2. [Jere'ch.] One of the descendants of Judah signalled as the "father — i.e. the founder — of Geor" (1 Chr. iv. 18). He was one of the sons of Ezrah by his wife Ha-Jeshubiah, i.e. the Jewess. The Jews, however, give an allegorical interpretation to the passage, and treat this and other names therein as titles of Moses — Jered, because he caused the manna to descend. Here — as noticed under Jabez — the pan, though obvious in Biblical Hebrew, where Jered (the root of Jordan) means "to descend," is concealed in the rabbinical paraphrase, which has שְׁלֹשׁ, a word with the same meaning, but without any relation to Jered, either for eye or ear.

eṣia, FA. —ēsia: Jeremai], a layman; one of the Bene-

Hesham, who was compelled by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 36). In the lists of Ezrast it is omitted.

JEREMIAH ('Iṣregh), as the more usual form, or Iṣregh, ch. xxxvi.-xxxviii.: Iṣregha: Jeremias, Vulg.: Hieremia, Hieron. et al.). The name has been variously explained: by Jerome and Simonis (Onomast., p. 535), as "the exalted of the Lord;" by Gesenius (t. c.), as "appointed of the Lord;" by Carpoza (Intro. ad Tob. V. T. p. 3 c, fol.) following by Hengstenberg (Christologia des A. B. vol. i., as "the Lord throws" — the latter seeing in the name a prophetic reference to the book described in i. 10; [by Dietrich, "whom Jehovah founds," i.e. establishes.]

1. Life. — It will be convenient to arrange what is known as to the life and work of this prophet in sections corresponding to its chief periods. The materials for such an account are to be found almost exclusively in the book which bears his name. Whatever interest may attach to Jewish or Christian traditions connected with his name, they have no claim to be regarded as historical, and we are left to form what picture we can of the man and of his times from the narratives and prophecies which he himself has left. Fortunately, these have some down to us, though in some disorder, with usual fullness; and there is no one in the "goodly fellowship of the prophets" of whom, in his work, feelings, sufferings, we have so distinct a knowledge.
He is for us the great example of the prophetic life, the representative of the prophetic order. It is not x be wondered at that he should have seemed to the Christian feeling of the Early Church a type of Man in whom that life received its highest completion (Hieron. Comm. in Jerem. xxii. 3); Origen, Hom. in Jerem. i. and viii.; Aug. de Prae. Dei, c. xxvii.), or that recent writers should have identified him with the "Servant of the Lord" in the later chapters of Isaiah (Bansen, Gott in der Gus chte, i. 425-447; Engelbach, art. "Jerem." in Herzen's Real-Enzyklop.).

(1.) Under Josiah, n. c. 638-686. — In the 39th year of the reign of Josiah, the prophet speaks of himself as still "a child" (2 K. i. 6). We cannot rely indeed on this word as a chronological datum.
It may have been used simply as the expression of conscious weakness, and as a word of age it extends from infant infancy (Ex. ii. 6; 1 Sam.
iv. 11) to entire manhood (2 Sam. viii. 15; 1 K. li. 7).
We may at least infer, however, as we can trace his life in full activity for upwards of forty years from this period, that at the commencement of that reign he could not have passed out of actual childhood. He is described as "the son of Hilkiah of the priests that were in Anathoth" (1. 1).
Were we able, with some earlier (0.lem. Al. Strom.
I. p. 142; Jerome, Opor. tom. iv § 16, 11) and some later writers (Gellhorn, Celsius, Maldonatus, von Boden, Umbreit), to identify this Hilkiah with the high-priest who bore so large a share in Josiah's work of reformation, it would be interesting to think of the king and the prophet, so nearly of the same age (2 Chr. xxxiv. 1), as growing up together under the same training, subject to the same influences. Against this hypothesis, however, there have been urged the facts (Carpos. Keil, Ewald, and others) — (1.) that the name is too common to be a ground of identification; (2.) that the manner in which this Hilkiah is mentioned is incosistent with the notion of his having been the High-priest of Israel; (3.) that neither Jeremiah himself, nor his opponents, allude to this parentage; (4.) that the priests who lived at Anathoth were of the House of Uthman (1 K. ii. 26; 1 Chr. xxiv.
3), while the high-priests from Zadok downwards were of the line of Eleazar (Carpos. Introd. in lib.
V. T. Jerem.). The occurrence of the same name may be looked on, however, in this as in many other instances in the O. T., as a probable indication of affinity or friendship; and this, together with the coincidences — (1.) that the uncle of Jeremiah (xxxvi. 7) bears the same name as the husband of Hilkiah; (2.) that the high-priests from Zadok downwards in Anathoth as a son of Shaphan, the great supporter of Hilkiah and Huldah in their work (2 Chr.
xxiv. 20) was also, throughout, the great protector of the prophet (Jer. xxvi. 24), may help to throw some light on the education by which he was prepared for that work to which he was taught to have been "sacrificed from his mother's womb." The strange Rabbinic tradition (Carpos. i. c.), that right of the personal most conspicuous among the religious history of this period (Jeremiah, Baruch, Nechoh, Maseiah, Hilkiah, Hanameel, Huldah, Shaphan) were all descended from the harlot Rahab, day possibly have been a distortion of the fact that they were connected, in some way or other, as members of a family. If this were so, we can form a tolerably distinct notion of the influences that were at work on Jeremiah's youth. The boy would hear among the priests of his native town, not three miles distant from Jerusalem [Anathoth], of the obediences and cruelties of Manasseh and his son Amon. He would be trained in the traditional practices and ordinances of the Law. He would become acquainted with the names and writings of other prophets, such as Mica and Isaiah.
As
he grew up towards manhood, he would hear also of the work which the king and his counsellors were carrying on, and of the teaching of the woman, who alone, or nearly so, in the midst of that religious revival, was looked upon as speaking from direct prophetic inspiration. In all likelihood, as we have seen, he came into actual contact with them. Possibly, too, to this period of his life we may trace the commencement of that friendship with the family of Neriah which was afterwards so fruitful in results. The two brothers Baruch and Nechoh both appear as the disciples of the prophet (xxxvi. 4, li. 59); both were the sons of Neriah, the first born of Josiah (Jerem. vii. 21; xxxiv. 7. xxiv. 8) was governor of Jerusalem, acting with Hilkiah and Shaphan in the religious reforms of Josiah. As the result of all these influences we find in him all the conspicuous features of the devout ascetic character: intense consciousness of his own weakness, great susceptibility to varying emotions, a spirit easily bowed down. But there were also, we may believe (assuming only that the prophetic character is the development, purified and exalted, of the natural, not its contradiction), the strong national feelings of an Israelite, the desire to see his nation becoming in reality what it had been called to be, anxious doubts whether this was possible, for a people that had sunk so low (cf. Maurice, Propheils and Kings of the O. T., Sem. xxii.-xxiv.; Ewald, Propheils. ii. p. 6-8).
Left to himself, he might have borne his part among the reforming priests of Josiah's reign, free from their formalism and hypocrisy. But the word of Jehovah came to him" (1. 2); and by that divine voice the secret of his future life was revealed to him, at the very time when the work of reformation was going on with fresh vigor (2 Chr. xxxiv. 3), when he himself was beginning to have the thoughts and feelings of a man. He was to lay aside all self-distraction, all natural fear and trembling (1. 7, 8), and to accept his calling as a prophet of Jehovah
"set over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out and to pull down, and to destroy and to throw down, to build and to plant" (i. 10). A life-long martyrdom was set before him, a struggle against kings and priests and people (i. 18). When was this wonderful mission developed into action? We may have a clue there, and the life of the man who received it? For a time, it would seem, he held aloft from the work which was going on throughout the nation. His name is nowhere mentioned in the history of the memorable eighteenth year of Josiah. Though five years had passed since he had entered on the work of a prophet, it is from Hilkiah, not from him, that the son of Maseiah (c. c.); and conse-quence of the Book of the Law, however (we need not now inquire whether it was the Pentateuch as — A Carpos. (i. c.) fixes twenty as the probable age of Jeremiah at the time of his call.
a whole, or a lost portion of it, or a compilation altogether new), could not fail to exercise an influence on a mind like Jeremiah's: his later writings show abundant traces of it (cf. infra); and the result apparently was, that he could not share the hopes which others cherished. To them the reformation seemed more thorough than that accomplished by Hezekiah. They might think that fasts, and sacrifices, and the punishment of idolaters, might avert the penalties of which they heard in the book so strangely found (Deut. xxvii., xxviii., xxxii.), and might lead for a time to peace, of godliness and security (vii. 4). He saw that the reformation was but a surface one. Israel had gone into captivity, and Judah was worse than Israel (iii. 11). It was as hard for him as it had been for Isaiah, to find among the princes and people who worshipped in the Temple, one just, truth-seeking man (v. 1. 28). His own work, as a priest and prophet, led him to discern the falsehood and lust of rule which were at work under the form of zeal (v. 31). The spoken or written prophecies of his contemporaries, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Urijah, Huldah, may have served to deepen his convictions, that the sentence of condignation was already passed, and that there was no escape from it. The strange visions which had followed upon his call (i. 11-16) taught him that Jehovah would " hasten " the performance of His word; and if the Sycionid intruders of the later years of Josiah's reign seemed in part to correspond to the " destruction coming from the North " (Ewald, Propheta in loc.), they could hardly be looked upon as exaggerating the words that spoke of it. Hence, though we have hardly any mention of special incidents in the life of Jeremiah during the eighteen years between his call and Josiah's death, the main features of his life come distinctly enough before us. He had even then his experience of the bitterness of the lot to which God had called him. The duties of the priest, even if he continued to discharge them, were merged in those of the new and special office. Strange as it was for a priest to remain unmarried, his lot was to be one of solitude (xvi. 2). It was not for him to enter into the house of feasting, or even into that of mourning (xv. 5, 8). From time to time he appeared, clad probably in the " rough garment " of a prophet (Zech. xiii. 4), in Anathoth and Jerusalem. He was heard warning and protesting, " rising early and speaking " (xxv. 3), and as the result of this there came " reproach and derision daily " (xx. 8). He was betrayed by his own kindred (xii. 6), persecuted with murderous hate by his own townsmen (xiv. 21), mocked with the taunting question, Where is the word of Jehovah? (xvii. 13). And there were inner spiritual trials as well as these outward ones. He too, like the writers of Job and Ps. cxiii., was haunted by perplexities rising out of the disorders of the world (xii. 1, 2); on him there came the bitter feeling, that he was " a man of contention to the whole earth " (xxv. 10); the doubt whether his whole work was not a delusion and lie (xxvi. 19); the tempting of all times to fall back into silence, until the fire again burnt within him, and he was weary of forbearing (xx. 9). Whether the passages that have been referred to belong, all of them, to this period or a later one, they represent that which was inseparable from the prophet's life at all times, and which, in a character like Jeremiah's, was developed in its strongest form. Towards the close of the reign, however, he appears to have taken some part in the great national questions then at issue. The overthrow of the Assyrian monarchy to which Manasseh had become tributary led the old Egyptian party among the princes of Judah to revive their plans, and to urge an alliance with Pharaoh-Necho, as did Ezekiel (xvii. 18). Jeremiah, following in the footsteps of Isaiah (Is. xxx. 1-7), warned them that it would lead only to confusion (ii. 18, 36). The policy of Josiah was determined, probably, by this counsel. He chose to attach himself to the new Chaldean kingdom, and lost his life in the vain attempt to stop the progress of the Egyptian king. We may think of this as one of the first great sorrows of Jeremiah's life. His lamentations for the king (2 Chr. xxxv. 25) may have been those of personal friendship. They were certainly those of a man who, with nothing before him but the prospect of confusion and wrong, looks back upon a reign of righteousness and truth (xxii. 16).

(2.) Under Jehoahaz (= Shalman), n. c. 608. — The short reign of this prince — chosen by the people on hearing of Josiah's death, and after three months deposed by Pharaoh-Necho — gave little scope for direct prophetic action. The fact of his deposition, however, shows that he had been set up against Egypt, and therefore as representing the policy of which Jeremiah had been the advocate; and this may account for the tenderness and pity with which he speaks of him in his Egyptian exile (xxii. 11, 12).

(3.) Under Jehoiakim, n. c. 607-597. — In the weakness and disorder which characterized this reign, the work of Jeremiah became daily more prominent. The king had come to the throne as the vassal of Egypt, and for a time the Egyptian party was dominant in Jerusalem. It numbered among its members many of the princes of Judah, many priests and prophets, the Pashurs and the Hananihas. Others, however, remained faithful to the policy of Josiah, and held that the only way of safety lay in accepting the supremacy of the Chaldeans. Jeremiah appeared as the chief representative of this party. He had learnt to discern the signs of the times; the evils of the nation were not to be cured by any half-measures of reform, or by foreign alliances. The king of Babylon was God's servant (xx. 9, xxviii. 6), doing his work and was for a time to prevail over all resistance. Hard as it was for one who sympathized so deeply with all the sufferings of his country, this was the conviction to which he had to bring himself. He had to expose himself to the suspicion of treachery by declaring it. Men claiming to be prophets had their " word of Jehovah " to set against his (xiv. 14, xxiii. 17), and all that he could do was to submit his heart to God, and let the result come. None of the most striking scenes in this conflict are brought before us with great vividness. Soon after the accession of Jehoiakim, on one of the sol -

a This is clearly the natural inference from the words, and patristic writers take the fact for granted.
b The hypothesis which ascertains these lamentations to Jeremiah of Libnah, Josiah's father-in-law, is hardly worth refuting.
The feast-days — when the courts of the Temple were filled with worshippers from all the cities of Judah, the prophet appeared in a garment the message that Jerusalem should become a curse, that the Temple should share the fate of the tabernacle of Shiloh (xxvi. 6). Then it was that the great struggle of his life began: priests and prophets and people joined in the demand for his death (xxvi. 8). The princes of Judah, among whom were still many of the counsellors of Josiah, or their sons, endeavoured to protect him (xxvi. 18). His friends, including the president of the Meroshaites, who in the reign of Hezekiah had uttered a like prophecy with impurity, and so for a time he escaped. The fate of one who was stirred up to prophesy in the same strain showed, however, what he might expect from the weak and cruel king. If Jeremiah was not at once hunted to death, like Uriah (xxvi. 23), it was only because his friend Ahikam was powerful enough to protect him. The fourth year of Jehoiakim was yet more memorable. The battle of Carchemish overthrew the hopes of the Egyptian party (xvi. 2), and the armies of Nebuchadnezzar drove those who had no defended cities to take refuge in Jerusalem (xxvii. 11). As one of the consequences of this, we have the interesting episode of the Hechabites. The mind of the prophet, acetic in his habits, shrinking to the simple life of a Chaldaean prophet, perceiving that a natural enough drawn towards the tribe which was at once conspicuous for its abstinencc from wine and its traditional hatred of idolatry (2 K. x. 15). The occurrence of the name of Jeremiah among them, and their ready reception into the Temple, may point, perhaps, to a previous intimacy with him and his brother priests. Now they and their mode of life had a new significance for him. They, with their reverence for the precepts of the founders of their tribe, were as a living protest against the disobedience of the men of Judah to a higher law (xxviii. 18). In this year too came another solemn message to the king: prophecies which had been uttered, here and there at intervals, were now to be gathered together, written in a book, and read as a whole in the hearing of the people. Baruch, already known as the prophet's disciple and scribe; and in the following year, when a solemn fast-day called the whole people together in the Temple (xxxvi. 1-10), Jeremiah — hindered himself, we know not how — sent him to proclaim them. The result was as it had been before: the princes of Judah cowarded at the escape of the prophet and his scribe (xxxvi. 19). The king vented his impotent rage upon the scroll which Jeremiah had written. Jeremiah and Baruch, in their retirement, wrote it with many added prophecies; among them, probably, the special prediction that the king should die by the sword, and he cast out unburied and dishonoured (xxii. 30). In ch. xlv., which belongs to this period, we have a glimpse into the relations which existed between the master and the scholar, and into what at that time were the contents of his mind. The prophet and more eager, had expected a change for the better. To play a prominent part in the impending crisis, to be the hero of a national revival, to gain the favor of the conqueror whose coming he announced — this, or something like this, had been the vision that had come before him, and when this passed away he sank into despair at the seeming fruitlessness of his efforts. Jeremiah had passed through that phase of trial and could sympathize with it and knew how to meet it. To the mind of his disciple, as once to his own, the future was revealed in all its dreariness. He foretold the great things "for himself in the midst of his country and ruin: his life, and that only, was to be given him "for a prey." As the danger drew nearer, there was given to the Prophet a clearer insight into the purposes of God for his people. He might have thought before, as others did, that the chastisement would be but for a short time, that repentance would lead to strength, and that the yoke of the Chaldaean conqueror would be lifted off; but he knew that it would last for seventy years (xxv. 12), till he and all that generation had passed away. Nor was it on Judah only that the king of Babylon was to execute the judgments of Jehovah: all nations that were within the prophet's ken would be to drink as fully as she did of "the wine-cup of his fury" (xxv. 15-38). In the absence of special dates for other events in the reign of Jehoiakim, we may bring together into one picture some of the most striking features of this period of Jeremiah's life. As the danger from the Chaldaeans became more threatening, the persecution against him grew hotter, his own thoughts were more bitter and desponding (xviii.). The people sought his life: his voice rose up in the prayer that God would deliver and avenge him. Common facts became significant to him; the wonderful circumstances of the work of better aiming at the production of a perfect form, rejecting the vessels which did not attain to it, became a parable of God's dealings with Israel and with the world (xvii. 1-6: comp. Maurice, Prophecies and Kings, i. 6). That thought he soon reproduced in act as well as word. Standing in the valley of Ben-Hinnom, he broke the earthen vessel he carried in his hands, and prophesied to the people that the whole city should be defiled with the dead, as that valley had been, within their memory, by Josiah (xix. 10-13). The boldness of the speech and act drew upon him immediate punishment. The priest Pashur smote and put him "in the stocks" (xx. 2); and then there came upon him, as in all seasons of suffering, the sense of failure and weakness. The work of God's messengers seemed to him to terminate in nothing; he who had been called God's servant and the future of the nation, found himself to have been but a delusion, as the Lord had said (xx. 9). He used for himself the cry of wailing that had belonged to the extremest agony of Job (xx. 14-18). The years that followed brought no change for the better. Famine and drought were added to the miseries of the people (xix. 1), but false prophets still deceived them with assurances of plenty; and Jeremiah was looked on with dislike, as "a prophet of evil," and "every one cursed" him (xx. 10). He was set, however, "as a fenced hinman wall" (xx. 20), and went on with his work, reproving king and nobles and people; as for other sins, so also especially for their desecration of the Sabbath (xxii. 13-25), for their blind reverence for the Temple, and yet blinder trust in it, even while they were worshipping the Queen of Heaven in the city streets of Jerusalem (xxii. 14, 18). Now too, as before, his work extended to other nations: they were not to exult in the downfall of Judah, but to share it. All were to be swallowed up in the empire of the Chaldaeans (xxiii.-xxiv.). If there had been nothing beyond this, no hope for Israel or this world but that of a universal monarchy resting on brute strength, the work of Jeremiah would have been overwhelming; but through this darkness there gleamed the dawning of a glorious Hope. When
The seventy years were over, there was to be a restoration as wonderful as that from Egypt had been (xxxiii. 7). In the far off future there was the vision of a renewed kingdom; of a "righteous branch" of the house of David, "executing judgment and justice," of Israel and Judah dwelling safely, once more united, under "the Lord our Righteousness" (xxvii. 5, 6).

It is doubtful how far we can deal with the strange narrative of ch. xiii., as a fact in Jeremiah's life. "Prophecies (Prophecy not A. B, in loc.) rejects the reading "Euphrates" altogether; Hitzig, following Bochart, conjectures Euphrates. Most other modern commentators look on the narrative as merely symbolical. Assuming, however (with Calmet and Henderson, and the consensus of patristic expositors), that there, as in xix. 1, 10, xxvii. 2; Is. xx. 2, the symbols, however strange they might seem, were not and not, it is open to us to conjecture that in this visit to the land of the Chaldeans may have originated his acquaintance with the princes and commanders who afterwards befriended him. The special commands given in his favor by Nebuchadnezzar (xxxix. 11) seem at any rate to imply some previous knowledge.

— The danger which Jeremiah had so long foretold now threatened his life. Probably his successor, was carried into exile, and with them all that constituted the worth and strength of the nation,—princes, warriors, artists (2 K. xxiv.). Among them too were some of the false prophets who had encouraged the people with the hope of a speedy deliverance, and could not yet abandon their blind confidence. Of the work of the prophet in this short reign we have but the fragmentary record of xxvi. 24—30. We may infer, however, from the language of his later prophecies, that he looked with sympathy and sorrow on the fate of the exiles in Babylon: and that the fulfillment of all that he had been told to utter made him stronger than ever in his resistance to all schemes of independence and revolt.

(5.) Under Zedekiah, n. c. 597-586. — In this prince (probably, as having been appointed by Nebuchadnezzar, he failed to find the same obstinate resistance to the prophet's counsels as in Jehoiakin. He respects him, fears him, seeks his counsel; but he is a mere shadow of a king, powerless even against his own counselors, and in his reign, accordingly, the sufferings of Jeremiah were sharper than they had been before. The struggle with the false prophets went on: the more desperate the condition of their country, the more daring were their predictions of deliverance. Between such men, living in the present, and the true prophet, walking by faith in the unseen future of a righteous kingdom (xxiii. 5, 6), there could not but be an interminable enmity. He saw too plainly that nothing but the most worthless remnant of the nation had been left in Judah (xxiv. 5-8), and denounced the falsehood of those who came with lying messages of peace. First Jehoiakin, then the exiles (conveyed in a letter which, of all portions of the O. T., comes nearest in form and character to the Epistles of the N. T.) was, that they should submit to their lot, prepare for a long captivity, and wait quietly for the ultimate restoration. In this hope he found comfort for himself which made his sleep "sweet" unto him, even in the midst of all his sorrows and strife (xxx. 20). Even at Babylon, however, there were false prophets opposing him, speaking of him as a "madman" (xxiv. 26), urging the priests of Jerusalem to more active persecution. The trial soon followed. The king at first seemed willing to be guided by him, and sent to ask for his intercession (xxvii. 3), but the apparent revival of the power of Egypt under Apries (Ptolemy-Hophra), created false hopes, and drew him and the princes of the neighboring nations into projects of revolt. The earnestness with which Jeremiah had foretold the ultimate overthrow of Babylon, in a letter sent to the exiles in that city by his disciple, Baruch's brother Semiah (assuming the genuineness of I. and ii.), made him all the more certain that the time of that overthrow had not yet arrived, and that it was not to come from the hand of Egypt. He appears in the streets of the city with bonds and yokes upon his neck (xxvii. 2), announcing that they were meant for Judah and its allies. The false prophet Hananiah — who broke the offensive symbol (xxxviii. 10), and predicted the destruction of the Chaldeans within two years (xxviii. 3) — learnt that "a yoke of iron" was upon the neck of all the nations, and died himself while it was still pressing heavily on Judah (xxviii. 16, 17). The approach of an Egyptian army, however, and the consequent departure of the Chaldeans, made the position of Jeremiah full of danger; and he went to his home a prisoner, and the judicial procession of Jehoiachin, his escape from a city in which he seemed, he could no longer do good, and to take refuge in his own town of Anathoth or its neighborhood (xxviii. 12). The discovery of this plan led, not unnaturally perhaps, to the charge of desertion: it was thought that he too was "falling away to the Chaldeans," as others were doing (xxviii. 29); and, in spite of his denial, he was thrown into a dungeon (xxviii. 13). The interposition of the king, who still respected and consulted him, led to some mitigation of the rigor of his confinement (xxviii. 21); but, as this did not hinder him from speaking to the people, the princes of Judah—sent on an alliance with Egypt, and calculating on the king's being unable to resist them (xxviii. 5)—threw him into the prison-pit, to die there. From this horrible fate he was again delivered by the friendship of the Ethiopian eunuch, Ebed-Meles, who found the king's "evil in this city in which he had been kept previously, where we find (xxx. 16) he had the companionship of Baruch. In the impotence of his perplexity, Zedekiah once again secretly consulted him (xxxviii. 14), but only to hear the certainty of failure if he continued to resist the authority of the Chaldeans. The same counsel was repeated more openly when the king sent Pashur (not the same person mentioned) and Zephaniah—before friendly, it appears, to Jeremiah, or at least neutral (xxix. 20)—to ask for his advice. Fruitless as it was, we may yet trace, in the softened language of xxiv. 5, one consequence of the king's kindness: though exile was inevitable, he was yet to "die in peace." The return of the Chaldean army filled both king and people with dismay (xxvii. 1); and the risk now was, that they would pass from their presumptuous confidence to the opposite extreme and sink down in despair, with no faith in God and no hope for the future. The prophet was taught how to meet that danger also. In his prison, while the Chaldeans were ravaging the country, he bought, with all requisite formalities, the field at Anathoth, which his kinsman Hanamel wished to get rid of (xxvi. 6-9). His faith in the promises of God did not fail him.
With a confidence in his country's future, which has been compared (Nagyebisch, L. c.) to that of the Roman who bought at its full value the very ground on which the forces of Hannibal were encamped (Liv. xxxvi. 11), he believed not only that "houses and fields and vineyards should again be possessed in the land" (xxxii. 15), but that the voice of gladness should still be heard there (xxxiii. 11), that, under the "Lord our Righteousness," the house of David and the priests the Levites should never be without representatives (xxxiii. 15-18). At last the blow came. The solemn renewal of the national covenant (xxxiv. 10), the offer of freedom to all who had been brought into slavery, were of no avail. The selfishness of the nobles was stronger even than their fears, and the prophet, who had before rebuked them for their desecration of the Sabbath, now had to protest against their disregard of the sabbatic year (xxxiv. 14). The city was taken, the temple burnt. The king and his princes shared the fate of Jehoiachin. The prophet gave utterance to his sorrow in the Lamentations.

(6.) After the capture of Jerusalem, B. C. 586-7. The Chaldean party in Judah had now the prospect of better things. Nebuchadnezzar did not fail to reward those who, in the midst of hardships of all kinds, had served him so faithfully. We find accordingly a special charge given to Nebuzaradan (xxxiv. 11) to protect the person of Jeremiah, and, after being carried as far as Ramah with the crown of captives (xl. 1), he was set free, and Gedaliah, the son of his steadfast friend Ahikam, made governor over the cities of Judah. The feeling of the Chaldeans towards him was shown yet more strongly in the offer made him by Nebuzaradan (xl. 4,5). It was left to him to decide whether he would go to Babylon, with the prospect of living there under the patronage of the king, or remain in his own land with Gedaliah and the remnant over whom he ruled. Whatever may have been his motive—sympathy with the sufferings of the people, attachment to his native land, or the desire to help his friend—the prophet chose the latter, and the Chaldean commander "gave him a reward," and set him free. For a short time there was an interval of peace (xl. 9-12), soon broken, however, by the murder of Gedaliah by Ishmael and his associates. We are left to conjecture in what way the prophet escaped from a massacre which was apparently intended to include all the adherents of Gedaliah. The fullness with which the history of the massacre is narrated in chap. xii. makes it however probable that he was among the prisoners whom Ishmael was carrying off to the Ammonites, and who were released by the arrival of Johanan. One of Jeremiah's friends was thus cut off, but Baruch still remained with him, and his life, though under constant danger, was spared, and his work continued. We are not informed how long the command on the death of Gedaliah, turned to him for counsel. "The governor appointed by the Chaldeans had been assassinated. Would not their vengeance fall on the whole people? Was there any safety but in escaping to Egypt while they could?" They came accordingly to Jeremiah with a foregone conclusion. With the risk of perils and the probability of that happening which had been foreseen, he consented to go with Baruch the old charge of treachery (xiii. 3). The people followed their own counsel, and—lest the two whom they suspected should betray or contract it—took them also by force to Egypt. There, in the city of Tahpanhes, we have the last clear glimpses of the prophet's life. His words are sharper and stronger than ever. He does not shrink, even there, from speaking of the Chaldean king once more as the "servant of Jehovah" (xiii. 10). He declares that they should see the throne of the conqueror set up in the very place which they had chosen as the securest refuge. He utters a final protest against the ideas of which the death of Gedaliah and their fathers had been guilty, and which they were even then renewing. After this all is uncertain. If we could assume that li. 31 was written by Jeremiah himself, it would show that he reached an extreme old age, but this is so doubtful that we are left to other sources. On the one hand, there is the Christian tradition, resting doubtless on some earlier belief (Tertull., adv.omon. c. 8; Pseudo-Epiphan. Opp. lib. 239; Hieron., adv. Jovin. ii. 37, that the long tragedy of his life ended in actual martyrdom, and that the Jews at Tahpanhes, irritated by his rebukes, at last stoned him to death. Most commentators on the N. T. find an allusion to this in Heb. xvi. 37. An Alexandrian tradition reported that his bones had been brought to that city by Alexander the Great, who took the city of Tahpanhes, as Nebuchadnezzar had done the city of Jerusalem, 156, ed. Diodor, quoted by Carpzov and Nagyebisch). In the beginning of the last century travellers were told, though no one knew the precise spot, that he had been buried at Gilead (Lucas, Travels in the Levant, p. 28). On the other side, there is the Jewish statement that, on the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he, with Baruch, made his escape to Babylon (Seder Olam Rabba, c. 26); Genadriel, Chronol. Heb. 1608) or Judah (R. Solomon Jarchi, on Jer. xiv. 14), and died in peace. Josephus is altogether silent as to his fate, but states generally that the Jews who took refuge in Egypt were finally carried to Babylon as captives (Ant. x. 9). It is not impossible, however, that both the Jewish tradition and the silence of Josephus originated in the desire to gloss over a great crime, and that the elder of Nebuzaradan (xl. 4) suggested the conjecture that afterwards grew into an assertion. As it is, the darkness and doubt that brood over the last days of the prophet's life are more significant than either of the issues which presented themselves to men's imaginations as the winding-up of his career. He did not need a death by violence to make him a true martyr. To die, with none to record the time or manner of his death, was the right end for one who had spoken all along, not to win the praise of men, but because the word of the Lord was in him a "burning fire" (xx. 9). May we not even conjecture that this silence was due to the prophet himself? If we believe (cf. infra) that Baruch, who was with Jeremiah in Egypt, survived him, and had any share in bringing out and editing his prophecies, it is hard to account for the omission of a fact of so much interest, except on the hypothesis that his lips were sealed by the injunctions of the master who thus taught him, by example as well as by precept, that he was not to seek "great things" for himself.

Other traditions connected with the name of Jeremiah are obscure, though they throw no light on his history, are interesting, as showing the impression left by his work and life on the minds of later generations. As the Captivity dragged on, the prophecy of the Seventy Years, which had at first been so full of terror, came to be a ground of hope.
JEREMIAH

I. Character and Style. — It will have been seen from this narrative that there fell to the lot of Jeremiah sharper suffering than any previous prophet had experienced. It was not merely that the misery which others had seen afar off was actually pressing on him and on his country, nor that he had to endure a life of persecution, while they had intervals of repose, in which they were honored and their counsel sought. In addition to all this, causes of outward circumstances, there was that of individual character, influenced by them, reacting on them. In every page of his prophecies we recognize the temperament which, while it does not lead the man who has it to shrink from doing God’s work, however painful, makes the pain of doing it infinitely more acute, and gives to the whole character the terrors of a deeper and more lasting melancholy. He is preeminently “the man that hath seen afflictions” (Lam. iii. 1). There is no sorrow like unto his sorrow (Lam. i. 12). He witnesses the departure, one by one, of all his hopes of national reformation and deliverance. He has to appear, Cassandra-like, as a prophet of evil, dashes to the ground the false hopes with which the people are buoying themselves up. Other prophets, like Elias, Elisha, Isaiah, had taught the people to resistance. He (like Phocion in the parallel crisis of Athenian history) has been brought to the conclusion, bitter as it is, that the only safety for his countrymen lies in their accepting that against which they are contending as the worst of evils; and this brings on him the charge of treachery and desertion. If it were not for his trust in the God of Israel, for his hope of a better future to be brought out of all this chaos and darkness, his heart would fail within him. But that vision is clear and bright, and it gives to him, almost as fully as to Isaiah, the character of a prophet of the Gospel. He is not merely an Israelite looking forward to a national restoration. In the midst of all the woe which he utters against neighboring nations he has hopes and promises for them also (xlvii. 47, xlix. 6, 30). In that stormy sunset of prophecy, he beholds, in spirit, the dawn of a brighter and eternal day. He sees that, if there is any hope of salvation for his people, it cannot be by a return to the old system and the old ordinances, divine though they once had been (xxxi. 31). There must be a New Covenant. That word, destined to be so full of power for all after-ages, appears first in his prophecies. The relations between him and the people as a member of the Christian church, and appeared in the notion that he had never really died, but would return one day from Paradise as one of the “two witnesses” of the Apocalypse (Victorinus, Comm. in Apoc. xi. 13). Egyptian legends assumed yet wilder and more fantastic forms. He it was who foretold to the priests of Egypt that their idols should one day fall to the ground in the presence of the virgin king (Epictetus, Tē Tript. Opp. p. 290). Playing the part of a St. Patrick, he had delivered one district on the shores of the Nile from crocodiles and asps, and even in the 4th century of the Christian era the dust of that region was looked on as a specific against their bites (ibid.). According to another tradition, he had returned from Egypt to Jerusalem, and lived there for 300 years (D’Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 499). The O.T. narrative of his sufferings was dressed out with the incidents of a Christian martyrdom (Eupolemus, Polyhist. in Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 39).

way the outward form of his writings answers to his life, we find some striking characteristics that help us to understand both. As might be expected in one who lived in the last days of the kingdom, and had therefore the works of the earlier prophets to look back upon, we find in him reminiscences and reproductions of what they had written, which indicate the way in which his own spirit had been educated (comp. Is. xi. 19, 20, with x. 9—Ps. xxviii. 7, with whom speaks out of the fulness of his heart, to reproduce himself—to repeat in nearly the same words the great truths on which his own heart rested, and to which he was seeking to lead others (comp. marginal references possin, and list in Keil, Einl. § 74). Throughout, too, there are the tokens of his individual temperament: a greater prominence of the subjective, elegiac element than in other prophets, a less sustained energy, a less orderly and completed rhythm (De Wette, Einl. § 217; Ewald, Propheten, ii. 1—11). A careful examination of the several parts of his prophecy has led to the conviction that we may trace an increase of these characteristics corresponding to the accumulating trials of his life (Ewald, l. c.). The earlier writings are calmer, softer, more uniform in tone: the later show marks of age and weariness and sorrow, and are more strongly imbued with the language of individual suffering. Living at a time when the purity of the older Hebrew was giving way under continual contact with other kindred dialects, his language came under the influence which was acting on all the writers of his time, abounds in Aramaic forms, loses sight of the finer grammatical distinctions of the earlier Hebrew, includes many words not to be found in its vocabulary (Ehrenreich, Einl. in des A. T. iii. 121). It is in part distinctive of the man as well as of the time, that single words should have appeared full of a strange significance (i. 11), that whole predictions should have been embodied in names coined for the purpose (xiv. 6, xx. 3), and that the real analogies which presented themselves should have been drawn not from the region of the great and terrible, but from the mean and familiar incidents (xiii. 1—11, xviii. 1—10). Still more startling is his use of a kind of cipher (the Atbash; comp. Hitzig and Ewald on xxv. 26), con-

"image of the opening Gates of the Inferno is not without importance, as bearing on this parallelism."
The context of the name Jeremiah with any other portion of the O. T. is to pass from the field of history into that of conjecture; but the fact that Hitzig (Comm. über die Psalmen), followed in part by Rödiger (Ersch und Grüber, Encycl. art. Jerem.), assigns not less than thirty psalms (cc. vi., vii., xxi.-xxii., lii.-lv., lxxix.-lxxxi.) to his authorship is, at least, so far instructive that it indicates what were the hymns, belonging to that or an earlier period, with which his own spirit had most affinity, and to which he and other like sufferers might have turned as the fit expression of their feelings.

III. Arrangement. — The absence of any chronological order in the present structure of the collection of Jeremiah's prophecies is obvious at the first glance; and this has led some writers (Blayney, Pref. to Jeremiah) to the belief that, as the book now stands, there is nothing but the wildest confusion — "a preposterous jumbling together" of prophecies of different dates. Attempts to reconstruct the book on a chronological basis have been made by almost all commentators on it since the revival of criticism (Simonis, Vitringa, Cornelius à Lapide, among the earliest; cf. De Wette, Einl. § 220); and the result of the labors of the more recent critics has been to modify the somewhat hasty judgment of the English divine. Whatever points of difference there may be in the hypotheses of Movers, Hitzig, Ewald, Bunsen, Nagelschmidt, and others, they agree in admitting traces of an order in the midst of the seeming irregularity, and endeavor to account, more or less satisfactorily, for the apparent anomalies. The conclusion of the three last-named is that we have the book substantially in the same state in which it left the hands of the prophet, or his disciple Baruch. Confining ourselves, for the present, to the Hebrew order (reproduced in the A. V.) we have two great divisions:

1. Ch. i.-xv. Prophecies delivered at various times, directed mainly to Judah, or connected with Jeremiah's personal history.
2. Ch. xvi.-lii. Prophecies connected with later nations.

Ch. lii., taken largely, though not entirely, from 2 K. xxv., may be taken either as a supplement to the prophecy, or (with Grotius and Lowth) as an introduction to the Lamentations.

Looking more closely into each of these divisions, we have the following sections. The narrative of xxxvi. 32 serves to explain the growth of the book in its present shape, and accounts for some, at least, of its anomalies. Up to the 4th year of Jehoiakim, it would appear, no prophecies had been committed to writing; or, if written, they had not been collected and preserved. Then the more memorable among the messages which the word of the Lord had from time to time brought to him were written down at the dictation of the prophet himself. When that roll was destroyed, a second was written out, and other prophecies or narratives added as they came. We may believe that this MS. was the groundwork of our present text; but it is easy to understand how, in transcribing such a document, or collection of documents, the desire to introduce what seemed to the transcriber a better order might lead to many modifications. As it is, we recognize — adopting Bunsen's classification (Gott in der Geschichte, i. 113), as being the most natural, and agreeing substantially with Ewald's — the following groups of prophecies, the sections in each being indicated by the recurrence of the formula, "The word of the Lord came to Jeremiah," in fuller or abbreviated forms.

1. Ch. i.-xvi. Containing probably the substance of the book of xxxvi. 32, and including prophecies from the 13th year of Josiah to the 4th of Jehoiakim: i. 3, however, indicates a later revision, and the whole of ch. i. may possibly have been added at the end of this period. The prophecy of xxxvi. 2 was probably written, since its first beginning. Ch. xvi. belongs to a later period, but has probably found its place here as connected, by the recurrence of the name Pashur, with ch. xx.

2. Ch. xvii.-xxv. Shorter prophecies, delivered at different times against the kings of Judah and the false prophets. Xxxv. 13, 14 evidently marks the conclusion of a series of prophecies; and that which follows, xxxv. 15-38, the germ of the fuller predictions in xvi.-xxii., has been placed here as a kind of completion to the prophecy of the Seventy Years and the subsequent fall of Babylon.

3. Ch. xxvi.-xxxvii. The two great prophecies of the fall of Jerusalem, and the history connected with them. Ch. xxxvi. belongs to the earlier, ch. xxxvii. and xxxviii. to the later period of the prophet's work. Jehoiakim in xxvii. 1 is evidently (comp. ver. 3) the year for Zech. xxxiv.

5. Ch. xlv.-xlvi. The history of the last two years before the capture of Jerusalem, and of Jeremiah's work in them and in the period that followed. Ch. xxxvi. and xxxvii. are remarkable as interrupting the chronological order, which otherwise would have been followed here more closely.

than in any other part. The position of ch. xlv., unconnected with anything before or after it, may be accounted for on the hypothesis that Harnack desired to place on record so memorable a passage in his own life, and inserted it where the direct narrative of his master's life ended. The same explanation applies in part to ch. xxxvi., which was evidently at one time the conclusion of one of the divisions.

6. Ch. xvi.-li. The prophecies against foreign ations, ending with the great prediction against Babylon.

7. The supplementary narrative of ch. lii.

IV. Text. The translation of the LXX. presents many remarkable variations, not only in details indicating that the translator found or substituted readings differing widely from those now extant in Hebrew codices (Keil, Einführung, § 76), but in the order of the several parts. Whether we suppose him to have had a different recension of the text, or to have endeavored to introduce an order according to his own notions into the seeming confusion of the Hebrew, the result is, that in no other book of the O. T. is there so great a diversity of arrangement. It is noticeable, as illustrating the classification given above, that the two agree as far as xxxv. 13. From that point all is different, and the following tables indicate the extent of the divergence. It will be seen that here there was the attempt to collect the prophecies according to their subject-matter. The thought of a consistently chronological arrangement did not present itself in such case more than the other.

Supposed Interpolations. — The genuineness of some portions of this book has been called in question, partly on the hypothesis that the version of the LXX. presents a purer text, partly on internal and a priori grounds. The following tables indicate the chief passages affected by each class of objections:

1. As omitted in the LXX.

(1) x, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.

(2) xxvii. 7.

(3) xxviii. 16-21 [not omitted, but with many variations].

(4) xxxiii. 14-21.

(5) xxxix. 4-13.

2. On other grounds.

(1) x, l.-li. As being altogether the work of a later writer, probably the so-called Pseudo-Jeremiah.
The fragment of ver. 11 is urged as confirming this view.

(2) xxv. 11-14.

(3) xxvii. 7.

(4) xxxiii. 14-26.

(5) xxxix. 1, 2, 4-15.

(6) xxviii.-xxix. As showing, in the shortened form of the prophet's name (Jerem. i. 1), and the addition of the epithet "Jeremias the prophet,"
the revision of a later writer.

(7) xxxvii.-xxvi.

As pertaining of the character of the later prophecies of Isaiah.

(8) xxvi. As betraying in language and statements the interpolations either of the later prophecies of Isaiah or of a still later writer.

(9) li. As being a continuation of events, inserted probably by the writer of ls. xxiv., and foreign in language and thought to the general character of Jeremiah's prophecies.

(10) liii. As being a supplementary addition to the book, compiled from 2 K. xxv. and other sources.

In these, as in other questions connected with the Hebrew text of the O. T., the impugners of the authenticity of the above passages are for the most part — De Wette, Movers, Hitzig, Ewald, Kielbel, Hengstenberg, Kiiper, and Umbreit, are among the chief defenders. (Comp. Keil, Einleitung, § 76; and, for a special defense of li. and liii., the monograph of Nagelsbach, Jeremia und Babyloyn.)

* The prophecies are often spoken of in the Bible as announcing orally their predictions and messages, but very seldom as writing them out either before or after their promulgation. In this respect we have more distinct notices concerning the habit of Jeremiah, than of any other prophet. We learn from Jer. xxxvi. 21, that in the fourth year of Jehoiachin he received a command from God to collect all that he had spoken "against Israel and against Judah, and against all the nations from the days of Josiah," and to write down the same in a book. In accordance with this direction he dedicated to his master his announcements all his prophecies up to that time. This collection was burnt by Judas itakim on account of the threatening which it contained against himself; but Jeremiah immediately prepared another in which he not only

It is noteworthy that the first quotation from Jeremiah as we open the Gospel history (Matt. ii. 17, 18) brings back to us the voice of lamentation and sorrow to which we were accustomed in the Old Testament.

Of the later Introductions to the Old Testament hose of Keil (pp. 249-294, 2te Aufl.), Bleek (pp. 169-501) and Davidson (iii. 87-120) contain important sections. The art. on Jeremiah in Ersch and Gruber’s Allgemein. Encyclopädie (Seite. ii. Bd. xv.) is by Rödiger; that in Herzog’s Real-Encyk. (vi. 478-483), by Nigelsbach; and that in Zeller’s Bild. Wörterb. (i. 666 ff.), of a popular character, by Wunderlich. Stanley’s sketch of Jeremiah (Jerish Church, ii. 570-622) describes him as reality the great personage of his epoch, not merely in his religious sphere, but in the state. For his poetical characteristics, see Lathw’s Lectures on Hebrew Poetry, pp. 177, 178 (Stone’s ed.), Meier, Gesch. d. prophet. Nat.- lit. der Hebräer (1856), pp. 395 ff. and Isaac Taylor’s Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, pp. 272 (N. Y. 1862). For Milman’s estimate of his importance and of his literary merits, see his History of the Jews, i. 439-448 (Amcr. ed.). His unrivalled elegies, says this eminent critic, combine the truth of history with the deepest pathos of poetry. He justifies the encomium by a translation of some of the passages, all remarkable for originality of thought and tenderness of expression, in which the Hebrew patriot laments the sad fate of Jerusalem on its being captured and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar.

On the general import of his prophecies the reader may consult F. R. Hasse’s Geschichte des A. Bandes, pp. 145-157; Köster’s Die Propheten, pp. 112-113, and Hengstenberg’s Christologie, especially in relation to the Messianic portions, ii. 381-473 (Edinb. 1856). It is to Jeremiah, says Stanley (ii. 580), “even more than to Isaiah, that the writers of the Apostolic age (Hebr. viii. 8, 13, x. 16, 17) look back, when they wish to describe the Dispensation of the Spirit. His predictions of the Anointed King are fewer and less distinct than those of the preceding prophets. But he is the prophet beyond all others of the New Testament, the New Covenant, which first appears in his writings.... And the knowledge of this new truth shall no longer be confined to any single order or caste, but all shall know the Lord, from the least unto the greatest” (Jer. xxxi. 33, 34).”

Seven other persons bearing the same name as the prophet are mentioned in the O. T.

2. 3. [Ierpwaj, Alex.-wmis, F.A.-wmis, Vat.-wmis; Ierpwaj, Vat.-wmis, Alex.-wmis, F.A.-Ierpwaj; 4. Ierpwaj, Vat.-wmis, Alex.-wmis]. Three warriors — two of the tribe of Gad — in David’s army, 1 Chr. xii. 4, 10, 13.

5. [Ierpwaj; Vat. Ierpwaj]. One of the “mighty men of valor” of the trans-Jordanic half tribe of Manasseh, 1 Chr. v. 24.

6. [F.A.-Ierpwaj; Alex. Ierpwaj, exc. xii. 34, Ierpwaj; Vat. Ierpwaj, Ierpwaj; F.A. Ierpwaj, Ierpwaj]. A priest of high rank, head of the second or third of the 21 courses which are apparently enumerated in Neh. x. 2-8. He is mentioned again, i.e. the course which was called after him is, in Neh. xii. 11; and we are told at v. 12 that the personal name of the head of this course in the days of Joakim was Hanamah. This course, or its chief, took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 34).

7. [Rom. Vat. Ierpwaj]. The father of Jaza’iah the Rechabite, Jer. xxxv. 3.

A Benjamite chief, son of the house of Beraiah of Ephraim, according to an obscure genealogy of the age of Hezekiah (1 Chr. viii. 14; comp. 12 and 18). His family dwelt at Jerusalem, as distinguished from the other division of the tribe, located at Gilbon (ver. 28).

In Esdras the names are respectively Ieremoth and Jerimoth.

6. The name which appears in the same list as "and Ramoth" (ver. 20) — following the correction of the Keri — is in the original text (Tehill) Jeremoth, in which form also it stands in 1 Esdr. ix. 30, Ieremoth, A. V. Ieremoth. A. C. H.

[Jeremias: Jeremias.]) These abbreviated forms were much in favor about the time that the A. V. was translated. Elsewhere we find Esai for Isaiah; and in the Homiletics such abbreviations as Zachary, Toby, etc., are frequent.

JERIACH (תֹּרְא, i. e. Teri-ya'ahu [founded by Jehovah]: Ierai: Exdai: [Vat. 1500, Ierai: Alex. Ierai: Ierai: Jerai:]) a Kohathite Levite, chief of the great house of Hebron when David organised the Levites (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23; in the latter passage the name of Hebron has been omitted both in the Hebrew and LXX.).

The same man is mentioned again, though with a slight difference in his name, as Jeriah.

JERIBAI [3 sls.] (תֹּרְא, [pers. whm Je- rovah defends]: Ieraih: [Vat. Ieraih]: Alex. Ieraih: Ieraih], one of the Bene-Eliannah [sons of E.], named among the heroes of David's guard in the supplemental list of 1 Chr. (xi. 46).

a In which case it would probably be a remnant of the old Canaanite worship of the heavenly bodies, which has left its traces in such names as Chemel, Jericho, etc.) Jericho is first mentioned as the city to which the two spies were sent by Joshua from Shittim: they were lodged in the house of Rahab the harlot upon the wall, and departed, having first promised to save her and all that were found in her house from destruction (ch. i. 21). In the annihilation of the city that ensued, this promise was silently observed. Her house was recognized by the scarlet line bound in the window from which the spies were let down, and she and her relatives were taken out of it, and "lodged without the camp;" but it is nowhere said or implied that her house escaped the general conflagration. That she "dwelt in Beth-shemesh, and others (see IDOLATRY, p. 1131 b) which may have been the head-quarters of the worship indicated in the names they bear. • also from תֹּרְא, rach, "to be broad," as in a wide plain; יָרֶח; [Vat. Such was either its vicinity, or the extent of its territory, that Gilgal, which formed their primary encampment, stood in its east border (iv. 19). That it had a king is a very secondary consideration, for almost every small town had one (ii. 19-24); in fact monarchy was the only form of government known to those primitive times — the government of the people of God presenting a marked exception to prevailing usage. But Jericho was further inclosed by walls — a fenced city — its walls were so considerable that at least one person (Rahab) had a house upon them (ii. 15), and its gates were shut, "as throughout the East still, when it was dark" (v. 6). Again, the spoil that was found in it betokened its influence — Ai, Makedah, Libnah, Lachish, Eglon, Hebron, Debir, and even Hazor, evidently contained nothing worth mentioning in comparison — besides sheep, oxen, and asses, we hear of vessels of brass and iron. These possibly may have been the first-fruits of those brass foundries "in the plain of Jordan" of which Solomon afterwards so largely availed himself (2 Chr. iv. 17). Silver and gold was found in such abundance that one man (Achan) could appropriate stealthily 200 shekels (100 oz. avoid. see Lewis, Hib. Rep. vi. 57) of the former, and "a wedge of gold of 50 shekels (25 oz.) weight; "a goodly Babylonish garment," purloined in the same dishonesty, may be adduced as evidence of a then existing commerce between Jericho and the far East (Josh. vi. 24, vii. 21). In fact its situation alone — in so noble a plain and contiguous to so prolific a river — would bespeak its importance in a country where these natural advantages have been always so highly prized, and in an age when people depended so much more upon the indigenous resources of nature than they are compelled to do now. But for the curse of Joshua (vi. 28) doubtless Jericho might have proved a more formidable counter-claim to the city of David than even Samaria.

Jericho is first mentioned as the city to which the two spies were sent by Joshua from Shittim: they were lodged in the house of Rahab the harlot upon the wall, and departed, having first promised to save her and all that were found in her house from destruction (ch. i. 21). In the annihilation of the city that ensued, this promise was silently observed. Her house was recognized by the scarlet line bound in the window from which the spies were let down, and she and her relatives were taken out of it, and "lodged without the camp;" but it is nowhere said or implied that her house escaped the general conflagration. That she "dwelt in Beth-shemesh, and others (see IDOLATRY, p. 1131 b) which may have been the head-quarters of the worship indicated in the names they bear.
Jericho

Israel" for the future; that she married Salmon son of Naasson, "prince of the children of Judah," and had by him, Poriah, the husband of Ruth and progenitor of David and of our Lord; and lastly, that she was the first and only gentile name that appears in the list of the faithful of the O. T. given by St. Paul (Josh. vi. 25; 1 Chr. ii. 10; Matt. i. 5; Heb. xi. 31), all these facts surely indicate that she did not continue to inhabit the accredited site; and, if so, and in absence of all direct evidence to the contrary, "Jericho" has been inferred that her house was left standing.

Such as it had been left by Joshua, such it was bestowed by him upon the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xvii. 21), and from this time a long interval elapses before Jericho appears again upon the scene. It is only incidentally mentioned in the life of David in connection with his embassy to the Ammonite king (2 Sam. x. 5). And the solemn manner in which its second foundation under Hel; the Bethelite is of the direction recorded — upon whom the curse of Joshua is said to have descended in full force (1 K. xvi. 34) — would certainly seem to imply that up to that time its site had been uninhabited. It is true that mention is made of "a city of palm-trees" (Judg. i. 16, and iii. 13) in existence apparently at the time when spoken of; and that Jericho is twice once before its first overthrow, and once, surely its second foundation — designated by that name (see Deut. xxxiv. 3, and 2 Chr. xxvii. 15). But it would be difficult to prove the identity of the city mentioned in the book of Judges, and as in the territory of Judah, with Jericho. However, once actually rebuilt, Jericho rose again slowly into consequence. In its immediate vicinity the sons of the prophets sought retirement from the world; had he built the spire of the waters," and over and against it, beyond Jordan, Elijah "went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2 K. ii. 1-22). In its plains Zedekiah fell into the hands of the Chaldeans (2 K. xxv. 5; Jer. xxxix. 5). By what may be called a retrospective account of it, we may infer that Hiel's restoration had not utterly failed; for in the return under Zerubbabel the "children of Jericho," 544 in number, are comprised (Ezra. ii. 44). Neb. iii. 2). We now enter upon its more modern phase. The Jericho of the days of Josephus was distant 150 stadia from Jerusalem, and 50 from the Jordan. It lay in a plain, overlain by a barren mountain whose roots ran northwards towards Sechartopolis, and southwards in the direction of Sodom and the Dead Sea. These formed the western boundaries of the plain. Eastwards, its barriers were the mountains of Moab, which ran parallel to the former. In the midst of the plain the great plain as it was called — flowed the Jordan, and at the top and bottom of it were two lakes: Tiberias, proverbial for its sweetness, and Ashtaroth, bitter as a brine. Away from the Jordan it was parched and unhealthy during summer; but during winter, even when it snowed at Jerusalem, the inhabitants here wore linen garments. Hard by Jericho — bursting forth close to the site of the old city, which Joshua took on his entrance into Canaan was a most exuberant fountain, whose waters, before noted for their contrary properties, had received, proceeds Josephus, through Edna's prayers, their then wonderfully salutary and prolific efficacy. Within its range — 70 stadia (Strabo says 100) by 20 — the fertility of the soil was unsurpassed; plenty of various names and properties, some that produced honey scarce inferior to that of the neighborhood — opolexandum, the choicest of indigenous fruits — cypris (Ar. "el-henna") and myrobalancum ("Zukkhum") threw there beautifully, and thickly dabbled about in pleasure-grounds (B. j. iv. 8, § 3). Wisdom herself did not disdain comparison with "the rose of Jericho" (Ezech. xxi. 8). Well might Strabo (Geogr. v. 2, § 41) say: "Miller could hardly doubt that its revenues were considerable. By the Romans Jericho was first visited under Pompey: he encamped there for a single night; and subsequently destroyed two forts, Thrax and Taurus, that commanded its approaches (Strabo, &c. § 40). Gabinus, in his resettlement of Judea, made it one of the five seats of assembly (Joseph. B. J. i. 5, § 5). With Herod the Great it rose to still greater prominence; it had been found full of treasure of all kinds, as in the time of Joshua, so by his Roman allies who sacked it (ibid. i. 15, § 6); and its revenues were eagerly sought, and rented by the wily tyrant from Cœpatra, to whom Antony had assigned them (Ant. xv. 4, § 2). Not long afterwards he built a fort there, which he called "Cy- prus" (Ant. xv. 4; i. 4). A tower, which he called in honor of his bride "Phasæus," and a number of new palaces — superior in construction to those which had existed there previously — which he named after his friends. He even founded a new town, higher up the plain, which he called, like the tower, Tharsis (B. J. i. 21, § 8). If he did not make Jericho his habitual residence, he at least retired thither to die — and to be interred, if he could have got his plan carried out — and it was in the amphitheatre of Jericho that the news of his death was announced to the assembled soldiers and people by Salome (B. J. i. 38, § 8). Soon afterwards the palace was burnt, and the town plundered by one Simon, a revolutionary that had been slave to Herod (Ant. xvii. 10, § 6); but Archelaus rebuilt the former sumptuously — founded a new town in the plain, that bore his own name — made it a measure for all, diverted water from a village called Neera, to irrigate the plain which he had planted with palms (Ant. xvii. 13, § 1). Thus Jericho was once more a "city of palms" when our Lord visited it: such as Herod the Great and Archelaus had left it, such he saw it. As the city that had so exceptionally contributed to his own ancestry — as the city which had been the first to fall — amidst so much ceremony before "the captain of the Lord's host," and his servant Joshua — we may well suppose that his eyes surveyed it with unwonted interest. It is supposed to have been on the rocky heights overrating it (hence called by tradition the Quar- tana), that he was assailed by the Tempter; and over against it, according to tradition likewise, He had been previously baptized in the Jordan. Here it is in honor of the blind (two, or perhaps three, St. Matth. xx. 30; St. Mark x. 46; this is in jorico Jericho. St. Luke says "as He was come nigh unto Jericho," etc., xviii. 35). Here the descendant of Rahab did not disdain the hospitality of Zaqueus the publican — an office which was likely to be lucrative enough in so rich a city. Finally, between Jerusalem and Jericho was laid the scene of His story of the good Samaritan, which, if it is not to be regarded as a real occurrence throughout, at least derives interest from the fact, that robbers have ever been the terror of that precipitous road; and so formidable had they proved only just before the Christian era, that Pontius Pilate was induced to undertake the destruction of their strongholds (Strabo, as before, vii. 2, § 40; comp. Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 1 ff.). Dagon, or Docus (1 Mac. xvi. 15; comp. ix. 50), where Potenay assassinated his father-in-law, Simon the Macabeus, may have been one of these.

Posterior to the Gospels the chronicle of Jericho may be briefly told. Vespasian found it one of the strongest of all the Judean cities (Jñ. iii. 20). C. of the city deserted by its inhabitants in a great measure when he encamped there (ibid. iv. 8, § 2). He left a garrison on his departure— not necessarily the 10th legion, which is only stated to have marched through Jericho—which was still there when Titus advanced upon Jerusalem. Is it asked how Jericho was destroyed? Evidently by Vespasian; for Josephus, rightly understood, is not so silent as Dr. Robinson (ibid. iii. 50, 51 ed.) would have us think. C. of the city pillaged and burnt, in R. J. iv. 9, § 1, was clearly Jericho with its adjacent villages, and not Gerasa, as may be seen at once by comparing the language there with that of c. § 5, 2, and the agent was Vespasian. Eusebius and St. Jerome (Onom. sanct. s. v.) say that it was destroyed when Jerusalem was besieged by the Romans. They further add that it was afterwards rebuilt—they do not say by whom—and still existed in their day; nor had the ruins of the two preceding cities been obliterated. Could Hadrian possibly have planted a colony there when he passed through Judea and founded Elia? (Bion, Cass. Hist. i. xix. 11, ed. Sturz.; more at large. Chor. Ptol.) p. 234. ed. Du Fresne.) The discovery which Origen made there of a version of the O. T. (the 5th in his Hexapla), together with sundry MSS. of Greek and Hebrew, suggests that it could not have been wholly without inhabitants (Euseb. E. H. vi. 16; S. Epiphani. Lib. de Pudicit. et Mæsur. cæræ met.) or again, as is perhaps more probable, did a Christian settlement arise there under Hadrian, when baptisms in the Jordan began to be the rage? That Jericho became an episcopal see about that time under Jerusalem appears from more than one unanswerable fact (Joseph. 1 Bar. 7. 1, 10, § 1, 2, and the Parap. appended to it; comp. William of Tyre, Hist. lib. xxiii., ed. H.). Its bishops subscribed to various councils in the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries (ibid. and Le Quien's Oriens Christian., iii. 654). Justinian, we are told, restored a hospice there, and likewise a church dedicated to the Virgin (Procop. De Edif. v. 9). As early as A. D. 357, when the Herouadice planted Wesselinus, there existed a hospice here, which was pointed out, during the manner of those days, as the house of Rahab. This was useless when Arculfus saw it; and not only so, but the third city was likewise in ruins (Adam. de Locis S. ap. Migne, Patrolog. C. lxxvii. 793). Had Jericho been visited by an earthquake, as Antoninus reports (ap. Ugoi. Theor. vii. p. xcviii., and note to c. 9); and as Syria certainly was, in the 11th year of Justinian, A. D. 553? If so, we can well understand the restorations already referred to; and when Antoninus adds that the house of Rahab had now become a hospice and oratory, we might almost pronounce that this was the very hospice which had been restored by that emperor. Again, it may be observed, did Christian Jericho receive no injury from the Persian Romiunz, the ferocious general of Chosroes II. A.D. 614? (Bar-Hébraï. Chron. 29 Lat. v. ed. Kirsch.) It would rather seem that there were more religious edifices in the 7th than in the 6th century round about it. According to Arculfus one church marked the site of Gibgal; another the spot where our Lord was supposed to have deposited his garments previously to his baptism; a third within the precincts of a vast monastery dedicated to St. John, situated upon some rising ground overlooking the Jordan. (See as before.) Jericho meanwhile had disappeared as a theatre of human life. Monasteries sprang up round it on all sides, but could not modify away in their turn. The anchorite caves in the rocky flanks of the Quentanes are the most striking memorial that remains of early or medieval enthusiasm. Arculfus speaks of a diminutive race—Canaanites he calls them—that inhabited the plain in great numbers in his day. They have retained possession of those fairy meadow-lands and pleasant groves which have made the spot so dear to our literary translaters. In some centuries round the "square tower or castle" first mentioned by Willebrand (ap. Leon. Alhaz Sulamis. p. 151) in A. D. 1211, when it was inhabited by the Saracens, whose work it may be supposed to have been, though it has since been dignified by the name of the house of Zaelness. Their village is by Brocards (ap. Cinn. Thes. iv. 16), in A. D. 1230, styled "a vile place;" by Sir J. Manwells, in A. D. 1232, "a little village;" and by Henry Maundrell, in A. D. 1697, "a poor nasty village;" in which verdict all modern travellers that have ever visited it has must concur. (See Early Trav. in Pal. by Wright, pp. 177 and 451.) They are looked upon by the Arabs as a desolate race: and are probably nothing more or less than veritable gypsies, who are still to be met with in the neighborhood of the Frank mountain near Jerusalem, and on the heights round the village and convent of St. John in the desert, and are still called "Soomanitae" by the native Christians—one of the names applied to them when they first attracted notice in Europe in the 15th century (i. e. from feigning themselves "penitents") and under censure of the Pope. See Huy- land's Histor. Survey of the Gypsies, p. 18; also The Poem by Dr. Southwell. 3d S. iv. 204.) Jericho does not seem to have been ever restored as a town by the Crusaders: but its plains had not ceased to be prolific, and were extensively cultivated and laid out in vineyards and gardens by the monks (Ptolema. ap. Leon. Alhaz. Sulamis. c. 20, p. 31). They seem to have been included in the domains of the patriarchate of Jerusalem, and as such were bestowed by Arnulf upon his niece as a dowry (Wm. of Tyre. Hist. xi. 15). Twenty-five years afterwards we find Melisendeis, wife of king Fulco, assigning them to the convent of Bethany, which she had founded A. D. 1137.

The site of ancient (the first) Jericho is with reason placed by Dr. Robinson (ibid. Rev. 1. 552-568) in the immediate neighborhood of the four towns of Elath, and the second city of the N. T. and of Josephus) at the opening of the Wady Kelt (Cherith), half an hour from the fountain. These are precisely the sites that one would infer from Josephus. On the other hand we are much more inclined to refer the ruined aqueducts round Jericho to the irrigations of Archelaus (see above) than to any hypothetical "culture or preparation of sugar by the Saracens." Jacob of Vitri JERICHOSays but generally, that the plains of the Jordan produced cane yielding sugar in abundance,— from Lebanon to the Dead Sea,— and when he speaks of the mode in which sugar was obtained from them, he is rather describing what was done in Syria than anywhere near Jericho (Hist. Hierosol. c. 93). Besides, it may fairly be questioned whether the same sugar-yielding reeds or canes there spoken of are not still as plentiful as ever they were within range of the Jordan (see Lynch’s Narrative, events of April 16, also p. 260-67). Almost every reed in these regions distills a sugary juice, and almost every herb breathes fragrance. Palms have indeed disappeared (there was a solitary one remaining not long since) from the neighborhood of the “city of palms”; yet there were groves of them in the days of Acrabius, and palm-branches could still be cut there when Fulcherius traversed the Jordan, A. D. 1100 (ap. Gest. Dei per Francos, vol. I. part I, p. 402). The fig-mulberry or “tree-fig” of Zaccheus—which all modern travellers confound with our Acer pseudahelenum, or common sycamore (see Dict. d’Hist. Nat. tom. xiii. p. 218, and Cruden’s Concord. s. v.)—mentioned by the Bordeaux pilgrim and by Antoninus, no longer exists. The agophilo fumum has become extinct both in Egypt—whither Cleopatra is said to have transplanted it—and in its favorite vale, Jericho. The mycolium um (Zadkum of the Arabs) alone survives, and from its nut oil is still extracted. Honey may be still found here and there, in the nest of the wild bee. Fig-trees, maize, and cucumbers, may be said to comprise all that is now cultivated in the plain; but wild flowers of brightest and most varied hue besprinkle the rich herbage on all sides.

Lastly, the bright yellow apples of Sodom are still to be met with round Jericho; though Josephus (B. J. iv. 84) and others (Havercamp, ad Tertull. Apol. c. 40, and Jacob of Vitry, as above) make their locality rather the shores of the Dead Sea: and some modern travellers assert that they are found out of Palestine no less (Bild. Res. i. 322 ff.). In fact there are two different plants that, correctly or incorrectly, have obtained that name, both bearing bright yellow fruit like apples, but with no more substance than fungus-balls. The former or larger sort seems confined in Palestine to the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, while the latter or smaller sort abounds near Jericho.

JERIEL (גериיל) [founded by God]: Jericho; [Vat. Ρεγία;] Jeriel, a man of Issachar, one of the six heads of the house of Tola at the time of the census in the time of David (1 Chr. vii. 2).

JERIJAH (גרייה) [founded by Jehovah]: Ophias; [Vat. τον Δείας;] Alex. τον Διας; Jerias, 1 Chr. xxvi. 31. [The same name as Jeriah, with a slight difference in the form of the name.] The difference consists in the omission of the final u, the Plain of Jericho, as we found two aged trees in the little ravine [near the channel of Wadi Ketif], in Illustration of the Gospel narrative!” (Land of Israel, p. 229, and also p. 314, 24 ed.). He also found a few of these trees “among the ruins by the wayside at ancient Jericho” (Natural History of the Bible, p. 369, Lond 1867). [ZACHIEU] not in the insertion of the [1], which our translators should have added in the former case.

JERIMOTH (גֵּרִימוֹת) [heights]: 1. Jerimad, 1 Jermad, Jeremad). 1. [I jerkd: Vat. Araphim.] Son or descendant of Deh, according to 1 Chr. vii. 7, and founder of a Benjamite house, which existed in the time of David (ver. 2). He is perhaps the same as—

2. (Araphim: [Vat. Araphim: Alex. Araph; Vat. Araph; Jerimath, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5). [BELA.]

3. (גְּרִימוֹת, i.e. Jeremoth: [I Jeremath: Vat. Araphim: Alex. Jeremad.) A son of Becher (1 Chr. vii. 8), and head of another Benjamite house. [BECHER.]

4. [I jerkd: Vat. Araphim.] Son of Mushi, the son of Merari, and head of one of the families of the Merarites which were counted in the census of the Levites taken by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 30). [See JEREMOTH, 2.]

5. [I jerkd: Vat. Jeremath: Alex. Jeremath.) Son of Harim, head of the 15th ward of musicians (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 22). In the latter he is called JEREMOTH. [HUMAN.]

6. [I jerkd: Alex. Jeremad: Vat. Araphim.] Son of Azriel, "ruler" (גֵּרִימוֹת) of the tribe of Naphtali in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxi. 19). The same persons, called rulers, are in ver. 22 called "princes" (גֵּרִימוֹת) of the tribes of Israel.

7. (I jerkd: Vat. Jeremath: Alex. Araphim.) Son of king David, whose daughter Mahalath was one of the wives of Rehoboam, her cousin Abiail being the other (2 Chr. xi. 18). As Jeremoth is not named in the list of children by David's wives in 1 Chr. iii. or iv. 4-7, it is fair to infer that he was the son of a concubine, and this in fact is the Jewish tradition (Jerome, Questions, ad loc.). It is however questionable whether Rehoboam would have married the grand-child of a concubine even of the great David. The passage 2 Chr. xi. 18 is not quite clear, since the word "daughter" is a correction of the Keri: the original text had [7.] i.e. "son."

8. [I jerkd: Vat. Jeremath.] A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, one of the overseers of offerings and dedicated things placed in the chambers of the Temple, who was under Chenaniah and Shemai the Levites, by command of Hezekiah, and Azariah the high-priest (2 Chr. xxxi. 13). A. C. H.

JERIOTH (גֵּרִימֶה) [curtains]: Jered: [Vat. Exad: Jered]. According to our A. V. and the LXX, one of the elder Caleb's wives (1 Chr. ii. 18), but according to the Vulgate he was his daughter by his first wife Azubah. The Hebrew text seems evidently corrupt, and will not make sense: but the probability is that Jerioth was a daughter of Caleb the son of Hezon. (In this case we ought to read [גֵּרִימֶה] הָנַה נִתְח תּוֹלָה]. The Latin version of Santes Pagininius, which makes Azubah and Jerish both daughters of Caleb, and the note of Vatadulis, which makes Ishosh (A. V. "wife") a proper name and a third daughter, are clearly wrong, as it appears from ver. 19 that Azubah was Caleb's wife. A. C. H.

JEROBOAM (גֵּרִימוֹב) = Yarabam: 1 Jeroboam). The name signifies "whose people is many," and thus has nearly the same meaning with Rehoboam, "enlarger of the people." Both names appear for the first time in the reign of Solomon, and were probably suggested by the increase of the Jewish people at that time.

1. The first king of the divided kingdom of Israel. The ancient authorities for his reign and his wars were "the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel" (1 K. xiv. 19), and "the visions of Iddo the seer against Jeroboam the son of Nebat" (2 Chr. ix. 29). The extant account of his life is given in two versions, so different from each other, and yet each so ancient, as to make it difficult to choose between them. The one usually followed is that contained in the Hebrew text, and in one portion of the LXX. The other is given in a separate account inserted by the LXX. at 1 K. xi. 43, and xii. 24. This last contains such evident marks of authenticity in some of its details, and is so much more full than the other, that it will be most conveniently taken as the basis of the biography of this remarkable man, as the nearest approach which, in the contradictory state of the text, we can now make to the truth.

1. He was the son of an Ephraimite of the name of Nebat; his father had died whilst he was young; but his mother, who had been a person of loose character (LXX.), lived in her widowhood, trusting apparently to her son for support. Her name is variously given as Zeruiah (Heb.), or Sarai (LXX.), and the place of their abode on the mountains of Ephraim is given either as Zereda, or (LXX.) as Sarai: in the latter case, indicating that there was some connection between the wife of Nebat and her residence. At the time when Solomon was constructing the fortifications of Millo underneath the citadel of Zion, his sagacious eye discovered the strength and activity of a youth of Ephraimite name, who was employed on the works, and he raised him to the rank of superintendent (גֵּרִימֶה A. V. "ruler") over the taxes and labors exacted from the tribe of Ephraim (1 K. xi. 28). This was Jeroboam. He made the most of his position. He completed the fortifications, and was long afterwards known as the man who had "enclosed the city of David" (1 K. xii. 24, LXX.). He then aspired to royal state. Like Absalom before him, in like circumstances, though now on a grander scale, in proportion to the enlargement of the royal establishment itself, he kept 300 chariots and horses (1. LXX.), and at last was perceived by Solomon to be aiming at the monarchy.

These ambitious designs were probably fostered by the sight of the growing disaffection of the great tribe over which he presided, as well as by the alienation of the prophetic order from the house of Solomon. According to the version of the story in the Hebrew text (Jos. Ant. viii. 7, § 7), this alienation was made evident to Jeroboam very early in his career. He was leaving Jerusalem, and he encountered, on one of the black-paved roads which

... who was the first to insult David in his flight and the "first of all the house of Joseph" to congratulate him on his return.
JEROBOAM

He went out of the city, Abijah, "the prophet" of the ancient sanctuary of Shiloh. Abijah drew him aside from the road into the field (LXX.), and, as soon as they found themselves alone, the prophet, who was dressed in a new outer garment, stripped it off, and tore it into 12 shreds; of 10 of which he gave to Jeroboam, with the assurance that on condition of his obedience to His laws, God would establish for him a kingdom and dynasty equal to that of David (1 K. xii. 21-40).

The attempts of Solomon to cut short Jeroboam's designs occasioned his flight into Egypt. There he remained during the rest of Solomon's reign — in the court of Shishak (LXX.), who is here first named in the sacred narrative. On Solomon's death, he demanded Shishak's permission to return. The Egyptian king seems, in his reluctance, to have offered any gift which Jeroboam chose, as a reason for his remaining, and the consequence was the marriage with Ame, the elder sister of the Egyptian queen, Tahpenes (LXX. Thekemina), and of another princess (LXX.) who married the Edomite chief, Hadad. A year elapsed, and a son, Abijah (or Abijam), was born. Then Jeroboam again requested permission to depart, which was granted: and he returned with his wife and child to his native place, Sarira, or Zereda, which he fortified, and the consequence became a centre for his fellow tribesmen (1 K. xi. 43, xii. 24, LXX.).

Still there was no open act of insurrection, and it was in this period of suspense (according to the LXX.) that a pathetic incident darkened his domestic history. His infant son fell sick. The anxious father sent his wife to inquire of God concerning him. Jerusalem would have been the obvious place to visit for this purpose. But no doubt political reasons forbade. The ancient sanctuary of Shiloh was nearer at hand: and it so happened that a prophet was now residing there, of the highest repute. It was Abijah — the same who, according to the common version of the story, had already been in communication with Jeroboam, but who, according to the authority we are now following, appears for the first time on this occasion. He was 60 years of age — but was prematurely old, and his eyesight had already failed him. He was living, as it would seem, in poverty, with a boy who waited on him, and with his own little children. For him and for them, the wife of Jeroboam brought such gifts as were thought likely to be acceptable; ten loaves, and two rolls for the children (LXX.), a bunch of raisins (LXX.), and a jar of honey. She had disguised herself, to avoid recognition; and perhaps these humble gifts were part of the plan. But the blind prophet, at her first approach, knew who was coming; and bade his boy go out to meet her, and invite her to his house without delay. There he warned her of the uselessness of her gifts. There was a doom on the house of Jeroboam, not to be averted; those who grew up in it and died in the city would become the prey of the hungry dogs; they who died in the country would be devoured by the vultures. This child alone would die before the calamities of the house arrived: "They shall mourn for the child, Woe, O Lord, for in him there is found a good word regarding the Lord," — or according to the other version, "all Israel shall mourn for him, and bury him; for he only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward Jehovah, the God of Israel, in the house of Jeroboam." (1 K. xiv. 13, LXX. xiii.).

The mother returned. As she reentered the town of Sarira (Heb. Tirah, 1 K. xiv. 17), the child died. The loud wail of her attendant damsels greeted her on the threshold (LXX.). The child was buried, as Abijah had foretold, with all the state of the child of a royal house. "All Israel mourned for him" (1 K. xiv. 18). This incident, if it really occurred at this time, seems to have been the turning point in Jeroboam's career. It drove him from his ancestral home, and it gathered the sympathies of the tribe of Ephraim round him. He left Sarira and came to Shechem. The Hebrew text describes that he was sent for. The LXX. speaks of it as his own act. However that may be, he was thus at the head of the northern tribes, when Rehoboam, after he had been on the throne for somewhat more than a year, came up to be inaugurated in that ancient capital. Then (if we may take the account already given of Abijah's interview as something separate from this), for the second time, and in a like manner, the Divine intimation of his future greatness is conveyed to him. The prophet Shevatah, the Enuhite (1 K. xii. 16; 2 K. xiv. 9) addressed to him the same veiled parable, in the ten shreds of a new unwashed garment (LXX.). Then took place the conference with Rehoboam (Jeroboam appearing in it, in the Hebrew text, but not in the LXX.), and the final revolt; which ended (expressly in the Hebrew text, in the LXX. by implication) in the elevation of Jeroboam to the throne of the northern kingdom. Shevatah remained on the spot and deterred Rehoboam from an attack. Jeroboam entered at once on the duties of his new situation, and fortified Shechem as his capital on the west, and Penuel (close by the old trans-Jordanic capital of Mahanaim) on the east.

II. Up to this point there had been nothing to disturb the anticipations of the Prophetic Order and of the mass of Israel as to the glory of Jeroboam's future. But from this point, error crept, not unnaturally, into his policy, which undermined his dynasty and tarnished his name as the first king of Israel. The political disruption of the kingdom was complete; but its religious unity was as yet unimpaired. He feared that the yearly pilgrimages to Jerusalem would undo all the work which he effected, and he took the bold step of rending it asunder. Two sanctuaries of venerable antiquity existed already — one at the south, the other at the northern extremity of his dominions. These he elevated into seats of the national worship, which should rival the newly established Temple at Jerusalem. As Abderrahman, caliph of Spain arrested the movement of his subjects to Mecca, by the erection of the holy place of the Zecca at Cordova, so Jeroboam trusted to the erection of his shrines at Dan and Bethel. But he was not satisfied without another deviation from the Mosaic idea of the national unity. His long stay in Egypt had familiarized him with the outward forms under which the Divinity was there represented: and now, for the first time since the Exodus, was an Egyptian element introduced into the national worship of a This omission is however borne out by the Hebrew text, 1 K. xii. 20, "when all Israel heard that J. was come again."

b The cry of revolt, 1 K. xii. 19, is the same as that in 2 Sam. xx. 1.
Palestine. A golden figure of Meneius, the sacred calf of Helipolis, was set up at each sanctuary, with the address, "Behold thy God" (Ephesians—comp. Neb. ix. 18) which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." The sanctuary at Dāx, as the most remote from Jerusalem, was established first (1 K. xii. 30) with priests from the distant tribes, whom he conserved instead of the Levites (xii. 31, xiii. 33). The more important one, as nearer the capital and in the heart of the kingdom, was at Bethel. The worship and the sanctuary continued till the end of the northern kingdom. The priests were supplied by a peculiar form of consecration—any one from the non-Levitical tribes could procure the office on sacrificing a young bullock and seven rams (1 K. xiii. 33; 2 Chr. xiii. 9). For the dedication of this he copied the precedent of Solomon in choosing the feast of Tabernacles as the occasion; but postponing it for a month, probably in order to meet the vintage of the most northern parts. On the fifteenth day of this month (the 8th), he went up in state to offer incense on the altar which was before the calf. It was at this solemn and critical moment that a prophet from Judah suddenly appeared, whom Josephus with great probability identifies with伊do the Seeer (the calls him Lebon, Ant. viii. 8, § 51; and see Jerome, Qu. Heb., on 2 Chr. x. 4), who denounced the altar, and foretold its desolation by Josiah, and violent overthrow. It is not clear from the account, whether it is intended that the overthrow took place then, or in the earthquake described by Amos (i. 1). Another sign is described as taking place instantly. The king stretching out his hand to arrest the prophet, felt it wither and paralyzed, and only at the prophet's prayer saw it restored, and acknowledged his divine mission. Josephus adds, but probably only in conjecture from the sacred narrative, that the prophet who seduced Idlo on his return, did so in order to prevent his obtaining too much influence over Jeroboam, and endeavored to explain away the miracles to the king, by representing that the altar fell because it was new, and that his hand was paralyzed from the fatigue of sacrificing. A further alliance is mentioned in this incident in the narrative of Josephus (Ant. viii. 15, § 4), where Zeckeliah is represented as contrasting the potency of Idol in withering the hand of Jeroboam with the powerlessness of Memiah to wither the hand of Zeckeliah. The visit of Ano to Abiiah, which the common Hebrew text places after this event, and with darker intimations in Abiiah's warning only suitable to a later period, has already been described.

Jeroboam was at constant war with the house of Judah, but the only act distinctly recorded is a battle with Abiiah, son of Rechoboam; in which, in spite of a skillful ambush made by Jeroboam, and of much superior force, he was defeated, and for the time lost three important cities, Bethel, Jeshaunah, and Ephraim. The calamity was severely felt; he was paralyzing the blow, and soon after died, in the 22d year of his reign (2 Chr. xiii. 20), and was buried in his ancestral sepulchre (1 K. xiv. 20). His son Nadah, or (LXX.) Nela (named after the grandfather), succeeded, and in him the dynasty was closed. The name of Jeroboam hang remained under a cloud as the king who "had caused Israel to sin." At the time of the Reformation it was a common practice of Roman Catholic writings to institute comparisons of the kings of Israel, and for his separation from the sanctuary of Judah, and that of Henry VIII. from the see of Rome.

2. JEROBOAM II., the son of Joash, the 4th of the dynasty of Jehu. The most prosperous of the kings of Israel. The contemporary accounts of his reign are, (1.) in the "Chronicles of the Kings of Israel" (2 K. xiv. 24), which are lost, but of which the substance is given in 2 K. xiv. 23-25. (2.) In the contemporary prophets Hosea and Amos, and (perhaps) in the fragments found in Is. xv., xvi. It had been foretold in the reign of Jeconiah that a great deliverer should come, to rescue Israel from the Syrian yoke (comp. 2 K. xiii. 4, xiv. 26, 27), and this had been expanded into a distinct prediction of Jonah, that there should be a restoration of the wildest domination of Solomon (iv. 25). This "savior" and "restorer" was Jeroboam. He not only repelled the Syrian invaders, but took their capital city Damascus (2 K. xiv. 28; Am. i. 3-5), and recovered the whole of the ancient dominion from Hanath to the Pecul Sea (xiv. 25; Am. vi. 14). Ammon and Moab were reconquered (Am. i. 13, ii. 1-3); the trans-Jordanic tribes were restored to their territory (2 K. xiii. 5; 1 Chr. v. 17-22).

But it was merely an outward restoration. The sanctuary at Bethel was kept up in royal state (Am. vii. 14), but drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression, prevailed in the country (Am. ii. 6-8, iv. i. 6; Hos. iv. 12-14, 1, 2), and idolatry was united with the worship of Jehovah (Hos. iv. 13, xiii. 6).

Amos prophesied the destruction of Jeroboam and his house by the sword (Am. vii. 9, 17), and Amaziah, the high priest of Bethel, complained to the king (Am. vii. 10-13). The effect does not appear. Hosea (Hos. i. 1) also denounced the crimes of the nation. The prediction of Amos was not fulfilled as regarded the king himself. He was buried with his ancestors in state (2 K. xiv. 29).

Ewah (Grec. iii. 51, note) supposes that Jero- boam was the subject of Ps. xiv. A. P. S.

JERUSALM

n Neh., tom. Alex. 17ro0, Vat. FA.1 omit.) A descendant of Aaron, of the house of Immer, the elder of the sixteenth course of priests; son of Pashur and father of Adiaiah (1 Chr. ix. 12). He appears to have been mentioned again in Neh. xii. 12 (a record curiously and puzzlingly parallel to that of I Chr. ix., though with some striking differences), though as here he is stated to belong to the house of Mahliiah, who was leader of the fifth course (and comp. Neh. xi. 14).

5. (17ro0, [Vat. FA. Pau, Alex. 17ro0,].) Jeroham of Gedor (לֹוֹדֵד אֶחָה), some of whose "sons" joined David when he was taking refuge from Saul at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 7). The list purports to be of Benjamins (see verse 2, where the word "even" is interpolated, and the last five words belong to verse 3). But then how can the presence of Kohites (verse 6), the descendants of Korah the Levite, be accounted for?

6. (17ro0, [Vat. Ald.] Alex. 17ro0.) A Danite, whose son or descendant Azarel was head of his tribe in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 22).

7. (17ro0.) Father of Azariah, one of the "captains of hundreds" in the time of Athaliah; one of those to whom Jehoiada the priest confided his scheme for the restoration of Joash (2 Chr. xiii. ii. 9).

JERUBBAAL (ֹּרְבֵאֶל [with whom Exod contents]: 17ro0b, [Vat. in Judg. vi. 32, Arab: vii. 1, 17ro0; viii. 29, 17ro0b; i Sam. xlii. 11, 17ro0a]) Alex. 117ro0אָאַבָאָאַבָאָאַבָאָאַבָאָאַבָאָאַבָאָאַבָאָאַבָאָa: Judg. vi. 32, 17ro0b in vii. 1: Jerubbaal), the surname of Gideon which he acquired in consequence of destroying the altar of Baal, when his father confided him to the vengeance of the Abiezrites. The A. V. of Judg. vi. 32, which has "therefore on that day he called him Jerubbaal," implying that the surname was given by Joash, should rather be, in accordance with a well-known Hebrew idiom, "one called him," i.e. he was called by the men of his city. The LXX. in the same passage have ἐκάλαξεν αὐτῷ, "he called it," i.e. the Abiezrites in the preceding verse, but in all other passages they recognize Jerubbaal as the name of Gideon, the reading should probably be αὐτόν. In Judg. viii. 25 the Vulg. strictly follows the Heb., Jeroham Gedon. The Alex. version omits the name altogether from Judg. ix. 57. Besides the passages quoted, it is found in Judg. vii. 1, viii. 29, ix. 1, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, and 1 Sam. xiii. 11. In a fragment of Porphyry, quoted by Eusebius (Proc. Ex. i. 9, § 21), Gideon appears as Hieromuelas (17ro0b, the priest of the God '17ro0, or Jehovah, from whom the Phoenician chronicler, Sanchoniathon of Byblos, received his initiation with regard to the affairs of the Jews.

* Ex. iv. 11, 12; xx. 22-29.

Other names borne by Jerusalem are as follows:—

A. Those, the "lion of God," or according to another interpretation, the "hearth of God" (Is. xxix. 1, 2; comp. Es. xiii. 15). For the former significance compare Matt. xxiv. 2 (Stier, S. P. § 171)."I am the Θεός τῆς Ιουδαίας, "the holy city," Matt. i. 5 and xxii. 53 only. Both these passages would seem to refer to Zion—the sacred portion of the place, in which the Temple was situated. It also occurs, ἐκῇ, 1 P. iv. 13, ἐκ τῶν οἰκονομιῶν τύχος, "in the holy house," the sanctuary. The former is that in ordinary use at present. The latter is found in Arabic chronicles. The name al-Sherif, "the venerable," or οἶκος, is also quoted by Schultens in his Index Geogr. in Vit. Saladin. 2. The corrupt form of Acrebelen is found in Erieli (Jaubert, i. 345), possibly quoting a Christian writer.

The question of the identity of 17ro0 with Jerusalem will be examined under that head.
bined, lest displeasure should be felt by either of the two Saints at the exclusive use of one (Berech. Rob. in Otio, Lex. Rob. x. v., also Lightfoot). Others, quoted by Reindel (p. 833), would make it mean "fear of Salem," or "sight of peace." The suggestion of Reindel himself, adopted by Simonis (Onom. p. 467), and Ewald (Gesch. iii. 156, note) is אֵלֶּ֣הֶל אֶֽיֶרֶנֵיָּה (Eyeris, p. 2), is named by the two last great scholars only to condemn it. Others again, looking to the name of the Canaanite tribe who possessed the place at the time of the conquest, would propose Jebusus-Reindel (p. 834), or even Jehus-Solomon, as the name conferred on the city by that monarch when he began his reign of tranquility.

Another controversy relates to the termination of the name — Jeruselhim — the Hebrew dual; which, by Simonis and Ewald, is unasstesiatingly referred to the double formation of the city, while reasons are shown against it by Reindel and Gesenius. It is certain that on the two occasions where the latter portion of the name appears to be given for the whole (Gen. iv. 18; Ps. lxvi. 2) it is Shalem, and not Shalhim; also that the five places where the vocal points of the Masorets are supported by the letters of the original text are of a late date, when the idea of the double city, and its reflection in the name, would have become familiar to the Jews. In this conflict of authorities the suggestion will perhaps occur to a bystander that the original formation of the name may have been anterior to the entrance of the Israelites on Canaan, and that Jeruselhim may be the attempt to give an intelligible Hebrew form to the original ancient name, just as centuries afterwards, when Hebrews in their turn gave way to Greeks, attempts were made to twist Jeruselhim itself into a shape which should be intelligible to Greek ears. a "the holy Solyma" (Joseph. B. J. vi. 10), "Ierou Σαλομώνεια" b in the "holy place of Solomon" (Tappanom, in Enseh. Jr. E. ix. 34), or, on the other hand, the curious fancy quoted by Josephus (ib. i. 34, 35) from Lysimachus — Ἱεροσόλυμα (speakers of temples) — are perhaps not more violent adaptations, or more wide of the real meaning of Jerusalem, than that was of the original name of the city.

The subject of Jerusalem naturally divides itself into three heads: —

I. The place itself: its origin, position, and physical characteristics.

II. The annals of the city.

III. The topography of the town; the relative a Such mystical interpretations are those of Origen, τον ἑκάστη χρόνον άνθρωπ (from γήγη and γῆ), in the eἰγορία, where half the name is interpreted as Greek, and half as Hebrew, curious as they are, cannot be examined here. (See the catalogues preserved by Jerome.)

b Other instances of similar Greek forms given to Hebrew names are Ἱεροβόλα and Ἱεροσόλυμα.

c Philo carries this a step further, and, hearing in the only the sanctity of the place, he discards the Semitic member of the name, and calls it Ἱεροσόλυμα.

d Theologies of its various parts; the sites of the Holy Places ancient and modern, etc.

I. THE PLACE ITSELF.

The arguments — if arguments they can be called — for and against the identity of the "Salem" of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18) with Jerusalem — the "Salem" of a late Psalmist (Ps. lxvi. 2) — are almost equally balanced. In favor of it are the unhesitating statement of Josephus (Ant. i. 10; vii. 3, 2; B. J. vi. 104) and Eusebius (Onom. τοῦ Πολιορκημένου), the recurrence of the name Salem in the Psalm just quoted, where it undoubtedly means Jerusalem, and the general consent in the identification. On the other hand is the no less positive statement of Jerome, grounded on more reason than he often vouchers for his statements (Ep. ad Eusebiun, § 7), that "Salem was not Jerusalem, as Josephus and all Christians (mastri omnes) believe it to be, but a town near Syphopolis, which to this day is called Salem, where the magnificent ruins of the palace of Melchizedek are still seen, and of which mention is made in a subsequent passage of Genesis. — Jacob came to Salem, a city of Shechem. (Gen. xxxii. 18.), Elsewhere (Onomasticon, "Salem"). Eusebius and he identify it with Shechem itself. This question will be discussed under the head of SAELEM.

Here it is sufficient to say (1) that Jerusalem suits the circumstances of the narrative rather better than any place further north, or more in the heart of the country. It would be quite as much in Abram's road from the sources of Jordan to his home under the oaks of Hebron, and it would be more suitable for the visit of the king of Sodom. In fact we know that, in later times at least, the usual route from Damascas avoided the central highlands of the country and the neighborhood of Shechem, where Seme is now shown. (See Pompey's route in Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3, § 4; 4, § 1. (2) It is perhaps some confirmation of the identity, at any rate it is a remarkable coincidence, that the king of Jerusalem in the time of Joshua should bear the title Adoni-zedek — almost precisely the same as that of Melchizedek.

The question of the identity of Jerusalem with "Calatys, a large city of Syria," — almost as large as Sardis," which is mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 150, iii. 5) as having been taken by Pharaoh-Necho, need not be investigated in this place. It is interesting, and, it decided in the affirmative, so far important as confirming the Scripture narrative; but does not in any way add to our knowledge of the history of the city. The reader will find it fully examined in Rawlinson's Hierod. ii. 246; Blakeley's Hierod. — It was on bk. iii. ch. 5 (both against the identification); and in Kenrick's Egypt, ii. 406; and Dict. of Gr. and Rsm. Geogr. ii. 17 (both for it).

It is exactly the complement of πόλις Σαλομόν (Pausanias, viii. 16).

a In this passage he even goes so far as to say that Melchizedek was "the first priest of God," built there the first Temple, and changed the name of the city from Salmus to Hierusalem. c A contraction analogous to others with which we are familiar in our own poetry; 1 cor. Edin., or Elime for Edom. d For Edinburgh. e Winer is wrong in stating (Rahab. ii. 79) that Jerome bases this statement on a mischievous tradition. The tradition that he quotes, in § 5 of the same Ep is as to the identity of Melchizedek with Shem.
JEJUSALEM

Not only do we more than refer to the traditions — it traditions they are, and not mere individual speculations — of Tacitus (Hist. v. 2) and Plutarch (Isis et Osir. c. 31) of the foundation of the city by a certain Hierosolymus, a son of the Typhon (see Winer's note, i. 545). All the certain information to be gathered as to the early history of Jerusalem, must be gathered from the books of the Jewish historians alone.

It is during the conquest of the country that Jerusalem first appears in definite form on the scene in which it was destined to occupy so prominent a position. The earliest notice is probably that in Josh. xv. 8 and xviii. 16, 28, describing the landmarks of the boundaries of Judah and Benjamin. Here it is styled "the Jebusite," (A. V. Jebusa), after the name of its occupiers, just as is the case with other places in these lists. (Jerus.) Next, we find the form JERUSALEM (Judg. xix. 10, 11) — "Jebus, which is Jerusalem . . . the city of the Jebusites;" and lastly, in documents which profess to be of the same age as the foregoing — we have Jerusalem (Josh. x. 1, &c., xii. 19; Judg. i. 7, &c.). To this we have a parallel in Hebron, the other great city of Southern Palestine, which bears the alternative title of Kirjath-jearim, in these very same documents.

It is one of the obvious peculiarities of Jerusalem — but to which Professor Stanley appears to have been the first to call attention — that it did not become the capital till a comparatively late date in the career of the nation. Bethel, Shechem, Hebron, had their beginnings in the earliest periods of national life — but Jerusalem was not only not a chief city, it was not even possessed by the Israelites till they had gone through one complete stage of their life in Palestine, and the second — the monarchy — had been fairly entered on. (See Stanley, S. p. 103.)

The explanation of this is no doubt in some measure to be found in the fact that the seats of the government and the religion of the nation were originally fixed farther north — first at Shechem and Nabal; then at Gibeah, Saul, and Gibbor; but it is also no doubt partly due to the natural strength of Jerusalem. The heroes of Joshua's army who traced the boundary-line which was to separate the possessions of Judah and Benjamin, when, after passing the spring of En-rogel, they went along the "vale of the son of Hinnom," and looked up to the "southern shoulder of the Jebusite" (Josh. xv. 7, § 1), must have felt that to scale its heights so great and so steep would have fully tasked even their tried prowess. We shall see, when we glance through the annals of the city, that it did effectually resist the tribes of Judah and Simeon not many years later. But when, after the death of Ishboseth, David became king of a united and powerful people, it was necessary for him to leave the remote Hebron and approach nearer to the bulk of his dominions. At the same time it was imposs-

a This appears from an examination of the two corresponding documents, Josh. xvii. 7, 8, and xviii. 15, 17. The line was drawn from En-shemesh — probably Ain Habat, known also as En-gedi — to En-harod, either to the west or the Fountain of the Virgin; thence it went by the ravine of Hinnom and the southern shoulder of the Jebusite — the steep slope of the modern Zion; climbed the heights on the west of the ravine, and stretched off to the spring at Nephtoah, probably Lybnah. The other view, which is made the subject of my ingenious "calculsible to desert the great tribe to which he belonged, and over whom he had been reigning for seven years. Out of this difficulty Jerusalem was the natural escape, and accordingly at Jerusalem David fixed the seat of his throne and the future sanctuary of his nation.

The boundary between Judah and Benjamin the north boundary of the former and the south boundary of the latter, was at the foot of the hill on which the city stands, so that the city itself was actually in Benjamin, while by crossing the narrow ravine of Hinnom you set foot on the territory of Judah. That it was not far enough to the north to command the continued allegiance of the tribe of Ephraim, and the others which lay above him, is obvious from the fact of the separation which at last took place. It is enough for the vindication of David in having chosen it to remember that that separation did not take place during the reigns of himself or his son, and was at last precipitated by misgovernment combined with feeble short-sightedness. And if not actually in the centre of Palestine, it was yet virtually so. "It was on the ridge, the broadest and most strongly marked ridge, of the back-bone of the complicated hills which extend through the whole country from the Plain of Esdraelon to the Desert. Every wanderer, every conqueror, every traveller who has trod the central route of Palestine from N. to S. must have passed through the table-land of Jerusalem. It was the water-shed between the streams, or rather the torrent-beds, which find their way eastward to the Jordan, and those which pass westward to the Mediterraneum (Stanley, S. p. 176)."

This central position naturally impressed itself in the words of Ezekiel (ver. 5), "I have set Jerusalem in the midst of the nations and countries round about her," led in later ages to a definite belief that the city was actually in the centre of the earth — in the words of Jerome, "umbilicus terrae," the central axis or navel of the world. (See the quotations in Ireland, Palestine, pp. 52 and 838; Joseph, B. J. iii. 3, § 5; also Stanley, S. p. 146.)

At the same time it should be observed that, while thus central to the people of the country, it had the advantage of being remote from the great high road of the nations which so frequently passed by Palestine, and therefore enjoyed a certain immunity from disturbance. The only practicable route for a great army, with baggage, siege-trains, etc., moving between Egypt and Assyria was by the low plain which bordered the sea-coast from Tyre to Pelusium. From that plain, the central table-land on which Jerusalem stood was approached by valleys and passes generally too intricate and precipitous for the passage of large bodies. One road there was less rugged than the rest — that from Jaffa and Lydda up the pass of the Bethhorons to Gibalon, and thence, over the hills, to the north side of Jerusalem: and by this route, with few if any exceptions, armies seem to have apb This is pressingly expressed in a rubriculated figure quoted by Othon (Lex. p. 290): "The world is like to an eye: the white of the eye is the ocean surrounding the earth; the blue of the world itself: the pupil is Jerusalem, and the lense in the pupil, the Temple."

proceeded the city. But, on the other hand, we shall find, in tracing the annals of Jerusalem, that large armies, nay, that sieges of the towns on the Mediterranean coast were conducted, lasting for years, without apparently affecting Jerusalem in the least. Jerusalem stands in latitude 31° 46' 35" North, and longitude 35° 18' 30" East of Greenwich. It is 32 miles distant from the sea, and 18 from the Jordan; 20 from Hebron, and 36 from Samaria.

Such is the result of the latest observations possessed by the Lords of the Admiralty, and officially communicated to the Consul of Jerusalem in 1852 (p. 153). To what part of the town the observations apply is not stated. Other results, only slightly differing, will be found in Van de Velde's Memoir, p. 64, and in Rob. i. 259.
"In several respects," says Professor Stanley, "its situation is singular among the cities of Palestine. Its elevation is remarkable; occasioned not from its being on the summit of one of the numerous hills of Judaea, like most of the towns and villages, but because it is on the edge of one of the highest table-lands of the country. Hebron indeed is higher still by some hundred feet, and from the south, accordingly (even from Bethlehem), the approach to Jerusalem is by a slight descent. But from any other side the ascent is perpetual; and to the traveller approaching the city from the E. or W. it must always have presented the appearance beyond any other capital of the then known world — we may say beyond any important city that has ever existed on the earth — of a mountain city; breathing, as compared with the sultry plains of Jordan, a mountain air; enthroned, as compared with Jericho, or Damascus, Gaza or Tyre, on a mountain fastness" (S. & P. p. 170, 171).

The elevation of Jerusalem is a subject of constant reference and exultation by the Jewish writers. Their fervid poetry abounds with allusions to its height,2 to the ascent thither of the tribes from all parts of the country. It was the habitation of Jehovah, from which "he looked upon all the inhabitants of the world" (Ps. xxxiii. 14); its kings were "higher than the kings of the earth" (1S. lxxix. 27). In the later Jewish literature of narrative and description, this poetry is reduced to prose, and in the most exaggerated form. Jerusalem was so high that the flames of Jannah were visible from it (2 Macc. xii. 9). From the tower of Paeplinius outside the walls, could be discerned on the one hand the Mediterranean Sea, on the other the country of Arabia (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2). Hebron could be seen from the roofs of the Temple (Lightfoot, Chor. Cult. xlix.). The same thing can be traced in Josephus's account of the environs of the city, in which he has exaggerated what is in truth a remarkable ravine, to a depth so enormous that the head swam and the eyes failed in gazing into its recesses (Ant. xv. 11, § 53).

In exemplification of these remarks it may be said that the general elevation of the western ridge of the city, which forms its highest point, is about 2,500 feet above the level of the sea. The Mount of Olives rises slightly above this — 2,724 feet. Beyond the Mount of Olives, however, the descent is remarkable; Jericho — 13 miles off — being no less than 3,524 feet below, namely, 900 feet under the Mediterranean. On the north, Bethel, at a distance of 11 miles, is 419 feet below Jerusalem. On the west Ramleh — 25 miles — is 2,274 feet below. Only to the south, as already remarked, are the heights slightly superior — Bethlehem, 2,704; Hebron, 3,029. A table of the heights of the various parts of the city and environs is given further on.

The situation of the city in reference to the rest of Palestine, has been described by Dr. Robinson in a well-known passage, which is so complete and graphic a statement of the case, that we take the liberty of giving it entire.

Jerusalem lies near the summit of a broad mountain ridge. This ridge or mountainous tract extends, without intermission, from the plain of Esdraelon to a line drawn between the south end of the Dead Sea and the S. E. corner of the Mediterranean: or more properly, perhaps, it may be regarded as extending as far south as to Jebel 'Arūjī in the desert; where it sinks down at once to the level of the great western plateau. This tract, which is everywhere not less than from twenty to twenty-five geographical miles in breadth, is in fact high uneven table-land. It everywhere forms the precipitous western wall of the great valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; while towards the west it sinks down by an offset into a range of lower hills, which lie between it and the great plain along the coast of the Mediterranean. The surface of this upper region is everywhere rocky, uneven, and mountainous; and is moreover cut up by deep valleys which run east or west on either side towards the Jordan or the Mediterranean. The line of division, or water-shed, among the waters of these valleys, — a term which here applies almost exclusively to the waters of the rainy season, — follows for the most part the height of land along the ridge; yet not so but that the heads of the valleys, which run off in different directions, often interlap for a considerable distance. Thus, for example, a valley which descends to the Jordan often has its head a mile or two westward of the commencement of other valleys which run to the western sea.

From the great plain of Esdraelon onwards towards the south, the mountainous country rises gradually, forming the tract anciently known as the mountains of Ephraim and Judah; until in the vicinity of Hebron it attains an elevation of nearly 9,000 Paris feet above the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Further north, on a line drawn from the north end of the Dead Sea towards the true west, the ridge has an elevation of only about 2,500 Paris feet; and here, close upon the water-shed, lies the city of Jerusalem.

Six or seven miles N. and N. W. of the city is spread out the open plain or basin round about el-Jib (Gibeon), extending also towards el-Birch (Hebron); the waters of which flow off at its S. E. port through the deep valley here called by the Arabs Wady Bilb Hamiu; but to which the monks and travellers have usually given the name of the Valley of Turpentine, or of the Terebinth, on the mistaken supposition that it is the ancient Valley of Elah. This great valley passes along in S. W. direction an hour or more west of Jerusalem; and that, if bored to its foundation, the wall would present an unbroken face of solid masonry of nearly 1,000 feet long, and for a large portion of the distance more than 150 feet in height; in other words, the height of the Crystal Palace, and the height of the triumphal arch. The wall, as it stands, with less than half that height, emerging from the ground, has always been regarded as a marvel. What must it have been when entirely exposed to view! No wonder that prophets and psalmists have rejected in the 'walls' and 'bolwarks' between the Temple, and that Ezekiel should have described it as modo arcei constructum;" See also Journal of the Society of Biblical Literature, p. 494 (January 1888). II.
finally opens out from the mountains into the western plain, at the distance of six or eight hours S. W. from the city, under the name of Wady es-Sâdîr. The traveller, on his way from Ramleh to Jerusalem, descends into and crosses this deep valley at the village of Kâbînîtch on its western side, an hour and a half from the latter city. On again reaching the high ground on its eastern side, he enters upon an open tract sloping gradually downwards towards the south and east; and sees before him, at the distance of a mile and a half, the walls and domes of the Holy City, and beyond them the higher ridge or summit of the Mount of Olives.

The traveller now descends gradually towards the city along a broad swell of ground, having at some distance on his left the shallow northern part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; and close at hand on his right the basin which forms the beginning of the Valley of Hinnom. Upon the broad and elevated promontory within the fork of these two valleys, lies the Holy City. All around are higher hills: on the east, the Mount of Olives; on the south, the Hill of Evil Counsel, so called, rising directly from the Vale of Hinnom; on the west, the ground rises gently, as above described, to the borders of the great Wady; while on the north, a bend of the ridge connected with the Mount of Olives bounds the prospect at the distance of more than a mile. Towards the S. W. the view is some what more open; for here lies the plain of Rechâ'ın already described, commencing just at the southern brink of the Valley of Hinnom, and stretching off S. W., where it runs to the western sea. In the N. W., too, the eye reaches up along the upper part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; and from many points can discern the mosque of Nebi Samueel, situated on a lofty ridge beyond the great Wady, at the distance of two hours." (Robinson's Bibl. Res. i. 258-260).

So much for the local and political relation of Jerusalem to the country in general. To convey an idea of its individual position, we may say roughly, and with reference to an accompanying Plan, that the city occupies the southern termination of a table-land, which is cut off from the country round it on its west, south, and east sides, by ravines more than usually deep and precipitous. These ravines leave the level of the table-land, the one on the west and the other on the northeast of the city, and fall rapidly until they form a junction below its southeast corner. The eastern one — the valley of the Kedron, commonly called the Valley of Jehoshaphat, runs nearly straight from north to south. But the western one — the Valley of Hinnom — runs south for a time and then takes a sudden bend to the east until it meets the Valley of Jehoshaphat, after which the two rush off as one to the Dead Sea. How sudden is their descent may be gathered from the fact, that the level of the point of junction — about a mile and a quarter from the starting-point of each — is more than 600 feet below that of the upper plateau from which they commenced their descent. Thus, while on the north there is no material difference between the general level of the country outside the walls and that of the highest parts of the city; on the other three sides, so steep is the fall of the ravines, so trench-like their character, and so close do they keep to the promontory, at whose feet they run, as to leave on the beholder almost the impression of the ditch at the foot of a fortress, rather than of valleys formed by nature.

The promontory thus encircled is itself divided by a longitudinal ravine running up it from south to north, rising gradually from the south like the external ones, till at last it arrives at the level of the upper plateau, and dividing the central mass into two unequal portions. Of these, two, that on the west — the "Upper City" of the Jews, — the Mount Zion of modern tradition — is the higher and more massive; that on the east — Mount Moriah, the "Akra" or "lower city" of Josephus, now occupied by the great Mohammedan sanctuary with its mosques and domes — is at once considerably lower and smaller, so that, to a spectator from the south, the city appears to slope gradually towards the east. This central valley, at about half-way up its length, throws out a subordinate on its left or west side, which apparently quitted it at about right angles, and made its way up to the general level of the ground at the present Jaffa or Bethlehem gate. We say apparently, because covered as the ground now is, it is difficult to ascertain the point exactly. (This is the reason to which the author alludes, in speaking of the straight valley north and south, or its southern half, with the branch just spoken of, as a Tyropeon valley of Josephus. The question will be examined in Section III. under the head of the Topography of the Ancient City.

One more valley must be noted. It was on the north of Moriah, and separated from it by a hill on which, in the time of Josephus, stood one of the few part of the city called Bezea, or the New-town. Part of this depression is still preserved in the large reservoir with two arches, usually called the Pool of Bethesda, near the St. Stephen's gate. It also will be more explicitly spoken of in the examination of the ancient topography.

This rough sketch of the terrain of Jerusalem will enable the reader to appreciate the two great advantages of its position. On the one hand, the ravines which entrench it on the west, south, and east — out of which, as has been said, the rocky slopes of the city rise almost like the walls of a fortress out of its ditches — must have rendered it impregnable on those quarters to the warfare of the old world. On the other hand, its junction with the more level ground on its north and northwest sides afforded an opportunity of expansion, of which we know advantage was taken, and which gave it remarkable superiority over other cities of Palestine, and especially of Judah, which, though secure on their hill-tops, were unable to expand them (Stanley, S. J. P. pp. 174, 175).

The heights of the principal points in and round the city, above the Mediterranean Sea, as given by Lt. Van de Velde in the Memoirs accompanying his Map, 1838, are as follows:

From these figures it will be seen that the ridge on which the western half of the city is built is tolerably level from north to south; that the eastern hill is more than a hundred feet lower; and that from the latter the descent to the floor of the valley at its feet — the Bir-Agob — is a drop of nearly 450 feet.

The Mount of Olives overtops even the highest part of the city by rather more than 100 feet, and the Temple-hill by no less than 300. Its northern and southern outliers — the Viri Galilaei, Scopus, and Mount of Offense — bend round slightly towards the city, and give the effect of a standing round about Jerusalem. Especially would this be the case to a worshipper in the Temple. "It is true," says Professor Stanley, "that this image is not realized, as most persons familiar with European scenery would wish, and expect it to be realized. . . . Any one facing Jerusalem westward, northward, or southward will always see the city itself on an elevation higher than the hills in its immediate neighborhood, its towers and walls standing out against the sky, and not against any high background, such as which incloses the mountain towns and villages of our own Cumbrian or Westmoreland valleys. Yet again is the plain on which it stands inclosed by a continuous, though distant, circle of mountains like Athens or Innsbruck. The mountains in the neighborhood of Jerusalem are of unequal height, and only in two or three instances b A table of levels, differing somewhat from those of Lt. Van de Velde, will be found in Barclay's City of the Great King, pp. 103, 104.

It thus appears that the highest point of elevation here is the two seas — 2,715 feet — occurring on Mount Sepphoris, just north of Jerusalem. A bright spot from the top of the cairn on Sepphoris is 2,724 feet. The level of the Mediterranean is crossed 33 miles beyond Khan Hulda; and the figures against the last two stations represent the depression below the level of the Mediterranean. The party reached the Dead Sea on the 12th of March, 1865. It is known that this sea is liable to be, on the average, six feet lower, a few weeks later in the season; and hence the lowest depression of the surface would be 1,298 feet. According to the soundings by Lient. Vignes of the French Navy, the maximum depth of the Dead Sea is 1,148 feet, making the depression of the bottom 2,446 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. "The sounding in the Mediterranean, midway between Malta and Candia, by Capt. Sprunt, gave a depth of 13,920 feet, or a depression of the bottom five times greater than that of the bottom of the Dead Sea." (Observance Survey of Jerusalem, pp. 26-27, Lond. 1865.) It should be stated that a line of levels was also carried from Jerusalem to Solomon’s Pools. The level at the Jaffa gate on the west side of the city was found to be 2,528 feet below the Mediterranean; near the Mar Elias, 2,616; at Rachel’s tomb, 2,478; at the Castle near Solomon’s Pools, 2,424; near the upper Pool, 2,616, and the lower Pool, 2,513. (Survey, p. 88.)

Roule.—There appears to have been but two main approaches to the city. 1. From the Jordan Valley by Jericho and the Mount of Olives. This was the route commonly taken from the north and east of the country — as from Galilee by our Lord (Luke xvi. 11, xviii. 35, xix. 1, 29, 43, &c.), from Damascus by Pompey (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3, § 4: 1, § 1), to Malhamim by David (2 Sam. xv. 17, xvi.). It was also the route from places in the central districts of the country, as Samaria (2 Chr. xxviii. 15). The latter part of the approach, over the Mount of Olives, as generally followed at the present day, is identical with what it was, at least in one memorable instance, in the time of Christ. A path there is over the crown of the hill, but the common route is that 2,500 yards more to the south, along the shoulder of the principal summit (see S. F. P. p. 193). In the later times of Jerusalem, this road crossed the valley of the Kedron by a bridge or viaduct on a double series of arches, and entered the Temple by the gate of Susanna. (See the quotations from the Talmud in Otto, Lex. Rob. 265; and Barclay, pp. 102, 292.) The insecure state of the Jordan Valley has thrown this route very much into disuse, and has diverted the traffic from the north to a road along the central ridge of the country. 2. From the great maritime plain of Philistia and Sharon. This road led by the two Beth-herons up to the high ground at Gibeah, whence it turned south, and came to Jerusalem by Ramah and Gibeah, and over the ridge north of the city. This is still the route by which the heavy traffic is carried, though a few important to the same view as not least just than beautiful: "From almost every point, there is visible that long purple wall, rising out of its unmathematical depths, to us even more interesting than to the old Jewsites or inhabitants. They knew the tribes whom they were living over; but the inhabitants of modern Jerusalem, of whom comparatively few have ever visited the other side of the Jordan, it is the end of the world, — and to them
JERUSALEM

At districts of nora). This was the route by which large bodies, such as armies, always approached the city, whether from Gaza on the south, or from Cesarea and Tophelmen on the north. The communication with the mountainous districts of the south is less distinct. Even Hebron, after the establishment of the monarchy at Jerusalem, was hardly of importance enough to maintain any considerable amount of communication, and only in the wars of the Maccabees do we hear of any military operations in that region.

The roads out of Jerusalem were a special subject of Solomon's care. He paved them with black stone — probably the basalt of the trans-Jordanic districts. (Joseph. Ant. viii. 7, § 4).

Gates. — The situation of the various gates of the city is examined in Section III. It may, however, be desirable to supply here a complete list of those which are named in the Bible and Josephus, with the references to their occurrences: —

1. Gate of Ephraim. 2 Chr. xxv. 23; Neh. xii. 16, xii. 39. This is probably the same as the —

2. Gate of Benjamin. Jer. xx. 2, xxvii. 13; Zech. xiv. 10. If so, it was 400 cubits distant from the —

3. Corner Gate. 2 Chr. xxv. 23, xxvii. 9; Jer. xxxi. 12; Zech. xiv. 10.

4. Gate of Joshua, governor of the city. 2 K. xxiii. 8.

5. Gate between the two walls. 2 K. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4.

6. Horse Gate. Neh. iii. 28; 2 Chr. xxxii. 15; Jer. xxxi. 40.

7. Ravine Gate (i.e. opening on ravine of Hinnom). 2 Chr. xxvi. 9; Neh. ii. 13, 15, iii. 12.

8. Fish Gate. 2 Chr. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 31; Zeph. i. 9.

10. Sheep Gate. Neh. iii. 32, xii. 39.

11. East Gate. Neh. iii. 29.

13. Fountain Gate (Siloam?). Neh. xii. 37.

17. Gate Harith (perhaps the Sun; A V. East Gate). Jer. xix. 2.

To these should be added the following gates of the Temple:

Gate Sur. 2 K. xi. 6. Called also —

Gate of Foundation. 2 Chr. xxiii. 5.

Gate of the Guard, or behind the guard. 2 K. xi. 6, 19. Called the —

High Gate. 2 Chr. xxiii. 20, xxvii. 3; 2 K. xv. 35.

Gate Shallheeleth. 1 Chr. xxvi. 16.

Burial-Grounds. — The main cemetery of the city seems from an early date to have been where § is still — on the steep slopes of the valley of the Kidron. Here it was that the fragments of the idol abominations, destroyed by Josiah, were cast on the "graves of the children of the people" (2 K. xxii. 6), and the valley was always the receptacle for impurities of all kinds. There Manasseh's idol was burnt by Ass (1 K. xv. 13); there, according to Josephus, Athaliah was executed; and there the "filthiness" accumulated in the sanctuary, by the false-worship of Ahaz, was discharged (2 Chr. xxvii. 6, 16). But in addition to this, and although there is only a slight allusion in the Bible to the fact (Jer. vii. 32), many of the tombs now existing on the immediate environs of the city, must be as old as Biblical times — and if so, show that this was also used as a cemetery. The monument of Ananias the high-priest (Joseph B. J. v. 12, § 2) would seem to have been in this direction.

The tombs of the kings were in the city of David that is, Mount Zion, which, as will be shown in the concluding section [III.] of this article, was an eminence on the northern part of Mount Moriah. [See opposite view in § 14. Amer. ed.] The royal sepulchres were probably chambers containing separate recesses for the successive kings. [Tombs.] Of some of the kings it is recorded that, not being thought worthy of a resting-place there, they were buried in separate or private tombs in Mount Zion (2 Chr. xxix. 23, xxvii. 25; 2 K. xv. 7). Ahaz was not admitted to Zion at all, but was buried in Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxvii. 27). Other spots also were used for burial. Somewhere to the north of the Temple, and not far from the wall, was the monument of king Alexander (Joseph. B. J. v. 7, § 3). Near the northwest corner of the city was the monument of John the high-priest (Joseph. v. 6, § 2, 4); and to the northeast the "monument of the Fuller" (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2). On the north, too, were the monuments of Herod (v. 3, § 2) and of queen Helena (v. 2, § 3, § 3), the former close to the "Serpent's Pool." Wood; Gardens. — We have very little evidence as to the amount of wood and of cultivation that existed in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. The king's gardens of David and Solomon seem to have been in the bottom formed by the confluence of the Kidron and Hinnom (Joseph. Ant. vii. 15; Joseph. B. J. v. iv. 12, § 4, ix. 10, § 4). The Mount of Olives, as its name and those of various places upon it seem to imply, was a fruitful spot. "At its foot was situated the Garden of Gethsemane. At the time of the final siege, the space north of the wall of Agrippa was covered with gardens, groves, and plantations of fruit-trees, inclosed by hedges and walls; and to level these was one of Titus's first operations (B. J. v. 3, § 2). We know that the gate Gennath (i.e. "of gardens") opened on this side of the city (B. J. v. 4, § 2). The Valley of Hinnom was in Jerome's time "a pleasant and woody spot, full of delightful gardens watered from the fountain of Siloah." (Comm. in Jer. vii. 30). In the Talmud mention is made of a certain rose garden outside the city, which was of great fame but no clue is given to its situation (Otho, Lex. us, these mountains almost have the effect of a distant view of the sea; the houses constantly changing, or that precipitous rock coming out clear in the morning or evening shade — there, the form dimly shadowed out by surrounding valleys of what may possibly be Plegad; here the point of Rock, the capital of Ish and fortress of the Crusaders — and then at times all wrapped in deep haze — the mountains overhanging the valley of the shadow of death, and all the more striking from their contrast with the gray or green colors of the hills and streets and walls through which you catch the glimpse of them." (S & S p. 199; Amer. ed.) H.
Jerusalem

Rob. 265. [GARDEN.] The sieges of Jerusalem were too frequent during its later history to admit of any considerable growth of wood near it, even if the thin soil, which covers the rocky substratum, would allow of it. And the scarcity of earth again necessitated the cutting down of all the trees that could be found for the banks and mounds, with which the ancient sieges were conducted. This is expressly said in the accounts of the sieges of Pompey and Titus. In the latter case the country was swept of its timber for a distance of eight or nine miles from the city (B. J. vi. 8, § 1, a.c.).

Ceremonies just mentioned on the north of the city were watered if it is difficult to understand, since at present no water exists in that direction. At the time of the siege (Joseph. B. J. v. 3, § 2) there was a reservoir in that neighborhood called the Serpent's Pool; but it has not been discovered in modern times. The subject of the waters is more particularly discussed in the third section, and reasons are shown for believing that at one time there existed, north of the town, the outflow of which was stopped—possibly by Hezekiah, and the water fed underground to reservoirs in the city and below the Temple. From these reservoirs the overflow escaped to the so-called Fount of the Virgin, and thence to Siloam, and possibly to the Hir-Aphob, or "Well of Nehemiah." This source would seem to have been, and to be still the only spring in the city—but it was always provided with private and public cisterns. Some of the latter still remain. Outside the walls the two on the west side (Birket Manilla, and Birket es-Sultan), generally known as the upper and lower reservoirs of Gibon, the small "pool of Siloam," with the larger B. el-Haram close adjoining, and the B. Hammam Sidi Marga, close to the St. Stephen's Gate. Inside are the so-called Pool of Hezekiah (B. el-Rabat), near the Jaffa gate, which receives the surplus water of the Birket Manilla; and the B. Isbell on the opposite side of the city, close to the St. Stephen's Gate, commonly known as the Pool of Bethesda. These two reservoirs are probably the Pools of Amasyalab and Struthius of Josephus, respectively. Dr. Bar- chav has discovered another reservoir below the Ma'talim in the latter part of the city—the Tyropean valley—west of the Haram, supplied by the aqueduct from Bethlehem and "Solomon's Pools." It is impossible within the limits of the present article to enter more at length into the subject of the waters. The reader is referred to the chapters on the subject in Barchav's City of the Great King (x. and xviii.), and Williams' Holy City: also to the articles RAMON; SOLOMON; POOL.

Streets, Houses, etc.—Of the nature of these in the ancient city we have only the most scattered notices. The "East Street" (2 Chr. xxix. 4): the "street of the city"—i.e. the city of David (xxxi. 6): the "street facing the water gate" (Neh. viii. 1, 3)—or, according to the parallel account in 1 Esdr. ix. 38, the "bread place (appia peplos) of the Temple towards the east;" the "street of the handmaids of the king" (Est. vi. 8): the "first gate of the gate of Ephraim" (Neh. viii. 16): and the "open place of the first gate towards the east" must have been not "streets" in our sense of the word, so much as the open spaces found in eastern towns round the inside of the gates. This is evident, not only from the word used, Recelbd, which has the force of breadth or room, but also from the nature of the occurrences related in each case. The same phrases are intended in Zech. viii. 5: Streets, properly so called (Chaldez), there are (Jer. v. 1): but the name of only one, "the Bakers' Street." (Jer. xxxvii. 21), is preserved to us. This is conjectured, from the names, to have been near the Tower of Ovens (Neh. xii. 38; "furnaces" is incorrect). A notice of streets of this kind in the 3d century a. d. is preserved by Ariston (see p. 1292).

At the time of the destruction by Titus the low part of the city was filled with narrow lanes, containing the bazaars of the town, and when the breach was made in the second wall it was at the spot where the cloth, brass, and wool bazaars abutted on the wall.

To the houses we have even less clue, but there is no reason to suppose that in either houses or streets the ancient Jerusalem differed very materially from the present city. No description of the houses exhibit that air of meandering dilapidation which is now so prominent there—that sordid look which gives its houses the appearance of "having been burnt down many centuries ago." (Richardson, in S. of P. p. 183), and which, as it is characteristic of so many eastern towns, must be ascribed to Turkish neglect. In another respect too, the modern city must present a different aspect from the ancient—the hill masonry of color which, at least during a part of the year, pervades the slopes of the hills and ravines outside the walls. Not only is this the case on the west, where the city does not relieve the view, but also on the south. A dull, leaden ashue hove overspreads all. No doubt this is due, wholly or in part, to the enormous quantities of debris of stone and mortar which have been shut over the precipices after the numerous demolitions of the city. The whole of the slopes south of the Haram area (the ancient Ophel), and the modern Zion, and the west side of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, especially near the St. Stephen's Gate, are covered with these debris, lying as soft and loose as the day they were poured over, and presenting the appearance of gigantic mounds of rubbish.

Thus at least the ancient city stood in favorable contrast with the modern, but in many others the resemblance must have been strong. The nature of the site compels the walls in many places to retain their old positions. The southern part of the summit of the Upper City and the slopes of Ophel are now bare, where previous to the final siege they were covered with houses, and the North Wall has retired very much south of where it then stood; but on the whole the area of the West and East, and the western corner of the North Wall, are what they always were. And the look of the walls and gates, especially the Jaffa Gate, with the "Citadel" adjoining, and the Daviuncus Gate, is probably hardly changed from what it was. True, the minarets, domes, and spires, which give such a variety to the modern town, must have been absent; but their places would have been the Western and Eastern, at the northwest part of the wall; by the upper stories and turrets of Herod's palace, the palace of the Antonians, and the other public buildings; while the lofty fortress of Antonia, towering far above every building within the city, and itself a The writer was there in September, and the account above described left an ineffaceable impression on him.

JERUSALEM

surrounded by the keep on its southeast corner, must have formed a feature in the view not altogether unlike (though more prominent than) the "Citadel" of the modern town. The flat roofs and the absence of windows, which give an eastern city so startling an appearance to a western traveller, must have existed then as now.

But the greatest resemblance must have been on the southeast side, towards the Mount of Olives. Though there can be no doubt (see below, Section III. p. 131) that the hierarchy is now much larger than it was, yet the precinct of the Haram es-Sherif, with its domes and sacred buildings, some of them clinging to the very spot formerly occupied by the Temple, must preserve what we may call the personal identity of this quarter of the city, but little changed in its general features from what it was when the Temple stood there. Nay, more: in the substructions of the enclosure - those massive and venerable walls, which once to see is never to forget - is the very masonry itself. Its lower courses undisturbed, which was laid there by Herod the Great, and by Agrippa, possibly even by still older builders.

Environs of the City. — The various spots in the neighborhood of the city will be described at length under their own names, and to them the reader is accordingly referred. See Environs of Jerusalem; Kidron; Olives, Mount of, etc., etc.

II. The Annals of the City.

In considering the annals of the city of Jerusalem, nothing strikes one so forcibly as the number and severity of the sieges which it underwent. We catch our earliest glimpse of it in the brief notice of the 1st chapter of Judges, which describes how the "children of Judah smote it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire:" and almost the latest mention of it in the New Testament is contained in the solemn warnings in which Christ foretold how Jerusalem should be "compassed with armies" (Luke xxii. 20), and the abomination of desolation be seen standing in the Holy Place (Matt. xxiv. 15). In the fifteen centuries which elapsed between those two points the city was besieged no fewer than seventeen times; twice it was razed to the ground; and on two other occasions its walls were levelled. In this respect it stands without a parallel in any city ancient or modern. The fact is one of great significance. The number of the sieges testifies to the importance of the town as a key to the whole country, and as the depository of the accumulated treasures of the Temple, no less forcibly than do the severity of the contests and their protracted length to the difficulties of the position, and the obstinate enthusiasm of the Jewish people. At the same time the details of these operations, scanty as they are, throw considerable light on the difficult topography of the place; and on the whole they are in every way so characteristic, that it has seemed needful to use them as far as possible as a frame-work for the following rapid sketch of the history of the city.

The first siege appears to have taken place almost immediately after the death of Joshua (cir. 1400 B.C.). Judah and Simeon had been ordered by the divine oracle at Shiloh or Shechem to commence the task of actual possession of the portions distributed by Joshua. As they travelled in the region south of these they encountered a large force of Canaanites at Bezek. They dispersed, took prisoner Adoni-bezek, a ferocious petty chieftain, who was the terror of the country, and swept on their southward road. Jerusalem was soon reached. a It was evidently too important, and also too near the actual limits of Judah, to be passed by. "They fought against it and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire" (Judg. i. 8). To this brief notice Josephus (Ant. v. 2, § 2) makes a material addition. He tells us that the siege lasted some time (aiov χάτθων;) that the part which was taken at last, and in which the slaughter was made, was the lower city; but that the upper city was so strong, "by reason of its walls and also of the nature of the place," that they relinquished the attempt and moved off to Hebron (Ant. v. 2, § 23). These few valuable words of the 1st Jewish historian reveal one of those topographical peculiarities of the place - the possession of an upper as well as a lower city - which differentiated it so remarkably from the other towns of Palestine which enabled it to survive so many sieges and partial destructions, and which in the former section we have endeavored to explain. It is not to be wondered at that these changes, which must have been impressed with peculiar force on the mind of Josephus during the destruction of Jerusalem, of which he had only lately been a witness, should have recurred to him when writing the account of the earlier sieges. b

As long as the upper city remained in the hands of the Jebusites they practically had possession of the whole as that a Jebusite city in fact it remained for a longer period after this. The Benjamites followed the men of Judah to Jerusalem, but with no better result - "They could not drive out the Jebusites, but the Jebusites dwelt with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day." (Judg. i. 21). At the time of the sad story of the Levite (Judg. xix. — which the mention of Phinehas (xx. 28) fixes as early in the period of the Judges - Benjamin can hardly have had even so much footing as the passage just quoted would indicate; for the Levite refuses to enter it, not because it was hostile, but because it was "the city of a stranger, and not of Israel." And this lasted during the whole period of the Judges, the reign of Saul, and the reign of David at Hebron. c Owing to several

a According to Josephus, they did not attack Jerusalem till after they had taken many other towns - μετά των ᾧ κατέχοντο, ταυτότητι του. b See this noticed and contrasted with the situation of the villages in other parts by Prof. Stanley (S. & P. 161, 571, &c.).

c About half way through the period of the Judges (i.e. c. 8. 152) - occurred an invasion of the territory of the Hittites (Khatti) by Sethe I. king of Egypt, and the capture of the capital city, Keshesh, in the land of Amor. This would not have been noticed here, had not Keshesh been by some writers identified with Jerusalem (Geberon, Egypt, her Testimony, etc.)

d Also Williams in Dict. of Geogr. ii. 23, 24). The ground plans and identification are (1) the apparent affinity of the name (which they read Chadash) with the Greek κάθας, the modern Arabic et-Ruds, and the Syriac Kadatha; (2) the affinity of Amon with Amorites; (3) a likeness between the form and situation of the city, as shown in a rude sketch in the Egyptian records, and that of Jerusalem. But on closer examination these correspondences vanish. Egyptian scholars are now agreed that Jerusalem is much too far south to suit the requirements of the rest of the campaign, and that Keshesh survives in Nisra, a name discovered by Robinson a patron b ...
circumstances — the residence of the Ark at Shiloh — Saul's connection with Gibeah, and David's with Ziklag and Hebron — the disunion of Benjamin and Judah, symbolized by Saul's persecution of David — the tide of affairs was drawn northwards and southwards, and Jerusalem, with the places adjacent, was left in possession of the Jebusites. But as soon as a man was found to assume the rule over all Israel both north and south, so soon was it necessary that the seat of government should be moved from the remote Hebron nearer to the centre of the country, and the choice of David at once fell on the city of the Jebusites. David advanced to the siege at the head of the men-of-war of all the tribes who had come to Hebron — to turn the kingdom of Saul to him." They are stated as 290,000 men, choice warriors of the flower of Israel (1 Chr. xii. 23-39). No doubt they approached the city from the south. The ravine of the Kidron, the valley of Hinnom, the hills south and southeast of the town, the uplands on the west must have swarmed with these hardy warriors. As before, the lower city was immediately taken — and as before, the citadel held out (Joseph. Ant. vii. 3, § 1). The unhaunted Jebusites, lake and island on the Oronetes between Riblah and Homs, and still showing traces of extensive artificial works. Nor does the agreement between the representation in the records and the site of Jerusalem fail better. For the stream, which was supposed to represent the ravine of Jerusalem — the nearest point of the resemblance — contained at Ketesh water enough to drown several persons (Brugsch, Geogr. Inschift. 21, 8c.).

The passage which forms the latter clause of 2 Sam. v. 9 is generally taken to mean that the blind and the lame were excluded from the Temple. But believing in the impregnable of their fort as, manned the battlements "with lane and blind." a But they little understood the temper of the king, where is the proof that this was the fact? On one occasion at least we know that "the blind and the lame" came to Christ in the Temple, and he hailed them (Matt. xvi. 11). And indeed what had the Temple, which was not founded till long after this, to do with the matter? The explanation — which is in accordance with the accentuation of the Masorets, and for which the writer is indebted to the kindness of the Rev. J. J. S. Perowne — would seem to be that it was a proverb used in future with regard to any impregnable fortress — "The blind and the lame are there; let him enter the place if he can."
of those he commanded. David's anger was thoroughly roused by the insult (2 Sam. v. 13), and he at once proclaimed to his host that the first man who would scale the rocky side of the fortress and kill a Jebusite should be made chief captain of the host. A crowd of warriors, including Joseph, rushed forward to the attempt, but Josiah's superior agility gained him the day, and the citadel, the fastness of Zion, was taken (1 Chron. xiv. 10). It is the first time that that memorable name appears in the history.

David at once proceeded to secure himself in his new acquisition. He inclosed the whole of the city with a wall, and connected it with the citadel. In the latter he took up his own quarters, and the Zion of the Jebusites became "the city of David."

Zeal. Zion. The rest of the town was left to the more immediate care of the new captain of the host.

The sensation caused by the fall of this impregnable fortress must have been enormous. It reached even to the distant Tyre, and before long an alliance was made between the two. Thus Jerusalem, the city of David, became from this time "a characteristic offering of artificers and materials to erect a palace for David in his new abode. The palace was built, and occupied by the fresh establishment of wives and concubines which David acquired. Two attempts were made the one by the Philistines alone (2 Sam. vii. 17-21: 1 Chr. xiv. 8-12), the other by the Philistines, with all Syria and Phoenicia (Joseph. Ant. vii. 4, § 1; 2 Sam. xvi. 22-23) — to attack David in his new situation, but they did not affect the city, and the actions were fought in the "Valley of Giants," apparently north of Jerusalem, near Gibeah or Gibeon. The arrival of the Ark, however, was an event of great importance. The old Tabernacle of Bezaleel and Aholiab being now pitched on the height of Gibeon, a new tent had been spread by David in the fortress for the reception of the Ark; and here, "in its place," it was deposited with the most impressive ceremonies, and Zion became at once the great sanctuary of the nation. It now perhaps acquired the name of Beth Ha-Har, the "house of the mount," of which we catch a glimpse in the LXX. addition to 2 Sam. xxv. 24. In this tent the Ark remained, except for short flight to the foot of the Mount of Olives with David (xxv. 1-20), until it was placed in its permanent resting-place in the Temple of Solomon.

In the fortress of Zion, too, was the sepulchre of David, which became also that of most of his successors.

The only works of ornament which we can ascribe to David are the "royal gardens," as they are called by Josephus, which appear to have been formed by him in the level space southeast of the city, and on the slope of the valleys of Kidron and Hinnom, screened from the sun during part of the day by the shoulders of the inclosing mountains, and irrigated by the well "Ain Aglib, which still appears to retain the name of Joab (Joseph. Ant. viii. 14, § 4; ix. 10, § 4). Until the time of Solomon we hear of no additions to the city. His three great works were the Temple, with its east wall and cloister (Joseph. B. J. v. 3, § 1), his own palace, and the Wall of Jerusalem. The two former will be best described elsewhere. [PALACE; SOLOMON; TEMPLE.] Of the last there is an interesting notice in Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 1: 6, § 1), from which it appears that David's wall was a mere rampart without towers, and only of moderate strength and height. One of the first acts of the new king was to make the walls larger probably extend them round some outlying parts of the city — and strengthen them (1 K. iii. 1, with the explanation of Josephus, vii. 2, § 1). But on the completion of the Temple he again turned his attention to the walls, and both increased their height, and constructed very large towers among them (ix. 15, and Joseph. Ant. vii. 6, § 1). Another work of his in Jerusalem was the repair or fortification of Millo, whatever that strange term may signify (1 K. ix. 15, 24). It was in the works at Millo and the city of David — it is uncertain whether the latter consisted of stopping breaches (as in A. V.) or filling up a ditch round the fortress (the Vulg. and others) — that Jeroboam first cause under the notice of Solomon (1 K. x. 18, 27). Millo was a palace for his Egyptian queen — of the situation of which all we know is that it was not in the city of David (1 K. vii. 8, ix. 24, with the addition in 2Chr. viii. 11). But there must have been much besides these to fill up the measure of "all that Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem." (2 Chr. viii. 6) — the vast Harem for his 700 wives and 300 concubines, and their establishment — the colleges for the priests of the various religions of these women — the stables for the 1,400 chariots and 12,000 riding horses. Outside the city, probably on the Mount of Olives, there remained, down to the latest times of the monarchy (2 K. xxii. 13), the fanes which had erected for the worship of foreign gods (1 K. xi. 7); and which have still left their name clinging to the "Mount of Olives."

His care of the roads leading to the city is the subject of a special panegyric from Josephus (Ant. vii. 7, § 4). They were, as before observed, paved with black stone, probably the hard basalt from the region of Argob, on the east of Jordan, where he had a special resident officer.

As long as Solomon lived, the visits of foreign powers to Jerusalem were those of courtesy and amity; but with his death this was changed. A city, in the midst of which all the vessels were of pure gold, where spices, precious stones, rare woods, curious animals, were accumulated in the greatest profusion; where silver was no more valued than the stones of the street, and considered too mean a material for the commonest of the royal purposes — such a city, governed by such a fitiment prince as Rehoboam, was too tempting a prey for the surrounding kings. He had been on the throne (1 K. xx. 40, 970 a. c.) before Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded Judah with an enormous host, took the fortified places and advanced to the capital. Jerusalem was crowded with the chief men of the realm who had taken refuge there (2 Chr. xii. 5), but Rehoboam did not attempt resistance. He opened his gates, apparently on a promise from Shishak that he would not pillage (Joseph. Ant. viii. 10, § 3). However, the promise was not kept, and the treasures of the Temple and palace were carried off, and special mention is made of the golden...
bucklers ( JsonConvertующийся), which were hung by Solomon in the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K. xiv. 25; 1 Chr. xii. 9; comp. 1 K. x. 17).3 Jered in his pride was again threatened in the reign of Asa (grandson of Rehoboam), when Zerah the Cushite, or king of Ethiopia (Joseph. Ant. viii. 12, § 1), probably incited by the success of Shishak, invaded the country with an enormous horde of followers (2 Chr. xiv. 9). He came by the road through the low country of Philistia, where his chariots could find level ground. But Asa was more faithful and more powerful than Rehoboam had been. He did not remain to be blockaded in Jerusalem, but went forth and met the enemy at Mareshah, and repulsed him with great slaughter (cir. 1440). The consequence of this victory was a great reformation extending throughout the kingdom, but most demonstrative at Jerusalem. A vast assembly of the men of Judah and Benjamin, of Simeon, even of Ephraim and Manasses — now "strangers" (firebase) — was gathered at Jerusalem. Enormous sacrifices were offered; a prodigious enthusiasm seized the crowds of city, and amidst the clamor of trumpets and shouting, oaths of loyalty to Jehovah were exchanged, and threats of instant death denounced on all who should forsake his service. The temple of Jehovah in front of the palace of the Temple, which had fallen into decay, was rebuilt: the horrid idol of the queen-mother — the mysterious Asherah, doubtless an abomination of the Syrian worship of her grandmother — was torn down, ground to powder, and burnt in the ravine of the Kidron. At the same time the vessels of the Temple, which had been plundered by Shishak, were replaced from the spoil taken by Shaphan from the treasures, with Asa himself from the treasures (2 Chr. xiv. 8-19; 1 K. xxv. 12-15). This prosperity lasted for more than ten years, but at the end of that interval the Temple was once more despoiled, and the treasures so lately dedicated to Jehovah were sent by Asa, who had himself dedicated them, as bribes to Ben-hadad at Damascus, where they probably enriched the temple of Rimmon (2 Chr. xvi. 2, 3; 1 K. xix. 18). Asa was buried in that chariot by himself in the royal sepulchres in the citadel.

The reign of his son Jehoshaphat, though of great prosperity and splendor, is not remarkable as regards the city of Jerusalem. We hear of a "new court" to the Temple, but have no clue to its situation or its builder (2 Chr. xx. 5). An important addition to the government of the city was made by Jehoshaphat in the establishment of courts for the decision of causes both ecclesiastical and civil (2 Chr. xix. 8-11).

Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram was a prince of a different temper. He began his reign (cir. 887) by a massacre of his brethren, and of the chief men of the kingdom. Instigated, no doubt, by his wife

* According to Josephus he also carried off the arm which David had taken from the king of Zobah; but these were afterwards in the Temple, and did service at the proclamation of King Jehosh. [Ant. xiv. 102.]

* The Horse Gate is mentioned again in connection with Eloth by Jeremiah (xxxvi. 40). Possibly the name was perpetuated in the gate Susam (Nasa = horse) of the second Temple, the only gate on the east side of the outer wall (Lightfoot, Prop. of Temple, iii.).

From the expression in xiv. 25, "sons of Je-Jerusalem, he re-introduced the profligate licentious worship of Ashtaroth and the high places (2 Chr. xx. 11), and built a temple for Baal (2 Chr. xxii. 1). Though Jehoram, Ant. ix. 7, § 4), was a man of great vigor and courage, he was overcome by an invasion of one of those huge hordes which were now almost periodical. The Philistines and Arameans attacked Jerusalem, broke into the palace, spoilt all its treasures, sucked the royal harem, killed or carried off the king's wives, and all his sons but one. This was the fourth siege. Two years after it the king died, universally detested, and his kingdom was divided. His son Jehoram was denied a resting-place in the sepulchres of the kings, but was buried without ceremony in a private tomb on Zion (2 Chr. xxi. 20).

The next events in Jerusalem were the massacre of the royal children by Joram's widow Athaliah, and the six years' reign of that queen. During her sway the worship of Baal was prevalent and that of Jehovah proportionately depressed. The Temple was only ordered to go without repair, but was even mutilated by the sons of Athaliah, and its treasures removed to the temple of Baal (2 Chr. xxiv. 7). But with the increasing years of Josiah, the spirit of the adherents of Jehovah returned, and the confederacy of Jehohada the priest with the chief men of Judah resulted in the restoration of the true line. The king was crowned and proclaimed in the Temple. Athaliah herself was hurried out to execution from the sacred precincts into the valley of the Kidron (Joseph. Ant. ix. 7, § 3), between the Temple and Olivet, through the Horse Gate.6 The temple of Baal was demolished, its altars and images destroyed, his priests put to death, and the religion of Jehovah was once more the national religion. But the restoration of the Temple advanced but slowly, and it was not till three-and-twenty years had elapsed, that through the personal interference of the king the ravages of the Baal worshippingers were repaired (2 K. xii. 6-16), and the necessary vessels and utensils furnished for the service of the Temple (2 Chr. xxiv. 14. But see 2 K. xiii. 13; Joseph. Ant. iv. 8, § 2). But this zeal for Jehovah soon expired. The solemn ceremonial of the burial of the good priest in the royal sepulchres, in which the kings, can hardly have been forgotten before a general relapse into idolatry took place, and his son Zechariah was stoned with his family in the very court of the Temple for protesting.

The retribution invoked by the dying martyr quickly followed. Before the end of the year (cir. 838), Hazael king of Syria, after possessing himself of Gath, marched against the much richer prize of Jerusalem. The visit was averted by a timely offer of treasure from the Temple and the royal palace (2 K. xii. 18; 2 Chr. xxiv. 23, Joseph. Ant. ix. 4, § 4), but not before an action had been fought, in which a large army of the Israelites was routed by a very inferior force of Syro-hobah, 4 we are perhaps warranted in believing that Zechariah's brethren or his sons were put to death with him. The LXX. and Vulg. have the word in the singular number "son;" but, on the other hand, the Syr. and Arabic, and the Targum all agree with the Hebrew, and this is specially mentioned in Jerome's Qust. Hebr. It is perhaps supported by the special notice taken of the exception made by Amaziah in the case of the murderers of his father (2 K. xiv. 6; 2 Chr. xxiv. 4). The case of Naboth is a parallel [See Ramb. p. 796, note f].

a This is an addition by Josephus (ix. 9, § 9). If it really happened, the chariot must have been sent round to the other side of the valley of Hinnom and back again where there would be the direct road from Ain-Saams. Since the time of Solomon, chariots would seem to have become unknown in Jerusalem. At any rate we should infer, from the notice in 2 K. xiv. 20, that the royal establishment could not at that time boast of one.

c 2 Chr. xxvi. 9. The word rendered "the valley" has always employed for the valley on the west stones and arrows against besiegers. Later in this reign happened the great earthquake, which, although unmentioned in the historical books of the Bible, is described by Josephus (ix. 10, § 4), and alluded to by the Prophets as a kind of era (see Stanley, S. j. P., pp. 184, 125). A serious breach was made in the Temple itself, and below the city a large fragment was detached from the hill at En-roged, and, rolling down the slope, overwhelmed the king's gardens at the junction of the valleys of Hinnom and Kidron, and rested against the bottom of the slope of Olivet. After the death of Uzziah, he left the sacred precincts, in which the palace would therefore seem to have been situated, and resided in the hospital or lazare-house till his death. He was buried at Zion, with the kings (2 K. xv. 7); not in the sepulchre itself, but in a garden or field attached to the spot.

Jotham (cir. 756) inherited his father's sagacity, as well as his tastes for architecture and warfare. His works in Jerusalem were building the upper gateway to the Temple—apparently a gate communicating with the palace (2 Chr. xxiii. 20)—and also porticoes leading to the same (Ant. ix. 11, § 2). He also built much on Ophel,—probably on the south of Moriah (2 K. xv. 35; 2 Chr. xxiv. 3) —repaired the walls wherever they were dilapidated, and strengthened them by very large and strong towers (Joseph.). Before the death of Jotham (cir. 749) the clouds of the Syrian invasion began to gather. They broke on the head of Ahaz his successor; Rezin king of Syria and Pekah king of Israel joined their armies and invested Jerusalem (2 K. xvi. 5). The fortifications of the two previous kings enabled the city to hold out during a siege of great length (? in Π αλατίν Χρυσός, Joseph.). During its progress Rezin made an expedition against the distant town of Elath on the Red Sea, from which he expelled the Jews, and landed it over to the Edomites (2 K. xvi. 6; Ant. ix. 12, § 1). [AHAZ.]. Finding on his return that the place still held out, Rezin ravaged Judaea and returned to Damascus with a multitude of captives, leaving Pekah to continue the blockade.

Ahaz, thinking himself a match for the Israelite army, marched out and came forth. A tremendous conflict ensued, in which the three chiefs of the government next to the king, and a hundred and twenty thousand of the able warriors of the army of Judah, are stated to have been killed, and Pekah returned to Samaria with a crowd of captives, and a great quantity of spoil collected from the Benjaminite towns north of Jerusalem (Joseph.). Ahaz himself escaped, and there is no mention, in any of the records of the city, of the city having been plundered. The captives and the spoil were however sent back by the people of Samaria—a fact which, as it has no bearing on the history of the city, need here only be referred to, because from the narrative and south of the town, as נַעֲרָה is for that on the east.

d This will be the so-called Mount of Evil Counsel, or the hill below Moriah, according as En-roged is taken to be the "Well of Joram" or the "Fount of the Virgin."

e The interpretation given above is that of Kimchi, adopted by Genesis, Fürst and Bertheau: Keli (on 2 K. xx. 5) and Hengstenberg however, contend for a different meaning.
To learn that the nearest or most convenient route from Samaria to Jerusalem at that time was not, as now, along the plateau of the country, but by the depths of the Jordan Valley, and through Jericho (2 K. xvi. 5; 2 Chr. xxvii. 5-15; Joseph. Ant. ix. 12, § 2),

To oppose the confederacy which had so injured him, Ahaz had recourse to Assyria. He appears first to have sent an embassy to Tiglath-Pileser with presents of silver and gold taken from the treasures of the Temple and the palace (2 K. xvi. 8), which had been recruited during the last two reigns, and with a promise of more if the king would overrun Syria and Israel (Ant. ix. 12, § 3). This Tiglath-Pileser did. He marched to Damascus, took the city, and killed Rezin. While there, Ahaz visited him, probably to make his formal submission of vassalage, and gave him the further presents. To collect these he went so far as to lay hands on part of the permanent works of the Temple— the original constructions of Solomon, which none of his predecessors had been bold enough or needlessly to touch. He cut off the richly chased panels which ornamented the brass bases of the cisterns, dismounted the large tank or "sea" from the brazen halls, and supported it on a pedestal of stone, and removed the "cover for the sea," and the ornamental stand on which the kings were accustomed to sit in the Temple (2 K. xvi. 17, 18).

Whether the application to Assyria relieved Ahaz from one or both of his enemies, is not clear. From one passage it would seem that Tiglath-Pileser actually came to Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxviii. 20). At any rate the intercourse resulted in fresh insights, and fresh insults to the Temple. A new brazen altar was made after the profane fashion of one he had seen at Damascus, and was set up in the centre of the court of the Temple, to occupy the place and perform the functions of the original altar of Solomon, now removed to a less prominent position (see 2 K. xii. 16-15, with the expl. of Keil); the very sanctuary itself (2 K. xvi. 17, and 2 Chr. xxvi. 7) was polluted by idol-worship of some kind or other (2 Chr. xxviii. 3, 16). Horses dedicated to the sun were stabled at the entrance to the court, with their chariots (2 K. xxii. 11). Altars for sailing, and the moon, and stars were erected on the flat roofs of the Temple (2 Chr. xxiv. 12). Such consecrated vessels as remained in the house of Jehelah were taken there, and either transferred to the service of the idols (2 Chr. xxiv. 19), or cut up and re-manufactured; the lamps of the sanctuary were extinguished (xxix. 7), and for the first time the doors of the Temple were closed to the worshippers (xxviii. 24), and their offerings seized for the idols (Joseph. Ant. ix. 12, § 3). The famous sun-dial was erected at this time, probably in the Temple. When Ahaz at last died, it is not wonderful that a meager fate was awarded him that of even the leprous Uzziah. He was excluded not only from the royal sepulchres, but from the precincts of Zion, and was buried "in the city—in Jerusalem." For the very first act of Hezekiah (Isa. 7. 24) was to restore what his father had desecrated (2 Chr. xxix. 3; and see 36, "suddenly"). The Levites were collected and inspired; the Temple freed from its impurities both actual and ceremonial; the accumulated abominations being flushed and charged into the valley of the Kidron. The ill-fated service of the Temple was reorganized, with the instruments and the hymns ordained by David and Asaph; and after a solemn sin-offering for the late transgressions had been offered in the presence of the king and princes, the public were allowed to testify their acquiescence in the change by bringing their own thank-offerings (2 Chr. xxix. 1-26). This was done on the 17th of the first month of his reign. The regular time for celebrating the Passover was therefore gone by. But there was a law (Num. ix. 10, 11) which allowed the feast to be postponed for a month on special occasions, and of this law Hezekiah took advantage, in his anxiety to obtain from the whole of his people a national testimony to their allegiance to Jehovah and his laws (2 Chr. xxx. 2, 3). Accordingly at the special invitation of the king a vast multitude, not only from his own dominions, but from the northern kingdom, even from the remote Asher and Zebulun, assembled at the capital. Their first act was to uproot and efface all traces of the idolatry of the preceding and former reigns. High-places, altars, the mysterious and obscene symbols of Baal and Asherah, the votive-bronze serpents of Moses itself, were torn down, broken to pieces, and the fragments cast into the valley of the Kidron (2 Chr. xxx. 14: 2 K. xviii. 4). This done, the feast was kept for two weeks, and the vast concourse dispersed. The permanent service of the Temple was next thoroughly organized, the subsistence of the officiating ministers arranged, and provision made for storing the supplies (2 Chr. xxix. 2-21). It was probably at this time that the dedications of the Temple were renewed, and the gold or other precious plating, which had been removed by former kings, reapplied to the doors and pillars (2 K. xiii. 16).

And now approached the greatest crisis which had yet occurred in the history of the city: the dreaded Assyrian army was to appear under its walls. Hezekiah had in some way intimated that he did not intend to continue as a dependent— and the great king was now (in the 14th year of Hezekiah, cir. 711 B.C.) on his way to chastise him. The Assyrian army had been for some time in Phoenicia and on the sea-coast of Philistia (Rawlinson, Herod. i. 476), and Hezekiah had therefore had warning of his approach. The delay was taken advantage of to prepare for the siege. As before,
They gathered also in the gate of Gibon (2 Chr. xxiii. 30), A. V. most incorrectly "water-course"). It was led down by a subterraneous channel "through the hard rock" (2 Chr. xxxii. 30; Ezck. xlviii. 17), to the west side of the city of David (2 Chr. xx. 29), that is, into the valley which separated the Mount Moriah and Zion from the Upper City, and where traces of its presence appear to this day (Barclay, 310, 358).

This done, he carefully repaired the walls of the city, furnished them with additional towers, and built a second wall (2 Chr. xxxii. 5; Is. xxii. 10). The water of the reservoir, called the "low pool," or the "old pool," was diverted to a new tank in the city between the two walls (Is. xxi. 11). Nor was this all: as the struggle would certainly be one for life and death, he strengthened the fortifications of the city (2 Chr. xxxii. 5, "Milo," Is. xxii. 9), and prepared abundance of ammunition. He also organized the people, and offered them, gathered them together in the open place at the gate, and inspired them with confidence in Jehovah (xxxii. 6).

The details of the Assyrian invasion or invasions will be found under the separate heads of Sennacherib and Hezekiah. It is possible that Jerusalem was once regularly invested by the Assyrian army. It is certain that the army encamped there on another occasion, that the generals—the Tartan, the chief Cup-bearer, and the chief Eunuch—held a conversation with Hezekiah's chief officers outside the walls, most probably at or about the present Kaar Judah at the N W. corner of the city, while the wall above was crowded with the anxious inhabitants. At the time of Titus's siege the name of "the Assyrian Camp" was still attached to a spot north of the city, in remembrance either of this or the subsequent visit of Seleucus Nicator (Joseph. B. J. v. 12, § 2). But though taken—though the citadel was still the "virgin daughter of Zion"—yet Jerusalem did not escape unharmed. Hezekiah's treasures had to be emptied, and the costly ornaments he had added to the Temple were stripped off to make up the tribute. This, however, he recovered by the time of the subsequent visit of the ambassadors from Babylon, as we see from the account in 2 Chr. xx. 12; and 2 Chr. xxxii. 27-29.

The death of this good and great king was indeed a national calamity, and so it was considered. He was buried in one of the chief of the royal sepulchres, and a vast concourse from the country, as well as of the citizens of Jerusalem, assembled to join in the waiting at the funeral (2 Chr. xxxii. 33).

The reign of Manasseh (b. c. 696) must have been an eventful one in the annals of Jerusalem though only meagre indications of its events are to be found in the documents. He began by plunging into all the idolatries of his forefathers. He destroyed, and desecrated the Temple and the city with even more offensive idolatries than those of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxxii. 2-4; 2 K. xxi. 2-9). In this career of wickedness he was stopped by an invasion of the Assyrian army, by whom he was taken prisoner and carried to Babylon, where he remained for some time. The rest of his long reign was occupied in attempting to remedy his former misdeeds, and in the repair and conservation of the city (Joseph. Ant. x. 3, § 2).

He built a fresh wall to the citadel, "from the west side of Gibon-in-the-valley to the Fish Gate," i. e. apparently along the east side of the central valley, which parts the upper and lower cities from S. to N. He also continued the works which had been begun by Jotham at Ophel, and raised that fortress or structure to a great height. On his death he was buried in a private tomb in the garden attached to his palace, called also the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 18; 2 Chr. xxxii. 29). Here also was interred his son Amon after his violent death, following an uneventful but idolatrous reign of two years (2 Chr. xxxiii. 21-23; 2 K. xxi. 19-25).

The reign of Josiah (b. c. 639) was marked by a more strenuous zeal for Jehovah than even that of Hezekiah had been. He began his reign at eight years of age, and by his sixtieth year (12th of his reign—2 Chr. xxxiv. 3) commenced a thorough removal of the idolatrous abuses of Manasseh and Amon, and even some of Ahaz, which must have escaped the purgations of Hezekiah (2 K. xili. 12).

As on former occasions, these abominations were broken up small and carried down to the bed of the Kidron—which seems to have served almost the purpose of a common sewer, and there calcined and dispersed. The cemetery, which still paves the sides of that valley, had already begun to exist, and the fragments of the broken altars and statues were scattered on the graves that they might be effectually defiled, and thus prevented from further use. On the opposite side of the valley, somewhere on the Mount of Olives, were the ejections which Solomon had put up for the deities of his foreign wives. Not one of these was spared; they were all annihilated, and dead bones scattered over the places where they had stood. These things occupied six years, at the expiration of which, in the first month of the 18th year of his reign (2 Chr. xxxv. 1; 2 K. xxii. 23), a solemn passover was held, emphatically recorded to have been the greatest since the time of Samuel (2 Chr. xxxiv. 18). This seems to have been the crowning ceremony of the a The authority for this is the use here of the word Nachal, which is uniformly applied to the valley east of the city, as Ge is to that west and south. There are two remaining fragments of the concluding section of this article. Similar measures were taken by the Moslems on the approach of the Crusaders (Will. of Tyre, viii. 7, quoted by Robinson, i. 546 note).

b The reservoir between the Jaffa Gate and the Church of the Sepulchre, now usually called the Pool of Hezekiah, cannot be either of the works alluded to above. If an ancient construction, it is probably the Almond Pool of Josephus. (For the reasons, see Wilhams, Holy City, 35-38, 488.)

c The narrative in Kings appears to place the destruction of the images after the king's solemn covenant in the Temple, i. e. after the completion of the repairs. But, on the other hand, there are the dates given in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8, xxxv. 1, 19, which fix the Passover to the 14th of the 1st month of his 15th year, too early in the year for the repair which was begun in the same year that it had preceded it.
pursification of the Temple; and it was at once followed by a thorough renovation of the fabric (2 Chr. xxiv. 8; 2 K. xxii. 3). The cost was met by offerings collected at the doors (2 K. xiii. 4), and also all through the country (Joseph. Ant. x. 4, § 1), not only of Judah and Benjamin, but also of Ephraim and the other northern tribes (2 Chr. xxvii. 8). It was during these repairs that the Holy City was opened to worship once more, and shortly after all the people were convened to Jerusalem to hear it read, and to renew the national covenant with Jehovah.\(^a\)
The mention of Huldah the prophetess (2 Chr. xxiv. 22; 2 K. xii. 14) introduces us to the lower city under the name of "the Mishneh" (מִשְנֶה; A. V. "college," "school," or "second part")\(^b\). The name also survives in the book of Zephaniah, a prophet of this reign (i. 10), who seems to recognize "the Fish Gate," and "the lower city," and "the hills," as the three main divisions of the city.
Josiah's death took place at a distance from Jerusalem; but he was brought there for his burial, and was placed in "his own sepulchre" (2 K. xxiii.
30), or "in the sepulchre of his fathers" (2 Chr.
xxiv. 21) probably already prepared by Manasseh and Amos. (See I Esdr. i. 31.)
Josiah's rash opposition to Pharaoh-Necho cost him his life, his son his throne, and Jerusalem much suffering. Before Jehoachaz (n. c. 608) had been reigning three months, the Egyptian king found opportunity to send to Jerusalem, from Riblah where he was then encamped, a force sufficient to depose and take him prisoner, to put his brother Eliakim on the throne, and to erect a heavy liine from the city and country, which was paid in advance by the new king, and afterwards extorted by taxation (2 K. xxiii. 33, 35).
The fall of the city was now rapidly approaching.
During the reign of Jehoiakim — such was the new name which at Necho's order Eliakim had assumed — Jerusalem was visited by Nebuchadnezzar, with the Babylonian army lately victorious over the Egyptians at Carchemish. The visit was possibly repeated once, or even twice.\(^c\) A siege there must have been; but of this we have no account. We may infer how severe was the pressure on the surrounding country, from the fact that the very Bedouins were driven within the walls by "the fear of the Chaldeans and of the Syrians" (Jer.
xxv. 11). We may also infer that the Temple was entered, since Nebuchadnezzar carried off all of the vessels therefrom for his temple at Babylon (2 Chr. xxvii. 7), and that Jehoiakim was treated with great indignity (ibid. 6). In the latter part of this reign we discern the city harrassed and pillage by marauding bands from the east of Jor-daan (2 K. xxiv. 2).
Jehoiakim was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin
(n. c. 597). Hardly had his short reign begun, before the terrible army of Babylon reappeared before the city, again commanded by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K. xxiv. 10, 11). Jehoiachin's disposition appears that he might have shrunk from inflicting the punishment on the city the horrors of a third invasion. (Jer. vii. 2, § 1), and be therefore surrendered in the third month of his reign. The treasures of the palace and Temple were pillaged, certain golden articles of Solomon's original establishment, which had escaped the plunder and descensions of the previous reigns, were cut up (2 K. xxiv. 13), and the more desirable objects out of the Temple carried off (Jer. xxvi. 19). The first deportation that we hear of from the city now took place.
The king, his wives, and the queen mother, with their numerous and whole establishment, the princes, 7,000 warriors, and 1,000 artificers — in all 10,000 souls, were carried off to Babylon (ibid. 14-16). The uncle of Jehoiachin was made king in his stead, by the name of Zedekiah, under a solemn oath (\"by God\") of allegiance (2 Chr. xxxviii. 13; Ez. xxiv. 13, 14, 18). Had he been content to remain quiet under the rule of Babylon, the city might have stood many years longer; but he was not.
He appears to have been tempted with the chance of relief afforded by the accession of Pharaoh
Hophra, and to have applied to him for assistance (Ez. xxvii. 15). Upon this Nebuchadnezzar marched in person to Jerusalem, arriving in the ninth year of Zedekiah, on the 10th day of the 10th month (n. c. 588), and at once began a regular siege, at the same time wasting the country far and near (Jer. xxxvi. 7). The siege was conducted by erecting forts on lofty mounds round the city, from which, on the usual Assyrian plan, mountains were discharged into the town, and the walls and houses in them battered by rains (Jer. xxxi.
24, xxxii. 4, 6; 4 Ez. xxii. 3; Joseph. Ant. x
8, § 1). The city was also surrounded with troops (1 Jer. ii. 7). The siege was once abandoned, owing to the approach of the Egyptian army (Jer. xxxvii.
5, 11), and during the interval the gates of the city were reopened (ibid. 13). But the relief was only temporary and, in the 11th of Zedekiah (n. c. 586), on the 9th day of the 4th month (Jer. i. 6), being just a year and a half from the first investment, the city was taken. Nebuchadnezzar had in the meantime retired from Jerusalem to Riblah to watch the more important siege of Tyre, then in the last year of its progress. Thebesieged seem to have suffered severely both from hunger and discase (Jer. xxxiv. 24), but chiefly from the former

\(^a\) This narrative has some interesting correspondences with that of Josiah's coronation (2 K. xi.).
Amongst these is the singular expression, the king stood "on the pillar." In the present case Josephus understands this as an official spot — הַמָּסָבָה. See Keil on 2 K. xxii. 14. (In regard to this rendering of the A. V., see addition to College, Amer.
rel. 14.)

\(^b\) This event would surely be more emphatically related in the Bible, if Jerusalem were the Cadities which Necho is recorded by Herodotus to have destroyed after the battle at Megido. The Bible records pass over in total silence, or notice only in a casual way, events which are close to the threshold of the territory, when those events do not affect the families support this.

JERUSALEM

3 K. xxi. 3: Jer. ii. 6; Lam. v. 10). But they would perhaps have held on songer had not a breach in the wall been effected on the day named. It was at midnight (Joseph.). The whole city was wrapt in the pitchy darkness characteristic of an eastern town, and nothing was known by the Jews of what had happened till the generals of the army entered the city. (Joseph. and others.) and they took their seats in the middle court (Jer. xxxvi. 3; Joseph. Ant. x. 8, § 2). Then the alarm was given to Zedekiah, and, collecting his remaining warriors, they stole out of the city by a gate at the south side, somewhere near the present Beth el-Mughardibeh, crossed the Kedron above the royal gardens, and made their way over the Mount of Olives to the Jordan Valley. At break of day information of the flight was brought to the Chaldeans by some deserters. A rapid pursuit was made: Zedekiah was overtaken near Jericho, his people were dispersed, and he himself captured and reserved for a miserable fate at Riblah. Meantime the wretched inhabitants suffered all the horrors of assault and sack: the men were slaughtered, old and young, prince and peasant; the women violated in Mount Zion itself (Lam. ii. 4, v. 11, 12).

On the seventh day of the following month (2 K. xxv. 8), Nebuzaradan, the commander of the king's body-guard, who seems to have been changed with Nebuchadnezzar's instructions as to what should be done with the city, arrived. Two days were passed, probably in collecting the captives and booty; and on the tenth (Jer. iii. 12) the Temple, the royal palace, and all the more important buildings of the city, were set on fire, and the walls thrown down and left as heaps of disordered rubbish on the ground (Neh. iv. 2). The spoil of the city consisted apparently of little more than the furniture of the Temple. A few small vessels in gold and silver, and some other things in brass were carried away whole—the former under the special eye of Nebuzaradan himself (2 K. xxv. 15; comp. Jer. xxvii. 10). But the larger objects, Solomon's huge brazen basin or sea with its twelve bulls, the ten bases, the two magnificent pillars—Jachin and Boaz, too heavy and too cumbersome for transport, were broken up. The pillars were almost the only parts of Solomon's original construction which had not been mutilated by the sacrilegious hands of some idol-worshipping monarch or other, and there is quite a touch of pathos in the way in which the chronicler fingers over his recollections of their height, their size, and their ornaments—capitals, wreathen work, and pomegranates, all of brass.

The previous depredations, and the sufferings endured in the siege, must to a great extent have drained the place of its able-bodied people, and thus the captives, on this occasion, were but few and unimportant. The high-priest, and four other officers of the Temple, the commanders of the fighting men, five of the court, the master officer of the army, and sixty select private persons, were reserved to be submitted to the king at Riblah. The daughters of Zedekiah, with their children and establishment (Jer. xii. 10, 16; comp. Ant. x. 9, § 4), and Jeremiah the prophet (ibid. xl. 5), were placed by Nebuzaradan at Mizpeh under the charge of Gedaliah ben-Ahikam, who had been appointed as a steward of the few poor laboring people left to carry on the necessary husbandry and vine-dressing. In addition to these were some small bodies of men in armed, who had perhaps escaped from the city before the blockade, or in the interval of the siege, and who were hoarding on the outskirts of the country watchting what might turn up (Jer. xii. 7, 8). (Ishmael, 6.) The remainder of the population—numbering, with the 72 above named, 8,422 souls (Jer. lii. 29)—were marched off to Babylon. About two months after this Gedaliah was murdered by Ishmael, and then few people of consideration left with Jereniah went into Egypt. Thus the land was practically deserted of all but the very poorest class. Even these were not allowed to remain in quiet. Five years afterwards—the 291 of Nebuchadnezzar's reign—the insatiable Nebuzaradan, on his way to Egypt (Joseph. Ant. x. 9, § 7), again visited the ruins, and swept off 745 more of the wretched peasants (Jer. lii. 30).

Thus Jerusalem at last had fallen, and the Temple, set up under such fair auspices, was a heap of chokeden ruins. The spot, however, was none the less sacred because the edifice was destroyed, and it was still the resort of devotes, sometimes from great distances, who brought their offerings—in strange heathenish guise indeed, but still with a true feeling—to weep and wail over the holy place (Jer. xlii. 5). It was still the centre of hope to the people in captivity, and the time soon arrived for their return to it. The decree of Cyrus authorizing the rebuilding of the "house of Jehovah, God of Israel, which is in Jerusalem," was issued n. c. 530. In consequence thereof a very large caravan of Jews arrived in the country. The expedition comprised all classes—the royal family included—Levites, inferior ministers, lay people belonging to various towns and families—and numbered 42,360 in all. They were well provided with treasure for the necessary onthly: and—a more precious burden still—they bore the vessels of the old Temple which had been preserved at Babylon, and were now destined again to find a home at Jerusalem (Ezr. v. 14, vi. 5).

A short time was occupied in settling in their former cities, but on the first day of the 7th month (Ezr. ii. 6) a general assembly was called together at Jerusalem in the "open place of the first gate towards the east" (I Esdr. v. 47); the altar was set up, and the daily morning and evening sacrificial offerings were made according to the old method. (Jan. 5), the day of the investment of the city by Nebuchadnezzar; the 10th Ab (July 29), destruction of the Temple by Nebuzaradan, and subsequently by the Romans; the 11th Ab (Sept. 19), murder of Gedaliah; the 9th Tebeth, when Ezekiel and the other captives at Babylon received the news of the destruction of the Temple. The entrance of the Chaldees into the city is commemorated on the 17th Tammuz (July 8), the day of the breach of the Antonia by Titus. The modern dates here given are the days on which the fasts are kept in the present year, 1890. (Josephus says 43,492.) been commenced. Other festivals were re-instituted, and we have a record of the celebration of at least one anniversary of the day of the first assembly at Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 1, &c.). Arrangements were made for stone and timber for the fabric, and in the 2d year after their return (v. c. 534), on the 1st day of the 2d month (1 Esdr. v. 57), the foundation of the Temple was laid amidst the songs and music of the priests and Levites (according to the old rites of David), the tears of the old men and the shouts of the young. But the work was destined to suffer material interruptions. The chiefs of the people by whom Samaria had been colonized, finding that the Jews refused their offers of assistance (Ezr. iv. 2), annexed and hindered them in every possible way; and by this and some natural drawbacks—such as violent storms of wind by which some of the work had been blown down (Hag. i. 9), drought, and consequent failure of crops, and mortality amongst both animals and men—the work was protracted through the rest of the reign of Cyrus, and that of Alexander, till the accession of Artaxerxes (Darius) I. to the throne of Persia (2 Esdr. vi. 24). The Samaritans then sent to the court at Babylon a formal memorial (a measure already tried without success in the preceding reign), representing that the inevitable consequence of the restoration of the city would be its revolt from the empire. This produced its effect, and the building entirely ceased for a time. In the mean time houses of some pretension began to spring up—cathed houses (Hag. i. 4), and the embankments of the builders of the Temple cooled (ibid. 9). But after two years the delay became intolerable to the leaders, and the work was recommenced at all hazards, amidst the encouragements and rebukes of the two prophets, Zechariah and Haggai, on the 24th day of the 6th month of Darius' 2d year. Another attempt at interruption was made by the Persian governor of the district west of the Emphrates (Ezr. v. 3), but the result was only a confirmation by Darius of the privileges granted by his predecessor (vi. 6-13), and an order to render all possible assistance. The work now went on apace, and the Temple was finished and dedicated in the 6th year of Darius (n. c. 516), on the 3d (or 2d, 1 Esdr. vii. 5) of Adar—but the last month, and on the 14th day of the new year the first Passover was celebrated by the people. The new Temple was 90 feet less in altitude than that of Solomon (Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, § 1); but its dimensions and form—of which there are only scanty notices—will be best considered elsewhere. [TEMPLE.] All this time the walls of the city remained as the Assyrians had left them (Neh. ii. 12, &c.). A period of 58 years now passed of which no accounts are preserved to us; but at the end of that time, in the year 437, Ezra arrived from Babylon with a caravan of Priests, Levites, Nethinims, and lay people, among the latter some members of the royal family, in all 1,777 persons (Ezr. vii., and with variable offerings from the Persian king and his court, as well as from the Jews who still remained in Babylonia (ibid. vii. 14, viii. 25). He left Babylon on the 1st day of the year and reached Jerusalem on the 1st of the 5th month (Ezr. vii. 9, viii. 32).

Ezra at once set himself to correct some irregularities into which the community had fallen. The chief of them was the practice of marrying the native women of the old Canaanitish nations. The people were assembled at three days' notice, and harkened by Ezra—so urgent was the case—in the midst of a pouring rain, and in very cold weather, in the open space in front of the main entrance to the Temple (Exra. x. 9, 1 Esdr. ix. 6). His exhortations were at once acceded to, a form of treasurers-offering was arranged, and no less than 17 priests, 10 Levites, and 86 laymen, renounced their foreign wives, and gave up an intercourse which had been to their fathers the cause and the accompaniment of almost all their misfortunes. The matter took three months to carry out, and was completed on the 1st day of the new year: but the practice was not wholly eradicated (Neh. xiii. 24), though it never was pursued as before the Captivity.

We now pass another period of eleven years until the arrival of Nehemiah, about n. c. 445. He had been moved to come to Jerusalem by the accounts given him of the wretchedness of the community, and of the state of ruin in which the walls of the city continued (Neh. i. 3). Arrived there he kept his intentions quiet for three days, but on the night of the third he went out by himself, and, as far as the ruins would allow, made the circuit of the place (xii. 11-16). On the following day he collected the chief people, and proposed the immediate rebuilding of the walls. One spirit seized them. Priests, rulers, Levites, private persons, citizens of distant towns, as well as those dwelling on the 21st, put their hand vigorously to the work. And notwithstanding the taunts and threats of Sanballat, the ruler of the Samaritans, and Tobiah the Ammonite, in consequence of which one half of the community remained while the other half built, the work was completed in 52 days, on the 25th of Elul. The wall thus rebuilt was that of the city of Jerusalem as well as the city of Lavi or Zion, as will be shown in the next section, where the account of the rebuilding is examined in detail (Section II. p. 1322). At this time the city must have presented a forlorn appearance; but few houses were built, and large spaces remained unoccupied, or occupied but with the ruins of the Assyrian destructions (Neh. vii. 4). In this respect it was not unlike much of the modern city. The solemn dedication of the wall, recorded in Neh. xii. 27-43, probably took place at a later period, when the works had been completely finished.

Whether Ezra was here at this time is uncer-
In the government of Nehemiah, especially on one interesting occasion — the anniversary, it would appear, of the first return of Zerubbabel's caravan — on the 1st of the 7th month (Neh. viii. 1). He there appears as the venerable and venerable instigator of the people in the forgotten law of Moses, amongst other reforms reestablishing the first of Tabernacles, which we incidentally learn had not been celebrated since the time that the Israelites originally entered on the land (viii. 17).

Nehemiah remained in the city for twelve years (v. 14, xiii. 6), during which time he held the office and maintained the state of governor of the province (v. 14) from his own private resources (v. 15). He was indefatigable in his regulation and maintenance of the order and dignity both of the city (vii. 3, x. 1, xiii. 13, &c.) and Temple (x. 32, 39, xii. 44); abolished the excessive rates of usury by which the richer citizens had grievously oppressed the poor (v. 6-12); kept up the genealogical registers, at once so characteristic of, and important to, the Jewish nation (vii. 5, xii. 27); and in various other ways showed himself an able and active governor, possessing power and influence over his fellow-citizens. At the end of this time he returned to Babylon; but it does not appear that his absence was more than a short one, and he was soon again at his post, as vigilant and energetic as ever (xiii. 7). Of his death we have no record.

The foreign tendencies of the high-priest Eliashib and his family had already given Nehemiah some concern (vii. 4, 28), and when the cheats exercised by his vigilance and good sense were removed, they quickly led to serious disorders, unfortunately the only occurrences which have come down to us during the next epoch. Eliashib's son Joiaid, who succeeded him in the high-priesthood (apparently a few years before the death of Nehemiah), had two sons, the one Jonathan (Neh. xii. 11) or Johanan (Neh. xii. 22; Joseph. Ant. xi. 7, § 1), the other Joshua (Joseph. ibid.). Joshua had made interest with the general of the Persian army that he should displace his brother in the priesthood: the two quarrelled, and Joshua was killed by Johanan in the Temple (n. c. ciii. 306): a horrible occurrence, and even aggravated by its consequences; for the Persian general made it the excuse not only to pollute the sanctuary (mājib) by entering it, on the ground that he was certainly less nucleus than the body of the murdered man — but also to extort a tribute of 50 daries on every lamb offered in the daily sacrifice for the next seven years (Joseph. Ant. i. 103d.);

Johanan in his turn had two sons, Jaddua (Neh. xii. 11, 22) and Manasseh (Joseph. Ant. xi. 7, § 2). Manasseh married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, and eventually became the first priest of the Samaritan temple on Gerizim (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2, 4). But at first he seems to have been associated in the priesthood of Jerusalem with his brother (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2, 4), and have relinquished it only on being forced to do so on account of his connection with Sanballat.

The foreign marriages against which Ezra and Nehemiah had acted so energetically had again become common among both the priests and kymen. A movement was made by a returning party against the practice; but either it had obtained a firmer hold than before, or there was nothing to replace the personal influence of Nehemiah, for the movement only resulted in a large number going over with Manasseh to the Samaritans (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2, 4). During the high-priesthood of Judas occurred the famous visit of Alexander the Great to Jerusalem. Alexander had invaded the north of Syria, beaten Darius's army at the Granicus, and again at Issus, and then, having besieged Tyre, sent a letter to Judas inviting his allegiance, and desiring assistance in men and provisions. The answer of the high-priest was, that to Darius his allegiance had been given, and that to Darius he should remain faithful while he lived. Tyre was taken by the Persians (Krouk's "Histoire," 401), and then the Macedonians compelled Josias of Egypt, the last king of that strip of the coast of Palestine to Gaza, which in its turn was taken in October. The road to Egypt being thus secured, Alexander had leisure to visit Jerusalem, and deal in person with the people who had ventured to oppose him. This he did apparently by the same route which Isaiah (xviii. 32-33) describes Semnecherib as taking. The "Saphon," at which he was met by the high-priest must be Mount Mephil — Seopus — the high ridge to the north of the city, the Nob of Isaiah, which is crossed by the northern road, and from which the first view — and that a full one — of the city and Temple is procured. The result to the Jews of the visit was an exemption from tribute in the Sabbatical year; a privilege which they retained for long.

We hear nothing more of Jerusalem until it was taken by Ptolemy Soter, about b. c. 302, during his invasion into Syria. The account given by Josephus (Ant. xii. 1; Abyon, i. § 22), partly from Agatharchides, and partly from some other source, is extremely meagre, nor is it quite consistent with itself. But we can discern one point to which more than one parallel is found in the later history — that the city fell into the hands of Ptolemy because the Jews would not fight on the Sabbath. Great liberties were then to have been experienced by the Jews after this conquest, and a large number were transported to Egypt and to Northern Africa.

A stormy period succeeded — that of the struggles between Antigonus and Ptolemy for the possession of Syria, which lasted until the defeat of the former at Ipsus (b. c. 301), after which the country came into the possession of Ptolemy. The contention however was confined to the maritime region of b Prideaux says five years; but his reasons are not satisfactory, and would apply to tea as well as to five.

c According to Neh. xiii. 28, the man who married Sanballat's daughter was "son of Josiah;" but this is an anachronistic expression to the circumstances stated of Josephus, if related in the text, and the word "son" is often used in Hebrew for "grandson," or even a more remote descendant (see, e. g. Cant. iii. 801).

d The details of this story, and the arguments for and against its authenticity, are given under Alexander (i. 99; see also High-Priest ii. 1072). It should be observed that the text of the Targum is quite cut down, and the whole of the narrative appears as if more native to the authors of the book of Judges than to the pen.

Palestine, and Jerusalem appears to have escaped. Scanty as is the information we possess concerning the city, it yet indicates a state of prosperity; the only outward mark of dependence being an annual tax of twenty talents of silver payable by the highpriests. Simon the Just, who followed his father Onias in the high-priesthood (cir. n. c. 300), is one of the favorite heroes of the Jews. Under his care the sanctuary was repaired, and some foundations of great depth added round the Temple, possibly to gain a larger surface on the top of the hill (Ezckus. l. 1. 2). The large cistern or "sea" of the principal court of the Temple, which hitherto would seem to have been built temporarily or roughly constructed, was sheeted in brass (ibid. 3); the walls of the city were more strongly fortified to guard against such attacks as those of Ptolemy (ib. 4); and the Temple service was maintained with great pomp and ceremonial (ib. 11-21). His death was marked by evil omens of various kinds prefiguring disasters (Otho, Lex. Reb. "Messias"). Simon's brother Eleazar succeeded him as highpriest (n. c. 211), and Antigonos of Socho as president of the Sanhedrim (ib. Ptolaeus). The disasters predicted did not immediately arrive, at least in the century occupied; but intercourse with Greeks was fast eradicating the national character, but it was at any rate a peaceful intercourse during the reigns of the Ptolemies who succeeded Soter, namely, Philadelphia (n. c. 285), and Egergetes (n. c. 247). It was Philadelphia who, according to the story preserved by Josephus, had the translation of the Septuagint made, in connection with which he sent Aristaeus to Jerusalem during the priesthood of Eleazar. He also bestowed on the Temple very rich gifts, consisting of a table for the showbread, of wonderful workmanship, basins, bowls, phials, etc., and other articles both for the private and public use of the priests (Joseph. Ant. xii. 2. § 5 — 10, 15). A description of Jerusalem at this period under the name of Aristeas still survives, which supplies a lively picture of both Temple and city. The Temple was enclosed with three rows of arches, and a proportionate thickness. The spacious courts were paved with marble, and beneath them lay immense reservoirs of water, which by mechanical contrivance was made to rush forth, and thus wash away the blood of the sacrifices. The city occupied the summit and the eastern slope of the opposite hill — the modern Zion. The main streets appear to have run north and south; some of the lower ones having but parallel, following the course of the valley, with cross streets connecting them. They were "furnished with raised pavements," either due to the slope of the ground, or possibly adopted for the reason given by Aristaeus, namely, to enable the passengers to avoid contact with persons or things ceremonially unclean. The bazaars were then, as now, a prominent feature of the city. There were to be found gold, precious stones, and spices brought by caravans from the East, and other articles imported from the West by way of Joppa, Gaza, and Ptolemais, which served its purposes largely. This is evidenced by the fact that among these Phoenician importations from the West may have figured the dyes and the tie of the remote Britain.

Eleazar was succeeded (cir. n. c. 276) by his uncle Manasses, brother to Onias I.; and he again (cir. 250) by Onias II. Onias was a son of the great Simon the Just; but he inherited none of his father's virtues, and his ill-timed avarice at length endangered the prosperity of Jerusalem. For, the payment of the annual tax to the court of Egypt having been for several years evaded, Ptolemy Euergetes, about 226, sent a commissioner to Jerusalem to enforce the arrears (Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 1: Ptolemeis). Onias, now in his second childhood (Ant. xii. 4, § 3), was easily prevailed on by his nephew Joseph to allow him to return with him to Alexandria, to endeavor to arrange the matter with the king. Joseph, a man, evidently, of great ability, not only procured the remission of the tax in question, but also persuaded Ptolemy to grant him the lucrative privilege of furnishing the whole revenue of Judaea, Samaria, Coele-Syria, and Phoenicia — a privilege which he retained till the province was taken from the Ptolemies by Antiochus the Great. Hitherto the family of the high-priest had been the most powerful in the country; but Joseph had now founded one able to compete with it, and the contention and rivalry between the two — manifesting itself at one time in enormous bribes to the court, at another in fierce quarrels at home — at last led to the interference of the chief power with the affairs of a city, which, if wisely and quietly governed, might never have been molested.

Onias died about 217, and was succeeded by Simon II. In 221 Ptolemy Philopator had succeeded Euergetes on the throne of Egypt. He had only been king three years when Antiochus the Great attempted to take Syria from him. Antiochus partly succeeded, but in a battle at Raphia, south of Gaza, fought in the year 217 (the same as that of Hamilcar at Thrasymene), he was completely routed and forced to fly to Antioch. Ptolemy shortly after visited Jerusalem. He offered sacrifice in the court of the Temple, and would have entered the sanctuary, had he not been prevented; the first Jew we meet with bearing a Greek name.

"The legend of the translation by 72 interpreters is no compilation, but it probably rests on some foundation of fact. The sculpture of the table and bowls (chies and vines, without any figures) seems to have been founded on the descriptions in the Law. In 5 Mace. ii. 14, &c., it is said to have had also a map of Egypt and it.

ranted by the firmness of the high-priest Simon, and also by a supernatural terror which struck him and stretched him paralyzed on the pavement of the court (3 Mac. ii. 22). a This repulse Ptolemy never forgave, and the Jews of Alexandria suffered severely in consequence.

Like the rest of Palestine, Jerusalem now became alternately a prey to each of the contending parties (Joseph. Ant. xii. 3, § 3). In 193 it was taken by Antiochus. In 199 it was retaken by Scopas the Alexandrian general, who left a garrison in the citadel. In the following year Antiochus again beat the Jews, and the money was for a time preserved from the plunderers of the city, gladdening the hearts of all in Egypt. The service of Antiochus required by large presents of money and articles for sacrifice, by an order to Ptolemy to furnish ephod and other materials for idolatries and other additions to the Temple, and by material relief from taxation. He also declared a decree framing the sacrifice of the dead of the Jewish nation with the intrusion of strangers, and forbidding any infrac-

A The third book of the Macabees, though so called, has no reference to the Macabean heroes, but is taken up with the relation of this visit of Ptolemy to Jerusalem, and its consequences to the Jews.
b This visit is omitted in 1 Mac. Josephus mentions it, but says that it was marked by a great

iv. 9, 12) for the first time we hear of an attempt to efface the distinguishing mark of a Jew—again to "become uncircumcised." The priests quickly followed the example of their chief (2 Mac. iv. 14), and the Temple service was neglected. A special deputation of the youth of Jerusalem—"anti-ochians"—they were now called—was sent with offers from the Temple of Jehovah to the festival of Hercules at Tyre. In 172 Jerusalem was visited by Antiochus. He entered the city at night by torch-light and amid the acclamations of Jason and his party, and after a short stay returned (b 2 Mac. iv. 22). b And now the treachery of Jason was to be requited to him. His brother Onias, who had assumed the Greek name of Menelaus, in his turn bought the high-priesthood from Antiochus, and drove Jason out to the other side of the Jordan (2 Mac. iv. 26). To pay the price of the office, Menelaus had laid hands on the consecrated plate of the Temple. This became known, and a riot was the consequence (2 Mac. iv. 32, 30, 39, 40).

During the absence of Antiochus in Egypt, Jason suddenly appeared before Jerusalem with a thousand men, and whether by the fury of his attack, or from his having friends in the city, he entered the walls, drove Menelaus into the citadel, and slaughtered the citizens without mercy. Jason seems to have failed to obtain any of the valuables of the Temple, and shortly after retreated beyond Jordan, where he miserably perished (2 Mac. v. 7-10). But the news of these tumults reaching Antiochus on his way from Egypt brought him again to Jerusalem (n. c. 170). He appears to have entered the city without much difficulty. c An indiscriminate massacre of the adherents of Ptolemy followed, and then a general pillage of the contents of the Temple. Under the guidance of Menelaus, Antiochus went into the sanctuary, and took from there the golden altar, the candlestick, the magnificent table of shewbread, and all the vessels and utensils, with 1,800 talents out of the treasury. These things occupied three days. He then quitted for Antioch, carrying off, besides his booty, a large train of captives; and leaving, as governor of the city, a Phrygian named Philip, a man of a more savage disposition than himself (1 Mac. v. 10-12, 17-20; 2 Mac. v. 17). a Onias, e Antiochus, and the Temple—"the Temple which the Jews had built in these places with their own hands" (Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 3; B. J. i. 1, § 1). But something worse was reserved for Jerusalem than pillage, death, and slavery, worse than even the pollution of the presence of this monster in the holy place of Jehovah Nothing less than the total extermination of the Jews was resolved on, and in two years (b. c. 168) an army was sent under Apollonius to carry the resolve into effect. He waited till the Sabbaths, and then for the second time the entry was made while the people were engaged in their devotions. Another great slaughter took place, the city was now in its turn pillaged and burnt, and the walls destroyed.

The foreign garrison took up its quarters in what had from the earliest times been the strongest part of the place—the ancient city of David (1 Mac. i. 93, vii. 32), the famous hill of Zion, described by the Jews as the place of the slaughter of the Jewish party and by plunder (Ant. xii. 5, § 3). This, however, does not agree with the best ancient character given to it in the 2 Mac. and Josephus, and followed above.

c There is a great discrepancy between the accounts of 1 Mac., 2 Mac., and Josephus.
But safe, not or Jehovah, opened readied a. she's, there their this severe, no circumcision these xiii. worship of Temple (1 Jer. vi. 18) — that Judas collected his people to take it, and began a siege with banks and engines. In the mean time Antiochus had died (n. c. 164), and was succeeded by his son Antiochus Eupator, a youth. The garrison in the Acra, finding themselves pressed by Judea, managed to communicate with the king who brought an army from Antioch and attacked Beth-zur, one of the key-positions of the Maccabees. This obliged Judas to give up the siege of the Acra, and to march southwards against the intruder (1 Mac. vi. 32; Joseph. Ant. xii. 9, § 4). Antiochus's army proved too much for his little force, his brother Eleazar was killed, and he was compelled to fall back on Jerusalem and shut himself up in the Temple. Thither Lydia, Antiochus's general — and later, Antiochus himself — followed him (vi. 48, 51, 57, 62) and commenced an active siege. How long it lasted we are not informed, but the provisions of the besieged were rapidly becoming exhausted, and famine had driven many to make their escape (ver. 54), when news of an insurrection elsewhere induced Lyda to advise Antiochus to offer terms to Judas (vi. 55-58). The terms, which were accepted by him were, liberty to live after their own laws, and immunity to their persons and their fortress. On inspection, however, Antiochus found the place so strong that he refused to keep this part of the agreement, and before he left the walls were pulled down (vi. 62; Ant. xii. 9, § 7). Judas apparently remained in Jerusalem for the next twelve months. During this time Antiochus and Lyda had been killed and the throne seized by Demetrius (n. c. 162), and the new king had despatched Bæchides and Aleimus, the then high-priest, — a man of Greek principles, — with a large force, to Jerusalem. Judas was again within the walls of the Temple, which in the interval he must have rebuilt. He could not be tempted forth, but sixty of the Ascalonians were killed the next year. They had moved off, first to a short distance from the city, and finally back to Antioch (1 Mac. vii. 1-25: Ant. xii. 10, §§ 1-3). Demetrius then sent another army under Nicama, an unknown place not far from the city. Judas was victorious, and Nicama escaped and took his army within the city. Then, "the famous hill of Zion" vanished, both, about a century and a half before Christ.

Worship of the Temple, and so high as to overlook it (Ant. xii. 5, § 4).

This was built on the eastern hill, as containing the edifice from the western hill or upper Jerusalem. From a critical examination and clear elucidation of the testimony here referred to, in its connection, by Dr. Robinson, it would not be seen in the desert mountain. The meaning probably is the entire Immersion. Josephus (Ant. xii. 7, § 7) says "the city." Both writers probably refer to the whole hill.

The Mount Zion: but in the parallel passages, vi. 7, 26, the word used is "sanctuary," or rather "holy places," ἁγίασμα. The meaning probably is the entire Immersion. Josephus (Ant. xii. 7, § 7) says "the city." Both writers probably refer to the whole hill.
refuge in the Acra at Jerusalem. Shortly after Nicanaor came down from the fortress and paid a visit to the Temple, where he insulted the priests (1 Macc. vii. 30, 34; 2 Macc. xiv. 31-35). He also caused the death of Razia, one of the elders in Jerusalem, a man greatly esteemed, who killed himself in the most horrible manner, rather than fall into his hands (2 Macc. xiv. 37-40). He then procured some reinforcements, met Judas at Adhas, probably not far from Demetrias, was killed, and his army thoroughly beaten. Nicanaor's head and right arm were brought to Jerusalem. The head was nailed on the wall of the Aera, and the hand and arm on a conspicuous spot facing the Temple (2 Macc. xv. 30-35), where their memory was perhaps perpetuated in the name of the gate Nicanaor, the eastern entrance to the Great Court (Reland, Antiq. i. 9, 4).

The death of Judas took place in 161. After it Baccides and Alcimus again established themselves at Jerusalem in the Aera (Joseph. Ant. xiii. i, § 3), and in the intervals of their contests with Jonathan and Simon added much to its fortifications, furnished it with provisions, and confided there the children of the chief people of Judea as hostages for their good behavior (1 Macc. ix. 50-53). In the second month (May) of 160 the high-priest Alcimus began to make some alterations in the Temple, apparently doing away with the interlave between one court and another, and in particular demolishing some wall or building, to which peculiar sanctity was attached as "the work of the prophets" (1 Macc. x. 54). The object of these alterations was doubtless to lessen the distinction between Jew and Gentile. But they had hardly been commenced before he was taken suddenly ill and died.

Baccides now returned to Antioch, and Jerusalem remained without molestation for a period of seven years. It does not appear that the Macbethes resided there; part of the time they were at Michmash, in the entangled country seven or eight miles north of Jerusalem, and part of the time fighting with Baccides at Beth-haam in the Jordan Valley near Jericho. All this time the Aera was held by the Ezizians (Ant. xiii. 4, § 92) and the obisonten Jews, who still held the hostages taken from the other part of the community (1 Macc. x. 6). In the year 153 Alexander Balas, the real or pretended son of Antiochus Epiphanes, having landed at Ptolemais, Demetrius sent a communication to Jonathan with the view of keeping him attached to his cause (1 Macc. x. 1, &c.; Ant. xiii. 2, § 1). Upon this Jonathan moved up to Jerusalem, rescued the hostages from the Aera, and began to repair the city. The destructions of the last few years were remedied, the walls round Mount Zion particularly being rebuilt in the most substantial manner, as a regular fortification (x. 11). From this time forward Jonathan received privileges and professions of confidence from both sides. First, Alexander authorized him to assume the office of high-priest, which had not been filled up since Elasius (Ant. xiii. 6, § 10, § 1). This he took at the Feast of Tabernacles in the autumn of the year 153, and at the same time collected soldiers and ammunition (1 Macc. x. 21).

Next, Demetrius, amongst other immunities granted to the country, recognized Jerusalem and its environs as again "holy and free," relinquished all "right to the Aera — which was henceforward to be subject to the high-priest (x. 31, 32), endowed the Temple with the revenues of Ptolemais, and also with 15,000 shekels of silver charged in other places and ordered not only the payment of the same sum in regard to former years, but the release of an annual tax of 3,000 shekels hitherto exacted from the priests. Lastly, he authorized the repair of the holy place, and the building and fortifying of the walls of Jerusalem to be charged to the royal accounts, and gave the privilege of sanctuary to all persons, even mere debtors, taking refuge in the Temple or in its precincts (1 Macc. x. 31, 32, 39-41).

The contents between Alexander and Demetrius, in which he was actively engaged, prevented Jonathan from taking advantage of these grants till the year 145. He then began to invest the Aera (xii. 29; Ant. xiii. 4, § 9), but, owing partly to the strength of the place, and partly to the constant dissensions abroad, the siege made little progress during fully two years. It was obvious that no progress could be made as long as the inmates of the Aera could get into the city or the country, and there buy provisions (xiii. 49), as hitherto was the case; and, therefore, at the first opportunity, Jonathan built a wall or bank round the base of the citadel-hill, cutting off all communication both with the city on the west and the country on the east (xii. 36; comp. xiii. 49), and thus completing the circle of investment, of which the Temple wall formed the south and remaining side. At the same time the wall of the Temple was repaired and strengthened, especially on the east side, towards the Valley of Kidron. In the mean time Jonathan was killed at Ptolemais, and Simon succeeded him both as chief and as high-priest (xii. 8, 42). The investment of the Aera proved successful, but three years still elapsed before this enormously strong place could be reduced, and at last the garrison capitulated only from famine (xiii. 49; comp. 21). Simon entered it on the 23d of the 2d month b. c. 142. The fortress was then entirely demolished, and the existence on which it had stood lowered, until it was reduced below the height of the Temple hill beside it. The last operation occupied three years (Ant. xiii. 6, § 7). The valley north of Moriah was probably filled up at this time (B. J. v. 5, § 4). A fort was then built on the north side of the Temple hill, apparently against the wall, so as directly to command the site of the Aera, and here Simon and his immediate followers resided (xiii. 52). This was the Baris — so called after the Hebrew word Birah — which, under the name of Antonia, became subsequently so prominent a feature of the city. Simon's other achievements, and his alliance with the Romans, must be reserved for another place. We hear of no further occurrences at Jerusalem during his life except the placing of two brass tablets, commemorating his exploits on Mount Zion, in the precinct of the sanctuary (xiv. 27, 48). In 135 Simon was murdered at Beth Jeraicho, and then all was again confusion in Jerusalem.

One of the last steps of his son John Hyrcanus was to secure both the city and the Temple (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 7, § 4). The people were favorable to him, and repulsed Ptolemy, Simon's murderer, when he attempted to enter (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 7, § 4; B. J. i. 2, § 3). Hyrcanus was made high-priest. Shortly after this, Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, brought an army into southern Palestine, ravaged and burnt the country, and attacked Jerusalem. To invest the city, and cut off all chance of escape it was encircled by a girdle of seven camps. The active operations of the siege were carried on as usual at the north, where the level ground comes up to the walls. Here a hundred towers of attack were erected, each of three stories, from which projectiles were cast into the city, and a double ditch, broad and deep, was excavated before them to protect them from the sudden sallies which the besieged were constantly making. On one occasion the wall of the city was undermined, its timber foundations pulled down and thus a temporary breach was effected (5 Macc. xxii. 5). For the first and last time we hear of a want of water inside the city, but from this a reasonable rain relieved them. In other respects the besieged seem to have been well off. Hyrcanus however, with more prudence than humanity, anticipating a long siege, turned out of the city all the infant and non-fighting people. The Feast of Tabernacles had now arrived, and, at the request of Hyrcanus, Antiochus, with a moderation which gained him the title of the Pious, agreed to a truce. This led to further negotiations, which ended in the siege being relinquished. Antiochus wished to place a garrison in the city, but this the late experience of the Jews forbade, and hostages and a payment were substituted. The money for this subsidy was obtained by Hyrcanus from the spoils of David, the outer chamber of which he is said to have opened, and to have taken 3,000 talents of the treasure which had been buried with David, and had hitherto escaped discovery (\textit{Ant.} vii. 15, \textit{f}. 3; xiii. 8, \textit{f}. 4; \textit{B. J.} i. 2, 2). After Antiochus's departure Hyrcanus carefully repaired the damage done to the walls (5 Macc. xxi. 18); and it may have been at this time that he enlarged the Elyma or fortress adjoining the northwest wall of the Temple enclosure, which had been founded by his father, and which he used for his own residence and for the custody of his sacred vestments worn as high-priest (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xvii. 4, \textit{f}. 3).

During the rest of his long and successful reign John Hyrcanus resided at Jerusalem, officially administering the government from there, and regularly fulfilling the duties of the high-priest (see 5 Macc. xxix. 3; Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 10, \textit{f}. 3). The great sons of Pharisees and Sadducees first appear in prominence at this period. Hyrcanus, as a Macabæus, had belonged to the Pharisees, but an occurrence which happened near the end of his reign caused him to desert them and join the Sadducees, and even to persecute his former friends (see the story in Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 10, \textit{f}. 3; 5 Macc. xxi. 7-11; Maimon, ii. 73). He died in peace and honor (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 10, \textit{f}. 7). There is no mention of his burial, but it is nearly certain that the "monument of John the high-priest," which stood near the northwest corner of the city and is so frequently referred to in the account of the final siege, was his tomb; at least no other high-priest of the name of John is mentioned. [\textit{High-priest}, ii. 167.]

Hyrcanus was succeeded (n. e. 197) by his son Aristobulus. Like his predecessors he was high-priest; but unlike them he assumed the title as well as the power of a king (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 11, \textit{f}. 1; 5 Macc. xxviii. 11). Aristobulus resided in the Elyma (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 11, \textit{f}. 2). A passage, dark and subterfugious (\textit{B. J.} i. 3, \textit{f}. 3), led from the Elyma to the Temple; one part of this passage was called "Strato's tower," and here Antigonus, brother of Aristobulus, was murdered by his order. Aristobulus died very tragically immediately after, having reigned but one year. His brother Alexander Januarius (n. c. 105), who succeeded him, was mainly engaged in trying to get at a distance from Jerusalem, returning thither however in the intervals (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 12, \textit{f}. 3, \textit{ad fin.}). About the year 95 the animosities of the Pharisees and Sadducees came to an abashing explosion. Like his father, Alexander belonged to the Sadducees. The Pharisees had never forgiven Hyrcanus for having deserted them, and at the feast of Tabernacles, as the king was officiating, they invited the people to go to him with the criers which they carried in the feast (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 13, \textit{f}. 5; comp. 10, \textit{f}. 5; Reland, \textit{Ant.} iv. 5, \textit{f}. 9). Alexander retaliated, and six thousand persons were at that time killed by his orders. But the dissensions lasted for six years, and no fewer than 50,000 are said to have lost their lives (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 13, \textit{f}. 5; 5 Macc. xxix. 2). These severities made him extremely unpopular with both parties, and led to their inviting the king of Demetrias Eucharius, king of Syria, against him. The actions between them were fought at a distance from Jerusalem; but the city did not escape a share in the horrors of war: for when, after some fluctuations, Alexander returned successful, he crucified publicly 800 of his opponents, and had their wives and children butchered before their eyes, while he and his counsellors feasted in sight of the whole scene (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 14, \textit{f}. 2). Such an iron sway as this was enough to crush all opposition, and Alexander reigned till the year 70 without further disturbances. He died while besieging a fortress called Targugae, somewhere beyond Jordan. He is commemorated as having at the time of his disputes with the people erected a wooden screen round the altar and the sanctuary (\textit{Ant.} xiv. 13, \textit{f}. 6), as far as the parapet of the priests' court, to prevent access to him as he was administer (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} xiii. 14, \textit{f}. 5). The "monument of king Alexander" was doubtless his tomb. It stood somewhere near, but outside, the north wall of the Temple (\textit{B. J.} v. 7, \textit{f}. 3), probably not far from the situation of the tombs of the old kings (see section III. p. 1325). In spite of opposition the Pharisees were now by far the most powerful party in Jerusalem, and Alexander had before his death instructed his queen, Alexander—whom he left to succeed him with two sons—to commit herself to them. She did so, and the consequence was that though the feuds between the two great parties continued at their height, yet the government, being supported by the strongest, was always secure. The chieft of the two sons, Hyrcanus, was made high-priest, and Aristobulus had the command in wars abroad. The queen lived but the year 70. On her death, Hyrcanus attempted to take the crown, but was opposed by his brother, to whom in three months he yielded its possession, Aristobulus becoming king in the year 69. Before Alexander's death she had imprisoned the family of Aristobulus in the Baris (B. J. i. 5, § 4). There too Hyrcanus took refuge during the negotiations with his brother about the kingdom, and from thence had attacked and vanished his opponents who were collected in the Temple (Ant. xiv. 1, § 2). Josephus here first speaks of it as the Acropolis, as and as being above the Temple (σημείω τῶν ἱερῶν).

After the reconciliation, Aristobulus took possession of the royal palace (τὰ βασιλεία). This can hardly be other than the "palace of the Asmonaeans," of which Josephus gives some notices at a subsequent part of the history (Ant. xx. 8, § 11; B. J. ii. 16, § 3). From these it appears that it was situated west of the Temple, on the extreme highest point of the upper city (the modern Zou) immediately facing the southwest angle of the Temple enclosure, and at the west end of the bridge which led from the Temple to the Xystus.

The brothers soon quarreled again, when Hyrcanus called to his assistance Aretas, king of Damascus. Before this new enemy Aristobulus fled to Jerusalem and took refuge within the fortifications of the Temple. And now was witnessed the strange anomaly of the high-priest in alliance with a heathen king besieging the priests in the Temple. Suddenly a fire appeared on the Temple, and the siege is interrupted and eventually raised by the interference of Scouras, one of Pompey's lieutenants, to whom Aristobulus paid 400 talents for the relief. This was in the year 65. Shortly after, Pompey himself arrived at Damascus. Both the brothers came before him in person (Ant. xiv. 3, § 2), and were received with moderation and civility. Aristobulus could not make up his mind to submit, and after a good deal of straining betook himself to Jerusalem and prepared for resistance. Pompey advanced by way of Jericho. As he approached Jerusalem, Aristobulus, who found the city too much divided for effectual resistance, met him and offered a large sum of money and surrender. Pompey sent forward Gabinus to take possession of the place; but the bolder party among the adherents of Aristobulus had meantime gained the ascendancy, and he found the gates closed. Pompey on this threw the king into chains and advanced on Jerusalem. Hyrcanus was in possession of the city and received the invader with open arms. The Temple on the other hand was held by the party of Aristobulus, which included the priests (xiv. 4, § 3). They cut off the bridges and causeways which connected the Temple with the town on the west and north, and prepared for an obstinate defense. Pompey put a garrison into the palace of the Asmonaeans, and into other positions in the upper city, and fortified the houses adjacent to the Temple. The north side was the most practicable, and there he commenced his attack. But even there the hill was intrenched by an artificial ditch in addition to the very deep natural valley, and was defended by lofty towers on the wall of the Temple (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; B. J. i. 7, § 1).

The city appeared to be strong; and the garrison had stationed some part of its force on the high ground west of the city (Joseph. B. J. vi. 12, § 2), but he himself commanded in person at the north. The first efforts of his soldiers were devoted to filling up the ditch and the valley, and to constructing the banks on which to place the military engines, for which purpose they cut down all the timber in the environs. These had in the mean time been sent for from Tyre, and as soon as the banks were sufficiently raised the ballistae were set to work to throw stones over the wall into the crowded courts of the Temple; and lofty towers were erected, from which to discharge arrows and other missiles. But these operations were not carried on without great difficulty, for the wall of the Temple was thronged with slingers, who most seriously interfered with the progress of the Romans. Pompey, however, remarked that on the seventh day the Jews regularly desisted from fighting (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; Strab. xvi. p. 763), and this afforded the Romans a great advantage, for it gave them the opportunity of moving the engines and towers nearer the walls, filling up the trenches, adding to the banks, and in other ways making good the damage of the past six days without the slightest molestation. In fact Josephus gives it as his opinion, that but for the opportunity thus afforded, the necessary works never could have been completed. In the Temple itself, however fierce the attack, the daily sacrifices and other ceremonies, down to the minutest detail, were never interrupted, and the priests pursued their devotions unmolested, even when men were struck down near them by the stones and arrows of the besiegers. At the end of three months the besiegers had approached so close to the wall that the battering rams could be worked, and a breach was effected in the largest of the towers, through which the Romans entered, and after an obstinate resistance and loss of life, remained masters of the Temple. Many Jews were killed by their countrymen of Hyrcanus's party who had entered with the Romans; some in their confusion set fire to the houses which abutted on a portion of the Temple walls, and perished in the flames, while others threw themselves over the precipices (B. J. i. 7, § 4). The whole number slain is reported by Josephus at 12,000 (Ant. xiv. 4, § 4). During the assault the priests maintained the same calm demeanor which they had preserved during the siege, and were equally slain at their duties while pouring their drink-offerings and burning their incense (B. J. i. 7, § 4). It should be observed that in the account of this siege the Baris is not once mentioned: the attack was on the Temple alone, instead of on the fortress, as in Titus's siege. The inference is that at this time it was a small and unimportant adjunct to the main fortifications of the Temple.

Pompey and many of his people explored the recesses of the Temple, and the distress of the Jews was greatly aggravated by their holy places being thus exposed to intrusion and profanation (B. J. i. 7, § 6). In the sanctuary were found the great golden vessels — the table of shew-bread, the candle-stick, the censers, and other articles proper to that place. But what most astonished the intruders, on passing beyond the sanctuary and surveying the total darkness of the Holy of Holies, was to find it in the adytum neither image nor shrine. It evidently caused much remark ("inde vulgatunm"), and was the one fact regarding the Temple which the historian thought worthy of preservation —

nulla intus deum effige; vaenum sedem et inania area " (Tacitus, Hist. v. 9). Pompey's conduct on this occasion does him great credit. He left the treasures thus exposed to his view — even the spoils and the money in the treasury — untouched, and, after his examination over, he ordered the Temple to be cleansed and purified from the bodies of the slain, and the clergy worship to be resumed, and the Jews was confirmed in his high-priesthood, but without the title of king. (Ant. xx. 10); a tribute was laid upon the city, the walls were entirely demolished (καταστροφή... τὰ τεῖχη πάντα), and Pompey took his departure for Rome, carrying with him Aristobulus, his sons Alexander and Antigonus, and his two daughters. The Temple was taken in the year 63, in the 3d month (Sivan), on the day of a great fast (Ant. xiv. 4, § 3); probably that for Jerobeam, which was held on the 24th of that month.

During the next few years nothing occurred to affect Jerusalem, the struggles which desolated the unhappy Palestine during that time taking place away from its vicinity. In 56 it was made the seat of one of the five senates or Sanhedrins, to which under the constitution of Galbinus the civil power of the country was for a time committed. Two years afterward (b. c. 54) the rapacious Crassus visited the city on his way to Parthia, and plundered it not only of the money which Pompey had spared, but of a considerable treasure accumulated from the contributions of Jews throughout the world, in all a sum of 10,000 talents, or about 2,000,000 of sterling. The pillage was aggravated by the fact of his having first received from the priest in charge of the treasure a most costly beam of solid gold, on condition that everything else should be spared (Ant. xiv. 7, § 1).

During this time Hyrcanus remained at Jerusalem, acting under the advice of Antipater the Idumean, his chief minister. The assistance which they rendered to Mithridates, the ally of Julius Caesar, in the Egyptian campaign of 48-47, induced Caesar to confirm Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, and, in reward for his services to the Roman government under the title of Ephraem (Ant. xiv. 10). At the same time he rewarded Antipater with the procuratorship of Judæa (Ant. xiv. 8, § 5), and allowed the walls of the city to be rebuilt (Ant. xiv. 10, § 4). The year 47 is also memorable for the first appearance of Antipater's son Herod in Jerusalem, when, a youth of fifteen (or more probably about 20), he characteristically overawed the assembled Sanhedrin. In 45 Antipater was murdered in the palace of Hyrcanus by one Malchias, who was very soon after himself slain by Herod (Ant. xiv. 11, §§ 4, 6). The tumults and revolts consequent on these murders kept Jerusalem in commotion for some time (B. J. i. 12). But a more serious danger was at hand. Antigonus, the younger and now the only surviving son of Aristobulus, suddenly appeared in the country supported by a Parthian army. Many of the Jews of the district about Carmel and Joppa bhedged to him, and he instantly made for Jerusalem, giving out that his only object was to pay a visit of devotion to the Temple (5 Macc. xlix. 5). So sudden was his approach, that he got into the city and reached the palace in the upper market-place — the modern Zion — without resistance. Here however he was met by Hyrcanus and Phasaelus (Herod's brother, with a strong party of soldiers. A fight ensued, which ended in Antigonus being driven over the bridge into the Temple, where he was constantly harassed and annoyed by Hyrcanus and Phasaelus from the city. Fentcost arrived, and the city, and the suburbs between it and the Temple, were crowded with pilgrims and others who wished to keep the feast. Herod too arrived, and with a small party had taken charge of the palace. Phasaelus kept the wall. Antigonus' people seem (though the account is very obscure) to have got out through the Barios into the part north of the Temple. Here Herod and Phasaelus attacked, dispersed, and cut them up. Paccornus, the Parthian general, was lying outside the walls, and at the earnest request of Antigonus, he and 500 horse were admitted, ostensibly to mediate. The result was, that Phasaelus and Hyrcanus were outwitted, and Herod overpowered, and the Parthians got possession of the place. Antigonus was made king, and as Hyrcanus knelt a supplicant before him, the new king — with all the wrongs which his father and himself had suffered full in his mind — bit off the ears of his uncle, so as effectually to incapacitate him, and again taking the high-priesthood. Phasaelus killed himself in prison. Herod alone escaped (Ant. xiv. 13).

Thus did Jerusalem (b. c. 40) find itself in the hands of the Parthians. In three months Herod returned from Rome king of Judæa, and in the beginning of 39 appeared before Jerusalem with a force of Romans, commanded by Sibon, and pitched his camp on the west side of the city (B. J. i. 15, § 5). Other occurrences, however, called him away from the siege at this time, and for more than two years he was occupied elsewhere. In the mean time Antigonus held the city, and had dismissed his Parthian allies. In 37 Herod appeared again, now driven to fury by the death of his favorite brother Joseph, whose dead body Antigonus had shamefully mutilated (B. J. i. 17, § 2). He came, as Pompey had done, from Judæa, and, like Pompey, he pitched his camp and made his attack on the north side of the Temple. The general circumstances of the siege seem also very much to have resembled the former, except that there were now two walls north of the Temple, and that the driving of mines was a great feature in the siege operations (B. J. i. 18, § 1; Ant. xiv. 16, § 2). The Jews distinguished themselves by the same reckless courage as before; and although it is not expressly said that the services of the Temple were carried on with such minute regularity as when they excited the astonishment of Pompey, yet we may infer it from the fact that, during the hottest of the operations, the besieged desired a short truce in which to bring in animals for sacrifice (Ant. xiv. 16, § 2). In one respect — the facts which raged among the besieged — this siege somewhat foreshadows that of Titus.

For a short time after the commencement of the operations Herod absented himself for his marriage at Samaria with Mariamne. On his return he was joined by Sosius, the Roman governor of Syria, with a force of from 50,000 to 60,000 men, and the siege was then resumed in earnest (Ant. xiv. 16).

J. i. 19, § 3), 20,000 persons were killed by the fall of buildings, and an immense quantity of cattle. The panic at Jerusalem was very severe: but it was calmed by the arguments of Herod, then departing to a campaign on the east of Jordan for the interests of Cleopatra.

The following year was distinguished by the death of Hyrcanus, who, though more than 80 years old, was killed by Herod, ostensibly for a reasonable correspondence with the Arabs, but really to remove the last remnant of the Asmonean race, who, in the fluctuations of the times, and in Herod's absence from his kingdom, might have been dangerous to him. He appears to have resided at Jerusalem since his return: and his accusation was brought before the Sanhedrin (Ant. xv. 6, § 1). Mariamne was put to death in the year 29, whether in Jerusalem or in the Alexandria, in which she had been placed with her mother when Herod left for his interview with Octavius, is not certain. But Alexandria was now in Jerusalem again; and in Herod's absence, ill, at Samaria (Sebaste), she began to plot for possession of the Paris, and of another fortress situated in the city. The attempt, however, cost her her life. The same year saw the cessation of hostilities, husbands of Herod's sister Salome, and of several other persons of distinction (Ant. xv. 7, § 8–10).

Herod now began to encourage foreign practices and usages, probably with the view of "counter-balancing by a strong Grecian party the turbulent and exclusive spirit of the Jews." Amongst his acts of this description was the building of a theatre at Jerusalem (Ant. xv. 8, § 1). Of its situation no information is given, nor have any indications yet been discovered. It was ornamented with the names of the victories of Octavius, and with trophies of arms conquered in the wars of Herod. Quinquennial games in honor of Caesar were instituted on the most magnificent scale, with racing, boxing, musical contests, fights of gladiators and wild beasts. The zealus Jews took fire at these innovations, but their wrath was especially excited by the trophies round the theatre at Jeruusalem, which they believed to contain figures of men. Even when shown that their suspicions were groundless, they remained discontented. The spirit of the old Maccabees was still alive, and Herod only narrowly escaped assassination, while his would-be assassins endured torments and death with the greatest heroism. At this time he occupied the old palace of the Asmoneans, which crowned the eastern face of the upper city, and stood adjoining the Xystus at the end of the bridge which formed the communication between the south part of the Temple and the upper city (xx. 8, § 5; comp. xx. 8, § 11, and B. J. ii. 16, § 3). This palace was not yet so magnificent as it afterwards made it, but it was already most richly furnished (xx. 9, § 2). Herod had now also completed the improvements of the Bars — the fortress built by John Hyrcaeus on the foundations of Simon Maccabaeus — which he had enlarged and strengthened at great expense, and named Antonia — after his friend Mark Antony.1 A description of this celebrated fortress will be given in treating of the TEMPLE, of which, as reconstructed by Herod, it formed an intimate part.
It stood at the west end of the north wall of the Temple, and was inaccessible on all sides but that.
See section III. p. 1318.

The year 25 — the next after the attempt on Herod's life in the theatre — was one of great misfortunes. A long drought, followed by unproductive seasons, involved Judaea in famine, and its usual consequence, a dreadful pestilence (Ant. xv.
9, § 1). Herod took a noble and at the same time a most politic course. He sent to Egypt for corn, sacrificing for the purchase the costly decorations of his palace and his silver and gold plate. He was thus able to make regular distribution of corn and clothing, on an enormous scale, for the present necessities of the people, as well as to supply seed for the next year's crop (Ant. xv. 9, § 2). The result of this was to remove to a great degree the animosity occasioned by his proceedings in the previous year.

In this year or the next, Herod took another wife, the daughter of an obscure priest of Jerusalem named Simon. Shortly before the marriage was concluded his little sister, the daughter of Judas, or Jesus, the son of Phanuel, who appears to have succeded Ananias, and was now deposed to make way for Herod's future father-in-law (Ant. xv. 9, § 3). It was probably on the occasion of this mar-rriage that he built a new and extensive palace2 immediately adjoining the old wall, at the northwest corner of the upper city (B. J. v. 4, § 4), about the spot now occupied by the Latin convent, in which, as memorials of his connection with Cæsar and Agrippa, a large apartment — superior in size to the Sanctuary of the Temple — was named after each (Ant. ibid.; B. J. i. 21, § 1). This palace was very strongly fortified; it communicated with the three great towers on the wall erected shortly after, and it became the citadel, the special fortress alterations to the fortresses had been at least 7 or 8 years in progress.

of the whole city. Archelaus meanwhile temporized and promised redress when his government should be confirmed by Rome. The Passover was close at hand, and the city was fast filling with the multitude of rustics and of pilgrims (εἰς τὰς ἱερεῖς πόλιας), who crowded to the great Feast (B. J. ii. 1, § 3; Ant. xvii. 9, § 3). These strangers, not being able or willing to find admittance into the houses, pitched their tents (τοῖς αὐτοῖς ἑσυχασμένοις) upon the open ground around the Temple (ibid.). Meanwhile the tumult in the Temple itself was maintained and increased daily; a multitude of fanatics never left the courts, but continued there, incessantly clamoring and impe-} over the whole city. Archelaus meanwhile temp-

Jerusalem, but at Casarea on the coast (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 1). The first appointed was Coponius, who accompanied Vitellius to the country immediately on the disgrace of Archelaus. Quirinius (the Quirinus of the N. T.) — now for the second time prefect of Syria — was charged with the unpopular measure of the enrolment or assessment of the inhabitants of Judaea. Notwithstanding the riots which took place elsewhere, at Jerusalem the enrolment was allowed to proceed without resistance, owing to the prudence of Joscar (Ant. xviii. 1, § 1), again high-priest for a short time. One of the first acts of the new governor had been to take formal possession of the state vestments of the high-priest, worn on the three Festivals and on the Day of Atonement. Since the building of the Paris by the Maccabees these robes had always been kept there, a custom continued since its re-construction by Herod. But henceforward they were to be put up after use in an underground stone chamber, under the seal of the priests, and in charge of the captain of the guard. Seven days before use they were brought out, to be consigned again to the chamber after the ceremony was over (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4, § 3).

Two incidents at once most important in their character, and in their significance to that age and to ourselves, occurred during the procuratorship of Coponius. First, in the year 9, the finding of Christ in the Temple. Aminas had been made high-priest about a year before. The second occurrence must have been a most distressing one to the Jews, unless they had become inured to such things. But of this we cannot so exactly fix the date. It was nothing less than the pollution of the Temple by some Samaritans, who secretly brought human bones and strewn them about the cloisters during the night of the Passover. Up to this time the Samaritans had been admitted to the Temple; they were henceforth excluded.

In or about A. D. 10, Coponius was succeeded by M. Ambivius, and he by Aminus Rufus. In 14, Augustus died, and with Tiberius came a new procurator — Val. Gratius, who held office till 25, when he was replaced by Pontius Pilate. During this period the high-priests had been numerous 1 but it is only necessary here to say that when Pilate arrived at his government the office was held by Joseph Caiphas, who had been appointed but a few months before. The freedom from disturbance which marks the preceding 20 years at Jerusalem was probably due to the absence of the Roman troops, who were quartered at Casarea out of the way of the fierce fanatics of the Temple. But Pilate transferred the winter quarters of the army to Jerusalem (Ant. xviii. 3, § 1), and the very first day there was a collision. The offense was given by the Roman standards — the images of the emperor and of the eagle — which by former commanders had been kept out of the city. A representation was made to Pilate; and so obdurate was the temper of the Jews on the point, that he yielded, and the standards were withdrawn (Ant. lxxvi. 3). He afterwards, as if to try how far he might go, consecrated some gift shields — not containing figures, but inscribed simply with the name of the deity and of the donor — and hung them in the palace at Jerusalem. This act again aroused the resistance of the Jews; and on appeal to Tiberius they were removed (Vitell. pp. 10, 11, Maeged ii. 15).

Another riot was caused by his appropriation of the Corban — a sacred revenue arising from the redemption of vows — to the cost of an aqueduct which he constructed for bringing water to the city from a distance of 200 (Ant. xviii. 3, § 2) or 400 (B. J. ii. § 9, 4) stadia. This aqueduct has been supposed to be that leading from "Solomon's Pools" 2 at Uraeus to the Temple hill (Kraft, in Ritter, Erdkunde, Pol. 270); but the distance of Uraeus is against the identification.

A. D. 23. At the Passover of this year our Lord made his first recorded visit to the city since his boyhood (John ii. 13).

A. D. 35. At the Passover of this year, occurred his crucifixion and resurrection.

In A. D. 37, Pilate having been recalled to Rome Jerusalem was visited by Vitellius, the prefect of Syria, at the time of the Passover. Vitellius conferred two great benefits on the city. He remitted the duties levied on produce, and he allowed the Jews again to have the free custody of the high-priest's vestments. He removed Caiphas from the high-priesthood, and gave it to Jonathan son of Annas. He then departed, apparently leaving a Roman officer (synagogus) in charge of the Antonia (Ant. xxi. 4, § 3). Vitellius was again at Jerusalem this year, probably in the autumn, with Herod the tetrarch (xviii. 5, § 3); while he, again changed the high-priest, substituting for Jonathan Theophilus his brother. The news of the death of Tiberius and the accession of Caligula reached Jerusalem at this time. Marcellus was appointed procurator by the new emperor. In the following year Stephen was stoned. The Christians were greatly persecuted, and all, except the Apostles, driven out of Jerusalem (Acts viii. 1, xi. 19).

In A. D. 40, Vitellius was superseded by P. Petronius, who arrived in Palestine with an order to place in the Temple a statue of Caligula. This order was ultimately, by the intercession of Agrippa, countermanded, but not until it had raised the Jews to such a pitch of passion (Ant. xvi. 8, §§ 2-9; and see the admirable narrative of Milman, Hist. of Jews, bk. x.).

With the accession of Claudius in 41 came an edict of toleration to the Jews. Agrippa arrived in Palestine to take possession of his kingdom, and one of his first acts was to visit the Temple, where he offered sacrifice and dedicated the golden chain which the late emperor had presented him after his release from captivity. It was hung over the Treasury (Ant. xix. 6, § 1). Simon was made high-priest; the house-tax was remitted.

Agrippa resided very much at Jerusalem, and added materially to its prosperity and convenience. The city had for some time been extending itself towards the north, and a large suburb had come into existence on the high ground north of the Temple, and outside of the "second wall" which enclosed the northern part of the great central valley of the city. Hitlers the outer portion of this suburb — which was called Bezetha, or "New Town," and had grown up very rapidly — was unprotected by any formal wall, and practically lay

A set of furious fanatics, whom Josephus calls Sicarii, had lately begun to make their appearance in the city, whose creed it was to rob and murder all whom they judged to be Jews. Information of the deed was communicated to Felix, weary of the remonstrances of Jonathan or his vicarious life, employed some of these wretches to assassinate him. He was killed in the Temple, while sacrificing. The murder was never inquired into, and, emboldened by this, the Sicarii repeated their horrid act, thus adding, in the eyes of the Jews, the awful crime of sacrilege to that of murder (B. J. ii. 14, § 3; Ant. xix. 5, § 16). The city, too, was filled with hints to the inspiration, but inspired only with hatred to all government and order. Nor was the disorder confined to the lower classes: the chief people of the city, the very high-priests themselves, robbed the threshing-floors of the tithes common to all the priests, and led parties of robbers to open tumult and fighting in the streets (Ant. xx. 8, § 8). In fact, not only Jerusalem, but the whole country far and wide, was in the most frightful confusion and insecurity.

At length a riot at Casarea of the most serious description caused the recall of Felix, and in the end of 60 or the beginning of 61, PONCIUS FESTUS succeeded him as procurator. Festus was an able and upright officer (B. J. ii. 14, § 1), and at the same time conciliatory towards the Jews (Acts xxv. 11). In the brief period of his administration he kept down the robbers with a strong hand, and gave the province a short breathing time. His interview with St. Paul (Acts xxv. xxvi.) took place, not at Jerusalem, but at Casarea. On one occasion both Festus and Agrippa came into collision with the Jews at Jerusalem. Agrippa—who had been appointed king by Nero in 52—had added an apartment to the old Asmoncean palace on the eastern brow of the upper city, which commanded a full view into the interior of the courts of the Temple. This view the Jews interjected by building a wall on the west side of the inner quadrangle. But the wall not only intercepted Agrippa, it also interfered with the view from the outer cloisters in which the Roman guard was stationed to watch the festivals. Both Agrippa and Festus interfered, and required it to be pulled down; but the Jews pleaded that once built it was a part of the Temple, and as such could not be altered, and which belonged to Nero. Nero allowed their plea, but retained as hostages the high-priest and treasurer, who had headed the deputation. Agrippa appointed Joseph, called Cabi, to the vacant priesthood. In 62 (probably) Festus died, and was succeeded by Albinus, and he again very shortly after by Anna or Ananus, son of the Ananas before whom our Lord was taken. In the interval a persecution was commenced against the Christians at the instance of the new high-priest, a rigid Sadducee, and St. James and others were arraigned before the Sanhedrin (Joseph. Ant. xx. 9, § 1). They were "delivered to be stoned," but St. James at any rate appears not to have been killed till a few years later. The act gave great offense to all, and cost Anna his office after he had held it but three

Three and ordered priest to house but by Jews city marble.

"all things grew from worse to worse" (Ant. xx. 9, § 4). The evils were aggravated by two occurrences — first, the release by Albinus, before his departure, of all the smaller criminals in the prisons (Ant. xx. 9, § 5); and secondly, the sudden discharge of an immense body of workmen, on the conclusion of the repairs to the Temple (xx. 9, § 7). An endeavor was made to remedy the latter by inducing Agrippa to rebuild the eastern cloisters; but he refused to undertake a work of such magnitude, though he consented to pave the city with marble. The repairs of a part of the sanctuary that had fallen, and the renewal of the foundations of some portions were deferred for the present, but the materials were collected and stored in one of the courts (B. J. v. 1, § 5).

Josephus says that the Scevola, a Titius Florus, who succeeded him in 63, was worse. In fact, even Tacitus admits that the endurance of the oppressed Jews could last no longer — "duriat patientia Judaeus usque ad Scevolam Florum" (Hist. v. 10). So great was his rapacity, that whole cities and districts were desolated, and the robbers openly allowed to purchase immunity in plunder. At the Passover, probably in 66, when Cæsar Gallus, the prefect of Syria, visited Jerusalem, the whole assembled people asked him for restress; but without effect. Florus's next attempt was to obtain some of the treasure from the Temple. He demanded 17 talents in the name of the emperor. The demand produced a frantic disturbance, in the midst of which he approached the city with both cavalry and foot-soldiers. That night Florus took up his quarters in the royal palace — that of Herod, at the N.W. corner of the city. On the following morning he took his seat on the Bema, and the high-priest and other principal people being brought before him, he demanded that the leaders of the late riot should be given up. On their refusal he ordered his soldiers to plunder the upper city. This order was but too faithfully carried out; every house was entered and pillaged, and the Jews driven out. In their attempt to get through the narrow streets which lay in the valley between the upper city and the Temple, many were caught and taken, others were brought before Florus, scourged, and then crucified. No grade or class was exempt. Jews who bore the Roman equestrian order were among the victims treated with most indignity. Queen Berenice herself (B. J. ii. 15, § 1) — residing at that time in the Amonaeon palace in the very midst of the slaughter — was so affected by the scene, which had been enacted in London and barefoot before Florus, but without avail, and in returning she was herself nearly killed, and only escaped by taking refuge in her palace and calling her guards about her. The further details of

"dreadful tumult must be passed over." Florus was foiled in his attempt to press through the old city up into the Antonia — whence he would have had nearer access to the treasures — and finding that the Jews had broken down the north and west cliffs where they joined the fortress, so as to cut off the communication, he relinquished the attempt and withdrew to Cesarea (B. J. ii. 15, § 6). Cæsarius Gallus, the prefect, now found it necessary for him to visit the city in person. He sent one of his lieutenants to announce him, but before he himself arrived events had become past remedy. Agrippa had shortly before returned from Alexander, and had done much to calm the people. At his instance they rebuilt the part of the cloisters which had been demolished, and collected the tribute in arrear, but the mere suggestion from him that they should obey Florus until he was replaced, produced such a storm that he was obliged to leave the city (B. J. ii. 16, §§ 5, 17), § 1). The seditionists in the Temple led by young Eleazar, son of Ananias, rejected the offerings of the Roman emperor, which since the time of Julius Caesar had been regularly made. This, as a direct remuneration of allegiance, was the true beginning of the war with Rome (B. J. ii. 17, § 2). Such acts were not done without resistance from the dealers in the Temple. But resistance was vanishing, the innovators would listen to no representations. The peace party, therefore, despatched some of their number to Florus and to Agrippa, and the latter sent 3,000 horse-soldiers to assist in keeping order.

Hostilities at once began. The peace party, headed by the high-priest, and fortified by Agrippa's soldiers, threw themselves into the upper city. The other insurgents held the Temple and the lower city. In the Antonia was a small Roman garrison. Fierce contests lasted for seven days, each side endeavoring to take possession of the part held by the other. At last the insurgents, who behaved with the greatest ferocity, and were reinforced by a number of Sicarii, were triumphant. They gained the upper city, driving all before them — the high-priest and other leaders into vaults and sewers, the soldiers into the harem's palace. The Antonia was the high-priest's house, and the repository of the Archives — in Josephus's language, the nerves of the city" (B. J. ii. 17, § 6) — were set on fire. Antonia was next attacked, and in two days they had effected an entrance, sabred the garrison, and burnt the fortress. The balaistae and catapults found there were preserved for future use (v. 6, § 3). The soldiers in Herod's palace were next besieged; but so strong were the walls, and so stout the resistance, that it was three weeks before an entrance could be effected. The soldiers were at last forced from the palace into the three great towers on the adjoining wall with great loss; and ultimately were all murdered in the most treacherous manner. The high-priest and his brother were discovered hidden in the aqueduct of the palace; they were instantly put to death. Thus the insurgents were now completely masters of both city and Temple. But they were not to remain so long. After the defeat of Cæsarius Gallus at Beth horon, discussions began to arise, and it soon became known that there was still a large moderate party; and the Temple — 10,000 men, and 5,000 Idumaeans (B. J. v. 6, § 1), in all, a force of between 25,000, and 24,200, and in 70 A.D. — in addition of the last two years to general skill and thorough recklessness. The numbers of the other inhabitants, swelled, as they were, by the strangers and pilgrims who flocked from the country to the Passover, it is extremely difficult to decide. Tacitus doubtless from some Roman source, gives the whole at 600,000. Josephus states that 1,100,000 perish during the siege (B. J. vi. 9, § 3; comp. v. 13, § 7) and that more than 40,000 were allowed to depart into the country (vi. 8, § 2), in addition to an "immense number" sold to the army, and who of course form a proportion of the 97,000-capital captive during the whole war" (vi. 9, § 3). We may therefore take Josephus's computation of the numbers at about 1,200,000. Reasons are given in the third section of this article for believing that even the smaller of these numbers is very greatly in excess, and that it cannot have exceeded 90,000 or 70,000 (see p. 1329).

Titus's force consisted of four legions, and some auxiliaries — at the outside 30,000 men (B. J. v. 1, § 6). These were disposed on their first arrival in three camps — the 12th and 15th legions on the ridge of Scopus, about a mile north of the city; the 5th a little in the rear; and the 10th on the top of the Mount of Olives (v. 3, § 5, 5), to guard the road to the Jordan Valley, and to shell the place (if the expression may be allowed) from that commanding position. The army was well furnished with artillery and machines of the latest and most approved invention — "cuncta expugnandi urbibus, reperta apud veteres, aut novis ingenitis," says Tacitus (Hist. v. 13). The first operation was to clear the ground between Scopus and the north wall of the city —fell the timber, destroy the forces of the gardens which fringed the wall, and level the rocky protrusions. This occupied four days. After it was done the three legions were marched forward from Scopus, and encamped off the northwest corner of the walls, stretching from the Tower of Psephinus to opposite Hippicus. The first step was to get possession of the outer wall. The point of attack chosen was in Simon's portion of the city, at a low and comparatively weak place near the junction of the wall with the wall of John Hyrcanus, and at the junction of the three walls, and where the upper city came to a level with the surrounding ground. Round this spot the three legions erected banks, from which they opened batteries, pushing up the rams and other engines of attack to the foot of the wall. One of the rams, more powerful than the rest, went among the Jews by the subrogant of Nikon, 4 the conqueror." Three large towers, 75 feet high, were also erected, overtopping the wall. Meanwhile from their camp on the Mount of Olives the 10th legion opened fire on the Temple and the east side of the city. They had the heaviest balistae, and did great damage. Simon and his men did not suffer these works to go on without molestation.

c These are the numbers given by Josephus; but it is probable that they are exaggerated.

d O Νίκον... ἀδω ραί παρὰ τινα (B. J. v. 7, § 5). A curious question is raised by the occurrence of this and other Greek names in Josephus; so stated as to lead to the inference that Greek was familiarly used by the Jews indiscriminately with Hebrew. See the catalogues of names in B. J. v. 4, § 3.
The catapults, both those taken from Cestius, and those found in the Antonia, were set up on the wall, and constant desperate sallies were made. At last the Jews began to tire of their fruitless assaults. They saw that the wall must fall, and, as they had during Nebuchadnezzar's siege, they left their posts at night, and went home. A breach was made by the relentless Nikon on the 7th Artemisius (civ. April 15th); and here the Romans entered, driving the Jews before them to the second wall. A great length of the wall was then broken down, such parts of Bethzatha as had escaped destruction by Cestius were levelled, and a new camp was formed, on the spot formerly occupied by the Assyrians, and still known as the “Assyrian camp.”

This was a great step in advance. Titus now lay with the second wall of the city close to him on his right, while before him at no considerable distance rose Antonia and the Temple, with no obstacle in the interval to his attack. Still, however, he preferred, before advancing, to get possession of the second wall, and the neighborhood of John's monument was again chosen. Simon was no less reckless in assault, and no less fertile in stratagem, than before; but notwithstanding all his efforts, in five days a breach was again effected. The district into which the Romans had now penetrated was the great Valley which lay between the two main hills of the city, occupied then, as it is still, by an intricate mass of narrow and tortuous lanes, and containing the markets of the city—no doubt very like the present bazaars. Titus's breach was where the wool, cloth, and brass bazaars came up to the wall (v. 8, § 1). This district was held by the Jews with the greatest tenacity. Knowing, as they did, every turn of the lanes and alleys, they had an immense advantage over the Romans, and it was only after four days' incessant fighting, much loss, and one thorough repulse, that the Romans were able to make good their position. However, at last, Simon was obliged to retreat, and then Titus demolished the wall. This was the second step in the siege.

Meanwhile some shots had been interchanged in the direction of the Antonia, but no serious attack with engines had been made there. Titus resolved to give his troops a few days' rest, and the Jews a short opportunity for reflection. He therefore called in the 10th legion from the Mount of Olives, and held an inspection of the whole army on the ground north of the Temple—full in view of both the Temple and the upper city, every wall and house in which were crowded with spectators (B. J. v. 11, § 1). But the opportunity was thrown away upon the Jews, and, after four days, orders were given to recommence the attack. Hitherto the assault had been almost entirely on the city; it was now to be simultaneous on city and Temple. Accordingly two pairs of large batteries were constructed, the one pair in front of Antonia; the other at the old point of attack—the monument of John Hyrcanus. The first pair was erected by the 7th and 12th legions, and was near the pool of Strymon—the probably the present Pool of Hezekiah—and near the high-priest's monument (v. 11, § 4). These banks seems to have been constructed of timber and fascines, to which the Romans must have been driven by the scarcity of earth. They absorbed the incessant labor of seventeen days, and were erected on the 29th Artemisius (civ. May 7th). John in the mean time had not been idle; he had employed the seventeen days' respite in driving mines, through the solid limestone of the hill, from within the fortress (v. xi. § 4; vi. 1, § 3) to below the banks. The mines were formed with timber roofs and supports. When the banks were quite complete, and the engines placed upon them, the inner part of the galleries was fired, the superincumbent ground gave way, and the labor of the Romans was totally destroyed. At the other point Simon had maintained a resistance with all his former intrepidity, and more than his former success. He had now greatly increased the number of his machines, and his people were much more expert in handling them than before, so that he was able to impede materially the progress of the works. And when they were completed, and the battering rams had begun to make a sensible impression on the wall, he made a furious assault on them, and succeeded in firing the rams, seriously damaging the other engines, and destroying the banks (v. 11, §§ 5, 6).

It now became plain to Titus that some other measures for the reduction of the place must be adopted. He therefore made a tour of the city, and western parts of the city had not been invested, and on that side a certain amount of communication was kept up with the country, which, unless stopped, might prolong the siege indefinitely (B. J. v. 12, § 1; 10, § 3; 11, § 1; 12, § 3). The number who thus escaped is stated by Josephus at more than 500 a day (v. 11, § 1). A council of war was therefore held, and it was resolved to encompass the whole place with a wall, and then recommence the assault. The wall began at the Roman camp—a spot probably outside the modern north wall, between the Damascus Gate and the N. E. corner. From thence it went to the lower part of Bethzatha—and about St. Stephen's gate; then across Kedron to the Mount of Olives; thence south, by a rock called the "Pigeon's Rock;"—possibly the modern "Tombs of the Prophets"—to the Mount of Olives. As was placed upon them, the whole place was again dipped into the Kedron, ascended the Mount of Evil Counsel, and so kept on the upper side of the ravine to a village called Beth-Erebirdith, whence it ran outside of Herod's monument to its starting point at the camp. Its entire length was 29 furlongs—very nearly 3 miles—and it contained 13 stations or guard-houses. The whole strength of the army was employed in the work, and it was completed in the short space of three days. The siege was then vigorously pressed. The north attack was relinquished, and the whole force concentrated on the Antonia (12, § 4). Four new banks of greater size than before were constructed, and as all the timber in the neighborhood had been already cut down, the materials had to be procured from a distance of eleven miles (vi. 1, § 1). Twenty-five days were occupied in completing the walls. Their position is not specified, but it is evident, from some of the expressions of Josephus, that they were at a considerable distance from the fortress (vi. 1, § 3). At length on the 1st Panemus or Tanur (civ. June 7th), the fire from the banks commenced, under cover of which the rams were set to work, and that night a part of the wall fell at a spot where the foundations had been strengthened by the mines employed against the former attacks. Still this was but an outwork.
and between it and the fortress itself a new wall was discovered, which John had taken the precaution to build. At length, after two desperate attempts, this wall and that of the inner fortress were scaled by a bold surprise, and on the 5th of Panemus (June 11) the Antonia was in the hands of the Romans (vi. 1, § 7). Another week was occupied in breaking down the outer walls of the fortress for the passage of the machines, and a further delay was occasioned by works, on the fresh level, for the lombardment and battery of the Temple. During the whole of this time—the miseries of which are commemorated in the traditional name of yomim deméta, "days of wretchedness," applied by the Jews to the period between the 17th Tamuz and the 9th Ab—the most desperate hand-to-hand encounters took place, some in the passages from the Antonia to the cloisters, some in the cloisters themselves, the Romans endeavoring to force their way in, the Jews preventing them. But the Romans gradually gained ground. First the western, and then the whole of the northern external cloister was burnt (27th and 28th Pan.), and then the wall enclosing the court of Israel and the holy house itself. In the interval, on the 17th Panemus, the daily sacrifice had failed, owing to the want of officiating priests; a circumstance which had greatly distressed the people, and was taken advantage of by Titus to make a further though fruitless invitation to surrender. At length, on the tenth day of Louis or Ab (July 15), by the wanton act of a soldier, contrary to the intention of Titus, and in spite of every exertion he could make to stop it, the sanctuary itself was fired (vi. 4, § 7-7). It was, by one of the most extraordinary coincidences that sometimes occur, the very same month and day of the month that the first temple had been burnt by Nebuchadnezzar (vi. 4, § 8). John, and such of his party as escaped the flames and the carnage, made their way by the bridge on the south to the upper city. The whole of the cloisters that had hitherto escaped, including the magnificent triple colonnade of Herod on the south of the Temple, the treasury chambers, and the rooms where the outer courts, were now all burnt and demolished. Only the edifice of the sanctuary itself still remained. On its solid masonry the fire had had comparatively little effect, and there were still hidden in its recesses a few faithful priests who had contrived to rescue the most valuable of the utensils, vessels, and spoils of the sanctuary (vi. 6, § 1; 8, § 3).

The Temple was at last gained; but it seemed as if half the work remained to be done. The upper city, higher than Moriah, inclosed by the original wall of David and Solomon, and on all sides precipitous except at the north, where it was defended by the wall and towers of Herod, was still to be taken. Titus first tried a parley—he stood on the east end of the bridge between the Temple and the upper city, and John and Simon on the west end. His terms, however, were rejected, and no alternative was left him but to force on the siege. The whole of the low part of the town—the crowded lanes of which we have so often heard—was burnt, in the teeth of a frantic resistance from the Zealots (vi. 7, § 1), together with the council-house, the repository of the records and documents of the city. The outer wall was occupied by Simon since its former destruction, and the palace of Helena, which were situated in this quarter—the suburb of Ophel under the south wall of the Temple, and the houses as far as Siloam on the lower slopes of the Temple Mount.

It took 18 days to erect the necessary works for the siege; the four legion's were once more stationed at the west or northwest corner where Herod's palace abutted on the wall, and where the three magnificent and impregnable towers of Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne rose conspicuous (vi. 8, § 1, and § 4, ad fin.). This was the main attack. Opposite the Temple, the precipices nature of the slopes of the upper city rendered it unlikely that any serious attempt would be made by the Jews, and this part accordingly, between the bridge and the Antonia, was left to the soldiers. The siege was commenced on the 7th of Gorpaeus (cir. Sept. 11), and by the next a breach was made in the wall, and the Romans at last entered the city. During the attack John and Simon appear to have stationed themselves in the towers just alluded to; and had they remained there they would probably have been able to make terms, as the towers were considered impregnable (vi. 8, § 4). But on the first signs of the breach, they took flight, and, traversing the city, descended into the Valley of Hinnom below Siloam, and endeavored to force the wall of circumvallation and so make their escape. On being repulsed there, they took refuge apart in some of the subterraneous caverns or sewers of the city. John shortly after surrendered himself; but Simon held out for several weeks, and did not make his appearance until the 17th. Titus had quitted the city. They were both reserved for the Triumph at Rome.

The city being taken, such parts as had escaped the former incursions were burned, and the whole of both city and Temple was ordered to be demolished, excepting the west wall of the upper city, and Herod's three great towers at the northwest corner, which were left standing as memorials of the massive nature of the fortifications.

Of the Jews, the aged and infirm were killed; the children under seventeen were sold as slaves; the rest were sent, some to the Egyptian mines, some to the provincial amphitheatres, and some to grace the Triumph of the Conqueror.6 Titus then

6 Josephus contradicts himself about this date, since in vi. 2, § 1, he says that the 17th Panemus was the "very day" that Antonia was entered. The date given in the text agrees best with the narrative. But on the other hand the 17th is the day commemorated in the Jewish Calendar.

The reader will note that all which remained to be taken was the western hill, protected as above described. If the topographical article of this article be correct, namely, that Zion, the city of David, was exterior to this hill, then those measures deriv'd from themselves and their royal residence not only of the advantage of the strongest natural position, but also of the protection of their own wall! There is no escape from this conclusion: and the above statement of Mr. Grose, which is strictly accurate, is a complete refutation of Mr. Ferguson's theory.

7 The prisoners were collected for this final execution in the Court of the Women. Josephus states that during the process eleven thousand died! It is a good instance of the exaggeration in which he indulges on these matters: for taking the largest estimate of the Court of the Women (Lightfoot), it contains 83,000 square feet, t. c. little more than 8 square feet for each of those who died, not to speak of the living.

separated, leaving the tenth legion under the command of Terentius Volutas to carry out the work of demolition. Of this Josephus assures us that “the whole was so thoroughly leveled and dug up that on no visiting it would believe it had ever been inhabited” (R. J. vii. 1, § 1).

G.

Medal of Vespasian, commemorating the capture of Jerusalem.

From its destruction by Titus to the present time.

For more than fifty years after its destruction by Titus Jerusalem disappears from history. During the revolts of the Jews in Cyrenaica, Egypt, Cyp rus, and Mesopotamia, which disturbed the latter years of Trajan, the recovery of their city was never attempted. There is indeed reason to believe that Lucanus, the head of the insurgents in Egypt, led his followers into Palestine, where they were defeated by the Roman general Turbo, but Jerusalem is not once mentioned as the scene of their operations. Of its annals during this period we know nothing. Three towers and part of the western wall alone remained of its strong fortifications to protect the cohorts who occupied the conquered city, and the soldiers’ huts were long the only buildings on its site. But in the reign of Hadrian it again emerged from its obscurity, and became the centre of an insurrection, which the best blood of Rome was shed to subdue. In despair of keeping the Jews in subjection by other means, the Emperor had formed a design to restore Jerusalem, and thus prevent it from ever becoming a rallying point for this turbulent race. In furtherance of his plan he had sent thither a colony of veterans, in numbers sufficient for the defence of a position so strong by nature against the then known modes of attack. To this measure Dio Cassius (iv. 12) attributes a renewal of the insurrection, while Eusebius asserts that it was not carried into execution till the outbreak was quelled. Be this as it may, the embers of revolt, long smouldering, burst into a flame soon after Hadrian’s departure from the East in A. D. 132. The contemptuous indifference of the Romans, or the secrecy of their own plans, enabled the Jews to organize a wide-spread conspiracy. Bar Cocheba, their leader, the third, according to Rabbinical writers, of a dynasty of the same name, prince of the Captivity, was crowned king at Bethelehem by the Jews who thronged to him, and by the populace was regarded as the Messiah. His armorer-bearer, R. Akiba, claimed descent from Siera, and hated the Romans with the fierce rancor of his adopted nation. All the Jews in Palestine flocked to his standard. At an early period in the revolt they became masters of Jerusalem, and attempted to rebuild the Temple. The exact date of this attempt is uncertain, but the fact is inferred from allusions in Chrysostom (Or. 3 in Judæos, Nicephorus (H. E. iii. 21), and George Cedrenus (Hist. Comp. p. 249), and the collateral evidence of a coin of the period. Hadrian, alarmed at the rapid spread of the insurrection, and the ineffectual efforts of his troops to suppress it, summoned from Britain Julius Severus, the greatest general of his time, to take the command of the army of Judæa. Two years were spent in a fierce guerrilla warfare before Jerusalem was taken, after a desperate defense in which Bar Cocheba perished. The courage of the defenders was shown by the falling in of the vaults on Mount Zion, and the Romans became masters of the position (Millman, Hist. of Jer., iii. 122). But the war did not end with the capture of the city. The Jews in great force had occupied the fortress of Betheul, and there maintained a struggle with all the tenacity of despair against the repeated onsets of the Romans. At length, worn out by famine and disease, they yielded on the 9th of the month Ab, A. D. 135, and the grandson of Bar Cocheba was among the slain. The slaughter was frightful. The Romans, say the Rabbinical historians, waded to their horse-brides in blood, which flowed with the fury of a mountain torrent. The corpses of the slain, according to the same veracious authorities, extended for more than thirteen miles, and remained unburied till the reign of Antoninus. Five hundred and eighty thousand are said to have fallen by the sword, while the number of victims to the attendant calamities of war was countless. On the side of the Romans the loss was enormous, and so dearly bought was their victory, that Hadrian, in his letter to the Senate, announcing the conclusion of the war, did not adopt the usual congratulatory phrase. Bar Cocheba has left traces of his occupation of Jerusalem in coins which were struck during the first two years of the war. Four silver coins, three of them undoubtedly belonging to Trajan, have been discovered, restamped with Samaritan characters. But the rebel leader, amply supplied with the precious metals by the contributions of his followers, afterwards coined his own money. The mint was probably during the first two years of the war at Jerusalem; the coins struck during that period bearing the inscription, “to the freedom of Jerusalem,” or “Jerusalem the holy.” They are mentioned in both Talmuds.

The foundation date of the Temple was one of the most sacred of events, and the time of its destruction was looked upon by the Jewish nation as their darkest day.

The Talmud says, “The foundations of the Temple only were dug up (see the quotations in Schwartz, p. 225), and even these seem to have been in existence in the time of Chrysostom (Ad Judæos, iii. 431).”

* The word used by Josephus — τροφοδοτεισθαι — may mean either the whole place, or the inclosing walls, or the precinct of the Temple. The statements of the Talmud perhaps imply that the Jesus, and among the ornaments of the new city were a theatre, two market-places (Σωκράτεια), a building called Ἱεροσόλυμα, and another called Ἱεροσόλυμα. It was divided into seven quarters, each of which had its own warden. Mount Zion lay without the walls (Jerome, Misc. iii. 12; Eus. Ιεροσ. p. 532, ed. Wesseling). That the northern wall includ-ed the so-called sacred places, though asserted by Deyling, is regarded by Münzer as a failure of a later date. A temple to Astarte, the Phoenician Venus, on the site afterwards identified with the sepulchre, appears on coins, with four columns and the inscription C. C. C., Colonius Aelia Capitolina, but it is more than doubtful whether it was erected at this time. The worship of Serapis was introduced from Egypt. A statue of the emperor was raised on the site of the Holy of Holies (Niceph. H. E. iii. 24); and it must have been near the same spot that the Bordeaux pilgrim saw two statues of Hadrian, not far from the "lapis puerperis" which the Jews of his day yearly visited and anointed with oil (Eus. Ιεροσ. p. 591).

It was not, however, till the following year, A.D. 139, that Hadrian, on celebrating his Vicennalia, bestowed upon the new city the name of Αἰλία Capitolina, combining with his own family title the name of Jupiter of the Capitol, the guardian deity of Rome, as Hezekiak and pagonas alone were allowed to reside. Jews were forbidden to enter on pain of death, and this prohibition remained in force in the time of Tertullian. But the conqueror, though stern, did not descend to wanton mockery. The swine, sculptured by the emperor's command over the gate leading to Bethlehem (Euseb. Chron. Hadr. Ann. xx.) was not intended as an insult to the conquered race to bar their entrance to the city of their fathers, but was one of the σιγνα κελευθερίων of the Roman army. About the middle of the 4th century the Jews were allowed to visit the neighborhood, and afterwards, once a year, to enter the city itself, and weep over it on the anniversary of its capture. Jerome (on Zeph. i. 15) has drawn a vivid picture of the wretched crowds of Jews who in his day assembled at the wailing-place by the west wall of the Temple to lament their lot, and of the porches and colonnades which were there. On the ninth of the month Ab might be seen the aged and decrepit of both sexes, with tattered garments and disheveled hair, who met to weep over the downfall of Jerusalem, and purchased permission of the soldiery to prolong their lamentations ("et miles mercedem postulat ut illis flere plus licet ").

So completely were all traces of the ancient city obliterated that its very name was in process of time forgotten. It was not till after Constantine built the Martyrium on the site of the crucifixion, that its ancient appellation was revived. In the 7th canon of the Council of Nicaea the bishop of Aelia is mentioned; but Macarius, in subscribing to the canons, designated himself bishop of Jerusalem. The name Aelia occurs as late as Adamnanus (A.D. 907), and is even found in Eridi and of the cod-Dina about 1495.

After the inauguration of the new colony of Aelia the annals of the city again relapse into an obscurity which is only represented in history by a list of twenty-three Christian bishops, who filled up the interval between the election of Marcus, the 3rd of the series, and Macarius in the reign of Constantine. Already in the 3rd century the Holy Places had become objects of enthusiastic, and the pilgrimage of Alexander, a bishop in Cypro-docia, and afterwards of Jerusalem, is matter of history. In the following century such pilgrimages became more common. The aged Empress Helen, mother of Constantine, visited Palestine in A.D. 326, and, according to tradition, erected magnificent churches at Bethlehem, and on the Mount of Olives. Her son, fired with the same zeal, swept away the shrine of Astarte, which occupied the site of the resurrection, and founded in its stead a chapel or oratory. On the east of this was a large court, the eastern side being formed by the Basilica, erected on the spot where the cross was said to have been found. The latter of these buildings is that known as the Martyrium; the former was the church of the Anastasis, or Resurrection: their locality will be considered in the following section (p. 1321, sqq.). The Martyrium was completed A.D. 335, and its dedication celebrated by a great council of bishops, first at Tyre, and afterwards at Jerusalem, at which Eusebius was present. In the reign of Julian (A.D. 362) the Jews, with the permission and at the instigation of the emperor, made an abortive attempt to lay the foundations of a temple. From whatever motive, Julian had formed the design of restoring the Jewish worship on Mount Moriah to its pristine splendor, and during the summer of the year 358, in the East, the work of the project was intrusted to his favorite, Alypius of Antioch. Materials of every kind were provided at the emperor's expense, and so great was the enthusiasm of the Jews that their women took part in the work, and in the laps of their garments carried off the earth which covered the ruins of the Temple. But a sudden whirlwind and earthquake shattered the stones of the former foundations; the workmen fled for shelter to one of the neighboring churches (πειρατεῖς και ἐπίθετον λεπτόν, Greg. Naz. Or. iv. 111), the doors of which were closed against them by an invisible hand, and a fire issuing from the Temple-mount raged the whole day and consumed their tools. Numbers perished in the flames. Some who escaped took refuge in a portico near at hand, which fell at night and crushed them as they slept (Theodor. B. E. i. 7, ed. Lass. v. 31; comp. Euseb. Ιεροσ. ed. Th. iv. 1 ed. Th. 17). Whatever may have been the coloring which this story received as it passed through the hands of the ecclesiastical historians, the impartial narrative of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 1), the friend and companion in arms of the emperor, leaves no reasonable doubt of the truth of the main facts that the work was interrupted by fire, which all attributed to supernatural agency. In the time of Chrysostom the foundations of the Temple still remained, to which the orator could appeal (adm. Iudaeos, iii. 431; Paris, 1636). The event was regarded as a judgment of God upon the impious attempt of Julian to falsify the predictions of Christ: a position which Bishop Warburton defends with great skill in his treatise on the subject.

During the fourth and fifth centuries Jerusalem became the centre of attraction for pilgrims from all regions, and its bishops contended with those of Caesarea for the supremacy; but it was not till after the council of Chalcedon (451-453) that it was made an independent patriarchate. In the theological controversies which followed the decision of that council with regard to the two natures of Christ, Jerusalem bore its share with other oriental
The over Jericho. and Salem Bon. Morpheus, from Arabs. A. Mohammedan, and that the patriarch as- signed him the spot occupied by the reputed stone of Jacob's vision: over this he is said to have built the mosque afterwards known by his name (Eutychii Chron. ii. 283; Ockley, Hist. of S. Sar. pp. 256-214, Bohl), and which still exists in the S. E. corner of the Akca. Henceforth Jerusalem became for Muslims, as well as Christians, a sacred place, and the Mosque of Omar shared the honors of pilgrimage with the renowned Ka'ba of Mecca.

In the reign of Charlemaigne (771-814) ambassadors were sent by the Emperor of the West to distribute alms in the Holy City, and on their return were accompanied by envoys from the enlightened Khalif Harun er-Rashid, bearing to Charlemaigne the keys of Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre. But these amenities were not of long continuance. The disillusionment which ensued upon the death of the Khalif spread to Jerusalem, and churches and convents suffered in the general anarchy. About the same period the feud between the Joktanite and Ishmaelite Arabs assumed an alarming aspect. The former, after devastating the neighboring region, made an attempt upon Jeru- salem, but were repulsed by the signal valor of its garrison. In the reign of the Khalif el-Motamas it was held for a time by the rebel chief Tamun Abou Abba.' With the fall of the Abbasides the Holy City passed into the hands of the Fatimite conqueror Muez, who fixed the seat of his empire at Kairah, the modern Cairo (A. D. 386). Under the Fatimite dynasty the sufferings of the Christians in Jerusalem reached their height, when el-Hakem, the third of his line, ascended the throne (A. D. 908). The church of the Holy Sepulchre, which had been twice dismantled and burnt within the previous seventy years (Eutychii Ann. ii. 529, 530; Cedren. Hist. Comp. p. 661), was again demolished (Ademari Chron. a. D. 1010), and its successor was not completed till A. D. 1018. A small chapel ("catasta vade modii." Will. Tyr. viii. 3) supplied the place of the magnificent Basilica on Gol- gotha.

The pilgrimages to Jerusalem in the 11th century became a source of revenue to the Muslims, who exacted a tax of a lyceant from every visitor to the Holy Sepulchre. Among the most remarkable pilgrimages of this century were those of Robert of Normandy (1053), Liebert of Cambrai (1064), and the German bishops (1065).

In 1077 Jerusalem was plundered by Afés the Khalirumian, commander of the army sent by Melk Shah against the Syrian dominions of the Khalif. About the year 1081 it was bestowed by Tutush, the brother of Melk Shah, upon Ortok, chief of a Turkman horse under his command. From this time till 1094 Ortok was emir of the city, and on his death it was held as a kind of fief by his son Hizbik and Sukman, whose severity to the Chris- tians became the proximate cause of the Crusades. Raduwan, son of Tutush, made an insurrection attack upon Jerusalem in 1096. The city was ultimately taken, after a siege of forty days, by Afsal, vizir.
of the khilaf of Egypt, and for eleven months had been governed by the Emir Itikar ed-Daulah, when, on the 7th of June, 1099, the crusading army appeared before the walls. After the fall of Antioch in the preceding year the remains of their numerous host marched along between Lebanon and the sea, passing Hydaspes, Lybdes, and Tyries; and through Lydias, Ramiel, and the ancient Emmonns, to Jerusalem. The crusaders, 40,000 in number, but with little more than 20,000 effective troops, reconnoitred the city, and determined to attack it on the north. Their camp extended from the Gate of St. Stephen to that beneath the tower of David. Godfrey of Lorraine occupied the extreme left (East); next him was Count Robert of Flanders; Robert of Normanby held the third place; and Tancred was posted at the N. W. corner tower, afterwards called by his name. Raymond of Toulouse originally encamped against the West Gate, but afterwards withdrew half his force to the part between the city and the church of Zion. At the tidings of their approach the khilaf of Egypt gave orders for the repair of the towers and walls; the fountains and wells for five or six miles round (Will. Tyr. vii. 24), with the exception of Siloun, were stopped, as in the days of Hezekiah, when the city was invested by Sennacherib's host of Assyrians. On the fifth day after their arrival the crusaders attacked the city and drove the Saracens from the outworks, but were compelled to suspend their operations till the arrival of the Genoese engineers. Another month was consumed in constructing engines to attack the walls, and meanwhile the besiegers suffered all the horrors of thirst in a burning sun. At length the engines were completed and the day fixed for the assault. On the night of the 13th of July Godfrey had changed his plan of attack, and removed his engines to a weaker part of the wall between the Gate of St. Stephen and the corner tower overlooking the Valley of Jehoshaphat on the north. At break of day the city was assaulted in three points at once. Tancred and Raymond of Toulouse attacked the walls opposite their own positions. Night only separated the constabulary, and was spent by both armies in preparations for the morrow's contest. Next day, after seven hours' hard fighting, the drawbridge from Godfrey's Tower was let down. Godfrey was first upon the wall, followed by the Count of Flanders and the Duke of Normandy; the northern gate was thrown open, and at three o'clock on Friday the 15th of July Jerusalem was in the hands of the crusaders. Raymond of Toulouse entered without opposition by the Zion Gate. The carnage was terrible; 10,000 Muslims fell within the sacred enclosure. Order was gradually restored, and Godfrey of Bouillon elected king (Will. Tyr. vii.). Churches were established, and for eighty-eight years Jerusalem remained in the hands of the Christians. In 1187 it was retaken by Saladin a Some account of Jerusalem as it now is will be found under the head of Modern Jerusalem, appended to the present article (Amer. ed.). This review of the vicissitudes of the Holy City would be incomplete without some reference to such a work.

b This article of Mr. Ferguson on the "Topography of the City" is one of great value, aside altogether from the correctness or incorrectness of his peculiar views respecting the identification of Mount Zion and the site of the Holy Sepulchre. On these particular points his views, though approved by some able and supported by no little ingenuity, are not those after a siege of several weeks. Five years afterwards (1192), in anticipation of an attack by Richard of England, the fortifications were strengthened and new walls built, and the supply of water again cut off (Barbeur. Chron. p. 421). During the winter of 1191-2 the work was prosecuted with the utmost vigor, and the walls were added in part. In 1206 Baldwin of Mosul, rendered able assistance, and two thousand Christian captives were pressed into the service. The Sultan rode round the fortifications each day encouraging the workmen, and even brought them stones on his horse's saddle. His sons, his brother Malak al-Adel, and the Emirs ably seconded his efforts, and within six months the works were completed, solid and durable as a rock (Wilken, Kreuzzüge, iv. 455, 458). The walls and towers were demolished by order of the Sultan Melik el-Mu'addheed of Damascus in 1219, and in this defenseless condition the city was ceded to the Christians by virtue of the treaty with the Emperor Frederick II. An attempt to rebuild the walls in 1239 was frustrated by an assault by David of Kerak, who dismantled the city anew. In 1243 it again came into the hands of the Christians, and in the following year sustained a siege by the wild Khairismian hordes, who slaughtered the priests and monks who had taken refuge in the church of the Holy Sepulchre, and after plundering the city withdrew to Gaza. After their departure Jerusalem again reverted to the Mohammedans, in whose hands it still remains. The defeat of the Christians at Gaza was followed by the occupation of the Holy City by the forces of the Sultan of Egypt.

In 1267 the citadel was nominally annexed to the kingdom of Sicily. In 1517 it passed under the sway of the Ottoman Sultan Selim I., whose successor Suleiman built the present walls of the city in 1542. Mohammed Aly, the Pasha of Egypt, took possession of it in 1832. In 1844 it was seized and held for a time by the Fellahin during the insurrection, and in 1840, after the bombardment of Acre, was again restored to the Sultan. Such in brief is a sketch of thecheckered fortunes of the Holy City since its destruction by Titus. The details will be found in Gibbon's Decline and Fall; Prof. Robinson's Bibl. Res. i. 365-407; the Rev. G. Williams' Holy City, vol. i. Wilken's Gesch. der Kreuzzüge; Deyling's Dias. de Asiae Capitolinae orig. et historia; and Bp. Münster's History of the Jewish War under Titus and Hadrian, translated in Robinson's Bibliotheca Sacra, pp. 393-456.

III. TOPOGRAPHY OF THE CITY.

There is perhaps no city in the ancient world the topography of which ought to be so easily determined as that of Jerusalem. In the first place, the city always was small, and is surrounded by deep valleys, while the form of the ground within its limits is so strongly marked that there never could which Biblical scholars generally entertain. We insert therefore (at the end of the article) a somewhat extended examination of his theory on this part of the subject, by Dr. Welcket, who writes with the advantage of a personal knowledge of the localities in question. We pursue this course, instead of selecting aside or abbreviating the article, both as an act of justice to Mr. Ferguson, who enjoys a high reputation as an architect and archaeologist and as required also by our pledge to the reader to omit nothing in this edition of the Dictionary which he would find in the Biblical edition.
apparently be any great difficulty in ascertaining its general extent, or in fixing its more prominent features; and on the other hand we have in the works of Josephus a more full and complete topo-ographical description of this city than of almost any other in the ancient world. It is certain that he was intimately acquainted with the localities he describes, and his curious descriptions can be tested by comparing them with the details of the siege by Titus which he afterwards narrates, there ought to be no difficulty in settling at least all the main points. Nor would there ever have been any, but for the circumstance that for a long period after the destruction of the city by Titus, the place was practically deserted by its original inhabitants, and the continuity of tradition consequently broken in upon; and after this, when it again appears in his history, it is as a sacred city, and at a period the most uncritical of any known in the modern history of the world. During at least ten centuries of what are called most properly the dark ages, it was thought necessary to find a locality for every event mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures which had taken place within or near its walls. These were in most instances fixed arbitrarily, there being no constant tradition to guide the topographer, so that the confusion which has arisen has become perplexing, to a degree that can only be appreciated by those who have attempted to unravel the tangled thread; and now that long centuries of constant tradition have added sanctity to the localities, it is extremely difficult to shake one's self free from its influence, and to investigate the subject in that critical spirit which is necessary to elicit the truth
so long buried in obscurity.

It is only by taking up the thread of the narrative from the very beginning, and admitting nothing which cannot be proved, either by direct testimony or by local indications, that we can hope to clear up the mystery; but, with the ample materials that still exist, it only requires that this should be done in order to arrive at a correct determination of at least all the principal points of the topography of this sacred city.

So little has this been done hitherto, that there are at present before the public three distinct views of the topography of Jerusalem, so discrepant from one another in their most essential features, that a disinterested person might fairly feel himself justified in assuming that there existed no real data for the determination of the points at issue, and that the disputed questions must forever remain in the same unsatisfactory state as at present.

1. The first of these theories is the most obvious, and has at all events the merit of simplicity. It consists in the belief that all the sacred localities were correctly ascertained in the early ages of Christianity; and, what is still more important, that none have been changed during the dark ages that followed, or in the numerous revolutions to which the city has been exposed. Consequently, inventing that all which the traditions of the Middle Ages have handed down to us may be implicitly relied upon. The advantages of this theory are so manifest, that it is little wonder that it should be so popular and find so many advocates.

The first person who ventured publicly to express his dissent from this view was Korte, a German printer, who travelled in Palestine about the year 1728. On visiting Jerusalem he was struck with the apparent impossibility of reconciling the site of the present church of the Holy Sepulchre with the exigencies of the Bible narrative, and on his return home published a work denying the authenticity of the so-called sacred localities. His theories exicted very little attention at the time, or for long afterwards; but the spirit of inquiry which has sprung up during the present century has revived
the controversy which has so long been dormant, and his dispositions and comments have been published and Catholic, have expressed with more or less distinctness the difficulties they feel in reconciling
the assumed localities with the indications in the Bible.
The arguments in favor of the present localities being the correct ones are well summed up by the Rev. George Williams in his work on the Holy City, and with the assistance of Professor Willis all has been said that can be urged in favor of their authenticity. Nothing can exceed the ingenuity of the various hypotheses that are brought forward to explain away the admitted difficulties of the case;
but we look in vain for any new facts to counterbalance the significance of those so often urged on the other side, while the continued appeals to faith and to personal arguments, do not inspire confidence in the soundness of the data brought forward.

2. Professor Robinson, on the other hand, in his elaborate works on Palestine, has brought together all the arguments which from the time of Korte have been accumulating against the authenticity of the mediæval sites and traditions. He has done this with a power of logic which would probably have been conclusive had he been able to carry the argument to its legitimate conclusion. His want of knowledge of architecture and of the principles of architectural criticism, however, prevented him from perceiving that the present church of the Holy Sepulchre was wholly of an age subsequent to that of the Crusades, and without a trace of the style of Constantine. Nor was he, from the same causes, able to correct in a single instance the erroneous adscriptions given to many other buildings in Jerusalem, whose dates might have afforded a clue to the mystery. When, in consequence, he announced as the result of his researches the melancholy conclusion, that the site of the Holy Sepulchre was now, and must in all probability for ever remain a mystery, the effect was, that those who were opposed to his views clung all the more firmly to those they before entertained, preferring a site and a sepulchre which had been hallowed by the tradition of ages rather than launch forth on the swordless sea of speculation which Dr. Robinson's negative conclusion opened out before them.

3. The third theory is that put forward by the author of this article in his "Essay on the Ancient Topography of Jerusalem." It agrees generally with the views urged by all those from Korte to Robinson, who doubt the authenticity of the present site of the sepulchre; but instead of acquiescing in the desponding view taken by the latter, it goes on to assert, for reasons which will be given hereafter, that the building now known to Christians as the Mosque of Omar, but by Moslems called the Dome of the Rock, is the identical church which Constantine erected over the Rock which contained the Tomb of Christ.

If this view of the topography can be maintained,
it at once sets to rest all questions that can possibly arise as to the accuracy of the sacred sites with the Bible narrative; for there is no doubt but that at the time of the crucifixion this locality was outside the walls, "near the judgment-seat," and Topography of Josephus.

Plate 1

JERUSALEM
towards the country;" and it agrees in every respect with the minutest indication of the Scriptures.
It confirms all that was said by Eusebius, and all Christian and Mohammedan writers before the time of the Crusades, regarding the sacred localities, and brings the Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan topography into order, and explains all that before was so puzzling.
It substitutes a building which no one doubts was built long before the time of the Crusades, for one which as Eusebius says, was erected after that event: and one that now possesses in its centre a mass of living rock with one cave in it exactly as described by Eusebius, for one with only a small taleremade of marble, where no rock ever was seen by human eyes; and it groups together buildings undoubtedly of the age of Constantine, whose juxtaposition it is otherwise impossible to account for.
A theory offering such advantages as these ought either to be welcomed by all Christian men, or assailed by earnest reasoning, and not rejected without good and solid objections being brought against it. For it never can be unimportant even to the best established creeds to deprive scoffer's of every opportunity for a sneer, and it is always wise to offer to the waving every testimony which may tend to confirm them in their faith.
The most satisfactory way of investigating the subject will probably be to commence at the time of the greatest prosperity of Jerusalem, immediately before its downfall, which also happens to be the period when we have the greatest amount of knowledge regarding its features. If we can determine what was then its extent, and fix the more important localities at that period, there will be no great difficulty in ascertaining the proper sites for the events which may have happened either before or after. All that now remains of the ancient city of course existed then; and the descriptions of Josephus, in so far as they are to be trusted, apply to the city as he then saw it; so that the evidence is at that period more complete and satisfactory than at any other time, and the city itself being then at its greatest extent, it necessarily included all that existed either before or afterwards.
It will not be necessary here to dwell upon the much disputed point of the veracity of the historian on whose testimony we must principally rely in this matter. It will be sufficient to remark that every new discovery, every improved plan that has been made, has served more and more to confirm the testimony of Josephus, and to give a higher idea of the minute accuracy of his local knowledge.
In no one instance has he yet been convicted of any material error in describing localities in plan. Many difficulties which were thought at one time to be insuperable have disappeared with a more careful investigation of the data; and now that the city has been carefully mapped and explored, there seems every probability of our being able to reconcile all his descriptions with the appearance of the existing localities. So much indeed is this the case that one cannot help suspecting that the Roman army was provided with surveyors who could map out the localities with very tolerable precision; and that, though writing at Rome, Josephus had before him a much clearer and more exactly drawn map of Jerusalem than the one which now exists, which is said to be in horizontal dimensions. This becomes more probable when we consider how moderate all these are, and how consistent with existing remains. And compare them with his strangely exaggerated statements whenever he speaks of heights or describes the arrangement of buildings which had been destroyed in the siege, and of which it may be supposed no record or correct description then existed. He seems to have left himself at liberty to indulge his national vanity in respect to these, but to have been checked when speaking of what still existed, and could never be falsified. The consequence is, that in almost all instances we may implicitly rely on anything he says with regard to the plan of Jerusalem, and as to anything that existed or could be tested at the time he wrote, but must receive with the greatest caution any assertion with regard to what did not then remain, or respecting which no accurate evidence could be adduced to refute his statement.
In attempting to follow the description of Josephus there are two points which it is necessary should be fixed in order to understand what follows.
The first of these is the position and dimensions of the Temple; the second the position of the Tower Hippicus.
Thanks to modern investigation there now seems to be little difficulty in determining the first, with all the accuracy requisite to our present purposes. The position of the Tower Hippicus cannot be determined with the same absolute certainty, but can be fixed within such limits as to allow no reasonable doubts as to its locality.
1. Site of the Temple. — Without any exception, all topographers are agreed that the Temple stood within the limits of the great area now known as the Haram, though few are agreed as to the portion of that space which it covered; and at least one author places it in the centre, and not at the southern extremity of the inclosure. With this exception all topographers are agreed that the southwestern angle of the Haram area was one of the angles of the ancient Jewish Temple. In the first place it is admitted that the Temple was a rectangle, and this happens to be the only right angle of the whole inclosure. In the next place, in his description of the great Stoa Basilica of the Temple, Josephus distinctly states that it stood on the southern wall and overhung the valley (Ant. xv. 16, § 3). Again, the discovery of the remains of the arch of a bridge, commencing about 40 feet from the S. W. angle in the western wall, and consequently coinciding with the centre of the great Stoa (as will be shown under the head 'Temple'), so exactly corresponds with the description of Josephus (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; B. J. i. 2, §§ 5, 2, ii. 10, i. 27 v. 6, ii. 3; vi. 7, § 1) as it is, perhaps, only necessary to suffice to decide the question. The size of the stones and the general character of the masonry at the Jews' Wall-place (wood-cut No. 2) in the western wall near its southern extremity have been considered by almost all topographers as a proof that the wall there formed part of the substructures of the Temple: and lastly, the discovery of one of the old gateways which Josephus (B. J. vi. 6, § 9) mentions as leading from the Temple to Pura-, on this side, mentioned by Ali Bey, ii. 226, and Dr. Barclay (City of the Great King, p. 400), besides minor indications, make up such a chain of proof as to leave scarcely a doubt on this point.

The extent of the Temple northwards and eastwards from this point is a question on which there is much less agreement than with regard to the position of its southwestern angle, though the evidence here written and local, points incontestably to the conclusion that Josephus was literally correct when he said that the Temple was an exact square of a stadium, or 600 Greek feet, on each side (Ant. xv. 11, § 3). This assertion he repeats when describing the great Stoa Basilica, which occupied the whole of the southern side (xx. 11, § 9); and again, in describing Solomon's, or the eastern portion, he says it was 400 cubits, or 600 feet, in extent (xx. 10, § 7); and lastly, in narrating the building of the Temple of Solomon (viii. 4, § 9), he says he elevated the ground to 400 cubits, meaning, as the context explains, on each side. In fact there is no point on which Josephus repeats himself so often, and is throughout so thoroughly consistent.

There is no other written authority on this subject except the Talmud, which asserts that the Temple was a square of 500 cubits each side (Mishna, v. 334); but the Rabbis, as if aware that this assertion did not coincide with the localities, immediately correct themselves by explaining that it was the width of 15 inches which was meant, which would make the side 625 feet. Their authority, however, is so questionable, that it is of the least possible consequence what they said or meant.

"This arch is known among travellers as 'Robinson's Arch.' Though Dr. Robinson was not the first to recognize these projecting stones as connected with some ancient bridge or viaduct, he was unquestionably the first to identify them with the bridge so particularly described by Josephus. (See B. J. Res. 24, § 8.) It will be observed that these stones spring out of the Haram wall on the east side of the Tyropo
eon. One of the most remarkable of the recent discoveries at Jerusalem is the dischtering of the opposite buttress or pier of the bridge on the western side of the valley, and of the stones of the pavement which formed the floor of this causeway.

The following account of this discovery is drawn up from the report of Lieut. Warren, who superintended the excavation: 'At the depth of about 55 feet a gallery from one of the shafts was traced along an ancient artificial cutting in the solid rock until it was stopped by a mass of masonry, constructed of 300 beveled stones of great size, and evidently still remaining in their original position. This masonry, of which three courses remain, proved to be the lowermost portion of the original western pier of Robinson's Arch. . . .

The remains of the pier consist of 'splendid stones' of a peculiarly hard texture, of great magnitude and in perfect preservation: the lowest course, resting on the rock, is 3 feet 6 inches high, and the next 3 feet 2 inches, with the large stones still visible, obviously above the present surface of the ground in the Haram wall. The pier was rather more than 12 feet in thickness east and west, and it was constructed not as a solid mass, but so built with the great stones already mentioned that the hollow space was visible, openings leading to this space through the exterior masonry: and thus the whole pier may be said to be made up of smaller ones . . . ."

"East of these remarkable and most interesting remains of this arch-pier, and on a level with the rock surface, a pavement of stone was found to extend towards the Haram wall; and here, on this pavement, upwards of 50 feet beneath the present surface, when they had cleared away a cavern-like space sufficiently large for them to examine the ancient ruins that were lying before them, the explorers discovered, ranged in two lines north and south, and huddled together just as they fell, the actual caissons, or wedge-shaped arch-stones, of which when in its complete condition, the great viaduct of Robinson's Arch had been constructed. That viaduct had led from the Jerusalem on the western portion of the rock-plateau that formed the site of the city, over the Tyropoeon Valley to the Temple on Zion—the eastern portion. The great arch, its span 42 feet 6 inches and its width upwards of 50 feet, which supported this causeway, was broken down by command of Titus, when at length the whole of Jerusalem had fallen into his power: and the arch-stones, hard, and their forms still as clearly defined as when they fell, and each one weighing at least 20 tons, may now be seen in the excavated cavern, at the bottom of the shaft, preserved in safety while hidden from sight through eighteen centuries by the gradually accumulating covering of ruins and earth, that at length rose 50 feet above the m.

It would be difficult to find any relic of ancient times more interesting than this broken archway. The Apostles must very often have passed over it, while yet the arch remained entire; and so also must their Master and ours often have passed over it with them."

angles to the southern wall, and bounding the solid space. Beyond this point the Haram area is filled up with a series of light arches supported on square piers (shown in the annexed woodcut, No. 3), the whole being of so slight a construction that it may be affirmed with absolute certainty that neither the Stoa Basilica, nor any of the larger buildings of the Temple, ever stood on them. The proof of this is not difficult. Taking Josephus's account of the great Stoa as we find it, he states that it consisted of four rows of Corinthian pillars, 40 in each row. If they extended along the whole length of the present southern wall they must have been spaced between 23 and 24 feet apart, and this, from our knowledge of the works of the ancients, we may assert to be architecturally impossible. But, far more than this, the piers that support the vaults in question are only about 3 feet 6 inches by 3 feet 3 inches square, while the pillars which it is assumed they supported were between 5 and 6 feet in diameter (Ant. xv. 11, § 5), so that, if this were so, the foundations must have been practically about half the area of the columns they supported. Even this is not all; the piers in the vaults are so irregularly spaced, some 17, some 20 or 21, and one even 30 feet apart, that the pillars of the Stoa must have stood in most instances on the crown or sides of the arches, and these are so weak (as may be seen from the roots of the trees above having struck through them) that they could not for one hour have supported the weight. In fact there can be no doubt whatever that the buildings of the Temple never stood on this frail prop, and also that no more solid foundations ever existed here; for the bare rock is everywhere visible, and if ever more solidly built upon, the remains of such constructions could not have disappeared. In so far, therefore, as the southern wall is concerned, we may rest perfectly satisfied with Josephus's description that the Temple extended east and west 600 feet.

The position of the northern wall is as easily fixed. If the Temple was square it must have commenced at a point 600 feet from the southwest angle, and in fact the southern wall of the platform which now surrounds the so-called Mosque of Omar runs parallel to the southern wall of the inclosure, at a distance of exactly 600 feet, while westward it is continued in a causeway which crosses the valley just 600 feet from the south-western angle. It may also be mentioned that from this point the western wall of the Haram area no longer follows the same direction, but inclines slightly to the westward, indicating a difference (though perhaps not of much value) in the purpose to which it was applied. Moreover the south wall of what is now the platform of the Dome of the Rock runs eastward from the western wall for just 600 feet; which again gives the same dimension for the north wall of the Temple as was found for the southern wall by the limitation of the solid space before the commencement of the vaults. All these points will be now clear by reference to the plan on the next page (woodcut No. 4), where the dimensions are stated in English feet, according to the best available authorities, not in Greek feet, which alone are used in the text.

The only point in Josephus's description which seems to have misled topographers with regard to these dimensions is his assertion that the Temple extended from one valley to the other (Ant. xv. 11, § 5). If he had named the valley or identified it in any way with the Valley of Kidron this might have been a difficulty; but as it is only a valley it is of less importance, especially as the manner in which the vaults extend northwards immediately beyond the eastern wall of the Temple is sufficient to show that such a depression once existed here as to justify his expression. But, whatever importance may be attached to these indefinite words, they never can be allowed to outweigh the written dimensions and the local indications, which show that the Temple never could have extended more than 600 feet from the western wall.

It has been objected to this conclusion that if the Temple were only 600 feet square, it would be impossible to find space within its walls for all the courts and buildings mentioned by Josephus and in the Talmud. This difficulty, however, has no real foundation in fact, and the mode in which the interior may have been arranged, so as to meet all the exigencies of the case, will be explained in treating of the Temple. But in the mean while it seems impossible to escape from the conclusion that the square space indicated by shading in the plan (wood-cut No. 4) was the exact area occupied by the Jewish Temple as rebuilt by Herod, and as described by Josephus. [Against this view, see § IV. Amer. ed.]

II. Hippicus. — Of all the towers that once adorned the city of Jerusalem only one now exists in anything like a state of perfection. Being in the centre of the citadel, on one of the most elevated points of the city, it strikes the traveller's eye whichever way he turns; and from its prominence now, and the importance which Josephus ascribes to the tower Hippicus, it has been somewhat hastily assumed that the two are identical. The reasons, however, against this assumption are too cogent to
No. 4.—Plan of Haram Area at Jerusalem
a * Nothing could seem to be more palpable to an observer, than that in the Tower of David, so called, in the present citadel of Jerusalem, we have the remains of one of the three great Herodian towers, spared by Titus, when the city was demolished (R. v. 7 § 1). No theory, which would make it more modern, can explain the structure. Its lower part bears every mark of antiquity, and its cubic solidity (an unusual feature) accords with Josephus's description of these towers. (B. J. v. 4, § 3.) If it was either of them, it must have been Hippicus, for Flaccus and Mariamne lay east of it, and there could not have been a fortress west of this point. Its position relative to the site of the Temple, and to the wall which stretched between them, along the northem brow of Zion, harmonizes with this view. The ruins of Kâbat el-Jâlud offer no rival claim — suggesting nothing more than a modern bastion and an ancient wall. S. W.
have been said to have extended to that fortress, but in either of these cases it is quite impossible that it could have passed outside the present Haram wall so as to meet the old wall at the southeastern angle of the Temple, where Josephus in his description makes the old wall end. There does not seem to be any possible solution of the difficulty, except the one pointed out above, that the Temple was only 600 feet square; that the space between the Temple and the Valley of Kidron was not included within the walls till Agrippa's time, and that the present eastern wall of the Haram is the identical wall built by that king—a solution which not only accords with the words of Josephus but with all the local peculiarities of the place.

It may also be added that Josephus's description (B. j. v. 4, § 2) of the immense stones of which this wall was constructed, fully bears out the appearance of the great stones at the angles, and does away with the necessity of supposing on account of their magnificence, that they are parts of the substructure of the Temple proper.

After describing these walls, Josephus adds that the whole circumference of the city was 32 stadia, or nearly four English miles, which is as near as may be the extent indicated by the localities. He then adds (B. j. v. 4, § 3) that the number of towers in the old wall was 60, the middle wall 40, and the new wall 90. Taking the distance of these towers as 150 feet from centre to centre, which is probably very near the truth on the average, the first and last named walls are as nearly as may be commensurate, but the middle wall is so much too short that either we must assume a mistake somewhere, or, what is more probable, that Josephus enumerated the towers not only to where it ended at the Antonia, but round the Antonia and Temple to where it joined the old wall above Siloam. With this addition the 150 feet again is perfectly consistent with the facts of the case and with the localities. Altogether it appears that the extent and direction of the walls is not now a matter admitting of much controversy, and probably would never have been so, but for the difficulties arising from the position of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which will be alluded to hereafter.

Josephus—Before leaving the subject of the walls, it may be well to fix the situation of the Turbo Antonia, as far as the data at our command will admit. It certainly was attached to the Temple buildings, and on the northern side of them; but whether covering the whole space, or only a portion, has been much disputed. After stating that the Temple was foursquare, and a stadium on each side, Josephus goes on to say (B. j. v. 5, § 2), that with Antonia it was six stadia in circumference. The most obvious conclusion from this would be that the Antonia was of the same dimensions as the Temple, and of the form shown in the diagram (wood-cut No. 5), where A marks the Temple, and B Antonia, according to this theory. In other words, it assumes that the Antonia occupied practically the platform on which the so-called Mosque of Omar now stands, and there is nothing in the locality to contradict such an assumption (see B. j. vi. 5, § 4). On the contrary, the fact of the Sakra being the highest rock in the immediate neighborhood would confirm all we are told of the situation of the Jewish citadel. There are, however, certain facts mentioned in the account of the siege which render such a view nearly if not quite untenable.

It is said that when Titus reviewed his army on Bezeba (B. j. v. 9, § 1), the Jews looked on from the north wall of the Temple. If Antonia, on higher ground, and probably with higher walls, had intervened, this could not have been possible; and the expression must have been that they looked on from the walls of Antonia. We have also a passage (B. j. v. 7, § 3) which makes this even clearer; it is there asserted that "John and his faction defended themselves from the tower Antonia, and from the northern cloisters of the Temple, and fought the Romans" (from the context evidently simultaneously) before the entrance of king Alexander. We are therefore forced to adopt the alternative, which the words of Josephus equally justify, that the Antonia was a tower or keep attached to the northwestern angle of the Temple, as shown in the plan. Indeed, the words of Josephus hardly justify any other interpretation; for he says (B. j. v. 5, § 8) that "it was situated at the corner of two cloisters of the court of the Temple—of that on the west, and that on the north," probably it was surrounded by a wall, inclosing courts and other appurtenances of a citadel, and with its inclosing wall at least two stadia in circuit. It may have been two and a half, or even three, as shown in the diagram (wood-cut No. 6), where C marks the size and position of the Antonia on the supposition that its entire circumference was two stadia, and D) the size it would attain if only three of its sides were counted, and if Josephus did not reckon the four stadia of the Temple as a fixed quantity, and deducted the part covered by the fortress from the whole sum; but in this instance we have no local indication to guide us. The question has become one of very great importance, as it is quite certain that, if the Temple was only 600 feet square, it did not occupy the whole of the northern half of this feature the line given does not correspond with the description.

The third wall, as above stated, joined the (southward part of the) old wall at the valley called the Valley of Kidron. It could not then, have joined it at the point indicated in the text and map, for this point lies between the Kidron and the Tyropoeon valley, more than one third of the distance from the former.

The specification which this writer considers the most important point in his description is claimed by Dr. Robinson in support of the theory which he seeks to displace. (Bib. Hist. 1:461.)
the Haram area, and consequently that neither was the "pool of Bethesda" its northern ditch, nor the rock on which the governor's house now stands its rock foundation. With the Temple area fixed as above, by no hypothesis could it be made to stretch as far as that; and the object, therefore, which many topographers had in view in extending the dimensions, must now be abandoned.*

V. Hills and Valleys. — Notwithstanding the very great degree of certainty with which the site of the Temple, the position of the Hippicus, and the direction of the walls may be determined, there are still one or two points within the city, the positions of which have not yet been fixed in so satisfactory a manner. Topographers are still at issue as to the true direction of the upper part of the Tyropeon Valley, and, consequently, as to the position of Aera, and various smaller points dependent on the fixation of these two. Fortunately the determination of these points has no bearing whatever on any of the great historical questions arising out of the topography; and though it would no doubt be satisfactory if they could be definitely settled, they are among the least important points that arise in discussing the descriptions of Josephus.

The difficulty of determining the true course of the upper part of the Tyropeon Valley is caused by our inability to determine whether Josephus, in describing the city (B. J. v. 4, § 1), limits his description to the city of Jerusalem, properly so called, as circumscribed by the first or old wall, or whether he includes the City of David also, and speaks of the whole city as inclosed by the third or great wall of Agrippa. In the first case the Tyropeon must have been the depression leading from a spot opposite the northwest angle of the Temple towards the Jaffa Gate; in the second it was the great valley leading from the same point northwards towards the Damascus Gate.

The principal reason for adopting the first hypothesis arises from the words of Josephus himself, who describes the Tyropeon as an open space or depression within the city, at "which the corresponding rows of houses on both hills end" (B. J. v. 4, § 1). Would exactly answer the position of a valley running to the Jaffa Gate, and consequently within the old walls, and would apply to such a ravine as might easily have been obliterated by accumulation of rubbish in after times; but it is not so easy to see how it can be made applicable to such a valley as that running towards the Damascus Gate, which must have had a wall on either side, and the slope of which is so gradual, that then, as now, the "rows of houses" might — though it by no means follows that they must — have run across it without interruption. We cannot indeed apply the description to this valley, unless we assume that the houses were built close up to the old wall, so as to leave almost no plain space in front of it, or that the formation of the bottom of the valley was originally steeper and narrower than it now is. On the whole, this view presents perhaps less difficulty than the obliteration of the other valley, which its most zealous advocates are now forced to admit, after the most patient search; added to the difficulty that must have existed in carrying the old wall across its gorge, which Josephus would have hinted at had it existed.

* The opposite view, namely, that the fortress Antonia apparently occupied the whole northern part of the present Haram area, is strongly presented by

The direct evidence seems so nearly balanced that either hypothesis might be adopted if we were content to fix the position of the hill Aera from that of this valley, as is usually done, instead of from extraneous evidence, as we fortunately are able to do with tolerable certainty in this matter.

In all the transactions mentioned in the 12th and 13th books of the Antiquities, Josephus commonly uses the word Ἀσπα as the corresponding term to the Hebrew word Metzidah, translated stronghold, fortress, and tower in the books of the Macabees, when speaking of the fortress which joined the Temple in the north; and if we might assume that the hill Aera and the tower Aera were one and the same place, the question might be considered as settled.

It is more than probable that this was so, for in describing the "upper market-place," which was called the "citadel" by David (B. J. v. § 1), Josephus uses the word φραγμον, which he also applies to the Aera after it was destroyed (Ant. xiii. 16, § 5), or βραγμος, as the old name apparently immediately before it was rebuilt by Herod, and by him called the Antonia (Ant. xviii. 4, § 2).

It is also only by assuming that the Aera was on the Temple Hill that we can understand the position of the valley of the Tyropeon which was obliterated.

It is true that Josephus describes the citadel or Aera of Jerusalem (Ant. xiii. 4, § 9) as situated in the "lower city" (ἐν τη χαρα χαίλη Παλαια, xiii. 5, § 4, B. J. i. 1, § 4), which would equally apply to either of the assumed sites, were it not that he qualifies it by saying that it was built so high as to dominate the Temple, and at the same time lying close to it (Ant. xii. 9, § 3), which can only apply to a building situated on the Temple Hill. It must also be observed that the whole of the Temple Hill is very much lower than the hill on which the city itself was located, and, consequently, that the Temple and its adjuncts may, with great propriety, be called the lower city, as contradistinguished from the other half, which, from the superior elevation of the plateau on which it stands, is truly the upper city.

If we adopt this view, it will account for the great leveling operations which at one time have been carried on at the northwestern angle of the Haram area, and the marks of which have been always a puzzle to antiquaries. These are utterly unmeaning on any hypothesis yet suggested, for so far from contributing to the defense of any work erected here, their effect from their position must have been the very reverse. But if we admit that they were the works which occupied the Jews for three years of incessant labor (Ant. xii. 7, § 6) after the destruction of the Aera, their appearance is at once accounted for, and the description of Josephus made plain.

* If this view of the matter be correct, the word ἄφωνοςματος (B. J. v. 6, § 1), about which so much controversy has been raised, must be translated sloping down on either side," a meaning which it will bear equally as well as "gibbons," which is usually affixed to it, and which only could be applied if the hill within, the old wall were indicated.

On reviewing the whole question, the great preponderance of evidence seems to be in favor of the assumption that the hill Aera and the citadel Aera were one and the same place; that Aera was situated on the northern side of the Temple, on the same hill, and probably on the same spot, originally occupied by David as the stronghold of Zion (2 Sam. v. 7-9), and near where Baris and Antonia afterwards stood; and consequently that the great northern depression running towards the Damascus Gate is the Tyropean valley, and that the Valley of the Asmonæans was a transverse cut, separating the hill Bezetha from the Aera or citadel on the Temple Hill.

If this view of the internal topography of the city be granted, the remaining hills and valleys fall into their places easily and as a matter of course. The citadel, or upper market-place of Josephus, was the modern Zion, or the city inclosed within the old wall; Aera was the ancient Zion, or the hill on which the Temple, the City of David, Baris, Aera, and Antonia, stood. It lay over against the other; and probably exactly between these two, in the valley, stood the lower city, and the place called Hillel. Bezetha was the well-defined hill to the north of the Temple, just beyond the valley in which the Piscina Probatica was situated. The fourth hill which Josephus enumerates, but does not name, must have been the ridge between the last-named valley and that of the Tyropean, and was separated from the Temple Hill by the Valley of the Asmonæans. The other minor localities will be pointed out in the sequel as they occur in order.

VI. Population. — There is no point in which the exaggeration in which Josephus occasionally indulges is more apparent than in speaking of the population of the city. The inhabitants were dead; no record remained; and to magnify the greatness of the city was a compliment to the prowess of the conquerors. Still the assertions that three millions were collected at the Parcoen (1851, pp. 66, 153, 154), that a million of people perished in the siege: that 100,000 escaped, &c., are so childish, that it is surprising any one could ever have repeated them. Even the more moderate calculation of Tacitus of 600,000 inhabitants, is far beyond the limits of probability.

Placing the Hippicus on the farthest northern point possible, and consequently extending the walls as far as either authority or local circumstances will admit, still the area within the old walls never could have exceeded 180 acres. Assuming, as is sometimes done, that the site of the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre was outside the old walls, this area must be reduced to 120 or 130 acres; but taking it at the larger area, its power of accommodating such a multitude as Josephus describes may be illustrated by reference to a recent example. The great Exhibition Building of 1851 covered 18 acres—just a tenth of this. On three days near its closing 100,000 or 105,000 persons visited it; but it is not assumed that more than from 60,000 to 70,000 were under its roof at the same moment.

Any one who was in the building on these days will recollect how impossible it was to move from one place to another; how frightful in fact the crush was both in the galleries and on the floor, and that in many places even standing room could hardly be obtained; yet if 600,000 or 700,000 people were in Jerusalem after the fall of the outer wall (almost at the beginning of the siege), the crowd there must have been denser than in the Crystal Palace; eating, drinking, sleeping, or fighting, literally impossible; and considering how the site of a town must be measured with buildings, 300,000 in Jerusalem would have been more crowded than were the sight-seers at the Crystal Palace in its most crowded moments.

But fortunately we are not left to such vague data as these. No town in the east can be pointed out where each inhabitant has not at least 50 square yards on an average allowed to him. In some of the crowded cities of the west, such as parts of London, Liverpool, Hamburg, &c., the space is reduced to about 50 yards to each inhabitant; but this only applies to the poorest and most crowded places, with houses many stories high, not to cities containing palaces and public buildings. London, on the other hand, averages 200 yards of superficial space for every person living within its precincts. But, on the lowest estimate, the ordinary population of Jerusalem must have stood nearly as follows: Taking the area of the city inclosed by the two old walls at 750,000 yards, and that inclosed by the wall of Agrippa at 1,500,000, we have 2,250,000 for the whole. Taking the population of the old city at the probable number of one person to 50 yards we have 15,000, and at the extreme limit of 30 yards we should have 25,000 inhabitants for the old city. And at 100 yards to each individual in the new city about 15,000 more; so that the population of Jerusalem, in its days of greatest prosperity, may have amounted to from 30,000 to 45,000 souls, but could hardly have reached 50,000; and assuming that in times of festival one million were added to this amount, which is an extreme estimate, there may have been 60,000 or 70,000 in the city when Titus came up against it. As no one would stay in a beleaguered city who had a home to fly to, it is hardly probable that the men who came up to fight for the defense of the city would equal the number of women and children who would seek refuge elsewhere; so that the probability is that about the usual population of the city were in it at that time.

It may also be mentioned that the army which Titus brought up against Jerusalem did not exceed from 25,000 to 30,000 effective men of all arms, which, taking the probabilities of the case, is about the number that would be required to attack a fortified town defended by from 8,000 to 10,000 men capable of bearing arms. Had the garrison been more than 20,000, the siege would have been improbable, but taking the whole incidents of Josephus's narrative, there is nothing to lead us to suppose that the Jews ever could have mustered 10,000 the number of persons carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar in three deportations from both city and province as only 4,000, though they seem to have sworn off every one who could go, nearly depopulating the place.
 frontal area at any period of the siege; half that number is probably nearer the truth. The main interest of this question lies in a topographical point of view, is the additional argument it affords for placing Hippicus as far north as it has been placed above, and generally to extend the walls to the greatest extent justifiable, in order to accommodate a population at all worthy of the greatness of the city. It is also interesting as showing the utter impossibility of the argument of those who would except the whole northwest corner of the present city from the old walls, so as to accommodate the Holy Sepulchre with a site outside the walls, in accordance with the Bible narrative.

VII. Zion. — One of the great difficulties which has perplexed most authors in examining the ancient topography of Jerusalem, is the correct fixation of the locality of the sacred Mount of Zion. It cannot be disputed that from the time of Constantine downwards to the present day, this name has been applied to the western hill on which the city of Jerusalem now stands, and in fact always stood.

Notwithstanding this, it seems equally certain that up to the time of the destruction of the city by Titus, the name was applied exclusively to the eastern hill, or that on which the Temple stood.

Unfortunately the name Zion is not found in the works of Josephus, so that we have not his assistance to the invaluable aid in this case, and there is no passage in the Bible which directly asserts the identity of the hills Moriah and Zion, though many which cannot well be understood without this assumption. The cumulative proof, however, is such as almost perfectly to supply this want.

From the passages in 2 Sam. vii. 7, and 1 Chr. xi. 5–8, it is quite clear that Zion and the city of David were identical, for it is there said, "David took the castle of Zion, which is the City of David." And David dwelt in the castle, therefore they called it the City of David. And he built the city round about, even from Millo round about, and Joab repaired the rest of the city." This last expression would seem to separate the city of Jerusalem which was required, from that of David which was built, though it is scarcely distinct enough to be relied upon. In the same line of thought, the most distinct passage is that in the 48th Psalm, verse 2, where it is said, "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King," which it seems almost impossible to apply to the modern Zion, the most southern extremity of the city. There are also a great many passages in the Bible where Zion is spoken of as a separate city from Jerusalem, as for instance, "For out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and they that escape out of Mount Zion " (2 K. xix. 31). "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion; build thou the walls of Jerusalem" (Ps. lxi. 18). "The Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem " (Zech. i. 17). "For the people shall dwell in Zion at Jerusalem " (Is. xxx. 19). "The Lord shall rear up Zion on her glory, and all his holy persons " (Is. liii. 16; Am. i. 2). There are also unnumberless passages in which Zion is spoken of as a Holy place in such terms as are never applied to Jerusalem, and which can only be understood as applied to the Holy Temple Mount. Such expressions, for instance, as "I set my king on my holy hill of Zion " (Ps. lii. 6) — "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob" (Ps. lxxxvii. 2) — "The Lord has chosen Zion " (Is. xxixii. 13) — "The city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel " (Is. lx. 14) — "Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion to the Lord" (Jer. xxxii. 8) — "Thus saith the Lord, I am returned to Zion " (Zech. viii. 3) — "I am the Lord thy God, dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain " (Joel iii. 17) — "For the Lord dwelleth in Zion " (Joel iii. 21), and many others, which will occur to every one at all familiar with the Scriptures, seem to us to indicate plainly the hill of the Temple. Substantiate the word Jerusalem for Zion in these passages, and we feel at once how it grates on the ear; for such epithets as these are never applied to that city; on the contrary, if there is a curse uttered, or term of disparagement, it is seldom applied to Zion, but always to her unfortunate sister, Jerusalem. It is never said, — The Lord dwelleth in Jerusalem; or, loveth Jerusalem; or any such expression, which surely would have occurred, had Jerusalem and Zion been one and the same place, as they now are, and generally supposed to have been. Though these cannot be taken as absolute proof, they certainly amount to strong presumptive evidence that Zion and the Temple Hill were one and the same place. There is one curious passage, however, which is scarcely intelligible on any other hypothesis than this; it is known as the "sepalphers of the kings" (2 Chr. xxviii. 27). Jerahim (2 Chr. xxi. 20) narrowly escaped the same punishment, and the distinction is so marked that it cannot be overlooked. The modern sepulchre of David (Neloy David) is, and always must have been in Jerusalem; not, as the Bible expressly tells us, in the city of David, as contradistinguished from the city of the Jehovites.

When from the Old Testament we turn to the Books of the Maccabees, we come to some passages written by persons who certainly were acquainted with the localities, which seem to fix the site of Zion with a considerable amount of certainty; as, for instance, "They went up into Mount Zion, and saw the walls desolate and the courts, and the shrubs growing in the courts as a forest." (1 Macc. iv. 37 and 60). "After this went Nicanor up to Mount Zion, and there came out of the sanctuary certain persons " (1 Macc. v. 33), and several others, which seem to leave no doubt that at that time Zion and the Temple Hill were considered one and the same place. It may also be added that the Rabbis with one accord place the Temple on Mount Zion, and though their authority in matters of doctrine may be valueless, still their traditions ought to have been sufficiently distinct to justify their being considered as authorities on a merely topographical point of this sort. There is also a passage in Nehemiah (iii. 16) which will be alluded to in the next section, and which, added to the above, seems to leave very little doubt that in ancient times the name of Zion was applied to the eastern and not to the western hill of Jerusalem.

VIII. Topography of the Book of Nehemiah. — The only description of the ancient city of Jeru-} such valuable indications that it is well worthy of the most attentive examination.

No. 7.—Diagram of places mentioned in dedication of walls.

The easiest way to arrive at any correct conclusion regarding it, is to take first the description of the Dedication of the Walls in ch. xii. (31-40), and drawing such a diagram as this, we easily get at the main features of the old wall at least.

The order of procession was that the princes of Judah went up upon the wall at some point as nearly as possible opposite to the Temple, and one half of them, turning to the right, went towards the Dung Gate, and at the Fountain Gate, which was over against them (or, in other words, on the opposite or Temple side of the city), "went up by the stairs of the City of David at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the Water Gate eastward." The Water Gate, therefore, was one of the southern gates of the Temple, and the stairs that led up to it are here identified with those of the City of David, and consequently with Zion.

The other party turned to the left, or northwards, and passed from beyond the tower of the furnaces even unto the broad wall," and passing the Gate of Ephraim, the Old Gate, the Fish Gate, the towers of Hammeel and Meah, to the Sheep Gate, "stood still in the Prison Gate," as the other party had in the Water Gate. "So stood the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God."

If from this we turn to the third chapter, which gives a description of the repairs of the wall, we have no difficulty in identifying all the places mentioned in the first sixteen verses, with those mentioned in the 12th chapter. The repairs began at the Sheep Gate on the north side, and in immediate proximity with the Temple, and all the places named in the dedication are again named, but in the reverse order, till we come to the Tower of the Furnaces, which, if not identical with the tower in the citadel, so often mistaken for the Hippicus, must at least have stood very near to it. Mention is then made, but now in the direct order of the dedication, of the Valley Gate, of the Dung Gate, "the Fountain Gate," and lastly, the "stairs that go down from the City of David."

Between these last two places we find mention made of the pool of Siloah and the king's garden, so that we have long passed the so-called sepulchre of David on the modern Zion, and in the immediate proximity of the Temple: most probably in the valley between the City of David and the city of Jerusalem. What follows is most important (ver. 16), "After him repaired Nehemiah, the son of Azbuk, the ruler of the half part of Beth-zur, unto the place over against the sepulchres of David, and to the pool that was made, and unto the house of the mighty."

This passage, when taken with the context, seems in itself quite sufficient to set at rest the question of the position of the City of David, of the sepulchres of the kings, and consequently of Zion, all which could not be mentioned after Siloah if placed where modern tradition has located them.

If the chapter ended with the 16th verse, there would be no difficulty in determining the sites mentioned above, but unfortunately we have, according to this view, retraced our steps very nearly to the point from which we started, and have got through only half the places enumerated. Two hypotheses may be suggested to account for this difficulty; the one that there was then, as in the time of Josephus, a second wall, and that the remaining names refer to it; the other that the first 16 verses refer to the walls of Jerusalem, and the remaining 16 to those of the City of David. An attentive consideration of the subject renders it almost certain that the latter is the true explanation of the case.

In the enumeration of the places repaired, in the last part of the chapter, we have two which we know from the description of the dedication really belonged to the Temple. The prison-court (iii. 25), which must have been connected with the Prison Gate, and, as shown by the order of the dedication, to have been on the north side of the Temple, is here also connected with the king's high house; all this clearly referring, as shown above, to the castle of David, which originally occupied the site of the Turris Antonia. We have on the opposite side the "Water Gate," mentioned in the next verse to Ophel, and consequently as clearly identified with the southern gate of the Temple. We have also the Horse Gate, that by which Athaliah was taken out of the temple (2 K. xi. 16; 2 Chr. xxiii. 15), which Josephus states led to the Kedron (Ant. ix. 7, § 3), and which is here mentioned as connected with the priests' houses, and probably, therefore, a part of the Temple. Mention is also made of the house of Eliashib, the high-priest, and of the eastern gate, probably that of the Temple. In fact, no place is mentioned in these last verses which cannot be more or less directly identified with the localities on the Temple Hill, and not one which can be located in Jerusalem. The whole of the City of David, however, was so completely rebuilt and remodelled by Herod, that there are no local indications to assist us in ascertaining whether the order of description of the places mentioned after verse 16 proceeds along the northern face, and reached by Ophel, and up behind the Temple back to the Shee Gate; or whether, after crossing the causeway to the armory and prison, it does not proceed along the western face of the Temple to Ophel in the south, and then along the eastern face, back along the northern, to the place from which the description started. The latter seems the more probable hypothesis, but the determination of the point is not of very great consequence. It is enough to know that the description in the first 16 verses applies to Jerusalem, and in the last 16 to Zion, or the City of David: as this is sufficient to explain almost all the difficult.
Topography of the Bible.
IX. Waters of Jerusalem. — The above determination explains most of the difficulties in understanding what is said in the Bible with regard to the water-supply of the city. Like Mecca, Jerusalem seems to have been in all ages remarkable for some secret source of water, from which it was copiously supplied during even the worst periods of siege and famine, and which never appears to have failed during any period of its history. The principal source of this supply seems to have been situated to the north; either on the spot known as the “camp of the Assyrians,” or in the valley to the northward of it. The earliest distinct mention of these springs is in 2 Chr. xxxii. 4, 30, where Hezekiah, fearing an attack from the Assyrians, “stopped the upper water-course of Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the City of David;” and again “he fortified the city, and brought in water into the midst thereof, and dug the rock with iron, and made wells for water” (Ecclus. xlviii. 17), in other words, he brought the waters under ground down the valley leading from the Damascus Gate, whence they have been traced at Damascus, to a well which he called the “pool,” between “the two walls,” namely, those of the cities of David and Jerusalem. Thanks to the researches of Drs. Robinson and Barclay, we know how correct the description of Tacitus is, when he describes the city as containing, “fons perennis aque et cavati sub terrâ montes,” etc., for great rock-cut reservoirs have been found under the Temple area, and channels connecting them with the fountain of the Virgin, and that again with the pool of Siloam; and many others may probably yet be discovered.

It would appear that originally the overflow from the great reservoir under the Temple area must have been by some underground channels, probably alongside of the great tunnel under the Mosque el Aksa. This may at least be inferred from the form of the ground, as well as from the fact of the southern gate of the Temple being called the Water Gate. This is further confirmed by the fact that when the Caliph Omar was searching for the Sakrah or Holy Rock, which was then covered with filth by the Christians (Jebel Alhûn, p. 174), he was impeded by the water which “ran down the steps of the gate, so that the greater part of the steps were under water:” a circumstance which might very well occur if these channels were obstructed or destroyed by the ruins of the Temple. Of course, if it is attempted to apply this tradition to the Sakrah under the “Dome of the Rock;” it is simply absurd; as, that being the highest point in the neighborhood, no water could lie around it: but applying it to the real Sakrah under the Aksa, it is not only consistent with facts, but enables us to understand one more circumstance with regard to the waters of Jerusalem. It will require, however, a more critical examination than even that of Dr. Barclay before we can feel quite certain by which channel the underground waters were collected into the great “excavated sea” (wood-cut No. 4) under the Temple, or by what exact means the overflow was managed.

A considerable portion of these waters was at one time diverted to the eastward to the great reservoir known sometimes as the pool of Bethsaida, but, from its probable proximity to the Sheep Gate, as shown above, more properly the “piscina protetica,” and which, from the curiously elaborate character of its hydraulic masonry, must always have been intended as a reservoir of water, and never could have been the ditch of a fortification. From the wood-cut No. 8 it will be perceived that the masonry consists first of large blocks of stone, 18 or 20 inches square, marked A. The joints between their courses have been hollowed out to the depth of 8 inches, and blocks 16 inches deep inserted in them. The interstices are then filled up with smaller stones, 8 inches deep, b. These are covered with a layer of coarse plaster and concrete, (C), and this again by a fine coating of plaster (D) half an inch in thickness. It is impossible to conceive such elaborate pains being taken with a ditch of a fortress, even if we had any reason to suppose that a wet ditch ever formed part of the fortifications of Jerusalem; but its locality, covering only one half of one side of the assumed fortress, is sufficient to dispose of that idea, even if no other reason existed against converting this carefully formed pool into a ditch of defense.

It seems, however, that even in very ancient times this northern supply was not deemed sufficient, even with all these precautions, for the supply of the city; and consequently large reservoirs were excavated from the rock, at a place near Eltham, now known as Solomon’s pools, and the water brought from them by a long canal which enters the city above Siloam, and, with the northern supply, seems at all times to have been sufficient for the consumption of its limited population, aided of course by the rain water, which was probably always stored in cisterns all over the town. The tank now known as the pool of Hezekiah, situated near the modern church of the Holy Sepulchre, cannot possibly be the work referred to, as executed by him. It is merely a receptacle within the walls for the surplus rain water drained into the pool now known as the Bir ket Manufi, and as no outlet eastwards or towards the Temple has been found, it cannot ever have been of the importance ascribed to the work of Hezekiah, even supposing the objections to the locality did not exist. These, however, cannot possibly be got over. [See § IV., Amer. ed.]

X. Site of Holy Sepulchre. — If the preceding investigations have rendered the topography of the ancient city at all clear, there ought to be no difficulty in determining the localities mentioned in the of the rock, expresses no doubt or uncertainty about the matter. In order to insult the Christians according to his account (Vita Const., iii. 26), "impious persons had heaped earth upon it, and erected an idol temple on the site." The earth was removed, and he says (Theophanis, Lee's Translation, p. 199), "it is astonishing to see even the rock standing out crest and alone on a level land, and having only one house built, and there being many, the miracle of Him who overcame death might have been obscured;" and as if in order that there might be no mistake as to its position, he continues, "Accordingly on the very spot that witnessed our Saviour's sufferings a new Jerusalem was constructed over against the one so celebrated of old, which since the foul stain of guilt brought on it by the murder of the Lord has experienced the last extremity of desolation. It was opposite this city that the emperor began to rear a monument of our Saviour's victory over death with rich and lavish magnificence" (Vita Const. iii. 33). This passage ought of itself to be sufficient to set the question at rest, for it is minutely descriptive of the site of the building now known as the Mosque of Omar, but wholly inapplicable to the site of the present church, which was known as "the tombs of those in the time of Titus or of Herod have been within the walls of the city of Jerusalem, and neither opposite to nor over against it.

The buildings which Constantine or his mother, Helena, erected, will be more particularly described elsewhere (Sepulchre); in the mean while it is sufficient to say that it will be proved by what follows, that two of them now remain—the one the Anastasis, a circular building erected over the tomb itself; the other the "Golden Gateway," which was the propylaeum described by Eusebius as leading to the atrium of the basilica. He says it opened "στην ταύτης θαυμασίας ἀγγέλειαν," in other words, that it had a broad market-place in front of it, as all sacred places or places of pilgrimage had, and have, in the East. Beyond this was an atrium leading to the basilica. This was destroyed in the end of the tenth century by a great fire, but was described by Eusebius, in the words of William of Tyre (lib. i. e. iv.), "usque ad solum diluuit," or as it is more quaintly expressed by Albericus (Le Quien, Origines Christianae, p. 475), "Solo coemarent mandavit." Fortunately, however, even the Moslems respected the tomb of Christ, whom they consider one of the seven prophets, inferior only to the Founder of their own religion; and they left the "Home of the Rock" unjured as we now see it.

In order to prove these assertions, there are three classes of evidence which may be appealed to, and which must coincide, or the question must remain still in doubt:

First, it is necessary that the circumstances of the locality should accord with those of the Bible narrative.

Secondly, the incidental notices furnished by those travellers who visited Jerusalem between the time of Constantine and that of the Crusades must be descriptive of these localities:

Thirdly, the architectural evidence of the buildings themselves must be that of the age to which they are assigned.

Taking the last first, it is hardly necessary to remark how important this class of evidence has become in all questions of this sort of late years. Before the gradation of styles had been properly investigated nothing could be more wild than the DETERMINATION of the dates assigned to all the medieval buildings of Europe. Now that the chronometric scale has been fixed, nothing is either so easy or so certain as to fix the date of any building, or any part of one, and it is admitted by all archæologists that it is the most sure and conclusive evidence that can be adduced on the subject.

In this country the progress of style is only generally understood as applied to medieval buildings, but with sufficient knowledge it is equally applicable to Indian, Mohammedan, Classical, or Roman, in fact to all true styles, and no one who is familiar with the gradation of styles that took place between the time of Hadrian and that of Justinian can fail to see that the Golden Gateway and Dome of the Rock are about half-way in the series, and are in fact buildings which must have been erected within the century in which Constantine flourished. With regard to the Golden Gateway, which is practically unaltered, this is undoubted. It is precisely of that style which is found only in the buildings of the end of the third, or beginning of the fourth century, and accords so completely with those found at Rome, Spalatro, and elsewhere, as to leave no reasonable doubt on the subject. Had it been as early as the time of Hadrian, the best entablature which covers both the external and internal openings could not have existed, while had it been as late as the age of Justinian, its classical features would have been exchanged for the peculiar incised style of his buildings. It may also be remarked that, although in the outer wall, it is a festal, not a fortified entrance, and never could have been intended as a city gate, but must have led to some sacred or palatial edifice. It is difficult, indeed, to suggest what that could have been, except the basilica described by Eusebius.

That it was possible to put this evidence aside, the most plausible suggestion is to appeal to the presumed historical fact that it was built by Omar, or by the Moslems at all events. There is, however, no proof whatever of this assumption. What Omar did build is the small mosque on the east of the Aksa, overhanging the southern wall, which is often mentioned in the time of the Crusades. It may also be added that, whatever it is, it certainly is not a mosque. The principal and essential feature in all these buildings is the Kiblah, or niche pointing towards Mecca. No mosque in the whole world, of whatever shape or form, is without this; but in the place where it should be in this building is found the principal entrance, so that the worshipper enters with his back to Mecca—a sacrilege which the Mohammedans, if this were a mosque, would be impossible. Had it been called the Tomb of Omar, this incongruity would not have been apparent, for all the old Moslem and Christian tombs adopt nearly the same ordinance; but no tradition links the Emperor Omar or any Moslem saint was ever buried within its precincts.

Nor will it answer to assume, as is generally done, that it was built in the first century of the Hegira over the Sacred Rock of the Temple; for from the account of the Moslem and Christian historians of the time it is quite evident that at that time the site and dimensions of the Jewish Temple could be ascertained, and were known. As shown above this building certainly always was outside the limits of the Temple, so that this could not be the object of its erection. The Mosque of Omar properly so called, the great Mosque el-Aksa, the mosques of the Moghulins and of Abu Bekr, are all within the limits of the old Temple, and were meant to be so (see wood-cut No. 4). They are so because in all ages the Mohammedans held the Jewish Temple to be a sacred spot, as certainly as the Christians held it to be sacred, and all their sacred buildings stood within its precincts; and as we now know there was nothing in Jerusalem of a sacred character built by the Mohammedans outside the four walls of the Temple anterior to the recovery of the city by Saladin.

Irrefragable as this evidence appears to be, it would be impossible to maintain it otherwise than by assuming that Constantine blindly adopted a wrong locality, if the sites now assumed to be true were such as did not accord with the details of the Bible narratives: fortunately, however, they agree with them to the minutest detail.

To understand this it is necessary to bear in mind that at the time of the crucifixion the third wall, or that of Agrippa (as shown in Plate II.), did not exist, but was commenced twelve years afterwards: the spot where the Dome of the Rock therefore now stands was at that time outside the walls, and open to the country. It was also a place where certain tombs did exist. It has been shown above that the sepulchres of David and the other kings of Israel were in this neighborhood. We know from Josephus (B. J. v. 7, § 3) that "John and his faction defended themselves from the Tower of Antonia, and from the northern cloister of the Temple, and fought the Romans before the monument of king Alexander:"

so that there certainly were tombs hereabouts; and there is a passage in Jeremiah (xxvi. 38-40) which apparently describes prophetically the building of the third wall and the inclosure of the northern parts of the city from Garb — most probably the hill on which Zeophinos stood to Gethseman, which is mentioned as in immediate juxtaposition to the Horse Gate of the Temple, out of which the wicked queen Athaliah was taken to execution; and the description of "the whole valley of the dead bodies and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook of Kidron, and the corner of the horse-gate toward the east," is in itself sufficient to prove that this locality was then, as it is now, the great cemetery of Jerusalem; and as the sepulchre was nigh at hand to the place of execution (John xix. 42), every probability exists to prove that this may have been the scene of the Passion.

The Prætorium where Christ was judged was most probably the Antonia, which at that time, as before and afterwards, was the citadel of Jerusalem and the residence of the governors, and the Xystus and Council-house were certainly, as shown above, in this neighborhood. Leaving these localities the Saviour, bearing his cross, must certainly have gone towards the country, and might well meet Simon or any one coming towards the city; thus every detail of the description is satisfied, and none offended by the locality now assumed.

The third class of evidence is from its nature by no means so clear, but there is nothing whatever in it to contradict, and a great deal that directly confirms the above statements. The earliest of the travellers who visited Jerusalem after the discovery of the Sepulchre by Constantine is one known as the Bordeaux pilgrim; he seems to have visited the place about the year 333. In his itinerary, after describing the palace of David, the Great Synagogue, and other objects inside the city, he adds, "Hodie ut est loco mundi de Sion sanctus ad Portum Neopolitam ad partem dextram decemam in valle sunt parietes ubi dominus fuit sive palatium Pontii Pilati. Hic Dominus auditis est antequam patiaret. A sinistra autem parte est monticulus Golgota, ubi Dominus crucifixus est. Inde quasi ad lapidem museum est eripita ubi corpus ejus posi-

From this it is evident that passing out of the ancient Zion Gate he turned round the outside of the walls to the left. Had he gone to the right, past the Jaffa gate, both the ancient and modern Golgotha would have been on his right hand; but passing round the Temple area he may have had the house of Pilate on his right in the valley, where some traditions placed it. He must have had Golgotha and the Sepulchre on his left, as he describes them. In so far as the text is testing one, it is clear he was not speaking of the modern Golgotha, which is inside the city, while the very expression "foris murum" seems to indicate what the context confirms, that it was a place on the verge of the city, and on the left hand of one passing round the walls, or in other words the place marked on the accompanying map.

Antoninus Martyr is the only other traveller whose works have come down to us, who visited the city before the Mohammedan conquest: his description is not sufficiently distinct for much reliance to be placed on it, though all it does say is more in accordance with the eastern than the western site: but he incidentally supplies one fact. He says, "Juxta ipsum altare est crypta ubi sì ponas aureas flumen aquarum, et si jactas ilunas ponas antiquum natura potest et vade ad Sanctum Siloam et ibi illud suscipies" (Ant. Mart. Hin. p. 14).

There is every reason to believe, from the researches of Drs. Robinson and Barclay, that the whole of the Haram area is excavated with subterranean water-channels, and that therefore if you place your ear almost anywhere you may hear the flowing of the water; and all these waters can only drain out towards Siloam. We also know that under the cave in the Dome of the Rock there is a well, called the Bahr Arwah, and that it does communicate with the great excavated road in front of the Akse, and that its overflow is towards Siloam, so that if an apple were dropped into it, in so far as we now know, it would come out there. If we presume that Antoninus was speaking of the present sepulchre the passage is utterly unintelligible. There is no well, and no trace has ever been discovered of any connection, it is with Siloam. As far as our present knowledge goes, this objection is in itself fatal to the modern site.

A third and most important narrative has been preserved to us by Adamnanus, an abbot of Iona, who took it down from the mouth of Arelius, a French bishop who visited the Holy Land in the end of the seventh century. He not only describes, but gives from memory a plan of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, but without any very precise indication of its locality. He then describes the Mosque el-Aksa as a square building situated on the site of the Temple of Solomon, and with details that leave no doubt as to its identity; but either he omits all mention of the Dome of the Rock, which certainly was then, as it is now, the most conspicuous and most important building in Jerusalem; or the inference is inevitable, that he has already described it under the designation of the Church of the Sepulchre, which the whole context would lead us to infer was really the case.

Beside these, there are various passages in the writings of the Fathers which are unintelligible if we assume that the present church was the one built by Constantine. Douillet, for instance (l. 1, § 7), says, that owing to the steepness of the ground, or to the hill or valley, to the westward of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre it had only its one wall far that side; "Έκχει δ' αὐτό τὸ άγειν ταφον κατὰ μὲν τὴν δυτικὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱεροῦ καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ τοῖχου αὐτοῦ." This cannot be applied to the present church, inasmuch as towards the west in that locality there is space for any amount of building; but it is literally correct as applied to the so-called Dome of the Rock, which does stand so near the edge of the valley between the two towns that it would be impossible to erect any considerable building there.

The illuminated Cross, mentioned by St. Cyril (Epist. ad Const.), is unintelligible, unless we assume the Sepulchre to have been on the side of the city next to the Mount of Olives. But even more distinct than this is a passage in the writings of St. Epiphanius, writing in the 4th century, who speaking of golgotha, says, "It does not occupy an elevated position as compared with other places surrounding it. Over against it, the Mount of Olives is higher. Again, the hill that formerly existed in Zion, but which is now leveled, was once higher than the sacred spot." As we cannot be sure to which hill he applies the name, Zion, no great stress can be laid on that; but no one acquainted with the localities would speak of the modern Golgotha as over against the Mount of Olives. So far therefore, as this goes, it is in favor of the proposed view.

The slight notices contained in other works are hardly sufficient to determine the question one way or the other, but the mass of evidence adduced above would probably never have been questioned, were it not that from the time of the Crusades down to the present day (which is the period during which we are really and practically acquainted with the history and topography of Jerusalem), it is certain that the church in the Latin quarter of the city has always been considered as containing the tomb of Christ, and as being the church which Constantine erected over the sacred cave; and as no record exists — nor indeed is it likely that it should — of a transference of the site, there is a difficulty in persuading others that it really took place. As however there is nothing to contradict, and nothing to confirm the assumption that a transference did take place about this time, it is not important to the argument whether or not we are able to show exactly how it took place, though nothing seems to be more likely or natural under the circumstances.

Architecturally, there is literally no feature or [and] no detail which would induce us to believe that any part of the present church is older than the time of the Crusades. The only things in the list of more ancient date are the fragments of an old classical cornice, which are worked in as st.ing courses with the Gothic details of the external façade, and singularly enough this cornice is identical in style with, and certainly belongs to the age of the Golden Gateway and Dome of the Rock, and consequently can scarcely be anything else than a fragment of the old basilica, which el-Hakim had destroyed in the previous century, and the remains of which must still have been scattered about when the Crusaders arrived.

It is well known that a furious persecution of the Christians was carried on, as above mentioned, at the end of the 10th century. Their great basilica was destroyed, their tomb appropriated, they... were driven from the city, and dared not approach the holy places under pain of death. As the persecution relaxed, a few crept back to their old quarter of the city, and there most naturally built themselves a church in which to celebrate the sacred mysteries of Easter. It is not necessary to assume fraud in this proceeding any more than to impute it to those who built spoliated churches in Italy, Spain, or England. Thousands have prayed and wept in these simulated sepulchres all over the world, and how much more appropriately at Jerusalem! Being in the city, and so near the spot, it was almost impossible but that it should eventually come to be assumed that instead of a simulated, it was the true sepulchre, and it would have required more than human virtue on the part of the priests if they had undeceived the unsuspecting pilgrims, whose faith and liberality were no doubt quickened by the assumption. Had the Christians never recovered the city, the difference would never have been discovered in the dark ages; but when unexpectedly those who had knelt and prayed as pilgrims, came back as armed men, and actually possessed the city, it was either necessary to confess the deception or to persevere in it; and, as was too often the case, the latter course was pursued, and hence all the subsequent confusion.

Nothing, however, can be more remarkable than the different ways in which the Crusaders treated the Dome of the Rock and the Mosque el-Aksa. The latter they always called the "Templum seu palatum Solomonis," and treated it with contempt always applied by Christians to anything Jewish. The Mosque was turned into a stable, the buildings into dwellings for knights, who took the title of Knights Templars, from their residence in the Temple. But the Dome of the Rock they called "Templum Domini." (Jacob de Vitry, c. 62; Sawulf, Rel. de Voyage, iv. 834; Mansedeville, Toning, etc., 100, 105; Mar. Sanutz, iii. xiv. 9; Brecon, vi. 1047.) Priests and a choir were appointed to perform service in it, and during the whole time of the Christian occupation it was held and served as sacred, if not more so, than the church of the Holy Sepulchre in the town. (Will. of Tyre, viii. 3.) Had they believed or suspected that the rock was that on which the Jewish temple stood it would have been treated as the Aksa was, but they knew that the Dome of the Rock was a Christian building, and sacred to the Saviour; though in the uncritical spirit of the age they never seem exactly to have known either what it was, or by whom it was erected. [See § IV. Amer. ed.]

X. Rebuilding of the Temple by Julian.—Before leaving the subject, it is necessary to revert to the attempt of Julian the Apostate to rebuild the Temple of the Jews. It was undertaken avowedly as a slight to the Christians, and with the idea of establishing a counterfeit to the influence and position they had attained by the acts of Constantine. It was commenced about six months before his death, and during that period the work seems to have been pushed forward with extraordinary activity under the guidance of his friend Alypius. Not only were large sums of money collected for the purpose, and an enormous concourse of the Jews assembled on the spot, but an immense mass of materials was brought together, and the stones of the foundations at least carried vigorously on during this period of excitement, before the miracle occurred, which put a final stop to the undertaking. Even if we have not historical evidence of these facts, the appearance of the south wall of the Haram would lead us to expect that something of the sort had been attempted at this period. As before mentioned, the great tunnel-like vault under the Mosque el-Aksa, with its four-domed vestibule, is almost certainly part of the temple of Herod [see Temple], and coeval with his period, but externally to this, certain architectural decorations have been added (wood-cut No. 10), and that so slightly, that daylight can be perceived between the old walls and the subsequent decorations, except at the points of attachment. It is not difficult to ascertain, approximately at least, the age of these adjuncts. From their classical forms they cannot be so late as the time of Justinian; while on the other hand they are slightly more modern in style than the architecture of the Golden Gateway, or than any of the classical details of the Dome of the Rock. They may therefore with very tolerable certainty be ascribed to the age of Julian, while, from the historical accounts, they are just such as we would expect to find them. Above them an inscription bearing the name of Hadrian has been inserted in the wall, but turned upside down; and the whole of the masonry being of that intermediate character between that which we know to be ancient and that which we easily recognize as the especially for the writer on the spot, or to which he owes much of the information detailed above, though it has been impossible to refer to it on all occasions.

a This fact the writer owes, with many other valuable indications, to the observation of his friend Mr. G. Moore. The wood-cut, etc., is from a large photograph which, with many others, was taken.

work of the Mohammedans, there can be little doubt but that it belongs to this period.

Among the incidents mentioned as occurring at this time is one bearing rather distinctly on the topography of the site. It is said (Gregory Nazianzen, ad Jud. et Gent. 7, 1, and confirmed by Sozomen) that when the workmen were driven from their works by the globes of fire that issued from the foundations, they sought refuge in a neighboring church (ἐν τῷ παρείῳ ἑπάνω, or, as Sozomen has it, εἰς τὸ ἑπάνω) — an expression which would be unintelligible did not the buildings of Constantine exist at that time on the spot; for, except these, there could not be any church or sacred place in the neighborhood to which the expression could be applied. The principal bearing, however, of Julian's attempt on the topography of Jerusalem consists in the fact of its proving not only that the site of the Jewish Temple was perfectly unmistakably to the spot near to which it must have stood, that almost all topographers have jumped to the conclusion that the Mosque el-Aksa is the identical church referred to. Apart from the consideration already mentioned, the architecture of that building is alone sufficient to refute any such idea. No seven-aisled basilica was built in that age, and least of all by Justinian, whose favorite plan was a dome on pendentives, which in fact, in his age, had become the type of an Oriental Church. Besides, the Aksa has noapse, and, from its situation, never could have had either that or any of the essential features of a Christian basilica. Its whole architecture is that of the end of the 7th century, and its ornament is essentially that of a mosque. It is hardly necessary to argue this point, however, as the Aksa stands on a spot which was perfectly known then, and ever afterwards, to be the very centre of the site of Solomon's Temple. Not only this shown from Julian's attempt, but all the historians, Christian and Mohammedan, who refer to Omar's visit to Jerusalem, relate that the Sakkrah was covered with filth and abhorred by the Christians; and more than this, we have the direct testimony of Eutychius, writing in the 9th century, from Alexandria (Annales, ii. 289), “That the Christians had built no church within the area of the Temple on account of the denunciations of the Lord, and had left it in ruins.”

Notwithstanding this there is no difficulty in fixing on the site of this church, inasmuch as the vaults that fill up the southeastern angle of the Haram area are almost certainly of the age of Justinian (wood-cuts Nos. 3, 4), and are just such as

\[\] The only authentic historical fact, under this head, is that the emperor Julian made an abortive attempt to rebuild the Temple.

S. W
Procopius describes: so that if it were situated at the northern extremity of the vaults, all the arguments that apply to the Aeks equally apply to this situation.

We have also direct testimony that a church did exist here immediately after Justinian’s time in the following words of Ant. Martyr. "Ante ruinas vero templi Solomonis aqua decoratur ad fontem Sicon, sequo porticum Solomonis in ecclesin est sedes, sequo Pratum quando ambit Dominum." (Hin. p. 16). As the position of Solomon was the eastern portico of the Temple, this exactly describes the position of the church in question.

But whether we assume the Aeks, or a church outside the Temple, on these vaults, to have been the Mary church of Justinian, how comes it that Justinian chose this remote corner of the city, and so a difficult site, for the erection of his church? Why did he not go to the quarter where, if the modern theory be correct — all the sacred localities of the Christians were grouped together in the middle of the city? The answer seems inevitable: that it was because in those times the Sepulchre and Golgotha were here, and not on the spot to which the Sepulchre with his Mary-church have subsequently been transferred. It may also be added, that the fact of Justinian having built a church above the spot of Mount Zion, is in itself insufficient to prove that in his age the site and dimensions of the Jewish Temple were known, and also that the localities immediately outside the Temple were then considered as sacred by the Christians.

[See § IV., Amer. ed.]

XIII. Conclusion. — Having now gone through all the principal sites of the Christian edifices, as they stand prior to the destruction of the churches by el-Hakeem, the plan (No. 4) of the area of the Haram will be easily understood. Both Constantine’s and Justinian’s churches having disappeared, of course the restoration of these is partly conjectural. Nothing now remains in the Haram area but the Mohammedan buildings situated within the area of Solomon’s Temple. Of the Christian buildings which once existed there, there remain only the inaccessible precipices of Constantine — now known as "the Mosque of Omar" and "the Dome of the Rock" — certainly the most interesting; as well as one of the most beautiful Christian buildings in the East, and a small but equally interesting little domical building called the Little Sakhra at the north end of the inclosure, and said to contain a fragment of the rock which the angel sat upon, and which closed the door of the sepulchre (Ali Bey, ii. 225). These two buildings are entire. Of Constantine’s church we have only the festal entrance, known as the Golden Gateway, and of Justinian’s only the substructions.

It is interesting to compare this with a plan of the city (woodcut No. 11) made during the Crusades, and copied from a manuscript of the twelfth century, in the Library at Brusel. It gives the traditional sacred precincts much as they are now with the exception of St. Stephen’s Gate, which was the name then applied to that now known as the Damascus Gate. The gate which now bears its name was then known as that of the Valley of Jehoshaphat. The "Temple of Solomon," i.e. the Mosque of el Aksa, is divided by a wide street from that of our Lord; and the Sepulchre is represented as only a smaller copy of its prototype within the Haram area, but very few in area, so as to say the least of it.

Having now gone through the main outlines of the topography of Jerusalem, in so far as the limits of this article would admit, or as seems necessary for the elucidation of the subject, the many details which remain will be given under their separate titles, as Temple, Tomb, Palace, etc. It only remains, before concluding, to recapitulate here that the great difficulties which seem hitherto to have rendered the subject confused, and in fact inexplicable, were (1) the improper application of the name to the northern hill, and (2) the assumption that the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre was built by Constantine.

The moment we transfer the name, Zion, from the western to the eastern hill, and the scenes of the Passion from the present site of the Holy Sepulchre to the area of the Haram, all the difficulties disappear: and it only requires a little patience, and perhaps in some instances a little further investigation on the spot, for the topography of Jerusalem to become as well, or better established, than that of any city of the ancient world.

* IV. TOPOGRAPHY OF THE CITY.

It will be seen from the preceding that the two points in the topography of Jerusalem which Mr. Ferguson regarded as demanding special elucidation — the position of Mount Zion, and the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. With reference to both, he has advanced theories which are original — theories which not only have not been breached before, and are unsupported by a single tradition, but which, so far as is known, contradict the previous impressions of the Christian world. Speculations so novel respecting localities so prominent in the history of the sacred city, naturally awaken the reader’s surprise and suspicion, and demand a candid scrutiny.

We will examine these points separately —

I. Mount Zion. — Mr. Ferguson’s theory is, that the Mount Zion of the sacred writers is not "the western hill on which the city of Jerusalem now stands, and in fact always stood," but "the eastern hill, or that on which the Temple stood."

On this point we will consider —

(1) The testimony of the Sacred Scriptures. —

The sacred historian says, "As for the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Israel could not drive them out, but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day." (Josh. xv. 63). Four hundred years later, "David and all Israel went to Jerusalem, which is Jebus, where the Jebusites were, the inhabitants of the land. And the inhabitants of Jebus said to David, Thou shalt not come hither. Nevertheless, David took the castle of Zion, which is the City of David. And David dwelt in the castle: therefore they called it, The City of David'" (1 Chr. xi. 4, 5, 7). Here was his citadel, and here his residence; and hence the frequent allusions in the Bible to the towers, bastions, and palaces of Zion. A few years later, "David made him houses in the City of David, and prepared a place for the ark of God, and pitched for it a tent." "So they brought the ark of God, and set it in the midst of the tent that David had pitched for it" (1 Chr. xv. 1). Thirty years after, "Solomon began to build the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, in Mount Moriah" (2 Chr. iii. 1). Seven years later, "Solomon approached the site of the Mount Moriah, the site of the ark of the covenant of the Lord, out of the City of David, which is Zion" (2 Chr. v. 2), and then fol-
The account of their removing the ark and depositing it in the Temple.

From this it is clear that the Jebusite stronghold which David stormed, and where he dwelt, was Zion, or the City of David: that the ark of the covenant was brought to this spot, and from it was transferred to the Temple on Mount Moriah; and that Mount Moriah, the site of the Temple, could not have been identical with Zion, the City of David. This view appears on the face of the narrative, and there is not a passage of Scripture which conflicts with it, or which it renders difficult or obscure.

Mr. Fergusson says, "There are a number of passages in which Zion is spoken of as a holy place, in such terms as are never applied to Jerusalem, and which can only be applied to the holy Temple Mount." Surely, no straws can be too elevated to be applied to the mount on which the tabernacle was pitched, and where the ark of the covenant stood — the seat of the theocracy, the throne alike of David and of David's Lord, the centre of dominion and of worship. Indeed, the verse quoted, "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion," could only be affirmed of that western hill which was the royal residence. The same may be said of the verse quoted as specially difficult, on the received theory, in its allusion to the "sides of the north," the reference here being to the lofty site of the city; and to one who approaches it from the south, the precipitous brow of Zion invests the description with a force and beauty which would be lost by a transfer to the other eminence.

It is, moreover, a mistaken impression that greater sanctity is ascribed to Zion than to Jerusalem, or that the two names are, in this respect, carefully distinguished. What passage in the Bible recognizes greater sanctity in a locality than the plain-tive apostrophe: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; if I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy"? The Song of songs sets forth the divine beauty of the bride, or loved one, by the simile, "comedy as Jerusalem"; and the call of the evangelical prophet is, "Awake, put on thy strength, O Zion, put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city." The localities are thus constantly declared to be "the Lord in Zion and his praise in Jerusalem." The names are, and may be, used interchangeably, without "grating on the ear"; and the extraordinary assertion, "It is never said, The Lord dwelleth in Jerusalem, or loveth Jerusalem, or any such expression," we meet with the inspired declarations from the Chronicles, the Psalms, and the Prophets, "I have chosen Jerusalem that my name might be there"; "The God of Jacob, whose habitation is in Jerusalem"; "Blessed be the Lord out of Zion, who dwelleth at Jerusalem"; "Thus saith the Lord, I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem." Our Saviour expressly forbade the profanation of the name; and through the force of the same sacred associations, the beloved disciple could find no more fitting type of heaven itself, as he beheld it in vision — the New Jerusalem, the New Jerusalem.

Mr. Fergusson remarks — that the sepulchres of David and his successors were on Mount Zion, or in the City of David, but the wicked king Ahaz, for his crimes, was buried in Jerusalem, "in the city," and not in the sepulchres of the kings. Jehoram narrowly escaped the same punishment, and the distinction is so marked, that it cannot be overlooked." The burial of King Ahaz is thus recorded: "And they buried him in the city, in Jerusalem, but they brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings" (2 Chr. xxvii. 27). That of King Jehoram (which Mr. Fergusson overlooks) is as follows: "They buried him in the City of David, but they buried him not in the sepulchres of the kings" (2 Chr. xxiv. 20). That of King Josiah (which Mr. Fergusson emphasizes) is as follows: "They buried him in the City of David, but they buried him not in the sepulchres of the kings" (2 Chr. xxx. 21). Mr. Fergusson assumes that there is a "marked distinction" between the first and the last two records. We assume that the three accounts are, in substance, identical; and we submit the point to the judgment of the reader, merely adding, that of the three monarchs, Jehoram was apparently the most excrated, and Josaphat, who is silent about the burial of Ahaz, describes that of Jehoram as ignominious.

Mr. Fergusson says, "There are a great many passages in which Zion is spoken of as a separate city from Jerusalem," and addsuces instances in which the Hebrew scholar will recognize simply the parallelism of Hebrew poetry; no more proving that Zion was a separate city from Jerusalem, than the exclamation, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel," proves that Jacob was a separate people from Israel.

The term Zion came, naturally, to be employed both by sacred and profane writers, as the representative of the whole city, of which it formed so prominent a part. It was thus used by the later prophets, quoted above, as also in the Book of the Macabees, where it evidently includes the Temple and adjacent mount.

The passage cited by Mr. Fergusson from Nehemiah (iii. 16) which he pronounces "important," is as follows: "After him repaired Nehemiah the son of Azbuk, the ruler of the half part of Beth-zur, unto the place over against the sepulchres of David, and to the pool that was made, and unto the house of the mighty. These localities, with many others named in the chapter, can only be fixed correctly. On the face of the passage they accord well with the received theory respecting Mount Zion, with which locality Dr. Barclay, after carefully examining the matter on the ground; associates them, and represents the wall here described as running "along the precipitous brow of Zion." (City, etc., pp. 128, 155.) This interpretation has just received strong confirmation, and the case is proceeding (Neh. iii.18) becomes a proof-test in the argument which identifies the ancient City of David with the modern Zion. In this verse mention is made of "the stairs that go down from the City of David," and Mr. Tristram reports the interesting discovery of a flight of steps in the rock, in some excavations made by the Anglican Bishop below the English Cemetery on Mount Zion (Land of Israel). From this, as from the Scripture quotations, Mr. Fergusson's theory derives no support. This dispose of the Biblical testimony.
We will now consider —

"David took the lower city by force, but the citadel held out still" (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2), with the other particulars as already given. He also says, "The city was built upon two hills, and that which contains the upper city, is much higher, and accordingly it was called the citadel by King David" (Ant. xiv. 15, § 2). In the siege by Pompey, one party within counseling resistance and the other submission, the former seized upon the Temple and the bridge which reached from it to the city, and prepared themselves to abide a siege, but the others admitted Pompey's army in, and delivered up both the city and the king's palace to him" (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2), and, having secured these, he laid siege to the Temple, and captured its occupants. In the siege by Herod, when the outer court of the Temple and the lower city were taken, the Jews fled into the inner court of the Temple and into the upper city" (Ant. xiv. 16, § 2). In the siege by Titus, after the lower city had been taken, and it became necessary to raise an embankment against the upper city, "the works were erected on the west side of the city, over against the royal palace" (J. J. vi. 8, § 1). Describing the Temple, Josephus says, "In the western parts of the inclosure of the Temple were four gates, one leading over to the royal palace, the valley between being intercepted to form a passage" (Ant. xx. 11, § 5). He says that "king Agrippa built himself a very large dining-room in the royal palace," from which he "could observe what was done in the Temple"; which so displeased the Jews, that they "erected a wall upon the uppermost building which belonged to the inner court of the Temple, to the west; which wall, when it was built, intercepted the prospect of the dining-room in the palace" (Ant. xx. 8, § 11).

Nothing can be plainer than that the upper city of Josephus is identical with the Zion, or City of David, of the sacred Scriptures; that the citadel and the royal palace were on this western hill; that the Temple was on the lower eastern hill, separated from the western by a deep valley, which was spanned by a bridge; and that the whole the Temple is not identical with the Mount Moriah of the Bible, and distinct from Mount Zion. This view, which is in harmony with the Scriptural view already given, accords also with every other allusion in Josephus to these localities. And the substructions of the bridge above referred to, are the most striking feature in the remains of the modern city. With this, we take leave of Josephus.

(3.) Christian Itineraries.—This brings us to the Christian Itineraries, etc., and their testimony is uniform and unbroken. Except one or two wild speculations, no other Mount Zion has been known, from the days of Eusebius down, than the high western hill of Jerusalem which now bears the name. So late as 1852, Prof. Robinson referred to this as one of the few points "yet unassailed" (Bibl. Res. p. 296). The careful reader of the preceding article, in chiding the "Annals" of the city, will notice the confusion which has been introduced into it by this theory of its "Topography." The writers of the historical portions (Messa, Grove and Wright), both eminent Biblical scholars, have passed over to their fellow-contractor (Mr. Ferguson) most of the topographical points; but it was impossible for them to write an intelligible narrative without contradicting him. From many sentences of the same kind, we select three or four which exhibit the necessary failure of the attempt to harmonize the theory with the facts of history and topography.

"As before, the lower city was immediately taken and, as before, the citadel held out. The undaunted Jebusites believed in the impregnable of their fortress. A crowd of warriors rushed forward, and the citadel, the fastness of Zion, was taken. It is the first time that the same place appears in the history. David at once proceeded to secure it in his new acquisition. He inclosed the whole of the city with a wall, and connected it with the citadel. In the litter he took up his own quarters, and the Zion of the Jebusites became the City of David."—(pp. 1282, 1283.)

"The Temple was at last gained; but it seemed as if half the work remained to be done. The upper city, higher than Moriah, inclosed by the original wall of David and Solomon, and on all sides precipitous, except at the north, where it was defended by the wall and towers of Herod, was still to be taken. Titus first tried a parley, he standing on the east end of the bridge, between the Temple and the upper city, and John and Simon on the west end."—(p. 1287.)

"Acre was situated on the northern side of the Temple, on the same hill, and probably on the same spot occupied by David as the stronghold of Zion."—(p. 1280.)

"There is no passage in the Bible which directly asserts the identity of the hills Zion and Moriah, though [there are] many which cannot well be understood without this assumption. The cumulative proof, however, is such as almost perfectly to supply this want."—(p. 1321.)

The first two extracts are from the historical, and the last two from the topographical, portion of the article; and the reader will see that they are in irreconcilable conflict. Before quitting the theme, let us gather into one sentence such points as are consistent with each other and with known facts and probabilities.

The city or stronghold of the Jebusites was the southernmost part of the western ridge, the highest, most inaccessible, and easily fortified ground in the city; conquered by David, it became his fortified abode: his castle or citadel was here, and remained here; his palace was built here, and through successive reigns and dynasties, down to the Christian era, it continued to be the royal residence: it was the ancient as it is the modern Zion, inclosed by the old wall, the original wall, it was the upper city, the upper market-place; it was here that the ark abode until its removal to the Temple; the royal sepulchres were here; and Moriah was the southern portion of the eastern ridge, and on this the Temple was built. This statement embodies, we believe, the truth of history, and with this we close the discussion of the site of Mount Zion.

We pass now to the other point:

History of the Holy Sepulchre.—Mr. Ferguson's theory is, "that the building now known to Christians as the Mosque of Omar, but by Moslems called the Dome of the Rock, is the identical church which Constantine erected over the rock which contained the tomb of Christ." Since the publication of the preceding article, he has renewed the discussion of this point in a pamphlet," from which we shall also quote, as it contains a more compact summary of his argument.

He concedes, above, the conclusiveness of the argument by which Dr. Robinson has shown that the present church does not cover " the place where the Lord lay." This has been the battle-ground of recent writers on the topography of the city, and the concession renders it unnecessary to adduce here the proofs which the Professor has brought together, and which may be found in his Biblical Researches (in 1833, pp. 204-205, 631-632). The "power of logic" with which they are presented is not affected by any theory which may be held respecting the identity of any other spot. The argument reaches "its legitimate conclusion," alike whether the reader accepts some other site, or whether he regards the true site as beyond the reach of modern discovery. The theory here offered, like the one which we have examined, is novel and startling; and like that, is put forth with much confidence by a writer who has never examined the localities. We submit our reasons for rejecting it; and as we agree with Mr. Ferguson that the site of the church is not the place of our Lord's burial, our interest in the question is purely historical.

Mr. Ferguson's theory fails to explain the present church, a building of great intrinsic and historic interest. When, and by whom were its early foundations laid? Who built up its original walls? For how many centuries has it been palmed upon the public as the Church of the Sepulchre? Has the largest and most remarkable Christian sanctuary in the East, planted in the very centre and cradle of Christian devotion, come down to us without a chronicle or even an intimation of its origin? We repeat that the early history of such an edifice could not, since the Christian era, and in the most conspicuous spot in Christianity, have faded into utter oblivion, like that of some temple of the Old World, around which the sands of the desert had gathered for ages before Christ.

Mr. Ferguson's theory, while failing to account for the existence of the most imposing church in the East, fails also to account for the disappearance of every vestige of another church of imperial veneration. This argument, like the preceding, is not offered by us as independent proof. Church edifices in Palestine, large and small, have been destroyed by violence, or have crumbled by decay. Some of them have been rebuilt or repaired, and perpetuated on their present sites, like that of the Nativity in Bethlehem, or that of the Sepulchre in Jerusalem; and others are clearly traceable, if not impressive, in their ruins, like that of the Baptist in Samaria, that of St. George's in Lydda, that of St. Anne in El-Aksa, and the ancient cathedral church in Tyre. But what church of the largest class has had a history which corresponds with this theory? The emperor Justinian had a passion for church-building, and decorated his metropolis with a majestic temple, which is still its boast. He erected another in Jerusalem, which he designed to be worthy of "the name of the Great King," as of the Virgin Mother, in whose special honor it was built, " on which great expense and labor were bestowed to make it one of the most splendid in the world."

It does not appear to have been disturbed by the subsequent convulsions of the country; writers who describe the injury done to the Church of the Sepulchre in the sack of the city by the Persians, and under the Fatimite Khalifs of Egypt, so far as we know, are silent respecting this edifice. The Mosque el-Aksa, which in accordance with prevalent tradition, is almost universally regarded as the original church of Justinian, Mr. Ferguson appropriates as the Mosque of Abd el-Melek. This leaves the church to be provided for, and in the plan of the Haram area, which he has introduced into the Biblical and republished in his Notes, he places the church of Justinian, and sketches its walls, where not the slightest trace appears of a foundation ancient or modern. It is purely a conjectural site, demanded by the exigencies of his theory, according to which the sacred walls, pillars, and arches of a church described by a contemporary historian, and sketched by Mr. Ferguson as four hundred feet in length and one hundred and more in breadth, have vanished as utterly as if they had been pulverized and scattered to the winds. It has disappeared, withal, from a quarter of the city which was never needed nor used for other purposes, where no dwellings could have encroached upon it, and where no rubbish has accumulated. Considering the character, the location, and the dimensions of this building, and the date of its erection, we hazard the assertion that no parallel to such complete annihilation can be found in the East.

The Mosque of Omar near it, Mr. Ferguson claims to have been converted by the Mussulmen conquerors into a mosque from a church; we advance the same claim for the Mosque el-Aksa; and there were similar transformations, as is well known, of the Church of St. John in Damascus, and of the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, built also by Justinian. Instead of converting to the same use the substantial and splendid church which the same emperor had erected here, what could have prompted the Moslems to obliterate every memorial of it? Within the same inclosure, according to Mr. Ferguson, the "great Anastasia of Constantinople," the present Mosque of Omar, built two centuries earlier, survives in all its essential features. The walls of the octagon still remain untouched in their original form; the circle of colonnades and piers that divide the two aisles, with the entablatures, discharging arches, and cornices, still remain entirely unchanged and untouched; the pier arches of the dome, the triforium belt, the clerestory, are all parts of the unaltered construction of the age of Constantinople." (Note, p. 29). The Mosque of Abd el-Melek, the present el-Aksa, abides within the same inclosure in its original strength. "Its whole architecture is that of the end of the seventh century" (p. 1295). But the church of Justinian, standing by their side in rival glory, mysteriously passed away from that open area — wall and column and arch and architrave — from foundation to top-stone, smitten like the psalmist's bay-tree:

"And lo, it vanished from the ground,
Destroyed by hands unseen;
Nor root, nor branch, nor leaf was found,
Where all that pride had been."

Mr. Ferguson's theory leaves the later history of the church of Justinian enveloped in the same darkness as the earlier history of the Church of the Sepulchre.
The rejecters of his theory recognize this ancient house of worship in the building adjacent to the southern wall of the Haram, two hundred and eighty feet long by one hundred and ninety broad, and with a dome 240 feet in diameter, of which traces are still visible. These, however, are not among the impressive objects which it was our fortune to examine in Jerusalem.

What has been said of Justinian's church may be repeated on his theory respecting the church which he affirms that Constantine built within the sacred enclosure, with walls of beaten gold, and which name has vanished in like manner, except a festal entrance which he identifies with the present Golden Gateway in the eastern wall of the Haram area.

On the hypothesis of a transfer of site, not the Christian world alone, but the Moslem world likewise, has been imposed upon, and by parties who could only see the face of the front gate of the Haram. And it is not surprising that all this has been done subsequent to the seventh century. So late as the close of that century, if this theory is true, all Christians and all Moslems, who knew anything about Jerusalem, knew that the present Mosque of Omar was not then a mosque, and never had been; and that the present Church of the Sepulchre, or one on its site, was not the Church of the Sepulchre. On both sides they have since that date been misled by designing men.

All Christians, residents in Jerusalem, and visitors, so far as is known, have from the first ascribed the site of the present church to the emperor, and all Moslems, residents in Jerusalem and visitors, so far as is known, have from the first ascribed the present mosque to the Khalif, and yet in all these centuries they have alike been the dupes and victims of a double delusion and imposture, commencing we know not when. Can this fact be matched, either in historic annals, or in the fabulous legends of the Dark Ages?

An incident in the Mohammedan conquest of the city, narrated by both Christian and Arabian writers, may properly be cited in this connection. We quote from the historic portion of the article:

"The Khalif, after ratifying the terms of capitulation, which secured to the Christians liberty of worship in the churches which they had, but prohibited the erection of more, entered the city and was met at the gates by the patriarch. Omar then, in company with the patriarch, visited the Church of the Resurrection, and at the Muslim time of prayer knelt down on the eastern steps of the basilica, refusing to pray within the buildings, in order that the possession of them might be secured to the Christians. Tradition relates that he requested a site whereon to erect a mosque for the Mohammedan worship, and that the patriarch offered him the spot occupied by the reputed stone of Jacob's vision," etc. (p. 1310).

Passing by the tradition, we have the historic fact that the Khalif declined entering the church, for the reason above given, stated in almost the same words by another writer: "In order that his followers might have no pretext to claim possession of the church after his departure, under the pretense that he had worshipped in it." (Riab. Res. ii. 37). Yet if we may believe Mr. Ferguson, this pledged faith, underlaid alike by both parties, and on the testimony of both scrupulously respected at the outset, was afterwards violated without any known pretext a remonstrance violated on the part of Christians, we know not when, history and tradition being both as silent respecting this transaction as in regard to the "area montis," by which the homage of Christiandom was subsequently transferred to another locality.

We pass now to the testimony of early visitors and writers.

Eusebius, who was contemporary with Constantine, and his biographer, represents the church which he built over the supposed sepulchre, as having an open court on the east, towards the gates of Jerusalem, with cloisters on each side and gates in front, "after which, in the midst of the street of the market (or in the middle of the broad market-place) the beautiful propylaea (vestibule) of the whole structure presented to those passing by on the outside the wonderful view of the things seen within." (Vit. Const. iii. 39).

Along the street of the bazaars, east of the present church, which would make their site identical with "the market-place" of Eusebius, and correspond with the position of the propylaea, are three granite columns, the apparent remains of an ancient portico, and which can be referred to no other structure than the church of Constantine. Mr. Ferguson admits that the propylaea of the church "had a broad market-place in front of it," and to Professor Willis's criticism that this would be "ridiculously impossible" where he locates the building, he replies: "There is now an extensive cemetery on the spot in front of this gateway; and where men can bury they can buy; where there is room for tombs, there is room for stalls" (Notes, p. 50). With reference to this locality, we quote Mr. Grove: "The main cemetery of the city seems from an early date to have been where it is still, on the steep slopes of the Valley of the Kidron. Here it was that the fragments of the idol abominations, destroyed by Josiah, were cast out on the graves of the children of the people" (2 K. xxiii. 6), and the valley was always the receptacle for impurities of all kinds" (p. 1279).

Connect with this the fact that the spot was then, as it is now, outside the city, and on its least populous side, and we have the reader to judge what element of absurdity is lacking in Mr. Ferguson's supposition.

The testimony of Eusebius on another point, that of all the other writers, whom Mr. Ferguson depends upon, is thus summed up in his Notes:—

"In so far as the argument is concerned I would be prepared, if necessary, to waive the architectural evidence altogether, and to rest the proof of what is advanced above on any one of the following four points:—

1. The assertion of Eusebius that the new Jerusalem, meaning thereby the buildings of Constantine, was opposite to, and over against, the old city.

2. The position assigned to the Holy Places by the Bordeaux Pilgrim.

3. The connection pointed out by Antoninus between the Bz Arnaq and Silwan.

4. The assumed omission by Arculfus of all mention of the House of the Rock, and, I may add, by the building of a Mary Church by Justinian within the precincts of the Haram area".— (p. 55.)

We will take up in their order and fairly examine the "four points" here named, with which Mr. Ferguson agrees to stand or to fall.

1. The assertion of Eusebius that the new Jerusalem, meaning thereby the buildings of Constantine, was opposite to, and over against, the old city.

The assertion referred to, he quotes as follows: —

"Accordingly on the very spot which witnessed the Saviour's sufferings a new Jerusalem was constructed, over against the one so celebrated of old, which, since the foul stain of guilt brought upon it by the murder of the Lord, had experienced the extremity of desolation. It was opposite the city that the emperor began to rear a monument to the Saviour's victory over death, with rich and lavish magnificence."

To this he adds the following passage from Sozomen:

"The mother of the emperor built a magnificent house of prayer on the place of the sepulchre, founding a new Jerusalem opposite to the old and deserted city."

"The old city," in respect to its dwellings, was divided into two parts, "the upper" and "the lower." The former was on Mount Zion and the latter on Mount Akra, and in the adjacent valleys. The site of the Mosque of Omar is directly opposite to the latter, or to the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which "stands directly on the ridge" (Böhl, Res. i. 391). The site of the Temple and that of the church lie "over against" each other. These are the points which Eusebius is comparing. He does not refer directly to the ruined dwellings of either the upper or the lower city; he refers especially to the deserted ruins of the Temple. By "the new Jerusalem," says Mr. Fergusson, he means "the buildings of Constantine. Exactly — he means these and nothing else. And by "the old Jerusalem" he means the buildings of the Temple, neither more or less. Or rather, while the primary meaning is on each side thus restricted, he intends to designate by the latter the ancient city, of which the Temple was the crown, and by the former, the modern city, of which the church was to be the future glory. The antithesis is complete. The other interpretation makes the comparison incongruous — the old city meaning a collection of buildings, and the new city meaning simply a church. Dr. Stanley has justly observed: "Whatever differences of opinion have arisen about the other hills of Jerusalem, there is no question that the mount on which the Mosque of Omar stands, overhanging the valley of the Kidron, has from the time of Solomon, if not of David, been regarded as the most sacred ground in Jerusalem" (S. de P. p. 177, Amer. ed.). This is the fact which the Christian Fathers recognize, using each locality as, in a religious sense, the representative of the city, when they say that the emperor Constantine "founded a new Jerusalem, opposite to the old and deserted city," a phrase, withal, more applicable to the eastern hill, which was burned over, swept "clear of houses," and was still forsaken, than to the western hill, which had never been thus completely desolated, and was still inhabited. Opposite the deserted site of the Hebrew Temple Constantine reared the Christian sanctuary. This is our interpretation of Eusebius and Socrates; and this disposes of the first point.

His testimony is: —

"Inde sit eas foris murum de Sione etmisibus ad portam Neapolitanam ad partem dextram deorum in valle sunt parietes ubi dominus fuit sive palaestra Pontii Pilati. Ibi Dominus auditus est aequum pateretur. A sinistra autem parte est monticulus Golgota, ubi Dominus crucifixus est. Inde quaedam ad lapidem missum est cripta ubi corpus ejus posita fuit, et tertia die resurrectit. Ibdem modo Jussu Constantini Imperatoris Basilica facta est, id est Dominicum mirae pulchritudinis."

There is no allusion here to a "Zion Gate," and none then existed. (Arculf. i. 1). Had the modern gate been there, no visitor would have passed out of it to go to the opposite side of the city, either to the right or the left, and especially not to the left. It involves, further, the absurd supposition that the governor's house, where the Saviour was arraigned, was in a valley, unprotected, outside of the city, when in the preceding paragraph the writer has asserted that the residence of the governor and the probable scene of the trial was the castle of Antonia.

The natural course of one who passed out of the city northward, going from Zion to the Neapolis Gate, would have been formerly, as now, between the Temple area and the site of the Church of the Sepulchre, near to the latter, and the objects seen would have been in just the relative position in which this traveller describes them.

Mr. Fergusson assumes that this phrase "foris murum" requires us to believe that the visitor's course, here described, from Zion to the Neapolis Gate (called Neapolis then, for the same reason that it is now called Damascus), lay outside of the wall. If so, the reference is to the inner wall along the brow of Zion, the first of the three walls which surrounded this part of the city. This may be the meaning of the barbarous Latin of the old Pilgrim, but far more probably, we think, he means simply what we have indicated above. There never was a road from Zion southward, and no suggestion could be more improbable than that of plunging from Zion into the lower Tyropoeon, outside the city, ascending the opposite slope, and making the long detour by the northeast corner of the city to reach the gate named. The point of destination was northward from Zion, and the Pilgrim says that one who would go beyond the wall, or outside of the city, going from Zion to the Neapolis Gate, would see the objects described, on the right and left. The peculiar construction of the sentence favors this rendering of "foris murum," and we have an authority for it, exactly in point "Foris; in late Latin, with the accusative = de ymou. Constitutis si sit fluvius, qui foris agrum non vagatur." (Andrew's Lex. in loc.). Either of these interpretations we claim to be more natural and probable than Mr. Fergusson's, for the reasons already given; and this disposes of the second point.

"3. The connection pointed out by Antoninus between the Bir Arrosh and Siloam." This testimony is: —

"Near the altar is a crypt, where, if you place your ear, you will hear the flowing of water; and if you throw in an apple, or anything that will swim, and go to Siloam, you will find it there."

In the preceding article, Mr. Fergusson says: "In so far as we know," the connection exists; meaning merely, We do not know that it does not exist. In the Notes he says: "It is, therefore, a fact at this hour," that the connection exists. This is an unsupported assertion. The connection has not been established, and the subterranean watercourses of Jerusalem are still involved in much uncertainty
The witness cited in support of the alleged fact pronounced directly against its probability, and in favor of the opposite theory. Dr. Barclay gives his reasons for believing that the subterranean conduit of Hezekiah was brought down on the west side of the valley running south from the Damoscas Gate, and says that on this hypothesis "it would pass just by the rock Golgotha," the traditional site of the sepulchre, as described by Antoninus (City, etc., pp. 94, 300). Furthermore, in examining the fountain of Siloam, he found a subterranean channel which supplied it, and which he traversed for nearly a thousand feet; and on locating its course, he was "perfectly satisfied that this subterranean canal derived its former supply of water, not from Moriah, but from Zion" (ib. p. 523).

He also says: "If this channel was not constructed for the purpose of conveying to Siloam the surplus waters of Hezekiah's aqueduct, then I am unable to suggest any purpose to which it could have been applied" (ib. p. 309). [Siloam, Aner. ed.] So little countenance, so palpable a contradiction, rather, is given to the "fact" by the witness cited to corroborate it; and this disposes of the third point.

The assumed omission by Arculfus of all mention of the Dome of the Rock, and, I may add, the building of a Mary Church by Justinian within the precincts of the Haram area.

We do not see the bearing of the last-named particular. Churches in honor of the Virgin were erected in many localities, and it is not necessary to account for the selection of this site, though it were easy to conjecture a reason. It proves nothing.

The remaining specification, like the other, is an argument drawn from silence and conjecture, and rates no higher as proof. It runs thus: If this building were then in existence, this visitor must have described it; the building was in existence, and the opposite theory assumes that he did not allude to it; therefore, the current theory is false. We cannot but be struck with the difference between this position and the principle with which Mr. Ferguson professedly started, of "admitting nothing which cannot be proved by direct testimony or by local indications" (p. 1312).

There is no pretense that this argument rests on either of these: it rests on nothing but an unaccountable "omission." And this silence is offered as not merely corroborative evidence, but as vital proof. Mr. Ferguson adds this as one of four points, "any one" of which establishes his theory beyond question. As if the existence of St. Paul's in London, or of St. Peter's in Rome, at any period, would be absolutely disproved by the silence of a visitor respecting either, in a professed description of the objects of interest in the city. At the best, it could only be a natural inference; it could never be proof positive. And here we might rest; for if we proceed no further, Mr. Ferguson's last point is disposed of, and his claim is prostrate.

But we join issue with him, and affirm that what Arculfus describes as the Church of the Sepulchre, was the building standing on the site of the present church, and not the Mosque of Omar, or any part of it. Neither could the "square house of prayer erected at the site of the Temple," have been, as he alleges, the Mosque el-Maka. The phrase "vii fabricati sunt opera," could never have been applied to this structure. The immense quadrangle, rudely built with beams and planks over the remains of ruins as described by the bishop, would seem to be a natural account of the building erected by the Khalif Omar over the rock es-Sukkrah, as Dr. Barclay suggests, which in the course of half a century gave place to the present elegant octagonal edifice, erected by Abi el-Molch (City, etc., p. 336). If the assigned date of the completion of the latter edifice is correct, this would serve to fix more definitely the date of Arculfus' visit, which is only known to have been "in the latter part of the seventh century" (Wright's Introduction, p. xii., Robinson's ed.).

In the Bishop's description of "the Church of the Holy Sepulchre," whatever other changes may have taken place, we have a crucial test of the identity of the building described with the church or the mosque, in the account of the cave which was the reputed tomb of the Saviour. For this, together with that of William, a few years later, and that of Saward, still later, we refer the reader to Bible Sacra, xxiv. 137, 138.

The sepulchral cave of the church, described by these writers, Mr. Ferguson claims to have been the cave in the rock es-Sukkrah, beneath the dome of the present Mosque of Omar. This rock has been the most stationary landmark in Jerusalem, and has probably changed as little as any other object. And it is the only event which accounts for the cave within it, we refer the reader to Bible Sacra, xxiv. 138, 139.

It is not credible that these and the preceding all refer to the same excavation. The narrative of Arculfus can be adjusted to the present Church of the Sepulchre and its reputed tombs, making due allowance for the changes wrought by the destruction of the building. But by no practicable change, by no possibility, can it be adjusted to the rock es-Sukkrah and the cave beneath it; and this disposes of the fourth point.

We have now completed our examination of Mr. Ferguson's "four points." He offered to "rest the proof" of his theory "on any one" of them; and we have shown that on a fair investigation not one of them sustains his theory in a single particular, and for the most part they positively refute it. There remains an objection to this theory, as decisive as any, which can be best appreciated by those who have been on the ground. The site of the so-called Mosque of Omar could not have been, in our Saviour's day, outside of the walls. The theory would break up the solid masonry of the ancient substructions of the Temple area, still existing, making one portion modern and the other ancient, leaving one without the city, and retaining the other within it, in a way which is simply incredible. Whatever may have been the bearings and dimensions of the Temple, with its courts and porticoes, in the inclosure above, the massive foundations of the area are one work, and that a work of high antiquity. The immense beveled stones in the southeast corner were laid at the same time with the stones in the northwest corner. They are of the same magnitude, and it does not need the eye of an architect to assure us that they are of the same age and style of workmanship. They were the two extremities of the ancient southern wall, as they are of the modern, stretching, as Josephus informs us, from valley to valley, and laid with stones "immoveable for all time;" and to-day they confirm his testimony, and contradict this theory. "We are led irresistibly to the conclusion," said Dr. Robinson, on his first visit, "that the area of the Jewish temple was identical on its western and southern sides, with the present enclosure of the Haram. " Ages upon ages have rolled away, yet these foundations endure, and are immovable as at the beginning" (Bibl. Res. i. 427). The investigations of his second visit confirmed the conclusion of his first, from which we see not how any visitor who has inspected this masory can withhold his assent that in the southwest corner, in the southern part of the western wall, in the southeast corner on both sides, and along the southern wall, we have before us "the massive sub-structions of the ancient Jewish Temple. Such has been the impression received by travellers for centuries, and such it will probably continue to be so long as these remain endure" (Bibl. Res. (382) 220).

These are our main reasons for rejecting Mr. Fergusson's theory of the Topography of Jerusalem, in its two principal points: and if these points are untenable, almost the entire reasoning of his section of the article falls with them.

S. W.

V. Modern Jerusalem. - Walls and Gates. - The present walls of Jerusalem are not older than the 16th century, though the materials of which they are built belonged to former walls and are much more ancient. They consist of heewn stones of a moderate size, laid in mortar. They are 4 built for the most part with a breastwork; that the exterior face of the wall is carried up several feet higher than the interior part of the wall, leaving a broad and convenient walk along the top of the latter for the accommodation of the defenders. This is protected by the parapet or breastwork, which has battlements and loopholes. There are also flights of steps to ascend or descend at convenient distances on the inside (Rob. Bibl. Res. i. 352). The walls embrace a circuit of about 28 miles. On the west, south, and east sides they stand generally as near the edge of the valleys as the ground will allow: except that the southern extremity of Zion and a part of Moriah (known as Ophel) being outside of the city, the walls there run across the ridge of those hills. They vary in height from 20 to 50 feet, according to the depth of the ravines below, which formed an important part of the natural defenses of the city. The inner face of the wall is therefore, where the ground is more open and level, are protected to some extent by ditches or trenches. It is a peculiarity of a part of this northern wall that it consists of a mass of natural rock, 75 feet high, with strata so exactly corresponding with those of the opposite ledge that the passage between them must be artificial. It may have been a quarry for obtaining stones for the walls of the city. Fortifications of this character, surmounted as they are by higher positions in the vicinity, would be utterly useless against European tactics. Yet, imperfect as they are in this respect, these walls so notched with battlements and seeming to rise and fall (like a waving line) with the de-divilities of the ground, especially as they suddenly show themselves to the traveller approaching the city from the west, form a picturesque oriental sight, never to be forgotten.

Four gates are present in use, which look towards the cardinal points. Though they bear other names among the natives, they are known to travellers as the Yifta (Joppa) Gate on the west side, the Damascus Gate on the north side, the Gate of St. Stephen on the east, and of Zion on the south. The first two are so called after the places which the roads starting from them lead: that of St. Stephen from a popular belief that this martyr was put to death in that quarter, and that of Zion from its situation on the hill of this name. Near the Damascus Gate are the remains of towers, supposed by Robinson to have been the guard-houses of a gate which stood there as early as the age of Herod. The Yifta Gate forms the main entrance, and on that account is kept open half an hour later than the other gates. The custom of shutting the gates by night (see Rev. xxi. 23-25) is common in eastern cities at the present day. Three or four smaller gates occur in the walls, but have been closed up, and are now seldom or never used. The most remarkable of these is the Golden Gate in the easterm wall which overlooks the Valley of the Kidron. "It is in the centre of a projection 55 feet long and standing out 6 feet. Its portal is double, with semicircular arches profusely ornamented. The Corinthian capitals which sustain the entablature spring like corbels from the wall, and the whole entablature is bent round the arch. The exterior appearance, independently of its architecture, bears no mark of high antiquity . . . . for it bears no resemblance to the massive stones along the lower part of the wall on each side, and indeed the masonry around is sufficiently apparent" (Porter, Handbook, i. 115 f.). The style of architecture, whether the structure occurs on its original site, or has been referred to an early Roman period. [Wood-cut, p. 1325.] It is a saying of the Franks that the Mohammedans have walled up this gate because they believe that a king is to enter by it who will take possession of the city and become Lord of the whole earth (Rob. Bibl. Res. i. 323). It may be stated that the largest stones in the exterior walls, bearing incontrovertible marks of a Hebrew origin, and occupying their original place, are found near the southeast angle of the city and in the substructions of the Castle of David so called, not far from the Yifta Gate, near the centre of the western wall of the city. Some of the alternate courses at the former point measure from 17 to 18 feet in length by 3 or 4 feet in height. One of the stones there is 24 feet in length by 3 feet in height and 6 in breadth. This part of the wall is common both to the Haram and the Temple area. In the stones in the foundations of the Castle is 124 feet long and 3 feet 5 inches broad; though most of them are smaller than those at the southeast angle. The upper part of this Castle or Tower, one of the most imposing structures at Jerusalem, is comparatively modern; but the lower part exhibits a different style of workmanship and is unquestionably ancient, though whether a remnant of Herod's Hippie tower (as Robinson supposes) or not, is still disputed. [P. S. E. STORRIIUM.] The Saviour's language that "not one stone should be left on another" (Matt. xxiv. 2) is not contradicted by such facts. In the first place the expression may be a proverbial one for characterizing the overthrow as signal, the destruction as desolating, irresistible. In the next place this was spoken in reality not of the city and its walls, but of "the buildings of the temple," and in that application was fulfilled in the strictest sense.
JERUSALEM

The city is intersected from north to south by its principal street, which is three fifths of a mile long, and runs from the Damascus Gate to Zion Gate. From this principal street, the other streets of the city, both the principal and the secondary, radiate out in all directions, generally running east and west, at right angles to it; among these is the Via Dolorosa 'along the north of the Haram, in which is the Roman archway, called Ecce Homo. The city is divided into quarters, which are occupied by the different religious sects. The boundaries of these quarters are defined by the intersection of the principal street, and that which crosses it at right angles from the Jaffa Gate to the Gate of the Haram, called Bah as-Nilb, or Gate of the Chain. The Christians occupy the western half of the city, the northern portion of which is called the Christian quarter, and contains the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; the southern portion is the Armenian quarter, having the Citadel at its northwest angle. The Mohammedan quarter occupies the northeast portion of the city, and includes the Haram el-Sherif. The Jewish quarter is on the south, between the Armenian quarter and the Haram.' (Ordinance Survey of Jerusalem, p. 9. London, 1865.)

It has been stated that the streets are not known by any particular names. A detailed report of inquiries on this subject (appended to the Ordinance Survey) shows that most of them are thus known: being distinguished by the names of persons or families, from trades carried on in them, or from the places to which the streets or alleys lead. The streets are narrow, uneven, and badly paved, for the most part with a gutter or channel in the middle for beasts of burden. Some of them, those most frequented, are darkened with mats or stone arches for the purpose of excluding the heat. The houses are built of limestone, many of them mere hovels, others more substantial, but seldom with windows to cleanse the air. The low windows guarded with iron grates give to many of them a dreary, prison-like appearance. Some of them have lattice windows toward the street; but generally, these open toward the inner courts on which the houses stand.

Population. — In proportion to the extent of the place, the population of Jerusalem is very dense. The houses in general are closely tenanted, and in some quarters they are piled upon one another, so as to extend across the streets, and make them appear almost like subterranean passages. It is difficult (as no proper system of registration exists) to fix the precise number of the inhabitants. Dr. Schultze, formerly Prussian Consul at Jerusalem, placed it in 1845 at 27,000. The following table exhibits the different classes of this population according to their nationalities and religious confessions:

| 11. Mohammedans | 5,000 |
| 11. Christians | 900 |
| (a) Greeks | 2,000 |
| (b) Roman Catholics | 350 |
| (c) Armenians | 100 |
| (d) Copts | 20 |
| (e) Syrians | 20 |
| (f) Abyssinians | 20 |
| Total | 3,350 |

11. Jews |

| (a) Turkish subjects (S phủ- ardum) | 6,600 |
| (b) Foreigners (Asikkenasim) | 1,100 |
| (c) Caralies | 7,120 |

To the foregoing we are to add the 65 or 70 persons, European Protestants or Catholics, connected with consulates or ecclesiastical establishments, and the Turkish garrison of 899 or 1,000 men, and we have then the aggregate (as stated above) of about 17,000. The number of pilgrims, greatest at Easter, varies from time to time; the maximum may be 18,000. It was about 5,000 in 1843, and about 3,000 in 1844 (Schultz, Jerusalem, Eine Vorlesung, pp. 33, 34). The estimate in the Ordinance Survey (1865) — 16,000 — shows that hardly any change has taken place in the population during the last twenty years. The statement (in this latter work) that the travelers and pilgrims at Easter swell the sum to 30,000, seems almost incredible, unless it be understood of some altogether exceptional year. Tolcher complains (Deutschblatt aus Jerusalem, p. 551) that the Turkish statistics are extremely uncertain. It is generally allowed that the Christian inhabitants slowly increase at the expense of the Mohammedans. Water Supply. — Most of the houses are furnished with cisterns in which the rain-water is collected by means of gutters during the rains from December to March. The western houses often have two or three such cisterns, so arranged that when one is full the water flows into another. "As the water which runs through the filthy streets is also collected in some of these cisterns, it can only be drunk with safety after it is filtered and freed from the numerous worms and insects which are bred in it." Some water is obtained from Jacob's Well [Ex-Rom.], whence it is brought in goatskins on donkeys and sold to the inhabitants. The ancient city was supplied with an abundance of pure water from the three Pools of Solomon near Bethlehem. The works constructed for this purpose, "in boldness of design and skill in execution, rival even the most approved system of modern engineers" (Ordinance Survey, p. 10). The Pacha of Jerusalem has recently repaired the conduit from Solomon's Pools to Jerusalem, which is now supplied from Ain Elon, and "the scaled fountain," above the upper pool.

Jews. — The Jews constitute an interesting class of the inhabitants. Very many of them are pilgrims who have come to Jerusalem to fulfill a vow and then return to the countries where they were born, or aged persons who desire to spend their but are foreign writings. The privilege of being buried there is obliged to pay a large sum; but if any one is too poor to incur this expense, the body is taken to the slope on Mount Zion where the Tomb of David is situated. Among them are representatives from almost every land, though the Spanish, Polish, and German Jews compose the greater number. Like their brethren in other parts of Palestine, with the exception of a few in commercial places, they are wretchedly poor, and live chiefly on alms contributed by their countrymen in Europe and America. They devote most of their time to holy employments, as they are called. They frequent the synagogues, roam over the country to visit places memorable in their ancient history, and read assiduously the Old Testament and the Talmudic and Rabbinic writings. Those of them who make any pretension to learning understand the Hebrew and Rabbinic, and speak as their vernacular tongue the language of the country where they formerly lived, or whence their fathers emigrated. As would be expected, from the character of the motives which brings them to the Holy Land, they are distinguished, as a class, for their pious attachment to Judaism. The Jews at Jerusalem have several synagogues which they attend, not promiscuously, but according to their national or geographical affinities. The particular bond which unites them in this religious association is that of their birth or sojourn in the foreign land, and their speaking the same language (Comp. Acts vi. 9 ff.). For information respecting the Jews in Palestine, the reader may see especially Wilson's Land of the Bible (2 vols. Edinb. 1847) and Bosan and M'Cheyne's Narrative of a Mission of Inquiry to the Jews, in 1859 (24th thousand, Edinb. 1852. The statements in these works remain substantially correct for the present time.

Burial Places. — Modern burial places surround the city on all sides. Thus, on our right as we go out of St. Stephen's Gate is a Mohammedan cemetery, which covers a great part of the eastern slope of Moriah, extending to near the southeast angle of the Haram. This cemetery, from its proximity to the sacred area, is regarded as specially sacred. The least prominent of the Moslem monuments is on the west side of the city, near the Kirbet Mamilla, or Upper Gihon, a reservoir so named still in use. The Moslem Sheikhs or Saints are buried in various parts of the city and neighborhood, especially along the western wall of the Haram. The Moslems are buried without cofins, being simply wrapped in a sheet, and are carried to the grave in a sort of wooden box, borne on the shoulders of six men. The body is preceded by a man bearing a palm branch and followed by the mourners. Prayers are offered up in the mosque whilst the body is there, and at the grave the Koran is recited, and the virtues of the deceased extolled. The outside portion of Mount Zion is occupied chiefly as a place of burial for the Christian communities, i.e., Catholics, Greeks, Armenians, and Protestants. Not far from David's Tomb there is a little cemetery which the press has been accustomed to call the burying-ground of some of the most famous of the Jewish nation who have died at Jerusalem. One of the graves is that of the late Prof. Fiske of Amherst College, whose memory is still cherished among us by so many pupils and friends. The great Jewish cemetery, as already mentioned, lies along the base and to the sides of Olivet. The white slabs which cover the graves are slightly elevated and marked with Hebrew inscriptions. It should be stated that the traditional spot is the grave of bursts it.

Churches. — It is impossible to do more than glance at this branch of the subject. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre, in the northwest part of the city, stands over the reputed place of the Savior's tomb, mentioned in the history of the Passion. It is the most imposing edifice in Jerusalem, after the Mosque of Omar. It was built in 1808, on the site of a more ancient one destroyed by fire. Some monument of this kind has marked the spot ever since the time of the Empress Helen, about A. D. 326, and perhaps earlier still. It does not belong to this place to discuss the question of the genuineness of the site. For a convenient résumé of the arguments on both sides, Stanley refers to the Museum of Classical Antiquities, April, 1848. Nothing decisive has more recently been brought to light. This church is in reality not so much a single church as a cluster of churches or chapels. The church is entered by a door leading out of an open court on the south, never opened except by a member of the Moslem family. It is always open for a few hours in the morning and again in the afternoon. The open court is paved with limestone and worn as smooth as glass by the feet of pilgrims. Here the vendors of souvenirs of the Holy Land from Bethlehem expose their wares and drive a thriving trade. On the east side are the Greek convent of Abraham, the Armenian church of St. John, and the Coptic church of the Angel: on the west side are three Greek chapels, that of St. James, that of the Forty Martyrs, in which a very beautiful font, and that of St. John; at the eastern end of the south side of the court is a Greek chapel, dedicated to the Egyptian Mary, and east of the entrance a flight of steps leads to the small Latin Chapel of the Agony. The Chapel of the Holy Sepulchre is in the centre of the Rotunda, built principally of the limestone known as "Santa Croce marble." What is shown as the Tomb of our Lord is a raised bench, 2 feet high, 6 feet 4 inches long, covered on the top by a marble slab. No rock is visible at the present time. Monsignor Capt. Wilson, "but may exist below the marble slab, as in forming the level floor of the Rotunda a great quantity of rock must have been cut away, and the portion containing the tomb would naturally be left intact." The church is at present undergoing important repairs.

Near St. Stephen's Gate is the Church of St. Anne, built over a grotto, which looks like an ancient cistern. The church belongs to France, and is being almost rebuilt at great expense. It shows the scarcity of wood that the timber required in these repairs has to be imported at Yaffa, and then transported over the heavy roads to Jerusalem. The Church of St. James in the Armenian convent is one of the richest in gilding, decorations, and pictures in the city. Nearly opposite the Pool of Hezekiah is the Greek church and convent of "the Forerunner," comparatively modern and of light architecture, belonging to the usual Greek style. a The church of the Anglo Russian ESCAPED on Mount Zion, though not large, is a most edifice, built of limestone, in the form of a cross. The preaching in this church on the Sab- bath and at other times is in German and in Eng- lish. See an interesting sketch of the origin and objects of this escapel by Gilder in Herzog’s Real-Encycl., vi. 503-505. The London Jews’ Society expends large sums of money for the benefit of the Palestine Jews, through the agency of this Jerusalem bishopr. On the rising ground west of the city stands the immense Robinson pile, a new building, which completely overshadows every other architectural feature. It combines in some degree the appearance and the uses of cathedral close, public offices, barracks, and hostelry; the flag of the Russian consolate floats over one part, while the tall cupola of the church commands the centre. There are many Russian priests and monks, and shelter is provided for the crowds of Musscovite pilgrims” (Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 174, 2d ed.). All recent travellers testify that the distinc- tive oriental character of Jerusalem is rapidly fall- ing away and a European coloring taking its place.

Old Jerusalem. — It is ascertained that a labyrinth of great extent and of complicated in- tricacy exists under the present Jerusalem. It is unquestionably very ancient, but having been so recently discovered or rediscovered, belongs in that point of view to our own times, quite as much as to its own proper antiquity. Dr. Barclay has the merit of bringing this wonderful excavation to the knowledge of European and American travellers. We insert an abridged account of this discovery in the words of Dr. R. G. Barclay (in the City of the Great King, pp. 460-463, 1st ed.): —

Having provided ourselves with all the requisites for such a fascinating adventure — matches, candles, compass, tape-line, paper, and pencils — a little previous to the time of closing the gates of the city, we sat down at one of the better, to avoid exciting suspicion, and rendezvoused at Jeremiah’s Pool, near to which we secreted ourselves within a white enclosure surrounding the tomb of a departed Arab sheik, until the shades of darkness enabled us to approach unperceived, when we issued from our retreat, and, by the aid of the compass, compasses, scenting of hawks, howling of jackals, and the chirping of nocturnal insects. The mouth of the cavern being immediately below the city wall, and the houses on Beza, we proceeded cautiously in the work of removing the dirt, mortar, and stones; and, after undermining and picking awhile, a hole (commenced a day or two previous by our dog) was made, though scarcely large enough for us to worm our way serpentinely through the ten foot wall.

On scrambling through and descending the inner side of the wall, we found our way apparently obstructed by an immense mound of soft dirt, which had been thrown in, the more effectually to close up the entrance; but, after examining awhile, discovered that it had settled down in some places sufficiently to allow us to crawl out on hand and knees; which having accomplished, we found ourselves enveloped in thick darkness, that might be felt, but not penetrated by all our lights, so vast is the hall.

"For some time we were almost overcome with feelings of awe and admiration (and I must say apprehension, too, from the immense impending vaulted roof), and felt quite at a loss to decide in which direction to wend our way. There is a con- stant and in many places very rapid descent from the entrance to the termination, the distance be- tween which two points, in a nearly direct line, is 750 feet; and the cave is upwards of 4,000 feet in circumference, supported by great numbers of rude natural pillars. At the southern extremity there is a very deep and precipitous pit, in which we received a very salutary warning of caution from the dead — a human skeleton! supposed to be that of a person who, not being sufficiently supplied with lights, was precipitated headlong and broke his neck."

"We noticed bats-clinging to the ceiling in several places, in patches varying from fifty to a hundred and fifty, hanging together, which flew away at our too near approach, and for some time continued to flit and scream round and about our heads in rather disagreeable proximity. Numerous crosses marked on the wall indicated that, though unknown to Christendom of the present day, the devout Pilgrim or Crusader had been there; and a few Arabic and Hebrew inscriptions (though too much effaced to be deciphered) proved that the place was not unknown to the Jew and Arab. Indeed, the manner in which the beautiful white solid limestone rock was everywhere carved by the mason’s rough chisel into regular pillars, proved that this extensive cavern, though in part natural, was formerly used as the grand quarry of Jeru- salem... There are many intricate meandering passages leading to immense halls, as white as the driven snow, and supported by colossal pillars of irregular shape — some of them placed there by the hand of nature, to support the roof of the various grottos, others evidently left by the stone quarry in quarrying the rock to prevent the inmuddling of the city. Such reverberations I never heard before."

"What untold toil was represented by the vast piles of blocks and chippings, over which we had to clamber, in making our exploration! A melodious grandeur — at once exciting and depressing — pervaded these vast solitudes. This, without doubt, is the very magazine from which much of the Temple rock was hewn — the pit from which was taken the material for the silent growth of the Temple. How often, too, had it probably been the last place of retreat to the wretched inhabitants of this guilty city in the agonizing extremities of her various overthrows! It will probably yet form the grave of many that are living over it! for the work of disintegration and undermining is going on surely, though slowly."

More recent explorers confirm this report, and supply other information. "The roof of rock,"
... and SS. Thamsom, "is about 30 feet high, even above the huge heaps of rubbish, and is sustained by large, shapeless columns of the original rock, left for that purpose by the quarrymen, I suppose. In some places we climbed with difficulty over large masses of rock, which appear to have been shaken down from the roof, and suggest to the nervous the possibility of being ground to powder by similar masses which hang overhead. The general direction of these excavations is southeast, and about parallel with the valley which descends from the Damascus Gate. I suspect that they extended down to the Temple area, and also that it was into these caverns that many of the Jews retired when Titus took the Temple, as we read in Josephus. The whole city might be stowed away in them; and it is my opinion that a great part of the very white stone of the Temple must have been taken from these subterranean quarries" (Land and Book, ii. 491 f.).

Capt. Wilson says further: "In places the stones have been left half cut out, and the marks of the chisel and pick are as fresh as if the workmen had just left, and even the black patches made by the smoke of the lamps remain. The tools employed seem to have been much the same as those now in use, and the quarrymen to have worked in gangs of 5 or 6, each man carrying in a vertical cut as a whole 4 inches broad till he had reached the required depth. The height of the course would determine the distance of the workmen from each other; in these quarries it was found to be about 1 foot 7 inches. When the cuts had all obtained the required depth, the stones were got out by working in from the end. The cuts were apparently made with a two-handed pick, and worked down from above. In one part of the quarry is the so-called wall, which is nothing more than the leakage from the cisterns above, and the constant dripping has worn away the rock into the form of a basin. The steps left by the quarrymen for getting about can be easily traced. On the opposite side of the road is another old quarry, worked in a similar manner, but not to the same extent, to which the name of Jeremiah's Grotto has been given" (Ordnance Survey of the Holy Land, p. 191, 2d ed.), "the very niches remained out of which the great blocks had been hewn which form the Temple wall. There lay on the ground in one corner a broken monolith, which had evidently split in the process of removal, and had been left where it fell. The stone here is very soft, and must easily have been sawn, while, like some other limestones, it hardens almost to marble on exposure."

Antiquities in and around the City. — Some account has been given of these in previous sections of this article. The only point on which we propose to remark here, is that of the obscurity still resting on some of the questions connected with the ancient topography of the city and the impossibility of identifying the precise scene of many of the events of the Old and the New Testament history. Traditions, it is true, are current among the oriental Christians, which profess to give us all the information on this subject that one could desire. But, in general, such traditions are nothing more than vague conjectures; they are incapable of being traced back far enough to give them the value of historical testimony, and are often contradicted by facts known to us from the Bible, or with other traditions maintained with equal confidence. Even conclusions once admitted as facts into our manuals of geography and archaeology have been from time to time drawn into question or disproved by the results of further study and research.

But this state of our knowledge should not disappoint or surprise the reader. It admits of a ready and satisfactory explanation. "No ancient city," says Raumer, "not excepting Rome itself, has undergone (since the time of Christ) so many changes as Jerusalem. Not only houses, palaces, temples, have been demolished, rebuilt, and destroyed anew, but entire hills on which the city stood have been dug down, and valleys filled up" (Palastin, p. 253, 3d ed.). When, a few years ago, the Episcopal Church was erected on Mount Zion, it was found necessary to dig through the accumulated rubbish to the depth of 50 feet or more, in order to obtain a proper support for the foundations. In some more recent excavations the workmen struck on a church embedded 40 feet below the present surface. Capt. Wilson makes some statements on this subject so instructive that they deserve to be mentioned. "We learn from history, and from actual exploration under ground, that the Tyropoen Valley has been nearly filled up, and that there is a vast accumulation of ruins and rubbish in the broader valley known as the Valley of the Cheesemongers (Tyropoeon) near the citadel. In fact, we know that it was part of the settled policy of the conquerors of the city to obliterate, as far as possible, those features upon the strength of which the upper city and the Temple mainly depended. The natural accumulation of rubbish for the last 3,000 years has further contributed to obliterate, to a great extent, the natural features of the ground within the city" (Ordnance Survey of Jerusalem, p. 7 f.). The latest excavations by Lieut. Warren near "Robinson's Arch" have gone to a depth of 55 feet below the surface before coming to the bottom of the valley between Zion and Moriah (The Quarterly, p. 619, June, 1898, Lond.). In many places the present level of the "Via Dolorosa" is not less than 30 or 40 feet above its original level: disproving, by the way, the claim set up for the antiquity of its sites. In digging for the foundations of the house of the Prussian Deaconesses, a subterranean street of houses was found several feet below the street above it. (Survey, p. 56.)

Views of Jerusalem. — The summit of Olivet furnishes, on the whole, the best look-out in the vicinity of Jerusalem. Yet the view of the city from this point is too distinct to be very imposing; for, having few edifices that will bear inspection, it must be seen, like Damascus, at a distance and in the mass, in order to produce the best effect. The vaulted domes surrounding the roofs of the better houses, and giving to them solidity and support, serve also as ornaments, and are striking objects as men from this direction. Such domes are said to be peculiar to a few towns in the south of Palestine. The want of foliage and verdure is a very noticeable defect. A few cypresses and dwarfish palms are the only trees to be discovered within the city itself. The minarets, only 8 or 10 in number, which often display elsewhere a graceful figure, are here very ordinary, and add little or nothing to the scene. On the other hand, the buildings which compose the court of the Holy Sepulchre, arrest attention at once, on account of their comparative size and elegance. But more conspicuous than all is the Mosque of Omar, which being so near at hand, on the east side of the city, can be surveyed here with great advantage. It stands near the centre of an inclosure which coincides very nearly with the court of the ancient Temple. It is built on a platform, 495 feet from east to west, and 550 from north to south, elevated about 15 feet, and paved in part with marble. It is approached on the west side by three flights of stairs, on the north by two, on the south by two, and on the east by one. The building itself is an octagon of 67 feet on a side, the walls of which are ornamented externally with variegated marbles, arranged in elegant and intricate patterns. The lower story of this structure is 46 feet high. In the upper story, at the distance of about one half of its diameter from the outer edge, rises a wall 70 feet higher, perforated towards the top, with a series of low windows. Above this wall rises a dome of great beauty, 40 feet high, surmounted by a gilt crescent. The entire altitude, therefore, including the platform, is 170 feet. The dome is covered with lead, and the roof of the first story with tiles of glazed porcelain. The Mosque has four doors, which face the cardinal points, guarded by handsome porches. The Mohammedans regard it as their holiest sanctuary, and do not step into it without removing their shoes. The ample court which surrounds the Mosque, as seen from Olivet, appears as a grass-plat, shaded with a few trees, and intersected with walks.

When about half way up this mount, the traveller will see for himself, apparently, off against the level of Jerusalem. In accordance with this, the Evangelist represents the Saviour as being "over against the Temple"—as he sat on the Mount of Olives, and foretold the doom of the devoted city (Mark xiii. 3). Hence the disciples, as they listened to him at that moment, had the massive "buildings of the Temple" in full view before them across the valley of the Kedron, to which they had just called his attention with so much pride, and of which they were told that soon "not one stone would be left on another."

Visitors to Jerusalem by the way of Yifta (Coppa) and Wady Ayl, usually obtain their first sight of the city from the northwest. Even from this side the view is not unimpressive. The walls with their battlements,—the entire circuit of which lies at once beneath the eye,—the tall form of Olivet; the distant hills of Moab in dim perspective; the turrets of the church of the Sepulchre; the lofty limbs of the Mosque of Omar; the Castle of David, so antique and massive,—all come suddenly into view, and produce a startling effect.

Yet, as Dr. Robinson remarks, the traveller may do better to take the camel-road from Ramleh (Jerusalem; or, rather, the road lying still further north by the way of Beth-horon. In this way he will pass near to Lydda, Ginzu, Lower and Upper Beth-horon, and Gilson; he will see Romah and Gilbon near at hand on his left; and he may pause on Sequeas to gaze on the city from one of the finest points of view" (Later Res. iii. 160). Stanley prefers the approach from the Jericho road, "No human being could be disappointed who first saw Jerusalem from the east. The beauty consists in this, that you thus burst at once on the two great ravines which cut the city off from the surrounding table-land, and that then only you have a complete view of the Mosque of Omar" (S. of P. p. 167, Amer. ed.). Mr. Tristram coincides in this impression. "Let the pilgrim endeavor to enter from the east, the favorite approach of our Lord, the path of his last and triumphal entry. It is a glorious burst, as the traveller rounds the shoulder of Mount Olivet, and the Haram wall starts up before him from the deep gorge of the Kedron, with its domes and crescents sparkling in the sunlight— a royal city. On that very spot He once paused and gazed on the same bold cliffs supporting a far more glorious pile, and when He beheld the city He wept over it" (Land of Israel, p. 173 f. 2d ed.). The writer was so fortunate as to have this view of Jerusalem, and would add that no one has seen Jerusalem who has not had this view.

JERUSA'LAHM [possessed or possession]: [Tepouwāta: [Vat. Epauros]; Alex. Ἱερουσαλήμ; Jeru.] daughter of Zadok, queen of Uzziah, and mother of Jotham king of Judah (2 K. xv. 35). In Chronicles the name is given under the altered form of—JERUSA'LAHM [as above]: [Tepouwāta: [Vat. -σαρα; Jerusalem], 2 Chr. xxvii. 1. See the preceding article.

JESHA'IAH [3 syl.], i. e. Jeshahiah: [Iriaia: [Vat. Iraaba; Alex. Ierashia: Ἱερασία]; 1. Son of Hanneliah, brother of Pelatiah, and grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 21). But according to the LXX. and the Vulgate, he was the son of Pelatiah. For an explanation of this genealogy, and the difficulties connected with it, see Lord A. Hervey's Genealogies of our Lord, ch. iv. § v.

2. (Heb. יִשְׂחַיָּהוּ), i. e. Jeshahiah: [Iriaia: Alex. Ierashia: [P. Ierashia: Ἱερασία]; A Benjamite, whose descendants were among those chosen by lot to reside in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 7).

JESHA'IAH [3 syl.]. 1. (Heb. יִשְׂחַיָּהוּ; salutation of Jehovah): [Iriaia: [Vat. Sinas]; in 1 Chr. xxv. 3, and Ieriaia: [Vat. -σαρα] in ver. 15; in the former the Alex. Ms. has Ieriaia kal Sceali, and in the latter Ieriaia: [comp. Ieraia: Ἱερασία]; the Vulg. has now supplied by surface drainage. Some are of modern date, but in others the months of old calendars can be seen. The splendid photographic views of various parts of the city, and other objects, could greatly to the value of this publication.
Jeshanan

One of the six sons of Jeduthun, set apart for the musical service of the Temple, under the leadership of their father, the inspired minstrel: he was the chief of the eighth division of the singers. The Hebrew name is identical with that of the prophet Isaiah.

2. (Isorai; [Var.] Alex. Ossosa: Isoura.) A Levite in the reign of David, eldest son of Hezir, a descendant of Amram through Moses (1 Chr. xxvi. 25). He is called Issorai (Isoura) in 1 Chr. xxi. 21, in A. V., though the Hebrew is merely the shortened form of the name. Jehuel, one of his ancestors, appears among the Hemanites in 1 Chr. xxiv. 2, and is said in Targ. on 1 Chr. xxvi. 24 to be the same with Jonathan the son of Gerhshom, the priest of the idols of the Danites, who afterwards returned to the fear of Jehovah.

3. (וֹרָשָׁא: Isorai; [Var. Iosora] Alex. Hsasa: Isoura.) The son of Athaliah and chief of the name of the house of the Ben{ sons} Elam who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 7). In 1 Esr. viii. 33 he is called Josias.

Jeshanah (יוֹרָשָׁא [ancient]; יֹרָש: Yorash; [Vat. Kara:] Alex. Avai; Joseph: Y'orash; Jasour, a town which, with its dependent villages (Heb. and Alex. LXX. - daughters "), was one of the three taken from Jeroboam by Abijah (1 Chr. xiii. 19). The other two were Bethel and Ephraim, and Jeshanah is named between them. A place of the same name was the scene of an encounter between Herod and Pappus, the general of Antigonus's army, related by Josephus with curious details (Ant. xiv. 15, § 12), which however convey no indication of its position. It is not mentioned in the Othography, unless we accept the conjecture of Reck (Palaestina, p. 861) that "Jethalah, urbs antiqua Judææ," is at once a corruption and a translation of the name Jeshana, which signifies "old." Nor has it been identified in modern times, save by Schwarz (p. 158), who places it at "Al-Sanim, a village two miles W. of Bethel," but undiscoverable in any map which the writer has consulted.

Jesharelah (יוֹרָשָׁא נַח, NACH [upright toward God]; but see First!): Yereshal; [Alex.] Yossef: Israel.) head of the seventh of the 24 wards into which the musicians of the Levites were divided (1 Chr. xxv. 14). [Heman; Jedethun.] He belonged to the house of Asphah, and had 12 of his house under him. At ver. 2 his name is written Assarelah, with an initial N instead of J; in the LXX. Erin. A. C. H.

Jeshabeab (יוֹרָשָׁא בֵּא, בֵּא [father's sent or abode]: Yereshba; [Alex. Yosseba:] Comp. 'Isaafa-EB: Ersba,) head of the 14th course of priests (1 Chr. xxiv. 13). [Jeholath.] A. C. H.

Jeshur (יוֹרָשָׁא A shortened; [Var.] Alex. Ioshera: Yosher), one of the sons of Saba the son of Heinon by his wife Azubah (1 Chr. ii. 18). In two of Kennicott's MSS. it is written יֵשׁוּר, Jethur, from the preceding verse, and in one MS. the two names are combined. The Peshito Syriac has Oshir, the same form in which Josher is represented in 2 Sam. i. 18.

Jeshimom (יוֹרָשָׁא מֹמ, the weaned: in [Vat.] Alex. Iosora: Joser.) in Num. 4:24: Joel (xii. 8), 1 Kgs. vii. 54: "Jeshonim," a name which occurs in Num. xx. 20 and xxiii. 28, in designating the position of Pisgah and Peor: both described as "facing the [יוֹרָש הַמֹּמָה] the Jeshimmon." Not knowing more than the general locality of either Peor or Pisgah, this gives us no clue to the situation of Jeshimon. But it is elsewhere used in a similar manner with reference to the position of two places very distant from both the hill of Hachilah, "on the south of," or "facing the Jeshimon." (1 Sam. xxiiii. 19, xxvi. 1, 3), and the wilderness of Maon, also south of it (xxiii. 24). Zigh (xxiii. 15) and Maon are known at the present day. They lie a few miles south of Hebron, so that the district strictly north of them is the hill-country of Judah. But a line drawn between Maon and the probable position of Peor — on the high country opposite Jericho — passes over the dreary, barren waste of the hills lying immediately on the west of the Dead Sea. To this district the name, if interpreted as a Hebrew word, would be not inapplicable. It would also suit as to position, as it would be full in view from an elevated point on the highlands of Moab, and not far from north of Maon and Zigh. On the other hand, the use of the word ha-Ardalah, in 1 Sam. xxiiii. 24, must not be overlooked, meaning, as that elsewhere does, the sunk district of the Jordan and Dead Sea, the modern Ghor. Beth-Jeshimoth too, which by its name ought to have some connection with Jeshimon, would appear to have been on the lower level, somewhere near the mouth of the Jordan. [Beth-Jeshimoth.] Perhaps it is not safe to lay much stress on the Hebrew sense of the name. The passages in which it is first mentioned are indisputably of very early date, and it is quite possible that it is an archaic name found and adopted by the Ismaelites.

* Mr. Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 540, 2d ed.) supposes Jeshimon to be used for "the barren plain of the Ghor," about the mouth of the Jordan. Assuming this, he makes it one of his proofs, that the term Ben-baka range "over against Jericho" (Deut. xxiii. 4), ascended by him, is the Nebo or Pisgah of Moses. [Nero. Amer. ed.] The article is always prefixed in the Hebrew, with the exception of a few poetical passages (Deut. xxiii. 10; Is. lviii. 7, lxviii. 40, civ. 14, civ. 4; and Isa. xlix. 19, 20). It is really questionable whether the word should not be taken as appellative rather than a proper name. In the former case the particular desert must be inferred from the context, and may be a different one at different times. Lieut. Warren reports that after special inquiry on the ground he was unable to find any trace of the name of Beth-Jeshimoth (see above) in the vicinity of the mouth of the Jordan. He speaks, however, of a ruin at the northeast of the Dead Sea called Seawineh, as if possibly the lost site may have been there (Report, etc., 1867-95, p. 13)...

Jeshshai (יוֹרָשָׁא הַשָּׁי, the spring of one old): [Var.] Alex. Iosorai: Joser. one of the ancestors of the Gadites who dwelt in Gilead, and whose genealogies were made out in the days of Jotham king of Judah (1 Chr. v. 14). In the Peshito Syriac the latter part of the verse is omitted.
JESHOHAIAH [4 syll.] (גְּשֹׁהַיָּהְי) [boved down by Jehovah]: 'Iaroyia: Ishahatia), a chief of one of the families of that branch of the Simeonites, which was descended from Shimeai, and was more numerous than the rest of the tribe (1 Chr. iv. 36). He was concerned in the raid upon the Hamites in the reign of Hezekiah.

JESHPUA [ Heb. Jesha'a] (גְּשֹׁפּוּא) [Jehovith helps, or saves]: 'Iaroyia: Jesue, [Jesus,] and Josc], a later Hebrew contraction for Joshua, or rather Jehoshua. (JesHosHa.)

1. [Jesu.] Joshua, the son of Nun, is called Jehoshua in one passage (Neh. viii. 17). [JesuHA.]

2. [Jesus.] A priest in the reign of David, to whom the ninth course fell by lot (1 Chr. xxiv. 11). He is called Jehoshua in the A. V. One branch of the house, namely, the children of Jedediah, returned from Babylon (Ezr. l. 36; but see JEHOSHAIAH.)

3. [Jesu.] One of the Levites in the reign of Hezekiah, after the reformation of worship, placed in trust in the cities of the priests in their classes, to distribute to their brethren the offerings of the people (2 Chr. xxxii. 15).

4. [Jesu.] Son of Jehozadak, first high-priest of the third series, namely, of those after the Babylonish Captivity, and ancestor of the fourteen high-priests his successors down to Joshua or Jason, and Onias or Menelaus, inclusive. [HIGH-PRIEST.] Joshua, like his contemporary Zerubbabel, was probably born in Babylon, whither his father Jehozadak had been taken captive while young (1 Chr. vi. 13, A. V.). He came up from Babylon in the first of Cyrus with Zerubbabel, and took a leading part with him in the rebuilding of the Temple, and the restoration of the Jewish commonwealth. Everything we read of him indicates a man of earnest piety, patriotism, and courage. One of less faith and resolution would never have surmounted all the difficulties and opposition he had to contend with. His first care on arriving at Jerusalem was to rebuild the altar, and restore the daily sacrifice, which had been suspended for some fifty years. He then, in conjunction with Zerubbabel, hastened to collect materials for rebuilding the Temple, and was able to lay the foundation of it as early as the second month of the second year of Cyrus, the first month of the second year, according to the Babylonian reckoning, - an interval of about fourteen years. In that year, n. c. 529, at the prophecying of Haggai and Zechariah (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 11; Hagga. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 1-9; Zechar. i.-viii.), the work was resumed by Joshua and Zerubbabel with redoubled vigor, and was happily completed on the third day of the month Adar (= March), in the sixth of Darius. The dedication of the Temple, and the celebration of the Pasch, in the next month, were kept with great solemnity and rejoicing (Ezr. vi. 15-22), and especially a The 7th, after the Babylonian reckoning, according to Pfeiffer.

b The connection with Hani, Hasbollah (or Hash-

"twelve he-goats, according to the number of the tribes of Israel," were offered as a sin-offering for all Israel. Jehoshua's zeal in the work is exemplified by the Son of Sirach (Eccles. xiii. 12). Besides the great importance of Jehoshua as a historical character, from the critical times in which he lived, and the great work which he accomplished, his name Jesus, his restoration of the Temple, his office as high-priest, and especially the two prophecies concerning him in Zech. iii. and vi. 9-15, point him out as an eminent type of Christ. [HIGH-PRIEST.] Nothing is known of Jehoshua later than the seventh year of Darius, with which the narrative of Ezr. vii.-vi. closes. Josephus, who says the Temple was seven years in building, and places the dedication of it in the ninth of Darius, contributes no information whatever concerning him: his history here, with the exception of the 9th sect. of b. vi. ch. iv., being merely a paraphrase of Ezra and 1 Esdras, especially the latter. [ZERUBBAHEL.] Jehoshua had probably conversed often with Daniel and Ezekiel, and may or may not have known Jehoseachin at Babylon in his youth. He probably died at Jerusalem. It is written Jehoshua or Joshua in Zech. iii. 1, 3, &c.; Hagge. i. 1, 12, &c.

5. [In Ezr. ii. 40, Vat. 1groue; Neh. xii. 8, Alex. 1groue: Jesus, Jesus, once.] Head of a Levitical house, one of those which returned from the Babylonish Captivity, and took an active part under Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The name is used to designate either the whole family or the successive chiefs of it (Ezr. ii. 40, iii. 9; Neh. iii. 10, viii. 7, ix. 4, 5, xii. 8, &c.). Joshua, and Kadmiel, with whom he is frequently associated, were both "sons of Hodiavius" (called Judah, Ezr. iii. 9), but Joshua's more immediate ancestor was Azaniah (Neh. x. 9). In Neh. xii. 24 "Jeshua the son of Kadmiel" is a manifest corruption of the text. The LXX. read ξεινις και Καδμιμ,

6. [Jesus.] A branch of the family of Pahath-Moab, one of the chief families, probably, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. x. 14, xi. 11, &c.; Ezr. x. 30). His descendants were the most numerous of all the families which returned with Zerubbabel. The verse is obscure, and might be translated, "The children of Pahath-Moab, for (i.e. representing) the children of Joshua and Josiah:" so that Pahath-Moab would be the head of the family. A. C. H.

JESHTUA [ Heb. Jesha'a] (גְּשֹׁתְיוּא) [see above]: [Igroue: Jesue], one of the towns re-inhabited by the people of Judah after the return from captivity (Neh. x. 25). Being mentioned with Mefahah, Beer-sheba, etc., it was apparently in the extreme south. It does not, however, occur in the original lists of Judah and Simeon (Josh. xv. 20, xxxi.), and there is no name in these lists of which this would be probably a corruption. It is not mentioned elsewhere.

G.

JESHTUH [ Heb. Jesha'hah] (גְּשֹׁתְיוּוּא), Igroue: Jesus), a priest in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 11), the same as JEHOSUA, No. 2.

JESHURUN, and once by mistake in A. V
JESURUN, Is. xiv. 2 (ע"ז"זד) [see infran]; ב אוגוסטוס, once with the addition of 'ישראל', which the Arabic of the Lond. Polyglot adopts to the exclusion of the former: dictius, redactisimus, a symbolical name for Israel in Deut. xxiii. 15, xxxiii. 5, 20; Is. xiv. 2, for which various etymologies have been suggested. Of its application to Israel there seems to be no division of opinion. The Targum and the Peshitta Syriac uniformly render Jeshurun by 'Israel.' Kiuchi (on Is. xiv. 2) derives it from the root יְשָׁר, yashar, 'to be right' or 'upright,' because Israel was 'upright among the nations;' as בִּשְׁרָיו, yesharim, 'the upright' (Num. xxiii. 10; Ps. cxvi. 1) is a poetical allusion of the chosen people, who did that which was right (רִבְנָיו, hay-yashar) in the eyes of Jehovah, in contradistinction from the idolatrous heathen who did that which was preeminently the evil (נְשָׁרִי, hâ-r'i), and worshipped false gods. This see to have been the view adopted by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion — who, according to the account of their version given by Jerome (on Is. xiv. 3), must have had קִדוֹשׁ or קִדוֹשָׁתָם — and by the Vulgate in three passages. Malvenda (quoted by Poole's Synopsis, Deut. xxxiii. 15), taking the same root, applies it ironically to application to Israel. For the like reason, on the authority of the above-mentioned Father, the book of Genesis was called 'the book of the just' (אֲדֹנָי), as relating to the histories of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel. The termination ק is either intensive, as the Vulgate takes it, or an affectionate diminutive (אֲרוֹם), Hittig, and Furst; '*Liebend,' Hendewerk, and Hansen. Simionis (Lex. Hebr. s. v., and Arc. Form. Nom. p. 582) connects Jeshurun with the Arabic root יִשָּׁר, yasrân, which in the second conj. signifies 'to prosper,' and in the 4th 'to be wealthy,' and is thus cognate with the Hebrew יֵשָׁר, yashar, which in Paul signifies 'to be blessed.' With the intensive termination Jeshurun would then denote Israel as supremely happy or prosperous, and to this significiation it must be allowed in the context in Deut. xxxii. 15 points. Michaelis (Synopsis, ad Lex. Heb.) considers it as a diminutive of Israel, and would read יִשָּׁרְיָהוּ, yisrâ- yâhû, contracted from יִשָּׁרְיָהוּ, yisre'lahû. Such too was the opinion of Grotius and Vitringa, and of the author of the Veneto-Gk. version; who renders it 'ישראלים.' For this theory, though supported by the weight of Gesenius' authority, it is scarcely necessary to say there is not the smallest foundation, either in analogy or probability. In the application of the name Jeshurun to Israel, we may discover that fondness for a play upon words of which there are so many examples, and which might be allowed to have some influence in the selection of the appellation. But to derive the one from the other is a fancy unworthy of a scholar. Two other etymologies of the name may be noticed as showing what length that conjecture may go when not regulated by any definite principles.

The first of these, which is due for Foster (quoted by Glassius, Phil. Sacr. lib. iv. tr. 2), connects it with יְשָׁר, yishar, 'an ox,' in consequence of the allusion in the context of Deut. xxxii. 13; the other with יְשָׁרָה, yish'rah, 'to behold,' because Israel beheld the presence of God.

JESIAH (יהשע, i. e. Yissiahu [whom Jehovah lendeth]): יִשְׁיָאָו [Vat. FA.-vii.]; Alex. יִשְׁיָא (Jesio). 1. A Korhite, one of the mighty men, 'helpers of the battle,' who joined David's standard at Ziklag during his flight from Saul (1 Chr. xii. 6).

2. (לִשְׁיָא): יִשְׁיָא; [Vat. IESIA]; Alex. IESIA.) The second son of Uziel, the son of Kohath (1 Chr. xxii. 20). He is the same as Jeshiah, whose representative was Zechariah (1 Chr. xxiv. 25); but our translators in the present instance followed the Vulg., as they have too often done in the case of proper names.

JESIMIEL (יהשימיאל, [whom God sets up or places]): יִשְׁיָמֵיא [Vat. omits]: IESIMA), a Simeonite, descended from the prolific family of Shimei, and a prince of his own branch of the tribe, whom he leads against the Medes and Hamites in the reign of Hezkiah (1 Chr. iv. 36).

JESSE (ישע, i. e. Isha [perh. strong, Ges., or ijit, i. e. of God, Dietr.]; אֵישֵי, Joseph. IESAIAS): יִשְׁיָא: In the margin of 1 Chr. x. 14, our translators have given the Vulgate form, the father of David, and thus the immediate progenitor of the whole line of the kings of Judah, and ultimately of Christ. He is the only one of his name who appears in the Sacred records. Jesse was the son of Obed, who again was the fruit of the union of Boaz and Ruth. For Jesse was the only foreign blood that ran in his veins; for his great-grandmother was no less a person than Rahab the Canaanitish of Jericho (Matt. i. 5). Jesse's genealogy in is twice given in full in the Old Testament, namely, Ruth iv. 18-22, and 1 Chr. ii. 5-12. We there see that, long before David had rendered his family illustrious, it belonged to the greatest house of Judah, that of Perez, through Hezron his eldest son. One of the links in the descent was Nahshon (N. T. Naasoon), chief man of the tribe at the critical time of the Exodus. In the N. T. the genealogy is also twice given (Matt. i. 3-5; Luke iii. 32-34).

He is commonly designated as 'Jesse the Bethlehemite' (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18). So he is called by his son David, then fresh from home (xvii. 58); but his full title is 'the Ephrathite of Bethlehem Judah' (xvii. 12). The double expression and the use of the antique word Ephrathite perhaps imply that he was one of the oldest families in the place. He is an 'old man' when we first meet with him (1 Sam. xvii. 12), with eight sons (xvi. 10, xvii. 12), residing at Bethlehem (xvi. 4, 5). It would appear, however, from the terms of xvi. 4, 5, and of Josephus (Ant. vi. 8, § 1), that Jesse was not one of the 'elders' of the town. The few slight glimpses we can catch of him are soon recalled. According to

an ancient Jewish tradition, recorded in the Targum on 2 Sam. xxi. 19, he was a weaver of the vails of the sanctuary, but as there is no contradiction, so there is no corroboration of this in the Bible, and it is possible that it was suggested by the occurrence of the word veqana’ "weaver" in connection with a member of a family. [J.A.A.E. ORI.EG.] Jesse's wealth seems to have consisted of a flock of sheep and goats (1 Sam. ii. 2, A.V., "sheep"), which were under the care of David (xvi. 11, xvi. 34, 35). Of the produce of this flock we find him on two occasions sending the simple presents which in those days the highest persons were wont to accept—slices of milk cheese to the captain of the division of the army in whose hands were serving (xvii. 18), and a kid to Saul (xvi. 29); with the accomplishment in each case of parched corn from the fields of Boaz, leaves of the bread from which Bethlehem took its very name, and wine from the vineyards which still curish the terraces of the hill below the village. When David's rupture with Saul had finally driven him from the court, and he was in the cave of Adullam, "his brethren and all his father's house" joined him (xxi. 2). His "brother" (probably Eliah) is mentioned on a former occasion (xx. 25) as taking the lead in the family. This is no more than we should expect from Jesse's great age. David's anxiety at the same period to find a safe refuge for his parents from the probable vengeance of Saul is also quite in accordance with their helpless condition. He took his father and his mother into the country of Moab, and deposited them with the king, and there they disappear from our view in the records of Scripture. But another old Jewish tradition (Rabbiith Seder, 1 Sam., 256, col. 2) states that after David had quitted the hold, his parents and brothers were put to death by the king of Moab, so that there remained, besides David, but one brother, who took refuge with Nahash, king of the Genezammim. To the wife of Jesse we are not told. His eight sons will be found displayed under David, i. 552. The family contained in addition two female members, Zerubiah and Abigail, but it is uncertain whether these were Jesse's daughters, for though they are called the sisters of his sons (1 Chr. ii. 16), yet Abigail is said to have been the daughter of Nahash (2 Sam. xviii. 25). Of this two explanations have been proposed. (1.) The Jewish— that Nahash was another name for Jesse (Jerome, Q. Hebr., on 2 Sam. xviii. 25). (2.) Professor Stanley's—that Jesse's wife had been formerly wife or concubine to Nahash, possibly the king of the Ammonites (David, i. 552).

An English reader can hardly fail to remark how often Jesse is mentioned long after the name of David had become famous enough to supersede that of his obscure and humble parent. While David was a struggling outlaw, it was natural that to friend and foe—to Saul, Ibeth, and Nabul, no less than to the captains of Judah and Benjamin— he should be merely the "son of Jesse" (1 Sam. xvi. 13; comp. xxiv. 16, xxv. 10; I Chr. xii. 18); but that Jesse's name should be brought forward in records of so late a date as I Chr. xxix. 26, and Ps. lxxxi. 20, long after the establishment of David's own house, is certainly worthy of notice. Especially it is to be observed that it is in his name—the "shout out of the stump of Jesse... the root of Jesse which should stand as an ensign to the people" (Is. xi. 1; xli. 8) that Jesse announces the most splendid of his promises, intended to rouse and cheer the heart of the nation at the time of its deepest despondency.

JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH

In the phraseology here referred to, the reader will recognize the taste of the oriental mind, which delights in a sort of poetic parenthesis. Hence the frequent phrase, "Son of David," "Seed of David," etc., as applied to Christ. The son is often designated by the father's name, as above, where the father is known only through such association of his name as in the address to Rahab: "Thou son of Abin Zam" (Judg. v. 12), and the Saviour's appeal to Peter "Simon, son of Jonas" (John xx. 15).
but

Saviour, or simply the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus, § 1). The same passage speaks of him as a native of Jerusalem (Eccles. L. c.); and the internal character of the book confirms its Palestinian origin. The name Jesus was of frequent occurrence, and was often represented by the Greek Jason. In the apocryphal list of the LXXII commissions sent by Eleazar to Pottery it occurs twice (Arist. Hist. ap. Hody, De text. p. vii.); but there is not the slightest ground for connecting the author of Ecclesiastics with either of the persons there mentioned. The various conjectures which have been made as to the position of the son of Sirach from the contents of his book; as, for instance, that he was a priest (from vii. 29 ff., xiv., xlix., I), or a physician (from xxxviii. I ff.), are equally unfounded.

Among the later Jews the "son of Sirach" was celebrated under the name of Ben Sira as a writer of proverbs, and some of those which have been preserved offer a close resemblance to passages in Ecclesiastics [Ecclesiasticus, § 4, vol. i. p. 651, note A] but in the course of time a later compilation was substituted for the original work of Ben Sira (Zunz, Gottesd. Vertr. d. Juden, p. 100 ff.), and tradition has preserved no authentic details of his person or his life.

The chronological difficulties which have been raised as to the date of the Son of Sirach have been already noticed [Ecclesiasticus, § 4], and do not call for further discussion.

According to the first prologue to the book of Ecclesiastics, taken from the Synopsis of the Pseudo-Athanasius (iv. p. 377, ed. Migne), the translator of the book bore the same name as the author of it. If this conjecture were true, a genealogy of the following form would result: 1. Sirach. 2. Jesus, son (Either) of Sirach (author of the book). 3. Sirach. 4. Jesus, son of Sirach (translator of the book). It is, however, most likely that the last chapter, "The prayer of Jesus the son of Sirach," gave occasion to this conjecture. The prayer was attributed to the translator, and then the title of succession followed necessarily from the title attached to it.

JÉSUS [Ιησους], called JUSTUS [iust], a Christian who was with St. Paul at Rome, and joined him in sending salutations to the Colossians. He was one of the fellow-workers who were a comfort to the Apostle (Col. iv. 11). In the Acts Synod. Jan. iv. 67, he is commemorated as bishop of Eleutheropolis.

W. T. B.

* This Jesus or Justus cannot be identified with the Justus at Corinth (Acts xviii. 7). The one here mentioned was a Jewish Christian (one of the circumcision), Col. iv. 11), but the other a Gentile who had been a Jewish proselyte (συμβάλλοντος τον θεον) before he embraced the Gospel. [Justus.]

II.

JÉSUS CHRIST. The name Jesus (Ἰησους) signifies Saviour. Its origin is explained above, and it seems to have been not an uncommon name among the Jews. It is assigned in the New Testament (1) to our Lord Jesus Christ, who "saves His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 21); also (2) to Joshua, the successor of Moses, who brought the Israelites into the land of promise (Num. xxvii. 18; Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8); and (3) to Jesus named Justus, a converted Jew, associated with St. Paul (Col. iv. 11).

The name of Christ (Χριστός from χρίω, I anoint) signifies Anointed. Priests were anointed amongst the Jews, as their inauguration to their office (1 Chr. xvi. 22; Ps. ev. 15), and kings also (2 Sam. i. 24; Eccles. xvi. 19). In the New Testament the name Christ is used as equivalent to Messiah (Greek Μισσαή; Hebrew בֵּית Y). John i. 41, the name given to the long promised Prophet and King whom the Jews had been taught by their prophets to expect; and therefore δέ ευαγγέλιον (Acts xix. 4; Matt. xi. 3). The use of this name as applied to the Lord has always a reference to the promises of the Prophets. In Matt. i. 4, xi. 2, it is assumed that the Christ when He should come would live and act in a certain way, described by the Prophets. So Matt. xxii. 42, xxiii. 10, xxiv. 5, 23; Mark xii. 33, xiii. 21; Luke iii. 13, xx. 41; John vii. 27, 31, 41, 42, xii. 31, in all which places there is a reference to the Messiah as delineated by the Prophets. That they had foretold that Christ should suffer appears Luke xxiv. 26, 46. The name of Jesus is the proper name of the Lord, and that of Christ is added to identify Him with the promised Messiah. Other names are sometimes added to the names Jesus Christ, or Christ Jesus: thus "Lord" (frequently), "a King" (added as a kind of explanation of the word Christ, Luke xiiii. 2), "King of Israel" (Mark xv. 32), Son of David (Mark xii. 35, Luke xx. 41), chosen of God (Luke xiiii. 35).

Remarkable are such expressions as "the Christ of God" (Luke ii. 26, ix. 20; Rev. xi. 12, xii. 10); and the phrase "in Christ," which occurs about 78 times in the Epistles of St. Paul, and is almost peculiar to them. But the germ of it is to be found in the words of our Lord Himself, "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me" (John xv. 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10). The idea that all Christian life is not merely an imitation and following of the Lord, but a living and constant union with Him, causes the Apostle to use such expressions as "fallen asleep in Christ" (1 Cor. xv. 18), "I knew a man in Christ" (2 Cor. xii. 2), "I speak the truth in Christ" (1 Tim. ii. 7), and many others. (See Schleiermacher's Lectures on the Christian Religion; Fritzsche's On St. John's Gospel; De Wette's Commentary; Schmitt's Greek Concordance, etc.)

The Life, the Person, and the Work of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ occupy the whole of the New Testament. Of this threefold subject the present article includes the first part, namely, the Life and Teaching; the Person of our Lord will be treated under the article SON OF GOD; and His Work will naturally fall under the word SAVIOUR. Toward the close of the reign of Herod Great, arrived that "fullness of time" which God in His inscrutable wisdom had appointed for the sending of His Son; and Jesus was born at Bethlehem, to redeem a sinful and ruined world. According to the received chronology, which is in fact of Dionysius Exiguus in the 6th century, this event occurred in the year of Rome 754. But modern scholars, with hardly an exception, believe that this calculation places the nativity some years too late: although they differ as to the amount of error. Herod the Great died, according to Josephus, in the thirty-seventh year after he was appointed king (Ant. xvii. 8, § 1; B. J. i. 33, § 8). His elevation coincides with the consularship of Cn. Domitius Calvus and C. Asinius Pollio, and the determines the date A. u. c. 714 (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 14, § 5). There is reason to think that in such calculation Josephus reckons the years from the month Nisus to the same month; and also that the Nativity took place in the beginning of the thirty-seventh year, or just before the Passover (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 9, § 3); if then thirty-six complete years are added they give the year of Herod's death A. u. c. 750 (see Note on Chronology at the end of this article). As Jesus was born during the life of Herod, it follows from these data that the Nativity took place some time before the month of April 750, and if it took place only a few months before Herod's death, then its date would be four years earlier than the Dionysian reckoning (Wieseler).

Three other chronological data occur in the Gospels, but the arguments founded on them are not conclusive. 1. The Baptism of Jesus was followed by a Passover (John ii. 13), at which certain Jews mention that the restoration of their Temple had been in progress for forty-six years (ii. 20), beyond which time the Temple was not yet known (Ant. xv. 9, § 4); this makes this year of age " (Luke iii. 23). As the date of the Temple-restoration can be ascertained, it has been argued from these facts also that the nativity took place at the beginning of A. u. c. 750. But it is sometimes argued that the words that determine our Lord's age are not exact enough to serve as the basis for such a calculation. 2. The appearance of the star to the wise men has been thought likely, by the aid of astronomy, to determine the date. But the opinion that the star in the East was a remarkable conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the sign Pisces, is now rejected. Besides the difficulty of reconciling it with the sacred narrative (Matt. ii. 9) it would throw back the birth of our Lord to A. u. c. 747, which is too early. 3. Zacharias was "a priest of the course of Abia" (Luke i. 5), and he was engaged in the duties of his course when the birth of John the Baptist was foretold to him; and it has been thought possible to calculate, from the place which the course of Abia held in the cycle, the precise time of the Saviour's birth. All these data are discussed below (p. 1391).

In treating of the Life of Jesus, a perfect record of the events would be no more than a reproduction of the four Gospels, and a discussion of those events would swell to the compass of a voluminous commentary. Neither of these would be appropriate here, and in the present article a brief sketch only of the Life can be attempted, drawn up with a view to the two remaining articles, on the Son of God and Saviour.

The Man who was to redeem all men and do for the human race what no one could do for his brother, was not born into the world as others are. The salutation addressed by the Angel to Mary His mother, "Hail! Thou that art highly favored," was the prelude to a new act of divine creation; the first Adam, that sinned, was not born but created; the second Adam, that restored, was born indeed, but in supernatural fashion. "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God " (Luke i. 35). Mary received the announcement of a miracle, the full import of which she could not have understood, with the submission of one who knew that the message came from God; and the Angel departed from her. At first, her betrothed husband, when he heard from her what had taken place, doubted her, but a supernatural communication convinced him of her purity and he took her to be his wife. Not only was the appearance of the Birth of Jesus made the subject of supernatural communications, but that of the Baptism the forerunner also. Thus before the birth of either of these actually taken place, a small knot of persons had been prepared to expect the fulfillment of the divine promises in the Holy One that should be born of Mary (Luke i.).

The prophet Micah had foretold (v. 2) that the future king should be born in Bethlehem of Judaea, in the place where his house had its origin; but Mary dwelt in Nazareth. Augustus, however, had ordered a general census of the Roman empire, and although Judaea, not being a province of the empire, would not necessarily come under such an order, it was included, probably because the intention was already conceived of reducing it after a time to the condition of a province (see Note on Chronology). That such a census was made we can safely conclude from a statement of Tertullian (Apology, ii. 12) that application to Palestine it should be made with reference to Jewish feelings and prejudices, being carried out no doubt by Herod the Jewish king, was quite natural; and so Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, the city of David, to be taxed. From the well-known and much-ennuessed passage in St. Luke, the year 8-20 (Luke ii. 2) it appears that the taxing was not completed till the time of Quirinius (Cyrenius), some years later; and how far it was carried now, cannot be determined; all that we learn is that it brought Joseph, who was of the house of David, from his home to Bethlehem, where the Lord was born. As there was no room in the inn, a manger was the cradle in which Christ the Lord was laid. But signs were not wanting of the greatness of the event that seemed so unimportant. Lowly shepherds were the witnesses of the wonder that accompanied the lowly Saviour's birth; an angel proclaimed to them "good tidings of great joy;" and then the exceeding joy that was in heaven amongst the angels about this mystery of love broke through the silence of night with the words — "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men " (Luke ii. 8-20). We need not suppose that these simple men were cherishing in their hearts the expectation of the Messiah which others had not been so much interested in. They were chosen from the humblest, as were our Lord's companions afterwards, in order to show that God "thath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty " (1 Cor. i. 26-31), and that the poor and meek could apprehend the message of salvation to which kings and priests could turn a deaf ear.

The subject of the Genealogy of our Lord, as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, is discussed fully in another article. [See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.]

The child Jesus is circumcised in due time, is brought to the Temple, and the mother makes the offering for her purification. That offering wanted its peculiar meaning in this case, which was an act of new creation, and not a birth after the common order of our fallen nature. But the seed of the new kingdom was to grow undiscernibly as yet; no exemption was claimed by the "highly favored" mother, and no portent intervened. She made her humble offering like any other Jewish mother, and would have gone her way unnoticed; but here too God suffered not His beloved Son to be without witness, and Simeon and Anna, taught from God that the object of their earnest longings was before them, prophesied of His divine work: the one rejoicing that his eyes had seen the salvation of God, and the other speaking of Him "to all that looked for redemption in Jerusalem" (Luke ii. 29-38).
JESUS CHRIST

Thus recognized amongst His own people, the Saviour was not without witness amongst the heathen. "Wise men from the East" — that is, Persian magi of the Zend religion, in which the idea of a Zoroash or Redeemer was clearly known — guided miraculously by a star or meteor created for the purpose, came and sought out the Saviour to pay him homage. We have said that in the year 474 occurred a remarkable combination of the planets Jupiter and Saturn, and this is supposed to be the sign by which the wise men knew that the birth of some great one had taken place. But, as has been said, the date does not agree with this view, and the account of the Evangelist describes a single star moving before them and guiding their steps. We must suppose that God saw good to speak to the magi in their own way: they were seeking light from the study of the stars, but only physical light could be found, and He guided them to the Source of spiritual light, to the cradle of His Son, by a star miraculously made to appear to them, and to speak intelligibly to them through their preconceptions. The offerings which they brought have been regarded as symbolical: the gold was a tribute to a king, the frankincense was for the use of a priest, and the myrrh for a body preparing for the tomb —

"Aurea nascendi fideantur munera regi, Thura dedere Dom, myrrhae tribuere sepultu."

says Sedulius: but in a more general view these were at any rate the offerings made by worshippers, and in that light must the magi be regarded. The events connected with the birth of our Lord are all significant, and here some of the wisest of the heathen knew before the Redeemer as the first-fruits of the Gentiles, and as a sign that his dominion was to be not merely Jewish, but as wide as the whole world. (See Matt. ii. 1-12; Münzer, Der Stern der Weisen, Copenhagen, 1827; the Commentaries of Alford, Williams, Olshausen, and Hefenber, where the opinions as to the nature of the "star" are discussed.)

A little child made the great Herod quake upon his throne. When he knew that the magi were come to hail their King and Lord, and did not stop at his palace, but passed on to a humbler roof, and when he found that they would not return to betray this child to him, he put to death all the children in Bethlehem that were under two years old. The crime was great; but the number of the victims was less than the numbers like Bethlehem were small enough to escape special record among the wicked acts of Herod from Josephus and other historians, as it had no political interest. A confused indication of it, however, is found in Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 4).

Joseph, warned by a dream, flees to Egypt with the young child, beyond the reach of Herod's arm. This flight of our Lord from his own land to the land of darkness and idolatry — a land associated even to a proverb with all that was hostile to God and his people, impresses on us the reality of his humiliation. Herod's cup was well nigh full: and the doom that soon overtook him could have arrested him in his bloody attempt; but Jesus, in accepting humanity, accepted all its incidents. He was saved, not by the intervention of God, but by the obedience of Joseph; and from the storms of persecution He had to use the common means of escape (Matt. ii. 13-23; Thomas' Kepulis, ii. 13, and Commentaries). A time passed in less than a year, Jesus returned with his parents to their own land, and went to Nazareth, where they abode.

Except as to one event the Evangelists are silent upon the succeeding years of our Lord's life down to the commencement of his ministry. When He was twelve years old He was found in the temple, hearing the doctors and asking them questions (Luke ii. 49-52). We are shown this one fact that we may know that at the time when the Jews considered childhood to be passing into youth, Jesus was already aware of his mission, and consciously preparing for it, although years elapsed before its actual commencement. This fact at once confirms and illustrates such a general expression as "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." (Luke i. 52.) His public ministry did not begin with a sudden impulse, but was prepared for by his whole life. The consciousness of his divine nature and power grew and ripened and strengthened until the time of his showing unto Israel.

Thirty years had elapsed from the birth of our Lord to the opening of his ministry. In that time great changes had come over the chosen people. Herod the Great had united under him almost all the original kingdom of David; after the death of that prince it was dismembered for ever. Archelaus succeeded to the kingdom of Judaea, under the title of Ethnarch; Herod Antipas became tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and Philip tetrarch of Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, Batanea, and Pæmus. The Emperor Augustus promised Archelaus the title of king; if he should prove worthy; but in the tenth year of his reign (u. c. 750) he was deprived in deference to the hostile feelings of the Jews, was banished to Vienne in Gaul, and from that time his dominions passed under the direct power of Rome, being annexed to Syria, and governed by a procurator. No king nor ethnarch held Judaea afterwards, if we except the three years when it was under Agrippa I. Marks are not wanting of the irritation kept up in the minds of the Jews by the sight of a foreigner exercising acts of power over the people whom David once ruled. The publicans (portilouses) who collected tribute for the Roman empire were everywhere detested; and as a marked class is likely to be a degraded one, the Jews saw everywhere the most despised among the people exacting from them all, and more than all (Luke iii. 13), that the foreign tyrant required. Constant complaints were made by the people to the office of high priest, perhaps from a necessary policy. Josephus says that there were twenty-eight high-priests from the time of Herod to the burning of the Temple (Ant. xx. 10). The sect of Judas the Gaulonite, which protested against paying tribute to Caesar, and against bowing the neck to an alien yoke, expressed a conviction which all Jews shared. The sense of oppression and wrong would tend to shape all the hopes of a Messiah, so far as they still existed, to the conception of a warrior who should deliver them from a hateful political bondage.

It was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius the Emperor, reckoning from his joint rule with Augustus (Jan. u. c. 765), and not from his sole rule (Aug
This makes a complete conception of the temptation impossible for minds wherein temptation is always associated with the possibility of sin. But whilst we must be content with an incomplete conception, we must avoid the wrong conceptions that are often substituted for it. Some suppose the account before us to describe what takes place in a vision or ecstasy of our Lord; so that both the temptation and its answer arise from within. Others think that the temptation was suggested from within, but in a state, not of sleep or ecstasy, but of complete consciousness. Others consider this narrative to have been a parable of our Lord, of which He has told a story, as if told by himself; but the account sets aside the historical testimony of the Gospels: the temptation as there described arose not from the sinless mind of the Son of God, where indeed thoughts of evil could not have harbored, but from Satan, the enemy of the human race. Nor can it be supposed that this account is a mere parable, unless we assume that Matthew and Luke have wholly misunderstood their Master's meaning. The three temptations are addressed to the three forms in which the disease of sin makes its appearance on the soul—to the sense of sin, and the love of praise, and the desire of gain (1 John iii. 16). But there is one element common to them all—they are attempts to call up a willful and wayward spirit in contrast to a patient self-denying one. In the first temptation the Redeemer is an hungered, and when the Devil bids Him, if He be the Son of God, command that the stones may be made bread, there would seem to be no great sin in this use of divine power to overcome the pressing human want. Our Lord's answer is required to show us where the essence of the temptation lay. He takes the words of Moses to the children of Israel (Deut. viii. 3), which mean, not that men must dispense with bread and feed only on the study of the divine word, but that our meat and drink, our food and raiment, are all the work of the Creator of food; and that a sense of dependence on God is the duty of man. He tells the tempter that as the sons of Israel standing in the wilderness were forced to humble themselves and to wait upon the hand of God for the bread from heaven which He gave them, so the Son of Man, fasting in the wilderness from hunger, will be humble and will wait upon His Father in heaven for the word that shall bring Him food, and will not be fast to deliver Himself from that dependent state, but will wait patiently for the gifts of His goodness. In the second temptation, it is not probable that they left the wilderness, but that Satan was allowed to suggest to our Lord's mind the place, and the marvel that could be wrought there. They stood, as has been suggested, on the lofty porch that overlooked the Valley of Rephaim, where the steep side of a valley was added to the height of the Temple (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 11, § 5), and made a depth that the eye could scarcely have borne to look down upon. "Cast thyself down,"—perform in the Holy City, in a public place, a wonder that will at once make all men confess that none but the Son of God could perform it. A passage from the 93rd Psalm is quoted to give a color to...

the argument. Our Lord replies by an allusion to another text that carries us back again to the same wandering in the wilderness. He shall not tempt the Lord your God, as ye tempted Him in Mas'sah (Deut. vi. 16). Their conduct is more fully described by the Psalmist as a tempting of God: They tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust; yea, they spoke against God: they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? Behold he smote the rock that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed. Can he give bread also? Can he provide flesh for his people? (Ps. lxviii.) Just parallel was the temptation here. God has protected Thee so far, brought Thee up, put his seal upon Thee by manifest proofs of his favor. Can He do this also? Can He send the angels to buoy Thee up in Thy descent? Can He make the air thick to sustain, and the earth soft to receive Thee? The appropriate answer is, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. In the third temptation it is not asserted that there is any mountain from which the eyes of common men can see the world and its kingdoms at once displayed; it was with the mental vision of One who knew all things that these kingdoms and their glory were seen. And Satan has now begun to discover, if he knew not from the beginning, that One is here who can become the King of kings and Lord of lords. All these things will I give Thee if Thou wilt fall down and worship me. In St. Luke the words are fuller: All this power will I give Thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me, and to whosoever I will I give it: but these words are the lie of the tempter, which he uses to mislead. Thou art come to be great — to be a King on the earth; but I am strong; and will resist Thee. Thou shalt be imprisoned and slain; some of them shall fall away through fear; others shall forsake Thy cause, loving this present world. Cast in Thy lot with me; let Thy kingdom be an earthly kingdom, only the greatest of all — a kingdom such as the Jews seek to see established on the throne of David. Worship me by living as the children of this world live, and so honoring me in Thy life: then shall all the nations of the world be gathered together and shall see this and shall know that this speaker is the Son of God. He that hath the power and the spirit to guide the destinies of the nations was no longer speaking with Jesus. The question here puts a new point upon the matter. He followed right in foreshadowing such trials to Him; but though clouds and darkness hung over the path of his ministry He must work the works of Him that sent Him, and not another work: He must worship God and none other. Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve. As regards the order of the temptations, there are internal marks that the account of Matthew assigns them their historical order: St. Luke transposes the two last, for which various reasons are suggested by commentators (Matt. iv. 1-11; Mark i. 12, 13; Luke iv. 1-13).

Deserting for a time the historical order, we shall find that the records of this first portion of his ministry, from the temptation to the transfiguration, consist mainly (1) of miracles, which prove his divine commission; (2) of discourses and parables on the doctrine of the kingdom of heaven; (3) of incidents showing the behavior of various persons when brought into contact with our Lord. The two former may require some general remarks, the last will unfold themselves with the narrative.

1. The Miracles. — The power of working miracles was granted to many under the Old Covenant: Moses (Ex. iii. 20, vii.-xi.) delivered the people of Israel from Egypt by means of them; and Josue following in his steps, enjoyed the same power (Matt. xii. 22) for the completion of his work (Josh. iii. 13-16). Samuel (Judg. xv. 19), Elijah (I K. xvii. 10, 12), and Elisha (2 K. ii.-vi.) possessed the same gift. The prophets foretold that the Messiah, of whom Moses was the type, would show signs and wonders as he had done. Isaiah, in describing his kingdom, says Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing (Is. xxxv. 5, 6). According to the same prophet, the Christ was called to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house (Is. lix. 7). And all who looked for the coming of the Messiah expected that the power of miracles would be one of the tokens of his constitution. When John the Baptist, in his prison, heard of the works of Jesus, he sent his disciples to inquire, Art Thou He that should come (ψευδάτος = the Messiah), or do we look for another? Our Lord, in answer to this, only points to his miracles, leaving to John the inference from them, that no one could do such works except the promised One. When our Lord cured a blind and dumb demoniac, the people, struck with the miracle, said, This is the Son of God (xv. 28), and when they had seen the signs he did, and the things that were heard out of the mouth of the madman, they fell down, and worshiped him (xii. 21). On another like occasion it was asked, When Christ cometh will He do more miracles than these which this man hath done? (John vii. 31). So that the expectation that Messiah would work miracles existed amongst the people, and was founded on the language of prophecy. Our Lord's miracles are described in the New Testament by several names: they are signs (σημάτα), wonders (παράπτωμα), works (παράπτωμα), and mighty works (σημαίνεσις), according to the point of view from which they are regarded. They are indeed astonishing works, wrought as signs of the might and presence of God; and they are powers or mighty works because they are such as no power short of the divine could have effected. But if the object had been merely to work wonders, the cure of the blind and dumb in silence would be sufficient. A miracle is performed in the presence of the author of the miracle and the beholders; it is not seen by their eyes or comprehended by their minds. It is therefore a fair question whether the whole of the miracles of our Lord, convenient as they have been, have not been the best means of producing the effect, since many of them were wrought for the good of obscure people, before witnesses chiefly of the humble and uneducated class, and in the course of the ordinary life of our Lord, which lay not amongst those who made it their special business to inquire into the claims of a prophet. When requests were made for a more striking sign than those which He had wrought for a sign from heaven (Luke xi. 16), it was refused. When the tempter suggested that He should cast Himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple before all men, the temptation was rejected. The miracles of our Lord were to be, not wonders merely, but signs: and not merely signs of preternatural power, but of the scope and character of his ministry, and of the divine nature of his Person. This will be evident from an examination of those which are more particularly described in the Gospels. Nearly forty cases of this kind appear; but that they are only examples taken out of a very great number, the Evangelists frequently remind us (John ii. 23; Matt. viii. 16 and paral.; iv. 23; xii. 13 and paral.; Luke vi. 19; Matt. xi. 5; xii. 38; ix. 36; xiv. 14, 39; xv. 30; xix. 2; xxi. 14). These cases might be classified. There are three instances of restoration to life, each under peculiar conditions: the daughter of Jairus was lateily dead; the widow's son at Nain was being carried out to the grave; and Lazarus had been four days dead, and was returning to corruption (Matt. xviii. 18; Luke xi. 12; John xi. 1, etc.). There are about six cases of demoniac possession, each with its own circumstances: one in the synagogue at Caper-num, where the unclean spirit bore witness to Jesus as "the holy one of God" (Mark i. 24); a second, that of the man who dwelt among the tombs in the country of the Gadarenes, whose state is so forcibly described by St. Mark (v. 2); and who also bore witness to Him as "the Son of the Most High God;" a third, the case of a dumb man (Matt. ix. 32); a fourth, that of a youth who was brought to Him as He came down from the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 15), and whom the disciples had vainly tried to heal; a fifth, that of another dumb man, whom the Jews thought He had healed "through Belzebub the prince of the devils" (Luke xi. 15); and a sixth, that of the Syrian-Capernaum girl whose mother's faith was so tremendous (Matt. xvii. 22). There are about seventeen recorded cases of the cure of bodily sickness, including fever, leprosy, palsy, inveterate weakness, the unnamed lumb, the issue of blood of twelve years' standing, dropsey, blindness, deafness, and dumbness (John iv. 47; Matt. vii. 2, 14, ix. 2; John v. 5; Matt. xii. 10, viii. 3, ix. 20, 27; Mark viii. 22; John ix. 1; Luke xiii. 10, xvii. 11, xviii. 35, xxii. 51). These three groups of miracles all pertained to the cure, either by setting aside natural laws and conditions — now in passing unseen through a hostile crowd (Luke iv. 30); now in procuring miraculous draughts of fishes, when the fisher's skill had failed (Luke v. 4; John xxi. 6); now in stilling a tempest (Matt. viii. 26); now in walking to his disciples on the sea (Matt. xiv. 25); now in the transformation of his comeliness by a heavenly light and glory (Matt. xiv. 1); and again in seeking and finding the shield for the customary tribute to the Temple in the fish's mouth (Matt. xvii. 27). In a third class of these miracles, we find our Lord overawing the wills of men: as when He twice cleared the Temple of the traders (John ii. 13; Matt. xxii. 12); and when his look staggered the officers that came to take Him (John xviii. 6). And in a fourth subdivision will stand one miracle only, where his power was used for destruction — the case of the barren fig-tree (Matt. xxv. 19). The destruction of the herd of swine does not properly rank here; it was a permitted act of the devils which He cast out, and is no more to be held to the account of the Redeemer than are all the sicknesses and sufferings in the hand of the Jews which He permitted to waste and destroy, having, as He showed by his miracles, abundant power to prevent them. All the miracles of this latter class show our Lord to be one who wields the power of God. No one can suspend the laws of nature save He who made them; when bread is wonderfully multiplied, and the fickle sea becomes a firm floor to walk on, the God of the universe is working the change, directly or through his deputy. Very remarkable, as a claim to divine power, is the mode in which Jesus justified acts of healing on the Sabbath — "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (John v. 17): which means, "As God the Father, even on the Sabbath-day, keeps all the laws of the universe at work, making the planets roll, and the grass grow, and the animal pulses beat, so do I my work: I stand above the law of the Sabbath, as He does." a

On reviewing all the recorded miracles, we see at once that they are signs of the nature of Christ's Person and mission. None of them are done merely to astonish: and hardly any of them, even of those which prove his power more than his love, but tend directly towards the good of men in some way or other. They show how active and unwearied was his love; they also show the diversity of its operation. Every degree of human need — from Lazarus now returning to dust — through the palsy that has seized on brain and nerves, and is almost death — through the leprosy which, appearing on the skin, was really a subtle poison that had tainted every drop of blood in the veins — up to the injury to the particular hand in which bread is received succor from the powerful word of Christ; and to wrest his buried friend from corruption and the worm was neither more nor less difficult than to heal a withered hand or restore to its place an ear that had been cut off. And this intimate connection of the miracles with the work of Christ will explain the fact that faith was in many cases required as a condition for their performance. According to the common definition of a miracle, one would seem to be a capable witness of its performance: yet Jesus sometimes required from working wonders before the unbelieving (Mark vi. 5, 6), and sometimes did the work that was asked of him because of the faith of them that asked it (Mark vii. 27). The miracles were intended to attract the witnesses of them to become followers of Jesus and members of the kingdom of heaven. Where faith was already so far fixed on Him as to believe that He could do miracles, there was the fit preparation for a faith in higher and heavenly things. If they knew that He could heal the body, they only required teaching to enlarge their view of him into that of a healer of the diseased spirit, and a giver of true life to those that are dead in trespasses and sins. On the other hand, where men's minds were in a state of bristling and actagonism against Him, to display miracles before them would but increase their condemnation. a If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not believed; but now I have they both seen and hated both Me and my Father" (John xv. 24). This result was inevitable: in order to offer salvation to those who are to be saved, the offer must be heard by some of those who will reject it. Miracles then have two purposes: the proximate and ultimate purpose of doing a work of love to them that need it, and the higher purpose of revealing Christ in his own Person and nature as the Son of God and Saviour of men. Hence the rejection of the demand for a sign from heaven — for some great celestial pheomenon which all should see and none could dispute. He refused to give such a sign to the "assembly" that asked it: and once He offered them a sign, but not a sign of the kind of miracle He as to his burial and resurrection: thus refusing them the kind of sign which they required. So again, in answer to a similar demand, He said, "Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up" — alluding to his death and resurrection. It is as though He had said, "All the miracles that I have been working are only intended to call attention to the one great miracle of My presence on earth; for the humble servant, that is the kind of miracle I will work. If you wish for a greater sign, I refer you to the great miracle about to be wrought in Me — that of My resurrection." The Lord's words do not mean that there shall be no sign; He is working wonders daily: but that He will not travel out of the plan He has proposed for Himself. A sign in the sun and moon and stars would prove that the power of God was there; but it would not teach men to understand the mission of God Incarnate, of the loving and suffering friend and brother of men. The miracles which He wrought are those best suited to this purpose; and those who had faith, though but in small measure, were the fittest to behold them. They knew Him but a little; but even to think of Him as a Prophet who was able to heal their infirmity was a germ of faith sufficient to make them fit hearers of His doctrine and spectators of His deeds. But those gained nothing from the Divine work who, unable to display the evidence of their eyes and ears, took refuge in the last argument of malice, "He casteth out devils through Beelzebub the prince of the devils."

What is a miracle? A miracle must be either something done in contravention of all law, or it is a transgression of all natural laws, whether known now or to be known hereafter, on account of some higher law whose operation interferes with them. Only the last of these definitions could apply to the Christian miracles. God has chosen to govern the world by laws, having impressed on the face of nature in characters not to be mistaken the great truth that He rules the universe by law and order, would not adopt in the kingdom of grace a different plan from that which in the kingdom of nature He has pursued. If the seen universe requires a scheme of order, and the spiritual world is governed without a scheme (so to speak), by caprice, then the God of Nature appears to contradict the God of Grace. Spinoza has not failed to make the most of this argument; but he fails not the true Christian idea of a miracle, but one which he substitutes for it (Tract. Theol. Polit. 6). Nor can the Christian miracles be regarded as cases in which the wonder depends on the anticipation only of some law that is not now understood, but shall be so hereafter. In the first place many of them go beyond, in the amount of their operation, all the wildest hopes of the scientific discoverer. In the second place, the very conception of a miracle is vitiated by such an explanation. All distinction in kind between the man who is somehow the agent of his own knowledge, and the worker of miracles, would be taken away; and the miracles of one age, as the steam-engine, the telegraph-wire, become the tools and toys of the next. It remains then that a miracle is to be regarded as the overruling of some physical law by some higher law that is brought in. We are invited in the Gospels to regard the miracles as not as the work of the devil, but of Jesus of Nazareth. They are identified with the work of redemption. There are even cautions against teaching them separately — against severing them from their connection with his work. Eye-witnesses of His miracles were strictly charged to make no report of them to others (Matt. ix. 30; Mark v. 43, vii. 36). And yet when John the Baptist sent his dis-picents to ascertain whether the Messiah were indeed come in the flesh, the answer he sent back was the very thing we have been forbidden to other — a report of miracles. The explanation of this seeming contradiction is that wherever a report of the signs and wonders was likely to be conveyed without a right conception of the Person of Christ and the kind of doctrine which He taught, there He suffered not the report to be carried. Now had the purpose been to reveal his divine nature only, this caution would not have been needed, nor would faith have been a needful preliminary for the apprehension of miracles, nor would the temptations of Satan in the wilderness have been the cunning snares they were intended to be, nor would it have been necessary to refuse the convincing sign from heaven to the Jews that asked it. But the part of his work to which attention was to be directed in connection with the miracles, was the mystery of our redeem-tion by One who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross" (Phil. ii. 5-8). Very few are the miracles in which divine power is exerced without a manifest reference to the purpose of assisting men. He works for the most part as the Power of God in a state of humiliation for the good of men. Not insignificant here are the cases in which He condescends to use means, wholly inadequate indeed in any other hands than his; but still they are a token that He has descended, into the region where means are employed, from that in which even the spoken word can control the subservient agents of nature. He laid his hand upon the patient (Matt. viii. 3, 15, ix. 22, xx. 34; Luke vii. 14; xiii. 51). He anointed the eyes of the blind with clay (John ix. 6). He put his finger into the ear and touched the tongue of the deaf and dumb sufferer in Decapolis (Mark vii. 33, 34). He treated the blind man at Bethesda in like fashion (Mark viii. 23). Even where He fed the five thousand and the four, He did not create bread out of nothing, which would have been as easy for Him, but much bread out of little: and He looked up and blessed the meal, and said, the man would do (Matt. xiv. 19; John vi. 11; Matt. xv. 36). At the grave of Lazarus He lifted up his eyes and gave thanks that the Father had heard Him (John x. 41, 42), and this great miracle is accompanied by tears and groanings, that show how One so mighty to save has truly become a man with human soul and sympathies. The worker of the miracles is God become Man; and as signs of his Person and work are they to be measured.
Hence, when the question of the credibility of miracles is discussed, it ought to be preceded by the question, Is redemption from the sin of Adam a probable thing? Is it probable that there are spiritual laws as well as natural, regulating the relations between us and the Father of our spirits?
Is it probable that, such laws existing, the needs of men and the goodness of God would lead to an expression of them, complete or partial, by means of revelation? If these questions are all decided in the affirmative, then Hume's argument against miracles is already half overthrown. 'No testi-momy,' says Hume, 'is sufficient to establish a miracle, unless the testimony be of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavors to establish; and even in that case there is a mutual destruction of arguments, and the superior only gives us an assurance suitable to that degree of force which remains after deducing the inferior' (Essays, vol. ii. p. 130).
If the Christian miracles are parts of a scheme which bears other marks of a divine origin, they prove the existence of a set of spiritual laws with which Christianity is connected, and of which it is the expression; and then the difficulty of believing them disappears. They are not 'against nature,' but above it; they are the new caprices of Provience breaking in upon ages of order, but they are glimpses of the divine spiritual cosmos permitted to be seen amidst the laws of the natural world, of which they take precedence, just as in the physical world one law can supersede another. And as to the testimony for them let Paley speak: 'Twelve men, whose probity and good sense I had long known, should seriously and circumstantially relate to me an account of a miracle wrought before their eyes, and in which it was impossible they should be deceived: if the governor of the country, hearing a rumor of this account, should call those men into his presence, and offer them a short proposal, either to confess the imposture or submit to be put to death, and if they should peremptorily with one voice to acknowledge that there existed any falsehood or imposture in the case: if this threat were communicated to them separately, yet with no different effect; if it was at last executed, if I myself saw them one after another consenting to be racked, burnt, or strangled, rather than give up the truth of their account: . . . there exists not a skeptic in the world who would believe them, or who would defend such incredulity' (Evidence, Introduction, p. 6). In the theory of a 'mutual destruction' of arguments so that the belief in miracles would represent exactly the balance between the evidence for and against them, Hume contradicts the commonest religions, and indeed worldly, experience; he confounds the state of dedereliction and examination with that of conviction.
When the world, the people, who despise the great central miracle of the resurrection, was allowed to touch the Saviour's wounded side, and in an access of undoubting faith exclaimed, 'My Lord, and my God!' who does not see that at that moment all the former doubts were wiped out, were as though they had never been? How could be carry about those doubts or any recollection of them, to be a set-off against the complete concfusion that had succeeded them? It is so with the Christian life in every case; faith, which is 'the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen,' could not continue to weigh and balance evidence for and against the truth: the conviction either rises to a perfect moral certainty, or it continues tainted and worthless as a principle of action.

The lapse of time may somewhat alter the aspect of the evidence for miracles, but it does not weaken
it. It is more difficult (so to speak) to cross-examine witnesses who delivered their testimony ages ago; but another kind of evidence has been their gathering strength in successive ages. The miracles are all consequences and incidents of one great miracle, the Incarnation; and if the Incarnation is found true, the rest become highly probable. But this very doctrine has been thoroughly proved through all these ages. Nations have adopted it, and they are the greatest nations of the world.
Men have lived and died in it, have given up their lives to preach it; have found that it did not disappoint them, but held true under them to the last. The existence of Christianity itself has become an evidence. It is a phenomenon easy to understand if we grant the miracle of the Incarnation, but is an effect without an adequate cause if that be denied.

Miracles then are offered us in the Gospels, not as startling violations of the order of nature, but as consequences of the revelation of His self made by Jesus Christ for man's salvation, and as such they are not violations of order at all, but interferences of the spiritual order with the natural. They are abundantly witnessed by earnest and competent men, who did not aim at any earthly reward for their teaching; and they are prodigious, together with his pure life and holy doctrine, that Jesus was the Son of God. (See Dean Trench On the Miracles, an important work: [Moyley, Boyington Lectures, 1865]; Baumgarten, Leben Jesu; Paley's Evidences; Butler's Analogy; Hase, Leben Jesu; with the various Commentaries on the New Testament.)

2. The Parables.—In considering the Lord's teaching we turn first to the parables. In all ages the aid of the imagination has been sought to present the moral of a truth, and that in various ways: in the parable, where some story of ordinary doings is made to convey a spiritual meaning, beyond what the narrative itself contains, and without any assertion that the narrative does or does not present an actual occurrence, in the fable, where a story, for the most part an impossible one, of talking beast and reasoning bird, is made the vehicle of a taught or abstract lesson of worldly wisdom; in the allegory, which is a story with a moral or spiritual meaning, in which the lesson taught is so prominent as almost wholly to supersede the story that clothes it, and the names and actions and they are so chosen that no interlocutor shall be required for the application: and lastly, in the proverb, which is often only a parable or a fable condensed into a few pithy words ([Parable] [Ezek. xlii.
32; Prov. xiv. 23; xix. 11, 17, 28; Prov. i.
22, 29; Job. xii. 24, 25; xiii. 15]; and other [Parable] [Ezek. xii. 23, 32; Prov. i.
22, 29; xii. 15]; and other Commentaries: Hase, Leben Jesu, § 67, 4th ed.; Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 588, fll.).
Nearly fifty parables are preserved in the Gospels,
and they are only selected from a larger number (Mark iv. 33). Each Evangelist, even St. Mark, has preserved some that are peculiar to himself

1854 JESUS CHRIST JESUS CHRIST
St. John never uses the word parable, but that of proverb (παραφιά), which the other Evangelists nowhere employ. In reference to this mode of teaching, our Lord tells the disciples, "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God; but to others in parables, that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand" (Luke vii. 10); and some have hastily concluded from this that the parable — the clearest of all modes of teaching — was employed to conceal knowledge from those who were not susceptible of it, and that this was its chief purpose. But it was chosen not for this negative object, but for its positive advantages in the instruction of the disciples. The nature of the kingdom of heaven was not understood even by disciples; hard even to them were the sayings that described it, and the hearing of them caused many to go back and walk no more with Him (John vi. 65). If there was any mode of teaching better suited than another to the purpose of preserving truths for the memory that were not yet accepted by the heart — for keeping the seed safe till the time should arrive for the quickening Spirit to come down and give it growth — that mode would be the best suited to the peculiar position of the disciples. And any means of translating an abstract thought into sensible language has ever been the object of poet and teacher in all conditions of life. It was the best means of catching the souls of the visible world for the deeper acts of thought has been the clearest and most successful expositor. The parable affords just such an instrument as was required. Who could banish from his mind, when once understood, the image of the house built on the sand, as the symbol of the faithless soul unable to stand by the truth in the day of temptation? To whom does not the parable of the prodigal son bring back the thought of God's merciful kindness towards the erring? But without such striking images it would have been impossible (to use mere human language) to make known to the disciples in their half enlightened state the mysteries of faith in the Son of God as a principle of life, of repentance from sin, and of an assurance of peace and welcome from the God of mercy. Eastern teachers have made this mode of instruction familiar; the originality of the parables lay not in the method of the method, but in the parables and new truths which the stories taught so aptly. And Jesus had another purpose in selecting this form of instruction: He foresaw that many would reject Him, and on them He would not lay a heavier burden than they needs must bear. He did not offer them daily and hourly, in their plainest form, the grand truths of sin and atonement, of judgment and heaven and hell, and in so doing multiply occasions of blasphemy. "Those that were without," heard the parable; but it was an aimless story to them if they sought no moral purpose under it, and a dark saying, passing comprehension, if they did so seek. When the Lord gathered round Him those that were willing to be his, and explained to them at length the parable and its application (Matt. xii. 19-21), than the light thus thrown on it was not easy to extinguish in their memory. And even to the apostles, who with all the means of advantage there was no doubt a certain difference; some listened with indifference, and some with unbelieving and resisting minds; and of both minds some remained in their aversion, some or less active, from the Son of God unto the end, and some were converted after He was risen. To these we may suppose that the parables which had rested in their memories as vivid pictures, yet still a dead letter, so far as moral import is concerned, because by the Holy Spirit, whose business it was to teach men all things and to bring all things to their remembrance (John xiv. 26), a quick and powerful light of truth, lighting up the dark places with a brightness never again to fade from their eyes. The parable unapplied is a dark saying; the parable explained is the clearest of all teaching. When language is used in Holy scripture which would seem to treat the parables as means of concealment rather than of instruction, it must be taken to refer to the unexplained parable — to the cypress without the key — the symbol without the interpretation.

Besides the parables, the more direct teaching of our Lord is conveyed in many discourses, dispersed through the Gospels; of which three may be here selected as examples, the sermon on the Mount (Matt. vii.-xiv.), the discourse after the feeding of the five thousand (John vi. 22-65), and the final discourse and prayer which preceded the Passion (John xvi.-xvii.). These are selected principally because they mark three distinct periods in the ministry of Jesus, the opening of it, the principal change in the tone of its teaching, and the solemn close.

Notwithstanding the endeavor to establish that the sermon on the Mount of St. Matthew is different from the sermon on the plain of St. Luke, the evidence for their being one and the same discourse greatly preponderates. If so, then its historical position must be fixed from St. Luke; and its earlier place in St. Matthew's Gospel must be owing to the Evangelist's wish to commence the account of the ministry of Jesus with a summary of his teaching; an intention further illustrated by the mode in which the Evangelist has wrought in with his report of the discourse several sayings which St. Luke connects with the various facts which on different occasions drew them forth (comp. Luke xiv. 33, xi. 17, xii. 38, 59, xvi. 18, with places in Matt. v.; also Luke xi. 1-4, xii. 33, 34, xi. 34-36, xvi. 13, xii. 22-31, with places in Matt. vi.; also Luke xi. 9-13, xiii. 24, 25-27, with places in Matt. vii.). Yet this is done without violence to the connection and structure of the discourse. The love of the Teacher in the whole and new words present as the Messiah, the Anointed Prophet of the chosen people, the successor of Moses, sets at the head of his ministry the giving of the Christian law with its bearing on the Jewish. From Luke we learn that Jesus had gone up into a mountain to pray, that on the morning following He made up the number of his twelve Apostles, and solemnly appointed them, and then descending He stood upon a level place and spake to his disciples. These words of St. Matthew's text in the parables and in these passages, and the fact that they are present as the Messiah, the Anointed Prophet of the chosen people, the successor of Moses, sets at the head of his ministry the giving of the Christian law with its bearing on the Jewish. From Luke we learn that Jesus had gone up into a mountain to pray, that on the morning following He made up the number of his twelve Apostles, and solemnly appointed them, and then descending He stood upon a level place (ουραβαί απο θεον στηρι χθονικα του θεον κοινωνικα τον και ανωμοιον Λουκα 17), not necessarily at the bottom of the mountain, but where the multitude could stand round and hear, and so he taught them in a solemn address the laws and constitution of his new kingdom, the kingdom of Heaven. He tells them who are meet to be citizens of that heavenly polity, and in so doing renews almost every quarter on which the world sets a value. And the spirit that is in these discourses that of the law and the prophets, that of faith and of hope, that of charity and of mercy, and of the meek, those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, the merciful, the pure, and the peace-makers, are all "blessed," are all possessed of the temper which will assert well with that heavenly kingdom, in contrast to the proud, the confident, the great and successful, whom the world honors.
example, who, when He might have summed more than twelve legions of Angels to his aid, allowed the Jews to revile and slay Him. And yet it is not possible at once to wipe out from our social arrangements the principle of retribution. The robber who takes a coat must not be encouraged to seize the cloak also; to give to every one that asks all that he asks would be an encouragement to sloth and shameless impiety. But yet the awakened conscience will find out a hundred ways in which the spirit of this precept may be carried out, even in our imperfect social state; and the power of this loving policy will be felt by those who attempt it. Finally, our Lord teaches us the art of his divine law by words full of sublime wisdom. To the crampèd and confined love of the Rabbis, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy," He opposes this noble rule — "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; for He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. . . . Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." (Matt. v. 44, 45, 48.) To this part of the sermon, which St. Luke has not preserved, but which St. Matthew, writing as it were with his face turned towards his Jewish countrymen, could not preternat, succeed precepts on absolving; on prayer, on forgiveness, on fasting, on trust in God's providence, and on tolerance; all of them tuned to one of two notes: that a man's whole nature must be offered to God, and that it is man's duty to do to others as he would have them do to him. An earnest appeal on the difficulty of a godly life, and the worthlessness of mere profession, cast in the form of a parable, concludes this wonderful discourse. The differences between the reports of the two Evangelists are many. In the former Gospel the sermon occupies one hundred and seven verses: in the latter, thirty. The longer report includes the exposition of the relation of the Gospel to the Law: it also draws together, as we have seen, some passages which St. Luke reports elsewhere and in another connection; and where the two contain the same matter, that of Luke is somewhat more compressed. But in taking the one for the other, the difference of purpose and the need of the context is to be borne in mind: the morality of the Gospel is to be fully set forth at the beginning of our Lord's ministry, and especially in its bearing on the Law as usually received by the Jews, for whose use especially this Gospel was designed. And when this discourse is compared with the later examples to which we shall presently refer, the fact comes out more distinctly, that we have here the Code of the Christian Lawgiver, rather than the whole Gospel; that the standard of Christian duty is here fixed, but the means for raising men to the level where the observance of such a law is at all possible are not yet pointed out. The hearers learned how Christians would act and think, and to what degree of moral purity they would aspire, in the state of salvation; but how that state was to be purchased for them, or conveyed over to them, is not yet pointed out.

The next example of the teaching of Jesus must be taken from a later epoch in his ministry. It is probable that the great discourse in John vi. took place about the time of the Transfiguration, just before which He began to reveal to the disciples the
of his sufferings (Matt. xvi. and parallels), which was the special and frequent theme of his teaching until the end. The effect of his personal work on the disciples was doubtless the subject. He had taught them that He was the Christ, and had given their law, wider and deeper far than that of Moses. But the objection to every law applies more strongly the purer and higher the law is; and "how to perform that which I will" is a question that grows more difficult to answer as the standard of obedience is raised. It is that question which our Lord proceeds to answer here. The teaching of the Teacher, which had lately taken place; and from this miracle He preaches yet a greater, namely, that all spiritual life is imparted to the disciples from Him, and that they must feed on Him that their souls may live. He can feed them with something more than manna, even with Himself; "for the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven and giveth life unto the world" (John vi. 29-40). The Jews murmur at this hard doctrine, and He warns them that it is a kind of test of those who have been with Him: "No man can come to Me except the Father which hath sent Me draw him." He repeats that He is the bread of life; and they murmur yet more (vers. 41-52). He presses it on them still more strongly: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whose extath my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me" (vv. 33-57). After this discourse many of the disciples went back and walked no more with Him. They could not conceive how salvation could depend on a condition so strange, new, even so revolting. However we may blame them for their want of confidence in their Teacher, it is not to be imputed to them as a fault that they found a doctrine, which in itself is difficult, and here was clothed in dark and obscure expressions, beyond the grasp of their understanding at that time. For that doctrine was, that Christ had taken our fleshly nature, to suffer in it, and to shed his blood. The feeding on the five thousand had lately given an impression of his atoning death are imparted find it to be their spiritual food and life, and the condition of their resurrection to life everlasting.

Whether this passage refers, and in what degree, to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is a question on which commentators have been much divided, but two observations should in some degree guide our interpretation: the one, that if the pre-natural reference of the discourse had been to the Lord's Supper, it would have been uttered at the institution of that rite, and not before, at a time when the disciples could not possibly make application of it to a sacrament of which they had never then heard; the other, that the form of speech in this discourse comes so near that which is used in instituting the Lord's Supper, that it is impossible to exclude all reference to that Sacrament. The Redeemer had been, when he was with them, the body which should suffer on the Cross, and to the blood which shall be poured out. This great sacrifice is not only to be looked on, but to be believed; and not only believed, but appropriated to the believer, to become part of his very heart and life. Faith, here as elsewhere, is the means of apprehending it, but when it is once hid hold of, it will be as much a part of the believer as the food that nourishes the body but can be acquired only through the passages in the other Evangelists, in which our Lord about this very time prepares them for his sufferings, He connects with the announcement a warning to the disciples that all who would come after Him must show the fruit of his death in their lives (Matt. xvi., Mark viii., Luke ix.). And this new principle, infused into them by the life and death of the Redeemer, by his taking our flesh and suffering in it (for neither of these is excluded), is to believers the seed of eternal life. The believer "hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John vi. 54). Now the words of Jesus in instituting the Lord's Supper come very near to the expressions in this discourse: "This is my body which is given for you (ἦλθεν ἐμοί). . . . This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you" (Luke xxii. 19, 20). That the Lord's Supper is a means of applying to us through faith the fruits of the incarnation and the atonement of Christ, is generally admitted; and if so, the discourse before us will apply to that sacrament, not certainly to the exclusion of other means of appropriating the saving death of Christ, but still with great force, inasmuch as the Lord's Supper is the most striking symbol of the application to us of the Lord's body. Here in a bold figure the disciples are told that they must eat the flesh of Christ and drink his blood; whilst in the sacrament the same figure becomes an act. Here the language is meant to be general; and there it finds its most striking special application, but not its only one. And the uttering of these words at an epoch that preceded by some months the first celebration of the Lord's Supper was probably intended to preclude that special and limited application of it which would narrow it down to the sacrament only, and out of which much false and even idolatrous teaching has grown. (Compare Commentaries of Allford, Lücke, Meyer, Stier, Heubner, Williams, Tholuck, and others, on this passage.) It will still be asked how we are to account for the startling form in which this most profound Gospel-truth was put before persons to whom it was likely to prove an offense. The answer is not difficult. Many of the disciples had come to have this idea of his ministry, to see his miracles, perhaps to derive some fruit from them, to talk about Him, and to repeat his sayings, who were quite unfit to go on as his followers to the end. There was a wide difference between the two doctrines, that Jesus was the Christ, and that the Christ must hang upon the tree, as to their effects on regenerate and worldly minds. For the latter they were not prepared; though many of them could possibly accept the former. Now this discourse belongs to the time of transition from the easier to the harder doctrine. And we may suppose that it was meant to sift the disciples, that the good grain might remain in the garner and the chaff be scattered to the wind. Hence the hard and startling form in which it was cast; not indeed that this figure of eating and drinking in reference to spiritual things was unknown to the early Christians, but that the foot, Schürer, and Wetstein, have shown the contrary. But hard it doubtless was; and if the condition of discipleship had been that they should then and there understand what they heard, their turning back at this time would have been meri-
But even on the twelve Jesus imposes no such condition. He only asks them, "Will ye also go away?" If a beloved teacher says something which overthrows the previous notions of the taught, and shocks their prejudices, then whether they will continue by his side to hear him explain further, or whether, or else dismiss him at once, will depend on the amount of their confidence in him. Many of the disciples went back and walked no more with Jesus, because their conviction that He was the Messiah had no real foundation. The rest remained with him for the reason so beautifully expressed by Peter: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." (John vi. 68, 69).

The sin of the faint-hearted followers who now deserted Him was not that they found this difficult; but that finding it difficult they had not confidence enough to wait for light. The third example of our Lord's discourses which may be selected is that which closes his ministry—"Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in Him. If God be glorified in Him, God shall also glorify Himself in Himself; and shall straightway glorify Him" (John xiii. 31, 32).

This great discourse, recorded only by St. John, extends from the thirteenth to the end of the seventeenth chapter. It hardly admits of analysis. It announces the Saviour's departure in the fulfillment of his mission; it imposes the "new commandment" on the disciples of a special love towards each other which should be the outward token to the world of their Christian profession; it consoles them with the promise of the Comforter who should be to them instead of the Saviour; it tells them all that He should do for them, teaching them, reminding them, reproving the world and guiding the disciples into all truth. It offers them, instead of the bodily presence of their beloved Master, free access to the throne of his Father, and spiritual blessings such as they had not known before. Finally, it culminates in that prayer (chap. xvi.) by which the High-priest as it were consecrates Himself the victim; and so doing, prays for those who shall hold fast and keep the benefits of that sacrifice, offered for the whole world, whether his disciples already, or to be brought to Him thereafter by the ministry of Apostles. He wills that they shall be with Him and behold his glory. He recognizes the righteousness of the Father in the plan of salvation, and in the result produced to the disciples; in whom that highest and purest love wherewith the Father loved the Son shall be present, and with and in that love the Son Himself shall be present with them. "With this elevated thought," says Oblique, "the Redeemer concludes his prayer for the disciples, and in them for the Church through all ages. He has compressed into the last moments given Him for intercourse with his own the most sublime and glorious sentiments ever uttered by human lips. Hardly has the sound of the last word died away when Jesus passes with his disciples over the brook Kidron to Gethsemane; and the bitter conflict draws on. The seed of the new world must be sown in death that thence life may spring up. These three discourses are examples of the Saviour's teaching—of its progressive character from the opening of his ministry to the close. The first exhibits his practical precepts as Lawyer of his people; the second, an exposition of the need of his sacrifice, but addressed to the world without, and intended to try them rather than to attract; and the third, where Christ, the Lawgiver and the High-priest, stands before God as the Son of God, and speaks to Him of his utmost counsels, as one who had been His before from the beginning. They will serve as illustrations of the course of his destiny whilst others will be mentioned in the narrative as it proceeds.

The Scene of the Lord's Ministry. — As to the scene of the ministry of Christ, no less than as to its duration, the three Evangelists seem at first sight to be at variance with the fourth. Matthew, Mark, and Luke record only our Lord's doings in Galilee; but if we put aside a few days before the passion, we find that they never mention his visiting Jerusalem. John, on the other hand, whilst he records some acts in Galilee, devotes the chief part of his Gospel to the transactions in Judaea. But when the supplemental character of John's Gospel is borne in mind there is little difficulty in explaining this. The three Evangelists do not profess to give a chronology of the ministry, but rather a picture of it: notes of those events least frequent in the narrative, and yet of essential importance. And they chiefly confine themselves to Galilee, where the Redeemer's chief acts were done; they might naturally omit to mention the feasts, which being passed by our Lord at Jerusalem, added nothing to the materials for his Galilean ministry. John, on the other hand, writing later, and giving an account of the Redeemer's life which is still less complete as a history (for more than one half of the fourth Gospel is occupied with the last three months of the ministry, and seven chapters out of twenty-one are filled with the account of the few days of the passion), vindicates his historical claim by supplying several precise notices of time: in the occurrences after the baptism of Jesus, days and even hours are specified (i. 24, 35, 39, 43, ii. 1); the first miracle is mentioned, and the time at which it was wrought (i. 1-11). He mentions not only the Passovers (iii. 22; vi. 4; xii. 1, and perhaps v. 1), but also the feast of Tabernacles (vii. 2) and of Dedication (x. 22); and it is ordered that the Evangelist who goes over the least part of the ground of our Lord's ministry is yet the same who fixes for us its duration, and enables us to arrange the facts the more exactly in their historical places. It is true that the three Gospels record chiefly the occurrences in Galilee; but there is evidence in them that labors were wrought in Judaea. Frequent teaching in Jerusalem is implied in the Lord's lamentation over the lost city (Matt. xxiii. 37). The appearance in Galilee of seraphs and Pharisess and others from Jerusalem (Matt. iv. 25, xv. 1) would be best explained on the supposition that their enmity had been excited against Him during visits to Jerusalem. The intimacy with the family of Lazarus (Luke, x. 38 ff.), and the attachment of Joseph of Arimathea to the Lord (Matt. xxvii. 57), would imply, most probably, frequent visits to Jerusalem. But why was Galilee chosen as the principal scene of the ministry? The question is not easy to answer. The prophet would resort to the Temple of God: the King of the Jews would go to his own royal city; the Teaching of the chosen people would preach in the midst of them. But their hostility prevented it. The Saviour, who, accepting all the infinities of "the form of a servant," which He had taken, fled in his childhood to Egypt, betakes Himself to Gal-

wonders in the various places to which He came? This would be more likely if the journeys were hurried and partial: but all three are spoken of as though they were the very opposite. It is, to say the least, easier to suppose that the "feast" (John v. 1) was a Passover, dividing the time into two, and throwing two of these circuits into the second year of the ministry; provided there be nothing to make this interpretation improbable in itself. The words are, "After this there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem." These two facts are meant as cause and effect; the feast caused the visit. If so, it was probably one of the three feasts at which the Jews were expected to appear before God at Jerusalem. Was it the Passover, the Pentecost, or the Feast of Tabernacles? In the preceding chapter the Passover has been spoken of as the "feast" (ver. 43); and if another feast were meant here the name of it would have been added, as in vii. 2, x. 22. The omission of the article is not decisive, for it occurs in other cases where the Passover is certainly intended (Matt. xxvii. 15; Mark xv. 6); nor is it clear that the Passover was called the feast, as the most eminent, although the Feast of Tabernacles was sometimes so described. All that the omission could prove would be that the Evangelist did not think it needful to describe the feast more precisely. The words in John iv. 35, "There are yet four months and then cometh the harvest," would agree with this, for the barley harvest began on the 16th Nisan, and reckoning back four months would bring this conversation to the beginning of December, i. e. the middle of Kislev. If it be granted that our Lord is here merely quoting a common form of speech (Allford), still it is more likely that He would use one appropriate to the time at which He was speaking. And if these words were uttered in December, the next of the three great feasts occurring would be the Passover. The shortness of the interval between v. 1 and vi. 4, would afford an objection, if it were not for the scantiness of historical details in the early part of the ministry in St. John: from the other Evangelists it appears that two great journeys might have to be included between these verses. Upon the whole, though there is nothing that amounts to proof, it is probable that there were four Passovers, and consequently that our Lord's ministry lasted somewhat more than three years, the "beginning of miracles" (John i.) having been wrought before the first Passover. On data of calculation that have already been mentioned, the year of the first of these Passovers was c. c. 780, and the Baptism of our Lord took place either in the beginning of that year or the end of the year preceding. The ministry of John the Baptist began in c. c. 779. (See Commentaries on John v. 1, especially Kunkel and Lietzke. Also Winer, Reallexikon der Geschichtswissenschaft, II. Jesus Christ; Griseveld, Discorations, vol. i. Diss. 4, vol. ii. Diss. 22.) After this sketch of the means, the scene, and the duration of the Saviour's ministry, the historical order of the events may be followed without interruption.

Our Lord has now passed through the ordeal of temptation, and his ministry is begun. At Bethsaida, wherein he returns, there were two facts drawn towards him: Andrew and another, probably John, the sole narrator of the fact, see Jesus, and hear the Baptist's testimony concerning Him. Andrew brings Simon Peter to see Him also; and He receives from the Lord the name of Cephas. Then Philip and Nathanael are brought into contact with our Lord. All these reappear as Apostles, if Nathanael be, as has often been supposed, the same as the Nathanael whom the Lord questioned, but the time of their calling to that office was not yet. But that their minds, even at this early time, were wrought upon by the expectation of the Messiah appears by the confession of Nathanael: "Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel." (John i. 50-51.) The two disciples last named saw Him as He was about to set out for Galilee, on the third day of his sojourn at Bethelam. The third day after this interview Jesus is at Cana in Galilee, and works his first miracle, by making the water wine (John i. 29, 35, 43; ii. 1). All these particulars are supplied from the fourth Gospel, and come in between the 11th and 12th verses of the 4th chapter of St. Matthew. They show that our Lord left Galilee expressly to be baptized and to suffer temptation, and returned to his own country when these were accomplished. He now becats Himself to Capernaum and begins to work there for the space of many days," sets out for Jerusalem to the Passover, which was to be the beginning of his ministry in Judaea (John ii. 12, 13).

The cleansing of the Temple is associated by St. John with this first Passover (ii. 12-22), and a similar cleansing is assigned to the last Passover by the other Evangelists. These two cannot be confounded without throwing discredit on the historical character of one narrative or the other; the notes of time are too precise. But a host of interpreters have pointed out the probability that an action symbolical of the power and authority of Messiah should be twice performed, at the opening of the ministry and at its close. The expulsion of the traders was not likely to produce a permanent effect, and at the end of three years Jesus found the tumult and the traffic defiling the court of the Temple as they had done when He visited it before. Besides the difference of time, the narrative of St. John is by no means identical with those of the others; he mentions that Jesus made a scourge of small cords (φραγέλλων εκ σχονίων, ii. 15) as a symbol — we need not prove that it could be no more — of his power to punish; that here He ensured them for making the Temple "a house of merchandise;" whilst at the last cleansing it was pronounced "a den of thieves," with a distinct reference to the two passages of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is. lv. 7; Jer. vii. 11). Writers like Strauss would persuade us that "tact and good sense" would prevent the Redeemer from attempting such a violent measure at the beginning of his ministry, before his authority was admitted. The aptness and the greatness of the occasion have no weight with such critics. The usual sacrifice of the law of Jehovah, and the usual half-shekel paid for tribute to the Temple, the very means that were appointed by God to remind them that they were a consecrated people, were made an excuse for secularizing even the Temple; and in its holy precincts all the business of the world went on. It was a time when "the zeal of God's house" might well supersede the "tact" on which the German philosopher lays stress; and Jesus failed in the zeal, nor did the accusing consciences of the traders fail to justify it, for at the rebuke of one man they retreated from the scene of their gains. Their hearts told them even though they had been long immered in hardening traffic, that the house of God could belong to none other but God; and when a Prophet claimed it for Him, conscience deprived them of the usufruct of the law. The fact is, that Simon the Zealot to whom these words were spoken petitioned Him to see if a sign or proof of his right to exercise this authority. He answered them by a promise of a sign by which He would hereafter confirm his mission, "Destroy this Temple and in three days I will raise it up." (John ii. 19,) alluding, as the Evangelist explains, to his resurrection. But why is the name of the building before them applied by our Lord so darkly to Himself? There is doubtless a hidden reference to the Temple as a type of the Church, which Christ by his death and resurrection would found and raise up. He who has cleared of buyers and sellers the courts of a perishable Temple made with hands, will prove hereafter that He is the Founder of an eternal Temple made without hands, and your destroying it shall be the cause. The reply was indeed obscure; but it was meant as a refusal of their demands, and to the disciples afterwards it became abundantly clear. At the time of the Passion this saying was brought against Him, in a perverted form — "At the last came two false witnesses, and said, This fellow said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days." (Matt. xxvi. 61.) They hardly knew perhaps how utterly false a small alteration in the tale had made it. They wanted to mould him up as one who dared to think of the destruction of the Temple; and to change "destroy" into "I can destroy," might seem no great violence to do to the truth. But those words contained not a mere circumstance but the very essence of the saying, "you are the destroyers of the Temple; you that were polluting it now by turning it into a market-place shall destroy it, and also your city, by staining its stones with my blood." Jesus came not to destroy the Temple but to change it. He who should destroy the law had to complete it (Matt. v. 17). Two syllables changed their testimony into a lie.

The visit of Nicodemus to Jesus took place about this first Passover. It implies that our Lord had done more at Jerusalem than is recorded of Him even by John; since we have here a Master of Israel (John iii. 10), a member of the Sanhedrim (John vii. 50), expressing his belief in Him, although too timid at this time to make an open profession. The object of the visit, though not directly stated, is still clear: he was one of the better Pharisees, who were expecting the kingdom of Messiah, and having seen the miracles that Jesus did, he came to inquire more fully about these signs of its approach. This indicates the connection between the remark of Nicodemus and the Lord's reply: "You recognize these miracles as signs of the kingdom of God; verily I say unto you, no one can truly see and know the kingdom of God, unless he be born again (φανερωθῇ, from above); see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., in loc., vol. iv.). The visitor boasted the blood of Abraham, and expected to stand high in the new kingdom in virtue of that birthright. He did not wish to surrender it, and set his hopes upon some other birth (comp. Matt. iii. 9); and therefore something of willingness in the question of "How can a man be born when he is old?" (ver. 4). Our Lord again insists on the necessity of the renewed heart, in him who would be admitted to the kingdom of heaven. The new birth is real though it is unseen, like the wind which blows lither and thither the eye cannot catch it save in its effects. Even so the Spirit sways the heart towards good, carries it away towards heaven, brings over the soul at one time the cloud, at another the sunny weather. The sound of Him is heard in the soul, now as the eager east wind bringing pain and remorse; now breathing over it the soft breath of consolation. In all this He is as powerful as the wind; and as unseen is the mode of His action. For the new birth of the Holy Ghost, without which none can come to God, faith in the Son of God is needed (ver. 18); and as implied in that, the renouncing of those evil deeds that blind the eyes to the truth (vv. 19, 20).

It has been well said that this discourse contains the whole Gospel in epistle; there is the kingdom of grace into which God will receive those who have offended Him, the new truth which God the Holy Spirit will write in all those who seek the kingdom, and God the Son crucified and slain that all who would be saved may look on Him when He is lifted up, and find health thereby. The three Persons of the Trinity are all before us carrying out the scheme of man's salvation. If it be asked how Nicodemus, so timid and half-hearted as yet, was allowed to hear thus early in the ministry what our Lord kept back even from his disciples till near the end of it, the answer must be, that, wise as it was to keep back from the general body of the hearers the doctrine of the Crucifixion, the Physician of souls would treat each case with the medicine that it most required. Nicodemus was an inquiring spirit, ready to believe all the Gospel, but for his Jewish prejudices and his social position. He was one whom even the shadow of the Cross would not estrange; and the Lord knew it, and laid open to him all the scheme of salvation. Not in vain. The tradition, indeed, may not be thoroughly certain, which reports his open conversion and his baptism by Peter and John (Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 171).

But three years after this conversation, when all the disciples have been scattered by the death of Jesus, he comes forward with Joseph of Arimathaea, at no little risk, although with a kind of secrecy still, to perform the last offices for the Master to whom his soul cleaves (John xix. 39).

After a journey at Jerusalem of uncertain duration, Jesus went to the Jordan with his disciples; and they there baptized in his name. The Baptist was now at Eon near Salim; and the jealousy of his disciples against Jesus drew from John an avowal of his position, which is remarkable for its humility (John iii. 27–30). "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven. Ye yourselves bear me witness, that I am, I say not, the Christ, but that I have been sent before Him. He that hath the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice: this my joy therefore is fulfilled. He must increase, but I must decrease." The speaker is one who has bitherto enjoyed the highest honor and popularity, a prophet exulted by all the people. Before the Sun of Righteousness his reflected light is turning pale; it shall soon be extinguished. Yet no word of reluctance, or of attempt to cling to a name and the glory of the day. If his pride has forsook him (see the parallel in John xii. 26–28). Joseph of Arimathaea asks, "If He be the King of Israel, let Him now come and save Himself." It had been the same before; when the Sanhedrim sent to inquire about him he claimed to be no more than "the voice of One crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esias" (John i. 23); there was one "who coming after me is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose" (i. 27). Strauss thinks this height of self-renunciation beautiful, but impossible (Leben Jesu, ii. 4, § 49); but what divine influence had worked in the Baptist's spirit, adorning that once rugged nature with the grace of humility, we do not admit that Dr. Strauss is in a position to measure.

How long this sojourn in Judaea lasted is uncertain. But in order to reconcile John iv. 1 with Matt. iv. 12, we must suppose that it was much longer than the "twenty-six or twenty-seven" days, to which the learned Mr. Greswell upon mere conjecture would limit it. From the two passages together it would seem that John was after a short time cast into prison (Matt.), and that Jesus, seeing that the emnity directed against the Baptist would now assult Him, because of the increasing success of his ministry (John), resolved to withdraw from its reach.

In the way to Galilee Jesus passed by the shortest route, through Samaria. This country, peopled by men from five districts, whom the king of Assyria had planted there in the time of Hoshea (2 K. xxiv. 24, c.), and by the residue of the ten tribes that was left behind from the Captivity, had once abounded in idolatry, though latterly faithful in the true God had gained ground. The Samaritans even claimed to share with the people of Judaea the restoration of the Temple at Jerusalem, and were refused (Eara iv. 1–5). In the time of our Lord they were hated by the Jews even more than if they had been Gentiles. Their corrupt worship was a shadow of the true; their temple on Gerizim was a rival to that which adored the hill of Zion. "He that eats bread from the hand of a Samaritan," says a Jewish writer, "is as one that eats swine's flesh." Yet even in Samaria were souls to be saved; and Jesus would not shake off even that dust from his feet. He came in his journey to Sichem, which the Jews in mockery had changed to Sychar, to indicate that its people were despised (Lightfoot), or that they followed idols (Acts 7:44). In ensued which with that Jesus, the Leopard, addressed the men of Sichem and showed them the ways of truths as well as falsehood, and was made known everywhere. He returned the same day to Simon’s house, and healed the mother-in-law of Simon, who was sick of a fever. At sunset, the multitude, now fully aroused by what they had heard, brought their sick to Simon’s door to get them healed. He did not refuse his service, and healed them all (Mark i. 29–34). He now, after showing down on Capharnaum so many cures, turned his thoughts to the rest of Galilee, where the rest of sheep were scattered: “Let us go into the next towns (κατοικοδομεῖν) that I may preach there also, for therefore came I forth” (Mark i. 38). The journey through Galilee, on which He now entered, must have been a general circuit of that country. His object was to call on the Galileans to repent and believe the Gospel. This could only be done completely by taking such a journey that his teaching might be accessible to all in turn at some point or other. Josephus mentions that there were two hundred and four towns and villages in Galilee (Tab. 45): therefore such a circuit as should in any real sense embrace the whole of Galilee would require some months for its performance. “The course of the present circuit,” says Mr. Grosse (Dissertations, vol. ii. 292), “we may conjecture, was, upon the whole, as follows: First, along the western side of the Jordan, northward, which would disseminate the fame of Jesus in Decapolis; secondly, along the confines of the tetrarchy of Philip, westward, which would make Him known throughout Syria: thirdly, by the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, southward; and, lastly, along the verge of Samaria, and the western region of the Lake of Galilee—the nearest points to Judea proper and Antipas, a miracle which was witnessed by many, of the course of this circuit, besides the works of mercy spoken of by the Evangelists (Matt. iv. 23–25; Mark i. 32–34; Luke iv. 40–41). He had probably called to Him more of his Apostles. Four at least were his companions from the beginning of it. The rest (except perhaps Judas Iscariot) were Galileans, and it is not improbable that they were found by their Master during this circuit. Philip of Bethsaida and Nathanael were among the rest, and were prepared to become his disciples by an earlier interview. On this circuit occurred the first case of the healing of a leper: it is selected for record by the Evangelists, because of the in crudeness of the allment. So great was the dread of this disorder — so strict the precautions against its infection—that even the raising of Lazarus’ daughter from the dead, which was perhaps the second occurred at Capernaum, at the end of this circuit, would hardly impress the beholders more profoundly.

Second Visit of the Ministry.— Jesus went up to Jerusalem to “a feast of the Jews,” which we have shown (p. 1359) to have been probably the Passover. At the pool Bethesda (= house of mercy), which was near the Sheep Gate (Neh. iii. 1 on the northeast side of the Temple, Jesus saw many infirm persons waiting their turn for the healing virtues of the water. (John v. 1-18. On the genuineness of the fourth verse, see Scholz, N. T.; Tischendorf, N. T.; and Lukee, in loc. It is preserved in the first and second MSS, and in Sin. J.; it is singularly disturbed with variations in the MSS. that insert it, and it abounds in words which do not occur again in this Gospel.) Among them was a man who had had an infirmity thirty-eight years: Jesus made him whole by a word, bidding him take up his bed and walk. The miracle was done on the Sabbath; and the Jews, by which name in St. John's Gospel we are to understand the Jewish authorities, were indignant against Jesus, rebuked the man for carrying his bed. It was a labor, and as such forbidden (Jer. xxvi. 21). The answer of the man was too logical to be refuted:

"He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed and walk" (v. 11). If He had not authority for the latter, whence came his power to do the former? Their anger was now directed against Jesus for healing on the Sabbath, even for healing the infirm, which is not the right to put Him to death. They based their objection on our Lord's justification of Himself, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (v. 17), there is an unequivocal claim to the Divine nature. God the Father never rests: if sleep could visit his eyelids for an instant; if his hand could droop for a moment's rest, the universe would collapse in ruin. He rested on the seventh day from the creation of new beings; but from the maintenance of those that exist He never rests. His love streameth forth on every day alike; as do the impartial beams from the sun that he has placed in the heavens. The Jews rightly understood the saying: none but God could utter it; none could quote God's example, as setting Him over and above God's law, save One who was God Himself. They sought the more to kill Him. He expounded to them more fully his relation to the Father. He works with the strength of the Father and according to his will. He can do all that the Father does. He can raise men out of bodily and out of spiritual death; and He can judge all men. John bore witness to Him: the works that He does bear even stronger witness. The reason that the Jews do not believe is their want of discernment of the meaning of the Scriptures; and that comes from their worldliness, their desire of honor from one another, and a desire to bring condemnation; even out of their Law they can be condemned, since they believe not even Moses, who foretold that Christ should come (John v. 19-47).

Another discussion about the Sabbath arose from the disciples plucking the ears of corn as they went through the fields (Matt. xii. 1-8). The time of this is somewhat uncertain: some would place it a year later, just after the third Passover (Lamman); but its place is much more probably here (Newcome, Robinson, etc.). The needy were permitted by the Law (Deut. xxiii. 25) to pluck the ears of corn with their hand, even without waiting for the owner's permission. The disciples must have been living a hard and poor life to resort to such means of sustenance. But the Pharisees would not allow that it was lawful on the Sabbath-day. Jesus reminds them that David, whose example they are not likely to challenge, ate the sacrificial bread in the tabernacle, which it was not lawful to eat. The priests might partake of it, but not a stranger (Ex. xxix. 33; Lev. xxiv. 5, 9). David, on the principle that mercy was better than sacrifice ( Hos. vi. 6). took it and gave to the young men that were with him that they might not perish for hunger. In order further to show that a literal mechanical observance of the law of the Sabbath would lead to absurdities, Jesus reminds them that this was perpetually set aside on account of another: "The priests profane the Sabbath and are blameless" (Matt. xii. 5). The work of sacrifice, the placing of the shewbread, go on on the Sabbath, and bidur even on that day may be done by priests, and may please God. It was the root of the Pharisees' fault that they thought sacrifice better than mercy, ritual exactness more than love: if ye had known what this meant, I will have mercy and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless. For the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath-day" (Matt. xii. 7, 8). These last words are inseparable from the meaning of our Lord's answer. In pleading the example of David, the king and prophet, and of the priests in the Temple, the Lord tacitly implies the greatness of his own position. He is indeed the new Priest, and the King; and one of these, the argument would have been not merely incomplete, but misleading. It is undeniable that the law of the Sabbath was very strict. Against labors as small as that of winnowing the corn a severe penalty was set. Our Lord quotes cases where the law is superseded or set aside, because He is One who has power to do the same. And the rise of a new law is implied in those words which St. Mark alone has recorded: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." The law upon the Sabbath was made in love to men, to preserve for them a due measure of rest, to keep room for the worship of God. The Son of Man has power to readjust this law, if its work is done, or if men are fit to receive a higher.

This may have taken place on the way from Jerusalem after the Passover. On another Sabbath, probably at Capernaum, to which Jesus had returned, the Pharisees gave a far more striking proof of the way in which their hard and narrow and unloving interpretation would turn the beneficence of the Law into a blighting oppression. Our Lord entered into the synagogue, and found there a man with a withered hand—some poor artisan, perhaps, whose handiwork was his means of life. Jesus was about to heal him—which would have back life to the sufferer—who would give joy to every beholder who had one touch of pity in his heart. The Pharisees interposed: "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath-day?" Their doctors would have allowed them to pull a sheep out of a pit: but they will not have a man rescued from the depth of misery. Rarely is that loving Teacher wroth, but here his anger, mixed with grief, showed itself: He looked round about upon them with anger, being grieved at the hardness of their hearts, and answered their evils by healing the man (Matt. xii. 9-14; Mark iii. 1-6; Luke vi. 6-11).

In placing the ordination or calling of the Twelve Apostles just before the Sermon on the Mount, we are under the guidance of St. Luke (vi. 13, 17). But this more solemn separation for their work by no means marks the time of their first approach to Jesus. Scattered notices prove that some of them at least were drawn gradually to the Lord, so that it would be difficult to identify the moment when they earned the name of disciples. In the case of St. Peter, five degrees or stages might be traced.
The twelve Apostles were certainly poor and unlearned men; it is probable that the rest were of the same kind. Four of them were fishermen, not indeed the poorest of their class; and a fifth was a "publican," one of the "pitytters," or tax-gatherers, who collected the taxes exacted by Romans of higher rank. Andrew, who is mentioned with Peter, is less conspicuous in the history than he, but he enjoyed free access to his Master, and seems to have been more intimate with him than the rest (John vi. 8, xii. 22, with Mark xiii. 3). But James and John, who are sometimes placed above him in the list, were especially distinguished. They were fishermen, and James the son of Zebedee, and his brother, had been with their father, the fishermen, when the Twelve were called (John i. 21). The Zealot party is said probably from his belonging to the sect of Zealots, who, from Num. xxv. 7, 8, took it on themselves to punish crimes against the law. If the name Iscirot (= man of Cario = Kerith) refers the birth of the traitor to Kanoz in Judah (Josh. xiv. 25), then it would appear that the traitor alone was of Judaeo origin, and the eleven faithful ones were despised Galileans.

From henceforth the education of the Twelve Apostles will be one of the principal features of the Lord's ministry. First He instructs them then He takes them with Him as companions of His wayfaring; then He sends them forth to teach and heal for Him. The Sermon on the Mount, although it is meant for all the disciples, seems to have a special reference to the chosen Twelve (Matt. v. 11 ff.). Its principal features have been sketched already; but they will miss their full meaning if it is forgotten that they are the first teaching that the Apostles were called on to listen to after their appointment.

About the time it was that John the Baptist, long a forerunner with little hope of release, sent his disciples to Jesus with the question, "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" In all the Gospels there is no more touching incident. Those who maintain that it was done solely for the sake of the disciples, and that John himself needed no answer to support his faith, show as little knowledge of the human mind as exactness in explaining the words of the account. The great privilege of John's life was that he was appointed to recognize and bear witness to the Messiah (John i. 31). After languishing a year in a dungeon, after learning that even yet Jesus had made no steps towards the establishment of his kingdom of the Jews, and that his following consisted of only twelve poor Galileans, doubts began to cloud over his spirit. Was the kingdom of Messias such as he had thought? Was Jesus not the Messiah, but some forerunner of that Deliverer, as he himself had been? There is no unbelief; he does not suppose that Jesus has deceived: when the doubts arise, it is to Jesus that he submits them. But it was not without great depression and perplexity that he put the question, "Art thou He that should come?" The scope of the answer given lies in its reading John to the grounds of his former confidence. The very miracles are being wrought that were to be the signs of the kingdom of heaven; and therefore that kingdom is come (Is. xxv. 5, in Luke viii. 6, 7). There is more of grave encouragement than of rebuke in the words, "Blessed is he who shall not be offended in me" (Matt. xi. 6). They bids the Forerunner to have a good heart, and to hope and believe to the end. He has allowed sorrow, and the apparent triumph of wickedness, which is a harder trial, to trouble his view of the divine plan; let him remember that it is blessed to attain that state of confidence with which these things cannot disturb; and let the signs which Jesus now exhibits suit him to the end (Matt. xi. 1–6; Luke vii. 18–23).

The testimony to John which our Lord graciously adds is intended to restate him in that place in the minds of his own disciples which he had occupied before this mission of doubt. John is not a weak waverer; not a luxurious courtier, attaching himself to the new dispensation from worldly motives: but a prophet, and more than a prophet, for the prophets spoke of Jesus afar off, but John stood before the Messiah, and with his hand pointed Him out. He came in the spirit and power of Elijah (Mal. iii. 1, iv. 5), to prepare for the kingdom of heaven. And yet, great as he was, the least of those in the kingdom of heaven when it is completely planted should enjoy a higher degree of religious illumination than he (Matt. xii. 7–11; Luke vii. 24–28).

We now commence the second circuit of Galilee (Luke viii. 1–3), to which belong the parables in Matt. xiii., the visit of our Lord’s mother and brethren (Luke viii. 19–21), and the account of his reception at Nazareth (Mark vi. 1–6).

During this time the twelve have journeyed with Him. But now a third circuit in Galilee is recorded, which probably occurred during the last three months of this year (Matt. ix. 35–38); and during this circuit, after reminding them how great is the harvest and how pressing the need of laborers, He carries the training of the disciples one step further by sending them forth by themselves to teach (Matt. x., xii.). Such a mission is not to be considered as identical in character with the mission of the Apostles, the Twelve. It was limited to the Jews; the Samaritans and heathen were excluded: but this arose, not from any narrowness in the limits of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15), but from the limited knowledge and abilities of the Apostles. They were sent to proclaim to the Jews that "the kingdom of heaven," which their prophets taught them to look for, was at hand (Matt. x. 7); but they were unsuited for the task of explaining to Jews the true nature of that kingdom, and still more to Gentiles who had received no preparation for any such doctrine. The preaching of the Apostles whilst Jesus was yet on earth was only ancillary to his and a preparation of the way for Him. It was probably of the simplest character. "As ye go, preach, saying, The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." Power was given them to confirm it by signs and wonders; and the purpose of it was to show the minds of those who heard it into an inquiring state, so that they might seek and find the Lord Himself. But whilst their instructions as to the matter of their preaching were thus brief and simple, the cautions, warnings, and encouragements as to their own condition were far more full.

They were to do their work without anxiety for their welfare. No provision was to be made for their journey; in the house that first received them in any city they were to abide, no seeking of the best. Dangers would befell them, for they were sent forth "as sheep in the midst of wolves" (Matt. x. 16); but they were not to allow this to disturb their thoughts. The same God who wrought their miracles for them would protect them; and those who confessed the name of Christ before men would be confided by Christ before the Father as his disciples. These precepts for the Apostles even went somewhat beyond what their present mission required; it does not appear that they were at this time delivered up to councils, or scourged in synagogues. But in training their feeble wings for their first flight the same rules and cautions were given which would be needed even when they soared the highest in their zeal and devotion to their crucified Master. There is no difficulty here, if we remember that this sending never was rather a training of the Apostles than a means of converting the Galilean people.

They went forth two and two; and our Lord continued his own circuit (Matt. xi. 1), with what companions does not appear. By this time the heaven of the Lord’s teaching had begun powerfully to work among the people. Herod, we read, "was perplexed, because that it was said of some, that John was risen from the dead, and of some that Elijah had appeared; and of others, that one of the old prophets was risen again" (Luke ix. 7, 8). The false apprehensions about the Messiah, that he should be a temporal ruler, were so deep-rooted, that whilst all the rumors concurred in assigning a high place to Jesus as a prophet, none went beyond to recognize Him as the King of Israel—the Saviour of his people and the world.

After a journey of perhaps two months’ duration the twelve returned to Jesus, and give an account of their ministry. The third Parable was now drawing near; but the Lord did not go up to it, because his time was not come for submitting to the malice of the Jews against Him; because his ministry in Galilee was not completed; and especially, because He wished to continue the training of the Apostles for their work, now one of the chief objects of his ministry. He wished to confine the observation of the Twelve individually upon their work, and, we may suppose, to add to the instruction they had already received from Him (Mark vi. 30, 31). He therefore went with them from the neighborhood of Capernaum to a mountain on the eastern shore of the Sea of Tiberias, near Bethesda Julia, not far from the head of the sea. Great multitudes pursued them; and here the Lord, moved to compassion by the hunger and weariness of the people, sought for them one of his most remarkable miracles. Out of five barley leaves and two small fishes, He produced food for five thousand men besides women and children. The act was one of creation, and therefore was both an assertion and a proof of divine power; and the discourse which followed it, recorded by John only, was an important step in the training of the Apostles, for it hinted to them for the first time the nature of that to which they would be bound by the blood of Christ, that is, his Passion, must become the means of man’s salvation. This view of the doctrine of the kingdom of heaven which they had been teaching, could not have been understood; but it would prepare those who still clave to Jesus to expect the hard facts that were to follow

Jesus had wrought, the discourse itself has already been examined (p. 1336). After the miracle, but before the comment on it was delivered, the disciples crossed the sea from Bethsaida Julias to Bethsaida of Galilee, and Jesus retired alone to a mountain to commune with the Father. They were tarrying at the sea, for the wind was contrary, when, as the night drew towards morning, they saw Jesus walking to them on the sea, having passed the whole night on the mountain. They were amazed and terrified. He came into the ship and the wind ceased. They worshipped Him at this new proof of divine power—"Of a truth thou art the Son of God!" (Matt. xiv. 33). The storm had been another trial of their faith (comp. Matt. viii. 23-26), not in a present Master, as on a former occasion, but in an absent one. But the words of St. Mark intimate that even the feeling of the five thousand had not built up their faith in Him,—"for they considered not the miracle of the loaves: for their heart was hardened!" (vi. 52). Peter, however, as St. Matthew relates, with his usual zeal wishing to show that he really possessed that faith in Jesus, which perhaps in the height of the storm had been somewhat forgotten, requests Jesus to bid him come to Him upon the water. When he made the effort, his faith began to fail, and he cried out for deliverance, "O Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee in the water!" Peter was a of the same kind; there was a faith full of zeal and eagerness, but it was not constant. He believed that he could walk on the waters if Jesus bade him; but the roar of the waves appalled him, and he sank from the same cause that made him deny his Lord afterwards.

When they reached the shore of Gennesaret the whole people showed their faith in Him as a Healer of disease (Mark vi. 53-56); and he performed very many miracles on land. Nothing could surpass the eagerness with which they sought Him. Yet on the next day the great discourse just alluded to was uttered, and from that time many of his disciples went back and walked more with Him (Jude xii. 24-27).

Third Year of the Ministry. — It is recorded that Jesus had not coming to the feast, Sacrifices and Pharisees from Jerusalem went down to see Him at Capernaum (Matt. xv. 1). They found fault with his disciples for breaking the tradition about purifying, and eating with unwashed hands. It is not necessary to suppose that they came to lie in wait for Jesus. The objection was one which they would naturally raise. Our Lord, in his answer, tries to show them how far external rule, claiming to be religious, may lead men away from the true spirit of the Gospel. "Ye say, whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, it is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; and honor not his father or his mother, he shall be true;" (Matt. x. 3, 6). They admitted the obligation of the fifth commandment's rebate, "O Lord, thou hast made a means of evading it, by enabling a son to say to his father and mother who sought his help that he had made his property a gift to the Temple, which took precedence of his obligation. We might apply to a people where such a miserable evasion could find place, the words of Isaiah (xxix. 13)—"If this people draw not nigh unto me with their mouth, and honor me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

Leaving the neighborhood of Capernaum our Lord now travels to the northwest of Galilee, to the region of Tyre and Sidon. The time is not strictly determined, but it was probably the early summer of this year. It does not appear that He retired into this heathen country for the purpose of ministering; more probably it was a retreat from the machinations of the Jews. A woman of the country, of Greek education (Matt. xi. 21), came to entreat Him to be healed of her daughter, who was tormented with an evil spirit. The Lord at first repelled her by saying that He was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; but not so was her maternal love to be baffled. She besought Him again and was again repelled; the bread of the children was not to be given to dogs. Still persisting, she besought him, even as one of the dogs so desired; "the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the Master's table." Faith so sincere was not to be resisted. Her daughter was made whole (Matt. xv. 21-28; Mark vii. 24-30).

Returning thence He passed round by the north of the sea of Galilee to the region of Decapolis on its eastern side (Mark vii. 31-57). In this district He performed many miracles; and especially the restoration of a deaf man who had an impediment in his speech, remarkable for the seeming effort with which He wrought it. To these succeeded the feeding of the four thousand with the seven loaves (Matt. xv. 32). He now crossed the Lake to Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees asked and were refused a "sign;" some great wonder wrought expressly for them to prove that He was the Christ. He answers them as He had answered a similar request before: "the sign of the prophet Jonas was all that they should have. His resurrection after a death of three days should be the great sign, and yet in another sense no sign should be given them, for they should neither see it nor believe it. The unnatural alliance between Pharisees and Sadducees is worthy of remark. The zealots of tradition, and the political partisans of Herod, were in open enmity of the Sadducees;" in Matt. xvi. 6 = "leaven of Herod," Mark viii. 15) joined together for once with a common object of hatred. After they had departed, Jesus crossed the lake with his disciples, and, combining perhaps for the use of the disciples the remembrance of the feeding of the four thousand with that of the conversation they had just heard, warned them to "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the leaven of Herod." (Mark vi. 14) So little however were the disciples prepared for this, that they took it for a rebuke for having brought only one loaf with them. They had forgotten the five thousand and the four thousand, or they would have known that where He was, natural bread could not fail them. It was needful to explain to them that the leaven of the Pharisees was the doctrine of those who had been shorn of their moral hold by traditions which, aiming to propagate religion, really overlaid and destroyed it, and the leaven of the Sadducees was the doctrine of those who, under the show of superficial enlightenment, denied the foundations of the fear of God by denying a future state. At Bethsaida Julias, Jesus restored sight to a blind man; and here, as in a former case, the form and preparation which He adopted are to be remarked. As though the human Saviour has wrestle with and painfully overcome the sufferings of His people. He takes him by the hand, and leads him out of the town, and spits on his eyes and asks him if he sees aught. At first the sense is restored imperfectly; and Jesus lays his hand again upon him and the cure is complete (Mark viii. 22-26).

The ministry in Galilee is now drawing to its close. Through the length and breadth of that country Jesus has proclaimed the kingdom of Christ, and has shown by mighty works that He is the Christ that was to come. He begins to ask the disciples what are the results of all his labors. "Whom say the people that I am?" (Luke i. 18). It is true that the answer shows that they took Him for a prophet. But we are obliged to admit that the rejection of Jesus by the Galileans had been as complete as his preaching to them had been universal. Here and there a few may have received the seeds that shall afterwards be quickened to their conversion. But the great mass had heard without earnestness the preached word, and forgotten it without regret. "Wherewithal shall I liken this generation?" says Christ. "It is like unto children sitting in the market, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented" (Matt. xi. 16, 17). This is a picture of a wayward people without an earnest thought. As children, from want of any real purpose, cannot agree in their play, so the Galileans quarrel with every form of religious teaching. The message of John and that of Jesus they did not attend to; but they could discuss the question whether one was right in fasting and the other in eating and drinking. He denounces woe to the cities where He had wrought the most, to Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, for their strange insensibility, using the strongest expressions. "Thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee have been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee." (Matt. x. 24, 25). Such awful language could only be talked of a country chosen by God to be a representative of a nation from amidst the world, and in truth nothing was wanting to aggravate that rejection. The lengthened journeys through the land, the miracles, far more than are recorded in detail, had brought the Gospel home to all the people. Capernaum was the focus of his ministry. Through Chorazin and Bethsaida He had no doubt passed with crowds behind Him, drawn together by wonder that they had seen, and by the hope of others to follow them. Many thousands had actually been benefited by the miracles; and yet of all these there were only twelve that really clave to Him, and one of them was Judas the traitor. With this rejection an epoch of the history is connected. He begins to unfold now the doctrine of his Passion more fully. First inquiring who the people said that He was, He then put the same question to the Apostles themselves. Simon Peter, the ready spokesman of the rest, answers, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." It might almost seem that such a manifest inference from the wonders they had witnessed was too obvious to deserve praise, did not the sight of a whole country which had witnessed the same wonders, and despised them, prove how thoroughly callous the Jewish heart was. "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi. 18-20). We compare the language applied to Capernaum for its want of faith with that addressed to Peter and the Apostles, and we see how wide is the gulf between those who believe and those who do not. Jesus now in the plainest language tells them what is to be the mode of his departure from the world: "how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21). Peter, who had spoken as the representative of all the Apostles before, in confessing Jesus as the Christ, now speaks for the rest in offering to our Lord the commonplace consolations of the children of this world to a friend beset by danger. The danger they think will be averted: such an end cannot befall one so great. The Lord, "when he had turned about and looked on his disciples" (Mark), to show how connected with Peter's earlier thoughts, and so to prepare them all, addresses Peter as the tempter — "Get thee behind me, Satan: thou hast an offense unto me." These words open up to us the fact that this period of the ministry was a time of special trial and temptation to the sinless Son of God. "Escape from sufferings and death! Do not drink the cup prepared of Thy Father: it is too bitter; it is not deserved." Such was the whisper of the Prince of this World at that time to our Lord; and Peter has been unwittingly taking it into his mouth. The doctrine of a suffering Messiah, so plainly exhibited in the prophets, had reeled from sight in the current religion of that time. The announcement of it to the disciples was at once new and shocking. By repelling it, even when offered by the Lord Himself, they fell into a deeper sin than they could have conceived. The chief of them was called "Satan," because he was unscrupulously pleading on Satan's side (Matt. xvi. 21-23).

Turning now to the whole body of those who followed Him (Mark, Luke), He published the Christian doctrine of self-denial. The Apostles had just shown that they took the natural view of suffering, that it was an evil to be shunned. They shrank from conflict, and pain, and death, as it is natural men should. But Jesus teaches that, in comparison with the higher life, the life of the soul, the life of the body is valueless. And as the renewed life of the Christian implies his dying to his old wishes and desires, suffering, which causes the death of earthly hopes and wishes, may be a good. "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for My sake shall find it. For what is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. xvi.) From this part of the history to the end we shall not lose sight of the sufferings of the Lord. The Cross is darkly seen at the end of our path; and we shall ever draw nearer to that mysterious implement of human salvation (Matt. xvi. 21-28, Mark viii. 31-38; Luke xx. 22-27).
The Transfiguration, which took place just a week after this conversation, is to be understood in connection with it. The minds of the twelve were greatly disturbed at what they had heard. The Messiah was to perish by the wrath of men. The Master whom they served was to be taken away from them. Now, if ever, they needed support for their perplexed spirits, and this their loving Master failed not to give them. He takes with Him three chosen disciples, Peter, James, and John, who formed as it were a smaller circle nearer to Jesus than that of the rest, into a high mountain apart by themselves. There are no means of determining the position of the mountain; although Caesarea Philippi was the scene of the former conversations, it does not follow that this occurred on the eastern side of the lake, for the intervening week would have given time enough for a long journey thence.

There is no authority for the tradition which identifies this mountain with Mount Tabor, although it may be true. [HERMON; TARON.] The three disciples were taken up with Him, who should afterwards be the three witnesses of his agony in the garden of Gethsemane; those who saw his glory in the holy mount would be sustained by the remembrance of it when they beheld his lowest humiliation. The highest and the lowest in the multitude preclude all doubt as to its historical character. It is no myth, nor vision; but a sober account of a miracle. When Jesus had come up into the mountain He was praying, and as He prayed, a great change came over Him. "His face did shine as the sun (Matt.); and His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them" (Mark). Beside Him appeared Moses and Elijah, the greatest and most illustrious of the prophets; and they spoke of his departure, as though it was something recognized both by Law and prophets. The three disciples were at first asleep with weariness; and when they woke they saw the glorious scene. As Moses and Elijah were departing (Luke), Peter, wishing to arrest them, uttered these strange words, "Lord, it is good for us to be here, and let us make three tabernacles, one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Eli- jah." They were the words of one astonished and somewhat afraid, yet of one who felt a strange peace in this explicit testimony from the Father that Jesus was his. It was good for them to be there, he felt, where no Pharisees could set traps for them, where neither Pilate nor Herod could take Jesus by force. Just as he spoke a cloud came over them, and the voice of the Heavenly Father attested once more his Son — "This is my beloved Son; hear Him." There has been much discussion on the purport of this great wonder. But this much seems highly probable. First, as it was connected with the prayer of Jesus, to which it was no doubt an answer, it is to be regarded as a kind of inauguration of Him in his new office as the High-priest who should make atonement for the sins of the people with his own blood. The mystery of his trials and temptations lies too deep for speculation: but He received strength against human infirmity — against the prospect of sufferings so terrible — in this his glorification. Secondly, as the witnesses of this scene were the same three disciples who were with the Master in the garden of Gethsemane it may be assumed that the one was intended to prepare them for the other, and that they were to be borne up under the spectacle of his humiliation by the remembrance that they had been eye-witnesses of his majesty (2 Pet. 1:16-18).

As they came down from the mountain He charged them to keep secret what they had seen till after the Resurrection; which shows that this miracle took place for his use and for theirs, rather than for the rest of the disciples. This led to questions about the meaning of his rising again from the dead, and in the course of it, and arising out of it, occurred the question, "Why then (a question which refers to some preceding conversation) say the scribes that Elias must first come?" They had been assured by what they had just seen that the time of the kingdom of God was now come; and the objection brought by the Scribes, that before the Messiah Elijah must reappear, seemed hard to reconcile with their new conviction. Our Lord answers them that the Scribes have rightly understood the prophecies that Elijah would first come (Mal. iv. 5, 6), but have wanted the discernment to see that this prophecy was already fulfilled.

"Elias has come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatever they listed." In John the Baptist, who came in the spirit and power of Elijah, were the Scriptures fulfilled (Matt. xviii. 1-13; Mark ix. 2-13; Luke x. 28-36).

The Transfiguration, which was a scene of talking place which formed the strongest contrast to the glory and the peace which they had witnessed, and which seemed to justify Peter's remark, "It is good for us to be here." A poor youth, hungry and possessed by a devil — for here as elsewhere the possession is superadded to some known form of that bodily and mental evil which came in at first with sin and Satan — was brought to the disciples who were not with Jesus, to be cured. They could not prevail; and when Jesus appeared amongst them the agonized and disappointed father appealed to Him, with a kind of complaint of the impotence of the disciples. "O faithless and perverse generation!" said our Lord; "how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?" The rebuke is not to the disciples, but to all, the father included; for the father interfered with the miracles that were in them all.

St. Mark's account, the most complete, describes the paroxysm that took place in the lad on our Lord's ordering him to be brought; and also records the remarkable saying, which well described the father's state, "Lord, I believe; help Thou my unbelief." What the disciples had failed to do, Jesus did at a word. He then explained to them that their want of faith in their own power to heal, and in his promises to bestow the power upon them, was the cause of their inability (Matt. xviii. 14-21; Mark ix. 14-29; Luke ix. 37-43).

Once more did Jesus foretell his sufferings on their way back to Capernaum: but "they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask Him" (Mark ix. 30-32).

But a vague impression seems to have been produced on them that his kingdom was now very near. It broke forth in the shape of a dispute amongst them as to which should rank the highest in the kingdom when it should come. Taking a little child, He told them that, in his kingdom, not ambition, but a childlike humility, would entitle to the highest place (Matt. xviii. 1-5; Mark ix. 33-37; Luke ix. 46-48). The humility of the Christian is so closely connected with consideration for the souls of others, that the transition to a warning against causing offense (Matt., Mark), which
The history of the woman taken in adultery belongs to this time. But it must be premised that several MSS. of highest authority omit this passage, and that in those which insert it the text is singularly disturbed (see Liefke, in loc., and Tischendorf, Gr. Text., ed. vii.). The remark of Augustine is perhaps not far from the truth, that this story formed a genuine portion of the apostolic teaching, but that mistaken people excluded it from their copies of the written gospel, thinking it might be reverted into a license to women to sin (Ad Pollent. ii. ch. 7). That it was thus kept apart, without the safeguards which Christian vigilance exercised over the rest of the text, and was only admitted later, would at once account for its absence from the MSS. and for the various forms assumed by the text where it is given. But the history gives no ground for such apprehensions. The law of Moses gave the power to stone women taken in adultery. But Jewish morals were sunk very low, like Jewish faith; and the punishment could not be inflicted on a sinner by those who had sinned in the same kind: "Etenim non est ferundus accusator qui quod in altero vitium reprehendit, in eo quo reprehenditur" (Cicero, c. Ferrum, III.). Thus the punishment had passed out of use. But they thought, by proposing this case to our Lord, to induce Him to modify the law for women, lest they might accuse Him of profaneness; or to sentence the guilty wretch to die, and so become obnoxious to the charge of cruelty. From such temptations Jesus was always able to escape. He threw back the decision upon them: He told them that the man who was free from that sin might cast the first stone at her. Conscience told them that this was unanswerable, and one by one they stole away, leaving the guilty woman alone before One who was indeed her Judge. It has been supposed that the words "Neither do I condemn thee" convey an absolute pardon for the sin of which she had just been guilty. But they refer, as has long since been pointed out, to the doom of stoning only. "As they have not punished thee, neither do I: go, and let this danger warn thee to sin no more" (John viii. 1-11).

The explanations (John viii. 12-59) show in a strong light the perversity of the Jews in misunderstanding our Lord's words. They refuse to see any spiritual meaning in them, and drag them as it were by force down to a low and carnal interpretation. Our Lord's remark explains the cause of this, "Why do ye not understand my speech (way of speaking)? Even because ye cannot hear my word (ver. 49). His mode of expression was strange to them, because they were neither able nor willing to understand the real purport of his teaching. To this place belongs the account, given by John alone, of the healing of one who was born blind, and the consequences of it (John i. 41-41, x. 1-21). The poor patient was excommunicated for refusing to undervalue the agency of Jesus in restoring him. He believed on Jesus; whilst the Pharisees were only made the worse for what they had witnessed. Well might Jesus exclaim, "For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind" (ix. 39). The well-known parable of the good shepherd is an answer to the calumnies of the Pharisees, that He was an impostor and breaker of the law, "This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day" (ix. 16).

We now approach a difficult portion of the sacred history. The note of time given us by John immediately afterwards is the Feast of the Dedication, which was celebrated on the 25th of Kislev, answering nearly to December. According to this Evangelist our Lord does not appear to have returned to Galilee between the Feast of Tabernacles and that of Dedication, but to have passed the time in and near Jerusalem. Matthew and Mark do not allude to the Feast of Tabernacles. Luke appears to do so in ix. 51; but the words there used would imply that this was the last journey to Jerusalem. Now in St. Luke's Gospel a large section, from ix. 51 to xviii. 14, seems to belong to the time preceding the departure from Galilee: and the question is how is this to be arranged, so that it shall harmonize with the narrative of St. John? In most Harmonies a return of our Lord to Galilee has been assumed, in order to find a place for this part of Luke's Gospel. "But the manner," says the English editor of Robinson's Harmony, "in which it has been arranged, after all, is exceedingly various. Some, as Le Clerc, Harn. Evang. p. 294, insert nearly the whole during this supposed journey. Others, as Lightfoot, assign to this journey only what precedes Luke xii. 38 and refer the remainder to our Lord's sojourn beyond Jordan, John x. 40 (Chrys. Temp. xvi. p. 153). Greweil (Dissert. xxi. vol. ii.) maintains that the transactions in Luke ix. 51-xviii. 14, all belong to the journey from Ephraim (through Samaria, Galilee, and Perea) to Jerusalem, which he dates in the interval of four months between the Feast of Dedication and our Lord's last Passover. Wieseler (Chron. Synops. p. 328) makes a somewhat different arrangement, according to which Luke xii. 38 refers to the period from Christ's journey from Galilee to the Feast of Tabernacles, till after the Feast of Dedication (parallel to John vii. 10—x. 42). Luke xii. 22—xvii. 10 refers to the interval between that time and our Lord's stay at Ephraim (parallel to John xi. 1-54); and Luke xvii. 11—xviii. 14 relates to the journey from Ephraim to Jerusalem, through Samaria, Galilee, and Perea." (Robinson's Harmony, English ed. p. 92). If the Table of the Harmony of the Gospels given above is referred to [Gos. xvi.], it will be found that this great division of St. Luke (x. 17—xviii. 14) is inserted entirely between John x. 21 and 22; not that this appeared certainly correct, but that there are no points of contact with the other Gospels to assist us in breaking it up. That this division contains partly or chiefly reminiscences of occurrences in Galilee prior to the Feast of Tabernacles, is untenable. A journey of some kind is implied in the course of it (see xiii. 22, and beyond this we shall hardly venture to go. It is quite possible, as Wieseler supposes, that part of it should be placed before, and part after the Feast of Dedication. Notwithstanding the uncertainty, it is as the history of this period of the Redeemer's career that the Gospel of St. Luke presents its chief distinction to us. Some of the most striking parables, preserved only by this Evangelist, belong to this period. The parables of the good Samaritan, the prodigal son, the unjust steward, the rich man and Lazarus, and the Pharisee and publican, all peculiar to this Gospel, belong to the present section. The instructive account of Mary and Martha, on which so many have taken a wrong view of Martha's conduct, reminds us that there are two ways of serving the truth, that of active exertion, and that of contemplation. The preference is given to Mary's meditation, because Martha's labor belonged to household cares, and was only indirectly religious. The miracle of the ten lepers belongs to this portion of the narrative. Besides these, scattered sayings that occur in St. Matthew are here repeated in a new connection. Here too belongs the return of the seventy disciples, but we know not precisely where they rejoined the Lord (Luke x. 17-20). They had been full of triumph, because they found even the devils subject to them through the weight of Christ's word. In anticipation of the victory which was now begun, against the powers of darkness, Jesus replies, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." He sought, however, to humble their triumphant spirit, so near akin to spiritual pride; "Notwithstanding, in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven."

The account of the bringing of young children to Jesus mates again the three Evangelists. Here, as often, St. Mark gives the most minute account of what occurred. After the announcement that the disposition of little children was the most meet for the kingdom of God, "He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them and blessed them." The childlike spirit, which in nothing depends upon its own capacity, but seeks not how to contrast with the haughty Pharisaism with its boast of learning and wisdom; and Jesus tells them that the former is the passport to his kingdom (Matt. xix. 13-15; Mark x. 13-16; Luke xviii. 15-17).

The question of the ruler, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" was one conceived wholly in the spirit of Judaism. The ruler asked not how he should be delivered from sin, but how his will, already free to righteousness, might select the best and most meritorious line of conduct. The words, "Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God," were meant first to draw him down to a humbler view of his own state; the title good is easy to give, but hard to justify, except when applied to the One who is all good. Jesus by no means repudiates the title as applied to Himself, but only as applied on any other ground than that of a reference to his true divine nature. Then the Lord opened out to him all the moral law, which in its full and complete sense no man has observed; but the ruler answered, perhaps sincerely, that he had observed it all from his youth up. Duties however there might be which had not come within the range of his thoughts; and as the demand had reference to his own special case, our Lord gives the special advice to sell all his possessions and to give to the poor. Then for the first time did the man discover that his devotion to God and his yearning after the eternal life were not so perfect as he had thought; and he went away sorrowful, unable to bear this sacrifice. And Jesus told the disciples how hard it was for those who had riches to enter into the kingdom of God. To be rich was not by any means a disqualification, but the feeding on the material world in the most ready, now contrasts, with somewhat too much emphasis, the mode in which the disciples had left all for Him, with the conduct of this rich ruler. Our Lord, spring him the rebuke which he might have expected, tells them that those who have made any sacrifice shall have it richly repaid even in this life in the shape of a consolation and comfort, which even persecutions cannot take away (Mark x. 17-34; Luke xvii. 18-30). Words of warning close the narrative, "Many that are first shall be last and the last shall be first,” lest the disciples should be thinking too much of the sacrifices, not so very great, that they had made. And in St. Matthew only, the well-known parable of the laborers in the vineyard is added to illustrate the same lesson. Whatever else the parable may contain of reference to the calling of Jews and Gentiles, the first lesson Christ was to give was one of caution to the Apostles against thinking too much of their early calling and arduous labors. They would see many, who, in comparison with themselves, were as the laborers called at the eleventh hour, who should be accepted of God as well as they. But not merit, not self-sacrifice, but the pure love of God and his mere bounty, conferred salvation on either of them: “Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own?” (Matt. xx. 1–16).

On the way to Jerusalem through Peræa, to the Feast of Dedication, Jesus again puts before the minds of the twelve what they are never to forget, the sufferings that await Him. They “understood none of these things” (Luke), for they could not reconcile this foreboding of suffering with the signs and announcements of the coming of his kingdom (Matt. xx. 17–19; Mark x. 32–34; Luke xviii. 31–34). In consequence of this new, though dark, intimation of the coming of the kingdom, Salome, with her youngest son, James, then a child,46 besought “to bespeak the two places of highest honor in the kingdom. Jesus tells them that they know not what they ask; that the places of honor in the kingdom shall be bestowed, not by Jesus in answer to a chance request, but upon those for whom they are prepared by the Father. As sin ever provokes sin, the ambition of the ten was now aroused, and they began to be much displeased with James and John. Jesus once more recalls the principle that the childlike disposition is that which He approves. “Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant: Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many” (Matt. xx. 28–33; Mark x. 35–45).

The healing of the two blind men at Jericho is chiefly remarkable among the miracles from the difficulty which has arisen in harmonizing the accounts. Matthew speaks of two blind men, and of the occasion as the departure from Jericho; Mark of one, whom he names, and of their arrival at Jericho; and Luke agrees with him. This point has received much discussion; but the view of Lightfoot finds favor with many eminent expositors, that there were two blind men, and both were healed under similar circumstances, except that Bartimæus was on one side of the city, and was healed by Jesus as he entered, and the other was healed on the other side as they departed (see Greswell, Diss. xx. ii.; Wieseler, Chron. Syn. p. 392; Matt. xx. 26–34; Mark x. 46–52; Luke xviii. 35–43). [BARTHEMUS, Amer. ed.]

The calling of Zacchæus has more than a mere personal interest. He was a publican, one of a class despised and despoiled by the Jews. But he was one who sought to serve God; he gave largely to the poor, and restored fourfold when he had injured any man. Justice and love were the law of his life. From such did Jesus wish to call his disciples, whether they were publicans or not. “This day is salvation come to this house, for that he also is a son of Abraham. For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost” (Luke xix. 1–10).

We have reached now the Feast of Dedication; but, as has been said, the exact place of the events in St. Luke about this part of the ministry has not been conclusively determined. After being present at the feast, Jesus returned to Bethabara beyond Jordan, where John had formerly baptized, and abode there. The place which the beginning of his ministry had consecrated, was now to be adorned with his presence as it drew towards its close, and the scene of John’s activity was now to witness the presence of the Saviour whom he had so faithfully proclaimed (John x. 32–42). The Lord intended by this choice to recall to the minds of many the good which John had done them, and also, it may be, to prevent an undue exaltation of John in the minds of some who had heard him only. “Many,” we read, “resorted to Him, and said, John did no miracle, but all things that John spoke of this man were true. And many believed on Him there” (vv. 41, 42).

How long He remained here does not appear. It was probably for some weeks. The sore need of a family in Bethany, who were what men call the poor, is referred to (John xii.), and Jesus, who saw Lazarus was sick, and his sisters sent word of it to Jesus, whose power they well knew, Jesus answered that the sickness was not unto death, but for the glory of God, and of the Son of God. This had reference to the miracle about to be wrought; even though he died, not his death but his restoration to life was the purpose of the sickness. But Jesus made a trial to the faith of the sisters to find the words of their friend apparently falsified. Jesus abode for two days where He was, and then proposed to the disciples to return. The rage of the Jews against him filled the disciples with alarm; and Thomas, whose mind least always to the despising side, and saw nothing in the expedition but certain death to all of them, said, “Let us also go that we may die with Him.” It was not till Lazarus had been four days in the grave that the Saviour appeared on the scene. The practical energy of Martha, and the retiring character of Mary, show themselves here, as once before. It was Martha who met Him, and addressed to Him words of sorrowful reproach. Jesus prob ed her faith deeply, and found that even in this extremity of sorrow it would not fall her. Mary now joined them, summoned by her sister; and she too reproached the Lord for the delay. Jesus does not resist the contagion of their sorrow, and as a Man He weeps true human tears by the side of the grave of a friend. But with the power of God He breaks the fetters of brass in which Lazarus was held by death, and at His word the man whom corruption had already begun to do its work came forth alive and whole (John xi. 38–45). It might seem difficult to account for the omission of this, perhaps the most signal of all the miracles of Jesus, by the synoptical Evangelists. No doubt it was intentional; and the wish not to direct attention, and perhaps persecution, to Lazarus in his lifetime may go far to account for it. But it stands well in the pages of John, whose privilege it has been to announce the highest truths connected with the divine nature of Jesus, and who is now also permitted to show Him touched with sympathy for a sorrowing family with whom he lived in intimacy.
A miracle so public, for Bethany was close to Jerusalem, and the family of Lazarus well known to many people in the mother-city, could not escape the notice of the Sanhedrin. A meeting of this Council was called without loss of time, and the matter discussed, not without symptoms of alarm, for the members believed that a popular outbreak, with Jesus at its head, was impending, and that it would excite the jealousy of the Romans and lead to the taking away of their place and nation." Caiphas the high-priest gave it as his opinion that it was expedient for them that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation should not perish. The Evangelist adds that these words bore a prophetic meaning, of which the speaker was unconscious: "This spake he not of himself, but being high-priest that year he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation." That a bad and worldly man may prophesy the case of Babylon proves (Num. xxiii.); and the Jews, as Schottgen shows, believed that prophecy might also be unconscious. But the connection of the gift of prophecy with the office of the high-priest offers a difficulty. It has been said that though this gift is never in Scripture assigned to the high-priest as such, yet the popular belief at this time was that he did enjoy it. There is, however, except this passage, of any such belief; and the Evangelist would not appeal to it except it were true, and if it were true, then the O. T. would contain some allusion to it. The endeavors to escape from the difficulty by changes of punctuation are not to be thought of. The meaning of the passage seems to be this: The Jews were about to commit a crime, the real results of which they did not know; and Pilate overruled the words of one of them to make him declare the reality of the transaction, but unconsciously; and as Caiphas was the high-priest, the highest minister of God, and therefore the most conspicuous in the sin, it was natural to expect that he and not another would be the channel of the prophecy. The connection between his office and the prophecy was not a necessary one: but if a prophecy was to be uttered, it was expected that the highest-priest, who offered for the people, should be the person compelled to utter it. The death of Jesus was now resolved on, and He fled to Ephraim for a few days, because his hour was not yet come (John xi. 45-57).

We now approach the final stage of the history, and every word and act tend towards the great act of suffering. The hatred of the Pharisees, now converted into a settled purpose of murder, the them, and straightway he will send them." With these facts, impressed as for the service of a King, He was to enter into Jerusalem. The disciples spread upon the ass their rags clad choaks for Him to sit on. And then, crying aloud before Him, in the words of the 118th Psalm, " Hosanna, Save now! blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." This Messiaanic psalm they applied to Him, from a belief, sincere for the moment, that He was the Messiah. It was a striking, and to the Pharisees an alarming sight; but it only serves in the end to show the feeble hearts of the Jewish people. The same lips that cried Hosanna will be long before He passes by. Meantime, however, all thoughts were carried back to the promises of a Messiah. The very act of riding in upon an ass revived an old prophecy of Zechariah (ix. 9). Words of prophecy out of a palm sprang unconsciously to their lips. All the city was moved. Blind and lame came to the Temple when He arrived there and were healed. The augurs consulted, the barren fig-tree had already died. But all these demonstrations did not deceive the divine insight of Christ. He wept over the city that was hailing Him as its King, and said, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes" (Luke). He goes on to prophesy the destruction of the city, just as it afterwards came to pass. After working miracles in the Temple He returned to Bethany. The 10th of Nisan was the day for the separation of the paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 3). Jesus, the Lamb of God, entered Jerusalem and the Temple on this day, and although none but He knew that He was the Paschal Lamb, the coincidence is not undesigned (Matt. xxi. 1-11, 14-17; Mark xi. 1-11; Luke xix. 29-44; John xii. 12-19).

Monday the 11th of Nisan (April 3rd).—The next day Jesus returned to Jerusalem, again to take advantage of the mood of the people to instruct them. On the way He approached one of the many fig-trees which grew in that quarter (Bethphage = a house of figs ), and found that it was full of foliage, but without fruit. He said, " No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever:" and the fig-tree withered away. This was no doubt a work of destruction, and as such was unlawful. But He desired to understand the mind of those who stumbled at the destruction of a tree, which seems to have ceased to bear, by the word of God the Son, yet are not offended at the famine or the pestilence wrought by God the Father. The right of the Son must rest on the same ground as that of the Father. And this was not a wanton destruction; it was a type and a warning. He had been made the subject of a parable (Luke xii. 5); and here it is made a visible type of the destruction of the Jewish people. He had come to them seeking fruit, and now it was time to pronounce their doom as a nation — there should be no fruit on them for ever (Matt. xxi. 18, 19; Mark xi. 12-14). Proceeding now to the Temple, He cleared its court of the crowd of traders that gathered there. He had performed the same act at the beginning of his ministry, and now at the close He repeats it, for the house of prayer was as much a den of thieves as ever. With zeal for God's house his ministry began, with the same it ended (see p 1369; Matt. xxi. 12, 13; Mark xi. 15-19; Luke xix. 45-48). In the evening He returned again to Bethany.
that terrible denunciation of woe to the Thiriasse, with which we are familiar (Matt. xxiii. 1-39). If we compare it with our Lord's account of his own position in reference to the Law, in the Sermon on the Mount, we see that the principles there laid down are everywhere violated by the Thiriasse. Their dissembling was ostentation: their distinctions about oaths led to falsehood and profaneness; they were exact about the small observances and neglected the weightier ones of the Law; they adorned the tombs of the prophets, saying that if they had lived in the time of their fathers they would not have sinned; and yet they were about to fill up the measure of their fathers' sins by slaying the greatest of the prophets, and persecuting and slaying his followers. After an indignant denunciation of the hypocrites who, with a show of religion, had thus contrived to stifle the true spirit of religion and were in reality its chief persecutors, He apostrophizes Jerusalem in words full of compassion, yet carrying with them a sentence of doom: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. xxi.).

Another great discourse belongs to this day, which, more than any other, presents Jesus as the great Prophet of His people. On leaving the Temple His disciples drew attention to the beauty of its structure, its "goodly stones and gifts," their remarks probably arising from the threats of destruction which had so lately been uttered by Jesus. His Master answered that not one stone of the noble pile should be left upon another. When they reached the Mount of Olives the disciples, or rather the first four (Mark), speaking for the rest, asked Him when this destruction should be accomplished. To understand the answer it must be borne in mind that Jesus warned them that He was not giving them an historical account such as would enable them to anticipate the events. "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only. But the day and hour of His coming no man knoweth, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." Accordingly, two events, analogous in character but widely sundered by time, are so treated in the prophecy that it is almost impossible to disentangle them. The destruction of Jerusalem and the day of judgment — the national and the universal days of account — are spoken of together or alternately without hint of the great interval of time that elapsed between them. Thus it may seem that a most important fact is omitted; but the highest work of prophecy is not to fix times and seasons, but to disclose the divine significance of events. What was most important to them to know was that the destruction of Jerusalem followed upon the probation and rejection of her people, and that the crucifixion and that destruction were connected as cause and effect (Matt. xxvii.; Mark xv.; Luke xxiii.).

The conclusion which Jesus drew from his own awful warning was, that they were not to attempt to fix the date of his return: "Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." The lesson of the parable of the Ten Virgins is the same; the Christian soul is to be ever in a state of vigilance and preparation (Matt. xxvi. 33-35). And the parable of the Ten Virgins is, here repeated in a modified form, teaches how precious to souls are the uses of time (Matt. xxv. 1-13). In concluding this momentous discourse, our Lord puts aside the destruction of Jerusalem, and displays to our eyes the picture of the final judgment. There will He Himself be present, and will separate all the vast family of mankind into two classes, and shall appraise the works of each class as works done to Himself, present in the world though invisible; and men shall see, some with terror and some with joy, that their life here was spent either for Him or against Him, and that the day of the Lord is near. By the approximation for them by Him, and not by choice, and the reward and punishment shall be apportioned to each (Matt. xxv. 31-46).

With these weighty words ends the third day; and whether we consider the importance of His recorded teaching, or the amount of opposition and of sorrow presented to His mind, it was one of the greatest days of all His earthly ministries. The general tendency of His ministry is to contain a retrospect of His ministry and of the strange reception of Him by His people, may well be read as if they came in here. (xv.)

*Wednesday the 13th of Nisan (April 5th).— This day was passed in retirement with the Apostles. Satan had put it into the mind of one of them to betray Him; and Judas Iscariot made a covenant to betray Him to the chief priests for thirty pieces of silver. The character of Judas, and the degrees by which he reached the abyss of guilt in which he was at last destroyed, deserve much attention. There is no reason to doubt that when he was chosen by Jesus He possessed, like the rest, the capacity of being saved, and was endowed with gifts which might have made him an able minister of the New Testament. But the innate wickedness and covetousness were not purged out from him. His practical talents made him a kind of steward of the slender resources of that society, and no doubt he conceived the wish to use the same gifts on a larger field, which the realization of "the kingdom of Heaven" would open out before him. These practical gifts were his ruin. Between him and the rest there could be no comparison: his motives were worldly, and theirs were not. They loved the Saviour more as they knew Him better. Judas, living under the constant tacit rebuke of a most holy example, grew to hate the Lord; for nothing, perhaps, more strongly draws out evil instincts than the enforced contact with goodness. And when he knew that his Master did not trust him, was not deceived by him, his hatred grew more intense. But this did not break out in overt act until Jesus began to foretell his own crucifixion and death. If these were to happen, all his hopes that he had built on following the Lord would be dashed down. If they should crucify the Master they would not spare the servants; and, in place of a heavenly kingdom, he could find contempt, persecution, and probably death. It was high time, therefore, to the powers that seemed most likely to prevail in the end; and he opened a negotiation with the high-priests in secret, in order that, if his Master were to fall, he might be the instrument, and so make friends among the triumphant persecutors. And yet, strange contradiction, he did not wholly cease to believe in Jesus; possibly he thought that he would so act that he might be safe either xxvi. If Jesus was the Prophet and Mighty One that he had once thought, then the attempt to take Him might force Him to put forth all his resources and to assume the kingdom to which He laid claim, and then the agent in the treason, even if discovered, might plead that he foresaw the result: if He were unable to save Himself and his disciples, then it was well for Judas to betake himself to those who were stronger. The bribe of money, not very considerable, could not have been the chief motive; but as two vicious appetites could be gratified instead of one, the thirty pieces of silver became a part of the temptation. The treason was successful, and the money paid; but not one moment’s pleasure did those silver pieces purchase for their wretched possessor, not for a moment did he reap any fruit from his detestable guilt. After the crucifixion, the avenging belief that Jesus was what He professed to be rushed back in full force upon his mind. He went to those who had hired him; they derided his remorse. He cast away the accursed silver pieces, defiled with the ‘innocent blood’ of the Son of God, and went and hanged himself (Matt. xxvii. 14-16; Mark xiv. 10-11; Luke xxii. 1-6).—

Thursday the 14th of Nisan (April 6th).—On the “first day of unleavened bread,” when the Jews were wont to put away all leaven of their houses, Jesus, after the feast (Heb. on March 8, 12), the disciples asked their Master where they were to eat the Passover. He directed Peter and John to go into Jerusalem, and to follow a man whom they should see bearing a pitcher of water, and to demand of him, in their Master’s name, the use of the guest-chamber in his house for this purpose. All happened as Jesus had told them, and in the evening they assembled to celebrate, for the last time, the paschal meal. The sequence of the events is not quite clear from a comparison of the Evangelists; but the difficulty arises with St. Luke, and there is external evidence that he is not following the chronological order (Wieseler, Chron. Syn., p. 399). The order seems to be as follows. When they had taken their places at table and the supper had begun, Jesus gave them the first cup to divide among themselves (Mark xiv. 26). It was customary to drink at the paschal supper four cups of wine mixed with water; and this answered to the first of them. There now arose a contention among the disciples which of them should be the greatest; perhaps in connection with the places which they had taken at this feast (Luke). After a solemn warning against pride and ambition Jesus performed an act which, as one of the last of his life, must ever have been remembered by the witnesses as a great lesson of humility. He rose from the table, poured water into a basin, girded himself with a towel, and proceeded to wash the disciples’ feet (John). It was an office for slaves to perform, and from Him, knowing as He did, “that the Father had given all things into his hand, and that He was come from God and went to God,” it was an unspoken Angelic service. But his love for them was infinite, and if there were any way to teach them the humility which as yet they had not learned, He would not fail to adopt it. Peter, with his usual readiness, was the first to refuse to accept such menial service—“Lord, dost thou wash my feet?” When he was told that this act was significant of the greater act of humiliation by which Jesus saved his disciples and united them to Himself, his scruples vanished. After all had been washed, the Saviour explained to them the meaning of what He had done. “If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another’s feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you. But this act was only the outward symbol of far greater sacrifices for them than they could as yet understand. It was a small matter to wash their feet; it was a great one to come down from the glories of heaven to save them. Later the Apostle Paul put this same lesson of humility into another form, and rested it upon deeper grounds. ‘Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus: who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross’ (Phil. ii. 5-8; Matt. xxvii. 17-20; Mark xiv. 12-17; Luke xxii. 7-30; John xiii. 1-20).—

From this act of love it does not seem that even the traitor Judas was excluded. But his treason was thoroughly known: and now Jesus denounced it. One of them should betray Him. They were all sorrowful at this, and each asked “Is it I?” and even Judas asked and received an affirmative answer (Matt.), but probably in an undertone, for when Jesus said “That thou dost do quickly,” none of the rest understood. The traitor having gone straight to his wicked object, the end of the Saviour’s ministry seemed already at hand. “Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in Him.” He gave them the new commandment, to love one another, as though it were a last bequest to them. To love was not a new thing, it was enjoined in the old Law; but to be distinguished for a special Christian love and mutual devotion was what He would have, and this was the new element in the commandment. Founded by a great act of love, the Church was to be marked by love (Matt. xxvi. 21-25; Mark xiv. 18-21; Luke xxii. 21-23; John xiii. 21-35).—

Towards the close of the meal Jesus instituted the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper. He took bread and gave thanks and brake it, and gave to his disciples, saying, “This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me.” He then took the cup, which corresponded to the third cup in the usual course of the paschal supper, and after giving thanks, He gave it to them, saying, “This is my blood of the new testament [covenant] which is shed for many.” It was a memorial of his passion and of this last supper that preceded it, and in dwelling on his Passion in this sacrament, in true faith, all believers draw nearer to the cross of his sufferings and taste more strongly the sweetness of his love and the evidence of his atoning death (Matt. xxvi. 28-32; Mark xiv. 22-25; Luke xii. 19 20; 1 Cor. xi. 23-25).—

The denial of Peter is now foretold, and to no man bearing a pitcher of water.” As the host was to be identified by this circumstance, it seems to be implied that the practice was unusual.
one would such an announcement be more incredible than to Peter himself. "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now?" I will lay down my life for thee." The zeal was sincere, and as such did the Lord regard it; but here, as elsewhere, Peter did not count the cost. By and by, when the Holy Spirit has come down to give them a strength not their own. Peter and the rest of the disciples will be bold to resist persecution, even to the death. It needs strong love and deep insight to view such an act as this denial with sorrow and not with indignation (Matt. xxvi. 31-55; Mark xiv. 27-31; Luke xxi. 31-38; John xiii. 36-38).

That great final discourse, which John alone has recorded, is now delivered. Although in the middle of it there is a mention of departure (John xiv. 31), this perhaps only implies that they prepared to go; and then the whole discourse was delivered in the house before they proceeded to Gethsemane. Of the contents of this discourse, which is the voice of the Priest in the holy of holies, something has been said already (p. 1388; John xiv.-xvii.).

Friday the 15th of Nisan (April 7), including part of the eve of it. — "When they had sung a hymn," a which perhaps means, when they had sung the second part of the Hallel, or song of praise, which consisted of Psalms ext.-xxviii., the former part having been sung (a) at an earlier part of the supper, they went out into the Mount of Olives. They came to a place called Gethsemane (oil-press), and it is probable that the place now pointed out to travellers is the real scene of that which follows, and even that its huge olive-trees are the legitimate successors of those which were there when Jesus visited it. A moment of terrible agony is approaching, of which all the Apostles need not be spectators, for He thinks of them, and wishes to spare them this addition to their sorrows. So He takes only his three proved companions, Peter, James, and John, and passes with them farther into the garden, leaving the rest seated, probably near the entrance. No pen can attempt to describe what passed that night in that secluded spot. He tells them "my soul is exceeding sorrowful," He will lay down his life for the sheep, and watch with me," and then leaving even the three He goes further, and in solitude wrestles with an inconceivable trial. The words of Mark are still more expressive — He began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy" (θυμομαις καὶ ἄνευνοις, xiv. 33). The former word means that he was struck with a great dread; not from the fear of physical suffering, however exorcizing, we may well believe, but from the contact with the sins of the world, of which, in some inconceivable way, He here felt the bitterness and the weight. He did not merely contemplate them, but bear and feel them. It is impossible to explain this scene in Gethsemane in any other way. If it were merely the fear of the terrors of death that overcame Him, then the martyr Stephen and many another would have sung Him a requiem. But when He says, "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee; take away this cup from me: nevertheless not what I will, but what thou wilt," (Mark), the cup was filled with a far bitterer potion than death; it was favored with the poison of the sins of all mankind against its God. Whilst the sinless Son is thus carried two ways by the present horror and the strong determination to do the Father's will, the disciples have sunk to sleep. It was in search of consolation that He came back to them. The disciple who had been so ready to ask "Why cannot I follow thee now?" must hear another question, that relaxes his former confidence — "Couldst not thou watch one hour?" A second time He departs and wrestles in prayer with the Father; but although the words He utters are almost the same (Mark says "the same"), He no longer asks that the cup may pass away from Him — "If this cup may not pass away from me except I drink it, Thy will be done" (Matt.). A second time He returns and finds them sleeping. The same scene is repeated yet a third time; and then all is concluded. Henceforth they may sleep and take their rest; never more shall they be asked to watch one hour with Jesus, for his ministry in the flesh is at an end. "The hour is at hand, and the Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners" (Matt.). The prayer of Jesus in this place has always been regarded, and with reason, as of great weight against the monomelodious heresy. It expresses the natural shrinking of the human will from a horror which the divine nature has admitted into it, yet without sin. Never does He say, "I will flee," He says, "If it be possible:" and leaves that to the decision of the Father. That horror and dread arose from the spectacle of human sin: from the bearing the weight and guilt of human sin as about to make atonement for it: and from a conflict with the powers of darkness. Thus this scene is in complete contrast to the Transfiguration. The same companions witnessed both; but there was peace, and glory, and honor, for the sinless Son of God; here fear and conflict: there God bore testimony to Him: here Satan for the last time tempted Him. (On the account of the Agony see Krummacher, Der Leidende Christus, p. 206; Matt. xxxvi. 36-46; Mark xiv. 32-42; Luke xiii. 39-41; John xviii. 1.) Judas now appeared to complete his work. In the double light of torches, a kiss from him was the sign to the officers whom they should take. John xvi.; the kiss was given to Peter, and the sword of him whom Jesus loved, he drew a sword and smote a servant of the high-priest, and cut out off his ear: but His Lord refused such succor, and healed the wounded man. [MALCHUS.] He treated the seizure as a step in the fulfilment of the prophecies about Him, and resisted it not. All the disciples forsake Him and fled (Matt. xxvi. 47-50; Mark xiv. 43-52; Luke xxii. 47-53; John xvi. 2-12.)

There is some difficulty in arranging the events that immediately follow, so as to embrace all the four accounts. — The data will be found in the Commentary of Olshausen, in Wieseler (Chron. Syn. p. 401 ff.), and in Greswell's Dissertations (iii. 200 ff.). On the capture of Jesus He was first taken to the house of Annas, the father-in-law of Caiphas (see p. 1350 of the high-priest. It has been argued that as Annas is called, and conjointly with Caiphas, the high-priest, he must have held some actual office in connection with the priesthood, and Lightfoot and others suppose that he was the vicar or deputy of the high-priest, and Selden that he was president of the Council of the Sadducees;
Feeling and and and for subject principle he prefilled president the after, time, upon several some denies over a Peter disciples? tion in, the who them, chambers house Evangelists sent course Grammar); fact 1 did Caiaphas the most the court to the him, to the lamp of the portress threw its light on his face, and she took note of him; and afterwards, at the fire which had been lighted, she put the question to him, "Art not thou also one of this man's disciples?" The answer which she received at this time was both zealous and boldness of Peter seems to have deserted him. This was indeed a time of great spiritual weakness and depression, and the power of darkness had gained an influence over the Apostle's mind. He had come as in secret; he is determined so to remain, and he denies his Master! Feeling now the danger of his situation, he went out into the porch, and there some one, or, looking at all the accounts, probably several persons, asked him the question a second time, and he denied more strongly. About an hour after, when he had returned into the court, the same question was put to him a third time, with the same result. Then the cock crew; and Jesus, who was within sight, probably in some open room, communicating with the court, "turned and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly" (Luke). Let no man who cannot fathom the utter perplexity and distress of such a time presume to judge the zealous disciple hardly. He trusted too much to his strength; he did not enter into the full meaning of the words, "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation." Self-confidence betrayed him into a great sin: and the most merciful Lord restored him after it. Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. x. 12; Matt. xxvi. 57, 58, 61-73; Mark xiv. 53, 54, 60-72; Luke xii. 34-62; John xviii. 13-18, 24-27).

The first interrogatory to which our Lord was surject (John xviii. 19-24) was addressed to Him by Caiphas (Annas?, Olkhausen, Wieseler), probably before the Sanhedrin had time to assemble. It was the questioning of an inquisitive person who had no right to make such a demand, rather than a formal examination. The Lord's refusal to answer is thus explained and justified. When the more regular proceedings begin He is ready to answer. A servant of the high-priest, knowing that he should thereby please his master, smote the cheek of the Son of God with the palm of his hand. But this was only the beginning of horrors. At the dawn of day the Sanhedrin, summoned by the high-priest in the course of the night, assembled, and brought their band of false witnesses, whom they must have had ready before. These gave their testimony (see Psalm xxvii. 12), but even before this unjust tribunal it could not stand, it was so full of contradictions. At last two false witnesses came, and their testimony was very like the truth. They deposed that He had said, "I will destroy this temple, that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands" (Mark xiv. 58). The perversion is slight but important; for Jesus did not say that He would destroy (see John ii. 19), which was just the point that would irritate the Jews. Even these two fell into contradictions. The high-priest now with a solemn adjuration asks Him whether He is the Christ the Son of God. He answers that He is, and foretells his return in glory and power at the last day. This is enough for their purpose. They pronounce Him guilty of a crime for which death should be the punishment. It appears that the Council was now suspended or broken up; for Jesus is delivered over to the brutal violence of the people, which could not be prevented while the high court of the Jews was sitting. The prophets had foretold this violence (Is. l. 6), and also the meekness with which it would be borne (Is. lli. 7). And yet this "lama led to the slaughter" knew that it was He that should judge the world, including every one of his perpetrators. The Sanhedrin had been within the range of its duties in taking cognizance of all who claimed to be prophets. If the question put to Jesus had been merely, Art Thou the Messiah? this body should have gone into the question of his right to the title, and decided upon the evidence. But the question was really twofold, "Art Thou the Christ, and in that name dost Thou also call Thyself the Son of God?" There was no blasphemy in claiming the former name, but there was in assuming the latter. Hence the proceedings were cut short. They had closed their eyes to the one, accessible to all, of the truths of Jesus, that He was indeed the Son of God, and without these they were not likely to believe that He could claim a title belonging to no other among the children of men (John xviii. 19-24; Luke xxii. 63-71; Matt. xxvi. 59-68; Mark xiv. 55-65).

Although they had pronounced Jesus to be guilty of death, the Sanhedrin possessed no power to carry out such a sentence (Josephus, Ant. xx. 6). So as soon as it was day they took Him to Pilate, the Roman procurator. The hall of judgment, or praetorium, was probably a part of the tower of Antonia near the Temple, where the Roman garrison was. Pilate hearing that Jesus was an offender under their law, was about to give them leave to treat him accordingly; and this would have made it quite safe to execute Him. But the council, wishing to shift the responsibility from themselves, from the sedition and fear of revolution among the people, the blindness of the Lord, such as they had seen on the first day of that week, said that it was not lawful for them to put any man to death: and having condemned Jesus for blasphemy, they now strove to have Him condemned by Pilate for a political crime, for calling Himself the King of the Jews. But the Jewish punishment was stoning; whilst crucifixion was Roman punishment, inflicted occasionally on those who were not Roman citizens; and thus it came about that Pilate, saying he had found no fault of him, his death was fulfilled (Matt. xx. 19, with John xii. 33, 35). From the first Jesus found favor in the eyes of Pilate; his answer that his kingdom was not of this world, and therefore could not menace the Roman rule, was accepted, and Pilate pronounced that he found no fault in Him. Not so easily were the Jews to be chanted of their prey. They heaped up accusations against Him as a disturber of the public peace (Luke xxiii. 5). Pilate was no match for their vehemence. Finding that Jesus was a Galilean, he sent Him to Herod to be dealt with; but Herod, after cruel mockery and persecution, sent Him back to Pilate. Now commenced the fearful struggle between the Roman procurator, a weak as well as cruel man, and the Jews. Pilate was detested by the Jews as cruel, treacherous, and oppressive. Other records of his life do not represent him merely as the weakening that he appears here. He had violated their national prejudices, and had used the knives of assassins to avert the consequences. But the Jews knew the weak point in his breastplate. He was the merely worldly and professional statesman, to whom the favor of the Emperor was life itself, and the only evil of life a downfall from that favor. It was their policy therefore to threaten to denounce him to Caesar for lack of zeal in suppressing a rebellion, the leader of which was anizing at a crown. In his way Pilate believed in Christ; this the greatest crime of a stained life was that with which his own will had the least to do. But he did not believe, so as to make him risk delusion to his Master and all its possible consequences. He yielded to the stronger purpose of the Jews, and suffered Jesus to be put to death. Not many years after, the consequences which he had stained his soul to avert came upon him. He was accused and banished, and like Judas, the other great accomplice in this crime of the Jews, put an end to his own life [see [PILOT]]. The well-known incidents of the second interview are soon recalled. After the examination by Herod, and the return of Jesus, Pilate proposed to release Him, as it was usual on the feast-day to release a prisoner to the Jews out of grace. Pilate had the public peace in mind, and wished to object to this; but it was a covert appeal to the people, also present, with whom Jesus had so lately been in favor. The multitude, persuaded by the priests, preferred another prisoner, called Barabba. In the mean time the wife of Pilate sent a warning to Pilate to have nothing to do with the death of "that just man," as she had been troubled in a dream on account of Him. Oligod, as he thought, to yield to the clamors of the people, he took water and washed his hands before them, and adopting the phrase of his wife, which perhaps represented the opinion of both of them formed before this time, he said, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it." The people impressed on their own heads and those of their children the blood of Him whose doom was thus sealed.

Pilate released unto them Barabba "that for sedition and murder was cast into prison whom they had desired" (comp. Acts iii. 14). This was no unimportant element in their crime. The choice was offered them between one who had broken the laws of God and man, and one who had given his whole life up to the doing good and speaking truth amongst them. They condemned the latter to death, and were eager for the deliverance of the former. And in fact their demanding the acquittal of a murderer is but the prelude to requiring the death of an innocent person, as St. Ambrose observes: for it is but the very law of iniquity, that which hate innocence should love crime. They rejected therefore the Prince of Heaven, and chose a robber and a murderer, and an insurrectionist, and they received the object of their choice: so was it given them, for insurrections and murders did not fail them till the last, when their city was destroyed in the midst of such other insurrections, which they now demanded of the Roman governor" (Williams on the Passion, p. 215).

Now came the scourging, and the blows and insults of the soldiers, who, uttering truth when they thought they were only reviling, crowned Him and addressed Him as King of the Jews. According to John, Pilate now made one more effort for his release. He thought that the scourging might appease their rage, he saw the frame of Jesus bowed and withered with all that it had gone through; and, hoping that this moving sight might inspire them with the same pity that he felt himself, he brought the Saviour forth again to them, and said, "Behold the man!" Not even so was their violence assuaged. He had made Himself the Son of God, and must die. He still sought to release Jesus; but the last argument, which had been in the minds of both sides all along, was now openly applied to him: "If thou let this man go, thon art not Caesar's friend." This saying, which had not been until the vehemence of rage overcame their decent respect for Pilate's position, decided the question. He delivered Jesus to be crucified (Matt. xxvii. 15-20; Mark xvi. 16-18; Luke xxi. 17-25; John xviii. 39, 40; xix. 1-16). John mentions that this occurred about the sixth hour, whereas the crucifixion, according to Mark, was accomplished at the third hour; but there is every reason to think, with Greewell and Wieseler, that John reckons from midnight, and that this took place at six in the morning, whilst in Mark the Jewish reckoning from six in the morning is followed, so that the crucifixion took place at nine o'clock, the intervening time having been spent in preparations. [Hout, Amer. ed.]

Lifchit, but not insuperable, chronological questions arise in connection with (a) John xiii. 1, "before the feast of the Passover;" (b) John xviii. 28, "and they themselves went not into the judgmenthall lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover;" and (c) John xix. 14, "And it was the preparation of the Passover, about the sixth hour," in all of which the account of John seems dissuant with that of the other Evangelists. The passages are discussed in the various commentaries, but nowhere more fully than in a paper by Dr. Robinson "Bibl. Sacra, 1845, p. 465," reproduced in his English Harmony in an abridged form.

One Person alone has been calm amidst the excitements of that night of horrors. He now laid the weight of his cross, or at least the transverse beam of it; and, with this pressing Him down, they procured out of the city to Golgotha or Calvary, a place the site of which is now uncertain. As He began to droop, his persecutors, unwilling to defile themselves with the accursed burden, by hold of Simon of Cyrene and compel Him to carry the cross after Jesus. Amongst the great multitude that followed, were several women, who bewailed and lamented Him. He bade them not to weep for Him, but for the widespread destruction of their nation, which should be the punishment for his death (Luke). After offering Him wine and myrrh, they crucified Him between two thieves. Nothing was wanting to his humiliation; a thief had been preferred before Him, and two thieves share his punishment. The soldiers divided his garments and cast lots for them (see Psalm xxii, 18). Pilate set over Him in three languages the inscription "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews." The chief-priests took exception to this, but Pilate did not denounce Him as falsely calling Himself by that name, but Pilate refused to alter it. The passers-by and the Roman soldiers would not let even the minutes of deadly agony pass in peace; they reviled and mocked Him. One of the two thieves underwent a change of heart even on the cross; he reviled at first (Matt.); and then, at the sight of the constancy of Jesus, repented (Luke) (Matt. xxvii.; Mark xv.; Luke xiii.; John xix.).

In the depths of his bodily suffering, Jesus calmly commenced to John (?), who stood near, the care of Mary his mother. "Behold thy son; behold thy mother." From the sixth hour to the ninth there was darkness over the whole land. At the ninth hour (3 p. m.) Jesus uttered with a loud voice the opening words of the 22d Psalm, all the inspired words of which referred to the sufferings of Messiah. One of those present dipped a sponge in the common sour wine of the soldiers and put it on a reed to moisten the sufferer's lips. Again He cried with a loud voice, "It is finished!" (John), "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Luke); and gave up the ghost. His words upon the cross had all of them shown how truly He possessed his soul in patience even to the end of the sacrifice He was making; "Father, forgive them," was a prayer for his enemies. "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise," was a merciful acceptance of the offer of a penitent heart. "Woman, behold thy son," was a sign of loving consideration, even at the last, for those He had always loved. "Why hast Thou forsaken me?" expressed the fear and the need of God. "I thirst," the only word that related to Himself, was uttered because it was preload to that it I not denote Him to drink. "It is finished," expresses the completion of that work which, when He was twelve years old, had been present to his mind, and never absent since; and "Into thy hands I commend My spirit," was the last utterance of his resignation of Himself to what was laid upon Him (Matt. xxvii. 31-56; Mark xvi. 19-41; Luke xxi. 37-46; John xix. 28-30.

On the death of Jesus the veil which covered the most Holy Place of the Temple, the place of the more especial presence of Jehovah, was rent in twain, a symbol that we may now have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus by a new and living way which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, through his flesh" (Heb. x. 19, 20). The priesthood of Christ superseded the priesthood of the law. There was a change in the order of service. Many who were estranged rose from their graves, although they returned to the dust again after this great token of Christ's quickening power had been given to many (Matt.): they were "saints" that slept—probably those who had most earnestly longed for the salvation of Christ were the first to taste the fruits of his conquest of death. [Saints, Amer. ed.] The centurion who kept guard, witnessing what had taken place, came to the same conclusion as Pilate and his wife, "Certainly this was a righteous man; there was nothing beyond them," "Truly this man was the Son of God" (Mark). Even the people who had joined in themocking and reviling were overcome by the wonders of his death, and "smote their breasts and returned" (Luke xxiii. 48). The Jews, very zealous for the Sabbath in the midst of their murderous work, begged Pilate that he would put an end to the punishment by breaking the legs of the criminals (John xv. 26), but it was too late. He had been taken down and buried before the Sabbath, for which they were preparing (Deut. xx. 23; Joseph., B. J. iv. 3, § 2). Those who were to execute this duty found that Jesus was dead and the thieves still living; so they performed this work on the latter only, that a bone of Him might not be broken (Ex. xix. 40; Psalm xxxiv. 20). The death of the Lord before the others was, no doubt, partly the consequence of the previous mocking and suffering which He had undergone, and partly because his will to die lessened the natural resistance of the frame to dissolution. Some seek for a "mysterious cause" of it, something out of the course of nature: but we must beware of such theories as would do away with the reality of the death, as a punishment inflicted by the hands of men. Joseph of Arimathea, a member of the council but a secret disciple of Jesus, came to Pilate to beg the body of Jesus, that he might bury it. Nicodemus assisted in this work of love, and they anointed the body and laid it in Joseph's new tomb (Matt. xxvii. 50-61; Mark xv. 37-47; Luke xxi. 40-46; John xix. 30-42).

Saturdy the 16th of Nisan (April 8th).—Love having done its part, hatred did its part also. The chief priests and Pharisees, with Pilate's permission, set a watch over the tomb, to lest his disciples come by night and steal Him away, and say unto the people He is risen from the dead" (Matt. xxvii. 62-66).

Sunday the 17th of Nisan (April 9th).—The Sabbath ended at six on the evening of Nisan 16th. Early the next morning the resurrection of Jesus took place. Although He had lain in the grave for about thirty-six or forty hours, yet those formed part of three days, and thus, by a mode of speaking not unusual to the Jews (Josephus frequently reckons years in this manner, the two extreme portions of a year reckoning as two years), the time of the dominion of death over Him is spoken of as three days. The order of the events that follow is somewhat difficult to harmonize; for each Evangelist selects the facts which belong to his purpose.® The exact hour of the resurrection is not mentioned by any of the Evangelists. But from Mark xvi. 2 and Matthew we infer that it was not long before the coming of the women; and from the time at which the guards went into the city to give the alarm the same inference arises (Matt. xxvii. 11). Of the great mystery itself, the resumption of life by Him who was truly dead, we see but little. There was a great earthquake, for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door of the tomb and sat upon it. His countenance was like lightning, and the ground was as white as snow: and for fear of him the keepers did snake, and became as dead men" (Matt.). The women, who had stood by the cross of Jesus, had prepared spices on the evening before, perhaps to complete the embalming of our Lord's body, already promised by Joseph of Arimathaea to Joseph and Mary Magdalene. They came very early on the first day of the week to the sepulchre. The names of the women are differently put by the several Evangelists, but with no real discrepancy. Matthew mentions the two Marys; Mark adds Salome to these two; Luke has the two Marys, Joanna, and others with them; and John mentions Mary Magdalene only. In thus citing such names as seemed good to him, each Evangelist was no doubt guided by some reason of his own. John, from the especial share which Mary Magdalene took in the testimony to the fact of the resurrection, mentions her only. The women discuss with one another who should roll away the stone, that they might do their pious office on the body. But when they arrive they find the stone rolled away, and Jesus no longer in the Sepulchre. He had risen from the dead. Mary Magdalene at this time, with haste; and just then learning that the body has been removed by men, tells Peter and John that the Lord has been taken away. The other women, however, go into the Sepulchre, and they see an angel (Matt., Mark), or two angels (Luke), in bright apparel, who declare to them that the Lord is risen, and will go before the disciples into Galilee. The two angels, mentioned by St. Luke, are probably two separate appearances to different members of the group: for he alone mentions an indefinite number of women. They now leave the sepulchre, and go in haste to make known the news to the Apostles. As they were going, "Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and held Him by the feet, and worshipped Him. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid; go tell My brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see Me." The eleven do not believe the account when they receive it. In the mean time Peter and John came to the Sepulchre. They ran, in their eagerness, and John arrived first and looked in; Peter afterwards came up, and it is characteristic that the awe which had prevented the other disciples from going in appears to have been unfeigned by Peter, who entered at once, and found the grave-clothes lying, but not Him who had worn them. This fact must have suggested that the removal was not the work of human hands. They then returned, wondering at what they had seen. Mary Magdalene, however, remained weeping at the tomb, and she too saw the two angels in the tomb, though Peter and John did not. They address her, and she answers, still, however, without any suspicion that the Lord is risen. As she turns away she sees Jesus, but in the tumult of her feelings does not even recognize Him at his first address. But He calls her by name, and then she joyfully recognizes her Master. He says, "Touch Me not, for I am not yet ascended to My Father: but go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father and your Father, and to My God and your God." The meaning of the prohibition to touch Him must be sought in the state of mind of Mary, since Thomas, for whom it was desirable as an evidence of the identity of Jesus, was permitted to touch Him. Hitherto she had not realized the mystery of the resurrection. She saw the Lord, and would have touched his hand or his garment in joy. Our Lord's answer means, "Death has now set a gulf between us. Touch not, as you once might have done, this body, which is now glorified by its conquest over death, for with this body I ascend to the Father" (so Euthymius, Theophylact, and others). Space has been wanting to discuss the difficulties of the discrepancy of this passage that attach to this part of the narrative. The remainder of the appearance presents less matter for dispute; in enumerating them the important passage in 1 Cor. xv. must be brought in. The third appearance of our Lord was to Peter (Luke, Paul); the fourth to the two disciples going to Emmaus in the evening (Mark, Luke); the fifth in the same evening to the eleven as they sat at meat (Mark, Luke, John). All of these occurred on the first day of the week, twenty-four hours after the resurrection. Exactly a week after, He appeared to the Apostles, and gave Thomas a convincing proof of His resurrection (John); this was the sixth appearance. The seventh was in Galilee, where seven of the Apostles were assembled, some of them probably about to return to their old trade of fishing (John). The eighth was to the eleven (Matt.), and probably to five hundred brethren assembled at a distance (Luke); the ninth was to James (Paul); and the last to the Apostles at Jerusalem just before the Ascension (Acts).

Whether this be the exact enumeration, whether a single appearance may have been quoted twice, or two distinct ones identified, it is clear that for forty days the Lord appeared to His disciples and to others at intervals. These disciples, according to the common testimony of all the Evangelists were by no means enthusiastic and prejudiced expectants of the resurrection. They were sober-minded men. They were only too slow to apprehend the nature of our Lord's kingdom. Almost to the last they shrunk from the notion of his suffering death, and thought that such a calamity would be the absolute termination of all their hopes. But from the time of the Ascension they went about preaching the truth that Jesus was risen from the dead. Kings could not alter their conviction on this point: the fear of death could not mingle them from proclaiming it (see Acts ii. 24, 32, iv. 8-13, iii., x., xiii.: 1 Cor. xv. 1: 1 Pet. i. 21). Against this event no real objection has ever been brought, except that it is a miracle. So far as historical testimony goes, nothing is better established.

In giving his disciples their final commission, the Lord said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." (Matt. xxviii. 18-20). The living energy of Christ is ever present with his Church, even though He has withdrawn from it his bodily presence. And the facts of the life that has been before us are the substance of the apostolic teaching now as in all ages. That God and man were reconciled by the mission of the Redeemer into the world, and by his self-devotion to death (2 Cor. v. 18; 1 P.h. i. 10; Col. i. 20), that this sacrifice has prepared for man the restoration of the divine love (Rom. v. 8, viii. 32; 1 John iv. 9): that we by his incarnation become the child-of God, knit to Hlin in bonds of love, instead of slaves under the bondage of the law (Rom. viii. 15, 29; Gal. iv. 1); these are the common ideas of the apostolic teaching. Brought into such a relation to Christ and his life, we see in all its acts and stages something that belongs to and instructs us. His birth, his baptism, temptation, lowliness of life and mind, his sufferings, death, burial, resurrection, and ascension, all enter into the apostolic preaching, as furnishing motives, examples, and analogies for our use. Hence every Christian should study well this sinless life, not in human commentaries only, still less in a bare abstract like the present, but in the living pages of inspiration. Every one who has studied the study with the heart, he might hope, with God’s grace, that the conviction would break in upon him that did upon the Centurion at the cross — “ Truly this is the Son of God.”

CHRONOLOGY.—Year of the Birth of Christ.—It is certain that our Lord was born before the death of Herod the Great. Herod died, according to Josephus (Ant. xvi. 8, § 1), having reigned thirty-four years from the time that he had rescued Antigonus to be slain; but thirty-seven years from the time that he had been declared king by the Romans ("see also B. J. i. 33, § 8"). His appointment as king, according to the same writer (Ant. xiv. 14, § 3), coincides with the 184th Olympiad, and the consulship of C. Domitius Calvisius and C. Asinius Pollio. It appears that he was made king by the joint influence of Antony and Octavius; and the reconciliation of these two men took place on the death of Fulvia in the year 714. Again, the death of Antigonus and the siege of Jerusalem, which form the basis of calculation for the thirty-four years, coincide (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 16, § 4) with the consulship of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and L. Caminius Gallus, that is with the year of House 717; and occurred in the month Sivan (=June or July). From these facts we are justified in placing the death of Herod in A. u. C. 750. Those who place it one year later overlook the mode in which Josephus reconciles Jewish reigns. Wieseler shows by several passages that he reckons the year from the month Nisan to Nisan, and that he counts the fragment of a year at either extreme as one complete year. In this mode, thirty-four years, from June or July 717, would apply to any date between 750 and 751, but not to Nisan 751. And thirty-seven years from 714 would apply likewise to any date within the same termtini. Wieseler finds facts confirmatory of this in the dates of the reigns of Herod Antipas and Archelaus (see his Chronologische Synopse, p. 55). Between these two dates Josephus furnishes means for a more exact determination. Just after Herod’s death the Passover occurred (Nisan 15th), and upon the fourth years from Archelaus that he had kept seven days mourning to be kept for him (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 9, § 37. vii. 8, § 4): so that it would appear that Herod died somewhat more than seven days before the Passover in 750, and therefore in the first few days of the month Nisan A. u. C. 750. Now, if Jesus was born before the death of Herod, it follows that the Dionysian era, which corresponds to A. u. C. 754, is at least four years too late.

Many have thought that the star seen by the wise men gives grounds for an exact calculation of the time of our Lord’s birth. It will be found however, that this is not the case. For it has first been assumed that the star was not properly a star, but an astronomical conjunction of known stars. Kepler finds a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the sign of Pisces in A. u. C. 747, and again in the spring of the next year, with the planet Mars added; and from this he would place the birth of Jesus in 747. But, whether this be so or not, the kind of explanation places it in A. u. C. 747. But this process only proves a highly improbable date, on highly improbable evidence. The words of St. Matthew are extremely hard to reconcile with the notion of a conjunction of planets: it was a star that appeared, and it gave the Magi ocular proof of its purpose by guiding them to where the young child was. But a new light has been thrown on the subject by the Rev. C. Fritschard, who has made the calculations afores. Ideler (Handbuch d. Chronologie) asserts that there were three conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn in B. c. 7, and that in the third they approached so near that, “to a person with weak eyes, the one planet would almost seem to come within the range of the dispersed light of the other, so that both might appear as one star.” It is clear that this method must be rejected; but in November 12 in that year the planets were so close that “an ordinary eye would regard them as one star of surpassing brightness” (Greek Test. in loc.). Mr. Fritschard finds, and his calculations have been verified and confirmed at Greenwich, that this conjunction occurred not on November 12 but early on December 3; and that even with Ideler’s somewhat strange postulate of an observer with weak eyes, the planets could never have appeared as one star, for they never approached each other within double the apparent diameter of the moon (Memoires R. Aastr. Soc. vol. xxv. [Star in the East]). Most of the chronologists find an element of calculation in the order of Herod to destroy all the children “from two years old and under” (and dieuos kai katathipsera, Matt. ii. 16). But the age within which he destroyed, would be measured rather by the extent of his fears than by the accuracy of the calculation of the Magi. Gesenius has labored to show that, from the inclusive mode of computing years, mentioned above in this article, the phrase of the Evangelist would apply to all children just turned one year old, which is true; but he assumes that it would not apply to any that were older, say to those aged a year and eleven months. Herod was a cruel man, angry, and jealous, it is vain to assume that he adjusted the limit of his cruelties with the nicest accuracy. As a basis of calculation the visit of the Magi, though very important to us in other respects, must be dismissed (but see Gesenius, Dissertations etc., Diss. 18th; Wieseler, Chron. Syn. p. 57 ff., with all the references there).

The census taken by Augustus Cæsar, which led to the journey of Mary from Nazareth just before the birth of the Lord, has also been looked on as an important note of time, in reference to the chronology of the life of Jesus. Several difficulties have to be disposed of in considering it. (i.) It is argued that there is no record in other histories of a census of the whole Roman empire in the time of Augustus. (ii.) Such a census, if held during the reign of Herod the Great, would not have included Judæa, for it was not yet a Roman province. (iii.) The Roman mode of taking such a census was with reference to actual residence, so that it would not have been requisite for Joseph to go to Bethlehem. (iv.) The state of Mary at the time would render such a journey less probable.
St. Lake himself seems to say that this census was not actually taken until ten years later (ii. 2). To these objections, of which it need not be said Strauss has made the worst, answers may be given in detail, though scarcely in this place with the proper completeness. (i.) "As we know of the lege actionis and their abrogation, which were quite as important in respect to the early period of Roman history, as the census of the empire was in respect to a later period, not from the historical works of Livy, Dionysius, or Polybius, but from a legal work, the Institutes of Gaius; so we should think it strange if the works of Paulinus and Ulpian De,jus, the first of which was believed to have been published rather than not to have been. Nor mention were made in them of the census of Augustus; while it would not surprise us that in the ordinary histories of the time it should be passed over in silence" (Hinske in Wieseler, p. 78).

"If Suetonius in his life of Augustus does not mention this census, neither does Spartian in his Life of Hadrian devote a single syllable to the edictum personae which, in later times, has chiefly absorbed the name of the emperor, for the simple reason, that it seems that the argumentum de beneficiato is very far from conclusive. The effect possibly affected only the provinces, and in them was not carried out at once; and in that case it would attract less attention at any one particular moment.

In the time of Augustus all the procurators of the empire were brought under his sole control and supervision for the first time (T. C. 731 (Dion. Cass. lii. 32). This movement towards centralization renders it not improbable that a general census of the empire should be ordered, although it may not have been carried into effect suddenly, nor intended to be so. But proceedings in the way of an estimate of the empire, if not an actual census, are distinctly recorded to have taken place in the time of Augustus. "Haec addendae sunt mensurae, limitum et terminorum ex Heriss Augusti et Neronis Caesarum: sed et fallsi mensuris, qui temporibus Augusti omnium provinciarum et civitatum formam et mensuras comperitas in commentarios retulit et lege agraria per universitatem provinciarum distinctius et declaravit" (Frontinus, in the Res Agrae, Acc. of Gears, p. 102; quoted by Wieseler). This is confirmed from other sources (Wieseler, pp. 81, 82). Augustus directed, as we learn from the inscription, that a census be made, in which, according to Tacitus, "ops publice continentur: quantum civium sociorumque in armis, quos classes, regna, provinciae, tributa muta vectigalia et necessitates nec derogationes" (Tacit. Ann. i. 11; Sueton. Aug. 28, 101; Dion. Cass. lii. 30, 31, 33, given in Wieseler; see also Ritschel, in Reini. Hist. für Philos. New Series, i. 481).

All this makes a census by order of Augustus in the highest degree probable, apart from St. Lake's estimate. The time of our Lord's birth was most remote. Except some troubles in Decia, the Roman world was at peace, and Augustus was in the full enjoyment of his power. But there are persons who, though they would at once believe this fact on the testimony of some inferior historian, added to these confirmatory facts, reject it just because on Evangelist has said it (ii. 1 and 2). Next comes the objection, that, as Judaea was not yet a Roman province, such a census would not have included that country, and that it was not taken from the residence of each person, but from the place of his origin. It is very probable that the mode of taking the census would afford a clew to the origin of it. Augustus was willing to include in his census all the tributary kingdoms, for the region are mentioned in the passage in Tacitus; but this could scarcely be enforced. Perhaps Herod, desiring to gratify the emperor, said in his love for this kind of information, was ready to undertake the census for Judaea, but in order that it might appear to be his rather than the emperor's, he took it in the Jewish manner rather than in the Roman, in the place whence the family sprang, rather than in that of actual residence. There might be some hardship in this, and we might wonder that a woman about to become a mother should be compelled to leave her home for such a purpose, if we were sure that it was not voluntary. A Jew of the house and lineage of David would not willingly forgo that position, and if it were necessary to assert it by going to the city of David, he would probably make some sacrifice to do so. Thus the objection (iv.), on the ground of the state of Mary's health, is entitled to little consideration. It is said, indeed, that "all went to be taxed, every one to his own city" (Luke ii. 1). But this was the decree prescribed that they should. Nor could there be any means of enforcing such a regulation. But the principle being adopted, that Jews were to be taxed in the places to which their families belonged, St. Luke tells us by these words that as a matter of fact it was generally followed. (v.) The objection that, according to St. Luke's own admission, the census was not taken now, but when Quirinus was governor of Syria, remains to be disposed of. St. Luke makes two statements, that at the time of our Lord's birth ("in those days") there was a decree for a census, and that this taxing first came about, or took effect (πραγματευομενος), when Cyrenius, or Quirinus, was governor of Syria (Luke ii. 1, 2). And as the two statements are quite distinct, and the very form of expression calls special attention to some remarkable circumstance about this census, no historical inaccuracy is proved, unless the statements are shown to be contradictory, or one or other of them to be untrue. That Strauss makes such a charge without establishing either of these grounds, is worthy of a writer so dishonest (Luke 1., iv. 32). Now, without going into all the theories that have been proposed to explain this second verse, there is no doubt that the word "first" in Luke ii. 1 was not used by the Evangelist in a chronological manner, without violence to the sense or contradiction. Herod undertakes the census according to Jewish forms; but his death the same year puts an end to it, and no more is heard of it: but for its influence as to the place of our Lord's birth it would not have been recorded at all. But the Evangelist knows that, as soon as a census (αυτον) is mentioned, persons conversant with Jewish history will think at once of the census taken after the beginning of Archelaus, about ten years later, which was avowedly a Roman census, and which is said at first some resistance in consequence (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 1). The second verse therefore means — "No census was actually completed then, and I know that the first Roman census which was taken in his own name was after the banishment of Archelaus; but the decree went out much earlier, in the time of Herod." That this is the only possible explanation of so vexed a passage cannot of course be affirmed. But it will bear this inter-pertation, and upon the whole evidence there is no ground whatever for denying either assertion of the Evangelist, or for considering them irreconcilable.
Many writers have confounded an obscurity with a proved inaccuracy. The value of this census, as a fact in the chronology of the life of Christ, depends on the connection which is sought to be established between it and the insurrection which broke out under Matthias and Judas, the son of Sariaphus, in the last illness of Herod (Josephus, Ant. xvi. § 3, 8).
If the insurrection arose out of the census, a point of connection between the sacred history and that of Josephus is made out. Such a connection, however, has not been clearly made out (see Wes-ke, Olshausen, and others, for the grounds on which it is supposed to rest).

The age of Jesus at his baptism (Luke iii. 22) affords an element of calculation. "And Jesus Himself began to be about (δόξα) thirty years of age." Born in the beginning of A. u. c. 730 (or the end of 749), Jesus would be thirty in the beginning of A. u. c. 780 (A. d. 27). Greswell is probably right in placing the baptism of our Lord in the beginning of this year, and the first Passover during his ministry would be that of the same year: Wieseler places the baptism later, in the spring or summer of the same year. (In the sense of ἀνακάλυψις, see the commentators.)
To this first Passover after the baptism attaches a note of time which will confirm the calculations already made. "Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this Temple in building (ἔδρασαν ἡ ἡγεμονία), and wilt Thou rear it up in three days?" There can be no doubt that this refers to the rebuilding of the Temple by Herod: it cannot mean the second Temple, built after the Captivity, for this was finished in twenty years (n. c. 525 to n. c. 515).
Herod, in the eighteenth year of his reign (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 11, § 11, begun to reconstruc the Temple on a larger and more splendid scale (A. u. c. 734).
The work was not finished till long after his death, till A. u. c. 818. It is inferred from Josephus (Ant. xvii. §§ 5, 6) that it was begun in the month Z a n i, A. u. c. 794. And if the Passover and the Passover feasts are made out of the year (A. u. c.
788), then forty-five years and some months have eclapsed, which, according to the Jewish mode of reckoning (p. 1381), would be spoken of as "forty and six years." Thus the death of Herod enables us to fix a boundary on one side to the calculations of our Lord's birth. The building of the Temple, for forty-six years, confirms this, and also gives a boundary on the other. From the star of the Magnaster thing conclusive can be gathered, nor from the census of Augustus. One datum remains: the commencement of the preaching of John the Baptist is connected with the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar (Luke iii. 1). The rule of Ti-berius may be calculated either from the beginning of his sole reign, after the death of Augustus, A.
t. c. 767, or from his joint government with Augustus, B. c. from the beginning of A. u. c. 785.
In the latter case the fifteenth year would correspond with A. u. c. 779, which goes to confirm the rest of the calculations relied on in this article.

An endeavor has been made to deduce the time of the year of the birth of Jesus from the fact that Zacharias was "a priest of the course of Abia" (L uke i. 5).
The twenty-four courses of priests served in the Temple according to a regular weekly cycle, the order of which is known. The date of the conception of John would be about fifteen months before the birth of our Lord, and if the date of the latter be A. u. c. 750, then the former would fall in A. u. c. 748. Can it be ascertained in what part of the year 748 the course of Abia would be on duty in the Temple? The Talmud preserves a tradition that the Temple was destroyed by Titus, A. d. 70, on the ninth day of the month Ab. Josephus mentions the date as the 10th of Ab (B. J. vi. 4, §§ 5, 8). Without attempting to follow the steps by which these are reconciled, it seems that the "course" of Jehoiarib had just entered upon its weekly duty at the time the Temple was destroyed. Wieseler, assuming that the day in question would be the same as the 5th of August, A. u. c. 823, reckons back the weekly courses to A. u. c. 748, the course of Jehoiarib being the first of all (1 Chr. xxiv. 7). "It follows," he says, "that the minister of the first course of Abi, 74 years 10 months and 2 days, or (reckoning 19 intercalary years) 27,335 days earlier (=1 92 hieratic circles and 119 days earlier), fell between the 3rd and 9th of October, A. u. c. 748.
Reckoning from the 10th of October, on which Zacharias might reach his house, and allowing five months or the pregnancy of Elizabeth, to which six months are to be added (Luke i. 29),
we have in the whole one year and three months, which gives the 10th of January as the date of Christ's birth." Greswell, however, from the same starting-point, arrives at the date April 5th; and when two writers so laborious can thus differ in their conclusions, we must rather suspect the soundness of their method than their accuracy in the use of it.

Similar differences will be found amongst eminent writers in every part of the chronology of the Gos-pers. For example, the birth of our Lord is placed in n. c. 1 by Pearson and Hug; n. c. 2 by Scaliger;
n. c. 3 by Baronius, Calvinus, Sinckind, and Paulus;
n. c. 4 by Lamk, Bengel, Anger, Wieseler, and Greswell; n. c. 5 by Ushe and Petavius; n. c. 7 by Ideker and Sandemane. And whilst the calculations given above seem sufficient to determine us, with Ushe, Usber, Petavius, Bengel, Wieseler, and Greswell, to the close of n. c. 5, or early part of n. c. 4, let it never be forgotten that there is a distinction between these researches, which the Holy Spirit has left obscure and doubtful, and "the weightier matters" of the Gospel, the things which directly pertain to man's salvation. The silence of the inspired writers, and sometimes the obscurity of their allusions to matters of time and place, have given rise to dispute. But their words admit of no doubt when they tell us that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, and that

Quirinus (Ant. xviii. 1, § 1) mentions that Quirinus was sent, after the banishment of Archelaus, to take a census. Either Quinzio would set this authority aside, or would hold that Quirinus, twice governor, twice made a census; which is scarcely an easier hypothosis than no others. [In addition to Criner universal sympathies. Solon, Socrates, and Plato were Greeks, and can only be fully appreciated as types of the Greek character. Christ is the life of men, who "draws all men" to him, because he is the universal, absolute man, elevated above the limitations of race and nationality and the prejudices of any particular age. He had the purest humanity, free from the demoniacal adulteration of sin. He is the most intensely human. Never man felt, spoke, acted, suffered, died so humanly, and so as to appeal to the universal sympathies and the universality of all men without distinction of race, generation, and condition of society. It was an approach to this idea of an universal humanity when the Jewish philosopher Philo, a contemporary of Christ, called the Logos, the eternal Word. Δλόθις άνθρωπος. As sin and death proceeded from the first Adam who was of the earth earthly, so righteousness and life proceed from the second Adam who is from heaven heavenly.

The perfect humanity of Christ has been the subject of peculiar interest and earnest investigation in the present age, and a deeper insight into it is perhaps the most substantial modern contribution to Christology, which is the very heart of the Christian system.

(1.) The singular perfection of Christ's character viewed as a man, according to the record of the Gospels and the more significant of the Acts.

The human side of Christ is expressed by the designation the Son of Man (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου), which applies to himself about eighty times in the Gospels, is probably derived from Dan. vii. 13, where it signifies the Messiah, as the head of a universal and eternal kingdom, and from the ideal representation of man as the divine image and head of creation in Ps. viii. In the Syriac, the Saviour's native dialect, bar našo, the son of man, is man generically; the full part of the compound denotes the identity and likeness. The Syriac bar našo is the Hebrew bar našo, the identity and imitation of God the Son of God is that of the Son of Man, the Son of man, the representative of all men to God the Father. It is the only person who is head of all men. From his resurrection to his ascension he was the head of humanity, the perfect man, the Son of man, the Son of God, and Lord of lords, and King of kings, and able to command the host of heaven and the angels; and could not command the host of holy angels to destroy that wicked hands crucified and slew him, and that we and all men must own him as the Lord and Redeemer.

SOURCES. — The bibliography of the subject of the Life of Jesus has been most fully set out in Hase, Leben Jesu, Leipzig, 1854, 4th edition. It would be vain to attempt to rival that enormous catalogue. The principal works employed in the present article are the four Gospels, and the best-known commentaries on them, including those of Beza, Wetstein, Lightfoot, De Wette, Lichte, Oehler, Stricker, Alford, Williams, and others; Neander, Leben Jesu (Hamburg, 1837 [5th Aufl. 1852, Eng. transl. by M'Culloch and Blumenthal, New York, 1848]), as against Strauss, Leben Jesu (Tübingen, 1853), also consulted; Stackhouse's History of the Bible; Ewald, Geschichte des Volks Israel, vol. v. x. (Stuttgart, 1857 [3d Ausg. 1867?]); Bammert, Geschichte Jesu (Brunswick, 1859); Krummacher, Die Lebenschristus (Riedel, 1854). Upon the harmony of the Gospels, see the list of works given under Gospel. The principal works used for the present article have been, Wieseler, Chronologische Synopsen, etc., Hamburg, 1843; Griswold's Harmony, Propositions, and Dissertations, Oxford, v. y.; two papers by Dr. Robinson in the Biblical Sac. for 1845; and his th. Tantale Sympo. ('Havinit, 1852). Special works on the Parables and on the Miracles, have also been consulted; and detached monographs, sermons, and essays in periodicals. For the text of the Gospels, the 7th edition of Tischendorf's Greek Test. has been employed.

W. T. * Moral Character of Jesus. — According to the unerring teaching of the Apostles, and the faith of the universal Christendom, Jesus was a divine-human person, the God-Man (θεομαν), and hence the Mediator between God and man and the Saviour of the race. The idea and aim of religion, as union and communion of man with God, was fully actualized in Christ, and can be actualized in us only in proportion as we become united to Him. The Synoptic Gospels represent Him predominantly as the divine man, the Gospel of John as the incarnate (ἐνθροισθεν, John v. 36), both is the God-Man. The human side of Christ is expressed by the designation the Son of Man (ὁ υιὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου) — mark the article, the divine side by the term the Son of God (ὁ υιὸς τοῦ θεοῦ), also with the definite article, to distinguish Him as the eternal, only begotten Son from ordinary υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ whose adoption is derived from his absolute Sonship. The term ὁ υιὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, which is applied to Him himself about eighty times in the Gospels, is probably derived from Dan. vii. 13, where it signifies the Messiah, as the head of a universal and eternal kingdom, and from the ideal representation of man as the divine image and head of creation in Ps. viii. In the Syriac, the Saviour's native dialect, bar našo, the son of man, is man generically; the full part of the compound denotes the identity and likeness of man. The Syriac bar našo is the Hebrew bar našo, the identity and imitation of God the Son of God is that of the Son of Man, the Son of man, the representative of all men to God the Father. It is the only person who is head of all men. From his resurrection to his ascension he was the head of humanity, the perfect man, the Son of man, the Son of God, and Lord of lords, and King of kings, and able to command the host of heaven and the angels; and could not command the host of holy angels to destroy as itself the greatest moral, miracle, or monstrosity rather, that can be imagined.

(2) Perfect holiness. The positive side of sinlessness. It consists in the beautiful harmony and symmetry of all virtues and graces. Christ's life was one continued act of love or self-consecration to God and to man. "It was absolute love to God in purest humanity." The opposite and to us apparently contradictory virtues were found in him in equal proportion. He was free from all onesidedness, which constitutes the weakness as well as the strength of the greatest moral forces. The moral forces were so well tempered and moderated by each other that none was unduly prominent, none carried to excess, none alloyed by the kindred failing. Each was checked and completed by the opposite grace. He combined innocence with strength, love with earnestness, humility with dignity, wisdom with courage, devotion to God with interest in man. He was justly compared to the lamb and the lion. His dignity was free from pride, his self-denial free from narrowness; his zeal never degenerated into passion, nor his constancy into obstinacy, nor his benevolence into weakness, nor his tenderness into sentimentality; he was equally removed from the excesses of the legalist, the pietist, the mystic, the ascetic, and the enthusiasm. His character from tender childhood to ripe manhood was one of purity and innocence in unbroken communion with God, overflowing with the purest love to men, free from every sin and error, exhibiting in doctrine and example the ideal of virtue, scaling the purest life with the sublimest death, and ever acknowledged since as the perfect model of goodness for universal imitation. All human greatness loses on closer inspection; but Christ's character grows more pure, sacred, and lovely, the better we know him. The whole range of history and fiction furnishes no parallel to it. His person is the great miracle of which his works are only the natural manifestations.

Such a perfect man in the midst of universal imperfection and sinfulness can only be understood on the ground of the godhead dwelling in him. The perfection of his humanity is the proof of his divine nature. Other theories, the theory of enthusiasm and self-deception, the theory of imposture, and the theory of mythical or legendary fiction, explain nothing, but substitute an unnatural monstrosity for a supernatural miracle. Only a Jesus could have invented a Jesus. Even Renan must admit that "whatever be the surprises of the future, Jesus will never be surpassed; his worship will grow young without ceasing; his legend (?) will call forth tears without end; his sufferings will melt the noblest hearts; all ages will proclaim that, among the sons of men, there is none born greater than Jesus." But this and similar admissions of modern infidels refute their own hypothesis, and have no meaning unless we admit the truth of Christ's testimony concerning his unity with the Father and his extraordinary claims which in the mouth of every other with this blaspheous or madness, while burning his lips they excite no surprise, nor appear as natural and easy as the rays of the shining sun. The church of all ages and denominations in response to these claims worships and adores, exclaiming with Thomas: "My Lord and my God!" This is the testimony of the soul left to its deepest instincts and noblest aspirations, the soul which was originally made for Christ and finds in Him the solution of all moral problems, the satisfaction of all its wants, the unfailing fountain of everlasting life and peace.

JESUS CHRIST

JESUS CHRIST 1385

The first formal description of the personal appearance of Christ, which, though not authentic and certainly not older than the fourth century, exerted great influence on the pictorial representations, is ascribed to the heathen Publius Lentinus, a supposed contemporary of Pilate and Proconsul of Judea, in an apocryphal Latin letter to the Roman Senate which was first discovered in a MS. copy of the writings of Aeschn of Canterbury, and is as follows:—

"In this time appeared a man, who lives till now, a man endowed with great powers. Men call Him a great prophet; his own disciples term Him the Son of God. His name is Jesus Christ. He restores the dead to life, and cures all manner of diseases. This man is of noble and well-proportioned stature, with a face full of kindness and yet firmness, so that the beholders both love Him and fear Him. His hair is the color of wine, and golden at the root; straight, and without luster, but from the level of the ears curling and glossy, and divided down the centre after the fashion of the Nazarenes. His forehead is even and smooth his face without blushing, and enhanced by a tempered bloom. His countenance ingenious and kind. Nose and mouth are in no way faulty. His beard is full, of the same color as his hair, and forked in form; his eyes blue, and extremely brilliant. In reproof and rebuke he is formidable; in exhortation and teaching, gentle and amiable of tongue. None have seen Him to laugh; but many, on the contrary, to weep. His person is tall; his hands beautiful and straight. In speaking He is deliberate and grave, and little given to loquacity. In beauty surpassing—most men. Another description is found in the works of the Greek theologian John of Damascus in the 8th century. It ascribes to Christ a stately person, beautiful eyes, curly hair, "black beard, yellow complexion and long fingers, like his mother."

On the ground of these descriptions and of the Abgar and the Veronica legends, arose a vast number of pictures of Christ which are divided into two classes: the "Selectio pictures, with the expression of calm serenity and dignity, without the faintest mark of grief, and the Free Homo pictures of the suffering Savior with the crown of thorns. But "no figure of Chr., in color, or bronze, or marble, can reach the ideal of perfect beauty which came forth into actual reality in the Son of God and Son of Man. The highest-creations of art are here but feeble reflections of the original in heaven; yet prove the mighty influence which the living Christ continually exerts even upon the imagination and sentiment of the great painters and sculptors, and which He exert to the end of the world."

JETHRO

P. S.

JETHOR (יְהֶתְרוֹ) [string, cord, and abundance, residuce]. 1. (תֵּיתְרוֹ: Jethro). Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, is so called in Ex. iv. 18 and the margin of A. V.; though in the Heb.-Sum. text and Sum. version the reading is יְהֵתְרָו, as in the Syriac and Targ.-Jon., one of Kennicott's MSS., and a MS. of Targ. Onk., No. 16 in De Rémusat's collection.

2. (תֵּיתְרוֹ: Jethro). The firstborn of Gideon's seventy sons, who were all, with the exception of Jotham, the youngest, slain at Ophrah by Abimelech. At the time of his father's victorious pursuit of the Midianites and capture of their kings he was still a lad on his first battle-field, and feared to draw his sword at Gideon's bidding, and avenge, as the representative of the family, the slaughter of his kinmen at Tabor (Judg. viii. 20).

3. (תֵּיתְרוֹ: Jethro) in 1 K. ii. 5, 32; (תֵּיתְרוֹ: Jethro) in 1 Chr. ii. 17; the Alex. MS. has תֵּיתְרוֹ in all the passages: Jethor. The father of Amasa, captain-general of Abshalom's army. Jethor is merely another form of Ethan (2 Sam. xvii. 25), the latter being possibly a corruption. He is described in 1 Chr. ii. 17 as Ethan the Ezrahite, which again is more likely to be correct than the "Israhelie" of the Heb. in 2 Sam. xvii., or the "Jezreelite" of the LXX. and Vulg. in the same passage. "Israhelie" is said by the author of the Quest. Hebr. in 1b. Reg. to have been the reading of the Hebrew, but there is no evidence of it in the old MSS. One MS. of Chronicles reads "Israilie," as does the Targum, which adds that he was called Jethor the Israhelie, "because he girt his loins with the sword, to help David with the Arabs, when Abner sought to drive away David and all the race of Jesse, who were not pure to enter the congregation of Jehovah on account of Ruth the Moabitess." According to Jarchi, Jethor was an Ezrahite, dwelling in the land of Israel, and theeis acquired his surname, like the house of Obadiah the Gittlete. Josephus calls him תֵּיתְרוֹ (Ant. vii. 10, § 1). He married Abigail, David's sister, probably during the sojourn of the family of Jesse in the land of Moab, under the protection of its king.

4. The son of Jada, a descendant of Hezon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 32). He died without children, and being the eldest son the succession fell to his brother's family.

5. The son of Ezra, whose name occurs in a disputed passage in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. v. 17). In the LXX the name is repeated, "and Jethor begat Miriam," etc. By the author of the Quest. Hebr. in Par. he is said to have been Aaron, Ezra being another name for Aaron.

6. (תֵּיתְרוֹ: Alex. תֵּיתְרוֹ). The chief of a family of warriors of the line of Asher, and father of Jehu (1 Chr. vii. 38). He is probably the same as Ishram in the preceding verse. One of Konmott's MSS. and the Alex. had Jethor in both cases.

JETHITH (יֵיתִית) [pin, nail, Sim.]: תֵּיתְרוֹ [pin, nail, Sim.;]: תֵּיתְרוֹ [pin, nail, Sim.;]. Jetheth, one of the phylarchs (A. V. "dukes") of the name of Esaun (Gen. xxvii. 40; 1 Chr. i. 54), enumerated separately from the genealogy of Esau's children in the earlier part of the chapter, "according to their families, after their places, by their names," and "according to their habitations in the land of their possession" (vv. 40-44). This record of the Edomite phylarchs may point specially to the places and habitations, or towns, named after, or occupied by them; and even otherwise, we may look for some trace of their names, after the custom of the wandering tribes to leave such footprints in the changeless desert. Identifications of several in the list have been proposed: Jetheth, as far as the writer knows, has not been yet recovered. He may, however, be probably found if we adopt the likely suggestion of Simonis, יֵיתִית = יֵיתִית, "a nail," "a tent-pin," etc. (and metaphorically "a prince," etc., as being stable, firm) = Arab. یَتُتُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُثُתُثُתُתُتُتُ." (n. of unity of the former), is a place in Nejd, said to be in the Dahnah (see ISHRAB): there is also a place called EL-Wedid, and EL-Wedidat (perhaps pl. of the first-named), which is the name of mountains belonging to Benez 'Abd-Allah Ibn Gatitain (Muirhead, s. v.).

E. S. F.

JETHIAH (יֵיתִיה) i. e. Jehihah [high, exalted; Gez.; hill-place, Frst.]: סאלאד: [Yat. סאלאד]: Alex. [Adb. Comp.] יֵיתִיהוֹ: Jetheda, one of the cities of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xiv. 42), named with Abdon and Thimmothah. In the Onomasticon it is mentioned, without any description or indication of position, as Jetheda. It has not since been met with, even by the indefatigable Toher in his late Wandering in that district.

JETHRO (יֵיתִרוֹ), i. e. Jithro [preeminence, superiority]: תֵּיתְרוֹ: Jethro], called also Jethor and Hobah; the son of Reuel, was priest or prince of Midian, both offices probably being combined in one person. Moses spent the forty years of his exile from Egypt with him, and married his daughter Zipporah. By the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed deputies to judge the congregation and share the burden of government with himself (Ex. xviii.). On account of his local knowledge he was entrusted with the mission with the Israelites throughout their journey to Canaan; his room, however, was supplied by the ark of the covenant, which supernaturally indicated the places for encamping (Num. x 31, 33). The idea conveyed by the name of Jethro or Jethor is probably that of excellence, and as Hobah may mean beloved, it is quite possible that both appellations were given to the same person for similar reasons. That the custom of having more than one name was common among Closes, hospitality, and, the wanderer, on the relation of his children that he had watered their flock, is a picture of eastern manners no less true than lovely.

We may perhaps suppose that Jethro, before his acquaintance with Moses, was not a worshipper of the true God. Traces of this appear in the delay which Moses had suffered to take place with respect to the circumcision of his son (Ex. iv. 24-26): indeed it is even possible that Zipporah had afterwards been subjected to a kind of divorce (Ex. xviii. 2, "בֵּיתֵיהּ 3 לִ֭יְבָּם"), on account of her attachment to an alien creed, but that growing convictions were at work in the mind of Jethro, from the circumstance of Israel's continued prosperity, till at last, acting upon these, he brought back his daughter, and declared that his impressions were confirmed, for "now he knew that the Lord was greater than all gods, for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly, he was above them:" consequently we are told that "Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, took a burnt-offering and sacrifices for God: and Aaron came and all the elders of Israel to eat bread with Moses' father-in-law before God:" as though to celebrate the event of his conversion. Whether or not the account given at Num. x. 29-32 refers to this same event, the narrative at Ex. xviii. 27, coincides with Hobah's own words at Num. x. 39: and, comparing the two, we may suppose that Moses did not prevail upon his father-in-law to stay with the congregation. Calvin (in 5 lib. Mosis Comment.) understands vv. 31, 32 thus: "Thou last gone with us hitherto, and hast been to us instead of eyes, and now what profit is it to thee if, having suffered so many troubles and difficulties, thou dost not go on with us to inherit the promised blessing?" And Mat. Henry imagines that Hobah complied with this invitation, and that traces of the settlement of his posterity in the land of Canaan are apparent at Judg. i. 16 and 1 Sam. xv. 6. Some, and among them Calvin, take Jethro and Hobal to be identical, and call Hobal the brother-in-law of Moses. The present punctuation of our Bibles does not warrant this. Why, at Judg. i. 16, Moses' father-in-law is called אָבִּי (Kenite, comp. Gen. xv. 19), or why, at Num. xii. 1, Zipporah, if it be Zipporah, is called אָבִי אֲבָרָך. A. V. Ethiopian, is not clear.

The Mohammedan name of Jethro is Sheelah (Koran, 7, 11). There is a tale in the Midrash that Jethro was a counsellor of Pharaoh, who tried to dissuade him from slaughtering the Israelite children, and consequently, on account of his enemies, was forced to flee into Midian, but was rewarded by becoming the father-in-law of Moses (see Weis' Biblical Legends, p. 93, note). Son of Esau, by Abidahamah, the father of Anah, the son of Zibeon the Hivite (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. i. 35). It appears from Gen. xxxvi. 20-25, that Anah is a man's name (not a woman's, as might be thought from ver. 2), and by comparison with ver. 2, that the Hittites were Hivites. Jeshua was one of the Edomites, dukes (ver. 18). The Cethith has repeatedly יֵעָש, Jeshua.

This name was properly applied to a member of the kingdom of Judah after the separation of the ten tribes. In this sense it occurs twice in the second book of Kings, 2 K. xxi. 6, xxv. 25, and seven times in the later chapters of Jeremiah: Jer. xxxii. 12, xxxix. 9 (in connection with Hebrew), xxxviii. 19, xl. 12, xli. 3, xlvii. 1, lii. 28. After the return the word received a larger application. Partly from the predominance of the members of the old kingdom of Judah among those who returned to Palestine, partly from the identification of Judah with the religious ideas and hopes of the people, all the members of the new state were called Jews (Judaeans), and the name was extended to the remnant of the race scattered JEW (יוודא: יודא), JEWS (יוודאים: יوذאים), in Ezra and Dan. Originally "man, or men of Judah." The term first makes its appearance just before the Captivity of the ten tribes, and then is used to denote the men of Judah who held Elath, and were driven out by Rezin king of Syria (2 K. xvi. 6). Elath had been taken by Azariah or Uzziah, and made a colony of Judah (2 K. xiv. 22). The men of Judah in prison with Jeremiah (Jer. xxii. 12) are called "Jews" in our A. V., as those who deserted to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxviii. 19), and the fragments of the tribe which were dispersed in Moab, Edom, and among the Ammonites (Jer. xi. 3). Of these latter were the confederates of Ishmael the son of Nathaniah, who were of the blood-royal of Judah (Jer. xii. 3). The fugitives in Egypt (Jer. xxiv. 1) belonged to the two tribes, and were distinguished by the name of the more important; and the same general term is applied to those who were carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. ii. 28, 30) as well as to the remnant which was left in the land (2 K. xxv. 25; Neh. i. 2, 16, &c.). That the term Yehudah or "Jew" was in the latter history used of the members of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin without distinction is evident from the case of Mordecai, who, though of the tribe of Benjamin, is called a Jew (Esth. ii. 5, &c.), while the people of the Captivity are called the people of Mordecai! (Esth. iii. 6). After the Captivity the appellation was universally given to those who returned from Babylon.

JEWEL. [Precious Stones.]

JEWESS (יוודא: יודא), a woman of Hebrew birth, without distinction of tribe (Acts xvi. 1, xiv. 24). It is applied in the former passage to Eunice the mother of Timothy, who was unquestionably of Hebrew origin (comp. 2 Tim. iii. 15), and in the latter to Drusilla, the wife of Felix and daughter of Herod Agrippa I.

JEWISH (יוודא: יודא), of or belonging to Jews; an epithet applied to the rabbinical legends against which the elder apostle warns his younger brother (Tit. i. 14).

Jewry comes to us through the Norman French, and is of frequent occurrence in Old English. It is found besides in 1 Esdr. i. 32, ii. 4, iv. 49, v. 7, 8, 57, vi. 1, viii. 31, ix. 3; Bel. 33; 2 Macc. x. 24; Luke xxii. 35; John vii. 1. JEWS LANGUAGE IN THE (םלענמ)

Literally "Jewishly:" for the Hebrew must be taken adverbially, as in the LXX. (יווֹשֵׁב) and Vulgate (Judæo). The term is only used of the language of the two southern tribes after the Captivity of the northern kingdom (2 K. v. 28, 32; 2 Chr. xxvii. 18; lxix. 11, 13), and of that spoken by the captives who returned (Neh. xiii. 24). It therefore denotes as well the pure Hebrew as the dialect adopted during the Captivity, which was characterized by Aramaic forms and idioms. Elsewhere (Is. xix. 18) in the poetical language of Isaiah it is called "the Lip of Canaan."

JEZANIAH [עָבָר יֵזָנְיָה]: [one whom Jehovah hears]: E'zowas [Vat. F. Acts]. E'zowas in Jer. xi. 8: פֶּרַשׁ נוֹעַי, 'A'pia in Jer. xiii. 1: Jezemias, the son of Hosiah, the Machaithe, and one of the chiefs of the forces, who had escaped from Jerusalem during the final attack of the Babylonian army of the Chaldaeans. In the consequent pursuit which resulted in the capture of Zedekiah, the army was scattered from him and dispersed throughout the open country among the neighboring Ammonites and Moabites, watching from thence the progress of events. When the Babylonians had departed, Jezaiah, with the men under his command, was one of the first who returned to Zedekiah at Mizpah. In the events which followed the assassination of that officer Jezaiah took a prominent part. He joined Johnan in the pursuit of Ishmael and his murderous associates, and in the general consternation and distrust which ensued he became one of the foremost advocates of the migration into Egypt, so strongly opposed by Jeremias. Indeed in their interview with the prophet at the Khan of a Chidan, when words ran high, Jezaiah (there called Azariah) was apparently the leader in the dispute, and for once took precedence of Johnan (Jer. xii. 2). In 2 K. xxv. 23 he is called Jezanias, in which form the name was easily corrupted into Azariah, or Zariah, as one MS. of the LXX. reads it. The Syriac and Josephus follow the Hebrew. In the LXX. his father's name is Manciah.

a Amongst the Spanish Jews the name of Jezebel was given to Isabella "the Catholic," in consequence of the detestation in which her memory was held as their persecutor, Lord's Handbook of Spain, 2d ed. p. 496. Whether the name Isabella was originally connected with that of Jezebel is doubtful.

b According to the reading of A. V. and the older, Gessenius in loc., wife of Ahab, king of Israel and mother of Athaliah, queen of Judah, and Ahaziah and Joash, kings of Israel" She was a Phoenician princess, daughter of "Ethiopian king of Sidon," the Sidonian king of the Syrians and Sidonians, Menander apud Joseph. Ant. x. 23, § 2; c. Apion, i. 18). Her marriage with Ahab was a turning point in the history of Israel. Not only was the union with a Canaanitish wife unprecedented in the northern kingdom, but the character of the queen gave additional force and significance to what might else have been regarded merely as a commercial and political measure, natural to a king devoted to the arts of peace and the splendor of regal luxury. She was a woman in whom, with the reckless and licentious habits of an oriental queen, were united the sternest and fiercest qualities inherent in the Phoenician people. The royal family of Tyre was remarkable at that time both for its religious fanaticism and its savage temper. Her father Ethbaal united with her royal office the priesthood of the goddess Ashtaroth, and gave her charge to be the throne by inheritance of her predecessor Phelles (Joseph. c. Apion, i. 18). The next generation included within itself Nicanah, or Matgenes, king and priest of Baal, the murderer Pygmalion, and Elisa or Bido, foundress of Carthage (xviii.). Of this stock came Jezebel. In her hands her husband became a mere puppet (1 K. xvi. 25). Even after his death, through the reigns of his sons, her influence was the evil genius of the dynasty. Through the marriage of her daughter Athaliah with the king of Judah, it extended even to the rival kingdom. The wild license of her life, the magical fascination of her arts, or of her character, became a proverb in the nation (2 K. ix. 32). Long afterwards her name lived as the byword for all that was execrable, and in the Apocalypse it is given to a church or an individual in Asia Minor, combining in like manner fanaticism and profligacy (Rev. ii. 20). If we may trust the numbers of the text, she must have married Ahab before his accession. He reigned 22 years; and 12 years from that time her grandson Ahaziah was 21 years of age. Her daughter Athaliah must have been born therefore at least 35 years before.

The first effect of her influence was the immediate establishment of the Phoenician worship on a grand scale in the court of Ahab. At Bethel alone were supposed less than 4,300 prophets of Baal, and 400 of Astarte (1 K. xi. 31, 32, xviii. 19). The prophets of Jehovah, who up to this time had found their chief refuge in the northern kingdom, were attacked by her orders and put to the sword (1 K. xviii. 13; 2 K. ix. 7). When at last the people, at the instigation of Elijah, rose against her ministers, and slaughtered them at the foot of Carmel, she had come to the throne by submission, she alone retained her presence of mind; and when she received in the palace of Jezebel the tidings that her religion was all but destroyed (1 K. xix. 1), her only answer was one of those fearful vows which have made the leaders of Semitic nations so terrible whether for good or evil—versions IT is the feminine one, "thy wife." In that case she must be the wife of the "angel," and the expression would thus confirm the interpretation which makes "the angel" to be the bishop or presiding officer of the Church of Thyatira; and this woman would thus be his wife.
pressed a message to the very man who, as it might have seemed but an hour before, had her life in his power: "As surely as those art Eli'jah and as I am Jezebel (LXX), so may God do to me and more also, if by this time tomorrow I make not thy life as the life of one of them" (1 K. xix. 2). Eli'jah, who had encountered un-daunted the king and the whole force of the prophets of Baal, "scared" (LXX.) the wrath of the awful queen, and for his life beyond the farthest limits of Israel (1 K. xix. 3). [Eli'jah.]

The next instance of her power is still more characteristic and complete. When she found her husband cast down by his disappointment at being thwarted by Naboth, she took the matter into her own hands, with a spirit which reminds us of Clytemnestra or Lady Macbeth. "Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel? (play the king, pregnant Balsehia, LXX.) Arise and eat bread and let thine heart be merry, and I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Jezereliteth." (1 K. xxi. 7).

She wrote a warrant in Ahab's name, and sealed it with his seal. It was couched in the official language of the Israelite law—a solemn fast—witnesses—a charge of blasphemy—the authorized punishment of stoning. To her, and not to Ahab, was sent the announcement that the royal wishes were accomplished (1 K. xii. 14), and she bade her husband go and take the vacant property, and on her accordingly fell the prophet's curse, as well as on her husband (1 K. xxi. 21).

We hear no more of her for a long period. But she survived Ahab by 14 years, and still, as queen-mother (after the oriental custom), was a great personage in the court of her son, and, as such, became the special mark for vengeance when Jehu advanced against Jezebel to overthrow the dynasty of Ahab. "What peace so long as the whoreldons of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" (2 K. ix. 22). But in that supreme hour of her life the spirit of the aged queen rose within her, equal to the dreadful emergency. She was in the palace, which stood by the gate of the city, overlooking the approach from the east. Re-neth by the open space, under the city walls. She determined to face the destroyer of her family, whom she saw rapidly advancing in his chariot.c She painted her eyelids in the eastern fashion with antimony, so as to give a darker border to the eyes, and make them look larger and brighter (Keil), possibly in order to induce Jehu, after the manner of eastern usipers, to take her, the widow of his predecessor, for his wife, but more probably as the last act of regal splendor. She fired ("made good") her head, and, looking down upon him from the high lattice window in the tower (Joseph. Ant. ix. 6, § 4), she met him by an allu-asion to a former act of treason in the history of her adopted country, which conveys a different ex-

a A graphic conception of this scene occurs in Racine's A'har terrified, Act II. Sc. 5.
b According to the explanation of S. Ephraim Syrus ad loc.
c The A. V. (2 K. ix. 30) renders the Hebrew (יִנָּשָׁא שָׁמַר יֹבְסָדְךָ) in the text, "painted her face," but in the margin more strictly, "put her eyes in painting" (or "in paint"). The act referred to is a familiar one among Syrian women at the present lime. They "paint," or blacken the eyelids and eyebrows with kohl, and prolong the apparent length of the depresurion, according as we take one or other of the different interpretations given to it. (1) "Was there peace to Zimri, who slew his lord?" and as if to remind Jehu, now in the fullness of his triumph, how Omri, the founder of the dynasty which he was destroying, had himself come into power as the avenger of Zimri, who had murdered Baasha, as he now had murdered Jehoram: or (2) a direct address to Jehu, as a second Zimri: "Is it well to reign, O Zimri, slayer of Zimri?" (So Keil and LXX. "εἰρήνη ὑμῶν δαμαθία διά τὴν κυρίαν αὐτῶν") Or (3) "Peace to Zimri, who slew his lord?"—(according to Josephus, Ant. ix. 6, § 4, καλός δούλος ο ἀδελφός των δαμαθίων)—which again may be taken either as an ironical welcome, or (according to Ewald, iii. 163, 290) as a reminder that as Zimri had spared the scragno of Baasha, so she was pre-approached to welcome Jehu. The general character of Jezebel, and the doubt as to the details of the history of Zimri, would lead us rather to adopt the stern eye of her speech. Jehu looked up from his chariot—and his answer, again, is variously given in the LXX. and in the Hebrew text. In the former he exclaims, "Who art thou?" Come (Keil), "Who is on my side, who?" In either case the issue is the same. Two or three emnuchs of the royal harem show their faces at the windows, and at his command dashed the ancient princes down from the chamber. She fell immediately in front of the conqueror's chariot. The blood flew from her mangled corpse over the palace-walls behind, and over the advancing horses in front. The merciless destroyer passed on; and the last remains of life were tranqULed out by the horses' hoofs. The body was left in that open space called in modern eastern language "the mounds," where offal is thrown from the city-walls. The dogs of eastern cities, which prowl around these localities, and which the present writer met on this very spot by the modern village which occupies the site of Jezebel, pounced upon this unexpected prey. Nothing was left by them but the hard portions of the human skeleton, the skin of the hands, and the feet. Such was the sight which met the eyes of the messengers of Jehu, whom he had sent from his triumphal banquet, struck with a momentary feeling of compassion for the fall of so much greatness. "Go, see now this cursed woman and bury her, for she is a king's daughter." When he heard the fate of the body, he exclaimed in words which no doubt were long remembered as the epitaph of the greatest and wickedest of the queens of Israel—"This is the word of Jehovah, which He spake by his servant Elijah the Tishbi, saying, In the portion of Jezebel the dogs shall eat the flesh of Jezebel; and the carcasse of Jezebel shall be as dung on the face of the earth; so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel ," (2 K. ix. 36, 37).

JEZELUS (Iēζελος; [Vat. Iεθβαλς] Zech.
ultra.). 1. The same as JAMAVELE (1 Esdr. viii.
32).

2. (Iηζελος; Jezebel.) Jezebel, the father of Olahias (1 Esdr. viii. 35).

JEZER (ζηζερον, ινινεον; :ιεζερ) in Gen.
xxvi. 34; :ιεζερ, Num. xxxvi. 49. Alex.
Iεζερ; Αζερ, 1 Chr. xiii. 13. Alex. Ζαζερ; [Vat.
Iεζερων, Comp. Abd. :ιεζερ'] Jezier), the third son of Nathaniel, and father of the family of the Jezirites, who were numbered in the plains of Moab.

JEZERITES, THE (ζηζερίται) δι: ιεζερι.
[Vat.-req], Alex. o:ιεζερίτες: Jezriate). A family of the tribe of Nathaniel, descendants of Jezir (Num. xxxvi. 49).

JEZIEL (εζιέλ, Keri ) ιεζιέλ, which is the reading of some MSS.: [assembly of God]: Ιαποο:
F.A. Aίχηα; [Abb. Ιαποο; Comp. Εζιέλα: Jezriel], one of the skilled Hejazite archers or singers who joined David in his retreat at 'Ziklag. He was probably the son of Azmaveth of Bahurim, one of David's heroes (1 Chr. xii. 7). In the Syriac Jeziel is omitted, and the sons of Azmaveth are there Peket and Berachah.

JEZI'LIAH (εζιέληα) [Jehovah delivers.
Forst.]: Iεζιέλα; [Vat. Ζαζερας] Alex. Εξιελα; [Comp. Abd. Iεζιέλα: Jezriel], one of a long list of Benjamite heads of houses, sons of Ephah, who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chr. xiii. 18).

A. C. H.

JEZOAR (εζωαρ) [shining, brilliant, as a verb]: Ζαφρων: Jezron), the son of Helah, one of the wives of Asher, the father or founder of Tekon, and posthumous son of Herson (1 Chr. iv. 7). The Keri has ἡλα' and Zohar", which was followed by the LXX, and by the A. V. of 1611. [Zoharn at the end].

JEZRAHIAH (εζραέλια, Jehovah causes to break forth, i.e. into life]: [Vat. Alex. F.A. omit: F.A.]; Ιεζραεως; [Comp. Abd. Ιεζραηπ'] Jezreel), a Levite, the leader of the chieftains at the solemn dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42). The scribes had built themselves villages in the environs of the city, and the oasis of the Jordan, and with the minstrels they gathered themselves together at the first summons to keep the dedication with gladness.

JEZREEL (εζραελ) [gird will saw or matter]; Iεζραεως; [Vat. Αζραεως; Alex. Ιεζρα ωας, Alex. 2: Ιεζραηπ'); Jezreel], according to the revised text, a descendant of the father or founder of Etam, of the line of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). But as the verse now stands, we must supply such word as "families;" "these (are the families of) the father of Etam.” Both the LXX. and Vulg.

read τις, "sons," for των, "father," and six of Kennicott's MSS. have the same, while in two of the Ross's readings are combined. The Syriac is singularly different from all. "And these are the sons of Ammodob, Achizertel., Nehem, and Dibesh," the last clause of vers. 3 being entirely omitted. But, although the Syriac text of the Chronicles is so corrupt as to be of little authority in this case, there can be no doubt that the genealogy in vv. 3, 4 is so confused as to be attended with almost insuperable difficulties.

Tremellius and Junius regard Etam as the proper name of a person, and Jezreel as one of his sons, while Becherim considers them both names of the place. The Targum on Chron. has, "And these are the Rabbis dwelling at Etam, Jezreel, etc.", in vers. 4 Hur is referred to as the ancestor of this branch of the tribe of Judah, and therefore, if the present text be adopted, we must read, "and these, namely, Abd-Elam, Jezreel," etc. But the probability is that in vers. 3 a clause has been omitted.

JEZREEL (εζραελ) [see above]: LXX.
Iεζραελα, [Iεζραηλα, Ιεζραηλα, Ιεζραηλα, Iεζραηλα, etc.; Vulg. Jezroel, Jezreel, Jezriel], Joseph. Iεζραηλα, Ant. viii. 13, § 6, 7; 1εζραηλα, Ant.
vi. 13, §§ 4, 6; Ιεζραηπος, or 'Ιεζραηπεος; Jud.
i. 8, iv. 6; 5οζραηλα, Etsehoises and Jerome, in Oudemation, pore Jezreel, Latinized into Streirola.
Its modern name is Zerin, which is in fact the same word, and which first appears in William of Tyre (xxi. 28) as Gairn (Germain), and Benjamin of Tudela as Zizin. The history of the identification of these names is well given in Robinson, B. K.
1st ed. iii, 163, 165, and is curious as an example of the tenacity of a local tradition, in spite of the carelessness of modern travellers.

The name is used in 2 Sam. ii 9 and (2) iv. 4, and 10, i. 5, for the valley or plain between Gilboa and Little Hermon and to this plain, in its widest extent, the general form of the name Esdrachon (first used in Jud. i. 8) has been applied in modern times. It is probably from the richness of the plain that the name is derived, "God has seen", or "God has sown." For the events connected with this great battle-field of Palestine, see ESDRACHON.

In its more limited sense, as applied to the city, it first appears in Josh. xix. 18, where it is mentioned as a city of Issachar, in the neighborhood of the hill-slopes and Shunem; and it had citizens (1 K. xxi. 1-3), elders, and nobles of its own (1 K.
ei. 8). But its historical importance is derived from the reign of Ahaz; who chose it for his chief residence, as Onni had chosen Samaria, and Baasha Tirzah.

The situation of the modern village of Zerin still remains to show the fitness of his choice. It is on one of the gentle swells which rise out of the fertile plain of Esdrachon; but with two peculiarities which mark it out. First, the hill is the remnant of a mountain On the N. E. the hill presents a steep rocky descent of at least 100 feet (Robinson, 1st ed. i. 162) in vili. 15, §§ 4, 6, 7, Ιεζραη. Various readings are given of Iεζραη, Αζραης, Αζραης, Αζραης.
The other is its central locality. It stands at the opening of the middle branch of the three eastern forks of the plain, and looks straight towards the wide western level; thus commanding the view towards the Jordan on the east (2 K. ix. 17), and visible from Carmel on the west (1 K. xviii. 46).

In the neighborhood, or within the town probably, was a temple and grove of Ashtar, with an establishment of 400 priests supported by Jezebel (1 K. xvi. 23; 2 K. x. 11). The palace of Ahab (1 K. xxi. 1, xviii. 46), probably containing his "ivory house" (1 K. xxi. 39), was on the eastern side of the city, forming part of the city wall (comp. 1 K. xxi. 1; 2 K. ix. 25, 30, 33). The seraglio, in which Jezebel lived, was on the city wall, and had a high window facing eastward (2 K. ix. 30).

Close by, if not forming part of this seraglio (as Josephus supposes, σταυρός τοις πύργοις, Ant. ix. 6, § 4), was a watch-tower, on which a sentinel stood, to give notice of arrivals from the disturbed district beyond the Jordan (2 K. ix. 17). This watch-tower, well-known as "the tower in Jezreel," may possibly have been the tower or "moglod" near which the Egyptian army was encamped in the battle between Necho and Josiah (Jer. lix. 159). An ancient square tower which stands amongst the hovels of the modern village may be its representative. The gateway of the city on the east was also the gateway of the palace (2 K. ix. 34).

Immediately in front of the gateway, and under the city wall, was an open space, such as existed before the neighboring city of Bethshan (2 Sam. xxvi. 12), and is usually found by the walls of eastern cities, under the name of "the mounds" (see Arabian Nights, passim), whence the dogs, the scavengers of the East, prowled in search of offal (2 K. ix. 25). Here Jezebel met with her end (2 K. ix. 30). [JEZREEL]

A little further east, but adjoining to the royal domain (1 K. xxi. 1), was a smooth tract of land cleared out of the uneven valley (2 K. ix. 25), which belonged to Naboth, a citizen of Jezreel (2 K. ix. 25), by a hereditary right (1 K. xxi. 3): but the royal grounds were so near that it would have been easily turned into a garden of herbs for the palace (1 K. xxi. 22). The Eliahim net Ahab, Jehu, and Bidk (1 K. xxi. 17). Here Jehim met Joram and Ahaziah (2 K. ix. 21, 23). [ELIAHIM; JEHU]. Whether the vineyard of Naboth was here or at Samaria is a doubtful question. [NAROTII.]

Still in the same eastern direction are two springs, one 12 minutes from the town, the other 29 minutes (Robinson, 1st ed. iii. 167). This latter spring "flows from under a sort of cavern in the wall of conglomerate rock, which here forms the base of Gilboa. The water is excellent; and issuing from crevices in the rocks, it spreads out at once into a fine limpid pool, 40 or 50 feet in diameter, full of fish" (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii. 168). This probably, both from its size and situation, was known as "the spring of Jezreel" (mistranslated A. V. "a fountain," 1 Sam. xxix. 1), where Saul was encamped before the battle of Gilboa; and probably the same as the spring of "Harod," where Gideon encamped before his night attack on the Midianites (Judg. vii. 1, mistranslated A. V. "the well"). The name of Harod, "trembling," probably was taken from the "trembling" of Gideon's army (Judg. vii. 5). It was the scene of successive encampments of the Crusaders and Saracens; and was called by the Christians Tutania, and by the Arabs "Ain Jubal," the spring of Goliath" (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii. 69).

This last name, which it still bears, is derived from a tradition mentioned by the Bordeaux Pilgrim, that here David killed Goliath. The tradition may be a confused reminiscence of many battles fought in its neighborhood (Ritter, Jordu, p. 416); or the word may be a corruption of "Gilead," supposing that to be the ancient name of Gilboa, and thus explaining Judg. v. 3, "depart from Mount Gilead" (Schwartz, 344).

According to Josephus (Ant. viii. 15, §§ 4, 6), this spring, and the pool attached to it, was the spot where Naboth and his sons were executed, where the dogs and swine licked up their blood and that of Ahab, and where the harlots bathed in the blood-stained water (I.XX). But the natural inference from the present text of 1 K. xxi. 38 makes the scene of these events to be the pool of Samaria. [See NAROTII.]

With the fall of the house of Ahab the glory of Jezreel departed. No other king is described as living there, and the name was so deeply associated with the family of its founder, that when the Divine retribution overtook the house of their destroyer, the eldest child of the prophet Hosen, who was to be a living witness of the coming vengeance, was called "Jezreel:" I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Ahab... and at that day I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel... and great shall be the day of Jezreel" (Hos. iv. 5, 11). And then out of that day and place of humiliation the name is to go back to its original significance as derived from the beauty and fertility of the rice plain, and to become a pledge of the revived beauty and richness of Israel. "I will hear and answer the heavens, and they will hear and answer the earth, and the earth shall hear and answer the corn and the wine and the oil [of that fruitful plain], and they shall hear and answer 'Jezreel [that is, the seed of God], and I will set thee among me in the earth'" (Hos. ii. 22; see Ewald ad loc., and Gesenius in vose Jezreel). From this time the image seems to have continued as a prophetic allusion for expressing the sorrowing the people of Israel, as it were, and her city, without the name of the country where the world were to become, in a spiritual sense, one rich plain of Jezreel. "I will set them among the people, and they shall remember me in far countries" (Zech. x. 9). "Ye shall be tilled and sown, and I will multiply men upon you" (Ez. xxxvi. 9, 10). "I will set the house of Israel and the house of Judah with the seed of men and with the seed of beasts" (Jer. xxxi. 27). Hence the consecration of the image of "sowing," as it appears in the N. T. Matt. xiii. 2.

2. [Ιεζρεήλ: Alex. Ἰεσσαρεᾶ: Comp. Alfd. Ιηςρεήλ: Jezreel.] A town in Judah, in the neighborhood of the southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 56). Here David in his wanderings took Ahinoam the Jezreelitess for his first wife (1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 5). A. P. S. Jezreel (Ιηςρεήλ: Ιεζρεῆλ). The eldest son of the prophet Hosen (Hos. i. 4), significantly so called because Jehovah said to the prophet, "Yet a little while and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu," and "I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel." W. A. W. Jezreelitess (Ιηςρεήλτης: Ιεζρεήλτης).
In this case the valley is the great | valley, which "has its head in the hills near | Jezreel, and runs thence westward to the | plain" (Robinson, iii, 107). Vande Veide conveys in this, and identifies Zelah (Josh. xix. 27), which he considers to be a town, with the ruins of | Abyla (Memoir, p. 326). It should, however, be | remarked that the Hebrew word Ge, here rendered | "valley," has commonly rather the force of a | ravine or glen, and is distinct from Nachal, which answers | exactly to the Arabic Wady (Stanley, S. & F. | App. §§ 2, 38).

JOAB (38N; Jehoveh father [or, whose | father is Jehoveh]: (d)7é: Joab), the eldest | and most remarkable of the three nephews of David, the | children of Zeruiah, David's sister. Their father | is unknown, but seems to have resided at Bethel, | and to have died before his sons, as we find mention of his sepulchre at that place (2 Sam. ii. 32). They both exhibit the activity and courage of David's constitutional character. But they never rise beyond this to the nobler qualities which lift | him above the wild soldiers and chieftains of the | time. Asahel, who was cut off in his youth, and | seems to have been the darling of the family, is | only known to us from his gaudy and lively | personal. (2 Sam. ii. 18). Abishai and Joab are alike in their | impetuous courage. Joab, however, combines with | these ruder qualities something of a more states- | man-like character, which brings him more nearly | to a level with his youthful uncle: and unquestion- | ably gives him the second place in the whole history | of David's reign.

I. He first appears after David's accession to | the throne at Hebron, thus differing from his brother | Abishai, who was already David's companion during | his wanderings (1 Sam. xxvi. 6). He with his two | brothers went out from Hebron at the head of | David's "servants," or guards, to keep a watch on | the movements of Abner, who with a considerable | force of Benjaminites had crossed the Jordan, and | come as far as Gibea, perhaps on a pilgrimage to | the sanctuary. The two parties so met opposite | each other, on each side of the bank by that city. Abner's | challenge, to which Joab assented, led to a desperate | struggle between twelve champions from either side. | (Gehron.) The left-handed Benjaminites, and the | right-handed men of Judah — their sword-hands | thus coming together — seized each his adversary | by the head, and the whole number fell by the | mutual wounds they received.

This roused the blood of the rival tribes; a | general encounter ensued; Abner and his company | were defeated, and in his flight, being hard pressed | by the swift-footed Asahel, he reluctantly killed | the unfortunate youth. The expressions which he uses, | "Therefore should I smite thee to the ground? | how then should I hold up my face to Joab thy | brother?" (2 Sam. ii. 22), imply that up to this | time there had been a kind of friendly feeling | between the two chiefs. It was rudely extingu- | ished by this deed of blood. The other soldiers of | Judah, when they came up to the dead body of | their young leader, halted, struck dumb by grief. | But his two brothers, on seeing the corpse, only | hurried on with greater fury in the pursuit. At | sunset the Benjamite force rallied round Abner, | andrended "triumph" in the A. V. (2 Sam. ii. 25), is | and he then made an appeal to the generosity of Joab not to push the war to extremities. Joab reluctantly consented, drew off his troops, and returned, after the loss of only nineteen men, to Hebron. They took the corpse of Asahel with them, and on the way halted at Bethlehem in the early morning, or at dead of night, to inter it in their family burial-place (2 Sam. iii. 32).

But Joab's revenge on Abner was only postponed. He had been on another of these predatory excursions from Hebron, when he was informed on his return that Abner had, with his absence paid a visit to David, and been received into favor (2 Sam. iii. 23). He broke out into a violent remonstrance with the king, and then, without David's knowledge, immediately sent messengers after Abner, who was overtaken by them at the well of Sirah, according to Josephus (Ant. viii. 1, § 5), about two miles from Hebron. Abner, with the unsuspecting generosity of his noble nature, returned at once. Joab and Abishai met him in the gateway of the town: Joab took him aside (2 Sam. iii. 27), as if with a peaceful intention, and then struck him a deadly blow "under the fifth rib." It is possible that with the passion of vengeance for his brother may have been mingled the fear lest Abner should supply him in the king's favor. David burst into passionate invective and imprecations on Joab when he heard of the act, and forced him to appear in sackcloth and torn garments at the funeral (iii. 31). But it was an infirmation of Joab's power, which David never forgot. The awe in which he stood of the sons of Zeruiah cast a shade over the whole remainder of his life (iii. 39).

II. There was now no rival left in the way of Joab's advancements, and soon the opportunity occurred for his legitimate succession to the highest, and rest post that David could confer. At the siege of Jerusalem, the king offered the office of chief of the army, now grown into a "host," to any one who would lead the forlorn hope, and scale the precipice on which the besieged fortress stood. With an agility equal to that of David himself, or of his brother Asahel, Joab succeeded in the attempt, and became in consequence commander-in-chief—"captain of the host." He held under Saul, the highest in the state after the king (1 Chr. vi. 6; 2 Sam. viii. 16). His importance was immediately shown by his undertaking the fortification of the conquered city, in conjunction with David (1 Chr. xi. 8).

In this post he was content, and served the king with undeviating fidelity. In the wide range of wars which David undertook, Joab was the acting general, and he therefore may be considered as the founder, as far as military prowess was concerned, of the Marlborough, the Belisarius, of the Jewish empire. Abishai, his brother, still accompanied him, as captain of the king's "mighty men" (1 Chr. xxvii. 20; 2 Sam. x. 10). He had a chief armor-bearer of his own, Nahash, a Beerothite (2 Sam. xxvii. 37; 1 Chr. xxvii. 39), and ten attendants to carry his equipment and the royal office (2 Sam. x. 18). He had the charge, formerly belonging to the king or judge, of giving the signal by trumpet for advance or retreat (2 Sam. xvii. 16). He was called by the almost regal title of "Lord" (2 Sam. xi. 11), an unusual one, פּלֶנֶה (Aqvedah), elsewhere employed for a bunch or knot of hyssop.

Possibly the spring which still exists about that "the prince of the king's army" (1 Chr. xxvii. 34). His usual residence (except when campaigning) was in Jerusalem—but he had a house and property, with barley-fields adjoining, in the country (2 Sam. xiv. 30), in the "wilderness" (1 K. ii. 34), probably on the N. E. of Jerusalem (comp. 1 Sam. xii. 13, Josh. viii. 15, 20), near an ancient sanctuary, called from its nomadic village "Edad-hazor" (2 Sam. xiii. 23; comp. with xiv. 30), where there were extensive sheepwalks. It is possible that this "house of Joab" may have given its name to Aroth, Beth-Joab (1 Chr. ii. 54), to distinguish it from Aroth-adar. There were two Arothos in the tribe of Benjamin [see AROTH].

1. His great war was that against Ammon, which he conducted in person. It was divided into three campaigns. (a) The first was against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon. He attacked and defeated the Syrians, whilst his brother Abishai did the same for the Ammonites. The Syrians rallied with their kindred tribes from beyond the Euphrates, and were finally routed by David himself. [HADADEZER.] (b) The second was against Edom. The decisive victory was gained by David himself in the "valley of salt," and celebrated by a triumphal monument (2 Sam. viii. 13). But Joab had the charge of carrying out the victory, and remained in the land for months, expelling the native population, whom he then buried in the tombs of Petra (1 K. xi. 15, 16). So long was the terror of his name preserved that only when the fugitive prince of Edom, in the Egyptian court, heard that "David slept with his fathers, and that Joab the captain of the host was dead," did he venture to return to his own country (ib. xi. 21, 22). (c) The third was against the Ammonites. They were again left to Joab, who was ordered to "take the city," and forced to "repent" lest the glory of the conquest should pass from the king to his general (2 Sam. xii. 26-28).

2. The services of Joab to the king were not confined to these military achievements. In the entangled relations which grew up in David's domestic life, he bore an important part. (a) The first occasion was the unhappy correspondence which passed between him and the king during the Amnonite war respecting Uriah the Hittite, which led to the treacherous sacrifice of Uriah in the above-mentioned sortie (2 Sam. i. 1-25). It shows both the confidence reposed by David in Joab, and Joab's too unscrupulous fidelity to David. From the possession which Joab thus acquired of the terrible secret of the royal household, has been dated, with some probability, his increased power over the mind of the king.

(b) The next occasion on which it was displayed was in his successful endeavor to reinstate Absalom in David's favor, after the murder of Amnon. It would almost seem as if he had been guided by distance out of Hebron on the left of the road going northward, and bears the name of Ain-Sarah. The road has doubtless always followed the same track.

See Blunt's Coincidences, ii., xi.
of the king by Nathan's parable.
A similar apologue he put into the mouth of a "wise woman of Tekoah." The exclamation of David on perceiving the application intimates the high opinion which he entertained of his general, "Is this the face of Amasa, which thou didst ever regard in the face of Joab in all the days of David (2 Sam. xiv. 1-20).
A like indication is found in the confidence of Absalom that Joab, who had thus procured his return, could also go a step further and demand his admission to his father's presence. Joab, who evidently thought that he had gained as much as could be expected (2 Sam. xiv. 22), twice refused to visit the prince, but having been entraped into an interview by a stratagem of Absalom, undertook to make an admission, and succeeded in this also (ib. xvi. 28-33).
(c.) The same keen sense of his master's interests that had prompted this desire to heal the breach in the royal family ruled the conduct of Joab no less, when the relations of the father and son were reversed by the successful revolt of Absalom. His former intimacy with the prince did not impair his fidelity to the king. He followed him beyond the Jordan, and in the final battle of Ephraim assumed the responsibility of taking the rebel prince's dangerous life in spite of David's injunction to spare him, and when no one else had courage to act so decisive a part (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 11-15).
He was well aware of the terrible effect it would have on the king (ib. xviii. 20), and on this account possibly dissuaded his young friend Ahinaez from bearing the news; but, when the tidings had been broken, he had the spirit himself to raise David from the frantic grief which would have been fatal to the royal cause (2 Sam. xix. 5-7). His stern resolution (as he had himself anticipated) well-nigh proved fatal to his own interests. The king could not forgive it, and went so far in his unreasonable resentment as to transfer the command of the army from the too faithful Joab to his other nephew Amasa, the son of Abigail, who had even sided with the insurgents (2 Sam. xix. 13). In like manner he returned only a reproachful answer to the vindictive loyalty of Joab's brother, Abishai (ib. 22).
(d.) Nothing brings out more strongly the good and bad qualities of Joab than his conduct in this trying crisis of his history. On the one hand, he remained still faithful to his master. On the other hand, as before in the case of Absalom, he was determined not to lose the post he so highly valued.
Amasa was commander-in-chief, but Joab had still his own small following of attendants; and with him were the mighty men commanded by his brother Abishai (2 Sam. xx. 7, 10), and the bodyguard of the king. With these he went out in pursuit of the remnants of the rebellion. In the heat of pursuit, he encountered his rival Amasa, meeting him in the same quest. At "the great stone" in Gileon, the cousins met. Joab's sword was attached to his girdle; by design or accident it protruded from the sheath. Amasa rushed into the treacherous embrace, to which Joab invited him, holding fast his sword by his own right hand, whilst the unsheathed sword in his left hand plunged into Amasa's stomach; a single blow from the practiced hand in the case of Absalom, sufficed to do its work. Joab and his brother hurried on to discharge their commission, whilst one of his ten attendants staid by the corpse, calling on the royal party to follow after Joab. But the deed produced a frightful impression. The dead body was lying in a pool of blood by the roadside; every one halted, as they came up, at the ghastly sight, till the attendant dragged it out of the road, and threw a cloak over it.
Then, as if the spell was broken, they rallied about Joab, and once more the king (2 Sam. xx. 5-13). He, too, when they overtook him, presented an aspect long afterwards remembered with horror. The blood of Amasa had spilt all over the girdle to which the sword was attached, and the sandals on his feet were red with the stains left by the falling corpse (1 K. ii. 5).
(e.) But, at the moment, all were absorbed in the pursuit of the rebels. Once more a proof was given of the wide-spread confidence in Joab's judgment. In the besieged town of Abel Beth-mannach, far in the north, the same appeal was addressed to his sense of the evils of an endless civil war, that had been addressed to him years before by Abner near Gilson. He demanded only the surrender of the rebel chief, and on the sight of his head thrown over the wall, withdrew the army and returned to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xx. 16-22). [SIEBA.]
He was not only a traitor, but a traitor who was in the thick of the battle, when it was announced on the king's desire to number the people. "The king prevailed against Joab" (2 Sam. xxiv. 1-4). But Joab's scruples were so strong that he managed to avoid numbering two of the tribes, Levi and Benjamin (1 Chr. xxi. 6).
3. There is something mournful in the end of Joab. At the close of his long life, his loyalty, so long unshaken, at last wavered. "Though he had not turned more of the cause of the house of David than of the house of Joab (2 Sam. xxiv. 32).
The revival of the pretensions of Adonijah after David's death was sufficient to awaken the suspicions of Solomon. The king deposed the high-priest Abiathar, Joab's friend and fellow-conspirator—and the news of this event at once alarmed Joab himself. He claimed the right of sanctuary within the curtains of the sacred tent, under the shelter of the altar at Gibeon. He was pursued by Benaijah, who at first hesitated to violate the sanctuary of the refuge; but Solomon urged that the guilt of two such murders overrode all such protection. With his hands on the altar therefore, the gray-headed warrior was slaughtered by his successor. The body was carried to his house in "the wilderness," and there interred. He left descendants, but nothing is known of them, unless it may be inferred from the double curse of David (2 Sam. iii. 29) and of Solomon (1 K. ii. 33) that they seemed to dwindle away, stricken by a succession of visitations—weakness, leprosy, lameness, murder, starvation. His name is by some supposed (in allusion to his part in Adonijah's coronation on that spot) to be preserved in the modern appellation of En-regel—"the well of Job"—corrupted from Joab.
A. V. N.
2. [2811]: 164165: Alex. 1616: Jech."
Son of Seraijah, and descendant of Kenaz (1 Chr. iv. 14). He was father, or prince, as Jechri explains rt. of the valley of Charashim, or smiths, so called, according to the tradition quoted by Jerome (\emph{Quast. Hebr. in Psal.}), because the architects of the Temple were selected from among his sons.

3. (\textit{Joahaz}: [Vat. in Ezr. ii. 6; Neh. vii. 11, 12; Ezra ii. 10.] Job in 1 Esdr. i. 34.) The head of a family, not of priestly or Levitical rank, whose descendants, with those of Joshua, were the most numerous of all who returned with Zerubbabel (Exx. ii. 6, viii. 9; Neh. vii. 11; 1 Esdr. viii. 35). It is not clear whether Joshua and Joab were two prominent men among the children of Pahath-Moab, the ruler or sultan (\emph{shâlon}) of Moab, as the Syrian readers, or whether, in the registration of those who returned, the descendants of Joshua and Joab were represented by the sons of Pahath-Moab. The latter is more probably the true solution, and the verse (Exx. ii. 6; Neh. vii. 11) should then be rendered: "the sons of Pahath-Moab, for (i. e. representing) the sons of Joshua and Joab."

In this case the \textit{Joahaz} of Exx. vii. 9 and 1 Esdr. viii. 35 was probably a distinct personage.

\textbf{JO`ACHAZ} (\textit{Ioschiua; Alex. Iosa\'i}; [\textit{Iosa\'i};] \textit{Ieshonim} = JOHACHIAH (1 Esdr. i. 34), the son of Josiah. The LXX. and Vulgate and in most Jewish manuscripts followed St. Matthew (\textit{xxv. 11}), or have been altered so as to agree with him.

\textbf{JO`ACHIM} (Ioschah; [Vat. Ioschiua; Alex. Iosa\'i; and Iosa\'i;] JOACHIM, L. = JOHAOAH, called also JOACHIN.)

1. (Bar. i. 5 = JOAAHIN, J. = JOHAOAHIN (1 Esdr. i. 37, 38, 39).) [\textit{Iosa\'i;}, 1.]

2. (\textit{Iosa\'i;}; Vat. Alex. \textit{Iosa\'i;}, \textit{Iosa\'i;}; JOACHIN) = JOHAOAHIN (1 Esdr. i. 43).

3. (\textit{Ioscha\'i;}; Alex. -\textit{Iosa\'i;}; JOACHIN.) = JOHACHIAH, the son of Josiah (1 Esdr. v. 5). He is by mistake called the son of Zerubbabel, as is clear from Neh. xii. 10, 26; and the passage has in consequence been corrected by Junius, who renders it: "Jehoshua filius Jehohazakki zum Jehohazaki filio." Harrington (\textit{Gen.} i. 72) proposed to omit the words \textit{Iosa\'i;} \textit{Iosa\'i;} altogether as an interpolation.

4. (\textit{Ioschiua;} Vat. Sin. Alex. -\textit{Iosa\'i;}; Elechim, JOACHIN.) "The high-priest who was in Jerusalem" (Jud. iv. 6, 14) in the time of Judith, who welcomed the heroine after the death of Holofernes, in company with "the ancients of the children of Israel" (\textit{\gamma\varepsilon\varphi\omicron\sigma\iota\tau\omega\varsigma \tau\eta\iota\nu\varsigma \iota\varsigma\varphi\alpha\omicron\omicron\omicron\nu\varsigma\varphi\omicron\alpha\omicron\nu}; xv. 8 ff.). The name occurs with the various reading Elechim, but it is impossible to identify him with any historical character. No such name occurs in the lists of high-priests in 1 Chr. vi. (Joseph. \textit{Ant.} x. 8, \textit{§} 6); and it is a mere arbitrary conjecture to suppose that Elechiam mentioned in 2 K. xviii. 18 was afterwards raised to that dignity. Still less can be said for the identification of Joscheim with Hilkiah (2 K. xxi. 4: \textit{Elia\'k\iota;), Joseph. \textit{Ant.} x. 4, \textit{§} 2: \textit{Xe\'lad\iota;}, LXX.). The name itself is appropriate to the position which the high-priest occupies in the story of Judith ("The Lord hath set up"), and the person must be regarded as a necessary part of the fiction.

5. (\textit{Ioschiua;} \textit{Ieshonim}, but ed. 1590 JOACHIN.) The husband of Susanna (Sus. i. 1 ff.). The name seems to have been chosen, as in the former case, with a reference to its meaning; and it was probably for the same reason that the husband of Anna, the mother of the Virgin, is called Joachim in early legends (\textit{Protev. Jos.}, i., &c.).

\textbf{JOADA\'NAS} (\textit{Ioschob\'os;} JOANCE, one of the sons of Josiah, the son of Josadak (1 Esdr. ix. 19). His name occupies the same position as that of Gedaliah in the corresponding list in Ezx. x. 18, but it is uncertain how the corruption originated. Probably, as Burrington suggests (\textit{Gen. ed.}, i. 167), the \textit{\gamma} was corrupted into \textit{\eta}, and \textit{\alpha} into \textit{\nu}, a change which in the uncial character would be very slight.

\textbf{JO\'AIH} (\textit{Jehochaih his brother = friend}; \textit{Ioad} in Kings, \textit{Iosa\'i} in Isaiah; Alex. JOIDA\'NAS in 2 K. xviii. 18, 26, and \textit{Ioad} in ver. 37.; [Vat. and Comp. \textit{Ioad} in Is. xxxvi. 11; \textit{Sin.} \textit{Ioad} in Is. xxxvi. 3, ver. 11 omits, ver. 22, \textit{Ioad} = Joah). 1. The son of Asaph, and chronicler, or keeper of the records, to Hezekiah. He was one of the three chief officers sent to communicate with the Assyrian general at the conduit of the upper pool (Is. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22), and probably belonged to the tribe of Levi.

2. (\textit{Ioad}; Alex. \textit{Iosa\'i}; JOAH.) The son or grandson of Zimmah, a Gershonite (1 Chr. vi. 21), and apparently the same as Ethan (ver. 42), unless, as is not improbable, in the latter list some names are supplied which are omitted in the former, and vice versa. For instance, in ver. 42 Shimeu is added, and in ver. 43 Libni is omitted (comp. ver. 20). If Joah and Ethan are identical, the passage must have been early corrupted, as all ancient versions give it as it stands at present, and there are no variations in the MSS.

3. (\textit{Ioad}; Alex. \textit{Iosa\'i}; JOAHAH.) The third son of Obad-edom (1 Chr. xxiv. 4), a Korhite, and one of the door-keepers appointed by David. With the rest of his family he is characterized as a man of excellence in strength for the service (ver. 8). They were appointed to keep the southern gate of the Temple, and the house of Asuppim, or "gatherings," which was either a storehouse or council chamber in the outer court (ver. 15).

4. (\textit{Ioad}; [Vat. omits: Alex. Iosa\'i; (Comp. \textit{Ioad};)] JOAH.) A Gershonite, the son of Zimmah, and father of Eden (2 Chr. xxix. 12). As one of the chief priests, or high-priests, or other dignitaries in the Temple to which he belonged, he took a leading part in the purification of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah. In the last clause of the verse the LXX. have \textit{Ioad}, which is the reading of both MSS.; but there is nothing to show that the same person is not in both instances intended, nor any MS. authority for the various reading.

5. (\textit{Ioad}; [\textit{\textit{Iosa\'i;}, Comp. \textit{Ioad};.] JOAH.) The son of Joahaz, and keeper of the Temple, or an assistant to Joahaz. Together with the chief officers of state, Shaphan the scribe, and Massaiah, the governor of the city, he superintended the repair of the Temple which had been neglected during the two previous reigns (2 Chr. xxvii. 8). Jospehus calls him \textit{Ioad}, as if he read \textit{\\gamma\nu\\iota\\nu\\phi\omicron\alpha\omicron\nu}; the Syriac and Arabic omit the name altogether.

\textbf{JO`AHAB} (\textit{Jehohave; Ioha\'b;}, takes as by the hand); \textit{Iosa\'i}; [Vat. \textit{Iosa\'i}; JOACHAZ), the father of Joah, the chronicler or keeper of the records to King Josiah (2 Chr. xxiv. 8). One of Kennicott's MS. readings \textit{Iosa\'i};, i. e. AHAB, and the margin of Bomberg's Bible gives  Joi.

Joan. E.

and is elsewhere called John. [John, 2]

* Joan'nas, Luke iii. 27. [Joanna.]

Joseph, chief of the first of the twenty-four courses of priests in the reign of David, and 1. son of Ahaziah king of Judah, and the only one of his children who escaped the murderous hand of Athaliah. Jehoash having himself killed all his own brethren, and all his sons, except Ahaziah, having been killed by the irritation of the Philistines and Arameans, and all Ahaziah's remoter relations having been put to death by Athaliah (2 Chr. xxxi. 4, 17; xxiii. 7, 8, 9, 10), the house of David was reduced to the lowest ebb, and Joash appears to have been the only surviving descendant of Solomon. After his father's sister Jehoshabeath, the wife of Jehoiahad, had stolen him from among the king's sons, he was hid for 6 years in the chambers of the Temple. In the 7th year of his age and of his confinement, a successful revolution placed him on the throne of his ancestors, and freed the country from the tyranny and idolatries of Athaliah. [Jehoiahad.] For at least 23 years, while Jehoiahad lived, this reign was very prosperous. Excepting that the high-places were still restored to incense and sacrifice, pure religion was restored, large contributions were made for the repair of the Temple, which was accordingly restored; and the country seems to have been free from foreign invasion and domestic disturbance. But, after the death of Jehoiahad, Joash, who was evidently of weak character, fell into the hands of bad advisers, at whose suggestion he revived the worship of Baal and Ashhtaroth. When he was relented for this by Zacharias, the son of Jehoiahad, who had probably succeeded to the high-priesthood, with base ingratitude and daring impertinence Joash caused him to be stoned to death in the very court of the Lord's house, "between the Temple and the altar" (Matt. xxix. 35). The vengeance imprest by the murdered high-priest was not long delayed. That very year, Hazael king of Syria, after a successful campaign against the Philistines, came up against Jerusalem, and carried off a vast booty as the price of his departure. A decisive victory, gained by a small band of Syrians over a great host of the king of Judah, had thus placed Jerusalem at his mercy. This defeat is expressly said to be a judgment upon Joash for having forsaken the God of his fathers. He had scarcely escaped this danger, when he fell into another and a fatal one. Two of his servants, taking advantage of his severe illness, some think of a wound received in battle, conspired against him, and slew him in his bed in the fortress of Millo, thus averting the innocent blood of Zacharias. He was buried in the sepulchres of the kings of Judah, in the sepulchres of the kings of Judah. Possibly the fact of Jehoiahad being buried there had something to do with this exclusion. Joash's reign lasted 40 years, from 878 to 838 B.C. He was 10th king from David inclusive, reckoning the reign of the usurper Athaliah. He is one of the three kings (Ahaziah, Joash, and Zacharias) omitted by St. Matthew in the genealogy of Christ.

With regard to the different accounts of the Syrian invasion given in 2 K. and in 2 Chr., which have led some (as Theusins and many older commentators) to imagine two distinct Syrian invasions, and others to see a direct contradiction, or at least a strange incompleteness in the narratives, as Winer, the difficulty exists solely in the minds of the critics. The narrative given above, which is also that of the Syrian historian Josephus (Ant. iv. 7, § 4) as well as of Josephus, perfectly units the two accounts, which are merely different abridgments of the one fuller account contained in the original chronicles of the kingdom. Grundberg pushes the system of irreverent criticism to such an absurd pitch, that he speaks of the murder of Zacharias as a pure fable (Winer, Rech. art. Jehoash).

It should be added that the prophet Elisha triumphed in Israel throughout the days of Joash; and there is some ground for concluding with Winer (agreeing with Cremer, Movers, Hitzig, Meier, and others) that the prophet Joel also prophesied in the former part of this reign. (See Movers, Chronik, pp. 119-121.)

2. Son and successor of Jehoahaz on the throne of Israel from b. c. 840 to 825, and for two full years a contemporary sovereign with the preceding (2 K. xiv. 1; comp. with xii. 1, xii. 10). When he succeeded to the crown, the kingdom was in a deplorable state from the devastations of Hazael and Ben-hadad, king of Syria, of whose power at this time we had also evidence in the preceding article. In spite of the perseverance of Joash in the worship set up by Jeroboam, God took compassion upon the extreme misery of Israel, and in remembrance of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, interposed to save them from entire destruction. On occasion of a friendly visit paid by Joash to Elisha on his deathbed, where he wept over his sins and the sins of his ancestors, Joash, king of Judah, a younger son of Ahaz, who held a subordinate jurisdiction in the lifetime of his father, or was appointed viceroy (E*Wyrta, LXX. of 2 Chr. xviii. 25) during his absence in the attack on Ramoth-Gilead (1 K. xxii. 26: 2 Chr. xxi. 25).

Or he may have been merely a prince of the bloodroyal. But if Geiger be right in his conjecture, that Masseiah, "the king's son," is 2 Chr. xxviii. 7, was a prince of the Moloch worship, Joash would be a priest of the same. There is, however, but slender foundation for the belief (Geiger, Urschrift, etc., p. 397). The Vulgate calls him "the son of Amelech," taking the article as part of the noun, and the whole as a proper name. Thenius suggests that he may have been placed with the governor of the city for the purpose of military education.

3. [Vat. corrupt.] A descendant of Shelah the son of Judah, but whether his son or the son of Jokim, as Burrington (Genealogies, i. 179) supposes, is not clear (1 Chr. iv. 22). The Vulgate rendering of this name by Scisurus, according to its etymology, is as well as of the other names in the same verse, very remarkable. The Hebrew tradition, quoted by Jerome (Quast. Hebr. in Paral., & Jarchi (Comm. in loc.), applies it to Mahlon, the son of Elimelech, who married a Moabitess. The expression rendered in A. V., "he had the dominion (5722, bddla) in Moab," would, according to this interpretation, signify "who married in Moab." The same explanation is given in the Targum of R. Joseph.

6. [Rom. FA. ‘Idar: Vat. Isa. Alex. Iapar.] A Benjamine, son of Shemaiah of Gibeah (1 Chr. xii. 3). He was one of the heroes, "helpers of the battle," who resorted to David at Ziklag; and assisted him in his excursions against the marauding parties to whose attacks he was exposed (ver. 21). He was probably with David in his pursuit of the Amalekites (comp. 1 Chr. xii. 21, with 1 Sam. xxx. 8, where 7555 should be "troop" in both passages). The Peshito-Syriac, reading 32, for 7557, makes him the son of Ahiezer.

7. One of the officers of David's household, to whose charge were entrusted the store-houses of oil, the produce of the plantations of sycamore and the olive-yards of the lowlands of Judah (1 Chr. xxvii. 28).

JOB [יָבֹא]: i.e. /job (one persecuted, afflicted: see further, Fürst, Handw. s. v.; Ges. Theaur., s. v.): יֹזְבֹא: Job.
The numerous and difficult questions touching the integrity of this book, its plan, object, and general character; and the probable age, country, and circumstances of its author, cannot be satisfactorily discussed without a previous analysis of its contents. It consists of five parts: the introduction, the discussion between Job and his three friends, the speech of Eliph, the manifestation and address of Almighty God, and the concluding chapter.

I. Analysis. — 1. The Introduction supplies all the facts on which the argument is based. Job, a chieftain in the land of Uz, 2 of immense wealth and high rank; 3 the greatest of all the men of the East, 4 is represented to us as a man of perfect integrity, blameless in all the relations of life, declared indeed by the Lord Himself to be 5 without his like in all the earth, a perfect, and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil. The highest goodness, and the most perfect temporal happiness are combined in his person; under the protection of God, surrounded by a numerous family, he enjoys in advanced life an almost parabolical state, exemplifying the normal results of human obedience to the will of a righteous God. One question could be raised by envy: may not the goodness which secures such direct and tangible rewards be a refined form of selfishness? In the world of spirits, where all the mysteries of existence are brought to light, Satan, the accusing angel, suggests the doubt: 6 doth Job fear God for naught? his life vividly to his face. The problem is thus distinctly propounded which this book is intended to discuss and solve. [See addition, Amer. ed.] Can goodness exist irregardless of reward, can the fear of God be retained by man when every inducement to selfishness is taken away? The problem is obviously of infinite importance, and could only be answered by inflicting upon a man, in whom, while prosperous, malice itself could detect no evil, the calamities which are the due, and were then believed to be invariably the results, even in this life, of wickedness. The answer receives permission to make the trial, he destroys Job's property, then his children; and afterwards, to leave no possible opening for a cavil, is allowed to inflict upon him the most terrible disease known in the East. Each of these calamities assumes a form which produces an impression that it must be a visitation from God, precisely such as was to be expected, supposing that the patriarch had been a successful hypercrite, reserved for the sake of the trials which Satan had anticipated the patriarch himself would at last utter in his despair, she counsels him to curse God and die. 7 a Job remains steadfast.

The destruction of his property draws not from him a word of complaint: the death of his children elicits the sublimest words of resignation which ever fell from the lips of a mourner — the disease which made him an object of loathing to man, and which seemed to designate him as a visible example of divine wrath, is borne without a murmur; he repels his wife's suggestion with the simple words, What! shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil? 8 In all this Job did not sin with his lips.

The question raised by Satan was thus answered. His assaults had but issued in a complete removal of the outer forms which could mislead men's judgment, and in developing the highest type of disinterested worth. Had the narrative then ended, the problem could not be regarded as unsolved, while a sublime model would have been exhibited for men to admire and imitate.

2. Still in that case it is clear that many points of deep interest would have been left in obscurity. Entire as was the submission of Job, he must have been inwardly perplexed by events which had no clear explanation whatever. 9 an unaccountable on any hypothesis hitherto entertained, and seemed repugnant to the ideas of justice engraven on man's heart. It was also most desirable that the impressions made upon the generality of men by sudden and unaccountable calamities should be thoroughly discussed, and that a broader and firmer basis than heretofore should be found for speculations concerning the providential government of the world. An opportunity for such discussion is afforded in the most natural manner by the introduction of three men, representing the wisdom and experience of the age, who came to console with Job on bearing of his misfortunes. Some time 10 appears to have elapsed in the interim, during which the situation of Uz is doubtful. Ewald: Der Buch Job, p. 41 suggests it to have been the district south of Bashan. Spaulding and Rosenmuller (Proll pp. 29-33) fix it in the N. E. of the desert near the Ephrates. See also Dr. Lee, Introduction to Job, p. 21.

1 From ch. xii. 16 it may be inferred that he was about 70 years old at this time.

which the disease had made formidable progress, and Job had thoroughly realized the extent of his misery. The meeting is described with singular beauty. At a distance they greet him with the wild demonstrations of sympathizing grief usual in the East; coming near they are overpowered by the sight of his wretchedness, and sit seven days and seven nights without uttering a word. This awful silence, whether Job felt it as a proof of real sympathy, or as an indication of inward suspicion on their part, drew out all his anguish. In an agony of desperation he curses the day of his birth, and sees and hopes for no end of his misery, but death.

With the answer to this outburst begins a series of discussions, continued probably (as Ewald shows, p. 55) with some intervals, during several successive days. Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar in turn, bring forward arguments, which are severally answered by Job.

The results of the first discussion (from c. iii. -xiv.) may be thus summed up. We have on the part of Job's friends a theory of the divine government resting upon an exact and uniform correlation between sin and punishment (iv. 6, 11, and throughout). Afflictions are always penal, issuing in the destruction of those who are radically opposed to God, or who do not submit to his chastisements. They lead of course to correction and amendment of life when the sufferer repents, confesses his sins, puts them away, and turns to God. In that case restoration to peace, and even increased prosperity may be expected (vv. 17-27). Still the fact of the suffering always proves the commission of some special sin, while the demeanor of the sufferer indicates the true internal relation between him and God.

These principles are applied by them to the case of Job. They are in the first place scandalized by the vehemence of his complaints, and when they find that he maintains his freedom from wild, or conscious sin, they are driven to the conclusion that his faith is radically unsound; his protestations appear to them almost blasphemous, they become convinced that he has been secretly guilty of some unpardonable sin, and their tone, at first courteous, though warning (comp. c. iv. with c. xv.), becomes stern, and even harsh and menacing. It is clear that unless they are driven from their partial and exclusive theory they must be led on to an unqualified condemnation of Job.

In this part of the dialogue the character of the three friends is clearly developed. Eliphaz represents the true patriarchal chieftain, grave and dignified, and erring only from an exclusive adherence to tenets hiterto unquestioned, and influenced in the first place by genuine regard for Job, and sympathy with his affliction. Bildad, without much originality or independence of character, reposes partly on the wise saws of antiquity, partly on the authority of his older friend. Zophar differs from both, he seems to be a young man; his language is violent, and at times even coarse and offensive (see especially his second speech, c. xx.). He represents the prejudiced and narrow-minded bigots of his age.

In order to do justice to the position and argu- ments of Job, it must be borne in mind, that the direct object of the trial was to ascertain whether he would deny or forsake God, and that his real integrity is asserted by God Himself. His answers throughout correspond with these data. He knows with a spirit of unshrinking simplicity that he is not an offender in the sense of his opponents: he is there fore confident that whatever may be the object of the afflictions for which he cannot account, God knows that he is innocent. This consciousness, which from the nature of things cannot be tested by others, enables him to examine fearlessly their position. He denies the assertion that punishment follows surely on guilt, or proves its commission. Appealing boldly to experience, he declares that in point of fact prosperity and misfortune are not always, or generally, commensurate; both are often irrespective of man's deserts, "the tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure" (c. xii. 6). In the government of Providence he can see but one point clearly, namely, that all events and results are absolutely in God's hand (xii. 9-25), but as for the principles which underlie those events he knows nothing. In fact, he is sure that his friends are equally unenlightened, and are sophists, defending their position, out of mere prejudice, by arguments and statements false in themselves and doubly offensive to God, being hypocritically advanced in his defense (xiii. 1-13). Still he doubts not that God is just, and although he cannot see how or when that justice can be manifested, he feels confident that his innocence must be recognized. Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him; He also will be my salvation" (xiii. 14, 16). There remains then but one course open to him, and that he takes. He turns to supplication, implores God to give him a fair and open trial (xiii. 18-28). Admitting his liability to such sins as are common to man, being maimed by birth (xiii. 25, iv. 4), he yet protests his substantial innocence, and in the bitter struggle with his misery, he first meets the thought which is afterwards developed with remarkable distinctness. Believing that with death all hope connected with this world ceases, he prays that he may be hidden in the grave (xiv. 13), and there reserved for the day when God will try his cause and manifest Him self in love (ver. 15). This prayer represents but a dim, yet a profound and true presentiment, drawn forth, then evidently for the first time, as the possible solution of the dark problem. As for a renewal of life hereafter, he dreams not of it (14), nor will he allow that the possible restoration or prosperity of his descendants at all meets the exigencies of his case (21, 22).

In the second discussion (xv.-xxi.) there is a more resolute elaborate attempt on the part of Job's friends to vindicate their theory of retributive justice. This requires an entire overthrow of the position taken by Job. They cannot admit his innocence. The fact that his "cities are unpolluted, proves to them that there must be something quite unique in his guilt. Eliphaz (c. xv.), who, as usual, lays down the basis of the argument, does not now hesitate to impugn to Job the worst crimes of which man could be guilty. His defense is blasphemous, and proves that he is quite godless; that he disregards the wisdom of age and experience, denies the fundamental truths of religion (19-161), and by his infamous strangle "the naked" against God deserves every calamity which can befall him systematized by Basildes, to the great scandal of the early Fathers. See Clem. Al. Strom. iv. p. 506.

a Thus Schottmann.

b It is curious that this theory was revived and Bildad (xviii.) takes up this suggestion of ungodliness, and after enlargeing upon the inevitable results of all iniquity, concludes that the special evils which had come upon Job, such as agony of heart, ruin of home, destruction of family, are peculiarly the penalties due to one who is without God. Zophar (xx.) draws the further inference that a sinner's sufferings must needs be proportioned to his former enjoyments (6-14), and his losses to his former gains (15-19), and thus not only accounts for Job's present calamities, but menaces him with still greater evils (20-24).

In answer Job recognizes the hand of God in his afflictions (xvi. 7-16, and xix. 6-20), but rejects the charge of ungodliness; he has never forsaken his Maker, and never ceased to pray. This being a matter of inward consciousness cannot of course be proved. He appeals therefore directly to earth and heaven: "My witness is in heaven, and my record is on high" (xvi. 19). The train of thought thus suggested carries him much farther in the way towards the great truth—that since in this life the righteous certainly are not saved from evil, it follows that their ways are watched and their sufferings recorded, with a view to a future and perfect manifestation of the divine justice. This view becomes gradually brighter and more definite as the controversy proceeds (xvi. 18, 19, xxii. 8, 9, and perhaps 13-16), and at last finds expression in a strong and clear declaration of his conviction that at the latter day (evidently that day which Job had expressed a longing to see, c. xiv. 12-14) God will personally manifest Himself, and that he, Job, will then see him, in his body, with his own eyes, and notwithstanding the destruction of his skin, i.e., the outward man, retaining or recovering his personal identity (xix. 25-27). There can be no doubt that Job here virtually anticipates the final answer to all difficulties supplied by the Christian revelation.

On the other hand, stung by the harsh and narrow-minded bigotry of his opponents, Job draws out (xxii.) with terrible force the undeniable fact, that from the beginning to the end of their lives unjustly men, avowed atheists (xx. 14, 15), persons, in fact, guilty of the very crimes imputed, out of more conjecture, to himself, frequently enjoy great and unbroken prosperity. From this he draws the inference, which he states in a very unguarded manner, and in a tone calculated to give just offense, that an impenetrable veil hangs over the temporal dispensations of God.

In the third dialogue (xxii.-xxvii.) no real progress is made by Job's opponents. They will not give up and cannot defend their position. Eliphaz (xxii.) makes a fast effort, and raises one new point which he states with some ingenuity. The station in which Job was formerly placed presented temptations to certain crimes; the punishments which he undergoes are precisely such as might be expected had those crimes been committed; hence he infers they actually were committed. The tone of this discourse thoroughly harmonizes with the character of Eliphaz. He could scarcely come to a different conclusion without surrendering his fundamental principles, and he urges with much dignity and impressiveness the exhortations and warnings which in his opinion were needed. Bildad has nothing to say in this section. He only repeats the insensible majesty of God and the nothingness of man. Zophar, the most violent and least rational of the three, is put to silence, and retires from the contest.

In his two last discourses Job does not alter his position, nor, properly speaking, adduce any new argument, but he states with incomparable force and eloquence the chief points which he regards as established (c. xxviii.). All creation is conditioned by the majesty and might of God; man catches but a faint echo of God's word, and is baffled in the attempt to comprehend his ways. He then (c. xxviii.) describes even more completely than his opponents had done d the destruction which, as a rule, ultimately falls upon the hypocrite, and which he certainly would deserve if he were hypocritically to disguise the truth concerning himself, and deny his own integrity. He thus recognizes what was true in his opponent's arguments, and corrects his own hasty and unguarded statements. Then follows (xxviii.) the grand description of Wisdom, and the declaration that human wisdom does not consist in exploring the hidden and inscrutable ways of God, but in the fear of the Lord, and in turning away from evil. The remainder of this discourse (xxix.-xxxii.) contains a singularly beautiful description of his former life, contrasted with his actual misery, together with a full vindication of his character from all the charges made or insinuated by his opponents.

3. Thus ends the discussion, in which it is evident both parties had partially failed. Job has been betrayed into very hazardous statements, while his friends had been on the one hand disingenuous, on the other bigoted, harsh, and pitiless. The points which had been omitted, or imperfectly developed, are now taken up by a new interlocutor (xxxii.-xxxviii.). Elihu, a young man, descended from a collateral branch of the family of Abraham, has listened in indifferent silence to the arguments of his elders (xxxii. 7), and, impelled by an inward inspiration, he now addresses himself to both parties in the discussion, and specially to Job. He shows, 1. that they had accused Job upon false or insuffi- cient grounds, and failed to convict him, or to vindicate God's justice. Job again had assumed his entire innocence, and had arraigned that justice (xxxii. 9-11). These errors he traces to their own over-weighing one main object of all suffering. God speaks to man by chastisement (14, 19-22) warns him, teaches him self-knowledge and humility

\( a \) This gradual and progressive development was perhaps first brought out distinctly by Ewald.

\( b \) מְזַלְצָל, lit. "from my flesh," may mean in the body, or out of the body. Each rendering is equally tenable on grammatical grounds; but the specification of the time (יחצִייאז) and the place (ףִּיַּאֹל) requires a personal manifestation of God, and a personal recognition on the part of Job. Complete personality in the mind of the ancients implies living body.
Job 18, 17 — and prepares him (23) by the mediation of a spiritual interpreter (the angel Jehovah a of Genesis) to inquire and to obtain pardon (24), renewal of life (25), perfect access and restoration (26). This statement does not involve any charge of special guilt, such as the friends had alleged and Job had repudiated. Since the warning and suffering are preventive, as well as remedial, the visitation anticipates the commission of sin; it saves man from pride, and other temptations of wealth and power, and it effects the real object of all divine interpositions, the entire submission to God's will. Again, the passage (xxxv. 10–17) that any charge of injustice, direct or implicit, against God involves a contradiction in terms. God is the only source of justice; the very idea of justice is derived from his governance of the universe, the principle of which is love. In his absolute knowledge God sees all secrets, and by his absolute power he controls all events, and that, for the one end of bringing righteousness to light (21–30). Man has of course no knowledge of his own heart, but he perceives it as a matter of grace (xxxv. 6–9). The occasional appearance of unanswered prayer (9), when evil seems to get the upper hand, is owing merely to the fact that man prays in a proud and insolent spirit (12, 13). Job may look to his heart, and he will see if that is true of himself.

Job is silent, and Elihu proceeds (xxxv.) to show that the Almighty of God is not, as Job seems to assert, associated with any contempt or neglect of his creatures. Job, by ignoring this truth, has been led into grave error, and terrible danger (12; cf. 18), but God is still drawing him, and if he yields and follows he will yet be delivered. The rest of the discourse brings out forcibly the lessons taught by the manifestations of God, as well as greatness in creation. Indeed, the great object of all natural phenomena is to teach men — " who teacheth like Him? " This part differs from Job's magnificent description of the mystery and majesty of God's works, insasmuch as it indicates a clearer recognition of a loving purpose — and from the address of the Lord which follows, by its discursive and argumentative tone. The last words are evidently spoken while a violent storm is coming on; in Job, Elihu elicits a sign of Theophany, which cannot fail to produce an intense realization of the nothingness of man before God.

4. From the preceding analysis it is obvious that many weighty truths have been developed in the course of the discussion — nearly every theory of the objects and uses of suffering has been reviewed — while a great advance has been made towards the apprehension of doctrines hereafter to be revealed, such as were known only to God. But the mystery is not as yet really cleared up. The position of the three original opponents is shown to be untenable — the views of Job himself to be but imperfect — while even Elihu gives not the least intimation that he recognizes one special object of calamity. In the case of Job, as we are expressly told, that object was to try his sincerity, and to demonstrate that goodness, integrity in all relations, and devout faith in God, can exist independent of external circumstances. [See addition, Amer. ed.] This object never occurs to the mind of any one of the interlocutors, nor could it be proved without a revelation. On the other hand, the exact amount of censure due to Job for the excesses into which he had been betrayed, and to his three opponents for their harshness and want of caution, could only be awarded by an omniscient Judge. Hence the necessity for the Theophany — from the midst of the storm Jehovah speaks. In language of incomparable grandeur He reproves and silences the murmurs of Job. God does not confound, strictly speaking, to argue with his creatures. The speculative questions discussed in the colloquy are unnoticed, but the declaration of God's absolute power is illustrated by a marvellously beautiful and comprehensive survey of the glory of creation, and his all-embracing Providence by reference to the phenomena of the animal kingdom, which would argue, if anything, that He understands at least the objects for which instincts so strange and manifold are given to the beings far below man in gifts and powers. This declaration suffices to bring Job to a right mind: he confesses his inability to comprehend, and therefore to answer his Maker (xl. 3, 4). A second address completes the work. It proves that a charge of injustice against God involves the consequence that the accuser is more competent than He to rule the universe. He should then be able to control, to punish, to reduce all creatures to order — but he cannot even subdue the monsters of the irrational creation. Buffeted by levitation and bemoaneth, how can he hold the reins of government, how contend with Him who made and rules them all?

5. Job's unreserved submission terminates the trial. He expresses deep contrition, not of course for sins falsely imputed to him, but for the bitterness and arrogance which had characterized some portions of his complaints. In the rebuke then addressed to Job's opponents the integrity of his character is distinctly recognized, while they are condemned for untruth, which, insasmuch as it was not willful, but proceeded from a real but narrow-minded estimate of the divine justice, is pardoned on the intercession of Job. The rebuke confirms an external prosperity, which is an inevitable result of God's personal manifestation, symbolizes the ultimate compensation of the righteous for all sufferings undergone upon earth.

From this analysis it seems clear that certain views concerning the general object of the book are partial or erroneous. It cannot be the object of the writer to prove that there is no connection between guilt and sorrow, or that the old orthodox doctrine of retribution was radically unsound. Job himself recognizes the general truth of the doctrine, which is in fact confirmed by his ultimate restoration to happiness. Nor is the development of the great doctrine of a future state the primary object.

a Tims A. Schultens. There can be no doubt that "angel," not "messenger," is the true translation, nor that the angel, the one of a thousand, is the רְאוֹּלָן־גָּאוֹן of Genesis.

b This bearing of the statement upon the whole argument is satisfactorily shown by Hahn (Introduction to Job, p. 4), and by Schloßmann in his commentary on the passage (p. 458).

c This is the strangely exaggerated form in which Mr. Froude represents the views of Ewald. Nothing can be more contrary to the whole tenor of the book.

d See Ewald's remarks in his Jahrb., 1858, p. 33. The notion that Job is a type of the Hebrew nation in their sufferings, and that the book was written to console them in their exile, held by Clermont-Ganneau, is generally rejected. See Rosemauller, pp. 13-16.

e Ewald's theory, on which Schloßmann has some excellent observations (p. 45).
It would not in that case have been passed over in Job's last discourse in the speech of Elihu, or in the blessing of the Lord God. In fact, critics who hold that view admit that the doctrine is rather suggested than developed, and amounts to scarcely more than a wish, a presentiment, at the most a subjective conviction of a truth first fully revealed by Him — who brought life and immortality to light. The great object must surely be that which is distinctly intimated in the introduction, and confirmed in the conclusion, to show the objects of calamity in its worst and most awful form upon a truly religious spirit. Job is no Stoic, no Titan (Ewald, p. 24), struggling rebelliously against God; nor Prometheus, victim of a jealous and unrelenting Deity: he is a suffering man, acutely sensitive to all impressions inward and outward, grieved by the loss of wealth, position, domestic happiness, the respect of his countrymen, dependents, and followers, tortured by a homesickness and all but unendurable disease, and stung to an agony of grief and passion by the insinuations of conscious guilt and hypocrisy. Under such provocation, being wholly without a clue to the cause of his misery, and hopeless of restoration to happiness on earth, he is shaken to the utmost, and driven almost to desperation. Still in the centre of his being he remains firm — with an interest concerning the success of his own integrity — without a doubt as to the power, wisdom, truth, or absolute justice of God, and therefore awaiting with longing expectation the final judgment which he is assured must come and bring him deliverance. The representation of such a character, involving the discomfiture of man's great enemy, and the development of the manifold problems which such a spectacle suggests to men of imperfect knowledge, but thoughtful and inquiring minds, is the true object of the writer, who, like all great spirits of the ancient world, dealt less with abstract propositions than with the objective realities of existence. Such is the impression naturally made by the book, and which is recognized more distinctly in proportion as the reader grasps the tenor of the arguments, and realizes the character and events. [See appendix to the text.]

11. Integrity of the book. — It is satisfactory to find that the arguments employed by those who impugn the authenticity of considerable portions of this book are for the most part mutually destructive, and that the most minute and searching investigations bring out the most convincing proofs of the unity of its composition, and the coherence of its constituent parts. One point of great importance is noted by the latest and one of the most ingenious writers (M. E. Renan, Le Livre de Job, Paris, 1853) on this subject. After some strong remarks upon the inequality of the style, and appearance of interpolation, M. E. Renan observes (p. xiv.): — The Hebrews, and Orientalists in general, differed widely from us in their views about composition. Their works never lack that perfectly defined outline to which we are accustomed, and we should be careful not to assume interpolations or alterations (retoches) when we meet with defects of sequence which surprise us." He then shows that in parts of the work, acknowledged by all critics to be by one hand, there are very strong instances of what Europeans might regard as repetition, or suspect of interpolation; thus Elihu recommences his argument four times; while discourses of Job which have distinct portions, such as, to modern critics might seem unconnected and even misplaced, are impressed with such a character of sublimity and force as to leave no doubt that they are the product of a single inspiration. To this just and true observation it must be added that the assumed want of coherence and of logical consistency is for the most part only apparent, and results from a radical difference in the mode of thinking and4 conceiving thought between the old Eastern and modern European.

Four parts of the book have been most generally attacked. Objections have been made to the introductory and concluding chapters (1) on account of the style. Of course there is an obvious and natural difference between the prose of the narrative and the highly poetical language of the colloquy. Yet the best critics now acknowledge that the style of these portions is quite as genuine in its simple and severe grandeur as that of the Pentateuch itself (to which it bears a striking resemblance), or as any other part of this book, while it is as strikingly unlike the narrative style of all the later productions of the Hebrews. Ewald says with perfect truth, "these proaic words harmonize thoroughly with the old poem in subject-matter and thoughts, in coloring and in art, also in language, so far as prose can be like poetry." It is said again that the doctrinal views are not in harmony with those of Job. This is wholly unfounded. The fundamental principles of the patriarch, as developed in the most solemn of his discourses, are identical with those maintained throughout the whole. The form of worship belongs essentially to the early patriarchal type; with little of ceremonial ritual, without the angelic and inart, wholly domestic in form and spirit. The representation of the angels, and their apellation, "sons of God," peculiar to this book and to Genesis, accord entirely with the intimations in the earliest documents of the Semitic race. It is moreover alleged that there are discrepancies between the facts related in the introduction, and statements or allusions in the dialogue. But the apparent contradiction between xix. 17 and the statement that all Job's children had perished, rests upon a misinterpretation of the words "founs of my womb," i.e. "of the womb that bare me" — "my brethren," not "my children" (cf. xxii. 10): indeed the destruction of the patriarch's whole family is repeatedly assumed in the dialogue (v. viii. 4, xxix. 5). Again, the omission of all reference to the — that the MSS. must have been very good — the verbal connection is accurate — and emendations unnecessary (see p. 63). M. Renan asserts, "Vers antiquis most perfecti sunt et parvis manu et patris penu sub-perscrvanda, dum un it fort miserabile et moele en pluribus endrota" (p. 1x3.

defeat of Satan in the last chapter is quite in accordance with the grand simplicity of the poem (Schloßmann, pp. 30, 40). It was too obvious a result to need special notice, and it had in fact been accomplished by the steadfast faith of the patriarch even before the discussions commenced. No allusion to the agency of that spirit was to be expected in the colloquy, since Job and his friends are represented as wholly ignorant of the transactions in heaven. At present, indeed, it is generally acknowledged that the entire work would be unintelligible without these portions.

2. Strong objections are made to the passage xxvii. from ver. 7 to the end of the chapter. Here Job describes the ultimate fate of the godless hypocrite in terms which some critics hold to be in direct contradiction to the whole tenor of his arguments in other discsourses. Dr. Kennicott, whose opinion is adopted by Eliechorn, Froude, and others, held that, owing to some confusion or omission in the MS., the missing speech of Zophar has been put into the mouth of Job. The fact of the contradiction is denied by able writers, who have shown that it rests upon a misapprehension of the patriarch's character and fundamental principles. He had been provoked, under circumstances of peculiar aggravation, into statements which at the close of the discussion he would be anxious to guard or recall: he was bound, having spoken so harshly, to recognize, what beyond doubt he never intended to deny, the general justice of divine dispensations even in this world. Moreover he intimates a belief or presentiment of a future retribution, of which there are no indications in any other speaker (see ver. 8). The whole chapter is thoroughly colored: the first part is admitted by all to belong to Job; nor can the rest be disjoined from it without injury to the sense. Ewald says, "only a grievous misunderstanding of the whole book could have misled the modern critics who hold that this passage is interpolated or misplaced." Other critics have abundantly vindicated the authenticity of the passage (Hahn, Schlottmann, etc.). As for the style, E. Renan, a most competent and critical critic, declares that "it is one of the finest developments of the poem. It certainly differs exceedingly in its breadth, loftiness, and devout spirit, from the speeches of Zophar, for whose silence satisfactory reasons have been already assigned (see the analysis).

3. The last two chapters of the address of the Almighty have been rejected as interpolations by many of course rationalistic writers (Stuhlhmann, Herstein, Eliechorn, Ewald, Meier): partly because of an alleged inferiority of style; partly as not having any bearing upon the argument; but the connection of reasoning, involved, though, as was to be expected, not drawn out in this discourse, has been shown in the preceding analysis: and as for the style, few who have a true ear for the resonant gracefulness of ancient Hebrew poetry will dissent from the judgment of E. Renan, whose suggestion, that it may have been written by the same author at a later date, is far from weakening the force of his observation as to the identity of the style.

4. The speech of Elihu presents greater difficulties, and has been rejected by several rationalists, whose view is contested not only by orthodox writers, but by some of the most sceptical commentators. The former support their decision chiefly on the manifest, and to a certain extent the real, difference between this and other parts of the book in tone of thought, in doctrinal views, and more positively in language and general style. Much stress also is laid upon the facts that Elihu is not mentioned in the introduction nor at the end, and that his speech is unanswered by Job, and unnoticed in the final address of the Almighty. These points were observed by very early writers, and were accounted for in various ways. On the one hand, Elihu was regarded as a specially inspired person (Schloßmann, p. 58). In the Seder Olam (a rabbinical system of chronology) he is reckoned among the prophets who declare the will of God to the Gentiles before the promulgation of the law. S. Bar Nachman (12th century) notes his connection with the family of Abraham as a sign that he was the fittest person to expound the ways of the God. The Greek Fathers generally follow Chrysostom in attributing to him a superior intellect; while many of the best critics of the two last centuries consider that the true dialectic solution of the great problems discussed in the book is to be found in his discourse. On the other hand, Jerome, who is followed by Gregory, and many ancient as well as modern writers of the Western Church, speak of his character and arguments with singular contempt. Later critics, chiefly rationalists, see in him but an empty babbler, introduced only to heighten by contrast the effect of the last solemn and dignified discourse of Job. The alternative of rejecting his speech as an interpolation was scarcely less objectionable and has been preferred by Stuhlmann, Bernstein, Ewald, Renan, and other writers of similar opinions in our country. A candid and searching examination, however, leads to a different conclusion. It is proved (see Schlottmann, Einl. p. 55) that there is a close internal connection between this and other parts of the book; there are references to numerous passages in the discourses of Job and his friends; so covert as to be discovered by close inquiry; yet, when pointed out, so striking and natural as to leave no room for doubt. Elihu supplies exactly what Job repeatedly demands — a confirmation of his opinions, not merely produced by an overwhelming display of divine power, but by rational and human arguments, and proceeding from one, not like his other opponents bigoted or hypercritical, but upright, candid, and truthful (comp. xxxiii. 3 with vi. 24, 25). The reasons of Eilhin are, moreover, such as are needed for the development of the doctrines inculcated in the book, while they are necessarily cast in a form which could not with impunity be ascribed to the Almighty. As to the objection that the doctrinal system of Eilhin is in some points more advanced than that of Job or his friends, it may be answered, first, that there are no traces in this discourse of certain doctrines which were undoubtedly known at the earliest date to which those critics would assign the interpretation; whereas it is evident that if known they would have been advanced as the very strongest arguments for a warning and consolation. No reader of the Psalms and of the prophets could have failed to urge such topics as the resurrection, the future judgment, and the personal advent of Messiah. Secondly, the doctrinal system of Eilhin differs rather in degree than in kind from that which has been either developed or intimated in several passages of the work, and consists chiefly in the speculative application of the modi­datory theory, not unknown to Job, and in a deeper appreciation of the love manifested in all providential dispensations. It is quite consistent with the plan of the writer, and with the admirable skill shown in the arrangement of the whole work, that the highest view as to the object of afflictions, and to the source to which men should apply for comfort and instruction, should be reserved for this, which, so far as regards the human reasoner, is the culminating point of the discussion. Little can be said for Lightfoot's theory, that the whole work was composed by Eilhin; or for E. Renan's conjecture that this discourse may have been composed by the author in his old age: yet these views imply an unconscious impression that Eilhin is the fullest exponent of the truth. It is satisfactory to know that two1 of the most impartial and discerning critics, who unite in denying this to be an original and integral portion of the work, fully acknowledge its intrinsic excellence and beauty.

There is no difficulty in accounting for the omission of Eilhin's name in the introduction. No persons are named in the book until they appear as agents, or as otherwise concerned in the events. Thus Job's brethren are named incidentally in one of his speeches, and his relations make their first appearance at the time in the concluding chapter. Had Eilhin been mentioned at first, we should of course have expected him to take part in the discussion, and the impression made by his startling address would have been lost. Job does not answer him, nor indeed could he deny the cogency of his arguments; while this silence brings out a curious point of coincidence with a previous declaration of the patriarch (vi. 24, 25). Again, the discourse between Eilhin finally true did not meet correction, and is therefore left unnoticed in the final decision of the Almighty. Nothing indeed could be more in harmony with the ancient traditions of the East than that a youth moved by a special and supernatural impulse to speak out God's truth in the presence of his elders, should return to obscurity by what he had accomplished. More weight is to be attached to the objection resting upon diversity of style, and dialectic peculiarities. The most acute critics differ indeed in their estimate of both, and are often grossly deceived (see Schlottmann, p. 61), still there can be little doubt as to the fact. It may be accounted for either on the supposition that the author adhered strictly to the form in which he had handed down the dialogue; in which case the speech of a Syrian might be expected to bear traces of his dialect; or that the Chaldaic forms and idioms, which are far from resembling later vulgarisms or corruptions of Hebrew, and occur only in highly poetic passages of the oldest writers, are such as pecu­liarly suit the style of the young and fiery speaker (see Schlottmann, Eidel. p. 61). It has been observed that none of the other interlocutors have each a very distinct and characteristic coloring, shown not only in the general tone of thought, but in peculiarities of expression (Ewald and Schlottmann). The excessive obscurity of the style, which is universally admitted, may be accounted for in a similar man­ner. A young man speaking under strong excite­ment, embarrassed by the presence of his elders, and by the peculiar responsibility of his position, might be expected to use language Obscured by repetitions: and, though ingenious and true, yet somewhat intricate and imperfectly developed arguments; such as in fact present great difficulties in the excess of this portion of the book.

III. Historical Character of the Work. — Three distinct theories have been maintained at various times — some believing the book to be strictly historical; others a religious fiction; others a composition based upon facts. Until a comparatively late time the prevalent opinion was, not only that the persons and events which it describes are real, but that the very words of the speakers were accurately recorded. It was supposed either that Job himself employed the later years of his life in writing it (A. Schultens), or that at a very early age some inspired and sagacious collector of the facts faithfully preserved by oral tradition, and presented them to his countrymen in their own tongue. By some the authorship of the work was attributed to Moses; by others it was believed (and this theory has lately been sustained with much ingenuity) that Moses became acquainted with the documents during his residence in Medinah, and that he added the introductory and concluding chapters.

The fact of Job's existence, and the substantial truth of the narrative, were not likely to be denied

3 Page 98. This implies, at any rate, that in his opinion there is no absolute incompatibility between the historical part of the book and the parts of style or thought. The conjecture is a striking instance of ins­sistency in a very dogmatic writer.

4 Ewald and Renan. Ewald says: "The thoughts

5 In this speech are in themselves exceedingly pure and true, conceived with greater depth, and presented with more force than in the rest of the book." (p. 320).

6 This seems a sufficient answer to an objection more likely to occur to a modern European than to a Hebrew.

7 Sticker supposes that the Aramaic forms were intentionally introduced by the author on account of the Syrian descent of Eilhin.

8 By Dr. Lee: see his Introduction. He accounts thus for the use of the name מְלֹאכָה, found, with one exception, only in these chapters.
by Hebrews or Christians, considering the term in which the patriarch is named in the 14th of Exe-kilo and in the Epistle of St. James (ver. 11). It seemed to early writers incompatible with any idea of inspiration to assume that a narrative, certainly not legendary, should be a mere fiction; and consequent to suppose that the Almonight would be in-introduced as a speaker in an imaginary coloquy.
In the East numerous traditions (Ewald, pp. 17, 18; see D'Herbolot, s. v. Agimub) about the patriarch and his family show the deep impression made by his character and calamities: these traditions may possibly have been derived from the book itself; but it is at least equally probable that they had an independent origin. We are led to the same conclusion by the soundest principles of criticism.
Ewald says (Fuld, p. 15) most truly, "The invention of a history without foundation in facts — the creation of a person, represented as having a real historical existence, out of the mere head of the poet — is a notion so entirely alien to the spirit of all antiquity, that it only began to develop itself gradually in the latest epoch of the Literature of any ancient people, and in its complete form belongs only to the most modern times." In the canonical books there is not a trace of any such invention.
Of all people the Hebrews were the least likely to mingle the mere creations of imagination with the sacred records revered as the peculiar glory of their race.

This principle is corroborated by special arguments. It is, to say the least, highly improbable that a Hebrew, had he invented such a character as that of Job, should have represented him as belonging to a race which, though descended from a common ancestor, was never on friendly, and generally on hostile, terms with his own people.
Uz, the residence of Job, is in no way associated with Israelish history, and, apart from the patriarch's own history, would have no interest for a Hebrew. The names of most persons introduced have no meaning connected with the part attributed to them in the narrative. The name of Job himself is but an apparent exception. According to most critics בִּנְיָם is derived from בָּנָי influence, and means "crucially or hostilely treated." According to others (Ewald and Rosenmüller) of high authority it may signify a "true penitent," corresponding to אֵין אוב, so applied to Job, and evidently with reference to his name, in the Koran (Sur. 38, 44). In either case the name would give but a very partial view, and would indeed fail to represent the central principle of the patriarch's heroi character. It is concluded far from improbable that the name previously borne by the hero may have been changed in commemoration of the Forbade as these arguments may appear, many critics have adopted the opinion either that the whole work is a moral or religious apologue, or that, upon a substratum of a few rudimental facts preserved by tradition, the genius of an original thinker has raised this, the most remarkable monument of the Semitic mind. The first indications of this opinion are found in the Talmud (Baba Batra, i. 14). In a discussion upon the age of this book, while the Rabbis in general maintain its historical character, Samuel Bar Nachman declares his conviction—an Job did not exist, and was not a created man, but the work is a parable.

"Hai Gam, A. d. 1000, who is followed by Jaradi, alters this passage to—"Job existed and was created to become a parable." They had evidently no critical ground for the change, but bore witness to the prevalent tradition of the Hebrews. Maimonides (Mevorah Nevehkiah, iii. 22), with his characteristic freedom of mind, considers it an open question of little or no moment to the real value of the inspired book. Balbag, i. e. R. Levi Ben Gershom, treats it as a philosophic work. A late Hebrew commentator, Sinucha Arieh (Schloottmann, p. 4), denies the historical truth of the narrative, on the ground that it is incredible the patriarchs of the chosen race should be surpised in goodness by a child of Edom. This is worth noting in corroboratation of the argument that such a fact was not likely to have been invented by an Israelite of any age.

Luther first suggested the theory which, in some form or other, is now most generally received. In his introduction to the first edition of his translation of the Bible, he speaks of the author as having so treated the historical facts as to demonstrate the truth that God alone is righteous — and in the Tischendorf (ed. Welch, tom. xxii. p. 2034), he says, "I look upon the book of Job as a true history, yet I do not believe that all took place just as it is written, but that an ingenious, pious, and learned man brought it into its present form." This position was strongly attacked by Bellarmine, and other Roman theologians, and was afterwards repudiated by himself. The fact that Spinoza, Clericus (Le Clerc), Du Pin, and Father Simon, held nearly the same opinion, the first denying, and the others notoriously holding low views of the inspiration of Scripture, had of course a tendency to bring it into disrepute. J. D. Michaelis first revived the old theory of Bar Nachman, not upon critical but dogmatic grounds. In a more recent history, the opinions or doctrines enunciated by Job and his friends could have no dramatic authority; whereas if the whole book were a pure inspiration, the strongest arguments could be deduced from them on behalf of the great truths of the resurrection and a future judgment, which, though implied in other early books, are nowhere so distinctly inculcated. The arbitrary character of such reasoning is obvious. At present no critic doubts that the narrative is founded upon facts, although the present opinions among continental scholars is certainly that in its form and general features, in its reasonings and representations of character, the book is a work of creative genius.

The question, however, cannot be settled, nor indeed thoroughly understood, without reference to other arguments by which critics have endeavored to determine the date at which the work was completed in its present form, and the circumstances under which it was composed. We proceed, therefore, to these arguments.

IV. The probable Age, Country, and Position of the Author.—The language alone does not, as some have asserted, supply any decisive test as to the date of the composition. Critics of the last century generally adopted the opinion of A. Schultens (Proef. ad librum Jobis), who considered that the indications of external influences were best accounted for on the supposition that the book was written at a very early period, before the different branches of the Semitic race had completely formed their distinct dialects. The fact that the language of this work approaches far more nearly to the Arabic than any other Hebrew production was remarked by Jerome and is recognized by the soundest critics. On the other hand, there are undoubtedly many Aramaic words, and grammatical forms, which some critics have regarded as a strong proof that the writers must have lived during, or even after the Captivity. At present this hypothesis is universally given up as untenable. It is proved (Evall, Renan, Schloottmann, and Kosegarten) that there is a radical difference between the Aramaisms of the later Hebrew writings and those found in the book of Job. These latter are, without an exception, such as characterize the antique and highly poetic style; they occur in parts of the Talmud, in the Song of Deborah, in the earliest Psalms, and the Song of Solomon, all of which are now admitted even by the ablest rationalistic critics to be among the earliest and purest productions of Hebrew literature. So far as any argument can be drawn from idiomatic peculiarities, it may be regarded as a settled point that the book was written long before the exile (see some good observations by Havernick, p. 209, etc.); while there is absolutely nothing to prove a later date than the Pentateuch, or even those parts of the Pentateuch which appear to belong to the patriarchal age.

This impression is borne out by the style. All critics have recognized its grand archaic character. Firm, compact, sonorous as the ring of a pure metal, severe and at times rugged, yet always dignified and majestic, the language belongs altogether to a period when thought was slow, but profound and intensely concentrated, when the weighty and oracular sayings of the wise were wont to be engraved upon rocks with a pen of iron and in characters of metal lead (see xix. 24). It is truly a lapidary style, such as was natural only in an age when writing, though known, was rarely used, before language had acquired so much freshness, fluency, and beauty, or gained the qualities of its freshness and native force. Much stress has been laid upon the fact such as could only proceed from a vain and ignominous Heathen. Even Ezra, among the Jews, maintained the same position.

b Renan's good taste and candor here, as elsewhere, neutralize his rationalistic tendency. In the Histories of Jews (Kronikynen der Juden, 1857), he held that the Aramaisms indicate a very late date; in the preface to Job he has adopted the opinion here expressed.
that the book bears a closer resemblance to the Proverbs of Solomon than to any other Hebrew work (see especially Rosenmuller, Prolz. p. 38).
This is true to a remarkable extent with regard to the thoughts, words, and forms of expression, while the style which is somewhat diffuse and strongly marked, is almost identical. Hence it has been inferred that the composition belongs to the Solomonic era, or to the period between Solomon and Hezekiah, by whose orders, as we are expressly informed, a great part of the book of Proverbs was compiled. But the argument loses much of its force when we consider that Solomon did not merely rewrite the proverbs, but felt himself inspired by the most ancient and curious sayings of olden times, not only of the Hebrews, but probably of other nations with whom he had extensive intercourse, and in whose philosophy he is supposed, not without good reason, to have taken deep interest, even to the detriment of his religious principles (see Renan's Job, p. xxiii.);
while those proverbs which he invented himself would as a matter of course be cast in the same mold as that in which he had been born in mundane character.
Again, there can be little doubt that the passages in which the resemblance is most complete and striking, were taken from one book by the author of the other, and adapted, according to a Hebrew custom common among the prophets, to the special purposes of his work. On comparing these passages, it seems impossible to deny that they belonged in the first instance to the book of Job,9 where they are in thorough harmony with the tenor of the argument, and have all the characteristics of the author's genius. Taking the resem-bance as a fact, we are entitled to conclude that we have in Job a composition not later than the most ancient proverbs, and certainly of much earlier date than the entire book.

The extent to which the influence of this book is perceptible in the later literature of the Hebrews is a subject of great interest; and importance; but it has not yet been thoroughly investigated.
Hilvernick has a few good remarks in his general
Introduction to the Old Testament, § 30. Dr. Lee (Introd. section vii.) has led the way to a more complete and searching inquiry by a close examination of five chapters, in which he produces a vast number of parallel passages from the Pentateuch (where they are in thorough harmony with the proverbs, and which he concludes with an introduction, and of a later date than the rest of the book), from Ruth, Samuel, the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Micah, and Nahum, all of which are probably,
and some of them demonstrably, copied from Job.

a Each verse, with very few exceptions, consists of two parallel members, and each member of three words: when that number is exceeded, it is owing to the particles or subordinate words, which are almost always so combined as to leave only three tones in each member (Schloottmann, p. 68).

b See Rosenmuller, Prolz. p. 40. Even Renan, who believes that Job was written after the time of Solomon, holds that the description of Wisdom (ch. xxviii.)
is the original source of the idea which we find in the Proverbs (chs. viii., ix.).

3 This is true of the Greek dramatists, and of the greatest original writers of our own, and indeed of 4 In fact, scarcely one work of fiction exists in which the arching criticism does not detect anachronisms or inconsistencies.

5 See Renan, p. xvi. It should be noted that even especially in those of the post-Davidic age, occurs only or no allusions to those institutions or events. The statement is inaccurate. In each of the books spec.

ified there are abundant traces of the Law. It was not to be expected that a complete view of the Levitical rites, or of historical facts unconnected with the subject-matter of those works, could be derived from them; but they abound in allusions to customs and notions peculiar to the Hebrews trained under the Law, to the services of the Tabernacle or Temple, and they all recognize most distinctly the existence of a sacerdotal system, whereas our author ignores, and therefore, as we may reasonably conclude, was unacquainted with any forms of religious service, save those of the patriarchal age.

Ewald, whose judgment in this case will not be questioned,5 asserts very positively that in all the descriptions of manners and customs, domestic, social, and political, and even in the indirect allusions and illustrations, the genuine coloring of the age of Job, that is of the period between Abraham and Moses, is very faithfully observed; that all historical examples and allusions are taken exclusively from patriarchal times, and that there is a complete and successful avoidance of direct reference to later occurrences,6 which in his opinion may have been known to the writer. All critics concur in extolling the fresh, antique simplicity of manners described in this book, the genuine air of the wild, free, vigorous life of the desert, the stamp of hearth and family, and the thorough consistency in the development of characters, equally remarkable for originality and force. There is an absolute contrast between the manners, thoughts, and feelings, and those which characterized the Israelites during the monarchical period; while whatever difference exists between the customs of the older patriarchs as described in Genesis and those of Job's family and associates, is accounted for by the progress of events in the intervening period. The chieftain lives in considerable splendor and dignity; menial offices, such as commonly devolved upon the elder patriarchs and their children, are now performed by servants, between whom and the family the distinction appears to be more strongly marked. Job visits the city frequently, and is there received with high respect as a prince, judge, and distinguished warrior. There are no courts of judicature, written indictments,7 and regular forms of procedure (xiii. 26, and xxxi. 28). Men had begun to observe and reason upon the phenomena of nature, and astronomical observations were made with curious speculations upon primeval traditions. We read (xx. 13, xxi. 10, xvii. 16, 17, xviii. 1-21) of mining operations, great buildings, ruined sepulchres, perhaps even of sculptured figures of the dead,8 and there are throughout copious allusions to the natural productions and the arts of Egypt. Great revolutions had occurred within the time of the writer; nations once independent had been overthrown, and whole races reduced to a state of misery and degradation. All this might be expected, even supposing the work to have been written before or near the date of the Exodus. The communications with Egypt were frequent, and indeed uninterrupted during the patriarchal age, and in that country each one of the customs upon which most reliance is placed as indicating a later date in now proved to have been common long before the age of Moses (see Lepinus, Schlottmann, p. 107). Moreover, there is sufficient reason to believe that under favorable circumstances a descendant of Abraham, who was himself a warrior, and accustomed to meet princes on terms of equality, would at a very early age acquire the habits, position, and knowledge which we admire in Job. He was the head of a great family, successful in war, prosperous in peace, supplied abundantly with the necessaries of life, and enjoying many of its luxuries; he lived near the great cities on the Euphrates and Tigris, and on the route of the caravans which at the remotest periods exchanged the productions of Egypt and the far East, and had therefore abundant opportunities of procuring information from those merchants, supposing that he did not himself visit a country so full of interest to a thoughtful mind.

Such a progress in civilization may or may not be admitted by historical critics to be probable within the limits of time thus indicated, but no positive historical fact or allusion can be produced from the book to prove that it could not have been written before the time of Moses. The single objection (Erenan, p. 40) which presents any difficulty is the mention of the Cabirians in the introductory chapter. It is certain that they appear first in Hebrew history about the year c. 770. But the name of Chesed, the ancestor of the race, is found in the genealogical table in Genesis (xxii. 22), a fact quite sufficient to prove the early existence of the people as a separate tribe. It is highly probable that an ancient race bearing that name in Usuristan (see Xenoph. Cyrr. iii. 1, § 34; Jerub. p. 222, 5) which still appears in the courts of that nation, who were there trained in predaceous habits, and accustomed, long before their appearance in history, to make excursions into the neighboring deserts;9 a view quite in harmony with the part assigned to them in this book.

The arguments which have induced the generality of modern critics to assign a later date to this book, notwithstanding their concurrence in most of the points and principles which we have just considered,

5 Known in Egypt at an early period (Diod. Sic. i. p. 75).
6 Ch. xxi. 22. The interpretation is very doubtful.
7 The remarkable treatise by Chwolson, Uber die Vorschriften des Babyloni schen Rechts in Arabischen Abhandlungen, proves an advance in mental cultivation in those regions at a far older age, more than sufficient to answer every objection of this nature.
8 This is now generally admitted. See M. Renan, Histoire Generale des Langues Semitiques, ed. 1858, p. 56. He says truly that they were "redoutes dans tout l'Orient pour leurs brigandages" (p. 65). See also Chwolson, Die Schabir, vol. i. p. 322. Of the Chaldeans was undoubtedly so named because it was founded or occupied by that people.
may be reduced to two heads, which we will now anteriorly—:

1. We are told that the doctrinal system is considerably in advance of the Mosaic; in fact, that it is the result of a recoil from the stern, narrow dogmatism of the Pentateuch. Here of course there can be no common ground between those who admit, and those who secretly or openly deny the authenticity and inspiration of the Mosaic writings. Still even rationalistic criticism cannot show, what it so confidently assumes, that there is a demonstrable difference in any essential point between the principles recognized in Genesis and those of our author. The absence of all recognition of the peculiar views and institutions first introduced or developed in the Law has been already shown to be an evidence of an earlier date—all that is really proved is that the elementary truths of primeval revelation are represented, and their consequences developed under a great variety of striking and original forms—a fact sufficiently accounted for by the highly thoughtful character of the book and the undoubted genius of the writer (comp. Job x. 9; Gen. iii. 19; Isa. xxvii. 3; Gen. ii. 7, vii. 22; Job xii. 15, 16, with the account of the deluge). In Genesis and in this work we have the same theology; the attributes of the Godhead are identical. Man is represented in all his strength and in all his weakness, glorious in capacities, but infirm and impure in his actual condition, with a soul and spirit allied to the eternal, but with a physical constitution framed from the dust to which it must return. The writer of Job knows just so much of the fall of Adam and the early events of man's history, including the deluge (xxi. 15, 16), as was likely to be preserved by tradition in all the families descended from Shem. And with reference to those points in which a real progress was made by the Israelites after the time of Moses, the position from which this writer starts is precisely that of the lawgiver. One great problem of the book is the reconciliation of unmerited suffering with the love and justice of God. In the prophets and psalms the subject is repeatedly discussed, and receives, if not a complete, yet a substantially satisfactory settlement in connection with the great doctrines of Messiah's kingdom, priesthood, sufferings, and second coming, and of judgment and retribution to be wrought out by God's righteous judgment. In the book of Job, as it has been shown, there is no indication that the question had previously been raised. The answers given to it are evidently elicited by the discussions. Even in the discourse of Eliphaz, in which the nearest approach to the full development of the true theory of providential dispensations is admitted to be found, and which indeed for that very reason has been suspected of interpolated character, there is no such question. The writer knew those characteristics of Messiah which from the time of David were continually present to the mind of the Israelites.

Again it is said that the representation of angels, and still more specially of Satan, belongs to a later epoch. Some have even asserted that the notion must have been derived from Persian or Assyrian mythology. That hypothesis is now generally rejected—on the one hand it would fix a far later date for the composition than any critic of the highest authority would assign to the book; on the other it is proved that Satan bears no resemblance to Ahriman; he acts only by permission from God, and differs from the angels not in essence but in character. It is true that Satan is not named in the Pentateuch, but there is an exact correspondence between the characteristics of the malignant and envious accuser in this book and those of the enemy of man and God, which are developed in the history of the Fall. The appellation of "sons of God" is peculiar to this book and that of Genesis.

It is also to be remarked that no charge of idolatry is brought against Job by his opponents when enumerating all the crimes which they can imagine to account for his calamities. The only allusion to the subject (xxx. 26) refers to the earliest form of false religion known in the East. To an Israelite, living among heathen rites, such a charge was the very first which would have suggested itself, nor can any one satisfactory reason be assigned for the omission.

2. Nearly all modern critics, even those who admit the inspiration of the author, agree in the opinion that the composition of the whole work, the highly systematic development of the plot, and the philosophic tone of thought indicate a considerable progress in mental cultivation far beyond what can, with any show of probability, be supposed to have existed before the age of Solomon. We are told indeed that such topics as are here introduced occupied men's minds for the first time when schools of philosophy were formed under the influence of that prince. Such assertions are easily made, and resting on no tangible grounds, they are not easily disproved. It should, however, be remarked that the persons introduced in this book belong to a country celebrated for wisdom in the earliest times; insomuch that the writer who speaks of those schools considers that the peculiarities of the Solomonian writings were derived from intercourse with its inhabitants (Renaux, pp. xxiii.—xxv.). The book of Job differs from those writings chiefly in its greater earnestness, vehemence of feeling, vivacity of fancy, and force of independent inquiry into the principles of divine government; characteristics as it would seem of a primitive race, acquainted only with the patriarchal form of religion, rather than of a scholastic age. There is indeed nothing in the composition incompatible with the Mosaic age, admitting (what all rationalistic critics who assign a later date to this book deny) the authenticity and integrity of the Pentateuch.

We should attach more weight to the argument derived from the admirable arrangement of the entire book (Schlottmann, p. 108), did we not remember how completely the same course of reasoning misled the acutest critics in the case of the Homeric poems. There is a kind of artifice in style and arrangement of a subject which is at once recognized as an infallible indication of a highly the name of Job is perhaps more than an accidental coincidence.

a To the epoch of the Achaemenide.

b See Renaux, p. xxxix. This was previously pointed out by Herder.

c Dr. Lee (Introduction to Job, p. 78) observes that although Satan is not named in Genesis, yet the character which that name implies is clearly intimated in the words, "I will put enmity (יְשִׂיתָא) between thee and him." The connection between this word and the name of Job is perhaps more than an accidental coincidence.

cultivated or declining literature. This, however, differs essentially from the harmonious and majestic simplicity of form, and the natural development of a great thought which characterize the first grand productions of genius in every nation, and produce so powerful an impression of reality as well as of grandeur in every unprejudiced reader of the book of Job.

These considerations lead of course to the conclusion that the book must have been written before the promulgation of the Law, by one speaking the Hebrew language, and thoroughly acquainted with the traditions preserved in the family of Abraham. Whether the writer had access to original documents or not is mere matter of conjecture; but it can scarcely be doubted that he adhered very closely to the accounts, whether oral or written, which he received.

It would be a waste of time to consider the arguments of those who hold that the writer lived near the time of the Captivity,—that view is now all but universally repudiated: but one hypothesis which has been lately brought forward (by Sticke, who is followed by Schloittmann), and supported by very ingenious arguments, deserves a more special notice. It meets some of the objections which have been here adduced to the prevalent opinion of modern critics, who maintain that the writer must have lived at a period when the Hebrew language and literature had attained their full development; while it accounts in a satisfactory manner for some of the most striking peculiarities of the book. That supposition is, that Job may have been written after the settlement of the Israelites by a dweller in the south of Judaea, in a district immediately bordering upon the blanune desert. The inhabitants of that district were to a considerable extent isolated from the rest of the nation: their attendance at the festivals and ordinances of the Tabernacle and of the Temple before the time of the later kings was probably rare and irregular, if it were not altogether interrupted during a long period. In that case it would be natural that the author, while recognizing and enforcing the fundamental principles of religion, should be sparing in allusions to the sanctions or observances of the later law resident in that district. It would have peculiar opportunities of collecting the varied and extensive information which was possessed by the author of Job. It was not far from the country of Eliphaz; and it is probable that the intercourse with all the races to which the persons named in the book belonged was frequent during the early years of Israelish history. The caravans of Tema and Sheba (Job vi. 19) crossed there in a route much frequented by merchants, and the communications with Egypt were of course regular and uninterrupted. A man of wealth, station, and cultivated mind, such as we cannot doubt the author must have been, would either learn from conversation with merchants the peculiarities to which he so frequently alludes, or, as is highly probable, he would avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded of visiting that country at all the most interesting to an ancient. The local coloring, so strikingly characteristic of this book, and so evidently natural, is just what might be expected from a writer: the families in Southern Palæstine even at a later age, lived very much after the manner of the patriarchs; and illustrations derived from the free, wild, vigorous life of the desert, and the customs of pastoral tribes, would spontaneously suggest themselves to his mind. The people appear also to have been noted for freshness and originality of mind.—qualities seen in the woman of Tekoa, or still more remarkably in Amos, the poor and unlearned herdsman, also of Tekoa. It has also been remarked that Amos seems to have known and imitated the book of Job (comp. Am. iv. 13; v. 8, ix. 6, with Job ix. 8, 9, xxxviii. 31, xii. 15; Schloittmann, p. 109): a circumstance scarcely to be explained, considering the position and imperfect education of that prophet, excepting on the supposition that for some reason or other this book was peculiarly popular in that district. Some weight may also be attached to the observation (Sticke, p. 276; Schloittmann, p. 111) that the dialectic peculiarities of Southern Palæstine, especially the softening of the aspirates and exchanges of the sibilants, resemble the few divergencies from pure Hebrew which are noted in the book of Job.

The controversy about the authorship cannot ever be finally settled. From the introduction it may certainly be inferred that the writer lived many years after the death of Job. From the strongest internal evidence it is also clear that he must either have composed the work before the Law was promulgated, or under most peculiar circumstances which exempted him from its influence. The former of these two suppositions has nothing against it excepting the arguments, which have been shown to be far from conclusive, derived from language, composition, and indications of a high state of mental cultivation and general civilization. It has every other argument in its favor, while it is free from the great, and surely insuperable, difficulty that a devout Israelite, deeply interested in all religious speculations, should ignore the doctrines and institutions which were the peculiar glory of his nation: a supposition which, in addition to its intrinsic improbability, is scarcely consistent with any sound view of the inspiration of holy writ.

A complete list and fair estimate of all the preceding commentators on Job is given by Rosenmüller (Pdchelus Interp., Jobi. 1824). The best rabbinical commentators are — Jarchi, in the 12th century: Aben Ezra, a good Arabic as well as Hebrew scholar, & c. p. 1168; Levi ben Gershon, commonly known as Rallag, p. 1570; and Nachmaniides in the 13th century. Saadia, the well-known translator of the Pentateuch, has written a paraphrase of Job, and Tanhumah a good commentary, both in Arabic (Fawzi, Forer, p. xi.). The early Fathers contributed little to the explanation of the text: but some good remarks on the general argument are found in Chrysostom, Dulaanus Alexandrinus, and other Greek Fathers quoted in the Cateches of Nicerat, edited by Junius, London, fol., 1637 — a work chieflv valuable with reference to the Alexandrins credulity. Tulsus Justiniana, chiefly doctrinal and practical, vol. ii., Romans, 1740. The translation in the Latin Vulgate by Jerome is of great value; but the commentary ascribed to aim consists merely of excerpts from the work of Philip, one of Jerome's disciples (see Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. xii. 601): it is of little or no use for the interpretation. The great work of Gregory M. is through manuscript, and in the Rosenmuller says the German translation of Job by T. A. Delerse is one of the best in that language. The early Protestants, Bucer, Oecolampadius, and Calvin, contributed somewhat to the better understanding of the text; but by far the best commentary of that age is that prepared by C. Bertram, a disciple of Mercer, after the death of his master, from his MSS. notes. This work is well worth consulting. Mercer was a sound Hebrew scholar of Reuchlin's school, F. C. Cal, and a man of acute discernment and excellent judgment. The great work of Albert Schultens on Job (A. d. 1737) far surpasses all preceding and contemporary expositions, nor has the writer as yet been surpassed in knowledge of the Hebrew and cognate languages. He was the first who brought all the resources of Aramaic literature to bear upon the interpretation of Job. The fault of his book is diffuseness, especially in the statement of opinions long since rejected, and uninteresting to the student. The best works of the present century are those of Rosenmuller, 3 vols. 1824; and H. Ewald, whose translation and commentary are remarkable for accurate learning and originality of genius, but also for contempt of all who believe in the inspiration of Scripture. The Vorrede is most painful in tone. The commentaries of Umbreit, Vaihinger, Lange, Stiekel, Hahn, Hitzig, De Wette, Knobel, and Vatke are generally characterized by diligence and ingenuity; but have for the most part a strong rationalistic tendency, especially the three last. The most useful analysis is to be found in the introduction to K. Schloittmann's translation, Berlin, 1851; but his commentary is deficient in philological research. M. Renan has lately given an excellent translation in French (Le Livre de Job, 1864), with a long commentary, which, notwithstanding its thoroughly sceptical character, shows a genial appreciation of some characteristic excellences of this book. In England we have a great number of translations, commentaries, etc., of various merit; among which the highest rank must be assigned to the work of Dr. Lee, especially valuable for its copious illustrations from different sources.

* The personal character of Job, and his sentiments and conduct under his afflictions, are to be learned from the statements respecting them in the introductory and concluding chapters. These are to be taken as the complete exposition of his character and conduct. The whole is summed up in his memorable words (ch. i. 21), "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." The poetical portion, intervening between the introductory and concluding chapters, is the inspired writer's own discussion of the topics therein considered, under the names of Job and his friends. His immediate object, in this instructive discussion, is to exhibit, in strongest contrast, the antagonistic views suggested by observation of the moral government of God, in order to deduce from them the only practical lessons which that observation can teach, or is capable of comprehending. Hence it gives to these conflicting views the freest scope and the most impressioned expression, so as to exhibit their antagonisms in the strongest light. To impute to Job, personally, sentiments which the writer himself desired to express through one of the parties in the discussion, would be no less absurd, than it would be to regard the sublime poetry of this book as the verbatim report of an actual debate. But what is the object of the book, and what are the lessons which it teaches? To say (as above, p. 1400, col. 1) that the problem is, "Can goodness exist irrespective of reward," is to ignore the greater part of the discussion; for it takes a far wider range than this. It is justly said (on p. 1403, col. 2) that the object of the calamities inflicted on Job was "to try his sincerity;" but this throws no light on the object of the book and its discussions, to which the sufferings of Job only furnished the occasion.

Nor can it be said (as on p. 1404, col. 1) that the object is, "to show the effects of calamity, in its worst and most awful form, upon a truly religious spirit." If this were the object, it was already achieved in the record of Job's conduct given in the two introductory chapters. It is seen in his tender and faithful expostulation with his angry wife (ch. ii. 10), "shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we receive evil?" It is expressed in his grateful and submissive recognition of God's hand, in what he gives and what he withholds (ch. i. 21), "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Here is seen "the effect of calamity on a truly religious spirit," and in all ages of the church it has been justly regarded as the highest and fullest attainment of the religious life. (Compare James v. 11.) This, moreover, is the historical record of Job's calamities, and of their effect on him. The poetical discussion, which follows, is of quite another character, and has a very different object.

The discussion, on the part of the human disputants, covers all which observation can attain, respecting the moral government of God, and (including the subject of the book) the true character of human existence. But all fails to solve the great problem of the divine government, in view of the apparently indiscriminate distribution of happiness and misery to the good and evil among men. Many facts of human life are correctly stated, as all experience proves, and much also that is false; many principles are avowed, that are true and just and substantial, as well as many that are false and injurious. The whole discussion is instructive, as exhibiting the various aspects under which the divine government may be viewed; and especially as showing the conflicts which may agitate the breast even of the good man, in view of the strange and unexplained distribution of good and evil in this life. It is no solution of the problem, that this life is fragmentary; that all will be rightly adjusted in another and a better existence. Nor if it would to make the distinction there between right and wrong, why is it not made here? a a A very interesting and instructive discussion of this problem in one of its aspects, as it presented itself to the mind of an intelligent and reflecting heathen, is given in Plutarch's treatise On the Deity of JOB

By a skillful manœuvre, another disputant is now introduced. An important, though a subordinate, view of the subject still remains, which could not be considered in connection with the topics of the preceding discussion. To have presented it in the person of one equal or superior in age to those who had already spoken, would have given to him the appearance of an umpire, and to his views an importance not at all deserved; for they do not penetrate to the heart of the subject, and only offer certain partial suggestions, which might occur to the superficial observer, but are worthy to be taken into account. In the final arbitrament, they are passed over in silence, as something aside from the main issue. It is to a young man, therefore, that this part is fittingly assigned; and with admirable skill he is made to speak in character, both in the views ascribed to him, and in the manner of expressing them.

According to this speaker, the divine judgments are corrective in their design; the chastisement of a wise and tender parent, seeking to reclaim a wayward child. Such chastisement is an index, therefore, of the moral state of its subject. It must be graduated, consequently, to the necessities of the case, and its severity is an exact measure of the moral desert of the recipient. The view necessarily assumes, that a great sufferer must have been a great sinner; and consequently that Job, contrary to the whole tenor of his outward life, and to the express testimony of the Searcher of the heart, must have been secretly as eminent in sin as he was now in suffering.

Human wisdom is thus shown to be utterly at fault, in its efforts to comprehend the mystery of God's government on earth. Is there, then, no help? Is there no rest for the human spirit, no stable ground of trust and confiding submission, where it may find secure repose?

The sacred writer now breaks off the discussion, which has reached no satisfactory result, by the sudden manifestation of the Deity in the terrors of the storm. As the office had been assigned to Job of relating the false assumptions of the three friends, and of boldly questioning the rectitude of the divine practical wisdom, the answer of God is addressed directly to him. This answer demands special attention, as the key to the design and instructions of the book. That it is so, is clear; for why should the Deity be introduced at all, except as the supreme Arbiter, to whom the final decision is assigned? The introduction of the Almighty, the supreme Judge of all, for any less purpose, would have been a gross violation of every rule of probability in composition, and one with which the author of a work so perfect in design and execution should not be charged. These sublime discourses are justly regarded as the most fitting reply, on the part of the Supreme Ruler and Judge, to the presumptuous charges against his moral government. They do not descend to vindicate his ways, or attempt to make the reader see the matter; but the rebuke is so overpowering, that the opposition to it can be felt only by the overthrow of the Deity themselves, and the utter destruction of their followers. But the Deity is now punishing the wicked; "the Greek text, c. 15."

JO'BA'B. 1. (יוֹבָּב [yôḇâḇ; and then place of deserta]; [in Gen.]. 10:8; [in 1 Chr., 1:8; 18:2]; [in 1. Kings., 5:1]; 1:3). The last in order of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 29; 1 Chr. i. 23). His name has not been discovered among the Arab names of places in Southern Arabia, where he ought to be found with the other sons of Joktan. But Piocmen mentions the 108ןבָּרְאֵת near the Suchalite; and Bochart (Phaleg, B. 21), followed by Salamin and Gesenius, suggests the reading 108ןבָּרְאֵת, by the common interchange of p and b. The identification is perhaps correct, but it has not been connected with an Arab name of a tribe or place; and Bochart’s conjecture of its being i. q. Arab.

"a desert," etc., from הֹבָּב, though regarded as probable by Gesenius and Michaelis, seems to be unworthy of acceptance. Kalisch (Com. on Gen.) says that it is "according to the etymology, a district in Arabia Deserta," in apparent ignorance of the famous desert near Hadrumiet, called the Aabf, of proverbial terror; and the more extensive waste on the northeast of the former, called the "deserted quarter," Er-Ruba el-Khaled, which is impassable in the summer, and fitter to be called desert Arabia than the country named deserta by the Greeks.

2. [Alex. in Gen. xxxvi. 33, 10:8; 1:8.] One of the "kings" of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 33, 44; 1 Chr. i. 44, 45), enumerated after the sons of Canaan, and belonging to the northern chief among the phylarch descended from Esau. [Ezra.] He was "son of Zerah of Bozrah," and successor of Bela, the first king on the list. This is Jobab whom the LXX., quoting the Syriac, identify with Job, his father being Zerah son of Esau, and his mother, 108ןבָּרְאֵת.

3. [10:8; 1:8.] King of Madon; one of the northern chieftains who attempted to oppose Joseph’s conquest, and were routed by him at Meron (Josh. xi. 15).

(10:8; [Vat. Comp. Ald.] Alex. 1:8.; [in 1. Kings.]. The head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. xviii. 9). [Jezz.] A. C. H. JOCHEBED (יוֹכָבֵד [yôcohâḇ; and then place of glory is Jehovah]; [in Num., 10:8; 1:8;] Jochabeth), the wife and at the same time the aunt of Amram, and the mother of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 20). In order to avoid the apparent illegitimacy of the marriage between Amram and his aunt, the LXX. and Vulg. render the word 108ןבָּרְאֵת “cousin” instead of “aunt.” But this is unnecessary: the example of Abraham himself (Gen. xxv. 12) proves that in the pre-Mosaic age a greater latitude was permitted in regard to kinship in an later age. Moreover it is expressly stated elsewhere (Ex. ii. 1; Num. xxvi. 59), that Jochabeth was the daughter of Levi, and consequently sister of Kohath, Amram's father.

JO DA (Ioađ; [Vat. Iossâ; Vulg. omita]) = Judah the Levite, in a passage which is difficult to unravel (1 Esdr. v. 58; see Ezr. iii. 9). Some words are probably omitted. The name elsewhere appears in the A. V. in the forms Hesdâh (Ezr. vii. 40), Heshâv (Neh. vii. 43), Hoshâh (Neh. x. 10), and Sulâhas (1 Esdr. v. 28).

JOved (Jeroba is witness) = Ioađ, a Benjamite, the son of Pethahiah (Neh. xi. 7). Two of Kenemann's MSS. read ’3y'W, i.e. Jozeer, and two *y'y, i.e. Joel, confounding Joel with Joel the son of Pethahiah, the Manassite. The Syriac must have had 3y'y.

JOEL (Jehovah is God; or whose God is Jehovah, Ges.): Ioađ, Joel, and Jobel. 1. Elekst son of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. viii. 2: 1 Chr. vi. 33, xv. 17), and father of Hanan the singer. He and his brother Abiah were nine judges in Beer-sheba when their father was old, and no longer able to go his accustomed rounds. But they disagreed both their office and their parenting by the corrupt way in which they took bribes and perverted judgment. Their grievous misconduct gave occasion to the change of the constitution of Israel to a monarchy. It is in the case of Joel that the singular corruption of the text of 1 Chr. v. 1 (28 A. V.) has taken place. Joel's name has dropped out; and Yehôa, which means "and the second," is descriptive of Abijah, but has been taken for a proper name.

2. [Jobel]. In 1 Chr. vi. 36, A. V., Joel seems to be merely a corruption of Shama at ver. 24.

A. C. H.

1. One of the twelve minor prophets; the son of Pethuel, or, according to the LXX, Bethuel. Beyond this fact all is conjecture as to the personal history of Joel. Pseudo-Epiphanus (ii. 245) recounts a tradition that he was of the tribe of Reuben, born and buried at Beth-lehem, between Jerusalem and Cæsarea. It is most likely that he lived in Judah, for his mission was to Judah, as that of Hossa had been to the ten tribes (St. Jerome, Comment. in Joel). He exhorts the priests, and makes frequent mention of Judah and Jerusalem. It has been made a question whether he were a priest himself (Winer, Re-buc), but there do not seem to be sufficient grounds for determining it in the affirmative, though some recent writers (e. g. Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 179) have taken this view. Many different opinions have been expressed about the date of Joel's prophecy. Trusler has placed it in the reign of Josiah, Berthold of Hezekiah, Kimchi, Jehu, etc. of Manasseh, and Cabnet of Nehemiah. The LXX. place Joel after Amos and Micah. But there seems no adequate reason for departing from the Hebrew order. The majority of critics and commentators (Amarland, Vitringa, Hengstenberg, Winer, etc.) fix upon the reign of Ezzed, thus making Joel nearly contemporaneous with Hosea and Amos. The principal reasons for this conclusion, besides the order of the books, are the special and exclusive mention of the Egyptians and Edomites as enemies of Judah, to allusion being made to the Assyrians or Babylonians, who arose at a later period. Nothing, says Hengstenberg, has yet been found to overthrow this conclusion, and it is confirmed on other grounds especially.

The nature, style, and contents of the prophecy

—We find, what we should expect on the supposition of Joel being the first prophet to Judah, only a broad outline of the whole terrible scene, which was to be depicted more and more in detail by subsequent prophets (Brown, Oso Seel, p. 691). The scope, therefore, is not any particular invasion, but the whole day of the Lord. "This book of Joel is a type of the early Jewish prophethical discourse, and may explain to us what distant events in the history of the land would expand it, and bring fresh discoveries within the sphere of the inspired man's vision" (Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 179).

The proximate event to which the prophecy related was a public calamity, then impending on Judah, of a twofold character: want of water, and a plague of locusts, continuing for several years. The prophet exhorts the people to turn to God with penitence, fasting, and prayer, and then (he says) the plague shall cease, and the rain descend in its season, and the land yield her accustomed fruit. Joel, the time will be a most joyful one; for God, by the outpouring of his spirit, will support his worshippers increased knowledge of Himself, and after the excision of the enemies of his people, will extend through them the blessings of true religion to heathen lands. This is the simple argument of the book: only that it is beautified and enriched with variety of ornament and pictorial description. The style of the original is perspicuous (except towards the end) and elegant, surpassing that of all other prophets, except Isaiah and Haggai, in sublimity.

Brown (Oso Seel, p. 662) regards the contents of the prophecy as embracing two visions, but it is better to consider it as one connected representation (Hengst., Winer). For its interpretation we must observe not isolated facts of history, but the idea. The swarm of locusts was the medium through which this idea, "the ruin upon the apostate church," was represented to the inward contemplation of the prophet. But, in one unbroken connection, the idea goes on to penitence, return, blessing, outpouring of the Spirit, judgments on the enemies of the Church (1 Pet. iv. 17), final establishment of God's kingdom. All prior destructions, judgments, and victories are like the smaller circles; the final consummation of all things, to which the prophecy reaches, being the outmost one of all.

The boasts of ch. ii. were regarded by many interpreters of the last century (Louth, Shaw, etc.) as figurative, and introduced by way of comparison to a hostile army of men from the north country. This view is now generally abandoned. Locusts are spoken of in Deut. xxviii. 38 as instruments of Divine vengeance: and the same seems implied in Joel ii. 14, 25. Maurice (Prophets and Kings, p. 190) strongly maintains the literal interpretation. And yet the plague continued a parable in it, which it was the prophet's mission to unfold. The four kinds or swarms of locusts (i. 4) have been supposed to indicate four Assurian invasions (Titubam, Bode Stabils), or four crises to the chosen people of God, the Babylonian, Syro-Macedonian, Roman, and Antichristian (Brown). In accordance with the literal (and certainly the primary) interpretation of the prophecy, we should render 3y'W, 3y'W, 3y'W, 3y'W.

as in our A. V., 'the former rain,' with Rosenm. and the lexographers, rather than 'a (or the) teacher of righteousness,' with marg. of A. V., Hebrg., and others. The allusion to the Messiah, which Hebrg. finds in this word, or to the ideal teacher (Deut. xviii. 18), of whom Messiah was the chief, scarcely accords with the immediate context.

The נָנָסִים of ch. iii. 1 in the Hebrew, 'afterwards' ch. ii. 28 of the A. V., raises us to a higher level of vision, and brings into view Messianic times and scenes. Here, says Steudel, we have a Messianic prophecy altogether. If this prediction has ever yet been fulfilled, we must certainly refer the event to Acts ii. The best commentators are agreed upon this. We must not, however, interpret it thus to the exclusion of all reference to preparatory events under the earlier dispensation, and still less to the exclusion of later Messianic times. Acts ii. virtually contained the whole subsequent development. The outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost was the נָנָסִים, while the full accomplishment and the final reality are yet to come. But here both are blended in one, and the whole passage has therefore a double aspect. The passage is well quoted by E. Peter. He adopts the first prophet to the Jewish kingdom. And his quoting it shows that the Messianic reference was the prevailing one in his day; though Acts ii. 39 proves that he extended his reference to the end of the dispensation. The expression 'all flesh' (ii. 17) is explained by the following clauses, by which no principle of distribution is meant, but only that all classes, without respect of persons, will be the subjects of the Spirit's influence. All distinction of races, too, will be done away (cf. Joel ii. 32, with Rom. x. 12, 13). Lastly, the accompanying portents and judgments upon the enemies of God find their various solutions, according to the interpreters, in the repeated deportations of the Jews by neighboring merchants, and sale to the Macedonians (1 Mace. iii. 41, and Ez. xxvii. 13), followed by the sweeping away of the neighboring nations (Maurice); in the evanescence 'well quoted by St. Peter from the first prophet to the Jewish kingdom, in the breaking up of all human polities. But here again the idea includes all manifestations of judgment, ending with the last. The whole is shadowed forth in dim outline; and while some crises are past, others are yet to come (comp. iii. 13-21 with St. Matt. xxiv., and Rev. xix.).

Among the commentators on the book of Joel, enumerated by Rosenmiller, Salooh in Vit. Test., part 7, vol. i., may be specially mentioned Lewend's Joel Exegesis, Ulmri, 1657; Dr. Ewok. Pooock's Commentary on the Prophecy of Joel, Oxford, 1691; and A Paraphrasis and Critical Commentary on the Prophecy of Joel, by Samuel Chandler, London, 1735. * The principal commentators on Joel as one of the minor prophets (not mentioned above), are

To the other separate writers on this book may be added Fr. A. Holzhausen (1829), K. A. Crozons (1831), E. Meier (1841), and E. B. Pusey (1861) in pta. ii. and iii. of his Minor Prophets (not yet completed). Crozet's Der Prophet Joel übersetzt, etc., (pp. 316) is "a rich store-house of philological and historical illustration," but is deficient in method and a skillful use of the abundant material. The natural history of the locusts supplies much of the imagery of the book. Dr. Pusey, by his singular industry in the collection of illustrative facts, advances our knowledge on this subject far beyond all previous interpreters. For useful information here, see also Thomason's Land and Book, ii. 102-108. The Introductions to the O. T. (Haverneck, Scholz, De Wette, Welte-Herbst, Keil, Bleek, Davidson) treat, more or less fully, of the person and prophesies of our author. Ancheren has written on "Joel" in Herzog's Real-Encyk. vi. 719-721. Stanley describes this prophet as the 'connecting link between the older prophets who are known to us only through their actions and sayings, and the later who are known chiefly through their writings... With a glance that reached forward to the most distant ages... he foretold as the chiefest of blessings, that the day was at hand when the prophet's spirit should be made use of to be confirmed to this nation, but should be poured out on all humanity, on male and female, on old and young, even on the slaves and humblest inhabitants of Jerusalem" (Jewish Church, ii. 490).

Dr. Pusey adopts the figurative interpretation of the scourge of locusts. Though so many of the recent commentators, as remarked above, discard this view, it must be confessed that some of the arguments adduced for it are not easily set aside. Among these is the fact that in ii. 17 the prophet says, "Give not thy heritage to reproach that the heathen should rule over them." The connection here is obscure, unless we suppose that, having hitherto employed an allegory, the writer at this point rephrases the figure and passes over to its real import, namely, the devastation of the country by a swarm of locusts (cf. ii. 20, 25). It is clear, however, that who is to inflict the threatened calamity is called "the northern" or northman ("northern army," A. V.) (church), i.e. one who is to come from the north, which is not true of literal locusts; for they are not accustomed to invade Palestine from that quarter, nor could they be dispersed by any natural process in precisely opposite directions as there represented. A finger-sign appears also in i. 6: the locusts just spoken of are here "a heathen people" (יִדְרַךְ), who have come upon the land and inflicted on it the misery of which the prophet goes on to portray so fearful a picture. It is said that the pretences (i. 6 ff.) show that the locusts as literally understood have accomplished or at least begun the work of devastation, and therefore cannot prefigure another and future calamity. But on the other hand, it is possible that these pretences so called may be rhetorical merely; not historical: the act may be represented as past, in order to affirm with greater emphasis the certainty of the occurrence a west wind into Persia, and with an east wind into Egypt. Similarly the Assyrian hordes would come from their country" (Natural History of the Bible Lond. 1897).

in due time. It agrees with this view that in i. 15 "the day of Jehovah is spoken of as not yet arrived; and "the day" is certainly identified with the visitation of the locusts with which the book opens.

The last five verses (28-32) of ch. ii. (A. V.) form a distinct chapter in the Hebrew Bible. In this division the A. V. follows the LXX. It may be remarked that the transition at this point arises from the relation of subjects, not of time. The prosperity of the ancient people of God if they repented and turned to Him, leads the prophet to speak of the still richer blessings which then awaited those who should believe on Christ under the new and last economy (Acts ii. 16 ff.). On this Messianic passage see especially Hengstenberg's Christology, iii. 125-141 (Keith's tr., 1839).

The style of Joel places him, in the judgment of the best critics, among the most classical of the Hebrew writers. His language is copious and polished; his paradigm regular and well balanced; his imagery bold and picturesque. His description of the warlike locusts—their march, onset and victory, as they spread themselves with irresistible might through the land—forms by universal consent one of the most graphic sketches of this nature to be found in the poetry of any language. The calamity was to come "like man spread upon the mountains" (ii. 2); i.e. suddenly and swiftly as the first teams of the runners in the circus gladiators race to the mountaintop to another. The brute creation suffers as well as men. The Hebrew (i. 29) puts before us a more distinct image than that presented in the A. V. The heat and drought penetrate into the recesses of the desert. The grass is withered; the streams are dried up. The suffering animals turn their eyes towards heaven, and by their silent agony implore relief from the hunger and thirst which they endure. For the battle-scene in Jerem. chapter (iii. 2 ff. or Hebr. iv. 2 ff.) see on that word (Amer. ed.). John's Apocalypse itself has reproduced more from Joel (compared with his extent) than from any other Hebrew poet. The closing verses (iii. 18 ff.) show us how natural it was to foreshadow the triumphs of Christianity under the symbols of Judaism (comp. Is. ii. 2; 3; Mic. iv. 1-5; Ezek. xl-xlviii).

4. (N.N.) "Joel." The head of one of the families of the Simeonites (1 Chr. iv. 35). He formed part of the expedition against the Hamites of Gezer in the reign of Hezekiah.

5. [Alex. Basa.] A descendant of Remren, Jaminus and Treemellus make him the son of Hanoch, while others trace his descent through Carmi (1 Chr. v. 4). The Syriac for Joel substitutes Carmi, but there is reason to believe that the genealogy is that of the eldest son. Barrington (Genentl. i. 53) maintains that the Joel mentioned in v. 8 was a descendant, not of Hanoch, but of one of his brethren, probably Carmi, as Jaminus and Treemellus print it in their genealogical table. But the passage "which he relies for support (ver. 7), as considering the genealogy of Hanoch, evidently refers to Bearah, the prince of the Renenites, whom the Assyrian king carried captive. There is, however, sufficient similarity between Shemaiah and Shema, who are both represented as sons of Joel, to render it probable that the latter is the same individual in both instances. Bertheau conjectures that he was contemporary with David, which would be apparently true if the genealogy were traced in each case from father to son.

6. (Amer. Basa.) Chief of the Gaddites, who dwelt in the land of Bashan (1 Chr. v. 12).

7. (Vat. corrupt: Jobel.) The son of Izrahiah, of the tribe of Issachar, and a chief of one of the troops of the host of the battle "who numbered in the days of David 36,000 men (1 Chr. vii. 3). Four of Kennicott's MSS. omit the words "and the sons of Izrahiah;" so that Joel appears as one of the five sons of Uzzi. The Syriac retains the present case, with the exception of reading "four" for "five."

8. The brother of Nathan of Zobah (1 Chr. xi. 38), and one of David's guards. He is called G.f.t. in 2 Sam. xxviii. 36; but Kennicott contends that in this case the latter passage is corrupt, though in other words it preserved the true reading.

9. The chief of the Gershonites in the reign of David, who sanctified themselves to bring up the ark from the house of Obededom (1 Chr. xv. 7; 11).

10. A Gershonite Levite in the reign of David, son of Jehiel, a descendant of Laadan, and probably the same as the preceding (1 Chr. xxiii. 8; xxvi. 2). He was one of the officers appointed to take charge of the treasures of the Temple.

11. The son of Pelatiah, and prince or chief of the tribe of Manasseh, west of Jordan, in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 20).

12. A Kohathite Levite in the reign of Hezekiah. He was the son of Azariah, and one of the two representatives of his branch of the tribe in the solemn purification by which the Levites prepared themselves for the restoration of the Temple (2 Chr. xxix. 12).

13. One of the sons of Nehemiah, who returned with Ezra, and later married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 43). He is called Joel in 1 Esdr. ix. 35.

14. The son of Zichri, a Benjamite, placed in command over those of his own tribe and the tribe of Zabulon, which dwelt at Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 9).

The Joanites and Jedidiah, having made his way towards the waste country in the southeast. Here, according to the scanty information we possess, Karkor would seem to have been situated. No trace of any name like Jobekhebah has yet been met with in the above, or any other direction.

JOGLI (יְוַגֵל [zyg'el]: [Ezr. viii. 2]; Alex. EAU]: [Comp. 'Iyag'el] Johghi, the father of Bukki, a chief man among the Danites (Num. xxxiv. 22).

JOHIAH. 1. (יוֹהִיא [verb, Jehovah revives, brings to life]): 'Iydh: [Iam. iexva'yawv]: Alex. Ioyaw: John.) One of the sons of Beriah, the Benjamite, who was a chief of the fathers of the dwellers in Aijalon, and had put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chr. vii. 16). His family may possibly have founded a colony, like the Danites, within the limits of another tribe, where they were exposed, as the name of Ephraim had been, to the attacks of the Gittites. Such border-warfare was too common to render it necessary to suppose that the narratives in 1 Chr. vii. 21 and viii. 13 refer to the same encounter, although it is not a little singular that the name Beriah occurs in each.

2. ('Iyaw'; [Vat. FA.]: Alex. Ioyaw; [Comp. 'Iyaw'd]): The Vizite, one of David's guard [1 Chr. xii. 45]. Kennicott decides that he was the son of Shimi, as he is represented in the A. V., though in the margin the translators have put "Shimrite" for the son of Shimi to the name of his brother Jedidiah.

JOHAN'NAN (יוֹהָנָן [T.]: Iow'avaw: [Vat. Isawon, and so Alex. ver. 10: Johannah], a shortened form of Jehohanan [Jehovah's gift]. It is the same as John. [Johmihanan].

1. Son of Azariah [Azariah, 1], and grandson of Ahinnax the son of Zadok, and father of Azariah, 6 (1 Chr. vi. 9, 10, A. V.). In Josiphus (Ant. x. 8, § 6) the name is corrupted to Johanan, and in the Seder Olam to Johazah. The latter places him in the reign of Jehoshaphat; but merely because it begins by wrongly placing Zadok in the reign of Solomon. Shorn of his family name we know from 1 K. iv. 2, supported by 1 Chr. vi. 10, A. V., that Azariah the father of Johanan was high priest in Solomon's reign, and Amariah his grandson was in Jehoshaphat's reign, we may conclude without much doubt that Johanan's pontificate fell in the reign of Rehoboam. (See Hervey's Genealogies, etc., etc., ch. x.)

2. [Alex. Iowaw]: Son of Eleazar, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Simeas, in the line of Zerubbabel's heirs [Shelomai], (1 Chr. iii. 24).

3. ('Iowaw in 2 K. [xxvi. 27], 'Iowaw in Jer.; Alex. Iowaw in 2 K., and Iowaw in Jer., except xlii. 11, xliii. 8, xliii. 2, 4, 5; [Vat. Iovaw in Jer. xlii. 8; FA. Iovaw in Jer. xlii. 15, Iowaw ver. 10: Johannah.] The son of Karah, and one of the captains of the scattered remnant of the army of Judah, who escaped in the final attack upon Jerusalem by the Chaldeans and, after the capture of the king, remained in the open country of Moab and the Ammonites, watching the tide of events. He was one of the first to repair to Mizpah, after the withdrawal of the hostile army, and tender his allegiance to the new governor appointed by the king of Babylon. From his acquaintance with the treacherous designs of Ishmael, against which Jedidiah was unhappily warned in vain, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he may have been a companion of Ishmael in his exile at the court of Baalis king of the Ammonites, the promotor of the plot (Jer. xi. 8-16). After the murder of Gedaliah, Johanan was one of the foremost in the pursuit of his assassin, and rescued the captives he had carried off from Mizpah (Jer. xii. 11-16). Fearing the vengeance of the Chaldeans for the treachery of Ishmael, the captains, with Johanan at their head, halted by the Kean of Chaldea, on the road to Egypt, with the intention of seeking refuge there; and, notwithstanding the warnings of Jeremiah, settled in a body at Tahpanhes. They were afterwards scattered throughout the country, in Migdol, Noph, and Pathros, and from this time we lose sight of Johanan and his fellow-captains.

4. (Iowawv: [H. Iowawv]): The firstborn son of Josiah king of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 17) to either die before his father, or fall with him at Megido. Junius, without any authority, identifies him with Zaneeas, mentioned 1 Esdr. i. 38.

5. A valiant Benjamite, one of David's captains, who joined him at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 4).

6. (Alex. Iowaw: [Vat. FA.]: Iowaw) The eighth in number of the lion-faced warriors of Gad, who left their tribe to follow the fortunes of David, and spread the terror of their arms beyond Jordan in the month of its overflow (1 Chr. xii. 12).

7. (Iowawv: [Alex. Iowawv]): The father of Azariah, an Ephrahite in the time of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).

9. (Iowawv: [FA.3 in Ezr., Iowaw]): The son of Eliakim, one of the chief Levites (Neh. xiii. 20) to whose kinsman (or "tutor," according to the LXX.) Ezra retired to mourn over the foreign marriages which the people had contracted (Ezr. x. 6). He is called Johanan in 1 Esdr. ix. 1; and some have supposed him to be the same with Jonathan, descendant of another Eliakim, who was afterwards high-priest (Neh. xii. 11). [JOATHAN, 10.]

10. (Iowawv: [Alex. Iowarav, FA.3 Iowaw]: The son of Tobiah the Ammonite, who had married the daughter of Messhahill the priest (Neh. vii. 18).

JOHN, THE APOSTLE.

1. Before the call to the disciples.—We have no data for settling with any exactitude the time of the Apostles' birth. The general impression left on us by the Gospel-narrative is that he was younger than the brother whose name commonly precedes his (Matt. iv. 21, x. 2, xviii. 1, &c.; but comp. Luke iv. 28, where the order is inverted); younger than his friend Peter, possibly also than his Master. The life which was protracted to the time of Trajan (Euseb. H. E. iii. 23, following Eucumenus) can hardly have begun before the year n. c. 4 of the Dionysian era. The Gospels give us the name of his father Zebedaeus (Matt. iv. 21) and his mother Salome (Matt. xxvii. 56, compared with Mark xv. 40, xvi. 1). Of the former we know nothing more. The traditions of the fourth century (Epiphanius, Hær. 78) make the latter the daughter of Joseph by his first wife, and consequently half-sister to our Lord. By some recent critics she has been identified with the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, in John xxi. 25 (Wieseler, Stud. u. Krit. 1840, p. 648). They lived, it may be inferred from John i. 44, in or near Bethany (Matt. xxvii. 3). They were afterwards the companions and partners of their children. There, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, the Apostle and his brother grew up. The mention of the "hired servants" (Mark i. 29), of his mother's "substance" (and τῶν ὄπωρχων, Luke viii. 3), of "his own house" (τὸ ἴδιον, John xix. 27), implies a position removed by at least some strata of society from absolute poverty. The fact that the Apostle was known to the high-priest Caiaphas, as that knowledge was hardly likely to have begun after he had avowed himself the disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, suggests the probability of some early intimacy between the two men or their families. The name which the parents gave to their younger child was too common to serve as the ground of any special inference; but it deserves notice (1) that the name appears among the kindred of Caliphas (Acts iv. 6); (2) that it was given to another priestly child, the son of Zacharias (Luke i. 13), as the embodiment and symbol of Messianic hopes. The frequent occurrence of the name at this period, unconnected as it was with any of the great deeds of the old heroic days of Israel, is indeed in itself significant as a sign of that yearning and expectation in which characterized, not only the more faithful and devout (Luke ii. 25, 28), but the whole people. The prominence given to it by the wonders connected with the birth of the future Baptist may have given a meaning to it for the parents of the future Evangelist which it would not otherwise have had. Of the character of Zebedaeus we have hardly the slightest trace. He interposes no refusal when his sons are called on to leave him (Matt. iv. 21). After this he disappears from the scene of the Gospel-history, and we are led to infer that he had died before his wife followed her children in their work of ministration. His character meets us as presenting the same marked features as those which were conspicuous in her son. From her, who followed Jesus and ministered to Him of her substance (Luke viii. 3), who sought for her two sons that they might sit on his right hand and the other on his left, in his kingdom (Matt. xx. 22), he might well derive his strong affections, his capacity for giving and receiving love, his eagerness for the speedy manifestation of the Messiah's kingdom. The early years of the Apostle we may believe to have passed under this influence. He would be trained in all that constituted the ordinary education of Jewish boyphood. Though not taught in the schools of Jerusalem, and therefore, in later life, liable to the reproach of having no recognized position as a teacher, no rabbinical education (Acts iv. 13), he would yet be taught to read the Law and observe its precepts, to feed on the writings of the prophets with the feeling that their accomplishment was not far off. For him too, as bound by the Law, there would be, at the age of thirteen, the periodical pilgrimages to Jerusalem. He would become familiar with the stately worship of the Temple with the sacrifice, the incense, the altar, etc.

Baptist, were of the tribe of Levi. On the other hand, more sober critics, like Neander (Pflanz. u. Leit. p. 600, 4th ed.), and Lücke (Joannea, i. p. 9), reject both the tradition and the conjecture.

C. With his own hypothesis that the sons of Zebedee, and our Lord, as well as the b Ewald (Gesch. Israels, v. p. 171) adopts Wieseler's conjecture, that the sons of Zebedee, and our Lord, as well as the

and the priestly robes. May we not conjecture that they were not made for use but for the occasion? The impression was first made which never afterwards wore off? Assuming that there is some harmony between the previous training of a prophet and the form of the visions presented to him, may we not recognize them in the rich liturgical imagery of the Apocalypse—in that union in one wonderful vision of all that was most wonderful and glorious in the predictions of the other prophets? Consequently the vision here would be also the boy's outward life as sharing in his father's work. The great political changes which agitated the whole of Palestine in such a degree made themselves felt even in the village-town in which he grew up. The Galilean fisherman must have heard, possibly with some sympathy, of the efforts made (when he was too young to join in them) by Judas of Gamala, as the great aspirer of the freedom of Israel against their Roman rulers. Like other Jews he would grow up with strong and bitter feelings against the neighboring Samaritans. Lastly, before we pass into a period of greater certainty, we must not forget to take into account that to this period of his life belongs the commencement of that intimate fellowship with Simon Bar-jonah of which we afterwards find so many proofs. That friendship may even then have been, in countless ways, fruitful for good upon the hearts of both.

II. From the Call to the Discipleship to the Departure from Jerusalem. — The ordinary life of the fisherman of the Sea of Galilee was at last broken in upon by the news that a prophet had once more appeared. The voice of John the Baptist was heard in the wilderness of Judaea, and the publicans, peasants, drovers, and fishermen of Galilee gathered round him. Among these were the two sons of Zebedee and their friends. With them, perhaps, was One whom as yet they knew not. They heard, it may be, of his protests against the vices of their own ruler—against the hypocrisy of Pharisees and Scribes. But they heard also, it is clear, words which spoke to them of their own sins—of their own need of a deliverer. The words, "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world," implied that those who heard them would enter into the blessedness of which they spoke. Assuming that the unnamed disciple of John i. 37-40 was the Evangelist himself, we are led to think of that meeting, of the lengthened interview that followed it, as the starting-point of the entire devotion of heart and soul which lasted through his whole life. Then Jesus loved him as He loved all earnest seekers after righteousness and truth (comp. Mark v. 21). The words of that evening, though unrecorded, were mighty in their effect. The disciples (John apparently among them) followed their new teacher to Galilee (John i. 44), were with him, as such, at the marriage-feast of Cana (ii. 2), journeyed with him to Capernaum, and thence to Jerusalem (ii. 12, 23), came back through Samaria (iv. 8), and thence, for some uncertain interval of time, returned to their former occupations. The uncertainty which hangs over the narratives of Matt. iv. 18, and Luke v. 1-11 (comp. the arguments for and against their relating to the same events in Lampe, Comment. ed. John. i. 20), leaves us in doubt whether they received a special call to become "fishers of men" once only or twice. In either case they gave up the employment of their life and went to do a work like it, and yet unlike, in God's spiritual kingdom. From this time they take their place among the company of disciples. Only here and there are there traces of individual character, of special turning-points in their lives. Soon they find themselves in the number of the Twelve who are chosen, not as disciples only, but as their Lord's deputies—Apostles. In all the lists of the Twelve those four names of the sons of Jonah and Zebedee stand foremost. They come within the innermost circle of their Lord's friends, and are as the ἀποστόλοι, ἀποστόλων. The three, Peter, James, and John, are with him when none else are in the chamber of death (Mark v. 37), in the glory of the transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1), when he forewarns them of the destruction of the Holy City (Mark xiii. 3, Andrew, in this instance, with them), in the agony of Gethsemane. St. Peter is throughout the leader of that band; to John belongs the yet more memorable distinction of being the disciple whom Jesus loved. This love is returned with a more single undivided heart by him than by any other. If Peter is the πάντως ἀμφιβλητός, John is the πάντως ἀληθινός (Grotius, Proleg. in Johm.). Some striking facts indicate this; but the character was which was thus worthy of the love of Jesus of Nazareth. They hardly sustain the popular notion, fostered by the received types of Christian art, of a nature gentle, yielding, feminine. The name Boanerges (Mark iii. 17) implies a vehemence, zeal, intensity, which gave to those who had it the name of Sons of Thunder. That spirit broke out, once and again, when their Saviour laid their mother in asking for the highest places in the kingdom of their Master, and declared that they were ready to face the dark terrors of the cup that he drank and the baptism that he was baptized with (Matt. xx. 23-24; Mark x. 35-41) when they rebuked one who cast out devils in their Lord's name because he was not one of their company (Luke iv. 39) when they sought to call down fire from heaven upon a village of the Samaritans (Luke ix. 54). About this time Salome, as if her husband had died, takes her place among the women who followed Jesus in Galilee (Luke viii. 3), ministering to him of their substance, and went with him in his last journey to Jerusalem (Luke xxi. 55). Through her, we may well believe, St. John first came to know that Mary Magdalen whose character he depicts with such a life-like touch, and that other Mary to whom he was afterwards to stand in so close and special a relation. The fullness of his narrative of what the other Evangelists omit (John xxi.) leads to the conclusion that he was united also by some special ties of intimacy to the family of Bethany. It is not necessary to dwell at length on the familiar history of the Last Supper. What is characteristic is that he is there, as ever, the disciple whom Jesus loved; and, as the chosen and favored friend, reclines at table with his head upon his Master's breast (John xiii. 23). To him the eager Peter—they had been sent together to prepare the supper (Luke xxii. 8) makes signs of impatient questioning that he should ask what was not likely to be answered if it came from any other (John xiii. 24). As they go out to the Mount of Olives the chosen three are nearest to their Master. They only are within sight or hearing of the conflict in the temple (Matt. xxvii. 55). When the betrayal is accomplished, Peter and John, after the first moment of confusion, follow afar off, while the others simply seek safety in a hasty flight (John xviii. 15). The personal acquaintance which existed between John and Caiaphas enabled him to gain access both for himself and Peter, but the latter remains in the porch with the officers and servants, while John himself apparently is admitted to the council-chamber, and follows therefrom even to the pronouncement of the Roman Procurator (John xvi. 16, 19, 28). Thence, as if the desire to see the end, and the love which was stronger than death, sustained him through all the terrors and sorrows of that day, he followed—accompanied probably by his own mother, Mary the mother of Jesus, and Mary Magdalene—to the place of crucifixion. The Teacher who had been to him as a brother leaves to him a brother's duty. He is to be as a son to the mother who is left desolate (John xix. 26-27). The Sabbath that followed was spent, it would appear, in the same company. He receives Peter, in spite of his denial, on the old terms of friendship. It is to them that Mary Magdalene first runs with the tidings of the emptied sepulchre (John xx. 1): they are the first to go together to see what the strange words meant. Not without some bearing on their respective characters is the fact that John is the more impetuous, running on most eagerly to the rock-tomb; Peter, the least restrained by awe, the first to enter in and look (John xx. 4-6). For at least eight days they continued in Jerusalem (John xx. 25). Then, in the interval between the resurrection and the ascension, we find them still together on the sea of Galilee (John xx. 1), as though they would calm the eager suspense of that period of expectation by a return to their old calling and their old familiar haunts. Here, too, there is a characteristic difference. John is the first to recognize in the dim form seen in the morning twilight the presence of his risen Lord; Peter the first to plunge into the water and swim towards the shore where He stood calling to them (John xxi. 7). The last words of John are recorded as a means of the other's attention which united the two friends. It is not enough for Peter to know his own future. That at once suggests the question—"And what shall this man do?" (John xxi. 21). The history of the Acts shows the same union. They are of course together at the ascension and on the day of Pentecost. Together they enter the Temple as worshippers (Acts iii. 1) and protest against the threats of the Sadducees (iv. 13). They are fellow-workers in the great first step of the Church's expansion. The Apostle whose wrath had been roused by the unbelief of the Samaritans, overcomes his national exclusiveness, and receives them as his brethren (viii. 14). The persecution which was pushed on by Saul of Tarsus did not drive him or any of the Apostles from their post (viii. 1). When the persecutor came back as the convert, he, it is true, did not see him (Gal. i. 19), but this of course does not preclude that it was the same that he had left Jerusalem. The sharper though shorter act (xxvii. 2). The incident which followed under Herod Agrippa brought a great sorrow to him in the martyrdom of his brother (Acts xii. 2). His friend was driven to seek safety in flight. Fifteen years after St. Paul's first visit he was still at Jerusalem, and helped to take part in the great settlement of the controversy between the Jewish and the gentile Christians (Acts xxi. 20). His position and resources were those of one ranking among the chief "pillars" of the Church (Gal. ii. 9). Of the work of the Apostle during this period we have hardly the slightest trace. There may have been special calls to mission-work like that which drew him to Samaria. There may have been the work of teaching, organizing, exhorting the churches of Judea. His fulness of the solemn charge intrusted to him may have led him to a life of loving and reverent thought rather than to one of conspicuous activity. We may, at all events, feel sure that it was a time in which the natural elements of his character, with all their fiery energy, were being purified and mollified, rising step by step to that high serenity which we find perfected in the closing portion of his life. Here, too, we may, without much hesitation, accept the traditions of the Church as recording a historic fact when they ascribe to him a life of edicity (Tertull. de Monog. c. 13). The absence of his name from 1 Cor. i.x. 5 tends to the same conclusion. It harmonizes with all we know of his character to think of his heart as so absorbed in the higher and divine love that there was no room left for the lower and the human.

III. From his Departure from Jerusalem to his Death.—The traditions of a later age come in, with more or less show of likelihood, to fill up the great gap which separates the Apostle of Jerusalem from the Bishop of Ephesus. It was a natural conjecture to suppose that he remained in Judea till the death of the Virgin released him from his trust.6 When this took place we can only conjecture. There are no signs of his being at Jerusalem at the ascension. There are none of his remaining at Jerusalem when the Apostle to the Gentiles was sent by the Church to the Gentiles. Whether in the time of Augusteine (Quatt. Rom. ii. 19), and embodied in some MSS. of the N. T., represented the 1st Epistle of St. John as addressed to the Parthians, and so far implied that his Apostolic work had brought him into contact with them. When the form of the aged disciple meets us again, in the twilight of the Apostolic age, we are still left in great doubt as to the extent of his work and the circumstances of his outward life. Assuming the authorship of the Epistles and the Revelation to be his, the facts which the N. T. writings assert or imply are—(1) that, having come to Ephesus, some persecution, local or general, drove him to Patmos (Rev. i. 9); (2) that the seven churches, of which seven agencies of the Episcopalians were the special objects of his solicitude (Rev. i. 11): that in his work he had to encounter men who denied the truth on which his faith rested (1 John iv. 1; 2 John 7), and others who, with a railing and malignant temper, disputed his authority (5 John 9, 10). If to this we add that he must have outlived all, or nearly all of those who had been the friends and companions even of his earlier years—that this lingering age gave strength to an old imagination that his Lord had promised him immortality (John xxi. 23) — that, as if remembering the actual words which had been thus perverted, the longing of his soul gathered itself up in the cry, “Even so, come, Lord Jesus” (Rev. xxii. 20)—that from some who spoke with authority he received a solemn assurance of the confidence they reposed in him (John xxi. 24)—we have stated all that has any claim to the character of historical truth. The picture which tradition fills up for us has the merit of being full and vivid, but it blends together, without much regard to harmony, things probable and improbable. He is shipwrecked off Ephesus (Simeon Metaph. in viit. John. c. 2; Laume. i. 47), and arrives there in time to check the progress of the heresies which sprang up after St. Paul’s departure. Then, or at a later period, he numbers among his disciples men like Polycarp, Papias, Ignatius (Hieron. de Vir. Hist. c. 17). In the persecution under Domitian he is taken to Rome, and there, by his boldness, though not by death, gains the crown of martyrdom. The boiling oil into which he is thrown has no power to hurt him (Tertull. de Prescritp. c. 36). He is then sent to labor in the mines, and Patmos is the place of his exile (Victorinus in Apoc. i. x.; Laume. l. 96). The acceptance of Nerva frees him from danger, and he returns to Ephesus. There he settles the canon of the Gospel-history by formally attesting the truth of the first three Gospels, and writing his own to supply what they left wanting (Euseb. H. E. ii. 24). The elders of the Church are gathered together, and he, as by a sudden inspiration, begins with the wonderful opening; “In the beginning was

THE word” (Hieron. de Vr. Illust. c. 29). Heresies continue to show themselves, but he meets them with the strongest possible protest. He refuses to pass under the same roof (that of the public baths of Ephesus) as their foremost leader, lest the house should fall down on them and crush them (Iren. iii. 3; Euseb. H. E. iii. 22, iv. 14). Through his agency of the example of Artemas, is at last nipt of its magnificence, and even (?) leveled with the ground (Cyril. Alex. Orat. de Mer. Virg.; Nicephor. H. E. ii. 42; Laume. i. 90). He introduces and perpetuates the Jewish mode of celebrating the Easter feast (Euseb. H. E. iii. 3). At Ephesus, if not before, as one who was a true priest of the Lord, bearing on his brow the plate of gold (nephalion; comp. Suicer. Thes. s. v.), with the sacred name engraved on it, which was the badge of the Jewish pontiff (Polytretes, in Euseb. H. E. iii. 21, v. 24). In strange contrast with this ideal exaltation, a later tradition tells how the old man used to find pleasure in the playfulness and fondness of a favorite bird, and defended himself against the charge of unworthy trifling by the familiar apologue of the bow that must sometimes be bent (Comp. Euseb. Coloss. xxix. c. 3). More true to the N. T. character of the Apostle is the story, told with so much power and beauty by Clement of Alexandria (Quis divae, c. 42), of his special and loving interest in the younger members of his flock; of his eagerness and courage in the attempt to rescue one of them who had fallen into evil courses. The scene of the old and loving man, standing face to face with the outlaw-chief whom, in days gone by, he had baptized, and winning him to repentance, is one which we could gladly look on as belonging to his actual life—part of a story which is, in Clement’s words, ov μίθος, ἀλλὰ λαγός. Not less beautiful is that other scene which comes before us as the last act of his life. When all capacity to work and teach is gone—when there is no strength even to stand—the spirit still retains its power to love, and the lips are still opened to repeat, without change and variation, the command which summed up all his Master’s will, “Little children, love one another” (Hieron. in Col. vi.). Other stories, more apocryphal and less interesting, we may pass over rapidly. That he put forth his power to raise the dead to life (Euseb. H. E. v. 18); that he drank the cup of hemlock which was intended to cause his death, and suffered no harm from it (Ps.-August. Sollog.; Isid. Hispal.

* Here again the hypotheses of commentators range from Claudius to Domitian, the consensus of patristic tradition preponderating in favor of the latter. [Comp. Revelation.]

1 The scene of the supposed miracle was outside the Porta Aboriginum and hence the Western Church commonly remembers it by the special festival of St. John Port. Latin on May 6th.

2 Eusebius and Irenæus make Cerinthus the heretic. In Epiphanius (Herr. xxx. c. 24) Eilen is the hero of the story. To modern feelings the anecdote may seem at variance with the character of the Apostle of Love, but it is hardly more than the development in act of the principle of 2 John 1). To the mind of Epiphanius there was difficulty of another kind. Nothing less that a special inspiration could account for such a departure from an ascetic life as going to a bath at all.

3 The story of the nephalion is perhaps the most perplexing of all the traditions as to the age of the Apostles. What makes it still stranger is the appearance of a like tradition (Hegesippos in Euseb. H. E. ii. 23; Epiph. Herr. 78) about James the Just. Measured by our notions, the statement seems altogether improbable, and yet how can we account for its appearance at so early a date? Is it possible that this was the symbol that the old exclusive priesthood had passed down as a secret? If so, there is a strong presumption of some perverted statement as to the new priesthood was misinterpreted, and that rhetoric passed rapidly into legend? [Comp. Neum. Phaph. u. Leyt. p. 613; Stanley, Sermons and Essays on Apostolate Age, p. 283.] Ewald (l. c.) finds in it an evidence in support of the hypothesis above referred to.

4 The authority of Cassian is but slender in such a case; but the story is hardly to be rejected, on a priori grounds, as incompatible with the dignity of an Apostle. Does it not illustrate the truth—

“Hie praeysth best who lovesth best
All things both great and small”?

5 The memory of this deliverance is preserved in the symbolic cup, with the serpents issuing from it, which appears in the medieval representations of the

JOHN THE BAPTIST (Iouan'n, δ ὄδηγος [and δ ὄδηγ of], a saint more signaly honored of God than any other whose name is recorded in either the O. or the N. T. John was of the priestly race by both parents, for his father Zecharias was himself a priest of the course of Abia, or Aliajah (1 Chr. xxiv. 10), offering incense at the very time when a son was promised to him; and Elizabeth was of the daughters of Aaron (Luke i. 5). Both, too, were devout persons — walking in the commandments of God, and waiting for the fulfillment of his promise to Israel. The divine mission of John was the subject of prophecy many centuries before his birth, for St. Matthew (iii. 3) tells us that it was John who was forefigured by Isaiah as "the Voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight" (Is. xi. 3), while by the prophet Malachi the spirit announces more definitely, "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before Me" (iii. 1). His birth — a birth not according to the ordinary laws of nature, but through the miraculous interposition of Almighty power — was foretold by an angel sent from God, who announced it as an occasion of joy and gladness to many — and at the same time assigned to him the name of John to signify either that he was to be born of God's especial favor, or, perhaps metae," et seq., is familiar to most students as the motto prefixed by Olshausen to his commentary on St John's gospel. The whole hymn is to be found in Trench's Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 71; also in Daniel, Theaurae Homiliae, ii. 109, and Mowe's Latinische Hymnen des Mittelalters, iii. 118.)

recorded and the personal with ing that shadows of it current. The time of his death lies within the region of conjecture rather than of history, and the dates that have been assigned for it range from A. D. 89 to A. D. 120 (Lampe, i. 92).

The result of all this accumulation of apocryphal materials is, from one point of view, disappointing enough. We strain our sight in vain to distinguish between the false and the true — between the shadows with which the gloom is peeped, and the living forms of which we are in search. We find it better and more satisfying to turn again, for all our confusions of the Apostle's mind and character, to the scanty records of the N. T., and to the writings which he himself has left. The truth sought that we can attain to is still that he was "the disciple whom Jesus loved" — ὁ ἐπισκόπων Ἐρατο — returning that love with a deep, absorbing, unwavering devotion. One aspect of that feeling is seen in the zeal for his Master's glory, the burning indignation against all that seemed to outrage it, which runs, with its fiery gloom, through his whole life, and makes him, from first to last, one of the Sons of Thunder. To him, more than to any other disciple, there is no neutrality between Christ and Antichrist. The spirit of such a man is intolerant of compromises and concessions. The same strong personal affection shows itself, in another form, in the chief characteristics of his Gospel. While the other Evangelists record primarily the discourses and parables which were spoken to the multitude, he treasures up every word and accept of dialogues and conversations, which must have seemed to most men less conspicuous. In the absence of any recorded narrative of his work as a preacher, in the silence which he appears to have kept for so many years, he comes before us as one who lives in the unseen eternal world, rather than in that of secular, or spiritual actualities. If there is less apparent power to enter into the minds and hearts of men of different temperament and education, less ability to become all things to all men than there is in St. Paul, there is a perfection of another kind. The image mirrored in his soul is that of the Son of Man, who is also the Son of God. He is the Apostle of Love, not because he starts from the easy temper of a general benevolence, nor again as being of a character soft, yielding, feminine, but because he has grown, ever more and more, into the likeness of Him whom he loved so truly. Nowhere is the vision of the Eternal Word, the glory of as the only-begotten of the Father, so uncloaked; nowhere are there such distinctively per-that he was to be the harbinger of grace. The angel Gabriel moreover proclaimed the character and office of this wonderful child even before his conception, foretelling that he would be filled with the Holy Ghost from the first moment of his existence, and appear as the great reformer of his countrymen — another Elijah in the boldness with which he would speak truth and rebuke vice — but, above all, as the chosen forerunner and herald of the long-expected Messiah.

These marvelous revelations as to the character and career of the son, for whom he had so long prayed in vain, were too much for the faith of the aged Zacharias; and when he sought some assurance of the certainty of the promised blessing, God gave it to him in a judgment — the privation of speech — until the event foretold should happen — a judgment intended to serve at once as a token of God's truth, and a rebuke of his own incredulity. And now the Lord's gracious promise tarried not — Elizabeth, for greater privacy, retired into the hill-country, whither she was soon afterwards followed by her kinswoman Mary, who was herself the object and channel of divine grace beyond measure greater and more mysterious. The two cousins, who were thus honored above all the mothers of Israel, came together in a meeting of the Holy Ghost, all surprise, at the home of the Hebron, by others (Jutta), and immediately God's purpose was confirmed to them by a miraculous sign; for as soon as Elizabeth heard the salutations of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb, thus acknowledging, as it were even before birth, the presence of his Lord (Luke i. 43. 44). Three months after this, and while Mary still remained with her, Elizabeth was delivered of a son. The birth of John preceded by six months that of our blessed Lord. [Respecting this date, see Jesus Christ, p. 1381.] On the eighth day the child of promise was, in conformity with the law of Moses (Lev. xii. 3), brought to the priest for circumcision, and as the performance of this rite was the accustomed time for naming a child, the friends of the family proposed to call him Zacharias after the name of his father. The mother, however, required that he should be called John — a decision which Zacharias, still speechless, confirmed by writing on a tablet, "his name is John." The judgment on his want of faith was then at once withdrawn, and the first use which he made of his recovered speech was to praise Jehovah for his faithfulness and mercy (Luke i. 64). God's wonderful interposition in the birth of John had impressed the minds of many with a certain solemn awe and expectation (Luke iii. 15). God was surely again visiting his people. His providence, so long hidden, seemed once more about to manifest itself. The child thus supernaturally born must doubtless be commissioned to perform some important part in the history of the chosen people. Could it be the Messiah? Could it be Elijah? Was the era of their old prophets about to be restored? With such grave thoughts were the minds of the people occupied, as they paused on the events which had been passing under their eyes, and said one to another, "What manner of child shall this be?" while Zacharias himself, "filled with the Holy Ghost," broke forth in that glorious strain of praise and prophecy so familiar to us in the morning service of our church — a strain in which it is to be observed that the father, before speaking of his own child, blesses God for remunerating his covenant and promise, in the redemption and salvation of his people through Him, of whom his own son was the prophet and forerunner. A single verse contains all that we know of John's history for a space of thirty years — the whole period which elapsed between his birth and the commencement of his public ministry.

"The child grew and waxed strong in the spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (Luke i. 80). John, it will be remembered, was ordained to be a Nazarite (see Num. vi. 21), from his birth, for the words of the angel were, "He shall drink neither wine nor strong drink" (Luke i. 15). What we are to understand by this brief announcement is probably this: The chosen forerunner of the Messiah and herald of his kingdom was required to forego the ordinary pleasures and indulgences of the world, and live a life of the strictest self-denial in retirement and solitude.

It was thus that the holy Nazarite, dwelling by himself in the wild and thinly peopled region westward of the Dead Sea, called "Desert" in the text, prepared himself by self-discipline, and by constant communion with God, for the wonderful office to which he had been divinely called. Here year after year of his stern probation passed by, till at length the time for the fulfillment of his mission arrived. During the very appearance of the phantom of itself a lesson to his countrymen; his dress was that of the old prophets — a garment woven of camel's hair (2 K. i. 8), attached to the body by a leathern girdle. His food was such as the desert afforded — locusts (Lev. xi. 22) and wild honey (Ps. lxxvi. 16).

And now the long secluded hermit came forth to the discharge of his office. His supernatural birth — his hard ascetic life — his reputation for extraordinary sanctity — and the generally prevailing expectation that some great one was about to appear — these causes, without the aid of miraculous power, for "John did no miracle" (John x. 41), were sufficient to attract to him a great multitude from "every quarter" (Matt. iii. 5). Brief and startling was his first exhortation to them — "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Some soundly wise may have found in this the rebuke of John's preaching, and the sum of it all is repentance; not mere legal ablation or expiation, but a change of heart and life. Herein John, though exhibiting a marked contrast to the Scribes and Pharisees of his own time, was but repeating with the stimulus of a new and powerful motive the lessons which had been again and again impressed upon them by their ancient prophets (cf. Is. i. 16, 17, iv. 7; Jer. vii. 3-7; Ez. xviii. 19-32, xxxvi. 23-27; Joel ii. 12, 13; Mic. vi. 8; Zech. i. 3, 4). But while such was his solemn admonition to the multitude at large, he adopted towards the leading sects of the Jews a severer tone, denouncing Pharisaics and Saducees alike as "a generation of vipers," and warning them of the folly of trusting to external privileges as descendants of Abraham (Luke iii. 8). Now at last he warns them that "the axe was laid to the root of the tree" — that formal righteousness would be tolerated no longer, and that none would be acknowledged for children of Abraham but such as did the works of Abraham (cf. John viii. 39). Such alarming declarations produced their effect, and many of every class pressed forward to confess their sins and to be baptized.

What then was the baptism which John administered? Not altogether a new rite, for it was the custom of the Jews to baptize proselytes to their religion— not an ordinance in itself conveying remission of sins, but rather a token and symbol of that remission which was an indispensable condition of forgiveness through Him, whom John pointed out as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." Still less did the baptism of John impart the grace of regeneration—of a new spiritual birth. This was to be the mysterious effect of baptism "with the Holy Ghost," which was to be ordained by that "Mightier One," whose coming he proclaimed. The preparatory baptism of John was a visible sign to the people, and a distinct acknowledgment by them, that a hearty renunciation of sin and a real amendment of life were necessary for admission into the kingdom of heaven, which the Baptist proclaimed to be at hand. But the fundamental distinction between John's baptism unto repentance, and that baptism accompanied with the gift of the Holy Spirit which our Lord afterwards ordained, is clearly marked by John himself (Matt. iii. 11, 12).

As a preacher, John was eminently practical and discriminating. Self-love and covetousness were the prevalent sins of the people at large: on them therefore he enjoined charity, and consideration for others, which were the chief means of being prepared for the reception of the Holy Spirit. For instance, the soldiers against violence and plunder. His answers to them are, no doubt, to be regarded as instances of the appropriate warning and advice which he addressed to every class.

The mission of the Baptist—an extraordinary one for an extraordinary purpose—was not limited to those who had openly forsaken the covenant of God, and so forfeited its principles. It was to the whole people alike. This we must infer from the baptism of one who had no confession to make, and no sins to wash away. Jesus Himself came from Galilee to Jordan to be baptized of John, on the special ground that it became Him "to fulfill all righteousness," and, as man, to submit the customs and ordinances which were binding upon the rest of the Jewish people. John, however, naturally at first shrank from offering the symbols of purity to the sinless Son of God. But here a difficult question arises—How is John's acknowledgment of Jesus at the moment of his presenting Himself for baptism compatible with his subsequent assertion that he knew Him not, save by the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him, which took place after his baptism? If it be difficult to imagine that the two courses were not personally acquainted with each other, it must be borne in mind that their places of residence were at the two extremities of the country, with but little means of communication between them. Perhaps, too, John's special destination and mode of life may have kept him from the stated festivals of his countrymen at Jerusalem. It is possible therefore that the Saviour and the Baptist had never before met. It was certainly of the utmost importance that there should be no occasion of concert or collusion between them. John, however, must assuredly have seen in daily expectation of Christ's manifestation to Israel, and so a word or sign would have sufficed to reveal to him the person and presence of our Lord, though we may well suppose such a fact to be made known by a direct communication from God, as in the case of Ninian (Luke ii. 26; cf. Jackson "in the Creed"; Wilkins, Ox. ed. vi. 404). At all events it is wholly inconceivable that John should have been permitted to baptize the Son of God without being enabled to distinguish Him from any of the ordinary multitudes. Upon the whole, the true meaning of the words καὶ ἐχθρὸν ήπον ἰδεῖν ὁ θεός οὐδεὶς would seem to be as follows: And I, even I, standing in so near a relation to Him, both personally and ministerially, had no assured knowledge of Him or the Messiah. I did not know Him, and I had not authority to proclaim Him as such, till I saw the predicted sign in the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him. It must be borne in mind that John had no means of knowing by previous announcement, whether this wonderful acknowledgment of the Divine Son would be consoled to his forerunner at his baptism, or at any other time (see Dr. Mill's Hist. Character of St. Luke's Gospel, and the authorities quoted by him).

With the baptism of Jesus John's more especial office ceased. The king had come to his kingdom. The function of the herald was discharged. It was this that John had with singular humility and self-renunciation announced beforehand: "He must increase, but I must decrease."

John, however, still continued to present himself to his countrymen in the capacity of witness to Jesus. Especially did he bear testimony to Him at Bethany beyond Jordan (for Bethany, not Beth-"hem), the birthplace of the Messiah. Moreover, it seems that John had not, in his different appearances of the kind mentioned, shirked the difficulties. For if we consider (see John iii. 23, iv. 1; Acts xiv. 3), we gather also that John instructed his disciples in certain moral and religious duties, as fasting (Matt. ix. 14; Luke v. 33) and prayer (Luke xi. 1).

But shortly after he had given his testimony to the Messiah, John's public ministry was brought to a close. He had at the beginning of it condemned the hypocrisy and worldliness of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and he now had occasion to denounce the lust of a king. In daring disregard of the divine laws, Herod Antipas had taken to himself the wife of his brother Philip; and when John reproved him for this, as well as for other sins (Luke iii. 19), Herod cast him into prison. The place of his confinement was the castle of Machærus—a fortress on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. It was here that reports reached him of the miracles which our Lord was working in Judæa—miracles which, doubtless, were to John's mind but the confirmation of what he expected to hear as to the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. But if Christ's kingdom were indeed established, it was the duty of John's own disciples no less than of all others to acknowledge it. They, however, would naturally cling to their true leader, and be slow to conform to a change of allegiance to another. With a view therefore to overcome their scruples, John sent two of them to Jesus Himself to ask the question, "Art Thou He that should come?" They were answered not by words, but by a series of miracles wrought before their eyes—the very miracles which prophecy had specified as the distinguishing credentials of the Messiah (Is. xxxv. 5, lix. 1); and, while Jesus had the two messengers carry back to John as his only answer the report of what they had seen and heard, He took occasion to guard the multitude who surrounded Him against supposing that the Baptist himself was shaken in mind, by a direct Witsius, the so and undoubtedly his instructions ask. The humility, not possessed, characterizes the body only and must be acknowledged to acknowledge that one so incured to a life of hardness and privation was not affected by being subject to the ordinary torments of a prison. But our Lord not only vindicates his forerunner from any suspicion of impiety, but goes on to proclaim him a prophet, and more than a prophet, nay, inferior to none born of woman, though in respect to spiritual privileges behind the least of those who were to be born of the Spirit and admitted into the fellowship of Christ's body (Matt. xi. 11). It should be noted that the expression δὲ μακρότερος, κ.τ.λ. is understood by Chrysostom, Augustin, Hilary, and some modern commentators, to mean Christ Himself, but this interpretation is less agreeable to the spirit and tone of our Lord's discourse.

Jesus further proceeds to declare that John was, according to the true meaning of the prophecy, the Elijah of the new covenant, foretold by Malachi (iii. 4). The event indeed proved that John was to Herod what Elijah had been to Ahab, and a prison was deemed too light a punishment for his boldness in asserting God's law before the face of a king and a queen. Nothing but the death of the Baptist would satisfy the resentment of Herodias. Though fooled once, she continued to watch her opportunity, which at length arrived. A court festival was kept at Machaerus [see THEODORUS] in honor of the king's birthday. After supper [or during it, Mark vi. 21, 22], the daughter of Herodias came in and danced before the company, and so charmed was the king by her grace that he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she should ask.

Salome, prompted by her abandoned mother, demanded the head of John the Baptist. The promise had been given in the hearing of his distinguished guests, and so Herod, though loth to be made the instrument of so bloody a work, gave instructions to an officer of his guard, who went and executed John in the prison, and his head was brought and presented to the eyes of the adulteress whose sins he had denounced.

Thus was John added to that glorious army of martyrs who have suffered for righteousness' sake. His death is supposed to have occurred just before the third Passover in the course of the Lord's ministry. It is by Josephus (Ant. xviii. 5, § 2) attributed to the jealousy with which Herod regarded his growing influence with the people. Herod undoubtedly looked upon him as some extraordinary person. "For no sooner did he hear of the miracles of Jesus than, though a Saducee himself, and as such a disbeliever in the Resurrection, he ascribed them to John, whom he supposed to be risen from the dead. Holy Scripture tells us that the body of the Baptist was laid in the tomb by his disciples, and ecclesiastical history records the honors which successive generations paid to his memory."

The brief history of John's life is marked throughout by his character. He knew his calling, and, being burdened with a denial, humility, and holy courage. So great indeed was his abstinance that worldly men considered him possessed. "John came neither eating nor drinking, and they said he hath a devil." His humility was such that he had again and again to disavow the character, and decline the honors which admiring multitude almost forced upon him. To their questions he answered plainly, he was not the Christ, nor the Elijah, but the prophet, nor one of their old prophets. He was no other—a voice merely—the Voice of God calling his people to repentance in preparation for the coming of Him whose shoe latchet he was not worthy to unloose.

For his boldness in speaking truth, he went a willing victim to prison and to death.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF. 1. Authority.—No doubt has been entertained at any time in the Church, either of the canonical authority of this Gospel, or of its being written by St. John. The text 2 Pet. i. 14 is not indeed sufficient to support the inference that St. Peter and his readers were acquainted with the fourth Gospel, and recognized its authority. But still no other book of the N. T. is authenticated by testimony of so early a date as that of the disciples which is embodied in the Gospel itself (xxii. 24, 25). Among the Apostolic Fathers, Ignatius appears to have known and recognized this Gospel. His declaration,"I desire that they who are the children of God, which is the flesh of Jesus Christ the Son of God . . . and I desire the drink of God, his blood, which is incorruptible love" (ad Rom. c. 7; Cureton, Corpus Ignatianum, p. 231), could scarcely have been written by one who had not read St. John vii. 52, &c. And in the €p. ad Philadelphos, c. 7 (which, however, is not contained in Mr. Cureton's Syriac MSS.), the same writer says, "The Holy Spirit knoweth whence He cometh and whither He goeth, and reproveth the things which are hidden:" this is surely more than an accidental verbal coincidence with St. John iii. 8 and xvi. 8. The fact that this Gospel is not quoted by Clement of Rome (A. P. 68 or 96) serves, as Dean Alford suggests, merely to confirm the statement that it is a very late production of the Apostolic age. Polycarp in his short epistle, Hermas, and Barnabas do not refer to it. But its phraseology may be clearly traced in the Epistle to Diognetus (Christian dwell in the world, but they are not of the world;" comp. John xvii. 11, 14, 16; "He sent his only-begotten Son . . . as loving, notcondemning;" comp. John iii. 16, 17), and in Justin Martyr, A. D. 150 ("Christ said, Except ye be born again ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven; and it is manifest to all that it is impossible for those who have been once born to enter into the wombs of those that bare them:" Apol. c. 61; comp. John iii. 3, 5; and again, "His blood having been produced, not of human seed, but of the will of God:" Trypho, c. 63; comp. John i. 13, &c.). Tatian, A. D. 170, wrote a harmony of the four Gospels: and he quotes St. John's Gospel in his only extant work; so do his contemporaries Apollinaris of Hierapolis, Athenagoras, and the writer of the Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians. The Docetists and Valentinians made great use of it; and one of their sect, Heracleom, wrote a commentary on it. Yet its authority among orthodox Christians was so furnished to be shaken thereby. Theophilus of Antioch (of Antiochus, ii.) expressly ascribes this Gospel to St. John; and he wrote, according to Jerome (Ep. 54, ad Alfeus.), a harmonized commentary on the four Gospels. And, to close the list of writers of the second century, the numerous and full testimonies of Irenaeus in Gaul and Tertullian at Carthage, with the obscure but weighty testimony of the Roman writer of the Muratorian Fragment on the Canon, sufficiently show the authority attributed in the Western Church to this Gospel. The fourth century introduces a fresh testimony from the Fathers of the Alexandrian Church, Clement and Origen, which it is unnecessary here to quote at length.

Cerdon, Marcion, the Montanists, and other ancient heretics (see Lampe, Commentarius, i. 136), did not deny that St. John was the author of the Gospel, but they held that the Apostle was mistaken, or that his Gospel had been interpolated in those passages which are opposed to their tenets. The Allogi, a sect in the beginning of the third century, were singular in rejecting the writings of St. John. Gneirke (Einleitung in N. T. p. 303) enumerates later opponents of the Gospel, beginning with an Englishman, Edw. Evanson, On the Dissuance of the Four Evangelists, Iepwch, 1792, and closing with Bretschneider's Probabilita de Evangelii, etc., originis, Lips. 1829. His arguments are characterized by Gneirke as strong in comparison with those of his predecessors. They are grounded chiefly on the strangeness of such language and thought as those of St. John coming from a Galilean fisherman, and on the difference between the representations of our Lord's person and of his manner of speech given by St. John and the other Evangelists. Gneirke answers Bretschneider's arguments in detail. The skepticism of more recent times has found its fullest, and, according to Bleek, its most important, expression in a treatise by Liitzenberger on the tradition respecting the Apostle John and his writings (1840). His arguments are recapitulated and answered by Dr. Davidson (Introduction to the N. T., 1818, vol. i. p. 244, &c.). It may suffice to mention one specimen. St. Paul's expression (Gal. ii. 6), agnoscit me, is translated by Liitzenberger, "whencever they [Peter, James, and John] were formerly." he discovers therein an implied assertion that all three were not living when the Epistle to the Galatians was written, and infers that since Peter and James were undoubtedly alive, John must have been dead, and therefore the tradition which ascribes to him the residence at Ephesus, and the composition, after A. D. 60, of various writings, must confound him with another John. Still more recently the objections of Baur to St. John's Gospel have been answered by Ebrard, Das Evangelium Johannis, etc., Zürich, 1845.

2. Place and Time at which it was written.—Ephesus and Patmos are the two places mentioned by early writers: and the weight of evidence seems to preponderate in favor of Ephesus, 60. The third century introduces another place (Jerome, Proc. in Matth., vi. 6) where the Church of Ephesus was, mentioned as a church of Asia. He seems to have dwelt in Ephesus of Asia. Jerome (Proc. in Matth.) states that John was in Asia when he compiled with the request of the bishops of Asia and others to write more profoundly concerning the Divinity of Christ. The whole of Meopnesta (Proc. in Ιονηνην) relates that John was living at Ephesus when he was moved by his disciples to write his Gospel.

The evidence in favor of Patmos comes from two anonymous writers. The author of the Synopsis of Scripture, printed in the works of Athanasius, states that the Gospel was dictated by St. John in Patmos, and published afterwards in Ephesus. The author of the work De XII. Apostolis, printed in the Appendix to Fabricius's Hagiopolis (p. 952. ed. Mige), states that John was banished by Domitian to Patmos, where he wrote his Gospel. The later date of these unknown writers, and the seeming inconsistency of their testimony with St. John's self-evident position, in the second century, distinctly shows, that he had previously borne record of the Word of God, render their testimony of little weight.

Attempts have been made to elicit from the language of the Gospel itself some argument which should decide the question whether it was written before or after the destruction of Jerusalem. But considering that the present tense "is" is used in v. 2, and the past tense "was" in xi. 18, xviii. 1, xix. 41, it would seem reasonable to conclude that these passages throw no light upon the question.

Clement of Alexandria (cphil. Eusib. ii. 6, vi 14) speaks of St. John as the latest of the Evan- gelists. The Apostle's sojourn at Ephesus probably began after St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians was written, i.e. after A. D. 62. Eusibius (E.H. iii. 20) specifies the fourteenth year of Domitian, i.e. A. D. 92, as the year of his banishment to Patmos. Probably the date of the Gospel may lie about midway between these two, about A. D. 78. The reference to it in the First Epistle and the Revelation lead to the supposition that it was written decidedly before those two books; and the tradition of its supplementary character would lead us to place it some little time after the Apostle had fixed his abode at Ephesus.

3. Occasion and Scope.—After the destruction of Jerusalem A. D. 69, Ephesus probably became the centre of the active life of Eastern Christendom. Even Antioch, the original source of missions to the Gentiles, and the future metropolis of the Christian patriarch, appears, for a time, less conspicuous in the obscurity of early church history than Ephesus, to which St. Paul inscribed his latest Epistle, which shows that John founded a church there, and left it in a state of peace and a tomb. This half-Greek, half Oriental city, "visited by ships from all parts of the Mediterranean, and united by great roads with the markets of the interior, was the common meeting-place of various characters and classes of men" (O'Byrne and Howson's St. Paul, ch. xiv.). It contained a large church of faithful Christians, a multitude of zeal, an intelligent population devoted to the worship of a strange thing whose image (Iren., Prof. in Ephe.) was borrowed from the East, its name from the West: in the Ystatus of Ephesus, free-thinking philosophers of all nations disputed over their favorite tenets (Justin, Trypho, ec. 1, 7). It was the place to which Cerinthus chose to bring the doctrines which he devised or learned at Alexandria (Necander, Church History, ii. 42, ed. John). In this city of a strange and holy image (Jerome, a.D. 31) was engaged in extending the Christian Church, when, for the greater edification of that Church, his Gospel was written. It was obviously addressed primarily to Christians, not to heathens; and the Apostle himself tells us (xx. 31) what was the end to which he looked forward in all his teaching.

Modern criticism has indulged in much curious speculation as to the exclusive or the principal motive which induced the Apostle to write. His design, as the historian of his times understood it, was to meet the deficiencies of the earlier three Gospels; according to others, to confute the Nicolaitans and Cerinthians; according to others, to state the true doctrine of the Divinity of Christ. But let it be borne in mind first of all that the inspiring, directing impulse given to St. John was that by which all "prophecy came in old time," when holy men of God spake, "not by the will of man," but as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. We cannot feel confident of our own capacity to analyze the motives and circumscribe the views of a mind under the influence of Divine inspiration. The Gospel of St. John is a boon to all ages, and to men in an infinite variety of circumstances. Something of the feelings of the chronicler, or the polemic, or the catechist may have been in the heart of the Apostle, but let us not imagine that his motives were limited to any, or to all of these.

It has indeed been pronounced by high critical authority that the supplementary theory is entirely untenable; "and so it becomes if put forth in its most rigid form, and as showing the whole design of St. John. But even Dr. Davidson, while pronouncing it unsupported by either external tradition or internal grounds, acknowledges that some truths lie upon it. Those who hold the theory in its extreme and exclusive form will find it hard to account for the fact that St. John has many things in common with his predecessors; and those who repudiate the theory entirely will find it hard to account for his omission, e. g. of such an event as the Transfiguration, which he was admitted to see, and which would have been within the scope (under any other theory) of his Gospel. Luthardt concludes most judiciously that, though St. John may not have written with direct reference to the earlier three Evangelists, he did not write without any reference to them.

And in like manner, though so able a critic as Lücke speaks of the anti-Gnostic reference of St. John as prevailing throughout his Gospel, while Luthardt is for limiting such reference to his first verses and the first scenes of the Lord; and though other writers have shown much ingenuity in discovering, and perhaps exaggerating, references to Docetism, Ebionitism, and Sabellianism; yet, when controversial references are set forth as the principal design of the Apostle, it is well to bear in mind the cautious opinion expressed by Dr. Davidson: "Designed polenical opposition to one of those errors, or to all of them, does not lie in the contents of the Gospel itself: and yet that they were not unnoticed by St. John. He intended to set forth the faith alone, and in so doing he has written passages that do confute those erroneous tendencies."

There is no intrinsic improbability in the early tradition as to the occasion and scope of this Gospel, which is most fully related in the commentary of Theodore of Mopsuestia, to the effect that while St. John lived at Ephesus, and visited all parts of Asia, the writings of Matthew, Mark, and even Luke came into the hands of the Christians, and were diligently circulated everywhere. Then it occurred to the Christians of Asia that St. John was a more credible witness than all others, forasmuch as from the beginning, even before Matthew, he was with the Lord, and enjoyed more abundant grace through the love which the Lord bore to him.

And they brought him the books, and sought to know his opinion of them. Then he praised the writers for their veracity, and said that a few things had been omitted by them, and that all but a little of the teaching of the most important miracles was recorded. And he added that they who discourse of the coming of Christ in the flesh ought not to omit to speak of his Divinity, lest in course of time men who are used to such discourses might suppose that Christ was only what He appeared to be. Therefore the brethren exhorted him to write at once the things which he judged the most important for instruction, and which he saw omitted by the others. And he did so. And therefore from the beginning he discoursed about the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ, judging this to be the necessary beginning of the Gospel, and from it he went on to the incarnation. [See above, p. 1428.]

4. Contents and Integrity. — Luthardt says that there is no book in the N. T. which more strongly than the fourth Gospel impresses the reader with the notion of its unity and integrity. And yet it does not appear to be written with such close adherence to a preconceived plan as a western writer would show in developing and illustrating some one leading idea. The preface, the break at the end of the twelfth chapter, and the supplementary chapter, are divisions which will occur to every reader. The ingenious analysis of Bengel and the thought of one of Luthardt are worthy of attention. But none is so elaborate and minute as that of Lampen, of which the following is an abridgment:—

A. The Prologue, i. 1–18.

B. The History, i. 19–xx. 29.

1. Various events relating to our Lord’s ministry, narrated in connection with seven journeys, i. 19–xii. 50:—

1. First journey into Judæa and beginning of his ministry, i. 19–ii. 12.

2. Second journey, at the Passover in the first year of his ministry, ii. 13–iv. (The manifestation of his glory in Jerusalem, ii. 13–iii. 21, and in the journey back, iii. 22–iv.)

3. Third journey, in the second year of his ministry, about the Passover, v. 1–vii. 30: the Passover, in the third year of his ministry, beyond Jordan, vi. (His glory shown by the multiplication of the loaves, and by his walking on the sea, and by the discourses with the Jews, his disciples and his Apostles.)

5. Fifth journey, six months before his death, begun at the Feast of Tabernacles, vii. vi. 21. (Circumstances in which the journey was undertaken, vi. 1–13: five signs of his glory shown at Jerusalem, vii. 14–x.)

6. Sixth journey, about the Feast of Dedication, x. 22–42. (His testimony in Solomon’s porch, and his departure beyond Jordan.)

7. Seventh journey into Judæa towards Bethany, xi. 1–54. (The raising of Lazarus and its consequences.)

8. Eighth journey, before his last Passover, xi. 55–xii. (Plots of the Jews, his entry into Jerusalem, and into the Temple, and the manifestation of his glory there.)

b. History of the Death of Christ, xii.–xx. 29.

1. Preparation for his Passion, xiii.–xvii. (Last Supper, discourse to his disciples, his communicative prayer.)

2. The circumstances of his Passion and Death, xviii. xix. (His apprehension, trial, and crucifixion.)
completely answered in a note in Gérard's L'Inritany, p. 310 (or Neutett, Iespokik, 5th Aufl. 1863, p. 225 f.), and are given up with one exception by Lücke. Other objections, though urged by Lücke, are exceedingly trivial and artificial. It is true that the reference to the author in verse 20 is unlike the manner of St. John: that xx. 30, 31 would have been placed at the end of xxi. by St. John if he had written both chapters: that the narrative descends to strangely minute circumstances, etc.

The 25th verse and the latter half of the 24th of ch. xxi. are generally received as an undisguised fabrication, probably by the author of the Episcopalian Church, where the Gospel was first published.

There is an early tradition recorded by the author of the Synopsis of Scripture in Athanasian, that this Gospel was written many years before the Apostle permitted its general circulation. This fact — rather improbable in itself — is rendered less so by the obviously supplementary character of the latter part, or perhaps the whole of ch. xxi. Ewald Grundz. der Velle Iteral., vii. 261, less skeptical herein than many of his countrymen, comes to the conclusion that the first 20 chapters of this Gospel, having been written by the Apostle, about A. D.
80, at the request, and with the help of his more advanced Christian friends, were not made public till a short time before his death, and that ch. xxi.
was a later addition by his own hand.3

5. Literature. — The principal Commentators

\(^{a}\) A distinction should be made between these passages. The genuineness of John v. 3 (or rather v.
4, with the last clause of ver. 3) and vii. 11 (or more accurately vii. 8–vii. 11) is a question of textual criticism, these verses being wanting in the oldest and most important manuscripts, and in other authorities.
They are accordingly regarded as interpolations or as of very doubtful genuineness, not only by the writers
mentioned above, but by Griesbach, Knapp, Schott, Tittmann, Thiele, Lammann (John vii. 9–vii. 11 omitted), Tischendorf, Tregelles, Alford, de Wette, Brücker, Meyer, Lücke, Tholuck, Olschanski, Neumüller, Luther, Kaezal, Baunlein, Bzel, Gnodt, Norton, Porter, Davidson, Green, Scrivener, and many other critics, except that some of these receive the last clause of v. 11 as genuine. But there is no external evidence against the genuineness of the other passages referred to.

\(^{b}\) This account of Ewald's view is not entirely entirely correct. He regards the 21st chapter as reducing substantially from the Apostolic, but as betraying here and there (as in vv. 24, 24, 25), even more than the main body of the Gospel, the hand of friends who aided him in committing its redactions to writing. Der prin., Neutett, i. 55 ff.) The main object of the addition he supposes to have been to correct the erroneous report referred to in ver. 23 respecting the exemption of the beloved disciple from death.

Anticipating the two last verses of the 21st chapter (as rather ver 25 and the last clause of ver. 24) he has the air of an editorial note is obvious. The extravagant hyperbole in ver. 25, and the use of several words (see, if this is the true reading, for δια, et, cum), are also foreign from the style of John. Perhaps there is no supposition respecting these verses more probable than that of Mr. Norton, who observes: 'According to ancient accounts, St. John wrote his Gospel at Ephesus — it is not improbable, before his death.
It is circulation had been confined to the members of that church. Thrice copies of it would be afterwards obtained; and the copies provided for transmission was, we may suppose, accompanied by the strong attendance which we now find, given by the men, or the elders of the church, to their full faith in the accounts which it contained, and by the concluding remark made by the writer of this attestation in his own person' (Genuineness of the Gospels, 23 ed., vol. i. Add. Notes, p. xxvii.; for a fuller discussion see G. A. Gesch. Comm. sur l'Évang. de St. Jean, 52 ff.)

On the supposition that the Gospel is genuine, this view of the last two verses removes all objections of any real weight to the acceptance of the remainder of the chapter of the Apostle John. The weakness of most of these objections is fully recognized even by Baur (Das kanon. Evangelize, p. 255 ff.): and Cremer, who contends against the genuineness of the chapter, admits that "it exhibits almost all the peculiarities of John's style." Gesch., der Entwicklung, vol. 1. 417 On this diffERENCE which have been urged are altogether insignificificant in comparison with the striking agreement, not merely in phraseology, but in manner, and in the structure and connection of sentences; not especially the en jambes, x. 10, 11, 12 bisse, 13, 15, bis 16, ter* 17, (ter* 23, 25, and the frequent use of eü. On the supposition, however, that the Gospel is not genuine, this Appendix presents a problem which seems to admit of no solution. What motive could there have been for adding such a supplement to a spurious work after the middle of the second century? Was it needful, fifty years or more after the Apostle's death, to correct a false report that it was promised him that he should not die? Or what imaginative purpose could this addition serve? And how is its discontinuity of detail, and its extraordinary agreement in style with the rest of the Gospel to be explained? It may be said that it was designed to give credit to the forged Gospel by a pretended attestation.
But was the whole chapter needed for this? And what credit could a fictitious work of that period derive from an anonymous testimony? Had such been the object, moreover, how strange that the Apostle John should not be named as the author? The only plausible explanation, then, of vv. 24, 25, seems to be, that they are an attestation of the trustworthiness of the Gospel by those who first put it into general circulation — companions and friends of the author, and well known to those to whom it was com-JOHN, GOSPEL OF

Until very lately the English reader had no better critical help in the study of St. John’s Gospel than those which were provided for him by Hammond, Lightfoot, and Whiby. He now has access through the learned Commentaries of Canon Wordsworth and Dean Alford to the interpretations and explanations of the ancient Fathers, and several English theologians, and to those of all the eminent German critics. The Commentaries of Chrysostom and Augustine have been translated into English in the Oxford Library of the Fathers [Chrysostom, vol. xxvii., xxxvi., Augustine, vol. xxix.] (Parker, 1848). English translations have been published also of the Commentaries of Bengel and Olshausen. And the Rev. F. D. Maurice has published an original and devout Commentary under the title of Discourses on the Gospel of St. John, 1857. W. T. B.

*GENUINENESS.—Since the rise of the Tubingen critical school, the question of the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel has been much discussed. The opponents of the Johannine authorship are far from being agreed among themselves respecting the date which they assign to the book. Baur placed it at about 160, Hilgenfeld at from 120 to 110, Schenkel at from 110 to 120, and Renan in his 13th ed. [Paris, 1867] before 100. The position of the Tubingen school on this question is a part of their general theory concerning the rise of Catholic Christianity, which they attribute to the gradual pacifying of the supposed antagonism of the Jewish-Christian or Petrine, and Gentile-Christian or Pauline, branches of the Church. As the book of Acts was an earlier one, the fourth Gospel was a later product of this compromising tendency. The writer of it assumed the name of John in order to give an Apostolic sanction to his higher theological platform, on which love takes the place of faith, and the Jewish system is shown to be fulfilled, and so abolished, by the offering of Christ, who is represented as the true Paschal lamb. The history is artificially contrived as the symbolical vestment of ideas, such as the idea of unbelief culminating in the crucifixion of the self-manifested Christ, and the idea of faith as not real and genuine so far as it rests on miracles. Renan differs from most of the German critics in receiving as authentic much more of the narrative portion of the Gospel. He conceives the work to have been composed by some disciple of the Evangelist John, who derived from the latter much of his information. In particular Renan accepts as historical the belief in the resurrection of Lazarus (which, however, he holds to have been a counterfeit miracle, the result of collusion), and much besides which John records in connection with the closing scenes of the life of Jesus.

We shall now review the principal arguments which bear on the main question. That John spent the latter part of his life, and died at an advanced age, is the testimony of his contemporaries, and of those who knew him personally. His death was a well-attested fact. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus near the close of the second century, who had become a Christian as early as 131, and seven of whose kinmen had been bishops or presbyters, says that John died and was buried in that place (Euseb. H. E. v. 24; cf. ii. 31). Ireneaus, who was born in Asia, says of those old presbyters, immediate discipies of the Apostles, whom he had known, that they had been personally conversant with John, and that he had remained among them up to the time of Trajan, whose reign was from 98 to 117. (See Irex. adv. Haer. ii. 22, al. 39, § 5.) That his informants were mistaken on such a point as the duration of the Saviour’s ministry does not invalidate their testimony in regard to the duration of John’s life, about which they could not well be mistaken. His Gospel, according to Ireneaus, Clemens of Alexandria, and others, was the last written of the four, and the tradition placed its composition near the end of his life.

In support of this proposition, we have the testimony of Jerome and Eusebius, both diligent inquirers, and knowing how to discriminate between books universally received and those which had been questioned. In an argument which depends for its force partly on an accumulation of particulars, their authority is not without weight. We may begin, however, with the indisputable fact that in the last quarter of the second century, the fourth Gospel was received in every part of Christendom municated; and the only plausible account of the first 23 verses of the chapter is, that they are a supplementary addition, which proceeded directly from the pen of the apostle himself, from the dictation of the author of the rest of the Gospel. It should further be noted that Tischendorf, in the 24th edition of his Synopsis Evangelicae (1864), brackets ver. 23 as spurious, chiefly on the ground of its omission in the Codex Sinaiticus a prima manu. The part of Tischendorf’s 8th critical edition of the N. T. containing the Gospel of John has not yet appeared.) The verse stands at present in the Codex Sinaiticus, but Tischendorf believes that the color of the ink and slight difference in the handwriting show that it did not proceed from the original scribe, but was added by a contemporary reviser of the manuscript. On this palaeographical question, however, Tregelles differs from him in Procesural Asia, in particular at Ephesus (Codex, pp. xxxviii., lxxvi. 38), has been erroneously cited as omitting the verse (see Scrivener’s Full Collation of the Cod. Sin., p. Ixx, note). The scholia of many MSS. however, speak of it as regarded by some as an addition by a foreign hand; and a scholion to this effect, ascribed in one manuscript to Theodorus of Mopsuestia, is given in Carol. Mai’s edition of the Commentaries of this father (Nova Patr. Bibl. vii. 407, or Migne’s Patrool. lixiv. 730 f.). A.

as the work of the Apostle John. The prominent witnesses are Tertullian in North Africa, Clement in Alexandria, and Irenaeus in Gaul. Tertullian, in his treatise against Marcion, written in 207 or 208, appeals in behalf of the exclusive authority of the four canonical Gospels, to tradition coming down from the Apostles—to historical evidence. (Adr. Marcion, iv. 2, 5.) Clement, an erudite and travelled scholar, not only ascribed to the Four Gospels exclusively canonical authority (Strom. iii. 13), but also, in his last work, the "Institutions," quoted by Eusebius (xi. 14), gave a tradition concerning the order of the Gospels which he had received from presbyters of more ancient times: "that is, concerning the chronological order of their composition. He became the head of the Alexandrian school about the year 190. But the testimony of Irenaeus has the highest importance, and is, in truth, when it is properly considered, of decisive weight on the main question. He was a Greek, born in Asia Minor about 140. He after wards went to Lyons in Gaul, where he first held the office of presbyter, and then, a. d. 178, that of bishop; and was therefore acquainted with the Church both in the East and the West. He had in his youth known Polycarp, the immediate disciple of John, and retained a vivid recollection of his person and words. Irenaeus not only testifies to the faithfulness of the four Gospels, but testifies that he argues fancifully that there must be four, and only four, as there are four winds, etc. This fanciful analogy, so far from impairing the force of his testimony, only serves to show how finely settled was his faith, and that of others, in the exclusive authority of the canonical Gospels. (Adv. Her. iii. 1, § 4, and iii. 11, § 8.) If the occasional use of fanciful reasoning, or similar violations of logic, were to discredit a witness, nearly all of the Fathers would be at once excluded from court. If Irenaeus had, to any extent, devised his belief in the Gospels from his reasoning, the objection to his testimony might have some solidity; but such was not the fact. The objection of Scholten and others that he misdated the Apocalypse, attributing it to the time of Domitian, does not materially affect the value of his statement on the point. A very slight error in placing a verse or adding a sentence, could not make Irenaeus express himself in this way, in case John's Gospel had first made its appearance during his lifetime, or shortly before. His relation to Polycarp—not to speak of other Christians likewise older than himself—forsakes the supposition, moreover, that this Gospel was a fictitious product of any part of the second century. Polycarp visited Rome and conferred with Anicetus, about the year 150. Several years probably elapsed after this, before he was put to death. But at the date of that visit Irenaeus had reached the age of 20, that John's Gospel was universally received at that time, might be safely inferred from what Irenaeus says in the passages referred to above, even if there were no other proof in the case. Polycarp must have been among the number of those who were present at a general synod concerning the canonical Gospel. Irenaeus's testimony, considering his relation to Polycarp and the length of Polycarp's life, affords well-nigh as strong evidence in favor of the Johannine authorship as if we had the distinct and direct assertion of the fact from that very disciple of John. The ample learning and critical spirit of Origen, though his theological career is later than that of the Fathers just named, give to his testimony to the universal reception of this Gospel much weight. If he was not free from mistakes, it should be remembered that an error on a topic of engrossing interest and capital importance, and lying in the direct line of his researches, was not likely to be committed by him; so that his judgment on the question before us goes beyond the mere fact of the reception of the Gospel by the generation just before him. In the same category with Irenaeus, Irenas, and Tertullian, is the Canon of Muratori and the Peshito version, in both of which it is stated, in the words of Origen, that Polycrates, too, in his letter to Victor (A. D. 196), characterizes the Apostle John in words borrowed from the Gospel (Euseb. v. 24). His own life, as a Christian, began, as we have said, in 131, and with that of his kinsmen, also officers of the Church, covered the century. His home was at Ephesus, the very spot where John died, and where the Gospel, if he was the author of it, first appeared.

Looking about among the fragments of Christian literature that have come down to us from the second half of the second century, we meet with Tertullian, said to have been a pupil of Justin Martyr, though after Justin's death he swerved from his teaching. It is conceded by Baur and Zeller that in the Oratio ad Graecos he quotes repeatedly from the fourth Gospel. (See cc. 13, 19, 5, 4.) In the section in which Tatian's Diatessaron is mentioned, and others, that since Tatian does not mention the name of the author of the Gospel, we cannot be certain that he referred to it John. But he quotes as from an authoritative Scripture, and there is not the slightest reason to suppose that he differed from his contemporaries on the question, who was its author. This work was written not far from A. D. 170. He also composed a sort of exegetical harmony on the basis of our four Gospels. Eusebius says (H. E. iv. 29), that "having formed a certain body or collection of Gospels, I know not how, he has given this the title Diatessaron, that is, the Gospel by the Four, or the Gospel formed of the Four, which is in the possession of certain persons now." From his manner of speaking, it would seem that Eusebius had not seen the book. But, at the beginning of the fifth century, Theodoret, in his works, mentions two books of Tatian's work, of which the Gospel of John stands preeminent. And Tatian's works were in circulation, and had taken them away, substituting for them the four Gospels. Theodoret adds that the genealogies and the descent from David were left out of Tatian's work. (H. E. iv. 5.) And, of course, the fact from Eusebius, that Tatian named his book Diatessaron, and the fact from Theodoret, that he found it in use among Catholicon Christians, in the room of the Gospels. These facts, together with the known use of the fourth Gospel by Tatian, as seen in his other work, would justify the conclusion that this Gospel was one of the four at the basis of the Diatessaron. But an early Syriac translation of this work, began, according to Bar Salibi, with the opening words of the Gospel of John: "In the beginning was the Word." If the Diatessaron is really a translation by Tatian, this occasioned confusion by Syriacs with the Harmony of Ammonius, this was not done by Bar Salibi, who distinguishes the two works. The objections of Scholten (Die altchrist. Zeugnisse, etc., p. 95 ff.), which are partly repeated by Davidso, (Introduction to the New Testament, 1868, p. 396 ff.), are sufficiently met by the remarks of Bleek, and by the observations of Riegenbach (Das Zeugnis fur das Ev. Johann, etc., p. 47 ff.). Ther-writings of the O. T. prophets serve as the foundation of exhortations to the people (Apol. i. 67). Nearly all of Justin's numerous allusions to the sayings of Christ and events of his life correspond to passages in our canonical Gospels. There is no citation from the Memoirs, which is not found in the canonical Gospels; for there is no such reference either in c. 103 or c. 88 of the Did. c. Tryph. (See Westcott, Canon of the N. T. 2d ed., p. 137 l.) Justin may have been acquainted with the Gospel of the Hebrews; but this cannot be established. That it formed one of the authoritative memoirs of which he speaks, is extremely improbable. Having attained to such an authority, how could it be thrown out and discarded without an audible word of opposition? How could this be done, if Irenaeus had already reached his manhood?—for he had attained to this age before Justin died.

In the long list of passages collected by Semisch (Die Erlaubnikeiten des Martyrs Justinus) and by other writers, there are some which are obviously taken from the fourth Gospel. One of these is the passage relative to John the Baptist (Did. c. Tryph. c. 88), which is from John i. 20, 23. Another is the passage on regeneration (Apol. i. 61) from John iii. 3—5. The occurrence of this passage respecting regeneration in the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies (Hom. xi. 26) shows that however the same deviations from John that are found in Justin's quotation, has been made an argument to prove that both writers must have taken it from some other Gospel—the Gospel of the Hebrews. But the addition to the passage in the Homilies, and the omission of the part concerning the impossibility of a second physical birth,—points of difference between Justin and the Homilies,—are quite as marked as the points of resemblance, which may be an accidental coincidence. The deviations in Justin's citation from the original in John are chiefly due to the confusion of the phraseology of this passage with that of Matt. xviii. 3— than which nothing was more natural. Similar inaccuracies, and from a similar cause, is quoted in John iii. 3 or 5, are not uncommon now. a That Justin uses the compound word ἄρρενογις, is because he had found occasion to use the same word but in the context, and because this had become the current term to designate regeneration. b a For example, Jeremy Taylor quotes the passage thus: "Unless a man be born of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." (Works, ii. 240, ed. Heber, Lond. 1829.)

b * Clement of Alexandria (Cohort. ad Grat. c. 9, Opp. p. 62, ed. Potter) has apparently confused the passages John iii. 5 and Matt. xviii. 3 in a manner similar to that of Justin. The two principal deviations of Justin from the text of John—the use of ἄρρενογις or ἄρρενογις καί τιμίων (c. 90) and ἄρρενογις καί τιμίων (c. 100)—are both found in Irenaeus, who quotes the passage thus: "εἰ μὴ τὸ ἀρρενογιαί sunt, οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθητι εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν ὄροις (Iren. xxxv. ed. Stieren). So also in Epiphanius (op. cit. 3d ed. Migne. 336), and in Euseb. (Epiphanius, c. 167), and in the Catechismi Synagogarum (Comm. in I. ii. 16, 17, Opp. vii. 93 ed. Migne). "Ἀρρενογιαῖ" in ver. 5 is also the reading of the Old Latin and Vulgate versions (veniunt fuere), and occurs in Athanasius (De Iren. c. 11), Eusebius Syrianus (De Patr. Opp. iii. 153), and Chrysostom (Hom. in 1 Cor. xx. 25). The reading ἄρρενογιαῖ in the Greek is not found in Iren. and Euseb. as above (see also Euseb. in ih. iii. 1, 2) but also in Hippolytus (quoting from the Deoteor, the Apostol. Constitut. Orig. lat. int.) Ephemeris of Syrus, Chrysostom (at least 5 times), Basil of Selcicia (Orant. xxviii. 83), Pseudo-Athanasius (Questiones ad Antiochum, c. 101), and Theodoret (Quest. in Num. 53); in Tertullian, Jerome, Philastrius, Augustine, and other Latin fathers; and in the Codex Sinaiticus with two other Greek manuscripts, and is even adopted as genuine by Tischendorf in the 21 ed. of his Synopsis Evangelicae (1854). Chrysostom in his Homilies on John iii. quotes the verse 5 times with the reading ἄρρενογιαῖ (Opp. vii. 134B, 141, ed. Mont), and 5 times with the reading ἄρρενογιαῖ. (Opp. viii. 134A, 144, see also Opp. iv. 6814, xi. 259e). These facts show how natural such variations were, and how little ground they afford for the supposition that Justin derived the passage from the Homilies or from some other source than the Gospel of John. The change from the infdefinite singular to the definite plural is made in John itself in the immediate context (ver. 1): "Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again." The length of this note may be partly excused by the fact that most of the passages of the fathers here referred to in illustration of the variations from the common text in Justin's quotation do not appear to have been noticed in any critical edition of the Greek Testament.
Baur, in one place, adduces John iii. 4 as an instance of the fictitious ascription to the Jews, on the part of the author of this Gospel, of incredible misunderstandings of the words of Jesus. If this be so, surely Justin must be indebted to this Gospel for the passage. Anxious to avoid this conclusion, and apparently forgetting what he had said before, Baur in another passage of the same work affirms that this same expression is borrowed alike by the author of John and by Justin from the Gospel of the Hebrews! (See Baur's Kriton. Evang. pp. 236, 300, compared with pp. 352, 353.) The mention of the three other citations, however, in the Homilies, in which the same deviations are found as in corresponding citations in Justin. But if this circumstance lent any plausibility to the pretense that these passages in Justin were drawn from some other document than the canonical John, this plausibility vanished and the question was really set at rest by the publication of Dressel's edition of the Homilies. This edition gives the corresponding portion, not found in Cotelieris, and we are thus furnished (Dressel, xix. 22: comp. John ix. 2, 3) with an unembodied and undeniable quotation from John. This makes it evident that Hom. iii. 52 is a quotation from John x. 9, 27, and also removes all doubt as to the source whence the quotation of John iii. 3-5 was derived. The similarity of the Homilies to Justin, in the few quotations referred to above, is probably accidental. If not, it simply proves that Justin was in the hands of their author. This may easily be supposed. The date of the Homilies is in the neighborhood of 170. (See, on these points, Meyer, Einl. p. 10; Bleek, p. 228; Semisch, p. 193 ff.)

The objections of the skeptical critics, drawn from Justin's habit of quoting ad se numina, and from his not naming the authors of the Memoirs, are without force, as all scholars must see. His manner of citation was not unusual, and he was writing to heathen who knew nothing of the Evangelists. The supposition that Justin borrowed the passages, to which we have referred, from the apocryphal Gospel of Peter, which Hilgenfeld and others have advocated, hardly deserves a refutation. It is supported partly by the misinterpreted passage in Tryph. 106 (see Otto's note, ad loc.), and partly by conjectures respecting this apocryphal book, for which no historical value has been claimed. Justin's doctrine of the Logos and of the Incarnation must have been derived from some authoritative source, and this could only be the fourth Gospel. In one passage (Diss. c. Tryph. 105), he directly appeals for the truth of the Incarnation, "that Christ becames man by the Virgin," to the Memoirs. Scholten has labored to prove that a general similarity exists between Justin's conception of the Logos and that which is found in the Gospel; but there is no greater difference than might easily exist between an author and a somewhat inexact theological interpreter.

That Justin used our four Gospels and designates these as the Memoirs, Norton has cogently argued (Ian. of the Gospels. p. 237-239).

Papias, whom Irenæus calls "an ancient man," says: "The Logos was in the beginning with God, and the Logos was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." It is, according to the same Father, heard the Apostle John. Eusebius supposes that Irenæus is mistaken in this, and that it was the Presbyter John whom Papias personally knew. This, however, is doubtful; and the very existence of such a personage as the Presbyter John, in distinction from the Apostle of the same name, is an open question. However this may be, Eusebius states that Papias "made use of testimonies from the first Epistle of John." Whether he quoted from the Gospel or not, Eusebius does not state. If it were shown that he did not so his silence could not be turned into an argument against its genuineness, as we do not know the particular end he had in view in making its citations. But the First Epistle was written by the author of the Gospel. (See De Wette, Einl. in das N. Testament, § 177 a.) So that the testimony of Papias to the First Epistle is likewise a testimony to the genuineness of the Gospel.

Justin, in the Apologies, finds that others, we find not a few expressions, especially in the Ignatian Epistles, which remind us of passages peculiar to John. In one instance, such a reference can scarcely be avoided. Polycarp, in his Epistle to the Philippians, says: "Παύς ἐν χρόνοις ἤπειρος Ἀρσενίου Ἑβραίων ἐπαρίσσῃ ἔρχοντα ἀντικριστός ἐστιν" (c. 7). It is much more probable that this thought was taken from 1 John iv. 3, than that it was derived from any other writer. We have been led to regard this as a most important text in the case, when it is remembered that Polycarp was a disciple of John. John xxii. 24, coming from another hand than that of the author of the Gospel, is also a testimony to its genuineness.

The Armentines, the party of Unitarians at Rome near the end of the second century, did not think of disputing the canonical authority of the fourth Gospel. Marcion was acquainted with it, but rejected it for the reason that he did not acknowledge any Apostles but Paul and Tertullian. Adv. Marc. iv. 3, 2, 5. De Corne Christi. 3. For other passages to the same effect from Irenæus and Tertullian, see De Wette, Einl. in das N. Testament, § 72 c, Ann. d.) The Valentinian Gnostics admitted the genuineness of this Gospel, and used it much (Irenæus, Adv. Her. iii. 11, § 7). Tertullian, a follower of Valentine's doctrine, explicitly acknowledges this Gospel (Epist. ad Florum. e. 1, ap. Epiph. Her. xxxii. 3. See Grabe, Spicilegium, ii. 79, 2d ed., or Stierens's ed. of Irenæus, i. 924). Heracleon, another follower, wrote a commentary on it, which Origen frequently quotes (Grabe, Spicilegium, vol. ii., and Stierens's ed. of Irenæus, i. 958-967). Scholten has attempted to show that Heracleon was late in the century. One of his arguments, that Heracleon would not have mentioned him, is, as Grabe remarks, "a burlet," who produces from Irenæus a passage in which he is named in connection with Tertullian. The use of the fourth Gospel by leading followers of Valentinians, and the need they have to apply a perverse interpretation to the statements of the Gospel, render it probable that their master also acknowledged the Gospel as genuine. This is implied by Tertullian (De Praescription Heræt. c. 39, "It Valentine," says Tertullian, "appears (videretur) to make use of the entire instrument" — that is, the four Gospels, — he has done violence to the truth," etc.). The "videretur" may be the reluctant concession of an adversary, but the word is frequently used by Tertullian in the sense, to be seen, to be fully apparent (comp. Tert. adv. Præ. c. 29, 29.; adv. Val. c. 19.; Tert. adv. Marc. c. 21.; adv. Marc. c. 1.; adv. Jud. c. 5, quoted from Irenæus, ii. 12.) Such is probably its meaning here. But Hippolytus, explaining the tenets of Valentine, writes as follows: "All the prophets and the law spoke from the Penning, a foolish god, he says — feet, knowing nothing. On this account it is, he says, that the Saviour says: "All that came before me are
In considering the Internal Evidence for the genuineness of the fourth Gospel, we notice the following points:—

1. The Gospel claims to be the work of the Apostle John, and the manner of this claim is a testimony to its truth. The author declares himself an eye-witness of the transactions recorded in the Gospel, and refers to the distinctives of the Valentinian sect and the phases of opinion that respectively belong to them. In the place referred to, he is speaking of the founder of the sect himself. A similar remark is to be made of Basilides and of the passages of Hippolytus relating to his use of John (cf. Pler. Herr. vi. 22, 27). The early date of Basilides is shown by various proofs. (See Höffdste de Groot, "Basilides als eerst Zeuge," etc., Leipzig, 1868.) The work of Basilides "on the Gospel" (Enseh. H. E. iv. 7) was not improbably a commentary on the four Gospels (see Norton, Gen. of the Gospels, iii. 238). How widely extended was the knowledge and use of the fourth Gospel among the heretics of the second century, is further illustrated by the numerous quotations that were made from it by the Ophites or Naxasseni, and the Perate, which are preserved by Hippolytus (v. 7, 8, 9, 12, 16). The insignificant party of the Alogi is an argument for, rather than against, the genuineness of the Gospel. (Iren. iii. 11, § 9). We assume, what is most probable, that the party referred to by Irenaeus is the same which Epiphanius designates by this name. Their opposition shows the general acceptance of the Gospel not long after the middle of the second century. Moreover, they attributed the Gospel to Cerinthus, a contemporary of John— a testimony to its age. They rejected, also, the Apocalypse, which even the Tubingen school holds to be the work of John. (See, on the character of the Alogi, Schneider, p. 38 f.) Celsus refers to circumstances in the Evangelical history which are recorded only in John's Gospel. (For the passages, see Lardner, Works, vii. 220, 221, 223.)

The great doctrinal battle of the Church in the second century was with Gnosticism. The struggle began early. The germ of it is discovered in the Apostolic age. At the middle of the second century, the conflict with these elaborate systems of error was raging. We find that the Valentinians, the Basilichians, the Marcionites (followers either of Marcus or of Marcion) are denominated aswarmly by Justin Martyr as by Irenaeus and his contemporaries. (Dial. c. Trypho. c. 32.) By both of the parties in this wide-spread conflict, by the Gnostics and by the Church theologians, the fourth Gospel is accepted as the work of John, without a lap of opposition or of doubt. In that distracted period, with what incredible skill must an anonymous counterfeiter have proceeded, to be able to frame a system which should not immediately excite hostility and cause his false pretensions to be challenged! The particular testimonies to the recognition of the fourth Gospel in the second century simply afford a glimpse of the universal, undisputed tradition on which that acceptance rested. From this point of view their significance and weight must be estimated. The Church of the second century was so situated that it could not be deceived on a question of this momentous nature. It was a great community, all of whose members were deeply interested in the life of the Lord for whom they were making so great sacrifices, and which comprised within its pale men of literary cultivation and critical judgment.
the fourth Gospel, as to its contents, with the other three, we have to notice the apparent discrepancy upon the date of the crucifixion, and also the critical controversies of the second century, in their bearing upon the point of chronology. The Synoptists appear to place the Lord’s Supper on the evening when the Jews ate the Passover-meal, the 14th Nisan (or, according to the Jewish reckoning, the 15th); John, on the evening before.

Dr. F. Robinson, Tholuck, Norton, Böhlmen, Hugenbach, and others believe themselves able to harmonize the statements of John with those of the other three. (See the question very fully discussed in Tholuck, “Das Auge der Welt,” p. 17; and in Bleek, p. 314.) If they are successful in this, there is no discrepancy to be explained. Assuming here, with most of the later critics, that there is a real difference, Bleek draws a strong argument in favor of the fourth Gospel.

No sufficient motive can be assigned why a 5ioir6ou should deviate from the accepted view on this subject. The probability that the fourth Gospel is correct, is strengthened by the fact that it has been brought forward by the Synoptists themselves (Matt. xxvi. 5, xxvii. 59 ff.; Mark xv. 42, 46; Luke xxiii. 50). See Elliott, Life of Christ (Amer. ed.), p. 292, n. 3.

The so-called Quartodecimans of Asia Minor observed a festival on the 14th of Nisan, on whatever day of the week it might occur. Roman and other Christians kept up, on the contrary, the preparatory fast until Easter Sunday. Hence the dispute on the occasion of Polycarp’s visit to Asia Minor about the year 169; then ten years later, in which Claudius Apollinaris, bishop of Hierapolis, and Melito of Sardis took part; and especially at the end of the second century, when Victor of Rome was attacked by Irenaeus for his intolerance. The Asia Minor bishops, in these controversies, appealed to the authority of the Apostle John, who had lived in the midst of them. But what did the Quartodecimans commemorate on the 14th of Nisan? The Tubingensia and the Last Supper, and infer that John could not have written the Gospel that bears his name. But, to say the least, it is equally probable that the Quartodecimans commemorated the crucifixion of Jesus, the true passover-lamb; or that the theory of Bleek is correct, that their festival was originally the Jewish Passover, and that the Synoptists in the latter part of the first century, who took on naturally an association with the Last Supper, and with which John did not interfere. We should add that not improbably Apollinaris was himself a Quartodecimian, and was opposing a Judaizing faction of the party, who dissented from their common view. We do not find that Victor, the Roman opponent of Polycrates, appeared to be familiar with the Synoptists, although he must have been familiar with it; and the course taken by the disputants on both sides at the end of the second century, shows that if it was written with the design which the negative critics affirm, it failed of its end. Had the Quartodecimans been called upon to receive a new Gospel, purporting to be from John, of which they had not before heard, and which was partly designed to destroy the foundation of their favorite observance, would they not have promptly rejected such a document, or, at least, called in question its genuineness?

4. The discourses of Christ in the fourth Gospel have been used as an argument against its apostolic origin. But the contrast between them and the teachings of Christ recorded by the Synoptists may be explained on the supposition that each of the disciples apprehended Jesus from his own point of view, according to the measure of his own individuality. Jesus did not confine himself in his teaching to generalities and parables (Matt. xiii. 10 ff.). The Synoptists occasionally express views which are strikingly in the Johannine style (Matt. xi. 25, comp. Luke xi. 21). On the contrary, the apologetic style is met with in the reports of the fourth Gospel (John xii. 24, 26; xiv. 16, 20). Essentially the same conception of Christ is found in the fourth Gospel as in the other three (Matt. xi. 7; also Matt. xii. 41 ff.; compared with Mark xiv. 58). But in all these passages, which belong to this point, Bown’s Jesus of the Evangelists, London, 1868, p. 217 f. The resemblance of the style of the discourses and of the narrative portion of the book is accounted for, if we suppose that the teachings of Jesus were fully assimilated and freshly reproduced by the Evangelist, after the lapse of a considerable period of time. Here and there, in the discourses, are indicated expressions which mark the fidelity of the Evangelist, as John xii. 31. His interpretations alluded to sayings of Christ are an argument in the same direction (John ii. 19; xii. 32).

5. The Hel lenic culture and the theological point of view of the author of the fourth Gospel are made an objection to the Johannine authorship.

The author’s mode of speaking of the Jews (ii. 6; iii. 13; iv. 1; vi. 4; vii. 2; xi. 50) is accounted for by the fact that the Gospel was written late in the apostolic age, and by a writer who was himself outside of Palestine, among Gentiles and Hellenic Christians. For the special proofs that the writer was of Jewish and Palestinian extraction, see Bleek, First p. 207 f. The probability is that “Synch” was a name of the town from distinctly from Sichem, though near it. That the writer did not misplace Bethany where Lazarus dwelt, is demonstrated by John xi. 18. The book indicates no greater acquaintance with the Greek culture than John, from the circumstances of his early life and his long residence in Asia, may well be supposed to have gained. The Christology of the fourth Gospel, especially the use of the term Logos, constitutes no valid objection to its genuineness. Even if this term was taken up by John from the current speculations of the day, and deliberately adopted by him, he has preserved his conception of the Son in his relation to the Father. After the first few verses, which define the term, we hear no more of the Logos. No allusion to the Logos is introduced into the report of the discourses of Christ. The free and liberal spirit of the fourth Gospel towards the Gentiles would be natural to the Apostle at the time, and under the circumstances, in which his work was composed. The objection, that the allusions drawn from this characteristic of the Gospel, rests also upon their untenable and false assumption of a radical antagonism between the original Apostle and Paul. The differences between the Apocalypse and the Gospel, in regard to style and contents, have been much urged by the opponents of the genuineness of the latter. But a long interval elapsed between the composition of the two books. The state of the author’s mind and feeling in the two cases was widely different. And Baur himself regards the Gospel as so far resembling the Apocalypse that the former is a general transmutation or spiritualization of the latter. If the community of authorship between the two works were disproved, the weight of evidence would be in favor of the genuineness of the Gospel. But the difficulty of supposing a common author has been greatly magnified.

See Gieseler, K. G. bk. i. § 127, n. 8.

The special theory of the Tübingen school in reference to the character and aim of the fourth Gospel is only sustained by an artificial and indefensible excess of its contents. On this branch of the subject, we may refer to the acute and candid criticisms of Drucker in his edition of De Wette's Compendium on the Gospel.

On the whole, the external evidence for the genuineness of this book is strong and unanswerable; and the proofs derived from its internal characteristics, notwithstanding minor difficulties, are equally convincing. They who consider a miracle to be something impossible, and therefore utterly incredible, will of course deny that the book had an Apostle for its author. But those who approach the inquiry with minds free from this unphilosophical bias, may reasonably rest with confidence in the opposite conclusion.

* LITERATURE. — It will be convenient to arrange the more recent literature relating to the Gospel of John under several heads.

1. Genuineness and Credibility. — In addition to the works referred to above, and under the art. Gospel, Tübingen school, there is in the field of the New Testament.

JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE OF 1435

On John's doctrine of the Logos one may also see E. G. Beugel, Obs. de Lgeo einand. Part i. 1824 (in his Oeuv. Acad. 1844, pp. 407-426).

JOHN, THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL. OF. Its Authenticity. — The external evidence of is the most satisfactory nature. Eusebius places it in his list of the διακολογηθέντα [see above, p. 373], and we have ample proof that it was acknowledged and received as the production of the Apostle John in the writings of Polycarp (Ep. ad Philipp. c. 7); Papias, as quoted by Eusebius (ff. E. iii. 39); Irenæus (Adv. Henv. iii. 18); Origen (apud Eus. H. E. vi. 25); Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. ii.); Tertullian (Adv. Pros. c. 15); Cyprian (Epist. xxvii.); and there is no voice in antiquity raised to the contrary.

On the grounds of internal evidence it has been questioned by [S. G.] Lange (Die Schrift. Johannis übersetzt und erklärt, vol. iii.); Chaldis (Urn- schichten des Christenthums); Decastri (Proba- bilia de Evang. et epist. Joan. Ap. inbole et origine); Zeller (Theologische Jahrbücher for 1845). The objections made by these critics are too slight to be worth mentioning. On the other hand the internal evidence for its being the work of St. John from its similarity in style, language, and doctrine to the Gospel is overwhelming. Macknight (Preface to First Epistle of John) has drawn out a list of nineteen passages in the epistle which are so similar to an equal number of passages in the Gospel that we cannot but conclude that the two writings emanated from the same mind, or that one author was a strangely successful copyist both of the words and of the sentiments of the other. The allusion again of the writer to himself is such as would suit St. John the Apostle, and very few but St. John (1 Ep. i. 1).

Thus we see that the high probability of the authorship is established both by the internal evidence and by the external evidence taken apart. Unite them, and this probability rises to a moral certainty.

With regard to the time at which St. John wrote the epistle (for an epistle it essentially is, though not commencing or concluding in the epistolary form) there is considerable diversity of opinion. Grotius, Wetstein, and Witsius might fix a date previous to the destruction of Jerusalem understanding (but probably not correctly) the ex question of their authenticity is argued at length by Mill (note at the end of 1 John v.), and Horne (Introduction to H. S. iv. p. 418, Lond. 1834 [or 10th ed., 1856, pp. 355 ff.]). It would appear without doubt that they are not genuine. The latter passage is contained in four only of the 150 (250) MSS. of the epistle, the Codex Guelphobibliothek of the seventeenth century, the Codex Ravennas, a forgery subsequent to the year 1514, the Codex Britannicus or Montfortii of the fifteenth or sixteenth century, and the Codex Ottobonians of the fifteenth century. It is not found in the Syriac versions, in the Coptic, the Sahidic, the Ethiopic, the Armenian, the Arabic, the Shavonic, nor in any ancient version except the Latin; and the best editions of even the Latin version omit it. It was not quoted by one Greek Father or writer previous to the 14th century. It was not inserted in Erasmus's editions of the Greek Testament, published in 1516 and 1519, nor in that of Aldus, 1518: nor in that of Germainus, 1521; nor of Cephalis, 1524: nor of Colinius, 1534: nor in Luther's version of 1546.

Against such an amount of external testimony no internal evidence, however weighty, could be of avail. For the exposition of the passage as containing the words in question, see (as quoted by Bishop Horby's New Enquiry) The same passage interpreted without the disputed words, see Sir Isaac Newton's Historia of Two Texts (Works, v. p. 528, Lond. 1779). See also Emilys Enquiry, etc., Lond. 1717. See further, Travis (Letters to Gibbon, Lond. 1783); Person (Letters to Travis, Lond. 1790); Bishop Marsh (Letters to Travis, Lond. 1793); Michaelis (Intro. to New Test. iv. p. 412, Lond. 1802); Griesbach (Dissert. ad Jo. i. 4. (Diatribe ad Jo. i. 4.); Butler (Horae Biblicae, ii. p. 245, Lond. 1807); Clarke (Succession, etc., i. p. 71, Lond. 1807); Bishop Burgess (Introduction of 1 John v. 7, Lond. 1822 and 1823: Authorities Milli, etc., 1822; Letter to the Clergy of St. David's, 1825; Two Letters to Mrs. Joanna Brewis, 1831, 1835), to which may be added a dissertation in the Life of Bp. Burgess, Lond. 1847.

It is far from correct to speak of the last clause of 1 John ii. 23 as "dothfful," and even, as is done above, to include it in the same category with 1 John v. 7, as "without doubt . . . not genuine." The clause in question, though omitted in the so-called "received text," is supported by decisive evidence, and is regarded as genuine by all critics of any note. Its omission in some manuscripts was obviously occasioned by the like rendering (in the original) of the preceding clause.

To prevent a mistake which has often been made, it may be well to say explicitly that the whole of 1 John v. 7 is not spurious, but the words which follow "bear record," together with the first clause of ver. 8, "and there are three that bear witness in earth," the genuine text of vv. 7, 8 reads simply, "If there be a word that bear record, or rather bear witness," as the same verb is rendered in ver. 6,1 the spirit, and the water, and the blood, and the three agree in one."

For a full account of the controversy on this famous passage, one may consult the Rev. William Orme's Memoir of the Controversy respecting the Three Heavenly Witnesses, published under the name of "Criticus," Lond. 1830; new edition with notes and an Appendix, bringing the history of the discussion down to the present time, by E. Abbot New York, 1866. To the list of publications o the controversy given above the following deserves to be added for its signal ability, and the valuable information it contains: A Indication of the Literary Character of Professor Paton, from the Aniadingen of the Rev. Thomas Burgess, by Crito Controverticus, Cambridge, 1827. The author was Dr. Thomas Turner, afterwards Bishop of Ely; and to him are probably to be ascribed the able articles which had previously appeared on the subject in the Quarterly Review for March 1832, and Dec. 1835. On the other side may be mentioned Cardinal Wiseman’s Two Letters on some Parts of the Controversy concerning the Genuineness of John v. 7, in the Cath. Mag. for 1832 and 1833, reprinted in vol. i. of his Essays, Lond. 1853. These letters relate almost wholly to the reading of the passage in the Old Latin version. For an answer, see Dr. William Wright’s Appendix to his translation of Seller’s Bibl. Hermeneuticae (1835), pp. 633 ff.; Tregelles in Horne’s introd., 10th ed., p. 363 ff.; and the Appendix to the American edition of Orme’s Memoir, pp. 186–191. Dr. Tregelles, in the Journ. of Soc. Lit. for April, 1858, p. 167 ff., has exposed the extraordinary misstatements of Dr. Joseph Turnbull in relation to this passage. The free Place and Role of John the Apostle in the Gospels of the Three Hebrew Witnesses, by the Rev. Charles Forster, London, 1867, deserves notice only as a literary and psychological curiosity.

On the doctrine of the epistle, see L. Thomas, Études de la première épître de Jean, Genève, 1848, and there referred to in the addition under JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

JOHN, THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF. Their Authenticity.—These two epistles are placed by Eusebius in the class of ἄπαθα γέγραπτα, and he appears himself to be doubtful whether they were written by the Evangelist, or by some other John (H. E. iii. 25). The evidence of antiquity in their favor is not very strong, but yet it is considerable. Clement of Alexandria speaks of the First Epistle as the larger (Strom. lib. ii. c. 15, p. 464, ed. Potter), and if the Admurians are his, he bears direct testimony to the Second Epistle (Admur. p. 1011, ed. Potter). Origen appears to have had the same doubts as Eusebius (opus Euseb. H. E. vi. 25). Dionysius (opus Euseb. H. E. vii. 25) and Alexander of Alexandria (opus Soc. H. E. i. 6) attribute them to St. John. So does Ireneus (John. Hær. i. 16). [The Muratorian canon mentions two epistles of John.] Aurelius quoted them in the Council of Carthage, a. 259, as St. John’s writing (Cyprian, Opp. Hier. p. 120, ed. Oberthür). Eunomius Synec. speaks of them in the same way in the fourth cen-
JOHN, THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF

The Second Epistle is addressed to Gaius or Caius. We have no reason for identifying him with Caius of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29), or with Caius of Derbe (Acts xx. 4), or with Caius of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14), or with Caius Bishop of Ephesus, or with Caius Bishop of Thessalonica, or with Caius Bishop of Pergamum. He was probably a convert of St. John (Ep. iii. 4), and a layman of wealth and distinction (Ep. iii. 5) in some city near Ephesus.

The object of St. John in writing the Second Epistle was to warn the lady to whom he wrote against abetting the teaching known as that of Basileides and his followers, by perhaps an undue kindness displayed by her towards the preachers of the false doctrine. After the introductory salutation, the Apostle at once urges on his correspondent the great principle of love, which with him (as we have before seen) means right affection springing from right faith and issuing in right conduct. The immediate consequence of the possession of this love is the abhorrence of heretical misbelief, because the latter, being incompatible with right faith, is destructive of the producing cause of love, and therefore of love itself. This is the secret of St. John's strong designation of the doctrine, whom he designates as "anti-Christ." Love is with him the essence of Christianity; but love can spring only from right faith. Wrong belief therefore destroys love and with it Christianity. Therefore says he, "If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed, for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds" (1 John ii. 10).

The Third Epistle was written for the purpose of commending to the kindness and hospitality of Cains some Christians who were strangers in the place where he lived. It is probable that these Christians carried this letter with them to Caius as their introduction. It would appear that the object of the travellers was to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles without money and without profit (2 Cor. xi. 7). St. John had already written to the ecclesiastical authorities of the place (2 Pet. ii. 10, 11; 3 John, v. 9, not "scripissimus," (Acts xvi. 10): but they, at the instigation of Diotrephes, had refused to receive the missionary brethren, and therefore the Apostle now commends them to the care of a layman. It is probable that Diotrephes was a leading presbyter who held Juniaizing views, and would not give assistance to men who were going about with the purpose of preaching solely to the Gentiles. Whether Penetratus (ver. 12) was a tolerant presbyter of the same community, whose example St. John holds up as worthy of commendation in contradistinction to that of Diotrephes, or whether he was one of the strangers who bore the letter, we are now unable to determine. The latter supposition is the more probable.

We may conjecture that the two epistles were written by St. John some time after the First Epistle to the "Ephesians." They both apply to individual cases of conduct the principles which had been laid down in their fullness in the First Epistle.

The title Catholic does not properly belong to the Second and Third Epistles. It became attached to them, although addressed to individuals, because they were of too little importance to be classed by themselves, and so far as doctrine went, were regarded as appendices to the First Epistle.

JOYADA (יֹוְיָדַא) [Jehovah knows]: Jos, 13; Josh. 13; [Vat. Néb. xii. 10, 11, Iuda.] Alex. [Iwaša], Iwâša (and so F.A. in Néb. xii. 22): Josh. high priest after his father Elhasib, but whether in the lifetime of Nehemiah is not clear, as it is doubtful whether the title in Néb. xii. 23 applies to him or his father. One of his sons married a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite. He was succeeded in the high-priestly office by his son Jonathan, or Johanan (Néb. xii. 11, 22). Josephus calls this Jehovah, Judas. A. C. H.

JOYAKIM (יֹיָּאֵיכָּם) [Jehovah establishes]: [Vat. Alex. F.A. Iwâša:] Josia, a high priest, son of the renowned Jeshua who was joint leader with Zerubabel of the first return from Babylon. His son and successor was Eliashib (Néb. xii. 10). In Néb. xii. 12-20 is preserved a catalogue of the heads of the various families of priests and Levites during the high-priesthood of Jeshua.
The name is a contracted form of JEHOLIKIM.

JOYARIB (יֹוְיָרֵיב) [Jehovah defends]: [Vat. Iwaša; Alex. Iwâša; Josiá], Joyriá. A layman who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 10).

2. [Néb. xii. 10, Iwaša; Vat. Joyriá; Alex. Iwâša: Joyriá]: F.A. Iwaša in Néb. xii. 6, 19, Vat. Alex. F.A. omit, and so Rom. in ver. 6: Joyriá, Joyriá. The founder of the one of the courses of priests, elsewhere called in full JEHOLIKIM. His descendants after the Captivity are given in Néb. xii. 6, 19, and also in xii. 10; though it is possible that in this passage another person is intended.

3. [Iwaša; Vat. Joyriá; F.A. Iwaša, corr. Iwaša; Alex. Joyriá; Joyriá]: A Shikinito — i.e. probably a descendant of Shilah the son of Judah — named in the genealogy of Massiah, the then head of the family (Néb. xii. 5).

JOKDEAM (יוֹדְקְדֶּאֶם) [possessed by the people]: [Vat. Iwâša; Alex. Iwâša; Iwaša; Iwaša]; Iwâša; Iwaša; [Josephus, Jokdeam, Jecopam, Jecopam, Jecopam, Jecopam, Jecopam]; a city of the tribe of Zebulun, allotted with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34), but entirely omitted in the catalogue of 1 Chr. vi. (comp. ver. 77). It is not clear whether the names, interchangeably named in connection with the boundaries of the tribe — "the torrent which faces Jokdeam" (xix. 11), and as the Canaanite town, whose king was killed by Joshua — "Jok deam of Carmel" (xii. 22). The requirements of these passages are sufficiently met by the modern site Tell Keifam, an eminence which stands just below the eastern termination of Carmel, with the Kishon at its foot, and had a mill. Dr. Robinson has shown (R. B. iii. 115, note) that the modern name is legitimately descended from the ancient: the CYAMON of Jud. vii. 3 being a step in the pedigree. (See also Van de Velde, i. 331, and Memoire, 326.) Jokdeam is found in the A. V.
The native traditions respecting Joktan commence with a difficulty. The ancestor of the great southern peoples were called Khaftun, who, say the Arabs, was the same as Joktan. To this some European critics have objected that there is no good reason to account for the change of name, and that the identification of Kahtun with Joktan is evidently a Jewish tradition adopted by Mohammed or his followers, and consequently at or after the promulgation of the Koran. M. Cauvin de Percevaux commences his essay on the history of Yemen (Jesuit, i. 30) with this assertion, and adds, "Le nom de Cahtun, disent-ils [les Arabes], est le nom de Yeetan, légèremealt en passant d'une langue à l'autre dans la langue arabe." In reply to these objections, we may state:

1. The Kabbals hold a tradition that Joktan settled in India (see Joseph. Ant. i. 6, § 4), and the supposition of a Jewish influence in the Arab traditions respecting him is therefore untenable. In the present case, even were this not so, there is an absence of motive for Mohammed's adopting traditions which alienate from the race of Ishmael many tribes of Arabia; the influence here suspected may rather be found in the contradictory assertion, put forward by a few of the Arabs, and rejected by the great majority, and the most judicious, of their historians, that Khaftun was descended from Ishmael.

2. That the traditions in question are post-Mohammedan cannot be proved; the same may be said of everything which Arab writers tell us dates before the Prophet's time; for then oral tradition alone existed, if we except the rock-cut inscriptions of the Himyrites, which are too few, and our knowledge of them is too slight, to admit of much weight attaching to them.

3. A passage in the Mir'at ez-Zaman, hitherto unpublished, throws new light on the point. It is as follows: "Ibn-El-Kellay says, Yutkan [whose name is also written Yuktan] is the same as Khaftun son of 'Abir," i.e. El-El, and so say the generality of the Arabs. El-Delhibiyyah says, People differ as to what Khaftun was; some say he is the same as Yuktan, who is mentioned in the Pentateuch; but the Arabs arabized his name, and said Khaftun the son of Hood [because they identified their prophet Hood with Elker, whom they call 'Abir]; and some say, of Es-Seneyfa,' or as is said in one place by the author here quoted, "El-Heneysa," the son of Nebit [or Nobit, i.e. Nebiath], the son of Ismael; i.e. Ismael. He then proceeds, in continuation of the former passage, "Alsoo-Haneefeh Ed-Denewaray says, He is Khaftun the son of 'Abir: and was named Khaftun only because of his suffering from drought" [which is termed in Arabic Kaht]. (Mir'at ez-Zamin, account of the sons of Shem.) Of similar changes of names by the Arabs there are numerous instances. Thus it is evident that the name of "Saul" ( שאול) was changed by the Arabs to "Tilodotu" (תִּלּוּדְתּוּ), because of his tallness, from "טִלְוָל ה" (tallness) or "גַּלֵּל ה" (he was tall); al-

b It is remarkable that in historical questions, the Rabbinists are singularly wide of the truth, displaying a deficiency of the critical faculty that is characteristic of Shemitic races.
though the latter name, being imperfectly declinable, is not to be considered as Arabic (which several Arabian writers assert it to be), but as a variation of a foreign name. (See the remarks on this name, as occurring in M. Le Roi, in ch. ii. 248, in the Exposition of Ez-Zamakhsherie and El-Beydawee.) We thus obtain a reason for the change of name which appears to be satisfactory, whereas the theory of its being arabicized is not readily to be explained unless we suppose the term "arabicized" to be loosely employed in this instance.

4. If the traditions of Kahtan be rejected (and in this rejection we cannot agree), they are, it must be remembered, immaterial to the fact that the peoples called by the Arabic dominants of Kahtan, are certainly Joktanites. His sons' colonization of Southern Arabia is proved by indisputable, and undisputed, identifications, and the great kingdom, which there existed for many ages before our era, and in its later days was renowned in the world of classical antiquity, was as surely Joktanite.

The settlements of the sons of Joktan are examined in the separate articles bearing their names, and generally in Arabia. They colonized the whole of the south of the peninsula, the old "Arabia Felix," into the Yemen, and as far as they could, and a wide significance in early times, stretching, according to the Arabs (and there is in this case no ground for doubting their general correctness), to Mekkeh, on the northwest, and along nearly the whole of the southern coast eastwards, and far inland. At Mekkeh, tradition connects the two great races of Joktan and Ishmael, by the marriage of a daughter of Jurhum the Joktanite with Ishmael. It is necessary in mentioning this Jurhum, who is called a "son" of Joktan (Kahtan), to observe that "son" in these cases must be regarded as signifying "descendant" (cf. CHRONOLOGY) in Hebrew generations, and that many generations (though how many, or in what order, is not known) are missing from the existing list between Kahtan (embracing the most important time of the Joktanites), and the establishment of the comparatively modern H wymyrite kingdom; from this latter date, stated by Caussin, Essai, i. 64, at n. c. c. 100, the succession of the Tubabians is apparently preserved to us. At Mekkeh, the tribe of Jurhum long held the office of guardians of the Kaeeleh, or temple, and the sacred enclosure, until they were expelled by the Ismaelites (Kuth-ed-Deen, Hist. of Mekkeh, ed. Wustenfeld, pp. 35 and 39 ff.; and Caussin, Essai, i. 194). But it was at Seba, the Biblical Sheba, that the kingdom of Joktan attained its greatest extent. In the southwestern angle of the peninsula, San'a (Uzal), Seba (Sheba), and Hadramaut (Hazaraveh), all closely neighboring, formed together the principal known settlements of the Joktanites. Here arose the kingdom of Sheba, followed in later times by that of Himyar. The dominant tribe from remote ages seems to have been that of Seba (or Sheba, the Sheba of the Greeks): while the family of Himyar (Hamiyeh) held the first place in the tribe. This kingdom called that of Himyar we believe to have been merely a late phasis of the old Sheba, dating, both in its rise and its name, only shortly before our era.

In Arabia we have alluded to certain curious indications in the names of Himyar, Ophir, Phoenicians, and the Erythraean Sea, and the traces of their westward spread, which would well repay a careful investigation; as well as the obscure relations of a connection with Chaldea and Assyria, found in Berosus and other ancient writers, and strengthened by presumptive evidence of a connection closer than that of commerce, in religion, etc. between those countries and Arabia. An equally interesting and more touching subject, is the apparently proved settlement of Cushite races along the coast, on the ground also occupied by Joktanites, involving intermarriages between these peoples, and explaining the Cyclopean masonry of the so-called Himyrite ruins which bear no mark of a Semite's hand, the vigorous character of the Joktanites and their sea-faring propensities (both qualities not usually found in Semites), and the Cushite elements in the ancient inscriptions on the "Hymyrite" language.

Next in importance to the tribe of Seba was that of Hadramiwt, which, till the fall of the Himyrite power, maintained a position of independence and a direct line of rulers from Kahtan (Caussin, l. 135-6). Joktanite tribes also passed northwards, to Heerch, in El-Iirk, and to Ghasün, near Damascus. The emigration of these and other tribes took place on the occasion of the capture of a great dyke (the Dyke of El-Arim), above the metropolis of Seba; a catastrophe which appears, from the concurrent testimony of Arab writers, to have devastated a great extent of country, and destroyed the city Ma-ril or Seba. This event forms the commencement of an era; the dates of which exist in the inscriptions on the Dyke and elsewhere; but when we should place that commencement is still quite an open question. (See the extracts from El-Mos'oodie and other authorities, edited by Schultens; Caussin, i. 84 ff.; and Arabia.)

The position which the Joktanites hold (in native traditions) among the successive races who are said to have inhabited the peninsula has been fully stated in art. Arabia: to which the reader is referred for a sketch of the inhabitants generally, their descent, history, religion, and language. There are some existing places named after Joktan and Kahtan (El-Bireesce, ed. Jaubert; Niebuhr, Descr. 248); but there seems to be no safe ground for attaching to them any special importance, or for supposing that the name is ancient, when we remember that the whole country is full of the traditions of Joktan.

JONAH

Jonah to the cliff (מִשְׁכָּן, A. V. Sehah) — the stronghold of the Edomites — after he had captured it from them (2 K. xiv. 7). The parallel narrative of 2 Chr. xxv. 11-13 supplies fuller details. From it we learn that, having beaten the Edomite army with a great slaughter in the " Valley of Salt," the valley south of the Dead Sea — Jonah took those who were not slain to the cliff, and threw them headlong over it. This cliff is asserted by Eusebius (Onomasticon, κράτα) to be "a city of Edom, also called by the Assyrians Rekan," by which there is no doubt that he intended Petra (see Onomasticon, Περσία, and the quotations in Stanley's S. of P., 94, note). The title thus bestowed is said to have continued "unto this day." This, Keil remarks, is a proof that the history was nearly contemporary with the event, because Jonah's conquest was lost again by Ahaz less than a century afterwards (2 Chr. xxviii. 17).

JONAX (Jonas [see below]), the father of the Apostle Peter (John i. 42 [Gr. 43]), who is hence addressed as Simon Barjona in Matt. xvii. 17. In the A. V. of John xxi. 15-17 he is called Jona, though the Greek is Ἰωάνης, and the Vulg. Johannes throughout. The name in either form would be the equivalent of the Hebrew Johanan.

* In all the passages in John the received text reads Ἰωάννης, for which Lachm. and Treg. adopt the reading Ἰωάννα, Lisc. Ἰωάννα. The Leningr. Vulg. has Ἰωάννης in John i. 42, but the Cod. Amiatinus reads Johannes, and the Sixtine edition Iōnōn. The reading of the received text would have been in our translation by John's Jewish contemporaries.

JONADAB. 1. (יונָדָב), and once יונהדב (Jonahdab; יונהדב: Jonahab), son of Shimeah and nephew of David. He is described as " very subtil " (鬷ָדוֹב סְפָר יָבָד: the word is that usually translated +wise," as in the case of Solomon, 2 Sam. xii. 3). He seems to have been one of those characters who, in the midst of great or royal families, pride themselves, and are esteemed, for being acquainted with the secrets of the whole circle in which they move. His age naturally made him the friend of his cousin Amnon, heir to the throne (2 Sam. xii. 3). He perceived from the prince's altered appearance that there was some unknown grief — " Why art thou, the king's son, so lean? " — and, when he had warned him out, he gave him the fatal advice, for endangering his sister Tamar (3, 6).

Again, when, in a later stage of the same tragedy, Amnon was murdered by Absalom, and the exasperated report reached David that all the princes were slain, Jonadab was already aware of the real state of the case. He was with the king, and was able at once to reassure him (2 Sam. xxii. 32, 33).

2. Jer. xxxv. 6, 8, 10, 14, 16, 18, 19, in which it represents sometimes the long, sometimes the short Heb. form of the name. [JEHOADAB].

JONAH (יֹנָה) [dorc]: יַרְאוּס, I.XX. and Matt. xii. 39); a prophet, son of Amittai (whose name, compounded with יָדָב, used by the widow of Zarephath, 1 K. xvii. 21, has given rise to an old tradition, recorded by Jerome, that Jonah was her son, and that Amittai was a prophet himself). We further learn from 2 K. xiv. 25, he was of Gath-hepher, a town of Lower Galilee, in Zebulun. This verse enables us to approximate to the time at which Jonah lived. It was plainly after the reign of Jehu, when the losses of Israel (2 K. x. 32) began; and it may not have been till the latter part of the reign of Jereboam II. The general opinion is that Jonah was the first of the prophets (Rosem., Bp. Lloyd, Davison, Browne, Drake); Hengstenberg would place him after Amos and Hosea, and indeed adheres to the order of the books in the canon for the chronology. The king of Nineveh at this time is supposed (Ussher and others) to have been Pul, who is placed by Layard (Nine. and Bab. 624) at n. c. 824 before an edomite king, Adonibezek II., n. c. 810, is regarded more probable by Drake. Our English Bible gives n. c. 802.

The personal history of Jonah is brief, and well known; but is of such an exceptional and extraordinary character, as to have been set down by many German critics to fiction, either in whole or in part. The book, say they, was composed, or compounded, some time after the death of the prophet, perhaps (Rosem.) at the kitter part of the Jewish kingdom, during the reign of Josiah (S. Sharpe), or even later. The supposed improbabilities are accounted for by them in a variety of ways; e. g. as merely fabulous, or fanciful ornaments to a true history, or allegorical, or paradoxical and moral, both in their origin and design. A list of the critics who have advanced these several opinions may be seen in Davidson's Introduction, p. 556. Rosenmüller (Prophec. in Jonnus) reduces them in detail; and then propounds his own, which is equally hazardous. Like them, he begins with proposing to escape the difficulties of the history, but ends in a mere theory, open to still greater difficulties. "The fable of Hercules," he says, "deceived and then restored by a sea-monster, was the foundation on which the Hebrew prophet built up the story. Nothing was really true in it." We feel ourselves precluded from any doubt of the reality of the transactions recorded in this book, by the simplicity of the language itself; by the historical allusions in Tob. iv. 6-15; and Joseph. Ant. ix. 10, § 2; by the accordance by other authorities of the historical and geographical notices; ("Quod aut annua divina miracula credenda non sint, aut hoc non credatur causa nullis sit," Aug. Epp. cit. in Quodl. 6 de Jonn, ii. 294; cf. Cyril. Alex. Comment. in Jonn., iii. 367-380; above all, by the explicit words and teaching of our Blessed Lord Himself (Matt. xxii. 39, 41, xvi. 4; Luke xi. 29), and by the correspondence of the miracles in the histories of Jonah and of the Messiah.

We shall derive additional arguments for the same conclusion from the history and meaning of the prophet's mission. Having already, as it seems from 1 iun. 1, propounded to Israel, he was sent to Nineveh. The time was one of political revival in Israel: but ere long the Assyrians were to be employed by God as a scourge upon them. The Israelites consequently viewed them with repugnance; and the prophet, in accordance with his name (יֹנָה, a dorv), out of timidity and love for his country, shrunk from a commission which he felt sure would result (iv. 2) in the spiring of a hostile city. He attempted therefore to escape to Tarshish, either Tartessus in Spain (Bochart, Tzitom) and, or more probably (Drake) Tarus in Cilicia, a port of commercial intercourse.

The providence of God, however, watched over him, first in a storm, and then in his being swallowed by a large fish (תיה החירה) for the space of three days and three nights. We need not multiply miracles by supposing a great fish to have been created for the occasion, for Bochart (Hier. ii. pp. 752-754) has shown that there is a sort of shark which devoura man entire, as this did Jonah while cast into the water (August. Ep. 49, ii. 284).

After his deliverance, Jonah executed his commission; and the king, "believing him to be a minister from the supreme deity of the nation" (Layard's Nineveh and Babylon), and having heard of his miraculous deliverance (Dean Jackson On the Creed, bk. ix. c. 42), ordered a general fast, and averted the threatened judgment. But the prophet, not from personal but national feelings, grudged the mercy shown to a heathen nation. He was therefore taught, by the significant lesson of the "gourd," whose growth and decay (a known fact to naturals, Layard's Nineveh, i. 128, 124) brought home to the king the truth that the house of Jonah, whom he was sent to testify by deed, as other prophets would afterwards testify by word, the capacity of Gentiles for salvation, and the design of God to make them partakers of it. This was "the sign of the prophet Jonas" which was given to a proud and perverse generation of Jews after the ascension of Christ by the preaching of His Apostles. (Luke xi. 29, 30; Jackson's Comm. on the Creed, ix. c. 42.)

But the resurrection of Christ itself was also shadowed forth in the history of the prophets, as is made certain to us by the words of our Saviour. (See Jackson, as above, bk. ix. c. 40.) Tictomb (Bible Studies, p. 237, n.) sees a correspondence between Jon. i. 17 and Hosea vi. 2. Besides which, the fact and the faith of Jonah's prayer in the belly of the fish betokened to the nation of Israel the intimation of a resurrection and of immortality.

We thus see distinct purposes which the mission of Jonah was designed to serve in the Divine economy; and in these we have the reason of the history's being placed in the prophetic canon. It was highly symbolical. The facts contained a concealed prophecy. Hence, too, only so much of the prophet's personal history is told us as suffices for setting forth the symbols divinely intended, which accounts for its fragmentary aspect. Exclude the symbolical meaning, and you have no adequate reason to give of this history: admit it, and you have images here of the highest facts and doctrines of Christianity. (Davison, On Prophecy, p. 275.)

For the extent of the site of Nineveh, see NINEVEH.

The old tradition made the burial-place of Jonah to be Gath-hepher; the modern tradition places it at Nino, Tanaus, opposite Mosul. See the account of the excavations in Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 596, 597. And consult Drake's Notes on Jonah (Macmillan and Co., 1853).

- The passages in which our Lord asserts the truth of the story of Jonah, and the Divine authority of his book, and its intimate connection with himself, are full and explicit. See especially Matt. xii. 39–41, xvi. i. 14, Luke xi. 29–32. It was one great object of our Lord's mission to interpret and confirm the Old Testament (Matt. v. 17–19). Much of his time was spent in explaining the O. T. to his disciples. We read, for example, that "Beginning at Moses, and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." (See Luke xxiv. 27–32, 45.)

His authority on this subject is just as good as it is on any other; and if we reject his sanctions and interpretations of the O. T., we reject his whole mission. No one can say, without absurdity and self-contradiction, "I admit that Christ brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel; but I do not admit that he understood the O. T. or was an accurate and safe interpreter of it." A miracle is always a direct exertion of creative power; and so far as the physical fact is concerned, one miracle is just as easy, and just as probable, and just as natural, as another. There is no question of hard or easy, natural or unnatural, probable or improbable, in regard to a real miracle. The exertion of creative power is to the Creator always natural; the possibility of the creative act may be; there can, in such a problem, be no necessity or proportion in regard to the actual facts. The only question must be a moral one, whether the alleged fact has a purpose worthy of God, and is appropriate to the object intended; and this question we are authorized and required by God himself to ask. (See Deut. xili. 1–5.)

The country which was the scene of Jonah's activity is by no means analogous to his story, which seem to rest on some basis of actual facts which once occurred among the people of that region.

Neptune sent a monstrous serpent to ravage the coast in the neighborhood of Joppa (whence Jonah sailed), and there was no remedy but to expose Andromeda, the daughter of king Cepheus, to be devoured. As she stood chained to the rocks awaiting her fate, Perseus, who was returning through the air from his exploit against the Gorgon Medusa, captivated by her beauty, turned the monster into a rock by showing him Medusa's head, and then liberated and married the maiden. Jerome informs us that the very rock, outside the port of Joppa, was in his day pointed out to travellers.

At Troy, more northerly, on the same Mediterranean coast, Neptune in anger sent out a devouring sea-monster, which with every returning tide committed fearful ravages on the people. There was no help till king Laomedon gave up his beautiful daughter Hesione to be devoured. While the monster with extended jaws was approaching her chained to the rocks, Hercules, sword in hand, leaped into his throat, and for three days and three nights maintained a tremendous conflict in the monster's bowels, from which he at length emerged victorious and unmanned, except with the loss of his hair, which the heat of the animal had loosened from the scalp. For this exploit Hercules was named Τριέρεως (Three-nights).

Aia, the daughter of the king of Beirôt, a city north of Joppa, on the same coast, for the salvation of her country was about to be devoured by a frightful dragon. St. George, in full armor, assaulted the dragon, and after an obstinate conflict of several days' continuance, slew him and delivered the princes. He is the patron saint of Aramaea and England, of the Franciscan and Swabian knights, and of the crusades generally.

According to Babylonian tradition, a fish-god or fish-man, named Oannes, was divinely sent to that country, the region of the Emperates and Tigris, to teach the inhabitants the fear of God and good morals, to instruct them in astronomy and agriculture, the sciences and useful arts, legislation and other utilities. He came from the sea and spoke with a man’s voice, teaching only in the daytime, and returning again every night to the sea. Sculptures of this fish-god are frequently found among the ruins of Nineveh. The head and face of a dignified and noble-looking man are seen just below the mouth of the fish, the hands and arms project from the posterior fins, and the feet and ankles from the ventral; and there are other forms, but it is always a man in a fish.

The Assyrian Ninevites were of the same race as the Hebrews, and spoke a language very like the Hebrew. The Greek name Oannes may be derived from the oriental Jonah, just as Emperates is derived from the oriental Thuth. For a fuller discussion of these oriental traditions illustrative of the book of Jonah, the reader may see an essay by the Rev. Dr. Sisson in the Bibl. Sacra for October, 1853. Consult especially Groenzer, Sybaritische Mythologie der Alten Volker, ii. 22, 74-81, &c.

Jonah was probably born about 850 B.C., and prophesied during the reign of Jeroboam II., from 825 to 789 B.C. He was a child when Hosea was an old blind bard singing his rhapsodies on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean; a contemporary of the Spartan hawgiver, Lycurgus; by a century the senior of Isaiah, and four centuries more ancient than Herodotus. He is the oldest of the prophets, any of whose writings have reached our times. This hoary antiquity, the rough manners of the time, and the simplicity of the people who were his contemporaries, must be taken into consideration in an estimate of the book. It is throughout in keeping, eminently appropriate to the times and circumstances in which it claims to have originated. God always adapts his revelations to the character and circumstances of those to whom he makes them, and never stands on dignity as men do. Human notions of dignity are a small matter with him; his field of observation is so large that he is not much affected by triftes of this sort.

Jonah was evidently a man of hypochondriac temperament, easily discouraged and easily elated; timid and courageous at rapid intervals; in his ideas of God a good deal under the influence of the heathenism of his time; yet a God-fearing man, a patriotic lover of his own people, and an earnest hater of their idolatrous oppressors, the Ninevite Assyrians. A consideration of these traits explains the oddities of his history, and illustrates the condescension and patience of his God.

The Chronicon of the Mediterranean is of sufficiency with the Bible. See A. T. iv. 340, 341.

their king should be alarmed by a threat from the God of the Hebrews; and their mode of fasting and repenting, and manifesting sorrow, is just what we find described by other ancient authors, such as Herodotus, Plutarch, Virgil, etc. (Herod. ii. 27).

The plant which shaded Jonah is treated in the story as miraculous. Such rapidly growing and suddenly withering plants, however, are still found in the east, and have been well described by our American missionaries, and more truly than by Nichbr [Goren]. The castor-oil bean, cultivated in some of our gardens, will give us a good idea of the kind of plant referred to.

The Orientals have always had a high regard for Jonah, and his tomb is still shown with veneration near the ruins of Nineveh, as well as at Gath-hepher. The Kabbins, who make two Messiahs, one the son of David, and the other the son of Joseph, affirm that Jonah was the Messiah the son of Joseph. The respect shown to him by the Mohammedans is also remarkable. In the Koran one entire chapter is inscribed with his name.

In one passage he is called Dech'ham, that is, the dredler in the fish; and in the thirty-seventh chapter the following narrative is given of him: "Jonah was one of our ambassadors. When he was cast in the fully laden ship, the sailors cast lots, and by that he was condemned: and then the fish swallowed him, because he merited punishment. We cast him upon the naked shore, and he felt himself sick; and therefore we caused a vine to grow over him, and sent him to a hundred thousand men, or more; and when they believed, we granted them their lives for a definite time." In the twenty-first chapter it is said: "Remember Pharaoh (the dredler in the fish, that is, Jonah), how he departed from us in wrath and believed that we could exercise no power over him. And in the darkness he prayed to us in these words: 'There is no god but thee. Honour and glory be to thee. Truly I have been a sinner, but thou art merciful beyond all the power of language to express.' And we heard him, and delivered him from his distress; as we are always accustomed to deliver the believers." This story is one of those which the Koran, not as a history, but as a moral, in which the later Mohammedans, uttering in the belly of the fish, the Mohammedans regard as one of the holiest and most efficacious of all prayers, and they often use it in their own devotions. Certainly it is simple, expressive, and beautiful, and reminds us of the prayer of the publican in the Gospel. The tenth chapter of the Koran says: "It is only the people of Jonah, whom we, after they had believed, did deliver from the punishment of shame in this world, and granted them the enjoyment of their goods for a certain time."

The Mohammedan writers say that the ship in which Jonah had embarked stood still in the sea and would not be moved. The seamen, therefore, cast lots, and the lot falling upon Jonah, he cried out, 'I am the frogfish, and threw himself into the water' (for the fish swallowed him. The time he remained in the fish is differently stated by them as three, seven, twenty, or forty days; but when he was thrown upon the land he was in a state of great suffering and distress, his body having become like that of a new-born infant. When he went to Nineveh, the inhabitants at first treated him harshly, so that he was obliged to flee, after he had declared that the city should be destroyed within three days, or, as some say, forty. As the time approached, a black cloud, shooting forth fire and smoke, rolled itself directly over the city; and put the inhabitants into dreadful consternation, so that they proclaimed a fast and repented, and God spared them.

From all the oriental traditions on the subject, it is very plain that the men of the old East, the men of the country where Jonah lived, who were acquainted with the manners and modes of thought there prevalent, never felt any of those objections to the prophet's narrative, which have so much stultified the men of other nations and other times. God deals with men just as their peculiar circumstances and habits of thought require; and the sailors and fishermen of Palestine, three thousand years ago, are not to be judged of by the standard of culture at the present day; and a mode of treatment might have been very suitable for them, which would be quite inappropriate to modern fashionable society; and they, we doubt not, in the sight of God, were of quite as much importance in their time as we are in ours. Christ himself so far honors Jonah as to make his history a type of His own resurrection.

The charge of the book in the Hebrew Canon in the time of Christ, and in all previous and all subsequent time, is unquestionable and unquestioned. See the apocryphal book of Tobit, xiv. 7, 8.

A consideration of the real state of both the heathen and the Jewish mind, at that time and in that land, will show the utter groundlessness of the objection sometimes made to the credibility of the book of Jonah, because it represents a Hebrew prophet as being sent to a heathen city, and preaching there with great acceptance and power. Compare 1 K. xx. 23–33; 2 K. viii. 7–10, xvi. 10–15; 2 Chr. xxxi. 31; Am. iv. 7, 8.

To understand the feelings of the prophet in regard to Nineveh, and the failure of his prophecy, we must call to mind the circumstances in which he lived. He was a native of Gath-hepher, in the northern part of Israel, where the people had been greatly corrupted by constant intercourse with idolatry; and they were consequently much exposed to the cruelty and oppression of their northern and eastern neighbors, especially from the powerful empire of Nineveh, by which they had been greatly injured.

Among the prophetic utterances of Moses, God had declared in respect to his people (Deut. xxvii. 21): “I will move them to jealousy with those which are not a people; I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation.” This they understood to imply that the time would come when the Israelites would be rejected for their sins, and some Pagan nation received to favor instead of them; and this is the use which the Apostle Paul makes of the text in Rom. x. 19. Jonah had seen enough of the sins of the Israelites to know that they deserved rejection; and the favor which God showed to the Ninevites, on their repentance, might have led him to fear that the event so long before predicted by Moses was now about to occur, and that too by his instrumentality. Israel would be rejected, and the proud, oppressive, hateful Nineveh, odious to the Israelites for a thousand cruelties (2 K. xx. 19, 20), might then be received, on their repentance and reformation, as the people of God. He was to him a thought insupportably painful, and God had made him unwillingly the means of bringing this about. He thought he did well to be angry — to be displeased, grieved, distressed — for such is the import of the original phrase in Jon. iv. 1, 9.

Alone, unprotected, at the hazard of his life, and most reluctantly, he had, on his credit as a prophet, made a solemn declaration of the Divine purpose in regard to that city, and God was now about to falsify it. Why should he not be distressed, the poor hypocochondriac, and pray to die rather than see it? Everybody is against him; everything goes against him; God himself exposes him to disgrace and disregards his feelings. So he feels; so every hypocochondriac would feel in like circumstances. He cannot bear to remain an hour in the hated city; he retires to the neighboring field, exposed to the dreadful burning of the sun, which is so intolerable that the inhabitants of the cities on the Tigris find it necessary, at the present day, to construct apartments under ground to protect themselves from the noon-day heat. God causes a spacious, unrameous plant to spread its broad leaves over the booth and afford him the needed shelter. He rejoices in its shade; but before the second day has dawned, the shade is gone; the sirocco of the desert beats upon him, with the next noon-day sun, he is distracted with pains in his head, he faints with the insupportable heat, and alone, disconsolate, unriended, thinking that everybody despises him and scorns him as a lying prophet, hypocochondriac-like, he again wishes himself dead. Prophetic inspiration changed no man's natural temperament or character. The prophets, just like other men, had to struggle with their natural infirmities and disabilities, with only such Divine aid as is within the reach of all religious men. The whole representation in regard to Jonah is in perfect keeping; it is as true to nature as any scene in Shakespeare, and represents hypocondria as graphically as Othello represents jealousy or Lear madness.

Jonah is not peculiarly wicked, but peculiarly uncomfortable, and to none so much so as to himself; and his kind and forgiving God does not hastily condemn him, but pities and expostulates, and by the most significant of illustrations justifies his forbearance towards the repentant Ninevite.

The prophet, living in the time of the Punic warious mission, often came to places in which they felt as if it would be better for them to die rather than live. For example, of Elijah, who was of a very different temperament from Jonah, far more cheerful and self-relying, we have a similar narrative in 1 K. xix. 4–10.

Dr. Pusey has given us an excellent commentary on Jonah. There is a more ancient one of great value by John King, D. D., and some excellent suggestions in regard to the book may be found in Davison on Prophecy, disc. vi. pt. 2. — Friedrichsen's Kritische Übersicht der verschiedenen Ansichten von dem Buche Jonas, etc. (Leipz. 1841) is a useful work. The commentaries on the book are well-nigh immeasurable. A formidable catalogue of them is given in Rosenmüller's Scholia in Vet. Test. For the later writers on Jonah as one of the minor prophets, see Habakkuk (Amer. ed.).

JOYAN (Joseph [Tisch. Treg. 'Tovaid] Joner), son of Eliaim, in the genealogy of Christ, in the 7th generation after David, i.e. about the time of king Jehoram (Luke iii. 30). The name is probably only another form of Johanan, which occurs so frequently in this genealogy. The sequence of names, Jonan, Joseph, Juda, Simeon, Levi, Mattath, is singularly like that in vv. 29, 27, Joann, Judah, Joseph, Semei - Mattathias.

JOANAS. 1. (Jonas; [Vat. Jonas].) Alex.

JONAS. 2. (Jonas.] The prophet Jonah (2 Esdr. xiv. 29; Tob. xiv. 4; Matt. xii. 39, 30, 41, xvi. 1-3.

JONATHAN (יוֹנָתָן, i. e. Jehonathan, and יְוֹנָתָן; the two forms are used almost alternately; יְוֹנָדָה, Jos. יְוֹנָדָה: Jonathan), the eldest son of king Saul. The name (the gift of Jehovah, corresponding to Theodorus in Greek) seems to have been common at that period possible from the example of Saul's son (see JONATHAN, the nephew of David, JONATHAN, the son of Abiathar, JONATHAN, the son of Shage, and NATHAN the prophet).

He first appears some time after his father's accession (1 Sam. xiii. 2). If his younger brother Ishboseth was 40 at the time of Saul's death (2 Sam. ii. 8, Jonathan must have been at least 30, which is first mentioned. Of his own family we know nothing, except the birth of one son, 5 years before his death (2 Sam. iv. 4). He was regarded in his father's lifetime as heir to the throne. Like Saul, he was a man of great strength and activity (2 Sam. i. 23), of which the exploit at Michmash was a proof. He was also famous for the peculiar martial exercises in which his tribe excelled - archery and slingling (1 Chr. xii. 2). His bow was to him what the spear was to his father: "the bow of Jonathan turned not back" (2 Sam. i. 22). It was always about him (1 Sam. xviii. 4, xx. 53). It is through his relation with David that he is chiefly known to us, probably as related by his descendants at David's court. But there is a background, not so clearly given, of his relation with his father. From the time that he first appears he is Saul's constant companion. He was always present at his father's meals. As Abner and David seem to have occupied the places afterwards called the captainships of "the host" and "of the guard," so he seems to have been (as Hushai afterwards) "the friend" (comp. 1 Sam. xx. 25; 2 Sam. xv. 37). The whole story implies, without expressing, the deep attachment of the father and son. Jonathan can only go on his dangerous expedition (1 Sam. xiv. 1) by concealing it from Saul. Saul's vow is confirmed, and its tragic effect deepened, by his feeling for his son, "though it be Jonathan my son" (ib. xiv. 39). "Tell me what thou hast done" (ib. xiv. 43). Jonathan cannot bear to believe his father's enmity to David, "my father will do nothing great or small, but that he will show it to me: and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so" (1 Sam. xx. 2). To him, of all men, the king was immenable - "Saul hearkened unto the voice of Jonathan" (1 Sam. xix. 4). Their mutual affection was indeed interrupted by the growth of Saul's insularity. Twice the father would have sacrificed the son: once in consequence of his vow (1 Sam. xiv.); the second time, more deliberately, on the discovery of David's flight: and on this last occasion, a momentary glimpse is given of some darker history. Were the phrases "son of a perverse rebellions woman," "shame on thy mother's nakedness" (1 Sam. xx. 30, 31), mere frantic increases? or is there something in the expression of Abimelech or Zizgah which we do not know? In fierce anger "Jonathan left the royal presence (ib. 34). But he cast his lot with his father's decline, not with his friend's rise, and "in death they were not divided" (2 Sam. i. 23; 1 Sam. xxiii. 16).

His life may be divided into two main parts.

1. The war with the Philistines: commonly called, from its locality, the "war of Michmash," as the last years of the Philomessian War were called for a similar reason "the war of Deceba" (1 Sam. xiii. 22, LXX.). In the previous war with the Ammonites (1 Sam. xi. 4-15) there is no mention of him; and his abrupt appearance, without explanation, in xii. 2, may seem to imply that some part of the narrative has been lost.

He is already of great importance in the state. The chief fact is the miracle of Saul's son's army which was formed (xii. 22; xvi. 1, 2), 1,000 men were under the command of Jonathan at Gilgal. The Philistines were still in the general command of the country: an officer was stationed at Gaba, either the same as Jonathan's position or close to it. In a sudden act of youthful daring, as when, Tell rose against Gessor, or as in sacred history Moses rose against the Egyptians, Jonathan slew this officer, and thus gave the signal for a general revolt. Saul took advantage of it, and the whole population rose. But it was a premature attempt. The Philistines poured in from the plain, and the tyranny became more deeply rooted than ever. [Saul.] Saul and Jonathan (with their immediate attendants) alone had arms, amidst the general weakness and disarming of the people (1 Sam. xiii. 22). They were encamped at Gath, with a small body of men: in their presence or as they looked down from that height on the misfortunes of their country, and of their native tribe especially, they wept aloud (i.e. LXX., 1 Sam. xiii. 16).

From this oppression, as Jonathan by his former act had been the first to provoke it, so now he was the first to deliver his people. On the former occasion Saul had been equally with himself involved in the responsibility of the deed. Saul "blew the trumpet;" Saul had "sumitted the officer of the Philistines" (xiii. 3, 4). But now it would seem that Jonathan was resolved to undertake the whole risk himself. "The day," the day fixed by him (קֵיַד; ἡ ἡμέρα, LXX.; 1 Sam. xiv. 1) approached: and without communicating his project to any one, except the young man, whom, like all the chiefs of that age, he retained as his personal bearer, he summoned a thousand of whom he dashed against the garrison of the Philistines stationed on the other side of the steep defile of Michmash (xiv. 1). His words are short, but they breathe exactly the ancient and peculiar spirit of the Israelite warrior. "Come, and let us go over unto the garrison of these uncircumcised; it may be that Jehovah will work for us: for there is no restraint to Jehovah to save by many or by few." The answer is no less characteristic of the close friendship of the two young men: already like to that which afterwards sprang up between Jonathan and David. "Do all that is in thine heart; . . . behold, I am with thee; as thy heart is my heart (LXX.; 1 Sam. xiv. 7)." After the manner of the time (and the more, probably, from having taken no counsel of the high-priest or any prophet before his departure) Jonathan proposed to draw an omen from his own heart, or what he hoped of the issue of the enterprise. If the garrison, on seeing them, gave intimations of descending upon them, they would remain in the valley; if, on the other hand, they raised a challenge to advance, they were to accept it. The latter turned out to be the case. The first appearance of the two warriors from behind the rocks was taken by the Philistines as a prudent apparition of the Hebrews coming forth out of the holes where they had hid themselves; and they were welcomed with a scolding invitation (such as the Jebusites afterwards offered to David), "Come up, and we will show you a thing" (xiv. 4-12). Jonathan immediately took them at their word. Strong and active as he was, "as strong as a lion, and swift as an eagle" (2 Sam. i. 25), he was fully equal to the adventure of climbing on his hands and feet up the face of the cliff. When he came directly in view of them, with his armor-bearer behind him, they both, after the manner of their tribe (1 Chr. xii. 2) discharged a flight of arrows, stones, and pEBBLES, from their bows, crossbows, and slings, with such effect that 20 men fell at the first onset [AHMS, vol. i. p. 169 b]. A panic seized the garrison, thence spread to the camp, and thence to the surrounding hordes of marauders; an earthquake combined with the terror of the moment; the confusion increased; the Israelites who had been taken slaves by the Philistines during the last 3 days (LXX.) rose in mutiny: the Israelites who lay hid in the numerous caverns and deep holes in which the rocks of the neighborhood abound, sprang out of their subterranean dwellings. Saul and his little band had watched in astonishment the wild retreat from the heights of Gilboa — he now joined in the pursuit, which led him through the woods, over the rugged plateau of Bethel, and down the pass of Beth-horon to Ajalon (xvii. 31). [GILKIH, p. 915.] The father and son had not met on that day: Saul only conjectured his son's absence from not finding him when he numbered the people. Jonathan had not heard of the rash curse (xv. 24) which Saul invoked on any one who ate before the evening. In the dizziness and darkness (Hebrew, LXX., xiv. 27) that came on after his desperate exertions, he put forth the staff which apparently had (with his sling and bow) been his chief weapon, and tasted the honey which lay on the ground as they passed through the forest. The pursuers in general were restrained even from this slight indulgence by fear of the royal curse: but the moment that the day, with its enforced fast, was over, they flew, like Muslims at sunset during the fast of Ramadan, on the captured cattle, and devoured them, even to the brutal neglect of the law which forbade the disembowelling of the fresh carcasses with the blood. This violation of the law Saul endeavored to prevent and to expiate by erecting a large stone, which served both as a rude table and as an altar: the first altar that was raised under the monarchy. It was in the dead of night after this wild revel was over that he proposed that the pursuit should be continued till dawn; and then, when the silence of the oracle of the high-priest indicated that something had occurred to intercept the Divine favor, the lot was tried, and Jonathan appeared as the culprit. Jephthah's dreadful sacrifice would have been repeated; but the people interposed in behalf of the hero of that great day; and Jonathan was saved [xv. 24-46].

2. This is the only great exploit of Jonathan's life. But the chief interest of his career is derived from the friendship with David, which began on the day of David's return from the victory over the champion of Gath, and continued till his death. It is the first Biblical instance of a romantic friendship, such as was common afterwards in Greece, and has been since in Christendom; and is remarkable both as giving its sanction to these, and as filled with a pathos of its own, which has been imitated, but never surpassed, in modern works of fiction. "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul" — "Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women" (1 Sam. xviii. 1; 2 Sam. i. 25). Each found in each the affection that he found not in his own family: no jealousy of rivalry between the two, as claimants for the same throne, ever interposed: "Thou shalt be king in Israel, and I shall be next unto thee" (1 Sam. xiii. 17). The friendship was confirmed, after the manner of the time, by a solemn compact often repeated. The first was immediately on their first acquaintance. Jonathan gave David as a pledge his royal mantle, his sword, his girdle, and his famous bow (xviii. 4). His fidelity was soon called into action by the insane rage of his father against David. He interceded for him. He bore his father's message, and, after it had been acceded to (1 Sam. xix. 1-7), then the madness returned and David fled. It was in a secret interview during this flight, by the stone of Ezel, that the second covenant was made between the two friends, of a still more binding kind, extending to their mutual posterity — Jonathan laying such emphasis on this portion of the compact, as almost to suggest the belief of a slight misgiving on his part of David's future conduct in this respect. It is this interview which brings out the character of Jonathan in the liveliest colors — his little artifices — his love for both his father and his friend — his bitter disappointment at his father's unmanageable fury — his familiar sport of archery. With passionate embraces and tears the two friends parted, to meet only once more (1 Sam. xx.). That one more meeting was far away in the forest of Ziph, during his friend were as a yoke of oxen ploughing, and resolving the sharp ploughshares."

3. In xiv. 25, 31, the LXX. reads "Damnath" for "Beth-aven," and omits "Ajalon." [c] Josephus Ant. (vi. 6, § 5) puts into Jonathan's mouth a speech of patriotic self-devotion, after the manner of a Greek or Roman. Ewald (ii. 438) supposes that a substitute was killed in his place. There is no trace of either of these in the sacred narrative.
JONATHAN

Saul's pursuit of David. Jonathan's alarm for his friend's life is now changed into a confidence that he will escape: "He strengthened his hand in God." Finally, and for the third time, they renewed the covenant, and then parted forever (1 Sam. xxiii. 16-18).

From this time forth we hear no more till the tale of Gileon. In that battle he fell, with his two brothers and his father, and his corpse shared his fate (1 Sam. xxxi. 2, 8). [SACL.] His ashes were buried first at Jabez-Gilead (chap. 13), but forthwith removed with those of his father to Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 12). The news of his death occasioned the celebrated elegy of David, in which, he, as the friend, naturally occupies the chief place (2 Sam. i. 22, 23, 25, 26), and which seems to have been sung in the education of the archers of Judah, in commemoration of the one great archer, Jonathan: "He bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow" (2 Sam. i.
17). 18.

He left one son, five years old at the time of his death (2 Sam. iv. 4), to whom he had probably given his original name of Merib-idad, after wards changed to Mephibosheth (comp. 1 Chr. viii.
34, ix. 49). [Mephibosheth.] Through him the line of descendants was continued down to the time of Ezra (1 Chr. ix. 40), and even then their great ancestor's archery was practiced amongst them. [SACL.]

2. (Jonathan.) Son of Shimea, brother of Jonannah, and nephew of David (2 Sam. xxii. 21; 1 Chr. xx. 7). He inherited the union of civil and military gifts, so conspicuous in his uncle. Like David, he engaged in a single combat and slew a gigantic Philistine of Gath, who was remarkable for an additional finger and toe on each hand and foot.
(2 Sam. xxii. 21). If we may identify the Jonathan of 1 Chr. xxvii. 32 with the Jonathan of this passage, where the word translated "uncle" may be "nephew," he was (like his brother Jonathan)
"wise"—and as such, was David's counsellor and secretary. Jerome (Quast. Heb. on 1 Sam. xiii. 12) conjectures that this was Nathan the prophet, thus making up the 8th son, not named in 1 Chr. ii.
15-19. But this is not probable.

3. [Jonathan.] The son of Abiathar, the high-priest. He is the last descendant of Eli, of whom we hear anything. He appears on two occasions.
1. On the day of David's flight from Absalom, when it first appeared his father Abiathar as far as Olivet (2 Sam. xv. 36), he returned with him to Jerusalem, and was there, with Abiathar the son of Zadok, employed as a messenger to carry the first news of Hushai's plans to David (xvii.
15-21). 2. On the day of Solomon's inauguration, he suddenly broke in upon the banquet of Adonijah, to announce the success of the rival prince (1 K.
42, 43). It may be inferred from Adonijah's expression ("Thou art a valiant man, and flnestest good tidings"), that he had followed the policy of his father Abiathar in Adonijah's support.

On both occasions, it may be remarked that he appears as the swift and trusty messenger.

4. The son of Shallai the Hararite (1 Chr. xi.
31; 2 Sam. xxii. 32). He was one of David's heroes (gibborim). The LXX. makes his father's name Shallai (σαλαί), and applies the epithet "Arar-ite" (ὁ Αραρίτης) to Jonathan himself. "Harar" is not mentioned elsewhere as a place; but it is a poetical word for "Har" (mountain), and, as such, may possibly signify in this passage "the moun-tainer." Another officer (Abiam) is mentioned with Jonathan, as bearing the same designation (1 Chr. xi. 35).

5. (Jonathan.) The son, or descendant, of Gershom, the son of Moses, whose name in the Masoretic is changed to Manasseh, as designed to screen the memory of the great lawgiver from the disgrace which attached to the apostasy of one so closely connected with him (Judg. xviii. 30).
While wandering through the country in search of a home, the young Levite of Bethlehem-Judah came to the house of Micaiah, the rich Ephrâmite, and was by him appointed to be a kind of private champion, to minister in the house of gods, or sanctuary, which Micaiah had made in imitation of that at Shiloh. He was recognized by the five Danite spies appointed by their tribe to search the land for an inheritance, who lodged in the house of Micaiah on their way northwards. The favorable answer which he gave when consulted with regard to the issue of their expedition probably induced them, on their march to Laish with the warriors of their tribe, to turn aside again to the house of Micaiah, and carry off much gold and treasure, still continuing to hope till at last to make success certain.
Jonathan, to whose ambition they appealed, accompanied them, in spite of the remonstrances of his patron; he was present at the massacre of the defenseless inhabitants of Laish, and in the new city, which rose from its ashes, he was constituted priest of the graven image, an office which became hereditary in his family till the Captivity. The Targum of 1. Joseph, on 1 Chr. xxvii. 16, identifies him with Sheleah the son of Gershom, who is there said to have reigned (בֵּן מִן נָוִים דַּבָּר) in his old age, and to have been appointed by David as chief over his treasures. All this arises from a play upon the name Sheleah, from which this meaning is extracted in accordance with a favorite practice of The Targumist. 6. (Jonathan.) One of the sons of Adin (Ezr. viii. 6), whose representative Ebed returned with Ezra at the head of fifty men, a number which is increased (Ezr. viii. 32) to a hundred and fifty (Ezr.
vi. 32, where Jonathan is written לאדבש).
7. [In 1 Esdr. 1, 2, 32: Jonathan.] A priest, the son of Asahel, one of the four who assisted Ezra in investigating the marriages with foreign women, which had been contracted by the people who returned from Babylon (Ezra x. 15; 1 Esdr. ix.
14). 8. [Vat. Alex. FA. omit.] A priest, and one of the chief of the fathers in the days of Jeshua, son of Jehohanan. He was the representative of the family of Melch (Neh. xii. 14).

9. One of the sons of Kareth, and brother of Jonathan (Jer. vii. 8). The LXX. in this passage omit his name altogether, and in this they are supported by two of Kennicott's MSS., and the parallel passage of 2 K. xxv. 28. In three others of Ken-nicott's it was erased, and was originally omitted in three of Da Costa's. He was one of the captains of the army who had escaped from Jerusalem in the final assault by the Chaldeans, and, after the capture of Zedekiah at Jericho, had crossed the Jordan, and remained in the open country of the Ammonites till the victorious army had retired with their spoil and captives. He accompanied his brother Johanan and the other captains, who resorted to Gedaliah at Mizpah, and from that time we hear nothing more of him. Hitzig decides against the LXX. and the MSS. which omit the name (Der Proph. Jeremiaus), on the ground that the very similarity between Jonathan and Josiah favors the belief that they were brothers.

10. (Jonathas; [FA. once (tl) arrow-v.)
Son of Saul, and his successor in the high-priesthood. The only fact connected with his pontificate recorded in Scripture, is that the genealogical records of the priests and Levites were kept in his day (Neh. xii. 11, 22), and that the chronicles of the state were continued to his time (2b. 23). Jonathan (or, as he is called in Neh. xii. 22, 23, John [Johann]) lived, of course, long after the death of Nehemiah, and in the reign of Artaxerxes Meneon.

Josephus, who also calls him John, as do Eusebius and Nicephorus likewise, relates that he murdered his own brother Jesus in the Temple, because Jesus was endeavoring to get the high-priesthood from him through the influence of Bagoes the Persian general. He adds that John by this means brought two great judgments upon the Jews: the one, that Bagoes entered into the Temple and polluted it; the other, that he imposed a heavy tax of 50 shekels upon every lamb offered in sacrifice, to punish them for this horrible crime (A. J. xi. 7, § 4). Jonathan, or John, was high-priest for 32 years, according to Eusebius and the Alexander. Chron. (Sch, de Success, in P. L. cap. vii.). Milman speaks of the murder of Jesus as "the only memorable transaction in the annals of Judea from the death of Nehemiah to the time of Alexander the Great." (Hist. of Jesus, ii. 29).

11. [Vat. FA. (!) arrow-.
Father of Zechariah, a priest who blew the trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. xii. 35). He seems to have been of the course of Shemen. The words "son of" seem to be improperly inserted before the following name, Mattaniah, as appears by comparing xi. 17.

13. [Sin.1 Macc. ii. 5, ! Jonatha; Sin.2 Alex. !! Jonathas; so Sin. in v. 17: Jonathos.] A son of Mattathias, and leader of the Jews in their war of independence after the death of his brother Judas Maccabaeus, b. c. 161 (1 Macc. ix. 19 ff.). [Mac-cabees.]

14. [Alex. in xi. 70 ! Jonatha, pen.] A son of Absalom (1 Macc. xiii. 11), sent by Simon with a force to occupy Joppa, which was already in the hands of the Jews (1 Macc. xii. 33), though probably held only by a weak garrison. Jonathan expelled the inhabitants ( τοις υπαρ η υππαιρα τοις υπαρ; cf. Jos. Ant. xiii. 6, § 3) and secured the city. Jonathan was probably a brother of Mattathias (2) (1 Macc. xi. 70).

15. [Jonatha; Alex. in viii. 22, !! Jonathas; Jonathas.] A priest who is said to have offered up a solemn prayer on the occasion of the sacrifice made by Nehemiah after the recovery of the sacred fire (2 Macc. i. 23 ff.; cf. Ewald, Gesch. d. V. Israel. iv. 184 f.). The narrative is interesting, as it presents a singular example of the combination of public prayer with sacrifice (Grimm, ad 2 Macc. i. c.).

JONATH-E-LIM-RECHOKIM (Jonath-e-lim-rechokim, a dumb dove of (in) distant places), a phrase found once only in the Bible, as a heading to the 56th psalm. Critics and commentators are very far from being agreed on its meaning. Rashi considers that David employed the phrase to describe his own unhappy condition when, exiled from the land of Israel, he was living with Achish, and was an object of suspicion and hatred to the people of Goliath: thus was he amongst the Philistines as a mute (mizpah) dove. Kirche supplies the following commentary: "The Philistines sought to seize and slay David (1 Sam. xxxii. 14-11), and he, in his terror, and pretending to have lost his reason, called himself Jonath, even as a dove driven from her cote." Knapp's explanation "on the oppression of foreign rulers"—assigning to Eleon the same meaning which it has in Ex. xiv. 15—is in harmony with the contents of the psalm, and is worthy of consideration. De Wette translates Jonath Elem Rechokim "dove of the distant terebintins," or "of the dove of dullness (Stummheit) among the strangers" or "in distant places.

According to the Septuagint, ἵππος τοῦ λιόν τοῦ ἄπω τῶν άγιων μεσαρχησιον, "on the people far removed from the holy places" (probably ἦλθον = ἦλθον, the Temple-hall; see Orient. Literatur-Blatt, p. 579, year 1841), a rendering which very nearly agrees with the Chaldee paraphrase: "On the congregation of Israel, compared with a mute dove while exiled from their cities, but who come back again and offer praise to the Lord of the Universe." Alon Ezra, who regards Jonath Elem Rechokim as merely indicating the modulation or the rhythm of the psalm (comp. the title ἔλεος ἵππος), appears to come the nearest to the meaning of the passage in his explanation, "after the melody of the air which begins Jonath-elem-rechokim." In the Biewer to Mendelssohn's version of the Psalms Jonath Elen Rechokim is mentioned as a musical instrument which produced dull, mournful sounds. "Some take it for a pipe called in Greek άλων, ἵππος, from ἵππος, Greek, which would make the inscription read "the long Grecian pipe," but this does not appear to us admissible." (Bouvier's Preface, p. 25).

JOPPA (Jonath, i. e. Yaffo, beauty; the A. V. follows the Greek form, except once, ἔλεος: τοῦ νομίμου, LXX. N. T. and Vulg. [Joppa]: Ipan). Joseph, —at least in the most recent editions—Strabo, and others: now Yaffo or Jaffa), a town on the S. W. coast of Palestine, the port of Jerusalem in the days of Solomon, as it has been ever since. Its etymology is variously explained; some deriving it from "Japheth," others from "Iopa," daughter of Eoheus and wife of Cepheus, Andromeda's father, its reputed founder; others interpreting it "the watch-tower of joy," or "beauty," and so forth (Reldand, "Pulitien," p. 384). The fact is, that from its being a sea-port, it had a profane, as well as a sacred history. Pliny following Mela (De situ orb. i. 12), says that it was of ante-flood antiquity (Naut. Hist. v. 14); and even Sir John Manningville, in the 14th century, bears witness though perhaps with even less certainty than Mela, that Joppa was a constant port ("Every Travels in II.", p. 142). According to Josephus, it originally belonged to the Phoenicians (Ant. xiii. 15, § 4). Here, writes Strabo, some say Andromeda was exposed to the whale (Geograph. xvi. p. 759; comp. Muller's Hist. Geoc. Eryman. vol. iv. p. 325, and his Geograph. Geoc. Min. vol. i. p. 79), and he appeals to its elevated position in behalf of those who said the scene there; though in order to do so consistently, he had already shown that it would be necessary to transport Joppa into Ethiopia by the Phoenicians (Strab. i. p. 43). However, in Pliny's age—and Josephus had just before affirmed the same (Hist. Nat. iii. 9, § 3)—they still showed the chains by which Andromeda was bound; and not only so, but M. Scarrus the younger, the same that was so much employed in Judea by Pompey (Hist. Nat. iii. 6, § 218), had the bones of the monster transported to Rome from Joppa—where till then they had been exhibited (Mela, ibid.)—and displayed them there during his residence to the public amongst other prodigies. Nor would they have been uninteresting to the modern geologist, if his report be correct. For they measured 40 feet in length; the span of the ribs exceeding that of the Indian elephant; and the thickness of the spine or vertebrae being one foot and a half "semaepheidos," i.e. in circumference—when Solinus says "semaepheidos," he means in diameter, see Plin. Nat. Hist. ix. 5 and the note, Delphin ed.). Reldand would trace the adventures of Joppa in this legendary guise (see above); but it is far more probable that it symbolizes the first interchange of commerce between the Greeks, personified in their errant hero Persus, and the Phoenicians, whose lovely—but till then neglected—clane may be well shadowed forth in the fair virgin Andromeda. Persus, in the tale, is said to have plunged his dagger into the right shoulder of the monster. Possibly he may have discovered or improved the harbor, the rear from whose foaming reefs on the north, could scarcely have been surpassed by the barkings of Seyla or Charybdis. Even the chains shown there may have been those by which his ship was attached to the shore. Kings used by the Romans for mooring their vessels are still to be seen near Terracina in the S. angle of the ancient port (Murray’s Handb. for S. Italy, p. 10, 24 ed.).

* The Ordinance Survey (p. 21) makes Joppa a little over 39 miles from Jerusalem (Olive) by the way of Jimmon (Ginno).

Returning to the province of history, we find that Japho or Joppa was situated in the portion of Don (Josh. xix. 46) on the coast towards the south; and on a hill so high v. Mela was under the assurance (but incorrectly) that Jerusalem was visible from its summit. Having a harbor attached to it—though always, as still, a dangerous one—it became the port of Jerusalem, when Jerusalem became metropolis of the kingdom of house of David, and certainly never did port and metropolis more strikingly resemble each other in difficulty of approach both by sea and land. Hence, except in journeys to and from Jerusalem, it was not much used. In St. Paul's travels, for instance, the starting-points by water are, Antioch (Acts xv. 39, via the Lycus); it is presumed—xviii. 22, 23, was probably a landing-place on this voyage; xvii. 30, and xviii. 2, and once Seleucia (xii. 4, namely that at the mouth of the Orontes). Also once Antioch (xiv. 26) and once Tyre, as a landing place xxx. 3). And the same preference for the more northern ports is observable in the early pilgrims, beginning with him of Bordeaux.

But Joppa was the place fixed upon for the cedar and pine-wood, from Mount Lebanon, to be hauled by the servants of Hiram king of Tyre: thence to be conveyed to Jerusalem by the servants of Solomon—for the erection of the first “house of habitation” ever made with hands for the invisible Jehovah. It was by way of Joppa, similarly, that like materials were conveyed from the same locality, by permission of Cyrus, for the rebuilding of the 2d Temple under Zerubbabel (1 K. v. 9; 2 Chr. xxiv. 16). Here, Josephus, whenever and wherever he may have lived (2 K. xiv. 25 certainly does not clear up the first of these points), “took ship to flee from the presence of his Maker,” and accomplished that singular history, which our Lord has appropriated as a type of one of the principal scenes in the great drama of His own (Jon. i. 3; Matt. xii. 40). Here, lastly, on the house-top of Simon the tanner, “by the sea-side”—with the view therefore circumscribed on the E. by the high ground on which the town stood: but commanding a boundless prospect over the western waters—St. Peter had his vision of tolerance,” as it has been hapily designated, and went forth like a 2d Person—but from the East—to emancipate, from still worse thraldom, the virgin daughter of the West.

The Christian poet Arator has not failed to discover a mystic connection between the raising to life of the aged Tabitha—the occasion of St. Peter’s visit to Joppa—and the baptism of the first gentile household (De Act. Apost. i. 840, ap. Migne, Patrol. Curs. Comp. Ivii. 161). These are the great Biblical events of which Joppa has been the scene. In the interval that elapsed between the Old and New Dispensations it experienced many vicissitudes. It had sided with Ahab and was attacked and captured by Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Mac. x. 76). It witnessed the meeting between the latter and Ptolemy (ibid. xi. 6). Simon had his suspicions of its inhabitants, and set a garrison there (ibid. xii. 34), which he afterwards strengthened considerably (ibid. xiii. 11). But when peace was restored, he reestablished it once more as a haven (ibid. xiv. 5). He likewise rebuilt the fortifications (ibid. xiv. 34). This occupation of Joppa was one of Josephus’ charges against Antiochus, son of Demetrius, against Simon; but the latter alleged in excuse the mischief which had been done by its inhabitants to his fellow citizens (ibid. xx. 30 and 35). It would appear that Judea Maccabaeus had burnt their places in the house of Ptolomeus (ver. 7). Possibly also Paul disembarked at Seleucia, not Antioch (Acts xiv. 25), for in such cases it was very common to speak of the town and its harbor as one compass (Acts xx. 6). The Orontes, it is true, was navigable at that time (though it is no longer so) as far up as Antioch.

harrow some time back for a gross act of barbarity (2 Macc. xii. 6). Tribute was subsequently exacted for its possession from Hyrcanus by Antiochus Sidetes. By Pompey it was once more made independent, and comprehended under Syria (Joseph, Ant. xiv. 4, § 4); but by Cesar it was not only restored to the Jews, but its revenues — whether from land or from export-duties — were bestowed upon the 20,000 Jews and his helpers (xv. 10, § 6). When Herod the Great commenced operations, it was seized by him, lest he should leave a hostile stronghold in his rear, when he marched upon Jerusalem (xiv. 13, § 1), and Augustus confirmed him in its possession (xv. 7, § 4). It was afterward assigned to Archelaus, when constituted ethnarch (xvii. 11, § 4), and passed with Syria under Ovencus, when Archelaus had been deposed (xvii. 12, § 5). Under Cestius (i.e. Gesius Florus) it was destroyed amidst great slaughter of its inhabitants (Bell. Jud. ii. 18, § 10); and such a nest of pirates had it become, when Vespasian arrived in those parts, that it underwent a second and entire destruction — together with the adjacent villages — at his hands (iii. 9, § 3). Thus it appears that this part had already begun to be the den of robbers and outcasts which it was in Strabo's time (Geog. xvi. p. 759); while the district around it was so populous, that from Jamnia, a neighboring town, and its vicinity, 40,000 armed men could be collected (ibid.). There was a vast plain around it, as we learn from Josephus (Ant. xiii. 4, § 4); it lay between Jamnia and Cæsarea — the latter of which might be reached "on the margin" from it (Acts x. 9 and 24) — not far from Lydda (Acts i. 28), and distant from Antipatris 150 stadia (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 15, § 1).

When Joppa first became the seat of a Christian bishop is unknown: but the subscriptions of its presbyters are preserved in the acts of various synods of the 5th and 6th centuries (Le Quien, Orient Christian. iii. 629). In the 7th century Arculfus sailed from Joppa to Constantinople, the very route usually taken now by those who visit Jerusalem; but he Scenes here, and his performance (Early Travels in P. by Wright, p. 10). Seawolf, the next who set sail from Joppa, A. D. 1103, is not more explicit (ibid. p. 47). Meanwhile Joppa had been taken possession of by the forces of Godfrey de Bouillon previously to the capture of Jerusalem. The town had been deserted and was allowed to fall into ruin: the Crusaders contenting themselves with possession of the citadel (William of Tyre, Hist. viii. 91); and it was in part assigned subsuequenty for the support of the Church of the Resurrection (ibid. ix. 10); though there seem to have been bishops of Joppa (perhaps only titular at all) between A. D. 1253 and 1363 (Le Quien, 121; comp. p. 1241). Saladin, in A. D. 1188, destroyed its fortifications (Sanct. Secret. Pict. Crusis, lib. iii. part x. e. 5); but Richard of England, who won the contest for Joppa by sickly Queen Elina, and Richard of Devizes in Bohn's Ant. Lib. p. 61). Its last occupation by Christians was that of St. Louis, A. D. 1253, and when he came, it was still a city and governed by a count. "Of the immense sums," says Joinville, "it which cost the king to inclose Jaffa, it does not become me to speak; for they were countless. He inclosed the town from one side of the sea to the other; and there were 24 towers, including small and great. The ditches were well scoured, and kept clean, both within and without. There were 3 gates"... (Chron. of Crus. p. 495, Bohn). So restored it fell into the hands of the Sultan of Egypt, together with the rest of Palestine, by whom it was once more laid in ruins. So much so, that Bertrand de la Broquiere visiting it about the middle of the 15th century, states that it then only consisted of a few tents covered with reeds; having been a strong place under the Christians. Guides, accredited by the Sultan, here met the pilgrims and received the customary tribute from them; and here the papal indulgences offered to pilgrims commenced (Early Travels, p. 280). Finally, Jaffa fell under the Turks, in whose hands it still is, exhibiting the usual decrepitude of the cities possessed by them, and depending on Christian commerce for its feeble existence. During the period of their rule it has been three times sacked — by the Arabs in 1722; by the Manouches in 1775; and lastly, by Napoleon I. in 1799, upon the glories of whose early career "the massacre of Jaffa" leaves a stain that can never be washed out (v. Moroni, Diction. Eccl. s. v.; Porter, Howl. pp. 238, 239).

The existing town contains in round numbers about 4,000 inhabitants, and has three convents, Greek, Latin, and Armenian; and as many, or more monasteries. Its lozenges are worth a visit; yet few places could exhibit a harbor and landing more miserable. Its chief manufacture is soap. The house of Simon the Tanner of course purports to be shown still: nor is its locality locally chosen (Stanley, S. & P. 263, 274; and see Selden's Memoir, 60, 87, 155).

The oranges of Jaffa are the finest in all Palestine and Syria: its pomegranates and water-melons are likewise in high repute, and its gardens and orange and citron-groves deliciously fragrant and fertile. But among its population are fugitives and vagabonds from all countries; and Europeans have little security, whether of life or property, to induce a permanent abode there. E. S. F.

JO'RAH (JORAH) [born in autumn, First: = JORAH (JORAH) (Jorah), the ancestor of a family of 112 who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. ii. 18). In Neh. vii. 24 he appears under the name Hariph, or more correctly the same family are represented as the Beni-Hariph, the variation of name originating probably in a very slight confusion of the letters which compose it. In Ezr. two of De Rossi's MSS., and originally one of Kennicott's, had JORAH, i.e. Jorah, which is the reading of the Syr. and Arab. versions. One of Kennicott's MSS. had the original reading in Ezr. altered to JORAH, i.e. Jorah; and two in Neh. read JORAH, i.e. Hariph, which corresponds with Apela of the Alex. MS., and Haroph of the Syr. In any case the chance confusion of letters which might have caused the variation of the name is so slight, that it is difficult to pronounce which is the true form, the corruption of Jorah into Hariph being as easily conceivable as the reverse. Burrington (Gened. ii. 75) decides — Possibly Jorah and Hariph are interchanged as equivalent in sense (see note a. ii. 1068).
in favor of the latter, but from a comparison of both passages with Ezr. x. 31 we should be inclined to regard Harim (ךָּרַמ) as the true reading in all cases. But on any supposition it is difficult to account for the form Azepurith, or more properly Ἀσπορία, in 1 Esdr. v. 16, which Bunting considers as having originated in a corruption of the two readings in Ezra and Nehemiah, the second syllable arising from an error of the transcriber in mistaking the uncial E for Σ.

JORDAN

1. Of that which is called Jordan in the Holy Scripture, and in the printed copy used by Luther, read Ἰορδαν. i. e. Jorai.

2. The earliest allusion is not so much to the river itself as to the plain or plains which it traverses: Lot lifted up his eyes and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere . . . even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt...

3. There is no regular description of the Jordan to be met with in Holy Scripture, and it is only by putting scattered notices of it together that we can give the general idea which runs through the Bible respecting it.

4. In the time of David (1 Chr. xxii. 23). A priest [יֵדְרֹמָה] in the reign of Jehoshaphat, one of those employed by him to teach the law of Moses through the cities of Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 8).

It winds through scenery remarkable rather for smoothness and tameness than for bold outline. Its course is not much above 200 miles from first to last, less than 1-15th of that of the Nile — from the roots of Anti-Lebanon, where it bursts forth from its various sources in all its purity, to the head of the Dead Sea, where it loses itself and its tributaries in the unfathomable chasm.

Such is the river of "great plain" of Palestine — the "Descender" — if not "the river of God" in the book of Psalms, at least that of His chosen people throughout their history. As Joppa could never be made easy of access or commodious for traffic as a commercial city, so neither could Jordan ever vie with the Thames or the Tiber as a river of the world, nor with the rivers of Sanaan's preference, the Phraer and Alama, for the natural beauty of its banks. These the picturesque, over the Jordan, that Gerizim, and Samaria could over Zion and Jerusalem.

We propose to inquire, (i.) what is said about the Jordan in Holy Scripture; (ii.) the accounts given of it by Josephus and others of the same date; (iii.) the statements respecting it by later writers and travelers.

1. There is no regular description of the Jordan to be met with in Holy Scripture, and it is only by putting scattered notices of it together that we can give the general idea which runs through the Bible respecting it.

2. We must anticipate events slightly to be able to speak of the fords or passages of the Jordan. Jordan is inexhaustible in the book of Job (xli. 23), and deep enough to prove a formidable passage for belligerents (1 Mac. iv. 49); yet, as in all rivers of the same magnitude, there were shallows where it could be forded on foot. There were fords over against Jericho, to which point the men of Jericho pursued the spies (Jos. ii. 7), the same probably that are said to be "toward Moab" in the book of Judges, where the Moabites were slaughtered (iii. 28). Higher up, perhaps over against Sicech, some way above where the little river Jabbok (דַּבְּק) rises, were the Jordan, were the fords or passages of Bethabar (probably the Bethalmar, "house of passage," of the Gospel, though most moderns would read Bethany, see Stanley, S. P. p. 308, note 2d ed.), where Gideon lay in wait for the Midianites (Judg. vii. 24), and where the men of Gilead slew the Ephraimites (xii. 6). Not far off, in the clay ground between Sicech and Zarthan, were the Jordan, were the fords or passages of Bethel (probably the Bethalmar, "house of passage," of the Gospel, though most moderns would read Bethany, see Stanley, S. P. p. 308, note 2d ed.), where Gideon lay in wait for the Midianites (Judg. vii. 24), and where the men of Gilead slew the Ephraimites (xii. 6).

The fords undeniably witnessed the first recorded passage of the Jordan in the O. T.: we say recorded, because there can be little dispute but that Abraham must have crossed it likewise. But only the passage of Jacob is mentioned, and that in remarkable language: "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two banks" (Gen. xxxii. 10, and Jabbok in connection with it, ver. 22). And Jordan was next crossed — over against Jericho — by Joshua, the son of Nun, at the head of the descendants of the twelve sons of him who signalized the first passage. The magnitude of their operations may be inferred from the fact, that — of the children of Reuben and of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh.
only—"about 40,000 prepared for war passed over before the Lord unto battle." (Josh. iv. 13 and 14). The ceremonial of this second crossing is too well known to need recapitulation. It may be observed, however, that, unlike the passage of the Red Sea, where the intermediate agency of a strong east wind is freely admitted (Ex. xiv. 21), it is here said, in terms equally explicit, not only that the river was then unusually full of water, but that the waters which came down from above stood and rose upon an heap—"that the waters came down toward the sea of the plain . . . failed and were cut off," as soon as ever the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water" (Josh. iii. 15, 16). That it happened in harvest-time is seen also from ch. v. 10-12. Finally, with regard to the memorial of the twelve stones, such had been the altar erected by Moses "under the hill" (Ex. xxiv. 4); such, probably, the altar erected by Joshua upon Mount Ebal, though the number of stones is not defined (Josh. viii. 31); and such, long afterwards, the altar erected by Elijah (I K. xviii. 31). Whether these twelve stones were deposited in, or on the banks of, the Jordan, or whether there were two sets, one for each locality, has been disputed. Josephus only recognizes a single construction—that of an altar—in his narrative; and this was, according to him, in the present instance, 50 staedia from the river, and 10 staedia from Jericho, where the people encamped, with the stones which the heads of their tribes had brought from out of the bed of the Jordan. It may be added that Josephus seems both to admit a miracle, both in the passage of the Jordan and that of the Red Sea (Ant. v. 1, § 4, ii. 16, § 8). From their vicinity to Jerusalem these lower fords were much used; David, it is probable, passed over them in one instance to fight the Syrians (2 Sam. x. 17); and subsequently, when a fugitive himself, in his way to Mahanaim (xvii. 22), on the east bank. Hither Judah came to re-conduct the king home (2 Sam. xix. 15), and on this occasion a ferry-boat—If the Hebrew word has been rightly rendered—said to have been employed (ver. 18). Somewhere in these parts Elijah must have smitten the waters with his mantle, "so that they divided hither and thither" (2 K. ii. 8), for he had just left Jericho (ver. 4), and by the same route that he went did Elisha probably return (ver. 14). Naaman, on the other hand, may be supposed to have performed his ablutions in the upper fords, for Elisha was then in Samaria (v. 3), and it was by these fords doubtless that the Syrians fled when miraculously dispossessed through his instrumentality (vii. 15). Finally, it was probable in these upper fords that Judas and his followers went over into the great plain before Bethsan—not that they crossed over against Bethsan (Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 5), when they were retracing their steps from the land of Gilead to Jerusalem (1 Macc. v. 52).

Thus there were two customary places, at which the Jordan was fordable, though there may have been more, particularly during the summer, which are not mentioned. And it must have been at one of these, if not at both, that baptism was afterwards administered by St. John and by the disciples of our Lord. The plain inference from the Gospels would appear to be that these baptisms were administered in more places than one. There was one place where St. John baptized in the first instance (John x. 40), though it is not named. There was Bethabara—probably the upper fords—that the Baptist, having previously baptized our Lord—whether there or elsewhere—bears record to the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Him who was in Capernaum (i. 29-34). There was Enon, near to Salim, to the north, where St. John was baptizing upon another occasion, "because there was much water there" (iii. 21). This was during the summer evidently (comp. ii. 23-29), that is, long after the feast of the Passover, and the river had become lower, so that it was necessary to resort to some place where the water was deeper than at the ordinary fords. There was some place "in the land of Judaea" where our Lord, or rather his disciples, baptized about the same time (iii. 22). And lastly, there was the place—most probably the lower ford near Jericho—where all "Jerusalem and Judæa" went out to be baptized of John in the Jordan (Matt. iii. 5; Mark i. 5).

Where our Lord was baptized is not stated expressly. What is stated is, (1) that as St. John was a native of some "city in the hill-country of Judæa" (Luke i. 28), so his preaching, commencing "in the wilderness of Judæa" (Matt. iii. 1), embraced "all the country about Jordan" (Luke iii. 3), and drew persons from Galilee, as far off as Nazareth (Mark i. 9) and Bethsaida (John i. 35, 40, 44), and (2) that this baptism from Jordan and the baptism of the multitude from Jerusalem and Judæa preceded that of our Lord (Matt. iii. 6, 13; Mark i. 5, 9); (3) that our Lord's baptism was also distinct from that of the said multitude (Luke iii. 21); and (4) that He came from Nazareth in Galilee, and not from Jerusalem or Judæa, to be baptized. The inference from all which would seem to be, (1) that the first (τὸ πῶλον) baptisms of St. John took place at the lower ford near Jericho, to which not only he himself, a native of Judæa, but all Jerusalem and Judæa likewise, would naturally resort as being the nearest; where similarly our Lord would naturally take refuge when driven out from Jerusalem, and from whence He would be within reach of tidings from Bethany, the scene of his next miracle (John x. 24, 40, xi. 1); (2) that his second were at the upper ford, or Bethabara, whither he had alleged to himself to the course of his preachings, and were designed for the inhabitants of the more northern parts of the Holy Land, among whom were Jesus and Andrew, both from Galilee; (3) that his third and last baptisms were in the neighborhood of Enon and Salim, still further to the north, where there was not generally so much of a ford, but, on the contrary, where the water was still sufficiently deep, notwithstanding the advanced season. Thus St. John would seem to have moved upwards gradually towards Galilee, the seat of Herod's jurisdiction, by whom he was destined to be apprehended and executed; while our Lord, coming from Galilee, probably by way of Samaria, as in the converse case (John iv. 3, 4), would seem to have met him half way, and to have been baptized in the ford nearest to that locality—a ford which had been St. John's of the first recorded crossing. The tradition which asserts Christ to have been baptized in the ford near Jericho, has been obliged to invent a Bethabara near that spot, of which no trace exists in history, to appear consistent with Scripture (Origen, quoted by Alford on John i. 28).

3. These fords—and more fight will be thrown upon their exact site presently—were rendered much the more precious in those days from two circumstances. First, it does not appear that there were: then any bridges thrown over, or boats regularly established on, the Jordan, for the purpose of transporting either pedestrians or merchandise from one bank to the other. One case, perhaps, of either bridge or boat is upon record; but it would seem to have been got up expressly for the occasion (2 Sam. xix. 18).4 Neither the LXX. nor Vulg. contain a word about a "boat," and Josephus says expressly that it was a "bridge" that was then extemporized (Ant. vii. 2 [11], § 2). And secondly, because, in the language of the third book of Joshua (xxi. 15), "Jordan overflowed all his banks all the time of harvest: "a "swelling" which, according to the 1st book of Chronicles (xii. 15), commenced "in the first month" (i.e. about the latter end of March), drove the lion from his lair in the days of Jeremiah (xii. 5, xiii. 10, l. 44), and had become a proverb for abundance in the days of Jesus the son of Sirach (Eccles. xxv. 29). The context of the first of these passages may suffice to determine the extent of this exuberance. The meaning is clearly that the channel or bed of the river became brimful, so that the level of the water and of the banks was then the same. Dr. Robinson seems therefore to have good reason for saying that the ancient rise of the river has been greatly exaggerated (i. 540, 2d ed.), so much so as to have been compared to that of the Nile (Ireland, Palestine, xli. 111). Evidently too there is nothing extraordinary whatever in this occurrence. On the contrary, it would be more extraordinary if it were otherwise. All rivers that are fed by melting snows are fuller between March and September than between September and March; but the exact time of their increase varies with the time when the snows melt. The Po and Adige are equally "all during their harvest-time with the Jordan; but the snows on Lebanon melt earlier than on the Alps, and harvest begins later in Italy than in the Holy Land. "The heavy rains of November and December," as Dr. Robinson justly remarks, "find the earth in a parched and thirsty state, and are consequently absorbed into the soil as they fall. The melting of the snows, on the other hand, on the mountainous slopes of Lebanon can only affect the rivers. Possibly the basins of Huleh and Tibersias may so far act as "regulators" upon the Jordan as to delay its swelling till they have been replenished. On the other hand, the snows on Lebanon are certainly melting fast in April.

4. The last feature which remains to be noticed in the Scriptural account of the Jordan is its frequent mention as a boundary: "over Jordan," "this," and "the other side," or "beyond Jordan," were expressions as familiar to the Israelites as "across the water," "this," and "the other side of the Channel," are to English ears. In one sense indeed, that is, in so far as it was the eastern boundary of the land of Canaan, it was the eastern boundary of the promised land (Num. xxxiv. 12). In reality, it was the long serpentine vine, trailing over the ground from N. to S., round which the whole family of the twelve tribes were clustered.

... four tribes of their number—nine tribes and a half—dwelt on the W. of it, and one fifth, or two tribes and a half, on the E. of it, with the Levites in their cities, originally assigned unto them, and it was theirs from its then reputed fountain-head to its exit into the Dead Sea. Those who lived on the E. of it had been allowed to do so on condition of assisting their brethren in their conquests on the W. (Num. xxxii. 20-33); and those who lived on the W. "went out with one consent" when their countrymen on the E. were threatened (Josh. xiii. 2). The great altar built by the children of Reuben, of Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the banks of the Jordan, was designed as a witness of this intercommunion and mutual interest (Josh. xiii. 10-29). In fact, unequal as the two sections were, they were nevertheless regarded as integral parts of the whole land; and thus there were three cities of refuge for the man-slayer appointed on the E. of the Jordan; and there were three cities and more on the W.—in both cases moreover equi-distant one from the other (Num. xxxv. 9-13; Josh. xx. 7-9; Lewis, Heb. Republ. ii. 13). When these territorial divisions had been broken up in the captivities of Israel and Judah, some of the "coasts beyond Jordan" seem to have been retained under Judaean (Jud. xxvii).

H. As the passage which is supposed to speak of "the fountain of Phaiah" (Num. xxxiv. 11, and Patrick ed. 1., see below) is by no means clear, we cannot appeal to Holy Scripture for any information respecting the sources of the Jordan. What Josephus and others say about the Jordan may be briefly told. Panium, says Josephus (i.e. the sanctuary of Pan), appears to be the source of the Jordan; whereas it has a secret passage hither under ground from Phaiah, as it is called, about 120 stadia distant from Cassara, on the road to Trachonitis, and on the right hand side of, and not far from, the road. Being a wheel-shaped pool, it is rightly called Phaiah from its rotundity (serpneumia); yet the water always remains there up to the brim, neither subduing nor overflowing. That this is the true source of the Jordan was first discovered by Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis—for by that name it was more usually known at that time—and it was taken up at Panium. Panium was always a lovely spot; but the embellishments of Agrippa, which were sumptuous, added greatly to its natural charms (from Bell. Jud. i. 21, § 3; and Ant. x. 10, § 3, it appears that the temple there was due to Herald the Great). It is from this cave at all events that the Jordan commences its estuarian course above ground; traversing the marshes and fens of Seemenchitis (L. Menom or Hihkh), and then, after a course of 120 stadia, passing by the town Julias, and intersecting the Lake of Genesaret, winds its way through a considerable wilderness, till it finds its exit in the Lake Asphaltites (B. J. iii. 10, § 7). Elsewhere he somewhat modifies his assertion respecting the nature of the great plain [Luke 4]; while on the physical beauties of Genesaret, the palms and figs, olives and grapes, of Israel, p. 30, 2d ed.). Some explorers, as Costigan, Molyneux, and Lynch, have launched boats on the Jordan, and with difficulty have made their way to the Dead Sea; but for ordinary written heating and is still impracticable on account of the many violent rapids in the river, and to some extent unnecessary on so count of the fords.

... that floured round it, and the fish for which its waters were far-famed, is still more eloquent (B. J. iii. 10, § 8). In the first chapter of the next book (iv. 1, § 1) he notices more fountains at a place called Daphne (still Dısfıch, see Rob. Bibl. Rev. vol. iii. p. 339, note), immediately under the temple of the golden calf, which he calls the sources of the little, and its communication with the great, Jordan (comp. Ant. i. 10, § 1, v. 3, § 3). Deut. vii. § 1, W. Robinson has explained it by a stream upon its sources, Phausius, who had visited the Jordan, dedicates upon its extraordinary disappearance. He cannot get over its losing itself in the Dead Sea, and compares it to the submarine course of the Alpheus from Greece to Sicily (lib. v. 7, 4, ed. Dindorf.). Pliny goes so far as to say that the Jordan instinctively shrinks from entering that dread lake by which it is swallowed up. On the other hand Pliny attributes its rise to the fountain of Panaces, from which, he adds, Cesarea was named (II. N. v. 15). Lastly, Strabo speaks of the aromatic reeds and rushes, and even balsam, that grew on the shores and marshes round Gennesaret; but he can be believed when he asserts that the Arabians and others were in the habit of wading up the Jordan with car·po/ (xvi. 2, 15.) It will be remembered that he wrote during the first days of the empire, when there were boats in abundance upon Gennesaret (John vii. 22-24).

III. Among the latest travellers who have explored and afterwards written upon the course of the Jordan, are Messrs. Irby and Mangles (Journal of Trav.). Dr. Robinson, Lient. Lynch and party (Narrat. and Off. Rep.), Capt. Newbold (Journal of R. Asiatic. S., vol. xvi. p. 8 ff.), Rev. W. Thomson (Bibl. Soc., vol. iii. p. 184 ff.), and Professor Stanley. While making our best acknowledgments to these writers for what is contained in the following summary, we shall take the liberty of offering one or two criticisms where personal inspection constrains us demurring to their conclusions. According to the older commentators " Dan " was a stream that rose in a fountain called Phila, in the district called Panium, and among the roots of Lebanon; then after a subterraneous course, reappeared near the town called Panana, Dan, or Cesarea, Philippia, where it was joined by a very small stream called " Jor;" and hence united both names in one—Jordan (Corn. a Lop. in Dent. xxiii. 22). It has been well observed that the Hebrew word " Jordan, has no relation whatever to the name Dan; and also that the river had borne that name from the days of Abraham, and from the days of Job, at least five centuries before the name of Dan was given to the city at its source (Robinson, iii. 412). It should be added that the number of streams meeting at or about Bánias very far exceeds two.

This is one of the points on which we are compelled to dissent from one and all of the foregoing travellers—not one of them dwells upon the phenomenon that from the village of Ḥasbāliyyeh on the N. W. to the village of Shiba'h on the N. E. of Bánias, the entire slope of Anti-Lebanon is alive with bursting fountains and gushing streams, every one of which, great or small, finds its way sooner or later into the swamp between Bánias and lake Ḥaleh, and eventually becomes part of the Jordan. Incidentally this of course comes out; but surely this, and not those three prime sources exclusively, to which Captain Newbold has most justly added a fourth, passed over without a word by the rest—should be made the prominent feature of that charmed locality. The fact is, that is the exception of Messrs. Irby and Mangles, he is the only traveller of them all who has in any degree explored the S. E. side of the slope; the route of the others being from Bánias to Ḥashbāliyyeh on the western side. Then again all have travelled in the months of April, May, or June—that is, before the melting of the snows had ceased to have influence—except Messrs. Irby and Mangles, whose scanty notices were made in February, or just after the heavy rains. Whereas in order to be able to decide to which of those sources Jordan is most indebted, the latter end of October, the end of the dry season, and just before the rains set in—when none but streams possessed of inherent vitality are in existence—should have been chosen. Far be it from us to depreciate those time-honoured parent springs—the noble fountain (of Daphne) under the Tell, or hill of Dan (Tell el-Kâdiyeh), which "gushes out all at once a beautiful river of delicious water " in the midst of verdure and welcome shade; still less, that magnificent " burst of water out of the low slope " in front of the picturesque cave of Bánias, inscriptions in the niches of which still testify to the deepv that was once worshipped there, and to the royal munificence that adorned the same. Travellers, nevertheless, who have seen Cætumus (and to read of it in Pliny, Ep. lib. viii. 8, is almost to see), Vaucou, or even Holywell in N. Wales, will have seen something of the kind. But what shall we say to " the bold perpendicular rock " near Ḥashbāliyyeh, " from beneath which," we are told, "the river gushes copious, transparent, and cool, from two regular streams, one to the N. E., one to the other to the N. W. " for if this source, being the most distant of all, may "claim in a strictly scientific sense to be the parent stream of the whole valley," then let us be prepared on the same principle to trace the Mississippi back to the Missouri. Besides, Captain Newbold—and we can here rouch for his statement—has detected a 4th source, which according to the Arabs, is never dry, in what is known as the mountain-torrent Ḥaθīb el-Kid, and Messrs. Irby and Mangles as a "rivulet;" but which the Captain appears to have followed to the springs called El-Shor, though we must add, that its sources, according to our impression, lie considerably more to the N. It runs past the ruined walls and forts of Bánias on the S. E. Nobody that has seen its dizzy entaracts in the month of April, or its deeprock-hewn bed at all other seasons, can speak lightly of it; though it is naturally lost upon all those who quit Bánias for the N. W.

Again, we make bold to say, that the Phila of Josephus has not yet been identified. Any lake would have been called Phila by the Greeks that bore that shape (Ercand, Palast. 41; comp. Hofmann's Lex. Univ. s. v.; if we mistake not, the Lake of Delos is a further instance). But Ṣirkit er-Rem, or the alleged Phila, lying to the S. E. of and at some distance from the cave of Bánias, we are not surprised that the story of Josephus should be voted absurd; for he is thus made to say seriously, what even to a tragic poet was the climax of impossibilities (Eur. Med. 410), that " the fountains of sacred streams flow backwards," or up-hill. The Arabs doubtless heard of the story of the chaff through some dragoon, who heard it from his masters; but the direction of Shiba'h—" six hours higher ap the southern declivity of Mount Hermon, and therefore to the N. E. of Banâda is, by doubt the true one, as long since pointed out by Erland (ibid., and see his Map) for the site of the lake. According to Lynch, "a very large fountain issuing from the base of a high rock" exists there (Off. R. P., p. 112). Lastly, the actual description given by Captain Newbold of the lake Merj el-Man, "3 hrs. E. 10th N. from Banâda," proves, at all events, that there is a circular lake, besides Hirket er-Râm, in those regions, and in the very direction indicated by the historian. We cannot help, therefore, entertaining the suspicion that Merj el-Man will turn out to be the true Thâlah.

Once more, Mr. Thomson had stated that the Hotâbâégâ, when it reaches the L. Hûch, has been immensely enlarged by the waters from the great fountains of Banâda, Tell el-Kâdiy, el-Melihâbâ, Derrêlit or Derrît" (both on the western side of the plain), "and innumerable other springs." Captain Newbold, on the other hand, found it impossible to ascertain whether such a junction took place, nor, before they enter the lake (p. 15). His Arabs strongly maintained the negative. It was reserved for Dr. Robinson in 1832 to settle the question of their previous junction, which according to him may be witnessed one third of a mile N. of Tell Shesh Yaiqâf; so that they enter Hûchâb, as Kâb, as if in one united mass (vol. iii. p. 295). Its passage through and from Gennesaret is that of uninterrupted unity. But that the waters of the Jordan do not descend to mingle in any sense with those of the lake, is as true as that the Rhône and the Lake of Genève never embrace. Any comparison between the waters of the Jordan, as a fertilizer, or as a beverage, with those of the Nile, would be no less unreal; while from the immense amount of vegetable matter which they contain, the former decomposes with a rapidity perfectly marvelous when kept. Travellers, therefore, who arc desirous of preserving them, will do well to go to the fountain-heads for their supply. There alone they sparkle and look inviting.

"The Jordan enters Gennesaret about two miles below the ruins of the ancient city Julias, or the Bethsaida of Ptolemais, which lay upon its eastern bank. At a distance of about 80 yards, it is about 70 feet wide, a lazy, turbid stream, flowing between low alluvial banks. There are several bars not far from its mouth, where it can be forded. . . . From the site of Bethsaida to Jisr Renât Yâkîb is about six miles. The Jordan here rushes along, a foaming torrent (much of course depending on the season when it is visited), through a narrow winding ravine, shut in by high precipitous banks. Above the bridge the current is less rapid and the banks are lower. The whole distance from the Lake el-Hûch to the Sea of Tiberias is nearly nine miles, and the full of the river is about 600 feet." (Porter's Handbook, part ii, pp. 426-27; comp. Stanley's S. of P., p. 364, note 1, 2d ed.).

The two principal features in the course of the Jordan are its descent and its sinuosity. From its fountain-heads to the point where it is lost to nature, it rushes down one continuous inclined plane, only broken by a series of rapids or precipices falls. Between the Lake of Tiberias and the Dead Sea, Lieutenant Lynch passed down 27 rapids which he calls threatening; besides a great many more of lesser magnitude. According to the calculations which were then made, the descent if the Jordan in each mile was about 118 English feet; the depression of the Lake of Tiberias below the level of the Mediterranean 553.3; and that of the Dead Sea 331.7 (Robinson, i. 612, note xxx.). Thus "the Descender" may be said to have fairly earned his name. Its sinuosity is not so remarkable in the upper part of its course. Lieutenant Lynch would regard the two phenomena in the light of cause and effect. "The great secret," he says, "of the depression between Lake Tiberias and the Dead Sea is solved by the torrentious course of the Jordan. In a space of 60 miles of latitude and course, or 5 miles of length, the Jordan transverses at least 200 miles" (Off. Letter, p. 265 of Narrat.). During the whole passage of 81 days, the time which it took his boat to reach the Dead Sea from Gennesaret, only one straight reach of any length, about midway between them, i.e. on the 4th day, is noticed. The rate of stream seems to have varied with its relative width and depth. The greatest width mentioned was 190 yards, the point where it enters the Dead Sea. Here it was only 3 feet deep. On the 6th day the width in one place was 80 yards, and the depth only 2 feet; while the current on the whole varied from 2 to 8 knots. On the 5th day the width was 70 yards, with a current of 2 knots, or 30 yards with a current of 6 knots.

The only living tributaries to the Jordan noticed particularly below Gennesaret were the Yarmûk (180 yards wide), and the Geniss (175 yards wide). The mouth of the former of these was passed on the 3d day, 40 yards wide, with moderate current; while the latter, whose course became visible on the 7th day, was, on the 8th day, discovered to have two distinct outlets into the main stream, one of which was then dry. Older writers had distinguished two beds and banks of the Jordan; the first, that occupied by the river in its normal state; the second, comprising the space which it occupied during its swelling or overflow (Martinier, Dict. Geogr., s. v.). Similarly Lieutenant Lynch has remarked, "There are evidently two terraces to the Jordan, and through the lowest one the river runs its serpentine course. From the stream, above the immediate banks, there is, on each side, a singular terrace of low hills, like truncated cones, which is the bluff terminus of an extended table-land, reaching into a distance of two or three miles, and bounded at the foot by hills on the western side" (Narrat., April 13, and comp. what Capt. Newbold says, p. 22). There are no bridges over Jordan which to an earlier date has been assigned than that of the Roman occupation; and there are vestiges of Roman roads in different parts of the country — between Nablûs and Bâisûn for instance — that may well have crossed by these bridges. The Saracens afterwards added to their mules, or restored these which they found in ruins. Thus the bridge called el-Chayûn over the Hotâbâégâ, has two pointed arches and one round (Newbold, p. 13), while the entire architecture of the Jisr Renât Yâkîb (of the daughters of Jacob), 2 miles to the S. of L. Hûch, as well as of the Khan adjacent to it on the eastern side, is pronounced to be Saracenic (ibid., p. 20). A Roman bridge of two arches that traverses the Jordan near the village bearing that name, and was doubtless on the route from Tiberias and Tari- chea to Gadara and Decapolis (ibid., p. 21, Irby, p. 90). Lastly, the bridge of Mâpinîâch, which crosses the Jordan about six miles from the Lake of Gennesaret, was Saracenic; while that near the ford Rimâq was more Roman (Newbold, p. 29 and Lynch, Narr., April 16).
Turning from these artificial constructions to the old bridges of nature — the fords — we find a remarkable yet perfectly independent concurrence between the narrative of Lieutenant Lynch and what has been asserted previously respecting the fords or passages of the Bible. We do not indeed affirm that the localities fit into each other like the pieces of a puzzle. Yet still it is no slight coincidence that no more than three, or at most four regular fords should have been set down by the chroniclers of the American expedition. The two first occur on the same day within a few hours of each other, and are called respectively Wacobs and Sakwat (Off. Rep. pp. 25 and 26). Eighteen miles E. by N. of the last of these were the ruins of Jerash (which our authority confounds with Pella), exactly in a line with which is placed the site of Succoth, or Sükat, in the map of Dr. Robinson; though he admits that arguments are not wanting for placing it some way to the S. (vol. iii. p. 310). The next ford is passed the following, or the 7th day, the ford of Danisch, as it is called, opposite to the commencement of the Wady Zerka, some miles above the junction of that river with the Jordan, and where the road from Nebulus to es-Salt crossed. Could we ascertain the true site of Succoth, we might be better able to decide which of these two fords answered best to the Beth-barah of the Old Test., or Bethabara of the New; and then Elou might be the ford, or one of the two fords, to the N. of it. It is perhaps worthy of note that the neighborhood of the ford Sükat is represented as the dreariest wild imaginable — fearful solitude and monotony (Narr., April 15). That Messrs. Irby and Mangles forded the Jordan near Tarichea was probably due to the ruins of the old Roman bridge; on the contrary, where they forded it on horseback, 13 hour from Beisan, Lynch found the water between 5 and 6 feet deep.

The ford el-Masbi'en a over against Jericho was the last ford put upon record, and it is too well known to need any lengthened notice. Here tra-expressing our warmest thanks to our Transatlantic brethren. It was not enough that Dr. Robinson should have eclipsed all other writers who had precealed him in his noble work upon Palestine, but that a nation from the extreme W.—from a contintent utterly unknown to the Old or New Testament—should have been the first to accomplish the navigation of that sacred river, which has been years; this is a fact which surely ought not to be passed over by any writer on the Jordan in silence,

1. The elder of the two sons of Jacob by Rachel. Like his brethren, he received his name on account of the circumstances of his birth. We read that Rachel was long barren, but that at length she "laced a son; and said, God hath taken away (יוּשָבָד) my reproach and she called his name Joseph (יוּשָבָד:); saying, the Lord will add (יוּשָבָד) to me another son" (Gen. xxx. 27, 28); a hope fulfilled in the birth of Benjamin (comp. xxxv. 17). passage seems to indicate a double etymology (from בֵּית and בָּיִם). There is nothing improbable in this explanation, because of the relation of the taking away the reproach to the expectation of another son. Such double etymologies are probably more common in Hebrew names than is generally supposed.

The date of Joseph's birth relatively to that of the coming of Jacob into Egypt is fixed by the mention that he was thirty years old when he became governor of Egypt (xlii. 46), which agrees with the statement that he was "seventeen years old." (xxxvi. 2) about the time that his brethren sold him. He was therefore born about 39 years before Jacob came into Egypt, and, according to the chronology which we hold to be the most probable, B. C. cir. 1906.

After Joseph's birth he is first mentioned as a youth, seventeen years old. As the child of Rachel, and "son of his old age" (xxvii. 3), and doubtless also for his excellence of character, he was beloved by his father above all his brethren. Probably at this time Rachel was already dead and Benjamin but an infant, Benjamin, that other "child of his old age" (xlv. 20), whom Jacob afterwards loved as all that remained of Rachel when he supposed Joseph dead — "his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loved him" (l.c.). A. Jacob at this time had two small pieces of land in Canaan, Abraham's burying-place at Hebron in the south, and the "parcel of a field, where he [Jacob] had spread his tent." (Gen. xxxiii. 19), at Shechem in the north, the latter being probably, from its price, the lesser of the two. He seems then to have stayed at Hebron with the aged Isaac while his sons kept his flocks. Joseph, we real, brought the evil report of his brethren to his father, and they hated him because his father loved him more than them, and bad shown his preference by making him a dress of blue and vermilion, which appears to have been a long tunic with sleeves, worn by youths and maidens of the richer class. The hatred of Joseph's brethren was increased by his telling of a dream foreboding that they would bow down to him, which was followed by another of the same import. It is remarkable that thus early prophetic dreams appear in Joseph's life. This part of the history (xlviii. 3-11) may perhaps be regarded as a retrospective introduction to the narrative of the great crime of the envious brethren. They had gone to Shechem to feed the flock, and Joseph was sent thither from the vale of Hebron by his father to bring him word of their welfare and that of the flock. They were not at Shechem, but were gone to Dothan, which appears to have been not very far distant, pasturing their flock like the Arabs of the present day, wherever the wild country (ver. 24) was unowned. On Joseph's approach, his brethren, except Reuben, resolved to kill him; but Reuben saved him, persuading them to cast him into a dry pit with the intent that he might restore him to his father. Accordingly when Joseph was come, they stripped him of his tunic and cast him into the pit, "and they sat down to eat bread: and they lifted up their eyes and looked, and beheld, a company of Ishmaelites came from Gilead, with their camels bearing spicery (?) and balm and gum ladanum (?); going to carry [it] down to Egypt." (ver. 25). — In passing we must call attention to the interest of this early notice of the trade between Palestine and Egypt. — The Ishmaelites are also called Midianites in the narrative: that the two names are used interchangeably is evident from ver. 28; it must therefore be supposed that one of them is generic; the caravan "came from Gilead" and brought balm; so that it is reasonable to infer the merchants to have been Midianites, and that they are also called Ishmaelites by a kind of generic use of that name. Judith suggested to his brethren to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelites, appealing at once to their covetousness and, in proposing a less cruel course than that on which they were

d According to the order of the nar- rative, Rachel's death preceded the selling of Joseph; it is unlikely that 17 years should have elapsed between the birth of Joseph and that of Benjamin; and as Benjamin had ten sons at the coming into Egypt (xlii. 21), it is scarcely probable that he was born no more than 22 years before. There is moreover no mention of Rachel besides the allusion in the speech of Judah to Joseph, quoted above (xlii. 26), in the whole subsequent narrative, until dying Jacob, when he blesses Ephraim and Manasseh, returns to the thought of his beloved wife, and says, "And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when we were few; and the Lord had dealt kindly with me in the way of Ephrath; and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath; the same [is] Beth-lehem." (xlii. 7). Joseph's anxiety in Egypt to see Benjamin seems to favor the idea that he had known him as a child. When Joseph was sold, Benjamin can, however, have only been very young.

The name of this dress seems to signify "a tunic reaching to the extremities." It was worn by David's daughter Tamar, being the dress of "the king's daughter."(2 Sam. iii. 38). There seems no reason for the LXX. rendering σαρκικόν, or the Vulg. polypntia, except that it is very likely that such a tunic would be ornamented with colored stripes, or embroidered. The richer classes among the ancient Egyptians wore long dresses of white linen. The people of Palestine and Syria, represented on the Egyptian monuments as enemies or tributaries, wore similar dresses, partly colored, generally with a stripe round the skirts and the borders of the sleeves.

e From Joseph's second dream, and his father's rebuke, it might be inferred that Rachel was living at the time that he dreamt it. It is indeed possible that it may have occurred some time before the selling of Joseph, and been interpreted by Jacob of Joseph, who certainly was not alive at its fulfillment, so that it could not apply to her. Yet, if Leah only survived, Jacob might have spoken of her as Joseph's mother. The dream, moreover, indicates eleven brethren besides the father and mother of Joseph; if therefore Benjamin were already born, Rachel must have been dead: the reference is therefore more probably to Leah, who may have been living when Jacob went into Egypt.

The three articles of commerce carried by the caravan we have rendered spicery, balm, and gum ladanum. The meaning of מָלָאכָם is extremely doubtful: there is nothing to guide us but the renderings of the LXX. rendering σπειράματα, and the Vulg. aromata, and the conjecture of their meaning with that of the name of the second article. As to the מָלָאכָם, there can be no doubt that it was a kind of balm, although its exact kind is difficult to determine. The meaning of מָלָאכָם is not certain: perhaps gum ladanum is a not improbable conjecture.
probably still resolved, to what remnant of brotherly feeling they may still have had. Accordingly they took Joseph out of the pit and sold him "for twenty [shekels] of silver" (ver. 28), which we find to have been, under the Law, the value of a male from five to twenty years old (Lev. xxvii. 34). Probably they took him, in the same manner, in white slaves, and the price, according to the unchangeableness of eastern customs, long remained the same. It is worthy of remark that we here already find the descendants of Abraham's concubines oppressing the Circumcised. Reuben was absent, and on his return to the pit was greatly distressed at not finding Joseph. His brethren pretended to Jacob that Joseph had been killed by some wild beast, taking to him the tunic stained with a kid's blood, while even Reuben forsook to tell him the truth, all speaking constantly of the lost brother as though they knew not what had become of him, and even as dead.

"And Jacob rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days. And all his sons and all his daughters rose up to comfort him: but he refused to be comforted; and he said, For I will go down unto my son mourning into the grave. Thus his father wept for him" (Gen. xxxvii. 34, 35).

Joseph's lamentation shows that he knew of a future state, for what comfort would he have in going into his own grave when he thought that his lost son had been torn by wild beasts? This is one of the cases in which we should certainly understand "Hades" by "the grave," and may translate, "For I will go down unto my son mourning unto Hades." c The Midrash tells Joseph in Egypt to Potiphar, "an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the executioners, an Egyptian" (xxxix. 1; comp. xxxvi. 31)."d We have probably no right to infer, as Gesenius has done (Thes. s. v. I7Ψ), that by the executioner we are to understand the same as the king's guard or body-guard. e This may be the case when the Chaldeans are spoken of, for the immediate infliction of punishment under the very eye of the sovereign was usual both with Solomon and Tartars, as a part of their system of investing the regal power with terror; but the more refined Egyptians and their responsible kings do not seem to have practiced a custom which nothing but necessity could render tolerable. That in this case the crime was less heinous literally, it is found in the control exercised by Potiphar over the king's prison (xxxix. 20), and from the fact that this prison is afterwards shown to have been in the house of the captain of the executioners, that officer then being undoubtedly a successor of Potiphar (xl. 3, 4). The name Potiphar is written in hieroglyphics PEP-PT-PAH or PEP-PT-KA, and signifies "belonging to Ra." (The sun). It occurs again, with a slightly different orthography, Poti-phereh, as the name of Joseph's father-in-law, priest or prince of On. It may be remarked that as Ra was the chief divinity of On, or Heliopolis, it is an interesting undesignated coincidence that the latter should bear a name identical with the divine name.

It is important to observe that a careful comparison of evidence has led us to the conclusion that, at the time that Joseph was sold into Egypt, the country was not united under the rule of a single native line, but governed by several dynasties, of which the Fiftteenth Dynasty, of Shepherd Kings, was the predominant line, the rest being tributary to it. The absolute dominions of this dynasty lay in Lower Egypt, and it would therefore always be most connected with Palestine. The manners described are Egyptian, although there is apparently an occasional slight tinge of Semitism. The date of Joseph's arrival we should consider B. C. cir. 1830. [EGYPT: CHRONOLOGY.]

In Egypt, the second period of Joseph's life begins. As a child he had been a true son, and withstood the evil example of his brethren. He is now to serve a strange master in the hard state of slavery, and his virtue will be put to a severer proof than it had yet sustained. Joseph prospered in the house of the Egyptian, who, seeing that God blessed him, and pleased with his good service, "set him over his house, and all (that) he had he gave into his hand" (xxxix. 4, comp. 5). He was placed over all his master's property with perfect trust, and "the Lord blessed the Egyptian house for Joseph's sake" (ver. 5). The sculptures and paintings of the ancient Egyptian tombs bring vividly before us the daily life and duties of Joseph. The property of great men is shown to have been managed by scribes, who exercised a most methodical and minute supervision over all the operations of agriculture, gardening, the keeping of live stock, and fishing. Every product was carefully registered to check the dishonesty of the laborers, who in Egypt have always been famous in this respect. Probably in no country was farming ever more systematic. Joseph's previous knowledge of tending flocks, and perhaps of husbandry, and his truthful character, exactly fitted him for the post of overseer. How long he filled it we are not told, "Joseph was fair of form and fair in appearance" (xxxix. 6). His master's wife, with the well-known profligacy of the Egyptian women, tempted him, and failing, charged him with the crime she would have made him commit. Potiphar, incensed against Joseph, cast him into prison. It must not be supposed, from the bêttness of the morals of the Egyptians in practice, that the sin of unfaithfulness in among the Israelites during and after the sojourn in Egypt, see art. EGYPT. f The word נֶרֶשׁ, which we have rendered "officer," with the A. V., properly means "smear," as explained in the margin, although it is also used in the Bible in the former sense (Gen. Thes. s. v.). Potiphar's office would scarcely have been given to a commoner, and there is, we believe, no evidence that there were such in the Egyptian courts in ancient times. This very word first occurs in hieroglyphics, written šrs, as a title of Persian functionaries, in inscriptions of the time of the Persian dominion.

g The name הָשָׁרָה must mean "captain of the executioners," from Potiphar's connection with the prison, although the LXX renders it ἐκαστασία.
Joseph

wife was not ranked among the highest vices. The punishment of adulterers was severe, and a moral tale recently interpreted, "The Two Brothers," is founded upon a case nearly resembling that of Joseph. It has, indeed, been suggested that the story was based upon the trial of Joseph, and as it was written for the heir to the throne of Egypt at a later period, there is some reason in the idea that the virtue of one who had held so high a position as Joseph might have been in the mind of the writer, were this part of his history well known to the priests, which, however, is not likely. This incident, moreover, is not so remarkable as to justify great stress being laid upon the similarity to it of the main event of a moral tale. The story of Belerophon might as reasonably be traced to it, were it Egyptian and not Greek. The Muslims have founded upon the history of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, whom they call Yosuff and Zeleckha, a famous religious allegory. This is much to be wondered at, as the Kor-an relates the tempting of Joseph with no material variation in the main particulars from the authentic narrative. The commentators say, that after the death of Potiphar (Kitteer) Joseph married Zeleckha (Sale, ch. xii.). This mistake was probably caused by the circumstance that Joseph's father-in-law bore the same name as his master.

Potiphar, although convinced of Joseph's guilt, does not appear to have brought him before a tribunal, where the enormity of his alleged crime, especially after the trust placed in him, and the fact of his being a foreigner, which was made much of by his master's wife (xxxix. 14, 17), would probably have insured a punishment of the severest kind. He seems to have only cast him into the prison, which appears to have been in his house, or, at least, under his control, since afterwards prisoners are related to have been put in ward [in] the house of the captain of the executioners, into the prison "(xl. 3), and simply, "in ward [in] the captain of the executioners' house" (xli. 10, comp. xl. 7). The prison is described as "a place where the king's prisoners [were] bound" (xxix. 20). Here the hardest time of Joseph's period of probation began. He was cast into prison on a false accusation, to remain there for at least two years, and perhaps for a much longer time. At first he was treated with severity; this we learn from Ps. cx. 2, "He sent a man before them, Joseph [who] was sold for a slave; whose feet they afflicted with the fetter; the iron entered into his soul." (ver. 17, 18). There is probably here a connection between "fetter" and "iron" (comp cxlix. 8), in which case the signification of the last clause would be a various stage of the growth of the tree and fruit as though immediately following one another, would allow the omission of the process of preparing the wine. The evidence of the manuscripts makes it very improbable that unfermented wine was drunk by the ancient inhabitants, so that it seems impossible that it should ever have taken the place of fermented or true wine, which was the national beverage of the higher classes at least.

"And here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon" (Judg. xvi. 15), does not throw light upon this matter; for although the word used seems properly to mean the worst kind of prison, or the worst part of a prison, here it must be merely equivalent, as in xli. 14, to "גַּלִּית בָּעָשׁוֹ (xxxix. 8), & c., which seems properly a milder term.

It has been imagined, from the account of the reminiscence of the chief of the cup-bearers, that the wine drunk by the king of Egypt may have been the fresh unfermented juice of the grape; but the nature of the dream, which embraces a long period, and merely indicates the various stages of the growth of the tree and fruit as though immediately following one another, would allow the omission of the process of preparing the wine. The evidence of the manuscripts makes it very improbable that unfermented wine was drunk by the ancient inhabitants, so that it seems impossible that it should ever have taken the place of fermented or true wine, which was the national beverage of the higher classes at least.

"Lit. "at the end of two years of days," but we may read "after," or "at the end;" and the word "days" appears merely to indicate that the year was a period of time, or possibly is used to distinguish the ordinary year from a greater period, the year of days from the year of years.

This word is probably of Egyptian origin. [Egypt; Niat.]

There can be no doubt that this is an Egyptian word. The LXX. does not translate it (Gen. xii. 18; Is. xix. 7); and Jesus the son of Strach, as

This word is probably of Egyptian origin. [Egypt; Niat.]

There can be no doubt that this is an Egyptian word. The LXX. does not translate it (Gen. xii. 18; Is. xix. 7); and Jesus the son of Strach, as of the river, evil in appearance, and lean-flushed (xli.—3). These, afterwords described still more strongly, ate up the first seven, and yet, as is said in the second account, when they had eaten them remained as lean as before (xli.—4, 17—21). Then Pharaoh had a second dream — Behold, seven ears of corn coming up on one stalk, fat or full, ver. 22] and good. And, behold, seven ears, thin and blasted with the east wind, sproting forth after them (ver. 5, 6). These, also described more strongly in the second account, devoured the first seven ears (ver. 5—7, 22—24). In the morning Pharaoh sent for the scribes, (xlii.), and the wise men, and they were unable to give him an interpretation. Then the chief of the cupbearers remembered Joseph, and told Pharaoh how a young Hebrew, servant to the captain of the executioners, had interpreted his and his fellow-prisoner’s dreams. Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they made him hasten out of the prison: and he shaved [himself], and changed his raiment, and came unto Pharaoh’s (ver. 14). The king then related his dreams, and Joseph, when he had disclaimed any human wisdom, declared to him that they were sent of God to forewarn Pharaoh. There was essentially but one dream. Both kine and ears symbolized years. There were to be seven years of great plenty in Egypt, and after them seven years of consuming and “very heavy famine.” The doubling of the dream denoted that the events it foreshadowed were certain and imminent. On the interpretation of it may be remarked, that it seems evident that the kine represented the animal products, and the ears of corn the vegetable products, the most important object in each class representing the whole class. Any reference to Egyptian superstitions, such as some commentators have imagined, is both derogatory to revelation and, on purely critical grounds, unreasonable. The perfectly Egyptian color of the whole narrative is very noticeable, and nowhere more so than in the particulars of the first dream. The cattle coming up from the river and feeding on the bank may be seen even now, though among them the lean kine predominate: and the use of one Egyptian word, if not of two, in the narrative, probably shows that the writer knew the Egyptian language. The corn with many ears on one stalk must be wheat, one kind of which now grown in Egypt has this peculiarity. Another point to be remarked is, that Joseph shaved before he went into Pharaoh’s presence, and we find from the monuments that the Egyptians, except when engaged in war, shaved both the head and face, the small beard that was worn on the chin being probably artificial. Having interpreted the dream, Joseph counselled Pharaoh to choose a wise man and put him over the land of Egypt in order that he should take the fifth part of the produce of the seven years of plenty against the years of famine. To this high post the king appointed Joseph. Thus, when he was thirty years of age, was he at last released from his state of suffering, and placed in a position of the greatest honor. About thirteen years’ probation had prepared him for this trust: some part passed as Potiphar’s slave, some part, probably the greater, in the prison. If we view of Hebrew and Egyptian chronology be correct, the Pharaoh here mentioned was Asshur, Manetho’s Assis or Asses, whose reign we suppose to have occupied the first half of the nineteenth century B. C.

Pharaoh, seeing the wisdom of giving Joseph, whom he perceived to be under God’s guidance, greater powers than he had advised should be given to the officer set over the country, made him not only over Egypt, but second only to the sovereign. We read: “And Pharaoh took off his signet from his hand, and put it upon Joseph’s hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen (xlii.—22, 23), and put a collar of gold about his neck: and he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Abrech (xlii.—24, 25), even to set him over all the land of Egypt” (xlii. 42, 43). The monuments show that on the investiture of a high official in Egypt, one of the chief ceremonies was the putting on him a collar of gold (see Ancient Egyptians, pl. 80); the other particulars, the vestures of fine linen and the riding in the second chariot, are equally in accordance with the manners of the country. The meaning of what was cried before him has not been satisfactorily determined. We are told that Pharaoh named Joseph Zaphnaith-paaneah (xlii. 45), the signification of which Kamassian. 3. The spring hot winds are southerly. 4. They do not last fifty days. 4. They are not called Chamshin (Khamseen) or Kamassen. 5. They prevail, usually for three days at a time, during the seven weeks (49 days) following Easter, vulgarly called in Egypt Khamseen, which is a plural of Kamassen, a term applied in the singular to neither winds nor period, though they are not strictly confined to this fluctuating period. 6. They have no relation to the Kamassen, which occurs in any hot weather, and seldom lasts more than a quarter of an hour. 7. The Kamassen is not peculiar to Arabia. 8. We learn that Joseph was two years in prison after the liberation of the chief of the cupbearers. The preponderance of evidence, however, seems in favor of supposing that he was longer in prison than in Potiphar’s house.

b. The signet was of so much importance with the ancient Egyptian kings that their names (except perhaps in the earliest period) were always inscribed in an oval which represented an elongated signet. 3. We do not here except Burns’ etymology, Ephedrae, i. c., for we doubt that the root bears the signification he gives it, and think the construction un questionable.
Joseph. [See ZAPINAXI-DAAPNIAI.] He also gave him to wife Asenath daughter of Potipherah, priest [or 'prince,' ḫnwyn] of On' (ver. 45). Whether Joseph's father-in-law were priest or prince cannot, we think, be determined, although the former seems more likely, since On was a very pious city, and there is no good reason to think that a priest would have been more exclusive than any other Egyptian functionary. His name, implying devotion to Ra, the principal object of worship at On, though, as already noticed, appropriate to any citizen of that place, would be especially so to a priest. [POTIPHERAH.] It is worthy of remark that On appears to have been the capital, and seems to have been certainly the religious capital, as containing the great temple, of Apepop, a shepherd-king, probably of the same line as Joseph's Pharaoh. (Select Papyrus; Brugsch, Zeitschrift d. Deutsch. Morgenland. Gesellsch.) The name of Joseph's wife we are disposed to consider to be Hebrew. [ASENATH.] Joseph's history, as governor of Egypt, shows him in two relations, which may be here separately considered. We shall first speak of his administration of the country, and then of his conduct to his brethren. In one respect, as bearing upon Joseph's moral character, the two subjects are closely connected, but their details may be best treated apart, if we keep this important aspect constantly in view.

Joseph's first act was to go throughout all the land of Egypt.' (ver. 46). During the seven plenteous years there was a very abundant produce, and he gathered the fifth part, as he had advised Pharaoh, and laid it up. The narrative, according to Semitic usage, speaks as though he had taken the whole produce of the country, or the whole surplus produce (ver. 48); but a comparison with a parallel passage shows that our explanation must be correct (ver. 31, 36). The abundance of this store is evident from the statement that "Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he could number it' (ver. 49). The representations of the monuments, which show that the contents of the granaries were accurately noted by the scribes when they were filled, well illustrate this passage.

Before the years of famine Asenath bare Joseph two sons, of whom we read that he named the 1...2...[a forgotten?]; For God [said] and named, forget all my toil, and all my father's house. And the name of the second called he Ephraim [fruitful?]. 3...For God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction' (50-52). Though, as was natural, the birth of a son made Joseph feel that he had at last found a home, that his father's house was no longer his home, yet it was not in utter forgetfulness of his country that he gave this and the other, both born of his Egyptian wife, Hebrew names, still less, can we signifying his devotion to the God of his fathers.

When the seven good years had passed, the famine began. We read that ' the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread. And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread: and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph, what he saith unto you, do. And the famine was over all the face of the earth. And Joseph opened all the storehouses [lit. 'all wherein ['nets], and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt. And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy [corn]; because that the famine was [so] sore in all lands' (ver. 34-37). The expressions here used do not require us to suppose that the famine extended beyond the countries round Egypt, such as Palestine, Syria, and Arabia, as well as some part of Africa, although of course it may have been more widely experienced. It may be observed, that although famines in Egypt depend immediately upon the failure of the inundation, and in other countries upon the failure of rain, yet that, as the rise of the Nile is caused by heavy rains in Ethiopia, an extremely dry season there and in Palestine would produce the result described in the sacred narrative. It must also be recollected that Egypt was anciently the granary of neighboring countries, and that a famine there would cause first scarcity, and then famine, around. Famines are not very frequent in the history of Egypt; but the famous seven years' famine in the reign of the Pharaoh Khufu of the V dynasty, which is the only known parallel to that of Joseph, of this an account is given under Famine. Early in the time of famine, Joseph's brethren came to buy corn, a part of the history which we mention here only as indicating the liberal policy of the governor of Egypt, by which the storehouses were opened to all buyers of whatever nation they were.

After the famine had lasted for a time, apparently two years, there was 'no bread in all the land; for the famine [was] very sore, so that the land of Egypt and the land of Canaan failed by reason of the famine. And Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought; and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house' (xvii. 13, 14). When all the money of Egypt and Canaan was exhausted, barley became necessary. Joseph then obtained all the cattle of Egypt, and in the next year, all the land, except that of the priests, and apparently, as a consequence, the Egyptians themselves. He demanded, however, only a fifth part of the produce as Pharaoh's right. It has been attempted to trace this enactment of Joseph in the fragments of Egyptian history preserved by profane writers, but the result has not been satisfactory. Even were the latter sources trustworthy as to the early period of Egypt, it. This difficulty we may perhaps partly attribute to the pointing.

a The very old opinion that ḫnwyn means prince as well as priest has been contradicted by Gesenius, but not disproved.

b It may be remarked, as indicating that Joseph's family did not maintain an Egyptian mode of life, that Manasseh took an Aramean as a concubine (1 Chr. vii. 14). This happened in his father's lifetime: for Joseph lived to see the children of Muchir the son of his concubine born (Gen. xliii. 14).

c The derivation of Ephraim can scarcely be doubted, although there is difficulty in determining tian history, it would be difficult to determine the areas referred to, as the actions of at least two kings are asscribed by the Greeks to Sesostriis, the king particularly. Herodotus says that, according to the Egyptians, Sesostriis made a division of the soil of Egypt among the inhabitants, assigning square plots of ground of equal size to all, and obtaining his chief revenue from the rent which the holders were required to pay him every year" (ii.
109). Elsewhere he speaks of the priests as hav-
JESUS to see his brother, first refusing that they should return without sending for and bringing Benjamin, then putting them in prison three days, but at last releasing them that they might take him back to the brethren and be left as a hostage. They were then stricken with remorse, and saw that the punishment of their great crime was come upon them. "And they said one to another, We [are] verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us. And Reuben answered them, saying, Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child, and ye shall not hear? therefore, behold, also his blood is required. And they knew not that Joseph understood [them]; for an interpreter [was] between them. And he turned himself about from them, and wept; and returned to them again, and communed with them, and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes" (21-24). Thus he separated one of them from the rest, as the heir of the patriachry from his father, and reserved their money in their sacks, and gave them provision for the way, besides the corn they had purchased. The discovery of the money terrified them and their father, who refused to let them take Benjamin. Yet when the famine continued, and they had eaten the supply, Jacob desired his sons to go again to Egypt. But they could not go without Benjamin. At the persuasion of Judah, who here appears as the spokesman of his brethren, Jacob was at last prevailed on to let them take him, Judah offering to be surety. It may be remarked that Reuben had made the same offer, apparently, at once after the return, when Jacob had withheld his consent, telling his father that he might shew his sons if he did not bring back Benjamin (37, 38). Judah seems to have been put forward by his brethren as the most able, and certainly his after-conduct in Egypt would have justified their choice, and his father's trusting him rather than the rest. Jacob, anxious for Benjamin, and not unmindful of Simeon, touchingly sent to the governor out of his scanty stock a little present of the best products of Palestine, as well as double money that his sons might repay what had been returned to them.

When they had come into Egypt, Joseph's brethren, as before, found him presiding at the sale of corn. Now that Benjamin was with them he told his steward to shew and make ready, for they should dine with him at noon. So the man brought them into Joseph's house. They feared, not knowing, as it seems, why they were taken to the house (xiii. 25), and perhaps thinking they might be imprisoned there. Joseph no doubt gave his command in Egyptian, and apparently did not cause it to be interpreted to them. They were, however, encouraged by the steward, and Simeon was brought out to them. When Joseph came they brought him the present, again fulfilling his treas, as twice they bowed before him. At the sight of Benjamin he was greatly affected. "And he lifted up his eyes and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, [Is] this your younger brother, of whom ye spake unto me? And he said, our brother is, yea, your brother whom ye sold into Egypt. And he made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother, and he sought [where] to weep; and he entered into [his] chamber, and wept there. And as he washed his face, and went out, and refrained himself" (29-31). The description of Joseph's dinner is in accordance with the representations of the monuments. The governor and each of his guests was seated separately, and the brethren were placed according to their age. That the youngest thus had the lowest place, yet when Joseph sent messes from before him to his brethren, he showed his favor to Benjamin by a mess five times as large as that of any of them. "And they drank, and were merry with him" (32-34). It is mentioned that the Egyptians and Hebrews sat apart from each other, as to eat bread with the Hebrews was an abomination to the Egyptians" (32). The scenes of the Egyptian table show us that it was the custom for each person to eat singly, particularly among the great. That guests were placed according to their right of precedence, and that it was usual to drink freely, men and even women being represented as overpowered with wine, probably as an evidence of the liberality of the entertainer. These points of agreement in matters of detail are well worthy of attention. There is no evidence as to the entertaining foreigner. But the general exclusiveness of the Egyptians is in harmony with the statement that they did not eat with the Hebrews.

The next morning, when it was light, they left the city (for here we learn that Joseph's house was in a city), having had their money replaced in their sacks, and Joseph's silver cup put in Benjamin's sack. His steward was ordered to follow them, and say (claiming the cup), "Therefore have ye rewarded evil for good? [Is] not this [it] in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth? Ye have done evil in so doing." (xlv. 4, 5). When they were thus accused, they declared that the guilty person should die, and that the rest should be bondmen. So the steward searched the sacks, and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack; whereupon they rent their clothes, and returned to the city, and went to Joseph's house, and fell before him on the ground. And Joseph said unto them, What deed [is] this that ye have done? wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?" Judah then, instead of protesting innocence, admitted the alleged crime, and declared that he and his brethren were the governor's servants. But Joseph replied that he would alone keep him in whose hand the cup was found. Judah, not unmindful of the trust he held, then hid the whole matter before Joseph, showing him that he could not leave Benjamin without causing the old man's death, and as surety nobly offered himself as a bondman in his brother's stead. Then, at the touching relation of his father's love and anxiety, and, perhaps, moved by Judah's generosity, the strong will of Joseph gave way to the tenderness he had so long felt, but restrained, and he made himself known to his brethren. If Iditheroe had dealt severely, now he showed his generosity. He sent forth every one but his brethren. "And he wept aloud. . . . And Joseph said unto his brethren, I [am] Joseph; doth my father yet live? And his brethren could not answer him; for they were troubled at his presence. And Joseph said unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you. And they came near. And he said, [Is] my father yet alive? And Joseph told his brethren that he was not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life. For these two years [this] dear famine [been] in the land: and yet [there are] five Joseph, at this time can, we think, he only explained by the supposition that he felt it was his duty to treat his brethren severely: otherwise his delay and his causing distress to his father are inconsistent with his deep affection. The sending for Benjamin seems hard to understand, except we suppose that Joseph felt he was the surest link with his father, and Jacob may more readily receive his testimony as to the lost son.

There is no need here to speak largely of the rest of Joseph's history: full as it is of interest, it throws no new light upon his character. Jacob's spirit revived when he saw the wagons Joseph had sent. Encouraged on the way by a Divine vision, he journeyed into Egypt with his whole house.

And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while. And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou [art} yet alive " (xvi. 29, 30).

Then Jacob and his house abode in the land of Goshen, Joseph still ruling the country. Here Jacob, when near his end, gave Joseph a portion above his brethren, doubtless including the 'parch of ground before the house of Pharaoh,' future burying-ground of Shechem's family (comp. John iv. 5). Then he blessed his sons, Joseph most earnestly of all, and died in Egypt. "And Joseph fell upon his father's face, and wept upon him, and kissed him " (I. 1).

When he had caused him to be embalmed by "his servants the physicians" he carried him to Canaan, and laid him in the cave of Machpehlah, the burying-place of his fathers. Then it was that his brethren feared that, their father being dead, Joseph would punish them, and that he strove to remove their fears. From his being able to make the journey into Canaan with "a very great company" (9), as well as from his living apart from his brethren and their fear of him, Joseph seems to have been still governor of Egypt. We know no more than that he lived "a hundred and ten years" (22, 20), having been more than ninety in Egypt; that he "saw Ephraim's children of the third" [generation], and that the children also of Machir the son of Manasseh were borne upon Joseph's knees (23); and that dying he took an oath of his brethren that they should carry up his bones to the land of promise: thus showing in his latest action the faith (Heb. xi. 22) which had guided his whole life. Like his father he was embalmed, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt " (I. 20). His trust was kept, and the bones of Joseph in his inheritance in Shechem, in the territory of Ephraim his offspring.

The character of Joseph is wholly composed of great materials, and therefore needs not to be minutely portrayed. We trace in it very little of that balance of good and evil, of strength and weakness, that marks us through human, and do not any where distinctly discover the results of the conflict of motives that generally occasions such great difficulty in judging men's actions. We have as full an account of Joseph as of Abraham and Jacob, a fuller one than of Isaac; and if we compare their histories, Joseph's character is the least marked by wrong or indecision. His first quality seems to have been that of Shechem, his future historie: he not only believed faithfully, but could endure perseverance, and could command equally his good and evil passions. Hence his strong sense of duty, his zealous work his strict justice, his clear discrimination of good and evil. Like all men of vigorous character, he loved power, but when he had gained it he used it with the greatest generosity. He seems to have striven to get men unconditionally in his power that he might confer benefits upon them. Generosity in conferring benefits, as well as in forgiving injuries, is one of his distinguishing characteristics. With this strength was united the deepest tenderness. He was easily moved to tears, even weeping at the first sight of his brethren after they had sold him. His love for his father and Benjamin was not enfeebled by years of separation, nor by his great station. The wise man was still the same as the true youth. These great qualities explain his power of governing and administering, and his extraordinary flexibility, which enabled him to suit himself to each new position in life. The last characteristic to make up this great character was modesty, the natural result of the others.

In the history of the chosen race Joseph occupies a very high place as an instrument of Providence. He was "sent before" his people, as he himself knew, to preserve them in the terrible famine, and to settle where they could multiply and prosper in the interval before the iniquity of the Canaanites was full. In the latter days of Joseph's life, he is the leading character among the Hebrews. He makes a great difference in the history of the Exile, and is the most prominent Hebrew of his time. He proteets his kinsmen. Dying, he reminds them of the promise, charging them to take his bones with them. Blessed with many revelations, he is throughout a God-taught leader of his people. In the N. T. Joseph is only mentioned: yet the striking particulars of the persecution and sale by his brethren, his resisting temptation, his great degradation and yet greater exaltation, the saving of his people by his hand, and the confounding of his enemies, seem to indicate that he was a type of our Lord. He also connects the Patriarchal with the Gospel dispensation, as an instance of the exercise of some of the highest Christian virtues under the less distinct manifestation of the Divine will granted to the fathers.

The history of Joseph's posterity is given in the articles devoted to the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. The facts of the Bible are spoken of under the name of Joseph, which is given even to the whole Israelite nation. Ephraim is, however, the common name of his descendants, for the division of Manasseh gave almost the whole political weight to the brother-tribe. That great people seems to have inherited all Joseph's ability with none of his goodness, and the very knowledge of his power in Egypt, instead of stimulating his offspring to follow in his steps, appears only to have constantly drawn them into a balking after that forbidden land which began when Jeroboam introduced the calves, and ended only when a treasonable alliance laid Samaria in ruins and sent the ten tribes into captivity.

* "Joseph's conduct towards his brethren, and his father," prior to the disclosure in Egypt, is susceptible of a somewhat different interpretation from that which is offered in a preceding paragraph. The mental distress which the brothers endured, was both a deserved punishment and a needful discipline, and it was a fitting retribution of Divine Providence that the injured brother should be the agent in inflicting it. Its evident justice. If not the motive for its infliction, may have well reconciled it to, and his conviction of its necessity must have been such as to overcome his great reluctance to cause his honored father an illiterion pang, even though his sorrow would soon be turned into joy. The assumed part which he acted, and the harsh tone which he adopted, were foreign to every sentiment of his heart, and it cost a violent struggle with his noble nature, to bear this alien attitude to a point essential to the end which he had in view. And what was this end? Was it, as suggested above, to punish his brethren?—not indeed to gratify an unfatral vinvictiveness, but as a calm instrument of God's justice, and for their good.

This effect was, doubtless, secured, but it seems to us that he had an object, apart from this, which dictated his policy, while he neither sought, nor desired, their punishment—willingly leaving it to the being who had been his Protector.

Before revealing himself to them, it was necessary for him to know whether they still cherished the feelings which had prompted their wicked treatment of him. Had he sought their punishment, or a mere personal triumph, he could have had it at an earlier period. This he did not seek, but waited for the day, which he must have anticipated from the time of his elevation, when he could put them to the test, and ascertain if the way were open for the resumption of the lost relation—which he did desire with the longings of a child and the fervor of a brother-tribe. He has been exiled from home. The hour has come, and he must now know whether they have repented of their wickedness towards him—whether the old rancor has been changed to contrition and tenderness. Their relation to his own brother Benjamin, will furnish a decisive test. The partiality which the doing father had felt for himself, and which had cost him so dearly, would have inevitably passed over to the surviving son of the lamented Rachel, the son of his old age. Joseph cannot be certain that Benjamin is alive, or if living, that he is not persecuted—that, having the same pretext for it, their treatment of him has not been as treacherous and cruel as it was of himself. He must see them together and judge for himself, and learn whether their dispositions are changed. Their brief imprisonment and the detention of Simeon (the eldest son to Reuben, and, it may be, the guiltless) were severe, but necessary, expedients to induce them to bring Benjamin, or rather, to deter them from coming without him, on their second visit, which would be equally a necessity with the first.

The plan succeeds, and Benjamin arrives with his brothers. Joseph bestows special attentions upon him, and has the opportunity of observing whether their former envy survives. Finally causes him to be arrested as a thief, and proposing to retain him as a prisoner, bids the others return in peace to their father. Will they do it? They not merely abandoned Joseph—they sold him as a slave, and only not murdered him. Will they now simply desert Benjamin, and leave him to his fate? They did not scruple to shock their father with the tidings of Joseph's death. Are they still so callous as to consent to return and tell him that Benjamin is gone also? They committed an enormous crime to rid themselves of the other favorite. Are they willing to be freed from this, without any culpable agency of their own? The result shows that their hearts are softened. The recollection of their injustice to Joseph, has made them even tender of Benjamin. The sight of the suffering which they have brought upon their father, has made them careful of his feelings and sympathetically devoted to his happiness. The arrest of the youngest brings them all, with rent garments, into Joseph's presence, when Judah, the orator of the company, draws near and addresses his unknown brother in a strain which stands unrequited, perhaps, among recorded speeches, as an exhibition of pathetic eloquence. With entire artlessness he tells the whole story, and with the generous devotion of a true son and brother, asks leave to abide as a bondman "instead of the lad," "lest, peradventure, I see the evil that shall come on my father."

Joseph, under Divine guidance, has refrained from a premature disclosure, and the fit time has fully come. He has no disposition to injure or reproach his brothers, or punish them in any way. He has put them to the test, as it was his duty to do, and satisfied that their feelings are now right, the struggling emotions of his nature, long pent up, find an irresistible vent. Troubled by the disclosure and unable to speak, he calms their agitation and seeks to soothe their self-upbraiding, thrice reminding them of the wisdom of God's plan, which had been broader than theirs. This is followed by affectionate embraces, and the charge to hasten homeward with a message to their aged father — sitting in his loneliness, day after day, in the door of his tent at Hebron, and anxiously waiting for tidings from Egypt. And years after, when on the decease of their father they humbly asked the forgiveness of their brother, he still comforted them with the reflection that God had overruled their conduct for good. From first to last, the narrative appears to us to demonstrate the view, which also seems to us most consonant with the eminent meekness of this noble Hebrew, that the leading design of his harsh policy was to subject them to a needful test, which the Lord used as a means of deepening their penitence, and that he gladly desisted, and with a brother's sympathy sought to assuage their bitter regrets, as soon as he was convinced that they were no longer false brothers, but true.

We would further suggest that the charge to them to "fall not out by the way" on their return, does not necessarily indicate that he thought them "not less wicked or not wiser than of old." Now that their associated guilt had been brought home to them, nothing was more natural than that they should seek to throw off individual responsibility. Kenben had already put in his exculpating plea, and the design of the charge was to turn them from unprofitable mutual criminations, and lead them to a devout recognition of the divine sovereignty and goodness.

It is intimately above, that Joseph was not wholly acting under Divine direction. The divining cup may not be fully explicable; it plainly reveals an Egyptian superstition, but does not necessarily imply Joseph's participation in it, and the allusion must be construed by what is known of the life. If consummate wisdom in plan and skill in execution, if a spirit beautiful in every relation, if the fruits of a manly and boldly pious, if a character as nearly faultless as has been delineated in human biography, be marks of Divine guidance, we must accord it to him, whose bow abode in strength and whose arms were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.

It is obvious to add, that the wisdom of the presidential dealings, as related to the family in Hebron, was not less marked as related to Joseph in Egypt. The course of discipline through which he passed was an indispensable qualification for the high service in reserve for him — enabling him to learn the most difficult lesson, and be prepared to bear without injury one extreme of fortune, by having properly endured the other. S. W.

* Ewald, in his Geschichte des Volkes Israel comments upon the statesmanship of Joseph in taking advantage of the pressure of famine to reduce the entire population to a tenantry, and thus accomplishing without violence a great social revolution; — a statesmanship "careful at once of the weal of populous nations, and for the consolidation and increase of the royal authority, and winning its best victories through the combination of these seemingly opposite aims. By providently storing up in his garner supplies of corn sufficient for many years of possible scarcity, Joseph was enabled not only to secure to the people the present means of existence and the possibility of better times in future, but to establish a more solid organization of government, such as a nation is very loath to accede to except in a time of overmastering necessity." (Martinmein's translation, p. 413.)

The present state of Egyptian chronology will hardly warrant the positive conclusions of Mr. Poole concerning the epoch of the Hyksos; yet, while his views are retained in the text, the data are here appended for a more comprehensive view of the subject. The problem concerning the Israelites in Egypt is mixed with the question of the Hyksos whose date is still unsettled. Bunsen makes Joseph the Grand-vizir of Sesostris, second king of the 12th Dynasty, about 2180 n. c., and 209 years before the incursion of the Hyksos; as the Hyksos were Semitic tribes, the Hebrews were undisturbed during their supremacy; but after their expulsion, the Israelites were reduced to forced labor as a means of consolidating the Pharaonic power. But this theory, which makes the sojourn in Egypt last the coming and going of the Hyksos, prolongs the stay of the Israelites beyond the utmost stretch of our Biblical chronology. (Egypt's Pasts, vol. v. p. 68.) Brugsch regards the Hyksos as Ismaelitish Arabs, who invaded Egypt about 2115 n. c. and ruled over the Delta for 511 years. Taking the second Menepthah of the 19th Dynasty, 1341-1221 n. c. for the Pharaoh of the Exodus, and computing backward 430 years, he places Joseph in office under one of the Shepherd kings. (Histoire d'Egypte, 1. 78.) Mr. Poole also makes the Pharaoh of Joseph one of the Shepherd kings in the first half of the nineteenth century, n. c. But if the Hebrews were in Egypt under the Hyksos — though this may account for the favorable reception of Jacob, and the undisputable growth of his posterity in Goshen — it is not easy to imagine how so large a foreign population, of a kindred race with the Hyksos, was suffered to remain in the Delta when the Shepherds were expelled by the revised native government; and the notion that the Exodus of the Israelites and the expulsion of the Hyksos were the same event, has no foundation either in Egyptian or in Hebrew history. To meet this difficulty, Leipsius places the migration of Jacob into Egypt after the expulsion of the Hyksos, with an interval sufficient for the fear of another Arab invasion to have died out, though the prejudice of the Egyptian: and, that the number of "shepherds" remained. His dates are, for the expiration of the Hyksos about 1501 n. c., the arrival of Jacob 1414, the Exodus 1314. (Köninglsbc.) But this brings the Exodus down to very late period, and reduces the sojourn in Egypt to one hundred years. Ewald, with his usual boldness in inventing an hypothesis to solve a difficulty, conceives that at the first, only a small portion of the Israelitish family followed Joseph into Egypt, — then under the rule of the Hyksos: that, at the expulsion of the latter, the Israelites took sides with the Egyptians, and that Joseph then summoned Israel in a body out of Canaan, and established them in Goshen as a frontier-guard of the kingdom against any new attacks of the Hyksos. In the date of the Hyksos invasion and the duration of the Shepherd dynasties in Egypt, all these writers are substantially agreed. They agree also in the main facts concerning Joseph as an historical person, and the residence of the Israelites in Egypt until the exodus under Moses. Even Ewald concedes that the "Blessing of Jacob" (Gen. xlix. 22-25), from the complication of the language and poetry, must be referred to pre-Mosaic times. The order of the historical events is not strictly dependent upon chronology.

3. A lay Israelite of the family of Bani, who was compelled by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 45). In 1 Esdr. vii. 30, he is given as the representative of the priestly family of Shechaniah, in the next generation after the return from Captivity (Neh. xii. 14).

Afford adopts the reading Josech, a mistake which seems to originate with the common confusion in Heb. MSS. between ? and ?.

11. Son of Heli [Luke iii. 23], and reputed father of Jesus Christ. The recurrence of this name in the three above instances, once before, and twice after Zerubbabel, whereas it does not occur once in St. Matthew's genealogy, is a strong evidence of the paternal descent of Joseph the son of Heli, as traced by St. Luke to Nathan the son of David.

All that is told us of Joseph in the N. T. may be summed up in a few words. He was a just man, and of the house and lineage of David, and was known as such by his contemporaries, who called Jesus the son of David, and were disposed to own Him as Messiah, as being Joseph's son. The public registers also contained his name under the reckoning of the house of David (John i. 45; Luke iii. 23; Matt. i. 20; Luke ii. 4). He lived at Nazareth in Galilee, and it is probable that his family had been settled there for at least two preceding generations, possibly from the time of Matthias, the common grandfather of Joseph and Mary, since Mary lived there too (Luke i. 26, 27). He espoused Mary, the daughter and heir of his uncle Jacob, and before he took her home as his wife received the angelic communication recorded in Matt. i. 20. It must have been within a very short time of his taking her to his home, that the decree went forth from Augustus Cesar which obliged him to leave Nazareth with his wife and go to Bethlehem. He was there with Mary and his first-born, when the shepherds came to see the babe in the manger, and he went with them to the Temple to present the infant according to the law, and there heard the prophetic words of Sim eon, as he held him in his arms. When the wise men from the East came to Bethlehem to worship Christ, they found the city was taken, and he went to Egypt with them by night, when warned by an angel of the danger which threatened them; and on a second message he returned with them to the land of Israel, intending to reside at Bethlehem the city of David; but being afraid of Archelaus he took up his abode, as before his marriage, at Nazareth, where he carried on his trade as a carpenter. When Jesus was 12 years old, Joseph and Mary took him with them to keep the Passover at Jerusalem, and when they returned to Nazareth he continued to act as a father to the child Jesus, and was reputed to be so indeed. But here our knowledge of Joseph ends. That he died before our Lord's crucifixion is indeed tolerably certain by what is related John xix. 27, and perhaps Mark vi. 3 may imply that he was then dead. But where, when, or how he died, we know not. What was his age when he married, what children he had, and, who was their mother, are questions on which tradition has been very busy, and very contradictory, and on which it affords no available information whatever. In fact the different accounts give are not traditions, but the attempts of different ages of the early Church to reconcile the narrative of the Gospels with their own opinions, and to give support, as they thought, to the miraculous conception. It is not necessary to detail or examine these accounts here, as they throw light rather upon the history of those opinions during four or five centuries, than upon the history of Joseph. But it may be well to add that the origin of all the earliest stories and assertions of the fathers concerning Joseph, as e. g., his extreme old age, his having sons by a former wife, his having the custody of Mary given to him by lot, and so on, is to be found in the apocryphal Gospels, of which the earliest is the Protevangelium of St. James, apparently the work of a Christian Jew of the second century, quoted by Origen, and referred to by Clement of Alexandria and Justin Martyr (Tischendorf, P. T. c. viii.). The same stories are repeated in the other apocryphal Gospels. The monophysite Coptic Christians are said to have first assigned a festival to Joseph in the Calendar, namely, on the 20th July, which is thus inscribed in a Coptic almanc: "Reques sancti sensa justi Josephu fabri lignarii, Deipara Virginis Mariae sponsi, qui pater Christi..."
JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA

recri promenit." The apocryphal Hisborio Josephi fabri iurgorii, which now exists in Arabic, is thought by Tierschendorf to have been originally written in Coptic, and the festival of Joseph is supposed to have been transferred to the Western Churches from the East as late as the year 1380.

The above-named history is acknowledged to be quite fabulous, though it belongs probably to the 4th century. It professes to be an account given, by our Lord himself to the Apostles on the Mount of Olives, and placed by them in the library of Jerusalem. It ascribes 111 years to Joseph's life, and makes him old and the father of 4 sons and 2 daughters before he espoused Mary. It is headed with this sentence: "Benedictiones ejus et precum servent nos omnes, O fratres. Amen." The reader who wishes to know the opinion of the ancient on the obscure subject of Joseph's marriage, may consult Jerome's sermonic tract Cantar Heliodrion. He will see that Jerome highly disapproves the common opinion (derived from the apocryphal Gospels) of Joseph being twice married, and that he claims the authority of Ignatius, Polycarp, Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, and "many other apostolical men," in favor of his own view, that our Lord's brethren were his cousins only, or at all events against the opinion of Heliodorus, which had been held by Eusebius, Theodotus of Byzantium, and Valentin, that they were the children of Joseph and Mary. Those who held this opinion were called Antiochenes, as enemies of the Virgin.

(Epiphanius, Adv. Heres. i. iii. ii. ii. Her. xxviii. also Her. li. See also Pearson on the Creed, Art. Virgin Mary: Mill, on the Brethren of the Lord; Calmet, de St. Joseph, S. Mor. Verg. copies, and Lord Laetare's note on Matt. xiii. 55; Winer, Realb. v. v. Jesus and Josephs.)

* 12. Joseph is the reading of the oldest MSS. (adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Tregelles, instead of Josaph of the received text) in Matt. xiii. 55, as the name of one of the brethren of our Lord. [Joseph, 2.]

* 17. Joseph (instead of Josaph) is the proper name of Barnabas (Acts iv. 36) according to the oldest MSS. and the best critical editions. [Joseph, 3.]

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA [A. V. Arimathaea] (I.αυτητος αριμαθειας), a rich and pious Israelite who had the privilege of performing the last offices of duty and affection to the body of our Lord. He is distinguished from other persons of the same name by the addition of his birthplace Arimathaea, a city supposed by Robinson to be situated somewhere between Lydia and Nore, now Beirut Nubat, a mile northeast of Tyre (Hill, Res. ii. 239-41, ii. 142).

Joseph is denominated by St. Mark (xv. 43) an honourable councillor, by which we are probably to understand that he was a member of the Great Council, or Sanhedrin. He is further characterized as "a good man and just" (Luke xxiii. 51), one of those who, hearing in their hearts the words of their old prophets, was waiting for the kingdom of God (Acts iv. 41; Luke ii. 25, 39, xxiii. 53). We are expressly told that he did not "consent to the counsel and deed" of his colleagues in conspiring to bring about the death of Jesus; but he seems to have lacked the courage to protest against their judgment. At all events we know that he shrank, through fear of his countrymen, from professing himself openly a disciple of our Lord.

The awful event, however, which crushed the hopes while it excited the tears of the chosen disciples, had the effect of inspiring him with new boldness and confidence to which he had been before a stranger. The crucifixion seems to have wrought in him the same clear conviction that it wrought in the centurion who stood by the cross: for on the very evening of that dreadful day, when the triumph of the chief priests and rulers seemed complete, Joseph "went boldly unto Pilate and crave the body of Jesus." The fact is mentioned by all four Evangelists. Pilate, having ascertained himself that the Divine Sufferer was dead, consented to the request of Joseph, who was thus rewarded for his faith and courage by the blessed privilege of consigning to his own new tomb the body of his crucified Lord. In this sacred office he was assisted by Nicodemus, who, like himself, had hitherto been afraid to make open profession of his faith, but now dismissing his fears bought an abundant store of myrrh and aloes for the embalming of the body of his Lord according to the Jewish custom.

These two masters in Israel then having enfolded the sacred body in the linen shroud which Joseph had bought, consigned it to a tomb hewn in a rock—a tomb where no human corpse had ever been laid.

It is specially recorded that the tomb was in a garden belonging to Joseph, and close to the place of crucifixion.

The minuteness of the narrative seems purposely designed to take away all ground or pretext for any rumor that might be spread, after the Resurrection, that it was some other, not Jesus himself, that had risen from the grave. But the burial of Jesus in the new private sepulchre of the rich man of Arimathea must also be regarded as the fulfillment of the prophecy of Isaiah (liii. 9): according to the literal rendering of Bishop Lowth, "with the rich man was his tomb." Nothing, but the merest legendary character, is recorded of Joseph, beyond what we read in Scripture. There is a tradition, surely a very improbable one, that he was of the number of the Seventy. Another, with neither authentic or not, deserves to be mentioned as generally current, namely—that Joseph, being sent to treat Britain by the Apostle St. Philip, about the year 61, settled with his brother disciples at Glastonbury, in Somersetshire; and there erected of wicker twigs the first Christian oratory in England, the parent of the majestic abbey which was afterwards founded on the same site. These and other guides to this day show the miraculous things said to bad and bless (every Christmas-day) that sprung from the staff which Joseph stuck in the ground as he stepped to rest himself on the hill-top. (See Du Fauge's Monumentum, i. 1; and Harnack, Hist. and Art. of Glastonbury: Assmann, Hist. Brtit. iii. 319.) Winer refers to a manuscript in Joseph Scaliger, Pius de Josepho Arimathia, Vivae, 1601, 4 vol.

had fallen. He, therefore, had been a companion of the disciples all the time that they followed Jesus, from his baptism to his ascension.

Papias (ap. Euseb. H. E. i. 38) calls him Justus Barsabas, and relates that having drunk some deadly poison he, through the grace of the Lord, sustained no harm. Eusebius (H. E. i. 12) states that he was one of the seventy disciples. He is to be distinguished from Jesus Barsabas (Acts iv. 36) and from Judas Barsabas (Acts xxv. 22). The significance of Barsabas is quite uncertain. Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. Acts i. 23) gives five possible interpretations of it, namely, the son of conversion, of quiet, of an oath, of wisdom, of the old man. He prefers the last two; and suggests that Joseph Barsabas may be the same as Joses the son of Alpheus, and that Judas Barsabas may be his brother, the Apostle.

JOSEPHUS (Ἰωάννης; [Vat. Φωτις; Josephus]), 1 Esdr. ix. 94. [Josephus, 3.]

JOSES (Ἰωάννης [ἢ Ἰωάννης; Lachm. Tisch. Treg.], Alford Ἰουσαφ; Ἰωάννης [ἢ Ἰωάννης] is the genitive case; [Josephus]). 1. Son of Eleazar, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 27); 15th generation from Abraham, i. e. about the reign of Manasseh. a The A. V. gives the name as Joses, which is merely the form of the genitive case. A.

2. In Matt. xiii. 55, Lachm. Tisch. Treg. Ἰωάννης; and so Sin. in Mark vi. 3; Tisch. reads Ἰωάννης also in Matt. xxvii. 50: Joseph.] One of the Lord's brethren (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3). His name connects him with the preceding. For the inquiry who these brethren of the Lord were, see James. All that appears with certainty from Scripture is that his mother's name was Mary, and his brother's James (Matt. xxvii. 50; Mark xiv. 47).

JO'ASHAH (לוֹזָשָׁה) [perh. Jehovah lets dwell, Gen.; Ἰωάννης; [Vat. Ιωάννης: Alexander Ἰωάννας; Joseph], a prince of the house of Simeon, son of Amaziah, and consequently with the more proper designation branch of the tribe, who, in the days of Hoseah, headed a marauding expedition against the peaceable Hamite shepherds dwelling in Gedor, exterminated them, and occupied their pastureage (1 Chr. iv. 34. 38-41).

JO'SHAPATH (יוֹשָחָד) [Jehovah judges]: Ἰωάννης; F.A. Ἰωάννης; Josephath, the Mithnite, one of David's guard, apparently selected from among the warriors from the east of Jordan (1 Chr. xi. 43). Buxtorf (Lex. Todt. col. 1284) gives Mathath as the Chaldee equivalent of Bar'khim. by which latter is always represented in the Targ. Onk.; and if this were the place which gave Joshaphath his surname, he was probably a Gadite. In the Syriac, Joshaphat and Uzziah (ver. 44) are interchanged, and the latter appears as "Azri of Anathoth."

a * Barsabas, says Meyer, is a patronymic (son of, and Justus a Roman surname such as Jesus often adopted at that time (Apostelgesch. ii. 23). under the direction of God again renewed (Josh i. 1), Joshua, now in his 85th year (Joseph. Ant. v. 1 § 29), assumed the command of the people at Shittim, sent spies into Jericho, crossed the Jordan, fortified a camp at Gilgal, circumcised the people, kept the passover, and was visited by the Captain of the Lord's Host. A miracle made the fall of Jericho more terrible to the Canaanites. A miraculous repulse in the first assault on Ai impressed upon the invaders the warning that they were the instruments of a holy and jealous God. At fell-and the law was inscribed on Mount Ebal, and read by their leader in the presence of all Israel.

The treaty which the fear-stricken Gibeonites obtained deceitfully was generously respected by Joshua. It stimulated and brought to a point the hostile movements of the five confederate chiefs of the Amorites. Joshua, aided by an unprecedented hailstorm, and a miraculous prolongation of the day, obtained a decisive victory over them at Makkedah, and proceeded at once to subjugate the south country, as far as Kadesh-barnea and Gaza. He returned to the camp at Gilgal, master of half of Palestine.

In another campaign he marched to the waters of Merom, where he met and overthrew a confed- eracy of the Canaanitish chiefs in the north, under Java'm king of Hazor; and in the course of a protracted war he led his victorious soldiers to the gates of Zidon and into the Valley of Lebanon under Hermon. In six years, six nations with thirty-one kings swell the roll of his conquests; and amongst others the Anakim — the old terror of Israel — are specially recorded as destroyed everywhere except in Philistia. It must be borne in mind that the extensive conquests of Joshua were not intended to achieve and did not achieve the complete extirpa- tion of the Canaanites, many of whom continued to occupy isolated strongholds throughout the land.

Joshua, now stricken in years, proceeded in con- junction with Eleazar and the heads of the tribes to complete the division of the conquered land; and when all was allotted, Timnath-serah in Mount Ephraim was assigned by the people as Joshua's peculiar inheritance. The Tabernacle of the con- gregation was established at Shiloh, six cities of refuge were appointed, forty-eight cities assigned to the Levites, and the warriors of the trans-Jordanic tribes dismissed in peace to their homes.

After an interval of rest, Joshua convened an as- sembly from all Israel. He delivered two solemn addresses reminding them of the marvelous fulfill- ment of God's promises to their fathers, and warn- ing them of the conditions on which their prosperity depended: and lastly, he caused them to renew their compact at Shechem, a place already famous in connection with Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 4), and Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32).

He died at the age of 110 years, and was buried in his own city, Timnath-serah.

Joshua's life has been noted as one of the very few which are recorded in history with some fulness of detail, yet without any stain upon them. In his character have been traced, under an oriental garb, such features as chieflykindled the imagina- tion of western chroniclers and poets in the Mid- dle Ages: the character of a devout warrior, blame- less and fearless, who has been taught by serving as a youth how to command as a man: who earns by manly vigor a quiet honored old age; who combines strength with gentleness, ever looking up- for and obeying the Divine impulse with the sim- ple faith which held, with all his inner power and directs it calmly, and without swerving, to the accomplishment of a high mission.

All that part of the book of Joshua which re- lates his personal history seems to be written with the unconscious, vivid power of an eye-witness. We are not merely taught to look with a distant reverence upon the first man who bears the name which is above every name. We stand by the side of one who is admitted to hear the words of God, and see the vision of the Almighty. The image of the armed warrior is before us as when in the sight of two armies he lifted up his spear over un- guarded Ai. We see the majestic presence which inspired all Israel (iv. 14) with awe; the mild father who demonstrated with Achaz; the calm, dignified judge who pronounced his sentence; the devout worshipper prostrating himself before the Captain of the Lord's host. We see the lonely man in the height of his power, separate from those about him, the last survivor of a famous generation; the honored old man of many deeds and many sufferings, gathering his dying energy for an attempt to bind his people more closely to the service of God whom he had so long served and worshipped, and whom he was ever learning to know more and more.

The great work of Joshua's life was more ex- citing but less happy than that of Moses. He gathered the first fruits of the autumn harvest where his predecessor had sown the seed in spring. It was a high and hopeful task to watch beside the cradle of a mighty nation, and to train its early footsteps in laws which should last for centuries. And it was a fit end to a life of expectation to gaze with longing eyes from Pisgah upon the Land of Promise. But no such brightness gleaned upon the last years of Joshua's life. Solomon words and dark with foreboding, fell from him as he sat "un- der the oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord in Shechem." The excitement of his battles was past; and there had grown up in the mind of the pious leader a consciousness that it is the tendency of prosperity and success to make a people wanton and worldly-minded, idolaters in spirit if not in act, and to alienate them from God.

Holy Scripture itself suggests (Heb. iv. 8) the consideration of Joshua as a type of Christ. Many of the Christian Fathers have enlarged upon this view; and Bishop Pearson, who has collected their opinions (On the Circumc., Art. ii. pp. 87-90, and 94-96, ed. 1843), points out the following and many other typical resemblances: (1) the name common to both; (2) Joshua brings the people of God into the land of promise, and divides the land amongst the tribes; Jesus brings his people into the presence of God, and assigns them to their man- sions; (3) as Joshua succeeded Moses and completed his work, so the Gospel of Christ succeeding the Law, announced One by whom all that believe are justified from all things from which we could not be justified by the Law of Moses (Acts xiii. 39); (4) as Joshua the minister of Moses renewed the rite of circumcision, so Jesus the minister of the circumcision brought in the circumcision of the heart (Rom. xvi. 8, ii. 29).

The treatment of the Canaanites by their Jewish conquerors is fully discussed by Dean Graves (On the Pentateuch, pt. 3, lect. 1). He concludes that the extermination of the Canaanites was justified by their crimes, and that the employment of the Jews in such an undertaking last war, contrary to God's method of governing the world. Prof. Fairbairn (Tytology of Scripture, bk. iii. ch. 4, § 1, ed. 1854) argues with great force and candor in favor of the complete agreement of the principles on which the war was carried on by Joshua with the principles of the Christian dispensation.

Among the supernatural occurrences in the life of Joshua there is one, which is so much discussed as the prolongation of the day of the battle of Makkedah (x. 12-14). No great difficulty is found, in and of Hezekiah (2 K. xx. 11); and in connecting both days with the Egyptian tradition mentioned by He- rodotus, ii. 142. But since modern science revealed the stupendous character of this miracle, modern criticism has made several attempts to explain it. It is regarded by Le Clerc, Darle, and others, as no miracle but an optical illusion; by Rosenmüller, following Igen, as a mistake of the time of day; by Winer and many recent German critics, with whom Dr. Davidson (Intro. to O. T. p. 644) seems to agree, as a mistake of the meaning or the authority of a poetical contributor to the book of Joshua. So Ewald (Gesch. Isr. ii. 290) traces in the latter part of verse 18 an interpolation by the hand of that anonymous Jew whom he supposes to have written the book of Deuteronomy, and here to have misunderstood the vivid conception of an old poet: and he cites numerous similar conceptions from the old poetry of Greece, Rome, Arabia, and Peru. But the literal and natural interpretation of the text as intended to describe a miracle is sufficiently vindicated by Delitzsch, Ost- reicher (in p. 190) and J. G. A. Richter, of Switzerland. Sedis ap. Non. Thes., Theol.-Philol. p. 516; and is forcibly stated by Bishop Watson in the 4th letter in his Apology for the Bible. — For the view of Hengstenberg on the “Standing still of the Sun and Moon,” see Evang. Kirchenzeitung, 1832, No. 55; and the same translated in the Biblical Repository, iii. 721-730. [H.]

Procopius, who flourished in the 6th century, relates (Vand. iii. 10) that an inscription existed at Tyris in Mauritania, set up by Phoenician refugees from Canaan, and declaring in the Phoenician language, “We are they who fled from the face of Joshua the robber the son of Nun.” Ewald (Gesch. Isr. ii. 297, 298) gives sound reasons for forbearing to use this story as authentic history. It is, however, accepted by Rawlinson (Bampton Lectures, for 1859, iii. 91).

Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. in Matt. i. 5, and Chorog. Luci praev. iv. § 3) quotes Jewish traditions to the effect that Rahab became a proselyte, and the wife of Joshua, and the ancestress of nine prophets and priests; also that the sepulchre of Joshua was adorned with an image of the Sun in memory of the miracle of Aijalon. The LXX. and the Arab. Ver. add to Josh. xxiv. 30 the statement that in his sepulchre were depicted the illustrious which were used for the circumcisions at Gilgal (Josh. v. 2). The principal occurrences in the life of Joshua are reviewed by Bishop Hall in his Contemplations on the O. T. ixxx. 7, 8, and 9.

*Joshua, the son of Nun, is meant, Heb. iv. 8, where the A. V. employs Jesus for Ἰσραήλ, though the translators add in the margin “that is, Joshua. The object may have been to represent the Greek name in a uniform manner in the N. T. Most of the preceding English versions avoid this confusion. See Tranch’s Authorized Version, p. 75f. (2d ed. 1839). [Jesus, 8.]]

1. [Σαρχή: Alex. Ἰσραήλ; Josue.] An inhabitant of Beth-shemesh, in whose land was the stone at which the milch-kine stopped, when they drew the ark of God with the offerings of the Philistines from Ekron to Beth-shemesh (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18).

2. [Ἰσραήλ: Alex. Ἰσραήλ; Jesus.] A governor of the city, who gave his name to a gate of Jerusalem (2 K. iii. viii. 8).

4. [Ἰσραήλ: Jesus.] Called Joshua in Ezra and Nehemiah; a high priest, who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel. [See Hag. i. 1, 2, 14, ii. 2, 4; Zech. vii. 1, 3, 6, 8, 9, 11.] For details, see Joshua, No. 4.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF

theory that it is a compilation from two distinct documents. The boundaries of the different tribes, it is said, are stated sometimes with greater, sometimes with less exactness. Now, this may be a fault of the surveyors employed by Joshua: but it is scarcely an inconsistency to be charged on the writer of the book who transcribed their descriptions. Again, the Divine promise that the coast of Israel shall extend to the Euphrates (i. 4) is not inconsistent with the fact that the country which Joshua was commanded to divide (xiii. 16) does not extend so far. Again, the statement (xvii. 3) that Ekrón, etc., remained yet to be possessed is not inconsistent with the subsequent statement (xv. 4) that it was assigned to Judah. Dr. Davidson gives no proof either of his assertion that the former text is in fact subsequent to the latter, or of his supposition that Ekrón was in the possession of Judah at the time of its assignment. Again, it would seem that Dr. Davidson pushes a theory too far when he assumes (Letter to O. T. 657, 658) that one and the same writer would hardly denote a "tribe" by one Hebrew word in some passages, and by a synonymous Hebrew word in others; or that he would not in some passages designate Moses as the servant of the Lord, and in others mention Moses without so designating him; or that he would not describe the same class of persons in one place as "servants of the Lord," and in another, as "servants of Aaron." Such alleged discrepancies are not sufficient either to impair the authority of the book, or to prove that it was not substantially the composition of one author.

2. Scope and contents. — The book of Joshua is a distinct whole in itself. Although to later generations it became a standing witness of the faithfulness of God in fulfilling his promises to Israel, yet the immediate aim of the inspired writer was probably of a more simple character. He records, for the information of the nation to which he belonged, the acts of Joshua so far as they possessed a national interest. The book was not intended to be a mere ascription of praise to God, nor a mere biography, nor a mere collection of documents. While it serves as a link between that which precedes, and that which follows it, it has a distinct and independent existence. There is not sufficient ground for treating it as a part of the Pentateuch, or a compilation from the same documents as formed the groundwork of the Pentateuch. The fact that its first sentence begins with a conjunction does not show any closer connection between it and the Pentateuch than exists between Judges and it. The references in i. 8, viii. 31, xxvii. 26, to the "book of the law," rather show that that book was distinct from Joshua. Other references to events recorded in the Pentateuch tend in the same direction. No quotation (in the strict modern sense of the word) from the Pentateuch can be found in Joshua. The author quotes from memory, like the writers of the N. T., if he quotes at all comp. xiii. 7 with Num. xxxv. 14; xiii. 7 with Num. xxx. 27; xii. 21 with Num. xx. 18; xii. 20-24 with Num. xviii. 1, 2; and Num. xviii. 20, xxi. with Num. xxxv. xxvii.

Perhaps no part of Holy Scripture is more immersed than the first half of this book by being printed in chapters and verses. The first twelve chapters form a continuous narrative, which seems never to halt or flag. And the description is frequently so minute as to show the hand not merely of a contemporary, but of an eye-witness. An awful sense of the Divine Presence reigns throughout. We are called out from the din and tumult of each battle-field to listen to the still, small Voice. The progress of events is clearly foreshadowed in the first chapter (vv. 5, 6). Step by step we are led on through the solemn preparation, the arduous struggle, the crowning triumph. Moving everything around, yet himself moved by an unseen Power, the Jewish leader rises high and calmly amid all.

The second part of the book (ch. xiii.-xxii.) has been aptly named by Dr. Davidson the book of the Norman conquerors of England. The lists of which it consists were doubtless the abstract of such reports as were supplied by the men whom Joshua sent out (xviii. 8) to describe the land. In the course of time it is probable that changes were introduced into their reports — whether kept separately among the national archives, or embodied in the contents of a book — by transcribers adapting them to the actual state of the country in later times when political divisions were modified, new towns sprung up, and old ones disappeared (comp. the two lists of Levitical towns, Josh. xxi. and I Chron. 54, d. c.).

The book may be regarded as consisting of three parts: a) the conquest of Canaan, (b) the partition of Canaan, (c) Joshua's farewell.

a. The preparations for the war, and the passage of the Jordan, ch. 1-5; b) the capture of Jericho, 6; the conquest of the south, 7-10; the conquest of the north, 11; c) the second address, 23; his second address at Shechem, and his death, 24.

The events related in this book extend over a period of about 25 years, from n. c. 1451 to 1426. The declaration of Caleb, xiv. 10, is useful in determining the chronology of the book.

3. Author. — Nothing is really known as to the authorship of the book. Joshua himself is generally named as the author by the Jewish writers and the Christian Fathers; and a great number of critics ascribe one or more or less entirely in that belief. But no contemporary assertion or sufficient historical proof of the fact exists, and it cannot be maintained without qualification. Other authors have been conjectured, as Philonax by Lightfoot; Eleazar by Calvin; Samuel and Vain Tii; Jeremias by Henry; one of the elders who survived Joshua, by Keil. Von Lengerke thinks it was written by one in the time of Joshua; by some one in the time of Samuel, or somewhat later: Masius, Le Clerc, Manner, and others by some one who lived after the period of Joshua, but before 426 B. C. It is now advocated for the most part in connection with a theory, which may perhaps help to explain the composition of the Pentateuch; but which, when applied to a book so uniform in its style as Joshua, seems to introduce more difficulties than it removes. It has been supposed that the book as it now stands is a compilation from two earlier documents: one, the original, called Holistic, the other supplementary, called Joabistic; they are distinguished by the names given in them to God, and by some other characteristic differences on which the supporters of the hypothesis are not perfectly agreed. Ewald's theory is that the Pentateuch and the book of Joshua form one complete work: that it is mainly compiled from contemporary and ancient documents, and that it has grown into its present form under the hands of five successive writers or editors; the first of whom composed his book in the time of the judges, and the last (to whom the book of Deuteronomy is assigned) in the time of Manasseh. His account of these authors or compilers may be seen in Gesch. Isr. i. 81-174, and his method of apportioning various parts of the book of Joshua to the several writers in Gesch. Isr. i. 84 and ii. 292-305. The theory of this able critic, so conjectural, complicated, and arbitrary, has met with many opponents, and few, if any, supporters even in his own country.

No one would deny that some additions to the book might be made after the death of Joshua without detracting from the possible fact that the book was substantially his composition. The last verses (xxv. 22-33) were obviously added by some later hand. If, as is possible, though not certain, some of the events after the death of Joshua, such as the capture of Hazor, the capture of Bethel, of Debir (Josh. xv. 14-19, and Judg. i. 10-15), and of Leshem (Josh. xix. 47, and Judg. xviii. 7), and the joint occupation of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 63, and Judg. i. 21) did not occur till after Joshua's death, they may have been inserted in the book of Joshua by a late transcriber. The passages xiii. 2-6, xvi. 10, xvi. 11, which also are subsequently repeated in the book of Judges, may doubtless describe accurately the same state of things existing at two distinct periods.

The arguments which, though insufficient to prove that Joshua was the author, yet seem to give a preponderance in favor of him when compared with any other person who has been named, may be thus briefly stated: (a) It is evident (xvii. 26) that Joshua could and did write some account of at least one transaction which is related in this book; (b) the numerous accounts of Joshua's intercourse with the kings of Canaan (Josh. i. 1, iii. 7, iv. 2, v. 2, 9, vi. 10, viii. 1, 8, 11, xvi. 1, xxiv. 2), and with the Captain of the Lord's Host (v. 13), must have emanated from himself; (c) no one is more likely than the speaker himself to have committed to writing the two addresses which were Joshua's legacy to his people (xxiii. and xxiv.); (d) no one was so well qualified by his position to describe the events related, and to collect the documents contained in the book; (e) the example of his predecessor and master, Moses, would have suggested to him such a record of his acts: (f) one verse (vi. 25) must have been written by some person who lived in the time of Joshua; and two other verses, v. 1 and 6 — assuming the common reading of the former to be correct — are most fairly interpreted as written by actors in the scene. Havernick's assertion that some grammatical forms used in Joshua are less ancient than the corresponding forms in Judges, may be set against Keil's list of expressions and forms which are peculiar to this book and the Pentateuch; and Havernick is not supported by facts when he supposes that no expedition of any separate tribe against the Canaanites could have occurred in the lifetime of Joshua, and that the book was therefore written some time afterwards. It has been said that the expression "to this day," which is found fourteen times in the book, presupposes so considerable an interval of time between the occurrence of the event and the composition of the history, that Joshua could not have lived long enough to write in such language. But a careful examination of the passages will scarcely bear out that observation. For instance, in three places (xxii. 5, xxiii. 8, 9) the phrase denotes a period unquestionably included within the twenty-five years which Joshua lived in Canaan; in xxii. 17 it goes but a little farther back; in iv. 9, vii. 26, viii. 29, and x. 27 it describes certain piles of stones which he raised as still remaining — a remark which does not necessarily imply that more than twenty years had elapsed since they were raised; and in vi. 25 it defines a period within the lifetime of a contemporary of Joshua, and therefore probably within his own. In the remaining passages (viii. 28, xiii. 13, xiv. 14, xvii. 63, xvi. 10) there is nothing which would make it impossible that Joshua should have used this expression.

4. There is extant a Samaritan book of Joshua in the Arabic language. It was printed for the first time at Leyden in 1818, with the title "Liber Josua; Chronicon Samaritanum, edidit, Latine commentariis illustravit, J. J. Junius, Edinb. — Liber extraordinarius; ad libro Septem metas apportioning various parts of the book of Joshua to the several writers in Gesch. Isr. i. 84 and ii. 292-305. The theory of this able critic, so conjectural, complicated, and arbitrary, has met with many opponents, and few, if any, supporters even in his own country.

No one would deny that some additions to the book might be made after the death of Joshua without detracting from the possible fact that the book was substantially his composition. We have some words from Ritter respecting the geographical and historical accuracy of the book of Joshua, which deserve attention. The subject of the book being the subjugation and conquest of the land of Canaan, its predominant character, as he remarks, must from the nature of the case be geographical. But beyond this it is true also that the entire political and religious life of the Hebrews was interwoven in the closest manner, like a piece of network, with the geography of the country; far more so than is true of modern European nations; so that, especially at this time when we know so much of the topography of Palestine, we are able to subdivide the history of the people of God almost everywhere.

The test has been applied, and the result has been to establish the accuracy of the book even in minute details, and comparatively unimportant and trivial local relations. Its notices, not only of distinct regions, but of valleys, fountains, mountains, villages, have been confirmed, often with surprising certainty and particularity. The great geographer refers as an example of this to the account of Joshua's second campaign in the south of Palestine (Josh. xxii. 40, 41; xxiii. 1-13). He shows that the division of the country there into five parts, the scene of that expedition, rests upon a basis in nature, upon a diversity of geographical position which none but an eye-witness could have remarked, and which modern travellers find to be entirely characteristic of the region still. He shows, in addition to this general accuracy in the outlines, that the specialties are equally true; that many of the cities and towns which are mentioned have remained under their ancient names to the present day, and also occur together in groups, precisely in the manner that the sacred writers represent them as having been arranged of old. This agreement between the Old Testament records in general and the geography of the land as now more and more fully illustrated, furnishes an important evidence of the authenticity. (Ein Blick auf Palastina und seine Christliche Besiedelung, Berlin, 1852.)

On no side perhaps has this book been so violently assailed as that of its morality involved in the mission of Joshua to subdue and expel the aboriginal Canaanites. The reader will find some very pertinent remarks on this subject, in Dean Stanley's History of the Jewish Church, i. 254 ff. (Amor. ed.). We quote, after his example, a few sentences from one of Dr. Arnold's sermons on the Wars of the Israelites (vi. 35 ff.):—

"It is better that the wicked should be destroyed a hundred times over than that they should tempt those who are yet innocent to join their company. Let us but think what might have been our fate, and the fate of every other nation under heaven at this hour, had the sword of the Israelites done its work more sparingly. Even as it was, the numbers of those who were left, and the nations around them, so tempted the Israelites by their idolatrous practices, that we read continually of the whole people of God turning away from his service. But had the heathen lived in the land in equal numbers, and, still more, and they intermarried largely with the Israelites, how was it possible, humanly speaking, that any sparks of the light of God should have survived to the coming of Christ?"

They seem of very small importance to us now, these perpetual contests with the Canaanites and the Midianites and the Ammonites and the Philistines, with which the books of Joshua and Judges and Samuel are almost filled. We may half wonder that God should have interfered in such quarrels, or have changed the course of nature, in order to give one of the nations of Palestine the victory over another. But in these contests, on the fate of one of these nations of Palestine, the happiness of the human family depended. The Israelites fought not for themselves only, but for its... They did God's work; they preserved unhurt the seed of eternal life, and were the ministers of blessing to all other nations, even though they themselves failed to enjoy it."

H. JOSIAH (יהודה) [Jehovah heals or succors] Josian. [Val. almost everywhere Jersias; Sin. in Zeph. i. 1, Josias.] 1. The son of Amon and Jehudah, succeeded his father K. c. 641, in the eighth year of his age, and reigned 31 years. His history is contained in 2 K. xxii.-xxiii. 30: 2 Ch. xxxiv., xxxv.; and the first twelve chapters of Jeremiah throw much light upon the general character of the Jews in his days. He began in the eighth year of his reign to seek the Lord, and to put away his side, six years afterwards, in a personal progress throughout all the land of Judah and Israel, he destroyed everywhere high places, groves, images, and all outward signs and relics of idolatry. Those which Solomon and Ahaz had built, and even Hezekiah had spared, and those which Manasseh had set up were recently, now ceased to pollute the land of Judah; and in Israel the purification began with Jerobeam's temple at Bethel, in accordance with the remarkable prediction of the disobedient prophet, by whom Josiah was called by name three centuries before his birth (1 K. xii. 2). The Temple was restored under a special commission; and in the course of the repairs Hilkiah the priest (Hilkiah) found that book of the Law of the Lord which quickened so remarkably the ancient zeal of the king. The question as to the contents of that book has been discussed elsewhere; in forming an opinion on it we should bear in mind that it is very difficult for us in this age and country to estimate the sanctity of the opportunities which were then open to the study of acquiring literary knowledge connected with religion. The special commission sent forth by Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 7) is a proof that even under such kings as Asa and his son, the Levites were insufficient for the religious instruction of the people. What then must have been the amount of information accessible to a generation which had grown up in the reigns of Manasseh and Amon? We do not know that the Law was read as a stated part of any public service in the Temple of Solomon (unless the injunction, Deut. xxvii. 11, was obeyed once in seven years), though God was worshiped by the voluntary sacrifices, public, and prayer. The son of Amon began only when he was sixteen years old to seek the God of David, and for ten years he devoted all his active energies to destroying the gross external memorials of idolatry throughout his dominions, and to strengthening and multiplying the visible signs of true religion. It is not surprising that in the 29th year of his age he should find the most awful denunciations and some home to his heart on a particular occasion with a new and strange power, and that he should send to a prophetess to inquire in what degree of closeness those words were to be Josiah applied to himself and his generation. That he had never read the words is probable. But his conduct is no sufficient proof that he had never heard them before, or that he was not aware of the existence of a "Book of the law of the Lord."

The great day of Josiah's life was that on which he and his people, in the eighteenth year of his reign, entered into a special covenant to keep the law of the Lord, and celebrated the feast of the Passover at Jerusalem with more magnificent offerings, better arranged services, and a larger concourse of worshippers than had been seen on any previous occasion.

After this, he endeavors to abolish every trace of idolatry and superstition were still carried on. But the time drew near which had been indicated by Huldah (2 K. xxii. 20). When Pharaoh-Necho went from Egypt to Carchemish to carry on his war against Assyria (comp. Herodotus, ii. 159), Josiah, possibly in a spirit of loyalty to the Assyrian king, to whom he may have been bound, opposed his march along the sea-coast. Necho reluctantly paused and gave him battle in the Valley of Esdraelon; and the last good king of Judah was carried wounded from Hadadrimmon, to die before he could escape to Jerusalem.

He was buried with extraordinary honors; and a funeral dirge, in part composed by Jeremiah, which the affection of his subjects sought to perpetuate as an annual solemnity, was chanted probably at Hadadrimmon. Compare the narrative in 2 Chr. xxxv. 25 with the allusions in Jer. xxvi. 10, 18, and Zech. xii. 11, and with Jackson, On the Creed, bk. viii. ch. 23, p. 375. The prophecy of Huldah, that he should "be gathered into the grave in peace," must be interpreted in accordance with the explanation of that phrase given in Jer. xxxiv. 5. Some excellent remarks on it may be found in Jackson, On the Creed, bk. xi. ch. 36, p. 664. Josiah's reformation and his death are commented on by Bishop Hall, Contemplations on the O. T. bk. xx.

It was in the reign of Josiah that a nomadic band of Sidonians overran Asia (Herodotus, vii. 104-106). A detachment of them went towards Egypt by the way of Phœnicia: somewhere southward of Ascalon they were met by messengers from Psammetihus and induced to turn back. They are not mentioned in the historical accounts of Josiah's reign. But Ewald (Die Parthenon, 165) conjectures that the 96th Psalm was composed by king Josiah during a siege of Jerusalem by these Sidonians. The town Beth-shan is said to derive its Greek name, Scythopolis (Reland, Pol. 992), Lightfoot, Chor. Morc. vii. § 2), from these invaders. The facility with which Josiah appears to have extended his authority in the land of Israel is added as an indication that the Assyrian conquerors of that land were themselves at this time under the restraining fear of some enemy. The prophecy of Zephaniah is considered to have been written amid the terror caused by their approach.

The same people are described at a later period by Ezekiel (xxviii.). See Ewald, Gesch. Jthii. iii. 689.

Josiah Jotapata 1481

Josibiah, the father of John, a Simeonite, descended from that branch of the tribe of which Shime was the founder, and which afterwards became most numerous (1 Chr. iv. 35).

Josiphia (Joseph), the father or ancestor of Shedonith, who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 10). A word is evidently omitted in the first part of the verse, and is supplied both by the LXX. and the Syr., as well as by the compiler of 1 Esdr. viii. 36. The LXX. supply Bazezi, i. e. בזזיא', which, from its resemblance to the preceding word בזזיא', might easily have been omitted by a transcriber. The verse would then read, "of the sons of Bani, Shedonith the son of Josiphiah." In the Syriac Shedonith is repeated, but this is not likely to have been correct. Josiphiah is called in Esdras Josiphians.

* Jotapata (Jotorparsa), a famous fortress in Galilee, which figured largely in the early post-Biblical Jewish history. Josephus, who commanded the forces in it, and was captured there, has given a full description of the place, which he had fortified, and of the siege by Vespasian, in which 40,000 persons perished before it was reduced. (J. iii. 7 E.) The site, which had been searched for by modern travelers, was discovered by Schultz in 1847, and identified with the modern Jift; an (Gesch. LXX. iii. 507) conjectures that it may have been the common name of Josiah to restore not only the ritual, but also the kingdom of David in its full extent and independence, and that he attacked Necho as an invader of what he considered his northern dominions. This conjecture, if equally probable with the former, is equally without adequate support in the Bible, and is somewhat derogatory to the character of Josiah.

JOZACHAR

3. (lōsābāh: [FA. lōsābāh]) Alex. lōsābāh. A hero of Manasseh, like the preceding (1 Chr. xii. 29).

4. (lōsābāh: [Vat. E. lōsābāh]) Alex. lōsābāh, in 2 Chr. xxxi. 13.) A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, who was one of the overseers of offerings and dedicated things in the Temple, under Cennahim and Shimai, after the restoration of the true worship.

minihated T.T.L. about fifteen miles southeast from Akka. The spot was visited and described by Dr. Robinson in 1833 (Later Biblical Res. p. 105 ff.), who also identifies it with the Jiphthah-el of Joshua. [Jiphthah-el.]

JOTBAH (747n [goodness]; lēr'ēbah: [Vat. lērēbah]) Alex. lērēbah: Jos. lērēdyē; Jēthēh. the native place of Mesullemeth, the queen of Manasseh, and mother of Amon king of Judah (2 K. xxi. 19). The place is not elsewhere named as a town of Palestine, and is generally identified with Jdtbath, or Jotbathah, mentioned below. This there is nothing either to prove or disprove. [G.]

JOTBATH or JOTBATHAH (747n [goodness], pleasurable); lērēbah: [Vat. in Deut. Tašēbah; in Num. Vat. 1 Šēbēlah] Alex. lērēbah, [or šēba; Jēthētah]. Dext. ʃ. 7 Num. xxxii. 35), a desert station of the Israelites; it is described as "a land of torrents of water." There are several confusions of wadies on the W. of the Arabah, any one of which might in the rainy season answer the description, and would agree with the general locality. II. II.

JOTHAM (747n [Jehovah is uprightness]; lāhōthām: Vat. lāhōthān; Alex. in ver. 5 lāhō'ē; ver. 21, lēhō'ach; Joshua.) The youngest son of Gideon (Judg. ix. 5, 7, 21, 57), who escaped when his brethren, to the number of 49 persons, were slain at Ophrah by their half-brother Abimelech. When this likely act of Abimelech had secured his election as king, Jotham, ascending Mount Gerizim, boldly uttered, in the hearing of the men of Shechem, his well known warning parable of the reign of the bramble. Nothing is known of him afterwards, except that he dwelt at Beer.

2. (lēhō'ē, lēhō'ach; Vat. Alex. in 2 K. xv. 5, 7, 32. lēhō'ē; and so Alex. 2 K. xvi. 12, 1 Chr. xxvi. 23: Alex. 1 Chr. v. 17. lēhō'ach: Joshua, Joshua). The son of king Uzziah or Azariah and Jerusalem. After administering the kingdom for some years during his father's minority, he succeeded to the throne w. c. 758, when he was 25 years old, and reigned 16 years in Jerusalem. He was contemporary with Pekah and with the prophet Isaiah. His history is contained in 2 K. xxv. and 2 Chr. xxvii. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and his reign was prosperous, although the highways were not removed. He built the great hight of the Temple, made some additions to the wall of Jerusalem, and raised fortifications in various parts of Judah. After a war with the Ammonites he compelled them to pay him the tribute they had been accustomed to pay his father. Towards the end of his reign Rezin king of Damascus, and Pekah, began to assume a threatening attitude towards Judah. W. T. B.

3. A descendant of Judah, son of Jahdi (1 Chr. ii. 47).

JOURNEY, SABBATH-DAY'S. [SABBABTH-

JOZACHAR (747n [Jehovah re- rememberers]; lōsābāh: [Vat. lōsābāh] Alex. lōsēbērō:] Jōzāchar), the son of Shimeon the Ammonites, and one of the murderers of Josiah king of Judah (2 K. xii. 21). The writer of the Chronicles (2 Chr. xxiv. 26) calls him Zahah, which is nothing more than a clerical error for Jozachar: the first syllable being omitted in consequence of the final letters of the preceding word יָנָה.

In 15 MSS. of Kennicott's edition the name in the Kings is יָנָה, i. e. Jozabah, and in the same is the reading of 32 MSS. collated by De Rossi. Another MS. in De Rossi's possession had יָנָה, i. e. Jozachah, and one collated by Kennicott יָנָה, or Jozabah, which is the reading of the Peshito-Syriac. Barrington concludes that the original form of the word was יָנָה, or Jozaphat; but for this there does not seem sufficient reason, as the name would then be all but identical with that of the Mehitite Jeozabad, who was the accomplice of Jozachar in the murder. It is uncertain whether their conspiracy was prompted by a personal feeling of revenge for the death of Zedekiah, as Josephus intimates (Ant. ix. 8, § 4), or whether they were urged to it by the family of Jehudah. The care of the chronicler to show that they were of foreign descent seems almost intended to disarm a suspicion that the king's assassination was an act of priestly vengeance. But it is more likely that the conspiracy had a different origin altogether, and that the king's murder was regarded by the chronicler as an instance of Divine retribution. On the accession of Amoniah the conspirators were executed. W. A. W.

JUBAL (גֵּבָל) [sound, blast of trumpets]:
"Jubal": A son of Lamech by Adah, and the inventor of the "harp and organ" (Gen. iv. 21; ki-nor evy'g, probably general terms for strung and wind instruments). His name appears to be connected with this subject, springing from the same root as yebel, "Jubilee." That the inventor of musical instruments should be the brother of him who introduced the nomad life, is strictly in accordance with the experience of the world. The connection between music and the pastoral life is indicated in the traditions of the Greeks, which ascribed the invention of the pipe to Pan and of the lyre to Apollo, each of them being also devoted to pastoral pursuits.

JUBILEE, THE YEAR OF (גְּבָלֵי, שְׁכִינַת הָלֻכָּת, and simply גְּבָלָה: estos τος αφετέρους, αφετέρως σημαίνουσιν Japheth, and Japhethi, the fifth year after the succession of seven sabbatical years, in which all the land which had been alienated returned to the families of those to whom it had been allotted in the original distribution, and all bondmen of Hebrew blood were liberated. The relation in which it stood to the sabbatical year and the general directions for its observance are given Lev. xxv. 8-16 and 23-55. Its bearing on lands dedicated to Jehovah is stated Lev. xxvii. 16-23. There is no mention of the Jubilee in the book of Deuteronomy, and the only other reference to it in the Pentateuch is in the appeal of the tribe of Manasseh, on account of the daughters of Zelophheud (Num. xxxvi. 4; see below, § 3. note d).

II. The year was inaugurated on the Day of Atonement with the blowing of trumpets through-out the land, and by a proclamation of universal liberty.

1. The soil was kept under the same condition of rest as had existed during the preceding sabbatical year. There was to be neither ploughing, sowing, nor reaping; but the chance produce was to be left for the use of all comers. [SABBATHIAL YEAR.]

2. Every Israelite returned to "his possession and to his family": "that is, he recovered his right in the land originally allotted to the family of which he was a member, if he, or his ancestor, had parted with it.

(a.) A strict rule to prevent fraud and injustice in such transactions is laid down in a Hebrew, [Note: the latter seems by far more probable. Connected with the mistake as to the origin of the word גְּבָלָה (which will be noticed below), was the notion that they were rams' horns. R. Jehush, in the Mishnah, says that the horns of rams (גְּבָלָה) were used at the Feast of Trumpets, and those of wild goats (גְּבָלָה) at the Jubilee. But Maimonides and Bartenora say that rams' horns were used on both occasions (Rashi Hinnom, p. 282, edit. Sarug). Rashi and others have justly objected that the horns of rams, or those of wild goats, would form but sorry trumpets. [CONTR.] It is probable that on this, as on other occasions of public proclamation, the trumpets were blown by the priests, in accordance with Num. xxxv. 29, 30, in which verse mendium lateis suspice, forte in die numerou, יְבָלָה בָּלִים, primiitus positum (pro גְּבָלָה) cui deinde (in the rest of the whole) "die expiationem"? (Comment. de vera fest. nat. iii. p. 20). In the same vein of criticism, considering that the rest of the soil is alien to the idea of the Jubilee, he would expunge ver. 11 as an interpolation. He is disposed to deal still more freely with that part of the chapter which relates to the sabbatical year.

c. The trumpets used in the proclamation of the Jubilee appear to have been curved horns, not the long, straight trumpets represented on the arch of Titus, and which, according to Hengstenberg (Egypt and the Books of Mose, p. 131, Eng. trans.), are the only ones represented in Egyptian sculptures and paintings. The straight trumpet was called גְּבָלָה, and גְּבָלִים the other, גְּבָלָה. The Jubilee horns used in the siege of Necho are called גְּבָלָה (Josh. vi. 4); and, collectively, in the following verse, גְּבָלִים. (See Keil on Josh. vi. 4.) It is not quite certain whether they were the horns of oxen or of metal (Kronwald, p. 50), but the latter seems by far more probable. Connected with the mistake as to the origin of the word גְּבָלָה (which will be noticed below), was the notion that they were rams' horns. R. Jehush, in the Mishnah, says that the horns of rams (גְּבָלָה) were used at the Feast of Trumpets, and those of wild goats (גְּבָלָה) at the Jubilee. But Maimonides and Bartenora say that rams' horns were used on both occasions (Rashi Hinnom, p. 282, edit. Sarug). Rashi and others have justly objected that the horns of rams, or those of wild goats, would form but sorry trumpets. [CONTR.]

It is probable that on this, as on other occasions of public proclamation, the trumpets were blown by the priests, in accordance with Num. xxxv. 29, 30, in which verse mendium lateis suspice, forte in die numerou, יְבָלָה בָּלִים, primiitus positum (pro גְּבָלָה) cui deinde (in the rest of the whole) "die expiationem"? (Comment. de vera fest. nat. iii. p. 20). In the same vein of criticism, considering that the rest of the soil is alien to the idea of the Jubilee, he would expunge ver. 11 as an inter-
Houses calculated rites of Jubilee. The same formula is used — "When ye be come into the land which I give unto you" — both in Lev. xxv. 2, and Lev. xxiii. 10.

III. Josephus (Ant. iii. 12, § 3) states that all debts were remitted in the year of Jubilee, while the Scripture speaks of the remission of debts only in connection with the sabbatical year (Deut. xxv. 13, 22). He also describes the terms on which the holder of a piece of land resigned it in the Jubilee to the original proprietor. The former (he says) produced a statement of the value of the crops, and of the money which he had laid out in tillage. If the expenses proved to be more than the worth of the produce, the balance was paid by the proprietor before the field was restored. But if the balance was on the other side, the proprietor simply took back the field, and allowed him who had held it to retain the profit.

Philos (De Septemviris, cc. 13, 14, vol. v. p. 37, edit. Tacht.) gives an account of the Jubilee agreeing with that in Leviticus, and says nothing of the remission of debts.

IV. There are several very difficult questions connected with the Jubilee, of which we now proceed to give a brief view:

1. Origin of the word Jubilee. — The doubt on this point appears to be a very old one. The Hebrew word is treated by the LXX. in different modes. They have retained it untranslated in Josh. vi. 8, 13 (where we find καταραίαν τοῦ Ἰαβδᾶ, and σάλπιγγα τοῦ Ἰαβδᾶ). In Lev. xxv. they generally render it by ἄφέσις, or ἄφεσας σήματια: but where the context suits it, by φάνον σάλπιγγα. In Ex. xix. 13 they have τις φωναὶ καὶ σάλπιγγαι. The Vulgate retains the original word in Lev. xxv., as well as in Josh. vi. ("cumque quarnus usus est in Jubilo"); and renders it by vocem in Ex. xix. 13. It seems, therefore, beyond doubt that uncertainty respecting the word must have been felt when the most ancient versions of the O. T. were made.

Nearly all of the many conjectures which have been hazarded on the subject are directed to explain the word exclusively in its bearing on the year of Jubilee. This course has been taken by Josephus — εὐχοδόρδιον δὲ σημαίνει τοίχωμα: and by St. Jerome — Jebul est dumitibus or mittitis. Many modern writers have exercised their ingenuity in the same track. Now in all such attempts at explanation there must be an anachronism, as the word is used in Ex. xix. 13, before the institution of the Law, where it can have nothing to do with the year of Jubilee, or its observances. The expression there used is εὐχοδόρδιον τοίχωμα; similar to that in Josh. vi. 5, where the meaning is here mean others, states that no cities were thus reckoned, as regards the Jubilee, but such as were walled in the time of Joshua. According to this, Jerusalem was excluded.

Maimonides says that the interval between the Feast of Trumpets and the Day of Atonement, in the year of Jubilee, was a time of rest only, without resuming the work of the servitude; and that observation regarding the jubilean year is confirmed by a passage in Lev. xxvii. 32. The Mishnah contains nothing on the jubilean year, and there is no evidence of a reformation in its observances.
JUBILEE, THE YEAR OF

the peculiar sound, or the instrument for producing the sound? Ewald favors the latter notion, and so does Gesenius (Thee. sub 71, 72), following the old versions (with which our own agrees), though under 71, 72 he explains 72 as clangor. De Wette inclines the same way, rendering the words in Ex. xix. 13 — "beim Blazen des Jobelhorns." Luther translates the same words — "wenn es wird abre lange tonen" (though he is not consistent with himself in rendering Josch. vi. 3) — Diller renders them, "cum trahatur sonus," and most recent critics agree with him. It would follow from this view that what is meant in Joshua, when the trumpet is expressly mentioned, is, "When the sound called Jubilee (whatever that may be) is prolonged on the horn." a

As regards the derivation of the word, it is now very generally ascribed to the root 71, 72, "undavit, copiose et cum quantum impetu fluxit." Hence Kraeland explains 71, 72, "id quod magno strepitu fluat"; and he adds, "duplex igitur in ea radice vis distinguitur, thuendi et sonandi altera in 71, 72 (dillium), Gen. vi. 17, altera in 71, 72 (artic. musicae inventor), Gen. iv. 21, conspicua." The meaning of Jubileum would thus seem to be, a resounding, penetrating sound? But in the uncertainty, which, it must be allowed, exists, our translators have taken a safer course by retaining the original word in Lev. xxv. and xxvi., than that which was taken by Luther, who has rendered it by Hallelujah.

2. Was the Jubilee every 40th or 50th year? — If the plain word of this text, xxv. 10, were to be followed, this question need not be asked. The statement that the Jubilee was the 50th year, after the succession of seven weeks of years, and that it was distinguished from, not identical with, the seventh sabbatical year, is as evident as language can make it. But the difficulty of justifying the wisdom of allowing the land to have two years of rest in succession has been felt by some, and deemed sufficient to prove that the Jubilee could only have been the 49th year, that is, one with the seventh Sabbatical year. But in such a case, a mere a priori argument cannot justly be deemed sufficient to overthrow a clear unequivocal statement, involving no inconsistency, or physical impossibility.

Heng has suggested that the sabbatical year might have begun in Nisan and the Jubilee Year in Tisri (Wimer, sub cocce). In this way the knobs of the harvestmen would only have been intermitted for a year and a half. It is thus a very harsh supposition to imagine that Moses would have spoken of the institution of the two years, and of the relation in which they stand to each other, without noticing such a distinction, had it existed. It is most probable that the sabbatical year and the Jubilee both began in Tisri, as is stated in the Mishna (Rosh Hodesh, p. 300, edit. Suren). [SABBATICAL YEAR.]

The simplest view, and the only one which accords with the sacred text, is, that the year which followed the seventh sabbatical year was the Jubilee, which was intercalated between two series of sabbatical years, so that the next year was the first of a new half century, and the seventh year after that was the first sabbatical year of the other series.

Thus the Jubilee was strictly a Pentecost year, holding the same relation to the preceding seven sabbatical years, as the day of Pentecost did to the seven Sabbath days. Substantially the same formula, in reference to this point, is used in each case d (cf. Lev. xxiii. 15, 16, xxv. 8–10).

3. Were Debits remitted in the Jubilee? — Not a word is said of this in the O. T., or in Philo. The affirmative rests entirely on the authority of Josephus. Maimonides says expressly that the remission of debts is a point of distinction between the sabbatical year and the Jubilee. The Mishna is to the same effect (Shebith, cap. x. p. 194, edit. Suren). f It seems that Josephus must either have

The other notions respecting the word may be found in Fuller (Misc. Sac. p. 1025 f.; Critici Sacri, vol. ix.), in Carpov (p. 448 f), and, most completely given, in Kraeland (p. 11 f.).

The success of any distinguished Jewish teacher who advocated the claims of the 49th year was R. Johai. He was followed by the Gamm, certain doctors who took up the exposition of the Talmud after the work was completed, from the seventh to the eleventh century (Wimer, sub cocce). The principal Christian writers on the same side are, Scaliger, Petavius, Ussher, Canerius, and Schroeder.

a The grounds on which the opposite view rests are stated elsewhere. [See Cornet.]

b Carpov (App. p. 449) appears to have been the first to put forth this view of the origin and meaning of the word. The figure of the "rich stream of music" is familiar enough in most languages to recommend it as probable. But Gesenius prefers to make a second root, 72, juvabere, which he ascribes to onomatopoeia, like the Latin jiuvare, and the Greek ἠλέκτρον.

c The fanciful notion that 72 signifies a ram has some interest, from its being held by the Jews so generally and by the Chaldee Paraphrast; and from its having influenced our translators in Josch. vi. to call the horns on which the Jubileum was sounded trumpeta de ramis horne. It appears to come from the strange nonsense which some of the Rabbis in early times began to talk respecting the ram which was sacrificed in the place of Isaac. They said (R. Bechaj in Ex. xix. ap. Kraeland) that after the ram was burnt, God miraculously restored the body. His muscles were deposited in the golden altar; from his visera were made the strings of David's harp; his skin became the mantle of Elijah; his left horn was the trumpet of Sata.; and his right horn was to sound when Messiah comes (Is. xxvii. 15). R. Akiba, recent to connect this with the Jubilee, affirms that 72 is the Arable for a ram, though the best Arabic scholars say there is no such word in the language.

d Ewald (Afterthemer, p. 449) and others, have referred the words of Is. xxxvii. 9 to the Jubilee year expressly. But Gesenius adopts another view of the passage, which accords better with the context. He regards it as merely referring to the continuance of the decolation occasioned by the war for two years.

e The Message of Josephus and of Philo, and of every eminent Jewish and Christian writer, except those that have been mentioned, are in favor of the fifteenth. Iieder has taken up the matter very satisfactorily (Hein. der Cirix t. 995).

f Whether this was an absolute remission of debts, or merely a justification for the year, will be considered under Sabbatical Year.
JUBILEE, THE YEAR OF

JUBILEE, THE YEAR OF

wholly made a mistake, or that he has drawn too side an inference from the general character of the year. Of course to those who were in bondage for their debts, the freedom conferred by the Jubilee must have amounted to a remission; as did, not less, their freedom at the end of their seven years of servitude.

The first Jubilee year must have fallen in due course after the first seven sabbatical years. For the commencement of the series on which the succession of sabbatical years was reckoned, see CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 437, and SABBATICAL YEAR.

V. Maimonides, and the Jewish writers in general, consider that the Jubilee was observed till the destruction of the first Temple. But there is no direct historical notice of its observance on any one occasion, either in the books of the O. T., or in any other records. The only passages in the Prophets which can be regarded with much confidence, as referring to the Jubilee in any way, are Is. v. 7, 8, 9, 10; Is. ix. 1, 2; Ez. vii. 12, 13; Ez. xvi. 16, 17, 18. Regarding Is. xxxvii. 30, see note d, p. 1485.
Some have doubted whether the law of Jubilee ever came into actual operation (Michaelis, Laws of Jubilee, art. xxi., and Winer, sub r., a number) others have confidently denied it (Krauss, p. 89; Hup-feld, p. iii. p. 20). But Ewald contends that the institution is eminently practical in the character of its details, and that the accidental circumstance of no particular instance of its observance having been recorded in the Jewish history proves nothing.
Besides the passages to which reference has been made, he applies several others to the Jubilee. He conceives that the year of visitation mentioned in Jer. xi. 19, xiii. 12, xlviii. 44, denotes the publishment of those who, in the Jubilee, withheld by thyanny or fraud the possessions or the liberty of the poor. From Jer. xxxii. 6-12 he infers that the Law was restored to operation in the reign of Josiah (ibid. p. 424, note 1).

VI. The Jubilee is to be regarded as the outer circle of that great sabbatical system which comprises within it the sabbatical year, the sabbatical month, and the Sabbath-day. The rest and restoration of an individual member of the state, in his spiritual relation, belongs to the weekly Sabbath and the sabbatical month, while the land had its rest and relief in the sabbatical year. But the Jubilee is more immediately connected with the body politic; and it was only as a member of the state that each person concerned could participate in its provisions. It has less of a formally religious aspect than either of the other sabbatical institutions, and its details were of a more immediately practical character. It was not distinguished by any prescribed religious observance peculiar to itself, like the rites of the Sabbath day and of the sabbatical month; nor even by anything like the reading of the Law in the sabbatical year. But to the Hebrew state, policy and religion were never sep-ated, nor was their essential connection ever dropped out of sight. Hence the year was hallowed, in the strict sense of the word, by the solemn blast of the Jubilee trumpets, on the same day on which the sins of the people had been acknowledged in the generalfast, and in which they had been symbolically expiated by the entrance of the high-priest into the holy of holies with the blood of the appointed victims. Hence also the deeper ground of the provisions of the institution is stated with marked emphasis in the Law itself. — The land was to be restored to the families to which it had been at first allotted by divine direction (Josh. xiv. 2), because it was the Lord's. The land shall not be purchased for ever: for the land is Mine; ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. xxv. 23). "I am the Lord your God which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God" (ver. 38). — The Hebrew bondman was to have the privilege of claiming his liberty as a right, because he could never become the property of any one but Jehovah.
"For they are my servants which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold bondmen." (ver. 42). "For unto me the children of Israel are servants, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt." (ver. 55).

If regarded from an ordinary point of view, the Jubilee was calculated to meet and remedy those incidents which are inevitable in the course of human society: to prevent the accumulation of inordinate wealth in the hands of a few, and to relieve those whom misfortune or fault had reduced to poverty. As far as legislation could go, its provisions tended to restore that equality in outward circumstances which was instituted in the first settlement of the land by Joshua. But if we look on the subject (Bib. Law, art. 73). The very well-proved instance of anything like it in other nations appears to be that of the Dalmatians, mentioned by Strabo, lib. viii. p. 365, ed. Cassub. He says that they redistributed their land every eight years. Ewald following the statement of Plutarch, refers to the institute in a similar manner, but Mr. Grote is of another view of the matter (Hist. of Greece, vol. ii.
p. 594).

D. A collateral result of the working of the Jubilee must have been the preservation of the genealogical tables, and the maintenance of the distinction of the tribes. Ewald and Michaelis suppose that the tables were systematically corrected and filled up at each Jubilee. This seems reasonable enough, in order that the fresh names might be filled in, that irregularities arising from the dying out of families might be recti-fied, and that disputed claims might be, as far as possible, authoritatively met.

Its effect in maintaining the distinction of the tribe is illustrated in the appeal made by the tribe of Mannosh in regard to the daughters of Zelophehad (Num. xxxviii. 6). The sense of the passage is, however, ob

"a The words of Isaiah (v. 7-10) may, it would seem with more distinctness, be understood to the same efect, as denouncing woe against those who had unrighteously hindered the Jubilee from effecting its object.

b If there were a difficulty in considering this passage to have any bearing on the Jubilee, from its relation, apparently, to a priest's field (see § 11.
2 (c)). At all events, the transaction was merely the transfer of land from one member of a family to another, with a recognition of a preference allowed to a near relation to purchase. The case mentioned Ruth iv. 3 f. appears to go further in illustrating the Jubilee principle. — Naomi is about to sell a field of Elimelech's property. Boaz proceeds to the next of kin to purchase it of her, in order to prevent it from going out of the family, and, on his refusal, takes it himself, as having the next right.

c The foundation of the law of Jubilee appears to be so essentially connected with the children of Israel, that it seems strange that Michaelis should have doubly affirmed its Egyptian origin, while yet he acknowledges that he can produce no specific evidence

JUDAEA

1. [Jubal.] Son of Joseph in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 30), in the ninth generation from David, about the time of King Joash.

2. [Jubal.] Son of Joanna [Joannah] or Hannaiah [Hannaiah, 8] (Luke iii. 28). He seems to be certainly the same person as Abin in Matt. i. 13. His name, Ἰẛα, is identical with that of ὸνα, only that ὸνα is prefixed; and when Jesus is discarded from Luke’s line, and allowance is made for St. Matthew’s omission of generations in his genealogy, their tiers will agree perfectly. Both may be the same as Hadiah of 1 Chr. iii. 24.

3. [Judas.] One of the Lord’s brethren, enumerated in Mark vi. 3. [Joses; Joseph.] On the question of his identity with Judæ the brother of James, one of the twelve Apostles (Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13), and with the author of the general Epistle, see art. JUDE. In Matt. xiii. 55 his name is given in the A. V. as JUDAS [and so be given, Mark vi. 3].

4. [Judas.] The patriarch Judah (Suns. 66; Luke iii. 33; Heb. vii. 14; Rev. v. 5, vii. 5) [or in the last three passages, the name of the tribe.]

A. C. H.

* JUDA, a city of (A. V.), for τον Ιουδα in Luke i. 39, where Zacharias and Elizabeth lived, and where probably John the Baptist was born. But whether a town so named is meant, or the territory of JUDEA (=Ioubaia) is disputed. In the latter case the city is spoken of merely as one of the hill country (Αμοίβα, Luke) of Judæa, the name of which may have been unknown to Luke. Some suppose that the nameless city may have been Hebron, as that was both among the hills and belonged to the priests (Jos. xxvi. 11).

So Lightfoot (Hor, Hebr. ii. 493, Rotterdam, 1686), Sepp (Leben Christi, ii. 8), and Andrews (Life of our Lord, p. 65). The Franciscans have a Convent of St. John at ‘Ain Kòrin, a little west of Jerusalem, where they place the house of Zacharias and the nativity of the Forerunner (Thomson’s Land and Books, i. 530 ff.). Others regard this Juda as the name of the town itself, and identical with the modern Jatta, found in the neighborhood of Hebron. Dr. Robinson, after Reland (Palestina, p. 387), adopts this view (Bibl. Res. ii. 296, and Greek Horn, Notes, § 4). That this Jatta and Jutah in Josh. xxii. 16, are the same, no one can doubt; but it does not follow from this that Jatta and Jutah are the same. Meyer (on Luke i. 39) calls it an arbitrary supposition. Bleek also objects (Synopt. Erklärungen, i. 53) that if Luke had been acquainted with the name, he would naturally have introduced it in ver. 23. If Judah answers to Jutah (=Iat’ar) it can be only as a very mutilated form; for otherwise Juda and Jutah (Ἰουδα) have no etymological relation to each other.

II. JUDEA or JUDEA (Ioubaia), a territorial division which succeeded to the overthrow of the ancient landmarks of the tribes of Israel and the Jews, whose wealth did not consist in lands, it was reasonable that they should retain them in absolute possession. It has been conjectured that many of these tribesmen were foreign proselytes, who could not hold property in the land which was subject to the law of Jubilee.

a. This view is powerfully set forth by Bähr.
JUDAEA, WILDERNESS OF

Judah in their respective capacities. The word first occurs Dan. v. 13 (A. V. "Jewry"), and the first mention of the "province of Judaea" is in the book of Ezra (v. 8); it is alluded to in Neh. xi. 3 (Heb., and A. V. "Judah"), and was the result of the division of the Persian empire mentioned by Herodotus (iii. 89-97), under Darius (comp. Esth. viii. 11). In the works of Josephus the word "province" is dropped, and throughout the books of Esdras, Tobit, Judith, and Maccabees, the expressions are the "land ofJudaea," "Judaea" (A. V. frequently "Jewry"), and throughout the N. T. In the words of Josephus, "The Jews made preparations for the work of rebuilding the walls under Nehemiah" — a name which they received forthwith on their return from Babylon, from the tribe of Judah, which being the first to arrive in those parts, gave name both to the inhabitants and the territory" (Ant. xi. 5, § 7). But other tribes also returned from Babylon, such as the tribes of Benjamin and Levi (Ezra i. 5, and x. 5-9; Neh. xi. 4-36); scattered remnants of the "children of Ephraim and Manasseh" (1 Chr. ix. 3), or "Israel," as they are elsewhere called (Ezr. ii. 70, iii. 1, and iv. 11); Nehemiah, vii. 7, the borders of those peoples was not ascertainable (Ezr. ii. 59). In fact so many returned that in the case of the sin-offering the number of he-goats offered was twelve, according to the original number of the tribes (ibid. vii. 17, see also viii. 35). There had indeed been more or less of an amalgamation from the days of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxx.-xxxiii.), which continued ever afterwards, down to the very days of our Lord. Anna, wife of Phanuel, for instance, was of the tribe of Asher (St. Luke ii. 36). St. Paul of the tribe of Benjamin (Rom. xi. 1), St. Barnabas, a Levite, and so forth (Acts iv. 3; comp. Acts xxvi. 7; and Pirie, Lexicon, vol. i. p. 128-130, ed. McCaul). On the other hand the schismatical temple upon Mount Gerizim drew many of the dissatisfied Jews from their own proper country (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8). Nazareth, a city of Galilee, was the residence of our Lord's own parents; Bethsaida, that of three of his Apostles; the borders of the sea of Galilee generally, that of most of them. The scene of his preaching — intended as it was, during his earthly ministry, for the lost sheep of the house of Israel — was, with the exception of the last part of it, confined to Galilee. His disciples are addressed by the two angels subsequently to his Ascension, as "men of Galilee" (Acts i. 11), and it was asked by the multitude that came together in wonder on the day of Pentecost, "Are not all these who speak, Galileans?" (Acts ii. 7). Thus, neither did all who were Jews inhabit that limited territory called Judaea; nor again was Judaea inhabited solely by that tribe which gave name to it, or even in sole conjunction with Benjamin and Levi.

Once more as regards the territory. In a wide and more improper sense, the term Judaea sometimes extended to the whole country of the Canaanites, its ancient inhabitants (Joseph. Ant. i. 6, § 2); and even in the Gospels we seem to read of the coasts of Judaea beyond Jordan (St. Matt. xix. 1; St. Mark x. 1), a phrase perhaps countenanced by Josephus no less (Ant. xii. 14, § 11; comp. Jer. viii. 4), if the usual rendering of these passages is to be followed (see Reiss, Politien, i. 5). He stirred up the people, teaching through- out all Jewry (κατὰ διὸν τῆς ᾿Ιουδαίας) beginning from Galilee, unto this place," said the chief priests of our Lord (St. Luke xxiii. 5). With Pontius, moreover (see Reiss, ibid.), and with Dion Cassius (xxviii. 16), Judaea is synonymous with Palestine-Syria; the latter adding that the term Palestine had given place to it. With Strabo (xiv. p. 756 f.) it is the common denomination for the whole inhabited country between Elymais and Lebanon, and even Libanus, thus including Galilee and Samaria. Similarly, the Jews, according to Tacitus (Hist. v. 6), occupied the country between Arabia on the E., Egypt on the S., Phoenicia and the sea on the W., and Syria on the N.; and by the same writer both Pompey and Titus are said to have conquered Judaea, the other and less important divisions of course included.

Still, notwithstanding all these large significations which have been alluded to, Judaea was, in strict language, the name of the third district, west of the Jordan, and south of Samaria. Its northern boundary, according to Josephus (B. J. iii. 3, § 5) was a village called Amath, its southern another village named Jirdas. Its general breadth was from the Jordan to Joppa, though its coast did not exceed three miles in breadth, and it was latterly subdivided into eleven lots or portions, with Jerusalem for their centre (Joseph. ibid.). In a word it entitled "the original territories of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, together with Dan and Simeon: being almost the same with the old kingdom of Judah, and about 100 miles in length and 60 in breadth" (Lewis, ibid. i. 2).

It was made a portion of the Roman province of Syria, upon the deposition of Archelaus, the ethnarch of Judaea in A. D. 6, and was governed by a procurator, who was subject to the governor of Syria. The procurator resided at Caesarea on the coast, and not at Jerusalem (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 13, § 3; xviii. 1, § 1; § 1; § 1). Its history as a Roman province is related under JERUSALEM (p. 1391 ff.), and the physical features of the country are described in the article PALESTINE. E. S. H.

JUDAEA, THE LAND OF (γεφων τῆς Ἰουδαίας: desert Judaea), designates the region in which John the Baptist made his first appearance as the herald of the Messiah (Matt. iii. 1). It is the same, no doubt, as the "wilderness of Judah" (ἐρήμων Ἰουδαίας) in Judg. i. 16. It lay along the eastern border of Judaea towards the Dead Sea, in which were the "six cities with their villages" mentioned in Josh. xv. 61 f. It was the scene of many of David's perils and escapes during the days of his persecution by Saul (Ant. xix. 4, 17; xix. 10-12; xx. 1; xx. 1; xx. 1; xx. 1). It was a desert, of course, not in our own, but the oriental sense; i.e., fit for cultivation at intervals, thinly inhabited, and resorted to mainly as pasture-ground. As such terms must be more or less fluctuating, it may have included also the western shore of the Jordan north of the Dead Sea, which Josephus also designates as ῾Ιούδαιας (B. J. iii. 19, § 7, and iv. 8, §§ 2, § 2). (See Bleek's Synopsis. ErkUii.-hnu. der dcri ersten Jerusalems, i. 141.)

Mark i. 4 and Luke (iii. 2) refer to the same desert simply as ῾Ιούδαιας. Luke's ἔρημους τοῦ ῾Ιούδαου (iii. 3) includes the wider circuit of John's labors at a later period, as in the course of his ministry he preached now on this side of the Jordan and now on that. It is unnecessary, as well as incorrect, to suppose that any part of this Judean desert lay on the east of the river. It certainly is not just to regard גֶּפֶן גַּדְתִּי 'Leou- baias (Matt. iii. 1), as equivalent to גֶּפֶן גַּדְתִּי 'Leontov (Matt. iii. 5); for the latter (the other, or Jordan Valley) denotes the general region from which, and not that to which, the people came for baptism. (See also Bibli. Secura, xxiii. 529.) Hence, if the desert of the Saviour’s temptation (Matt. iv. 1 ff.) was in Perea (Stanley, Ellicott), it was a different one from that in Judaea. To urge no other reason, the proximity of Matt. iii. 1 to iv. 1 is adverse to that opinion. Probably the Saviour went to be tempted to a remotest part of the desert previously mentioned; but on returning to John after the lapse of forty days, he found him at Bethabara, or Bethany, beyond the Jordan (John i. 28). The actual place of the temptation may have been קָרָתָכּ (a corruption of קְרֵדְכִרְטֵא, 40 days), a part of the desert back of Jericho to- wards Jerusalem. It is a high mountain cut off from the plain by a wall of rock 1,290 or 1,500 feet high, is frightfully wild, and roams with wild beasts and reptiles, and thus answers fully to Mark’s significant intimation (i. 13) respecting the wildness of the scene (ἔθη τῶν θηρίων). H.

JU'DAH (יֵהוּדָה), i. e. Yehudâ [præs. honor.]: יְהוּדָא in Gen. xxix. 35; Alex. Jôdua, elsewhere Yôdâ in both MSS. and in N. T.; and so also Josephus: יְהוּדָא, the fourth son of Jacob and the fourth of Leah, the last before the tempo- rary cessation in the births of her children. His whole brothers were Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, elder than himself—issachar and Zebulun younger (see xxxv. 23). The name is explained as having originated in Leah’s exclamation of praise;” at this fresh gift of Jehovah—"She said, ‘now will I praise יְהוּדָא, Heb. Yehovah,’ and she called his name Yehudath (Gen. xxix. 35). The same play is preserved in the blessing of Jacob—"Ju- dah, thou whom thy brethren shall praise!" (xlix. 8). The name is not of frequent occurrence in the O. T. To the Apocrypha, however, it appears in the great hero Judas Maccabæus in 1 Macc. iv. 47, in N. T. in Jude, Judas Iscariot, and others [Juda; JU-DAS].

Of the individual Judah more traits are pre- served than of any other of the patriarchs with the exception of Joseph. In the matter of the sale of Joseph, he and Reuben stand out in favorable contrast to the rest of the brothers. But for their interference he, who was “their brother and their flesh,” would have been certainly put to death. Though not the firstborn, he “prevailed above his brethren” (I Chr. v. 2), and we find him subse- quently taking a decided lead in all the affairs of the family. When a second visit to Egypt for corn had become inevitable, it was Judah who, as the mouthpiece of the rest, headed the remonstrance against the detention of Benjamin by Jacob, and finally undertook to be responsible for the safety of the lad (xliii. 3-10). And when, through Joseph’s artifice, the brothers were brought back to the palace, he is again the leader and spokesman of the land. In that thoroughly Oriental scene it is Judah who unhesitatingly acknowledges the guilt which had never been committed, throws himself on the mercy of the supposed Egyptian prince, of- fers himself as a slave, and makes that wonderful appeal to the feelings of their disguised brother which renders it impossible for Joseph any longer to conceal his secret (xiv. 14, 16-34). So too it is Judah who is sent before Jacob to smooth the way for him in the land of Goshen (xvii. 28). This ascendency over his brethren is reflected in the last words addressed by him to his father and sons, whom thy brethren shall praise! thy father’s sons shall bow down before thee until he shall be the gathering of the people.” (Gen. xlix. 17-40). In the interesting traditions of the Koran and the Midrash his figure stands out in the same prominence. Before Joseph his wrath is mightier and his recognition heartier than the rest. It is he who hastens in advance to beat to Jacob the fragrant role of Joseph (Well’s Biblical Legends, pp. 88-90).

His sons were five. Of these three were by his Caananite wife Bath-shua; they are all insignificant, two died early, and the third, Shelah, does not come prominently forward, either in his person, or his family. The other two, Pharez and Zerah—twins—were illegitimate sons by the widow of the Egyptian, Zilpah, the elder, is named first; it is not infrequent in the case, the illegitimate sons surpassed the legitimate, and from Pharez, the elder, were descended the royal, and other illustrious families of Judah. These sons were born to Judah while he was living in the same district of Palestine, which, centuries after, was reppossessed by his de- scendants—amongst villages which retain their names unaltered in the catalogues of the time of the conquest. The three sons went with their father into Egypt at the time of the final removal thither (Gen. xlii. 12; Ex. i. 3).

When we again meet with the families of Judah they occupy a position among the tribes similar to that which their progenitor had taken amongst the patriarchs. The numbers of the tribe at the cen- sus at Sinai were 74,600 (Num. i. 26, 27), considerably in advance of any of the others, the largest of which—Dan—numbered 62,700. On the borders of the Promised Land they were 76,900 (xxvi. 22). Dan being still more nearly the chief of the tribe at the former census was Nahor, the son of Amminadab (Num. i. 7, ii. 3, vii. 12, x. 14), an ancestor of David (Ruth iv. 20). Its rep- resentative amongst the spies, and also among those appointed to partition the land, was the great Ca- leb the son of Jephunneh (Num. xiii. 6; xxiviv.). During the march through the desert Judah’s place was in the van of the host, on the east side of the Tabernacle, with his kinsmen Issachar and Zebu- lun (iii. 3-9; x. 14). The traditional standard of the tribe was a lion’s whelp, with the words, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered! (Targ. Pseudojon. on Num. ii. 3).

During the conquest of the country the only in- cidents specially affecting the tribe of Judah are—(1) the misbehavior of Achan, who was of the great house of Zerah (Josh. vii. 1, 16-18); and (2) the conquest of the mountain-district of Hebron by Caleb, and of the strong city Debir, in the same locality, by his father and son—Anan the Oth- niel (Josh. xiv. 6-15; xv. 13-19). It is the only instance given of a portion of the country being expressly reserved for the person or persons who conquered it. In general the conquest seems to have been made by the whole community, and the territory allotted afterwards, without reference to the original conquerors of each locality. In this case the high character and position of Caleb, and perhaps a claim established by him at the time of the visit of the spies to "the land wherein his feet had trodden" (Josh. xiv. 9; comp. Num. xiv. 21), may have led to the exception.

The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with greater minuteness than the others, in Josh. xv. 1-66. This may be due either to the fact that the lists were reduced to their present form at a later period, when the monarchy intervened with Judah, and when more care would naturally be bestowed on them than on those of any other tribe; or to the fact that the territory was more important and more thickly covered with towns and villages than any other part of Palestine. The greater prominence given to the genealogies of Judah in 1 Chr. ii. iii., iv. no doubt arises from the former reason. However this may be, we have in the record a very full and systematic description of the allotment to this tribe. The north boundary — for the most part coincident with the south boundary of Benjamin — began at the bend of the Jordan, entered the hills apparently at or about the present road from Jericho, ran westward to En-shemesh — probably the present Ain-Haum, below Bethany — thence over the Mount of Olives to En rogel, in the valley beneath Jerusalem; went along the ravine of Hinnom, made the precipice of the city, climbed the hill in a N. W. direction to the Water of Nephthah (probably Lifer), and thence by Kirjath-jearim (probably Karit el-Lather, Beth-shemesh (Ain-Sheha), Timnah, and Ekron, to Japhoel on the sea-coast. On the east the Dead Sea, and on the west the Mediterranean formed the boundaries. The southern line is hard to determine, since it is denoted by places many of which have not been identified. It left the Dead Sea at its extreme south end, and joined the Mediterranean at the Wady el-Arish; but between these two points it passed through Machir Accabrim, the Wilderness of Zinc, Hebron, Adar, Karkaa, and Azmon; the Wilderness of Zin the extreme south of all (Josh. xv. 1-12). This territory — in average length about 45 miles, and in average breadth about 50 — was from a very early date divided into four main sections. (1.) The South — the undulating pasture country, which intervened between the hills, the proper possession of the tribe, and the deserts which encompass the lower part of Palestine (Josh. xv. 21; Stanley, S. of P.). It is this which is designated as the wilderness (midebar) of Judah (Judg. i. 16). It contained thirty-seven cities, with their dependent villages of ophel and siphar. Twelve of those farthest south were called to Simcon (xix. 1-39). Amongst these southern cities the most familiar name is Beer-sheba.

(2.) The Lowland (xxv. 33; A. V. valley) — or, to give it its own proper and constant appellation, the Shefelah — the broad belt or strip lying between the central highlands — the mountain — and the Mediterranean, the lower portion of that maritime plain, which extends through the whole of the seashore of Palestine, from Sodom in the north, to Elimelechah at the south. This tract was the garden and the granary of the tribe. In it, long before the conquest of the Country by Israel, the Philistines had settled themselves, never to be completely dislodged (Neh. xxiii. 23, 24). There, planted at equal intervals along the level coast, were their five chief cities, each with its circle of smaller dependents, overlooking, from the natural modulations of the ground, the "standing waves" — "shocks," "vineyards and olives," which excited the ingenuity of Samson, and are still remarked by modern travellers. "They are all remarkable for the beauty and profusion of the gardens which surround them — the scarlet blossoms of the pomegranates, the enormous oranges which gild the green foliage of their famous groves" (Stanley, S. of P. 257). From the edge of the sandy tract, which fringes the immense shore right up to the very wall of the hills of Judah, stretches the immense plain of corn-fields. In those rich harvests lies the explanation of the constant contests between Israel and the Philistines (S. of P. 258). From them gathered the enormous cargoes of wheat, which were transmitted to Phœnica by Solomon in exchange for the arts of Hiram, and which in the time of the Herods still nourished the moneyed class of Sidon and Tyre (Lk. iv. 20). There were olive-trees, the sycamore-trees, and the treasures of oil, the care of which was sufficient to task the energies of two of David's special officers (1 Chr. xxvii. 28). The nature of this locality would seem to be reflected in the names of many of its towns if interpreted as Hebrew words: DILEAN = cemeteries; GEDERAH, GEDOTH, GEDEROOTH, sheepfolds; ZOReAH, wassps; ES-SANNIN, spring of gardens, etc., etc. But we have yet to learn how far these names are Hebrew: and whether at best they are but mere Hebrew accommodations of earlier Orphic names, and therefore not to be depended on for their significations. The number of cities in this district, without counting the smaller villages connected with them, was forty-two. Of these, however, many which belonged to the Philistines can only have been allotted to the tribe, and if taken possession of by Judah were only held for a time.

What were the exact boundaries of the Shefelah we do not know. We are at present ignorant of the principles on which the ancient Jews drew their boundaries between one territory and another. One thing only is almost certain, that they were not determined by the natural features of the ground, or else by boundaries to which the spies transmitted the same. The lowland plain, whose modern representatives are found deep in the mountains, [Alemeth: Japhan, etc.] (The latest information regarding this district is contained in Tophet's The Wandering, 1859.)

(3) The third region of the tribe — the Mount, the hill country of Judah — though not the richest, was at once the largest and the most important of the four. Beginning a few miles below Hebron, where it attains its highest level, it stretches eastward to the Dead Sea and westward to the Shefelah, and forms an elevated district or plateau, which, though thrown into considerable modulations, yet preserves a general level in both directions. It is the southern portion of that elevated hill country of Palestine which stretches north until intersected by the plain of Edom alone, and on which Hebron, Jerusalem, and Shechem are the chief spots. The surface of this region, which is of limestone, is monotonously smooth,—round swelling hills and hollows, of somewhat broader proportions than those immediately north of Jerusa-

ren, which, though in early times probably covered with forests [HARETT], have now, where not cultivated, no growth larger than a brushwood of dwarf-oak, arbutus, and other bushes. In many places there is a good soft turf, discoverable even in the autumn, and in spring the hills are covered with flowers. The number of towns enumerated (Josh. xxv. 38-60) as belonging to this district is 38; but, if we may judge from the ruins which meet the eye on every side, this must have been very far below the real number. Hardly a hill which is not crowned by some fragments of stone buildings, more or less considerable,—those which are still inhabited surrounded by groves of olive-trees, and inclosures of stone walls protecting the vineyards, now desolate; but where these are not, few, and woods and springs are frequent—in the neighborhood of "Solomon's Pools" at Ureth the most abundant.

(4.) The fourth district is the Wilderness (Mlheb), which here and here only appears to be synonymous with Aridcli, and to signify the sunk-en district immediately adjoining the Dead Sea. It contained only six cities, which must have been either, like Lebedi, on the slopes of the cliffs overhanging the Sea, or else on the lower level of the shore. The "city of Salt" may have been on the salt plains, between the sea and the cliffs which form the southern termination to the Ghor.

Nine of the cities of Judah were allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 9-19). The Levites had no cities in the tribe, and the priests had none out of it.

In the partition of the territory by Joshua and Eleazar (Josh. xix. 51), Judah had the first allotment (xv. 1). Joshua had on his first entrance into the country overrun the Shefelah, destroyed some of the principal towns and killed the kings (xv. 23-35), and had even penetrated thence into the mountains as far as Hebron and Debir (36-43); but the task of really subjugating the interior was yet to be done. After his death it was undertaken by Judah and Simeon (Judg. i. 20). In the artificial contrivances of war they were surprised by the Canaanites, and in some places, where the ground admitted of their iron chariots being employed, the latter remained masters of the field. But whatever force and vigor were in question, there the Israelites succeeded, and they obtained entire possession of the mountain district and the great corn-growing tract of Philistia (Judg. i. 19, 20). The latter was constantly changing hands as one or the other side got stronger (1 Sam. iv. v., vii. 11, etc.); but in the natural fortresses of the mountains Judah dwelt undisturbed throughout the troubled period of the Judges. Othniel was partly a member of the tribe (Judg. iii. 9), and a On the words "Judah on Jordan," used in describing the eastern termination of the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34), critics have strained their ingenuity to prove that Judah had some possessions in that remote locality either by allotment or inheritance. See the elaborate attempt of Von Raumer (Pall. pp. 495-410) to show that the villages of Jair are intended. But the difficulty—maximus auge insobebitis nonis, pat ultor exiprits tertis, has deflected the exegetes from the emendation; and the suggestion of Ewald (Gena. ii. 280, note) is the most feasible—that the passage is corrupt, and that Cinneroth or some other word originally occupied the place of "at Judah" is not accepted by "at Judah," b Keil adopts this view of Raumer (see Bibl. Comm. in loc.). The district of the 60 villages on the east of the Bethlehem of which Izra is a native (xii. 8, 9) may have been Bethlehem-Judah. But even if these two tribes belonged to Judah, the tribe itself was not molest ed, and with the one exception mentioned in Judg. xx. 19, when they were called by the divine oracle to make the attack on Gibeon, they are not again found to do during the whole of that period but settle themselves in their homes. Not only did they take no part against Sisera, but they are not even rebuked for it by Deborah.

Nor were they disturbed by the incursions of the Philistines during the rule of Samuel and of Saul, which were made through the territory of Dan and of Benjamin; or if we place the Valley of Elah at the western extent of the Holy Canaan, then only on the outskirts of the mountains of Judah. On the last named occasion, however, we know that at least one town of Judah—Bethlehem—furnished men to Saul's host. The incidents of David's flight from Saul will be found examined under the heads of David, Saul, Samson, Hachilah, etc.

The main inference deducible from these considerations is the determined manner in which the tribe of Judah, as a tribe, adhered to the Ghor—neither offering its aid nor asking that of others. The same independent mode of action characterizes the foundation of the monarchy after the death of Saul. There was no attempt to set up a rival power to Ishbosheth. The tribe had had full experience of the man who had been driven from the court to take shelter in the caves, woods, and fastnesses of their wild hills, and when the opportunity offered, the men of Judah came and anointed David king over the house of Judah in Hebron" (2 Sam. ii. 4, 11). The further step by which David was invested with the sovereignty of the whole nation was taken by the other tribes, Judah having no special part therein; and though willing enough, if occasion rendered it necessary, to act with others, their conduct later, when brought into collision with Eipiraim on the matter of the restoration of David, shows that the men of Judah had preserved their independent mode of action. The king was near of kin to them; and therefore they, and they alone, set about bringing him back. It had been their own affair, to be accomplished by themselves alone, and they had gone about it in that independent manner, which looked like despising those who believed their share in David to be a far larger one (2 Sam. xix. 449). The same independent temper will be found to characterize the tribe throughout its existence as a kingdom, which is considered in the following article.

2. A Levite whose descendants, Kadmiel and his sons, were very active in the work of rebuilding the Jordan, he says, is counted as Judah's, or in Ju-

a But Bethlehem appears to have been closely connected with them (2 Chr. xvi. 7, 9; xix. 1). The word here (Judg. i. 19) is Emek, entirely a different word from Shefelah, and rightly rendered a valley. It is difficult, however, to fix upon any such valley in this region sufficiently important to be alluded to. Can it be the Valley of Poes, where contests with the Philistines took place later?
the Temple after the return from Captivity (Ezr. iii. 9). Lord Hervey has shown cause for believing (Genev. i. 29, etc.) that the name is the same as HODAVIAH and HODEVAH. In 1 Esd. v. 58, it appears to be given as JUDIA.

3. ([In Ezr.] "Joas", [Vat. 160a, F. A. 160a; in Neh. xii. 8:] "Joas", [Vat. F. A. 1 Jos. 160a, Alex. "Jesd": in xii. 36, Vat. Alex. F. A. 1 omits: Judas, Judish.]) A Levite who was obliged by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 29). Probably the same person is intended in Neh. vii. 36, 56. In 1 Esd. ii. 27 his name is given as JUDAS.

4. ([Jos. 160a; Vat. Alex. 1 Jos. 160a; Judas.] A Benjaminite, son of Sennah (Neh. xi. 9). It is worth notice, in connection with the suggestion of Lord Hervey mentioned above, that in the lists of 1 Chr. ix., in many points so curiously parallel to those of this chapter, a Benjaminite, Hodaviah, son of Has-sennah, is given (ver. 7).

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. 1. When the disruption of Solomon's kingdom took place at Shechem, only the tribe of Judah followed the house of David. But almost immediately afterwards, when Rehoboam deceived the design of establishing his authority over Israel by force of arms, the tribe of Benjamin also is recorded as obeying his summons, and contributing its warriors to make up his army. Jerusalem, situate within the borders of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28, &c.), yet won from the heathen by a prince of Judah, connected the frontiers of the two tribes by an indissoluble political bond. By the erection of the city of David, Benjamin's former adherence to the temple was canceled; though at least two Benjaminite towns, Bethel and Jericho, were included in the northern kingdom. A part, if not all, of the territory of Simeon (1 Sam. xxviii. 6; 1 K. x. 3; cf. Josh. xix. 1) and of Dan (2 Chr. xii. 10: cf. Josh. xix. 41-42) was recognized as belonging to Judah; and in the reigns of Abijah and Asa, the southern kingdom was enlarged by some additions taken out of the territory of Ephraim (1 Chr. xiii. 19, xv. 8, xvii. 2). After the conquest and deportation of Israel by Assyria, the influence, and perhaps the delegated jurisdiction of the king of Judah sometimes extended over the territory which formerly belonged to Israel.

2. In Edom a vassal-king probably retained his fidelity to the son of Solomon, and guarded for Jewish enterprise the road to the maritime trade with Ophir. Philistia maintained for the most part a quiet independence. Syria, in the height of her brief power, pushed her conquests along the northern and eastern frontiers of Judah and threatened Jerusalem; but the interposition of the territory of Israel generally relieved Judah from any immediate contact with that dangerous neighbor. The southern border of Judah, resting on the un-inhabited Desert, was not agitated by any turbulent stream of commercial activity like that which flowed by the rear of Israel, from Damascus to Tyre. And though some of the Egyptian kings were ambitious, that ancient kingdom was far less aggressive as a neighbor to Judah than Assyria was to Israel.

3. A singular gauge of the growth of the kingdom of Judah is supplied by the progressive augmentation of the army under successive kings. In David's time (2 Sam. xiv. 9, and 1 Chr. xxi. 5) the warriors of Judah numbered at least 500,000. But Rehoboam brought into the field (1 K. xii. 21) only 180,000 men: Abijah, eighteen years afterwards, 400,000 (2 Chr. xii. 3); Asa (2 Chr. xiv. 8), his successor, 580,000, exactly equal to the sum of the armies of his two predecessors; Jothamiah (2 Chr. xiv. 19-14), the next king, numbered his warriors in five armies, the aggregate of which is 1,150,000, exactly double the army of his father, and exactly equal to the sum of the armies of his three predecessors. After four inglorious reigns the energetic Amaziah could muster only 200,000 men when he set out to recover Edom. His son Uzziah had a standing (2 Chr. xxvi. 11) force of 390,500 fighting men. It would be out of place here to discuss the question which has been raised as to the accuracy of these numbers. So far as they are authentic, it may be safely reckoned that the population subject to each king was about four times the number of the fighting men in his dominions. [ISRAEL.]

4. Unless Judah had some other means beside pasture and tillage, of acquiring wealth as by maritime commerce from the Red Sea ports, or (less probably) from Joppa, or by keeping up the old trade (1 K. x. 28) with Egypt — it seems difficult to account for that ability to accumulate wealth, which supplied the Temple treasury with sufficient stores to be possessed by the hand of the spoiler, Egypt, Damascus, Samaria, Nineveh, and Babylon, had each in succession a share of the pillage. The treasury was emptied by Shishak (1 K. xiv. 26), again by Asa (1 K. x. 18), by Jehosh of Judah (2 K. xii. 18), by Jehosh of Israel (2 K. xiv. 14), by Ahaz (2 K. xvi. 8), by Hezekiah (2 K. xvii. 18), and by Nechochnezer (2 K. xxiv. 13).

5. The kingdom of Judah possessed many advantages which secured for it a longer continuance than that of Israel. A frontier less exposed to powerful enemies, a soil less fertile, a population harder and more united, a fixed and venerated centre of administration and religion, an hereditary aristocracy in the sacred royal caste, an army always subordinate, a succession of kings which no revolution interrupted, many of whom were wise and good, and strove successfully to promote the moral and material prosperity of their people: still more than these, the devotion of the people to the One True God, which, if not always a pure and elevated sentiment, was yet a contrast to such devotion as could be inspired by the worship of the calves or of Baal: and lastly the popular reverence for and obedience to the Divine law so far as they learned it from their teachers: — to these and other secondary causes is to be attributed the fact that Judah survived her more populous and more powerful sister kingdom by 133 years; and lasted from n. c. 975 to n. c. 586.

6. The chronological succession of the kings of Judah is given in the article ISRAEL. A few difficulties of no great importance have been discovered in the statements of the ages of some of the kings. They are explained in the archaeological table in this article and in Keil's Commentary on the Book of Kings. A detailed history of each king will be found under his name.

Judah acted upon three different lines of policy in succession. First, animosity against Israel: secondly, resistance, generally in alliance with Israel, to Damascus: thirdly, defence, perhaps vassalage to the Assyrian king. (c) The first three kings of Judah seem to have cherished the hope of reestablishing their authority over the Ten Tribes; for sixty years there was war between them and the kings of Israel. Neither the abandoning of Rehoboam’s forces by the authority of Shemaiah, nor the pillage of Jerusalem by the irresistible Shishak, served to put an end to the fraternal harmony. The history revealed by the daring Abijah brought to Judah a temporary accession of territory. Asa appears to have enlarged it still further; and to have given a powerful stimulus to the migration of religious Israelites to Jerusalem, that Baasha was induced to fortify Ramah with the view of checking the movement.
Asa provided for the safety of his subjects from invaders by building, like Rehoboam, several fenced cities; but he resolutely carried through an ancient Ethiopian horde; he hired the armed invasion of Benhadad I., king of Damascus, against Baasha; and he discouraged idolatry and enforced the worship of the true God by severe penal laws.

(b.) Hanani’s remonstrance (2 Chr. xvi. 7) prepares us for the reversal by Jehoshaphat of the policy which Asa pursued towards Israel and Dan-mascus. A close alliance sprang up with strange races between Judah and Israel. For eighty years, till the time of Amaziah, there was no open war between them, and Damascus appears as their chief and common enemy; though it rose afterwards from its overthrow to become under Rezin
the ally of Pekah against Ahaz. Jehoshaphat, active and prosperous, repelled nomad invaders from the desert, cured the aggressive spirit of his nearer neighbors, and made his influence felt even among the Philistines and Arabs. A still more lasting benefit was conferred on his kingdom by his persevering efforts for the religious instruction of the people, and the regular administration of justice.
The reign of Jehoram, the husband of Athaliah, a time of bloodshed, idolatry, and disaster, was cut short by disease. Ahaziah was slain by Jehu.
Athaliah, the grand-daughter of a Tyrian king, usurped the blood-stained throne of David, till the followers of the ancient religion put her to death, and crowned Jehosh the surviving scion of the royal house. His preserver, the high-priest, acquired prominent personal influence for a time; but the king fell into idolatry, and failing to withstand the power of Syria, was murdered by his own officers. The vigorous Amaziah, flushed with the recovery of Edom, provoked a war with his more powerful neighbor, and finally ceased to push the boundaries of the Syrians; and Jerusalem was entered and plundered by the Israelites. But their energies were sufficiently occupied in the task of completing the subjugation of Damascus. Under Uzziah and Jotham, Judah long enjoyed political and religious prosperity, till the wanton Ahaz, surrounded by united enemies, with whom he was unable to cope, became in an evil hour the tributary and vassal of Terror-Powers.

(c.) Already in the fatal grasp of Assyria, Judah was yet spared for a checkered existence of almost another century and a half after the termination of the kingdom of Israel. The effect of the repulse of Semacheth, of the signal religious revival under Hezekiah and under Josiah, and of the extension of their salutary influence over the long-severed territory of Israel, was apparently done away by the ignominious reign of the impious Manasseh, and the lingering decay of the whole people under the two feeble descendants of Josiah. Provoked by their treachery and inhumanity, their Assyrian master trained in successive deportations all the strength of the kingdom. The consumption of the ruin came upon them in the destruction of the Temple by the hand of Nebuzaradan, amid the wailings of prophets, and the taunts of heathen tribes released at length from the yoke of David.

7. The national history of the Jews saw no longer extant; but there was still, as there had been all along, a spiritual life hidden within the body.

It was a time of hopeful darkness to all but those Jews who had strong faith in God, with a clear and steady insight into the ways of Providence as interpreted by prophecy. The time of the division of the kingdoms was the golden age of prophey. In each kingdom the prophetic office was required to minister to the prevailing necessities;
but in Judah the peculiar office of a mediatory prophet was required by the circumstances of the priesthood, in Israel by the existence of the House of Baal and the Altar in Bethel. If, under the shadow of the Temple, there was a depth and a grasp elsewhere unequalled, in the views of Isaiah and the prophets of Judah, if their writings touched and elevated the hearts of thinking men in studios' retriment in the silent night-watches; there was, also, in the few burning words and exhortations of the prophets of Israel, a power to tame a lawless multitude and to check the high-handed tyranny and idolatry of kings. The organization and moral influence of the priesthood were matured in the time of David; from about that time to the building of the second Temple the influence of the prophets rose and became predominant. Some historians have suspected that after the reign of Athaliah the priesthood gradually acquired and retained excessive and unconstitutional power in Judah. The recorded facts scarcely sustain the conjecture. Had it been so, the effect of such power would have been manifest in the exorbitant wealth and luxury of the priests, and in the constant and cruel enforcement of penal laws, like those of Asa, against irreligion. But the peculiar offices of the priesthood, as witnessed in the prophetic writings, were of another kind. Ignorance of God’s Word, neglect of the instruction of the laity, untruthfulness, and partial judgments, are the offenses specially imputed to them, just such as might be looked for where the priesthood is a hereditary caste and irresponsible, but neither ambitious nor powerful. When the priest either, as was the case in Israel, abandoned the land, or, as in Judah, was, in a particular manner, a teacher of a more spiritual communion with God, ceased from living sympathy with man, and became the mere image of an interessee, a mechanical performer of ceremonial duties little understood or heeded by himself, then the prophet was raised up to supply some of his deficiences, and to exercise his functions so far as was necessary. Whilst the priests sink into obscurity and almost disappear, except from the genealogical registers, the prophets are pre-ailing everywhere to the conscience of individuals, in Israel as wonder-workers, calling together God’s chosen few out of an idolatrous nation, and in Judah as teachers and seers, supporting and purifying all that remained of ancient piety, explaining each mysterious dispensation of God as it was unfolded, and pronouncing his gracious spiritual providence in all its effects. The forward march of Judah, Jeremiah, and other prophets took in preparing the Jews for their Captivity, cannot indeed be fully appreciated without reviewing the succeeding efforts of Ezekiel and Daniel. But the influence which they exercised on the national mind was too important to be overlooked in a sketch JUDAH UPON JORDAN

however brief, of the history of the kingdom of Judah.

W. T. B.

* JUDAH UPON JORDAN (A. V.), a border town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34). See note a, p. 1491. The Hebrew is more strictly Judah-Jordan, without a preposition. Though the tribe of Judah was in the south and Naphtali in the north, it is very conceivable that there may have been a town named after one tribe in the territory of another. Dr. Thomson's discovery gives support to this supposition. He found a place near Ramina and the Wadi er-Rubbeh (يوداَيِ الرَّحبة) or Valley of Rehoboth, marked by ruins and a tomb with a dome, revered as the tomb of a prophet by the Arabs, and called Siidi Yakhada (سيدى يخادة) "My Lord Judah." He is very confident that this is the site of the ancient Judah with its name perpetuated. (See Land and Book, i. 389 ff.) A conterminous border of Judah and Naphtali at any point is out of the question.

1. JUDASIM (יוֹדֵאתָיּ), only in Gal. i. 13, 14 in the N. T. ("Jewish religion," A. V., and 2 Macc. ii. 21 (rendered "Judaimus") and xiv. 33 twice ("Judasim") and xiv. 38 twice ("Judaism") and "religion of the Jews"). It designates the system of Jewish faith and worship in its perverted form as one of blind attachment to rites and traditions, and of bigotry, self-righteousness, and national exclusiveness. To what extent the religion of the Jews partook of this character in the time of our Lord, appears not only from his constant exposure of their formalism and self-assertion, but especially in the fact, that in John's Gospel the Jews (יוֹדֵאתָיּ) occurs more frequently than otherwise as synonymous with opposers of Christ and of his teachings. A similar usage is found in the Acts. Yet Paul recognizes the idea of a true Judaism as distinguished from its counterfeit, when he says: "He is a Jew who is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God (Rom. ii. 29).

Of the spirit of Judaism the Apostle himself before his conversion was a signal example. He ascribes to himself that character in various passages. He declares in Gal. i. 13, 14 that his persecution of the church was a fruit and evidence of this spirit, and that in the violence of his zeal he outstripped even of his associates or complices (ἁτρήσθης) as a zealot (ἱππότης) for the traditions of the fathers. (See also Acts ix. 1 ff.; xxvi. 9; 1 Tim. i. 13, xvi.) Such Judaism possessed in the eyes of a Jew the merit of both patriotism and piety, and hence is portrayed as such in the heroes of the Jewish apocryphal books.

2. JUDAS (יוֹדֵא), the Greek form of the Hebrew name JUDAH, occurring in the LXX. and N. T. (JUDAS).

1. [Vat. Alex. ὸδας; Codex E, ℃. f. 28, 31.] The son of Mattathias, called Macceus (1 Macc. ii. 4). [MACCEUSES.]

2. The son of Mattathias, called Macceus (1 Macc. ii. 4). [MACCEUSES.]

3. The son of Calphi (Архиепископ), a Jewish general under Jonathan (1 Macc. xi. 70).

4. A Jew occupying a conspicuous position at Jerusalem at the time of the mission to Aristobulus [Aristobulus] and the Egyptian Jews (2 Macc. i. 10). He has been identified with an Es bense, consciens for his prophetic gifts (Jos. Ant. xiii. 11, 2; B. J. i. 3, 5); and with Jews Macceuses (Grinnm ad loc.). Some again suppose that he is a person otherwise unknown.

5. A son of Simon, and brother of Joannes Hyrcanus (1 Macc. xvi. 2), murdered by Ptolemaus the usurper, either at the same time (c. 135 n. c.) with his father (1 Macc. xvi. 15 ff.), or shortly afterwards (Jos. Ant. xiii. 8, 1: cf. Grinnm, ad Macc. 1. c.).

6. The patriarch Judah (Matt. i. 2, 3).

7. A man residing at Damascus, in "the street which is called Straight," in whose house Saul of Tarsus lodged after his miraculous conversion (Acts ix. 11). The "Straight Street" may be with little question identified with the "Street of Bazanars," a long, wide thoroughfare, penetrating from the southern gate into the heart of the city, which, as in all the Syro-Greek and Syro-Roman towns, it intersects in a straight line. The so-called "House of Judas" is still shown in an open space called "the Shekyh's Place," a few steps west of the "Street of Bazanars." It contains a square room with a stone floor, partly walled off for a tomb, shown to Maundrell (Lord Torr. to Maundrell, a leading as the "tomb of Ananias." The house is an object of religious respect to Mussulmans as well as Christians (Stanley, S. P. p. 412; Conybeare and Hows. i. 102; Maundrell, l. c.; Pococke, i. 119). E. V.

* It is not certain, nor probable, that this Judas (of whom nothing further is known) was at that time a Christian. None of Saul's company were Christians, nor did they know that he had become one. Neither they, nor he, would probably know of a Christian family to which they could address him, nor would such a family have then received him. It was probably led by his companions to his intended stopping-place—possibly, a public house. It is a fair inference from the narrative, that the host and the guest were both personally strangers to Ananias.

JUDAS, SURNAMED BAR-SABAS (יוֹדֵא־בַּר־סָבָא, Ἰουδάς ὁ ἀπὸ Δαμασκός Βαρσαβάς [Ludan. Tisch. Targ. Barabas]; Judas qui quomominatur Barba) was a Jew of Antioch, member of the Apostolic church at Jerusalem (יוֹדֵא־בַּר־סָבָא ἐν τῷ Ἀντιόχεια), Acts xx. 22, and "perhaps a member of the Presbytery" (Neeander, Pl. & Ev. i. 123), ended with the gift of prophecy (ver. 32), chosen with Silas to accompany St. Paul and St. Barnabas as delegates to the church at Antioch, to make known the decree concerning the terms of admission of the Gentile converts, and to receive the Gentile communion and character by personal communications (ver. 27). After employing their prophetic gifts for the confirmation of the Syrian Christians in the faith, Judas went back to Jerusalem, while Silas either remained at Antioch (for the reading Acts xx. 34 is uncertain; and while some MSS. followed by the Vulgate, add ὁ δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἰουδάς ἐν τῇ Ἰερουσαλημ, the verse is accurate, or possibly readeth thither. Nothing further is recorded of Judas. The form of the name Bar-sabas [or Baraabas, see above]—Son of Sabas, has led to several conjectures: Wolff and Grotsch, probably enough, suppose him to have been a brother of Joseph Barbabas (Acts ii. 21); while Schott (in loc. § 163, p
JUDAS OF GALILEE

(1) takes Sabas or Zabas to be an abbreviated form of Zebedee, regards Judas as an elder brother of James and John, and attributes to him the "ad" (Add). Judas Iscariot, on the other hand (Die Katholische, Briefe, Lengy, 1801–8, ii. 80), advances the opinion, though with considerable hesitation, that he may be identical with the Apostle Ioudas Isakoues

JUDAS OF GALILEE (Ioudas Γαλαταιος: Judas Galileus), the leader of a popular revolt in "the days of the taxing" (i. e. the census, under the prefecture of P. Sulp. Quirinus, A. D. 6, A. C. c. 759), referred to by Galanell in his speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts v. 37). According to Josephus (Ant. xviii. 1, § 1), Judas was a Gaionate of the city of Gamala, probably taking his name of Gaillam from his instruction having had its rise in Galilee. His revolt had a character, the watchword of which was "we will have no Lord nor master but God," and he boldly denounced the payment of tribute to Caesar, and acknowledged no authority, as treason against the principles of the Mosaic constitution, and signifying nothing short of downright slavery. His fiery eloquence and the popularity of his doctrines and martial conduct on the other hand, by many of whom he was regarded as the Messiah (Orig. H. w. in loc. xcv.), and the country was for a time entirely given over to the lawless depredations of the fierce and licentious throng who had joined themselves to him; but the might of Rome proved irresistible: Judas himself perished, and his followers were "dispersed," though not entirely destroyed till the final overthrow of the city and nation. With his fellow insurgent Sadoc, a Pharisee, Judas is represented by Josephus as the founder of a fourth sect, in addition to the Pharisees, Saducees, and Essenes (Ant. xviii. 1, § 1, 6; B. J. ii. 8, § 1). The only point which appears to have distinguished his followers from the Pharisees was their stubborn love of freedom, leading them to despise torments or death for themselves or their friends, rather than call any man master.

The Gaunions, as his followers were called, may be regarded as the doctrinal ancestors of the Zadots and Sicarii of later days, and to the influence of his tenets Josephus attributes all subsequent insurrections of the Jews, and the final destruction of the City and Temple. James and John, the sons of Judas, headed an unsuccessful insurrection in the procuratorship of Tiberius Alexander, A. D. 47; by whom they were taken prisoners and crucified. Twenty years later, A. D. 66, their younger brother Menahem, following his father's example, took the lead of a band of desperadoes, who, after pillaging the armory of Herod in the fortress of Masada, near the "gardens of Engaddi," marched to Jerusalem, occupied the city, and after a desperate siege took the palace, where he immediately assumed the state of a king, and committed great enormities. As he was going up to the Temple to worship, with great pomp, Menahem was taken by the partisans of Eleazar the high-priest, by whom he was tortured to death Aug. 15, A. D. 66 (Milman, Hist. of Jews, ii. 152, 231; Joseph. l. c.; Orig. in Matt. 7, xxv. § 25).

JUDAS ISCARIOT (Ioudas Iskarioth in Mark and Luke, Lachm. Tisch. Treg. Iskarioth: Judas Ischariotes). He is sometimes called "the son of Simon" (John vi. 71, xiii. 2, 26), but more commonly (the three Synoptic Gospels give no other name), Iscariotes (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 19; Luke vi. 16, etc.). In the three lists of the Twelve there is added in each case the fact that he was the betrayer.

The name Iscariot has received many interpretations more or less conjectural.

(1) From Kerihoth (Josh. xvi. 23), in the tribe of Judah, the Heb. קְרֵיָהוֹת, ISH KIRIOTH, passing into Ἰσκαριότης in the same way as Ὁ Ἰσκαριότης Iσκαριότης ish Tob, a man of Tob—appears in Josephus (Ant. vii. 6, § 1) as ἶσος ὁ διστάσας (Winer, Realb. s. v.). In connection with this explanation may be noticed the reading of some MSS. in John vii. 71, ὁ Ἰσκαριότης, and that received by Lachmann and Tischendorf, which makes the name Iscariot belong to Simon, and not, as elsewhere, to Judas only. On this hypothesis his position among the Twelve, the rest of whom belonged to Galilee (Acts ii. 7), would be exceptional; and this has led to

(2) From Kartha in Galilee (Kartan, A. V., Josh. xxi. 32; Ewald, Gesch. Israel. v. 321). As equivalent to Ἰσκαριότης (Curtius on Matt. x. 4; Hemmatt, Misell. Groving. iii. 938, in Winer, Realb.).

(4) From Ἰσκαριότης, as "date-trees (καρπωτείς) in the neighborhood of Jerusalem or Jericho (Barolocci, Bibl. Reg. iii. 10, in Winer, l. c.; Gill, Com. in Matt. x. 4)."

(5) From Ἰσκαριότης ὁ Ἰσος, a leathern apron, the name being applied to him as the bearer of the bag, and = Judas with the apron (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Matt. x. 4).

(6) From Ἰσκαριότης, isos = strangeling (angius), as given after his death, and confessing (Lightfoot, l. c.), or indicating that he had been subject to a disease tending to sublime previously (Helmich in Suicer. Thes. s. v. Ἰσκαριότης). This is mentioned also as a meaning of the name by Orig., Tract. in Matt. xxxv.

Of the life of Judas, before the appearance of his name in the lists of the Apostles, we know absolutely nothing. It must be left to the sad vision of a poet (Keble, Lyres Inwoacement, ii. 15), or the fantastic fables of an apocryphal Gospel (Col. Apec. N. T. Ewry. Infinit. c. 35) to portray the infancy and youth of the traitor. What that appearance implies, however, is that he had previously declared himself a disciple. He was drawn, as the others were, by the preaching of the Baptist, or his own Messianic hopes, or the "gracious words" of the new teacher, to leave his former life, and to obey the call of the Prophet of Nazareth. What later and more selfish motives may have mingled even then with his faith and zeal, we can only judge by reasoning backward from the sequel. Gifts of some kind there must have been, rendering the choice of such a man not strange to others, not unfit in itself, and the function which he exercised afterwards among the Twelve may indicate what they were. The position of his name, uniformly the last in the lists of the Apostles in the Synoptic Gospels, is due, it may be imagined, to the infamy which afterwards rested on his name, but, prior to that guilt, it would seem that he took his place in the group of four which always stand last in order, as possessing neither the love, nor the faith, nor the devotion which marked the sons of Zebedee and Judah.
JUDAS ISCARIOT

The choice was not made, we must remember, without a provision of its issue. Jesus knew from the beginning...

He (John xix. 6), and the distinctiveness with which that Evangelist records the successive stages of the guilt of Judas, and his Master's discernment of it (John xii. 4, xiii. 27), leaves us with the impression that he too shrank instinctively (Bengel describes it as "singularis antipathia," Comm. V. T. on John vi. 64) from a nature so opposite to his own. We can hardly expect to solve the question why such a man was chosen for such an office. Either we must assume absolute fore-knowledge, and then content ourselves with saying with Calvin that the judgments of God are as a great deep, and with Ullmann (Sündigeleg. Jesu, p. 97) that he was chosen that the Divine purpose might be accomplished through him; or else with Neander (Leben Jesu, § 77) that there was a discernment of the latent germs of evil, such as belong to the Son of Man, in his insight into the hearts of men (John ii. 25; Matt. ix. 3; Mark xii. 15), yet not such as to exclude emotions of sudden sorrow or anger (Mark iii. 5), or astonishment (Mark vi. 6; Luke xii. 9), admitting the thought "with men this is impossible, but not with God." Did He in the depth of that insight, and in the fulness of his compassion, seek to over-come the evil which, if not conquered, would be so fatal? It gives, at any rate, a new meaning and force to many parts of our Lord's teaching, to remember that they must have been spoken in the hearing of Judas, and may have been designed to make him conscious of his danger. The warnings as to the impossibility of a service divided between God and Mammon (Matt. vi. 19-24), and the destructive power of the "cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches" (Matt. xiii. 22, 29), the pointed words that spoke of the guilt of unfaithfulness in the "malignant Mammon" (Luke xvi. 11), the proverb of the camel passing through the needle's eye (Mark x. 25), must have fallen on his heart as meant specially for him. He was among those who asked the question, Who then can be saved? (Mark x. 26). Of him, too, we may say, that, when he sinned, he was "kicking against the pricks," letting slip his call and election;

John vi. 70), indicate that even then, though the greed of immediate, or the hope of larger gain, kept him from "going back," as others did (John vi. 66), hatred was taking the place of love, and heading him on to a fiendish malignity.

In what way that evil was related, what discipline was applied to counteract it, has been hinted at above. The scene at Bethany (John xii. 1-9; Matt. xxvi. 6-13; Mark xiv. 3-9) showed how deeply the canker had eaten into his soul. The warm outpouring of love calls forth no sympathy. He utter's himself, and suggests to others, the complaint that it is a waste. Under the plea of caring for the poor he covers his own miserable theft.

The narrative of Matt. xxvi., Mark xiv. places this history in close connection (apparently in order of time) with the fact of the betrayal. It leaves the motives of the betrayer to conjecture (comp. Neander, Leben Jesu, § 294). The mere love of money may have been strong enough to make him clutch at the bribe offered him. He came, it may be, expecting more (Matt. xxvi. 15); he will take that. He has lost the chance of dealing with the three hundred denarii; it will be something to get the thirty shekels as his own. It may have been that he felt that his Master saw through his hidden guilt, and that he hastened on a crisis to avoid the shame of open detection. Mingled with this there may have been some feeling of vindictiveness, a vague, confused desire to show that he had power to stop the career of the teacher who had reproved him. Had the words that spoke of "the burial" of Jesus, and the lukewarmness of the people, and the conspiracies of the priests led him at last to see that the Messianic kingdom was not as the kingdoms of this world, and that his dream of power and wealth to be enjoyed in it was a delusion? (Ewalt, Gesch. Israels, v. 441-446). There may have been the thought that, after all, the betrayal could do no harm, that his Master would provide for the care of the poor, or by some supernatural manifestation effect his escape (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. p. 886, in Winer, and Whiston on Matt. xxvii. 4).

Another motive has been suggested (comp. Neander, Leben Jesu, §; and Whately, Essays on Dangers to Christian Faith, Discourse iii.) of an entirely different kind, altering altogether the character of the act. Not the love of money, nor the fear of disappointment, but policy, a subtle plan to force on the hour of the triumph of the Messianic kingdom, the belief that for this service he would receive as high a place as Peter, or James, or John; this it was that made him the traitor. If he could place his Master in a position, from which retreat would be impossible, where he would be compelled to throw himself on the people, and be raised by them to the throne of his father David, then he might look forward to being foremost and highest in that kingdom, with all his desires for wealth and power gratified to the full.
Ingenious as this hypothesis is, it fails for that very reason. It attributes to the Galilean peasant a subtlety in forecasting political combinations, and planning stratagems accordingly, which is hardly compatible with his character and learning, hardly consistent either with the pettiness of the faults into which he had hitherto fallen. Of the other motives that have been assigned we need not care to fix on any one, as that which singly led him on. Crime is for the most part the result of a hundred more or less bewilderings fury through the mind of the criminal.

During the days that intervened between the supper at Bethany and the 'Paschal or quasi-Paschal gathering, he appeared to have concealed his treachery. He went with the other disciples to and fro from Bethany to Jerusalem, and looked on the actual parable of the barren and condemned tree (Mark xviii. 20—24), and shed the vigils in Gethsemane (John xviii. 3). At the Last Supper he is present, looking forward to the consummation of his guilt as drawing nearer every hour. All is at first as if he were still faithful. He is admitted to the feast. His feet are washed, and for him there are the fearful words, "Ye are clean, but not all." He, it may be, receives the bread and the wine which were the pledges of the new covenant. Then he disclosing words which proved that his design was known. "One of you shall betray me." Others ask, in their sorrow and confusion, "Is it I?" He too must ask the same question, lest he should seem guilty (Matt. xxvi. 25). He alone hears the answer. John only, and through him Peter, and the traitor himself, understand the meaning of the act which pointed out that he was the guilty one (John xiii. 26). After this there comes on him that paroxysm and insanity of guilt as of one whose human soul was possessed by the Spirit of Evil — "Satan entered into him" (John xiii. 27). The words, "What thou doest, do quickly," come as a spur to drive him on. The other disciples see in them only a command which they interpret as connected with the work he had hitherto undertaken. Then he completes the sin from which even those words might have drawn him back, and he knows that garden in which his Master and his companions had so often rested after the weary work of the day. He comes, accompanied by a band of officers and servants (John xviii. 3), with the kiss which was probably the usual salutation of the disciples. The words of Jesus, calm and gentle as they were, showed that this was what embittered the treachery, and made the suffering it inflicted more acute (Luke xxiii. 48).

What followed in the confusion of that night the Gospels do not record. Not many students of the N. T. will follow Heumann and Archip. Whately (Essays on Doubters, i. e.) in the hypothesis that Judas was "the other disciple" that was known to the high-priest, and brought Peter in (comp. Meyer on John xviii. 15). It is probable, indeed, that he who had gone out with the high priest's officers should return with them to wait the issue of the trial. Then, when it was over, came the reaction. The fever of the crime passed away. There came back on him the recollection of the sinless righteousness of the Master he had wronged (Matt. xxvii. 5). He repented, and his guilt and all that had tempted him to it became hateful. He will get rid of the accursed thing, will transfer it back again to those who with it had lured him on to destruction. They mock and sneer at the tool whom they have used, and then there comes over him the horror of great darkness that precedes self-murder. He has owned his sin with "an exceeding bitter cry," but he dares not turn, with any hope of pardon, to the Master whom he has betrayed. He hurls the money, which the priests refused to take, into the sanctuary (Σατέρι) where they were assembled. For him there is no longer sacrifice or propitiation. He is "the son of perdition" (John xvii. 12). "He departed and went and hanged himself" (Matt. xxvii. 5). He went unto his own place" (Acts 1. 25).

We have in Acts i. another account of the circumstances of his death, which it is not easy to harmonize with that given by St. Matthew. There, in words which may have been spoken by St. Peter (Meyer, following the general consensus of interpreters), or may have been a parenthetical notice inserted by St. Luke (Calvin, Olshausen, and others), it is stated —

(1.) That, instead of throwing the money into the Temple, he bought (ερημοιον) a field with it.
(2.) That, instead of hanging himself, "falling headlong, and breaking his bowels" (Acts, in Matt. xxvii. 5. comp. also Theophanes, Hom. xxvii., in Sueton, Thes. 4. v. "Locus")

The words έρημοοιοιοι in St. Peter's speech convey to our minds, probably were meant to convey to those who heard them, the impression of some dark region in Gehenna. Lightfoot and Gill (in loc.) quote passages from rabbinical writers who find that meaning in the phrase, even in Gen. xxxii. 55, and Num. xxiv. 25. On the other hand it should be remembered that many interpreters reject that explanation (comp. Meyer, in loc.), and that one great Anglican divine (Hammond, Comment. on N. T. in loc.) enters a distinct protest against it.

a Comp. the remarks on this hypothesis, in which Whately followed (unconsciously perhaps) in the footsteps of Paulinus, in Erich u. Gruber's Ἀνθ. Εὐρυπλ. Σεβ. vol. v. art. "Judas." b The question whether Judas was a partaker of the Lord's Supper is encompassed with many difficulties, both dogmatic and harmonistic. The general consensus of patristic commentators gives an affirmative, that of modern critics a negative, answer. (Comp. Meyer, Comm. on John xiii. 38.)

c The combination of the narratives of the four Gospels is not without grave difficulties, for which harmonists and commentators may be consulted. We have given that which seems the most probable result.

d This passage has often been appealed to, as illustrating the difference between μητριακὰ and μητρακία. It is questionable, however, how far the N. T. writers were in fact following him (comp. Gruber, in loc.). Still more questionable is the notion above referred to, that St. Matthew describes his disappointment at a result so different from that which he had reckoned on.

It is characteristic of the wide, far-reaching sym pathy of Origen, that he suggests another motive for the suicide of Judas. Despairing of pardon in this life, he would rush on into the world of the dead, and there (μαθητὴς τοῦ Κυρίου καί δούλος) meet his Lord, and confess his guilt and ask for pardon (Tract. in Matt. xxxvii. 5. comp. also Theophanes, Hom. xxvii., in Sueton, Thes. 4. v. "Locus")

The words έρημοοιοιοι in St. Peter's speech convey to our minds, probably were meant to convey to those who heard them, the impression of some dark region in Gehenna. Lightfoot and Gill (in loc.) quote passages from rabbinical writers who find that meaning in the phrase, even in Gen. xxxii. 55, and Num. xxiv. 25. On the other hand it should be remembered that many interpreters reject that explanation (comp. Meyer, in loc.), and that one great Anglican divine (Hammond, Comment. on N. T. in loc.) enters a distinct protest against it.

a Meyer mentions some who reject the above explanation respecting έρημοοιοιοι, though he gives his own version to it.
It is, of course, easy to cut the knot, as Strauss and De Wette have done, by assuming one or both accounts to be spurious and legendary. Receiving both as authentic, we are yet led to the conclusion that the explanation is to be found in some unknown series of facts, of which we have but two fragmentary narratives. The solutions that have been suggested by commentators and harmonists are nothing more than exercises of ingenuity seeking to dovetail into each other portions of a dissected map which, for want of missing pieces, do not fit. Such as they are, it may be worth while to state the chief of them.

As to (1) it has been said that there is a kind of irony in St. Peter's words, "This was all he got." That which was bought with his money is spoken of as bought by him (Meyer in loc.).

As to (2) we have the explanations —

(a) That αὐθήμερον, in Matt. xxvii. 5, includes death by some sudden spasm of suffocation (συνίπτοντας περιφέρεις), such as might be caused by the overpowering mixture of poison, and that then came the fact described in the Acts (Snider, Thea. s. v. αὐθήμερον: Grotius, Hammond, Lightfoot, and others). By some this has even been connected with the name Iscariot, as implying a constitutional tendency to this disease (Gilli).

(b) That the work of suicide was but half accomplished, and that, the halter breaking, he fell (from a tree, in one tradition) across the road, and was mangled and crushed by the carts and wagons that passed over him. This explanation appears, with strange and horrible exaggerations, in the narrative of the martyrs, quoted by Eunomius on Acts i., and in Theophylact on Matt. xxvii.

As to (3) we have to choose between the alternatives —

(a) That there were two Acedabos. [Aceldama.]

(b) That the potter's field which the priests had bought was the same as that in which the traitor met so terrible a death.

The life of Judas has been represented here in the only light in which it is possible for us to look on it, as a human life, and therefore as one of temptation, struggle, freedom, responsibility. If another mode of speaking of it appears in the N. T., it is clearly an extension which implies that all happened as it had been decreed; that the guilt and the misery were parts of a Divine plan (John vi. 64, xiii. 18; Acts i. 16), we must yet remember that this is no single, exceptional instance. All human actions are dealt with in the same way. They appear at one moment separate, free, uncontrollable; at another they are links in a long chain of causes and effects, the beginning and the end of which are in the "thick darkness of God who is," or determined by an inevitable necessity. No adherence to a philosophical system frees men altogether from inconsistency in their language. In proportion as their minds are religious, and not philosophical, the transitions from one to the other will be frequent, abrupt, and startling.

With the exception of the stories already mentioned, there are but few traditions that gather round the name of Judas. It appears, however, in a strange, hardly intelligible way in the history of the wilder heresies of the second century. The sect of Gnostics, consistent in their inversion of all that Christians in general believed, was reported to have honored him as the only Apostle that was in possession of the true essence, to have made him the object of their worship, and to have had a Gospel bearing his name (comp. Neander, Church History, ii. 159, Eng. transl.; Iren. adv. Hær. i. 35; Tertull. de Pæst., c. 47). For the general literature connected with this subject, especially for monographs on the motives of Judas and the manner of his death, see Winer, Realency. For a full treatment of the questions of the relation in which his guilt stood to the life of Christ, comp. Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus, on the passages where Judas is mentioned, and in particular vol. vii. pp. 40-67, ibidem.

Question I. What was the character of Judas Iscariot?

A. What was his intellectual character?

(6) There are more signs in the Gospels that Judas had a strong and sturdy intellect than that some of the other disciples had. It may be surmised from John xii. 4-8 as compared with Matthew xxvi. 8-11 and Mark xiv. 7-11, that especially in financial affairs he had a marked influence upon his fellow apostles. He was appointed to supervise the funds, and disburse the charities of the retinue which accompanied the Messiah. At one time (Luke viii. 1-3) this retinue needed a careful, exact, and sharp-sighted treasurer. We may presume that Judas's intellectual fitness for this office was one reason for his appointment to it. Some (as Jodocus) have supposed that each of the disciples in his turn had the oversight of the money belonging to the retinue of Christ. But this more conjecture is adverse to the Biblical impression.

(6) Although the Gospels give us more intimations of shrewdness as characteristic of Judas than as characteristic of the other disciples, they do not imply that he had so extensive a reach of mind as some German theorists ascribe to him. According to these theorists he was so sharp-sighted as to reason in a manner like the following: —

"It may be inferred from certain words of the Master [Matthew xix. 28] that he will assume a temporal throne, and exalt his twelve apostles to be his twelve princes; it may be inferred from certain exhibitions of popular feeling [John xii. 17-18] that the masses of the Jews are now ready, and need only an impulse and occasion to enthrone him; the betrayal will put the Messiah into such a position that he must declare himself; the Jewish rulers will at once resist his pretensions, but the people will at once stand up for him, and under his leadership will overcome the rulers; the betrayal will thus be the means of introducing a new administration highly advantageous to the state, of expediting the royal glory of the Master, and the piously honored of the disciples; of pleasing by exalting the king, rather than of destroying by degrading him."

We do not know enough to deny outright that such a plan, or at least some parts of it, may have momentarily occurred to Judas; but the Gospels do not make upon us the impression of his having that kind of intellect which remains sternfaced in such a comprehensive plan.

B. What was the moral character of Judas?

(6) Some writers regard him as possessing a merely cold and calculating spirit insusceptible to the influences flowing from the virtues of the Messiah; as having full confidence in the superiority prevented. (See Neander’s Leben Jesu, p. 679 f. 4. April.) We are further apt to err in supposing that Judas must have had the inducing motive, or else a self-consistent system of motives for his treason. He seems to have had a spirit which was driven hither and thither by a tumult of emotions, some of which were at variance with others; to have been like a merchant on the eve of bankruptcy distracted with conflicting impul ses; to have been bewildered by the words and acts of Jesus; not to have known exactly what to expect; and indeed has been at last surprised (Meyer on Matt. xxvi. 14-16) that Jesus did not fill his adversaries and escape the crucifixion.

(n.) It has been supposed that Judas was animated, in a greater or less degree, by Jewish patriotism. He has been called by some “Ein braver Mann”; he has been thought by others to have combined certain selfish impulses with his patriotism and treachery. Jesus could not have made a mistake in selecting him as a disciple and bursar; therefore Judas must have been worthy of the selection. Mr. De Quincey, who thinks that Judas as the pursuer of the disciples had “the most of worldly wisdom, and was best acquainted with the temper of the times,” and could not “have made any gross blunder as to the wishes and secret designs of the populace in Jerusalem,” for “his official duty must have brought him every day into minute and circumstantial communication with an important order of men, namely, petty shop-keepers,” who “in all countries alike fulfills a great political function,”) supposes that Iscariot had reason to hope not only for the rising of the Jewish populace in behalf of the Messiah, but also perhaps for the ultimate aid of the Romans in defending him against the Jewish rulers. (See Thiel. Jesu, I. 147-177; see also above, Qest. L. A. (n.). But as the intellect of Judas fitted him for small though dexterous maneuvers rather than for adhering steadfastly to any great political scheme, so his heart was more ready to grasp some petty contracted strategem of selfishness, than to persevere in any large plan of patriotism. Besides, if he had engaged himself under the influence of the wide-reaching plan, he probably would not at last have summed up the history of it by the words which excluded the semblance of an apology: “I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood,” Matt. xxvii. 4: nor probably would the consideration Jesus has uttered against the “host” man, “the son of perdition,” those significant words, “Good were it for that man if he had never been born,” John xviii. 41; Matt. xxvi. 24; Mark xiv. 21: nor probably would Luke have characterized the thirty pieces of silver as “the reward of iniquity,” Acts i. 18, like Maham’s “wages of unrighteousness,” 2 Peter ii. 15; nor probably would Peter have applied to Judas those fearful predictions of the Psalms, Acts i. 16, 29, as Matthew applied the solemn words of Zechariah, Matt. xxii. 9, 11, nor would he have dissolved solitary motto, such an involuntary outflow of indignation against the traitor as appears in his gospel xii. 6, xiii. 27-30, xiv. 22 (see Meyer), vi. 70, 71; nor perhaps would the synoptists, in giving their catalogue of the Apostles, have uniformly placed at the foot of the list the name of “Judas Iscariot who also betrayed him,” Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 19; Luke vi. 15.

(c) It is a more plausible theory that Iscariot was impelled to his crime by a desire to avoid the shame of being so frequently and pointedly rebuked by the Messiah. Although he was willing to sell his kiss for thirty pieces of silver, yet he was a man, and must have had some wish to avoid the reprimands which were becoming more and more solemn and pointed.

(c.) Connected with the preceding was his desire to avert from himself the persecutions and other evils which were to come on the disciples. Even if, in his calculation of chances, he did sohe himself with the possibility of driving the Messiah up to the temple, he must have had a presentiment that the new kingdom must be speedily established. It appears far more probable that he was influenced by an aim to earn the gratitude of the Jews by delivering the Saviour to their custody, than by an aim to earn by hastening their elevation to thrones. Especially does it appear so, when we reflect that during the hours of the day preceding his formation of the traitorous purpose, he had probably heard, or heard of, those fearful words of Christ which portended violent changes in the Jewish state, and the troublous times of the Apostles (see Matt. xxiv. and xxx.; Mark xiii.; Luke xxi.; see also (e.) below).

(d) One of the motives which strengthened all the others for the treason was probably the traitor’s dissatisfaction with the principles of the new kingdom (Neander’s Leben Jesu, p. 679 f. He saw more and more distinctly, and the scene recorded in John xii. 1-9 confirmed him in the belief, that the spiritual kingdom would yield him but a meagre living. It was to require a habit of low self-denial, and was to be characterized by services to the poor. For these services he had no taste.

(e.) Mingled with his aversion to spiritual duty, was his vindictive spirit impelling him to work some undefined sort of injury to the Messiah. According to the most plausible hypothesis, he had been charmed by the fact that, although the almoner of the disciples, he yet had a lower place than Peter, James, and especially John in the esteem of his Master; his revenue, having been repeatedly inflamed by sults and censures, was at last assumed by him, and this generous woman applauded, at the feast of the union on the evening after Tuesday; stung by that disgrace, he formed his plan of the betrayal; he may not have determined the exact time of executing that plan, but having been still further irritated at the Paschal supper on the evening following Thursday, and having been goaded on by the mandate “what thou doest do quickly,” he did not sleep as the other disciples did on Thursday night, but then precipitated himself into his crime (Meyer and others suppose that he then formed his purpose of the crime). On Tuesday, during the saviour’s last visit to the Temple, the Jewish rulers had been violently incensed against him by the speeches recorded in Matt. xxi. and xxii., Mark xii., and Luke xx. On the evening after that day, when Judas was irritated by the remonstrances of his Master, he would naturally think of the Jews cut to the heart by the same reprover, and would be tempted to conspire with them against the author of these reprimands. This was the critical period for him to turn “State’s Evidence,” and to join hands with the Sanhedrim as Flate joined hands with Berosus.

(c.) Another of the motives working in the traitor’s mind was avarice. Three hundred denarii had been kept out of his purse two days before the betrayal (John xii. 1-9), and this needless loss intensi-fied his misery as well as retaliatory spirit. It has been objected (even by Neander) that he could not have been influenced by so small a reward as eighteen dollars. It is true that the words "eighteen dollars" in American coinage represent the value of thirty shekels of silver at the time of Josephus; but according to the American standard represent a far smaller amount of purchasing power than was repre-sented by the thirty silverings of Josephus. For obtaining this sum Judas did not regard one kiss as a very great work. Besides, an arrancious man is often more affected by a small gain than a large one. A little in the hand also is more attractive to him than much in the prospect. Even if he had endeavored to encourage or excuse himself by sudden gleams of hope that he would acquire wealth by expediting the Messianic reign, these fitful gleams could not relieve his prevailing expectation that the new reign would leave him poor; and thirty shekels of silver paid down were a surer good than the spiritual honors of the uncertain kingdom.

That in the tumultuous rush of his evil thoughts the traitor was under the special power of avarice, revealed by the spiritualliments of the Messiah's kingdom is intimated in Scriptures like the following: Luke xxii. 3; John vi. 12 and 70, xii. 6, xiii. 2, 10, 11, 27.

Question III. Why did Christ select and retain Judas as one of the Apostles?

We may consider the call of Judas as made by sex, and as made by God.

A. Regarding it as made merely by the sex, theologians have maintained, with more or less distinctness, the following theories:

\[ (a. ) \] At the first Christ understood the financial abilities, but not the thievish or treacherous ten-dencies of Iscariot. These were not discovered until they were developed in the passion week, or at least not until it was too late to eject him from the Saviour's family. The reasons for retaining were different from those for originally appointing him. This traitor could have been influenced by the expulsion, and would have precipitated the delivery of Jesus to his enemies before the full accomplish-ment of the Messianic work. "That Jesus knew from the beginning that Judas was a thoroughly bad man, and yet received him among the twelve is altogether impossible." Schenkel's Character of Jesus portrayed, vol. ii. p. 218; see also Ullmann's Staattheit Jesu, Sect. 3; Winer's Real-wörter, art. Judas.

\[ (b. ) \] From the first Christ was perfectly certain of the traitor's miserly and dishonest aims; but he knew the necessity of being delivered up to be cruci-fied; he must have some instrument for being given over to the power of his enemies: he singled out Judas as that instrument, and the discipleship as a convenience for that work.

\[ (c. ) \] A more plausible account than either of the proceeding is: The Messiah perceived Iscariot's business talents, economical habits and other to us unknown qualifications for the discipleship: he per-ceived also the disqualifications which were less prominent in Iscariot's earlier than in his later life. For they became more and more aggravated as the disciple hardened his heart in resisting the influence of the Master; when the appointment was made the other Apostles do not appear to have dis-persed the matter: they wondered at it, many to as unknown circumstances conspiring to justify it, while the Saviour knew the evil tendencies of Judas and ex-pected that these germs of iniquity would unfold themselves in embezzlement and treason (John ii. 25, vi. 64, 70; Matt. ix. 4: Mark ii. 8), still he encouraged in himself a hope that he might counteract those wrong proclivities, and that the world's spirit would be refined and elevated by the apostol-ic example of the other honors of it (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30), by the powers belonging to it (Luke xii. 19), by the personal instructions given to the occupants of it (especially such instructions as Matt. vi. 19-34, xiii. 22, 23; Mark viii. 36, x. 25; Luke xvi. 11), by the indefinable endearments of being "with Jesus" (Mark iii. 14 compared with Acts i. 17; Acts iv. 13; Phil. i. 23; Col. iii. 3, 4: I Thess. iv. 17; see Dr. N. F. Dar's Hours among the gospels, xxviii.), while the Saviour could not fully believe that his efforts would be successful in reforming the traitor, still he could not doubt that they would be successful in improving the character of other men—that the patience, forbearance, fortu-tude, caution, gentleness, persevering love mani-fested in his treatment of the pursue-bearer (as in washing the traitor's feet, and in giving him the sweetening of the sum, would be a useful example to the church, that his own character and his life be set off with more distinctness by its contrast with that of Judas—good contrasted with evil, moral strength amid physical weakness illustrated by moral weak-ness amid physical strength—and that such a con-fession as "I have betrayed the innocent blood" would retain through all time a marked historical importance, and would be a symbol of the triumph of virtue over vice. Could the liekeness have cherished any degree of anticipation Jesus might win Iscariot to a life of virtue, and at the same time have believed that he should not succeed? The human mind often cherishes a feasible expecta-tion of favorable results, and at the same time believes on the whole that the results will be un-favorable; makes unfruitful efforts for a good, and in one view of it faintly expects to succeed, but in another view of it fully anticipates a failure. Amid this conflict of hopes and fears, called by the lastmen spes impropria, one man "against hope believed in hope," Rom. iv. 18, and other men "against hope" have disbelieved and labored "in hope."

B. Regarding the call of Judas to the apostle-ship, as made by God, theologians have used it for a test of their speculations on the nature of moral government, etc. In reality there is no other kind of objection to the fact that the Most High in his providence allowed Judas to be one of the first preachers of the Gospel, than to the fact that he has in his providence allowed other unmitte men to be eminent preachers of it, or that he was allowed unworthy men to sit on the bench of justice, or to reign on the throne which, even although they were "ordained of God," they have tarnished. The mystery here is the old mystery of moral evil: see Oskansen on Matthew xxvii. 3-10. As men differ in their speculations in regard to the general sub-ject of sin and moral government, they differ, of course, in regard to the sin of Judas as related to that government.

\[ (n. ) \] Some maintain that Iscariot was called to his office on the ground of his constitutional fitness and without any prevision of his treason, sin being "altogether arbitrary and inconsequential," and thus incapable of being foreknown by any mind.

\[ (m. ) \] Others maintan that, his treason was fore-known, but was not included in the divine plan.
just as all other sin is said to be foreseen, but not predetermined; and just as many vile men are providentially called to occupy offices which it is foreseen they will disgrace.

(c) Others maintain that his treason was contemplated in the divine plan (as may be inferred from John xii. 18-26, Acts i. 16-20, Acts iv. 28; see Meyer on Matt. xxvi. 14-27, John vi. 70); but still the sin was included in this plan not directly, but incidentally; the plan was adopted not in any degree on account of the sin, but in despite of it, and Judas himself was appointed to his office not because the appointment was directly a good or a means of good, but because it was incidentally to the means of good which were directly predetermined.

(6) Others maintain, that the appointment and conduct of Judas were parts of the plan of God, just as directly as the movements of matter are parts of that plan. Of these divines, one class assigns various uses for which the appointment was designed, and these are all the uses which in fact result from it; another class regard the reasons for the appointment and interwoven in a mystery which does not admit an investigation.

QUESTION IV. — How can we reconcile the apparent discrepancies in the Biblical narratives of Judas?

A. One of these discrepancies relates to the manner of the betrayal. According to Matthew xxvi. 48-50, Mark xiv. 44-46, Luke xxi. 47, 48, the Saviour was pointed out to his captors by Judas tenderly embracing him. According to John xviii. 4-8 the Saviour came forward and voluntarily made himself known to the captors while Judas was standing with them. One of the various methods in which the two accounts may be harmonized, is the following: Judas had stipulated to designate the Messiah by a kiss; the Messiah, as soon as he saw his captors approaching, advanced to meet them: they, noticing his approach, halted (perhaps in amazement); Judas went forward, gave the significant embrace, returned, and stood with the captors: Jesus continued his walk toward them, and when sufficiently near, addressed them in the words cited by John. The fact of the kiss had been mentioned by the Synoptists, and had thus become generally known before John wrote; therefore he did not attribute to it. The fact of Christ's own voluntary approach of himself may not have been so generally known, therefore John made it prominent. (See Tholuck and Meyer on John xviii. 4-7.)

A less probable version is, that Judas, in order to fulfill his engagement, gave the promised sign after Jesus had announced himself. Another is, that the sign was given twice; at first was not observed (for it was night) by the captors, and was therefore given the second time.

B. The most important of the alleged discrepancies relate to the last developments of Judas.

It is said in Matthew xxvii. 6, 7, that the chief priests bought the Potter's Field; but it is said in Acts i. 18, that Judas bought it with the thirty silverlings. Among the various allowable methods of reconciling these passages, the following is adopted by the majority of the best interpreters: the word ἐξαγαγαν may denote not only "purchased," but also "caused to be purchased," "gave occasion for the purchase," and thus we glean from the two accounts the connected narrative that in consequence of Judas's treachery and the eighteen dollars obtained by it, the chief priests some time after his death purchased the Field of Blood. This field is sometimes thought to be the identical field on which Judas died. But we are not so informed by the Evangelists. The field which was purchased may have been on the Hill of Evil Council over the Valley of Hinnom, and it may have been called the Field of Blood for two reasons; first, it was purchased with "the price of blood;" secondly, with the money obtained from him "whose bloody end was so notorious" (Hackett's Comm. on Acts i. 19).

It is said in Matthew xxviii. 5, that Judas hanged himself; and Acts xii. 18 that he fell headlong into the midst, and all his bowels gushed out." Several of the terrible legends in regard to Judas have been suggested by these narratives; see Hofmann, Leben Jesu nach den Apostelgesch., § 77. We cannot affirm that there is a contradiction between the statements when there is a plausible hypothesis on which the two can be reconciled. There are several hypotheses on which these two statements can be harmonized. One of these hypotheses which is in striking uniformity with an old tradition, and is in itself so credible that some of the most decided rationalists (as Fritzsche) have adopted it in the main, is that Matthew describes the beginning, and Luke the end of the death-scene: that the traitor suspended himself on a bough which hung over a precipice, and the rope broke, or the bough broke, or some one, unwilling to have such a spectacle exhibited during the holy week, cut the rope or the bough, and the traitor fell with such physical results as Luke describes. Travellers in Palestine exploring the Valley of Hinnom have been impressed with the probability of this hypothesis; see especially Hackett's Illustrations of Scripture, pp. 294-298. No jury in the world would hesitate to adopt an hypothesis similar to the preceding for the reconciliation of two apparently conflicting testimonies given in court.

Partly on account of these imagined discrepancies, without any external evidence, however, not only by such critics as Strauss and Renan, but also by most conservative scholars, that either Matthew xxviii. 5-10, or else that Acts i. 18, 19, must be spurious. Prof. Norton (in his book on "The Evidence of the Gospels," pp. 438-441) gives the following among other reasons for rejecting Matthew xxviii. 3-10.

(1.) "At first view this account of Judas has the aspect of an interpolation. It is inserted so as to disjoin a narrative, the different parts of which, when it is removed, come together as if they had been originally united." But the same may be said of numerous passages not only in the Gospels, but also in the Old Testament.

(2.) "Whether it be or be not an interpolation, it is clearly not in a proper place." "As the account is now placed, it is said that in the morning Judas, was affected with bitter remorse, because he saw that Jesus was condemned; but no condemnation had yet been passed upon him by the Roman governor," etc. Some commentators (as Fritzsche) would here reply that the "condemnation" spoken of in Matt. xvii. 3, is the condemnation by the Sanhedrin, and this had taken place before Jesus was sent to Pilate, and before Judas repented; but the more plausible reply is that Matthew's narrative of the traitor's death is out of the historical order, and instead of being inserted between the

JUDE, OR JUDAS 1503

...and the 11th verses, should, for preserving the sequence of time, be inserted between the 30th and the 31st verses of his xxviith chapter; as John's narrative of the supper at Bethany is out of the historical order, and instead of being inserted between the 2d and 9th verses, should, for preserving the sequence of time, be inserted at the end of his 12th chapter. Deviations from the exact order of time are so frequent in the Biblical narratives as to warrant no suspicion that a paragraph thus deviating is spurious. Sometimes they are designed not for "tracings" but for historical explanations, as John's narrative of the meting (xiii. 3-10) may have been designed to explain the motive of Judas's treason, and prepare the reader for the otherwise unaccountable assertion in John xiii. 12 (see Question II. (c.) above).

(3.) The account of Matthew "represents Judas as having had an interview with the chief priests and the elders (that is, with the Sanhedrin) in the Temple," but Matthew "could not have described the Sanhedrin as holding a council in the house of Caiaphas, and proceeding thence to the house of Pilate, and also as being in the Temple, where Judas returned them their money," etc. To this some writers would reply, that the Sanhedrin condemned Jesus in the Temple which was the regular place for holding the assemblies of the council; and they condemned him early in the morning, "soon after five," etc., which St. John would naturally describe by ερρος, because "earlier than sunrise," ερρος, though much later than the dawn of the day, and therefore coincident with the time when preparations usually began for the morning sacrifice, and when the priests must necessarily be at the Temple (Greswell's 42d Dissertation). But the more plausible reply is that after Jesus had been condemned by the Roman governor, some, perhaps many, of the priests returned to the "inner court," or "holy place," of the Temple; and Judas, not being allowed to step within the "court of the priests," came to the entrance of it, and threw his silverings into it, perhaps upon the floor.

(4.) "In the conclusion of the account found in Matthew's Gospel there is an extraordinary misuse of a passage of Zechariah, which the writer professes to quote from Jeremiah," and the words of which are altogether inapplicable to the purpose for which they are cited in Matthew xxii.

In regard to the word Jeremiah used instead of Zechariah, some critics have supposed that it was an error not of Matthew but of the copist. There is no important external evidence for this supposition, and it may appear a singular attempt to save the genuineness of an entire paragraph by giving up the genuineness of one word in it. But while a mere date or proper name is obviously wrong, there is more reason for questioning its genuineness than there would be if the doubtful word were suggestive of a moral idea or religious sentiment. An accidental error is the more easily committed and overlooked where the copist is not guided by any impression on his heart. Dr. Henderson says:

Augustine mentions, that in his time some MSS. omitted the name of Ieropolito. It is also omitted in the Latin MS. of 1573; in the Syriac, which is the most ancient of all the Eastern versions in this passage, and in a Persic MS. in my possession, bearing date 1507; in the modern Greek; in the Verona and Vercelli Latin MSS., and in a Latin MS. of Luc Brug. The Greek MS. 22 reads Σαναδιου, as also do the Philoxenian Syriac in the margin, and an Arabic MS. quoted by Bengel. Origen and Eusebius were in favor of this reading." Prof. Henderson mentions the conjecture that "Ieropolito was written by some early copyist instead of Ζαναδιου, and thus the mistake of Jeremiah" for "Zechariah" was easily transmitted. See Henderson's Commentary on Zechariah, xi. 12, 13; also Robinson's Harmony, p. 227.

In regard to the propriety of the citation of Matthew from Zechariah we may remark, that the entire book from which the citation was made is one of the obscurest in the Bible, and our difficulties in determining its precise import should make us modest in asserting that the Evangelist has made a wrong use of it. It is not true, however, that we can discover no propriety in the quotation. Among the various methods of explaining it, one is the following: The prophet is speaking of himself as a type of Christ, and of his opposers as types of Christ's opposers. In this typical style he predicts the sufferings of Christ, and also the malice of Christ's opposers. As the chief priests and Judas were among the most conspicuous enemies of Christ, the prophet may be considered as typically referring in the most conspicuous manner to them. He describes himself as appraised by his foes at a "spickedy" (i.e. despicable) price, thirty pieces of silver (the sum paid for a common slave, Exodus xxii. 32), and this money was given to the potter for his field. The Evangelist, fixing his eye upon the salient points of the prophecy and quoting ad sensum rather than ad litteram, says that Jesus was appraised at the same contemptible price, and this was given to the potter for his field. The events described by Zechariah are thus typical and in this sense prophetical of the events described by Matthew. There is no more reason for regarding Matthew's quotation as spurious than for regarding many other quotations in the New Testament as such. This is a common style of the New Testament writers. Even De Wette in his old age conceded: "The entire Old Testament is a great prophecy, a great type of Him who was to come, and has come." — The typological comparison, also, of the Old Testament with the New was by no means a mere play of fancy; nor can it be regarded as altogether the result of accident, that the evangelical history, in the most important particulars, runs parallel with the Mosaic. (See the passage cited in Fairbairn's Typology, i. 34. See also pp. 342, 334.)

Another and kindred explanation of the passage is this: As Psalms lixx. 25 and cix. 8 contain prophecies of the generic or ideal righteous man of whom Christ is the prototype, so they contain prophecies of the generic or ideal unrighteous man of whom according to Acts i. 16-20 Judas is an antitype, and this prophecy of Zechariah may be interpreted as thus generic or ideal in its reference to the Messiah and his persecutors.

E. A. P.

JUDE, OR JUDAS, LEBBEUS AND THADDEUS ('Ioúdha Lebbéou: Judas Juscodi: A. V. "Judas the brother of James"), one of the Twelve Apostles; a member, together with his name, of the list of the persons in the procession of Alphus, and Simon Zeolates, of the last of the three sections of the apostolic body. The name Judas only, without any distinguishing mark, occurs in the lists given by St. Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13; and in John xiv. 22 (where we find "Judas not Iscariot")

JUDAS, THE LORD'S BROTHER

Among the Apostles, but the Apostle has been generally identified with "Lebbeus whose surname was Thaddæus" (λέββαιος ὁ ἀνεπνευματικός Θαδαίος), Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18, though Schleiermacher (Crit. Essay on St. Luke, p. 93) treats with scorn any such attempt to reconcile the lists. In both the last quoted places there is considerable variety of reading; some MSS. having both in St. Matt. and St. Mark λέββαιος, or Θαδαίος alone; others introducing the name Ιωάς or Judas Zebêtes in St. Matt., where the Vulgate reads Θαδαίου alone, which is adopted by Lachmann in his Berlin edition of 1832. This confusion is still further increased by the tradition preserved by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 13), where the name of Thomas the twin to Thaddæus was "Seventy" identified by Jerome in Matt. x. with "Judas Jacōbi" (Θαδαίου); as well as by the theories of modern scholars, who regard the "Levi" (Λευνίς τοῦ Ἀλφαίου) of Mark ii. 14, Luke vi. 27, who is called "Lebæus" (Λεββαίος). While the exegetical difficulties are as great as the identity of names with Thadæus, were three names for the same Apostle, who is therefore said by Jerome (in Matt. x. to have been "trinitymen," rather than introduce confusion into the apostolic catalogues, and render them erroneous either in excess or defect.

The interpretation of the names Lebbeus and Thadæus is a question best left with almost equal difficulty. The former is interpreted by Jerome "hasty," curadum, as from ἐκ, cur, and Thadæus has been erroneously supposed to have a cognate signification, homo peccator, as from the Syriac "πεκτος, pectus" (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 235).

Bengel; Matt. x. 3), the true signification of Ιωάς being aewma (Anglo. text), Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. 2565. Winer (Rechub. s. v.) would combine the two and interpret them as meaning Herodes. Another interpretation of Lebbeus is the young Ion (ιονικός) as from Νείβου, νείβος (Schleusner, s. v.), while Lightfoot and Baumg-Crusins would derive it from Lebor, a maritime town of Galilee mentioned by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 19), where, however, the ordinary reading is Ζῆλος. Thadæus appears in Syriac under the form Αζόλ, and Michaelis admits the idea that Αζόλ, Thadæus, and Judas, may be different representations of the same word (v. 770), and Wordsworth (Gr. Text. in Matt. x. 3) identifies Thadæus with Judas, both from Ιωάς, to "praise." Chrysostom, De Prod. Jud. i. c. 2, says that there was a "Judas Zebêtes" among the disciples of our Lord, whom he identifies with Judas the twin to Thomas. In the midst of these minor taints no decision can be arrived at, and all must rest on conjecture.

Much difference of opinion has also existed from the earliest times as to the right interpretation of the words Ιωάς λακδοβο. The generally received opinion is that there is an ellipse of the word λακδοβο, and that the A. V. is right in translating "Judas the brother of James." This is defended by Winer (Rechub. s. v.); Gramm. of N. T. Dict. (Clark's edition, i. 293), Arndt (Recher. Crit. sur l'Eph. de Jude), and accepted by Barbon, Allford, Tregelles, Michaelis, etc. This view has received strength from the belief that the "Epistle of Jude," the author of which expressly calls himself "brother of James," was the work of this Apostle. But if, as will be seen hereafter, the arguments in favor of a non-apostolic origin for this epistle are such as to lead us to assign it to another author, the mode of supplying the ellipse may be considered independently; and since the dependent genitive almost universally implies the filial relation, and is so interpreted in every other case in the apostolic catalogues, we may be allowed to follow the Pesbito and Arabic versions, the Benedictine editor of Chrysostom, Hom. XXXIII, in Matt. x. 2, and the translation of Luther, as well as nearly all the most eminent critical authorities, and render the words "Judas the son of James," is, either "Judas the son of Alphæus," with whom he is coupled, Matt. x. 3, or some otherwise unknown person.

The name of Jude only occurs once in the Gospel narrative (John xiv. 22), where we find him taking part in the last conversation with our Lord, and sharing the low temporal views of their Master's kingdom, entertained by his brother Apostles. Everything is certainly known of the later history of the Apostle. There may be some truth in the tradition which connects him with the foundation of the church at Edessa; though here again there is much confusion, and doubt is thrown over the account by its connection with the worthless fiction of "Algarus king of Edessa" (Euseb., H. E. ii. 17, Jerome, Comment. in Matt. x.) (Tadæus.).

Niceneus (H. E. ii. 40) makes Jude die a natural death in that city after preaching in Palestine, Syria, and Arabia. The Syrian tradition speaks of his abode at Edessa, but adds that he went thence to Assyria, and was martyred at Phoenicia on his return; while that of the west makes Persia the field of his labors and the scene of his martyrdom.

The tradition preserved by Hegesippus, which appears in Eusebius, relative to the descendants of Jude, has reference, in our opinion, to a different Jude. See next article. E. V.

JUDAS, THE LORD'S BROTHER.

Among the brethren of our Lord mentioned by the people of Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 5) occurs a "Judas," who has been sometimes identified with the Apostle of the same name; a theory which rests on the double assumption that "Judas Judæus" Thadæus is the Apostle, and that the twin to Thomas was the brother of James," and that "the sons of Alphæus" were "the brethren of our Lord," and is sufficiently refuted by the statement of St. John vi. 5, that "not even his brethren believed on him." It has been considered with more probability that he was the writer of the epistle which bears the name of "Jude the brother of James," to which the Syriac version incorporated with the later editions of the Peshito adds "and of James" (Origen in Matt. xxxii. 55; Clem. Alex. Adumb. 6; Allford, Gk. Text., Matt. xxxii. 55). [Jude, Epistle of James.]

Eusebius gives us an interesting tradition of Hegesippus (H. E. iii. 20, 32) that two grandsons of Jude, "who according to the flesh was called the Lord's brother," were born (i.e. 1 Cor. ix. 5), were educated and carried to Rome by orders of Domitian, whose apprehensions had been excited by what he had heard of the mighty power of the kingdom of Christ. But that the Emperor having discovered by their answers to his inquiries, and the appearance of their hands, that they were poor men, supporting them-

Jude, or Judas.
JUDE, EPISTLE OF

I. Its Authorship.—The writer of this epistle styles himself, ver. 1, "the brother of James" (ἀδελφός Ἰάκωβου), and has been usually identified with the Apostles Judas Lebaborus or Thaddaeus, called by St. Luke, vi. 16, ὁδειάς ἰακώβου, A. V. "Judas the brother of James." It has been seen above (Judas Leb.

Euc.roc) that this mode of supplying the ellipse, though not directly contrary to the usual conjectures, is, to say the least, questionable, and that there are strong reasons for regarding the words "Judas the son of James:" and inasmuch as the author appears, ver. 17, to distinguish himself from the Apostles, and bases his warning rather on their authority than on his own, we may agree with eminent critics in attributing the epistle to another author. Jerome, Tertullian, and Origen, among the ancients, and Calvin, Haunold, Humphrey, Lange, Vatablus, Arnaud, and Tregelles, among the moderns, agree in assigning it to the Apostle. Whether it were the work of an Apostle or not, it has from very early times been attributed to "the Lord's brother" of that name (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3): a view in which Origen, Jerome, and (if indeed the Adubamationes be rightly assigned to him) Clemens Alexandrinus agree; which is implied in the words of Chrysostom (Hom. 48 in Jesu.), confirmed by the epigraph of the Syrian version, and is accepted by most modern commentators, Arnaud, Bengel, Burton, Hug, Jessen, Olhausen, Tregelles, etc. The objection that has been felt by Neander (Pl. and Tr. i. 392), and others, that if he had been "the Lord's brother" he would have directly styled himself so, and not merely "the brother of James," has been anticipated by the author of the "Adubamationes" (Bunsen, Adum. Ante-Nic. i. 530), who says, "Jude, who wrote the Catholic Epistle, brother of the sons of Joseph, an extremely religious man, though he was aware of his relationship to the Lord, did not call himself His brother; but what said he? 'Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ,' as his Lord, but 'brother of James.'" We may easily believe that it was through humility, and a true sense of the altered relations between them and Him who had been declared to be the Son of God with power, . . . by the resurrection from the dead" (of 2 Cor. v. 18); that both St. Jude and St. James forbore to call themselves the brethren of Jesus. The arguments concerning the authorship of the epistle are ably summed up by Jessen (de Authent. Ep. Jud. Lips. 1821), and Arnaud (Recher. Critiq. sur l'Ep. de Jude, Strasb. 1851; transl. Brit. and For. Ev. Rec. Jud. 1850); and though it is by no means clear of difficulty, the most probable conclusion is that the author was Jude, one of the brethren of Jesus, and brother of James, not the Apostle the son of Alpheus, but the Bishop of Jerusalem, of whose dignity and authority in the church he avails himself to introduce his epistle to his readers.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF

II. Genuineness and Canonicity.—Although the Epistle of Jude is one of the so-called Antilegomena, and its canonicity was questioned in the earliest ages of the church, there never was any doubt of its genuineness among those by whom it was known. It was too unimportant to be a forgery; few portions of Holy Scripture could, with reverence be it spoken, have been more easily spured; and the question was never whether it was the work of an impostor, but whether its author was of sufficient weight to warrant its admission into the Canon.

This question was gradually decided in its favor, and the more widely it was known the more generally it was received as canonical, until it took its place without further dispute as a portion of the volume of Holy Scripture.

The state of the case as regards its reception by the church is briefly as follows:—

It is wanting in the Peshito (which of itself proves that the supposed Evangelist of Edessa could not have been its author), nor is there any trace of its use by the Asiatic churches up to the commencement of the 4th century; but it is quoted as apostolic by Ephrem Syrus (Opp. Syr. i. p. 136).

The earliest notice of the epistle is in the famous Muratorian Fragment (circa A. D. 170) where we read "Epistola sive Jude et superscripti Johannis capititer" (Bunsen, Auct. Ante-Nic. i. 152, reads "Catholicis") "halentur."

Clement of Alexandria is the first father of the church by whom it is recognized (Pothag. l. iii. c. 8, p. 239, ed. Syria; Strumn. l. iii. c. 2, p. 431, Adub. l. c.). Eusebius also informs us (H. E. vi. 14) that it was among the books of Canonical Scripture, of which explanations were given in the Hypotyposes of Clement; and Cassiodorus (Bunsen, Auct. Ante-Nic. i. 390-394) gives some notes on this epistle drawn from the same sources.

Origen refers to it expressly as the work of the Lord's brother (Comment. in Matt. xiii. 55, 56, t. x. § 17): "Jude wrote an epistle of but few verses, yet filled with vigorous words of heavenly grace." He quotes it several times (Homil. in Gen. xxiii.; in Jos. viii.; in Eccles. iv.; Comment. in Matt. l. xiii. 27, xx. 27, xvii. 30; in Johann. l. xii. § 57; in Mark. l. iii. § 6, v. § 1; De Præcip. l. iii. c. 2, § 1), though he is in some places of doubt as to its canonicity, "if indeed the Epistle of Jude be received" (Comment. in Matt. xxii. 23, t. xvii. § 30).

Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25) distinctly classes it with the Antilegomena, which were nevertheless recognized by the majority of Christians; and asserts (ii. 23) that, in common with the Epistle of James, it was "deemed spurious" (ποθετεσται), though together with the other Catholic Epistles publicly read in most churches.

Of the Latin Fathers, Tertullian once expressly cites this epistle as the work of an Apostle (de Hab. Malchis. l. 3), as does Jerome. "from whom (Enoch) the Apostle Jude in his epistle has given a quotation" (in Tit. c. h. p. 708), though on the other hand he informs us that in consequence of the quotation from this apocryphal book of Enoch it is rejected by most, adding that "it has obtained such authority from antiquity and use, that it is now reckoned among Holy Scripture" (Catal. Scrip. Eccles.). He refers to it as the work of an Apostle (Epist. ad Paulin. iii. 3).

The epistle is also quoted by Malchon, a presbyter of Antioch, in a letter to the bishops of Alexandria and Rome (Enoseh. H. E. vii. 30), and by Paradise the period of Chrysostom (Chrys. Opy.
JUDE, EPISODE OF

t. viii., Did. ec. 18, 20), and is contained in the Laodicean (A. v. 363), Carthagian (397), and so-called Apostolic Catalogues, as well as in those emanating from the churches of the East and West, with the exception of the Synopsis of Chrysostom,
and those of Cassiodorus and Eled Jesus.

Various reasons might be assigned for delay in receiving this epistle, and the doubts long prevalent respecting it. The uncertainty as to its author, and its standing in the church, the unimportant nature of its contents, and their almost absolute identity with 2 Pet. ii., and the supposed quotation of apocryphal books, would all tend to create a prejudice against it, which could be only overcome by time, and the gradual recognition by the leading churches of its genuineness and canonicity.

At the Reformation the doubts on the canonical authority of this epistle were revived, and have been shared in by modern commentators. They were more or less entertained by Grotius, Luther, Calvin, Berenger, Bolen, Pahl, Michaels, and the Magdeburg Centurarians. It has been ably defended

III. Time and Place of Writing.—Here all is conjecture. The author being not absolutely certain, there are no external grounds for deciding the point; and the internal evidence is but small. The question of its date is connected with that of its relation to 2 Peter (see below, § vi.), and an earlier or later period has been assigned to it according as it has been considered to have been anterior or posterior to that epistle. From the character of the errors against which it is directed, it cannot be placed very early: though there is no sufficient ground for Schleiermacher’s opinion that “in the last time” (2 Pet. iii. 3, 18; cf. 1 John ii. 18, τῇ ἐκα tέρα ἡμῶν) symbolises our placing it in the apostolic age at all. Larner places it between A. D. 64 and 66, Davidson before A. D.
70, Cremer A. D. 80, Calmet, Estius, Witsius, and Xenander, after the death of all the Apostles but John, and perhaps after the fall of Jerusalem;
although considerable weight is to be given to the argument of DeWette (Einl. in N. T. p. 300), that if the destruction of Jerusalem had already taken place, some warning would have been drawn from so signal an instance of God’s vengeance on the ungodly.

There are no data from which to determine the place of writing. Burton however, is of opinion that inasmuch as the descendants of “Judas the brother of the Lord,” if we identify him with the author of the epistle, were found in Palestine, he probably lived and ministered from his native country, and that the epistle was published there, since he styles himself “the brother of James,” “an expression not likely to be used in a country where James was well known” (Eccles.
Hist. i. 334).

IV. For what Readers designed.—The readers are nowhere expressly defined. The address (ver.
1) is applicable to Christians generally, and there is nothing in the character of the epistle to limit its reference; and though it is not improbable that the author had a particular portion of the church in view, and that the Christians of Palestine were the immediate objects of his warning, the dangers described were such as the whole Christian world was exposed to, and the adversaries the same which had eyet has to be guarded against.

V. Its Object, Contents, and Style.—The object of the Epistle is plainly enough announced, ver. 3:
“it was needful for me to write unto you and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints:” the reason for this exhortation is given ver. 4, in the stealthy introduction of certain ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God and our Lord Jesus Christ.” The remainder of the epistle is almost entirely occupied by a minute depicition of these adversaries of the faith — not merely teachers (as has been sometimes supposed), which constitutes a marked distinction between this epistle and that of St. Peter — whom in a torrent of impasioned invective he describes as stained with unnatural lusts, like “the angels that kept not their first estate” (whom he evidently identifies with the “sons of God,” Gen. vi. 2), and the inhabitants of Solomon and Gomerah — as despisers of all legiti-mate authority (ver. 8) — murderers like Cain — covetous like Balaam — rebellious like Korah (ver.
11) — destined from of old to be signal monuments of the Divine vengeance, which he confirms by reference to a prophecy current among the Jews, and traditionally assigned to Enoch (vv. 14, 15).

The epistle closes by briefly reminding the readers of the oft-repeated prediction of the Apostles
— among whom the writer seems not to rank himself — that the faith would be assailed by certain enemies as he has depicted (vv. 17-19), exhorting them to maintain their own steadfastness in the faith (vv. 20, 21), while they earnestly sought to rescue others from the corrupt example of those lucrative livers (vv. 22, 23), and commending them to the power of God in language which forcibly recalls the closing benediction of the epistle

This epistle presents one peculiarity, which, as we learn from St. Jerome, caused its authority to be impeached in very early times — the supposed citation of apocryphal writings (vv. 9, 14, 15).

The former of these passages, containing the reference to the context of the archangel Michael and the Devil “about the body of Moses,” was supposed by Origen to have been founded on a Jewish work called the “Ascension of Moses” (shown quoted also by Eusebius (ib. 629). Origen’s words are express, “which little work the Apostle Jude has made mention of in his epistle” (de Principi. iii. 2, i. 138); and some have sought to identify the book with the πνευμάτων, οὐ τῆς θανάτου τοῦ Μωϋσέως.”
This is, however, proved by Michaelis (iv. 382) to be a modern composition. Attempts have also been made by Larner, Macknight, Vitringa, and others, to interpret the passage in a mystical sense, by reference to Zech. iii. 1, 2; but the similarity is too distant to afford any weight to the idea. There is, on the whole, little question that the writer here making use of a Jewish tradition, based on Pent. xxxiv. 6, just as facts unrecorded in Scripture are referred to by St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8; gal. iii. 19): by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ii. 2, xi. 21); by St. James (v. 17), and

As regards the supposed quotation from the Book of Enoch, the question is not so clear whether St. Jude is making a citation from a work already in the hands of his readers — which is the opinion of Jerome (l. c.) and Tertullian (who was in connection with the Church of Rome).
JUDE, EPISTLE OF

quency inclined to receive the Book of Enoch as canonical Scripture, and has been held by many modern critics — or is employing a traditionary prophecy not at that time committed to writing (a theory which has been propounded, "Enoch prophesied " אֶרֶץ יְבְנֵי־אֲדֹנָי " וַיִּשָׁבֵד אֶלֶף אֵלֶּה " 'אָבִי אֲנָשִׁים) rather to favor), but afterwards embodied in the apocryphal work already named [Enoch, the Book of]. This is maintained by Tregelles (Horne's Introd. 10th ed., iv. 621), and has been held by Cave, Hofmann (Schriftbeweise, i. 420), Lightfoot (ii. 117), Witsius, and Calvin (cf. Jerom. Comment. in Epph. c. v. p. 647, 648; in Tit. c. 1, p. 54).

The main body of the epistle is well characterized by Alfred (Gr. Test. iv. 147) as an impassioned invective, in the imperious whirlwind of which the writer is hurried along, collecting example after example of Divine vengeance on the ungodly; leaping epithet upon epithet, and piling image upon image, and as it were laboring for words and images strong enough to depict the polluted character of the apostates against whom he is warning the church; returning again and again to the subject, as though all language was insufficient to give an adequate idea of their profligacy, and to express his burning hatred of their perversion of the doctrines of the Gospel.

The epistle is said by DeWette (Einleit. in N. T. p. 300) to be tolerably good Greek, though there are some peculiarities of diction which have led Schmidt (Einleit. i. 314) and Bertholdt (vi. 3194) to imagine an Aramaic original.

VI. Relation between the Epistles of Jude and 2 Peter. — It is familiar to all that the larger portion of this epistle (ver. 3-16) is almost identical in language and subject with a part of the Second Epistle of Peter (2 Pet. ii. 1-19). In both, the heretical enemies of the Gospel are described in terms so similar as to preclude all idea of entire independence. This question is examined in the article Peter, Second Epistle of.

As might be expected from the comparatively unimportant character of the epistle, critical and exegetical editions of it have not been numerous. We may specify Arnaud, Recherches Crit. sur l'Epître de Jude, Strass. and Par. 1851; Laumann, Not. Crit. et Comment. in Ep. Jud., Groninge, 1813; Scharling, Jacob. et Jud. Ep. Cathol. comment., Hauvие, 1841; Stier, On the Epistles of James and Jude; Herder, Briefe. etc. Bruder Jesu, Lemgo, 1775; Angusti, Wielcker, Benson, and Macknight, on the Catholic Epistles. E. V.

* It is impossible in a limited space to discuss the relations between this epistle and the Second of St. Peter; but it may be assumed that an attentive consideration of them will show that the two epistles could not have been written independently. Less certain, and yet probable, is the conclusion that the Epistle of St. Jude was the earlier of the two. If this be accepted, then the date of the death of St. Peter in A. D. 68 becomes a fixed point in determining the date of the Epistle of St. Jude, and the question of date is thus brought within narrow limits, as the whole contents of the epistle prove it to have been comparatively late.

It is extremely unlikely that two epistles so similar and so nearly of the same date should have been addressed primarily to the same readers. It may therefore be argued negatively that the Epistle of St. Jude was not first sent to the Christians of Asia Minor. As the earliest testimony to the epistle comes from Alexandria, it has been suggested that Egypt may have been the original destination of the epistle.

The expression in the first paragraph of section V., in the preceding article, "these adversaries of the faith — not heretical teachers (as has been sometimes supposed) which constitutes a marked distinction between this epistle and that of St. Peter" — is not easily understood in connection with the statement in VI., "In both the heretical enemies of the Gospel are described in terms so similar as to preclude all idea of entire independence." Certainly the terms in both epistles are quite similar, and must refer to the same class of persons. It is plain enough that they were persons within the church; "men crept in unawares" (Jude 4), "spots in your feast of charity, when they feast with you" (12). St. Peter expressly calls them teachers (ii. 1); St. Jude describes their teaching and its effects.

The analysis of the epistle may be given somewhat more fully, since notwithstanding its warmth and gravity it is most thoroughly planned and fully arranged. After the salutation (1, 2), and the reason for writing (3, 4), follows an argument for the certain punishment of the ungodly from a series of historical examples (5, 6, 7). The application of this is made in the following verse, and then, in contrast, an example is given of godly conduct (9) and a further application (10). After this follows a denunciation of the ungodly by a series of examples (11), and by five comparisons (12, 13). The certain punishment of the ungodly is then further shown by prophecy; first, the prophecy of Enoch, as the most ancient possible, and its application (14-16), then as the most recent, thus showing perfect accord in all time, the prophecy of the Apostles, with its application (17-19). This concludes the argumentative part of the epistle, and then follows an exhortation to the faithful, (a.) in regard to their own spiritual warfare (20, 21), and (b.) in regard to those corrupted by the ungodly (22, 23). The epistle closes with a benediction (24) and doxology (25).

There is nothing in the epistle to indicate that the author identified "the angels that kept not their first estate" (6) with the "sons of God" mentioned in Gen. vi. 2. This was an interpretation current in the church of the second century; but the sin of the angels here mentioned must have occurred before man was placed upon the earth.

In regard to the quotation from Enoch, the remark above made, that it does not appear that St. Jude quoted from any book, is very just. It is certain that he could not have made use of our present "book of Enoch," as that work bears decisive internal evidence of not having been written before the middle of the second century. In the article Enoch, the book of; a great variety of opinions will be found given on this matter. The only ground however, on which it seems possible to assign an earlier date to this volume than to the writings of the New Testament, is that of its having been subsequently largely altered and interpolated — a supposition which makes it to have been originally a different book from that which we now have. Without denying the possibility of there having been another more ancient "book of Enoch," from which our present has been drawn, it is sufficient to say that such a supposition deprives it of all interest in the present connection, and it remains that St. Jude could not have quoted from the book as we now have it. Such suppositions however, are always cumbersome, useless, and unsatisfactory, in the al-sense of any proof and it is far more reasonable to be guided by the ordinary means of evidence to consider the whole book as a forgery of the second century — a period when works of this character abounded.

* JUDEA. [Judea.]

* JUDETH. [Judith, 2.]

JUDGES. The administration of justice in all early eastern nations, as amongst the Arabs of the desert to this day, rests with the patriarchal seniors;* the judges being the heads of tribes, or of chief houses in a tribe. Such from their elevated position would have the requisite leisure, would be able to make their decisions respected, and through the wider intercourse of superior station would decide with fuller experience and riper reflection. Thus in the book of Job (xxix. 7, 8, 9) the patriarchal magistrates are represented as going forth "to the gate" amidst the respectful silence of elders, princes, and nobles (comp. xxxii. 9). The actual chieftains of individual tribes are mentioned on various occasions. The last notice of the time of David is that his service in the commonwealth (Num. vii. 2, 10, 11, xvii, 6, or 17 in Heb. text: xxxiv. 18; Josh. xxii. 14, so perh. Num. xvi. 2, xxii. 18). Whether the princes of the tribes mentioned in 1 Chr. xxvi. 16, xxvii. 1, are patriarchal heads, or merely chief men appointed by the king to govern, is not strictly certain; but it would be foreign to all ancient eastern analogy to suppose that they preferred the judicial prerogative, until reduced and overshadowed by the monarchy, which in David’s time is contrary to the tenor of history. During the oppression of Egypt the ascendant people would necessarily have few questions at law to plead; and the Egyptian magistrate would take cognizance of theft, violence, and other matters of police. Yet the question put to Moses shows that a “prince and a judge” were connected even then in the popular idea (Ex. ii. 14; comp. Num. xvi. 19). When they emerged from this oppression into national existence, the want of a machinery of judicature began to press. The patriarchal seniors did not instantly assume the function, having probably been depressed by bondage till rendered unfit for it, not having become experienced in such matters, nor having secured the confidence of their tribesmen. Perhaps for the reasons Moses at first took the whole burden of judicature upon himself, then at the suggestion of Jethro (Ex. xviii. 14-24) instituted judges over numerically graduated sections of the people. These were chosen for their moral fitness, but from Deut. i. 15, 16, we may infer that they were taken from amongst those to whom primogeniture would have assigned it. Save in offenses of public magnitude, criminal cases were not yet to be have been adjudged from civil. In the duty of teaching the people the knowledge of the law which pertained to the Levites, doubtless included such instruction as would assist the judgment of those who were thus to decide according to it. The Levites were thus the ultimate sources of ordinary jurisprudence, and perhaps the “teaching” aforesaid may merely mean the expounding the law as applicable to difficult cases arising in practice. Beyond this, it is not possible to indicate any division of the provinces of deciding on points of law as distinct from points of fact. The judges mentioned as standing before Joshua in the great assemblies of the people must be understood as the successors to those chosen by Moses, and had doubtless been elected with Joshua's sanction from among the same general class of patriarchal seniors (Josh. iv. 2, 4, xii. 14, xxiv. 1).

The judge was reckoned a sacred person, and secured even from verbal injuries. Seeking a decision at law is called "inquiring of God" (Ex. xvii. 15). The term "gods" is actually applied to judges (Ex. xx. 6; comp. Ps. lxxxii. 1, 6). The judge was told, "thou shalt not be afraid of the face of men, for the judgment is (God's);" and thus, whilst human instrumentalities was indispensability, the source of justice was upheld as divine, and the purity of its administration only sunk with the decline of religious feeling. In this spirit speaks Ps. lxxxi., —a lofty charge addressed to all who judge: comp. the qualities regarded as essential at the institution of the office, Exx. xvii. 21, and the strict admonition of Deut. xvi. 18-20. But besides the sacred dignity thus given to the only royal function, which, under the Theocracy, lay in human hands, it was undeniably popularly vested in those who led public feeling, and its importance in the public eye appears from such passages as Ps. lxxix. 12 (comp. cxxx. 23), lxxxi., cxxxviii. 11; Prov. viii. 15, xxxi. 4, 5, 23. There could have been no considerable need for the legal studies and expositions of the Levites during the wanderings in the wilderness while Moses was alive to solve all questions, and while the law which they were to expound was not wholly delivered. The Levites, too, had a charge of cattle to look after in that wilderness like the rest, and seem to have acted also, being Moses' own tribe, as supports to his executive authority. But then few of the greater entanglements of property could arise before the people were settled in their possession of Canaan. Thus they were disciplined in smaller matters, and under Moses' own eye, for greater ones. When, however, the community had been indeniyed, the elders shone the in all thy gates." (Deut. xvi. 18), came to be fulfilled in Canaan, there were the following sources from which those officials might be supplied: 1st, the ex officio judges, or their successors, as chosen by Moses; 2dly, any surplus left of patriarchal seniors when they were taken out (as has been shown from Deut. i. 15, 16) from that class; and 3dly, the Levites. On what principle the non-Liturgical judges were chosen after Divine supervision tendence was interrupted at Joshua's death is not clear. A simple way would have been for the existing judges in every town, etc., to choose their own colleagues, as vacancies fell, from among the limited number of persons who, being heads of families, were competent. Generally speaking, the reputation for superior wealth, as some guarantee against the introduction of corruption, would have been a choice of a judge, and, taken in connection with personal qualities, would tend to limit the choice to probably a very few persons in practice. The suggestion that judicature will always be provided for is carried through all the books of the Law (see Ex. xxi. 6, xxii. 19; Lev. xix. 15; Num. xxxv. 24; Deut. i. 16, xvi. 18, xxxv. 1). And all that we know of the facts of later history confirms the suggestion. The Hebrews were sensitive as regards the administration of justice; nor is the free spirit of their early commonwealth in anything more manifest than in the resentment which followed the verbal or partial judge. The fact that justice reposed on a popular basis of administration largely contributed to keep up this spirit of independence, which is the ultimate check on all perversions of the tribunal. The popular aristocracy of heads of tribes, sections of tribes, or families, is found to fall into two main orders of varying nomenclature, and rose from the opus consil, or more citizens, upwards. The more common name for the higher order is "princes," and for the lower, "elders" (Judg. viii. 14; Ex. xii. 14; Job xxix. 7, 8, 9; Ezr x. 8). These orders were the popular element of judicature. On the other hand the Levitical body was imbued with a keen sense of allegiance to God as the Author of Law: and to the Covenant as his embodiment of it, and somehow involved whatever forensic experience and erudition those simple times could yield: hence they brought to the judicial task the legal acumen and sense of general principles which complemented the ruder lay element. Thus the Hebrews really enjoyed much of the virtue of a system which allots separate provinces to judge and jury, although we cannot trace any such line of separation in their functions, save in so far as has been indicated above. To return to the first or popular branch, there is reason to think, from the general concurrence of phraseology amidst much diversity, that in every city these two ranks of "princes" and "elders" had their analogues, and that a variable number of heads of families and groups of families, in two ranks, were popularly recognized, whether with or without any form of election, as charged with the duty of administering justice. Suceoth c (Judg. viii. 14) may be taken

• This term is used for want of a better; but as regards privileges of race, the tribe of Levi and house of Aaron were the only aristocracy, and these, by their pravity as regards holding lands, were an aristocracy very unlike what has usually been by that name.

b A number of words — e. g. ἴνις, ἴς, ἴς, ἴς and (especially in the book of Job) ἴς — are sometimes rendered "prince" in the A. V.; the first most nearly uniform so, which seems designative of the more eminent of high birth or position; the next, ἴς, ἴς, expresses active and official authority. Yet as the ἴς was most likely, nay, in the earlier annals, certain, to be the ἴς, we must be careful of excluding from the person called by the one title the qualities denoted by the other. Of the two remaining

• This is the base of Ex. xviii. and Deut. i. 16, strongly suggests that 70 + 7 were the actual components; although they are spoken of rather as regards functions of ruling generally than of judging specially, yet we need not separate the two, as is clear from Deut. i. 16. Such division of labor assurely found little place in primitive times. No doubt these men presided in the gate. The number of Jacob's family (with which Suceoth was traditionally connected, Gen. xxxiii. 17) marks upon the first thirteen, contained in the book of Judges, are made in the following article. The chronology of this period is discussed under CHRONOLOGY (vol. i. pp. 444).

This function of the priesthood, being, it may be presumed, in abeyance during the period of the judges, seems to have merged in the monarchy.

The example of Samuel and Abin delayed the assertion of the external title to allow civil matters much prominence. Hence of his only two recorded judicial acts, the one (1 Sam. xi. 13) was the mere remission of a penalty popularly demanded; the other the pronouncing of a sentence (ibid. xiv. 44, 45) which, if it was sincerely intended, was overruled in turn by the right sense of the people.

In David’s reign it was evidently the rule for the king to hear causes in person, and not merely be passively, or even by deputy (though this might also be included), the “fountain of justice” to his people. For this purpose, perhaps, it was prospectively ordained that the king should “write him a copy of the Law,” and “read therein all the days of his life” (Deut. xvii. 18, 19). The same class of cases which were reserved for Moses would probably fail to his lot; and the high-priest was of course ready to assist the monarch. It is further presumed from the fact that no officer analogous to a chief justice ever appears under the kings. It has been supposed that the subjection of all Israel to David’s sway caused an influx of such cases, and that advantage was artfully taken of this by Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 1–4); but the rate at which cases were disposed of can hardly have been slower among the ten tribes after David had become their king, than it was during the previous anarchy. It is more probable that during David’s uniformly successful wars wealth and population increased rapidly, and civil cases multiplied faster than the king, occupied with war, could attend to them, especially when the summary process customary in the East is considered. Perhaps the arrangements, mentioned in 1 Chr. xxiii. 4, xxv. 29 (comp. v. 52), under which twenty special judges, called Levites, were appointed to act as “officers and judges,” and amongst them specially “Chena and his sons:” with others, for the trans-Jordanic tribes, may have been made to meet the need of suitors. In Solomon’s character, whose reign of peace would surely be fertile in civil questions, the “wisdom to judge” was the fitting first quality (1 K. iii. 19; comp. Ps. lxxii. 1–4). As a judge Solomon shines “in all his glory” (1 K. iii. 16, 17). No criminal was too powerful for his justice, as some had been for his father’s (2 Sam. iii. 39; 1 K. ii. 5, 6, 33, 54). The examples of direct royal exercise of judicial authority are 2 Sam. i. 15, iv. 9–12, where sentence is summarily executed, and on the supposed case of 2 Sam. xiv. 1–21.

as an example. Evidently the ex officio judges of Moses’ choice would have left their successors when the tribe of Gad, to which Succoth pertained (Josh. xiii. 27), settled in its territory and towns: and what would be more simple than that the whole number of judges in that tribe should be allotted to its towns in proportion to their size? As such judges, they were hence by theology, they would fall into their natural places, and symmetry would be preserved. The Levites also were apportioned on the whole equally among the tribes; and if they preserved their limits, there were probably few parts of Palestine beyond a day’s journey from a Levitical city.

One great hold which the priesthood had, in their jurisdiction, upon men’s ordinary life was the custody in the Sanctuary of the standard weights and measures, to which, in cases of dispute, reference was doubtless made. It is, however, reasonable to suppose that in most towns sufficiently exact models of them for all ordinary questions would be kept, since to refer to the Sanctuary at Shiloh, Jerusalem, etc., in every case of dispute between dealers would be nugatory (Ex. xxx. 13; Num. iii. 47; Ex. xiv. 12). Above all these, the high-priest in the antecedent period was not in short of weight in difficult cases (Deut. xvii. 12), as the chief jurist of the nation, and who would in case of need be perhaps unequally directed; yet we hear of none acting as judge save Eli; nor is any judicial act recorded of him; though perhaps his not restraining his sons is meant to be noticed as a failure in his judicial duties. Now the judicial authority of any such supreme tribunal must have wholly lapsed at the time of the events recorded in Judges. It is also a part of some weight, negatively, that none of the special deliverers called judges of the judicial lineage, or even became as much noted as Deborah, a woman. This seems to show that any central action of the high-priest on national unity was null, and of this supremacy, had it existed in force, the judicial prerogative was the main element. Difficult cases would include cases of appeal, and we may presume, that save so far as the authority of those special deliverers made itself felt, there was no judge in the last resort from Joab to Samuel. Indeed the current phrase of those deliverers that they “judged” Israel during their term, shows which branch of their authority was most in request, and the demand of the people for a king was, in the first instance, that he might “judge them,” rather than that he might “fight their battles” (1 Sam. viii. 5, 29).

The denunciation of 2 Sam. xii. 5 6. is, though not formally judicial, yet in the same spirit. Solomon similarly proceeded in the cases of Joab and Shimel (1 K. ii. 34, 46; comp. 2 K. xiv. 5, 6). It is likely that royalty in Israel was ultimately unfavorable to the local independence connected with the practice of justice in private persons; and whereas the Levites were in the territory and cities of each tribe. The tendency of the monarchy was doubtless to centralize, and we read of large numbers of king's officers appointed to this and cognate duties (1 Chr. xxiii. 4, xxvi. 29-32). If the general machinery of justice had been, as is reasonable to think, deranged or retarded during a period of anarchy, the Levites afforded the fittest materials for its reconstitution. Being to some extent detached, both locally, and by special duties, exemptions, etc., from the mass of the population, they were more easily brought to the steady routine which justice requires, and, what is no less important, were, in case of neglect of duty, more at the mercy of the king (as shown in the case of the priests at Nob, 1 Sam. xxi. 17). Hence it is probable that the Levites generally superseded the local elders in the administration of justice. But subsequently, when the Levites withdrew from the kingship of the ten tribes, judicial elders probably again filled the gap. Thus they conducted the mock trial of Naboth (1 K. xxi. 8-13). There is in 2 Chr. xix. 5, 6., a special notice of a reappointment of judges by Jehoshaphat and of a distinct court, of appeal perhaps, at Jerusalem, composed of Levitical and of lay elements. In the same place (as also in a previous one, 1 Chr. xxvi. 32) occurs a mention of "the king's judges" (the officers of the branch of jurisprudence. The rights of the prerogative having a constant tendency to encroach, and needing continual regulation, these may have grown probably into a department, somewhat like our exchequer.

One more change is noticeable in the pre-Babylonian period. The "princes" constantly appear as a powerful political body, increasing in influence and privileges, and having a fixed centre of action at Jerusalem. Till in the reign of Zedekiah, they seem to exercise some of the duties of a privy council; and especially a collective jurisdiction (2 Chr. xviii. 21; Jer. xxvi. 10, 16). These "princes" are probably the heads of great houses in Judah and Benjamin, whose fathers had once been the pillars of local jurisdiction; but who, through the attractions of a court, and probably also under the constant abuse of hostile invasion, became gradually residents in the capital, and formed an oligarchy, which drew to itself, amidst the growing weakness of the latter monarchy, whatever vigor was left in the state, and encroached on the sovereign attribute of justice. The employment in offices of trust and encomium would tend also in the same way, and such chief families would probably monopolize such employment. Hence the constant burden of the prophetic strain, denouncing the neglect, the perversion, the corruption, of judicial functionaries (Is. i. 17, 21, v. 7, x. 2, xxviii. 7, xvi. 1, xix. 4; Jer. ii. 8, v. 1, vii. 5, xiii. 12; Ez. xxi. 27, xiv. 8, 9; Hos. v. 10, viii. 5, 7, Amos vi. 24, vi. 13; Nah. i. 4). Still, although far changed from its broad and simple basis in the earlier period, the administration of justice had little resembling the set and rigid system of the Sanhedrin of later times. [See SANHEDRIN.] This last change arose from the fact that the patriarchal seniority, degenerate and corrupted as it became before the Captivity, was by that event broken up, and a new basis of judicature had to be sought for.

With regard to the forms of procedure little more is known than may be gathered from the two examples, Ruth iv. 2, of a civil, and 1 K. xxii. 8-14, of a criminal character: to which, as a specimen of royal summary jurisdiction, may be added the well-known "judgment" of Solomon. Is az apparently enunciates as it were the first ten "elders" whom he meets "in the gate," the well-known case of the orphans, the city of refuge, he was to make out his case to the satisfaction of its elders (Josh. xx. 4), and this failing, or the congregation deciding against his claim to sanctuary there (though how its sense was to be taken does not appear), he was not put to death by act of public justice, but left to the "avenger of blood" (Dent. xix. 12). The expressions between "blood and blood," between "plea and plea" (Dent. xvii. 8, 9), indicate a presumption of legal intrigue arising: the latter expression seeming to imply something as what we call a "cross-suit." We may infer from the sanctity, or rather almost entire absence of direction as regards forms of procedure, that the legislator was content to leave them to be provided for as the necessity for them arose, it being impossible by any jurisprudential devices to anticipate chicanery. It is an interesting question how far judges were allowed to receive fees of suitors: Michaelis reasonably presumes that none were allowed or customary, and it seems, from the words of 1 Sam. xii. 3, that such transactions would have been regarded as corrupt. There is another question how far advocates were usual. There is no reason weak either of government or of personal charac-

weakness, or EITHER DRIT. own criminality with Batsheeba it is superfluous to assert, since the matter was by divine interference removed from the cognizance of MZAN law.

a. From Num. iv. 3, 23, 30, it would seem that after 50 years of age the Levites were excused from the service of the tabernacle. This was perhaps a provision meant to favor their usefulness in deciding on points of law, since the maturity of a judge has hardly begun at that age, and before it they would have been junior to their lay coadjutors.

b. That some of the heads of such houses, however, walled their proper sphere, seems clear from Jer.

21, 17, where "elders of the land" address an assembly of the people. Still, the occasion is not judicial.

c. The Sanhedrin is, by a school of Judaism once more prevalent than now, attempted to be based on the 70 elders of Num. xi. 18, and to be traced through the O. T. history. Those 70 were chosen when judia cature had been already provided for (Ex. xvii. 25), and the chief office was to assist Moses in the duty of governing. But no influence of any such body is traceable in later times at any eras of history. They seem in fact to have left no successors.

d. The example of Susannah and the elders is a suspicious an authority to be cited.
to think that until the period of Greek influence, when we meet with words based on σωτήρος and παράδοσις, any proselyted class of pleaders existed. Yet passages abound in which the pleading of the cause of those who are unable to plead their own case, is spoken of as a thing proper to the nation, a noble act of charity; and the expression has even (which shows the popularity of the practice) become a basis of figurative allusion (Job xxi. 21; Prov. xxiii. 23, xxvii. 9; Ez. i. 17; Jer. xxx. 13. l. 34. fi. 36). The blessedness of such acts is forcibly dwelt upon, Job xxiii. 12, 13.

There is no mention of any distinctive dress or badge as pertaining to the judicial officer. A staff or sceptre was the common badge of a ruler or prince, and this perhaps they bore (Is. xiv. 5; Am. i. 5, 8). They would, perhaps, when officiating, be more than usually careful to comply with the regulations about dress laid down in Num. xv. 38, 39; Deut. xxii. 12. The use of the "white ass" (Judg. v. 10), by those who "sit in judgment," was perhaps a convenient distinctive mark for them when journeying where they would not usually be known.

For other matters relating to some of the forms of law, see OATHS, OFFICERS, WITNESSES.

II. H.

JUDGES, BOOK OF (جملة : Kpe \r¡\r¡ : {\b\r¡\r¡}). 1. Title.—The period of history contained in this book reaches from Joshua to Eli, and is thus more extensive than the time of the Judges. A large portion of it also makes no mention of them, though belonging to their time. But because the history of the Judges occupies by far the greater part of the narrative, and is at the same time the history of the people, the title of the whole book is derived from that portion. The book of Ruth was originally a part of this book. But about the middle of the fifth century after Christ it was placed in the Hebrew copies immediately after the Song of Solomon. In the LXX. it has preserved its original position, but as a separate book.

II. Arrangement.—The book at first sight may be divided into two parts—i.—xvi. and xvii.—xxiv.

A. I.—xvi. The subdivisions are: (a.) i.—ii. 5, which may be considered as a first introduction, giving a summary of the results of the war carried on against the Canaanites by the several tribes on the west of Jordan after Joshua's death, and forming a continuation of Josh. xi. 1. It is placed first, as in the most natural position. It tells us that the people did not obey the command to expel the people of the land, and contains the reproof of them by a prophet. (b.) ii. 6—vi. 5. This is a second introduction, standing in nearer relation to the following history. It informs us that the people fell into idolatry after the death of Joshua, and his generation, and that they were punished for it by being unable to drive out the remnant of the inhabitants of the land, and by falling under the hand of oppressors. A parenthesis occurs (ii. 16—19) of the highest importance as giving a key to the following portion. It is a summary view of the history: the people fall into idolatry; they are then oppressed by a foreign power; upon their repentance they are delivered by the judge, after whose death they relapse into idolatry. (c.) iii. 7—xvi. The words, "and the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord," which had been already used in ii. 11, are employed to introduce the history of the 13 judges comprised in this book. An account of six of these 13 is given at greater or less length. The account of the remaining seven is very short, and merely attached to the longer narratives. These narratives are as follows: (1) The history of Gideon and his son Abimelech is contained in vi.—ix., and followed by the notice of Tola, x. 1, 2, and Jair, x. 5—5. This is the only case in which the history of a judge is continued by that of his children. (2) The history of Jephthah, x. 6—xii., which illustrates the lesson taught by the whole book. Gideon's sin in making the ephod is punished by the destruction of his family by Abimelech, with the help of the men of Shechem, who in their turn become the instruments of each other's punishment. In addition to this, the short reign of Abimelech would seem to be recorded as being an unauthorized anticipation of the kingly government of later times. (3.) The history of Barak, x. 21—xxvii. 7; to which is added the mention of Heber, xxviii. 10; Elon. 11, 12; Abdon, 13—15. (4.) The history of Samson, consisting of twelve exploits, and forming three groups connected with his love of three Philistine women, xiii.—xxvi. We may observe in general on this portion of the book, that it is almost entirely a history of the wars of deliverance; there are no sectarian allusions in it; the tribe of Judah is not afterwards to the time of Othniel; and the greater part of the judges belong to the northern half of the kingdom.

B. xvii.—xxiv. This part has no formal connection with the preceding, and is often called an appendix. No mention of the judges occurs in it. It contains allusions to "the house of God," the ark, and the high-priest. The period to which the narrative relates is simply marked by the expression "when there was no king in Israel" (xxix. 1; 1 Kings. i. 1). It records (a) the conquest of Laish by a portion of the tribe of Dan, and the establishment there of the idolatrous worship of Jehovah already instituted by Micah in Mount Ephraim. The date of this occurrence is not marked, but it has been thought to be subsequent to the time of Deborah, as her song contains no allusion to any northern settlements of the tribe of Dan. (b) The almost total extinction of the tribe of Benjamin, and the whole people of Israel, in consequence of their supporting the cause of the wicked men of Gibeah, and the means afterwards adopted for preventing its becoming complete. The date is in some degree marked by the mention of Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron (xx. 28), and by the proof of the unanimity still prevailing among the people.

1. "6-sign. The passage already seen that there is an unity of plan in i.—xvii., the clue to which is stated in ii. 16—19. There can be little doubt of the design to enforce the view there expressed. But the words of that passage must not be pressed too closely. It is a general view, to which the facts of the history correspond in different degrees. Thus the people is contemplated as a whole; the judges are spoken of with the reverence due to God's instruments; and the deliverances appear complete. But it would seem that the people were in no instance under exactly the same circumstances, and the judges in some points fall short of the ideal This Gideon, who in some respects is the most

JUDGES, BOOK OF 1513

Joh. xv.-xxii. must be compared with Judg. i. in order to understand fully how far the several tribes failed in expelling the people of Canaan. Nothing is said in ch. i. about the tribes on the east of Jordan, which had been already mentioned (Josh. xiii 13), nor about Levi (see Josh. xiii. 33, xvi. 1-42). The carrying on of the war by the tribes singly is explained by Josh. xiv. 28. The book begins with a reference to Joshua's death, and it, it is presumed, resumes the narrative, suspended by i.-ii. 5, with the same words as are used in concluding the history of Joshua (xxiv. 28-31). In addition to this the following passages appear to be common to the two books: compare Judg. i. 10-15, 20, 21, 27, 29, with Josh. xv. 14-19, 13, 63, xvii. 12, xvi. 10. A reference to the conquest of Laish (Judg. xviii.) occurs in Josh. xix. 47.

(13) To the books of Samuel and Kings. — We find in i. 28, 30, 33, 35, a number of towns upon which, "when Israel was strong," a tribute of bond-service was levied; this is supposed by some to refer to the time of Solomon (1 K. ix. 13-22). The conduct of Saul towards the Kenites (1 Sam. xx. 6), and that of David (1 Sam. xxxv. 29), is explained by i. 16. A reference to the continuance of the Philistine wars is implied in xiii. 5. The allusion to Abimelech (2 Sam. xi. 21) is explained by ch. ix. Chapters xxvii.-xxviii. and the book of Ruth are more independent, but they have a general reference to the subsequent history.

The question now arises whether this book forms one link in an historical series, or whether it has a closer connection either with that which preceded or follow it. We cannot infer anything from the agreement of its view and spirit with those of the other books of the Old Testament. By its position in the canon we may conclude that it was not an independent book originally. The history ceases with Samson, excluding Eli and Samuel; and then at this point two historical pieces are added — xvii.-xxvi. and the book of Ruth, independent of the general plan and of each other. This is sufficiently explained by Ewald's supposition that the books from Judges to 2 Kings form one work. In this case the histories of Eli and Samuel, so closely united between themselves, are transferred on account of their close connection with the rise of the monarchy. And Judg. xvi.-xxi. is inserted both as an illustration of the sin of Israel during the time of the Judges, in which respect it agrees with i.-xxvi., and as presenting a contrast with the better order prevailing in the time of the kings. Ruth follows next, as touching on the time of the judges, and containing information about David's family history which does not occur elsewhere. The connection of these books, however, is denied by Retheau (Einzeldichtung, 2, 163, 170) only recognizes the use of speeches in the appendix. Other critics, however, trace them throughout. Bertheau (On Judges, pp. xxvii.-xxxii.) says that the difference of the diction in the principal narratives, coupled with the fact that they are united in one plan, points to the incorporation of parts of previous histories. Thus, according to him, the author found the substance of iv. 2-24 already accompanying the song of Deborah, and of iv. 25-31 two distinct authorities are used — a life of Gideon, and a history of Jael and its usurper; in the account of Jephthah a history of the tribes on the east of Jordan is employed, which meets us again in different parts of the Pentateuch and Joshua; and the history of Samuel is taken from a longer work on the Philistine wars. Ewald's view is similar (Eich. iv. 181 f. ii. 490 f.).

V. Relation to other Books. — (A.) To Joshua.

In but originally, as Ewald thinks (Gesch. i. 282, 283), the commencement of a larger work reaching down to above a century after Solomon (see also Davidson, Introduction, 649, 650). Again, the writer of the appendix lived when Shiloh was no longer a religious centre (xviii. 31); he was acquainted with the regal form of government (xviii. 6, xviii. 1). There is some doubt as to xviii. 90. It is thought by some to refer to the Philistine oppression. But it seems more probable that the Assyrian captivity is intended, in which case the writer must have lived after 721 B.C. The whole book therefore must have taken its present shape after that date. And if we adopt Ewald's view, that Judges to 2 Kings form one book, the final arrangement of the whole must have been after the thirty-seventh year of Jehoiachin's captivity, or c. 562 (2 K. xxv. 27). Bertheau's suggestion with respect to Ezra brings it still lower. But we may add, with reference to the subject of this and the two preceding sections, that, however interesting such inquiries may be, they are only of secondary importance. Few persons are fully competent to conduct them, or even to pass judgment on their discordant results. And whatever obscurity may rest upon the whole matter, a more important consideration is that we have, through God's providence, a continuous history of the Jewish people, united throughout by the conviction of their dependence upon God and government by Him. This conviction finds its highest expression in parts of the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Prophets; but it was confirmed by the events of the history—although, at times, in a manner which gave room to Faith to use its power of perception, and allowed men in those days, as well as in these, to rush to recognize it.

VII. Chronology.—The time commonly assigned to the period contained in this book is 299 years. But this number is not derived directly from it. The length of the interval between Josua's death and the invasion of Cushan-rishathaim, and of the time during which Shangar was judge, is not stated. The dates which are given amount to 440 years, reckoned from the capture of Jerusalem by Solomon in 960 B.C. and from the 40th year of Eli in 410 B.C. (Judg. xiv. 6). This would show that this was the computation commonly adopted, as the 450 years seem to result from adding 40 years for Eli to the 410 of this book. But a difficulty is created by x. 26, and in a still greater degree by I. K. vi, 1, where the whole period from the Exodus to the building of the Temple is stated at 489 years (440, LXX.). The solution questions the genuineness of the date in I Kings. Keimcott pronounces against it (Dis. teor. 81, § 3), because it is omitted by Origen when quoting the rest of the verse. And it is urged that Josephus would not have reckoned 592 years for the same period, if the present reading had existed in his time. But it is defended by Tholusius (ad loc.), and is generally adopted partly on account of its agreement with Egyptian chronology. Most of the systems therefore shorten the time of the judges by reckoning the dates as inclusive or contemporary. But all these combinations are arbitrary. And this may be said of Keil's scheme, which is one of those least open to objection. He reckons the dates successively as far as 1008; but makes Judah and the three following judges contemporary with the 40 years of the Philistine oppression (cf. x. 6-xiii. 1); and by compressing the period between the division of the land and Cushan-rishathaim into 10 years, the Philistine wars to the death of Saul into 30, he arranges ultimately at the 480 years. Ewald and Bertheau have proposed ingenious but unsatisfactory explanations—differing in details, but both built upon the supposition that the whole period from the Exodus to Solomon was divided into 12 generations of 40 years; and that, for the period of the judges, this system has become blended with the dates of another more precise reckoning. On the whole, it seems safer to give up the attempt to ascertain the chronology exactly. The successive narratives give us the history of only parts of the country, and some of the occurrences may have been contemporary. But there seems to have been used—the number 40 occurs four times; and two of the periods are without any date. On this difficult subject see also Chronology, vol. i. p. 444 f.

* Other references.—Among the older commentators (see above) are also J. Prusius, "ad loca" case, adding together the years from the birth of Isaac regarded as the pledge of the promesse de joue (Gen. xxv. ii), the age of Jacob on going into Egypt 130, the sojourn in Egypt 215, as required by 31st ii. 17, and the time of the wandering in the wilderness (47), we have as the result 452 years between Jacob and the judges. Never so conveniently that this form of the chronology is correct (Apostolisch-p. 221, ed. 1849); but it is singular that so many of the best authorities agree in this variation. For fuller details on this question see the writer's Commentary on the Acts, pp. 157 f. and 214 f.
difficulties in the sentence, such as the use of the term "similar" and the phrase "Deborah's pp." which might be interpreted as suggesting a lack of clarity or precision in the author's writing.

Regarding the events of the period, it is noted that the "Judgment Day" was a significant event in Jewish history, as it marked the end of the Roman occupation and the beginning of a new era of freedom and independence for the Jews.

The author then goes on to discuss the various interpretations of the event, ranging from the Roman perspective to the Jewish perspective, and how each side viewed it differently.

A crucial point in this discussion is the role of Pilate, the Roman governor of Judaea, who is described as "doubtless inhabiting the palace of his father" (Luke xxvii. 7). The author notes that Pilate was "lived there at one time" (Phil. iv. 11, 12), and further describes how his residence was "in the palace of Herod, which was then and long afterwards the citadel of Jerusalem." (Jerusalem, p. 1326 a.)

The author then discusses the events that took place in Jerusalem during "the time of the trial of Christ," including the "doubtless inhabiting the palace of his father" (Luke xxvii. 7) and the "lived there at one time" (Phil. iv. 11, 12).

JUDITH, THE BOOK OF

With this direct personal sense we might expect the dative without "of", as in the other clause (comp. also Acts iv. 16, vii. 13; 1 Tim. iv. 15). But with the local sense as the direct one and the personal as indirect as in Ewald’s "im ganzen Prautorium unter den Kriegen," see his "Handbuch zur Altpreußischen Geschichte". The variation in position is natural. See Meyer’s note on this passage; also the art. Censar’s Household (Amst. ed.).

4. The word prautorium occurs also in Matt. xxvii. 27, where it is translated "a common hall" [A. V. marg. "court or governor’s house"], and in Mark xv. 16. In both places it denotes Pilate’s residence in Jerusalem.

* JUDGMENT-SEAT, the translation (A. V.) in various passages of Bůmá, and once of sýrīsírō. [Gábrithal; JUDGMENT-HALL; PRÉTORIUM.] Some critics adopt this sense of sýrīsírō in 1 Cor. vi. 2: 4 (see Meyer in loc. and comp. James ii. 6, A. V.).

JUDITH. 1. [Jóvdth:] [see below]: [Juodth:] [Alex. Jóvdb: Judith:]; "The daughter of Beeri the Hittite," and wife of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 34; Aboth Kedamah).

2. [Jóvdth:] Vat. Sin. Alex. Júvadeth: Ahd. Jóvadith, Jóvadèth.] The heroine of the apocryphal book which bears her name, who appears as an ideal type of piety (Jud. viii. 6), beauty (xi. 21), courage, and chastity (xvi. 22 f.). Her supposed descent from Simeon (iv. 2) and the manner in which she refers to his revered dead (Gen. xxxiv. 25 ff.), mark the conception of the character, which evidently belongs to a period of stern and perilous conflict. The most unscrupulous daring (xiii.) is combined with zeal and ritualism (xii. 1 f.), and faith is turned to action rather than to supplication (xiv. 31 ff.). Clement of Rome (Ep. i. 55) assigns to Judith the epithet given to Jadh ("Jóvdeth, Jóvadèth") and Jerome sees in her exploit the image of the victory of the Church over the power of evil (Ep. lxxix. 11, p. 508; "Judith . . . in typo Ecclesiastici dimitto capite transevit; " cf. Ep. xxi. 21, 1805).

The name is properly the feminine form of Jóvadh, Júvados (cf. Jer. xxxvi. 14, 21). In the passage of Genesis it is generally taken as the correlative of Jadh, i. e. "prised." B. F. W.

* In the A. V. ed. 1611 and other early editions the name of the heroine of this book is uniformly spelt Judith, as in the Geneva version. This orthography was doubtless derived from the Aldine edition, which reads "Jóvdeth" in the heading, and often, though not uniformly, in the text of the book.

JUDITH, THE BOOK OF, like that of Tobit, belongs to the earliest specimens of historical fiction. The narrative of the reign of "Nebuchadnezzar king of Nineveh" (i. 1), of the campaign of Holobernes, and the deliverance of Bethulia, through the strategem and courage of the Jewish heroine, contains too many and too serious difficulties, both historical and geographical, to allow of the supposition that it is either literally true, or even carefully moulded on truth. The existence of a kingdom of Nineveh and the reign of a Nebuchadnezzar are in themselves inconsistent with a date after the return; and an earlier date is excluded equally by internal evidence and by the impossibility of placing the events in harmonious connection with the course of Jewish history. The latter, together with the later character of the book, contradict the priority of its composition.

The variations of opinion among those critics who have endeavored to maintain the veracity of the story, Nebuchadnezzar has been identified with Cambyses, Xerxes, Esarhaddon, Klinshad, Merodach Baladan, etc., without the slightest show of probability. But apart from this, the text evidently alludes to the position of the Jews after the exile, when the Temple was rebuilt (v. 18, 19; iv. 3) and the hierarchical government established in place of the kingdom (xxv. 8, 9; γραφή των νεων Ισραήλ: cf. iv. 4, Samaria; viii. 6, προσάββατον, προσμάρτυρας); and after the Return the course of authentic history absolutely excludes the possibility of the occurrence of such events as the book relates. This fundamental contradiction of which underlies the whole narrative, renders it superfluous to examine in detail the other objections which may be urged against it. (c. iv. 6, vi. 31, vi. 441); "The book is exhibited in these traits, affords the best indication of its date: for it cannot be wrong to refer its origin to the Macedonian period, which it reflects not only in its general spirit but even in smaller traits. The impious design of Nebuchadnezzar finds a parallel in the prophetic description of Antiochus (Dan. xi. 31 ff.), and the triumphant issue of Judith's courage must be compared not with the immediate results of the invasion of Apollonius (as Pehlrbôth, Ful, 2553 ff.), but with the victory which the author pictured to himself as the reward of faith. But while it seems certain that the book is to be referred to the second century n. c. (175-100 n. c.), the attempts which have been made to fix its date within narrower limits, either to the time of the war of Alexander Jannaeus (105-4 n. c., Movers) or of Demetrius II. (129 n. c., Ewald), rest on very inaccurate data. It might seem more natural (as a mere conjecture) to refer it to an earlier time, e. 170 n. c., when Antiochus Epiphanes made his first assault upon the Temple.*

3. In accordance with the view which has been given of it, the character and date of the book, it is probable that the several parts may have a distinct symbolic meaning. Some of the names can scarcely have been chosen without regard to their derivation (e. g. Achior: Brother of Light; Judith = Jewess; Bethulia = Βηθελία, the virgin of Jehovah), and the historical difficulties of the person of Nebuchadnezzar disappear when he is regarded only be noticed in passing, as it assumes the spuriousness of the First Epistle of Clement (§ 9).
and these variations can only be explained by going back to some still more remote source (cf. Bertholdt, Einl. 2968 ff.), which was probably an earlier Greek copy.

6. The existence of these various recensions of the book is a proof of its popularity and wide circulation, but the external evidence of its use is very scanty. Josephus was not acquainted with it, or it is likely that he would have made some use of its contents, as he did of the apocryphal additions to Esther (Jos. Ant. xi. 6, § 1 ff.). The first reference to its contents occurs in Clem. Rom. (Ep. i. 55), and it is quoted with marked respect by Origen (Sed. in Jerem. 23: cf. Hom. ix. in Jud., I Hilary (in Paul. cxxv. 6), and Lucifer (De mon. parc. p. 395). Jerome speaks of it as "reckoned among the Sacred Scriptures by the Synod of Nice," by which he probably means that it was quoted in the records of the Council, unless the text be corrupt. It has been wrongly inserted in the catalogue at the close of the Apostolic Canons, against the best authority (cf. Hody, De Bibli. Text. 646 a), but it obtained a place in the Latin Canon at an early time (cf. Hier. Prof. in Ps. 15), which it commonly maintained afterwards. [CASMAN.]

7. The Commentary of Fritzsche (Kurzgefasstes Exeg. Handbuch, Leipzig, 1855) is by far the best which has appeared; within a narrow compass it contains a good critical apparatus and scholarlike notes.

* Literature.—Besides the Introductions and other general works referred to under the art. APOCRYPHA, the following essays and treatises may be noted: Reuss, art. Judith in Ersch and Gruber's Allgemeine Encycl., Sect. ii. Theil xxviii. pp. 98-103. Vaininger, in Herzog's Real-Encycl. vii. 115-142. Ginsburg, in Kittel's Cyclop. of Bibli. Lit., 3d ed., ii. 692-696. "G. B." in the Journ. of Soc. for July, 1856, pp. 342-363, and B. L. Cowper, The Book of Judith and his Commentary (in the Journ. of Soc. for July, 1856, pp. 421-440. O. Wolff (Cath.), Das Buch Judith als geschichtliche Urkunde vertheigt u. ehrhrt, Leipzig, 1861, of little or no value. The most elaborate and remarkable among the recent publications relating to the book is that of Volkmar, Handb. d. Einl. in die Apokryphen, 3rd Theil, " A nth. Judith, Tub. 1860. He maintains that the book was composed in the first year of the reign of Hadrian, near the end of A. D. 117 or the beginning of 118, and that it describes, under the disguise of fictitious names, the war of Trajan against the Parthians and Jews, and the triumph of the latter in the death of Lusius Quietus, the general of Trajan and governor of Judaea. Nebuchadnezzar stands for Trajan; Nineveh is Antioch "the great," as the chief city under the Roman sway in the East; and Assyria accordingly stands for Syria as the representative of the power which oppressed the Jews, the region where that power was concentrated.

"Arphaxad the king of the Medes" represents the Parthian Arsacids; Ecbatana is Nisibis, Holophernes Lusius Quietus, and the beautiful widow Judith symbolizes Judaea in her desolation, but still faithful to Jehovah, and destined to triumph over her enemies. This explanation is carried out into detail with great learning and ingenuity.

JULII (Ἰουλία: [Vat. Ioana, but joined with the following word: ] Julet). I. 1 Esdr. ix. 34. [Vat.]

2. (Vat. Omna), but joined with the preceding word:] Jesse. I. 1 Esdr. ix. 35. [Joel, 13.]

JULIA (Ἰουλία: [Judith, acc.:]), a Christian woman at Rome, probably the wife, or perhaps the sister of Philoheus, in connection with whom she is saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 15). Origen supposes that they were master and mistress of a Christian household which included the other persons mentioned in the same verse. Some modern critics have conjectured that the name may be that of a man, Julius. W. T. B.

JULIUS (Ἰούλιος: [Julius]), the courteous centurion of a "Augustus’ band," to whose charge St. Paul was delivered when he was sent prisoner from Cesar’a to Rome (Acts xxvii. 1, 9). [Cust.]

Augustus’ band has been identified by some commentators with the Italian band (Acts x. 1) by others, less probably, with the body of cavalry denominated Scytheni by Josephus (Ant. ix. 9, § 2, d). Conder and Howson (Life of St. Paul, ch. 2) adopt in the main Wiedener’s opinion, that the Augustan cohort was a detachment of the German Guards attached to the person of the Roman governor at Cesarea; and that this Julius may be the same as Julius Priscus (Tacit. Hist. ii. 92, iv. 11), sometime centurion, afterwards prefect of the Procurators. [Italian Band. Amer. ed.]

JUNIA (Ἰουνία, i. e. Junias: [Junium, acc.]), a Christian at Rome, mentioned by St. Paul as one of his kinsfolk and fellow-prisoners, of note among the Apostles, and in Christ before St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 7). Origen conjectures that he was possibly one of the seven disciples. Hammond also takes the name to be that of a woman, Junias, which would be a contraction (as Winer observes) of Junimias or Juniamia. [Andronicus.]

Chrysostom, holding the more common, but perhaps less probable, hypothesis that the name is that of a woman, Junia, remarks on it, "How great is the devotion of this woman, that she should be counted worthy of the name of Apostle!" Nothing is known of the imprisonment to which St. Paul refers Origen supposes that it is that bondage from which Christ makes Christians free.

JUPITER (Ζεύς), from Ζεύς, "blessed," Gesen. p. 1317; Ἰουάνας, υμεῖς, 1 K. xiv. 4, 5: Junipens). It has been already stated [Cedar] that the ocycedrus or Phoenician juniper was the tree whose wood, called "cedar-wood," was ordained by the law to be used in ceremonial purification (Ex. v. 4; Num. x. 9). The word, however, which is rendered in A. V. juniper, is beyond doubt a sort of brome, Genista monspurium, Genista retama of Forskal, answering to the Arabic Rethim, which is also found in the desert of Sinai in the neighborhood of the true juniper (Hollinsop, ii. 124). It is mentioned as affording shade to Elijah in his flight to Horeb (1 K. xiv. 4, 5), and as affording material for fuel, and also, in extreme cases, for human food (Ps. cxxv. 4: Job xxxvii. 20). It is very abundant in the desert of Sinai, and affords shade and protection, both in heat and storm, to travellers (Vig. Georg. ii. 434, 436). Its roots are very bitter, and would thus serve as food only in extreme cases: but it may be doubted whether "Junipera" (Job xxxvii. 4) is to be restricted to roots only, or to be taken in a wider sense of product, and thus include the fruit, which is much liked by sheep, and may thus sometimes served for human food (Ges. p. 1484). The roots are much valued by the Arabs for charcoal for the Cairo market. The fruit, which affords shade to Eljiah may have furnished also the "ceals" or ashes for baking the cake which satisfied his hunger (1 K. xiv. 6; see also Ps. cxxv. 4, "ceals of juniper"). The Rethem is a leguminous plant, and bears a white flower. It is found also in Spain, Portugal, and Palestine. Its abundance in the Sinai desert gave a name to a station of the Israelites, Bithnah (Num. xxxiii. 18, 19; Burckhardt, Syria, pp. 484, 542; Robinson, i. 294, 295; Lord Lindsay, Letters, p. 183: Phyth. JUPITER (Zeus. LXX. [and N. T.: Jupiter]). Among the chief measures which Antiochus Epiphanes took for the entire subversion of the Jewish faith was that of dedicating the Temple at Jerusalem to the service of Zeus Olympus (2 Macc. vi. 2), and at the same time the rival Temple on Gerizim was dedicated to Zeus Xenius (Jupiter Hospitalis, Vulg.). The choice of the first epithet is easily intelligible. The Olympian Zeus was the national god of the Hellenic race (Thucyd. iii. 14), as well as the supreme ruler of the heathen world, and as such formed the true opposite to Jehovah, who had revealed Himself as the God of Abraham. The application of the second epithet, "the God of heights," to Zeus on Gerizim, was more obscure. In 2 Mace. vi. 2 it is explained by the clause, "as was the character of those who dwelt in the place," which may, however, be an ironic comment of the writer (cf. Curt. iv. 5, 8), and not a sincere encomium of the hospitality of the Samaritans (as Ewald, Gesch. iv. 334 n.).

Jupiter or Zeus is mentioned in one passage of the N. T., on the occasion of St. Paul’s visit to Lystra (Acts xiv. 12, 13), where the expression...
JU\'SHAB-HE\'SED

"Jupiter, which was before their city," means that his temple was outside the city.\footnote{The name Jupiter also occurs in the A. V. in Acts xix. 35, where "the image [of the goddess Artemis] which fell down from Jupiter" is the translation of το\'ι Δε\'υνα.} B. F. W.

* The Lystrans on that occasion called Barnabas Jupiter (ver. 12), because Paul being "the chief speaker" and therefore Mercury, the god of eloquence, they supposed the other visitor must be Jupiter, whom they specially worshipped. They had a tradition also that these two gods had once travelled in disguise among them (see Ovid, Met. viii. 611). It has been suggested too that Barnabas may have been the elder man of the two, and more imposing than Paul in his personal appearance (comp. 2 Cor. x. 1, 10).

JU\'SHAB-HE\'SED (יו\'ש חֶסֶד): Aso\'b\'le\'a; [Vat. Ap\'o\'b\'a\'n\'a]; Alex. Ap\'o\'b\'a\'n\'a; [Comp. \'Yu\'b\'he\'e\'se\'e\'a; \'J\'u\'b\'he\'e\'e\'e\'e\'a;].

1. Jutah, son of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 29). It does not appear why the five children in this verse are separated from the three in ver. 19. Bertheau suggests that they might be by a different mother, or possibly born in Judæa after the return, whereas the three others were born at Babylon. The name of Jushab-hese, i.e. "Loving-kindness is returned," taken in conjunction with that of his father and brothers, is a striking expression of the feelings of pious Jews at the return from Captivity, and at the same time a good illustration of the nature of Jewish names.

JUSTUS (יו\'ש\'ע\'ד): [Justus, "just"]; S_lockettgen (Hor. Hebr. in Act. Ap.) shows by quotations from rabbinical writers that this name was not unusual among the Jews.\footnote{This — with one t — is the form given in Iahab's text of xv. 55: Michaelis and Walton insert a dagesh, but it was apparently unknown to any of the old translators in those versions (with the exception of the Alex. LXX), whatever shape the word assumes, it retains a single t.} 1. A surname of Joseph called Barsabas (Acts i. 23). [Joseph Bara\'ba\'s.]

2. A Christian at Corinth, with whom St. Paul lodged (Acts xviii. 7). The Syr. and Arab. have Titus, while the Vulg. combines both names Titus Justus.

Paul did not lodge with Justus at this time, but having left the synagogue preached at the house of Justus, which being near the synagogue was so much the more convenient for that purpose (ver. 8). For ought that appears, he abode still with Aquila (ver. 3 after this separation from the Jews. Nor is Justus spoken of as a Christian, but as a Jewish proselyte (σεβο\'μενο\'ν το\'ν θεο\'ν), though evidently he had more sympathy with Paul than with the Jews, and no doubt soon became a believer.

JUTTAH (יו\'תָח), i. e. Jutah; also in xxi. 16, י תָח [extended, included]: Tr\'dv. Alex. Ier\'a: Tarb. Alex. omits: Jot\'h, Jot\'h\'a, a city in the mountain region of Judah, in the neighborhood of Maon and Carmel (Josh. xv. 55). It was allotted to the priests (xvi. 16), but in the catalogue of 1 Chr. vi. 57-59, the name has escaped. In the time of Ezechias it was a large village (אָנָּוֹן אָגֵלָו), 18 miles southward of Cletheropolis (Onomasticum, "Jattan"). A village called Jut\'h\'a was visited by Robinson, close to M\'i\'n and Kurdy (Gild. Res. 1st ed. ii. 192, 628), which doubtless represents the ancient town.

KA\'DESH, KA\'DESH BARNE\'A 1519

Roland (Pol. p. 870) conjectures that Jutta is the το\'ι Διο\'νο\'σιο\'ν (A. V. a city of Judah") in the hill country, in which Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, resided (Luke i. 39). But this, though feasible, is not at present confirmed by any positive evidence. [Juda, City of, Amer. ed.]

KA\'SE\'E\'EL (ק\'ס\'א\'י\'א): [see below]: [in Josh.] Bara\'se\'la\'h, Alex. Bara\'se\'la\'h; [Comp. Bara\'se\'la\'h, Al\'d. Bara\'se\'la\'h: in 2 Sam.], Kasa\'se\'la\'h; [Vat. Kar\'a\'se\'b\'e\'a]; Comp. Al\'d. Kasa\'se\'la\'h: in 1 Chr.]. Bara\'se\'la\'h: Gab\'e\'e\'l, one of the "eights" of the tribe of Judah; the first named in the enumeration of those next Edom, and apparently the farthest south (Josh. xv. 21). Taken as Hebrew, the word signifies "collected by God," and may be compared with Jok\'tfe\'e\'l, the name bestowed by the Jews on an Edomite city. Kaza\'be\'el is memorable as the native place of the great hero Bena\'lah\'i\'n-Je\'hoida, in connection with whom it is twice mentioned (2 Sam. xxiii. 20: 1 Chr. xi. 22). After the Captivity it was reinaugurated by the Jews, and appears as Je\'k\'a\'se\'e\'el.

It is twice mentioned in the Onomasticon — as Bara\'se\'la\'h and Copes\'el: the first time by Eusebius only, and apparently confused with Carmel, unless the conjecture of Le Clerc in his notes on the passage be accepted, which would identify it with the site of Elijah's sleep and vision, between Beer-sheba and Horeb. No trace of it appears to have been discovered in modern times.

* KA\'DE\'S (ק\'ד\'ס): Vulg. omits, Jud. i. 9, perhaps the same as Kade\'sh (see below), or Kede\'sh, Josh. xv. 23.

KA\'DE\'S, KA\'DE\'S BARNE\'E [Heb. Barne\'a] (ק\'ד\'ש ק\'ד\'ש ברנ\'א): [see in the art. and notes]: Kadesh [L. xiiil. 19, Rom. Vat. Ka\'di\'a], Kadesh Bar�by, Kadesh vuj Barby [Num. xxxiv. 4; Ovid, Cadberian]. This place, the scene of Miriam's death, was the farthest point to which the Israelites reached in their direct road to Canaan; it was also that whence the spies were sent, and where, on their return, the people broke out into murmuring, upon which their strictly penal term of wandering began (Num. xiii. 32, 36, xiv. 29-33, xvi. 1; Deut. ii. 14). It is probable that the term "Kadesh," though applied to signify a "city," yet had also a wider application to a region, in which Kadesh-Meriba, certainly, and Kadesh-Barnea probably, indicates a precise spot. Thus Kadesh appears as a limit eastward of the same tract which was limited westward by Shur (Gen. xx. 1). Shur is possibly the same as Sihor, "which is before Egypt" (xviii. 18; Josh. xiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18), and was the first portion of the wilderness on which the people emerged from the passage of the Red Sea. [MICR.] "Between Kadesh and Iared" is another indication of the site of Kadesh as an eastern limit (Gen. xvi. 14), for the point so fixed is "the fountain on the way to Shur" (v. 7), and the range of limits is narrowed by selecting the western one not so far to the west, while the eastern one, Kadesh, is unchanged. Again, we have Kadesh as the point to which the foray of Chedorlaomer returned—a word which does not imply that they had previously visited it, but that it lay in the direction, as viewed from Mount Seir and Paran mentioned next as fixed at "unto the land of Chinnereth" which was that of the point from which Chedorlaomer had gone, namely, the North. Chedorlaomer, it seems, coming down by the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, smote the Zoanites (Ammon, Gen. xiv. 4; Deut. ii. 20), and the Emims (Moab, Deut. ii. 11), and the Horites in Mount Seir, to the south of that sea, unto "El-Paran that is by the wildernes." He drove these Horites over the Arinah into the et-Tih region. Then "returned," i.e. went northward to Kadesh and Hazazon Tamar, or Engedi (comp. Gen. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xx. 2). In Gen. xiv. 7 Kadesh is identified with En-Mishpat, the fountain of judgment, and is connected with Tamar, or Hazazon Tamar, just as we find these two in the comparatively late book of Ezekiel, as designed to mark the southern border of Judah, drawn through them and terminating seaward at the "River to (or toward) the Great Sea." Precisely thus stands Kadesli-Barnac in the books of Numbers and Joshua (comp. Ex. xiii. 19, xviii. 28; Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xx. 3). Unless then we are prepared to make a double Kadesh for the book of Genesis, it seems idle with Rehob (Palestine, p. 114-17), to distinguish the "En-Mishpat, which is Kadesli," from that to which the spies returned. For there is an identity about all the connections of the two, which, if not conclusive, will compel us to abandon all possible inquiries. This holds especially as regards Paran and Tamar, and in respect of its being the eastern limit of a region, and also as being the first point of importance found by Chedorlaomer on passing round the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. In a strikingly similar manner we have the limits of a route, apparently well-known one at the time, indicated by three points, Horae, Mount Sabe, Kadesh-Barnac, in Den. i. 2, the distance between the extremity being fixed at "11 days' journey," or about 115 miles, allowing 15 miles to an average day's journey. This is one element for determining the site of Kadesh, assuming of course the position of Horae ascertained. The name of the place to which the spies returned is "Kadesli" simply, in Num. xiii. 26, and is there closely connected with the "wilderness of Paran." Yet the "wilderness of Zin" stands in near conjunction, as the point where the "search" of the spies commenced (ver. 21). Again, in Num. xxxii. 8, we find that it was from Kadesli-Barnac that the mission of the spies commenced, and in the rehearsed narrative of the same event in Den. i. 19, Num. ix. 23, the name "Barnac" is also added.
KADESH

n Another short article of Jerome's, apparently required to be Stanley (N. & P. 95 note), as relating likewise to En-mishpat, should seem to mean something wholly different, namely, the well of Isaac and Abimelech in Gezer: φραγμὸς κρίσεως εἰς τὰν εἰς τον θόρυβον βορείως (πρὸς δοξολογίαν καλοδομην τῇ Γεζερ). There is a remarkable interpolation in the LXX., or (as seems less probable) omission in the present Heb. text of Num. xxxii. 35, where, in following the various stages of the march, we find respectively so follows.

Thus far there seems no reasonable doubt of the identity of this Kadesli with that of Genesis. Again, in Num. xx., we find the people encamped in Kadesli after reaching the wilderness of Zin. For the question whether this was a second visit (supposing the Kadesli identical with that of the spies), or a continued occupancy, see Wilderness of Wandering. The mention of the wilderneses of Zin and Paran, is in favor of the identity of this place with that of Num. xiii. The reasons which seem to have fostered a contrary opinion are the absence of water (ver. 2) and the position assigned—"in the uttermost of the border" of Edom. Yet the murmuring seems to have arisen, or to have been more intense on account of their having encamped there in the expectation of finding water: which affords again a presumption of identity. Further, "the wilderness of Zin along by the coast of Edom" (Num. xxxiv. 3; Josh. xvi.) destroys any presumption to the contrary arising from that position. Jerome clearly knows but of one and the same Kadesli—"where Moses smote the rock," where "Miriam's monument," he says, "was still shown, and where Chedorlaomer smote the rulers of Amalek." It is true Jerome gives a distinct article on Kodepsi, ἕνα ἡ πηγή τῆς κρίσεως, i.e. En-mishpat, but only perhaps in order to record the fountain as a distinct local fact. The apparent ambiguity of the position, first, in the wilderness of Paran, or in Paran; and secondly in that of Zin, is no real increase to the difficulty. For whether these tracts were contiguous, and Kadesli on their common border, or ran into each other, and embraced a common territory, to which the name "Kadesli," in an extended sense, might be given, is comparatively unimportant. It may, however, be observed, that the wilderness of Paran commences, Num. x. 12, where that of Sinai ends, and that it extends to the point, whence in ch. xiii. the spies set out, though the only positive identification of Kadesli with it is that in xiii. 26, when on their return to rejoin Moses they come "to the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesli." Parah then was evidently the general name of the great tract south of Palestine, commencing soon after Sinai, as the people advanced northwards—that perhaps now known as the desert et-Tih. Hence, when the spies are returning southerly they return to Kadesli, viewed as in the wilderness of Paran; though, in the same chapter, when starting northwards on their journey, they commence from that of Zin. It seems almost to follow that the wilderness of Zin must have overlapped that of Paran on the north side: or must, if they were parallel and lay respectively east and west, have had a further extension northwards than this latter. In the designation of the southern border of the Israelites also, it is observable that the wilderness of Zin is mentioned as a limit, but nowhere that of Paran (Num. xxxiv. 3, Josh. vi. 1), unless the dwelling of Ismael "in the wilderness of Paran" (Gen. xxi. 21) indicates that, on the western portion of the southern border, which the story of Hagar indicates as his dwelling-place, the Paran nomenclature prevailed.

If it be allowed, in the dearth of positive testimony, to follow great natural boundaries in suggesting the limits of these adjacent or perhaps overlapping wildernesses, it will be seen, on reference to Kiepert's map (ib. in Robinson, vol. i, see also Russegger's map of the same region), that the Arabah itself and the plateau westward of it are, when we leave out the commonly so-called Sidonitic peninsula (here considered as corresponding in its wider or northerly portion to "the wilderness of Sinai"), the two parts of the whole region most strongly partitioned off from and contrasted with one another. On this western plateau is indeed superimposed another, no less clearly marked out, to judge from the map, as distinct from the former as this from the Arabah; but this higher ground, it will be further seen, probably corresponds with the mountain of the Amorites. The Arabah, and its limiting barrier of high ground on the western side, differ by about 400 to 900 feet in elevation at the part where Robinson, advancing from Petra towards Hebron, ascended that barrier by the pass el-Khârâr. At the N. W. angle of the Arabah the regularity of this barrier is much broken by the great wadies which converge thither; but from its edge at el-Khârâr the great floor stretches westward, with no great interruption of elevation, if we omit the superimposed plateau, to the Egyptian frontier, and northward to Rhinocoula and Gaza. Speaking of it apparently from the point of view at el-Khârâr, Robinson (ii. 585, 587) says it is "not exactly a table-land, but a higher tract of country, forming the first of the several steps or offsets into which the ascent of the mountains in this part is divided."

It is now known as the wilderness et-Tih. A general description of it occurs in Robinson (i. 261, 262), together with a mention of the several travellers who had then per per the visited it. Its configuration is given, ib. 294. If this et-Tih region represents the wilderness of Paran, then the Arabah itself, including all the low ground at the southern and southwestern extremity of the Dead Sea, may stand for the wilderness of Zin. The superimposed plateau has an eastern border converging, towards the north, with that of the general elevated tract on which it stands, i.e. with the western barrier aforesaid of the Arabah, but losing towards its higher or northern extremity its elevation and preciseness, in proportion as the general tract on which it stands appears to rise, till, near the S. W. curve of the Dead Sea, the higher plateau and the general tract appear to blend. The convergence in question arises from the general tract having, on its eastern side, i.e. where it is to the Arabah a western limit, a barrier running more nearly N. and S. than that of the superimposed plateau, which runs about E. N. E. and W. S. W. This highest of the two steps on which this terrace stands is described by Williams (Holy City, i. 463, 464), who approached it from Hebron — the opposite direction to that in which Robinson, mounting towards Hebron by the higher pass es-Sâfâh, came upon it — as "a gigantic natural rampart of lofty mountains, which we could distinctly trace for many miles E. and W. of the spot on which we stood, whose precipitous promontories of naked rock, forming as it were bastions of Cyclopean masonry, were covered with irregular masses from the mountain-barrier into the southern wilderness, a confused chaos of chalk."

Below the traveller lay the Wady Murreeh, running into that called el-Fîrekh, identifying the spot with that described by Robinson (ii. 587) as "a formidable barrier supporting a third plateau" (reckoning apparently the Arabah as one), rising on the other, i.e. northern side of the Wady el-Fîrekheh. But the southern face of this highest plateau is still more strongly defined wall of mountains. The Israelites must probably have faced it, or wandered along it, at some period of their advance from the wilderness of Sinai to the more northern desert of Paran. There is no such boldly-marked line of cliffs north of the et-Tih and el-Ubâneh ranges, except perhaps Mount Seir, the eastern limit of the Arabah, or 400 or more feet, as in Deut. i. 7, 19, 20, "the mountain of the Amorites," which, besides those of Seir and Hor, is the only one mentioned by name after Sinai, and which is there closely connected with Kadesh Barnea. The wilderness (that of Paran) "great and terrible," which they passed through after quitting Horeb (vv. 6, 7, 19), was "by the way of" this "mountain of the Amorites." "We came," says Moses, "to Kadesh Barnea: and I said unto you, ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites." Also in ver. 7, the adjacent territories of this mountain-region seem not obscurely intimated; we have the Sefehelh ("plain") and the Arabah ("vale"), with the "hills" ("hill-country of Judah") between them; and "the South" is added as that debatable outlying region, in which the wilderness strives with the inroads of life and culture. There is no natural feature to correspond so well to this mountain of the Amorites as this smaller higher plateau superimposed on et-Tih, forming the watershed of the two great systems of wadies, those north-westward towards the great Wady el-Arish, and those northeastward towards the Wady Jerâfelh and the great Wady el-Jebel. Indeed, in these converging wady-systems on either side of the "mountain," we have a desert-continuation of the same configuration of country, which the Sefehelh and Arabah with their interposed water-shedding highlands present further north. And even as the name Arabah is plainly continued from the Jordan Valley, so as to mean the great arid trough between the Dead Sea and Edath; so perhaps the Sefehelh ("vale") might naturally be viewed as continued to the *river of Egypt." And thus the "mountain of the Amorites" would merely continue the mountain-mass of Judah and Ephraim, as forming part of the land which the Lord our God doth give unto us." The southwestern angle of this higher plateau, is well defined by the bluff peak of Jebel "Arâfîj, standing in about 30° 22' N., by 34° 30'

KADeSH

E. Assuming the region from Wady Feiran to the Jebel Moum, as a general basis for the position of Horeb, nothing farther south than this Jebel 'Arar,1 appears to give the necessary distance from it for Kadesh, nor would any point on the west side of the western face of this mountain region suit, until we get quite high up towards Beer-sheba. No, the evidence was not to be gained by the last direction here given, is it easy to account for the way of Mount Seir,2 being mentioned as it is, Deut. i. 2, apparently as the customary route from Horeb. But if, as further reasons will suggest, Kadesh lay probably near the S. W. curve of the Dead Sea, then Mount Seir3 will be within sight on the E. during all the latter part of the journey from Horeb. This mountain region is in Kiepert's map laid down as the territory of the Asirimah, but is said to be so wild and rugged that the Bedouins of all other tribes avoid it, nor has any road ever traversed it (Robinson, i. 186). Across this then there was no pass; the choice of routes lay between the road which, leading from Elath to Gaza and the Shefeleh, passes to the west of it, and that which ascends from the northern extremity of the Arabah by the Mt. 'Akedh Akrabbin towards Mount Horeb. But the reason given that the Israelites took this latter course are, that if they had taken the western, Beer-sheba would seem to have been the most natural route of their first attempted attack (Robinson, i. 187). It would also have brought them, not so near to the land of the Philistines, which it seems to have been the Divine purpose that they should avoid. But above all, the features of the country, scantily as they are noticed in Num., are in favor of the eastern route from the Arabah and Dead Sea.

One site fixed on for Kadesh is the 'Ain es-Shek-âbeh on the south side of this "mountain of the Amorites," and therefore too near Horeb to fulfill the conditions of Deut. i. 2. Messrs. Rawlonds and Williams ('Holy City, i. 463-68) argue strongly in favor of a site for Kadesh on the west side of this whole mountain region, towards Jebel Hebel, where they found "a large single mass of solid rock, a spur of the mountain to the north of it, immediately rising above it, the only visible naked rock in the whole district." They found salient water rushing from this rock into a basin, but soon losing itself in the sand, and a grand space for the encampment of a host on the S. W. side of it. In favor of it they allege, (1) the name Kidês or Kados, pronounced in English Kudsâ or Kudês, as being exactly the form of the Hebrew name Kadesh; (2) the position, in the line of the southern boundary of Judah; (3) the correspondence with the order of the places mentioned, especially the places Ahdar and Azmon, which these travellers recognize in Aidhirat and Aseirâh, otherwise (as in Kiepert's map) Aidhirat and Aseirâh; (4) its position with regard to Jebel el-Hus, or Jebel Hebel; (5) its position with regard to the mountain to the east, the "mountain of the Amorites" (which they seem to identify with the western face of the plateau); (6) its situation with regard to the grand S. W. route to Palestine by Beer-lahai-roi from Egypt; (7) its distance from Sinai, and the goodness of the way thither; (8) the accessibility of Mount Hor from this region. Of these, 2, 4, 5, and 8, seem of no weight; (1) is a good deal weakened by the fact that some such name seems to have a wide range in this region; 3 is of considerable force, but seems overbalanced by the fact that the whole position seems too far west; arguments 6 and 7 rather tend against than for the view in question, any western route being unlikely (see text above), and the "goodness" of the road not being discoverable, but rather the reverse, from the Mosaic record. But, above all, how would this accord with the "way of the Amorites" being that from Sinai to Kadesh Barnea? (Deut. i. 2).

In the map to Robinson's last edition, a Jebel el-Kudeis is given on the authority of Abeken. But this spot would be too far to the west for the fixed point intended in Deut. i. 2 as Kadesh Barnea. Still, taken in connection with the region endeavored to be identified with "mountain of the Amorites," it may be a general testimony to the prevalence of the name Kadesh within certain limits; but it is further supported by the names given below.

The indications of locality strongly point to a site near where the mountain of the Amorites descends to the low region of the Arabah and Dead Sea. Tell Arad is perhaps as clear a local monument of the event of Num. xxi. 1, as we can expect to find. 〔A-R-A-D.] "The Canaanish king of Arad" found that Israel was coming "by the way of the spies," and "fought against," and "took some of them prisoners." The subsequent defeat of this king is clearly connected with the pass es-Sâfît, between which and the Tell Arad a line drawn ought to give us the direction of route intended by "the way of the spies;" accordingly, within a day's journey on either side of this line produced towards the Arabah, Kadesh-Barnea should be sought for. 〔H-O-H-M-I-N.] Nearly the same ground appears to have been the scene of the previous discomfiture of the Israelites rebelliously attempting to force their way by this pass to occupy the "mountain" where the Amalekites and Amorites were "before them" (Num. xiv. 45; Judg. i. 17); further, however, this defeat is said to have been "in Seir" (Deut. i. 44). Now, whether we admit or not with Monck (8. p. 94 note) that Falam had at this period no territory west of the Arabah, which is perhaps doubtful, yet there can be no room for doubt that "the mountain of the Amorites" must at any rate be taken as their western limit. Hence the overthrew in Seir must be cast of that mountain, or, at furthest, on its eastern edge. The "Seir" alluded to may be the western edge of the Arabah below the es-Šâfît pass. When thus driven back, they "walked in Kadesh many days" (Deut. i. 46). The city, whether we prefer Kadesh simply, or Kadesh-Barnea, as its designation, cannot have belonged to the Amorites, name for the well-known hill Madâr, or Madârah, lying within view of the point described above, from Wady Hebel. 〔H-O-H-M-I-N.] This is towards the east, a good deal nearer the Dead Sea, and so far more suitable. Further, Robertson's map in Stewart's The Tent and the Khan places an 'Ain Khânâr near the junction of the Wady Awd with the Wady el-Arish; but in this map are taken in some confusion in the drawing.

1 What is more disputable than the S. boundary line? Jebel Hebel derives its sole significance from a passage not specified in Jeremiah, or the "mountain of the Amorites," as shown above, need not be that western face. Mt. Hezor is accessible from elsewhere.

2 Seezen's last map shows a Wady Kidês corresponding in position nearly with Jebel el-Kederâse given in Kiepert's, on the authority of Abeken. Zimmer-mann's Atlas, sect. x., gives el-Gafriân as another for these after their victory would probably have disputed possession of it; nor could it, if plainly Amoritical, have been "in the uttermost of the border" of Edom. It may be conjectured that it lay in the debatable ground between the Amorites and Edom, which the Israelites in a message of courtesy to Edom might naturally assign to the latter, and that it was possibly then occupied in fact by neither, but by a remnant of those Horites whom Edom (Deut. ii. 12) dislodged from the "mount" Seir, but who remained as refugees in that arid and unenviable region, which perhaps was the sole remnant of their previous possession, and which they still called by the name of "Seir," their patriarch. This would not be inconsistent with "the edge of the land of Edom" still being at Mount Hor (Num. xxxviii. 37), nor with the Israelites regarding this debatable ground, after disposing the Amorites from "their mountain," as pertaining to their own "south quarter." If this view be admissible, we might regard it "Ararim," as a Hebraized remnant of the Horite language, or of some Horite name.

The nearest approximation, then, which can be given to a site for the city of Kadesh, may be probably attained by drawing a circle, from the pass es-Sa'af, at the radius of about a day's journey; its southwestern quadrant will intersect the "wilderness of Paran," or el-Twain, which is there overhung by the superimposed plateau of the mountain of the Amorites; while its southeastern one will cross what has been designated as the "wilderness of Zin." This seems to satisfy all the conditions of the passages of Genesis, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which refer to it. The nearest site in harmony with this view, which has yet been suggested (Robinson, ii. 175), is undoubtedly the 'Alm el-Wadib. To this, however, is opposed the remark of a traveller (Stanley, S. O. P. p. 96) who went probably with a deliberate intention of testing the local features in reference to this suggestion, that it does not afford among its "stony shelves of three or four feet high" any proper "cliff" (סֵפֶר), such as is the word specially describing that "rock" (A. V.) from which the water gushed. It is however nearly opposite the Wady Ghawar, the great opening into the steep eastern wall of the Arabah, and therefore the possible "path" by which to "pass through the border" of Edom. But until further examination of local features has been made, which owing to the frightfully desolate character of the region seems very difficult, it would be unwise to push identification further.

Notice is due to the attempt to discover Kadesh in Petra, the metropolis of the Nabataeans (Stanley, S. O. P. p. 94), embedded in the mountains to which the name of Mount Seir is submitted by all authorities to appear, and almost overhanging Mount Hor. No doubt the word סֵפֶר, "cliff," is used as a proper name occasionally, and may probably in 2 K. xiv. 7; Is. xvi. 1, be identified with a city or spot of territory belonging to Edom. But the two sites of Petra and Mount Hor are surely far too close for each to be a distinct camping station, as in Num. xxxiii. 36, 37. The camp of Israel would have probably covered the site of the city, the mountain, and several adjacent valleys. But, further, the site of Petra must have been as thoroughly Edomitish territory as was that of Bozrah, the then capital, and could not be described as being "in the uttermost" of their border. "Mount Seir" was "given to Esau for a possession," in which he was to be unmolested, and not a foot's breadth of his land was to be taken. This seems irreconcilable with the quiet encampment of the whole of Israel and permanency there for "many days," as also with their subsequent territorial possession of it, for Kadesh is always reckoned as a town in the southern border belonging to Israel. Neither does a friendly request to be allowed to pass through the land of Edom come suitably from an invader who had seized, and was occupying one of its most difficult passes; nor, again, is the evident temper of the Edomites and their precautions, if they contemplated, as they certainly did, armed resistance to the violation of their territory, consistent with that invader being allowed to settle himself by anticipation in such a position without a stand being made against him. But, lastly, the conjunction of the city Kadesh with "the mountain of the Amorites," and its connection with the assault repulsed by the Amalekites and Canaanites (Deut. i. 44, Num. xiv. 45), points to a site wholly away from Mount Seir.

A paper in the Journal of Sacred Literature, April, 1860, entitled A Critical Enquiry into the Route of the Exodus, discards all the received sites for Sina, even that of Mount Hor, and fixes on Elusa (el-Kades) as that of Kadesh. The arguments of this writer will be considered, as a whole, under WILDERNESS OF WANDERING.

Kadesh appears to have maintained itself, at least as late as the days of the prophet Ezekiel (l. c) and those of the writer of the apocryphal book of Judith (i. 9 [A. V. Kades]). The "wilderness of Kades" occurs only in l. xxi. 8, and is probably undistinguishable from that of Zin. As regards the name "Kadesh," there seems some doubt whether it is originally Hebrew.

Almost any probable situation for Kadesh on the grounds of the Scriptural narrative is equally opposed to the impression derived from the aspect of the region thereabouts. No spot, perhaps, in the locality above indicated, could now be an eligible site for the host of the Israelites "for many days," Jerome speaks of it as a "desert" in his day, and makes no allusion to any city there, although the tomb of Miriam, of which no modern traveller has found any vestige, had there its traditional site. It is possible that the great volume of water which in the rainy season swamps by the great El Jezel and other wadis into the S. W. corner of the Ghor, might, if duly husbanded, have once created an artificial oasis, of which, with the neglect of such industry, every trace has since been lost. But, as no attempt is made here to fix on a definite site for Kadesh as a city, it is enough to observe that the objection applies in nearly equal force to nearly all solutions of the question of which the Scriptural narrative admits.

KADMIEL (כדמיל) [who stands before God, i.e. his servant]: KADEMIAH; [in Neh. vii. 43, Vat. KADMBHA; MS. Caballal], one of the Levites who with his family returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and was probably a representative of the descendants of Hodaiah, or, as he is elsewhere called, Hodecah or Judah (Ezr. ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43). In the first attempt which was made to rebuild the Temple, Kadnemil and Joshua, probably an elder member of the same house, were, together with their families, appointed by Zerubbabel to superintend the workmen, and officiate in the thanksgiving-service by which the laying of the foundation was solemnized (Ezr. iii. 9). His house took a prominent part in the confession of the people on the day of humiliation (Neh. ix. 4, 5), and with the other Levites joined the princes and priests in a solemn compact to separate themselves to walk in God's law (Neh. x. 9). In the parallel lists of 1 Esdr. he is called KADMIEL.

KADMONITES, THE (כדמוני, i.e. "the Kadmonite" [hetheler in the east]: חדמנים; Alex. omits: Cudmannus, a people named in Gen. xv. 19 only; one of the nations who at that time occupied the land promised to the descendants of Abram. The name is from a root קדמ, signifying "eastern," and also "ancient." (Gen. Thes. p. 1195).

Beccart (Chan. i. 19; Pohl, iv. 36) derives the Kadmonites from Cadmus, and further identifies them with the Hivites (whose place they fill in the above list of nations), on the ground that the Hivites occupied Mount Hermon, "the most easterly part of Canaan." But Hermon cannot be said to be on the east of Canaan, not, if it were, did the Hivites live there so exclusively as to entitle them to an appellation derived from that circumstance (see vol. ii. p. 1082). It is more probable that the name Kadmonite in its one occurrence is a synonym for the Bnai Kedem — the "children [sons] of the East," the general name which in the Bible appears to be given to the tribes which roved in the great waste tracts on the east and southeast of Palestine.

G.

The Kadmonites even at Jerom might be said to be on the east as compared e. g. with the Zidonians on the west, "he said, "as the sun," says Thacker- son, "is still preserved among the Nusairiyeh north of Tripoli, and they have a tradition that their ancestors were expelled from Palestine by Joshua. It is curious also that a fragment of this strange people still cling to their original home at 'Ain Fit, Zorah, and Gibeah, near the foot of Hermon. I have repeatedly travelled among them in their own mountains, and many things in their physiognomy and manners gave me the idea that they were a remnant of the most ancient inhabitants of this country " (Loud & Buck, i. 242).

KAL-LAI [2 syl.] ( calves, swine of one, one): KALAI; [Vat. Alex. F. omits: F. 8 ΧΑΛΛΑΙ (èrò)]: a priest in the days of Joakim the son of Joshua. He was one of the chiefs of the fathers, and represented the family of Salsib (Neh. xii. 20).

KANAH (קנה) [place or place of reeds]: Kana'; Alex. KANA: Cuma, one of the places which formed the landmarks of the boundary of Asher: apparently next to Zidon-rabhab, or "great Zidon" (Josh. xix. 28 only). If this inference is correct, then Kanah can hardly be identified in the modern village Kana', six miles inland, not from Zidon, but from Tyre, nearly 20 miles south thereof. The identification, first proposed by Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii. 456), has been generally accepted by scholars (Wilson, Loud, ii. 238; Porter, Handbook, 365; Schwarz, 192; Van de Velde, i. 180). Van de Velde (i. 209) also treats it as the native place of the "woman of Canaan" (גנה כנענית) who cried after our Lord. But the former identification, not to speak of the latter — in which a connection is assumed between two words radically different — seems untenable. An "Abi Kana" is marked on the map of Van de Velde, about 8 miles S. E. of Sidon (Zidon), close to the conspicuous village Jarjir, at which latter place Zidon lies full in view (Van de Velde, i. 437). This at least answers more nearly the requirements of the text. But it is put forward as a mere conjecture, and must abide further investigation.

G.

That the village of אָלָּא mentioned by Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii. 456) and generally accepted by travelers, is the one referred to in Josh. xix. 28 seems probable for various reasons. Assuming BETEN (which see) to have been, as Eusebius claims, eight miles east of Ptolemais, we must take our point of departure in giving the boundaries of Asher (Josh. xix. 25) a little south of Achzib, or Edlipa, the sitewhich of which may be laid down with certainty. Passing by Helkath and Hali, the site of which is lost, we come to Beten on the road southward toward Carmel. That Beten by inland might be imagined, inasmuch as the Asherites did not drive not the inhabitants of the sea-coast from Arzib to Archi (Alkev). The border then passed KANAAN, THE RIVER southward to Achshaph, which is probably Hlaphi',  חלפיא, of the present day (see Achshaph). Passing by Abonamlick (cf. Wady el-Melkh north of Carmel) and Anam and Mishech, two unknown sites, we come to Carmel. This fixes the direction of the route by which the border is designated. From this point the border turns eastward, and at its juncture with the lot of Zebahun its direction plainly turns northward, and passing places identified with a degree of probability, it reaches Kana, and the border of the great Zidon. Now it is objected that Tyre is much nearer this Kana than Zidon. But it must be remembered that at this early period Zidon was probably greater than Tyre, and that the inhabitants of Tyre are themselves called Zidonians. It may have been, that at that period the territory of Zidon extended nearer to Kana than it did in later times when Tyrian power had interfered between it and Zidon. In any case, the eastern border is simply said to have extended from Kana even unto great Zidon.

This does not make it necessary that the city walls should be understood, which supposition would be forbidden by the historical fact that the territory of Zidon remained unoccupied; and whether we suppose that the territory of Asher stretched to the northward of the parallel of Tyre, toward Zidon, or not, in either case it is inadmissible to extend it to the city gates, just as it is inadmissible to extend it (ver. 29) to the gates of Tyre itself. The existence of the name Kanaan, unchanged by centuries, in a spot having so many chains for recognition as the one intended (Josh. xix. 28), must fix the identification with a reasonable degree of certainty, and forestall the attempt to establish the site at the obscure ' Ain Kanana near Jerjew, S. E. of Sakhita.

Van de Velde's attempt (i. 292) to establish this site as the place of birth of the "woman of Canaan" is to be rejected on philological grounds. Kanaanah is derived from Kanaan, not from Kana. Furthermore, for Kanaanah (Matt. xv. 22), Mark (vii. 26) has Σωτόφοινα, designating race and nationality, not place of birth or residence. It would have been possible for a Jewess to have resided in Kana or be born there, but the Evangelist wishes to designate this woman as not a Jewess, but a foreigner, a Canaanita. G. E. P.

KANA'A, THE RIVER (קנאה; קנה) the torrent or wady K.: Χαλααα, φάραγγι Καραά; Alex. χαλαάα γᾶ κανα και φαραγγί καραα; Vullis arwordeliteli, a stream falling into the Mediterranean, which formed the division between the territories of Ephraim and Manasseh, the former on the south, the latter on the north (Josh. xvi. 8, xvii. 9). No light appears to be thrown on its situation by the Ancient Versions or the Onomasticon. Dr. Robinson (iii. 135) identifies it "without doubt" with a wady, which taking its rise in the central mountains of Ephraim, near Akrobot, some 7 miles S. E. of Nobbha, crosses the country and enters the sea just above Jaffa as Nahar el-Ajjech, bearing part of its course the name of Wady Kannah. But this, though perhaps sufficiently important to serve as a boundary between two tribes, and though the retention of the name is in its favor, is surely too far south to have been the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh. The conjecture of Schwarz (51) is more plausible—that it is a wady which approaches west of and close to Nobbha, at ' Ain el-KANAH, and falls into the sea as Na'ar Faleh, and which bears also the name of Wady al-Khasah— the reedy stream. This has its more northerly position in its favor, and also the agreement in signification of the names (Kanah meaning also reedy). But if it should not be forgotten that the name Khashah is borne by a large tract of the maritime plain at this part (Stanley, S. & P. 290) Porter pronounces for N. Akhlab, close below Cesarea.

G.

K AP E R on C A P E R (from κάτωπαρι and in Lat. caputari). Many suppose this fruit or plant, to be meant in Eccles. xii. 5 by θηρίον το αυτον, "the caper," instead of "desire" (A. V.). The word occurs only in that passage. The meaning then is that, as one of the signs and effects of old age, the caper (acconsemed to be eaten for its stimulating properties) shall at length lose its power to excite the appetite of the aged or restore to them their last vigor. The article in the Hebrew (as above) and the verb's semi-figurative sense (θηρίον, "shall break" sc. its compact or promise) favor this explanation. Celsius (Hierob. i. 209 ff.) mentions some of the authorities in support of this view. Prof. Stuart adopts it. (Commentary on Ecclesiastes, p. 327 f.)

KARA'A (קאראא; Kaper; Coree), the father of Johann and Jonathan, who supported Gedaliah's authority and avenged his murder (Jer. xi. 8, 13, 15, 16, xii. 11, 13, 14, 16, xiii. 1, 8, xilii. 2, 4, 5). He is elsewhere called CAREA.

KARKA'A (with the def. article, כרה; כארא; כארא) [bottom, foundation]: Καρας, in both MSS.; Synn. translating, Καρας: Corov; one of the landmarks on the south boundary of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 3), and therefore of the Holy Land itself. It lay between Adhar and Azmon, Azmon being the next point to the Mediterranean (Wady el-Arish). Karka, however, is not found in the specification of the boundary in Numb. xxiv., and it is worth notice that while in Joshua the line is said to make a detour (כרה צור) to Karka, in Numbers it runs to Azmon. Nor does the name occur in the subsequent lists of the southern cities in Josh. xv. 21-32, or xix. 2-8, or in Neh. xi. 25, 46. Eusebius (Onomasticon, Ακαραε) perhaps speaks of it as then existing (καραε εστιν), but at any rate no subsequent traveller or geographer appears to have mentioned it.

KARKOR (with the def. article, כרה or כרה; כארו; כארו) foundation, Ges.; or perh. flat and soft ground, Distr.): Kapeda: Alex. Kapera: Vulg. translating, requiescensbot), the place in which the remnant of the host of Zebah and Zalmunna which had escaped the rear of the Jordan Valley were encamped, when Gideon burst upon and again dispersed them (Judg. viii. 10). It must have been on the east of the Jordan, beyond the district of the towns, in the open wastes inhabited by the nomadic tribes — "the land that dwelt on the east of Nohab and Juezhebah" (ver. 11). But it is difficult to believe that it can have been so far to the south as it is placed by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. Capch and "Carech"), namely one day's journey (about 15 miles) north of Petra, where in their time stood the fortress of Caracara, as in ours the Fastle of Kirc ch-Shebek (Durellanit, 19 Aug. 1858). The scene is somewhat similar to that of Characa, or Charcha, a place on the east of the Jordan, mentioned once in the Macabean history; but there is nothing to be said either for or against the identification of the two.

If Kamar be KENATH, on which Nohab bestowed his own name (with the usual fate of such innovations in Palestine), then we should look for Karthar in the desert to the east of that place; which is quite far enough from the Jordan Valley, the scene of the first encounter, to justify Josephus's expression, παρα σας τολα (Ant. vii. 6, § 5), and the careless "security" of the Midianites. But no traces of such a name have yet been discovered in that direction, or any other than that above mentioned.

KARTAH (קַרְתָּה. 8.21. [city]; בַּקָּדָשָׁה: Alex. קַפָּה: Carthah), a town of Zebulun, which with its "suburbs" was allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34). It is not mentioned either in the general list of the towns of this tribe (xix. 10-16), or in the parallel catalogue of Levitical cities in 1 Chr. vi. nor does it appear to have been recognized since.

* Van de Velde inserts a Tell Kircbing on his Map of Palestine, in the plain a little inland from Kafaij. He speaks of this as probably the Karthah of Josh. xxii. 34. An ancient null and numerous old building stones mark the site. (Syv. of Pal. i. 293.)

KARTAN (קַרְתָּן. 21.21. [double city]; קַפָּה: Alex. Karpiai; [Comp. Ab. קַפָּה: Carthah], a city of Naphtali, allotted with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxii. 32). In the parallel list of 1 Chr. vi. the name appears in the more usual form of KERTATHAM (ver. 74), of which Kartan may be either a provincialism or a contraction. A similar change is observable in Dothan and Dothaim. The LXX. evidently had a different Hebrew text from the present.

KATTATH (קַתָּתָה. small or young); Karet: Alex. Kartath: Cethath), one of the cities of the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15). It is not mentioned in the Onomasticon. Schwartz (172) reports that in the Jerusalem Me'garoth, Kattath "is said to be the modern Kattim," which he seeks to identify with Kama Lark, — most probably the Gena of Galilee of the N. T., 5 miles north of Scythopolis, partly on the ground that Gena is given in the Syriac as Kattah, and partly for other but not very palpable reasons.

KEQAR (קֶקֵר), black skin, black shaven man, Gen.: קַקְרָדָה: Kedar), the second in order of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13: 1 Chr. ii. 29), and the name of a great tribe of the Arabs, settled on the northwest of the peninsula and the confines of Palestine. This tribe seems to have been, with Tena, the chief representative of Ishmael's sons in the western portion of the land they originally peopled. The "glory of Kedar" is recorded by the prophet Isaiah (xviii. 13-17) in the burden upon Arabia; and its importance may also be inferred from the "princes of Kedar," mentioned by Ez. (xxvii. 21), as well as the pastoral character of the tribe: "Arabia, and all the princes of Kedar, who occupied with thee in lands, and rams, and goats, in these be ye they merchants." But this characteristic is maintained in several other remarkable passages. In Cant. i. 5, the black tents of Kedar, black like the goat's or camel's hair tents of the modern Bedawee, are forcibly mentioned, "as [am] black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon." In Is. vi. 7, we find the "flocks of Kedar, together with the rams of Nebaioth; and in Jer. xlix. 21, "concerning Kedar, and concerning the sons of Hazor," it is written, "Arise ye, go up to Kedar, and spoil the men of the Fast [the Dā'awī-Kēdār]. Their tents and their flocks shall they take away: they shall take to themselves their tent-curtais, and all their vessels, and their camels" (28, 29). They appear also to have been, like the wandering tribes of the present day, "archers" and "mighty men" (Is. xxi. 17; comp. Ps. cxxv. 5). They also settled in villages or towns, we find from that magnificent passage of Isaiah (xli. 11), "Let the wilderness and the cities thereof lift up [their voice], the villages [that] Kedar doth inhabit: let the inhabitants of the rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains;"—unless encampments are here intended. But dwelling in more permanent habitations than tents is just what we should expect from a far-stretching tribe such as Kedar certainly was, covering in their pasture-lands and watering places the western desert, settling on the borders of Palestine, and penetrating into the Arabian peninsula, where they were to be the fathers of a great nation. The archers and warriors of these tribes were probably engaged in many of the wars which the "men of the Fast" (of whom Kedar is probably the only settlement, and the most probably a part wagged, in alliance with Midianites and others of the Bene-Kedem, with Israel see M. Camun de Pereval's Ezors, i. 180, 181, on the war of Gideon, etc.). The tribe seems to have been one of the most conspicuous of all the Ishmaelite tribes, and hence the Rabbin call the Arabinians universally by this name.

In Is. xxii. 17, the descendants of Kedar are called the Bene-Kedar. As a link between Bible history and Mohammdan traditions, the tribe of Kedar is probably found in the people called the Cedri or Fliny, on the confines of Arabia Petraea to the south (N. B. v. 11); but they have, since classical times, become merged into the Arab nation, of which so great a part must have sprung from them. In the Mohammdan traditions, Kedar ( وهي) is the ancestor of Mohammed, and through him, although the genealogy is broken for many generations, the necestry of the letter from Ishmael is carried. (See Caussin, ibid., i. 175 ff.). The descent of the bulk of the Arabs from Ishmael we have elsewhere shown to rest on indisputable grounds. [Istmael.]

KEDEMMAH (קֶדֶמָ֣ה, i. e. eastward: Kēdēmāh [Alex. in 1 Chr. Kēdēmu], the youngest of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chr. i. 31).

KEDE'MOTH (קֶדֶמֹות; in Deut. and Chron. קֶדֶמֹות; in Josh. קֶדֶמֹות [beginnings, origin]): Kēdemoth, Bekevehāth, Ḥēderēm, Ḫēdēmāt; [Vat. in Josh. xiii. Bekevehāth, in 1 Chr. Kēdēma]! Alex. Kēdēmoth, Kēdēmāt, ʿĪdēmāth, Kēdemoth; Gedēmāth, Gedēmoth, Kēdēmāth (Cedemoth, Cēdēmāth [Cedemoth])], one of the towns in the district east of the Dead Sea allotted to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18); given with its “suburbs” to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 37; 1 Chr. vi. 79); in the former of these passages the name, with the rest of the verses 36 and 37, is omitted from the Rec. Hebrew Text, and from the Vulg. It possibly conferred its name on the “wilderness, or uncultivated pasture land” (Milhîr), of Kedemoth, “in which Israel was encamped when Moses asked permission of Sihon to pass through the country of the Amorites; although, if Kedemoth be treated as a Hebrew word, and translated = East ern,” the same circumstance may have given its name both to the city and the district. And this is more probably the case, since “Aroer on the brink of the torrent Arnon” is mentioned as the extreme (south) limit of Sihon’s kingdom and of the territory of Reuben, and the north limit of Mos. Kedemoth, Jahazah, Hazchon, and other towns, being apparently north of it (Josh. xiii. 16; &c.), while the wilderness of Kedemoth was certainly outside the territory of Sihon (Deut. ii. 26; 27, &c.), and therefore south of the Arnon. This is supported by the terms of Num. xxi. 23, from which it would appear as if Sihon had come out of his territory into the wilderness; although on the other hand, from the fact of Jahaz (or Jahazah) being allotted to Reuben (Num. ii. 23), it seems doubtful whether the towns named in Josh. xiii. 16-21 were all north of Arnon. As in other cases we must await further investigation on the east of the Dead Sea. The place is but casually mentioned in the Omission (—Kedemoth “), but yet so as to imply a distinction between the town and the wilderness. No other Græveller appears to have noticed it. (See Ewald, Gesch. ii. 271.) [DARAH.]

KE'DESH (קדש; the name borne by three cities in the Palestine. 1. (Kādēṣ; Alex. Kēdēṣ; Cēdēs) in the ex-

a Some of the variations in the LXX. are remarkable. In Judg. iv. 3, 10, Vat. has Kēdēs and Alex. Kēdēṣ; but in ver. 11, [and 1 Chr. vi. 70], they both have Kēdēs. In 2 Chr. 29 both have Kēdēṣ. In Judg. iv. and elsewhere, the Peshito Version has Recem-Naphthali for Kedesh, Recem being the name which in the Targums is commonly used to the Southern Kadesh, K. Barnesa. (See Stanley, S. & P. 94 note.)

b Πρὸς Βορρᾶν πέλας τῆς Γαλαάσας τῆς Ἀαρ. Κεδῆς τοῦ ωτοῦ, J. D. Michaelis (Orient. und Exeg. Bibliothek, 1773, No. 84) argues strenuously for the admitted person of Beroth and Kedes in this passage with Berucy (Berucia) and Kedes, near Tamar (see above); yet interesting and ingenious is as the attempt, the treme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23). Whether this is identical with Kadesh-Barnna, which was actually one of the points on the south boundary of the tribe (vii. 3; Num. xxxiv. 4), it is impossible to say. Against the identification is the difference of the name,—hardly likely to be altered if the famous Kadesh was intended, and the occurrence of the name elsewhere showing that it was of common use.

2. (Kēdēṣ; Alex. Kēdēṣ; Cēdēs), a city of Issachar, which according to the catalogue of 1 Chr. vi. was allotted to the Gershonite Levites (ver. 72). In the parallel list (Josh. xxi. 28) the name is Keshon, one of the variations met with in these lists, for which it is impossible satisfactorily to account. The Kedes mentioned among the cities whose kings were slain by Joshua (Josh. xii. 22), in company with Megiddo and Jokneam of Carmel, would seem to have been this city of Issachar, and not, as is commonly accepted, the northern place of the same name in Naphtali, the position of which in the catalogue would naturally have been with Hazor and Shimron-Meron. But this, though probable, is not conclusive.

3. Kedesheh (Kādēṣ, Kādēṣ, Kēdēṣ, Kēdēṣ; Alex. also Kēdēṣ; Cēdēs): also Kedesheh in GALL-LEE (גַּלְלֵי), i.e. “K. in the Galiil:” Ḫādēṣ, etc.) in τῇ Γαλαάσα (Vat.-Alex.; Cēdēs in Gal-lée): and once, Judg. iv. 6, Kedesheh-NAPHTALI (נַפְתַּלִי), one of the fortified cities of the tribe of Naphtali, named between Ha-azor and Edrah (Josh. xix. 37); appointed as a city of refuge, and allotted with its “suburbs” to the Gershonite Levites (xx. 7, xxi. 32; 1 Chr. vi. 76). In Josephus’s account of the northern wars of Joshua (Ant. v. 1, § 18), he apparently refers to it as marking the site of the battle of Merom, if Meron be intended under the form Beroth.” It was the residence of Barak (Judg. iv. 6), and there he and Deborah assembled the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali before the conflict (9, 10). Near it was the tree of Zaanannim, where was pitched the tent of the Kenites Heber and Jaal, in which Sisera met his death (ver. 11). It was probably, as its name implies, a “holy place” of great antiquity, which would explain its selection as one of the cities of refuge, and its being chosen by the prophets as the spot at which to meet the warriors of the tribes before the commencement of the struggle “for Jehovah against the mighty.” It was one of the places taken by Tidhar-Ṭilesar in the reign of Pekah (Jos. Ant. ix. 11, § 1, Kīṭāra: 2 K. xv. 29); and here again it is mentioned in immediate connection with Hazor. Its next and conclusion cannot be tenable. (See also a subsequent paper in 1774, No. 116.)

c From the root קדש, common to the Semitic languages (Gesenius, Theor. 1105, 8). Whether there was any difference of signification between the Southern Kadesh and Kedesh, does not seem at all clear. Gesenius places the former in connection with a similar word which would seem to mean a person or thing devoted to the infamous rites of ancient heathen worship—“Σαρκαρίων, ταυρόμενον, ταύρον ταυροῦν. " But he does not absolutely say that the false god resided in the name of the place Kadesh.” To Kedesh he gives a favorable interpretation — "Sacrarium." The other interpreters, as Hilfer and Simonia do not recognize the distinction.
KEILAH

last appearance in the Bible is as the scene of a battle between Jonathan Maccabaeus and the forces of Demetrius (1 Macc. xi. 63, 73, A. V. Cades; Jos. Ant. xiii. 5, § 6, 7). After this time it is spoken of by Josephus (B. J. ii. 18, § 1; iv. 2, § 3, πάρος Κωδοσσος) as in the possession of the Phoenician king, Xerxes, and well fortified, and with a great number of inhabitants: and he mentions that, during the siege of Giscala, Titus removed his camp thither—a distance of about 7 miles, if the two places are correctly identified—a movement which allowed John to make his escape.

By Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. "Cedes") it is described as lying near Enaaces, and 20 miles from Tyre, and as called Kudossos or Chlisim. Brocadus (Devar. ch. iv.) describes it, evidently from personal knowledge, as 4 leagues north of Safed, and an abounding in ruins. It was visited by the Jewish travellers, Benjamin of Tudela (A. d. 1170) and ha-Parchi (A. d. 1315). The former places it one day's, and the latter half-a-day's, journey from Kanna (Hebrew of Tudela by Asher, i. 82 B. M.), according to a previous imperfect knowledge and errors in transcription, there is a tolerable agreement between the above accounts, recognizable now that Dr. Robinson has with great probability identified the spot. This he has done at Kesh, a village situated on the western edge of the basin of the Ain el-Huleh, the great depressed basin or tract through which the Jordan makes its way into the Sea of Merom. Kedha lies 10 English miles N. of Safed, 4 to the N. W. of the upper part of the Sea of Merom, and 12 or 13 S. of Boniia. The village itself "is situated on a rather high ridge, jutting out from the western hills, and overlooking a small green vale or basin. Is its site a splendid one, well watered and surrounded by fertile plains? There are numerous sarcophagi, and other ancient remains (Rob. iii. 396–408; see also Van de Velde, ii. 417. Spaleni, 365, 368). In the Greek (Κεδεσχ) and Syriac (Keshel di Naphtholi) texts of Tob. i. 2,—though not in the Vulgate or A. V.—Kedesh is introduced as the birthplace of Tobias. This is exceedingly corruptions, but some little support is lent to this reading by the Vulgate, which, although omitting Kedesh, mentions Safed,—"post viam que duxit ad Occidentem, in simulacris et sarcophagis,"—of Tobias, in similitudinem civitatis Sapheth. The name Kedesh exists much farther north than the possessions of Naphtali appear to have extended, attached to a lake of considerable size on the Orontes, a few miles south of Hama, the ancient Emessus (Rob. iii. 549; Thomson, in Ritter, Itiner. Islam., 1002, 1004). The lake was well known under that name to the Arabic geographers (see, besides the authorities quoted by Robinson, Abu-l-Feda in Schulten's Index Geogr., "Fluvius Orontes" and "Kudomus"), and they connect it in part with Alexander the Great. But this and the origin of the name are alike uncertain. At the lower end of the lake is an island which, as already remarked, is probably the site of Kesheth, the capture of which by Sibele is preserved in the records of the Egyptian king. [Jerusalem, vol. ii. p. 198, note c.]

KEHILATAH (קְהִלָּתָה) [assembly, or congregation]—Macrælia: [Alex. Macræs] (Cethilah), a desert encampment of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 22, 23), of which nothing is known. H. H.

KEILAH [3 syl.] (קֵילָה), but in 1 Sam. xiii. 5, [Ketesh, fortress, Sim. Ges.]:—Kideitch, Keilad [Vat. Alex. KICelA [Vat. once Keeilad]—Joseph. Kilia; and the people of Kilaoroi and of Kajatir: Cult: Luth. Keylaf, a city of the Shefelah or lowland district of Judah, named, in company with Cezirah and Mackeyah, in the next group to the Philistine cities (Josh. xv. 44). Its main interest consists in its connection with David. He rescued it from an attack of the Philistines, who had fallen upon the town at the beginning of the harvest (Josh. Ant. vi. 13, § 1), plundered the corn from its threshing-floor, and driven off the cattle (1 Sam. xxiii. 1). The prey was recovered by David (2–5), who then remained in the city till the completion of the building. It was then a fortified place, as with walls, gates, and bars (1 Sam. xxiii. 7, and Joseph.). During this time the massacre of Nob was perpetrated, and Keilah became the repository of the sacred Ephod, which Abiathar the priest, the sole survivor, had carried off with him (ver. 6). But it was not destined long to enjoy the presence of these brave and hallowed inhabitants, nor indeed was it worthy of such good fortune, for the inhabitants soon plotted David's betrayal to Saul, then on his road to besiege the place. Of this intention David was warned by Divine intimation. He therefore left (1 Sam. xxiii. 7–13).

It will be observed that the word Bani is used by David to denote the inhabitants of Keilah, in this passage (vv. 11, 12; A. V. "men"); possibly pointing to the existence of Canaanites in the place (Haim, vol. i. p. 287 n.).

We catch only one more glimpse of the town, in the times after the captivity, when Hashabiah, the ruler of one half the district of Keilah (or whatever the word Pehes, A. V., "part," may mean), and Davai ben-Hemedal, ruler of the other half, assisted Nebuchadnezzar in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 17, 18). Keilah appears to have been a congregation, with the local suffix ת, which many of these names carry. Compare the name of another place of encampment ת, that appears to be from the same root.

This is said by Gezer-ina and others to be the signification of the name "Keilah." If this be so, there would probably appear to be a reference to this and the contemporary circumstances of David's life, in Ps. xxxiii.; not only in the expression (ver. 21), "marvelous kindness in a strong city" (קֵילָה תַּתָּא), but also in verse 8, and in the general tenor of the Psalm.
KELAIAH

known to Eusebius and Jerome. They describe it in the Onomasticon as existing under the name Kašd, or Cela, on the road from Eleutheropolis to Hebron, at 8 a miles distance from the former. In the map of Lieut. V. Van de Velde (1858), the name Kila occurs attached to a site with ruins, on the lower road from Beit Jibrin to Hebron, at very nearly the right distance from B. Jibrin (almost certainly Eleutheropolis), and in the neighborhood of Beit Na'd (Neziq) and Mounts (Maresiah). The name was only reported to Lieut. V. (see his Memoir, p. 328), but it has been since visited by the indefatigable Tobler, who completely confirms the identification, merely remarking that Kila is placed a little too far south on the map. Thus another is added to the list of places which, though specified as in the "lowland," are yet actually found in the mountains: a puzzling fact in our present ignorance of the principles of the ancient boundaries. [Litt. Jud. 1: 1490 &c.]

In the 4th century a tradition existed that the prophet Habakkuk was buried at Keila (Onomasticon, = Cela); *Nicaephorus, H. E. xii. 48; Cassiodorus, in Sozomen, H. E. vii. 29); but another tradition gives this honor to Hukkok.

In 1 Chr. iv. 19, "Keila the Garmithe" is mentioned, apparently—though it is impossible to say with certainty—as a descendant of the great Caleb (ver. 15). But the passage is extremely obscure, and there is no apparent connection with the town Keila.

G.

KELAIAH [3 syll.] (כֶּלַּיָּה) [derert]: Koleia; Alex. Koleia; [Vat.] FA. Koleia; Celio = Kelaiah (Ezr. x. 23). In the parallel list of 1 Esdr. his name appears as Colius.

KELITA (כֶּלְיָתָא) [derert]: Koleitas, [Vat. FA.1] Koleio, FA.2 Koleitas; Koleit in Neh, x. 10 (Vat. FA.1 omit); Celio; Celita in Ezr. x. 23), one of the Levites who returned from the Captivity with Ezra, and had intermarried with the people of the land (Ezr. x. 23). In company with the other Levites he assisted Ezra in expounding the law (Neh. viii. 7), and entered into a solemn league and covenant to follow the law of God, and separate from admixture with foreign nations (Neh. x. 10). He is also called Kelaiah, and in the parallel list of 1 Esdr. his name appears as Colitas.

KEMU'EL (כֶּעֶמְעֵל) [assembly of God]: Kaunah(A): Camatia). 1. The son of Nahor by Milcah, and father of Aram, whom Ewah (Gesch, i. 414, note) identifies with Ram of Job xxiii. 2, to whose family Eliphaz belonged (Gen. xxvii. 21). 2. The son of Shiphan, and prince of the tribe of Ephraim; one of the twelve men appointed by Moses to divide the land of Canaan among the tribes (Num. xxxiv. 24).

3. [Vat. Σοροια]. A Levite, father of Hashshah, prince of the tribe in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 17).

KENAN (כֶּנָּן) [possession]: Cainan; Cainan = Cainan the son of Enos (1 Chr. i. 2), whose name is also correctly given in this form in the margin of Gen. v. 9.

KENATH (כֶּנָּת) [possession]: Kad; Alex. Kavanah; in Chron. both MSS. [rather, Rom. Alex.] Kavanah; [Vat. Kavanah]: Canath, Canathah, one of the cities on the east of Jordan, with its daughter-town (A. V. "village") taken possession of by a certain Nahia, who then called it by his own name (Num. xxxii. 42). At a later period these towns, with those of Jair, were recaptured by Geshur and Aram (1 Chr. ii. 23). In the days of Eusebius (Onom. "Canath") it was still called Kanatha, and he speaks of it as "a village of Araba . . . near Bozra." Its site has been recovered with tolerable certainty in our own times as Kenatha, a ruined town at the southern extremity of the Lejik, about 20 miles N. of Basrah, which was first visited by Burekhardt in 1810 (Syria, 83-86), and more recently by Porter (Onomasticon, ii. 87-115; Howelk. 512-14), the latter of whom gives a lengthened description and identification of the place. The suggestion that Kenatha was Kenath seems, however, to have been first made by Gesenius in his notes to Burekhardt (A. D. 1823, 505). It is another Kenath which is marked on Van de Velde's map, about 10 miles farther to the west.

The name furnishes an interesting example of the permanence of an original appellation. Norah, though conferred by the conqueror, and apparently at one time the received name of the spot (Judg. viii. 11), has long since given way to the older title. Compare Achcho, Kelaiah-Aria, etc.

KENAZ (כֶּנָּצ) [chose, hunting]: Kevef; [Alex. in Judg. i. 13, Kevef; in 1 Chr. i. 36, Kevefs]: Cenez. 1. Son of Eliphaz, the son of Esau. He was one of the dukes of Edom, according to both lists, that in Gen. xxxvi. 15, 42, and that in 1 Chr. i. 36, and the founder of a tribe or family, who were called from him Kenozites (Josh. xiv. 14, etc.). Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, and Othniel, were the two most remarkable of his descendants. [Caleh.]

2. [Kevef (Vat. Kevefsai, Kevefs)]. One of the same family, a grandson of Caleb, according to 1 Chr. iv. [13], where, however, the Hebrew text is corrupt. Another name has possibly fallen out before Kenaz.

KENZITE (written KEN TzzIITE, A. V. Gen. xv. 19: Keneitos; Kevefios; [Alex. in Josh. xiv. 14, Kevefios]: Cenexizes), an Edomish tribe (Num. xxxix. 12; Josh. xiv. 6, 14). [Kenz.] It is difficult to account for the Kenzites existing as a tribe so early as before the birth of Isacc, as they appear to have done from Gen. xv. 19. If this tribe really existed then, and the enumeration of tribes in ver. 19-21 formed a part of what the Lord said to Abram, it can only be said, with Bochart (Phelog. iv. 36), that these Kenzites are mentioned here only, that they had ceased to exist in the time of Moses and Joshua, and that whatever is known of their origin or place of abode. But it is worth consideration whether the enumeration may not be a later explanatory addition by Moses or some later editor, and so these Kenzites be descendants of Kenaz, whose adoption should be, "And Geshur and Aram took the Havoth-Jalir, with Kenath and her daughters, sixty cities. [See Bertheau, Chronic: Zuna's version; Targum of Joseph, etc., etc.] into Israel took place in the time of Caleb, which was the reason of their insertion in this place.

Vat. כָּרֵיַא, or כַּרַיַא; Alex. כַּרַיַא, or כָּרַיַא; כַּרְיַא כְּרַיַא; Jer. כַּרְיַא כְּרַיַא; כְּרַיַא], a tribe or nation whose history is strangely interwoven with that of the chosen people.
In the genealogical table of Gen. x. 13, the Kenites are not mentioned. The first mention of them is in company with the Kenizzites and Kadmonites, in the list of the peoples that then occupied the Promised Land (Gen. xv. 19). Their origin, therefore, like that of the two tribes just named, and of the Avvim (Avites), is hidden from us. But we may fairly infer that they were a branch of the larger nation of Midian — from the fact that Jethro, the elder of Moses's wife, who in the records of Moses (see ii. 15, 16, iv. 19, &c.) is represented as dwelling in the land of Midian, and as prince or priest of that nation, is in the narrative of Judges (i. 16, iv. 11 b) as distinctly said to have been a Kenite. As Midianites they were therefore descended immediately from Abraham by his wife Keturah, and in this relationship and their connection with Moses we find the key to their continued alliance with Israel. The important services rendered by the shekh of the Kenites to Moses during a time of great pressure and difficulty were rewarded by the latter with a promise of firm friendship between the two peoples — "what goodness Jehovah shall do unto us, the same will we do to thee." And this promise was gratefully remembered long after to the advantage of the Kenites (1 Sam. iv. 6). The connection then commenced lasted as firmly as a connection could last between a settled people like Israel and one whose tendencies were so markedly nomadic as the Kenites. They seem to have accompanied the Hebrews during their wanderings.
At any rate they were with them at the time of their entrance on the Promised Land. Their encampment — separate and distinct from the rest of the people — was within Baham's view when he heard his prophecy (Num. xxiv. 21, 22), and we may infer that theagedList in the capture of Jericho, the "city of palm-trees" (Judg. i. 10; comp. 2 Chr. xviii. 15). But the wanderings of Israel over, they forsok the neighborhood of the towns, and betook themselves to freer air — to "the wilderness of Judah, which is to the south of Arad " (Judg. i. 16), where "they dwelt among the people" of the district — the Amalekites who wandered in that dry region, and among whom they were living centuries later when Saul made his expedition there (1 Sam. xv. 6). Their alliance with Israel at this later date is shown no less by Saul's friendly warning than by David's feigned attack (xxvii. 10, and see xxx. 29).

But one of the sheikhs of the tribe, Heber by name, had wandered north instead of south, and at the time of the great struggle between the north-en and tribes and Judah, under Hozai, his tents were pitched under the tree of Zaanain, near Kedesh (Judg. iv. 11). Heber was in alliance with both the contending parties, but in the hour of extremity the ties of Hebd-relationship and ancient companionship proved strongest, and Nisera fell a victim to the hammer and the blade of Jael.

The most remarkable development of this people, exemplifying most completely their character-des, their Bedouin hatred of the restraints of civilization, their fierce determination, their attachment to Israel, together with a peculiar semi-nomadic austerity not observable in their earlier proceedings — is to be found in the sect or family of the Rechabites, founded by Rechab, or Jonadab his son, who came prominently forward on more than one occasion in the later history. [Jehosadab, Rechabites.]
The founder of the family appears to have been a certain Hamanath (A. V., Hemath), and a singular testimony is furnished to the connection which existed between this tribe of Midianite wanderers and the nation of Israel, by the fact that their name and descent are actually included in the genealogies of the great house of Judah (1 Chr.
ii. 59).

No further notices would seem to be extant of this interesting people. The name of Bo-Kan (abbreviated from Bene el-Kuin), is mentioned by Ewald ('Gesch. i. 337, note), as borne in comparatively modern days by one of the tribes of the descert; but little or no inference can be drawn from such similarity in names.

KIRCHEIFS, Ezck. xiii. 18, 21 כַּפְּלִיא כַּפְּלִיא (cereolus) = coverings for the head, from the French couvrechevel. The word appears in Chaucer as kerchevel (Eastwood and Wright's

Jehonathan, when the Rechabite Kiriathaim was so far "wasted" by the invading army of Asa, as to be driven to take refuge within the walls of the city, a step to which we may be sure nothing short of actual extremity could have forced these Children of the Desert. Whether "Asshir carried them away captive " with the other inhabitants we are not told, but it is at least possible.

It has been pointed out under Hohar that one of the wards opposite Jericho, the same which, by according to the local tradition, the Bene-Israel descended to the Jordan, retained the name of Sh'eleb, the Musul-mian version of Hohar.

A place named Kishr, possibly derived from the same root as the Kenites, is mentioned in the lists of the cities of "the south" of Judah. But there is nothing to imply any connection between the two [Kenites].
Keren-Happuch (כְּרֵנְ-הַפּוּךְ) [the point-brown]: Amalthea [Vat. Tet. Sin. U. Tet., Alex. Maltezis] Cyprus [Corinthis]. the youngest of the daughters of Job, born to him during the period of his reviving prosperity (Job xli. 14), and so called probably from her great beauty.

The Vulgate has correctly rendered her name "horn of antimony," the pigment used by eastern ladies to color their eyelashes; but the LXX., unless they had a different reading, adopted a current expression of their own age, without regard to strict accuracy, in representing Keriyyoth as "horn of Amalthea," or "horn of plenty."

Keriyyoth (כְּרֵי-יוֹת; i.e. Keriyyoth [cities]).

1. (חָיְל; Alex. πόλεις; Curioth.) A name which occurs among the lists of the towns in the southern district of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). According to the A. V. ("Keriioth, and Hezron"), it denotes a distinct place from the name which follows it; but this separation is not in accordance with the accentuation of the Rcc. Hebrew text, and is now generally abandoned (see Keil, Joaot, ad loc., and Hahnd, Pulciuus, pp. 703, 708, the versions of Kane, Calhoun, etc.), and the name taken as "Keriyyoth, which is Hazor," its name before its conquest was Hazor, for which was afterwards substituted Keriyyoth-Hezron — the "cities of H." Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii. 101), and Lient. Van de Velde (ii. 82) propose to identify it with Kureyetta ("the two cities"), a ruined site which stands about 10 miles S. from Hebron, and 3 from Mela (Monat).

Keriioth furnishes one, and that perhaps the oldest and most usual, of the explanations proposed for the title "Isaiceriot," and which are enumerated under Judas Isaioth, vol. ii. p. 1455. But if Keriioth is to be read in conjunction with Hezron, as stated above, another difficulty is thrown in the way of this explanation.

2. (קֵפַדָּה; Curioth.) A city of Moab, named in the denunciations of Jeremiah — and there only in company with Dibon, Beth-bilshahim, Bethmelek, and other places "far and near" (Jer. xviii. 24). None of the ancient interpreters appear to give any clue to the position of this place. By Mr. Porter, however, it is hesitatingly identified with Kureyagh, a ruined town of some extent lying between Busrak and Sulkind, in the southern part of the Hezron (Fire Years etc. ii. 191-93; Handbook, pp. 523, 524). The chief argument in favor of this is the proximity of Kerik to Busrak, which Mr. Porter accepts as identical with the Busrak of the same passage of Jeremiah. But there are some considerations which stand very much in the way of these identifications. Jeremiah is speaking (xviii. 21) expressly of the cities of the "Mishor" (A. V., "plain-country"), that is, the district of level downs east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, which probably answered in whole or in part to the Belof of the modern Arabs. In this region were situated a In the A. V. of 1011 the punctuation was still more marked — "and Keriioth: and Hezron, which is Hazor."

b This agrees with the version of Junius and Tremellius — "at Keriioth (Getzron or its Chatzeror), and with that of Luther. Castello, on the other hand, has " polarity, quae alia Hazor."

c This is a different place from the ruins and cave of Kureyath, near Tekoa (which see), about 2 hours southeast of Bethlehem. The names are somewhat Heshbon, Dibon, Elealeh, Beth-meon, Kir-heres — the only places named in the passage in question, the positions of which are known with certainty. The most northern of these (Heshbon) is not further north than the upper end of the Dead Sea; the most southern (Kir) lay near its lower extremity. Nor is there anything in the parallel denunciation of Moab by Isaiah (ch. xxvi.) to indicate that the limits of Moab extended further to the north. But Busrak and Kureyagh are no less than 68 miles to the N. X. E. of Heshbon itself, beyond the limits even of the modern Belks (see Kiepert's map to Wetzstein's Hebran and the Travcbmen, 1869), and in a country of an entirely opposite character from the " flat downs, of smooth and even turf," which characterize that district — "a savage and forbidding aspect .... nothing but stones and jagged black rocks ... the whole country around Kerik covered with heaps of loose stones," etc. (Porter, ii. 183, 193). A more plausible identification would be Kureyagh, at the western foot of Jebel Atturas, and but a short distance from either Dibon, Beth-meon, or Heshbon.

But on the other hand it should not be overlooked that Jeremiah uses the expression "far and near" (ver. 21), and that if Busrak and Kureyagh are not Bozrah and Keriioth, those important places have apparently flourished without any notice from the sacred writers. This is one of the points which further investigation by competent persons, east of the Jordan, may probably set at rest.

Keriioth occurs in the A. V., also in ver. 41. Here however it bears the definite article מַקְוֹטֶה, תְּל שֶׁרֶה; Alex. Καρκάκαβα; [Vat. P. Καρκακάβα; Curioth;], and would appear to signify not any one definite place, but "the cities" of Moab — as may also be the case with the same word in Amos ii. 2. [Keriioth.]

Kerros (כְּרֹס; weaver's comb): Kades; Alex. Kepos in Ezr. ii. 44; מַקְוֹטֶה, תְּל שֶׁרֶה; Kaparit: [Vat. Kepa, P. Kepa, F.] Alex. Kepos in Neh. vii. 47; Ceres, one of the Xethinium, whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel.

Kettle (כְּרֹט; מַחְבֶּה; nakheva), a vessel for culinary or sacrificial purposes (1 Sam. ii. 14). The Hebrew word is also rendered "basket" in Jer. xxiv. 2, "caldron" in 2 Chr. xxxv. 13, and "pot" in Job xiii. 29. [CALDIRON.] H. W. P.

Ketura (כְּרֻעָא, וּכְרֻעָא; accesor. Ges.: Κετ ο ρα: Ketero; Cetero), the "wife" whom Abraham "had added and took" (A. V., "again took") besides, or after the death of, Sarah (Gen. xxv. 1; i Chr. i. 32). Genesis and others adopt the theory that Abraham took Ketura after Sarah's death; but probability seems against it (compare Gen. xvii, 17, xviii. 11; Rom. iv. 19; and Heb. xi. 12), and we incline to the belief that the passage commencing with xxv. 1, and comprising perhaps the whole chapter, or at least as far as ver. 10, is placed out of order, but that is accidental Kuetreita is so called from a celebrated monk Chariton, who a.p. 340-350 occupied the cave as a kura or monastery, which it continued to be for ages. The name is given also to the adjacent place, and to a fountain and a little village. See Tobler's Deblaker aus Jerusalem, p. 581 and Sepp's Judenland und das heil. Land, i. 529. H

of its chronological sequence in order not to break the main narrative; and that Abraham took Keturah during Sarah's lifetime. That she was, strictly speaking, his wife, is also very uncertain. The Hebrew word translated in this place in the A. V., and by many scholars, is Ishah, a of which the first meaning given by Gesenius is "a woman, of every age and condition, whether married or not: and although it is commonly used with the signification of "wife," as opposed to handmaid, in Gen. xxx. 4, it occurs with the signification of concubine, and she gave him Bilhah her handmaid to wife." In the record in 1 Chr. i. 32, Keturah is called a "concubine," and it is also said, in the two verses immediately following the genealogy of Keturah, that "Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac. But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country" (Gen. xxv. 5, 6).

Except Hagur, Keturah is the only person mentioned to whom this passage can relate; and in confirmation of this supposition we find strong evidence of a wide spread of the tribes sprung from Keturah, bearing the names of her sons, as we have mentioned in other articles. These sons were "Zimran, and Jokshan, and Medan, and Midian, and Ishshar, and Shurah" (ver. 2); besides the sons and grandsons of Jokshan, and the sons of Midian. They evidently crossed the desert to the Persian Gulf and occupied the whole intermediate country, where traces of their names are frequent, while Midian extended south into the peninsula of Arabia Proper. The former branch of the "sons of the concubines," however, was that of Ishmael. He has ever stood as the representative of the hand-woman's sons; and as such his name has become generally applied by the Arabs to all the Abrahamic settlers north of the Peninsula—besides the great Ishmaelite element of the nation.

In searching the works of Arab writers for any information respecting these tribes, we must be contented to find them named as Arabians, or even Ishmaelites, for under the latter appellation almost all the former are confounded by their descendants. Keturah herself is by them mentioned very rarely and vaguely, and evidently only in quoting from a rabbinical writer. (In the Kérimos the name is said to be that of the Turks, and that of a young girl (or slave) of Abraham; and it is added, her descendants are the Turks!)

M. Cauvin de Ducoral (Essai, i. 129) has endeavored to identify her with the name of a tribe of the Amalekites (the 1st Amalek) called Katoura, but his arguments are not of any weight. They rest on a weak etymology, and are contradicted by the statements of Arab authors as well as by the fact that the early tribes of Arabia (of which is Katoura) have not, with the single exception of Amalek, been identified with any historical races; while the exception of Amalek is that of an apparently aboriginal people whose name is recorded in the Bible; and there are reasons for supposing that these early tribes were aboriginal.

E. S. P.
by no means extinct in Palestine at the present day. "In the neighborhood of En-gedi," says Tristram, (Not. Hist. of the Bible, p. 196), "while encamped by the Dead Sea shore, we obtained several fine specimens, and very interesting it was to find this graceful creature by the very fountain to which it gave name, and in the spot where it roamed of old while David wandered to escape the persecutions of Saul (1 Sam. xxiv. 2)." [EN-GEDI.] Thomson also speaks of them as found in the ravines near this fountain (Land and Book, ii. 129).

Among the pastoral inhabitants of Palestine a kid forms the ordinary dish at a feast or entertainment. "The lamb," says Tristram, "are more generally kept till they reach maturity, for the sake of their wool, and a calf is too large and too valuable to be slain except on some very special occasions. Whenever in the wilder parts of Palestine the traveller halts at an Arab camp, or pays his visit to a village sheikh, he is pressed to stay until the kid can be killed and ready, and he has an opportunity of seeing in front of the tent the kid caught and prepared for the cooking" (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 90 f.). This usage explains the terms of the elder brother's complaint in the parable of the prodigal: "Thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends, but as soon as this thy son was come ... thou hast killed for him the fatted calf" (Luke xv. 20, 30).

The custom of "seething a kid in its mother's milk" (which was forbidden to the Hebrews, see Ex. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 25, and Deut. xix. 21) is common among the Arabs of the present day. "They select," says Thomson, "a young kid, fat and tender, dress it carefully, and then stew it in milk, generally sour, mixed with onions and hot spices such as they relish. They call it Lbn limam — kid, 'in its mother's milk.'" The Jews however, refuse such food with abhorrence, not only as being abominable by Mosaic law, but unnatural and barbarous (Land and Book, i. 135).

The name is derived by Gesenius and others from הָעַרְבָּם (הָעַרְבָּם), "to be black," either, according to Robinson, from the turbidity of its stream (comp. Job vi. 19; though the words of Job imply that this was a condition of all brooks when frozen); or more appropriately, with Stanley, from the depth and obscurity of the ravine (Ex. xvi. P. 172), or possibly also — though this is proposed with hesitation — from the impurity which seems to have attached to it from a very early date.

We cannot, however, too often insist on the great uncertainty which attaches to the interpretations of these ancient names. Kidron, as a Hebrew word, we may be making a mistake almost as absurd as that of the coptic who altered it into τοῦ κηφόρον, believing that it arose from the presence of vipers.
by our Lord on his way to Gethsemane (John xviii. 1); a comp. Mark xiv. 26; Luke xxii. 39). Its connection with these two occurrences is also sufficient to leave no doubt that the Nachal Kidron is the deep ravine on the east of Jerusalem, now commonly known as the "Valley of Jehoshaphat."

But it would seem as if the name were formerly applied also to the ravines surrounding other portions of Jerusalem — the south or the west; since Solomon's prohibition to Shimei to "pass over the torrent Kidron" (1 K. ii. 37; Jos. Ant. viii. 1, § 5) is said to have been broken by the latter when he went in the direction of Gath to seek his fugitive slaves (41, 42). Now a person going to Gath would certainly not go by the way of the Mount of Olives, or approach the eastern side of the city at all. The route — whether Gath were at Beth-Awgin or at Tell es-Suifeh — would be by the Bethlehem-gate, and then nearly due west. Perhaps the prohibition may have been a more general one than is implied in ver. 37 (comp. the king's reiteration of it in ver. 42), the Kidron being in that case specially mentioned because it was on the road to Baburim, Shimei's home, and the scene of his crime. At any rate, beyond the passage in question, there is no evidence of the name Kidron having been applied to the southern or western ravines of the city.

The distinguishing peculiarity of the Kidron Valley — that is, the ravine as to which it is most frequently mentioned in the O. T. — is the impurity which appears to have been ascribed to it. Excepting the two casual notices already quoted, we first meet with it as the place in which King Asa demolished and burnt the obscene phallic idol (vol. ii. p. 1118) of his mother (1 K. xxv. 13; 2 Chr. xvi. 16). Next we find the wicked Athaliah hurried thither to execution (Jos. Ant. ix. 7, § 3; 2 K. xii. 16). Then it becomes the regular receptacle for the impurities and abominations of the idol-worship, when removed from the Temple and destroyed by the adherents of Jehovah (§ 2 Chr. xxix. 16, xxx. 14; 2 K. xiii. 4, 6, 12). In the course of these narratives, the statement of Josephus just quoted as to the death of Athaliah is supported by the fact that in the time of Josiah it was the common cemetery of the city (xi. 23; comp. xxv. 22; "graves of the common people."), perhaps the "valley of dead bodies" mentioned by Jeremiah (xxxi. 40) in close connection with the "fields" of Kidron; and the restoration of which to sanctity was to be one of the miracles of future times (ibid.).

How long the valley continued to be used for a burying-place it is very hard to ascertain. After the capture of Jerusalem in 609 B.C. the bodies of the slain were buried outside the Golden Gateway (Mishin, ii. 487; Todd, "Ungubunganii, p. 218); but what had been the practice in the interval the writer has not succeeded in tracing. To the date of the monuments at the foot of Oeloph we have at present no clue; but even if they are of pre-Christian times there is no proof that they are tombs.

From the date just mentioned, however, the burials appear to have been constant, and at present it is the favorite resting-place of Moslems and Jews. The former on the west, the latter on the east of the valley. The Moslems are mostly confined to the narrow level spot between the foot of the wall and the commenceinent of the precipitous slope; while the Jews have possession of the lower part of the slopes of Oeloph, where their scanty tombs are crowded so thick together as literally to cover the surface like a pavement.

The name Kidron is known in the O. T. with one single exception (2 K. xxiii. 4), attached to the name of Kidron, and apparently to that alone of the valleys or ravines of Jerusalem. Hammon is always the Ge. This enables us to infer with great probability that the Kidron is intended in 2 Chr. xxxiii. 4, by the break (Nachal) which ran through the midst of the land"; and that Hezekiah's preparations for the siege consisted in sealing the source of the Kidron — the upper springfield (not "watercourse," as A. V.) of Gilgon, where it burst out in the wady some distance north of the city, and leading it by a subterranean channel to the interior of the city. If this is so, there is no difficulty in accounting for the fact of the subsequent want of water in the ancient bed of the Kidron. In accordance with this also is the specification of Gilgon as "Gilgon-in-the-Nachal" — that is, in the Kidron Valley — though this was probably the lower of two outlets of the same name. [Gilgon.]

It is mentioned as "close to Jerusalem on the eastern side, and spoken of by John the Evangelist." But the favorite name of this valley at the time of Jerome, and for several centuries after, was "the Valley of Jehoshaphat," and the name Kidron, or, in accordance with the orthography of the Vulgate, Cidron, is not invariably found in the travellers (see Arcuti, "Earl. Trav. I; Sewell, 41; Benjamin of Tudela; Maundeville, "Earl. Trav. 176; Thietmar, 27; but not the Bordeaux Pilgrim, [Trans de Jersu-

The following description of the Valley of Kidron in its modern state — at once the earliest and the most accurate which we possess — is taken from 1863, in "R. D. B., 1859, xx. 111; 2, 1862, xxvii. 203;

"In approaching Jerusalem from the high mark of Nabi Samuel in the N. W., the traveller first descends and crosses the bed of the great Wady Beit Hunain already described. He then ascends again towards the S. E. by a small side wady and along a rocky slope for twenty-five minutes, when he reaches the Tomb of the Judges, lying in a small gap or depression of the ridge, still half an hour distant from the northern gate of the city. A few steps further he reaches the watershed be-and partly in the formation of sepalches. The region is full of excavated tombs; and these continue with more or less frequency on both sides of the valley, all the way down to Jerusalem. The valley runs for 15 minutes directly towards the city; a) it is here shallow and broad, and in some parts tilted, though very stony. The road follows almost the same line, and the valley now turns nearly east, almost at a right angle, and passes to the northward of the Tomb of the Kings and the Muslin Wely before mentioned. Here it is about 230 rods distant from the city; and the track between is tolerably level ground, planted with olive-trees. The Nablus road crosses it in this part, and ascends the hill on the north. The valley is here still shallow, and runs in the same direction for about 10 minutes. It then turns again to the south, and, following this general course, passes between the city and the Mount of Olives.

Before reaching the city, and also opposite its northern part, the valley spreads out into a basin of some breadth, which is tilted, and contains plantations of olive and other fruit-trees. In this part it is crossed obliquely by a road leading from the N. E. corner of Jerusalem across the northern part of the Mount of Olives to Amase. Its sides are still full of excavated tombs. As the valley descends, the steep side upon the right becomes more and more elevated above it; until, at the gate of St. Stephen, the height of this brow is about 100 feet. Here a path winds down from the gate on a course S. E. by E., and crosses the valley by a bridge; beyond which are the church with the Tomb of the Virgin, Gethsemane, and other plantations of fruit-trees, already described. The path and bridge are on a causeway, or rather terrace, built up across the valley, perpendicular on the southern side; the earth being filled in on the northern side up to the level of the bridge. The bridge itself consists of an arch, open on the southern side, and 17 feet high from the bed of the channel below; but the northern side is built up, with two subterranean drains entering it from above; one of which begins from the southern point of the Virgin's Tomb, and the other from the fields farther in the northwest. The breadth of the valley at this point will appear from the measurements which I took from St. Stephen's Gate to Gethsemane, along the path, namely —

The last three numbers give the breadth of the proper bottom of the valley at this spot, namely, 435 feet or 145 yards. Further north it is somewhat broader.

Below the bridge the valley contracts gradually, and sinks more rapidly. The first continuous traces of a water-course or torrent-bed commence at the bridge, though they occur likewise at intervals higher up. The western hill becomes steeper and more elevated; while on the east the Mount of Olives rises much higher, but is not so steep. At the distance of 1000 feet from the bridge on a course S. 19° W. the bottom of the valley has become merely a deep gully, the narrow bed of a torrent, from which the hills rise directly on each side. Here another bridge b) is thrown across it on an arch; and just by on the left are the alleged tombs of Jehoshaphat, Absalom, and others; as also the Jewish cemetery. The valley now continues for a few minutes of the same character, and follows the same course (S. 100° W.) for 500 feet further; where it makes a sharp turn for a moment towards the right. This portion is the narrowest of all; it is here a mere ravine between high mountains. The S. E. corner of the area of the mosque overhangs this part, the corner of the wall standing upon the very brink of the declivity. From it to the bottom, on a course S. E. the angle of depression is 27°, and the distance 450 feet, giving an elevation of 128 feet at that point; to which may be added 20 feet or more for the rise of ground just north along the wall; making in all an elevation of about 150 feet. This, however, is the highest point above the valley; for further south the narrow ridge of Ophel slopes down as rapidly as the valley itself. In this part of the valley one would expect to find, if anywhere, traces of ruins thrown down from above, and the surface of the ground covered by the rubbish thus accumulated. Occasional blocks of stone are indeed seen, but neither the surface of the ground, nor the bed of the torrent, exhibits any special appearance of having been raised or interrupted by masses of ruins.

Below the short turn above mentioned, a line of 1025 feet on a course S. W. brings us to the Fountain of the Virgin, lying deep under the western hill. The valley has now opened a little; but its bottom is still occupied only by the bed of the torrent. From here a course S. 21° W. carried us along the village of Siloam (Κήφρος Σεβρίων) on the eastern side, and at 1170 feet we were opposite the mouth of the Tyropoeon and the Pool of Siloam, which lies 255 feet within it. The mouth of this valley is still 40 or 50 feet higher than the bed of the Kidron. The steep descent between the two has been already described as built up in terraces, which, as well as the strip of level ground below, are occupied with gardens belonging to the village of Siloam. These are irrigated by the waters of the Pool of Siloam, which at this time were lost in them. In these gardens the stones have been removed, and the soil is a fine mould. They are planted with fig and other fruit-trees, and furnish also vegetables for the city. Elsewhere the bottom of the valley is thickly strewn with small stones.

Further down, the valley opens more and is tilted. A line of 685 feet on the same course (S. 21° W.) brought us to a rocky point of the eastern hill, here called the Mount of Offense, over against the entrance of the Valley of Hinnom. Thence to the well of Job or Nehemiah is 275 feet due south. At the junction of the two valleys the bottom forms an oblong plat, extending from the gardens above mentioned nearly to the well of Job, and being 150 yards or more in breadth. The western and north-western parts of this plat are in like manner occupied by gardens; many of which are also on terraces and receive a portion of the waters of Siloam.

Below the well of Nehemiah the Valley of Jehoshaphat continues to run S. S. W. between the Mount of Offense and the Hill of Evil Counsel,

KIDRON, THE BROOK

so called. At 130 feet is a small cavity or outlet by which the water of the well sometimes runs off. At about 1200 feet, or 400 yards, from the well is a pass under the western hill, where in the rainy season water flows out as from a fountain. At about 1500 feet or 500 yards below the well the valley lends off S. 75° E. for half a mile or more, and then turns again more to the south, and pursues its way to the Dead Sea. At the angle where it thus lends eastward a small wadi comes in from the west, from behind the Hill of Evil Counsel. The width of the main valley below the well, as far as to Hlobe, varies from 50 to 100 yards; it is full of olive and fig-trees, and is in most parts ploughed and sown with grain. Further down it takes the name among the Arabs of Wady er-Ribid, "Monks' Valley," from the convent of St. Saba situated on it; and still nearer to the Dead Sea it is also called Wady er-Nisr, "Fire Valley." 2

1 The channel of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, the Hesek Kidron of the Scriptures, is nothing more than the dry bed of a winter torrent, bearing marks of being occasionally swept over by a large volume of water. No stream flows here now except when the heavy rains of winter, when the waters descend into it from the neighboring hills. Yet even in winter there is no constant flow; and our friends, who had resided several years in the city, had never seen a stream running through the valley. Nor is there any evidence that there was an ancient more water in it than at present. Like the wadis of the desert, the valley probably served of old, as now, only to drain off the waters of the rainy season.

1 A point is unnoticed in Dr. Robinson's description, sufficiently curious and well-attested to merit further careful investigation—the possibility that the Kidron flows below the present surface of the ground. Dr. Barclay ('City, etc., p. 392) mentions "a fountain that bursts forth during the winter in a valley entering the Kidron from the north, and flows several hundred yards before it sinks;" and again he testifies that at a point in the valley about two miles below the city the quantities of a stream deep below the ground may be distinctly heard, which stream, on excavation, he actually discovered under the Western hill, where in the two points the brook is flowing in a subterraneous channel, as is "not at all un frequent in Palestine" (p. 303). Nor is this a modern discovery, for it is spoken of by William of Tyre; by Brocardus (Hebr. cap. viii.), as audible near the "Tomb of the Virgin;" and also by Fabri (l. 370), Marinus Sanutus (3, 14, 9), and others.

That which Dr. Robinson complains that neither he nor his friends were fortunate enough to witness has since taken place. In the winter of 1853-54 so heavy were the rains that not only did the lower part of the Kidron, below the so-called well of Nechemiah or Jehud, run with a considerable stream for the whole of the month of March (Barclay, 515), but also the upper part, "in the middle section of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, flowed for a day or two" (Stewart, Tent of Klim, 316). The Well of Jehud is probably one of the outlets of the mysterious spring which flows below the city of Jerusalem, and its overflow is comparatively common; 4 but the flowing of a stream in the upper part of the valley would seem not to have taken place for many years before the occasion in question, although it occurred also in the following winter (Jewish Intelligence, May 1856, p. 137 note), and, as the writer is informed, has since become almost periodical. 5

* The language of Dr. Barclay (see above) hardly implies so much as the actual discovery of the subterranean stream spoken of. His words are that "about two miles southeast of the city" where a "notable stream of running water beneath the ground" was said to have been heard, "on removing the rocks to the depth of about ten or twelve feet, water was found, though in small quantity, in midsummer" (City of the Great King, pp. 302, 303).

flows and discharges its waters down the Wady er-Nisr, the lower part of the Kidron, then they are certain that they will have abundance of water during the summer; if there is no overflow, their minds are filled with forebodings." (Stewart, 259.)

1 A list of some of the plants found in this valley is given by Medicus (261); and some samples of information about the valley itself at p. 140.

2 During the latter rains of February and March the well 'Ain Avgb is a subject of much speculation and interest to all dwellers in the city. If it overflows and discharges its waters down the Wady er-Nisr, the lower part of the Kidron, then they are certain that they will have abundance of water during the summer; if there is no overflow, their minds are filled with forebodings." KINAH

KINDRED

KINAH (ጊጓሮ) [memoration, dirigę]: እስካፋ: Alex. KINN: Citiu, a city of Judah, one of those which lay or the extreme south boundary of the tribe, next to Edom (Josh. xx. 22). It is mentioned in the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome, but not so as to imply that they had any actual knowledge of it. With the sole exception of Schwartz (90), it appears to be unmentioned by any traveller, and the "town Ginnah situated near the wilderness of Zin" with which he would identify it, is not to be found in his own or any other map.

Professor Stanley (S. of P. p. 160) very ingeniously connects Kinah with the Kenites (ኢትሮ), who settled in this district (Jugd. i. 16). But it should not be overlooked that the list in Josh. xv. purports to record the towns as they were at the conquest, while the settlement of the Kenites probably (though not certainly) did not take place till after a.

KINDRED. a I. Of the special names denoting relation by consanguinity, the principal will be found explained under their proper heads, FATHER, BROTHER, etc. It will be there seen that the words which denote near relation in the direct line are used also for the other superior or inferior degrees in that line, as grandfather, grandson, etc.

On the meaning of the expression Shè’r bašor (see below 1 and 2) much controversy has arisen. Sh’er, as shown below, is in Lev. xvii. 6, in marg. of A. V., "remainder." The rendering, however, of Shè’r bašor in text of A. V., "near of kin," may be taken as correct, but, as Michaelis shows, without determining the precise extent to which the expression itself is applicable (Mich. Lives of Moses, ii. 48, ed. Smith; Koshol on Levitica; see also Lev. xxiv. 49; Num. xxvii. 11).

II. The words which express collateral consanguinity are — (1) uncle; (2) aunt; (3) nephew; (4) niece (not in A. V.); (5) cousin.

III. The terms of affinity are — 1. (a) father-in-law, (b) mother-in-law; 2. (a) son-in-law, (b) daughter-in-law; 3. (a) brother-in-law, (b) sister-in-law.

The relations of kindred, expressed by few words, and imperfectly defined in the earliest ages, acquired in course of time greater significance and wider influence. The full list of relatives either by consanguinity, i. e. as arising from a common ancestor, or by affinity, i. e. as created by marriage, may be seen detailed in the Corpus Juris Civ. Digest, lib. xxxviii. tit. 10, de Grudha; see also Corp. Jur. Canum. Decr. ii. c. xxxv. 9, 5.

The domestic and economical questions arising out of kindred may be clasbed under the three heads of MARRIAGE, INHERITANCE, and BLOOD-REVENGE; and the reader is referred to the articles on those subjects for information thereon. It is clear that the tendency of the Mosaic Law was to increase the restrictions on marriage, by defining more precisely the relations created by it, as is shown by the cases of Abraham and Moses. [ISRAEL;
The immediate occasion of the substitution of a regal form of government for that of the judges seems to have been the siege of Jabesh-gilead by Nahash, king of the Ammonites (1 Sam. xi. 1, xii. 12), and the refusal to allow the inhabitants of that city to capitulate, except on humiliating and cruel conditions (1 Sam. xii. 4, 4-6). The conviction seems to have forced itself on the Israelites that they could not resist their formidable neighbor unless they placed themselves under the sway of a king, like surrounding nations. Concurrently with this conviction, disgust had been excited by the corrupt administration of justice under the sons of Saul, and a radical change was desired by them in this respect also (1 Sam. viii. 3-5). Accordingly the original idea of a Hebrew king was two-fold: first, that he should lead the people to battle in time of war; and, secondly, that he should execute judgment and justice to them in war and in peace (1 Sam. viii. 20). In both respects the desired end was attained. The righteous wrath and military capacity of Saul were immediately triumphant over the Ammonites: and though ultimately he was defeated and slain in battle with the Philistines, he put even them to flight on more than one occasion (1 Sam. xiv. 23, xvii. 52), and generally waged successful war against the surrounding nations (1 Sam. xiv. 47). His successor, David, entered on a series of brilliant conquests over the Philistines, Moabites, Syrians, Edomites, and Ammonites (see David, vol. i. p. 301); and the maps confined within the narrow bounds of Palestine, had an empire extending from the river Euphrates to Gaza, and from the entering in of Hamath to the river of Egypt (1 K. iv. 21). In the mean while complaints cease of the corruption of justice; and Solomon not only consolidated and maintained in peace the empire of his father, David, but left an enduring reputation for his wisdom as a judge. Under this expression, however, we must regard him, not merely as pronouncing decisions, primarily, or in the last resort, in civil and criminal cases, but likewise as holding public levees and transacting public business as the gate, when he would receive petitions, hear complaints, and give summary decisions on various points, which in a modern European kingdom would come under the cognizance of numerous distinct public departments.

To form a correct idea of a Hebrew king, we must abstract ourselves from the notions of modern Europe, and realize the position of Oriental sovereigns. It would be a mistake to regard the Hebrew government as a limited monarchy, in the English sense of the expression. It is stated in 1 Sam. x. 25, that Samuel "told the people the name of the kingdom," and wrote it in the book and laid it before the Lord; and it is barely possible that this may refer to some statement respecting the boundaries of the kingly power. But no such document has come down to us; and if it ever existed, and contained restrictions of any moment on the kingly power, it was probably disregarded in practice. The following passage of Sir John Malcolm respecting the Shabs of Persia may, with some slight modifications, be regarded as fairly applicable to the Hebrew monarchy under David and Solomon: 'The monarch of Persia has been pronounced to be one of the most absolute in the world. His word has ever been deemed a law; and he has probably never had any further restraint upon the free exercise of his vast authority than has arisen from his regard for religion, his respect for established usages, his desire of repu?tation, and his fear of exciting an opposition that might be dangerous to his power, or to his life' (Malcolm's Persis, vol. ii. 361; compare Elphinstone's India, or the Indian Mofulmante Empire, lock viii. e. 3). It must not, however, be supposed to have been either the understanding, or the practice, that the sovereign might seize at his discretion the private property of individuals. Ahaz did not venture to seize the vineyard of Nahoth till, through the testimony of false witnesses, Nahoth had been convicted of blasphemy; and possibly his vineyard may have been seized as a confiscation, without flagrantly outraging public sentiment in those who did not know the truth (1 K. xxi. 6). But no monarchy perhaps ever existed in which it would not be regarded as an outrage, that the monarch should from covetousness seize the private property of an innocent subject in no ways dangerous to the state. And generally, Sir John Malcolm proceeds as follows, in reference to "one of the most absolute" monarchs in the world, it will be understood that the Hebrew king, whose power might be described in the same way, is not, on account of certain restrictions which exist in the nature of things, to be regarded as a "limited monarch" in the European use of the words. "We may assume that the power of the king of Persia is by usage absolute over the property and lives of his conquered provinces, his rebellious subjects, his own family, his ministers, over public officers civil and military, and all the numerous towns of dominacies; and that

\[1\] The precise period depends on the length of the reign of Saul, for estimating which there are no certain data. In the O. T. the exact length is nowhere mentioned. In Acts, xiii. 21 forty years are specified; but this is in a speech, and statistical accuracy may have been foreign to the speaker's ideas on that occasion. And there are difficulties in admittin that he reigned so long as forty years. See Williamson and RAW, and the article Saul in this Dictionary. It is only in the reign of David that mention is first made of the "recorder" or "chronicler" of the king (2 Sam. viii.

\[2\] The word used in the text (בַּלּוּף) is not a "true" Mandarin in the LAX, meaning, in essence, "true," "act," or "ordinance" (see Ezek. iv. 17, Jer. xii. 17, 14. 13). But Josephus seems to have regarded the Sanhedrin, as a sort of a president, which, before the king, of the sanhedrin, which were to arise from the kingly power as a kind of protest record for succeeding ages (see Act. vi. 4, § 8).
be may punish any persons of these classes, without examination or formal procedure of any kind: in all other cases that are capital, the forms prescribed by law and custom are observed; the monarch only commands, when the evidence has been examined and the law declared, that the sentence shall be put in execution, or that the condemned subject be delivered up to his own, in accordance with such usages. David ordered Uriah to be treacherously exposed to death in the forefront of the hottest battle (2 Sam. xi. 15); he caused Rechab and Baanah to be slain instantly, when they brought him the head of Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 12); and he is represented as having on his death-bed recommended Solomon to put Joab and Shimei to death (1 K. ii. 5-9). In like manner, Solomon caused to be killed, without trial, not only his elder brother Adonijah, and Joab, whose execution might be regarded as the exceptional acts of a dismal state policy in the beginning of his reign, but likewise Shimei, after having been seated on the throne three years. And King Saul, in resentment at their compliance with David's escape, put to death 35 priests, and caused a massacre of the inhabitants of Nob, including women, children, and sucklings (1 Sam. xxi. 18, 19).

Besides being commander-in-chief of the army, supreme judge, and absolute master, as it were, of the lives of his subjects, the king exercised the power of imposing taxes on them, and of exacting from them personal service and labor. Both these points seem clear from the account given (1 Sam. viii. 11-17) of the evils which would arise from the kingly power: and are confirmed in various ways. Whatever mention may be made of consulting "old men," or "elders of Israel," we never read of their deciding such points as these. When Palt, the king of Assyria, imposed a tribute on the kingdom of Israel, "Menashe, the king," exacted the money of all the mighty men of wealth, of each man 30 shekels of silver (2 K. xxv. 19). And when Jehoiakim, king of Judah, gave his tribute of silver and gold to Pharaoh, he taxed the land to give the money: he exacted the silver and gold of the people of every one according to his taxation (2 K. xxiii. 35). And the degree to which the exactation of personal labor might be carried on a special occasion is illustrated by King Solomon's requirements for building the Temple. He raised a levy of 30,000 men, and sent them to Lebanon by courses of ten thousand a month; and he had 70,000 that bare burdens, and 80,000 hewers in the mountains (1 K. v. 13-15). Judged by the oriental standard, there is nothing improbable in these numbers. In our own days, for the purpose of constructing the Mahnoodeh Canal in Egypt, Memelit, by orders given to the various sheikhs of the provinces of Sakarah, Ghizeh, Mensoura, Sharkieh, Menouf, Bahireh, and some others, caused 300,000 men, women, and children, to be assembled along the site of the intended canal. a This was 120,000 more than the levy of Solomon.

In addition to these earthly powers, the King of Israel had a more awful claim to respect and obedience. He was the viceroy of Jehovah (1 Sam. x. 1, xvi. 13), and as it were His son, if just and holy (2 Sam. vii. 14; Ps. lxxxix. 25, 27, ii. 6, 7).

He had also a claim to a divine power, as it was said in his mouth that he had his head had been poured the holy anointing oil, composed of olive-oil, myrrh, cinnamon, sweet calamus, and cassia, which had hitherto been reserved exclusively for the priests of Jehovah, especially the high-priest, or had been solely used to anoint the Tabernacle of the Congregation, the Ark of the Testimony, and the vessels of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxv. 29-33; xl. 9; Lev. xxi. 10; 1 K. i. 39). He had become, in fact, emphatically "the Lord's Anointed." At the coronation of sovereigns in modern Europe, holy oil has been frequently used, as a symbol of divine right; but this has been mainly regarded as a mere form; and the use of it was undoubtedly introduced in imitation of the Hebrew custom. But, from the beginning to the end of the Hebrew monarchy, a living red signification continued to be attached to consecration by anointing oil. From well-known anecdotes related of David,—and perhaps, from words in his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 21)—it results that a certain sacredness invested the person of Saul, the first king, as the Lord's anointed; and that, on this account, it was deemed sacrilegious to kill him, even at his own request (1 Sam. xxiv. 6, 10, xxvi. 9, 16; 2 Sam. i. 14). And, after the destruction of the first Temple, in the Book of Lamentations over the calamities of the Hebrew people, it is by the name of "the Lord's Anointed" that Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, is bewailed (Lam. iv. 20). Again, more than 600 years after the capture of Zepheliah, the name of the Anointed, though never so used in the Old Testament,—yet suggested probably by Ps. ii. 2, Dan. ix. 26,—had become appropriated to the expected king, who was to restore the kingdom of David, and inaugurate a new era of prosperity and peace, as the Anointed of God, or the Messiah, and the Prositines, would again be incorporated with the Hebrew monarchy, which would extend from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean Sea and to the ends of the earth (Acts i. 6; John i. 41, iv. 25; Is. xi. 12-14; Ps. lxxii. 8). And thus the identical Hebrew word which signifies anointed, b through its Aramaic form adopted into Greek and Latin, is still preserved to us in the English word Messiah. (See Gesenius's Thesaurus, p. 825.) A ruler in whom so much authority, human and divine, was embodied, was naturally distinguished by outward honors and luxuries. He had a court of oriental magnificence. When the power of the kingdom was at its height, he sat on a throne of ivory, covered with pure gold, at the feet of which were two figures of lions. The throne was apa See The Englishman in Egypt, by Mrs. Poole, vols. ii. p. 219. Owing to insufficiency of provisions, bad treatment, and neglect of proper arrangements, 30,000 of this number perished in seven months (p. 220). In compulsory levies of labor, it is probably difficult to prevent gross injustice; but the representation of 30,000 of the ten tribes, Adoniraim, called also Adoniram, who was over the levy of 30,000 men for Lebanon, was stoned to death (1 K. xii. 13; 1 K. v. 14; 2 Sam. xxiv. 24).

b It is supposed both by John (Archaeol. Bib. § 229) and Bauer (in his Hist. Altevthemat., § 30), that a king was only anointed when a new family came to the throne, or when the right to the crown was disputed. It is usually on such occasions only that the anointing is specified; as in 1 Sam. x. 1, 2 Sam. ii. 4, 1 K. i. 33, 2 K. i. 3, 2 K. xii. 12: but this is not invariably the case (see 1 K. v. 17), and there does not seem sufficient reason to doubt that each individual king was anointed. There can be little doubt, likewise, that the kings of Israel were anointed, though this is not specified by the writers of Kings and Chronicles, who would deem such anointing invalid.
proceeded by 6 steps, guarded by 12 figures of lions, two on each step. The king was dressed in royal robes (1 K. xxii. 10; 2 Chr. xvii. 9): his insignia were, a crown or diadem of pure gold, or perhaps radiant with precious gems (2 Sam. i. 10, xii. 30; 2 K. xii. 12; Ps. xxi. 3), and a royal sceptre (Ex. xix. 11; Is. xiv. 5; Ps. xiv. 6; Am. i. 5, 8). Those who approached him did him obeisance, bowing down and touching the ground with their foreheads (1 Sam. xxiv. 8; 2 Sam. xix. 18); and this was done even by a king's wife, the mother of Solomon (1 K. i. 16). Their officers and subjects called themselves his servants or slaves, though they do not seem habitually to have given way to such extravagant salutations as in the Chaldean and Persian courts (1 Sam. xvii. 32, 34, 36, xx. 8; 2 Sam. vi. 20; Dan. ii. 4). As in the East at present, a kiss was a sign of respect and homage (1 Sam. x. 1, perhaps Ps. ii. 12). He lived in a splendid palace, with porches and columns (1 K. vii. 2–7). All his drinking-vessels were of gold (1 K. x. 21). He had a large harem, which in the time of Solomon must have been the source of enormous expense, if we accept as statistically accurate the round number of 700 wives and 3,000 concubines, in all 1000, attributed to him in the Book of Kings (1 K. xi. 3). As is invariably the case in the great eastern nations, the church was present, his harem tended to be enlarged by exiles; translated "officers" in the A. V. for the most part (1 Sam. viii. 15; 2 K. xxiv. 12, 15; 1 K. xxii. 9; 2 K. viii. 6, ix. 32, 33, xx. 18, xxiii. 11; Jer. xxxviii. 7). The main practical restraints on the kings seem to have arisen from the prophets and the prophetic order, though in this respect, as in many others, a distinction must be made between different periods and different reigns. Indeed, under all circumstances, much would depend on the individual character of the king or the prophet. No transaction of importance, however, was entered on without consulting the will of Jehovah, either by Urim and Thummim or by the prophets; and it was generally the persuasion that the prophet that was in an especial sense the servant and messenger of Jehovah, to whom Jehovah had declared his will (Is. xiv. 29; Am. iii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, ix. 6; see PROPHECY). The prophets not only rebuked the king with boldness for individual acts of wickedness, as after the murders of Uriah and of Naboth; but also, by interposing their denunciations or exhortations at critical periods of history, they swayed permanently the destinies of the state. When, after the revolt of the ten tribes, Rehoboam had under him at Jerusalem in army stated to consist of 180,000 men, Shechemiah, as interpreter of the divine will, caused the army to separate without attempting to put down the rebellion (1 K. xii. 21–24). When Judah and Jerusalem were in imminent peril from the invasion of Sennacherib, the prophetic utterance of Isaiah encouraged Hezekiah to a successful resistance (Is, xxxvii. 22–36). On the other hand, at the close of Jeremiah's life, the Chaldaeans, Jeremiah prophetically announced impending woes and calamities in a strain which tended to paralyze patriotic resistance to the power of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxviii. 4, 2). And Jeremiah evidently produced an impression on the king's mind contrary to the counsels of the princes, or what might be called the war-party in Jerusalem (Jer. xxxviii. 14–27). The law of succession to the throne is sometimes somewhat obscure, but it seems most probable that the king during his lifetime named his successor. This was certainly the case with David, who passed over his elder son Adonijah, the son of Haggith, in favor of Solomon, the son of Bath-shheba (1 K. i. 30, ii. 22); and with Rehoboam, of whom it is said that he loved Maachah the daughter of Abisai above all his wives and concubines, and that he made Abijah her son to be ruler among his brethren, to make him king (2 Chr. xi. 21, 22). The succession of the first-born has been inferred from a passage in 2 Chr. xxx. 4, in which Jehoshaphat is said to have given the kingdom to Jehoram "because he was the first-born." But this very passage tends to show that Jehoshaphat had the power of naming his successor; and it is worthy of note that Jer- horam, on his coming to the throne, put to death all his brothers, which he would scarcely, perhaps, have done if the succession of the first-born had been the law of the land. From the conciseness of the narratives in the books of Kings no inference either way can be drawn from the ordinary formula in which the death of the father and succession of his son is recorded (1 K. xv. 8). At the same time, if no partiality for a favorite wife or son intervened, there would always be a natural bias of affection in favor of the eldest son. There appears to have been some prominence given to the mother of the king, whether of the earlier reigns (2 K. xxii. 15; 1 K. ii. 19), and it is possible that the mother may have reigned during the minority of a son. Indeed some such custom best explains the possibility of the audacious usurpation of Athaliah on the death of her son Ahaziah: an usurpation which lasted six years after the destruction of all the seed-royal except the young Jehoash (2 K. xi. 1, 3).

The following is a list of some of the officers of the king: —

1. The Recorder or Chronicler, who was perhaps analogous to the Historiographer whom Sir John Malcolm mentions as an officer of the Persian court, whose duty it is to write the annals of the king's reign (History of Persia, c. 2). Certain it is that there is no regular series of minute dates in Hebrew history until we read of this recorder, or remem- brancer, as the word merseir is translated in a marginal note of the English version. He signifies one who keeps the memory of events alive, in accordance with a motive assigned by Herodotus for writing his history, namely, that the acts of men might not become extinct by time (Herod. i. 1; 2 Sam. viii. 16; 1 K. iv. 3; 2 K. xxii. 18; Is. xxxvi. 3, 22).

2. The Scribe or Secretary, whose duty would be to answer letters or petitions in the name of the king, to write despatches, and to draw up edicts (2 Sam. viii. 17, xx. 35; 2 K. xii. 10, xix. 2, xxii. 8).

3. The officer who was over the house (Is. xxii. 15, xxxiv. 3). His duties would be those of chief steward of the household, and would embrace all the internal economical arrangements of the palace, the superintendence of the king's servants, and the custody of his costly vessels of gold and silver. He seems to have worn a distinctive robe of office and girdle. It was against Shebna, who held this office, that Isaiah uttered his personal prophecy (xxii. 15–25), the only instance of the kind in his writings (see Ges. Com. on Isaiah, p. 694).

4. The king's friend (1 K. iv. 5), called likewise the king's companion. It is evident from the name that this officer must have stood in confidential relation to the king, but his duties are nowhere specified.
It only remains to add, that in Deuteronomy xvii. 14-20 there is a document containing some directions as to what any king who might be appointed by the people was to do upon his accession. The proper appreciation of this document would mainly depend on its date. It is the opinion of many modern writers—Genesius, de Wette, Winer, and others—that the book which contains the document was composed long after the time of Moses. See, however, Deuteronomy in the 1st vol. of this work; and compare Genesius, Geschichte der hebräischen Sprache und Schrift, p. 32; de Wette, Einleitung in die Bibel, 7th and 18th edns., Winer, s. v. * KINGDOM OF HEAVEN—always with the article. ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν.

1. This expression occurs thirty-three times in the first Gospel, but nowhere else in the Scriptures. In one passage (iii. 2) it is attributed by Matthew to John the Baptist, in another (xviii. 1) to the disciples of Christ, and in all the rest to Christ himself. An abbreviated form of it is found in such phrases as, "the gospel of the kingdom" (iv. 23), "the word of the kingdom" (xiii. 19), "the sou[s] of the kingdom" (vii. 12, xiii. 38), and "the kingdom prepared for you" (xxv. 34). In a single instance (2 Tim. iv. 18) Paul speaks of the Lord's "heavenly kingdom," —ἡ βασιλεία αὐτοῦ τῶν οὐρανῶν,—an expression which is equivalent to "the kingdom of heaven," as this phrase was sometimes used by Christ. (See Matt. viii. 11, 12.) It will be observed that the Apostle not only describes the kingdom as "heavenly," but also as the Lord's, "his heavenly kingdom." In a few passages of the first Gospel (xiii. 41, xvi. 28, cf. xx. 21) it is likewise referred to as the Messiah's kingdom. With these may properly be connected the language of Christ in the Gospel of John (xviii. 36), the words of the Angel to Mary as preserved by Luke (i. 33), those of Christ as recorded by the same Evangelist (xii. 13, 15, xiii. 24, 30), and the teaching of the Apostles in their letters (1 Cor. xx. 24, 25; Eph. v. 5; Col. i. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 1; Heb. i. 8; 2 Pet. i. 11). The kingdom of heaven is therefore frequently represented as the kingdom of Christ. But it is still more frequently called the kingdom of God. Matthew attributes this expression in several instances to Christ (vi. 10, 33, xii. 28, xiii. 43, xxi. 31, 44, xxi. 29), and when, in reporting the Saviour's teaching, his Gospel gives the words "kingdom of heaven," the other synoptical Gospels have, as a rule, the words "kingdom of God" (e. g. cf. Matt. v. 3, xi. 11, xiii. 31, 33, with Luke vi. 20, vii. 28, xiii. 18, 20). In all the other books of the New Testament the latter designation is regularly employed. While therefore the two expressions denote the same object, and may be regarded as substantially equivalent, the latter appears for some reason to have displaced the former in the language of the Apostles. Rev. (Histoire de la Théologie Chrétienne ou Sécule Apostolique, i. 181) supposes that it had the advantage of being more comprehensive, not "seeming to restrict the notion to a future epoch, a particular locality, or a state of..."
things different from that in which humanity now exists," and was therefore preferred to the other by the Apostle.

The idea of a divine or heavenly kingdom was not proposed for the first time by John the Baptist and then adopted by Christ. It may be traced in many parts of the O. T., from the Pentateuch to the prophets of the exile. The Israelites as a people belonged especially to Jehovah, and were already in the law described as a nation of kings and priests unto Him (Ex. xix. 6, cf. 1 Pet. ii. 9). Yet even in their best estate, under David their greatest king, they were but a shadow of the true people of God, and their sovereign but a shadow of his greater Son. And this they were clearly taught: for a Messiah was foretold by the prophets, who should spring from the family of David, should salve all his foes, and should reign forever in righteousness and peace (Ps. ii. ex.; Is. xi. cf. Ps. cxiii.: Jer. xxiii. 5 ff.; xxxi. 31 ff.; xxxii. 37 ff.; xxxiii. 7 ff.; Ez. xxiv. 23 ff.; xxxvi. 24 ff.). Moreover, in length, the prophecies of Daniel it was distinctly revealed that the "God of heaven" was to set up a kingdom (ii. 44), which was to be composed of his saints (vii. 27), was to be administered by One like a son of man (vii. 13, 14), and was to be universal and everlasting (vii. 27).

The very expression, "kingdom of God," occurs in the Apocrypha (Wis. of Sed. s. 10). Accordingly, when Christ appeared among the Jews, they were expecting this kingdom of "the God of heaven" which was to be set up by the agency of their long anticipated Messiah; and, however erroneous their views of its nature had become, they were prepared to understand in some measure the language of Jesus and his disciples concerning it. A few indeed of the more devout and spiritual, like Simeon and Anna, appear to have had a tolerably just conception of its nature.

5. This kingdom, in its ultimate and perfect form, is said to have been prepared for the saints from the foundation of the world. (Matt. xxv. 34.) It was therefore included in the wise purpose of God which antedates creation, and in this sense it is eternal. But the various representations of the N. T. have given rise to some differences of opinion among Biblical scholars as to the terminus a quo of its ultimate establishment. The writers of the O. T. speak of it distinctly as future and not present; and many passages of the N. T. refer to it in connection with the second coming of Christ. It is therefore maintained by some interpreters, that this kingdom has not yet been established, and will not be until the Lord returns in glory. Others have made the preaching of John the Baptist the date of its commencement, appealing to the words of Christ seen Matt. xi. 12, xiii. 11; Luke xvi. 16, in support of their position. But it has been objected to this, that one who was spoken of, by way of contrast, as less than the host of those in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xi. 11) could not have been an agent in setting up that kingdom, by introducing men into it, and that the kingdom itself must have its date fixed by the personal appearance and recognition of its king, that is, from the time of Christ's entrance on his public ministry. Others still, identifying the kingdom of God with the Christian church, have fixed upon the day of Pentecost, when the Spirit was poured out marvellously, as the date of its establishment. Perhaps the view which connects it most closely with the person of Christ, affirming that it began, properly speaking, with his public ministry, is entitled to the preference. For in the course of his preaching he spoke of it clearly as already come. At one time he said to the Pharisees, "If I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, the kingdom of God is come unto you." (Matt. xii. 28); and at another time he said to the same class of men, according to a natural interpretation of his words, "Behold, the kingdom of God is in the midst of you." (Luke xvi. 21). "The kingdom of God" (Eccles. Hist. de la Théod. Chr. i. 180) which Jesus wished to set up in his personal appearance on the world's theatre: his advent, and the advent of the kingdom, are one and the same thing, for he is the source and cause of it, and the cause may not exist without the effect.

He went so far even as to assign an exact date to the advent of the kingdom, and this date was no other than the moment when John Baptist, the last and greatest of the prophets, opened the door, so to speak, by announcing to the world of Him who would realize its cherished hopes. At that moment the movement towards the kingdom began, and men pressed on with ardor to enter into it."
KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF

from the heart the will of God. Jews and Greek, bond and free, are alike welcomed to the duties, the honors, and the eternal blessedness of the Messiah's reign. And there are a few passages of the N. T. which seem to ascribe to holy angels a connection with it both in service and glory. (Matt. xvi. 27, xiii. 41, xviii. 10; Luke xv. 10; Heb. i. 14; Eph. i. 10, 20, 22, iii. 15; 1 Pet. i. 12, iii. 22.)

6. Yet this kingdom, though in its nature spiritual, was to have with earth a visible form in Christian churches, and the simple rites belonging to church life were to be observed by every loyal subject (Matt. xxviii. 18 ff.; John iii. 5; Acts ii. 38; Luke xxi. 17 ff.; 1 Cor. xii. 24 ff.). It cannot however be said that the N. T. makes the spiritual kingdom of Christ exactly coextensive with the visible church. There are many in the latter who do not belong to the former (1 John ii. 9), and some doubtless in the former do not take their place in the latter.

* KINGDOM OF ISRAEL. [ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.]

KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF, originally only one book in the Hebrew Canon, and first edited in Hebrew as two by Bomberg, after the model of the LXX. and the Vulgate (De Wette and O. Theobald, Einleitung). They are called by the LXX, Origen, etc., Basileias tui ouropwr and regnum. The third and fourth of the Kingsbooks (the book of Samuel being the first and second), but by the Latins, with few exceptions, tertius et quartus Regnum liber. Jerome, though in the head- ing of his translation of the Scriptures he follows the Hebrew name, and calls them Liber Mahalchim Primus and Secundus, yet elsewhere usually follows the common usage of the church in his day. In his Prologus Galatus he places them as the fourth of the second order of the sacred books, i. e. of the Prophets: a) Quartus, Mahalchim, i. e. Regum, qui tertia et quartum regnum volumine continuat. Me- liusque nullo est Mahalchim, i. e. Regum, quam Manuelscloth, i. e. Regniowum, dicere. Non enim multum gentium descript regna: sed unius Israe- liti populi, qui tribus duodecim continetur. In his epistle to Paulinus he thus describes the contents of these two books: a) Mahalchim, i. e. ter- tius et quartus Regnum liber, a Salomone usque ad Jeconiam, et a Jeroboam filio Nabat usque ad Osee qui ductus est in Assyrias, regnum Juda et regnum describit Israel. Si historiam respiciat, verba simplicia sunt: si in literis senum latente inspexeris, Ecclesiæ paucitas, et hereticoorum contra ecclesiæ bellam, narratur. b The division into two books, being purely artificial and as it were mechanical, may be overlooked in speaking of them; and it must also be remembered that the division between the books of Kings and Samuel is equally artificial, and that in point of fact the histories and books commencing with and ending with 2 Kings present the appearance of one work, giving a continuous history of Israel from the times of Joshua to the death of Jehoiachin. It must suffice here to mention, in support of this assertion, the frequent allusion in the book of Judges to the times of the kings of Israel (xvii. 6, xviii. 1, xiv. 1, xxii. 25); the concurrent evidence of ch. ii. that the writer lived in an age when he could take a retrospect of the whole time during which the judges ruled (ver. 10-19), i. e. that he lived after the monarchy had been established; the occurrence in the book of Judges, for the first time, of the phrase "the Spirit of Jehovah" (iii. 10), which is repeated often in the book (vi. 34, xx. 23, xiv. 6, etc.), and is of frequent use in Samuel and Kings, (e. g. 1 Sam. x. 6, xvi. 13, xiv. 9; 2 Sam. xxii. 2; 1 K. xii. 24; 2 K. ii. 16, etc.); the allusion in i. 21 to the capture of Jerusalem, and the continuance of a Jehielite population (see 2 Sam. xxiv. 16): the reference in xx. 27 to the removal of the ark of the covenant from Siloah to Jerusalem, and the expression "in those days," pointing, as in xvi. 6, etc., to remote times; the distinct refer- ence in xviii. 30 to the Captivity of Israel by Shal- maneser; with the fact that the books of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, form one unbroken narrative, similar in general character, which has no beginning except at Judg. i., while, it may be added, the book of Judges is not a continuation of Joshua, but opens with a repetition of the same events with which Joshua closes. In like manner the book of Ruth clearly forms part of those of Samuel, sup- plying as it does the essential point of David's genealogy and early family history, and is no less clearly connected with the book of Judges by its references to the history of Saul and the early kings, while the whole book relates. Other links connecting the books of Kings with the preceding may be found in the comparison, suggested by De Wette, of 1 K. ii. 26 with 1 Sam. iii. 35; ii. 11 with 2 Sam. v. 5; 1 K. ii. 3, 4, v. 17; 18, viii. 18, 19, 25, with 2 Sam. vii. 12-16; and 1 K. iv. 1-6 with 2 Sam. viii. 15-18. Also 2 K. xvii. 41 may be compared with Judg. ii. 19; 1 Sam. ii. 27 with Judg. xviii. 6; 2 Sam. xiv. 17, 29, xii. 27, with Judg. xiii. 6; 1 Sam. ii. 21 with Judg. vi. 15, and xx. i. 8, 19; 2 Sam. vi. 17, and v. 7, 9; 1 Sam. xviii. 12 with Ruth iv. 17; Ruth i. 1 with Judg. xvii. 7, 8, 9, xiv. 1, 2 (Bethlehem-Judah); the use in Judg. xviii. 6, 8, of the phrase "the, man of God" (in the earlier books applied to Moses only, and that only in Deut. xxxii. 1 and Josh. iv. 6), may be com- pared with the very frequent use of it in the books of Samuel and Kings as the common designation of a prophet, whereas only Jeremiah besides (xxxiv. 4) so uses it before the Captivity. The phrase, "God a De Wette's reasons for reckoning Kings as a separate work seem to the writer quite inconclusive. On the other hand, the book of Joshua seems to be an independent book. It avoids classes these books together as in the above (De W. i. 175), and calls them the great Book of the Kings."

b Eichhorn attributes Ruth to the author of the books of Samuel (Th. Parker's De Wette, ii. 329).

c In Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, it repeatedly occurs.
KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF

Jo so to me, and more also," is common to Ruth, Samuel, and Kings; and "til they were ashamed," to Judges and Kings (Judg. iii. 23; 2 K. ii. 17, viii. 11). And generally the style of the narrative, orderly quiet and simple, but rising to great vigor and spirit when stirring deeds are described (as in Judg. vi. vii., xi., &c.; 1 Sam. iv. xvii., xxxi.-1 K. viii., xviii., xix., &c.), and the introduction of poetry or poetic style in the midst of the narrative (as in Judg. v. 1 Sam. ii. 2 Sam. i. 17, &c., 1 K. xxi. 17, &c.), constitute such strong features of resemblance as lead to the conclusion that these several books form but one work. Indeed the very names of the books sufficiently indicate that they were all imposed by the same authority for the convenience of division, and with reference to the subject treated of in each division, and not that they were original titles of independent works.

But to confine ourselves to the books of Kings.

We shall consider—

I. Their historical and chronological range.

II. Their peculiarities of diction, and other features in their literary aspect.

III. Their authorship, and the sources of their information.

IV. Their relation to the books of Chronicles.

V. Their place in the canon, and the references to them in the New Testament.

I. The books of Kings range from David's death and Solomon's accession to the throne of Israel, commonly reckoned as n. c. 1015, but according to Lepsius n. c. 933 (Ko1i14b. d. Egyjpt. p. 102); to the destruction of the kingdom of Judah and the desolation of Jerusalem, and the burning of the Temple, according to the same reckoning n. c. 588 (n. c. 586, Lepsius, p. 107),—a period of 425 (or 405) years: with a supplemental notice of an event that occurred after an interval of 26 years, namely, the liberation of Jehoachin from his prison at Babylon, and a still further extension to Jehoiachin's death, the time of which is not known, but which was probably not long after his liberation. The history therefore comprises, the whole time of the Israelitish monarchy, exclusive of the reigns of Saul and David, whether existing as one kingdom as under Solomon and the eight last kings, or divided into the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. It exhibits the Israelites in the two extremes of power and weakness; under Solomon extending their dominion over tributary kingdoms from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean and the border of Egypt (1 K. iv. 21); under the last kings reduced to a miserable remnant, subject alternately to Egypt and Assyria, till at length they were rooted up from their own land. As the cause of this decadence it points out the division of Solomon's monarchy into two parts, followed by the religious schism and idolatrous worship brought about from political motives by Jeroboam. How the consequent wars between the two kingdoms necessarily weakened both; how they led to calling in the stranger to their aid whenever their power was equally balanced, of which the result was the destruction first of one kingdom and then of the other; how a further evil of these foreign alliances was the adoption of the idolatrous superstitions of the heathen nations whose friendship and protection they sought, by which they forfeited the Divine protection—all this is with great clearness and simplicity set forth in these books, which treat equally of the two kingdoms while they lasted.

The doctrine of the Theocracy is also clearly brought out (see e. g. 1 K. iv. 7-11, xv. 24, 30, xvi. 1-7), and the temporal prosperity of the pious kings, as Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, stands in contrast with the calamitous reigns of Rehoboam, Ahaziah, Ahaz, Manasseh, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. At the same time the constancy of the kingdom of Judah, and the permanence of the dynasty of David, are contrasted with the frequent changes of dynasty, and the far shorter duration of the kingdom of Israel, though the latter was the more populous and powerful kingdom of the two (2 Sam. xxiv. 9). As regards the affairs of foreign nations, and the relation of Israel to them, the historical notices in these books, though in the earlier times scanty, are most valuable, and as has been lately fully shown (Rawlinson's Four Ointment Lectures, 1859), in striking accordance with the latest additions to our knowledge of contemporary profane history. Thus the patronage extended to Hadad the Edonite by Psinaesch king of Egypt (1 K. xi. 19, 20); the alliance of Solomon with his successor Pessuene, who reigned 35 years; the accession of Shishak, or Sennacherib, i., towards the close of Solomon's reign (1 K. xi. 40), and his invasion and conquest of the cities in the reign of Rehoboam, of which a monument still exists on the wall of Nebma (Ko1j14b. p. 114); the time of the Ethiopian kings So (Salab) and Tirhakah, of the 25th dynasty; the rise and speedy fall of the power of Syria; the rapid growth of the Assyrian monarchy which overshadowed it; Assyria's struggles with Egypt, and the sudden ascendency of the Babylonian empire under Nebuchadnezzar, to the destruction of Egypt and Assyria, as we find these events in the books of Kings, as exactly with what we now know of Egyptian, Syrian, Assyrian, and Babylonian history. The names of Omri, Jehu, Menahem, Hoshea, Hezekiah, etc., are believed to have been deciphered in the cuneiform inscriptions, which also contain pretty full accounts of the campaigns of Tighath-Pileser, Sargon, Senacherib, and Esarhaddon; Shalmaneser's name has not yet been discovered, though two inscriptions in the British Museum are thought to refer to his reign. These valuable additions to our knowledge of profane history, which we may hope will shortly be increased both in number and in certainty, together with the fragments of ancient historians, which are now becoming better understood, are of great assistance in explaining the brief allusions in these books, while they afford an irrefragable testimony to their historical truth.

Another most important aid to a right understanding of the history in these books, and to the filling up of its outline, is to be found in the prophets, and especially in Isaiah and Jeremiah. In the former the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah, and of the contemporary Israelitish and foreign potentates, receive special illustration; in the latter, the history of Ahaz and Hezekiah, the dynasty of David, and Zedekiah, and those of their heathen contemporaries. An intimate acquaintance with these prophecies is of the utmost moment for elucidating the concise narrative of the books of Kings. The two together give us a fully full view of the events of the times at home and abroad.

It must, however, be admitted that the chronological details expressly given in the books of Kings form a remarkable contrast with their striking historical accuracy. These details are inexplicable and frequently entirely contradictory. The very first date of a decidedly chronological character which is given, that of the foundation of Solomon's Temple (1 K. vi. 1), is manifestly erroneous, as being irreconcilable with the evident fact of the antiquity of the times of the judges, or with St. Paul's calculation, Acts xiii. 20. It is in fact abandoned by almost all chroniclers, whatever school they belong to, whether ancient or modern, and is utterly ignored by Josephus. [CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. pp. 414-47.] Moreover, when the text is examined, it immediately appears that this date of 480 years is both unnecessary and quite out of place. The reference to the Exodus is gratuitous, and all the later notes of Blue, which refer merely to Solomon's accession. If it is left out, the text will be quite perfect without it, and will agree exactly with the resume in v. 37, 38, and also with the parallel passage in 2 Chr. iii. 2. The evidence therefore of its being an interpolation is wonderfully strong. But if so, it must have been inserted by a professed chronicler, whose object was to reduce the Scripture history to an exact system of chronology, which is manifestly therefore that we shall find traces of the same hand in other parts of the books. Now De Wette (F. I. II. p. 235), among the evidences which he puts forward as marking the books of Kings as in his opinion a separate work from those of Samuel, mentions, though erroneously, as 2 Sam. v. 4, 5 shows, the sudden introduction of "a chronological system" (die genaue Zeitrechnung). When therefore we find that the very first date introduced is erroneous, and that numerous other dates are also certainly wrong, because contradictory, it seems a not unfair conclusion that such dates are the work of an interpolator, trying to bring the history within his own chronological system: a conclusion somewhat confirmed by the alterations and omissions of these dates in the LXX. As regards, however, these chronological difficulties, it must be observed they are of two essentially different kinds. One kind is merely the want of the data necessary for chronological exactness. Such is the absence, apparently, of any uniform rule for dealing with the fragments of years at the beginning and end of the reigns. Such might also be a deficiency in the sum of the reign years of Israel as compared with the synchronistic years of Judah, caused by unnoticed interregna, if any such really occurred. And this class of difficulties may probably have belonged to these books in their original state, in which exact scientific chronology was not aimed at. But the other kind of difficulty is of a totally different character, and embraces dates which are very exact in their mode of expression, but are erroneous and contradictory. Some of these are pointed out below; and it is such which it seems reasonable to ascribe to the interpolation of later professed chroniclers. But it is necessary to give specimens of each of these kinds of difficulty, both with a view to approximating to a true chronology, and also to show the actual condition of the books under consideration.

(1.) When we sum up the years of all the reigns of the kings of Israel as given in the books of Kings, and then all the years of the reigns of the kings of Judah from the 1st of Rehoboam to the 6th of Hezekiah, we find that, instead of the two sums agreeing, there is an excess of 19 or 20 years in Judah—the reigns of the latter amounting to 261 years, while the former make up only 242. But we are able to get within half a year of this disagreement, because it so happens that the parallel histories of Israel and Judah touch in four or five points where the synchronisms are precisely marked. These points are (1) at the simultaneous ascensions of Jeroboam and Rehoboam; (2) at the simultaneous deaths of Jehoram and Ahaziah, or, which is the same thing, the simultaneous ascensions of Jehu and Athaliah; (3) at the 13th year of Amaziah, which was the 1st of Jeroboam II. (2 K. xiv. 17); (4) in the reign of Ahaz, which was contemporary with some part of Pekah's, namely, according to the text of 2 K. xvi. 3, the three first years of Ahaz with the three last of Pekah; and (5) at the 6th of Hezekiah, which was the 9th of Hoshea: the two last points, however, being less certain than the others, at least as to the precision of the synchronisms, depending as this does on the correctness of the numerals in the text.

Hence, instead of lumping the whole periods of 261 years and 242 years together, and comparing their difference, it is clearly expedient to compare the different sub-periods, which are defined by common termini. Beginning, therefore, with the sub-period which commences with the double accession of Rehoboam and Jeroboam, and closes with the double death of Ahaziah and Jehoram, and summing up the number of years assigned to the different reigns in each kingdom, we find that the six reigns in Judah make up 95 years, and the eight reigns in Israel make up 98 years. Here there is an excess of 3 years in the kingdom of Israel, which may, however, be readily accounted for by the frequent changes of dynasty there, and the probability of fragments of years being reckoned as whole years, thus causing the same year to be reckoned twice over. The 95 years of Judah, or even a less number, will hence appear to be the true number of whole years (see too Clinton, F. H. ii. 314, &c.).

Beginning again, at the double accession of Athaliah and Jehu, we have in Judah 7 + 4 + 11 first years of Amaziah = 61, to correspond with 28 + 17 + 16 = 61, ending with the last year of Jehosh in Israel. Starting again with the 15th of Amaziah = 1 Jeroboam II., we have 15 + 52 + 16 = 83 (to the 3d year of Ahaz), to correspond with 41 + 1 + 10 + 2 + 20 = 74 (to the close of Pekah's reign), where we at once detect a deficiency on the part of Israel of 9(174 = 12) years, if at least the 3d of Ahaz really corresponded with the 2th of Pekah. And lastly, starting with the year following that last named, we have 13 last years of Ahaz + 7 first of Hezekiah = 20, to correspond with the 9 years of Hoshea, where we find another deficiency in Israel of 11 years. The two first of the above periods may then be said to agree together, and to give 85 + 61 = 136 years from the accession of Rehoboam and Jeroboam to the 15th of Amaziah in Judah, and the death of Jehosh in Israel, and we observe that the discrepancy of 12 years first occurs in the third period, in which the breaking up of the kingdom of Israel began at the close of Jehu's dynasty. Putting aside the synchronistic arrangement of the years as we

a The MSS A B C have, however, a different reading, which is adopted by Lachmann [Tregelles] and Wordsworth.

b And it came to pass. In the fourth year
...and in 2 K. xv. 8, there would be no difficulty whatever in supposing that the reigns of the kings of Israel at this time were not continuous, and that for several years after the death of Zachariah, or Shallum, or both, the government may either have been in the hands of the king of Syria, or broken up amongst contending parties, till at length Menahem was able to establish himself on the throne by the help of Pals, king of Assyria, and transmit his tributary throne to his son Pekahiah.

But there is another mode of bringing this third period into harmony, which violates no historical probability, and is in fact strongly indicated by the fluctuations of the text. We are told in 2 K. x. 8, that Zachariah began to reign in the 38th of Uzziah, and (xv. 23) that his father Jeroboam began to reign in the 14th of Amaziah. Jeroboam must therefore have reigned 52 or 53 years, not 41: for the idea of an interregnum of 11 or 12 years between Jeroboam and his son Zachariah is absurd.

But the addition of these 12 years to Jeroboam's reign exactly equalizes the period in the two kingdoms, which would thus contain 86 years, and makes up 242 years from the accession of Rehoboam and Jeroboam to the 3d of Ahaz and 20th of Pekah, supposing always that these long-named years really synchroneous.

As regards the discrepancy of 11 years in the length of the period, nothing can in itself be more probable than that during some part of Pekah's life-time, or after his death, a period, not included in the regnal years of either Pekah or Hoshea, should have elapsed, when there was either a state of anarchy, or the government was administered by an Assyrian officer. There are also several passages in the contemporary prophets Isaiah and Hosea, which would fall in with this view, as Hos. x. 3, 7; Is. ix. 19-11. But it is impossible to assert peremptorily that such was the case. The decision must await some more accurate knowledge of the chronology of the times from heathen sources. The addition of these last 20 years makes up for the whole duration of the kingdom of Israel, 261 or 262 years, more or less. Now the interval, according to Lepsius' tables, from the accession of Sennachersib, or Shalman, to that of Sargon or Senacherib, is 17 years. Allowing Sennachersib to have reigned 7 years contemporaneously with Solomon, and Sargon, who reigned 12 years, to have reigned 9 before Shalmaner-as came up the same period against Sennacherib (235 + 7 + 9 = 261), the chronology of Egypt would exactly tally with that given here. It may, however, turn out that the time thus allowed for the duration of the Israelish monarchy is somewhat too long, and that the time indicated by the years of the Israelish kings, without any interregnum, is nearer the truth. If so, a ready way of reducing the sum of the reigns of the kings of Judah would be to assign 41 years to that of Uzziah, instead of 52 (as if the numbers of Uzziah and Jeroboam had been accidentally interchanged): an arrangement which interferes with no known historical truth, though it would disturb the double synchronism of the 3d of Ahaz with the 20th of Pekah, and make the 3d of Ahaz correspond with about the 9th or 10th of Pekah. Indeed it is somewhat remarkable that if we neglect this synchronism, and consider as one the period from the accession of Athaliah and Jehu to the 7th of Hezekiah and 9th of Hoshea, the sums of the reigns of the two kingdoms may not continue, and that we reckon 41 years for Uzziah, and 52 for Jeroboam, namely, 155 years, or 250 for the whole time of the Israelitish monarchy. Another advantage of this arrangement would be to reduce the age of Uzziah at the birth of his son and heir Jotham from the improbable age of 42 or 43 to 31 or 32. It may be added that the date in 2 K. xiv. 1, which assigns the length of Uzziah to the 27th of Jeroboam, seems to indicate that the author of it only reckoned 41 years for Uzziah's reign, since from the 27th of Jeroboam to the 1st of Pekah is just 41 years (see Lepsius's table, Königsb. p. 103 2). Also that 2 K. xii. 1, which makes the 12th of Ahaz = 1st of Hoshea, implies that the 1st of Ahaz = 9th of Pekah.

(2.) Turning next to the other class of difficulties mentioned above, the following instances will perhaps be thought to justify the opinion that the dates in these books which are intended to establish a precise chronology are the work of a much later hand or hands than the books themselves.

The date in 1 K. vi. 1 is one which is obviously intended for strictly chronological purposes. If correct, it would, taken in conjunction with the subsequent notes of time in the books of Kings, be intended to be correct also, to a year, the length of the time from the Exodus to the Babylonian Captivity, and establish a perfect connection between sacred and profane history. But so little is this the case, that this date is quite irreconcilable with Egyptian history, and is, as stated above, by almost universal consent rejected by chroniclers, even on purely Scriptural grounds. This date is followed by precise synchronistic definitions of the parallel reigns of Israel and Judah, the effect of which would be, and must have been designed to be, to supply the want of accuracy in stating the length of the reigns without reference to the old months. But these synchronistic definitions are in continual discord with the statement of the length of reigns. According to 1 K. xxii. 31 Alaziah succeeded Ahab in the 17th year of Jehoshaphat. This makes the length of Ahab's reign in xvi. 29, to the death of Jehoshaphat, according to 2 K. i. 17, Jehoram, the son of Alaziah, succeeded his brother (after his 2 years' reign) in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, though, according to the length of the reigns, he must have succeeded in the 18th or 19th of Jehoshaphat (see 2 K. iii. 1), who reigned, in all, 25 years (1 K. xxiii. 3). As regards Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, the statements are so contradictory that Archbishop Usher actually makes three distinct beginnings to his regnal era: the first when he was made prince, to meet 2 K. i. 17; the second when he was associated with his father, 5 years later, to meet 2 K. viii. 18; the third when his sole reign commenced, to meet 1 K. xii. 24. In fact, as the primary purpose of these chronisms is to give an accurate measure of time, nothing can be more absurd than to suppose such variations in the time from which the commencement of the regnal year is dated. It may also be remarked that the whole notion of these joint of whom reigned 11 years, and the latter 41. But beyond the confusion of the names there is nothing to support such a notion.
reigns has not the smallest foundation in fact, and unluckily does not come into play in the only cases where there might be any historical probability of their having occurred, as in the case of Asa's illness and Uzziah's leprosy. From the length of Amaziah's reign, as given 2 K. xiv. 2, 17, 25, it is manifest that Jeroboam II. began to reign in the 15th year of Amaziah, and that Uzziah began to reign in the 16th of Jeroboam. But 2 K. xv. 1 places the commencement of Uzziah's reign in the 27th of Jeroboam, and the accession of Zachariah = the close of Jeroboam's reign, in the 38th of Uzziah — statements utterly contradictory and irreconcilable.

Other grave chronological difficulties seem to have their source in the same erroneous calculations on the part of the Jewish chronologist. For example, one of the cuneiform inscriptions tells us that Menahem paid tribute to Assyria in the 8th year of Tiglath-Pileser (Rav. Herod. i. 448), and the same inscription passes on directly to speak of the overthrow of Rezin, who we know was Pekah's ally. Now this is scarcely compatible with the supposition that the remainder of Menahem's reign, the 2 years of Pekahiah, and 18 or 19 years of Pekah's reign intervened, as must have been the case according to 2 K. xvi. 1, xx. 32. But if the invasion of Judaea was one of the early acts of Pekah's reign, and the destruction of Rezin followed soon after, then we should have a very intelligible course of events as follows. Menahem paid his last tribute to Assyria in the 8th of Tiglath-Pileser, his suzerain (2 K. xv. 19), which, as he reigned for some time under Pul, and only reigned 10 years in all, we may assume to have been his own last year. On the accession of his son Pekahiah, Pekah, one of his captains, rebelled against him, made an alliance with Rezin king of Syria to throw off the yoke of Assyria, in the course of a few months dethroned and killed Pekahiah, and reigned in his stead, and rapidly followed up his success by a joint expedition against Judah, the object of which was to set up a king who should strengthen his hands in his rebellion against Assyria. The king of Assyria, on learning this, and receiving Azah's message for help, immediately marches to Syria, invests Damascus, conquer s and kills Rezin, invades Israel, and carries away a huge body of captives (2 K. xvi. 20), and leaves Pekah to reign as tributary king over the sacked remnant, till a conspiracy deprived him of his life. Such a course of events would be consistent with the cuneiform inscription, and with everything in the Narrative scripture, except the synchronistic arrangement of the reigns. But of course it is impossible to affirm that the above was the true state of the case. Only at present the text and the cuneiform inscription do not agree, and few people will be satisfied with the explanation suggested by Mr. Rawlinson, that "the official who composed, or the workman who engraved, the Assyrian document, made a mistake in the name," and put Menahem when he should have put Pekah (Bibl. Lect. pp. 186, 409: Herod. i. 468-471).

Again, Scripture places only 8 years between the fall of Samaria and the first invasion of Judah by Sennacherib (2 K. xx. 27) = the 14th of Hezekiah). "The inscriptions (cuneiform; assigning the fall of Samaria to the first year of Sargon giving Sargon a reign of at least 15 years, and assigning the first attack on Hezekiah to Sennacherib's third year, put an interval of at least 18 years between the two events" (Rav. Herod. i. 479). This interval is further shown by reference to the canon of Ptolemy to have amounted in fact to 22 years. Again, Lepsius (Königl. p. 95-97) shows with remarkable force of argument that the 14th of Hezekiah could not by possibility fall earlier than n. c. 692, with reference to Tiribakh's accession; but that the additional date of the 3d of Sennacherib furnished by the cuneiform inscriptions, coupled with the fact given by Ierosus, that the year n. c. 693 was the year of Sennacherib's accession, fixes the year n. c. 691 as that of Sennacherib's invasion, and consequently as the 14th of Hezekiah. But from n. c. 691 to n. c. 586, when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, is an interval of only 105 years; whereas the sum of the regnal years of Judah for the same interval amounts to 125 years. A from which calculations it necessarily follows, both that there is an error in those figures in the book of Kings which assign the relative positions of the destruction of Samaria and Sennacherib's invasion, and also in those which measure the distance between the invasion of Sennacherib and the destruction of Jerusalem. By whatever method, however, be noted that there is nothing to fix the fall of Samaria to the reign of Hezekiah but the statement of the synchronia; and 2 Chr. xxx. 6, 18, &c., seems rather to indicate that the kingdom of Israel had quite ceased in the 1st of Hezekiah.

Many other numbers have the same stamp of incorrectness. Jeroboam's age is given as 41 at his accession, 1 K. xiv. 21, and yet we read at 2 Chr. xiii. 7, that he was "young and tender-hearted" when he came to the throne. Moreover, if 41 when he became king, he must have been born before Solomon came to the throne, which seems improbable, especially in connection with his Amnonish mother. In the apocryphal passage moreover in the Cod. Vat. of the L.XX, which follows 1 K. xiii. 24, his age is said to have been 16 at his accession, which is much more probable. According to ver. 2, Uzziah's son and heir Jotham was not born till his father was 42 years old; and according to 2 K. xxii. 1, compared with ver. 19, Manasseh's son and heir Amon was not born till his father was in his 45th year. Still more improbable is the statement in 2 K. xviii. 2, compared with xvi. 2, which makes Hezekiah to have been born when his father was 11 years old; a statement which Bochart has endeavored to defend with his usual vast erudition, but with little success (Opera, i. 921). But not only does the incorrectness of the numbers testify against their genuineness, but in some passages the structure of the sentence seems to betray the fact of a later insertion of the chronological element. We have seen one instance in 1 K. vi. 1. In like manner at 1 K. xiv. 31, xv. 1, 2, we can see that at some time or other xv. 1 has been inserted between the two verses; for we may assume that ver. 9 has been inserted between 8 and 10; and xv. 24 must have once stood next to xii. 43, as xii.
KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF

50 did to 2 K. vii. 17, at which time the corrupt ver. 16 had no existence. Yet more manifestly viii. 24, 26, were once consecutive verses, though they are now parted by 25, which is repeated, with a variation in the numeral, at ix. 29. So also xvi. 1 has been interposed between xv. 38 and xvi. 2. xxvii. 2 is consecutive with xvi. 20. But the plainest instance of all is 2 K. xi. 21, xii. 1 (xii. 1 ff., Heb.), where the words — "In the seventh year of John, Jehoshiah began to reign," could not possibly have formed part of the original sentence, which may be seen in its integrity 2 Chr. xxiv. 1. The disturbance caused in 2 K. xii. by the intrusion of this clause is somewhat disguised in the LXX. and the A. V. by the division of Heb. xii. 1 into two verses, and separate chapters, but is still palpable. A similar instance is pointed out by Movers in 2 Sam. v., where ver. 3 and 6 are parted by the introduction of ver. 4, 5 (p. 190). But the difficulty remains of deciding in which of the above cases the insertion was by the hand of the original compiler, and in which by a later chronologist.

Now when to all this we add that the pages of Josephus are full, in like manner, of a multitude of inconsistent chronological schemes, which prevent his being of any use, in spite of Habel's praises, in clearing up chronological difficulties, the proper inference seems to be, that no authoritative, correct, systematic chronology was originally contained in the books of Kings, and that the attempt to supply such afterwards led to the introduction of many erroneous dates, and probably to the corruption of some true ones which were originally there. Certainly the present text contains what are either conflicting calculations of antagonistic chronologists, or errors of careless copyists, which no learning or ingenuity has ever been able to reduce to the consistence of truth.

II. The peculiarities of diction in them, and other features in their literary history, may be briefly disposed of. The words noticed by De Wette, § 185, as indicating their modern date, are the following:

for הָנָה for חָנָה, 1 K. xvi. 2. (But this form is also found in Judges, xii. 2. Jer. iv. 39, Ezek. xxxvi. 13, and not once in the later books.) לָשׁ for לָשָׁה, 1 K. xiv. 2. (But this form is also found in Judges, xii. 2. Jer. iv. 39, Ezek. xxxvi. 13, and not once in the later books.) לָשָׁה for לָשׁ, 2 K. i. 15. (But this form of לָשׁ is found in Lev. xv. 18, 21; Josh. xiv. 12; 2 Sam. xxiv. 21; 1 K. xix. 3. xii. 1 xiv. 10, xx. 11, xxvii. 2. Ez. xiv. 4, xxvii. 28.) לָשׁ for לָשָׁה, 1 K. i. 8. (But Jer. x. 8, xlix. 17, are identical in phrase and orthography.) לָשׁ for לָשָׁה, 2 K. xii. 13. (But everywhere else in Kings, e. g. 2 K. xii. 6, etc., לָשָׁה, which is also universal in Chronicles, an awkwardly later book; and here, as in לָשׁ for לָשׁ, 1 K. xii. 33, there is every appearance of the being a clerical error for the copulative ל; see Thesaurus, t. c.) לָשׁ for לָשָׁה, 1 K. xx. 14. (But this word occurs Lam. i. 1, and there is every appearance of its being a technical word in 1 K. xx. 14, and therefore as old as the reign of Ahaz.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 1 K. iv. 22. (But אָבַר is used by Ez. xiv. 14, and homer.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 1 K. xxi. 8. (On this see Kätner's Gramm. Heb. Gramm. Eng. tr. p. 6; Keil, Chron. p. 10; seems to have been then already obsolete.) 1 K. xii. 8. 11. (Occurs in Is. and Jer.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 2 K. xxv. 8. (But as the term evidently came with the Chaldees, as seen in Rab shahel, Rab-sara, Rab-mag, its application to the Chaldean general is no evidence of a time later than the person to whom the title is given.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 1 K. vii. 61, &c. (But there is not a shadow of proof that this expression belongs to later Hebr. It is found, among other places, in Is. xxxviii. 3; a passage against the authenticity of which there is also not a shadow of proof, except upon the presumption that prophetic intimations and supernatural interventions on the part of God are impossible.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 2 K. xviii. 7. (On what grounds this word is added it is impossible to guess, since it occurs in this sense in Josh., Is. Sam., and Jer.: vid. Gesen.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 2 K. xviii. 19. (Is. xxxvi. 4, Ezech. iv. 4.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 2 K. xviii. 26. (But why should not a Jer. in Hezekiah's reign, as well as in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, have called his mother—'the Javah language,' in opposition to the Aramaic? There was nothing in the Babylonish Captivity to give it the name, if it had not before: nor is there a single earlier instance — Is. xix. 18 might have furnished one — of any name given to the language spoken by all the Israelites, and which in later times was called Hebrew: Edom ski, Proleg. Ezech. ii. xxii. 38; John v. 2, &c.) אָבַר for אָבַר, 2 K. xxv. 6. (Frequent in Jer. iv. 12, xxxix. 5, &c.) Theod. Parker adds אָבַר (see too, Thesaurus, Edit. § 6), 1 K. x. 15, xx. 24; 2 K. xvii. 24, on the presumption probably of its being of Persian derivation; but the etymology and origin of the word are quite uncertain, and it is repeatedly used in Jer. ii., as well as Is. xxxvi. 9. With better reason might אָבַר have been added, 1 K. xii. 24. The expression אָבַר אָבַר, in 1 K. iv. 14 is also a difficult one to form an impartial opinion about. It is doubtful, as De Wette admits, whether the phrase necessarily implies its being used by one to the east of the Euphrates, because the use varies in Num. xxxii. 31, xxxii. 14; Josh. i. 14 ff., v. 1, ii. 17, xix. 7; 1 Chr. xxvi. 50; Deut. i. 1, 5, &c. It is also conceivable that the phrase might be used as a mere geographical designation by those who belonged to one of the provinces beyond the river subject to Babylon; and at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, Judas had been such a province for at least 23 years, and probably longer. We may safely affirm therefore, that on the whole the peculiarities of diction in these books do not indicate a time after the Captivity, or towards the close of it, but on the contrary point pretty distinctly to the age of Jeremiah. And it may be added, that the marked and systematic differences between the language of Chronicles and that of Kings, taken with the fact that all attempts to prove the Chronicles later than Ezra have utterly failed, lead to the same conclusion. (See many examples in Movers, p. 200 ff.) Other peculiar or rare expressions in these books are the proverbial ones: אָבַר for אָבַר, found only in them and in 1 Sam. xxv. 22, 34, "slept with his fathers," "him that dieth in the city, the dogs shall eat," etc.;
KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF

13, Is. xxxix. 2. הָרָעֹ֖שׁ, part of Jerusalem so called, xxii. 14, Zeph. i. 10, Neh. xi. 9. תֹּ֖א דְּרֶתֶּרֶת, "signs of the Zodiac," xxiii. 5. סְּלֹּ֖שׁוֹ, "a suburb," xxiii. 11. יִֽשׁבָּ֖שׁ, "ploughmen," xxv. 12 (Cethib). אַ֣בּ, for יִֽשׁבָּ֖שׁ, "to change," xxv. 29. To which may be added the architectural terms in 1 K. vi., viii., and the names of foreign idols in 2 K. xvii. The general character of the language is, most distinctly, that of the time before the Babylonian Captivity. But it is worth consideration whether some traces of diastic varieties in Judah and Israel, and of an earlier admixture of Syriisms in the language of Israel, may not be discovered in those portions of these books which refer to the kingdom of Israel. As regards the text, it is far from being perfect. Besides the errors in numbers, some of which are probably to be traced to this source, such passages as 1 K. xxv. 6, v. 10, compared with v. 2; 2 K. xv. 30, xili. 16, xvii. 34, are manifest corruptions of transcribers. In some instances the parallel passage in Chronicles corrects the error, as 1 K. iv. 26 is corrected by 2 Chr. xxiv. 19-20 is corrected by 2 Chr. xxxiv. 3-7. The substitution of Azariah for Uzziah in 2 K. xxiv. 21, and throughout 2 K. xxv. 1-30, except ver. 13, followed by the use of the right name, Uzziah, in vv. 30, 32, 34, is a very curious circumstance. In Isaiah, in Zechariah (xv. 5), and in the Chronicles, except 1 Chr. lii. 12, it is uniformly Uzziah. Perhaps no other cause is to be sought than the close resemblance between יִֽשָּׂרֵאֶ֖ל and יִֽשָּׂרֵאֶל, and the fact that the latter name, Azariah, might suggest itself more readily to scribal error. There can be little doubt that Uzziah was the king's true name, Azariah that of the high-priest. (But see Thenius on 1 K. xiv. 21.)

In connection with these literary peculiarities may be mentioned also some remarkable variations in the version of the LXX. These consist of transpositions, omisions, and some considerable omissions, of all which Thenius gives some useful notices in his Introduction to the books of Kings.

The most important transpositions are the history of Shimeel's death, 1 K. ii. 36-46, which in the LXX. (Cod. Vaticanus) comes after iii. 1, and diversia scops from chapts. iv., v., and ix., accompanied by one or two remarks of the translators.

The sections 1 K. iv. 20-25, 2-6, 26, 21, 1, are strung together and precede 1 K. lii. 2-28, but are many of them repeated again in their proper places.

The sections 1 K. lii. 1, ix. 16, 17, are strung together, and placed between iv. 34 and v. 1.

The section 1 K. vii. 1-12 is placed after vii. 51. Section viii. 12-13 is repeated after 33.

Section ix. 15-22 is placed after x. 22.

Section xi. 43, xii. 1, 2, 3, is much transposed and confused in LXX. xi. 43, 44, xii. 1-3.

Section xiv. 1-21 is placed in the midst of the long addition to Chr. xii. mentioned below.
Section xxii. 42-50 is placed after xvi. 28. Chaps. xx. and xxi. are transposed.
Section xx. is placed after 2 K. i. 18.

The omission are few.
Section 1. vi. 11-14 is entirely omitted, and 37, 38, are only slightly altered to at the opening of ch. iii. The erroneous clause 1 K. xv. 6 is omitted; and so are the dates of Aaî's reign in xvi. 8 and 15; and there are a few verbal omissions of no consequence.

The chief interest lies in the additions, of which there are four, and these are the following. The supposed mention of a fountain as among Solomon's works in the Temple in the passage after 1 K. ii. 35; of a paved causeway on Lebanon, iii. 46; of Solomon pointing to the sun at the dedication of the Temple, before he uttered the prayer, "The Lord said he would dwell in the thick darkness," etc., xii. 12, 13 (after 53 LXX.), with a reference to the βιβλιόν τῆς ἀφίδος, a passage on which Thoain relies as proving that the Alexandrian had access to original documents now lost; the information that "Jeram his brother" perished with Tilibi, xii. 22; an additional date, "in the 24th year of Jeroboam," xv. 8; numerous verbal additions, as xi. 29, xvii. 1, &e.; and lastly the long passage concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat, inserted between xii. 24 and 25. There are also many glosses of the translator, explanatory, or necessary in consequence of transpositions, as e. g. 1 K. ii. 35, viii. 1, xi. 44, xvii. 20, xix. 2, &e. Of the above, from the recupitulatory character of the passage after 1 K. ii. 35, containing in brief the sum of the things detailed in ch. vii. 21-23, it seems far more probable that ΚΡΗΝΗ ΘΗΣ ΑΤΑΧΩΣ is only a corruption of ΚΡΙΝΟΝ ΤΟΥ ΑΙΑΛΑΜ, there mentioned. The obscure passage about Lebanon after ii. 46, seems no less certainly to represent what in the Hes. ix. x., 19, as appears by the triple concurrence of Tadmor, Lebanon, and ΣΗΡΑΙΜΩΝ, representing πορφύρας. The strange mention of the sun seems to be introduced by the translator to give significance to Solomon's mention of the sun's brightness in his son's glory. The works of Hiram which he had built for Gez, which he said He would dwell in the thick darkness; not therefore under the unveiled light of the sun; and the reference to "the book of song" can surely mean nothing else than to point out that the passage to which Solomon referred was Ps. xcviii. 2.
Of the other additions the mention of Tilibi's brother Jeram is the one which has most the semblance of an historical fact, or makes the existence of any other source of history probable. See too 1 K. xx. 19, 2 K. xv. 23. There remains only the long passage about Jeroboam. That this account is only an apocryphal version made up of the existing materials in the Hebrew Scriptures, after the manner of 1 Esdr., Bel and the Dragon, the apocryphal Esther, the Targums, etc., may be inferred on the following grounds. The framework of the story is given in the very words of the Hebrew narrative, and that very copiously, and the new matter seems to have been framed, and was the original one. The principal facts introduced, the marriage of Jeroboam to the sister of Shishak's wife, and his request to be permitted to return, is a manifest imitation of the story of Hadad. The misplacement of the story of Abijah's sickness, and the visit of Jeroboam's wife to Abijah the Siloite, makes the whole history out of keeping — the disguise of the queen, the rescue of Jeroboam's idolatry (which is accordingly left out from Abijah's prophecy, as is the mention at x. 2 of his having told Jeroboam he should be king), and the king's anxiety about the recovery of his son and heir. The embellishments of the story, Jeroboam's chariots, the amplification of Abijah's address to Aaî, the request asked of Pharaoh, the new garment not worked in silver, are precisely such as an embroiderer would add, as we may see by the apocryphal books above cited. Then the fusing down the three Hebrew names השעון, השעון and השעון, into one שמעון giving the same name to the mother of Jeroboam, and to the city where she dwelt, shows how comparatively modern the story is, and how completely of Greek growth. A yet phander indication is the confounding Shemaiah of 1 K. xii. 22, with Semaiah the Nehelamite of Jer. xxix. 24, 31, and putting Abijah's prophecy into his mouth. For beyond all question Erasmus, 1 K. xii. 22, is only an abbreviation of Αλασκροτιζήσῃ (Jer. xxxix. 24, LXX.). Then again the story is self-contradictory, if Jeroboam's child Abijam was not born till a year or so after Solomon's death, how could "any good thing toward the Lord God of Israel" have been found in him before Jeroboam became king? The one thing in the story that is more like truth than the Hebrew narrative is the age given to Rehoboam, 11 years, which may have been preserved in the MS. which the writer of this romance had before him. The calling Jeroboam's mother "paphyrion" instead of γυναῖκα was probably accidental.

On the whole then it appears that the great variations in the LXX. contribute little or nothing to the elucidation of the history contained in these books, nor much even to the text. The Hebrew text and arrangement is not in the least shaken in its main points, nor is there the slightest cloud cast on the accuracy of the history, or the truthfulness of the prophecies contained in it. But the variations illustrate a characteristic tenacity of the Jewish mind to make interesting portions of the Scriptures the groundwork of separate religious tales, which they altered or added to according to their fancy, without any regard to history or chronology, and in which they exercised a peculiar kind of ingenuity in working up the Scripture materials, or in inventing circumstances calculated as they thought to make the main history more probable. The story of Zerubbabel's answer in 1 Esdr. about truth, to prepare the way for his mission by Parus; of the discovery of the imposture of Bel's priests by Daniel, in Bel and the Dragon; of Mordecai's dream in the Apoc. Esther; and the paragraph in the Talmud inserted to connect 1 K. xvi. 34, with xvii. 1 (Smith's Σύγκρισις, vol. ii. p. 421), are instances of this. And the reign of Solomon, of which the remarkable rise of Jeroboam were not unlikely to exercise this propensity of the Hellenistic Jews. It is to the existence of such works that the variations in the LXX. account of Solomon and Jeroboam must most probably be attributed.

Another feature in the literary condition of our books must just be noticed, namely that the compiler, may be seen in Chronica in Literature, i. 226. The Talmud contains many more.
In arranging his materials, and adopting the very words of the documents used by him, has not always been careful to avoid the appearance of contradiction. Thus the mention of the staves of the ark remaining in their place "unto this day," 1 K. viii. 3, does not accord with the account of the destruction of the Temple 2 K. xxv. 3. The mention of Eliah as the only prophet of the Lord left, 1 K. xxii. xix. 10, has an appearance of disagreement with xx. 13, 28, 35, &c., though xviii. 4, xix. 18, supply, it is true, a ready answer. In 1 K. xxi. 15, only Naboth is mentioned, while in 2 K. ix. 26, his sons are added. The prediction in 1 K. xix. 15-17 has no perfect fulfilment in the following chapters. 1 K. xxii. 38 does not seem to be a fulfilment of xxi. 19. The declaration in 1 K. ix. 22 does not seem in harmony with xiv. 28. There are also some singular repetitions, as 1 K. xiv. 21 compared with 31; 2 K. ix. 24 with vii. 25; xiv. 15, 16 with xii. 12, 13. But it is enough just to have pointed these out, as no real difficulty can be found in them.

III. As regards the authorship of these books, but little difficulty presents itself. The Jewish tradition which ascribes them to Jeremiah, is borne out by the strongest internal evidence, as well as by an agreement to that of the LXX. The evidence chapter, especially as compared with the last chapter of the Chronicles, bears distinct traces of having been written by one who did not go into captivity, but remained in Judea, after the destruction of the Temple. This suits Jeremiah. The events singled out for mention in the concise narrative, are precisely those of which he had personal knowledge, and in which he took an active interest. The famine in 2 K. xx. 3 was one which had nearly cost Jeremiah his life (Jer. xxxvii. 9). The capture of the city, the flight and capture of Zedekiah, the judgment and punishment of Zedekiah and his sons at Riblah, are related in 2 K. xxxvi. 1-7, in almost the identical words which we read in Jer. xxxix. 1-7. So are the breaking down and burning of the Temple, the king's palace, and the houses of the great men, the desolation of Babylon of the fugitives and the surviving inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judea. The intimate knowledge of what Nebuzardan did, both in respect to those selected for captive punishment, and those carried away captive, and those poor whom he left in the land, displayed by the writer of 2 K. xxv. 11, 12, 18-21, is fully explained by Jer. xxxix. 10-11, xl. 1-5, where we read that Jeremiah was actually one of the captives who followed Nebuzaradan as far as Ramah, and was very kindly treated by him. The careful enumeration of the pillars and of the sacred vessels of the Temple which were plundered by the Chaldeans, tallies exactly with the prediction of Jeremiah concerning them, xxvii. 19-22. The paragraph concerning the appointment of Gedaliah as governor of the remnant, and his murder by Ishmael, and the flight of the Jews into Egypt, is merely an abridged account of what Jeremiah tells us more fully, xl.-xxxii. 7, and are events in which he was personally deeply concerned. The writer in Kings has nothing more to tell us concerning the Jews or Chaldees in the land of Judah, which exactly agrees with the hypothesis that he is Jeremiah, who we know was carried down to Egypt with the fugitives. In fact, the date of the writing and the position of the writer seem as clearly marked by the termination of the narrative at v. 26, as in the case of the Acts of the Apostles. It may be added, though the argument is of less weight, that the annexation of this chapter to the writings of Jeremiah so as to form Jer. lii. (with the additional clause contained 25-30), is an evidence of a very ancient, if not a con temporaneous, editor of it. Again, the special mention of Seniah the high-priest, and Zephaniah, the second priest, as slain by Nebuzaradan (v. 18), together with three other priests, is very significant when taken in connection with Jer. xxxi. 1, xxxii. 23-24, passages which show that Zephaniah belonged to the faction which opposed the prophet, a faction which was healed by priests and also by the apostles (Acts xxvii. 7, 8, 11, 16). Going back to the xxvith chapter, we find in ver. 14 an enumeration of the captives taken with Jehoiachin identical with that in Jer. xxiv. 1; in ver. 13, a reference to the vessels of the Temple precisely similar to that in Jer. xxvii. 18-20, xxviii. 3, 6, and in vv. 3, 4, a reference to the idolatries and bloodshed of Manasseh very similar to those in Jer. lii. 34, xxx. 4-8, &c., a reference which also connects ch. xxiv. with xxi. 6, 19-16. In ver. 20 the hostile nations, and the reference to the prophets of God, point directly to Jer. xxv. 9, 20, 21, and the reference to Pharaoh Necho in ver. 7 points to ver. 19, and to xxxi. 1-12. Brief as the narrative is, it brings out all the chief points in the political events of the time which we know were much in Jeremiah's a For a discussion of this difficulty see Naboth. Jer. The simplest explanation is that Naboth was stoned at Samaria, since we find the elders of Jeareel at Samaria, 2 K. x. 1. Thus both the spot where Naboth's blood flowed, and his vineyard at Jeareel, were the scene of righteous retribution.

b De Wette cites from Livy, Cincinnati, and Movers, 1 K. ix. 8, 9, comp. with Jer. xxxii. 8; 2 K. vili. 13, 14, comp. with Jer. vii. 13, 24; 2 K. xii. 12. comp. with Jer. xxii. 3; and the identity of Jer. iii. 2 with 2 K. xxiv. 18 ff., xxv., as the strongest passage in favor of Jeremiah's authorship, which, however, he repudiates, on the ground that 2 K. xxv. 27-30 could not have been written by him. A weaker ground can scarcely be imagined. Jer. xv. 1 may also be cited as connecting the compilation of the books of Samuel with Jeremiah. Compare further 1 K. vii. 51 with Jer. xi. 4.

c The last four verses, relative to Jehoiachin, are equally a supplement whether added by the author or by some later hand. There is nothing impossible in the supposition of Jeremiah having survived till the 51st of Jehoiachin's captivity, though he would have been between 80 and 90. There is something touching in the idea of this gleam of joy having reached the prophet in his old age, and of his having added these few words to his long-finished history of his nation.

d These priests, of very high rank, called ψευδοπροφηταὶ, or "keepers of the door," i. e. of the three principal entrances to the Temple, are not to be confounded with the porters, who were Levites. We are expressly told in 2 K. xii. 10 (A. V.) that these "keepers" were priests. 2 K. xxii. 4. xiii. 4, with xii. 10 and xxi. 19, they are put out of the rank of these officers as next in dignity to the second priest, a sagam. [Houg-Priest, vol. ii. p. 1009.] Josephus calls them τοὺς διακόνους τοῦ ἱεροῦ ἱερεῖας. The expression ψευδοπροφηταὶ, is however also applied to the Levites in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 9, 1 Chr. ix. 19. [Koö]

mind; and yet which is exceedingly remarkable, Jeremiah is never once named (as he is in 2 Chr. xxxvi. 12, 21), although the manner of the writer is frequently to connect the sufferings of Judah with their sins and their neglect of the Word of God, 2 K. xviii. 13 ff., xxiv. 2, 3, &c. And this leading together, connecting, and placing in a prominent portion of the history which belongs to Jeremiah's times, and the writings of Jeremiah himself. De Wette speaks of the superficial character of the history of Jeremiah's times as hostile to the theory of Jeremiah's authorship. Now, considering the nature of these annals, and their coincidences, this criticism seems very unfounded as regards the reigns of Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. It must, however, be acknowledged that as regards Jehoiakim's reign, and especially the latter part of it, and the way in which he came by his death, the narrative is much more meagre than one would have expected from a contemporary writer, living on the spot. But exactly the same pæan of information is found in those otherwise copious notices of contemporary events with which Jeremiah's prophecies are interspersed. Let any one open, e. g. Townsend's "Arrangement," or Genest's "Parallel Histories," and he will see at a glance how remarkably little light Jeremiah's narrative or prophecies throw upon the latter part of Jehoiakim's reign. The cause of this silence may be difficult to assign, but whatever it was, whether absence from Jerusalem, possibly on the mission described, Jer. xiii., or imprisonment, or any other impediment, it operated equally on Jeremiah and on the writer of 2 K. xxiv. When it is borne in mind that the writer of 2 K. was a contemporary writer, and, if not Jeremiah, must have had independent means of information, this coincidence will have great weight.

Going back to the reign of Josiah, in the xxii. and xxiii. chapters, the connection of the destruction of Jerusalem with Manasseh's transgressions, and the comparison of it to the destruction of Samauria, xv. 25, 27, lead us back to xxi. 10-14, and that passage leads us to Jer. vii. 15, xv. 4, xix. 3, 4, &c. The particular account of Josiah's passover, and his other good works, the reference in vv. 24, 25 to the law of Moses, and the finding of the Book by Hilkiah the priest, with the fuller account of that discovery in ch. xxiii., exactly suit Jeremiah, who began his prophetic office in the 15th of Josiah; whose xii. chap. refers repeatedly to the book thus found; and who showed his attachment to Josiah by writing a lamentation on his death (2 Chr. xxvi. 25), and whose writings show how much he made use of the copy of the Deuteronomy so found. [JEREMIAH, HILKIAH.] With Josiah's reign (although we may even in earlier times hit upon occasional resemblances, such for instance as the silence concerning Manasseh's repentance in both), necessarily cease all strongly marked characters of Jeremiah's authorship. For though the general unity and continuity of plan (which, as already observed, pervades not only the books of Kings, but those of Samuel, Ruth, and Judges likewise, lead us to assign the whole history in a certain sense to one author, and enable us to carry to the account of the whole book the proofs derived from the closing chapters, yet it must be borne in mind that the authorship of those parts of the history of which Jeremiah was not an eye-witness, that is, of all before the reign of Josiah, would have consisted merely in selecting, arranging, inserting the connecting passages, and adding necessary, slightly modernizing (see Thurston, "Editors" 4 14), those histories which had been drawn up by contemporary prophets through the whole period of time. See c. g. 1 K. xiii. 32. For, as regards the sources of information, it may truly be said that we have the narrative of contemporary writers throughout. It has already been observed [Chronicles] that there was a regular series of state-annals both for the kingdom of Judah and for that of Israel, which embraced the whole time comprehended in the books of Kings, or at least to the end of the reign of Jehoiakim, 2 K. xxiv. 5. These annals are constantly cited by name as "the Book of the Acts of Solomon," 1 K. xi. 41; and, after Solomon, "the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah, or Israel," c. g. 1 K. xiv. 21, xv. 7, xvi. 5, 14, 20; 2 K. x. 34, xxiv. 5, &c., and it is manifest that the author of Kings had them both before him, while he drew up his history, in which the reigns of the two kingdoms are harmonized, and these annals constantly appealed to. But in addition to these national annals, there were also extant, at the time that the books of Kings were compiled, separate works of the several prophets who had lived in Judah and Israel, and which probably bore the same relation to the annals, which the historical parts of Isaiah and Jeremiah bear to those portions of the annals preserved in the books of Kings, i. e. were, in some instances at least, fuller and more copious accounts of the current events, by the same hands which drew up the more concise narrative of the annals, though in others perhaps mere duplicates. Thus the acts of Uzziah, written by Isaiah, were very likely identical with the history of his reign in the national chronicles; and part of the history of Hezekiah we know was identical in the chronicle and in the prophet. The chapter in Jeremiah relating to the destruction of the Temple (hi.) is identical with that in 2 K. xxiv., xxv. In later times we have supposed that a chapter in the prophecies of Daniel was used for the national chronicles, and appears as Ezr. ch. 1, [Ezra, Book of.] Compare also 2 K. xvi. 5, with Is. xii. 1; 2 K. xii. 8, with Is. xii. 20. As an instance of verbal agreement, coupled with greater fulness in the prophetic account, see 2 K. xx. compared with Is. xxxiii., in which latter alone is Hezekiah's writing given.

These other works, then, as far as the memory of them has been preserved to us, were as follows (see Keil's Apology Vers.): For the time of David, the book of Nathan the seer, the book of Nathan the prophet, and the book of God the seer (2 Sam. xx.-xxiv. with 1 K. 1, being probably extracted from Nathan's book), which seem to have been collected—at least that portion of them relating to David—into one work called "the Acts of David the King" 1 Chr. xxix. 29. For the time of Solomon, "the Book of the Acts of Solomon,"

"The prophet does not tell us that he returned to Jerusalem after his exile to the Captivity. This may have been spent among the Captivity at Babylon. [JEREMIAH, p. 152.] He may have returned just after Jehoiachin's death; and the king and the queen," in ver. 18, may mean Jehoiachin and his mother. Comp. 2 K. xxiv. 12, 15, which would be the fulfillment of Jer. xviii. 18, 19.
1. Acts seeing of in Chronicles time reign xvii., Nehu been of servilely, Oded, likely passage, LXX., "For Ahijah the book of the Chr."
2. The Chronicler says, as "the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel," which in the parallel passage, 1. K. xv. 24, is called "the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah." So again, 2. Chr. xxvii. 7, comp. with 2. K. xv. 36; 2. Chr. xxviii. 26, comp. with 2. K. xvi. 19; 2. Chr. xxxii. 32, comp. with 2. Chr. xxix. 20; 2. Chr. xxxii. 28; 2. Chr. xxxvi. 8, with 2. K. xxv. 5. Moreover the book so quoted refers exclusively to the affairs of Judah; and even in the one passage where reference is made to it as "the Book of the Kings of Israel," 2. Chr. xx. 34, it is for the reign of Jehoshaphat that it is cited. Obviously, therefore, it is the same work which is elsewhere described as the Chr. of Israel and Judah, and of Judah and Israel? Nor is this an unreasonable title to give to these chronicles. Saul, David, Solomon, and in some sense Hezekiah, 2. Chr. xxx. 1, 5, 6, and all his successors were kings of Israel as well as of Judah, and therefore it is very conceivable that in Ezra's time the chronicles of Judah should have acquired the name of the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah. Even with regard to a portion of Israel in the days of Rehoboam, the Chronicler remarks, apparently as a matter of gratulation, that "Rehoboam reigned over them," 2. Chr. x. 17: he notices Abijah's authority in portions of the Israelitish territory, 2. Chr. xiii. 18, 19, xv. 8, 9; he not unfrequently speaks of Israel, when the kingdom of Judah is the matter in hand, as 2. Chr. xii. 1, xiv. 4, xxii. 2, &c., and even calls Jehoshaphat "King of Israel," 2. Chr. xx. 2, and distinguishes "Israel and Judah," from "Ephraim and Manasseh." XXX. 1: he notices Hezekiah's authority from Dan to Beer-shaba, 2. Chr. xxx. 5, and Josiah's destruction of idols throughout all the land of Israel, xxxiv. 6-9, and his passerover for all Israel. xxxv. 17, 18, and seems to parade the title "King of Israel" in connection with David and Solomon, xxxv. 3, 4, and the elevation of the Levites to "all Israel," ver. 3; and therefore it is only in accordance with the feeling displayed in such passages that the name, "the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah" should be given to the chronicles of the Jewish kingdom. The use of this term in speaking of the "Kings of Israel and Judah who were carried away to Babylon for their transgression," 1 Chr. ix. 1, would be conclusive, if the construction of the sentence were certain. But though it is absurd to separate the words "and Judah" from Israel, as Bertheau does (Kurzf. Exeg. Handsch.), follow ing the Masoretic punctuation, seeing that the "Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah" is cited in at least six other places in Chr., still it is possible that Israel and Judah might be the antecedent to the pronoun understood before הָלוֹנִי.

It seems, however, much more likely that the antecedent to הָלוֹנִי is הָלוֹנִי מַעֲלֶה. On the whole, therefore, there is no evidence of the existence in the time of the Chronicler of a history, § 8. It is cited in 2. Chr. xxvii. 23 as "the story" — the Midrash הָלוֹנִי of the book of the Kings Comp 2 K. xii. 19.

KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF

since lost, of the two kingdoms, nor are the books of Kings the work so quoted by the Chronicler, except for the facts of the acts of Kings, when he has already given all that is contained in our books of Kings. He refers therefore to the chronicles of Judah. From the above authentic sources then was compiled the history in the books under consideration. Judging from the facts that we have in 2 K. xvi., xix., xx., the history of Hezekiah in the very words of Isaiah, xxxvi.-xxxix.; that, as stated above, we have several passages from Jeremian in duplicate in 2 K., and the whole of Jer. iii. in 2 K. xxiv. 18, &c., xxv.: that so large a portion of the books of Kings is repeated in the books of Chronicles, though the writer of Chronicles had the original chronicles also before him, as well as from the whole internal character of the narrative, and even some of the blemishes referred to under the 2d head; we may conclude with certainty that we have in the books of Kings, not only in the main the history faithfully preserved to us from the ancient chronicles, but most frequently whole passages transferred verbatim into them. Occasionally, no doubt, we have the compiler's own comments or reflections thrown in, at 2 K. xxi. 10-16, xvii. 10-13, xiii. 23, xvii. 7-41 &c. We connect the insertion of the prophecy in 1 K. xiii. with the fact that the compiler himself was an eye-witness of the fulfillment of it, and can even see how the words ascribed to the old prophet are of the age of the compiler. We can perhaps see his hand in the frequent repetition on the review of each reign of the remark, "the high places were not taken away, the people still sacrificed and burnt incense on the high places," 1 K. xii. 43; 2 K. ii. 3, xiv. 4, 45; cf. 1 K. iii. 3, and in the repeated observation that such and such things, as the staves by which the ark was borne, the revolt of Edom, etc., continue unto this day," though it may be perhaps doubted in some cases whether these words were not in the old chronicler (2 Chr. v. 9).

See 1 K. viii. 8, ix. 13, 21. x. 12, xii. 19; 2 K. ii. 22, xvii. 22, x. 27, xiii. 23, xiv. 7, xvi. 23, xvi. 43, 44, xlii. 25. It is, however, remarkable that in no instance does the use of this phrase lead us to suppose that it was perused after the destruction of the Temple; in several of the above instances the phrase necessarily supposes that the Temple and the kingdom of Judah were still standing. If the phrase then is the compiler's, it proves him to have written before the Babylonish Captivity; if it was a part of the chronicler he was quoting, it shows how exactly he transferred its contents to his own pages.

IV. As regards the relation of the books of Kings to those of Chronicles, it is manifest, and is universally admitted, that the former is by far the older work. The language, which is quite free from the Persianisms of the Chronicles and their late orthography, and is not at all more Aramaic than the language of Jeremiah, as has been shown above (I.), clearly points out its relative superiority in regard to that characteristic object of Israel as well as Judah, is another indication of its composition before the kingdom of Israel was forgotten, and before the Jewish annals to Samaria, which is apparent in such passages as 2 Chr. xx. 37, xxv., and in those chapters of Ezra (i.-iv.), which belong to Chronicles, was brought to maturity. While the books of Chronicles were therefore written especially for the Jews after their return from Babylon, the book of Kings was written for the whole of Israel, before their common national existence was hopelessly quenched.

Another comparison of considerable interest between the two histories may be drawn in respect to the main design, that design having a marked relation both to the individual station of the supposed writers, and to the peculiar circumstances of their country at the times of their writings.

Jeremiah was himself a prophet. He lived while the prophetic office was in full vigor, in his own person, in Ezekiel, and Daniel, and many others, both true and false. In his eyes, as in truth, the main cause of the fearful calamities of his countrymen was their rejection and contempt of the Word of God in his mouth and that of the other prophets; and the one hope of deliverance lay in their hearing the words to the prophets who still continued to speak to them in the name of the Lord. Accordingly, we find in the books of Kings great prominence given to the prophetic office. Not only are some fourteen chapters devoted more or less to the history of Elijah and Elisha, the former of whom is but once named, and the latter not once in the Chronicles; but besides the many passages in which the names and sayings of prophets are referred to (alike in both histories, the following may be cited as instances in which the compiler of Kings has noticed of the prophets which are peculiar to himself. The history of the prophet who went from Judah to Bethel in the reign of Jeroboam, and of the old prophet and his sons who dwelt at Bethel, 1 K. xiii.; the story of Ahijah the prophet and Jeroboam's wife in 1 K. xiv.; the prophecy of Jehu the son of Hanani concerning the house of Ahab, 1 K. xvi.; the reference to the fulfillment of the Word of God in the termination of Jehu's dynasty, in 2 K. xx. 12; the reflections in 2 K. xvii. 7-23; and above all, as relating entirely to Judah, the narrative of Hezekiah's sickness and recovery in 2 K. xx. as contrasted with that in 2 Chr. xxxix., may be cited as instances of that prominence given to the prophetic office and to the book of Kings, which is also especially noticed by De Wette, § 183, and Parker, transl. p. 233.

This view is further confirmed if we take into account the lengthened history of Samuel the prophet, in 1 Sam. (while he is but barely named two or three times in the Chronicles), a circumstance, by the way, strongly connecting the books of Samuel with those of Kings.

Ezra, on the contrary, was only a priest. In his days the prophetic office had wholly fallen into abeyance. That evidence of the Jews being the people of God, which consisted in the presence of prophets among them, was no more. But to the men of his generation, the distinctive mark of the continuance of God's favor to their race was the building of the Temple at Jerusalem, the restoration of the temple service and the Levitical worship, and the wonderful and providential renewal of the Mosaic institutions. The chief instrument, too, for preserving the Jewish remnant from absorption into the mass of heathenism, and for maintaining their national life till the coming of Messiah, was the maintenance of the Temple, its ministers, and its services. Hence we see at once that the chief care of a good and enlightened Jew of the age of Ezra, and all the more if he were himself a priest, would naturally be to enhance the value of the Levitical ritual, and the dignity of the Levitical caste. And in compiling a history of the past glories of his race, he would as naturally select such passages as especially bore upon the sanctity of the priestly office, and showed the deep concern taken by their ancestors in all that related to the honor of God's House, and the support of his ministering servants. Hence the Levitical character of the books of Chronicles, and the presence of several detailed narratives not found in the books of Kings, and the more frequent reference to the Mosaic institutions, may most naturally and simply be accounted for, without resorting to the absurd hypothesis that the ceremonial law was an invention subsequent to the Captivity. 2 Chr. xxix., xxx., xxxi. compared with 2 K. xiii. is perhaps as good a specimen as can be selected of the distinctive spirit of the Chronicles. See also 2 Chr. xxvi. 10-21, comp. with 2 K. xv. 5; 2 Chr. xi. 13-17, xiii. 9-20, xv. 1-15, xiii. 2-8, comp. with 2 K. xi. 5-9, and xv. 18, 19, comp. with ver. 18, and many other passages.

Moreover, upon the principle that the sacred writers were influenced by natural feelings in their selection of their materials, it seems most appropriate that while the prophetic writings in Kings is very fully with the kingdom of Israel, in which the prophets were much more illustrous than in Judah, the Levitical writer, on the contrary, should concentrate all his thoughts round Jerusalem where alone the Levitical caste had all its power and functions, and should dwell upon all the instances preserved in existing monuments of the deeds and even the minutest ministrations of the priests and Levites, as well as of their faithfulness and sufferings in the cause of truth. This professional bias is so true to nature, that it is surprising that any one should be found to raise an objection from it. Its subserviency in this instance to the Divine purposes and the instruction of the Church, is an interesting example of the providential government of God. It may be further mentioned as tending to account simply and naturally for the difference in some of the narratives in the books of Kings and Chronicles respectively; that whereas the compiler of Kings usually quotes the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah, the writer of Chronicles very frequently refers to those books of the contemporary prophets which we presume to have contained more copious accounts of the same reigns. This appears remarkably in the parallel passages in 1 K. xi. 41; 2 Chr. ix. 29, where the writer of Kings refers for "the rest of Solomon's acts," to the "book of the acts of Solomon," while the writer of Chronicles refers to "the book of Nathan the prophet" and "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and "the visions of Iddo the seer against Jeroboam the son of Nebat;" and in 1 K. xiv. 29, and 2 Chr. xii. 15, where the writer of Kings sums up his history of Rehoboam with the words, "Now the rest of the acts of Rehoboam are written in the Book of the Kings of Judah," whereas the chronicler substitutes "in the Book of Shemariah the prophet, and of Iddo the seer concerning genealogies," and in 1 K. xxi. 45, where "the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah" stands instead of "the Book of Jehu the son of Hanani," in 2 Chr. xx. 34. Besides which, the very formula so frequently used, "the rest of the acts of so and so, and all that he did," etc., necessarily supposes that there were in the chronicles of each reign, and in the other works cited, many things recorded which the compiler did not transcribe, and which of course it was open to any other compiler to insert in his narrative if he pleased. If then the chronicler, writing with a different motive and different predications, and in a different age, had access to the same original documents from which the author of Kings drew his materials, it is only what was to be expected, that he should omit or abridge some things given in detail in the books of Kings, and should insert, or give in detail, some things which the author of Kings had omitted, or given very briefly. The following passages which are placed side by side are examples of these opposite methods of treating the same subject on the part of the two writers:

Fall in Kings

1 K. i. ii. give in detail the circumstances of Solomon's accession, the conspiracy of Adonijah, Joab, Abiathar, etc., and substitution of Zadok in the priest's office, in the same room of Abiathar, the submission of Adonijah and all his party, Joab's death, etc.

Short in Chronicles

1 Chr. xxix. 22-24.

"And they made Solomon the son of David king the second time, and anointed him unto the Lord to be the chief governor, and Zadok to be priest. Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father, and prospered, and all Israel obeyed him. And all the princes and the mighty men, and all the sons likewise of king David, submitted themselves unto Solomon the king."

1 K. iii. 5-14.

Ver. 6. "And Solomon said, Thou hast shewed unto thy servant David my father great mercy, according as he walked before Thee in truth, and in righteousness, and in uprightness of his heart with Thee; and Thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that Thou hast given him a son to sit on his throne, as it is this day."

7, 8, 9, 10. "And the speech pleased the Lord, that Solomon had asked this thing."

11. "And God said unto him, etc."

12. "... and hast made me to reign in his stead."

2 Chr. i. 7-12.

Ver. 8. "And Solomon said unto God, Thou hast shewed great mercy unto David my father, and hast made me to reign in his stead."

11. "And God said to Solomon, etc."

12. "... any after thee have the like."

13. "Then Solomon came from his journey to the high place that was at Gibeon to Jerusalem, from before the tabernacle of the congregation, etc."
KINGS. FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF

Full in Kings. Solomon's judgment.

iv. 1. "So king Solomon was king over all Israel."

2-10. Containing a list of Solomon's officers.

xii. 2. "Who was yet in Egypt." The omission of the word "yet" in Chronicles of course accounted for by his flight from Egypt not having been narrated by the chronicler.

1 K. xvi. 18. "Then Asa took all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the treasures of the king's house, and delivered them into the hand of his servants; and king Asa sent them to Benhadad the son of Tabrimon, the son of Hezaviah, king of Damascus, that dwelt at Damascus, saying, There is a league, etc."

2 K. xvi. 10-16. A detailed account of Ahaz's visit to Damascus, and setting up an altar in the temple at Jerusalem after the pattern of one at Damascus. Urijah's subterfuge, etc.

xx. 1-19. Hezekiah's sickness, prayer, and recovery, with Isaiah's prophecy, and the sign of the shadow on the dud; the visit of the Babylonish ambassadors; Hezekiah's pride, Isaiah's rebuke, and Hezekiah's submission and reign over Israel." Omitted in Chronicles.

2 Chr. xii. 1. "And it came to pass when Rehoboam had established the kingdom, and had strengthened himself, he forsook the law of the Lord, and all Israel with him."

2 Chr. xvi. 2. "Then Asa brought out silver and gold out of the treasures of the house of the Lord, and of the king's house, and sent to Benhadad king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus, saying, There is a league, etc."

2 Chr. xxvii. 1-22. "And in the time of his distress did he trespass yet more against the Lord; this is that king Ahaz. For he sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus which were in Damascus, he sent, because the gods of Syria help them, therefore will I sacrifice to them, that they may help me."

xxvii. 24-28. "In those days Hezekiah was sick to the death, and prayed unto the Lord, and he spoke unto him, and gave him a sign. But Hezekiah rendered not again according to the benefit done unto him; the message. Throughout the history of Hezekiah the narrative in 2 K. and Isaiah is much fuller than in Chronicles.

2 K. xxviii. 4-25. Detailed account of the destruction of Baal-worship and other idolatrous rites and places in Judah and Israel, by Josiah, "that he might perform the words of the law which were written in the book that Hilkiah the high priest found in the house of the Lord."

In like manner a comparison of the history of the reigns of Jotham, (Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, and Zechariah, will show, that, except in the matter of Hezekiah's capture in the 4th year of his reign, and deportation or (towards) Babylon, in which the author of Chronicles follows Daniel and Ezekiel (Dan. i. 1, 2; Ez. xix. 9), the narrative in Chronicles is chiefly an abridgment of that in Kings. Compare 2 K. xxiii. 30-37, with 2 Chr. xxxvii. 1-5; 2 K. xiv. 1-7, with 2 Chr. xxxvii. 6-9; 2 K. xiv. 10-17, with 2 Chr. xxxvii. 10. From 2 Chr. xxxvii. 13, however, to the end of the chapter, is rather a comment upon the history in 2 K. xvi. 1-21, than an abridgment of it.

Under this head should be noticed also what may be called systematic abridgments; as when the statements in Kings concerning high-place worship in the several reigns (2 K. ii. 25. 3, xiv. 3, xiv. 3. 4, 4. 5, 35) are either wholly omitted, or more cursorily glanced at, as at 2 Chr. xxv. 2, xxvi. 12; or when the name of the queen-mother is omitted, as in the case of the seven last kings from Manasseh downwards, whose mothers are given by the author of Kings, but struck out by the author of Chronicles.

There is some thing systematic also in the omitted or abbreviated accounts of the idolatries in the reigns of Solomon, Rehoboam, and Ahaz. It may not always be easy to assign the exact motives which influence a writer, who is abbreviating, in his selection of passages to be shortened or left out: but an obvious motive in the case of these idolatries, as well as the high-places, may be found in the circumstance that the idolatrous tendencies of the Jews had wholly ceased during the Captivity, and that the details and repetition of the same remarks relating to them were therefore less suited to the requirements of the age. To see a design on the part of the Chronicler to deceive and mislead, is to draw a conclusion not from the facts before us, but from one’s own prejudices. It is not criticism, but invention.

On the other hand, the subjoined passages present some instances in which the books of Kings give the short account, and the books of Chronicles the full one.

Short in Kings.

1 K. viii.

Ver. 10. "And it came to pass when the priests were come out of the holy place, that the cloud filled the house of the Lord,

11. "So that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord.

12. "Then said Solomon," etc.

Full in Chronicles.

2 Chr. v.

Ver. 11. "And it came to pass when the priests were out of the holy place: (for all the priests that were present were sanctified, and did not then wait by course:"

12. "Also the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them 120 priests, sounding with trumpets:"

13. "It came even to pass, as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanksgiving to the Lord; and when they lifted up their voice with the trumpets and cymbals and instruments of music, and praised the Lord, saying, For He is good, for His mercy endureth for ever; then that the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord;"

14. "So that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God. Then said Solomon," etc.

a A curious incidental confirmation of the fact of this copious use of musical instruments in Solomon's time may be found in 1 K. x. 11, 12, where we read that Solomon made of the great plenty of alms- "which came from Ophir" 2 harps and psalteries for singers." Several able critics (as Ewald) have inferred from the frequent mention of the Levitical musical services, that the author of Chronicles was one of the singers of the tribe of Levi himself.

b This is obviously repeated here, because at this moment the priests sought to have entered into the house, but could not because of the glory.

2 Chr. xx. 1-50.

2 K. ix. 27.

"And when Ahaziah the king of Judah saw this, he fled by the way of the garden-house. And Jehu followed after him, and said, Sit thee down also in the chariot. And they did so at the going up to Gur, which is by Ibleam. And he fled to Megiddo, and died there. And his servants carried him in a chariot to Jerusalem, and buried him in his sepulchre with his fathers in the city of David."

With reference to the above two accounts of the death of Ahaziah, which have been thought irreconcilable (Kwald, iii. 529; Parker's De Wette, 470; Theuren, etc.), it may be here remarked, that the order of the events is sufficiently intelligible if we take the account in Chronicles, where the kingdom of Judah is the main subject, as explanatory of the brief notice in Kings, where it is only incidentally mentioned in the history of Israel. The order is clearly as follows: Ahaziah was with Jehoram at Jeruel when Jehu attacked and killed him. Ahaziah escaped and fled by the Beth-gam road to Samaria, where the partisans of the house of Ahab were strongest, and where his own brethren were, and there concealed himself. But when the sons of Ahab were all put to death in Samaria, and the house of Ahab had hopelessly lost the kingdom, he determined to make his submission to Jehu, and send his brethren to salute the children of Jehu (2 K. x. 13), in token of his acknowledgment of him as king of Israel. Jehu, instead of accepting this submission, had them all put to death, and instanced on to Samaria to take Ahaziah also, who had probably learnt some of from the attendants

"Not, as Theuren and others, the children of Je horam, and of Jezebel the queen-mother as he already knew, was at Samaria. Ahaziah again took to flight northwards, towards Megiddo, perhaps in hope of reaching the dominions of the king of the Sidonians, his kinsman, or more probably to reach the coast, where the direct road from Tyre to Egypt would bring him to Judah. [Cesarea.] He was hotly pursued by Jehu and his followers, and overtaken near Hileani, and mortally wounded, but managed to get as far as Megiddo, where it should seem Jehu followed in pursuit of him, and where he was brought to him as his prisoner. There he died of his wounds. In consideration of his descent from Jehoshaphat, "who sought Jehovah with all his heart," Jehu, who was at this time very forward in displaying his zeal for Jehovah, handed over the corpse to his followers, with permission to carry it to Jerusalem, which they did, and buried him in the city of David. The whole difficulty arises from the account in Kings being abridged, and so bringing together two incidents which were not consecutive in the original account. But if 2 K. ix. 27 had been even divided into two verses, the first ending at "house," and the next beginning "and Jehu followed after him," the difficulty would almost disappear. Jehu's pursuit of Ahaziah would only be interrupted by a day or two, and there would be nothing the least unusual in the omission to notice this interval of time in the concise abridged narrative. We should then understand that the word also in the original narrative referred not to Jehoram, but to the brethren of Ahaziah; who had just before been smitten, and the death of Ahaziah would fall under 2 K. x. 17. If Beth-gan (A. V. "garden-house") was as usual, now Jezreel, it lay directly on the road from Jezreel to Samaria, and is also the place at which the road to Megiddo and the coast, where Cesarea afterwards stood, turns off from the road between Jezreel and Samaria. In this case the mention of Beth-gan in Kings as the direction of Ahaziah's flight is a confirmation of the statement in Chronicles that he concealed himself in Samaria. This is also substantially explained by the account of the Medonites in 2 K. xiv. 7-9 (p. 322, note 1, but not very successfully (םירעב) instead of הַסַּמְלָה.).

The other principal additions in the books of Chronicles to the facts stated in Kings are the following. In 2 Chr. xxiv. 17-24 there is an account of Joash's relapse into idolatry after the death of Jehoiada, of Zechariah's prophetic rebuke of him, and of the stoning of Zechariah by the king's command in the very court of the Temple; and the Syrian invasion, and the consequent calamities of the close of Joash's reign are stated to have been the consequence of this iniquity. The book of Kings gives the history of the Syrian invasion at the close of Joash's reign, but omits all mention of Zechariah's death. In the account of the Syrian invasion also some details are given of a battle in which Jehoshaphat was victorious, which are not mentioned in Kings, and repeated reference is made to the sin of the king and people as having drawn down this judgment upon them. But though the apostasy of Jehoash is not mentioned in the book of Kings, yet it is clearly implied in the expression (2 K. xii. 2), "Jehoash did that which was right in the eyes of Jehovah all his days, wherein Jehovah instructed him." The silence of Kings is perhaps to be accounted for by the author following here the Chronicle of the Kings, in which Zechariah's death was not given. And the truth of the narrative in the book of Chronicles is confirmed by the distinct reference to the death of Zechariah, Luke xi. 49-51.

2 Chr. xxv. 3-16 contains a statement of a genealogical character, and in connection with it an account of the hiring of 100,000 mercenaries out of Israel, and their disposal by Amaziah in the bidding of a man of God. This is followed by an account (in greater detail than that in Kings) of Amaziah's victory over the Edomites, the plunder of certain cities in Judah by the rejected mercenaries of Israel, the idolatry of Amaziah with the idols of Edom, and his relapse by a prophet.

2 Chr. xxvi. 5-20 contains particulars of the reign of Uzziah, his wars with the Philistines, his towers and walls which he built in Jerusalem and Judah, and other statistics concerning his kingdom, somewhat of a genealogical character: and lastly, of his invasion of the priestly office, the resistance of Azariah the priest, and the leprosy of the king. All this nothing is mentioned in Kings except the fact of Uzziah's leprosy, and the latter part of his reign; a fact which confirms the history in Chronicles. The silence of the book of Kings may most probably be explained here on the mere principle of abridgment.

2 Chr. xxvii. 2-6 contains some particulars of the reign of Jotham, especially of the building done by him, and the tribute paid by the Ammonites, which are not contained in Kings.

2 Chr. xxviii. 17-19 gives details of invasions by Edomites and Philistines, and of cities of Judah taken by them in the reign of Ahaz, which are not recorded in Kings. 2 K. xvi. 5 speaks only of the hostile attacks of Rezin and Pekah. But 2 Chr. xxxix. xxx. contains by far the longest and most important addition to the narrative in the book of Kings. It is a detailed and circumstantial account of the purification of the Temple by Hezekiah's orders in the last year of his reign, with the names of all the principal Levites who took part in it, and the solemn sacrifices and musical services with which the Temple was reopened, and the worship of God reinstated, after the desuetude and idolatries of Ahaz's reign. It then gives a full account of the celebration of a great Passover at Jerusalem in the second month, kept by all the tribes, telling us that "since the time of Solomon the son of David king of Israel there was not the like in Jerusalem;" and goes on to describe the destruction of idols both in Judah and Israel; the revival of the courses of priests and Levites, with the order for their proper maintenance, and the due supply of the daily, weekly, and monthly sacrifices; the preparation of chambers in the Temple for the reception of the titles and dedicated things, with the names of the various Levites appointed to different charges connected with them. Of this there is no mention in Kings: only the high religious character and zeal, and the attachment to the law of Moses, ascribed to him in 2 K. xviii. 4-6, is in exact accordance with these details.

2 Chr. xxxii. 2-8 supplies some interesting facts

b From 1 Chr. ix. 1, it appears that "The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah" contained a copious collection of genealogies.
KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF

connected with the defense of Jerusalem, and its supplies of water, in Hezekiah's reign, which are not mentioned in 2 K. xxiii.

2 Chr. xxxiii. 11–19 contains the history of Manasseh's captivity, deportation to Babylon, repentance and restoration to his throne, and an account of his buildings in Jerusalem after his return. The omission of this remarkable passage of history in the book of Kings is perhaps one of the most difficult to account for. But since the circumstances are, in the main, in harmony with the narrative in Kings, and with what we know of the profane history of the times (as Keil has shown, p. 427), and since we have seen numerous other omissions of important events in the books of Kings, to disbelieve or reject it on that account, or to make it a ground of discarding the book of Chronicles, is entirely contrary to the spirit of sound criticism. Indeed all the sober German critics accept it as truth, and place Manasseh's captivity under Esarhaddon (Bertheau, in loc.). But Bertheau suggests that some support to the account may perhaps be found in 2 K. xxi. 17 ff. Moviers, while he defends the truth of Manasseh's exile to Babylon, attempts to raise up the story of his repentance, and reduces it to the level of a moral romance, such as the books of Tobit and Judith. But such a mode of explaining away plain historical statements of a trustworthy historian, who cites contemporaneous documents as his authority (let alone the peculiar character of the Biblical histories as "given by inspiration of God"), cannot reasonably be accepted. There is no doubtless some reason why the repentance of Manasseh for his dreadful and heinous wickedness was not recorded in the book of Kings, and why it was recorded in Chronicles: just as there is some reason why the repentance of the thief on the cross is only recorded by one evangelist, and why the raising of Lazarus is passed over in silence in the three first Gospels. It may be a moral reason: it may have been that Manasseh's guilt being permanent in its fatal effects upon his country, he was to be handed down to posterity in the national record as the Sinful King, though, having obtained mercy as a penitent man, his repentance and pardon were to have a record in the more private chronicle of the church of Israel. But, whatever the cause of this silence in the book of Kings may be, there is nothing to justify the rejection as non-historical of any part of this narrative in the book of Chronicles.

Passing over several other minor additions, such as 2 Chr. xxxiv. 12–14, xxxv. 25, xxxvi. 6, 7, 13, 17, it may suffice to notice the last place the circumstantial account of Josiah's Passover in 2 Chr. xxxv. 1–19, as compared with 2 K. xviii. 21–25. This addition has the same strong critical character that appears in some of the other additions, and contains the names of many Levites, and especially, as in so many other passages of Chronicles, the names of singers; but is in every respect, except as to the time, a confirmatory of the brief account in Kings. It refers, curiously enough, to a great Passover held in the days of Samuel (thus defining the looser expressions in 2 K. xiii. 24, "the days of the judges"), of which the memorial, like that of Josiah's terrible campaign in Edom (1 K. xi. 15, 16), has not been preserved in the books of Samuel, and enables us to reconcile one of those little verbal apparent discrepancies which are jumped at by hostile and unspeculative criticism. For the detailed account of the two Passovers at the return of Hezekiah and Josiah enables us to see, that, while Hezekiah's was most remarkable for the extensive fasting and joy with which it was celebrated, Josiah's was more to be praised for the exact order in which everything was done, and the fuller union of all the tribes in the celebration of it (2 Chr. xxx. 26, xxxv. 18, 2 K. xxi. 22). As regards discrepancies which have been imagined to exist between the narratives in Kings and Chronicles, besides those already noticed, and besides those which are too trifling to require notice, the account of the repair of the Temple by King Josiah, and that of the invasion of Judah by Hazael in the same reign may be noticed. For the latter, see Jos. xvii. As regards the former, the only real difficulty is the placing of the chest for the collection of contributions. The writer of 2 K. xxii. 19 seems to place it in the inner court, close to the brazen altar, and says that the priests who kept the door put therein all the money that was brought into the house of Jehovah. The writer of 2 Chr. xxiv. 8, places it apparently in the outer court, at the entrance into the inner court, and makes the princes and people cast the money into it themselves. Bertheau thinks there were two chests. Lightfoot, that it was first placed by the altar, and afterwards removed outside at the gate (ix. 374, 375), but whether, either of these be the true explanation, or whether rather the same spot be not intended by the two descriptions, the point is too unimportant to require further consideration in this place.

From the above comparison of parallel narratives in the two books, which, if given at all, it was necessary to give somewhat fully, in order to give them fairly, it appears that the results are precisely what would naturally arise from the circumstances of the case. The writer of Chronicles, having the books of Kings before him, and to a great extent making those books the basis of his own, but also having his own personal views, predilections, and motives, was writing for a different age and society, under very different circumstances; and, moreover, having before him the original authorities from which the books of Kings were compiled, as well as some others, naturally rearranged the older narrative as suited his purpose, and his tastes; gave in full passages which the other had abridged, inserted what had been wholly omitted, omitted some things which the other had inserted, including everything relating to the kingdom of Israel, and showed the color of his own mind, not only in the nature of the passages which he selected from the ancient documents, but in the reflections which he frequently adds upon the events which he relates, and possibly also in the turn given to some of the speeches which he records. But to say, as has been the rest of the acts, etc., comes in in both books. See 1 K. xiv. 23, 24, and 2 Chr. xxi. 11, 12 of this 1 K. xiv. 21, 22, compared with 2 Chr. xii. 16, xiii. 1, 2, is another striking proof. So is the repetition of rare words found in K. by the Chronicler. Comp 2 K. xiv. 11, with 2 Chr. xxvi. 21, 2 K. xx. 5 with Chr. xxvi. 21, 1 K. iv. 21 with 2 Chr. iv. 22.
sia or insinuated, that a different view of supernatural agency and Divine interposition, or of the Mosaic institutions and the Levitical worship, is given in the two books, or that a less historical character belongs to one than to the other, is to say what has not the least foundation in fact. Supernatural agency, as the school of the Temple of Solomon, 1 K. viii. 10, 11; the appearance of the Lord to Solomon, iii. 5, 11, ix. 2 ff.; the withering of Jeroboam's band, xiii. 3-6; the fire from heaven which consumed Elijah's sacrifice, xviii. 38; and numerous other incidents in the lives of Elijah and Elisha; the summiting of Samnachthi's army, 2 K. xix. 35; the going back of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz, xx. 11; and in the very frequent prophecies uttered and fulfilled, is really more often advanced in these books than in the Chronicles.

The selection therefore of one or two instances of miraculous agency which happen to be mentioned in Chronicles and not in Kings, as indications of the superstitious credulous disposition of the Jews after the Captivity, can have no effect but to mislead. The same may be said of a selection of passages in Chronicles in which the mention of Jewish idolatry is given. There are, however, reasons, because the truth is that the Chronicler does expose the idolatry of Judah as severely as the author of Kings, and traces the destruction of Judah to such idolatry quite as clearly and forcibly (2 Chr. xxxvi. 14 ff.). The author of Kings again is quite explicit in his references to the law of Moses, and has many allusions to the Levitical ritual, though he does not dwell so copiously upon the details. See e. g. 1 K. ii. 3, iii. 14, viii. 2, 4, 9, 53, 56, ix. 9, 20, x. 12, xi. 2, xii. 31, 32; 2 K. xi. 5-7, 12, xii. 5, 11, 13, 16, xiv. 6, xvi. 13, 15, xvii. 7-12, 13-15, 31-33, xviii. 4, 6, xxi. 4, 5, 8 ff., xxii. 21,

The author of Kings again is quite explicit in his references to the law of Moses, and has many allusions to the Levitical ritual, though he does not dwell so copiously upon the details. See e. g. 1 K. ii. 3, iii. 14, viii. 2, 4, 9, 53, 56, ix. 9, 20, x. 12, xi. 2, xii. 31, 32; 2 K. xi. 5-7, 12, xii. 5, 11, 13, 16, xiv. 6, xvi. 13, 15, xvii. 7-12, 13-15, 31-33, xviii. 4, 6, xxi. 4, 5, 8 ff., xxii. 21,

§ The miracle of the loaves and fishes (Luke ix. 18, 19 K. iv. 12; John vii. 9, 2 K. iv. 43), and the catching of the fish (Philip, Acts vii. 39, 40, as compared with 1 K. xviii. 12. 2 K. ii. 16, are also, in a different way N. T. references to the books of Kings.
Indeed he disappointed: but if we are content to read accurate and truthful history, ready to fit into its proper place whenever the exact chronology of the times shall have been settled from other sources, then we shall assuredly find they will abundantly repay the most laborious study which we can bestow upon them.

But it is for their deep religious teaching, and for the insight which they give us into God's providential and moral government of the world, that they are above all valuable. The books which describe the wisdom and the glory of Solomon, and yet record his fall; which make us acquainted with the painful ministry of Elijah, and his translation into heaven; and which tell us how the most magnificent temple ever built for God's glory, and of which He vouchsafed to take possession by a visible symbol of his presence, was consigned to the flames and desolation, for the sins of those who worshipped in it, read us such lessons concerning both God and man, as are the best evidence of their divine origin, and make them the richest treasure to every Christian man.

Of the Introductions to the O. T., those in particular of Haverick (ii. 148-226) and (Lectures, 1866) and (Lectures, 1806) furnish a good outline of the questions relating to the authorship, sources, and historical character of the Books of Kings. See also Davidson's Introd. to the Old Test. ii. 1-16 (1862), and (Andover, 1856), and (1824, 1866). It will be borne in mind that the interest of these chronicles centres largely in the personal character and history of those who are mentioned in them. The reader therefore will find important aid for the study of these books in the articles on the names in the Dictionary (Solomon, Jeroboam, John, Elijah, Elisha, Abiah, Jehoram, Heziah, Manasseh, Isaiah, and others), which represent this period of Hebrew history. The copious articles on JUDAH, KINGDOM OF, and ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF, may be consulted for the same purpose.

* KINRED is the reading of the original edition of the A. V. (A. ed. 1611) in all the passages in which "kindred" now stands in later editions. This substitution is due to the copyists which illustrate the "large amount of tarit and unacknowledged revision" which the English Scriptures have gradually undergone. See Trench, "Authorized Version," p. 63 (2d ed.).

* KINRIDS in the A. V. ed. 1611 has also (as above) given place in later editions to "kinreds," in the sense of families or tribes.

The original terms are in the OT. הַשֵּׁם (1 Chr. xvi. 28; Ps. xxxii. 27, &c.), and in the T. נַעֲרֵי (Acts iii. 25) and פָּנָאי (Rev. i. 7, vii. 9, &c.).

Ps. xlvii. 2; Is. i. 29, &c. &c.), and 2 in the book of Ezra, either in speaking of Samaria (iv. 10), or in the letter of the Samaritans (iv. 12-21), implying that it had become a provincialism. In this it is unlike Ir, which is the ordinary term for a city in narrative or chronicle, while it enters into the composition of early names in a far smaller proportion of cases. For illustration—though for that only—Kirjath may perhaps be compared to the word "burg," or "bury," in our own language.

Closely related to Kirjath is Kereth (קֵרְתֵּש), apparently a Phoenician form, which occurs occasionally (Job xxix. 7; Prov. viii. 3). This is familiar to us in the Latin garb of Cardagno, and in the Partian and Armenian names Cirto, Piriano-Certia (Bochart, Chaldaica, ii. cap. x.; Genesis, Thes. 1236-37).

As a proper name it appears in the Bible under the forms of Kirioth, Kartah, Kartan; besides those immediately following.

G.

Kirjatha'im (כִּרְתָּהִים), but in the Cethib of Ez. xxv. 9, כֵּרְתָּהִים [two cites]: Ḡarwás, in Vat. [rather, Rom.] of Jer. xlviii. 1; [Vat. here] and elsewhere with Alex. Ḡarwás: [FA. in Jer., xliv. 23, Ḡarwás: Corineth], one of the towns of Moab which were the "glory of the country;" named amongst the denominations of Jeremian (xlviii. 1, 23) and Ezekiel (xxv. 9). It is the same place as Kirjatha'im, in which form the name elsewhere occurs in the A. V. Taken as a Hebrew word this would mean "double city;" but the original reading of the text of Ez. xxv. 9, Kirjathaim, taken with that of the Vat. LXX. at Num. xxxii. 37, prompts the suspicion that that may be nearer its original form, and that the men — the Hebrew dual — is a later accommodation, in obedience to the ever-existing tendency in the names of places to adopt an intelligible shape. In the original edition (A. D. 1611) of the A. V. the name Kirjath, with its compounds, is given as Kirjath, the yod being there, as elsewhere in that edition, represented by i. Kirjathaim is one of the few of these names which in the subsequent editions have escaped the alteration of i to y.

Kirjoth (כִּרְתּות), with the definite article, i. e. hab-Kerjoth [the cities]: אֵי צִבְיָה כִּרְתּות: Caribot, a place in Moab the palace of which were denounced by Amos with destruction by fire (Am. ii. 2); unless indeed it be safer to treat the word as meaning simply "the cities" — which is probably the case also in Jer. xlviii. 41, where the word is in the original exactly similar to the above, though given in the A. V. "Kirich." [Kerioth].

G.

Kirjath (כִּרְתָּה), [city]: ָּיָרְפִּים; [Vat. ָּיָרְפִּים]: Alex. πόλις ָּיָרְפִּים: Corinth, the last of the cities enumerated as belonging to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xvii. 29), one of the group which contains both Gibson and Jerusalem. It is named with Gibeah, but without any copulative — "Gibeah, Kirjath," a circumstance which, in the absence of any further mention of the place, has given rise to several explanations. (1.) That of KIRJATHAIM 1654

Eusebius in the Onomasticon (Καρπαθία), that it was under the protection of Gibeath (ὃ χρηστάν σταυρίζων Γαβάδα). This, however, seems to be a mere supposition. (2.) That of Schwarz and others, that the two names form the title of one place, "Gibeath-Kirjatha" (the hill-town). Against this is the fact that the towns in this group are summoned up as 14; but the objection has not much force, and there are several considerations in favor of the view. [See Eusebius, p. 214 n.]

But whether there is any connection between these two names or not, there seems a strong probability that Kirjath is identical with the better known place Kirjath-Jearim, and that the latter part of the name has been omitted by copyists at some very early period.

Such an omission would be very likely to arise from the fact that the word for "cities," which in Hebrew follows Kirjath, is almost identical with Jearim; and that it has arisen we have the testimony of the LXX. in both MSS. (the Alex. most complete), as well as of some Hebrew MSS. still existing (Davidson, Hebr. Text, ad loc.). In addition, it may be asked why Kirjath should be in the "construct state" if no word follows it to be in construction with? In that case it would be Kiriah. True, Kirjath-jearim is enumerated as a city of Judah (Jos. xxv. 9, 10, 11); but so are several towns which were Simeon's and Dan's, and it is not to be supposed that these places never changed hands.

G. KIRJATHAIM (בִּקְרְיָת-יָיִם) [two cities], the name of two cities of ancient Palestine.

1. (Καρπαθία: [Vat. Καρπαθία] (in Num.), Καρπαθία: [Alex. Καρπαθία] Kirjathaim.) On the east of the Jordan, one of the places which were taken possession of and rebuilt by the Reubenites, and had fresh names conferred on them (Num. xxxii. 57, and see 38). Here it is mentioned between Ebelah, Nebo, and Beth-meon, the first and last of which are known with some tolerable degree of certainty. But on its next occurrence (Josh. xiii. 19) the same order of mention is not maintained, and it appears in company with Michmash and Shimna, of which at present nothing is known. It is possibly the same place as that which gave its name to the ancient Shaveh-Kirjathaim, though this is mere conjecture. It existed in the time of Jeremiah (xlvii. 1, 23) and Ezekiel xxxv. 14—in these three passages the A.V. gives the name Kirjathaim. Both these prophets include it in their denunciations against Moab, in whose hands it then was, prominent among the cities which were "the glory of the country" (Ezr. xxv. 9).

By Eusebius it appears to have been well known. a a The text now stands בִּקְרְיָת-יָיִם; in the above view it originally stood בִּקְרְיָת יָיִם

b It is as well to observe, though we may not be able yet to draw any inference from the fact, that on both occasions of its being attributed to Judah, it is called by another name. — "Kirjath-baal, which is Kirjath-jearim.

c This reading of the LXX suggests that the dual termination "ain" may have been a later accommodation of the name to Hebrew forms, as was possibly the case with Jerusalim (vol. ii. p. 1272). It is supported there are several considerations in favor of the view. [See Eusebius, p. 14, and the Vat. Roman.] Ixx. of Jer. xviii. I. [Kirjathaim.]

d There is some uncertainty about Burekhardt's name at this part. In order to see Mad-bah, which is shown on the maps as nearly S. of Hebron, he left the great road at the latter place, and went through Betul, es-Nemeh, and other places which are shown as on the road eastward, in an entirely different direction from Madba, and then after 8 hours, without noting any change of direction, he arrives at Madba, which appears from the maps to be only about 11 hour from Ittin.

e The following is the full synonym of this Targum for Kirjathaim: "And the city of two streets paved with marble, the same is Berosha." [Str. 11, 1437.] This is almost identical with the rendering given in the same Targum on Num. xxii. 39, for Kirjath-Huzoth. Can Berosha contain an allusion to the modern Jerash? 1654

KIRJATH-ARBA (בִּקרְיָת-אֵרָבָא) and once, Neh. xi. 25, 227 N [see in the art.]: παλαι Ἀρβῶν, π. Ἀρβῶν: Alex. [Ἀρβῶν, Ἀρβῆκα, Ἀρβὸν] Αρβὸν and Ἀρβᾶ: Καρπαθανάκος [Vat. Καρπαθανάκος]; Καρπαθαβάκοσφερ, but Mai Καρπαθαβάκοφερ; Alex. Karada'abh (in Neb. Karada'ap-Bh; Vat. FA; Karada'ap, Alex. Karada'abho!)
Contra Arba, an anagram of the name of the city which after the conquest is generally known as Hbron (Josh. xiv. 13; Judg. i. 10). Possibly, however, not Kirjath-arba, but MAMRE, was its earliest appellation (Gen. xxv. 27), though the latter name may have been that of the sacred grove near the town, which would occasionally transfer its title to the whole spot. {MAMRE.}

The identity of Kirjath-Arba with Hebron is constantly asserted (Gen. xxii. 2, xxxv. 27; Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, 54, xx. 7, xxi. 11), the only mention of it without that qualification being, as is somewhat remarkable, after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 25), a date so late that we might naturally have supposed the aboriginal name would have become extinct. But it lasted far longer than that, for when Sir John Maundeville visited the place (cir. 1322) he found that "the Saracens call the place a place that the Jews call it Arboth" (Early Trav. p. 161). Thus too in Jerome's time would Debrir seem to have been still called by its original title, Kirjath-Sepher. So impossible does it appear to extinguish the name originally bestowed on a place?

The signification of Kirjath-Arba is, to say the least, unsatisfactory. In favor of its being derived from some ancient hero is the statement that "Arba was the great man among the Anakim" (Josh. xiv. 15) — the "father of Anak" (xxi. 11). Against it are the peculiarity of the expression in the first of these two passages, where the term Adam (הַדָּם הַנַּחַל) — usually employed for the species, the human race — is used instead of Ish, which commonly denotes an individual. (b.) The consideration that the term "father" is a metaphor frequently employed in the Bible — as in other oriental writings — for an originator or author, whether of a town or a quality, quite as often as of a human being. (c.) The LXX. certainly so understood both the passages in Joshua, since they have in each μητροπόλις, "mother-city." (c.) The constant tendency to personification so familiar to students of the topographical philology of other countries than Palestine, and which in the present case must have had some centuries in which to exercise its influence. In the lists of 1 Chron. Hebron itself is personified (li. 42) as the son of Maresiah, a neighboring town, and the father of Tappnah and other places in the same locality; and the same thing occurs with Beth-zur (ver. 45), Ziph (42), Madmannah and Gibeah (49); etc. etc. (d.) On more than one occasion (Gen. xxxv. 27; Josh. xiv. 13; Neh. xi. 25) the name Arba has the definite article prefixed to it. This is very rarely, if ever, the case with the name of a man (see Rod. Pol. p. 724). (e.) With the exception of the

In Gen. xxxv. 27, the A. V. has "the city of Ar-bah;" in Josh. xiv. 13, and xxi. 11, "the city of Arba" but "Ar'bah," ed. 1011, in xxi. 11. A curious parallel to this terminology is found in our own country, where many a village is still known to its rustic inhabitants by the identical name by which it is inscribed in Domesday Book, while they are actually unaware of the later name by which the place has been currently known in maps and documents, and in the general language of all but their own class for centuries. If this is the case with Kirjath-Arba and Hebron, the occurrence of the former in Heb-
KIRJATH-JEARIM

KIRJATH-JEARIM, P; πόλις Καριαθαρίμ (city of forests), and once πόλις Καριαθῆρια; Alex, the same, excepting in some cases the termination σια; [Vat. σια, πολις] there are other variations not here noticed; J. Joseph, Kariathaim: Carithathara, a city which played a not unimportant part in the history of the Chosen People. We first encounter it as one of the four cities of the Gileadites (Josh. iv. 15); it next occurs as one of the landmarks of the northern boundary of Judah (xx. 9), and as the point at which the western and southern boundaries of Benjamin coincided (xviii. 14, 15); and in the last two passages we find it

KIRJATH-JEARIM — in 1 Chr. xiii. 6, the Vulgate has Collis Carithatharim, and in the Hebrew name it is Kiriath-Jearim, not Kirjath-Jearim; and in the preceding verse, 5, it is Kiriath-Jearim. In 2 Sam. xvi. 1, it is Kirjath-Jearim. The name Kirjath-Jearim is not stated to have been allotted to the Levites, but it is difficult to suppose that Abinadab and Eleazar were not Levites. This question, here another, perhaps earlier, name — that of the great Canaanite deity Baal, namely Baalah and KIRJATH-BAAL. It is included among the towns of Judah (xv. 60), and there is some reason for believing that under the shortened form of Kirjath it is also named among those of Benjamin, as might almost be expected from the position it occupied on the confines of each. Some considerations bearing on this will be found under KIRJATH and GIDEON. It is included in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. i. 50, 52) as founded by, or descended from, Simeon, the son of Caleb-Hur, and as having in its turn sent out the colonies of the Jebusites, Philistines, Ammonites, and Moabites, and as having in its turn sent out the colonies of the Jebusites, Philistines, Ammonites, and Moabites, as has already been stated under Kirjath-Jearim. Behind Kirjath-Jearim, the land of Danites pitched their camp before their expedition to Mount Ephraim and Gilgal, leaving their name attached to it (Judg. xviii. 12). In this high place — the hill (see above) — under the charge of Eleazar, son of Ahimelech, the ark remained for twenty years (vii. 2), during which period the spot became the resort of pilgrims from all parts, anxious to offer sacrifices and perform vows to Jehovah (Joseph. Ant. vi. 2, § 1). At the close of that time Kirjath-Jearim lost its sacred treasure, on its removal by David to the house of Obed-edom the Gittite (1 Chr. xiii. 5, 6; 2 Chr. i. 3; 2 Sam. vi. 2, 4). It is very remarkable and suggestive that in the account of this transaction the ancient and present name of Baal is preserved. In full and complete form this name, 2, vi. 2, probably the original statement — the name Baal is used without any explanation, and to the exclusion of that of Kirjath-jearim. In the allusion to this transaction in Is. xxxii. 6, the name is otherwise indicated as the "wood" — yer, the root of Kirjath-jearim. We are further told that its people, with those of Chephirah and Beeroth, 743 in number, returned from captivity (Neh. vii. 20; and see Ezra ii. 25, where the name is Kir'am, and 1 Esdr. v. 19, Kirathareas). We also hear of a prophet Uriah-ben-Shemaiah, a native of the place, who enforced the warnings of Jeremiah, and was cruelly murdered by Jehoiakin (Jer. xxxvii. 20, 4), but of the place we know nothing beyond what has been already said. A tradition which intercedes for Uriah, in his connection with the Ark, is found in 1 Ki. ii. 12, 13, and 2 Sam. xiv. 23, xxv. 8, 9, Dan. § 17), though without stating his authority, that it was the native place of Zechariah, see and the force of the word rendered "sanctified" (vii. 1), will be noticed under Levites. On the other hand it is remarkable that Beth-hemesh, from which the Ark was sent away, was a city of the priests.
a very uneven country, with no appearance of any road ever having existed (Rob. iii. 157). Neither is it at all in proximity to Bethlehem (Ephratah), which would seem to be implied in Is. cxxxi. 6; though this latter passage is very obscure. Williams (Holy City) endeavors to identify Kirjath-jearim with Deir el-Homs, east of Ain Sheva. But this, though sufficiently near the latter place, does not answer to the other conditions. We may therefore, for the present, consider Kuriet el-Emab as the representative of Kirjath-jearim.

The modern name, differing from the ancient only in its latter portion, signifies the "city of grapes;" the ancient name, if interpreted as Hebrew, the "city of forests." Such interpretations of these very antique names must be received with great caution on account of the tendency which exists universally to alter the names of places and persons so that they shall contain a meaning in the language of the country. In the present case we have the play on the name in Ps. cxxxii. 6, already noticed, the authority of Jerome (Comm. in Is. xxix. 1), who renders it villa silvarum, and the testimony of a recent traveller (Tolker, Dritte Wunderung, 178, 187), who in the immediate neighborhood, on the ridge probably answering to Mount Jearim, states that "for real genuine (cohete) woods, so thick and so solitary, he had seen nothing like them since he left Germany."

It remains yet to be seen if any separate or definite eminence answering to the hill or high-place on which the ark was deposited is recognizable at Kuriet el-Emab.

* An old Gothic church at Kuriet el-Emab built by the Crusaders is an object of mournful interest to the traveller. It is one of the most perfect Christian ruins of this description in Palestine. The exterior walls are well preserved, and the aisles, pillars, and some old frescoes still remain. The Moslems often make mosques of such churches, but this one they have turned into a stable or cow-pen.

KIRJATH-SANNAH (תִּירְגַּת-סָנְנָה) [city of instruction or writing, FIrst; of palm-branch.]

a The mention of קַרְיָתָא (Aur.l. קַרְיָתָא) in the LXX. of Josh. iii. 10, possibly proceeds from a corruption of the Hebrew Kirjath-A-Tau, "the city Ges.]: פַּדָּא הָֽעַֽרְפּוּדְתָא: Carithsenna), a name which occurs once only (Josh. xv. 49), as another, and probably an earlier, appellation for Debir, an important place in the mountains of Judah, not far from Hebron, and which also bore the name of Kirjath-Sepher. Whence the name is derived we have no clue, and its meaning has given rise to a variety of conjectures (see Keil, Joshur, on x. 49; Ewald, Gesch. i. 324, note). That of Gesenius (Thes. 902) is, that sannah is a contraction of sannnah = a palm-branch, and thus that Kirjath-sannah is the "city of palms." But this, though adopted by Stanley (S. of P. 161, 524), is open to the objection that palms were not trees of the mountain district, where Kirjath-sannah was situated, but of the valleys (S. of P. 145).

It will be observed that the LXX. interpret both this name and Kirjath-Sepher alike.

* The etymology of the name at present seems almost hopelessly obscure, and any explanation founded on that basis must be uncertain. It has been suggested that תִּירְגַּת may mean the palm-branch or leaf as used for writing purposes, as is the case so extensively in Asia at the present day.

Adam," as has been pointed out under Adam, vol. i. p. 27 a.
If this were so, Kirjath-sannah and Kirjath-Sepher would differ only as referring the one to the books written or preserved in the place and the other to the material out of which they were made. If the palm trees themselves did not grow there (though several are found now even at Jerusalem), the leaves could have been procured elsewhere and brought thither. If the later name Debir (which see) signifies "sacred recess," "sacred sanctuary" (Jerome, ocellum), it then simply points back by a less definite designation to the ancient character of the town (shadowed forth in the other names) as the seat of some religious cultus among the old Canaanites. II.

KIRJATH-SEPHER (קִירְיַת-שֵׁפֶר) [city of the book or writing]: In Judg. i. 11, קִירְיַת-שֵׁפֶר [Val. כֶּרֶם-שֵׁפֶר] πόλις γραμματέως in ver. 12, and in Josh. the first word is omitted (Curtius-Sepher), the early name of the city Debir, which further had the name — doubtless also an early one — of Kirjath-Sannah. Kirjath-Sepher occurs only in the account of the capture of the place by Othniel, who gained thereby the hand of his wife Achsah, Caleb's daughter (Josh. xv. 15, 16; and in the exact repetition of the narrative, Judg. i. 11, 12). In this narrative, a document of unmistakably early character (Ewald, Gesch. ii. 373, 374), it is stated that "the name of Debir before was Kirjath-Sepher." Ewald conjectures that the new name was given by the conquerors on account of its retired position on the back — the south or southwestern slopes — of the mountains, possibly at or about the modern el-Baer, a few miles W. of el-Dhahirah (Gesch. ii. 373, note). But whatever the interpretation of the Hebrew name of the place may be, that of the Canaanite name must certainly be more obscure. It is generally assumed to mean "city of book" (from the Hebrew word Sepher = book), and it has been made the foundation for theories of the amount of literary culture possessed by the Canaanites (Keil, Josen, x. 39; Ewald, i. 324). But such theories are to say the least, premature during the extreme uncertainty as to the meaning of these very ancient names?

The old name would appear to have been still in existence in Jeromen's time, if we may understand his allusion in the epigraph of Paula (§ 11), where he translates it vinculum litterarum. [Comp. Kirjath-Sepher.]

KIR OF MOAB: נַחָל מָאָב [cave or fortification of Moab]; תֵּלְחֵי תְּרוֹמִית יְהוּדָה [Vat. Sin. -Bens]: murmurs, Moab), one of the two chief strongholds of Moab, the other being Ar or Mount Sion. The name occurs only in Is. xx. 1, though the place is probably referred to under the names of Kir-Heba, Kir-Hareseth, etc. The clue to its identification is given up by the Targum on Is. and Jeremiah, which for the above names has נַחָל הַמִּצְרָיִם, נַחָל שָׁמְרוֹן. It is almost identical with the name Kirwil, by which the site of an important city in a high and very strong position at the S. E. of the Dead Sea is known at this day. The claim of evidence for the identification of Kirwil with Kir-Moab is very satisfactory. Under the name of קירמָאָב it is mentioned in the Acts of the Council of Jerusalem, A. D. 536 (Ibn-Dor, p. 533), by the geographers Toleny and Stephanus of Byzantium (Ibn-Dor, pp. 493, 765). In A. D. 1211, under King Fulk, a castle was built there which became an important station for the Crusaders. Here, in A. D. 1183, they sustained a fruitless attack from Saladin and his brother (Bosioini, Vita. San. 2. 5), the place being as impregnable as it had been in the days of Eliakim (2 K. iii. 23). It was then the chief city of Arcobia Secundus or Petronius; it is specified as in the Bibles, and is distinguished from Kaksah, the ancient Ar-Moab, and from the Mens regula (Schultens, Index Georg. Caracalle: see also the remarks of Gesenius, Josua, 517, and his notes to the German transl. of Burckhardt). The Crusaders in error believed it to be Petra, and that name is frequently attached to it in the writings of William of Tyre and Jacob de Vitry (see quotations in Rob. Bibl. Res. ii. 167). This error is perpetuated in the Greek Church service compiled by the bishop of Petra, whose office, as representative of the Patriarch, it is to produce the holy fire at Easter in the "Church of the Sepulchre" at Jerusalem (Stanley, S. & P. 467), is in reality bishop of Kerak (Seteetn, Reisen, ii. 538; Burchst. 387).

The modern Kerak is known to us through the descriptions of Burckhardt (378-380), Irby (ch. viii.), Setetn (Reisen, i. 412, 413), and De Saney (Le Mor Morte, i. 355, etc.); and these fully bear out the interpretation given above to the name — the "fortress," as contradistinguished from the "metropolis" (Ar) of the country, i.e. Rabbath-Moab, the modern Rub. It lies about 6 miles S. of the last-named place, and some ten miles from the Dead Sea, upon the plateau of highlands which forms this part of the country, not far from the western edge of the plateau. Its situation is truly remarkable. It is built upon the top of a steep hill, surrounded on all sides by a deep and narrow valley, which again is completely inclosed by mountains rising higher than the town, and overbuckling it on all sides. It must have been from these surrounding heights that the Israelite singers hurled their volleys of stones after the capture of the place had proved impossible (2 K. ii. 25). The town was completely compassed by a wall of great width, and when perfect, there were but two entrances, one to the south and the other to the north, cut or tunnelled through the ridge of the natural rock below the wall for a length of 100 to 120 feet. The wall is defended by several large towers, and the western extremity of the town is occupied by an enormous mass of buildings — on the south the castle or keep, on the north the walled town of Rabbath-Moab, which, when perfect, there were but two entrances, one to the south and the other to the north, cut or tunnelled through the ridge of the natural rock below the wall for a length of 100 to 120 feet.
KISH

hardly be less than 3000 feet above the sea (Porter, Hdbk. 60). From the heights immediately outside it, near a ruined mosque, a view is obtained of the Dead Sea, and in clear weather of Bethlehem and Jerusalem (Seetzen, Relken, i. 419; Schwarz, 217).

G.

KISH (ךו?) [perh. bone, Ges.]: Kis; [Vat. Alex.
Kei], and so Lachhm. Tisch. Treg. in Acts: Cis, Vulg. and A.V., Acts xiii. 21]. 1. A man of the tribe of Benjamin and the family of Matri, according to 1 Sam. x. 21, though descended from Becher, according to 1 Chr. vii. 8, compared with 1 Sam.
x. 1. [BECHEI]. He was son of Ner, brother to Almer, and father to King Saul. Gibesh or Gibon seems to have been the seat of the family from the time of Jehiel, otherwise called Abiel (1 Sam.
xiv. 51), Kish’s grandfather (1 Chr. ix. 35).

2. Son of Jehiel, and uncle to the preceding
(1 Chr. viii. 30), ix. 30).

3. [Karas]: Vat. Alex. Keswcy: A Benja-mite, great grandfather of Mordecai, who was taken captive at the time that Joneniah was carried to Babylon (Fatha ii. 5).

4. A Merarite, of the house of Mahli, of the tribe of Levi. His sons married the daughters of his brother Eleazar (1 Chr. xiii. 21, 22, xxiv. 28, 29), apparently about the time of David, since Jethuhun was the singer was the son of Kish (1 Chr.
vi. 44, A. V.), compared with 2 Chr. xxix. 12. In the last cited place, “Kish, the son of Abdi;” in the reign of Hezekiah, must denote the Levitical house or division, under its chief, rather than an individual.

The genealogy in 1 Chr. vi. shows that, though Kish is called “the son of Mahli” (1 Chr. xii. 21), eth eight generations intervened between him and Mahli. In the corrupt text of 1 Chr.
xxvi. the name is written Kushabiah at ver. 17,
and for Jethubah is written Ethan. [JETHUHUN.]

It is not improbable that the name Kish may have passed into the tribe of Levi from that of Benjamin, owing to the residence of the latter in the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem, which might lead to intermarriages (1 Chr. viii. 28, 32).

KISHON (ךו) [see above]: Kishon, [Vat. Keswcy: Alex. Keswcy: Cesion], one of the town on the boundary of the tribe of Issachar (Jos. xix.
20), which with its suburbs was allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 28); though in this place the name — identical in the original — is incorrectly given in the A. V. KISHON. If the judgment of Gesenius may be accepted, there is no connexion between the name Kishon and that of the river Kishon, since as Hebrew words they are derivable from distinct roots.

But it would seem very questionable how far so archaic a name as that of the Kishon, mentioned, as it is, in one of the earliest records we possess (Judg. v.), can be treated as Hebrew. No trace of the situation of Kishon however exists, nor can it be inferred so as to enable us to ascertain whether any connection was likely to have existed between the town and the river.

KISHON, THE RIVER [torrent, K., i. e. bending itself, serpentine, Ges.]: ךו, קיוושו, Kishon, and Kishon: [Vat. Alex. Keswcy: Cesion], uniformly, and Kishon, of the town (Cesion), a torrent or winter stream of central Palestine, the scene of two of the grandest achievements of Israelite history — the defeat of Sisera, and the destruction of the prophets of Baal by Elijah.

Unless it be alluded to in Jos. xii. 11 as "the torrent facing Jokneam" — and if Kainah be Jok-necam, the description is very accurate — the Kishon is not mentioned in describing the possessions of the tribes. Indeed its name occurs only in connection with the two great events just referred to (Judg. iv. 7, 13, v. 21; Ps. lxxxii. 9 — here in-curately "Kison;" and 1 K. xviii. 40).

The Nahor Mukattah, the modern representative of the Kishon, is the drain by which the waters of the plain of Esdraelon, and of the mountains which inclose that plain, namely, Carmel and the Samaria range on the south, the mountains of Galilee on

2. As an epithet of the Kishon itself: LXX., χειρόβους ἀργαῦμα; Aquila, καινουργίαν, perhaps intending to imply a searching wind or sinuous course accompanying the rising of the waters; Symmachus, αἰγίων or αἰγουρ, perhaps alluding to the swift spring-ning of the torrent (άγεν is used for high waves by Artemidorus). The Targum, adhering to the signification "ancient," expands the sentence — "the torrent in which, were shown signs and wonders to Israel of old," and this miraculous torrent a later Jewish tratition (present in the Commentarius in Canticam Deborah, ascribed to Jerome) would identify with the Red Sea, the scene of the greatest marvels in Israel’s history. The rendering of the A. V. is supported by Mendelssohn, Gesenius, Ewald, and other modern sciences. But it is not possible that the term may refer to an ancient tribe of Kedumum — wanderers from the eastern deserts — who had in remote antiquity settled on the Kishon or one of its tributary wadis.
the north, and Gibson, "Little Hermon" (so called), and Tabor on the east, and their way to the Mediterranean. Its course is in a direction nearly due N. W. along the lower part of the plain nearest the foot of the Samarian hills, and close beneath the very cliffs of that range. (Thomson, Land and Book, 2d ed. p. 430), breaking through the hills which separate the plain of Esdraelon from the maritime plain of Acre, by a very narrow pass, beneath the eminence of Herod's Church or Turt, which is believed still to retain a trace of the name of Harosheth of the Gentiles (Thomson, p. 437). It has two principal feeders: the first from Debariah (Dabatha), on Mount Tabor, the S. E. angle of the plain; and secondly, from Jabok (Gibsam and Jacob (Eugan- nium) on the S. E. The very large perennial spring of the last-named place may be said to be the origin of the remote part of the Kishon (Thomson, p. 435). It is also fed by the copious spring of Leijun, the stream from which is probably the "waters of Megiddo" (Van de Velde, 333; Porter, Handbook, p. 383). During the winter and spring, and after such rain as may have fallen on the upper part of the Kishon, the upper half has a very strong torrent; so strong, that in the battle of Mount Tabor, April 16, 1799, some of the circumstances of the defeat of Sisera were reproduced, many of the fugitive Turks being drowned in the wady from Debariah, which then inundated a part of the plain (Barekhald, p. 329). At the same seasons the ground about Leijun (Megiddo) where the principal encounter with Sisera would seem to have taken place, becomes a morass, impassable for even single travellers, and truly destruc- tive for a large horde like his army (Prokoseh, in Rob ii. 364; Thomson, p. 436).

But like most of the so-called "rivers" of Palestine, the perennial stream forms but a small part of the Kishon. During the greater part of the year its upper portion is dry, and the stream confined to a few miles next the sea. The sources of this perennial portion proceed from the roots of Carmel — the "vast fountains called 'So Abedjic, about three miles east of Uzafa" (Thomson, p. 435) and those, apparently still more copious, described by Shaw (Rob, ii. 365), b as bursting forth from beneath the eastern brow of Carmel, and discharging of themselves "a river half as big as the Isis." It enters the sea at the lower part of the bay of Akko, and forms about two miles east of Caspian a deep tortuous bed between banks of loam some 15 feet high, and 15 to 20 yards apart." (Porter, Handbook, pp. 383, 384). Between the mouth and the town the shore is lined by an extensive grove of date-palms, one of the finest in Palestine (Van de Velde, p. 289).

The part of the Kishon at which the prophets of Baal were slaughtered by Elijah was probably close before the spot on Carmel where the sacrifice had taken place. This spot is now fixed with all but certainty, as at the extreme east end of the mountain, to which the name is still attached of el-Moharak, "the burning." [CARMEL.] No-where does the Kishon run so close to the mountain as just beneath this spot (Van de Velde, i. 324). It is about 1000 feet above the river, and a precipitation raves leads directly down, by which the victims were perhaps hurried from the sacred precinets of the altar of Jehovah to their doom in the torrent bed below, at the foot of the mound, which from this circumstance may be called Tell Kisd, the hill of the priests. Whither the Kishon contained any water at this time we are not told; that required for Eliah's sacrifice was in all probability obtained from the spring on the mountain side below the plateau of el-Moharak. [CARMEL, vol. i. p. 360 a.]

Of the identity of the Kishon with the present Nahar Maktabeh there can be no question. The existence of the sites of Tanneh and Megiddo along its course, and the complete agreement of the circumstances just named with the requirements of the story of Elijah, are sufficient to satisfy us that the two are the same. But it is very remarkable what an absence there is of any continuous or traditional evidence on the point. By Josephus the Kishon is never named, neither does the name occur in the early Itineraries of Antoninus Augustus, or the Bordeaux Pilgrims. Eusebius and Jerome dismiss it in a few words, and note only its origin in Tabor (Osma, "Cison") of such part of it as can be seen thence (Ep. ad Eustochium, § 14), passing by entirely its connection with Carmel. Benjamin of Tudela visited Akka and Carmel. He mentions the river by name as "Naxhal Kishon;" but only in the most cursory manner. Brocardus (cir. 1500) describes the western portion of the stream with a little more fullness, but enlarges most on its upper or eastern part, which, with the victory of Tarab, he places on the east of Tabor and Kishon, as discharging the water of those mountains into the Sea of Galilee (Desc. Terr. S. Cap. 6, 7). This has been shown by Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii. 364) to allude to the Wady el-Birich, which runs down to the Jordan a few miles above Scythopolis. For the descriptions of modern travellers, see Maundrell (Early Trav. 450); Robinson (ii. 362 Ac., ii. 116, 117); Van de Velde (221, &c.); Stanley (306, 393, 355), and Thomson (Land and Book, chap. xxxii.).

KISDON (קיסון) [see above]: Kishon. Kishon, or Kisson, an inaccurate mode of representing the name elsewhere correctly given in the A. V. in Kiston (Ps. lviii. 9 only). An additional inconsistency is the expression "the brook of Kisson" — the word of" being redundant both here and in Judg. iv. 18, and v. 21. KIS.
The written decrees of a sovereign are kissed in token of respect; even the ground is sometimes kissed by Orientals in the fullness of their submission (Gen. xii. 40; 1 Sam. xxiv. 8; Ps. lxxix. 9. Is. xlix. 23; Mic. vii. 17; Matt. xxviii. 9; Wilkison, Anc. Egy. ii. 293; Layard, Nin. i. 374; Harmer, Obs. i. 336).

Friends saluting each other join the right hand. Then each kisses his own hand, and puts it to his lips and forehead, or breast; after a long absence they embrace each other, kissing first on the right side of the face or neck, and then on the left, or on both sides of the beard (Lane, ii. 9, 10; Irby and Mangles, p. 116; Chardin, Voy. iii. 421; Arriuex, L. c.; Burchardt, Notes, i. 369; Russell, Aleppo, i. 240).

Kissing is spoken of in Scripture as a mark of respect or adoration to idols (1 K. xix. 18: Hos. vii. 2; comp. Civ. Err. iv. 43; Tadunit, speaking of an eastern custom, Hist. iii. 24, and the Mohammedan custom of kissing the Kaaba at Mecca; Burchardt, Trav. i. 290, 298, 329; Crichton, Arabus, ii. 218).

KITE (775, ayagh: ikirwos, γαφ: vultus vulgaris). The Hebrew word thus rendered occurs in three passages, Lev. xi. 14, Deut. xiv. 13, and Job xxviii. 7: in the two former it is translated "kite" in the A. V., in the latter "vulture." It is enumerated among the twenty names of birds mentioned in Deut. xiv. 13 (belonging for the most part to the order Fugitores), which were considered unclean by the ancient Law, and forbidden for food, which may be used as food by the Israelites. The allusion in Job alone affords a clue to its identification. The deep mines in the recesses of the mounts from which the labor of man extracts the treasures of the earth are there described as "a track which the bird of prey hath not known, nor hath the eye of the ayagh looked upon it." Among all birds of prey, which are proverbially clear-sighted, the ayagh is thus distinguished as possessed of peculiar keenness of vision, and by this attribute alone is it marked. Translators have been singularly at variance with regard to this bird. In the LXX. of Lev. and Deut. ayagh is rendered "kite," while in Job it is "vulture," which the A. V. has followed. The Vulg. gives "vulture" in all three passages, unless, as Drusius suggests (on Lev. xi. 14), the order of the words in Lev. and Deut. is changed; but even in this case there remains the rendering "vulture" in Job, and the reason advanced by Drusius for the transposition is not conclusive. The Targ. Onkelos vaguely renders it "bird of prey," Targ. Pseudo-Jonathan, "black vulture;" Targ. Jerus. by a word which Buxtorf translates "a pie," in which he is supported by the authority of Kimchi, but which Bochart considers to be identical in meaning with the preceding, and which is employed in Targ. Onkelos as the equivalent of the word rendered "heron" in A. V. of Lev. xi. 19. It is impossible to say what the rendering of the Peshito Syriac in Lev. and Deut. may be, in consequence of an evident confusion in the text; in (Milenus vulgaris); but "gledë" is applied by the common people in Ireland to the common buzzard (Buteo vulgaris), the "kite" not being indigenous to that country. So, too, the translators of the A. V. considered the terms "kite" and "gledë" as distinct for they render γαφ: "gledë," and 775: "kite."

Job 39:20 is translated by daishi as "a kite" or "vulture" as some have it, which is the representative of "vulture" in the A. V. of Is. xxiv. 15. The Arabic versions of Saadia and Abulwahab give "the night-owl;" and Alen Ezra, deriving it from a root מז signifyng "an island," explains it as "the island bird," without however identifying it with any individual of the feathered tribes. Robertson (Cleris Pentateuchi) derives ayyih from the Heb. עין, an obsolete root, which he connects with an Arabic word, the primary meaning of which, according to Schultens, is "to turn." If this derivation be the true one, it is not improbable that "kite" is the correct rendering. The habit which birds of this genus have of "sailing in circles, with the rudder-like tail by its inclination governing the curve," as Yarrell says, accords with the Arabic derivation.

Bochart, regarding the etymology of the word, connected it with the Arabic عين, a kind of hawk so called from its cry عين, described by Damir as a small bird with a short tail, used in hunting, and remarkable for its great courage, the swiftness of its flight, and the keenness of its vision, which is made the subject of praise in an Arabic stanza quoted by Damir. From these considerations Bochart identifies it with the merlin, or Falco australis of Linnaeus, which is the same as the Greek α listing and Latin avis. It must be confessed, however, that the grounds for identifying the ayyih with any individual species are too slight to enable us to regard with confidence any conclusions which may be based upon them; and from the expression which follows in Lev. and Deut., "after its kind," it is evident that the term is generic. The Talmud go so far as to assert that the four Hebrew words rendered in A. V. "vulture," "glede," and "kite," denote one and the same bird (Levisohn, Zoology).

KNIFE

Seven different kinds employed by the natives to the same purpose.

Two persons are mentioned in the O. T. whose names are derived from this bird. [AAAH.] First (Howe. s. v.) compares the parallel instances of Shahin, a kind of falcon, used as a proper name by the Persians and Turks, and the Latin Milvius. To these we may add Falco and Falcatus among the Romans, and the names of Hawke, Falcon, Falconer, Kite, etc., etc., in our own language (see Lower's Historical Essays on English Surnames).

*The common black kite, which is seen wheeling in circles over the cities of Egypt, with the small vulture (Vultur percopterus) is called by the natives مَلْح. This species is found also in Syria, though like all the raptorial birds, less numerous than in Egypt. From its proximity to the cities it would appear to prefer what it can pick up of offal and dead birds to the more precarious hunting of its living prey. The pigeons of Egypt, which are exceedingly numerous in the neighborhood of the towns, seem to fly about in perfect indifference to the presence of this powerful raptor, and I never saw a kite make a descent on a flock of pigeons, though they might be at all times. They are exceedingly wary and difficult to approach, or shoot on the wing.*

KITHLISH (maids, i. e. Ciblish. Maryas: Alex. Kobhoss: [Comp. Abd. Kobhoss:] Ciblish, one of the towns of Judah, in the Develd, or lowland (Josh. xv. 40), named in the same group with Egdon, Gederoth, and Makkedah. It is not named by Eusebius or Jerome, nor does it appear to have been either sought or found by any latter traveller.

KITRON (Kitron [perh. coste, fortress, Diets.]: Khopau; Alex., with unusual departure from the Heb. text, Khpbau; [Comp. Khphao:] Cetrion, a town which, though not mentioned in the specification of the possessions of Zebulun in Josh. xix., is catalogued in Judg. i. 30 as one of the towns from which Zebulun did not expel the Canaanites. It is here named next to Nahalgal, a position occupied in Josh. xix. 15, by Kaddath. Kitron may be a corruption of this, or it may be an independent place omitted for some reason from the other list. In the Talmud (Meggil), as quoted by Schwarz, 173 it is identified with Zippori, i. e. Sepphoris, now Safuriah.

KNIFE: 1. The knives of the Egyptians, and of other nations in early times, were probably only of hard stone, and the use of the flint or stone knife was sometimes retained for sacred purposes after the introduction of iron and steel (Plin. H. N. 68. 92; pharmos; gladius.)

xxxv. 12, § 165). Herodotus (ii. 36) mentions knives both of iron and of stone\textsuperscript{a} in different stages of the same process of engraving. The same may perhaps be said to some extent of the Hebrews.\textsuperscript{b}

2. In their meals the Jews, like other Orientals, made little use of knives, but they were required both for slaughtering animals either for food or sacrifice, as well as cutting up the carcase (Lev. vii. 33, 34, viii. 15, 20, 25; ix. 13; Num. xviii. 18; I Sam. ii. 24; Ez. xxiv. 4; Ex. i. 9; Matt. xxvi. 29; Russell, \textit{Aegypt.}, i. 172; Wilkinson, i. 109; Mischein. \textit{Tanait}, iv. 3).

3. Smaller knives were in use for paring fruit (\textit{Joseph. Ant.} xvii. 7; \textit{B. J.} ii. 33, § 7) and for sharpening pens\textsuperscript{c} (Jer. xxxvi. 23).

1. 2. Egyptian Flint Knives in Museum at Berlin.
3. Egyptian Knife used in Hieroglyphics.

4. The razor\textsuperscript{d} was often used for Nazaritic purposes, for which a special chamber was reserved in the Temple (Num. vi. 5, 9, 19; Ez. v. 1; Is. vii. 20; Jer. xxxvi. 23; Acts xviii. 18, xxii. 24; Mischein. \textit{Mishl}, ii. 5).

5. The pruning-hooks of Is. xviii. 5\textsuperscript{e} were probably curved knives.

6. The lancets\textsuperscript{f} of the priests of Baal were double-pointed knives (1 K. xviii. 28). [\textit{Lancet}.]

Asiatics usually carry about with them a knife or dagger, often with a highly ornamented handle, which may be used when required for eating purposes (Judg. iii. 21; Layard, \textit{Num.} ii. 342, 299; Wilkinson, i. 352, 360; Chardin, \textit{Voy.} iv. 18: Niebuhr, \textit{Iog.} i. 349, pl. 71). H. W. P.

* Instead of "sharp knives" in Josh. v. 2 (A. V.) the margin reads "knives of flint," which is more exact for \textit{μαθέα}, \textit{πέρπασα}, lit. knives of rocks or stones. The account of Joshua's burial (Josh. xiv. 30) contains in the Septuagint this remarkable addition. "Then they placed with him in the tomb in which they buried him there the flint knives (\textit{τας μαθέας} \textit{τας πέρπασας}) with which he circumcised the children of Israel in Gilgal, when he led them forth out of Egypt, as the Lord commanded them; and there they are unto this day." It thus appears that the Alexandrian translator (even supposing that he has not followed here a distinct tradition respecting the great Hebrew leader) was at all events familiar with the fact that it was not uncommon to bury such relics with distinguished persons when they died. It is well known that in the Sinaitic peninsula stone or flint knives have often been discovered on opening ancient places of sepulture. The Abyssinian tribes at the present day use flint knives in performing circumcision (Knobel, \textit{Exodus}, p. 40). See \textit{Stones}, 3. H.

KNOP, that is \textit{Knor} (A. S. \textit{cnap}). A word employed in the A. V. to translate two terms, of the real meaning of which all that we can say with certainty is that they refer to some architectural or ornamental object, and that they have nothing in common.

1. \textit{Cephtar} (רץ). This occurs in the description of the candlestick of the sacred tent in Ex. xxv. 31-36, and xxxvii. 17-22, the two passages being identical. The knops are here distinguished from the shaft, branches, bowls, and flowers of the candlestick; but the knob and the flower go together, and seem intended to imitate the produce of an almond-tree. In another part of the work they appear to form a boss, from which the branches are to spring out from the main stem. In Am. ix. 1

\textit{a} \textit{Ailôn Ailônios}.

\textit{b} \textit{V̄r̄} (Ex. iv. 25) is in LXX \textit{φιλος}, in which Syr.

\textit{c} \textit{ זכֶבַּת קֶבָּב}, \textit{"the knife of a scribe."}

\textit{d} \textit{כֶּכֶבַּב, Ges.} p. 1069.

\textit{e} \textit{גֶּכֶבַּב}, Ges. p. 421: \textit{הנהר}: \textit{fatea}.

\textit{f} \textit{כֶּכֶבַּב: סָטָמַצַת: lanuotli}
the same word is rendered, with doubtful accuracy, "lintel." The same rendering is used in Zeph. ii. 14, where the reference is to some part of the palaces of Nineveh, to be exposed when the wooden upper story—the "cedar work"—was destroyed. The Hebrew word seems to contain the sense of "covering" and "crowning" (Gesenius, Thes. 790). Josephus’s description (Ant. iii. 6, § 7) names both balls (σφαίρας) and pomegranates (ροδοκινός), either of which may be the σεφθις. The Targum agrees with the former, the LXX. (σφαίριτις) with the latter. [LINTEL.]

2. The second term, Pe'katim (פֵּקַטִים), is found only in 1 K. vi. 18 and v. 24. It refers in the former to carvings executed in the cedar wainscot of the interior of the Temple, and, as in the preceding word, is associated with flowers. In the latter case it denotes an ornament cast round the great reservoir or "sea" of Solomon’s Temple below the brim: there was a double row of them, ten to a cubit, or about 2 inches from centre to centre.

The word no doubt signifies some globular thing resembling a small gourd, or an egg, though as to the character of the ornament we are quite in the dark. The following woofcut of a portion of a

KO'A (כֹּהָד; כְּיָוד) [Alex. Asor; Comp. Ko'ē; Ab. Ko'ōth: principles] is a word which occurs only in Ez. xxvii. 23: "The Babylonians and all the Chaldaeans, Pekod, and Shoa, and Koâ and all the Assyrians with them." It is uncertain if the word is a proper name or no. It may perhaps designate a place otherwise unknown, which we must suppose to have been a city or district of Babylonia. Or it may be a common noun, signifying "prince" or "nobleman," as the Vulgate takes it, and some of the Jewish interpreters.

KO'HATH c (כֹּהָד), and Num. xvi. 1, 1c, כֹּהֶד, assembly: Koâd and [Alex. once] Koâ: Kohath, second of the three sons of Levi (Gershon, Kohath, Merari), from whom the three principal divisions of the Levites derived their origin and their name (Gen. xvi. 11: Exod. vii. 10, 18; Num. iii. 17; vii. 26)."
KOATH

2 Chr. xxxiv. 12, 18). Kothath was the father of Anram, and he of Moses and Aaron. From him, therefore, were descended all the priests; and hence those of the Kohathites who were not priests were of the highest rank of the Levites, though not the sons of Levi's first-born. Korah, the son of Izhar, was a Kohathite, and hence, perhaps, his impatience of the superiority of his relatives, Moses and Aaron. In the journeys of the Tabernacle the sons of Kohath had charge of the most holy portion of the vessels, to carry them by staves, as the vail, the ark, the tables of show-bread, the 7, 10-21, etc. (Num. iv.); but they were not to touch them or look upon them "lest they die." These were all previously covered by the priests, the sons of Aaron. In the reign of Hezekiah the Kohathites are mentioned first (2 Chr. xxix. 12), as they are also 1 Chr. xxv. 5-7, 11, when Urieil their chief assisted, with 120 of his brethren, in bringing up the ark to Jerusalem in the time of David. It is also remarkable that in this last list of those whom David calls "chief of the fathers of the Levites," and couples with "Zadok and Abia-thar the priests," of six who are mentioned by name four are descendants of Kohath; namely, besides Urieil, Shemaiath the son of Elzaphan, with 20 men, the head of his family, the son of Aaron, with 80 of his brethren; and Amminadab, the son of Uziel, with 112 of his brethren. For it appears from Ex. vi. 18-22, compared with 1 Chr. xxiii. 12, xxvi. 23-32, that there were four families of sons of Kohath—Aramaites, Izharites, Hebronites, and Uzzielites; and of the above names Elzaphan and Amminadab were both Uzzielites (Ex. vi. 22), and Elieel a Hebronite. The verses already cited from 1 Chr. xxiv.; Num. iii. 19, 27; 1 Chr. xxviii. 12, also disclose the wealth and importance of the Kohathites, and the important offices filled by them as keepers of the dedicated treasures, as judges, officers, and rulers, both secular and sacred. In 2 Chr. xx. 19, they appear as singers, with the Korahites.

The number of the sons of Kohath between the ages 29 and 50, at the census in the wilderness was 2,750, and the whole number of Kohathites who were born from a month old was 9,000 (Num. iii. 23, iv. 36). Their number is not given at the second numbering (Num. xxvi. 57), but the whole number of Levites had increased by 1,300, namely, from 22,000 to 23,300 (Num. iii. 39, xxvi. 62). The place of those sons of Kohath in marching and encamping was south of the Tabernacle (Num. iii. 23), which was also the situation of the Reubenites. Samuel was a Kohathite, and so of course were his descendants, Heman the singer and the third division of the singers which was under him. [HEMAN; ASAPH; JEDUTTHA]. The inheritance of those sons of Kohath who were not priests lay in the half tribe of Manasseh, in Ephrain (1 Chr. vi. 61-70), and in Dan (Josh. xxi. 5, 20-29). Of the personal history of Kohath we know nothing, except that he came down to Egypt with Levi and Josue (Gen. xi. 11), that his sister was Jochebed (Ex. vi. 20), and that he lived to the age of 133 years (Ex. vi. 18). He lived about 80 or 90 years in Egypt during Joseph's lifetime, and about 30 more after his death. He may have been some 20 years younger than Joseph his uncle. The table on the preceding page shows the principal descents from Korath's family; a fuller table may be seen in Bunting's Genealogies, Tab. X. No. 1. [LEVITES.]

A. C. H.

* KO'ATHITES (acional, 7 times, and * KO'RAH (axyal, 4 times, and * KO'LA'IAH, baldness a; Kopel; Core). 1. Third son of Esau by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxv. 5, 14; 1 Chr. i. 55). He was born in Canaan before Esau migrated to Mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 3-9), and was one of the "dukes" of Edom.

2. Another Edomish duke of this name, sprung from Eliphaz, Esau's son by Ada (Gen. xxxvi. 16); but this is not confirmed by ver. 11, nor by the list in 1 Chr. i. 36, nor is it probable in itself.

3. [Yat. Kopel.]. One of the "sons of Hebron" 1 in 1 Chr. ii. 44; but whether, in this obscure passage, Hebron is the name of a man or of a city, and whether, in the latter case, Korah is the same as the son of Izhar (No. 4), whose children may have been located at Hebron among those Kohathites who were priests, is difficult to determine.

4. Son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi. He was leader of the famous rebellion against his cousins Moses and Aaron in the wilderness, for which he paid the penalty of perishing with his followers by an earthquake and flames of fire (Num. xvi. 10), and was not only rebuked, but also cast out of the congregation as a leper. This detail of his rebellion is too well known to need repetition here, but it may be well to remark, that the particular grievance which rankled in the mind of Korah and his companions was their exclusion from the office of the priesthood, and their being "confined — those among them who were Levites — to the inferior service of the Tabernacle, as appears clearly, both from the words of Moses in ver. 9, and from the test resorted to with regard to the censors and the offering of incense. The same thing also appears from the subsequent confirmation of the priesthood to Aaron (ch. xvii.). The appointment of Elzaphan to be chief of the Kohathites (Num. iii. 30) may have far more inflamed his jealousy. Korah's position as leader in this rebellion was evidently the result of his personal character, which was that of a bold, haughty, and ambitious man. This appears from his address to Moses in Num. xv. 3, and especially from his conduct in ver. 19, where both his daring and his influence over the congregation are very apparent. Were it not for this, one would have expected the Gershonites — as the older and it has been retorted that Korah's baldness has a more suitable antitype in the tonsure of the Korahite priests (Simonis. Comm. 5, 149).

branch of the Levites — to have supplied a leader in conjunction with the sons of Kohath, rather than the family of Izhar, who was Amram's younger brother. From some cause which does not clearly appear, the children of Korah were not involved in the destruction of their father, as are expressly told in Num. xvi. 11, and as appears from the continuance of the family of the Korahites to the reign, at least of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xx. 19), and probably till the return from the Captivity (1 Chr. ix. 20, 31). [KORAHITE.] Perhaps the fissure of the ground which swallowed up the tents of Bathan and Abiram did not extend beyond those of the Reubenites. From Num. xvi. 27 it seems clear that Korah himself was not with Bathan and Abiram at the moment. His text may have been a pitch for himself, in contempt of the orders of Moses, by the side of his fellow-rebels, while his family continued to reside in their proper camp nearer the tabernacle; or it must have been separated by a considerable space from those of Bathan and Abiram. Or, even if Korah's family resided amongst the Reubenites, they may have fled, at Moses's warning, to take refuge in the Kohathite camp, instead of remaining, as the wives and children of Bathan and Abiram did (ver. 27). Korah himself was doubtless with the 250 men who bore censers nearer the tabernacle (ver. 19), and perished with them by the fire from Jehovah, which accompanied the earthquake. It is nowhere said that he was one of those who went down quick into the pit (comp. Ps. cxvii. 18), and it is natural that he should have been with the censor-leaders. That he was so is indeed clearly implied by Num. xvi. 19—21, 35, 40, compared with xxvi. 9, 10. In the N. T. (Jude ver. 11) Korah is coupled with Cain and Balam, and seems to be held out as a warning to those who despise dominion and speak evil of dignities, of whom it is said that they perished in the gaining of Core. Nothing more is known of Korah's personal character or career previous to his rebellion.

A. C. H.

KORAHITE. (1 Chr. ix. 20, 31). KORAHITE, or KORATHITE (in Hebrew always קֹרָחִי, or in plur. קֹרָחִי, קֹרָחִי [patr. from KORAH;] never expressed at all by the LXX., but paraphrased διστατος, διστατος of προφήτης Κόραθιν, see note 1). (Gen. vii. 19; Numbers, xxvii. 3). The only portion of the Kohathites, which were descended from Korah, and are frequently styled by the synonymous phrase Sons of Korah. [KORAHITE.] It would appear, at first sight, from Ex. vi. 24, that Korah had three sons — Assir, Elkanah, and Abiasaph. As Winer, Rosenmuller, etc., also understand it; but as we learn from 1 Chr. vi. 22, 23, 37, that Assir, Elkanah, and Abiasaph, were respectively the sons, grandson, and great-grandson of Korah, it seems obvious that Ex. vi. 24 gives us the chief houses sprung from Korah, and not his actual sons, and therefore that Elkanah and Abiasaph were not the sons, but later descendants of Korah. If, however, Abiasaph was the grandson of Assir his name must have been added to this genealogy in Exodus later, as he could not have been born at that time. Elkanah might, being of the same generation as Phinehas (Ex. vi. 25).

The office held by the sons of Korah, as far as we are informed, are the following. They were an important branch of the singers in the Kohathite division, Heman himself being a Korahite (1 Chr. vi. 34), and the Korahites being among those who, in Jehoshaphat's reign, "stood up to praise the Lord God of Israel with a loud voice on high." (2 Chr. xx. 19). [HUMAN.] Hence we find eleven Psalms (or twelve, if Ps. 45 is included under the same title as Ps. 42) dedicated or assigned to the sons of Korah, namely, Ps. 42, 44—49, 84, 85, 87, 88. Winer describes them as some of the most beautiful in the collection, from their high lyric tone. Origen says it was a remark of the old interpreters that all the Psalms inscribed with the name of the sons of Korah are full of pleasant and cheerful subjects, and free from anything sal or harsh (Homil. on 1 Kings, i. e. 1 Sam., Matt. viii. 20), he ascribes the authorship of these Psalms to "the three sons of Korah," who, "because they agreed together had the Word of God in the midst of them." (Homil. xiv.). Of moderns, Rosenmuller thinks that the sons of Korah, especially Heman, were the authors of these Psalms, which, he says, rise to greater sublimity and breathe more vehement feelings than the Psalms of David. And quotes Hesner and Eichhorn as agreeing. I. C. Wette also considers the sons of Korah as the authors of them (Itid. 333-339), and so does Just. Ohsbaum on the Psalms (Exeg. Homil. Eikir. p. 22). As, however, the language of several of these Psalms — as the 42d, 87th, etc. — is manifestly meant to apply to David, it seems much simpler to explain the title "or the sons of Korah," to the sense that they were inspired, not by them to the Temple, but by the Temple-serenades. If their style of music, vocal and instrumental, was of a more sublime and lyric character than that of the sons of Merari or Gershon, and Heman had more fire in his execution than Asaph and Jeduthun, it is perfectly natural that David should have given his more poetic and elevated strains to Heman and his choir, and the xxvi. 19, 2 Chr. xx. 9. psalter, αἰωνιοί, and ςτατικ ). These represent distinct Hebrew words, and Kop is used instead of the patronymic; while in 1 Chr. ix. 30, 31, xii. 6, the LXX. have Kopis or Kopis (Vat. vat. 4). A. St. Augustine has a still more fanciful conceit, which he thinks it necessary to repeat in almost every homily; from the eleven poems inscribed to the sons of Kore. Adverting to the interpretation of Korah, Bat- rat, he finds in it a great mystery. Under this term is set forth Christ, who is entitled Calvin, because he was exalted on Calvary, and was mocked by the bystanders, as Elisa had been by the children, and after him "Caleps, ever, and who, when they said God, thou hail pals, had prefigured the crucifixion. The sons of Korah are therefore the children of Christ the bride-groom (Hom. i. 1 Paulus).

sumptuous and quieter psalms to the other choirs. J. van Iperen (ap. Rosenm.) assigns these psalms to the times of Jehoshaphat: others to those of the Maccabees; Ewald attributes the 42d Psalm to Jeremiah. The purpose of many of the German critics seems to be to reduce the antiquity of the Scriptures as low as possible.

Others, again, of the sons of Korah were "porters," i.e., doorkeepers, in the Temple, an office of considerable dignity. In 1 Chr. ix. 17-19, we learn that Shallum, a Korahite of the line of Ebiassaph, was chief of the doorkeepers, and that he and his brethren were over the work of the service, keepers of the gates of the tabernacle (comp 2 K. xxvii. 18), apparently after the return from the Babylonian Captivity. [Kings.] See also 1 Chr. xxv. 22-23; Jer. xxv. 4; and Ezr. ii. 42. But in 1 Chr. xxvi. we find that this official station of the Korahites dated from the time of David, and that their chief was then Shelumiel or Meshelemiah, the son of (Abi)assaph, to whose custody the east gate fell by lot, being the principal entrance. Shelumiel is doubtless the same name as Shallum in 1 Chr. ix. 17, and, perhaps, Meshelemiah, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 12. Neh. xii. 35, where, as in so many other places, it designates, not the individuals, but the house of family. In 2 Chr. xxxiv. 14, Kore, the son of Innah the Levite, the doorkeeper towards the east, who was over the free-will offerings of God to distribute the oblations of the Lord and the most holy things, was probably a Korahite, as we find the name Kore in the family of Korah in 1 Chr. ix. 19. In 1 Chr. ix. 51, we find that Mattithiah, the first-born of the Korahites, had the set office over the things that were made in the tabs. (Barrington's Genealogies: Patrick, Comment, on Num. 1. Lyell's Princ. of Geol., ch. 23, 24, 25, on Earthquakes; Rosenmüller and Olshausen, On Psalms; De Wette, Eitd.)

KO'ER (נֵרֶחֶם) [title]: Kopé = [Vat. Kaphyš]. Alex. Xaryp in 1 Chr. ix. 19; Alex. Kapha, 1 Chr. xxi. 1: [Cere]. 1. A Korahite, ancestor of Shalum and Meshelemiah, chief porters in the reign of David.

2. (Kaphé: Alex. Kaphyš). Son of Innah, a Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, appointed over the free-will offerings and most holy things, and a gatekeeper on the eastern side of the Temple after the reform of worship in Judah (2 Chr. xxvi. 14). 3. In the A. V. of 1 Chr. xxvi. 10, "the sons of Korah" (following the Vulg. Cere), should properly be "the sons of the Korahite."

KUSHA'TAH (3 syl.) (נֵרֶחֶם) [Jeconiah's row]: Koradas [Vat. F.A. Kor]. [Custow.]. The same as Kish or Kishil, the father of Ethan the Merarite (1 Chr. xv. 17).

LABAN

LADAD (לֶדֶד) [order, arranging]: Lādād: [Vat. Mazaθ]; Lazurc, the son of Shelah, and grandson of Judah. He is described as the "father," or founder, of Maresaiah in the lands of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 21).

LADAD (לָדָד) [put in order]: Lādād: Alex. Ḥaθaθ and Lādād: Leedan. 1. An Ephraimitic ancestor of Joshua the son of Nun (1 Chr. vii. 21).

2. (Ehād: Alex. Ḥaθaθ: Leedan, 1 Chr. xiii. 7, 8, 9: Lādād Alex. Ḥaθaθ and Lādād: Leob: 1 Chr. xvi. 21.) The son of Gershon, elsewhere called Jeush. His descendants in the reign of David were among the chief fathers of his tribe, and formed part of the Temple-choir.

LABAN (לָדָד) [white]: Ḥaθaθ: Joseph. Ḥaθaθ: Leob: Lōtan, son of Bethuel, grandson of Nabor and Milcah, grand-nephew of Abraham, brother of Rebekah, and father of Leah and Rachel; by whom and their descendants Bilhah and Zilpah he was the natural progenitor of three fourths of the nation of the Jews, and of our Blessed Lord, and the legal ancestor of the whole.

The elder branch of the family remained at Haran when Abraham removed to the land of Canaan, and it is there that we first meet with Laban, as taking the leading part in the betrothal of his sister Rebekah to her cousin Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 10, 24-60, xxvii. 43, xxviii. 4). Bethuel, his father, pays so insignificant a part in the whole transaction, being in fact only mentioned once, and that after his son (xxviii. 50), that various conjectures have been formed to explain it. Josephus asserts that Bethuel was dead, and that Laban was the head of the house and his sister's natural guardian (Ant. ii. 10, § 2); in which case "Bethuel" must have crept into the text inadvertently, or be supposed, with some (Adam Clarke, in loc.), to be the name of another brother of Rebekah. Le Cerc (in Pent.) mentions the conjecture that Bethuel was absent at first, but returned in time to give his consent to the marriage. The mode adopted by Prof. Blunt (Unhesitating Coincidences, p. 35) to explain what he terms "the consistent insignificance of Bethuel," namely, that he was incapacitated from taking the management of his family by age or indiscretion, is most ingenious; but the prominence of Laban may be sufficiently explained by the custom of the country, which then, as now (see Niebuhr, quoted by Rosenmüller in loc.), gave the brothers the main share in the arrangement of their sister's marriage, and the defense of her honor (comp. Gen. xxiii. 13; Judg. xxi. 22; 2 Sam. xiii. 20-21). [BETHUEL.]

The next time Laban appears in the sacred narrative it is as the host of his nephew Jacob at Haran (Gen. xxvii. 13, 14). The subsequent transactions by which he secured the valuable services of his nephew for fourteen years in return for his two daughters, and for six years as the price of his cattle, together with the disgraceful artifice by which he palmed off his elder and less attractive daughter on the unsuspecting Jacob, are familiar to all (Gen. xxix, xxx.).
Laban was absent shearing his sheep, when Jacob, having gathered together all his possessions, started with his wives and children for his native land; and it was not till the third day that he heard of their steady departure. In hot haste he set off in pursuit of the fugitives, his indignation at the prospect of losing a servant, the value of whose services he had proved by experience (xxx. 27), and a family who he hoped would have increased the power of his tribe, being increased by the discovery of the loss of his teraphim, or household gods, which Rachel had carried off, probably with the view of securing a prosperous journey. Jacob and his family had crossed the Pishputtes, and were already some days' march in advance of their pursuers; but so large a caravan, encumbered with women and children, and cattle, would travel but slowly (comp. Gen. xxxviii. 13), and Laban and his kinsmen came up with the retreating party on the east side of the Jordan, among the mountains of Gilead. The collision with his irritated father-in-law might have proved dangerous for Jacob but for a divine intervention to Laban, who, with characteristic hypocrisy, passes over in silence the real ground of his displeasure at Jacob's departure, urging only its clandestine character, which had prevented his sending him away with marks of affection and honor, and the theft of his gods. After some sharp mutual recrimination, and an unsuccessful search for the teraphim, which Rachel, with the cunning which characterized the whole family, knew well how to hide, a covenant of peace was entered into between the two parties, and a calm raised about a pillar-stone set up by Jacob, both as a memorial of the covenant, and a boundary which the contracting parties pledged themselves not to pass with hostile intentions. After this, in the simple and beautiful words of Scripture, "Laban rose up and kissed his sons and his daughters, and blessed them, and departed, and returned to his place;" and he thenceforward disappears from the Biblical narrative.

Few Scriptural characters appear in more repulsive colors than Laban, who seems to have concentrated in himself acquisitiveness and selfishness, and an unctuous hypocrisy and servility, which marked the family of Haran. The leading principle of his conduct was evidently self-interest, and he was little scrupulous as to the means whereby his ends were secured. Nothing can excuse the abominable trick by which he deceived Jacob in the matter of his wife, and there is much of harshness and mean selfishness in his other relations with him. At the same time it is impossible, on an unbiased view of the whole transactions, to acquit Jacob of blame, or to assign him any very decided superiority over his uncle in fair and generous dealing. In the matter of the flocks each was evidently seeking to outwit the other; and though the whole was divided overwork to deal with important issues in securing Jacob's return to Canaan in wealth and dignity, our moral sense revolts from what Chalmers (Daily Rev. Readings, p. 60) does not shrink from designating as "snaking artifices for the promotion of his own selfishness," adopted for his own enrichment and the impoverishment of his uncle; while we can well excuse Laban's mortification at seeing himself outdone by his nephew in cunning, and the best of his flocks changing hands. In their mistaken zeal to defend Jacob, Christian writers have unduly depreciated Laban, and even the ready hospitality shown by him to Abraham's servant, and the affectionate reception of his nephew (Gen. xxiv. 30, 31, xxix. 13, 14), have been misconstrued into the acts of a selfish man, eager to embrace an opportunity of a lucrative connection. No man, however, is wholly selfish; and even Laban was capable of generous impulses, however mean and unprincipled his general conduct.

E. V.

LABAN (לָבָן [white]: Aًbāb: Laban), one of the landmarks named in the obscure and disputed passage, Deut. i. 1: "Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Diblah." The mention of Hazeroth has perhaps led to the only conjecture regarding Laban of which the writer is aware, namely, that it is identical with Lishnah (Num. xxxv. 20), which was the second station from Hazeroth. The SYrinc Pes-Hito understands the name as Lysenon. The Targums, from Onkelos downward, play upon the five names in this passage, connecting them with the main events of the wanderings. Lavan in this way suggests the meaning, because of its white color, that being the force of the word in Hebrew.

The corresponding Hebrew word, לָכֶת (lakhet), is derived from a verb signifying "to twist," is translated "wound" in Judg. xvi. 9, line in Ex. xi. 3, "wore (of gold) in Ex. xxxix. 3, ribbon in Num. xv. 38, and very improperly "bracelets in Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25, where it denotes the cord or string by which the signet-ring was suspended from the neck.

of the king: it was attacked in its turn, immediately after the fall of Lachish, and notwithstanding an effort to relieve it by Hezron king of Gezer, was taken, and every soul put to the sword (vv. 31-33). In the special statement that the attack lasted two days, in contradiction to the other cities which were taken in one (see ver. 35), we gain our first glimpse of that strength of position for which Lachish was afterwards remarkable. In the catalogue of the kings slain by Joshua (xii. 10-12), Lachish occurs in the same place with regard to the others as in the narrative just quoted; but in Josh. xv., where the towns are separated into groups, it is placed in the Shefeloth, or lowland district, and in the same group with Ezlon and Makkekel (ver. 33), apart from its former companions. It should not be overlooked that, though included in the lowland district, Lachish was a town of the Amorites, who appear to have been essentially mountaineers. Its king is expressly named as one of the "kings of the Amorites who dwelled in the mountains" (Josh. x. 6). A similar remark has already been made of Jarmuth, Keilah, and others; and see Judah, vol. ii. p. 1490 b. * Its proximity to Lilaah is illu-worded many centuries later (2 K. xix. 8). Lachish was one of the cities fortified and garrisoned by Hezroon after the revolt of the northern kingdoem (2 Chr. xi. 9). What was its fate during the invasion of Shishak—who no doubt advanced by the usual route through the maritime lowland, which would bring him under its very walls—we are not told. But it is probable that it did not materially suffer, for it was evidently a place of security later, when it was chosen as a refuge by Amaziah king of Judah from the conspirators who threatened him in Jerusalem, and to whom he at last fell a victim at Lachish (2 K. xiv. 19, 2 Chr. xxv. 27). Later still, in the reign of Hezekiah, it was one of the cities taken by Sennacherib when he on his way from Phoenicia to Egypt (Rawlinson's Herod. i. 477). It is specially mentioned that he laid siege to it "with all his power" (2 Chr. xxxii. 9), and here "the great king" himself remained, while his officers only were dispatched to Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxxii. 9; 2 K. xviii. 17).

This siege is considered by Layard and Gliecks to be depicted on the slabs found by the former in one of the chambers of the palace at Kouyunjik, which bear the inscription "Sennacherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment before (or at the entrance of) the city of Lachish (Lakhusha). I give permission for its slaughter" (Layard, N. & B. pp. 149-52, and 153, note). These slabs contain a view of a city which, if the inscription is correctly interpreted, must be Lachish itself.

Another slab seems to show the ground-plan of the same city after its occupation by the conquerors — the Assyrian tents pitched within the walls, and the foreign worship going on. The features of the town appear to be accurately given. At any rate there is considerable agreement between the two views in the character of the walls and towers, and both are unlike those represented on other slabs. Both support in a remarkable manner the conclusions above drawn from the statement of the Bible as to the position of Lachish. The elevation of the town (fig. 1) shows that it was on hilly ground, one part higher than the other. This is also testified to by the background of the scene in fig. 2, which is too remote to be included in the limits of the woodcut, but which in the original shows a very hilly country covered with vineyards and fig-trees. On the other hand the palms round the town in fig. 2 point to the proximity of the maritime plain, in which palms flourished — and still flourished — more than in any other region of Palestine. But though the Assyrian records thus appear to assert the capture of Lachish, no statement is to be found either in the Bible or Josephus that it was taken. Indeed, some expressions in the former would almost seem to imply the reverse (see "thought to win them," 2 Chr. xxxii. 1: "departed b from Lachish," 2 K. xix. 8; and especially Jer. xxxiv. 7). The warning of Micah (i. 13) c was perhaps delivered at this time. Obscur as the passage is, it plainly implies that from Lachish some form of idolatry, possibly belonging to the northern kingdom, had been imported into Jerusalem.

a Col. Rawlinson seems to read the same as Lubiana, c Lilaah (Layard, N. & B. 153, note).
b This is also the opinion of Rawlinson (Herod. i. 130, note 6). c The play of the words is between Lachish and Revish (ב"ץת, A. V. "swift beast"), and the ehoration is to flight.

in favor of the identification are the proximity of Egbou (if *Ajblin be it), and the situation of Um-Lakis in the middle of the plain, right in the road from Egypt. By "Parana" also Eusebius may have intended, not the southern district, but a place of that name, which is mentioned in the Talmud, and is placed by the accurate old travellerhap Parchi as two hours south of Gaza (Zonuz in Benj. of Tudeh, by Asher, ii. 442). With regard to the weakness of Um-Lakis, Mr. Porter has a good comparison between it and Ashkelon (Hondek., p. 261).

LACUNUS (Lacunos: Colossi, one of the sons of Addison, who returned with Ezra, and had married a foreign wife (1 Esdr. ix. 31). The name does not occur in this form in the parallel lists of Ezr. x., but it apparently occupies the place of Zonuz (ver. 30), as is indicated by the Colossi of the Vulg.

LADD OF TYRUS, THE (ץ ננמ נב תוד קתב) Tyros: a terminus Tyri, possibly reading נומנ: one of the extremities (the northern) of the district over which Simon Macrobius was made captain (Σπυράργυς) by Antiochus VI. (or These), very shortly after his coming to the throne; the other being "the borders of Egypt" (1 Macc. xi. 59). The Ladder of Tyre, or of the Tyrians, was the local name for a high mountain, the highest in that neighborhood, a hundred stadia north of Ptolemais, the modern Akka or Acre (Joseph. B. J. ii. 10, § 2). The position of the Ris en-elhbarah agrees very nearly with this, as it lies 10 miles, or about 120 stadia, from Akka, and is characterized by travellers from Parchi downwards as very high and steep. Both the Ris en-elhbarah and the Ris el-alyan, i.e. the White Cape, sometimes called Cape Blanco, a headland 6 miles still farther north, are surrounded by a path cut in zigzags; that over the latter is attributed to Alexander the Great. It is possibly from this circumstance that the Ris el-alyan b is by some travellers (Bray, Van de Velde, etc.) treated as the ladder of the Tyrians.

But by the early and accurate Jewish traveller, ≈Parchai (Zimm, 402), and in our own times by Robinson (ii. 89), Mislin (Les Saints Lieux, ii. 9), Porter (Haulfik, p. 380), Schwarz (76), Stauley (S. F. p. 264), the Res en-Nakura is identified with the ladder; the last-named traveller pointing out well that the reason for the name is the fact of its differing from Carmel in that it leads no track between itself and the sea, and thus, by cutting off all communication round its base, acts as the natural barrier between the Bay of Acre and the maritime plain to the north—in other words, "between Palestine and Phenicia" (comp. p. 266).

LA'EL (לֶאֵל) [to God, i. e. consecrated to him, Furst]: La'afa; La'el, the father of Eliaspah, prince of the Gershonites at the time of the Exodus (Num. iii. 24).

LA'HAD (לָהָד): Aaadâ: [Vat. Ααδᾶ]: Alex. Ααδᾶ, son of Judah, one of the descendants of Judah, a Jewish tribe who settled at Zorah, according to the Targ. of R. Joseph (1 Chr. iv. 2).

LAHAI-ROI'T, THE WELL (לָהַיּוֹר): τὸ φράες τῆς ὁρασίας: puteus, cuyus uocen ex iv. 11, nomine Tarenta et Videntis. In this form it is given in the A. V. of Gen. xxiv. 62, and xxv. 11, the name of the famous well of Hagar's relief, in the oasis of verdure round which Isaac afterwards resided. In xvi. 14—the only other occurrence of the name—it is represented in the full Hebrew form of BEREH-LAHAI-Ro'T. In the Mussulman traditions the well Zemzem in the Belhel-mehcc of Mecca is identical with it. [Lehm.] G.

LAH-MAM (לָהָמ): Maxîs kal Naaxâs: Alex. Ααμα: Lehmon, Leeman, in the lowland district of Judah (Josh. xxv. 40) named between CANAAN and KITILISH, and in the same group with LACHISH. It is not mentioned in the Ocanonost, nor does it appear that any traveller has sought for or discovered its site.

In many MSS. and editions of the Hebrew Bible, amongst them the Rec. Text of Van der Hooght, the name is given with a final s—Lachmas.4 Corrupt as the LXX. text is here, it will be observed that both MSS. exhibit the s. This is the case also in the Targum and the other oriental versions. The ordinary copies of the Vulgate have Lehmanum, but the text published in the Beneficent edition of Jerome Leonna.

LAH-MI (לָהָמִי) [Bethlehemite? Rom.—τὸν Ααμά]: Vat. Δυαμμα: Alex. Δυαμον: Beth-lehem-ites), the brother of Goliath the Gittite, slain by Elhanan the son of Jair, or Joar (1 Chr. xxv. 5). In the parallel narrative (2 Sam. xxvi. 19), amongst other differences, Lahmi disappears in the word Beth-hal-lechem, i. e. the Bethlehemite. This hand, Iry and Mangies (Oct. 21), with equally unusual inaccuracy, give the name of Cape Blanco to the Res Nakura—an hour's ride from es-Zorah, the ancient Elle-Gappa. Wilson also (ii. 220) has fallen into a curious confusion between the two.

scene of the battle in which Judas was killed. In the Vulgate it is given as Laish. If the Heera at which Bemintrius was encamped on the same occasion was Beeroth — and from the Peshito reading this seems likely — then Alexar or Laiska was somewhere on the northern road, 10 or 12 miles from Jerusalem, about the spot at which a village named Adasa existed in the time of Eusebius and Jerome. D (Δ) and I. (Δ) are so often interchanged in Greek manuscripts, that the two names may indicate one and the same place, and that the Laishah of Isaiah. Such an identification would be to a certain extent consistent with the requirements of Is. xx. 20, while it would throw some light on the uncertain topography of the last struggle of Judah Marcellinus. But it must be admitted that at present it is but conjectural; and that the neighborhood of Beeroth is at the least somewhat far removed from the narrow circle of the villages enumerated by Isaiah.

David gave Michael, David's wife (1 Sam. xxiv. 44; 2 Sam. iii. 15). He was a native of Gallim. It is very remarkable that the names of Laish (Laishah) and Gallim should be found in conjunction at a much later date (Is. x. 30). G.

Lakkum is but casually named in the Thomsonian, and no one since has discovered its situation. The rendering of the Alex. LXX. is worth remark.

LAMB. 1. נָבָה, immar, is the Chaldean equivalent of the Hebrew ecebe. See below, No. 6 (Ezr. vi. 9, 17, vii. 17).

2. נָבָה, nabah (1 Sam. vii. 9; Is. lxv. 25), a young suckling lamb; originally the young of any animal. The noun from the same root in Arabic signifies "a fawn," in Ethiopic "a kid," in Samaritan "a boy;" while in Syriac it denotes "a fox," and in the fem., "a girl." Hence "Nabalah hami," "Namal, arise." (Mark v. 41). The plural of a cognate form occurs in Is. xx. 11.

3. נָבָה, ecebe, נַבָּה, etc., and the feminines נְבָּה, נְבָּּה, נְבָּּה, נְבָּּּה, respectively denote a male and female lamb from the first to the third year. The former perhaps more nearly coincide with the provincial term boy or bocjet, which is applied to a young ram before he is shorn. The corresponding word in Arabic, according to Gesenius, denotes a ram at that period when he has lost his first two teeth and four others make their appearance, which happens in the second or third year. Young rams at this age formed an important part of almost every sacrifice. They were offered at the daily morning and evening sacrifice (Ex. xxix. 38-41), on the Sabbath day (Num. xxviii. 9), at the feast of the new moon (Num. xxviii. 11), of Atonement (Num. xxix. 2), of tabernacles (Num. xxix. 13-40), of Pentecost (Lev. xxiii. 18-20), and of the Passover (Ex. xii. 5). They were brought by the princes of the congregation as burnt-offerings as the dedication of the tabernacle (Num. vii.), and were offered on solemn occasions like the consecration of Aaron (Lev. i. 9), the coronation of Solomon (1 Chr. xii. 21), the purification of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxii. 21), and the great passover held in the reign of Josiah (2 Chr. xxxv. 7). They formed part of the sacrifice offered at the purification of the sons of Aaron (Lev. vi. 16), and at the cleansing of a leper (Lev. xiv. 10-25). They accompanied the presentation of first-fruits (Lev. xxii. 12). When the Nazarites commenced their period of separation they offered a he-lamb for a trespass-offering (Num. vi. 12); and at its conclusion a he-lamb was sacrificed as a burnt-offering, and an ewe-lamb as a sin-offering (c. 14). An ewe-lamb was also the offering for the sin of ignorance (Lev. iv. 32).

4. פַּר, far, a fat ram, or more probably a wether, as the word is generally employed in opposition to עוד, which strictly denotes a "ram" (Deut. xxxii. 14; 2 K. iii. 4; Is. xxxiv. 6). Misha king of Geshur, carried off into the kingdom of Israel 10,000 fat wethers; and this circumstance is made use of by R. Joseph Kimachi to explain Is. xvi. 1, which he regards as an exhortation to the Moabites to renew their tryst. The Tyrians obtained their supply from Arabia and Kedar (Ex. xxii. 21), and the pastures of Bashan were famous as grazing grounds (Ex. xxxiii. 18). [Bashan, Amer. ed.]

5. נָבָא, na'a, rendered "lamb," in Ex. xii. 21, is properly a collective term denoting a "flock" of small cattle, sheep and goats, in distinction from herds of the larger animal (Lev. ii. 7; Ex. xiv. 15). In opposition to this collective term the word נָב, nab, is applied to denote the individuals of a flock, whether sheep or goats; and hence, though "lamb" is in many passages the rendering of the A. V., the marginal reading gives "kid." (Gen. xxii. 7, 8; Ex. xiii. 2, xxii. 14). [Sheep.]

LAMECH (לָמֶ֣כְע) [perh. youth, one in his strength], Gen. vi. 20: Lamech, properly Lemech, the name of two persons in antediluvian history.

1. The fifth named descendant from Cain (Gen. iv. 18-24). He is the only one except Enosh, of the posterity of Cain, whose history is related with some detail. He is the first polygamist on record. His two wives, Adah and Zillah, and his daughter Nannah, are, with Eve, the only antediluvian women whose names are mentioned by Moses. His three sons — Jaram, Jiral, and Tural — are celebrated in Scripture as authors of useful inventions. The Targum of Jonathan adds, that his daughter was "the mistress of sounds and songs," i.e. the first poetess. Josephus (Antid. 2, § 2) relates that the number of his sons was seventy-seven, and Jerome records the same tradition, adding that they were all cut off by the Deluge, and that this was the seventy-and-sevenfold vengeance which Lamech inspired.

The remarkable poem which Lamech uttered has not yet been explained quite satisfactorily. It is the subject of a dissertation by Hilliger in Theosaurus Theologico-Philol. i. 141, and is discussed at length by the various commentators on Genesis. The history of the descendants of Cain closes with a song, which the Jews, that Cain bloodshed. Delitzsch observes, that as the arts which were afterwards consecrated by pious men to a heavenly use had their origin in the family of Cain, so this early effort of poetry is composed in honor, not of God, but of some deadly weapon. It is the only extant specimen of antediluvian poetry; it came down, perhaps as a popular song, to the generation for whom Moses wrote, and he inserts it in its proper place in his history. It contains in all the peculiar features of later Semitic poetry — rhythm, assonance, parallelism, strophe, and poetical diction. It may be rendered:

Adah and Zillah: hear my voice, Ye wives of Lamech: give ear unto my speech; For a man had slain me for wounding me, And a youth for wounding me: Surely sevenfold shall Cain be avenged, But Lamech seventy and seven.

The A. V. makes Lamech declare himself a murderer, "I have slain a man to my wounding," etc. This is the view taken in the LXX. and the Vulgate. Chrysostom (Hom. xx. in Gen.) regards Lamech as a murderer, but by more, pretences to make public confession of his guilt solely to ease his conscience, and afterwards (Hom. in Ps. vi.) obtaining mercy. Theodoret (Quaest. in Gen. xiv.) sets him down as a murderer. Basal (Ep. 290 [317], § 5) interprets Lamech's words to mean that he had committed two murders, and that he deserved a much severer punishment than Cain, as having sinned after plainer warning. Basal adds, that some persons interpret the last lines of the poem as meaning, that whereas Cain's sin increased, and was followed after seven generations by the punishment of the Deluge washing out the fouls of the world, so Lamech's sin shall be followed in the seventy-seventh (see St. Luke iii. 22-38) generation by the coming of Him who taketh away the sin of the world. Jerome (Ep. xxxvi. of Domusam, t. i. p. 161) relates as a tradition of his predecessors and of the Jews that Cain was accidentally slain by Lamech in the seventh generation from Adam. This legend is told with fuller details by Jarchi. According to him, the occasion of the poem was the refusal of Lamech's wives to associate with him in consequence of his having killed Cain and Tubal-cain; Lamech, it is said, was blind, and was led about by Tubal-cain: when the latter saw in the thicket what he supposed to be a wild-beast, Lamech, by his son's direction, shot an arrow at it, and thus slew Cain: in alarm and indignation at the deed, he killed his son: hence his wives refused to associate with him; and he excuses himself as having acted without a vengeful or murderous purpose. Luther considers the occasion of the poem to be the deliberate murder of Cain by Lamech. Lightfoot (Deces Chrsog. More. præm. § iv.) considers Lamech as expressing remorse for having, as the first polygamist, introduced more destruction and murder than Cain was the author of into the world. Pfeiffer (Diff. Scrip. Lec. p. 25) collects different opinions with his usual diligence, and concludes that the poem is Lamech's vindication of himself to his wives, who were in terror for the possible consequences of his having slain two of the posterity of Seth. Lowth (De S. Poesi Heb. iv.) and Michaelis think that Lamech is excusing himself for some murder which he had committed in self-defense "for a wound inflicted on me." A rather curious interpretation has been given to the poem by some, whose opinions are perhaps of greater weight than the preceding in a question of Hebrew criticism. Onkelos, followed by Pseudo-jonathan, paraphrases it, "I have not slain a man that I should bear sin on his account." The Arab. Ver. (Nastula) puts it in an interrogative form, "Have I slain a man?" etc. These two versions, which are substantially the same, are adopted by De Dieu and Bishop Patrick. Alen-Erra, Calvin, Drusius, and Cartwright, interpret it in the future tense as a threat, "I will slay any man who wounds me." This version is adopted by Herder: whose hypothesis as to the occasion of the poem was partly anticipated by Hass, and has been received by Rosenmüller, Ewald, and Delitzsch. Herder regards it as Lamech's song of exultation on the invention of the sword by his son Tubal-cain, in the possession of which he foresaw a great advantage to himself and his family over any enemies. This interpretation appears, on the whole, to be the best that has been suggested. But whatever interpretation be preferred, all persons will agree in the remark of Bp.Kidder that the occasion of the poem not being revealed, no man can be expected to determine the full sense of it; thus much is plain, that they are vamping words in which Lamech seems, from Cain's indeliberacy, to encourage himself in violence and wickedness.

W. T. B.

* The sacred writer inserts the lines, says Dr. Count, "as an illustration of the spirit of the period of violence and blood, which culminated in the state of society described in Gen. vi. 5 and 11-13, when the earth was filled with violence." They celebrate the prowess of an ancient hero, who boasts that he had signally avenged his wound on his adversary, and that the vengeance promised to Cain was light, compared with what he had inflicted" (Genesis, with a revised Version and Notes, p. 25: N. Y. 1898).

H.

2. The father of Noah (Gen. v. 25-31; 1 Chr. i. 3). Chrysostom (Serm. ix. in Gen. and Hom. xxi. in Gen.), perhaps thinking of the character of the other Lamech, speaks of this as an unrighteous man, though moved by a divine impulse to give a prophetic name to his son. Buttmann and others, observing that the names of Lamech and Enoch are found in the list of Seth's, as well as in the list of Cain's family, infer that the two lists are merely different versions or recensions of one original list, — traces of two conflicting histories of the first human family. This theory is deservedly repudiated by Delitzsch on Gen. v. W. T. B.

LAMENTATIONS. The Hebrew title of this book, Echoh (יוח), is taken, like those of the five books of Moses, from the Hebrew word with which it opens, and which appears to have been almost a received formula for the commence-ment of a song of wailing (comp. 2 Sam. i. 19-27). The Septuagint translators found themselves obliged, as in the other cases referred to, to substitute some title more significant, and adopted ἀνέπλων lamentations as the equivalent of Kimah (יוח, "lamentations"), which they found in Jer. vii. 29, ix. 19, 20; 2 Chr. xxxv. 23, and which had probably been applied familiarly, as it was afterwards by Jewish commentators, to the book itself. The Vulgate gives the Greek word and explains it (Threni, i.e., Lamentations Jeremae Prophetae). Luther and the A.V. have given the translation only, in Klopffer's Lamentations and Lamentations respectively.

The poems included in this collection appear in the Hebrew canon with no name attached to them, and there is no direct external evidence that they were written by the prophet Jeremiah earlier than the date given in the preatory verse which appears in the Septuagint. This represents, however, the established belief of the Jews after the completion of the canon. Josephus (Ant. x. 5, § 1) follows, as far as the question of authorship is concerned, in the same track, and the absence of any tradition or probable conjecture to the contrary, leaves the consensus of critics and commentators almost undisturbed. An agreement so striking rests, as might be expected, on strong internal evidence.

The poems belong unmistakably to the last days of the kingdom, or the commencement of the exile. They are written by one who speaks, with the vividness and intensity of an eye-witness, of the misery which he behelds. It might almost be enough to ask who else then living could have written with that union of strong passionate feeling and entire submission to Jehovah which characterizes both the Lamentations and the Prophecy of Jeremiah. The evidences of identity are, however, stranger and more minute. In both we meet, once and again, with the picture of the 'Virgin-daughter of Zion,' sitting down in her shame and misery (Lam. i. 13, ii. 13; Jer. xiv. 17). In both there is the same vehemence outpouring of sorrow. The prophet's eyes flow down with tears (Lam. i. 16; ii. 11, iii. 48, 49; Jer. ix. 1, xiii. 17, xiv. 17).

There is the same haunting feeling of being surrounded with fears and terrors on every side (Lam. ii. 22; Jer. vi. 25, xvi. 5). In both the worst of all the evils is the iniquity of the prophets and the priests (Lam. ii. 14, iv. 13; Jer. v. 30, 41, xiv. 13, 14). The sufferer appeals for vengeance to the righteous Judge (Lam. iii. 64-66; Jer. xi. 24). He bids the rival nation that existed in the full of Jerusalem rejoice for a like desolation (Lam. iv. 21; Jer. xlix. 14). We can well understand, with all these instances before us, how the scribes who compiled the Canon after the return from Babylon should have been led, even in the absence of external testimony, to assign to Jeremiah the authorship of the Lamentations.

Assuming this as sufficiently established, there come the questions — (1.) When, and on what occasion did he write it? (2.) In what relation does it stand to his other writings? (3.) What light does it throw on his personal history, or on that of the time in which he lived?

1. The earliest statement on this point is that of Josephus (Ant. x. 5, § 1). He finds among the books which were extant in his own time the Lamentations on the death of Josiah, which are mentioned in 2 Chr. xxxv. 25. As there are no traces of any other poem of this kind in the later Jewish literature, it has been inferred, naturally enough, that he speaks of this. This view was maintained also by Jerome, and has been defended by some modern writers (Ussher, Buthe, Michaelis, etc.).

Notes to Lament. Pref. xiii.; Calvinist, Prop. gent. ad Thren.; Be Wette, Einl. in das A. T., Kgyl.). It does not appear, however, to rest on any better grounds than a hasty conjecture, arising from the reluctance of men to admit that any work by an inspired writer should have perished, on the arbitrary assumption (Be Wette, l. c.) that the same man could not, twice in his life, have been the spokesman of a great national sorrow. And against it we have to set (1) the tradition on the other side embodied in the preface of the Septuagint. (2) the contents of the book itself. Admitting that some of the calamities described in it may have been common to the invasions of Nebuchadnezzar, we yet look in vain for a single word distinctive of a funeral dirge over a devout and zealous reformer like Josiah, while we find, step by step, the closest possible likeness between the pictures of misery in the Lamentations and the events of the closing years of the reign of Zedekiah. The long siege had brought on the famine in which the young children fainted for hunger (Lam. ii. 11, 12, 20, 21). The city was taken by storm (Lam. ii. 7, iv. 12; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 17). The Temple itself was polluted with the massacre of the priests who defended it (Lam. ii. 20, 21; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 17), and then destroyed (Lam. ii. 6; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 19). The fortresses and strongholds of Judah were thrown down. The anointed of the Lord, under whose shadow the remnant of the people might have hoped to live in safety, was taken prisoner (Lam. iv. 20; Jer. xxxix. 5). The chief of the people were carried into exile (Lam. i. 5, ii. 9; 2 K. xxi. 11). The bitterest grief was found in the malignant exultation of the Edonites (Lam. iv. 21; Ps. cxvii. 7). Under the rule of the stranger the Sabaths and solemn feasts were forgotten (Lam. i. 4, ii. 6), as they could hardly have been during the short period in which Jerusalem was in the hands of the Egyptians. Unless we adopt the strained perils, or the strained poem is prophetic in the sense of being predictive, the writer seeing the future as if it were actually present, or the still wilder conjecture of Jarchi, that this was the roll which Jehoiakim destroyed, and which was re-written by Baruch or Jeremiah (Cargoy, Introd. ad lib. V. T. iii. c. iv.), we are compelled to come to the conclusion that the coincidence is not accidental, and to adopt the later, not the earlier of the dates. At what period after the capture of the city the prophet gave this utterance to his sorrow we can only conjecture, and the materials for doing so with any probability are but scanty. The local tradition, which pointed out a cavern in the neighborhood of Jerusalem as the refuge to which Jeremiah withdrew that he might write this book (Del Rio, Proleg. in Thren., quoted by Cargoy, Introd. l. c.) is as trustworthy

a But it came to pass that after Israel was led captive and Jerusalem was laid waste, Jeremiah sat weeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and sold. b The question whether all the five poems were by the same hand has however been raised by Theodore, Die Kriegsleider erklärt: Vorlekt, quoted in David- von's Introd. to O. T., p. 888.

b More detailed coincidences of words and phrases are given by Keil quoting from Parace in his Einl. in das A. T. § 129.

c Michaelis and Buthe, however, afterwards abandoned this hypothesis, and adopted that of the later date.

d The argument that iii. 27 implies the youth of the writer, hardly needs to be confuted.
as most of the other legends of the time of Helena. The ingenuity which aims at attaching each individual poem to some definite event in the prophet's life, is for the most part simply wasted. He may have written it immediately after the attack was over, as he was with Gedaliah at Mizpeh, or when he was with his countrymen at Talpiot.

II. It is well, however, to be reminded by these conjectures that we have before us, not a book in five chapters, but five separate poems, each complete in itself, each having a distinct subject, yet brought at the same time under a plan which includes them all. It is clear, before entering on any other characteristics, that we find, in full predominance, that strong personal emotion which mingled itself, in greater or less measure, with the whole prophetic work of Jeremiah. There is here no "word of Jehovah," no direct message to a sinful people. The man speaks out of the fulness of his heart, and though a higher Spirit than his own helps him to give utterance to his sorrows, it is yet the language of a sufferer rather than of a teacher. This is more manifest in the technical classification which placed the Lamentations among the Hagiographa of the Hebrew Canon, in the feeling which led the rabbinic writers (Kinschi, \textit{Pref. in Psal.}) to say that they and the other books of that group, were written indeed by the help of the Holy Spirit, but not with the special gift of prophecy.

Other differences between the two books that bear the prophet's name grew out of this. Here there is more attention to form, more elaboration. The rhythm is more uniform than in the prophecies. A complicated alphabetic structure pervades nearly the whole book. It will be remembered that this acrostic form of writing was not peculiar to Jeremiah. Whatever its origin, whether it had been adopted as a help to the memory, and so fitted especially for didactic poems, or for such as were to be sung by great bodies of people (Louth, \textit{Psalms}, ii.), it had been a received, and it would seem popular, framework for poems of very different characters, and extending probably over a considerable period of time. The 119th Psalm is the great monument which forces itself upon our notice; but it is found also in the 25th, 34th, 37th, 111th, 112th, 145th — and in the singularly beautiful fragment appended to the book of Proverbs (Prov. xxxi. 10-31). Traces of it, as if the work had been left half-finished (De Wette, \textit{Psalmen}, ad loc.) appear in the 9th and 10th. In the Lamentations (confining ourselves for the present to the structure) we meet with some remarkable peculiarities.

\textit{Lamentations} (1.) Ch. i., ii., and iv. contain 22 verses each, arranged in alphabetic order, each verse falling into three nearly balanced clauses (Ewald, \textit{Post. Back.} p. 147); ii. 15 forms an exception under this rule, the result of an interpolation, as if the writer had shaken off for a moment the restraint of his self-imposed law. Possibly the inversion of the usual order of \(\mathbf{Y}\) and \(\mathbf{Z}\) in ch. ii., iii., iv., may have arisen from a like forgetfulness. Grotius, \textit{ad loc.}, explains it on the assumption that here Jeremiah followed the order of the Chaldean alphabet.

(2.) Ch. iii. contains three short verses under each letter of the alphabet, the initial letter being three times repeated.

(3.) Ch. v. contains the same number of verses as ch. i., ii., iv., but without the alphabetic order. The thought suggests itself that the earnestness of the prayer with which the book closes may have carried the writer beyond the limits within which he had previously confined himself; but the conjecture (of Ewald) that we have here, as in Ps. iv. and x., the broken draught of what was intended to have been finished afterwards in the same manner as the others, is at least a probable one.

III. The power of entering into the spirit and meaning of poems such as these depends on two distinct conditions. We must seek to see, as with our own eyes, the desolation, misery, confusion, which came before those of the prophet. We must endeavor also to feel as he felt when he looked on them. And the last is the more difficult of the two. Jeremiah was not merely a patriot-poet, weeping over the ruin of his country. He was a prophet who had seen all this coming, and had foretold it as inevitable. He had urged submission to the Chaldeans as the only mode of diminishing the terrors of that "day of the Lord." And now the Chaldeans were come, irritated by the perfidy and rebellion of the king and princes of Judah; and the actual horrors that he saw, surpassed, though he had predicted them, all that he had been able to imagine. All feeling of exultation in which, as mere prophet of evil, he might have indulged at the fulfillment of his forebodings, was swallowed up in deep overwhelming sorrow. Yet sorrow, not less than other emotions, works on men according to their characters, and a man with Jeremiah's gifts of utterance could not sit down in the mere silence and stupor of a hopeless grief. He was compelled to give expression to that which was devouring his heart and the heart of his people. The act itself was a relief to him. It led him on (as will be seen hereafter) to a calmer and serener state. It revived has shown how compatible such a structure is with the highest energy and beauty. With some of these, too, it must be added, the assignment of a later date than the time of David rests on the foregone conclusion that the acrostic structure is itself a proof of it. (Comp. Delitzsch, \textit{Commentar. uber den Psalter}, on Ps. ix., x.) De Wette however allows, conditionally, that the Lamentations, in spite of their degenerate taste, "have some merit in their way?" (\"stind zwar in ihrer Art von einigen Werthe?\")

Similar anomalies occur in Ps. xxxvii., and have received a like explanation (De Wette, Ps. p. 57). It is however a mere hypothesis that the Chaldean alphabet differed in this respect from the Hebrew; nor is it easy to see why Jeremiah should have chosen the Hebrew order for one poem, and the Chaldean for the other three.

\textit{De Wette} maintains (\textit{Commentar. uber die Psalmen}, p. 56) that this acrostic form of writing was the outgrowth of a feeble and degenerate age dwelling on the outer structure of poetry when the soul had departed. His judgment as to the origin and character of the alphabetic form is substantiated by Ewald (\textit{Psalmen}, i. p. 140). It is hard, however, to reconcile this estimate with the impression made on us by such Psalms as the 25th and 54th; and Ewald himself, in his translation of the Alphabetical Psalms and the Lamentations, the faith and hope which had been nearly crushed out.

It has to be remembered too, that in this speaking he was doing that which many must have looked for from him, and so meeting at once their expectations and their wants. Other prophets and poets had made themselves the spokesmen of the nation's feelings on the death of kings and heroes. The party that continued faithful to the policy and principles of Josiah remembered how the prophet had lamented over his death. The Lamentations of that period (though they are lost to us) had been accepted as a great national dirge. Was he to be silent now that a more terrible calamity had fallen upon the people? Did not the exiles in Babylon need this form of consolation? Does not the appearance of this book in their Canon of Sacred writings, after their return from exile, indicate that during their captivity they had found that consolation in it?

The choice of a structure so artificial as that which has been described above, may at first sight appear inconsistent with the deep intense sorrow of which it claims to be the utterance. Some wilder less measured rhythm would seem to us to have been a litter form of expression. It would belong, however, to a very shallow and hasty criticism to pass this judgment. A man true to the gift he has received will make the conventional (28) self-imposed rules for deep sorrow as well as for other strong emotions. In proportion as he is afraid of being carried away by the strong current of feeling, will he be anxious to make the laws more difficult, the discipline more effectual. Something of this kind is traceable in the fact that so many of the master-minds of European literature have chosen, as the fit vehicle for their deepest, tenderest, most impassioned thoughts, the complicated structure of the sonnet: in Dante's selection of the terzo rime for his vision of the unseen world. What the sonnet was to Petrarch and to Milton, that the alphabetic verse-system was to the writers of Jeremiah's time, the most difficult among the recognized forms of poetry, and yet one in which (assuming the earlier date of some of the Psalms above referred to) some of the noblest thoughts of that poetry had been deposited (though not originally so), he should have employed it as flatter than any other for the purpose for which he used it. If these Lamentations were intended to assuage the bitterness of the Babylonian exile, there was, besides this, the subsidiary advantage that it supplied the memory with an artificial help. Hymns and poems of this kind, once learnt, are not easily forgotten, and the circumstances of the captives made it then, more than ever, necessary that they should have this help afforded them.1

An examination of the five poems will enable us to judge how far each stands by itself, how far they are connected as parts forming a whole. We must deal with them as they are, not forcing our own meanings into them: looking on them not as prophetic, or didactic, or historical, but simply as lamentations, exhibiting, like other elegies, the different phases of a pervading sorrow.

1. The opening verse strikes the key-note of the whole poem. That which haunts the prophet's mind is the solitude in which he finds himself. She that was a princess among the nations (like the JEDDAH CAPE of the Roman males) “solitary,” “as a widow.” Her “lovers” (the nations with whom she had been allied) hold aloof from her (2). The heathen are entered into the sanctuary, and mock at her Sabothith (7, 10). After the manner so characteristic of Hebrew poetry, the personality of the writer now recedes and new advances, and blends by hardly perceptible transition, with that of the city which he personifies, and with which he, as it were, identifies himself. At one time, it is the daughter of Zion that asks “Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?” (12). At another, it is the prophet who looks on her, and portrays her as “spreading forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her” (17). Miming with this outburst of sorrow there are two thoughts characteristic both of the man and the time. The calamities which the nation suffers are the consequences of its sins. There must be the confession of these sins: “The Lord is righteous, for I have rebelled against His commandment” (18). There is also, at any rate, this gleam of consolation, that Judah is not alone in her sufferings. Those who have exulted in her destruction shall drink of the same cup. They shall be like unto her in the day that the Lord shall call (19).11

II. As the solitude of the city was the subject of the first lamentation, so the destruction that had laid it waste is that which is most conspicuous in the second. Jehovah had thrown down in his wrath the strongholds of the daughter of Judah (2). The rampart and the wall have fallen together (8). The walls of the palace are given up into the hand of the enemy (7). The breach is great as if made by the invading of the sea (13). With this there had been united all the horrors of the famine and the assault: young children fainting for hunger in the top of every street (19); women eating their own children, and so fulfilling the curse of Deut. xxviii. 53 (20); the priest and the prophet slain in the sanctuary of the Lord (ibid.). Added to all this, there was the remembrance of that which had been all along the great trial of Jerusalem's life, against which he had to wage continual war. The prophets of Jerusalem had seen rain and foolish things, false burdens, and causes of banishment (14). A righteous judgment had fallen on them. The prophets found no vision of Jehovah (9). The king and the princes who had listened to them were captive among the Gentiles.

III. The difference in the structure of this poem which has been already noticed, indicates a corresponding difference in its substance. In the two preceding poems, Jeremiah had spoken of the misery and destruction of Jerusalem. In the third he speaks chiefly, though not exclusively, of his own. He himself is the man that has seen affliction (1), who has been brought into darkness and not into light (2). He looks back upon the long life of the holy man whose thoughts he has been called to express, the scorn and derision of the people, the bitterness as of one drunken with wormwood (14, 15). But that experience was not one which had ended in

1 The reappearance of this structure in the later literature of the East is not without interest. Alphabetic poems are found among the hymns of Ephraim (Assyrian, Bbl. Chwst. viii. 11, 19, 38) and other writers; sometimes, as in the case of Eleazar, with a much more complicated plan than any of the O. T. poems of this type (ibid. iii. 22), and these chiefly in hymns to be sung by boys at solemn festivals, or in compositions of faith which were meant for their instruction.
darkness and despair. Here, as in the prophecies, we find a Gospel for the weary and heavy-laden, a trust not to be shaken, in the mercy and righteousness of Jehovah. The mercies of the Lord are new every morning (58). The closing verses, in particular, point to one fixed characteristic which must have occasioned this difference. There are signs also of a later date than that of the preceding poems. Though the horrors of the famine are ineffaceable, yet that which he has before him is rather the continued protracted suffering of the rule of the Chaldeans. The mountain of Zion is desolate, and the foxes walk on it (18). Slaves have ruled over the people of Jehovah (9). Women have been subjected to insult and wrong which seemed to have been taken to grind, and the children have fallen under the wood (13). But in this also, deep as might be the humiliation, there was hope, even as there had been in the dark hours of the prophet's own life. He and his people are sustained by the old thought which had been so fruitful of comfort to other prophets and patriarchs. The periods of suffering and struggle which seemed so horrid, were moments in the lifetime of the Eternal (19); and the thought of that eternity brought with it the hope that the purposes of love which had been declared so clearly should one day be fulfilled. The last words of this Lamentation are those which have risen so often from broken and contrite hearts, "Turn thou us, O Lord, and we shall be turned. Renew our days as of old" (21). That which had begun with wailing and weeping ends (following Ewald's and Michaelis's translation) with the question of hope, "Wilt thou utterly reject us? Wilt thou be very wroth against us?"

There are perhaps few portions of the O. T. which appear to have done the work they were meant to do more effectually than this. It has presented but scanty materials for the systems and controversies of theology. It has supplied thousands with the fullest utterance for their sorrows in the critical periods of national or individual suffering. We may well believe that it soothed the weary years of the Babylonian exile (comp. Zech. i. 6, with Lami. ii. 17). When they returned to their own land, and the desolation of Jerusalem was remembered as belonging only to the past, this was the book of remembrance. On the ninth day of the month of Ab (July), the Lamentations of Jeremiah were read, year by year, with fastings and weepings, to commemorate the misery out of which the people had been delivered. It has come to be connected with the thoughts of a later devastation, and its words enter, sometimes at least, into the prayers of the pilgrim Jews who meet at the "place of wailing" to mourn over the departed glory of their city. It enters largely into the nobly-constructed order of the Latin Church for the service of Pasion week (Breviarium Rom. Feria Quinta, "In Cœna Domini"). If it has been comparatively in the background in times when the study of Scripture had passed into casuistry and speculation, it has come forward, once and again, in times of danger and suffering, as a messenger of peace, comforting men, not after the fashion of the friends of

\[\text{Lamentations} 1587\]

It obviously indicates either a deliberate abandonment of the alphabetic structure, or the unfinished character of the concluding elegy. The title prefixed in the Vulgate, "Oratio Jeremia Prophetæ," points to one fixed characteristic which must have occasioned this difference. There are signs also of a later date than that of the preceding poems. Though the horrors of the famine are ineffaceable, yet that which he has before him is rather the continued protracted suffering of the rule of the Chaldeans. The mountain of Zion is desolate, and the foxes walk on it (18). Slaves have ruled over the people of Jehovah (9). LAMENTATIONS

Job, with formal moralizings, but by enabling them to express themselves, leading them to feel that they might give utterance to the deepest and saddest feelings by which they were overwhelmed. It is striking, as we cast our eye over the list of writers who have treated specially of the book, to notice how many must have passed through scenes of trial not unlike in kind to that of which the Lamentations speak. The book remains to do its work for any future generation that may be exposed to analogous calamities.

A few facts connected with the external history of the book remain to be stated. The position which it has occupied in the canon of the O. T. has varied from time to time. In the received Hebrew arrangement it is placed among the Kethubim or Hagiographa, between Ruth and Kolheleth (Ecclesiastes). In that adopted for synagogue use, and reproduced in some editions, as in the Bonnberg Bible of 1521, it stands among the five Megillah after the Books of Moses. The LXX. group the writings connected with the name of Jeremiah together, but the Book of Baruch comes between the prophecy and the Lamentations. On the hypothesis of some writers that Jer. 3i. was originally the introduction to the poem, and not the conclusion of the prophecy, and that the preface of the LXX. (which is not found either in the Hebrew, or in the Targum of Jonathan) was inserted to diminish the abruptness occasioned by this separation of the book from that with which it had been originally connected, it would follow that the arrangement of the Vulg. and the A. V. corresponds more closely than any other to that which we must look on as the original one.

* Lamentations. To find a reference to Lamentations in 2 Chr. xxxv. 22: "And Jeremiah lamented for Josiah, and all the singing men and the singing women spake of Josiah in their lamentations to this day," and made them an ordinance in Israel: and behold, they are written in the Lamentations." Jerem. (Comm. ad Sacch. xii. 11) went so far as to maintain that the death of Josiah forms the proper subject of the entire book. See also Jos. Ant. x. 5, § 1. But the contents of Lamentations utterly forbid this supposition. It is evident from the above passage that a collection of elegies on the death of this king existed at the time when Chronicles was written; and among them it no doubt contained some composed by Jeremiah. But it is impossible to identify them with any part of our present Lamentations. They belonged in all probability to such books as Jeremiah, which like various others associated in Chronicles, were not received into the Jewish Canon, and have perished. See Bxek, Einl. in das A. Test. p. 504.

Some critics, as already stated, assign a low rank to the poetry of this book in comparison with other Hebrew poetry. It has been decried as artificial, verbroneith, without vigor of imagination or style. Against this view we may oppose the authority of so eminent a critic and sebhar as the late Dean Macray. "Never," he says (History of the Jews, 1. 446), "was coined city lamented in language so exquisitely pathetic. Jerusalem is, as it were, personified, and bewailed with the passionate sorrow of private and domestic attachment; while the more general pictures of the famine, common misery of every rank and age and sex, all the désholation, the carnage, the violation, the dragging away into captivity, the remembrance of former glories of the gorgeous ceremonies, and of the gulf festivals, the awful sense of the Divine wrath, heightening the scenes of calamities, are successively drawn with all the life and reality of an eye-witness." In illustration of this statement he presents in English several extracts from these elegies, which as an expression of the thoughts and spirit of the original are remarkably faithful. We cannot forbear citing here one of these translations for the gratification of the reader. It is taken from the last chapter (v. 1 ff.):

"Remember, Lord, what hath beset thee;
Look down on our reproach:
Our heritage is given to strangers,
Our home to foreigners.
Our water have we drunk for money,
Our fuel hath its price.
We stretch our hands to Egypt,
To Assyria for our bread,
At our life's risk we gain our food,
From the sword of desert robbers.
Our skins are like an oven, parched
By the fierce heat of famine.
Matrons in Zion have they ravished,
Virgins in Judah's cities.

Princes were hung up by the hand,
And age had no respect.
Young men are grinning at the mill,
Boys faint with thirsts loads of wood.
The elders from the gate have ceased,
The young men from their music.

The crown is fallen from our head,
Woe! woe! that we have sinned,
'Tis therefore that our hearts are faint,
Therefore our eyes are dim,
For Zion's mountain desolate;
The foxes walk on it."

That part of the golden candlestick belonging to the Tabernacle which bore the light: also of each of the ten candlesticks placed by Solomon in the Temple before the Holy of Holies (Ex. xxxv. 37; 1 K. vii. 49; 2 Chr. iv. 20, xiii. 11; Zech. iv. 2). The lamps were lighted every evening, and cleansed every morning (Ex. xxx. 7; 8; Reldan, Ant. Hebr. i. 9, and viii.). The primary sense of light (Gen. xv. 17) gives rise to frequent metaphorical usages, indicating life, welfare, guidance, as e. g. 2 Sam. xxii. 17; Ps. cxiv. 10; Prov. vi. 23; xiii. 14; xxiv. 9.

2. A torch or flambeau, such as was carried by the soldiers of Gideon (Judg. vii. 16, 20; comp. xxiv. 4). See vol. i. p. 699, note.

Herodotus, speaking of Egyptian lamps used at a festival, describes them as vessels filled with salt and olive oil with floating wicks, but does not mention the material of the vessels (Herod. ii. 62; Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. Abridg. i. 298, ii. 71).

The use of lamps fed with oil at marriage processions is alluded to in the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. xxv. 1).

Egyptian lamp.

Modern Egyptian lamps consist of small glass vessels with a tube at the bottom containing a cotton-wick twisted round a piece of straw. Some water is poured in first, and then oil. [The engraving also illustrates the conical wooden receptacle, which serves to protect the flame from the wind.]

For night-travelling, a lantern composition of waxed cloth strained over a sort of cylinder of wire-rings, and a top and bottom of perforated copper. This would, in form at least, answer to the lamps within pitchers of Gideon. [It may also, possibly, correspond with the lamps referred to in the parable of the ten virgins.] On occasions of marriage the street or quarter where the bridegroom lives is illuminated with lamps suspended from cords drawn across. Sometimes the bridegroom is accompanied to a mosque by men bearing flambeaux, consisting of frames of iron fixed on staves, and filled with burning wood; and on his return, by others bearing flambeaux with many lamps suspended from them (Lane, Moll. Eg. i. 202, 213, 224, 225, 230; Mrs. Poole, English. in Eg. iii. 131). [H. W. P.

LANCET. This word is found in 1 K. xvii. 38 only. The Hebrew term is Rahmāk, which is elsewhere rendered, and appears to mean a javelin, or light spear. [See Arms, vol. i. 160 et.] In the original edition of the A. V. (1611) this meaning is preserved, the word being "lancers."

* LAND-MARK. [F.E.L.E.]

* LANES. The Greek word (πᾶγα) so rendered occurs in Luke xiv. 21, Matt. vi. 12, and Acts iv. 11, and xii. 10. It originally meant "a rushing," and then a "line of direction," or "current," and occasionally in later Greek and the N. T., a place where the current of people flows along i. e. a "street." It denoted especially a "narrow street" (see Labeck, mt Phryn. p. 494), where, as in Luke xiv. 21, the poorer class of people would be found. [R. D. C. H.

LANGUAGE. [TONGUES, CONFUSION OP.]
LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

The subject of this article is not the language used by the writers of the New Testament (see New Testament, IV.), but the language of its speakers, the actual language of the discourses and conversations which stand reported in the Greek of the New Testament.

On the question, What was the prevailing language of Palestine in the time of our Saviour? there has been great difference of opinion and much controversy. Some have insisted that the mass of the people spoke Aramaic only; others that they spoke Greek only; and yet others that they were acquainted with both languages, and could use this or that at pleasure. To understand the merits of the case, the simplest way will be to take up each of the two languages in question, and trace the indications of its use among the Palestine Jews of the first century.

We begin then with ARAMAIC (the Jewish-Aramaic or Chaldean, in distinction from the Christian-Aramaic or Syriac, dialect). It is not unlikely that the long intercourse, friendly and hostile, between the Kingdom of Israel and its Aramaean neighbors on the north, especially the Syrians of Damascus, may have produced some effect on the language of the northern Israelites. But the effect must have been seen to become more evident when the Kingdom of Israel was overthrown by the Assyrians, the higher classes carried into other lands, and their places filled by importations from tribes of Aramaic speech. In the siege of Jerusalem by the Assyrians, a few years later, it appears from the prophecies of the Jewish chieftains to Rabshakeh (2 K. xxiv. 26) that the Aramaic language was understood by the leading men of the city, though not much accessible to the people at large. The curse of evildoers during the next century must have added to the influence of the Aramaic in southern Palestine, until at length the conquest by Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonian Captivity gave it a decided preponderance. Surrounded for two generations by speakers of Aramaic, the Judean exiles could not fail to acquire that language. It may be presumed that many, perhaps most of them, still retained the use of Hebrew in their intercourse with one another; but some, doubtless, forgot it altogether. After the return to their own land, the Aramaic was still required for communication with many brethren out of Palestine or in it, and with the officers or agents of the Persian government, which seems to have made this the official language for the provinces between the Tigris and the Mediterranean (comp. Ezra iv. 7, 8). The progress of the change which made the Hebrew a dead language, and put the Aramaic in its place as a living one, cannot be distinctly traced for want of literary monuments. But the result is certain: it was complete at the Christian era, and may have been so two or three centuries earlier. It is true that the New Testament in several passages speaks of the Hebrew as still in use; but in some of these (John v. 23; Mark iv. 17) it is evident from the form of a word described as Hebrew (αραμαινέον, αραμαίον, Γαλατικικά, Γαλατικόν), that the Aramaic is meant, the current language of the Hebrew people. In many other cases, where words of the popular idiom are given in the N. T., but without being called Hebrew, they can only be explained from the Aramaic; thus Matt. v. 22, ραδίαν; vi. 21 (Luke xi. 9, 19), μαμαίνω; xvi. 17, βοηθάω; Mark x. 24; Luke xvi. 20, ἀλλάζω; John i. 43, Χριστί: Acts i. 25, Ἀκρωτηρία: I Cor. xvi. 22, μαμαίνω αὕτη: — to which the words ῥαδίμων, ῥαδίδων, μαμάσας, τάξα, and proper names beginning with Bar- (son). By Josephus too, the name Hebrew is often used to denote the popular Aramaic; thus ἀδερμα "red" (Ant. i. 1, § 1), καταστήμα "priests" (iii. 7, § 1), Ἀραμάη "Pentecost" (iii. 10, § 6), ἐμπέρ "priest's girdle" (iii. 7, § 2), all of which he designates as Hebrew, are used in the native tongue (καταστήμα). That this Jewish-Aramaic was not confined to a fraction of the people, but was in general and familiar use among the Jews of Palestine in the first century, is proved by a variety of evidence outside of the N. T. as well as in it. Josephus speaks of it repeatedly (B. J. pr. 1, § 6, § 3, v. 9, § 2) as ἡ παρασιν γλώσσα, the tongue of the fathers and fatherland, or, as we should say, the mother-tongue, the native vernacular idiom. As such he contrasts it with the Greek, which he describes (Ant. pr. 2 § 2) as ἀλλοδαπήν ἦν τοῦ καὶ ἐντονίσμου συμβολούμενον, "a mode of expression, alien to us and belonging to a foreign language." From Josephus we learn (B. J. v. 6, § 3) that in the siege of Jerusalem, when the watchman on the towers saw a heavy stone launched from the ramparts of Gath-rimmon, he cried in the common tongue of the city, "the missile is coming!" he would, of course, give warning in the language best understood by the citizens at large. Josephus himself, when sent by Titus to communicate with the Jews and persuade them to surrender, addressed the multitude in Hebrew (B. J. v. 9, § 2), which he would not have done, if the language had not been generally intelligible and acceptable. For further proof we might appeal to the Targums or Chaldee paraphrases of parts of the Old Testament, of which the oldest, that of the Pentateuch by Onkelos, was probably written not far from the time of Christ: but it is possible that these Targums may have been composed, not for the Jews of Palestine, but for those of Babylonia and the adjacent countries; as Josephus states (B. J. pr. 1 § 1) that the first edition of his own History was composed by the Chaldeans or Chaldaic scribes of the interior (ταῖς ἀλλοσυρινσικαίς). Of more weight as proof of a vernacular Aramaic in Palestine is the early existence of a Hebrew gospel (i.e. an Aramaic, or, as Jerome calls it, Syro-Chaldee gospel, "Chaldaico Syroque sermonem conscriptum"), commonly ascribed to the Apostle Matthew, Papæs, bishop of Hierapoli, who flourished in the first half of the second century, speaks of such a book, and holds it for the composition of the Apostle. He may have been mistaken as to the authorship; but as to the existence of an Aramaic gospel at a very early period, there is no sufficient ground to discard his testimony. It appears then that there was a body of people in Palestine during the first century to whom it seemed desirable to have the gospel in their Aramaic vernacular, as well as intelligible, but as recommended also by patriarchic or sectarian feeling.

Turning to the New Testament, we find it stated (Acts i. 19) that when the catastrophe of Judas became known to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the place where it occurred was called "Akrabatam, field of blood," a name clearly Aramaic, and that it was called thus in εἰς ἄλλα ἀραμαι-

This does not imply that the Aramaic belonged to the inhabitants of Jerusalem exclusively, so as to be spoken by no other population; nor that it belonged to them as their only language, so that no other tongue was spoken in the city; but that it belonged to them more properly than any other tongue which might be spoken there, which could only be true of the native vernacular, ἡ πατρίως γλώσσα. A strong light is thrown on this whole subject by the account of Paul’s address to the people of the city (Acts xxvii. 27 ff.). The Apostle, having been rescued by the love of a mob which sought to kill him, was about to be taken to the castle; but was allowed at his own request to address the multitude. “And when there was made a great silence, he spake unto them in the Hebrew tongue.” “And when they heard that he spake in the Hebrew tongue to them, they kept the more silence.” (Acts xxi. 40, xxii. 2.) It is plain that he took them by surprise. If they did not know him for a native of the Greek city Tarsus, they had heard him charged with bringing Greeks into the Temple; and they expected him to use the Greek. When they found him speaking Aramaic, they showed by their greater attentiveness that they were not only surprised but gratified; not that a Greek address would have been unintelligible, and perhaps not on an account of any prejudice against the language, but more on account of an idiom which was peculiarly their own, evinced his respect for their nationality, his sympathy with their feelings, and, as it were, made himself one of their number.

Of our Lord himself it is expressly stated that on three occasions he made use of the Aramaic: when with the words ταῦτα καὶ ἔντυσεν he raised the daughter of Jairus (Mark v. 41); when with ἔφθασι δέχασθαι he opened the ears of the deaf man (Mark vii. 34); and when upon the cross, paraphrasing the first words of Ps. xxii., he cried, ἐλαοι, ἐλατε, λαμά σαβαχθανεὶς (Mark xxvii. 34: in Matt. xxvii. 46, ἡλί, ἡλι, λαμα σαβαχθανεις!). It is hardly supposable that among all his utterances recorded in the Gospels these three were the only ones for which he used the native idiom of the country. Yet it is not easy to say why out of a larger series these alone should have been given by the original author of the Gospels. In the last case it seems probable that the Aramaic words actually uttered by our Lord were given by the writer to explain how it was that some of the bystanders conceived him to be calling on Elias. As to the other two, it is not noteworthy that they appear in only one of the Evangelists. The miracle wrought with the word ἔφθασι is found in Mark alone: the miracle wrought with ταῦτα καὶ ἔντυσεν is found in Luke also, but the words ascribed to our Lord (viii. 54) are Greek, ἡ πατρίως εὐεργεῖα, — showing how unsafe it is in other cases to conclude that he spoke Greek because he is not said to have spoken Aramaic. It is not an unlikely supposition that in these two instances the narrative of Mark reflects the impressions of an individual, whose mind was peculiarly struck by the stupendous effect instantly produced, and similarly produced by, the utterance of one or two words, so that the very sound of the words became indelibly fixed in his memory. That the same subjective impression was not made in other cases of the same kind, or that being made it did not find its way with uniformity into the narrative, are both easily conceivable. There is, however, yet another instance in which our Lord is expressly stated to have spoken Hebrew (Aramaic): in his appearance to Paul when journeying to Damascus. Of this event there are three narratives (Acts ix., xxii., xxvi.); and here again it is worth noticing that among the parallel accounts only one (xxvi. 14) alludes to the fact that the language used was Hebrew. An able writer, who holds that Christ seldom spoke Hebrew, suggests that he used it on this occasion to keep his words from being understood by Paul’s companions. But if these companions failed to hear or to understand the voice (Acts ix. 7, xxii. 9), it is not safe in an event of this nature to infer their ignorance of the language. And it is quite supposable that the use of Hebrew here belonged to the verisimilitude of the manifestation. Jesus appearing to this new apostle not only with the form in which he was known to the Twelve, but with the language in which he was accustomed to converse with them.

The influence of the Greek in Palestine began with the conquest by Alexander. The country fell under the power of Macedonian rulers, the Ptolemies of Egypt, and afterwards the Seleucids of Syria, with whom Greek was the language of court and government. It was used for the official correspondence of the state: for laws and proclamations; for petitions addressed to the sovereign, and charters, rights, or patents granted by him. The administration of justice was conducted in it, at least so far as the cases of the higher tribes were concerned. There was at the same time commercial intercourse between the countries under Macedonian rule came into the hands of men who either spoke Greek as their native tongue or adopted it as the means of easiest and widest communication. Parly for purposes of trade and partly as supports for Macedonian domination, colonial cities were planted in these regions, and settled by people who, if not all of Hellenic birth, had the Greek language and civilization and bore the name of Greeks. Such influences were common to the countries about the eastern Mediterranean; and their effect in all was to establish as the Greek the general language of public life, of law, of trade, of literature, and of communication between men of different lands and races. It did not in general supplant the native Aramaic, as the Latin afterwards supplanted those of Gaul and Spain; it subsisted along with it, contracting but not swallowing up the sphere of their use. Its position and influence may be compared with those possessed, though in a much inferior degree, by the French language in modern Europe. The sway of the Greek extended to lands never conquered by Alexander. To a language so capable, so highly cultivated, so widely diffused, so rich in literature and science, the Romans could not remain indifferent, especially when the regions where it prevailed became part of their empire. Long before the Christian era a knowledge of Greek was an indispensable element in the training of an educated Roman. In the reign of the emperor Tiberius, under whom our Lord suffered, we are told (Val. Max. ii. 2, 3) that speeches in the Roman Senate were often made in Greek. The emperor himself, acting as judge, frequently heard pleaders address him in it (Flut. Cass. Ed. 15.). Of the emperor Claudius, a few years later, it is said (Sueton. Claud. 42.) that he gave audience to Greek ambassadors speaking in their own tongue and made replies in the same language.

The people of Palestine were subjected to Hellenizing influences of a special character. Their Seleucid rulers, not content with the natural operation of circumstances, made strenuous efforts to The great national reaction under the Macedoains, provoked by these efforts, was of no long duration. The Romans became masters of the country; and must have given new force to the Greek influences to which they had themselves yielded. It cannot be doubted that the Roman administration of state and justice in Palestine was conducted in the Greek, not the Latin, language. The first Herod, who reigned for many years under Roman supremacy, was manifestly partial to the Greeks. Caesarea, which he founded, and made, after Jerusalem, the greatest city in the land, was chiefly occupied by Greek inhabitants. Of many other cities in or near the Holy Land, we learn, mostly from incidental notices, that the population was wholly or partly Greek.

Thus Gaza, Ascalon, Joppa, Ptolemais, Decapolis, as well as Caesarea, on the western sea-coast; Tiberias and Sebaste in the interior; and on the east and northeast, Hippos, Gadara, Sechthopolis (or Bethshan), Pella, Gerasa, Philadelphia, and perhaps the remaining cities of the Decapolis. It is obvious that the Jews must have been powerfully affected by so many Greek communities established near them and connected with them by manifold political relations, and especially the Jews of Galilee, who, in those days, they were and pressed upon by such communities.

While many Greeks were becoming settled in Palestine, Jews in yet larger numbers were leaving it to establish themselves in all the important places of the Grecian world. Without losing their nationality and religion, they gave up their Aramaic mother-tongue for the general language of the people around them. Had the Jews of Egypt retained the native idiom, the first translation of the Scriptures would probably have been made in Aramaic, and not in Greek. Even Philo of Alexandria, an older contemporary of our Lord, gives no evidence in his voluminous and learned writings of an acquaintance with either Hebrew or Aramaic.

But these Jews of the dispersion frequently returned to their fatherland; they gathered in crowds to the great national festivals; and in personal communion with their Palestinian kinsmen, did much to extend the use of their adopted language. In many cases they continued to reside in Palestine. Thus we hear (Acts vi. 9) of one or more synagogues of Libertines (Greek freedmen from Italy), Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Circians, and peoples from western Asia Minor. That many would content themselves with their familiar Greek, as being sufficient for the ordinary purposes of communication, without taking the trouble to learn Aramaic, is a fact which can hardly be doubted. It is generally believed that the Hellenists, mentioned in Acts ix. 29 and (as converts to Christianity) in Acts vi. 1, were persons of this sort, — separated from these around them not by speaking Greek for most others could do so, but by speaking only Greek. The satisfaction which Paul gave by his use of Aramaic (Acts xiii. 2), makes it easy to understand how such persons, who being settled in Palestine disdained to acquire the native idiom, might be looked upon with coldness or disfavor as a class by themselves, especially if they showed, as may often have been the case, a weakened attachment to other features of the national life. [Hellenists.]

The Greek version of the LXX. did much to make the Greek known and familiar to the Jews of Palestine. The original Hebrew was an object of scholastic study; a learned acquaintance with it was highly valued in popular estimation (Jos. Ant. xx. 11, § 2); and the number of scribes, lawyers, etc., who possessed such knowledge was probably not inconsiderable; but to the mass of the people the Hebrew Scriptures were a sealed book. Nor was there, so far as we know, prior to the Christian era, any Aramaic version. To the common man — the man of common education — if he had any knowledge of Greek, the most natural and easy way to gain a knowledge of the Scriptures was by reading the Greek translation. That such use was made of it by great numbers of the people cannot well be doubted. Of the quotations from the Old Testament made by the writers of the New, the greater part are in the words of the LXX. Comparatively few give any clear evidence that the writer had in mind the Hebrew original. This familiarity with the Greek version makes it probable that it was used not only for private reading, but in the public services of the synagogue. In many places there may have been no one sufficiently acquainted with the ancient Hebrew to read and translate it for the congregation; but in every community, we may presume, there were persons who could both read the Greek and add whatever paraphrase or explanation may have been needed in Aramaic. It is apparent that the Synagogue, that school of learning who had studied the Hebrew were familiar with the version of the LXX.; in his Antiquities Josephus makes more use of the latter than of the former. To the influence of the LXX. must be added that of a considerable Jewish-Greek literature, composed mainly in the last two centuries before Christ, the so-called Apocrypha of the Old Testament. It is use to show that in general use (except perhaps in countries east of the Syrian desert) the Hebrew (or Aramaic) original was early superseded by the Greek version. A case nearly parallel is seen in Josephus' History of the Jewish War. It was composed (according to the statement of the preface) in the native tongue for the barbarians of the interior, i.e. beyond the Syrian desert, the limit of the Roman power. But for those under the Roman government he translated it into Greek (κατα την Ῥωμαϊκην γλωσσαν την Ἑλληνικην γλωσσαν μεταφρασα). And this translation has so thoroughly superseded the original work that, but for the statement of its author, we should not have known, or perhaps even suspected, its existence.

That Greek was generally understood by the people of Jerusalem, is evident from the circumstances of Paul's address in Acts xxii. The multitude, who listened with hushed attention when he spoke to them in Aramaic, were already attentive while expecting to hear him in Greek. It does not follow that all understood him in the former language, or that all would have understood him in the latter. To gain attention, it would be enough that a large majority could understand the language of the speaker; those who could not, might still get some notion of the speech, its drift and substance, by occasional renderings of their fellow.
The Greek New Testament is itself the strongest proof of the extent to which its language had become naturalized among the Jews of Palestine. Most of its writers, though not belonging to the lowest class, to the very poor or the quite uneducated, were men in humble life, in whom one could hardly expect to find any learning or accomplishment beyond what was common to the great body of their countrymen. We are not speaking of Saul or Luke or the unknown writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews; but of Peter, Jude, James, John, and Matthew, if (as is most probable) we have his Gospel in its original language. Yet we find them not only writing in a language which they knew, but writing it as if they had translated their thoughts when they expressed them in Greek. But similar idiom occurs in the compositions of Paul, who, as the native of a Greek city must have been all his life familiar with the Greek language. When Greek began to be spoken by Hebrews, learning it in adult years, they had to go through a process of mental translation: and the natural result was the formation of a Hebraistic dialect, largely intermixed with Semitic idioms, which they handed down to their descendants. The latter, as they did not cease to speak an Aramaic idiom, were little likely to correct the Aramaic peculiarities in the Greek received from their fathers. Josephus speaks with emphasis of the difficulty which even a well-educated Jew found in writing Greek with idiomatic accuracy. The Greek style of a Jew, especially when writing on religious subjects, was naturally affected by his familiarity with the LXX., which copied from the original many Hebrew forms of expression, and kept them alive in the memory and use of the people.

In view of these proofs, the conclusion seems unavoidable that, as a general fact, the Palestine Jews of the first century were acquainted with both languages, Greek and Aramaic. It is probable, indeed, that already stated, that some who were not acquainted with the Aramaic; and it is by no means improbable, though the proof is less distinct, that some were not acquainted with the Greek. Of both these classes the absolute number may have been considerable. But apparently they were the exceptions, the majority of the people having a knowledge more or less extended of both languages. Other instances of bilingual communities, of populations for the most part able to express themselves in two different tongues, are by no means wanting. One of the most striking at the present day is to be found in a people of Aramean origin with a firmly held Aramean vernacular, the Nestorian Syrians or Chaldees Christians. "In Persia most of the Nestorians are able to speak fluently the rude Tatar (Turkish) dialect used by the Mohammedans of this province, and those of the mountains are equally fluent in the language of the country. Still they have a strong preference for their own tongue, and make it the constant and only medium of intercourse with each other." (Stoddard, Preface to Modern Syriac Grammar in Journal of Amer. Oriental Soc. vol. iv.)

It is a common opinion that by the pentecostal gift of tongues (Acts ii.) the Apostles were miraculously endowed with a knowledge of many languages and the power of using them at pleasure. But from this it seems not to be inferred that there was a necessity to have been a kind of inspiration under which the speaker gave utterance to a succession of sounds, without himself willing, or perhaps even understanding, the sounds which he uttered. It does not appear from the subsequent history that the Apostles in their teaching made use of any other languages than Greek and Aramaic. It is not necessary to suppose that Paul spoke Latin at Rome, or Mithra in Syria, or Aram in Lystra (Acts xiv.). In the transactions at Lystra it is pretty clearly implied that Paul and Barnabas did not understand the speech of Lyceanpnia, and therefore failed to perceive and oppose the idolatrous intentions of the people until they had broken out into open act. In choosing between the two languages which they undoubtedly possessed, the Apostles were of course guided by the circumstances. Outside the Holy Land, they would naturally use Greek, if not always, make use of the Greek. In Syria, indeed, a considerable part of the people — the same for which the Peshitto version was made in the next century — would probably have understood an address in the Aramaic of Palestine; but in Antioch, the capital, where the disciples were first called Christians, Greek must have been the prevalent language. Even in Palestine, Paul's addresses to the Roman governors Felix and Festus would naturally be made in Greek. This is not so clear of the address to Agrippa, who had enjoyed a Jewish education. In the meeting of apostles and elders at Jerusalem (Acts xv.), occasioned by events in Antioch and attended by delegates from that city, the proceedings were probably in Greek, as also the circular letter which announced its result to the brethren who are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia. When Peter on the day of Pentecost addressed the multitude of Jews gathered from many different countries, he would naturally use the language which was most widely understood. It is true that the "Parthians and Medes and Elamites — and Arabians," if no others, would have been most accessible to an Aramaic address: so we judge from the fact that Josephus, writing for readers in these very lands, composed his history in the native tongue. Still, when we consider the "dwellers in Capadocia, in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome," it is probable that more would have understood Greek than Aramaic; so that if there was only one address in one language (which perhaps the terms of the narrative do not require us to suppose), it was probably made in Greek.

The difficulty of determining the language used for each particular discourse is even greater in the Gospels than in the Acts. It seems reasonable to suppose that conversations between kindred and friends, and the familiar utterances of Christ to his disciples, were in Aramaic; the native idiom of the country, if not wholly given up, would naturally be employed for occasions like these. Yet as long as speakers and hearers had another language at command, they seem frequently, in the absence of express statements, a possibility that this, and not Aramaic, may have been used for any given conversation. And if, on the other hand, it seems reasonable to suppose that our Lord in his more public discourses spoke Greek, there is a similar difficulty about being sure in particular cases that he did not use the other language which was familiar to him and to the mass of his hearers. A recent writer assumes that every discourse which, as reported to us, contains quotations from the O. T. in the words of the LXX., must have been pronounced in Greek; and this criterion, were it trustworthy, would decide many cases. But if an Aramaic speech containing Scripture quotations were to be reported in Greek by a writer familiar with the LXX., who seldom (if ever) read the Scriptures in any other form, is it not probable that he would give the quotations for the most part according to the LXX.? Sometimes, it is likely, he would depart from it, because he did not correctly remember its phraseology; and sometimes, because he remembered that the Aramaic speaker gave the passage a sense varying from that given by the LXX. As the writers of the Gospels were probably in this condition — of persons familiar with the LXX., who seldom (if ever) read the Scriptures in any other form — it is unsafe from the way in which they give the Scripture quotations to infer anything as to the language used by the speakers who quoted them. There are instances, however, in which the circumstances of the case afford some indications on this point. Thus in the case of the people who were in the house with which Josephus calls a Greek city, our Lord would use the Greek language. Among the crowds who followed him before the Sermon on the Mount and who seem to have stood about the mountain while he was speaking, were some from Decapolis (Matt. iv. 25). As already stated, the ten cities of that region were most, if not all, of them Greek. As our Lord had thus in the surrounding multitude of his auditors some who probably were unaccustomed with Aramaic, there is plausible ground for believing that on this important occasion he made use of the Greek language. In the closing scenes of his life, when he was brought before the Roman governor for judgment and execution, it is nearly certain that Greek was used by Pilate himself and by the various speakers about his tribunal. It is stated in the Mishnah (Sanh. 10:4), that when the war of Titus broke out, an order was issued in which fathers were forbidden to have their sons instructed in Greek. Whether this is true or not, it would be only natural that the excited patriotism of such a time should cause the Jews to set a higher value on their national tongue. Perhaps those who spoke Greek and Aramaic were now inclined as far as possible to discard the use of Greek: the opposite, which seem to have made their first appearance or to have assumed a permanent shape about this time, would be a help in doing so. At all events there is reason for believing that after this period there was a considerable population in Palestine who did not understand Greek.

The general opinion of the Fathers (from Clement of Alexandria down) that the Epistle to the Hebrews was composed in Aramaic, had probably no other foundation than the belief that it would otherwise have been unintelligible to the Jews of Palestine for whom it was designed. This belief is of little weight as regards the original language of the Epistle, but as regards the prevailing language of Palestine in later times it may not be without value. Eusebius of Cesarea, a native and lifelong resident of Palestine, declares (Hist. Eccl. iv. 3.2, 3) that the Apostles before the death of their Master understood no language but that of the Syrians; this he would hardly have done if Greek had been generally spoken by the tillers of the soil.

The discussion as to the Language of Palestine in our Saviour's time has been quite generally connected with the question whether Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew or in Greek. Most defenders of the Hebrew original (as Du Pin, Mill, Michaels, Marsh, Weber, Kuinoel, etc.) have maintained that this was the only language then understood by the body of the people. A number of Aramaic passages from the Greek original (as Cappell, Basset, Masch, Lardner, Walms, etc.) have made a like claim for the Greek. For a full list of the older writers, see Kuinoel in Fabriiins, Bibl. Gravor ed. Harles. iv. 769. We add the names of some writers who have treated the subject more at large. Isaac Vossius (De Oraculis Septignant. Oxon. 1693), though a staunch believer in the Hebrew original, held that Greek was almost universal in the towns of Palestine, and that the Syriac was spoken in the country and in villages had become so corrupted as to be a kind of mongrel Greek. He found an opponent in Simon (Hist. Crit. du Texte du N. T., Rotterdam, 1689), who allowed that Greek was the common language (lingua vulgare) of the country, but contended that the Jews, beside the Greek, had preserved the Aramee which they brought with them from Babylon, and which they called the national language. Diodati of Naples (De Christo Greco Inclyt. 1767: reprinted London, 1843) went further than Vossius, asserting that Greek in the days of our Lord had entirely supplanted the old Palestinian dialect. Replies to this work were put forth by Ernesti (in Novum Thol. Bibl., 1771) and De Rossi (Delle Langue popol. di Ghristo. Parima. 1772). De Rossi's work was adopted by Pinachiue as the basis of his essay on the Aramaean language in Palestine (in Eichhorn's Allegria. Bibl. 1797), translated by E. Robinson in Am. Bibl. Repert. (1831) with an introduction on the literature of the subject. Another translation (by T. G. Repp) is given in Clark's Biblical Cabinet, vol. ii. Against Pinachiue, who represented the Aramaean language as the language of the Nazarenes (Hist. in d. N. T., 4th ed., 1847; 3d ed. trans. by Fossick. Ansever, 1836) maintained the concurrent use of Greek. His position — which is nearly the same with that of Simon — is held substantially by most later writers, as Corder (Hist. in d. N. T., Halle, 1836) and Bleek (Hist. in d. N. T., Berlin, 1862). A somewhat more advanced position is taken by Dr. Alex. Roberts (Discourses on the Gospels, 2d ed., London, 1863), who, while admitting that both languages were in general use, contends that our Lord spoke for the most part in Greek, and only now and then in Hebrew (Aramaic).

LAODICEA (Λαόδικη; [Laodie])

The two passuses in the N. T. where this city is mentioned, define its geographical position in harmony with other authorities. In Rev. i. 11, iii. 11, it is spoken of as belonging to the general district which contained Ephesus, Smyrna, Thyatira, Pergamus, Sardis, and Philadelphia. In Col. iv. 16, 15, it appears in still closer association with Colossae and Hierapolis. And this was exactly its position.
was a town of some consequence in the Roman province of Asia; and it was situated in the valley of the Maeander, on a small river called the Lycaus, with Colossae and Hierapolis a few miles distant to the west.

Built, or rather rebuilt, by one of the Seleucid monarchs, and named in honor of his wife, Laodicea became under the Roman government a place of some importance. Its trade was considerable; it lay on the line of a great road; and it was the seat of a council. From Rev. iii. 17 we should gather it was a place of great wealth. The damage which was caused by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. xiv. 27) was promptly repaired by the mercy of the inhabitants. It was soon after this occurrence that Christianity was introduced into Laodicea, not however, as it would seem, through the direct agency of St. Paul. We have good reason for believing that when, in writing from Rome to the Christians of Colosse, he sent a greeting to those of Laodicea, he had not personally visited either place. But the preaching of the Gospel at Ephesus (Acts xviii. 19-xxix. 41) must inevitably have resulted in the formation of churches in the neighboring cities, especially where Jews were settled; and there were Jews in Laodicea (Joseph. Ant. xii. 3, § 4; xiv. 10, § 20). In subsequent times it became a Christian city of eminence, the see of a bishop, and a meeting-place of councils. It is often mentioned by the Byzantine writers. The Mohammedan invaders destroyed it; and it is now a scene of utter desolation: but the extensive ruins near Domula justify all that we read of Laodicea in Greek and Roman writers. Many travellers (Pococke, Chandler, Leake, Arundell, Fellows) have visited and described the place, but the most elaborate and interesting account is that of Hamilton.

One Biblical subject of interest is connected with Laodicea.

From Col. iv. 16 it appears that St. Paul wrote a letter to this place (τῇ ἐκ Λαοδικείας) when he wrote the letter to Colosse. The question arises whether we can give any account of this Laodicene epistle. Wieseler's theory (Apost. Zeit- ander, p. 430) is that the Epistle to Philemon is meant; and the tradition in the Apostolic Constitutions that he was bishop of this see is adduced in confirmation. Another view, maintained by Paley and others, and suggested by a manuscript variation in Eph. i., is that the Epistle to the Ephesians is intended. [Ephesians.] Usher's view is, that this last epistle was a circular letter sent to Laodicea among other places (see Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii. 488, with Alford's Prolegomena, G. T. v. iii. 13-18). None of these opinions can be maintained with much confidence. It may however be said, without hesitation, that the apocryphal Epistola ad Laodicenses is a late and clumsy forgery. It exists only in Latin MSS., and is evidently a cento from the Galatians and Ephesians. A full account of it is given by Jones (On the Canon, ii. 31-42).

The subscription at the end of the First Epistle to Timothy (γραφαὶ ἀνὴρ Λαοδικείας, ἦν ἐστὶν ἀπεργότους ἄγγελος τῆς Παναγίας) is of no authority; but it is worth mentioning, as showing the importance of Laodicea.

J. S. H.

* The reasons for regarding Paul's letter to Philemon as the letter to the Laodicenses are very inconclusive. The letter to Philemon was of a private nature, and in the salutation (vv. 1, 2) restricts itself to a private circle, and could not therefore be a letter to the entire Laodicene church (comp. Col. i. 1 f.). Further as Onesimus certainly belonged to Colosse (Col. iv. 9), Philemon also must have belonged there, and the letter has been written to him at that place. Wieseler argues (Chronologie des Apost. Zeittatters, p. 454) that Philemon lived at Laodicea because Archippus
LAODICEANS

(Phil. ver. 2 and Col. iv. 17) lived there: and he argues that Archippus lived there because Paul sends a message to him just after speaking of the church in Laodicea. But Paul directs these same Colossians to whom he writes to deliver this message as by word of mouth to Archippus (ἐπιστολάργε), and hence Archippus must have been at Colossae as well as the Colossians. It may be said indeed that ἐπιστολάργε denotes an intermediate act like ἀποστασίας in ver. 13; that is, possible, we must admit, but altogether against the natural impression of the passage. The tradition that an Archippus was bishop at Laodicea (Apost. Cont., vii. 46) may or may not have some weight as an argument. It is an inadvertence in the article above that Wieseler is said to connect that tradition with Philostratus.

The best edition of this Latin Epistola ad Laodicenses is Anger’s, appended to his treatise Opera fori (Lap., 1843). He agrees with those who regard the Epistle to the Ephesians as encyclical, and hence the one from Laodicea (Col. iv. 16) to which Paul refers. Prof. Lightfoot (Epistle to the Philippian, p. 137 f.) maintains also this opinion. He has a valuable note there on this question of Apostolic epistles. Hutter’s Greek translation of this epistle will be found in Anger as above (p. 172), and in Fabricius, Col. Apocryph. N.T. I. 873 f. Dr. Elsie has given an English version of this Greek copy in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Colossians. 11.

LAODICEANS (Λαοδικεαὶ: Λαοδικεας), the inhabitants of Laodicea (Col. iv. 16; Rev. iii. 14).

LAPIDOTH (λάπιθος, t. c. Lappidoth: [Rom. Alex. Λαπίθα: Vat. Ald.] Λαπίθα: Λαπιθός), the husband of Deborah the prophetess (Judg. iv. 4 only). The word rendered “wife” in the expression “wife of Lappidoth,” has simply the force of “woman;” and thus λαπίθα (or “torches”) must be, as some understand it, descriptive of Deborah’s disposition, and even of her occlusions. (Deborah.) But there is no real ground for supposing it to mean anything but wife, or for doubting the existence of her husband. True, the termination of the name is feminine; but this is the case in other names undoubtedly borne by men, as Meremoth, Manahothi, etc. G.

LAPWING (λαππίθαθ, dukiopath : ἡ χοτάρα: ὕπαρ) occurs only in Lev. xi. 19, and in the parallel passage of Deut. xiv. 18, amongst the list of those birds which were forbidden by the law of Moses to be eaten by the Israelites. Commentators generally agree with the LXX. and Vulg. that the lapwing is the bird intended, and this interpretation the Arabic versions coincide; all these three versions give one word, hoopoe, the meaning of dukipath: but one cannot definitely say whether the syriac reading? The Targums of Jerusalem, Oekels, and Jonathan, and the Jewish doctors, indicate any particular bird or not, for they merely appear to resolve the Hebrew word into its component parts, dukipath being by them understood as the “mountain-cock,” or “woodland-cock.” This translation has, as may be supposed, produced considerable discussion as to the kind of bird represented by these terms — expressions which would, before the date of acknowledged scientific nomenclature, have a very wide meaning. According to Bocchard, these four different interpretations have been assigned to dukipath: 1. The Sadducees supposed the bird intended to be the common hen, which they therefore refused to eat. 2. Another interpretation understands the cock of the woods (Tetrox nyrogallus). 3. Other interpreters think the attacin is meant. 4. The last interpretation is that which gives the hoopoe as the rendering of the Hebrew word.

The Hoopoe (Upupa epops).

As to the value of 1. nothing can be urged in its favor except that the first part of the word dūk or dūd does in Arabic mean a cock. 2. With almost as little reason can the cock of the woods, or cyperecrist, be considered to have any claim to be the bird intended; for this bird is an inhabitant of the northern parts of Europe and Asia, and although it has been occasionally found, according to M. Tenuinick, as far south as the Ionian Islands, yet such occurrences are rare indeed, and we have no record of its ever having been seen in Syria or Egypt. The cyperecrist is therefore a bird not at all likely to come within the sphere of the observation of the Jews. 3. As to the third theory, it is certainly at least as much a question what is signified by attacin, as by dukipath: Many, and curious in some instances, are the derivations proposed for the Hebrew word, but the most probable one is that which was alluded to d. There can be no doubt that the hoopoe is the bird intended by dukipath; for the Copic κυκάβα, the Syriac kūkābān, which stand for the Upupa epops, are almost certainly allied to the Hebrew לנטו לנטו dukipath.

c. دیک دیک (Calyx, galus). By attacin is here of course meant the artaxis of the Greeks, and the attacin of the Romans, not that name as sometimes applied locally to the partridges, or white grouse.
above, namely, the mountain-cock. Achlythus speaks of the hoopoe by name, and expressly calls it the bird of the rocks (Frargon. 291, quoted by Arist. H. A. i. 49.) Eltan (N. A. iii. 26) says that these birds build their nests in lofty rocks. Aristotle's words are to the same effect, for he writes, "Now some animals are found in the mountains, as the hoopoe for instance." (H. A. i. 1.) When the two lawsuit-wearing citizens of Athens, Encelides and Pithothrus, in the comedy of the Birds of Aristophanes (20, 54), are on their search for the home of Epops, king of birds, their ornithological conductors lead them through a wild desert tract terminate by mountains and rocks, in which is situated the royal aviary of Epops.

It must, however, be remarked that the observations of the habits of the hoopoe recorded by modern zoologists do not appear to warrant the assertion that it is so preeminently a mountain-bird as has been implied above.a Marshy ground, ploughed land, wooded districts, such as are near to water, are more especially its favorite haunts: but perhaps more extended observation on its habits may hereafter confirm the accuracy of the statements of the ancients.

The hoopoe was accounted an unclean bird by the Mosaic law, nor is it now eaten b except occasionally in those countries where it is abundantly found — Egypt, France, Spain, etc., etc. Many and strange are the stories which are told of the hoopoe in ancient oriental fable, and some of these stories are by no means to its credit. It seems to have been always regarded, both by Arabsians and Greeks, with a superstitious reverence c — a circumstance which it owes no doubt partly to its crest (Aristoph. Birds, 94; comp. Ov. Met. vi. 672), which certainly gives it a most imposing appearance; partly to the length of its back, and partly also to its habits "If any one anointed himself with its blood, and then fell asleep, he would see demons subduing him" — "If its liver were eaten with rue, the eater's wits would be sharpened, and pleasing memories be excited" — are superstitions held respecting this bird. One more fable narrated of the hoopoe is given, because its origin can be traced to a peculiar habit of the bird. The Arabs say that the hoopoe is a betrayer of secrets: that it is able moreover to point out hidden wells and fountains under ground. Now the hoopoe, on settling upon the ground, has a strange and portentous-looking habit of bending the head downwards till the point of the beak touches the ground, raising and depressing its crest at the same time.d Hence with much probability arose the Arabic fable.

These stories, absurd as they are, are here mentioned because it was perhaps in a great measure owing not only to the crest but also to the superstitions feeling with which the hoopoe was regarded by the Egyptians and heathen generally, that it was forbidden as food to the Israelites, whose affections Jehovah wished to wean from the land of their bondage, to which, as we know, they fondly clung.

The word hoopoe is evidently onomatopoetic, being derived from the voice of the bird, which resembles the words "hoop, hoop," softly but rapidly uttered. The Germans call the bird Ein Hoop, the French La Hooppe, which is particularly appropriate, as it refers both to the crest and note of the bird. In Sweden it is known by the name of Hain-Fogel, the hoax-bird, because from its enigmatic cry, frequently heard in the wilds of the forest, while the bird itself moves off as any one approaches, the common people have supposed that seasons of scarcity and war are impending (Lloyd's Second Advent. ii. 321).

The hoopoe is an occasional visitor to this country, arriving for the most part in the autumn, but instances are on record of its having been seen in the spring. Col. Hamilton Smith has supposed that there are two Egyptian species of the genus Upupa, from the fact that some birds remain permanently resident about human habitations in Egypt, while others migrate: he says that the migratory species is eaten in Egypt, but that the stationary species is considered inedible (Kitto's Cyc. art. 'Loping). There is, however, but one species of Egyptian hoopoe known to ornithologists, namely, Upupa epops. Some of these birds migrate northwards from Egypt, but a large number remain all the year round: all, however, belong to the same species. The hoopoe is about the size of the missel-thrush (Turdus viscivorus). Its crest is very elegant, the long feathers forming it are each of them tipped with black. It belongs to the family Upupidae, sub-order Turdinae, and order Passeres.

* * * * *

I have eaten the hoopoe, and found it very palatable. As for filthy habits, it has no more of them than all birds that live in the neighborhood of human habitations, and make the dunghill one of their localities for seeking their food. In cleanliness of plumage, as in contrast of coloring, it resembles the barnyard cock. Other reasons than its filthiness must be assumed for the prohibition of the Mosaic law, if this be the bird intended.

LACÉA (Aegae: [Third cent.]). Four or five years ago it would have been impossible to give any information regarding this Cretan city, except indeed that it might be presumed (Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, ii. 394, 2d ed.) to be identical with the "Lisia" mentioned in the Peidinger Table as 16 miles to the east of Gortyna. This corresponds sufficiently with what is said in Acts xviii. 5 of its proximity to Fair Havens. The whole matter, however, has been recently cleared up. In the month of January, 1856, a yachting party made inquiries at Fair Havens, and were told that the name Lasa was still given to some ruins a few miles to the eastward. A short search sufficed to discover these ruins, and independent testimony a See Macgillivray's British Birds, vol iii. 43; Yarrell, Brit. B. ii. 178, 21 edit.; Lloyd's Scandinavian Adventures, ii. 321; Tristram in Brit. vol. i. The chief grounds for all the filthy habits which have been ascribed to this much-maligned bird are to be found in the fact that it resorts to dunghills, etc., in search of the worms and insects which it finds there.

b A writer in Brit. vol. i. p. 49, says, "We found the hoopoe a very good bird to eat."

c Such is the case even to this day. The Rev. H. B. Tristram, who visited Palestine in the spring of 1858, says of the hoopoe (Brit. i. 27): "The Arabs have a superstitious reverence for this bird, which they believe possess marvelous medicinal qualities, and call it 'the Doctor.' Its head is an indispensable ingredient in all charms, and in the practice of witchcraft."

d This habit of inspecting probably first suggested the Greek word krotis.

Captain Spratt, R. X., had previously observed some remains, which probably represent the harbor of Lassera (see pp. 34, 82, 245). And it might be noticed that in the Descrizione dell’ Isola di Candia, a Venetian MS. of the 16th century, as published by Mr. E. Falkener in the
G. H. T. C. S., Sept. 1852 (p. 287), a place called Lassera, with a “temple in ruins,” and “other vestiges near the harbor,” is mentioned as being close to Fair Havens. This also is undoubtedly St. Luke’s Lassera, and we see now needlessly it is (with Cramer, Ancient Greece, ii. 374, and the Edinburgh Review, No. iv. 176) to resort to Lachmann’s reading, “Alassa,” or to the “Tlalassa” of the Vulgate. LASTHENES (A&;u*;e;:, cf. A&;u*;&;v;:, Lasthenes), an officer who stood high in the favor of Demetrius II. Nicator. He is described as “consul” (*ergyniis, 1 Maxx. xii. 31) and “father” (1 Maxx. xi. 92; Jos. Ant. xiii. 5, § 9; of the king. Both words may be taken as titles of high nobility (comp. Grimm on 1 Maxx. x. 89; *Diod. xvii. 59; G. H. T. C. S. v. 4. 4) It appears from Josephus (Ant. xiii. 4, § 3) that he was a Cetan, to whom Demetrius was indebted for a large body of mercenaries (cf. 1 Maxx. x. 67), when he asserted his claim to the Syrian throne. The service which he thus rendered makes it likely (Vales. ad loc.) that he was the powerful favorite whose evil counsels afterwards issued in the ruin of his master (Diod. 23. xxix. p. 592). But there is not the slightest ground for identifying him with the nameless Caphip to whose charge Demetrius I. committed his sons (Ant. xxx. 2). [B. F. W.

LATCHET, the thong or fastening by which the stulal was attached to the foot. The English word is apparently derived from the Anglo-Saxon brac worm, to catch or fasten (Old Eng. to latch), as latchet from lacem or latch, whence latch. the fastening of a door, “lock,” and others. The Fr. boelet approaches most nearly in form to the present word. The Hebrew &;u;v;rv, erice, is derived from a root which signifies “to twist.” It occurs in the proverbal expression in Gen. v. 23, and is there used to denote something trivial or worthless. Gesenius (Thes. s. v. of) compares the Lat. filum = filmum, and quotes two Arabic proverbs from the Hums and the Kana, in which a corresponding word is similarly employed. In the poetical figure in Is. v. 27 the “latchet” occupies the same position with regard to the shoes as the girdle to the long flowing oriental dress, and was as essential to the comfort and expedition of the traveler. Another semi-proverbal expression in Luke iii. 16 points to the fact that the office of bearing and fastening the shoes of great personages fell to the meanest slaves. [SHOE.]

e. But though the Latin language is hardly recognized by name in the N. T., it is represented there by various Latin words under Greek forms. This is especially true of terms which designate Roman objects or ideas for which no suitable expression existed in Greek. They are found, as we should expect, chiefly in the Gospels and the Acts; for the narrative there brings us into contact with Roman life more than in the other books of the N. T. They are such as the following: kentrophs, kolauia, koustitia, kouristrs, karpot, legev, lentos, laverions, mi3os, manek6s, mados, sodwv, s6cimai, s6cma6ai, titlos, prwtwos, vupElv, med, c6stv, and others.

Latin terminations of adjectives occur instead of the proper Greek endings, as Ηρωφαιαος (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6) and Χρυσαυγας (Acts xi. 26), instead of forms like Ιταλως (Acts x. 1), Ναυ- ρας (Acts ii. 22). Latin proper names are numerous, borne not only by Romans, but Greeks and Jews.

The lexical effect of the Latin is very limited. The law-phrase, λαβίντε το ικανον, having taken bail or surety, Acts xvii. 9, probably stands for "satis acceperis." In Mark v. 23 ἐσχάων ἑχειν and in xv. 15 το θέλον το ικανον ποιήσεις corresponds to "populo satisfacere" and "in extremis sive." Similar phrases are συμβαθίνα λαβίν (Matt. xii. 14, &c.), σωματας ἐφαγοιαν (Luke xii. 38), ἤμε και παρατέμνομεν (Luke xiv. 18).

It will be found that the Latinisms are relatively more frequent in Mark than in the other Evangelists. Hence these who maintain that Mark wrote his Gospel at Rome and for Roman readers find in that peculiarity an indication of the origin and destination of his Gospel. The presence of this Latin element in the N. T. Greek is a proof of some value that our Christian books belong to the age to which we are accustomed to refer them.

* LATIN VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE. [VULGATE.]

LATITUDE. The rendering in A. V. of three Hebrew words.

1. לֹּסֶנֶּה, ὀστίνα, which occurs but twice, Judges xiv. 29, and Prov. vii. 6, and in the latter passage is translated "casedement" in one A. V. In both instances it stands in parallelism with "window." Gesenius, following Schultens, connects it with an Arab root, which signifies "to be cool," esp. of the day, and thus attaches to καπνὸς the signification of a "latticed window," through which the cool breezes enter the house, such as is seen in the illustrations to the article House (vol ii. p. 1103 f.). But Fuerst and Meier attach to the root the idea of twisting, twining, and in this case the word will be synonymous with the two following, which are rendered by the same English term, "lattice." In Judges xiv. 29 render καπνος by καπνος, which is explained by Jerome (vol Ex. xi. 16) to mean a small arrow-shaped aperture, narrow on the outside, but widening inwards, by which light is admitted. Others conjecture that it denoted a narrow window, like those in the castles of the Middle Ages, from which the archers could discharge their arrows in safety. It would then correspond with the "shot-window" of Chaucer ("Miller's Tale"), according to the interpretation which some give to that obscure phrase.

2. לָשָׁנָה, khe'recias (Cant. ii. 9), is apparently synonymous with the preceding, though a word of later date. The Targum gives it in the Chaldee form, as the equivalent of καπνος in Prov. vii. 6. Fuerst (Conc. s. v.) and Michaelis before him assign to the root the same notion of twisting or weaving, so that khe'recias denotes a network or jalousie before a window.

3. לָשָׁנָה, šebâchah, is simply "a network" placed before a window or balcony. Perhaps the network through which Ahaseph fell and received his mortal injury was on the parapet of his palace (2 K. i. 2). [House, vol ii. pp. 1105 f., 1106 a.] The root involves the same idea of weaving or twisting as in the case of the two preceding words. Šebâchah is used for "a net" in Job viii. 8, as well as for the network ornament on the capitals of the columns in the Temple. [Wine].

LATTE.

LAVER. 1. In the Tabernacle, a vessel of brass containing water for the priests to wash their hands and feet before offering sacrifice. It stood in the court between the altar and the door of the Tabernacle, and, according to Jewish tradition, a little to the south (Ex. xxx. 19, 21; Reland, Ant Hebr. p. i. ch. iv. 9; Clemens, de Labro Aeneis, iii. 9; ap. Ugolini, Thes. vol. xix.). It rested on a base, i.e. a foot, though by some explained to be a cover (Clemens, ibid. ch. iii. 5), of copper or brass, which, as well as the laver itself, was made from the mirrors of the women who assembled at the door of the Tabernacle-court (Ex. xxxvii. 8). The notion held by some Jewish writers, and reproduced by Franzius, Bühr (Synab. i. 484), and others, founded on the omission of the word "women," that the brazzen vessel, being polished, served as a mirror to the Levites, is untenable.

The form of the laver is not specified, but may be assumed to have been circular. Like the other vessels belonging to the Tabernacle, it was, together with בּוּשָׁה, γυαλαίων, is inserted; Gesenius on the prep with its foot, consecrated with oil (Lev. vii. 10, 11). No mention is found in the Hebrew text of the mode of transporting it, but in Num. iv. 14 a passage is added in the LXX., agreeing with the Samaritan Pent. and the Samaritan version, which prescribes the method of packing it, namely, in a purple cloth, protected by a skin covering. As no mention is made of any vessel for washing the flesh of the sacrificial victim, it is possible that the laver may have been used for this purpose also (Reland, Ant. Hebr. i. iv. 9).

2. In Solomon's Temple, besides the great molten sea, there were ten lavers a of brass, raised on bases b (1 K. vii. 27, 39), five on the N. and S. sides respectively of the court of the priests. Each laver contained 40 of the measures called 'bath' (γέβας, LXX. and Josephus). They were used for washing the animals to be offered in burnt-offerings (2 Chr. iv. 6; Joseph. Ant. viii. 3, § 6). The bases were multiform, Ahaz, and carried away as plunder, or at least what remained of them, by Nebuzaradan, after the capture of Jerusalem (2 K. xvi. 17, xxv. 13). No mention is made in Scripture of the existence of the lavers in the second Temple, nor by Josephus in his account of Herod's restoration (Joseph. J. J. v. 5). [MOLLEN SEAS.

The dimensions of the bases with the lavers, as given in the Hebrew text, are 4 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 in height. The LXX. gives 4+4+5 in height. Josephus, who appears to have followed a var. reading of the LXX., makes them 5 in length, 4 in width, and 6 in height (1 K. vii. 28; Thenius, ad loc. Joseph. Ant. viii. 3, § 3). There were to be 4 wheels of 14 cubit in diameter, with spokes, etc., all cast in one piece. The principal parts requiring explanation may be thus enumerated: (a) Borders, c probably panels. Gesenius (Thes. p. 938) supposes these to have been ornaments like square shields with engraved work. (b) Ledges, d joints in corners of bases or fillets covering joints. (c) Additions, f probably festoons. Lightfoot translates oblique decussates, (d) Plates, g probably axles, cast in the same piece as the wheels. (e) Under-setters, h either the nave of the wheels, or a sort of handles for moving the whole machine; Lightfoot renders columnae fulciles haverunm. (f) Naves, l Spokes, m Fellows, (i) Chapter, m perhaps the rim of the circular opening (mouth, ver. 31) in the convex top. (k) A round compass, p perhaps the convex roof of the base. To these parts Josephus adds chains, which may probably be the festoons above mentioned (Ant. viii. 3, § 6).

Laver

Thenius, with whom Keil in the main agrees, both of them differing from Ewald, in a minute examination of the whole passage, but not without some transportation, chiefly of the greater part of ver. 31 to ver. 35, deduces a construction of the bases and lavers, which seems fairly to reconcile the very great difficulties of the subject. Following chiefly his description, we may suppose the base to have been a quadrangular hollow frame, connected at its corners by plasters (ledges), and moved by 4 wheels or high castors, one at each corner, with handles (plates) for drawing the machine. The sides of this frame were divided into 3 vertical panels or compartments (boards), ornamented with bas-reliefs of lions, oxen, and cherubim. The top of the base was convex, with a circular opening of 1 1/2 cubit diameter. The top itself was covered with engraved cherubim, lions, and palm-trees or branches. The height of the convex top from the upper plane of the base was 1 1/2 cubit, and the space between this top and the lower surface of the laver 1 1/2 cubit more. The laver rested on supports (under-setters) rising from the 4 corners of the base. Each laver contained 40 "baths," or about 300 gallons. Its diameter therefore, to be in proportion to 7 feet (4 cubits, ver. 38) in diameter, must have been about 20 inches in depth. The great height of the whole machine was doubtless in order to bring it near the height of the altar (2 Chr. iv. 1: Aias, de Tempel Pohrter, Crit. Sacr, vii. 926; Lightfoot, Descr. Tempel, ch. xxxvii. 3, vol. i. p. 646; Thienius, in Kurzg. exeg. Handb. on K. Rich. and App. p. 41; Ewald, Geschichtl. iii. 315; Keil, Handb. der Bibl. Arch. § 24, pp. 128, 129; Winer, s. v. Hausfuss). H. W. P.

LAW (יוֹמָד): The word is properly used, in Scripture as elsewhere, to express a definite commandment laid down by any recognized authority. The commandment may be general, or (as in Lev. vi. 9, 14, &c., the law of the burnt-offering, etc.) particular in its bearing: the authority either human or divine. But when the word is used with the article, and without any words of limitation, it refers to the expressed will of God, and, in nine cases out of ten, to the Mosaic Law, or to the Pentateuch, of which it forms the chief portion.

The Hebrew word (derived from the root טור, "to point out," and so "to direct and lead") lays more stress on its moral authority, as teaching the truth, and guiding in the right way; the Greek Νόμος (from νόμος, "to assign or appoint"), on its results. It will be well understood by a recognized authority. But in either case it is a commandment proceeding from without, and distinguished from the free action of its subjects, although not necessarily opposed thereto.

The sense of the word, however, extends its scope, and assumes a more abstract character in the writings of St. Paul. Νόμος, when used by him with the article, still refers in general to the Law of Moses; but when used without the article, so as to embrace any manifestation of "law," it includes all that will be well understood by each of us, and may be, or be not, expressed in definite forms. This is seen in the constant opposition of ἐγγύς νόμος ("works done under the constraint of law") to faith, or "works of faith," that is, works done freely by the internal influence of faith. A still more remarkable use of the word is found in Rom. vii. 23, where the power of evil over the will, arising from the corruption of man, is spoken of as a "law of sin," that is, an unnatural tyranny proceeding from an evil power without.

The occasional use of the word "law" (as in Rom. iii. 27, "law of faith;" in vii. 23, "law of my mind," τοῦ νοῦς: in viii. 2, "law of the spirit of life;" and in Jam. i. 25, ii. 12, "a perfect law, the law of liberty") to denote an internal principle of action does not really militate against the general rule. For in each case it will be seen, that such principle is spoken of in contrast with some formal law, and the word "law" is consequently applied to it improperly, in order to mark this opposition, the qualifying words which follow guarding against any danger of misapprehension of its real character.

It should also be noticed that the title "the Law" is occasionally used loosely to refer to the whole of the Old Testament (as in John x. 34, referring to Ps. lxxvi. 6; in John xiv. 25, referring to Ps. xxxv. 13; and in 1 Cor. xiv. 21, referring to Is. xxviii. 11, 12). This usage is probably due, not only to desire of brevity and to the natural prominence of the Pentateuch, but also to the predominance in the older Covenant (when considered separately from the New, for which it was the preparation) of an external and legal character.

A. B.

LAW OF MOSES. It will be the object of this article, not to enter into the history of the giving of the Law (for which see Moses, the EXODUS, etc.), nor to examine the authorship of the books in which it is contained (for which see Pentateuch, Exodus, etc.), nor to dwell on particular ordinances, which are treated of under their respective heads; but to give a brief analysis of its substance, to point out its main principles, and to explain the position which it occupies in the progress of Divine Revelation. In order to do this the more clearly, it seems best to speak of the Law, 1st, in relation to the past; 2dly, in its own intrinsic character; and, 3dly, in its relation to the future.

(I. a.) In reference to the past, it is all-important, for the proper understanding of the Law, to remember its entire dependence on the ABRAHAMIC COVENANT, and its adaptation thereto (see Gal. iii. 17-24). That covenant had a twofold character. It contained the "spiritual promise" of the Messiah, which was given to the Jews as representatives of the whole human race, and as guardians of a treasure in which "all families of the earth should be blessed." This would prepare the Jewish nation to be the centre of the unity of mankind. But it contained also the temporal promises subsidiary to the former, and needed in order to preserve intact the nation, through which the race of man should be educated and prepared for the coming of the redeemer. These promises were special, given distinctively to the Jews as a nation, and, so far as they were considered in themselves, calculated to separate them from other nations of the earth, as follows that the Law could be the Law of the earth a corresponding duality of nature. There would be much in it of the latter character, much (that is) peculiar to the Jews, local, special, and transitory; but the fundamental principles on which it was based must be universal, because expressing the will of an unchanging God, and springing from relations to Him, inherent in human nature, and therefore perpetual and universal in their application.

(b.) The manner of this relation of the Law to the promise is clearly pointed out. The belief in God as the Redeemer of man, and the hope of his manifestation as such in the person of the Messiah, involved the belief that the Spiritual Power must be superior to all carnal obstructions, and that there was in man a spiritual element which could rule his life by communion with a Spirit from above. But it involved also the idea of an antagonistic Power of Evil, from which man was to be redeemed, existing in each individual, and existing also in the world at large. The promise was the witness of the one truth, the Law was the declaration of the other. It was "added because of transgressions." In the individual, it stood between his better and his worse self; in the world, between the Jewish nation, as the witness of the spiritual promise, and the heathendom, which groaned under the power of the flesh. It was intended, by the gift of guidance and the pressure of motives, to strengthen the weakness of good, while it curbed directly the power of evil. It followed inevitably that, in the individual, it assumed somewhat of a coercive, and, as between Israel and the world, somewhat of an antagonistic and isolating character; and hence that, viewed without reference to the promise (as it was viewed by the later Jews), it might actually become a hindrance to the true revelation of G-d, and to the mission for which the nation had been made a 'chosen people.'

(c.) Not is it less essential to remark the period of the history at which it was given. It marked and determined the transition of Israel from the condition of a tribe to that of a nation, and its definite assumption of a distinct position and office in the history of the world. It is on no unreal metaphor that we base the well-known analogy between the stages of individual life and those of national or universal existence. The period of the patriarchal child, the time when a nation's history is in the sinner of the wilderness, represents the awakening to the difficulty, the responsibility, and the nobleness of life, which marks the "putting away of childlike things." The Law is the sign and the seal of such an awakening.

(d) Yet, though now in its general conception, it was probably not wholly new in its materials. Neither in his material nor his spiritual providence does G-d prove of the nation then, and, as before, from their past history, the most necessary have been, before the Law, commandments and revelations of a fragmentary character, under which Israel had hitherto grown up. Indications of such are easily found, both of a ceremonial and moral nature: as, for example, in the penalties against murder, adultery, and fornication (Gen. ix. 6, xxxviii. 24), in the existence of the Levirate law (Gen. xxxviii. 8), in the distinction of clean and unclean animals (Gen. viii. 20), and probably in the observance of the Sabbath (Ex. xvi. 23; 27-29).

But, even without such indications, our knowledge of the existence of Israel as a distinct community in Egypt would necessitate the conclusion, that it must have been guided by some laws of its own, growing out of the old patriarchal customs, which would be preserved with oriental tenacity, and gradually become modified by the progress of circumstances. Nor would it be possible for the Israelites to be in contact with an elaborate system of ritual and law, such as that which existed in Egypt, without being influenced by its general principles, and, in less degree, by its minuter details. As they approached nearer to the condition of a nation they would be more and more likely to modify their patriarchal customs by the adoption from Egypt of laws which were fitted for national existence. This being so, it is hardly conceivable that the Mosaic legislation should have embodied none of these earlier materials. It is clear, even to human wisdom, that the only constitution, which can be efficient and permanent, is one which has grown up slowly, and so been assimilated to the character of a people. It is the peculiar mark of legislative genius to mould by fundamental principles, and animate by a higher inspiration, materials previously existing in a cruder state. The necessity for its vitality lies not in the matter, but in the manner, of the legislator, but of the subjects; and the argument therefore is but strengthened by the acknowledgment in the case of Moses of a divine and special inspiration. So far therefore as they were consistent with the objects of the Jewish law, the customs of Palestine and the laws of Egypt would doubtless be traceable in the Mosaic system.

(e) In close connection with and almost in consequence of this reference to antiquity we find an accoammodation of the Law to the temper and circumstances of the Israelites, to which our Lord refers in the case of divorce (Matt. xix. 7, 8) as necessarily interfering with its absolute perfection. In many cases it rather should be said to guide and modify existing usages than actually to sanction them. In this manner, the ordinance in the Levirate law, which, in its character, leads to a conception of its ordinances not only erroneous, but actually the reverse of the truth. Thus the punishment of filial disobedience appears severe (Deut. xxi. 18-21); yet when we refer to the extent of parental authority in a patriarchal system, or (as at Rome) in the earlier periods of national existence, it appears more like a limitation of absolute parental authority by an appeal to the judgment of the community. The Levirate Law again appears (see Mich. Mus. Rech., bk. iii. ch. 6, art. 98) to have existed in a far more general form in the early Asiatic peoples, and to have been rather limited than favored by Moses. The law of the Avenger of Blood is a similar instance of merciful limitation and distinction in the exercise of an immemorial usage, probably not without its value and meaning, and certainly too deep-seated to admit of profound alteration or of a legislation in which it was involved.

We must remember (as has been already suggested) that the degree of prominence, given to each part of the Mosaic system, has a similar reference to the period at which the nation had arrived. The ceremonial portion is marked out distinctly and with elaboration; the moral and civil laws are limited and straitened; the civil law, so far as it relates to individuals, is systematic: I expanse all these were called for by the past growth of the nation, and needed in order to settle and develop its resources. But the political and constitutional law is comparatively imperfect; a few leading principles are laid down; to be developed hereafter; but the law is directed rather to sanction the various powers of the state, than to define and balance their operations. Thus the existing relations of a patriarchal nature in the tribe and family are recognized; while side by side with them is established the priestly and Levitical power, which was to supersede them entirely in sacredness, and partly also in judicial functions. The supreme civil power of a "judge," or (hereafter) a king, is recognized distinctly, although only in general terms, indicating a sovereign and summary jurisdiction (Deut. xviii. 14-20). The prophetic office, in its political as well as its moral aspect, is spoken of still more vaguely as future (Deut. xviii. 15-22). These powers, being recognized, are left, within due limits, to work out the political system of Israel, and to ascertain by experience their proper spheres of exercise. On a careful understanding of this adaptation of the Law to the national growth and character of the Jews (and of a somewhat similar adaptation to their climate and physical circumstances) depends the correct appreciation of its nature, and the power of distinguishing in it what is local and temporary from that which is universal.

(f.) In close connection with this subject we observe also the gradual process by which the Law was revealed to the Israelites. In Ex. xx., xxxiii., in direct connection with the revelation from Mount Sinai, that which may be called the rough outline of the Mosaic Law is given by God, solemnly recorded by Moses, and accepted by the people. In Ex. xxv., xxxiii. there is a similar outline of the Mosaic ceremonial. On the basis of these it may be conceived that the fabric of the Mosaic system gradually grew up under the requirements of the time. In certain cases indeed (as e.g., in Lev. x. 1, 2, compared with 8–11; Lev. xxiv. 11–16; Num. ix. 6–12; xv. 32–41; xxvii. 1–11 compared with xxxvi. 1–12) we actually see how general rules, civil, criminal, and ceremonial, originated in special circumstances; and the connected nature of the records of laws in the earlier books suggests the idea that this method of legislation extended to many other cases.

The first revelation of the Law in anything like a perfect form is found in the book of Deuteronomy, at a period when the people, educated to freedom and national responsibility, were prepared to receive it, and carry it with them to the land which was now prepared for them. It is distinguished by its systematic character and its reference to first principles; for probably even by Moses himself, certainly by the people, the Law had not before this been recognized in all its essential characteristics; and to it we naturally refer in attempting to analyze its various parts. [DEUTERONOMY.] Yet even then the revelation was not final; it was the duty of the prophets to amend and explain it in special points (as in the well-known example in Ez. xviii.), and to bring out more clearly its general principles, as distinguished from the external rules in which they were embodied; for in this way, as in others, they prepared the way of Him, who “came to fulfill” (ταπαράται) the Law of old time.

The relation, then, of the Law to the Covenant, its accommodation to the time and circumstances of its promulgation, its adaptation of old materials, and its gradual development, are the chief points to be noticed under the first head.

(II.) In examining the nature of the Law in itself, it is customary to divide it into the Moral, Political, and Ceremonial. But this division, although valuable, if considered as a distinction merely subjective (as enabling us, that is, to conceive the objects of Law, dealing as it does with man in his social, political, and religious capacity), is wholly imaginary, if regarded as an objective separation of various classes of Laws. Any single ordinance might have at once a moral, a ceremonial, and a political bearing; and in fact, although in particular cases one or other of these aspects predominated, yet the whole principle of the Mosaic institutions is to obliterare any such supposed separation of laws, and refer all to first principles, depending on the Will of God and the nature of man.

In giving an analysis of the substance of the Law it will probably be better to treat it, as any other system of laws is usually treated, by dividing it into — (1) Laws Civil; (2) Laws Criminal; (3) Laws Judicial and Constitutional; (4) Laws Ecclesiastical and Ceremonial.

(I.) LAWS CIVIL.

(A.) Of Persons.

The power of a Father to be held sacred, cursing, or exuding (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xx. 9), or stubborn and willful disobedience to be considered capital crimes. But uncontrolled power of life and death was apparently refused to the father, and vested only in the congregation (Deut. xxi. 18–21).

Right of the first-born to a double portion of the inheritance not to be set aside by partiality (Deut. xxi. 15–17).

Inheritance by Daughters to be allowed in default of sons, provided (Num. xxvii. 8–8, comp. xxxvii.) that heiresses married in their own tribe.

Daughters unwedded to be entirely dependent on their father (Num. xxx. 3–5).

(b.) Husband and Wife.

The power of a Husband to be so great that a wife could never be suit juris, or enter independently into any engagement, even before God (Num. xiv. 6–15). A widow or divorced wife became independent, and did not again fall under her husband’s power (ver. 9).

Divorce (for uncleanness) allowed, but to be formal and irrevocable (Deut. xxiv, 1–4).

Marriage within certain degrees forbidden (Lev. xviii. etc.).

A Slave Wife, whether bought or captive, not to be actual property, nor to be sold; if ill-treated, to be ipso facto free (Deut. xxii. 7–9; Deut. xxi. 10–14).

Slander against a wife’s virginity to be punished by fine, and by deprivation of power of divorce; on the other hand, anto-connubial uncleanness in her to be punished by death (Deut. xxi. 13–21).

The raising up of seed (Levirate law), a formal right to be claimed by the widow, under pain of infamy, with a view to preservation of families (Deut. xxv. 5–10).

(c.) Master and Slave.

Power of Master so far limited, that death under actual chastisement was punishable (Ex. xxi. 29); and maiming was to give liberty ipso facto (vv. 25, 27).

The Hebrew Slave to be freed at the sabbatical year, and provided with necessaries (his wife and children to go with him only if they came to his master with him), unless by his own formal act he consented to be a perpetual slave (Ex. xxi. 1–6; Deut. xiv. 12–18). In any case (it would seem) to be freed at the jubilee (Lev. xxv. 10), with his children. If sold to a resident alien, to be always redeemable, at a price proportional to the distance of the jubilee (Lev. xxvi. 36-43).

LAW OF MOSES

Foreign Slaves to be held and inherited as property for ever (Lev. xxv. 45, 46); and fugitive slaves from foreign nations not to be given up (Deut. xxxii. 15).

* The condition of servants under the Mosaic code is discussed at length in the article SLAVE. In the view of some of the ablest expounders of that code, both Jewish and Christian, the servant was not regarded as a chattel or as property in the intent of the law, but always as a person. "The Hebrew language has no word for stigmatizing by a degrading appellation one part of these who owe service, and distinguishing them from the rest as 'slaves,' but only one term for all who are under obligation to render service to others. For males, this is "hebèl," servant, 'man-servant,' properly 'laborer;' for females Shifchah, Amâ, 'maid-servant,' 'maid.' The laws respecting servants protect in every regard their dignity and their feelings as men. They by no means surrendered these to the arbitrary will of the master, as in other ancient and modern states in which slavery and servitude prevail." - Salzmann, Der Moseische Code, Kap. 101. Dr. Mirkirch, of Copenhagen, in his Skoeren bei den Hebr., defines ched as 'a common name for all who stood in a dependent or subordinate relation. It had not the degrading sense which we connect with the words slave or bondman; but it often had the mild significance which we associate, in certain relations, with the word servant." - Salvador, in his Histoire des Institutions de Moïse, treats of Hebrew servitude under the title of "Domesticity, or the condition of servants improperly called slaves." He does not find in the laws of Moses any trace of chattelism. While the Hebrew servant was released at the end of seven years, or sooner if the jubilee intervened, the foreign servant could be held for the whole jubilee term, and if, at the death of the master, the term of service had not expired, the natural heirs of the master could enforce it until the jubilee: this, and not service in perpetuity, was the meaning of "for ever," in Lev. xxv. 45, 46. In this sense, also, as owning unfledged service, the servant was "money" to his master, but never a salable chattel. Man-stealing and man-selling were punished with death. Ewald has shown that in all the spiritual blessings of life the servant was on a par with the free man; and that important civil rights were secured to him as a protection against his master. (6.) Strangers.

They seem never to have been sui juris, or able to protect themselves, and accordingly protection and kindness towards them are enjoined as a sacred duty (Ex. xxii. 21; Lev. xix. 33, 34).

(R.) LAW OF THINGS.

(a.) Laws of Land and Property.

(1.) All Land to be the property of God alone, and its holders to be deemed his tenants (Lev. xiv. 23).

(2.) All soil Land therefore to return to its original owners at the jubilee, and the price of sale to be calculated accordingly; and redemption on equitable terms to be allowed at all times (xxv 26-27).

A House sold to be redeemable within a year; and, if not redeemed, to pass away altogether (xxv. 30, 31).

But the Houses of the Levites, or those in uncalled villages, to be redeemable at all times, in the same way as land; and the Levitical suburbs to be inalienable (xx. 31-34).

(3.) Land or Houses sanctified, or tithes, or un- clean firstlings to be capable of being redeemed, at any value (calculated according to the distance from the jubilee-year by the priest); if devoted by the owner and unredeemed, to be hallowed at the jubilee for ever, and given to the priests; if only by a possessor, to return to the owner at the jubilee (Lev. xxviii. 14-34).

(4.) Inheritance.

(1.) Sons.

(2.) Daughters.

(3.) Brothers.

(4.) Daughters on the Father's side.

(5.) Next Kinmen, generally.

(b.) Laws of Debt.

(1.) All Debts to be released at the 7th (sabbatical) year; a blessing promised to obedience, and a curse on refusal to lend (Deut. xv. 1-11).

(2.) Usury (from Israelites) not to be taken (Ex. xxii. 25-27; Deut. xxvii. 19, 20).

(3.) Pledges not to be insolently or ruinously exacted (Deut. xxix. 6, 10-13, 17, 18).

(c.) Taxation.

(1.) Census-money, a poll-tax (of a half-shekel), to be paid for the service of the tabernacle (Ex. xxx. 12-16).

All spoil in war to be hallowed; of the combatant's half, 1/20th, of the people's, 1/20th, to be paid for a 'heave-offering' to Jehovah.

(2.) Tithes.

(a.) Tithes of all produce to be given for maintenance of the Levites (Num. xviii. 20-24).

(Or this 1/20th to be paid as a heave-offering for maintenance of the priests) . . . .

(6.) Second Tithe to be bestowed in religious feasting and charity, either at the Holy Place, or every 3d year at home (?) (Deut. xiv. 22-28).

(c.) First-fruits of corn, wine, and oil (at least 1/20th, generally 4/5th, for the priests) to be offered at Jerusalem, with a solemn declaration of dependence on God the King of Israel (Deut. xxvi. 1-15; Num. xvi. 12, 13).

Firstfruits of clean beasts; the redemption-money (5 shekels) of man, and (1 shekel, or 1 shekel) of unclean beasts, to be given to the priests after sacrifice (Num. xviii. 15-18).

(3.) Poor Lands.

(u.) Greetings (in field or vineyard) to be at a legal right of the poor (1 Lev. xii. 10-20; Deut. xxiv. 19-22).
(1.) Slight Trespass (eating on the spot) to be allowed as legal (Deut. xxii. 24, 25).
(2.) 5th Tithe (see 2 β) to be given in charity.
(3.) Maintenance of Priests (Num. xviii. 8–32).
(4.) Deity of Levites’ Tithe. (See 2 a.)
(5.) The heave and wave-offerings (breast and right shoulder of all peace-offerings).
(6.) The meat and sin-offerings to be eaten solemnly, and only in the holy place.
(7.) First-Fruits and redemption money. (See 2 γ.)
(8.) Price of all devoted things, unless specially given for a sacred service. A man’s service, or that of his household, to be redeemed at 50 shekels for man, 30 for woman, 20 for boy, and 10 for girl.

(II.) Laws Criminal.
(A.) Offenses against God (of the nature of treason).
1st Command. Acknowledgment of false gods (Ex. xxii. 20), as e. g. Moloch (Lev. xx. 3), and generally all idolatries (Deut. xiii., xvi.–25).
2d Command. Witchcraft and false prophecy (Ex. xxii. 18; Deut. xviii. 9–22; Lev. xix. 31).
Punishment in all cases, death by stoning. Idolatrous cities to be utterly destroyed.

(B.) Offenses against Man.
5th Command. Disobedience to or cursing or suitsing of parents (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xx. 9; Deut. xxi. 18–21) to be punished by death without sanctuary or reprieve, or satisfaction (Ex. xxi. 12, 14; Deut. xix. 11–13). Death of a slave actually under the rod, to be punished (Ex. xxi. 24, 25).

(2.) Death by negligence to be punished by death (Ex. xxi. 28–30).
(3.) Accidental Homicide: the avenger of blood to be escaped by flight to the cities of refuge till the death of the high-priest (Num. xix. 9–28; Deut. iv. 11–13, xiv. 4–10).缺点.
(4.) Uncertain Murder to be expiated by formal disavowal and sacrifice by the elders of the nearest city (Deut. xxi. 1–9).
(5.) Assault to be punished by lex talionis, or damages (Ex. xxi. 18, 19, 22–23; Lev. xiv. 19, 20).
7th Command. (1.) Adultery to be punished by death of both offenders: the rape of a married or betrothed woman, by death of the offender (Deut. xiii. 13–27).
(2.) Rape or Seduction of an unbetrothed virgin, to be compensated by marriage, with dowry (50 shekels), and without power of divorce; or, if she be refused, by payment of full dowry (Ex. xxi. 16, 7; Deut. xxii. 22, 29).

a Military conquest discouraged by the prohibition if the use of horses. (See Josh. xi. 6.) For an ex-

(3.) Unlawful Marriages (incestuous, etc.) to be punished, some by death, some by childlessness (Lev. xx.).
8th Command. (1.) Theft to be punished by fourfold or double restitution; a nocturnal robber might be slain as an outlaw (Ex. xii. 1–4).
(2.) Trespass and injury of things lent to be compensated (Ex. xii. 5–15).
(3.) Persecution of Justice (by bribes, threats, etc.), and especially oppression of strangers, strictly forbidden (Ex. xiiii. 3, &c.).
(4.) Kidnapping to be punished by death (Deut. xiv. 7).
9th Command. False Witness to be punished by lex talionis (Ex. xiiii. 1–3; Deut. xix. 16–21).

A fuller consideration of the tables of the Ten Commandments is given elsewhere. [Ten Commandments.]

(III.) Laws Judicial and Constitutional.
(A.) Jurisdiction.
(a.) Local Judges (generally Levites, as more skilled in the Law) appointed, for ordinary matters, probably by the people with approbation of the supreme authority (as of Moses in the wilderness, Ex. xviii. 25; Deut. i. 15–18), through all the land (Deut. xvi. 18).
(b.) Appeal to the Priests (at the holy place), or to the judge; their sentence final, and to be accepted in all cases of death. See Deut. xiii. 8–18 (comp. appeal to Moses, Ex. xiiii. 26).
(c.) Two witnesses (at least) required in capital matters (Num. xxxv. 30; Deut. xvi. 6, 7).
(d.) Punishment (except by special command) to be personal, and not to extend to the family (Deut. xiv. 16).

Stripes allowed and limited (Deut. xxi. 1–3), so as to avoid outrage on the human frame.
All this would be to a great extent set aside —
1st. By the summary jurisdiction of the king, see 1 Sam. xxi. 11–19 (Saul); 2 Sam. xii. 1–5, xiv. 4–11; 1 K. iii. 16–28; which extended even to the deposition of the high-priest (1 Sam. xxi. 17, 18; 1 K. ii. 20, 27).

The practical difficulty of its being carried out is seen in 2 Sam. xv. 2–6, and would lead of course to a certain delegation of his power.
2d. By the appointment of the Seventy (Num. xii. 24–30) with a solemn religious sanction. In later times there was a local Sanhedrim of 23 in each city, and two such in Jerusalem, as well as the Great Sanhedrim, consisting of 70 members, besides the president, who was to be the high-priest if duly qualified, and controlling even the king and high-priest. The members were priests, scribes (Levites), and elders (of other tribes). A court of exactly this nature is noticed, as appointed to supreme power by Jehoshaphat. (See 2 Chr. ix. 8–11.)

(B.) Royal Power.
The King’s Power limited by the Law, as written and formally accepted by the king; and directly forbidden to be despotic a (Deut. xviii. 14–20; comp. 1 Sam. x. 25). Yet he had power of taxation (to 30th); and of compulsory service (1 Sam. viii. 10–18); the declaration of war (1 Sam. xi.),

a Military conquest discouraged by the prohibition if the use of horses. (See Josh. xi. 6.) For an ex-example of obedience to this law, see 2 Sam. viii. 4, &c. of disobedience to it in 1 K. x. 24–29.

The Princes of the Congregation. The heads of the tribes (see Josh. ix. 15) seem to have had authority under Joshua to act for the people (comp. 1 Chr. xxvii. 16-22); and in the later times "the princes of Judah" seem to have had power to control both the king and the priests (see 1 Chr. xxvi. 10-12, xxviii. 4, 5, &c.).

(C.) ROYAL REVENUE. (See Mich. b. ii. c. 7, art. 59.)

1.) Tenth of produce.
2.) Domain land (1 Chr. xxvii. 26-29). Note confiscation of criminal's land (1 K. xxi. 13).
3.) Bond service (1 K. v. 17, 18) chiefly on foreigners (1 K. ix. 20-22; 2 Chr. ii. 16, 17).
4.) Fleeces and heards (1 Chr. xxvii. 28-31).
5.) Tributes (gifts) from foreign kings.
6.) Commerce; especially in Solomon's time (1 K. x. 22, 29, &c.).

(V.) ECCLESIASTICAL AND CEREMONIAL LAW.

(A.) LAW OF SACRIFICE. (considered as the sign and the appointed means of the union with God, on which the holiness of the people depended.)

1.) ORDINARY SACRIFICES.

(a.) The whole Burnt-Offering (Lev. i.) of the herd or the flock; to be offered continually (Ex. xxix. 38-42); and the fire on the altar never to be extinguished (Lev. vi. 8-12).
(b.) The Meat-Offering (Lev. ii. vi. 11-23) of flour, oil, and frankincense, unleavened, and seasoned with salt.
(c.) The Peace-Offering (Lev. iii. vii. 11-21) of the herd or the flock; either a thank-offering, or a vow, or freewill offering.
(d.) The Sin-Offering, or Trespass-Offering (Lev. iv. v. vi.).
  (a.) For sins committed in ignorance (Lev. iv.).
  (b.) For vows unwittingly made and broken, or uncleanness unwittingly contracted (Lev. v.).
  (c.) For sins willingly committed (Lev. vi. 1-7).

2.) EXTRAORDINARY SACRIFICES.

(a.) At the Consecration of Priests (Lev. viii. ix.).
(b.) At the Purification of Women (Lev. xii.).
(c.) At the Cleansing of Lepers (Lev. xiv. xiv.).
(d.) On the Great Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi.).
(e.) On the Great Festivals (Lev. xxiii.).

(B.) LAW OF HOLINESS (arising from the union with God through sacrifice).

1.) HOLINESS OF PERSONS.

(a.) Holiness of the whole people as "children of God" (Ex. xiv. 5, 6; Lev. xi. xxvii. xviii.; Deut. xiv. 1-21) shown in (a.) The Dedication of the first-born (Ex. xii. 12, 13, xxvii. 29, 30, &c.); and the offering of all firstlings and first-fruits (Deut. xxvii. et cetera).
LAW OF MOSES

Based on known truth and acknowledged authority, it is enforced; and (d) the character which it seeks to impress on the people.

(4.) The basis of human society is ordinarily sought, by law or philosophy, either in the rights of the individual, and the partial delegation of them to political authorities; or in the mutual needs of men, and the relations which spring from them; or in the actual existence of power of man over man, whether arising from natural relationship, or from benefits conferred, or from physical or intellectual ascendency. The maintenance of society is supposed to depend on a "social compact" between governors and subjects; a compact, true as an abstract idea, but untrivial if supposed to have been a historical reality. The Mosaic Law seeks the basis of its polity, first, in the absolute sovereignty of God, next in the relationship of each individual to God, and through God to his countrymen. It is clear that such a doctrine, while it contradicts none of the common theories, yet lies beneath them all, and shows why each of them, being only a secondary deduction from an ultimate truth, cannot be in itself sufficient; and, if it claim to be the whole truth, will become an absurdity. It is the doctrine which is insisted upon and developed in the whole series of prophecy; and which is brought to its perfection only when applied to that universal and perpetual spiritual kingdom for which the Mosaic system was a preparation.

(5.) The Law, as proceeding directly from God, and referring directly to Him, is necessarily absolute in its supremacy and unlimited in its scope.

It is supreme over the governors, as being only the delegates of the Lord, and therefore it is incompatible with any despotic authority in them. It is seen in its limitation of the power of the master over the slave, in the restrictions laid on the priesthood, and the ordination of the "manner of the kingdom" (Deut. xvii. 14-20; comp. 1 Sam. x. 25). By its establishment of the hereditary priesthood side by side with the authority of the heads of tribes ("the princes"), and the subsequent sovereignty of the king, it provides a balance of powers, all of which are regarded as subordinate. The idea of theocracy, as embodied in the earlier times in the dictatorship of the judges, but much more clearly under the kingdom by the spiritual commission of the prophet. By his rebukes of priests, princes, and kings, for abuse of their power, he was not only defending religion and morality, but also maintaining the divinely-appointed constitution of Israel. On the other hand, it is supreme over the governed, recognizing no inherent rights in the individual, as prevailing against, or limiting the law. It is therefore unlimited in its scope. There is in it no recognition, such as is familiar to us, that there is one class of actions directly subject to the coercive power of law, while other classes of actions and the whole realm of thought are to be indirectly guided by moral and spiritual influence. Nor is there any distinction of the temporal authority which wields the former power, from the spiritual authority to which belongs the other. In fact these distinctions would have been incompatible with the character and objects of the law. They depend partly on the want of foresight and power in the legislator; they could have no place in a system traced directly to God: they depend also partly on the freedom which belongs to the manhood of our race; they could not therefore be appropriate to the more imperfect period of its youth.
Thus the Law regulated the whole life of an Israelite. His house, his dress, and his food, his domestic arrangements and the distribution of his property, all were determined. In the laws of the release of debts, and the prohibition of usury, the dictates of self-interest and the natural course of commercial transactions are sternly checked. His actions were rewarded and punished with great minuteness and strictness; and that according to the standard, not of their consequences, but of their intrinsic morality; so that, for example, fornication and adultery were as severely visited as theft or murder. His religious worship was defined and enforced in an elaborate and unceasing ceremonial. In all things it is clear, that, if men submitted to it merely as a law, imposed under penalties by an irresistible authority, and did not regard it as means to the knowledge and love of God, and a preparation for his redemption, it would well deserve from Israelites the description given of it by St. Peter (Acts xiv. 10), as "a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear."

(c) The penalties and rewards by which the Law is enforced are such as depend on the direct threcracy. With regard to individual actions, it may be noticed that, as generally some penalties are inflicted by the subordinate, and some only by the superior authority, so among the penalties some came from the hand of man, some directly from the providence of God. So much is this the case, that it often seems doubtful whether the threat that a soul shall be cut off from Israel" refers to outraving and excommunication, or to such miraculous punishments as those of Nahab and Abiab, or Korah, Davthan, and Abiram. In dealing with the nation at large, Moses, regularly and as a matter of course, refers for punishments and rewards to the providence of God. This is seen, not only in the great blessing and curse which enforces the law as a whole, but also in special instances, as, for example, in the promise of unusual fertility to compensate for the sabbatical year, and of safety of the country from attack when left undefended at the three great festivals. Whether these were to come from natural causes, i.e. laws of nature, which underlies and foresees, or from causes supernatural, i.e. incomprehensible and inscrutable, is not in any case laid down, nor indeed does it affect this principle of the Law.

The bearing of this principle on the inquiry as to the revelation of a future life in the Pentateuch is easily seen. So far as the Law deals with the nation as a whole, it is obvious that its penalties and rewards could only refer to this life, in which alone the nation exists. So far as it relates to such individual acts as are generally cognizable by human law, and capable of temporal punishments, no one would expect that its divine origin should necessitate any reference to the world to come. But the sphere of moral and religious action and thought to which it extends is beyond the cognizance of human laws, and the law themselves becomes penalties and is therefore left by them to the retribution of God's inscrutable justice, which, being but imperfectly seen here, is contemplated especially as exercised in a future state. Hence arises the expectation of a direct revelation of this future state in the Mosaic Law. Such a revelation is certainly not given. Warburton (in his Divine Legislation of Moses) even builds on its non-existence an argument for the supernatural power and commission of the law-giver, who could promise and threaten retribution from the providence of God in this life and submit his predictions to the test of actual experience. The truth seems to be that, in a law which appeals directly to God himself for its authority and its sanction, there cannot be that broad line of demarcation between this life and the next, which is drawn for those whose power is limited by the grave. Our Lord has taught us (Matt. xxii. 31, 32) that in the very revelation of God as the "God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob," the promise of immortality and future retribution was implicitly contained. We may apply this declaration even more strongly to a law in which God was revealed as entering into covenant with Israel, and in them drawing mankind directly under his immediate government. His blessings and curses, by the very fact that they came from Him, would be felt to be unmitigated by time, and the immediate fulfillment, which they found in this life, would be accepted as the earnest of a deeper, though more mysteries completion in the world to come.

But the time for the clear revelation of this truth was not yet come, and therefore, while the future life and its retribution is implied, yet the rewards and penalties of the present life are those which are plainly held out and practically dwelt upon.

Moses was of course acquainted with the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments as held by this Egyptians. This embraced the following particulars. (1) The continued existence of the soul after death. (2) The future descent of every soul, at death, into Hades, or the underworld. (3) The inspection of the soul in Hades by judges and tests, with a view to determine its moral character. (4) The remaining of the wicked from Hades to a degraded form of existence in this world, as for instance, in the body of a pig.

The progress of the justified, through various experiences, sometimes pigmatarial, and the elevation of the gods. (6) A final judgment and the condemnation of the incorrigibly wicked. (7) The reunion of the justified soul with its unmutilated body. (See Bibl. Sacra, January 1868, p. 69.) According to Egyptian theology the future condition of the soul was determined by its conduct in the present life. The Israelites must have been familiar with the same principle; and the absence of an explicit statement of it in their Law may be accounted for by the fact that it belonged to the sphere of theology rather than of legislation, and was assumed throughout as the basis of the government of the spiritual, holy, and eternal Jehovah.

(d) But perhaps the most important consequence of the theocratic nature of the Law was the peculiar character of goodness which it sought to impress on the people. Goodness in its relation to man takes the forms of righteousness and love; in its independence of all relation, the form of purity, and in its relation to God, that of piety. All these three, as attributes of the Mosaic Law, may be accounted for in the fact that it belonged to the sphere of theology rather than of legislation, and was assumed throughout as the basis of the government of the spiritual, holy, and eternal Jehovah.

...but these can hardly be called its distinguishing features. It is most instructive to refer to the careful preface of the Law in Deut. vii-xi. (especially to vi. 4-13), where all is based on the first great commandment, and to observe the subordinate and dependent character of "the second that is like unto it,"—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; I am the Lord" (Lev. xix. 18).

On the contrary, the care for the purity of the people stands out remarkably, not only in the enforcement of ceremonial "cleanliness," and the multitude of precautions or remedies against any breach of it, but also in the severity of the laws against sensuality and self-pollution, a severity which distinguishes the Mosaic code before all others ancient and modern. In punishing these sins, as committed against a man's own self, without reference to their effect on others, and in recognizing purity as having a substantive value and glory, it sets up a standard of individual morality, such as, even in Greece and Rome, philosophy reserved for its most exotic teaching.

Now in all this it is to be noticed that the appeal is not to any dignity of human nature, but to the obligations of communion with a Holy God. The subordination, therefore, of this idea also to the religious idea is enforced; and so long as the supreme supremacy of the latter was preserved, all other duties were subordinated in other harmonies. But the usurpation of that supremacy in practice, by the idea of personal and national sanctity was that which gave its peculiar color to the Jewish character. In that character there was intense religious devotion and self-sacrifice; there was a high standard of personal holiness, and connected with these an ardent feeling of nationality, based on a great idea, and, therefore, finding its vent in their proverbial spirit of proselytism. But there was also a spirit of contempt for all unbelievers, and a forgetfulness of the existence of any duties towards them, which gave even to their religion an antagonistic spirit, and degraded it in after-times to a ground of national self-assertion. It is to be traced to a natural, though not justifiable, perversion of the law, by those who made it their all; and both in its strength and its weaknesses it has reappeared remarkably among those Christians who have dwelt on the O.T. to the neglect of the N.T.
