GENNESARET, SEA OF

GENNES'ARET, SEA OF (יוֹמְתָּה גֶּנֶּנְסָרָאֵט, Luke v. 1: δύσω Γεννησάραν, 1 Mac. xi. 67), called in the O. T. “the Sea of Chinnereth,” or “Chinneroth,” Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3), from a town of that name which stood on or near its shore (Josh. xix. 30). In the later Hebrew we always find the Greek form Γέννας, which may possibly be a corruption of גנים, though some derive the word from Gannah, “a garden,” and Sharon, the name of a plain between Tabor and this lake (Onom. s. v. Σαρόν: Cambria, pp. 193-259). Josephus calls it Γεννασαραίνα χώρα (Ant. xii. 2, § 1); and this seems to have been its common name at the commencement of our era (Strabo, xi. p. 755; Plin. v. 16; Ptol. v. 15). At its northeastern angle was a beautiful and fertile plain called "Gennesaret" (גְּנֶנֶסָרָאֵט, Matt. xiv. 34), from which the name of the lake was taken (Joseph. B. J. iii. 10, § 7). The lake is also called in the N. T. Θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας, from the province of Galilee which bordered on its western side (Matt. iv. 18; Mark vii. 31; John vi. 1); and Θάλασσα τῆς Τιβέριας, from the celebrated city (John vi. 1, [xxi. 1]). Eusebius calls it Διαμήτηρ Τιβερίας (Onom. s. v. Σαρόν: see also Cyr. in Jev. i. 5). It is a curious fact that all the numerous names given to this lake were taken from places on its western side. Its modern name is Bahar Tiberiav, (בַּהַר תִּבְרֵיָא). It is the source of two rivers which empty into the Jordan a few miles below the sea. The lake is about seventeen miles long and twelve broad.

In Josh. xiii. 3 “the plains south of Chinnereth” are mentioned. It is the sea and not the city that is here referred to (comp. Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xiii. 3); and “the plains” are those along the banks of the Jordan. Most of our Lord’s public life was spent in the environs of the Sea of Gennesaret. On its shores stood Capernaum, “his own city” (Matt. iv. 13); on its shore he called his first disciples from their occupation as fishermen (Luke v. 1-11); and near its shores he spoke many of his parables, and performed many of his miracles. This region was then the most densely peopled in all Palestine. No less than nine cities stood on the very shores of the lake; while numerous large villages dotted the plains and hill-sides around (Porter, Handbook, p. 421).

The Sea of Gennesaret is of an oval shape, about thirteen geographical miles long, and six broad.

GENNESARET, SEA OF

Josephus gives the length at 140 stadia, and the breadth forty (B. J. iii. 10, § 7); and Pliny says it measured xvi. m. v. by vi. (H. N. xiv.). Both these are near the truth that they could scarcely have been more estimates. The river Jordan enters it at its northern end, and passes out at its southern end. In fact the bed of the lake is just a lower section of the great Jordan valley. Its most remarkable feature is its deep depression, being no less than 700 feet below the level of the ocean (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i. 613). Like almost all lakes of volcanic origin it occupies the bottom of a great basin, the sides of which shelf down with a uniform slope from the surrounding plateaus. On the east the banks are nearly 2000 feet high, destitute of verdure and of foliage, deeply furrowed by ravines, but quite flat along the summit; forming in fact the supporting wall of the table-land of Bashan. On the north there is a gradual descent from this table-land to the valley of the Jordan; and then a gradual rise again to a plateau of nearly equal elevation skirting the mountains of Upper Galilee. The western banks are less regular, yet they present the same general features— plateaus of different altitudes breaking down abruptly to the shore. The scenery has neither grandeur nor beauty. It wants features, and it wants variety. It is bleak and monotonous, especially so when the sky is cloudless and the sun high. The golden tints and purple shadows of evening help it, but it looks best during a thunder-storm, such as the writer has often witnessed in early spring. The cliffs and rocks along the shores are mostly a hard porous basalt, and the whole basin has a scathed volcanic look. The frequent earthquakes prove that the elements of destruction are still at work beneath the surface. There is a copious warm fountain near the site of Tiberias, and it is said that at the time of the great earthquake of 1837 both the quantity and temperature of the water were much increased.

The great depression makes the climate of the shores almost tropical. This is very sensibly felt by the traveller in going down from the plains of Galilee. In summer the heat is intense, and even in early spring the air has something of an Egyptian calmness. Snow very rarely falls, and though it often whitens the neighboring mountains, it never lies here. The vegetation is almost of a tropical character. The thorny lote-tree grows among the basalt rocks; palms flourish luxuriantly, and indigo is cultivated in the fields (comp. Joseph. B. J. iii. 10, § 6).

The water of the lake is sweet, cool, and transparent; and its beach is everywhere pellucidly it has a beautiful sparkling look. This fact is somewhat strange when we consider that it is exposed to the powerful rays of the sun, that many warm and brackish springs flow into it, and that it is supplied by the Jordan, which rushes into its northern end, a turbid, reddish torrent. The lake abounds in fish now as in ancient times. Some of the same species as those got in the Nile, such as the Ctenurus, the Turbot, and another called by Hasselquist Syrurus Galileus (Reis, pp. 181, 412 f.; comp. Joseph. B. J. iii. 10, § 7). The fishery, like the soil of the surrounding country, is sadly neglected. One little crazy boat is the sole representative of the fleets that covered the lake in N. T. times, and even with it there is no deep-water fishing. Two modes are now employed to catch the fish. One is a hand-net, with which a man, usually naked (John xxi. 7), stands along the shore, and watching his opportunity, throws it round the game with a jerk. The other mode is still more curious. Bread-crums are mixed up with bi-chloride of mercury, and sown over the water; the fish swallow the poison and die. The dead bodies float, are picked up, and taken to the market of Tiberias! (Porter, Handbook, p. 432.)

A "mournful and solitary silence" now reigns along the shores of the Sea of Gennesaret, which were in former ages studded with great cities, and resounded with the din of an active and industrious people. Seven out of the nine cities above referred to are now uninhabited ruins; one, Magdala, is occupied by half a dozen mud hovels; and Tiberias alone retains a wretched remnant of its former prosperity.

GE'ONNES (Γέννεας, Alex. Γένναιος: Gen'nes), father of Apollonius, who was one of several generals (στρατηγοὶ) commanding towns in Palestine, who molested the Jews while Lyssias was governor for Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. xii. 2). Luther understands the word as an adjective (Γένναιος = well-born), and has "des edlen Apollonius."

GENTILES. I. Old Testament,—The Hebrew יְנִיטָל in sing. = a people, nation, body politic; in which sense it is applied to the Jewish nation amongst others. In the plural it acquires an ethnographic, and also an invocative meaning, and is rendered in L. V. by gentiles and Heathen.

הניטלו, the nations, the surrounding nations, foreigners, as opposed to Israel (Neh. v. 8). In Gen. x. 5 it occurs in its most indeterminate sense = the far-distant inhabitants of the Western Isles, without the slightest necessary notion of heathenism, or libertinism. In Lev., Dent., Ps., the term is applied to the various heathen nations with which Israel came into contact; its meaning grows wider in proportion to the wider circle of the national experience, and more or less invocative according to the success or defeat of the national arms. In the prophets it attains at once its most comprehensive and its most hostile view; hostile in presence of inward invasions, comprehensive with reference to the triumphs of a spiritual future.

Notwithstanding the disagreeable connotation of the term, the Jews were able to use it, even in the plural, in a purely technical, geographical sense. Sc Gen. x. 5 (see above); Gen. xiv. 1;Josh. xii. 23; Is. ix. 1. In Josh. xii. 24, "the king of the nations of Gilgal," A. V.; better with Genuesus the king of the Gentiles at Gilgal," where probably, as afterwards in Galilee, foreigners, Gentiles, were settled among the Jews.

For "Galilee of the Gentiles," comp. Matt. iv. 15 with Is. ix. 1, where A. V. = "Galilee of the nations." In Heb. גַּלְיָאָאֵל לְבָנָא, the "circle of the Gentiles;" Kat έξοχήν, גַּלְיָאֵל ha-Ga'al; whence the name Galilee applied to a district which was largely peopled by the Gentiles, especially the Phoenicians.

The Gentiles in Gen. xiv. 1 may either be the inhabitants of the same territory, or, as suggested by Genuesus, "nations of the West," generally.

II. New Testament.—1. The Greek ἐθνος in sing. means a people or nation (Matt. xxiv. 7; Acts ii. 5, &c.), and even the Jewish people (Luke vii. 5, &c., xvi. 1, &c.; comp. Matt. xxi. 23, ἐθνος, heathen, ethniio): in Matt. xxi. 43 ἐθνος alludes to, but does not directly stand for, "the Gentiles." As equivalent to Gentiles it is found in the Epistles of St. Paul, but not always in an invocative sense (e. g. Rom. xi. 13; Eph. iii. 1, 6).

The A. V. is not consistent in its treatment of this word; sometimes rendering it by Greek (Acts xiv. 1, vii. 4; Rom. i. 16, x. 12), sometimes by Gentile (Rom. ii. 9, 10, iii. 9; 1 Cor. x. 32), inserting Greek in the margin. The places where ἐθνος is equivalent to Greek simply (as Acts xvi. 1, 3) are much fewer than those where it is equivalent to Gentile. The former may probably be reduced to Acts xvi. 1, 3; Acts xviii. 17; Rom. i. 14. The latter use of the word seems to have arisen from the almost universal adoption of the Greek language. Even in 2 Macc. iv. 13 Ελληνωμόν appears as synonymous with ἀλλοφαλωμόν (comp. vi. 9); and in Is. x. 12 the Local renders גַּלְיָאֵל by Ελληνων: and so the Greek Fathers defended the Christian faith πῶς Ελληνων, and καὶ Γαληνων. [GREG; HEATHEN.]

GENU'BATH (גֵּנְבָּת) [thep, Ges.]; Gen'vbat: Genubeth, the son of Hadad, an Edomite of the royal family, by an Egyptian princess, the sister of Tahpenes, the queen of the Pharaoh who governed Egypt in the latter part of the reign of David (1 K. vi. 20; comp. 16). Genubath was born in the palace of Pharaoh, and weaned by the queen herself; after which he became a member of the royal establishment, on the same footing as one of the sons of Pharaoh. The fragment of Edomite chronicle in which this is contained is very remarkable, and may be compared with that in Gen. xxxvi. Gubnabath is not again mentioned or alluded to.

GE'ON (גֵּון: Gehon), i. e. Girion, one of the four rivers of Eden; introduced, with the Jordan, and probably the Nile, into a figure in the praise
This is a page from a document discussing the historical and geographical significance of Gerar and Gerar Valley. The text references various biblical passages and geographical locations, discussing the names, historical moments, and cultural significance of these places. It also makes reference to archaeological and historical studies by scholars such as Robinson and others. The page contains specific theological terms and biblical quotes, such as Genesis 20:1 and 21:32, and names like Shimei and Shem. The text is rich with historical and geographical detail, providing insights into the past civilizations and their interactions in this region.
GERASA

(Gerasa, Phœn.; P., Gerasa, Not. Eccles.; Arab. Jerash, جرش). This name does not occur in the O. T., nor in the Received Text of the N. T. But it is now generally admitted that in Matt. viii. 28 "Gerasenes" superseded "Gadarenes." Gerasa was a celebrated city on the eastern borders of Perea (Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, § 3), placed by some in the province of Tzelosia and region of Decapolis (Steph. s. c.), by others in Arabia (Epiph. ad loc.; Her. Ἰορ. in John). These various statements do not arise from any doublet as to the locality of the city, but from the ill-defined boundaries of the provinces mentioned. In the Roman age no city of Palestine was better known than Gerasa. It is situated amid the mountains of Gilead, 20 miles east of the Jordan, and 25 north of Philadelphia, the ancient Rabbath-Ammon. Several MSS. read Γερασαί instead of Γερασηνοί, in Matt. viii. 28; but the city of Gerasa lay too far from the Sea of Tiberias to admit the possibility of the miracles having been wrought in its vicinity. If the reading Γερασηνοί be the true one, the γερασαί, "district," must then have been very large, including Gadara and its environs; and Matthew thus uses a broader appellation, where Mark and Luke use a more specific one. This is not improbable: as Jerome (ad Thund) states that Gilead was in his day called Gerasa; and Origen affirms that Γερασηνοί was the ancient reading (Opp. iv. p. 140).

It is not known when or by whom Gerasa was founded. It is first mentioned by Josephus as having been captured by Alexander Janneus (cirec. n. c. 83); Joseph. B. J. i. 4, § 8). It was one of the cities the Jews burned in revenge for the massacre of their countrymen at Gerasa, at the commencement of their last war with the Romans; and it had scarcely recovered from this calamity when the Emperor Vespasian despatched Annianus, his general, to capture it. Annianus, having carried the city at the first assault, put to the sword one thousand of the Jews who had not effected their escape, enslaved their families, and plundered their dwellings (Joseph. B. J. iv. 9, § 1). It appears to have been a more important city in this period that Gerasa attained its greatest prosperity, and was adorned with those monuments which give it a place among the proudest cities of Syria. History tells us nothing of this, but the fragments of inscriptions found among its ruined palaces and temples, show that it is destined for its architectural splendor to the age and genius of the Antonines (A. D. 138-80). It subsequently became the seat of a bishopric. There is no evidence that the city was ever occupied by the Saracens. There are no traces of their architecture—no mosques, no inscriptions, no reconstruction of old edifices, such as are found in most other great cities in Syria. All here is Roman, or at least ante-Islamic; every structure remains as the hand of the destroyer or the earthquake shook it—ruins and desolation.

The ruins of Gerasa are by far the most beautiful and extensive east of the Jordan. They are situated on both sides of a shallow valley that runs from north to south through a high undulating plain, and falls into the Zerka (the ancient Jablock) at the distance of about 5 miles. A little rivulet, thickly fringed with elder, winds through the valley, giving life and beauty to the deserted city. The first view of the ruins is very striking; and such as have enjoyed it will not soon forget the impression made upon the mind. The long colonnade running through the centre of the city, terminating at one end in the graceful circle of the forum; the groups of columns clustered here and there round the crumbling walls of the temples; the heavy masses of masonry that distinguish the positions of the great theatres; and the vast field of shapeless ruins rising gradually from the green banks of the rivulet to the buttressed heights on each side—all combine in forming a picture such as is rarely equaled. The form of the city is an irregular square, each side measuring nearly a mile. It was surrounded by a strong wall, a large portion of which, with its flanking towers at intervals, is in a good state of preservation. Three gateways are still nearly perfect; and within the city upwards of two hundred and thirty columns remain on their pedestals. (Full descriptions of Gerasa are given in the Handbook for Syria, and Pal.; Burchard's Travels in Syria; Buckingham's Arab Tribes; Litter's Pal. and Syria.)

GERIZIM (always כֶּרֶנֶּיזֶּים; har-Ge'rizim, the mountain of the Gerizzites, from יִרְזִים, dwellers in a shorn (i.e. desert) land, from יִרְזָה, give off; to cut off: possibly the tribe subdued by David, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8; פִּנְגָוֹס, [Vit. Alex. period. ext. Alex. D. xi. 29; פִּנְגָאִי; Ge'rizim], a mountain designated by Moses, in connexion with Mount Ebal, to be the scene of a great solemnity upon the entrance of the children of Israel into the promised land. High places had a peculiar charm attached to them in these days of external observance. The law was delivered from Sinai: the blessings and curses allied to the performance or neglect of it were directed to be pronounced upon Ge'rizim and Ebal. Six of the tribes—Simeon, Levi (but Joseph being represented by two tribes), Jish, Dan, and Naphtali—upon the latter to curse (Deut. xxvii. 12-13). Apparently, the Ark halted mid-way between the two mountains, encompassed by the priests and Levites, thus divided by it into 10 bands, with Joshua for their oryphas. He read the blessings and cursings successively (Josh. vii. 33, 34), to be re-echoed by the Levites on either side of him, and responded to by the tribes in their double array with a loud Amen (Deut. xxvii. 14). Curiously enough, only the formula for the curses is given (ibid. ver. 14-26); and it was upon Ebal, and not Ge'rizim, where the altar of whole unworked stone was to be built, and where the huge plastered stones, with the words of the law (Josh. viii. 32; Joseph. Ant. iv. 8, § 44, limits them to the blessings and curses just pronounced) written upon them, were to be set up (Deut. xxvii. 4-6) —a significant omen for a people entering joyously upon their new inheritance, and yet the song of Moses abounds with forebodings still more sinister and plain-spoken (Deut. xxviii. 5, 6, and 15-28). The next question is, Has Moses defined the lo satives of Ebal and Gerizim? Standing on the eastern side of the Jordan, in the plain of Moab (Deut. i. 7), he asks: "Are they not on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down (i. e. at some distance to the W.), in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the campaign against against Gilgal (i. e. whose territory — not these mountains — commenced over against Gilgal — see Patrick on Deut. xi. 30), beside the plains of Moreh?"... These closing words would seem to mark their site with unusual precision: for in Gen. vii. 5 — the plain (LXX. ἐκτείνεσθαι) of Moreh is expressly connected with "the place of Sichem or Shechem" (N. T. "Sychem" or "Sichar," which last form is thought to convey a reproach. Reland, Dissert. on Gerizim, in Uog. Theaur. p. deccxxvi., in Josephus the form is "Sicima"), and accordingly Judg. ix. 7, Joshua is made to address his celebrated parable to the men of Shechem from the top of Mount Gerizim." The "hills of Moreh," mentioned in the history of Gideon his father, may have been a mountain overhanging the same plain, but certainly could not have been further south (comp. e. vi. 33, and vii. 1). Was it therefore prejudice, or neglect of the true import of these passages, that made Eusebius and Epiphanius, both natives of Palestine, concur in placing Ebal and Gerizim near Jericho, the former charging the Samaritans with crime for attributing titles to Mount Gerizim? (Reland. Dissert., as above, p. deccxxvi.). Of one thing we may be assured, namely, that their Scriptural site must have been, in the fourth century, lost to all but the Samaritans; otherwise these two fathers would have spoken very differently. It is true that they consider the Samaritan hypothesis irreconcilable with Deut. xi. 30, which it has already been shown not to be. A more formidable objection would have been that Joshua could not have marched from Ai to Shechem, through a hostile country, to perform the above solemnity, and retraced his steps so soon afterwards to Gilgal, as has been found there by the Gideonites (Josh. ix. 6; comp. viii. 30-35). Yet the distance between Ai and Shechem is not so long (under two days' journey). Neither can the interval implied in the context of the former passage have been so short, and in the latter so brief, that the latter passage has been misplaced. The remaining objection, namely, "the wide interval between the two mountains at Shechem" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 238, note), is still more easily disposed of, if we consider the blessings and curses to have been pronounced by the Levites, standing in the midst of the valley — thus abbreviating the distance by one half — and not by the six tribes on either hill, who only responded. How indeed could 600,000 men and uphers, besides women and children (comp. Num. ii. 32 with Judg. xx. 2 and 17), have been accommodated in a smaller space? Besides in those days of assemblies "sub dio," the sense of hearing must have been necessarily more acute, just as, before the aids of writing and printing, memories were much more retentive. We may conclude, therefore, that there is no room for doubting the Scriptural position of Ebal and Gerizim, though it may be doubted whether they were placed — in the territory of the tribe of Ephraim; the latter of them overhanging the city of Shechem or Sichem, as Josephus, following the Scriptural narrative, asserts. Even Eusebius, in another work of his (Praec. Evang. ix. 22), quotes some lines from Theodorus, in which the true position of Ebal and Gerizim is described with great force and accuracy and St. Jerome, while following Eusebius in the Omination, in his ordinary correspondence does not hesitate to connect Sichem or Neapolis, the well of Jacob, and Mount Gerizim (Ep. cviii. c. 13, el. Migne). Procopius of Gaza does nothing more than follow Eusebius, and that clumsily (Roland, Palest. lib. ii. c. 13, p. 563); but his more accurate namesake of Caesarea expressly asserts that Gerizim rose over Neapolis (Proc. lib. v. 7) — that Ebal was not a peak of Gerizim (v. Quaresm. Elucid. T. S. lib. vii. Per. i. e. 8), but a distinct mountain to the N. of it, and separated from it by the valley in which Shechem stood, we are not called upon here to prove; nor again, that Ebal was entirely barren, which it can scarce be called now; while Gerizim was the same proverb for verdure and gushing rills formerly, that it is now, at least where it descends towards Nablus, It is a far more important question whether Gerizim was the mountain on which Abrahau was directed to offer his son Isaac (Gen. xxii. 2 ff). First, then, let it be observed that it is not the mountain, but the district which is there called Moriah (of the same root with Moreh: see Corn. a. Lapid. on Gen. xii. 6), and that antecedently to the occurrence which took place "upon one of the mountains" in its vicinity — a consideration which, not itself would naturally point to the locality, already known to Abraham, as the plain or plains of Moreh, "the land of vision," "the high land:" and therefore consistently "the land of adoration," or "religious worship," as it is variously explained. That all these interpretations are incomparably more applicable to the natural features of Gerizim and its neighborhood, than to the hilltop (in comparison) upon which Solomon built his temple, none can for a moment doubt who have seen both Jerusalem unquestionably stands upon high ground, but owing to the hills "round about" it cannot be seen on any side from any great distance; nor, for the same reason, could it ever have been a land of vision, or extensive views. Even from Mount Olivet, which must always have towered over the small eminences at its base to the S. W., the view cannot be named in the same breath with that from Gerizim, which is one of the finest commanding, as it does, from an elevation of nearly 2,500 feet (Arrowsmith, Geograp. Dict. of the H. S. p. 145), "the Mediterranean Sea on the W., the snowy heights of Hermon on the N., on the E. the wall of the trans-Jordanian mountains, broken by the deep cleft of the Jablok " (Stanley, S. & P. p. 235), and the lovely and tortuous expanse of plain (the Makkhe) stretched as a carpet of many colors beneath its feet, as "present to a traveller advancing up the Philistine plain " (ibid. p. 252) — the direction from which Abraham came — to be overlooked. It is by no means necessary, as Mr. Porter thinks (Handbook of S. & P. i. 339), that he should have started from Beer-sheba (see Gen. xxii. 34 — "the whole land being before him," c. xx. 15). Then, "on the morning of the third day, he would arrive in the plain of Sharon, exactly where the massive height of Gerizim is visible afar off" (Ibid p. 251), and from thence, with the mount always — — a From the top of Gerizim the traveller enjoys a prospect unique in the Holy Land. See it well described in Tristram's Land of Israel p. 101, 1st ed. B. in view, he would proceed to the exact "place which god had told him of" in all solemnity — for again, it is not necessary that he should have arried on the actual spot during the third day. All about the narrative, is that, from the time that it hove in sight, he and Isaac parted from the young men, and went on together alone.

The Samaritans, therefore, through whom the tradition of the true site of Gerizim has been preserved, are probably not wrong when they point out still — as they have done from time immemorial — Gerizim as the hill upon which Abraham's "faith was made perfect" and if it be observable that no such spot is attested to be shown on the rival hill of Jerusalem, as distinct from Calvary. Different reasons in all probability caused these two localities to be so named: the first, not a mountain, but a land, district, or plain (for it is not intended to be asserted that Gerizim itself ever bore the name of Moriah; though a certain spot upon it was ever afterwards to Abraham personally "Jehovah-Jireh"), called Moreh, or Moriah, from the noble vision of nature, and therefore of natural religion, that met the eye; the second, a small hill deriving its name from a special revelation or vision, as the express words of Scripture say, which took place
"by the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite":
(2 Chr. iii. 1; comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 16). If it be thought strange that a place once called by the "Father of the faith" Jehovah-Jireh, should have been merged by Moses, and ever afterwards, in a general name so different from it in sense and origin as Gerizim; it would be still more strange, that, if Mount Moriah of the book of Chronicles and Jehovah-Jireh were one and the same place, no sort of allusion should have been made by the inspired historian to the prime event which had caused it to be so called. True it is that Josephus, in more than one place, asserts that where Abraham offered, there the temple was afterwards built (Ant. i. 14, § 2, and vii. 14, § 9). Yet the same Josephus makes God bid Abraham go to the mountain — not the land — of Moriah; having omitted all mention of the plains of Morch in his account of the preceding narrative. Besides, in more than one place he shows that he bore no love to the Saoraritans (ibid. xii. 8, § 6, and xii. 5, § 5), St.
Jerome follows Josephus (Quod. in Gen. xxxii. 5. ed.
Migne), and his uncertainty that no such temple of Gerizim, what else could he have done? Besides it appears from the Ommaristicon (s. v.) that he considered the hill of Moreh (Judg. vii. 1) to be the same with Moriah. And who that is aware of the extravagance of the Rabbinian traditions respecting Mount Moriah can attach weight to any one of them? (Cumeaux, De Republ. Is. lib. ii.
12). Finally, the Christian tradition, which makes the site of Abraham's sacrifice to have been on Calvary, will derive countenance from neither Josephus nor St. Jerome, unless the sites of the Temple and of the Crucifixion are admitted to have been the same.
Another tradition of the Samaritans is far less trustworthy; namely, that Mount Gerizim was the spot where Melchisedech met Abraham — though there was a vast difference between what was neighborhood (Gen. xxxii. 18; Stab. S. o. P. p. 247 ff.). The first altar erected in the land of Abraham, and the first appearance of Jehovah to him in it, was in the plain of Moreh near Seirien (Deut. xii. 6); but the mountain overhanging that hym (assuming our view to be correct) had not yet been hallowed to him for the rest of his life by the decisive trial of his faith, which was made there subsequently. He can hardly therefore be supposed to have been gerizim from his road so far, which lay through the plain of Morch; and the Jordan again is likely that he would have found the king of Sodom so far away from his own territory (Gen. xiv. 17 ff.).
Lastly, the altar which Jacob built was not on Gerizim, as the Samaritans contend, though probably about its base, at the head of the plain between it and Edom, "in the parcel of a field which that patriarch purchased from the children of Hamor, and he spread his tent
(Gen. xxxiii. 18-20). Here was likewise his well
(John iv. 6); and the tomb of his son Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32), both of which are still shown; the former surmounted by the remains of a vaulted chamber, and with the ruins of a church hard by (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 283) the latter, with a "fruitful vine" trailing over its white-washed inclosure, and before it two dwarf pillars, hollowed out at the top to receive lamps, which are lighted every Friday or Mohammedan sabbath. There is, however, another Mohammedan monument claiming to be the said tomb (Stanley, S. o. P. p. 241, note).
The tradition (Robinson, ii. 283, note) that the twelve patriarchs were buried there likewise (it should have made them eleven without Joseph, or thirteen, including his two sons), probably depends upon Acts vii. 42; where, unless we are to suppose confusion in the narrative, ofad should be read for ‘Apad, which may well have been suggested to the copist from its recurrence, v. 17; while ofad
, from having already occurred, v. 15, might have been thought suspicious.
We now enter upon the second phase in the his-Tory of Gerizim. According to Josephus, a marriage contracted between Manasseh, brother of Judas, the then high-priest, and the daughter of Sanballat the Cuthian (comp. 2 K. xvii. 24), having created a great stir amongst the Jews, who had been strictly forbidden to contract alien marriages (Ezr.
ix. 2; Neh. xiii. 23) — Sanballat, in order to re-ceal his son-in-law to this unpopular alliance, obtained leave from Alexander the Great to build a temple upon Mount Gerizim, and to inaugurate a rival priesthood and altar there to those of Jerusalem (Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2-4, and for the harmonizing of paraphrase of the site of the temple and Mount Prideaux, "became the common refuge and asylum of the refractory Jews" (ibid. ; see also Joseph Ant. xi. 8, § 7), and for a time, at least, their temple seems to have been called by the name of a Greek deity (ibid. xi. 5, § 5). Hence one of the first acts of Hyrcanus, when the death of Antiochus Sidetes had set him free, was to erect Shechem, and then to destroy the temple upon Gerizim, after it had stood there 200 years (Ant. xiii. 9, § 1). But the destruction of their temple by no means ruined the rancour of the Samaritans. The road from Galilee to Judaea lay then, as now, through Samaria, skipping the foot of Gerizim (John iv. 4).
Here was a constant occasion for religious controversy and for outrage. How is it that Thou, being a Jew, aske to drink of the water of Samaria?" said the female to our Lord at the well of Jacob, where both parties would always be sure to meet. "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship?" . . . Subsequently we read of the depredations committed on that road.
upon a party of Galileans (Ant. xx. 6, § 1). The liberal attitude, first of the Saviour, and then of his disciples (Acts viii. 14), was thrown away upon all those who would not abandon their creed. And Gerizim continued to be the focus of outbreaks through successive centuries. One, under Pilate, while it led to their severe chastisement, procured the disgrace of that ill-starred magistrate, who had crucified Jesus, the king of the Jews," with impunity (Ant. xviii. 4, § 1). Another hostile gathering on the same spot caused a slaughter of 10,600 of them under Vespasian. It is remarkable that, in this instance, want of water is said to have made them easy victims; so that the delicious cold and pure spring on the summit of Gerizim must have failed before so great a multitude (B. J. iii. 7, § 32). At length their aggressions were directed against the Christians inhabiting Neapolis — now powerful, and under a bishop — in the reign of Zeno. Terebinthus at once carried the news of this outrage to Byzantium: the Samaritans were forcibly ejected from Gerizim, which was handed over to the Christians, and adorned with a church in honor of the Virgin; to some extent fortified, and even guarded. This not proving sufficient to repel the foe, Justinian built a second wall round the church, for which his historian says defied all attacks (Procop. De Aedif. v. 7). It is probably the ruins of these buildings which meet the eye of the modern traveller (Handb. of S. of P. ii. 339). Previously to this time, the Samaritans had been a numerous and important sect — sufficiently so, indeed, to be carefully distinguished from the Jews and Cœcilians in the Theodosian code. This last outrage led to their comparative disappearance from history, as a distinct race, after the 12th, 13th, and 17th centuries take notice of their existence, but extreme paucity (Early Travels, by Wright, pp. 81, 181, and 432), and their number now, as in those days, is said to be below 200 (Robinson, Bibb. Res. ii. 282, 2d ed.). We are confined by our subject to Gerizim, and therefore can only touch upon the Samaritans, or their city Neapolis, so far as their history connects directly with that of the mountain. And yet we must observe that it was undoubt- edly this mountain of which our Lord had said, "Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem (i. e. exclusively), worship the Father." (John iv. 21) — so likewise it is a singular historical fact, that the Samaritans have continued on this selfsame mountain century after century, with the briefest interruptions, to worship according to their ancient custom ever since to the present day. While the Jews — expelled from Jerusalem, and therefore no longer able to offer up bloody sacrifices according to the law of Moses — have been obliged to adapt their ceremonial to the circumstances of their destiny: here the Paschal Lamb has been offered up in all ages of the Christian era by a small but united nationality (the spot is accurately marked out by Dr. Robinson, Bibb. Res. ii. 277). Their copy of the Law, probably the work of Manasseh, and known to the fathers of the 2d and 3d centuries (Prideaux, Connect. i. 600; and Robinson, ii. 297—301), was, in the 17th, vindicated from oblivion by Seelig, Usher, Morris, and others: and no traveller now visits Palestine with out making a sight of it one of his prime objects Gerizim is likewise still to the Samaritans what Jerusalem is to the Jews, and Mecca to the Mohamnedans. Their prostrations are directed towards it wherever they are; its holiest spot in their estimation being the traditional site of the tabernacle, near that on which they believe Abraham to have offered his son. Both these spots are on the summit: and near them is still to be seen a mound of ashes, similar to the larger and more celebrated one N. of Jerusalem; collected, it is said, from the sacrifices of each successive age (Dr. Robinson, Bibb. Res. ii. 292 and 299, evidently did not see this on Gerizim). Into their more legendary traditions respecting Gerizim, and the story of their alleged worship of a dove,— due to the Jews, their enemies (Ireland, Dict. ap. Uplin. Thesaur. vii. pp. deexxi—xxxiii.), — it is needless to enter.

E. S. F.

* The theory that Gerizim is "the mountain on which Abraham was directed to offer his son Isaac," advocated by Dean Stanley (S. of P. p. 218) and controverted by Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 212), is brought forward by the writer of the above, on grounds which appear to us wholly unsustain-

(1.) The assumed identity of Moreh and Moriah cannot be admitted. There is a radical difference in their roots (Robinson's Gesen. Heb. Lex. a. v.), which is conceded by Stanley; and the reasoning about "the plains of Moreh, the land of vision," "called Moreh, or Moriah, from the noble vision of nature," etc., is irrelevant. Murphy (Com. in loc.) justly observes: "As the two names occur in the same document, and differ in form, they naturally denote different things."

(2) The distance of Gerizim from Beer-sheba is fatal to this hypothesis. The suggestion that Abraham need not have started from Beer-sheba, is gratuitous — the narrative fairly conveying the impression that he started from his residence, which was then at that place. [BEER-SHEBA.] From this point Jerusalem is three days, and Gerizim two days, and there is not a day's journey between them. It is possible that the journey could not have been completed, with a loaded ass, "on the third day;" and the route by which this writer, following Stanley, sends the party to Gerizim, is an unknown and improbable route.

(3) The suggestion of Mr. Froude above, and of Mr. Grose [MORIAH], that the patriarch only came in sight of the mountain on the third day, and had an infinite time for the rest of the journey, and the similar suggestion of Dr. Stanley, that after coming in sight of the mountain he had "half a day" for reaching it, are inadmissible. Acknowledging "that from the time it hove in sight, he and Isaac parted from the young men and went on together alone," these writers all overlook the fact that from this point the wood for the burnt-offering was laid upon Isaac. Thus far the needed materials had been carried by the servants and the ass. That the young man could bear the burden for a short distance alone, does not warrant the supposition that he could have borne it for a day's journey, or a half-day's — in which case it would seem that the donkey and servants might have been left at home. The company halted, apparently, not very far from the spot of the intended sacrifice.

(4.) The commanding position of Gerizim, with the wide prospect from its summit, is a necessary, though probable, element in the decision of the question. It was to the land of Moriah that the patriarch was directed, some one of the eminences of which, apparently not yet named, the Lord was to designate as his destination. In favor of Gerizim as an elevated site, Stanley lays stress upon the phrase, "lifted up his eyes," forgetting that this identical phrase had been applied (Gen. xiii. 10) to Lot's survey of the plain of the Jordan below him.

(5.) The Samaritan tradition is inadmissible. From the time that a rival temple to that on Moriah was erected on Gerizim, the Samaritans felt a natural desire to invest the spot with some of the sanctities of the earlier Jewish history. Their substitution of Moreh for Moriah (Gen. xvi. 2) in their version, is of the same character with this claim. Had this been the traditional site of the scene in question, Josephus would hardly have ventured, without some allusion to the claim for Jerusalem; and though sharing the prejudices of his countrymen, his general fairness as a historian forbids the intuition that he was capable of robbing this community of a cherished site, and transferring it to another. Moreover, the improbable theory that Gerizim, and not Jerusalem, was the scene of the meeting between Abraham and Melchisedec, which, though held by Prof. Stanley, Mr. Foulkes is compelled to reject, has the same authority of Samaritan tradition.

The objections to the Moriah of Jerusalem as the site in question, need not be considered here. The theory which claims that locality for this sacrificial scene, has its difficulties, which will be examined in their place. [MORAH, Amer. ed.] Whether that theory be accepted or rejected, the claims of Gerizim appear to us too slightly supported to entitle them to any weight in the discussion.

GERIZITES, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. [GERIZITES.]

GERRHENIANS, THE (גֶּרֶהְנִיאֶּנָּאָה: Gen. xlviii. 2; Gezer: Gezeren: od. Gezeren), named in 2 Mac. xiii. 24 only, as one limit of the district committed by Antiochus Epiphanes to the government of Judas Macacaulay, the other limit being Ptolemais (Achea). To judge by the similar expression in defining the extent of Simon's government in 1 Mac. xi. 59, the specification has reference to the sea-coast of Palestine, and, from the nature of the case, the Gerrhenians, wherever they were, must have been south of Ptolemais. Gerdus seems to have been the first to suggest that the town Gerishon or Gerha was intended, which lay between Ptolemais and Rhinocedon (Wady el Arish). But it has been pointed out by Ewald (Geschichte, iv. 365, note) that the coast as far north as the latter place was at that time possession of Egypt, and he thence conjectures that the inhabitants of the ancient city of Gere, S. E. of Gaza, the residence of Abraham and Isaac, are meant. In support of this Grimm (Vulg. Curs.) mentions that at least one MS. reads Γερασηαων, which would without difficulty be corrupted to Γερασηαων.

It seems to have been overlooked that the Syrian version (early, and entitled to much respect) has Gozor (גוזָר). By this may be intended either (a) the ancient Gezer, which was near the sea somewhere about Joppa; or (b) Gaza, which appears sometimes to take that form in these books. In the former case the government of Judas would contain half, in the latter the whole, of the coast of Palestine. The latter is most probably correct, as otherwise the important district of Idumaea, with the great fortress of Bethsura, would have been left unprovided for.

GERSHON (in the earlier books יָמִנָה) in ch. generally יָמִנָה. 1. (Papara: in Judg. iv. 16, [Vat. M. Paparoa, Vat. II] and Alex. Paparoa: Joseph. Paparoa: Gersam, Gersom.) The first-born son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex. ii. 22; xviii. 3). The name is explained in these passages as יָמִנָה (Ger shon) = a stranger there, in allusion to Moses' being a stranger in Midian—"for he said, I have been a stranger (Ger) in a foreign land." This signature is adopted by Josephus (Ant. ii. 13, § 1), and also by the LXX. in the form of the name which they give—Papaon; but according to Gesenius (Thes. p. 306 b), its true meaning, taking it as a Hebrew word, is "expulsion," from a root יָמִנָה, being only another form of Gershom (see also Fürst, Handbuch). The circumcision of Gershon is probably related in Ex. iv. 23. He does not appear again in the history in his own person, but he was the founder of a family of which more than one of the members are mentioned later. (a.) One of these was a remarkable person—"Jonathan the son of Gershon," the "young man the Levite," whom we first encounter on his way from Bethlehem-Judah to Micah's house at Mount Ephraim (Judg. xvii. 7), and who subsequently became the first priest to the irregular worship of the tribe of Dan (xviii. 30). The change of the name "Moses" in this passage, as it originally stood in the Hebrew text, to "Manasseh," as it now stands both in the text and the A. V., is explained under MANASSEH. (b.) But at least one of the other branches of the family preserved its allegiance to Jehovah, for when the courses of the Levites were settled by king David, "the sons of Moses the man of God" received honorable prominence, and SHIMEUEL chief of the sons of Gershon was appointed ruler (יָמִנָה) of the treasurers. (1 Chr. xxiii. 15-17; xxvi. 24-28.)

The form under which the name Gershon—the eldest son of Levi—is given in several passages of Chronicles, namely, 1 Chr. vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71; xv. 7. The Hebrew is almost alternately יָמִנָה and יָמִנָה; the LXX. adhere to their ordinary rendering of Gershom: [Rom.] Vat. POTHOS, Alex. Paparoa, [exc. vi. 43, Vat. POTHOS, and xv. 7, Alex. Paparoa, Vat. PA. Paparoa] Vulg. Gersom and Gersom.

3. (יָמִנָה: Paparoa, [Vat.] Alex. Paparoa: Gersom, the representative of the priestly family of Phineas, among those who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Exz. viii. 2). In Esdras the name is Gersom.

GERSHON (יָמִנָה: in Gen. Paphos, in other books uniformly Paphos; and so also Alex with three exceptions; Joseph. Ant. ii. 7, § 4 Paparoa: [Gersom]), the eldest of the three sons.

of Levi, born before the descent of Jacob's family into Egypt (Gen. xvi. 11; Ex. vi. 16). But though the eldest born, the families of Gershon were outstripped in fame by their younger brethren of Kohath, from whom sprang Moses and the priestly line of Aaron. a Gershon's sons were Libni and Shimi (Ex. vi. 17; Num. iii. 18, 21; 1 Chr. vi. 17), and their families were duly recognized in the reign of David, when the permanent arrangements for the service of Jehovah were made (1 Chr. xxiii. 7–11). At this time Gershon was represented by the famous Asaph "the seer," whose genealogy is given in 1 Chr. vi. 39–43, and also in part, 20, 21. The family is mentioned once again as taking part in the reforms of king Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12, where it should be observed that the sons of Asaph are reckoned as distinct from the Gershonites). At the census in the wilderness of Sinai the whole number of the males of the tribe Gershon was 7,900 (Num. iii. 22), midway between the Kohathites and the Merarites. At the same date the efficient men were 2,630 (iv. 40). On the occasion of the second census the numbers of the Levites are given only in gross (Num. xxvi. 62). The sons of Gershon had charge of the fabrics of the Tabernacle — the coverings, curtains, hangings, and cords (Num. iii. 25, 26; iv. 25, 29); for the transport ordered two covered wagons and four oxen (vii. 3, 7). In the encampment their station was behind (מזגנ) the Tabernacle, on the west side (Num. iii. 23). When on the march they went with the Merarites in the rear of the first body of the three tribes — Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, — with Reuben behind them. In the apportionment of the Levitical cities, thirteen fell to the lot of the Gershonites. These were in the northern tribes — two in Manasseh beyond Jordan; four in Issachar; four in Asher; and three in Naphtali. All of these are said to have possessed "suburbs," and two were cities of refuge (Josh. xxi. 27–53; 1 Chr. vi. 62, 71–76). It is not easy to see what special duties fell to the lot of the Gershonites in the service of the Tabernacle after its erection at Jerusalem, or in the Temple. The sons of Jeduthun "prophesied with a harp," and the sons of Heman "lifted up the horn," but for the sons of Asaph no instrument is mentioned (i Chr. xxv. 1–5). They were appointed to "prophesy" (that is, probably, to utter, or sing, inspired words), perhaps after the special prompting of David himself (xxv. 2). Others of the Gershonites, sons of Laadan, had charge of the "treasures of the house of God, and over the treasures of the holy things" (xxvi. 20–22), among which precious stones are specially named (xxix. 8). In the story the name is given, with two exceptions (1 Chr. vi. 1; xxiii. 6), given in the slightly different form of Gershom. [GERSHOM, 2.] See also GERSHONITES.

GERZITES, THE (גֶּרֶזְיִים), or (גֶּרֶזְיֵי),— (Ges. Thes. p. 301) — the Gizrite, or the Gerzite. Vat. omits, Alex. תְּמאָ יָהוּ: "Yahweh has blessed the tribe of Gad and of Asher (Judg. i. 39)." In our English versions the Gizrite, or the Amalekites, occupied the land between the south of Palestine and Egypt in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). They were rich in bedouin treasures "sheep, oxen, asses, camels, and apparel" (ver. 9; comp. xv. 3; 1 Chr. vi. 21). The name is not found in the text of the A. V. but only in the margin. This arises from its having been corrected by the Masorets (Keri) into Gizrites, which form (or rather Gizrites) our translators have adopted in the text. The change is supported by the Targum, and by the Alex. MS. of the LXX. as above. There is not, however, any apparent reason for relinquishing the older form of the name, the interest of which lies in its connection with that of Mount Gerizim. In the name of that ancient mountain we have the only remaining trace of the presence of this old tribe of Bedouins in central Palestine. They appear to have occupied it at a very early period, and to have relinquished it in company with the Amalekites, who also left their name attached to a mountain in the same locality (Judg. xii. 15), when they abandoned that rich district for the less fertile but freer South. Other tribes, as the Avvim and the Zemarites, also left traces of their presence in the names of towns of the central district (see pp. 201 a, 277, note b).

The connection between the Gerzites and Mount Gerizim appears to have been first suggested by Gesenius. [First accepts the same view.] It has been since adopted by Stanley (S. & F. p. 237, note). Gesenius interprets the name as "dwellers in the dry, barren country." [G.

GESEM, THE LAND OF (גֶּשֶׁמ), the Greek form of the Hebrew name GOSHEN (Jud. i. 9).

GESHAM (גֶּשֶׁמ), i. e. Geshan [filthy, Ges.]; סַרְגָּד, Alex. פָּרָגָא: "Farion," one of the sons of JAHDAI, in the genealogy of Judah and family of Caleb (1 Chr. ii. 47). Nothing further concerning him has been yet traced. The name, as it stands in our present Bibles, is a corruption of the A. V. of 1011, which has, accurately, GESHAN. Birington, usually very careful, has Geshah (Table xi. i. 280), but without giving any authority.

a corruption of the Hebrew המָלֶךְ . Simah (A. V. "of old . . . to Shear") or it may contain a mention of the name Telmim or Telain, a place in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 24), which bore a prominent part in a former attack on the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 4). In the latter case T has been read for T. (See Lenzgerke: Fürst's Handw. & c.)
GESHAN (1 Chr. ii. 47), the correct form of a name for which Geshan has been improperly substituted in modern editions of the A. V.

GE'SHEM, and GASH'MU (גֶּשֶם, גַּשְׁמוּ) (comp. Ge'shem, [Geshem], Ge'shum), an Arabian, mentioned in Neh. ii. 19, and vi. 1, 2, 6, who, with “Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobias, the servant, the Ammonite,” opposed Nehemiah in the repairing of Jerusalem. Geshem, we may conclude, was an inhabitant of Arabia Petraea, or of the Arabian Desert, and probably the chief of a tribe which, like most of the tribes on the eastern frontier of Palestine, was, in the time of the Captivity and the subsequent period, allied with the Persians or with any peoples threatening the Jewish nation. Geshem, like Sanballat and Tobias, seems to have been one of the “governors beyond the river,” to whom Nehemiah came, and whose mission “grieved them exceedingly, that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel” (Neh. ii. 19); for the wandering inhabitants of the frontier doubtless availed themselves largely, in their predatory excursions, of the distracted state of Palestine, and dreaded the re-establishment of the kingdom; and the Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites, are recorded as having been “conquered to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder” the repairing. The endeavors of these confederates and their failure are recorded in chapters ii., iv., and vi. The Arabic name corresponding to Geshem cannot easily be identified. Jasim (or Gásim, جاسم) is one of very remote antiquity; and Jashan (يان) is the name of an historical tribe of Arabia Proper; the latter may more probably be compared with it.

GE'SHUR (גָּשָׁרוּ, גָּשָׁרוּ; גֶּשֶר, גַּשְׁר), a bridge: [Ge'shur, ex. 2 Sam. iii. 3, Ge'sir, Vat. Ge'sir; 1 Chr. ii. 23, Alex. Ge'siwr, iii. 2, Ge'siwr; Ge'sur:] Arab. جسر, Aj'sur, a little principality in the northeastern corner of Bashan, adjoining the province of Argob (Dent. iii. 14), and the kingdom of Aram (Syria) in the A. V. (Isa. xxv. 8; comp. 1 Chr. ii. 23). It was within the boundary of the allotted territory of Manasseh, but its inhabitants were never expelled (Josh. xiii. 13; comp. 1 Chr. ii. 23). King David married “the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur” (2 Sam. iii. 3); and her son Absalom sought refuge among his maternal relations after the murder of his brother. The wild acts of Absalom’s life may have been to some extent the results of natural training; they were at least characteristic of the stock from which he sprung. He remained at “Geshur of Aram” until he was taken back to Jerusalem by David (2 Sam. xii. 37, xv. 8). It is highly probable that Geshur was a section of the wild and rugged region, now called el-Lejih, among whose rocky fastnesses the Geshurites might dwell in security while the whole surrounding plains were occupied by the Israelites. On the north the Lejih borders on the territory of Danassus, the ancient Aram; and in Scripture the name is so intimately connected with Bashan and Argob, that one is led to suppose it formed part of them (Dent. iii. 13, 14; 1 Chr. ii. 21, Josh. tii. 12, 13). [Aorob.] J. L. P.

The bridge over the Jordan above the sea of Galilee no doubt stands where one must have stood in ancient times. [Bridge, Amer. ed.] It may be, says Robinson (Phys. Geogr. p. 155), “that the adjacent district on the east of the Jordan took the name of Geshur (גַּשְׁר), as if Bridge-land;” at any rate Geshur and the Geshurites were in this vicinity.

GE'SHURI and GE'SHURITES (גָּשָׁרוּ, גֶּשְׁרִים): [Dent., Μαργαρης, Vat. Alex. -ςις; Comp. Ge'siwr; in Jos., Alex Ge'siwr; xii. 5, Perseus; xii. 2, 11, 15, Perseus; Vat. Ge'siwr; 1 Sam., Ge'siwr, Vat. -ςις; Alex. Ge'siwr; Ge'sur.] The inhabitants of Geshur, which see (Dent. iii. 14; Jos. xii. 5, xiii. 11).

GETH'ER (גֶּתֶר, גַּתֶר; [Alex. Γαθέρ]) Gether), the third, in order, of the sons of Aram (Gen. x. 23). No satisfactory trace of the people sprung from this stock has been found. The theories of Bochart and others, which rest on improbable etymologies, are without support; while the suggestions of Tarrans (Hieron.), Bactrians (Joseph. Ant.), and Geshum, גָּשָׁרוּ, (G. Dar.,) are not better founded. (See Bochart, Phyllog., ii. 10, and Winer, s. v.) Kalisch proposes Geshur; but he does not adduce any argument in its favor, except the similarity of sound, and the permutation of Aramaean and Hebrew letters.

The Arabs write the name غَطَر (Gathir); and, in the mythical history of their country, it is said that the probably aboriginal tribes of Thmoid, Taur, Jades, and Ad (the last, in the second generation, through 'Ood), were descended from Gathir (Cassim [de Perceval], Fawzi, i. 8, 9, 23; Abul-Fida, Hist. Antisl. 16). These traditions are in the highest degree untrustworthy; and, as we have stated in Arameh, the tribes referred to were, almost demonstrably, not of Semitic origin. See ARAM, ARAM, and ARABIA.

GETHSEMANE (גֶּתֶשְׁמֶנֶא, Gethsemane, a "wine-press," and גָּתֶם, "shaken," "oil," גֶּתֶשְׁמֶנָא; [so Tisch.; Lachm. Treg. -πεῖ], or more generally גֶּתֶשְׁמָנָא; a small "farm," as the French would say, "un bien mechant farme" (χειμπρόν: αυτόν), or as the Vulgate, villa; "A.V. a place;" Matt. xxvi. 36; Mark xiv. 32, situated across the brook Kidron (John xviii. 1), probably at the foot of Mount Olivet (Luke xxi. 39), to the N. W., and about 1 or ½ of a mile English from the walls of Jerusalem. There was a "garden," or rather orchard (κήπος), attached to it, to which the olive, fig, and pomegranate doubtless invited resort by their "hospitalitable shade." And we know from the Evangelists, Luke (xxii. 39) and John (xviii. 2), that our Lord ofttimes resorted thither with his disciples. "It was on the road to Bethany," says Mr. Greswell (Helv. Dia., xlix.), "and the family of Lazarus might have possessions there;" but, if so, it should have been rather on the S. side of the mountain where Bethany lies: part of which, in may be remarked, being the property of the village still, as it may well have been then, is even now called Bethany (el-Azariyeh) by the natives. Hence the expressions in S. Luke xxiv. 50 and Acts i. 12 are quite consistent. According to Josephus, the suburbs of Jerusalem abound with gardens and pleasure-grounds (παραθεραίοι, B. J. vi. 1, § 1; comp. v. 3, § 2) now, with the exception of those belonging to the Greek and Latin convents, hardly the vestige of a garden is to be seen. There is indeed a favorite paddock or close, half-a-mile or more to the north, on the same side of the continuation of the valley of the Kidron, the property of a wealthy Turk, where the Mohammedan holies pass the day with their families, their bright flowing costume forming a picturesque contrast to the stiff sombre foliage of the olive-grove beneath which they cluster. But Gethsemane has not come down to us as a scene of mirth; its inexhaustible associations are the offspring of a single event — the Agony of the Son of God on the evening preceding His Passion. Here emphatically, as Isaiah had foretold, and as the name imports, were fulfilled those dark words, "I have trodden the wine-press alone" (Is. iii. 3; comp. Rev. xiv. 20, "the winepress... without the city"). "The period of the year," proceeds Mr. Greswell, "was the Vernal Equinox: the day of the month about two days before the full of the moon — in which case the moon would not be now very far past her meridian; and the night would be enlightened until a late hour towards the morning" — the day of the week Thursday, or rather, according to the Jews, Friday — for the sun had set. The time, according to Mr. Greswell, would be the last watch of the night, between our 11 and 12 o'clock. Any recapitulation of the circumstances of that inedible event would be unnecessary; any comments upon it unseasonable. A modern garden, in which are eight venerable olive-trees, and a grotto to the north, detached from it, and in closer connection with the Church of the Sepulchre of the Virgin — in fact with the road to the summit of the mountain running between them, as it did also in the days of the Crusaders (Sanuti Secret. Fidel. Cruc. lib. iii. p. xiv. c. 9) — both securely inclosed, and under lock and key, are pointed out as making up the true Gethsemane. These may, or may not, be the spots which Eusebius, St. Jerome (Liber de Situ et Nomina]bus, s. v.), and Adamnarus mention as such; but from the 4th century downwards some such localities are spoken of as known, frequented, and even built upon. Every generation dwells most upon what accords most with its instincts and predilections. Accordingly the pilgrims of antiquity say nothing about those time-honored olive-trees, whose age the poetic minds of a Lamartine or a Stanley shrink from criticizing — they were doubtless not so imposing in the 6th century; still, had they been noticed, they would have afforded mutual witness to the locality — while, on the other hand, few modern travellers would inquire for, and adore, with Antoninus, the three precise spots where our Lord is said to have fallen upon His face. Against the contemporary antiquity of the olive trees, it has been urged that Titus cut down all the trees round about Jerusalem; and certainly this is no more than Josephus states in express terms (see particularly B. J. vi. 1, § 1, a passage which must have escaped Mr. Williams, Holy City, vol. ii. p. 437, M. ed., where only cries v. 3, § 2, and vi. 8, § 1). Besides the 10th legion, arriving from Jericho, were posted about the Mount of Olives (v. 2, § 3; and comp. vi. 2, § 8), and, in the course of the siege, a wall was carried along the valley of the Kidron to the fountain of Siloam (v. 2). The probability, therefore, would seem to be, that they were planted by Christian hands to mark the spot; unless, like the sacred olive of the Acropolis (Kühr ad Herod. viii. 55), they may have reproduced themselves. Mandrelli (Early Travels in Pal. by Wright, p. 471) and Parussinius (Elucid. T. S. lib. iv. per. c. ch. 7) appear to have been the first to notice them, not more than three centuries ago: the former arguing against, and the latter in favor of, their reputed antiquity: but nobody reading their accounts would imagine that there were then no more than eight, the locality of Gethsemane being supposed the same. Parallel claims, to be sure, are not wanting in the cedars of Lebanon, which are still visited with so much enthusiasm: in the beechen, or oak of Mavre, which was standing in the days of Constantine the Great, and even worshipped (Vales. ad Enos. Hist. Const. iii. 53), and the fig-tree (Ficus ilicifolia) near Nerbudda in India, which native historians assert to be 2,500 years old (Patterson's Journal of a Tour in Egypt, &c., p. 262, note). Still more appositely there were olive-trees near Linterum 250 years old, according to Flucci, in his time, which are recorded to have survived the middle of the tenth century (Venant. Dict. d'Hist. Nat. Paris, 1846, vol. xxx. p. 61).

* Gethsemane, which means "olive-press" (see above) is found according to the narrative in the proper place: for Oliveti, as the name imports, was famous for its olive-trees, still sufficiently numerous there to justify its being so called, though little cultivation of any sort appears now on that mount. The place is called also "a garden" (χώρα), but we are not by any means to transfer to that term our ideas of its meaning. It is to be remembered, as Stanley remarks (S. of P. p. 187, 1st ed.), that "Eastern gardens are not flower-gardens nor private gardens, but the orchards, vineyards, and fig-enclosures" near the towns. The low wall, covered with white stucco, which incloses the reputed Gethsemane, is comparatively modern. A series of rude pictures (utterly out of place there, where the memory and the heart are the only prompts required) are hung up along the face of the wall, representing different scenes in the history of Christ's passion, such as the scourging, the mockery of the soldiers, the sinking beneath the cross, and the like. The eight olive-trees here, though still verdant and productive, are so decayed as to require to be propped up with heaps of stones against their trunks in order to prevent their being blown down by the wind. Trees of this class are proverbially long-lived. Schubert, the celebrated naturalist, decides that those in Gethsemane are old enough to have flourished amid a race of contemporaries that perished long centuries ago (Reise in das Morgenland, ii. 521). Stanley also speaks of them as the most venerable of their race on the face of the earth . . . the most affecting of the sacred memorials in or about Jerusalem." (S. of P. p. 450, 1st ed.)

There are two or three indications in the Gospel history which may guide us as to the general situation of this ever memorable spot to which the Saviour repaired on the night of his betrayal. It is quite certain that Gethsemane was on the western slope of a little hill or spur of that mountain where it sinks down into the valley of the Kidron. When it is said that "Jesus went forth with his disciples beyond the brook Kidron, where was a garden" (John xviii. 1), it is implied that he did not go far up the Mount of Olives, but reached the place which he had in view soon after crossing the bed of that stream. The garden, it will be observed, is named in that passage with reference to the brook, and not the mountain. This result agrees also with the presumption from the Saviour's abrupt summons to his disciples recorded in Matt. xxvi. 46: "Arise, let us be going: see, he is at hand that doth betray me." The best explanation of this language is that his watchful eye, at that moment, caught sight of Judas and his accomplices, as they issued from one of the eastern gates, or turned round the northern or southern edges of the valley, in order to descend into the valley. The night, with the moon then near its full, and about the beginning of April, must have been clear, or if exceptionally dark, the torches (John xviii. 13) would have left no doubt as to the object of such a movement at that unsavory hour. It may be added that in this neighborhood also are still to be seen cedars and desert tombs into which his pursuers may have thought that he would endeavor to escape and conceal himself, and so came prepared with lights to follow him into these lurking-places.

The present enclosure known as Gethseman fulfills all these conditions: and so also, it may be claimed, would any other spot similarly situated across the brook, and along the western declivity in front of Jerusalem. Tischendorf (Reise in den Orient, i. 312) finds the traditional locality "in perfect harmony with all that we learn from the Evangelists." Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 284) thinks it should be sought "rather in a secluded vale several hundred yards to the northeast of the present Gethsemane." Robinson alleges no positive reasons against the common identification. "The authenticity of the sacred garden," says Williams (Holy City, ii. 437), "I choose rather to believe than to defend." But such differences of opinion as these involve an essential agreement. The original garden may have been more or less extensive than the present site, or have stood a few hundred rods further to the north or the south; but far, certainly, from that spot it need not be supposed to have been. We may sit down there, and read the narrative of what the Saviour endured for our redemption, and feel assured that we are near the place where he prayed, and longed for. Part of it may still, but little be done"; and while, "being in an agony, he sweated as it were great drops of blood, falling down to the ground." It is altogether probable that the disciples in going back to Jerusalem from Bethany after having seen the Lord taken up into heaven passed Gethsemane on the way. What new thoughts must have arisen in their minds, time of the Saccarine compound of Jerusalem, a p. 626. Since that period the Saviour receives half of the pata baskets of the temple as his tribute. (See Rammes, Palaeist. p. 309, 4th Aufl.) what deeper insight into the mystery of the agony must have flashed upon them, as they looked once more upon that scene of the sufferings and humiliation of the crucified and ascended One. H.

GEUEL (גְּיוַּל, Sam. גְּיוּל [God's ex- genital; Ges.]; Τούδηλα; [Vat. Τούδηλα; Gyle], son of Machi: ruler of the tribe of God, and its representative among the spies sent from the wilderness of Paran to explore the Promised Land (Num. xiii. 15).

GEZER (גְּזֶר, in pause גְּזֶר [deep place, precipice; Fürst, Ges.]: פַּאֶר; פַּאֶר [Alex. 1 K. ix. 15, 16], פַּאֶר; פַּאֶר; Josh. x. 34, Vat. פַּאֶר; 1 Chr. xiv. 16, 10, פַּאֶר פַּאֶר; Gezer; [Gezer, Gazar]), an ancient city of Canaan, whose king, Horan, or Eleam, coming to the assistance of Lachish, was killed with all his people by Joshua (Josh. x. 33; xii. 12). The town, however, is not said to have been destroyed; it formed one of the landmarks on the south boundary of Ephraim, between the lower Beth-horon and the Mediterranean (xvi. 3), the western limit of the tribe (1 Chr. vii. 28). It was allotted with its suburbs to the Kohathites Levites (Josh. xxi. 31; 1 Chr. vi. 67); but the original inhabitants were not dispossessed (Judg. i. 29); and even down to the reign of Solomon the Canaanites, or (according to the LXX. addition to Josh. xvi. 10) the Canaanites and Perizzites, were still dwelling there, and paying tribute to Israel (1 K. ix. 16). At this time it must in fact have been independent of Israelite rule, for Pharaoh had burnt it to the ground and killed its inhabitants, and then presented the site to his daughter, Solomon's queen. But it was immediately rebuilt by the king; and though not heard of again till after the Captivity, yet it played a somewhat prominent part in the later struggles of the nation.

[GAZERA.]

Ewald (Gezeh. iii. 280; comp. ii. 427) takes Gezer and Gezur to be the same, and sees in the destruction of the former by Pharaoh, and the simultaneous expedition of Solomon to Hamath-zophon, the neighborhood of the latter, indications of a revolt of the Canaanites, of whom the Gezurites formed the most powerful remnant, and whose attempt against the new monarch was thus frustrated. But this can hardly be supported.

In one place Gob is given as identical with Gezer (1 Chr. xx. 4, comp. 2 Sam. xvi. 15). The exact site of Gezer has not been discovered; but its general position is not difficult to infer. It must have been between the lower Beth-horon and the sea (Josh. xvi. 3; 1 K. ix. 17); therefore on the great maritime plain which lies beneath the hills of which Beth’er et-tahat is the last outpost, and forms the regular coast road of communication with Egypt (1 K. ix. 16). It is therefore appropriately named as the last point to which David's pursuit of the Philistines extended (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16); and as the scene of at least one sharp en a If Lochish be where Van de Velde and Porter would place it, at Um Libis, near Gaza, at least 40 miles from the southern boundary of Ephraim, there is some ground for suspecting the existence of two Gezers, and this is confirmed by the order in which it is mentioned in the list of Josh. xii. with Hebron, Ezion, and Debir. There is not, however, any means of determining this.

b In these two places the word, being at the end of a period, has, according to Hebrew custom, its first counter (1 Chr. xx. 4), this plain being their own peculiar territory (comp. Jos. Ant. vii. 8, § 1, Ταγαΰτης, της Παλαιστίνης χώρας ὑπάρχουσα) and as commanding the communication between Egypt and the new capital, Jerusalem, it was an important point for Solomon to fortify. By Eusebius it is mentioned as four miles north of Neco¬lis (Αμάριτης); a position exactly occupied by the important town Jinsa, the ancient Ginos, and corresponding well with the requirements of Joshua.

But this hardly agrees with the indications of the 1st book of Maccabees, which speak of it as between Emmonus (Anoeis) and Azotus and Jamaica; and again as on the confines of Azotus. In the neighborhood of the latter there is more than one site bearing the name Yasia; but whether this Arabic name can be derived from the Hebrew Gezer, and also whether so important a town as Gazar was in the time of the Maccabees can be represented by such insignificant villages as these, are questions to be determined by future investigation. If it can, then perhaps the strongest claims for identity with Gezer are put forward by a village called Yasia, 4 or 5 miles east of Joppa, on the road to Ramleh and Lydd.

From the occasional occurrence of the form Gazer, and from the LXX. version being almost uniformly Gazar or Gazer, Ewald infers that this was really the original name.

G.

GEZRITES, THE (גְּזֶרִים), occur. the Gize¬rites: [Vat. omits; Alex. τού Γεζηρούν; Gezri].

The word which the Jewish critics have substituted in the margin of the Bible for the ancient reading, "the Gerizzite" (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), and which has thus become incorporated in the text of the A. V.

If it mean anything — at least that we know — it must signify the dwellers in Gezer. But Gezer was not less than 50 miles distant from the "south of Judah, the south of the Jeraulmedites, and the south of the Kenites," the scene of David's inward flight; a fact which stands greatly in the way of our receiving the change. [GERIZITES, THE.]

GIAH (גִּיא, i.e. a vinear or giren; a view also taken in the Vulgate.

GIANTS. The frequent allusion to giants in Scripture, and the numerous theories and disputes which have arisen in consequence, render it necessary to give a brief view of some of the main curious and curious inferences to which the mention of them leads.

1. They are first spoken of in Gen. vi. 4, under the name Nephilim (גִּיאים נֵפִיל; LXX. γιγαντεῖς Aguil. ενοίητοιτειρες; Symm. θαυματίαν; Vulg. gigantes). The word was evidently lengthened, and stands in the text as Gazer and in these two places only the name is so transferred to the A. V.

But, to be consistent, the same change should have been made in several other passages, where it was used in the Hebrew (e.g. Josh. xvi. 3, 10; 1 K. ix. 15, &c. It would seem better to render [represent] the Hebrew name always by the same English one, when the difference arises from nothing but an euphuistic accept.
GIANTS

The word is derived either from מָרָכֶל (mārakel) or מַרְכֶּל (marcel) (= "marvellous"), or, as is generally believed, from מְרַכֶּל (mercāl), either in the sense to throw down, or to fall (= fallen angels, Jarchi, cf. Is. xiv. 12; Luke x. 18); or meaning "ἀθροιστεῖς" (Asgen.), or collapsi (by euphemism, Boettcher, de Inferiis, p. 92); but certainly not "because men fell from terror of them" (as R. Kimchi). That the word means "giants" is clear from Num. xiii. 32, 33, and is confirmed by מִרְכֶּל (mirakel), the Chaldee name for "the aery giant" (Orion (Joh. ix. 9, xxxviii. 31; Is. xiii. 10; Targ.), unless this name arise from the obliquity of the constellation (Gen. of Earth, p. 35).

But we now come to the remarkable conjectures about the origin of these Nephilim in Gen. vi. 1-4. (An immense amount has been written on this passage. See Kurz, Die Eben der Schöne Gottes, &c., Berlin, 1857; Ewald, Jahrb. 1854, p. 120; Goyett's Isaiah Ungültigst; Faber's Many Miseanc, in the Journal of Soc. Lit., Oct. 1858, &c.) We are told that "there were Nephilim in the earth," and that afterwards (kal met ἐκεῖνα, LXX.) the "sons of God" mingling with the beautiful "daughters of men" produced a race of violent and insolent Gibborim (גִּבְבוֹרִים). This latter word is also rendered by the LXX. γίγαντες, but we shall see hereafter that the meaning is more general. It is clear however that no statement is made that the Nephilim themselves sprang from this unhallowed union. Who then were they? Taking the usual derivation מָרָכֶל (marakel), and explaining it to mean "fallen spirits," the Nephilim seem to be identical with the "sons of God;" but the verse before us militates against this notion as much as against that which makes the Nephilim the same as the Gibborim, namely, the offspring of wicked marriages. This latter supposition can only be accepted if we admit (1) that there were two kinds of Nephilim, — those who existed before the unequal interourse, and those produced by it (Heidergerg, Hist Patr. xii.), or (2) by following the Vulgate rendering, postposter viti ingenii sunt, &c. But the common rendering seems to be correct, nor is there much probability in Alen Ezra's explanation, that מְרַכֶּל (mercāl) "(after that)" means מָרָכֶל (marakel) (in. c. "after the deluge"), and is an allusion to the Anakims. The genealogy of the Nephilim then, or at any rate of the earliest Nephilim, is not recorded in Scripture, and the name itself is so mysterious that we are lost in conjecture respecting them.

2. The sons of the marriages mentioned in Gen. vi. 1-4, are called Gibborim (גִּבְבוֹרִים), from מְרַכֶּל (mercāl) to be strong, a general name meaning powerful (ἀθρόισται καὶ παριστάν ὑπερταίραν καλος. Joseph. Ant. i. 3, § 1; γίγαντες τῶν ποιήματι καὶ βοηθασάντων τοῦ λαοῦ ἑαυτοῦ κ.τ.λ., Philo de Gigant., p. 270; comp. Is. ii. 2, xiii. 24; Ez. xxxii. 21). They were not necessarily giants in our sense of the word "Theodote, (Quest. 48.) Yet, as was natural, these powerful chieftains were almost universally represented as men of extraordinary stature. The LXX. render the word γίγαντες, and call Naino a γίγαντας (1 Chr. i. 10); Augustine calls them Stu-turati (de Civ. Dei, xv. 4); Chrysostom ὢμοιοι, Theodoret παριστάνεις (comp. Bar. iii 28, ἐν οὕτως, ἐπιστάμενος πάλαιος). But who were the parents of these giants; who are "the sons of God" (הוּנֵי הָבֵית הָאָדָם)? The opinions are various: (1) Men of power (vid. παριστάταινες, Symm., Hieron. Quest. Heb. ad loc.; מְרַכֶּל, Onk.; מִרְכֶּל, Samar.; so too Seiden, Versst. &c.). (2) Men with great gifts, "in the image of God" (Ritter, Schumann); (3) Giants arrogantly assuming the title (Paulus); or (4) the pious Sethites (comp. Gen. iv. 26; Maimon. Moth. II. i. 14; Said. ii. 29 and παριστάταινες. Cedren. Hist. Comp. p. 10; Ang. de Civ. Dei, xv. 27; Chrysost. Rom. 22, in Gen.; Theod. in Gen. Quest. 47; Cyril, c. 9, i. 9, &c.). A host of modern commentators catch at this explanation, but Gen. iv. 26 has probably no connection with the subject. Other texts quoted in favor of the view are Deut. iv. 1, 2; Ps. lxxiii. 15; Prov. xiv. 26; Hos. i. 10; Rom. viii. 14, &c. Still the mere antiquity in the verse, as well as other considerations, tend strongly against this gloss, which islet 1 is built on a foregone conclusion. Compare however the Indian notion of the two races of men Suras and Asuras (children of the sun and of the moon, North, Rom., and Rabbi, p. 284 ff.), and the Persian belief in the marriage of Djinshid with the sister of a erva, whence sprung black and impious men (Kalisch, Gen. p. 175). (5) Worshipers of false gods (παριστάται τῶν ἡθῶν, Apc.) making מְרַכֶּל = "servants" (comp. Deut. xiv. 1; Prov. xiv. 26; Ex. xxxii. 1; Deut. iv. 28, &c.). This view is ably supported in Genesis of Earth and Man, p. 39 f. (6.) Devils, such as the Inebul and Sincub li. Such was the belief of the Caballists (Yaleus, de S. Philoso., cap. 8). That these beings can have intercourse with women St. Augustine declares it would be folly to doubt, and it was the universal belief in the East. Mohammed makes one of the ancestors of Balsis Queen of Sheba a demon, and Damir says he heard a Mohammedan doctor openly boast of having married in succession four demon wives (Boechart, Hieroz. r. p. 747). Indeed the belief still exists (Iane's Mod. Egypt. i. ch. x. ad in.) (7) Closely allied to this is the oldest opinion, that they were angels (ἄγγελοι τῶν ἡθῶν, LXX.) for such was the old reading, nos eisioi. Ang. de Civ. Dei, xvi. 23; so too Joseph. Ant. i. 3, § 1; Phil. de Gigant, i. 358; Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 7, § 63; Sulp. Sever. Hist. Scriptur. in Orthod. i. i. &c.; comp. Job i. 6, ii. 11; Ps. xxxi. 1. Job iv. 18). The rare expression "sons of God" certainly means angels in Job xxxviii. 7, i. ii. 6, i. 11, and that such is the meaning in Gen. vi. 4 also, was the most prevalent opinion both in the Jewish and early Christian Church.

Thus this very ancient view which gave rise to the curious book of Enoch, and the notion quoted from it by St. Jude (iii. 6), and alluded to by St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 4; comp. 1 Cor. xi. 10 Tert. de Virg. Vel. 7). According to this book certain angels, sent by God to guard the earth (Ἐγγέφυτον, φύλακες), were perverted by the beauty of women, "went after strange flesh," taught sorcery, finery (lumina Irphillollon, ciréus ex àure, Tert., etc.), and being banished from heaven had sons 3,000 edious high, thus originating a celestial and terrestrial race of demons — "Unde modo vagi subventur corpora multa" (Commendini Instruct. III., Colus Theonum) s. c. they are still the sources of epilepsy, etc. Various names were given at a later time to these monsters. Their chief was Leuinx, and of their number were Machsael, Aza, Shamchozani, and (the wickedest of them) a goat-like demon Azael (comp. Azael. Lev. xvi. 8, and for the very curious questions connected with this name, see Bochart, Hieros. i. p. 652 ff.; Rab. Eliezer, cap. 22; Bersisheth Rab. ad Gen. vi. 2; Seunort, de Gigantibus, iii.).

Against this notion (which Hiëvernick calls "the slightest whim of the Alexandrine Gnostics and Caballistic Rabbis") Heidegger (Hist. Potr. l. c.) quotes Matt. xxii. 30; Luke xxiv. 39, and similar testimonies. Philastrius (Adv. Heres. cap. 108) characterizes it as a heresy, and Chrysostom (Hom. 22) even calls it το βδομάδριον εκείνο. Yet Jude is explicit, and the question is not so much what can be, as what we believe. The fathers almost unanimously accepted these fables, and Tertullian argues warily (partly on expedient grounds!) for the genuineness of the book of Enoch. The angels were called Εγγέφυτον, a word used by Aquil.

and Symm. to render the Chaldee יֵלֵל (Dan. iv. 13 ff.; Vulg. Vjpi1: LXX. eτρ: Lex. Cyrril. ἡγεῖιων ἡ ἄγγελος; Fabric. Cod. Pseudap. p. 180), and therefore used, as in the Zend-Avesta, of good guardian angels, and applied especially to archangels in the Syriac liturgies (cf. יֵלֵל, Is. xxii. 11), but more often of evil angels (Castelli Leg. Syr. p. 469; Scalig. ad Enseb. Chron. p. 403; Gesen. s. v. יֵלֵל). The story of the Egregori is given at length in Tert. de Car. Fem. i. 2, ii. 10; Commodianus, Instruct. iii.; Lactant. Divit. Inst. ii. 14; Tertull. Patriarch. [Raben.], c. v., etc. Every one will remember the allusions to the same interpretation in Milton, Par. Reg. ii. 179 —

"Before the Flood, thou with thy lusty crew, False-titled sons of God, roaming the earth, Cast wanton eyes on the daughters of men, And coupled with them, and begat a race."

The use made of the legend in some modern poems cannot sufficiently be reprobat ed.

We need hardly say how closely allied this is to the Greek legends which connected the θυρεία φύλα γιγαντών with the gods (Hom. Od. vii. 203; I'au sau. viii. 23), and made δαίμωνες sons of the gods (Plat. Apolog. θυρείαν; Cratyl. § 32). Indeed the whole heathen tradition resembles the one before us (Cumberland’s Sanchonatho, p. 24; Hom. Od. vii. 306 ff.; Xen. Thesprot. 185, Opp. et D. 144; Plut. Rep. ii. § 17, p. 804 B; de Legg. iii. § 16, p. 805 A; Or. Medam. l. 151; Luc. iv. 593; Lucian, de Dea Syr., etc.; cf. Grot. de Ver. i. 6); and the Greek translators of the Bible make the resemblance still more close by introducing such words as δεο defending, γηγενεαι, and even Τιτανει, to which last Josephus (l. c.) expressly compares the giants of Genesis (LXX. Prov. ii. 18; Ps. xlviii. 2 (xlii. 2); 2 Sam. v. 18; Judith xvi. 7). The fate too of these demon-chiefs is identical with that of heathen story (Job xxvi. 5; Ecclus. xvi. 7; Bar. iii. 26-28; Wisd. xiv. 6; 3 Macc. ii. 4; 1 Pet. iii. 19).

These legends may therefore be regarded as distortions of the Biblical narrative, handed down by tradition, and embellished by the fancy and imagination of eastern nations. The belief of the Jews in later times is remarkably illustrated by the story of Asmodeus in the famous Lel Tobih. It is deeply instructive to observe how wide and marked a contrast there is between the incidental allusion of the sacred narrative (Gen. vi. 4), and the minute frivolities or profane follies which degrade the heathen mythology, and repeatedly appear in the groundless imaginations of the Rabbinic interpreters. If there were fallen angels whose lawless desires gave birth to a monstrous progeny, both they and their nefarious offspring were destroyed by the deluge, which was the retribution on their wickedness, and they have no existence in the baptized and regenerated earth.

Before passing to the other giant-races we may observe that all nations have had a dim fancy that the aborigines who preceded them, and the earliest men generally, were of immense stature. Berosus says that the ten antediluvian kings of Chaldea were giants, and we find in all monarchical traditions a similar statement about the earliest possessors of Britain (comp. Hom. Od. x. 119; Aug. de Civ. Dei, xv. 9; I'n. vii. 16; Varr. op. Ant. Gell. iii. 10; Jer. on Matt. xxvi. 3-5). The great size decreased gradually after the deluge (2 Esdr. v. 52-55). That we are dwarfs compared to our ancestors was a common belief among the Latin and Greek poets (II. v. 302 ff.; Luceret. ii. 115; Virg. An. xii. 100); Jude (v. 8, 9), although it is now a matter of absolute certainty from the remains of antiquity, reaching back to the very earliest times, that in old days men were no taller than ourselves. On the origin of the mistaken supposition there are curious passages in Natalis Comes (Mythology, vi. 21), and Macrobius (Saturn. i. 20).

9. THE REPHAIM, a name which frequently occurs, and in some remarkable passages. The earliest mention of them is the record of their defeat by Chedorlaomer and some allied kings at Ashtoroth Karmim (Gen. xiv. 5). They are again mentioned (Gen. xv. 20), their dispersion recorded (Deut. ii. 10, 20), and Og the giant king of Bashan said to be "the only remnant of them" (Deut. iii. 11; Jos. xii. 4, xiii. 12, xvii. 15). Exterminated, however, from the east of Palestine, they long found a home in the west, and in connection with the Philistines, under whose protection the small remnant of them may have lived, they still employed their arms against the Hebrews (2 Sam. xxi. 18 ff.; 1 Chr. xx. 4). In the latter passage there seems however to be some confusion between the Rephaim and the sons of a particular giant of Gath, named Rapha. Such a name may have been conjectured as that of a founder of the race, like the names Ion, Dorus, Teut, etc. (Boettcher, de Inferia, p. 96, n; Rapha occurs also as a proper name, 1 Chr. vii. 25, vii. 37). It is probable that they had possessed districts west of the Jordan in early times, since the "Valley of Rephaim" (κοιλάδα τῶν Τιτάνων), 2 Sam. v. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 15; Is. xii. 5; κ. τῶν γιγαντῶν, Joseph. Ant. vii. 4, § 1), a rich valley S. W. of Jerusalem, derived its name from them.

That they were not Canaanites is clear from GIANTS

There being no allusion to them in Gen. x. 16-19, they were probably one of those aboriginal people to whose existence the traditions of many nations testify, and of whose genealogy the Bible gives us no information. The few names recorded have, as Ewald remarks, a Semitic aspect (tischach, des Volkes Isr. i. 311), but from the hatred existing between them and both the Canaanites and Hebrews, some suppose them to be Japheticites, "who comprised especially the inhabitants of the coasts and islands." (Kahleian. Gen. p. 531).

Is. lixxvii. 14; Is. xxvi. 14, where it is confused with רוגץ; cf. Gen. i. 2, and sometimes רוגץ, רוגץ, especially in the later versions. In A. V. the words used for it are "Rephaim," "giants," and "the dead." That it has the latter meaning in many passages is certain (Ps. lixviii. 10; Prov. i. 18, ix. 18, xxi. 10; Is. xxvi. 19, 14). [Dead, The, Amer. ed.] The question arises, how are these meanings to be reconciled? Genesius gives no derivation for the national name, and derives רוגץ = mortai, from רוגץ, smarit, and the proper name Rapha from an Arabic root signifying "a tall," thus seeming to sever all connection between the meanings of the word, which is surely most unlikely. Musius, Simonis, &c., suppose the second meaning to come from the fact that both spectres and giants strike terror (accepting the derivation from רוגץ, remisit, "unstrung with fear." R. Dechai on Deut. ii. 3; Vitringa and Hiller from the notion of length involved in stretching out a corpse, or from the fancy that spirits appear in more than human size (Hiller, Synonyma, Hesper. p. 205; Virg. Aen. ii. 772, &c.). J. D. Michaelis (ad loc. Thuc. ii. p. 466) endeavored to prove that the Rephaim, &c., were Troglytotes, and that hence they came to be identified with the dead. Passing over other conjectures, Boettcher sees in רוגץ and רוגץ a double root, and thinks that the giants were called רוגץ (bangamfoci) by an empeirion; and that the dead were so called by a title which will thus exactly parallel the Greek καυμάτες, καυμάτες (comp. Böttmann, Lex. ii. 257 ff.). His arguments are too elaborate to quote, but see Boettcher, pp. 94-100. An attentionive consideration seems to leave little room for doubt that the dead were called Rephaim (as Genesius also hints) from some notion of Sheol being the residence of the fallen spirits or buried giants. The passages which seem most strongly to prove this are Prov. xxvi. 16 (where obviously something more than mere physical death is meant, since that is the common lot of all); Is. xxvi. 14, 19, which are difficult to explain without some such supposition; Is. xiv. 9, where the word רוגץ (ai ἐνζεκαὶ τῆς γῆς, I.N.X.) if taken in its literal meaning of "giant," may mean evil spirits represented in that form (cf. Lev. xvii. 7); and especially in xxvi. 6, "Behold the giants (A. V. 'dead things') grown under the waters" (Dooyan version), where there seems to be clear allusion to some subaquatic prison of rebellious spirits like that (according to the Hindoo legend) Vishnu the water-god confuses a race of giants (cf. וּדוֹאָדוֹחֵי, as a title of Neptune, with the Roman Neptunus), which the Bible calls הים, here "giants," and "dead." The word "giants," "dead," or "the dead." (accepting the derivation from רוגץ, remisit, "unstrung with fear." R. GIANTS

Geese, however (misled by supposed relics) thought otherwise (Joseph. Ant. v. x. 1. § 3). No one has yet proved by experience the possibility of giant races, materially exceeding in size the average height of man. There is no great variation in the ordinary standard. The most stunted tribes of Esquimaux are at least four feet high, and the tallest races of America (e. g. the Guayaquilts and people of Paraguay) do not exceed six feet and a half. It was long thought that the Patagonians were men of enormous stature, and the assertions of the old voyagers on the point were positive. For instance Pizafetta (Voyage Round the World, Pinkerton. xi. 314) mentions an individual Patagonian so tall, that they "hardly reached to his waist." Similar exaggerations are found in the Voyages of Byron, Wallis, Carteret, Cook, and Forster; but it is now a matter of certainty from the recent visits to Patagonia (by Winter, Capt. Snow, and others), that there is nothing at all extraordinary in their size.

The general belief (until very recent times) in the existence of fabulously enormous men, arose from fancied giant-graves (see De la Vallee's Travels in Persia, ii. 90), and above all from the discovery of huge bones, which were taken for those of men, in days when comparative anatomy was unknown. Even the ancient Jews were thus misled (Joseph. Ant. vii. 10. § 8). Augustus appeals triumphantly to this argument, and mentions a molar tooth which he had seen at Utica a hundred times larger than ordinary teeth (De Civ. Dei, xv. 9). No doubt it once belonged to an elephant. Vives, in his commentary on the place, mentions a tooth as big as a fist, which was shown at St. Christopher's. In fact this source of delusion has only very recently been dispelled (Sennert. De Gigant. passim; Martin's West. Isabel. in Pinkerton, ii. 891). Most bones, which have been exhibited, have turned out to be long to whales or elephants, as was the case with the vertebra of a supposed giant, examined by Sir Hans Sloane in Oxfordshire.

On the other hand, isolated instances of monstrosity are sufficiently attested to prove that beings like Goliath and his kinsmen may have existed. Columnella (R. R. iii. 8, § 2) mentions Navius Pollio as one of the Gauls, and Pliny says that in the time of Claudius Caesar there was an Arab named Gabbaras nearly ten feet high, and that even he was not so tall as Fusio and Secundilla in the reign of Augustus, whose bodies were preserved (vii. 16). Josephus tells us that, among other hostages, Artabanus sent to Tiberius a certain Eleazar, a Jew, surmounted "the Giant," seven cubits in height (Ant. xviii. 4, 5, 5). Nor are well-authenticated instances wanting in modern times. O'Brien, whose skeleton is preserved in the Museum of the College of Surgeons, must have been 8 feet high, but his unnatural height made him weakly. On the other hand the blacksmith Parsons, in Charles II.'s reign, was 7 feet 2 inches high, and also remarkable for his strength (Fuller's Worthies, Staffordshire).

There are also monographs by Cassianon, Sanguetilli, and Senment; we have only met with the latter (Dissert. Hist. Phil. de Gigantibus, Vittenberg 1603); it is interesting and learned, but extraordinarily erudite. F. W. F.

GIBBAR (גּיִבְיָא [hero, or high, gigantic]; גּיִבְרֶל [Vat. Teseb; Gebbar]). Bene-Gibbar, to the number of ninety-five, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 20). In the parallel list of Neh. vii. the name is given GIBEZON.

GIB'ETHON (גּיִבְיָא [eminence, hill]; in Josh., גּיִבְרֶל [Vat. Teseb; Gebbar]). Geb'ethon, a town allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), and afterwards given with its "suburbs" to the Kohathite Levites (xxii. 33). Being, like most of the towns of Dan, either in or close to the Philistines' country, it was no doubt soon taken possession of by them; at any rate they held it in the early days of the monarchy of Israel, when king Nadab "and all Israel," and after him Omri, besieged it (1 K. xvi. 27; xvi. 17). What were the special advantages of situation or otherwise which rendered it so desirable as a possession for Israel are not apparent. In the Omo-nonticon (Gabathon) it is quoted as a small village (טלמה) called Gebel, in the 17th mile from Cesarea. This would place it nearly due west of Cimmaria, and about the same distance therefrom. No name at all resembling it has, however, been discovered in that direction.

GIB'EA (גּיִבְיָא [hill-inhabitant, Frurst; hill, Gesen.]; גּיִבְרֶל [Vat. Teseb; Gebbar]). Sheva, "the father of Macebeaen," and "father of Gibea," is mentioned with other names unmistakably those of places and not persons, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 49, comp. 42). [FATHER.] This would seem to point out Gibeah (which in some Hebrew MSS. is Gilbe; see Bunting, i. 216) as the city Gibeah in Judah. The mention of Madmannah (49, comp. Josh. xv. 31), as well as of Ziph (42) and Maon (45), seems to carry us to a locality considerably south of Hebron. [GIBRAH, 1.] On the other hand Madmannah recalls Madmenah, a town named in connection with Gibeah of Benjamin (Is. x. 31), and therefore lying somewhere north of Jerusalem.

GIB'EAH (גּיִבְיָא), derived, according to Genius (Thes. pp. 259, 260), from a root, גּיִבְיָא, signifying to be round or humped; comp. the Latin gibbus, English gibbons; the Arabic جبّ, jabal, a mountain, and the German gipfel. A word employed in the Bible to denote a "hill" — that is, an eminence of less considerable height and extent than a "mountain," the term for which is גּיִבְיָא, har. For the distinction between the two terms, see Ps. cxlviii. 9; Prov. viii. 25; Is. ii. 2, xl. 4, &c. In the historical books gibon is commonly applied to the bald rounded hills of central Palestine, especially in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (Stanley, App. § 25). Like most words of this kind it gave its name to several towns and places in Palestine.
which would doubtless be generally on or near a

1. Gibeah (Gaḇāḏ: Gabah), a city in the mountain-district of Judah, named with Maon and the southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 57; and comp. 1 Ch. ii. 49, &c.). In the Osmomastion a village generated Gabatha is mentioned as containing the monument of Halakuk, the prophet, and lying twelve miles from Elenthropolis. The direction, however, is not stated. Possibly it was identical with Keilah, which is given as eastward from Elen-thropolis (Eusebius says seventeen, Jerome eight miles) on the road to Hebron, and is also mentioned as containing the monument of Halakuk. But neither of these can be the place intended in Joshua, since that would appear to have been to the S. E. of Hebron, near where Carmel and Maon are still existing. For the same reason this Gibeah cannot be that discovered by Robinson as Jebel' in the Wady Musa'er, not far west of Bethlehem, and ten miles north of Hebron (Rob. ii. 6, 16). Its site is therefore yet to seek.

2. Gib'eath (יוֹבֵית; Gaḇāḇāḇ; Alex. Taḇāḇāḇ: Gababah). This is enumerated among the last group of the towns of Benjamin, next to Jerusalem (Josh. xvii. 28). It is generally taken to be the place which afterwards became so notorious as a "Gibeah-of-Benjamin" or "of-Saul." But this, as we shall presently see, was five or six miles north of Jerusalem, close to Gibon and Ramah, with which, in that case, it would have been mentioned in ver. 25. The name being in the "construct state,"—Gibeah and not Gibeth,—may it not belong to the following name, Kirjath (i. e. Kirjath-jeirim, as some MSS. actually read), and denote the hill adjoined that town (see below, No. 3)? The obvious objection to this proposal is the statement of the number of this group of towns as fourteen, but this is not a serious objection, as in these catalogues discrepancies not unfrequently occur between the numbers of the towns, and that stated as the sum of the enumeration (comp. Josh. xv. 32, 36; xix. 6, &c.). In this very list there is reason to believe that Zelah and Ha-Keleph are not separate names, but one. The lists of Joshua, though in the main coeval with the division of the country, must have been often added to and altered before they became finally fixed as we now possess them, and the singularity conformed on the "hill of Kirjath" by the temporary sojourn of the Ark there in the time of Saul would have secured its insertion among the lists of the towns of the tribe.

3. (יוֹבֵית; Gaḇāḇāḇ; Alex. Gaḇāḇāḇīn; in Gabah), the place in which the Ark remained from the time of its return by the Philistines till its removal by David (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; comp. 1 a For instance, Beth-maraboth, "house of charcoal," which in the village of Gabah (Josh.

xix. 5) would seem to date from the time of Solomon, when the traffic in these articles began with Egypt.

b יִבְיָד, A. V. "meadows of Gibeah," taking the word [after the Targum and R. Kimchi as Maḇaroth, an open field (Stanley, App. § 19); the LXX. (Rom. Var.)
transfers the Hebrew word literally, Maḇaraphi; 1 MSS.
read Maḇaḵ Pāḇən or Pāḇən; but Comp. Aid., with Alex. and about 15 other MSS., add ʼeḇāḇāḇ or ʼeḇāḇāḇ Pāḇən; the Syriac has ʼeḇāḇāḇ = cave. The Hebrew word for cave, Meḇāḇ, differs from that adopted in the A. V. only in the vowel-points; and

Sam. vii. 1, 2). The name has the definite article, and in 1 Sam. vii. 1 [as here in the margin of the A. V.] it is translated "the hill." (See No. 2 above.)

4. Gib'eaḥ-of-Benjamin. This town does not appear in the lists of the cities of Benjamin in Josh. xvii. (1.) We first encounter it in the tragi-comic story of the Levite and his concubine, when it brought all but extermination on the tribe (Judg. xix., xx.). It was then a "city" (יוֹבֵית) with the usual open street (יוֹבֵית) or square (Judg. xix. 15 17, 20), and containing 700 "chosen men" (xx.
15), probably the same whose skill as slingers is preserved in the next verse. Thanks to the precision of the narrative, we can gather some general knowledge of the position of Gibeah. The Levite
—when the day was coming near the time at which the tents would be pitched for evening. It was probably between two and three o'clock.
At the ordinary speed of eastern travellers they would come "over against Jebus" in two hours, say by five o'clock, and the same length of time would take them an equal distance, or about four miles, to the north of the city on the Nobthis road, in the direction of Mount Ephraim (xix. 13, comp. 1).
Ramah and Gibeah both lay in sight of the road, Gibeah apparently the nearest; and when the sudden onset of that climate, accompanied by more than a very brief twilight, made further progress impossible, they "turned aside" from the beaten track to the town where one of the party was to meet a dreadful death (Judg. xix. 9-15). Later indications of the story seem to show that a little north of the town the main track divided into two —one, the present Nobhas road, leading up to Bethel, the "house of God," and the other taking to Gibeah-in-the-field (xx. 31), possibly the present Jebus. Below the city, probably,—about the base of the hill which gave its name to the town, —was the cave of Gibeah," in which the liers in wait concealed themselves until the signal was given c (xx. 33).

During this narrative the name is given simply as Gibeah," with a few exceptions; at its introduction it is called "Gibeah which belongeth to Benjamin" (xix. 14, and so in xx. 4). In xx. 10 we have the expression "Gibeah of Benjamin," but here the Hebrew is not Gibeah, but Gela—יוֹבֵית.
The same form of the word is found in xx. 38, where the meadows, or cave, "of Gibeah," should be "of Gela."

In many of the above particulars Gibeah agrees very closely with Tuleth el-Fal" [hill of beans], a conspicuous eminence just four miles north of there seems a certain consistency in an ambush con-celring themselves in a cave, which in an open field would be impossible.

* Herodotus (Book of the Rhetor. c, 323) objects to the meaning "cave" that the liers-in-wait are said (vers. 29) to have been set "round about Gibeah." He undoubtedly at least part of vers. 33 to mean that the men of Israel came forth from their ambush ere the town of Gibea, in order to expel the men of the Benjamites (xx. 31, 32). Butcher, Trenchard and others give nearly the same interpretation, rendering the last clause of the verse "post demotionem Gibaeonem.

A e Josephus, Ant. v. 2, § 11.
Jerusalem to the right of the road. Two miles beyond it and full in view is er-Ram, in all probability the ancient Ramah, and between the two the main road divides, one branch going off to the right to the village of Jebn, while the other continues its course upwards to Bethin, the modern representative of Bethel. (See No. 5 below.)

(2.) We next meet with Gibeah of Benjamin during the Philistine wars of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. xiii., xiv.). It now bears its full title. The position of matters seems to have been this: The Philistines were in possession of the village of Gela, the present Jebn on the south side of the Wady Saqeinath. In their front, across the wady, which is here about a mile wide, and divided by several swells lower than the side Eminences, was Saul in the town of Michmash, the modern Mahkemas, and holding also "Mount Bethel," that is, the heights on the north of the great wady — Deir Dircën, Barba, Tell el-Hajar, as far as Beth'in itself. South of the Philistine camp, and about three miles in its rear, was Jonathan, in Gibeah-of-Benjamin, with a thousand chosen warriors (xiii. 2).

The Philistines, in order to dislodge the Philistines from Gela, by a feat of arms which at once procured him an immense reputation. But in the meantime it increased the difficulties of Israel, for the Philistines (hearing of their reverse) gathered in prodigious strength, and advancing with an enormous armament, pushed Saul's little force before them out of Bethel and Michmash, and down the eastern passes, to Gilgal, near Jericho in the Jordan valley (xiv. 3, 7). They then established themselves at Michmash, formerly the headquarters of Saul, and from thence sent out their bands of plunderers, north, west, and east (vv. 17, 18). But nothing could dislodge Jonathan from his main stronghold in the south. As far as we can disentangle the complexities of the story, he soon relinquished Gela, and consolidated his little force in Gibeah, where he was joined by his father, with Samuel the prophet, and Ahiah the priest, who, perhaps remembering the former fate of the Ark, had brought down the sacred Ephod 8 from Shiloh. These three had made their way up from Gilgal, with a force sorely diminished by desertion to the Philistine camp (xiv. 21), and flight (xiii. 7) — a mere remnant (καταλειμμα) of the people following in the rear of the little band (LXX.). Then occurred the feat of the hero and his armor-bearer. In the stillness and darkness of the night they descended the hill of Gibeah, crossed the intervening country to the steep terraced slope of Jebn, and threading the mazes of the ravine below, climbed the opposite hill, and discovered themselves to the garrison of the Philistines just as the day was breaking. 5

No one had been aware of their departure, but it was not long unknown. Saul's watchmen at Tuleil el-Fel were straining their eyes to catch a glimpse in the early morning of the position of the foe; and as the first rays of the rising sun on their light broke over the mountains of Gilgal, and glit-

1 Sam. xiv. 3. In ver. 18 the ark is said to have been at Gibeah; but this is in direct contradiction to the statement of vii. 1, compared with 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4, and 1 Chr. xiii. 1; also to those of the LXX. and Josephus at this place. The Hebrew words for ark and uoph — יִסְכִּית and יְסָכִית — are very similar, and may have been mistaken for one another (Kwald, Griech. in 46. note; Stanley, p. 360).

a They were this to Josephus: ὠφρασιοῦν ἡς τῆς ἤμερας (Ant. vi. 6, § 3).

b This is their inference from the fact that the wives of 400 out of the 600 Benjamites who escaped the massacre at Gibeah came from Jabesh-Gilead (Judg. xxi. 12).

c The word in this verse rendered "hill" is not gibeah but law, i.e. "mountain," a singular change and not quite intelligible.

gives his route as though Samaria to Gophna, thence a day's march to a valley "called by the Jews the Valley of Thornes, near a certain village called Galathiasoule, distant from Jerusalem about thirty stadia," i.e. just the distance of Tushel el-Ful. Here he was joined by a part of his army from Emmaus (Nicopolis), who would naturally come up the road by Bethoron and Gibeah, the same which still falls into the northern road close to Tushel el-Ful. In both these respects therefore the agreement is complete, and Gibeah of Benjamin must be taken as identical with Gibeah of Saul. The discovery is due to Dr. Robinson (i. 577-79), though it was partly suggested by a writer in Sted. und Kritiken.

This identification of Gibeah, as also that of Gela with Jebel, is fully supported by Is. x. 28-32, where we have a specification of the route of Nebuchadnezir from the north through the villages of the Benjaminite district to Jerusalem. Commencing with Ai, to the east of the present Bethin, the route proceeds by Makkina, across the "passages" of the Wady Surnint to Jeba on the opposite side; and then by er-Ran and Tushel el-Ful, villages actually on the present road, to the heights north of Jerusalem, from which the city is visible. Gallin, Mudnemah, and Gebim, none of which have been yet identified, must have been, like Anathoth (Annai) villages on one side or the other of the direct line of march. The only break in the chain is Migron, which is here placed between Ai and Michmeth, while in 1 Sam. xiv. 2 it appears to have been five or six miles south, at Gibeah. One explanation that presents itself is, that in that uneven and rocky district the name "Migron," "precipice," would very probably, like "Gibeah," be borne by more than one town.

In 1 Sam. xxii. 6, xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1, "Gibeah" [LXX. Gbouer]: Vulg. Gibeon: doubtless stands for G. of Saul.

6. GIBEAH-IN-THE-FIELD (רִבְּאֵה-אֶת הַגֶּדֶן): Gibeah en arypeh: [Alex. Γ. έν τω αραγώ: Gobna], named only in Judg. xx. 31, as the place to which one of the "highways" (רַדְבַּל הָצֶה) led from Gibeah-of-Benjamin, "of which one went up to Bethel, and one to Gibeah-in-the-field." Such, "the word here rendered "field," is applied specially to cultivated ground, "as distinguished from town, desert, or garden" (Stanley, App. § 15). Cultivation was so general throughout this district, that the text affords no clue to the situation of the place. It is, however, remarkable that the north road from Jerusalem, shortly after passing Tushel el-Ful, separates into two branches, one running on to Betha (Bethel), and the other diverging to the right to Gela (Geba). The attack on Gibeah came from the north (comp. xx. 18, 19, and 26, in which "a house of God" is really Bethel), and therefore the divergence of the roads was north of the town. In the case of Gibeah-of-Benjamin we have seen that the two forms "Gela" and "Gibeah" appear to be convertible, the former for the latter. If the identification now proposed for Gibeah-in-the-field be correct, the case is here reversed, and "Gibeah" is put for "Gela."

The "meadows of Gala" (גָּלָה) [A. V. Gibeah: Judg. xx. 33] have no connection with the "field," the Hebrew words being entirely different. As stated above, the word rendered "meadows" is probably accurately "caves." [Geba, p. 877 n.]

7. There are several other names comroaded to Gibeah, which are given in a translated form in the A. V., probably from their appearing not to belong to towns. These are:—

(1.) The "hill of the foreskins" (Josh. v. 3) between the Jordan and Jericho; it derives its name from the circumcision which took place there, and seems afterwards to have received the name of Gilgal.

(2.) [Tushel el-Ful] in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xxx. 33). This may be the Jeba on the left of the Nobba road, half-way between Bethel and Shiloh; or the Jeba north of Nobba (Robb. ii. 265 note, 312). Both would be "in Mount Ephraim," but there is nothing in the text to fix the position of the place, while there is no lack of the name among the villages of central Palestine.

(3.) The "hill of Maron" (Judg. vii. 1).

(4.) The "hill of God" — Gibeah-ka-Eklim (1 Sam. x. 5); one of the places in the route of Saul, which is so difficult to trace. In verses 10 and 13, it is apparently called "the hill," and "the high place."

(5.) [Vulg. 1 Sam. xxvi. 3; Gobna Hocilla.] The "hill of Hachilah" (1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxvi. 1, 3).

(6.) The "hill of Ammah" (2 Sam. ii. 5).

GIB'EATH, Josh. xviii. 28. [Gibeath, 2.]

GIB'EATHITE, THE (רִיבְּאֵת הַתִּיָּשֶּׁר; Ῥιβάθητις; [Vat. fa. Ῥιβάθητις; Alex. Ριβάθητις; Giov. Zebulithes]), i.e. the native of Gibeah (1 Chr. xiii. 3); in this case Shamah, or "the Benjaminites," father of two Benjamites, "Saul's brethren," who joined David.

GIB'EON (רִיבְּאֵן), i.e. belonging to a hill: [Giboan: [Vat. 1 K. ix. 2, 3; Gibaon, Jer. xii. 12, 13; Joseph. Ριβανον; Gibbon], one of the four cities of the Hivites, the inhabitants of which made a league with Joshua (ix. 3-15), and thus escaped the fate of Jericho and Ai (comp. xi. 19). It appears, as might be inferred from its taking the initiative in this matter, to have been the largest of the four — a great city, like one of the royal cities — larger than Ai (x. 2). Its men too were all practiced warriors (Gibborim, "Gibborim"). Gibeon lay within the territory of Benjamin (xviii. 25), and with its "suburbs" was allotted to the priests (xvii. 17), of whom it became afterwards a principal station. Occasional notices of its existence occur in the historical books, which are examined more at length below; and after the Captivity we find the "men of Gibeon" returning with Zerubabel (Neh. vii. 25); in the list of Ezra the name is altered to Gilbar, and assisting Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 7). In the post-biblical times it was the scene of a victory by the Jews over the Roman troops under Cestius Galus, which offers in many respects a close parallel to that of Joshua over the Cananites (Jos. B. J. ii. 21). T. Stanley, S. P. 212.

The situation of Gibeon has fortunately been recovered with as great certainty as any ancient site in Palestine. The traveller who pursues the northern canal-road from Jerusalem, turning off to the left at Tulkil el-Ful (Gibeath) on that branch of it which leads westward to Jaffa, finds himself, after crossing one or two stony and barren ridges, in a district of a more open character. The hills are rounder and more isolated than those through which he has been passing, and rise in well-defined mameions from broad undulating valleys of tolerable extent and fertile soil. This is the central plateau of the country, the “land of Benjamin;” and these round hills are the Gibeaths, Gebas, Gibeons, and Ramahs, whose names occur so frequently in the records of this district. Retaining its ancient name almost intact, el-Jib stands on the northernmost of a couple of these mameions, just at the place where the road to the sea parts into two branches, the one by the lower level of the Wady Saleimân, the other by the heights of the Beth-horonos, to Gimzo, Lydda, and Joppa. The road passes at a short distance to the north of the base of the hill of el-Jib. The strata of the hills in this district lie much more horizontally than those further south. With the hills of Gibeon this is peculiarly the case, and it imports a remarkable precision to their appearance, especially when viewed from a height such as the neighboring eminence of Netly Smawil. The natural terraces are carried round the hill like contour lines; they are all dotted thick with olives and vines, and the ancient-looking houses are scattered over the flatlshop summit of the mound. On the east side of the hill is a copious spring which issues in a cave excavated in the limestone rock, so as to form a large reservoir. In the trees further down are the remains of a pool or tank of considerable size, probably, says Dr. Robinson, 120 feet by 100, i.e. of rather smaller dimensions than the lower pool at Hebron. This is doubtless the “pool of Gibeon” at which Abner and Joab met together with the troops of Ish-bosheth and David, and where that sharp conflict took place which ended in the death of Asahel and led at a later period to the treacherous murder of Abner himself. Here or at the spring were the “great waters (or the many waters, ṣāḥyôn ṣāḥyôn) of Gibeon,” a at which Johanan the son of Kareah found the traitor Ishmael (Jer. xlii. 12). Round this water also, according to the notice of Josephus (ἐν τοις παραλίασι τῆς ἱεροσολυμίας, Ant. v. 1, § 17), the five kings of the Amorites were encamped when Joshua burst upon them from Gilgal. The “wilderness of Gibeon” (2 Sam. ii. 24 — the Midbar, i.e. rather the waste pasture-grounds — must have been to the east, beyond the circle or suburb of cultivated fields, and towards the neighboring swells, which bear the names of Jedîrek and Biz Nebelakh. Such is the situation of Gibeon, fulfilling in position every requirement of the notices of the Bible, Josephus Eusebius, and Jerome. Its distance from Jerusalem by the main road is as nearly as possible 61 miles; but there is a more direct road reducing it to 5 miles.

The name of Gibeon is most familiar to us in connection with the artifice by which its inhabitants obtained their safety at the hands of Joshua, and with the memorable battle which ultimately resulted therefrom. This transaction is elsewhere examined, and therefore requires no further reference here. [JOSHUA; BETH-HORON.] We next hear of it at the encounter between the men of David and of Ish-bosheth under their respective leaders Joab and Abner (2 Sam. ii. 12-17). The meeting has all the air of having been a Both here and in 1 K. iii. 4, Josephus substitutes Macon for Gibeon (Ant. x. 3, § 5, vii. 2, § 1).

premeditated by both parties, unless we suppose that Joab had heard of the intention of the Benjamites to revisit from the distant Mahalaim their native villages, and had seized the opportunity to try his strength with Abner. The details of this disastrous encounter are elsewhere given. [Joah.]

The place where the struggle began received a name from the circumstance, and seems to have been long afterwards known as "the field of the strong man." [Helch.]

We again meet with Gibeon in connection with Joab; this time as the scene of the cruel and revolting death of Amasa by his hand (2 Sam. xx. 5-10). Joab was in pursuit of the rebellious Shela the son of Becher, and his being so far out of the direct north road as Gibeon may be accounted for by supposing that he was making a search for this Benjamite among the towns of his tribe. The two rivals met at "the great stone which is in Gibeon" — some old landmark, now no longer recognizable, at least not recognized — and then Joab repeated the treachery by which he had murdered Abner, but with circumstances of a still more revolting character. [Joah.; Armis, p. 158.]

It is remarkable that the retribution for this crowning act of perfidy should have overtaken Joab close to the very spot on which it had been committed. For it was to the tabernacle at Gibeon (1 K. ii. 28, 29; comp. 1 Chr. xvi. 29) that Joab fled for sanctuary when his death was pronounced by Solomon, and it was while clinging to the horns of the brazen altar there that he received his death-blow from Benaiah the son of Jehoshaphat (1 K. ii. 28, 30, 31; and LXX. 29).

Familiar as these events in connection with the history of Gibeon are to us, its reputation in Israel was due to a very different circumstance — the fact that the tabernacle of the congregation and the brazen altar of burnt-offering were for some time located on the "high place" attached to or near the town. We are not informed whether this "high place" had any name for sanctity before the tabernacle came there; but if not, it would probably have been erected elsewhere. We only hear of it in connection with the tabernacle, nor is there any indication of its situation in regard to the town. Professor Stanley has suggested that it was the remarkable hill of Nebi Samwil, the most prominent and individual eminence in that part of the country, and to which the special appellation of "the great high-place" (1 K. iii. 4; יֵבֵי סָ السعود) would perfectly apply. And certainly, if "great" is to be understood as referring to height or size, there is no other hill which can so justly claim the distinction (Siani and Pol., p. 216). But the word has not always that meaning, and may equally imply eminence in other respects, e. g. superior sanctity to the numerous other high places — Bethel, Ramah, Mizpah, Gibeah — which surrounded it on every side. The main objection to this identification is the distance of Nebi Samwil from Gibeon — more than a mile — and the absence of any close connection therewith than with any other of the neighboring places. The most natural position for the high place of Gibeon is the twin mount immediately south of el-Jib — so close as to be all but a part of the town, and yet quite separate and distinct. The testimony of Eiphaphias, by which Mr. Wright supports his conjecture, namely, that the "Mount of Gideon," was the highest round Jerusalem (Ain. Herodasa, i. 394), should be received with caution, standing as it does quite alone, and belonging to an age which, though early, was marked by ignorance, and by the most improbable conclusions.

To this high place, wherever situated, the "tabernacle of the congregation" — the sacred tent which had accompanied the children of Israel through the whole of their wanderings — had been transferred from its last station at Nob. The exact date of the transfer is left in uncertainty. It was either before or at the time when David brought up the ark "from Kirjath-jearim, to the new tent which he had pitched for it on Mount Zion, that the original tent was spread for the last time at Gibeon. The expression in 2 Chr. i. 5, "the brazen altar he put before the tabernacle of Jehovah," at first sight appears to refer to David. But the text of the passage is disputed, and the authorities are divided between כִּלָּה= מֵאָם, and כִּלָּה= מָהָי. Whether king David transferred the tabernacle to Gibeon or not, he certainly appointed the staff of priests to offer the daily sacrifices there on the brazen altar of Moses, and to fulfill the other requirements of the law (1 Chr. xvi. 40), with no less a person at their head than Zechar the priest (30), assisted by the famous musicians Heman and Jeduthun (41).

One of the earliest acts of Solomon's reign — it must have been while the remembrance of the execution of Joab was still fresh — was to visit Gibeon. The ceremonial was truly magnificent: the congregation with all the great officers of the state — the captains of hundreds and thousands, the judges, the governors, and the chief of the fathers — and the sacrifice consisted of a thousand burnt-offerings (1 K. iii. 4). And this glimpse of Gibeon in all the splendor of its greatest prosperity — the smoke of the thousands animals rising from the venerable altar on the commanding height of "the great high place" — the clang of "trumpets and cymbals and musical instruments of God" (1 Chr. xxi. 42) resounding through the valleys far and near — is virtually the last we have of it. In a few years the temple at Jerusalem was completed, and then the tabernacle was once more taken down and removed. Again "all the men of Israel assembled themselves" to king Solomon, with the "elders of Israel," and the priests and the Levites brought up both the tabernacle and the
The Gibeonites are also known as the 'Bene-Giddel' and are mentioned in the Targum, a Hebrew translation of the Old Testament. They were known for their skill in building and were close associates of Solomon's builders, as indicated in the New Testament (Acts 7:44). They were also known for their role in the construction of the temple in Jerusalem (I Chron. 29:26). However, their name is also known to have been corrupted to 'Cathue' in some versions.

GIDEON, THE

The name 'Gideon' is mentioned in connection with Lebanon in the enumeration of the portions of the Promised Land remaining to be conquered by Joshua (Josh. xiii. 4). The ancient versions, as will be seen above, give no help, but there is no reason to doubt that the allusion is to the inhabitants of the city Gebal, which was on the sea-coast at the foot of the northern slopes of Lebanon. The one name is a regular derivative from the other (see Gesenius, Thes. p. 238 b). We have here a confirmation of the identity of the Aphek mentioned in this passage with Aro, which was overlooked by the writer when examining the latter name (cf. Gen. 49:20; and the whole passage is instructive, as showing how very far the limits of the country designed for the Israelites exceeded those which they actually occupied.

press, to conceal it from the predatory tyrants. After a natural hesitation he accepted the commission of a deliverer, and learned the true character of his visitant from a miraculous sign (vi. 12-23); and being reassured from the fear which first seized him (Ex. xx. 19; Judg. xiii. 22), built the altar of Jehovah-shalom, which existed when the book of Judges was written (vi. 24). In a dream the same night he was ordered to throw down the altar of Baal and cut down the Asherah (A. V. "grove") upon it [Asherah], with the wood of which he was to offer in sacrifice his father's "second bullock of seven years old," an expression in which some see an allusion to the seven years of servitude (vi. 26, 1). Perhaps that particular bullock is specified because it had been reserved by his father to sacrifice to Baal (Rosenmuller, Nebel ad loc.), for Joshua seems to have been a priest of that worship. Bithynia can hardly be right in supposing that Gideon was to offer two bullocks (Richt. p. 115). At any rate the minute touch is valuable as an indication of truth in the story (see Ewald, Gesch. ii. 498, and note). Gideon, assisted by ten faithful servants, obeyed the vision, and next morning ran the risk of being stoned; but Joshua appeased the popular indignation by using the common argument that Baal was capable of defending his own majesty (comp. 1 K. xviii. 27). This circumstance gave Gideon the surname of "Magen" (="Let Baal plead") vi. 32; LXX. τεφοδαλα, a standing instance of national irony, expressive of Baal's impotence. Winer thinks that this irony was increased by the fact that Μακίαν θυσία, was a surname of the Phoenician Hercules (comp. Movers, Phoen. i. 434). We have similar cases of contempt in the names Sychar, Bala-zote, etc. (Lightfoot, Hor. Hbr. ad Matt. xii. 24). In consequence of this name some have identified Gideon with a certain priest Τεφοδαλαος, mentioned in Ezechiel's (Prop. Ezech. i. 10) as having given much accurate information to Sandemianus the Byrtian (Barchet, Philog. p. 775; Huetius, Dec. Ezech. p. 84, &c.), but this opinion cannot be maintained (Ewald, Gesch. ii. 494; W. Gesenius, loc. cit.). We also find the name in the form "Τεφοδαλα" in Sahidic (2 Sah. vii. 23); comp. Ezech. i. 18, xiii. 34 with Isaiah-xvi. 2. 3 Sam. ii. (4). Ewald (p. 495, &c.) brings forward several arguments against the supposed origin of the name.

2. After this begins the second set of Gideon's life. "Clothed" by the Spirit of God (Judg. vi. 34; comp. 1 Chr. xii. 18; Luke xiv. 40), he blew a trumpet; and, joined by "Zebalum, Nathatil, and even the reluctant Asher" (which tribes were chiefly endangered by the Midianites), and possibly also by some of the original inhabitants, who would suffer from these predatory "sons of the East" no less than the Israelites themselves, he encamped on the slopes of Gilboa, from which he overlooked the plains of Esdraelon covered by the tents of Midian (Stanley, S. of P., p. 243). Strengthened by a double sign from God (to which Ewald gives a strange figurative meaning, Gesch. ii. 500), he reduced his army of 32,000 by the usual process (Dent. xx. 8; comp. 1 Mac. iii. 56). The expression "let him depart from Mount Gilgal" is perplexing: Dathan would render it "to Mount Gilgal" - on the other side of Jordan; and Genicus reads הִגְיָדְנָא, Gilboa; but Ewald is probably right in regarding the name as a sort of war-ery and general designation of the Mannasses. (See, (Gesen. Thes. p. 834, n.) By a second test at "the spring of trembling" (now probably Alm Jâdil), on which see Stanley, S. of P. (p. 342), he again reduced the number of his followers to 300 (Judg. vii. 6 f.), whom Josephus explains to have been the most cowardly in the army (Ant. vi. 5, § 3). Finally, being encouraged by words fortunately overheard (what the latter Jews termed the Bath Kol; comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 9, 10, Lightfoot, Hor. Hbr. ad Matt. iii. 14) in the relation of a significant dream, he framed his plans, which were admirably adapted to strike a panic terror into the huge and undisciplined nomad host (Judg. viii. 15-18). We know from history that large and irregular oriental armies are especially liable to sudden outbursts of uncontrollable terror, and when the stillness and darkness of the night were suddenly disturbed in three different directions by the flash of torches and by the reverberating echoes which the trumpets and the shouting woke among the hills, we cannot be astonished at the complete rout into which the enemy were thrown. It must be remembered, too, that the sound of 300 trumpets would make them suppose that a corresponding number of companies were attacking them.a For specimens of similar stratagems see Liv. xxii. 10; Polyb. Strateg. ii. 37; Frontin. ii. 4; Sall. Judg. 99; Nieahr, Descr. de l'Aphrod. p. 304; Joseph. Js. 1841, ii. 516 (quoted by Ewald, Rosenmuller, and Winer). The custom of dividing an army into three seems to have been common (1 Sam. xi. 11; Gen. xiv. 19), and Gideon's war-ery is not unlike that adopted by Cyrus (Xenoph. Cyro. iii. 28). He adds his own name to the war-ery, as suited both to inspire confidence in his followers and strike terror into the enemy. His stratagem was eminently successful, and the Midianites, breaking into their wild peculiar cries, fled headlong "down the descent to the Jordan," to the "house of the Ascent" (Beth-saat), and the "meadow of the dance" (Ada-nehbals), but were intercepted by the Ephraimites (to whom notice had been sent, vii. 24) at the fords of Beth- barah, where, after a second fight, the princes Tubb and Zeeb ("the Raven" and "the Wolf") were detected and slain—the former at a rock, and the latter concealed in a wine-press, to which their names were afterwards given. Meanwhile the higher sheikhs Zebal and Zalmuna had already escaped, and Gideon (after pausing—for by a soft answer, which became proverbial—the haughty tribe of Ephraim, viii. 1-3) pursued them into eastern Mas- saseh, and, bursting upon them in their fancied security among the tents of their Bedouin countrymen (see Karkok), won his third victory, and avenged on the Midianites the massacre of a It is curious to find "tumphs and pitchers" in use here, as at this time in the streets of Cairo. The Zabat or Ashel of the police carries with him at night a torch which burns, soon after it is lighted, without a flame, except when it is moved through the air, when it suddenly blazes forth.

b The war-ery was properly, "For Jehovah and for Gilboa." The A. V. inserts "the sword," but that has no warrant, and restricts too much the idea.
his kingly brethren whom they had slain at Tabor (viii. 18 f.). In these three battles only 15,000 out of the Midianites escaped alive. This is indeed stated in Judg. viii. 10, that 120,000 Midianites had already fallen; but here as elsewhere, it may merely be intended that such was the original number of the routed host. During his triumphal return Gideon took signal and appropriate vengeance on the coward and apostate towns of Succoth and Peniel. The memory of this splendid deliverance took deep root in the national traditions (1 Sam. xii. 11; Ps. lxxxiii. 11; Is. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 32).

3. After this there was a peace of 40 years, and we see Gideon in peaceful possession of his well-earned honors, and surrounded by the dignity of a numerous household (viii. 29-31). It is not improbable that, like Saul, he had owed a part of his popularity to his princely appearance (Judg. viii. 18). In this third stage of his life occur alike his most noble and his most questionable acts, namely, the refusal of the monarchy on theocratic grounds, and the irregular consecration of a jewelled ephod, formed out of the rich spoils of Midian, which proved to the Israelites a temptation to idolatry, although it was doubtless intended for use in the worship of Jehovah. Gideon's sons and others (Thee. p. 133; Bertheau, p. 133 f.) follow the Peshito in making the word Ephod here mean an idol, chiefly on account of the vast amount of gold (1,700 shekels) and other rich material appropriated to it. But it is simpler to understand it as a significant symbol of an unauthorized worship.

Respecting the chronology of this period little certainty can be obtained. Making full allowance for the use of round numbers, and even admitting the improbable assertion of some of the Rabbis that the period of oppression is counted in the years of rest (vile Rosenmuller, On Judg. iii. 11), insuperable difficulties remain. It, however, as has been suggested by Lord A. Hervey, several of the judgeships really synchronize instead of being successive, much of the confusion vanishes. For instance, he supposes (in a comparison of Judg. iii., viii., and xii.) that there was a combined movement under three great chiefs, Ehud, Gideon and Jephthah, by which the Israelites emancipated themselves from the dominion of the Moabites, Ammonites, and Midianites (who for some years had occupied their land), and enjoyed a long term of peace through all their coasts. "If," he says, "we string together the different accounts of the different parts of Israel which are given us in that miscellaneous collection of ancient records called the book of Judges, and treat them as connected and successive history, we shall fall into as great a chronographical error as if we treated in the same manner the histories of Mercia, Kent, Essex, Wessex, and Northumb-land, before Englund became one kingdom" (Genealogy, of our Lord, p. 238). It is now well known that a similar source of error has long existed in the chronology of Egypt.

Gideoni (גידיאוֹנֵי) or once גידיאַוֹנֵי [a pros- trator, warrior]: Peshito: [Vat. Genesis, Genesis, Peshito, etc.] Gesenius [gen.]. Abidan, son of Gideon, was the chief of the tribe of Manasseh, Benjamin at the time of the census in the wilderness of Fini (Num. i. 11; ii. 22; vii. 60, 65; x. 24).

Giddom (גִּדְדֹם) [a cutting down, desolating]: Lekechi: Alex. Gâdanâ [Comp, Abd. Gâdadâ], a place named only in Judg. xx. 43, as the limit to when the pursuit of Benjamin extended after the final battle of Gibeah. It would appear to have been situated between Gibeah (Tulul el-Fâlî) and the cliff Minna (probably Râmâin, about three miles E. of Bethel); but no trace of the name, nor yet of that of Memnah, if indeed that was a place (Judg. xx. 43: A. V. "with case" — but see margin), has yet been met with. [Menuchah, Amer. ed.] The reading of the Alex. LXX., "Gilead," can hardly be taken as well founded. In the Valley the word does not seem to be represented.

Gier-Eagle (גֵּיֶר-אָגָל) [rich, râchâm; פֶּרֶצָי], râchâmab: ñûôûôô [עַבְּרָיִים], an ancient bird mentioned in Lev. xi. 18 and Deut. xiv. 17. There is no reason to doubt that the râchâm of the Hebrew Scriptures is identical in reality as in name with the râchâm (רָכָּחָם) of the Arabs, namely, the Egyptian vulture (Neophron percnopterus); see Gener, De Arb. p. 176; Bochart, Hervae., Tovor. p. 293, and Hasselquist's Natural Hist. of Egypt, ii. 195, 2d ed. The LXX. in Lev. i. c. renders the Hebrew term by "swan" (κότάρας), while in Deut. i. c. the "purple water-hen" (Porphyrio intermedium) is given as its representative. There is too much discrepancy in the LXX. translations of the various birds mentioned in the Levitical law to allow us to attach much weight to its authority. The Hebrew term etymologically signifies "a bird which is very affectionate to its young," which is perfectly true of the Egyptian vulture, but not more so than of other birds. The Arabian writers relate many fables of the Râchâm, some of which the reader may see in the Hierocodiac of Bochart (iii. p. 56). The Egyptian vulture, according to Bruce, is called by the Egyptians "Pharaoh's Hen." It is generally distributed throughout Egypt, and Mr Tristram says it is common in Palestine, and breeds in great numbers in the valley of the Cedron (Ib., i. 23). Though a bird of decidedly unprepossessing appearance and of disgusting habits, the Egyptians, like all other Orientals, wisely protect so efficient a scavenger, which rides them of putrefying carcases that would otherwise breed a pestilence in their towns. Near Cairo, says Shaw (Tovor. p. 388, folio), there are several flocks of the Ach Bobbi, "white father," — a name given it by the Turks.
partly out of the revenue they have for it, partly from the color of its plumage. — "which, like the ravens about our metropolis, feed upon the carrion and nastiness that is thrown without the city." Young birds are of a brown color with a few white feathers; adult specimens are white, except the primary and a portion of the secondary wing feathers, which are black. Naturalists have referred this variety to the "περιστήριον" or "περιστήριον" of Aristotle (Hist. Anim. i. 22, § 2, ed. Schuch.).

GIFT

* There are two birds known as "ravens" among the Arabs in Egypt. The first is the variety known as "Neophron percnopterus." It is found extensively in all parts of Egypt, and is common in Palestine and Syria. The adult has the front of the head and the upper part of the throat and cere naked, and of a bright lemon yellow. The plumage is a dirty white, with the exception of the quill-feathers, which are a grayish black. The appearance of this bird soaring (in circles) over and around the towns in Egypt, with its bright yellow beak and neck and crop, and white body, and dark-wing feathers, is exceedingly beautiful.

The second is the "Pelecanus onocrotalus," found in large numbers in Egypt, and about Lake Huleh in the Palestrine. This is probably the bird intended by "κύλλα" in Lev. xi. 18 and Dent. xiv. 17, while the bird to which "περίστηριον" should be "corinorant." This seems altogether more natural when we consider the context, and that it is grouped with the large water-fowl. The word "περίστηριον" translated "corinorant" in Lev. xi. 17 and Dent. xiv. 17 more properly suits the Diver ("Calypsoa"), of which there is a large species in Egypt.

GIFT. The giving and receiving of presents has in all ages been not only a more frequent, but also a more formal and significant proceeding in the East than among ourselves. It enters largely into the ordinary transactions of life: no negotiation, alliance, or contract of any kind can be entered into between states or sovereigns without a previous interchange of presents: none of the important events of private life, betrothal, marriage, coming of age, birth, take place without presents: even a visit, if of a formal nature, must be prefaced by a present.

We cannot advise a more remarkable proof of the important part which presents play in the social life of the East, than the fact that the Hebrew language possesses no less than fifteen different expressions for the one idea. Many of these expressions have specific meanings: for instance, "minchah" (מִכָּחָה) applies to a present from an inferior to a superior, as from subjects to a king (Judg. iii. 15; 1 K. x. 25; 2 Chr. xvii. 5); "mashcheth" (מָשַךְ) expresses the converse idea of a present from a superior to an inferior, as from a king to his subjects (Esth. ii. 18); hence it is used of a portion of food sent by the master of the house to his inferior guests (Gen. xiii. 34; 2 Sam. xi. 8); "nashchath" (נָשֶׁךָת) has very much the same sense (2 Sam. xix. 42); "berith" (בֵּרִית), literally a "blessing," is used where the present is one of a complimentary nature, either accompanied with good wishes, or given as a token of attention (Gen. xxxvii. 11; Judg. i. 16; 1 Sam. xxv. 27, xxx. 26; 2 K. v. 15); and again, "shochoth" (שֹׁכְחָת) is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment, presented either to a judge (Ex. xxviii. 8; Dent. x. 17), or to a conqueror (2 K. vi. 8). Other terms, as "mattan" (מַתַּן), were used more generally. The extent to which the custom prevailed admits of some explanation from the peculiar usages of the East; it is clear that the term "gift" is frequently used where we should say in English "present," or "give." The tribute of subject states was paid not in a fixed sum of money, but in kind; each nation presenting its particular product — a custom which is frequently illustrated in the sculptures of Assyria and Egypt; hence the numerous instances in which the present was no voluntary act, but an exaction (Judg. iii. 16-18; 2 Sam. vii. 2, 6; 1 K. iv. 21; 2 K. xxvii. 3; 2 Chr. xxi. 17, xxvi. 8); and hence the expression "to bring presents" — to own submission (Ps. lxxix. 29, lxxxvi. 11; Is. viii. 7). Again, the present taken to a prophet was viewed very much in the light of a consulting "fee," and conveyed no idea of bribery (1 Sam. ix. 7, comp. xii. 3; 2 K. v. 5, viii. 9): it was only when false prophets and corrupt judges arose that the present was prostituted, and became, instead of a "minchah" (as in the instances quoted), a "shochoth," or bribe (Is. i. 23, v. 15; Jer. xi. 17; Mic. iii. 11). But in assistance for these cases, which are hardly "gifts" in our sense of the term, there is still a large excess remaining in the practice of the East: friends brought presents to friends on any joyful occasion (Esth. ix. 19, 22), those who asked for information or advice to those who gave it (2 K. viii. 8), the needy to the wealthy from whom any assistance was expected (Gen. xlii. 11; 2 K. xv. 19, xvi. 8), rulers to their favorites (Gen. xiv. 12; 2 Sam. vi. 8), especially to their officers (Esth. ii. 18; Joseph. Ant. xii. 2, § 15), or to the people generally on festive occasions (2 Sam. vi. 19); on the occasion of a marriage, the bride-room not only paid the parents for his bride (A. V. "dowry"), but also gave the bride certain presents (Gen. xxiv. 12; comp. Gen. xxiv. 22), while the father of the bride gave her a present on sending her away, as is expressed in the term "shiluchim" (שִׁלְכוּת) (1 K. x. 16); and again, the portions of the sons of concubines were paid in the form of presents (Gen. xxv. 6).

The nature of the presents was as various as were the occasions: food (1 Sam. i. 7, xvi. 20, xxiv. 11), sheep and cattle (Gen. xlvii. 13-15; Judg. xv. 8), gold (2 Sam. xviii. 11; Job iii. 11; Matt. xi. 20), jewels (Gen. xxiv. 53), furniture, and vessels for eating and drinking (2 Sam. xvi. 28), delicacies, such as spices, honey, etc. (Gen. xxiv. 53; 1 K. x. 23, xiv. 3), and robes (1 K. x. 25; 2 K. v. 22), particularly in the ease of persons induced into high office (Esth. vi. 8; Dan. vi. 16; comp. Herod. iii. 29). The mode of presentation was as much as possible: the presents were conveyed by the hands of servants (Judg. iii. 18), or still better on the backs of beasts of burden (2 K. viii. 9), even when such a mode of conveyance was unnecessary. The refusal of a present was regarded as a high indignity, and this constituted the aggravated insult noticed in Matt. xvii. 11, the marriage robe having been offered and refused (Trench, Parable). No present was not to bring a present when the position of the parties demanded it (1 Sam. x. 27).
GIHON (גִּחוֹן [gīhōn]: Gr. Πρώτος: Alex. Prōtos. [Gehon]. I. The second river of Paradise (Gen. i. 13). The name does not again occur in the Hebrew text of the O. T.; but in the LXX. it is used in Jer. ii. 18, as an equivalent for the word Shichor or Silhor, i. e. the Nile, and in Ecclus. xxiv. 27 (A. V. "Geon"). All that can be said upon it will be found under Eden, p. 638 f. 2. (מִין, and in Chron. מִינָה [minā]: [in K. K. מִין, [Vat. Prōtos, Alex. o Prōtos in 2 Chr. xxxii. 30], Prōtos, [Vat. Σείλων, Alex. Gihon, in 2 Chr. xxxiii. 14, κακαν νοτόν, Comp. τοῦ Πρώτος: Gihon.] A place near Jerusalem, memorable as the scene of the anointing and proclamation of Solomon as king (1 K. i. 33, 38, 43). From the terms of this passage, it is evident it was at a lower level than the city — "bring him down (בִּנְיָן) upon גִּחוֹן" "they are come up (胬ְּנָה) from thence." With this agrees a later mention (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14), where it is called "Gihon-in-the-valley," the word rendered valley being נחל (nāchāl). In this latter place Gihon is named to designate the direction of the wall built by Manasseh — the outside of the city of David, from the west of Gihon-in-the-valley to the entrance of the Fish-gate. It is not stated in any of the above passages that Gihon was a spring; but the only remaining place in which it is mentioned suggests this belief, or at least that it had given its name to some water — "Hezekiah also stopped the upper source or issue (נַחַל, from נַחַל, to rush forth; incorrectly "watercourse" in A. V.) of the waters of Gihon" (2 Chr. xxxiii. 30). If the place to which Solomon was brought down on the king's mule was Gihon-in-the-valley — and from the terms above noticed it seems probable that it was — then the "upper source" would be some distance away, and at a higher level.

The locality of Gihon will be investigated under Jerusalem; but in the mean time the following facts may be noticed in regard to the occurrences of the word. (1.) Its low level: as above stated. (2.) The expression "Gihon-in-the-valley:" "where it will be observed that נחל (nāchāl" "torrent" or "wady") is the word always employed for the valley of the Kidron, east of Jerusalem — the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat; ge ("ravine" or "glen") being as constantly employed for the Valley of Hinnom, south and west of the town. In this connection the mention of Ophel (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14) with Gihon should not be disregarded. In agreement with this is the fact that (3) the Temple of Jonathan, and the Syriac and Arabic Versions, have Sīlūka, i. e. Sīlūm (Arab. Ain-Sīlūk) for Gihon in 1 K. i. In Chronicles they agree with the Hebrew text in having Gihon. In Sīlūm be Gihon, then (4) "from the west of Gihon to the Fish-gate" — which we know from St. Jerome to have been near the present "Jaffa-gate," would answer to the course of a wall inclosing "the city of David" (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14); and (5) the omission of Gihon from the very detailed catalogue of Neh. iv. is explained. the natives as Jebel el-Dhib. The ridge rises out of the plain of Esdraelon, and, running eastward, sinks down into the valley of the Jordan. The Israelites at first pitched their tents at Jezreel, the present Zer'in on the western declivity of Gilboa, and near a fountain (1 Sam. xxix. 1), undoubtedly the present Um el-Jiljil, exactly in the right position, and forming naturally one indiscernable for selecting that spot. The "high places" on which Saul and Jonathan were slain would be the still higher summits of the ridge up which their forces were driven as the battle turned against them in the progress of the fight. The Philistines encamped at first at Shunem (1 Sam. xxviii. 4), now called Solhem, on the more northern, but parallel, ridge opposite to Jezreel, where they could overlook and watch the enemy, and at the same time were protected against any surprise by the still higher ground behind them. On the other hand, the camp of the Philistines was visible, distant only eight or ten miles, from the camp of Israel. Hence when "Saul saw the host of the Philistines, he was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled." The Philistines, in their proper home, dwelt in the country south of Jabbok, and having in all probability marched north along the coast as far as Carmel, had been turned across the plain of Esdraelon, and had thus reached this well-chosen camping ground at Shunem. The Philistines are next mentioned as rallying their forces at Aphik (1 Sam. xxviii. 4). No place of this name has yet been discovered in that neighborhood. Some suppose that it was only another name for Shunem; but it is more likely to be the name of a different place, situated nearer Jezreel, perhaps the one from which the Philistines made their direct attack on the Israelites. Further, we read that the conquerors, after the battle, carried the bodies of Saul and his sons to Beth-shean, and hung them up on the walls of that city. Beth-shean was a stronghold of the Philistines which the Israelites had never wrested from them. That place, evidently, reappeared in the present Beisan, which is on the eastern slope of the Gilboa range, visible in fact from the two peaks, and still remarkable for its strength of position as well as the remains of ancient fortifications.

The strange episode of Saul's nocturnal visit to the witch of Endor illustrates this same feature of the narrative. It is evident that Saul was absent on that errand but a few hours, and the place must have been near his encampment. This Endor, as no one can doubt, must be the present Tell el-Dhib, with its dreary cisterns (Thomson's Land and Book, ii. 191), a fitting abode of such a necromancer, on the north side of Dalby, at the west end of which was Shunem. Hence Saul, leaving his camp at Jezreel, could steal his way under cover of the night across the intervening valley, and over the moderate summit which he would have to ascend, and then, after consulting the woman with a familiar spirit at Endor, could return to his forces without his departure being known to any except those in the secret. All these places, so interwoven in the network of the story, and clearly identified after theapse of so many centuries, lie almost within sight of each other. A person may start from any one of them and make the circuit of them all in a few hours. The date assigned to this battle is n. c. 1055, later but a little than the traditional age of the siege of Troy. It is seldom that a record of remote events can be subjected to so severe a scrutiny as this.

For other sketches which reproduce more or less fully the occurrences of this battle, the reader may see Van de Velde (Travels in Syria and Persia, ii. 368 ff.); Stanley (8, of I. 8, 560 f., Amer. ed.), Robinson (Bibl. Res. iii. 174 f., 1st ed.); and Porter (Handbook, ii. 355 ff.). Some of the writers differ as to whether the final encounter took place at Jezreel or higher up the mountain. Stanley has drawn out the personal incidents in a striking manner (Josephus, Ant. ii. 30 ff.). For geographical information respecting this group of places, see especially Robinson, Phys. Geog. pp. 29-38, and Ritter's Geogr. of Palestine, Cape's transl., ii. 321-356.

GILEAD (גיל) [see below]: Palæstina, a mountainous region east of the Jordan; bounded on the north by Bashan, on the east by the Arabian plateau, and on the south by Moab and Ammon (Gen. xxxi. 21; Pent. iii. 12-17). It is sometimes called "Mount Gilboa" (Gen. xxxi. 25, תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ; Judges. i. 1, תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ; Judges. iv. 5, תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ), sometimes the "land of Gilboa" (Num. xxxii. 1, תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ; Judges. iv. 5, תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ); and some times simply "Gilead" (Ps. lx. 7, Gen. xxxiv. 23); but a comparison of the several passages shows that they all mean the same thing. There is no evidence, in fact, that any particular mountain was meant by Mount Gilead more than by Mount Lebanon (Judg. iii. 9)—they both comprehended the whole range, and the range of Gilead embraced the whole province. The name Gilead, as is usual in Palestine, describes the physical aspect of the country. It signifies "a hard, rocky region;" and it may be regarded as standing in contrast to Bashan, the other great trans-Jordanic province, which is, as the name implies, a "level, fertile tract."

The statements in Gen. xxxi. 48 are not opposed to this etymology. The old name of the district was תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ (Gilead), but by a slight change in the pronunciation, the radical letters being retained, the meaning was made beautifully applicable to the "heap of stones." Jacob and Laban had built up תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ and Laban said, this heap תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ is a witness תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ between me and thee this day. Therefore was the name of it called "Gilgal" תְּרוֹם יְבָאוֹ (the heap of witness). Those acquainted with the modern Arabs and their literature will see how intensely such a play upon the word would be appreciated by them. It does not appear that the interview between Jacob and his father-in-law took place on any particular mountain peak. Jacob, having passed the Embrates, "set his face toward Mount Gilgal;" he struck across the desert by the great fountain at Palmira; then traversed the eastern part of the plain of Damascus, and the plateau of Bashan, and entered Gilead from the northeast. In the Mount Gilead Laban overtook him—apparently soon after he entered the district; for when they separated again, Jacob went on his way and arrived at Mahamain, which must have been considerably north of the river Jalib (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, 22).

The extent of Gilead we can ascertain with tolerable exactness from incidental notices in the Holy Scriptures. The Jordan was its western border (1
A comparison of a number of passages shows that the river Hieromax, the nursery, Sotriit el-Muluk, separated it from Bashan on the north. "Half Gilead" is said to have been possessed by Sihon king of the Amorites, and the other half by Og king of Bashan; and the river Jabbok was the division between the two kingdoms (Deut. ii. 12; Josh. xii. 1–5). The half of Gilead possessed by Og must, therefore, have been north of the Jabbok. It is also stated that the territory of the tribe of Gad extended along the Jordan valley to the Sea of Galilee (Josh. xiii. 27); and yet "all Bashan" was given to Manasseh (ver. 30). We, therefore, conclude that the deep glen of the Hieromax, which runs eastward, on the parallel of the south end of the Sea of Galilee, was the dividing line between Bashan and Gilead. North of that glen stretches out a flat, fertile plateau, such as the name Bashan (בַּשָּׁן, like the Arabic بَشَانَةُ, signifies "soft and level soil") would suggest; while on the south we have the rough and rugged, yet picturesque hill country, for which Gilead is the fit name. (See Porter in Journal of Soc. Lit. vi. 284 ff.) On the east the mountain range melts away gradually into the high plateau of Arabia. The boundary of Gilead is here not so clearly defined, but it may be regarded as running along the foot of the range. The southern boundary is less certain. The tribe of Reuben occupied the country as far south as the river Arnon, which was the border of Moab (Deut. ii. 35, iii. 12). It seems, however, that the southern section of their territory was not included in Gilead. In Josh. xiii. 9–11 it is intimated that the "plain of Medeba" ("the Mishor") is called, north of the Arnon, is not in Gilead; and when speaking of the cities of refuge, Moses describes Bezer, which was given out of the tribe of Reuben, as being "in the wilderness, in the plain country (i. e. in the country of the Mishor," רֶמֶח רשַף, while Ramoth is said to be in Gilead (Deut. iv. 43). This southern plateau was also called "the land of Jazer" (Num. xxxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5; compare also Josh. xiii. 16–23). The valley of Heshbon may therefore, in all probability, be the southern boundary of Gilead. Gilead thus extended from the parallel of the south end of the Sea of Galilee to that of the north end of the Dead Sea—about 60 miles; and its average breadth scarcely exceeded 20.

While such were the proper limits of Gilead, the name is used in a wider sense in two or three parts of Scripture. Moses, for example, is said to have seen, from the top of Pisgah, "all the land of Gilead unto Dan" (Deut. xxxiv. 1); and in Judg. xx. 1, and Josh. xii. 9, the name seems to comprehend the whole territory of the Israelites beyond the Jordan. A little attention shows that this is only a vague way of speaking, in common use everywhere. We, for instance, often say "England" when we mean "England and Wales." The section of Gilead lying between the Jabbok and the Hieromax is now called Jebel Ajlan; while that to the south of the Jabbok constitutes the modern province of Belts. One of the most conspicuous peaks in the mountain range still retains the ancient name, being called Jebel Jilid, "Mount Gilead." It is about 7 miles south of the Jabbok, and commands a magnificent view over the whole Jordan valley, and the mountains of Judah and Ephraim. It is probably the site of Ramath-Mizpah of Josh. xiii. 29; and the "Mizpah of Gilead," from which Jephthah "passed over unto the children of Ammon (Judg. xi. 29). The spot is admirably adapted for a gathering place in time of invasion, or aggressive war. The neighbouring village of es-Salt occupies the site of the old "city of refuge" in Gad, Ramoth-Gilead. (Ramat-Gilead.)

We have already alluded to a special descriptive term, which may almost be regarded as a proper name, used to denote the great plateau which borders Gilead on the south and east. The refuge-city Bezer is said to be "in the country of the Mishor" (Deut. iv. 43); and Jeremiah (xlvii. 21) says, "judgment is come upon the country of the Mishor" (see also Josh. xiii. 9, 16, 17, 21, xii. 8).

Mishor (מִשִּׁורְ) and ḫall (מִשָּׁרְ) signifies a "level plain," or "table-land;" and no word could be more applicable. This is one among many examples of the immense accuracy of Bible topography.

The mountains of Gilead have a real elevation of from two to three thousand feet; but their apparent elevation on the western side is much greater, owing to the depression of the Jordan valley, which averages about 1,000 feet. Their outline is singularly uniform, resembling a massive wall running along the horizon. From the distant east they seem very low, for on that side they meet the plateau of Arabah, 2,000 ft. or more in height. Though the range appears bleak from the distance, yet on ascending it we find the scenery rich, picturesque, and in places even grand. The summit is broad, almost like table-land "tossed into wild confusion of undulating downs" (Stanley, S. of P. p. 320). It is everywhere covered with luxuriant vegetation. In the extreme north and south there are no trees; but as we advance toward the centre they soon begin to appear, at first singly, then in groups, and at length, on each side of the Jabbok, in fine forests chiefly of prickly oak and terebinth. The rich pasture land of Gilead presents a striking contrast to the nakedness of western Palestine. Except among the hills of Galilee, and along the heights of Carmel, there is nothing to be compared with it as a "place for cattle" (Num. xxxii. 1). Gilead anciently abounded in spices and aromatic gums which were exported to Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 25; Jer. viii. 22, xvi. 11). The first notice we have of Gilead is in connection with the history of Jacob (Gen. xxxvi. 21 ff.); but it is possibly this same region which is referred to under the name Ham, and was inhabited by the giant Zuzims. The kings of the East who came to punish the rebellious "cities of the plain," first attacked the Rehphans in Asheroth Karmaim, i. e. in the country now called Maurit; then they advanced southwards against the "Zuzims in Ham;" and next against the Emins in Shaveh-Kirathaim, which was subsequently possessed by the Mobeites (Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 8–9). [See Emins; Rehphant.] We hear nothing more of

GILEADITES, THE

Gilead till the invasion of the country by the Israelites. One half of it was then in the hands of Sihon king of the Amorites, who had a short time previously driven out the Moabites. Og, king of Bashan, had the other section north of the Jabbok. The Israelites defeated the former at Dahath, and the latter at Edrei, and took possession of Gilead and Bashan (Num. xxxi. 29 ff.). The rich pasture lands of Gilead, with its study forests, and equinoctial streams, attracted the attention of Reuben and Gad, who "had a very great multitude of cattle," and was allotted to them. The future history and habits of the tribes that occupied Gilead were greatly affected by the character of the country. Rich in flocks and herds, and now the lords of a fitting region, they retained, almost unaltered, the pastoral habits of their patriarchal ancestors. Like all Bedawin they lived in a constant state of warfare, just as Jacob had predicted of Gad—"a troop shall plunder him; but he shall plunder at the last" (Gen. xlix. 19). The sons of Ishmael were subdued and plundered in the time of Saul (1 Chr. v. 9 ff.); and the children of Ammon in the days of Jephthah and David (Judg. xi. 32 ff.; 2 Sam. x. 12 ff.). Their wandering tent life, and their almost inaccessible country, made them in ancient times one of the Bedawin tribes—"proctors of the refugee and outlaw. In Gilead the sons of Saul found a home while they vainly attempted to reestablish the authority of their house (2 Sam. ii. 8 ff.). Here, too, David found a sanctuary during the unnatural rebellion of a beleaguered crown; and the surrounding tribes, with a characteristic hospitality, carried presents of the best they possessed to the fallen monarch (2 Sam. xxii. 22 ff.). Elijah the Tishbite was a Gileadite (1 K. xvii. 1); and in his simple garb, wild aspect, abrupt address, wonderfully active habits, and movements so rapid as to evade the search of his watchful and bitter foes, we see all the characteristic of the genuine Bedawin, emodeled by a high prophetic mission. [G.A.D.]

Gilead was a frontier land, exposed to the first attacks of the Syrian and Assyrian invaders, and to the wondering raids of the desert Bedawin. Because Machir the first-born of Manasseh was a man of war, therefore he had Bashan and Gilead "(Josh. xvii. 1). Under the wild and wayward Jephthah, Mizpeh of Gilead became the gathering place of the trans-Jordan tribes (Judg. xi. 29); and in subsequent times the neighboring stronghold of Ramoth-Gilead appears to have been considered the key of Palestine on the east (1 K. xxiii. 3, 4, 6; 2 K. vili. 28, ix. 1).

The name Gilead (Γαλαάς) occurs several times in the history of the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 9 ff.); and also in Josephus, but generally with the Greek termination—Γαλαάςης or Γαλαάδης (Ant. xiii. 14, § 2; B. J. i. 4, § 1). Under the Roman dominion the country became more settled and civilized; and the great cities of Gadara, Pella, and others, with Philadelphia on its southern border, sprang up to opulence and splendor. In one of these (Pella) the Christians of Jerusalem found a sanctuary when the armies of Titus gathered round the devoted city (Enseh. H. E. ii. iii. 5). Under Mohammedan rule the country has again lapsed into semi-barbarism. Some scattered villages amid the fastnesses of Jebel Ajban, and a few fierce wandering tribes, constitute the whole population of Gilead. They are nominally subject to the Porte but their allegiance sits lightly upon them.

For the scenery, products, antiquities, and history of Gilead, the following works may be consulted. Burckhardt's Tran. in Syr.; Buckingham's Arab Tribes; Iby and Mangles, Travels; Porter's Handbook for Travellers; Five Years in Damascus; Stanley's Sin. and Pal.; Ritter's Pal. and Syria.

2. Possibly the name of a mountain west of the Jordan, near Jezerel (Judg. vii. 3). We are inclined, however, to agree with the suggestion of Clericus and others, that the true reading in this place should be γεννάω, Gideon, instead of γεννήσαι. Gideon was encamped at the "spring of Hard." which is at the base of Mount Gilea. A copist would easily make the mistake, and ignorance of geography would prevent it from being afterwards detected. For other explanations, see Ewald, Gesch. iii. 500; Schwarz, p. 164; Gesen. Thes. p. 894, note.

* * *wards Gilead (2), Jorthean also (Buch der Richter, p. 129), would substitute Gideon for that name in Judg. vii. 3. Keil and Delitzsch hesitate between that view and the conclusion that there may have been a single mountain or a range so called near Jezerel, just as in Josh. xv. 10, we read of a Mount Seir in the territory of Judah otherwise unknown (Com. on Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, p. 341). Dr. Wordsworth has the following note on this perplexed question: "Probably the western half-triib of Manasseh expressed its connection with the eastern half-triib by calling one of its mountains by the same name, Mount Gilead, as the famous mountain bearing that name in the eastern division of their tribe (Gen. xxxi. 21-25, xxxvii. 25). Num. xxxii. 1, 40, &c.). May we not see 'a return of the compliment' (if the expression may be used) in another name which has perplexed the commentators, namely, the Wood of Ephraim on the eastern side of Jordan (2 Sam. viii. 6)? Ephraim was on the west of Jordan, and yet the Wood of Ephraim was on the east. Perhaps that half-triib of Manasseh, which was in the east, marked its connection with Ephraim, its brother tribe, by calling a wood in its own neighborhood by that name." (See his Holy Bible with Notes, ii. pt. i. p. 111.) Cassel (Richter, p. 71) thinks that Gilead here may denote in effect character rather than locality: "the Mount of Gilead—the community of the warlike Manassites (Josh. xvii. 1), now so fitly represented by Gideon, sprung from that tribe (Judg. vi. 15). The cowardly deserve no place in the home of such heroes, and should separate themselves from them.

3. The name of a son of Machir, grandson of Manasseh (Num. xxxvi. 29, 30).

4. The father of Jephthah (Judg. xi. 1, 2). It is difficult to understand (comp. ver. 7, 8) whether this Gilead was an individual or a personification of the community.*

5. One of the posterity of Gad, through whom the genealogy of the Gadites in Bashan is traced (1 Chr. v. 14).

b Jephthah is called both when first and last mentioned (Judg. xi. 1, and xii. 7). The personal name of the father being unknown, that of his country stands in place of it. See Cassel, Richter u. Ruth is Lange's Biblewerk, p. 192.

1, 8, 15, 17: Judg. xii. 4, 5; Galád: Num. xxvi. 29; Galádá: [Vat. -5ei]; Judg. x. 3, 6; Galádá: [Judg. xi. 1, 40, xii. 7; 2 Sam. xvii. 27; xix. 31; 1 K. ii. 7; Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63] ó; Galádáigís[is]: [Vat. -5ei, exc. Judg. xi. 40, Vat. Galádá]; Alex. o Galádáigís, o Galádáigís[is] [and Judg. xii. 5, andpës Galádá: Gileadites, Gilgalites, évir Oth nod]. A branch of the tribe of Manasseh, descended from Gilead. There appears to have been an old standing feud between them and the Ephraimites, who taunted them with being deserts. See Judg. xii. 4, which may be rendered, "And the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Runagates of Ephraim are ye (Gilead is between Ephraim and Manasseh);" the last clause being added parenthetically. In 2 K. xv. 25 for "of the Gileadites" the LXX. have ἄνω των τετρακοσίων [Vulg. de filia Gilead uterum].

GILGAL (always with the article but once, τὸ θεῖον Γειλαδ'). [the circuit, the rolling, see below]: Γάλγαλα (plural); [in Deut. xii. 30, Γαλγάλα; Josh. xiv. 6, Rom. Vat. Γαλγάλα:] Gilgala (sing. and plur.)]. By this name were called at least two places in ancient Palestine.

1. The site of the first camp of the Israelites on the east of the Jordan, the place at which they passed the first night after crossing the river, and where the twelve stones were set up which had been taken from the bed of the stream (Josh. iv. 19, 20, comp. 3); where also they kept their first passover in the land of Canaan (v. 10). It was in the "end of the east of Jericho" (Y 'môr Tûmáh lá'îm), apparently on a hillock or rising ground (v. 3, comp. 9) in the Arloth-Jericho (A. V. "the plains"), that is, the hot depressed district of the Ghôr which lay between the town and the Jordan (v. 10). Here the Israelites who had been born on the march through the wilderness were circumcised; an occurrence from which the sacred historian derives the name: "This day I have rolled away (gallithoth) the reproach of Egypt from off you." Therefore the name of the place is called Gilgal to this day." By Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 11) it is said to signify "freedom" (λατεράνον). The camp thus established at Gilgal remained there during the early part of the conquest (ix. 6, x. 6, 7, 9, 15, 43); and we may probably infer from one narrative that Joshua retired thither at the conclusion of his labors (xiv. 6, comp. 15).

We again encounter Gilgal in the time of Saul, when it seems to have exchanged its military associations for those of sanctity. True, Saul, when driven from the highlands by the Philistines, collected his feeble force at the site of the old camp (1 Sam. xiii. 4, 7); but this is the only occurrence at all connecting it with war. It was now one of the "holy cities" (of ιεροσατέραοι) - if we accept the addition of the LXX. - to which Samuel regularly resorted, where he administered justice (1 Sam. vii. 16), and where anniversaries of peace offerings were accustomcd to be offered "before Jehovah" (x. 8, xi. 15, xii. 8, 9-12, xiv. 21); and on one occasion a sacrifice of a more terrible description than either (xv. 33). The air of the narrative all through leads to the conclusion that at the time of these occurrences it was the chief sanctuary of the central portion of the nation (see v. 8, xi. 14, xiv. 12, 21). But there is no sign of its being a town; no mention of building, or of its being allotted to the priests or Levites, as was the case with other sacred towns, Bethel, Shechem, etc. We again have a glimpse of it, some sixty years later, in the history of David's return to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xix.). The men of Judah came down to Gilgal to meet the king to conduct him over Jordan as if it was close to the river (xix. 15), and David arrived there immediately on crossing the stream, after his parting with Barzillai the Gileadite. How the remarkable sanctity of Gilgal became appropriated to a false worship we are not told, but certainly, as far as the obscure allusions of Hosea and Amos can be understood (provided that they refer to this Gilgal), it was so appropriated by the kingdom of Israel in the middle period of its existence (Hos. iv. 15, ix. 15, xii. 11; Amos iv. 3, v. 5).

Beyond the general statements above quoted, the sacred text contains no indications of the position of Gilgal. Neither in the Apocalypse nor the N. T. is it mentioned. Later authorities are more precise, but unfortunately discordant among themselves. By Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 4) the encampment is given as fifty stadia, rather under six miles, from the river, and ten from Jericho. In the time of Jerome the site of the camp and the twelve memorial stones were still distinguishable, if we are to take literally the expression of the Epit. Paula (§ 12). The distance from Jericho was then two miles. The spot was left uncultivated, but regarded with great veneration by the residents, "focus desertus . . . ab illius regionis mortalibus natio cultui habitis" (Onom. Gilgala). When Arculf was there at the end of the seventh century the place was shown at five miles from Jericho. A large church covered the site, in which the twelve stones were ranged. The church and stones were seen by Willibald, thirty years later, but he gives the distance as five miles from the Jordan, which again he states correctly as seven from Jericho. The stones are mentioned also by Theutmar, A. D. 1217, and lastly by Ludolf de Suchem a century later. No modern traveller has succeeded in eliciting the name, or in discovering a probable site. In Van de Velde's map (1838) a spot named Moherfer, a little S. of er-Rita, is marked as possible; but no explanation is afforded either in his Syria, or his Memoir.

2. But this was certainly a distinct place from the Gilgal which is connected with the last scenes in the life of Elijah, and with one of Elisha's miracles. The chief reason for believing this is the impossibility of making it fit into the notice of Elijah's translation. He and Elisha are said to "go down" (נָהַל) from Gilgal to Bethel (2 K ii. 1), in opposition to the repeated expressions of the narratives in Joshua and 1 Samuel, in which the way from Gilgal to the neighborhood of Bethel is always spoken of as an ascent, the fact being that the former is nearly 1,200 feet below the latter. Thus there must have been a second Gilgal at higher level than Bethel, and it was probably that at which Elisha worked the miracle of healing on the poisonous potage (2 K. iv. 38). Perhaps the expression of 2 K. ii. 1, coupled with the "came again" of iv. 38, may indicate that Elisha resided there. The mention of Saul—shalah (iv. 42) gives a clue to its situation, when taken with the notice of Eusebius (Jown. Betharsis) that that place was fifteen miles from Diospolis (Lydda) towards the north. In that very position stand now the ruins bearing the name of Jiftlich, i. e. Gilgal. (See Van de Velde's map, and Rob. iii. 139.)

" Such this derivation of the name cannot apply in the case of the other Gilgals mentioned below May it not have been adopted by John the Baptist when he said that God was "able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham?" (Thietmar, Perses, 31).

3. The "King of the Nations of Gilgal," or rather perhaps the "King of Giom—at Gilgal" (גֶלֶגֶל), is mentioned in the catalogue of the chiefs overthrown by Joshua (Josh. xii. 23). The name occurs next to Dor in an enumeration apparently proceeding southwards, and therefore the position of the Jiftlich just named is not wholly inappropriate, though it must be confessed its distance from Dor—more than twenty-five miles—is considerable: still it is nearer than any other place of the name yet known. Eusebius and Jerome (Junon. Gelgel) speak of a "Gulgulium" six miles from Antiochus. This is slightly more suitable, but has not been identified. What these Gulg were has been discussed under Heathen.

By that word (Judg. iv. 2) or "nations" (Gen. xiv. 1) the name is usually rendered in the A. V. as in the well-known phrase, "Galilee of the nations" (Is. ix. 1; comp. Matt. iv. 15). Possibly they were a tribe of the early inhabitants of the country, who, like the Gerizites, the Avim, the Zemarites, and others, have left only this faint casual trace of their existence there.

A place of the same name has also been discovered nearer the centre of the country, to the left of the main north road, four miles from Shiloh (Sichin), and rather more than the same distance from Bethel (Bethon). This suits the requirements of the story of Elijah and Elisha even better than the former, being more in the neighborhood of the established holy places of the country, and, as more central, and therefore less liable to attack by the wandering nations in the maritime plain, more suited for the residence for the sons of the prophets. In position it appears to be not less than 500 or 600 feet above Bethel (Van de Velde, Mem. ii. p. 179). It may be the Beth-Gilgal of Neh. xii. 29; while the Jiftlich north of Lydai may be that of Josh. xii. 23. Another Gilgal, under the slightly different form of Kiltlich, lies about two miles E. of Keir Lydon. Gilgal is spoken of in Josh. xv. 7, in describing the north border of Judah. In the parallel list (Josh. xviii. 17) it is given as Gilelon, and under that word an attempt is made to show that Gilgal, i. e. the Gilgal near Jericho, is probably correct. G.

GIMZO [גִּמֶּזֶו] [place of scenery]: etc. Alex. Gimmiziai, Gimmiz, a town which with its dependent villages (Hebrew "daughters"?) was taken possession of by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 18). The name—which occurs nowhere but here—is mentioned with Timnah, Socho, and other towns in the northwest part of Judah, or in Dan. It still remains attached to a large village between two and three miles S. W. of Lydda, south of the road between Jerusalem and Jaffa, just where the hills of the highland finally break down into the maritime plain. Jinnu is a tolerably large village, on an eminence, well surrounded with trees, and standing just beyond the point where the two main roads from Jerusalem (that by the Beth-horons, and that by Wady Salehnon), which parted at Gilbon, again join and run on as one to Jaffa. It is remarkable for nothing but some extensive rubbish mounds underground, unless it be also for the silence maintained regarding it by all travellers up to Dr. Robinson (ii. 249).

GIN, a trap for birds or beasts; it consisted of a net (תּוּר), and a stick to act as a spring (וּרֹדֶשׁ); the latter word is translated "gin" in the A. V. Am. iii. 5, and the former in Is. viii. 14, the term "snares" being in each case used for the other part of the trap. In Job xli. 24 (marginal translation) the second of these terms is applied to the ring run through the nostrils of an animal. W. L. B.

He is probably the same person as the preceding.

GIRDLE

GIRGASHITES, THE

2 K. i. 8; Jer. xiii. 1; soldiers, Is. v. 27; Ez. xxiii. 15, or kings in their military capacity, Job xii. 18.

(3.) מַעֲשֶׂה or מַעֲשֶׁה, used of the girdle worn by men alone, Job xii. 21, Ps. cix. 19, Is. xxiii. 10.

(4.) מַעֲשֶׁה, the girdle worn by the priests and state officers. In addition to these, מַעֲשֶׁה, Is. iii. 24, is a costly girdle worn by women. The Vulgate renders it fascist pectorilia. It would thus seem to correspond with the Latin strophium, a belt worn by women about the breast. In the LXX. however, it is translated χιτών μεσοροφος, "a tunic shot with purple," and Gesenius [Thek.] has "buntes Förgelkleid" (comp. Schroeder, de Vest. Mál. pp. 137, 138, 404). The מַעֲשֶׁה mentioned in Is. iii. 20, Jer. ii. 32, were probably girdles, although both Kimchi and Jarchi consider them as fillets for the hair. In the latter passage the Vulgate has again fascist pectorilia, and the LXX. στροφοδομις, an appropriate bridal ornament.

The common girdle was made of leather (2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4), like that worn by the Bedouins of the present day, whom Bunsen describes as "armed with a long crooked knife, and a pistol or two stuck in a red leather girdle" (Monast. of the Levant, p. 7). In the time of Chardin the nobles of Minægia wore girdles of leather, four fingers broad, and embossed with silver. A finer girdle was made of linen (Jer. xiii. 1; Ez. xv. 10), embroidered with silk, and sometimes with gold and silver thread (Dan. x. 5; Rev. i. 13, xv. 9), and frequently studded with gold and precious stones or pearls (Le Brunn, Frag. iv. 170: comp. Verg. Æn. ix. 359).a Morier (Second Journey, p. 150), describing the dress of the Armenian women, says, "they wear a silver girdle which rests on the hips, and is generally curiously wrought." The manufacture of these girdles formed part of the employment of women (Prov. xxxi. 24).

The girdle was fastened by a clasp of gold or silver, or tied in a knot so that the ends hung down in front, as in the figures on the ruins of Persepolis. It was worn by men about the loins, hence the expressions מַעֲשֶׁה מְעַלְמִים, Is. xi. 5; מַעֲשֶׁה מְעַלְמִים, Is. v. 27. The girdle of women was generally looser than that of the men, and was worn about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxvii. 17). Curzon (p. 58), describing the dress of the Egyptian women, says, "not round the waist, but round the hips a large and heavy Cashmere shawl is worn over the yelk, and the whole gracefulness of an Egyptian dress consists in the way in which this is put on." The military girdle was worn about the waist, the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3). In the Nineveh sculptures the soldiers are represented with broad girdles, to which the sword is attached, and through which even two or three daggers in a sheath are passed. Q. Curtius (iii. 3) says of Darius, "zona aurea muliebris cinctus eburnea suspenedatur, cui ex gemma erat vagina." Hence girding up the loins denotes preparation for battle or for active exertion.

In times of mourning, girdles of sackcloth were worn as marks of humiliation and sorrow (Is. iii. 24; xxvii. 12).

In consequence of the costly materials of which girdles were made, they were frequently given as presents (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 2 Sam. xviii. 11), as still the custom in Persia (cf. Morier, p. 93). Villages were given to the queens of Persia to supply them with girdles (Xenoph. Anab. i. 5, § 9; Phat. Alc. i. p. 129).

They were used as pockets, as among the Arabs still (Nielander, Descr. p. 56), and as purses, one end of the girdle being folded back for the purpose (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8). Hence "zoonan peredere," "to lose one's purse" (Hor. Epist. ii. 2, 40; comp. Juv. xiv. 237). Inkrhmas were also carried in the girdle (Ez. ix. 2).

The גִּרְגַּשְׂיִים, or girdle worn by the priests at the close-fitting tunic (Ex. xxviii. 39; xxxix. 29), is described by Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, § 2) as made of linen so fine of texture as to look like the slough of a snake, and embroidered with flowers of scarlet, purple, blue, and fine linen. It was about four fingers' broad, and was wrapped several times round the priest's body, the ends hanging down to the feet. When engaged in sacrifice, the priest threw the ends over his left shoulder. According to Maimonides (de Vos. Sanct. c. 8), the girdle worn both by the high-priest and the common priests was of white linen embroidered with wool, but that worn by the high-priest on the day of Atonement was entirely of white linen. The length of it was thirty-two cubits, and the breadth about three fingers. It was worn just below the arm-pit to avoid perspiration (comp. Ez. xlv. 18). Jerome (Ep. ad Fabianum, de Vest. Sacr.) follows Josephus. With regard to the manner in which the girdle was embroidered, the "needlework" (גִּרְגַּשְׂיִים, Ex. xxviii. 39) is distinguished in the Mishna from the "cunning-work" (גִּרְגַּשְׂיִים, Ex. xxvi. 31) as being worked by the needle with figures on one side only, whereas the latter was woven work with figures on both sides (Cod. Joma, c. 8). So also Maimonides (de Vos. Sanct. viii. 15). But Jarchi on Ex. xxvi. 31, 36, explains the difference as consisting in this, that in the former case the figures on the two sides are the same, whereas in the latter they are different.

In all passages, except Is. xxii. 21, גִּירָגָשְׂיִים is used of the girdle of the priests only, but in that instance it appears to have been worn by Shebna, the treasurer, as part of the insignia of his office; unless it be supposed that he was of priestly rank, and wore a girdle not above his priestly capacity. He is called "high-priest" in the Chronicana Persicale, p. 115 α', and in the Jewish tradition quoted by Jarchi in loc.

The "curious girdle" (גִּירָגָשְׂיִים, Ex. xxviii. 8) was made of the same materials and colors as the ephod, that is of "cold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen." Josephus describes it as sewn to the breastplate. After passing once round it was tied in front upon his loins, the ends hanging down (Ant. iii. 7, § 5). According to Maimonides it was of woven work.

"Girdle" is used figuratively in Ps. cix. 19; Is. xli. 5; cf. 1 Sam. ii. 4; Ps. xxxi. 11, lv. 12; Eph. vi. 14.

Gush Chalah: Arab. غاشلة, el-Ishkh, a village in Galilee on a hill about two hours northwest from Safid. It was fortified by order of Josephus, and was the last fortress in Galilee to surrender to the Roman armies (Joseph. B. J. ii. 20, § 6; iv. 2, §§ 1–5). It has been identified by Dr. Robinson as the modern el-Ishkh, which was destroyed by an earthquake in 1837 (Erbdt. Res. iii. 368 ff., 1st ed.). It must have been one of the towns in the circuit of Christ’s labors, and well known to his Galilean disciples. There was a tradition that the parents of Paul emigrated from this place to Tarsus. [See \textit{AHLAB}.

GISTA (גוISTA) [hearkening]: [FA.] Geresa: [Comp. Geräños; Rom. Vat. Alex. FA.] omit: Geryon), one of the overseers of the Nehumim, in “the Ophel,” after the return from Captivity (Neh. xi. 21). By the LXX. the name appears to have been taken as a place.

GITTACH-HEPHIER, Josh. xix. 13. [TATH-HEPHIER.]

GITTAIM (גיתאים). i.e. two wine-prepresses: [in 2 Sam., Detha, [Vat. Detha, Alex. Detha]; in Neh. xi. 33, Rom. Vat. Alex. FA.] omit: FA.] Detha], a place incidentally mentioned in 2 Sam. iv. 3, where the meaning appears to be that the inhabitants of Beeroth, which was allotted to Benjamin, had been compelled to fly from that place, and had taken refuge at Gittaim. Beeroth was one of the towns of the Gileadites (Josh. ix. 17): and the cause of the flight of its people may have been (though this is but conjecture) Saul’s persecution of the Gileadites alluded to in 2 Sam. xxi. 2. Gittaim is again mentioned [Neh. xi. 33] in the list of places inhabited by the Benjamites after their return from the Captivity, with Ramah, Nebatim, Lodi, and other known towns of Benjamin to the N. W. of Jerusalem. The two may be the same; though, if the persecution of the Gileadites proceeded from Benjamin, as we must infer it did, they would hardly choose as a refuge a place within the limits of that tribe. Gittaim is the dual form of the word Gath, which suggests the Philistine plain as its locality. But there is no evidence for or against this.

Gittaim occurs in the LXX. version of 1 Sam. xvi. 33 — "out of Gathaim roll me a great stone." But this is not supported by any other of the ancient versions, which unanimously adhere to the Heb. text, and probably proceeds from a mistake or corruption of the Hebrew word גותים: A. V. "ye have transgressed." It further occurs in the LXX. in Gen. xxxvi. 35 and 1 Chr. i. 40, as the representative of Avith, a change not so intelligible as the other, and equally unsupported by the other old versions.

GITTITES (גちなים, patron. from גתח, [Pethaios, Alex. Pethaios, Gathai]), the 600 men who followed David from Gath, under Ittai the Gittite (Gittite, 2 Sam. xv. 18, 19), and who probably acted as a kind of body-guard. Obad-edom the Levite, in whose house the Ark was for a time placed (2 Sam. vi. 10), and who afterwards served in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xxi. 38), is called "the Gittite" (גちなים). We can scarcely think, however, that he was so named from the royal city of the Philistines. May he not have been from the town of Gittaim in Benjamin (2 Sam. iv. 3; Neh. xi. 33), or from Gath-rimmon, a town of Dan, allotted to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 24), of whom Obad-edom seems to have been one (1 Chr. xxvi. 4)?

J. L. P.

GITTITH (גיתית) [see \textit{inpro}†], a musical instrument, by some supposed to have been used by the people of Gath, and thence to have been introduced by David into Palestine; and by others (who identify יגדית with גיתית, a wine-press, or trough, in which the grapes were trodden with the feet) to have been employed at the festivities of the vintage. The Chaldee paraphrase of יגדית יגדית, occasionally found in the heading of Psalms, is, "On the instrument יגדית יגדית ([Chorn], which was brought from Gath." Rashii, whilst he admits Gittith to be a musical instrument, in the manufacture of which the artisans of Gath excelled, quotes a Talmudic authority which would assign to the word a different meaning. "Our sages," says he, "have remarked: On the nations who are in future to be trodden down like a wine-press." (Comp. Is. lxiii. 3.) But neither of the Psalms, viii., lxxix., or lxxxiv., which have Gittith for a heading, contains any thing that may be connected with such an idea. The interpretation of the LXX. quote a Talmudic authority, "for the wine-presses," is condemned by Aleni-Exra and other eminent Jewish scholars. First (\textit{Concordance}) describes Gittith as a hollow instrument, from יגדית, to depose (synonymous with יגדית). D. W. M.

GIZONITE, THE (גיזונית: 5 פִּילָּחֵי).
GLASS (from ןוֹרֵז מָגָל; Doros: vitrum). The word occurs only in Job xxviii. 17, where in the A. V. it is rendered "crystal." It comes from נור (to be pure), and according to the best authorities means a kind of glass which in ancient days was held in high esteem (J. D. Michaelis, Hist. Vitri quod Habr.; and Hamburger, Hist. Vitri ex antiquitate erudie, quoted by Gesenius, s. v.). Symmachus renders it κρύσταλλος, but that is rather intended by שֶׁבֶל (Job xxviii. 18, A. V. "pears," LXX. γαβις, a word which also means "ice;" cf. Phin. H. N. xxxvii. 2), and שֶׁבֶל (Ez. 22). It seems then that Job xcviii. 17 contains the only allusion to glass found in the O. T., and even this reference is disputed. Besides Symmachus, others also render it διαυγή κρύσταλλον (Schenkener, Thesaur. s. v. בֵלָו), and it is argued that the word בֵלָו frequently means crystal. Thus the Schol. on Aristoph. Nath. 674, defines בֵלָו (when it occurs in old writers) as διαυρης λίθος ἐκκόκκος ὀκρός, and Hesychius gives as its equivalent λίθος τίμων. In Herodotus (iii. 24) it is clear that בֵלָו must mean crystal, for he says, "δε δε δις πολλή καὶ θερμος ὀρθέαται, καὶ Αἴτιλις Θάτις σημειώθη τετραγμενή" (i. 3; Bacher, On Ηεροδ. ii. 44; Heeren, Ideen, ii. 1, 355). Others consider מִילָח to be amber, or electrum, or alabaster (Boehart, Hieros. ii. vi. 872).

In spite of this absence of specific allusion to glass in the sacred writings, the Hebrews must have been aware of the invention. There has been a violent modern prejudice against the belief that glass was early known to, or extensively used by, the ancients, but both facts are now certain. From paintings representing the process of glass-blowing which have been discovered in paintings at Beni-Hassan, and in tombs at other places, we know that the invention is at least as remote as the age of Osiraen the first (perhaps a contemporary of Joseph), 3,500 years ago. A bead as old as 1500 B.C. was found by Captain Hervey at Thebes, "the specific gravity of which, 250.30, is precisely the same as that of the crown glass now made in England." Fragments too of wine-vases as old as the Exodus have been discovered in Egypt. Glass beads known to be ancient have been found in Africa, and also (it is said) in Cornwall and Ireland, which are in all probability the relics of an old Phoenician trade (Wilkinson, in Rowlandson's Herod. ii. 50, i. 475; Anc. Egypt. iii. 88-112). The art was also known to the ancient Assyrians (Layard, Niniveh, i. 42), and a glass bottle was found in the N. W. palace of Ninmurr, which has on it the name of Sargon, and is therefore probably older than 714 B.C. (id. Nin. and Bab. p. 197, 503). This is the earliest known specimen of transparent glass.

The disbelief in the antiquity of glass (in spite of the distinct statements of early writers) is difficult to account for, because the invention must almost naturally arise in making bricks or pottery, during which processes there must be at least a superficial vitrification. There is little doubt that the honor of the discovery belongs to the Egyptians. Pliny gives no date for his celebrated story of the discovery of glass from the solitary accident of some Phoenician sailors using blocks of natron to support hirr sanceners when they were unable to find stones for the purpose (H. N. xxxvi. 65). But this account is less likely than the supposition that vitreous matter first attracted observation from the action of lighting fires on the sand, 'in a country reducing natron or subcarbonate of soda' (Haw- linnson's Herod. ii. 32). It has been pointed out that Pliny's story may have originated in the fact that the sand of the Syrian river Belus,a at the mouth of which the incident is supposed to have occurred, "was esteemed peculiarly suitable for glass-making, and exported in great quantities to the workshops of Sidon and Alexandria, long the most famous in the ancient world (Dict. of Ant. art.) for where everything requisite to the illustration of the classical allusions to glass may be found. Some find a remarkable reference to this little river (respecting which see Lib. ii. N. v. 17, xxxvi. 65; Joseph. B. J. i. 10, § 2; Tac. Hist. v. 7) in the blessing to the tribe of Zebulun, "they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand" (Deut. xxxiii. 19). Both the name Delos (Reed, quoted in Dict. of Geogr. s. v. and the Hebrew word לִינוֹן, sand (Calmet, s. r.) have been suggested as derivations for the Greek ἰαλός, which is however, in all probability, from an Egyptian root.

Glass was not only known to the ancients, but used by them (as Winckelmann thinks) for more extensively than in modern times. They even tells us that it was employed in wallscotching (vitree camera, H. N. xxxvi. 94; Stat. Syr. i. v. 42). The Egyptians knew the art of cutting, grinding, and engraving it, and they could even inlay it with gold or enamel, and "permeate opaque glass with designs of various colors." Besides this they could color it with such brilliancy as to be able to imitate precious stones in a manner which often defied detection (Lib. ii. N. xxxvi. 26, 33, 75). This is probably the explanation of the incredibly large number of glass-finds which are found in various names, e. g. Larcher considers that the emerald column alluded to by Herodotus (iii. 44) was "du verre couleur dont l'intérieur était éclairé par des lampes." Strabo was told by an Alexandrian glass-maker that this success was partly due to a rare and valuable earth found in Egypt (Beckmann, History of Inventions, "Colored Glass," i. 195 f. Eng. Transl., also iii. 208 f., iv. 54). Yet the perfectly clear and transparent glass was considered the most valuable (Lib. xxxvi. 26).

Some suppose that the proper name לִינוֹן (burnings by the waters) contains an allusion to Sidonian glass-factories (Meier on Jos. xi. 8, xiiii. 6), but it is much more probable that it was so called from the burning of Judah's chariots at that place (Lord A. Hervey, On the Genealogies, p. 228), or from hot springs.

In the N. T. glass is alluded to as an emblem of brightness (Rev. iv. 6, xv. 2, xvi. 18). The three other places where the word occurs in the A. V. (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Jam. i. 23), as also the word "glass" (Is. iii. 24), are considered under MIHRONS. For, strange to say, although the ancients were aware of the reflective power of glass, and although the Sidonians used it for mirrors (Lib. ii. N. xxxvi. 66), yet for some unexplained reason mirrors of glass must have proved unsuccessful, since even under the empire they were universally made of metal, which is at once less perfect, more expensive, and more difficult to preserve (Dict. of Ant. art. Speculum).

GLEANING (גֶּלֶנֶּה) as applied to produce generally, גָּלֶנֶּה rather to corn. The remarks under GLEAN on the definite character of the rights of the poor, or rather of poor relations and dependents, to a share of the crop, are especially exemplified in the instance of Ruth gleaning in the field of Boaz. Poor young women, recognized as being "his maids," were gleaning his field, and on her claim upon him by near affinity being made known, she was hidden to join them and not go to any other field; but for this, the reaper might have driven her away (Ruth ii. 6, 8, 9). The gleanings of fruit trees, as well as of cornfields, was reserved for the poor. Hence the proverb of Gideon. Judg. viii. 2. Maimonides indeed lays down the principle (Constitutiones de domus poenarum, cap. ii. 1), that whatever crop or growth is fit for food, is kept, and gathered all at once, and carried into store, is liable to that law. See for further remarks, Maimon, Constitutiones de domus poenarum, cap. iv.

H. II.

GLEDE, the old name for the common kite (Milvus ater), occurs only in Deut. xiv. 13 (תּוּרֵן) among the unclean birds of prey, and if תּוּרֵן be the correct reading, we must suppose the name to have been taken from the bird's acuteness of vision; but as in the parallel passage in Lev. xi. 14 we find תּוּרֵן, vultur, it is probable that we should read תּוּרֵן in Deut. also. The LXX. have γαλάζω in both places.

W. D.

GNAT (_packet), mentioned only in the proverbs, expression used by our Saviour in Matt. xxiii. 24, 'Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.' "Strain at, in the A. V., seems to be a typographical error, since the translations before the A. V. had 'strain out,'" the Greek word δοχίαν signifying to strain through (a sieve, etc.), to filter (see Trench, On the Author Vers., 1st ed. p. 131) [2d ed. p. 172]. The Greek κατάρδας is the generic word for gnat.

GOAD. The equivalent terms in the Hebrew are (1) תּוּרֵן (Judg. iii. 31), and (2) תּוּרֵן (1 Sam. xiii. 21; Exch. xii. 11). The explanation given by John (Archaeol. i. 4, § 59) that is the former represents the pole, and the latter the iron spike with which it was shod for the purpose of goading. With regard to the latter, however, it may refer to anything pointed, and the tenor of Exch. xii. requires rather the sense of a peg or nail, anything in short which can be fastened; while in 1 Sam. xiii. the point of the ploughshare is more probably intended. The former does probably refer to the goad, the long handle of which might be used as a formidable weapon (comp. Hom. Mus. i. 135), though even this was otherwise understood by the LXX. as a ploughshare (τρόφιμον ὑποτροφίας); it should also be noted that the etymological force of the word is that of guiding (from תּוּרֵן, to teach) rather than goading (Sachschi. Archael. i. 105). There are undoubted references to the use of the goad in driving oxen in Exchus. xxviii. 25. and Acts xxvi. 14. The instrument, as still used in the countries of southern Europe and western Asia, consists of a rod about eight feet long, brought to a sharp point and sometimes curved with iron at the head (Harmer's Observations, iii. 348). The expression ἐν τῷ κωπίῳ αὐτοῦ (Acts iv. 26; A. V. "æt his pike"), was proverbially used by the Greeks for vaunting resistance to superior power (comp. Esch. Agam. 1633, Prom. 323; Eurip. Bacch. 791).

W. L. B.

* The use of the goad in driving animals, which is still common in the East, is implied in 2 K. iv. 24, where it explains a slight obscurity in the verse as given in the A. V. Mounted on her donkey—
GOAT

The favorite mode of travelling with oriental ladies - the Shunammite, intent on the utmost dispatch, directs her servant, running by her side, to urge the animal with the goad to its full speed.

The long ox-goat, used in the field, with an iron point at one end, and an iron paddle at the other to clean the plough in the furrows, often was, and still is, a massive implement. In the hands of a strong and valiant man, like Shamgar, as represented in Judg. iii. 31, it would be a destructive weapon. (See Hackett's Illustr. of Scripture, p. 155.)

GOAT. I. Of the Hebrew words which are translated goat and she-goat in A. V., the most common is יָּרֵךְ = Syr. ܠNavbar, Arab. ܢܢ resize, Phoen. ܢܢ resize.

The Indo-Germanic languages have a similar word in Sanskr. agra = goat, ayā = she-goat, Ger. gera or gems, Greek aigē or aigyn. The derivation from יָּרֵךְ, to be strong, points to go as the original meaning, but it is also specially used for she-goat, as in Gen. xv. 9, xxxi. 28, xxxii. 14; Num. xvi. 37. In Judg. vi. 19 יָּרֵךְ is rendered kid, and in Deut. iv. 4 יָּרֵךְ is rendered the goat, but properly signifies flock of goats. יָּרֵךְ is used elliptically for goats' hair in Ex. xxvi. 7, xxxvi. 14, &c., Num. xxxvi. 29, and in 1 Sam. xix. 13.

2. יָּרֵךְ are wild or mountain goats, and are rendered wild goats in three passages of Scripture in which the word occurs, namely, 1 Sam. xxiv. 2, Job xxxix. 1, and Ps. civ. 18. The word is from a root יָּרֵךְ, to ascend or climb, and is the Heb. name of the ibex, which abounds in the mountainous parts of the ancient territory of Moab. In Job xxxix. 1, the LXX. have τραγαλαύρεος πετράς.

3. יָּרֵךְ is rendered the wild goat in Deut. xiv. 5, and occurs only in this passage. It is a contracted form of יָּרֵךְ, according to Lee, who renders it gazelle, but it is more properly the tragelaphus or goat-hair (Shaw. Suppl. p. 76).

4. יָּרֵךְ, a he-goat, as Gesenius thinks, of four months old - strong and vigorous. It occurs only in the plural, and is rendered by A. V. indifferently goats and he-goats (see Ps. i. 9 and 13). In Jer. i. 8 it signifies he-goats, leaders of the flock, and hence its metaphorical use in Is. xiv. 9 for chief ones of the earth, and in Zech. x. 3, where goats = principal men, chiefs. It is derived from the root יָּרֵךְ, to set, to place, to prepare.

5. יָּרֵךְ occurs in 2 Chr. xxxix. 21, and in Dan. viii. 5, 8 - it is followed by יָּרֵךְ and signifies he-goat of the goats. Gesenius derives it from יָּרֵךְ, to leap. It is a word found only in the later books of the O. T. In Ezr. vi. 17 we find the Chal. form of the word יָּרֵךְ.

6. יָּרֵךְ is translated goat, and signifies properly a he-goat, being derived from יָּרֵךְ, to stand in end, to bristle. It occurs frequently in Leviticus and Numbers (יָּרֵךְ יָּרֵךְ), and is the goat of the sin-offering, Lev. ix. 3, 13, 16. The word is used as an adjective with יָּרֵךְ in Dan. viii. 21 "— and the goat, the rough one, is the king of Javan."

7. יָּרֵךְ is from a root יָּרֵךְ, o strike. It is rendered he-goat in Gen. xxx. 35, xxxix. 15, Prov. xxx. 9, and 2 Chr. xxvii. 11. It does not occur elsewhere.

8. יָּרֵךְ, scape-goat in Lev. xvi. 8, 10, 26. On this word see Atonement, Day of, p. 197.

In the N. T. the words rendered goats in Matt. xxv. 32, 35, are θηρίον and θηρίον = a young goat, or kid; and in Heb. ix. 12, 13, 19, and x. 4, θηρίον = he-goat. Goat-skins, in Heb. xi. 37, are in the Greek, εὖ αἰγελόν δίδωσαν; and in Judg. xi. 17 αἰγελόν is rendered goats.

W. D.

There appear to be two or three varieties of the common goat (Hircus saginus) at present bred in Palestine and Syria, but whether they are identical with those which were reared by the ancient Hebrews it is not possible to say. The most marked are the Syrian goat (Capra bannenii, Linn.), with long thick pendent ears, which are, says Russell (Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, ii. 150, 2d ed.), a foot long, and the Angoran goat (Capra angorica, Linn.), with fine long hair. The Syrian goat is mentioned by Aristotle (Hist. An. ix. 27, § 3). There is also a variety that differs but little from British specimens. Goats have from the earliest ages been considered important animals in rural economy, both on account of the milk they afford, and the excellency of the flesh of the young animals. The goat is figured on the Egyptian monuments (see Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. i. 223). Col. Ham. Smith (Griffith's An. King. iv. 308) describes three Egyptian breeds: one with long hair, depressed horns, ears small and pendent; another with horns very spiral, and ears longer than the head; and a third, which occurs in Upper Egypt, without horns.

Goats were offered as sacrifices (Lev. iii. 12, ix. 15; Ex. xii. 5, etc.); their milk was used as food (Prov. xxvii. 27); their flesh was eaten (Deut. iv. 4; Gen. xxviii. 9); their hair was used for the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 7, xxxvi. 14), and for stuffing cushions (1 Sam. xix. 13); their skins were sometimes used as clothing (Heb. xi. 37).

The passage in Cant. iv. 1, which compares the hair of the beloved to "a flock of goats that eat of Mount Gilgal," probably alludes to the fine hair of the Angoran breed. Some have very plausibly supposed that the prophet Amos (iii. 12), when he speaks of a shepherd "taking out of the mouth of the lion two legs or a piece of an ear," alludes to the long pendulous ears of the Syrian breed (see Harmer's Obs. iv. 162). In Prov. xxx. 31, a goat is mentioned as one of the "four things which are incomy in going;" in allusion, probably, to the stately march of the leader of the flock, which was always associated in the minds of the Hebrews with the notion of dignity. Hence the metaphor in Is. xiv. 9, "all the chief ones (marg., great goats) of the earth." So the Alexandrine version of the LXX. understands the allusion. καὶ τραγόες ἀγγελικές αἰγολοι.α

speaks of these animals: "In all the valleys south of the Modjeb, and particularly in those of Modjeb and El Asia, large herds of mountain goats, called by the Arabs Beden (בְּדוּן), are met with. This is the steinbock a or bouquetin of the Swiss and Tyrol Alps. They pasture in flocks of forty and fifty together. Great numbers of them are killed by the people of Kerek and Tafylé, who hold their flesh in high estimation. They sell the large knotty horns to the Hebrew merchants, who carry them to Jerusalem, where they are worked into handles for knives and daggers. . . . . The Arabs told me that it is difficult to get a shot at them, and that the hunters hide themselves among the reeds on the banks of streams where the animals resort in the evening to drink. They also asserted that, when pursued, they will throw themselves from a height of fifty feet and more upon their heads without receiving any injury." Hasselquist (Trav. p. 160) speaks of rock goats (Capra cervicapra, Linna.) which he saw hunted with falcons near Nazareth. But the C. cervicapra of Linnæus is an antelope (Antilope cervicapra, Pall.).

There is considerable difficulty attending the identification of the akkô (אֵקָה), which the LXX. render by γραβάς, and the Vulg. trigebalus. The word, which occurs only in Deut. xiv. 5 as one of the animals that might be eaten, is rendered "wild goat" by the A. V. Some have referred the akkô to the abu of the Persians, i.e. the Capreolus pygargus, or the "tailless roe" (Skene, Zool. ii. 297), of Central Asia. If we could satisfactorily establish the identity of the Persian word with the Hebrew, the animal in question might represent the akkô of the Pentateuch, which might formerly have inhabited the Lebanon, though it is not found in Palestine now. Perhaps the pusang (Cap. aegagrus, L. v.) which some have taken to be the parent stock of the common goat, and which at present inhabits the mountains of Persia and Caucasus, may have in Biblical times been found in Palestine and may be the akkô of Scripture. But we allow this is mere conjecture.

by the account of a third and subsequent fight, which all agree happened at Gath (2 Sam. xxii. 20); 1 Chr. xx. 6), and which, from the terms of the narrative, seems to have occurred at the same place as the others. The suggestion of Nob — which Davidson {Hebr. Text} reports as in many MSS. and which is also found in copies of the LXX. — is not admissible on the account of the situation of that place. G.

GOLAN [גּוֹלָן: a circle, region, Dict. Fürst; migration, Ges.] = Gaulan' [in 1 Chr. vi. 71, Gaulan: Alex. also in Josh. Gaulan: Gaulon, exc. Dict. Golon], a city of Bashan (יַעַר בַּשָּׁן, 1 Sam. iv. 43) allotted out of the half tribe of Manasseh to the Levites (Josh. xiii. 27), and one of the three cities of refuge east of the Jordan (xx. 8).

We find no further notice of it in Scripture; and though Eshehins and Jerome say it was still an important place in their time (Quom. s. v.; Reuand, p. 815), its very site is now unknown. Some have supposed that the village of Nune, on the eastern border of Jordan, around which are extensive ruins (see Handbook for Syr. and Pol.), is identical with the ancient Golon; but for this there is not a shadow of evidence; and Nume besides is much too far to the eastward.

The city of Golan is several times referred to by Josephus (Ἰωάννης, B. J. i. 4, § 4, and 8); he, however, more frequently speaks of the province which took its name from it, Gaulanitis (Ἰωάννητις). When the kingdom of Israel was overthrown by the Assyrians, and the dominion of the Jews in Bashan ceased, it appears that the aboriginal tribes, before kept in subjection, but never annihilated, rose again to some power, and rent the country into provinces. Two of these provinces at least were of ancient origin [Trachonitis and Hauran], and had been distinct principalities previous to the time when Og or his predecessors united them under one sceptre. Before the Babylonian captivity Bashan appears in Jewish history as one kingdom: but subsequent to that period it is spoken of as divided into four provinces — Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanaea (Joseph. Ant. iv. 5, § 3, and 7, § 4, i. 6, § 4, xvi. 9, § 1; B. J. i. 20, § 4, iii. 3, § 1, iv. 1, § 1). It seems that when the city of Golan rose to power it became the head of a large province, the extent of which is pretty accurately given by Josephus, especially when his statements are compared with the modern divisions of Bashan. It lay east of Galilee, and north of Gadaritis (Gadara, Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, § 1). Gaulana, an important town on the eastern bank of the Sea of Galilee, now called El-Hasa (see Handbook for Syr. and Pol.), and the province attached to it, were included in Gaulanitis (B. J. iv. 1, § 1).

But the boundary of the provinces of Gadara and Gaulanitis must evidently have been the river Hermonax, which may therefore be regarded as the south border of Gaulanitis. The Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to its fountains at Dan and Cesaron-Philippi, formed the western boundary (B. J. iii. 3, § 5). It is important to observe that the boundaries of the modern province of Joufia (יוּמִּי) is the Arabic form of the Hebrew מִשָּׁר (Mishar) is given in 1 K. xx. 23, 25 — "the plow" in which the Syrians were overthrown by the Israelites, near Aphek, which perhaps stood upon the site of the modern Fik (stanley, App. § 6; Handbook for S. and P. p. 425). The western side of Gaulanitis, along the Sea of Galilee, is steep, rugged, and bare. It is upwards of 2,500 feet in height, and when seen from the city of Tiberias resembles a mountain range, though in reality it is only the supporting wall of the plateau. It was this elevated site that led the classical geographers to suppose that the mountain range of Gilead was joined to Lebanon (Reuand, p. 342).

Further north, along the bank of the upper Jordan, the plateau breaks down in a series of terraces, which, though somewhat rocky, are covered with rich soil, and clothed in spring with the most luxuriant herbage, spangled with multitudes of bright and beautiful flowers. A range of low, round-topped, picturesque hills, extends southwards for nearly 20 miles from the base of Hermon along the western edge of the plateau. These are in places covered with noble forests of prickly oak and terebinth. Gaulanitis was once densely populated, but it is now almost completely deserted. The writer has a list of the towns and villages which it once contained; and in it are the names of 127 places, all of which, with the exception of about twelve, are now unrecognised. Only a few patches of its soil are cultivated; and the very best of its pasture is lost — the tender grass of early spring. The flocks of the Turkmans and el-Fudhul Arabs — the only tribes that remain permanently in this region — are not able to consume it; and the Amaziah, those "children of the East," who spread over the land like locusts, and whose camels are without number (Judg. xii. 12), only arrive about
GOLD

The most valuable of metals, from its color, lustre, weight, ductility, and other useful properties (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 19). Hence it is used as an emblem of purity (Job xxii. 10) and nobility (Lam. iv. 1). There are six Hebrew words used to denote it, and four of them occur in Job xxviii. 15, 16, 17. These are:

1. בּהֵם (Behem), the common name, connected with בּהֵמ (to be yellow), as gold, from yel, yellow. Various epithets are applied to it: as, "fine" (2 Chr. iii. 5), "refined" (1 Chr. xxviii. 18), "pure" (Ex. xxv. 11). In opposition to these, "beaten" gold (גּוֹד הַיְמֵן) is probably mixed gold; LXX. δαντός; used of Solomon's shields (1 K. x. 16).

2. יִרְצִיז (Yeritz) treasured, i.e. c. fine gold (1 K. vi. 29, vii. 49, &c.). Many names of precious substances in Hebrew come from roots signifying concealment, as יִרְצִיז (Gen. xxxii. 23, A. V. "treasure").

3. יִרְצִי (Yerits), pure or native gold (Job xxviii. 17; Cant. v. 15; probably from יִרְצִי to separate). Rosenmuller (Altehistisches, iv. p. 49) makes it come from a Syrian root meaning solid or massy; but יִרְצִיז (2 Chr. ix. 17) corresponds to יִרְצִי (1 K. x. 18).

The LXX. renders it by λίθος τίμως, χριστόν ἄργυρον (Is. xiii. 12; Theod. ἄργυρον; comp. Thub. ii. 13; Plin. xxxii. 19, otherwise). In Ps. xxxix. 12, the LXX. render it τοῦ ἄργυρου, the Hebrew word being adopted to avoid the repetition of χριστόν (Thes. s. v. τόσσος; Hesych. s. v. τόσσος).

4. יִרְצִי, gold earth, or a mass of raw ore (Job xxii. 24, ἄργυρον, A. V. "gold as dust").

The poetical names for gold are:

1. יִרְצִי (Yeritz) (also implying something concealed): LXX. χριστόν; and in Is. xiii. 12, λίθος τίμως. In Job xxxvii. 22, it is rendered in L. V. "fair weather." LXX. ρέφι χρυσαυγινα. (Comp. Zeoh. iv. 12.)

2. יִרְצִי (Yeritz) = day out (Prov. viii. 10), a general name, which has become special, Ps. lviii. 13, where it cannot mean genus, as some suppose (Boehm, Hist. pop. tom. ii. p. 9). Michaelis connects the word יִרְצִי with the Greek χριστός.

Gold was known from the earliest times (Gen. ii. 11). Phiny attributes the discovery of it (at Mount Pangaeans), and the art of working it, to Cadmus (H. N. vii. 57); and his statement is adopted by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. 363, ed. Vott.). It was at first chiefly used for ornaments, etc. (Gen. xxiv. 22); and although Abraham is said to have been "very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold" (Gen. xiii. 2), yet no mention of it as used in purchases, is made till after his return from Egypt. coined money was not known to the ancients (e.g. Hom. H. vii. 473) till a comparatively late period; and on the Egyptian tombs gold is represented as being weighed in rings for commercial purposes. (Comp. Gen. xxiii. 21.) No coins are found in the ruins of Egypt or Assyria (Layard, Nin. ii. 418.). "Even so late as the time of David gold was not used as a standard of value, but was considered merely as a very precious article of commerce, and was weighed like other articles" (Iahn, Arch. Bibl. § 115, 1 Chr. xii. 25).

Gold was extremely abundant in ancient times (1 Chr. xii. 4: 2 Chr. i. 15, ix. 9; Nah. ii. 9; Dan. iii. 1); but this did not depreciate its value, because of the enormous quantities consumed by the wealthy in furniture, etc. (1 K. vi. 22, x. passim; Cant. iii. 9, 10; Esth. i. 10, iv. x. 11; comp. Hom. Od. xix. 55; Herod. ix. 82). Probably too the art of gilding was known extensively, being applied even to the battlements of a city (Herod. i. 98, and other authorities quoted by Layard, ii. 264).

The chief countries mentioned as producing gold are Arabia, Sheba, and Ophir (1 K. ix. 28. x. 1; Job xxii. 24, the word ἀργυρός is used for gold). Gold is not found in Arabia now (Niebuhr's Travels, p. 141), but it is used to be (Artemidor. ap. Strab. xvi. 3, 18, where he speaks of an Arabian river ψεύδια μα χρυσων καταφεϊε). Dioscorides also says that it was found there native (ἀργυρός) in good-sized nuggets (βαλανία). Some suppose that Ophir was an Arabian port to which gold was brought (comp. 2 Chr. ii. 7, ix. 10). Other gold-bearing countries were Uphaia (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5) and Paraim (2 Chr. iii. 6).

Metallurgical processes are mentioned in Is. lxvi. 10, Prov. xv. 23, xxii. 21; and in Is. xvi. 6, the trade of goldsmiths (cf. Judg. xvii. 4, יִרְצִים) is alluded to in connection with the overvaluing of idols with gold-leaf (Rosenmuller's Minerals of Script. pp. 46-51). [Handicraft.] F. W. F. *GOLDSMITH. [Handicraft.]

GOLGOTA ( Garner [a skull]; Golgotho, the Hebrew name of the spot at which our Lord was crucified (Matt. xxvii. 33; Mark xv. 22: John xix. 17). By these three Evangelists it is interpreted to mean the "place of a skull," St. Luke, in accordance with his practice in other cases (compare Gabbatha, Gethsemane, etc.), omits the Hebrew term and gives only its Greek equivalent, κρανίων. The word Calvary, which in Luke xviii. 33 is retained in the A. V. from the Vulgate, as the rendering of κρανίων, obscures the statement of St. Luke, whose words are really as follows: "the place which is called 'a skull'" —not, as in the other Gospels, κρανίων, of a skull; thus employing the Greek term exactly as they do the Hebrew one. [Culverly, Amer. ed.]. This Hebrew, or rather Chaldee, term, was doubtless יִשְׂרָאֵל, Ga'ṭana, in pure Hebrew יִשְׂרָאֵל, applied to the skull on account of its round globular form, that being the idea at the root of the word.

Two explanations of the name are given: (1) that it was a spot where executions ordinarily took place, and therefore surrounded in skulls; but according to the Jewish law these were not bereated, and Goliath were no more likely to confer a name on the spot than any other part of the skeleton. In this case too the Greek should be τότος κρασιον; "a skull," instead of κρασιον, "of a skull," still less "of skull" as in the Hebrew, and in the Greek of St. Luke. Or (2) it may come from the look or form of the spot itself, bald, round, and skull-like, and therefore a mound or hillock, in accordance with the common phrase — for which there is no direct authority — "Mount Calvary."

Whichever of these is the correct explanation — and there is apparently no means of deciding with certainty — Golgotha seems to have been a known spot. This is to be gathered from the way in which it is mentioned in the Gospels, each except St. Matthew having the definite article — "the place Golgotha" — "the place which is called a skull" — "the place (A. V. omits the article) called of, or after, a skull." It was "outside the gate," ἐκ τῆς πύλης (Heb. xiii. 12) but close to the city, ἐγέρσαι τις πόλεως (John xix. 20); apparently near a thoroughfare on which there were passers-by. This road or path led out of the "country" (ἀγρός). It was probably the ordinary spot for executions. Why should it have been otherwise? To those at least who carried the sentence into effect, Christ was but an ordinary criminal; and there is not a word to indicate that the soldiers in "leading Him away" went to any other than the usual place for what must have been a common operation. However, in the place (ἐν τῷ τῆς) itself — at the very spot — was a garden or orchard (κῆπος).

These are all the indications of the nature and situation of Golgotha which present themselves in the N. T. Its locality in regard to Jerusalem is fully examined in the description of the city. [JERUSALEM.]

A tradition at one time prevalent that Adam was buried on Golgotha, that from his skull it derived its name, and that at the Crucifixion the drops of Christ's blood fell on the skull and raised Adam to life, whereby the ancient prophecy quoted by St. Paul in Eph. v. 14 received its fulfillment — "Awake, thou Adam that sleepest," — so the old versions appear to have run — and arise from the dead, for Christ shall touch thee" (ἐπιφάνειας γιὰ ἐπιφανείας). See Jerome, Comen. on Matt. xxvii. 33, and the quotation in Roland, P. L. p. 800; also Sawulf, in Early Travel. p. 23. The skull commonly introduced in early pictures of the Crucifixion refers to this.

A connection has been supposed to exist between Gath and Golgotha, but at the best this is mere conjecture, and there is not in the original the same similarity between the two names — יִשֵּב and יְשַׁלֵּש — which exists in their English or Latin garb, and which probably occasioned the suggestion. G.

GOLIATH (גּוֹלִיאָת) [ lyon.cour, brilliant, Dietr.; see below]: Goláth: Goliath, a famous giant of Gath, who "morning and evening for forty days" fed the armies of Israel (1 Sam. xvii.). He was possibly descended from the old Rephaim, of whom scattered remnants took refuge with the Philistines after their dispersion by the Ammonites (Deut. ii. 20, 21; 2 Sam. xxi. 22). Some trace of this tradition may be preserved in the giant's name, if it be connected with יִשֵּב, an exile. Simonia, however, derives it from an Arabic word meaning "a stout" (Gesen. Thes. s. v.). His height was "six cubits and a span," which, taking the cubit at 21 inches, would make him 10 feet high. But the LXX. and Josephus read "four cubits and a span" (1 Sam. xvii. 4; Joseph. Ant. vi. 9, § 1). This will make him about the same size as the royal champion slain by Antiochus, brother of Anticlaudus (αὐτοκράτορα μινός μακρόσπονδος βασιλεύς, ap. Strab. xiii. p. 617, with Müller's emendation). Even on this computation Goliath would be, as Josephus calls him, "εὐρύς ταμειγευθήτωρ — a truly enormous man.

The circumstances of the combat are in all respects Homeric; free from any of the pauser legends which oriental imagination subsequently introduced into it — as for instance that the stones used by David called out to him from the brook, "by our means you shall slay the giant," etc. (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. i. 3, p. 111 ff. D'Herbe, s. v. Goliath). The fancies of the Rabbis are yet more extraordinary. After the victory David cut off Goliath's head (1 Sam. xvii. 51; comp. Herod. iv. 6; Xenoph. Anab. v. 4, § 17; Niebuhr mentions a similar custom among the Arabs, Descr. Winer, s. c., which he brought to Jerusalem (probably after his accession to the throne, Ewald, Gesch. iii. 94), while he hung the armor in his tent.

The scene of this famous combat was the Valley of the Terebinth, between Shochoh and Azekah, probably among the western passes of Benjamin, although a confused modern tradition has given the name of 'Ain Jalál (spring of Goliath) to the spring of Harod, or "trembling" (Stanley, p. 342; Judg. vii. 1). [ELAH, VALLEY OF.]

In 2 Sam. xxi. 19, we find that another Goliath of Gath, of whom it is also said that "the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam," was slain by Elnathan, also a Bethlehemite. St. Jerome (Quest. Hebr. ad loc.) makes the unlikely conjecture that Elnathan was another name of David. The A. V. here interposes the words "the brother of," from 1 Chr. xx. 5, where this giant is called "Lahmi." This will be found fully examined under Elnathan.

In the title of the Psalm added to the Psalter in the LXX. we find τό Γαλίας πάνω τῶν Γολοθάς; and although the allusions are vague, it is perhaps possible that this Psalm may have been written after the victory. This Psalm is given at length under David, p. 554 b. It is strange that we find no more definite allusions to this combat in Hebrew poetry: but it is the opinion of some that the song now attributed to Nathan (1 Sam. ii. 1-10) was originally written in commemoration of David's triumph on this occasion (Theol. Gr. Bücher Sam., p. 8; comp. Berthold, Einl. iii. 915; Ewald, Poet. Bücher des A. B. i. ii. 111).

By the Mohammedans Saul and Goliath are called Taluth and Ghaluth (Jalut in Koran), perhaps for the sake of the homoeoteleuton, of which they are so fond (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. i. 3, p. 28). Abulfeda mentions a Canannite king of the name Jalut (Hist. Antiquit., p. 170, in Winer s. v.); and, according to Ahmed al-Fasi, Ghalut was a dynastic name of the old giant-chiefs (D'Herbe, s. v. Falasthin). [GIANTS.] F. W. F.

GOMER (גומר) [complete text: פועף; [in Ezck. פועף] Gomer). 1. The eldest son of Japheth, and the father of Ashkenaz, Eliphath, and Togarnah (Gen. x. 2, 3; [1 Chr. i. 5, 6]). His name is subsequently noticed but once (Ez. xxxviii. 6) as an ally or subject of the Great King. He is generally recognized as the progenitor of the early Cimmerians, of the later Cimi and the other branches of the Celta family, and of the modern Cossack and Cymry, the latter preserving with very slight deviation the original name. The Cimmerians, when first known to us, occupied the Thracian Cernose, where they left traces of their presence in the ancient names, Cimmerian Bosphorus, Cimmerian Olus, Mount Cimera, the district of Cimera, and particularly the Cimmerian walls (Her. iv. 12, 45, 100; Ezck. Prom. Vind. 720), and in the modern name Cimuna. They forsook this abode under the pressure of the Scythian tribes, and during the early part of the 7th century B.C. they poured over the western part of Asia Minor, committing immense devastation, and dying for more than half a century the power of the Lydian kings. They were finally expelled by Artaxerxes, with the exception of a few, who settled at Sinope and Antipatris. It was about the same period that Ezekiel noticed them, as acting in conjunction with Armenia (Togarnah) and Magog (Scythia). The connection between Gomer and Armenia is supported by the tradition, preserved by Moses of Chorene (i. 11), that Gamin was the ancestor of the Haueian kings of the latter country. After the expulsion of the Cimmerians from Asia Minor their name disappears in its original form but there can be little reasonable doubt that both the name and the people are to be recognized in the Cimi, whose abodes were fixed during the Roman Empire in the north and west of Europe, particularly in the Cimbrian Cernose (Dacian), on the coast between the Elbe and Ribble, and in Belgium, whence they crossed to Britain, and occupied at one period the whole of the British isles, but were ultimately driven back to the western and northern districts, which their descendants still occupy in two great divisions, the Cossack in Ireland and Scotland, the Cymry in Wales. The latter name preserves a greater similarity to the original Gomer than either of the classical forms, the consonants being identical. The link to connect Cymry with Cimbra is furnished by the forms Cimbra and Cambri-land. The whole Celtic race may therefore be regarded as descended from Gomer, and thus the opinion of Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 1), that the Cimbrians were sprung from him, may be reconciled with the view propounded. Various other conjectures have been hazarded on the subject: Bocchart (Phyto. ii. 81) identifies the name on zoological grounds with Plutus; Wall (Jus. ii. 274) proposes Capceporus; and Kalbitz (Com. on Gen.) seeks to identify it with the Chonara, a nation in Bactria, noticed by Ptolemy (xiv. 11, § 6).

2. [תעֹּף]. The daughter of Diblahim, and concubine of Hosea (i. 3). The name is significant of a maiden, and signifies well with the name Diblahim, which is also derived from the subject of fruit.

GOMORRAH (גומרות) [complete text: פועף; [in Ezck. פועף] Gomorrah, probably submersion, from פועף, an unused root; in Arabic ﻓَوْضَأ, ﻣُغَمَّر, is to "overwhelm with water"; פּוּפָּה: Gomorrah), one of the five cities of the plain," or "vale of Siddim," that under their respective kings joined battle there with Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2-8) and his allies, by whom they were discomfited till Abram came to the rescue. Four out of the five were afterwards destroyed by the Lord with fire from heaven (Gen. xiv. 23-25). One of them only, Zoor or Bela, which was its original name, was spared at the request of Lot, in order that he might take refuge there. Of these Gomorrah seems to have been only second to Sodom in importance, as well as in the wickedness that led to their overthrow. What that atrocity may have been is gathered from Gen. xiv. 4-8. Their miserable fate is held up as a warning to the children of Israel (Deut. xxix. 23); as a precedent for the destruction of Babylon (Is. xiii. 19), and Jer. i. 40, of Edom (Jer. xiii. 18), of Moab (Zeph. ii. 9), and even of Israel (Am. iv. 11), with the remnant of Judah (2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude, xxv. 4-5), it is made an example unto those that after should live ungodly, or deny Christ. Similarly their wickedness rings as a proverb throughout the prophecies (e.g. Deut. xxxii. 32; Is. i. 9, 10; Jer. xxiii. 14). Jerusalem herself is there unequivocally called Sodom, and her people Gomorrah, for their enormities: just in the same way that the corruptions of the Church of Rome have caused her to be called Babylon. On the other hand, according to the N. T., there is a sin which exceeds even that of Sodom and Gomorrah, that, namely, of which Tyre and Sidon, Capernaum, Chorazin, and Bethsaida were guilty, when they "repealed not," in spite of "the mighty works which they had witnessed (Matt. x. 15, and St. Mark has ranged under the same category all those who would not receive the preaching of the kingdom iv. 11).

To turn to their geographical position, one passage of Scripture seems expressly to assert that the vale of Siddim had become the "salt," or dead, "sea" (Gen. xiv. 3), called elsewhere too the "sea of the plain" (Josh. xii. 3): the expression, however, occurs antecedently to their overthrow. Josephus (Ant. i. 9) says that the lake Asphaltites or Dead Sea, was formed out of what used to be the valley where Sodom stood: but elsewhere he declares that the territory of Sodom was not submerged in the lake (B. J. iv. 8, § 4), but still existed parched and burnt up, as is the appearance of that region still: and certainly nothing in Scripture would lead to the idea that they were destroyed by submersion — though they may have been submerged afterwards when destroyed — for their destruction is expressly attributed to the fierceness and fire rained upon them from heaven (Gen. xix. 24; see also Deut. xxiv. 23, and Zeph. ii. 9; also St. Peter and St. Jude before cited). And St. Jerome in the Commentation says of Sodom, "Evitavit..."
GOMORRAH

GORTYNA

Gomorrha (Gomorrah): in the name in which the name Gomorrha is written in the A. V. of the Apocryphal books and the New Testament, following the Greek form of the word, Κωμόρρα (2 Esdr. ii. 8; Matt. x. 15; Mark vi. 11; Rom. ix. 29; Jude 7; 2 Pet. ii. 6).

*GOODMAN OF THE HOUSE (οἰκοδεσπότης), employed in the A. V. of the master of the house (Matt. xx. 11), and simply equivalent to that expression, without any reference to moral character. This was a common usage when the A. V. was made. The Greek term being the same, there was no good reason for saying "goodman of the house" in that verse, and "housekeeper" at the beginning of the parable (ver. 1). See Trench, Authorized Version, p. 96 (1850).

Gopher Wood. Only once in Gen. vi. 14. The Hebrew שֵׁלֶג תַּנֶּג, trees of Gopher, does not occur in the cognate languages. The A. V. has made no attempt at translation: the LXX. (γάλα ῥερπέωνα) and Vulgate (lignum keríggito), elected by means as "of" and "like the cedar" (see 2 K. 25:13), the former having reference to square blocks, cut by the axe, the latter to planks smoothed by the plane, have not found much favor with modern commentators.

The conjectures of cedur (Aben Ezra, Onk Jonath, and Rabbins generally), wood most proper to float (Kimchi), the Greek κερπεδαν (Jun Trench.; Bux, πᾶν (Aven.; Munst.), τοπεαντίον (Castado), are little better than gratuitous. The rendering cedur has been defended by Pilletier, who refers to the great abundance of this tree in Asia, and the durability of its timber.

The Mohammedan equivalent is sîg, by which Herbelot understands the Indian plane-tree. Two principal conjectures, however, have been proposed: (1.) By Is. Vossius (Diss. de LXX. Interc. c. 12) that ἔδαφος = κέδρος, resine; whence σίγις, meaning any of the trees of the resin kind, such as pine, fir, etc. (2.) By Fuller (Miscell. Sac. iv. 5), Bochart (Phaleg, i. 4), Celsius (Hierobot, pt. i. p. 328), Hasse (Entdeckungen, pt. ii. p. 78), that Gopher is cypress, in favor of which opinion (adopted by Gesen. Lxx.) they advance the similarity in sound of gopher and cypress (κατέχω = γορρεί; the suitability of the cypress for building, and the fact that this tree abounded in Babylonia, and more particularly in Adiabene, where it supplied Alexander with timber for a whole fleet (Arrian. vii. p. 161, ed. Steph.).

A tradition is mentioned in Eutychius (Annals, p. 34) to the effect that the Ark was made of the wood Soñf, by which is probably meant not the ebony, but the Juniperus Sibina, a species of cypress (Bochart and Cetk.: Rosenm. Scholl. ad Gen. vi. 14, and Alterthumsk. vol. iv. pt. 1). T. E. B.

Gorgias (Gorgias): [Alex. 1 Mac. iii. 38, 2 Mac. xii. 35, 37, Gorgyes; 1 Mac. iv. 5, Κόρ-γιας], a general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac. iii. 38, αὐθίνθαυνος τῶν ψιλῶν τοῦ Βασιλέα; cf. 2 Mac. viii. 9), who was appointed by his recent Lydias to a command in the expedition against Judas in B. C. 166, in which he was defeated by Judas Maccabeus with great loss (1 Mac. iv. 1 ff.). At a later time (B. C. 164) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and defeated the forces of Joseph and Azarias, who attacked him contrary to the orders of Judas (1 Mac. v. 50 ff.; Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6; 2 Mac. xii. 32). The account of Gorgias in 2 Mac. is very obscure. He is represented there as acting in a military capacity (2 Mac. x. 14, στρατηγὸς τῶν τάκτων (?), hardly of Cœle-Syria, as Grinn (l. c.) takes it), apparently in concert with the Idumeans, and afterwards he is described, according to the present text as, "governor of Idumaea" (2 Mac. xii. 32), though it is possible (Giotius, Grinn, l. c.) that the reading is an error for "governor of Jamnia" (Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6, τῆς Ιουδαίας στρατηγὸς). The hostility of the Jews towards him is described in strong terms (2 Mac. xii. 33, τὸν καταδιδόντα, A. V. "that cursed man"); and while his success is only noticed in passing, his defeat and flight are given in detail, though confusedly (2 Mac. xii. 34-38; cf. Joseph. l. c.).

The name itself was borne by one of Alexander's generals, and occurs at later times among the eastern Greeks.

GOSHEN

The only direct Biblical interest of Gortyna is in the fact that it appears from 1 Macc. xv. 23 to have contained Jewish residents. [VII. 126.] The circumstance alluded to in this passage took place in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor; and it is possible that the Jews had increased in Crete during the reign of his predecessor Ptolemy Philometor, who received many of them into Egypt, and who also rebuilt some parts of Gortyna (Strab. x. p. 478). This city was nearly half-way between the eastern and western extremities of the island; and it is worth while to notice that it was near Fair Havens; so that St. Paul may possibly have preached the gospel there, when on his voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 8). He saw Gortyna seems to have been the capital of the island under the Romans. For the remains on the old site and in the neighborhood, see the Museum of Classical Antiquities, ii. 272-286.

GOSHEN (גֹּשֶן): Ge'rāh; [Gen. xlii. 29, יֵפֹתֵשׁ פָּלאט; for ver. 28 see below:] Gessen), a word of uncertain etymology, the name of a part of Egypt where the Israelites dwelt for the whole period of their sojourn in that country. It is usually called the "land of Goshen," גֹּשֶן גֹּשֶׁן, but also Goshen simply. It appears to have borne another name, "the land of Rameses," רֵעֶשׁ רֵעֶשׁ (Gen. xlii. 11), unless this be the name of a district of Goshen. The first mention of Goshen is in Joseph's message to his father: "Thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me" (Gen. xlii. 10). This shows that the territory was near the usual royal residence or the residence of Joseph's Pharaoh. The dynasty to which we assign this king, the nineteenth [Egypt: Joseph], appears to have resided part of the year at Memphis, and part of the year, at harvest-time, at Avaris on the Balastite or Pelusiac branch of the Nile; this, Manetho tells us, was the custom of the first king (Joseph. e. Apen, i. 11). In the account of the arrival of Jacob it is said of the patriarch: "He sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen: and they came into the land of Goshen. And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen" (Gen. xlii. 28, 29). This land was therefore between Joseph's residence at the time and the frontier of Palestine, and apparently the extreme province towards that country. The advice that Joseph gave his brethren as to their conduct to Pharaoh further characterizes the territory: "When Pharaoh shall call you, and shall say, What [is] your occupation? Then ye shall say, Thy servants have been herdsmen of cattle (גֹּשֶן גֹּשֶׁן) from our youth even until now, both we: and also our fathers; that ye may dwell in the land of Goshen: for every shepherd (גֹּשֶן גֹּשֶׁן) [is] an abomination unto the Egyptians" (xliii. 33, 34). It is remarkable that in Coptic Ṣṯḥc signifies both "a shepherd" and "disgrace" and the like (Rosellini, Monumenti storici, i. 177). This passage shows that Goshen was scarcely regarded as a part of Egypt Proper, and was not peopled by Egyptians—characteristics that would positively indicate a frontier province. But it is not to be inferred that Goshen had no Egyptian inhabitants at this period: at the time of the ten plagues such are distinctly mentioned.

That there was, moreover, a foreign population besides the Israelites, seems evident from the account of the calamity of Pharaoh's house [Beri]ah and the mention of the בְּנֵי גֹּשֶן who went out at the Exodus (Ex. xii. 38), notices referring to the earlier and the later period of the sojourn. The name Goshen itself appears to be Hebraic, or Semitic—although we do not venture with Jerome to derive it from בְּנֵי גֹּשֶן—for it also occurs as the name of a district and of a town in the south of Palestine (infe‖, 2), where we could scarcely expect an appellation of Egyptian origin unless given after the Exodus, which in this case does not seem likely. It is also noticeable that some of the names of places in Goshen or its neighborhood, as certainly Migdol and Bala-zephon, are Semitic (Baal-zaphon), the only positive exceptions being the cities Pitthen and Ramesses, built during the oppression.

The next mention of Goshen confirms the previous inference that its position was between Canaan and the Delta (Gen. xliii. 1). The nature of the country is indicated more clearly than in the passage last quoted in the answer of Pharaoh to the request of Joseph's brethren, and in the account of the settling of the Israelites in the land of Goshen. And Joseph spoke unto Joseph, saying, Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee: the land of Egypt [is] before thee; in the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell: in the land of Goshen let them dwell: and if thou knowest any men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle. . . . And Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded" (Gen. xliii. 5, 6, 11). Goshen was thus a pastoral country where some of Pharaoh's cattle were kept. The expression "in the best of the land," גֹּשֶן גָּרֶם גָּרֶם (in ye ṭב אֵלֶּי עֵלֶּי, ye Egypti herd), must, we think, be relative, the best of the land for a pastoral people (although we do not accept Michaelis' reading גָּרֶם גָּרֶם, "pastures" by comparison with מַעֲרֹת, Suppl. p. 102f; see Gesen. Thea. s. v. בּוּשָׁן), for in the matter of fertility the richest parts of Egypt are those nearest to the Nile, a position which, as will be seen, we cannot assign to Goshen. The sufficient evidence for this tract for the Israelites, their prosperity there, and their virtual separation, as is evident from the account of the plagues, from the great body of the Egyptians, must also be borne in mind. The clearest indications of the exact position of Goshen are those afforded by the narrative of the Exodus. The Israelites set out from the town of Rameses in the land of Goshen, made two days' journey of this tract for wilderness, and in one day more reached the Red Sea. At the starting-point two routes lay before them, "the way of the land of the Philistines . . . that [was] near," and "the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Ex. xiii. 17, 18). From these indications we infer that the land of Goshen must have in part been near the eastern side of the ancient Delta, Ramesses lying within the valley now called the Wady Tempe, the land of Goshen about thirty miles in a direct course from the ancient western shore of the Arabian Gulf (Exodus, iii).

The results of the foregoing examination of Biblical evidence are that the land of Goshen [in] between the eastern part of the ancient Delta and the western border of Palestine, that it was scarcely a part of Egypt Proper, was inhabited by other foreigners besides the Israelites, and was in its geographical names rather Semitic than Egyptian; that it was a pasture-land, especially suited to a shepherd-people, and sufficient for the Israelites, who there prospered, and were separate from the main body of the Egyptians; and lastly, that one of its towns lay near the western extremity of the Wādīt-Tumeylah. These indications, except only that of sufficiency, to be afterwards considered, seem to us decisive to indicate the Wādīt-Tumeylah, the valley along which anciently flowed the canal of the Red Sea. Other identifications seem to us to be utterly untenable. If with Lepsius we place Goshen below Heliopolis, near Bubastis and Bithynia, the distance from the Red Sea of three days' journey of the Israelites, and the separate character of the country, are violently set aside. If we consider it the same as the Bocotia, we have either the same difficulty as to the distance, or we must imagine a route almost wholly through the wilderness, instead of only for the last third or less of its distance.

Having thus concluded that the land of Goshen appears to have corresponded to the Wādīt-Tumeylah, we have to consider whether the extent of this tract would be sufficient for the subsistence of the Israelites. The superficial extent of the Wādīt-Tumeylah, if we include the whole cultivable part of the natural valley, which may somewhat exceed that of the tract bearing this appellation, is probably under 60 square geographical miles. If we suppose the entire Israelite population at the time of the Exodus to have been 1,800,000, and the whole population, including Egyptians and foreigners other than the Israelites, about 2,000,000, this would give no less than between 30,000 and 40,000 inhabitants to the square mile, which would be half as dense as the ordinary population of an eastern city. It must be remembered, however, that we need not suppose the Israelites to have been limited to the valley for pasture, but like the Arabs to have led their flocks into fertile tracts of the desert around, and that we have taken for our estimate its extreme sum, that of the people of the Exodus. For the greater part of the sojourn their numbers must have been far lower, and before the Exodus they seem to have been partly spread about the territory of the oppressor, although collected at Rameses at the time of their departure. One very large place, like the Shepherd-stronghold of Avaris, which Manetho relates to have had at the first a garrison of 240,000 men, would also greatly diminish the disproportion of population to superfluities. The very small superficial extent of Egypt in relation to the population necessary to the construction of the vast monuments, and the maintenance of the great armies of the Pharaohs, requires a different proportion to that of other countries— a condition fully explained by the extraordinary fertility of the soil. Even now, when the population is almost at the lowest point it has reached in history, when villages have replaced towns, and hamlets villages, it is still enough to determine that of the four rich and populated Yorkshire. We do not think, therefore, that the small superfluities presents any serious difficulty.

Thus far we have reasoned alone on the evidence of the Hebrew text. The LXX. version, however, presents some curious evidence which must not be passed over unnoticed. The testimony of this version in any Egyptian matter is not to be disregarded, although in this particular case too much stress should not be laid on it, since the tradition of Goshen and its inhabitants must have become very faint among the Egyptians at the time when the Pentateuch was translated, and we have no warrant for attributing to the translator or translators any more than a general and popular knowledge of Egyptian matters. In Gen. xiv. 10, for ΓΩΣΗΝ the LXX. has ΓΙΟΤΩI, Ἀραβίας. The explanatory word may be understood either as meaning that Goshen lay in the region of Lower Egypt to the east of the Delta, or else as indicating that the Arabian Nome was partly or wholly the same. In the latter case it must be remembered that the Abydos, the Arabian Nome, was more far-reaching than under the Ptolemies. On either supposition the passage is favorable to our identification. In Gen. xvi. 28, instead of ΓΩΣΗΝ, the LXX. has καθ’ Ἄραμων πόλιν, ἐν τῇ Ραμσησ (or εἰς τῇ Ραμσησ), seemingly identifying Rameses with Heropolis. It is scarcely possible to fix the site of the latter town, but there is no doubt that it lay in the valley not far from the ancient head of the Arabian Gulf. Its position is too near the gulf for the Rameses of Scripture, and it was probably chosen merely because at the time when the translation was made it was the chief place of the territory where the Israelites had been. It must be used, however, that in Exod. xii. 11, the LXX., followed by the Septuagint, reads, instead of "Pithom and Rameses," τῷ τῷ Πιθῶμ, καὶ Ραμσης, καὶ Ὄμην, ἢ ἄστοι Χαλδαίας. Eusebius identifies Rameses with Avaris, the Shepherd-stronghold on the Υδατικ branch of the Nile (ap. Cramer, Anecd. Parisii, ii. p. 174). The evidence of the LXX. version therefore lends a general support to the theory we have advocated. [See Exodus, t. i.]

2. [ΓΩΣΗΝ: Γοσῆα. [Genesen; Josh. x. 41, in Vulg. ed. 1390,] Gosen; [ed. 1393.] Gozen] the "land" or the "country (both ΥΥζ) of Goshen," is twice named as a district in Southern Palestine (Josh. x. 41, xii. 16). From the first of these it would seem to have lain between Gaza and Gibeon, and therefore to be some part of the maritime plain of Judah; but in the latter passage, that plain — the Shefelah, is expressly specified in addition to Goshen (Josh. xii. 16). In the article above, too, the situation of Goshen — if the order of the statement be any indication — would seem to be between the "south" and the Shefelah (A. V. "valley"). If Goshen was any portion of this rich plain, is it not possible that its fertility may have suggested the name to the Israelites? but this is not more than mere conjecture. On the other hand the name may be far older, and may retain a trace of early intercourse between Egypt and the south of the promised land. For such intercourse comp. I Chr. vii. 21.

3. [Γοσῆα: Gosen.] A town of the same name is once mentioned in company with Debir, Socoh, and others, as in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 51). There is nothing to connect this place with the district last spoken of. It has not yet been identified.

G. GOSPELS. The name Gospel (from god and spe1, Ang. Sax. god message or news, which is a translation of the Greek εὐαγγέλιον) is applied to the four inspired histories of the life and teaching of Christ contained in the New Testament, of which separate accounts will be given in their place. [Matthew; Mark; Luke; John.] It may be fairly said that the genuineness of these four narratives rests upon better evidence than that of any other ancient writings. They were all composed during the lifetime of the chief characters of the story of St. Matthew and St. Mark some years before the destruction of Jerusalem; that of St. Luke probably about A. D. 64; and that of St. John towards the close of the century. Before the end of the second century, there is abundant evidence that the four Gospels, as one collection, were generally used and accepted. Irenaeus, who suffered martyrdom about A. D. 202, the disciple of Polycarp and Papias, who, from having been in Asia, in Gaul, and in Rome, had ample means of knowing the belief of various churches, says that the authority of the four Gospels was so far confirmed that even the heretics of his time could not reject them, but were obliged to attempt to prove their tenets out of one or other of them (Contra. Her. iii. 11, § 7). Tertullian, in a work written about A. D. 208, mentions the four Gospels, two of them as the works of St. Mark and two as that of the discipulus Apostoli (apostolic); and rests their authority on their apostolic origin (Jusbe. Morcicn, lib. iv. c. 2). Origae, who was born about A. D. 185, and died A. D. 253, describes the Gospels in a character

teristic strain of metaphor as "the four [element]s of the Church's faith, of which the whole world, reconciled to God in Christ, is composed" (In Johan. [tom. i. § 6]). Elsewhere, in commenting on the opening words of St. Luke, he draws a line between the inspired Gospels and such productions as the Muratorian canon and the "Memoirs of the Twelve," and the like (Homil. in Luc., Obs. iii. 932 § 1). Although Theophlius, who became sixth (seventh?) bishop of Antioch about A. D. 188, speaks only of "the Evangelists," without adding their names (Ad Autol. iii. pp. 124, 125), we might fairly conclude with Gieseler that he refers to the collection of four, already known in his time. But from what we know that Theophili arranges the records of the four Evangelists into one work (Epist. ad Alphas, iv. p. 197), Tatian, who died about A. D. 170 (?), compiled a Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels. The Muratorian fragment (Muratori, Antiq. lii. iii. p. 854; Routh, Rel. Sacr. vol. iv. [vol. i. ed. alt.]), which, even if it be not by Taurus and of the second century, is at least a very old monument of the Roman Church, describes the Gospels of Luke and John; but time and tradition have given the first place to the discipulus Apostoli as the Evangelist of the Gospels, as well as to the his testimony as by the spirit, and the flesh is weak," are given precisely as we have them in Matthew. The epistles attributed to Ignatius have a considerable number of expressions which appear to imply an acquaintance with words of Christ preserved by Matthew and John; but they contain no formal quotation of the Gospels; and the uncertainty respecting both the authorship and the text of these epistles is such as to make it unsafe to rest any argument on them. In regard to the Apostolic Fathers, we have, it is true, a number of sayings of Jesus and the facts in his history which they have recorded may have been derived by them from oral tradition. Their writings serve to confirm the truth of the Gospels, but cannot be appealed to as affording direct proof of their genuineness. When we come to Justin Martyr, however, we stand on firmer ground. He, indeed, does not name the Evangelists; and it cannot be said that "many of his quotations are found verbatim in the Gospel of John." His quotations, however, of the "Memoirs of the Apostles," as "Memoirs composed by the Apostles, which are called Gospels" (Apol. i. c. 66), or as he describes them in one place more particularly, "Memoirs composed by Apostles of Christ and their companions" (Dial. e. Tryph. c. 185), are such as to have no reasonable doubt of his use of the first three Gospels; and his use of the fourth Gospel, though contested by most of the critics of the Tubingen school, is now conceded even by Hilgenfeld (Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theol. 1865, p. 477). The subject of Justin Martyr's quotations is discussed in a masterly manner by Mr. Norton in his "Genuineness of the Gospels," 1:200-233, and with fuller detail by Semich, der Apostel, Dukungswissenschaft des Martyrius Justinus, Mamb. 184," and Westcott (History of the Gospels, pp. 383-415). It must not be forgotten that the "Memoirs of the Apostle" used by Justin Martyr were sacred books.

a * Theophili does not use the term "Evangelists," but speaks of "the Prophecies" of the Old Testament and "the Gospels" as alike divinely inspired (Ad Autol. lib. iii. c. 12, p. 218, ed. 1905). He expressly names John as among those "moved by the Spirit," quoting John i. 1 (ibid. ii. 22, p. 120). After citing a passage from the Book of Proverbs on the duty of charity, he says, "But the Evangelists more teach charity yet more imperfectly," quoting Matt. v. 29, 30 (ibid. iii. 13). Further on, he introduces a quotation from Matthew with the expression, "The Gospel says" (ibid. iii. 11).

b Among the writers who bear testimony to the general reception of the Gospels by Christians before the close of the second century, Clement might well have been mentioned, who succeeded Panteum as president of the celebrated Catechetical School at Alexandria about A. D. 199, and was one of the most learned men of the time. Allusions from the sayings of the Gospels are not, however, always authoritative; they are not only most abundant, but he expressly speaks of "the four Gospels which have been handed down to us," in contrast with an obscure apocryphal book, "The Gospel according to the Egyptians," used by certain heretics (Strom. iii. 13, opp. p. 553, ed. Potter).

c * The Muratorian fragment expressly designates the Gospels of Luke and John as the "third" and "fourth" in order; and the imperfect sentence with which it begins applies to Mark. A note of time in the document itself appears to indicate that it was composed not far from A. D. 170, perhaps earlier; but the question of the date is not wholly free from difficulty. Recent critical editions and discussions of this interesting relic of Christian antiquity may be found in Cremer's Greek, des Neuest. Kanon, heraus, von Volckmar (Berlin, 1899), pp. 111-170, 311-394; Hilgenfeld's Der Kanon u. die kritik des N. T. Halle, 1893, pp. 35-43; and Westcott's Hist of the Canon of the N. T. 1873, ed. 1901, pp. 184-194, 494-488. Martyr's quotations are discussed in a masterly manner by Mr. Norton in his "Genuineness of the Gospels," 1:200-233, and with fuller detail by Semich, der Apostel, Dukungswissenschaft des Martyrius Justinus, Mamb. 184," and Westcott (History of the Gospels, pp. 383-415). It must not be forgotten that the "Memoirs of the Apostle" used by Justin Martyr were sacred books.
in 364, and that of the third Council of Carthage in 397, in both of which the four Gospels are numbered in the Canon of Scripture, there can hardly be room for doubt on the solid principle of St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John, and possibly of St. Mark also, whose words it is more difficult to separate. The quotations from St. Matthew are the most numerous. In historical references, the mode of quotation is more free, and the narrative occasionally unites those of Matthew and Luke: in a very few cases he alludes to matters not mentioned in the canonical Gospels. Besides these, St. Matthew was also employed by the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, by Hegesippus, Irenaeus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus. Eusebius records that Pantemus found in India (?) the south of Arabia (?) Christians who used the Gospel of St. Matthew.

All this shows that long before the end of the second century the Gospel of St. Matthew was in general use. From the fact that St. Mark's Gospel has few places peculiar to it, it is more difficult to believe that it was not expressly assigned to him; but Justin Martyr and Irenaeus appear to quote his Gospel, and Irenaeus does so by name. St. Luke is quoted by Justin, Irenaeus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus; and St. John by all of these, with the addition of Ignatius, the Epistle to Diognetus, and Polycrates. From these we may conclude that before the end of the second century the Gospel collection was well known and in general use. There is yet another line of evidence; the heretical sects, as well as the Fathers of the Church, knew the Gospels; and as there was the greatest hostility between them, if the Gospels had become known in the Church after the discussion arose, the heretics would never have accepted them as genuine from such a quarter. But the Gnostics and Marcionites arose early in the second century; and therefore it is probable that the Gospels were then accepted, and thus they are traced back almost to the times of the Apostles (Olahansen). A review of all the witnesses, from the Apostolic Fathers down to the Canon of the Laodicean Council read in the churches on the Lord's day, in connection with the Prophecies of the Old Testament (Justin, Apol. i. 122, II. 24); Luke's testimony would be strong enough to establish so easy a phenomenon in the Acts of the Apostles. Confining ourselves to this narrow mode of proof, we arrive at what in a common case would be a satisfactory conclusion. But when we endeavor to strengthen this evidence by appealing to the writings ascribed to Apostolic Fathers, we in fact weaken its force. At the very extremity of the chain of evidence, where it ought to be strongest, we are attacking defective links which will bear no weight.

The direct historical evidence for the genuineness of the Gospels...is of a very different kind from what we have just been considering. It consists in the indisputable fact, that throughout a community of millions of individuals, scattered over Europe, Asia, and Africa, the Gospels were regarded with the highest reverence, as the works of the Apostles to whom they were ascribed, at so early a period that there could be no difficulty in determining whether they were genuine or not, and when every intelligent Christian must have been deeply interested to ascertain the truth. And this fact assumes a far greater importance in the case of the great body of Christians to the genuineness of the gospels, it is itself a phenomenon admitting of no explanation, except that the four Gospels had all been handed down as genuine from the Apostolic age, and had every reason to be regarded as genuine and as received through the world.
GOSPELS and Gieseler, and article.

In the fourth Gospel the narrative coincides with that of the other three in a few passages only. Putting aside the account of the Passion, there are only three facts which John relates in common with the other Evangelists. Two of these are, the feeding of the five thousand, and the storm on the sea of Galilee (ch. vi.), which appear to be introduced in connection with the discourse that arose out of the miracle, related by John alone. The third is the anointing of His feet by Mary; and it is worthy of notice that the narrative of John recalls something of each of the other three: the actions of the woman are drawn from Luke, the ointment and its value are described in Mark, and the adoration of the disciples to Jesus appears in Matthew; and John combines in one narrative the three parts.

Whilst the three present the life of Jesus in Galilee, John follows him into Judaea; nor should we know, but for him, that our Lord had journeyed to Jerusalem at the prescribed feasts. Only one discourse of our Lord that was delivered in Galilee, that in the 6th chapter, is recorded by John. The disciple whom Jesus loved had it put into his mind to write a Gospel which should more expressly than the others set forth Jesus as the Incarnate Word of God: if he also had in view the beginnings of the errors of Cerinthus and others before him at the time, as Irenaeus and Jerome assert, the polemical purpose is quite subordinate to the dogmatic. He does not war against a temporary error, but preaches for all time that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, in order that believing we may have life through His name. Now many of the facts omitted by St. John and recorded by the rest are such as would have contributed most directly to this great design; why then are they omitted? The received explanation is the only satisfactory one, namely, that John, writing last, at the close of the first century, had seen the other Gospels, and purposely abstained from writing anew what they had sufficiently recorded. [John 20:24]

The agreement of the Gospels there is a great amount of agreement. If we suppose the history that they contain to be divided into sections, in 42 of these all the three narratives coincide, 12 more are given by Matthew and Mark only, 5 by Mark and Luke only, and 14 by Matthew and Luke. To these must be added 5 peculiar to Matthew, 2 to Mark, and 9 to Luke; and the enumeration is complete. But this applies only to general coincidence as to the facts narrated: the amount of verbal coincidence, that is, the passages either verbally the same, or coinciding in the use of many of the same words, is much smaller. "By far the larger portion," says Professor Andrew Norton (Genuineness, i. p. 210, 2d ed. [Addit. Notes, p. civ. f., Amer. ed.]), "of this verbal agreement is found in the recital of the words of others, and particularly of the words of Jesus. Thus, in Matthew's Gospel, the passages verbally coincident with one or both of the other two Gospels amount to less than a sixth part of its contents: and of this about seven eighths occur in the recital of the words of others, and only about one eighth in what, by way of distinction, I may call mere narrative, in which the Evangelist, speaking in his own person, was unrestrained in the choice of his expressions. In Mark, the proportion of coincident passages to the whole contents of the Gospel is about one sixth, of which not one fifth occurs in the narrative. Luke has still less agreement of expression with the other Evangelists. The passages in which it is found amount only to about a tenth part of his Gospel; and but an inconsiderable portion of it appears in the narrative—less than a twentieth part. These proportions should be further compared with those which the narrative part of each Gospel bears to that in which the narrative passages are professedly repeated. Matthew's narrative occupies about one fourth of his Gospel; Mark's about one half, and Luke's about one third. It may easily be computed, therefore, that the proportion of verbal coincidence found in the narrative part of each Gospel, compared with what exists in the other part, is about in the following ratios: in Matthew as one to something more than two, in Mark as one to four, and in Luke as one to ten. Without going minutely into the examination of examples, which would be desirable if space permitted, the leading facts connected with the subject may be thus summed up: The verbal and material agreement of the three first Evangelists is such as does not occur in any other authors who have written independently of one another. The verbal agreement is greater where the spoken words of others are cited than where facts are recorded; and greatest in quotations of the words of our Lord. But in some leading events, as in the call of the four first disciples, that of Matthew, and the Transfiguration, the agreement even in expression is remarkable: there are also narratives where there is no verbal harmony in the outset, but only in the crisis or emphatic part of the story (Matt. viii. 3 = Mark i. 41 = Luke v. 15, and Matt. xiv. 19, 20 = Mark vi. 41-45 = Luke ix. 16, 17). The narratives of our Lord's early life, as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, have little in common; while St. Mark does not include that part of the history in his plan. The agreement in the narrative portions of the Gospels begins with the Baptism of John, and reaches its highest point in the account of the Passion of our Lord and the facts that preceded it; so that a direct ratio might almost be said to exist between the amount of agreement and the importance of the facts related to the Passion. After this event, in the account of His burial and resurrection, the coincidences are few. The language of all three is Greek, with Hebrew idioms: the Hebraisms are most abundant in St. Mark, and fewest in St. Luke. In quotations from the Old Testament, the Evangelists, or two of them, sometimes exhibit a verbal agreement, although they differ from the Hebrew and from the Septuagint version (Matt. iii. 3 = Mark i. 3 = Luke iii. 4. Matt. iv. 10 = Luke iv. 8. Matt. xi. 10 = Mark i. 2 = Luke vii. 27, &c.). Except as to 24 verses, the Gospel of Mark contains no principal facts which are not found in Matthew and Luke: but he often supplies details omitted by them, and these are often such as would belong to the graphic account of an eye-witness. There are no cases in which Matthew and Luke exactly harmonize, where Mark does not also coincide with them. In several places the words of Mark have something in common with each of the other narratives, so as to form a connecting link.

between them, where their words slightly differ. The examples of verbal agreement between Mark and Luke are not so long or so numerous as those between Matthew and Mark, and Matthew and Mark: but as to the arrangement of events Mark and Luke frequently coincide, where Matthew differs from them. These are the leading particulars; but they are very far from giving a complete notion of a phenomenon that is well worthy of that attention and reverent study of the sacred text by which alone it can be fully and fairly apprehended.

These facts exhibit the three Gospels as three distinct records of the life and works of the Redeemer, but with a greater amount of agreement than three wholly independent accounts could be expected to exhibit. The agreement would be no difficulty, without the differences; it would only mark the one divine source from which they are all derived—the Holy Spirit, who spake by the prophets. The difference of form and style, without the agreement, would offer no difficulty, since there may be a substantial harmony between accounts that differ greatly in mode of expression, and the very difference might be a guarantee of independence. The harmony and the variety, the agreement and the differences, form together the problem with which Biblical critics have occupied themselves for a century and a half.

The number of differences is so many, that they can be more easily classified than enumerated. The first and most obvious suggestion would be, that the narrators made use of each other’s works. Accordingly Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and many others, have endeavored to ascertain which Gospel is to be regarded as the first; which is copied from the first; and which is the last, and copied from the other two. It is remarkable that each of the six possible combinations has found advocates; and this of itself proves the uncertainty of the theory (Hp. Mark’s “Michaelis, iii. p. 172; De Wette, Handbuch, § 22 ff.). When we are told by men of research that the Gospel of St. Mark is plainly founded upon the other two, as Griesbach, Büsching, and others assure us; and again, that the Gospel of St. Mark is certainly the primitive Gospel, on which the other two are founded, as by Whiston (Eichhorn), it is not always relying mainly on facts that lie within the compass of the text, we are not disposed to expect much fruit from the discussion. But the theory in its crude form is in itself most improbable; and the wonder is that so much time and learning have been devoted to it. It assumes that an Evangelist has taken up the work of his predecessor, and without substantial alteration has made a few changes in form, a few additions and retrenchments, and has then allowed the whole to go forth under his name. Whatever order of the three is adopted to favor the hypothesis, the omission by the second or third, of matter in serted by the first, offers a great difficulty; since it would indicate a tacit opinion that these passages are either less useful or of less authority than the rest. The nature of the alterations is not such as we should expect to find in an age little given to literary composition, and in authors so unlearned as these are admitted to be. The replacement of a word by a synonym, neither more nor less apt, the omission of a saying in one place and insertion of it in another, the occasional transposition of events; these are not in conformity with the habits of a time in which composition was little studied, and only practiced as a necessity. Basiles, such deviations, which in writers wholly independent of each other are only the guarantee of their independence, cannot appear in those who copy from each other without showing a certain wilfulness—an intention to contradict and alter—that seems quite irreconcilable with any view of inspiration. These general objections will be found to take a still more cogent shape against any particular form of this hypothesis: whether it is attempted to show that the Gospel of St. Mark, as the shortest, is also the earliest and primitive Gospel, or that this very Gospel bears evident signs of being the latest, a compilation from the other two; or that the order in the canon of Scripture is also the chronological order—and all these views have found defenders at no distant date—the theory that each Evangelist only copied from his predecessors offers the same general features, a plausible argument from a few facts, which is met by insuperable difficulties as soon as the remaining facts are taken in (Gieseler, pp. 35, 36; J. Marshall’s “Michaelis, vol. iii., part ii. p. 171 ff.).

The supposition of a common original from which the three Gospels were drawn, each with more or less modification, would naturally occur to those who rejected the notion that the Evangelists had copied from each other. A passage of Epiphanius has been often quoted in support of this (Harnack, ii. 6), but the ξειάνσις τις πνεύματος no doubt refers to the inspiring Spirit from which all three drew their authority, and not to any earthly copy, written or oral, of His divine message. The best notion of that class of speculations which would establish a written document as the common original of the three Gospels, will be gained perhaps from Bishop Marsh’s (“Michaelis, vol. iii. part ii.) account of Eichhorn’s hypothesis, and of his own additions to it. It appeared to Eichhorn that the portions which are common to all the three Gospels were contained in a certain common document, from which they all drew. Niemeyer had already assumed that copies of such a document had got into circulation, and had been altered and annotated by different hands. Now Eichhorn tries to show, from an exact comparison of passages, that "the sections, whether great or small, which are common to St. Matthew and St. Mark, but not to St. Luke, and at the same time occupy places in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark which correspond to each other, were additions made in the copies used by St. Matthew and St. Mark, but not in the copy used by St. Luke; and, in like manner, that the sections found in the corresponding places of the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, but not contained in the Gospel of St. Matthew, were additions made in the copies used by St. Mark and St. Luke” (p. 192). Thus Eichhorn considers himself entitled to assume that he can reconstruct the original document, and also that there must have been four other documents to account for the phenomena of the text. Thus he makes—

1. The original document.
2. An altered copy which St. Matthew used.
3. An altered copy which St. Luke used.
4. A third copy, made from the two preceding, used by St. Mark.

As there is no external evidence worth considering that this original or any of its numerous copies ever existed, the value of this elaborate hypothesis must depend upon its furnishing the only explanation, and that a sufficient one, of the facts of the text. Bishop Marsh, however, finds it necessary, in order to complete the account of the text, to raise a number of documents to eight, still without producing any external evidence for the existence of any of them; and this, on one side, deprives Eichhorn's theory of the merit of completeness, and, on the other, presents a much broader surface to the obvious objections. He assumes the existence of—

1. A Hebrew original.
3. A transcript of No. 1, with alterations and additions.
4. Another, with another set of alterations and additions.
5. Another, combining both the preceding, used by St. Mark, who also used No. 2.
6. Another, with the alterations and additions of No. 3, and with further additions, used by St. Matthew.
7. Another, with those of No. 4 and further additions, used by St. Luke, who also used No. 2.
8. A wholly distinct Hebrew document, in which our Lord's precepts, parables, and discourses were recorded, but not in chronological order; used both by St. Matthew and St. Luke.

To this it is added, that as the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke contain Greek translations of Hebrew materials, which were incorporated into St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, the person who translated St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel into Greek frequently derived assistance from the Gospel of St. Mark, where he had matter in connection with St. Matthew; and in those places, but in those places only, where St. Mark had no matter in connection with St. Matthew, he had frequently recourse to St. Luke's Gospel (p. 581). One is hardly surprised after this to learn that Eichhorn soon after put forth a revised hypothesis (Ehelilung in das N. T. 1804), in which a supposed Greek translation of a supposed Aramaic original took a conspicuous part; nor that Hug was able to point out that even the most liberal assumption of written documents had not provided for one case, that of the verbal agreement of St. Mark and St. Luke, to the exclusion of St. Matthew; and which, though it is quite rare occurrence, would require, on Eichhorn's theory, an additional Greek version.

It will be allowed that this elaborate hypothesis, whether in the form given it by Marsh or by Eichhorn, possesses almost every fault that can be charged against an argument of that kind. For every new class of facts a new document must be assumed to have existed; and Hug's objection does not really weaken the theory, since the new class of documents he mentions only requires a new version of the "original Gospel," which can be supplied on demand. A theory so prolific in assumptions may still stand, if it can be proved that no other solution is possible; but since this cannot be shown, even as against the modified theory of Gratz (Nye Versuch, etc., 1812), then we are reminded of the schoolman's exclamation, "qui non multum prodest quod non additur." To assume for every new class of facts the existence of another complete edition and recension of the original work is quite gratuitous; the documents might have been as easily supposed to be fragmentary memorials, brought in by the Evangelists into the web of the original Gospel; or the coincidences might be, as Gratz supposes, cases where one Gospel has been interpolated by portions of another. Then the "original Gospel" is supposed to have been of such authority as to be circulated everywhere: yet so defective, as to require help from any hand; so little revered, that no hand dared ed it. If all the Evangelists agreed to draw from such a work, it must have been widely if not universally accepted in the Church; and yet there is no record of its existence. The force of this dilemma has been felt by the supporters of the theory: if the work was of high authority, it would have been preserved, or at least mentioned; if of lower authority, it could not have become the basis of three canonical Gospels: and various attempts have been made to escape from it.

Berthold tries to find traces of its existence in the titles of works other than our present Gospels, which were current in the earliest ages; but Gieseler has so diminished the force of his arguments, that only one of them need here be mentioned. Berthold ingeniously argues that a Gospel used by St. Paul, and transmitted to the Christians in Pontus, was the basis of Maricon's Gospel; and assumes that it was also the "original Gospel;" so that in the Gospel of Maricon there would be a transcript, though corrupted, of this primitive document. But there is no proof at all that St. Paul used any written Gospel; and as to that of Maricon, if the work of Hahn had not settled the question, the researches of such writers as Volkmar, Zeller, Ritschl, and Hilgenfeld, are held to have proved that the old opinion of Tertullian and Epiphanius is also the true one, and that the so-called Gospel of Maricon was not an independent work, but an abridged version of St. Luke's Gospel, altered by the heretic to suit his peculiar tenets. (See Berthold, ib. 1208-1223; Gieseler, p. 57; Weisse, Evangelienfrage, p. 73.) We must conclude then that the work has perished without record. Not only has this fact befallen the Aramaic or Hebrew original, but the translation and the five or six recensions. But it may well be asked whether the state of letters in Palestine at this time was such as to make this constant editing, translating, annotating, and enriching of a history a natural and probable process. With the independence of the Jews their literature had declined; from the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, so far as they are known and there are records of their works have become known, if at all, in Greek translations through the Alexandrine Jews. That the period of which we are speaking was for the Jews one of very little literary activity, is generally admitted; and if this applies to all classes of the people, it would be true of the humble and uneducated class from which the first converts came (Acts iv. 13; James ii. 5). Even the second law (Bevropö), which is the law of the heathen after the revolt, and the conditions under which the knowledge of the learned class consisted, was handed down by oral tradition, without being reduced to writing. The theory of Eichhorn is only probable amidst a people given to literary habits, and in a class of that people where education was good and literary activity likely to prevail: the conditions here are the very reverse (see Gieseler's able argument, p. 59 ff.). These are only a few of the objections which may be raised, on critical and historical grounds, against the theory of Eichhorn and Marsh.

But it must not be forgotten that this question reaches beyond history and criticism, and has a deep theological interest. We are offered here an...
Jesus, according to which we now rely on the Gospels as pure, true, and genuine histories of the life of Jesus, composed by four independent witnesses inspired for that work, would be taken away. Even the testimony of the writers of the second century to the universal acceptance of these books would be invalidated, from their silence and ignorance about the strange circumstances which are supposed to have affected their composition.

The English student will find in Bp. Marsh's Translation of Michaelis's Introd. to N. T. iii. 2, 1803, an account of Eichhorn's earlier theory and of his own. Veysie's Examination of Mr. Morris's Hypothesis, 1808, has suggested many of the objections. In Bp. Thirlwall's Translation of Schleiermacher on St. Luke, 1825, Introduction, is an account of the whole question. Other important works are, an essay of Eichhorn, in the 9th vol. Allgemeine Bibliothek der literarischen Literatur, 1791; the Essay of Bp. Marsh, just quoted; Eichhorn, Einleitung in das N. T. 1804; Gratz, Neuer Versuch die Entstehung der drey ersten Evang. zu erklären, 1812; Bertholdt, Histor. kritische Einleitung in sämtliche k. ev. und apok. Schriften des A. und N. T., 1812-1819; and the work of Gieseler, quoted above. See also De Wette, Lehrbuch, and Westcott, Introduction, already quoted; also Weisse, Evangelienfrage, 1831, and the Supplement of the 4th edition of the subject, see addition to the present article.

There is another supposition to account for these facts, of which perhaps Gieseler has been the most sequestrer. It is probable that none of the Gospels was written until many years after the day of Pentecost, on which the Holy Spirit descended on the assembled disciples. From that day commenced at Jerusalem the work of preaching the Gospel and converting the world. So sedulously were the Apostles in this work that they divested themselves of the labor of ministering to the poor in order that they might give themselves "continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word." (Acts vi. 4.) Prayer and preaching were the business of their lives. Now their preaching must have been, from the nature of the case, in great part historical; it must have been based upon an account of the life and acts of Jesus of Nazareth. They had been the eye-witnesses of a wondrous life, of acts and sufferings that had an influence over all the world: many of their hearers had never heard of Jesus, many others had received false accounts of one whom it suited the Jewish rulers to stigmatize as an impostor. The ministry of our Lord went on principally in Galilee; the first preaching was addressed to people in Judaea. There was no written record to which the hearers might be referred for historical details, and therefore the preachers must furnish not only inferences from the life of our Lord, but the facts of the life itself. The preaching, then, must have been of such a kind as to be to the hearers what the reading of lessons from the Gospels is to us. So far as the records of apostolic preaching in the Acts of the Apostles go, they cannot have had this view. The records of Paul at Antioch, preach alike the facts of the Redeemer's life and death. There is no improbability in supposing that in the course of twenty or thirty years' assiduous teaching, without a written Gospel, the matter of the apostolic preaching should have taken a settled form. Not only might the Apostles think it well that their own accounts should agree, as in substance so in form; but the teachers whom they sent forth, or left behind in the churches they visited, would have to be prepared for their mission; and, so long as there was no written Gospel to put into their hands, it might be desirable that the oral instruction should be as far as possible one and the same to all. It is by no means certain that the interval between the mission of the Comforter and his work of directing the writing of the first Gospel was so long as is here supposed; the date of the Hebrews of Matthew may be earlier. [Matthew.] But the argument remains the same: the preaching of the Apostles would probably begin to take one settled form, if at all, during the first years of their ministry. If they were allowed to ask why God in his providence saw fit to defer the gift of a written Gospel to his people, the answer would be, that for the first few years the powerful working of the Holy Spirit in the living members of the church supplied the place of those records, which, as soon as the brightness of his presence began to be at all withdrawn, became indispensable in order to prevent the corruption of the Gospel history by false teachers.

He was promised as one who should "teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever the Lord had said unto them" (John xiv. 26). And more than once his aid is spoken of as needful, even for the proclamation of facts that are not of immediate interest (John iii. 8; 1 Pet. i. 12); and he is described as a witness with the Apostles, rather than through them, of the things which they had seen during the course of a ministry which they had shared (John xv. 26, 27; Acts v. 32. Compare Acts xv. 28). The personal authority of the Apostles as eye-witnesses of what they preached is not set aside by this divine and again and again they describe themselves as “witnesses” to facts (Acts ii. 32, iii. 15, x. 39, &c.); and when a vacancy occurs in their number through the fall of Judas, it is almost assumed as a thing of course of that his successor shall be chosen from those “which had companied with them all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among them” (Acts i. 21). The teachings of the Holy Spirit consisted, not in whispering to them facts which they had not witnessed, but rather in revealing the fulness of the promise, and throwing out into their true importance events and sayings that had been esteemed too lightly at the time they took place. But the Apostles could not have spoken of the Spirit as they did (Acts v. 28, unless he were known to be working in and with them and directing them, and manifesting that this was the case by unmistakable signs. Here is the answer, both to the question why was it not the first care of the Apostles to prepare a written Gospel, and also to the scruples of those who fear that the supposition of an oral Gospel would give a precedent for those views of tradition which have been the bane of the Christian church as they were of the Jewish. The guidance of the Holy Spirit supplied for a time such aid as made a written Gospel unnecessary; but the Apostles saw the dangers and errors which a traditional Gospel would be exposed to in the course of time; and, whilst they were still preaching the oral Gospel in the strength of the Holy Ghost, they were admonished by the same divine Person to prepare those written records which were hereafter to be the daily spiritual food of all the church of Christ. Nor is there anything unnatural in the supposition that the Apostles intentionally uttered their witness in the same order, and even, for the most part, in the same form of words. They would thus approach as nearly to the condition in which the church was to be when written books were to be the means of edification. They quote the scriptures of the Old Testament frequently in their discourses; and as their Jewish education had accustomed them to the use of the words of the Bible as well as the matter, they would do no violence to their prejudices in writing down new records to the same end, in reducing them to a “form of sound words.” They were all Jews of Palestine, of humble origin, all alike on earth, we may suppose, for the loving zeal with which they would observe the works of their Master and afterwards propagate his name; so that the tendency to variance, arising from peculiarities of education, taste, and character, would be reduced to its lowest in such a body. The language of their first preaching was the Syrian-Chaldee, which was a poor and scanty language; and though Greek was now widely spread, and was the language even of several places in Palestine (Josephus, Ant. xxii. 14, § 4; I. J. iii. 9, § 1), though it prevailed in Antioch, where the first missions to Greeks and Hellenists, or Jews who spoke Greek, proceeded (Acts xi. 22, xiii. 46), the Greek tongue, as used by Jews, partook of the poverty of the speech which it replaced; as, indeed, it is impossible to honor a whole language without borrowing the habits of thought upon which it has built itself. Whilst modern taste aims at a variety of expression, and abhors a repetition of the same phrases as monotonous, the simplicity of the men, and their language, and their education, and the state of literature, would all lead us to expect that the Apostles would have no such feeling. As to this, we have more than mere conjecture to rely on. Occasional repetitions occur in the Gospels (Luke vii. 19, 20; xix. 31, 34), such as a writer in a more copious and cultivated language would perhaps have sought to avoid. In the Acts, the conversion of St. Paul is three times related (Acts ix., xxii., xxvi.), once by the writer and twice by St. Paul himself; and the two first harmonize exactly, except as to a few expressions, and as to one more important circumstance (ix. 7—xxii. 9), which, however, admits of an explanation,—whilst the third deviates somewhat more in expression, and has one passage peculiar to itself. The vision of Cornelius is also three times related (Acts x. 3—6, 30—32; xii. 13, 14), where the words of the angel in the two first are almost precisely alike, and the rest very similar, whilst the other is an abbreviated account of the same facts. The vision of Peter is twice related (Acts x. 15—16; xi. 3—10), and the repetitions, the agreement is verbally exact. These places from the Acts, which, both as to their resemblance and their difference, may be compared to the narratives of the Evangelists, show the same tendency to a common form of narrative which, according to the present view, may have influenced the preaching of the Apostles. It is supposed, then, that the preaching of the Apostles, and the teaching whereby they prepared others to preach, as they did, would tend to assume a common form, more or less fixed; and that the portions of the three Gospels which harmonize most exactly over their agreement not to the fact that they were copied from each other, although it is impossible to say that the later writer made no use of the earlier one, nor to the existence of any original document now lost to us, but to the fact that the church had already clothed itself in a settled or usual form of words, to which the writers inclined to conform without feeling bound to do so; and the differences which occur, often in the closest proximity to the harmonies, arise from the feeling of independence with which each wrote what he had seen and heard, or, in the case of Mark and Luke, what apostolic witnesses had told him. The harmonies, as we have seen, begin with the baptism of John; that is, with the conservation of the Lord to his messianic office; and with this event probably the ordinary preaching of the Apostles would begin, for its purport was that Jesus is the Messiah, and that as Messiah he suffered, died, and rose again. They are very frequent as we approach the period of the Passion, because the sufferings of the Lord would be much in the mouth of every one who preached the Gospel, and all would become familiar with the words in which the Apostles declared St. Matthew and St. Mark only; and if the passage implies an intention to supersede the writings added to, then these two Evangelists cannot be included amongst genuine partial or reminiscences of the preaching of the Apostles, written with a given aim but without authority, are attended: and, if we may argue from St. Luke’s sphere of observation, they were probably composed by Greek converts.
and, that the divergence from the intention of each Evangelist to contribute something towards the weight of evidence for this central truth. Accordingly, all the four, even St. Mark (xvi. 14), who often throws a new light upon old ground and opens out neglected angles and aspects of the Lord to establish that he was risen indeed. The verbal agreement is greater where the words of others are recorded, and greatest of all where they are those of Jesus, because here the apostolic preaching would be especially exact; and where the historical fact is the utterance of certain words, the duty of the historian is narrowed to a bare record of them. (See the works of Gieseler, Norton, Westcott, Weiss, and others already quoted.)

That this opinion would explain many of the facts connected with the text is certain. Whether, besides conforming to the words and arrangement of the apostolic preaching, the Evangelists did in any cases make use of each other's work or not, it would require a more careful investigation of details to discuss than space permits. Every reader would probably find on examination some places which could best be explained on this supposition. Nor does this involve a sacrifice of the independence of the narrator. If each of the three drew the substance of his narrative from the one common strain of preaching that everywhere prevailed, to have departed entirely in a written account from the common form of words to which Christian ears were beginning to be familiar, would not have been independence but willfulness. To follow here and there the words and arrangement of another written Gospel already current would not compromise the writer's independent position. If the principal part of the narrative was the voice of the whole church, a few portions might be confounded to another writer without altering the character of the testimony. In the separate articles on the Gospels it will be shown that, however close may be the agreement of the Evangelists, the independent position of each is preserved from the contents of his book, and has been recognized by writers of all ages. It will appear that St. Matthew describes the kingdom of Messiah, as founded in the Old Testament and fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth; that St. Mark, with so little of narrative peculiar to himself, brings out by many minute circumstances a more vivid delineation of our Lord's completely human life; that St. Luke puts forward the work of Redemption as a universal benefit, and shows Jesus not only as the Messiah of the chosen people but as the Saviour of the world; that St. John, writing last of all, passed over most of what his predecessors had related, in order to set forth more fully all that he had heard from the Master who loved him, of his relation to the Father, and of the relation of the Holy Spirit to both. The independence of the writers is thus established; and if they seem to have here and there used each other's account, which it is perhaps impossible to prove or disprove, such cases will not compromise that claim which alone gives value to a plurality of witnesses.

How does this last theory bear upon our belief in the inspiration of the Gospels? This moments question admits of a satisfactory reply. Our blessed Lord, on five different occasions, promised to the apostles the divine guidance, to teach and enlighten them in their dangers (Matt. x. 19; Luke xii. 11, 12; Mark xii. 11; and John xiv., xv., xvi.). He bade them take no thought about defending them selves before judges; he promised them the Spirit of Truth to guide them into all truth, to teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance. That this promise was fully realized to them the history of the Acts sufficiently shows. But if the divine assistance was given them in their discourses and preaching, it would be rendered equally when they were about to put down in writing the same gospel which they preached, and, as this would be their greatest time of need, the aid would be granted then most surely. So that, as to St. Matthew and St. John, we may say that their Gospels are inspired because the writers of them were inspired, according to their Master's promise; for it is impossible to suppose that He who put words into their mouths when they stood before a human tribunal, with no greater fear than that of death before them, would withhold his light and truth when the want of them would mislead the whole Church of Christ and turn the light that was in it into darkness. The case of the other two Evangelists is somewhat different. It has always been held that they were under the guidance of Apostles in whom the Holy Spirit was — St. Mark under that of St. Peter, and St. Luke under that of St. Paul. We are not expressly told, indeed, that these Evangelists themselves were persons to whom Christ's promises of supernatural guidance had been extended, but it certainly was not confined to the twelve to whom it was originally made, as the case of St. Paul himself proves, who was admitted to all the privileges of an apostle, though, as it were, "born out of due time;" and as St. Mark and St. Luke were the companions of apostles — shared their dangers, confronted hostile tribunals, had to teach and preach — there is reason to think that they equally enjoyed what they equally needed. In Acts xxv. 28, the Holy Ghost is spoken of as the common guide and light of all the brethren, not of apostles only; nay, to speak it reverently, as one of themselves. So that the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke appear to have been admitted into the church, not from the example of their authors, but in free and close communication with inspired apostles. But supposing that the portion of the three first Gospels which is common to all has been derived from the preaching of the Apostles in general, then it is drawn directly from a source which we know from our Lord himself to have been inspired. It comes to us from those Apostles into whose mouths Christ promised to put the words of his holy Spirit. It is not from an anonymous writing, as Eichhorn thinks — it is not that the three witnesses are real ones, as Story and others have suggested in the theory of copying — but that the daily preaching of all apostles and teachers has found three independent transcribers in the three Evangelists. Now the inspiration of an historical writing will consist in its truth, and in its selection of events. Everything narrated must be substantially and exactly true, and the comparison of the Gospels one with another offers us nothing that does not answer to this test. There are differences of arrangement of events; here some details of a narrative or a discourse are supplied which are wanting there; and if the writer had professed to follow a strict chronological order, or had pretended that his record was not only true but complete, then one inversion of order, or one omission of a ny liable, would condign him of inaccuracy. But if it is plain—if it is all but avowed—that minute chronological data are not part of the writer's purpose—if it is also plain that nothing but a selection of the facts is intended, or, indeed, possible (John xxi. 23)—then the proper test to apply is, whether each gives us a picture of the life and ministry of Jesus of Nazareth that is self-consistent and consistent with the others, such as would be suitable to the use of those who were to believe on His Name for this higher evidenced intention. About the answer there should be no doubt. We have seen that each Gospel has its own features, and that the divine element has controlled the human, but not destroyed it. But the picture which they conspire to draw is one full of harmony. The Saviour they all describe is the same loving, tender guide of his disciples, sympathizing with them in the sorrows and temptations of earthly life, yet ever ready to enlighten that life by rays of truth out of the infinite world where the Father sits upon his throne. It has been said that St. Matthew portrays rather the human side, and St. John the divine; but this holds good only in a limited sense. It is in St. John that we read that "Jesus wept;" and there is nothing, even in the last discourse of Jesus, as reported by St. John, that opens a deeper view of his divine nature than the words in St. Matthew xi. 27, beginning, "But to him that loved us."]

Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes." All reveal the same divine and human Teacher; four copies of the same portrait, perhaps with a difference of expression, yet still the same, are drawn here, and it is a portrait the like of which no one had ever delineated before, or, indeed, could have done, except from having looked on it with observant eyes, and from having had the mind opened by the Holy Spirit to comprehend such features of such unspeakable radiance. Not only does this highest "harmony of the Gospels" manifest itself to every pious reader of the Bible, but the lower harmony—the agreement of fact and word in all that relates to the ministry of the Lord, in all that would contribute to a firm view of his apostolic character—exists also, and cannot be denied. For in our judgment it will tell us alike that Jesus was transfigured on the mount; that the shekinah of divine glory shone upon his face: that Moses the lawgiver and Elias the prophet talked with him; and that the voice from heaven bare witness to him. Is it any imputation upon the truth of the histories that St. Matthew alone tells us that the witnesses fell prostrate to the earth, and that Jesus raised them? or that St. Luke alone tells us that for a part of the time they were heavy with sleep? Again, one Evangelist, in describing our Lord's temptation, follows the order of the occurrences, another arranges according to the degree of temptation, and the third, passing over all particulars, merely mentions that our Lord was tempted. Is there anywhere here to shake our faith in the writers as credible historians? Do we treat other histories in this exacting spirit? Is not the very independence of treatment the pledge to us that we have really three witnesses to the fact that Jesus was tempted like as we are? for if the Evangelists were copyists, nothing would have been more easy than to remove such an obvious difference as this. The histories are true according to any test that should be applied to a history: and the events that they select—though we could not pre-some to say that they were more important than what are omitted, except from the fact of the omission—are at least such as to have given the whole Christian Church a clear conception of the Redeemer's life, so that none has ever complained of insufficient means of knowing him.

There is a perverted form of the theory we are considering which pretends that the facts of the Redeemer's life remained in the state of an oral tradition till the latter part of the second century and that the four Gospels were written till that time. The difference is not of degree but of kind between the opinion that the Gospels were written during the lifetime of the Apostles, who were eye-witnesses, and the notion that for nearly a century after the oldest of them had passed to his rest the events were only preserved in the changeable and insecure form of an oral account. But for the latter opinion there is not one spark of historical evidence. Heretics of the second century who would gladly have rejected and exposed a new gospel that made against them never hint that the Gospels are spurious; and orthodox writers ascribe without contradiction the authorship of the books to those whose names they bear. The theory was invented to accord with the assumption that miracles are impossible, but upon no evidence whatever; and the argument when exposed runs in this vicious circle: "If there are no miracles, then the accounts of them must have grown up in the course of a century from popular exaggeration, and as the accounts are not contemporaneous it is not proved that there are miracles!" That the Jewish mind in its lowest decay should have invented the character of Jesus of Nazareth, and the sublime system of morality contained in his teaching—that four writers should have fixed the popular impression in four plain, simple, unadorned narratives, without any outbursts of national prejudice, or any attempt to give a political tone to the events they wrote of—would be in itself a miracle harder to believe than that Lazarus came out at the Lord's call from his four days' tomb.

It will be an appropriate conclusion to this imperfect sketch to give a conjectural of the harmony of the Gospels, by which the several theories may be tested. We beg to call the attention of our readers to the ingenious and careful labours of Mr. Macknight, who has been the most diligent in detail. Let it be remembered, however, that a complete harmony, including the chronological arrangement and the exact succession of all events, was not intended by the sacred writers to be constructed; indeed the data for it are pointedly withheld. Here most of the places where there is some special difficulty, and where there has been a question whether the events are parallel or distinct, are marked by verses in different type. The sects might in many cases have been subdivided but for the limits of space, but the reader can supply this defect for himself as cases arise. (The principal works employed in constructing it are, Griesbach, Synopsis Evangeliorum, 1776; De Wette and Luecke, Syn. Evang., 1818, 1822; Kliger, Syn. Evang., 1820; Chauven, Quatrain Evang. Tabula Synopsis, 1822; Greenwell's Harmony [Harmoniae Evangelicae, ed. 5th, Oxon, 1856] and Dissertations [21 ed., 4 vols. in 5, Oxford, 1837], a most important work; the Rev. J. Williams On the Gospels, Thirle's Greek Testament; and Tischendorf's Syn. Evang. 1854 [21 ed. 1864]; besides the well-known works of Lightfoot, Macknight, Newcome, and Robinson.) 1. The word "Genealogies," it is to be understood that some special difficulty besets the harmony where one or more references under a given section are in light, and one or more in heavy type, it is to be understood that the former are given as in their proper place, and that it is more or less doubtful whether the latter are to be considered as parallel narratives or not.

The references are printed in the Gospels as follows:

- St. Matthew: iv. 1-8, ix. 1-9, xii. 1-24, xx. 1-12.
- St. Mark: iv. 1-37, ix. 1-17, xii. 1-22, xx. 1-12.

The Theory which bears the name of Strauss could hardly have originated anywhere but in Germany, nor is it easy for an Anglo-Saxon mind to conceive of its being seriously propagated and actually believed. It is far from being clearly defined and self-consistent in the author's own statement; and his Life of Jesus, while a work of great learning in detail, is singularly deficient in comprehensiveness and unity.

The theory, in brief, is this. Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary. In his childhood he manifested unusual intelligence and promise, as compared with his external advantages, and was the object of admiration in the humble family circle in which his lot was cast. He early became a disciple of John the Baptist; and, from strong sympathy with his enthusiastic expectation of the speedy advent of the Messiah (an expectation vividly entertained by all loyal Jews of that day), he conceived the idea of assuming that character himself, and personating it so successfully as to become his own dupe, and thus to pass unconsciously from imposture to self-delusion. He made disciples, chose disciples, uttered discourses which impressed themselves profoundly upon the popular mind, and drew upon himself the hostility of the chief men of the nation, especially of the Pharisees. They procured his execution as a traitor; but his disciples, believing that the Messiah could not die, maintained that he must have risen alive from the sepulchre, and, as he had not been seen among men after his crucifixion, that he had ascended to heaven. This simple life-story became the basis of a series of myths—narratives not intentionally false or consciously invented, but some of them the growth of popular credulity, others, symbolical forms in which his disciples sought to embody the doctrines and precepts which had been the staple of his discourses. His miraculous birth was imagined and believed, because it seemed impossible that the Messiah should have been born like other men. Supernatural works were ascribed to him, because the Hebrew legends had ascribed such works to the ancient prophets, and it could not be that he who was greater than they, and of whom they were thought to have written glowing predictions, should not have performed more numerous and more marvellous miracles than any of them. His appearances after his resurrection were inferred, defined as to time and place, and incorporated into the faith of his disciples, because it was inconceivable that he should have returned to life without being seen. These myths had their origin chiefly outside of the circle of the Apostles and the persons most closely intimate with Jesus, and were probably due in great part to the constructive imaginations of dwellers in portions of Galilee where he had tarried but a little while, or of admirers who had been his companions but for a brief period.

The mythical element, once introduced into his history, had a rapid growth for some thirty, forty, or fifty years after his death, and new incidents in accordance with the Messianic ideal were constantly added to the multiform oral Gospel propagated and transmitted by his disciples. Within that period, various persons, none of them apostles or intimate friends of Jesus, compiled such narratives as had come to their ears; and of these narratives there have come down to us our four Gospels, together with other fragmentary stories of equal authority, which bear the popular designation of the Apocryphal Gospels.

Such was the completion of Strauss's mythic theory, as developed in his Life of Jesus, published in 1863-35, repeatedly reprinted, and sufficiently well known in this country by a cheap reprint of a moderately good English translation. In his new work, issued in 1864, The Life of Jesus, for the German People, he departs from his former position so far as to charge the propagandists and historians of Christianity with willful and conscious falsifications, and to maintain with the critics of the Tubingen school that the four Gospels were written, in great part, to sanction and promote the dogmatism of their respective authors, and that they thus represent so many divergent theological tendencies. In assuming this ground, Strauss enlarges the definition of the term myth, which no longer denotes merely the fabulous outgrowth or embodiment of an idea without fraudulent intent, but includes such wanton falsehoods as are designed to express, promulgate, or sanction theological dogmas. We have said that Strauss's attempt to historicalize the myths of the mythical structure proposed by the Evangelists. How is this basis to be determined? How are we to distinguish between facts and myths?

1. The usual order of nature cannot in any instance, way, or measure, have been interrupted. Therefore every supernatural incident must be accounted as mythical.

2. Jesus having been regarded as the Messiah, it was inevitable that representations should have been made of him in accordance with the Messianic notions of his time and people, and with the predictions deemed Messianic in the writings of the Hebrew prophets. Consequently, all such representations, though involving nothing supernatural, such as his descent from David and his flight into Egypt, are at least suspicious, and may be safely set down as myths.

3. His admirers would have been likely to attribute to him sayings and deeds corresponding with those recorded of various distinguished persons in Jewish history. Therefore, every portion of the narrative which bears any resemblance or analogy to any incident related in the Old Testament, is mythical. But, on the other hand, Jesus was a Hebrew, confined within the narrow circle of Jewish ideas, and not under any training or influence which could have enlarged that circle. Consequently every alleged utterance of his, and every idea of his mission and character, that is broader and higher than the narrowest Judaism, is also mythical. Thus we have an historical personage, of whom the critics denies at once everything national and everything extra-national. By rarity of reasoning, we might, in the biography of Washington, cast suspicion on everything that he is alleged to have said or done as a loyal American, because he was a white man, and his biographer would of course ascribe to him the attributes of an American; and on everything that he is alleged to have said or done from the impulse of a larger humanity, because, being an American, it was impossible that he should have been anything more—a style of criticism which, with reference to any but a sacred personage, the world would regard as simply idiotic. But this is not all. (5.) Though among secular historians, even of well-known periods and events, there are discrepancies in minor details, and these are held to be confirmations of the main facts, as evincing the mutual independence of the writers considered as separate authorities, for some unexplained and to us insurmountable reason, this law does not apply to the Gospels. In them, every discrepancy, however minute, casts just suspicion on an alleged fact or a recorded discourse or conversation. This suspicion is at least as weighty an obstacle to the varied narrative of very slight particulars, with- out making any allowance for the different points of view which several independent witnesses must of necessity occupy, or for the different portions of a prolonged transaction or discourse which would reach their eyes or ears, according as they were nearer or more remote, early or late in the ground, precise or less absorbed in what was passing. All, therefore, in which the Evangelists vary from one another, is mythical. But while their variance always indicates a myth (6), their very close agreement demands the same construction; for wherever the several narrators coincide circumstantially and verbally, their coincidence indicates some common legendary source. Thus mutually inconsistent and contradictory are the several tests employed by Strauss to separate myth from fact. Practically, were Strauss's Life of Jesus lost to the world, one might reconstruct it, by classing as a myth, under one or more of the heads that we have specified, every fact in the history of Jesus, and every deed or utterance of his, which indicates either the divinity of his mission, his unparalleled wisdom, or the transcendent loveliness, purity, and excellence of his character.

Yet, while Jesus is represented as in part self-deluded, and in part an impostor, and his biography as in all its distinctive features utterly fictitious, strange to say, Strauss recognizes this biography as symbolical of the spiritual history of mankind. What is false of the individual Jesus is true of the race. Humanity is God manifest in the flesh," the child of the visible mother, Nature, and the invisible father, Spirit. It works miracles; it subdues Nature in and around itself by the power of the Spirit. It is sinful; for pollution cleaves to the individual, but does not affect the race or its history. It dies, rises, and ascends to heaven; for the suppression of its personal and earthly life—in other words, the annihilation of individual men by death—is a reunion with the All-Father, Spirit. Faith in this metaphysical farago is justifying and sanctifying Christian faith. Thus a history, which is the joint product of imposture and credulity, by a strange chance, (for providence there is none,) has become a symbolical representation of true spiritual philosophy.

We will now offer some of the leading considerations, which are fairly urged against the mythical theory.

1. This theory assumes that miracles are impossible. But why are they impossible, if there be a God? The power which established the order of nature includes the power to suspend or modify it, as the greater includes the less. If that order was established with a moral and spiritual purpose, for the benefit of reasoning, accountable, immortal beings, and if that same purpose may be served by the suspension of proximate causes at any one epoch of human history, then we may expect to find authentic vestiges of such an epoch. All that is needed in order to make miracles credible is the discovery of an adequate purpose, a justifying end. Such a purpose, such an end, is the development of the highest forms of goodness in human conduct and character; and whether miracles—red or imagined—have borne an essential part in such development, is an historical question which we are competent to answer. Suppose that we write down the names of those who have left a reputation for eminent excellence,—Orientals, Greeks, Romans, ancient, modern, the lights of dark ages, the chosen representatives of every philosophical school, the finished product of the highest civilization of every type, reformers, philanthropists, those who have adored the loveliest stations, those who have made lowly stations illustrious. Let us proceed to separate the names into two columns, writing the Christians in one column, all the rest in the other. We shall find that we have made a horizontal division,—that the least in the Christian column is greater than the greatest out of it. From Paul, Peter, and John; from Feneon, Xavier, Boyle, Doddridge, Martyn, Hecer, Judson, Channing, men whose genius and culture conspired with their piety to make them the best good, down to the unlettered Bedford tinker, John Pond the cobbler, the Dairyman's daughter, with just education enough to read her Bible and to know the will of her Lord, we find traits of character, which in part are not shared in any degree, in part are but remotely approached, by the best men out of the Christian pale. Now when we look into the forming elements and processes of these Christian characters, we shall find that the miracles of the New Testament hold a foremost place, and we shall find it impossible even to conceive of their formation under the mythical theory. It is absurd to think of Paul as compassing sea and land, laying bare his back to the scourge, reaching after the crown of martyrdom, to defend a mythical resurrection and ascension of humanity; of Martyn or Judson as forsaking all the joys of civilized life, and encountering hardships worse than death, to preach Strassmansion; of the Gospel according to Strauss as taking the place of Matthew's or John's Gospel in the hands of the tinker or the dairy-maid, developing the sainily spirit, heralding the triumphant deaths, of which we have such frequent record in the annals of the poor. These holy men and women have been guided and sustained in virtue by the authority of a divinely commissioned Lawgiver, whose words they have received because he had been proclaimed and attested as the Son of God by power from on high. They have had a working faith in immortality,—such a faith as no reasoning, or analogy, or instinct ever has given,—because they have stood in thought by the bier at the gates of Xain and by the tomb of Bethany; because they have seen the light that streams from the broken sepulchre of the crucified, and have made a part of the contentment of the poor. Now if the development of the highest style of human character is a purpose worthy of God, and if in point of fact a belief in miracles has borne an essential part in the development of such characters, then are miracles not only possible, but antecedently probable and intrinsically credible. And this is an argument which cannot be impeached till Strassmansion has furnished at least a few finished characters, which we may drop down to the unlettered tinker and the dairy-maid. If now the development of these conditions that have been formed by faith in a miraculously empowered and endowed Teacher and Saviour.

Miracle, living as it does clearly within the scope of omnipotence, needs only adequate testimony to substantiate it. Human testimony is indeed appealed to in proof of the unbroken order of nature; but, so far as it goes, it proves the opposite. We can trace back no line of testimony which does not reach a miraculous epoch. Nay, if there be any element of human nature which is universal, with exceptions as rare as idiocy or insanity, it is the appettity for miracle. So strong is this, that at the present day none are so ready to receive the driftings of hyper-electrified women as utterances from departed spirits, and to accept the ab-surdities of the newest form of necromancy, as those who set aside the miracles of the New Testament and cast contempt on the risen Saviour. Such being the instinctive craving of human nature for that which is above nature, it is intrinsically probable that God has met this craving by authentic voices from the spirit-realm, by authentic glimpses from behind the veil of sense, by authentic forth-lookings of the omnipotent arm from beneath the mantle of proximate causes.

2. Strauss is self-refuted on his own ground. He maintains the uniformity of the law of causation in all time, equally in the material and the intellectual universe, so that no intellectual phenomenon can make its appearance, except from causes and under conditions adapted to bring it into being. Myths, therefore, cannot originate, except from causes and under conditions favorable to their birth and growth. Now, if we examine the undoubted myths connected with the history and religion of the ancient nations, we shall find that they had their origin prior to the era of written literature; that their evident nucleus is to be sought in historical personages and events of a very early date; that they grew into fantastic forms and vast proportions by their transmission from tongue to tongue, whether in story or in song; that their various versions are the result of oral tradition through different channels, as in the separate states of Greece, and among the aboriginal tribes and pre-historical colonists of Italy; and that they received no essential additions or modifications after the age at which authentic history begins. Thus the latest of the gods, demigods and wonder-working heroes of Grecian fable—such of them as ever lived—lived seven centuries before Herodotus, and not less than four centuries before Hesiod and Homer; the various accounts we have of them appear to have been extant in the earliest period of Greek literature; and we have no proof of the origin of any extended fable or of the existence of any personage who became mythical, after that period. The case is similar with the distinctively Roman myths and the mythical portions of Roman history. They are all very considerably anterior to the earliest written history and literature of Rome. The mythical and the historical periods of all nations are not co-extensive. Every nation's mythology, and the Christian era falls far within the historical period. Single prodigies are indeed related in the history of that age, as they are from time to time in modern and even recent history; but the leading incidents of individual lives and the successive stages of public and national affairs in that age are detailed with the same literalness with which the history of the seventeenth or eighteenth century is written. Yet, had these conditions not the growth of myths existed, there were not wanting, then, personages, whose vast abilities, strange vicissitudes of fortune, and extended fame would have made them mythical. It is hardly possible that there could have been a fuller supply of the material for myths in the life of Hercules, or of Cæsar, or of Mohammed, than in that of Julius Cesar, or of Marcus Antoninus, or of Charlemagne. Nor is it maintained that in this respect Judea was at an earlier and more primitive stage of culture than Rome or Egypt. Josephus, the Jewish historian, was born about the time of the death of Jesus Christ, and wrote very nearly at the period assigned by Strauss for the composition of the earliest of our Gospels. In addition to what we believe to have been the miracles of the Old Testament, he records many un doubted myths of the early Hebrew ages; but his history of his own times, with now and then a touch of the marvellous, has no more of the mythical element or tendency than we find in the narratives of the same epoch by Roman historians. In fine, there was nothing in that age more than in this, which could give rise or currency to a mythical history.

3. Myths are vague, dateless, incoherent, dreamy, poetical; while the Gospels are eminently prosaic, circumstantial, abounding in careful descriptions of persons, and designations of places and times. The genealogies given in Matthew and Luke are represented by Strauss as mythical; but nothing could be more thoroughly opposed to our idea of a myth, and to the character of the acknowledged myths of antiquity, than such catalogues of names. We believe both these genealogies to be authentic; for Matthew alone professes to give the natural and actual ancestry of Joseph, while Luke expressly says that he is giving the legal genealogy of Jesus, (as he was legally reckoned being the literal rendering of the words employed by the Evangelist, δεήσεως) and it is well known that the legal genealogy of a Jew might diverge very widely from the line of his actual parentage. But even were we to admit the alleged inconsistency of the two, they both bear incontestable marks of having been copied from existing documents, and not imagined or invented. All through the Gospels we find, in close connection with the miracles of Christ, details of common Jewish life, often so minute and trivial, that they would have been wholly beneath the aim of ambitious fiction or tawdly fancy, and could have found a place in the narrative only because they actually occurred. The miracles are not in a setting of their own kind, as they would have been in a fictitious narrative. They are imbedded in a singularly natural and lifelike, humble and unpretending history. The style of the Evangelists is not that of men who either wondered themselves, or expected others to wonder, at what they related; but it is the unambitious style of men who expected their audience to be incredulous, and who were perfectly familiar with the marvellous events they described. Had they related these events from rumor, from a euted imagination, or with a disposition to deceive, they must have written in an inflated style, with a profusion of epithets, with frequent appeals to the sentiment of the marvellous, not unmixed with the show of argument to convince the incredulous. When we find on the current of the Gospel history not a ripple of swollen diction, not a quickening of the rhetorical pulse, not a deviation from the quiet, prosaic, circumstantial flow of narrative, in describing such events as the walking upon the sea, the raising of Lazarus, the ascension of Jesus Christ to heaven, we can account for this unparalleled literary phenomenon only by supposing that the writers had become so conversant with miracle, either in their own experience or through their intimacy with eye-witnesses, that events aside from the ordinary course of nature had ceased to be contemplated with amazement.

4. Another conclusive argument against the mythical theory is derived from the sufferings and the martyrdoms of the primitive Christians. Strauss admits that the earliest of our Gospels assumed its present form within thirty or forty years after the death of Jesus. At that time there were still living great multitudes, who must have been contemporary and coeval with Jesus, and who had the means of ascertaining the truth with regard to his personal history. Mere fable, which involved no serious consequences to those who received it, might have passed unquestioned, and might have been devoured by weak men and superstitious women with easy credulity. But men are not wont to stake their reputation, their property, their lives, on stories which they have the means of testing, without looking carefully into the evidence of their truth. Now no fact in history is more certain than that, within forty years from the death of Christ, large numbers of persons, many of them natives of Judea, suffered the severest persecution, and incurred painful and ignominious death by fire, by crucifixion, and by exposure to wild beasts, in consequence of their professed belief in the divine mission, the miraculous endowments, and the resurrection of Jesus. Many of these persons were men of intelligence and cultivation. They must have known how far the alleged facts of the life of Jesus were confirmed by eye-witnesses, and how far and on what grounds they were called in question. They lived at a time when they could have tried the witnesses, and they must have been more or less than human if they threw away their lives for mere exaggerations or fables. The genuineness of several of Paul's epistles is admitted by Strauss, and neither he nor any one else doubts the fact of Paul's protracted sacrifices and sufferings, and his ultimate martyrdom as a Christian believer. Paul's epistles show him to have been a man of eminent power and culture,—in the opinion of many, the greatest man that God ever made; in the judgment of all, far above mediocrity. Born a Jew, educated in Jerusalem, familiar with the alleged scenes and witnesses of the miracles of Jesus, at first a persecutor of the infant church, he could have become a believer and a champion of the Christian faith only on strong evidence, and with a full knowledge of the grounds for unbelief and doubt; and we have his own statement of what he believed, and especially of his undoubting belief in the crowning miracle of the resurrection of Jesus. We know of no man whose testimony as to the present state of things is as firm and as certain as Paul's; and the time of the epistles of Jesus could be worth so much as his; and it is inconceivable that he, of all men, should have suffered or died in attestation of what he supposed or suspected to be myths. But we must multiply his testimony by hundreds, nay, by thousands, in order to represent the full amount and weight of the testimony of martyrdom. Now while we have not the slightest doubt that our Gospels were written, three of them at least at an earlier date than Strauss assigns to the first, and all of them by the men whose names they bear, we should deem them, if possible, more surely authenticated as to their contents, did we suppose them anonymous works of a later date; for in that case they would embody narratives already sealed by the martyr-blood of a cloud of witnesses, and thus would be not the mere story of their authors, but the story of the collective church.

5. The character of the primitive Christians is an impregnable argument for the truth of the Gospel-history, as opposed to the mythical theory. There is no doubt whatever that from the lifetime of Jesus commenced the moral regeneration of humanity. Virtues which had hardly a name before, sprang into being. Vices which had been embalmed in song and cherished in the heart of the highest civilization of the Roman empire, were condenied and denounced. A lofty ethical standard—a standard which has not yet been improved upon—was held forth by the earliest Christian writers, and recognized in all the Christian communities. There were among the early Christians types of character, which have never been surpassed, hardly equalled since. Strauss maintains that there are no uncaused effects,—no effects which have not causes fully commensurate with themselves. A Jewish youth, half-enthusiast, half-impostor, must have been immeasurably inferior to those great philosophers, who, with no other stock, and no other means of accounting for his superiority over all other teachers of truth and duty, unless we believe that he held by the gift of God a precociousness, which his alleged sway over nature and victory over death were but the natural and fitting expression.

6. Strauss bases his theory on the assumption that our Gospels were not written by the men whose names they bear, but that the productions of authors now unknown, at later and uncertain periods: and he admits that the mythical fabric which he supposes the Gospels to be could not have had its origin under the hands, or with the sanction, of apostles or their companions. But the genuineness of no ancient, we might almost say, of no modern work, rests on stronger evidence than does the authorship of our Gospels by the men whose names they bear. In the earlier ages their compositions were not reputed sacred, nor were they ever denied or called in question,—not even by the heretics who on dogmatic grounds rejected some of them, and would have found it convenient to reject all,—not even by Jewish and Gentile opponents of Christianity, who argued vehemently and bitterly against their contents without impeaching their genuineness. Justin Martyr, who wrote about the middle of the second century, speaks repeatedly of Memoirs of the Apostles called Gospels, and in his frequent recapitulation of what he professes to have drawn from this source there are numerous coincidences with our Gospels, not only in the facts narrated, but in words and in passages of considerable length. From his extant works we could almost reproduce the gospel history. He was a man of singularly inquisitive mind, of philosophical training, of large and varied education; and it is impossible that he should not have known whether these books were received without question, or whether they rested under the suspicion of spurious authorship. Irenaeus, who wrote a little later, gives a detailed description of our four Gospels, naming their respective authors, and stating the order in which and the circumstances under which they were composed; and he writes, not only in his own name, but in that of the whole church, saying that these books were not and had not been called in question by any. These are hot specimens of very numerous authorities that might be cited. About the same time, Cebus wrote against Christianity, and he drew so largely from our Gospels as the authorized narratives of the life of Christ, that a connected history of that life might almost be made from the extant passages quoted from his writings by his Christian opponents.

In the middle and the latter half of the second century, there were large bodies of Christians in every part of the civilized world, and the copies of the Gospels must have been numbered by many thousands. Their universal reception as the works of the men whose names they now bear can be accounted for only by their genuineness. Suppose that they were spurious, yet written and circulated in the lifetime of the Apostles,—it is impossible that they should not have openly denied their authorship, and that this denial should not have left traces of itself in the days of Justin Martyr and Irenaeus. Suppose that they were first put in circulation under the names they now bear, after the death of the Apostles,—it is inconceivable that there should not have been men shrewd enough to ask why they had not appeared while their authors were living, and their late appearance would have given rise to endless controversy and questions which would not have been quieted for several generations. Suppose that they were first issued and circulated anonymously,—there must have been a time when the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were first attached to them, and it is impossible that the attaching of the names of well-known men as authors to books which had been anonymous should not have been attended by grave doubt.

The statement of Luke in the Introduction of his Gospel, and the very nature of the case render it certain that numerous other accounts, more or less authentic, of the life of Christ were early written, and some such accounts, commonly called the Apocryphal Gospels, are still extant. But we have ample evidence that no such writings were ever received as of authority, read in the churches, or sanctioned by the office-bearers and leading men in Christiinity; and that none of them has ever possessed a character which would make them dangerous to the Church.

We have then abundant reason to believe, and no reason to doubt, that the ancient four Gospels were written by the men whose names they bear; and if this be proved, by the confession of Strauss himself the mythical theory is untenable.

Warren, Nieu Test. with Notes, vol. 1 Boston, 1857 (Amer. Tr. Soc.). Of works illustrating portions of the Gospels, A. Trench's Notes on the Parables (1841, 9th ed. 1864), Notes on the Miracles (1846, 7th ed. 1890), and Studies in the Gospels (1867), of all of which we have American editions, deserve particular mention. Wichelhaus has written an elaborate commentary on the history of the Passion Week (Ausführ. Komm. zu d. Gesch. des Leidens Jesus Christi, Halle, 1853). Of the works named above, the most valuable in a critical and philological point of view are those of Meyer, De Wette, and Bleek. For treatises on the separate Gospels, see their respective names; see also the article JESUS CHRISTUS.

A. GOTHOLIAS. Josias, son of Gotholias (Γοθολίας; Gothic), was one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Esdras (1 Esdr. viii. 33). The name is the same as ATHIAHILL, with the common substitution of the Greek ɣ for the Hebrew guttural ʕ. In the passage compared with 2 K. xi. 1, 1 (see shows that Athaliah was both a male and female name.

GOTHONIEL. (Γοθονῆς, i.e. Othnial; [Sin.1 Βοθονήν, gen. Βοθονήδας] Gotholiah, father of Caleb, who was one of the governors (ἀποστολας) of the city of Bethulia (Jud. vi. 15).

GOURD. I. Ἰτέλλω, only in Jon. iv. 6-10: κολοκύνθης; hedera. A difference of opinion has long existed as to the plant which is intended by this word. The argument is as old as Jerome, whose rendering was emended by Augustine as a heresy! In reality Jerome's rendering was not intended to be critical, but rather as a kind of pis aller necessitated by the want of a proper Latin word to express the original. Besides he was unwilling to leave it in merely Latinized Hebrew (קְוָרֹן), which might have occasioned misapprehensions. Augustine, following the LXX. and Syr. Versions, was in favor of the rendering gourd, which was adopted by Luther, the A. V., etc. In Jerome's description of the plant called in Syr. κάρα and Punic el-kor, Celsius recognizes the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant (Hieron. ii. 273 ff; Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 233, 623). The Ricinus was seen by Niebuhr (Descript. of Arab. p. 148) at Basra, where it was distinguished by the name el-kor; by Rauwolf (Trav. p. 52) it was noticed in great abundance near Tripoli, where the Arabs called it el-kor; while both Hassedquist and Robinson observed very large speci- mens of it in the neighborhood of Jericho (Ricinus in altitudine arboris insignissim; Hassedq. p. 555; see also Rob. i. 553).

Niebuhr observes that the Jews and Christians at Mosaic (Nineveh) maintained that the tree which sheltered Jonah was not "el-kor," but "el-kerra," a sort of gourd. 'His revival of the Augustan rendering has been defended by J. E. Faber (Notes et Harmer's Observations, etc. i. 145). And it must be confessed that the evidently miraculous charac- ter of the narrative in Jon. deprives the Polian Christi of any special claim to identification on the ground of its rapid growth and tree, as described by Niebuhr. More important, however, is it to observe the tree-like character of this plant, rendering it more suitable for the purpose which it is stated to have fulfilled; also the authority of the Palestine Jews who were contemporaries of Jerome, as compared with that of the Mosaic Jews conversed with by Niebuhr. But most decisive of all seems the derivation of the Hebrew word from the Egypt- tion kik (Herod. ii. 94; comp. Bahr, loc. cit. and Judkensy, *Opusc. pt. i. p. 110) established by Cel- sius, with whose arguments Michaelis declares him- self entirely satisfied (J. D. Mich. Suppl.); and confirmed by the Talmudical יַלְדָּן יֵאֵל וְלָא, aFig-oil, prepared from the seeds of the Ricinus (Buxt. Lex. Chid. Talmud, vol. 2029), and Dioscorides, iv. 164, where κράτων (Polian Christi) is described under the name of kik, and the oil made from its seeds is called kikwn wllw. II. יתלדנ and ילבּאלח. (1) In 2 K. iv. 39: a fruit used as food, disagreeable to the taste, and supposed to be poisonous. (2.) In 1 K. vi. 18, vii. 24, as an architectural ornament, where A. V. "knaps." In Hebrew the plant is described as לַדֶת יִפְלָר וְאֵפֶּר: riten silver- trem: whence in A. V. "wild vine" [2 K. iv. 39]. The fruits is called in Hebrew as above: *הַלּאָפָר: אָפָר: אָפָר: *wild gourds," A. V.

The inconsistency of all these renderings is man- ifest; but the fact is that the Hebrew name of the plant may denote any shrub which grows in ten- drels, such as the coilocynth, or the cucumber. Rosenmüller and Gesenius pronounce in favor of the wild cucumber, Cucumis agrestis or asinum (Cels. Hierobot. i. 393 ff). This opinion is con- firmed by the derivation from ילבאלח to burst. The wild cucumber bursts at the touch of the finger, and scatters its seeds, which the coilocynth does not (Rosem. Alterthuns. iv. pt. 1, 1). T. E. B.

There can, we think, be no reasonable doubt that the kikya which afforded shade to the prophet Jonah before Nineveh is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant, which, formerly a native of Asia, is now naturalized in America, Africa, and the south of Europe. This plant, which varies considerably in size, being in India a tree, but in England seldom attaining a greater height than three or four feet, receives its generic name from the resemblance its fruit was anciently supposed to bear to the acinus ("tick") of that name. See Dioscorides (iv. 161, ed. Sprengel) and Pliny (H. N. xv. 7). The leaves are large and palmy, with serrated lobes, and would form an excellent shelter for the sun-stricken prophet. The seeds contain the oil so well known under the name of "castor-oil," which has for ages been in high repute as a medicine.

With regard to the "wild gourds" (יַלְדָּן וְלָא, pokkaith) of 2 K. iv. 39, which one of the "sons of the prophets" gathered ignorantly, supposing them to be good for food, there can be no doubt that it is a species of the gourd tribe (Cucurbitaceae), which contain some plants of a very bitter and dangerous character. The leaves and tendrils of this family of plants bear some resemblance to those of the vine. Hence the expression, "wild vine;" and as several kinds of Cucurbitaceae, such as melons, pumpkins, etc., are favorite articles of refreshing food amongst the Orientals, we can easily understand the cause of the mistake.

The plants which have been by different writers identified with the pkhkwth are the following: the colocynth, or colocynthia (Citrullus colocynthis); the Cucumis prophetarum, or globe cucumber; and the Cucumen (Momordica) peltata; all of which have claims to denote the plant in question. The etymology of the word from בֶּשְׁלִיק, "to split or burst open," has been thought to favor the identification of the plant with the Ecbalium elaterium, or "squirt ing cucumber," so called from the elasticity with which the fruit, when ripe, opens and scatters the seeds when touched. This is the ἔριξις ἡμών of Dioscorides (iv. 152) and Theophrastus (vii. 6, § 4, &c.), and the Cucumis yl-nestri of Pliny (H. N. xx. 2). Celsius (Hist. i. 283), Rosenmüller (Böd. Bot. p. 128), Winer (Böd. Res. i. 525), and Gesnerus (Thes. p. 1122), are in favor of this explanation, and it must be confessed, not without some reason. The old versions, however, understand the colocynth, the fruit of which is about the size of an orange. The drastic medicine in such general use is a preparation from this plant. Michaelis (Suppl. Lex. Heb. p. 344) and Oedlmann (Vern. Samen. iv. 88) adopt this explanation; and since, according to Kitto (Pict. Böd. i. c.), the dry gourds of the colocynth, when crushed, burst with a crashing noise, there is much reason for being satisfied with an explanation which has authority, etymology, and general suitableness in its favor. All the above-named plants are found in the East.

* There is a Letter relating to Jonah's Gourd in the Bible, Euseb. xii. 196 ff., from the late Rev. H. Loebell, Missionary at Mosul in Mesopotamia. He says that "the Mohammedans, Christians, and Jews all agree in referring the plant to the kert, a kind of pumpkin peculiar to the East. The leaves are large, and the rapidity of the growth of the plant is astonishing. Its fruit is, for the most part, eaten in a fresh state, and is somewhat like the squash. It has no more than a generic resemblance to the gourd of the United States, though I suppose that both are species of the cucurbitas. It is grown in great abundance on the alluvial banks of the Tigress, and on the plain between the river and ruins of Nineveh, which is about a mile wide." He gives reasons for supposing that the LXX kolokynth was really meant to designate that plant. Dr. Pusey (Jonah, p. 258) follows those who adopt our marginal rendering as correct, namely, palmercot or the castor-oil plant as described above. He remarks concerning this plant (which must be true, perhaps, of any plant with which the ἱκίας was identical) that while the rapidity of its growth was supernatural, it was a growth in conformity with the natural character of the product.

GOVERNOR. In the A. V. this one English word is the representative of no less than ten Hebrew and four [five] Greek words. To discriminate between them is the object of the following article.

1. פַּלְטָנָה, alliph, the chief of a tribe or family, פַּלְטָנָה, elaph (Judg. vi. 15; Is. ix. 22; Mic. v. 2), and equivalent to the "prince of a thousand" of Ex. xviii. 21, or the "head of a thousand" of Num. i. 16. It is the term applied to the "dukes" of Edom (Gen. xxxiv.). The LXX. have retained the etymological significance of the word in rendering it by καλαίρως in Zech. ix. 7; xii. 5, 6 (comp. יִלְעֶה, from יִלָּעַה). The usage in other passages seems to imply a more intimate relationship than that which would exist between a chieftain and his fellow-clerics, and to express the closest friendship. Allāyp is then a "guide, director, counsellor" (Ps. lv. 13; Prov. ii. 17; Jer. iii. 4), the object of confidence or trust (Mic. v. 2).

2. מַכְּלָךְ, מַכְּלָךְ (Judg. v. 9), and מַכְּלָךְ (Judg. v. 14), denote a ruler in his capacity of toungiier and dispenser of justice (Gen. xix. 10; Prov. viii. 15; comp. Judg. v. 14, with Is. x. 1).

4. מְשֶה, mēsheh, a ruler considered especially as having power over the property and persons of his subjects; whether his authority were absolute, as in Judg. xix. 11 of Sihon, and in Ps. cxv. 26, or delegated, as in the case of Abraham's steward (Gen. xxiv. 2), and Joseph as second to Pharaoh (Gen. xvii. 8, 26, Ps. cxv. 21). The "governors of the people" in 2 Chr. xxiii. 20 appear to have been the king's body-guard (cf. 2 K. xii. 19).

5. מִנְגִּיד, minēgid, is connected etymologically with מַנְגָּיב יָד, and denotes a prominent personage, whatever his capacity. It is applied to a king as the military and civil chief of his people (2 Sam. v. 2, vi. 21; 1 Chr. xvi. 11), to the chief of an army (2 Chr. xxxii. 21), and to the head of a tribe (2 Chr. xix. 11). The heir-apparent to the crown was thus designated (2 Chr. xii. 22), as holding a prominent position among the king's sons. The term is also used of persons who fulfilled certain offices in the temple, and is applied equally to the high-priest (2 Chr. xxxi. 10, 13), as to inferior priests (2 Chr. xxxv. 8) to whose charge were committed the treasures and the dedicated things (1 Chr. xxvi. 24), and to Levites appointed for special service (2 Chr. xxi. 12). It denotes an officer of high rank in the palace, the lord high chamberlain (2 Chr. xxviii. 7), who is also described as "over the household" (1 K. iv. 6), or "over the house" (1 K. xviii. 3). Such was the office held by Shebna, the scribe, or secretary of state (Is. xxii. 15), and in which he was succeeded by Elizakim (2 K. xvii. 15). It is perhaps the equivalent of ἐκκόμος, Rom. xvi. 23, and of ἐκταραττός, 1 Esd. vii. 2 (cf. 1 Esd. i. 8).

6. מְשֹׁרֵי, mēshore. The prevailing idea in this word is that of elevation. It is applied to the chief of a tribe (Gen. xxv. 20, 26, etc.), to the heads of sections of a tribe (Num. iii. 32, vii. 2), and to a powerful sheikh (Gen. xxvii. 6). It appears to be synonymous with allāyp in 2 Chr. i. 2, מְשֹׁרֵי מְשֹׁרַר = מְשֹׁרַר מְשֹׁרֵי (cf. 2 Chr. v. 2).

In general it denotes a man of elevated rank. In later times the title was given to the president of the great Sanhedrin (Selden, De Synedrisis, ii. 6, § 1).

7. פֶּכְּחָה, pekhāh, is probably a word of Assyan origin. It is applied in 1 K. x. 15 to the petty chieftains who were tributary to Solomon (2 Chr. x. 14); to the military commander of the Syrians (1 K. xx. 24); the Assyrians (2 K. xvii. 24), the Chaldeans (Jer. lii. 23), and the Medes (Jer. lii. 28). Under the Persian viceroys, during the Babylonian captivity, the land of the Hebrews appear, to have been portioned out among "governors" (נָפָחַה, pekhāh) inferior in rank to the satraps (Ezr. viii. 44), like the other provinces which were under the dominion of the Persian king (Neh. ii. 7, 9).

It is impossible to determine the precise limits of their authority, or the functions which they had to perform. They formed a part of the Babylonian system of government, and are expressly distinguished from the נָפָחַה, naphāh (Jer. lii. 23, 28), to whom, as well as to the satraps, they seem to have been inferior (Dan. iii. 2, 3, 27); as also from the שלים, širim (Esth. iii. 12, viii. 9), who, on the other hand, had a subordinate jurisdiction. Sheshbazar, the "prince" (עֵנֶשׁ בְּצָר, Ezr. i. 8) of Judah, was appointed by Cyrus a "governor" of Jerusalem (Ezr. v. 14), or "governor of the Jews," as he is elsewhere designated (Ezr. vi. 7), an office to which Nehemiah afterwards succeeded (Neh. v. 14) under the title of Tirshatha (Ezr. vi. 63; Neh. viii. 9). Zerubbabel, the representative of the royal family of Judah, is also called the "governor" of Judah (Hag. i. 1), but whether in consequence of his position in the tribe or from his official rank is not quite clear. Tattenai, the "governor" beyond the river, is spoken of by Josephus (Ant. xi. 4, § 4) under the name of Sisines, as ἐραγόσας of Syria and Phoenicia (cf. 1 Esd. vi. 3); the same term being employed to denote the Roman proconsul or procurator as well as the procurator (Jos. Ant. xx. 8, § 1). It appears from Ezr. vi. 8 that these governors were intrusted with the collection of the king's taxes; and from Neh. vi. 18, xii. 26, that they were supported by a contribution levied upon the people, which was technically termed "the bread of the governor" (comp. Ezr. iv. 14). They were probably assisted in discharging their official duties by a council (Ezr. iv. 7, vi. 6). In the Peshito version of Neh. iii. 11. Pahath Moab is not taken as a proper name, but is rendered "chief of Moab," and a similar translation is given in other passages where the words occur, as in Ezr. ii. 6, Neh. vii. 11, x. 14. The "governor" beyond the river had a judgment-seat at Jerusalem, from which probably he administered justice when making a progress through his province (Neh. iii. 7).

8. פֶּכְּבָד, pekbād, denotes simply a person appointed to any office. It is used of the officers proposed to be appointed by Joseph (Gen. xliii. 34); of Zebul, Abimelech's lieutenant (Judg. ii. 28); of an officer of the high-priest (2 Chr. xxiv. 11), inferior to the mēgīd (2 Chr. xxxi. 12, 13), or pekbēd mēgīd (Jer. xx. 1), and of a priest or Levite of high rank (Neh. xi. 14, 22). The same term is applied to the eunuch who was over the men of war (2 K. xx. 19; Jer. iii. 25), and to an officer appointed for special service (Esth. ii. 3). In the passage of Jer. xx. above quoted it probably denotes the captain of the temple guard mentioned in Acts iv. 1, v. 24, and by Josephus (B. J. vi. 5, § 3).

9. מְשֹׁלָל, mēšolah, a man of authority. Applied to Joseph as Pharaoh's prime minister (Gen. xliii. 6); to Arioch, the captain of the guard, to the king of Babylon (Dan. ii. 15), and to Daniel as third in rank under Belshazzar (Dan. v. 29).

10. נִרְעָה, nirā, a chief, in any capacity. The term is used equally of the general of an army (Gen. xxii. 22), or the commander of a division (1 K. xvi. 9, xi. 24), as of the governor of Pharaoh's prison (Gen. xxxix. 21), and the chief of his butlers and bakers (Gen. xi. 2), or herdsmen (Gen. xliii. 4). The chief officer of a city, in his civic capacity, was thus designated (1 K. xii. 26; 2 K. xxii. 8). The same dignity is elsewhere described as svw
GOVERNOR

11. "W. Upoffrd Trjs and who he ethnarchy, Archelaus, from is exercised under the Persian kings.

12. "The concept of a governor under Aretas, the Arabian king of Damascus. It is not easy to determine the capacity in which he acted. The term is applied in 1 Mac. xiv. 47, xv. 1 to Simon the high-priest, who was made general and ethnarch of the Jews, as a vessel of Domitian. From this the office would appear to be distinct from a military command. The jurisdiction of Archelaus, called by Josephus (B. J. ii. 6, § 3) an ethnarchy, extended over Idumaean, Samaria, and all Judaea, the half of his father’s kingdom, which he held as the emperor’s vassal. But, on the other hand, Strabo (xvii. 13), in enumerating the offices who formed part of the machinery of the Roman government in Egypt, mentions ethnarch as apparently as inferior both to the military commanders and to the monarchs, or governors of districts. Again, the prefect of the colony of Jews in Alexandria (called by Philo θεσπάργης, lib. in Flacc. § 10) is designated by this title in the edict of Claudius given by Josephus (Ant. xix. 5, § 2).

According to Strabo (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7, § 2) he exercised the prerogatives of an ordinary independent ruler. It has therefore been conjectured that the ethnarch of Damascus was merely the governor of the resident Jews, and this conjecture receives some support from the parallel narrative in Acts ix. 24, where the Jews alone are said to have taken part in the conspiracy against the Apostle. But it does not seem probable that an officer of such limited jurisdiction would be styled “the ethnarch of Aretas the king;” and as the term is clearly capable of a wide range of meaning, it was most likely intended to denote one who held the city and district of Damascus as the king’s vassal or representative.

13. "Guzan, the procurator of Judæa under the Romans (Matt. xxvii. 2, etc.). The verb is employed (Luke ii. 2) to denote the nature of the jurisdiction of Quirinus over the imperial province of Syria.

14. "Guzan, a steward; apparently intrusted with the management of a minor’s property.

15. "Guzan, John ii. 9, “the governor of the feast.” It has been conjectured, but without much show of probability, that this officer corresponded to the συμποσιαρχος of the Greeks, whose duties are described by Plutarch (Sympsis. Quaed. 4), and to the latter bishop of the Roman Lightfoot supposes him to have been a kind of chaplain, who pronounced the blessings upon the wine that was drunk during the seven days of the marriage feast. Again, some have taken him to be equivalent to the ταυτάκοποι, who is defined by Philox (Theol. vi. 1) as one who had the charge of all the servants at a feast, the carvers, entertainers, etc. But there is nothing in the narrative of the marriage-feast at Cana which would lead to the supposition that the ἀρχιτριτίλειος held the rank of a servant. He appears rather to have been on intimate terms with the bridegroom, and to have presided at the banquet in his stead. The duties of the master of a feast are given at full length in Ecles. xxxvi. (xxxi.).

In the Apocryphal books, in addition to the common words, ἀρχων, δεσπότης, στρατηγός, which are rendered “governor,” we find ἐπιστάτης (1 Esdr. 1; Jud. ii. 14), which closely corresponds to τάφαρχος used of Zeerbubl and Tatna (1 Esdr. vi. 3, 29, vii. 1), and ἀρχιτριτίλειος, applied to Sheshhazzar (1 Esdr. ii. 12), both of which represent τάφαρχος: ἐπιστάτης (1 Esdr. vii. 2) and προστάτης του ἵππου (2 Mac. iii. 4), “the governor of the temple” — τάφαρχος (cf. 2 Chr. xxiv. 8) and στρατηγός (1 Esdr. iii. 21), a “satrap,” not always used in its strict sense, but as the equivalent of στρατηγός (Jud. v. 2, vii. 8).

W. A. W.

16. "The edéwos, the governor (dirigens, Vulg.), Jas. iii. 4, where the pilot or helmsman is meant. Both κοπρείρας (Acts xxvii. 11 and Rev. xvii. 17) and the Latin gubernator, whence our “governor” is derived, denote the man at the helm of the vessel.

GOZAN (Πηνυκα, perh. quarry, Gez.; poss. fired, First: Γαζα, v. v. 2, 6, Γααρ, and 1 Chr. xxvii. 1; Gozan, [in Is., Gozam]) seems in the A. V. of 1 Chr. v. 26 to be the name of a river; but in Kings (2 K. vii. 6, and xviii. 11) it is evidently applied not to a river but a country. "Where Kings and Chronicles differ, the authority of the latter is weak; and the name Gozan will therefore be taken in the present article for the name of a tract of country.

Gozan was the tract to which the Israelites were carried away captive by Pult, Tighath-Pilser, and Shalmaneser, or possibly Sargon. It has been variously placed; but it is probably identical with the town called of Homem (Geographe, v. 18), and may be regarded as represented by the Mygdonia of other writers (Strab., Polyb., etc.). It was the tract watered by the Habor (Ἀβάρδας, Αβάρδας), the modern Khabur, the great Mesopotamian affluent of the Euphrates. Mr. Layard describes this region as one of remarkable fertility (Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 290–313). According to the LXX. Halah and Habor were both rivers of Gozan (2 K. vii. 6); but this is a mistranslation of the Hebrew text, and it is corrected in the following chapter, where we have the term “river” used in the singular of the Halah only. Halah seems to have been a region adjoining Gozan. [HALAH] With respect to the term Mygdonia, which became the recognized name of the region in classic times, and which Strabo (xvi. 1, § 27) and Plutarch (Livid. xix. e. 52) abridgely connect with the Mygdonian Mygdones, it may be observed that it is merely gozan, with the participial or adverbial ἐπί prefixed. The Greek writers always represent the Semitic ẹ by their own ọ. Thus Goza became Gozan, etc. But the Latin word which became the Phrae, and Mygdonian Mygum. The conjunction of Gozan with Haran or Haran in Isaiah (xxvii. 12) is in entire agreement with was on the river, and a ford there (see above) may have given name to both.

the position here assigned to the former. As Gozan was the district on the Khabour, so Haran was that upon the Bilk, the next affluent of the Euphrates. [See Charran.] The Assyrian kings, having conquered the one, would naturally go on to the other.

GRAPE. [Vine.]

GRASS. 1. This is the ordinary rendering of the Heb. word הָרָגָא (haragah), which signifies properly an inclosed spot, from the root הָרָגָא, to inclose; but this root also has the second meaning to flourish, and hence the noun frequently signifies "folder," "food of cattle." In this sense it occurs in 1 K. xvii. 8; Job xi. 15; Ps. civ. 14: Is. xx. 6, 8. As the herbage rapidly fades under the parching heat of the sun of Palestine, it has afforded to the sacred writers an image of the fleeting nature of human fortunes (Job viii. 12; Ps. xxxvii. 2), and also of the brevity of human life (Is. xi. 6, 7; Ps. xc. 5). The LXX. render הָרָגָא by ὤμαιναν and πῶς, but most frequently by αἱρεῖν, a word which in Greek has passed through the very same modifications of meaning as its Hebrew representative: αἱρεῖν = gaven, "folder," is properly a con or inclosed space for cattle to feed in (Homo. II. xi. 774), and then any feeding-place whether inclosed or not (Drr. ἱπ. T. 134, αἱρεῖν εὐθειάρος).

Gesenius questions whether הָרָגָא, αἱρεῖν, and the Sam. הֵרָגָא "green" may be traceable to the same root.

2. In Jer. i. 11, A. V. renders הָרָגָא as the heifer at press, and the LXX. ὡμαίναν ὂμαιναν. It should be "as the heifer treading out corn" (comp. Hos. x. 11). הָרָגָא comes from הָרָגָא, cederers, tritivare, and has been confounded with הָרָגָא, gaven, from root הָרָגָא, to germinate. This is the word rendered press in Gen. i. 11, 12, where it is distinguished from הָרָגָא, the latter signifying herba suitable for human food, while the former is herbage for cattle. Gesenius says it is used chiefly concerning grass, which has no seed (at least none obvious to general observers), and the smaller weeds which spring up spontaneously from the soil. The LXX. render it by αἱρεῖν, as well as by αἱρεῖν, ὡμαιναν, and πῶς.

3. In Num. xxii. 4, where mention is made of the ox licking up the grass of the field, the Heb. word is הוֹרָגָא, which elsewhere is rendered green, when followed by הָרָגָא or הָרָמָא, as in Gen. i. 30, and Ps. xxxvii. 2. It answers to the German des Grasen, and comes from the root הָרָגָא, to flourish like grass.

4. הָרָגָא is used in Deut., in the Psalms, and in the Prophets, and, as distinguished from הָרָגָא, signifies herbs for human food (Gen. i. 30; Ps. civ. 14), but also folder for cattle (Deut. xi. 15; Jer. xiv. 6). It is the grass of the field (Gen. ii. 5 Ex. ix. 22) and of the mountain (Is. xiii. 15 Prov. xxvii. 25).

In the N. T. wherever the word grass occurs it is the representative of the Greek "GRAPE." [L. D.

* GRATE. [ALTAR.]

GRAVE. [BURIAL.]

GREALVES (776). This word occurs in the A. V. only in 1 Sam. xvii. 6, in the description of the equipment of Goliath — "he had greaves of brass upon his legs." Its ordinary meaning is a piece of defensive armor which reached from the foot to the knee, and thus protected the shin of the wearer. This was the case with the "kynal of the Greeks, which derived its name from its covering the kynal, i. e. the part of the leg above-named. But the Mishneh of the above passage can hardly have been armor of this nature. Whatever the armor was it was not worn on the legs, but on the feet (777) of Goliath. It appears to have been derived from a root signifying brightness, as of a star (see Gesenius and Fürst). The word is not either in the dual or plural number, but is singular. It would therefore appear to have been more a kind of shoe or boot than a "greave;" though in our ignorance of the details of the arms of the Hebrews and the Philistines we cannot conjecture more closely as to its nature. At the same time it must be allowed that all the old versions, including Josephus, give it the meaning of a piece of armor for the leg — some even for the thigh.

G.

GREECE, GREEKS, GRECIANS. The histories of Greece and Palestine are so little connected as those of any other two nations exercising the same influence on the destinies of mankind could well be.

The Homeric Epos in its widest range does not include the Hebrews, while on the other hand the Mosaic idea of the Western world seems to have been sufficiently indefinite. It is possible that Moses may have derived some geographical outlines from the Egyptians; but he does not use them in Gen. x. 2-5, where he mentions the descendants of Javan as peopling the islands of the Gentiles. This is merely the vaguest possible indication of a geographical locality; and yet it is not improbable that his Egyptian teachers were almost equally in the dark as to the position of a country which had not at that time arrived at a unity sufficiently imposing to arrest the attention of its neighbors. The amount and precision of the information possessed by Moses must be measured by the nature of the relation which we can conceive as existing in his time between Greece and Egypt. Now it appears from Herodotus that prior to the Trojan war the current of tradition, sacred and mythical, set from Egypt towards Greece; and the first quasi-historical event which awakened the curiosity and stimulated the imagination of the Egyptian priests, the story of Paris and Helen (Herod. ii. 43, 51, 52, and 112). At the time of the Exodus, therefore, it is not likely that Greece had entered into any definite relation whatever with Egypt. Withdrawn from the sea-coast, and only gradually fighting their way to it during the period of the Judges, the Hebrews have had no opportunity of forming connections with the Greeks. From the time of Solon, it is true, the Greeks, as we may notice in the two elements of the Greeks in the Hebrew writings, except that which was contained in the word Javan (Gen. x. 2); and it does not seem probable that during this period the word had any peculiar significance for a Jew, except in so far as it was associated with the idea of islanders. When, indeed, they came into contact with the Ionians of Asia Minor, and recognized them as the long-lost islanders of the western migration, it was natural that they should mark the similarity of sound between Vpy = Η and Ione, and the application of that name to the Asiatic Greeks would tend to satisfy in some measure a longing to realize the Moshe ethnography. Accordingly the O. T. word which is Grecia in A. V. Greece, Greeks, etc. is in Hebrew פ*ג, Jerusalem, Isaiah xxxv. 8; Dan. viii. 21; the Hebrew, however, is sometimes retained (Is. lxvi. 19; Ez. xxvii. 13). In Gen. x. 2, the LXX. have καὶ Ἱουαναὶ καὶ Εβραίων, with which Rosenmuller compares Herod. ii. 56-58, and professes to discover the two elements of the Greek race. From Ίουαναί he gets the Ionian or Pelasgian, from *Εβραίων (for which he supposes the Hebr. original נ*ג), the Hellenic element. This is excessively fanciful, and the degree of accuracy which it implies upon an ethnological question cannot possibly be attributed to Moses, and is by no means necessarily involved in the fact of his divine inspiration.

The Greeks and Hebrews met for the first time in the slave-market. The medium of communication seems to have been the Tyrian slave-merchant. About 8. c. 800 Joel speaks of the Tyrians as selling the children of Judah to the Greeks (Joel iii. 6); and in the 3rd century B.C. the Greeks are mentioned as bartering their,brazen vessels for slaves. On the other hand, Bechart says that the Greek slaves were highly valued throughout the East (Geogr. Soc. pt. i. lib. iii. c. 3, p. 175); and it is probable that the Tyrians took advantage of the calamities which befell either nation to sell them as slaves to the other. Abundant opportunities would be afforded by the attacks of the Libyan monarchy on the one people, and the Syrian on the other; and it is certain that Tyre would let slip no occasion of replenishing her slave-market.

Prophehtical notice of Greece occurs in Dan. viii. 21, etc., where the history of Alexander and his successors is rapidly sketched. Zechariah (ix. 13) foretells the triumphs of the Maccabees against the Greek-Syrian empire, while Isaiah looks forward to the conversion of the Greeks, amongst other Gentiles, through the instrumentality of Jewish missionaries (lxvi. 19). For the connection between the Jews and the quasi-Greek kingdoms which sprung out of the divided empire of Alexander, reference should be made to other articles.

The presence of Alexander himself at Jerusalem, and his respectful demeanor, are described by Josephus (Ant. xi. 8, § 3); and some Jews are even said to have joined him in his expedition against Versus (Heb. ap. Joseph. c. Apion, ii. 4), as the Samaritans had already done in the siege of Tyre (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 4-6). In 1 Macc. xii. 5-23 (about B. c. 180), and Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 10, we have an account of an embassy and letter sent by the Lacedaemonians to the Jews. [AREUS; OXH.

The most remarkable feature in the transaction is the claim which the Lacedaemonians prefer to kindred with the Jews, and which Arcus professes to establish, by reference to a book. It is by no means unlikely that two declining nations, the one crowning beneath a Roman, the other beneath a Graeco-Syrian invader, should draw together in face of the common calamity. This may have been the case, or we may with John (Heb. Comm. ix. 9, note) regard the affair as a piece of pompous trilling or idle curiosity, at a period when all nations were curious to ascertain their origin, and their relationship to other nations.

The notices of the Jewish people which occur in Greek writers have been collected by Josephus (c. Apion, i. 22). The chief are Pythagoras, Herodotus, Cheriaus, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Hecataus. The main drift of the argument of Josephus is to show that the Greek authors derived their materials from Jewish sources, or with more or less distinctness referred to Jewish history. For Pythagoras, see verses Herinnipus's life; for Aristotle, Cicaclus; but it should be remembered that the Neo-Platonism of these authorities makes them comparatively worthless; that Herinnipus in particular belongs to that Alexandrian school which made it its business to fuse the Hebrew traditions with the philosophy of Greece, and propitiated the genius of Orientalism by denying the merit of originality to the great and independent thinkers of the West. The style of thought was further developed by Cicaclus; and a very good specimen of it may be seen in Lecher's notices on Grotius, de Verr. It has been ably and vehemently assailed by Ritter, Hist. Phil. b. i. c. 3.

Herodotus mentions the Euphrates of Palæstina as confessing that they derived the rite of circumcision from the Egyptians (ii. 104). Bihler, however, does not think it likely that Herodotus visited the interior of Palestine, though he was acquainted with the sea-coast. (On the other hand see Dallmann, pp. 55, 56, Engl. transl.) It is almost impossible to suppose that Herodotus could have visited Jerusalem without giving us some more detailed account of it than the merely incidental notices in ii. 159 and iii. 5, not to mention that the site of Καστόρ is still a disputed question.

The victory of Phraor-Anecho over Josiah at Megiddo is recorded by Herodotus (comp. Herod. ii. 159 with 2 K. xvii. 22-23, 2 Chr. xxxv. 20-22). It is singular that Josephus should have omitted these references, and cited Herodotus only as mentioning the rite of circumcision.

The work of Theophrastus cited is not extant; he enumerates amongst other oaths that of Corbin. Cheriaus is supposed by Josephus to describe the Jews in a by no means flattering portrait of a people who accompanied Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. The chief points of identification are, their speaking the Phoenician language, and dwelling in the Solývems mountains, near a broad lake, which according to Josephus was the Dead Sea.

phasis has been called in question by Origen and others.

After the complete subjugation of the Greeks by the Romans, and the absorption into the Roman empire of the kingdoms which were formed out of the dominions of Alexander, the political connection between the Greeks and Jews as two independent nations no longer existed.

The name of the country, Greece, occurs once in N. T., Acts xx. 2, "Ελλάς = Greece, i. e. Greece Proper, as opposed to Macedonia. a In the A. V. of O. T. the word Greek is not found; either Javan is retained, or, as in Joel iii. 6, the word is rendered by Grecian. In Maccaebes Greeks and Grecians seem to be used indifferently (comp. 1 Mac. i. 10, vi. 2; also 2 Mac. iv. 10, Greekish). In N. T., on the other hand, a distinction is observed, "Ελλάς being observed Greek, and Ελληνι- στής Grecian. The difference of the English terminations, however, is not sufficient to convey the difference of meanings. "Ελλάς in N. T. is either a Greek by race, as in Acts xvi. 1-3, xviii. 17, Rom. i. 14; or more frequently a Gentile, as opposed to a Jew (Rom. ii. 9, 10, etc.); so fem. 'Ελληνις, Mark vii. 26, Acts xviii. 21. "Ελληνι- στής (properly "one who speaks Greek") is a foreign Jew; opposed, therefore, not to Ιουδαῖος, but to Εβραίος, a home-Jew, one who dwelt in Palestine. So Schleusner, etc.; according to Salmusius, how- ever, the Hellenists were Greek proselytes, who had become Christians; so Wolf, Parkhurst, etc., arguing from Acts xi. 20, where 'Ελληνισταί are contrasted with Ιουδαῖοι in 19. The question resolves itself partly into a textual one, Griesbach having adopted the reading "Ελληνισταί, and so also Lach- man. b

GREETING. [SALUTATION.]

GREYHOUND, the translation in the text of the A. V. (Prov. xxx. 31) of the Hebrew words זִיצֵי נַחַל (zarzir mothirgin), i. e. "one girl about the loins." See margin, where it is conjectured that the "horse" is the animal de- noted by this expression. The Alexandrine version of the LXX. has the following interpretation, ἀλεποῦν ἑπετριπτὴν ἐν θηλαις εὐφορον, i. e. "a cock as it proudly struts amongst the hens." Somewhat similar is the Vulgate, "gallus succinc- tus lumbos." Various are the opinions as to what animal "comely in going" is here intended. Some think "a leopard," others "an eagle," or "a man girl with armor," or "a zebra," etc. Gesenius (Thea. p. 433), Schultens (Comment. ad Prov. l. c.), Bochart (Hieroz. li. 684), Rosenmüller (Schol. ad Prov. i. c., and Not. ad Boch. l. c.), Fuller (Miscell. Sac. v. 12), are in favor of a "war-horse girl with trappings" being the thing signified. But,

GRINDERS, Eccl. xii. 3. [ALMOND.]

GRINDING. [MILL.]

GROVE. A word used in the A. V., with two exceptions, to translate the mysterious Hebrew term Aserah (יָשָרֶה). This term is examined under its own head (p. 173), where it is observed that almost all modern interpreters agree that an idol or image of some kind must be intended, and not a grove, as our translators render, following the version of the LXX. (Δασός) and of the Vulgate (lucus). This is evident from many passages, and especially from 2 K. xxvii. 6, where we find that Josiah "brought out the Asherah " (translated by our version "the grove ") b from the house of the

H. * "Ελλάς stands there for the stricter ΑΧΛΑΣ (see Acts xviii. 12 and xix. 21). Wetstein has shown (Nov. Test. ii. 500) that Luke was justified in that use of the term.

A. Also, Tischendorf, De Wette, Meyer, and others, adopt Ελληνισταί, partly on external, and partly on internal grounds. It is a question of mixed evidence without this reading it is impossible to see how the sphere of the speakers in ver. 19 differs from that of those in ver. 20. It would have been nothing new at this time to preach to the Greek-speaking Jews; see e. g., Acts ii. 9, and ix. 20. b Lord" (comp. also Judg. iii. 7; 1 K. xiv. 23, xvii. 19). In many passages the "groves" are grouped with maidens and graven images in a manner that leaves no doubt that some idol was intended (2 Chr. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 3, 4; Is. xvii. 8). There has been much dispute as to what the Asherah was; but in addition to the views set forth under Asher- rah, we must not omit to notice a probable connection between this symbol or image — whatever it was and the sacred symbolic tree, the representation of which occurs so frequently on Assyrian sculptures, and is shown in the preceding woodcut. The connection is ingeniously maintained by Mr. Fergusson in his Nineveh and Persepolis restored (pp. 299-304), to which the reader is referred.

2. The two exceptions noticed above are Gen. xxi. 33 and 1 Sam. xxii. 6 (margin), where a "grove" is employed to render the word מְדִילֶה, Medil, which in the latter of the passage, and in 1 Sam. xxxvi. 13, is translated "tree." Professor Stanley (S. & P. § 77; also p. 21, note) would have Medil to be a tamarisk; but this is controverted by Bonar (Land of Promise), on the ground of the thin and shadeless nature of that tree. It is now, however, generally recognized (amongst others, see Gesen. Thes. p. 50 b; Stanley, S. & P. App. § 76, 3, p. 142 note, 220 note, and Passow), that the word אלה, Elleh, which is uniformly rendered by the A. V. "groves," signifies a grove or plantation. Such were the Elah of Manare (Gen. xxiii. 18, xiv. 18, xviii. 1); of Moreh (Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30); and of Medin (Judg. iv. 15, or Josh. xiv. 33); of the pillar (Judg. ix. 6); of Monemenin (Judg. ix. 37); and of Tabor (1 Sam. x. 3). In all these cases the LXX. have πώρας or βαλακρίνας: the Vulgate — which the A. V. probably followed — calles or convallis, in the last three, however, quercus.

In the religions of the ancient heathen world groves play a prominent part. In old timesaltors only were erected to the gods. It was thought wrong to shut up the gods within walls, and hence, as Pliny expressly tells us, trees were the first temples (H. N. xii. 2; Tac. Germ. 9; Lucian, de Sacer. 19; see Carpzov, App. Crit. p. 332), and from the earliest times groves are mentioned in connection with religious worship (Gen. xii. 6, 7, xiii. 18; Deut. xi. 30; A. V. "plain;" see above). Their high antiquity, refreshing shade, solemn silence, and awe-inspiring solitude, as well as the striking illustration they afford of natural life, marked them out as the fit localities, or even the actual objects of worship (ναοί in et in silentia ipsa adoramus; Plin. xii. 1; "Secretum loci .... et admiratio umbra silvis tibi nunmis facet," Sen. Ep. xii.; "Quo possis viso dicere Numen habet," Or. First. ii. 260; "Sacra nemus accebit umbra," Virg. Georg. iii. 334; Or. Met. viii. 743; Ev. vi. 13; Is. vii. 5; Hos. iv. 13). This last passage hints at another and darker reason why groves were important for the degraded services of idolatry; their shadow hid the atrocities and obscenities of heathen worship. The groves which were generally found connected with temples, and often had the right of offering an asylum (Tac. Germ. 9, 40; Herod. ii. 138; Virg. Æn. i. 441, 512; Sil. Ital. i. 81). Some have supposed that even the Jewish Temple had εἰδώλια planted with palm and cedars (Ps. xixii. 12, 15) and olive (Ps. lii. 8) as the mosque which stands on its site now has. This is more than doubtful; but we know that a celebrated Ask stoio by the sanctuary at Sebcbh (Jos. xxii. 20; Judg. ix. 6; Stanley, S. & P. p. 142). We find repeated mention of groves consecrated with deep superstition to particular gods (L iv. vii. 13, xxiv. 3, xxxvi. 51; Tac. Ann. ii. 12, 51, etc., iv. 73, etc.). For this reason they were stringently forbidden to the Jews (Ex. xxxiv. 13; Jer. xvii. 2; Ez. xx. 28), and Maimonides even says that it is forbidden to sit under the shade of any green tree where an idol statue was (Fabric. Bibl. Antiq. p. 230). Yet we find abundant indications that the Hebrews felt the influence of groves on the mind ("the spirit in the woods," Wordsworth), and therefore selected them for solemn purposes, such as great national meetings (Judg. ix. 6, 37) and the burial of the dead (Gen. xxxvi. 8; 1 Sam. xxxi. 13). Those connected with patriarchal history were peculiarly liable to superstitions reverenee (Am. v. 5, viii. 14), and we find that the groves of Manare were long a place of worship (Sozomen, H. E. ii. 4; Euseb. Tit. Constant. 81; Irenaeus, Past. p. 714). There are in Scripture many memorable trees; e. g. Allon-bauchit (Gen. xxxvi. 8), the tamarisk (but see above) in Gilgal (1 Sam. xxii. 6), the terebinth in Shechem (Jos. xiv. 26, under which the law was set up), the palm-tree of Deborah (Judg. iv. 5, the terebinth of enchantments (Judg. ix. 37), the terebinth of wanderers (Judg. iv. 11) and others (1 Sam. x. 3; x. 4, sometimes "plain" in A. V., Vulg. "convalis").

This observation of particular trees was among the heathen extended to a regular worship of them. "Tree-worship may be traced from the interior of Africa, not only into Egypt and Arabia, but also onward uninterruptedly into Palestine and Syria, Assyria, Persia, India, Thibet, Siam, the Philippine Islands, China, Japan, and Syleria; also westward into Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and other countries; and in most of the countries here named it obtains in the present day, combined as it has been in other parts with various forms of idolatry." (Gen. of Earth and Man, p. 139.) "The worship of trees even goes back among the Iranians to the rules of Homa, called in the Zend-Avesta the promulgator of the old law. We know from Herodotus the delight which Xerxes took in the great plane-tree in Lydia, on which he bestowed golden ornaments, and appointed for it a sentinel in the person of one of the "immortal ten thousand." The early veneration of trees was associated, by the moist and refreshing canopy of foliage, with that of sacred fountains. In similar connection with the early worship of Nature were among the Hellenic nations the fame of the great palm-tree of Delos, and of an aged palmus in Arcadia. The Buddhists of Ceylon venerate the colossal Indian fig-tree of Anurah-depa .... As single trees thus became objects of veneration from the beauty of their form, so did also groups of trees, under the name of gardos of groves." (Pausanias (i. 21, § 9) is full of the praise of a grove belonging to the temple of Apollo at Gymnion in Eolis; and the grove of Colone is celebrated in the renowned chorus of Sophocles) (Humphreys, Grecia, iii. 96, Eng. ed.). The custom of adorning trees "with jewels and ornaments was very ancient and universal (Herod. vii. 31; Ilian. V. H. ii. 14; Theor. Id. ii. 18; Or. Met. vii. 728, 745; Arnoh. arg. Gentil. i. 39), and even still exists in the East.

The ocellar trees of antiquity are well known.
GUARD

The Hebrew terms commonly used had reference to the spurious duties which the body-guard of a monarch had to perform.

(1) Tabbāch (תַּבָּך) originally signified a "cook," and as butchering fell to the lot of the cook in Eastern countries, it gained the secondary sense of "butcher." It is applied to the body-guard of the kings of Egypt (Gen. xxxvi. 36), and Babylon (2 K. xv. 8; Jer. xxxix. 9, xl. 1; Dan. vii. 14). [EXECUTIONER.]

(2) Rātā (רתא) properly means a "runner," and is the ordinary term employed for the attendants of the Jewish kings, whose office it was to run before the chariot (2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 K. i. 5), like the cur senes of the Roman Emperors (Senee. Ep. 87, 125). That the Jewish "runners" superseeded the ordinary duties of a military guard, appears from several passages (1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 K. x. 27, xi. 6; 2 Chr. xii. 19). It was their office also to carry despatches (2 Chr. xxx. 6). They had a guard-room set apart for their use in the king's palace, in which their arms were kept ready for use (1 K. xiv. 28; 2 Chr. xii. 11). [FOOTMAN.]

(3) The terms mishmereth (מְשֶׁמֶרֶת) and mishmâr (מִשְׁמַר) express properly the act of watching, but are occasionally transferred to the persons who kept watch (Neh. iv. 9, 22, vii. 3, xii. 9; Job xii. 12). The A. V. is probably correct in substituting mishmarot (מִשְׁמָרֹת) for the present reading in 2 Sam. xxiii. 23, Benalish being appointed "captain of the guard," as Josephus (Ant. vii. 14, § 4) relates, and not privy counsellor: the same error has crept into the text in 1 Sam. xxii. 14, where the words "which goeth at thy bidding" may originally have been "captain of the body-guard." For the duties of the captain of the guard, see [CAPTAIN], and [CAPTAIN OF THE GUARD, Amer. ed.]

* GUILTY. The phrase "guilty of death" (A. V.) Num. xxxvi. 31; Tob. vi. 12; Matt. xxvi. 36, Mark xiv. 64, contrary to the present idiom of pur language, signifies "deserving the penalty of death," being perhaps an imitation of the Latin res multis. "He is guilty" in Matt. xxiii. 1 (A. V.), is the translation of the same Greek word (σαφαδίως) which in ver. 16 is rendered "he is a debtor." A better translation in both cases would be, "he is bound," i.e. by his oath.

GUL/LOTH (גלוֹת) [spring, bubbling], plural of גל, a Hebrew term of unfrequent occurrence in the Bible, and used only in two passages — and those identical relations of the same occurrence — to denote a natural object, namely, the springs added by the great Caleb to the south land in the neighborhood of Debir, which formed the down of his daughter Achsah (Josh. xv. 19; Judg. i. 15). The springs were "upper" and "lower" — possibly one at the top and the other at the bottom of a ravine or glen; they may have derived their unusual name from their appearance being different from [from] that of the ordinary springs of the country. The root (גל) has the force of rolling or tumbling over, and perhaps this may imply that they welled up in that round or mushroom form which is not uncommon here, though apparently most rare in Palestine. The rendering of the Vat. LXX. is singular. In Jos. it has θέραμον (so Rom. Vat. Codex Boeth.); and the Gower, the latter doubtless a mere corruption of the Hebrew. The Alex. MS., as usual, is faithful to the Hebrew text [reading Γαλααδ]. In Judges both have λόφος. An attempt has been lately made by Dr. Rosen to identify these springs with the 'Ain Nukur near Hebron (see Zeitschrift der D. M. G. 1857); but the identification can hardly be received without fuller confirmation (Stanley, S. of P. App. § 84). [DELIB.]

GUN'IM (גנ'ים) [sorrowful, afflicted, Dicta.:

1. [Faw'i [Vat.-ve'ı], or Faw'i [Vat.-ve'ı]; Alex. Faw'i: Γανίτες. A son of Nachthi (Gen. xlii. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 13), the founder of the family of the Gunites (Num. xxvi. 48). Like several others of the early Israelite names, Gunit is a patronymic — "Gunite;" as if already a family at the time of its first mention (comp. Aroli, Hushim, etc.).

2. [Faw'ı.] A descendant of God; father of Abdil, a chief man in his tribe (1 Chr. v. 15).

GUN'ITES, THE (גנ'ים [the Gunites]: ὡνίς [the Gunites]; or Faw'i: [Vat.-ve'ı; Alex. Faw'i]: Γανίτες), the "family" which sprang from Gunit, son of Naphthi (Num. xxvi. 48). There is not in the Hebrew any difference between the two names, of the individual and the family.

GUR, THE GOING UP TO (גּוֹר בַּעַפְיָהּ) = the ascent or steep of Gur, or the lion's whelp, Gen. Hes. p. 275: εν τῷ ἀναβαίνοντι Γαλί. [Comp. εν τῷ ἀναβαίνοντι Ποίγισ: ascensus (Greer), an ascent or rising ground, at which Ahaziah received his death-blow while flying from Jehu after the slaughter of Joram (2 K. ix. 27). It is described as at (2) Hileam, and on the way between Jezreel and Beth-hag-gan (A. V. "the garden-house."). As the latter is identified with tolerable probability with the present Jenin, we may conclude that the ascent of Gur was some place more than usually steep on the difficult road which leads from the plain of Esdraelon to Jenin. By Josephus it is a * Dr. Robinson thinks that 'Ain Nukur may have some relation to these springs (Phys. Geogr. p 249).

GUR-BAAL (גּוּר-בָּאל [sole of Baal]): πετρα: Gurbaal), a place or district in which dwelt Arabians, as recorded in 2 Chr. xxvi. 7. It appears from the context to have been in the country lying between Palestine and the Arabian peninsula: but this, although probable, and although the LXX. reading is in favor of the conjecture, cannot be proved, no site having been assigned to it. The Arab geographers mention a place called Baal, on the Syrian road, north of El-Medeneh (Jarash), s. v. [רַעֹ] צֶכֶר (יִשָּׁר). The Targum, as Winer (s. v.) remarks, reads רַעֹ צֶכֶר יִשָּׁר — "Arabs living in Gerar" — suggesting רַעֹ instead of רַעֹ but there is no further evidence to strengthen this supposition. [See also GERAR.] The ingenious conjectures of Kochert (Phalag, ii. 22) respecting the Mehemim, who are mentioned together with the "Arabians that dwelt in Gur-Baal," may be considered in reference to the Mehemim, although they are faintly traced. [MIDEMIM.]

* GUTTER. This word occurs in the difficult passage 2 Sam. v. 6-8, translated in the A. V. as follows: "(6.) And the king and his men went to Jerusalem unto the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land; which spake unto David, saying, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither; thinking, David cannot come in hither. (7.) Nevertheless, David took the stronghold of Zion; the same is the city of David. (8.) And David said on that day, Whosoever getheth up to the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites, and the blind and the lame, he shall be chief and captain. Whereupon they said, the blind and the lame shall not come into the house." So long ago as 1546, Sebastian Münster (Hebrew Bible, fol. ed., in loc.) said of this passage, "Est locus ille valde obscurus." The lapse of more than 300 years has not much mended the matter, and the passage is still widely obscured. Our limits here forbid a full discussion of the points at issue. But without attempting to examine every grammatical difficulty, we may reach a better translation than the above, by attending to the following points: (1.) The two clauses, "except thou take away the blind and the lame," and "thou shalt not come in hither," are improperly transposed in the above version: and this transposition puts the next following clause out of its proper connection, and makes it meaningless. (2.) The words rendered "except thou take away the blind and the lame," should be translated, "but the blind and the lame will turn thee away." (3.) The apodosis, or after-clause, corresponding to the expression, "any one that smites" (= if any one smites), is not expressed in the Hebrew. This is a favorite Hebrew idiom, where for any reason it is left to unnecessary to complete the construction. E. g., Ex. xxxii. 32, in the A. V. Here, the object was two-fold: first, to state what David proposed to his warriors as the means of capturing the stronghold; and secondly, to account for the proverbial saying that arose from this occurrence. Neither of these objects required the completion of the sentence, which would readily be understood to be the offer of a reward for the service. A dash should therefore be put (as in the A. V. Ex. xxxii. 32) after the word "soul" (omitting the words in italics), to indicate that the sentence is incomplete.

In ver. 8 there is also, as in ver. 6, an improper transposition of two clauses, "whosoever getheth up to the gutter," "and smiteth the Jebusites." (5.) In ver. 8, instead of "the Jebusites" (plural with the def. art.), we should translate, "a Jebusite." (6.) The word translated "gutter," בֹּלֶלֶב, is here properly a water-course. It is derived from a verb which apparently expresses the sound of rushing water. It occurs in only one other passage, Ps. xili. 8, and is there applied to a mountain torrent, or a cataract (A. V. "water-paths"). (7.) The words, "the blind and the lame," may be taken in the same construction as "a Jebusite" (even the blind and the lame); or, as the sentence is manifestly left unfinished, they may be regarded as a part of the incomplete construction, having no grammatical relation to the preceding words.

Thus without resorting to the violent method of conjectural emendation of the text, which Maurer, Thienes, Hdbcher, and others, think necessary, or to a change of punctuation and an unauthorized sense of the word בֹּלֶלֶב, proposed by Wäsb and adopted by Keil, we obtain the following grammatically correct rendering: "And the king and his men went to Jerusalem, to the Jebusite inhabiting the land. And he spake to David, saying, Thou shalt not come in hither; but the blind and the lame will turn thee away, saying, David shall not come in hither." (7.) And David took the stronghold of Zion; that is, the city of David. (8.) And David said on that day, Any one that smites a Jebusite, and gets to the water-course, and the lame and the blind hated of David's soul — therefore they say, Blind and lame shall not come into the house." Gutter, Jebusites, confident in the strength of their show that they are not in the Hebrew text. To the common reader, with nothing but the translation to guide him, they seem to be "elusive; but of the ale," as the English version expresses. But a reference to 1 Chr. xi. 6 shows that these words, though they have no right here, are not a pure invention of the translator. The reader of the Hebrew text, if those words are necessary to make sense of the passage, was in the same case as the English reader of the A. V. would be without them.

position, which had successfully resisted repeated attempts to capture it, sneeringly said to David, “the blind and the lame will turn thee away;” needing only to say, “David shall not come in hither;”

David took this stronghold (ver. 7); and how this was effected is intimated in ver. 8. If the water-course could be reached, by which water was supplied to the besieged, the reduction of the stronghold must soon follow. On the import of the last clause in ver. 8, compare the suggestion in the article Jerusalem, II., fourth paragraph, foot-note.

A review of the principal interpretations of Jewish and Christian scholars would be interesting and instructive; but there is no space for it here.

HAHASHTARI (חֹאֲשָׁתָרִי), with the article, the Ahasharite [perh. courier, messenger, Fürst]: [to the Αὐασθῆ; [Vat. Αὐασσαί]: Alex. Αὐασθῆ: Haftori], a man, or a family, immediately descended from Ashur, “father of Tekoa” by his second wife Naarah (1 Chron. iv. 6). The name does not appear again, nor is there any trace of a place of similar name.

HABATAH [3 syll.] [חֹבָת-a], in Neh. 7:17: [but MSS. and editions vary in both places; whom Jehoehu protects]: Ασσέλ, E'Bia: Alex. Ο'Ssαα, [E'βεια; in Neh., Vat. E'βενα, P'A Ασιέτα] Hob'a, Hohri.

Bene-Chalapha were among the sons of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but whose genealogy being imperfect, were not allowed to serve (Ezra ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63). It is not clear from the passage whether they were among the descendants of Barzillai the Gileadite.

In the lists of 1 Esdras the name is given as Ommi (marg. Hobahiah).

HABAKKUK or HABBAKKUK (חֹבַקְקָק, [embaracing, as a token of love, Ges., Fürst]: Jerome, Pro. in Heb., renders it by the Greek περὶκλησι: Ἀμβακούοι: Houbaco). Other Greek forms of the name are Ἀμβακούοι, which Suidas erroneously renders παρὰ γέρωνοι, Ἀμβακούοι (Geog. Codrars), Ἀμβακούοι, and Ἀμβακοῦοι (Dorothem, Doctr. 2). The Latin forms are Ambacuom, Ambacues, and Hobicus.

1. Of the facts of the prophet’s life we have no certain information, and with regard to the period of his prophecy there is great division of opinion.

The Rabbinical tradition that Habakkuk was the son of the Shumamite woman whom Elisha restored to life is repeated by Abbariael in his commentary, and has no other foundation than a fanciful etymology of the prophet’s name, based on the expression in 2 K. iv. 16. Equally unfounded is the tradition that he was the sentinel set by Isaiah to watch for the destruction of Babylon (comp. Isa. xxl. 16 with Hab. ii. 1). In the title of the history of Bel and the Dragon, as found in the LXX. version in Origen’s Tetrapol, the author is called Habakkuk, the son of Josha, of the tribe of Levi.

Some have supposed this apocryphal writer to be identical with the prophet (Jerome, Proem. in Dom.). The psalm in ch. 3 and its title are thought to favor the opinion that Habakkuk was a Levite (Delitzsch, Hdbbkuk, p. iii.). Pseudo-Epiphanius (vol. ii. p. 240, de Vita Prophetarum) and Dorotheum (Chron. Pasch. p. 150) say that he was of Bethboch or Bohoctov (Bethokh, Isid. Hispal. c. 47), of the tribe of Simon. This may have been the same as Bethzecharias, where Judah Macceaeus was defeated by Antonius Epaphor (1 Mace. vii. 32, 33). The same authors relate that when Jerusalem was sacked by Nebuchadnezzar, Habakkuk fled to Ostcarine, and remained there till the Chaldeans had left the city, when he returned to his own country and died at his farm two years before the return from Babylon, v. c. 556. It was during his residence in Judaea that he is said to have carried food to Daniel in the den of lions at Babylon. This legend is given in the history of Bel and the Dragon, and is repeated by Eusebius, Bar-Hecceias, and Eutychius. It is quoted from Joseph ben Goriion (B. J. xi. 3) by Abbariael (Comm. on Heb.), and seriously refuted by him on chronological grounds. The scene of the event was shown to medieval travellers on the road from Jerusalem to Bethel (Erod. Trogr. Pers. p. 23). Habakkuk is said to have been buried at Keilah in the tribe of Judah, eight miles E. of Eleutheropolis (Eusebius, Onomasticon). Rabbinical tradition places his tomb at Chukkok, of the tribe of Nahsholi, now called Jakil. In the days of Zelemus, bishop of Eleutheropolis, according to Niephorus (H. E. xii. 48) and Nazometh (H. E. xii. 28), the remains of the prophets Habakkuk and Micah were discovered at Keilah.

2. The Rabbinical traditions agree in placing Habakkuk with Joel and Nahum in the reign of Manasseh (of Sedor Olim Robba and Zatu, and Tanach Da‘riv). This date is adopted by Kimchi and Abbariael among the Rabbis, and by Witsius, Kalynsky, and Jahn among modern writers. The general corruption and looseness which prevailed in the reign of Manasseh are supposed to be referred to in Hab. i. 2-4. Both Kalynsky and Jahn conjecture that Habakkuk may have been one of the prophets mentioned in 2 K. xxi. 10. Symmachus (Chronographei, pp. 214, 230, 240) makes him contemporary with Ezekiel, and extends the period of his prophecy from the time of Manasseh to that of Daniel and Joshua the son of Josedeek.

The Chronicon Paschale places him later, first mentioning him in the beginning of the reign of Josiah (Olymp. 32), as contemporary with Zephaniah and Nahum; and again in the beginning of the reign of Cyrus (Olymp. 42), as contemporary with Daniel and Ezekiel in Persia, with Haggai and Zechariah in Judaea, and with Baruch in Egypt. Davidson (Horne’s Intr. ii. 968), following Keil, decides in favor of the early part of the reign of Josiah. Calmet, Jaeger, Ewald, De Wette, Rosenmuller, Knobel, Maurer, Hitzig, and Meier agree in assigning the commencement of Habakkuk’s prophecy to be defended by a couple of men against any force, before the invention of fire-arms. The escarpment was probably carried down to the valley in a succession of terraces; the large amount of rubbish, however, will not allow anything to be seen clearly.” (See Ochiann. Survey of Jerusalem, p. 61, Lond. 1855.)

the reign of Jehoiakim, though they are divided as to the exact period to which it is to be referred. Knobel (Der Propheten, d. Hebr.) and Meier (Gesch. d. poet. nat. Liter. d. Hebr.) are in favor of the commencement of the Chaldean era, after the battle of Carchemish (n. c. 609), when Judah was first threatened by the victors. But the question of the date of Habakkuk's prophecy has been discussed in the most exhaustive manner by Delitzsch (Der Prophet Habakkuk, Einl. § 3), and though his arguments are rather ingenious than convincing, they are well deserving of consideration as based upon internal evidence. The conclusion at which he arrives is that Habakkuk delivered his prophecy about the 12th or 13th year of Josiah (n. c. 630 or 629), for reasons of which the following is a summary. In Hab. i. 5 the expression "in your days" shows that the fulfillment of the prophecy would take place in the lifetime of those to whom it was addressed. The same phrase in Jer. xvi. 9 embraces a period of at most twenty years, while in Ez. xii. 25 it denotes about six years, and therefore, reckoning backwards from the Chaldean invasion, the date above assigned would involve no violation of probability, though the argument does not amount to a proof. From the similar passages in Jer. ii. 29 and Zeph. i. 1 and Delitzsch infers that the latter is an imitation, the former being the original. He supports this conclusion by many collateral arguments. Now Zephaniah, according to the superscription of his prophecy, lived in the time of Josiah, and from iii. 5 must have prophesied after the worship of Jehovah was restored, that is, after the twentieth year of that king's reign. It is probable that he wrote about n. c. 624. Between this period therefore and the 12th year of Josiah (n. c. 630) Delitzsch places Habakkuk, but Jeremiah began to prophesy in the 13th year of Josiah, and many passages are borrowed by him from Habakkuk (cf. Hab. ii. 13 with Jer. li. 58, etc.). The latter therefore must have written about 630 or 624 n. c. This view receives some confirmation from the position of his prophecy in the O. T. Canon. A special name is appended upon the prophecy as an organic whole, Rosenmuller divided it into three parts corresponding to the chapters, and assigned the first chapter to the reign of Jehoiakim, the second to that of Jehoiachin, and the third to that of Zedekiah, when Jerusalem was besieged for the third time by Nebuchadnezzar. Kafinsky (Vaticun. Chronic. et Not.) makes four divisions, and refers the prophecy not to Nebuchadnezzar, but to Esarhaddon. But in such an arbitrary arrangement the true character of the composition as a perfectly developed poen is entirely lost sight of. The prophet commences by announcing his office and important mission (i. 1). He bewails the corruption and social disorderization by which he is surrounded, and cries to Jehovah for help (i. 2-4). Next follows the reply of the Deity, threatening swift vengeance (i. 5-11). The prophet, transferring himself to the near future foreshadowed in the divine threatenings, sees the rapidity and beastful impiety of the Chaldean hosts, but, confident that God has only employed them as the instruments of correction, assumes (ii. 1) an attitude of hopeful expectancy, and waits to see the issue. He receives the divine command to write in an enduring form the vision of God's retributive justice, as revealed to his prophetical eye (ii. 2, 3). The doom of the Chaldeans is first foreshadowed in gen-
The poet of the Hebrews has to show in this species of composition. He exhibits the greatest strength and fullness, an imagination capable of the loftiest flights, without ever sacrificing beauty and clearness. His rhythm is at the same time perfectly free, and yet measured. His diction is fresh and pure. (See his Einl. in das A. Test., p. 338, 35e Ausg.) Lowth awards him the highest sublimity (Lect. xxviii, in his Poetry of the Hebrews), "the anthem" at the close of the book, says Isaac Taylor, "unequaled in majesty and splendor of language and imagery, gives expression in terms the most affecting to an intense spiritual feeling; and, on this ground, it so fully embodies these religious sentiments as to satisfy Christian piety, even of the loftiest order." (See his Spirit of the Hebrew Poets, p. 255, Amer. ed.) The doctrine impersonated in the prophet's experience is that the soul, though stripped of all outward possessions and cut off from every human resource, may still be happy in God alone as the object of its confidence and the bestower of the ample spiritual consolations which that trust secures. (Comp. 2 Cor. iv. 8 ff.)

HABAZINIAH (חֵבֶזְיָה) [perh. light of Jehovah, Gen.: collection by Joth, First:] Xαβαζιόν; [Vat. F. - Χαβαζίων] Habazin; apparently the head of one of the families of the Rechabites: his descendant Jazanannah was the chief man among them in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. xxxv. 3).

HAB'BACUC (חָבָאכֵו) Habucce, the form in which the name of the prophet HABAKUK is given in the Apocrypha (Bel, 39-39).

HABERGEON, a coat of mail covering the neck and breast. The Hebrew terms are הַבֶּרֶגֶון, and הַבֶּרֶוגֶון. The first, tachara, occurs only in Ex. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23, and is noticed incidentally to illustrate the mode of making the aperture for the head in the sacerdotal meil. It was probably similar to the linear corselet (λειυθρόπνης), worn by the Egyptians (Her. ii. 182, iii. 47), and the Greeks (H. ii. 529, 330). The second, shiraq, occurs only in Job xli. 26, and is regarded as another form of shirayn (ךֶרֶאשׁ), a "breastplate" (Is. lix. 17); this sense has been questioned, as the context requires offensive rather than defensive armor; but the objection may be met by the suppression of an extended sense being given to the verb, according to the grammatical usage known as exagmen. The third, shiryon, occurs as an article of defensive armor in 1 Sam. xvii. 5, 2 Chr. xxviii. 14, and Neh. iv. 16. W. L. B.

HABOR (חָבְרֵר) [perh. rich in vegetation, Dietr.; but see First:] Α'βαρ, Χαβαρ; [Vat. 2 K. xixii. 11. Αβαρ:] Habor, the "river of Goran" (2 K. xvii. 6, and xviii. 11 [also 1 Chr. v. 26]) has been already distinguished from the Chebar or Chobar of Ezekiel. [CHEBAR.] It is identified beyond all reasonable doubt with the famous affluent of the Euphrates, which is called Aborhas (Αβορέας) by Strabo (xiv. 1, § 27) and Procopius (Bell. Pers. ii. 5); Aboras (Αβορας) by Isidore of Charax (p. 4); Abor (Αβόρα) by Zosimus (iii. 12); and Chobares (Χαβαράς), by Pliny and Ptolemy (v. 18). The stream in question still bears the name of the Khobur. It flows from several sources in the mountain-chain, which in about the 37th parallel closes in the valley of the Tigris upon the south — the Mono Masius of Strabo and Ptolemy, at present the Khwaraj Day. The chief source is said to be "a little to the west of Marvina" (Layard, Nin. and Babs. p. 309, note); but the upper course of the river is still very imperfectly known. The main stream was seen by Mr. Layard flowing from the northwest as he stood on the conical hill of Koubib (about lat. 30° 20', long. 41°); and here it was joined by an important tributary, the Jenjier, which flowed down to it from Nishib. Both streams were here fordable, but the river formed by their union had to be crossed by a raft. It flowed in a tortuous course through rich meads covered with flowers, having a general direction about S. S. W., to its junction with the Euphrates at Karkesy, the ancient Circesium. The country on both sides of the river was covered with mounds, the remains of cities belonging to the Assyrian period.

The Khobur occurs under that name in an Assyrian inscription of the ninth century before our era. G. R.

HACHILAH (חָכִילָה) [from Jehovah appelli, Gen. 6:4 Anp.; ] Χαξίλια, Αξιάλα; [Vat. Χαξιλεια, Αξιαλα; Αξιαλα; Αξιαλα:] Hechiya, Ichiliya), the father of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 1: x. 1).

HACHILAH, THE HILL (חָכִילָה) [hill of darkness, Ges. or of barrenness, First:] α βοούς το (and α but Alex. τοο) Αξιαλα; [in 1 Sam. xxvi. 1, Vat. Χαξιλεια, Alex. Αξιαλα:] collis, and Gabab, Ichili), a hill apparently situated in a wood (ךֶרֶאשׁ) in the wilderness or waste land (ךֶרֶאשׁ) in the neighborhood of Ziph; in the fastnesses, or passes, of which David and his six hundred followers were lurking when the Ziphites informed Saul of his whereabouts (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; comp. 14, 15, 18). The special topographical note is added, that it was "on the right (xxii. 19, A. V. "south") of the Jeshimon," or, according to what may be a second account of the same transaction (xxvi. 1-3), "facing the Jeshimon" (ךֶרֶאשׁ, A. V. "before"), that is, the waste barren district. As Saul approached, David drew down from the hill into the lower ground (xxvi. 3), still probably remaining concealed by the wood which then covered the country. Saul advanced to the hill, and bivouacked there by the side of the road (ךֶרֶאשׁ, A. V. "way"), which appears to have run over the hill or close below it. It was during this nocturnal halt that the romantic adventure of the spear and curse of water took place. In xxviiii. 14 and xxvii. 13 this hill would seem (though this is not quite clear) to be dignified by the title of "the mountain" (ךֶרֶאשׁ): in the latter, the A. V. has "hill," and in both the article is missed; but, on the other hand, the same eminence appears to be again designated as "the cliff" (xxvii. 25,ךֶרֶאשׁ, A. V. "a rock") from b which David descended into the midbar of Moan. Places bearing the names of Ziph and Moan are still found in the south of Judah—in all probability the identical sites of those ancient towns. They are sufficiently close to each other for the district between them to bear indiscriminately the name of both. But the wood has vanished, and no trace of the name Hachilah has yet been discovered, nor has the ground been examined with the view to see if the minute indications of the story can be recognized. By Eusebius and Jerome (Commentary on Ezechiel) is named as a village then standing; but the situation—seven miles from Eleutheropolis, i. e. on the N. W. of Hebron—would be too far from Ziph and Moan: and as Rechan has pointed out, they probably conformed it with Kedlah (comp. Onom. "Cecilah"); and Rechan, p. 745.

G. HACHMONI, SON OF, and THE HACHMONITE (1 Chr. xxvii. 32; xl. 11), both renderings— the former the correct one—of the same Hebrew words צ"ולאנסטאשנוזאשש is son of a Hachmonite: צ"ולאאנשאש ר' א衡阳א: [Vat. Ayαμας, Ayαμας: [Gesen. Αχαμαμάν] Alex. Αχαμαμάν: Richommoni.] Two of the Bene-Hachmoni [sons of H.] are named in these passages. Jehuel, in the former, and Jashobeam in the latter. Hachmoni or Hachmonith was no doubt the founder of a family to which these men belonged: the actual father of Jashobeam was Zabeel (1 Chr. xxvii. 2), and he is also said to have belonged to the Korhites (1 Chr. xii. 6), possibly the Levites descended from Korah. But the name Hachmoni nowhere appears in the genealogies of the Levites. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 the name is altered to Tachcmonite. [TACHMIONITE.] See Kennicott, Diss. p. 241. After the time of the exile who calls attention to the fact that names given in Chronicles with Ben are in Samueled without the Ben, but with the definite article.

G. HADAD (תַחַד) [sharpness, Gesen, powerful, First: Ἀδαδ, [Ἀδάδ, Χόρδας: Hador.] This name occurs frequently in the history of the Syrian and Edomite dynasties. It was originally the indigenous appellation of the sun among the Syrians (Maerob. Sortimam. i. 23; Plin. xxxviii. 12), and was thence transferred to the king, as the highest of earthly authorities, in the forms Hadad, Ben-hadad ("worshipper of Hadad"), and Hadab-ezer (assisted by Hadad). Gesen. Thes. p. 219. The title appears to have been an official one, like Pharaoh; and perhaps it is so used by Nicaeus Damascenus, as quoted by Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, § 2), in reference to the Syrian king who aided Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 5). Josephus appears to have used the name in the same sense, where he substitutes it for Benhadad (Int. ix. 8, § 7, compared with 2 K. viii. 21). The name appears occasionally in the altered form Habor (Gen. xxv. 15, xxxvi. 39), compared with 1 Chr. i. 30, 50).

1. [תַחַד: Χόρδας, Alex. Χόρδας: Hador.] The first of the name was a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15 [HADAD: 1 Chr. i. 30]). His descendents probably occupied the western coast of the Persian Gulf, where the names Altai (Pod. vi. 7, § 15), Attene, and Chatana (Plin. vi. 32) bear affinity to the original name.

ng to the ordinary interpretation of Zech. xii. 11, a place in the valley of Megiddo, named after two Syrian idols, where a national lamentation was held for the death of king Josiah in the last of the four great battles (see Stanley, S. of P. ix.) which have made the plain of Esdraelon famous in Hebrew history (see 2 K. xxi. 29; 2 Chr. xxxv. 23; Josephus, Ant. x. 3, § i.). The LXX. translate the word "pomegranate;" and the Greek commentators, using that version, see here no reference to Josiah. Jonathan, the Chaldean interpreter, followed by Jarchi, understands it to be the name of the son of king Tabrimon who was opposed to Ahab at Ramoth-Gilead. But it has been taken for the place at which Josiah died by most interpreters since Jerome, who states (Comm. in Zech.) that it was the name of a city which was called in his time Maximanopolis, and was not far from Jereed. Van de Velde (i. 355) thinks that he has identified the very site, and that the more ancient name still lingers on the spot. There is a treatise by Wichmanhausen, De planeta HADAR. in the Nov. Theos. Thol.-phil. i. 101. W. T. B.

HADAR (חדר) [perh. chaluder]: 2 Chronicles 26:4; Hadar or Hadad, a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15); written in 1 Chr. i. 50 Hadad (חדר) 2 Chronicles 26:4; Hadad; but Gesenius supposes the former to be the true reading of the name. It has not been identified, in a satisfactory way, with the appellation of any tribe preceding or on the Syrian frontier: but names identical with, or very closely resembling it, are not uncommon in those parts, and may contain traces of the Ishmaelite tribe sprung from Hadar. The mountain Hadad, belonging to Teyma (תאי, the borders of the Syrian desert, north of E. Medeveh, is perhaps the most likely to be correctly identified with the ancient dwellings of this tribe; it stands among a group of names of the sons of Ishmael, containing Dumah (דמעה, Kedar (كيفאר), and Tema (תמא). E. S. P.

2. (חדר) [perh. ornament, honor], with a different aspirate to from [the preceding]; 2 Chronicles 26:4; 2 Chronicles 26:4, Abda or Bapda, Alex. Abad: Adbar). One of the kings of Edom, successor of Baal-hannan ben-Abchor (1 en. xxxvi. 29), and, if we may so understand the statement of ver. 31, about contemporary with Saul. The name of his city, and the name and genealogy of his wife, are given. In the parallel list in 1 Chr. i. 50 he appears as HADAD. We know from another source (1 K. xi. 14, &c.) that Hadad was one of the names of the royal family of Edom. Indeed, it occurs in this very list (Gen. xxxvi. 35). But perhaps this fact is in favor of the form HADAR being correct in the present case: its isokoria is probably a proof that it is a different name from the others, however similar.

HADAREZER (חדרезר) [chose help is Hadad, Ges.]: 2 Chronicles 26:4; Abara, Aba, and so gen. Ald. Fa. comp. gen. Abadar: Adarse, son of Rehob (2 Sam. vii. 3); the king of the Aramean state of Zobah, who, while on his way to "establish his dominion," at the Euphrates, was overtaken by David, defeated with a great loss both of chariots, horses, and men (1 Chr. xviii. 3, 4), and driven with the remnant of his force to the other side of the river (xix. 16). The golden weapons captured on this occasion (בְּנֵי, A. V. "shields of gold," a thousand in number, was taken by David to Jerusalem (xviii. 7), and dedicated to Jehovah. The foreign arms were preserved in the Temple, and were long known as king David's (2 Chr. xxix. 9; Cant. iv. 4). (Arms; Shelet, p. 102.)

Not daunted by this defeat, Hadarezer seized an early opportunity of attempting to revenge himself: and after the first repulse of the Ammonites and their Syrian allies by Josh, he sent his army to the assistance of his kindred the people of Maachah, Rehob, and Ish-toh (1 Chr. xix. 16; 2 Sam. x. 15, comp. 8). The army was a large one, as is evident from the numbers of the slain; and it was especially strong in horse-soldiers (1 Chr. xix. 18). Under the command of Shophach, or ShobaZ, the captain of the host (םכ) they crossed the Euphrates, joined the other Syrians, and encompassed at a place called Helam. The moment was a critical one, and David himself came from Jerusalem to take the command of the Israelite army. As on the former occasion, the rout was complete: seven hundred chariots were captured, seven thousand charioteers and forty thousand horse-soldiers killed, the petty sovereigns who had before been subject to Hadarezer submitted themselves to David, and the great Syrian confederacy was, for the time, at an end.

But one of Hadarezer's more immediate retainers, Rezon ben-Elizah, made his escape from the army, and gathering round him some fugitives like himself, formed them into one of those marauding ravaging "bands" (תافية) which found a congenial refuge in the thinly peopled districts between the Jordan and the Euphrates (2 K. v. 2; 1 Chr. xix. 19-22). Making their way to Damascus, they possessed themselves of the city. Rezon became king, and at once began to avenge the loss of his kinsmen by the course of "mischief" to Israel which he pursued down to the end of Solomon's reign, and which is summed up in the emphatic words " he was an adversary (a 'Satan') to Israel "... he abhorred Israel (1 K. xi. 23-25).

In the narrative of David's Syrian campaign in 2 Sam. we have this name given as Hadar-ezer, and also in 1 K. xi. 24. But in 2 Sam. only, and in all its other occurrences in the Hebrew text as well as in the LXX. (both MSS.), and in Josephus, the form Hadarezer is maintained.

G. HAD'ASHAH (חֲדָשָׁה) [new, Ges.]: Adar, Alex. Aδας: Hadassxa, one of the towns of Judah, in the Shefelah or maritime low-country, named between Zenan and Mischkel-gad, in the second group (Josh. xv. 37 only). By Eusebius it is spoken of as lying near Taphna, i.e. Gopha. But if by this Eusebius intends the well-known Gophna, there must be some error, as Gopha was several miles north of Jerusalem, near the direct north road to Nobia. No satisfactory reason presents itself why Hadashah should not be the Aδας of the Macreassan history. Hitherto it has eluded discovery in modern times.

G. * HADES. [DEAD, THE; DEEP, THE; HELL.]

HADASSAH (חֲדָסָה) [myrtle]: LXX. omit: Edessa, a name, probably the earlier name, of Esther (Esth. ii. 7). Gesenius (Thes. p. 966) suggests that it is identical with 'Akroaea, the name of the daughter of Cyrus.
HADATHAH (יוֹדָתָה) [new]: LXX. mit: νοτατ. According to the A. V., one of the three names of Judah in the Chronic record—Hazar, Hadathah, and Kerethi, and Hebron,” etc. (Gen. xv. 25); but the Masoret accents of the Hebrew connect the word with that preceding it, as if it were Hazor-chadathath, i.e. New Hazor, in distinction from the place of the same name in ver. 23. This reading is expressly sanctioned by Eusebius and Jerome, who speak: (Onom. “Asor”) of “New Hazor” as lying in their day to the east of and near Ascalon. (See also Jellicoe, p. 708.) But Ascalon, as Robinson has pointed out (ii. 34, note), is in the Shefelah, and not in the South, and therefore, if named in Joshua at all, be included in the second division of the list, beginning at ver. 33, instead of where it is, not far from Kedesh. G.

HADID (יהָדִיד), sharp, possibly from its situation on some craggy eminence, Gen. Thes. 440; ‘אַדִּית (אֹדִית) by comb., with preceding name in Exe. xvi. 24. ‘אַדָּית, cf. A. H., Josh. ii. 8, A. H. , Damascus, in Neh. vii., אַדָּית, Vat. F. A. אַדָּית (in Neh. xii., אַדָּית, A. H., אַדָּית, Vat. A. אַדָּית, in Neh. xi., LXX. mit: Ἡδίθ), a place named, with Loyal (Lydda) and Ono, only in the later books of the history (Ex. ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xii. 34), but yet so as to imply its earlier existence. In the time of Eusebius (Onom. “Adhimain”) a town called Aditha, or Adatha, existed to the east of Diospolis (Lydda). This was probably Haditha, the Adaim of the Macarolonic history cannot be the same place, as it is distinctly specified as in the maritime or Philistine plain further south—“Aditha in Sepeha” (1 Macc. xii. 38)—with which agrees the description of Josephus (Ant. xiii. 6, § 5). About three miles east of Lodah stands a village called el-Hadith, marked in Van de Velde’s map. This is described by the old Jewish traveller Flav.Josephus as being on the summit of a round hill, and identified by him, doubt, correctly, with Hadid. See Zuntz, in Ascher’s Λνμ. of Tukda, ii. 430. G.

HADILAI [2 syll.] (יהָדִילֵי [recting or keeping holy]): אָדִיל (Vat.=X נוֹדִיל). A. H., אָדִיל, a man of Ephraim; father of Amasa, who was one of the chief of the tribe in the reign of Pekah (2 Chr. xxvii. 12).

HADROMOTH (יהָדָרֶמֹת) [possibly fire-worshipers: see Frister]: אָדְרָם; [Vat. X. אָדְרָם]. A. H., אָדְרָם, a man of Ephraim; father of Amasa, who was one of the chief of the tribe in the reign of Pekah (2 Chr. xxvii. 12).

HADRACH (יהָדַרָךְ) [see infra]: Στρίτισ. [Alex. Στρίτισ. Abl. with 13 MSS. Στρίτισ] Hadrach, a country of Syria, mentioned once only, by the prophet Zechariah, in the following words: “The burden of the word of Jehovah in the land of Hadrach, and Damascus [shall be] the rest thereof: when the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be toward Jehovah. And Hamath also shall border thereby; Tyre and Zidon, though it be very wise” (ix. 1, 2). The position of the district, with its borders, is here generally stated, although it does not appear, as is commonly assumed, that it was on the east of Damascus; but the name itself seems to have wholly disappeared; and the ingenuity of critics has been exercised on it without attaining any trustworthy results. It still remains unknown. It is true that R. Jose of Damascus identifies it with the site of an important city east of Damascus; and Joseph Alashi makes mention of a place called Hadrak (אֲדָרָךְ); but, with Gesenius, we may well distrust these writers. The vague statement of Στρίτισ Alex. seems to be founded on no particular facts beyond those contained in the prophecy of Zechariah. Besides these identifications we can point to none that possesses the smallest claim to acceptance. Those of Movers (Phoen.), a, Bleeck, and others are purely ham (Am. Lette, Joun. Asiatique, iii. 348, vi. 220); but this is highly improbable; nor is the suggestion of Hadhura, by Caussin (Essai, i. 30) more likely: the latter being one of the aborigines, tribes of Arabia, such as ‘Ad, Thamood, etc. [Αραβια.] E. S. P.

2. (יהָדָרָךְ): הָדוּרְמָו (Vat. Χριστοῦ Α. H. הָדוּרְמָו): Alex. Χριστοῦ; Hadrorm. son of Tou or Tie king of Hamath; his father’s ambassador to congratulate David on his victory over Hadarezer king of Zobah (1 Chr. xvi. 11), and the bearer of valuable presents in the form of articles of antique manufacture (Joseph.), in gold, silver, and brass. In the parallel narrative of 2 Sam. viii. the name is given as Joram; but this being a contraction of Jehoram, which contains the name of Jehovah, is peculiarly an Israite appellation, and we may therefore conclude that Hadoram is the genuine form of the name. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, § 4) it is given as Ἁδώρμως.

3. (יהָדָרָךְ): δ’ Ἁδώρμως (Vat. -τείλι): Alex. Χριστοῦ: Hadrorm. The form assumed in Chronicles by the name of the intendant of taxes under David, Solomon, and Rehoboam, who lost his life in the battle of Ziklag (1 Chr. xvi. 11), and the last-named prince (2 Chr. x. 18). He was sent by Rehoboam to appease the tumult, possibly as being one of the old and moderate party; but the choice of the chief officer of the taxes was not a happy one. His interference was ineffectual, and he himself fell a victim: “all Israel stoned him with stones that he died.” In Kings the name is given in the longer form of Hadroram, but in Samuel (2 Sam. vii. 2) as Hadrach. By Josephus, in both the first and last case, he is called Ἀδώρμως.

HADRACH (יהָדַרָךְ) [see infra]: Στρίτισ. [Alex. Στρίτισ. Abl. with 13 MSS. Στρίτισ] Hadrach, a country of Syria, mentioned once only, by the prophet Zechariah, in the following words: “The burden of the word of Jehovah in the land of Hadrach, and Damascus [shall be] the rest thereof: when the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be toward Jehovah. And Hamath also shall border thereby; Tyre and Zidon, though it be very wise” (ix. 1, 2). The position of the district, with its borders, is here generally stated, although it does not appear, as is commonly assumed, that it was on the east of Damascus; but the name itself seems to have wholly disappeared; and the ingenuity of critics has been exercised on it without attaining any trustworthy results. It still remains unknown. It is true that R. Jose of Damascus identifies it with the site of an important city east of Damascus; and Joseph Alashi makes mention of a place called Hadrak (אֲדָרָךְ); but, with Gesenius, we may well distrust these writers. The vague statement of Στρίτισ Alex. seems to be founded on no particular facts beyond those contained in the prophecy of Zechariah. Besides these identifications we can point to none that possesses the smallest claim to acceptance. Those of Movers (Phoen.), a, Bleeck, and others are purely

b The Movers do not propose any local identification (if that be meant here). In Strabo’s account of Syria, the land of Hadrak (α. Ἄραβια) is mentioned, as is probably supposed by Movers, and may be intended. For Bleeck’s theory, see above. H.

hypothetical, and the same must be said of the theory of Alphens [Van Alphens], in his monograph De terra Hadrach et Damascus (Traj. Rh. 1723, referred to by Winer, s. c). A solution of the difficulties surrounding the name may perhaps be found by supposing that it is derived from HADRACH.

* Another conjecture may be mentioned, namely, that Hadrach is the name of some Syrian king otherwise unknown. It was not uncommon for heathen kings to bear the names of their gods. Gesenius (Therapeut. i. 449) favors this opinion after Bleek. (See Theol. Stud. u. Krit. 1852, p. 268.) Valhinger argues for it, and attempts to show that the king in question may have been the one who reigned between Bembadad III. and Rezin, about the time of Uzziah and Jeroboam II. (See Herz. Realcyc. v. 445). The data are insufficient for so definite a conclusion. Hengstenberg adopts the Jewish symbolic explanation, namely, that Hadrach (derived from חָּדַר and חֲדָּר = strong-weak) denotes the Persian kingdom as destined, according to prophetic announcement, notwithstanding its power, to be utterly overthrown. Winer (Bibl. Relatn. i. 454) speaks of this as not improbably correct. Hengstenberg discusses the question at length under the head of "The Land of Hadrach," in his Christology of the O. T., iii. 371 ff. (trans. Edlinb. 1858).

HAGAB (חֲגָב) [locus]: "Ayál: Hagab.

Bene-Hagab [sons of Hagab] were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel [Ezr. ii. 49]. In the parallel list in Nehemiah, this and the name preceding it are omitted. In the Apocryphal Esdras [v. 30] it is given as AGABA.

HAGABA (חֲגָבָה) [locus]: "Ayálah: [Alex. Ayá-alá: Hagaba].

Bene-Hagaba were among the Nethinim who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 48). The name is slightly different in form from under which it is found in the parallel list of Ezr. iv. 45. In Esdras it is given as GRABAH.

HAGAR (חָגָר) [flight]: "Ayáp: Avar,

an Egyptian woman, the handmaid, or slave, of Sarah (Gen. xvi. 1), whom the latter gave as a concubine to Abraham, after he had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan and had no children by Sarah (xvi. 2 and 3). That she was a bondwoman is stated both in the O. T. and in the N. T. (in the latter as part of her typical character); and the condition of a slave was one essential of her position as a legal concubine. It is recorded that "when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes" (4), and Sarah, with the anger, we may suppose, of a free woman, rather than of a wife, reproached Abraham for the results of her own act: "My wrong be upon thee: I have given my maid into thy bosom; and when she saw that she had conceived, I was despaired in my eyes: Jehovah judge between me and thee." Abraham's answer seems to have been forced from him by his love for the wife of many years, who besides was his half-sister; and with the apparent want of purpose that he before displayed in Egypt, and afterwards at the court of Abimelech [in contrast to his firm courage and constancy when directed by God], he said, "Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee." This permission was necessary in an eastern household, but it is worthy of remark that it is now very rarely given; nor do we think, from the unchangeableness of eastern customs, and the strongly-marked national character of those peoples, that it was usual ancieitly to allow a wife to deal hardly with a slave in Hagar's position. Yet the truth and individuality of the vivid narrative is enforced by this apparent departure from usage: "And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face," turning her steps towards her native land through the great wilderness traversed by the Egyptian road. By the fountain in the way to Shur, the angel of the Lord found her, charged her to return and submit herself under the hands of her mistress, and delivered the remarkable prophecy respecting her unborn child, recorded in ver. 10-12. [ISID.]

"And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God art a God of vision; for she said, Have I then seen [i. e. lived] after vision of God?"

Wherefore the well was called BEER-LAHAI-ROM (13, 14). On her return, Hagar gave birth to Ishmael, and Abraham was then eighty-six years old.

Mention is not again made of Hagar in the history of Abraham until the feast at the weaning of Isaac, when "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking." and in exact sequence with the first mention of Ishmael, she gave birth to him. [Gen. xxv. 12].

"Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bondwoman and her son: for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, [even] with Isaac." (xxi. 9, 10). Abraham, in his grief, and unwillingness thus to act, was comforted by God, with the assurance that in Isaac should his seed be called, and that a nation should also be raised of the bondwoman's son. In his trustful obedience, we read; in the pathetic narrative, Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took his camels, and Isaac, and Bethuel's daughter, and a bottle of water, and gave [it] unto Hagar, putting [it] on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away, and she departed and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat her down over against [him] a good way off, as it were a bow-shot; for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against [him], and lifted up her voice and wept. And God heard the voice of the lad, and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? Fear not, for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he [is]. Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand, for I will make him a great nation. And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water, and she went and filled the bottle [skin] with water, and gave the lad to drink" (xxi. 14-19).

The verisimilitude, oriental exactness, and simple heroism of this story go into the full expansion attesting its truth apart from all other evidence; and even Winer says (in alluding to the subterfuge of skepticism that Hagar = flight) — would lead to a It seems to be unnecessary to assume (as Kalscheuer, Comment. on Genesis) that we have here another proof of Abraham's faith. This explanation of the

"Hagar ").

The name of Hagar occurs elsewhere only when she takes a wife to Ishmael (xxi. 21), and in the genealogy (xv. 12). St. Paul refers to her as the type of the old covenant, likening her to Mount Sinai, the Mount of the Law (Gal. iv. 22 ff.).

In Mohammedan tradition Hagar (عائشة) is represented as the wife of Abraham, as might be expected when we remember that Ishmael is the head of the Arab nation, and the reputed ancestor of Mohammed. In the same manner she is said to have dwelt and been buried at Meckah, and the well Zendem in the sacred enclosure of the temple of Meckah is pointed out by the Musulms as the well which was miraculously formed for Ishmael in the wilderness. E. S. P.

* The truthfulness to nature which is so manifest in the incidents related of Hagar and Ishmael (as suggested above), bears strong testimony to the fidelity of the narrative. See especially Gen. xvi. 6; xxi. 10, 11, and 24 ff. Dean Stanley very properly calls attention to this trait of the patriarchal history as illustrated in this instance, as well as others. (Jewish Church, i. 40 ff.) See also, on this characteristic of these early records, Blunt's Veracity of the Books of Moses. Hess brings out impressively this feature of the Bible in his Geschichte der Patriarchen (2 Bde. Tübingen, 1878). It appears from Gal. iv. 21, where Paul speaks of the dissensions in Abraham's family, that the jealousy between Hagar's son and the heir of promise proceeded much farther than the O. T. relates. Rixetschi has a brief article on "Hagar" in Herzog's Realencyclopädie for 1872. Mr. Williams (Holy City, p. 463-468) inserts an extended account of the supposed discovery by Mr. Rowlands of Beer-lahmi-riö, the well in the desert, at which, after her expulsion from the house of Abraham, the angel of the Lord appeared to Hagar (Gen. xvi. 7 f.). It is said to be about 5 hours from Kadesh, on the way from Beer-sheba to Egypt, and is called Mâlidîh (more correctly Mâlidîh, says Rixetschi), the name being regarded as a false syllable, except in the first syllable of the change of Beer, "well," for Mo'ed, "water." Near it also is found an elaborate excavation in the rocks which the Arabs call Beit-Hagar, i. e. "house of Hagar." Keil and Delitzsch (in Gen. xvi. 14) incline to adopt this identification. Knobel (Genesis, p. 147) is less decided. Dr. Robinson's note (Bibl. Riss., 2d ed. i. 189) throws some discredit on the accuracy of this report.

Hagar occurs in Gal. iv. 25 (T. R. & A. V.), not as a personal name (q. "Ayap"); but as a local or local name (q. "Abip") applied to Mount Sinai in Arabia. The Arabic عائشة, pronounced very much like this name, means a "stone," and may have been in use in the neighborhood of Sinai as one of its local designations. (See Meyer on Gal. iv. 25.) There is no testimony that the mount was so called out of this passage; but as Ewald remarks respecting this point (Niedtray in his Buchbeschreibung des Apostel., p. 103 th.), Paul is so much the less to be charged with an error here, since moral reminiscence of his own, as he had himself travelled in that part of Arabia, and as an apostle, had remained there a long time." (See Gal. i. 17 f.) Some conjecture that this name was transferred to the mountain from an Aramaic town so called, where, according to one account, Hagar is said to have been buried. But, on the other hand, it is not certain that q. "Ayap" originally belongs to the toponym, though the weight of critical opinion affirms it (see Meyer, in loc.). The questions both as to the origin of the name and the genelessness of the reading are carefully examined in Lightfoot's Commentary on Galatians (pp. 178, 189 ff. 2d ed.), though perhaps he underestimates the testimony for q. "Ayap."

"Ayapøuvi, Ayapaou, [etc.] Agapou, Agapou, Agapouou", a people dwelling to the east of Palestine, with whom the tribe of Reuben made war in the time of Saul, and "who fell by their hand, and they dwelt in their tents throughout all the land [i.e. of Gilead]" (1 Chr. v. 10); and again, in ver. 18-20, the sons of Reuben, and the Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh, "made war with the Hagrites, with Jether, and Nophish, and Nobah, and they were helped against them, and the Hagrites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them. The spoil here recorded to have been taken shows the wealth and importance of these tribes; and the conquest, at least of the territory occupied by them, was complete, for the Israelites "dwelt in their tents until the Captivity" (ver. 22). The same people, as confederate against Israel, are mentioned in Ps. lxxxiii.: "The encampments of Edom and the Ishmaelites; of Moab and the Hagrites; of Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assur also is joined with them; they have holpen the children of Lot" (ver. 6-8).

Who these people were is a question that cannot readily be decided, though it is generally believed that they were named after Hagar. Their geographical position, as inferred from the above passages, was in the "east country," where dwelt the descendants of Ishmael; the occurrence of the names of two of his sons, Jether and Nophish (1 Chr. v. 19), as before quoted, with that of Nobah, whom Genesis supposes to be another son (though he is not found in the genealogical lists, and must remain doubtful [NODAH]), seems to indicate that these Hagarenes were named after Hagar; but in the passage in Ps. lxxxiii., the Ishmaelites are apparently distinguished from the Hagarenes (cf. Bar. iii. 29). May they have been thus called after a town or district named after Hagar, and not only because they were her descendants? It is needless to follow the suggestion of some writers, that Hagar may have been the mother of other children after her separation from Abraham (as the Bible and tradition are silent on the question), and it is in itself highly improbable.

It is also uncertain whether the important town and district of Heger (the inhabitants of which were probably the same as the Agar of Strabo, xvi. p. 767, Dionys. Perig. 958, Plin. vi. 32, and Ptol. v. 19, 2) represent the ancient name and a dwelling of the Hagarenes; but it is reasonable to suppose that they do. Heger or Herjera (جاجير) is indecipherable, according to Yakoot, *Musulirak, s. v.

Hager also, according to Airmes, as Gesenius and Winter write it, is the capital town, and also a subdivision of the province of northeastern Arabia called El-Behery, or, as some writers say, the name of the province itself (Muškharak and Muraviev, s. v.), on the borders of the Persian Gulf. It is a low and fertile country, frequented for its abundant water and pastureage by the wandering tribes of the neighboring deserts and of the high land of Neby. For the Agrie, see the Dictionary of Geography. There is another Hejer, a place near El-Medemench.

The district of Hejer (Joseph, ii. 22), on the borders of Desert Arabia, north of El-Medemench, has been thought to possess a trace, in its name, of the Hagarites. It is, at least, less likely than Hejer to do so, both from situation and etymology. The tract, however, is curious from the caves that it is reported to contain, in which, say the Arabs, dwelt the old tribe of Thamood.

Two Hagarites are mentioned in the O. T.: see Mihiyar and Jaziz.

HAGGARITE

THE (ןגהראית: אַ'אָנוֹרַיְת; [Vat. sap. יִנְעַרְיִת; Aygarea;]. Jaziz the Hagarite, i. e. the descendant of Hagar, had the charge of David's sheep (I ن, א. V. "flocks"); 1 Chr. xxvii. 31). The word appears in the other forms of Hagarites and Hagarines.

HAGGAI [2 syll.] (גָּגָי [yntvi].) "The Prophet." [Sin. אַגָּיָי İgays, in Hag., except inscription, and so Alex. in the inscr. of Ps. cxlv.-cxliv..] Aygarea, the tenth in order of the minor prophets, and first of those who prophesied after the Captivity. With regard to his tribe and parentage both history and tradition are alike silent. Some, indeed, taking in his literal sense the expression הַגָּיָי הַנִּנְעַרְיִת (males y'be'eich) in i. 13, have imagined that he was an angel in human shape (Jerome, Comm. in loc.). In the absence of any direct evidence on the point, it is more than probable that he was one of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua; and Ewald (Die Prophet. d. Alt. B.) is even tempted to infer from ii. 2 that he may have been one of the few survivors who had seen the first temple in its splendor. The rebuilding of the temple, which was commenced in the reign of Cyrus (n. c. 535), was suspended during the reigns of his successors, Cambyses and Pseudo-Smerdis, in consequence of the determined hostility of the Samaritans. On the accession of Darius Hystaspis (n. c. 521), the prophets Haggai and Zechariah urged the renewal of the undertaking, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14; Joseph. Ant. xi. 4). Aninated by the high courage (magni spiritus, Jerome) of these devoted men, the people prosecuted the work with vigor, and the temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (n. c. 516). According to tradition, Haggai was born in Babylon, was a young man when he came to Jerusalem, and was buried with honor near the sepulchres of the priests (Isidore. Hispal. c. 49; Pseudo-Dorotheus, in Chron. Pasch. 51 d.). It has hence been conjectured that he was of priestly rank. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, according to the Jewish writers, were the men who were with Daniel when he saw the vision related in Dan. x. 7; and were after the Captivity members of the Great Synagogue, which consisted of 130 elders (Civit., ill. 65). The Sefer Ovam Zada places their death in the 53rd year of the Medes and Persians; while the extravagance of another tradition makes Haggai survive till the entry of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem, and even till the time of our Saviour (Carpzov, Introd.). In the Roman Martyrology Hosea and Haggai are joined in the catalogue of saints (Acta Sanctor. 4 July). The question of Haggai's probable connection with the authorship of the book of Ezra will be fully discussed in the article under that head, pp. 805, 806.

The names of Haggai and Zechariah are associated in the LXX. in the titles of Ps. 137, 145-148; in the Vulgate in those of Ps. 111, 145; and in the Posito Syriac in those of Ps. 125, 126, 145, 146, 147, 148. It may be that tradition assigned to these prophets the arrangement of the above-mentioned psalms for use in the temple service, just as Ps. lxiv. is in the Vulgate attributed to Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the name of the former is inscribed at the head of Ps. cxxxvi. in the LXX. According to Pseudo Epiphanius (de Vita Proph.), Haggai was the first who chanted the Hallelujah in the second temple: "wherefore," he adds, "we say 'Hallelujah, which is the hymn of Haggai and Zechariah.'" Haggai is mentioned in the Apocalypse as Agorys, in 1 Esdr. vi. i, vi. 3; 2 Esdr. i. 40; and is included in the Exclus. xix. 11 (cf. Hag. ii. 21) and Heb. xii. 26 (Haggai, v. 6).

The style of his writing is generally tame and prosaic, though at times it rises to the dignity of severe invective, when the prophet rebukes his countrymen for their selfish indolence and neglect of God's house. But the brevity of the prophecies is so great, and the poverty of expression which characterizes them so striking, as to give rise to a conjecture, not without reason, that in their present form they are but the outline or summary of the original discourses. They were delivered in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (n. c. 520), at intervals from the 1st day of the 6th month to the 24th day of the 9th month in the same year.

In his first message to the people the prophet denounced the listlessness of the Jews, who dwelt in their "panelled houses," while the temple of the Lord was roofless and desolate. The displeasure of God was manifest in the failure of their efforts for their own gratification. The heavens were "stayed from dew," and the earth was "stayed from her fruit." They had neglected that which should have been their first care, and reap the due wages of their selfishness (i. 4-11). The words of the prophet sank deep into the hearts of the people and their leaders. They acknowledged the voice of God speaking by his servant, and obeyed the command. Their obedience was rewarded with the assurance of God's presence (i. 13), and twenty-four days after the building was resumed. A month had scarcely elapsed when the work seems to have slackened, and the enthusiasm of the people abated. The prophet, ever ready to rekindle their zeal, encouraged the flagging spirits of the chiefs with the renewed assurance of God's presence, and the fresh promise that, stately and magnificently, the temple is to be the glory of the latter house should be greater than the glory of the former (ii. 3-9). Yet the people were still inactive, and two months afterwards we find him again censuring their sluggishness, which rendered worthless all their ceremonial observances. But the rebuke was accompanied by a repetition of the promise (ii. 10-19). On the same day, the four-and-twentieth of the ninth month, the prophet declared his last prophecy, addressed to Zerubbabel, prince of Judah, the representative of the royal family of David, and as such the lineal ancestor of the Messiah. This closing prediction foreshadows the establishment of the Messianic kingdom upon the overthrow of the thrones of the nations (ii. 20-23).

Keil gives a list of the older commentators or monographs in his Lehr- und krit. Einl. in d. J. T. p. 308 (2nd Ed.). Oehler treats of the prophet's personal history in Herzog's Real-Encyc. v. 471 ff. Bleek (Einl. in d. A. Test. p. 549) agrees with those (Ewald, Haevernick, Keil) who think that Haggai lived long enough to see both the first and the second temples. HAG'GERI (יוֹבָר), i. e. Hagri, a Hagarite: 'Ayyapi; [Vat. FA.-p.ζα] Alex. ΑγγατΟς: Ajyppa]. "Mihirak son of Haggeri" was one of the mighty men of David's guard, according to the catalogue of 1 Chr. xii. 38. The parallel passage—2 Sam. xxii. 36—has "Ban the Gadite" (יוֹבָר). This Kennicott decides to have been the original, from which Haggeri has been corrupted (Dissert. p. 214). The Targum has Bar Gedh (יוֹבָר). HAGG'GII (יוֹבָר) [festive]: 'Ayyapi, Alex. ΑγγατΟς: [In Num.], 'Ayyapi, Vat. -p.ζα Haggii, Ajyppa], second son of Gad (Gen. xxvi. 16; Num. xxvi. 15), founder of the Haggites (יוֹבָר). It will be observed that the name, though given as that of an individual, is really a patronymic, precisely the same as the family.

HAGG'FIJAH (יוֹבָר חֹבָד), the festal name of Haggai, a Levite, one of the descendants of Merari (1 Chr. vi. 30).

HAG'GITES, THE (יוֹבָר תְּרָא), four 'Ayyapi: [Vat. -p.ζα] Ajyppa], the family sprung from Haggai, second son of Gad (Num. xxvi. 15).

HAGGI'TH (יוֹבָר), a dancer: 'Ayyapi; Alex. ΑγγατΟς, Ajyppa; [Vat. ΑγγατΟς, ΑγγατΟς] Joseph. 'Ayyapi (Haggith, Ajyppa), one of David's wives, of whom nothing is told us except that she was the mother of Abdoniah, who is commonly designated as "the son of Haggith" (2 Sam. iii. 4: 1 K. i. 5, 11, ii. 13; 1 Chr. iii. 2). He was, like Absalom, renowned for his handsome presence. In the first and last of the above passages Haggith is fourth in order of mention among the wives, Abdoniah being also fourth among the sons. His birth happened at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 2, 5) shortly after that of Absalom (1 K. i. 6; where it will be observed that the words "his mother" are inserted by the translators).

HA'I (יוֹבָר [the stone-heap, or ruin]): 'Ayyapi: [Vat. FA.-p.ζα] Alex. ΑγγατΟς: Ajyppa]. The form in which the well-known place At appears in the A. V. on its first introduction (Gen. xii. 8; xiii. ii.). It arises from the translators having in these places, and these only, recognized the definite article with which At is invariably and emphatically accompanied in the Hebrew. (More probably it comes from the Vulgate.—A. T.) In the Samaritan Version of the above two passages, the name is given in the first Aivah, and in the second Cephrath, as if Cephrath.

HAIL (סָפָר, "The Ten; Snow")

HAIR. The Hebrews were fully alive to the importance of the hair as an element of personal beauty, whether as seen in the "curled locks, black as a raven," of youth (Cant. v. 11), or in the "crown of glory" that encircled the head of old age (Prov. xvi. 31). The customs of ancient nations in regard to the hair varied considerably: the Egyptians allowed the women to wear it long, but kept the heads of men closely shaved from early childhood (Her. ii. 30, iii. 12; Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, ii. 327, 328). The Greeks admired long hair, whether in men or women, as is evidence in the expression καρποφόρα ταῖς 'Αραμίταις, and in the representations of their divinities, especially Bacchus and Apollo, whose long locks were a symbol of perpetual youth. The Assyrians also wore it long (Her. i. 195), the flowing curls being gathered together in a heavy cluster on the back, as represented in the sculptures of Nineveh. The Hebrews, on the other hand, while they encouraged the growth of hair, observed the natural distinction between the sexes by allowing the women to wear it long (Luke vii. 38; John xi. 2; 1 Cor. xi. 6 ff.), while the men restrained theirs by frequent clippings to a moderate length. This difference between the Hebrews and the surrounding nations, especially the Egyptians, arose no doubt partly from natural taste, but partly also from legal enactments. Clipping the hair in a certain manner and offering the locks, was in early times connected with religious worship. Many of the Arabsians practiced a peculiar tonsure in honor of their God OONTAL (Her. iii. 8, 5ηαυατάν πετρόγαλα, πορίζομαι, κόσμον τών κρατάοντος), and hence the Hebrews were forbidden to "round the corners (יוֹבָר) the extremity of their heads" (Lev. xvi. 27), meaning the locks along the forehead and temples, and behind the ears. This tonsure is described in the LXX. by a peculiar expression κασάθες (= the classical κασάθος), probably derived from the Hebrew קָסָר (comp. Bohart, Com. i. 6, p. 379).

That the practice of the Arabsians was well known to the Hebrews, appears from the expression קָסָר יְבָר, rounded as to the locks, by which

They are described (Jer. ix. 26; xvi. 23; xliii. 32: we marginal translation of the A. V.). The prohibition against cutting off the hair on the death of a relative (Deut. xiv. 1) was probably grounded on a similar reason. In addition to these regulations, the Hebrews dreaded baldness, as it was frequently the result of leprous (Lev. xvi. 40 fin.), and hence formed one of the disqualifications for the priesthood (Lev. xxii. 6, LXX.). [Baldness.] The rule imposed upon the priests, and probably followed by the rest of the community, was that the hair should be polled (ผม, Ez. xlv. 20), neither being shaved, nor allowed to grow too long (Lev. xvi. 5; Ez. i. c.). What was the precise length usually worn, we have no means of ascertaining; but, from various expressions, as

The usual and favorite color of the hair was black (Cant. v. 11), as is indicated in the comparisons to a "lock of goats" and the "kents of Kedar" (Cant. iv. 1, i. 5); a similar hue is probably intended by the purple of Cant. vii. 5, the term being broadly used (as the Greek πορφύρας in a similar application μᾶλις, Anacr. 28). A fictitious hue was occasionally obtained by sprinkling gold-dust on the hair (Joseph. Ant. viii. 7, § 3). It does not appear that dyes were ordinarily used; the "Carmel" of Cant. vii. 5 has been understood as χιλιαξ (A. V. "crimson," margin) without good reason, though the similarity of the words may have suggested the subsequent reference to purple. Herod is said to have dyed his gray hair for the purpose of concealing his age (Ant. xvi. 8, § 1); but the practice may have been borrowed from the Greeks or Romans, among whom it was common (Aristoph. Eum. 736; Martial, Ep. iii. 43; Propert. ii. 18, 24, 29; from Matt. v. 36, we may infer that it was not usual among the Hebrews. The approach of age was marked by a sprinkling (ןָּלֶק, Hos. vii. 9; comp. a similar use of spargere, Propert. iii. 4, 24) of gray hairs, which soon overspread the whole head (Gen. xliii. 28, xvii. 29; 1 K. ii. 6, 9; Prov. xxxi. 13, xx. 29). The reference to the almond in Eccl. x. 5, has been explained of the white blossoms of that tree, as emblematic of old age: it may be observed, however, that the color of the flower is pink rather than white, and that the verb in that passage, according to high authorities (Giesen, and Hitzig), does not bear the sense of blossoming at all. Pure white hair was deemed characteristic of the Divine Majesty (Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14).

The chief beauty of the hair consisted in curls, whether of a natural or artificial character. The Hebrew terms are highly expressive: to omit the word יִשְׁפָּר—rendered "locks" in Cant. iv. 1, 3, vi. 7, and Is. xlv. 2, but more probably meaning a veil,—we have יִשְׁפָּר (Cant. v. 11), properly pendulous flexible boughs (according to be LXX, ἐλατραί the shoots of the palm-tree, which supplied an image of the coma pendula; ἄνθισμα (Is. vi. 3), a similar image borrowed from the curve of a blossom: ὑφή (Cant. iv. 9), a lock falling over the shoulders like a chain of ear-pendants (in uno erineae colli tuae, Vulg., which is better than the A.V., "with one chain of thy neck"); ἀπιπρασία (Cant. vii. 5, A.V. "galeries"), properly the channels by which water was brought to the flocks, which supplied an image either of the coma flaus, or of the regularity in which the locks were arranged; θέρας (Cant. vii. 5), again an expression for coma pendula, borrowed from the threads hanging down from an unfinished wool; lastly κεραυνὸν (Is. iii. 24, A.V. "well set hair"), properly "plaited work," i.e. gracefully curved locks. With regard to the mode of dressing the hair, we have no very precise information: the terms used are of a general character, as of Jezreel (2 K. ix. 30), βρακία, i.e. she adorned her head; of Judith (x. 5), διήρατος, i.e. arranged (the A.V. has "braided," and the Vulg. decirumcurvatu), here used in a technical sense in the reference to the discirumcallinum or hair-pin); of Herod (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9, § 4), κεκραυγμένοι τῇ συνθέτει τῆς κοινῆς, and of those who adopted feminine fashions (B. J. iv. 9, § 10), κόμας συνθέτουσιν. The terms used in the N. T. (πλαγιασθείς, 1 Tim. ii. 9; ἑκατοστίς τρικύκλος, 1 Pet. iii. 3) are also of a general character; Schlesner (Lex. s. v.) understands them of curling rather than plaiting. HAKKATAN (Ἑκάκαταν) [the small or young]: Ἀκκαδαν [Vat. Akoan] I Faery. Johann, son of Hakkatan, was the chief of the Bene-Azaza [sons of A.], who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. vii. 12). The name is probably Katan, with the definite article prefixed. In the Apocrypha Esdras it is ACATAN.

familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii. 335) and Greeks (Hom. H. xiv. 176). The locks were probably worn in their place by a fillet, as in Egypt (Wilkinson, i. e.).

Ornaments were worked into the hair, as practiced by the modern Egyptians, who "add to each braid three black silk cords with little ornaments of gold" (Lane, i. 71): the LXX. understands the term ἄνθισμα (Is. iii. 18, A.V. "cauls"), as applying to such ornaments (ἐπαλάσων). Schroeder (de Vitr. Mat. Heb. cap. 2) approves of this, and conjectures that they were sun-dried, i.e. circular, as distinct from the "round tires like the moon," i.e. the crescent-shaped ornaments used for necklaces. The Arabian women attach small bells to the tresses of their hair (Niebuhr, Vegera, i. 133). Other terms, sometimes understood as applying to the hair, are of doubtful signification, e.g. χέλη (Is. iii. 22; nasus: "crisping-pins"), more probably porus, as in 2 K. v. 23; καρποί (Is. iii. 20, "head-lands"), birchit gyrdles, according to Schroeder and other authorities; διαφανής (Is. iii. 29), discirumcallinum, Vulg. i.e. pins used for keeping the hair parted; cf. Jerome in Euseb. iii. cap. ult., more probably tabucous. Combs and hair-pins are mentioned in the Talmud; the Egyptian combs were made of wood and double, one side having large, and the other small teeth (Wilkinson, ii. 343): from the ornamental devices worked on them we may infer that they were worn in the hair.

With regard to other ornaments worn about the head, see HAKKATAN. The Hebrews, like other nations of antiquity, adorned the hair profusely with orniments, which were generally compounded of various aromatic ingredients (Latham iii. 2; 2 Sam. xiv. 2; Ps. xxii. 5, 116, xcsii. 10; Exod. iv. 8; Is. iii. 24): more especially on occasion of festivities or hospitality (Matt. vii. 17, xxvi. 7; Luke vii. 46; cf. Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4, § 1, χρυσαμένου μιρροῦ τὸν κεφαλὴν, ἦ λεις κομοσιαῖς). It is perhaps in reference to the glossy appearance imparted to it that the hair is described as purple (Cant. vii. 5).

It appears to have been the custom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to shave the hair (Matt. v. 36), much as the Egyptian women still swear by the side-lock, and the men by their beards (Lane, i. 52, 71, notes).

Hair was employed by the Hebrews as an image of what was loved valuable in man's person (1 Sam. xiv. 45; 2 Sam. xiv. 11; 1 K. i. 52; Matt. v. 36; Luke xii. 7, 18; Acts xxviii. 31); as well as of what was innumerable (Ps. xi. 12, bxx. 4); or particularly fine (Judg. xx. 16). In Is. vii. 20, it represents the various productions of the field, trees, crops, etc.; like ἀρός κομματιον σαρόν of Gallin Dom. 41, or the κομματιον κομματιον of Stat. Theb. v. 56. Hair is as the hair of women? (Rev. ix. 8), means long and unshaved hair, which in later times was regarded as an image of barbaric rudeness (Hengstenberg, Comm. in loc.).

HAIR

HAKKATAN (Ἑκάκαταν) [the small or young]: ΑΝΚΑΔΑΤΑ [Vat. ΑΚΑΤΑΝ] I Faery. Johann, son of Hakkatan, was the chief of the Bene-Azaza [sons of A.], who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. vii. 12). The name is probably Katan, with the definite article prefixed. In the Apocrypha Esdras it is ACATAN.
HAHKKOZ (חאַּקַּקז [the thorn]): δ Κάσινον
'Comp. [Alex.] Ἀκάκας: Accoss, a priest, the chief of the seventh of the course in the service of the sanctuary, as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxvii. 10). In Ezr. ii. 61 the name occurs again as that of a family of priests; though here the prefix is taken by our translators — and no doubt correctly — as the definite article, and the name appears as Koz. The same thing also occurs in Neh. iii. 24, 21. In Edras Accoss.

HAKUPHA (חאַק'פָּח [bent, crooked]): Gen.; inclement, Fürst: 'Ακουφή, 'Ακουφία; [Vat. Αφήφα, Αφήφα: F.A. in Neh., Αφήφα:] Ακουφη. Bene-Chakupha [sons of C.] were among the names of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51, Neh. vii. 53). In Edras (1 Edr. v. 31) the name is given as ACIFPA.

HALLAH (חאַלָּה [a cloud, σωματί]: Αλάθ, Αλάτ; [Alex.] Αλάθ, Αλάτ, Χαλά]: Ηλία, [Lohdes] is probably a different place from the Calah of Gen. x. 11. [See CALAH.] It may with some confidence be identified with the Chalætis (Χαλαλήτης) of Ptolemy (v. 18), which he places between Anthemusia (cf. Strab. xvi. 1, § 27) and Gauzantis. The name is thought to remain in the modern Gla, a large mound on the upper Khobur, above its junction with the Jeruger (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 512, note 2, K. [vii. 6], viii. 11; I Chr. v. 26). G. K.

HALAK, THE MOUNT (with the article, חאַלַּק): The smooth mountain: πᾶς τῶν Χαλακῶν. *HALAK [Vat. in Josh. xi., Alex. Αλάθ, or Αλάτ: ποικιλόν], a mountain, twice and twice only, named as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests — the Mount Halak which goeth up to Seir" (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7), but which has not yet been identified — has not apparently been sought for by travellers. Keil suggests the line of chalk cliffs which cross the valley of the Ghor at about six miles south of the Dead Sea, and form at once the southern limit of the Ghor and the northern limit of the Arabah. [Arabah, p. 133 a.] And this suggestion would be plausible enough, if there were any example of the word har, "a mountain," being applied to such a vertical cliff as this, which rather answers to what we suppose was intended by the term Selā. The word which is at the root of the name (supposing it to be Hebrew), and which has the force of smoothness or baldness, has ramified into other terms, as Helkah, an even plot of ground, like those of Jacob (Gen. xxxvii. 19) or Naboth (2 K. ix. 25), or that which gave its name to Helkath-hat-tuerim, "the field of the strong" (Stanley, App. § 20). G.

* HALE (Luke xii. 58; Acts viii. 3) is the original form of "haul," sometimes still used in formal discourse. In both the above passages it means to drag men by force before magistrates. That is the import also of the Greek term κατασφυγή κατάφωσις. H.

HAL/HUL (חאַלַּה [full of hollows, νησί]: Ἀλάκον; [Vat. Αλάκον] Alex. Αλάκον: Ἁλάκον, a town of Judah in the mountain district, one of the group containing Beth-zur and Gedor (Josh. xv. 58). Jerome, in the Quaestiones comment (under Elul), reports the existence of a hamlet (ῥιλμός) named "Alula," near Hebron. The name still remains unaltered, attached to a conspicuous hill a mile to the left of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, between 3 and 4 miles from the latter. Opposite it, on the other side of the road, is Beltsur, the modern representative of Bethzur, and a little further to the north is Jedur, the ancient Gedor. [Bethzur:] The site is marked by the ruins of walls and foundations, amongst which stands a dilapidated mosque bearing the name of Nebi Yumrus — the prophet Jonah (Lob. i. 210). In a Jewish tradition quoted by Hotten (Cypřk Hebrewici, p. 52) it is said to be the burial-place of Gad, David's seer. See also the citations of Zunz in Asher's Benj. of Tudeka (ii. 437, note). G.

HALI (חאֶלִי [nekklace]): Αλάθιον: Alex. Αλαθίον. Chaladi, a town on the boundary of Asher, named between Helkath and Beten (Josh. xix. 25). Nothing is known of its situation. Schwarz (p. 191) compares the name with Che lethon, the equivalent in the Latin of Cymeon in the Greek of Jud. viii. 3.

HALICARNAS/SUS (חאַלכארונסוס): Χαλκαιούσσας) in Caïdia, a city of great renown, as being the birthplace of Herodotus and of the later historian Dionysius, and as embellished by the Mausoleum erected by Artemisia, but of no Biblical interest except as the residence of a Jewish population in the periods between the Old and New Testament histories. In 1 Mac. xxv. 23, this city is specified as containing such a population. The decree in Joseph. Ant. xiv. 10, § 23, where the Romans direct that the Jews of Halicarnassus shall be allowed τὰς προσευματί τινας ἐναρκτείς τής θάλασσας κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἑσοῦ, is interesting when compared with Acts xvi. 13. This city was celebrated for its harbor and for the strength of its fortifications; but it never recovered the damage which it suffered after Alexander's siege. A plan of the site is given in Ross, Relien auf den Griech. Inseln. (See vol. iv. p. 30.) The sculptures of the Mausoleum are the subject of a paper by Mr. Newton in the Classical Museum, and many of them are now in the British Museum. The modern name of the place is Pudrum. J. S. H.

HALLELU'JAH (חאַלָלַעַח): Αλαλύα): used of the court of the high-priest's house (Luke xxii. 55). Αλαλύα is in A. V. Matt. xxvi. 69, Mark xiv. 66, John xviii. 15, "palace;" Vulg. atrium: πραόσυλον, Mark xiv. 66, "porch;" Vulg. atrum atrium. In Matt. xxvii. 27 and Mark xvi. 15, Αλαλύα is syn. with πραόσυλον, which in John xvi. 28 is in A. V., "judgment-hall." Αλαλύα is the equivalent for כַּפַּר הַנִּלְגָּא, an inclosed or fortified space (Gen. p. 512), in many places in O. T. where Vulg. and A. V. have respectively vilis or viculus, "a village," or atrium, "a chief of the enclosure or temple. The hall or court of a house or palace would probably be an inclosed but uncovered space, impluvium.

It is not unworthy of notice that, though so far from Jerusalem, Jerome speaks of it as "in the district of Elia."
the language of Ham" in the Bible (Ps. 105:31, 32, 23), and this, though it does not prove that the name of the Egyptian name with that of the patriarch, certain debuggers it, and establishes the historical fact that Egypt, settled by the descendants of Ham, was peculiarly his territory. The name Mizraim we believe to confirm this. The restriction of Ham to Egypt, unlike the case, if we may reason inferentially, of his brethren, may be accounted for by the very early civilization of this part of the Hamite territory, while much of the rest was comparatively barbarous. Egypt may also have been the first settlement of the Hamites whose colonies went forth, as we know to have been the case with the Philistines. [CAMPBELL.]

The settlements of the descendants of Cush have occasioned the greatest difficulties to critics. The main question upon which everything turns is whether there was an eastern and a western Cush, like the eastern and western Ethiopians of the Greeks. This has been usually decided on the Biblical evidence as to the land of Cush and the Cushites, without reference to that as to the several names designating in Gen. x. his progeny, or, except in Nimrod's case, the territories held by it, or both. By a more inducive method we have been led to the conclusion that settlements of Cush extended from Babylonia along the shores of the Indian Ocean to Ethiopia above Egypt, and to the supposition that there was an eastern as well as a western Cush; historically the latter inference must be correct; geographically it may be less certain of the postdiluvian world. The ancient Egyptians applied the name Keset, or Kesh, which is obviously the same as Cush, to Ethiopia above Egypt. The sons of Cush are stated to have been Selu, Havilah, Sabath, Raamah, and Subtechah: it is added that the sons of Raamah were Sheba and Dedan, and that Cush beget Nimrod. Certain of these names recur in the lists of the descendants of Joktan and of Abraham by Keturah, a circumstance which must be explained, in most cases, as historical evidence tends to show, by the settlement of Cushites, Joktanites, and Abrahamites in the same regions. [ARABIA.] Selu is generally identified with Sheba, and there seems to be little doubt that at the time of Solomon the chief kingdom of Ethiopia was that of Selu. [SHEBA.] The postdiluvian Havilah seems to recur in the references to Arabia. [HAWILAH.] Sabath and Subtechah are probably Arabian names: this is certainly the case with Raamah, Sheba, and Dedan, which are recognized on the Persian Gulf. [SARAH; SARTECHO; RAAMAH; SHEBA; DEDAN.] Nimrod is a descendant of Cush, but it is not certain that he is a son, and his is the only name which is positively personal and not territorial in the list of the descendants of Cush. The account of his first kingdom in Babylonia, and of the extension of his rule into Assyria, and the foundation of Nineveh — for this we take the meaning of Gen. x. 11, 12 — indicates a spread of Hamitic colonies along the Euphrates and Tigris northwards. [CUSH.]

If, as we suppose, Mizraim in the lists of Gen. x. and 4 Chr. i. stand for Mizrir, we should take the singular Mazor to be the name of the progenitor of the Egyptian tribes. It is remarkable that Mazor appears to be identical in signification with Ham, so that it may be but another name of the patriarch. [EGYPT.] In this case the mention of Mizraim or Mizrir would be geographical, and not indicative of a Mazor, son of Ham.
The Mizraimites, like the descendants of Ham, occupied a territory wider than that bearing the name of Mizraim. We may, however, suppose that Mizraim included all the first settlements, and that in remote times other tribes besides the Philistines migrated, or extended their territories. This we may infer to have been the case with the Lehabim (Ludim) or Libyans, for Manetho speaks of them as in the remotest period of Egyptian history subject to the Pharaohs. He tells us that under the first king of the Third Dynasty, of Memphis, Nechores, or Necorechis, "the Libyans revolted from the Egyptians, but, on account of a wonderful increase of the moon, submitted through fear" (Cory's Anec. Frag. 21d ed. pp. 100, 101). It is unlikely that at this very early time the Memphite kingdom ruled far, if at all, beyond the western boundary of Egypt.

The Ludim appear to have been beyond Egypt to the west, so probably the Ananim, and certainly the Lehabim. [Ludim; Ananim; Lehabim.] The Naphtuhim seem to have been just beyond the western border. [Naphtuhim.] The Pathrusim and Caphtorim were in Egypt, and probably the Casdulhim also. [Pathros; Cuttor; Casdulhim.] The Phlitim are the only Mizraite tribe that we know to have passed into Asia: their first establishment was in Egypt, for they came out of Caphtor into Egypt, as Genesis tells us.

Phut has been always placed in Africa. In the Bible, Phut occurs as an ally or supporter of Egyptian Thebes, mentioned with Cush and Ludim (Nah. iii. 9), with Cush and Ludim (the Mizrane Ludim?), as supplying part of the army of Pharaoh-Necho (Jer. xvi. 9), as involved in the calamities of Egypt together with Cush, Lud, and Chub [Chuço] (Ez. xxx. 5), as furnishing, with Persia, Lud, and other lands or tribes, mercenaries for the service of Tyre (xxvii. 10), and with Persia and Cush as supplying part of the army of Gog (xxxviii. 5). There can therefore be little doubt that Phut is to be placed in Africa, where we find, in the Egyptian inscriptions, a great number of people corresponding to it. [Phut.]

Respecting the geographical position of the Canaanites there is no dispute, although all the names are not identified. The Hamathites alone of those identified were settled in early times wholly beyond the land of Canaan. Perhaps there was a primeval extension of the Canaanite tribes after their first establishment in the land called after their ancestor, for before the specification of its limits as those of their settlements it is stated "afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad" (Gen. x. 18, 19). One of their most important extensions was to the northeast, where was a great branch of the Hittite nation in the valley of the Orontes, constantly mentioned in the wars of the Pharaohs [Egypt], and in those of the kings of Assyria. Two passages which have occasioned much controversy may be here noticed. In the account of Abraham's entrance into Palestine it is said, "And the Canaanite [was] then in the land" (xii. 6); and as to a somewhat later time, that of the separation of Abraham and Lot, as repeated by Genesis, "the Canaanites and the Perizzites dwelt then in the land" (xiii. 7). These passages have been supposed either to be late glosses, or to indicate that the Pentateuch was written at a late period. A comparison of all the passages referring to the primitive history of Palestine and Idumea shows that there was an earlier population expelled by the Hamite and Abrahamic settlers. This population was important in the time of the war of Chedorlaomer; but at the Exodus, more than four hundred years afterwards, there was but a remnant of it. It is most natural therefore to infer that the two passages under consideration mean that the Canaanite settlers were already in the land, not that they were still there.

Philologers are not agreed as to a Hamitic class of languages. Recently Bunsen has applied the term "Hamitism," or as he writes it Chanutism, to the Egyptian language, or rather family. He places it at the head of the "Semitic stock," to which he considers it as but partially belonging, and thus describes it:—"Chanutism, or ante-historicai Semitism: the Chanut deposit in Egypt; its daughter, the Demotic Egyptian; and its end the Coptic." (Outline, vol. i. p. 183.) Sir H. Rawlinson has applied the term Cushite to the primitive language of Babylonia, and the same term has been used for the ancient language of the southern coast of Arabia. This terminology depends, in every instance, upon the race of the nation speaking the language, and not upon any theory of a Hamitic class. There is evidence which, at the first view, would incline us to consider that the term Semitic, as applied to the Syro-Arabic class, should be changed to Hamitic; but on a more careful examination it becomes evident that any absolute classification of languages into groups corresponding to the three great Noachian families is not tenable. The Biblical evidence seems, at first sight, in favor of Hebrew being classed as a Hamitite rather than a Semitic form of speech. It is called in the Bible "the language of Canaan," ḫaṭṭāḇ hēb`ēṯ (Is. xix. 18), although those speaking it are elsewhere said to speak ḫaṭṭāḇ hūḏāth (2 K. xvii. 26, 28; Is. xxxvi. 11, 13; Neh. xii. 24). But the one term, as Gesenius remarks (Gram. Intro., i.), indicates the country where the language was spoken, the other as evidently indicates a people by whom it was spoken; thus the question of its being a Hamite or Semitic language is not touched; for the circumstance that it was the language of Canaan is agreeable with its being either indigenous (and therefore either Canaanite or Rephite), or adopted (and therefore perhaps Semitic). The names of Canaanite persons and places, as Gesenius has observed (l. c.), conclusively show that the Canaanites spoke what we call Hebrew. Elsewhere we might find evidence of the use of a so-called Semitic language by nations either partly or wholly of Hamite origin. This evidence would favor the theory that Hebrew was Hamitic; but on the other hand we should be unable to dissociate Semitic languages from Semitic peoples. The Egyptian language would also offer great difficulties, unless it was held to be partly of Hamitic origin, since it is mainly of an entirely different class to [from] the Semitic. It is mainly Nigritional, but it also contains Semitic elements. We are of opinion that the groundwork is Nigritional, and that the Semitic part is a layer added to a complete Nigritional lin, zusage. The two elements are mixed, but not fused. This opinion those Semitic scholars who have studied the subject share with us. Some Iranian scholars hold that the two elements are mixed, and that the ancient Egyptian represents the transition from Turanian to Semitic. The only solution of the difficulty seems to be, that what we call Semitic is early Noachian.

An inquiry into the history of the Hamite nations presents considerable difficulties, since it cannot be determined in the cases of the most important of those commonly held to be Hamite that they were purely of that stock. It is certain that the three most illustrious Hamite nations—the Cushites, the Phenicians, and the Egyptians—were greatly mixed with foreign peoples. In Babylonia the Hamite element seems to have been absorbed by the Semites, but not in the earliest times. There are some common characteristics, however, which appear to connect the different branches of the Hamite family, and to distinguish them from the children of Japheth and Shem. Their architecture has a solid grandeur that we look for in vain elsewhere. Egypt, Babylonia, and Southern Arabia alike afford proofs of this, and the few remaining monuments of the Phenicians are of the same class. What is very important is that what is very important is indicating the purely Hamite character of the monuments to which we refer is that the earliest in Egypt are the most characteristic, while the earlier in Babylonia do not yield in this respect to the later. The national mind seems in all these cases to have been [represented in?] these material forms. The early history of each of the chief Hamite nations shows great power of organizing an extensive kingdom, of acquiring material greatness, and of checking the incursions of neighboring nominal peoples. The Philistines afford a remarkable instance of these qualities. In every case, however, the more energetic sons of Shem or Japheth have at last fallen upon the rich Hamite territories and despoiled them. Egypt, favored by a position fenced round with nearly impassable barriers—on the north almost a havenless coast, on the east and west sterile deserts, held its freedom far longer than the rest; yet even in the reign of Shishak the throne was filled by foreigners, who, if Hamites, were Semite enough in their belief to revolutionize the religion of the country. In Babylonia the Medes had already captured Ninus's city more than 2000 years before the Christian era. The Habites of Southern Arabia were so early overthrown by the Joktanites that the scanty remains of their history are alone known to us through tradition. Yet the story of the migration of the ancient kings of Yemen is so perfectly in accordance with all we know of the Habites that it is almost enough of itself to prove what other evidence has so well established. The history of the Canaanites is similar; and if that of the Phenicians be an exception, it must be reected that they became a merchant class, as Ezekiel's famous description of Tyre shows (chap. xxvii). In speaking of Hamite characteristics, we do not intend it to be inferred that they were necessarily altogether of Hamite origin, and not at least partly borrowed.

2. (םַע) [multitude, people, Friär], Gen. xiv. 5:

Sam. (שֵׁם), (ווח) According to the Masoretic text, Chedorlaomer and his allies vowed the Zuzim to a place called Ham. If, as seems likely, the Zuzim be the same as the Zammuzumm, Ham must be placed in what was afterwards the Ammonite territory. Hence it has been conjectured by Tuch, that Ham is but another form of the name of the chief stronghold of the children of Ammon, Rabbah, now Rumein. The LXX. and Vulg., however, throw some doubt upon the Masoretic reading: the former has, as the rendering of מַעְשֵׂה (תּוֹאֹר) and the latter, et Zuzim cum eis, which shows that they read מַעְשֵׂה; but the Mas. rendering seems the more likely, as each clause mentions a nation, and its capital or stronghold; although it must be allowed that if the Zuzim had gone to the assistance of the Egyptian, a deviation would have been necessary. The Samaritan Version has רַמְיָה, Lishoth, perhaps intending the Laish of Gen. x. 19, which by some is identified with Callirhoë on the N. E. quarter of the Dead Sea. The Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jonathan have מַעְשֵׂה, Hebr. Schwarz (217) suggests Hammeimoth (in Van de Veldc's map Hammeilet), one mile above Lebbaca, the ancient Ar-Moab, on the Roman road. [Zeterns.]

3. In the account of a migration of the Semeites to the valley of Gedor, and their destroying the pastoral inhabitants, the latter, or possibly their predecessors, are said to have been "of Ham" מַעְשֵׂה (מַעְשֶׂה) —הוֹאֹר רִיוֹנָה (דָּשִׁי יִשָּׁמ). This may indicate that a Hamite tribe was settled here, or, more precisely, that there was an Egyptian settlement. The connection of Egypt with this part of Palestine will be noticed under Zerah. Ham may, however, here be in no way connected with the patriarch or with Egypt.

HAMAN (הַמָּן [celebrated, Pers.], or = Mercury (Sans.), Friär): Amanu (Aman), the chief minister or vizier of king Ahaseurus (Esth. iii. 1). After the failure of his attempt to cut off all the Jews in the Persian empire, he was hanged on the gallows which he had erected for Mordecai. Most likely he is the same Aman who is mentioned as the oppressor of Achaæarans (Tob. xiv. 10). The Targum and Josephus (Ant. xi. 6, § 5) interpret the description of him—the Agaæus—as signifying that he was of Amalekite descent; but he is called a Macedonian by the LXX. in Esth. iv. 24 (cf. iii. 1), and a Persian by Sulpicius Severus. Prideaux (Conocion, anno 451) unites the sum which he offered to pay into the royal treasury at more than £2,000,000 sterling. Modern Jews are said to be in the habit of designating any Christian enemy by his name (Eisengenger, Ent. jud. i. 721). [See addition under Esther, Book of.] W. T. B.

HAMATH (הַמָּת [fortress, citadel]): Haddath, Haddath, Hadad Khamath, appears to have been the principal city of Upper Syria from the time of the Exodus to that of the prophet Amos. It was situated in the valley of the Orontes, about half-way between its source near Bazaalk and the bend which it makes at Jisr-hadid. It thus naturally commanded the whole of the Orontes valley, from the low screen of hills which forms the watershed between the Orontes and the Likey—a "entrance to Hamath," as it is called in Scripture (Num xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5, &c.) — to the defile
...It east the G. Horment, seems ond quarters Orontes, describes from the importance (Am. l) eing "that math rental, as presently) was the known that Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and on the defeat of the latter by David, sent his son to congratulate the Jewish monarch (2 Sam. viii. 10), and (apparently) to put Hamath under his protection. Hamath seems clearly to have been included in the dominions of Solomon (1 K. iv. 21-4); and its king was no doubt one of those many princes whom that monarch ruled, who "brought presents and served Solomon all the days of his life." The store-cities," which Solomon "built in Hamath " (2 Chr. viii. 4), were perhaps staples for trade, the importance of the Orontes valley as a line of traffic being always great. On the death of Solomon and the separation of the two kingdoms, Hamath seems to have regained its independence. In the Assyrian inscriptions of the time of Ahab (c. 900) it appears as a separate power, in alliance with the Syrians of Damascus, the Hittites, and the Phoenicians. About three-quarters of a century later Jeroboam the second "recovers Hamath " (2 K. xiv. 28); he seems to have dismantled the place, whereas the prophet Amos, who wrote in his reign (Am. i. 1), couples "Hamath the great " with Gath, as an instance of desolation (ib. vi. 2). Soon afterwards the Assyrians took it (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13, &c.), and from this time it ceased to be a place of much importance. Antiocchus Epiphanes appears to have changed its name to Epiphanion, an appellation under which it was known to the Greeks and Romans from his time to that of St. Jerome (Comment. in Ezek. xvii. 16), and possibly later. The natives, however, called it Hamath, even in St. Jerome's time; and its present name, Hamah, is but very slightly altered from the ancient form.

Burckhardt visited Hamah in 1812. He describes it as situated on both sides of the Orontes, partly on the declivity of a hill, partly in the plain, and as divided into four quarters — Hubler, El Djas, El Magh, and El Medine, the last being the quarter of the Christians. The population, according to him, was at that time 30,000. The town possessed few antiquities, and was chiefly remarkable for its huge water-wheels, whereby the gardens and the houses in the upper town were supplied from the Orontes. The neighboring territory he calls "the granary of Northern Syria." (Travels in Syria, pp. 146-147. See also Poirecko, Travels in the East, vol. i.; Irby and Mangles, Travels, p. 314; and Stanley, S. of P. pp. 406, 407."

* The "entrance of Hamath" is not as stated, at the water-sided of the Litâny and the Orontes, which would place it too far south, for the following reasons: (1) The northern boundary of the Israelites was certainly north of Riblah, for the border descends from Hazar-enan to Shepham, and from Shepham to Riblah. Riblah is still known by its ancient name, and is found south of Hums Lake about six or eight hours. The "entrance" must therefore lie north of this town. (2) It must lie east of Mount Hor. Now, if Mount Hor be, as it probably is, the range of Lebanon, the question is readily solved by a reference to the physical geography of the region. The ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon terminate opposite Hums Lake by bold and decided declivities. There is then a rolling country for a distance of about ten miles north of the Lebanon chain, after which rises the lower range of the Nusairiyeh mountains. A wider space of plain intervenes between Anti-Lebanon and the low hills which lie eastward of Hamath. The city of Hums lies at the intersection of the arms of the cross thus formed, and toward each of the cardinal points of the compass there is an "entering in" between the hills. Thus northward the pass leads to Hamath; westward to Kabit el-Husn and the Mediterranean; eastward to the great plain of the Syrian desert; and southward toward Baal-gad in Cœle-Syria. This will appear at a glance from the accompanying plan of the country, in which it will be seen

The Hamathites were a Hamitic race, and are included among the descendants of Canaan (Gen. x. 18). There is no reason to suppose with Mr. Kenrick (Phoenicia, p. 60), that they were ever in any sense Phoenicians. We must regard them as closely akin to the Hittites on whom they bordered, and with whom they were generally in alliance. Nothing appears of the power of Hamath, beyond the geographical notices which show it to be a well-known place (Num. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5; &c.), until the time of David, when we hear that Toi, king of Hamath, had "had wars" with Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and on the defeat of the latter by David, sent his son to congratulate the Jewish monarch (2 Sam. viii. 10), and (apparently) to put Hamath under his protection. Hamath seems clearly to have been included in the dominions of Solomon (1 K. iv. 21-4); and its king was no doubt one of those many princes whom that monarch ruled, who "brought presents and served Solomon all the days of his life." HAMATHITE, THE onon (2 Chr. viii. 3). It has been conjectured to be the same as Hamath, here regarded as included in Aram-Zobah — a geographical expression which has usually a narrower meaning. But the name Hamath-Zobah would seem rather suited to another Hamath which was distinguished from the "Great Hamath," by the suffix "Zobah." Compare Hamoth-Gilead, which is thus distinguished from Ramah in Benjamin.

*HAMITAL, 2 K. xxiii. 31, is the reading of the A.V. ed. 1611 for HAMITAL.

Hammath (חָמָת [warm spring]): Guamad-dadáke — the last two syllables a corruption of the name following; [Alex. Ámáth; Abl. Ámáhta] Ámáth, one of the fortified cities in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). It is not possible from this list to determine its position, but the notices of the Talmudists, collected by Lightfoot in his Chorographical Century, and Chor. Deod, leave no doubt that it was near Tiberias, one mile distant — in fact that it had its name, Channath, "hot baths," because it contained those of Tiberias. In accordance with this are the slight notices of Jospehus, who mentions it under the name of Namaan as a "village not far from Tiberias, . . . one of the baths" of Tiberias" (Ant. xviii. 2, § 3), and as where Vespasian had encamped "before" (πρὸς) Tiberias" (I. J. iv. 1, § 3).

Remains of the wall of this encampment were recognized by Irbê and Mangles (p. 89 b). In both cases Josephus names the hot springs or baths, adding in the latter, that such is the interpretation of the name 'Amsgáns, and that the waters are meddical. The Hamath, at present three in number, still send up their hot and sulphureous waters, at a spot rather more than a mile south of the modern town, at the extremity of the ruins of the ancient city (Rob. ii. 383, 384; Van de Velde, ii. 399).

It is difficult, however, to reconcile with this position other observations of the Talmudists quoted on the same place, by Lightfoot, to the effect that Chamath was called also the "wells of Gadara," from its proximity to that place, and also that half the town was on the east side of the Jordan and half on the west, with a bridge between them — the fact being that the ancient Tiberias was at least 4 miles, and the Hamman 2, from the present embouchure of the Jordan. The same difficulty besets the account of Parchi (in Zunz's App. to Benjamin of Tudela, ii. 403). He places the wells entirely on the coast of Jordan.

In the list of Levitical cities given out of Naph-tali (Josh. xxi. 32), the name of this place seems to be HAMMOTH-DOR, and in 1 Chr. vi. 76 it is further altered to HAMMON.

HAMMEDATHA (חָמָדָת-הוֹ): "Amasarth: [Alex. Ámamáthos, Ámamáthos:] Amosathus), father of the infamous Hannan, and commonly designated as "the Agagite" (Esth. iii. 1, 10; viii. 5; ix. 24), though also without that title (ix. 10).

By Gesenius (Lex. 1855, p. 539) the name is taken to be Medatha, preceded by the definite article. For other explanations, see First, Hommel. [Zend. = given by Hoom]; and Simonis, ONomacron, p. 589. The latter derives it from a Per-isan word meaning "double." For the termination compare ABDATHA.

HAMMELECH (חָמָלעך [the king]): τοῦ Basiileos: Amelech), rendered in the A.V. as a proper name (Jer. xxxvi. 26; xxxvii. 6); but there is no apparent reason for supposing it to be anything but the ordinary Hebrew word for "the king," i.e. in the first case Jehoiakim, and in the latter Zedekiah. If this is so, it enables us to connect with the royal family of Judah two persons, Jerachmeel and Malech, who do not appear in the A.V. as members thereof.

HAMMER. The Hebrew language has several names for this indispensable tool. (1.) Pattish (חָמָת, connected etymologically with נדָשָׁה, to strike), which was used by the gold-beater (Is. xlii. 7, A. V. "carpenter") to overlay with silver and "smooth" the surface of the image; as well as by the quarry-man (Jer. xxiii. 29). (2.) Mok-kibáh (מֹכֶּב [and מֹכֶּב תִּכְּנָה]), properly a tool for rising, hence a stone-cutter's mallet (1 K. vi. 7), and generally any workman's hammer (Judg. xv. 21; Is. xlv. 12; Jer. x. 4). (3.) Halmáth (חלמה), used only in Judg. v. 26, and then with the addition of the word "workmen's" by way of explanation. (4.) A kind of hammer, named moppélz (מֹפְּלָצ), Jer. lii. 20 (A. V. "battle-axe"), or môfítica (מֹפִית), Prov. xxv. 18 (A. V.

...and three others a few paces further south (see a's Rob. Euseb. Res. iii. 259).

HAMMER, THE

HA'MATHITE, THE (חָמָת-הו':) ʾAmarə;: Amathaus, Hamathaus), one of the families descended from Canaan, named last in the list (Gen. xiii. 18; 1 Chr. i. 16). The place of their settlement was doubtless HAMATH.

HAMMOLKETH

“maul”, was used as a weapon of war. “Hammer” is used figuratively for any overwhelming power, whether worldly (Jer. i. 23), or spiritual (Jer. xxiii. 21 [comp. Heb. iv. 12]). W. L. B.

* From יָהָּן comes Maccaabaeus or Maccabee [MACCABEES, THE]. The hammer used by Jael (Judg. v. 25) was not of iron, but a wooden maul, such as the Arabs, use now for driving down their tent-pins. (See Thosson’s Land and Book, ii. 149.) In the Hebrew, it is spoken of as “the hammer,” as being the one kept for that purpose. The nail driven through Sisera’s temples was also one of the wooden tent-pins. This particularity points to a scene drawn from actual life. It is said in 1 K. vi. 7 that no sound of hammer, or axe, or any iron tool, was heard in building the Temple, because it “was built of stone made ready” at the quarry. The immense cavern under Jerusalem, where undoubtedly most of the building material of the ancient city was obtained, furnishes incidental confirmation of this statement. The heaps of chippings which lie about show that the stone was dressed on the spot. . . . There are no other quarries of any great size near the city, and in the reign of Solomon this quantity of stone, in its whole extent, was without the limits of the city.” (Barclay’s City of the Great King, p. 486, 1st ed. (1865)). See also the account of this subterranean gallery in the Ordnance Survey of Jerusalem, pp. 63, 64. H.

HAMMOLEKETH (ךונלדז), with the article = the Queen: ֹםאֹלֶךְ (Malacoth: Regine), a woman introduced in the genealogies of Manasseh, as daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Chr. vii. 17, 18), and as having among her children Abi-Ezer, from whose family sprang the great judge Gideon. The Targum translates the name by יָּוָּן = who reigned. The Jewish tradition, as preserved by Kimchi in his commentary on the passage, is that “she used to reign over a portion of the land which belonged to Gilead,” and that for that reason her lineage has been preserved.

HAMMON (ךונלדז) [hot or sunny]: [Ezek. xxvi:]: Alex. Hamun: Honoon. 1. A city in Asher (Josh. xix. 28), apparently not far from Zidon-rabbah, or “Great Zidon.” Dr. Schults suggested its identification with the modern village of Hamul, near the coast, about 10 miles below Tyre (Rob. iii. 66), but this is doubtful both in etymology and position.

2. [Xaoue: Alex. Xaoue.] A city allotted out of the tribe of Naphtali to the Levites (1 Chr. vi. 76), and answering to the somewhat similar names Hammath and Hammam-Dor in Joshua. G.

HAMMOTH-DOR (ךונלדז) [warm springs, abode]: Neemad: Alex. Eamothop: Ammoth Dor, a city of Naphtali, allotted with its suburbs to the Gershonite Levites, and for a city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 62). Unless there were two places of the same name, but a wooden maul, this city is identical with Hammath. Why the suffix Dor is added is hard to tell, unless the word refers in some way to the situation of the place on the coast, in which fact only had it (as we know) any resemblance to Dor, on the shore of the Mediterranean. In 1 Chr. vi. 76 the name is connected with Hammam. G.

HAMONAH (ךונלדז) [tumult, noise of a multitude]: Polamah: Ammon, the name of a city mentioned in a highly obscure passage of Ezekiel (xxix. 16); apparently that of the place in or near which the multitudes of Gog should be buried after their great slaughter by God, and which is to derive its name — “multitude” — from that circumstance. G.

HAMON-GOG, THE VALLEY OF (ךונלדז) = ravine of Gog’s multitude: ֶָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּוָּזָזָז.

"אמסת [א]ס[א]ת[א][א]: אמסת[א]ת[א]", daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah: one of the wives of king Josiah, and mother of the unfortunate princes Jehohaz (2 K. xxiii. 31), and Mattaniah or Zedekiah (2 K. xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1). In the two last passages the name is given in the original text as חָמוּתַל. Chamiel, a reading which the LXX. follow throughout.

SYL.] (חָנָמֵיא [properly חָנָמֵיא whose God has given, Gesen.]: 'אַנָמֵיא ה[א][א]: Hanameel), son of Shallum, and cousin of Jeremiah. When Judah was occupied by the Chaldeans, Jerusalem be laguered, and Jeremiah in prison, the prophet found a field of Hanameel in token of his assurance that a time was to come when land should be once more, a secure possession (Jer. xxxii. 7, 8, 9, 12; and comp 44). The suburban fields belonging to the tribe of Levi could not be sold (Lev. xxv. 34); but possibly Hanameel may have inherited property from his mother. Compare the case of Haranah, who also was a Levite; and the note of Groton on Acts iv. 37. Henderson (on Jer. xxxii. 7) supposes that a portion of the Levitical estates might be sold within the tribe.

HANAN (חָנָן [gracious, merciful]: 'אָנָן: Hanon). 1. One of the chief people of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 23).

2. The last of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 35; ix. 44).

3. [FA. אפרוא, "Son of Manahah,' i.e. possibly a Syrain of Aram-Ma'aziah, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the extended list of 1 Chr. iv. 43.

5. (LXX. omits [Rom. and Alex. in Neh. x. 10 read אפרא, but Vat. and FA. omit]). One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in his public exposition of the law (Neh. viii. 7). The same person is probably mentioned in x. 10 as sealing the contract, since several of the same names occur in both passages.

6. [Vat. omits.]. One of the 9 heads "of the people," that is of the haimen, who also sealed the covenant (x. 22).

7. (אפרא: [F.A. אפרא.]) Another of the chief haimen on the same occasion (x. 26).

keepers of the provisions collected as tithes (Neh. xiii. 13). He was probably a haiman, in which case the four storekeepers represented the four chief classes of the people — priests, scribes, Levites, and haimen.

9. Son of Igddalah "the man of God" (Jer. xxiv. 4). The sons of Hanan had a chamber in the Temple. The Vat. LXX. gives the name [חָנָן יִזְיֹד אֲבָנָיו [F.A. אפרא ינוו אֲבָנָיו].

sons of Hanan, David's Seer, who were separated for song in the house of the Lord, and head of the 18th course of the service (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 25).

2. [FA. וּט, once וּט: Alex. 1 K. xvi. 7, 24]. A Seer who rebelled (n. c. 941) Asa, king of Judah, for his want of faith in God, which he had showed by laying off the hostility of Benhadad 1, king of Syria (2 Chr. xvi. 7). For this he was imprisoned by Asa 10). He (or another Hanan) was the father of Jehiel the Seer, who testified against Basha (1 K. xvi. 1, 7), and Jehosh-aphat (2 Chr. xix. 2, xx. 34).

3. [FA. וּט: Alex. וּט: Alex. APRA]. One of the priests who in the cime of Ezra were con nected with strange wives (Est. x. 20). In Edras the name is ANANIAS.

4. [FA. APRA, FA. in i. 2, APRA]. A brother of Nehemiah, who returned n. c. 446 from Jerusalem to Susa (Neh. ii. 2); and was afterwards made governor of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (vii. 2).

HANANIAH (חָנָנִיאָה and חָנָנִיאָה) [yeho-nah has given]: "Aphania; "Aphanias": Aphan-

Aphanias: "Aphanias".

1. Of the 14 sons of Heman the singer, and chief of the sixteenth out of the 24 courses or wards into which the 288 musicians of the Levites were divided by king David. The sons of Heman were especially employed to blow the horns (1 Chr. xv. 28).

2. One of the chief captains of the army of king

Uziah (2 Chr. xxvi. 11).

3. Father of Zakkiah, one of the princes in the reign of Jehoshaphat king of Judah (Jer. xxxv. 12).

4. Son of Azur, a Benjamite of Gilgal and a false prophet in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah in the 4th year of his reign, u. c. 605, Hananiah.
Eliakim, perhaps Jeremiah saith Babylonian Chadrnazzar, in combination no doubt with the projected movements of Pharaoh-Hophra. Hananiah corroborated his prophecy by taking from off the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by Divine command (Jer. xxvii., in token of the seduction of Judaea and the neighboring countries to the Babylonian empire), and breaking it, adding, "Thus saith Jehovah, Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years." But Jeremiah was bid to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes which he had broken he should make yokes of iron, so firm was the dominion of Babylon destined to be for seventy years. The prophet Jeremiah added this rebuke and prediction of Hananiah's death, the fulfillment of which closes the history of this false prophet. "Hear now, Hananiah; Jehovah hath not sent thee; but thou makest this people to trust in a lie. Therefore thus saith Jehovah, Behold I will cast thee from off the face of the earth: this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against Jehovah. So Hananiah the prophet died the same year, in the seventh month" (Jer. xxviii.). The above history of Hananiah is of great interest, as throwing much light upon the Jewish politics of that eventful time, divided as parties were into the partizans of Babylon on one hand, and Egypt on the other. It also exhibits the machine of false prophecies, by which the irreligious party sought to promote their own policy, in a very distinct form. At the same time too that it explains in general the sort of political calculation on which such false prophecies were hazarded, it supplies an important clew in particular by which to judge of the date of Pharaoh-Hophra's (or Apries') accession to the Egyptian throne, and the commencement of his ineffectual effort to restore the power of Egypt (which had been prostrate since Necho's overthrow, Jer. xlv. 2) upon the ruins of the Babylonian empire. The leaning to Egypt, indicated by Hananiah's prophecy as having begun in the fourth of Zedekiah, had in the sixth of his reign issued in open defection from Nebuchadnezzar, and in the guilt of perjury, which cost Zedekiah his crown and his life, as we learn from Ez. xvii. 12-20; the date being fixed by a comparison of Ez. viii. 1 with xx. 1. The temporary success of the intrigue which is described in Jer. xxxvii. was speedily followed by the return of the Chaldeans and the destruction of the city, according to the prediction of Jeremiah. This history of Hananiah also illustrates the manner in which the false prophets hindered the mission, and obstructed the beneficent effects of the ministry, of the true prophets, and affords a remarkable example of the way in which they prophesied smooth things, and said peace when there was no peace (comp. 1 K. xxii. 11, 24, 25).

5. Grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the ward at the gate of Benjamin who arrested Jeremiah on a charge of deserting to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxvii. 13).

6. Head of a Benjaminite house (1 Chr. vii. 24).

7. The Hebrew name of Shadrach. [SHAD-RACH.] He was of the house of David, according to Jewish tradition (Dan. i. 3, 6, 7, 11, 19; ii. 17). [ASANIAN.]

8. Son of Zerubbabel, 1 Chr. iii. 19, from whom Christ derived his descent. He is the same person who is by St. Luke called Iacovs, Joanna, and who, when Elias is discarded, appears there also as Zerubbabel's son [GENEOLOGY OF CHRIST.] The identity of the two names Hananiah and Joanna is apparent immediately we compare them in Hebrew. יהושע (Hananiah) is compounded of וגן and the Divine name, which always takes the form יג, or יג, at the end of compounded names (as in Jeremiah, Shephtiah, Nehem-iah, Azar-iah, etc.). It meant gratiosis dedit Domini. Joanna (יווה) is compounded of the Divine name, which at the beginning of compound names takes the form יג, or יג (as in Jeho-shuna, Jeho-shaphat, Jo-zadak, etc.), and the same word, יג, and means Dominus gratiosis dedit. Examples of a similar transposition of the elements of a compound name in speaking of the same individual, are יג יג, Jeconiah, and יג יג, Jeho-jachan, of the same king of Judah: Ahaz-iah and Jeho-ahaz of the same son of Jehoram; Eli-am, and Ammi-el, of the father of Bath-sheba; and Eli-asah for Asah- el, and Ishma- el, for Eli-shama, in some MSS. of Ezr. x. 15 and 2 K. xxv. 25. This identification is of great importance, as bringing St. Luke's genealogy into harmony with the Old Testament. Nothing more is known of Hananiah.

9. The two names Hananiah and Jehohanan stand side by side, Ezr. x. 28, as sons of Bela, who returned with Ezra from Babylon.

10. A priest, one of the "apostheacies" (which see) or makers of the sacred ointments and incense (Ex. xxx. 22-28, 1 Chr. ix. 30), who built a portion of the wall of Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 8). He may be the same as is mentioned in ver. 30 as having repaired another portion. If so, he was son of Shelemiah; perhaps the same as is mentioned xii. 41.

11. Head of the priestly course of Jeremiah in the days of Jotakim the high-priest, Neh. xii. 12.

12. Ruler of the palace (יהויאב ילא ייחו) at Jerusalem under Nehemiah. He is described as "a faithful man, and one who feared God above many." His office seems to have been one of authority and trust, and perhaps the same as that of Eliakim, who was "over the house" in the reign of Hezekiah. [ELIAKIM.] The arrangements for guarding the gates of Jerusalem were intrusted to him with Hanani, the Tirshathah's brother. Prideaux thinks that the appointment of Hanani and Hanannah are fixed by that of the conquest of Egypt by "ram byres."
indicates that at this time Nehemiah returned to Persia, but without sufficient ground. Nehemiah seems to have been continuously at Jerusalem for some time after the completion of the wall (viii. 5, 65, viii. 9, x. 1). If, too, the term ἀναξία means, as Gesenius supposes, and as the use of it in Neh. ii. 8 makes not improbable, not the palace, but the fortress of the Temple, called by Josephus Ἄφωρις—there is still less reason to imagine Nehemiah's absence. In this case Hananiah would be a priest, perhaps of the same family as the preceding. The rendering moreover of Neh. vii. 3, 3, should probably be, "And I rejoined (or gave orders to) Hanani...and Hananiah the captains of the fortress...concerning Jerusalem, and said, Let not the gates," etc. There is no authority for rendering ἀναξία by "over"—"He gave such an one charge over Jerusalem." The passages quoted by Gesenius are not one of them to the point.

HANDICRAFT (τέχνη, ἀποθεώσις: are, artificium, Acts xviii. 3, xix. 25; Rev. xviii. 12). Although the extent cannot be ascertained to which those arts were carried on whose invention is ascribed to Tuba-Cain, it is probable that this was proportionate to the nomadic or settled habits of the antediluvian races. Among nomad races, as the Bedouin Arabs, or the tribes of Northern and Central Asia and of America, the wants of life, as well as the arts which supply them, are few; and it is only among the city-dwellers that both of them are multiplied and made progress. This subject cannot, of course, be followed out here; in the present article brief notices can only be given of such handicraft trades as are mentioned in Scripture.

1. The preparation of iron for use either in war, in agriculture, or for domestic purposes, was doubtless one of the earliest applications of labor: and, together with iron, working in brass, or rather copper alloyed with tin, bronze (Ἀργυρόκοντος, xρυσίατης: argentarius, aurifex) must have found employment both among the Hebrews and the neighboring nations in very early times, as appears from the oraments sent by Abraham to Hezekiah (Gen. xxv. 22, 54, xxxiv. 4, xxxviii. 18; Deut. vii. 25). But whatever skill the Hebrews possessed, it is quite clear that they must have learned much from Egypt and its "iron furnaces," both in metal work and in the arts of setting and polishing precious stones; arts which were turned to account both in the construction of the Tabernacle and the making of the priests' ornaments, and also in the casting of the golden calf as well as its destruction by Moses, probably, as suggested by Gognet, by a method which he had learnt in Egypt (Gen. xii. 42; Ex. iii. 22, xvi. 35, xxxiv. 4, 5, xxxvi. 2, 4, 29, 24, xxxvii. 17, 24, xxxviii. 4, 8, 24, 25, xxxix. 6, 39; Neh. iii. 8; Is. xiv. 12). Various processes of the goldsmiths' work (No. 1) are illustrated by Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 130, 152, 162).

After the conquest frequent notices are found both of moulded and wrought metal, including soldering, which last had long been known in Egypt; but the Phoenicians appear to have possessed greater skill than the Jews in these arts, at least in Solomon's time (Judg. viii. 21, 27, xvii. 4; I K. vii. 13, 46, 46; Is. xii. 7; Wisd. xv. 4).

In N. T. Alexander "the coppersmith" (6 καλαντές) of Ephesus is mentioned, where also was carried on that trade in "silver shrines" (καπάλια), which was represented by Demetrius the silversmith (ἀργυροποιός) as being in danger from the spread of Christianity (Acts xix. 24, 28; 2 Tim. iv. 14). [See also Smith.]

2. The work of the carpenter (δέκτος, τέκτων, artifex lignarius) is often mentioned in HANDICRAFT

Scripture (e. g. Gen. vi. 14; Ex. xxxvii.; Is. xli. 13). In the palace built by David for himself the workmen employed were chiefly Phoenicians sent by Hiram (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chr. xiv. 1), as most of the rebuilding under Zerubbabel, no mention is made of foreign workmen, though in the latter case the timber is expressly said to have been brought by sea to Joppa by Zedekiah (2 K. xii. 11; 2 Chr. xxiv. 12; Ezra iii. 7). That the Jewish carpenters must have been able to carve with some skill is evident from Is. xli. 7, xlv. 13, in which last passage some of the implements used in the trade are mentioned: the ruler (ῥυτήρ, μέτρον, norma, possibly a chalk pencil, Ges. p. 1337), measuring-line (μέτρον, Ges. p. 1201), compass (ῥυτήριον, παραγγαφίς, circinum, Ges. p. 450), plane, or smoothing instrument (ῥυτήριον· κάλα, rasumis, Ges. pp. 1228, 1338), axe (ῥυτήριον, Ges. p. 302, or βραχήν, Ges. p. 1236, διχων, securis).

The process of the work, and the tools used by Egyptian carpenters, and also cooperers and wheelwrights, are displayed in Egyptian monuments and reliefs: the former, including dovetailing, veneering, drilling, gluing, varnishing, and inlaying, may be seen in Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 111-119. Of the latter many specimens, including saws, hatchets, knives, awls, nails, a hone, and a drill, also turned objects in bone, exist in the British Museum, 1st Egyptian room, case 42-43, Nos. 6046-6188. See also Wilkinson, ii. p. 113, fig. 385.

In N. T. the occupation of a carpenter (τεκτόνας) is mentioned in connection with Joseph the husband of the Virgin Mary, and ascribed to our Lord himself by way of reproach (Mark vi. 3; Matt. xiii. 55; and just. Mart. Dial. c. Tryph. c. 88).

3. The masons (הַבְלָה), wall-lauhlers, Ges. p. 299, employed by David and Solomon, at least the chief of them, were Phoenicians, as is implied also in the word בְּלֵה, men of Gebal, Jebail, Ryb. (Ges. p. 258; 1 K. v. 18; Ez. xxvii. 9; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 179). Among their implepered mortar " of Ezekiel (xliv. 10) was perhaps a sort of cold-wall of mud or clay without lime (בָּנָי, Ges. p. 1516) which would give way under heavy rain. The use of white-wash on tombs is remarked by our Lord (Matt. xxiii. 27. See also Mishna Monas Sheni, v. 1). Houses infected with leprosy were required by the Law to be re-plastered (Lev. xiv. 40-45).

4. Akin to the craft of the carpenter is that of ship and boat-building, which must have been exercised to some extent for the fishing-vessels on the lake of Gennesaret (Matt. viii. 23, ix. 1; John xxi. 3, 8). Solomon built, at Ezion-Geber, ships for his foreign trade, which were manned by Phoenician crews, an experiment which Je-hoshaphat endeavored in vain to renew (1 K. ix. 26, 27, xxi. 18; 2 Chr. xx. 36, 37).

5. The perfumes used in the religious services, and in later times in the funeral rites of monarchs, imply knowledge and practice in the art of the " apothecaries " (μυροφόροι, pigmentarii), who appear to have formed a guild or association (Ex. xxx. 25; Neh. iii. 8; 2 Chr. xvi. 14; Eccles. vii. 1, x. 1; Ecclus xxxvi. 8).

6. The arts of spinning and weaving both wool and linen were carried on in early times, as they are still usually among the Bedouins, by women. The women spun and wove goat's hair and flax for the Tabernacle, as in later times their skill was employed in like manner for idolatrous purposes. One of the excellences attributed to the good house-wife is her skill and industry in these arts (Ex. xxxv. 25, 26; Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11; 2 K. xxiii. 7; Ex. xvi. 16; Prov. xxxi. 13, 24; Burschardt, Notes on Ezek. i. 65; comp. Hom. ii. 123; Or. i. 356, ii. 104). The loom, with its beam (υλήμα, μισάντιον, licentiorum, 1 Sam. xvii. 7; Ges. p. 883), pin (γυρος, πάσαλας, clavus, Judg. xvi. 14; Ges. p. 643), and shuttle (Σφεν, δηνεῦτα, Joh. vii. 6; Ges. p. 146) was, perhaps, introduced later, but as early as David's time (1 Sam. xvii. 7), and worked by men, as was the case in Egypt, contrary to the practice of other nations. This trade also appears to have been practiced hereditarily (1 Chr. iv. 21; Herod. ii. 35; Soph. [Ed. Cod. 339]).

Together with weaving we read also of embroidery, in which gold and silver threads were interwoven with the body of the stuff, sometimes in figure patterns, or with precious stones set in the needlework (Ex. xxxvi. 1, xxviii. 4, xxxix. 6-13).

7. Besides these arts, those of dyeing and of dressing cloth were practiced in Palestine, and those also of tanning and dressing leather (Josh. ii. 15-18; 2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4; Acts ix. 43; Mish. Megill. iii. 2). Shoe-makers, barbers, and tailors are mentioned in the Mishnah (Pesach. iv. 6): the barber (כַּאוֹרָא, Ges. p. 283), or his occupation, by Ezekiel (v. 1; Lev. xxxv. 8; Num. vii. 5); Josephus, Ant. xvi. 17, § 5; B. J. i. 27, § 5; Mish. Shabb. i. 2), and the tailor (l. 3), plasterers, glaziers, and glass vessels, painters, and goldworkers are mentioned in Mishnah. (Chel. viii. xxxix. 3, 4, xxx. 1).

Tent-makers (ץבַּוַּנְיוּא) are noticed in the Acts (xviii. 3), and frequent allusion is made to the trade of the potters.

8. Bakers (כִּבָּשָה, Ges. p. 138) are noticed in Scripture as carrying on their trade (Jer. xxxvii. 21; Hos. vii. 4; Mish. Chel. xvii. 2); and the well-known valley Tyropoion probably derived its name from the commerce in its inhabitants (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, 1). Butchers, not Jewish, are spoken of in I Cor. x. 25.

Trade in all its branches was much developed after the Captivity; and for a father to teach his son a trade was reckoned not only honorable but indispensable (Pirke Pirkei Ab. ii. 2; Kebuthah. iv. 14). Some trades, however, were regarded as less honorable (Jahn, Bibl. Art. § 84). Some, if not all trades, had special localities, as was the case formerly in Europe, and is now in Eastern cities (Jer. xxviii. 31; 1 Cor. x. 25; Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 1, and 8, § 1; Mish. Beor. v. 1; Russell, Aleppo, i. 20; Chardin, Voyages, vii. 274, 394; Lane, Mod. Egypt. ii. 115).

One feature, distinguishing Jewish from other workmen, deserves peculiar notice, namely, that they were not slaves, nor were their trades necessarily hereditary, as was and is so often the case among other, especially heathen nations (Jahn, Bibl. Ant. c. v. § 81-84; Saalschütz, Hebr. Arch. 14. c. v; Winer, s. v. Handkercke). [MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS; POTTERY; GLASS; LEATHER.]

H. W. P. HANDEKERCHIEF, NAPKIN, APRON.

The two former of these terms, as used in the A. V. = σουδάρων, the latter = συμφίλοι: they are classed together, inasmuch as they refer to objects of a very similar character. Both words are of Latin origin: σουδάρων = sudarium from subdāre = to wear; "the Lutherian translation preserves the reference to its etymology in its rendering, schweisschut; συμφίλοι = semicinctum, i. e. "a half girdle." Neither is much used by classical writers; the sudarium is referred to as used for wiping the face ("candido frontem sudario tergeter," Quintil. vi. 3), or hands ("sudario manus tergens, "and in collo habeant," Petron. in fraga. Tragyr. c. 57); and also as worn over, the face for the purpose of concealment (Stenton. in Neros, c. 48): the word was introduced by the Romans into Palestine, where it was adopted by the Jews, in the form סְדָרָה as = סָדָרָה, in Ruth iii. 15. The sudarium is noticed in the N. T. as a wrapper to fold up money (Luke xix. 20) — as a cloth bound about the head of a corpse (John xi. 44, xx. 7), being probably brought from the crown of the head under the chin — and lastly as an article of dress that could be easily removed (Acts xix. 12), probably a handkerchief worn on the head like the kuffiyeh of the Bedouins.

The semicinctum is noticed by Martial xiv. Epigr. 153, and by Petron. in Satyr. c. 94. The distinction between the cinctus and the semicinctum consisted in its width (Isidor. Orig. xix. 33): with regard to the character of the συμφίλοι, the only inference from the passage in which it occurs (Acts xix. 12) is that it was easily removed from the person, and probably was worn next to the skin. According to Suidas the distinction between the sudarium and the semicinctum was very small, for he explains the latter by the former, συμφίλοι τάσσατον ἵνα συμφίλοι, the φασίδιον being a species of head-dress: Hesychius likewise explains συμφίλοι by φασίδιον. According to the scholiast in (Cod. Steph.), as quoted by Scheusner (Lex. s. v. σουδάρων), the distinction between the two terms is that the sudarium was worn on the head, and the semicinctum used as a handkerchief. The difference was probably not in the shape, but in the use of the article; we may conceive them to have been bands of linen of greater or less size, which might be adapted to many purposes, like the article now called lungi among the Arabs, which is applied sometimes as a girdle, at other times as a turban (Wellsted, Travels, i. 321).

HANES (חָנֵן): Hanes, a place in Egypt only mentioned in Is. xxx. 4: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his messengers came to Hanes." The LXX. has "Ὅτι ἐπὶ γῆν τὰς ἄρχουσας ἀνθρώπων, evidently following an entirely different reading. Hanes has been supposed by Vitringa, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius, to be the same as Heracleopolis Magna in the Heptanis, Cop. [ΕΚΘ΢ΕΚ, ΙΟΣΕΪ, ΣΙΝΗ.]

This identification depends wholly upon the similarity of the two names: a consideration of the sense of the passage in which Hanes occurs shows its great improbability. The prophecy is a reproof of the Jews for trusting in Egypt: and according to the Masoretic text, mention is made of an embassy, perhaps from Hoshea, or else from Ahaz, or possibly Hezekiah, to a Pharaoh. As the king whose assistance is asked is called Pharaoh, he is probably not an Ethiopian of the XXVIIth dynasty, for the kings of that line are mentioned by name — So, Tirhakah — but a sovereign of the XXIId dynasty, which, according to Manetho, was of Tanite kings. It is supposed that the last king of the latter dynasty, Manetho’s Zet, is the Sethos of Herodotus, the king in whose time Semachib’s army perished, and who appears to have been mentioned under the title of Pharaoh by Rabshakeh (Is. xxxvi. 6; 2 K. xviii. 21), though it is just possible that Tirhakah may have been intended if the reference be to an embassy to Zet, Zoan was probably his capital, and in any case then the most important city of the eastern part of Lower Egypt; Hanes was most probably in its neighborhood; and right in identifying it with בִּיתָן, or בְּיתָן, once written, if the Kethibh be correct, in the form בִּיתָן. Daphane, a fortified

Gesenius remarks, as a kind of apology for the identification of Hanes with Heracleopolis Magna, that it was latterly suggested, on strong grounds, by Sir Gardner Wilkinson, that this is a mistake in the case of the IXth dynasty for Hermontiades (Heroed. ed. Rawlinson, vol. ii. p. 348). If this supposition be correct as to the IXth dynasty, it must also be so as to the Xth; but the circumstance whether Heracleopolis was a royal city or not, a thousand years before Isaiah's time, is obviosely of no consequence here.

different articles in the furniture of the Temple.

1. The "hanging" ָּוַי תֹּנְיוֹת: תֹּנְיוֹת (torium) was a curtain or "covering," (as the word radially means) to close an entrance; one was placed before the door of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 36, 37, xxxix. 28); it was made of variegated stuff wrought with needlework, and was hung on five pillars of acacia wood; another was placed before the entrance of the court (Ex. xxvii. 16, xxxviii.
18; Num. iv. 26); the term is also applied to the vail that concealed the Holy of Holies, in the full expression "vail of the covering" (Ex. xxvii. 12, xxxix. 34, xl. 21; Num. iv. 5). [CURTAINS.
2. The "hangings" ([ֵבָּיִת תֹּנְיוֹת: תֹּנְיוֹת] were used for covering the walls of the court of the Tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Ex. xxvii. 9, xxviii. 17, xxxviii. 9; Num. iii. 26, iv.
26). The rendering in the LXX. implies that they were made of the same substance as the sails of a ship, i.e. (as explained by Rash.) "meshy, not woven." This opinion is, however, incorrect, as the material of which they were constructed was "five twined linen." The hangings were carried only five cubits high, or half the height of the walls of the court (Ex. xxvii. 18; comp. xxvi. 16). [TA-BERNACLE.

In 2 K. xxiii. 7, the term בְּיִתָן, מִיִּתָן, strictly "houses," A. V. "hangings," is probably intended to describe tents used as portable sanctuaries.

of Samuel (1 Sam. i. ii.): a prophetess of con-ciderable repute, though her claim to that title is based upon one production only, namely, the hymn of hanksgiving for the birth of her son. This hymn is in the highest order of prophetic poetry; its resemblance to that of the Virgin Mary (comp. 1
Sam. ii. 1-10 with Luke i. 66-80; see also Ps.
42: 11), has been noticed by the commentators; and it is specially remarkable as containing the first designation of the Messiah under that name. In the Targum it has been subjected to a process of magnificuous dilution, for which it would be difficult to find a parallel even in the pompous vagaries of that paraphrase (Eichhorn, Einl. ii. p. 68).

Legias. About that distance northeast of Legias, and two miles west of Sedom (the ancient Shunem),

Carrhar, which we know from Strabo and Ptolemy to have been the appellation by which Haran was known to the Greeks. We may assume then the author of Chronicles to mean, that a portion of the Israelites carried off by Pyl and Tiglath-Pilser were settled in Harron on the Belik, while the greater number were conveyed to the Chaldean.

HARAN. 1. (ḥārān) [a strong one, First: prob. montanus, mountainer, Gesen.]: Apārā: Jos. [Apārā: Aram]. The third son of Terah, and therefore youngest brother of Abram (Gen. xi. 31). Three children were born to Lot (27, 31), and two daughters, namely, Milcah, who married her uncle Nahor (29), and Iscah (29), of whom we merely possess her name, though in some (e. g. Josephus) she is held to be identical with Sarah. Haran was born in Ur of the Chaldees, and he died there while his father was still living (29). His sepulchre was still shown there when Josephus wrote his history (Ant. i. 6, § 5). The ancient Jewish tradition is that Haran was buried in the furnace of Nimrod for his waves' conduct during the fiery trial of Abraham. (See the Targum Ps. Jonathon; Jerome's Quest. in Genesis, and the notes thereto in the edit. of Migne.)

This tradition seems to have originated in a translation of the word Ur, which in Hebrew signifies "fire." It will be observed that although this name and that of the country appear the same in the A. V., there is in the original a certain difference between them: the latter commencing with the harsh guttural Cheth.

HARAN (ḥārān), i. e. Charran: Apādā: [Vat.] Alex. Apār: Harron, a son of the great Caleb by his concubine Ephaal (1 Chr. ii. 40). He himself had a son named Gazez.

HARAN (ḥārān) [scorned, abrid, Gesen.; a noble, freeman, First: Xapārā: Strab., Ptol. Kaqārā: Harron], is the name of the place whither Abraham migrated with his family from Ur of the Chaldees, and where the descendants of his brother Nahor established themselves. Haran is therefore called "the city of Nahor" (comp. Gen. xxxiv. 10 with xxvii. 43). It is said to be in Mesopotamia (Gen. xxiv. 10), or more definitely, in Padan-Aram (xxv. 20), which is the "cultivated district at the foot of the hills" (Stanley's S. F. P., p. 129 note), a name well applying to the beautiful stretch of country which lies below Mount Masina between the Khbouar and the Euphrates. [PADAN-ARAM.] Here, about midway in this district, is a town still called Harrain, which really seems never to have changed its appellation, and beyond any reasonable doubt is the Haran or Charran of Scripture (Bochart's Phileg., i. 14; Ewald's Geschichte, i. 384). It is remarkable that the people of Harrain retained to a late time the Chaldean language and the worship of Chaldean deities (Assenam. Bild. Or. i. 327; Chwolson's Studier und der Theismus, ii. 39). Harrain lies upon the Belik (ancient Blackicks), a small affluent of the Euphrates, which falls into it nearly in long. 39°. It was famous among the Romans for being near the scene of the defeat of Crassus (Plin. H. N. v. 24). Also in the time of the Christian era it appears to have been included in the kingdom of Edessa (Mos. Chor. ii. 32), which was ruled by Agbars. Afterwards it passed with that kingdom under the dominion of the Romans, and appears as a Roman city in the wars of Caracalla (Mos. Chor. ii. 72) and Julian (Jo. Malal. p. 329). It is now a small village inhabited by a few families of Arabs.

In the A. V. of the New Test. the name follows the Greek form, and is given as Charran (Acts vii. 2, 4).

G. R.

* A controversy has recently sprung up respecting the situation of the patriarchal Haran which requires notice here. Within a few years a little village known as Harrin-el-J تنو is been discovered, about four hours east of Damascus, on the borders of the lake into which the Barada (Alans) flows. Dr. Beke (Origines Biblic., Lond. 1834) had thrown out the idea that the Scripture Haran was not, as generally supposed, in Mesopotamia, but must have been near Damascus. He now maintains that this Harrin, so unexpectedly brought to light between "Alana and Pharpars, rivers of Damascus," must be the identical Haran (or Charran) of the Bible in Aram-naharam, i.e. Aram of the two rivers. In 1801 Dr. Beke made a journey to Palestine, with special reference to this question. The argument on which he mainly relies is the fact that Laban, in his pursuit of Jacob, appears to have travelled from Haran to Gilead on the east of the Jordan in 7 days (Gen. xxxi. 23), whereas the actual distance of Haran from Gilead is about 300 geographical miles, and would make in that country an ordinary journey of 15 or 20 days. An Arab tribe on its ordinary migrations moves from 12 to 15 miles a day, and a caravan from 20 to 23 miles a day. On the other hand, it is not a little remarkable that Dr. Beke himself went over the ground, step by step, between Harrin-el-J تنو and Gilead, and found the time to be five days, hence very nearly the time that Laban was on the way before he overtook Jacob in Gilead.

It must be owned that this rapidity of Laban's pursuit of Jacob from Haran is not a slight difficulty. For its removal we can only resort to certain suppositions in the case, which of course we are at liberty to make if the Scripture text does not exclude them, and if they are justified by the known customs of the country and the age.

First, we may assume that Laban, taking with him only some of his sons or other near kinsmen ("his brothers," see Gen. xxxi. 23), was uninumbered with baggage or women and children, and hence moved with all the despatch of which eastern travelling admits. One party was fleeing and the other pursuing. The chase was a close one, as is the language used. Jacob complains that Laban had "followed hotly" after him. The swift dromedaries would be brought into requisition if the ordinary camels were not swift enough. The speed of these animals is such, says
Sir Henry Rawlinson (who has seen so much of the East), that they "consume but 8 days in crossing the desert from Damascus to Bagdad, a distance of nearly 500 miles." He thinks it unquestionable that Laban could have "traversed the entire distance from Haran to Gil'eal in 7 days" (Athen. Soc., April 19, 1862). For examples of the capacity of such canals for making long and rapid journeys, see the Penny Cyclopaedia, vi. 191.

Secondly, the expression (which is entirely correct for the Hebrew) that Laban's journey before coming up with Jacob was a "seven days' journey," is indefinite, and may include 8 or 9 days as well as 7. "Seven," as Gesenius states, "is a round number, and stands in the Hebrew for any number less than 10." A week's time, in this wider sense, would bring the distance still more easily within an expeditious traveller's reach.

But whatever may be thought of the possibility of Laban's making such a journey in such time, the difficulty in the case of Jacob would seem to be still greater; since, accompanied as he was with flocks and herds and women and children, he must have travelled much more slowly. To this it may be replied that the narrative does not restrict us to the three days which passed before Laban became aware of Jacob's departure added to the seven days which passed before he overtook Jacob in Gil'eal. It is very possible that Laban, on hearing so suddenly that Jacob had fled, was not in a situation to follow at once, but had preparations to make which would consume three or four days more; so as in reality to give Jacob the advantage of five or six days before he finally started in pursuit. It is altogether probable too that the wary Jacob adopted measures before setting out which would greatly accelerate his flight. (See Gen. xxxvi. 20.) Mr. Porter, who is so familiar with Eastern life, has drawn out this suggestion in a form that appears not unreasonable. Jacob could quietly move his flocks down to the banks of the Euphrates and send them across the river, without exciting suspicion; since then, as now, the flocks of the great proprietors roamed over a wide region (Gen. xxxvi. 1-3). In like manner before starting himself he could have sent his wives and children across the river, and hurried them forward with all the despatch which at this day characterizes an Arab tribe fleeing before an enemy (vers. 17, 18). All this might take place before Laban was aware of Jacob's purpose; and they were then at least 3 days' distance from each other (vers. 19-22). The intervening distance between the Euphrates and Gil'eal, a distance of 250 miles, is a vast plain, with only one ridge of hills: and thus Jacob "could march forward straight as an arrow." If, as supposed, his route lay entirely to the north, he already could travel for the first two or three days at a very rapid pace. "Now, I maintain" (says this writer), "that any of the tribes of the desert would at this moment, under similar circumstances, accomplish the distance in 10 days, which is the shortest period we can, according to the Scripture account, assign to the journey (vers. 22, 23). We must not judge of the capabilities of Arabia at present, and according to our Western ideas and experience." (See Athen. Soc., May 24, 1862.)

Dr. Beke's other incidental confirmations of his theory are less important. It is urged that unless Abraham was living near Damascus, he could not have had a servant in his household who was called "Eliezer of Damascus" (Gen. xv. 2). The answer to this is that the servant himself may possibly have been born there and have wandered to the further East before Abraham's migration; or more probably, may have sprung from a family that belonged originally to Damascus. Mr. Porter says "I knew well in Damascus two men, one called Ibrahim el-Halify, 'Abraham of Aleppo'; and the other Elias el-Akkawy, 'Elias of Akka,' neither of whom had ever been in the town whose name he bore. Their ancestors had come from those towns: and that is all such expressions usually signify in the East" (Athen. Soc., December 7, 1861.)

The coincidence of the name proves nothing as to the identification in question. The name (if it be Arabic) means 'erald,' 'sclorch,' and refers no doubt to the Syrian Havis as being on the immediate confines of the desert. The affix Aro'naed, "columns," comes from five Ionic pillars, forty feet high, which appear among the mud-houses of the village. (See Porter's Biblical, of Syria, and Pal., ii. 457.)

Again, the inference from Acts vii. 2, that Stephen opposes Charan to Mesopotamia in such a way as to imply that Charan lay outside the latter, is unnecessary, to say the least; for he may mean equally as well that Abraham was called twice in Mesopotamia, i.e. not only in the part of that province where Charan was known to be, but still earlier in the more northern part of it known as the land of the Chaldees, the original home and seat of the Abrahamian race. Not only so, but the latter must be Stephen's meaning, unless he differed from the Jews of his time, since both Philo (de Abl. ii. pp. 11, 14, ed. Mang.) and Josephus (Ant. i. 7, § 1) relate that Abraham was called thus twice in the land of his nativity and kindness, and in this view they follow the manifest implication of the O. T., as we see from Gen. xv. 7 and Neh. ix. 7 (comp. Gen. xii. 1-4).

Dr. Beke found "flocks of sheep, and maidens drawing water," at Havis-el-Aro'naed, and felt that he saw the Scripture scene of Jacob's arrival, and of the presence of Rachel with "her father's sheep which she kept," reenacted before his eyes. But that is an occurrence so common in eastern villages at the present day, especially along the skirts of the desert, that it can hardly be said to distinguish one place from another.

But the reasons for the traditional opinion entirely outweigh those against it. (1.) The city of Nahor or Haran (Gen. xxiv. 10) is certainly in Aram-naharaim, i.e. "Syria of the two rivers" (in the A. V. "Mesopotamia"). This expression occurs also in Dent. xxii. 4 and Judg. iii. 8, and implies a historic notoriety which answers perfectly to the character of the Euphrates and Tigris, but not to rivers of such limited local importance as the Alanna and Charpur, streams of Damascus. (2.) Aram-Damascus (the "Syria Damascus" of Pliny) is the appellation of Southern Syria (see 2 Sam. vii. 6 and Is. vii. 8), and is a different region from Aram-naharaim where Haran was. (3.) Jacob in going to Haran went to "the land of the people of the East," not to "hills of Aram-damascus," but to a region that is as different from Damascus, as one almost north of Palestine, but is so to that beyond the Euphrates. In accordance with this, Balaam, who came from Aram-naharaim, speaks of himself as having been brought "out of the mountains of the East" (Dent. xxiii. 5; Num. xxiii. 7). (4.) The river which Jacob crossed in his flight from HARE (HA'RARITE, perhaps = the mountainer, Ges. Thes. p. 392: de Arvii, or Orori, Arorites), the designation of three men connected with David's guard.

1. ( הלֵל גֶּשֶׁם, [de Arvii]: "Agee, a Hararite" (there is no artile here in the Hebrew), father of Shammah, the third of the three chiefs of the heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 11). In the parallel passage, 1 Chr. xi., the name of this warrior is entirely omitted.

2. (הֲשָׂמַמָּה הַרָּאָרֵית, [Vat. Alex. e'hi: de Orori]): "Shammam the Hararite" is named as one of the thirty in 2 Sam. xxii. 33. In 1 Chr. xi. 34 [Araupi; Vat. 1. Araphe, 2. m. Arapi: Arorites] the name is altered to Shaze. Kennicott's conclusion, from a minute investigation, is that the passage is a mere repetition of the same in the Hebrew, as the word "Shammam" should stand in both, "Jonathan son of Shammah the Hararite," whereas Shammam being identical with Shimea, David's brother.

3. (חָזָבּרָפִּים), [Vat. - e're, - rei: Arorites, Arorites.] "Shakar (2 Sam. xxiii. 33) or Sacar (1 Chr. xi. 35) the Hararite" was the father of Abiam, another member of the correct name. Kennicott inclines to take Sacar as the correct name.

HARBO'NA (שָׂרָבָא) [prob. Pers. asdriver, Ges.]: [Arap. Alex. Oaproywa]: [Comp. Xapbawit: Harbavwz], the third of the seven chamberlains, or eunuchs, who served king Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10), and who suggested Haman's being hung on his own gallows (vii. 9). In the latter passage the name is "HARBO'NAH (שָׂרָבָא) [see above]:

Bouraybâ: [FA. Bouraya: Comp. Xapbawit: Harbavwz]. [Written thus in Esth. vii. 9, but the same name as the foregoing. — H.]

HARE (חָזַר, arnebeth = Sârânuw: lepus) occurs only in Lev. vi. 6 and Deut. xiv. 7, amongst the animals disallowed as food by the Mosaic law. There is no doubt at all that arnebeth denotes a "hare," and in all probability the species Lepus Sârânuw, which Ehrenberg and Hemprich (Symb Phys.) mention as occurring in the valleys of Arabia Petraea and Mount Sinai, and L. Sârânuw, which the same authors state is found in the Lebanon, are those which were best known to the ancient Hebrews; though there are other kinds of Leporidae, as the L. Egyptianus and the L. Aethiopicus, if a distinct species from L. Sârânuw, which are found in the Bide lands. The hare is at this day called arneb (בַּר) by the Arabs in Palestine and Syria (see Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, ii. 104, 105); and the Sârânuw, i. e. "rough foot," is identical with λαγός, and is the term which Aristotle generally applies to the hare: indeed, he only uses the latter word once in his History of Animals (viii. 27, § 4). We are of opinion, as we have elsewhere stated (Con ey), that the rabbit (L. conicus) was unknown to the ancient Hebrews, at any rate in its wild state; nor does it appear to be at present known in Syria or Palestine as a native. It is doubtful whether Aristotle was acquainted with the rabbit, as he never alludes to any burrowing λαγός or δασινώς; but, on the other hand, see the passage in vi. 28, § 3, where the young of the δασινώς are said to be "horn blind," which will apply to the rabbit alone. Pliny (N. H. viii. 53), expressly notices rabbits (cuniculi), which occur in such numbers in the Balearic Islands as to destroy the harvests. He also notes the practice of ferreting these animals, and thus driving them out of their burrows. In confirmation of Pliny's remarks, we may observe that there is a small island of the Balearic group called Cenceira, i.e., in Spanish a "rabitat-waren," which at this day is abundantly stocked with these animals. The hare was erroneously thought by the ancient Jews to have chewed the cud, who were no doubt misled, as in the case of the shaphim (Hyrax), by the habit these animals have of moving the jaw about.

"Hares are so plentiful in the environs of Aleppo," says Dr. Russell (p. 158), "that it was no uncommon thing to see the gentlemen who went out a sporting twice a week return with four or five brace hung in triumph at the girths of the servants' horses." The Turks and the natives, he adds, do not eat the hare; but the Arabs, who have a peculiar mode of dressing it, are fond of its flesh. Hares are hunted in Syria with greyhound and falcon.

HAREL (with the def. art. מַעֲרֵה: τὸ ἁρέλ: Αρέλ). In the margin of Ez. xiii. 15, the word rendered "altar" in the text is given "Harel, i.e. the mountain of God." The LXX., Vulg., and Arab. evidently regarded it as the same with "Ariel" in the same verse. Our translators followed the Targum of Jonathan in translating it "altar." Junius explains it of the Ἱσσράης or hearth of the altar of burnt offering, covered by the network on which the sacrifices were placed over the burning wood. This explanation Gesenius adopts, and brings forward as a parallel the Arab. مَيَا, "a hearth or fireplace," akin to the Heb. יִמָּא, "a light, flame." First (Homer, s. v.) derives it from an unused root מִמַּא, מַר, "to glow, burn," with the termination -r; but the only authority for the root is its presumed existence in the word ἠραλ, Edward (Die Propheten des A. B. ii. 373) identifies Harel and Ariel, and refers them both to a root מְמַא, מָרָה, akin to the Heb. יִמָּא, יָם.

(1 Chr. ii. 51, only.) In the lists of Ezr. ii. and Neh. vii. the similar name Hariph is found, but nothing appears to establish a connection between the two.

HARETH, THE FOREST OF (§§. §; §). מַמָּה, in both MSS. — reading מַמָּה for מַמָּה— שָׁם, [Vat. שָׁם]: Alex. Αρέφα: [Comp. Nothing appears in the narrative by which this position of the forest, which has long since disappeared, can be ascertained, except the very general remark that it was in the "land of Judah." c. e., according to Josephus, the inheritance proper of that tribe, τῷ καλοχριστῷ τῷ φασάθι, as opposed to the "desert," ἤν ἵπποιαρα, in which he had before been lurking (Ant. vi. 12, § 4). We might take it to be the "wood" in the "wilderness of Ziph," in which he was subsequently hidden (xiii. 15, 19), but that the Hebrew term is different (chorakh instead of yarāh). In the Onomasticon, "Arith" is said to have then existed west of Jerusalem.

HARHIAH (3 syl.) מַמָּה [Jehovah is angry]: "Apaxias: [Vat. Alex. FA. omit: Arriv]: Uziel son of Charanah, of the goldsmiths, assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 8). [Some MSS. read מַמָּה is a protection, First.]

HARHAS (§§. §).: "Apas: [Vat. Apeas]: Aronas, an ancestor of Shalumm the husband of Habbah, the prophetess in the time of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 14). In the parallel passage in Chronicles the name is given as Haseah.

HARHUR (§§. §) [root רֻר]: to burn, shine: hence distinction, First: but Ges., inflation: "Apas: [Vat. Alex. FA. Apeas]: Harhor: Bene-harchur were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53). In the Apocryphal Esdras the name has become Assur, Pharamon.

HARM [§§. § (moluccan)]. 1. (Arapi: [Comp.] Alex. Αράμι: Harum): a priest who had charge of the third division in the house of God (1 Chr. xxiv. 8).

2. [Harp: in Neh. x. 5, 16, Vat. Epapou]: Alex. Αραμί: Harum, Haruem, Arem]): Bene-Harim, probably descendants of the above, to the number of 1017, came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42). [Carm.]: The name, probably as representing the family, is mentioned amongst those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 5); and amongst the priests who had put away their foreign wives were five of the sons of Harim (Ezr. x. 21). In the parallel to this latter passage in Esdras the name is given Annas.

3. (Arapi: [Vat. Alex. FA omit: Harum]): It further occurs in a list of the families of priests "who went up with Zerubbabel and Jeshua," and of those who were their descendants in the next generation — in the days of Joakim the son of Josha (Neh. xii. 15). In the former list (xii. 3) the name is changed to Rehum (וֹרְמָה to יְרָמָה) by a not unfrequent transposition of letters. [Hebux.]

4. [Harp: ex. Ezr. ii. 32. Rom. "Haraz: Neh. x. 27, Abd. Alex. Peonua: Harim, Heron, Heruen, Heruron.]: Another family of Bene-Harim [sons of H], three hundred and twenty in number, came from the Captivity in the same caravan (Ezr. ii. 32; Neh. vii. 55). These were harime, and seem to have taken their name from a place, at least the contiguous names in the list are certainly those of places. These also appear among those who had married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 31), as well as those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 27). [Eanes].

hundred and twelve of the Bene-Chariph [sons of C.] returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 24). The name occurs again among the "heads of the people" that sealed the covenant (x. 19 [20 in Hebr.]). In the lists of Ezra and Esdras, Hariph appears as Jorah [Jorah] and Azemphthi respectively. An almost identical name, Haraph [חַרָפ], a plucking off, appears in the lists of Judah [1 Chr. ii. 51] as the father of Bethgader [comp. Haraphthi].

HARLOT (הִרְוֹת, often with הָרְזִרות הָרְזִרות הָרְזִרות), That this condition of persons existed in the earliest states of society is clear from Gen. xxxviii. 15. So Rahab [Josh. ii. 1], who is said by the Chaldean paraph. (ad loc.), to have been an innkeeper, but if there were such persons, considering what we know of Canaanitish morals (Lev. xviii. 27), we may conclude that they would, if women, have been of this class. The law forbids (xix. 29) the father's compelling his daughter to sin, but does not mention it as a voluntary mode of life on her part without his complicity. It could indeed hardly be so. The isolated act which is the subject of Deut. xxiii. 28, 29, is not to the purpose. Male relatives were probably allowed a practically unlimited discretion in punishing family dishonor incurred by their women's unchastity (Gen. xxxviii. 24). The provision of Lev. xxi. 9, regarding the priest's daughter, may have arisen from the fact of his home being less guarantied owing to his absence when ministering, as well as from the scandal to sanctity so involved. Perhaps such abominations might, if not thus severely marked, lead the way to the excesses of Gentile ritualistic fornication, to which indeed, when so near the sanctuary, they might be viewed as approximating (Michaelis, Lores f. Mosae, art. 268). Yet it seems to be assumed that the harlot class would exist, and the prohibition of Deut. xxiii. 18, forbidding offerings from the wages of such sin, is perhaps due to the contagion of heathen example, in whose worship practices abounded which the Israelites were taught to abhor. The term הָרְזָר [meaning properly "consecrated"] points to one description of persons, and הָרְזֵר ["strange woman"] to another, of which this class mostly consisted. The first term refers to the impure worship of the Syrian d Astarte (Num. xxv. 1; comp. Herod. i. 199; Justin, xvi. 5; Strabo, viii. p. 378, xii. p. 559; Val. Max. ii. 15; August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 4), whose votaries, as bolgry progressed, would be recruited from the daughters of Israel; hence the common mention of both these sins in the Prophets, the one indeed being a metaphor of the other (Is. i. 18; Jer. ii. 20; comp. Ex. xxiv. 15, 16; Jer. iii. 1, 2; Ecclus. xii. 6; Ez. xxi. 3); Hos. i. 2, ii. 4, 5, iv. 11, 13, 14, 15, v. 3). The latter class would grow up with the growth of great cities and of foreign intercourse.

HAROD, THE WELL OF 1008

and hardly could enter into the view of the Mosaic institutes. As regards the fashions involved in the practice, similar outward marks seem to have attended its earliest forms to those which we trace in the classical writers, e. g. a distinctive dress and a seat by the way-side (Gen. xxxviii. 14; comp. Ez. xvi. 16, 25; Bar. vi. 43 [or Epist. of Jer. 43]; Petron. Arb. Sat. xvi.; Juv. vi. 118 foll.; Doutouz Amulet. Sacro. Exc. xxiv.). Public singing in the streets occurs also (Is. xxii. 16; Eccles. ix. 4). Those who thus published their infamy were of the worst repute, others had houses of resort, and both classes seem to have been known among the Jews (Prov. vii. 8-12, xxiii. 25; Eccles. ix. 7, 8); the two women, 1 K. iii. 16, lived as Greek hetarces sometimes did, in a house together (Dict. Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. v. Hetero). The baneful fascination ascribed to them in Prov. vii. 21-25 may be compared with what Chardin says of similar effects among the young nobility of Persia (Voyages en Perse, i. 163, ed. 1711), as also may Luke xv. 30, for the sums lavished on them (l. b. 162). In earlier times the price of a kid is mentioned (Gen. xxxviii.), and great wealth doubtless sometimes accrued to them (Ex. xvi. 3, 39, xxiii. 20). But lust, as distinct from gain, appears as the inducement in Prov. vii. 14, 15 (see Doutouz. Amulet. Sacro. ad loc.), where the victim is further allured by a promised sacrificial banquet (comp. Ter. Eun. iii. 3). The "harlots" are classed with "publicans," as those who lay under the ban of society in the N. T. (Matt. xxii. 32). No doubt they multiplied with the increase of polygamy, and consequently lowered the estimate of marriage. The corrupt practices imported by Gentile converts into the Church occasion most of the other passages in which allusions to the subject there occur, 1 Cor. v. 1, 9, 11; 2 Cor. xii. 21; 1 Thess. iv. 3; 1 Tim. i. 10. The decree, Acts xv. 29, has occasioned doubts as to the meaning of πορνεία there, chiefly from its context, which may be seen discussed at length in Deyling's Obscr. Sacr. ii. 470, foll.; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. i. 488; Spencer and Hammond, ad loc. The simplest sense however seems the most probable. The children of such persons were held in contempt, and could not exercise privileges nor inherit (John viii. 41; Deut. xiii. 1; Judg. i. 1, 2). On the general subject Michaelis, Lores f. Mosae, bk. v. art. 268; Selden, de Us. Heb. i. 16, iii. 12, and de Jur. Natur. v. 4, together with Schoettgen, and the authorities there quoted, may be consulted.

The words הַרְזָר הַרְזָר הַרְזָר א. V. "and they washed his armor" (1 K. xii. 38) should be "and the harlots washed," which is not only the natural rendering, but in accordance with the LXX. and Josephus.

spring of Charod [i. e. of trembling], ḫârâd, [Hârâd, Alex. ἄραδ, Ax. ἄραδα], a spring by (חָרַד) which Gideon and his great army encamped on the morning of the day which ended in the rout of the Midianites (Judg. xil. 1), and where the trial of the people by their mode of drinking apparently took place. The word, slightly altered, recurs in the proclamation to the host: “Whosoever is fearful and trembling (חָרַד), charred) let him return” (ver. 3): it is impossible to decide whether the name Charod was, as Prof. Stanley proposes, bestowed on account of the trembling, or whether the mention of the trembling was suggested by the previously existing name of the fountain: either would suit the paronomastic vein in which these ancient records so delight. The word charred (A. V. “was afraid”) recurs in the description of another event which took place in this neighborhood, possibly at this very site—Samuel’s last encounter with the Philistines—when he was afraid, and his heart trembled greatly,” at the sight of their fierce hosts (1 Sam. xxviii. 5). The ‘Ain Jalâl, with which Prof. Stanley would identify Harod (S. q. P.), is very suitable to the circumstances, as being at present the largest spring in the neighborhood, and as forming a pool of considerable size at which great numbers might drink (Rob. ii. 324). But if at that time so copious, would it not have been seized by the Midianites before Gideon’s arrival? However, if the ‘Ain Jalâl be not this spring, we are very much in the dark, since the “hill of Moreh,” the only landmark afforded us (vii. 1), has not been recognized. The only hill of Moreh of which we have any certain knowledge was by Shechem, 25 miles to the south. If ‘Ain Jalâl be Harod, then Jael’s duty must be Moreh.

It is quite possible that the name Jalâl is a corruption of Harod. In that case it is a good example of the manner in which local names acquire a new meaning in passing from one language to another. Harod itself probably underwent a similar process after the arrival of the Hebrews in Canaan, and the paronomastic turn given to Gideon’s speech, as above, may be an indication of the change.

HARODITE, THE (חָרַד, [patronym. see below]): δ Ψωδαίους: Alex. o Ψωδαίους, Π[Ἀρωδιόν]: de Harodii, the designation of two of the thirty-seven warriors of David’s guard, SHAMMAH and ELKA (2 Sam. xxviii. 29), doubtless derived from a place named Harod, which just spoken of or some other. In the parallel passage of Chronicles by a change of letter the name appears as HAMORITE.

HAROFEH (חָרֹף, i. e. ha-Roch = the see: ‘Aroq [Vat. corrig.], a name occurring in the genealogical lists of Judah as one of the sons of “Shelah, father of Kirjath-jearim” (1 Chr. ii. 52). The Vulg. translates this and the following words, ‘qui violent dimidium requiptionem.’ A somewhat similar name—REAIM— is given in v. 2 as the son of Shelah, but there is nothing to establish the identity of the two.

HARORITE, THE (חָרֹר), [see Harodite]: δ Ψωδαίππι: [Vat. FA. Ψαδαίοι}: Alex. J̄: the title given to SHAMMUTI, Ε: of the warriors of David’s guard (1 Chr. xi. 27).

We have here an example of the minute discrepancies which exist between these two parallel lists. In this case it appears to have arisen from an exchange of Ψ, D, for Ψ, R, and that at a very early date, since the LXX. is in agreement with the present Hebrew text. But there are other differences, for which see SHAMMAH.

HAROSETH (חָרֹס, Charasheth [working in wood, stone, etc., Ge.; or city of crafts, of artificial wood, First]: ‘Aroseti; [Vat. Aroseth; Alex. Arosethi, in ver. 10, Aroseth]: Haroseth, or rather “Harosheth of the Gentiles,” as it was called (probably for the same reason that Gideon was afterwards, from the mixed races that inhabited it, a city in the north of the land of Canaan, supposed to have stood on the west coast of the lake Merom (cf. Hâlûkî), from which the Jordan issues forth in one unbroken stream, and in the portion of the tribe of Naphtali. It was the residence of Sisa, captain of Judah, king of Canaan (Judg. iv. 2), whose capital, Hazor, one of the fenced cities assigned to the children of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36), lay to the northwest of it; and it was the point to which the victorious Israelites under Barak pursued the discomfited host and chariots of the second potentate of that name (Judg. iv. 14). Herein the paronomastic usage with which the conquered Canaanites, the name of Sisa, became afterwards a family name (Ezr. ii. 53). Neither is it irrelevant to allude to this coincidence in connection with the moral effects of this decisive victory; for Hazor, once “the head of all those kingdoms” (Josh. xii. 16), had been taken and burnt by Joshua; its king, Jabin 1, put to the sword; and the whole conflagration of the Canaanites of the north broken and slaughtered in the celebrated battle of the waters of Merom (Josh. xi. 5–14)—the first time that “chariots and horses” appear in array against the invading host, and are so summarily disposed of, according to Divine command, under Joshua; but which subsequently the children of Joseph feared to face in the valley of Jezreel (Josh. xvi. 16–18); and which Judah actually failed before the Philistine plain (Judg. i. 19). Herein was the great difficulty of subduing plains, similar to that of the Jordan, beside which Harosheth stood. It was not till the Israelites had asked for and obtained a king, that they began “to multiply chariots and horses” to themselves, contrary to the express words of the law (Deut. xviii. 16), as it were to fight the enemy with his own weapons. (The first instance occurs 2 Sam. viii. 4, comp. 1 Chr. xv. 4; next in the history of Abinadab, 2 Sam. xxv. 1, and of Adoni- jah, 1 K. i. 5; while the climax was reached under Solomon, 1 K. iv. 26.) And then it was that their decadence set in! They were strong in faith when they immured the horses and burned the chariots with fire of the kings of Hazor, of Madon, of Shimron, and of Aschashaf (Josh. xii. 1). And yet so rapidly did they decline when their pillars were burnt, what more, that the city of Hazor had risen from its ruins; and in contrast to the kings of Mesopotamia and of Moab (Judg. iii.), who were both of them foreign potentates, another Jabin, the territory of whose ancestors had been assigned to the tribe of Naphtali, claimed the disposition of being the first to revolt against and shake off the dominion of Israel in his newly acquired inheritance. But the victory won by Deborah and Barak was well worthy of the song of triumph which it inspired (Judg. v.), and of the proverbial celebrity which ever afterwards attached to it (Ps. lxxxii. 9, 10). The whole territory was gradually won back, to be held permanently, as it would seem (Judg. iv. 24); at all events we hear nothing more of Hazor, Harosheth, or the Canaanites of the north, in the succeeding wars.

The site of Harosheth does not appear to have been identified by any modern traveller.

E. S. F.

* Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 143) supposes Harosheth to be the high Tell called Harottieh, near the base of Carmel, where the Kishon flows along toward the sea. "I have no doubt," he says, "of this identification." A castle there would guard the pass along the Kishon into the plain of Esdraelon, and the ruins still found on this "enormous double mound" show that a strong fortress must have stood here in former times. A village of the same name occurs higher up on the other side of the river, and hence somewhat nearer the scene of the Deborah-Barak battle. This writer says that Harottieh is the Arabic form of the Hebrew Harosheth, and (according to his view of the direction of the flight) lies directly in the way of the retreat of Sisera's forces. It is about eight miles from Megiddo, and in the neighborhood of Acecho (Akko), and hence exactly in the region where the Gentile "nations," to which Harosheth belonged, still dwelt and were powerful; for we learn from Judg. i. 37 that the Hebrews had been unable to drive them out from that part of the country.

En-dor is mentioned (Ps. lxxxii. 10) as a place of slaughter on this occasion. Hence, Stanley, in his graphic sketch (Jewish Church, i. 350), represents the Canaanites as escaping in the opposite direction, through the eastern branch of the plain, and thence onward to Harosheth, supposed by him to be among the northern hills of Galilee. En-dor was not far from Tabor (the modern village is distinctly visible from its top), and in that passage of the Psalms it may be named as a vague designation of the battle-field, while possibly those who "perished at En-dor" were some of the fugitives driven in that direction, about whose destruction there was something remarkable, as known by some tradition not otherwise preserved.

HARP (חֵינָוֶר, Kinnor), in Greek κινύρα or κινύρα, from the Hebrew word, the sound of which corresponds with the thing signified, like the German kwerran, "to produce a shrill tone" (Liddell and Scott). Lassen inclines to the opinion that חֵינָוֶר is derived from קְנָו, "an unusual onomatopoeic root, which means to give forth a tumultuous and strident sound, like that of a string when touched." The Kinnor was the national instrument of the Hebrews, and was well known throughout Asia. There can be little doubt that it was the earliest instrument with which man was acquainted, as the writer of the Pentateuch assigns its invention, together with that of theorgan, to the antediluvian period (Gen. iv. 21). Dr. Kalisch (Hist. and Crit. Com. on the Old Test. considers Kinnor to stand for the whole class of stringed instruments (Nepholoth), as עָנָב, says he, "is the type of all wind instruments." Writers who connect the κινύρα with κινύρα (vailing), conjecture that this instrument was only employed by the Greeks on occasions of sorrow and distress. If this were the case with the Greeks it was far different with the Hebrews, amongst whom the kinnor served as an accompaniment to songs of cheerfulness and mirth as well as of praise and thanksgiving to the Supreme Being (Gen. xxxi. 27; I Sam. xvi. 23; 2 Chr xx. 28; Ps lxxxiii. 2), and was very rarely used, if ever, in times of private or national affliction. The Jewish bard finds no employment for the kinnor during the Babylonian Captivity, but describes it as put aside or suspended on the willows (Ps. cxxxvii. 2); and in like manner Job's harp "is changed into mourning" (xxx. 31), whilst the hand of grief pressed heavily upon him. The passage "my bowels shall sound like a harp for Moab" (Is. xvi. 11) has impressed some Biblical critics with the idea that the kinnor had a lugubrious sound; but this is an error, since יָנָמ refers to the vibration of the chords and not to the sound of the instrument (Gesen. and Hitzig, in Comment.).

Touching the shape of the kinnor a great difference of opinion prevails. The author of Shilte Haggielborin describes it as resembling the modern harp; Pfeiffer gives it the form of a guitar; and St. Jerome declares it to have resembled in shape the Greek letter delta; and this last view is supported by Hieronymus, quoted by Joel Bell in the preface to Mendelssohn's Psalms. Josephus records (Antiq. vii. 12, § 3) that the kinnor had ten strings, and that it was played on with the plectrum; others assign to it twenty-four, and in the Shilte Haggibborim it is said to have had forty-seven. Josephus's statement, however, ought not to be received as conclusive, as it is in open contradiction to what is set forth in the 1st book of Samuel (xvi. 23, xviii. 10), that David played on the kinnor with his hand. As it is reasonable to suppose that there was a smaller and a larger kinnor, inasmuch as it was sometimes played by the Israelites whilst walking (1 Sam. x. 5), the opinion of Munk — "on jouint peut-être des deux manières, suivant les dimensions de l'instrument" — is well entitled to consideration. The Talmud (Moss. Bereith) has preserved a curious tradition to the effect that over the bed of David, facing the north, a kinnor was suspended, and that when at midnight the north wind touched the cords they vibrated and produced musical sounds.

The שמעון "harp on the Sheminith" (1 Chr. xv. 21) — was so called from its eight strings. Many learned writers, including the author of Shilte Haggibborim, identify the word "Sheminith" with the octave; but it would indeed be rash to conclude that the ancient Hebrews understood the octave in the sense in which it is employed in modern times. "[Sheminith]. The skill of the Jews on the kinnor appears to have reached its highest point of perfection in the age of David, the effect of whose performances, as well as of those by the members of the "Schools of the Prophets," are described as truly marvellous (comp. 1 Sam. x. 5, xvi. 23, and xix. 20)."

HARROW. The word so rendered 2 Sam. xiii. 1, 1 Chr. xx. 3 (ךִּבָּקוּנַי) is probably a threshing-machine, the verb rendered "to harrow" (ךִּבָּקוּנַי), is xxviii. 24; Job xxix. 10; Hos. x. 11, expresses apparently the breaking of the clods, and is so far analogous to our harrowing, but whether done by any such machine as we call "a harrow," is very doubtful. In modern Palestine, oxen are sometimes turned in to trample the clods, and in some parts of Asia a lash of thorns is dragged over the surface, but all these processes, if used, occur (not after, but) before the seed is committed to the soil. [See Agriculture.] 1 H. H.

HAR'SHA (שָׁרָשָׁה) [deaf]. Ges. 6th Aufl.; see Fürst]: 'Apsadi (אָפָסָדִי in Ezr., Vat. Apoc.: Apsadi) [Harsel]. Bene-colosha [sons of C.] were among the families of Nethinim who came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54). In the parallel list in Esdras the name is Charesa.

HART (שָׁרְשָׁה: אָפָסָדִי: כִּבָּקָשׁ). The hart is reckoned among the clean animals (Deut. xii. 15, xiv. 5, xv. 22), and seems, from the passages quoted as well as from 1 K. iv. 24, to have been commonly killed for food. Its activity furnishes an apt comparison in Is. xxxv. 6, though in this respect the hind was more commonly selected by the sacred writers. In Ps. xiii. 1 the feminine termination of the verb renders an exclamation necessary: we must therefore substitute the hind; and again in Lam. i. 6 the true reading is נָאָשְׁה, "a ram" (as given in the LXX. and Vulg.). The proper name Ajabon is derived from agyal, and implies that harts were numerous in the neighborhood.

W. L. B.

The Heb. masc. noun agyal (גַּל), which is always rendered אָפָסָדִי by the LXX., denotes, there can be no doubt, some species of Cervus (deer tribe), either the Dama vulgaris, fallow-deer, or the Cervus Barbatus, the Barbary deer, the southern representative of the European stag (C. elaphus), which occurs in Tunis and the coast of Barbary. We have, however, no evidence to show that the Barbary deer ever inhabited Palestine, though there is no reason why it may not have done so in primitive times. Hasselquist (Trav.

to the times after the Captivity, while that in Chron-

"on this side."
ex. the wrong division of words:] Haschman, one of the chief ("heads") of the people (i. e. the laymen) who sealed the covenant at the same time with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 25).

HASHABNI'AH (חַשָּמְנִי) [whom Jehovah regarde]: [Aramaica: [Vat. Aa'ShBanev].] Alex. Aa'ShBanev; [FA. Aa'ShBanev]; Haschmon (1. Father of Hattush, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10). 2. [Haschmon]. A Levite who was among those who olicited at the great fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (Neh. ix. 5). This and several other names are omitted in both MSS. of the LXX.

HASHBAD'AN (חַשֶּבָּן) [intelligence in judging, Gesen.]: [Aramaica: [Tat. FA.] omit; Alex. Aa'ShBanev; Haschmona], one of the men (probably Levites) who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the people in Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 4).

HAS'HEM (חַשֶּם) [perh. fuel, rich, Gesen.]: [Aramaica: [Vat. FA. corrupt: Assen]]. The sons of Hashem the Gizeonite are named amongst the members of David's guard in the catalogue of 1 Chr. (xi. 34). In the parallel list of 2 Sam. xxiii. we find "of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan." After a lengthened examination, Kennicott decides that the text of both passages originally stood "of the sons of Hashem, Guni" (Dissertation, pp. 198-203).

HASHMANIM (חַשֶּמְנִים) [πρόβατα, ζωο]: This word occurs only in the Hebrew of Ps. lxxviii. 31: "Hashmanim (A. V. "prince") shall come out of Egypt, Cush shall make her hands to hasten to God." In order to render this word "princes," or the like, modern Hebrewists have recourse to extremely improbable derivations from the Arabic. The old derivation from the civil name of Hermopolis Magna in the Heptanesia, preserved in the modern Arabic as ٌ،،،. "the two Ashmoons," seems to us more reasonable. The ancient Egyptian name is Ha-shmen or Ha-shmoon, the abode of eight: the sound of the signs for eight, however, we take alone from the Coptic, and Druschet reads them Sesiem (Geogr. Antiqu. i. pp. 219, 220), but not, as we think, on conclusive grounds. The Coptic form is سيم, "the two Shmoons," like the Arabic. If we suppose that Hashmanim is a proper name and signifies Hermopolis, the notion might be explained by the circumstance that Hermopolis Magna was the great city of the Egyptian Hermes, Thoth, the god of wisdom; and the meaning might therefore be that even the wisest Egyptians should come to the temple, as well as the distant Cushites. R. S. P.

HASHMON'AH (חַשֶּמְנָה) [fruitfulness]: Σαλαμώνα; Alex. Aa'Salma: Hermoana), a station of the Israelites, mentioned Num. xxxiii. 23, as next before Moereth, which, from xx. 28 and Deut. x. 5, was near Mount Hor; this tends to indicate the reality of Hashmonah.

HATACH (חַטַּכ) i. e. Chashub [associate, friend, or intelligent]: "Aisoab: Asub]. The re-duplication of the Sh has been overlooked in the A. V., and the name is identical with that elsewhere correctly given as Hasshur.

1. A son of Pahath-Moab who assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 23). 2. Another man who assisted in the same work, but at another part of the wall (Neh. iii. 11). 3. [Vat. FA. Aaseob]. The name is mentioned again among the heads of the "people" (that is the laymen) who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 25). It may belong to either of the foregoing names.

4. [Kem. omits; Vat. FA. Aa'Seob] A Merarite Levite (Neh. xii. 15). In 1 Chr. ix. 14, he appears again as Hasshur.

HAS'U'BANAH (חַשָּבָנָה) [uncovered, or asso- ciated]: [Aaseob; Alex. Aa'Seob: Hassoba], the first of a group of five men, apparently the latter half of the family of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 20). For a suggestion concerning these persons, see Hasadiah.

HAS'UM (חַשָּם) [rich, distinguished]: [Aa'Sum, Aa'Saum [etc.: Hassum, Hassom, Hassum]). 1. Bene-Chashum, two hundred and twenty-three in number, came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 19; Neh. vii. 22). Seven men of them had married foreign wives from whom they had to separate (Ezr. x. 33). The chief man of the family was among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 18). In 1 Esd. ix. 29, the man's name is Asum. 2. (Aa'Saum: [Vat. FA. omit: Asum]). The name occurs amongst the priests or Levites who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the congregation (Neh. viii. 4). In 1 Esd. ix. 44 the name is given corruptly as Lothisheus.

HAS'UPHA (חַשֶּפָה) [uncovered]: [AasepH: Alex. FA. AasefH: HasspH]). One of the families of Nethinim who returned from captivity in the first caravan (Neh. vii. 46). The name is accurately HasspH, as in Ezr. ii. 43. [AasmineH.]

HAS'RAH (חַשָּרָה) [perh. splendor, First]: [AapH: Alex. XeLaPhH: AesepH: Hotse]. The form in which the name Hassrah is given in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22 (comp. 2 K. xxi. 14).

HAS'SENA'AH (חַשֶּסְנָה) [the thorn-hedge, First]: [Aa'saH: Alex. AaseH: FA. AaseaH: AssaH]. The Bene-hassenaah [sons of Hassenaah] rebuilt the fish-gate in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 5). The name is doubtless that of the place mentioned in Ezr. ii. 35, and Neh. vii. 38 — NasaH, with the addition of the definite article. Perhaps it has some connection with the rock or cliff Nessah (1 Num. iv. 4).

HAS'SHUB (חַשֶּב) [intelligent, knowing, Gesen.]: [Aa'sob: Hassub], a Merarite Levite (1 Chr. ix. 14). He appears to be mentioned again in Neh. xi. 15, in what may be a repetition of the same genealogy; but here the A. V. have given the name as Hasshur.

HAS'UPHA (חַשֶּפָה) [uncovered, naked]: [AasofH: Alex. FA. AasepH: HasspH]. Bene Chashapha [sons of (s)] were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 43). In Nehemiah the name is inaccurately given in the A. V. as in the Genevan version] with FA.1, Αχαράδζιος; Comp. 'Ab'Ah'iz] Ahathach), one of the eunuchs (A. V., "chamberlains") in the court of Ahaseurus, in immediate attendance on Esther (Esth. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10). The LXX. alter ver. 5 to τῶν εὐνοῦχων αὐτῆς.

HASSUPHA: in Ezdras it is AasmineH.

HATACH (חַטַּכ) [Pers. cunnah, Gesen.]: [Aa'spH.]. Alex. [ver. 5]: Aa'spH-5 [ver. 9].
HATHATH

HATHATH (Ἁθαθ) [fearful]: 'Ab'di: Hathath, a man in the genealogy of Judah; one of the sons of Othniel the Kenazite, the well-known judge of Israel (1 Chr. iv. 13).

HATTIPHA (Ἡττίφα) [seized, captive]: 'Ατουφά, 'Ατιφά: [in Exzr. Alex. 'Ατουφα: Hatiopa], Bene-Chatitha [sons of C.] were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 54; Neh. xii. 36). [Ἀτίφα.]

HATTITA (Ἡττίτα) [diggings, exploring]: 'Ατίτα: [in Exzr. Aptippa: in Neh., Vat. FA. ˂Ατιτα: Hattito], Bene-Chatitha [sons of C.] were among the "porters" or "children of the porters" (ὕποπόστατοι, i.e. the gate-keepers), a division of the Levites who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). In Edras the name is abbreviated to ΤΕΤΑ.

HATTIL (Ἡττίλ) [woining, or deceiving]: 'Ατίλ, 'Ετίπα: Alex. 'Ατιλα, ['Ετίπα: in Exzr., Vat. Ατιβα: Hattil], Bene-Chatitha [sons of C.] were among the "children of Solomon's slaves" who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 57; Neh. vii. 50). [HAGIA.]

HATTUSH (Ḵattûš) [prob. assembled, Ges.: contendor, Fürst]: Χαττουσ, Χαττους, [etc.]: Hattus: 1. A descendant of the kings of Hittah, apparently one of the "sons of Shechemah" (1 Chr. iii. 22), in the fourth or fifth generation from Zerubbabel. A person of the same name, expressly specified as one of the "sons of David of the sons of Shechemah," accompanied Ezra on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 2), while Zerubbabel himself had also come only seventy or eighty years before (Ezr. ii. 1, 2). Indeed, in another statement Hattush is said to have actually returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 2). At any rate he took part in the sealing of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. xiv. 2). To obviate the discrepancy between these last-mentioned statements and the interval between Hattush and Zerubbabel in 1 Chr. iii., Lord A. Hervey proposes to read the genealogy in that chapter as if he were the nephew of Zerubbabel, Shemnah in ver. 22 being taken as identical with Shinem in ver. 19. For these proposals the reader is referred to Lord Hervey's Genealogies, pp. 103, 307, 322, &c. [LETTUS: Shinem, Vat. II., ii. 2. (Christōn) [Vat. FA. Χριτόμει: Alex. Χριτός: Comp. Χριτόν.] Son of Hashalhah: one of those who assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

HAU'RUN (Ḫawrûn) [see infra]: Al'wānīs:

Auran: Arab. خوران, a province of Palestine twice mentioned by Ezekiel in defining the north-eastern border of the Promised Land (xlvi. 16, 18). Had we no other data for determining its situation we should conclude from his words that it lay north of Damascus. There can be little doubt, however, that it is identical with the well-known Greek prov-

name is probably derived from the word "חֵוָל, Hār, "a hole or cave;" the region still abounds in caves which the old inhabitants excavated partly to serve as cisterns for the collection of water, and partly for granaries in which to secure their grain from plunderers. Josephus frequently mentions Aramits in connection with Trachonitis, Batanea, and Gaulanitis, which with it constituted the ancient kingdom of Bashan (R. J. i. 20, § 1; ii. 17, § 4). It formed part of that Ῥαχανίτων ἄφοι referred to by Luke (iii. 1) as subject to Philip the tetrarch (comp. Joseph Ant. xvii. 11, § 4). It is bounded on the west by Gaulanitis, on the north by the wild and rocky district of Trachonitis, on the east by the mountainous region of Batanea, and on the south by the great plain of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21). The surface is perfectly flat and the soil is among the richest in Syria. Not a stone is to be seen save on the few low volcanic tells that rise up here and there, like islands in a sea. It contains upwards of a hundred towns and villages, most of them now deserted, though not ruined. The buildings in many of these are remarkable, the walls are of great thickness, and the roofs and doors are of stone, evidently of remote antiquity (see Porter's Five Years in Damascus, vol. ii. [also his Giant Cities of Bashan, together with his Description of the Trachons and the Trachonites, (London, 1861)]. Some Arab geographers have described the Ḥawran as much more extensive than here stated (Bohard. Taf. Sal., ed. Schult. p. 70; Abulfed. Taf. Syl. s. v.); and at the present day the name is applied by those at a distance to the whole country east of Judah; but the inhabitants themselves define it as above.

* HAVENS, FAIR. [FAIR HAVENS.]

HAVILAH (Ḫavīlāh) [circle, district, Fürst]: Eōlād, Eōlād: Havelah. 1. A son of Cush (Gen x. 7); and —

2. A son of Joktan (x. 29). Various theories have been advanced respecting these obscure peoples. It appears to be most probable that both stocks settled in the same country, and there intermarried; thus receiving one name, and forming one race, with a common descent. It is immaterial to the argument to decide whether in such instances the name of the new immigrants took the name of the older settlers. In the case of Havilah, it seems that the Cushite people of this name formed the westernmost colony of Cush along the south of Arabia, and that the Joktanites were an earlier colonization. It is commonly thought that the district of Ḥāwīlān (خواران), in the Yemen, preserves the trace of this ancient people; and the similarity of name (being interchangeable with Ḥ, and the termination being redundant), and the group of Joktanite names in the Yemen, render the identification probable. Niebuhr states that there are two Khāwīlāns (Descr. 270, 280), and it has hence been argued by some that we have thus the Cushite and the Joktanite Havilah. The second Khāwīlān, however, is a town, and not a large and well-known district like the first, or more northern one; and the hypothesis based on Niebuhr's assertion is unnecessary, if the theory of a double settlement be Havilah and Toioi in or ever and our eastern preservation both between Kalkan and Kalkan may be neglected, both being descendants of the first Joktanite settler, and the whole of these early traditions pointing to a Joktanite settlement, without perhaps a distinct preservation of Joktan's name, and certainly none of a correct genealogy from him downwards.

Kalkan is a fertile territory, embracing a large part of myrrhiferous Ararita: mountainous: with plenty of water: and supporting a large population. It is a tract of Arabia better known to both Arabs and moderns than the rest of the Yemen, and the eastern and central provinces. It adjoins Nejran (the district and town of that name), mentioned in the account of the expedition of Elijah Gallos, and the scene of great persecutions of the Christians by Dina-Nuweis, the last of the Tubalians before the Abyssinian conquest of Arabia, in the year 523 of our era (Bossuin, Essai, i. 121 22). For the Chaunatius, see the Dictionary of Geography.

An argument against the identity of Kalkan and Havilah has been found in the mentions of a Havilah on the border of the Ishmaelites, as "than goest to Assyria" (Gen. xxviii, 18), and also on that of the Amelekites (1 Sam. xv. 7). It is not however necessary that these passages should refer to 1 or 2: the place named may be a town or country called after them; or it may have some reference to the Havilah named in the description of the rivers of the garden of Eden; and the LXX. render it, following apparently the last supposition, Εἰδαρ in both instances, according to their spelling of the Havilah of Gen. ii. 11.

These who separate the Cushite and Joktanite Havilah either place them in Neibahr's two Kalkans (as already stated), or place them on the north of the peninsula, following the supposed argument derived from Gen. xxxviii, 18 and 1 Sam. xv. 7, and finding the name in that of the Χαβοῦχα (Eratost. op. Strabo. xvi. 767), between the Nabatai and the Agrai, and in that of the town of Ḥambil on the Persian Gulf (Nicholl, Decr. 342). A Joktanite settlement so far north is however improbable. They discover 1 in the Avaliah on the Arabian coast (Ptol. iv. 7, Arrian. iv. 263, ed. Müller), the modern name of the shore of the Sinus Avalies being, says Gesenius, Zevlah = Zuwelah = Havilah, and Sadding having three times in Gen. written Zevah for Havilah. But Gesenius seems to have overlooked the true orthography of the name of the modern country, which is not זוֹעֵל, but זוֹעָל, with a final letter very rarely added to the Hebrew.

Hawk (חַוֹּלות, mts: מַעֲטַר; occipiter), the translation of the above named Heb. term, which occurs in Lev. xi. 16 and Lev. xix. 15 as one of the unclean birds, and in Job xxxix. 26, where it is asked, "Both the mts fly by thy wisdom and stretch her wings towards the south?" The word is doubtless generic, as appears from the expression in Deut. and Lev. e. after his kind," and includes various species of the Falco family, with more especial allusion perhaps to the small diurnal birds, such as the kestrel (Falco tinnunculus), the harrier (Falco subbuteo), the gregarious lesser kestrel (Tinunculus minor), common about the ruins in the plain districts of Palestine, all of which were probably known to the ancient Hebrews. With respect to the passage in Job (l. c.), which appears to allude to the migratory habits of hawks, it is curious to observe that of the ten or twelve lesser raptors of Palestine, nearly all are summer migrants. The kestrel remains all the year, but T. cenchroides, Micrionia galara, Hupp elomone, and F. nebogloceros, are all migrants from the south. Besides the above-named smaller hawks, the two magnificent species, F. Saker and F. lnannaris, are summer visitors to Palestine. "On one occasion," says Mr. Tristram, to whom we are indebted for much information on the subject of the birds of Palestine, "while riding with an Arab guide I observed a falcon of large size rise close to us. The guide, when I pointed it out to him, exclaimed, 'Tahir Sop';* 'Tahir, the Arabic for 'bird,' is universally throughout N. Africa and the East applied to those falcons which are capable of being trained for hunting, i.e. the bird, par excellence.' These two species of falcons, and perhaps the hobby and goshawk (Astur palmararius) are employed by the Arabs in Syria and Palestine for the purpose of taking partridges, sand-grouse, quails, herons, gazelles, hares, etc. Dr. Russell (Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, ii. p. 196, 2d ed.) has given the Arabic names of several falcons, but it is probable that some at least of these names apply rather to the different sexes than to distinct species. See a very graphic description of the sport of falconry, as pursued by the Arabs of N. Africa, in the Bous, i. p. 284: and comp. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 208 (i. 369-311, Am. ed.).

Whether falconry was pursued by the ancient Orientals or not, is a question we have been unable to determine decisively. No representation of such a sport occurs on the monuments of ancient Egypt (see Wilkinson, Am. Eqy. i. p. 321), neither is there any definite allusion to falconry in the Bible. With regard, however, to the negative evidence supplied by the monuments of Egypt, we must be careful ere we draw a conclusion; for the camel is not represented, though we have Biblical evidence to show that this animal was used by the Egyptians as early as the time of Abraham; still, as instances of various modes of capturing fish, game, and wild animals, are not unfrequent on the monuments, it seems probable the art was not known to the Egyptians. Nothing definite can be learnt from the passage in 1 Sam. xxvii. 20, which speaks of "a partridge hunted on the mountains," as this may allude to the method of taking these birds by "throw-sticks," etc. [PATERIDGE.] The hind or "fainting after the water-brooks" (Ps. xliii. 1) may appear at first sight to refer to the mode at present adopted in the East of taking gazelles, deer, and bustards, with the united aid of falcon and greyhound; but, as Hengstenberg (Conscient. on Ps. i. c.) has argued, it seems pretty clear that the expression spoken of is to be understood as arising not from pursuit, but from some prevailing drought, as in Ps. lxiii. 1, "My soul thirsteth for thee in a dry land." (See also Joel i. 20.) The poetical version of Brady and Tate—

"As pants the hart for cooling streams
When heated in the chase," has therefore somewhat prejudged the matter. For the question as to whether falconry was known to the ancient Greeks, see Beckmann, History of Inventions (i. 198-205, Bohn's ed.).

HAY (ןג"l,SHORT: gn in T. נדקת, פשת, הבד, the rendering of the A. V. in Prov. xxvii. 25, and Is. xvi. 6, of the above-named Heb. term, which occurs frequently in the O. T., and denotes "grass" of any kind, from an unused root, "to be green." [Grass.] In Num. xi. 5. this word is properly translated "leeks." [Leek.] Harmer (Observat. i. 423, ed. 1797), quoting from a MS. paper of Sir J. Chardin, states that hay is not made anywhere in the East, and that the fenian of the Vehe, (alba loca) and the "hay" of the A. V. are therefore errors of translation. It is quite probable that the modern Orientals do not make hay in our sense of the term; but it is certain that the ancients did mow their grass, and probably made use of the dry material. See Ps. xxxvii. 2. "They shall soon be cut down (nFmn, נדקת), and wither as the green herb;" Ps. lxxii. 6. "Like rain upon the meadow grass" (22). See also Am. vii. 1, "The king's mowings" (11 נדקת יד, נדקת), and Ps. cxxix. 7, where of the "grass upon the housetops" (Poa annua?) it is said that "the mower (ןדקת) filletth not his hand" with it, "nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." We do not see, therefore, with the author of Fragments in Continuation of Colinet (No. clxxiii.), any grass impropeity in our version of Prov. xxvii. 25, or in that of Is. xv. 6. A "Certainly," says this writer, "if the tender grass is but just beginning to show itself, the hay, which is grass cut and dried after it has arrived at maturity, ought by no means to be associated with it, still less ought it to be placed before it." But where is the impropeity? The tender grass (ןג"l) may refer to the springing after-grass.

a The word Sop', ינכ"l, is the name of all the raptores, of the falcons, hawks, and kites. G. B. P.

b "The hay appeareth, and the tender grass sheweth itself, and heret of the untains are gathered."
HAZÆL (םַחֵאֵל) [El (God) is seeing, First, Gen.]: 'Αχάη: Hazael was a king of Damascas, who reigned from about B.C. 866 to B.C. 849. He appears to have been previously a person in a high position at the court of Ben-hadad, and was sent by his master to Elisha, when that prophet visited Damascas, to inquire if he would recover from the malady under which he was suffering. Elisha's answer that Ben-hadad might recover, but would die, and his announcement to Hazael that he would one day be king of Syria, which seems to have been the fulfilment of the commission given to Elijah (1 K. xix. 15) to appoint Hazael king—led to the murder of Ben-hadad by his ambitious servant, who forthwith mounted the throne (2 K. viii. 7-15). He was soon engaged in hostilities with Alazoniah king of Judah, and Jehoram king of Israel, for the possession of the city of Ramoth-Gilead (ibid. viii. 24). The Assyrian inscriptions show that about this time a bloody and destructive war was being waged between the Assyrians on the one side, and the Syrians, Hititites, Hamathites, and the Phœnicians on the other. [See DAMASCUS.]

Ben-hadad had recently suffered several severe defeats at the hands of the Assyrians; and upon the accession of Hazael the war was speedily renewed. Hazael took up a position in the face of the hostilities of the Anti-Libanus, but was there attacked by the Assyrians, who defeated him with great loss, killing 16,000 of his warriors, and capturing more than 1100 chariots. Three years later the Assyrians once more entered Syria in force; but on this occasion Hazael submitted and helped to furnish the invaders with supplies. After this, internal troubles appear to have occupied the attention of the Assyrians, who made no more incursions into these parts for about a century. The Syrians rapidly recovered their losses; and towards the close of the reign of Jehu, Hazael led them against the Israelites (about B.C. 800), whom he 'smote in all their coasts' (2 K. x. 32), thus accomplishing the prophecy of Elisha (ibid. viii. 12). His main attack fell upon the eastern provinces, where he ravaged 'all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aror, which is by the river Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan' (ibid. x. 33). After this he seems to have held the kingdom of Israel in a semi-subjection (ibid. xiii. 3-7, and 22); and towards the close of his life he even threatened the kingdom of Judah. Having taken Gath (ibid. xii. 17; comp. Am. vi. 2), he proceeded to attack Jerusalem, defeated the Jews in an engagement (2 Chr. xxiv. 24), and was about to assault the city, when Joash induced him to retire by presenting him with 'all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and in the king's house' (2 K. xii. 18). Hazael appears to have died about the year B.C. 840 (ibid. xiii. 24), having reigned 46 years. He left his crown to his son Ben-hadad (ibid.).

The true import of Hazael's answer to the prophet on being informed of his future destiny (2 K. viii. 13), does not appear in the A.V.: 'What shall I say, that he should do this great thing?' This is the language of a proud and self-approving spirit, spurring on an undeserved imputation: 'Thy servant is not a dog that he should do this great thing.' It is obvious, moreover, that in this form the terms of the question are incongruous. If he had said, 'Is thy servant a dog, that he should do so base a thing, the question would have been consistent with itself. But the incongruity disappears, and the perniciousness of the illusion is obvious, when we render according to the Hebrew: 'What is thy servant, the dog, that he should do this great thing?' The use of the definite article in the Hebrew, as well as the congruity of the expression, requires this rendering.® [Dougb.] T. J. C.

HAZÆAEL, HOUSE OF (Am. i. 4), probably some well-known edifice or palace, which this king had built at Damascas, and which, according to the prophet, the fire (God's instrument of punishment) was destined to burn up. Some understood by 'the house' Damascas itself, and others Hazael's family or personal descendants. But the clause which follows—'the palaces of Ben-hadad'—as Baur (In V. Prophet Amos, p. 217) points out, favors the other explanation.

HAZÁTIAH [3 syll.] (חָצְטַיָה): Jehonah deco- rates or rivers; Oµäi: [Vat. FA. Oµäa: Hazin], a man of Judah of the family of the Shilonites A. V. 'Shikoni,' or descendants of Shelah (Neh. xi. 5).

HAZARMAVETH (חָצָר-מָכֵו; [in Gen.], [Hazav.]

Sapûdath: [Alex. 2 Anouadéth; in Chr. Rom. Vat. Onom. Alex. Anouadéth; Avondath; the court of death, Ges.), the third, in order of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 26). The name is preserved, almost literally, in the Arabic Hdrümâwâdâ (حدورمود) and Hdrumudâîdâ (حدورمودید) (Hazar-Ma'ud) and the appellation of a province and an ancient people of Southern Arabia. This identification of the settlement of Hazaraveth is accepted by Biblical scholars as not admitting of dispute. It rests not only on the occurrence of the name, but is supported by the proved fact that Joktan sojourned in the Yemen, along the south coast of Arabia, by the physical characteristics of the inhabitants of this region, and by the identification of the names of several others of the sons of Joktan. The province of Hadramaut is situate east of the modern Yemen (anciently, as shown in Arabia, the limits of the latter province embraced almost the whole of the south of the peninsula), extending to the districts of Shibir and Mahrah. Its capital is Shibam, a very ancient city, of which the native writers give curious accounts, and its chief ports are Mirbat, Zafari (Seihan), and Kishcem, from whence a great trade was carried on in ancient times with India and Africa. Hadramaut itself is generally cultivated, in contrast to the contiguous sandy desert (called El-Alknaf, where lived the gigantic race of 'A'd), is partly mountainous, with watered valleys, and was described in its frankincense (El Idreesee, ed. Jouard, i. p. 54; Niebuhr, Descr. p. 245), exporting also gum-arable, myrrh, dragon's blood, and aloes, the latter, however, being chiefly from Socotra, which is under the rule of the sheiky of Kesheem (Niebuhr, i. c. et seq.). The early kings of Hadramaut were Joktanites, distinct from the descendants of Yaaruh, the progenitor of the Joktanite Arabs generally; and it is hence to be inferred that they were separately descended from Hazaraveth. They maintained their independence against the powerful kings of Himyari, until the latter were subdued at the Abyssinian invasion (Ihu-Khalidoo, op. Causin, Essai, i. 135 ff.). The Greeks and Romans call the people of Hadramaut, variously, Chatrammit, Chatrammita, etc.; and there is little doubt that they were the same as the Adramite, etc. (the latter not applying to the descendant of Hadram, as some have supposed); while the native appellation of an inhabitant, Hadramee, comes very near Adramita in sound. The modern people, although mixed with other races, are strongly characterized by fierce, fanatic, and restless dispositions. They are enterprising merchants, well known for their trading and travelling propensities.

HAZ'AZON-T'AMAR, 2 Chr. xx. 2. [HAZAZON-TAMAR.]

HAZEL (נַז). The Hebrew term 'laz occurs only in Gen. xxx. 37, where it is coupled with the "poplar" and "chestnut," as one of the trees from which Jacob cut the rods, which he afterwards peed. Authorities are divided between the hazel and the almond-tree, as representing the 'laz; in favor of the former we have Kinachi, Rasibi, Luther, and others; while the Vulgate, Saxhins, and Genesius adopt the latter view. The rendering in the LXX, ἄσπερ, is equally applicable to either. We think the latter most probably correct, both because the Arabic word 'laz is undoubtedly the "almond-tree," and because there is another word in the Hebrew language, אַגּ֥ס (אַגִּ֫ס), which is applicable to the hazel. The strongest argument on the other side arises from the circumstance of another word, šâbâd (יָבָֹד), having reference to the almond: it is supposed, however, that the latter applies to the fruit exclusively, and the word under discussion to the tree: Rosemuller identifies the šâbâd with the cultivated, and 'laz with the wild almond-tree. For a description of the almond-tree, see the article on that subject. The Hebrew term appears as a proper name in Lux, the old appellation of Bethel.

HAZELLELPONI (הַזְּרֵלֵלְפַּנִּי; Εὐστελεβ-βωύ; Alex. Ευστελεβωύ; Aseltelpanhi), the sister of the sons of Etam in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). The name has the definite article prefixed, and is accurately "the Hazelponi," as of a family rather than an individual.

* That the name is genealogical rather than individual appears also from the appended הָזְרֵלֵלְפַּנִּי (see Ges. Lesegeb, der Hebr. Sprache, p. 514). It is variously explained: protection of the presence (Furst); or, shade coming upon me (Gen.). Ewald makes the former sense more expressive than the latter, because he sees in the name a symbol of that protection which was accorded to him by God (Lehrbuch, p. 509). This gives a different force to the ending. H.

HA'ZER (תָּזֵר; i. e. Chatzar, from 'laz, to surround or inclose), a word which is of not uncommon occurrence in the Bible in the sense of a "court" or quadrangle to a palace or other building, and which topographically seems generally employed for the "villages" of people in a roving and unsettled life, the semi-permanent collections of dwellings which are described by travellers among the modern Arabs to consist of rough stone walls covered with the tent cloths, and thus holding a middle position between the tent of the wanderer — so transitory as to furnish an image of the sudden termination of life (Is. xxxviii. 12) — and the settled, permanent, town.

As a proper name it appears in the A. V. —

1. In the plural, HAZERIM, and HAZEROTH, for which see below.

2. In the slightly different form of HAZOR.

3. In composition with other words, giving a special designation to the particular "village" intended. When thus in union with another word the name is Hazar (Chatzar). The following are the places so named, and it should not be overlooked that they are all in the wilderness itself, or else quite on the confines of civilized country: —

1. HAZAR-AD'DAR (תָּזֵר-אָדָד: Παπαίαν Αράδ, Σαράδα: Alex. Αν' Σαραία: Villa nomine Ador, Adhler), a place named as one of the landmarks on the southern boundary of the land promised to Israel between Kadesh-barnea and Azion (Num. xxxiv. 4). In the specification of the south boundary of the country actually possessed (Josh. xv. 3), the name appears in the shorter form of Addar (A. V. Aadar), and an additional place is named on each side of it. The site of Hazar-addar does not appear to have been encountered in modern times.

The LXX. reading might lead to the belief that Hazar-addar was identical with Addar, a Canaan-

Simeon in 1 Chr. iv. 31, with the express statement that they existed before and up to the time of David. This appears to invalidate Professor Stanley's suggestion (6, p. 160) that they were the depots for the trade with Egypt in chariots and horses, which commenced in the reign of Solomon. Still, it is difficult to know to what else to ascribe the names of places situated, as these were, in the Bedouin country, where a chariot must have been unknown, and where even horses soon carefully excluded from the possessions of the inhabitants—"canaan, sheep, oxen, and asses" (1 Sam. xxvii. 9). In truth the difficulty arises only on the assumption that the names are Hebrew, and that they are to be interpreted accordingly. It would cease if we could believe them to be in the former language of the country, adopted by the Hebrews, and so altered as to bear a meaning in Hebrew. This is exactly the process which the Hebrew names have in their turn undergone from the Arabs, and is in fact one which is well known to have occurred in all languages, though not yet recognized in the particular case of the early local names of Palestine.

1. HAZER [מֶזֶר], "village of horses": 'Homerowenin, as if ממר; [Vat. Haro- rob (cf. Eneas); Alex. Haro- Eneas)] Humesunin, the form under which the preceding name appears in the list of the towns of Simeon in 1 Chr. iv. 31.

HAZERIM. The Avvim, or more accurately the Avvim, a tribe commemorated in a fragment of very ancient history, as the early inhabitants of the southwestern portion of Palestine, are therein said to have lived in the villages (A. V. "Avvarin", "Avvarin, [O. a. Avaroin]; Alex. Ave- rum: B. B. ii. 23), before their expulsion by the Caphtorites. The word is the plural of "Avvar", noticed above, and as far as we can now appreciate the significance of the term, it implies that the Avvim were a wandering tribe who had retained in their new locality the transitory form of encampment of their original desert-life.

HAZEROTH [מֶזֶר עוֹרָת], "stations, camping grounds": 'Avaroin: [In Deut., Avvaron: Hazeron;] Num. xi. 25, xii. 16, xxvii. 17, Deut. i. 1), a station of the Israelites in the desert, mentioned next to Kilkath-Hattasah, and perhaps recognized in the Arabic al-,' the encampment near Hithra (Robinson, i. 151; Stanley, S. P. F. pp. 81, 82), which lies about eighteen hours' distance from Sinai on the road to the Akaba. The word appears to mean the sort of mixed-used villages in which the Bedouin were found to congregate. [HAZERIN.]

II. HAZERON-TAMAR, and HAZ ASON-TAMAR [מֶזֶר אוֹנ תָּמָר], but in Chron. מֶזֶר אוֹנ תָּמָר [prob. set place of palms, palm-wood, Diri.: stress of palms, palm-forest, First: 4. A'araw, or A'arow (for A'araw); Alex. A'araw: Vat. in 2 Chr. A'arow (A'arow); Alex. A'araw, A'araw)], the name under which, as a very early period of the history of Palestine, and where the Hebrew is Hazaron, they have Hazon, and the opposite in Chronicles.

a The translators of the A. V. have curiously reversed the two variations of the name. In Genesis, n a document believed by many to be the oldest of all these early records, we first hear of the place which afterwards became EN-GEDI. The Amorites were dwelling at Hazazon-Tamar when the four kings made their incursion, and fought their successful battle with the five (Gen. xiv. 7). The name occurs only once again in the records of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xx. 2)—when he is warned of the approach of the horde of Ammonites, Moabites, Meunim, and men of Mount Seir, whom he afterwards so completely destroyed, and who were no doubt pursuing thus far exactly the same route as the Assyrians had done a thousand years before them. Here the explanation, "which is En-gedi," is added. The existence of the earlier application, after En-gedi had been so long in use, is a remarkable instance of the tenacity of these old oriental names, of which more modern instances are frequent. See ACCIO, BETHSAIAD, etc.

Hazazon-tamar is interpreted in Hebrew to mean the "pruning or felling of the palm" (Gesen. Thes. p. 512). Jerome (Quest. in Gen.) renders it urbs palmarum. This interpretation of the name is borne out by the ancient reputation of the palms of En-gedi as those of En-gedi, xxiv. 14, and the citations from Pliny, given under that name. The Samaritan Version has יִֽבְרֹל־גֵּדִֽי יִֽמְלָלֶּֽי as the Valley of Cadi, possibly a corruption of En-gedi. The Targums have En-gedi.

Perhaps this was the "city of palm trees" (In-kat-temarim) out of which the Kenites, the tribe of Moses' father-in-law, went up into the wilderness of Judah, after the conquest of the country (Judg. i. 18). If this were so, the allusion of Balaam to the Kenite (Num. xxiv. 21) is at once explained. Standing as he was on one of the lofty points of the highlands opposite Jericho, the western shore of the Dead Sea as far as En-gedi would be before him, and the cliffs in the clefts of which the Kenites had fixed their secure "nest," would be a prominent object in the view. This has been already alluded to by Professor Stanley (S. d. P., p. 225, n. 4).

HAZO [חָזָו] [look, visibility, Furst.]: ΄Αξόα, a son of Nahor, by Milcah his wife (Gen. xxi. 22): perhaps, says Genesisi, for לְצָו, "a vision." The name is unknown, and the settlement of the descendants of Hazo cannot be ascertained. The only clue is to be found in the identification of Hazor, moth. of Sheshai, and he be other of the sons of Sheshai and hence he must, in all likelihood, be placed in Ur of the Chaldees, or the adjacent countries. Bunsen (Biblekern, i. pt. 2, p. 49) suggests Chasene by the Euphrates, in Mesopotamia, or the Chasene in Assyria (Strabo, xvi. p. 736).

HAZOR [חָזָר] [enclosure, castle]: ΄Ασόα: [Alex. in 1 K. ix. 15, ΄Ασόα]: ΄Ασορ, [Hazor].

I. A fortified city, which on the occupation of the country was allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36). Its position was apparently between Ramah and Kedesh (Josh. xii. 19), on the high ground overlooking the Lake of Merom (ἐμπροσθεν τῆς Σωματιδίου λίμνης, Joseph. Ant. v. 5, § 1). There is no reason for supposing it a different place from that of which Jabin was king (Josh. xi. 1), both when Joshua gained his signal victory over the northern confederation, and when Deborah and Barak routed his general Sisera (Judg. iv. 2, 17; 6, 34; ix. 10). It was the principal city of the whole of the North Palatinate, "the head of all those kingdoms" (Josh. xi. 10, and see Onomasticon, Asor). Like the other strong places of that part, it stood on an eminence (טִּיר, Josh. xi. 3, 13, A. V. "strength"); but the district around must have been on the whole flat, and suitable for the manoeuvres of the "very many" chariots and horses which formed part of the forces of the king of Hazor and his confederates (Josh. iv. 6, 9; Judg. iv. 3). Hazor was the only one of those northern cities which was burnt by Joshua; doubtless it was too strong and important to leave standing in his rear. Whether it was rebuilt by the men of Naphtali, or by the second Jabin (Judg. i.), we are not told, but Sebaan of Sisera did not seem so important a post, and the fortification of Hazor, Megido, and Gezer, the points of defense for the entrance from Syria and Assyria, the plain of Esdraelon, and the great maritime lowland respectively, was one of the chief pretexts for his levy of taxes (1 K. xv. 13). Later still it is mentioned in the list of the towns and districts whose inhabitants were carried off to Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser (2 K. xiv. 20; Joseph. Ant. xi. 11, § 1). We encounter it once more in 1 Mac. xi. 7, where Jonathan, after encamping for the night at the "water of Genesar," advances to the "plain of Asor" (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 9, § 7; the Greek text of the Maccabees has prefixed an ο to the preceding word τέρανος: A. V. Naser) to meet Demetrius, who was in possession of Kadesh (xi. 63; Joseph. as above). [NASOR.]

Several places bearing names probably derived from ancient Hazors have been discovered in this district. A list will be found in Rob. iii. 316, note (and compare also Van de Velde, Syr. and Ptol. ii. 178; Porter's Anc. ii. 304). But none of them are more likely to answer to the requirements of this Hazor. The nearest is the site suggested by Dr. Robinson, namely, Tell Khirbat, "the ruins," which, though without any direct evidence of name or tradition in its favor, is so suitable, in its situation on a rocky eminence, and in its proximity both to Kedesh and the Lake Huleh, that we may accept it until a better is discovered (Rob. iii. 304, 315).

* The ruins of a large city of very ancient date have recently been found about two miles southeast of Kedesh (Kedesh, 3), on an isolated hill called Tell Harah. The walls of the citadel and a portion of the city walls are distinctly traceable. Captain Wilson, of the Palestine Exploring Expedition, inclines to regard this place as the site of the Bile Hazor (Josh. xix. 35), instead of Tell Khirbat (See Journ. of Soer. Literature, April, 1806, p. 245). It is not far from the ancient city of Mezon or any similar one, still adheres to the locality. Thomson proposes Hozere or Hozbey as the site of this Hazor, northwest of the Huleh (Merom), and in the centre of the mountainous region which overhangs that lake: the ruins are very extensive as well as ancient, and a living tradition among the Arabs supports this claim (see Land and Book, i 439). R. Robinson objects to this identification that it
HEAD-BANDS

HEAD-DRESS

The Hebrews do not appear to have regarded a covering for the head as an essential article of dress. The earliest notice we have of such a thing is in connection with the aceribolata vestments, and in this case it is described as an ornamental appendage "for glory and for beauty" (Ex. xxviii. 40). The absence of any allusion to a head-dress in passages where we should expect to meet with it, as in the trial of jealousy (Num. v. 18), and the regulations regarding the leper (Lev. xiii. 45), in both of which the "uncovering of the head" refers undoubtedly to the hair, leads to the inference that it was not ordinarily worn in the Mosaic age, and this is confirmed by the practice, frequently alluded to, of covering the head with the mantle. Even in after times it seems to have been reserved especially for purposes of ornament: thus the taliykh (חַנֵית) is noticed as being worn by nobles (Josh. xix. 14), ladies (Is. iii. 23), and kings (Is. iii. 3), while the pe'er (פָּרֶח) was an article of holiday dress (Is. lix. 3; A. V. "beauty"); Ex. xxxiv. 23), and was worn at weddings (Is. lix. 10): the use of the mitpah was restricted to similar occasions (Jud. xvi. 8; 1 Sam. v. 2). The former of these terms undoubtedly describes a kind of turban: its primary sense (חַנֵית) "to roll around") expresses the folds of linen round round the head, and its form probably resembled that of the high-priest's mitzvapth (a word derived from the same root, and identified in meaning, for in Zech. iii. 5, taliykh = mitzvapth), as described by Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, § 3). The renderings of the term in the A. V., "hood" (Is. lix. 23), "diadem" (Job xxix. 14; Is. lix. 3), "mitre" (Zech. iii. 5), do not convey the right idea of its meaning. The other term, pe'er, primarily means an ornament, and is so rendered in the A. V. (Is. lix. 10; see also ver. 3, "beauty"), and is specifically applied to the head-dress from its ornamental character. It is uncertain what the term properly describes: the modern turban consists of two parts, the konik, a stiff, round cap occasionally rising to a considerable height, and the shork, a long piece of muslin wound about it (Russell, Aleppo, i. 104): Josephus' account of the high-priest's head-dress implies a similar construction; for he says that it was made of thick bands of linen doubled round many times, and sewn together: the whole covered by a piece of fine linen to conceal the seams. Sackshitz ( Archaeol. i. 27, note) says gests that the tzānîykh and the peîr represent the shāsh and the ko’dos, the latter rising high above the other, and so the most prominent and striking feature. In favor of this explanation it may be remarked that the peîr is more particularly connected with the niqūbaḥ, the high cap of the ordinary priests, in Ex. xxix. 28, while the tzānîykh, as we have seen, resembled the high-priest’s mitre, in which the cap was concealed by the linen folds. The objection, however, to this explanation is that the etymological force of peîr is not brought out: may not that term have applied to the jewels and other ornaments with which the turban is frequently decorated (Russell, i. 106), some of which are represented in the accompanying illustration borrowed from Lane’s Mod. Egypt. Appendix A. The term used for putting on either the tzānîykh or the peîr is שָׁשָׂן, “to bind round” (Ex. xxix. 9; Lev. viii. 13): hence the words in Ez. xvi. 10, “I girded thee about with fine linen,” are to be understood of the turban; and by the use of the same term Jonah (ii. 5) represents the weeds wrapped as a turban round his head. The turban as now worn in the East varies very much in shape; the most prevalent forms are shown in Russell’s Alaya, i. 102.

HEAD-DRESS

If the tzānîykh and the peîr were reserved for holiday attire, it remains for us to inquire whether any and what covering was ordinarily worn over the head. It appears that frequently the robes supplied the place of a head-dress, being so ample that they might be thrown over the head at pleasure: the ru’dîl and the tālîykh at all events were so used [Dress], and the veil served a similar purpose. [Veil.] The ordinary head-dress of the Bedouin consists of the kēfîyeh, a square handkerchief, generally of red and yellow cotton, or cotton and silk, folded so that three of the corners hang down across the back and shoulders, leaving the face exposed, and bound round the head by a cord (Barekhard, Notes, i. 48). It is not improbable that a similar covering was used by the Hebrews on certain occasions; the “kerchief” in Ex. xiii. 18, has been so understood by some writers (Harmer, Observations, ii. 303), though the word more probably refers to a species of veil; and the gμισθίνιον (Acts xix. 12, A V. “apron”), as explained by Suidas (τὸ κεφαλὴς φόρημα), was applicable to the purposes of a head-dress. [Handkerchief.] Neither of these cases, however, supplies positive evidence on the point, and the general absence of allusions leads to the inference that the head was usually uncovered, as is still the case in many parts of Arabia (Wellsted, Travels, i. 74).

The introduction of the Greek hat (μετακρατήριον) by Jason, as an article of dress adapted to the gymnasion, was regarded as a national dishonor (2 Mace. iv. 12); in shape and material the pomeios very much resembled the common felt hats of this country (Dicts. of Ant. art. Pilum).

HEARTH

The Assyrian head-dress is described in Ez. xxiii. 15 under the terms מַעֲלָה תַּנְיֵק; “excelling in dyed attire;” it is doubtful, however, whether מַעֲלָה describes the colored material of the head-dress (inveva a dolorious quibus tintae sint); another sense has been assigned to it more appropriate to the description of a turban (fascis orendi, Ges. Thes. p. 542). The term sâraḥî [סָרָהִי] expresses the flowing character of the Eastern head-dress, as it falls down over the back (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 308). The word rendered “hats” in Dan. iii. 21 ([vertex] properly applies to a cloak.

HEARTH.

1. מַעֲלָה: כִּפְרָה: uraba (Ges. 69), a pot or brazier for containing fire. 2. מָרַל: קַשָּׁן; f.: קַשָּׁן, a pot or brazier (Ges. p. 620). 3. מָרַל, or מִלַּה (Zech. xii. 6). מָרַל: καύσος; in dual, מָרַל (Lev. xii. 35): χυμβόλων: χυμβολίων; A. V. “ranges for pots” (Ges. p. 672).

One way of baking, much practiced in the East, is to place the dough on an iron plate, either laid on, or supported on legs, and, after being sunk in the ground, which forms the oven. This plate or “hearth” is in Arabic طَبْقَة, a word which has probably passed into Greek in ὑγνας. The cakes baked on the “hearth” (Gen. xviii. 8 ἡγνας, subgeneris panes) were probably baked in the existing Bedouin manner, on hot stones covered with ashes. The “hearth” of King Jeholakin’s winter palace, Jer. xxxvi. 29, was possibly a pan or brazier of charcoal. (Barekhard, Notes on Bed. i. 58; P. della Valle, Viaggi, i. 437; Harmer, Obs. i. p. 477, and note; Ranwold, Travels, ap. Ray, ii. 103; Shaw, Travels, p. 231; Niebuhr, HEATH (חַדְרָךְ, 'arōrēr, and חַדְרֶיךְ, 'arārē; see also Gk. ἱππόμηχος, ὠς ἵππος: myrican).

The prophet Jeremiah compares the man "who maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord," to the "'arōrēr" in the desert (xviii. 6). Again, in the judgment of Moab (xlviii. 6), to her inhabitants it is said, "'Flee, save your lives, and be like the 'arōrē in the wilderness," where the margin has "a naked tree." There seems no reason to doubt Celsius' conclusion (Hircib. ii. 195).

The 'arōrēr is identical with the 'arār of Arabic writers, which is some species of juniper. Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. 125, 6) states that when he was in the pass of Nemech he observed juniper trees (Arab. 'ar'or') on the porphyry rocks above. The berries, he adds, have the appearance and taste of the common juniper except that there is more of the aroma of the pine. "These trees were ten or fifteen feet in height, and hung upon the rocks even to the summits of the cliffs and needles." This appears to be the Juniperus Scabiana or savin, with small scale-like leaves, which are pressed close to the stem, and which is described as being a gloomy-looking bush inhabiting the most sterile soil (see English Cyc. N. Hist. iii. 311); a character which is obviously well suited to the naked or destitute tree spoken of by the prophet. Rosenmüller's explanation of the Hebrew word, which is also adopted by Maurer, "qui destitutus versatur" (Schol. ad loc. xlvii. 6), is very unsatisfactory.

Not to mention the trueness of the comparison, it is evidently contradicted by the antithesis in ver. 8: "Cursed is he that trusteth in man ... he shall be like the juniper that grows on the bare rocks of the desert." The word used is the same as is used in the O.T. (Ps. lxxx. 13; Jer. vii. 24), and is the name "of a shrub growing by a hilly road," and a Hebrew district (Godet, Thes. p. 170, 4) of the same desert. But the contrast between the shrub of the arid desert and the tree growing by the waters is very striking. It is as if the Hebrew writer were contrasting the desert in its depression appearing to us to spoil the whole. Even more unsatisfactory is Michaelis (Comm. Lev. Heb. p. 1971), who thinks "guineas hen" (Xmundē melanoria) are intended! Gesenius (Thek. p. 1073, 4) understands these two Heb. terms to denote "parrinetis, adjutca eversa" (ruins); but it is more in accordance with the Scriptural passages to suppose that some tree is intended, which explanation, moreover, has the sanction of the LXX and Vulgate, and of the modern use of a kindred Arabic word.

W. II.

HEATHEN. The Hebrew words גוי, גויים, together with their Greek equivalents ἐθνος, ἔθνη, have been somewhat arbitrarily rendered "nations," "gentiles," and "heathen" in the A. V. It will be interesting to trace the manner in which a term, primarily and essentially general in its signification, acquired that more restricted sense which was afterwards attached to it. Its development is parallel with that of the Hebrew people, and its meaning at any period may be taken as significant of their relative position with regard to the surrounding nations.

a From the root חַדְרָךְ, "to be naked," in allusion to the bare nature of the rocks on which the Juniperus

sider range than the national experience (Lev. xxvi. 39, 58; Deut. xxx. 1), and as the latter was gradually developed during the prosperous times of the monarchy, the goyin were the surrounding nations generally, with whom the Israelites were brought into contact by the extension of their commerce, and whose idolatrous practices they readily adopted (Ezr. x. 24; Am. v. 26). Later still, it is applied to the Babylonians who took Jerusalem (Neh. v. 8; Ps. lxxx. 1, 6, 10), to the destroyers of Moab (Isa. xvi. 8), and to the several nations among whom the Jews were scattered during the Captivity (Ps. cvi. 47; Jer. xvi. 28; Lam. i. 3, &c.), the practice of idolatry still being their characteristic distinction (Is. xxxvi. 18; Jer. x. 2, 3, xiv. 22). This significance it retained after the return from Babylon, though it was used in a more limited sense as denoting the mixed race of colonists who settled in Palestine during the Captivity (Neh. v. 17), and who are described as fearing Jehovah, while serving their own gods (2 K. xvii. 20-33; Eze. vi. 21).

Tracing the synonymous term ἐβραῖος through the Apocryphal writings, we find that it is applied to the nations around Palestine (1 Mac. i. 11), including the Syrians and Philistines of the army of Gergesia (Mac. iii. 41, iv. 7, 11, 14), as well as the people of Ptolemæis, Tyre, and Sidon (1 Mac. v. 9, 10, 15). They were image-worshippers (1 Mac. iii. 48; Wisd. xvi. 15), whose customs and fashions the Jews seem still to have had an unceasing propensity to imitate, but on whom they were bound by national tradition to take vengeance (1 Mac. ii. 68; 1 Esdr. vii. 83). Following the customs of the goyin at this period the denoted the neglect or contempt of circumcision (1 Mac. i. 15), disregard of sacrifices, profanation of the Sabbath, eating of swine’s flesh and meat offered to idols (2 Mac. vi. 6-9, 18, xvi. 2, 2), and adoption of the Greek national games (2 Mac. iv. 12, 14). In all points Judaism and heathenism are strongly contrasted. The “barbarous multitude” in 2 Mac. ii. 21 are opposed to those who played the man for Judaism, and the distinction now becomes an ecclesiastical one (comp. Matt. xviii. 17). In 2 Esdr. iii. 33, 34, the “gentes” are defined as those “qui habitant in seculo.” (comp. Matt. vii. 32; Luke xii. 30).

As the Greek influence became more extensively felt in Asia Minor, and the Greek language was generally used, Hellenism and heathenism became convertible terms, and a Greek was synonymous with a foreigner of any nation. This is singularly evident in the Syriac of 2 Mac. v. 9, 10, 13; cf. John vii. 35; 1 Cor. x. 32; 2 Mac. xii. 2. In the N. T. again we find various shades of meaning attached to ἐβραῖος. In its narrowest sense it is opposed to “those of the circumcision” (Acts x. 45; cf. Eph. vii. 13, where ἐβραῖοι = ἀρχαῖοι ταπαροῖ), and is contrasted with Israel, the people of Jehovah (Luke ii. 32), thus representing the Hebrew goyin at one stage of its history. But, like goyin, it also denotes the people of the earth generally (Acts xvii. 26; Gal. iii. 14). In Matt. v. 7 ἀθροίζομαι is applied to an idolater.

But, in addition to its significance as an etymological term, ἐβραῖος had a moral sense which must not be overlooked. In Ps. ix. 5, 15, 17 (comp. Ez. vii. 21) the word stands in parallelism with ἁρίδω, the wicked, as distinguished by his moral obliquity (see Hupfeld on Ps. i. 1); and in ver. 17 the people thus designated are described as “forgetters of God,” that know not Jehovah (Jer. x. 25). Again in Ps. lx. 5 it is to some extent commensurate in meaning with תְּרֵיִים, bīyīdî āvën, “iniquitous transgressors;” and in these passages, as well as in Ps. x. 16, it has a deeper significance than that of a merely national distinction, although the latter idea is never entirely lost sight of.

In later Jewish literature a technical definition of the word is laid down which is certainly not of universal fixation. Elias Levi (quoted by Eisenmenger, "Entleuchteter Palästina," II. 480) explains the sing. goy as denoting one who is not of Israelitish birth. This can only have reference to its after significance: in the O. T. the singular is never used of an individual, but is a collective term, applied equally to the Israelites (Josh. iii. 17) as to the nations of Canaan (Lev. xxi. 33), and denotes simply a body politic. Another distinction, equally unsupported, is made between מַנְדָא, goyim, and גוֹיֶנִים, umanim, the former being defined as the nations who had served Israel, while the latter were those who had not (Jalilax Chafoth, fol. 20, no. 29; Eisenmenger, l. 667). Avarband on Joel iii. 2 applies the former to both Christians and Turks, or Ishmaelites, while in Sepher Jesudia (fol. 148, col. 2) the Christians alone are distinguished by this appellation. Eisenmenger gives some curious examples of the disabilities under which a goy labore. One who kept sabbaths was judged deserving of death (ib. 206), and the study of the law was prohibited to him under the same penalty; but on the latter point the doctors are at issue (ib. 209).

HEAVEN. There are four Hebrew words thus rendered in the O. T., which we may briefly notice. 1. גוֹיֶנִים (נָטַרָם בָּאוּתָם; Luth. 130), a solid expance, from פָּזָל, “to beat out;” a word used primarily of the hammering out of metal (Ex. xxxix. 3, Num. xvi. 38). The fuller expression is בְּגֵי גוֹיֶנִים (Gen. i. 14 f.). That Moses understood it to mean a solid expance is clear from his representing it as the barrier between the upper and lower waters (Gen. i. 6 f.), i. e. as separating the reservoir of the celestial ocean (Ps. ciii. 22, xxxi. 3) from the waters of the earth, or those on which the earth was supposed to float (Ps. cxxxvi. 6). Through its open lattices (ברֵס בְּגֵי בּוֹז) Gen. vii. 11; 2 K. vii. 2, 19; comp. κόσμος, Aristoph. Nub. 373 or doors (ברֵס בְּגֵי בּוֹז, Ps. lxxxviii. 23) the dew and snow and hail are poured upon the earth (Job xxxviii. 22, 37, where we have the curious expression “bottles of heaven,” “utras coeli”). This firm vault, which Job describes as being “strong as a molten looking-glass” (xxxvii. 18), is transparent, like pellicid sapphire, and splendid as crystal (Dan. xii. 3; Ex. xxxiv. 10; Ez. i. 22; Rev. iv. 6), over which rests the throne of God (Is. lxvi. 1; Ez. i. 26), and which is opened for the descent of angels, or for prophetic visions (Gen. xxviii. 17; Ez. i. 1; Acts vii. 56, x. 11). In it, like gems or golden lamps, the stars are fixed to give light to the earth, and regulate the seasons (Gen. i. 14-19); and the whole magnificent, immeasurable structure (Jer. xxxi. 37) is supported by the mountains as its pillars, or strong foundations (Ps. xviii. 7; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Job xxxv. 11). Similarly the Greeks believed in an οὐρανός τούλαχιστον (Hom. II. v. 504), or σιδήρος (Hom. Od. xii. 328), or άδάμαστος (Orph. Hymno. ad Ceadum), which the philosophers called στέρεωμαν, or κρυστάλλοις (Emped. ap. Plat. de Phil. Phys. ii. 11; Arntz. ap. Sen Nat. Quest. vii. 13; quoted by Gessius, s. v.) It is clear that very many of the above notions were mere metaphors resulting from the simple primitive conception, and that later writers among the Hebrews had arrived at more scientific views, although of course they retained much of the old phraseology, and are fluctuating and undecided in their terms. Elsewhere, for instance, the heavens are likened to a curtain (Ps. civ. 2; Is. xl. 22). In A. V. "heaven" and "heavens" are used to render not only לְוָה and לְוָה, but also לְוָה, לְוָה, and לְוָה, for which reason we have thrown together under the former word the chief features ascribed by the Jewish writers to this portion of the universe. [FIRMAMENT, Auer. ed.]

2. לְוָה is derived from לְו, "to be high." This is the word used in the expression "the heaven and the earth," or "the upper and lower regions" (Gen. i, 1), which was a periphrasis to supply the want of a single word for the Cosmos (Deut. xxxii. 1; Is. i. 2; Ps. cxviii. 13). "Heaven of heavens" is their expression of infinity (Neh. ix. 6; Ecles. xvi. 18).

3. לְוָה is used for heaven in Ps. xviii. 16; Jer. xxxvi. 39; Is. xiv. 18. Properly speaking it means a mountain, as in Ps. ciii. 19, Ez. xviii. 23. It must not, however, be supposed for a moment that the Hebrews had any notion of a "Mountain of Meeting," like Mount Ararat, the northern hill of Babylonian mythology (Is. xiv. 13), or the Greek Ουρανος, or the Hindoo Meru, the Chinese K'uen-lun, or the Arabian "Ush" (see Kalisch, Gen. p. 24, and the authorities there quoted), since such a fancy is incompatible with the pure monotheism of the Old Testament.

4. לְוָה, "expanses," with reference to the extent of heaven, as the last two words were derived from its height; hence this word is often used together with לְוָה, as in Deut. xxxiii. 26; Job xxxv. 5. In the L. V. it is sometimes renderedcampo, for which the fuller term is סִפְרָם (Ps. xviii. 12). The word לְוָה means first "to pound," and then "to wear out." So that, according to some, "clouds" (from the notion of dust) is the original meaning of the word. Gessius, however, rejects this opinion (Theo. s. v.).

In the N. T. we frequently have the word οὐράνιον, which some consider to be a Hebrewism, or a plural of excellence (Schleusner, Lex. Nor. Test. s. v.). St. Paul's expression εις τρίτον οὐράνιον (2 Cor. xi. 2) has led to much conjecture. Gregory says that the Jews divided the heaven into three parts, namely, (1.) Nubiferum, the air or atmosphere, where clouds gather. (2.) Astriferum, the firmament, in which the sun, moon, and stars are fixed. (3.) Empyreum, or Angeliferum, the upper heaven, the abode of God and his angels, i. e. 1.

*HEAVE-OFFERING. [SACRIFICE.]

HEBER. The Heb. לְוָה and לְוָה are more forcibly distinguished than the English Eber and Heber. In its use, however, of this merely aspirate distinction the A. V. of the O. T. is consistent: Eber always = לְוָה, and Heber = לְוָה. In Luke iii. 35, Heber = Eber, kai ἔβρις; the distinction so carefully observed in the O. T. having been neglected by the translators of the N. T.

The LXX. has a similar distinction, though not consistently carried out. It expresses לְוָה by ἐβριον (Gen. ii. 21), Eber (1 Chr. i. 25), ἔβριον (Num. xxiv. 21); while לְוָה is variously given as אֵבָר, אֵבָר, אֵבָר, or אֵבָר. In these words, however, we can clearly perceive two distinct groups of equivalents, suggested by the effort to express two radically different forms. The transition from אֵבָר through אֵבָר to אֵבָר is sufficiently obvious.

The Vulg. expresses both indifferently by Heber except in Judg. iv. 17 where Haber is probably

2. The tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 18). [Of the tribe of Judah (Ch. iv. 18).]

3. [Xαβρή is: Alex. Ιαβρή; Comp. *Ἐβρή: Heber.] A Gadite (1 Chr. v. 13). [Of the tribe of Judah (Ch. iv. 18).]

4. A Benjaminite (1 Chr. viii. 17). [Of the tribe of Judah (Ch. iv. 18).]

5. [Xαβρή is: Vat. Οβρή; Ald. *Ἀβρή: Heber.] Another Benjaminite (1 Chr. viii. 22). [Of the tribe of Judah (Ch. iv. 18).]

6. Heber, the Kenite, the husband of Jebel (Judg. iv. 11–17, v. 24). It is a question how he could be a Kenite, and yet trace his descent from Hobah, or Jethra, who was priest of Midian. The solution is probably to be sought in the nomadic habits of the tribe, as shown in the case of Heber himself, of the family to which he belonged (Judg. i. 16), and of the Kenites generally (in 1 Sam. xv. 6, they appear among the Amalekites). It should be observed that Jethro is never called a Midianite, but expressly a Kenite (Judg. i. 10); that the expression "a priest of Midian," may merely serve to indicate the country in which Jethro resided; lastly, that there would seem to have been two successive migrations of the Kenites into Palestine, one under the sanction of the tribe of Judah at the time of the original occupation, and attributed to Jethro's descendants generally (Judg. i. 16); the other a special, nomadic expedition of Heber's family, which led them to Kadesh in Naphtali, at that time the debatable ground between the northern tribes, and Judah, King of Canaan. We are not to infer that this was the final settlement of Heber: a tent seems to have been his sole habitation when his wife smote Sisera (Judg. iv. 21).

*HEBREW LANGUAGE. See SHENIAC LANGUAGES, §§ 6–13.

HEBREWS, HE'BREWS. This word first occurs as applied to Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13): it was afterwards given as a name to his descendants. Four derivations have been proposed:—

I. Patronymic from Abram.

II. Appellative from יברי.

III. Appellative from יבריה.

IV. Patronymic from Eber.

I. From Abram, Abraham, and by euphony Hebrei (August., Ambrose). Displaying, as it does, the utmost ignorance of the language, this derivation was never extensively adopted, and was even retracted by Augustine (Retracct. 16). The euphony alleged by Ambrose is quite imperceptible, and there is no parallel in the Lat. meridie = meridian.

II. יברי, from יבר = 'crossed over,' applied by the Canaanites to Abraham upon his crossing the Euphrates (Gen. xiv. 13, where LXX. καταφέρει = transitur'. This derivation is open to be strong objection that Hebrew nouns ending in are either patronymics, or gentile nouns (Luxtorfe, Lusden). This is a technical objection which, though fatal to the καταφέρει, or appellatives, derivation as traced back to the verb, does not apply to the same as referred to the noun יבר. The analogy of Galli, Angli, Spani, from Gallin, Anglia, Hispania (Lusden), is a complete blunder in etymology; and at any rate it would confirm rather than destroy the derivation from the noun.

III. This latter comes next in review, and is essentially the same with II.; since both rest upon the assumption that Abraham and his posterity were called Hebrews in order to express a distinction between the races E. and W. of the Euphrates. The question of fact is not essential whether Abraham was the first person to whom the word was applied, his posterity as such inheriting the name; or whether his posterity equally with himself were by the Canaanites regarded as men from "the other side" of the river. The real question at issue is whether the Hebrews were so called from a progenitor Eber (which is the fourth and last derivation), or from a country which had been the cradle of their race, and from which they had emigrated westward into Palestine; in short, whether the word Hebrew is a patronymic, or a gentile noun.

IV. The latter opinion in one or other of its phases indicated above is that suggested by the LXX., and maintained by Jerome, Theodoret, Orig., Chrysost., Alciat Montanus, B. Bechaj, Paul Burg., Müntzer, Grotius, Scholiag, Soden, Rosenmu., Gesen., Eichhorn: the former is supported by Jo-sep., Suidas, Bochart, Vat., Drusius, Vossius, Buxtorf, Hottiinger, Lusden, Whiston, Bauer. As regards the derivation from יברי, the noun (or according to others the prep.), Lusden himself, the great supporter of the Buxtorfian theory, indicates the obvious analogy of Transmarini, Transsylvania, Transalpini, words which from the description of a fixed and local relation attained in process of time to the independence and mobility of a gentile name. So natural indeed is it to suppose that Eber (trans, on the other side) was the term used here in Palestine to denote the country E. of the Euphrates, and Hebrew the name which he applied to the inhabitants of that country, that Lusden is driven to stake the entire issue as between derivations III. and IV. upon a challenge to produce any passage of the O. T. in which יבר = יבר; יבר. If we accept Rosean, Schol. on Num. xxiv. 24, according to which Eber by parallelism with Assur = Trans-Euphratian, this challenge is met. But if not, the facility of the abbreviation is sufficient to create a presumption in its favor; while the derivation with which it is associated harmonizes more perfectly than any other with the later usage of the word Hebrew, and is confirmed by negative arguments of the strongest kind. In fact it seems almost impossible for the defenders of the patronymic Eber theory to get over the difficulty arising from the circumstance that no special prominence is in the genealogy assigned to Eber, such as might entitle him to the position of head or founder of the race. From the genealogical scheme in Gen. xi. 10–26, it does not appear that the Jews thought of any common source primary, or even secondary, of the national descent. The genealogy neither starts from him, nor in its uniform sequence does it rest.

upon him with any emphasis. There is nothing to distinguish Eber above Arphaxad, Peleg, or Serug. Like them is he but a link in the chain by which Shem is connected with Abraham. Indeed the tendency of the Israelitish retrospect is to stop at Jacob. It is with Jacob that their history as a nation begins; beyond Jacob they held their ancestry in common with the Edomites; beyond Isaac they were in danger of being confounded with the Ishmaelites. The predominant figure of the eminently Hebrew Abraham might tempt them beyond those points of affinity with other races, so distasteful, so anti-national; but it is almost inconceivable that they would voluntarily originate, and perpetuate an appellation of themselves which landed them on a platform of ancestry where they met the whole population of Arabia (Gen. x. 25, 30).

As might have been expected, an attempt has been made to show that the position which Eber occupies in the genealogy is one of no ordinary kind, and that the Hebrews stood in a relation to him which was held by none other of his descendants, and might therefore be called per excellence "the children of Eber." But this inference is easily false, for Eber is only one passage in which it is possible to imagine any peculiar resting-point as connected with the name of Eber. In Gen. x. 21 Shem is called "the father of all the children of Eber." But the passage is apparently not so much genealogical as etymological; and in this view it seems evident that the words are intended to contrast Shem with Ham and Japheth, and especially with the former. Now Babel is plainly fixed as the extreme limit of the posterity of Ham (ver. 11), while that of Nimrod or Eber was not limited in country, though with the name of A-V. in the next place, Egypt (ver. 13) is mentioned as the W. limit of the same great race; and these two extremes having been ascertained, the historian proceeds (ver. 15-19) to fill up his etymographic sketch with the intermediate tribes of the Canaanites. In short, in ver. 6-20, we have indications of three geographical points which distinguish the posterity of Ham, namely, Egypt, Palestine, and Babylon. At the last-mentioned city, at the river Euphrates, their proper occupancy, unaffected by the exceptional movement of Assur, terminated, and at the same point that of the descendants of Shem began. Accordingly, the sharpest contrast that could be devised is obtained by generally chasimg these latter nations as those beyond the river Euphrates; and the words "father of all the children of Eber," i. e. father of the nations to the east of the Euphrates, find an intelligible place in the context.

But a more tangible ground for the specially implied in the derivation of Hebrew from Eber is sought in the suppositions fact that Eber was the only descendant of Noah who preserved the one primordial language; and it is maintained that this language transmitted by Eber to the Hebrews, and to them alone of all his descendants, constitutes a peculiar and special relation (Theodore, Voss, Leusid). It is obvious to remark that this theory rests upon three entirely gratuitous assumptions: first, that the primordial language has been preserved; next, that Eber alone preserved it; lastly, that having so preserved it, he communicated it to his son Peleg, but not to his son Joktan.

The first assumption is utterly at variance with the most certain results of etymology: the two others are grossly improbable. The Hebrew of the O. T. was not the language of Abraham when he first entered Palestine: whether he inherited his language from Eber or not, decidedly the language which he did speak must have been Chaldee (comp. Gen. xxx. 47), and not Hebrew (Eichhorn). This supposed primordial language was in fact the language of the Canaanites, assumed by Abraham as more or less akin to that in which he had been brought up, and could not possibly have been transmitted to him by Eber.

The appellative (πατρίδος) derivation is strongly confirmed by the historical use of the word Hebrew. A patronymic would naturally be in use only among the people themselves, while the appellative which had been originally applied to them as strangers in a strange land would probably continue to designate them in their relations to neighboring tribes, and would be their current name among foreign nations. This is precisely the case with the terms Israelite and Hebrew respectively. The former was used by the Jews of themselves among themselves, the latter was the name by which they were known to foreigners. It is used either when foreigners are introduced as speaking (Gen. xxxix. 14, 17, xili. 12; Ex. i. 16, ii. 6: 1 Sam. iv. 6, 9, xili. 14, xiv. 11, xxv. 3), or where they are opposed to foreign nations (Gen. xiii. 32; Ex. i. 15, ii. 11; Deut. xv. 12; 1 Sam. xiiii. 3, 7). So in Greek and Roman writers we find the name Hebrews, or, in later times, Jews (Pausan. v. 5, § 2, vi. 24, § 6; Plut. Sympoes. iv. 6, 11; Tac. Hist. v. 1; Joseph. Ant. ii. 13). In N. T. we find the same contrast between Hebrews and foreigners (Acts vi. 1; Phil. iii. 5): the Hebrew language is distinguished from all others (Luke xxii. 38; John v. 2, xii. 1; Acts viii. 1; xiii. 1). While in 2 Cor. xi. 22, the word is used as simply as second to Isr/aelite in the expression of national peculiarity.

Gesenius has successfully controverted the opinion that the term Israelite was a sacred name, and Hebrew the common appellation.

Briefly, we suppose that Hebrew was originally a Cis-Euphratian word applied to Trans-Euphratian immigrants; it was accepted by these immigrants as their proper name; and after the general substitution of the word Jew, it still found a place in that marked and special feature of national contradistinction, the language (Joseph. Ant. i. 6, § 4; Suidas, s. v. Ἐβραίος; Euseb. de Prap. Evang. ii. 4; Ambrose, Comment. in Phil. iii. 5; August. Quest. in Gen. 24; Conso. Evang. 14; comp. HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE. The principal questions which have been raised, and the opinions which are current respecting this epistle may be considered under the following heads:

I. Its canonical authority.
II. Its author.
III. To whom was it addressed?
IV. Where and when was it written?
V. In what language was it written?
HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE

VI. Condition of the Hebrews, and scope of the epistle.

VII. Literature connected with it.

I. The most important question that can be entertained in connection with this epistle touches its canonical authority.

The universal Church, by allowing it a place among the Holy Scriptures, acknowledges that there is nothing in its contents inconsistent with the rest of the Bible. But the peculiar position which is assigned to it among the epistles shows a trace of doubts as to its authorship or canonical authority, two points which were blended together in primitive times. Has it then a just claim to be received by us as a portion of that Bible which contains the rule of our faith and the rule of our practice, laid down by Christ and his Apostles? Was it regarded as such by the Primitive Church, to whose clearly-expressed judgment in this matter all later generations of Christians agree to defer?

Of course, if we possessed a declaration by an inspired apostle that this epistle is canonical, all discussion would be superfluous. But the interpretation (by F. Spanheim and later writers) of 2 Pet. iii. 15 as a distinct reference to St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews seems scarcely tenable. For, if the "you" whom St. Peter addresses (i. e., all Christians (see 2 Pet. i. 2), the reference must not be limited to the Epistle to the Hebrews; or if it include only (see 2 Pet. iii. 1) the Jews named in 1 Pet. i. 1, there may be special reference to the Galatians (vi. 7-9) and Ephesians (ii. 3-5), but not to the Hebrews.

Was it then received and transmitted as canonical by the immediate successors of the Apostles? Then the most important witness among these, Clement (A. D. 70 or 95), refers to this epistle in the same way as, and more frequently than, to any other canonical book. It seems to have been "wholly transubursed," says Mr. Westcott (On the Canon, p. 32), into Clement's mind. Little stress can be laid upon the few possible allusions to it in Barnabas, Hermas, Polycarp, and Ignatius. But among the extant authorities of orthodox Christianity during the first century after the epistle was written, there is not one dissentient voice, whilst it is received as canonical by Clement writing from Rome; by Justin Martyr, familiar with the traditions of Italy and Asia; by his contemporaries, Tertullian (the Cretan bishop, and the predecessors of Clement and Origen at Alexandria); and by the compilers of the Peshito version of the New Testament. Among the writers of this period who make no reference to it, there is not one whose subject necessarily leads us to expect him to refer to it. Two heretical teachers, Basilides at Alexandria and Marcion at Rome, are recorded as distinctly rejecting the epistle.

But at the close of that period, in the North African church, where first the Gospel found utterance in the Latin tongue, orthodox Christianity first doubted the canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Gospel, spreading from Jerusalem along the northern and southern shores of the Mediterranean, does not appear to have borne fruit in North Africa until after the destruction of Jerusalem had curtailed intercourse with Palestine.

And it came thither not on the lips of an inspired apostle, but shorn of much of that oral tradition in which, with many other facts, was embodied the ground of the eastern belief in the canonical authority and authorship of this anonymous epistle. To the old Latin version of the Scriptures, which was completed probably about A. D. 170, this epistle seems to have been added as a composition of Barnabas, and as destitute of canonical authority. The opinion or tradition thus embodied in that age and country cannot be traced further back. About that time the Roman Church also began to speak Latin; and even its latest Greek writers gave up, we know not why, the full faith of the Eastern Church in the canonical authority of this epistle.

During the next two centuries the extant fathers of the Roman and North African churches regard the epistle as a book of no canonical authority. Tertullian, if he quotes it, disclaims its authority and speaks of it as a good kind of apocryphal book written by Barnabas. Cyriacus leaves it out of the number of St. Paul's epistles, and, even in his books of Scripture Testimonies against the Jews, never makes the slightest reference to it. Irenaeus, who came in his youth to Gaul, defaulding in his... great work the Divinity of Christ, never quotes, scarcely refers to the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Muratorian Fragment on the Canon leaves it out of the list of St. Paul's epistles. So did Cains and Hippolytus, who wrote at Rome in Greek; and so did Victorinus of Panomus. But in the fourth century its authority began to revive; it was received by Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer and Faustus of Cagliari, Fabius and Victorinus of Rome, Ambrose of Milan, and Philaster (?) and Commodius of Brescia. At the end of the fourth century, Jerome, the most learned and critical of the Latin Fathers, reviewed the conflicting opinions as to the authority of this epistle. He considered that the prevailing, though not universal view of the Latin churches, was of less weight than the view, not only of ancient writers, but also of all the Greek and all the Eastern churches, where the epistle was received as canonical and read daily; and he pronounced a decided opinion in favor of its authority. The great contemporary light of North Africa, St. Augustine, held a similar opinion. And after the declaration of these two eminent men, the Latin churches united with the East in receiving the epistle. The 3d Council of Carthage, A. D. 397, and a decree of Pope Innocent, A. D. 416, gave a final confirmation to their decision.

So great and the only considerable opposition which has been made to the canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Its origin has not been ascertained. Some critics have conjectured that the Montanist or the Novatian controversy instigated, and that the Arian controversy dissipated, so much opposition as proceeded from orthodox Christians. The references to St. Paul in the Clementine Homilies have led other critics to the startling theory that orthodox Christians at Rome, in the middle of the second century, commonly regarded and described St. Paul as an enemy of the Faith; a theory which, if it were established, would be a much stronger fact than the rejection of the least accredited of the epistles which bear the Apostle's name. But perhaps it is more probable that those jealous care, with which the Church everywhere, in the second century, had learned to scrutinize every book claim- ing canonical authority, misled, in this instance, the churches of North Africa and Rome. For to them this epistle was an anonymous writing, unlike an epistle in its opening, unlike a treatise in its end, differing in its style from every apostolic epistle, abounding in arguments and appealing to sentiments which were always foreign to the Gentile, and growing less familiar to the Jewish mind. So they went a step beyond the church of Alexandria, which, while doubtless the authorship of this epistle, always acknowledged its authority. The church of Jerusalem, as the original receiver of the epistle, was the depository of that oral testimony on which both its orthodoxy and canonical authority rested, and was the fountain-head of information which satisfied the Eastern and Greek churches. But the church of Jerusalem was early hidden in exile and obscurity. And Palestine, after the destruction of Jerusalem, became unknown ground to that class of "dwellers in Libya about Tyre, and strangers of Rome," who once maintained close religious intercourse with it. All these considerations may help to account for the fact that the Latin churches hesitated to receive an epistle, the credentials of which, from peculiar circumstances, were originally imperfect, and had become inaccessible to them when their version of Scripture was in process of formation, until religious intercourse between East and West again grew frequent and intimate in the fourth century.

But such doubts were confined to the Latin churches from the middle of the second to the close of the fourth century. All the rest of orthodox Christendom from the beginning was agreed upon the canonical authority of this epistle. No Greek or Syriac writer ever expressed a doubt. It was acknowledged in various public documents; received by the framers of the Apostolical Constitutions (about A. D. 259, Beter柏y); quoted in the epistle of the Synod of Antioch, A. D. 330; appealed to by the debaters in the first Council of Nica; included in that catalogue of canonical books which was added (perhaps afterwards) to the canons of the Council of Laodicea, A. D. 365; and sanctioned by the Quinisextian Council at Constantinople, A. D. 692.

Cardinal Cajetan, the opponent of Luther, was the first to disturb the tradition of a thousand years, and to deny the authority of this epistle. Erasmus, Calvin, and Beza questioned only its authorship. The holder spirit of Luther, unable to perceive its agreement with St. Paul's doctrine, pronounced it to be the work of some disciple of the Apostle, who had built not only gold, silver, and precious stones, but also wood, hay, and stubble upon his master's foundation. And whereas the Greek Church in the fourth century gave it sometimes the tenth place, or at other times, as it now does, and as the Syrian, Roman, and English churches do, the fourteenth place among the epistles of St. Paul, Luther, when he printed his version of the Bible, separated this book from St. Paul's epistles, and placed it with the epistles of St. James and St. Jude, next before the Revelation; indicating by this change of order his opinion that the four regarded books are of less importance and less authority than the rest of the New Testament. His opinion found some promoters; but it has not been adopted in any confession of the Lutheran Church.

The canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews is then secure, so far as it can be established by the tradition of Christian churches. The doubts which affected it were admitted in remote places, or in the failure of knowledge, or under the pressure of times of intellectual excitement; and they have disappeared before full information and calm judgment.

II. Who was the author of the Epistle? This question is of less practical importance than the last: for many books are received as canonical, whilst little or nothing is known of their writers. In this epistle the superscription, the ordinary source of information, is wanting. Its omission has been accounted for, since the days of Clement of Alexandria (epit. Faust., H. E. vi. 14) and Chrysostom, by supposing that St. Paul withheld his name, lest the sight of it should repel any Jewish Christians who might still regard him rather as an enemy of the law (Acts xxii. 21) than as a benefactor to their nation (Acts xxiv. 17).

a The Vatican Codex (B), A. D. 359, bears traces of an earlier assignment of the fifth place to the Ep. to the Hebrews. [See Beek, p. 247 and 447.]

Paulusmus, or some other predecessor of Clement, adds that St. Paul would not write to the Jews as an Apostle because he regarded the Lord himself as their Apostle (see the remarkable expression, Heb. iii. 1, twice quoted by Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 1. 29). It was the custom of the earliest fathers to quote passages of Scripture without naming the writer or the book which supplied them. But there is no reason to doubt that at first, everywhere, except in North Africa, St. Paul was regarded as the author. Among the Greek fathers, 'says Olschhausen (Proscaba, p. 85), no one is named either in Egypt, or in Syria, Palestine, Asia, or Greece, who is opposed to the opinion that this epistle proceeds from St. Paul.' The Alexandrian fathers, whether guided by tradition or by critical discernment, are the ear-est to note the discrepancy of style between this epistle and the other thirteen. And they received it in the same sense that the speech in Acts xxii. 1-21 is received as St. Paul's. Clement ascribed to St. Luke the transition of the epistle into Greek from a Hebrew original of St. Paul. Origen, embracing the opinion of those who, he says, preceded him, believed that the thoughts were St. Paul's, the language and composition St. Luke's or Clement's of Rome. Tertullian, knowing nothing of any connection of St. Paul with the epistle, names Barnabas as the reputed author according to the North African tradition, which in the time of Augustine had taken the less definite shape of a denial by some that the epistle was St. Paul's, and in the time of Isidore of Seville appears as a Latin opinion (found on the dissonance of style) that it was written by Barnabas or Clement. At Rome Clement was silent as to the author of this as of the other epistles which he quotes; and the writers who follow him, down to the middle of the fourth century, only touch on the point to deny that the epistle is St. Paul's.

The view of the Alexandrian fathers, a middle point between the Eastern and Western traditions, won its victory in the Church. It was adopted as the most probable opinion by Eusebius, Cyril, Athanasius, and the Council of Jerusalem. In all subsequent reception may have led to the silent transfer which was made about his time, of this epistle from the tenth place in the Greek Canon to the fourteenth, at the end of St. Paul's epistles, and before those of other Apostles. This place it held everywhere till the time of Luther; as if to indicate the deliberate and final acquiescence of the universal church in the opinion that it is one of the works of St. Paul, but not in the same full sense as the other ten [nine] epistles, addressed to particular churches, are his.

In the last three centuries every word and phrase in the epistle has been scrutinized with the most exact care for historical and grammatical evidence as to the authorship. The conclusions of individual inquirers are very diverse; but the result has not been any considerable disturbance of the an-tient tradition. No new kind of difficulty has been discovered: no hypothesis open to fewer objections than the tradition has been devised. The laborious work of the Rev. C. Forster (The Apo-tolical Authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews), which is a storehouse of grammatical evidence, advocates the opinion that St. Paul was the author of the language, as well as the thoughts of the epistle. Professor Stuart, in the Introduction to his Commentary on the Hebrews, not only of course, discusses the internal evidence at great length, and agrees in opinion with Mr. Forster, Dr. C. Wordsworth, On the Canon of the Scriptures, a Professor Blunt, On the Right Use of the Early Fathers, pp. 433-441, gives a complete view of the evidence of Clement, Origen, and Eusebius as to the autorship of the epistle.

b In this sense may be fairly understood the indirect declaration that this epistle is St. Paul's, which the Church of England puts into the mouth of her ministers in the Offices for the Visitation of the Sick and the S6lemization of Matrimony.

De ascensione primi Hen tophytorum, ch. viii. § 5] says that the way in which Timothy is mentioned (xii. 23) seems to him a sucient proof that St. Paul was the author of this epistle.

For another view of this passage see Bleek, i. 573.

d * It has been asserted by some German critics, as Schulte and Sayce, that an unusually large proportion of δὲνογ λεγόμενα, or peculiar words, is found in the Epistle to the Hebrews as compared with other epistles of Paul. This is denied by Prof. Stuart, who institutes an elaborate comparison between this epistle and others of Paul, and finds no proportion similar to this point. (See his Comm. on Hebrews, 21 ed., p. 217 ff., 223 ff.) As the result of this examination, he finds in 1 Cor. 230 words which occur nowhere else in the writings of Paul; while in the Epistle to the Hebrews, according to the reckoning of Sayce, there are only 115 words of this class. Taking into account the comparative length of the two epistles, the number of peculiar words in the Epistle to the Heb-naeas as compared with that in 1 Cor. is, according to Prof. Stuart, in the proportion of 1 to 1. 17. Hence he argues, that "if the number of δὲνογ λεγόμενα in our epistle proves that it was not from the hand of Paul, it must be more abundantly evident that Paul cannot have been the author of the First Epistle to the Corinthen." The facts in the case, however, are very different from what Prof. Stuart supposes. In the first place, 20 of his δὲνογ λεγόμε in 1 Corinthians are found in the Epistle to the Hebrews, which, to make the comparison tolerably fair, should be assumed as Pauline; 5 others are found only in quotations; and 13 more do not properly belong in the list, while 28 should be added to it. Correcting these errors, we find the number of peculiar words in 1 Cor. to be about 217. On the other hand, the number of δὲνογ λεγόμε in the Epistle to the Hebrews, not only of course, those in quotations from the Old Testament, instead of being only 115, as Prof. Stuart assumes, is about 390. (The precise numbers vary a little according to the text of the Greek Testament adopted as the basis of comparison.) Leaving out of account quotations from the Old Testament, the number of lines in the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, in Knapp's edition of the Greek Testament, is 922; in the Epistle to the Hebrews, 690. We have then the proportion — 920 690 (922 1390) showing 1390 to the Hebrews, no more than 1390 to 690. The number of peculiar words was as great in 1 Corinthians in proportion to its length as in the Epistles to the Hebrews, we should find there 432 instead of about 217. In other words, the number of δὲνογ λεγόμε in Hebrews exceeds that in 1 Corinthians in nearly the proportion of 2 to 1. No judicious critic would rest an argument in such a case on the mere number of peculiar words; but if this matter is to be discussed at all, it is desirable that the facts should be correctly presented. There is much that is erroneous or fallacious in Professor Stuart's Notice remarking on the internal evidence. The work of Mr. Forster in relation to this subject (mentioned above), displays the same intellectual characteristics as his treatise on the Himyarite

Inscriptions, his One PIEIVAL AND LANGUAGE, and his N-e

Pen for the Authenticity of the Test of the Two Hebrew

Only Witnesses (1 John v. 7), recently published A

Lect. ix., leans to the same conclusion. Dr. S. Davidson, in his Introduction to the New Testament, gives a very careful and minute summary of the arguments of all the principal modern critics who reason upon the internal evidence, and concludes, in substantial agreement with the Alexandrian tradition, that St. Paul was the author of the epistle, and that, as regards its theology and style, St. Luke cooperated with him in making it what it now appears. The tendency of opinion in Germany has been to ascribe the epistle to some other author than St. Paul. Luther’s conjecture, that Apollos was the author, has been widely adopted by Le Clerc, Bleeke, De Wette, Tholuck, Bunsen, and others. Apollos, Amer. ed.] Barnabas has been named by Wieseler, Thiersch, and others, Luke by Grotius, Silhus by others. Neander attributes it to some apostolic man of the Pauline school, whose training and method of stating doctrinal truth differed from St. Paul’s. The distinguished name of II. Ewald has been given recently to the hypothesis (partly anticipated by Wetstein), that it was written neither by St. Paul, nor to the Hebrews, but by some Jewish teacher residing at Jerusalem to a church in some important Italian town, which is supposed to have sent a deputation to Palestine. Most of these guesses are quite desultory of historical evidence, and require the support of imaginary facts to place them on a seeming equality with the traditional account. They cannot be said to rise out of the region of possibility into that of probability; but they are such as any man of leisure and learning might multiply till they include every name in the limited list that we possess of St. Paul’s contemporaries.

The tradition of the Alexandrian fathers is not without some difficulties. It is truly said that the style of reasoning is different from that which St. Paul uses in his acknowledged epistles. But it may be replied,—Is the adoption of a different style of reasoning inconsistent with the versatility of that mind which could express itself in writings so diverse as the Pastoral Epistles and the preceding nine? or in speeches so diverse as those which are severally addressed to Pagans at Athens and Jews at Antioch. These and other passages are quite desultory of historical evidence, and require the support of imaginary facts to place them on a seeming equality with the traditional account. They cannot be said to rise out of the region of possibility into that of probability; but they are such as any man of leisure and learning might multiply till they include every name in the limited list that we possess of St. Paul’s contemporaries.

Among these must now be placed Dean Alford, whose fourth volume of his伟大著作 (published since the above article was in type), discusses the question with great care and candor, and concludes that the epistle was written by Apollos to the Romans, about A.D. 60, from Ephesus.

Among these are some, who, unlike Origen, deny that Barnabas is the author of the epistle which bears his name. If it be granted that we have no specimen of his style, the hypothesis which connects him with the Epistle to the Hebrews becomes less improbable. Many circumstances show that he possessed some qualities which would make it very likely that he should have written the letter. The reply must be in the words of Orig. &c. There is ample evidence to show that he is the most likely to have written it. The style is not quite like that of Clement of Rome. Both style and sentiment are quite unlike those of the author of the Epistle of Barnabas. The style is not quite like that of Clement of Rome. been inscribed by the writer of the epistle, might have been given to it, in accordance with the use of the term Hebrews in the N. T., if it had been addressed either to Jews who lived at Jerusalem, and spoke Aramaic (Acts vi. 1), or to the descend ants of Abraham generally (2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5).

But the argument of the epistle is such as could be used with most effect to a church consisting exclusively of Jews by birth, personally familiar with, and attached to, the Temple-service. And such a community (as Black, Hebberd, i. 31, argues) could be found only in Jerusalem and its neighborhood. And if the church at Jerusalem retained its former distinction of including a great company of priests (Acts vi. 7) — a class professionally familiar with the songs of the Temple, accustomed to discuss the interpretation of Scripture, and acquainted with the prevailing Alexandrian philosophy — such a church would be peculiarly fit to appreciate this epistle. For it takes from the Book of Psalms the remarkable proportion of sixteen out of thirty-two quotations from the O. T., which it contains. It relies on the examples of Timothy and Titus from Scripture that this circumstance has been pointed out as inconsistent with the tone of independent apostolic authority, which characterizes the undoubted epistles of St. Paul. And so frequent is the use of Alexandrian philosophy and exegesis that it has suggested to some critics Apollos as the writer, to others the Alexandrian church as the primary recipient of the epistle. If certain members of the church at Jerusalem possessed goods (Heb. x. 34), and the means of ministering to distress (vi. 10), this fact is not irreconcilable, as has been supposed, with the deep poverty of other inhabitants of Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 26, &c.); but it agrees exactly with the condition of that church thirty years previously (Acts ii. 45, and vi. 34), and with the historical estimate of the material prosperity of the Jews at this time (Mivrale, History of the Romans under the Empire, vi. 531, ch. i.). If St. Paul quotes to Hebrews the LXX without correcting it where it differs from the Hebrew, this agrees with his practice in other epistles, and with the fact that, as elsewhere so in Jerusalem, Hebrew was a dead language, acquired only with much pains by the learned. The Scriptures were popularly known in Aramaic or Greek, quotations were made from memory, and verified by memory. Probably Prof. Jowett is correct in his inference (1st ed. i. 301), that St. Paul did not familiarly know the Hebrew original, while he possessed a minute knowledge of the LXX.

Ebrard limits the primary circle of readers even to a section of the church at Jerusalem. Considering such passages as v. 12, vi. 10, x. 32, as probably inapplicable to the whole of that church, he conjectures that St. Paul wrote to some neophytes whose conversion, though not mentioned in the Acts, may have been partly due to the Apostle's influence in the time of his last recorded sojourn in Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 22).

Some critics have maintained that this epistle was addressed directly to Jewish believers everywhere; where, as others have restricted it to those who dwelt in Asia and Greece. Almost every city in which St. Paul labored has been selected by some critic as the place to which it was originally sent. Not only Rome and Cæsarea, where St. Paul was long imprisoned, but, amid the profound silence of its early Fathers, Alexandria also, which he never saw, have each found their advocates. And one conjecture connects this epistle specially with the Gentile Church of Ephesus, which was the nearest, and, in being entirely unsupported by historical evidence; and each of them has some special plausibility combined with difficulties peculiar to itself.

IV. Where and when was it written? — Eastern traditions of the fourth century, in connection with the opinion that St. Paul is the writer, name Italy and Rome, or Athens, as the place from whence the epistle was written. Either place would agree with, perhaps was suggested by, the mention of Clement of Rome. But the authenticity of his epistle, and the opinion that it was written in Italy; but Winer (Grammatik, § 66, 6), denies that the preposition necessarily has that force.

The epistle was evidently written before the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70. The whole argument, and specially the passages viii. 4 and ff., ix. 6 and ff. (where the present tenses of the Greek are unaccountably changed into past in the English version), and xiii. 10 and ff. imply that the Temple was standing; and that its usual course of Divine service was carried on without interruption; a Christian reader, keenly watching in the doomed city for the fulfillment of his Lord's prediction, would at once understand the ominous references to "that which beareth thorns and briers, and is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned:" "that which decayeth and waxeth old, and is ready to vanish away:" and the coming of the expected "Day," and the removing of those things that are shaken, vi. 8, viii. 19, x. 35, 37, xii. 27. But these forerunings seem less distinct and circumstantial than they might have been if uttered immediately before the catastrophe. The references to former teachers xiii. 7, and earlier instruction v. 12, and x. 32, might suit any time after the first years of the church; but it would be interesting to connect the first reference with the martyrdom of St. James at the Passover A. D. 62. Modern criticism has not destroyed, though it has weakened.

a For an explanation of the alleged ignorance of the author of Heb. ix. as to the furniture of the Temple, see Ebrard's Commentary on the passage, or Professor Stuart's Exegesis, xvi. and xvii.

b The influence of the Alexandrian school did not begin with Philo, and was not confined to Alexandria, [ALEXANDRIA.] The means and the evidence of its progress may be traced in the writings of the son of Menach (Maurice's Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy, § 9, p. 294), the author of the Book of Wisdom Ewald, Schottische, iv. 545), Aristobulus, Eusebius, Philo.

and Theodotus (Ewald, iv. 297); in the phraseology of St. John (Prof. Jowett, On the Theologicals, etc 1st ed. i. 408), and the arguments of St. Paul (ibid p. 531); in the establishment of an Alexandrian synagoge at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 9), and the existence of schools of scriptural interpretation there (Ewald, Geschichte, v. 63, and vi. 231).

The connection of this epistle with St. Paul's Roman captivity (A. D. 61-63) by substituting the reading τοὺς διδάσκοντας, "the prisoners," for τοὺς διδάσκοντας τοῦ (A. V. "me in my bonds"); x. 34; by proposing to interpret ἄπολεξιν, xiii. 23, as "sent away," rather than "set at liberty;" and by urging that the condition of the writer, as portrayed in xiii. 18, 19, 23, is not necessarily that of a prisoner, and that there may possibly be no allusion to it in xiii. 3. On the whole, the date which best agrees with the traditional account of the authorship and destination of the epistle is A. D. 63, about the end of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, or a year after Albinus succeeded Festus as procurator.

V. In what language was it written?—Like St. Matthew's Gospel, the Epistle to the Hebrews has afforded ground for much unimportant controversy respecting the language in which it was originally written. The earliest statement is that of Clement of Alexandria (preserved in Eus. H. E. vi. 14), to the effect that it was written by St. Paul in Hebrew, and translated by St. Luke into Greek; and hence, as Clement observes, arises the identity of the style of the epistle and that of the Acts. This statement is repeated, after a long interval, by Eusebius, Theodoret, Jerome, and several later fathers; but it is not noticed by the majority. Nothing is said to lead us to regard it as a tradition, rather than a conjecture suggested by the style of the epistle. No person is said to have used or seen a Hebrew original. The Aramaic copy, included in the Peshito, has never been regarded otherwise than as a translation. Among the few modern supporters of an Aramaic original the most distinguished are Joseph Hallet, an English writer in 1727 (whose able essay is most easily accessible in a Latin translation in Wolf's Oeuvres Philologiques, x. 808-837), and J. D. Michaelis. Eékloq. des Briefes an die Hebräer. Bleek (i. 6-23), argues in support of a Greek original, on the grounds of (1) the purity and easy flow of the Greek; (2) the use of Greek words which could not be adequately expressed in Hebrew without long paraphrase; (3) the use of paronomasia—under which head he discerns the inference against an Aramaic original which has been drawn from the double sense given to διδασκον, ix. 15; (4) the use of the Septuagint in quotations and references which do not correspond with the Hebrew text.

VI. Condition of the Hebrews, and scope of the Epistle.—The numerous Christian churches scattered throughout Judaea (Acts ix. 31; Gal. i. 22) were continually exposed to persecution from the Jews (1 Thess. ii. 14), which would become more searching and extensive as churches multiplied, and as the increasing turmoils of the nation ripened into the insurrection of A. D. 13. Personal violence, spoliation of property, exclusion from the synagogue, and domestic strife were the universal forms of persecution. But in Jerusalem there was one additional weapon in the hands of the predominant oppressors of the Christians. Their magnificent national Temple, hallowed to every Jew by ancient historical and by gentle personal recollections, with its lifelessśbling attractions, its solemn strains, and mysterious ceremonies, might be shut against the Hebrew Christian. And even if, amid the false facts and frequent oscillations of authority in Jerusalem, this affliction were not often laid upon him, yet there was a secret burden which every Hebrew Christian bore within him—the knowledge that the end of all the beauty and awfulness of Zion was rapidly approaching. Paralyzed, perhaps, by this consciousness, and emboldened by their attachment to a lower form of Christianity, they became stationary in knowledge, weak in faith, void of energy, and even in danger of apostasy from Christ. For, as afflictions multiplied round them, and made them feel more keenly their dependence on God, and their need of near and frequent and associated approach to Him, they seemed, in consequence of their Christianity, to be receding from the God of their fathers, and losing that means of communion with Him which they used to enjoy. Angels, Moses and the High-priest—their intercessors in heaven in the grave, and on earth—became of less importance in the creed of the Jewish Christian; then glory waned as he grew in Christian experience. Already he felt that the Lord's day was superseding the Sabbath, the New Covenant the Old. What could take the place of the Temple, and that which was behind the veil, and the Levitical sacrifices and the Holy City, when they should cease to exist? What compensation could Christianity offer him for the thing which was pressing—the Hebrew Christian more and more.

James, the bishop of Jerusalem, had just left his place vacant by a martyr's death. Neither to Cephas at Babylon, nor to John at Ephesus, the third pillar of the Apostolic Church, was it given to understand all the greatness of his want, and to speak to him the word in season. But there came to him from Rome the voice of one who had been the foremost in sounding the depth and breadth of that love of Christ which was all but incomprehensible to the Jew, one who feeling more than any other Apostle the weight of the care of all the churches, yet clung to his own people with a love ever ready to break out in impassioned words, and unsought and ill-requited deeds of kindness. He whom Jerusalem had sent away in chains to Rome again lifted up his voice in the hallowed city among his countrymen; but with words and arguments suited to explain the new era of Christianity, and to press home the anger of a God against the old, and a tone in which reigned no apostolic authority, and a face veiled in very love from wayward children who might refuse to bear divine and saving truth, when it fell from the lips of Paul.

He meets the Hebrew Christians on their own ground. His answer is—"Your new faith gives you Christ, and, in Christ, all you seek, all your fathers sought. In Christ the Son of God you have an all-sufficient Mediator, nearer than angels to the Father, eminent above Moses as a benefactor, more sympathizing and more prevailing than the high-priest as an intercessor: His blood awaits you in heaven; to His covenant the old was intended to be subservient; His atonement is the eternal reality of which sacrifices are but the passing shadow; His city heavenly, not made with hands. Having Him, believe in Him, with all your heart, with a faith in the unseen future, stronger than that of the saints of old, patient under present, and prepared for coming woe, full of energy, and hope, and holiness, and love." Such was the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews...

brews. We do not possess the means of tracing out step by step its effect upon them; but we know that the result at which it aimed was achieved. The church at Jerusalem did not apostatize. It migrated to Alexandria (Eusebius, Eclog. III., 5); and there, no longer dwindled under the cold shadow of overhanging Judaism, it followed the Hebrew Christians of the Dispersion in gradually entering on the possession of the full liberty which the law of Christ allows to all.

And this great epistle remains to after times, a keystone binding together that succession of inspired men which spans over the ages between Moses and Christ. It contains the most substantial identity of the revelation of God, whether given through the Prophets, or through the Son; for it shows that God's purposes are unchangeable, however diversely in different ages they have been "reflected in broken and fitful rays, glancing back from the troubled waters of the human soul." It is a source of inexhaustible comfort to every Christian sufferer in inward perplexity, or amid "reproaches and afflictions." It is a pattern to every Christian teacher of the method in which larger views should be imparted, gently, reverently, and seasonably, to feeble spirits prone to cling to ancient forms, and to rest in accustomed feelings.

VII. Literature connected with the Epistle.—In addition to the books already referred to, four commentaries may be selected as the best representatives of distinct lines of thought:—those of Chrysostom, Calvin, Estius, and Bleek. Lüningmann (1855 [2d ed. 1867]), and Deissmann (1858) have recently added valuable commentaries to those already in existence.

The commentaries accessible to the English reader are those of Professor Stuart (of Andover, U. S. [2d ed., 1833], abridged by Prof. R. D. C. Robbins, Andover, 1860), and of Ebrard, translated by the Rev. J. Fulton [in vol. vi. of Olshausen's Bibl. Comm., Amer. ed.]. Dr. Owen's Exegetical Notes on the Hebrews are not chiefly valuable as an analysis of collections. The Paraphrase and Notes of Peirce [2d ed. Lond. 1734] are praised by Dr. Doddridge. Among the well-known collections of English notes on the Greek text or English version of the N. T., those of Hammond, Fell, Whitby, Macknight, Wordworth, and Aldrington may be particularly mentioned. In Prof. Stanley's Sermons and Essays on the Apostolical Age there is a thoughtful and eloquent sermon on this epistle; and it is the subject of three whole voluminous Lectures, by the Rev. F. D. Maurice [Lond. 1846].

A tolerably complete list of commentaries on this epistle may be found in Bleek, vol. ii., pp. 10-16, and a comprehensive but shorter list at the end of Ebrard's Commentary.

* The opinion that the Epistle to the Hebrews was not written by Paul has found favor with many besides those whose names have been mentioned. Among these are Ullmann (Stud. u. Krit. 1829, p. 388 f.), Schott (Langreise, 1830, §§ 70-87), Schliermacher (Einl. ins N. T. p. 439), Lechler (Das Apost. Zeitalt. p. 159 f.), Wieseler (Chron. d. Apost. Zeitalt. p. 504 f.), and in a separate treatise (Übersicht über den Hebräerbrief, Kiel, 1861), Twisten (Dogmatt., 4te Aufl., i. 95, and in Piper's Evangel. Kalender for 1838, p. 43 f.), Kostlin (in Baur and Zeller's Theol. Jahrb. 1834, p. 425 f.).

In justice to this opinion, the chief arguments urged in its support will be more particularly stated. Those furnished by the epistle itself may be classified according to their general nature as formal, doctrinal, personal:

i. To the first class belong, (1.) The absence of a salutation, and in general the treatise-like character of the epistle. The explanation of Paulus (?) is inadequate, for Paul might have sent a salutation without styling himself "apostle" (cf. Epp. to Phil. Thess. Phil.) the supposition of Clement of Alexandria attributes to the Apostle a procedure which, even if it were worthy of him, was hardly practicable, certainly hazardous, and plainly at variance with the indications that the author was known to his readers (cf. xii. 18, 19, 22 f.). The assumption that Paul in this epistle abandoned his ordinary manner of composition for some unknown reason, admits the facts, but adopts what, in view of the thirteen extant specimens of his epistolary style, is the less probable explanation of them. (2.) The peculiar electric character of the O. T. Paul quotes the O. T. freely, in the epistle it is quoted with punctilious accuracy; Paul very often gives evidence of having the Hebrew in mind, the epistle almost (if not quite) uniformly reproduces the LXX. version, and that, too, in a form of the text (Cod. Alex.) differing generally from the LXX. text employed by the Apostle (Cod. Vet.), Paul commonly introduces his quotations as "Scripture," often gives the name of the human author, but in the epistle the quotations, with but a single exception (ii. 6), are attributed more or less directly to God. (3.) The characteristics of expression. (a.) The epistle is destitute of many of Paul's favorite expressions — expressions which, being of a general nature and pertinent in any epistle, betray the Apostle's habits of thought. For instance, the phrase ἐκ τῶν ἔργων τῶν ἥλιων (variously modified as respects arrangement and pronouns), which occurs in every one of Paul's epistles, and more than 80 times in all, is not to be found in the Epistle to the Hebrews; the word εὐαγγελίζον, though used 60 times by Paul, and in all his epistles except that to Titus, is not met with in this epistle; he seems παρίδος, applied to God 36 times by Paul (exclusive of 6 instances in which God is called the Father of Christ), and occurring in every one of his epistles, is so used but once in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and then by way of antithesis (Heb. xii. 9). (b.) It substitutes certain synonymous words and constructions in place of those usual with Paul: ex. gr. μισθος διαδοθέντα for the simple μισθός employed by Paul; μετοχία εἰπα, etc., instead of Paul's κοινωνία etc.; the intransitive use of καθίζω in the phrase καθίζω εν διζίν τοις, where Paul uses the verb transitively; the expression διαπαντους, εἰς τὸ παντελές, εἰς τὸ διαπέρνεται instead of Paul's πάντοτε.

(c.) It exhibits noticeable peculiarities of expression: the phrase εἰς τὸ διαπέρνεται belongs to this class also; other specimens are the use of ὅσον... κατὰ τοσοῦτον ὡς ὀνόμα, τοσοῦτον... ὅσον alone, and of παρά and ὑπὲρ in expressing comparison: connectives, like εἰς τὸν παρευρ. (three times, ἓνεκεν six times), which are never used by Paul. (d.) And in general its language and style differ from Paul's—its language, in being less Hebraistic, more literary, more idiosyncratic in construction; its style, in being less impassioned, more regular, more rhetorical and euphonious. These differences have been generally conceded from the first, and by such judges as Clement of Alexandria and Origen, to whom Greek was vernacular. They are not satisfactorily accounted for by supposing a considerable interval of time to have elapsed between the composition of the other epistles and this—for so far as we are acquainted with the Apostle's history we can find no room for such an interval, and his style as exhibited in the other epistles shows no tendency towards the required transformation; nor by assuming that Paul elaborated his style because writing to Jews—for the Jews were not accustomed to finished Greek, and he who to the Jews became as a Jew did not trouble himself to polish his style on occasions when such labor might have been appreciated (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 6); nor by attributing the literary elegance of the epistle to its amanuensis—for the other epistles were dictated to different persons, yet exhibit evident marks of a common author.

II. The doctrinal indications at variance with the teaching of Paul's Partnership do amount to a conflict in any particular with the presentations of truth made by the Apostle; nor are its divergencies from the Pauline type of doctrine so marked as those of James and John. Still, it has peculiarities which are distinctive: Paul delights to present the Gospel as justification before God though faith in the Crucified One; in the Epistle to the Hebrews, on the other hand, it is represented as consummated Judaism. Without a marked difference, the epistle defines and illustrates faith in a generic sense, as trust in God's assurances and as antithetic to sight; whereas with Paul faith is specific—a sinner's trust in Christ—and antithetic (generally) to works; it sets forth the eternal high priesthood of the Messiah, while Paul dwells upon Christ's triumphant resurrection: in it the seed of Abraham are believing Jews, while Paul everywhere makes his converts Jews simply by the grace of life: it is conspicuous, too, among the N. T. writings for its spiritualizing, at times half-mystical, mode of interpreting the O. T. Further, these different presentations of the Christian doctrine are general made to rest upon different grounds: Paul speaks as the messenger of God, often referring, indeed, to the O. T.; but still often quietly assuming plenary authority to declare that a passage was revealed to holy men of old; but the writer to the Hebrews rests his teaching upon Biblical statements almost exclusively.

III. Among the matters personal which seem to conflict with the opinion that the epistle is Paul's, are enumerated, (1.) The circumstance that it is addressed to Jewish readers: if Paul wrote it, he departed, in doing so, from his ordinary province of labor (cf. Gal. ii. 9; Rom. xv. 20). (2.) The omission of any justification of his apostolic course relative to Judaism; and, assuming the epistle to have been destined for believers at Jerusalem, his use of language implying affectionate intimacy with them (xiii. 19, etc.; cf. Acts xxi. 17 f). (3.) The cool, historic style in which reference is made to the early persecutions and martyrdoms of the church at Jerusalem (xiii. 7, xii. 4). In these Paul had a prominent actor; and such passages as I Cor. xv. 9; 1 Tim. i. 12 f, show how he was accustomed to allude to them, even in writing to third parties. (4.) The intimation (ii. 3) that the writer, like his readers, received the Gospel indirectly, through those who had been the personal disciples of Christ. Paul, on the contrary, uniformly insists that he did not receive the Gospel through any human channel, but by direct revelation; and he accordingly claims equality with the other Apostles (Gal. i. 1, 11, 12, 13, 16; ii. 6; 1 Cor. ix. 1, 11, 23; Eph. iii. 2, 3; 2 Cor. xi. 5). The reply, that the writer here uses the plural communicatively and, strictly speaking, does not mean to include himself, is unsatisfactory. For he does not quietly drop a distinction out of sight; he expressly designates three separate classes, namely, "the Lord," "them that heard," and "we," and, in the face of this explicit distinction, includes himself in the third class—this he does, although his argument would have been strengthened had he been able (like Paul) to appeal to a direct revelation from heaven.

These internal arguments are not offset by the evidence from tradition. Respecting that evidence, statements like Olshausen's give an impression not altogether correct. For, not to mention that Eusebius, although often citing the epistle as Paul's, elsewhere admits (as Origen had virtually done before him, Eusebius, H. E. xi. 21) that its apostolic origin was not wholly unquestioned by the oriental churches (H. E. iii. 3), and in another passage (H. E. vi. 13) even classes it himself among the antilegomena, it is noticeable that the Alexandrian testimony from the very first gives evidence that the epistle was left to possess characteristics at variance with Pauline authorship. The statement of Clement that the epistle was translated from the Hebrew into Greek at a later period is regarded as incorrect: how can we be assured of the truth of the accompanying assertion—or rather, the other half of the same statement—that it was written by Paul? Further, in the conflict of testimony between the East and the West, it is not altogether clear that the probabilities favor the East. Half a century before we find the epistle mentioned in the Church at Antioch; nearly thirty years after it was written, it was known and prized at Rome by a man anciently believed to have been a fellow-laborer with the Apostle. It seems hardly possible, that Paul surnamed its author, Clement should have been ignorant of the fact; or that, the fact once known, know edge of it should have died out while the epistle itself survived. And yet in all parts of the West —

n Gaul, Italy, Africa—the epistle is un-Pauline.

The theory that Paul was mediately or indirectly the author has been adopted by Hug (Eind. ii. 422 f.), Eberard (in Olshausen's Com. on N. T., vi. 520, Kendrick's ed.), Guericke (Gesammelte Abh. des N. T. p. 419 f.), Davidson (Introduction to the N. T. iii. 256 f.), Delitzsch (in Rudolph and Guericke's Zeitschr. for 1849, trans. in the Evangel. Rec. Mercersburg, Oct. 1850, p. 184 ff., and in his Com. p. 707), Bloomfield (Gr. Text., 9th ed., ii. 574 ff.), Buchholz on the 2d Epistle to the Corinthians, p. 1 chap. 2, and others, who think Luke to have given the epistle its present form; by Thiersch (in the Progr. named above, and in Die Kirche im Apos. Zeit. d. p. 197 f.), Conybeare (as above), and others, who make Barnabas chiefly responsible for its style; by Olshausen (Opusc. p. 118 ff.), who supposes that sundry precursors were concerned in its origin; and by many who regard the Apostle's assistant as unknown. Now respecting the theory of mediately authorship it may be remarked: If Paul dictated the epistle, and Luke or some other scriba merely penned it, Paul remains its sole author; this was his usual mode of composing; this mode of composition does not occasion any perceptible diversity in his style; hence, this form of the hypothesis is useless as an explanation of the epistle's peculiarities. Again, if the epistle is assumed to be the joint production of Paul and some friend or friends, the assumption is unnatural, without evidence, without unequivocal analogy in the origin of any other inspired epistle, and insufficient to remove the difficulties in the case. Once more, if we suppose the ideas to be in the main Paul's, but their present form to be due to some one else, then Paul, not having participated actively in the work of composing the epistle, cannot according to the ordinary use of language be called its author. Whatever be the capacity in which Paul associates Timothy, Silvanus, and Sosthenes with himself in the salutation prefixed to some of his epistles,—and it is noteworthy that he does not on this account hesitate to continue in the 1st pers. sing. (see Phil. i. 3), or to use the 3d pers. of his associate at the very next mention of him (ii. 19),—the assumption of some similar associate in composing the Epistle to the Hebrews, even if it had historic warrant, would not answer the purpose designed. For the style of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, in which Sosthenes is conjoined with Paul, bears the Apostle's impress as unmistakably as does the style of the 2d Epistle to the Corinthians, where Timothy writes in the salutation. And in both, the individuality of the Apostle is as sharply defined as it is in the Epistle to the Romans. (The philologeal evidence thought by Delitzsch to show Luke's hand in the composition, has been collected and examined by Linnemann, as above, § 1.)

The opinion that Paul was the proper and sole author (besides the modern advocates of it already named), has been defended by Gelpeke (Vindictio, etc.), a writer in the Spirit of the Pilgrims for 1828 and 1829 (in reply to Prof. Norton), Gurney in the Bibl. Repos. for 1832, p. 409 ff., e. transcted from Biblical Notes and Dissertations, Lond. 1830), Eier (Der Brief an die Hebrüer, p. 422), Lewis (Lippincott's Discourses on the Gospels, 1845), in the Journal of the Sacred Lit., for 1890, p. 192 f., 193 ff., Hofmann (Schreibung, ii. 2, 2te Aufl., p. 573, cf. p. 105), Robbins (in the Bibl. Sacra for 1861, p. 469 ff.), cf. Tobler (in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr. for 1864, p. 533 ff.); Wordsworth (Gr. Text. ii. (1) 961 ff.); Stone (Origins and Hist. of the Books of the N. T. 1866, p. 370 ff.); Pond (in the Cong. Review for 1868, p. 28 ff.);—see a review of the evidence in favor of, and against, the Pauline authorship, in the Bibl. Sacra for Oct. 1867.

The opinion that the epistle was destined originally for Alexandrian readers (in opposition to which see Linnemann, Handb. Eind. § 2), has been adopted by Kastlin (as above, p. 383 ff.), Wieseler (as above, and in the Stud. u. Krit. for 1897, p. 605 ff.), Conybeare and Howson (as above), Bunsen (Hippol. and his Age, ii. 140, Germ. ed. 1865), Hilgenfeld (Zeitschr. f. Wiss. Theol., 1858, p. 104), Ritschl (as above), and seems to be favored by Muratoru's Fragment (see Westcott, Canon of the N. T. 2d ed. p. 480, cf. p. 190). Rome as its destination has been advocated fully by Holtzmann in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift for 1867, pp. 1-35.

The date of the epistle is fixed by Eberard at A. D. 62; by Lardner, Davidson, Schaff, Lindsay, and others at 63; by Lange (in Herzog's Real-Encycl. xi. 245) to 64; by Stuart, Tholuck, and others about 64; by Wieseler in the year 64 "between spring and July"; by Riehn, Hilgenfeld (as above) 64-66; De Wette, Linnemann, and others 65-67; Ewald "summer of 66"; Bunsen 67; Conybeare and Howson, Bleek (Eind. iia N. T. p. 553) 68-9; Alford 68-70.

The doctrine of the epistle has been generally discussed by Neander (Pilagint, etc. bk. vi. chap. ii. Robinson's ed. p. 187 f.), Kastlin (Jehan. Lehrbegr. p. 387 ff.), Reuss (Histoire de la Theologie Chrétienne, tom. ii.), Messner (as above), most fully by Riehn (as above); its Christology by Moll (in a series of programs, 1854 ff.), A. Sarrus (Jesus Christ d'apres l'Opiniére de l'E'ge aux Hibr., Strassb. 1851, and Beyerlag (Christologie des N. T., 1866, p. 170 ff.). The Melchisedee priesthood is treated of by Auberlen (Stud. u. Krit. for 1857, p. 453 ff.).

Its mode of employing the O. T. has been considered by De Wette (Theol. Zeitschr. by Schleierm., De Wette and Lücke, 3te Heft, p. 1 ff.), Tholuck (Beilage i. to his Com., also published separately with the title Das alte Text. im N. T., 3te Aufl 1861), and Fairlairn (Typology of Scripture. bk. ii. Append. B, viii. Amer. ed. vol. i. 302 ff.).

of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18, xxiii. 12). The immediate children of Hebron are not mentioned by name (comp. Ex. vi. 21, 22), but he was the founder of a "family" (Mishpachath) of Hebronites (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 39, 30, 31) or Bene-Hebron (1 Chr. xxv. 29, xxiii. 19), who are often mentioned in the enumerations of the Levites in the passages above cited. Jerahmeel was the head of the family in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 31, xxiv. 23; in the last of these passages the name of Hebron does not now exist in the Hebrew, but has been supplied in the A. V. from the other lists). In the last year of David's reign we find them settled at Jazer in Gilead (a place not elsewhere named as a Levitical city), "mighty men of valor." (1 Chr. xxvi. 2, 700 in number, who were superintendent for the king over the two and a half tribes in regard to all matters sacred and secular (1 Chr. xxviii. 31, 32). At the same time 1700 of the family under Hashabiah held the same office on the west side of Jordan (1 Chr. xxi. 30).

2. This name appears in the genealogical lists of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 42, 43), where Maresah is said to have been the "father of Hebron," who again had four sons, one of whom was Tappuach. The three names just mentioned are those of phases, as are also many others in the subsequent branches of this genealogy—Ziph, Maon, Beth-zur, etc. But it is impossible at present to say whether these names are intended to be those of the places themselves or of persons who founded them.

G. Hebron (יהבון [see supra]: Heb. בון and נֶבֶון; [Hebron]; 1 Mc. v. 65; Chaldean). Arab. حِرْمْنُّ := the friendly), a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 54): situated among the mountains (Josh. xii. 7), 29 Roman miles south of Jerusalem, and the same distance north of Beer-sheba (Othoam. v. s. Æsop.). Hebron is one of the most ancient cities in the world still existing; and in this respect it is the rival of Damascus. It was built, says a medieval writer, "seven years before Zosim in Egypt." (Num. xxvii. 22). But if Zosim built? It is well we can prove the high antiquity of Hebron independently of Egypt's mystical annals. It was a well known town when Abraham entered Canaan 3780 years ago (Gen. xiii. 18). Its original name was Kirjath-Arba (כִּירָעַת-אָרָבָּא; LXX., Κυραθ-ερβοκείφωρ, Judg. ii. 10), "the city of Arba:" so called from Arba, the father of Anak, and progenitor of the giant Anakim (Josh. xxi. 14, xv. 13, 14). It was sometimes called Mamre, doubtless from Abraham's friend and ally, Mamre the Amorite (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxvii. 27); but the "cave of Mamre," where the Patriarch so often pitched his tent, appears to have been not in, but near Hebron. (MAYNE.) The chief interest of this city arises from its having been the scene of some of the most remarkable events in the lives of the patriarchs. Sarah died at Hebron; and Abraham then bought from Ephron the Hittite the field and cave of Machpelah, to serve as a family tomb (Gen. xxiii. 2-9). The cave is still there; and the massive walls of the Hebron or mosque, within which it lies, form the most remarkable object in the whole city. (MAYNE.) Abraham is called by Mohammedans, el-Khulif, "the Friend," i.e. of God, and this is the modern name of Hebron. When the Israelites entered Palestine Hebron was taken by Joshua from the descendants of Anak, and given to Caleb (Josh. x. 36, xiv. 6-15, xv. 13, 14). It was assigned to the Levites, and made "a city of refuge" (Josh. xxi. 11-13). Here David first established the seat of his government, and dwelt during the seven years and a half he reigned over Judah (2 Sam. v. 5). Hebron was rebuilt after the Captivity; but it soon fell into the hands of the Edomites, from whom it was rescued by Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc. viii. 65; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 8, § 6). A short time before the capture of Jerusalem Hebron was burned by an officer of Vespasian (Joseph. B. J. iv. 9, § 9). About the beginning of the 12th century it was occupied by Crusaders. It subsequently lay a time in ruins (Albert Aqu. vii. 15; Swaolf in Early Travels in Pala., p. 45); but in A. D. 1167 it was made the seat of a Latin bishopric (Will. Tyr. xx. 3). In 1187 it reverted to the Muslims, and has ever since remained in their hands.

Hebron now contains about 5000 inhabitants, of whom some 50 families are Jews. It is picturesque situated in a narrow valley, surrounded by rocky hills. This, in all probability, is that "valley of Edom," whence the Jewish spies got the great bunch of grapes (Num. xiii. 23). Its sides are still clothed with luxuriant vineyards, and its grapes are considered the finest in Southern Palestine. Groves of gray olives, and some other fruit-trees, give variety to the scene. The valley runs from north to south; and the main quarter of the town, surrounded by the lofty walls of the venerable Hebron, lies partly on the eastern slope (Gen. xxvii. 14; comp. xxi. 19). [EASTRON.] The houses are all of stone, solidly built, that-roofed, each having one or two small cupolas. The town has no walls, but the main streets opening on the principal roads have gates. In the bottom of the valley south of the town is a large tank, 130 ft. square, by 50 deep; the sides are solidly built with hewn stones. At the northern end of the principal quarter is another, measuring 50 ft. long, by 55 broad. Both are of high antiquity; and one of them, probably the former, is that over which David hanged the murderers of Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 12). About a mile from the town, up the valley, is one of the largest oak-trees in Palestine. It stands quite alone in the midst of the vineyards. It is 33 ft. in girth, and its branches cover a space 80 ft. in diameter. This, says some, is the very tree beneath which Abraham pitched his tent; but, however this may be, it still bears the name of the patriarch. (Porter's Hand-ook, p. 67 ff.; Rob. ii. 76 ff.)

2. (אֲבֹדֶל, and שֵׁבְרֹם: Ἂξαβών, Alex. Αξ-), Achran, later editions Abdon). One of the towns in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 28), on the boundary of the tribe. It is named next to Rehob, and is apparently in the neighborhood of Zidon. By Eusebius and Jerome it is merely mentioned (Onomast. Achran), and no one in modern times has discovered its site. It will be observed that the name in the original is quite different from that of Hebron, the well-known city of Judah (No. 1), although in the A. V. they are the same, our translators having represented the aion by H, instead of by G, or by the vowel only, as is their usual custom. But, in addition, it is not certain whether the name should not rather be Ebdon or Abdon (עֵבְדוֹן), since that form is found in many MSS. (Davidson, Hebr. Text; Ges. Thes. p. 980), and since an Abdon is named amongst the Levitical cities of Asher in other lists, which otherwise would be unmentioned here. On the other hand, the old versions (excepting only the Vat. LXX., which is obviously corrupt) unanimously retain the H [Abdon].

* Kirjath Arba does not appear to have been the original name of Hebron; but simply the name immediately prior to the Israelitish occupancy. For we are told that it was so called from Arba, the father of Anak (Josh. xv. 13, 14); and the children of Anak were the occupants when Caleb took it, as we learn from the same passage. But in Abraham’s time there was a different occupant, Manure the ally of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13, 24); and the place was then called by his name (Gen. xxviii. 19, xxxv. 27). This appellation, then, preceded that of Kir- jath Arba. But as the place was a very ancient one (Num. xiii. 22), and as Manure was Abraham’s contemporary, it had some name older than either of these two. What was that previous name? The first mention of the place (Gen. xiii. 18) would obviously indicate Hebron as the previous and original name — subsequently displaced (in part at least) by Manure, afterwards by Arba, but restored to its ancient and time-honored rights when Arba’s descendants, the Anakim, were driven out by the descendants of Abraham.

HEBONITES, THE (חָבִיִּים, חָבִיִּים, חָבִיִּים: δ Ἑβραῖοι, δ Ἑβραῖοι [Vat. πα.: Ἑβρόνιται, Ἑβρόνιται]). A tribe of the Kohathite Levites, descendants of Hebron the son of Kohath (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23). In the reign of David the chief of the family west of the Jordan was Hashabiah; while on the east in the land of Gilead were Jerijah and his brethren, “men of valor,” over the Hebeni- nites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. xxvi. 30, 31, 32).

HEDGE (חֵץ, חֵץ, חֵץ: φράσας). The first three words thus rendered in the A. V., as well as their Greek equivalent, denote simply that which surrounds or incloses, whether it be a stone wall (חֵץ, פֶּהֶר), Prov. xxiv. 31; Ez. xiii. 10), or a fence of other materials. חֵץ, פֶּהֶר, and חֵץ, חוֹדֶר, are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Num. xxii. 24; Ps. lxxxix. 40; 1 Chr. iv. 23), and the latter is employed to describe the wide walls of stone, or fences of thorn, which served as a shelter for sheep in winter and summer (Num. xxxii. 16). The stone walls which surrounded the sheepfolds of modern Palestine are frequently crowned with sharp thorns (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 299), a custom at least as ancient as the time of Homer (Od. xiv. 10), when a kind of prickly pear (אֵיזֵבְּרָס) was used for that purpose, as well as for the fences of cornfields at a later period (Arist. Exec. 355). In order to protect the vineyards from the ravages of wild beasts (Ps. lixx. 12) it was customary to surround them with a wall of loose stones or mud (Matt. xxi. 33; Mark xii. 1), which was a favorite haunt of serpents (Exod. x. 8), and a retreat for locusts from the cold (Nah. iii. 17). Such walls are described by Manoah as surrounding the gardens of Dannahus; “they are built of great pieces of earth, made in the fashion of brick and hardened in the sun. In their dimensions they are each two yards long and somewhat more than one breadth, and half a yard thick. Two rows of these, placed one upon another, make a cheap, expedient, and, in this dry country, a durable wall” (Early Trav. in Pet. p. 487). A wall or fence of this kind is clearly distinguished in Is. v. 5 from the tangled hedges, מַעְרַכָּה (מַעְרַכָּה, Mic. vii. 4), which was planted as an additional safeguard to the vineyard (cf. Ezech. xxviii. 24), and was composed of the thorny shrubs with which Palestine abounds.

The prickly pear, a species of cactus, so frequently employed for this purpose in the East at present, is believed to be of comparatively modern introduction. The aptness of the comparison of a tangled hedge of thorns to the difficulties which a foolish man conjures up as an excus e for his inactivity, will be at once recognized (Prov. xv. 19; cf. Hos. ii. 6). The narrow paths between the hedges of the vineyards and gardens, “with a fence on this side and a fence on that side” (Num. xxxii. 24), are distinguished from the “highways,” or more frequented tracks, in Luke xiv. 23.

HEGAI (2 esyl) (חָגָי [Persian name, Ges.]: Φαί: Φαίος), one of the eunuchs (A. V. “chamberlains”) of the court of Abasuerus, who had special charge of the women of the harem (Esth. ii. 8, 15). According to the Hebrew text he was a distinct person from the “keeper of the concubines” — Shashagaz (14), but the LXX. have the same name in 14 as in 8, while in 15 they omit it altogether. In verse 3 the name is given under the different form of HEGE (חָגָי, Φαίος), probably a Persian name. Φαί signifies eunuch in Sanskrit, in accordance with which the LXX. have Ἰωσίφος, Hegas, Ηγής, is mentioned by Ctesias as one of the people about Xerxes, Gesenius, Thes. Addenda, p. 81 b.

HEIFEI (חָפֵה, חָפֵה, חָפֵה: δαμαλις: κορέα). The Hebrew language has no expression that exactly corresponds to our heifer; for both εἶδνυς and περίκες are applied to cows that have calved (1 Sam. vi. 7-12; Job xii. 10; Is. vii. 21): indeed εἶδνυς means a young animal of any species, the full expression being εἶδνυς βοτρις, “heifer of kine” (Deut. xxxi. 3; 1 Sam. xvi. 2; Is. vii. 21). The heifer or young cow was not commonly used for ploughing, but only for treading out the corn (Hos. x. 11; but see Judg. xiv. 18),5 when it ran about without any headstall (Judg. xiv. 24): hence the use of the unheadled heifer (Hos. iv. 16; A. V. “a lack-sidering”), to which Israel is compared. A similar sense has been attached to the expression “a calf of three years old,” i.e., unbridled, in Is. xv. 5, Jer. xxxii. 34; but it is much more probably to be taken as a proper name, Ephthah Shekibzib, such names being not uncommon. The sense of “disolute” is conveyed undoubtedly in Am. iv. 1. The comparison of Egypt to a “fair heifer” (Jer. xiv. 20) may be an allusion to the well-known form under whichApis was worshipped (to which we may also refer the words in ver. 15, as understood in the LXX., “Why is the bullock, μαγεύς ἐκλειπόντας, swept away? ”), the “destruction” threatened being the bite of the gad-fly, to which the word keretz would aptly apply. “To plough with another man’s heifer” (Judg. xiv. 18) implies that an advantage has been gained by unfair means. The proper names Ephah, Eiphchaim, and Yar, are derived from the Hebrew terms at the head of this article.

HEIR. The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a very simple character. Under the patriarchal system the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. xxi. 10, xxiv. 36, xxv. 5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest, on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. [Because of...]

The sons of concubines were particularly concerned with the question of inheritance, occasionally they were placed on a par with the legitimate sons (Gen. xlix. 1 f.), but this may have been restricted to cases where the children had been adopted by the legitimate wife (Gen. xxx. 3). At a later period the exclusion of the sons of concubines was rigidly enforced (Judg. xi. 1 f.). Daughters had no share in the patrimony (Gen. xxvii. 14), but received a marriage portion, consisting of a maid-servant (Gen. xxix. 24, 29), or some other property. As a matter of special favor they sometimes took part with the sons (Job xlii. 15). The Mosaic law regulated the succession to real property thus: it was to be divided among the sons, the eldest receiving a double portion (Deut. xxi. 17), the others equal shares: if there were no sons, it went to the daughters (Num. xxvii. 8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Num. xxxvi. 6 f.; Tob. vi. 12, 17), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited (Josh. iv. 1 f., 7, § 5). If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the nearest of kin (Num. xxvii. 9-11). In the case of a widow left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and in the event of his refusal the next of kin (Ruth iii. 12, 13): with him rested the obligation of re-securing the property of the widow (Ruth iv. 1 f.), if it had been either sold or mortgaged: this obligation was termed כשלון השם ("the right of inheritance"), and was exercised in other cases besides that of marriage (Gen. xxvii. 7 f.).

If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin. The object of these regulations evidently was to prevent the alienation of the land, and to retain it in the same family: the Mosaic law enforced, in short, a strict entail. Even the assignment of the double portion, which under the patriarchal régime had been at the disposal of the father (Gen. xviii. 22), was by the Mosaic law limited to the eldest son (Deut. xxi. 15-17). The case of David and Caleb presents a field (Josh. xiv. 18, 19; Judg. i. 15), an exception: but perhaps even in that instance the land reverted to Caleb's descendants either at the death of Achshah or in the year of Jubilee. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of heasip, as we understand it, was hardly known to the Jews: succession was a matter of right, and not of favor—a state of things which is embodied in the Hebrew language itself, for the word נכס (A. v. "to inherit") implies possession, and very often forceful possession (Dent. ii. 12; Judg. i. 29 xi. 24), and a similar idea lies at the root of the words הַבְּשַׁדַּי and הַבְּשַׁדַּי, generally translated "inheritance." Testimonial dispositions were of course superfluous: the nearest approach to the idea is the blessing, which in early times conveyed temporal as well as spiritual benefits (Gen. xxvii. 10, 37; Josh. xxv. 19). The references to wills in St. Paul's writings are borrowed from the usages of Greece and Rome (Heb. ix. 17), whence the custom was introduced into Judaea: several wills are noticed by Josephus in connection with the Herods (Ant. xiii. 16, § 1, xviii. 3, § 2; B. J. ii. 2 § 3).

With regard to personal property, it may be presumed that the owner had some authority over it, at all events during his lifetime. The admission of a slave to a portion of the inheritance with the sons (Prov. xvii. 2) probably applies only to the personal estate. A presentation of half the property formed the marriage portion of Tobit's wife (Tob. viii. 21). A distribution of goods during the father's lifetime is implied in Luke xvi. 11-13: a distinction may be noted between ωσια, a general term applicable to personalty, and καμπηοτηρία, the landed property, which could only be divided after the father's death (Luke xii. 13).

There is a striking resemblance between the Hebrew and Athenian customs of heasip, particularly as regards the daughter (ἐγερτοφόρος), who, were in both nations, bound to marry her nearest relation: the property did not vest in the husband even for his lifetime, but devolved upon the son of the heasip as soon as he was of age, who also bore the name of his father, but of his maternal grandfather. The object in both countries was the same, namely, to preserve the name and property of every family (Dict. of Ant. art. ἐγεερτοφόρος).

HELAH (יהלא; v. 1) [root]: Αἰαδία; Alex. Alass; Hellen], one of the two wives of Ashur, father of Tekoa (1 Chr. iv. 5). Her three children are enumerated in ver. 7. In the LXX. the passage is much more confused, the sons being ascribed to different wives from what they are in the Hebrew text.

HELAH (יהלא) [perh. power of the people, Gr.: Αἰαδία; Hellen], a place east of the Jordan, but west of the Euphrates ("the river"), at which the Syrians were collected by Halahzeru, and which David met and defeated them (2 Sam. x. 16, 17). In the latter verse the name appears as Chelannah (יהלאנה), but the final syllable is probably only the particle of motion. This longer form, Χαλανάδα, the present text b in the LXX. inserts in ver. 16 as the name of the river (but Alex. and Comp. omit it); while in the two other places it has Αἰαδία, corresponding to the Hebrew text. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 6, § 3) the name is decorative as to the existence of such a right among the Galatians (see Lightfoot's St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, p. 104, 2d ed.). The Apostle, in arguing his point (Gal. iv. 2), may have framed a case of this nature for the sake of illustration, or have had in mind certain discretionary power which the Roman laws granted to the father.

a It has been suggested that in Gal. iv. 2 Paul may have referred to a peculiar testamentary law among the Galatians (see Galas, Institutiones, i. § 55) conferring on the father a right to determine the time of the son's majority, instead of its being fixed by statute. In that case we should have the facility with which Paul could avail himself of his knowledge of minute local regulations in the lands in which he visited. (See Baung-Crusius, Comm. über τα Βιβλια τον Οικετην, p. 51.) But that passage in ius, when most closely examined, proves not to be

b This is probably a late addition, since in the LXX text as it stood in Orig. n's Ἠραρχα, Χαλανάδα was omitted after Αἰαδία (cf. Ant. Bahr, i. iv).
given as Χαλαμαί, and as being that of the king of the Syrians beyond Euphrates — πρὸς Χαλαμαί τον τῶν πέραν Ἑυφράτου Σιών Βασιλέα. In the Vulgate no name is inserted after plurimum; but in ver. 16, for "came to Helam," we find adjecturum verum, reading Ἡλβαθον, "their army." This too is the rendering of the old translator A vila — in δυνάμει αὐτῶν — of whose version v r. 16 has survived. In 17 the Vulgate agrees with the L. V. Many conjectures have been made as to the locality of Helbon; but to none of them does any certainty attach. The most feasible perhaps is that it is identical with Amathath, a town named by Ptolemy, and located by him on the west of the Euphrates near Nicopolium.

HELBAH (Ἑλβαθον) [fort]: Χεβδαι; [Alex. Σχεβδαι (acc.); Comp. Ἐλβαι]: Helbon, a town of Asher, probably on the plain of Phoenicia, not far from Siron (Josul. i. 31). J. L. P.

HELION (Ἑλίον) [fort, i.e. νεφελεῖα]: Χεβδεαν; [Alex. Χεβρον], a place only mentioned once in Scripture. Ezekiel, in describing the wealth and commerce of Tyre, says, "Damascus was thy merchant in the wine of Helbon [xxvii. 18]." The Vulgate translates these words in rino piissimis and some other ancient versions also make the word descriptive of the quality of the wine. There can be no doubt, however, that Helbon is a proper name. Strabo speaks of the wine of Chalbon (αὐτόν ἐκ Συρίας τὸν Χαλβδεαν) from Syria as among the luxuries in which the kings of Persia indulged (xx. p. 735); and Athenaeus assigns it to Damascus (i. 22). Geographers have hitherto represented Helbon as identical with the city of Aleppo, called Helbo (هَلْبُ) by the Arabs; but there are strong reasons against this. The whole force and beauty of the description in Ezekiel consists in this, that in the great market of Tyre every kingdom and city found ample demand for its own staple products. Why, therefore, should the Damascusen supply wine of Aleppo, conveying it a long and difficult journey overland? If strange merchants had engaged in this trade, we should naturally expect them to be some maritime people who could carry it cheaply along the coast from the port of Aleppo. A few year ago the writer directed attention to a village and district within a few miles of Damascius, still bearing the ancient name Helbon (the Arabic Ḥawra), and still celebrated as producing the finest grapes in the country. (See Journal of Soc. Lit. July 1873, p. 209, Five Years in Damascus, ii. 349 ff.). There cannot be a doubt that this village, and not Aleppo, is the Helbon of Ezekiel and Strabo. The village is situated in a wild grove, high up in Antilebanon. The remains of some large and beautiful structures are strewn around it. The bottom and sides of the glen are covered with terraced vineyards; and the whole surrounding country is rich in vines and fig-trees (Hawth., for Eycr. and Pat., pp. 435-6). J. L. P.

- The discovery of this Helbon is one of the results of missionary labor in that part of the East. Mr. Porter, who writes the article above, was formerly connected with the mission at Damascus. Dr. Robinson accepts the proposed identification as unquestionably correct. The name alone is not decisive, for Helib (Aleppo) may answer to Helbon; but Aleppo "produces no wine of any reputation; nor is Damascus the natural channel of commerce between Aleppo and Tyre" (Later Res. iii. 472). Fairfair (Ezekiel and the Book of his Prophecy, p. 301, 2d ed.) follows the old opinion. Rütcher (Herzog's Real-Konigl. v. 698) makes Ezekiel's Helbon and this one near Damascus the same, but thinks Ptolemy's Chalbon (see above) too far north to be identical with them.

HELCH'AH (Χαλκάς: [Vat.-κετ.—] Helcias), 1 Esdr. viii. 1. [Hilkiah].

HELCH'AS (Χαλκάς) the same person as the preceding, 2 Esdr. i. 1. [Hilkiah].

HELD'AI (Xel'kai) [skilful, trustworthy]: Χελδαία: [Vat. Χαλδαία; Alex. Χαλδαία]: Heldoc. 1, the twelfth captain of the monthly courses for the temple service (1 Chr. xxvii. 15). He is specified as "the Netophathite," and as a descendant of Othniel.

2, An Israelite who seems to have returned from the Captivity; for whom, others, Zechariah was commanded to make certain crowns as memorials (Zech. vi. 10). In ver. 14 the name appears to be changed to Helem. The LXX. translate ἤλεκτος τῶν ἁρχιέρων.

HEL'EB (Ἑλέβ) [milk]: Vat. omits: Alex. Αλεφ: [Comp. Ἐλεδ]: Helbo, son of Bananah, the Netophathite, one of the heroes of king David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 29). In the parallel lath the name is given as —

HELED (Ἑλέδ): Χαλδαίς: [Vat.-Χαλδαί]: Alex. Χαλδαί: Heloch, 1 Chr. xi. 30 [where he is mentioned as one of "the valiant men" of David's army].

HELEK (Ἑλέκ) [port, porton]: Χελέ: Αlex. Χελέ: [in Josh. Χαλέ]: Alex. Φελέχ]: Helok, one of the descendants of Manasseh, the second son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 30), and founder of the family of the Helkitites. The Ben-Chedek [sons of C.] are mentioned in Josh. xvii. 2 as of much importance in their tribe. The name has not however survived, at least it has not yet been met with.

HELEKITES, THE (Ἑλέκιται, i.e. the Chelkite: δ Ἰελέκη [Vat. -γελ], Alex. Χελέκη: familia Helckerburnii), the family descended from the foregoing (Num. xxvi. 30).

HELEM (Ἑλέμ) [hammer or blow]: [Rom. Βαρνάβα: Vat. Βαλέας; Alex.] Ελέας: Helem). A man named among the descendants of Asher, in a passage evidently much disordered (1 Chr. vii. 35). If it be intended that he was the brother of Shamer, then he may be identical with Hotham, in ver. 32, the name having been altered in copying; but this is mere conjecture. Lorington (i. 269) quotes two Hebrew MSS., in which the name is written אֵלֶם, Cheles.

HELEPH (חֵלֶפּ) [exchange, instead of]:

Matarim: Alex. Melaph — both include the preparation made: Heliaph, the place from which the boundary of the tribe of Naphtali started (Josh. xix. 33), but where situated, or on which quarter, cannot be ascertained from the text.

Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 320) proposes to identify it with Beitefuh, an ancient site, nearly due east of the River Jordan, and west of Kedesh, on the edge of a very marked ravine, which probably formed part of the boundary between Naphtali and Asher (Van de Velde, Syrie, i. 293; and see his map, 1858). G.

HELEZ (הֵלֶז) [perh. loins, thigh, Gesen.]:

Xalalath — the initial ס is probably from the end of the preceding word, [Xalalath; 1 Chr. xxvii. 10, Vat. Εξαλαθα]: Alex. Ελλης, Έλλης: Hellen, Helle.

1. One of “the thirty” of David’s guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 26): 1 Chr. xi. 2: in the latter, γήλην: an Ephraimithe, and captain of the seventh monthly course (1 Chr. xxvii. 10). In both these passages of Chronicles he is called “the Pelonite,” of which Kennicott decides that the Παλητίς of Samuel is a corruption of Παλητίς, a contraction of the name, as that by employed by the LXX. in the O. T. to render the Hebrew γήλην, Elmi the high-priest.

2. The third of three names inserted between Achitophel and Amariah in the genealogy of Ezra, in 2 Esdr. i. 2 (compare Ezra vii. 2, 3).

HELIES, 2 Esdr. vii. 39. [Ελαίας.]

HELIODYNES (Ἠλιόδυνης [gift of the sun]): Alex. Heliodounes (ὁ ἐν τοῖς πρωταγοραῖοις τοῦ Σελενίου Φίλοπαθος), who was commissioned by the king, at the instigation of Apollonius [Apol- lonius] to carry away the private treasures deposited in the Temple at Jerusalem. According to the narrative in 2 Macc. iii. 9 ff., he was stayed from the execution of his design by a “great apparition” (ἐπιφάνεια), in consequence of which he fell down “compassed with great darkness,” and speechless. He was afterwards restored at the intercession of the high-priest Onias, and bore witness to the king of the inviolable majesty of the Temple (2 Macc. iii.). The full details of the narrative are not supported by any other evidence.

Josephus, who was unequainted with 2 Macc., takes no notice of it; and the author of the so-called iv. Macc. attributes the attempt to plunder the Temple to Apollonius, and differs in his account of the miraculous interposition, though he distinctly refers, as we pole, to the καταστροφὴν καὶ τυφώσειν τῶν ἀπολλώνων . . . .). Heliodorus afterwards murdered Seleucus, and made an unsuccessful attempt to seize the Syrian crown n. c. 175 (App. Syr. p. 45). Cf. Wernsdorff, De fide Lib. Macc. § liv. Raphael’s grand picture of “Heliodorus” will be known to most by copies and engravings, if not by the original.

HELKAI [2 synt. (חֵלֶק) [whole portion in Jeuchok] : Ελάκας: [Vat. Alex. F. A. omit] Helka,

A priest of the family of Merioth (or Meremoth, see ver. 3), who was living in the days of the high-priest, i. e. in the generation following the return from Babylon under Joshua and Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 16; comp. 10, 12).

HELKATH (חֵלֶק) [field]: Εκκλησιατός:

[Xelakia]: Alex. Xelath, [Xelakia]: Helleath, and Helkath, the town named as the starting-point for the boundary of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 25), and allotted with its “suburb” to the Gerizomite Levites (xxi. 31). The enumeration of the boundary seems to proceed from south to north; but nothing absolutely certain can be said thereon, nor has any traveller recovered the site of Helkath.

Eusebius and Jerome report the name much corrupted (Onom. Ethes), but evidently knew nothing of the place. Schwarz (p. 191) suggests the village Yerko, which lies about 8 miles east of Akko (see Van de Velde’s map); but this requires further examination.

In the list of Levitical cities in 1 Chr. vi. Hulok is substituted for Helkath.

HEL KATH HAZZURIM (חֵלֶק הָאָצוּרִים) [field of the sharp edges, Keil; but see infra]: μερίς τῶν ἐπιδομῶν — perhaps reading "τῶν ἐπιδομῶν": Aquila, Καρύς τῶν στεφεών: Ager robustorum, a smooth piece of ground, apparently close to the pool of Gibeon, where the combat took place between the two parties of Joab’s men and Abner’s men, which ended in the death of the whole of the combatants, and brought on a general battle (2 Sam. ii. 16).

[ ג ב ר נ א צ י א נ : Ἰουαβ] Various interpretations are given of the name. In addition to those given above, Gesenius (Theor. p. 485 a) renders it “the field of swords.” The margin of the L. V. has “the field of strong men,” agreeing with Aquila and the Vulgate; Ewald (Gesch. iii. 147), “das Feld der Flickischen.” G.

* The field received its name from the bloody duel fought there, as expressly said (2 Sam. ii. 16). The Scripture words put before us the horrible scene: “And they caught every one his bow by the head and thrust his sword in his fellow’s side; so they fell down together: wherewith place was called Helkath-hazzurim.” The name may be “field of the rocks,” i. e. of the strong men, firm as rocks (see Wordsworth, in loc.).

HELKIAS (Xelidias: [Vat. Xelaxias]: Vulg. omits.

A fourth variation of the name of Hilkiah the high priest, 1 Esdr. i. 8. [Hilkiahs.]

HELL. This is the word generally and unfortunately used by our translators to render the Hebrew Shed (שֵׁד), or חֶדִית: “Ađhit, and once פארוס: 2 Sam. xxili. 6: Inferi or Inferno, or sometimes Moris). We say unfortunately, because — although, as St. Augustine truly asserts, Shed, with its equivalents Inferri and Hells, are never used in a good sense (De Gen. et Lit. xii. 33), yet — the English word Hell is mixed up with numberless associations entirely foreign to the minds of the ancient Hebrews. It would perhaps have been better to retain the Hebrew word Shed, or else render it always by “the grave” or “the pit.”

Ewald accepts Luther’s word Helle; even Unterwel, which is suggested by De Wette, involves exceptions too-known for the purpose.
Passing over the derivations suggested by other writers, it is now generally agreed that the word comes from the root הילא, "to make hollow" (comp. Germ. Hölle, "hell," with Höhle, "a hollow"), and therefore means the vast hollow subterraneous rest-place which is the nearest equivalent of the dead (Ges. Thes. p. 1348; Et ticher, de Inferiis, c. iv. p. 137 ff.; Ewald, ad Ps. p. 42). It is deep (Job xi. 8) and dark (Job v. 21, 22), in the centre of the earth (Num. xvi. 30; Deut. xxxii. 22), having within it depths on depths (Prov. ix. 18), and fastened with gates (Is. xxxviii. 10) and bars (Job xvii. 16). Some have fancied (as Jahn, Arch. Bibb. § 203, Eng. ed.) that the Jews, like the Greeks, believed in infernal rivers: thus Clemens Alex. defines Gehenna as "a river of fire" (Strom. xxxviii. 38), and expressly compares it to the fiery rivers of Tartarus (Strom. v. 14, 92); and Tertullian says that it was supposed to resemble Pyrphilegethon (Apolog. cap. xlvii.). The notion, however, is not found in Scripture, for Ps. xvii. 5 is a mere metaphor. In this cavernous realm are the souls of dead men, the Rechabim and ill-spirits (Is. lxxxvi. 15, lxxxviii. 48; Prov. xxiii. 14; Ez. xxxii. 21, 22). It is "all-devouring" (Prov. i. 12, xxxvi. 16), insatiable (Is. v. 14), and remorseless (Cant. viii. 6). The shadows, not of men only, but even of trees and kingdoms, are placed in Sheol (Is. xiv. 9-20; Ez. xxxi. 14-18, xxxii. passion.). It is clear that in many passages of the O. T. Sheol can only mean "the grave," and is so rendered in the A. V. (see, for example, Gen. xxxviii. 35, xliii. 38; 1 Sam. ii. 6; Job xiv. 13). In other passages, however, it seems to involve a notion of punishment, and is therefore rendered in the A. V. by the word "hell." But in many cases this is a translation misleads the reader. It is obvious, for instance, that Job xi. 8; Ps. cxxxiii. 8; Am. iv. 2 (where "hell" is used as the antithesis of "heaven"), merely illustrate the Jewish notions of the locality of Sheol in the bowels of the earth. Even Ps. ix. 17, Prov. xxv. 24, v. 5, iv. 18, seem to refer rather to the danger of terrible and precipitate death than to a place of infernal anguish. An attentive examination of all the passages in which the word occurs will show that the Hebrew notions respecting Sheol were of a vague description. The rewards and punishments of the Mossaic law were temporal, and it was only gradually and slowly that God revealed to his chosen people a knowledge of future rewards and punishments. Generally speaking, the Hebrews regarded the grave as the final end of all sentient and intelligent existence, "the land where all things are forgotten" (Ps. lxxxviii. 10-12; Is. xxxviii. 9-20; Ps. vi. 5; Eccl. iv. 10: Ecclus. xvii. 27, 28). Even the righteous Hezekiah trembled lest, "when his eyes closed upon the cherubim and the mercy seat," he should no longer "see the Lord, even the Lord in the land of the living." In the N. T. the word Hades (like Sheol) sometimes means merely "the grave" (Rev. xx. 13; Acts ii. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 55), or in general "the unseen world." It is in this sense that the creeds say of the Lord kaiarhthek ev airop or ei σαμων, diexkei se el ev infernion, "in the state of the dead in general, without any restriction of happiness or misery" (Beveridge on Act. iii.), a doctrine certainly, though only virtually, expressed in Scripture (Eph. iv. 9; Acts ii. 25-31). Similarly J. sephon uses Hades as the name of the place whence the soul of Samuel was evoked (Acts vi. 14, § 9). Elsewhere in the N. T. Hades is used of a place of torment (Luke xvi. 23; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Matt. xx. 27, &c.). Consequently it has been the prevalent, almost the universal, notion that Hades is an intermediate state between death and resurrection, divided into two parts, one the abode of the blessed and the other of the lost. This was the belief of the Jews after the exile, who gave to the places the names of Paradise and Gehenna (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1, § 58; et Orph. Lex. Robb. s. v.), of the Fathers generally (Tert. de Anima, c. vii.)."

which is full of fine irony against the enemy, the name is applied to purposes of threatening (with a probable allusion to the recent acts of Hezekiah, see Rosenmuller, ad loc.). Besides the authorities quoted, see Bochart (Phædro, p. 528), Ewald (Proph. ii. 77, in loc.), and Wilson (Leads of the Bible, i. 499), etc.

The subject of the punishment of the wicked, and of Hell as a place of torment, belongs to a Theological rather than a Biblical Dictionary.

F. W. F.

* Some of the positions in the previous article cannot be viewed as well established. That "generally speaking, the Hebrews regarded the grave as the final end of all sentient and intelligent existence" is a statement opposed to the results of the best scholarship. Against it stand such considerations as these: a four hundred years' residence of the Israelites among a people proved to have held the doctrine of a future life; the Hebrew doctrine of the nature of the soul; the translation of Enoc and Elijah: the prevalent views of necromancy, or conjuring by the spirits of the dead, (a practice prohibited by law, and yet endorsed by a monarch of Israel): the constant assertion that the dead were gathered to their fathers, though buried far away: the explicit and deliberate utterances of many passages, e.g., the 16th, 17th, 49th, 72d Psalms, Eccles. xii. 14, 13, Daniel xii. 2, 3; and the known fact that the doctrine of immortality existed among the Jews (excepting the small sect of Sadducees) at the time of Christ. The utterances about the silence and inactivity of the grave must therefore be understood from the present point of view, and as having reference to the activities of this life.

The statements of Gesenius and very many others about the gates and bars of Hades simply convert rhetoric into logic, and might with equal propriety invest the Kingdom of Heaven with "keys." The theory so prevalent, that Hades was the common province of departed spirits, divided, however, into two compartments, Paradise and Gehenna, seems to have been founded more upon the classical writers and the Rabbins — to whom it appeals so largely — than upon the Bible. It is undoubtedly true, that under the older economy the whole subject was much more distinct than under the new, and the Hades of the N. T. expresses more than the Sheol of the O. T. (See Fairbairn, Horne's Manual, p. 230 ff.) Sheol was, no doubt, the unseen world, the state of the dead generally. So in modern times we often intentionally limit our views, and speak of the other world, the invisible world, the undiscovered country, the grave, the spirit land, etc. But vagueness of designation is not to be confounded with community of lot or identity of abode or condition.

Sheol, the unknown region into which the dying disappeared, was naturally and always invested with gloom to a sinful race. But the vague term was capable of becoming more or less definite according to the writer's thought. Most commonly it was simply the grave. As we use the phrase: sometimes the state of death in general; sometimes a dismal place opposed to heaven, e.g., Job xi. 8, Ps. xxxix. 8, Am. ix. 2; sometimes a place of extreme suffering, Ps. lxxiv. 13, Is. 17, Prov. xxiii. 14. (See Bible Sacra, xiii. 155 ff.) No passage of the O. T. we believe, implies that the spirits of the good and bad were there brought together. The mention of the place (Is. xiv. 9) implies the contrary, sprawling us only the heathen kings meeting another king in mockery.

To translate this Hebrew term, the LXX adopted the nearest Greek word, Hades, which by derivation signifies the invisible world. But the Greek word does not carry Greek notions into Hebrew theology.

When Christ and his Apostles came, they naturally laid hold of this Greek word already introduced into religious use. But, of course, they employed it from their own stand-point. And as it was the purpose of their mission to make more distinct the doctrine of retribution, and as under their teachings death became still more terrible to the natural man, so throughout the N. T. Hades seems invariably viewed as the enemy of man, and from its alliance with sin and its doom, as hostile to Christ and his church. In many instances it is with strict propriety translated "hell." Even in Acts ii. 27, 31, quoted from the O. T., Hades is the abode of the wicked dead. In Luke xvi. 23 it certainly is the place of torment. In Matt. xvi. 18 it is the abode and centre of those powers that were arrayed against Christ and his church. In Luke x. 15, Matt. x. 23, it is the opposite of heaven. The word occurs, according to the Received Text, in 1 Cor. xv. 55; but the reading is not supported by the older MSS. The only remaining instances are the four that are in Rev. i. 18, vi. 8, xx. 13, 14, where, though in three of these cases personified, it is still viewed as a terror to man and a foe to Christ and his kingdom, over which at length he has gained the victory. While therefore Gehenna is the term which most distinctly designates the place of future punishment, Hades also repeatedly is nearly its equivalent: and, notwithstanding the greater vagueness of the terms, it remains true, as Augustin asserts, that neither Hades nor Sheol are ever used in a good sense, or (we may add) in any other than a sense that carries the notion of terror.

HELLENIST (ΕΛΛΗΝΙΣΤΩΣ: Grecus; cf. ΕΛΛΗΝΑ: Grecus, 3 Mark. iv. 13). In one of the earliest notices of the first Christian Church at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 1), two distinct parties are recognized among its members, "Hebrews" and "Hellenists" (Grecians), who appear to stand towards one another in some degree in a relation of jealous rivalry. So again, when St. Paul first visited Jerusalem after his conversion, he "spake and disputed with the Hellenists" (Acts ix. 29), if expecting to find more sympathy among them than with the rulers of the Jews. The term Hellenist occurs again in the N. T. according to the common text, in the account of the foundation of the church at Antioch (Acts xi. 20), but there the context, as well as the form of the sentence...
The name, according to its derivation, whether the original verb (Eλληνιζει) be taken, according to the etymology of similar forms (Μηθιζει, Ιπταειει, Φιλτηνει), in the general sense of adopting the spirit and character of Greeks, or, in the more limited sense of using the Greek language (Xen. Anab. vii. 3, § 25), marks a class distinguished by peculiar habits, and not by descent. Thus the Hellenists as a body included not only the prose-lytes of Greek (or foreign) parentage (οἱ σεβημενοι Ελληνες, Acts xxi. 4 (7); οἱ σεβημενοι προσλητα), Acts xiii. 45; οἱ σεβημενοι, Acts xvii. 17), but also those Jews who, by settling in foreign countries, had adopted the prevalent form of the current Greek civilization, and with it the use of the common Greek dialect, to the exclusion of the Aramaic, which was the national representative of the ancient Hebrew. Hellenism was thus a type of life, and not an indication of origin. Hellenists might be Greeks, but when the latter term is used (Eλληνες, John xii. 20), the point of view seems to be that which is forthwith in the mind of the writer.

The general influence of the Greek conquests in the East, the rise and spread of the Jewish Dispersion, and the essential antagonism of Jew and Greek, have been noticed in other articles [Alexander the Great; Alexandria; Dispersion; Antiquities. Emphases], and it remains only to characterize briefly the elements which the Hellenic civilization added to the language of the N. T. and the immediate effects which they produced upon the Apostolic teaching:

1. The flexibility of the Greek language gained for it in ancient times a general currency similar to that which French enjoys in modern Europe; but with this important difference, that Greek was not only the language of educated men, but also the language of the masses in the great centres of commerce. The colonies of Alexandria were one of the chief points of contact between the Hellenic and the Jewish worlds; but this had not been so before the advent of the Macedonian dialect throughout the East; but even in this the prevailing power of Attic literature made itself distinctly felt. Peculiar words and forms adopted at Alexandria were undoubtedly Macedonian origin, but the later Attic may be justly regarded as the real basis of Oriental Greek. This first type was, however, soon modified, at least in common use, by contact with other languages. The vocabulary was enriched by the addition of foreign words, and the syntax was modified by new constructions. In this way a variety of local dialects must have arisen, the specific characters of which were determined in the first instance by the conditions under which they were formed, and which afterwards passed away with the circumstances which had produced them. But one of these dialects has remained preserved by the influence of the people among whom it arose, by being consecrated to the noblest service which language has yet fulfilled. In other cases the dialects perished together with the communities who used them in the common intercourse of life, but in that of the Jews the Alexandrine version of the O. T., acting in this respect like the great vernacular versions of England and Germany, gave a definiteness and fixity to the popular language which could not have been gained without the existence of some recognized standard. The style of the LXX. itself is, indeed, different in different parts, but the same general character runs through the whole, and the variations which it presents are not greater than those which exist in the different books of the N. T. The functions which this Jewish-Greek had to discharge were of the widest application, and the language itself combined the most opposite features. It was essentially a fusion of Eastern and Western thought. For disregarding peculiarities of inflexion and novel words, the characteristic of the Hellenistic dialect is the combination of a Hebrew spirit with a Greek body, of a Hebrew form with Greek words. The conception belongs to one race, and the expression to another. Nor is it too much to say that this combination was one of the most important preparations for the reception of Christianity, and one of the most important aids for the adequate expression of its teaching. On the one hand, by the spread of the Hellenistic Greek, the deep, theoretic aspect of the world and life, which distinguishes Jewish thought, was placed before men at large; and on the other, the subtle truths, which philosophy had gained from the analysis of mind and action, and enshrined in words, were transferred to the speech of faithful men. In the fullness of time, when the great message came, a language was prepared to convey it; and thus the very dialect of the N. T. forms a great lesson in the true philosophy of history and becomes in itself a monument of the providential government of mankind.

This view of the Hellenistic dialect will at once remove one of the commonest misconceptions relating to it. For it will follow that its deviations from the ordinary laws of classic Greek are themselves bound by some common law, and that irregularities of construction and altered usages of words are to be traced to their first source, and interpreted strictly according to the original conception out of which they sprang. A popular, and even a corrupt, dialect is not less precise, or, in other words, is not less human than a polished one, though its interpretation may often be more difficult than that of a classical text. But in the case of the N. T., the books themselves furnish an ample store for the critic, and the Septuagint, when compared with the Hebrew text, provides him with the history of the language which he has to study.

2. The adoption of a strange language was essentially characteristic of the true nature of Hellenism. The purely outward elements of the national life were left aside with a facility of which history offers few examples, while the inner character of the people remained unchanged. In every respect the thought, so to speak, was clothed in a new dress. Hellenism was, as it were, a fresh incorporation of Judaism according to altered laws of life and worship. But as the Hebrew spirit made itself distinctly visible in the new dialect, so it remained unalloyed by the new conditions which regulated its action. While the Hellenic spirit had the natural instinct for trade, which was originally buried by the Mosaic Law, and gained a deeper insight into foreign character, and with this a truer sympathy, or at least a wider tolerance towards foreign opinions, they found means at the same time to extend the knowledge of the principles of their divine faith, and to gain respect and attention even from those who did not openly embrace their religion. Hellenism accomplished for the outer world what the

Hetuo [Cyrene] accomplished for the Palestinian Jews: it was the necessary step between a religion of form and a religion of spirit: it witnessed against Judaism as final and universal, and it witnessed for it, as the foundation of a spiritual religion which should be bound by no local restrictions. Under the influence of this wider instruction a Greek body grew up around the Synagogue, not admitted into the Jewish Church, and yet holding a recognized position with regard to it, which was able to apprehend the Apostolic teaching, and ready to receive it. The Hellenists themselves were at once missionaries to the heathen, and prophets to their own countrymen. Their lives were an abiding protest against polytheism and pantheism, and they retained with unshaken zeal the sum of their ancient creed, while the preacher had popularly occupied the place of the priest, and a service of prayer and praise and exhortation had succeeded in daily life to the elaborate ritual of the Temple. Yet this new development of Judaism was obtained without the sacrifice of national ties. The connection of the Hellenists with the Temple was not broken, except in the case of some of the Egyptian Jews. [The Dispersion.] Unity coexisted with dispersion: and the organization of a catholic church was formulated, not only in the widening breadth of doctrine, but even externally in the scattered communities which looked to Jerusalem as their common centre.

In another aspect Hellenism served as the preparation for a catholic creed. As it furnished the language of Christianity, it supplied also that literary instinct which counteracted the traditional reserve of the Palestinian Jews. The writings of the N. T., and all the writings of the Apostolic age, with the exception of the original Gospel of St. Matthew, were, as far as we know, Greek; and Greek seems to have remained the sole vehicle of Christian literature, and the principal medium of Christian worship, till the Church of North Africa rose into importance in the time of Tertullian. The Canon of the Christian Scriptures, the early Creeds, and the Liturgies, are the memorials of this Hellenistic predomiance in the Church, and the two centuries following; and if the Greek spirit descended to the investigation of painful subtleties, it may be questioned whether the fullness of Christian truth could have been developed without the power of Greek thought tempered by Hebrew discipline.

The general relations of Hellenism to Judaism are well treated in the histories of Ewald and Jost; but the Hellenistic language is as yet, critically speaking, almost unexplored. Winer’s Grammar (Grundr. d. N. T. Sprachlehren, 6te Aufl. 1853; 7th Aufl. by Linemann, 1867) has done great service in establishing the idea of law in N. T. language, which was obliterated by earlier interpreters, but even Winer does not investigate the origin of the peculiarities of the Hellenistic dialect.

The idiom of the N. T. cannot be discussed apart from those of the LXX.; and no explanation can be considered perfect which does not take into account the origin of the corresponding Hebrew idiom. For this work even the materials are as yet deficient. The text of the LXX. is still in a most unsatisfactory condition; and while Bruder’s Concordance leaves nothing to be desired for the vocabulary of the N. T., Trümmler’s Concordance to the LXX., however useful, is quite unworthy for critical purposes. [See Language of the New Testament.]

HEM OF GARMENT

HELMET. [Arms, p. 161.]

HELON (Ἑλων: Helon), father of Eliah, who was the chief man of the tribe of Zebulun, when the census was taken in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 9, ii. 7, viii. 24, 29; x. 16).

* HELPS. This is the term used in the authorized English Version, and in the Rheims N. T. for ἄρτιεράξωμεν, I Cor. xii. 28. The Vulgate translates, opulitioines; Wycliffe, helpyngis (helpings); Tyndale, Cranmer, and the Geneva Bible, helpers: Luther, Helfer. The noun occurs only once in the N. T., but the verb ἄρτιεράξωμαι, i. e., to take in turn, to hold on of, to help, also to partake in, occurs three times, Luke i. 54 (= hath helped his servant Israel”), Acts xx. 35 (="to support the weak”), 1 Tim. vi. 2 (οἱ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἄρτιεραξωμενοι, “parfakers of the benefit”). With the classics ἄρτιεραξίς signifies a taking in turn, seizure; receipt; perception, but with the later writers and in the O. T. Apocrypha (2 Macc. viii. 19; 3 Macc. v. 50; Exclus. xii. 12; li. 7; 1 Esdr. vii. 27 al.) also οἰκ. support. This must be the meaning of the word in 1 Cor. xii., and it is so understood by nearly all the commentators from (chrysostom ἄρτιεραξίας τῶν ἅγνωσε) down to De Wette, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, and King (in Lange’s Bible-Exeget.). It corresponds with the meaning of the verb in Luke i. 54 and Acts xx. 35, and suits the connection. Paul enumerates the ἄρτιεραξίαι among the charisms, and puts them between the miraculous powers (ὑπερήφανες and χαρίσματα λανδάνων) which were not confined to any particular office, and the gifts of government and administration (συνεργείαις) which belonged especially to the presbyter-bishops, and in the highest degree to the Apostles as the gubernatores ecclesiae. ἄρτιεραξίαι doubtless comprehends the various duties of the deacons and deaconesses of the Apostles’ church, especially the care of the poor and the sick. We may take it, however, in a more comprehensive sense for Christian charity and philanthropy. The plural indicates the diversity of the gift in its practical operation and application; comp. δοκιμασίαι, 1 Cor. xiv. 5. These helps or helping were represented here as a gift of the Spirit. The duty is based on the possession of the gift, but the gift is not confined to the deacons or any class of church officers. It is found also among the laity, especially the female portion, in all ages and all branches of Christendom. But from time to time God raises up heroes of Christian charity and angels of mercy whom He endows, in an extraordinary measure, with the charisma of ἄρτιεραξίας, δοκιμασίας, and ἀγάπη for the benefit of suffering humanity.

HEM OF GARMENT (χεραρις: κρασε-} Way). The importance which the later Jews, especially the Pharisees (Matt. xxiii. 5), attached to the hem or fringe of their garments was founded upon the regulation in Num. xv. 38, 39, which attached a symbolical meaning to it. We must not, however, conclude that the fringe owed its origin to that passage: it was in the first instance the ordinary mode of finishing the robe, the ends of the threads composing the woof being left in order to prevent the cloth from unraveling, just as in the Egyptian calotria (Her. ii. 81; Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, ii. 90), and in the Assyrian robes as represented in the bas-reliefs of Nineveh, the blue ribbon being added to strengthen the border. The Hebrew word κεθήθ is expressive of this frettèd edge: the Greek κρυστάλλα (the etymology of which is uncertain), being variously traced to κρύσταλλος, ἀκρος πέδων, and κρυπτή (applies to the edge of a river or mountain ( Xen. Hist. Gr. ii. 16, iv. 6, § 8), and is explained by Hesychius as τα ἐν τῷ ἄκρῳ τοῦ ἱλιουκoε-μένα ῥάματα καὶ τὸ ἄκρων αὐτοῦ. The begeti or outer robe was a simple quadrangular piece of cloth, and generally so worn that two of the corners hung down in front; these corners were ornamented with a "ribbons of blue," or rather dark violet, the ribbon itself being, as we may conclude from the word used, ἱμαίνει, as narrow as a thread or piece of string. The Jews attached great sanctity to this fringe (Matt. xix. 20, xiv. 69; Luke viii. 44), and the Pleriscnes made it more prominent than it was originally designed to be, enlarging both the fringe and the ribbon to an undue width (Matt. xxviii. 5). Directions were given as to the number of threads of which it ought to be composed, and other particulars, to each of which a symbolical meaning was attached (Carpzov, Appunt, p. 198). It was appended in later times to the тобб more especially, as being the robe usually worn at devotions: whence the proverbial saying quoted by Lightfoot (Ewsert, in Matt. v. 40), "He that takes care of his fringes deserves a good coat."

HEMAM [הֵמָמ] (extirminating, or razing); [Aja'da; Heman]. Hori (i.e. Horite) and Heman are occasionally written by the older Rabbis, while the word is Bene of Lotan, the eldest son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 22). In the list in 1 Chr. i. the name appears as Heman, which is probably the correct form.

HEMAM [הֵמָמ] [true, reliable]; [Ajoinar, Aivar; Alex.] Aja'da; [Haman; Eman, Heman]. 1. Son of Zerah, 1 Chr. ii. 6; 1 K. iv. 31. See following article.

2. [Aja'da; Vat. i. 1 Chr. xxv. 6, Ajoami, 2 Chr. xxix. 14, Διακόνος; Alex. Ps. Lxxviii. i., Aja'da; Heman, Hemon, Eman.] Son of Joel, and grand-son of Samuel the prophet, a Kohathite. He is called "the singer" (חָנִיָּה חָנִיָּה), rather, the musician, 1 Chr. vi. 33, and was the first of the three chief Levites to whom was committed the vocal and instrumental music of the temple-service in the reign of David, as we read 1 Chr. xv. 16-22, Asaph and Ethan, or rather, according to xxvi. 1-5, Jeduthun, as chief of the Levites. The name of this general of the Levites is given in 1 Chr. vi. 33-38 (A. V.), but the generations between Assir, the son of Korah, and Samuel are somewhat confused, owing to two collateral lines having got mixed. A rectification of this genealogy will be found at p. 214 of the Genealogies of our Lord, where it is shown that Heman is 14th in descent from Levi. A further account of Heman is given 1 Chr. xxv., where he is called (ver. 5) "the king's ser in the matters of God," the word חָנִיָּה, a "seren, which in 2 Chr. xxxv. 15 is applied to Jeduthun, and in xxix. 22 to Asaph, being probably used in the same sense as is נֵגֶפ, "prophesied," of Asaph and Jeduthun in xxx. 1-3. We there learn that Heman had fourteen sons, and three daughters [Hana'niah 1], of which the sons all assisted in the music under their father, and each of whom was head of one of the twenty-four wards of Levites, who "were instructed in the songs of the Lord," or rather, in sacred music. Whether or not this Heman is the person to whom the 88th Psalm is ascribed is doubtful. The chief reason for supposing him to be the same is, that as 88th Psalms are ascribed to Asaph and Jeduthun, so it is likely that this one should be to Heman the singer. But on the other hand he is there called ' the Ezrahite,' and the 88th Psalm is ascribed to ' Ethan the Ezrahite.' But since Heman and Ethan are described in 1 Chr. ii. 6, as 'sons of Zerah,' it is in the highest degree probable that Ezrahite means the family of Zerah, and consequently that Heman of the 88th Psalm is different from Heman the singer, the Kohathite. In 1 K. iv. 31 again (Heb. v. 11), we have mention, as of the wisest of mankind, of Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, Chaleol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol, a list corresponding with the names of the sons of Zerah, in 1 Chr. ii. 6. The inference from which is that there was a Heman, different from Heman the singer, of the family of Zerah the son of Judah, and that he is distinguished from Heman the singer, the Levite, by being called the Ezrahite. As regards the age when Heman the Ezrahite lived, the only thing that can be asserted is that he lived before Solomon, who was said to be 'wiser than Heman,' and after Zerah the son of Judah. His being called 'son of Zerah' in 1 Chr. ii. 6 indicates nothing as to the precise age when he and his brother lived. They are probably mentioned in this abbreviated genealogy, only as having been illustrious person of their family. Nor is anything known of Mahol their father. It is of course uncertain whether the tradition which ascribed the 88th Psalm to Heman's authorship is trustworthy. Nor is there anything in the Psalm itself which clearly marks the time of its composition. The 88th Psalm, ascribed to Ethan, seems to be subsequent to the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah, unless possibly the psalms described in the latter part of the Psalm may be understood of David's flight at Absalom's rebellion, in which case ver. 41 would allude to Shimei the son of Gera.

If Heman the Kohathite, or his father, had married an heiress of the house of Zerah, as the sons of Hakkoz did of the house of Barzillai, and was so reckoned in the genealogy of Zerah, then all the sons of Zerah, Jeduthun, Heman, Ethan, and the musical skill of David's chief musician, and the wisdom of David's seer, and the genius of the author of the 88th Psalm, concurring in the same individual, would make him fit to be joined with those other worthies whose wisdom was only excelled by that of Solomon. But it is impossible to assert that this was the case.

HEMATH (יוֹם 2 [fortress, citadel]: A:

[18]. [Vat.] Alex. Arab: Jmathom). Another form — not warranted by the Hebrew — of the well-known name Hamath (Am. vi. 14).

HEMATH (יוֹם 2) i. e. Hammath [heat, warm spring]: Amed; [Vat. Marpaya]. Vulg. translates de colore, a person, or a place, named in the genealogical lists of Judah, as the origin of the Kenites, and the "father" of the house of Rechab (1 Chr. ii. 55).

HEMDAN (יוֹמַד) [pleasant one, Firstl]: Amed: Ammon or Hammnoun, some copies Hamnon), the eldest son of Dishon, son of Anah the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26). In the parallel list of 1 Chr. (i. 41) the name is changed to Honaron (יהִנָּה), which in the A. V. is given as Amram, probably following the Vulgate Hamram, in the earliest MSS. Amram.

The name Hemedan is known to Knobel (Genesis, p. 256) compared with those of Hammedy and Hamady, two of the five families of the tribe of Ovaran or Amran, who are located to the E. and S. E. of Akaba. Also with the Beno-Hemady, who are found a short distance S. of Kerek (S. E. corner of the Dead Sea); and from thence to El-Bastorich, probably the ancient Bozraath, on the road to Petra. (See Burruckhardt, Syria, etc., pp. 669, 407.:

HE'LOCK. [GALL-]

HEN (יה 2) [favor, grace]: Hem. According to the rendering of the passage (Zech. vi. 14) adopted in the A. V. Hen (or accurately Chen) is the name of a son of Zephaniah, and apparently the same who is called Josiah in ver. 10. But by the LXX. (pam), Ewald (Gonat), and other interpreters, the words are taken to mean "for the favor of the son of Zephaniah."

HEN. The hen is nowhere noticed in the Bible except in the passages (Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34) where our Saviour touchingly compares His anxiety to save Jerusalem to the tender care of a hen «gathering her chickens under her wings.»

The word employed is עִובָץ, which is used in the same specific sense in classical Greek (Aristoph. A.R. 297: άδ. οὔβας). That a bird, so intimately connected with the household, and so common in Palestine, as we know from Rabbinical sources, should receive such slight notice, is certainly singular; it is almost equally singular that it is nowhere represented in the paintings of ancient Egypt (Wilkinson, i. 234.a

W. L. B.

HE'NA (יה 2) [depression, low land, Firstl]: "Av'd; [in 2 K. xii. 18, Vat. Arab. Alex. Anah]; in Is., by confusion with next word, Rom. Anayoyayava, Vat. Sin. Anayoyoyayava; Anah] seems to have been one of the chief cities of a monarchical state which the Assyrian kings had reduced shortly before the time of Semmacherib (2 K. [xxvi. 34.], xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13). Its connection with Sippurain, or Sippuna, would lead us to place it in Babylonia, or at any rate on the Euphrates. Here, at a great distance from Sippura (now Mosul), is an ancient town called Anan or Anah, which seems to have been a Ṣirā in Ṣirā at the present day. The peasants rely on them, and the eggs from them, as one of their chief items of subsistence (Themist, Land and Book. II. 1. 25). In former times a place of considerable importance. It is mentioned by Abuulfed, by William of Tyre and others (see Assenian. Bibl. Or. vol. III. pt. ii. p. 506, and p. 717). The conjecture by some (see Winers' Rabbinisches, s. v.) that this may be Hemn, is probable, and deserves acceptance. A further conjecture identifies Anah with a town called Arat (נַים is merely the feminine termination), which is mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions as situated on an island in the Euphrates (Fox Talbot's Assyrian Texts, 21, Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, 355) at some distance below its junction with the Tigris; and which appears as Anatho (אנהו) in Isidore of Charax (Musa. Parth. p. 4).

The modern Arat is on the right bank of the stream, while the name also attaches to some ruins a little lower down upon the left bank; but between them is "a string of islands" (Chesney's Euphrates Expedition, p. 3), on one or more of which the ancient city may have been situated. G. R.

HENADAD (יה 2) [favor of Iladod, First, Gen.]: Henedad, Enadad (2 Chron. xxxi. 11), the head of a family of Levites who took a prominent part in the rebuilding of the Temple under Jehoshua (Ezr. iii. 9). Bavi and Immui (Neh. iii. 18, 24), who assisted in the repair of the wall of the city, probably belonged to the same family. The latter also represented his family at the signing of the covenant (Neh. x. 9).

HENOCH (יה 2): Enoch. 1. The form in which the well-known name Enoch is given in the A. V. of 1 Chr. i. 3. The Hebrew word is the same both here in Genesis, namely, Cahan. Perhaps in the present case our translators followed the Vulgate.

So they appear also to have done in 1 Chr. i. 33 with a name which in Gen. xxiv. 4 is more accurately given as Hanoch.

HEPHER (יה 2) [a well]: Opher: Hepher. 1. A descendant of Manasseh. The youngest of the sons of Gilead (Num. xxxvii. 32), and head of the family of the Hephrites. Hepher was father of Zelophehad (xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1; [Josh. xvii. 2, 3]), whose daughters first raised the question of the right of a woman having no brother, to hold the property of her husband (Num. xxvii. 11). 2. (Hepher: Hosea). The second son of Naarah, one of the two wives of Ashur, the "father of Tekoa" (1 Chr. iv. 6), in the genealogy of Judah.

The Moerathite, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the list of 1 Chr. xi. 36. In the catalogue of 2 Samuel this name does not exist (see xxiii. 34); and the conclusion of Kennicott, after a full investigation of the passages, is that the names in Samuel are the originals, and that Hepher is a mere corruption of them.

HEPHER (יה 2) [a well]: Opher: [Vat in 1 K. corrupt; Comp. "Ophor: 2 K. Opher], a place in ancient Canaan, which, though not mentioned in the history of the conquest, occurs in the list of conquered kings (Josh. xii. 17). It was on the west of Jordan (comp. 7). So was also the "land of 552). The eggs of the hen are no doubt meant in the Saviour's illustration (Luke xi. 12), which implies also that they were very abundant. H

HERD

HERD, HERDSMAN. The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic period. Its multiplying was considered as a blessing, and its decrease as a curse (Gen. xxxii. 2; Deut. vii. 14, xxviii. 4; Ps. xxviii. 38, excr. iv. 14; Jer. li. 23). The ox was the most precious stock next to horse and mule, and (since those were rare) the thing of greatest value which was commonly possessed (1 K. xviii. 5). Hence we see the force of Saul's threat (1 Sam. xi. 7). The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. vii. 3; Ps. lix. 31; Is xxviii. 3); also flesh-meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. xxxvii. 14; 2 Sam. xxvii. 29), which such milks yields more copiously than that of small cattle (Arist. Hist. Anim. iii. 20). The full-grown ox is hardly ever slaughtered in Syria; but, for sacrificial and festive purposes, the young animal was preferred (Ex. xxix. 1)—perhaps three years might be the age up to which it was so regarded (Gen. xv. 9)—and is spoken of as a special dainty (Gen. viii. 8; Am. vi. 4; Luke xv. 23). The ease of Gideon's sacrifice was one of exigency (Judg. vi. 25) and exceptional. So that of the people (1 Sam. xiv. 22) was an act of wanton excess. The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox, in ploughing, threshing [AGRICULTURE], and as a beast of burden (1 Chr. xii. 40; Is. xvi. 1), made such a slaugthering seem wasteful; nor, owing to difficulties of grazing, fattening, etc., is beef the product of an eastern climate. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xxxvi. 31; comp. Plein. II. viii. 70, ed. Pur.). In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, especially in the "south" region, means cheese of cows' milk; שָׁגֵר, Arab. جمس. Gen. xvii. 8, Is. viii. 15, 2 Sam. xvii. 29, Job xx. i, Jer. v. 25, Prov. xxx. 33, is properly rendered "better" (which Gesenius, s. v., is mistaken in declaring to be "hardly known to the Orientals, except as a medicine"). The word שָׁגֵר, Job x. 10, is the same as the Arabic גֶּשֶׁר, applied by the Bedouins to their goats'-milk cheese. [HICHER; CHEESE.]

light the offense of Jason in sending envoy (οὖ[ν] πέρας) to his festival (2 Macc. iv. 19 ff.).

There can be little doubt but that Melkart is the proper name of the Baal—the Prince (βα[λ]λ)—mentioned in the later history of the O. T. The worship of “Baal” was introduced from Tyre (1 K. xvi. 31; cf. 2 K. xi. 18) after the earlier Canaanitish idolatry had been put down (1 Sam. iv. 4; cf. 1 K. i. 5—8), and Melkart (Heracles) and Astarte appear in the same close relation (Joseph. Ant. I. c.) as Baal and Astarte. The objections which are urged against the identification appear to have little weight; but the supposed connections between Melkart and other gods (Moloch, etc.) which have been suggested (Pauly, Real-Encycl. s. v. Melkarth) appear less likely (cf. Gesenius, L. c. c. Movers, Prouvicier, i. 176 ff., 385 ff.) [Baal].

The direct derivation of the word Heracles from Phœnician roots, either as הֶרְכָלִים, scribe, the traveller, in reference to the course of the sun, with whom he was identified, or to the journeys of the hero, or again as חֵרָךְ (Arphkalés, Phym. M.), the strong conqueror, has little probability.

HERALD

HERALD (Ἑράλδος [Her-Ad's]), the name commonly applied by the western nations to the tutelary deity of Tyre, whose national title was Melkart, the king of the city = πολιοῦχος, Melikbas, Phyl. Illyb. ap. Euseb. Porph. Fr. 1. 10). The identification was based upon a similarity of the legends and attributes referred to the two deities, but Hesiodus (ii. 44) recognized their distinctness, and dwells on the extreme antiquity of the Tyrian rite (Heron. l. c.; cf. Strabo, xvi. p. 757; Arr. Alex. ii. 16; Joseph. Ant. viii. 5, § 3; cf. Aplom. i. 18). The worship of Melkart was spread throughout the Tyrian colonies, and was especially established at Carthage (cf. Hamilcar), where it was celebrated even with human sacrifices (Plin. N. H. xxi. 4) (5); cf. Jer. xix. 5). light the offense of Jason in sending envoy (οὖ[ν] πέρας) to his festival (2 Macc. iv. 19 ff.).

There can be little doubt but that Melkart is the proper name of the Baal—the Prince (βα[λ]λ)—mentioned in the later history of the O. T. The worship of “Baal” was introduced from Tyre (1 K. xvi. 31; cf. 2 K. xi. 18) after the earlier Canaanitish idolatry had been put down (1 Sam. iv. 4; cf. 1 K. i. 5—8), and Melkart (Heracles) and Astarte appear in the same close relation (Joseph. Ant. I. c.) as Baal and Astarte. The objections which are urged against the identification appear to have little weight; but the supposed connections between Melkart and other gods (Moloch, etc.) which have been suggested (Pauly, Real-Encycl. s. v. Melkarth) appear less likely (cf. Gesenius, L. c. c. Movers, Prouvicier, i. 176 ff., 385 ff.) [Baal].

The direct derivation of the word Heracles from Phœnician roots, either as הֶרְכָלִים, scribe, the traveller, in reference to the course of the sun, with whom he was identified, or to the journeys of the hero, or again as חֵרָךְ (Arphkalés, Phym. M.), the strong conqueror, has little probability.

HERALD

HERALD (Ἑράλδος [Her-Ad's]), the name commonly applied by the western nations to the tutelary deity of Tyre, whose national title was Melkart, the king of the city = πολιοῦχος, Melikbas, Phyl. Illyb. ap. Euseb. Porph. Fr. 1. 10). The identification was based upon a similarity of the legends and attributes referred to the two deities, but Hesiodus (ii. 44) recognized their distinctness, and dwells on the extreme antiquity of the Tyrian rite (Heron. l. c.; cf. Strabo, xvi. p. 757; Arr. Alex. ii. 16; Joseph. Ant. viii. 5, § 3; cf. Aplom. i. 18). The worship of Melkart was spread throughout the Tyrian colonies, and was especially established at Carthage (cf. HERD

Herds grazed there: e. g. in Carmel on the W. side of the Dead Sea (1 Sam. xxv. 2; 2 Chr. xxvi. 10). Dothan also. Mishor, and Sharon (Gen. xxxvii. 17; comp. Robinson, iii. 122; Stanley, S. & P. pp. 247, 260, 484, 485; 1 Chr. xxvii. 21; Is. xvi. 10) were favorite pastures. For such purposes Uzziah built towers in the wilderness (2 Chr. xxvi. 10). Not only grass, a but foliage, is acceptable to the ox, and the hills and woods of Bashan and Gilead afforded both abundantly; on such upland (Ps. i. 10; lvx. 12) pastures cattle might graze, as also, of course, by river sides, when driven by the heat from the regions of the "wilderness." Especially was the eastern table-land (Ex. xxix. 18; Num. xxxii. 4) "a place for cattle," and the pastoral tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh who settled there retained something of the nomadic character and handed down some image of the patriarchal life (Stanley, S. & P. pp. 324-5). Herdsmen, etc., in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest, caste; hence as Joseph's kindred, through his position, were brought into contact with the highest castes, they are described as "an abomination"; but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. xvii. 6, 17; Ex. iv. 4, 20). Brands were used to distinguish the owner's herds (Wilkinson, iii. 8, 105; iv. 125-131). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Ps. lxxviii. 48), the first-born of which also were smitten (Ex. xii. 29). The Israelites departing stipulated for (Ex. x. 26) and took "much cattle" with them (xii. 38). [WILDERNESS OF WANDERING.] Cattle providential care and legislative ordinance (Ex. xx, 10, xxii. 28, xxxiv. 19; Lev. xix. 19, xxv. 7; Deut. xi. 15, xxii. 1, 4, 10, xxv. 4; Ps. civ. 14; Is. xxx. 23; Jon. iv. 11), and even the Levites, though not holding land, were allowed cattle (Num. xxxv. 2, 3). When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (called, Job vi. 5, 7, rendered "fodder") in the A. V., and, Is. xxx. 24, "provender:" e comp. the Roman farrengo and ogymus, Plin. xviii. 10 and 42) was used, as also (7,7, "chopped straw" (Gen. xxiv. 25; Is. xi. 7, lvx. 25), which was torn in pieces by the threshing-machine and used probably for feeding in stalls. These last formed an important adjunct to cattle-keeping, being indispensable for shelter at certain seasons (Ex. iv. 6, 19). The herd, after its harvest-duty was done, which probably caused it to be in high condition, was specially worth caring for; at the same time most open pastures would have failed because of the heat. It was then probably stalled, and would continue so until vegetation returned. Hence the failure of the herd from the stalls is mentioned as a feature of scarcity (Hab. iii. 17). "Calves of the stall" (Mal. iv. 2; Prov. xv. 17) are the objects of watchful care. The Reubenites, etc., bestowed their cattle in "cities" when they passed the Jordan to share the toils of conquest (Deut. iii. 19), i. e. probably in some pastures closely adjoining, like the "suburbs" appointed for the cattle of the Levites (Num. xxxv. 2, 3; Josh. xxvi. 2). Cattle were ordinarily allowed as a prey in war to the captor (Deut. xx. 14; Josh. viii. 24), and the case of Amalek is exceptional, probably to mark the extreme curse to which that people was devoted (Ex. xvii. 14; 1 Sam. xv. 3). The occupation of herdsman was honorable in early times (Gen. xlvi. 6; 1 Sam. xi. 5; 1 Chr. xxvii. 24, xxviii. 1). Saul himself assumed it in the interval of his cares as king; also Doeg was certainly high in his confidence (1 Sam. xi. 7). Pharaoh made some of Joseph's brethren "rulers over his cattle." David's herd-masters were among his chief officers of state. In Solomon's time the relative importance of the pursuit declined as commerce grew, but it was still extensive (Ecc. ii. 7; 1 K. iv. 23). It must have greatly suffered from the inroads of the a In Num. xxii. 4, the word 77, in A. V. "grass," really includes all vegetation. Comp. Ex. x. 15. Is. xxxvii. 27; Geno, de R. K. c. 30; Varro, de R. K. i. 15, and ii. 5. 77, Job viii. 12. xl. 15, seems used in a signification equally wide. [Grass.]

c The word seems to be derived from 77, to mix. The passage in Isaiah probably means that in the abundant yield of the crops the cattle should eat of the best, such as was usually consumed by man.
HERESIES to which the country under the later kings of Judah and Israel was exposed. Uzziah, however, (2 Chr. xxvi. 10), and Hezekiah (xxxii. 28, 29), resuming command of the open country, revived it. Josiah also seems to have been rich in herds (xxxv. 7–9). The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Am. i. 1, vii. 14). A goad was used (Judg. iii. 31; 1 Sam. xiii. 21, 27, 28, 29), being, as mostly, a staff armed with a spike. For the word ἄγον as applied to swine, see SWINE; and on the general subject, Ugolini, xxi., de R. H. rett. Hebr. c. ii., which will be found nearly exhaustive of it.

HERESH (ירש = artificer: Apis: [Var. Panamul]: Alex. Apis: carpenterius), a Levite; one of the staff attached to the tabernacle (1 Chr. ix. 15).

HERMAS (Ἐρώμας, from Ἐρώμης, the "Greek god of gain," or Mercury), the name of a person to whom St. Paul sends greeting in his Epistle to the Romans (xvi. 14), and consequently then resident in Rome, and a Christian: and yet the origin of the name, like that of the other four mentioned in the same verse, is Greek. However, in those days, even a Jew, like St. Paul himself, might acquire Roman citizenship. Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Origen, agree in attributing to him the work called the Shepherd; which, from the name of Clement occurring in it, is supposed to have been written in the pontificate of Clement I.; while others affirm it to have been the work of a namesake in the following age, and brother to one Irenius; others again have argued against its genuineness. (Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v.; Bull. Inl. P. V. Nich. i. 2, 3–4; Dindorf, Prof. ad Hermae Post.) From internal evidence, its author, whoever he was, appears to have been a married man and father of a family: a deep mystic, but without ecclesiastical rank. Further, the work in question is supposed to have been originally written in Greek — in which language it is frequently cited by the Greek Fathers — though it now only exists entire in a Latin version. It was never received into the canon; but yet was generally cited with respect only second to that which was paid to the authoritative books of the N. T., and was held to be in some sense inspired (Caillan's Patres, tom. i. p. 17). It may be styled the Pilgrim's Progress of ante-Nicene times; and is divided into three parts: the first containing four visions, the second twelve moral and spiritual precepts, and the third ten simultudes, each intended to shadow forth some verity (Caillan, ibid.). Every man, according to this writer, is attended by a good and bad angel, who are continually attempting to affect his course through life; a doctrine which forcibly recalls the fable of Proclus respecting the choice of Hercules (Xenoph. Mem. ii. 1).

The Hermas of the Epistle to the Romans is celebrated as a saint in the Roman calendar on May 9 (Butler's Lives of the Saints, May 9).

HERMON (ἕρμος) [prominent, lofty]: "Apebaew: [Hermon], a mountain on the northeastern border of Palestine (Dent. iii. 8; Josh. xii. 1), over against Lebanon (Josh. xii. 17), adjoining the plateau of Bashan (1 Chr. v. 23). Its situation being thus clearly defined in Scripture, there can be no doubt as to its identity. It stands at the southern end, and is the culminating point of the Anti-Lebanon range; it towers high above the ancient border-city of Pan and the fountains of the Jordan, and is the most conspicuous and beautiful mountain in all Transjordan or Syria. The name was doubtless suggested by its appearance — "a lofty prominent peak," visible from afar (ἅρμος) has the same meaning as the Arabic (المر) ; just as Lebanon was suggested by the white character of its limestone strata. Other names were also given to Hermon, each in like manner descriptive of some striking feature. The Sidonians called it Sirion (Sirión), from סיירון, "to glitter," and the Amorites Bēnîr (בְּנֵיר), from בְּנ-יר (to glitter), both signifying "breathe-plait," and suggested by its rounded glittering top, when the sun's rays were reflected by the snow that covers it (Dent. iii. 9; Cant. iv. 8; Ez. xxvii. 5).

It was also named Sirion, "the elevated" (םירון), lowering over all its companions (Deut. iv. 48). So, now, at the present day, it is called Jebel edh-Shikh (جبيل الشيخ), "the chief mountain" — a name it well deserves; and Jebel eth-Thel (جبيل التلم), "snowy mountain," which every man who sees it will say is peculiarly appropriate. When the whole country is parched with the summer-sun, white lines of snow streak the head of Hermon. This mountain was the great landmark of the Israelites. It was associated with their northern border almost as intimately as the sea was with the western (see ס in Ex. xxvii. 12, A. V., "west;" Josh. viii. 9). They conquered all the land east of the Jordan, "from the river Arnon unto Mount Hermon" (Deut. iii. 8, iv. 48; Josh. xi. 17). Baal-god, the border-city before Dan became historic, is described as "under Mount Hermon" (Josh. xiii. 5, xi. 17); and when the half-tribe of Manasseh conquered their whole allotted territory, they are said to have "increased from Bashan unto Baal-hermon and Senir, and unto Mount Hermon" (1 Chr. v. 23). In one passage Hermon would almost seem to be used to signify "north," as the word "sea" (םים) is for "west" — the north and the south Thou hast created them; Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name" (Ps. lxxxix. 12). The reason of this is obvious. From whatever part of Palestine the Israelites started toward the northward, Hermon was there, terminating the view. From the plain along the coast, from the mountains of Samaria, from the Jordan valley, from the heights of Moab and Gilead, from the plateau of Bashan, that pale-blue, snow-capped cone forms the one feature on the northern horizon. The "dew of Hermon" is once referred to in a passage which has long been considered a geographical puzzle — "As the dew of Hermon, the dew that descended on the mountains of Zion" (Ps. cxxxiii. 3). Zion (סַלְמִין) is probably used here for Sinai (סֵינֵי), one of the old names of Hermon (Deut. iv. 48). The snow on the summit of this mountain condenses the vapors that float during the summer in the higher regions of the atmosphere, causing light clouds to hover around it, and abundant dew to descend on it, while the whole country elsewhere is parched, and the whole heaven elsewhere cloudless.

Hermon has three summits, situated like the angles of a triangle, and about a quarter of a mile from each other. They do not differ much in elevation. This may account for the expression in Ps. xlii. 7 (6), "I will remember thee from the land of the Jordan and the Hermonas (סַלְמִין) — perhaps also for the three appellations in 1 Chr. v. 23. On one of the summits are curious and interesting ruins. Round a rock which forms the crest of the peak are the foundations of a rude circular wall, composed of massive stones; and within the circle is a large heap of hewn stones, surrounding the remains of a small and very ancient temple. This is evidently one of those "high places," which the old inhabitants of Palestine, and the Jews frequently in imitation of them, set up "upon every high mountain and upon every hill" (Deut. xii. 2; 2 K. xvii. 10, 11). In two passages of Scripture this mountain is called Baal-hermon (בָּאל-הֵרְменно), Judg. iii. 3; 1 Chr. v. 23); and the only reason that can be assigned for it is that Baal was there worshipped. Jerome says of it, "diciatur in vertice ejus insigne templum, quod ad ethnicius cultui habebatur e regione Pancadis et Lianu" — reference must here be made to the building whose ruins are still seen (Onom. s. v. Hermon). It is remarkable that Hermon was anciently encompassed by a circle of temples, all pointing the summit. Can it be that this mountain was the great sanctuary of Baal, and that it was to the old Syrians what Jerusalem was to the Jews, and what Mekkah is to the Moslems? (See Handb. for Syr. and Pal. 454, 457; Ireland, Pal. p. 323 f.)

The height of Hermon has never been measured, though it has been often estimated. It is unquestionably the second mountain in Syria, ranking next to the summit of Lebanon near the Orontes, and only a few hundred feet lower than it. It may safely be estimated at 10,000 feet. It rises up an obtuse truncated cone, from 2000 to 3000 feet above the ridges that radiate from it — thus having a more commanding aspect than any other mountain in Syria. The cone is entirely naked. A coating of disintegrated limestone covers the six eyes, rendering it smooth and bleak. The snow never disappears from its summit. In spring and early summer the top is entirely covered. As summer advances the snow gradually melts from the tops of the ridges, but remains in long glittering streaks in the ravines that radiate from the centre, looking in the distance like the white locks that scantily cover the head of old age. (See Fire Years in Damascus, vol. i.)

A tradition, originating apparently about the time of Jerome (Ireland, p. 320), gave the name Hermon to the range of Jebel ed-Duby near Tabor, the better to explain Ps. lxxxix. 12. The name still continues in the monasteries of Palestine, and has thus crept into books of travel. [GILBOA, note.]

• But few of the travellers in Syria have gone to the top of Hermon, and the view from it has not been often described. We are indebted to Mr. Tristram for the following sketch (Land of Israel, p. 614, 2d ed.): —

"We were at last on Hermon, whose snowy head had been a sort of pole-star for the last six months. We had looked at him from Sidon, from Tyre, from Carmel, from Gerizim, from the hills about Jerusalem, from the Dead Sea, from Gilead, and from Nebo; and now we were looking down on them all, as they stood out from the embossed map that lay spread at our feet. The only drawback was a light fleecy cloud which stretched from Carmel's top all along the Lebanon, till it rested upon Jebel Sannin, close to Baal-bec. But it lifted sufficiently..." to give us a peep of the Mediterranean in three places, and amongst them of Tyre. There was a haze, too, over the Ghur so that we could only see as far as Jebel Ajlun and Gilead; but Lakes Huleh and Gennesaret, sunk in the depths beneath us, and reflecting the sunlight, were magnificent. We could scarcely realize that at one glance we were taking in the whole of the land through which, for more than six months, we had been incessantly wandering. Not less striking were the views to the north and east, with the head waters of the Aewy (Pharpar) rising beneath us, and the Bequra (Alema), in the far distance, both rivers marking the courses of their fertilizing streams by the deep green lines of verdure, till the eye rested on the brightness of Damascus, and then turned up the wide opening of Cede-Syria, until shut in by Lebanon.

A ruined temple of Baal, constructed of squared stones arranged neatly in a circle, crowns the highest of the three peaks of Hermon, all very close together. We spent a great part of the day on the summit, but were before long painfully affected by the rarity of the atmosphere. The sun had sunk behind Lebanon before we descended to our tents, but long after we had lost him he continued to paint and gild Hermon with a beautiful mingling of Alpine and desert hues."

Mr. Porter, author of Five Years in Damascus, ascended Hermon in 1852. For an extended account of the incidents and results of the exploration, see Bild, Sirea, xi. 41-66. See the notices, also, in Mr. Porter's Handbook, ii. 453 ff. Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 438) speaks of his surprise at finding that from the shores of the Dead Sea he had a distinct view of "Mount Hermon hovering to the sky far, far up the Ghur to the north." It was a new evidence, he adds, that Moses also could have seen Hermon (Deut. xxxiv. 1 ff.) from the mountains of Moab [Nath, Amer, ed.].

Sirion or Shirion, the Sidonian name of Hermon, signifies a "breast-plate," or "coat of mail;" and it (as assumed above), it be derived from ʿāṣīr, "to glistens," or "to gleam," naturally, to any supposed resemblance of figure or shape, but to the shining appearance of that piece of armor. Hermon answers remarkably to that description. As seen at a distance through the transparent atmosphere, with the snow on its summit and stretching in long lines down its declivities, it glows and sparkles under the rays of the sun as it robed in a vesture of silver.

It is altogether probable that the Saviour's transfiguration took place on some one of the heights of Hermon. The Evangelists relate the occurrence in connection with the Saviour's visit to Caesarea Philippi, which was in that neighborhood. Hence also the healing of the lunatic boy (Luke iv. 37) took place at the foot of Hermon. Dean Aldrich assumes (Greek Test, i. 168) that Jesus had been journeying southward from Caesarea Philippi during the six or eight days which immediately preceded the transfiguration, and hence infers that the high mountain which he ascended must be sought near Capharnam. But that is not the more obvious view. Neither of the Evangelists says that Jesus was journeying southward during these days, but, on the contrary, having stated just before that Jesus came into "the parts" (Matt. xvi. 13) or "the villages" (Mark viii. 27) of Caesarea Philippi, they leave us to understand that he preached during the time mentioned, in that region, and there came to the mountain there on which he was transfigured. [Tawton.]

HERMON, DEW OF. The dew on this mountain is proverbially excellent and abundant. The "more copious dew," says Tristan (Land of Israel, p. 608 f. 2d ed.), "we never experienced than that on Hermon. Everything was drenched with it, and the tents were small protection. The under sides of our maccintosh sheets were in water, our guns were rusted, dew-drops were hanging everywhere. . . ." The hot air in the daytime comes streaming up the Ghur from the Huleh, while Hermon arrests all the moisture, and deposits it congregated at night. As Mr. Potter states, "one of its bills is appropriately called Tell Abu Nedy, i. e. Father of the Dew," for the clouds seem to cling with peculiar fondness round its wooded top and the little Wely of Sheikl Abu Nedy, which crowns it." (Handbook, i. 463.) Van de Veult (Syr. and Pal. i. 126) testifies to this peculiarity of Hermon.

It has perplexed commentators not a little to explain how the Psalmsist (xxixii. 5) could use of the dew of Hermon in the north of Palestine as falling on Zion in Jerusalem. The A. V. does not show the difficulty; for the words "and the dew" being interpolated between the clauses, the dew of Hermon appears there as locally different from that which descended on Mount Zion. But the Hebrew sentence will not bear that construction (see Hengel, Die Psalmen, iv. 320). Nor, where the places are so far apart from each other, can we think of the dew as carried in the atmosphere from one place to the other. Hengel (iv. 322) suggests that perhaps "as the dew of Hermon" may be a formula of blessing (comp. the curse on Gilboa, 2 Sam. i. 21), and as applied here may represent Zion as realizing the idea of that blessing, both spiritual and natural, in the highest degree. Kölker (Achreolose zum A. T., p. 58) assumes an appellative sense of יְהֵלָה, "dew," not of any particular mountain of that name), but of lofty heights generally, which would include Zion. Hengstenberg's explanation is not essentially different from this (Die Psalmen, iv. 89), except that with him the generalized idea would be = Dew of Hermon, instead of = Dew of Hermons.

HERMONTES, THE (הֶרֶמְתֵּס: Ἑρμοντησ): Ep. 26. Hermonthes, the a. V. Properly, the "Herms," with reference to the three or two "summits of Mount Hermon" (Ps. xi. 6 [7]), etc. [Ps. cxiii. 3]. (Heng. p. 147.) W. A. W.

HERMONS (according to the Hebrew), Ps. xi. 7 (6). Only one mountain is known in the Bible as Hermon; the plural name refers, no doubt, to the different summits for which this was noted. [HERMON.] See also Rob. Phys. Geogr. p. 347.

HEROD (הָרוֹד, i.e. Hero'des). The HERODIAN FAMILY. The history of the Herodian family presents one side of the last development of the Jewish nation. The evils which had existed in the hierarchy which grew up after the Return, found an unexpected embellishment in the-cyranus of a foreign usurper. Religion was adopted as a policy; and the Hellenizing designs of Antigonus Epiphanes were carried out, at least in their spirit, by men who professed to observe the Law. Side by side with the spiritual "kingdom of God," proclaimed by John the Baptist, and founded by the Lord, a kingdom of the world was established, which in its external splendor recalled the traditional magnificence of Solomon. The simultaneous realization of the two principles, national and spiritual, which had long variously influenced the Jews, in the establishment of a dynasty and a church, is a fact pregnant with instruction. In the fullness of time a descendant of Esau established a false counterpart of the promised glories of Messiah.

Various accounts are given of the ancestry of the Herods; but neglecting the exaggerated statements of friends and enemies, it seems certain that they were of Idumean descent (Jos. Ant. xiv. 1, 3), a fact which is indicated by the forms of some of the names which were retained in the family (Ewald, Geschichte, iv. 477, note). But though aliens by race, the Herods were Jews in faith. The Idumeans had been conquered and brought over to Judaism by John Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. xxiii. 9, § 1); and from the time of their conversion they remained constant to their new religion, looking upon Jerusalem as their mother city and claiming for themselves the name of Jews (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7 § 7; B. i. 10, § 4, iv. 4, § 4).

The general policy of the whole Herodian family, though modified by the personal characteristics of the successive rulers, was the same. It centered in the endeavor to found a great and independent kingdom, in which the power of Judaism should subservi the consolidation of a state. The protection of Rome was in the first instance a necessity, but the designs of Herod I. and Agrippa I. point to an independent eastern empire as their end, and not to a mere subject monarchy. Such a consummation of the Jewish hopes seems to have found some measure of acceptance at first (Herodotus); and by a natural reaction the temporal domination followed as the easy way to the destruction of the Jewish nationality. The religion which was degraded into the instrument of uncen susful ambition lost its power to quicken a united people. The high-priests were appointed and de posed by Herod I. and his successors with such a reckless disregard for the character of their office (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenlands, i. 322, 325, 421), that the office itself was deprived of its sacred dignity (comp. Acts xiii. 2 ff.; Jost, 430, &c.). The nation was divided, and amidst the conflict of sects a universal faith arose, which more than fulfilled the nobler hopes that found no satisfaction in the treacherous grandeur of a court.

The family relations of the Herods are singularly complicated from the frequent recurrence of the same names, and the several accounts of Josephus are not consistent in every detail. The following table, however, seems to offer a satisfactory suma The Jewish partisans of Herod (Nicolaus Damascenus, op. Jos. Ant. xiv. 1, 3) sought to raise him to the dignity of a descendant from one of the noble families which returned from Babylon; and, on the other hand, early Christian writers represented his origin as utterly mean and servile. Africanus has preserved a tradition (Routi, Ref. Stor. ii. p. 235), on the authority of "the natural kinsman of the Saviour," which makes /epiliptar, the father of Herod, the son of one Herod, of his statements. The members of the Herodian family who are mentioned in the N. T. are distinguished by capita.

Josephus is the one great authority for the history of the Herodian family. The scanty notices which occur in Hebrew and classic writers throw very little additional light upon the events which he narrates. Of modern writers Ewald has treated the whole subject with the widest and clearest view. Jost in his several works has added to the records of Josephus gleanings from later Jewish writers. Where the original sources are so accessible, monographs are of little use. The following are quoted by Winer: Nobilit. Hist. Jud. ... Francs. 1696. E. Spanheimii Stenae ... Herodii M., which are reprinted in Havercamp's Josephus (iii. 321 ff.; 402 ff.).

1. Herod the Great (Herod Agrippa I.) was the second son of Antipater, who was appointed procurator of Judaea by Julius Cæsar, B. C. 47, and Cyprian, an Arabian of noble descent (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7 § 3). At the time of his father's elevation, though only fifteen years old, he received the government of Galilee (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9, § 2), and shortly afterwards of Coele-Syria. When Antony came to Syria, B. C. 41, he appointed Herod and his elder brother Phænelot tetrarch of Judæa (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 13, § 1). Herod was forced to abandon Judæa next year by an invasion of the Parthians, who supported the claims of Antigonus, the representative of the Hasmonæan dynasty, and fled to Rome (B. c. 40). At Rome he was well received by Antony and Octavian, and was appointed by the Senate of Rome to the exclusion of the Hasmonæan line (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 14 § 4; App. Bell. C. 39). In the course of a few years, by the help of the Romans, he took Jerusalem (B. C. 37), and completely established his authority throughout his dominions. An expedition which he was forced to make against Arabia saved him from taking an active part in the civil war, though he was devoted to the cause of Antony. After the battle of Actium he visited Octavian at Rhodes, and in his generous offering would have given him the favor of the conqueror, who confirmed him in the possession of the kingdom, B. C. 31, and in the next year increased it by the addition of several important cities (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10, § 1 ff.), and afterwards gave him the province of Trachonitis and the district of Paneas (Joseph. Ant. l. c.). The remainder of the reign of Herod was undisturbed by external troubles, but his domestic life was emblazoned by an almost uninterrupted series of injuries and cruel acts of vengeance. Hyrcanus, the grandfather of his wife Mariamne, was put to death shortly before his visit to Augustus. Mariamne herself, to whom he was passionately devoted, was next sacrificed to his jealousy. One execution followed another, till at last, in B. C. 6, he was persuaded to put to death the two sons of Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, in whom the chief hope of the people lay. Two years afterwards he condemned to death Ana slave attached to the service of a temple of Apollo at Aeqalon, whom he had taken prisoner by Idumean robbers, and kept by them, as his father could not pay his ransom. The locality (cf. Philo, Leg. ad Caip. § 30) no less than the office, was calculated to fix a heavy reproach upon the name (cf. Routh, ad loc.). This story is repeated with great inaccuracy by Ephiphanes (Her. xx. 32).

pater, his eldest son, who had been their most active accuser, and the order for his execution was among the last acts of Herod's life, for he died himself five days after the death of his son, b. c. 4, in the same year which marks the true date of the Nativity of Christ. [See MARY.]

These terrible acts of bloodshed which Herod perpetrated in his own family were accompanied by others among his subjects equally terrible, from the numbers who fell victims to them. The infinities of his later years exaggerated him to yet greater cruelty; and, according to the well-known story, he ordered the nobles whom he had called to him in his last moments to be executed immediately after his death, that the least death might be atoned for by universal mourning (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 6, § 5). It was at the time of this fatal illness that he must have caused the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 16-18); and from the comparative insignificance of the murder of a few young children in an unimportant village when contrasted with the deeds which he carried out or designed, it is not surprising that Josephus has passed it over in silence. The murder of infants in Bethlehem and "all the borders thereof" (BY παιδαν όριοι) may be estimated at about ten or twelve; and the language of the Evangelist leaves in complete uncertainty the method in which the deed was effected (ἀναστήλας άνελκες). The scene of open and undisguised violence which has been consecrated by Christian art is wholly at variance with what may be supposed to have been the historic reality. At a later time the murder of the children seems to have been connected with the death of Antipater. Thus, according to the anecdote preserved by Macrobius (c. A. d. 410), Augustus, cum audisset inter pueros suos in Syria Herodos, Ilex Judaeorum, intra biwatum (Matt. ii. 16; ib. Ving. a biwatu et infra) jussit interici, filium quoque eis occidere, ait: Melius est Herodis percorn esse quam filium " (Macrobr. Siv. ii. 4).

But Josephus has preserved two very remarkable references to a massacre which Herod caused to be made shortly before his death, which may throw an additional light upon the history. In this it is said that Herod did not spare "those who seemed most dear to him" (Ant. xvi. 11, § 7), but "slew all those of his own family who sided with the Pharisees (φάραγησι)" in refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the Roman emperor, while they looked forward to a change in the royal line (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2, § 9; cf. Lardner, Credibility, etc., i. 278 ff., 332 f., 349 f.). How far this event may have been directly connected with the murder at Bethlehem it is impossible to say, from the obscurity of the details, but its occurrence and character throw a great light upon St. Matthew's narrative.

In dealing with the religious feelings or prejudices of the Jews, Herod showed as great contempt for public opinion as in the execution of his personal vengeance. He signalled his elevation to the throne by offerings to the Capitoline Jupiter (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenleben, i. 318), and surrounded his person by foreign mercenaries, some of whom had been formerly in the service of Cleopatra (Jos. Ant. xv. 7, § 3; xvii. i. 1: 8, § 3). His pius and those of his successors bore only Greek legends; and he introduced heathen games within the walls of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xv. 8, § 1). He displayed ostentatiously his favor towards foreigners (Jos. Ant. xvi. 5, § 3), and oppressed the old Jewish aristocracy (Jos. Ant. xv. 1, § 1). The latter Jewish writers describe him as successively the servant of the Romans, the Hasmonaeans and the Jews; and relate that one Rabbin only survived the persecution which he directed against them, purchasing his life by the loss of sight (Jost, i. 319, &c.).

While Herod alienated in this manner the affections of the Jews by his cruelty and disregard for the Law, he adorned Jerusalem with many splendid monuments of his taste and magnificence. The Temple, which he rebuilt with scrupulous care, so that it might seem to be a restoration of the old one rather than a new building (Jos. Ant. xv. § 11), was the greatest of these works. The restoration was begun b. c. 20, and the Temple itself was completed in a year and a half (Jos. Ant. xv. 11, § 6). The surrounding buildings occupied eight years moreover (Jos. Ant. xv. 11, § 5). But fresh additions were constantly made in succeeding years, so that the Temple was "the most beautiful in the whole of Jerusalem at the beginning of His ministry, it was said that the Temple was "built and fortified") in forty and six years" (John ii. 20), a phrase which expresses the whole period from the commencement of Herod's work to the completion of the latest addition then made, for the final completion of the whole building is placed by Josephus (Ant. xx. 8, § 7, § 96 ος της και τω λειων οτρασκοσκος) in the time of Herod Agrippa II. (c. A. d. 35).

Yet even this splendid work was not likely to mislead the Jews as to the real spirit of the King. While he rebuilt the Temple at Jerusalem, he rebuilt also the Temple at Samaria (Jos. Ant. xv. 8, § 5), and made provision in his new city Cesarea for the celebration of heathen worship (Jos. Ant. xv. 9, § 51); and it has been supposed (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenleben, i. 296) that the rebuilding of the Temple furnished him with the opportunity of destroying the authentic collection of records which was of the highest importance to the priestly families. Herod, as appears from his public designs, affected the dignity of a second Solomon, but he joined the license of that monarch to his magnificence; and it was said that the monument which he raised over the royal tombs was due to the fear which seized him after a sacrilegious attempt to rob them of secret treasures (Jos. Ant. xvi. 7, § 1).

It is, perhaps, difficult to see in the character of Herod any of the true elements of greatness. Some have even supposed that the title — the great — is a mistranslation for the elder (ωναι, Jost, i. 319, note; δέ μεγας, Ewald, Gesch. iv. 473, &c.); and yet on the other hand he seems to have possessed the good qualities of our own Henry VIII. with his vices. He maintained peace at home during a long reign by the vigor and timely generosity of his administration. Abroad he conciliated the good-will of the Romans under circumstances of unusual difficulty. His ostentation displayed and even his arbitrary tyranny was calculated to inspire Orientals with awe. Bold and yet prudent, oppressive and yet profuse, he had many of the character traits which make a popular hero; and the title which may have been first given in admiration of successful despotism now serves to bring out in clearer contrast the terrible price at which the success was purchased.

1. HEROD ANTIPAS (Ἀρτάπαρος, Ἀρτίαμος) was the son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan (Jos. Ant. xvii. 1, § 3). His father had originally destined him as his successor in the kingdom (cf. Matt. ii. 22; Archelaus), but by the last change of his will appointed him tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Jos. Ant. xviii. 8, § 1, Ἡρως ὑπὲρ τῆς Αἰγύπτου Τετραρχῆς), which brought him a yearly revenue of 200 talents (Jos. Ant. xviii. 14, § 4; cf. Luke viii. 3, Χρυσῆ ὑπὲρ τῆς Αἰγύπτου Τετραρχῆς), but chiefly his father granted to him the title of king of Arabia Petraea, which he and his successors closely adhered to, and the environs of Agrippa; but he was opposed at the court of Caligula by the emissaries of Agrippa; and he was condemned to perpetual banishment at Lucullum, A. D. 39 (Jos. Ant. xviii. 7, § 2), whence he appears to have retired afterwards to Spain (B. J. ii. 9, § 6; but see note on p. 796). Herodias voluntarily shared his punishment, and he died in exile. (HBDONAS.)

Archelaus took occasion from our Lord's residence in Galilee to send Him for examination (Luke xxiii. 6 ff.) to Herod Antipas, who came up to Jerusalem to celebrate the feast (cf. Jos. Ant. xviii. 6, § 3), and thus heal the feud which had existed between the tetrarch and himself (Luke xxii. 12; cf. Luke xix. 1, ἐπὶ τῷ τῶν Γαλατίων διά τινος Πιλάτου τιμήν μετά τῶν θυσιῶν αὐτῶν). The share which Antipas thus took in the Passion is specially noticed in the Acts (iv. 27) in connection with Ps. ii. 1, 2. His character, as it appears in the Gospels, answers to the general tenor of his life. He was unscrupulous (Luke iii. 19, μὴ παίνων ἐν ἐπιφανείᾳ πνεύματι), tyrannical (Luke xiii. 31), and weak (Matt. xiv. 9). Yet his cruelty was marked by cunning (Luke xiii. 32, τοὺς ἄνωντας ταύτα), and followed by remorse (Mark vi. 14). In contrast with Pilate he presents the type of an Eastern despot, capricious, sensual, and superstitions. This last point of superstition is both natural and clearly marked. For a time "he heard John gladly" (Mark vi. 20), and was anxious to see Jesus (Luke ix. 9, xxiii. 8), in the expectation, as it is said, of witnessing some miracle wrought by Him (Luke xiii. 31, xxiii. 8).

The city of Betheha, which Antipas founded and named in honor of the emperor, was the most conspicuous monument of his long reign; but, like the rest of the Herodian family, he showed his passion for building cities in several places, restoring Sepphoris, near Tabor, which had been destroyed in the wars after the death of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xiii. 12, § 9; xvii. 2, § 1) and Betharamphitha (Beth-haram) in Perea, which he named Julias, "from the wife of the emperor" (Jos. Ant. xvii. 2, § 1; Hieron. Euseb. Chron. A. D. 21).

2. ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχάλαος [ruler of the people]) was, like Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great and Malthace. He was brought up with his brother at Rome (Joseph. Ant. xii. 1, § 3), and in consequence of the accusations of his eldest brother Antipater, the son of Doris, he was excluded by his father's will from any share in his dominions. Afterwards, however, by a second change, the "kingdom" was left to him, which had been designed for his brother Antipas (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 8, § 1), and it was this unexpected arrangement which led to the retreat of Joseph to Galilee (Matt. ii. 22). Archelaus did not enter on his power without strong opposition and bloodshed (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9); but Augustus confirmed the will of Herod in its essential provisions, and gave Archelaus the government of Idumaea, Judea, and Samaria, with the cities of Cesarea, Sebaste,abeth-carmel, and Tiberias, which had been granted to his father Agrippa; and which produced a revenue of 400 (Joseph. H. J. ii. 6, § 3) or 600 talents (Ant. xviii. 13, 5). For the time he received the title of Ethnarch, with the promise of that of king, if he proved worthy of it (Joseph. l. c.). His conduct justified the fears which his character inspired. After violating the Mosaic law by the marriage with Golphyrus, his brother's widow (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 1, § 1), he raised his subjects by his tyranny and cruelty to appeal to Rome for redress. Augustus at once summoned him to his presence, and after his cause was heard he was banished to Vienne in Gaul (A. D. 7), where probably he died (Joseph. l. c.; cf. Strab. xvi. p. 765; Dio Cass. lv. 27); though in the time of Jerome, his tomb was shown near Bethlem (Onomastica).

3. HEROD PHILIP I. (Φιλίαπος, Mark vi. 17) was the son of Herod the Great, and Marianna the (as is often said) does not agree with the manifest anxiety of Pilate to release Jesus. (H.)

4. Archelaus Matthew's Testament (iii. 8, § 4), is the author of a spe- (Lev. xi. 19), when he was a significant influence. On returning from Egypt Joseph evidently meant to go directly to Bethlem; but hearing that Archelaus had succeeded Herod rather than some other one of his sons, he avoided that place and proceeded to Galilee.
Herod Philip II. (Φιλίππος) was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra (Ἰεροσολυμίτις). Like his half-brothers Antipas and Archelaus, he was brought up at Rome (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 9), and on the death of his father advocated the claims of Archelaus before Augustus (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 1). He received as his own government “Batanaea, Trachonitis, Auranitis (Gaulonitis), and some parts about Jannina” (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 3), with the title of tetrarch (Luke iii. 1, Φιλίππος ἐπὶ τετραρχάς τῆς Ἰουδαίας καὶ Ἰαλωσίου κυρίου). His rule was distinguished by justice and moderation (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4, § 6), and he appears to have devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office without sharing in the intrigues which disgraced his family (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 6). He built a new city on the site of Panes, near the sources of the Jordan, which he called Caesarea (Καισαρεια ἡ Φιλίππος, Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27), and raised Bithynia (in lower Gaulonitis) to the rank of a city under the title of Julius (Joseph. Ant. ii. 8, § 1; xviii. 2, § 1), and died there A.D. 34 (xviii. 5, § 6). He married Salome, the daughter of Philip (L.) and Herodias (Ant. xviii. 6, § 4), but as he left no children at his death his dominions were added to the Roman province of Syria (xviii. 5, § 6).

VI. Herod Agrippa I. (Ἡρῴδης, Acts; Ἀργίππας, Joseph.) was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was brought up at Rome with Claudius and Drusus, and after a life of various vicissitudes (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7), was thrown into prison by Tiberius for an unguarded speech, where he remained till the accession of Caligula (Caligula) A.D. 37. The new emperor gave him the governments formerly held by the tetrarchs Philip and Lysanias, and bestowed on him the ensigns of royalty and other marks of favor (Acts xii. 1, Ἡρ. δ. Βασιλεύς). The jealousy of Herod Antipas and his wife Herodias was excited by these distinctions, and they sailed to Rome in the hope of supplanting Agrippa in the emperor’s favor. Agrippa was aware of their design, and anticipated it by a counter-charge against Antipas of treasonous correspondence with the Parthians. Antipas failed to answer the accusation, and was banished to Gaul (A.D. 39), and his dominions were added to those already held by Agrippa (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7, § 2). Afterwards Agrippa rendered important services to Claudius (Joseph. B. J. ii. 11, §§ 2, 3), and received from him in return (A.D. 41) the government of Judaea and Samaria; so that his entire dominions equaled in extent the kingdom of Herod the Great. Unlike his predecessors, Agrippa was a strict observer of the Law (Joseph. Ant. xix. 7, § 3), and he sought with success the favor of the Jews. It is probable that it was with this view he put to death James the son of Zebedee, and further imprisoned Peter (Acts xi. 1 ff.). But his sudden death, which followed immediately afterwards, interrupted his ambitious projects.

In the fourth year of his reign over the whole of Judea (A.D. 44) Agrippa attended some games at Cæsarea, held in honor of the emperor. When he appeared in the theatre (Joseph. Ant. xix. 8, § 2, δευτέρα τῶν θεωρίων θηρία: Acts xlii. 21, ταχτή θηρία) in “a robe of silver stuff (ἐν ἀργίλῳ) of purple and white” (Peter Joseph. Ant. xvi. 21) which it might be supposed he wore in honor of the gods; and suddenly he was seized with terrible pains, and being carried from the theatre to the palace died after five days; and thus Agrippa died a kingly death, “πέντε τῶν γαστρῶν ἀκόμη μνήμης διερρέσθη τῶν βίων καταστρέφεται” (Joseph. Ant. xix. 8; γνωμένου σκαλωσιομαστοῦ εξείσεξε). His death was a great loss to the province, and it was at first thought that he had been seized with ague (ἐν ἀργίλῳ), and that his friends had thrown him into the temple and put him into “the angel,” the name of the emperor, whom the people believed to have been minister of the Divine Will (Acts xii. 23 ἐπέτατο φῶτον ἄγγελον Κυρίου; cf. 2 K. xii. 35, LXX.).

Various conjectures have been made as to the occasion of the festival at which the event took place. Josephus (l. c.) says that it was in “behalf of the emperor’s safety,” and it has been supposed that it might be in connection with his return from Britain; but this is at least very uncertain (cf. Wieseler, Chron. d. Apost. Zeit. p. 131 ff.). Josephus mentions also the concourse of “the chief men throughout the province” who were present on the occasion; and though he does not notice the embassy of the Tyrians and Agrippa’s speech, yet his narrative is perfectly consistent with both facts.

VII. Herod Agrippa II. (Ἁργίππας, N. T., Ἀργίππας, Joseph.) was the son of Herod Agrippa I. and Cypros, a grand-niece of Herod the Great. At the time of the death of his father, A.D. 44, he was at Rome, and his youth (he was 17 years old) prevented Claudius from carrying out his first intention of appointing him his father’s successor (Joseph. Ant. xix. 9, §§ 1, 2). Not long afterwards, however, the emperor gave him (A.D. 46) the kingdom of Chalcis, which had belonged to his uncle (who died A.D. 48; Joseph. Ant. xx. 4, § 2; B. J. ii. 12, § 11); and transferred himself (A.D. 52) to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip and

c. Just (p. 421, &c.), who objects that these acts are inconsistent with the known humanity of Agrippa entirely neglect the reason suggested by St. Luke (Acts xii. 3).
HERODIANS (Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 11; B. J. ii. 12, § 8), with the title of king (Acts xxv. 13, 'Αρχιππας δι Βασιλείας, xxvii. 2, 6c.).

Nero afterwards increased the dominions of Agrippa by the addition of several cities (Ant. xx. 6, § 4); and he displayed the lavish magnificence which marked his family by costly buildings at Jerusalem and other towns, in both of which he did such violence to the bequests of the Jews (Ant. xx. 7, § 11; 8, § 4). The relation in which he stood to his sister Berenice (Acts xxv. 13) was the cause of grave suspicion (Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 3), which was noticed by Juvenal (Sat. vi. 155 ff.). In the last Roman war Agrippa took part with the Romans, and after the fall of Jerusalem retired with Berenice to Rome, where he died in the third year of Trajan (A. D. 106), being the last prince of the house of Herod (Phot. Cod. 33).

The appearance of St. Paul before Agrippa (A. D. 60) offers several characteristic traits. Agrippa seems to have been intimate with Festus (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7, § 11); and it was natural that the Roman governor should avail himself of his judgment on a question of what seemed to be Jewish law (Acts xxv. 13 ff., 20; cf. Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, § 7). The "rump" (παλαις θεασεσι) with which the king came into the audience chamber (Acts xxv. 23) was accordant with his general bearing; and the cold irony with which he met the impassioned words of the Apostles (Acts xxvi. 27, 28) suits the temper of one who was contented to take part in the destruction of his nation. HERODIANS (HERODIANS). In the account which is given by St. Matthew (xxii. 15 ff.) and St. Mark (xii. 13 ff.) of the last efforts made by different sections of the Jews to obtain from our Lord himself the materials for his accusation, a party under the name of Herodians is represented as acting in concert with the Pharisees (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark xii. 13). St.

Mark mentions the combination of the two parties for a similar object at an earlier period (Mark iii. 6), and in another place (viii. 15; cf. Luke xii. 1) he preserves a saying of our Lord, in which "the heaven of Herod" is placed in close connection with "the heaven of the Pharisees". In the Gospel of St. John (xix. 13) the Pharisees and Herodians are not brought forward at all by name.

These very scanty notices of the Evangelists as to the position of the Herodians are not compensated by other testimonies; yet it is not difficult to fix their characteristics by a reference to the condition of Jewish feeling in the Apostolic age. There were probably many who saw in the power of the Herodian family the pledge of the preservation of their national existence in the face of Roman ambition. In proportion as they regarded the independent nationality of the Jewish people as the first condition of the fulfilment of its future destiny, they would be willing to acquiesce in the domination of men who were themselves of foreign descent (Joseph.), and not rigid in the observance of the Mosaic ritual. Two distinct classes might thus unite in supporting what was a domestic tyranny so contrasted with absolute dependence on Rome. Indeed, those who saw in the Herods a protection against direct heathen rule, which was the one object of their fear (cf. Jacta, b. 19, ap. Lightfoot, Harem. Fr. p. 470, ed. Lescu), "Herodes etiam senem Hillel magnum in honore habuit: namque hi homines regem illum esse non aere ferebant," and those who were inclined to look with satisfaction upon such a compromise between the ancient faith and heathen civilization, as Herod the Great and his successors had endeavored to realize, as the true and highest consummation of Jewish hopes. On the one side the Herodians — partisans of Herod in the widest sense of the term — were thus brought into union with the Pharisees, on the other, with the Sadducees. Yet there is no reason to suppose that they endeavored to form any very systematic harmony of the conflicting doctrines of the two sects, but rather the conflicting doctrines themselves were thrown into the background by what appeared to be a paramount political necessity. Such coalitions have been frequent in every age; and the rarity of the allusions to the Herodians, as a marked body, seems to show that this, like similar coalitions, had no enduring influence as the foundation of party. The feelings which led to the coalition remained, but were incapable of animating the common action of a united body for any length of time.

On the occasion mentioned in Matt. xxii. 16 and Mark xii. 13, the Herodians appear as supporters of the claim of the Roman emperors to receive tribute-money from the Jews. This fact agrees a Origen (Comm. in Matt. tom. xxvi. 29) regards this combination of the Herodians and Pharisees as a combination of antagonistic parties, the one favorable to the Roman government (κατά γαρ οὐκ ἐν τῷ λαῷ τούτῳ μὴν ἐκδικῶσιν τοὺς τῶν φημοῦ κατασκοπής τοὺς Παρισίους ὑπὸ τοῦ λαβέντων τὸν γεννήτωρ...), and the other opposed to it; but this view, which is only conjectural (κατά), does not offer a complete solution of the various relations of the Herodians to the other parties of the time. Jerome, following Origen, limits the meaning of the term yet more: "Cum Herodiani, i.e. multitudines Herodis, sec quos fuisse indicet Pharisaei, quis Romanes tribuntia sulpitant. Herodion vocant et non divinorum deitatum." (Hier. Comm. Matt. xxvi. 12).

b In this way the Herodians were said to regard Herod (Antipas) as "the Messiah": "Ἰησοῦν δὲ ἐκ τῶν Ἰουδαίων τούς ὧν ἦσαν ἀποτίθεντος ἐπισκόπου ἡγούμενος, κατατεθήκατος ἐν τῷ ἑαυτοῦ τίμημα ἔργῳ τῷ Ἰησοῦ τῷ οἰκεῖῳ τοῖς διάσωμεν, κατὰ τῇ ἢ ἔπεσον ταύτα τοίς κατατεθήκατος, διὸ δὲ ἐν τῷ τρίτῳ τοῦ ὕπαιθρος τῶν Ἰουδαίων τοῖς ἄγνωστοι κατατεθήκατος τοῖς διάσωμεν." (Ant. ap. Com. Cat. in Mar. p. 433). Philostratus (Her. xxvii.) applies the same belief to Herod Agrippa II: "Ἐπιλαθείτως (Her. xxix.) to Herod the Great. Johannes in one place (Matt. xxi. 15) calls the idea "a ridiculous notion of some Latin writers, which rests on no authority (quod nusquam legimus);" and again (Dial. c. Lucif. xxiii.) mentions it in a general summary of heretical notions without hesitation. The belief was, in fact, one of the most extraordinary and one of the most common general opinion, and not of distinct and pronounced confession.

with the view that they were essentially a political and not a religious party, and hence in this respect stood at the very opposite pole from the Pharisees, for the latter denied the Roman right of government and resisted all foreign innovations. It is remarkable that we find two such hostile parties acting together in any instance. And especially in regard to that earlier combination (Mark iii. 6), it does not appear from the narrative how a coalition of the Pharisees with the Herodians was to enable them to accomplish the death of Jesus. We can only conjecture how this may have been. The influence of Christ among the people in Galilee at that period was very great, and therefore any open act of violence on the part of his enemies was out of the question. Means more covert must be employed. The Herodians, as the partisans of Herod, had influence with that ruler; and the Pharisees, intriguing with them and fixing upon some political accusation, may have hoped to secure Herod's interposition in arresting and putting to death the object of their malice. It is not without significance that the overture for this alliance came from the Pharisees and not from the Herodians (μετὰ τῶν Ἡρω- διάων συμβολῶν ἐπὶ τούτῳ, Mark iii. 6). H.

HERODIAS (Ἡρώδιας, a female patronymic from Ἡρώδης; on patronymics and gentile names in ιας, see Matthie, Greek Gr, § 101 and 103), the name of a woman of notoriety in the N. T. daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Mariamne and Herod the Great, and consequently sister of Agrippa I.

She first married Herod, surronded Philip, another of the sons of Mariamne and the first Herod (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 4; comp. B. J. i. 29, § 4), and therefore her full uncle; then she eloped from him, during his lifetime (Ant. ibid.), to marry Herod Antipas, her step-uncle, who had been long married to, and was still living with, the daughter of Aeneas or Aretas—his assumed name—king of Arabia (ibid. xvii. 8, § 4). Thus she left her husband, who was still alive, to connect herself with a man whose wife was still alive. Her paramour was indeed less of a blood relation than her original husband; but being likewise the half-brother of that husband, he was already connected with her by affinity—so close that there was only one case contemplated in the Law of Moses where it could be set aside, namely, when the married brother had died childless (Lev. xiv. 21, and for the exception Deut. xxv. 5 f.). Now Herodias had already had one child—Salome—by Philip (Ant. xviii. 5, § 4), and, as she was still alive, might have had more. Well, therefore, may she be charged by Josephus with the intention of confounding her country's institutions (ibid. xviii. 5, § 4); and well may St John the Baptist have denounced against the enormity of such a connection with the tetrarch, whose conscience would certainly seem to have been a less hardened one (Matt. xiv. 9 says he was sorry " Mark vi. 20 that he " heared " St. John; and " heard him gladly ").

The consequences both of the crime, and of the reproof which it incurred, are well known. Aretas made war upon Herod for the injury done to his daughter, and routed him with the loss of his whole army (Ant. xviii. 5, § 1). The head of St John the Baptist was granted to the request of Herodias (Matt. xiv. 8–11; Mark vi. 24–28). According to Josephs the execution took place in a fortress called Machaerus, on the frontier between the dominions of Aretas and Herod, according to Pliny (v. 15), looking down upon the Dead Sea from the south (comp. Robinson, i. 570, note).

And it was to the iniquity of this act, rather than to the immodesty of that illicit connection that, the historian says, some of the Jews attributed the defeat of Herod. In the closing scene of her career, indeed, Herodias exhibited considerable magnanimity; as she preferred going with Antipas to Lugdunum, and there shared the exile and reverses of her brother Agrippa I, and partaking of his elevation (Ant. xviii. 7, § 2).

There are few episodes in the whole range of the N. T. more suggestive to the commentator than this one scene in the life of Herodias.

1. It exhibits one of the most remarkable of the undesigned coincidences between the N. T. and Josephus: that there are some discrepancies in the two accounts, only enhances their value. More than this, it has led the historian into a brief digression upon the life, death, and character of the Baptist, which speaks volumes in favor of the genuineness of that still more celebrated passage, in which he speaks of "Jesus," that "wised man, if man he may be called" (Ant. xviii. 3, § 3; comp. xx. 9, § 1, unhesitatingly quoted as genuine by Joseph. H. E. i. 11).

2. It has been warmly debated whether it was the adulterous, or the incestuous connection, that drew down the reproof of the prophet. It has already been shown that, either way, the offense merited condemnation upon more grounds than one.

3. The birthday feast is another undesigned coincidence between Scripture and profane history. The Jews abhorred keeping birthdays as a pagan custom (Bland on Matt. xiv. 6). On the other hand, it was usual with the Egyptians (Gen. xii. 20; comp. Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 7), with the Persians (Herod. i. 132), with the Greeks, even in the case of the dead, whence the Christian custom of keeping anniversaries of the martyrs (Bähr, ad Herod. iv. 26), and with the Romans (Pers. Sat. i. 1–3) Now the Herodis may be said to have gone beyond Rome in the observance of all that was Roman. Herod the Great kept the day of his accession; Antipas—as we read here—and Agrippa I, as Josephus tells us (Ant. xix. 7, § 1), their

It stood on the western border of the high plain (Mishor, Josh. xiii. 17), and on the boundary-line between the tribes of Reuben and Gad. The ruins of Heshbon, 20 miles east of the Jordan, on the parallel of the northern end of the Dead Sea, mark the site, as they bear the name, of the ancient Heshbon. The city is chiefly celebrated from its connection with Sihon, who was the first to give battle to the invading Israelites. He marched against them to Jabbaz, which must have been situated a short distance south of Heshbon, and was there completely overthrown (Deut. ii. 32 ff.). Heshbon was rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 37), but was assigned to the Levites in connection with the tribe of Gad (Josh. xxi. 39). After the Captivity it fell into the hands of the Moabites, to whom it had originally belonged (Num. xxi. 25), and hence it is mentioned in the prophetical denunciations against Moab (Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 2, 34, 43). In the fourth century it was still a place of some note (Theoph. s. v. Echedam), but it has now been for many centuries wholly desolate.

The ruins of Heshbon stand on a low hill rising out of the great undulating plateau. They are more than a mile in circuit; but not a building remains entire. Towards the western part is a singular structure, whose crumbling ruins exhibit the workmanship of successive ages—the massive stones of the Jewish period, the sculptured cornice of the Roman era, and the light Saracenic arches, all grouped together. There are many cisterns among the ruins; and towards the south, a few yards from the base of the hill, is a large ancient reservoir, which calls to mind the passage in Cant. vii. 4. "Thine eyes are like the fish-pools of Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbīm." (See Barchhardt, Temp. in Sycr., p. 365; Ibray and Mangles, p. 472.)

HERON

The Hebrew anaphath appears as the name of an unclean bird in Lev. xi. 19, xvi. 18. From the addition of the words "after her kind," we may infer that it was a generic name for a well-known class of birds, and hence it is the more remarkable that the name does not occur elsewhere in the Bible. It is quite uncertain what bird is intended; the only point on which any two commentators seem to agree is, that it is not the heoron, for many suppose the preceding word, translated in the A. V. "shark," to apply in reality to the heron. The LXX. translates it χα ῳπρος, which may be regarded as applicable to all birds frequenting swampy ground (νερος), but more particularly to the plover. This explanation has what weight it might otherwise have had, from the probability that it originated in a false reading, namely, anaphath, which the translators connected with anaph, "a bank." The Talmudists evidently were at a loss, for they describe it indefinitely as a "high-flying bird of prey." (Chalda, 63 a.) The only ground on which an opinion can be formed, is the etymology of the word; it is connected by Gesenius (Thes. p. 127) with the root anaph, "to soot in anger," and is therefore applicable to some irritable bird, perhaps the goose. The parrot, swallow, and a kind of eagle have been suggested without any real reason.

HERSED [Kindness, favor]: Ezed: Alex. Ezra: Benjeseid, the son of Hesed, or Henechesed, was commissary for Solomon in the district of the Aruboth, Socoh, and all the land of Hepher "(1 K. iv. 10).

HESMON [Shining, fruitfulnes]: LXX. omits, both MSS.; [Comp. Adj. "Aretéastus" Hesmon], a place named, with others, as lying between Mokadah and Beer-sheba (Josh. xx. 27), and therefore in the extreme south of Judah. Nothing further is known of it; but may it not be another form of the name Azmon, given in Num. xxxiv. 4 as one of the landmarks of the southern boundary of Judah?
HESRON (הֶשְׁרֹן) [enclosed, as by a wall]: *'Aṣpōw; Alex. *Aṣpouw: Hesron. Heszron, the son of Reuben (Num. xxvi. 6, [21]). Our translators followed the Vulg. in adopting this form of the name. [In many modern editions of the A. V. however, it is spelt Hesron. A.] W. A. W.

HETH (הֵתָה). i. e. Cheth [terror, giant]: Xē: Hethh, the forefather of the nation of the Hittites. In the genealogical tables of Gen. x. and i Chr. i, Heth is stated as a son of Canaan, younger than Zidon the firstborn, but preceding the Jebusites, the Amorites, and the other Canaanite families. Heth and Zidon alone are named as persons; all the rest figure as tribes (Gen. x. 15; 1 Chr. i. 13; LXX. τῶν Χετταών: [Vulg. Heth-

HITTITES. The Hittites were therefore a Hamite race, neither of the "country" nor the "kindred" of Abraham and Isaac (Gen. xxvii. 3, 4; xxviii. 1, 2). In the earliest historical mention of the nation — the beautiful narrative of Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah — they are styled, not Hittites, but Bene-Ceth (A. V. "sons, and children of Heth," Gen. xxviii. 3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20; xxv. 19; xlix. 32). Once we hear of "daughters of Heth" (xxviii. 46), the "daughters of the land;" at that early period still called, after their less immediate progenitor, "daughters of Canaan" (xxviii. 1, 8, compared with xxv. 46, and xxvi. 34, 35).

In the Egyptian monuments the name Chot is said to stand for Palestine (Bosnow, Egypten, quoted by Ewald, Gesch. i. 317, note). G.

HETHILON (הֶתיָלוֹן), the way of Hethlon [i. e. the lurking-place or stronghold]: [LXX. translate the name: Hethloun], the "name of a place on the northern border of the "promised land." It is mentioned only twice in Scripture (Ex. xlv. 15, xxviii. 1). In all probability the "way of Hethlon" is the pass at the northern end of Lebanon, from the sea-coast of the Mediterranean to the great plain of Hanaith, and is thus identical with "the entrance of Hamath" in Num. xxxiv. 8, &c. (See *Fire Years in Deuter.-

HEZEKII (חֶזְקִיَاו, חֶזְקִיוֹן), i. e. Hizkia, a short form of Hizkiah, strength of Jehovah = Hezekiah: *Aqōξi: [Yat. Ακέξῆ]: Hezeki), a man in the genealogies of Benjamin, one of the Bene-Ephal [sons of E.], a descendant of Shairaim (1 Chr. vii. 17).

HEZEKIAH (חֶזְקִיָה), generally חֶזְקִיָה, Hizkia'nu, and also with initial "נחֶזְקִיָה: LXX. and Joseph. Εξεκίας: Ezekias = strength of Jehovah), king ofJudah from the year 727 to 687 (B.C. 704). He was the second king of Judah, son of the apostate Ahaz and Abi (or Abijah), ascended the throne at the age of 25 u. c. 726. Since, however, Ahaz died at the age of 36, some prefer to make Hezekiah only twenty years old at his accession (reading ד for ד), as otherwise he must have been born when Ahaz was a boy of 11 years old. This, indeed, is not impossible ([Herion Ep. ad Iulianem, 132, quoted by Bochart, Geogr. Sacr. p. 929; see Keil on 2 K. xvii. 1; Knobel, Jes. 22, &c.; but, if any change be desirable, it is better to suppose that Heziz was 23 and not 20 years old at his accession (LXX. Syr. Arab. 2 Chr. xxvii. 1), reading ד for ד in 2 K. xvi. 2).

Hezekiah was one of the three most perfect kings of Judah (2 K. xviii. 5; Exod. xlv. 4). His first act was to purify, and repair, and reunite with splendid sacrifices and perfect ceremonial, the Temple which had been despised and neglected during the careless and idolatrous reign of his father. This consecration was accompanied by a revival of the theocratic spirit, so strict as not even to spare "the high places," which, although tolerated by many well-intentioned kings, had naturally been profaned by the worship of images and Asherahs (2 K. xvi. 4). On the extreme ineptitudes and probable consequences of this measure, see High Places. A still more decisive act was the destruction of a brazen serpent, said to have been the one used by Moses in the miraculous healing of the Israelites (Num. xxxi. 9), which had been removed to Jerusalem, and had become, "down to those days," an object of adoration, partly in consequence of its venerable character as a reliqu, and partly perhaps from some dint tendencies to the idolatry of the Hebrews. (Prideaux, Conscript. i. 12, Oxf., ed.) When the kingdom of Israel had fallen, Hezekiah extended his pious endeavors to Ephraim and Manasseh, and by inviting the scattered inhabitants to a peculiar Passover kindled their indignation also against the idolatrous practices which still continued among them. This Passover was, from the necessities of the case, celebrated at an unusual, though not illegal (Num. ix. 10, 11) time, and by an excess of Levitical zeal, it was continued for the unprecedented period of fourteen days. For these latter facts the Chronicler (2 Chr. xxix. 3, xxx. xxxi) is our sole authority, and he characteristically narrates them at great length. It would appear at first sight that this Passover was celebrated immediately after the purification of the Temple (see Prideaux, l. c.), but careful consideration makes it almost certain that it could not have taken place before the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign, when the fall of Samaria had stricken such a mortful terror into the heart of Israel (2 Chr. xxxi. 1, xxx. 6, 9, and Keil on 2 K. xviii. 3). By a rare and happy providence the most pious of kings was confirmed in his faithfulness, and seconded in his endeavors by the powerful assistance of the noblest and most eloquent of prophets. The influence of Isaiah was, however, not gained without a struggle with the "scurrilous" remnant of the former royal counsellors (Is. xxvi. 11), who in all probability recommended to the king such a "serpent," possibly with a contemplative play on the word דְּשִׁרָה, "a brazen thing," and with a prophetic reference to the heart of Israel (2 Chr. xxxi. 1, xxxi, 6, 9, and Keil on 2 K. xviii. 3).

alliances and con promises as would be in unison rather with the dictates of political expediency, than with that sole unhesitating trust in the arm of Jehovah which the prophets inculcated. The leading name of this cabinet was Shechem, who, from the outside of this story, is mentioned and the expression in Is. xxii. 16 (see Blunt, Lects., Coincidences), was probably a foreigner, perhaps a Syrian (Hitzig).

At the instance of Isaiah, he seems to have been subsequently degraded from the high post of preceptor of the palace (which office was given to Elkanim, Is. xxi. 21), to the inferior, though still honorable, station of state-secretary (Judg. ii. 18); the further punishment of exile with which Isaiah had threatened him (xxii. 18) being possibly forgiven on his amendment, of which we have some traces in Is. xxxvii. 2 E. (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 617).

At the head of a repentant and united people, Hezekiah ventured to assume the aggressive against the Philistines, and in a series of victories not only recovered the cities which his father had lost (2 Chr. xxvi. xxvii. 18), but even dispossessed them of their own cities except Gaza (2 K. xvii. 8) and Gath (Joseph. Ant. ix. 13, § 3). It was perhaps to the purposes of this war that he applied the money which would otherwise have been used to pay the tribute exacted by Shalmaneser, according to the agreement of Ahaz with his predecessor, Tiglath Pileser. When, after the capture of Samaria, the king of Assyria applied for this impost, Hezekiah refused it, and in open rebellion omitted to send even the usual presents (2 K. xviii. 7), a line of conduct to which he was doubtless encouraged by the splendid exhortation of his prophetic guide.

Instant war was averted by the heroic and long continued resistance of the Tyrians under their king Elukenos (Joseph. Ant. ix. 14), against a siege, which was abandoned only in the fifth year (Grote, Greece, iii. 559, 4th ed.), when it was found to be impracticable. This must have been a critical and intensely anxious period for Jerusalem, and Hezekiah used every available means to strengthen his position, and render his capital impregnable (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Chr. xxix. 3-5, 30; Is. xxi. 8-11, xxxii. 18; and to these events Ewald also refers Is. xlviii. 13). But while all Judaea trembled with anticipation of Assyrian invasion, and while Shechem and others were relying "in the shadow of Egypt," Isaiah's brave heart did not fail, and he even denounced the wrath of God against the proud and sinful merchant-city (Is. xxiii.), which now seemed to be the main bulwark of Judaea against immediate attack.

It was probably during the siege of Samaria that Shalmaneser died, and was succeeded by Sargon, who, jealous of Egyptian influence in Judaea, sent an army under a Taritan or general (Is. xx. 1), which penetrated Egypt (Nah. ii. 15-16) and destroyed Nu-anun; although it is clear from Hezekiah's rebellion (2 K. xvii. 7) that it can have produced but little permanent impression. Sargon, in the tenth year of his reign (which is the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah), made an expedition to Palestine; but his annals make no mention of any conquests from Hezekiah on this occasion, and he seems to have occupied himself in the siege of Ashdod, and in the inspection of mines (Rossmüller, Eld., Geogr., ix.). This must therefore be the expedition alluded to in 2 K. xxi. 13; Is. xxxi. 1; an expedition which is nearly alluded to, as it led to no result. But if the Scripture narrative is to be reconciled with the records of Assyrian history it seems necessary to make a transposition in the text of Isaiah (and therefore of the book of Kings). That some such expedition must be inferred is, if the Assyrian history is correct, maintained by Dr. Hincks in a paper On the restoration of Choromyth, which the newly discovered Apis-stela render necessary. "The text," he says, "as it originally stood, was probably to this effect: 2 K. xviii. 13. New in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah the king of Assyria came up [alluding to the attack mentioned in Sargon's Assur. xxi. xx. 1-19. In those days was king Hezekiah sick of a deadly disease, the king of Assyria, king of Assur, came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them, etc., xxii. 13, xiii. 37] (Dr. Hincks, in Journ. of Soc. Lit. Oct. 1858). Perhaps some later transcriber, unaware of the earlier and unimportant invasion, confused the mission to Sargon in 2 K. xxi. 13 with the detailed story of Semacheri's attack (2 K. xviii. 14 to xxi. 37), and, considering that the account of the former begins after the latter, broke the continuity of the narrative, removed it to the end.

According to this scheme, Hezekiah's dangerous illness (2 K. xx.; Is. xxxviiii.; 2 Chr. xxiii. 24) nearly synchronized with Sargon's futile invasion, in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, eleven years before Semacheri's invasion. That it must have preceded the attack of Semacheri is nearly obvious from the promise in 2 K. xx. 6, as well as from modern discoveries (Layard, Nim. and Bab. i. 145); and such is the view adopted by the Bibles (Schnor Olom, cap. xxiii.), Ussher, and by most commentators, except Vitringa and Gesenius (Keil, Ad loc.; Pridaux, i. 22). There seems to be no ground whatever for the vague conjecture so confidently advanced (Winers, s. v. Hisban; John, Hebr. Common. § 6f.), that the king's illness was the same plague which had destroyed the Assyrian army. The word נְבֵית is not elsewhere applied to the plague, but to carbuncles and inflammatory ulcers (Ex. ix. 9; Job ii. 7, &c.). Hezekiah, whose kingdom was in a dangerous crisis, who had at that time no heir (for Manasseh was not born till long afterwards, 2 K. xx. 1), and who regarded death as the end of existence (Is. xxxvi. 1.), "turned his face to the wall and wept sore at the threatened approach of dissolution. God had compassion on his anguish, and heard his prayer. Isaiah had hardly left the palace when he was ordered to promise the king immediate recovery, and a fresh lease of life, ratifying the promise by a sign, and earing the boil by a plaster of figs, which were often used medicinally in similar cases (Ges. Theor. i. 311; Celsius, Mevor. ii. 377; Barthdams, De Medic. Biblic. x. 47). What was the exact nature of the disease we cannot say; according to Monle it was fever terminating in abscesses. For some account of the retrogression of the shadow on the sundial of Ahaz, see Dial.. On this remarkable passage we must be content to refer the reader to Carpop., App. Crit. p. 351 f.; Winers, s. v. Hisban and Vulgar; Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 532 f.; the elaborate notes of Keil on 2 K. xx.; Rosenmuller and Gesenius on Is. xxxviiii., and especially Ewald, Gesch., i. 658.

Various ambassadors came with letters and gifts to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery (2 Chr. xxiii. 23), and among them an embassy from Merc-
Eosenmiuller, Layaid, So although ambassadors. Assyrian treasures of Ptolemy’s canon. The ostensible object of this mission was to compliment Hezekiah on his convalescence (2 K. xx. 12; Is. xxxix. 1), and “to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land” (2 Chr. xxxii. 31), a rumor of which could not fail to interest a people devoted to astrology. But its real purpose was to discover how far an alliance between the two powers was possible or desirable, for Marodonopads, no less than Hezekiah, was in apprehension of the Assyrians. In fact Sargon expelled him from the throne of Babylon in the following year (the 16th of Hezekiah), although after a time he seems to have returned and re-established himself for six months, at the end of which he was murdered by Belblos (Dr. Hincks, l. c.; Rosenmuller, Bibl. Geogr. ch. viii.; Layard, Nin. and Bab. i. 141). Community of interest made Hezekiah receive the overtures of Babylon with unexclusive gratification; and, perhaps, to enhance the opinion of his own importance as an ally, he displayed to the messengers the princely treasures which he and his predecessors had accumulated. The mention of such rich stores is an additional argument for supposing these events to have happened before Semachibar’s invasion (see 2 K. xviii. 14-16), although they are related after them in the Scripture historians. If ostentation were his motive it received a terrible rebuke, and he was informed by Isaiah that from the then tottering and subordinate province of Babylon, and not from the mighty Assyria, would come the ruin and captivity of Judah (Is. xxxix. 5). This prophecy and the one of Micah (Mic. iv. 10) are the earliest definition of the locality of that hostile power, where the clouds of exile so long threatened (Lev. xxvi. 35; Deut. iv. 27, xxx. 2) were beginning to gather. It is an impressive and fearful circumstance that the moment of exultation was chosen as the opportunity for warning, and that the prophecies of the Assyrian deliverance are set side by side with those of the Babylonish captivity (Davidson On Prophecy, p. 256). The weak friend was to accomplish that which was impossible to the powerful foe. But, although pride was the sin thus venenously checked by the prophet, Isaiah was certainly not blind to the political motives (Joseph. Ant. x. 2, § 2), which made Hezekiah so complaisant to the Babylonian ambassadors. Into those motives he had inquired in vain, for the king met that portion of his question (“What said these men?”) by emphatic silence. Hezekiah’s meek answer to the stern denunciation of future woe has been most unjustly censured as “a false rejection which combines sickness with sullenness” (Newman, Hebr. Mon. p. 274). But a careful study now would disclose a conviction that God’s decree could not be otherwise than just and right, and a natural thankfulness for even a temporary suspension of its inevitable fulfillment.

Sargon was succeeded (b. c. 702) by his son Semachibar, whose two invasions occupy the greater part of the Scripture records concerning the reign of Hezekiah. The first of these took place in the third year of Semachibar (b. c. 700), and comprises only three verses (2 K. xviii. 13-16), though the route of the advancing Assyrians may be traced in Is. x. 3-5. The rumor of the invasion redoubled Hezekiah’s exertions, and he prepared for a siege by providing offensive and defensive armor, stopping up the wells, and diverting the water of Gihon into the city by a subterranean canal (Ezech. xlvii. 17). For a similar precaution taken by the Maccabees, see Will. Tyr. viii. 7, Keil). But the main hope of the political faction was the alliance with Egypt, and they seem to have sought it by presents and private entreaties (Is. xxx. 6), especially with a view to obtaining chariots and cavalry (Is. xxxi. 1-3), which was the weakest arm of the Jewish service, as we see from the decision which it excised (2 K. xviii. 23). Such overtures kindled Isaiah’s indignation, and Selauna may have lost his high office by recommending them. The prophet clearly saw that Egypt was too weak and faithless to be serviceable, and the applications to Pharaoh (who is compared by Rabshakeh to one of the weak reeds of his own river), implied a want of trust in the help of God. But Isaiah did not disapprove of the spontaneously proffered assistance of the tall and warlike Ethiopians (Is. xviii. 2, 7, acc. to Ewald’s trans.); because he may have regarded it as a providential aid.

The account given of this first invasion in the Annals of Semachibar is that he attacked Hezekiah, because the Ekronites had sent their king Puliyia (or “Hadiyya” acc. to Col. Rawlinson) as a prisoner to Jerusalem (cf. 2 K. xviii. 8); that he defeated them with forty thousand men; and that in the 20th year of Hezekiah (Is. xiii. 14) is apparently a general expression, cf. xix. 8) and 290,000 prisoners: that he besieged Jerusalem with mounds (cf. 2 K. xix. 32); and although Hezekiah promised to pay 800 talents of silver (of which perhaps 300 only were ever paid) and 30 of gold (2 K. xvii. 14; but see Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 145), yet not content with this he mulcted him of a part of his dominions, and gave them to the kings of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza (Rawlinson, Hebr. x. 475 B). So important was this expedition that Demetrius, the Jewish historian, even attributes to Semachibar the Great Captivity (Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 146, ed. Syr.).

In almost every particular this account agrees with the notice in Scripture, and we may see a reason for so great a sacrifice on the part of Hezekiah in the glimpse which Isaiah gives us of his capital city driven by desperation into licentious and impious conduct. This can hardly be reconciled with the events which have had the one good result of proving the worthlessness of the Egyptian alliance; for at a place called Altagn (the Eltekon of Josh. xv. 59?) Semachibar inflicted an overwhelming defeat on the combined forces of Egypt and Ethiopia, which had come to the assistance of Ekron. But Isaiah regarded the purchased treaty as a cowardly defection, and the sight of his fellow-citizens gazing peacefully from the horse-steps on the bright array of the enemy and quivered Assyrians, filled him with indignation and despair (Is. xxv. 1-7, if the latest explanations of this chapter be correct).

Hezekiah’s bridle (or fine) brought a temporary release, for the Assyrians marched into Egypt, where, if Herodotus (ii. 141) and Josephus (Ant. x. 1-3) are to be trusted, they advanced without resistance to Pelusium, owing to the hatred of the warlike people. The queen of Thoth, who had, in her priestly predilections, interfered with their prerogatives. In spite of this advantage, Semachibar was forced to make the siege of Pelusium, by the advance of Tarchakah or Tarakos, the ally of Sethos and Hezekiah, who afterwards united the crowns of Egypt and Ethiopia. This magnificent Ethiopian hero, who had extended his conquests to the pillars of Hercules (Strab. xv. 472), was indeed a formidable antagonist. His death is recorded in a temple at Medainel Habool, but the jealousy of the Memphites (Wilkinson, Ant. Egypt. i. 141) concealed his assistance, and attributed the deliverance of Sesostris to the miraculous interposition of an army of mice (Herod. ii. 141). This story may have had its source, however, not in jealousy, but in the use of the mouse as the emblem of destruction (Herzfeld. Hierogly. i. 59; Rawlinson, Herod. ad loc.), and of some sort of disease of plagues (2 Sam. xxiii. 18; John, Arch. Ebd. § 185). The legend doubtless gained ground from the extraordinary circumstances which afterwards ruined the army of Semmacherib. We say afterwards, because, however much the details of the two occurrences may have been confused, we cannot agree with the majority of writers (Prideaux, Bechart, Michaelis, Jahn, Keil, Newman, etc.) in identifying the flight of Semmacherib from Pelusium with the event described in 2 K. xix. We prefer to follow Josephus in making them allude to distinct events.

Returning from his futile expedition (παρηγορητός ἀνέχετος, Joseph. Ant. x. 1, § 4), Semmacherib dealt treacherously with Hezekiah (Is. xxxix. 1) by attacking the stronghold of Lachish. This was the commencement of that second invasion, respecting which we have such full details in 2 K. xviii. 17 ff.; 2 Chr. xxxix. 9 ff.; Is. xxxvii. That there were two invasion (contrary to the opinion of Layard, Bonnet, Vince Smith, etc.) is clearly proved by the details of the first given in the Assyrian annals (see Rawlinson, Herod. i. p. 477).

Although the annals of Semmacherib on the great cylinder in the Brit. Museum reach to the end of his eighth year, and this second invasion belongs to his fifth year (n. c. 698, the twenty-eighth year of Hezekiah), yet no allusion to it has been found. So shameful a disaster was naturally concealed by national vanity. From Lachish he sent against Jerusalem an army under two officers and his embassador the orator Ralshakhe, with a blasphemous and insulting summons to surrender, dedicating Hezekiah's hopes of Egyptian succor, and apparently endeavoring to inspire the people with distrust of his religious innovations (2 K. xviii. 22, 25, 30). The reiteration and increasement of the latter arguments together with Ralshakhe's fluent mastery of Hebrew (which he used to tempt the people from their allegiance by a glowing promise, v. 31, 32), give countenance to the supposition that he was an apostate Jew. Hezekiah's ministers were thrown into anguish and dismay; but the unbaptized Isaiah hurled back threatening for threatening with unrivalled eloquence and force. He even prophesied that the fires of Tophet were already burning in expectation of the Assyrian corpses which were destined to feed their flame. Meanwhile Semmacherib, having taken Lachish (an event possibly depicted on a series of reliefs at Mosul, Layard, V. and B. 148-152), was besetting Lachish when, alarmed by a "rumor" of Tirhakah's advance (to avenge the defeat at Altah?), he was forced to relinquish once more his immediate designs, and content himself with a defiant letter to Hezekiah. Whether on this occasion he encountered and defeated the Ethiopians (as Prideaux precariously infers from Is. xx. Connect. i. p. 26), or not, we cannot tell. The next event of the campaign, about which we are informed, is that the Jewish king, with simple piety prayed to God with Semmacherib's letter outspread before him (cf. 1 Macc. iii. 48), and received a prophecy of immediate deliverance. Accordingly "that night the Angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians 185,000 men."

There is no doubt that some secondary cause was employed in the accomplishment of this event. We are certainly "not to suppose," as Dr. Johnson observed, that the angel went about with a sword in his hand stabbing them one by one, but that some powerful natural agent was employed. The Babylonian Talmud and some of the Targums attribute it to storms of lightning (Vitrunga, Vergel, etc.); Prideaux, Heine (de causa Strag. Assy.), and Faber to the Simon; R. Jose, Ussher, Press (de causa idol. Assy.), etc., to a nocturnal attack by Tirhakah: Paulus to a poisoning of the waters; and finally Josephus, followed by an immense majority of ancient and modern commentators, including even Keil, to the Pestilence. This would be a cause not only adequate (Justin, xix. 11; Diodor. xip. p. 434: see the other instances quoted by Rosenmuller, Winner, Keil, Jahn, etc.), but most probable in itself from the crowded and terrified state of the camp. There is therefore no necessity to adopt the ingenious conjectures by which Bedier, Koppe, and Weseler endeavor to get rid of the large number 185,000."

After this reverse Semmacherib fled precipitately to Nineveh, where he revenged himself on as many Jews as were in his power (Tob. i. 18), and after many years (not fifty-five days, as Tobit says, i. 21), was murdered by two of his sons as he drank himself drunk in the house of Nisroch (Assaraz?) his god. He certainly lived till n. c. 680, for his 220th year is mentioned on a clay tablet (c.) he must therefore have survived Hezekiah by some seventeen years. It is probable that several of the Psalms (e. g. xvi.-xlvii., lxxvi.) allude to his discomfiture.

Hezekiah only lived to enjoy for about one year more his well-earned peace and glory. He slept with his fathers after a reign of twenty-nine years, in the 56th year of his age (n. c. 697), and was buried with great honor and universal mourning in the chiefest of the sepulchres (or 'the road leading up to the sepulchres,' εἰς ἀναβάσεις τάφων, LXX., because, as Theophrastus conjectures, the actual sepulchres were full) of the sons of David" (2 Chr. xxxii. 33). He had found time for many works of peace in the noble and almost blameless course of his troubled life, and to his pious labors we are indebted for seven months at Cairo (Gesenski, ad loc.). It might be accomplished by a storm. So Vitrunga understood it, and this would best suit the words in Is. xxx. 20 (History of the Jewish Church, ii. 590). A mutilated account of this wonder was current among the Egyptians. They ascribed it, as a matter of course, to their own divinities, but unquestionably had in view the same occurrence (see Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 111).
HEZEKIAH

Hezekiah had for at least one portion of the present canon (Prov. xxv. 1; Eccles. xviii. 17 ff.) He can have no finer panegyric than the words of the son of Siraeh, "even the kings of Judah failed, for they就越过 the law of the Most High; all except Diaked, and Ezechias, and Judas failed."

"Besides the many authors and commentators who have written on this period of Jewish history (on which much light has been recently thrown by Mr. Layard, Sir G. Wilkinson, Sir H. Rawlinson, Dr. Hincks, and other scholars who have studied the Ninveh remains), see for continuous lives of Hezekiah, Josephus (Ant. ix. 13-x. 2), Prideaux (Connect. i. 11-49), John (Hebr. Comm. § xii.), Winer (s. v. Hezkia), and Ewald (Gesch. iii. 614-614, 3d ed.)."—E. W. F.

* Dean Stanley devotes a long lecture (History of the Jewish Church, i. 503-549) to the character of Hezekiah, and the events with which he was connected. "The reign of Hezekiah is the culminating point of interest in the history of the kings of Judah." Yet the interest of his personal history is mainly which arises from the contemplation of his example as one of faith and piety, and of the wonderful deliverance vouchsafed to the nation for his sake. Though both these and his earliest efforts for the reformation of the people served only to delay, but not to avert, the lastening ruin of the commonwealth. The sketch drawn by Mr. Stanley of Hezekiah's repairing to the temple with the defunct letter of Sennacherib, to spread it before Jehovah and to implore his help, brings out the monarch's character at that most critical juncture in its best light. The Assyrian conqueror had sent from Lachish, demand his submission of Hezekiah and the surrender of Jerusalem into the hands of his general. On hearing this summons, Eli-akin, Shebna, and Joah, Hezekiah's three highest officers, tore their garments in horror, and appeared in that state before the king. He, too, gave way to the same uncontrolled burst of grief. He and they both dressed themselves in sackcloth, and the king took refuge in the Temple. The ministers felt it became them to hail him as the king. The suc-ting embassy returned to Sennacherib. The army was moved from Lachish and lay in front of the fortress of Libnah. A letter conched in terms like those already used by his envoys, was sent direct from the king of Assyria to the king of Judah. What would be their fate if they were taken, they might know from the fate of Lachish, which we still see on the sculptured monuments, where the inhabitants are lying before the king, stripped in order to be flayed alive. Hezekiah took the letter, and penetrating, as it would seem, into the Most Holy Place, laid it before the Divine Presence enthroned above the cherubs, and called upon him whose name it insulted, to look down and see with his own eyes the outrage that was offered to him. From that dark recess no direct answer was vouch- safed. The answer came through the mouth of Isaiah. From the first moment that Sennacherib's army had appeared, he had held the same language of unbroken hope and confidence,clothed in every variety of imagery. . . . It was a day of awful suspcnsor. In proportion to the strenug of Isaiah's confidence and of Hezekiah's devotion, would have been the ruin of the Jewish church and faith, if they hcad been disappointed of their hope. It was a day of suspense also for the two great armies which were drawing near to their encounter on the boundaries of Palestine. Like Antius in the siege of Orleans, Hezekiah must have looked southward and westward with ever keener and keener eagerness. For already there was a rumor that Tiria-kah, the king of Egypt, was on his way to the rescue. Already Semmacherib had heard the rumor, and it was this which precipitated his endeavor to intimidate Jerusalem into submission. The evening was closed in on what seemed to be the devoted city. The morning dawned, and with the morning came the tidings from the camp at Libnah, that they were delivered. . . . It came to pass that night (2 K. xix. 35) that the Angel of Jehovah went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand." . . . The Assyrian king at once returned, and, according to the Jewish tradition, wreaked his vengeance on the Israelite exiles whom he found in Mesopotamia. He was the last of the great Assyrian conquerors. No Assyrian host again ever crossed the Jordan. Within a few years from that time . . . the Assyrian power suddenly vanished from the earth."

It was in all probability at the time of Semmacherib's first invasion of Palestine that Hezekiah pur chased his exemption from submission to the Assyrian yoke by the payment of a fine. If the Assyrian conquerors were right, that is, if the Annals of Sennacherib furnish an important confirmation of the Biblical account of this expedition, and of its results as regards Hezekiah and the Jews. The boastful record on one of the cylinders is said to read as follows: "And because Hezekiah, king of Judah, says Semmacherib, I would not submit to my yoke, I came up against him, and by force of arms and by the might of my power, I took forty-six of his strong fortified cities; and I took away the best of his horses . . . and my hand . . . in the gates, so as to prevent escape . . . Then upon this Hezekiah fell the fear of the power of my arms, and he sent out to me the chiefs and the elders of Jerusalem with 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, and divers treasures, a rich and immense booty. (See 2 K. xviii. 13-16). . . All these things were brought to me at Nineveh, the seat of my government, Hezekiah having sent them by way of tribute, and as a token of his submission to my power." (See Rawlinson's Bemp-ta Lectures for 1850, p. 316 f., Amer. ed.) Dean Milman also calls attention to this coincidence (History of the Jews, i. 427, Amer. ed.).

The chronological order of some of the events in Hezekiah's life is not easily adjusted. The events are related in different books (Kings, Chronicles, Micah, Isaiah), and not with many notations of time. M. von Niebuhr treats of some of the questions relating to the synchronism of Hezekiah's history with that of the Babylonians and Egyptians (Geschichte Assur's u. Babels, pp. 71, 76, 88, 100 f., 179). For valuable articles on Hezekiah, see Winer's Bibl. Real-Encyc. i. 496-499; Her-zogg's Real-Encycl. vi. 151-157; and Zeller's Bibl. Wörterb. i. 612-615, 2te Aufl. For information on related subjects, the reader is referred to this Dictionary to Dial. ; Isaiah ; Sargon ; Sex-

HEZION [חיזון] [sight; vision]: A’gav: [Vat. A’gav]: Alex. A’gav: Hez’mion], a king of Aram (Syria) father of Fabrimen, and grandfather of Benhadad I. He and his father are mentioned only in 1 K. xv. 18, and their names are omitted by Josephus. In the absence of all information, the authority of some editors that he is identical with Rezon, the contemporary of Solomon, in 1 K. xi. 23: the two names being very similar in Hebrew, and still more so in other versions (compare Arabs, and Peshito on the latter passage); and indeed this conclusion has been adopted by some translators and commentators (Johann, Kleiner, Duthe, Ewald). Against it are (r), that the number of generations of the Syrian kings would then be one less than those of the contemporary kings of Judah. But the reign of Abij am was only three years, and in fact Jeroboam outlived both Roboam and his son. (b) The statement of Nicolaus of Damascus (Joseph. Ant. vii. 5, § 2), that from the time of David for ten generations the kings of Syria were one dynasty, each king taking the name of Judah, "as did the Polybius in Egypt." But this would exclude, not only Hezir and Fabrimen, but Rezon, unless we may interpret the last sentence to mean that the official title of Hadad was held in addition to the ordinary name of the king. [Rezon: Fabrimen.]

HEZIR [חזר] [scire]: Xogp: [Vat. Xogp]: Alex. Xogp: Hez’ir]: 1. A priest in the time of David, leader of the 17th monthly course in the service (1 Chr. xxiv. 15). 2. [Xogp]: [Vat. Alex. FA. Xogp: Hez’ir]. One of the heads of the people (heaven) who sealed the solemn covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 20). 3. [Xogp]: [Vat. Alex. FA. Xogp: Hez’ir].

HEZR’AI [חזר’ai] [Hezron, which see], according to the Keri of the Masorets, but the original reading of the text, Celah, has הזר’ai = Hezron: A’resai: [Alex. A’resai: Hearon], a native of Carmel, perhaps of the southern race. He was the first of a tribe or a clan of priests once a slave of Nehor: one of the 30 heroes of David’s guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 35). In the parallel list the name appears as —

HEZ’RO [חזרו] [see infera]: [Hespor]: Alex. A’resai: [Vat. Alex. A’resai: Comp. Espor]: Hearon], in 1 Chr. xli. 37. Kennicott, however (DISCUSSION, pp. 207, 239), decides, on the almost unanimous authority of the ancient versions, that Hezra is the original form of the name.

HEZRON’I [חזרון] [unwoning, Fürst; but well, as a garden, Ges.]: A’resai: [Alex. in Num. A’resai: Hearon]. 1. A son of Reuben (Gen. xlii. 9: Ex. vi. 14), who founded the family of the Hezronites (Num. xxvi. 6). 2. A son of Pharez, and one of the direct ancestors of David (Gen. xliii. 12; Ruth ii. 18): in LXX. A’resai (once var. lect. Grap. A’resai), and A’resai, which is followed in Matt. i. 3. [Vat. in Ruth: Aresai, in 1 Chr. ii. 9, 18, 21, 25: Eresai: i. 5, 1-14, Aresai: Vulg. Hearon, in Ruth Eresai.]

HIEL [חיאל], perhaps for HIEL [חיאל] [God lives, Ges.]: [Alex. A’hian]: [Vat. Alex. A’hian: Comp. Xhian]: Heli, a native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Abah (1 K. xvi. 31); and in whom was fulfilled the curse pronounced by Joshua.

HEZRONITES, THE [חזרון] [i. e. Adarai]: [Vat. -xra]: Hezromite. A branch of the tribe of Judah, descendants of Hezron, son of Pharez (Num. xxvi. 21). [In the A. V. ed. 1611 the word is spelt Hezronites. — A.] W. A. W.

HIDDAI [הידדai] [2 slbl. [mightly chief]: Alex. A’dai: [Vat. A’dai: Abd. Ophai]: Vat. on Moses’ side, one of the thirty-seven guards of David’s guard (2 Sam. xxii. 30), described as "of the torrents of Gaash." In the parallel list of 1 Chr. (xi. 32) the name is given as Huru. Kennicott (DISCUSSION, p. 194) decides in favor of "Hamni" on grounds for which the reader must be referred to his work.

HIDDEKEL [חדרק] [sharp, swift, Dietr. in Ges. 6te Aufld.: Typos: [In Dan. (Theodol.)]: Typos E’dhekel: [Alex. E’dhekel]: Tygrias, Tigris, one of the rivers of Eden, the river which "goeth eastward to Assyria" (Gen. ii. 14), and which Daniel calls "the great river" (Dan. x. 4), seems to have been rightly identified by the LXX. with the Tigris. It is difficult to account for the initial π, unless it be for τπ, "lively," which is used of running water in Gen. xxvi. 19. Dekel (דקל) is clearly an equivalent of Diggah or Diggath, a name borne by the Tigris in all ages. The form Diggah occurs in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, in Josephus (Ant. i. 1), in the Armenian Eczues (Chron. Con. pars i. c. 2), in Zonaras (Anna. i. 2), and in the Armenian version of the nP. It is hardened to Diggah (Diggah) by Pliny (H. N. vi. 27). The name now in use among the inhabitants of Mesopotamia is Dijjah. It has generally been supposed that Diggah is a mere Semitic corruption of Tigris, and that this latter is the true name of the stream. Strabo (xi. 14, § 8, Pliny (loc. cit.) and other writers tell us that the river received its designation from its rapidity, the word Tigris (Tygrias) meaning in the Medo-Persian language "an arrow." This seems probable enough; but it must be observed that the two forms are found side by side in the Babylonian transcript of the Behistun inscription, and that the original name of the stream in the inscriptions of Assyria is Tygrias. Moreover, if we allow the Dekel of Hobebkel, to mean the Tigris, it would seem probable that this was the more ancient of the two appellations. Perhaps, therefore, it is best to suppose that there was in early Babylonian a root dik, equivalent in meaning, and no doubt heeded in origin, with the Aramaic tig or tj, and that from these two roots were formed independently the two names, Dikel, Dikkil, or Diggah, or Tygrias, Tigris, or Tigris. The stream was known by either name indifferently; but on the whole the Aramaic appellation predominated in ancient times, and was that most commonly used even by Semitic races. The Aramaic, however, when they conquered Mesopotamia, revived the true Semitic title, and this (Dijk’h) continues to be the name by which the river is known to the natives down to the present day. The course of the river is described under Tigris.

HIEL [חיאל], perhaps for HIEL [חיאל] [God lives, Ges.]: [Alex. A’hian]: [Vat. Alex. A’hian: Comp. Xhian]: Heli, a native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Abah (1 K. xvi. 31); and in whom was fulfilled the curse pronounced by Joshua Hierapolis (Ἱέραπόλις; sacred city). This place is mentioned only once in Scripture, and that incidentally, namely, in Col. iv. 13, where its church is associated with those of Coloss. and Laodicea. Such association is just what we should expect, for the three towns were all in the basin of the Meander, and within a few miles of one another. It is probable that Hierapolis was one of the "inustres Asiae urbes" (Tac. Ann. xiv. 27) which, with Laodicea, were simultaneously desolated by an earthquake about the time when Christianity was established in this district. There is little doubt that the church of Hierapolis was founded at the same time with that of Coloss., and that its characteristics in the apostolic period were the same. Its modern name is Pamukkale.

The most remarkable feature of the neighborhood consists of the hot calcareous springs, which have deposited the vast and singular incrustations noticed by travellers. See, for instance, Chandler, Travel in Asia Minor (1817), i. 254–272; Hamilton, Res. in Asia Minor (1842), i. 507–522.

The situation of Hierapolis is extremely beautiful; and its ruins are considerable, the theatre and gymnasium being the most conspicuous.

Arundel passed within sight of Hierapolis, which he describes as high up on the mountain side, on a terrace extending several miles (Discoveries in Asia Minor, ii. 200). Richter (Wolffarthten, p. 533 ff.) states that Hierapolis and Laodicea (mentioned together, Col. iv. 13) lie within view of each other on opposite sides of the Lyceus. For notices by still other travellers, see Pococke's Description of the East, etc., ii. pt. ii. 75; Fellow's Asia Minor, p. 283 ff.; and Schulte's Reise in das Morgenland, p. 283. The various observations are brought concisely together in Lewin's sketch (Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 204 ff.).

Epaphras may have founded the church at Hierapolis; and at all events, that city was one of the places where he manifested zeal for the truth accredited to him by the Apostle (Col. iv. 13).

The celebrated Stoic philosopher, Epictetus, was a native of Hierapolis, and nearly contemporary with Paul and Epaphras.

High Places (בֵית־חָצִים; in the historical books, תֵּאֵמָה, תֵּאֶמֶת; in the Prophets, בְּנֵים; in the Pentateuch, שם; Lev. xxvi. 30, &c.; and once שבאה, Ex. xvi. 16: excedit, finis). From the earliest times it was the custom among all nations to erect altars and places of worship on lofty and conspicuous spots. We find that the Trojans sacrificed to Zeus on Mount Ida (Il. x. 171), and we are repeatedly told that such was the custom of the Persians, Greeks, Germans, etc.
because they fancied that the hill-tops were nearer heaven, and therefore the most favorable places for prayer and incense (Herod. i. 131; Xen. Cyrop. viii. 7; Mom. iii. 8, § 10; Strab. xv. p. 732; Luc. de Sorceri. i. 4; Creuzer, Symô, i. 159; Winer, s. v. Bergüter). To this general custom we find constant allusion in the Bible (Is. xvi. 7; Jer. iii. 6; Ez. vi. 13, xiii. 6; Hos. iv. 13), and it is especially attributed to the Moabites (Is. xx. 21; 21; 12; Jer. xliii. 35). Even Abraham lay an altar to the Lord on a mountain near Bethel (Gen. xii. 7, 8; cf. xxii. 2-4, xxxi. 54) which shows that the practice was then as innocent as it was natural; and although it afterwards became mingled with idol-ators observances (Num. xxii. 3), it was in itself far less likely to be abused than the consecration of groves (Hos. iv. 13). The external religion of the patriarchs was in some outward observances different from that subsequently established by the Mosaic law, and therefore they should not be condemned for actions which afterwards became sinful only because they were forbidden (Heidelger, Hist. Patr. ii. iii. § 53). [BAMAH.]

It is, however, quite obvious that if every grove and eminence had been suffered to become a place to legitimate worship, especially in a country where they had already been defiled with the sins of people, the whole country, instead of being dedicated, as to the pure worship of the one true God (Haver-nick, Einl. i. p. 502). It would infallibly have led to the adoption of nature-goddesses, and "gods of the hills" (1 K. xx. 23). It was therefore implica-tly forbidden by the law of Moses (Deut. xii. 11-14), which also gave the strictest injunction to destroy those monuments of Cannanish idolatry (Lev. xxvii. 30; Num. xxxi. 62; Deut. xxviii. 49, and LXX. περίγορος), without stating any general reason for this command, beyond the fact that they had been connected with such associations. It seems, however, to be assumed that every Israelite would perfectly understand why groves and high places were prohibited, and therefore they are only condemned by virtue of the injunction to use but one altar for the purposes of sacrifice (Lev. xvii. 3, 4; Deut. xii. proemii, xvi. 21; John iv. 20).

The same idea was expressed in the proem and was not to come into force until such time as the tribes were settled in the promised land, and "had rest from all their enemies round about." Thus we find that both Gideon and Manasseh built altars on high places by Divine command (Judg. vi. 25, 26, xiii. 16-21), and it is quite clear from the tone of the book of Judges that the law on the subject was either totally forgotten or practically obsolete.
Nor could the unsettled state of the country have been pleaded as an excuse, since it seems to have been most fully understood, even during the life of Joshua, that burnt-offerings could be legally offered on one altar only (Josh. xxii. 24). It is more surprising to find this law absolutely ignored at a much later period, when there was no intelligible reason for its violation — as by Samuel at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii. 10) and at Bethelhem (xvi. 5); by Saul at Gilgal (xiii. 9) and at Ajalon (2 Sam. xiv. 35) by David (1 Chr. xxi. 26); by Elijah on Mount Varmel (1 K. xviii. 30); and by other prophets (1 Sam. x. 5). To suppose that in all these cases the rule was superseded by a Divine intimation appears to us an unwarrantable expedient, the more so as the actors in the transactions do not appear to be aware of anything extraordinary in their conduct. The Rabbinists have invented elaborate methods to account for the anomaly: thus they say that high places were allowed until the building of the Tabernacle; that they were then illegal until the arrival at Gilgal, and then during the period while the Tabernacle was at Shiloh; that they were once more permitted whilst it was at Nob and Gilgal (cf. 2 Chr. 3. 5), until the building of the Temple at Jerusalem rendered them finally unlawful (R. Sol. Jarchi, Abu lahian, etc., Horob. i. 8 f.). Others content themselves with saying that until Solomon's time all Palestine was considered holy ground, or that there existed a recognized exemption in favor of high places for private and spontaneous, though not for the stated and public sacrifices.

Such explanations are sufficiently unsatisfactory;
but it is at any rate certain that, whether from the obvious temptations to the disobedience, or from the example of other nations, or from ignorance of any definite law against it, the worship in high places was organized and all but universal throughout Judæa, not only during (1 K. iii. 2-4), but even after the time of Solomon. The convenience of them was obvious, because, as local centres of religious worship, they obviated the unpleasant and dangerous necessity of visiting Jerusalem for the celebration of the yearly feasts (2 K. xxii. 9).
The tendency was ingrained in the national mind; and although it was severely repressed by the later historians, we have no proof that it was known to be sinful during the earlier periods of the monarchy, except of course where it was directly con-ected with idolatrious abominations (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13). In fact the high places seem to have supplied the need of synagogues (Ps. lxxiv. 8), and to have obviated the extreme self-denial involved in having but one legalized locality for the highest forms of worship. Thus we find that Jehoshua established a definite worship at the high places, with its own peculiar and separated priesthood (2 Chr. xi. 12; 2 K. xxii. 9), the members of which were still considered to be priests of Jehovah (although in 2 K. xxiii. 5 they are called by the opprobrious term הבכש). It was therefore no wonder that Jehoshua found it so easy to seduce the people into his symbolic worship at the high places of Dan and Bethel, at each of which he built a chapel for his golden calves. Such chapes were of course frequently added to the mere altars on the hills, as appears from the expressions in 1 K.
xi. 7; 2 K. xii. 9, &c. Indeed, the word הבכש became so common that it was used for any idolatrious shrine even in a valley (Jer. vii. 31), or in the streets of cities (2 K. xii. 9; Ez. xxxi. 31).
These chapels were probably not structures of stone,
but more tabernacles hung with colored tapestry (Ez. xvi. 16; יבכשאש, Apoc. Thud.; Jer. ad
loc. i. 6; אבכשאש, בדשאש, 1 IX.), like the אוֹן כֹּלָא of the Carthaginians (Diod. Sic. xx. 65; Creuzer, Symô, v. 176, quoted by Ges. Thes. i. 188), and like those mentioned in 2 K. xiiii. 7; Am. v. 26.

Many of the pious kings of Judah were either too weak or too ill informed to repress the worship of Jehovah at these local sanctuaries, while they of course endeavored to prevent it from being contaminated with polytheism. It is therefore appended as a matter of blame or a (perhaps venial) drawback to the character of some of the most pious princes, that they tolerated this disobedience to the provi-

ON OF DEUTERONOMY AND LEVITICS. ON THE OTHER HAND IT IS MENTIONED AS AN AGGRAVATION OF THE SIN-FULNESS OF OTHER KINGS THAT THEY BUILT OR RAISED HIGH PLACES (2 CHRON. XXII. 11, XXVIII. 25), WHICH ARE GENERALLY SAID TO HAVE BEEN DEDICATED TO IDOLATROUS PURPOSES. IT IS AS IF THERE WERE AN ALMOST INCONSCIOUS BELIEF THAT A VIOLATION OF THE THEOCRATIC PRINCIPLE AS THE PERMITTED EXISTENCE OF FALSE WORSHIP SHOULD HAVE BEEN TOLERATED BY KINGS OF EVEN ORDINARY PIETY, MUCH LESS BY THE HIGHEST SACERDOTAL AUTHORITIES (2 K. XII. 3). WHEN THEREFORE WE FIND THE RECOGNIZING PHRASE, "ONLY THE HIGH PLACES WERE NOT TAKEN AWAY; AS YET THE PEOPLE DID SACRIFICE AND BURN INCENSE ON THE HIGH PLACES" (2 K. XIV. 4, XV. 4, 85; 2 CHRON. XV. 7), WE ARE FORCED TO LIMIT IT (AS ABOVE) TO PLACES DEDICATED TO JEHOWAH ONLY. THE SUBJECT, HOWEVER, IS MADE MORE DIFFICULT BY A DOUBLE DISCREPANCY, FOR THE ASSERTION, THAT ASA "TOOK AWAY THE HIGH PLACES" (2 CHRON. XIV. 3), IS OPPOSED TO WHAT IS STATED IN THE FIRST BOOK OF KINGS (XV. 14), AND A SIMILAR DISCREPANCY IS FOUND IN THE CASE OF JEHOSHAPHAT (2 CHRON. XVII. 6, XX. 33). MOREOVER IN BOTH INSTANCES THE CHRONICLER IS APPARENTLY AT ISSUE WITH, "AND YET" (2 CHRON. XVII. 17, XX. 33). IT IS INCREDIBLE THAT THIS SHOULD HAVE BEEN THE RESULT OF CARELESSNESS OR OVERSIGHT, AND WE MUST THEREFORE SUPPOSE, EITHER THAT THE EARLIER NOTICES EXPRESSED THE WILL AND ENDORSEMENT OF THESE MONARCHS TO REMOVE THE HIGH PLACES, AND THAT THE LATER ONES RECORDED THEIR FAILURE IN THE ATTEMPT (I. W. VAL., GEEGH. III. 408). KELL, APOL. VERS. P. 230; WINTER, S. RR. ASSA. JEWJ. HIST.; OR THAT THE STATEMENTS REFER RESPECTIVELY TO BAMOTH, DEDICATED TO JEHOWAH AND TO IDOLS (MICHAELIS, SCHULZ, BERTHOM ON 2 CHRON. XVII. 6, 6, ETC.). "THOSE DEVOTED TO FALSE GODS WERE REMOVED, THOSE MISLED TO THE TRUE GOD WERE LEFT TO REMAIN. THE KINGS OPPOSED IMPiETY, BUT WINKED AT ERROR" (BISHOP HALL).

AT LAST HEZEKIAH SET HIMSELF IN GOOD EARNEST TO THE SUPPRESSION OF THIS PREVALENT CORRUPTION (2 K. XXVIII. 4, 22), BOTH IN JUDAH AND ISRAEL (2 CHRON. XXXI. 1), ALTHOUGH, SO RAPID WAS THE GROWTH OF THE EVIL, THAT EVEN HIS SPEECH REFORMATION REQUIRED TO BE FINALLY CONSUMMATED BY JOSIAH (2 CHRON. XXXII.), AND THAT TOO IN THE JERUSALEM AND ITS IMPEDE NEIGHBOURHOOD (2 CHRON. XXXIV. 3). THE MEASURE MUST HAVE CAUSED A VERY VIOLENT SHOCK TO THE RELIGIOUS PREJUDICES OF A LARGE NUMBER OF PEOPLE, AND WE HAVE A CURIOUS AND ALMOST UNNOTICED TRACE OF THIS RESENTMENT IN THE FACT THAT RABSHAKH APPEARS TO THE DISCONTENTED FACTION, AND REPRESENTS HEZEKIAH AS A DANGEROUS INNOVATOR WHO HAD PROVOKED GOD'S ANGER BY HIS ARBITRARY IMPiETY (2 K. XXVIII. 22; 2 CHRON. XXXII. 12). AFTER THE TIME OF JOSIAH WE FIND NO FURTHER MENTION OF THESE JEHOSCHAH HIGH PLACES.

F. W. F.

In treating of the office of high-priest among the Israelites it will be convenient to consider it—

1. LEGALLY. 2. THEOCRATICALLY. 3. HISTORICALLY.

The legal view of the high-priest's office comprises all that the law of Moses ordained respecting it. The first distinct separation of Aaron to the office of the priesthood, which previously belonged to the firstborn, was that recorded Ex. xxviii. A partial anticipation of this call occurred at the gathering of the seventy (ch. xvi.), when Moses bid Aaron take a pot of manna, and lay it up before the Lord: which implied that the ark of the testimony would thenceforth lie under Aaron's charge, though it was not at that time in existence. The taking up of Nadab and Abihu with their father Aaron to the Mount, where they beheld the glory of the God of Israel, seems also to have been intended as a preparatory intimation of Aaron's hereditary priesthood. See also xxviii. 21. But it was not till the completion of the directions for making the tabernacle and its furniture that the distinct order was given to Moses, "Take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's sons" (Ex. xxviii. 1). And after the order for the priestly garments to be made "for Aaron and his sons," it is added, "and the priest's office shall be theirs for a perpetual statute: and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons, and "I will sanctify both Aaron and his sons to minister to me in the priest's office," xxxix. 9, 14.

We find from the very first the following characteristic attributes of Aaron and the high-priests his successors, as distinguished from the other priests.

(1.) Aaron alone was anointed. "He poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head, and anointed him to sanctify him" (Lev. viii. 12); whence one of the distinctive epithets of the high-priest was מִבְּיָהוּ מִבְּיָהוּ מִבְּיָהוּ, "the anointed priest" (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16, xxi. 10; see Num. xxv. 22). This also appears from Ex. xxix. 29, 30, where it is ordered that the one of the sons of Aaron who succeeds him in the priest's office shall wear the holy garments that were Aaron's for seven days, to be anointed therein, and to be consecrated in them. Hence Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi. 6; Dion. Euseb. viii.) understands the Anointed (A. V. "Messiah," or, as the LXX. read, υἱὸς Μωυσέου) in Dan. ix. 26, the anointing of the Jewish high-priests: "IT MEANeth nothing else than the succession of high-priests, whom the Scripture commonly calls υἱὸς Μωυσέου, anointed," and so too Tertullian and Theodoret (Rosenn. ad 1. c.). The anointing of the sons of Aaron: i.e., the common priests, seems to have been confined to sprinkling their garments with the anointing oil (Ex. xxix. 21, xxviii. 41, &c.), though according to Kalisch on Ex. xxix. 8, and Lightfoot, following the Rabbinical interpretation, the difference consists in the abundant pouring of oil (בָּיָהוּ) on the head of the high-priest, from whence it was drawn with the finger into two streams, in the shape of a Grecian X, while the priests were merely marked with the finger dipped in oil on the forehead (πεταλις). But this is probably a late invention of the Rabbins. The anointing of the high-priest is alluded to in Ps. cxxxiii. 2: "It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments." The composition of this anointing oil, consisting of myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, cassia, and olive oil, is prescribed Ex. xxv. 22-25, and its use for any other purpose but that of anointing the priests, the tabernacle, and the vessels, was strictly prohibited on pain of being "cut off from his people." The manufacture of it was intrusted to certain priests, called apothecaries (Neh. iii. 8). But this oil is said to have been wanting under the second Temple (Yrideux, i. 131; Selden, cap. ix.).

(2.) The high-priest had a peculiar dress, which we have seen passed to his successor at his death. This dress consisted of eight parts, as the Rabbins constantly note, the breastplate, the ephod with its curious girdle, the robe of the ephod, the miter, the headdress coat or diapher tunic, and the girdle, the materials being gold, blue, red, crimson, and fine (white) linen (Ex. xxviii. 3). To the above are added, in ver. 42, the breeches or drawers (Lev. xvi. 4) of linen; and to make up the number 8, some reckon the high-priest's miter, or the plate separately from the benem; while others reckon the curious girdle of the ephod separately from the ephod. Of these 8 articles of attire, 4, namely, the coat or tunic, the girdle, the breeches, and the benem or a In Lev. viii. 12 there is a complete account of the putting on of these garments by Aaron, and the whole ceremony of his consecration and that of his sons. It there appears distinctly that, besides the girdle common to all the priests, the high-priest also wore the curious girdle of the ephod.

b Josephus, however, whom Rühr follows, calls the turban, ἠρωμένον, instead of the mitre, Ἀριστήρ, belonged to the common priests.

It is well known how, in the Assyrian sculpture, the king is in like manner distinguished by the shape of his head-dress; and how in Persia none but the king wore the cidaris or erect tiara. Taking the articles of the high-priest's dress in the order in which they are enumerated above, we have (c) the breastplate, or, as it is further named (Ex. xxviii. 19, 29, 30), the breastplate of judgment, λαγγείον τῶν κρίσεων (or τίς κρίσεως) in the LXX., and only in ver. 4, περιτήμων. It was, like the inner curtains of the tabernacle, the veil, and the ephod, of "cunning work," ἐξ ἀρμόσεως, "opus plattarum," and "arte plattaria," Vulg. [See Emendation.]

The breastplate was originally 8 spans long, and 1 span broad, but when doubled it was square, the shape in which it was worn. It was fastened at the top by rings and chains of wreathen gold to the two cupyx stones on the shoulders, and beneath with two other rings and a lace of blue to two corresponding rings in the ephod, to keep it fixed in its place, above the curious girdle. But the most remarkable and most important parts of this breastplate, were the 12 precious stones, set in 4 rows, 3 in a row, thus corresponding to the 12 tribes, and divided in the same manner as their camps were; each stone having the name of one of the children of Israel engraved upon it. Whether the order followed the ages of the sons of Israel, or, as seems most probable, the order of the encampment, may be doubted; but unless any appropriate distinct symbolism of the different tribes be found in the names of the precious stones, the question can scarcely be decided. According to the LXX. and Josephus, and in accordance with the language of Scripture, it was these stones which constituted the Urim and Thummim, nor does the notion advanced by Gesenius after Spencer and others, that these names designated two little images placed between the folds of the breastplate, seem to rest on any sufficient ground, in spite of the Egyptian analogy of brought to bear upon it. Josephus's opinion, on the other hand, improved upon the Rabbins, as to the manner in which the stones gave out the oracular answer, by preternatural illumination, appears equally destitute of probability. It seems to be far simplest and most in agreement with the different accounts of inquiries made by Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. iv. 3, 18, xxi. 2, 4, 9, 11, 12, xviii. 6; Judg. xx. 28; 2 Sam. v. 23, &c.), to suppose that the answer was given simply by the Word of the Lord to the high-priest (comp. John xi. 51), when he had inquired of the Lord clothed with the ephod and breastplate. Such a view agrees with the true notion of the breastplate, of which it was not the leading characteristic to be oracular (as the term λαγγείον supposes, and as is by many thought to be intimated by the descriptive addition "of judgment," i. e., as they

c Rühl compares also the spices of the flamen Dialis.

For an account of the image of Thmeni worn by the Egyptian judge and priest, see Kalsch's note of Ex. xxviii.: Hengstenberg's Egypt and the Books of Moses; Wilkinson's Egyptians, ii. 27, &c.
will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires, and I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones, ver. 11, 12; comp. also ver. 14 and 17 (Heb.). It is obvious to add how entirely this view accords with the blessing of Levi in Dent. xxxiii. 8, where Levi is called God's holy one, and God's Thummim and Urim are said to be given to him, because he came out of the trial so clear in his integrity. (See also Bar. v. 2.)

(b.) The Ephod (אֵפַּדָּה). This consisted of two parts, of which one covered the back, and the other the front, i.e., the breast and upper part of the body, like the έμάκρυς of the Greeks (see Dict. of Antiquities, art. Tunic, p. 1172). These were clasped together on the shoulder with two large onyx stones, each having engraved on it 6 of the names of the tribes of Israel. It was further united by a "curious girdle" of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen round the waist. Upon it was placed the breastplate of judgment, which in fact was a part of the ephod, and included in the term in such passages as 1 Sam. ii. 28, xv. 3, xxiii. 9, and was fastened to it just above the curious girdle of the ephod. Linen ephods were also worn by other priests (1 Sam. xxii. 18), by Samuel, who was the first Levite (1 Sam. ii. 18), and by David when bringing up the ark (2 Sam. vi. 14). The expression for wearing an ephod is "girded with a linen ephod." The ephod was also frequently used in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites. See Judg. viii. 27, xviii. 5, &c. (Ephod; Girdle.)

(c.) The Robe of the ephod (אֵפַּדָּה). This was of inferior material to the ephod itself, being all of blue (Ex. xxviii. 31), which implied its being only of "woven work" (אֵפַּדָּה וְאֶפֶלֵדָה, xxxix. 22). It was worn immediately under the ephod, and was longer than it, though not so long as the brodered coat or tunic (אֵפַּדָּה וְאֶפֶלֵדָה), according to some statements (Bähr, Winer, Kalisch, &c.).

The Greek rendering, however, of אֵפַּדָּה וְאֶפֶלֵדָה, ἀνείφης, and Josephus's description of it (B. J. v. 5, § 7) seem to outweigh the reasons given by Bähr for thinking the robe only came down to the knees, and to make it improbable that the tunic should have been seen below the robe. It seems likely therefore that the sleeves of the tunic, of white diaper linen, were the only parts of it which were visible, in the case of the high-priest, when he wore the blue robe over it. For the blue robe had no sleeves, but only sids in the sides for the arms to come through. It had a hole for the head to pass through, with a border round it of woven work, to prevent its being rent. The skirt of this robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high-priest went in and came out of the Holy Place. Josephus in the Antiquities gives no explanation of the use of the bells, but merely speaks of the studied beauty of their appearance. In his Jewish War, however, he tells us that the bells signified thunder, and the pomegranates lightning. For Philo's very curious observations see Lightfoot's Works, i. p. 27.

Neither does the son of Sirach very distinctly explain it (Eccles. xlvi), who in his description of the high-priest’s attire seems chiefly impressed with its beauty and magnificence, and says of this trimming, “He compassed him with pomegranates and with many golden bells round about, that as he went there might be a sound, and a noise made that might he heard in the temple, for a memorial to the children of his people.” Perhaps, however, he means to intimate that the use of the bells was to give notice to the people outside, when the high-priest went in and came out of the sanctuary, as Whiston, Vatahlius, and many others have supposed.

(4.) The fourth article peculiar to the high-priest is the mitre or upper turban, with its gold plate, engraved with HOLINESS TO THE LORD, fastened to it by a ribbon of blue. Josephus applies the term Λευκώσας (μακροευθυγόνως) to the turbans of the common priests as well, but says that in addition to this, and sewn on to the top of it, the high-priest had another turban of blue: that beside this he had outside the turban a triple crown of gold, consisting, that is, of 3 rings one above the other, and termed a pteron, or top in a kind of conical calyx, like the inverted calyx of the herb hyssopus. Josephus doubtless gives a true account of the high-priest’s turban as worn in his day. It may be fairly conjectured that the crown was appended when the Asmonaean united the temporal monarchy with the priesthood, and that this was continued, though in a modified shape,2 after the sovereignty was taken from them. Josephus also describes the πέταλος, the hvosima or gold plate, which he says covered the forehead of the high-priest. In Ant. vii. 3, § 8, he says that the identical gold plate made in the days of Moses existed in his time; and Whiston adds in a note that it was still preserved in the time of Origen, and that the inscription on it was engraved in Samaritan characters (Ant. iii. 3, § 6). It is certain that R. Eliezer, who flourished in Hasidim’s reign, saw it at Rome. It was double- tioned, with other spoils of the Temple, in the Temple of Peace, which was burnt down in the reign of Commodus. These spoils, however, are expressly mentioned as part of Abiezer’s plunder when he took Rome. They were carried by Genseric into Africa, and brought by Felixarius to Byzantium, where they adorned his triumph. On the warning of a Jew the emperor ordered them back to Jerusalem, but what became of them is not known (Rabbin. de Sylilis Temp.);

(c.) The brodered coat, Βαλινσίδαι Κοραλικά, was a tunic or long shirt of linen with a tessellated or diaper pattern, like the setting of a stone. The girdle, Στεργόσα, also of linen, was wound round the body several times from the breast downwards, and the ends hung down to the ankles. The breeches or drawers, Στεργόσα, of linen, covered the loins and thighs: and the bonnet or Στεργόσα was a turban of linen, partially covering the head, but not in the form of a cone like that of the high-priest when the mitre was added to it. These four last were common to all priests; Josephus speaks of the robes (ούρλοισις) of the chief priests, and the tunics and girdles of the priests, as forming part of the spoil of the Temple, (R. J. vi. 8, § 3).

and at his death Eleazar (Num. xx. 26, 28), and their successors in the high-priesthood, were solemnly inaugurated into their office by being clad in these eight articles of dress on seven successive days. From the time of the second Temple, when the sacred oil (said to have been hid by Josiah, and lost) was wanted, this putting on of the garments was deemed the official investiture of the office. Hence the robes, which had to be kept in one of the chambers of the Temple, and were by Hyrcanus deposited in the Baris, which he built on purpose, were kept by Herod in the same tower, which he called Antonia, so that they might be at his absolute disposal. The Romans did the same till the government of Vitellius in the reign of Tiberius, when the custody of the robes was restored to the Jews. (Ant. xx. 11, § 4; xviii. 4, § 2).

(5.) Aaron had peculiar functions. To him alone it appertained, and he alone was permitted, to enter the Holy of Holies, where he stood once a year, on the great day of atonement, when he sprinkled the blood of the sin-offering on the mercy-seat, and burnt incense within the veil (Lev. xvi.). He is said by the Talmudists, with whom agree Lightfoot, Selden, Grotonis, Winer, Ithier, and many others, not to have worn his full pontifical roles on this occasion, but to have been clad entirely in white linen (Lev. xvi. 4, 32). It is singular, however, that on the other hand Josephus says that the great fast day was the chief, if not the only day in the year, when the high-priest wore all his robes (R. J. v. 5, § 7), and in spite of the alleged impropriety of his wearing his splendid apparel on a day of humiliation, it seems far more probable that on the one occasion when he performed functions peculiar to the high-priest, he should have worn his full dress. Josephus too could not have been mistaken as to the fact, which he repeats (cont. Ap. lib. ii. § 7), where he says the high-priests alone might enter into the Holy of Holies, “proprīa stoli circumambicilti.” For although Selden, who strenuously supports the rabbinical statement that the high-priest only wore the 4 linen garments when he entered the Holy of Holies, endeavors to prove that this was one and the same thing, it is not possible to twist his words into this meaning. It is true on the other hand, that Lev. xvi. distinctly prescribes that Aaron should wear the 4 priestly garments of linen when he entered into the Holy of Holies, and put them off immediately he came out, and leave them in the Temple: no one being present in the Temple while Aaron made the atonement (ver. 17). Either therefore in the time of Josephus this law was not kept in practice, or else we must reconcile the apparent contradiction by supposing that in consequence of the great jealousy with which the high-priest’s roles were kept by the civil power at this time, the custom had arisen for him to wear them, not even always on the 3 great festivals (Ant. xviii. 4, § 3), but only on the great day of expiation. If in this gorgeous attire he would enter the Temple in presence of all the people, and after having performed in secret, as the law requires, the rites of expiation in the linen dress, he would resume his pontifical roles and so appear again in public. Thus his wearing the roles would easily come to be identified chiefly with the day of atonement; and this is perhaps the most probable ex-

1 Josephus (i. J. xx. 10) says that Pompey would not allow him to wear the diadem, when he restored him to the high-priesthood.

2 Selden himself remarks (cap. viii. in fin.) that Josephus and others always describe the pontificial roles by the name of Τοίαν ὑφαίνεσθαι.
There is a controversy as to whether the deputy high-priest was the same as the sagan. Lightfoot thinks not.
set, both from the Jewish and Christian point of view. [See end of the article.]

III. T: pass to the historical view of the subject.

The history of the high-priests embraces a period of about 1470 years, according to the opinion of the present writer, and a succession of about 80 high-priests, beginning with Aaron, and ending with Phinehas. The number of all the high-priests (says Josephus, Ant. xx. 110) from Aaron . . . until Phinehas . . . was 83," where he gives a comprehensive account of them. They naturally arrange themselves into three groups: (a) those before David; (b) those from David to the Captivity; (c) those from the return from the Babylonian Captivity till the cessation of the office at the destruction of Jerusalem. The two former have come down to us in the canonical books of Scripture, and so have a few of the earliest and the latest of the latter; but for by far the larger portion of the latter group we have only the authority of Josephus, the Talmud, and some other profane writers.

(a.) The high-priests of the first group who are distinctively made known to us, such as: (1) Aaron; (2) Eleazar; (3) Phinehas; (4) Eli; (5) Abiathub (1 Chr. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11; 1 Sam. xiv. 3); (6) Abiathar (1 Sam. v. 21; vi. 3; xi. 14, 18; xv. 24, 25; 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; Ps. lxxviii. 60). This strong influence and interference of the secular power is manifest throughout the subsequent history. This first period was also marked by the calamity which Hell Pel the high-priests as the guardians of the ark, in its capture by the Philistines. This probably suspended all inquiries by Urim and Thummim, which were made before the ark (1 Chr. xiii. 3; comp. Judg. xx. 27; 1 Sam. vii. 2; xiv. 18), and must have greatly diminished the influence of the high-priests, on whom the largest share of the humiliation of the name involved would naturally fall. The rise of Samuel as a prophet at this very time, and his paramount influence and importance in the state, to the entire eclipsing of Abiah the priest, coincides remarkably with the absence of the ark, and the means of inquiring by Urim and Thummim.

(b.) Passing to the second group, we begin with the unexplained circumstance of there being two high-priests in the reign of David, apparently of nearly equal authority, namely, Zadok and Abiaheath (1 Chr. xv. 11; 2 Sam. viii. 17). Indeed, it is only from the deposition of Abiaheath, and the placing of Zadok in his room, by Solomon (1 K. ii. 32), that we learn certainly that Abiaheath was the high-priest, and Zadok the second. Zadok was son of Abiathub, of the line of Eleazar (1 Chr. vi. 8), and the first mention of him is in 1 Chr. vii. 28, as "the Levite" who joined David in Hebron after Saul's death, with 22 captains of his father's house. It is therefore not unlikely that after the death of Abiaheath and the succession of Abiaheath to David, Saul may have made Zadok priest, as far as it was possible for him to do so in the absence of the ark and the high-priest's robes, and that David may have avoided the difficulty of deciding between the claims of his faithful friend Abiaheath, and his new and important ally Zadok (who perhaps was the means of attaching to David's cause the 4000 Levites and the 3700 priests who came under Jehoiada their captain, vv. 26, 27), by appointing them to a joint priesthood: the first place, with the Ephod, and Urim and Thummim, commingled with Abiaheath, who was in actual possession of them. A certain it is that from this time Zadok and Abiathur are constantly named together, and singularly Zadok always first, both in the book of Samuel and that of Kings. We can, however, trace very clearly up to a certain point the division of the priestly offices and dignities between them, coinciding, as it did, with the divided state of the Levitical worship in David's time. For we learn from 1 Chr. vi. 1-7, 37, compared with 29, 46 and yet more distinctly from 2 Chr. i. 3, 4, 5, that the tabernacle and the brazen altar made by Moses and B.C. deked in the wilderness were at this time at Gib- ene, where the ark was at Jerusalem, in the separate manner (as K. vii. 4. 11. and David [2 Sam. xvi. 14; x. 94]. Now Zadok the priest and his brethren the priests were left "before the tabernacle at Gibeon" to offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord morning and evening, and to do according to all that is written in the law of the Lord (1 Chr. xvi. 39, 40). It is therefore obvious to conclude that Abiathar had special charge of the ark and the services connected with it, which agrees exactly with the possession of the ark by Abiathar, and his previous position with David before the priesthood of Isaiiah; as well as with what we are told 1 Chr. xxvii. 34, that Jehoiada and Abiathar were the king's counsellors next to Ahitophel. Residence at Jerusalem with the ark, and the privilege of inquiring of the Lord before the ark, both well suit his office of counselor. Abiathar, however, forfeited his place by taking part with Adonijah against Solomon, and Zadok was made high-priest in his place. The priesthood was thus again consolidated and transferred permanently from the line of Ithamar to that of Eleazar. This is the only instance recorded of the deposition of a high-priest (which became common in later times, especially under Herod and the Romans) during this second period. It was the fulfillment of the prophetical depositions of the sin of Elie's sons (1 Sam. ii. 11.).

The first considerable difficulty that meets in the historical survey of the high-priests of the second group is to ascertain who was high-priest at the dedication of Solomon's Temple - Josephus (Ant. x. 8, § 6) asserts that Zadok was, and that Shemaiah makes him the high-priest in the reign of Solomon. But first it is very improbable that Zadok, who must have been very old at Solomon's accession (being David's contemporary), should have lived to the 11th year of his reign; and next, 1 K. iv. 2 distinctly asserts that Azariah the son of Zadok was priest under Solomon, and 1 Chr. vi. 10 tells us of Azariah, "he it is that executed the priest's office in the Temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem," obviously meaning at its first completion. We can hardly therefore be wrong in saying that Azariah the son of Ahimeaz was the first high-priest of Solomon's Temple. The nonmention of him in the account of the dedication of the Temple, even where one would most have expected it (1 K. vi. 18, 3, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12; 2 Chr. v. 7, 11, x. 16), and the prominence given to Solomon - the civil power - are certainly remarkable. Compare also 2 Chr. viii. 14, 15. The probable inference is that Azariah had no great personal qualities or energy. In constructing the list of the succession of priests of this group, our method must be to compare the genealogical list in 1 Chr. vi. 8-15 (A. V.) with the notices of high-priests in the sacred history, and with the list given by Josephus, who, it must be remembered, had access to the lists preserved in the archives at Jerusalem: testing the whole by the application of the ordinary rules of genealogical succession. Now as regards the genealogy, it is seen at once that there is something defective; for whereas from David to Jeconiah there are 20 kings, from Zadok to Jehozadak there are but 13 priests. Moreover the passage in ques-

from the dynasty of David and from the worship at Jerusalem, and the setting up of a theocratic priesthood at Dan and Beer-sheba (1 K. xii. 31; 2 Chr. xiii. 9, xii.). (4.) The overthrow of the hyphen, the dynasty of Ahaz, by Jehoada, the high-priest, whose near relationship to king Josiah, added to his zeal against the idolatries of the house of Ahaz, stimulated him to head the revolution with the force of priests and Levites at his command. (5.) The boldness and success with which the high-priest Azariah withstood the encroachments of the king Uzziah upon the office and functions of the priesthood. (6.) The disregard of the temple by the high-priest, in the reign of Josiah, the restoration of the temple services by Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah, and the discovery of the book of the law, and the religious reformation by Hilkiah in the reign of Josiah. [Hilkiah.] (7.) In all these great religious movements, however, excepting the one headed by Jehoada, it is remarkable how the civil power took the lead. It was David who arranged all the temple service. Solomon who directed the building and dedication of the temple, the high-priest being not so much as named; Jehoshaphat who sent the priests about to teach the people, and assigned to the high-priest Amariah his share in the work; Hezekiah who headed the reformation, and urged on Azariah and the priests and Levites; Josiah who encouraged the priests in the service of the house of the Lord. On the other hand we read of no opposition to the idolatries of Manasseh by the high-priest, and we know how shamefully subservient Uriah the high-priest was to king Ahaz, actually building an altar according to the pattern of one at Danannas, to displace the brazen altar, and joining the king in his profane worship before it (2 K. xvi. 10-16). The preponderance of the civil over the ecclesiastical power, as an historical fact, in the kingdom of Judah, although kept within bounds by the hereditary succession of the high-priests, seems to be proved from these circumstances.

The priests of this series ended with Seraiah, who was taken prisoner by Nebuzar-adan, and slain at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar, together with Zephaniah the second priest or scribe, after the burning of the temple and the plunder of all the sacred vessels (2 K. xxv. 18). His son Jehozachak or Josebach was at the same time carried captive (1 Chr. vi. 15).

The time occupied by these (say) eighteen high-priests who ministered at Jerusalem, was about 454 years, which gives an average of something more than twenty-five years to each high-priest. It is remarkable that not a single instance is recorded after the time of David of an inquiry by Uri and Thummim as a means of inquiring of the Lord. The ministry of the prophets seems to have superseded that of the high-priests (see c. g. 2 Chr. xv., xviii., xx. 14, 15; 2 K. xix. 1, 2, xxii. 12-14; Jer. xxxi. 2). Some think that Uri and Thummim ceased with the theocracy; others with the division of Israel into two kingdoms. Nebuchadnezzar seems to have expected the restoration of it (Neh. vii. 65), and so perhaps did Judas Maccabeus, 1 Macc. iv. 46; comp. xiv. 41, while Josephus affirms that it had been possessed of the Jews from the last year before the destruction, namely, by John Hyrcanus (Whiston, Note on Ant. iii. 8, and Prud. Connect. i. 130, 151). It seems therefore scarcely true to reckon Uri and Thummim as one of the marks of God's presence with Solomon's Temple, which was wanting to the second Temple (Prid. i. 138, 144 ff.); this early cessation of answers by Uri and Thummim, therefore, and the high-priests of the time the bringing of the last stock enclosed in force during so many centuries, seems to confirm the notion that such answers were not the fundamental, but only the necessary uses of the breastplate of judgment.

(c) An interval of about fifty two years elapsed between the high-priests of the second and third group, during which there was neither temple, nor altar, nor ark, nor priest. Jehozachak, or Josebach, as it is written in Haggai (1 K. iv. 14, xvi.), who should have succeeded Seraiah, lived and died a captive at Babylon. The pontifical office revived in his son Jeshua, of whom such frequent mention is made in Ezra and Nehemiah, Haggai, and Zechariah, 1 Esdr. and Eccles.; and he therefore stands at the head of this third and last series, honorably distinguished for his zealous co-operation with Zerubbabel in rebuilding the temple; and restoring the disestablished commonwealth of Israel. His successors, as far as the O. T. guides us, were Jeshakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Johanan (or Jonathan), and Jaddua. Of these we find Eliashib hindering rather than seconding the zeal of the devout Tishthatha Nehemiah for the observance of God's law in Israel (Neh. xiii. 4, 7); and Johanan, Josephus tells us, murdered his own brother Jesus or Jeshua in the Temple, which led to its further profanation by Bagoes, the general of Artaxerxes Mætanes' army. Jeshua was high-priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Concerning him Josephus relates the story that he went out to meet Alexander at Sapha (probably the ancient Mizpeh) at the head of a procession of priests; and that when Alexander saw the multitude clothed in white, and the priests in their linen garments, and the high-priest in blue and gold, with the mitre on his head, and the gold plate, on which was the name of God, he stepped forward alone and adored the Name, and hastened to enhance the high-priest (Ant. xii. 8, § 5). Josephus adds among other things that the king entered Jerusalem with the high-priest, and went up to the Temple to worship and offer sacrifice; that he was shown the prophecies of Daniel concerning himself, and at the high-priest's intercession granted the Jews liberty to live according to their own laws, and freedom for fifty years. The story, however, has not obtained credit. It was the brother of this Jeshua, Manasseh, who, according to the same authority, was at the request of Sandalkat made the first high-priest of the Samaritan temple by Alexander the Great.

Jeshua was succeeded by Onias I., his son, and he again by Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue, as the Jews whom is usually ascribed the completion of the Canon of the O. T. (Prideaux, Conn. i. 545). Of him Jesus, the son of Sirach, speaks in terms of most glowing eulogy in Eccles. i., and ascribing to him the repair and fortification of the Temple, with other works. The passage (1-21) contains an interesting account of the ministries of the high-priest. Upon Simon's death, his son and successor under same Eleazar, Simon's brother, succeeded him. The high-priesthood of Eleazar is memorable as being that under which the LXX. version of the Scriptures was made at Alexandria for Ptolemy Philadelphus, according to the account of Josephus taken from Aristea (Ant. xii. 2). HIGH-PRIEST

At the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, valuable as it was with reference to the wider interests of religion, and marked as was the Providence which gave it to the world at this time as a preparation for the approaching advent of Christ, yet viewed in its relation to Judaism and the high-priesthood, was a sign, and perhaps a helping cause of their decay. It marked a growing tendency to Hellenize, utterly inconsistent with the spirit of the Mosaic economy. Accordingly in the high-priesthood of Eleazar's rival nephews, Jesus and Onias, we find their very names changed into the Greek ones of Jason and Menelaus, and with the introduction of this new feature of rival high-priests we find one of them, Menelaus, strengthening himself and seeking support from the Syro-Greek kings against the Jewish party, by offering to forsake their national laws and customs, and to adopt those of the Greeks. The building of a gymnasium at Jerusalem for the use of these apostate Jews, and their endeavor to conceal their circumcision when stripped for the games (1 Macc. i. 14, 15; 2 Macc. iv. 12-13; Jos. Ant. xii. 5, § 1), show the length to which this spirit was carried. The acceptance of the spurious priesthood of the temple of Onias from Ptolemy Philometor by Onias (the son of Onias the high-priest), who would have been the legitimate high-priest on the death of Menelaus, his uncle, is another striking indication of the same degeneracy. By this flight of Onias into Egypt the succession of high-priests in the family of Jozadak ceased; for although the Syro-Greek kings had introduced much uncertainty into the succession, by depositing at their will obnoxious persons, and appointing whom they pleased, yet the dignity had never gone out of the one family, Alexinus, whose Hebrew name was Jaxim (1 Chr. xxiv. 12), or perhaps Jacbin (1 Chr. ix. 10, xxiv. 17), or, according to Rufinus (ap. Selden), Joachim, and who was made high-priest by Antiochus Eupator on Menelaus being put to death by him, was the first who was of a different family. One, says Josephus, that "was indeed of the stock of Aaron, but not of this family" of Jozadak.

What, however, for a time saved the Jewish institutions from the new life and consistency into the priesthood and the national religion, and enabled them to fulfill their destined course till the advent of Christ, was the cruel and impolitic persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. This thoroughly aroused the piety and national spirit of the Jews, and drew together in defense of their temple and country all who feared God and were attached to their national institutions. The result was that after the high-priesthood had been brought to the lowest degradation by the apostasy and crimes of the last Onias or Menelaus, and after a vacancy of seven years had followed the brief pontificate of Alexinus, his no less infamous successor, a new and glorious succession of high-priests arose in the Asmonean family, which united the dignity of civil rulers, and for a time of independent sovereigns, to that of the high-priesthood. Josephus, who is followed by Lightfoot, Selden, and others, calls Judas, the first of this series, "the high-priest of Judah" (Ant. xii. 10, § 6; but, according to the far better authority of 1 Macc. x. 20, it was not till after the death of Judas Maccabaeus that Alexi-and instructed him how to act on the occasion. This shock-}

This shocking impetu, which to them was a subject of most poignant and awful grief, drew tears from the other priests, who beheld from a distance their law turned into ridicule, and groaned over the subversion of the sacred honors" (B. J. iv. 3 § 8).

Thus ignominiously ended the series of high-priests which had stretched in a scarcely broken line, through nearly fourteen, or, according to the common chronology, sixteen centuries. The Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Greek, and Roman empires, which the Jewish high-priests had seen in turn overshadowing the world, had each, except the last, one by one withered away and died—and now the last successor of Aaron was stripped of his sacerdotal robes, and the temple which he served laid level with the ground to rise no more. But this did not happen till the true High-priest and King of Israel, the minister of the sanctuary and of the true Tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man, had offered His one sacrifice, once for all, and had taken His place at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, bearing on His breast the judgment of His redeemed people, and continuing a Priest forever, in the Sanctuary which shall never be taken down!

The subjoined table shows the succession of high-priests, as far as it can be ascertained, and of the contemporary civil rulers.

Ἐξαλία.] High-priest in the reign of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 4 f.; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9 f.; 1 Esdr. i. 8). According to the genealogy in 1 Chr. vi. 13 (A. V.) he was son of Shallum, and from Ezr. vii. 1, apparently the ancestor of Ezra the scribe. His high-priesthood was rendered particularly illustrious by the great reformation effected under it by king Josiah, by the solemn Passover kept at Jerusalem in the 18th year of that king's reign, and above all by the discovery which he made of the book of the law in the Temple. With regard to the latter, Kennicott (Heb. Text. ii. 299) is of opinion that it was the original autograph copy of the Pentateuch written by Moses which Hilkiah found. He argues from the peculiar form of expression in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 14, מִּלְכִּיָּה, the book of the law of Jehovah by the hand of Moses: whereas in the fourteenth other places in the O. T. where the law of Moses or the book of Moses are mentioned, it is either "the book of Moses," or "the law of Moses," or "the book of the law of Moses." But the argument is far from conclusive, because the phrase in question may quite as properly signify "the book of the law of the Lord given through Moses." Compare the expression τὸν ἑαυτῷ μενιστρὸν (Gal. iii. 19), and מִלְכִּיָּה (Ex. ix. 33, xxxv. 29; Neh. x. 29; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6; Jer. 1. 1). Though, however, the copy cannot be proved to have been Moses' autograph from the words in question, it seems probable that it was, from the place where it was found, namely, in the Temple: and, from its not having been discovered before, but being only brought to light on the occasion of the repairs which were necessary, and from the discovering being the high-priest himself, it seems natural to conclude that the particular part of the Temple where it was found was one not usually frequented, or ever by any but the high-priest. Such a place exactly was the one where we know the original copy of the law was deposited by command of Moses, namely, by the side of the ark of the covenant within the vail, as we learn from Deut. xxxii. 9, 26. A difficult and interesting question arises. What was the book found by Hilkiah? Was it the whole Pentateuch, as Le Clerc, Keil, Ewald, etc., suppose, or the three middle books, as Bertheau, or the book of Deuteron- mony alone, as De Wette, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, etc.? Our means of answering this question seem to be limited, (1) to an examination of the terms in which the depositing of the book of the law by the ark was originally enjoined; (2) to an examination of the contents of the book discovered by Hilkiah, as far as they transpire; (3) to any indications which may be gathered from the contemporary writings of Jeremiah, or from any other portions of Scripture. As regards the first, a comparison of Deut. i. 5 with xxxii. 9: the consideration how exactly suited Deuteronomy is for the purpose of a public recital, as commanded Deut. xxxii. 10-13, whereas the passages of the whole of the law or portions of it are scarcely conceivable: and perhaps even the smaller bulk of a copy of Deuteronomy compared with that of the whole law, considered with reference to its place by the ark, point strongly to the conclusion that the book of the law " ordered to be put " in the side of the ark of the covenant " was the book of Deuteronomy alone, whether or no exactly in its present form is a further question. As regards the second, the 28th and 29th chapters of Deut. seem to be those especially referred to in 2 K. xiii. 16, 17, and 2 K. xxiii. 2, 3 seem to point directly to Deut. xxxix. 1, in the mention of the covenant, and ver. 3 of the former to Deut. xxx. 2, in the expression with all their heart and all their soul. The words in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 3, "The Levites that taught all Israel," see also to refer to Deut. xxxiii. 10. All the actions of Josiah which followed the finding of the book found in the destruction of all idolatrous symbols, the putting away of wizards and workers with familiar spirits, and the keeping of the Passover, were such as would follow from hearing the 16th, 18th, and other chapters of Deuteronomy, while there is not one that points to any precept contained in the other books, and not in Deuter- onomy. If there is any exception to this statement it is to be found in the description of the Passover in ch. xxxix. The phrases, "on the fourteenth day of the first month," in ver. 1: "Sanctify yourself, and prepare your brethren, that they may do according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses," ver. 6: "The priests sprinkled the blood," ver. 11: and perhaps the allusion in ver. 12, may be thought to point to Lev. xxii. 5, or Num. ix. 3; to Lev. xxii. and Num. viii. 20-22; to Lev. i. 5; iii. 2, &c.; and to Lev. iii. 3-5, &c. respectively. But the allusions are not marked, and it must be remembered that the Levitical institutions existed in practice, and that the other books of Moses were certainly extant, though they were not kept by the side of the ark. As regards the third, it is well known how full the writings of Jeremiah are of direct references and of points of resemblance to the book of Deuteronomy. Now this is at once accounted for on the supposition of the text found by Hilkiah being that book, which would thus naturally be an object of special curiosity and study to the prophet, and as naturally influence his own writings. Moreover, in an undated prophecy of Jeremiah's (ch. xi. ?), which seems to have been occasioned by the finding of this covenant — for he introduces the mention of the words of this covenant " quite abruptly — he quotes word for word from Deut. xxvii. 26, answering Amen himself, as the people are there directed to do, with reference to the curse for disobedience (see ver. 3, 5); a very strong confirmation of the proceeding arguments which tend to prove that Deuter- onomy was the book found by Hilkiah. But again: in Josh. viii. we have the account of the first execution by Joshua and the Israelites of that which Moses had commanded relative to writing the law upon stones to be set upon Mount Ebal; and it is added, ver. 34, and afterwards he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law." In ver. 32 he had said "he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses." Now not only is it impossible to imagine that the whole Pentateuch was transcribed on these stones, but all the references which transpire are to the book of Deuteronomy. The altar of whole stones untouched by iron tool, the peace-offerings, the blessings and the cursings, as well as the act itself of writing the law on stones and setting them on Mount Ebal, and placing half the tribes on Mount Ebal, and the other half on Mount Gerizim, all belong to Deuteronomy. And therefore when it is added in ver. 35, "There was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel," we seem constrained to accept the words with the limitation to the Book of Deuteronomy, as that which alone was ordered by Moses to be thus publicly read. And this increases the probability that here too the expression is limited to the same book.

The only discordant evidence is that of the book of Nehemiah. In the 8th chapter of that book, and ix. 3, we have the public reading by Ezra of "the book of the law of Moses" to the whole congregation at the feast of Tabernacles, in evident obedience to Deut. xxi. 10-15. But it is quite certain, from Neh. viii. 14-17, that on the second day they read out of Leviticus, because the directions about dwelling in booths are found there only, in ch. xxii. Moreover in the prayer of the Levites which follows Neh. ix. 5, and which is apparently based upon the previous reading of the law, reference is freely made to all the books of Moses, and indeed to the later books also. It is, however, perhaps not an improbable inference that, Ezra having lately completed his edition of the Holy Scriptures, more was read on this occasion than was strictly enjoined by Deut. xxxi., and that therefore this transaction does not really weaken the foregoing evidence.

But no little surprise has been expressed by critics at the previous non-acquaintance with this book on the part of Hilkiah, Josiah, and the people generally, which their manner of receiving it plainly evidences; and some have argued from hence that the book of Moses is not of the same age as the reign of Josiah; in fact that Josiah and Hilkiah invented it, and pretended to have found a copy in the Temple in order to give sanction to the reformation which they had in hand. The following remarks are intended to point out the true inferences which be drawn from the narrative of this remarkable discovery in the books of Kings and Chronicles. The direction in Deut. xxxi. 10-13 for the public reading of the law at the feast of Tabernacles on each seventh year, or year of release, to the whole congregation, as the means of perpetuating the knowledge of the law, sufficiently shows that at that time a multiplication of copies and a multitude of readers was not contemplated. The same thing seems to be implied also in the direction given in Deut. xvii. 18, 19, concerning the copy of the law to be made, for the special use of the king, and in the direction from that in the keeping of the priests and Levites. And this paucity of copies and of readers is just what one would have expected in an age when the art of reading and writing was confined to the professional scribes, and the very few others who, like Moses had learnt the art in Egypt (Acts vii. 22).

The 'troubled times of the Judges were obviously more likely to obliterate than to promote the study of letters. And whatever of sacred learning may have taken place under such kings as David, Solomon, Jehoshaphat, Uziah, Jotham, and Hezekiah, yet on the other hand such reigns as that of Athaliah, the last years of Joash, that of Ahaz, and above all the long reign of Manasseh, with their idolatries and national calamities, must have been most unfavorable to the study of "the sacred letters." On the whole, in the days of Josiah's vigilance and ignorance had overlooked all the dykes erected to stay their progress. In spite of such occasional acts as the public reading of the law to the people, enjoined by Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 9), and such insulated evidences of the king's reading the law, as commanded by Moses, as the action recorded of Amanaziah affords (2 K. xiv. 6)—where by the way the reference is still to the book of Deuteronomy—and the yet more marked acquaintance with the law attributed to Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 5, 6) [GENEVIEVE], everything in Josiah's reign indicates a very low state of knowledge. There were indeed still professional scribes among the Levites (2 Chr. xxxiv. 13), and Shaphan was the king's scribe. But judging from the narrative, 2 K. xxii. 8, 10; 2 Chr. xxxiv., it seems probable that neither Hilkiah nor Josiah could read. The same may perhaps be said of Jeremiah, who was always attended by Baruch the scribe, who wrote down the words of Jeremiah from his mouth (Jer. xxxvii. 1, 4, 6, 8, 18, 28, 32 xlv., &c.). How then can we wonder that under such circumstances the knowledge of the law had fallen into desuetude? or fail to see in the incident of the startling discovery of the copy of it by Hilkiah one of those many instances of simple truthfulness which impress on the narrative such an unimpeachable stamp of authenticity, when it is read in the same guileless spirit in which it is written? In fact, the ignorance of the law of Moses which this history reveals is in most striking harmony with the prevalent idletiy disclosed by the previous history of Judah, especially since its connection with the house of Ahab, as well as with the low state of education which is apparent from so many incidental notices.

The story of Hilkiah's discovery throws no light whatever upon the mode in which other portions of the Scriptures were preserved, and therefore this is not the place to consider it. But Theism truly observes that the expression in 2 K. xxii. 8 clearly implies that the existence of the law of Moses was a thing well known to the Jews. It is interesting to notice the concurrence of the king with the high-priest in the restoration of the Temple, as well as the analogy of the circumstances with what took place at the reign of Joash, when Jehoichin was high-priest, as related 2 Chr. xxiv. (Bertheau, 2 k.), (Beza, &c.; Trudeaux, connect. i. 43, 315, Lewis, Orig. Heb. ii. viii. ch. 8, &c.) [CHEVALIER].

HILKIAH; one of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the law to the people. Doubtless a Levite, and probably a priest (Neh. viii. 4). He may be identified with the Hilkiah who came up in the expedition with Joshua and Zerubbabel (xii. 7), and whose descendant Hashabiah is commemorated as living in the days of Joiakim (xiv. 21).

6. HILKIAH; a priest, of Anathoth, father of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. I. 1).

7. HILKIAH, father of Gemariah, who was one of Zedekiah's envoys to Babylon (Jer. xxxix. 3).

HILLS. The structure and characteristics of the hills of Palestine will be most conveniently noticed in the general description of the features of the country. [PALESTINE.]. But it may not be unprofitable to call attention here to the various Hebrew terms for which the word "hill" has been employed in the Authorized Version.

1. Gilbeth, גלבע, from a root akin to גבע, which seems to have the force of curvature or humappiness. A word involving this idea is peculiarly applicable to the rounded hills of Palestine, and from it are derived, as has been pointed out under Gereab, the names of several places situated on hills. Our translators have been consistent in rendering gilbeth by "hill:" in four passages only qualifying it as "little hill," doubtless for the more complete antithesis to "mountain" (Ps. lxxv. 3, xviii. 3, xxv. 6, 4). But they have also employed the same English word for the very different term הור, הר, which has a much more extended sense than gilbeth, meaning a whole district rather than an individual eminence, and to which our word "mountain" answers with tolerable accuracy. This exchange is always undesirable, but it sometimes occurs so as to confuse the meaning of a passage where it is desirable that the topography should be unmistakable. For instance, in Ex. xxiv. 4, the "hill" is the same which is elsewhere in the same chapter (12, 13, 18, &c.) and book, consistently and accurately rendered "mount" and "mountain." In Num. xxxiv. 44, 45, the "hill" is the "mountain" of verse 40, as also in Deut. i. 41, 43, compared with 34, 44. In Josh. xv. 9, the allusion is to the Mount of Olives, correctly called "mountain" in the preceding verse; and so also in 2 Sam. xvi. 13. The country of the "hills," in Deut. i. 7; Josh. iv. 1, x. 49, xii. 16, is the elevated district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, which is correctly called "the mountain" in the earliest descriptions of Palestine (Num. xiii. 23), and in many subsequent passages.

The "holy hill" (Ps. iii. 4), the "hill of Jehovah" (xxiv. 3), the "hill of God" (lxv. 15), are nothing else than "Mount Zion." In 2 K. i. 9 and vi. 27, the use of the word "hill" obscures the illusion to Carmel, which in other passages of the 36th of the prophet (i.e. 1 K. xviii. 19; 2 E. iv. 25) has the term "mount" correctly attached to it. Other places in the historical books in which the same substitution weakens the force of the narrative, are as follows: Gen. vii. 19; Deut. viii. 7; Josh. xii. 8, xiii. 14; Judg. xvi. 3; 1 Sam. xiiii. 14: xxv. 20; xxvi. 13; 2 Sam. xiii. 34; 1 K. xx. 28, xxviii. 17, &c.

3. On one occasion the word מָלַא ד. מָלַא is rendered "hill," namely, 1 Sam. ix. 11, where it would be better to employ "ascent" or some similar term.

4. In the N. T. the word "hill" is employed to render the Greek word βουράς: but on one occasion it is used for ἔσορας, elsewhere "mountain," so as to obscure the connection between the two parts of the same narrative. The "hill" from which Jesus was coming down in Luke ix. 37, is the same as "the mountain" into which He had gone for His transfiguration the day before (comp. ver. 28). In Matt. xiv. 14, and Luke iv. 29, ἔσορας is also rendered "hill," but not with the inexactness just noticed. In Luke i. 39 [and 65] the "hill country" (בּוֹרַע) is the same "mountain of Judah" [sing. = collective] to which frequent reference is made in the O. T.

HIN. [MEASURES.]

HIND (חֵיתָן: אֶבֶן: כֶּבֶשׁ: כְּבֵשׁ), the female of the common stag or cervus elaphus. It is frequently noticed in the poetical parts of Scripture as emblematic of activity (Gen. xlix. 21; 2 Sam. xxii. 34; Ps. xviii. 33; Hab. iii. 19), gentleness (Prov. v. 19), feminine modesty (Cant. ii. 7, iii. 5), earnest longing (Ps. xlix. 1), and maternal affection (Jer. iv. 5). Its shyness and remissness from the haunts of men are also noticed (Job xxxix. 1), and its timidity, causing it to cast its young at the sound of thunder (Ps. xxix. 9). The conclusion which some have drawn from the passage last quoted that the hind produces her young with great difficulty, is not in reality deducible from the words, and is expressly contradicted by Job xxxix. 3. The LXX. reads ἡνίδα in Gen. xlix. 21, rendering it στάλαγμομένα, "a luxuriant terebinth:" Luke has proposed a similar change in Ps. xxix., but in neither ease can the emendation be accepted: Naphthali verified the comparison of himself to a "graceful or tall hind" by the events recorded in Judg. iv. 6-9, v. 18. The insertion of Ps. xxix., "the kind of the morning," probably refers to a tune of that name. [ALLELIOTH-SHAIKH].

HINGE. 1. הָנֵג, הָנֵג, הָנֵג, with the notion of turning (Gen. p. 1165). 2. הָנֵג, חֵיתָן, הָנֵג, כֶּבֶשׁ, with the notion of insertion (Gen. p. 1096). Both ancient Egyptian and modern Oriental doors were and are hung by means of pivots turning in sockets both on the upper and lower sides. In Syria, and especially the Hauran, there are many ancient doors consisting of stone slabs with pivots carved out of the same piece, inserted in slots above and below, and fixed during the building of the house. The allusion in Prov. xxvi. 14 is thus clearly explained. The hinges mentioned in 1 K. vii. 50 were probably of the Egyptian kind, attached to the upper and lower sides of the door (Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 177; Porter, Damascus, ii. 22, 192; Maundrell, Early Travels, pp. 447, 448 (Bohn); Shaw, Travels, p. 219; Lord Lindsay, Letters, p. 292; Wilkinson, Anc. HINNOM, VALLEY OF [more strictly Ra-VAIIXE] OF, otherwise called "the valley of the son or "children [sons] of Hinnom" (הָנֵג, הָנֵג, הָנֵג).
HINNOM, VALLEY OF

The name by which it is now known is (it ignorance of the meaning of the initial syllable) Wa‘id, Jehemmon, or Wady er Rechob (Williams, Holy City, i. 56, suppl.), though in Mohammedan traditions the name Gehenna is applied to the Valley of Kidron (Ibn Batutah, 12, 4; Stanley, ut sup.).

The valley commences in a broad sloping basin to the W. of the city, S. of the Jaffa road (extending nearly to the brow of the great Wady, on the W.), in the centre of which, 700 yards from the Jaffa gate, is the large reservoir, supposed to be the ‘upper pool,’ or ‘Gillon’ [Gittos] (Is. vii. 3, xxxii. 2; 2 Chr. xxxii. 30), now known as Birket es-Sultan. From this point the ravine narrows and deepens, and descends with great rapidity between broken cliffs, rising in successive terraces, honeycombed with innumerable sepulchral recesses, forming the northern face of the ‘Hill of Exile’ (Jer. vii. 31; 2 Chr. xxix. 10), Birket-es-Sultan. From this point the ravine narrows and deepens, and descends with much greater rapidity towards the ‘valley of Jehoshaphat,’ or ‘of the Brook Kidron,’ before joining which it opens out again, forming an oblong plot, the site of Tophet, devoted to gardens irrigated by the waters of Siloam. Towards the eastern extremity of the valley is the traditional site of ‘Aclethana,’ authenticated by a bed of white clay still worked by potters (Williams, Holy City, ii. 453), opposite to which, where the cliff is thirty or forty feet high, the tree on which the adored images was hanged himself was placed during the Frankish kingdom (Barclay, City of Great King, p. 208).

Not far from Aclethana is aconspicuously situated tomb with a Poric pediment, sometimes known as the ‘whited sepulchre,’ near which a large sepulchral recess with a Poric portal hewn in the native rock is known as the ‘L직함 apostle,’ where the Twelve are said to have concealed themselves during the time between the crucifixion and the resurrection. The tombs continue quite down to the corner of the mountain, where it bends off to the S. along the valley of Jehoshaphat. None of the sepulchral recesses in the vicinity of Jerusalem are so well preserved; most of them are very old [see infra]—small gloomy caves, with narrow, rock-hewn doorways.

Robinson places ‘the valley gate,’ [which had

of ferred of connected in and on the southern hill-side above the ravine are somewhat fully described in the Ordinance Survey of Jerusalem, pp. 67, 68 (1865). They are regarded as having been made or modified at a later period than those on the north side of the city. Many of them have an inscription or scattered letters, but nothing that can be well deciphered. Closer inspection shows some of these to be much more elaborate than those here mentioned supposed. "Close to the building of Acclama the rock is perforated by seven loculi, through one of which a chamber containing several more loculi is reached; and one of these again, on the right-hand side, gives access to a second chamber with loculi; from that there is an opening to a third, and thence down a flight of steps to a fourth and last one, all the chambers having loculi: most of them are filled with rubbish, and many have the appearance of leading to other chambers." Sketches were taken of some of the appurtenances of these tombs, which accompany the text of the work referred to. Tolver states the results of a special examination of these rock sepulchres in Himmon (Dritte Wanderung, p. 438 ff).

A very noticeable feature of this ravine is the precipitous wall of rocks which overhangs the gorge in its deepest part, on the left, as one goes westward and nearly opposite to Acclama on the height above. The rocks here are almost perpendicular, and are found to be at different points forty, thirty-six, thirty-three, thirty, and twenty feet high. A few trees still grow along the margin of the overhanging brow, and trees here must antedate have been still more numerous when the land was better cultivated. Aside from this peculiaritiy of the valley, regarded as one of its aspects, it has some additional interest from its having been connected with the death of Judas. It has been thought that he may have hung himself on the limb of a tree near the edge of one of these precipices, and that the rope or limb breaking, he fell to the bottom and was dashed to pieces. This latter result would have been the more certain, in the event of his having so fallen, on account of the sharp edges projecting from the sides of the cliff, as well as the rocky ground below. Dr. Robinson (Harmony of the Greek Gospels, § 151) supposes that some such relation as this may have existed between the traitor's "bursting asunder" and the suicide, though he does not assign the occurrence to any particular place. Tholuck (MS. Notes) is one of those who think of Himmon as the scene of the event. See on this point the Life of our Lord, by Andrews, p. 510 ff. (1867). We cannot indeed rely very much on such minute specifications, because so little being related, so little is really known respecting the manner of Judas's death. [JEDAS.]

It may not be useless to correct more distinctly a somewhat prevalent idea that the Valley of Himmon lies wholly on the south of Jerusalem. This name belongs also to the valley on the west of the city, though the latter is often called from the reservoirs there the Valley of Gihon. They are both parts of one and the same valley, which sweeps around the city on two sides. As a topographical description, the reader will find Robinson's concise account of this locality (Phys. Geogr., pp. 97-100) very distinct and accurate.

HIPPOPOTAMUS. There is hardly a doubt that the Hebrew behemoth (בְּהוֹמָה) describes the hippopotamus: the word itself bears the strongest resemblance to the Coptic name pe-hemout, "the water-ox," and at the same time expresses in its Hebrew form, as the plural of בְּהוֹמָה, the idea of a very large beast. Though now no longer found in the lower Nile, it was formerly common there (Wilkinson, i. 230). The association of it with the crocodile in the passage in which it is described (Job. xl. 15 ff.), and most of the particulars in that passage are more appropriate to the hippopotamus than to any other animal. Behemoth = extinct grass as an ox" (Job. xl. 15) — a circumstance which is noticed as peculiar in an animal of aquatic habits: this is strictly true of the hippopotamus, which leaves the water by night, and feeds on vegetables and green plants. Its strength is enormous, vv. 16, 18, and the notice of the power of the muscles of the belly, "his force is in the navel of his belly," appears to be strictly correct. The tail, however, is short, and it must be conceded that the first part of ver. 17, "he moveth his tail like a cedar," seems not altogether applicable. A mode of attack is with his mouth, which is armed with a formidable array of teeth, projecting incisors, and enormous curved canines; thus "his creator offers him a sword," for so the words in ver. 19 may be rendered. But the use of his sword is mainly for pacific purposes, "the beasts of the field playing about him as he feeds; the hippopotamus being a remarkably inoffensive animal. His retreat is among the lotuses (izclea; A. V. "shady trees") which are abundant about the Nile, and amid the reeds of the river. Thoroughly at home in the water, "if the river riseth, he doth not take to flight; and he cares not if a Jordan (here an appellative for a "stream") press on his mouth." Ordinary means of capture were ineffectual against the great strength of this animal. "Will any take him before his eyes?" (i. e. openly, and without cunning), "will any bore his nose with a gin?" as was usual with large fish. The method of killing it in Egypt was with a spear, the animal being in the first instance secured by a lasso, and repeatedly struck until it became exhausted (Wilkinson, i. 240); the very same method is pursued by the natives of South Africa at the present day (Livingstone, p. 73; instances of its great strength are noticed by the same writer, pp. 231, 232, 497).

a * That depends on the explanation. Dr. Conant marks on the passage: Like a cedar; namely, as a cedar is bent, which is not easily done. The allusion is to the strength and stiffness of the tail, the smallest and weakest of all the members of the animal's body (Book of Job, with a Revised Version, p. 139).

See also Hirah's Heb ekkitur, p. 249. There are several expressions in this celebrated description of the water-ox of the Nile which the present philology represents somewhat differently from the A. V. See the versions of Ewald, De Wette, Umbreit, Conant, Nos., and others.
Hiram, the friend (יִירָם) of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12; and see 20). For 'friend' the LXX. and Vulg. have 'shepherd,' probably reading מִשְׂמָה.

Hiram or Huram (רָמָא, or הָרָמָא) [noble born = הָרָמָא Ges.]: [Rom. Xvi. 23, exc. 2

Sam. v. 11, 1 Chr. xiv. 1, Xerxes: Vat. Alex. Xerxes: Hiram. See different forms of the name see Hiram]. 1. The King of Tyre who sent workmen and materials to Jerusalem, first (2 Sam. v. 11, 1 Chr. xiv. 1) to build a palace for David whom he ever loved (1 K. v. 1), and again (1 K. v. 10, vii. 13, 2 Chr. ii. 14, 16) to build the Temple for Solomon, under whom he had a treaty of peace and commerce (1 K. v. 11, 12). The contempt with which he received Solomon's present of Carat. (1 K. iv. 12) does not appear to have caused any breach between the two kings. He admitted Solomon's ships, issuing from Joppa, to a share in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean (1 K. x. 22); and Jewish sailors, under the guidance of Tyrians, were taught to bring the gold of India (1 K. ix. 26) to Solomon's two harbors on the Red Sea (see Ewald, Gesch. III. 345-347). 3. The Philistine historian, and Mercenier of Ephesians (op. Joseph. c. Ap. i. 17, 18) assign to Hiram a prosperous reign of 44 years; and relate that his father was Abial, his son and successor Balearz; that he re-still various idol-temples, and dedicated some splendid offerings; that he was successful in war; that he enlarged and fortified his city; that he and Solomon had a contest with riddles or dark sayings (compare Solomos and his friends, Judg. xiv. 12), in which Solomon, after winning a large sum of money from the king of Tyre, was eventually outwitted by Abdonos, one of his subjects. The intercourse of these great and kindred-minded kings was much celebrated by local historians. Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 8) states that the correspondence between them with respect to the building of the Temple was preserved among the Tyrian archives in his day. With the letters in this v. and 2 Chr. ii. may be compared not only his copies of the letters, but also the still less authentic letters between Solomon and Hiram, and between Solomon and Vaphres (Apries?), which are preserved by Eusebius (op. Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 39), and mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor (op. Eum. Alex. Str. ii. 21, p. 532). Some Phoenician historians (op. Tatian. cont. Grec. § 37) relate that Hiram, besides supplying timber for the Temple, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon. Jewish writers, in less ancient times cannot overlook Hiram's unceasing aid in his services towards the building of the Temple. Their legends relate (op. Euseb. Eccl. i. 858) that because he was a God-bearing man and built the Temple he was received alive into Paradise; but that, after he had been there a thousand years, he sinned by pride, and was thrust down into hell. 2. [Xerxes: Vat. Alex. Xerxes: Hiram] Hiram was the name of a man of mixed race (1 K. vii. 13, 40, 45), the principal architect and engineer sent by king Hiram to Solomon; also called Huram in the Chronicles. On the title of הָרָמָא = master, or father, given to him in 2 Chr. ii. 13 iv. 16, see Hiram, No. 3. W. T. B.

* At the distance of 11 hours on the hill-side east of Tyre, is a remarkable tomb known as Kadhar Hiraun, i.e. Tomb of Hiram. It stands all alone, apart alike from human habitation and ancient ruin—a solitary, venerable relic of remote antiquity. In fact it is one of the most singular monuments in the land. It is an immense sarcophagus of limestone hewn out of a single block—12 feet long, 8 wide, and 6 high.; covered by a lid slightly pyramidal, and 5 feet in thickness;—the whole resting on a massive pedestal, about 10 feet high, composed of three layers of large hewn stones, the upper layer projecting a few inches. The monument is perfect, though weather-beaten. The only entrance to it is an aperture broken through the eastern face of the tomb. A tradition, now received by all classes and sects in the surrounding country, makes this the tomb of Hiram, Solomon's friend and ally; and the tradition may have come down unbroken from the days of Tyre's grandeur. We have at least no just ground for rejecting it. Port: Handbook, ii. 359.)

The people there also connect Hiram's name with a cupola fountain over which a massive stone structure has been raised, which the traveller passes on his way down the partly burnt coming to the site of Tyre (see Tristram's Land of Israel, p. 55, 2d ed.). Such traditions, whether they cleave rightfully or not to these particular places, have their interest. They come down to us through Phoenician channels, and indirectly authenticate the history of Hiram as recorded by the Hebrew writers. H.

Hircanus (Ἱρκανός, [Hircam from Ἰρκανός, a province on the Caspian Sea; Hircanus, a son of Tobias), who had a large treasure placed for security in the treasury of the Temple at the time of the visit of Hezbudoros (r. 187 b.c.; 2 Macc. iii. 11). Josephus also mentions "children of Tobias" (Ant. xii. 5, § 1, ταύτας Ταβίου, who, however, belonged to the fiction of Menelaus, and notice especially a son of one of them (Joseph) who was named Hircamus (Ant. xii. 4, § 2 ff.). But there is no sufficient reason for identifying the Hircamus of 2 Macc. with this grandson of Tobias either by supposing that the ellipse (τὸν Ταβίου) is to be so filled in as to suit the sons of Joseph were popularly named after their grandfather (Ewald, Gesch. iv. 309), which could scarcely have been the case in consequence of the great eminence of their father.

The name appears to be simply a local appellation, and became illustrious afterwards in the Macedonian dynasty, though the circumstances which led to its adoption are unknown (yet comp. Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 4.)

His is used throughout the A. V. instead of its, which does not occur in the original edition of 1611, though it has been introduced in one place in later editions. [Fr. This use sometimes occasions ambiguity, as in Matt. vi. 33, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, where Eastwood and Wright (Bible Word-Book, p. 252) erroneously refer the "his" to "kingdom" instead of to "God," the Greek being Θεσαυρος, not Θεσαυρος." His righteousness" here means "the righteousness which He requires." A.

Hittites, the, the nation descended from Cheth (A. V. "Heath"), the second son of...
HITTITES, THE

Canaan (1) With five exceptions, noticed below, the word is Καναάν = the Chichit [♂ Χέτταιοι, Χέτταιοι: Herod., Hethai: in Ex. ix. 1, δ Εβί, Vat. Ebe, Alex. ΑΛΩΝ], in the singular number, according to the common Hebrew idiom. It is occasionally rendered in the A. V. in the singular number, "the Hittite" (Ex. xxii. 28, xxiii. 2, xxiv. 11; Jos. ix. 7; Josh. xi. 20, etc.) plural (Gen. xv. 29); Ex. iii. 8, 17, xii. 5, xxii. 23; Num. xxii. 29; Deut. v. 1. xxviii, 17. Josh. iii. 10, xxiii. 8, xxv. 11; Judg. iii. 5; 1 K. ix. 29; 2 Chr. viii. 7; Ex. ix. 1: Neh. ix. 8; 1 Esdr. viii. 69, Χετταιοι). (2) The plural form of the word is Καναάνι, οι Χέτταιοι, Χέτταιοι (Val. Tav., Alex. Χετταιοι; Χετταιοι (Val. -xv.), οι Χέτταιοι: Herod., Hethai) (Josh. i. 4; Judg. i. 26; 1 K. x. 2); 2 K. vii. 6; 2 Chr. i. 17. (3) A Hittite [woman] is Χέτταια [Χετταιοι: Κθεταιοι] (Ex. xvi. 4, 5). In 1 K. xi. 1, the same word is rendered "Hittites." 1. Our first introduction to the Hittites is in the time of Abraham, when he bought from the Bene-Cheth, "Children of Heth" — such was then their title — the field and the cave of Machpelah, belonging to Ephron the Hittite. They were then settled at the town which was afterwards, under its new name of Hebron, to become one of the most famous cities of Palestine, then bearing the name of Kirjath-arba, and perhaps also of Mamre (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxvii. 9). The propensities of the tribe appear at that time to have been rather commercial than military. "The money current with the merchant," and the process of weighing it, were familiar to them; the peaceful assembly in the "gate of the city" was their manner of receiving the stranger who was desirous of having a "possession," "secured" to him among them. The dignity and courtesy of their demeanour also come out strongly in this narrative. As Ewald well says, Abraham chose his allies in warfare from the Amorites, but he goes to the Hittites for his grave. But the tribe was evidently as yet but small, not important enough to be noticed beside "the Canaanite and the Perizzite" who shared the bulk of the land between them (Gen. xii. 6, xiii. 7). In the southern part of the country they remained for a considerable period after this, possibly extending as far as Gera and Beer-sheba, a good deal below Hebron (xxvi. 17, xxviii. 10). From their families Esau married his first two wives; and her fear lest Jacob should take the same course is the motive given by Rebekah for sending Jacob away to Haran. It was the same feeling that had urged Abram to send to Mesopotamia for a wife for Isaac. The descendant of Shem could not well have had "daughters of Anar" if he was not acquainted with the Canaanites among whom I dwell . . . wherein I am a stranger," but "go to my country and thy kindred" is his father's command, "to the house of thy mother's father, and take thee a wife from thence" (Gen. xxviii. 2, xxiv. 4). 2. Throughout the book of Exodus the name of the Hittites occurs only in the usual formula for the occupants of the Promised Land. Changes occur in the mode of stating this formula [Canaan, p. 354 a], but the Hittites are never omitted (see Ex. xxiii. 28). In the report of the spies, however, we have again a real historical notice of them: "the Hittite, the Jebusite, and the Amorite dwell in the land" (Num. xiii. 29). Whatever temporary circumstances may have attracted them so far to the south as Beer-sheba, a people having the quiet commercial tastes of Ephron the Hittite and his companions can have had no call for the raving, skirmishing life of the country bordering on the desert: and thus, during the sojourn of Israel in Egypt, they had withdrawn themselves from these districts, retiring before Amalek (Num. xiii. 21). If there were some mountain fortress in the centre of the land. Perhaps the words of Ezekiel (xvi. 3, 45) may imply that they helped to found the city of Jehosh. From this time, however, their quiet habits vanish, and they take their part against the invader, in equal alliance with the other Canaanite tribes (Josh. i. 1, xiii. 3, &c.). 3. Henceforward the notices of the Hittites are very few and faint. We meet with two individuals, both attached to the person of David. (1) "Abimelech, the Hittite," who was with him in the hill of Hachilah, and with Abishai accompanied him by night to the tent of Saul (2 Sam. xxvi. 6). He is nowhere else mentioned, and was possibly killed in one of David's expeditions, before the list in 2 Sam. xxiii. was drawn up. (2) "Uriah the Hittite," one of "the thirty" of David's body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 39; 1 Chr. xi. 41), the deep tragedy of wilful wrongs forms the one blot in the life of his master. In both these persons, though warriors by profession, we can perhaps detect traces of those qualities which we have noticed as characteristic of the tribe. In the case of the first, it was Abiashai, the practical, unscrupulous "son of Zeruiah," who pressed David to allow him to kill the sleeping king. Abimelech is clear from that stain. In the case of Uriah, the absence from suspicion and the generous self-denial which he displayed are too well known to need more than a reference (2 Sam. xi. 11, 12). 4. The Egyptian annals tell us of a very powerful confederacy of Hittites in the valley of the Orontes, with whom Soter I., or Sethos, waged war about B. C. 1340, and whose capital, Ketesh, situate near Emesa, he conquered. [E.G.R., p. 511.] 5. In the Assyrian inscriptions, as lately deciphered, there are frequent references to a nation of Khatti, who "formed a great confederacy ruled by a number of petty chiefs," whose territory also lay in the valley of the Orontes, and who were sometimes assisted by the people of the sea-coast, probably the Phoenicians (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 463). "Twelve kings of the Southern Khatti are mentioned in several places." If the identification of these people with the Hittites should prove to be correct, it agrees with the name Chatu, as noticed under Heth, and affords a clue to the meaning of some passages which are otherwise puzzling. These are (a) Josh. i. 4, where the expression "all the land of the Hittites" appears to mean all the land of Canaan, or at least the northern part thereof. (b) Judg. i. 26. Here nearly the same expression recurs: [LIT.] (a) 1 K. x. 28; 2 Chr. i. 17; the kings of the Hittites and kings of Aram (probably identical with the "kings on this side Eniphatus," 1 K. iv. 24) are mentioned as purchasing chariots and horses from Egypt, for the possession of which they were so notorious, that

"Canaanite," has in many places the force of "merchant" or "trafficker." See among others the examples in vol. i. p. 354 b.

(dj) it would seem to have become at a later date almost proverbial in allusion to an alarm of an attack by chariots (2 K. vii. 6).

6. Nothing is said of the religion or worship of the Hittites. Even in the enumeration of Solomon's idolatrous worship of the gods of his wives — among whom were Hittite women (1 K. xi. 1) — no Hittitish diligence is alluded to. (See 1 K. xi. 3, 7; 2 K. xxiii. 15.)

7. The names of the individual Hittites mentioned in the Bible are as follow. They are all susceptible of interpretation as Hebrew words, which would lead to the belief either that the Hittites spoke a dialect of the Aramaic or Hebrew language, or that the words were Hebraized in their transference to the Bible records.

HIVITES, THE (םיתות) [perh. the village],
Ges.], i.e. the Chethite: ö *Ebaiai: (in Josh. ix. 7, Xoppaios, and so Alex. in Gen. xxxiv. 2.) here Cyc.
The name is, in the original, uniformly found in the singular number. It never has, like that of the Hittites, a plural, nor does it appear in any other form. Perhaps we may assume from this that it originated in some peculiarity of locality or circumstance, as in the case of the Amorites — "mountainiers;" and not in a progenitor, as did that of the Ammonites, who are also styled Bene-Amon — children of Amnon — or the Hittites, Bene- Ceth — children of Ceth. The name is explained by Exah (Josh. i. 318) as Binnehfinder, that is, "Hittite finders," by Gesenius (Thes. i. 454) as peqayim, "villagers." In the following passages the name is given in the A. V. in the singular — THE HIVITES: — Gen. x. 17; Ex. xxii. 28, xxviii. 2; xxvi. 11; Josh. ix. 1, xi. 3; 1 Chr. i. 15; also Gen. xxxiv. 2, xxxvi. 2. In all the rest it is plural.

1. In the genealogical tables of Genesis, "the Hittite" is named as one of the descendants — the sixth in order — of Canaan, the son of Ham (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chr. i. 15.) In the first enumeration of the nations who, at the time of the call of Abraham, occupied the promised land (Gen. xviii. 21), the Hivites are omitted from the Hebrew text (though in the Samaritan and LXX. their name is inserted.). This has led to the conjecture, amongst others, that they are identical with the Kadmonites whose name is found there and there only (Echen, Pal. 140; Kochart, Pal. iv. 56; Gen. i. 19). But are not the Kadmonites rather, as their name implies, the representatives of the Bene-kedem, or "children of the East?" The name commonly occurs in the formula by which the country is designated in the earlier books (Ex. iii. 8, 17, xiiii. 5, xxiii. 23, 28, xlviii. 2, xxiv. 11; Deut. vii. 1, x. 17; Josh. iii. 10, ix. 1, xii. 8, xlviii. 11), and also in the later ones (1 K. ix. 20; 2 Chr. viii. 7; but comp. Ex. ix. 1, and Neh. ix. 8). It is, however, absent in the report of the spies (Num. xili. 29), a document which fixes the localities occupied by the Canaanite nations at that time. Perhaps this is owing to the then insignificance of the Hittites, or perhaps to the fact that they were indifferent to the special locality of their settlements.

2. We first encounter the actual people of the Hittite, when the name of Jacob's return to Canaan. The Shechem was then (according to the current Hebrew text) in their possession, Hamor the Hivite being the "prince (נֵבְרִי) of the land" (Gen. xxiv. 2). They were at this time, to judge of their appearance, a warlike and conquered people, freeloaders, and easily deceived by the crafty and cruel sons of Jacob. The narrative further exhibits them as peaceful and commercial, given to "trade" (10, 21), and to the acquiring of "pos sessions" of cattle and other "wealth" (10, 23, 28, 29). Like the Hittites they held their assemblies or conferences in the gate of their city (20). We may also see a testimony to their peaceful habits in the fact of any attempt at revenge by Jacob for the massacre of the Shechemites. Perhaps a similar indication is furnished by the name of the god of the Shechemites some generations after this — Haal-berith — Bad of the league, or the alliance (Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4, 46); by the way in which the Shechemites were beaten by Abimelech (40); and by the military character, both of the weapon which caused Abimelech's death and of the person who discharged it (ix. 50).

The Alex. MS., and several other MSS. of the LXX., in the above narrative (Gen. xxxiv. 2) substitute "Horite" for "Hittite." The change is remarkable from the usually close adherence of the Alex. Codex to the Hebrew text, but it is not corroborated by any other of the ancient versions, nor is it recommended by other considerations. No instances occur of Horites in this part of Palestine, while we know, from a later narrative, that there was an important colony of Hivites on the highland of Benjamin at Gilbon, etc., no very great distance from Shechem. On the other hand, in Gen. xxxvi. 2, where Abdalnaim, one of Esau's wives, is said to have been the daughter of [Anah] the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite, all considerations are in favor of reading "Horite" for "Hittite." In this ease we fortunately possess a detailed genealogy of the family, by comparison of which little doubt is left of the propriety of the change (comp. verses 29, 31, 32, 30, with 2), although no ancient version has suggested it here.

3. We next meet with the Hivites during the conquest of Canaan (Josh. ix. 7, xi. 19). Their character is now in some respects materially altered. They are still evidently averse to fighting, but they have acquired — possibly by long experience in traffic — an amount of craft which they did not before possess, and which enables them to turn the tables on the Israelites in a highly successful manner (Josh. ix. 3-27). The colony of Hivites, who made Joshua and the heads of the tribes their dupes on this occasion, had four cities — Gilbon, Tephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jeerim — situated, if our present knowledge is accurate, at considerable distances asunder. It is not certain whether the three last were destroyed by Joshua or not (xi. 19);
HIZKI'AH (חיזקיה), an ancestor of Zeplianiah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

HIZKJ'AH (חזקיה) [as above]: E'zikia: Hezekeias, according to the punctuation of the A.V. a man who sealed the covenant of reformation with Ezra and Neboeniah (Neh. x. 17). But there is no doubt that the name should be taken with that preceding it, as "Ater-Hizkijah," a name given in the lists of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubabel. It appears also extremely likely that the two names following these in x. 17, 18 (Azeer, Hodjiah) are only corrupt repetitions of these.

This and the preceding name are identical, and are the same with that given in the A.V. as Hezekiah.

HO'BACH (הובך) [love, beloved]: 6' Oabba', Alex. Ooba, Oba; in Judg. 'Oabba' (Hobab). This name is found in two places only (Num. x. 29; Judg. iv. 11), and it seems doubtful whether it denotes the father-in-law of Moses, or his son. (1.) In favor of the latter are (a.) the express statement that Hobab was "the son of Raguel" (Num. x. 29); Raguel or Renel—the Hebrew word in both cases is the same—being identified with Jethro, not only in Ex. ii. 18 (comp. iii. 1, et.), but also by Josephus, who constantly gives that name. (b.) The fact that Jethro had some time previously left the Israelite camp to return to his own country (Ex. xviii. 27). The words "the father-in-law of Moses" in Num. x. 29, though in most of the ancient versions connected with Hobab, will in the original read either way, so that no argument can be founded on them. (2.) In favor of Hobab's identity with Jethro are (a.) the words of Judg. iv. 11; but it should be remembered that this is (ostensibly) of later date than the other, and altogether a more casual statement. (b.) Josephus as speaking of Raguel remarks once (Ant. ii. 12, § 1) that he "had Lotbor, i. e. Jethro) for a surname (τούτο γάρ ἦν ἐπικλήμα τῷ Ραγούλῃ). From the absence of the article here, it is inferred by Whiston and others that Josephus intends that he had more than one surname, but this seems hardly the case.

The Mohammediun traditions are certainly in favor of the identity of Hobab with Jethro. He is known in the Koran and elsewhere, and in the East at the present day, by the name of Sho 'eb (شعبة), doubtless a corruption of Hobab. According to those traditions he was the prophet of God to the idolaters of Medina (Midian), who not believing his message were destroyed (Lane's Koran, 179-181); he was blind (ib. 180 note); the rod of Moses was his gift, it had once been the rod of Adam, and was of the myrtle of Paradise, etc. (ib. 139; Well's Biblical Legends, 107-109). The name of Sho'eb still remains attached to one of the wadies on the east side of the Jordan, opposite Jericho, through which, according to the tradition of the locality (Seetzen, Reisen, 1854, ii. 319, 376), the children of Israel descended to the Jordan. [Beth-Nimra]. According to this tradition, therefore, he accompanied the people as far as the Promised Land, though whatever weight that may possess is, when the statement of Ex. xviii. 27 is taken into account, against his identity with Jethro. Other places bearing his name and those of his two daughters are shown at Sinai and on the Gulf of Akaba (Stanley, S. & P. p. 33).

But whether Hobab was the father-in-law of Moses or not, the notice of him in Num. x. 29-32, though brief, is full of point and interest. While Jethro is preserved to us as the wise and practiced administrator, Hobab appears as the experienced Bedouin sheikh, to whom Moses looked for the material safety of his cumbrous caravan in the new and difficult ground before them. The tracks and posses of that "waste howling wilderness" were all familiar to him, and his practiced sight would be to them "instead of eyes" in discerning the distant clumps of verdure which betokened the wells or springs for the daily encampment, and in giving timely warning of the approach of Amalekites or other spoilers of the desert. [Jethro].

HOBAB [or HO'BA, A. V. ed. 1611] (הובא) [concealed, Ges.; looking-hole, Fürst]: Xob'd: Hobo), the place to which Abraham pursued the kings who had pillaged Sodom (Gen. xiv. 15). It was situated "to the north of Damascus" (יובא [נפשה}). Josephus mentions a tradition concerning Abraham which he takes from Nicolaus of Damascus: — "Abraham reigned at Damascus, being a foreigner . . . and his name is still famous in the country, and there is a village called from him The Habitation of Abraham." (Ant. i. 7, § 2). It is remarkable that in the village of Buseh, three miles north of Damascus, there is a cleft in high veneration by the Mohammdeans, and called after the name of the patriarch, Marjed Ibrahim, "the prayer-place of Abram." The tradition attached to it is that here Abraham offered thanks to God after the total discomfiture of the eastern kings. Behind the cleft is a rock in which another tradition represents the patriarch as taking refuge on one occasion from the giant Ninnor. It is remarkable that the word Hobah signifies "a hiding-place."

The Jews of Damascus affirm that the village of Hod, not far from Burzeh, is the Holah of Scripture.

name with others is contained in the two first of these passages in the LXX.

could inherit her father's estate when he left no sons (Num. xxiii. 33, xxvii. i, xxxvi. II, Josh.

The name also occurs in BETI-HOGHIAH, which see.

HOHAM (םֹהַם) [whom Jehorah inquies,

Ges.]:景色 [Val.]

Alex. אָלַּחַמה, Oshom), king of

Hebron at the time of the conquest of Canaan (Josh. x. 3); one of the five kings who were pursued by Joshua down the pass of Beth-horon, and who were at last captured in the cave at Makkelah and there put to death. As king of Hebron he is frequently referred to in Josh. x., but his name occurs in the above passage only.

HOLM-TREE (םֹפְרָם) [ilex] occurs only in the apocryphal story of Susanna (ver. 58). The passage contains a characteristic play on the names of the two trees mentioned by the elders in their evidence. That on the mastich (םֹפְרָם ... ) is perhaps not specifically distinct from the first-mentioned oak. The ilex of the Roman writers was applied both to the holm-oak (Quercus ilex) and to the Quercus coccifera or kermes oak. See Flinn (H. N. xxvi. 6).

according to the book of Judith, a general of Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians (Judg. ii. 4), who was slain by the Jewish heroine Judith during the siege of Bethulia. [JUDITH.] The name occurs twice in Cappadocian history, as borne by the brother of Ariarathes i. (c. n. c. 350), and afterwards by a pretender to the Cappadocian throne, who was at first supported and afterwards imprisoned by Demetrius Soter (c. n. c. 158). The termination

-Iospernes, -Iotes, points to a Persian origin, but the meaning of the word is uncertain. B. F. W.

was allotted with its "suburbs" to the priests (xxi. 15). In the list of priest's cities of 1 Chron. vi. the name appears as HILLEM. In the Onomasticon ("Helen" and "Olom") it is mentioned, but not so as to imply its then existence. Nor has the name been since recognized by travellers.

2. (ηλέον [as above]: Ἡλέον; Helen), a city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21), only. It was one of the towns of the Midian: the level down (A. V. "plain country") east of Jordan, and is named with Jahazah, Dibon, and other known places; but no identification of it has yet taken place, nor does it appear in the parallel lists of Num. xxxii. and Josh. xiii.

HOMAM (ὄλομα) [extermination, Ges.]: Aitava (Horamon), the form under which in 1 Chr. i. 39 an Edomite name appears, which in Gen. xxxvi. is given HOMAM. Homam is assumed by Gesenius to be the original form (Thees. p. 385 o). By Knobel (Genesis, p. 274), the name is compared with that of Homatana (ὁματάνη), a town now ruined, though once important, half-way between Petra and Ailath, on the ancient road at the back of the mountain. See Labord, Journey, p. 207, Aretas; also the Arabic authorities mentioned by Knobel.

HOMER. [Measures.]

* HONEST. [Honesty.]

* HONESTY, of σωφρότης (A. V.), 1 Tim. ii. 2, is more restricted in its idea than the Greek word σωφρότης. The latter designates generally dignity of character, including of course prudish, but also other qualities allied to self-control and decorum. The same word is rendered "gravity," 1 Tim. iii. 4, and Tit. ii. 7. It may be added that "honest" (which in the N. T. usually represents καλός, once σωφρός) is often to be taken as equivalent to "good" or "reputable." Like the Latin honestus, it describes what is honorable, becoming, or morally beautiful in character and conduct.

* HONESTLY" is used in the A. V. in a similar manner as the rendering of εὐπρεπῶς and καλῶς (Rom. xiii. 13; 1 Thess. iv. 12; Heb. xiii. 18).

H. HONEY. We have already noticed [Foods] the extensive use of honey as an article of ordinary food among the Hebrews: we shall therefore in the present article restrict ourselves to a description of the different articles which passed under the Hebrew name of d'orah (יוֹרָה). In the first place it applies to the product of the bee, to which we exclusively apply the name of honey. All travellers agree in describing Palestine as a land "flowing with honey." (Ex. iii. 8), bees being abundant even in the remote parts of the wilderness, where they deposit their honey in the crevices of the rocks or in hollow trees. In some parts of northern Arabia the hills are so well stocked with bees, that no sooner are hives placed than they are occupied (Wellsted's Travels, i. 123). The Hebrews had special expressions to describe the exuding of the honey from the comb, such as wipheth (יוֹרָה), "overflowing" (Cant. iv. 11; Prov. v. 3, xxiv. 15; מַקְלָה, "a overflowing") (Ps. xix. 10; Prov. xvi. 24), and yar'ar (יוֹרָר) or yar'arah (יוֹרָר) (1 Sam. xiv. 27; Cant. v. 1) —expressions which answer to the mel acetum of Pliny (xi. 15): the second of these terms approaches nearest to the sense of "honey comb," inasmuch as it is connected with mipheth in Ps. xix. 10, "the droppings of the comb." (2.) In the second place, the term ἱδωρ applies to a severe lees of the juice of the grape which is still called "honey," and which forms a kind of commerce in the East; it was this, and not ordinary bee-honey, which Jacob sent to Joseph (Gen. xlii. 11, and which the Syrians purchased from Palestine (Ex. xxvii. 17). The mode of preparing it is described by Pliny (xiv. 11): the must was either boiled down to a hull (in which case it was called ἤθρον, or sope, the ἄπαξ ὀλίβου, and ἀργυρία of the Greeks); it was mixed either with wine or milk (Virg. Georg. i. 216; Or. Fast. iv. 780): it is still a favorite article of nutriment among the Syrians, and has the appearance of coarse honey (Russell, Aleppo, i. 82). (3.) A third kind has been described by some writers as "vegetable" honey, by which is meant the exudations of certain trees and shrubs, such as the Timuricz sumfvera, found in the peninsula of Sinai, or the stunted oaks of Luristan and Mesopotamia. The honey which Jonathan ate in the wood (1 Sam. xiv. 25), and the "wild honey" which supported St. John (Matt. iii. 4), have been referred to this species. We do not agree to this view: the honey in the wood was in such abundance that Jonathan took it up on the end of a stick; but the vegetable honey is found only in small globules, which must be carefully collected and strained before being used (Wellsted, ii. 50). The use of the term yar'arah in that passage is decisive against this kind of honey. The ἰδώρος of Matthew need not mean anything else than the honey of the wild bees, which we have already stated to be common in Palestine, and which Josephus (B. J. iv. 8, § 3) specifies among the natural productions of the plain of Jericho: the expression is certainly applied by Diodorus Siculus (x. 94) to honey exuded from trees; but it may also be applied like the Latin mel silvestre (Plin. xii. 16) to a particular kind of bee-honey. (4.) A fourth kind is described by Josephus (b. c.), as being manufactured from the juice of the date. The prohibition against the use of honey in meat offerings (Lev. ii. 11) appears to have been grounded on the fermentation produced by it, honey soon turning sour, and even forming vinegar (Plin. xxii. 48). This fact is embodied in the Talmudic word Kiddishah = to ferment," derived from d'orah. Other explanations have been offered, as that bees were unclean (Philo de Sacrific. c. 6, App. ii. 253), or that the honey was the artificial dibh (BaEr, Symbol. ii. 323).

HOOK, HOOKS. Various kinds of hooks are noticed in the Bible, of which the following are the most important.

1. Fishing-hooks (לוּר לוּר, Am. iv. 2; דּוּר דּוּר, Job xii. 2; Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15). The two first of these Hebrew terms mean primarily thorns, and secondarily fishing-hooks, from the similarity in shape, or perhaps from thorns having been originally used for the purpose: the hooks of the LXX. and Vulg. are taken in their renderings, giving ἱδωρας and conus for the first, ἱδω-
2 .PO (A. V. "thorn"). Properly a ring (ῥύθρος, circle) placed through the mouth of a large fish and attached by a cord (τόξον) to a stake for the purpose of keeping it alive in the water (Job xii. 2); the word meaning the cord is rendered "hook" in the A. V. and as ῥυθρός.

3. .PO and .PO, generally rendered "hook" in the A. V. after the LXX. ἀγκυστρόν, but properly a ring (circulus), such as in our country is placed through the nose of a bull, and similarly used in the east for leading about lions (Ex. xxix. 4, where the A. V. has "with chains"); canes, and other animals. A similar method was adopted for leading prisoners, as in the case of Manasses who was led with rings (2 Chr. xxxiii. 11; A. V. "in the thorns"). An illustration of this practice is found in a bas-relief discovered at Khorsabad (Layard, ii. 376). The expression is used several times in this sense (2 K. xix. 23; Is. xxxvii. 29; Ez. xxix. 4, xxxviii. 4). The term .PO is used in a similar sense in Job xi. 24 (A. V. "bore his nose with a gin," margin).

Hook. (Layard's Ninevites.)

4. .PO, a term exclusively used in reference to the Tabernacle, rendered "hooks" in the A. V. The LXX. varies in its rendering, sometimes giving ἄγκυστρον, i. e. the capitol of the pillars, sometimes κόπιος and ἀγκύστρον; the expiament of gold, as given in Ex. xxviii. 28, has led to this doubt; they were, however, most probably hooks (Ex. xxvi. 32, 37, xxxvii. 10 ff.; xxxviii. 10 ff.); the word seems to have given name to the letter 7 in the Hebrew alphabet, possibly from a similarity of the form in which the letter appears in the Greek Diogamma, to that of a hook.

5. .PO, a vine-dresser's pruning-hook (Is. ii. 4, xviii. 5; Mic. iv. 3; Joel iii. 10).

6. .PO and .PO (κρεπύρα), a flesh-hook for getting up the joints of meat out of the boiling pot (Ex. xxviii. 3; 1 Sam. ii. 13-14).

7. .PO (Ez. xl. 43), a term of very doubtful meaning, probably meaning "hooks" (as in the A. V.), used for the purpose of hanging up animals to flay them (passit bifarei, Ges. Thes. p. 1470); other meanings given are — ledges (lobar, Vulg.), or caves, as though the word were ὅραμα, pens for keeping the animals previous to their being slaughtered; hearth-stones, as in the margin of the A. V.; and lastly, gutters to receive and carry off the blood from the slaughtered animals.

HORNI (νοί, a fighter [A pugilist, boxer, Ges.; one strong, powerful, First]; ὁποίος [Vat. -vei; Alex. in 1 Sam. ii. 34, Ephesi, iv. 4 11, 17, ὁποίος; Ophelit]) and PHENIES (ἐφεῖος, φιεβός [Vat. Φιεβός]), the two sons of El, who performed the mediatory secular duties at Shiloh. Their brutal rapacity and lust, which seemed to acquire fresh violence with their father's increasing years (1 Sam. ii. 22, 12-17), filled the people with disgust and indignation, and provoked the curse which was denounced against their father's house first by an unknown prophet (vv. 27-36), and then by Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 11-14). They were both cut off in one day in the flower of their age, and the ark which they had accompanied to battle against the Philistines was lost on the same occasion (1 Sam. iv. 10, 11). The predicted ruin and ejection of El's house were fulfilled in the reign of Solomon. (El: Zadok.) The unbridled licentiousness of these young priests gives us a terrible glimpse into the fallen condition of the chosen people (Ewald, Gesch. ii. 538-638). The Scripture calls them "sons of Belial" (1 Sam. ii. 12); and to this our great poet alludes in the words —

"To him no temple stood Or altar smoked; yet who more off than he
In temples and at altars, when the priest Turns athwiss, as did El's sons, who filled
With lust and violence the house of God?"

HOR, MOUNT ("HOR" = Hor the mountain, remarkable as the only case in which the name comes first). 1. (ἄγος Ὄρος; Mons Hor), the mountain in which Aaron died (Num. xx. 25, 27). The word Hor is regarded by the lexicographers as an archaic form of Hor, the usual Hebrew term for "mountain" (Genesis, Thes. p. 391 b; Fürst, Heimkehr, ad voc., etc.), so that the meaning of the name is simply "the mountain of mountains," as the LXX. have it in another case (see below, No. 2) τὸ Ὄρος, Vulg. montis altissimae; and Jerome (Ep. ad Felicem) "non in monte simplicitet sed in montis monte."

The few facts given us in the Bible regarding Mount Hor are soon told. It was "on the boundary line" (Num. xx. 23) or "at the edge" (xxiii. 37) of the land of Edom. It was the next halting-place of the people after Kadesh (xx. 22, xxiii. 37), and the quiet road for Zophnah (xx. 41) in the road to the Red Sea (xxi. 4). It was during the encampment at Kadesh that Aaron was gathered to his fathers. At the command of Jehovah, his brother, and his son ascended the mountain, "in the presence of the people, in the eyes of all the congregation." The garments, and with the garments the office of high-priest were taken from Aaron and put upon Eleazar, and Aaron died there in the top of the mountain. In the circumstances of the ascent of the height to die, and in the marked exclusion from the Promised Land, the end of the one brother resembled the end of the other: but in the presence of the two survivors, and of the gazing crowd below, there is a striking difference between this event and the solitary death of Moses.

Mount Hor is one of the very few spots connected with the wanderings of the Israelites which admit of no reasonable doubt." (Stanley, Sigr. and P. D., p. 81.) It is almost unnecessary to state that to us. See his remarks, History of the Jewish Oracles, i. 418. B.
It is situated on the eastern side of the great valley of the Arabah, the highest and most conspicuous of the whole range of the sandstone mountains of Edom, having close beneath it on its eastern side—though strange to say the two are not visible to each other—the mysterious city of Petra. The tradition has existed from the earliest date. Josephus does not mention the name of Hor (Ant. iv. 4, § 7), but he describes the death of Aaron as taking place "on a very high mountain which surrounded the metropolis of the Arabs," which latter "was formerly called Arke, but now Petra." In the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome it is Ormons—a mountain in which Aaron died, close to the city of Petra." When it was visited by the Crusaders (see the quotations in Rob. 521), the sanctuary was already on its top, and there is little doubt that it was then what it is now—the Jebel Nebi-Horain, "the mountain of the Prophet Aaron."

Of the geological formation of Mount Hor we have no very trustworthy accounts. The general structure of the range of Edom, of which it forms the most prominent feature, is new red sandstone, displaying itself to an enormous thickness. Above that is the Jura limestone, and higher still the cretaceous beds, which latter in Mount Seir are reported to be 3,500 feet in thickness (Wilson, Lond. i. 194). Through these deposited strata longitudinal dykes of red granite and porphyry have forced their way, running nearly north and south, and so completely silicifying the neighboring sandstone as often to give it the look of a primitive rock. To these combinations are due the extraordinary colors for which Petra is so famous. Mount Hor itself is said to be entirely sandstone, in very horizontal strata (Wilson, i. 280). Its height, according to the latest measurements, is 4,800 feet (Eng.) above the Mediterranean, that is to say about 1,700 feet above the town of Petra, 4,000 above the level of the Arabah, and more than 6,000 above the Dead Sea (Roth, in Petermann's Mittheil. 1858, i. 3). The mountain is marked, far and near, by its double top, which rises like a huge castellated building from a lower base and is surmounted by the circular dome of the tomb of Aaron, a distinct white spot on the dark red surface of the mountain (Stanley, 86; Laborde, 143; Stephens, Incidents). This lower base is the "plain of Azorec," beyond which Burckhardt was, after all his toils, prevented from ascending. "Out of this plain, culminating in its two summits, spring the red sandstone masses, from its base upwards rocky and naked, not a bush or a tree to relieve the rugged and broken corners of the sandstone blocks which compose it. On ascending this mass a little plain is found to lie between the two peaks, marked by a white cypress, and not unlike the celebrated plain of the cypress under the summit of Jebel Matar, traditionally believed to be the scene of Elijah's vision. The southernmost of the two, on approaching, takes a conical form. The northernmost is truncated, and crowned by the chapel of Aaron's tomb." The chapel or mosque is a small square building, measuring inside about 25 feet by 13 (Wilson, 295), with its door in the S. W. angle.

It is built of rude stones, in part broken columns, all of sandstone, but fragments of granite and marble lie about. Steps lead to the flat roof of the chapel, from which rises a white dome as usual over a tomb's tomb. The interior of the chapel consists of two chambers, one below the other. The upper one has four large pillars and a stone chest, or tombstone, like one of the ordinary skils in churchyards, but larger and higher, and rather bigger at the top than the bottom. At its head is a high round stone, on which sacrifices are made, and which retained, when Stephens saw it, the marks of the smoke and blood of recent offerings. "On the shab are Arabic inscriptions, and it is covered with shawls chiefly red. One of the pillars is hung with votive offerings of beads, etc., and two ostrich eggs are suspended over the chest. Steps in the N. W. angle lead down to the lower chamber, which is partly in the rock, but plastered. It is perfectly dark. At the end, apparently under the stone chest above, is a recess guarded by a grating. Within this is a rude protonerchan, whether of stone or plaster was not ascertainable, resting on wood, and covered by a ragged pall. This lower recess is no doubt the tomb, and possibly ancient. What is above is only the artificial monument and

In one of the walls of the upper chamber is a "round polished black stone," one of those mysterious stones of which the prototype is the Kaaba at Mecca, and which, like that, would appear to be the object of great devotion (p. 420).

The impression received on the spot is that Aaron's death took place in the small basin between the two peaks, and that the people were stationed either on the plain at the base of the peaks, or at that part of the Wady Nub-Kushubah from which the top is commanded. Josephus says that the ground was sloping downwards (καταρρέειν το γηροφόντο; Ant. iv. 4, § 7). This may be the mere expression of a man who had never been on the spot. The greater part of the above information has been kindly communicated to the writer by Professor Stanley.

The chief interest of Mount Hor will always consist in the prospect from its summit — the last view of Aaron — that view which was to him what Pisgah was to his brother. It is described at length by Irvy (134), Wilson (t. 292-9), Martineau (413), and Stanley, who summed up in the following words: "We saw all the main points on which his eye must have rested. He looked over the valley of the Arabah intersected by its hundred watercourses, and beyond, over the white mountains of the wilderness they had so long traversed; and at the northern edge of it there must have been visible the heights through which the Israelites had vainly attempted to force their way into 'the Promised Land. This was the western view. Close around him on the east were the rugged mountains of Edom, and far along the horizon the wide downs of Mount Seir, through which the passage had been denied by the wild tribes of Esau who hunted over their long slopes." On the north lay the mysterious Dead Sea gleaming from the depths of its profound basin (Stephens, Incidents). "A dreary moment, and a dreary scene — such it must have seemed to the aged priest. . . ." The peculiarity of the view is the combination of wide extension with the severity of marked features. Petra is shut out by intervening rocks. But the survey of the Desert on one side, and the mountains of Edom on the other, is complete; and of these last the great feature is the mass of red banded sandstone rocks, intersected not by valleys but by deep seams (S. o. P. p. 87). Though Petra itself is entirely shut out, one overlooking building — if it may be called a building — is visible, that which goes by the name of the Deir, or Convent. Professor Stanley has thrown out a suggestion on the connection between the two which is well worth further investigation.

Owing to the natural difficulties of the locality and the caprices of the Arabs, Mount Hor and Petra are more difficult of access than any other places which Europeans usually attempt to visit. The records of these attempts — not all of them successful — will be found in the works of Burckhardt, Irvy and Mangles, Stephens, Wilson, Robinson, Martineau, and Stanley. They are sufficient to invest the place with a secondary interest, hardly inferior to that which attaches to it as the halting-place of the children of Israel, and the burial-place of Aaron.

If Burckhardt's informants were correct (Spron, p. 431) there is a considerable difference between what the lamb was even when he sacrificed his kid on the plain below, and when Irvy and Mangles visited it six years after.

Jaaakan, and Jothath or Jothabah; but the order is not strictly preserved. Hengstenberg (Genuline-ness of the Jewish State, ii. 336) has sought to account for this by supposing that they were in Deut.
x. 7 going the opposite way to that in Num.
xxxiii. 32. For the consideration of this see WILDENness OF WANDERING. Gedgel (Arab. جدج جدج), which has among other meanings that of a well abounding in water. The plural of either of these might closely approximate in sound to Gadgad. It is observable that on the west side of the Arabah Robinson (vol. i., map) has a Wady Ghadakhilh, which may bear the same meaning; but as that meaning might be perhaps applied to a great number of localities, it would be Dangerous to infer identity. The junction of this wady with the Arabah would not, however, be unsuitable for a station between Mount Hor, near which Moserah lay (comp. Num. xx. 28, Deut. x.

shrub growing in the Arabah itself, which he calls جذج جذج (ii. 121 comp. 119), which may also possibly suggest a derivation for the name.

of the name appears to have been met with in modern times.

rendered in the A.V. " the Horites."

The name Horite (Vendor, a troglodyte, from \for, "a hole" or "cave") appears to have been derived from their habits as "cave-dwellers." Their excavated dwellings are still found in hundreds in the sandstone cliffs and mountains of Edom, and especially in Petra. [Edom and Edomites.] It may, perhaps, be to the Horites Job refers in xxx. 6, 7.
They are only three times mentioned in Scripture:
first, when they were smitten by the kings of the East (Gen. xiv. 6); then when their genealogy is given in Gen. xxxvi. 20-30 and 1 Chr. i. 38-42; and lastly when they were exterminated by the Edomites (Deut. ii. 12, 22). It appears probable that they were not Canaanites, but an earlier race, who inhabited Mount Seir before the posterity of Canaan took possession of Palestine (Ewald, Gen-echichte, vol. i. 304, 305).

to Simeon, whose territory is reckoned as parcel of the former (Josh. xix. 4; comp. Judg. i. 17: 1 Chr.

xxi. 3 and Judg. i. 17 may be relieved by supposing that the vow made at the former period was fullilled at the latter, and the name (the root of which, Vendor, constantly occurs in the sense of to devote to destruction, or utterly to destroy) given by anticipation. Robinson (ii. 181) identifies the pass Es-Safit, وصل, with Zephath, in respect both of the name, which is sufficiently similar, and of the situation, which is a probable one, namely, the gap in the mountain barrier, which, running about
S. W. and N. E., completes the plateau of Southern Palestine, and rises above the less elevated step—

HORN. I. LITERAL. (Josh. vi. 4, 5; comp. Ex. xix. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 39; Job xlii. 11). — Two purposes are mentioned in the Scriptures to which the horn seems to have been applied. Trumpets were probably at first merely horns perforated at the tip, such as are still used upon mountain-farms for calling home the laborers at meal-time. If the A. V. of Josh. vi. 4, 5 ("rams' horns," hebrew: דְּרָגֵּי הַחֲרוֹן

"rims") were correct, this would settle the question: but the fact seems to be that הַחֲרוֹנָּה has nothing to do with ram, and that לִבְּקוֹנָּן, horns, serves to indicate an instrument which originally was made of horn, though afterwards, no doubt, constructed of different materials (comp. Var. L. l. v. 24, 35, "cornua quod ex quae nunc et ex arc tunc flabant halulolo e cornu"). [CORNET.] The horns which were thus made into trumpets were probably those of oxen rather than of rams: the latter would scarcely produce a note sufficiently imposing to suggest its association with the fall of Jericho.

The word horn is also applied to a flask, or vessel made of horn, containing oil (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 39), or used as a kind of toilet-bottle, filled with the preparation of antimony with which women tinged their eye-lashes (Keren-happuch = peint-horn, name of one of Job's daughters, Job xlii. 14). So in English, drinking-horn (commonly called a horn). In the same way the Greek κῆρας sometimes signifies bangle, trumpet (Xen. Anth. ii. 2, § 4), and sometimes drinking-horn (vii. 2, § 25). In like manner the Latin coroa means trumpets, and also all such (Hor. Sat. ii. 2, 61), and Jannet (Vulg. Georg. iii. 569).

II. METAPHORICAL. — 1. From similarity of form. — To this use belongs the application of the word horn to a trumpet of metal, as already mentioned. Horns of ivory, that is, elephants' teeth, are mentioned in Ex. xxvii. 13; either metaphorically from similarity of form; or, as seems more probable, from a vulgar error. The horns of the altar (Exx. xxvii. 1, 2) are not supposed to have been made of horn, but to have been metallic projections from the four corners (γαβρία κηρατοσέινα, Joseph. B. B. v. 5, § 6). [AL. I. p. 7.]

The peak or summit of a hill was called a horn (Is. v. 1, where hill = horn in Heb.; comp. κῆρας, Xen. An. v. 6, § 7, and corum, Stat. Theb. v. 522; Arab. Kūba Hāṭṭān [Horns of Hattan], Robinson, Bibl. i. p. 370; Germ. Schweerkhorn, Wetterhorn; Aarhorn: Celt. coirn). In Hab. iii. 4 ("he had horns coming out of his hand") the context implies rays of light.

The denominative לִבְּקוֹנָּן = to emit rays, is used of Moses' face (Ex. xxxiv. 29, 30, 35): so all the versions except Aquila and the Vulgate, which have the translations κηρατοσέινα κατὰ κύριον. This curious idea has not only been perpetuated by paintings, coins, and statues (Zornius, Biblioth. Antiq. i. 121), but has at least passed muster with of iron, worn defiantly and symbolically on the head, are intended. Expressive of the same idea, or perhaps merely a decoration, is the oriental military ornament mentioned by Taylor (Colinet's Fig. exii.), and the conical cap observed by Dr. Livingstone among the natives of S. Africa, and not improbably suggested by the horn of the rhinoceros, so abundant in that country (see Livingstone's Travels, pp. 456, 461.)

Hair of South Africans ornamented with buffalo-horns (Livingstone, Travels, pp. 456, 461.)

Heads of modern Asatics ornamented with horns (Livingstone, Travels, pp. 456, 457; comp. Taylor, i. c.). Among the Druzes upon Mount Lebanon the married women wear silver horns on their heads. The spiral coils of gold wire projecting on either side from the female head-dress of some of the Dutch provinces are evidently an ornament borrowed from the same original idea.

The abstract (my horn, Job xvi. 15; all the horns of Israel, Lam. ii. 3), and so for the supreme authority (comp. the story of Cippus, Ovid, Met. xv. 365; and the horn of the Indian Sacsmen mentioned in Clarkson’s Life of Penn, 1705), all horns are used for authority, whence it comes to mean king, kingdom (Dan. viii. 3, &c.; Zech. i. 18; comp. Tarquin’s dream in Accius, ap. Cic. Div. i. 22); hence in coins Alexander and the Seleucidae wear horns (see drawings on p. 61), and the former is called in Arab. two horned (Kor. xviii. 55 ff.), not without reference to Dan. viii.

Out of either or both of these two last metaphors sprang the idea of representing gods with horns. Spanheim has discovered such figures on the Roman denarius, and on numerous Egyptian coins of the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines (Dios. v. p. 333). The Bacchus ταυροκερας, or cornuws, is mentioned by Euripides (Bacch. 180), and among other pagan absurdities Arniolus enumerates "Dii cornuti" (c. Gent. vii.). In like manner river-gods are represented with horns (ταυροκερωματα Anubis, Hor. Od. iv. 14, 25; ταυροκερωματα ουαμα Κηρυκου, Eur. Ion. 1261). For various opinions on the ground-thought of this metaphor, see Notes on (quoting). Maxentius speaks of a tauraco-asiety, i.e. water-bull (see Crece's Minx Dict.). (See Bochart, Hieroc. ii. 288; and, for an admirable compendium, with references, Zornius, Bibliotheca Antiquiss., ii. 106 ff.).

HORNET (τερές, σφόντα, ερυθρον). That the Hebrew word ταρέ ish describes the hornet, may be taken for granted on the almost unanimous authority of the ancient versions. Not only were bees exceedingly numerous in Palestine, but from the name Zerah (Josh. xv. 33) we may infer that hornets in particular infested some parts of the country: the frequent notices of the animal in the Talmudical writers (Levysohn, Zod. § 465) lead to the same conclusion. In Scripture the hornet is referred to only as the means which Jehovah employed for the extermination of the Canaanites (Ex. xxiii. 28; Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xiv. 12; Wisd. xii. 8). Some commentators regard the word as used in its literal sense, and adduce authenticated instances, where armies have been severely molested by hornets (Elian, xi. 28, xvii. 35; Ammian. Marcellin. xvii. 5). But the following arguments seem to decide in favor of a metaphorical sense: (1) that the word “hornet” in Ex. xxiii. 28 is parallel to “Fear” in ver. 27; (2) that similar expressions are undoubtedly used metaphorically, e. g., “to chase as the bees do” (Deut. i. 44; Ps. cviii. 12); (3) that a similar transfer from the literal to the metaphorical sense may be instance in the classical aetos, originally a “cud-fly,” afterwards terror and madness; and lastly, (4) that no historical notice of such intervention as hornets occur in the Bible. We may therefore regard it as expressing under a vivid image the consternation with which Jehovah would inspire the enemies of the Israelites, as declared in Deut. ii. 25, Josh. ii. 11.

HORONATM (ὅρονατημ = two coves). [In Is.] ὁρονατήμα, Alex. ὁρονατήμα; [in Jer.] ὁρονατήμα, [Ὀρονατήμα, ὁ ὁρονατήμα, etc.] ὁρονατήμα, a town of Moab, somewhere near Zor and Luhith (Is. xvi. 5; Jer. xxiii. 3, 5, 34), but to the position of which no view is afforded either by the notices of the Bible or by mention in other works. It seems to have been on an eminence, and approached (like Beth-horon) by a road which is styled the “way” (ἡ λήξη, Is. xv. 5), or the “descent” (ἡ εἰσοδήμα, Jer. xliii. 5). From the occurrence of a similar expression in reference to Luhith, we might imagine that these two places were sanctuaries, on the high places to which the eastern worship of those days was so addicted. If we accept the name as Hebrew, we may believe the dual form of it to arise, either from the presence of two coves or the neighborhood, or from there having been two towns, possibly an upper and a lower, as in the case of the two Beth-horons, connected by the ascending road.

It is derived by Genesis (Thes. 430) from Horonaim the Moabite town, but by Fürst (Haudub.) from Horon, i. e. (Upper-) Beth-horon. Which of these is the more accurate is quite uncertain.

The former certainly accords well with the Ammonite and Arabian who were Sanballat’s comrades; the latter is perhaps more etymologically correct.

HORSE. The most striking feature in the Biblical notices of the horse is the exclusive application of it to warlike operations; in no instance is that useful animal employed for the purposes of ordinary locomotion or agriculture, if we except Is. xxviii. 28, where we learn that horses (A. V. “horsemen”) were employed in threshing; not however in that case put in the gears, but simply driven about wildly over the stove-ground. This remark certainly will be found to be borne out by the historical passages hereafter quoted; but it is equally striking in the poetical parts of Scripture. The animated description of the horse in Job xxxix. 19-23, applies solely to the war-horse: the main streaming in the breeze (A. V. “thunder”) which “clothes his neck:” his bony bounds “as a grasshopper;” his hoofs “digging in the valley” with excitement; his terrible snorting—are brought before us, and his ardor for the strife—

He swallowed the ground with feroceness and rage;

Neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trump.

He saith among the trumpets Ha, ha!

And he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

So again the bride advances with her charms to an immediate conquest “as a company of horses in Pharaoh’s chariots” (Cant. i. 9); and when the prophet Zechariah wishes to convey the idea of perfect peace, he represents the horse, no more mixing in the fray as before (ix. 10), but bearing on his heel (which was intended to strike terror into the foe) the peaceable inscription “Holiness unto the Lord” (xiv. 20). Lastly, the characteristic of the horse is not so much his speed or his utility, but his strength (Ps. xcvili. 17, cxvili. 10), as shown in the special application of the term.
The terms under which the horse is described in the Hebrew language are usually sīs and parish (םיס, פָּרִישׁ). The origin of these terms is not satisfactorily made out; but Pott (Egym. Forch. ii. 60) connects them respectively with Sussa and Parsa, or Persia, as the countries whence the horse was derived; and it is worthy of remark that sīs was also employed in Egypt for a mare, showing that it was a foreign term there, if not in Palestine. There is a marked distinction between the sīs and the parish; the former were horses for driving in the war chariot, of a heavy build, the latter were for riding, and particularly for cavalry. This distinction is not observed in the A. V., from the circumstance that parish also signifies horseman; the correct sense is essential in the following passages—1 K. i. 26, "forty thousand chariot-horses and twelve thousand cavalry-horses;" Ez. xxvii. 14, "driving-horses and riding-horses;" Joel ii. 4, "as riding-horses, so shall they run;" and Is. xxxi. 7, "a train of horses in couples."

In addition to these terms we have reveh (רֵיחֵה, רָכֹחֵה) of undoubted Hebrew origin to describe a swift horse, used for the royal post (Ez. viii. 10, 14) and similar purposes (1 K. iv. 28; A. V. "dromedary") as also in Esth., or for a rapid journey (Mic. i. 13); romācie (רומָכִי) used once for a mare (Ez. viii. 10); and shōkh (שֹּחֵךְ) in Cant. i. 9, where it is regarded in the A. V. as a collective term, "company of horses;" it rather means, according to the received punctuation, "my mare," but still better, by a slight alteration in the punctuation, "mares." The Hebrews in the patriarchal age, as a pastoral race, did not stand in need of the services of the horse, and for a long period after their settlement in Canaan they dispensed with it, partly in consequence of the hilly nature of the country, which only admitted of the use of chariots in certain localities (Judg. i. 19), and partly in consequence of the prohibition in Deut. xvii. 16, which would be literally applicable in Egypt for a more or less long period. They kept, however, the horses of the Canaanites (Josh. xi. 6, 9). David first established a force of cavalry and chariots after the defeat of Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 4), when he reserved a hundred chariots, and, as we may infer, all the horses; for the rendering "beheaded all the charriot-horses," is manifestly incorrect. Shortly after this Absalom was possessed of some (2 Sam. xv. 1). But the great supply of horses was subsequently effected by Solomon through his connection with Egypt; he is reported to have had "40,000 stalls of horses for his chariots, and 12,000 cavalry horses" (1 K. iv. 26), and it is worthy of notice that these forces are mentioned parenthetically to account for the great security of life and property noticed in the preceding verse. There is probably an error in the former of these numbers; for the number of chariots is given in 1 K. iv. 29; 2 Chr. i. 14, as 1,400, and consequently if we allow three horses for each chariot, two in use and one as a reserve, as was usual in some countries (Xen. Cyrop. vi. 1, § 27), the number required would be 4,200, or, in round numbers, 4,000, which is probably the correct reading. Solomon also established a very active trade in horses, which were brought by dealers out of Egypt and resold at a profit to the Hittites, who lived between Palestine and the Euphrates. The passage in which this commerce is described (1 K. x. 28, 29), is unfortunately obscure; the tenor of ver. 28 seems to be that there was a regularly established traffic, the Egyptians bringing the horses to a mart in the south of Palestine and handing them over to the Hebrew dealers at a fixed tariff. The price of a horse was fixed at 150 shekels of silver, and that of a chariot at 600; in the latter we must include the horses (for an Egyptian war-chariot was of no great value) and conceiv.e, as before, that three horses accompanied each chariot, leaving the value of the chariot itself at 150 shekels. In addition to this source of supply, Solomon received horses by way of tribute (1 K. x. 25). The force was maintained by the succeeding kings, and frequent notices occur both of riding horses and chariots (2 K. ix. 21, 23, xi. 10), and particularly of war-chariots (1 K. xxii. 4; 2 K. iii. 7; Is. ii. 7). The force seems to have failed in the time of Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 23) in Judah, as it had previously in Israel under Jehoshaz (2 K. xiii. 7). The number of horses belonging to the Jews on their return from Babylon is stated at 730 (Neh. vii. 68).

In the countries adjacent to Palestine, the use of the horse was much more frequent. It was introduced into Egypt probably by the Hyksos, as it is not represented on the monuments of the 15th dynasty (Wilkinson, i. 386, Obelism). At the period of the Exodus horses were abundant there (Gen. xviii. 17, i. 9; Ex. ix. 3, xiv. 9, 23; Deut. xvii. 16), and subsequently, as we have already seen, they were able to supply the nations of Western Asia. The Jewish kings sought the assistance of the Egyptians against the Assyrians in this respect (Is. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 8; Ez. xvii. 13). The Canaanites were possessed of them (Deut. xx. 1; Jos. xi. 19; Judg. iv. 3, v. 22, 28), and likewise the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4; 1 K. xx. 1; 2 K. iv. 14, vii. 10)—notices which are confirmed by the pictorial representations on Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, i. 392, 397, 401), and by the Assyrian inscriptions relating to Syrian expeditions. But the cavalry of the Assyrians themselves and the cavalry of conquest, it is regarded as most formidable; the horses themselves being thoroughly bred, as the Assyrian sculptures still testify, and fully merited the praise bestowed on them by Hakalabk (i. 8), "swifter than leopards, and more fierce than the evening wolves;" their riders—"clad in blue, captains and riders, all of them desirable young men" (Ez. xxiii. 6)—armed with "the bright sword and glittering spear" (Nah. iii. 3), made a deep impression on the Jews, who, plainly clad, went on foot; as also did their regular army as they proceeded in couples, contrasting with the disorderly troops of asses and camels which followed with the baggage (Is. xxi. 7, xcvb in this passage signifying rather a troïna than a single chariot). The number employed by the eastern potentates was very great, Holophernes possessing not less than 12,000 (Jud. ii. 15). At a later period we have frequent notices of the cavalry of the tarbotho-Syro-monarch (1 Macc. i. 17, iii. 39, cc.). With regard to the trapping and management of the horse, we have little information; the bridile (roosh) was placed over the horse's nose (Is. xxx. 28), and a bit or curb (motheh) is also noticed (2 K. x. 28; Ps. xxi. 9; Prov. xxvi. 3; Is. xxix. 21); in the A. V. it is incorrectly given "bridle," with the exception of Ps. xxxii. The harnesses of
The Assyrian horses were profusely decorated, the bits being gilt (1 Esdr. iii. 6), and the bridles adorned with tassels; on the neck was a collar terminating in a bell, as described by Zecharias (xix. 20). Saddles were not used until a late period; only one is represented on the Assyrian sculptures (Layard, ii. 357). The horses were not shod, and therefore hoofs as hard as flint (Is. v. 28) were regarded as a great merit. The chariot-horses were covered with embroidered trappings—the precious clothes manufactured at Delfan (Ez. xxvii. 20); these were fastened by straps and buckles, and to this periphrasis reference is made in Prov. xxx. 31, in the term xorxx, "one girded about the loins" (A. V. "greyhound"). Thus adorned, Mordecai rode in state through the streets of Shusban (Esth. vi. 9). White horses were more particularly appropriate to such occasions, as being significant of victory (Rev. ii. 2, xii. 11, 14). Horses and chariots were used also in idolatrous processions, as noticed in regard to the sun (2 K. xxiii. 11).

HORSE-GATE. [Jerusalem.]

the words "Sure now, we beseech thee" (Mishna, Succoth, iii. 9). On each of the seven days during which the feast lasted the people thronged in the court of the Temple, and went in procession about the altar, setting their boughs bending towards it; the trumpets sounding as they shouted Hosanna. But on the seventh day they marched seven times round the altar, shooting meanwhile the great Hosanna to the sound of the trumpets of the Levites (Lightfoot, Temple Service, xvi. 2). The very children who could wave the palm branches were expected to take part in the solemnity (Mishna, Succoth, iii. 15; Matt. xvi. 15). I have the custom of waving the boughs of myrtle and willow during the service the name Hosanna was ultimately transferred to the boughs themselves, so that according to Elias Levy (Tholdoth, s. v.), "the handles of the willows of the brook which they carry at the Feast of Tabernacles are called Hosannas." The term is frequently applied by Jewish writers to denote the Feast of Tabernacles, the seventh day of the feast being distinguished as the great Hosanna (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. Hosanna). It was not uncommon for the Jews in later times to employ the observances of this feast, which was predominantly a feast of gladness, to express their feelings on other occasions of rejoicing (1 Macc. xiii. 51: 2 Macc. x. 6, 7), and it is not, therefore, matter of surprise that they should have done so under the circumstances recorded in the Gospels.

HOSEA (הֹשֵׁעַ, help, deliverance, Gez.; or, God is help, Firstl): [2Sam., LXX., ] [N. T. in Tisch. ed., but ] [Eliz., Lachmann.; ] (masc.), son of Beeri, and first of the Minor Prophets as they appear in the A. V. The name is precisely the same as Hosea, which is more nearly equivalent to the Hebrew.

Time. — This question must be settled, as far as it can be settled, partly by reference to the title, partly by an inquiry into the contents of the book, (a.) As regards the title, an attempt has been made to put it out of court by representing it as a later addition (Almein, Rosenmüller, Kalman). But it can easily be shown that this is unnecessary; and Eichhorn, suspicious as he ordinarily is of titles, lets that of Hosea pass without question. It has been most unreasonably inferred from this title that it intends to describe the prophetic life of Hosea as extending over the entire reigns of the monarchs whom it mentions as his contemporaries. Starting with this hypothesis, it is easy to show that these reigns, including as they do upwards of a century, an impossible period for the duration of a prophet's ministry. But the title does not necessarily imply any such absurdity; and interpreted in the light of the prophecy itself it admits of an obvious and satisfactory limitation. For the beginning of Hosea's ministry the title gives us the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, but limits this vague definition by reference to Jeroboam II., king of Israel. The title therefore gives us Uzziah, and more definitely gives us Uzziah, with Jeroboam; it therefore yields a date not later than B. C. 783. The question then arises how much further back it is possible to place the first public appearance of Hosea. To this question the title gives no answer; for it seems evident that the only reason for mentioning Jeroboam at all may have been to indicate a certain portion of the reign of Uzziah. (b.) Accordingly it is necessary to refer to the contents of the prophecy; and in doing this Eichhorn has clearly shown that we cannot allow Hosea much ground in the reign of Jeroboam (823-783). The book contains descriptions which are utterly inexplicable to the condition of the kingdom of Israel during this reign (2 K. xiv. 25 f.). The pictures of social and political life which Hosea draws so forcibly are rather applicable to the interregnum which followed the death of Jeroboam (782-772), and to the reign of the succeeding kings. The calling in of Egypt and Assyria to the aid of rival factions (x. 3, xii. 10) has nothing to do with the strong and able government of Jeroboam. Nor is it conceivable that a prophet who had lived long under Jeroboam should have omitted the mention of that monarch's conquests in his enumeration of Jehoiakim's kindnesses to Israel (ii. 8). It seems then almost certain that very few at least of his prophecies were written until after the death of Jeroboam (783).

So much for the beginning; as regards the end of his career the title leaves us in still greater doubt. It merely assures us that he did not prophesy beyond the reign of Hezekiah. But here again the contents of the book help us to reduce the vagueness of this indication. In the sixth year of Hezekiah the prophecy of Hosea was fulfilled, and it is very improbable that he should have permitted this to pass unnoticed. The prophecy of Hosea extended from 784 to 725, a period of fifty-nine years.

The Hebrew reckoning of ninety years (CORN, A. C.) was probably limited by the fulfillment of the prophecy in the sixth of Hezekiah, and by the date of the accession of Uzziah, as apparently indicated by the title: 809-720, or 719 = 90 years.

Place. — There seems to be a general impression among commentators that the prophecies contained in this collection were delivered in the kingdom of Israel, for whose warning they were principally intended. Eichhorn does not attempt to decide this question (ix. 284). He thinks it possible that the book may have been originally communicated to the Jews, as an indirect appeal to the conscience of that kingdom; but he evidently leans toward the opposite supposition that having been first published in Israel they were collected, and a copy sent into Judah. The title is at least an evidence that at about the same period these prophecies were supposed to concern both Israel and Judah, and that they may have been transmitted from place to place, that it is difficult to account for their presence in our canon. As a proof of their northern origin Eichhorn professes to discover a Samaritanism in the use of 7N as masc. suff. of the second person.

Title and Properly. — Title quite unknown. The Pseudo-Phalermus, it is uncertain upon what ground, assigns Hosea to the tribe of Issachar. His father, Beeri, has by some writers been connected with Bevak, of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. vi. 6); this is an anachronism. The Jewish fancy that all prophets whose birth-place is not specified are to be referred to Jerusalem (R. David, vat.; Buxtorf, vat.) is probably nothing more than a fancy Hosea.

(J. Corn. a Lap.) Of his father Beeri we know absolutely nothing. Allegorical interpretations of the name, marvelous for their frivolous ingenuity, have been introduced to prove that he was a prophet (Jerome ad Zaph., init.; Basal ad Is. 1:1) but they are as little trustworthy as the Jewish dogma, which decides that, when the father of a prophet is mentioned by name, the individual so specified was himself a prophet.

Order in the Prophetic series. — Most ancient and medieval interpreters make Hosea the first of the prophets; their great argument being an old rendering of 1:2, according to which "the beginning of the word by Hosea" implies that the streams of prophetic inspiration began with him, as distinct from the other prophets. Modern commentators have rejected this interpretation, and substituted the obvious meaning that the particular prophecy which follows was the first communicated by God to Hosea. The consensus for some time seems to have been for the third place. Wall (Crit. Not. O. T.) gives Jonah, Joel, Hosea; Gesenius writes Joel, Amos, Hosea. The order adopted in the Hebrew and the Versions is of little consequence.

In short, there is great difficulty in arranging these prophets: as far as titles go, Amos is Hosea's only rival; but 2 K. xiv. 25 goes far to show that they must both yield to Jonah. It is perhaps more important to know that Hosea must have been more or less contemporary with Isaiah, Amos, Jonah, Joel, and Nahum.

Division of the Book. — It is easy to recognize two great divisions, which accordingly have been generally adopted: (1.) chap. i. to iii.; (2.) iv. to end.

The subdivision of these several parts is a work of greater difficulty: that of Eichhorn will be found to be based upon a highly subtle, though by no means precarious criticism.

(1.) According to him the first division should be subdivided into three separate poems, each originating in a distinct aim, and each after its own fashion attempting to express the idolatry of Israel by imagery borrowed from the matrimonial relation. The first, and therefore the least elaborate of these is contained in chap. iii., the second in i. 2-11, the third in i. 2-9, and ii. 1-23. These three are progressively elaborate developments of the same referential idea. Chap. i. 2-9 is common to the second and third poems, but not repeated with each severally (iv. 273 ff.). (2.) Attempts have been made by Wells, Eichhorn, etc., to subdivide the second part of the book. These divisions are made either according to reigns of contemporary kings, or according to the subject-matter of the poem. The former course has been adopted by Wells, who gets six, the latter by Eichhorn, who gets sixteen poems out of this part of the book. These prophecies — so scattered, so unconnected that Bishop Lowth has compared them with the leaves of the Sibyl — were probably collected by Hosea himself towards the end of his career.

Hosea's marriage with Gomer. — This passage (i. 2 foll.) is the texte quarto of the book. Of course it has its literal and its allegorical interpreters. For the literal view we have the majority of the Targums, and a host of ancient and medieval commentators. There is some little doubt about Jerome, who speaks of a figurative and typical interpretation: but he evidently means the word typicus in a proper sense as applied to a factual reality figuratively representative of something else (Corn. a Lap.). At the period of the Reformations the allegorical interpreters could only boast the Chaldee Paraphrase, some few Rabbinists, and the Hermeneutical school of Giorgio. Soon afterwards the theory obtained a vigorous supporter in Junius, and more recently has been adopted by the bulk of modern commentators. Both views are beset by serious inconveniences, though it would seem that those which beset the literal theory are the more formidable. One question which springs out of the literal view was whether the connection between Hosea and Gomer was literal or figurative. Another question which followed immediately upon the preceding was "an Deus posit dispensare ut formatique sit licita." This latter question was much discussed by the schoolmen, and by the Thomists it was avoided in the affirmative. But, notwithstanding the difficulties besetting the literal interpretation, Bishops Horsley and Lowth have declared in its favor. Eichhorn sees all the weight on the side of the literal interpretation, and shows that marrying a harlot is not necessarily implied by נְאִית הַרְאוֹן, which may very well imply a wife who after marriage becomes an adulteress, though chaste before. In favor of the literal theory, he also observes that a wife unchaste before marriage to be a type of Israel.

Style. — "Commotions," Jerome. "Osea quanto profundius loquitur, tanto operosius penetratur," August. Obscure brevity seems to be the characteristic quality of Hosea; and all commentators agree that "of all the prophets he is, in point of language, the most obscure and hard to be understood" (Henderson, Minor Prophets, p. 2). Eichhorn is of opinion that he has never been adequately translated, and in fact could not be translated into any European language. He compares him to a bee flying from flower to flower, to a painter reveling in strong and glaring colors, to a tree that wants pruning. Horsley detects another important specialty in pointing out the "individualistic" character of these prophecies, which above all others he deicates to be intensely Jewish.

Hosea's obscurity has been variously accounted for. Lowth attributes it to the fact that the extant poems are but a sparse collection of compositions scattered over a great number of years (Proef. xxii.) Horsley (Proef.) makes this obscurity individual and peculiar; and certainly the heart of the prophet seems to have been so full and fiery that it burst well through all restraints of dietic (Eichhorn), etc.

* That Hosea exercised the prophetic office in Israel, and in all probability was born there and not in Judah, is the general view of scholars at present. The most exclusive reference of his messages to that kingdom is a sufficient ground for this opinion: for the prophets very seldom after the separation of the ten tribes left their own part of the country, and Hosea appears the more strongly from the exceptional character which the mission, for example, of Elijah and Amos to both kingdoms is represented as having in their respective histories. But though we are to rely on this as the main argument, we may concede sometim to other considerations. Hosea shows, undeniably, a special familiarity with localities in the territory of Ephraim, as Gilgal, Mizpah, Taibor, Gilgal, Beth-Aven, Samaria, and others (see iv. 15, v. 18, vi. 8, x. 5, 7. xii. 11, &c.). His dictum also partakes of the roughness, and here and there of the Aramaic coloring, of the north-Palestine writers. For a list of words or forms of words more or less peculiar to Hosea see Keil's Einleitung in das A. T. p. 276. Havernick has shown that the grounds for ascribing to him a south-Palestine extraction are wholly untenable (Handb. der Einl. in das A. T. ii. 277 ff.). It may excite surprise, it is true, that Hosea mentions in the title of his book (the genuineness of which there is no reason for doubting) four kings of Judah, and only one of Israel. It is a possible explanation of this that the prophet after the termination of his more public ministry may have withdrawn from Ephraim to Judah, and there collected and published his writings (see Bleek, Einl. in das A. T. p. 523). Dr. Pusey finds a deeper reason for this precocious given to the Judaean dynasty. "The kingdom of Judah was the kingdom of the theocracy, the line of David to which the promises of God were made. As Elisha . . . . turned away from Jehovah (2 K. iii. 13, 14) saying 'Get thee to the prophets of the cities of his fathers, the prophets of Bethel, and the prophets of Jeroboam, and those of贫困村 mother,' and owned Jehoshaphat king of Judah only, so in the title of his prophecy Hosea at once expresses that the kingdom of Judah was legitimate" (Hosea, p. 7). The book at all events was soon known among the people of Judah; for the kingdom of Israel did not continue long after the time of Hosea, and Jeremian certainly had a knowledge of Hosea, as is evident from various expressions and illustrations common to him and that prophet. (On this latter point see especially Kueper, Jeremiae Libr. Socr. Inteepret. obiie Violuer, pp. 67-71.)

No portion of this difficult writer has occasioned so much discussion as that relating to Hosea's marriage with Gomer, "a wife of whoredoms" and the names of the children Jezeel and Lo-ruhamah, the fruit of that marriage (i. 2 ff.). From the earliest period some have maintained the literal and others the figurative interpretation of this narrative. For a history of the different opinions, the student may consult Marteck's Diction de Usure Fonteploration ou exposition fere integrum exp. i. Hosea (Leyden, 1696), and reprinted in his Com. in XII. Prophetas Minoras (Tiibingen, 1734). It is difficult to see how the transaction can be defended on grounds of morality, if it be understood as an outward one. It has been said that when "scripture relates that a thing was done, and that with the names of persons," we must conclude that it is to be taken as literally true." The principle thus stated is not a correct one: for in the parable acts are related and names often applied to the actors, and yet the literal sense is not the true one. The question in reality is not whether we are to accept the prophet's meaning in this instance, but what the meaning is which the prophet intended to convey, and which he would have us accept as the intended meaning. Further, aside from this question of the morality or immorality of the proceeding, it is impossible to see in it any adaptation to the prophet's object above that of the parabolic representation of a case assumed for the purpose of illustration. The circumstances, if they occurred in a literal sense, must extend over a series of years; they could have been known to the people only by the prophet's own rehearsal of them, and hence could have had the force only of his own personal testimony and explanation of their import. Hengstenberg (Christology, i. 177, Edinburgh, 1854) has stated very forcibly the manifold difficulties, exegetical and moral, which lie against our supposing that Hosea was instructed, to form a marriage so repugnant and repulsive, and at variance with explicit premonitions of the Mosaic code, or Lev. xxi. 7). At the same time this writer, while he denies that the marriage, the wife's adultery and the birth of the "children of whoredoms" (ii. 4) took place outwardly and literally, maintains that they took place inwardly and actually as a sort of vision; thus serving to impress the facts more strongly on the mind and enabling him to describe them with greater effect. He is very earnest to make something of the difference between this view and that of a symbolic or parabolic use of marriage as a type both in the sacredness of its relations and the criminality of its violations of the covenant between Jehovah and his people; but the line of distinction is not a very palpable one. To regard the acts as mentally performed in a sense different from that of their being objects of thought simply, would be going altogether too far. The idea of the ingenious writer may be that the vision of this adulterous wife proceeded from an outward occurrence, is at the same time objective to the prophet as that which he inwardly beheld. Prof. Cowles offers two or three suggestions to relieve this difficult question of some of its embarrassment (according to the literal theory) in his Minor Prophets, pp. 3, 4, 413-415.

Dr. Pusey assigns 70 years to the period of Hosea's ministry. He draws a fearful picture of the corruption of the times in which the prophet lived, derived partly from Hosea's own declarations, and partly from those of his contemporary, Amos. "The course of iniquity had been run. The stream had become darker and darker in its downward flow . . . . Every commandment of God was broken, and that, habitually. All was falsehood, adultery, blood-shedding; deceit to God produced faithlessness to man; excess and luxury were supplied by oppression and oppression by false dealing, perversion of justice, grinding of the poor. Blood was shed like water, until one stream met another, and everlast the land with one defiling deluge. Adultery was consecrated as an act of religion. Those who were first in rank were first in excess. People and king vied in debauchery, and the sottish king joined and encouraged the free-thinkers and blasphemers of his court. The idolatrous priest loved and shared in the sins of the people, and they seem to have set themselves to intercept those on either side of Jordan, who would go to worship at Jerusalem, laying wait to murder them. Corruption had spread throughout the whole land; even the places once sacred through God's revelations or other mercies to their forefathers, Bethel, Gilgal, Gilgal, Mizpah, Shechem, were especial scenes of corruption or of sin. Every human memory was erased by present corruption. Could things be worse? There was one aggravation more. Remonstrance was useless; the knowledge of God was wilfully rejected: the people hated rebuke; the more they were called the more they refused; they forsook their prophets to prophesy; and their false prophets hated God greatly. All attempts to heal all this disease only showed its incurableness" (Hosea, p. 35).

The same writer traces the obscurity which many have found in Hosea, to the "sacred pathos" for which he is distinguished. The expression of St. Jerome has often been repeated: "Hosea is concise, and speaketh, as it were, in detached sayings." The words of upholding, of judgment, of warning, of comfort, though slowly, heavily, condensed, abrupt, from the prophet's heavy and shrinking soul, as God commanded and constrained him, and put His words, like fire, in the prophet's mouth. An image of Him who said, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her young under her wings, and ye would not," he delivers his message, as though each sentence burst with a groan from his soul, and he had a new to take breath, before he uttered each renewed woe. Each verse forms a whole for itself, like one heavy toll in a funeral knell. The prophet has not been careful about order and symmetry, so that each sentence went home to the soul. And yet the unity of the prophecy is so evident in its words, that one cannot doubt that it is not broken, even when the connection is not apparent on the surface. The great difficulty consequently in Hosea is to ascertain that connection in places where it evidently exists, yet where the Prophet has not explained it. The easiest and simplest sentences are sometimes, in this respect, the most difficult.

Literature.—Some of the helps have been incidentally noticed in the addition which precedes. See under Amos and Habakkuk for the more important general works which include Hosea. Of the separate works on this prophet the following may be mentioned: Pocock, the celebrated orientalist and traveller, Comment. on Hosea, 1853; Manger, Comment. on Hosea, 1792, perhaps unequalled for the tact and discrimination with which he unfolds the spirit and religious teachings of the prophet; Kliersch, Hosea Graccula Hebri. et Lat. Annotationis illustrat.; 1792; Bishop Horsey, Hosea, translated from the Hebrew, with Notes explanatory and critical, 24 ed., London, 1894; J. C. Stock, Hosea Prophetis: Introductionem praebuit, ett, commentatoribus est, 1828, who regards the symbolic acts in chaps. i. and iii. as real events or facts; Sismon, Der Prophet Hosea erklärt u. übersetzt, with a copious history of the interpretation, 1851; Drake, Notes on Hosea. Jerusalem. (Eng.), 1852; and August Wünsche, Der Prophet Hosea übersetzt u. erklärt, 1808 (erste Hâfte, as far as chap. vii. 6, pp. i.-xxxii. and I-258), in which he has made special use of the Targums, and of the Jewish interpreters Rashi, Aben Ezra, and David Kimchi. Dr. Pusey's Commentary on this prophet (in pt. I. of his Minor Prophets) deserves to be characterized as learned, devout, and practical. It contains passages of great beauty and suggestive- ness. In his notes Hosea still lives, and his teachings are for our times as well as for his own. All that is Jewish is not found in Judaism, nor all that is heathenish found in heathendom.

Lübbeck (Symbolische Handlung Hoseus's in the Theol. Stadl. u. Krit., 1833, pp. 647-569) mainly wins the parochial view of the Gomer-marriage question. Umbreit's article Hosea (Herrick's Real-Encyk. vi. 207-275) is to some extent exegetical as well as critical, and contains valuable information. Hitzig's only important work, which portrays Hosea as "the Jeremiah of Israel" and the only individual character that stands out amidst the darkness of . . . nearly the whole of the last century of the northern kingdom" (Jevim, iii. 409 ff.).

The Christology of Hosea is not without difficulties. One passage only, namely, that foretelling the conversion of the heathen (ii. 25 and comp. vi. 10) is often in the N. T. as explicitly Messianic (Rom. ix. 25; 1 Pet. ii. 10). But it is a false principle of interpretation that only those portions of the O. T. refer to Christ which are expressly recognized as having that character in the New Testament. The N. T. writers represent the Redeemer as the great subject of the ancient economy; and if only those types and predictions relate to Him which are cited and applied in that manner, it is difficult to see how the Hebrew Scriptures can justly have ascribed to them such a character of predominant reference to the Christian economy. In regard to such gospel prophecies in Hosea, the reader may consult (in addition to the Commentaries) Hengstenberg's Christology of the O. T. i. 138-285 (Edinb. ed.); Hofmann's Wissenschaft u. Erfahrung, l. 206 ff.; Tholuck's Die Propheten u. ihre Weisungen, pp. 193, 207, 206; and Steilluin's Die Messianischen Weisungen des A. T. p. 53 ff.

All these writers do not recognize the same passages as significant, nor the same as significant in the same degree.

H.

Hosea (plural of hosea) Dan. iii. 21 (A. V.), is the translation of a Chaldee word which signifies tawûa (Dtnis, p. 624 r). Hosea formerly denoted any covering for the legs, short trousers or trunk-hose as well as stockings. See examples of this usage in Eastwood and Wright's Bible Words-Book, p. 257.

Hoshatia, [h'wsh:] (whom Jehovah saved): Osvina. 1. [h'wsh:] A man who assisted in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem after it had been rebuilt by Nebuchadnezzar (Neh. xii. 32). He led the princes (h'wsh:) of Judah in the procession, but whether himself one of them we are not told.

2. Mazarot; [Alex. Masarah: F. A. Annun; Marcen: The father of a certain Jeremiah or Azzariah, a man of note after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xiii. 1, xili. 2).

Hosh'ama (h'wsh-ama) [whom Jehovah hears]: Constr. Osvana. [Val. masah:] Alex. Assora; [Comp. Assora:] Senna), one of the sons of Jeconiah, or Jehoachin, the last king of Judah but one (1 Chr. iii. 18). It is worthy of notice that, in the narrative of the capture of Jeconiah by Nebuchadnezzar, though the mother and the wives of the king are mentioned, nothing is said about his sons (2 K. xxiv. 12, 15). In agreement with this is the denunciation of him as a childless man in Jer. xxii. 30. There is good reason for suspecting some confusion in the present state of the genealogy of the royal family in 1 Chr. iii.; and these facts would seem to confirm it.

Hoshea' (h'wsh-) [help, or God is help: see first]; [Hws: Oser], the nineteenth, last, and best king of Israel. He succeeded Pekah, whom he slew in a successful conspiracy, thereby fulfilling a prophecy of Isaiah (Isa. vii. 16). Although Josephus calls Hoshea a friend of Pekah (phileos tinou evmoloulonato aír; Ant. ix. 13, § 1), we have no ground for calling this "a treacherous murer" (Prideaux, i. 16). It took place n. c. 737, "in the 29th year of Jotham" (2 K. xv. 30), i.e. "in the 29th year after Jotham became sole king," for he only reigned 16 years (2 K. xv. 33). But there must have been an interregnum of at least six years after Hoshea came to the throne, which was not till n. c. 729, in the 12th year of Ahaz. (2 K. xvii. 1: we cannot, with Germain [Le Cere], read 4th for 12th in this verse, because of 2 K. xvi. 9). This is the simplest way of reconciling the apparent discrepancy between the passages, and has been adopted by Ussher, Des Vergennes, Fiele, etc. (Winer, s. v. Hoshea). The other suggestions made by Hythig, Lightfoot, etc., are mere quibbles on 2 K. xxv. 30.

It is expressly stated (2 K. xvii. 2: that Hoshea was not so sinful as his predecessors. According to the Rabbin this superiority consisted in his removing from the frontier cities the guards placed there by his predecessors to prevent their subjects from worshipping at Jerusalem (Sefer Ohm Rabba, cap. 22, quoted by Prideaux, i. 16), and in his not hindering the Israelites from accepting the invitation of the Assyrian king (2 K. xvii. xxxii. 1), not checking their zeal against idolatry (2b. xxxii. 15). This, however, is founded on the untenable supposition that Hezekiah's passover preceded the fall of Samaria (Hezekiah), and we must be content with the general fact that Hoshea showed a more theocratic spirit than the former kings of Israel. The compulsory cessation of the calf-worship may have removed his greatest temptation, for Edith-Plesser had carried off the golden calf from Dan some years before (Sed. Ohl. Rotb. 22), and that at Bethel was taken away by Shalmaneser in his first invasion (2 K. xvii. 3; Hos. x. 14; Prideaux, l. c.). But, whatever may have been his excellences, he still "did evil in the sight of the Lord," and it was too late to avert retribution by any improvements.

In the third year of his reign (n. c. 727) Shalmaneser, impelled probably by more thirst of conquest, came against him, cruelly stormed the strong caves of Beth-arbel (Hos. x. 14), and made Israel tributary (2 K. xvii. 3) for three years. At the end of this period, encouraged perhaps by the revolt of Hezekiah, Hoshea entered into a secret alliance with So, king of Egypt (who was either the Necho of Manetho, and son of Saisas, Herod. ii. 157; Keil, Vitringa, Sesounius, etc.; John, Hebr. Com. § 10; or SEOa, or himself, Wilkinson, Anti. Ig. i. 139; Ewald, Gesch. iii. 410), to throw off the Assyrian yoke. The alliance did him no good; it was revealed to the court of Nineveh by the Assyrian patty in Ephraim, and Hoshea was immediately seized as a rebellious vassal, shut up in prison, and apparently treated with the utmost indignity (Mic. v. 1). If this happened before the siege (2 K. xvii. 4), we must account for it either by supposing that Hoshea, hoping to discharge and gain time, had gone to Shalmaneser to account for his conduct, or that he had been defeated and taken prisoner in some unrecorded battle. That he disappeared very suddenly, like "a foam upon the water," was only infer from Hos. xiii. x, 7. The siege of Samaria lasted three years: for that "glorious and beautiful" city was strongly situated like "a crown of prudence" among her hills (Is. xxi. 1-3). It seems, therefore, that the siege of Samaria must have died, for it is certain that Samaria was taken by his successor Sargon, who thus laconically describes the event in his annals: "Samaria I looked at, I captured; 27,280 men (families?) who dwell in it I carried away. I constructed fifty chariots in their country. ... I appointed a governor over them, and continued upon them the tribute of the former people" (Iotta, 145, 11, quoted by Dr. Hinck, J. J. E. of Sc. Lit. Oct. 1858; Layard, Nin. and Babil. i. 148). This was probably n. c. 721 or 720. For the future history of the unhappy Ephraimites, the places to which they were transplanted by the policy of their conqueror and his officer, "the great and noble Asnapper" (Ezr. iv. 10), and the nations by which they were superseded, see Samaria. Of the subsequent fortunes of Hoshea we know nothing. He came to the throne too late, and governed a kingdom torn by pieces by foreign invasion and intestine broils. Sovereign after sovereign had fallen by the dagger of the assassin; and we see from the dark and terrible delineations of the contemporary prophets [Hoshea, Micah, Isaiah], that murder and idolatry, drunkenness and lust, had eaten like "an inwound wound" (Mic. i. 9) into the heart of the national morality. Ephraim was dogged to its ruin by the Assyrian policy, and its former power was asserted its independence (2 K. xxviii. Joseph. Ant. ix. 14: Prideaux, i. 15 ff.; Keil, On Kings, ii. 50 ff., Eng. ed.; John, Hebr. Com. § 11; Ewald, Gesch. iii. 607-613; Rosenmiiller, Bibl. Geogr. chap. ix., Engl. transl.; Kawlison, Herod. i. 149).

W. F. W.

HOSEA (onymous = help [see above]). The name is precisely the same as that of the prophet known to us as HOSHEA. 1. The son of Nun, i.e. Joshua (Dent. xxiii. 44: and also in Num. xiii. 8, though there the A. V. has Oshea). It was probably his original name, to which the Divine name of Jalu was afterwards added—Jehoshua, Joshua—"Jehovah's help." The LXX. in this passage miss the distinction, and have Ἰαβεθ: Vulg. Jace.

2. (✝ηρα: Oec.) Son of Azaziah (1 Chr. xxvii. 20) like his great namesake, a man of Ephraim, ruler (magel) of his tribe in the time of king David.

3. (✝ηρα: [Var. F. Goduμ:] Oec.) One of the heads of the people—i.e. the laymen—who sealed the covenant with Nebuchad (Neb. x. 23).

HOSPITALITY. The rites of hospitality are to be distinguished from the customs prevailing in the entertainment of guests [Food; Meals], and from the laws and practices relating to charity, almsgiving, etc., and they are thus separately treated, as far as possible, in this article.

Hospitality was regarded by most nations of the ancient world as one of the chief virtues, and especially by peoples of the Scythic stock; but it was not characteristic of the latter-and especially among the peoples of the Greeks, and even the Romans. Race undoubtedly influences its exercise, and it must also be ascribed in no small degree to the social state of a nation. Thus the desert tribes have always placed the virtue higher in their esteem than the townsfolk of the same descent as themselves; and in our own day, though an Arab townsman is hospitable, he entertains different guests on the subject from the Arabs of the desert (the Bed-awee). The former has fewer opportunities of showing his hospitality: and when he does so, he does it not as much with the feeling of discharging an obligatory act as a social and civilized duty.
With the advance of civilization the calls of hospitality become less and less urgent. The dweller in the wilderness, however, finds the entertainment of wayfarers to be a part of his daily life, and that to refuse it is to deny a common humanity. Viewed in this light, the notions of the Greeks and the Romans must be appreciated as the recognition of the virtue where its necessity was not of the urgent character that it possesses in the more primitive lands of the East. The ancient Egyptians resembled the Greeks; but, with a greater exclusiveness, they limited their entertainments to their own countrymen, being constrained by the national and priestly abhorrence and dread of foreigners. This exclusiveness throws some obscurity on their practices in the discharge of hospitality; but otherwise their customs in the entertainment of guests resembled those well known to classical scholars — customs probably derived in a great measure from Egypt.

While hospitality is acknowledged to have been a wide-spread virtue in ancient times, we must concede that it flourished chiefly among the race of Shem. The O. T. abounds with illustrations of the divine command to use hospitality, and of the strong national belief in its importance; so too the writings of the N. T.; and though the Eastern Jews of modern times dare not entertain a stranger lest he be an enemy, and the long oppression they have endured has made them more guarded in that respect than ever, it has made the name a proverb, the ancient hospitality still lives in their hearts. The desert, however, is yet free; it is as of old a howling wilderness; and hospitality is as necessary and as freely given as in patriarchal times. Among the Arabs we find the best illustrations of the old Bible narratives, and among them see traits that might beseech their ancestor Abraham.

The laws respecting strangers (Lev. xix. 33, 34) and the poor (Lev. xxiv. 14 ff.; Deut. xiv. 7), and concerning redemption (Lev. xxv. 23 ff.), etc., are framed in accordance with the spirit of hospitality; and the strength of the national feeling regarding it is shown in the incidental mentions of its practice. In the Law, compassion to strangers is constantly enforced by the words, "for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." (as Lev. xix. 34). And before the Exod., Abraham's entertainment of the angels (Gen. xviii. 1 ff.), and Lot's (xix. 1), are in exact agreement with its precepts and with modern usage. So Moses was received by Jethro, the priest of Midian, who reproached his daughters, though he believed him to be an Egyptian, saying, "And where is he? why is it [that] ye have left the man? call him, that he may eat bread." (Ex. ii. 20).

The story of Joseph's hospitality to his brethren, although he knew them to be such, appears to be narrated as an ordinary occurrence; and in like manner Pharaoh received Jacob with a liberality not merely dictated by his relationship to the savior of Egypt. Like Abraham, "Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord, I pray thee let us detain thee until we shall have made ready a kid for thee." (Judg. xiii. 15); and like Lot, the old man of Gibeath sheltered the Levite when he saw him "in a wayfaring man in the city of the plain;" and the old man said, Whither goest thou? and silence comest thou? Peace be with thee, however [let] all thy wants [lie] upon me, only lodge not in the street. So he brought him into his house, and gave provender unto the asses; and they washed their feet, and did eat and drink." (Judg. xix. 17, 20, 21).

In the N. T. hospitality is yet more markedly enjoined; and in the more civilized state of society which then prevailed, its exercise became more a social virtue than a necessity of patriarchal life.

The good Samaritan stands for all examples of Christian hospitality, embalmed by the command to love one's neighbor as himself; and our Lord's charge to the disciples strengthened that command: "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. . . . And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in nowise lose his reward." (Matt. x. 42).

The neglect of Christ is symbolized by inhospitality to our neighbors, in the words, "I was a stranger and ye took not me in." (Matt. xxv. 43). The Apostles urged the church to "follow after hospitality," using the forcible words πινακισμένα διώκοντες (Rom. xii. 13; cf. 1 Tim. v. 10); to remember Abraham's example, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." (Heb. xi. 22); to teach hospitality one to another without grudging." (1 Pet. iv. 9); while a bishop must be a "lover of hospitality." (Tit. i. 8, 1 Tim. iii. 2).

The practice of the early Christians was in accord with these precepts. They had all things in common, and their hospitality was a characteristic of their belief. If such has been the usage of Biblical times, it is in the next place important to remark how hospitality was shown. In the patriarchal ages we may take Abraham's example as the most fitting, as we have of it the fullest account: and by the light of Arab custom we may see, without obscurity, his hospitality to the tent door to meet his guests, with the words, "My lord, if now I have found grace in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant. Behold, let a little water be brought, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree, and I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts." "And," to continue the narrative in the vigorous language of the A. V., "Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead [it], and make cakes upon the hearth. And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave [it] unto a young man, and he hasted to dress it. And he took butter and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set [it] before them: and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat." A traveller in the eastern desert may see, through the vista of ages, this far-off example in its living traces. Mr. Lane's remarks on this narrative and the general subject of this article are too opposite to be omitted: he says, "Hospitality is a virtue for which the natives of the East in general are highly and deservedly admired; and the people of Egypt are but the people refused to receive him, because he was journeying to Jerusalem. This act was not an inconsiderability merely, or an inhumanity: it was an outrage against one of the most sacred of the recognized laws of oriental society.}

well entitled to commendation on this account. A word which signifies literally a person on a journey (mamur) is the term most commonly employed in this country in the sense of a visitor or guest. There are very few persons here who would think of sitting down to a meal, if there was a stranger at the house, without inviting him to partake of it; unless the latter were a minor, in which case he would be invited to eat with the servants. It would be considered a shameful violation of good manners if a Muslim abstained from ordering the table to be prepared at the usual time because a visitor happened to be present. Persons of the middle classes in this country (Egypt), if living in a retired situation, sometimes take their supper before the door of their house, and invite every passenger of respectable appearance to eat with them. This is very commonly done among the lower orders. In cities and large towns claims on hospitality are un urlpatterns, as there are many ree-kalcha or khans, where strangers may obtain lodging; and food is very easily procured: but in the villages travellers are often lodged and entertained by the sheykh or some other inhabitant; and if the guest be a person of the middle or higher classes, or even not very poor, he gives a present to the host's servants, or to the host himself. In the desert, however, a present is seldom received from a guest. By a Semitic law a traveller may claim entertainment, of any person able to afford it to him, for three days. The account of Abraham's entertaining the three angels, related in the Bible, presents a perfect picture of the manner in which a modern Bedouin sheykh receives travellers arriving at his encampment. He immediately orders his wife or woman to make bread, slaughter sheep or some other animal, and dress it in haste, and bring milk and any other provisions that he may have ready at hand, with the bread and the meat which he has dressed, sets them before his guests. If these be persons of high rank, he stands by them while they eat, as Abraham did in the case above alluded to. Most Bedouins will suffer almost any injury to themselves or their families rather than allow their guests to be ill-treated while under their protection. There are Arabs who even regard the chastity of their wives as not too precious to be sacrificed for the gratification of their guests (see Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, etc., 5vo ed. i. 179, 180); and at an encampment of the Bisharin, I ascertained that more than one or two persons in this great tribe (which includes a large portion of the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea) who offer their unmarried daughters (cf. Gen. xix. 8; Judg. xix. 24) to their guests, merely from motives of hospitality, and not for hire (see London, Egypt, ch. xiii.). Mr. Lane adds that there used to be a very numerous class of persons, called Tu-faleess, who lived by spurning, presuming on the well-known hospitality of their countrymen, and going from house to house where entertainments were being given. The Arabs along the Syrian frontier usually pitch the sheykh's tent towards the west, that is, towards the inhabited country, to invite passengers and lodge them on their way (Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, etc., 5vo ed. i. 33), it is held to be disgraceful to encamp in a place out of the way of travellers; and it is a custom of the Bedouin to light fires in the encampment to attract travellers, and to keep dogs who, besides watching against robbers, may in the night-time guide wayfarers to their tents. Hence a hospitable man is proverbially called "one whose dogs bark loudly." Approaching an encampment, the traveller often sees several horsemen coming towards him, and striving who shall be first to claim him as a guest. The favorite national game of the Arabs before El-Isham illustrates their hospitality. It was called "Meoxir," and was played with arrows, some notched and others without marks. A young camel was bought and killed, and divided into 24 portions: those who drew marked arrows had shares in proportion to the number of notches; those who drew blanks paid the cost of the camel among them. Neither party, however, ate of the flesh of the camel, which was always given to the poor, and was, in this they did out of pride and ostentation," says Sale, "it being reckoned a shame for a man to stand out, and not venture his money on such an occasion." Sale, however, is hardly philosophical in this remark, which concerns only the abuse of a practice originally arising from a national virtue: but Mohammed forbad the game, with all other games of chance, on the plea that it gave rise to quarrels, etc. (Sale's Preliminary Discourse, p. 96, ed. 1836, and Aria, ch. ii. and v.).

The oriental respect for the covenant of bread and salt, or salt alone, certainly sprung from the high regard in which hospitality was held. Even accidentally to taste another's salt imposes an obligation; and so great an extent is the feeling carried that a thief has been known to give up his booby in obedience to it. Thus El-Leys Es-Saffir, when a robber, left his booby in the passage of the royal treasury of Sijsistan: accidentally he stumbled over, and, in the dark, tasted a lump of rock-salt: his respect for his covenant gained his pardon, and he became the founder of a royal dynasty (Sale's Thousand and One Nights, ch. xv. note 21). The Arab peculiarity was carried into Spain by the so-called Moors.

For the customs of the Greeks and Romans in the entertainment of guests, and the exercise of hospitality generally, the reader is referred to the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Hospitality. They are incidentally illustrated by passages in the N. T., but it is difficult to distinguish between those so derived, and the native oriental customs which, as we have said, are very similar. To one of the eastern races, especially and naturally a reference is need to exist in Rev. ii. 17: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a

1 a "It is said to have been a custom of some of the Barmakese (the family so renowned for their geneate hospitality during the holy month of Muh
tal) to admit no one who applied at such times for admission to be required" (Lane's Thousand and One Nights, ed. note 97)
2 This is accompanied by hospitality lasting three days, and permitted a guest to take this right by force: although one day and one night is the period of the host's being "kind" to him (Mashiok, M. Mus. ib. 329, cited in Lane's Thousand and One Nights, in note 15). Burckhardt (Notes on the Bedouins, etc., 1. 178, 179, etc. in the same note) says that a stranger without friend, in a camp at night, s the first tent, where the women, in the absence of the owner, provide for his refreshment. After the lapse of three days and four hours he must, if he would avoid censure, either assist in household duties, or claim hospitality at another tent.

HOST (Luke x. 35). [Hospitality] INN.

HOSTAGE. The practice of giving and receiving persons, to be retained as security for the observance of public treaties or engagements, is indicated in 2 Kings xiv. 14, and 2 Chr. xxiv. 24. It is said that Josiah after his victory over Amaziah took with him hostages  לְגָאוֹבָס meaning "that upon his return to his own kingdom. D. S. T.

HOTHAM (הֹתָם [signet-ring]; [x]  הֹתָם; Alex. [A]  חֹתָמ; [t]  חותם; Hotham, a man of Athar, son of Heber, of the family of Beriah (1 Chr. vii. 32).

HOTHAM (הֹתָם, i. e. Hotham; [Vat. ] Alex.  חותמה; [RA.  חותמה; Hotham), a man of Aror, father of Shama and Jehiel, two of the heroes of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 44). The substitution of Hotham for Hotum is an error which has been retained from the edition of 1011 following the Bishops' Bible till now (Comp. the rendering of the LXX. both of this and the preceding name).

HOITHIR (יוֹתֹהְר [fullness]; [Vat. ] Alex.  יוֹתֹהְר; [RA. ] חותיר; [Orih. ] חותיר; the 13th son of Heman *the king's hearer" (1 Chr. xxv. 4), and therefore a Kohathite Levite. He had the charge of the twenty-first course of the musicians in the service of the tabernacle (xxv. 28).

* Some think that this name and the names of four of Heman's other sons (Giddalti, Romamti-ezer, Malbodi, Hothir, Mahazioth) formed a verse of some ancient prophetic saying. They follow each other in the list, 1 Chr. xxv. 4 (except the omission of Josiahkeshah), so as to make this couplet: —

I have magnified and exalted help; I have declared in abundance visions.

Furst says (Hebr. u. Chald. Wörterb. i. 244) that the rhythm of the words favors this view. Kralov refers to this case as a remarkable illustration of the use of significant or symbolic personal names among the Hebrews (Lehrbuch der Hebr. Sprache, p. 502, 56e Ausg.). [Names, Amer. ed.]

It should be said that according to this theory czer belonged to both the preceding verbs, and makes of them two compound names, instead of one, as in the A. V.

HOUGH (Josh. xi. 6, 9; 2 Sam. viii. 4) is an obsolete word from the Anglo-Saxon hol, and means to hamstrung, i. e. to cut the back sinews, and thus disable animals.

HOURL (לְהוֹר; לְהוֹרֶל, Chald.). This word is first found in Dan. iii. 6, iv. 19, 33, v. 5; and t occurs several times in the Apocrypha (Jud. xiv. 3, 2 Esdr. ix. 44). It seems to be a vague expression for a short period, and the frequent phrase "in the same hour" means "immediately". Hence we find לְהוֹרֶל substituted in the Targum for לְהוֹר, "in a moment" (Num. xvi. 21, &c.).

*Qpa is frequently used in the same way by the *t writers (Matt. viii. 13; Luke xii. 39, &c.). It occurs in the LXX. as a rendering for various words meaning time, just as it does in Greek writers long before it acquired the specific meaning of our word. The word is still used in Arabic both for an hour and a moment.

The ancient Hebrews were probably unacquainted with the division of the natural day into 24 parts. The general distinctions of "morning, evening and moonday" (Ps. lv. 17), were sufficient for them at first, as they were for the early Greeks (Hom. ii. 111); afterwards the Greeks adopted five marked periods of the day (Jul. Pollius, Oomn. i. 118; Dods Chrysost. Opusc. in de Glocb), and the Hebrews parcelled out the period between sunrise and sunset into a series of minute divisions distinguished by the sun's course [DAY], as is still done by the Arabs, who have stated forms of prayers for each period (Lane's Mod. Egypt. i. ch. 3).

The early Jews appear to have divided the day into four parts (Neb. ix. 3), and the night into three watches (Judg. vii. 19) [DAY; WATCHES], and even in the N. T. we find a trace of this division in Matt. xx. 1-5. There is however no proof of this: the assertion, sometimes made, that *dpa in the Gospels may occasionally mean a space of three hours.

The Greeks adopted the division of the day into 12 hours from the Babylonians (Herod. ii. 193, comp. Rawlinson, Herod. ii. p. 334). At what period the Jews became first acquainted with this method of reckoning time is unknown, but it is generally supposed that they too learnt it from the Babylonians during the Captivity (Wachner, Ant. Hebr. § 6 i. 8, 9). They may have had some such division at a much earlier period, as has been inferred from the fact that Abuz erected a sun-dial in Jerusalem, the use of which had probably been learnt from Babylon. There is however the greatest uncertainty as to the meaning of the word לְהוֹר (A. V. "degrees," Is. xxxviii. 8). [Dial.] It is strange that the Jews were not acquainted with this method of reckoning even earlier, for, although a purely conventional one, it is naturally suggested by the months in a year.

Sir G. Wilkinson thinks that it arose from a less obvious cause (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 334). In whatever way originated, it was known to the Egyptians at a very early period. They had 12 hours of the day and of the night (called N. and T. hours), each of which had its own genius, drawn with a star on its head. The word is said by Lepsius to have been found as far back as the 5th dynasty (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 135).

There are two kinds of hours, namely, (1.) the astronomical or equinoctial hour, i. e. the 24th part of a civil day, which although "known to astronomers, was not used in the affairs of common life till towards the end of the 4th century of the Christian era" (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Hour): and (2.) the natural hour (which the Rabbis called קָוֵֽפָלָּא or temporales), i. e. the 12th part of the natural day, or of the time between sunrise and sunset. These are the hours meant in the N. T., Josephus, and the Rabbis (John xi. 9, &c.; Jos. Ant. xiv. 4, § 3), and it must be remembered that they perpetually vary in length, so as to be very different at different times of the year. Besides this, an hour of the day would always mean a different length of time from an hour of the night, except at the equinox. From the consequent uncertainly the term there arose the proverbial expression "not all hours are equal" (G. Joshua ap. Carpov. App. Crit. p. 345). At the equinoxes the third hour would correspond to 9 o'clock; the sixth would always be at noon. To find the exact time meant at other seasons of the year we must know when the sun rises in Palestine, and reduce the hours to our reckoning accordingly. [D.A.V.] (Winer, s. v. Tun. Thren. Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 101.) What hitherto has varied true Jews possessed in the time of our Lord is uncertain; but we may safely suppose that they had gnomons, dials, and clepsydra, all of which had long been known to the Persians and other nations with whom they had come in contact. Of course the two first were inaccurate and uncertain indications, but the water-clock by ingenious modifications, according to the season of the year, became a very tolerable assistance in marking time. Mention is also made of a curious invention called πεπεραγμένον, by which a figure was constructed so as to drop a stone into a brazen basin every hour, the sound of which was heard for a great distance and announced the time (Otho, Lex. Rob. s. v. Horum).

For the purposes of prayer the old division of the day into 4 portions was continued in the Temple service as we see from Acts ii. 15, iii. 9. The Jews supposed that the 3d hour had been consecrated by Abraham, the 6th by Isaac, and the 9th by Jacob (Kischel; Schottetzen, Hor. Hebr. on Acts iii. 1). It is probable that the canonical hours observed by the Romans (of which there are 8 in the 24) are derived from these Temple hours (Godwyn, Mon. and Aær. iii. 9).

The Rabbis pretend that the hours were divided into 1080 διδυμη (minutes), and 56,848 δεκακόν (seconds), which numbers were chosen because they are so easily divisible (Gen. Hier. Beren. 2, 4, in Reland, Jott. Hebr. iv. 1, § 19). F. W. F.

Besides the various points mentioned above as forming the beginning of the day, from which the hours were reckoned, Pliny testifies (Hist. N. ii. 79) that among the Egyptians there was a religious and civil day was reckoned from midnight to midnight. His words are: "Nullum diei aliis observato, vulgus omne a luce ad tenebras, saeculo Romano, et qui diem divinam civilum, item Aegyptio, et Hipparchus, a medio nocte in medium." To the same purpose also Anius Gelius (Vest. Alt. iii. 2): "Populam autem Romam, uti Varro dixit, dies singulos ad medium praemittit multis argumentis ostendit." He then gives Varro's proofs.

If the passages in St. John's Gospel relating to the hour of the day be all examined, it will appear probable that he adopted this official Roman reckoning,—of course, numbering the hours from midnight as well as from midnight, so as not to exceed the number twelve. In i. 40 the visit of the Jews to Jesus will have occurred about 10 a.m. instead of at 4 p.m., as often supposed, and this seems more agreeable to the statement "they went with him that day." In iv. 6 the same mode of reckoning brings Jesus, "weary with his journey," to the well of Samaria at six in the evening, a time when the woman would naturally come to draw water, instead of at noon. So in iv. 52 this computation makes "the seventh hour," when the former told the woman's son, seven instead of one new, which agrees better with the circumstances and the probable distance between Cana and Capernaum.

The only remaining passage is xix. 14, the relation of which to Mark xv. 25 has been so much questioned. Here, too, this method of reckoning removes the seeming discrepancy, while the whole course of the narrative in all the Evangelists shows that the time indicated by St. John as that when Pilate sat upon his judgment-seat, could not have been later than between six o'clock in the evening—"about the sixth hour." After this, the events which followed — the further ineffectual opposition and final yielding of Pilate to the will of the Jews, the leading of Jesus out to Golgotha after taking off his mock royal array, etc., the preparation for the crucifixion, and the crucifixion itself, must have consumed the two hours or more until our nine o'clock, called by St. Mark, according to Jewish usage, "the third hour." For a list, of the older writers who adopt this view, see Wolinus, Curva Phil. on John xix. 14. Olshausen (who seems to prefer for himself a conjectural emendation of the text) yet well observes, "With this hypothesis admirably accord the fact that John wrote for the people of Asia Minor" — a remark which applies to all the passages above cited from his Gospel.

houses of the first rank. The prevailing plan of eastern houses of this class presents, as was the case in ancient Egypt, a front of walls, whose blank and mean appearance is usually relieved only by the door and a few lattice and projecting windows (Vies in Syr., ii. 25). Within this is a court or courts with apartments opening into them. Some of the finest houses in the East are to be found at Damascus, where in some of them are seven such courts. When there are only two, the innermost is the horcum, in which the women and children live, and which is jealously secluded from the entrance of any man but the master of the house (Burckhardt, Travels, i. 188; Van Egmont, ii. 246, 253; Shaw, p. 207; Porter, Damascus, i. 34, 37, 60; Chardin, Voyages, vi. 6; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 173, 207). Over the door is a projecting window with a lattice more or less elaborately wrought, which, except in times of public celebr-lakes off his shoes on the dukka‘ah before stepping on the be‘ein (Ex. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15; Luke vii. 38). The ceilings over the be‘ein and dukka‘ah are often richly panelled and ornamented (Jer. xxxii. 11). ( '[C E I N I N G.] The stairs to the upper apartments are in Syria usually in a corner of the court (Robinson, iii. 302). When there is no upper story the lower rooms are usually loftier. In Persia they are open from top to bottom, and only divided from the court by a low partition (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 10; Chardin, iv. 119; Burckhardt, Travels, i. 18, 19; Travels in Syria, i. 56).

Inner court of house in Cairo, with Mak‘ād.

(lane, Modern Egyptians.)

Around part, if not the whole, of the court is a verandah, often nine or ten feet deep, over which, when there is more than one door, runs a second gallery of like depth with a balustrade (Shaw, p. 208). Bearing in mind that the reception room is raised above the level of the court (Chardin, iv. 118: Travels in Syria, i. 56), we may, in explaining the circumstances of the miracle of the paralytic (Mark ii. 3; Luke v. 18), suppose, (1.) that our Lord was standing under the verandah, and the people in front in the court. The bearers of the sick man ascended the stairs to the roof of the house, and taking off a portion of the boarded over-riding of the verandah, or removing the awning over the Ἰμπλασιουμ, τὸ μεταστήνων, in the former case let down the bed through the verandah roof, or in the latter, down by way of the roof, διὰ τῶν κεφαλῶν, and deposited it before the Saviour (Shaw, p. 212). (2.) Another explanation presents itself in considering the room where the company were assembled as the συναγωγή, and the roof opened for the bed to be the true roof of the house (Trench, Miracles, p. 199; Lane, M. E. Eg. i. 39). (3.) And one still more simple is found in regarding the house as one of the rude dwellings now to be seen near the Sea of Galilee, a mere room 10 or 12 feet high and as many or more square, with no opening except the door. The roof, used as a sleeping-place, is reached by a ladder from the outside, and the bearers of the paralytic, unable to approach the door, would thus have ascended the roof, and having uncovered it (ἀνακαλύπτειν), let him down into the room where our Lord was (Malan, l. c.).

The stairs to the upper apartments or to the roof are often shaded by vines or creeping plants, and the courts, especially the inner ones, planted with trees. The court has often a well or tank in it (Ps. cxxviii. 3; 2 Sam. xvii. 18; Russell, Aleppo, the other, if at all, by only a low parapet) which was over the room into which they let down the bed before Jesus, through the tiles, broken up for that purpose. Stairs on the outside of houses are almost unknown in Palestine at present, and would only expose the inmates to violence and pilage. The healing of the paralytic took place at Capernaum (Mark ii. 2), where the houses might be expected to be thus contiguous to each other. Thomson informs us (Land and Book, ii. 6. ff.) how the ordinary Arab houses are constructed in the East.

b * Another view may be stated. Those who brought the paralytic, finding it impossible to reach the Saviour in the room where he was teaching (see especially Mark ii. 2), may have hardened at once to the court of an adjacent house. Taking advantage there of the stairs leading up thence to the roof of that next house, they could have crossed to the roof (separated from the other, if at all, by only a low parapet) which was over the room into which they let down the bed before Jesus, through the tiles, broken up for that purpose. Stairs on the outside of houses are almost unknown in Palestine at present, and would only expose the inmates to violence and pilage. The healing of the paralytic took place at Capernaum (Mark ii. 2), where the houses might be expected to be thus contiguous to each other. Thomson informs us (Land and Book, ii. 6. ff.) how the ordinary Arab houses are constructed in the East.
The "guest-chamber" (προσωπον: κατοικία) was often the 'inner chamber' (7ερώτημα: κατοικία) of the Persian monarch (τάλαμος: διαμετεχόν: δωμάτιον: κατοικία) noticed in the book of Esther (iii. 3). When there is an upper story, the k'lah forms the most important apartment, and thus probably answers to the ἐπέραφον, which was often the "house-chamber" (Luke xxii. 12 [Ἀλεξάνδρα]: Acts i. 13, ix. 37, xx. 8; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 154). The windows of the upper rooms often project one or two feet, and form a kiosk or latticed chamber, the ceilings of which are elaborately ornamented (Lane, i. 27; Russell, i. 102; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 190). Such may have been the "chamber on the wall" (11ερώτημα: κατοικία). The prophets' chamber at Shunem, 2 K. iv. 10 ("on the wall," A. V., but probably = wall-chamber, i. e., one surrounded with a wall, duly finished), was not doubt the modern 'Aliyeh (the Hebrew word is the same). It is the most desirable part of the establishment, is best fitted up, and is still given to guests who are to be treated with honor (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 235). This is the same also of Elijah's room ("loft," A. V.) at Sa- repta (1 K. xvii. 19).
Before quitting the interior of the house we may observe that, on the diwân, the corner is the place of honor, which is never quitted by the master of the house in receiving strangers (Russell, i. 27; Winer). The roofs of eastern houses are, as has been said, mostly flat, though there are sometimes domes over some of the rooms. The flat portions are plastered with a composition of mortar, tar, ashes, and sand, which in time becomes very hard, but when not laid on at the proper season is apt to crack in winter, and the rain is thus admitted. In order to prevent this, every roof is provided with a roller, which is set at work after rain. In many cases the terrace roof is little better than earth rolled hard. On ill-completed roofs grass is often found springing into a short-lived existence (Prov. xix. 13, xxvii. 15; Ps. cxxix. 6, 7; Is. xxxvii. 27; Shaw, p. 210; Lane, i. 27; Robinson, iii. 39, 44, 60).

In no point do oriental domestic habits differ more from European than in the use of the roof. Its flat surface is made useful for various household purposes, as drying corn, hanging up linen, and preparing figs and raisins (Shaw, p. 211; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 191). The roofs are used as places of recreation in the evening, and often as sleeping-places at night (2 Sam. xi. 2, xvi. 22; Dan. iv. 23; 1 Sam. ix. 25, 26; Job xvi. 18; Prov. xxi. 9; Shaw, p. 211; Russell, i. 55; Chardin, iv. 116; Layard, Nineveh, i. 177). They were also used as places for devotion, and even holydays worship (Jer. xxvii. 19, xlix. 13; 2 K. xii. 12; Zeph. i. 5; Acts x. 9). At the time of the Feast of Tabernacles booths were erected by the Jews on the tops of their houses, as in the present day huts of boughs are sometimes erected on the housetops as sleeping-places, or places of retirement from the heat in summer time ( Neh. viii. 16; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 280). As among the Jews the seclusion of women was not carried to the extent of Mohammedan usage, it is probable that the housetop was made, as it is among Christian inhabitants, more a place of public meeting both for men and women, than is the case among Mohammedans, who carefully secure their roofs from inspection by partitions (Burckhardt, Tmr, i. 191; comp. Wilkinson, i. 23). The Christians at Aleppo, in Russell's time, lived contiguously, and made their housetops a means of mutual communication to avoid passing through the streets in time of plague (Russell, i. 55). In the same manner the housetop might be made a means of escape by the stairs [i.e. from the roof into the court] by which it was reached without entering any of the apartments of the house (Matt. xxiv. 17, x. 27; Luke xii. 33).

Both Jews and heathens were in the habit of walling publicly on the housetops (Is. xv. 3, xxvii. 1; Jer. xviii. 28). Protection of the roof by parapets was enjoined by the Law (Deut. xxvii. 8). The parapets thus constructed, of which the types may be seen in ancient Egyptian houses, were sometimes of open work, and it is to a fall through, or over one of these that the injury by which Ahaziah suffered is sometimes ascribed (Shaw, p. 211). To pass over roofs for plundering purposes, as well as for safety, would be no difficult matter (Joel ii. 9). In ancient Egyptian and also in Assyrian houses a sort of raised story was sometimes built above the roof in the form of an open gallery, roofed or covered with awning, was sometimes erected on the housetop (Wilkinson, i. 9; Layard, Mon. of Nin. ii. pl. 49, 50). There are usually no fire-places, except in the kitchen, the furniture of which consists of a sort of raised platform of brick with receptacles in it for fire, answering to the "boiling places" (מִּתיָבָא, cultane) of Ezekiel (xvii. 33; Lane, i. 41; Ges. p. 249).

Special apartments were devoted in larger houses to winter and summer uses (Jer. xxxvii. 22; Am. iii. 19; Chardin, iv. 119). The ivory house of Ahab was probably a palace largely ornamented with inlaid ivory. [PALACE.]

The circumstance of Samson's pulling down the house by means of the pillars, may be explained by the fact of the company being assembled on tiers of balconies above each other, supported by central pillars on the basement; when these were pulled down the whole of the upper floors would fall also (Judg. xvi. 29; Shaw, p. 211).

Houses for jewels and armor were built and furnished under the kings (2 K. x. 15). The draughtsman (טָהוֹרָה, λυσκόν, litrare) was doubtless a public latrine, such as exists in modern eastern cities (2 K. x. 27; Russell, i. 34).}

The house in the house was probably a nitrous efflorescence on the walls, which was injurious to the salubrity of the house, and whose removal was therefore strictly enjoined by the Law (Lev. xiv. 34, 55; Kitto, Phys. Geog. of Pal. p. 112; Winer, s. v. Ηαυσερ).

The word טָהוֹר is prefixed to words constituting a local name, as Bethany, Beth-horon, etc. In modern names it is represented by Beit, as Beitlaham. [H. W. P.]

*HOUSEHOLDER. [GOODMAN.]

*HOUSE OF GOD. This expression occurs in Judg. xx. 18 (A. V.), where no doubt טָהוֹר, instead of being translated, should be retained as a proper name, i.e. Bethel; so also, ver. 26 and xii. 2. Bethel on the confines of Judah and Benjamin is the place there meant. The Ark of the Covenant having been brought to Bethel from Shiloh just at that time, for the purpose (it may be) of more convenient access, the other tribes went up thither to "ask counsel" of Jehovah in regard to the war on which they were about to enter against the Benjamites. The Ark of the Covenant is found again not long after this in its proper sanctuary at Shiloh (1 Sam. i. 3). That in Judg. xx. 18 Bethel denotes the place where the Ark was then, and not the Ark itself as called "the house of God," is evident from Judg. xx. 27, where the narrative distinguishes the two from each other, and recognizes Samuel and Saul had a conversation or private interview on the roof? But it appears from the Hebrew (ver. 29) that Saul, at least, slept there during the following night; for early the next morning Samuel called to him on the roof to arise and resume his journey. [H.}
HUKKOK

The presence of the Ark at Bethel as the result of a special emergency.

HUKKOK (הוקוק) [Inscion, rock-ex cavation, Dietr.; dich, Fürst]; Ἰακαρα; Aex. Ἰακαρ; Ἰακορ, a place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34), named next to Anoth-Tabor. It is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. iv. 15), but in such a manner as to show that they knew nothing of it but from the Text. By hap-haparchi in 1323, and in our own times by Wolcott and by Robinson, Hukkok has been recovered in Yikok, a village in the mountains of Naphtali, west of the upper end of the Sea of Galilee, about 7 miles S. S. W. of Safed, and at the head of Wady-el-Amud. An ancient Jewish tradition locates here the tomb of Halakuk (Zunz, in B. Tudeh, ii. 421; Schwarz, p. 182; Robinson, iii. 81, 82).

HUKKOK (הוקוק) [verb. established, et engraced]; Ἰακαρα; [Vat. Ἰακαρ]; Alex. Ἰακαρ; [Comp. Ald. Ἰακαρ]; Ἰακορ, a name which in 1 Chr. vii. 15 is substituted for HELKAK in the parallel list of the Gershonite cities in Asier, in Josh. xxi.

HUL (הול) [circle, region, Fürst]; Ὢουα; [in I Chr., Rom. Vat. omit, Alex. Ὢουα; ὲουα], the second son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 23). The geographical position of the people whom he represents is not well decided. Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 4) and Jerome fix it in Armenia; Schultes (Parad. p. 262) on etymological grounds (as though the name = הול, sand) proposes the southern part of Mesopotamia; von Bohlen (Intro. to Gen. ii. 249) places it in the neighborhood of Chaldaea. The strongest evidence is in favor of the district about the roots of Lebanon, where the names Arbel-Hilah, a district to the north of Lake Merom; Ola, a town noticed by Josephus (Ant. xv. 10, § 3), between Galile and Trachonitis; Golany, and its modern form Djanjan, bear some affinity to the original name of ὦουα, or, as it should rather be written, Chul.

HULDAH (הולדת) [woman, Fürst]; Ὢολδα; [Heb. ὲολδα]; a prophetess, whose husband Shallum was keeper of the wardrobe in the house of king Josiah, and who dwelt in the suburb (Rosenmüller, ad Zeph. i. 10) of Jerusalem. While Jeremiah was still at Anathoth, a young man unknown to fame, Huldah was the most distinguished person for prophetic gifts in Jerusalem: and it was to her that Josiah had recourse when Hilkhah found a book of the Law, to procure an authoritative opinion on it (2 K. xiv. 14; 2 Chr. xxiv. 20).

W. T. B.

HUMTAH (המותה) [place of lizards, Ges.; fortress, Fürst]; Ἐκάδη; Alex. Χαμάτα; Ἀθμάθα, a city of Judah, one of those in the mountain-district, the next to Hebron (Josh. xx. 54). It is not known to Eusebius and Jerome (see Onomasticon. "Ammatha"), nor has it since been identified. There is some resemblance between the name and that of Kimoth (קימות), one of the places added in the Vat. LXX. to the list in the Hebrew text of 1 Sam. xxx. 27-31.

nation of dangerous beasts, or for procuring sustenance, betokens a rude and semi-civilized state; as an amusement, it betokens an advanced state. In the former, personal prowess and physical strength are the qualities which elevate a man above his fellows and fit him for dominion, and hence one of the greatest heroes of antiquity is described as a "mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. x. 9), while Ishmael, the progenitor of a wild race, was famed as an archer (Gen. xxii. 20), and Esau, hunting in a similar way, was called "a cunning hunter, a man of the field" (Gen. xxvi. 27). The latter state may be exemplified, not indeed from Scripture itself, but from contemporary records. Among the accomplishments of Herod, his skill in the chase is particularly noticed; he kept a regular stud and a huntsman (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 10, § 8), followed up the sport in a wild country (Ant. xv. 7, § 7) which abounded with stags, wild asses, and bears, and is said to have killed as many as forty heads in a day (B. J. i. 21, § 13). The wealthy in Egypt and Assyria followed the sports of the field with great zest; they had their preserves for the express purpose of preserving and hunting game (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. i. 215; Xen. Cyrop. i. 4, §§ 5, 14), and drew from hunting scenes subjects for decorating the walls of their buildings, and even the roles they wore on state occasions.

The Hebrews, as a pastoral and agricultural people, were not given to the sports of the field; the density of the population, the earnestness of their character, and the tendency of their ritual regulations, particularly those affecting food, all combined to discourage the practice of hunting; and perhaps the examples of Ishmael and Esau were recorded with the same object. There was no lack of game in Palestine; on their entrance into the land, the wild beasts were so numerous as to be dangerous (Ex. xxii. 29); the utter destruction of them was guarded against by the provisions of the Mosaic law (Ex. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 7). Some of the fiercer animals survived to a late period, as lions (Judg. xiv. 5; 1 Sam. xvii. 34; 2 Sam. xxiii. 29; 2 K. xii. 24, xx. 36), and bears (1 Sam. xvi. 34; 2 K. ii. 24); jackals (Judg. xiv. 4) and foxes (Cant. ii. 15) were also numerous; hart, roebuck, and fallow deer (Deut. xii. 15; 1 K. iv. 25) formed a regular course of sustenance, and were always preserved in inclosures. The manner of catching these animals was either by digging a pitfall (מעבידים), which was the usual manner with the larger animals, as the lion (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ex. xix. 4, 8); or secondly by a trap (מנחת), which was set under ground (Job xviii. 10), in the run of the animal (Prov. xxii. 5), and caught it by the leg (Job xviii. 9); or lastly by the use of the net, of which there were various kinds, as for the gazelle (?) (Is. lii. 20, A. V. "wild bull"), and other animals of that class. [Nfr.] The method in which the net was applied is familiar to us from the description of the lion (Ex. xii. 21, 15) ff. [x. 797 ff.]; it was placed across a ravine or narrow valley, frequented by the animals for the sake of water, and the game was driven in by the hunters and then dispatched either with bow and arrow, or spears (comp. Wilkinson, i. 214). The game selected was generally such as was adapted for food (Prov. xlii. 27), and care was taken to pour out the blood of these as well as of tame animals (Lev. xvii 13).
Birds formed an article of food among the Hebrews (Lev. xvii. 13), and much skill was exercised in catching them. The following were the most approved methods. (1.) The trap (אַס), which consisted of two parts, a net, strung over a frame, and a stick to support it, but it is said that it should give way at the slightest touch; the stick or springe was termed צֵלָה (Am. iii. 5, "gim:"
Ps. lxxv. 22, "trap"); this was the most usual method (Job xviii. 9; Eccl. ix. 12; Prov. vii. 23).
(2.) The snare (אַסּ), from צֵלָה, to bind; Job xviii. 9, A. V. "robbere), consisting of a cord (אַסּ), Job xviii. 10; comp. Ps. xvii. 5, exvi. 3, exv. 5), so set as to catch the bird by the leg. (3.) The net, which probably resembled those used in Egypt, consisting of two sides or frames, over which network was strung, and so arranged that they could be closed by means of a cord: the Hebrew names are various. [VERN.] (4.) The decoy, to which reference is made in Jer. v. 29, 27 — a cage of a peculiar construction (בֵּית עַיָּן) — was filled with birds, which acted as decoys; the door of the cage was kept open by a piece of stick acting as a spring (אַסּ), and closed suddenly with a clap (whence perhaps the term clab) on the entrance of a bird. The partridge appears to have been used as a decoy (Ecclus. xi. 36).

HUPHAM [וכָּנָב] (protector, Furst; constainhabitant, Ges.): LXX. omit in both MSS.; Comp. ὁφαύα: Hupham), a son of Benjamin, founder of the family (Mishpechah) of the HUPHAMITES (Num. xxvi. 39). In the lists of Gen. xvii, and 1 Chr. vii. the name is given as HUP'PHAM, which see.

HUPHAMITES, THE (וכָּנַת מֵי): om. in LXX.; [Comp. ὁφαύα: ὑπαμηνίτες]. Descendants of HUPHAM of the tribe of Benjamin (Num. xxvi. 39). W. A. W.

HUP'PAH (וכָּנַת) [covering, vielding]: ὁφαύα; [Vat. ὑφαύαι Παλαθοτον]: Alex. ὁφαύα (Hupphan), a priest in the time of David, to whom was committed the charge of the 13th of the 24 courses in the service of the house of God (1 Chr. xxiv. 13).

HUP'PM (וכָּנַת) [protection, screen, Furst, Ges.]: Gen. xvi. 21; 1 Chr. vii. 12; in Gen., omitted in LXX. [Rom. Vat.], but Col. Alex. has ὁφαύα; in 1 Chr. vii. 12, ἀφιπ: [Vat. ὁφιπ], and in Col. Alex. ἀπειροι: [ver. 15, Vat. ἀπειροι, Alex. ἀπειροί]: the former is the correct form, if, as we read in Num. xxvi. 39, the name was Hupham: ὁπαν, [Ὑπαμην, ὑπαμηνίτες], head of a Benjaminite family. According to the text of the LXX. in Gen., a son of Bela [Bela: Bhecher]: but 1 Chr. vii. 12 tells us that he was son of Ir, or Iri (ver. 7), who was one of the five sons of Bela. According to Num. xxvi. 4, the Huphamites were one of the original families of the tribe of Benjamin. The sister of Hupham married into the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. vii. 15). A. C. II.

HUR (ֶבֶץ) [hole, hence a prison]: Hur. 1. [ipher: Joseph, ἦρας.] A man who is mentioned with Moses and Aaron on the occasion of the battle with Amalek at Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 10), when with Aaron he stayed up the hands of Moses (19). He is mentioned again in xxi. 14, as being, with Aaron, left in charge of the people by Moses during his ascent of Sinai. It would appear from this that he must have been a person connected with the family of Moses and of some weight in the camp. The latter would follow from the former. The Jewish tradition, as preserved by Josephus (Ant. iii. 2, § 4), is that he was the husband of Miriam, and (iii. 6, § 1) the name of his identically with —

2. (4πνόμον.) The grandfather of Bezalel, the chief artist of the tabernacle — "son of Uri, son of Hur — of the tribe of Judah" (Ex. xxxvi. 2, xxvii. 30, xxxviii. 22), the full genealogy being given on each occasion (see also 2 Chr. i. 5). In the lists of the descendants of Judah in 1 Chr. the pedigree is more fully preserved. Hur there appears as one of the great family of Pahre. He was the son of Caleb ben-Hezron, by a second wife, Ephrath (ii. 10, 20; comp. 5, also iv. 1), the first fruit of the marriage (ii. 50, iv. 4), and the father, besides Uri (ver. 20), of three sons, who founded the towns of Kirjath-jearim, Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader (51). Hur’s connection with Beth-lehem would seem to have been of a closer nature than with the others of these places, for he himself is emphatically called "Abi-Bethlehem" — the "father of Bethlehem" (iv. 4). Certainly Beth-lehem enjoyed, down to a very late period, a traditional reputation for the arts which distinguished his illustrious grandson. Jesse, the father of David, is said to have been a weaver of the vails of the sanctuary (Targ. Jonathan, 2 Sam. xxi. 19), and the dyers were still lingering there when Benjamin of Tudela visited Bethlem in the 13th century.

In the Tarqum on 1 Chr. ii. 19 and iv. 4, Ephrath is taken as identical with Miriam: but this would be to contradict the more trustworthy tradition given above from Josephus.

In his comments on 1 Chr. iv. 1 (Quest. Hebr. in Paralip.), Jerome overlooks the fact that the five persons there named as "sons" of Judah are really members of successive generations: and he attempts, as his manner is, to show that each of them is identical with one of the immediate sons of the patriarch. Hur he makes to be another name for Cuan.

3. (OHP: Joseph, ὁφρατος.) The fourth of the five "kings" (והוה: LXX. and Joseph. Ant. iv. 7, § 1, Βασιλεύς) of Midian, who were slain with Baham after the "matter of Peor" (Num. xxxi. 8). In a later mention of them (Josh. xiii. 21) they are called "princes" (והוה: הָנָבָה) of Midian and "dukes" (והוה: הָנָבָה, not the word commonly rendered "duke"). But probably with the force of dependence, see Keil ad loc.: LXX. (ἐπάρχα) of Sihon king of the Amorites, who was killed at the same time with them. No further light can be obtained as to Hur.

4. (Ὅψις: [Vat. Alex. FA. omit.]) Father of Rephaim, who was ruler of half of the environs (והוה: Α. V. "part") of Jerusalem, and assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall (Neh. iii. 9).

5. The "son of Hur" — Ben-Chur — was commander over Solomon in Mount Ephraim (1 K. iv. 8). The LXX. (both MSS. [rather, Rom. and Alex.]) give the word Ben both in its original and its translated form (βῆς — Alex. βῆς — ὑπνόμον: [Vat. Alex. Λαμπόρι for B. vi. ὑπνόμον] Comp. Ail
HURAI (Hurai), a not infrequent custom with them. Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 3) has Ὑραι as the name of the officer himself. The Vulg. (Beherur) follows the Hebrew, and is in turn followed in the margin of the A. V. It is remarkable that the same form is observed in giving the names of no less than twelve officers in this list.

HURAI [Syr. Syri., and throughout the LXX. decision, elsewhere (see note § 12, ix. 2, 39), of David’s guard—Hurai of the torrent of Gassus—according to the list of 1 Chr. xii. 32. In the parallel catalogue of 2 Sam. xxiii. the R is changed to D, as is frequently the case, and the name stands as HIRAI. Kemissott has examined the discrepancy, and, influenced by the readings of some of the MSS. of the LXX., decides in favor of Hurai as the genuine name (Disert. p. 194).

HURAM (Huram) [noble-born]: Ὑράμα; [Vat. ΝΑΣ]: Ηρώνον. 1. A Benjamite; son of Dila, the first-born of the patriarch (1 Chr. viii. 5).

2. The form in which the name of the king of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon—and elsewhere given as Hiram—appears in Chronicles. (a.) At the time of David’s establishment at Jerusalem (1 Chr. xiv. 1). In the A. V. the name is Hiram, in accordance with the Cetib or original Hebrew text (جريدة); but in the marginal correction of the Masorets (Keri) it is altered to Huram (جريدة), the form which is maintained in all its other occurrences in these books. The LXX. Ὑράμα [ΦΑ. Ὑράμα], Vulg. Hiram, and Targum, all agree with the Cetib. (b.) At the accession of Solomon (2 Chr. ii. 3, 11, 12, viii. 2, 18, ix. 10, 21: in each of these cases also the LXX. have Ὑράμα [Vat. and] Alex. Ὑράμα, Vulg. Hiram).

3. The same change occurs in Chronicles in the name of Hiram the antorich, which is given as Huram in the following places: 2 Chr. ii. 13, 14, 16. In the first and last of these a singular title is given him—the word Ab, “father”—“Huram my father,”* a and “Huram his father.” No doubt this denotes the respect and esteem in which he was held, according to the similar custom of the people of the East at the present day.* There also the LXX. [Rom. Ὑραμά, Vat. and Alex. Ὑράμα] and Vulgate follow the form Huram.

HURI (جريدة) [GREECE]: [Oipi, Vat. Οὐπή]: Ἡρᾶς, a Gadite; father of Abihail, a chief man in that tribe (1 Chr. v. 14).

HUSBAND. [MARRIAGE.]

HUSHAH (意识形态 [grotes]: Ἰρᾶδα [Comp. Οἰρᾶ]: [Ald. Ἰρᾶδα: Ἡρᾶς], a name which occurs in the genealogies of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 4)—“Ezer, father of Huram.” It may well be the name of a place, like Ezem, Gedor, Beth-lehem, and others, in the preceding and succeeding verses;

but we have no means of ascertaining the fact, since it occurs nowhere else. For a patronymic possibly derived from this name see HUSHATHITE.

HUSHAI [Syr. Syri., and throughout the LXX. decision, elsewhere (see note § 12, ix. 2, 39), of David’s guard—Hurai of the torrent of Gassus—according to the list of 1 Chr. xii. 32. He is called the “friend” of David (2 Sam. xv. 37; in 1 Chr. xxvii. 33, the word is rendered “companion;” comp. Josephus. Ant. vii. 9, § 2: the LXX. has a strange confusion of Archite and Ἰρᾶδα [the chief friend]. To him David confided the delicate and dangerous part of a pre-tended adherence to the cause of Absalom. His advice was preferred to that of Ahithophel, and speedily brought to pass the ruin which it meditated.

We are doublet correct in assuming that the Hushai, whose son Eutma was one of Solomon’s commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 19), was the famous counsellor of his father. Hushai himself was probably no longer living; at any rate his office was filled by another (comp. ver. 5). [ARCHITE.]

HUSHAM (意识形态 in Chron.意识形态 in Chron.意识形态 [hosting, swj]): [Aṣhā: one in 1 Chr.]. Aṣhā, and so Alex. in Gen.: Hushan, one of the kings of Edom, before the institution of monarchy in Israel (Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35; 1 Chr. i. 45, 46). He is described as “Hushan of the land of the Temanite;” and he succeeded Jobah, who was taken by the LXX. in their addition to the Book of Job as identical with that patriarch.

HUSHATHITE, THE (意识形态, and twice in Chron.意识形态 [patr. from意识形态, see above]: Ἰρᾶδα, Ἰρᾶδα, Ἰρᾶδα, etc. [comp. de Hushani, Hushathites], the designation of two of the heroes of David’s guard. 1. SIBBECHAI (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 20, xx. 4, xxvii. 11). In the last of these passages he is said to have belonged to the Zarthites, that is (probably) the descendants of Zerah of the tribe of Judah. So far this is in accordance with a connection between this and HUSHAH, a name, apparently of a place, in the genealogies of Judah. Josephus, however (Ant. vii. 12, § 2), mentions Sibbechah as a Hitzite.

2. [Ἀρωθίτα: Vat. - παρ: Alex. Ἀρωθίτας: de Hushani.] HIRUNAI (2 Sam. xxiii. 27). There seems no doubt that this name is a mere corruption of Sibbechah.

HUSHIM (意识形态 in [the hosting, Fürst: hosts: pr. Ges.]. Aṣhā: Hushim). 1. In Gen. xlv. 23, “the children [sons] (意识形态 of Dan)” are said to have been Hushim. The name is plural, as if of a tribe rather than an individual, which perhaps is sufficient to account for the use of the plural c in “children.” In the list of Num. xxvi. the name is changed to Shuham.

* The A. V. of 2 Chr. ii. 13 renders the words "of duram my father," meaning the late king; but this is unnecessary, and the Hebrew will well bear the rendering given above.

* Analogous to this, though not exactly similar, is Joseph’s expression (Gen. xiv. 8), “God hath made me a father unto Pharaoh.” Compare also 1 Macc. xi. 52; where note the use of the two terms “cousin” and “brother.”
tions of the recognition of Joseph, and of Jacob's burial at Hebron. See the quotations from the Midrash in Weil's Bib. Legends, p. 88 note, and the Targum Pseudojon. on Gen. l. 13. In the latter he is the executioner of Esau.

2. ἴδιος (G. Chushrin; ἴδιοι; Alex. ἴδιοι; Ḥusam), a member of the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 12); and here again apparently (as the text now stands) the plural nature of the name is recognized, and Hushim is stated to be "the sons of (Ben) of Abur." (See Bertheau in Ezey. Handb. ad loc.)

3. Ἰδιαῖος, and ἴδιος: Χαρίον: [Vat. Χαριόν, Χαριῶν.] Alex. Χαρίον: ἴδιοι, but in ver. 11

Michaliam, by inclusion of the Hebrew particle.) The name occurs again in the genealogy of Benjamin, but there as that of one of the two wives of Shaharaim (1 Chr. viii. 8), and the mother of two of his sons (11). In this case the plural significance of the name is not alluded to.

HUSKS. The word κεφάτια, which our nameSt. John's Bread, from a tradition that the Baptist lived upon its fruit in the wilderness.

* The carol-tree is very common also in the Greek islands, and its fruit is still in great request

there as a nutritious article for fattening swine.

It may be seen exposed for sale in the markets at Syracuse and Athens. The writer has seen it as far north as Trieste, on the Gulf of Venice. The pot, though considerably larger, resembles very much that of our common locust-tree. It contains a sweetish pulp when tender, but soon becomes dry and hard, with small seeds, which rattle in the pot when shaken. It emits a slight odor when first gathered, not a little offensive to those unacustomed to it.

The occasional use of this product for food (see above) is not at variance with the parable. It is not said there that the prodigal resorted to food caten only by swine; but that in his want, now having no friend to give him anything better, he was glad to share ἑκατέρους γεμίσα τοις "the husks" which the swine were eating, which he was sent into the fields to watch. Yet the expression here (και οὐδεὶς οὐδιόν αὐτῷ) some understand differently, namely, that no one gave the prodigal even so much as any of the husks; and if he obtained them, it was without permission and by stealth. This is Meyer's view (Lukas, p. 450, 4te Aufl.), and it appears to be that of Luther. The Greek does not require this interpretation; for the clause cited above (added in the Hebrew way by και = οὐ) may assign a reason why

(there being no other alternative) the prodigal must eat the husks to save himself from starvation. The ellipse of ἔτη after διαδόμου is very common (Matt. xix. 21, xxv. 8; Mark

vi. 37; Luke vi. 30, &c.). In the other case we supply κεφάτια as the object. II.

according to the general opinion of the Jews

(Buxtorf's Leizum ad voc. בֵּצָב), was the queen of Nineveh at the time when Nahum delivered his prophecy. This view appears to be followed in our version (Nah. ii. 10, and it has been recently defended by Ewald

Most modern expositors, however, incline to the belief that Huzzab here is not a proper name at all, but the Hophal of the verb בָּצָב (see Buxfor, as above; Gesenius, L. E. p. 903), and this is allowed as possible by the alternative rendering in the margin of our English Bible — "that which was established." Still there are difficulties in the way of such an understanding of the passage, and it is not improbable that after all Huzzab may really be a proper name. That a Ninevite queen otherwise unknown should suddenly be mentioned, is indeed exceedingly unlikely; for we cannot grant to Ewald that "the Ninevite queens were well nigh as powerful as the kings." But there is no reason why the word should not be a geographic term, or an equivalent or representative of Assyria, which the prophet HYÆNA

INTENDS TO THREATEN WITH CAPTIVITY. Huzzob may mean "the Zob country," or the fertile tract east of the Tigris, watered by the upper and lower Zob rivers (Zob Aka and Zob Asfiti), the A-dibb-êne of the geographers. This province — the most valuable part of Assyria — might well stand for Assyria itself, with which it is identified by Pliny ("H. N." xvi. 12) and Ammianus (xxiii. 6). The name Zob, as applied to the rivers, is certainly very ancient, being found in the great inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I., which belongs to the middle of the twelfth century A.C.

HYÆNA. Authorities are at variance as to whether the term tâdbâ'â ( httpRequest.error: '403' ) in Jer. xii. 9 means a "hyena," as the LXX. has it, or a "speckled bird," as in the A. V.

The etymological force of the word is equally adapted to either, the hyena being strowed. The only other instance in which it occurs is as a proper name, Zeloin (1 Sam. xiii. 18), "the valley of hyenas," Aquila; Neh. xi. 34). The Talmudical writers describe the hyena by no less than four names, of which tâdbâ'a is one (Jellouz, s.v. "Hymenêus.") The opinion of Bochart ("Hier. B." 163) and Gesenius ("Thes.", p. 1149) are in favor of the same view; nor could any room for doubt remain, were it not for the word alâbâ'â (אֶלֶבָâ'â ; A. V. "bird") connected with it, which in all other passages refers to a bird. The hyena was common in ancient as in modern Egypt, and is constantly depicted on monuments (Wilkinson, i. 213, 225): it must therefore have been well known to the Jews, if indeed not equally common in Palestine. The sense of the passage in Jeremiah implies a fierce strong beast, not far below the lion in the parallel passage (v. 8); the hyena fully answers to this description. Though cowardly in his nature, he is very savage when once he accords, and the strength of his jaws is such that he can crush the thigh-bone of an ox (Livingstone's "Travels," p. 600). [Zeloin.] W. - The etymological affinity of the Arabic عينought to decide that the animal intended is the hyena. This animal is common in Palestine and Syria.

HYDASPES (θαδσάς [Jadson]), a river noticed in Jud. i. 6, in connection with the Euphrates and Tigris. It is uncertain what river is referred to; the well-known Hydaspes of India (the Jelua of the Parthia) is too remote to accord with the other localities noticed in the context. We may perhaps identify it with the Choasap of Susiana.

HYMENÆUS [A. V. Hymeneus] (Ὑμηνεὺς), the name of a person occurring twice in the correspondence between St. Paul and Timothy; the first time classed with Alexander, and with him "delivered to Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme" (1 Tim. i. 20); and the second time classed with Philetus, and with him charged with having "erred concerning the truth, saying that the resurrection is past already," and thereby "overturned the faith of some" (1 Tim. iv. 17, 18). These latter expressions, coupled with "the shipwreck of faith" attributed to Hymenaeus in the context of the former passage (ver. 19), surely warrant our understanding both passages of the same person, notwithstanding the interval between the dates of the two letters. When the first was written he had already made one prostrate: before the second was penned he had seduced another: and if he could point further to be disbelieved, the error attributed to him, and the sentence imposed upon him.

1. The error attributed to him was one that had been in part appropriated from others, and has frequently been revived since with additions. What initiation was to the Pythagoreans, wisdom to the Stoics, science to the followers of Plato, contemplation to the Peripatetics, that "knowledge" (γνῶσις) was to the Gnostics. As there were likewise in the Greek schools those who looked forward to a complete restoration of all things (ἀποκατάστασις, v. Heyne ad "Vulg. Ed." iv. 5, comp. "Jn. vi. 735"; so there was "a regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5; Matt. xix. 28), "a new creation" (2 Cor. iv. 17), see Allford, "Ad loc."); Rev. xxi. 1), "a kingdom of heaven and of Messiah or Christ" (Matt. xiii.; Rev. vii.) — and because the popular letter of heathen anti-Jews was unequivocally pronounced in the N.T.; but here with this remarkable difference, namely, that in a great measure, it was present as well as future — the same thing in germ that was to be had in perfection eventually. "The kingdom of God is within you," said our Lord (Luke xix. 21). "He that is spiritual judgeth all things," said St. Paul (1 Cor. ii. 13). "He that is born of God cannot sin," said St. John (1 John i. 8). There are likewise two deaths and two resurrections spoken of in the N. T.: the first of each sort, that of the soul to and from sin (John iii. 3-5); "the hour which now is" (ibid. v. 24, 25), on which see Aug. De Cive Dei, xx. 6); the second, that of the body to and from corruption (1 Cor. xv. 36-44; also John v. 28, 29), which last is prospective. Now as the doctrine of the resurrection of the body was found to involve immense difficulties even in those early days (Acts and 1 Cor. xv. 35), how keenly and how earnestly they were pressed may be seen in St. Aug. De Cive Dei, xxii. 12 ff. ; while, on the other hand, there was so great a predisposition in the then current philosophy (not even extinct now) to magnify the excellence of the soul above that of its earthly tabernacle, it was at once the easier and more attractive course to insist upon and argue from the force of those passages of Holy Scripture which enliven upon the glories of the spiritual life that now is, under Christ, and to pass over or explain away allegorically all that refers to a future state in connection with the resurrection of the body. In this manner we may derive the first errors of the Gnostics, of whom Hymenaeus was one of the earliest. They were on the spread when St. John wrote; and his grand-disciple, St. Irenaeus, compiled a voluminous work against them ("Adv. Hær."). A good account of their full development is given by Gieseler, "E. H.," pcri. i. div. i. § 41 ff.

II. As regards the sentence passed upon him — it has been asserted by some writers of eminence (see Corn. a Lapide ad 1 Cor. v. 5), that the "delivering to Satan" is a mere synonym for ecclesiastical excommunication. Such can hardly be the case. The Apostles possessed many extraordinary prerogatives, which none have since arrogated to themselves, that they have set apart to them ever since. The shaking off the dust of their feet against a city that would not HYMENÆUS receive them (St. Matt. x. 14), even though the same injunction was afterwards given to the Seventy (St. Luke x. 11), and which St. Paul found it necessary to act upon twice in the course of his ministry (Acts xii. 51, and xviii. 6), has never been a practice since with Christian ministers. "Anathema," says Bingham, "is a word that occurs frequently in the ancient canon" (Antiq. xvi. 2, 16), but the form "Anathema Maranatha" is one that none have ever understood upon since St. Paul (1 Cor. xvi. 22). As the Apostles healed all manner of bodily infirmities, so they seem to have possessed and exercised the same power in inditing them—a power for so pious a being to be continued when the manifold exigencies of the Apostolic age had passed away. Ananias and Sapphira both fell down dead at the rebuke of St. Peter (Acts v. 5 and 10); two words from the same lips, "Tabitha, arise," sufficed to raise Dorcas from the dead (ibid. ix. 40). St. Paul's first act in entering upon his ministry was to strike Epaphras the sorcerer with blindness, his own sight having been restored to him through the medium of a disciple (ibid. ix. 17, and xiii. 11); while soon afterwards we read of his healing the cripple of Lystra (ibid. xiv. 8). Even apart from actual intervention by the Apostles, bodily visitations are spoken of in the case of those who approached the Lord's Supper unworthily, when as one (Matt. x. 34) had said: "For this cause many are weak and sickly in the body and a very small number (ικανοὶ, in the former case it is εὐκαναλοὶ) sleep" (1 Cor. xi. 30).

On the other hand Satan was held to be the instrument or executioner of all these visitations. Such is the character assigned to him in the book of Job (i. 6-12, ii. 1-7). Similar agencies are described 1 K. xxiii. 19-22, and 1 Chr. xxi. 1. In Ps. lxxix. 49, such are the causes to which the plagues of Egypt are assigned. Even our Lord submitted to be assailed by him more than once (Matt. iv. 1-10: Luke iv. 13 says, "departed from Him for a season"); and "a messenger of Satan was sent to buffet" the very Apostle whose net of delivering another to the same power is now under discussion. At the same time large powers over the world of spirits were gratuitously conveyed by our Lord to His immediate followers (to the Twelve in Acts i. 2), or even to the Seventy, as the results showed, ibid. x. 17-20.

It only remains to notice five particulars connected with its exercise, which the Apostle supplies himself. (1.) That it was no mere prayer, but a solemn authoritative sentence, pronounced in the name and power of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. v. 5-5). (2.) That it was never exercised upon any without the Church: "then the devil Judgeth thee" (John x. 13); he says in express terms. (3.) That it was "for the destruction of the flesh," i. e. some bodily visitation. (4.) That it was for the improvement of the offender: "that his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (ibid. v. 5); and that "he might learn not to blaspheme" while upon earth (1 Tim. i. 29). (5.) That the Apostle could in a given case empower others to pass such sentence in his stead. (Acts xvi. 17), where he says, "I have been with his converts "not even to eat" (1 Cor. v. 11). See an able review of the whole subject by Bingham, Antiq. vi. 2, 15.

HYMN

HYMN. This word is not used in the English version of the O. T., and only twice in the N. T. (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16); though in the original of the latter the derivative verb occurs in three places (Matt. xxvi. 30; comp. Mark xiv. 25; Acts xvi. 25; Heb. ii. 12). The LXX., however, employ it freely in translating the Heb. names for almost every kind of poetical composition (Schleus. Lex. Hymn). In fact the word does not seem to have had for the LXX. any very special meaning; and they called the Heb. book of Tekhillin the book of psalms, not of hymns. Accordingly the word psalm had for the later Jews a definite meaning, while the word hymn was more or less vague in its application, and capable of being used as occasion should arise. If a new poetical form or idea should be produced, the name of hymn, not being embarrassed by a previous determination, was ready to associate itself with the fresh thought of another literature. And this seems to have been actually the case.

Among Christians the Hymn has always been something different from the Psalm; a different conception in thought, a different type in composition. There is some dispute about the origin of its name and its Apostles on the occasion of the Last Supper; but even supposing it to have been the Ἁστελή, or Paschal Hymn, consisting of Pss. exii.-exviii., it is obvious that the word hymn is in this case applied not to an individual psalm, but to a number of psalms chanted successively, and altogether forming a kind of devotional exercise which is not unaptly called a hymn. The prayer in Acts iv. 24-30 is not a hymn, unless we allow non-metrical as well as metrical hymns. It may have been a hymn as it was originally altered; but we can only judge by the Greek translation, and this is without metre, and therefore not properly a hymn. In the jail at Philippi, Paul and Silas "sang hymns" (A. V. "praises") unto God, and so loud was their song that their fellow-prisoners heard them. This must have been what we mean by singing, and not merely recitation. In fact, it is a veritable singing of hymns. And it is remarkable that the noun hymn is only used in reference to the services of the Greeks, and in the same passages is clearly distinguished from the psalm (Eph. v. 19, Col. iii. 16), "psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs."

It is probable that no Greek version of the Psalms, even supposing it to be accommodated to the Greek metres, would make root in the affections of the Gentile convert. It was not only a question of metre, it was a question of tune; and Greek tunes required Greek hymns. So it was in Syria. Richer in tunes than Greece, for Greece had but eight, while Syria had 275 (Benedict. Pref. vol. iv. Op. Eph. Syr.). The Syrian hymnographers revelled in the varied luxury of their native music; and the result was that splendid development of the Hymn, as modelled by the songs of Barlaamenes, Harmonus, and other Syrian Hymnographers. In Greece the eight tunes which seem to have satisfied the exigencies of church-music were probably accommodated to fixed metres, each metre being welded to a particular

"A. V. stands for ἁγιάζωντας πολλοἷς.
Hymn; an arrangement to which we can observe a tendency in the Directions about tunes and measures at the end of our English metrical version of the Psalms. This is also the case in the German hymnology, where certain ancient tunes are recognized as such for the metres of later compositions, and their names are always prefixed to the hymns in common use.

It is worth while inquiring what profound models the Greek hymnographers chose to work after. In the old religion of Greece the word hymn had already acquired a sacred and liturgical meaning, which could not fail to suggest its application to the productions of the Christian muse. So much for this name. The special foots of the Greek hymn were various. The Homeric and Orphic hymns were written in the epic style, and in hexameter verse. Their metre was not adapted for singing; and therefore, though they may have been recited, it is not likely that they were sung at the celebration of the mysteries. We turn to the Panharian hymns, and here we find a sufficient variety of metre, and a definite relation to music. These hymns were sung to the accompaniment of the lyre, and it is very likely that they engaged the attention of the early hymn-writers. The dithyramb, with its development into the dramatic chorus, was sufficiently connected with musical traditions to make its form a fitting vehicle for Christian poetry; and there certainly is a dithyrambic savour about the earliest known Christian hymn, as it appears in Ch. Alex. pp. 512, 313, ed. Potter.

The first impulse of Christian devotion was to run into the moulds ordinarily used by the song-shippers of the old religion. This was more than an impulse, it was a necessity, and a twofold necessity. The new spirit was strong; but it had two limitations: the difficulty of conceiving a new musico-poetical literature; and the quality so peculiar to devotional music, of lingering in the heart after the head has been convinced and the belief changed. The old tunes would be a real necessity to the new life; and the exile from his ancient faith would delight to hear on the foreign soil of a new religion the familiar melodies of home. Dean Trench has indeed labored to show that the reverse was the case, and that the early Christian shrank with horror from the sweet, but polluted, enchantments of his unbelieving state. We can only asent to this in so far as we allow it to be the second phase in the history of hymns. When chl traditions died away, and the Christian acquired not only a new belief, but a new social humanity, it was possible, and it was desirable too, to break forever the attenuated thread that bound him to the ancient world. And so it was broken; and the trochaic and iambic metres, unassessed as they were with heathen worship, though largely associated with the heathen drama, obtained an ascendent in the Christian church. In I Cor. xiv. 26 allusion is made to improvised hymns, which being the outburst of a passionate emotion would probably assume the dithyrambic form. But attempts have been made to detect fragments of ancient hymns conformed to more obvious metres in Epiph. v. 14; Jan. i. 17; Rev. i. 8 ff., xv. 3. These premeditated fragments, however, may with much greater likelihood be referred to the swing of a prose composition unconsciously culminating into metre. It was in the Latin church that the trochaic and iambic metres became most deeply rooted, and acquired the greatest depth of tone and grasp of finish.

As an exponent of Christian feeling they soon surpassed the accentual hexameters; they were used unmononomically against the heathen and the heretics by Commodianus and Augustine. The introduction of hymns into the Latin church is commonly referred to Ambrose. But it is impossible to conceive that the West should have been formed, as the East: similar necessities must have produced similar results: and it is more likely that the tradition is due to the very marked prominence of Ambrose as the greatest of all the Latin hymnographers.

The trochaic and iambic metres, thus impressed into the service of the church, have continued to hold their ground, and are in fact the 7's, S. M., C. M., and L. M. of our modern hymns; many of which are translations, or at any rate imitations, of Latin originals. These metres were peculiarly adapted to the grave and solemn spirit of Latin Christianity. Less ecstatic than the varied chorus of the Greek church, they did not soar upon the pinion of a lofty praise, so much as they drooped and sunk into the depths of a great sorrow. They were subjective rather than objective; they appealed to the heart more than to the understanding: and if they contained less theology, they were fuller of life and emotion. They were characterized by a transcendent grace, a Beele, a slowness; by an aim of grandeur.

HYSSOP (HYSSUS, εὐστίον: ὑσσοῦς). Perhaps no plant mentioned in the Scriptures has given rise to greater differences of opinion than this. The question of the identification of the εὐστίον of the Hebrews with any plant known to modern botanists was thought by Casaubon "necesse sit difficilis ad explanandum, ut videtur Exsaios expectandos, qui certi aliquid non docentibus. But the botanical works of Solomon survived they might have thrown some light upon it. The chief difficulty arises from the fact that in the I. X. the Greek ὑσσοῦς is the uniform rendering of the Hebrew εὐστίον, and that this rendering is endorsed by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 20, 21), when speaking of the ceremonial observances of the Levitical law. Whether, therefore, the LXX. made use of the Greek ὑσσοῦς as the word most nearly resembling the Hebrew in sound, as Stanley suggests (S. of P. 21., note), or as the true representative of the plant indicated by the latter, is a point which, in all probability, will never be decided. Botanists differ widely even with regard to the identification of the ὑσσοῦς of Dioscorides. The name has been given to the Satureia Grave and the S. Juliana, to neither of which it is appropriate, and the hyssop of Italy and South France is now given Dioscorides. But the botanists' description of the plant has been read as approved of by Kuhn (Comm. in Dose. ii. 27), who in the same passage gives it as his opinion that the Hebrews used the Oryctopium Egyptianum in Egypt, the O. Sycorsum in Palestine, and that the hyssop of Dioscorides was the Satureia Grave. The latter describes two kinds of hyssop, ιοφόρον καὶ κηρυφήν, and divides it into the Egyptian equivalent.
HYSSOP

The Talmudists make the same distinction between the wild hyssop and the garden-plant used for food.

The C2b was used to sprinkle the doorposts of the Israelites in Egypt with the blood of the paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 22); it was employed in the purification of leprous persons (Lev. xiv. 4, 51), and in the sacrifice of the red heifer (Num. xix. 6). In consequence of its detergent qualities, or from its being associated with the purificatory services, the Talmudists make use of the expression, "purge me with C2b." (Ps. lii. 7). It is described in I K. iv. 33 as growing on or near walls. In John xix. 29 the phrase Bawo wawalwv (περιβλέπτης) corresponds to περιβλέπτα καλλίμακες in Matt. xxvii. 48 and Mark xv. 39. If therefore περιβλέπτα is the equivalent of περιβλέπτης, the latter must be a plant capable of producing a stick three or four feet in length.

Five kinds of hyssop are mentioned in the Talmud. One is called SNN simply, without any epithet: the others are distinguished as Greek, Roman, wild hyssop, and hyssop of Cochlii (Mishna, Kегайим, xiv. 6). Of these the four last-mentioned were profane, that is, not to be employed in purifications (Mishna, Passah, xi. 7). Maimonides (de Yacca Rof, iii. 2) says that the hyssop mentioned in the law is that which was used as a condiment. According to Porphyry (De Mafin. iv. 7), the Egyptian priests on certain occasions ate their bread mixed with hyssop; and the ομίλιον, or wild marjoram, with which it has been identified, is often an ingredient in a mixture called Είκοκο, which is to this day used as food by the poorer classes in Egypt (Lane, Mod. Egypt, i. 200). It is not improbably, therefore, that this may have been the hyssop of Maimonides, who wrote in Egypt; more especially as R. D. Kimchi (Ex. s. v.) who reckons seven different kinds, gives as the equivalent the Arabic مكراә, zovtcr, origanum, or marjoram, and the German Pesten or Wohldgeneth (Roessn. Handbk.). With this agrees the Tanachum Heber, MS. quoted by Gesenius. So in the Judaeo-Spanish version, Ex. xii. 22 is translated "y tomarádes manao de orégano." But Dioscorides makes a distinction between origanum and hyssop when he describes the leaf of a species of the former as resembling the latter (cf. Pliny, xx. 67). Though it is evident that he, as well as the Talmudists, regarded them as belonging to the same family. In the Syriac of I K. iv. 33 hyssop is rendered by ٍلئَع, lófšah, "house-deck," although in other passages it is represented by لئَن, lófš, which the Arabic translation follows in Ps. li. 7 and Heb. ix. 19, while in the Pentateuch it has zovtcr for the same. Patrick (on I K. iv. 33) was of opinion that C2b is the same with the Ethicic acsb, which represents the hyssop of Ps. li. 7, as well as بسألاυν, or marjoram, in Matt. xxviii. 23.

Becquet decides in favor of marjoram or some plant like it (Hieroc. i. 1. 2. c. 50), and to this conclusion, it must be admitted, all ancient tradition points. The monks on Jebel Musa give the name of hyssop to a fragrant plant called jltäch, which grows in great quantities on that mountain (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i. 157). Celsus (Hierobol. i. 427), after enumerating eighteen different plants, thyme, southerwood, rosemary, frencel, lavender, καλλίκτερ, and the maidenhair fern among others, which have been severally identified with the hyssop of Scripture, concludes that we have no alternative but to accept the Ηςοσσυνον τῆς Αποστολῆς, "nisci velimins apostolorum corrigere qui ro D C2b redit Heb. ix. 19." He avoids the difficulty in John xix. 29 by supposing that the sponge filled with vinegar was wrapped round a large stick, and that the two were then fastened to the end of a stick. Dr. Kitto conceived that he had found the peculiarities of the Hebrew C2b in the Phylo- "καλλικτερ" from the Greek, the fabricalist, and the C2b of 1 K. iv. 33 (Hitzig, Die Sprachw. Semit. i. 2). An elaborate and interesting paper by the late Dr. J. Forbes Boyle, On the Hyssop of Scripture, in the Journ. of the Roy. As. Soc. viii. 193-212, goes far to throw light upon this difficult question. Dr. R., after a careful investigation of the subject, arrived at the conclusion that the hyssop is no other than the caper-plant, or καπρίσσωνια of Iviron. The Arabic name of this plant, ομσίε, may, by a possible misapplication of the name, be identified with the C2b of 1 K. iv. 33, which, whether correctly employed in a mixture called Είκοκο, or wrongly, is made use of. It has been reserved for the ingenuity of a German to trace a connection between ομσίε, the Greek fabulist, and the C2b of 1 K. iv. 33 (Hitzig, Die Sprachw. Semit. i. 2).
the plants with which the tradition of centuries has identified it. That it may have been possessed of some deterrent qualities which led to its significant employment in the purificatory service is possible; but it does not appear from the narrative in Leviticus that its use was such as to call into action any medicinal properties by which it might have been characterized. In the present state of the evidence, therefore, there does not seem sufficient reason for departing from the old interpretation, which identified the Greek \textit{auranos} with the Hebrew \textit{zqms}.

W. A. W.

'1. I design to give reasons, conclusive in my mind, against the supposition that the \textit{Cupressis spinosa} is the hyssop. (1.) It is a thorny plant highly unsuitable to the use intended; \textit{i. e.}, the bough formed into a sort of wisp or brush, or bunch, suitable for sprinkling. Its branches are struggling and quite incapable of assuming the required form, and its harsh thorns would make it impossible to hold it in the hand. Can it be supposed that it was stripped of these to prepare it for use? (2.) It has no affinity with the \textit{sanq}, which is one of the \textit{Labiatce}, and which from its etymological identity with \textit{zqms} is entitled to be considered the plant referred to in the Scriptures.

II. I desire to present the evidence which satisfies my mind that the \textit{Origanum maru} is the plant intended.

(2.) It grows on the \textit{wells} of all the terraces throughout Palestine and Syria.

(3.) It is free from thorns, and its slender stem, free from spreading branches, and ending in a cluster of heads, having a highly aromatic odor, exactly fits it to be made into a bunch

\textit{Origanum maru}. (G. E. Post fac.)

The fact that many stalks grow up from one root sufficiently fit this species for the purpose intended. No plant growing in the East is so well fitted for the purpose. These considerations have long persuaded me that this is the plant intended.

Its leaves are commonly eaten in Syria with bread, and as a seasoning, as we use summer savoury, which it resembles in taste. Its effects on sheep and goats are very salutary.

ICH’ABOD (יִחָאָב֥ד), from נָאָב, "where?", equivalent to the negative, and יִחַֽהֲבוּן, "glory,"

(1.16) and the letters of Cicero (ad Fam. iii. 8, v. 20, xi. 4). When the Roman provincial system was matured, some of the most important roads intersected one another at this point, as may be seen from the map in Leake’s Asia Minor. These circumstances should be borne in mind, when we trace St. Paul’s journeys through the district. Iconium was a well-chosen place for missionary operations. The Apostle’s first visit was on his first circuit, in company with Barnabas; and on this occasion he approached it from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay to the west. From that city he had been driven by the persecution of the Jews (Acts xiii. 50, 51). There were Jews in Iconium also; and St. Paul’s first efforts here, according to his custom, were made in the synagogue (v. 14). The results were considerably both among the Hebrew and Gentile population of the place (Acts). We should notice that the working of miracles in Iconium is emphatically mentioned (v. 3). The intriguers of the Jews again drove him away; he was in danger of being stoned, and he withdrew to Lystra and Derbe, in the eastern and wilder part of Lycaonia (v. 6). Thither also the enmity of the Jews of Antioch and Iconium pursued him; and at Lystra he was actually stoned and left for dead (v. 19). After an interval, however, he returned over the old ground, revisiting Iconium and encouraging the church which he had founded there (v. 21, 22). These sufferings and difficulties are alluded to in 2 Tim. iii. 11; and this brings us to the consideration of his next visit to this neighborhood, which was the occasion of his first practically associating himself with Timothy. Paul left the Syrian Antioch, in company with Silas (Acts xv. 40), on his second missionary circuit; and travelling through Cilicia (v. 41), and up through the passes of Taurus into Lycaonia, approached Iconium from the east, by Derbe and Lystra (xiv. 1, 2). Though at one time, however, the Apostle was evidently well known to the Christians of Iconium (v. 2); and it is not improbable that his circumcision (v. 3) and ordination (1 Tim. 1, 18, iv. 14, 12; 2 Tim. i. 6) took place there. On leaving Iconium St. Paul and his party travelled to the N. W.; and the place is not mentioned again in the sacred narrative; though there is little doubt that it was visited by the Apostle again in the early part of his third circuit (Acts xvii. 23). From its position it could not fail to be an important centre of Christian influence in the early ages of the church. The curious apocryphal legend of St. Thecla, of which Iconium is the scene, must not be regarded as literally true. The "traditions ascribed at Iconium" are given in full by Grabe (Spicil. vol. i.), and by Jones (On the Canons, vol. ii. pp. 353-411). It is natural here to notice one geographical mistake in that document, namely, that Lystra is placed on the west instead of the east. In the declining period of the Roman empire, Iconium was made a domus. In the middle ages it became a place of great consequence, as the capital of the Seljukian sultans. Hence the remains of the Saracenic architecture, which are conspicuous here, and which are described by many travellers. Iconium is still a town of considerable size.

* The origin of the name is obscure. Some find it allied to εἰκόνα or εἰκόνων (= "place of images") while others derive it from a Semitic root (see Paul's Rhet.-Engyl. iv. 51). It was situated on one of the largest plains in Asia Minor, and, like Damascus, formed an oasis in the desert. The hills that flowed from mountain ranges on the west of the city irrigated, for a little distance, the low grounds which stretched away towards the east, and gardens and orchards were seen in luxuriance, but soon the water, the source of vegetation, was exhausted, and then commenced the dry barren plain of Lycaonia." (See Lewin's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 158.) The eyes of Paul and Barnabas must have rested for hours on the city both before reaching it from Antioch and after leaving it for Lystra. "We travelled," says Ainsworth, "three hours along the plain of Konyah, always in sight of the city, before we reached it" (Travels in Asia Minor, ii. 63). Leake says, "We saw the city with its mosques and ancient walls still at the distance of 12 or 14 miles from us" (Travels in Asia Minor, p. 45).

Luke's statement that Paul found there "a great multitude both of Jews and Greeks" (Acts xiv. 1), accords with the extent and variety of the ruins still found on the spot. It accords also with the geographical position of the place so well situated for trade and intercourse with other regions. The Greeks and Jews were the commercial factors of that period, as they are so largely at the present times; and hence the narrative mentions them as very numerous precisely here. The bulk of the population belonged to a different stock. The possession of a common language gave the missionaries access at once to the Greek-speaking foreigners.

The Apostle's narrow escape from being stoned at Iconium (Acts xiv. 5) recalls to us a passage in one of the epistles. Paul was actually stoned at Lystra (Acts xiv. 19), soon after his departure from Iconium, and referring to that instance when he wrote to the Corinthians, he says (2 Cor. xi. 25): "Once was I stoned." Hence, says Paley (More Pauline), "had this meditated assault at Iconium been completed, had the history related that a stone was thrown, as it relates that preparations were made both by Jews and Gentiles to stone Paul and his companions, or even had the account of this transaction stopped, without going on to inform us that Paul and his companions were "awake of the danger and fled," a contradiction between the history and the epistles would have ceased. Truth is necessarily inconsistent: but it is scarcely possible that independent accounts, not having true to guide them, should thus advance to the very brink of contradiction without falling into it."}

ID'ALAH (יָדָלָה) [memorial stone of El (God), First: Iʾsdw [Vat. -sp]; Alex. Iʾsdw-nn: Iʾsdw-nn, one of the cities of the tribe of Zebulun, named between Shimron and Bethphages (Josh. xix. 15). Schwarz (p. 172), without quoting his authority, but probably from one of the Talmudic books, gives the name as "Y'dalah or Chi/tris," and would identify it with the village of Kelah al-Chiris, 9 miles S. W. of Semunni." Semaniyah is known and marked on many of the maps, rather less than 3 miles S. of Beilt-Sulim; but the other place mentioned by Schwarz has evaded observation. It is not named in the Onomasticon.

IDBASH (ידבש) [stout, corpulent]: Iʾsdw-nn [Vat. corrupt?]; Alex. Iʾsdw-nn: Iʾsdw-nn, one of the three sons of Abi-Edan — "the father of Edan" — among the families of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). The Tzelephonite is named as his sister. This list is probably a topographical one, a majority of the names being those of places.

IDO 1. [ʾsdw-nn: Ydalah; [Vat. corrupt?]; Alex. Iʾsdw-nn: Adba. The father of Abinadab, one of Solomon's monthly purveyors (1 K. iv. 14).

2. [ʾsdw-nn: Ydalah; [Vat. Aṣhd; Comp. Abd. Aʾsdw-nn: Adbo. A descendant of Gershom, son of Levi (1 Chr. vi. 21). In the reversed genealogy (ver. 41) the name is altered to Udalait, and we there discover that he was one of the forefathers of Asaph the seer.

3. [ʾsdw-nn: Ydalah; [Vat. Aṣhd; Alex. Iʾsdw-nn: Abdo. The son of Zechariah, ruler (nabih) of the tribe of Manasseh east of Jordan in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 21).

4. [ʾsdw-nn, i. e. Y'doī [born on a festival; First]; but in the correction of the Keri ידאו, Ye'do: Iʾsdw, Aʾsdw-nn [Vat. Aṣhd; Adbo. A seer (ʾsdw-nn) whose "visions" (ʾsdw-nn) against Jeroboam incidentally contained some of the acts of Solomon (2 Chr. ix. 23). He also appears to have written a chronicle or story (Moshesh, Ges. p. 357) relating to the life and reign of Abijah (2 Chr. xii. 22), and also a book "concerning genealogies," in which the acts of Rehoboam were recorded (xii. 15). These books are lost, but they may have formed part of the foundation of the existing books of Chronicles (Herbeck, On Chron, Introd. § 3). The mention of his having prophesied against Jeroboam probably led to his identification in the ancient Jewish traditions (Jerome, Quart. Heb. in 2 Chron. xii. 15, Jaddo; Joseph. Ant. viii. 3, § 5, ʾsdw-nn with the "Man of God" out of Judah, who denounced the altar of that king (1 K. xii. 1). He is also identified with Oded (see Jerome on 2 Chr. xv. 1).

5. [ʾsdw-nn in Zeh. [i. 7] Iʾsdw-nn: Aʾsdw-nn [in Eer., Vat. Aṣhd; in Neh., Vat. Alex. F.A. omit, and so Rom. in xii. 4.] Adbo. The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i. 1, 7, although in other places Zechariah is called the son of Iddo" (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14). Iddo returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshaia (Neh. xii. 4), and in the next generation — the "days of Jeokim" son of Jeshua (vv. 10, 12) — his house was represented.

by Zechariah (ver. 14). In 1 Esdr. vi. 1 the name is Atum.

6. 珥ען: [LXX. omit, exc. Comp. once 'אב, שד, פב.]. The chief of those who assembled at Caphirah, at the time of the second caravan from Babylon, in the reign of Artaxeres Longimanus A. D. 60. He was one of the Nethinim, of whom 229 responded to the appeal of Ezra to assist in the return to Judæa (Ezr. viii. 17; comp. 29). In the Apoc. Esdras the name is SADDÉUS and DADDÉUS.

G. IDOL IMAGE. As no less than twenty-one different Hebrew words have been rendered in the A. V. either by idol or image, and that by no means uniformly, it will be of some advantage to attempt to discriminate between them, and assign as nearly as the two languages will allow, the English equivalents for each. But, before proceeding to the discussion of those words which in themselves indicate the objects of false worship, it will be necessary to notice a class of abstract terms which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with it, and stand out as a protest of the language against the enormities of idolatry. Such are—

1. ₪יִם, üren, rendered elsewhere "nought," "vanity," "iniquity," "wickedness," "sorrow," etc., and once only "idol" (Is. lxi. 3). The primary idea of the root seems to be emptiness, nothingness, as of breath or vapor; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief, and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence üren denotes a vain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols, and the consequences of their worship. The character of the word may be learnt from its associates. It stands in parallelism with רכש, epex (Is. xli. 29), which, after undergoing various modifications, comes at length to signify "nothing;" with יִכֶל, šebel, "breath" or "vapor," itself applied as a term of contempt to the objects of idolatrous reverence (Deut. xxxii. 21; 1 K. xvi. 13; Ps. xxxii. 9; Jer. viii. 19, x. 8); with יִהְר, shér, "nothingness," "vanity;" and with מִשָּׁר, šeker, "falseness" (Zech. x. 2): all indicating the utter worthlessnes of the idols to whom homage was paid, and the false and delusive nature of their worship. It is employed in an abstract sense to denote idolatry in general in 1 Sam. xvi. 24. There is much significance in the change of the name from Bethel to Bethaven, the great centre of idolatry in Israel (Hos. iv. 15).

2. יִד, id, is thought by some to have a sense akin to that of מֵשֶׁר, šeker, "falseness;" with which it stands in parallelism in Job xii. 4, and would therefore much resemble יַעַר, as applied to an idol. Delitzsch (on Hab. ii. 18) derives it from the negative particle יָלַע, al, "die Nicht-igkeit." But according to First (Heb. s. v.) it is a diminutive of יִד, "god," the additional syllable indicating the greatest contempt. In this case the signification above mentioned is a subsidiary one. The same authority asserts that the word denotes a small image of the god, which was consulted as an oracle among the Egyptians and Phoenicians (Is. xix. 3; Jer. xiv. 11). It is certainly used of the idols of Noph or Memphis (Ex. xxx. 13). In strong contrast with Jehovah it appears in Ps. xcv. 5, xxx. 7: the contrast probably being heightened by the resemblance between אֱלִילִן and אֱלִיתִן. A somewhat similar play upon words is observable in Hab. ii. 18, יִלְלֹת אֱלִילִים "ab idols," A. V.).

3. יִד, יִד, "a horror" or "a terror," and hence an object of horror or terror (Jer. i. 38), in reference either to the hideousness of the idols or to the gross character of their worship. In this respect it is closely connected with—

4. יִד, יִד, miphtèth, a "fright," "horror," applied to the idol of Masekah, probably of wood, which Asa cut down and burned (1 K. xv. 13; 2 Chr. xv. 16), and which was unquestionably the Phaïlas, the symbol of the productive power of nature (Movers, Phön. 1. 571; Selden, de Dis Syr. ii. 5), and the nature-goddess Aslēra. Allusion is supposed to be made to this in Jer. x. 5, and Epist. of Jer. 70 (in the Apocrypha). In 2 Chr. xv. 16 the Vulg. renders "simulacrum Pratii" (cf. Hol. "forum axiunque maxima, formibus"). The LXX. had a different reading, which it is not easy to determine. They translate in 1 K. xv. 13 the same word both by אֲבָדֹות (with which corresponds the Syr. יִד, "a festival," reading perhaps יִד, "a terror, as in 2 K. x. 20; Jer. ix. 2) and הַכְּדָבֹות, while in Chronicles it is אֲבָדֹות. Possibly in 1 K. xv. 13 they may have read יִד, "falsehood, the Vulg. specus, of which "a simulacrum terrissimum" is a correction. With יד it is found in close connection—

5. יִד, בֵּית, "shame," or "shameful thing" (A. V. Jer. xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10), applied to Baal or Baal-Peor, as characterizing the obscenity of his worship. With יד is found in close connection—

6. יִד, גֵּדָל, also a term of contempt, but of uncertain origin (Ex. xxx. 13). The Rabbinical authorities, referring to such passages as Ex. iv. 12, Zeph. i. 17, have favored the interpretation given in the margin of the A. V. to Deut. xxix. 17, "dumce gods" (Vulg. "sordes," "sordes idolorum," 1 K. xiv. 12). Jahn connects it with יִד, "to roll," and applies it to the stocks of trees of which idols were made, and in mockery called gidelin, "rolling things" (אֲרָכָה). He says, though it is difficult to see the point of his remark. Gesenius, repudiating the derivation from the Aram. יִד, julla, "to be great, illustrious," gives his preference to the rendering "stones, stone gods," thus deriving it from יִד, "a heap of stones;" and in this he is followed by First, who translates גדרל by the Germ. "Steinhaufer." The expression is applied, principally in Ezekiel, to false gods and their symbols (Deut. xxix. 17; Ez. viii. 10, 4c.). It stands side by side with other contemptuous terms in Ex. xvi. 36, xx. 8; as for example יִד, šekel, "filth," "abomination" (Ez. viii. 10), and—
The cognate יִשְׁמָאֹים, skilklōs, "filth," "impurity," especially applied, like σκέλη, to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness (Ex. xxiii. 23; Nah. iii. 5), such as food offered in sacrifice to idols (Zechar. ix. 7; comp. Acts xv. 20, 29). As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was associated, and hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship and also to their worshipers, who partook of the impurity, and thus became loathsome like their love," the foul Baal-Peor (Num. i. 9).

We now come to the consideration of those words which more directly apply to the images or idols, as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshipped through them. These may be classified according as they indicate that the images were made in imitation of external objects, and to represent some idea, or attribute; or as they denote the workmanship by which they were fashioned. To the first class belong—

8. בִּלְבָל, semel, or בְּלִבְלָל, semel, with which Gesenius compares as cognate בִּלְבָל, מַשְׁבַּל, and בֵּלָל/בֵּלָל, telem, the Lat. simulis and Greek διαλός, signifies a "likeness," "semblance." The Targ. in Deut. iv. 16 gives בֵּלָל, "figure," as the equivalent; while in Ez. viii. 3, 5, it is rendered by בֵּלָל, "image." In the latter passages the Syriac has בֵּלָל, "image," (the στάτιον of the LXX.), which more properly corresponds to ματαστάθαι (see No. 15 below); and in Deut. כִּבָּֽל/כִּבָּל, genitals, "kind" (οἴμοι). The passage in 2 Chr. xxxiii. 7 is rendered with images of four faces, the latter words representing the one under consideration. In 2 Chr. xxxiii. 15 it appears as "carved images," following the LXX. γαρστάθαι. On the whole the Greek εἰκόνις of Deut. iv. 16, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 7, and the "simulacrum" of the Vulgate (2 Chr. xxxiii. 15) most nearly resemble the Hebrew semel.

9. בֵּלָל, telem (Ch. id. and בֵּלָל, telem) is by all lexicographers, ancient and modern, connected with בֵּלְל/בֵּל, tell, "a shadow." It is the "image" of God in which man was created (Gen. i. 27; cf. Wisd. ii. 23), distinguished from בֵּלְל/בֵּל, demeth, or "likeness," as the "image" from the "idea" which it represents (Schmidt, de imag. Dei in Hom. p. 84); though it would be rash to insist upon this distinction. In the N. T. εἰκόνις appears to represent the latter (Col. iii. 10; cf. LXX. of Gen. v. 1), διαλός the former of the two words (Rom. i. 23, viii. 29; Phil. ii. 7), but in Heb. x. 1 εἰκόνις is opposed to σκιά as the substance to the unsubstantial form, of which it is the perfect representative. The LXX. render demeth by διάλοις, διαλός, εἰκόνες, διαλοῦσα, εἰκόνα, and εἰκόνα most frequently by εἰκόνις, though διάλοις, εἰκόνα, and εἰκόνα also occasionally occur. But whatever abstract nouns best define the meaning of telem, it is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects, and is applied to figures of gold and silver (1 Sam. vi. 5; Num. xxxiii. 52; Dan iii. 1), such as the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon walls (Ez. xxiii. 14). "Image" perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. Applied to the human countenance (Dan. iii. 19) it signifies the "expression," and corresponds to the idea of Matt. xxviii. 9, though demeth agrees rather with the Platonic usage of the latter word.

10. בֵּלָל/בֵּל, telem, rendered "image" in Job iv. 16; elsewhere "semblitude" (Deut. iv. 12), "likeness." (Deut. v. 8) "form," or "shape" would be better. In Deut. iv. 16 it is in parallelism with בֵּלָל, "image," literally "build," hence "plan," or "model" (2 K. xvi. 10; cf. Ex. xx. 4; Num. xii. 8).

11. בִּלְבַל, בִּלְבַל, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב (Jer. xxii. 28), or 13. בִּלְבַל, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב (Is. xlviii. 5), "a figure," "an idol," all derived from a root בָּלָל, מְתָס, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, "to work," or "a fashion" (akin to בָּלַע, בָּלָע, and the like), are terms applied to idols as expressing that their origin was due to the labor of man. The verb in its derived senses indicates the sorrow and trouble consequent upon severe labor, but the latter seems to be the radical idea. If the notion of sorrow were most prominent the words as applied to idols might be compared with årego above. Is. xlviii. 3 is rendered in the Phœnician Syriac "idols" (A. V. "laborers"), but the reading was evidently different. In Ps. cxxxix. 24, בֵּל/בֵּל, derec/תְּשַׁב, is "idolatry.

12. בָּל/בָּל, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, once only applied to an idol (Is. xlv. 16; LXX. μόραοι, as by בָּל/בָּל, "idol." The word usually denotes "a pang," but in this instance is probably connected with the roots בָּל, מְתָס, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, יִגְלָם, and מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, יִגְלָם, and מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, יִגְלָם, which signifies a "shape," or "mould," and hence an "idol."}

13. מְתָס/תְּשַׁב/מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, anything set up, a "statue" (בָּל/בָּל, מְתָס/תְּשַׁב, Jer. xliii. 13), applied to a memorial stone like those erected by Jacob on four several occasions (Gen. xxviii. 18, xxxi. 45, xxxv. 14, 15) to commemorate a crisis in his life, or to mark the grave of Rachel. Such were the stones set up by Joshua (Josh. iv. 9) after the passage of the Jordan, and at Shechem (xxiv. 26), and by Samuel when victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 12). When solemnly dedicated they were anointed with oil, and libations were poured upon them. The word is applied to denote the obelisks which stood at the entrance to the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis (Jer. xliii. 13), two of which were a hundred cubits high and eight broad, each of a single stone (Her. ii. 111). It is also used of the statues of Baal (2 K. iii. 2), whether of stone (2 K. x. 27) or wood (id. 29), which stood in the innermost recess of the temple at Samaria. Movers (Phcen. i. 674) conjectures that the latter were statues or columns distinct from that of Baal, which was of stone and conical (673), like the "meta" of Paphos (Tac. II. ii. 3), and probably therefore the whole inferior in accuracy to that of the rest of the O. T.
belonging to other deities who were his τὰφροδίων or σύμβολοι. The Phenicians consecrated and anointed stones like that at Bethel, which were called, as some think, from this circumstance Betygi. Many such are said to have been seen on the Lebanon, near Heliodorus, dedicated to various gods, and many prodigies are related of them (Pausanias in Phoix, quoted by Boeckh, "Anm., ii. 2"). The same authority describes them as acrolites, of a whitish and sometimes purple color, spherical in shape, and about a span in diameter. The Palladium of Troy, the black stone in the Kbaul at Meec, said to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, and the stone at Ephesus "which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts xix. 35), are examples of the belief, anciently so common, that the gods sent down their images on earth. In the older worship of Greece stones, according to Pausanias (vii. 22, § 4), occupied the place of images. Those at Phare, about thirty in number, and quadrangular in shape, near the statue of Hermes, received divine honors from the Phenicians, and each had the name of some god conferred upon it. The stone in the temple of Jupiter Ammon (mandale monaco simulacrum), enriched with emeralds and gems (Curt. iv. 7, § 31); that at Delphi, which Saturn swallowed (Paus. Phoc. 24, § 6); the black stone of pyramidal shape in the temple of Juggernaut, and the holy stone at Pessinus in Galatia, sacred to Cybele, show how widely spread and almost universal were these ancient objects of worship. They are mostly connected with these "statues" of Paul, whether in the form of obelisks or otherwise, were —

16. ἀγαλματικά, clouusa aumén, rendered in the margin of most passages "sun-images." The word has given rise to much discussion. In the Vulgate it is translated thrice similitura, three obelus, and once simile. The LXX. give πρεξευ ραν τωι, ἑβδομα τεω σα. ξυνα χεριατικα, βίβλιατικα, κα τα δώρα. With one exception (2 Chr. xxiv. 4, which is evidently corrupt) the Syriac has vaguely either "fears," i. e. objects of fear, or "houses." The Targum in all passages translates it by ישכון שֵׁבַי, chalista/syaggl, "houses for star-worship" (Fürst compares the Arab.槌، خانم, Chumms, the planet Mercury or Venus), a rendering which Rosenmailler prefers. Gesenius preferred to consider these chalista/syaggl as "veils" or "shrines surrounded or shrouded with hangings" (Ex. xxvi. 16; Targ. on Is. iii. 19), and seanted the interpretation of Ruxtorf — "statue solares" — as a mere guess, though he somewhat paradoxically asceried to Rosenmailler's opinion that they were "houses dedicated to the worship of the stars." Kimchi, under the root יַּשֹּב, mentions a conjecture that they were trees like the Ashrim, but (v. יַּשֹּב) elsewhere expresses his own belief that the Nun is apothetic, and that they were said "because the sun-worshippers made them." Alen Ezra (on Lev. xxvi. 30) says they were "houses made for worshipping the sun," which Boeckh approves (Comm. ii. 17); and Jarchi, that they were a kind of idol placed on the roofs of houses. Yossius (cf. [Heb. 3:35]), as Scaliger before him, connects the word with Amnus, or Ommus, the sacred fire, the symbol of the Persian sun-god, and renders it.

pyras (cf. Schellen, ii. 8). Adelung (Mishr. i. 156), quoted by Gesen. on Is. xvii. 8) suggested the same, and compared it with the Sanskrit hrasa. But to such interpretations the passage in 2 Chr. xxiv. 4, is inimical (Vitrings on Is. xvii. 8). Gesenius' own opinion appears to have fluctuated considerably. In his view (v. "Comm. on Is. xviii. 3") the general rendering "caulins" to the more definite one of "sun-columns," and is inclined to look to a Persian origin for the derivation of the word. But in his Thesaurus he mentions the occurrence of Chouma as a synonym of Baal in the Phenician and Palmyrene inscriptions in the sense of "Dominus Solaris," and its after application to the statues or columns erected for his worship. Spencer of Legg. Hebr. ii. 29), and after him Michaelis ("sygpl. ad Lex. Hebr. xvii. 8 v.), maintained that it signified statues or lofty columns, like the pyramids or obelisks of Egypt. Movers (Phen. i. 441) concludes with good reason that the sun-god Baal and the idol "Chouma" are not essentially different. In his discussion of Chouma, he says, "These images of the fire-god were placed on foreign or non-Israelitish altars, in conjunction with the symbols of the nature-goddess Asherah, as συγβολων (2 Chr. xxiv. 3, 5, xxxiv. 4, 7; Is. xvii. 9, xxvi. 9), as was otherwise usual with Baal and Asherah." They are mentioned with the Asherim, and the latter are coupled with the statues of Baal (1 K. xvi. 23; 2 K. xxii. 14). The choumâniat and statues are used promiscuously (cf. 2 K. xxiii. 14, and 2 hr. xxxiv. 4; 2 Chr. xxiii. 3 and 5), but are never spoken of together. Such are the steps by which he arrives on Isaiah (i.e. he presents it is supported by the Palmyrene inscription at Oxford, alluded to above, which has been thus rendered: "This column (Σύγβολον, Choumâniat), and this altar, the sons of Malem, etc. have erected and dedicated to the Sun." The Veneto-Greek Version leaves the word untranslated in the strange form ἀγαλμάτιτες. From the expressions in Ex. vi. 4, 6, and Lev. xxvi. 30, it may be inferred that these columns, which perhaps represented a rising flame of fire and stood upon the altar of Baal (2 Chr. xxiv. 4), were of wood or stone.

17. ἀγαλματική, michith, occurs in Lev. xxvi. 1; Num. xxxiii. 52; Ex. viii. 12; "device" most nearly suits all passages (cf. Ps. lxxiii. 7; Prov. xviii. 11, xxv. 11). This word has been the fruitful cause of as much dispute as the preceding. The general opinion appears to be that ἀγαλματική, michith, signifies a stone with figures graven upon it. Ben Zeb explains it as "a stone with figures or hieroglyphics carved upon it," and so Michaelis; and it is maintained by Movers (Phen. i. 105) that the betygi, or columns with painted figures, the lapides effigios "of Minucius Felix (c. 3), are these stones of device," and that the characters engraved on them are the lapides stygia, or characters sacred to the several deities. The invention of these characters, which is ascribed to Tant, he conjectures originated with the Seres. Gesenius explains it as a stone with the image of an idol, Baal or Astarte, and refers to his Mon. Phen. 21-24 for others of similar character. Rashii (on Lev. xxxi. 1) derives it from the root יַּשֹּב, to cover, "because they cover the floor with a pavement of stones." The Targum and Syr. Lev. xxi. 1, give "a stone of devotion," and the
The terms which follow have regard to the material and workmanship of the idol rather than to its character as an object of worship.

19. πεστιλ, pesel, and 20. πεσελιμ, peselum, usually translated in the L. V. "graven or carved images." In two passages the latter is ambiguously rendered "quarries" (Judg. iii. 19, 26) following the Targum, but there seems no reason for departing from the ordinary signification. In the majority of instances the LXX. have χαλκούντων once γλυπμα. The verb is employed to denote the finishing which the stone received at the hands of the masons, after it had been rough-hewn from the quarries (Ex. xxiv. 4; 1 K. v. 18). It is probably a later usage which has applied pesel to a figure cast in metal, as in Is. xl. 19, xiv. 10.

These "sculptured" images were apparently of wood, iron, or stone, covered with gold or silver (Deut. vii. 25; Is. xxx. 22; Hab. ii. 19), the more costly being of solid metal (Is. xl. 19). They could be burnt (Deut. vii. 5; Is. xl. 20; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 4) cut down (Deut. xii. 3) and pounded (2 Chr. xxxiv. 7), or broken in pieces (Is. xxi. 9). In making them, the skill of the wise iron-smith (Deut. xxvii. 15; Is. xl. 24) or carpenter, and of the goldsmith, was employed (Judg. xvii. 3, 4; Is. xli. 7), the former forming the rough mass of iron beaten into shape by the anvil (Is. xliii. 12), while the latter overlaid it with plates of gold and silver, probably from Tarshish (Jer. x. 9), and decorated it with silver chains. The image thus formed received the further adornment of embroidered robes (Ex. xvi. 18), to which possibly allusion may be made in Is. iii. 19. Brass and clay were among the materials employed for the same purpose (Dan. ii. 33, v. 23). A description of the three great images of Babylon on the top of the temple of Belus will be found in Dion. Soc. ii. 9 (comp. Layard, Nin. ii. 433). The several stages of the process by which the metal or wood became the "graven image" are so vividly described in Is. xlii. 10-20, that it is only necessary to refer to that passage, and we are at once introduced to the mysteries of idol manufacture, which, as at Ephesus, "brought no small gain unto the craftsmen."

21. Παλαι, nese, or Παλαι, nese, and 22.

The Syr. has Λαμος, tīlōp (רימ), "the mould," for chereb. But the expression ידוהי, vagga'tarah, decides that it was by the chereb, in whatever manner employed, that the shape of a calf was given to the metal.

In N. T. εἰκὼν is the "image " or head of the emperor on the coinage (Matt. xxii. 20).

Among the earliest objects of worship, regarded as symbols of deity, were, as has been said above, the meteoric stones which the ancients believed to have been the images of the gods sent down from heaven. From these they transferred their regard to rough unhewn blocks, to stone columns or pillars of wood, in which the divinity worshipped was supposed to dwell, and which were consecrated, like the sacred stone at Delphi, by being anointed with oil, and crowned with wool on solemn days (Paus. Phec. 24, § 8). Tavernier (quoted by Rosenmüller, Gr. u. N. Hervorgendes, i. § 80) mentions a black stone in the pagoda of Benares which was daily anointed with perfumed oil, and such are the "Lingams" in daily use in the Siva worship of Bengal (cf. Arnoldus, i. 39; Min. Fed. c. 3). Such custom is remarkable illustrations of the solemn consecration by Jacob of the stone at Bethel, as showing the religious reverence with which these memorial stones were regarded. And not only were single stones thus honored, but heaps of stone were, in later times at least, considered as sacred to Hermes (Hom. Od. xvi. 471; cf. Vulg. Prov. xxi. 8, "sicut qui mittit lapidem in acerrum Mercurii"), and to these each passing traveller contributed his offering (Creuzer, Synth. i. 24).

The heap of stones which Laban erected to commemorate the solemn compact between himself and Jacob, and on which he invoked the gods of his fathers, is an instance of the intermediate stage in which such heaps were associated with religious observances before they became objects of worship. Jacob, for his part, dedicated a single stone as his memorial, and called Jehovah to witness, thus holding himself aloof from the rites employed by Laban, which may have partaken of his ancestral idolatry. (Jegar-sahadutha.)

Of the forms assumed by the idolatrous images we have no manuscripts in the Bible. Dagon, the fish-god of the Philistines, was a human figure terminating in a fish (Dagon); and that the Syrian deities were represented in later times in a symbolical human shape we know for certainty

\(^{a}\) More probably still pesel denotes by anticipation the molten image in a later stage after it had been crammed into shape by the caster.
The Hebrews imitated their neighbors in this respect as in others (Is. xiv. 13; Wisd. xiii. 13), and from various allusions we may infer that idols in human forms were not uncommon among them, though they were more anciently symbolized by animals (Wisd. xiii. 14), as by the calves of Aaron and Jeroboam, and the brazen serpent which was afterwards applied to idolatrous uses (2 K. xviii. 4; Rom. i. 23). When the image came from the hands of the maker it was decorated richly with silver and gold, and sometimes crowned (Epist. Jer. 9 or Bar. vi. 9); clad in robes of blue and purple (Jer. x. 9), like the draped images of Pallas and Hera (Muller, Hist. d. Arch. d. Kunst, § 60), and fastened in the niche appropriated to it by means of chains and nails (Wisd. xiii. 15), in order that the influence of the deity which it represented might be secured to the spot. So the Ephesians, when besiegued by Creesus, connected the wall of their city by means of a rope to the temple of Aphrodite, with the view of ensuring the aid of the goddess (Her. i. 26); and for a similar object the Tyrians chained the stone image of Apollo to the altar of Hercules (Curt. iv. 3, § 15). Some images were painted red (Wisd. xiii. 14), like those of Dionysus and the Bacchantes of Hermes, and the god Pan (Paus. ii. 2, § 5); Muller, Hist. d. Arch. d. Kunst, § 60). This was considered sacred. Pliny, relates, on the authority of Verrius, that it was customary on festival days to color with red-lead the face of the image of Jupiter, and the bodies of those who celebrated a triumph (xxxiii. 36). The figures of Priapus, the god of gardens, were decorated in the same manner ("rubor custos" Tibull. 1. i. 18). Among the objects of worship enumerated by Arnobius (i. 39) are lions of elephants, pictures, and garlands suspended on trees, the "rami coronati" of Apul- leius (de Mag. c. 56).

When the process of adorning the image was completed, it was placed in a temple or shrine appointed for it (owta, Epist. Jer. 12, 19 [or Bar. vi. 12, 19]; owtoia, Wisd. xiii. 15; owtoicwv, I Cor. vii. 10; see Stanley’s note on the latter passage). In Wisd. xiii. 15, owtoia is thought to be used contemptuously, as in Tit. 1.10, and "owtoia ton Synexon in xonigia lignes ode deus" (Frizsche and Grünm, Heilb.); but the passage quoted is by no means a good illustration. From these temples the idols were sometimes carried in procession (Epist. Jer. 4, 25 [or Bar. vi. 4, 26]) on festival days. Their priests were maintained from the idol treasury, and feasted upon the meats which were appointed for the idols’ use (Del and the Dragon, 3, 17). These sacrificial feasts formed an important part of the idolatrous ritual (Idol.), and were a great stumbling-block to the early Christian converts. They were to the heathen, as Prof. Stanley has well observed, what the observance of circumcision and the Mosaic ritual were to the Jewish converts, and it was for this reason that St. Paul especially directed his attention to the subject, and laid down the rules of conduct contained in his first letter to the Corinthians (viii.-x.).

IDOLATRY (אֱּדֹלָּת, Εἰδωλία, "tem- phim," once only, 1 Sam. xv. 25: εἰδωλολατρεία), strict speaking, denotes the worship of deity in a visible form, whether the images to which homage is paid are symbolic representations of the true God, or of the false divinities which have been made the objects of worship in his stead. With its origin and progress the present article is not concerned. The former is lost amidst the dark mists of antiquity, and ..."

"...ter is rather the subject of speculation than of history. But under what aspect it is presented to us in the Scriptures, how it affected the Mosaic legislation, and what influence it had on the history of the Israelites, are questions which may be more properly discussed, with some hope of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. Whether, therefore, the defilement of the powers of nature, and the representation of them under tangible forms, preceded the worship of departed heroes, who were regarded as the embodiment of some virtue which distinguished their lives, is not in this respect of much importance. Some Jewish writers, indeed, grounding their theory on a forced interpretation of Gen. iv. 26, assign to Enoch, the son of Seth, the uncommon notoriety of having been the first to pay divine honors to the host of heaven, and to lead others into the like error (Malb. de Idol. i. 1). R. Solomon Jarchi, on the other hand, while admitting the same verse to contain the first account of the origin of idolatry, understands it as implying the deification of men and plants. Arabic tradition, according to Sir W. Jones, connects the people of Yemen with this same apostasy. This in descent from Joktan, and therefore a contemporary of Nahor, took the surname of Abda Shams, or "servant of the sun," whom he and his family worshipped, while other tribes honored the planets and fixed stars (Hales, Chronol. iv. 50, 4th ed.) Nimrod, again, to whom is ascribed the introduction of Zabulism, was after his death transferred to the constellation Orion, and on the slender foundation of the expression "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi. 31) is built the fabulous history of Abraham and Nimrod, narrated in the legends of the Jews and Musalmans (Jellinek, Beit ha-Midrash, i. 23; Weil, Bibl. Leg. pp. 47-74; Hyde, Rel. Pers. c. 2).

I. But, descending from the regions of fiction to sober historic narrative, the first undoubted allusion to idolatry or idolatrous customs in the Bible is in the account of Rachel’s stealing her father’s teraphim (Gen. xxxii. 20), a relic of the worship of other gods, whom the ancestors of the Israelites served "on the other side of the river, in old time" (Josh. xxiv. 2). By these household deities Laban was guided, and these heconsulted as oracles (obs. "...aetem", Gen. xxv. 27, A. V. “learned by experience”), though without entirely losing sight of the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor, to whom he appealed when occasion offered (Gen. xxxi. 53), while he was ready, in the presence of Jacob, to acknowledge the benefits conferred upon him by Jehovah (Gen. xxv. 27). Such, indeed, was the character of most of the idolatrous worship of the benefices. Like the ‘Othecan colonists in Samaria, who stained their temples with the blood of sacrifices (2 K. xvii. 30), they blended in a strange manner a theological belief in the true God with the external reverence which, in different stages of their history, they were led to pay to the idols of the nations by whom they were surrounded. For this species of false worship they seem, at all times, to have had an incredible propensity. On their journey from Shechem to Bethel, the family of Jacob put away from among them “the gods of the "foreigner," not the teraphim of Laban, but the gods of the Canaanites through whose land they passed, and the amulets and charms which were worn as the appendages of their worship (Gen. xxxv. 2, 4). And this marked feature of the Hebrew character is traceable throughout the entire history of the people. During their long residence in Egypt, the country of symbolism, they defiled themselves with the idols of the land, and it was long before the taint was removed (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ex. xx. 7). To these gods Moses, as the herald of Jehovah,3 threw down the gauntlet of defiance (Kurtz, Gesch. d. Alt. B. II. 86), and the plagues of Egypt smote their symbols (Num. xxxiii. 4). Yet, with the memory of their deliverness fresh in their minds, their leader absent, the Israelites clamored for some visible shape in which they might worship the God who had brought them up out of Egypt (Ex. xxxii.). Aaron lent himself to the popular cry, and chose as the symbol of deity one with which they had long been familiar — the calf — embodiment of Apsy, and emblem of the productive power of nature. But, with a weakness of character to which his greater brother was a stranger, he compromised with his better impulses by proclaiming a solemn feast to Jehovah (Ex. xxxiii. 5). How much of the true God was recognized by the people in this brutish symbol it is impossible to conceive; the festival was characterized by the solemn consecration with which idolatrous worship was associated (ver. 25), and which seems to have constituted its chief attraction. But on this occasion, as on all others, the transgression was visited with swift vengeance, and three thousand of the offenders were slain. For a while the erection of the tabernacle, and the establishment of the worship which accompanied it, satisfied that craving for an outward sign which the Israelites constantly exhibited; and for the remainder of their march through the desert, with the dwelling-place of Jehovah in their midst, they did not again degenerate into open apostasy. But it was only so long as their contact with the nations was of a hostile character that this seeming orthodoxy was maintained. The charms of the daughters of Moab, as Balak's bad genius forewarned, were potent for evil: the Israelites were "yoked to Baal-Peor" in the trammels of his false worshipers, and the master of their deliverance was grieved and mortally bent at (Num. xxv.). The great and terrible retribution which followed left so deep an impression upon the hearts of the people that, after the conquest of the promised land, they looked with an eye of terror upon any indications of defection from the worship of Jehovah, and denounced as idolatrous a memorial so slight as the altar of the Kenobites at the passage of Jordan (Josh. xxii. 18).

During the lives of Saul and David and the elders who outlived him, they kept true to their allegiance; but the generation following, who knew not Jehovah, nor the works he had done for Israel, swerved from the plain path of their fathers, and were caught in the toils of the foreigner (Judg. ii.). From this time forth their history becomes little more than a chronicle of the inevitable sequence of offense and punishment. They provoked Jehovah to anger by their offenses against the land of Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them" (Judg. ii. 12, 14). The narratives of the book of Judges, contemporaneous or successive, tell of the fierce struggle maintained against their hated foes, and how women forget their tenderness and forsook their retirement to sing the song of victory over the oppressor. By turns each conquering nation strove to establish the worship of its national god. During the rule of Midian, Joshua the father of Gideon had an altar to Baal, and an Asherah (Judg. vi. 25), though he proved but a lukewarm worshipper (ver. 31). Even Gideon himself gave occasion to idolatrous worship yet the ephod which he made from the spoils of the Midianites was perhaps but a votive offering to the true God (Judg. viii. 27). It is not improbable that the gold ornaments of which it was composed were in some way connected with idolatry (cf. Is. iii. 18-24), and that from their having been worn as amulets, some superstitious virtue was conceived to cling to them even in their new form. But though in Gideon's lifetime no overt act of idolatry was practised, he was no sooner dead than the Israelites again returned to the service of the Baalim, and, as if in solemn mockery of the covenant made with Jehovah, chose from among their Baal Berith, "Baal of the Covenant" (cf. Zer 'Speca), as the object of their special adoration (Judg. viii. 33). Of this god we know only that his temple, probably of wood (Judg. ix. 49), was a stronghold in time of need, and that his treasury was filled with the silver of the worshippers (ix. 4). No were the calumnies of foreign oppression confined to the land of Canaan. The trunk on the breast of Jehovah was set astray after the idols of the land, and were delivered into the hands of the children of Ammon (Judg. x. 8). But they put away from among them "the gods of the foreigner," and with the baseborn Jephthah for their leader gained a signal victory over their oppressors. The exploits of Samson against the Philistines, though achieved within a narrower space and with less important results than those of his predecessor, fill a brilliant page in his country's history. But the tale of his marvelous deeds is prefaced by that ever-recurring phrase, so mournfully familiar, "the children of Israel did evil again in the eyes of Jehovah, and Jehovah gave them into the hand of the Philistines." Thus far idolatry is a national sin. The episode of Micah, in Judg. xvii. xviii., sheds a lurid light on the secret practices of individuals, who, without formally renouncing Jehovah, thought ceasing to reverence him as the God of Israel, and worshipping as true to his name, was in spirit identical with the act of the people (Judg. xvii. 16), linked with his worship the symbols of ancient idolatry. The house of God, or sanctuary, which Micah made in imitation of that at Shiloh, was decorated with an ephod and teraphim dedicated to God, and with a graven and molded image consecrated to some inferior deities (Selden, de Dia Sygria, Synrt. i. 2). It is a significant fact, showing how deeply rooted in the people was the tendency to idolatry, that a Levite, who, of all others, needed to have been most sedulous to maintain Jehovah's worship in its purity, was found to assume the office of priest to the images of Micah; and that this Levite, priest afterwards to the idols of Dau, was no other than Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses. Tradition says that these idols were destroyed when the Philistines defeated the army of Israel and took from them the ark of the covenant of Jehovah (1 Sam. iv. 19). The arkites are supposed to have carried them into the field, as the other tribes bore the ark, and the Philistines the images of their gods, when they went forth to battle (2 Sam. v. 21; Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v. 9). But the Seder Olam Rabba (c. 24) interprets "the captivity of the land" (Judg. viii. 30), of the captivity of Manasseh; and Benjamin of Tudela mistook the remains of Peter Gentile worship for traces of the altar or statue which Micah had dedicated, and which was worshipped by the tribe of Dan (Selden, de Bib. Syn., Synth. i. c. 2; Stanley, S. C. i. p. 298). In other times the practice of secret idolatry was carried to greater lengths. Images were set up on the corn-floors, in the wine-vats, and behind the doors of private houses (Is. lvi. 8; Hos. ix. 1, 2); and to check this tendency the statute in Deut. xxvii. 15 was originally promulgated.

Under Samuel's administration a fast was held, and purificatory rites performed, to mark the public reprobation of idolatry (1 Sam. iii. 3-6). But in the reign of Solomon all this was forgotten. Each of his many foreign wives brought with her the gods of her own nation; and the gods of Amnon, Moab, and Zidon, were openly worshipped. Three of the summits of Olivet were crowned with the high-places of Ashtaroth, Chemosh, and Molech (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xii. 13), and the fourth, in memory of his great apostasy, was branded with the opprobrious title of the "Mount of Corruption." Jehoram, the son of an Ammonite mother, perpetuated the worst features of Solomon's idolatry (1 K. xiv. 22-24); and in his reign was made the great schism in the national religion: when Jeroboam, fresh from his recollections of the Apsis worship of Egypt, erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan, and by this crafty state-policy severed for ever the kingdom of Judah and Israel (1 K. xii. 25-31). To their use were temples consecrated, and the service in their honor was studiously copied from the Mesian ritual. High-priest himself, Jeroboam ordained priests from the lowest ranks (2 Chr. xi. 15); incense and sacrifices were offered, and a solemn festival appointed, closely resembling the feast of tabernacles (1 K. xii. 32, 33; cf. Am. iv. 4, 5). [JEROBOAM] The worship of the calves, "the sin of Israel" (Hos. x. 8), which was apparently associated with the great worship of Melchis (2 Chr. xii. 15; Herod. ii. 46) or of the ancient Zalji (Lewis, Orig. Heb. v. 3), and the Asherim (1 K. xiv. 15; A. V. "groves"), ultimately spread to the kingdom of Judah, and centred in Beer-sheba (Am. v. 5, vii. 9). At what precise period it was introduced into the latter kingdom is not certain. The Chronicles tell us how Abijah taunted Jeroboam with his apostasy, while the less partial narrative in 1 Kings represents his own conduct as far from exemplary (1 K. xv. 23). Asa's sweeping reform spared not even the idol of his grandmother Maachel, and, with the exception of the high-places, he removed all relics of idolatrous worship (1 K. xv. 12-14), with its accompanying impieties. His reformation was completed by Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvi. 6).

The successors of Jeroboam followed in his steps, till Ahaz, who rivalled Zedekiah in avarice, at her instigation (1 K. xvi. 25) built a temple and altar to Baal, and revived all the abominations of the Amorites (1 K. xvi. 26). For this he attained the bad preeminence of having done "more to provoke Jehovah, the God of Israel, to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him" (1 K. xvi. 33). Compared with the worship of Baal, the worship of the calves was a venial offense, probably because it was morally less detestable and also less anti-national (1 K. xvi. 28; 2 K. x. 29-31). [JERUSALEM, vol. i. p. 763].] Jeroboam's idolatry therefore became so completely identified with the northern kingdom that it is described as walking in the way or statutes of the kings of Israel (2 K. xii. 3, xvii. 8), as distinguished from the sin of Jeroboam, which ceased not till the Captivity (2 K. xii. 23), and the corruption of the ancient inhabitants of the land. The idolatrous priests became a numerous and important caste (1 K. xviii. 19), living under the patronage of wealth and influence in the royal court. The extirpation of Baal's priests by Elijah, and of his followers by Jehu (2 K. x.), in which the royal family of Judah shared (2 Chr. xxii. 7), was a death-blow to this form of idolatry in Israel, though other systems still remained (2 K. xiii. 6). But while Israel thus sinned and was punished, Judah was more morally guilty (Ex. xxi. 5). The alliance of Jehoshaphat with the family of Ahab transferred to the southern kingdom, during the reigns of his son and grandson, all the appurtenances of Baal-worship (2 K. viii. 18, 27). In less than ten years after the death of that king, in whose praise it is recorded that he "sought not the Baalim," nor walked "after the deed of Israel" (2 Chr. xvii. 3, 4), a temple had been built for the idol, statues and altars erected, and priests appointed to minister in his service (2 K. x. 18). Jehohias's vigorous measures checked the evil for a time, but his reform was incomplete, and the high-places still remained, as in the days of Asa, a nucleus for any fresh system of idolatry (2 K. xii. 3). Much of this might be due to the influence of the king's mother, Zibiah of Beer-sheba, a place intimately connected with the idolatrous dejection of Judah (Am. viii. 14). After the death of Jehoias, the princes prevailed upon Josiah to restore at least some portion of his father's idolatry (2 Chr. xxiv. 18). The conquest of the Edomites by Amaziah introduced the worship of their gods, which had disappeared since the days of Solomon (2 Chr. xxv. 14, 29). After this period even the kings who did not lend themselves to the encouragement of false worship had to contend with the corruption which still lingered in the hearts of the people (2 K. xv. 35; 2 Chr. xxvii. 2). Hilitherto the temple had been kept pure. The statues of Baal and the other gods were preserved in their own shrines, but Ahaz, who "sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus, which smote him" (2 Chr. xxvii. 3), and built altars to them at every corner of Jerusalem, and high-places in every city of Judah, replaced the brazen altar of burnt-offering by one made after the model of "the altar" of Damascus, and desecrated it to his own uses (2 K. xvi. 10-15).

The conquest of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser was for them the last scene of the drama of abominations which had been enacted uninterruptedly for upwards of 250 years. In the northern kingdom no reformer arose to try the long line of royal apostates; whatever was effected in the way of reformation, was done by the hands of the people (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). But even in their captivity they

Azax was not directly intended to pronounce the temple hill on which the temple was built. It is clear that the founding of an idolatrous nature had been introduced into the temple, and was afterwards removed by Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 5; cf. Ezr. vi. 21, ix. 11). It is possible that this might have reference to the brazen serpent helped to perpetuate the corruption. The colonists, whom the Assyrian conquerors placed in their stead in the cities of Samaria, brought with them their own gods, and were taught at Bethel by a priest of the captive nation "the manner of the God of the land." The lessons thus learnt resulting in a desire to keep its every injunction, they imbraced the altars, images, and other religious appliances with the homage paid to their national deities (2 K. xvii. 24-41). Their descendants were in consequence regarded with suspicion by the elders who returned from the Captivity with Ezra, and their offers of assistance rejected (Ezr. iv. 3).

The first act of Hezekiah on ascending the throne was the restoration and purificiation of the Temple, which had been dismantled and closed during the latter part of his father's life (2 Chr. xxviii. 24; xxix. 3). The multitude who flocked to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover, so long in abeyance, removed the idolatrous altars of burnt-offering and incense erected by Ahaz (2 Chr. xxx. 14). The iconoclastic spirit was not confined to Judah and Benjamin, but spread throughout Ephraim and Manasseh (2 Chr. xxix. 1), and to all external appearance idolatry was extirpated. But the reform extended little beyond the surface (xxix. 13). Among the leaders of the people there were many in high position who conformed to the necessities of the time (Is. xxviii. 14), and under Manasseh's patronage the false worship, which had been merely driven into obscurity, broke out with tenfold virulence. Idolatry of every form, and with all the accessories of enchantments, divination, and witchcraft, was again rife; no place was too sacred, no associations too holier, to be spared the contamination. If the conduct of Ahaz in erecting an altar in the temple court is open to a charitable construction, Manasseh's was of no doubtful character. The two courts of the temple were profaned by altars dedicated to the host of heaven, and the image of the Asherah polluted the holy place (2 K. xx. 7; 2 Chr. xxix. 7, 15; cf. Jer. xxxi. 34). Even in his late repentance he did not entirely destroy all traces of his former idolatry. The people, easily swayed, still burned incense on the high places; but Jehovah was the ostensible object of their worship. The king's son sacrificed to his father's idols, but was not associated with him in his repentance, and in his short reign of two years, restored all the altars of the Baalim, and the images of the Asherah. With the death of Josiah ended the last effort to revive among the people a purer ritual, if not a purer faith. The lamp of David, which had long shed but a struggling ray, flickered for a while and then went out in the darkness of Babylonic captivity.

But foreign exile was powerless to eradicate the deep inbred tendency to idolatry. One of the first difficulties with which Ezra had to contend, and which brought him well nigh to despair, was the haste with which his countrymen took their foreign wives of the people of the land, and followed them in all their abominations (Ezr. ix.). The priests and rulers, to whom he looked for assistance in his great enterprise, were among the first to fall away (Ezr. ix. 2, x. 18; Neh. vi. 17, 18, xiii. 23). Even during the Captivity the devotees of false worship plied their craft as prophets and diviners (Jer. xxix. 8; Ez. xlii.), and the Jews who fled to Egypt carried with them recollections of the material prosperity which surrounded their idolatrous sacrifices in Judah, and to the neglect of which they attributed their exiled condition (Jer. xlix. 17, 18). The conquests of Alexander in Asia caused Greek influence to be extensively felt, and Greek idolatry to be first tolerated, and then practised, by the Jews (1 Macc. i. 43-50, 54). The attempt of Antiochus to establish this form of worship was vigorously resisted by Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 23-26), who was joined in his rebellion by the Asiarchs (ver. 42), and destroyed the altars at which the king commanded them to sacrifice (1 Macc. ii. 25, 45). The erection of synagogues has been assigned as a reason for the comparative purity of the Jewish worship after the Captivity (Prideaux, Connect. i. 374), while another cause has been discovered in the hatred for images acquired by the Jews in their intercourse with the Persians.

It has been a question much debated whether the Israelites were ever so far given up to idolatry as to lose all knowledge of the true God. It would be hard to assert this of any nation, and still more difficult to prove. That there alone remained among them a faithful few, who in the face of every danger adhered to the worship of Jehovah, may readily be believed, for even at a time when Baal worship was most prevalent there were found several thousand Jews who had not bowed before his image (1 K. xxx. 18). But there is still room for grave suspicion that among the masses of the people, though the idea of a supreme Being—of whom the images they worshipped were but the distorted representatives—was not entirely lost, it was so obscured as to be but dimly apprehended. And not only were the ignorant multitude thus led astray, but the priests, scribes, and prophets became leaders of the apostacy (Jer. ii. 8). Warburton, indeed, maintained that they never formally renounced Jehovah, and that their devotion consisted "in joining foreign worship and idolatrous ceremonies to the ritual of the true God" (Div. Leg. bk. v. § 3). But one passage in their history, though confessedly obscure, seems to point to a time when, under the rule of the judges, "Israel for many days had no true God, and no teaching priest, and no king" (2 Chr. vi. 3). The corroborative arguments of Cudworth, who notes the influence of the teaching of the Hebrew doctors and rabbis that the pagan nations, anciently, at least the intelligent amongst them, acknowledged one supreme God of the whole world; and that all other gods were but creatures and inferior ministers, is controverted by Molesworth (Intell. Syst. i. 4, § 30, and notes).

There can be no doubt that much of the idolatry of the Hebrews consisted in worshipping the true God under an image, such as the calves at Bethel and Dan (Joseph. Ant. viii. 8, § 5; θεάδες ἐκοινο- νιόμοις τῷ Θεῷ), and in associating his worship with idolatrous rites (Jer. xlii. 5), and places consecrated to idols (2 K. xviii. 22). From the peculiarity of their position they were never distinguished as the inventors of a new pantheon, nor did they adopt any one system of idolatry so exclusively as ever to become identified with it. But they are still more in contact with other nations than they readily adapted themselves to their practices, the old spirit of antagonism died rapidly away, and intermarriage was one step to idolatry.

II. The old religion of the Semitic races consisted, in the opinion of Movers (Phon. l. c. 5), in the delegation of the powers and laws of nature: these powers being considered either as distinct and...

IDOLATRY

The allusions in Job xxxviii. 31, 32, are too obvious to allow any inference to be drawn as to the mysterious influences which were held by the old astrologers to be exercised by the stars over human destiny, nor is there sufficient evidence to connect them with anything more reconcilable than the astronomical knowledge of the period. The same may be said of the poetical figure in Dehobrah's chant of triumph, "the stars from their highways warred with Sisera" (Judg. v. 20). In the later times of the monarchy, Mazzoth, the planets, or the zodiac signs, received, next to the sun and moon, their share of popular adoration (2 K. xxi. 5); and the history of idolatry among the Hebrews shows that it is only or not mostly connected with the delusion of the heavenly bodies, and the superstition which watched the clouds for signs, and used divination and enchantments. It was but a step from such culture of the sidereal powers to the worship of God and Men, Babylonian divinities, symbols of Venus or the moon, as the goddess of luck or fortune. Under the latter aspect, the moon was reverenced by the Egyptians (Macrobi. Sat. i. 20) and the name Bad-gal is possibly an example of the manner in which the worship of the planet Jupiter as the bringer of luck was grafted on the old faith of the Phenicians. The false gods of the colonists of Samaria were probably connected with eastern astrology: Atrammelech, Movers regards as the sun-fire—the Solar Mars, and Anammelech the Solar Saturn (Plut. i. 410, 411). The Vulgate rendering of Prov. xxvi. 8, "sicut qui mittit lapidem in ociconem Mecaurei," follows the Midrash on the passage quoted by Jarchi, and requires merely a passing notice (see Selden, De Dis Syris, ii. 15; Maina, de Idol. iii. 2; Buxtorf, Lex. Tolda. s. v. יִלְּדַה)." Beast-worship, as exemplified in the calves of Jeroboam and the dark limbs which seem to point to the goats of Mendes, has already been alluded to. There is no actual proof that the Isrealites ever joined in the service of Dagon, the fish-god of the Philistines, though Ahaziah sent stealthily to Baal-zebub, the fly-god of Ekron (2 K. i.), and in later times the brazen serpent became the object of idolatrous homage (2 K. xviii. 4). But whether the latter was regarded with superstitions reverence as a memorial of their early history, or whether incense was offered to it as a symbol of some power of nature cannot now be exactly determined. The threatening in Lev. xxvi. 30, "I will put your carcasses upon the carcasses of your idols," may fairly be considered as directed against the tendency to regard animals, as in Egypt, as the symbols of deity. Tradition says that Nergal, the god of the men of Cath, the idol of fire, according to Lusden (Phil. Nerb. Miet. Diss. 43), was worshipped under the form of a cock; Aishma as a he-goat, the emblazon of generative power; Nibhaz as a dog; Atrammelech as a male of heacock; and Anammelech as a horse or a pleasant.

a Some have explained the allusion in Zeph. i. 9, as referring to a practice connected with the worship of Dagon; comp. I Sam. v. 5. The Syrfrans, on the authority of Xenophion (Abab. i. 4. § 9), paid divine honors to fish.

b Jaronem (Onomat. s. v. Dryas) mentions an oak near Hebron which existed in his infancy, and was the traditional tree beneath which Abraham dwelt. It was regarded with great reverence, and was made an object of worship by the heathen. Modern Palestinian

Of pure hero-worship among the Semitic races we find no trace. Moses indeed seems to have entertained some dim apprehension that his countrymen might, after his death, pay him more honor than were due to man; and the anticipation of his li on their death, was the occasion of his strong reproval (Deut. iv. 21, 22). Their expression in Ps. cxvi. 23, "the sacrifices of the dead," is in all probability metaphorical, and Wisd. xiv. 13 refers to a later practice due to Greek influence. The rabbinical commentators discover in Gen. xviii. 16, an allusion to the worshipping of angels (Coh. ii. 13), while they defend their ancestors from the charge of regarding them in any other light than merely as intermediaries between the oblations of the heavenly bodies, and the superstition which watched the clouds for signs, and used divination and enchantments. It was but a step from such culture of the sidereal powers to the worship of God and Men, Babylonian divinities, symbols of Venus or the moon, as the goddess of luck or fortune. abounds with sacred trees. They are found "all over the land covered with bits of rags from the garments of passing villagers, hung up as acknowledgments or as deprecatory signals and charms; and we find beautiful clumps of oak-trees sacred to a kind or beings called Jacob's daughters" (Thomson, Land and Book. ii. 151). [See GROVE.]

c Unless, indeed, this be a relic of the ancient Canaanitish worship; an older name associated with idolatry, which the conquerors of Israel and Edom, the king of Moab offered his eldest son as a burnt-offering.
the Persians, who worshipped the sun under the name of Mithra (Strabo, xv. p. 732), sacrificed on an elevated spot, but built no altars or images. The priests of the false worship are sometimes designated Choræmi or Aryans, a word of Syriac origin, to which different meanings have been assigned. It is applied to the non-Literalists who burnt incense on the high-places (2 K. xxiii. 5) as well as to the priests of the calves (Hos. x. 5); and the corresponding word is used in the Psalms (Judg. xxiii. 30) of Jonathan and his descendants, priests to the tribe of Dan, and in Targ. Onkelos (Gen. xlii. 22) of the priests of Egypt. The Rablisi, followed by Gesenius, have derived it from a root signifying "to be black," and without any authority assert that the name was given to idolatrous priests from the black vestments which they wore. But white was the distinctive color in the priestly garments of all nations from India to Gaul, and black was only worn when they sacrificed to the sun, so-called gods (Rahr, Sympb. ii. 87, &c.). That a special dress was adopted by the Baal-worshippers, as well as by the false prophets (Zeoh. xiii. 4), is evident from 2 K. x. 22 (where the rendering should be "the apparel"), the vestments were kept in an apartment of the idol temple, under the charge probably of one of the inferior priests. Mazz'ah Levi was provided with appropriate robes (Judg. xii. 10). The "foreign apparel," mentioned in Zeph. i. 8, refers doubtless to a similar dress, adopted by the Israelites in defiance of the sumptuary law in Num. xv. 37-40.

In addition to the priests there were other persons intimately connected with idolatrous rites, and the impurities from which they were inseparable. Both men and women consecrated themselves to the service of idols: the former as ἱερεύς; kedēskhēn, for which there is reason to believe the A. V. (Deut. xxiii. 17, &c.) has not given too harsh an equivalent; the latter as γυνὴ ἱερέως, kedēskōthē, who wore shrines for ἄστατος (2 K. xxiii. 7), and resembled the ἐγκαταστάται of Corinth, of whom Strabo (viii. p. 378) says there were more than a thousand attached to the temple of Aphrodite. Egyptian prostitutes consecrated themselves to Isis (Jun. vi. 489, ix. 22-24). The same class of women existed among the Phœnicians, Armenians, Lydians, and Babylonians (Her. xvi. 199; Strabo, xi. p. 532; Epist. of Jerem. ver. 43). They are distinguished from the public prostitutes (Hos. iv. 14) and associated with the performances of sacred rites, just as in Strabo (xii. p. 559) we find the two classes existing at Comana, the Corinth of Pontus, much frequented by pilgrims to the shrine of Aphrodite. The wealth thus obtained flowed into the treasury of the idol temple, and against such a practice the injunction in Deut. xxiii. 18 is directed. Dr. Maitland, anxious to defend the moral character of Jewish women, has with much ingenuity attempted to show that a meaning foreign to their true sense has been attached to the words above mentioned; and that, though closely associated with idolatrous services, they do not indicate such foul corruption (Essay on False Worship). But if, as Movers, with great appearance of probability, has conjectured (Phain. i. 670), the class of persons alluded to was composed of foreigners, the Jewish women in this respect need no such advocacy. That such customs existed among foreign nations there is abundant evidence to prove (Lucian, de Syr. Dea, c. 5); and from the juxtaposition of prostitution and the idolatrous rites against which the laws in Lev. xix. are aimed, it is probable that next to its immorality, one main reason why it was visited with such stringency was its connection with idolatry (comp. 1 Cor. xii. 19).

But besides these accessories there were the ordinary rites of worship which idolatrous systems had in common with the religion of the Hebrews. Offering burnt sacrifices to the idol gods (2 K. v. 17), burning incense in their honor (1 K. xi. 8), and bowing down in worship before their images (1 K. xix. 18) were the chief parts of their ritual; and from their very analogy with the ceremonies of true worship were more seductive than the grosser forms. Nothing can be stronger or more precise than the language in which these ceremonies were denounced by Hebrew law. Every detail of idol worship was made the subject of a separate enactment, and many of the laws, which in themselves seem trivial and almost absurd, receive from this point of view their true significance. We are told by Maimonides (Mor. Nib. c. 12) that the prohibitions against sowing a field with mingled seed, and wearing garments of mixed material, were directed against the practices of idolaters, who attributed a kind of magical influence to the mixture (Lev. xix. 19; Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. ii. 18). Such too were the precepts which forbade that the garments of the sexes should be interchanged (Deut. xxiii. 5; Maimon. de Idol. xii. 9). According to Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8) other Asatics when they sacrificed to their Venus changed the dress of the sexes. The priests of Cybele appeared in women's clothes, and used to urinate themselves (Trenzer, Sympb. ii. 34, 42); the same custom was observed "by the Ithyphallus in the rites of Bacchus, and by the Athenians in their Asclepia" (Young, Idol. Cor. in Rel. i. 105; cf. Lucian, de Dea Syrta, c. 15). To preserve the Israelites from contamination, they were forbidden three years after their conquest of Canaan from eating of the fruit-trees of the land, whose cultivation had been attended with hoariness (Deut. xxiii. 23); and the law aimed to "round the corner of the head," and to "near the corner of the beard" (Lev. xix. 27), as the Arabs did in honor of their gods (Her. iii. 8, iv. 175). Hence, the phrase προς το γλυκύναι: kedēskēth, (literally) "shorn of the corner," is especially applied to idolaters (Jer. ix. 20, xxv. 25). Spencer (de Leg. Hebr. i. 9, § 25) thus interprets the offering of honey (Lev. vi. 11) as intended to oppose an idolatrous practice. Strabo describes the Magi as offering in all their sacred practices liquid of oil mingled with honey and milk (xv. p. 733). Offerings in which honey was an ingredient were made to the inferior deities and the dead (Hom. Od. x. 519; Perip. de Antro. Nymp. c. 17). So also the practice of casting the bones of the dead "over the blood" (Lev. xix. 26; Ez. xxiii. 25, 26) was, according to Maimonides, common among the Zabii. Spencer gives a double reason for the practice that the public prostitutes received the appellation of the sacrilegous of the cathedral (Miller, P. of Hist. ii. 441).

A Illustration, though not an example, of this is found in the modern history of Europe. At a period of great profusion and corruption of morals, licentiousness was carried to such an excess in Stras-hilation: that it was a rite of divination, and divination of the worst kind, a species of necromancy by which they attempted to raise the spirits of the dead (comp. Hor. Sat. i. 8). There are supposed to be allusions to the practice of necromancy in Is. xvi. 4, or at any rate to superstitious rite with connection with the dead, in the passage of one tree upon another was forbidden, because among idolaters the process was accompanied by gross obscenity (Maim. Moc. Nib. c. 12). Cutting the flesh for the dead (Lev. xix. 28; 1 K. xviii. 28), and making a baldness between the eyes (Deut. xiv. 1) were associated with idolatrous rites: the latter being a custom among the Syrians (Sir. 6. Wilkinson in Rawlinson's Herod. ii. p. 183; note). The three repeated and much-veased passage, “Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother’s milk” (Ex. xxii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21), interpreted by some as a precept of humanity, is explained by Cudworth in a very different manner. He quotes from a Karaite commentary which he had seen in MS.: “It was a custom of the ancient heathens, when they had gathered in all their fruit, to take a kid and boil it in the dam’s milk, and then in a magical way give the concerned flesh to all the trees and fields and gardens and orchards; thinking by this means they should make them fruitful, and bring forth again more abundantly the following year” (On the Lord’s Supper, c. 2).a

The law which regulated clean and unclean meats (Lev. xxiii–26) may be considered both as a sanitary regulation, and also as having a tendency to separate the Israelites from the surrounding idolatrous nations. In that respect the race was with the same object, in the opinion of Michaelis, that while in the wilderness they were prohibited from killing any animal for food without first offering it to Jehovah (Leaves of Moses, trans. Smith, art. 203). The mouse, one of the unclean animals of Leviticus (xi. 29), was sacrificed by the ancient Magi (Is. lvii. 17; Movers, Phin. i. 219). It may have been some such reason as that assigned by Lewis (Orig. Hebr. v. 1), that the dog was the symbol of an Egyptian deity, which gazed in the west (cf. Amos ii. 13; 1 K. v. 2). Movers says the dog was offered in sacrifice to Molech (i. 404), as swine to the moon and Dionysus by the Egyptians, who afterwards ate of the flesh (Her. iii. 47; Is. lv. 4). Eating of the things offered was a necessary appendage to the sacrifice (comp. Ex. xvii. 12, xxxii. 6, xxxiv. 15; Num. xxv. 2, &c.). Among the Persians the victim was eaten by the worshippers, and the soul alone left for the god (Strabo, xv. 732). “Hence it is that the idolatry of the Jews in worshipping other gods is so often described synecdochically under the notion of feasting. Is. lvii. 7, ‘Upon a high and lofty mountain thou hast set thy bed, and thickestestest thou up to offer sacrifices;’ for in those ancient times they were not wont to sit at feasts, but lie down on beds or couches. Ez. xxii. 41: Amos ii. 8, ‘They laid themselves down upon clothes laid to pledge by every altar,’ i. e. laid themselves down to eat of the sacrifice that was offered on the altar: comp. Ex. xviii. 11 ’ (Cudworth, at Super. c. 1; cf. 1 Cor. viii. 10). The Israelites were forbidden ‘to print any mark upon them’ (Lev. xix. 28), because it was a custom of idolaters to brand upon their flesh some symbol of the deity they worshipped.

a Dr. Thomson mentions a favorite dish among the Greeks called john inanits, to which he conceives allusion made (Laws and Book, i. 150).

as the ivy-leaf of Bacchus (3 Macc. ii. 29). According to Lucian (De Dea Syrta, 50), all the Assyrians wore marks of this kind on their necks and wrists (comp. Is. xix. 5; Gal. vi. 17; Rev. xiv. 1, 11). Many other practices of false worship are alluded to, and made the subjects of rigorous prohibition but none are more frequently or more severely denounced than those which peculiarly characterized the worship of Molech. It has been attempted to deny that the worship of this idol was polluted by the foul stain of human sacrifice, but the allusions are too plain and too pointed to admit of reasonable doubt (Deut. xix. 21; 2 K. ii. 27; Jer. vii. 31; Ps. cv. 37; Ez. xxiv. 30). Nor was this practice confined to the idols of Molech: it extended to those of Baal (Jer. xix. 5), and the king of Moab (2 K. iii. 27) offered his son as a burnt-offering to his god Chemosh. The Phoenicians, we are told by Porphyry (De Abstin. ii. c. 36), on occasions of great national calamity sacrificed to Kronos one of their dearest friends. Some allusion to this custom may be seen in Micah vi. 7. Kissing the images of the gods (1 K. xii. 18; Hos. xii. 2), hugging votive offerings in their temples (1 Sam. xxxi. 10), and carrying them about the (2 Sam. vi. 21), all by the Jews of Maccabeus’ army did with the things consecrated to the idols of the Janmites (2 Macc. xii. 40), are usages connected with idolatry which are casually mentioned, though not made the objects of express legislation. But soothsaying, interpretation of dreams, necromancy, witchcraft, magic, and other forms of divination, are alike forbidden (Deut. xviii. 9; 2 K. i. 2; Is. lv. 4; Ez. xxi. 21). The history of other nations — and indeed the common practice of the lower class of the population of Syria at the present day — shows us that such a statute as that against bestiality (Lev. xviii. 23) was not unnecessary (cf. Jer. ii. 40; Rom. i. 26). Purificatory rites in connection with idol worship, and eating of forbidden food, were visited with severe retribution (Is. lvii. 17). It is evident, from the context of Ez. xviii. 17, that the votaries of the sun, who worshipped in their faces to the sun, put the branch to their nose,” did so in observance of some idolatrurous rite. Movers (Phin. i. 66), uneasingly affirms that the allusion is to the branch Barson, the holy branch of the Magi (Strabo, xv. p. 733), while Havernick (Comm. zu Ezech. p. 117), with equal confidence, denies that the passage supports such an inference, and renders, having in view the lament of the women for Thannum, “sie entsenden den Trauer- gesang an ihren Zorn.” The waving of a myrtle branch, says Maunides (de idol, vi. 2), accompanied the repetition of a magical formula in incantations. An illustration of the usage of bonghi in worship will be found in the Greek ineropha (Ess. Eun. 43: Suppl. 192; Schol. on Aristoph. Phel. 383; Porphyry de Aum. Nymphe c. 33). For detailed accounts of idolatrous ceremonies, reference must be made to the articles upon the several idols in the following.

11 III. It remains now briefly to consider the light in which idolatry was regarded in the Mosaic code, and the penalties with which it was visited. If one main object of the Hebrew polity was to teach the unity of God, the extermination of idolatry was but a subordinate end. Jehovah, the God of the Israelites, was the civil head of the State. He was the theocratic king of the people, who had delivered them from bondage, and to whom they were a willing and permanent people. They had entered into a solemn league and covenant with him as their chosen king (comp. 1 Sam. viii. 7), by whom obedience was required with temporal blessings, and rebellion with temporal punishment. This original contract of the Hebrew government, as it has been termed, is contained in Ex. xix. 3-8, xx. 2-5; Deut. xxix. 10-xxxi.: the blessings promised to obedience are enumerated in Deut. xxviii. 1-14, and the withering curses on disobedience in verses 15-49. That this covenant was faithfully observed it needs but slight acquaintance with Hebrew history to perceive. Often broken and often renewed on the part of the people (Judg. x. 10; 2 Chr. xv. 12, 13; Neh. ix. 38), it was kept with unwavering constancy on the part of Jehovah. To their kings he stood in the relation, so to speak, of a feudal superior: they were his representatives upon earth, and with them, as with the people before, his covenant was made (1 K. iii. 14, xi. 11). Idolatry, therefore, to an Israelite, was a state offence (1 Sam. xv. 20); a political crime of the gravest character, high treason against the majesty of his king. It was a transgression of the covenant (Deut. xvii. 2), "the evil" prominently in the eyes of Jehovah (1 K. xxii. 25, opp. to "the right," 2 Chr. xxvii. 2). But it was much more than this. While the idolatry of foreign nations is stigmatized merely as an abomination in the sight of God, which called for his vengeance, the sin of the Israelites is regarded as of more alarming gravity, and greater moral guilt. In the figurative language of the prophets, the relation between Jehovah and his people is represented as a marriage bond (Is. lv. 5; Jer. iii. 14), and the worship of false gods with all its accompaniments (Lev. xx. 56) becomes then the greatest of social wrongs (Hos. ii.; Jer. iii. etc.). This is beautifully brought out in Hos. ii. 16, where the apostate Israel, my master, whose father Israel has been accustomed to apply to her foreign possessor, is compared with Isbı̂ , my nun, my husband, the native word which she is to use when restored to her rightful husband, Jehovah. Much of the significance of this figure was unquestionably due to the impurities of idolaters, with whom such corruption was of no merely spiritual character (Ex. xxxiv. 16; Num. xxx. i. 2, &c.), but manifested itself in the grossest and most revolting forms (Rom. i. 26-32).

Regarded in a moral aspect, false gods are called "stumbling blocks" (Ex. xiv. 9), "snares" (Am. ii. 4; Rom. i. 23), "horrors" or "frights" (1 K. xv. 13; Jer. i. 38), "abominations" (Deut. xxix. 17, xxx. 16; 1 K. xi. 5; 2 K. xxii. 13), "gilt" (abstract for concrete, Am. viii. 14, ל"כשד lêkashm, comp. 2 Chr. xxix. 18), perhaps with a play on Jehovah, 2 K. xxii. 30), and with a profound sense of the degradation consequent upon their worship, they are characterized by the prophets, whose mission it was to warn the people against them (Jer. xlv. 4), as "shame" (Jer. xii. 14; Hos. ix. 10). As considered with reference to Jehovah, they are "other gods" (Josh. xxiv. 2. 16), "strange gods" (Deut. xxvii. 16), "new gods" (Judg. vi. 8), "devils, — not God" (Deut. xxix. 17; Cor. x. 20, 21); and, as denoting their foreign origin, "gods of the foreigner" (Josh. xxiv. 14, 15). Their powerlessness is indicated by describing them as "gods that cannot save" (Is. xiv. 20), "that made not the heavens" (Jer. x. 11), "nothing" (Is. xxiv. 1; Cor. vii. 4), "wind and emptiness" (Is. xxii. 28), "vanities of the heathen" (Deut. xxv. 24; Acts xvii. 31) and yet while their deity is denied, their personal existence seems to have been acknowledged (Kurtz, Gesch. d. A. B. ii. 86, &c.), though not in the same manner in which the preponderance of heathen deities were reciprocally recognized by the heathen (1 K. xx. 23, 25; 2 K. xxiv. 21). Other terms of contempt are employed with reference to idols, דנדנונ, הלאים (Lev. xiv. 4), and גנפננ, גלאים (Deut. xix. 17), to which different meanings have been assigned, and many which indicate ceremonial uncleanness. [Isa., p. 1118 b.]

Idolatry, therefore, being from one point of view a political offence, could be punished without infringement of civil rights. No penalties were attached to mere opinions. For aught we know, theoretical speculation may have been as rife among the Hebrews as in modern times, though such was not the tendency of the Satanic mind. It was not, however, such speculations, heterodox though they might be, but overt acts of idolatry, which were made the subjects of excommunication (Michaelis, Lives of Moses, arts. 245, 246). The first and second commandments are directed against idolatry of every form. Individuals and communities were equally amenable to the rigorous code. The individual offender was to be driven to destruction (Ex. xxiii. 20); his nearest relatives were not only bound to denounced him and deliver him up to punishment (Deut. xiii. 2-10), but their hands were to strike the first blow when, on the evidence of two witnesses at least, he was stoned (Deut. xvii. 2-5).

To attempt to deceive others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut. xiii. 6-10). An idolatrous rite shared a similar fate. No facts are more strongly insisted on in the O. T. than that the extermination of the Canaanites was the punishment of their idolatry (Ex. xxxiv. 13; Deut. vii. xxii. 24-xxvi. 17), and that the calamities of the Israelites were due to the same cause (Jer. ii. 17). A city guilty of idolatry was looked upon as a cancer of the state; it was considered to be in rebellion, and treated according to the laws of war. Its inhabitants and all their cattle were put to death. No spoil was taken, but everything it contained was burnt with itself; nor was it allowed to be rebuilt (Deut. xxi. 13-18; Josh. vi. 26). Soul lost to the kingdom, Achan his name, and Hiel his family, for transgressing this law (1 Sam. xvi.; Josh. vii. 1; 1 K. xxi. 34). The silver and gold with which the idols were covered were accused (Deut. xvii. 26). And not only were the Israelites forbidden to serve the gods of Canaan (Ex. xxxii. 24), but even to mention their names, that is, to call upon them or any form of prayer (Ex. xxxii. 9). In the A. V. the terms שֵׁי "say, strange," and שֵׁי or שֵׁי, מֵאָר or מֵאַר, "foreign," are not uniformly distinguished, and the point of a passage is frequently lost by the interchange of one with the other, or by rendering both by the same word. So Ps. lxxxi. 9 should be. "There shall not be in thee a strange god, nor shall thou worship a foreign god."
13: Josh xiii. 7). On taking possession of the land they were to obliterate all traces of the existing idolatries; statues, altars, pillars, idol-temples, every person and everything connected with it were to be swept away (Ex. xxix. 29; Deut. vii. 5, 23, xii. 1–3, xx. 17), and the name and worship of the idols blotted out. Such were the precautions taken by the framers of the Mosaic code to preserve the worship of Jehovah, the true God, in its purity. Of the manner in which his descendants have put a "fence" about the law, with reference to idolatry, many instances will be found in the Mishnah (de b. b. l.). They were prohibited from using vessels, scarlet garments, bracelets, or rings, marked with the sign of the sun, moon, or dragon (vii. 10); trees planted or stones erected for idol-worship were forbidden (viii. 5, 10); and, to guard against the possibility of contamination, if the image of an idol were found among other images intended for ornament, they were all to be cast into the Dead Sea (vii. 10).

IV. Much indirect evidence on this subject might be supplied by an investigation of proper names. Mr. Layard has remarked, "According to a custom existing from time immemorial in the East, the name of the Supreme Deity was introduced into the names of men. This custom prevailed from the banks of the Tigris to the Phoenician colonies beyond the Pillars of Hercules; and we recognize in the Sumeriakal of the Assyrians, and the Hanunial of the Carthaginians, the identity of the religious system of the two nations, as widely distinct in the time of their existence as in their geographical position" (Virt. ii. 459). The hint which he has given can be but briefly followed out here. Traces of the sun-worship of the ancient Canaanites remain in the nomenclature of their country. Beth-shemesh, "house of the sun," En-shemesh, "spring of the sun," and Ir-shemesh, "city of the sun," whether they be the original Canaanitish names, or their Hebrew renderings, attest the reverence paid to the source of light and heat, the symbol of the fertilizing power of nature. Samson, the Hebrew national hero, took his name from the same luminary, and was born in a mountaine-village above the modern Ain Sheous (En-shemesh): Thompson, Israel and Jude, ii. 301. The name of Baal, the sun-god, is one of the most common occurrences in compound words, and is often associated with places consecrated to his worship, and of which perhaps he was the tutelary deity. Ramoth-Baal, "the high-places of Baal," Bad-hermon, Beth-Baal-meon, Baal-gad, Baal-hamon, in which compound the names of the sun-god of Phoenicia and Egypt are associated, Baal-Tamar, and many others, are instances of this. Nor was the practice confined to the names of places: proper names are found with the same element. Esh-izrael, Ish-bal, etc., are examples. The Amorites, xebon Joshua did not drive out, dwelt on Mount Heres, in Aijalon, "the mountain of the sun" (Timnath-heres). Here and there we find traces of their attempt made by the Hebrews, on their conquest of the country, to extirpate idolatry. Thus Bashalah or Kirjath-baal, "the town of Baal," became Kirjath-pearim, "the town of forests" (Josh. xv. 60). The Moon, Ashtar or Ashtarto, gave her name to a city of Bashan (Josh. xiii. 12, 31), and it is not improbable that the name Jericho may have been derived from being associated with the worship of this goddess. [I. E. R.]

The name which was bestowed upon Jerusalem (Gen. iv. 17) is peculiar, and the name under which the Chaldaean worshipped the Moon or the planet Mercury, enters into many compounds: Neb-nazarad, Samgar-nebo, and others. Were Babylon of Semitic origin, it would probably be derived from Bals-Adam, or Atlantis, the Phoenician deity to whose worship Jer. xxvii. 18 seems to refer; but it has been connected with the name of the Indo-Germanic root. Habad, Habdelaer, Benhadad, are derived from the tutelary deity of the Syrians, and in Nergardshezer are recognized the god of the Cushites. Chenoum, the fire-god of Moab, appears in Carchemish, and Peor in Beth-peor. Malabou, a name which occurs but once, and then of a Moabite by birth, may have been connected with Melch and Milcom, the abomination of the Ammonites. A glimpse of star-worship may be seen in the name of the city Chesil, the Semitic Orion, and the month Chisheu, without recognizing in Kalab "the glittering fragments of the sea-snake trailing across the northern sky". It would perhaps be going too far to trace in En-gedi, "spring of the kid," any connection with the goat-worship of Mesopotamia, or any relics of the wars of the giants in Babylon and Ethiopia. Thus, indeed, recognized in Idel, Yemun or Astarle, the goddess of fortune, and identical with God (I. E. mel, s. v.). But there are fragments of ancient idolatry in other names in which it is not so palpable. Isheshbeth is identical with Ish-baal, and Jeri-besheth with Jeribbaal, and Mephibesheth and Meribbaal are but two names for one person (cf. Jer. xi. 13). The worship of the Syrian Rimmon appears in the names Hashal-rimmon, and Tabrimmon; and, if, as some suppose, it be derived from ḫmn, Rinnin, "a pomegranate-tree," we may connect it with the towns of the same name in Judah and Benjamin, with En-Rinnom and the prevailing tree-worship. It is impossible to pursue this investigation to any length: the hints which have been thrown out may prove suggestive.

IDUME'A or IDUMÉ'A (יוֹדֵמֵא; red. frequently יִדומֵא: Ishmael, Edom), Is. xxxv. 5, 6; Ez. xxxv. 15, xxxvi. 5; 1 Mac. iv. 15, 20, 61, v. 3, vi. 31; 2 Mac. xii. 32 Mark iii. 18. [Edom.]

IDUME'ANS or IDUMÉ'ANS (יוֹדֵמֵא: Ishmael), 2 Mac. x. 15, 16. [Edomites.]

IGAL (יגאל [known God redounds or avenges]), 1. (Iqqal: Alex. Iqal: Igal). Son of Joseph, of the tribe of Issachar, chosen by Moses to represent that tribe among the spies who went up from Kadesh to search the Promised Land (Num. xi. 7).

a That temples in Syria, dedicated to the several deities, did not be found in names of the places where they stood, is evident from the testimony of Leechman, as Assyrian himself. His derivation of Hera from the temple of the Assyrian Hera shows that he was familiar with the circumstance (de Dea Syr. c. 1). Balansapes ( = Beth-shemesh), a town of Arabia, derived its name from the sun-worship (Vossius, de Theol. Gent. ii. c. 8), like Kir Heres (Jer. xvi. 31) of Moab.
IGDALIÁH (יִגְדַּלְיָה), also Igda'lu or Igdaliahu. This name is identical with Igdalihu, a son of Shemaiah, a descendant of the royal house of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 32). It is fourth in descent from Zerubbabel, and, according to Lord A. Hervey’s plausible alteration, is the son of Shimea, brother to Zerubbabel, and therefore but one generation distant from the latter (Genealogy of our Lord, pp. 107-109). The name is identical with Igal (2 Sam. xxii. 36). It is given to Joel, son of Zared (2 Chr. xxvii. 2). The Targum Pseudojon. by Gizeh, possibly pointing to sheep-shearing in the holy land. In its usual sense, all of the text has given it as Joel.

Igal (יְגוֹל, [Heb. גַּל], a town in the extreme south of Judah, named in the same group with Beer-sheba, Hormah, etc. (Josh. xv. 29). The Peshito Syriac version has Elin, אֵילֶּן. No trace of the name has yet been discovered in this direction.

ILLYRICUM (Iλλύρικον), an extensive district lying along the eastern coast of the Adriatic from the boundary of Italy on the north to Epirus on the south, and contiguous to Moesia and Macedonia on the east: it was divided by the river Drino into two portions Illyris Barbara, the northern, and Illyris Graea, the southern. Within these limits was included Pithonitis, which appears to have been used indifferently with Illyricum for a portion, and ultimately for the whole of the district. St. Paul records that he preached the gospel “round about unto Illyricum” (Rom. xv. 19). He probably uses the term in its most extensive sense, and the port visited (if indeed he crossed the boundary at all) would have been about Dyrachium.

W. L. B.

* In Rom. xv. 19 Paul speaks of his having preached the gospel "from Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum." We have no account in the Acts of the Apostles of any journey to that province. But this sort of interlacings of the two literature which we can insert this journey in the history so as to bring the Acts and the Epistles into accordance with each other on this point. Illyricum lay on the Adriatic, west of Macedonia. Paul now was in Macedonia only three times during his ministry. He could not have gone to Illyricum when he was there first: for the course of his journey at that time is minutely traced in the Acts from his landing at Neapolis to his leaving Corinith on his return by sea to Palestine. In going south on that occasion he moved along the eastern side of the peninsula, and was kept at a distance from Illyricum (Acts xvi. 12 ff.). Nor, again, could it have been when he passed through Macedonia on his return thither from Greece at the time of his last journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 1 ff.); for the excursion to Illyricum must have preceded this return. He had then written the Epistle to the Romans, in which he speaks ofhaving already been to Illyricum; and that epistle he wrote at Corinth just before his departure thence for Macedonia (see Rom. xvi. i. 23, and comp. 1 Cor. i. 14). His only other visit to Macedonia was the intermediate one when he came to that region from Troas on the way to southern Greece (Acts xx. 1. 2). No mention is made of Illyricum at that time, but in describing the circuit of the Apostle's labors here, Luke employs the comprehensive expression "those parts" (τὰ ἐμπρος ἐκεῖνα). We may assume, therefore, that one of the "parts," or regions, was Illyricum, which was adjacent to Macedonia; and so much the more, because the chronology of this portion of Paul's life allows us to assign the ample time of three or four months to just these labors in Northern Greece before he proceeded to Achata or Corinth. Thus the epistle and the history, so incomplete and obscure apart from each other, form a perfect whole when brought together, and that by a combination of circumstances, of which the two writers could have had no thought when they penned their different accounts. Lardner pronounces this geographical and historical coincidence sufficiently important to authenticate the entire narrative of Paul's travels as related in the Acts of the Apostles.

* IMAGERY, CHAMBERS OF, or chambers of images (Ezok. viii. 12). The Hebrew is הָרִישֵׁיתִּים יִונות דִּוָּנִים ָּוָּו, and of this a literal translation would be: "Each one in the chamber or apartment of his image." Many of the commentators transfer the suffix pronoun to the first noun, and render: " Each one in his apartment of images" (see Rosenmüller, Maurer, and others). But the pronoun may perhaps be added to the last noun to show that different persons had different objects of worship. The whole passage (vv. 7-12 inclusive) represents a scene of idolatrous worship which was disclosed to the prophet as through a secret door of entrance (vv. 7, 8). On the walls of the apartment were portrayed "every form of creeping thing and abominable beasts, and all the Ẓed of the house of Israel" (ver. 10); and seventy men of the elders of the house of Israel (according to the number of the Sanhedrin), with their president (Jaaazaniah) stood before these pictures, each with his censer in his hand, and offered incense (ver. 11). That this idol worship was introduced from Egypt is plain from the kind of objects portrayed, as indicated in ver. 10; whilst in subsequent verses idle and profane practices which had their origin from Phoenicia (ver. 14) and Ezra (ver. 16), are brought to view. A similar chamber of imagery is referred to in Ez. xxviii. 14: "Where she sat men portrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans portrayed with vermillion," etc. Representations found among the ruins of Nineveh, as well as in Egypt, furnish good illustrations of the practices here referred to.

IMLA (ימלך) [filled, full; or fullford]: יִשְׂרָאֵל: [Ez. i. 14.] Alex. Ἰώσ : Jerusalem, father or progenitor of Miasiah, the prophet of Jehovah, who was consulted by Ahab and Jehoshaphat before their fatal expedition to Ramoth-gilead (2 Chr. xviii. 7, 8). The form —

IMLAH (יִמלֵה) : יִשְׂרָאֵל; [Ez. i. 14., i. 14:] Alex. Ἰώσ : Jerusalem, is employed in the parallel narrative (1 K. xxii. 8, 9).

IMMANUEL (יִמְנַעְל) [with us God], or in two words in many MSS. and editions יְמִנְעָל: יְמִנְעָא: Emmanuel), the symbolical name given by the prophet Isiaiah to the child who was announced to Ahaz and the people of Judah, as the sign which God would give of their deliverance from their enemies (Is. vii. 14). It is applied by the Apostle Matthew to the Messiah, born of the Virgin (Matt. i. 23). By the LXX. in one passage (Is. vii. 14), and in both passages by the Vulg., Syr., and Targ., it is rendered as a proper name; but in Is. vii. 8 the LXX. translate it literally μεθ' ἰδων καὶ ἐπερ. The verbs in question have been the battle-field of critics for centuries, and in their discussions there has been no lack of the odium theologorum. As early as the times of Justin Martyr the Christian interpretation was attacked by the Jews, and the position which they occupied has of late years been assumed by many continental theologians. Before proceeding to a discussion, or rather to a classification of the numerous theories of which this subject has been the fruitful source, the circumstances under which the prophecy was delivered claim especial consideration.

In the early part of the reign of Ahaz the kingdom of Judah was threatened with annihilation by the combined armies of Syria and Israel. A hundred and twenty thousand of the choice warriors of Judah, all "sons of might," had fallen in one day's battle. The Edomites and Philistines had thrown off the yoke (2 Chr. xxviii.). Jerusalem was menaced with a siege; the hearts of the king and of the people shook, as the trees of a forest shake before the wind" (Is. vii. 2). The king had gone to "the conduit of the upper pool," probably to take measures for preventing the supply of water from being cut off or falling into the enemy's hand, when the prophet met him with the message of consolation. Not only were the designs of the hostile armies to fail, but within sixty-five years the kingdom of Israel would be overthrown. In confirmation of his words, the prophet bids Ahaz ask a sign of Jehovah, which the king, with pretended humility, refused to do. After administering a severe rebuke to Ahaz for his obstinacy, Isaiah announces the sign which Jehovah himself would give unveiled: "Behold! the virgin (Virgo) is with child and shall bear a son, and he shall be called IMMANUEL." The interpreters of this passage are naturally divided into three classes, each of which admits of subdivisions, as the differences in detail are numerous. The first class consists of those who refer the fulfillment of the prophecy to a historical event, which followed immediately upon its delivery. The majority of Christian writers, till within the last fifty years, form a second class, and apply the prophecy exclusively to the Messiah, while a third class, almost equally numerous, agree in considering both these explanations true, and hold that the prophecy had an immediate and literal fulfillment, but was completely accomplished in the miraculous conception and birth of Christ. Among the first are numbered the Jewish writers of all ages, without exception. Jerome refutes, on chronological grounds, a theory which was current in his day amongst the Jews, that the prophecy had reference to Hezekiah, the son of Ahaz, who from a comparison of 2 K. xvi. 2 with xviii. 21, must have been nine years old at the time it was delivered. The force of Jerome's argument is somewhat weakened by the evident obscurity of the numbers in the passages in question, from which we must infer that Ahaz was eleven years old at the time of Hezekiah's birth. By the Jews in the middle ages this explanation was abandoned as unceaseable, and in consequence some, as Jarchi and Menahem, refer the prophecy to a son of Isaiah himself, and others to a son of Ahaz by another wife, as Kimchi and Michaelis. In this case, the 'almah is explained as the wife or betrothed wife of the prophet, or as a later wife of Ahaz. Kelle (Genes. Comm. iiber den Jesus) degrades her to the third rank of ladies in the harem (comp. Cant. vi. 8). Hitzig (des Prophet. Jesu) rejects Gesenius's application of 'almah to a second wife of the prophet, and interprets it of the prophetess mentioned in viii. 3. Hengstwurck (des Prophet. Jesu) follows Gesenius. In either case, the prophet is made to fulfill his own prophecy. In Ahaz's day, a pupil of Michaelis, defended the historical sense with considerable learning, and suffered unworthy persecution for expressing his opinion. The 'almah in his view was some Hebrew girl who was present at the colloquy between Isaiah and Ahaz, and to whom the prophet pointed as he spoke. This opinion was held by Baer, Cebot, and Rosenmüller (1st ed.). Michaelis, Eichhorn, Paulus, and Anselm give her merely the existent existence; while Umbreit allows her to be among the bystanders, but explains the pregnancy and birth as imaginary only. Interpreters of the second class, who refer the prophecy solely to the Messiah, of course understand by the 'almah the Virgin Mary. Among these, Vitringa (Ons Ster, v. e. 1) vigorously opposes those, who, like Grutius, Pellicanus, and Trinatus, conceded to the Jews that the reference to Christ was not direct and immediate, but by way of typical allusion. For, he maintains, a young married woman of the time of Ahaz and Isaiah could not be a type of the Virgin, nor could her issue by her husband be a figure of the child to be born of the Virgin by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Against this hypothesis of a solely Messianic reference, it is objected that the birth of the Messiah could not be a sign of deliverance to the people of Judah in the time of Ahaz. In reply to this, Theodoret advances the opinion that the birth of the Messiah involved the conservation of the family of Jesse, and therefore by implication of the Jewish state. Calvinists argue on the same side, that the sign of the Messiah's birth would intimate that in the interval the kingdom and state of the Jews could not be alienated from God, and besides it confirms ver. 8, indicating that before the birth of Christ Judah should not be subject to Syria, as it was when Acheleans was removed and it was reduced to the form of a Roman province. All these explanations Vitringa disapproves, and states his own conclusion, which is also that of Michaelis, is as follows: In vv. 14-16, the prophet gives a sign to the pious in Israel of their deliverance from the impending danger, and in ver. 17, &c., announces the evils which the Assyrians, not the Syrians, should inflict upon Ahaz and such of his people as resembled him. As surely as Messiah would be born of the Virgin, so surely would God deliver the Jews from the threatened evil. The principle of interpretation here made use of is founded by Calvin on the custom of the prophets, who confirmed special promises by the assurance that God would send a redeemer. But this explanation involves another difficulty, besides that which arises from the distance of the event predicted. Before the child shall arrive at years of discretion the prophet announces the desolation of the land whose kings threatened Ahaz. By this Vitringa understands that no more time would elapse before the former event was accomplished than would intervene between the birth and youth of Immanuel, an argument too far-fetched to have much weight. Hengstenberg (Christologia, ii. 44-66, Eng. trans.) supports to the full the Messianic interpretation, and closely connects vii. 14 with ix. 6. He admits frankly that the older explanation of vv. 15, 16, has exposed itself to the charge of being arbitrary, and confidently proclaims his own method of removing the stumbling-block. "In ver. 14 the prophet had seen the birth of the Messiah as present. Holding fast this idea and expanding it, the prophet makes him who has been born accompany the people through all the stages of its existence. We have here an ideal anticipation of the real incarnation . . . . What the prophet means, and intends to say here is, that, in the spiritual, the birth of the holy kingdom would already have taken place. As the representative of the contemporaries, he brings forward the wonderful child who, as it were, formed the soul of the popular life. . . . In the subsequent prophecy, the same wonderful child, grown up into a warlike hero, brings the deliverance from Assur, and the world's power represented by it."
in the case of Asshur, but denies its application to Immanuel. It would be hard to say whether text or commentary be the more obscure. In view of the difficulties which attend these explanations of the prophecy, the third class of interpreters are led to have recourse to a theory which combines the two preceding, namely, the hypothesis of the double sense. They suppose that the immediate reference of the prophet was to some contemporary occurrence, but that his words received their true and full accomplishment in the birth of the Messiah. Jerome (Comm. in Ewewm. vii. 14) mentions an interpretation of some Judaeans that Immanuel was the son of Isaiah, born of the prophetess, as a type of the Saviour, and that his name indicates the calling of the nations after the Word became flesh and dwelt among us. Something of the same kind is proposed by Dahse: in his opinion the miracle, while it immediately respected the times of the prophet, was a type of the birth of Christ of the Virgin Mary." Dr. Pye Smith conjectured that it had an immediate reference to Hezekiah, "the virgin" being the queen of Ahaz, but, like some other prophetic testimonies, real and fiction, and a designed reference to some remoter circumstance, which when it occurred would be the real fulfillment, answering every feature and filling up the entire extent of the original delineation (Scrip. Test. to the Messiah, i. 357, 3d ed.). A serious objection to the application of the prophecy to Hezekiah has already been mentioned. Kennicott separates ver. 16 from the three preceding, applying the latter to Christ, the former to the son of Isaiah (alluded to in Vs. vii. 13-16).

Such in brief are some of the principal opinions which have been held on this important question. From the manner in which the quotation occurs in Matt. i. 23, there can be no doubt that the Evangelist did not use it by way of accommodation, but as having in view its actual accomplishment. Whatever may have been his opinion as to any contemporary or immediate reference it might contain, this was completely obscured by the full conviction that burst upon him when he realized its completion in the Messiah. What may have been the light in which the promise was regarded by the prophet's contemporaries we are not in a position to judge; the hypothesis of the double sense satisfies most of the requirements of the problem, and as it does less violence to the text than the others which have been proposed, and is at the same time supported by the analogy of the Apostle's quotations from the O. T. (Matt. ii. 15, 18, 23; iv. 15), we accept it as approximating most nearly to the true solution. W. A. W.

INCENSE

The learned professor thus admits the double sense in the case of Asshur, but denies its application to Immanuel. It would be hard to say whether text or commentary be the more obscure.

In view of the difficulties which attend these explanations of the prophecy, the third class of interpreters are led to have recourse to a theory which combines the two preceding, namely, the hypothesis of the double sense. They suppose that the immediate reference of the prophet was to some contemporary occurrence, but that his words received their true and full accomplishment in the birth of the Messiah. Jerome (Comm. in Ewewm. vii. 14) mentions an interpretation of some Judaeans that Immanuel was the son of Isaiah, born of the prophetess, as a type of the Saviour, and that his name indicates the calling of the nations after the Word became flesh and dwelt among us. Something of the same kind is proposed by Dahse: in his opinion the miracle, while it immediately respected the times of the prophet, was a type of the birth of Christ of the Virgin Mary." Dr. Pye Smith conjectured that it had an immediate reference to Hezekiah, "the virgin" being the queen of Ahaz, but, like some other prophetic testimonies, real and fiction, and a designed reference to some remoter circumstance, which when it occurred would be the real fulfillment, answering every feature and filling up the entire extent of the original delineation (Scrip. Test. to the Messiah, i. 357, 3d ed.). A serious objection to the application of the prophecy to Hezekiah has already been mentioned. Kennicott separates ver. 16 from the three preceding, applying the latter to Christ, the former to the son of Isaiah (alluded to in Vs. vii. 13-16).

of the perfumes stacte, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense. All incense which was not made of these ingredients was called ḳabōth ẓirah (בתולה צירה), Ex. xxx. 9, and was forbidden to be offered. According to Rashi on Ex. xxx. 34, the above-mentioned perfumes were mixed in equal proportions, seventy manehs being taken of each. They were compounded by the skill of the apothecary, to whose use, according to rabbinical tradition, was devoted a portion of the temple, called, from the name of the family whose especial duty it was to prepare the incense, "the house of Abinetes." So in the large temples of India "is retained a man whose chief business it is to distill sweet waters from flowers, and to extract oil from wood, flowers, and other substances" (Roberts, Oriental Illustrations, p. 82).

The priest or Levite to whose care the incense was intrusted, was one of the fifteen ᵇᵉƚᵉⁿⁱⁿᵃ版权归ו (memunavo), or prefects of the temple. Constant watch was kept in the house of Abinetes that the incense might always be in readiness (Buxtorf, Lextr. Talm., s. v. דְּנֵנְסַנְנֶנָנָך). In addition to the four ingredients already mentioned, Jarchi enumerates seven others, thus making eleven, which the Jewish doctors affirm were communicated to Moses on Mount Sinai. Josephus (B. J. v. 5, § 5) mentions thirteen. The proportions of the additional spices are given by Maimonides (Veʾem haʾmanitshab, ii. 2, § 9) as follows:

- Of myrrh, cassia, spikenard, and saffron, sixteen manehs each.
- Of costus, twelve manehs.
- Of cinnamon, nine manehs.
- Of sweet balsam, sweet balsam, and myrrh, two manehs each.

The weight of the whole confection was 368 manehs. To these was added the fourth part of a cab of salt of Solomon, with amber of Jordan, and an herb called "the smoke-raiser" (בַּעֲרֵב הַשְׁעָל, moḥaṭ ahbaḥ), known only to the cunning in such matters, to whom the secret descended by tradition. In the ordinary daily service one maneh was used, half in the morning and half in the evening. Allowing then one maneh of incense for each day of the solar year, the three manehs which remained were again pounded, and used by the high-priest on the day of atonement (Lev. xxvi. 12). At night it was constantly kept in the temple (Jos. B. J. vi. 8, § 3).

The incense possessed the threefold characteristic of being salted (not tempered as in A. V.), pure and holy. Salt was the symbol of incorruptness, and nothing, says Maimonides, was offered without it, except the wine of the drink-offerings, the blood, and the wool (cf. Lev. ii. 19).

The expression ṭבּוּב תִּבּוּב (beḥel habōb), Ex. xxx. 34, is interpreted by the Chaldeans "weight by weight," that is, an equal weight of each (cf. Jarchi, in loc.); and this rendering is adopted by our version. Others however, and among them Aleni Ezra and Maimonides, consider it as signifying that each of the spices was separately prepared, and that all were afterwards mixed. The incense thus compounded was specially set apart for the service of the sanctuary: its desecration was punished with death (Ex. xxx. 37, 38); and in some part of India, according to Michaelis (Mosaisch. Recht, art. 249), it was considered high treason for any person to make use of the best sort of Cymbellon, which was for the service of the king in India.

The second temple of the office devoted upon the inferior priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot (Mishna, Yoma, ii. 4; Luke i. 9), each morning and evening (Abarnel on Lev. x. 1). A peculiar blessing was supposed to be attached to this service, and in order that all might share in it, the lot was cast among those who were "new to the incense," if any remained (Mishna, Yoma, l. c.; Barcena in Tanum, v. 2). Uzziah was punished for his presumption in attempting to infringe the prerogatives of the descendants of Aaron, who were consecrated to burn incense (2 Chr. xxvi. 16-21; Jos. Ant. ix. 10, 4). The officiating priest appointed another, whose office it was to take the fire from the brazen altar. According to Maimonides (Tumid, iii. 8, l. c. 5) this fire was taken from the second pile, which was over against the S. E. corner of the altar of burnt-offering, and was of fig-tree wood. A silver shovel (תַּנְכָּה, maḥatḥah) was first filled with the live coals, and afterwards emptied into a golden one, smaller than the former, so that some of the coals were spilled (Mishna, Tanum, v. 5, Yoma, iv. 4; cf. Rev. viii. 5). Another priest cleared the golden altar from the cinders which had been left at the previous offering of incense (Mishna, Tanum, iii. 6, 9, vi. 1).

The times of offering incense were specified in the instructions first given to Moses (Ex. xxx. 7, 8). The morning incense was offered when the lamps were trimmed in the holy place, and before the sacrifice, when the watchman set for the purpose announced the break of day (Mishna, Yoma, iii. 1, 5). When the lamps were lighted "between the evenings," after the evening sacrifice and before the drink-offerings were offered, incense was again burnt on the golden altar, which "belonged to the oracle" (1 K. vi. 22), and stood before the veil which separated the holy place from the Holy of Holies, the throne of God (Rev. viii. 4; Philo, de Anim. lib. § 3).

When the priest entered the holy place with the incense, all the people were removed from the temple, and from between the porch and the altar (Maimon. Tumid. Umus. iii. 3; cf. Luke i. 10). The incense was then brought from the house of Abinetes in a large vessel of gold called ṭבּוּב (cypar), in which was a phial (תַּנְכָּה, bezale, properly "a soler") containing the incense (Mishna, Tanum, v. 4). The assistant priests who attended to the lamps, the clearing of the golden altar from the cinders, and the fetching fire from the altar of burnt-offering, performed their offices singly, bowed towards the ark of the covenant, and left the holy place before the priest, whose lot it was to offer incense, entered. Profound silence was observed among the congregation who were praying without (cf. Rev. viii. 1); and at a signal from the high-priest the incense on the fire (Mishna, Tanum, vi. 3), and bowing reverently towards the Holy of Holies retired slowly backwards, not prolonging his prayer that he might not alarm the congregation, or cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily (Lev. xvi. 13; Luke i. 21: Mishna, Yoma, v. 1). When he came out he pronounced the blessing in Num. vi. 24-26, the "magpopshah," said, and the Levites burst forth into song, accompanied by the full swell of the temple music, the sound of which, say the Rabbins, could be heard as far as Jericho (Mishna, Tanum, iii. 8). It is possible that this may be
The priest then emptied the censer in a clean place, and hung it on one of the horns of the altar of burnt-offering.

On the day of atonement the service was different. The high-priest, after sacrificing the bullock as a sin-offering and the ram for his own sin-offering, took incense in his left hand and a golden censer filled with live coals from the west side of the brazen altar (Jarchi on Lev. xvi. 12) in his right, and went into the Holy of Holies. He then placed the censer upon the ark between the two bars. In the second temple, where there was no ark, a stone was substituted. Then sprinkling the incense upon the coals, he stayed till the house was filled with smoke, and walking slowly backwards came without the veil, where he prayed for a short time (Maimonides, Vayikra; quoted by Ainsworth on Lev. xvi. Outram de S. Scitificis, i. 8, § 11).

The offering of incense has formed a part of the religious ceremonies of most ancient nations. The Egyptians burnt resin in honor of the sun at its rising, myrrh when in its meridian, and a mixture called Kuphi at its setting (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. v. 315). Polybius (iv. 24, i. 31, 80) describes Kuphi as a mixture of sixteen ingredients "in the temple of Siva incense is offered to the Lingam six times in twenty-four hours" (Roberts, Oriental, Illus. p. 468). It was an element in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites (Jer. xii. 12, 17, xviii. 35; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 25).

With regard to the symbolic meaning of incense, opinions have been many and widely differing. While Maimonides regarded it merely as a perfume designed to counteract the effluvia arising from the beasts which were slaughtered for the daily sacrifice, other interpreters have allowed their imaginations to run riot, and vied with the wildest speculations of the Midrashim. Philo (Qv. ver. deo. hcr. sit. § 41, p. 501) conceives the stacte and onycha to be symbolic of water and earth; galbanum and frankincense of air and fire. Josephus, following the traditions of his time, believed that the ingredients of the incense were chosen from the products of the sea, the inhabited and the uninhabited parts of the earth, to indicate that all things are of God and for God (B. J. v. 5, § 5). As the temple or tabernacle was the palace of Jehovah, the theocratic king of Israel, and the ark of the covenant his throne, so the incense, in the opinion of some, corresponded to the perfumes in which the luxurious monarchs of the East delighted. It may mean all this, but it must mean much more.

Grotius, on Ex. xxx. 1, says the mystical significance is "suraum halenda corda." Cornelius a Lapide, on Ex. xxx. 34, considers it as an apt emblem of propitiation, and finds a symbolic meaning in the several ingredients. Fairbairn (Typology of Scripture, ii. 320), with many others, looks upon prayer as the reality of which incense is the symbol, founding his conclusion upon Ps. cxii. 2.; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, 4. Bähr (*Symb. d. Mose Cult. vol. i., vi. § 4) opposes this view of the subject, on the ground that the chief thing in offering incense, is not the producing of the smoke, which presses like prayer towards heaven, but the spreading of the fragrance. His own exposition may be summed up as follows: Prayer, among all oriental nations, signifies calling upon the name of God. The offering of incense is doubtless a commemoration of the several titles of God. The Scripture places incense in close relationship to prayer, so that offering incense is synonymous with worship.

Hence incense itself is a symbol of the name of God. The ingredients of the incense correspond severally to the perfections of God, though it is impossible to decide to which of the four names of God each belongs. Perhaps stacte corresponds to עַלְפִיָּה (laphpha), onycha to לָשׁוֹנָה (lashonah), gallanum to אַלְפִּיָּה (alapha), and frankincense to עַלְפִּיָּה (alapha).

Such is Bähr's exposition of the symbolism of incense, rather ingenious than logical. Looking upon incense in connection with the other ceremonial observances of the Mosaic ritual, it would rather seem to be symbolical, not of prayer itself, but of that which makes prayer acceptable, the intercession of Christ. In Rev. viii. 3, 4, the incense is spoken of as something distinct from, though offered with, the prayers of all the saints (cf. Luke i. 10); and in Rev. v. 8 it is the golden vials, and not the odors or incense, which are said to be the prayers of saints. Ps. cxii. 2, at first sight, appears to militate against this conclusion; but if it be argued from this passage that incense is an emblem of prayer, it must also be alluded that the evening sacrifice has the same symbolic meaning.

The name of India does not occur in the Bible before the book of Esther, where it is noticed as the limit of the territories of Ahasuerus in the east, as Ethiopia was in the west (I. 1; viii. 9); the names are similarly connected by Herodotus (vii. 9). The Hebrew form "Hindu" is an abbreviation of "Hinduva," which is identical with the indigenous names of the river Indus, "Hindu," or "Sindhu," and again with the ancient name of the country as it appears in the Vendidad, "Hapta Hindu." The native form "Sindhu" is noticed by Pliny (vi. 23). The India of the book of Esther is not the peninsula of Hindostan, but the country surrounding the Indus—the Panjik, and perhaps Seicle—the India which Herodotus describes (iii. 88) as forming part of the Persian empire under Darius, and the India which at a later period was conquered by Alexander the Great. The name occurs in the inscriptions of Persepolis and Nakshish-I-Istum, but not in those of Bishistin (Rawilson, Herod. ii. 483). In 1 Macc. viii. 8, India is reckoned among the countries which Emenees, king of Pergamus, received out of the former possessions of Antiochus the Great. It is clear that India proper cannot be understood, insomuch as this never belonged either to Antiochus or Emenees. At the same time none of the explanations offered by commentators are satisfactory: the Eneti of Ephphagnia have been suggested, but these people had disappeared long before (Strab. xii. 534); the India of Xenophon (Cyrop. i. 5, § 3, ii. 2, § 25), which may have been above the Carian stream named Indus (Ibn. v. 29, probably the Calis), is more likely; but the enumeration "Mysia and Ionia" for India et India, offers the best solution of the difficulty. (DONIA.).

A more authentic notice of the country occurs in 1 Macc. vii. 37, where Indians are noticed as the drivers of the war-elephants introduced into the army of the Syrian king. (See also 1 Esdr. iii. 2; Esth. xiii. 1; xvi. 1.)

But though the name of India occurs so seldom, the products and introductions of that country must have been tolerably well known to the Jews. There is undoubted evidence that an active trade was carried on between India and Western Asia: the Tyrants established their depots on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and procured "horns of ivory and ebony," "broidered work and rich apparel" (Ex. xxvii. 15, 24), by a route which crossed the Arabian desert by land, and then followed the coasts of the Indian ocean by sea. The trade opened by Solomon with "Ophir through the Red Sea chiefly consisted of Indian articles, and some of the names even of the articles, adjutianum, "smoked wood," kudjia, "apex," liucrtin, "peacocks," are of Indian origin (Humboldt, Kosmos, ii. 133); to which we may add the Hebrew name of the "topaz," "pithah," derived from the Sanscrit pitah. There is a strong probability that productions of yet greater utility were furnished by India through Syria to the shores of Europe, and that the Greeks derived both the term karakrtios (comp. the Sanscrit karatira), and the article it represents, "tin," from the coasts of India. The connection thus established with India led to the opinion that the Indians were included under the etiological title of Cush (Gen. x. 6), and hence the Syrian, Chaldean, and Arabic versions frequently render that term by India or Indus, as in 2 Chr. xvi. 16; Is. xi. 19, xviii. 1; Jer. xiii. 23; Zeph. iii. 10. For the connection which some have sought to establish between India and Paradise, see EwN [See on this word Keil's 12th, ed. Gen. Tich. p. 83.—II.]

INFIDEL, known to our Bible phraseology only in 2 Tim. vi. 15, and 1 Tim. v. 8. Instead of this positive term the privative "unbeliever" (ἀπιστός) is more correct, a distinction elsewhere observed in the rendering. The A. V. misses also the alliteration in the former of the above passages.

INHERITANCE. [HEIR.]

INK, INK-HORN. [WRITING.]

INK (יוֹם, mid.: קְתָלָא, παρδ庭审). The Hebrew word thus rendered literally signifies "a lodging-place for the night." A "inn" in our sense of the term, were, as they still are, unknown in the East, where hospitality is religiously practiced. The khans, or caravanserais, are the representatives of European inns, and these were established but gradually. It is doubtful whether there is any allusion to them in the Old Testament. The "hunting-place of a caravan" was selected originally on account of its proximity to water or pasture, by which the travellers pitched their tents and passed the night. Such was undoubtedly the "inn," at which occurred the incident in the life of Moses, narrated in Ex. iv. 24. It was probably one of the halting-places of the Israelitish merchants who traded to Egypt, with their camels-loads of spices. Moses was on his journey from the land of Midian, and the merchants in Gen. xxxix. are called indiscriminately Israelites and Midianites. At one of these stations, too, the first which they reached after leaving the city, and no doubt within a short distance from it, Joseph's brethren discovered that their money had been replaced in their wallets (Gen. xlii. 27).

Increased commercial intercourse, and in later times religious enthusiasm for pilgrimages gave rise to the establishment of more permanent accommodation for travellers. On the more frequented routes, remote from towns (Jer. ix. 2), caravanserais were in course of time erected, often at the expense of the wealthy. The following description of one of those on the road from Baghdad to Babylon will suffice for all: "It is a large and substantial square building, in the distance resembling a fortress, being surrounded with a lofty wall, and flanked by round towers to defend the inmates in case of attack. Passing through a strong gateway, the guest enters a large court, the sides of which are divided into numerous arched compartments, open in front, for the accommodation of separate parties and for the reception of goods. In the centre is a spacious raised platform, used for sleeping upon at night, or for the devotions of the faithful during the day. Between the outer wall and the compartments are wide vaulted arcades, extending round the entire building, where the beasts of burden are placed. Upon the roof of the arcades is an excellent terrace, and over the gateway an elevated tower containing two rooms—one of which is open at the sides, permitting the occupants to enjoy every breath of air that passes across the heated plain. The terrace is tolerably clean; but the court and stables below are ankle-deep in chopped straw and filth." (Letts, Chabba, p. 13.)

The great khans established by the Persian kings and great men, at intervals of about six miles on the roads from Baghda to the sacred places, are provided with stables for the horses of the pilgrims. "Within these stables, on both sides, are other cells for travellers." (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 478, note.) The "stall" or "stallier," mentioned in Luke ii. 7, was probably in a stable of this kind. Such khans are sometimes situated near running streams, or have a supply of water of some kind, but the traveller must carry all his provisions with him (Onsea, Trav. in Persia, i. 241, note). At Damascus the khans are many of them, substantial buildings; the small rooms which surround the court, as well as those above them which are entered from the sides, are used by the merchants of the city for depositing their goods (Porter's Damascus, i. 33). The erebeks of modern Egypt are of a similar description (Lane, Maf, Fig. ii. 10). "The house of paths" (Prov. viii. 2, fr obov διδον, Tur. Test.), where Wisdom took her stand, is understood by some to refer appropriately to a khan built where many ways met and frequented by many travellers. A similar meaning has been attached to ἕλαμ, ἐλαμ, ge'ran Chimah, "the hostel of Chimham" (Jer. xi. 17), beside Bethlehem, built by the liberality of the son of Kirzilii for the benefit of those who were going down to Egypt. (Noy, 8, p. 163; App. § 90.) The Targum says, "which David gave to Chimham, son of Kirzilii the Gileadite" (comp. 2 Sam. xix. 37, 38). With regard to this passage, the ancient versions are strangely at variance. The LXX. had evidently another reading with διδον and διδος, which they left untranslated απαθονομος, Alex. due to the same cause. Paulus, the friend of Jerome, built several on the road to Bethlehem; and the Scotch and Irish residents in France erected hospitals for the use of pilgrims of their own nation, on their way to Rome. (Brunnermann, Hist. of Inv. ii. 457). Hence Auspit, hostis, and Famili hostis.
A. inmfell on the road and was left by his comrades at an inn, under the charge of the hostess (γηνηγεκσαυαυ), pündelth = παντεκυπτρια). On their return to inquire for their friend, the hostess told them he was dead and buried, but they refused to believe her till she produced his staff, wallet, and roll of the law. In Josh. ii. 1, Ἱουαθ, zînâth, the term applied to Rahab, is rendered in the Targum of Jonathan נונקיס, pündelth, "a woman who keeps an inn." So in Judg. xi. 1, of the mother of Jephthah; of Delilah (Judg. xvi. 1) and the two women who appealed to Solomon (1 K. iii.
16). The words, in the opinion of Kimchi on Josh.
ii. 1, appear to have been synonymous.

In some parts of modern Syria a nearer approach has been made to the European system. The people of el-Salih, according to Hurkarth, support four taverns (Menšel or Melḫiya) at the public expense.
At these the traveller is furnished with everything he may require, so long as he chooses to remain, provided his stay is not unreasonably protracted.
The expenses are paid by a tax on the heads of families, and a kind of landlord superintends the establishment (Trav. in Syria, p. 36).

W. A. W.

The statement ascribed above to Hurkarth is not strictly correct. In modern Syria, in all villages not provided with a khân, there is a house, usually the dwelling of the sheikh, which is called the menzoul, which is the place of entertainment of all strangers who are not visiting at the houses of friends. One of the officials is officially designated as the khowit or caterer, and his business is to direct strangers to the menzoul, to supply them with provisions and folder if required, to keep off the intrusive visits of children and idlers, and to provide a place of safety for the animals at night.
It is not customary for the village to furnish these supplies gratis, but the traveller pays for them at usual rates, the caterer being the referee in case of a dispute between the buyer and seller. The caterer receives a compensation for his services proportioned to the generosity of the traveller.

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. A word employed by our translators in the N. T. with the force of urgency or earnestness, to render five distinct Greek words. We still say "at the instance of," but as that sense is no longer attached to "instant"—though it is still to the verb "insist," and to other compounds of the same root, such as "persist," "constant"—it has been thought advisable to notice its occurrences. They afford an interesting example, if an additional one be needed, of the close connection which there is between the Authorized Version and the Vulgate; the Vulgate having, as will be seen, suggested the word in three out of its five occurrences.

1. στουσαίον—"they besought Him instantly"
(Luke vii. 4). This word is elsewhere commonly rendered "earnestly," which is very suitable here.

2. ετέκειατο, from ετέκειαμαι, to lie upon:—
"they were instant with loud voices" (Vulg. in-stantam), Luke xxii. 23. This might be rendered
"they were pressing" (as in ver. 1).

3. εν έκτενειας, "instantly serving God" (Acts xxvi. 7). The metaphor at the root of this word is that of stretching—or the stretch. Elsewhere in the A. V. it is represented by "fervently:"

4. προσπαθετούντες, "continuing instante" (Rom.
ii. 12), Vulg. instantes. Here the adjective

Eastern inn or caravanserai.

is hardly necessary, the word being elsewhere rendered by "continuing" — or to preserve the rhythm of so familiar a sentence — "continuing steadfastly." (as Acts ii. 42).

b. Εἰσπέρτητι, from ἐσπέρταν, to stand by or upon — "be instant in season, out of season." (2 Tim. iv. 2). Vulg. "intera." Four verses further on it is rendered, "as is hand." The sense is "stand ready," "be alert" for whatever may happen. Of the five words this is the only one which contains the same metaphor as "instant.

In Luke ii. 38, "that instant" is literally "that same hour," — ἐκείνης ἑκείνης.

* INWARD is used in the expression "my inward friends," for "familiar," "confidential." (A. V.) Job xix. 19 (借用浙江省, lit. men of my intimacy). The patriarch complains that those with whom he had been most familiar, to whom he had made known his most secret thoughts, had turned against him and abhorred him.

II. * INTEREST. [Loan; Usury.]

* INTERPRETER. [Prophef; Magic.]

IO'NIA ([Semitic] JT. JAVAN, which see) Ιονία. The substitution of this word for 7 I&Η-ηη in 1 Mace. viii. 8 (A. V. "India") is a conjecture of Grotius, without any authority of MSS. It must be acknowledged, however, that the change removes a great difficulty, especially if, as the same commentator suggests, ουραnia [MYRIA] be substituted for Μυσία or Μυδία in the same context. The passage refers to the cession of territory which the Romans forced Antiochus the Great to make: and it is evident that India and Media are nothing to the purpose, whereas Ionia and Mydia were among the districts cia Τουρας, which were given up to Eumeus.

As to the term Ionia, the name was given in early times to that part of the western coast of Asia Minor which lay between Eolis on the north and Paros on the south. These were properly ethnological terms, and had reference to the tribes of Greek settlers along this shore. Ionia, with its islands, was celebrated for its twelve, afterwards thirteen, cities; five of which, Ephesus, Smyrna, Miletus, Chios, and Samos, are conspicuous in the N. T. In Roman times Ionia ceased to have any political significance, being absorbed in the province of Asia. The term, however, was still occasionally used, as in Joseph. Ant. xvi. 2, § 3, from which passage we learn that the Jews were numerous in this district. This whole chapter in Josephus is very interesting, as a geographical illustration of that part of the coast. [JAVAN.] J. S. H.

IRAM

I, (Ira, [Vat.] Alex. Epar.) "The Iariate," named in the catalogue of David's great officers (2 Sam. xx. 26) as "priest to David." (8:2: A. V. "a chief ruler"). The Pesach version for "Iariate" has "from Jathir," i.e., probably JATRUS, where David had found friends during his troubles with Saul. [JATRUS] If this can be maintained, and it certainly has an air of probability, then this Ira is identical with —

2. (Irap, [Vat.: Epar, Irap] Alex. Epar, [Irap]) "Ira the Ihlrite" (II 77: A. V. omits the article), that is, the Jatrine, one of the heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40). [JATRUS; JATRUS; JATRUS]

3. (Irap, [Vat.: Epar, Irap] Alex. Irap; [in 1 Chr. xxvii.]: Οθονια, Alex. Erap, Comp. [Irap] Θυρα.) Another member of David's guard, a Tekoite, son of Ikkesh (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 28). Ira was leader of the sixth monthly course of 24,000, as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxvii. 9).

IRAD (יִרְאָד [fleet, reign, Dietr.]: Ira'd in both MSS.; Joseph. Ἰαρίδης; Syn. Idr; Ira'd), son of Enoch, grandson of Cain, and father of Mehujud (Gen. iv. 18).

IRAM (יִרְאָם [watchful, Dietr.]: Zaph'or; [Alex. Zaph'ori, Ἱραμ; Vat. in Chr. Zaph'or; Hiram;] belonging to a city, Ges.), a leader (117: LXX. ἵγραμος; "phyllarch," A. V. "duke") of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chr. i. 54), i.e., the chief of a family or tribe. He occurs in the list of "the names of the duke [that came] of Edom, according to their families, after their places, by their names" (Gen. xxxvi. 40-43); but none of these names is found in the genealogy of Esau's immediate descendants; the latter being separated from them by the enumeration of the sons of Seir and the kings of Edom, both in Gen. and Chr. They were certainly descendants of Esau, but in what generation is not known; evidently not in a remote one. The sacred records are generally confined to the history of the chosen race, and the reason of the exclusion of the Edomite genealogy beyond the second generation is thus explicable. In remarking on this gap in the genealogy, we must add that there appears to be no safe ground for supposing a chronological sequence of sons and grandsons of Esau, sons of Seir, kings of Edom, and lastly descendants of Esau again, ruling over the Edomites. These were probably in part, or wholly, contemporaneous: and ἴραμ, we think, should be regarded as signifying a chief of a tribe, etc. (as rendered above), rather than a king. The Jewish assertion that these terms signified the same rank, except that the former was uncrowned and the latter crowned, may be safely neglected.

The names of which "Iram is one are according to their families, after their places (or towns," כֵּֽלַּת, by their names" (ver. 49); and again (ver. 43), "These [are] the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations in the land of their possession.") These words imply that tribes and others had suggested the change of names before Grotius. It has been thought possible also that the error may have crept into the text in the process of transmission from the Aramaic.
places were called after their leaders and founders, and tend to confirm the preceding remarks on the descendants of Esau being chiefs of tribes, and probably more or less contemporaneous with each other, and with the kings and Horites named together with them in the same records. It has been suggested that the names we are considering are those of the tribes and places founded by Esau's immediate descendants, mentioned earlier in the record; but no proof has been adduced in support of this theory.

The time of the final destruction of the Horites is uncertain. By analogy with the conquest of Canaan (cf. Deut. ii. 12, 22) we may perhaps infer that it was not immediate on Esau's settlement. No identification of Iram has been found.

IR-HA-HERES, in A. V. THE CITY OF

DESTRUCTION (םָיִּֽוֹּלְַּיִּֽוֹ, var. סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ: פָּלְאָיִּֽוֹ וֹיֵֽלֹא; F. A. π. σαρήούυου; Comp. π. ἁνέρες) (Civitae Solis), the name or an appellation of a city in Egypt, mentioned only in Is. xxx. 18.

The reading סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ is that of most MSS. the Syr. Aq. and Theod., the other reading, סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ, is supported by the LXX., but only in form, by Symm. who has פָּלְאָיִּֽוֹ וֹיֵֽלֹא, and the Vulg. Gesenius (Thes. pp. 391 n, 522) prefers the latter reading. There are various explanations: we shall first take those that treat it as a proper name, then those that suppose it to be an appellation used by the prophet to denote the future of the city.

1. סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ, city of the sun, a translation of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, generally called in the Bible On, the Hebrew form of its civil name על (On), and once בֶּת-שָּם-שָּם, "the house of the sun" (Jer. xiii. 18), a more literal translation than this supposed one of the sacred name בֶּת-שָּם-שָּם.

2. סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ, or סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ, the city of the sun, a transcription in the second word of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, הַוָיִּֽוֹ, "the abode (lit. house) of the sun." This explanation would necessitate the omission of the article. The LXX. favor it.

3. סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ, a city destroyed, lit. "a city of destruction," in A. V. "the city of destruction," meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be destroyed, according to Isaiah's idiom.

4. סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ, a city preserved, meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be preserved. Gesenius, who proposes this construction, if the second word be not part of the name of the place, compares the Arabic حَرَسَة, "he guarded, kept, preserved," etc. It may be remarked that the word הַוָיִּֽוֹ or הַוָיִּֽוֹ in ancient Egyptian, probably signifies "a guardian." This rendering of Gesenius is, however, merely conjectural, and seems to have been favored by him on account of its directly contradicting the rendering last noticed.

The first of these explanations is highly improbable, for we find elsewhere both the sacred and the civil names of Heliopolis, so that a third name, merely a variety of the Hebrew rendering of the sacred name, is very unlikely. The name בֶּת-שָּם-שָּם is, moreover, a more literal translation in its first word of the Egyptian name than this supposed one. It may be remarked, however, as to the second word, that one of the towns in Palestine called בֶּת-שָּם-שָּם, a town of the Lord over against the borders of Judah and Dan, was not far from a Mount Heres, סָּמְּרַּיִּֽוֹ (Judg. i. 35), so that the two names as applied to the sun as an object of worship might probably be interchangeable. The second explanation, which we believe has not been hitherto put forth, is liable to the same objection as the preceding one, besides that it necessitates the exclusion of the article. The fourth explanation would not have been noticed had it not been supported by the name of Gesenius. The common reading and old rendering remains, which certainly present no critical difficulties. A very careful examination of the sixth chap. of Isaiah, and of the xviiith and xxith, which are connected with it, has inclined us to prefer it. Egypt and Ethiopia were then either under a joint rule or under an Ethiopian sovereignty. We can, therefore, understand the connection of the three subjects comprised in the three chapters. Chap. xviii. is a prophecy against the Ethiopians, xix. is the Burden of Egypt, and xx., delivered in the year of the capture of Ashdod by Tartan, the general of Sargon, predicts the leading captive of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, probably the garrison of that strong stronghold, as a warning to the Israelites who trusted in them for aid. Chap. xixii. ends with an indication of the time to which it refers, speaking of the Ethiopians —as we understand the passage—as sending "a present" to "the place of the name of the Lord of hosts, the mount Zion" (ver. 7). If this is to be taken in a proper and not a tropical sense, it would refer to the conversion of Ethiopians by the preaching of the Law while the Temple yet stood. That such had been the case before the gospel was preached is evident from the instance of the eunuch of Queen Candace, whom Philip met on his return homeward from worshipping at Jerusalem, and converted to Christianity (Acts viii. 26-39). The Burden of Egypt seems to point to the times of the Persians and sovereigns over that country. The civil war agrees with the troubles of the Decadency, then we read of a time of bitter oppression by a "cruel lord and [or 'even'] a fierce king," probably pointing to the Persian conquests and rule, and specially to Cambyses, or Cambyses and Darius, and then of the drying of the sea (the Red Sea, comp. xiii. 15) and the river and canals, of the destruction of the water-plants, and of the failure of the grain of the men of the river, the princes and counsellors are to lose their wisdom and the people to be filled with fear, all which calamities seem to have begun in the desolation of the Persian rule. It is not easy to understand what follows as to the dread of the land of Judah which the Egyptians should feel, immediately preceding the mention of the subject of the article: "In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of the Canaanites; and among the land of Egypt shall one shall be called Ir-heres. In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt: for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a savior the early date of the one passage and the non-existence and incomplete state of the other, this is perhaps not irreconcilable.

No trace of the name of Ir-nahash attached to any site has been discovered. Jerome's interpretation (Qu. Hebr. ad loc.)—whether his own or a tradition he does not say—is, that Ir-nahash is Bethlehem, Nahash being another name for Jesse.

IRON (יִרְוֹן,firm, perh. God-fearing): kepēq; Alex. Ἰαπρώς; [Vmp. Ἱπρώς; Ἱρώς] Jecon, one of the cities of Naphtali, named between En-hazor and Migdal-el (Josh. xvi. 38); bitherto unknown, though possibly Verum. G.

IRON (יֶרֶבֶן, compares: Χθ. Νιβηρί, πορφύρα: εἰδώλος), mentioned with brass as the earliest of known metals (Gen. iv. 22). As it is rarely found in its native state, but generally in combination with oxygen, the knowledge of the art of forging iron, which is attributed to Tubal-Cain, argues an acquaintance with the obstacles which attend the smelting of this metal. Iron melts at a temperature of about 3200° Fahrenheit, and to produce this heat large furnaces supplied by a strong blast of air are necessary. But, however difficult it may be to imagine a knowledge of such appliances at so early a period, it is perfectly certain that the use of iron is of extreme antiquity, and that therefore some means of overcoming the obstacles in question must have been discovered. What the process may have been is left entirely to conjecture; a method is employed by the natives of India, extremely simple and of great antiquity, which though rude is very effective, and suggests the possibility of similar knowledge in an early stage of civilization (Urc, Dict. Acts and Sciences, art. Steel). The smelting furnaces of Ethiopia, described by Dioscorides (v. 15), correspond roughly with the modern bloomery, remains of which still exist in this country (Napier, Metehology of the Bible, p. 140). Malleable iron was in common use, but it is doubtful whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. The allusions in the Bible supply the following facts.

The natural wealth of the soil of Canaan is indicated by describing it as a land whose stones are iron" (Dent. vii. 9). By this Winer (Rohde, art. Eisen) understands the basalt which constitutes much of the hills of the Hauran, is the material of which Or's bedstead (Deut. iii. 11) was made, and contains a large percentage of iron. It is more probable that the expression is a poetical figure. Pharaoh's (xxvi. 11), who is quoted as an authority, says indeed that basalt is "terrei eodias atque duritas," but does not hint that iron was ever extracted from it. The book of Job contains passages which indicate that iron was very well known. Of the manner of procuring it, we learn that "iron is taken from dust" (xxviii. 2). It does not follow from Job xix. 24, that it was used for a writing implement, though such may have been the case, any more than that adamant was employed for the same purpose (Jer. xvii. 1), or that shoes were made with iron and brass (Deut. xxxii. 25). Indeed, iron so frequently occurs in poetic figures, that it is difficult to discriminate between its literal and metaphorical sense. In such passages as the following in which a "pole of iron" (Dent. xxviii. 18) designates hard service; a "rod of iron" (Ps. ii. 9), a stern government; a "pillar of iron" (Jer i 18),

The or IR (יִרְוֹן or יִרְבָּן) [healer of Jehovah, Dict.; Jehovah is watcher, First]; ὑψίπατρος [Vmp. παιράττων; Ἱρώς] Jecon, one of the cities of Naphtali, mentioned with brass as the earliest of known metals (Gen. iv. 22).

The or IR (יִרְוֹן or יִרְבָּן) [healer of Jehovah, Dict.; Jehovah is watcher, First]; ὑψίπατρος [Vmp. παιράττων; Ἱρώς] Jecon, one of the cities of Naphtali, mentioned with brass as the earliest of known metals (Gen. iv. 22).
a strong support; and "breathing instruments of iron" (Am. i. 3); the means of cerebral oppression; the hardness and heaviness (Ecclesi. xiii. 13) of iron are so clearly the prominent ideas, that it may have been used for the instruments in question; such usage is not of necessity indicated.

The "furme of iron" (Deut. iv. 20; 1 K. viii. 51) is a figure which vividly expresses hard bondage, as represented by the severe labor which attended the operation of smelting. Iron was used for chisels (Deut. xxvii. 5), or something of the kind; for axes (Deut. xiv. 22; 2 K. vi. 5, 6); Is. x. 24; Hym. ii. 485); for harness and saws (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chr. xx. 3); for nails (1 Chr. xxi. 3), and for war-chariots (Josh. xvii. 16, 18; Judg. i. 19, iv. 13, 13). The latter were plated or studded with it. Its usage in defensive armor is implied in 2 Sam. xxii. 7 (cf. Lev. ix. 9), and as a safeguard in peace it appears in letters (Ps. cv. 18), prison-gates (Acts xii. 10), and bars of gates or doors (Is. xvi. 16; Is. xvi. 2), as well as for surgical purposes (1 Tim. iv. 2). Sheet-iron was used for cooking utensils (Ex. iv. 3; cf. Lev. vii. 9), and bars of hammeret iron are mentioned in Job xl. 18, though here the LXX. pervertedly render σιγμιπος χερας, "cast iron." That it was plentiful in the time of David appears from 1 Chr. xxii. 3. It was used by Solomon, according to Josephus, to clamp the large rocks with which he built up the Temple mount (Ant. xv. xi. 3); and by Hezekiah's workmen to boul out the conduits of Gihon (Ecclesi. xviii. 17). Images were fastened in their niches in later times by iron brackets or clamps (Wisd. xiii. 15). Agricultural implements were early made of the same material. In the treaty made by Porsena was inserted a condition like that imposed on the Hebrews by the Philistines, that no iron should be used except for agricultural purposes (Plin. xxxiv. 39).

The market of Tyre was supplied with bright or polished iron by the merchants of Dan and Javan (Ex. xxvii. 19). Some, as the LXX. and Vulgate render this "wrong iron:" so De Wette "geladene Eisen." The Tarqum has "bars of iron," which would correspond with the scripture of Pliny (xxxiv. 41). But Kinkel (Lex. s. v. expounds ἴλαστος, "polished," as "pure and polished." (Cf. Span. aceiter, steel), in which he is supported by R. Sol. Pachon, and by Ben Zeb, who gives "glimnend" as the equivalent (comp. the Homeric ἄλοξ ἀλπος, H. vii. 473). If the Javan alluded to were Greece, and not, as Bochart (Phls. icq. ii. 21) seems to think, some place in Arabia, there might be reference to the iron mines of Mesopotamia, which belonged to the decree of Enamis Panaus (Liv. xiv. 29); but Bochart urges, as a very strong argument in support of his theory, that, at the time of Ezekiel's prophecy, the Tyrians did not depend upon Greece for a supply of cassia and cinnamon, which are associated with iron in the merchandise of Dan and Javan, but that rather the contrary was the case. Pliny (xxxiv. 41) awards the palm to the iron of Serbia, that of Parthia being next in excellence. The Chalybes of the Pontus were celebrat3ed as workers in iron in very ancient times (Ech. Prom. 733). They were identified by Strabo with the Chalchei of his day (xii. 549), and the mines which they worked were in the mountains skirting the sea-coast. The produce of their labor is supposed to be alluded to in Jer. xv. 12, as being of superior quality. Iron mines are still in existence on the same coast, and the ore is found in "small nodular masses in a dark yellow clay which overlies a limestone rock" (Smith's Geog. Dict. art. Chalybes).

It was for a long time supposed that the Egyptians were ignorant of the use of iron, and that the allusions in the Pentateuch were anachronisms, as no traces of it have been found in their monuments; but in the sepulchres at Thebes butchers are represented as sharpening their knives on a round bar of metal attached to their aprons, which from its blue color is presumed to be steel. The storied weapons on the tombs of Rameses III. are also painted blue; those of bronze being red (Willkinson, Anc. Enq. ii. 247). One iron mine only has been discovered in Egypt, which was worked by the ancients. It is at Hammam, between the Nile and the Red Sea; the iron found by Mr. Burton was in the form of specular and red ore (Id. iii. 246). That no articles of iron should have been found is easily accounted for by the fact that it is easily destroyed by exposure to the air and moisture. According to Pliny (xxxiv. 43) it was preserved by a coating of white lead, gypsum, and liquid pitch. Bitumen was probably employed for the same purpose (xxxv. 52). The Egyptians obtained their iron almost exclusively from Assyria proper in the form of bricks or pigs (Layard, Nin. ii. 415). Specimens of Assyrian iron-work overlaid with bronze were discovered by Mr. Layard, and are now in the British Museum (Nin. and Rob. p. 291). Iron weapons of various kinds were found at Nimroud, but fell to pieces on exposure to the air. Some portions of shields and arrow-heads (Id. 194, 596) were rescued, and are now in England. A pick of the same metal (Id. 194) was also found, as well as part of a saw (195), and the head of an axe (557), and remains of scale-armour and helmets inlaid with copper (Nin. i. 340). It was used by the Etruscans for offensive weapons, as bronze for defensive armor. The Assyrians had daggers and arrow-heads of copper mingled with iron, and hardened with an alloy of tin (Layard, Nin. ii. 418). So in the days of Homer war-clubs were shod with iron (H. vii. 141); arrows were tipped with it (H. iv. 123); it was used for the axes of chariots (H. v. 723), for litters (Id. i. 294), for axes and bills (H. iv. 485; Od. xxxi. 3, 81). Ardrastus (H. vi. 48) and Ulysses (Od. xxi. 19) reckoned it among their treasures, the iron weapons being kept in a chest in the treasury with the gold and brass (Od. xxxi. 61). In Od. i. 184, Menthe calls Telemaeus that he is travelling from Taphos to Tarsus to procure brass in exchange for iron, which Eustathius says was not obtained from the mines of the island, but was the product of piratical excursions (Millin, Mineral. Hom. p. 115, 2d ed.). Pliny (xxxiv. 4) mentions iron as used symbolically for a statue of Hercules at Thebes (cf. Dan. iii. 24, v. 4), and goleths of iron as among the offerings in the temple of Mars the Avenger, at Rome. Abhats the Lydian dedicated to the oracle at Delphi a small goblet of iron, the workmanship of Chares of Chios, to whom the discovery of the art of smelting this metal is attributed (Her. i. 25). The goblet is described by Pausanias (x. 16). From the fact that such offerings were made to the temples, and that Achilles gave as a prize of contest a rudely-shaped mass of the same metal (II. xxiii. 825), it has been argued that in early times iron was so little known as to be greatly esteemed for its rarity. That this was not the case, the time of Lycurgus is evident, and Homer attaches to it no epithet which would denote its preciousness (Millin, p. 106). There is reason to suppose that the discovery of brass preceded that of iron (Lecr. v. 122), though little weight can be attached to the line of Hesiod often quoted as decisive on this point (Op. et Dics. 150). The Dactylic label of trete were supposed by the ancients to have the merit of the first to discover the properties of iron (Plin. vii. 57; Diod. Sic. v. 24), but the Cyclops were said to have invented the iron-smith's forge (Plin. vii. 57). According to the Armenian marbles, iron was known b.c. 1370, while Larcher (Chron. d. Herod. p. 570) assigns a still earlier date, b.c. 1557. Enough has been said to prove that the allusions to iron in the Pentateuch and other parts of the O. T. are not anomalous.

There is considerable doubt whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. The rendering given by the LXX. of Joh xi. 18, as quoted above, seems to imply that some method nearly like that of casting was known, and is supported by a passage in Didymus (v. 13). The inhabitants of Anthia traded with pig-iron in masses like large sponges to Diancia and other norths, where it was bought by the smiths and fashioned into various moulded forms (παραβάτη χρωματίων).

In Exeles, xxxviii. 28, we have a picture of the interior of an iron-smith's (ls. xliii. 12) workshop: the smith, perched with the smoke and heat of the furnace, sitting beside his anvil and contemplating the unwrought iron, his ears deafened with the din of the heavy hammer, his eyes fixed on his model, and never sleeping till he has accomplished his task. [Steel.]

W. A. W.

The iron or quality for quality is mentioned worked at the present day near the village of Daimor in Mount Lebanon. It is especially valuable for shoeing bears of burden, and is greatly sought for through Northern Syria. It is probable that the merchants of Dan, who had possessions in the extreme north of Palestine in the neighborhood of Caesarea Philippi, derived from this source the "bright iron," which is probably to be translated "of the iron" (comp. iv. 13, 29).

This view commends itself the more if we suppose Java to be in Arabia, as the mention of the two places together makes it probable that they had at least a common entrepot for their wares. This would be possible at the junction of the roads of Cilicia-Syria from the north, with those from Gilead on the east in the possessions of Dan, and would explain the circumstance that to Tyre Dan was "laden with supplies of iron from Mount Lebanon, and of cedars and cedars from Arabia."

Still further, the geographical position of this entrepot corresponds with the language of the context. In ver. 18 the prophet speaks of Damascus: a ver. 19, of Dan with its trade with Javan; in ver. 20, of the caravans from Dedan, which would come in toward Tyre to the southward of Iam; finally, ver. 21, of those from Arabia, which would come from a still more southerly direction.

IRPEEL (יאריפל), [among God heads, or God requires, babbles]: Kadofa: [Lit.] Alex. Ιφέαδη, one of the cities of Benjamin (Jos. viii. 27), occurring in the list between Gelen and Farah. So trace has yet been discovered of its situation. It will be observed that the Ir in this name is radically different from that in the names Ir-mahalath, Ir-shemesh, etc. Taken as a Hebrew name it is Irpeel = "restored by God."

IR-SHEMESH (יאר-שמש) = city of the sun: πόλεις Σαμάνας: Alex. πόλεις Σαμηνός, a city of the Danites (Jos. xix. 41), probably identical with Beth-shemesh, and, if not identical, at least connected with Mount Heeres (Judg. i. 35), the "mount of the sun." Beth-shemesh is probably the later form of the name. In other cases Beth appears to have been substituted for other older terms (see Basalmon, etc.), such as Ir or Ar, which is unquestionably a very ancient word.

IRU (יארו) [watch, First]: Ἰρα, Alex. Ηρα: [Comp. Ιαρός] Ἱρα, the eldest son of the great Philistine Goliath (1 Chr. iv. 15). It is by some supposed that this name must be Ir, the vow at the end being merely the conjunction - and, properly belonging to the following name.

* It is true, 7 more frequently connects the nouns in such an enumeration; but that reason for changing Ir to Ir is not decisive. The copula may also be emitted between them (see 1 Chr. iv. 20, 24, &c.).

ISAAC (יאוסף) or יִשְׂאָל), daughter [mocker, laughter, First]: Izadka: [Izare], the son whom Sarah, in accordance with the Divine promise, bore to Abraham in the thirtieth year of his age, at Gerar. In his infancy he became the object of Ishmael's jealousy; and in his youth (when twenty-five years old, according to Joseph. Ant. l. 13, § 2) the victim, in intention, of Abraham's great sacrificial act of faith. When forty years old he married Rebekah his cousin, by whom, when he was sixty, he had two sons, Esau and Jacob. In his seventy-first year he and his brother Ishmael buried their father Abraham in the cave of Machpelah. From his ashes by the well Lainai-roi, in the South Country — a barren tract, comprising a few pastures and wells, between the hills of Judæa and the Arabian desert, touching at its western end Philistia, and on the north Hebron — Isaac was driven to by God (Gen. xxvi. 24), and there Jehovah appeared to him and bade him dwell there and not go over into Egypt, and renewed to him the promises made to Abraham. Here he subjected himself, like Abraham in the same place and under like circumstances (Gen. xx. 2), to a rebuke from Abimelech the Philistine king for an equivocation. Here he acquired great wealth by his flocks, but was repeatedly harassed by the Philistines of the wells, to which he sank at convenient stations. At Beersheba Jehovah appeared to him by night and blessed him, and he built an altar there: there, too, like Abraham, he received a visit from the Philistine king Abimelech, with whom he made a covenant of peace. After the death of which Jacob ascended his father's blessing, Isaac sent his son to seek a wife in Padanaram; and all that we know of him during the last forty-three years of his life is that he saw that son, with a large and prosperous family, return to him at Hebron (xxxv. 27) before he died there at the age of 189 years. He was buried by his two sons in the cave of Machpelah.

In the N. T. reference is made to the offering of Isaac (Heb. xi. 17; and James ii. 21) and to his blessing his sons (Heb. xi. 29). As the child of the promise, and as the progenitor of the children of God, he is contrasted with the seed of Ishmael (Gen. xvi. 7, 10; Gal. iv. 28; Heb. xi. 18). In our Lord's remarkable argument with the Sadducees, his history is carried beyond the point at which it is left in the O. T., into and beyond the grave. Isaac, of whom it was said (Gen. xxxv. 20) that he was gathered to his people, is represented as still living to God (Luke xx. 38. d. c.); and by the same Divine authority he is proclaimed as an acknowledged heir of future glory (Matt. viii. 11, d. c.).

II. Such are the facts which the Bible supplies of the last-lived of the Patriarchs, the last migratory, the last prolific, and the last favored with extraordinary divine revelations. A few events in this quiet life have occasioned discussion.

(1.) The signification of Isaac's name is thrice alluded to (Gen. xvii. 17, xviii. 12, xxi. 3). Josephus (Ant. i. 12, § 2) refers to the second of those passages for the origin of the name: Jerome (Quast. Heb. in Gen.) vehemently confounds it to the first; Ewald (gr. i. 429), without assigning reasons, gives it as his opinion that all three passages have been added by different writers to the original record.

(6.) It has been asked what are the persecutions sustained by Isaac from Ishmael to which St. Paul refers (Gal. iv. 29)? If, as generally supposed, he refers to Gen. xxi. 9, then the word πανοράμα, πανοράμασα, may be translated mollis, as in the A. V.; or, insinuating, as in xxi. 14, and in that case the trial of Isaac was by means of "cruel mockings" (ἰσταμένων), in the language of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xii. 3). Or the word may include a different signification from mocking; as in Ex. xxxii. 6, or fighting, as in 2 Sam. ii. 14. These three significations are given by Jeremi, who relates a Jewish tradition (quoted more briefly by Wetstein on Gal. iv. 2) of Isaac suffering personal violence from Ishmael, a tradition which, as Mr. Elliott thinks, was adopted by St. Paul. [Hagar, Amer. ed.] The English reader who is content with our own version, or the scholar who may prefer either of the other renderings of Jeremi, will be at no loss to connect Gal. iv. 2 with Gen. xxi. 9. But Origen (in Gen. Hom. vii. § 3), and Augustine (Sermon iii.), and apparently Professor Jowett (on Gal. ii. 29), do not observe that the gloss of the LXX. and the Latin versions "playing with his son Isaac" forms no part of the simple statement in Genesis, and that the words γεγυνότα, πανοράμασα are not to be confined to the meaning "playing, seem to doubt (as Mr. Elliott does on other grounds), whether the passage in Genesis bears the construction apparently put upon it by St. Paul. On the other hand, Rosenmüller (Schol. in Gen. xxi. 9) even goes so far as to characterize Isaac — "persecuted" — as a very excellent interpretation of γεγυνότα. (See Drusius on Gen. xxi. 9 in Crit. Sac., and Estius on Gal. iv. 29.)

(c.) The offering up of Isaac by Abraham has been viewed in various lights. It is the subject of five dissertations by Frischenh in the Theol. Thesi. Philol. p. 197 (attached to Crit. Sacri). By Bishop Warburton (Disc. Leg. b. vi. § 5) the whole transaction was regarded as "merely an information by action" (compare Jer. xxvi. 7; xxvii. 21). He interprets it instead of words, of the great sacrifice of Christ for the redemption of mankind, given at the earnest request of Abraham, who longed impatiently to see Christ's day." This view is adopted by Dean Graves (On the Pentateuch, pt. iii. § 4), and has become unpopular. But it is pronounced to be unsatisfactory by Parvison (Praehist. Sacrificii, pt. iv. § 2), who, pleading for the progressive communication of the knowledge of the Christian sacrament, protests against the assumption of a contemporary disclosure of the import of the sacrifice to Abraham, and points out that no expiation or atonement was joined with this emblematic oblation, which consequently symbolized only the act, not the power or virtue of the Christian sacrifice. Mr. Maurice (Patriarcha et Longivere, iv.) draws attention to words of St. Jerome, and quotes similar passages from the Romanized Jews, and others in his Life as slips of the pen of a Jewish transcriber. Even the merit of novelty cannot be claimed for such views, which appear to have been in some measure forestalled in the time of Augustine (Sermon ii. de Tentatione Abraham). They are, of course, irreconcilable with the declaration of St. James, that it was a work by which Abraham was justified. Eusebius (Prop. Evang. iv. 10, and i. 10) has preserved a singular and remarkable version of the offering of Isaac in an extract from the ancient Phcenian historian Sanchothoni; but it is absurd to suppose that the widely-spread (see Ewald, Afterhauener, p. 79, and Thomson's Babylon Lectures, 1853, p. 38) heathen practice of sacrificing human beings received any encouragement from a sacrifice which Abraham was forbidden to accomplish (see Waterland, Works, iv. 203). Some writers have found for this transaction a kind of parallel — it amounts to no more — in the classical legends of Iphigenia and Phrixus. The story of Iphigenia, which inspired the devout Athenian dramatist with sublime notions of the import of suffering and suffering (Esch. Agam. 147 ff.), supplied the Roman husband only with a keen taunt against religion (Lucert. i. 102); just as the great trial which perfected the faith of the offering of Isaac and made the character of Isaac, drawn from the Romanized Jew of the first century a rhetorical exhibition of his own uneasiness in the meaning of sacrifice (see Joseph. Ant. i. 13, § 3).

(2d) No passage of his life has produced more reproach to Isaac's character than that which is recorded in Gen. xxvi. 9-11. Abraham's conduct while in Egypt (xli.) and in Canaan (xxvi. 2-9) shows that he concealed the close connection between himself and his wife, which was implied by Isaac in Gerar. On the one hand, this has been regarded by avowed adversaries of Christianity as involving the guilt of "lying and endeavoring to betray the wife's chastity," and even by Christians, undoubtedly zealous for truth and right, as the conduct of "a very poor putty earthenworm, displaying cowardice, selfishness, readiness to put his wife in a terrible hazard for his own sake." But, on the other hand, with more reverence, more-kindness, and quite as much probability, Waterland, who is no indiscernible apologist for the errors of good men, after a minute examination of the circumstances, concludes that the patriarch did riots erect the difficulty so low as that it could be fully excused, and to await and see whether Divine Providence might not, some way or other, interpose before the last extremity. The event answered. God did interpose." (Scripture Vindicated, in Works, iv. 188, 190.)

(v.) Isaac's tact acquiescence in the conduct of his sons has been brought into discussion. Perhaps Fairbairn (Topology, i. 334) sees scarcely justified by facts in his conclusion that the later days of Isaac did not fulfill the promise of his earlier; that, instead of reaching to high attainments in faith, he fell into general feebleness and decay, moral and bodily, and made account only of the natural element in judging of his sons. The inept translation (to modern ears) of "\textit{yea} prout taken in hunting, by a vision" (Gen. xxv. 28), may have contributed to form, in the minds of English readers, a low opinion of Isaac. Nor can that opinion be supported by a reference to xxvii. 4; for Isaac's desire at such a time for savory meat may have sprung either from a dangerous sickness under which he was laboring (Blunt, \textit{Olden Times}, p. i. ch. vi.), or from the same kind of impulse preceding inspiration as prompted Elisha (2 K. iii. 14) to demand the soothing influence of music before he spoke the word of the Lord. For sadness and grief are enumerated in the Genarr among the impediments to the exercise of the gift of prophecy (Smith's \textit{Select Discourses}, vi. 215). The reader who bears in mind the peculiarities of Isaac's character, will scarcely infer from those passages any fresh accession of mental or moral force to his case.

III. Isaac, the gentle and dutiful son, the faithful and constant husband, became the father of a house in which order did not reign. If there were any very prominent points in his character they were not brought out by the circumstances in which he was placed. He appears less as a man of action than as a man of suffering, from which he is generally delivered without any direct effect of his own. Thus he suffers as the object of Edom's mockery, of the intended sacrifice on Meriah, of the rapidity of the Philistines, and of Jacob's snatching. But the thought of his sufferings is effaced by the ever-present tokens of God's favor; and he suffers with the calmness and dignity of a conscious heir of heavenly promises, without uttering any complaint, and generally without committing any action by which he would forfeit respect. Free from violent passions, he was a man of constant, deep, and tender affections. Thus he mourned for his mother till her place was filled by his wife. His sons were nurtured at home till a late period of their lives; and neither his grief for Isaac's marriage, nor the cares in which he was involved in consequence of Jacob's deceit, estranged either of them from his affectionate care. His life of solitary blandness must have been sustained by strong habitual piety such as showed itself at the time of Rebekah's barrenness (xxv. 21), in his special intercourse with God at Gerar and Beer-sheba (xxvi. 2, 20), in the solemn burnt-offering he offered after his escape from his brother.

But it was sufficiently marked and consistent to win respect and envy from his contemporaries. By his posternity his name is always joined in equal honor with those of Abraham and Jacob, and so it was even used as part of the formula which Egyptian magicians in the time of Origen (\textit{Contra Celsud, i. 22}) employed as efficacies to blind the demons whom they adjured (comp. Gen. xxxi. 45, 53).

If Abraham's enterprising, unsettled life foreshadowed the early history of his descendants; if Jacob was a type of the careful, commercial, un-warlike character of their later days, Isaac may represent the middle period, in which they lived apart from nations, and enjoyed possession of the fertile kind of promise.

IV. The typical view of Isaac is barely referred to in the N.T., but it is drawn out with minute particularity by Philo and those interpreters of Scripture who were influenced by Alexandrian philosophy. Thus in Philo, Isaac = laughter = the most exquisite enjoyment = the Soother and cheerer of peace-loving souls, is fore-shadowed in the facts that his father had attained 100 years (the perfect number) when he was born, and that he is specially designated as given to his parents by God. His birth from the mistress of Abraham's household symbolizes happiness proceeding from pre-dominant wisdom. His attachment to one wife (Rebekah = perseverance) is contrasted with Abraham's multiplied connections and with Jacob's toil-Bom wives, as showing the superiority of Isaac's heaven-born, self-sufficing, wisdom, to the accumulated knowledge of Abraham and the painful experiences in which he intended to have been raised. Philo sees only a sign that laughter = rejoicing = is the prerogative of God, and is a fit offering to Him, and that He gives back to obedient man as much happiness as is good for him. Clement of Rome (ch. 31), with characteristic solicitude, merely refers to Isaac as an example of faith in God. In Tertullian he is a pattern of meekness and a type of Christ bearing the cross. But Clement of Alexandria finds an allegorical meaning in the incidents which connect Abimelech with Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. xxxii. 8) as well as in the offering of Isaac. In this latter view he is followed by Origen, and by Augustine, and by Christian expositors generally.

The most minute particulars of that transaction are invested with a spiritual meaning by such writers as Gregorius Nazianzen, \textit{in Gen.} iii. 3. Abraham is made a type of the first Person in the blessed Trinity, Isaac of the Second; the two servants dismissed are the Jewish sects who did not attain to a perception of Christ in his humiliation; the ass bearing the wood is the Jewish nation, to whom were committed the oracles of God which they failed to understand; the three days are the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Christian dispensations; the ram is Christ on the cross, the thicket they who placed him there. Modern English writers hold firmly the typical significance of the transaction, without extending it into this detail (see Pearson on the Creed, i. 243, 251, ed. 1843; Fairbairn's Typology, i. 332). A recent writer (A. Jukes, Types of Genesis), who has shown much ingenuity in attaching a spiritual meaning to the characters and incidents in the book of Genesis, regards Isaac as representing the spirit of submision, in a series in which Adam represents human nature, Cain the carnal mind, Abel the spiritual, Noah regeneration, Abraham the spirit of faith, Jacob the spirit of service, Joseph suffering or glory. With this series may be compared the view of Ewald (Gesch. i. 387–400), in which the whole patriarchal family is a prefigurative group, comprising twelve members with seven distinct modes of relation: (1.) Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are three fathers, respectively personifying active power, quiet enjoyment, success after struggles, distinguished from the rest as Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses among the heroes of the Iliad, or as the Trojan Anchises, Aeneas, and Ascanius, and mutually related as Romulus, Rемus, and Numa; (2.) Sarah, with Isaac as mother and mistress of the household; (3.) Isaac as child; (4.) Isaac withachel as nurse and protector (comp. Abr. 19, xxviii. 2; Gen. xlviii. 23); (5.) Leah and Rachel the plurality of coeval wives; (6.) Deborah as nurse (compare Ann. and Caees., Ets. iv. 634, and vii. 1); (7.) Eliezer as steward, whose office is compared to that of the messenger of the Olympic deities.

V. Jewish legends represent Isaac as an angel made before the world, and descending to earth in human form (Origins, in Journ. ii. § 25); as one of the three men in whom human sinfulness has no place, as one of the six over whom the angel of death has no power (Eissenmenger, Ent. Jud. i. 343, 864). He is said to have been instructed in divine knowledge by Shem (Jarchi, on Gen. xxv.). The ordinance of evening prayer is ascribed to him (Gen. xxiv. 63), as that of morning prayer to Abraham (xix. 27), and night prayer to Jacob (xxxi. 11) (Eissenmenger, Ent. Jud. i. 433).

The Arabian traditions included in the Koran represent Isaac as a model of religion, a righteous person inspired with grace to do good works, observe prayer, and give alms (ch. 21), endowed with the divine gifts of prophecy, children, and wealth (ch. 19). The promise of Isaac and the offering of Isaac are also mentioned (ch. 11, 58). Faith in a future resurrection is ascribed to Abraham; but it is connected, not as in Heb. xi. 19 with the offering of Isaac, but with a fictitious miracle (ch. 2).

* A few additional words should be said on some of the points introduced or suggested in the foregoing article.

It is well to notice in regard to the origin of Isaac's name, that while it was given by divine command (Gen. xvii. 19), the reason for giving it is not explicitly stated. The historian employs the word on which the name is founded just before (ver. 17), in speaking of Abraham's joy on being assured that the child of promise was about to be born after so long a delay: and again, shortly after that (xviii. 12), in speaking of Sarah's incredulity as to the possibility of her becoming a mother at an advanced age. We may infer, therefore, that the name was designed to embody and conmemorate these incidents in the family-history. It represents, indeed, very different states of mind but no violence is done thereby to the Hebrew word, which readily admits of the twofold combination. No doubt Sarah refers once more to the signification of the name, on the occasion of formally giving it to the child at the time of circumcision (Gen. xxi. 3 f.); but in that instance her object was simply to recognize in the better sense of the name a symbol and pledge of joy both to herself and to the multitude of others who should be blessed in the promised seed. Such reasons for the name are certainly not inconsistent with each other, and, still less, are they so inconsistent as to discredit the narrative as one made up from contradictory sources. For some good remarks on the significance of 'birth-names,' the reader may consult Wilkinson's Person and Name of the Bible, pp. 290–312 (Loud. 1885).

It will be noticed above that some of the opinions respecting the typical character of Abraham's offering up of Isaac extend the analogy to numerous and very minute correspondences. It is of some importance here to distinguish between such opinions of interpreters and the explicit teaching of Scripture on this subject: so as not to make the sacred writers answerable for views or principles of human imagination. Every effort has been made to follow the various lines of investigation in order to trace the facts by which in the hands of some expositors have led to very fanciful conclusions. It seems unreasonable to deny altogether a symbolic significance to this sacrificial act and its concomitants, both on account of its suitableness in itself considered to shadow forth Christian ideas and relations, and also on account of some hints given by Paul which point in that direction. The most extended reference to Isaac in the N. T. is that in Col. iv. 21–31. Yet the intimations there in regard to his typical character, leave it questionable whether the Apostle meant to recognize the general facts of his history as in a strict sense prophetic of the N. T. dispensation, or simply to use the facts for the purpose of illustration. The points of comparison which the Apostle draws out in that passage are the following: As Ishmael was born in accordance with the law of nature, so the Jews are a natural seed; but Christians who obtain justification in conformity with the promise made to Abraham, are the true promised seed, even as Isaac was. Further, as in the history of Abraham's family, Ishmael persecuted Isaac, the child of promise, so it should not be accounted strange that under the Gospel, the natural seed, that is, the Jews, should persecute the spiritual seed, that is, Christians. And finally, as Isaac was acknowledged as the true heir, but Ishmael was set aside, so must it be as to the difference which exists between Jews and believers. The former, or, in other words, those who depend on their own merit for obtaining the favor of God, will be rejected, while those who seek it by faith shall obtain the heavenly inheritance. It may be remarked that this parallelism (whether illustrative only or typical) enables the Apostle skillfully to recapitulate the prominent doctrines of the whole epistle, and thus to leave them so associated in the minds of the Galatians with a familiar and striking portion of sacred history, that the teachings of the epistle could never be easily forgotten.

No mention is made in Genesis of Ishmael's persecuting Isaac; but Ishmael's mocking at the feast of weaning (Gen. xxii. 8, 9) reveals the spirit out of which an active hostility would be expected to grow in due time. In all probability Paul refers to such effects of that spirit, well known to the Jews of his time, from traditioinal sources. For other examples of traditions thus recognized as true, see under Abraham (Amer. ed.). Peab (Leben Abraham's, pp. 49, 170) shows that the Jews found in Isaiah's "mocking" a significant indication of the alienation and strife which marked the subsequent relations of the two brothers to each other.

Of the precise age of Isaac at the time of the great trial of Abraham's faith, we obtain no knowledge. That he was not tender a child, but was at least approaching his manhood, is evident from the fact that the wood was laid on him, as the father and the son went up the mountain. He is called at that time a lad in the A. V. (Gen. xxvii. 5), but the same Hebrew term (�א) is applied also to the servants who accompanied Abraham on this journey. When Josephus speaks of him as twenty-five years old (Ant. i. 13, § 2), it is a conjecture only, without any proof from Scripture or elsewhere to warrant so precise a statement. The full consent of Isaac to the wishes and design of Abraham must be taken for granted, as otherwise it could have been made by the stronger to the weaker, rendering it difficult to bind the victim to the altar. It is evident from Heb. xi. 19, that the pious Hebrews regarded this trial of Abraham's character as illustrating not so much a blind submission to the will of God, whatever this might seem to require, as an unwavering faith in the power and willingness of God to bring back the son to life if the father's hand must stay him. The question of the place of sacrifice is discussed under Mount (Amer. ed.). The view maintained there, that it was some mount near Jerusalem, in all probability the temple-mount itself (2 Chron. iii. 1), is also that of Baumgarten (Pentateuch, i. 227); Knobel (Die Genesis erklart, p. 174); Fuch (Gesch. i. 476, comp. iii. 313 f., 3d Ed.); Hengstenberg (Atheologie des Pent. ii. 295 f.); Winzer (Reeder, ii. 198); Delitzsch (Genesis, p. 467 f.); and Edlins transl. in: Kurz (Geschichte der A. V. und der A. B., i. 213 f.), and others.

It has been made an objection to the accuracy of the Biblical history of the patriarchs that so many similar events and so many identical names of persons and places occur in the account of the different men. But it is not to be forgotten that the dissimilarity in what is related of them is incomparably greater than the agreement. Their personal characteristics are unlike, bearing unmistakable marks of originality and individuality. Isaac never goes beyond the boundary of Palestine, though Abraham and Jacob ranged from one extreme part of the East to another. The domestic events also of their respective families were as diverse as the vicissitudes of human condition could well permit. Abraham's lack of seizure of the wives of the two strangers (Gen. xx. 2 f., and xxxi. 6 ff.) proves only that the same passions became stronger with successive generations, and prompt to the same acts in the presence of the same temptations. That, leading as they all did a nomadic life, they should occasionally visit the same places, was natural and inevitable. Abraham and Isaac appear at different times at Gedor and Beer-sheba, but the fertility of those places, or the opportunity in obtaining water, accounts for that coincidence, the recurrence of the same personal names, e.g., Abimelech and Phichol, in the intercourse of Abraham and Isaac with the Philistines, has its perfect analog in the present customs of the East. It is generally allowed that Abraham, like Pharaoh in Egypt, and Caesar among the Romans, was a royal title, and not the name of a single individual. But Phichol also, says Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 352, "may have been a name of office, as vakkir or wukir now in this country. If one of these officers is spoken of, his name is rarely mentioned."

For an outline of the events in Isaac's life, and a discussion of some of the historical and exegetical questions which the narrative presents, the reader may see Kurtz's Geschichte des A. Landes, i. 218-229. This writer regards the ground-type of Isaac's character as a certain elasticity of endurance which does not resist evil, does not contend against it, but overcomes it by patience and consecration (see Gen. xxvi. 17-22); and, in this respect, Isaac is truly great and worthy of admiration. That this greatness of men is usually unrecognized and abused, detracts nothing from its worth. And in Isaac also it was mocked and marred by a degree of weakness and want of self command" shows that human virtue has its unavoidable limitations. Heng has sketched the patriarch's life with mingled praise and censure in his Geschichte der Patriarchen, ii. 3-64. Vahlen has a brief article on Isaac in Herzog's Real-Enzy.
cycl. vili. 81-83; and also Wunderlich, in Zeller's Bild. Wörterb. i. 738 ff. The perimetry of Isaac's life, as this latter writer remarks, does not indeed impress us as that of an extraordinary personality; but, on the other hand, we are to remember that the design of Scripture here is, not to present men to us, even the elect ones, as they should be, but as they are. A spirit of humility and honesty must stamp itself on biography so written. It is not to be forgotten that what we know of the faults of Isaac can be harmonized with the great reprof-

* ISAAC, twice used (Am. viii. 9, 16, where the form is וים, as a poetic synonym for Israel, I. f. the ten tribes. Hence "the high-places
The verses in the book of Isaiah are profound and complex, discussing topics such as the judgments of God, the intercession of the prophet, the adherence of the people, and the judgment of the nations. For instance, the verse "For indeed—3. Isaiah must have been an old man at the close of Hezekiah's reign. The ordinary chronology gives 758 B.C. for the date of Jotham's accession, and 688 for that of Hezekiah's death. This gives us a period of 69 years. And since his ministry commenced before Uzziah's death (how long we know not), supposing him to have been more than 24 years old when he began to prophesy, he would have been 83 or 99 at Manasseh's accession.

The circle of hearsers upon whom his ministry was immediately designed to operate is determined to be "Judah and Jerusalem." True, we have in the book prophecies relating to the kingdom of Israel— as also to Moab, Bab-lon, and other heathen states; but neither in the one case nor in the other was the prophecying designed for the benefit of these foreign states, or meant to be communicated to them, but only for Judah, now becoming the sole home of Hebrew blessings and hopes Every other interest in the prophet's inspired view moves round Judah, and is connected with her.

5. It is the most natural and obvious supposition that the "visions" are in the main placed in the correct chronological order; and this supposition it would be arbitrary to set aside without more solid reasons than the mere impulses of subjective fancy. We grant that this presumption might be overruled, if good cause were shown; but till it is shown, we have no warrant for rejecting the principle that the present arrangement is in the main founded upon chronological propriety, only departed from in cases where similarity of character occasioned the grouping together of visions which were not uttered at the same time.

6. If then we compare the contents of the book with the description here given of it, we recognize prophecies which are certainly to be assigned to the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah; but we cannot so certainly fix any belonging to the reign of Manasseh. The form of the expression in vi. 1, "the year that King Uzziah died," fixes the time of that vision to the close of Uzziah's reign, and not to the commencement of Jotham's. What precedes ch. vi. may be referred to some preceding part of Uzziah's reign; except perhaps the first chapter; this may be regarded as a general summary of advice founded upon the whole of what follows,— a kind of general preface; corresponding at the commencement of the book to the parenthesis of the nine chapters at its close. Ch. vii. brings us at once from "the year that King Uzziah died" to "the days of Ahaz." We have then nothing left for Jotham's reign, unless we suppose that some of the group of "burdens" in xiii.—xxiii. belong to it, or some of the perhaps miscellaneous utterances in xxiv.—xxv. It may be that prophecies then spoken were not recorded, because applying to a state of things similar to what obtained in the latter part of Uzziah, they were themselves of a similar strain with chs. ii.—v.

7. We naturally ask, Who was the compiler of the book? The obvious answer is, that it was Isaiah himself aided by a scribal; comp. the very interesting glimpse afforded us by Jer. xxxvi. 1—5, of the relation between the utterance of prophecies and their writing. Isaiah we know was otherwise no author; for in 2 Chr. xxvi. 22 we read: "Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah first and last did Isaiah the son of Amoz the prophet write:" and though that historical work has perished, the fact remains to show that Isaiah's mind was not alien from the cares of written composition (comp. also 2 Chr. xxxiii. 32; and observe the first person used in viii. 1-5). The organic structure of the whole book also, which we hope to make apparent, favors the same belief. On the whole, that Isaiah was himself the compiler, claims to be accepted as the true view. The principal objection deserving of notice is founded upon xxvi. 8. It has been alleged (Höber to loc. cit.) that Semachoth's murder took place B.C. 696, two years after Manasseh's accession; others, however, question this (comp. Havernick's Einleitung): at all events the passage is quite reconcilable with the belief of Isaiah's being the compiler, if we suppose him to have lived two or three years after Manasseh's accession, even without having recourse to the expedient of attributing the verse in question and the one before it to a later hand. The same case occurs in xxvi. 11, 13, to the Hebrew spoken in Jerusalem, "the Jew's language," מֵאֲמֹר. There is no evidence of a later age; it is perfectly conceivable that while the written language remained the same in both kingdoms, as is evidenced by the prophetical and spoken dialect (comp. Judg. xii. 6) of the kingdom of Judah may have diverged so far from that of the (now perished) kingdom of Israel as to have received a distinct designation; and its name would naturally, like that of the kingdom itself, be drawn from the tribe which formed the chief constituent of the population. As we are seeking for objective evidence, we may neglect those wild hypotheses which some have indulged in, respecting an original work and its subsequent modifications; for since they originate in the denial of divine inspiration, conjoined with reliance on a merely subjective appreciation of the several writings, such hypotheses must be assigned to the region of fancy rather than of historic investigation.

8. In this introductory verse we have yet to notice the description which it gives of Isaiah's prophecies: they are "the vision which he saw." When we speak of visions we are apt to think of a mental condition in which the mind is drawn altogether from the perception of objects actually present, and contemplates, instead of these, another set of objects which appear at the moment sensibly present—a sort of dream without sleep. Such a vision was that of St. Peter at Joppa. Such again we recognize in Is. vi.—the only instance of this kind of pure vision in the book: in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah, they abound. But Isaiah's mental condition was quite different. His visions are not visionary of the mind. He saw things which to have been different from this. Outward objects really present were not withdrawn from his perception, but appear to have blended to his view, at times, with the spiritual which was really present, though not recognizable except to the eye of faith (e. g., the presence of Jehovah); at times, with the future, whether sensible or spiritual, which seemed to the prophet as if actually present. In this view his prophecies are not to be regarded as utterances, in the delivery of which the Holy Ghost employed the intellectual and physical organs of the prophet as mere instruments wielded by itself, but as vision, i. e., the description by the prophet himself under divine direction (2 Tim. iii. 16): of the which at the time he seemed to himself to see. If this view be just, it follows that in the description of the prophet the gift of which appeared to be before him, we cannot be at once sure, whether he is describing what was actually objectively present, or whether the objects delineated as present belonged to the future. For example: at first sight the description given of the condition of Judah in i. 5-9, portraying an invasion, might be understood of what was actually present, and so might lead us either to supplement the history of 2 K. with a hypothetical invasion, or put forward the time of the prophecying to Ahaz or Hezekiah. But recollect that it is the mind which it may be taken as simply predictive and threatening, and therefore as still spoken in Uzziah's reign. Similarly iii. 8, v. 13, xx. 28-32, are all predictive. So in the second part is xiv. 11. Further, it would be only in accordance with this method of predictive sight if we found the prophet describing some future time as if present, and from that standing-point announcing some more distant future, sometimes as future, and sometimes as present. And in fact it is thus that Isaiah represents the coming fortunes of God's people in the second part of his prophecy. Comp. xiii. 13-17, xlv. 18, xlvi. 1-4, iii. 3-10, 11, 12, xlii. 1-6, as illustrations of the manner in which the relations of the present, past, and future time are in vision blended together.

It has been remarked above as characteristic of Isaiah's ordinary prophetic vision, that the actually present is not lost to view. In fact this was essential to his proper function. His first and immediate concern was with his contemporaries, as the recoverer of sin, and to build up the piety of believers. Even when his vision the most contemplates the future, he yet does not lose his reference to the present, but (as we shall see even in the second part) he makes his prophecies tell by exhortation and reproach upon the state of things actually around him. From all this it results, that we often find it difficult to discriminate his predictions from his rebukes of present disorders. His contemporaries, however, would be under no such difficulty. The idolatrous and uncovetous Hebrew would promptly recognize his own description; the pious would be confirmed and cheered.

II. In order to realize the relation of Isaiah's prophecies not only to his own contemporaries, we need to take account both of the foreign relations of Judah at the time, and internally of its social and religious aspects. Our materials are scanty, and are to be collected partly out of 2 K. and 2 Chr., and partly out of the remaining writings of contemporary prophets, Joel (probably), Obadiah, and Micah, in Judah; and Hosea, Amos, and Jonah, in Israel. Of these the most assistance is obtained from Micah.

1. Under Uzziah the political position of Judah had greatly recovered from the blows suffered under Amaziah; the fortifications of Jerusalem itself were restored; castles were built in the country; new arrangements in the army and equipment of defensive artillery were established; and considerable successes in war gained against the Philistines and the Edomites. [UZZIAH.] This prosperity continued during the reign of Jothan, except that, towards the close of this latter reign, troubles threatened from the alliance of Israel and Syria. [JOTHAN.] The consequence of this prosperity was an influx of wealth, and this with the increased means of military strength withdrew men:
here, we are met by the fact that this same vision is found in very nearly the same words in Micah iv. 1-3. the two prophets were contemporaries, and one may very well have heard the other, and adopted his words. Compare a nearly similar phenomenon in 1 pet. v. 5-9, compared with 1 peter iv. 13. their Peter and paul in their public reforms as well as to fulfill the work which belongs to religious teachers in edifying God's true servants and calling the irreligious to repentance. Accordingly our prophet steps forward into public view with the divine message, dressed after the manner of prophets in general — girded in coarse and black, or at least dark colored, hair-cloth (comp. is. xx. 2. 1. 3; 2 k. i. 8; zech. xiii. 4) — emblematically indicating by this attire of mourning that Jehovah spoke to his people in grief and resentment. [sackcloth] from his house, which appears to have been in jerusalem (comp. vi. 3, xxvii. 5), he goes forth to places of general concourse, chiefly no doubt, as christ and his apostles afterwards did, to the colonnades and courts of the temple, and proclaims in the audience of the people "the word of Jehovah." what is this? what is the tenor of his message in the time of uzziah and jotham? this we read in chs. i.-v. chap. i. is very general in its contents. in perusing it we may fancy that we hear the very voice of the seer as he stands (perhaps) in the court of the israelites denouncing to nobles and people, then assembling for divine worship, the whole estimate of their character formed by Jehovah, and his approaching chastisements. "they are a sinful nation; they have provoked the holy one of israel to anger. flourishing as their worldly condition now appears, the man whose eyes are opened sees another scene before him (1-9) — the land laid waste, and zion left as a cottage in a vineyard — a picture realized in the syro-ephraimitish war, and more especially in the Assyrian invasion — the great event round which the whole of the first part of the book revolves. men of solon and comorrah that they are, let them hearken: they may go on if they will with their ritual worship, 'trampling' Jehovah's courts; nevertheless, he loathes them: the stain of innocent blood is on their hands; the weak are oppressed; there is bribery and corruption in the administration of justice. Let them reform; if they will not, Jehovah will burn out their sins in the smelting fire of his judgment. zion shall be purified, and thus saved, whilst the sinners and reprobates from Jehovah in her shall perish in their much-loved loditudes." this discourse suitably heads the book; it sounds the key-note of the whole; fires of judgment destroying, but purifying a remnant — such was the burden all along of Isaiah's prophecies.

of the other public utterances belonging to this period, chs. ii.-iv. are by almost all critics considered to be one prophesying — the leading thought of which is that the present prosperity of Judah should be destroyed for her sins, to make room for the real glory of piety and virtue; while ch. v. forms a distinct discourse, whose main purport is that Israel, God's vineyard, shall be brought to desolation. the idolatry denounced in these chapters is to be taken as that of private individuals, for both uzziah and jotham served Jehovah. they are prefixed by the vision of the exaltation of the man of the rock, which in the world view above all other views, to become the source of light and moral transformation to all mankind (li. 2-4).
God's works of judgment, with which the prophets threatened them (comp. the similar association of revelling with hardened unbelief in Israel, Am. v. 28, vi. 3-4); against those who confessed moral distinctions; against self-connected skeptics; and against profligate perverters of judicial justice. In fury of wrath Jehovah stretches forth his hand. For here is an awful vagueness in the image of terror which the prophet accompanies, till at length out of the cloud and mist of wrath he hears Jehovah his for the stern and irresistible warriors (the Assyrians), who from the end of the earth should crowd forward to spoil,—after which all distinctness of description again fades away in vague images of sorrow and despair.

What effect (we may ask) would such denunciations produce upon the mass of Hebrew hearers? It was not from Isaiah only that the same persons heard them. Oppression, denounced by him (iii. 14, 15, v. 7-10), was denounced also by Micah (ii. 1, 2); maladministration of justice (Is. i. 23, v. 13) is noted also by Micah (iii. 1-3, 9-11, vii. 3); the combination of idolatry, diviners, and horses found in Is. ii. 6-8, 13, is paralleled in Mic. v. 10-13.

This concurrence of prophetic testimony would not be without weight with those who had still some faith in Jehovah. But the worldly-minded, however silent when flagrant immorality was censured, might find what they would count plausible ground for demurring, when the prophet put the multiplication of gold, silver, horses, and chariots, in the same category with idols, or when with unsparing satire he particularized articles of female adornment as objects of Jehovah's wrath. But God's enemies through these woes had given similar injunctions (Dent. xv. 16, 17); and what in general there is not a single page of the prophetic books in which the Pentateuch is not again and again referred to. The Hebrew commonwealth was not designed to be a commercial state, but a system of small hereditary land-owners under a theocracy. Material progress and ever heightening embitter- ment, whether in the court or in society in general, with the men or with the women, removed it further and further from its original condition, and from Jehovah its God. Something resembling Spartan plainness belonged essentially to the idea of the Hebrew state.

3. In the year of Uzziah's death an ecstatic vision fell upon Isaiah, which, in compiling his prophecies long after, he was careful to record, both for other reasons, and also because he had then become aware of the failure of his ministry in reference to the bulk of his contemporaries, and of the desolation, yet not without hope, which awaited his people. We see in the case of St. Peter at Joppa (Acts v. 9-19) that such a state of certesla, though unquestionably of divine origin, yet in its form adapts itself to the previous condition, whether corporal or psychological, of the patient. Isaiah at this period (as we must infer from the placing of the prophecy) had been already for some time engaged in his ministry; and we may venture to surmise he hankered his little success. Seeing what he saw around him, and foreseeing what he foresaw, could he do otherwise than feel deeply how little he was able to effect for the welfare of his beloved country? In this vision he saw Jehovah, in the Second Person of the Godhead (John xii. 41; comp. Mal. iii. 1), enthroned aloft in his own earthly abode, attended by seraphim, whose praise filled the sanctuary as it were with the smoke of incense.

As John at Patmos, so Isaiah was overwhelmed with awe; he felt his own sinfulness and that of all with whom he was connected, and cried "woe" upon himself as if brought before Jehovah to receive the reward of his deeds. But, as at Patmos, the Man of Sin, hist hand upon John saying, "Fear not," so, in obedience evidently to the will of Jehovah, a seraph with a hot stone taken from the altar touched his lips, the principal organ of good and evil in man, and thereby removing his sinfulness, qualified him to join the seraphim in whatsoever service he might be called to. And now the condescending invitation of the Great King is heard: "Whom shall I send? Who will go for us?" "Here am I! send me." Had he not foreseen Jehovah's commission before? No doubt he had; yet now, with the intense sense of the reality of divine things which that hour brought him, he felt as if he had not. What heaven-taught minister does not understand this? And what was to be the nature of his work? "Make the understanding of this people (not "my people") topid; dull their ears; close up their eyes; the more they hear thy word, the more hardened they shall become: they must not, they shall not, receive the message so as to repent." A heart-crushing commission for the life of the prophet.

This, the prophet, though humble in spirit, did not think, for the moment, of grief at length finds utterance: "Lord, how long?" "Till the land be desolate—saving a small remnant, utterly desolate—a remnant of a holy seed, which will be a stock to sprout forth, but again and again to be cut back and burnt, and yet still to survive."

This vision, in the main, was another mode of representing what, both in previous and in subsequent prophecies, is so continually denounced—the almost utter destruction of the Hebrew people, with yet a purified remnant. But while this prediction was its principal purport, we are sure that the inspired editor of his prophecies so many years after, beheld in it also the sketch of the fruits of his ministry, which at the time when the revelation was made to him must have had no small effect upon his own private feelings. He goes at last almost speechless, despairing of the present, yet with seraph-like zeal, ardent and heaven-purged, and not without hope too, for the time to come. The "holy seed" was to be the "stock." It was to be his business to form that holy seed.

It is a touching trait, illustrating the prophet's own feelings, that when he next appears before us, some years later, he has so renowned Shearjashub, "Remnant—shall return." The name was evidently given with significance: and the fact discovers alike the sorrow which ate his heart, and the hope in which he found solace.

4. Some years elapsed between chs. vi. and vii., and the political scenery has greatly altered. The Assyrian power of Nineveh now threatens the Hebrew nation: Eighth-pleaser has already spelled the doom of Tekalah, one of the fairest parts of his dominions—of the country east of Jordan and the vale of the Sea of Galilee, removing the inhabitants probably to people the wide and as yet uninhabited space indeed by the walls of Nineveh (n. c. 746). After the Assyrian army was withdrawn, the Syrian kingdom of Hanunus rises into notice: it monarch, Ziza, combines with the now weakened king of Israel, and probably with other states. The most similar, and which shall confront Assyria. Abaz keeps aloft and becomes the object of attack to the allies: he has been already twice defeated (2 Chr. xiii. 5, 8); and now the allies are threatening him with a combined invasion (741). The news that "Aram is encamped in Ephraim" (Is. vii. 2) fills both king and people with consternation, and the king is gone forth from the city to take measures, as it would seem, to prevent the upper reservoir of water from falling into the hands of the enemy. Under Jeho- vah's direction Isaiah goes forth to meet the king, surrounded no doubt by a considerable com- pany of his officers and of spectators. The prophet is directed to take with him the child whose name, Shear-jashub, was so full of mystical promise, to add greater emphasis to his message. "Fear not," he tells the king, "Damascus is the head of Syria, and of Syria only; and Rezin head of Damascus, and not of Jerusalem; and within sixty years Ephraim shall be broken, to be no more a kingdom: so far shall Ephraim be from annexing Judah. Samaria again is head only of Ephraim, and Genediah's son only of Samaria. If ye will be established, believe this!" "Dost thou hesitate? Ask what sign thou wilt to assure thee that thus it shall be." The young king is already resolved not to let himself into the line of policy which Isaiah is urging upon him: he is bent upon an alliance with Assyria. To ask a sign might prove embarrassing; for, if it should be given — 2 Ahaz therefore, with a half-mocking show of reverence, declines to "tempt Jehovah." "O house of David, are ye not satisfied with trying the patience of an honest and wisely advising prophet, that you will put this contempt also up to the God who speaks through me? Jehovah him- self, irrespective of your deservings, gives you a guarantee that the commonwealth of Israel is not yet to perish. Behold, the Virgin is with child, and is bearing a son, and thou. O mother (comp. Gen. xvi. 11), shall call his name Immanuel. I seem to see that Child already born! Behold Him there! Cream and honey, abundance of the best food, shall he eat, when, ten or twenty years hence, he comes to the age of discretion; the devastating invasions of Syria and Israel shall be past then; for before that, the land of the two kings thou holdest so formidable shall have been subdued, and the hand of the Lord mingled with the promise in Sheer-jashub appears — upon thy people and upon thy family, not only in thy lifetime, but afterwards, Jehovah will bring an enemy more terrible than Jacob has ever known, Assyur—Asshur, whom thou wouldst fain hire to help (v. 20), but who shall prove a razor that will shave but too keenly; he shall so desolate the land that its inhabitants shall be sparse and few."

Again Isaiah predicts the Assyrian invasion; comp. ch. xxx. 6.

5. As the Assyrian empire began more and more to threaten the Hebrew commonwealth with utter overthrow, it is now that the prediction of the Messiah, the Restorer of Israel, becomes more positive and clear. Micaeh (v. 2) points to Bethlehem as the birthplace, and (v. 3) speaks of "her that travaileth " as an object to prophetic vision seeming almost present. Would not Micaeh and Isaiah confer with each other in these dark days of prevailing unbelief, upon the cheering hope which the Spirit of Christ that was in them suggested to their minds? (comp. Mal. iii. 16).

The king was bent upon an alliance with Assyria. This Isaiah steadfastly opposes (comp. x. 28). In this a theocracy the messenger of Jehovah would frequently appear as a political adviser. "Neither fear Aram and Israel, for they will soon perish; nor trust in Asshur, for she will be thy dire oppressor." Such is Isaiah's strain. And by divine direction he em- ployed various expedients to make his testimony the more impressive. He procured a large tablet (viii. 1), and with witnesses (for the purpose of attesting the fact, and displaying its especial significance) he wrote thereon in large characters suited for a public notice the words e Hasten boust Spedspoi, which tablet was no doubt to be hung up for public exhibition (w. x.). But even in this manner the Temple (comp. "priest," ver. 2). And further: his wife—who, by the way, appears to have been herself possessed of prophetic gifts, for "prophetess" always has this meaning and nowhere indicates a prophet's wife merely—just at this time apparently gave birth to a son. Jehovah bids the prophet give him the name Hastenboust Speedspoi, adding, what Isaiah was to avow on all occasions, that before the child should be able to talk, the wealth of Damascus and the booty of Samaria should be carried away before the king of Assyria.

The people of Judah was split into political fac- tions. The court was for Assyria, and indeed formed an alliance with Tiglath-pilesar; but a popular party was for the Syro-Ephraimitic connection formed to resist Assyria—partly actuated by their fears of a confederacy from which they had already suffered and severely and partly imbued by the sympathetic kindred race, drawing them to Israel, and even to Aram, in opposition to the more foreign Assyria. "Fear none but Jehovah only! fear Him, trust Him; He will be your safety." Such is the purport of the discourse viii. 5—ix. 7; in which, however, he augurs coming distress through the rejection of his counsels, but refreshes himself with the thought of the birth of the Great Deliverer. 6

2 The reader will observe the particular specification of the place, indicating the authenticity of the nar- rative. (Comp. Blum's Undeceived Coincidences, p. iii. no. i.)

6 That the birth of the Messiah is here pointed to cannot be doubted; indeed even Ewald sees this. But the very interpretation of vv. 15, 16 is hard to de- termine. That given above is in the main Hengsten- berg's (Curialogia, vol. ii.). The great difficulty which attaches to it is that the prophet represents Christ as already appearing, reckoning from his birth at the then present time, forward to the desolation of Syria and Israel within a few years. This difficulty is, how- ever, alleviated by the consideration that the prophet states the future as he existed to him in "vision," and in such prophetic vision the distances between events in point of time are often unperceived by the seer; who perhaps might sometimes in his own private interpre- tation of the vision (comp. 1 Pet. i. 10) have miscon- ceived the relations of time, in regard to events. The very clearness with which the future event was ex- hibited to him might deceive him in judging of its nearness. In the N. T. we have a somewhat similar phenomenon in the estimate formed by the Apostles and others of the relation of time between Christ's coming to judge Jerusalem and his second coming at the end of the world.

e A. V. Maher-shalal-hash-baz; by Luther rendered Rauschender, Elbers.

f With reference to Tiglath-pilesar's having recently removed the population of Galilee, the prophet specifies that "as the former time brought humiliation in the direction of Zebulun and Naphtali," located on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, "so the latter time-
The inspired advice was not accepted. Unbelief not discerning the power and faithfulness of Jehovah would argue that isolation was ruin, and accordingly involved Judah in alliances which soon brought her to almost utter destruction.

6. A prophecy was delivered at this time against the kingdom of Israel (xx. 8–x. 4), consisting of four strophes, each ending with the terrible refrain: "for all this, his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still." It announces that all expedients for recovering the power which Israel had lately lost were nugatory: they had forsaken Jehovah, and therefore God-forsaken (x. 4) they should perish. As Isaiah's message was only to Judah, we may infer that the object of this utterance was to check the disposition shown by many in Judah to connect Judah with the policy of the sister kingdom.

7. The utterance recorded in x. 5–xii. 6, one of the most highly wrought passages in the whole book, was probably one single outpouring of inspiration. It stands wholly disconnected with the preceding in the circumstances which it presupposes; and to what period to assign it, is not easy to determine. To allay the dread of Assyria which now prevailed, Isaiah was in God's mercy to his people inspired to declare, that though heavy judgment would be the bulk of the nation, yet the spirit of the Lord should go before the armies of Assyria; that the remnant should be delivered; that the remnant should return to his own land; that in Shearjashub! the remnant should indicate; that in svii. 20–22; and that the Assyrian should be overthrown in the very hour of apparently certain success by agency whose precise nature is left in awful mystery (x. 33, 34). From the destruction of Judah's enemies thus representatively foreshadowed, he then takes wing to predict the happy and peaceful reign of the "Twig which was to come forth from the stem of Jesse," when the united commonwealth of Judah and Ephraim should be restored in glory, and JAH JEHOWAH should be celebrated as the proved strength of his people. Here again is set forth a great deliverance, possibly the foreshadowing of xxxvii.

8. The next eleven chapters, xiii.–xxiv., contain chiefly a collection of utterances, each of which is styled a "burden." As they are detached pieces, it is possible they have been grouped together without strict observance of their chronological order.

(xx.) The first (xiii. 1–xiv. 27) is against Babylon; placed first, either because it was first in point of utterance, or because Babylon in prophetical vision, particularly when Isaiah compiled his book, headed in importance all the earthly powers opposed to God's people, and therefore was to be first struck down by the shaft of prophecy. As yet, not Babylon but Nineveh was the imperial city; but Isaiah possessed not a mere forerushing drawn from political sagacity, but an assured knowledge, that Babylon would be the seat of domination and a leading antagonist to the theoretic people. Not only did he tell Hezekiah a few years later, when Nineveh was still the seat of empire, that his sons should be carried captive "to Babylon," but in this "burden" he also foretells both the towering ambition and glory of that city, and its final overthrow. The ode of triumph (xiv. 5–23) in this burden is among the most poetical passages in all literature. It is remarkable that the overthrow of Babylon is in xv. 24, 25, associated with the Idow prediction of the Ninevite empire in the destruction of Senachemar's army (for here again this great miracle of divine judgment bounds out into the prophet's view), which very disaster, however, probably helped on the rise of Babylon at the cost of its northern rival. The explanation seems to be that Babylon was regarded as merely another phase of Asshur's sovereignty (comp. 2 K. xxiii. 29), so that the overthrow of Senachemar's army was a harbinger of that more complete destruction of the power of Asshur which approach. The destruction of Senachemar's army is the centre object of the first part of the book: and the action of predictive prophecy, and of miracle in relation to it, cannot be gainsaid without setting aside the authenticity of the narrative of other.

b This remarkable word, נבש, "lifting up," is variously understood, some taking it to refer to evils to be borne by the parties threatened, others as a lift—<ref>See our remarks in p. 1109. Even if this were coned to be the production of a later prophet than Isaiah (which there is no just cause whatever for believing), the problem which it presents to skeptics would be as hard as ever; for whom would its author learn that the ultimate condition of Babylon would be such as is here delineated? (xiii. 19–22)? In no time of Hebrew literature was there reason to anticipate this of Babylon in particular more than of other cities. In vain does skeptics dispute upon the 11th nothing is said there of the ultimate condition of Damascus; and it is obvious enough that any such blow as that (e. g.) inflicted by Tighth-piles would make Damascus for a while appear to be "no city" compared with what it had been, and would convert many of its streets into desolation. How different the language used of Babylon! And how wonderfully verified by time! We have the parallel language and verification in reference to Damascus (xxxiv.).</ref>
this burden announces. This prophecy is a note of preparation for the second part of the book; for the picture which it draws of Babylon, as having Jacob in captivity, and being compelled to relinquish her prey (xiv. i-3), is in brief the same as is more fully delineated in xlvii.; while the concluding verses about Sennacherib’s army (24-27) stand in somewhat the same relation to the rest of the “burden,” as the full history in xxxvi., xxxvii stands to xl-xlviii.

(b.) The short and pregnant “burden” against Philistia (xiv. 25-28) in the year that Azah died, was occasioned by the fall of the Philistines from Judah and their successful inroad, recorded 2 Chr. xxviii. 18. “If Judah’s rule was a serpent, that of Assyria would prove a basilisk—a flying dragon; let their gates howl at the smoke which announced the invading army! Meanwhile Zion would repose safe under the protection of her king;”—language plainly predictive, as the compiler in giving the date evidently felt; comp. xxxviii.

(c.) The burden of Zion (xv., xvi. i) is remarkable for the eloquent strain in which the prophet bewails the disasters of Moab, and for the dramatic character of xvi. 1-6, in which 3-5 is the petition of the Moabites to Judah, and ver. 6 Judah’s answer. a For Moab’s relation to Israel see Mrv. u.

(d.) Chapters xvi., xvii. This prophecy is headed “the burden of Damascus;” and yet after ver. 3 the attention is withdrawn from Damascus and turned to Israel, and then to Ethiopia. Israel appears as closely associated with Damascus, and indeed dependent upon her, and as having adopted her religious rites, “strange slips,” ver. 10 (comp. 2 K. xvi. 10, of Azah), which shall not profit her. This brings us to the time of the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance; at all events Ephraim has not yet ceased to exist. Chap. xvii. 12-14, as well as xviii. 1-7, point again to the event of xxxvii. But why this here? The solution seems to be that, though Assyria would be the ruin both of Aram and of Israel, and though it would even threaten Judah (“us,” ver. 14), it should not then conquer Judah (comp. turn of xiv. 31, 32). And with this last thought ch. xviii. is inseparably connected; for it is a call of congratulation to Ethiopia (“wos” in ver. 1 of A. V. should be “holo” as lv. 1; also in ver. 2 omit “saying”), whose deputies, predictively imagined as having come to Palestine to learn the progress of the Assyrian invasion (comp. xxxvii. 9), are sent back by the prophet charged with the glad news of Assyria’s overthrow described in vv. 4-6. In ver. 7 we have the conversion of Ethiopia: for “the people tall, and shorn” is itself “the present” to be brought unto Jehovah. (Comp. Acts viii. 20-40, and the present condition of Ethiopia.)

These repeated predictions of Zion’s deliverance from Asshur, in conjunction with Asshur’s triumph over Zion’s enemies, entered deeply into the essence of the prophet’s public ministry: the great aim of which was to fix the dependence of his countrymen entirely upon Jehovah.

(a) A good deal of this burden is an enlargement of Num. xxi. 27-30, from the imitation of which the coloring of its style in part arises. It in turn resembles an enlarged edition in Jer. xviii. The two concluding verses (is. xvi. 13, 14), which furnish no real ground for doubting whether Isaiah wrote the whole prophecy of this sort of old time the purport of this denunciation has been decreed (namely, in Num. xxi. and xxiv. 17), but that within three years it

(e.) In the “burden of Egypt” (xiv. the prophet seems to be pursuing the same object. Both Israel (xxi. 26-40, and Judah (xv. xvi. 1-14) were naturally disposed to look towards Egypt for succor against Assyria. Probably it was to counteract this tendency that the prophet is here directed to prophesy the utter helplessness of Egypt under God’s judgments: she should be given over to Asshur (the “cruel lord” and “fierce king” of ver. 4, not Psammethichus), and should also suffer the most dreadful calamities through civil dissensions and through foreign invasion—unless through the peculiar usefulness of the Nile and the veneration with which it was regarded (1-15). But the result should be that numerous cities of Egypt should own Jehovah for their God, and be joined in brotherhood with his worshippers in Israel and in Asshur;—a reference to Messianic times.

(f.) In the midst of these “burdens” stands a passage which presents Isaiah in a new aspect, an aspect in which he appears in this instance only. It was not uncommon both in the O. T. and in the New (comp. Acts xxii. 11) for a prophet to add to his spoken word an action symbolizing its import. Sargon, known here only, was king of Assyria, probably between Shahunmeser and Sennacherib. His armies were now in the south of Palestine besieging Ashdol. It has been plausibly conjectured that Tirhakah, king of Meroe, and Sethos, the king of Egypt, were now in alliance. The more emphatically to enforce the warning already conveyed in the “burden of Egypt”—not to look thitherward for help—Isaiah was commanded to appear in the streets and temple of Jerusalem stripped of his sackcloth mantle, and wearing his vest only, with his feet also bare. “Thus shall Egyptians and Ethiopians walk, captives before the king of Assyria.” For three years was he directed (from time to time, we may suppose) thus to show himself in public view,—to make the lesson the more impressive by constant repetition.

(g.) In “the burden of the desert of the sea,” a poetical designation of Babylonia (xii. 1-10), the images in which the fall of Babylon is indicated are sketched with Eschylean rapidity, and certainly not less than Eschylean awfulness and grandeur. As before (xii. 17), the Medes are the captors. It is to comfort Judah sighing under the “treacherous spoiling” (v. 2) and continual “thirsting” (v. 10) of Asshur—Ninivite and Babylonian—that the Spirit of God moves the prophet to this utterance:

(h.) “The burden of Dumah,”—in which the watchman can see nothing but night, let them ask him as often as they will,—of Arabia (xiii. 11-17), relate apparently to some Assyrian invasion.

(i.) In “the burden of the valley of vision” (xiii. 1-14), it is doubtless Jerusalem that is thus designated, and not without sadness, as having been so long the home of prophetic vision to so little result. The scene presented is that of Jerusalem should begin to be fulfilated. It was not completely fulfilled even in Jeremiah’s time.

b Comp. the close of the “burden of Tyre.” The “city of destruction” (xix. 15) is supposed by many to be Beth-shemesh of Jer. xiii. 15, specified because hitherto an especial seat of idolatry. Onias’s misuses which the prophet so well knew of (see 1 Macc. x. 1-6) agree.

c In vv. 3 and 4 the poet dramatically represents the feelings of the Babylonians.
ISAIAH

Juring an invasion; in the hostile army are named Ham and Kir, nations which no doubt contributed troops both to the Ninevite and to the Babylonian armies. The latter is probably here contemplated. The _homiletic_ purpose of this prediction in reference to Isaiah's contemporaries, was to incite a pious and humble dependence upon Jehovah in place of any mere fleshly confidence.

(6.) The passage xxiii. 15-21 is singular in Isaiah as a prophecy against an individual. Comp. the word of Amos (vii.) against Amaziah, and of Jere- niah (xx.) against Pashur. Shobnah was probably as ungodly as they. One of the king's highest functionaries, he seems to have been leader of a party opposed to Jehovah (v. 23, "the burden that is upon it"). Himself a stranger in Jerusalem—perhaps an alien, as Ewald conjectures from the un-Hebrew form of his name—he may have been introduced by Hezekiah's predecessor Ahaz; he made great parade of his rank (ver. 18; comp. 2 Sam. xv. 1), and presumed upon his elevation so far as to hew out a tomb high up in the cliffs (probably on the western or southwestern side of Jerusalem, where so many were excavated), as an ostentations display of his greatness (comp. 3 Chr. xxiii. 33, _margin_). We may believe him to have been engaged with this business outside the walls, when Isaiah came to him with his message. Shobnah succies his power securely rooted; but Jehovah will roll him up as a ball and toss him away into a far distant land, — _disgust that he is to his master!_ his stately robes of office, with his broad magnificent girdle, shall invest another, Elishiam. Ch. xxvii. 3, seems to indicate a decline of his power, as it also shows Elishiam's promotion to Shobnah's former post. Perhaps he was disgraced and exiled by Hezekiah, after the event of xxxvi., when the sinners in Zion were overawed and great ascendency for a while secured to the party which was true to Jehovah. If his fall was the consequence of the Assyrian overthrow, we can better understand both the demeanssment against the individual and the position it occupies in the record.

(l.) The last "burden" is against Tyre (xxvii.). The only cause specified by Isaiah for the judgment upon Tyre is the pride (ver. 9; comp. Ez. xviii. 2, 6); and we can understand how the Tyrians, proud of their material progress and its outward displays, may have looked with contempt upon the plainer habits of the theocratic people. But this was not the only ground. The contagion of her idolatry reached Jerusalem (1 K. xi. 5, 33; 2 K. xi. 18, xxii. 13). Otherwise also she was an injurious neighbor (Ps. lx. iii. 7; Joel, iv. 6; Am. i. 9). It therefore behoved Jehovah, both as avengeing his own worship, and as the guardian and avenger of his peculiar people, to punish Tyre Shalmaneser appears to have been foiled in his five years' siege; Nebuchadnezzar was more successful, capturing at least the main body of the city; and to this latter circumstance ver. 13 refers. In vv. 15-17 it seems to be intimated that when this pressure of Assyrian should be removed (by the Medo-Persian conquest), Tyre should revive. Her bitter destruction is not predicted by Isaiah as it afterwards was by Ezekiel. Ver. 18 probably points to Messianic times: comp. Matt. vii. 26; Acts xxi. 3; Enseh. _H. E._ x. 4.

9. The next four chapters, xxiv.-xxvi., form one prophecy essentially connected with the preceding ten "burdens" (xiii.-xxiii.), of which it is in effect a general summary; it presents previous denunciations in one general demeanssment which includes the theocratic people itself, and therewith also the promise of blessings, especially Messianic blessings, for the remnant. It no longer particularizes (Moab, xx. 10, represents all enemies of God's people, as Edom does in xi. 1), but speaks of judgments upon lands, cities, and oppressors in general terms, the reference of which is to be gathered from what goes before.

The latter part of xxv. is interrupted at ver. 13 by a glance at the happy remnant (ver. 15, _fires probably means cost_), but is resumed at ver. 16, till at ver. 21 the dark night passes away altogether to usher in an inexpressibly glorious day.

In xxv., after commemorating the destruction of all oppressors ("city" ver. 2, contemplates Babylon as type of all), the prophet gives us in vv. 6-9 a most glowing description of Messianic blessings, which connects itself with the vision of the future by numberless links, indicating the union of the prophet's Spirit ("the Spirit of Christ," 1 Pet. i. 11), with that which dwells in the later revelation.

In xxvi., ver. 12-18 describe the new, happy state of God's people as God's work wholly (comp. 13, "by thee only"); all their efforts were fruitless till God graciously interposed. The new condition of Israel is figuratively a restoration (comp. Ezekiel's vision of dry bones, Ez. xx. 1), the glad tidings of a triumphant agency: as indeed the glorified state of the Church hereafter will be literally a resurrection.

In xxvii. 1, "Leviathan the gleening serpent, and Leviathan the twisting serpent, and the dragon in the sea," are perhaps Nineveh and Babylon—two phases of the same Assyrian—and Egypt (comp. ver. 13); all, however, symbolizing adverse powers of evil. The reader will observe that in this period of his ministry, Isaiah already contemplates the xxxv. deliverance of his people as a restoration from captivity, especially from Assyria, vv. 12, 13 (comp. xi. 11, 16), as he does in the second part; — Babylon being a second phase of Assyria.

10. Ch. xxviii.—xxxv. The former part of this section makes nothing of a temporary character, being, as Hengstenberg with much probability conjectures, the substance of discourses not fully communicated, and spoken at different times. The latter part hangs more closely together, and may with considerable certainty be assigned to the time of Sennacherib's invasion. At such a season the spirit of prophecy would be especially awake.

Ch. xxvii. 1-6 is clearly predictive; it therefore presumes uninterrupted continuance of public relations, “the crown of pride” surmounting its beautiful hill, was destroyed. But the men of Judah also, ver. 7 (comp. ver. 14), are threatened. And here we have a picture given us of the way in which Jeho-ovah’s word was received by Isaiah’s contemporaries. Priest and prophet were drunk with a spirit of infatuation, — “they err’d in vision, they stumbled in judgment,” and therefore only scoff’d at his messages.

In the lips of these false prophets, prophesying, in proportion to its falsehood, would be exaggerated in the wildness and incoherency of the style. Hence the scoffing prophets and priests made it a matter of reproach against Isaiah that his style was so plain and simple — as if he were dealing with little children, ver. 9. And in mockery they accumulate monosyllables as infatuating its style (tev la-teav, teav la-teav, kar la-kar, kar la-kar, zeer sham, zeer sham, ver. 10). “Twist, my words” (Is. Isaiah’s reply) “into a mocking jabber if ye will; God shall in turn speak to you by the jabber of foreign invaders!” (comp. Deut. xxviii. 49). They trusted that they had made a “vision” — a compact with death and hell (vv. 15, 18, “agreement,” Hebrew. visyon), and that through the measures which they, seer and priest together, had adopted, no invasion should hurt them. But the stone which Jehovah lays in Zion (God’s own prophets) alone secures those who trust in it: ye shall perish (10-22). Ver. 16 is applied in the N. T. to Christ: he is now the prophet who saves those who believe in him. This glimpse into Hebrew life explains to us in part the cause of the failure of the prophetic ministry. The travesty of the “word of Jehovah” preoccupied men’s minds, or at least confused them; while further the conflicting voices of different prophets, the false and the true, would furnish them, as in all ages it does to the worldly and the skeptical, a ground for entire disbelief.

“Cannot ye wise men apply to the conduct of your affairs in relation to God that shrewdness and wisdom, which the fosterer displays in dealing with his various businesses, and which God has given alike to him and to you?” (23-29).

a "The priest and the prophet." There is no reason to understand these as connected with idolatry. There were always (it would seem) a numerous party who assumed the hair-worn mantle of the prophet ("wearing a hairy garment to deceive"); and these sable-clad men perhaps even swarmed in the streets of Jerusalem. [Ruth, p. 708, note e.] The priests, on the other hand, were the aristocracy of Judah, and, under the king, to a great extent ruled its policy. Like the coalition of strategos and orator at Athens, so priest and prophet plied into each other's hands. 4:10. Jesusism. Whatever public policy the priests advised, they would be seconded therein by prophets, "in the name of Jehovah." Isaiah’s contemporary shows us in what an unprincipled manner the prophets abused their function for their own advantage (Mic. iii. 5-7, 11): "The prophets prophesied falsely, and the priests bore rule by their means." (Jer. v. 31.) Hence prophets and priests are so often lumped together (comp. xxviii. 9, 10).

b In ver. 10, read "some days over a year shall ye be troubled." 16:10. In the reference to "the book of Jehovah," ver. 16 as containing this prediction, deserves notice. As the
Isaiah, xxxiv. has a general sense, so xxxv. indicates in general terms the deliverance of Israel as if out of captivity, rejoicing in their secure and happy march through the wilderness. It may be doubted whether the description is meant to apply to any deliverance out of temporal captivity, closely as the imagery approaches that of the second part. It rather seems to picture the march of the spiritual Israel to her eternal Zion (Heb. xvii. 10), and the approach of her Deliverer, Jehovah, in his long-sought and finally arrived salvation. The Assyrian was near with forces apparently irresistible. In the universal consternation which ensued, all the hope of the state centred upon Isaiah: the highest functionaries of the state,—Shalman too,—wait upon him in the name of their sovereign, confessing that they were now in the very extremity of danger (xxxvii. 3), and entreat his prayers:—a signal token this, of the approved fidelity of the prophet in the ministry which he had so long exercised. The short answer which Jehovah gave through him was, that the Assyrian king should hear intelligence which would send him back to his own land, there to perish. The event shows that the intelligence pointed to was that of the death of his array. Accordingly, Hezekiah communicated to Sennacherib, now at Lachish, his refusal to submit, expressing his assurance of being protected by Jehovah (comp. ver. 10). This drew from the Assyrian king a letter of defiance against Jehovah himself, as being no more able to defend Jerusalem, than other tutehry gods had been to defend the countries which he had conquered. On Hezekiah's sending this letter before Jehovah in the Temple for him to read and answer (ver. 17), Isaiah was commissioned to send a fuller reply to the pious king (21-35), the manifest object of which was the more completely to signalize, especially to God's own people themselves, the meaning of the coming event. How the deliverance was to be effected, Isaiah was not commissioned to tell; but the very next night (2 K. xix. 35) brought the appalling fulfilment. A divine inspiration so marvelous, so evidently miraculous, was in its magnificence worthy of being the kernel of Isaiah's whole book; it is, indeed that without which the whole book falls to pieces, but with which it forms a well-organized whole (comp. Is. lxvi. xvi. xlviii.).

prophet's spoken word was "the word of Jehovah." So his written word is here called "the book of Jehovah." It shows Isaiah's estimate of his prophetic writings. So xxx 8 points to an enduring record in which he was to deposit his testimony concerning Egypt. (In xxx. 5, for "That this is," etc., read "Because this is"")

"This is like Isaiah's style the whole passage is! xxxvii. 26 refers to the numerous predictions of prophetic writings of the context and overthrown found in preceding parts of the book (comp. xiv. 8; xvi. 9-11, &c.; comp. ver. 27 with xii. 2). "The" in ver. 30, as in xii. 11-16: There must be a remnant; therefore ye shall now be delivered. For further explanation, refer to the law in Lev. xxi. 5: 11: "Your condition this year will be like that of a Sabbath year; next year the land being even then not quite cleared of invaders like that of the jubilee year: as at the jubilee the Hebrew commonwealth starts afresh, restored to its proper condition, so now reformation, the fruit of affliction, shall introduce better days."

For Hezekiah's sickness was 15 years before his death, whereas the destruction of Sennacherib's army (so chronologies determine) occurred 12 or 13 years before the same date.

Since xxxvii. 9-20 is not in 2 K., and on the other hand in 2 K. are found many passages not found in Is. (e. g. 2 K. xviii. 14-20; xx. 4, 5, 9, &c.;), critics are generally agreed that neither account was drawn from the other, but both from the record mentioned in 2 Chr. xxxii. 22 as "the vision of Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, found in (not, as in A. V., and in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel;" which record Isaiah adopted with modifications into the composition of his prophecies.

As it is for the benefit of God's own people that Isaiah writes, and not to affect heathen nations to whom he had no commission, the argument against idolatry, of which we have so much in this prophet, is to be ascribed to inbred tenacities among the Hebrews themselves, which ceased at the Captivity (for the deportation probably altogether affected chiefly the best disposed of the nation, especially the priests, of whom there appears to have been a disproportionate number left among those who were exiled and those who remained."

12. The hot 27 chapters form a prophecy, whose coherence of structure and unity of authorship are generally admitted even by those who deny that it was written by Isaiah. The point of time and situation from which the prophet here speaks, is for the most part that of the Captivity in Babylon (comp., e. g., lv. 10, 11). But this is adopted on a principle already noted as characterizing "vision," namely, that the prophet sees the future as if present. That the present with the prophet in this section was imagined and not real, is indicated by the specification of sins which are reeked: as neglect of sacrifices (xlvii. 22-24), unceaseable sacrifices (lxxvi. 3), vials of bitterness (xxiv. 10) sin belonging to a period before the exile, and not to the exile itself. But that this imagined time and place should be maintained through so long a composition, is unquestionably a remarkable phenomenon. It is, however, explained by the fact, that the prophet in these later prophecies is a writer rather than a public speaker, writing for the edification of God's people in those future days, in the manner of which Isaiah was aware. For the punishment of exile had been of old denounced in case of disobedience even by Moses himself (Lev. xxvi. 31-35), and thus contemplated by Solomon (1 K. viii. 46-50); moreover, Isaiah had himself often realized and predicted it, with reference repeatedly to Babylon in particular (xxxix. 6, 7, xviii. 12, xxi. 2, 10, xiv. 2, 5, xi. 11, 12, xii. 11, 12); which was also done by Micah (iv. 10, xii. 13). Apart therefore from the immediate suggestion of an inspiring afflatus, it was a thought already fixed in Isaiah's mind by a chain of foregoing revelations, that the Hebrews would be deported to Babylon, and that too within a generation or two. We dwell upon this, because it most be acknowledged, and we have already made the remark, that "vision" even in its most heightened form still adapted itself more or less to the previous mental condition of the seer. We can understand, therefore, that the reader might be led to write prophecies, such as should serve as his ministerial bequest to his people when the hour of their captivity should have fallen upon them.

This same fact, namely, that the prophet is here, in the undisturbed retirement of his chamber, giving us a written prophecy, and not recording, as in the early part of the book, spoken discourses, goes far to explain the greater profusion of words, and the clearer, more complete and more comprehensive exposition of thoughts, which generally characterize this second part; whereas the first part frequently exhibits great abruptness, and a close compression and terseness of diction, at times almost enigmatical — as an ignorant man might speak among gain-sayers from whom little was to be hoped. This difference of style, so far as it exists (for it has been greatly exaggerated), may be further ascribed to the difference of purpose; for here Isaiah generally appears as the tender and compassionate comforter of the pious and afflicted: whereas before he appears rather as accuser and denounced. There exists after all sufficient similarity of diction to indicate Isaiah's hand (see Keil's Einleitung, § 72, note 7).

This second part falls into three sections, each, as it happens, consisting of nine chapters; the two first and with the refrain, "There is no peace, saith Jehovah (or 'my God ',' to the wicked," and the third with the same thought modified.

(1.) The first section (xl.-xlvi.) has for its main topic the comforting assurance of the deliverance from Babylon by Koresh ( Cyrus) who is even named twice (xli. 2, 3, 35, xliv. 24-28, xlv. 1-4, 13, xlvii. 3, xlviii. 14, 15).\(^a\) This section abounds with arguments against idolatry, founded mainly (not wholly, see the noble passage xlv. 9-23) upon the gift of prediction possessed by Jehovah's prophets, especially as shown by their predicting Cyrus, and even naming him (xlii. 26, xliv. 8, 24-28, xlv. 4, 10, 21, xlvii. 8-11, xlviii. 3-8, 15). Idols and heathen diviners are taunted with not being able to predict (xli. 1-7, 21-24, xlii. 8-13, xlv. 20-21, xlvii. 10-13). This power of foretelling the future, as shown in this instance, is insisted upon as the test of divinity. It is of importance to observe in reference to the prophet's standing-point in this second part, that in speaking both of the Captivity in Babylon and of the deliverance out of it, there is (excepting Cyrus's name) no specification of particular circumstances, such as we might expect to find if the writer had written at the end of the exile;

\(^a\) The point has been argued for, and the evidence seems satisfactory (Hüvernick, Hengst.), that Koresh. a word meaning Sun, was commonly in the East, and particularly in Persia, a title of princes, and that it was assumed by Cyrus, whose original name was Agdrades, on his ascending the throne. It stands, however, in history as his own proper name. This instance of particularizing in prophecy is paralleled by the specification of Josiah's name (I. K. xii. 2) some 590 years before his time.

\(^b\) It is difficult to acquire the passages above cited of impudent and indeed suicidal mendacity, if they were not written before Cyrus appeared on the political scene.

\(^c\) For the discussion and refutation of all expositions which understand by "the servant of Jehovah" here in the second section, the Jewish people, or the pious among them, or the prophetic order, or some other object than the Messiah, comp. Heinzenberg's Christologie, vol. ii.

\(^d\) In this passage Christ is called "Israel," as the concentration and consummation of the covenant-people — as he in whom its idea is to be realized.

\(^e\) That Jesus of Nazareth is the object which in "vision" the prophet saw in 1. 6, and in lii. 13, lxxvi. 12 (connecting lii. 13 with lii. 12 as one passage), will hardly be questioned amongst ourselves, except by those whose minds are prepossessed by the notion that predictive revelation is inconceivable. Meanwhile all will acknowledge the truth of Keil's remark: "In the Servant of Jehovah, so vividly sores before his view, the prophet discerns a new clear light shed abroad over all possible situations of that time; in him he finds the balm of consolation, the oil of the delineation is of a kind, generally frequent from the history of Moses and Joshua. Let it be observed, in particular, that the language respecting the wilderness (e. g. xlii. 17-20), through which the people, for which they were to pass, is unmistakably ideal and symbolical.

It is characteristic of sacred prophecy in general, that the "vision" of a great deliverance leads the seer to glance at the great deliverance to come through Jesus Christ. This associating of ideas is found in several passages in the first part of Isaiah, in which the destruction of the Assyrian army suggests the thought of Christ (e. g. x. 24-xl. 11, xxxvi. 3-xl. 27). This principle of association prevails in the second part taken as a whole; but in the first section, taken apart, it appears as yet imperfectly. However, xli. 1-7 is a clear prediction of the Messiah, and that too as viewed in part in contrast with Cyrus: for the "servant" of Jehovah is meek and gentle (ver. 2, 3), and will establish the true religion in the earth (ver. 4). Nevertheless, since the prophet regards the two deliveries as referable to the same type of thought (comp. lix. 1-3), so the announcement of one (xl. 3-5) is held by all the four Evangelists, and by John Baptist himself, as predictive of the announcement of the other.

(2.) The second section (xlii.-lvi.) is distinguished from the first by several features. The person of Cyrus as well as his name, and the specification of Babylon (named in the first section four times), and of his gods, and of the Chaldeans (named before five times), disappear altogether. Return from exile is indeed repeatedly spoken of and at length (xlii. 9-26, lii. 9-liii. 12, lv. 12, lixiv. 14); but in such general terms as admit of being applied to the spiritual and Messianic, as well as to the literal restoration. And that the Messianic restoration (whether a spiritual restoration or not) is principally intended, is clear from the connection of the restoration promised in xlii. 9-25 with the Messiah portrayed in xli. 1-8;\(^d\) from the description of the suffering Christ (in I. 5, 6) in the midst of the promise of deliverance (I. 1-11); from the same description in lii. 12-liii. 12, between the passages li. 1-lii. 12, and liv. 1-17; and from the exhibition of Christ in lv. 4 (connected in ver. 3 with the Messianic promise given to David, forning the foundation on which is raised the promise of lv. 3-13. Comp. also the interpretation of lv. 13 given by Christ himself in John vi. 45, and that of ix. 1-3 in Luke iv. 18. In fact the place of Cyrus in the first section is in this second section held by his greater Antitype.\(^e\)

(3.) In the third section (lvii.-lxv.) as Cyrus nowhere appears, so neither does "Jehovah's servant" occur so frequently to view as in the second. The only delineation of the latter is in ix. 1-3 and in xiii. 1-6, 9. He no longer appears as suffering, but only as saving and avenging Zion. The section is mainly occupied with various practical exhortations founded upon the views of the future already set forth. In the second the parentheses is almost all consisting, taking in x. 17 the form of advice; only in lii. and towards the close in ix. 9-liii. 14 is the language accusing and minatory. In this third section, on the other hand, the prophesying is very much in this last-named strain (cf. lvii. 1-7, lx. 1-8, lxv. 16, lxvi. 1-17, 21); taking the form of national self-resentment in lx. 9-15 and lxii. 13-lxiv. 12. Still, interspersed in this admonition, accusation, and threatening, there are gleams, and even bright tracts, of more cheering matter; besides the conditional promises as arguments for well-doing in lxii. 8 and lxvi. 1, 2, we have the long passage of general and unconditional promise in lx. 20-lxvi. 6, and the shorter ones lxv. 17-23, lxvi. 7-14, 18-24; and in some of these passages the future of Zion is depicted with brighter coloring than almost anywhere else. The whole bearing on the whole the predominant feature of this section is exhortation with the view, as it should seem, of qualifying men to receive the promised blessings. There was to be "no peace for the wicked," but only for those who turned from ungodliness in Jacob; and therefore the prophet in such various forms of exhortations urges the topic of repentance, promising, advising, leading to confession (lxvi. 6-12); comp. Hos. xiv. 2-3); warning, threatening. In reference to the sins especially selected for rebuke, we find specified idolatry lxv. 3, 4, lxvi. 17 (as in the second section lvii. 3-10), bloodshedding, and injustice (lx. 1-5), selfishness (lxv. 5), and merely outward and ceremonial ceremonialism (lxvi. 1-5). If it were not for the place given to idolatry, we might suppose with Dr. Henderson that the spirit of God is already by prophetic anticipation rekindling the Judah consulting taking in x. 17 the name of Jesus Christ, — so accurately in many places are its features delineated as denounced in the N. T. But the specification of idolatry leads us to seek for the immediate objects of this parenthesis in the prophet's own time, when indeed the Pharisianism displayed in the N. T. already existed, being in fact in all ages the natural product of an unconverted, unspiritual heart combining with the observance of a positive religion, and in all ages (comp. e.g. Ps. 1) antagonistic to true piety.

While we can distinctly discern certain dominant thoughts and moods in each of these three sections, we must not, however, expect to find them pursued with the regularity which we look for in a modern sermon; such treatment is wholly alien from the spirit of prophecy, which always more or less is in the strict sense the disorder of book. But obviously, we find in these, as in the earlier portions of the book, the transitions sudden, and the exhortation every now and then varied by dramatic interlocu-tion, by description, by odes of thanksgiving, by prayers.

III. Numberless attacks have been made by German critics upon the integrity of the whole book, different critics pronouncing different portions of the first part spurious, and many concurring to reject the second part altogether. A few observations, particularly on this latter point, appear here to be necessary.

1. The first writer who ever breathed a suspicion that Isaiah was not the author of the last twenty seven chapters was Koppe, in remarks upon ch. 1, in his German translation of Luth's Isaiah, published in the years 1772-1781. This was presently followed up by Därendel, especially in his Latin translation and commentary in 1783; by Eichhorn, who in a later period most fully developed his views on this point in his Hebräischen Propheten, 1810-1819; and the most fully and effectually by Justi. The majority of the German critics have given in their adhesion to these views: as Paulus (1793), Bertholdt (1812), De Wette (1817), Grosinis (1820, 1829), Hitzig (1833), Noth (1838), Umbreit and Ewald (1841). Defenders of the integrity of the book have not, however, been wanting — particularly Jahn in his Einleitung (1802); Müller in his De Authentia Prophetarum Juvenae (Copenhagen, 1825); Kleinert in his Excl. des Jesu (1829); Hengstenberg in his Christologie, vol. ii.; Harnack, Einleitung, B. iii. (1849); Steier in his Jesu nicht Physio-Jesu (1850); and Keil, Einleitung (1853), in which last the reader will find a most satisfactory compendium of the controversy and of the grounds for the generally received views.

2. The catalogue of authors who gainsay Isaiah's authorship of this second part is, in point of numbers, of critical ability, and of profound Hebrew scholarship, sufficiently imposing. Nevertheless when we come to inquire into their grounds of objection, we soon cease to attach much value to this formidable array of authorities. The circumstance mainly urged by them is the unquestionable fact that the author bows, to a considerable view taken his standing-point at the close of the Babylonish Captivity as if that were his present, and from thence looks forward into the subsequent future. Now is it possible (they ask) that in such a manner and to such a degree a seer should step out of his own time, and plant his foot so firmly in a later time? We must grant (they urge) that he might gaze upon a future not very distant, as if present, and represent it accordingly; but in the case before us infallible insight and prescience must be predicated of him: for this idea of an Isaiah who knows even Cyrus's name was not realized for two centuries later, and a chance hit is here out of the question. "This, however, is inconceivable. A prophet's prescience must be limited to the notion of foretelling (ivangi), and to the deductions from paternity — taken in combination with real or supposed truths. Prophets were bounded like other men by the horizon of their own age; they borrowed the object of their soothsaying from their present: and excited by the relations of their present use they spoke to their contemporaries of what affected other people's minds or their own, occupying themselves only with that future whose rewards or punishments were likely to reach the same con- temporaries. For the exigesis the position is impeccably that the prophetic writings are to be interpreted in each case out of the relations belonging to the time of the prophet; and from this follows as a corollary the critical Canon: that that time, those time-relations, out of which a prophet is, and time-relations: — to that time he must be referred as the date of his own existence." (Hitzig, 248).

a *Restoration from captivity is spoken of in viii. 12. lx. 4-7, lix. 4, 5, 10: but for the most part in such general terms as might easily be understood as referring to spiritual restoration in this literal restoration pre-requisite requirement, this exhortation may be taken with a reference to literal restoration as well.

3. This is the main argument. Other grounds which are alleged are confessedly "secondary and external," and are really of no great weight. The most important of these is founded upon the difference in the conception of style which has already been noticed; this point will come into view again presently. A number of particulars of dictation said to be non-Islamic have been accentuated: but the reasoning founded upon them has been satisfactorily met by opposing evidence of a similar kind (see Keil, Einleitung, § 72). It is not, however, on such considerations that the chief stress is laid by the opponents of the Islamic authorship of this portion of Scripture: the great ground of objection is, as already stated, the incompatibility of those phenomena of prediction which are not, in the writings in question, with the subjective theories of inspiration (or rather non-inspiration) which the reader has just had submitted to him. The incompatibility is confessed. But where is the solution of the difficulty to be sought? Are those theories so certainly true that all evidence must give way to them? This is not the place for combating them; but, for our own part, we are so firmly convinced that the theory is utterly discredited by the facts exhibited to us in the Bible throughout, that we are content to lack in this case the countenance of its upholders. Their judgment in the critical question before us is determined, not by their scholarship, but avowelly by the prepossessions of their unbelief.

4. For our present purpose it must suffice briefly to indicate the following reasons as establishing the integrity of the whole book, and as indicating the authenticity of the second part:

(a.) Extenually. — The unanimous testimony of Jewish and Christian tradition — Ecclus. xiv. 24, which manifestly (in the words paremdéxen tois tivnwv, and ἐξεταζέων την ἐπίστασα, πρὸς τὸ παραγεννήθη εἰρέτες) is to this second part. The case apparently made of the second part by Jeremiah (x. 1-16, v. 25, xxx. 31, 1, 11, Ezekiel (xxiii. 40, 41), and Zechariah (ii. 15, iii. 10). The decree of Cyrus in Ezr. i. 2-4, which plainly is founded upon Is. xlvii. 28, xlvii. 13, ac- crediting Josephus's statement (Ant. xi. 1, § 2); that the Jews showed Cyrus Isaiah's predictions of him. The inspired testimony of the N. T., which speaks (Matt. iii. 3 and the parallel passages: Luke iv. 17; Acts viii. 28; Rom. x. 16, 29) quotes with specification of Isaiah's name prophecies found in the second part.

(b.) Internally. — The unity of design and con- struction which, as we have seen, connects these last twenty-seven chapters with the preceding parts of the book: — The choice of dictation which pervades the whole book. — The peculiar elevation and grandeur of style, which, as is universally acknowl- edged, distinguishes the whole contents of the second part as much as of the first, and which assigns their composition to the golden age of He- brew literature. — The absence of any other name than Isaiah's claiming the authorship. At the time to which the composition is assigned, a Zecha- riah or a Malachi could gain a separate name and book; how was it that an author of such transcendent gifts, as "The Great Unnamed" who wrote xl.-lxvi., could gain none? — The claims which the writer makes to the "first knowledge of the deliverance by Cyrus, which claims, on the opposing view, must be regarded as a fraudulent personation of an earlier writer. — Lastly, the predictions which it contains of the character, sufferings, death, and glorification of Jesus Christ: a believer in Christ cannot fail to regard these predictions as affixing to this second part the broad seal of Divine Inspiration; whereby the chief ground of objection against its having been written by Isaiah is at once am- hilated.α

IV. It remains to make a few observations on the death of the author. Those who feel compelled from internal evidence to ascribe the latter part of Isaiah to a writer who flourished in the time of the Captivity, do not on that account value the work the less, but regard this view of it as investing it with new interest. Thus Dr. Noyes calls the author "the greatest of all the Jewish prophets" (New Trans. of the Hebrew Prophets, 4th ed., i. p. xliii); Dean Stanley speaks of these chapters as "the most deeply inspired, the most truly Evangelical, of any portion of the Prophetic writings, whatever be their date, and whoever their author" (Hist. of the Jewish Church, ii. 115); and Dean Milman remarks: "It is well known that the later chapters of Isaiah are attributed, by the common consent of most of the profoundly learned writers of Germany . . . to a different writer, whom they call the great nameless Prophet, or the second Isaiah, who wrote during the exile. I must acknowledge that these chapters, in my judgment, read with infinitely greater force, subtlety, and reality under this view. If they lose, and I hardly feel that they lose, in those points of inspiration, meaning, and consolation they do not lose their power when we consider them specially adapted to the condition of his immediate contemporaries, rather than designed for the elucidation of the people 150 years or more after the Isaiah's style; though in truth the abundance of the materials which offer themselves makes it a difficult matter to give anything like a just and definite view of the subject, without trespassing unduly upon the limits necessarily prescribed to us. On this point we cannot do better than introduce some of the remarks with which Ewald precedes his translation of such parts of the book as he is disposed to acknowledge as Isaiah's (Prophecies, ii. 166-179):

"In Isaiah we see prophetic authorship reaching its culminating point. Everything conspired to raise him to an elevation to which no prophet either before or after could as writer attain. Among the other prophets, each of the more important ones is distinguished by some one particular excellence, and some one peculiar talent; in Isaiah, all kinds of theologies and all beauteous of prophetic discourse meet together so as mutually to temper and qualify each other; it is not so much any single feature that distinguishes him as the symmetry and perfection of the whole.

"We cannot fail to assume, as the first condition of Isaiah's peculiar historical greatness, a native power and a vivacity of spirit, which even among prophets is a book which he met with, and rarely that we see combined in one and the same spirit the three several characteristics of — first, the most profound prophetic excitement and the purest sentiment; next, the most indefatigable and successful practical activity amidst all perplexities and changes of outward life; and, thirdly, that facility and beauty in representing thought which is the prerogative of the genuine poet; but this threefold combination we find realized in Isaiah as in no other man, nor can we see in the trances which we can perceive of the concealed joint-working of these three powers we must draw our conclusions as to the original greatness of his genius. — Both as prophet and as author Isaiah stands upon that calm, sunny height, which in each several branch of ancient literature one eminently favored spirit at the right time takes possession of; which seems as it were to have been waiting "for him and which, when he came and mounted the ascent, seems to keep and guard him to the last as its own right man. In the sentences which he expresses, in the topics of his discourses, and in the manner of expression, Isaiah uniformly reveals himself as the Kingly Prophet.

"In reference to the last named point, it cannot be said that his manner of representing thought is elaborate or artificial; it rather shows a lofty simplicity and an unconcern about external attractiveness, abandoning itself freely to the leading and requirement of each several thought; but nevertheless it always rolls along in a full stream which overpowers all resistance, and never fails at the right place to accomplish at every turn its object without toil or effort.

"The progress and development of the discourse is always majestic, achieving much with few words, which though short are yet clear and transparent; an overflowing, swelling fullness of thought, which might readily lose itself in the vast and indefinite, but which always at the right time with tight rein collects and tempers its exuberance; to the bottom exhausting the thought and completing the utterance, and yet never too diffuse. This severe self-control is the most admirably seen in those shorter utterances, which, by briefly sketched images and thoughts, give us the vague apprehension of something infinite, whilst nevertheless they stand before us complete in themselves and clearly delineated; c. g., viii. 6-ix. 8, xiv. 29-32, xviii. 1-7, xxi. 11, 12; while in the long piece, xxviii.-xxxii., if the composition here and there for a moment languishes, it is only felt itself up as in no other man, and then suddenly thrusts itself into perfect clearness; — a characteristic which belongs to this prophet alone, a freedom of language which with no one else so easily succeeds.

"The versification in like manner is always full, and yet strongly marked; while however this prophet is little concerned about anxiously weighing out to each verse its proper number of words; not infrequently he repeats the same word in two members (xxxi. 8, xxxii. 17, xii. 3, xiv. 13), as if, with so much power and beauty in the matter within, he did not so much require a painstaking finish in the outside. The structure of theストップはalways easy and beautifully rounded.

"Still the main point lies here, — that we cannot in the case of Isaiah, as in that of other prophets, specify any particular peculiarity, or any favorite (Hist. of the Jews, i. 423, note, new Amer. ed.), David- ron, in his Introduction to the Old Testament (iii. 59), after a full discussion of the authorship, concludes as follows: Among all the prophetic writings, the first place in many respects is due to those of the younger Isaiah. . . . None has announced in such strains as his the downfall of all earthly powers; or [so] unfolded to the view of the sifting the transcendency of Jehovah in salvation which should arise upon the remnant of Israel, forsaken and persecuted. None has penetrated so far into the essence of the new dispensation. . . . There is majesty in his sentiments, beauty and force in his language, propriety and elegance in his imagery. . . . Delitzsch, one of the most orthodox and conservative of the modern German theologians, in his elaborate article on Isaiah in Fairbairn's Interpretative Dictionary, maintains that all the prophecies in the book which bear the name of Isaiah are solely ascribed to him; but also remarks that, on the contrary supposition, "the prophetic discourses in this book are written with such a style that they could not necessarily lose anything of their predictive character and of their incomparable value. Their anonymous author might pass for another prophet, or even for the greatest of the Old Testament. We have no doctrinal reasons which would forbid us to distinguish in the book of Isaiah prophecies of Isaiah himself, and prophecies of anonymous prophets annexed to these." Fairbairn, i. 165, 45. He is of opinion that the prophets of the Old Testament are the authors of the book of Proverbs, "where, under the name of Solomon, the golden pearls of different times and of several authors are arranged beside one another, just as in the last centuries of our own the pearls are collected under the burden of David, the father of lyric poetry." So Prof. Stuart observes, "It is little of no theological or doctrinal importance which way this question is decided" (Ort. Hist. of the Old Testament, p. 104). On this subject see also the excellent remarks of Stanley, in his Note "On the Authorship of the Books of the Old Testament," appended to vol. i. of his History of the Jewish Church.

color as attaching to his general style. He is not the especially lyrical prophet, or the especially elegiac prophet, or the especially oratorical and harangue prophet, as we should describe a Joel, a Hosea, a Micah, with which the orators of the ancients are so enigmatical to us. He can only make himself heard utterly by the means which he feels he possesses as his subject-matter. This calmsness, however, no way demands that the strain shall not, when occasion requires, be more vehemently excited and assails the hearer with mightier blows; but even the extremest excitement, which does here and there intervene, is in the main bridled still by the same spirit of calmsness, and, not overstepping the limits which that spirit assigns, it soon with lofty self-control returns back to its wonted tone of equality (ii. 10-12, i. xxvi. 11-23, xxix. 9-14). Neither does this calmsness in discourse require that the subject shall always be treated only in a plain, level way, without any variation of form: rather, Isaiah shows himself master in just that variety of manner which suits the relation in which his hearers stand to the matter now in hand. If he wishes to bring home to their minds a distant truth which they like not to hear, and to judge them by a sentence pronounced by their own mouth, he retreats back into a popular statement of a case drawn from ordinary life (vv. 1-5, xxviii. 23-29). If he will draw the attention of the otherwise to some new truth, or to some future prospect, he surpises them by a brief oracle clothed in an enigmatical dress, leaving it to their penetration to discover its solution (vii. 14-16, xxix. 1-8). When the unhappy temper of people's minds which nothing can amend leads to loud lamentation, his speech becomes for a while the strain of elegy and lament (i. 21-23, xiii. 4, 5). Do the frivolous leaders of the people mock? - he outdoes them at their own weapons, and crushes them under the fearful earnest of divine mockery (xxviii. 10-13). Even a single ironed word in passing will drop from the lofty prophet (xvii. 3, glory). Thus his discourse varies into every complexion: it is its soul and stern, didactic and threatening, mourning and again exulting in divine joy, mocking and earnest; but ever at the right time it returns back to its original elevation and reposes, and never loses the clear ground-color of its divine seriousness."

In this delineation of Isaiah's style, Ewald contemplates exclusively the Isaiah of i.-xxxix., in which part of the book itself, however, there are several passages of which he will not allow Isaiah to be the author. These are the following: xii., xiii. 2-xiv. 23, xxi. 1-10, xxiv.-xxvi., xxv., xxvi. In reference to all these passages, with the exception of the first, the ground of objection is obvious upon a moment's observation of the contents; on rationalistic views of prophecy, none of them can be ascribed to Isaiah. For the proof of their genuineness it is sufficient to refer to Dreschler's Prophet Jesaias, or to Keil's Einleitung. We cannot however dismiss without mention the argument which the honesty of Ewald's esthetic judgment forms the style of nearly all these passages. He pronounces the magnificent denunciation of Babylon, xiii. 2-xiv. 23, to be referable to the same author as the prediction of Babylon's overthrow in xxi. 1-10, and both as alike remarkable for "the poetical facility of the words, images, and sentiments," particularizing xiv. 6-29 especially as "an ode of high poetical melancholy with which he traces much that "rejoices words of the genuine Isaiah."

If we refer to that part of Ewald's Propheten which treats of xl.-lxi., which he ascribes to "the Great Unnamed," the terms in which he speaks of its style of composition do not fall far short of those which he has employed respecting the former part. "Creative as this prophet is in his views and thoughts, he is not less peculiar and new in his language, which at times is highly inspired, and carries away the reader with a wonderful power.

Although, after the general manner of the later prophets, the discourse is apt to be too diffuse in delineation; yet, on the other side, it often moves confusedly and heavily, owing to the over-crowding fullness of fresh thoughts continually streaming in. But whenever it rises to a higher strain, as e. g. xl., xli. 1-4, it then attains to such a pure luminous sublimity, and carries the hearer away with such a wonderful charm of diction, that one might be ready to fancy he was listening to another prophet altogether, if other grounds did not convince us that it is one and the same prophet speaking, only in different moods of feeling. In no prophet does the mood in the composition of particular passages so much vary, as throughout the three separate sections into which this part of the book is divided, while under vehement excitement the prophet presents the most diverse objects. It is his business at different times, to comfort, to exhort, to shame, to chasten; to show, as out of heaven, the heavenly image of the Servant of the Lord, and, in contrast, to sour the folly and base groveling of imageworship; to teach what conduct the times require, and to rebuke those who linger behind the occasion, and then also to draw them along by his own example, in his prayer, exhortation, confession, thus smoothing for the approach to the exalted object of the New Time. Thus the complexion of the style, although hardly anywhere passing into the representation of visions properly so called, varies in a constant interchange; and rightly to recognize these changes is the great problem for the interpretation." (Propheten, vol. ii. 407-409). For obvious reasons we have preferred citing the esthetic judgments of so accomplished a critic as Ewald, to attempting any original criticism of our own; and this all the more willingly, because the inference to be drawn from the above cited passages (the reader will please especially to mark the sentences which we have put into italics) is clear, that in point of style, after taking account of the considerations already stated by us, we can find no difficulty in recognizing in the second part the presence of the same plastic genius as well as in the first. And, altogether, the esthetic criticism of all the different parts of the book brings us to the conclusion substantiated by the evidence previously accumulated; namely, that the whole of the book originated in one mind, and that mind one of the most sublime and variously gifted instruments which the Spirit of God has ever employed to pour forth its voice upon the world.
V. The following are the most important works on Isaiah: Vitringa’s Commentarius in Librum
Prophetiarum Isaias, 2 vols. fol. 1714, a vast mine of materials; Rosenmüller’s Scholia, 1818–1820 [3d ed., 1821–34], or his somewhat brief Scholia in Compendium reducta, 1831, which, though rationalistic, is [are] sober, and valuable in particular for the full use which he makes of Jerome and the Jewish expositors; Gesenius’s Philologisch-kritis-er und historischer Commentar, 1821 [and Übersetzung, 2 v. Aug., 1829]; Hitzig’s Prophet
Isaias überzett und ausgeg.’d, 1833, and Knobel, 1843 [3d ed. 1861], in the Kurzgeziefites Engelschen Handbuch zum Alten Testament, which are all three decidedly skeptical, but for lexical and historical materials are of very great value; Ewald’s Propheten des Alten Bundes [1840–41, 2d Aug., 1867–68], which, though likewise skeptical, is absolutely indispensable for a just appreciation of the poetry; the second volume of Hengstenberg’s Christ-oblog, translated in Clark’s Foreign Theological Library, 1856; Precherus’s Prophet Jesaias über und erklärt, now in course of publication [completed after the author’s death by F. Delitzsch and A. Hahn, and V. Thiele, 1848–57]. For Jesaias nicht Darmest.-Jesaias, 1859–51, which is a commentary on the last 27 chapters. The two chief English works are Bishop Lowth’s Isaias, a new translation, with Notes, Critical, Philological, and Expository, 1778 [13th ed., 1842], (whose incessant correction of the Hebrew text is constantly to be mistrusted), and Dr. Eleazer Hen-derson’s Translation and Commentary, 2d ed., 1857.
* The strong internal evidence of the common origin of the various writings attributed to Isaiah is of a cumulative character, and (especially as requiring often for its just presentation the aid of exegesis) can only be adequately exhibited at considerable length. A few of the more prominent points of the argument, in addition to those above given, may be here alluded to.
It is a consideration of no little weight, that many of the representations which are most strikingly characteristic of the second port are but fur-tier developments of thoughts that are more or less clearly suggested in the first. Thus the Captivity and the restoration, so largely and variously dwelt upon in the disputed portions, are distinctly predicted in ch. vi. 11–13, as well as intimated in other passages of which Isaiah is unhesitatingly admitted to be the author. Even the view presented of the Servant of Jehovah, which is perhaps the most distinctive feature of the second port, and which, combining as it does elements at first sight wholly irreconcileable with one another, has always been the stumbling-block of expositors, is, when rightly regarded, but a further unfolding of the conception which Gesenius, Ewald, and Knobel find in ch. xi. of the organic relation subsisting between the (ideal) Messiah and his people — the same conception, substantially, which Ewald, Hitzig, and Knobel find in viii. 8 and ix. 6, and which Ewald recognizes even in vi. 14.
In xlviii. 28–4x. 13 we find the thought expanded and applied to Cyrus which occurs in another form with a different application in x. 5–7. Compare here also xlvii. 11, lv. 16. The elements of the representation of the new heaven and the new earth in lv. 17–25 are found in xvs. 6–9 and elsewhere.
The magnificent representations, ch. lx. and elsewhere, of the glory of Jehovah being made the light and the defense of his people, have their germ in lv. 5.
In like manner the predictions in xliii. 6, xlv.
22, and lvii. 20 are framework in xlv. 12. Compare also xlv. 9–11 with xlv. 23, and xxix. 29, xlv.
9–20 with vi. 8; lviii. 17 with vi. 10.
One of the most prominent characteristics of style, binding together the various portions of the book, is the frequent occurrence of the expression,
The Holy One of Israel. This designation of Jehovah is found out of Isaias but six times: 2 K. xiv.
22: Ps. xlvii. 12, xlviiii. 41, lxxvi. 18; Jer. i. 29,
l. 5. In the first of these passages it is put into the mouth of the Servant himself. In the passages of Jeremiah, the whole intermediate context exhibits an expansion of the thoughts of Isaiah, sometimes presented even in his own language, yet in such a manner as to suggest that Jeremiah was not (as Hengstenberg affirms) imitating, but only writing with the impression full upon his mind of the utterances of his great predecessor. It deserves to be noticed that by such critics as Ewald, J. Ob-hansen, and Hitzig, the Isaias where the expression occurs are all assigned to a period later than the time of Isaiah. According to this view the expression must in all probability have originated with Isaias.
Another remarkable peculiarity observable in the different portions of Isaiah is the frequent use of the formula to be named in the sense of to be.
Such coincidences as these cannot have arisen in accident, which Dr. De Wette substantially agrees, attempting to account for them, con-jectures that there may have been an imitation of the earlier writer by the later, or, as he supposes with more probability, an attempt by a later hand to bring the various portions of the book into mutual conformity. But the former supposition, if consistently carried out and applied to all cases of marked resemblance occurring in these writings, must lead to results which no one capable of recognizing the impress of independent thought can possibly admit. The latter supposition is simply absurd. No proper parallel to such a procedure can be found in the history of ancient literature. Geseenius refers indeed to the traces of a conforming and xxxii. 18–22. That there is a connection between these passages can hardly be denied. Nor is there any room to question that the great conception embodied in Isaias xiv is an original conception. We need not affirm that in the later prophet there is any conscious imitation. But in the many and varied repetitions of Ezekiel we hear beyond all reasonable doubt the reverberations of that majestic strain in which Isaias has described the descent of the king of Babylon to the region of the dead.

vand in the punctuation of 81717 and 772 in the Pentateuch. But it is not necessary to point out how wide is the difference between the correction of what was supposed to be an error in a single letter, and the radical changes which upon the supposition in question must have been made by the "conforming hand" in such passages as lix. 5, lixi. 2, 4.

To say nothing of the difficulty there is in imagining an adequate motive for such a proceeding, the procedure itself implies a habit of critical observation which was wholly foreign to the spirit of the times. And those who can suppose a Jewish reader living two or three centuries before Christ, to have thus placed himself by anticipation at the stand-point of modern criticism, ought to find no difficulty in conceiving that a prophet writing in the time of Hezekiah should take his position amidst the scenes of the Captivity, and should announce the name of the deliverer. 9

While there are confessionally marked peculiarities, both of thought and diction, exhibited in the later portions of the prophetic writings attributed to Isaiah, and to some extent in the other portions also of which the genuineness has been called in question, the uncertain nature of the argument they furnish is sufficiently shown by a comparison of the widely different conclusions which different critics of the same school have formed in view of them. A very striking comparison of this kind is presented by Alexander in his Commentary, vol. i. pp. xxvii., xxviii.

The array of linguistic evidence in proof of a diversity of authorship, which has gradually grown within the last century into the formidable proportions in which it meets us in the pages of Knobel and others, rests very largely upon an assumption which none of these critics have the hardihood distinctly to vindicate, namely, that within the narrow compass of the Hebrew literature that has come down to us from any given period, we have the means for arriving at an accurate estimate of all the resources which the language at that time possessed. When we have eliminated from the list of words and phrases relied upon to prove a later date than the time of Isaiah, everything the value of which to the argument must stand or fall with this assumption, there remains absolutely nothing which may not be reasonably referred to the reign of Hezekiah. Indeed, considering all the circumstances of the times, it might justly have been expected that the traces of foreign influence upon the language would be far more conspicuous in a writing of this date than they actually are in the controverted portions.

It is to be remembered that the ministry of the prophet must have extended through a period, of the latest calculation, of nearly fifty years; 10 a period signalized, especially during the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah, by constant and growing intercourse with foreign nations, thus involving continually new influences for the corruption of public morals and new dangers to the state, and making it incumbent upon him who had been divinely constituted at once the political adviser of the nation and its religious guide, to be habitually and intimately conversant among the people, so as to desery upon the instant every additional step taken in their downward course and the first approach of each new peril from abroad, and to be able to meet each successive phase of their necessities with forms of instruction, admonition, and warning, not only in their general purport, but in their very style and diction, accommodated to conditions hitherto unknown, and that were still perpetually changing. Now when we take all this into the account, and then imagine to ourselves the prophet, toward the close of this long period, entering upon work which in some respects a novel kind of labor, and writing out, with a special view to the benefit of a remote posterity, the suggestions of that mysterious Theopneustia to which his lips had been for so many years the channel of communication with his contemporaries, far from finding any difficulty in the diversities of style perceptible in the different portions of his prophecy, we shall only see fresh occasion to admire that native strength and grandeur of intellect, which have still left upon productions so widely remote from each other in the time and circumstances of their composition, so plain an impress of one and the same overmastering individuality.

Probably there is not one of all the languages of the globe, whether living or dead, possessing any considerable literature, which does not exhibit instances of greater change in the style of an author, writing at different periods of his life, than appears upon a comparison of the later prophecies of Isaiah with the earlier.

(see Bertholdt, Ens. pp. 189, 185) that Isaiah and other prophets often transfer themselves in spirit into future times, lay great stress upon the alleged fact that the writer here deals exclusively with a period which in the age of Isaiah was yet future. But in addition to the considerations in relation to this point presented in the preceding article, see ib. pp. 1155, 1156, lxxiv. 11. May be added as plainly implying that at the time the prophet wrote, Jehovah had as yet for borne to punish his rebellious people, and that his for bearing had only been abused. The last clause of the first verse is also most naturally explained as containing an intimation of coming judgment. Still further, the only explanation of ver. 9 which satisfies all the demands of the passage makes it refer to the attempts of the people, in the age preceding the Captivity, to strengthen themselves by foreign alliances and these attempts are spoken of as being made by the contemporaries of the prophet. It is also strongly implied in lxi. 5, 7, and still more strongly in lxxvi. 3, 6, 20 (last clause), that the Temple was yet standing.

ISAIAH

Stanley's description of Isaiah (Jewish Church, ii. 494-504) presents him as one of the greatest figures on the page of history. A few sentences may be quoted, showing the universality of Isaiah's ideas and sympathies and the reach of his prophetic vision. "First of the prophets, he and those who followed him seized with unreserved confidence the mighty thought, that not in the chosen people, so much as in the nations outside of it, was to be found the ultimate well-being of man, the surest favor of God. Truly might the Apostle say that Isaiah was 'very bold' — 'bolder beyond' (Acts xx. 29) all that had gone before him — in enlargeing the boundaries of the church; bold with that boldness, and large with that largeness of view which, so far from weakening the hold on things divine, strengthens it to a degree unknown in less comprehensive minds. For to him also, with a distinctiveness which makes all other anticipations look pale in comparison, a distinction which grew with his advancing years, was revealed the coming of a Son of David, who should restore the royal house of Judah and gather the nations under its sceptre. . . . Lineament after lineament of that Divine Rider was gradually drawn by Isaiah or his scholars, until at last a Figure stands forth, so marvelously combined of power and gentleness and suffering as to present in the unifying idea of his Prophecy the moral features of an historical Person, such as has been, by universal confession, known once, and once only, in the subsequent annals of the world."—H. and A.

ISCAR'IOI'T. [see who looks about, or peers]: Ἰςκαρ'ίότ (Isch. Ἰςκαρ'ίότ), daughter of Hanan the brother of Abram, and sister of Milcah and of Lot (Gen. xi. 21). In the Jewish traditions as preserved by Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 5), Jerome (Quast. in genesh., and the Targum Pseudo-jonathan — not to mention later writers — she is identified with SARAH.

ISCAR'IOI'T. [Judah Iscariot].
ISDAEL

ISDAEL (Israel; Gaddathel), 1 Esdr. v. 33, [Giddel, 2].

ISH'BAH (ישב) [praising]: a 'Ishbâ: [Vat. Masreth; Alex. Iesbâ: leshbî], a man in the line of Judah, commemorated as the "father of Eshtemoa" (1 Chr. iv. 17); but from whom he was immediately descended is, in the very confused state of this part of the genealogy, not to be ascertained. The most feasible conjecture is that he was one of the sons of Mered by his Egyptian wife Bethulah. (See Bertheau, Chronik, ad loc.)

ISH'BAK (ישבך) [leaving behind]. Ishbâk: [Alex. in Chr., Israel: Jeoboc], a son of Abraham and Ketarah (Gen. xxv. 2: 1 Chr. i. 32), and the progenitor of a tribe of northern Arabia. The settlements of this people are very obscure, and we can only suggest as possible that they may have been recovered in the name of the valley called Sabak, or, it is said, Silah (סΪלא) in the Dahmah (אֶדמְחָה) and (Murskâh, s. v.). The Heb. root יִשְׁבַּךְ corresponds to the Arabic يِسْبَك سِبَق signifies: therefore identifications with names derived from the root ֶשְׁבַּך are improbable. There are many places of the latter derivation, as Shebek (שֵַּבָך), Shibik (שֵַּבָך), and Eshek (אֶשֶּבָך).

Shebak (אֶשֶּבָך): the last having been supposed (as by Rumsen, Biblebeek, i. pt. ii. 53) to preserve a trace of Ishbak. It is a fortress in Arabia Petraea; and is near the well-known fortress of the Crusader's times called El-Karak.

The Dahmah, in which is situate Sabak, is a fertile and extensive tract, belonging to the Benceneem, in Nejd, or the highland, of Arabia, on the northeast of it, and the borders of the great desert, reaching from the rugged tract (= "hazm") of Yensoo'ah to the sands of Yebreen. It contains much pasturage, with comparatively few wells, and is greatly frequented by the Arabs when the vegetation is plentiful (Meshkarâk and Murskâh, s. v.). There is, however, another Dahnah, nearer to the Ephraths (ib.), and some confusion may exist regarding the true position of Sabak; but either Dahnah is suitable for the settlements of Ishbak.

The first-mentioned Dahmah lies in a favorable portion of the widely-stretching country known to have been peopled by the Ketaranites. They extended from the borders of Palestine even to the Persian Gulf, and traces of their settlements must be looked for all along the edge of the Arabian peninsula, where the desert merges into the cultivable land, or (itself a rocky undulating plateau) rises to the wild, mountainous country of Nejd. Ishbak seems from his name to have preceded or gone before his brethren: the place suggested for his dwelling is far away towards the Persian Gulf, and penetrates also into the peninsula. On these, as well as mere etymological grounds, the identification is sufficiently probable, and every way better than that which connects the patriarch with Esh-bhâk, etc.

ISH-BI-BENOB (ишь-беноб, Keri, ישיבנווב) [dwelling in rest]: Iesbi: [Alex. Iesi'eb or Nosbi: Jesb-benob], son of Kaplah, one of the race of Philistine giants, who attacked David in battle, but was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. xxii. 16, 17).

ISH-BOSETH (ישבשׁ) [see infra]: Ishbô: [in 2 Sam. ii. Alex. Ishbôth or Esib, Comp. 'Iserbôth of Gihon in 2 Sam. vii. iv., Vat. Meuph-bôthi: Alex. Mephibôthi: Jebueth], the youngest of Saul's four sons, and his legitimate successor. His name appears (1 Chr. viii. 33, ix. 39) to have been originally Ish-ba'al, הַשָּׁבָאֵל, the son of Ral, whether this indicates that Ral was used as equivalent to Jehovah, or that the reverence for Ral still lingered in Israelish families, is uncertain; but it can hardly be doubted that the name (Ish-boseth, "the man of shame") by which he is commonly known, must have been substituted for the original word, with a view of removing the scandalous sound of Ral from the name of an Israelite king, and superseding it by the contemptuous word "shame" (Boseth). This latter was sometimes used as its equivalent in later times (Jer. iii. 24, 15; Hos. ix. 10). A similar process appears in the alteration of Jerubbaal (Judg. viii. 35) into Jerubbâhešt, (2 Sam. xi. 21); Meribâl (2 Sam. iv. 4) into Mephiboseth (1 Chr. viii. 34, ix. 40). The last three cases all occur in Saul's family. He was 35 years of age at the time of the battle of Gihon (in which his father and three eldest brothers perished); and therefore, according to the law of Oriental, though not of European succession, ascended the throne, as the oldest of the royal family, rather than Mephiboseth, son of his elder brother Jonathan, who was a child of five years old. He was immediately taken under the care of Abner, his powerful kinsman, who brought him to the ancient sanctuary of Mahanaim on the east of the Jordan, beyond the reaches of the victorious Philistines (2 Sam. ii. 8). There was a momentary doubt even in those remote tribes whether they should not close with the offer of David to be their king (2 Sam. ii. 7, iii. 17). But this was overruled in favor of Ish-boseth by Abner (2 Sam. iii. 17), who then for five years slowly but effectually restored the dominion of the house of Saul over the Transjordanite territory, the plain of Esdraelon, the central mountains of Ephraim, the frontier tribe of Benjamin, and eventually "over all Israel" (except the tribes of Judah, 2 Sam. ii. 9). Ish-boseth was then "40 years old when he began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years" (2 Sam. ii. 10). This form of expression is used only for the accession of a fully recognized sovereign (comp. in the case of David, 2 Sam. ii. 4, and v. 4).

During these two years he reigned at Mahanaim, though only in name. The wars and negotiations with David were entirely carried on by Abner (2 Sam. ii. 12, iii. 6, 12). At length Ish-boseth accused Abner (whether rightly or wrongly does not appear) of an attempt on his father's conscience, Rizpâh; which, according to oriental usage, amounted to treason (2 Sam. iii. 7; comp. 1 K. ii. 13; 2 Sam. xvi. 21, xx. 9). Abner resented this suspicion as a hint of treason, which, venturing itself in a solemn vow to transfer the kingdom from the house of Saul to the house of David.
ISHI

Ishbosheth was too much cowed to answer; and when, shortly afterwards, through Abner’s negotiation, David demanded the restoration of his former wife, Michal, he at once tore his sister from her reluctant husband, and committed her to Abner’s charge (2 Sam. iii. 14, 15).

The death of Abner deprived the house of Saul of their last remaining support. When Ish-bosheth heard of it, “his hands were feeble and all the Ishmaelites were troubled” (2 Sam. iv. 1).

In this extremity of weakness he fell a victim, probably, to a revenge for a crime of his father. The guard of Ish-bosheth, as of Saul, was taken from their own royal tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. xii. 21). But amongst the sons of Benjamin were reckoned the descendants of the old Canaanish inhabitants of Beeoth, one of the cities in league with Gibea (2 Sam. iv. 2, 3). Two of those Beeothites, Kama and Rediah, in remembrance, it has been conjectured, of Saul’s slaughter of their kinsmen the Gibeonites, determined to take advantage of the helplessness of the royal house to destroy the only representative that was left, excepting the child Mephibosheth (2 Sam. iv. 4). They were “chiefs of the marauding troops” which used from time to time to attack the territory of Judah (comp. 2 Sam. iv. 2, iii. 22, where the same word is used; Vulg. principes i. e. omm.) [Benjamin, vol. i. p. 278 a; Gittaiim, vol. ii. p. 930]. They knew the habits of the king and court, and acted accordingly. In the stillness of an eastern noon they entered the palace, as if to carry off the wheat which was piled up near the entrance. The female slave, who, as usual in eastern houses, kept the wheat, heard the noise herself, ran out at first, hid in the heat of the day, fallen asleep at her task (2 Sam. iv. 5, 6, in LXX. and Vulg.). They stole in, and passed into the royal bedchamber, where Ish-bosheth was asleep on his couch. They stabbed him in the stomach, cut off his head, made their escape, all that afternoon, all that night, down the valley of the Jordan (Arab. A. V. “plain”); (2 Sam. iv. 7), and presented the head to David as a welcome present. They met with a stern reception. David rebuked them for the cold-blooded murder of an innocent man, and ordered them to be executed; their hands and feet were cut off, and their bodies suspended over [prob. by or near] the tank at Hebron. The head of Ish-bosheth was carefully buried in the sepulchre of his great kinsman Abner, at the same place (2 Sam. iv. 9–12). A. P. S.

ISHI (יִשִּׁי, [saving, subduing]; Jesi). 1. (Ishuajah; Alex. Iesuaj). A man of the descendants of Judah, son of Appaim (1 Chr. iii. 31); one of the great house of Hezon, and therefore a near connection of the family of Jesse (comp. 9–13). The only son here attributed to Ishi is Sheshan.

2. (Zeri; [Vat. Zeri]; Alex. Ezr; [Comp. leresi]). In a subsequent genealogy of Judah we find another Ishi, with a son Zophah (1 Chr. iv. 20). There does not appear to be any connection between the two.

3. (Ieri; [Vat. Iereth]; Alex. Ieret). Four sons of the Bena-Ishi [sons of 1.], of the tribe of Simeon, are named in 1 Chr. iv. 42 as having headed an expedition of 500 of their brethren who took Mount Seir from the Amalekites, and made it their own abode.

ISHMAEL

ISHI’AH (יִשְׁיָעַה, [restoration, return] (Vat. Jesia), i.e. Ishiyah [whom Jehovah beings, perh. with the idea of children as a trust]; Jesia; [Vat. corrupt: Jesit]); the fifth of the five sons of Ishiah; one of the heads of the tribe of Issachar in the time of David (1 Chr. viii. 4). The name is identical with that elsewhere given as Ishiyah, Ishshiah, Issiah.

ISHIJAH (יִשְׁיָה, [as above] ;[Vat. Fa. Iesuah]; Alex. Iesuah; Josse), a lay Israite of the Bene-Harim [sons of II.], who had married a foreign wife, and was compelled to relinquish her (Ezr. x. 31). In Ebrus the name is IsaAS.

This name appears in the A. V. under the various forms of Ishiah, Ishshiah, Jesiah.

ISHMA (יִשְׁמָא, [castle, desert, Ges.]; Jesu); Iesuaj (Vat. Parea); Alex. Ieroused; Jesem), a name in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). The passage is very obscure, and in the case of many of the names it is difficult to know whether they are of persons or places. Ishma and his companion appear to be closely connected with Bethlehem (see ver. 4).

ISHMAEL (יִשְׁמָעֵל, whom God hears; Iesuajah; Ismael), the son of Abraham by Hagar, his concubine, the Egyptian; born when Abraham was fourscore and six years old (Gen. xvi. 10, 16). Ishmael was the first-born of his father; in ch. xv. we read that he was then childless, and there is no apparent interval for the birth of any other child; nor does the teaching of the narrative, besides the precise enumeration of the sons of Abraham as the father of the faithful, admit of the supposition. The saying of Sarah, also, when she gave him Hagar, supports the inference that until then he was without children. When he added and took a wife (A. V. “Then again Abraham took a wife,” xvii. 1, Kebran, is uncertain, but it is not likely to have been until after the birth of Isaac, and perhaps the death of Sarah. The conception of Ishmael occasioned the flight of Hagar [Hagar], and it was during her wandering in the wilderness that the angel of the Lord appeared to her, commanding her to return to her mistress, and giving her the promise, “I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that shall not be numbered for multitude.” and, “Ishmael shall be a wild ass of a desert, he and she shall bear a son, and shall call his name Ishmael, because the Lord hath heard thy affliction. And he will be a wild man; his hand [will be] against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren" (xvi. 10-12).

Ishmael was born in Abraham's house, when he dwelt in the plain of Mamre; and on the institution of the covenant of circumcision, was circumcised, he being then thirteen years old (xvii. 25). With the institution of the covenant, God renewed his promise respecting Ishmael. In answer to Abraham's entreaty, when he cried, "O that Ishmael might live before thee!" God assured him of the birth of Isaac, and said, "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee: behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall be heget, and I will make him a great nation" (xvii. 18, 20). Before this time, Abraham seems to have regarded his first-born child as the heir of the promise, his belief in which was counted unto him for righteousness (xv. 6); and although that faith shone yet more brightly after his passing weakness when Isaac was first promised, his love for Ishmael is recorded in the narrative of Sarah's expulsion of the latter: "And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son" (xxi. 11).

Ishmael does not again appear in the narrative until the weaning of Isaac. The latter was born when Abraham was a hundred years old (xii. 5), and as the weaning, according to eastern usage, probably took place when the child was between two and three years old, Ishmael himself must have been then between fifteen and sixteen years old. The age of the latter at the period of his circumcision, and at that of his expulsion (which we have now reached), has given occasion for some literary speculation. A careful consideration of the passages referring to it fails, however, to show any discrepancy between them. In Gen. xxvi. 25, it is stated that he was thirteen years old when he was circumcised; and in xxi. 14 (probably two or three years later), "Abraham . . . took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave [it] unto Hagar, putting [it] on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away." Here it is at least unnecessary to assume that the child was put on her shoulder, the construction of the Hebrew (mistranslated by the LXX., with whom seems to rest the origin of the question) not requiring it; and the sense of the passage renders it highly improbable: Hagar certainly carried the bottle on her shoulder, and perhaps the bread; she could hardly have also thus carried a child. Again, these passages are quite reconcilable with ver. 20 of the last quoted chapter, where Ishmael is termed "naath." A. V. "lad" (comp., for use of this word, Gen. xxxiv. 19 xxxvii. 2, xii. 12).

At the "time of the feast" made in celebration of the weaning, "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking," and urged Abraham to cast out him and his mother. The patriach, comforted by God's renewed promise that of Ishmael he would make a nation, sent them both away, and they departed and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. Here the water being spent in the bottle, Hagar cast her son under one of the desert shrubs, and went away a little distance, "for she said, Let me not see the death of the child," and wept. "And God heard the voice of the lad, and the angel of the Lord called to Hagar out of heaven," renewed the promise already thrice given, "I will make him a great nation," and "opened her eyes and she saw a well of water." This is miraculously saved from perishing by thirst, "God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness; and became an archer." It is doubtful whether the wanderers halted by the well, or at once continued their way to the "wilderness of Paran," where, we are told in the next verse to that just quoted, he dwelt, and where "his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt" (Gen. xxii. 9-21). This wife of Ishmael is not elsewhere mentioned; she was, we must infer, an Egyptian; and this second infusion of Hamitic blood into the progenitors of the Arab nation, Ishmael's sons, is a fact that has been generally overlooked. No record is made of any other wife of Ishmael, and failing such record, the Egyptian was the mother of his twelve sons, and daughter. This daughter, however, is called the "sister of Nebajoth" (Gen. xxviii. 9), and this limitation of the parentage of the brother and sister certainly seems to point to a different mother for Ishmael's other sons.4

1 The Heb. rendered "prince" in this case, is נֵֽעֶשׁ which signifies both a "prince" and the "leader," or "exemplify" of a tribe, or even of a family (Gen. xiv.); hence, it seems to mean the leader of a tribe, and Ishmael's twelve sons are enumerated in Gen. xxv. 15 "according to their nations," more correctly "peoples." מִֽעַן.

2 * The ambiguity lies in the A. V., rather than the original. According to the Hebrew construction (though a little peculiar), the expression "putting on her shoulder" should be taken as parenthesis, and that of "the child" be made the object of the first of the verbs which follow. Hence, this allusion to "the shrubs" of the desert brings out a picturesque trait of the narrative. The word so rendered (כַּדָּרָה) is still used in Arabic, unchanged. It is used, however, with some latitude, being a general designation for the shrub or bushy plants. These shrubby plants, which are of various kinds, are called generally כַּדָּרָה, as we speak of "bushes" the kind, however, most in use, and more than any other specifically designated, is the Sportium junceum. This is a tall shrub, growing to the height of eight or ten feet, of a close ramifications, but making a light shade, owing to the small size and lanceolate shape of its leaves. Its flowers are yellow, and its seeds edible. It grows in rocky places, usually where there is little moisture, and is widely diffused. We should expect to find it, of course, in a "wilderness" like that of Beer-sheba. But whether we understand by כַּדָּרָה this particular plant, whose light and insufficient shade would prove the only mitigation of the heat of the sun, or, in general, a bush or shrub, the allusion to it in Gen. xxv. 15 is locally exact, and explains why the mother sought such a shelter for the child. It might also be understood of Genista monosperma, the Retam of the Arabs, which furnished a shade to the prophet Elijah (1 K. xix. 4, 5), and is spoken of in Ps. xxx. 4, and Job xxx. 4. This species is said to abound in the desert of Sinai, and is called in the Copt. being, in fact, mentioned with it in Job xxx. 4.

3 According to Rabbinical tradition, Ishmael put away his wife and took a second; and the Arabs.
ISHMAEL

1 Of the later life of Ishmael we know little. He was present with Isaac at the burial of Abraham; and Esau contrived an alliance with him when he was yet but a child, and he had Malakh (or Basmath or Basmath, Gen. xxxvi. 3) the daughter of Ishmael Abraham's son, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife; and this did Esau because the daughters of Canaan pleased not Isaac and Rebeckah, and Jacob in obedience to their wishes had gone to Laban to obtain his daughters a wife (Gen. xxxii. 6-9). The death of Ishmael is recorded in a previous chapter, after the enumeration of his sons, as having taken place at the age of one hundred and thirty-seven years; and, it is added, "he died in the presence of all his brethren" (Gen. xxxv. 17, 18). The alliance with Esau occurred before this event (although it is mentioned in a previous passage), for he "went unto Ishmael;" but it cannot have been long before, if the chronological data be correctly preserved.

The name of Ishmael occurs in the biblical tradition in the following contexts:

1. Ishmael is the son of Abraham and Hagar, born through the promise of God.
2. Ishmael is the father of many nations, of which the Arabian nation is the most prominent.
3. Ishmael is associated with the desert and the Arabian desert specifically.
4. Ishmael is mentioned in connection with the genealogy of Jesus Christ.

The story of Ishmael's life and his descendants is intertwined with the broader narrative of the Bible, particularly with the stories of his brother Isaac and his nephew Jacob. Ishmael's lineage is significant in the context of the covenant and the promises made to Abraham by God.

5. Abraham, the father of Ishmael, lived to be 175 years old (Gen. xxvii. 26).
6. Ishmael is not mentioned in the New Testament, but his descendants, the Arabian nation, are associated with the lineage of Jesus Christ through the genealogy given in Luke 3:38.

Tending from the frontier of Palestine east to the Euphrates, and south probably to the borders of Egypt and the Arabian peninsula. This question is discussed in art. RECHERCHES; and it is inter-woven, though obscurely, with the next subject, that of the names and settlements of the sons of Ishmael. See also KETURAH, etc.; for the "brethren" of Ishmael, in whose presence he dwelt and died, included the sons of Keturah.

2. The sons of Ishmael were, Nebajoth (expressly stated to be his first-born), Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Mizzah, Hidabor, Tema, Jetur, Nebaioth, Kedemoth, and Jerahmeel. Ishmael gave his first-born daughter named Malakh (xxxvi. 9), elsewhere written Bashmath (or Basmath, Gen. xxxvi. 3), the sister of Nebajoth, before mentioned. The sons are enumerated with the particular statement that these are their names, by their towns, and by their castles; twelve princes according to their nations or peoples (xxxvi. 16). In seeking to identify Ishmael's sons, this passage requires close attention: it bears the interpretation of their being the tranches of tribes, having towns and castles called after them; and identifications of the latter become therefore more than usually satisfactory. They dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as though going unto Assyria (xxxvii. 18), and it is certain, in accordance with this statement of their limits (see HAVILAH, ISIS), that they stretched in very early times across the desert to the Persian Gulf, peoples the north and west of the Arabian peninsula, and eventually formed the chief element of the Arab nation. Their language, which is generally acknowledged to have been the Arabic commonly so called, has been adopted with insignificant exceptions throughout Arabia. It has been said that the Bible requires the whole of that nation to be sprung from Ishmael, and the fact of a large admixture of Joktanite and even Cushite peoples in the south and southeast has been regarded as a suggestion of skepticism. Yet not only does the Bible contain no warrant for the assumption that all Arabs are Ishmaelites; but the characteristics of the Ishmaelites, strongly marked in all the more northern tribes of Arabia, and exactly fulfilling the prophecy "he will be a wild man; his hand [will] be against every man, and every man's hand against him," and which are predicated of all the peoples of Joktan and other descent. The true Ishmaelites, however, and even tribes of very mixed race, are thoroughly 'wild men,' living by warlike forays and plunder; dreaded by their neighbors; dwelling in tents, with hardly any household chattels, but rich in flocks and herds, migratory, and recognizing no law but the authority of the chief of their tribes. Even the religion of Mohammad is held in light esteem by many of the more remote tribes, among whom the ancient usages of their people obtain in almost

The old simplicity, besides idolatrous practices altogether repugnant to Mohammadanism as they are to the fate of the patriarchs; practices which may be ascribed to the influence of the Canaanites, of Moab, Ammon, and Edom, with whom, by inter-marriages, commerce, and war, the tribes of Ishmael must have had long and intimate relations.

The term Ishmaelite (イスマイリテ) occurs on three occasions, Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxviii. 1; Judg. viii. 24; Ps. lxxxiii. 6. From the context of the first two instances, it seems to have been a general name for the Abrahamic peoples of the east country, the Bene-Kedem; but the second admits also of a closer meaning. In the third instance the name is applied in its strict sense to the Ishmaelites. It is also applied to Jether, the father of Amasa, by David's sister Abigail (1 Chr. ii. 17). [ISHER]

The notions of the Arabs respecting Ishmael (イスマイル) are partly derived from the Bible, partly from the Jewish Rabbins, and partly from native traditions. The origin of many of these traditions is obscure, but a great number may be ascribed to the fact of Mohammad's having for political reasons claimed Ishmael for his ancestor, and striven to make out an impossible pedigree; while both he and his followers have, as a consequence of accepting this assumed descent, sought to exalt that ancestor. Another reason may be safely found in Ishmael's acknowledged headship of the naturalized Arabs, and this cause existed from the very period of his settlement. [ARABIA].

Yet the rivalry of the Joktanite kingdom of southern Arabia, and its intercourse with classical and mediæval Europe, the wandering and unsettled habits of the Ishmaelites, their having no literature, and, as far as we know, only a meagre oral tradition, all contributed, till the importance it acquired with the propagation of El-Islam, to render our knowledge of the Ishmaelite portion of the people of Arabia, before Mohammad, lamentably defective. That they maintained, and still maintain, a patriarchal and primitive form of life is known to us. Their religion, at least in the period immediately preceding Mohammad, was in central Arabia chiefly the grossest fetishism, probably learnt from aboriginal inhabitants of the land; southwards it diverged to the cosmic worship of the Joktanite Hynryettes (though these were far from being exempt from fetishism), and northwards (so at least in ancient times) to an approach to that true faith which Ishmael carried with him, and his descendants thus gradually lost. This last point is curiously illustrated by the numbers who, in Arabia, became either Jews (Carnites) or Christians (though of a very corrupt form of Christianity); and by the movement in search of the faith of the patriarchs which had been put forward, not long before the birth of Mohammad, by men not satisfied with Judaism or the corrupt form of Christianity, with which alone they were acquainted. This movement first arose in Mohammad, and was afterwards the main cause of his success.

The Arabs believe that Ishmael was the first born of Abraham, and the majority of their doctors (but the point is in dispute) assert that this son, and not Isaac, was offered by Abraham in sacrifice. The scene of this sacrifice is Mount 'Arafat, near Mekkeh, the last holy place visited by pilgrims, it being necessary to the completion of pilgrimage to be present at a sermon delivered there on the 9th of the Mohammedan month Zu-l-Hijeh, in common memorial of the offering, and to sacrifice a victim on the following evening after sunset, in the valley of Mina. The sacrifice last mentioned is observed throughout the Muslim world, and the day on which it is made is called "The Great Festival." (Mr. Lane's Mod. Egypt. ch. iii.) Ishmael, say the Arabs, dwelt with his mother at Mekkeh, and both are buried in the place called the "Hejr," on the northwest (termed by the Arabs the north) side of the Ka'bah, and inclosed by a curved wall called the "Hateem." Ishmael was visited at Mekkeh by Abraham, and there, together, they together rebuilt the temple, which had been destroyed by a flood. At Mekkeh, Ishmael married a daughter of Mudial or El-Mudial, chief of the Joktanite tribe Jurham [AL-MODAID; ARABIA], and had thirteen children [MIRIAEL-ZEBAIM, MS.], thus agreeing with the Biblical number, including the daughter.

Mohammad's descent from Ishmael is totally lost, for an unknown number of generations to Adam, of the twenty-first generation before the prophet: from him downwards the latter's descent is, if we may believe the genealogists, fairly proved. But we have evidence far more trustworthy than that of the genealogists; for while most of the natives of Arabia are unable to trace up their pedigrees, it is scarcely possible to find one who is ignorant of his race, seeing that his very life often depends upon it. The law of blood-revenge necessitates his knowing the names of his ancestors for four generations, but no more; and this law extending from time immemorial has made any confusion of race almost impossible. This law, it should be remembered, is not a law of Mohammad, but an old pagan law that he endeavored to suppress, but could not. In casting doubt on the prophet's pedigree, we must add that this cannot affect the proofs of the chief element of the Arab nation being Ishmaelite (and so too the tribe of Kureish of whom was Mohammad). Although partly mixed with Joktanites, they are more mixed with Keturahites, etc.; the characteristics of the Joktanites, as before remarked, are widely different from those of the Ishmaelites; and whatever theories may be induced to the contrary, we believe that the Arabs, from physical characteristics, language, the concurrence of native traditions (before Mohammadism made them untrustworthy), and the testimony of the Bible, are mainly and essentially Ishmaelite. [ISHMAEL.]

1. One of the sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Merib-baal, or Mephibosheth (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44). See the genealogy, under SAUL.

2. [Vat. omits: ISMAEL.] A man of Judah, whose son or descendant ZEMADAI was ruler of the house of Judah in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xix. 11).

3. [Vat. Ισμαήλ: ISAMÔ.] Another man of Judah, son of Jehohanan; one of the "captains (イスマイラ) of hundreds" who assisted Jehoiada in restoring Josiah to the throne (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).

4. [Vat. Σαμαχ: SAAMÔ.] A priest, of the Bnei-Pashur [sons of P''], who was forced... by Ezra to relinquish his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 22).

6. [Lit. in 2 K. xxv. 25, Mezaph: Immoph.] The son of Nethaniah; a perfect marvel of craft and villanous, whose treachery forms one of the chief episodes of the history of the period immediately succeeding the first fall of Jerusalem. His exploits are related in Jer. xil. 7-xii. 15, with a short summary in 2 K. xxv. 23-25, and they read almost like a page from the annals of the late Indian mutiny.

His full description is a-Ismael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elissanna, of the seed royal of Judah (Jer. xil. 1; 2 K. xxv. 25). Whether by this is intended that he was actually a son of Zedekiah, or one of the later kings, or, more generally, that he had royal blood in his veins — perhaps a descendant of Elissanna, the son of David (2 Sam. v. 16) — we cannot tell. During the siege of the city he had, like many others of his countrymen (Jer. xi. 11), fled across the Jordan, where he found a refuge at Balaam, the then king of the Bene-Ammun (Jos. Antiq. x. § 2). Amnonite warriors were always found in the harem of the kings of Jerusalem (1 K. xi. 1), and Ishmael may have been thus related to the Amnonite court on his mother’s side. At any rate he was instigated by Balaam to the designs which he accomplished but too successfully (Jer. xil. 14; Antiq. x. § 3). Several bodies of Jews appear to have been lying under arms in the plains on the S. E. of the Jordan, during the last days of Jerusalem, watching the progress of affairs in Western Palestine, commanded by princes (of Judah), the chief of whom were Ishmael, and two brothers, Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Kareah. Immediately after the departure of the Chaldean army these men moved across the Jordan to pay their respects to Gedaliah, whom the king of Babylon had left as superintendent (Jer. xlix. 2) of the province. Gedaliah had taken up his residence at Mizpah, a few miles north of Jerusalem, on the main road, where Jeremiah the prophet resided with him (xii. 6). The house would appear to have been isolated from the rest of the town. We can discern a high inclosed court-yard and a deep well within its precincts. The well was probably (Jer. xil. 9; comp 1 K. xxv. 22), and the Jerome (Qu. Hebr. on 2 Chron. xxviii. 7) interprets this expression as meaning "of the seed of Moab." He gives the same meaning to the words "the King’s son" applied to Manasseh in the above passage. The question is an interesting one, and has been recently revived by Geiger (Uscherht, etc. p. 357), who extends it to other passages and persons. (Manasseh.) Jerome (as above) further says — perhaps on the strength of a tradition — that Ishmael was the son of an Egyptian slave, from a reason why the "seed royal" should hurl the meaning he gives it. This the writer has not hitherto succeeded in elucidating.

b So perhaps, taking it with the express statement of xil. 11, we may interpret the words "the forces which were in the field." (Jer. xil. 13), where the term rendered "the field" (יִּשְׁתַּקְנָה, yushkanah) is one used to denote the pasture grounds of Meab — the modern Beda — officer than any other district. See Gen. xxxvi. 35; Num. xxvi. 29; Ruth i. 1, and passim; 1 Chr. viii. 8; and Naeikey’s N. & S. F. Ap. § 15. The persistent use of the word in the semi-Moabite book of Ruth is alone enough to fix its meaning.

Ishmael made no secret of his intention to kill the superintendent, and usurp his position. Of this Gedaliah was warned in express terms by Josephus (Ant. x. 9, § 3). They all accordingly took Thirty days after (Ant. x. 9, § 4), in the seventh month (xil. 1), on the third day of the month — so says the tradition — Ishmael again appeared at Mizpah, this time accompanied by ten men, who were, according to the Hebrew text, "princes of the king" (תּוֹתֵעַ, tought), though this is omitted by the LXX. and by Josephus. Gedaliah entertained them at a feast (xil. 1). According to the statement of Josephus this was a very lavish entertainment, and Gedaliah became much intoxicated. It must have been a private one, for before its close Ishmael and his followers had murdered Gedaliah and all his attendants with such secrecy that no alarm was given outside the room. The same night he killed all Gedaliah’s establishment, including some Chaldean soldiers who were there. Jeremiah appears fortunately to have been absent, and, incredible as it seems, so well had Ishmael taken his precautions that for two days the massacre remained perfectly unknown to the people of the town. On the second day Ishmael perceived from his elevated position a large party coming southward along the main road from Shechem and Samaria. He went out to meet them. They proved to be eighty devotees, who with rent clothes, and with shaven beards, mutilated bodies, and other marks of heathen devotion, and weeping they went, were bringing incense and offerings to the ruins of the Temple. At his invitation they turned aside to the residence of the superintendent. And here Ishmael put into practice the same stratagem, which on a larger scale was employed by Mehemet Ali in the massacre of the Mamelukes at Cairo in 1806. As the unsuspecting pilgrims passed into the court-yard he closed the entrances

d This is the LXX. version of the matter — οἱ αὐτοὶ ἱερέμων καὶ ἱερεῖς. The statement of the Hebrew Text and A. V. that Ishmael went is unintelligible.

e The Hebrew has יִשְׁתַּקְנָה, yushkanah, the city" (A. V. ver. 7). This has been read by Josephus יִשְׁתַּקְנָה — "court-yard." The alteration carries its genuineness in its face. The same change has been made by the Masoretes and is read (בַּקְנָה). It is safer to follow the text, with Hitzig, Umbreit, De Wette, and others. It is to be noted that in the Hebrew יִשְׁתַּקְנָה precedes יִשְׁתַּקְנָה, i. e. they came "into the midst of the city," so that they were completely in Ishmael’s power before the massacre took place. It was natural to mention that circumstance, but there is no obvious reason for speaking thus precisely of "the midst of the court-yard." That specification also seems to require the article before the genitive. The πρὸν [or ৎנ], the word is יִשְׁתַּקְנָה.
of Elpaal, and named as a chief man in the tribe (1 Chr. vii. 18).

ISH'DOD (יִשְׁדָּד, i. e. Ish-hod [man of renown]: 3 1 Sam.: [Vat. Isaiah]: Alex. Zosip: ri-von decovum), one of the tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan, son of Hammoleketh, i. e. the Queen, and, from his near connection with Gilead, evidently an important person (1 Chr. vii. 18).

ISH'PAN (ישֵׁפָן [perh. bold, Ges.; one strong, Furst.]: [Vat. Isaiah]: Alex. Ezra: Jeshubam), a Benjamite, one of the family of Shashak; named as a chief man in his tribe (1 Chr. viii. 22).

ISH'TOB (ישֶׁתֹב [see intrv.]: 1 Sam.; [Vat. Isaiah]: Joseph. Ishrobi: Ishob), apparently one of the small kingdoms or states which formed part of the great country of Aram, named with Zobah, Rehob, and Maacah (2 Sam. x. 6, 8).

In the parallel account of 1 Chr. xix. Ishiob is omitted. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 6, § 1) the name is given as that of a king. But though in the ancient versions the name is given as one word, it is probable that the real signification is "the man of Toor," a district mentioned also in connection with Amanon in the records of Jubilæus, and again perhaps, under the shape of Toorie or Turiente, in the history of the Macedeas.

G.

ISH'UAH (ישוע, [even, level, Ges.; resting peaceful, Dietr.]: [Vat. Isaiah]: Alex. Issa: Jesso), the second son of Asher (Gen. xxvi. 17). In the genealogies of Asher in 1 Chr. vii. 30 the name, though identical in the original, is in the A. V. given as Issau. In the lists of Num. xxvi., however, Issuah is entirely omitted.

* The word is properly Ishvah, and was probably intended by the translators of the A. V. to be so read, u being used in the edition of 1611 for v.

ISH'UA'I [3 syl. (ישועי), i. e. Ishvi [see above]: 1 Sam.: [Vat. Isaiah]: Joseph. Issi: Jesse), the third son of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 30), founder of a family bearing his name (Num. xxvi. 44; A. V. "Jesse's".

His descendants, however, are not mentioned in the genealogy in Chronicles. His name is elsewhere given in the A. V. as Issi, Jesse, and (another person) Ishi.

G.

ISH'UI (ישועי, i. e. Ishvi [peaceful, quiet, Dietr.]: [Vat. Isaiah]: Joseph. Issi: Jesse), the second son of Saul by his wife Ahinoam (1 Sam. xxiv. 49, comp. 50): his place in the family was between Jonathan and MACHIHUAU. In the list of Saul's genealogy in 1 Chr. viii. and ix., however, the name of Ishui is entirely omitted; and in the sad narrative of the battle of Gilboa his place is occupied by Abinadab (1 Sam. xxxii. 2). We can only conclude that he died young.

The same name is elsewhere given in the A. V. as Issi, and Ishual. [In all these names u may have been intended by the translators of the A. V. to be read as v. See ISHUA'I. — A.]

ISLE (אֵיל, יֵיל). The radical sense of the Hebrew word seems to be "habitable places," as opposed to water, and in this sense it occurs in Is. xlii. 15. Hence it means secondarily any maritime district, whether belonging to a continent or to an island: thus it is used of the shore of the Mediterranean (Is. xx. 6, xxiii. 2, 6), and of the coasts of Elisah ( Ez. xxvii. 7), i.e. of Greece and Asia Minor. In this sense it is more particularly restricted to the shores of the Mediterranean, sometimes in the fuller expression “islands of the sea” (Is. xi. 11), or “isles of the Gentiles” (Gen. x. 5; comp. Zeph. ii. 11), and sometimes simply as “isles” (Ps. lxii. 10; Ez. xxi. 15, 18, xxviii. 3, 35, xxxix. 6; Dan. xi. 18): an exception to this, however, occurs in Ez. xxviii. 15, where the shores of the Persian gulf are intended. Occasionally the word is specifically used of an island, as of Caphtor or Tivete (Jer. xlvii. 4), and oferina or Cyprus (Ez. xxv. 16, xxvii. 14), or of Israel as opposed to the mainland (Ezah. x. 1). But more generally it is applied to any region separated from Palestine by water, as fully described in Jer. xxv. 22, “the isles which are beyond the sea,” which were hence regarded as the most remote regions of the earth (Is. xxiv. 13, xiii. 10, lix. 18; compare the expression in Is. lxiv. 19, “the isles afar off”), and also in a more abstract sense (Is. xlii. 15; Ps. xxxvii. 1): the word is more particularly used by the prophets. (See J. D. Michaelis, Spieletegium, ii. 131-142.)

ISMACIAH (יםיכאה), i.e. Isma-ya’im (from Jehovah supporteth) & ΣΜΑΧΙΑ (Vat. xer): Jeunachiah, a Levite who was one of the overseers of offerings, during the revival under king Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).

2. (ΣΩΜΑΙΟΣ: Ismaeas), 1 Esdr. ix. 22. (ISMAEL, 5.)

ISMAIAH (יהוסף), i.e. Ishaph (probably related to Issachar, a Levite, one of the chiefs of those warriors who relinquished the cause of Saul, the head of their tribe, and joined themselves to David, when he was at Z�hak (1 Chr. xii. 4). He is described as a hero (gibbor) among the thirty and over the thirty” — i.e. David’s body-guard: but his name does not appear in the lists of the guard in 2 Sam. xiii. and 1 Chr. xi. Possibly he was killed in some encounter before David reached the throne.

ISPAH (יהוסף), i.e. Ishb (perhaps related to Issachar, a Benjamite, of the family of Benjamin; one of the heads of his tribe (1 Chr. viii. 16).

ISRAEL (ישראל) [see Israel]: Israel.

1. The name given (Gen. xxxii. 28) to Jacob after his wrestling with the Angel ( Hos. xii. 4) at Peniel. In the time of Jerome (Quast. Hebr. in Gen. Opp. iii. 357) the signification of the name was commonly believed to be “the man (or the mind) seeing God.” But he prefers another interpretation, and paraphrases the verse after this manner: “Thy name shall not be called Jacob, Supplicator, but Israel, Prince with God.” For as I am a Prince, so thou that hast been able to wrestle with Me shall be called a Prince. But if with Me who am God (or an Angel) thou hast been able to contend, how much more [shall] thou (be able to contend) with men, i.e. with Kaon, whom thou oughtest not to dread?” The L. V. apparently following Jerome, writes יִשְׂרָאֵל, as a prince thou hast power;” but Rosenmuller and Gesenius give it the simpler meaning, “thou hast contended.” Gesenius interprets Israel “soldier of God.”

2. It became the national name of the twelve tribes collectively. They are so called in Ex. iii. 16 and elsewhere.

3. It is used in a narrower sense, excluding Judah, in 1 Sam. xi. 8. It is so used in the famous cry of the rebels against David (2 Sam. xx. 1), and against his grandson (1 K. xii. 16). Thenceforth it was accepted and assumed as the name of the Northern Kingdom, in which the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, Levi, Dan, and Simeon had no share.

4. After the Babylonian Captivity, the returned exiles and their sons they were mainly of the kingdom of Judah, resumed the name Israel as the designation of their nation; but as individuals they are almost always described as Jews in the Apocrypha and N. T. Instances occur in the Books of the Chronicles of the application of the name Israel to Judah (c. g. 2 Chr. xi. 3, xii. 6); and in Esther of the name Jews to the whole people. The name Israel is also used to denote it, and as by distinction from priests, levites, and other ministers (Ezr. vi. 10, ix. 1, x. 25; Neh. xi. 3, &c.).

W. T. B.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. 1. The prophet Ahijah of Shiloh, who was commissioned in the latter days of Solomon to announce the division of the kingdom, led one tribe (Judah) to the house of David, and assigned ten to Jeroboam (1 K. iii. 35, 31). These were probably Joseph (= Ephraim and Manasseh), Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, Naphtali, Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, Gad, and Reuben; Levi being intentionally omitted. Eventually, the greater part of Benjamin, and probably the whole of Simeon and Levi, were annexed to Judah, as by distinction from priests, levites, and other ministers (Ezr. vi. 21).

2. The conquests of David, Moab appears to have been attached to the kingdom of Israel (2 K. iii. 4); so much of Syria as remained subject to Solomon (see 1 K. vi. 24) would probably be claimed by his successor in the northern kingdom; and Ammon, though connected with Rehoboam as his brother’s native land (2 Chr. xiii. 13), and distinguished from tributary to Judah (2 Chr. xxvii. 5), was at one time allied (2 Chr. xx. 1), we know not how closely, or how early, with Moab. The sea-coast between Archo and Japho remained in the possession of Israel.

3. The population of the kingdom is not expressly stated, and in drawing any inference from the numbers of fighting-men, we must bear in mind that the numbers in the Hebrew text of the O. T. are strongly suspected to have been subjected to extensive, perhaps systematic, corruption. Forty years before the division, the census taken by direction of David gave 800,000 including 2 Sam. xxiv. 9, or 1,000,000 according to 1 Chr. xxv. 5, as the number of fighting-men in Israel. Jeroboam, n. c. 357, brought into the field an army of 800,000 men (2 Chr. xiii. 7). The small number of the army of Jehoshaphat (2 K. xii. 7) is to be attributed to his compact with Hazael; for in the next reign Israel could spare a mercenary host ten times as numerous for the wars of Amaziah (2 Chr. xxv. 6).

Excav is scarcely correct in his remark that we know not what time of life is reckoned as the military age (Gezach. Isr. iii. 185): for it is defined in —in Bp. Patrick proposes to reconcile these two numbers, by adding to the former 258,000 on account of David’s standing legions.

Joshua, the representatives of the two tribes, stand out side by side eminent among the leaders of the people. The blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 13), and the divine selection of Joshua inaugurated the greater prominence of Joseph for the next three centuries. Othniel, the successor of Joshua, was from Judah; the last, Samson, was born among the Ephraimites. Within that period Ephraim supplied at Shiloh (Judg. xxi. 19) a resting-place for the ark, the centre of divine worship; and a rendezvous, or capital at Shechem (Josh. xiv. 1; Judg. ix. 2) for the whole people. Ephraim arrogantly claimed (Judg. viii. 1, xii. 1) the exclusive right of taking the lead against invaders. Royal authority was offered to one dweller in Ephraim (vii. 22), and actually exercised for three years by another (ix. 22). After a silent, perhaps sullen, sequestration in the transfer of Samuel’s authority with additional dignity to a Benjamite, they resisted for seven years (2 Sam. ii. 9–11) its passing into the hands of the popular Jewish leader, and yielded reluctantly to the conviction that the sceptre which seemed almost within their grasp was reserved at last for Judah. Even in David’s reign their jealousy did not always slumber (2 Sam. xix. 40); and though Solomon’s alliance and intercourse with Tyre must have tended to increase the loyalty of the northern tribes, they took the first opportunity to emancipate themselves from the rule of his son. Distinguished the length of Solomon’s reign, and the clouds that gathered round the close of it (1 K. xi. 14–25), and possibly his increasing despotism (Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 915), tended to diminish the general popularity of the house of David; and the idolatry of the king alienated the affection of religious Israelites. But none of these was the immediate cause of the disruption. No aspiration after greater liberty, political privileges, or aggrandizement at the expense of other powers, no spirit of commercial enterprise, no breaking forth of pent-up energy seems to have instigated the movement. Ephraim proudly longed for independence, without considering whether or at what cost he could maintain it. Shechem was built as a capital, and Tirzah as a residence, for an Ephraimitic king, by the people who murmured under the burden imposed upon them by the royal state of Solomon. Ephraim felt no patriotic pride in a national splendor of which Judah was the centre. The dwelling-place of God when fixed in Jerusalem ceased to be so honorable to him as of old. It was ancient jealousy rather than recent provocation, the opportune death of Solomon rather than unwillingness to incur taxation, the opportune return of a persecuted Ephraimitic rather than any commanding genius for rule which Jeroboam possessed, that finally broke up the brotherhood of the children of Jacob. It was an outburst of human feeling so soon as that divine influence which restrained the spirit of disunion was withdrawn in consequence of the idolatry of Solomon, so soon as that stern prophetic voice which had called Saul to the throne under a protest, and David to the throne in repentance, was heard in anger summoning Jeroboam to divide the kingdom.

\[a\] Mr. Rickman noticed that in 1821 and in 1831 the number of males under 25 years of age, and the number of males of 20 years of age and upwards, were nearly equal, and this proportion has been since regarded as invariable; or, it has been assumed, that the males of the age of 25 and upwards are equal in number to a fourth part of the whole population.\[b\] Census of Great Britain, 1851, Population Tables, II. 5. Disruption where there can be no expansion, or disenchantment without growth, is fatal to a state. If England and America have prospered since 1783 it is because each found space for increase, and had vital energy to fill it. If the separation of east and west was but a step in the decline of the Roman empire, it was so because each portion was hemmed in by obstacles which it wished to surmount. The sources of life and strength begin to disappear; the state shrinks within itself, withers, and dies before some blast which once it might have braved.

The kingdom of Israel developed no new power. It was but a portion of David's kingdom deprived of many elements of strength. Its frontier was as open and as widely extended as before; but it wanted a capital for the seat of organized power. Its territory was as fertile and as tempting to the spoiler, but its people were less united and patriotic. A corrupt religion poisoned the source of national life. When less reverence attended on a new and unconsecrated king, and less respect was felt for an aristocracy reduced by the retirement of the Levites, the army which David found hard to control rose up unchecked in the exercise of its willful strength; and thus eight houses, each ushered in by a revolution, occupied the throne in quick succession. Tyre ceased to be the ally who, as long as the alliance was profitable to the merchant-city, Moab and Ammon yielded tribute only while under compulsion. A powerful neighbor, Damascus, sat armed at the gate of Israel; and, beyond Damascus, might be discerned the rising strength of the first great monarchy of the world. These causes tended to increase the misfortunes, and to accelerate the early end of the kingdom of Israel. It lasted 234 years, from B.C. 975 to B.C. 741, about two thirds of the duration of its more compact neighbor Judah. But it may be doubted whether the division into two kingdoms greatly shortened the independent existence of the Hebrew race, or interfered with the purposes which, it is thought, may have been in the establishment of David's monarchy. If among these purposes were the preservation of the true religion in the world, and the preparation of an agency adapted for the diffusion of Christianity in due season, then it must be observed — first, that as a bulwark providentially raised against the corrupting influence of idolatrous Tyre and Damascus, Israel kept back that contagion from Judah, and partly exhausted it before its arrival in the south; next, that the purity of divine worship was not impaired by the evasion of those tribes which were remote from the influence of the Temple, and by the concentration of priests and religious Israelites within the southern kingdom; and lastly, that to the worshipers at Jerusalem the early decline and fall of Israel was a solemn and impressive spectacle of judgment — the working out of the great problem of God's toleration of idolatry. This prepared the heart of Judah for the revivals under Hezekiah and Josiah, softened them when the event was not as Captivity, and strengthened them for their absolute renunciation of idolatry, when after seventy years they returned to Palestine, to teach the world that there is a spiritual bond more efficacious than the occupancy of a certain soil for keeping up national existence, and to become the channel through which God's greatest gift was conveyed to mankind. (1 Kings 12.)

6. The detailed history of the kingdom of Israel will be found under the names of its nineteen kings. [See Israel and Judah.] A summary may be given in four periods: —

(1.) B.C. 975-929. Jeroboam had not sufficient force of character in himself to make a lasting impression on his people. A king, but not a founder of a dynasty, he aimed at nothing beyond securing his present elevation. Without any ambition to share in the commerce of Tyre, or to compete with the growing power of Damascus, or even to complete the humiliation of the helpless monarch whom he had deprived of half a kingdom, Jeroboam acted entirely on a defensive policy. He attempted to give his subjects a centre which they wanted for their political allegiance, in Shechem or in Tirzah. He sought to change merely so much of their ritual as was inconsistent with his authority over them. But as soon as the golden calves were set up, the priests and Levites and many religious benighted (2 Chr. xii. 16) left their country, and the disastrous emigration was not effectually checked even by the attempt of Baasha to build a fortress (2 Chr. xvi. 6) at Ramah. A new priesthood was introduced (1 K. xii. 31) absolutely dependent on the king (Am. vii. 14), not forming as under the Mosaic law a landed aristocracy, not respected by the people, and unable either to withstand the oppression or to strengthen the weakness of a king. A priestly class, and a ritual element for formal purposes, had no hold whatever on the conscience of the people. To meet their spiritual cravings a succession of prophets was raised up, great in their poverty, their purity, their austerity, their self-dependence, their moral influence, but imperfectly organized: — a rod to correct and check the civil government, not, as they might have been under happier circumstances, a staff to support it. The army soon learned its power to dictate to the isolated monarch and dissatisfied people. Baasha in the midst of the army at Gibbethon slew the son and successor of Jeroboam: Zimri, a captain of chariots, slew the son and successor of Baasha; Omri, the captain of the host, was chosen to punish Zimri; and after a civil war of four years he prevailed over Elah, the choice of half the people. (6) B.C. 884. For the four years Israel was governed by the house of Omri. This sagacious king pitched on the strong hill of Samaria as the site of his capital. Damascus, which in the days of Baasha had proved itself more than a match for Israel, now again assumed a threatening attitude. Edom and Moab showed a tendency to independence, or even aggression. Hence the princes of Omri's house cultivated an alliance with the contemporary kings of Judah, which was cemented by the marriage of Jechoniah and Athaliah, and marked by the community of names among the royal children. Ahab's Tyrian alliance strengthened him with the counsels of the masculine mind of Jezebel, but brought him no further support. The entire rejection of the God of Abraham, under the disguise of abandoning Jeroboam's unlawful worship, and the election of kings as the god of the Ammonian court and subservient populace, led to a reaction in the nation, to the moral triumph of the prophets in the person of Elijah, and to the extinction of the house of Ahab in obedience to the bidding of Elisha. (c.) B.C. 881-772. Unparalleled triumphs, but greater humiliation, awaited the kingdom of Israel under the dynasty of Jehu. The house of Ahab was abolished by one blow; but, so long as the kings lasted, the people never rose superior to the detaining form of religion established by Jerobam. Hazael, the successor of the two Ben-Hadads, the eldest king of Damascus, reduced Jehoash to the condition of a vassal, and triumphed for a time over both the disunited Hebrew kingdoms. Almost the first sign of the restoration of their strength was a war between them; and Jehoash, the grandson of Jehu, entered Jerusalem as the conqueror of Amaziah. Jehoash also turned the tide of war against the Syrians; and Jeroboam II., the most powerful of all the kings of Israel, captured Damascus, and recovered the whole ancient frontier from Hamath to the Dead Sea. In the midst of his long and seemingly glorious reign the prophets Hosea and Amos uttered their warnings more clearly than any of their predecessors. The short-lived greatness expired with the last king of Jehu’s line.

(ce) n. c. 772-721. Military violence, it would seem, broke off the hereditary succession after the obscure and probably convulsed reign of Zachariah. An unsuccessful usurper, Shallum, is followed by the cruel Menahem, who, being unable to make head against the first attack of Assyria under Pul, became the agent of that monarch for the oppressive taxation of his subjects. Yet his power at home was sufficient to insure for his son and successor Pekahiah a ten years’ reign, cut short by a bold usurper, Pekah. Abandoning the northern and transjordanic regions to the encroaching power of Assyria under Tiglath-pileser, he was very near subjugating Judah, with the help of Damascus, now the coequal ally of Israel. But Assyria interfering summarily put an end to the independence of Damascus, and perhaps was the indirect cause of the assassination of the baffled Pekah. The irreligious Hoshea, the next and last usurper, became tributary to his invader, Shalmaneser, betrayed the Assyrian to the rival monarch of Egypt, and was punished by the loss of his liberty, and by the capture, after a three years’ siege, of his strong capital, Samaria. Some gleanings of the ten tribes yet remained in the land after so many years of religious decline, moral desolation, national degradation, anarchy, bloodshed, and deportation. Even these were gathered up by the conqueror and carried to Assyria, never again, as a distinct people, to occupy their portion of that goodly and pleasant land which their forefathers won under Joshua from the heathen.

7. The following table shows at one view the chronology of the kings of Israel and Judah. Columns 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10 are taken from the Bible. Columns 4, 5, 6 are the computations of eminent modern chronologists: column 4 being the
The numerous dates given in the Bible as the limits of the duration of the king’s reign act as a continued check on each other. The apparent discrepancies between them have been multiply exaggerated, because similar statements of various hypotheses have been put forward;—that an interregnum occurred; that two kings (father and son) reigned conjointly; that certain reigns were dated not from their real commencement, but from some arbitrary period in that Jewish year in which they commenced; that the Hebrew copists have transcribed the numbers incorrectly, either by accident or design; that the original writers have made mistakes in their reckoning. All these are mere suppositions, and even the most probable of them must not be insisted on as if it were a historical fact. But in truth most of the discrepancies may be accounted for by the simple fact that the Hebrew annalists reckon in round numbers, never specifying the months in addition to the years of the duration of a king’s reign. Consequently some of these writers seem to set down a fragment of a year, a few years, and other fragments altogether. Hence in computing the date of the commencement of each reign, without attributing any error to the writer or transcribers, it is necessary to allow for a possible mistake amounting to something less than two years in our interpretation of the indefinite phrasing of the Hebrew writers. But there are a few statements in the Hebrew text which cannot thus be reconciled. (c.) There are in the Second Book of Kings three statements as to the beginning of the reign of Jehoram king of Israel, which in the view of some writers involve a great error, and not a mere numerical one. His accession is dated (1) in the second year of Jehoram king of Judah (2 K. i. 17); (2) in the fifth year before Jehoram king of Judah (2 K. viii. 16); (3) in the eighteenth year of Jehoram (2 K. xi. 17). Two of these statements may be reconciled by the fact that Jehoram king of Judah had two accessions which are recorded in Scripture, and by the probable supposition of Archbishop Usher that he had a third and earlier accession which is not recorded. These three accessions are, (1) when Jehoshaphat left his kingdom to go to the battle of Kinsah-Gilead, in his 17th year; (2) when Jehoshaphat (2 K. viii. 16) either retired from the administration of affairs, or made his son joint king, in his 23rd year; (3) when Jehoshaphat died, in his 25th year. So that, if the supposition of Usher be allowed, the accession of Jehoram king of Israel in Jehoshaphat’s 18th year synchronized with (1) the second year of the first accession, and (2) the fifth year before the second accession of Jehoram king of Judah. (b.) The date of the beginning of Uzziah’s reign (2 K. xv. 1) in the 27th year of Jeroboam II., cannot be reconciled with the statement that Uzziah’s father, Amosiah whose whole reign was 25 years only, came to the throne in the second year of Joash (2 K. xiv. 1), and so reigned 14 years contemporaneously with Joash and 25 with Jeroboam. Usher and others suggest a reckoning of these statements by the supposition that Jeroboam’s reign had two commencements, the first not mentioned in Scripture, on his association with his father Josiah, b. c. 847. But Keil, after Capellus and Grutius, supposes that 2 is an error of the Hebrew copists for 25, and that instead of 25th of Jeroboam we ought to read 15th.

(c.) The statements that Jeroboam II. reigned 41 years (2 K. xiv. 23) after the 15th year of Amaziah, who reigned 29 years, and that Jeroboam’s son Zachariah came to the throne in the 38th year of Uzziah (2 K. xv. 8), cannot be reconciled without supposing that there was an interregnum of 11 years between Jeroboam and his son Zachariah. And almost all chronologists accept this as a fact, although it is not mentioned in the Bible. Some chronologists, who regard an interregnum as intrinsically improbable after the pros persous reign of Jeroboam, prefer the supposition that the number 41 in 2 K. xiv. 23 ought to be changed to 51, and that the number 27 in xv. 1 should be changed to 14, and that a few other corresponding alterations should be made.

(d.) In order to bring down the date of Pekah’s murder (2 K. xvii. 5) to Harrison’s accession, some chronologists propose to read 29 years for 20, in 2 K. xv. 27. Others prefer to let the dates stand as at present in the text, and suppose that an interregnum, not expressly mentioned in the Bible, occurred between those two usurpers. The words of Isaiah (ix. 20, 21) seem to indicate a time of anarchy in Israel. The chronology of the Kings has been minutely investigated by Abp. Usher, Chronologica Sacra, Pars Posterior, De Anna Regnum, Works, xii. 95-144; by Lightfoot, Order of the Texts of the O. T., Works, i. 77-130; by Hales, New Analysis of Chronology, ii. 372-447; by Clinton, l. c. r.; and by H. Browne, Osseo Scoliorum. (See also D. ISRAELITE (יִשְׂרָאֵל; יִשְׂרָאֵל: Ισραήλ; Ισραήλ: "IronaIl): [Vat. Ἰσραήλίτας: Abt. Ἰσραήλίται; "Israel." Ισραήλιτας ἐν τῷ Ισραήλ: Ισραήλιτας τῆς Ισραήλιτας; Ἐν τῷ Ισραήλ: Ἰσραήλιτας τῆς Ισραήλιτας.] In 2 Sam. xvii. 25, 2 Chron. xxv. 17, the father of Amaziah, is called "an Israelite," or more correctly "the Israelite," while in 1 Chr. ii. 17 he appears as "Jether the Ishmaelite." The latter is undoubtedly the true reading, for unless Judah had been a foreigner there would have been no need to express his nationality. The LXX. and Vulg. appear to have read Ἰσραήλιτας ἐρωτάς, "Jether the Ishmaelite." * "Israelite" also occurs in the A. V. as the rendering of Ἰσραήλιτας, "man of Israel." Num. xxiv. 14; and of Ἰσραήλιται or Ἰσραήλιται (Tisch. Treg., John i. 47, Rom. xi. 1. "Israelites"

A. * ISRAELITISH (יִשְׂרָאֵלית): Ἰσραήλιτας, "Israelite".
ISSACHAR

The designation of a certain woman (Lev. xxiv. 10, 11) whose son was stoned for blasphemy. A.

ISSACHAR (יס hakk, [see intro], i. e. Issacar—such is the invariable spelling of the name in the Hebrew, the Samaritan Codex and Version, the Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jonathan, but the Masorets have pointed it so as to supersede the second S, ימק, Isa [s] cur: יסחא: Rec. Text of N. T. יסחא, but Cod. C. יסחא: Joseph. יסחא: Issachar), the ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah; the firstborn to Leah after the interval which occurred in the births of her children (Gen. xxx. 17; comp. xxix. 35). As is the case with each of the sons the name is recorded as bestowed on account of a circumstance-connected with the birth. But, as may be also noticed in more than one of the others, two explanations seem to be combined in the narrative, which even then is not in exact accordance with the requirements of the name. "God hath given me my hire " (ם), skir, ... and she called his name Issachar," is the record; but in verse 18 that " hire " is for the surrender of her maid to her husband—while in ver. 14-17 it is for the discovery and bestowal of the mandrakes. Besides, as indicated above, the name in its original form—Issacar—rebels against this interpretation, an interpretation which, to be consistent, requires the form subsequently imposed on the word Is-sachar. The allusion is no again brought forward as it is with Dan, Asher, etc., in the blessings of Jacob and Moses. In the former only it is perhaps allowable to discern a faint echo of the sound of " Issachar " in the word skiruo—" a shoulder " (Gen. xl. 15).

Of Issachar the individual we know nothing. In Genesis he is not mentioned after his birth, and the few verses in Chronicles devoted to the tribe contain merely a brief list of its chief men and heroes in the reign of David (1 Chr. vii. 1-5). At the descent into Egypt four sons are ascribed to him, who founded the four chief families of the tribe (Gen. xlvi. 13; Num. xxvi. 23, 25: 1 Chr. vii. 1). Issachar's place during the journey to Canaan was on the east of the Tabernacle with his brothers Judah and Zebulun (Num. ii. 5), the group moving foremost in the march (x. 15), and having a common standard, which, according to the Rabbinical tradition, was of the three colors of sardine, topaz, and carbuncle, inscribed with the names of the three tribes, and bearing the figure of a lion's whelp (see Targum Pseudo-Jon. on Num. ii. 3). At this time the captain of the tribe was Nathanneel ben-Zuar (Num. i. 8, ii. 5, xviii. 18, x. 15). He was succeeded by Igal ben-Joseph, who went as representative of his tribe among the spies (xii. 7), and he again by Paltiel ben-Azzan, who assisted Joshua in apportioning the land of Canaan (xxxiv. 29). Issachar was one of the six tribes who were to stand on Mount Gerizim during the ceremony of blessing and cursing (Deut. xxvi. 12). He was still in company with Judah, Zebulun being opposite to Ebal. The number of the fighting men of Issachar when taken in the census at Sinai was 54,400. During the journey they seem to have steadily increased, and after the mortality at Peor they amounted to 64,900, being inferior to none but Judah and Dan. — to the latter by 140 souls only. The numbers given in 1 Chr. vii. 2, 4, 5 probably the census of Joseph, amount in all to 145,900.

The Promised Land once reached, the connection between Issachar and Judah seems to have closed, to be renewed only on two brief occasions, which will be noticed in their turn. The intimate relation with Zebulun was however maintained. The two brother-tribes had their portions close together, and more than once they are mentioned in company. The allotment of Issachar by above that of Manasseh. The specification of its boundaries and contents is contained in Josh. xix. 17-25. But to the towns there named must be added Daberath, given in the catalogue of Levitical cities (xxi. 28: Jarnatha here is probably the Remeth of xxi. 21), and five others—Beth-shan, Ibleam, En-dor, Taanach, and Megiddo. These last, though the property of Manasseh, remained within the limits of Issachar (Josh. xii. 11; Judg. i. 27), and they assist us materially in determining his boundary. In the words of Josephus (Ant. v. 4, § 22), "it extended in length from Carmel to the Jordan, in breadth to Mount Tabor." In fact it exactly consisted of the plain of Esdrælon or Jezreel. The south boundary we can trace by En-gannim, the modern Jenin, on the heights which form the southern inclosure to the Plain; and then, further westward, by Taanach and Megiddo, the authentic fragments of which still stand on the same heights as they trend away to the hump of Carmel. On the north the territory also ceased with the plain, which is there bounded by Tabor, the outpost of the hills of Zebulun. East of Tabor the hill-country continued so as to screen the tribe from the Sea of Galilee, but a continuous tract of level on the S. E. led to Beth-shan and the upper part of the Jordan valley. West of Tabor, again, a little to the south, is Cheseth, the modern es-ṣaf, close to the traditional "Mount of Precipitation;" and over this the boundary probably ran in a slanting course till it joined Mount Carmel, where the Ishbosheth (Josh. xix. 20) worked its way below the eastern bluff of that mountain—and thus completed the triangle at its western apex. Nazareth lies among the hills, a few [about two] miles north of the so-called Mount of Precipitation, and therefore escaping being in Issachar. Almost exactly in the centre of this plain stood Jezreel, on a low swell, attended on the one hand by the eminence of Mount Gilboa, on the other by that now called el-Duly, or "little Hermon," the latter having Shunem, Nan, and En-dor on its slopes, names which recall some of the most interesting and important events in the history of Israel.

This territory was, as it still is, among the richest land in Palestine. Westward was the famous plain which derived its name, the "seed-plot of God"—such is the signification of Jezreel—from its fertility, and the very weeds of which at this day curious details will be found in the Testamentum Iaaehar, Fabricius, Cod. Pompejani, I. 620-623. They were ultimately deposited "in the house of the Lord," whatever that expression may mean.
assist in making David king over the entire realm different qualifications are noted in them the had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do ... and all their brethren were at their commandment. To what this under standing of the times was we have no clue. By the later Jewish interpreters it is explained as skill in ascertaining the periods of the sun and moon, the intercalation of months, and dates of solemn feasts, and the interpretation of the signs of the heavens (Targum, ad loc. Jerome, Quast. Hebr.). Josephus (Ant. vii. 2, § 2) gives it as knowing the things that were to happen and he adds that the armed men who came with these leaders were 20,000. One of the wise men of Issachar according to an old Jewish tradition preserved by Jerome (Quast. Hebr. on 2 Chr. xix. 16), was Amassiah son of Kiah, who with 200,000 men offered himself to Jehovah in the service of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvi. 16): but this is very questionable, as the movement appears to have been confined to Judah and Benjamin. The ruler of the tribe at this time was Onni, of the great family of Michael (1 Chr. xxvii. 18; comp. vii. 3). May he not have been the forefather of the king of Israel of the same name the founder of the house of Omri and of the house of Ahaz, the builder of Samaria, possibly on the same hill of Shamir on which the Issacharite judge, Tola, had formerly held his court? But whether this was so or not, at any rate our dynasty of the Israelite kings was Issacharite. Baasha, the son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar, a member of the army with which Nadab and all Israel were besieging Gibbethon, apparently not of any standing in the tribe (comp. 1 K. xvi. 29); the king, and himself mounted the throne (1 K. xxv. 27, &c.). He was evidently a fierce and warlike man (xxv. 29; 2 Chr. xvi. 1), and an idolater like Jeroboam. The Issacharite dynasty lasted during the 24 years of his reign and the 2 of his son Elah. At the end of that time it was wrested from him by the same means that his father had acquired it, and Zimri, the new king, terminated his reign by a massacre of the whole kindred and country of Baasha left him put even so much as a dog (xvi. 11).

One more notice of Issachar remains to be added to the meagre information already collected. It is fortunately a favorable one. There may be no truth in the tradition just quoted that the tribe was in any way connected with the reforms of Jehoshaphat, but we are fortunately certain that, distant as Issachar was from Jerusalem, they took part in the passover with which Hezekiah sanctified the opening of his reign. On that memorable occasion a multitude of the people from the northern tribes, and amongst them from Issachar, although so long estranged from the worship of Jehovah as to have forgotten how to make the necessary purifications, yet by the enlightened wisdom of Hezekiah were c. The word bands which is commonly employed in the A. V. to render Heb. שְׂדֵה, שְׂדֶה, is unfortunately used in 1 Chr. xii. 23 for a very different term, by which the orderly assembly of the fighting men of the tribes is denoted when they visited Hebron to make David king. This term is כָּרָם, כָּרָם. We may almost suspect a mere misprint, especially as the Vulgate has præcessus. [The marginal rendering shows that it is not a misprint.] allowed to keep the feast; and they did keep it seven days with great gladness—with such in numinous joy as had not been known since the time of Solomon, when the whole land was one. Nor did they separate till the occasion had been sig nalized by an immense destruction of idolatrous altars and symbols. “In Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim and Manasseh,” up to the very confines of Issachar’s own land—and then “all the children of Israel returned every man to his possession into their own cities” (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). It is a satisfactory farewell to take of the tribe. Within five years from this date Shalmaneser king of Assyria had invaded the north of Palestine, and after three years’ siege had taken Samaria, and with the rest of Israel had carried Issachar away to his distant dominions. There we must be content to leave them until, with the rest of their brethren of all the tribes of the children of Israel (Dan only excepted), the twelve thousand of the tribe of Issacchar shall be sealed in their foreheads (Rev. vii. 7).

2. (יִשְׂרָאֵל) : יֵשׁוּרָאֵל : [Yshochar.] A Korhite Levite, one of the doorkeepers (A. V. “porters”) of the house of Jehovah, seventh son of Obed-edem (1 Chr. xxvi. 5).

G. ISSHIAH (יִשְׂרְיָהו) [whom Jehovah lends].
1. (Vat. omits: Alex. Isaya: Jesha.) A descendant of Moses by his younger son Eliezer: the head of the numerous family of Kebliah, in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 21; comp. xxiii. 17, xxv. 25). His name is elsewhere given as Jeshi-
lah. [ISSHIAH.]
2. (Ishia: Alex. Isaya: Jesia.) A Levite of the house of Kohath and family of Uzziah; named in the list of the tribe in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 29).

* ISSUE OF BLOOD. [Blood, Issue of.]

* ISSUE, RUNNING. The texts Lev. xv. 2, 3, xxii. 4, Num. v. 2 (and 2 Sam. iii. 29), where the malady is invoked as a curse, are probably to be interpreted of gonorrhea. In Lev. xv. 3 a distinction is introduced, which merely means that the cessation of the actual flux does not constitute ceremonial cleanness, but that the patient must bide the legal time, 7 days (ver. 13), and perform the prescribed purifications and sacrifice (ver. 14). See, however, Sarenumtin’s preface to the treatise Zobim of the Mishna, where another interpretation is given. As regards the specific varieties of this malady, it is generally asserted that its most severe form (gon. virulenta) is modern, having first appeared in the 15th century. Chardin (Voyages en Perse, ii. 200) states that he observed that this disorder was presalent in Persia, but that its effects were far less severe than in western climates. If this be true, it would go some way to explain the alleged absence of the gon. virul. from ancient nosology, which found its field of observation in the East, Greece, etc.; and to confirm the supposition that the milder form only was the subject of Mosaic legislation. But, beyond this, it is probable that diseases may appear, run their course, and disappear, and, for want of an accurate observation of their symptoms, leave no trace behind them. The “bed,” “sent,” etc. (Lev. xv. 5, 6, &c.), are not to be supposed

ITALY

I MUCH, however, not confirmed by any direct evidence, is not left wholly unsupported. It so happens that one of Gerard's inscriptions speaks of a "Colours militium Italorum voluntaria, que est in Syria" (see Ackerman, Nuministic Illustr. of the Narrative Portions of the N. T., p. 34). There was a class of soldiers in the Roman army who enlisted in their own accord, and were known as "voluntarii" in distinction from conscripts (see Fandy's Rent-Eyecde, vol. 2744).

It is supposed, therefore, with good reason, that there was such a cohort at Caesarea, at the time to which Luke's narrative refers, and that it was called Italian because it consisted of native Italians; whereas the other cohorts in Palestine were levied, for the most part, from the country itself (see Joseph. Ant. xiv. 15, § 10; B. J. i. 17, § 1). Ewald conjectures that this Italian cohort and the Augustan cohort (Acts xxvii. 1) may have been the same; but the fact that Luke employs different names is against that supposition, and so much the more because different cohorts are known to have been in Judaea at this time (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 19, § 2; xx. 8, § 7). It is worthy of remark, as Tholuck observes (Geschichte der Evangel., p. 174), that Luke places this Italian cohort at Caesarea. That city was the residence of the Roman procurator; and it was important that he should have there a body of troops on whose fidelity he could rely.

We may add, that if the soldiers who composed this legion were Italians, no doubt Cornelius himself who commanded them was an Italian.

Writers on this topic refer, as the principal authority, to Schwartz, Dicssurato des cohorte Italiane a August. Altior. 1720. For notes or remarks more or less extended, see also Wolf's Chris. ITALY (Ιταλία: [Italia]). This word is used in the N. T. in the usual sense of the period, i. e. in its true geographical sense, as denoting the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina. For the progress of the history of the word, first as applied to the extreme south of the peninsula, then as extended northwards to the right bank of the Po, see the Dict. of Geog. vol. ii. pp. 75, 76. From the time of the close of the Republic it was employed as we employ it now. In the N. T. it occurs three, or indeed, more correctly speaking, four times. In Acts x. 1, the Italian cohort at Caesarea (ἡ ἐκκλησία ἐν Καισαρείᾳ), v. c. "an Italian band," consisting, as it hath been said, of none recruited in Italy, illustrates the military relations of the imperial peninsula with the provinces. [ARMY.] In Acts xvi. 2, where we are told of the expulsion of Aquila and Priscilla with their companions "from Italy," we are reminded of the large Jewish population which many authorities show that it contained. Acts xxvii. 1, the beginning of St. Paul's voyage to the west, and the whole subsequent narrative, illustrate the trade which subsisted between the peninsula and other parts of the Mediterranean. And the words in Heb. xviii. 24, "They at Italy (οἱ πρὸς τῆς Ἰταλίας) salute you," what- ever they may prove for or against this being the region in which the letter was written (and the matter has been strongly argued both ways), are interesting as a specimen of the progress of Christiannity in the west.

ITHAI [2 syl.] (Ἰθαΐ) [with Jachové]: Ἰφίλω [Vat. Aegr.: F. A. Oebel.: Alex. Ιταί: [Ald. Ἰθαί Compl. Φ. Ebd.: Ebd.], a Benjaminite, son of Ithai of Gilead, one of the heroes of David's guard (1 Chr. viii. 17), one of the called list of 2 Samuel (xi. 21), also in which the name is given as ITHAI. But Kennicott decides that the form Ithai is the original (Dissertatio, ad loc.).

ITHAMAR (Ἰθαμᾶρ) [land of palms]: 18-αδὰς (Ithamar), the youngest son of Aaron (Ex. vi. 23). After the deaths of Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 1), Eleazar and Ithamar, having been admonished to show no mark of sorrow for their brothers' loss, were appointed to succeed to their places in the priestly office, as they had left no children (Ex. xxviii. 40, 43; Num. iii. 4, 4; 1 Chr. xxiv. 2). In the distribution of services belonging to the Tabernacle, and its transport on the march of the Israelites, the leviathites had charge of the curtains and hangings, and the Merarites of the pillars, cords, and boards, and both of these departments were placed under the superintendence of Ithamar (Ex. xxviii. 21; Num. iv. 21-33). These services were continued under the Temple system, so far as was consistent with its stationary character, but instead of being appropriated to families, they were divided by lot, the first lot being taken by the family of Eleazar, whose descendants were more numerous than those of Ithamar (1 Chr. xxiv. 4, 6). The high-priesthood passed into the family of Ithamar in the person of Eli, but for what reason we are not informed. It reverted in its original form into the person of Zadok, in consequence of Abiathar's participation in the rebellion of Abdonjah. This was ratified by the prophesy delivered to Samuel against Eli (1 Sam. ii. 31-35: 1 K. ii. 20, 27, 35; Joseph. Ant. viii. i, § 3).

A descendant of Ithamar, by name Daniel, is mentioned as returning from captivity in the time of Artaxerxes (Ex. viii. 2).

ITHIEL (Ἰθηήλ) [God is with me]: 1, a Benjaminite, son of Jessiah (Neh. xi. 7).

2. (1 LXX. omit: Vulg. translates, cum quo est Deus.) One of two persons — Ithiel and Ucaal — to whom Agur ben-Jakeh delivered his discourse (Prov. xxx. 1). [UCAAL.]

ITHMAH (Ἰθμα, Ἰθμή) [orphange]: 18-αδαί (Vat. Eob. F. A. Ebd.: Alex. Ἰθμα: Jethman), a Moabite, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the enlarged list of Chronicles (1 Chr. xi. 49).

ITHAN (Ἰθαν) [restored, given]; in both MSS. of the LXX. the name is corrupted by being attached to that next it: Ἀραπανναίας, Alex. Ἀραπανναί (Ἀραπανναί), one of the towns in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23), named with Kadesh and Telen (comp. 1 Sam. xvi. 4), and therefore probably on the borders of the desert, if not actually in the desert itself. No trace of its existence has yet been discovered, nor does it appear to have been known to Jerome. The village Ἰθαν which recalls the name, is between Hebron and Beit-Shein, and therefore much too far north.

ITHRA (תִּהְרָא) [abundance, eminence]: יְהֵרָא; [Vat. Alex.] יְהֵרָא; Joseph. Ant. vii. 10, § 1. יְהֵרָא (יְהֵרָא); an Israelite (2 Sam. xix. 25) or Ishmaelite (1 Chr. ii. 17, "Jether the Ishmeelite"); the father of Amasa by Abigail, David's sister. He was thus brother-in-law to David and uncle to Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, the three "sons of Zeruiah." There is no absolute means of settling which of these—Israelite or Ishmaelite—is correct; but there can be little doubt that the latter is so: the fact of the admixture of Ishmaelite blood in David's family being a fit subject for notice in the genealogies, whereas Ithra's being an "Ishmaelite would call for no remark. [JETHRA.

H.

ITHRAN (?הֶרָן ) [as above]. 1. (יְהֵרָאן, יְהֵרָאן; [Alex. יְהֵרָאן; Vat. in 1 Chr., יְהֵרָאן] יְהֵרָאן; Jeconia, Jethro), a son of Dishon, a Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chr. i. 41); and probably a phylarch ("duke," A. V.) of a tribe of the Horim, as was his father (Gen. xxxvi. 30); for the latter was evidently a son of Seir (vv. 21 and 30), and not a son of Anah (v. 29).

2. (יְהֵרָאן; [Vat. יְהֵרָאן; Alex. יְהֵרָאן; Comp. Abd. יְהֵרָאן; Jethro); a descendant of Asher, in the genealogy contained in 1 Chr. vii. 30-40.

E. S. P.

ITHREAM (?הֶרָם ) [residue of the people]: יְהֵרָם, יְהֵרָם; [Vat. in 1 Chr., יְהֵרָם] Alex. יְהֵרָם, יְהֵרָם; Joseph. יְהֵרָם (Jethro); a son of David, born to him in Hebron, and distinctly specified as the sixth, and as the child of "Eglah, David's wife" (2 Sam. iii. 5: 1 Chr. iii. 3). In the ancient Jewish traditions Eglah is said to have been Michal, and we have died in giving birth to Ithream.

ITHRITE, THE ("עֵרָיתָא" [patronym. from יְהֵרָאן ]): אֹּהֵרָיִלֵי, אֹּסֵרָיִלֵי, יְהֵרָא; [Vat. אֹּסֵרָיִלֵי, אֹּסֵרָיִלֵי; יְהֵרָא; Alex. אֹּסֵרָיִלֵי, אֹּסֵרָיִלֵי, יְהֵרָא; Jethrites, Jethro); the native, or a descendant of a man called lether (according to the Hebrew mode of forming derivatives); the designation of two of the members of David's guard, Ira and Gareb (2 Sam. xxii. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40). The Ithrite (A. V. "Ithrites" ["Aishath, Vat. Alex. אֹּסֵרָיִל; Jethrei]) is mentioned in 1 Chr. i. 53 as among the "families of Kirjath-jearim"; but this does not give us much clue to the derivation of the term, except that it fixes it as belonging to Judah. These two Ithrite heroes of David's guard may have come from Jartine, in the mountains of Judah, one of the places which were the "haunt of David" and his men in their freeloading wanderings, and where he had "friends" (1 Sam. xxx. 27; comp. 31). Ira has been supposed to be identical with "Ira the Jairite," David's priest (2 Sam xx. 26)—the Syriac version reading "from Jair" in that place. But n thing more than conjecture can be arrived at on the point.

ITTAAH-KAZIN (?יִתָאָה-קָזִין ) [in time, opportunity present]: יֵתֵאָה-קָזִין; one of the landmarks of the boundary of Zebalun (Josh. xix. 13), named next to Gatth-hepher. Like that place (A. V. "Gittath-heph"”) the name is probably Eth-kazin, with the Hebrew particle of motion (oth) added—i. e. to "Eth-kazin." Taken as Hebrew the name bears the interpretation time, or people of a judge (Gen. Thes. p. 1083 b). It has not been identified.

G.

ITTAAI (2 syl.) (?תֵאָאֵי ) [in time, opportunity present]. 1. (Ebd, and so Josephus; [Vat. אֵדֹי: אֵדֹי.) ITTAI the GITIVE, i. e. the native of Gath, a Philistine in the army of King David. He appears only during the revolution of Abdon. We first discern him on the morning of David's flight, while the king was standing under the olive-tree below the city, watching the army and the people defile past him. [See David, vol. i. p. 563 a]. Last in the procession came the 600 heroes who had formed David's band during his wanderings in Judah, and had been with him at Gath (2 Sam. xv. 18); comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxvii. 2, xxx. 9, 10; and see Joseph. Ant. vii. 9, § 2). Amongst these, apparently commanding them, was Ittai the Gittite (ver. 19). He caught the eye of the king, who at once addressed him and besought him as a "stranger and an exile," and as one who had but very recently joined his service, not to attach himself to a doubtful cause, but to return "with his brethren" and abide with the king (19, 20). But Ittai is firm; he is the king's slave (?תֵאָאֵי, A. V. "servant"), and wherever his master goes he will go. Accordingly he is allowed by David to proceed, and he passes over the Kidron with the king (xx. 22, LXX.), with all his men, and "all the little ones that were with him." These "little ones" (?תֵאָאֵי) "all the children" must have been the families of the band, their "households" (1 Sam. xxvii. 3). They accompanied them during their wanderings in Judah, often in the king's (1 Sam. xxx. 6), and they were not likely to leave them behind in this fresh commencement of their wandering life.

When the army was numbered and organized by David at Mahanaim, Ittai again appears, now in command of a third part of the force, and (for the time at least) enjoying equal rank with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 5, 12). But here, on the eve of the great battle, we take leave of this valiant and faithful stranger; his conduct in the fight and his subsequent fate are alike unknown to us. Nor is he mentioned in the lists of David's captains and of the heroes of his body-guard (see 2 Sam. xxiii.; 1 Chr. xi.), lists which are possibly of a date previous to Ittai's arrival in Jerusalem.

An interesting tradition is related by Jerome (Quast. Hebr. on 1 Chr. xx. 2). "David took the crown off the head of the image of Mideon (A. V. "their king"). But by the law it was forbidden to any Israelite to touch either gold or silver of an idol. Wherefore they say that Ittai a The meaning of this is doubtful. "The king" may be Abdon, or it may be Ittai's former king Achish. By the LXX the words are omitted

The mention of Ituraean and Aramaic terms in 2 Kings 10:23 gives rise to the identification of the Iturans. In this context, the term "Iturans" can be referred to as the inhabitants of the region of Ituraea, which is mentioned in the Bible. The identity of these people is debated among scholars, with some suggesting that they were a people from the Arabian Peninsula.

The name "Iturans" is mentioned in the Bible in 2 Kings 10:23: "And it was told to Ahab, saying, Behold, the Iturans take away from me one of my cities, even Chemosh; but I will take away one of thine, O Chemosh, saith the Lord; I will make thee a ashes." This passage suggests a historical conflict between Ahab and the Iturans.

The Iturans were known for their strong military and political influence in the region. They were mentioned in various historical texts, including the Bible. The Iturans are also referred to as the "Iturans of the region of Bashan" in 2 Kings 10:23. This indicates their presence in the region of Bashan, which is north of the Dead Sea and west of the Jordan River.

The Iturans were a powerful and influential people in the region. They were noted for their military strength and their ability to maintain control over the surrounding areas. They were also known for their trade and commerce, which helped to establish them as a significant force in the region.

The Iturans were mentioned in the Bible as part of a larger conflict between Ahab and the forces of Damascus. The Iturans were associated with the region of Bashan, which was a significant area in the region of the Bible. The Iturans were known for their military strength and their ability to maintain control over the surrounding areas.

The Iturans were also mentioned in other historical texts, including the works of Herodotus and Plutarch. These texts provide additional information about the Iturans and their role in the region.

The Iturans were a people who played a significant role in the region of Bashan during the time of the Bible. They were known for their strength and their ability to maintain control over the surrounding areas. Their presence in the region is evident in the Bible and other historical texts.

In conclusion, the Iturans were a significant people in the region of Bashan during the time of the Bible. They were known for their military strength and their ability to maintain control over the surrounding areas. Their presence in the region is evident in the Bible and other historical texts.
certainly favors the finding of Hurrae in Gedeon, as does also its being assigned by some of the ancient writers to Cœle-Syria. Yet Cœle-Syria, it should be said, is a vague designation, and was sometimes used so as to embrace nearly all inner Syria from Damascus to Arabia (see Winet’s Bibl. Rerum, i. 232, 3rd Ed.). Dr. Robinson (Phys. Geogr., p. 319) follows the common representation. See, to the same effect, Rauner’s Palastin., p. 227, 4th Aufl. For a paper on “Bashan, Hurrae, and Keath,” by Mr. Porter, author of the above article, see Bibl. Sacra, vili. 783-808.

IVAH, or A’VA (יווח, or יוח; [destruction, ruins, Gen.]: ’AB'D, [in Is. (with Hena), ’AY'Y(dy)VA', Vat. (with Hena) ’AYV[I]Y]SA; Comp. ’AYyd; in 2 K. xvi., Vat. omits, Alex. Aya'; in xix., Vat. Odox, Alex. Ayta'; which) is mentioned in Scripture twice (2 K. xviii. 94, xiii. 13; comp. Is. xxvii. 13), in connection with Hena and Sepharvain, and once (2 K. xvi. 21) in connection with Babylon and Cuthah, must be sought in Babylonia, and is probably identical with the modern Hîth, which is the ’Is of Herodotus (i. 170). This town lay on the Euphrates, between Sitippera (Sepharvain) and Anah (Hena), with which it seems to have been politically united shortly before the time of Sennacherib (2 K. x. 13). It is probably the Ahava (איהנה) of Ezra (viii. 15). The name is thought to have been originally derived from that of a Babylonian god, Titu, who represents the sky or Èther, and to whom the town is supposed to have been dedicated (Sir H. Rawlinson, in Rawlinson’s Herodotus, i. 606, note). In this case AYATH (יווח) would seem to be the most proper pointing. The pointing Aya', or rather Aya' (יוח), shows a corruption of articulation, which might readily pass on to Ahava (איהנה). In the Talmud the name appears as Itih (ייח), and hence would be formed the Greek Ἰς, and the modern Hîth, where the t is merely the feminine ending. Isidore of Charax seems to intend the same place by his ’Aςι-τόλισα (Masa. Parth., p. 5). Some have thought that it occurs as Isî in the Egyptian Inscriptions of the time of Thothmes III., but about n. c. 1450 (Birch, in Ovla. Egypt., p. 80).

This place has always been famous for its bitumen springs. It is bitumen which is brought to Thothmes III. as tribute from Isî. From Isî, according to Herodotus, was obtained the bitumen used as cement in the walls of Babylon (l. s. c.). Isidore calls Aelopolis "the place where are the bitumen springs" (ἐν τοιοῦτοι τὰς ὄρμας τῆς περιήγησιν). These springs still exist in Isî, and sufficiently mark the identity of that place with the Herodotean Isî, and therefore probably with the Isîth of Scripture. They have been noticed by most of our Mesopotamian travellers (see, among others, Rich’s First Memoir on Babylon, p. 64, and Chenevay’s Empires Expedition, i. 55).

IVORY (יווח, shen, in all passages, except 1 K. x. 22, and 2 Chr. ix. 21, where נקנ, shên-hoblim, is so rendered). The word shen literally signifies "the tooth" of any animal, and hence more especially denotes the substance of the projecting tusks of elephants. By some of the ancient nations these tusks were supposed to be lornus (Es. xxvii. 15; Phil. viii. 4, xviii. 1), though Diodorus Siculus (i. 55) correctly calls them teeth. As they were first acquainted with elephants through their ivory, which was an important article of commerce, the shape of the tusks, in all probability, led them into this error. It is remarkable that no word in 55.13/14 is used to denote an elephant, unless the latter portion of the compound shen-hoblim be supposed to have this meaning. Gesenius derives it from the Sanscrit ḍvah, "an elephant;" Keil (on I K. x. 22) from the Coptic έβυς; while Sir Henry Rawlinson mentions a word ᾱβα, which he met with in the Assyrian inscriptions, and which he understands to mean "the large animal," the term being applied both to the elephant and the camel (Journ. of As. Soc. xii. 461). It is suggested in Gesenius’ Thesaurus (s. v.) that the original reading may have been נעב בחון ל, "ivory, ebony" (cf. Ez. xxvii. 15). Hitzig (Hdb., p. 643), without any authority, renders the word "nubišhen Zahn." The Targum Jonathan on 1 K. x. 22 has נעב בחון ל, "elephant’s tusk," while the Peshito gives simply "elephants." In the Targum of the Pseudo Jonathan, Gen. i. 1 is translated, "and Joseph placed his father upon a bier of נעב לחון ל, "shelnaphil," which is conjectured to be a valuable species of wood, but for which Buxtorf, with great probability, suggests as another reading נעב לחון, "ivory."

The Assyrians appear to have carried on a great traffic in ivory. Their early conquests in India had made them familiar with it, and (according to one rendering of the passage) their artists supplied the luxurious Tyrians with carvings in ivory from the isles of Chittim (Es. xxvii. 6). On the obelisk in the British Museum the captives or tribute bearers are represented as carrying tusks. Among the merchandise of Babylon, enumerated in Rev. xiii. 12, are included "all manner vessels of ivory." The skilled workmen of Hiram, king of Tyre, fashioned the great ivory throne of Solomon, and overdid it with pure gold (1 K. x. 18; 2 Chr. ix. 17). The ivory thus employed was supplied by the caravans of Dedan (Is. xxiv. 13; Ez. xxvii. 19), or was brought with apes and peacocks by the navy of Tharshish (1 K. x. 22). The Egyptians, at a very early period, made use of this material in decoration. The cover of a small ivory box in the Egyptian collection at the Louvre is "inscribed with the names Nefert-ka-re, or Neper-cheres, adopted by a dynasty found in the upper line of the tablet of Abydos, and attributed by M. Bunsen to the fifth. . . . In the time of Thothmes III. ivory was imported in considerable quantities in Egypt, . . . in boxes laden with ivory and ebony" from Ethiopia, or else in tusks and cups from the Ruten-nu. . . . The celebrated car at Florence has its linchpins tipped with ivory" (Birch, in Trans. of Roy. Soc. of Lit. iii. 2d series). The specimens of Egyptian ivory work, which are found in the principal museums of Europe, are, most of them, in the opinion of Mr. Birch, of a date anterior to the Persian invasion, and some even as old as the 18th dynasty.

The ivory used by the Egyptians was principally brought from Ethiopia (Herod. iii. 114), though their elephants were originally from Asia. The Ethiopians, according to Diodorus Siculus (i. 55), brought to SesostrisIII. ebony and gold, and the IVY (σαγήνα; baleum), the common Red Sea ivy, of which the ancient Greeks and Romans knew two or three kinds, which appear to be only varieties. Mention of this plant is made only in 2 Mac. vi. 7, where it is said that the Jews were compelled, when the feast of Baccus was kept, to go in procession carrying ivy to this deity, to whom it is well known this plant was sacred. Ivy, however, though not mentioned by name, has a peculiar interest to the Christian, as forming the "incorruptible crown" (1 Cor. ix. 25) for which the competitors at the great Isthmian games contended, and which St. Paul so beautifully contrasts with the "incorruptible crown" which shall hereafter circumscribe the brows of those who run worthily the race of this mortal life. In the Isthmian contests the victor's garland was either ivy or pine.
IZRAHITE, THE

* The ivy (such as is described above) grows wild also in Palestine.

IZEHARI [israpel: Jeznur]. The form in which the name Isaiah is given in the A. V. of Num. iii. 19 only. In ver. 27 the family of the same person is given "the Izzahrites." The Hebrew word is the same as Izzhar.

IZZEHARITES, THE (זֶזָּהֵרֵי; ó is- raped; Alex. o 2aap; Jeznurite). A family of Kohathite Levites, descended from Izzhar the son of Heman (Num. iii. 27); called also in the A. V. "Izzahrites." W. A. W.

IZZAR (spelt Izzahr in Num. iii. 19, of A. V.; in Heb. always יִזָּהֶר [oil, and perhaps one anointed with oil]: israpel and [1 Chr. vi. 38, xxxii. 12, 18] israpel [but here Vat. Alex. read israap]; Vat. in Ex. iii. 19, israpel]; israap, son of Izzah of Levi, used as a name of Aaron and Moses, and father of Korah (Ex. vi. 18, 21; Num. iii. 19, vii. 1; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18). But in 1 Chr. vi. 22 Amminadub is substituted for Izzah, as the son of Kohath and father of Korah, in the line of Samuel. This, however, must be an accidental error of the scribe, as in ver. 38, where the same genealogy is repeated, Izzah appears again in the same person. (See Cant. vi. 22 read Izraap in place of Amminadub, and the Alaline and tomplukt, read Amminadub between Izzah and Kore, making another generation. But these are probably only corrections of the text.) See Barrington's Genealogies of the O. T.) Izzah was the head of the family of the Izzahrites or Izzahrites (Num. iii. 27; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 24), one of the four families of the Kohathites.

C. A. II.

IZZAHARITES, THE (זֶזָּהֵרֵי; ó israpel, ó israpel, ó israpel; [Vat. in 1 Chr. xxiv. 22, xxxvi. 29, israpel; Alex. o israpel, o israpel, o israpel: Isaac; Israel]; the same as the preceding. In the reign of David, Shebonith was the chief of the family (1 Chr. xxiv. 22), and with his brethren had charge of the treasure dedicated for the Temple (1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 24).)

IZRAHIAH, THE (זְרָיהָה); i. e. "the Israhahites" (inclyoumous, utique, Gen. First); ó israpel. [Vat. Esrae; Alex. Esraa; Isaac, the designation of Shammurth, the captain of the fifth monthly course as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxvii. 8). In its present form the Hebrew will not bear the interpretation put on it in the A. V. Its real force is probably Zerubbite, that is, from the great Judaic family of Zerah — the Zarites.

IZREEL is used for JERZIEL in Josh. xix. 18 in the A. V. ed. 1611. It is the common form in the Genevan version.

IZ'RI (יִּשְׁרִי), i. e. "the Istrite [Iehovih creates, First];" Ithr; [Vat. Isrebi < Isri]; Alex. Eshri; a Levite, leader of the fourth course or ward in the service of the house of God (1 Chr. xxv. 11). In ver. 3 he is called ZERI.

JA'AKAN (יָאָקָן, [one sagacious, intelligent, Forefather]), [Vat.] Alex. Iskaining: Jacabin, the forefather of the Bene-Jaakan, round whose well, the children of Israel encamped after they left Moserah, and from which they went on to Hor Hagidgad (Deut. x. 6). Jaakan was son of Ezer, the son of Seir the Horite (1 Chr. i. 42). The name is here given in the A. V. as JAKAN, though without any reason for the change. In Gen. xxxvi. 27 it is in the abbreviated form of AKAN. The site of the wells has not been identified. Some suggestions will be seen under Bene-Jaakan.

JA'AKOBAH (יָאָקָבָא): Iowaibah; Alex. Iskabah: Jacobon, one of the princes (יָאָבֹא) of the families of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 38). Excepting the termination, the name is identical with that of Jacob.

*First makes this name = "to Jacob," i. e. reckoned to him. It is the unaccented paragoge יָאָבֹא appended to a class of proper names in the later Hebrew. (Hebr. und Chald. Handb. s. v.)

JA'ALÁ (יָאָלָא, [red she-goat]): Iowaíla; Alex. FA. Ieana < Jalaba). Bene-Jaada (sons of J.) were among the descendants of "Solomon's slaves" who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 58). The name also occurs as —

JA'ALÁH (יָאָלָה) [as above]: Iowaálah; Alex. Isla: Jola, Ezr. ii. 58; and in Esdras as JElLA.

JA'ALAM (יָאָלָם): whom God hides, Ges.: IaJala: Ielion, Heilmon, a son of Estu by his wife Aholiabamah (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; cf. 1 Chr. i. 35), and a phylarch (A. V. "duke") or head of a tribe of Edom. E. S. P.

JA'ANAI (3 syn.): [whom Jehovah answers]: Ia'anaw; [Vat. Aeanwe]; Alex. Iasa: Janai, a chief man in the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. i. 12). The LXX. have followed the connecting name, Shaphat, to Jaanal, and rendered it 1. 3 γεαναταινέων.

JA'ARE-OREGIM (יָאָרֵי אֶרְגְּיִם) [see note]: Acharpeia; [Vat. Alex. -eirwe]: Solitus pugnaealterius), according to the present text of 2 Sam. xxi. 19, a Bethlehemite, and the father of Ethan who slew Goliath (the words "the brother of*:*" are added in the A. V.). In the parallel passage, 1 Chr. xiv. 5, besides other difference, Jar is found instead of Jaare, and Oregim is enriched. Oregim is not elsewhere found as a proper name nor is it a common word; and occurring as it does without doubt at the end of the verse (A. V. "weavers"), in a sentence exactly parallel to that in 1 Sam. xvii. 7, it is not probable that it should also occur in the middle of the same. The conclusion of Kennicott ([Dissertation, 80]) appears a just one — that in the latter place it has been interpolated from the former, and that Jar or Jair is the correct reading instead of Jaare. [Elmansan, vol. i. p. 697 a.]

Still the agreement of the ancient versions with the present Hebrew text affords a certain corroboration to that text, and should not be overlooked.

JA'ARIM (יָאָרִים, but the Kerî has "יָאָרִים"), i. e. Jasi (Israelites) makes, or is mother): and so the Vulg. (Jair), one of the Bene-Bani who had married a foreign wife, and had put her away (Ezr. x. 37). In the parallel list of 1 Esdras the name is not recognizable. The LXX. had a different text — καὶ ἑπιονάων = Ἰάρην.

JA'ASIEL (יָאָסֵיאל, [whom God created]): Ia'siála; [Vat. Aesíap]; Alex. Astia: Jasîch, son of the great Abner, ruler (יָאָסֵיאל) or prince (ינכט) of his tribe of Benjamin, in the time of David (1 Chr. xxviii. 21).

JA'AZANIAH (יָאָצָנְיָה) and ZE'ANIAH [whom Jehovah honours]: 1. YA'AZAN-YA'HU (יָאָצָנְיָה יָאָזָנְיָה) [Ieçóviás; [Vat. Ogóvías]: Jeconias), one of the "captains of the forces" who accompanied Johanan ben-Kareah to pay his respects to Gedaliah at Mizpah after the fall of Jerusalem (2 K. xxv. 29), and who appears afterwards to have assisted in restoring Jehoiachin's prey from his captives (comp. Jer. xii. 11). After that, he probably went to Egypt with the rest (Jer. xiii. 4, 5). He is described as the "son of the (not 'a') Maachathite." In the narrative of Jeremiah the name is slightly changed to ZEJANIAH.

2. YA'AZAN-YA'HU (Ieçóviás; Alex. Ieçóviás: Jeconias), son of Saklah, leader of the band of seventy of the elders of Israel, who were seen by Ezekiel worshipping before the idols on the wall of...

It is possible that he is identical with

3. YAAZAN-YAM' (I'cewiiain: Jezomin), son of Azur; one of the "princes" (נְבָנֵי) of the people against whom Ezekiel was directed to prophesy (Ez. xi. 1).

4. YAAZAN-YAM' (I'cewiiain: Jezomin), a Rechabite, son of Jeremiah. He appears to have been the sheik of the tribe at the time of Jeremiah's interview with them (Jer. xxxv. 3). [\'JHON-ADAM].

JAAZER and JAZER [helpers, Ges.; or place helpéd about, Fürst: see infra]. (The form of this name has much varied both in the A. V. and the Hebrew, though the one does not follow the other. In Num. xxxii. it is twice given Jazer and once Jazer, the Hebrew being in all three cases יָאָזֶר [?], i.e. Ya'ez'er. Elsewhere in Numbers and in Josh. iii. it is Jazer; but in Josh. xxi., in 2 Sam. xxiv., Isaiah and Jeremiah, Jazer: the Hebrew in all these is יָיָהֵזֶר, Ya'ez'er. In Chronicles it is also Jazer; but here the Hebrew is in the extended form of יָאָזֶר, Ya'ez'er, a form which the Samar. Codex also presents in Num. xxxii.

The LXX. have Ἰαζερ, but once [2 Sam. xxiv. 5] Ελασής, Alex. Ελασής — including the alluded Heb. particle, [and in 1 Chr. vi. 81, Vat. Εαζερ: xxvi. 31, Vat. Εαζερ, Alex. Εαζερ: Vulg. Jazer, Jaser, [Jazer]]. A town on the east of Jordan, in or near to Gilead (Num. xxxii. 1, 3; 1 Chr. xxvi. 31). We first hear of it in possession of the Amorites, and as taken by Israel after Heshbon, and on their way from thence to Bashan (Num. xxxii. 31). It was rebuilt subsequently by the children of Gad (xxxi. 35), and was a prominent place in their territory (Josh. xiii. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5). It was allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 39; 1 Chr. vi. 51), but in the time of David it would appear to have been occupied by Hebronites, i.e. descendants of Kohath (1 Chr. xxvi. 31). It seems to have given its name to a district of dependent or "daughter" towns (Num. xxxii. 32; A. V. "villages:" 1 Marc. v. 8), the "land of Jazer" (Num. xxxii. 1). In the "laborious" proclaimed over Moab by Isaiah and Jeremiah, Jazer is mentioned so as to imply that there were vineyards there, and that the cultivation of the vine had extended thither from Shihmah (Is. xvi. 8; 9; Jer. xxxiii. 32). In the latter passage, as the text at present stands, mention is made of the "sea of Jazer" (נַּחֲלִית הָיֶרֶשׁ). This may have been some pool or lake of water, or possibly is an ancient corruption of the text, the LXX. having a different reading — ποιημα 1. (See Gesenius, Sestiai, i. 556.)

Jazer was known to Eusebius and Jerome, and its position is laid down with minuteness in the Onomasticon as 10 (or 8, s. voc. Α'αζερ) Roman miles west of Philadelphia (Amman), and 15 from Heshbon, and as the source of a river which falls into the Jordan. Two sites bearing the names of Charet Seir and Es-Seir, on the road westward of Amman, were pointed out by Seetzen in 1806 (Reisen, 1864, i. 397, 398). The latter of these was passed also by Burckhardt (Syr. 364) at 2 hours a in Num. xxxi. 21, where the present Hebrew text (N. V. "strong").)

below Fœnis going south. The ruins may or may have been on the left (east) of the road, and below them and the road is the source of the Wâlir Seir (ウン), or Mîjeb es-Sîır (Sethzein), answering though certainly but imperfectly, to the nuxrib mu'attos of Eusebius. Seetzen conjectures that the sea of Jazer may have been at the source of this brook, considerable marshes or pools sometimes existing at these spots. (Comp. his early suggestion of the source of the Wâlir Seir, p. 393.) Seir, is shown on the map of Van de Velde as 9 Roman miles W. of Amman, and about 12 from Heshbon. And here, until further investigation, we must be content to place Jazer.

JAAZIYA'H (יָאָזֶיוֹיָהוּ, i.e. Ya'aziyahu [whom Jehovah consotes]) 'Oqiya' [Vat. Oqi'ma: Osaiu], apparently a third son, or a descendant, of Merari the Levite, and the founder of an independent house in that family (1 Chr. xxvi. 29, 27); neither he nor his descendants are mentioned elsewhere (comp. the lists in xxii. 21-23; Es. vi. 19, &c.). The word Bunu (בּוּנֵה), which follows Jaziazh, should probably be translated "his son," i.e. the son of Merari.

JAAZIEL (יָאָזֶיֵיאֵל, [ whom God consecutes]) 'Oqjia' [Vat. O'qa: Osia: Jaziel], one of the Levites of the second order who were appointed by David to perform the musical service before the ark (1 Chr. xv. 18). If Jaziel in ver. 20 is a contracted form of the same name — and there is no reason to doubt it (comp. Jesharelah and Asherah, 1 Chr. xxv. 2, 14) — his business was to "sound the psaltery on Amabom."* In the A. V. ed. 1611 the name is written Jaziel, as in the Bishops' Bible and the Vulgate.

JABAL (גְּבָל, [a stream]) 'Iṣbîa', [Alex. Ιαβάτα: Jebel]: the son of Lamech and Adah (Gen. iv. 20) and brother of Jubal. Though descended from a dweller in a city (ver. 17), he is described as the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle. Bochart (Hieroz. i. ii. c. 44, near the end) points out the difference between his mode of life and Abel's. Jubal's was a migratory life, and his possessions probably included other animals besides sheep. The shepherds who were before him may have found the land on which they dwelt sufficiently productive for the constant sustenance of their flocks in the neighborhood of their fixed abodes.

JABUK (גָּבֻו, [streaming forth, flowing], Sim. Ges.; [Iaββοκ; in Gen. xxxiii. 22, Rom.] 'Iaββοκ: Jebuk, [Juboc]), a stream which intersects the mountain range of Gilead (comp. Josh. xiii. 2, 5), and falls into the Jordan about midway between the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. There is great difficulty in interpreting two or three passages of Scripture in which the name Jekrok, as spoken of as the "border of the children of Ammon." The following facts may perhaps throw some light upon them: — The Ammonites at one time possessed the whole country between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, from the Jordan on the west to the wilderness on the east. They were driven out of it by Sihon king of the Amorites; and he was in turn expelled by the Israelites. Yet long subsequent to these events, the country was popularly called — the

and of the Ammonites," and was even claimed by them (Judg. xi. 12-22). For this reason the Jabbock is still called "the border of the children of Ammon" in Deut. xiii. 10, and Josh. xii. 2. Again, when the Ammonites were driven out by Sichon from their ancient territory, they took possession of the eastern plain, and of a considerable section of the eastern defiles of Gilead, around the sources and upper branches of the Jabbock. Rabbath-Ammon, their capital city (2 Sam. xi.), stood within the mountains of Gilead, and on the banks of a tributary to the Jabbock. This explains the statement in Num. xxi. 24—"Israel possessed his (Sichon's) land from Arnon unto Jabbock, unto the children of Ammon (יהודה לְיהוּדָה), for the border of the children of Ammon was strong"—the border among the defiles of the upper Jabbock was strong. This also illustrates Deut. ii. 36, "Only unto the land of the children of Ammon thou canst not go, unto every place of the torrent Jabbock ( SATA לַיהוּדָה), and unto the cities in the mountains, and every place which the Lord our God forbade." It was on the south bank of the Jabbock the interview took place between Jacob and Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 22); and this river afterwards became, towards its western part, the boundary between the kingdoms of Sichon and Og (Josh. xii. 3, 5). Emek-bias rightly places it between Gerasa and Philadelphia (Omne. s. v.); and at the present day it separates the province of Bella from Jebel Jyljan. Its modern name is Wady Zurco. It rises in the plateau east of Gilead, and receives many tributaries from both north and south in the eastern defiles of the mountain-range—one of these comes from Gerasa, another from Rabbath-Ammon; but all of them are mere winter streams. The Zurco cuts through Gilead in a deep, narrow defile. Throughout the lower part of its course it is fringed with thickets of cane and oleander, and the banks above are clothed with oak-forests. Towards its mouth the stream is perennial, and in winter often impassable.

* For other notices of the Jabbock, its history and scenery, the reader may see Robinson's Phys. Geogr. pp. 57, 139 f.; Tristram's Land of Israel, pp. 475, 553 (2d ed.); Stanley's S. of P. p. 200 (Amer. ed.); Porter's Handbook of Syria, p. 310 f.; and Lynch's Expedition to the Dead Sea, p. 253. The ford of Jabbock which Jacob crossed with his family on his return from Mesopotamia (Gen. xlviii. 13 f.) is pointed out at Kidmat Serka, on the great Damascus road through Gilead. A legend which contradicts the Biblical account assigns the passage to the Jordan, north of the Sea of Galilee. See Ritter's Gilead, page 290 (G. G. C. Gamm, N. of A. xiv. 228). The depression which marks the valley of the Zurco (Jabbock) can be seen from the heights near Bethel (Rob. Res. i. 444, 2d ed.).

JABEZ (ュー [dry, parched]: laBes [Vat. laBes]; Alex. laBes; Joseph. laBes) is a city of Stratum, the Upper Galilee of Israel (2 K. xv. 10, 13, 14).

[Gilead.] In its widest sense Gilead included the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. xxvii. 21) as well as the tribes of Gad and Reuben (Num. xxxii. 1-42) east of the Jordan—and of the cities of Gilead, Jabesh was the chief. It is first mentioned in connection with the cruel vengeance taken upon its inhabitants for not coming up to Mizpeh on the occasion of the fierce war between the children of Israel and the tribe of Benjamin. Every male of the city was put to the sword, and all virgins—to the number of 400—seized to be given in marriage to the 600 men of Benjamin that remained (Judg. xiii. 8-14). Nevertheless the city survived the loss of its males; and being attacked subsequently by Nahash the Ammonite, gave Saul an opportunity of displaying his prowess in its defense, and declaring himself worthy to be the king of his people by the children of Belial to his sovereignty (1 Sam. i. 1-15). Neither were his exhortations in behalf of this city unrequited; for when he and his three sons were slain by the Philistines in Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 8), the men of Jabesh-Gilead came by night and took down their corpses from the walls of Beth-shan where they had been exposed as trophies; then burnt the bodies, and buried the bones under a tree near Gilboa—observing a strict funeral fast for seven days (ibid. 13). David does not forget to bless them for this act of piety towards his old master, and his more than brother (2 Sam. ii. 5); though he afterwards had their remains translated to the ancestral sepulchre in the tribe of Benjamin (2 Sam. xxii. 14). As to the site of the city, it is not defined in the O. T., but EmesBes (Omne. s. v.) places it beyond Jordan, 6 miles from Pella on the mountain-road to Gerasa; where its name is probably preserved in the Wady Tribes, which, flowing from the east, enters the Jordan below Beth-shan or Scythopolis. According to Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. iii. 319), the ruin ed-Deir, on the S. side of the Wady, still marks its site.

JA'BEZ (יהודא who causes sorrow, Gez.: possibly a high place, Frärts.: laBes; Vat. רָכָּס [Rackas]; Alex. EmesBes: Jobes), apparently a place at which the families of the scribes (זָכָּס) resided, who belonged to the families of the Kenites (1 Chr. ii. 59). It occurs among the descendants of Salmon, who was of Judah; and closely connected with Rechabah the son of Eliezer, Moses' brother's son (1 Chr. xxvii. 25), and objects with Othniel the Kenizzite, who bore the name of Jabesh because he founded by his counsel (רָכָּס) a school (זָכָּס) of disciples called Tirathites, Shim'atites, and Sucathites." JABIN from Tal and, Tenworth, in Baxter's Lex. col. 966, where a similar derivation is given.

2. [1yavh2:3; Av. 1yavh2id, 1avh2:] The name occurs again in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 9, 10) in a passage of remarkable detail inserted in a genealogy again connected with Beth-lehem (ver. 4). Here a different force is attached to the name. It is made to refer to the sorrow (ncbc) with which his mother bore him, and also to his prayer that evil may not grieve (nuni) him. Jabez was "more honorable than his brethren," though who they were is not ascertainable. It is very doubtful whether any connection exists between this genealogy and that in ii. 50-53. Several names appear in both — Hur, Ephratah, Bethlehem, Zaraathites (in A. V. iv. 2 inaccurately "Zorath- ties"), Josh, Caleb; and there is much similarity between others, as Reehah and Reehah, Esthon and Esthendants; but any positive connection seems undemonstrable. The Targum repeats its identification of Jabez and Othmim.

These passages in the Targums are worthy of remark, not only because they exemplify the same habit of playing on words and seeking for derivations which is found in the above and many other passages of the Bible, both early and late, but also because, as often as not, the puns do not now exist in the Rabbinical Hebrew in which these paraphrases are written, although they appear if that Rabbinical Hebrew is translated back into Biblical Hebrew. There are several cases of this in the Targum above quoted, namely, on 1 Chr. ii. 55 (see Tirathim, Necathim, etc.), and others in the Targum on Ruth, in the additions to the genealogy at the end of that book. One example will show what is intended.

"Obed (y2)n22 was he who served the Lord of the world with a perfect heart."

"Served" in Biblical Hebrew is y2'n22, from the same root as Obed, but in the dialect of the Targum it is y2'n2'n, so that the allusion (like that in Coleridge's famous pun) exists, as it stands, neither for the eye nor the ear.

JA'BIN (יָבִין; [intelligent, First; one whom God observes], Gen.; 1 sa6; [Av. Alex. 1sa6: Jobin]). 1. King of Hazor, a royal city in the north of Palestine, near the waters of Meron, who organized a confederacy of the northern princes against the Israelite (Josh. xi. 1-3). He assembled an army, which the Scripture narrative merely compares to the sands for multitude (ver. 4), but which Josephus reckons at 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 20,000 chariots. Joshua, encouraged by God, surprised this vast army of allied forces "by the waters of Meron" (ver. 7); near Kedesh, according to Josephus, attired them, cut the horse-skins of their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire at a place which from that circumstance may have derived its name of Misapheth-Maim (Haller, On the Genealogies, p. 228). [MISAPHETH-MAIM.] It is probable that in consequence of this battle the confederate kings, and Jabin among them, were reduced to vassalage, for we find immediately afterwards that Jabin is safe in his capital, but during the ensuing wars (which occupied some a In Josh. xvi. 18, Joshua "turned back," and perhaps on some fresh rebellion of Jabin, inflicted on him a signal and summary vengeance, making Hazor an exception to the general rule of not burning the conquered cities of Canaan (xi. 1-14; Joseph. Ant. v. 1, § 18; Ewald, Gesch. ii. 328).

2. In Judg., 1la6 (Var. -Be'el): Alex. Ia6, Ia6 (Vat. -Be'el): Alex. Ia6, Ia6 (Var. -Be'el). A king of Hazor was defeated by Barak, whose army is described in much the same terms as that of his predecessor (Judg. iv. 3, 13), and who suffered precisely the same fate. We have already pointed out the minute similarity of the two narratives (Josh. xi.; Judg. iv., v.), and an attentive comparison of them with Josephus (who curiously omits the name of Jabin altogether in his mention of Joshua's victory, although his account is full of details) would easily supply further points of resemblance. [BARAK: DEMILALAH.] It is indeed by no means impossible that in the course of 150 years Hazor should have risen from its ashes, and even regained its preeminence under sovereigns who still bore the old dynastic name. But entirely independent considerations show that the period between Joshua and Barak could not have been 150 years, and indeed tend to prove that those two chiefs were contemporaries (Hervey, Gener. p. 228): and we are therefore led to regard the two accounts of the destruction of Hazor and Jabin as really applying to the same monarch, and the same event. What is to prevent us from supposing that dabin and his confederate kings were defeated both by Joshua and by Barak, and that distinct accounts of both victories were preserved? The most casual reader of the narrative cannot but be struck by the remarkable resemblance between the two stories. There is no ground whatever to throw doubts on the historical reality of the earlier narrative, as is done by Hasse (p. 120), Maurer (ad loc.), Studer (on Judges, p. 90), and De Wette (Com. p. 231), according to Keil, on Josh. xi. 10-13; and by Rosenmuller (Schr. Jds. xi. 11): but when the chronological arguments are taken into consideration, we do not (in spite of the difficulties which still remain) consider Havernick successful in removing the improbabilities which beset the common supposition that this Jabin lived long after the one which Joshua defeated. At any rate we cannot agree with Winer in denouncing any attempt to identify them with each other as the "ve plus alter of uncritical audacity." F. W. F.

JAB'NEEL (גַּבְנֵא, [God permits or causes to build]). The name of two towns in Palestine.

1. In O. T. Hebre.: [Vat. Aqar] Alex. Ia6, Ia6, in Asper. Ila6, Ia6, in Jown.: Jab'nel, Joum.: one of the towns on the northern boundary of Judah, not quite at the sea, though near it (Josh. xv. 11). There is no sign, however, of its ever having been occupied by Judah. Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 22) attributes it to the Danites. There was a constant struggle going on between that tribe and the Philistines for the possession of all the places in the lowland plain (Deut. xxiii. 11), and it is not surprising that the next time we meet with Jabnehel it should be in the hands of the latter (2 Chr. xxxi. 6). Uzziah dispossessed them of it, and demolished its fortifications. Here it is in the shorter form of the reo; probably reading y2'n22 for the press word y2'n22.

JABNEEL. In its Greek garb, IANNIA, it is frequently mentioned in the Maccabees (1 Mac. iv. 15, v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40), in whose time it was again a strong place. According to Josephus (Ant. xii. 8, § 6) Togrias was governor of it; but the text of the Maccabees (2 Mac. xiii. 2) has DUMMAEA. At this time there was a harbor on the coast, to which, and the vessels lying there, Judas set fire, and the conflagration was seen at Jerusalem, a distance of about 25 miles (2 Mac. xii. 9). The harbor is also mentioned by Fluni, who, in consequence speaks of the town as double — dua younes (see the quotations in Euland, p. 823). Like Ascalon and Gaza, the harbor bore the title of Majumus, perhaps a Coptic word, meaning the "place on the sea" (Euland, p. 590, &c.; Rannier, p. 174, note 184, note; Keunich, Punicin, pp. 27, 29). At the time of the fall of Jerusalem. Jabneh was one of the most populous places of Judea, and contained a Jewish school of great fame,* whose learned doctors are often mentioned in the Talmud. The same Jabnehflam was also held here. In this holy city, according to an early Jewish tradition, Rabbah * is buried the great Gamaliel. His tomb was visited by Parchi in the 14th century (Zuma, in Asher's Benj. of Tewel, ii. 439, 440: also 98). In the time of Eusebius, however, it had dwindled to a small place, πολιχνια, merely requiring casual mention (Onomasticon). In the 6th century, under Justinian, it became the seat of a Christian bishop (Epiphanius, o.e. Haec. lib. II. 750). Under the Crusaders it bore the corrupted name of Derlin, and gave a title to a line of Counts, one of whom, Jean d'Herlin, about 1230, restored to efficiency the famous code of the "Assises de Jerusalem" (Gibbon, ch. 58 ad fin.; also the citations in Rannier, P'bulinim, p. 185). The modern village of Yeboah, or more accurately Ibaa (יאב), stands about two miles from the sea, on a slight eminence just south of the Nahr Robin. It is about 11 miles south of Jaffa, 7 from Reemlaq, and 4 from Akir (Elron). It probably occupies its ancient site, for some remains of old buildings are to be seen, possibly relics of the fortress which the Crusaders built there (Porter, Handbook of the Holy Land, p. 274). Rannier (P'bulinim, p. 203, 4te Aufl.) regards Jabeln and Jabneh as probably the same. Fürst (Handb. i. 479) denies that they are the same, regarding Jabneh indeed as represented by Yeboah, but the site of Jabneh as lost. The traveller going from Enkal (Ashdod) to Yafa (Joppa) passes near Yeboah, conspicuous on a hill to the right, at the foot of which is a well from which the water is raised by a large wheel. The women of the village may be seen here in picturesque groups, with their water-skins and jars, at almost any hour. A slab of antique marble forms the front-piece of the watering-trough, and other similar fragments lie scattered here and there. At a little distance further south occur a few remains of a Roman aqueduct. The Gamaliel whose tomb is shown at Yeboah (see above) must be understood to be Gamaliel the younger, a grandson of the great rabbi, who was Paul's teacher. (See Sepp's Jezus. und die helle. Land, ii. 501.) The origin, studies, and fame of the Jewish school established at Jannia or Yeboah after the destruction of Jerusalem form an important chapter in the history of rabbinical and biblical literature. Lightfoot furnishes an out line of the subject (Ixxvi. 141—144, Anecd. in Luc. 1881). The best modern account of this section and its influence on the philosophy and religious ideas of the Jews is probably that of Dr. H. Graetz in the opening chapter of his Geschichte der Juden, vol. iv. (Berlin, 1853). The reader may see also Jost's Geschichte der Israeliten, iii. 185 ff.; and Dean Milman's History of the Jews, vol. ii. b. xxv. 151 ff.

1. (Iglmutha) Alex. l'abrah; [Comp. 'iabrah';] Jemnah. One of the landmarks on the boundary of Naphatli (Josh. xix. 33, only. It is named next after Adami-Nekeb, and had apparently Lakkuna between it and the "outgoings" of the boundary at the Jordan. But little or no clue can be got from the passage to its situation. Doubtless it is the same place which, as Izareina (180, § 37), and Izarein (B. J. ii. 20, § 6), is mentioned by Josephus among the villages in Upper Galilee, which, though strong in themselves (petrodes altas), were fortified by him in anticipation of the arrival of the Romans. The other villages named by him in the same connection are Netho, Achabare, or the rock of the Achabari, and Sepha. Schwarz (p. 181) mentions that the latter name of Jemnah was Kfar Yabush, the village by the sea. Taking this with the vague indications of Josephus, we should be disposed to look for its traces at the N. W. part of the Sea of Galilee, in the hill country.

* Or y'ina (Geschichte der Juden, iv. 18) speaks of this idea a renowned Jewish school at Jabneh before the fall of Jerusalem as unsounded. All its celebrity, if not its existence, was subsequent to that event. II.
JACOB, the son of Isaac and Rebekah. He was born with Esau, when Isaac was 60 and Abraham 159 years old, probably at the well Laban-roi. His history is related in the latter half of the book of Genesis. He grew up a quiet, domestic youth, the favorite son of his mother. He bought the birthright from his brother Esau; and afterwards, at his mother's instigation, acquired the blessing intended for Esau, by practicing a well-known deceit on Isaac. Hitherto the two sons shared the wanderings of Isaac in the South Country; but now Jacob, in his 78th year, was sent from the family home, to avoid his brother, and to seek a wife among his kindred in Padan-aram. As he passed through Bethel, God appeared to him. After the lapse of 21 years he returned from Padan-aram with two wives, two concubines, eleven sons, and a daughter, and large property. He escaped from the angry pursuit of Laban, from a rencontre with Esau, and from the vengeance of the Canaanites provoked by the murder of Shechem; and in each of these three emergencies he was aided and strengthened by the interposition of God, and in sign of the grace won by a night of wrestling with God his name was changed at Jabbok into Israel ("soldier of God"). Deborah and Rachel died before he reached Hebron; and it was at Hebron, in the 125th year of his age, that he and Esau buried their father Isaac. Joseph, the favorite son of Jacob, was sold into Egypt eleven years before the death of Isaac; and Jacob had probably exceeded his 130th year when he went thither, being encouraged in a divine vision as he pressed for the last time through Beer-sheba. He was presented to Pharaoh, and dwelt for seventeen years in Ram- ses and Goshen. After giving his solemn blessing to Ephraim and Manasseh, and his own sons one by one, and charging the ten to complete their reconciliation with Joseph, he died in his 147th year. His body was embalmed, carried with great care and pomp into the land of Canaan, and deposited with his fathers, and his wife Leah, in the cave of Machpehlah.

The example of Jacob is quoted by the first and the last of the minor prophets. Hosea, in the latter days of the kingdom, seeks (xii. 3, 4, 12) to convert the descendants of Jacob from their state of alienation from God, by recalling to their memory the repeated acts of God's favor shown to their ancestor. And Malachi (i. 2) strengthens the despoothing hearts of the returned exiles by assuring them that the love which God bestowed upon Jacob was not withheld from them. Besides the frequent mention of his name in conjunction with those of the other two Patriarchs, there are distinct references to events in the life of Jacob in four books of the N. T. In Rom. ix. 11-13, St. Paul adduces the history of Jacob's birth to prove that the favor of God is independent of the order of natural descent. In Heb. xii. 16, and xli. 21, the transfer of the birthright and Jacob's dying benediction are referred to as a parable and symbol of Messiah, and the possession of land at Shechem are cited in St. John i. 51, and iv. 5, 12. And St. Stephen, in his speech (Acts vii. 12-16), mentions the famine which was the means of restoring Jacob to his lost sons in Egypt, and the burial of the patriarch in Shechem. Such are the events of Jacob's life recorded in Scripture. Some of them require additional notice.

1. For the sale of his birthright to Jacob, Esau is branded in the N. T. as a "profane person" (Heb. xii. 16). The following sacred and important privileges have been mentioned as connected with primogeniture in patriarchal times, and as constituting the object of Jacob's desire. (a.) Superior rank in the family: see Gen. xii. 3, 4. (b.) A double portion of the father's property: so Aben Ezra see Buxt. xxi. 17, and Gen. xlix. 22. (c.) The priestly office in the patriarchal church: see Num. viii. 17-19. In favor of this, see Jerome ad Evang. Ep. lxxii. § 6; Jarchi in Gen. xxv.; Estius in Heb. xii.; Shuckford's Connection, bk. vii.; Blunt, Unkls. Council. pt. i. 1, §§ 2, 3; and against it, Vitringa, Obs. Sac., and J. D. Michaelis, Monistisch. Recht, ii. § 64, cited by Rosenmuller in Gen. xxv. (d.) A conditional promise or adoration in the heavenly inheritance: see Curtius in the Cfr. Sacr. on Gen. xxv. (e.) The promise of the seed in which all nations should be blessed, though not included in the birthright, may have been so regarded by the patriarchs, as it was by their descendants, Rom. ix. 8, and Shuckford, viii.

The whole subject has been treated in separate essays by Vitringa in his Obs. Sac. pt. i. 11, § 2; also by J. H. Hottinger, and by J. J. Schiirer, cited by W. C. Hottinger, in the Cyclopaedia.

2. With regard to Jacob's acquisition of his father's blessing, ch. xxviii., few persons will accept the excuse offered by Augustine, Serm. iv. § 22, 25, for the deceit which he practiced — that it was merely a figurative action, and that his personation of Esau was justified by his previous purchase of Esau's birthright. It is not however necessary, with the view of cherishing Christian hatred of sin, to heap opprobrious epithets upon a fallible man whom the choice of God has rendered vulnerable in the eyes of believers. Waterland (iv. 280) speaks of the conduct of Jacob in language which in the presence of a more vigorous brother: secretly stimulated by a belief that God designed for him some superior blessing, Jacob was perhaps in a fair way to become a narrow, selfish, deceitful, disappointed man. But, after dwelling for more than half a life-time in solitude, he is driven from home by the provoked hostility of his more powerful brother. Then in deep and bitter sorrow the outwardbecomeas, and after youth has passed, and finds himself brought first of all unexpectedly into that close personal communion with God which elevates the soul, and then into that enlarged intercourse with men which is capable of drawing out all the better feelings of human nature. An unseen world was opened. God revived and renewed to him that abounding promise over which he had brooded for three-score years, since he learned it in childhood from his mother. Angels conversed with him. Gradually he felt more and more the watchful care of an ever present spiritual Father. Face to face he wrestled with the Representative of the Almighty. And so, even though the moral consequences of his early transgressions hung about him, and saddened him with a deep knowledge of all the evil of treachery and domestic envy, and partial blindness, yet he felt himself to be the center of all the blessings which God had in store for him in his dearest earthly relations. As he nears the end of his life, Jacob's whole life becomes a series of religious experiences. The interest of the story is never lost. Jacob was a great self-reliant soul, and he was the subject of many warnings, whether in the form of dreams or in the words of an aged father. He listened to his dreams, and he heeded the warnings of his father. He was a man of great courage, and he was a man of great patience, and he was a man of great wisdom. He was a man of great love, and he was a man of great faith.

The impulse of the chosen family, the true inheritance of the promise of Abraham, was interwoven with the very essence of the character of the "plain man, dwelling in tents," steady, persevering, and modest, unafraid with deliberate settled purpose, through all the bitterness of suffering and of prosperity, of exile and return, of bereavement and recovery. The birthright is always before him. Rachel is won from Leah by hard services, and the seven years seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her. Isaac and Rebekah, and Rebekah’s nurse, are remembered with a faithful, filial remembrance; Joseph and Benjamin are long and passionately loved with a more parental affection, — bringing down his gray hairs for their sakes in sorrow to the grave. This is no character to be contumelied or scoffed at; if it was encompassed with much infirmity, yet its very complexity demands our reverent attention; in it are bound up, as his double name expresses, not one man, but two; by toil and struggle, Jacob, the Suphanniter, is gradually transformed into Israel, the Prince of God, and lower reasons are softened and purified away; he looks back over his long career with the fullness of experience and humility. "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies and of all the truth which thou hast shewn unto thy servant" (Gen. xxxii. 10). Alone of the patriarchal family, his end is recorded as invested with the solemnity of warning and of prophetic song, "Gather yourselves together, ye sons of Jacob; and hearken unto Israel your father." We need not fear to acknowledge that the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac was also the God of Jacob." (Jewish Church, p. 59 f.)

JADDA (τάκουμον; [Vat. Ιατρούμονον; Ακκυρ, 4.] ver. 32, Aκκυρον; [Vat. Ιατρούμονον; Ακκυρον; (Judea), son of Onam, and brother of Shammua, in the genealogy of the sons of Jeraubeel by his wife Arath (1 Chr. ii. 28, 32). This genealogy is very corrupt in the LXX., especially in the Vatican Codex.

JADDAU [2 ayl.] (τάκονον; but the Keri has τάκον; i.e. τακούμον; [Vat. Ιατρούμονον; Ιατρούμονον; (Juda), one of the Bene-Nebo who had taken a foreign wife, and was compelled by Ezra to relinquish her (Ezra xiv. 43).

JADDAU [2 ayl.] (τάκονον; [Vat. Ιατρούμονον; Ιατρούμονον; in Neh. xii. 22, Vat. ιατρούμονον; FAI. Άσον; (Jehoab), son, and successor in the high-priesthood of, Jonathan or Jehonathan. He is the last of the high-priests mentioned in the O. T., and probably altogether the latest name in the canon (Neh. xii. 22, 22), at least if 1 Chr. iii. 22-24 is admitted to be corrupt (see Geneal. of our Lord, pp. 101, 107). His name marks distinctly the time when the latest additions were made to the book of Nehemiah and the canon of Scripture, and perhps affords a clue to the age of Malachi the prophet. All that we learn concerning him in Scripture is the fact of his being the son of Jonathan, and high-priest. We gather also pretty certainly that he was priest in the reign of the last Persian king Darius, and that he was still high-priest after the Persian dynasty was overthrown, i.e. in the reign of Alexander the Great. For the expression "Parius the Person" must have been used after the accession of the Hellenic dynasty, and had another high-priest succeeded, his name would most likely have been mentioned. Thus far then the book of Nehemiah bears out the truth of Josephus's history, which makes Judas high-priest when Alexander invaded Judaea. But the story of his interview with Alexander [Hecatoi, vol. ii. p. 1072 b] does not on that account deserve credit, nor his account of the building of the temple on Mount Gerizim during Judas's pontificate, at the instigation of Sanballat, both of which, as well as the accompanying circumstances, are probably derived from some apocryphal book of Alexandrian growth, since lost, in which chronology and history gave way to romance and Jewish vanity. Judas seems to place the death of Judas before that of Alexander (4. J. xi. 8, 7). Eusebius assigns 20 years to Judas's pontificate (Geneal. of our Lord, 323 ff.; Selden, de Sacre; Prideaux, etc.). A. C. H.

JADDUA [τάκονον; as above; ίατρούμονον; [Vat. FAI. omit; Alex. Ιατρούμονον; Jebhuda), one of the chief of the people, i.e. of the haves, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 21).

JADON (τάκονον; [judge]; Eudeps in both MSS.; rather, in the Roman ed.; Vat. Alex. FAI. omit; Jada), a man, who in company with the Gibeonites and the men of Mizpah assisted to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7). His title, "the Meronothite" (comp. 1 Chr. xxvii. 30), and the mention of Gibeonites, would seem to point to a place Meronoth, and that in the neighborhood of Gibeon, but no such place has yet been traced.

Jadon (Κατάρας; is the name attributed by Josephus (Ant. viii. 8, 3) to the man of God from Judah, who witnessed Jerobeam at the altar at Bethel — probably intending Imro the seer. By Jerome (Gr. Heb. on 2 Chr. ix. 20) the name is given as Judas.

JATEL (τακούμον; [vindower, First, and hence wild goat]; Hex. Syr. Asenel; ιατρούμονον; [Vat. Ιατρούμονον; ιατρούμονον; Judah), the wife of Heber the Kenite. Heber was the chief of a nomadic Arab clan, who had separated from the rest of his tribe, and had pitched his tent under the oaks, which had in consequence received the name of seats of the wanderers" (v. 2, Ps. 83, v. 31), in the neighborhood of Kelel-Kapharāthoa [Kerebe; Kenezites]. The tribe of Heber had secured the quiet enjoyment of their pastures by adopting a neutral position in a troubous period. Their descent from Jethro secured them the favorable regard of the Israelites, and they were sufficiently important to conclude a formal peace with Jabin king of the Canaanites. In the headlong rout which followed the defeat of the Canaanites by Jerah, Sisera, abandoning his chariot the more easily to avoid notice (comp. Hom. ii. v. 20), fell unattended, and in an opposite direction from that taken by his army, to the tent of the Kenite chieftains. "The tent of Jerel" is expressly mentioned either because the harom of Heber was in a separate tent (Jasusaller, Mos. 9, iii. 22), or because the Kenite himself was absent at the time. In the sacred seclusion of this almost inviolable sanctuary, Sisera might well have felt himself absolutely secure from the incursions of the enemy (Calmet, Fragm. 111.)
and although he intended to take refuge among the Kenites, he would not have ventured so openly to violate all idea of oriental propriety by entering a woman's apartments (D'Herbelet, Bibl. Orient. s. v. "Haran"?), had he not received Jael's express, earnest, and respectful entreaty to do so. He accepted the invitation, and she flung a mantle over him as he lay wearily on the floor. When thirst prevaunted sleep, and he asked for water, she brought him butter-milk in her choicest vessel, thus ratifying with the semblance of officious zeal the sacred bond of eastern hospitality. Wine would have been less suitable to quench his thirst, and may possibly have been eschewed by Heber's clan (Jer. xxxi. 5). Butter-milk, according to the quotation in Harmer, is still a favorite Arab beverage, and that this is the drink intended we infer from Judges v. 23, as well as from the direct statement of Josephus (γάλα δεικτήθη χειρός, Ant. v. 5, § 4), although there is no reason to suppose with Josephus and the Rabbis (D. Kimchi, Jarchi, etc.), that Jael purposely used it because of its soporific qualities (Bochart, Hieroz. i. 473). But anxiety still prevailed in the breast of the lady until he had exacted a promise from his protec tess that she would faithfully preserve the secret of his concealment; till at last, with a feeling of perfect security, the weary and unfartunately general resignation to the deep sleep of misery and fatigue. Then it was that Jael took in her left hand one of the great wooden pins (A. V. "nail") which fastened down the cords of the tent, and in her right hand the mallet (A. V. "a hammer") used to drive it into the ground, and creeping up to his sleeping and confiding guest, with one terrible blow dashed it through Sisera's temples deep into the earth. With one spasm of fruitless agony, with one convulsion of sudden pain, "at her feet he bowed, he felt; where he bowed, there fell down dead" (Judg. v. 27). She then waited to meet the pursuing Barak, and led him into her tent that she might in his presence claim the glory of the deed! Many have supposed that by this act she fulfilled the saying of Deborah, that God would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman (Judg. iv. 9; Joseph. v. 5, § 4); and hence they have supposed that Jael was actuated by some divine and hidden influence. But the bible gives no hint of such an inspiration, and it is at least equally probable that Deborah merely intended to intimate the share of the honor which would be assigned by posterity to her own exertions. If therefore we eliminate the still more monstrous supposition of the Rabbis that Sisera was slain by Jael because he attempted to offer her violence—the murder will appear in all its hideous atrocity. A fugitive had asked, and received shelter (or protection) at her hands,—he was miserable, defeated, weary,—he was the ally of her husband,—he was her invited and honored guest,—he was in the sanctuary of the harm,—above all, he was confiding, defenseless, and adept; yet she broke her pledged faith, violated her solemn hospitality, and murdered a trustful and unprotected slumberer. Surely we require the clearest and most positive statement that Jael was instigated to such a murder by divine suggestion.

But it may be asked, "Has not the deed of Jael been praised by an inspired authority?" "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent" (Judg. v. 24). Without stopping to ask when and where Deborah claims for herself any infallibility, or whether, in the passionate moment of patriotic triumph, she was likely to pause in such wild times to scrutinize the moral bearings of an act which had been so splendid a benefit to herself and her people, we may question whether any moral commendation is directly intended. What Deborah stated was a fact, namely, that the wives of the nomad Arabs would undoubtedly regard Jael's conduct as a public benefactress, and praise her as a popular heroine. The suggestion of Gesenius (Thee., p. 608 b), Hollmann, and others, that the Jael alluded to in Judges v. 6 is not the wife of Heber, but some unknown Israelite judge, appears to us extremely unlikely, especially as the name Jael must almost certainly be the name of a woman (Prov. v. 19, A. V. "roe "). At the same time it must be admitted that the phrase "in the days of Jael" is one which we should hardly have expected.

F. W. F.

* This view of Gesenius that Jael (Judg. v. 6), is the name of a judge otherwise unknown, is also that of Furst, Bertheau, Wordsworth, and others. The name is masculine, and very properly used of a man, though such names were often borne by women. Cassel (Richter and Ruth, p. 50) denies that the wife of Heber can be meant in this instance, since Deborah was contemporary with her, and would hardly designate her own days as those of Jael. But to suppose with him that Shamgar mentioned in the other line is called Jael ("active," "chivalrous") merely as a complimentary epithet, seems far-fetched. From the order of the names, if this Jael was one of the judges, we should be led to place his time between Shamgar and Barak, and so have a more distinct enumeration of the long series of years during which the land was afflicted before the deliverance achieved by Deborah and her allies.

H. JAGUR (גֹּגֵר [lodging-place]). "A'gôr. Alex. Iawgôp. Jager), a town of Judah, one of those farthest to the south, on the frontier of Edom (Josh. xv. 21). Kabeed, one of its companions in the list, recurs subsequently; but Jager is not again met with, nor has the name been encountered in the imperfect explorations of that dreary region. The Jager, quoted by Schwarz (p. 99) from the Talmud as one of the boundaries of the territory of Ashkelon, must have been further to the N. W.

G.

JAH (יְהֹוָה; Kópios: Dominus). The abbreviated form of "Jehovah," used only in poetry. It occurs frequently in the Hebrew, but with a single exception (Ps. lxiiti. 4) is rendered "Lord" in the A. V. The identity of Jah and Jehovah is strongly marked in two passages of Josiah (xili. 2, xxvi. 4), the force of which is greatly weakened by the English rendering "the Lord." The former of these should be translated "for my strength and song is JAH JEHOVAH" (comp. Ex. xv. 2); and the latter, "trust ye in Jehovah for ever, for in ougle what the Samim was. Probably some part of the regular furniture of the tent.

a "Mantle" is here inaccurate; the word is יְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְנַעְn b Πασαλάαν, LXX.; but according to Ἰς-κόνις, σιδηρόν ἔλαον.

JAHATH (תַחַת, yahath). 1. Son of Libni, the son of Gershon, and the son of Levi (1 Chr. vi. 20). He was an ancestor to Asaph (ver. 45).

2. (1 Chr. vi.; Vat. 25.2). Head of a later house in the family of Gershon, being the eldest son of Shimeon, the son of Laadan. The house of Jahath existed in David's time (1 Chr. xxiii. 10, 11).

A. C. H.

3. (1 Chr.; Alex. omits: [Jahath]). A man in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 2), son of Reishah ben-Shoked. His sons were Ahmazai and Lahad, the families of the Zorathites. It Reishah and Haroeh are identical, Jahath was a descendant of Caleb ben-Hur. [HAROE1.]

4. (1 Chr.; Vat. 5.1; Alex. Isaac.). A Levite, son of Shelomoth, the representative of the Kohathite family of Ithahar in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 22).

5. (1 Chr.; Vat. 26.1.2; Comp. 1 Chr. 25.1). A Merarite Levite in the reign of Josiah, one of the overseers of the repairs of the Temple (2 Chr. xxxiv. 12).

JAHAZ, also JAHAZA, JAHAZAH, and JAHAZ. Under these four terms are given in the A. V. the name of a place which in the Hebrew appears as יְהָז (Jehaz) and יָהָז (Jehaz), the latter being in some cases—as Num. and Deut.—the particle of motion, but elsewhere an integral addition to the name. It has been uniformly so taken by the LXX., who have τασάδ, and twice τασάδ [once, namely, Judg. xi. 20, where Alex. reads ταόνα]. JAHAZ is found Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20; Is. xv. 4; Jer. xxxviii. 34. In the two latter only is it יְהָז, without the final י.

The Samaritan Cod. has יְהָז: Vulg. IAC.

At Jahaz the decisive battle was fought between the children of Israel and Sihon king of the Amorites, which ended in the overthrow of the latter and in the occupation by Israel of the whole pastoral country included between the Arnon and the Jabbok, the Βέλος of the modern Arabs (Num. xxii. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20). It was in the allotment of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), though not mentioned in the catalogue of Num. xxvi.; and it was given with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 78; and Josh. xxi. 36, though here omitted in the ordinary Hebrew text).

Jahazah occurs in the denunciations of Jeremias and Isaiah on the inhabitants of the "plain country," i.e. the Mishor, the modern Βέλος (Jer. xxxviii. 21, 34; Is. xxv. 4); but beyond the fact that at this period it was in the hands of Moab we know nothing of its history.

From the terms of the narrative in Num. xxvi. and Deut. ii., we should expect that Jahazah was in the extreme south part of the territory of Sihon, but yet north of the river Arnon (see bent. ii. 24, 30; and the words in 21, "begin to possess"), and in exactly this position a site named Jeruzalem is mentioned by Schwarz (227), though by him only.

But this does not agree with the statements of Eusebius (Onom. Ἱαθάζ), who says it was existing in his day between Medeba and Αμνῆς, by which he probably intends Dibon, which would place Jahaz considerably too far to the north. Like many others relating to the places east of the Dead Sea, this question must await further research. (See Ewald, Geschichte, ii. 296, 271.)

JAHAZA'Z (יָהָזָא, i. e. Yahazah [trodden down, threshing-floor]: Barad; Alex. Isaä: Joset), Josh. xiii. 18. [JAHAZ.]

JAHAZ'AH (יָהָזָא, i. e. Yah:izael [son of Jehovah, of Israel]): Vat. 'Iaqar; [Vat. FA. A-λαν] Isaä: Joset), son of Tivkah, apparently a priest; commemorated as one of the four who originally sided with Ezra in the matter of the foreign wives (Ezr. x. 15). In Esdras the name becomes Ezechias.

JAHAZIEL (יָהָזִיאֵל, i. e. Yah:izziel [son of Jehovah, of Israel]): Vat. 'Iaqar; [Vat. FA. A-λαν] Isaä: [Jehaziel]). A priest of the reign of David, whose office it was, in conjunction with Rehman, to blow the trumpet at the ministrations before the ark, when David had brought it to Jerusalem (1 Cor. xii. 6). [High-priest.]

3. (1 Chr. vi.; Alex. Isaä: [Vat. OA. A-λαν] Isaä: [Jehaziel]). A Kohathite Levite, third son of Hebron. His house is mentioned in the enumeration of the Levites in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 23).

A. C. H.

4. (Vat. OA. OA; Comp. 1 Chr. Isaä: [Jehaziel]). Son of Zechariah, a Levite of the Bnei-Asaph, who was inspired by the Spirit of Jehovah to animate Jehoshaphat and the army of Judah in a moment of great danger, namely, when they were anticipating the invasion of an enormous horde of Moabites, Ammonites, Mehumims, and other barbarians (2 Chr. xx. 14). Ps. lxxviii. is entitled a Psalm of Asaph, and this, coupled with the mention of Edom, Moab, Ammon, and others, in hostility to Israel, has seemed to connect it with the above event. [GEBAL.]

But, however desirable, this is very uncertain.

5. (Vat. OA. OA; Alex. omitt: Ezechiel). The "son of Jahaziel" was the chief of the Bnei-Shecaniah [sons of S.] who returned from Babylon with Ezra, according to the present state of the Hebrew text (Ezr. viii. 5). But according to the LXX. and the parallel passage in 1 Esdr. (viii. 32), he has ceased from the text, and it should read, "of the Bnei-Zatho" (probably Zattu), Shecaniah son of Jahaziel. In the latter place the name appears as Zechezel.

JAH'JAI (2 Chr. ii. 27, i. e. Yehdai [son of Jehovah, of Israel]): [Vat. Israä: [Vat. OA. OA: Jah:izziel], a man who appears to be thrust abruptly into the genealogy of Telsah, as the father of six sons (1 Chr. ii. 47). Various suggestions
JAHDEI

Regarding the name have been made: as that Gaze, the name preceding, should be Jahdae; that Jahda was a confluence of Caleb, etc.; but these are mere groundless suppositions (see Burrington, i. 216; Bertheau, ad loc.).

JAH'DIEL [ji'hah-dy-ul] [whom God makes joyful]: [Vat. Jeshunia;] Jedelch, one of the heroes who were heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).

JAH'DO [ji'hah-d0] [united, together]: Iesdai, as if the name had originally been יִשְׂדָא; comp. Jaasaiu, Jaazu; [Vat. Iosuaee; Comp. Iesdai;] Jesho, a Gadite named in the genealogies of his tribe (1 Chr. v. 14) as the son of Buz and father of Jeshiuai.

JAHLEEL [ji'hah-lil] [having in God]: 'Achore: Alex. Aqora, Aqole: Jahdel, [Juel], the third of the seven sons of Zebulun (Gen. xlv. 14; Num. xxv. 20), founder of the family of the JAHLEELITES. Nothing is heard of him or of his descendants.

JAHLEELITES, THE [ji'hah-lil'ites]: 6 'Aqole [Vat. 'Lelai;] Jelilite. A branch of the tribe of Zebulun, descendants of Jahdel (Num. xxvi. 20). W. A. W.

JAH'MAI [ji'hah-mai] (ji'hah-may) [whom Jehovah guards]: 'Ishai: [Vat. Eiskar; Alex. Eseous; Jemii], a man of Issachar, one of the heads of the house of Tola (1 Chr. vii. 2).

JAH'ZAH [ji'hah-zah] [a place stamped, threshing-floor]: [Vat. omits: Jasaos], 1 Chr. vi. 78. [Jehaz.]

JAHZEEL [ji'hah-zel] [God appor- tions]: 'Oseha: [Vat.1 in Num. '-Xa]; Josiel, the first of the four sons of Naphtali (Gen. xlv. 24), founder of the family of the JAHZEELITES. [Vat. 'Xosjil;] [Vat. omits: Josio], Num. xxvi. 48. His name is once again mentioned (1 Chr. vii. 13) in the slightly different form of JAHZIEL.

JAHZEELITES, THE [ji'hah-zel'ites]: 6 'Osehl: [Vat.1 Jseilei, 2. m. Agsahai;] Jeselites. A branch of the Naphtalites, descended from Jahzeel (Num. xxvi. 48).

JAHZERAH [ji'hah-zer-ah] [whom God leads back]: 'Effahs [or 'Effah;] Vat. Iesdai: Alex. Ichous [or 'Ichus];] Jevisa, a priest, of the house of Immer; ancestor of Masaias (read Masaih), one of the courses which returned (1 Chr. ix. 12). [Jehoshiah.]

In the duplicate passage in Neh. xi. 13 he is called יִשְׁדָא, Yehoshia, and all the other names are much varied.

* JAILOR. [Prison; Punishments.]

JAI'ZIEL [jih-zi'ul] [God alloats or appor- tions]: 'Izsih: [Vat. Ieserai;] Josiel, the form in which the name of the first of Naphtali's sons, elsewhere given JAHZEEL, appears in 1 Chr. vii. 13 only.

JAIR (jihr) [whom Jehovah enlightens]: Iesep; [Vat. commonly Ie thief: Alex. Iesep, Yhr,]

a This verse would seem not to refer to the original Jair, the nomad leader, who roamed the heaths of Palestine, the Kenites, and the Moabites - but rather to their recapture. The accurate rendering is said to be, "and Gehur and Aran took the Havvoth-Jair from them, with Kenath and her daughter Beth-horon, sixty cities" (Bertheau, Chronic., p. 164.)

have sprung from the great Jair of Manasseh, or some lesser person of the name.

JAIRUS [3 syl.]. 1. (ταίπος; [JAIROS], a rufta or basket, probably in some cave near the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. He was the father of the maiden whom Jesus restored to life (Matt. ix. 18; Mark v. 22; Luke viii. 41). The name is probably the Grecized form of the Hebrew Jair.

* It has been questioned whether the daughter of Jairus was really dead and raised to life again by the power of Jesus, or lay only in a state of insensibility. Among others Olshausen (Bild. Comm. i. 321 ff.) and Robinson (Lexicon, of the Y. T., p. 362) entertain the latter view. The doubt has arisen chiefly from the fact that the Saviour said of the dame, "She is not dead, but sleepeth" (Matt. ix. 24). The usual verb for describing death as a sleep, it is, true, is a different one (κωπέον, see John xi. 11 ff.); but the one which the Saviour employed in this instance (κατασκηνεῖται) is also used of the dead in 1 Thess. v. 10, where "whether we wake or sleep" is equivalent to "whether we are alive or dead." Hence we may attach the same figurative sense to the word as applied in the passage before us. It was a peculiarly expressive way of saying that in its relation to Christ's power death was merely a slumber: he had only to speak the word, and the lifeless rose at once to consciousness and activity. But there are positive reasons for understanding that Christ performed a miracle on this occasion. The dame lay dying when the father went in pursuit of Jesus (Luke viii. 42); shortly after that she was reported as dead (Mark v. 35); and was bewailed at the house with the lamentation customary on the decease of a person (Mark v. 38 ff.). The idea that she was asleep merely was regarded as absurd (Matt. ix. 24); and Luke states expressly (viii. 55) that "her spirit came again" to her on being commanded to arise. The mourners and the crowd "were astonished with a great astonishment" at what they beheld or heard related (Mark v. 42); and the Saviour permitted that impression to remain with them.

One other circumstance in this account deserves notice. Our Lord on arriving at the house of Jairus found the mourners already singing the dirge, and the "ministers" (αὐτομανεῖοι, "the players," performing their part in the service (Matt. ix. 23). On that custom, see De Wette's Hebr. Archaeologie, § 265 (4th Edit.).

Mr. Lane mentions that it is chiefly at the funerals of the rich among the modern Egyptians that musicians are employed as mourners. (Modern Egyptians, ii. 287, 297.) It is not within the ability of every family to employ them, as they are professional actors, and their presence involves some expense. The same thing, as a practical result, was true, no doubt, in ancient times; hence "the minstrels" very properly appear in this particular history. Jairus, the father of the dame, whom Christ restored to life, being a ruler of the synagogue, was a person of some rank among his countrymen. In such a family the most decent style of performing the last sad offices would be observed. Further, the narrative shows, without any interval between the daughter's death and the commencement of the wailing. This agrees with the present oriental custom; for when the death of a person is expected, preparations are often made so as to have the lament begin almost as soon as the last breath is drawn.

2. (ταίπος [Vat. ιερίπος]) Euth. xi. 2. [Jair.]

JAKEH

JA'KAN (יָֽאָ֜קָּן, intelligent, sagacious); אֲקַר: [Vat. אֲאר] Lex. [Avvaar kar] Ḫōmā' (Joseph), son of Exor the Horite (1 Chr. i. 42). The name is identical with that more commonly expressed in the A. V. as JA'AKAN. And see AKAN.

JAKEH (יָֽקָּי) and in some MSS. נָֽקִי [see infra], which is followed by a MS. of the Targum in the Cambridge Univ. Libr., and was evidently the reading of the Vulgate, where the whole clause is rendered symbolically - "Verba congregantis filii remansit." The A. V. of Prov. xxx. 1, following the authority of the Targum and Syriac, has represented this as the proper name of the father of Agur, whose sayings are collected in Prov. xxx., and such is the natural interpretation. But beyond this we have no clue to the existence of either Agur or Jakeh. Of course if Agur be Solomon, it follows that Jakeh was a name of David of some mystical significance. But for this there is not a shadow of support. Jarchi, fixing on the two names, explains the clause, "the words of Solomon, who gathered understanding and vomited it," evidently having before him the reading נָֽקִי, which he derived from נָֽקִי, "to vomit." This explanation, it needs scarcely be said, is equally characterized by elegance and truth. Others, adopting the form נָֽקִי, and connecting it with נָֽקִים or as First gives נָֽקִים, יָֽקִים, "obedience," apply it to Solomon in his late repentance. But these and the like are the merest conjectures. If Jakeh be the name of a person, as there is every reason to believe, we know nothing more about him, if not, there is no limit to the symbolic meanings which may be extracted from the clause in which it occurs, and which change with the ever-shifting ground of the critic's point of view. That the passage was early corrupted is clear from the rendering of the LXX., who insert χ. xxx. 1-14 in the middle of ch. xxiv. The first clause they translate τοὺς ιωδοὺς λόγους, υἱός, φοβηθήσεται, καὶ δειδεμενος αὐτὸς μεταφερεται - "My son, fear my words, and, having received them, repent: "a meaning which at first sight seems hard to extract from the Hebrew, and which has therefore been abandoned as hopelessly corrupt. But a slight alteration of one or two letters and the vowel-points will, if it do no more, at least show how the LXX. arrived at their extraordinary translation. They must have read כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'ך כד'א'�, in which the letters of the last word are slightly transposed, in order to account for μεταφεραται. In support of this alteration see Zech. xi. 5, where כד'א'ך is rendered μετασφατων. b The Targum

and Syriac point to different readings also, though not where Jakob is concerned. Hitzig (die Spräche Solomon's), unable to find any other explanation, has recourse to an alteration of the text as violent as it is unauthorized. He proposes to read וַיְנַהֲלְךָ חַרְוָי (2 Sam. 12, 12), "the son of her whose obedience is Massa;" which, to say the least of it, is a very remarkable way of indicating "the queen of Massa." But in order to arrive at this reading he first adopts the rare word חַרְוָי (which only occurs in the const. state in two passages, Gen. xix. 10, and Prov. xxx. 17), to which he attaches the unusual form of the pronoun suffix, and ekes out his explanation by the help of an elliptical and highly poetical construction, which is strangely out of place in the bold prose handling of the chapter. Yet to this theory Bertheau yields a coy assent ("nicht ohne Zögern," die Spr. Sid. Einl. p. xviii.); and thus Agur and Lemuel are brothers, both sons of a queen of Massa, the former being the reigning monarch (Prov. xxxxi. 1).

ןָהֲלָתָה, "prophesy" or "burlen," is considered as a proper name and identical with the region named Massa in Arabia, occupied by the descendants of a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxi. 14; 1 Chr. i. 30), and mentioned in connection with Dumea. This district, Hitzig conjectures, was the same which was conquered and occupied by the 500 Simeonites, whose predatory excursion in the reign of Hezekiah is narrated in 1 Chr. iv. 41-44. They are there said to have annihilated the Amalekites in Mount Seir, and to have seized their country. That this country was Massa, of which Lemuel was king, and that Agur was a descendant of the conquering Simeonites, is the opinion of Hitzig, approved by Bunsen. But the latter, retaining the received text, and considering Jakob as a proper name, takes נָהֲלָתָה, hamammab, as if it were נָהֲלָתָה, hamammasi, a gentilic name, "the man of Massa," supporting this by a reference to Gen. xv. 2, where נָהֲלָתָה, Denunmeh, is apparently used in the same manner (Biblereck, i. cxxxviii.). There is good reason, however, to suspect that the word in question in the latter passage is an interpolation, or that the verse is in some way corrupt as the rendering of the Chaldee and Syriac is not supported by the ordinary usages of Hebrew, though it is adopted by the A. V., and by Gesenius, Kro-

\[a\] Here as generally in the English edition of this work, Cod. B, or the Vatican manuscript 1209, is confounded with the Roman edition of 1587. The Vatican manuscript (B) does not contain the books of Macabees.

\[b\] The name itself will perhaps repay a few moments' consideration. As borne by the Apostles and their contemporaries in the N. T., it was of course Jacob, and it is somewhat remarkable that in them it reappears for the first time since the patriarch himself. In the unchangeable East St. James is still St. Jacob — Mgr Yakob; but no sooner had the name left the shores of Palestine than it underwent a series of curious and interesting changes probably unparallelled in any other case. To the Greeks it became Ιακώβος, with the accent on the first syllable; to the Latins, Ιακόβ, doubtless similarly accented, since in Italian a Ιακοβο is Gracioso [also Jacobo]. In Spain it was JAMBRI. Shortly after the death of Judas Maccabaeus (c. b. 161), "the children of Janihi" are said to have made a predatory attack on a detachment of the Maccabean forces and to have suffered reprimands (1 Macc. ix. 39-41). The name does not occur elsewhere, and the variety of readings is considerable: Ιακώμην, Cod. B; a [Ιακώμην]. Ιακώμβους, Cod. A; [Σιν. Αμπάμη, Ιακώμην] alli, "Αμπάμη, "Αμπάμη; Syr. Ambrey. It has been conjectured (Drusius, Michaelis, Grimm, 1 Macc. ix. 36) that the original text was μάκΜάκ, "the sons of the Amorites," and that the reference is to a family of the Amorites who had in early times occupied the town Medeba (ver. 36) on the borders of Idumea (Num. xxx. 30, 31).

JAMES (Ἰακώβος, Jacobus); the name of several persons mentioned in the N. T.

1. JAMES THE SON OF ZEBEDEE. This is the only one of the Apostles of whose life and death we can write with certainty. The little that we know of him we have on the authority of Scripture. All else that is reported is idle legend, with the possible exception of one tale, handed down by Clement of Alexandria to Eusèbius, and by Eusebius to us. With this single exception the line of denunciation is drawn clear and sharp. There is assumed two forms, apparently of different origins: Ιακώβ — in modern Spanish Diego, Portuguese, Tungo — and Xayene or Xajane, pronounced Hayne, with a strong initial guttural. In France it became Jacob; but another form was Jean, which appears in the metrical life of St. Thomas à Becket by Girardier (A. 9, 1170-74), quoted in Robertson's Becket, p. 135. Not from this lost the transition to our James is easy. When it first appeared in English, or through what channel, the writer has not been able to trace. Possibly it came from Scotland, where the name was a favorite one. It exists in Wyville's Bible (1551). In Russia, and in Germany and the countries more immediately related to this, the name has retained its original form, and accordingly there alone there would seem to be no distinction between Jacob and James; which was the case even in medieval Latin, where Jacob and Jacobus were always indiscriminated. Its modern dress, however, sits very lightly on the name; and we see in "Jacobite" and "Jacobin" how ready it is to throw it off, and, like a true Oriental, reveal its original form.

[1] Xayene or Xajane, [also Jacobo]. In Spain it no fear of confounding the St. James of the New Testament with the hero of Compostella.

Of St. James's early life we know nothing. We first hear of him A. D. 27, when he was called to be our Lord's disciple; and he disappears from view A. D. 44, when he suffered martyrdom at the hands of Herod Agrippa I. We proceed to thread together the several pieces of information which the inspired writers have given us respecting him during these seventeen years.

I. His History.—In the spring or summer of the year 27, Zebedee, a fisherman, but possessed at least of competence (Mark i. 20), was out on the Sea of Galilee, with his two sons, James and John, and some boatmen, whom either he had hired for the occasion, or who more probably were his usual attendants. He was engaged in his customary occupation of fishing, and near him was another boat belonging to Simon and Andrew, with whom he and his sons were in partnership. Finding themselves unsuccessful, the occupants of both boats came ashore, and began to wash their nets. At this time the new Teacher, who had now been ministering about six months, and with whom Simon and Andrew, and in all probability John, were already well acquainted (John i. 41), appeared upon the beach. He requested leave of Simon and Andrew to address the crowds that docked around him from their boat, which was lying at a convenient distance from the shore. The discourse being completed, and the crowds dispersing, Jesus desired Simon to put out into the deeper water, and to try another cast for fish. Though reluctant, Simon did as he was desired, through the awe which he already entertained for One who, he thought, might possibly be the promised Messiah (John i. 41, 42), and whom even now he addressed as "Rabbi" (ἐρωτάτα, Luke v. 5, the word used by this Evangelist for ἀπόστωλος). Astonished at the success of his draught, he beckoned to his partners in the other boat to come and help him and his brother in landing the fish caught. The same amazement communicated itself to the sons of Zebedee, and flushed conviction on the souls of all the four fishermen. They had doubted and mused before; now they believed. At His call they left all, and became, once and for ever, His disciples, hereafter to catch men.

This is the call of St. James to the discipleship. It will be seen that we have regarded the events narrated by St. Matthew and St. Mark (Matt. iv. 18-22; Mark i. 16-20) as identical with those related by St. Luke (Luke v. 1-11), in accordance with the opinion of Hammond, Lightfoot, Mahlonatus, Lardner, Trench, Wordsworth, etc.; not as distinct from them, as supposed by Alford, Greswell, etc.

For a full year we lose sight of St. James. He is then, in the spring of 28, called to the apostleship with his eleven brethren (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 14; Luke vi. 13; Acts i. 13). In the list of the Apostles given us by St. Mark, and in the book of Acts, his name occurs next to that of Simon Peter: in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke it comes third. It is clear that in these lists the names are not placed at random. In all four, the names of Peter, Andrew, James, and John are placed first; and it is plain that these four Apostles were at the head of the twelve throughout. Thus we see that Peter, James, and John, alone were admitted to the miracle of the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark v. 37; Luke viii. 51). The same three Apostles alone were permitted to be present at the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ii. 9; Luke ix. 28). The same three alone were allowed to witness the Agony (Matt. xxvi. 37; Mark xiv. 33). And it is Peter, James, John, and Andrew who ask our Lord for an explanation of his dark sayings with regard to the end of the world and his second coming (Mark xiii. 3). It is worthy of notice that in all these places, with one exception (Luke ix. 28), the name of James is put before that of John, and that John is twice described as "the brother of James" (Mark v. 37; Matt. xvi. 1). This would appear to imply that at this time James, either from age or character, took a higher position than his brother. On the last occasion on which St. James is mentioned we find this position reversed. That the prominence of these three Apostles was founded on personal character (as out of every twelve persons there must be two or three to take the lead), and that Simon, John, and Peter were encouraged by them "quos Dominus, ordinis servandi causâ, ceteris praemium," as King James I. has said (Preflat. Mon. in Apol. pro Jur. Fid.), can scarcely be doubted (cf. Eusebius, ii. 14).

It would seem to have been at the time of the appointment of the twelve Apostles that the name of Barnabas [Βαρναβᾶς] was given to the sons of Zebedee. It might, however, like Simon's name of Peter, have been conferred before. This name plainly was not bestowed upon them because they heard the voice like thunder from the cloud (Jerome), nor because "divina eorum praedictio magnum quendam et illustre solutum per terram orbem daturum creat" (Vict. Autioch.). nor ἀπεκτάσεως ἄνωθεν καὶ θεολογικῶν (Theoph.), but it was, like the name given to Simon, at once descriptive and prophetic. The "Rockman" had a natural strength, which was described by his title, and he was to have a divine strength, predicted by the same title. In the same way the "Sons of Thunder" had a burning and impetuous spirit, which twice exhibits itself in its unchastened form (Luke ix. 54; Mark x. 37), and which, when moulded by the Spirit of God, taking different shapes, led St. James to be the first apostolic martyr, and St. John to become the most personal and interesting of the Apostles of Love.

The first occasion on which this natural character manifests itself in St. James and his brother is at the commencement of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem in the year 30. He was passing through Samaria; and now courting rather than avoiding publicity, he "sent messengers before his face" into a certain village, "to make ready for him" (Luke ix. 52), i.e. in all probability to announce to him the Messiah. The Samaritans, with their old jealousy strong upon them, refused to receive him, because he was going to Jerusalem instead of to Gerizim; and in exasperation James and John entreated their Master to follow the example of Elijah, and call down fire to consume them. The rebuke of their Lord is testified to by all the New Testament MSS. The words of the rebuke: "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of," rest on the authority of the Codex Bezae, that village is commonly known to the members of the Latin Church in that district as San Giovanni [Jarno].
JAMES

and a few MSS. of minor value. The rest of the verse, "For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them," is an insertion without authority of MSS. (see Alford, in loc.1)

At the end of the same journey a similar spirit appears again. As they went up to Jerusalem our Lord declared to his Apostles the circumstances of his coming Passion, and at the same time strengthened them by the promise that they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. These words seem to have made a great impression upon Salome, and she may have thought her two sons quite as fit as the sons of Jona to be the chief ministers of their Lord in the mysteries kingdom which he was about to assume. She approached therefore, and besought, with perhaps a special reference in her mind to Peter and Andrew, that her two sons might sit on the right hand and on the left in his kingdom, i.e. according to a Jewish form of expression (Joseph. Ant. vi. 11, § 9), that they might be next to the King in honor. The two brothers joined with her in the prayer (Mark x. 35). The Lord passed by their petition with a mild and soothing reply, showing that the reputation of John had increased, and that of James diminished, by the time that St. Luke wrote: and secondly, that he perished not by stoning, but by the sword. The Jewish law laid down that if seducers to strange worship were few, they should be stoned; if many, that they should be beheaded. Either therefore Herod intended that James's death should be the beginning of a sanguinary persecution, or he merely followed the common practice of stoning to death from preference (see Lightfoot, in loc.).

The death of so prominent a champion left a huge gap in the ranks of the infant society, which was filled partly by St. James, the brother of our Lord, who now steps forth into greater prominence in Jerusalem, and partly by St. Paul, who had now been seven years a convert, and who shortly afterwards set out on his first apostolic journey.

III. Chronological recapitulation.—In the spring or summer of the year 27 James was called to be a disciple of Christ. In the spring of 28 he was appointed one of the Twelve Apostles, and at that time probably received, with his brother, the title of Bonerger. In the autumn of the same year he was admitted to the miraculous raising of Jairus's daughter. In the spring of the year 29 he witnessed the Transfiguration. Very early in the year 30 he urged his Lord to call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritan village. About three months later in the same year, just before the final arrival in Jerusalem, he and his brother made their ambitions request through their mother Salome. On the night before the Crucifixion he was present at the Agony in the Garden. On the day of the Ascension he is mentioned as persevering with the rest of the Apostles and disciples in prayer. Shortly before the day of the Passover, in the year 44, he was put to death. Thus during fourteen out of the seventeen years that elapsed between his call and his death we do not even catch a glimpse of him.

   b The same form is common throughout the East.
   d The great Armenian convent at Jerusalem on the southwest Mount Zion is dedicated "St. Peter the son of Zebedee." The church of the convent, or rather a small chapel on its northeast side, occupies the traditions site of his martyrdom. This, however, can hardly be the actual site (Williams, Holy City, ii. 558). Its most interesting possession is the chair of the Apostle, a venerable relic, the age of which is perhaps traceable as far back as the 4th century (Williams, 560). But as it would seem that it has hitherto been supposed to belong to "the first Bishop of Jerusalem," it is doubtful to which of the two Jameses the tradition would attach it.

hesitation, the Apostle kissed him, saying, "Peace be to thee!" and they were beheld together. This tradition is preserved by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 6). There is no internal evidence against it, and the external evidence is sufficient to make it credible, for Clement flourished as early as A. D. 195, and he states expressly that the account was given him by the Lord himself before him.

For legends respecting his death and his connection with Spain, see the Roman Breviary (in Fest. S. Jac. Ap.), in which the healing of a paralytic and the conversion of Hermogenes are attributed to him, and where it is asserted that he preached the Gospel in Spain, and that his remains were translated to Compostella. See also the fourth book of the Apostopolitan History written by Abdon, the (pseudo) first bishop of Barclony (Abdon, Histo- riae primi Episcopi ab Apostolis constitutae, de his- toria Certaminis Apostolici Libri decem, Paris, 1666); Isisobor, De vita et obitu SS. utriusque Test. As there is no shadow of foun- dation for any of the legends here referred to we pass them by without further notice. Even Baronius shows himself ashamed of them: Estius gives them up as hopeless; and Tillemont rejects them with as much contempt as his position would allow him to show. Ephesians, without giving or probably having any authority for or against his statement, reports that St. James died unmarried (S. Epiph. Adc. Her. ii. 4, p. 491, Paris, 1622), and that, like his namesake, he lived the life of a Nazarite (obd. iii. 2, 13, p. 1045). As himself.

8. JAMES THE SERVANT OF GOD AND OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST. James i. 1.

We reserve the question of the authorship of the epistle for the present.

St. Paul identifies for us Nos. 3 and 7 (see Gal. ii. 9 and 12 compared with i. 19). If we may translate ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου, Judas the brother, rather than the son of James, we may conclude that 5 and 6 are identical. And that we may so translate it, is proved, if proof were needed, by Winer (Grammatik der Idioms der N. T., translated by Agnew and Ebleke, New York, 1840, §§ 616. and xxx.), by Hinckle (Handb. der Erkl. in die Schriften des Neuen Test., Erlangen, 1880), by Arndt (Recherches critiques sur l'Épître de Jude, Strasbourg, 1851).

We may identify 9 and 6 with 3 because we know that James the Lord's brother had a brother named Jude.

We may identify 4 with 3 because we know James the son of Mary had a brother named Joseph, and so also had James the Lord's brother.

Thus there remain two only, James the son of Alphæus (2.), and James the brother of the Lord (5.), for we, or can we not, identify them? This requires a longer consideration.

1. By comparing Matt. xxvii. 56 and Mark xv. 40, with John xix. 25, we find that the Virgin Mary had a sister named like herself, Mary, who was the wife of Clopas, and who had two sons, James the Little, and Joseph. It has been suggested that "Mary the wife of Clopas" in John xix. 25 need not be the same person as "his mother's sister" (Kitto, Lange, Davidson), but the Greek will not admit of this construction without the addition or the omission of a καί. By referring to Matt. xiii. 55 and Mark vi. 3 we find that a James and a Joseph, with two other brethren called Jude and Simon, and at least three (πιστεύονται) sisters, were living with the Virgin Mary at Nazareth. By referring to Luke vi. 16 and Acts i. 13 we find that there were two brethren named James and Jude and, at least, two sisters, Lucina and Mary. It is altogether natural to think that we had here but one family of four brothers and three or more sisters, the children of Clopas and Mary, nephews and nieces of the Virgin Mary. There are difficulties, however, in the way of this conclusion. For, (1) the four brethren in Matt. xiii. 55 are described as the brothers (ἀδελφοί) of Jesus, not as His consis; (2) they are found living as at their home with the Virgin Mary, which seems unusual if she were their aunt, their mother being, as we know, still alive; (3) the James of Luke vi. 15 is described as the son not of Clopas, but of Alphæus; (4) the "brethren of the Lord" (who are plainly James, Jude, Joseph, and Simon) appear to be excluded from the Apostolic band by their declared and explicit in his Mes- siahship (John vii. 5-35) and by being formally dis- tinguished from the disciples by the Gospel-writers (John xxi. 2; Acts i. 14): (5) James and Jude are not designated as the Lord's brethren in the lists of the Apostles; (6) Mary is designated as mother of James and Joseph, whereas she would have been called mother of James and Jude, and James and Jude been Apostles, and Joseph not an Apostle (Matt. xxvii. 56).

These are the six chief objections which may be made to the hypothesis of there being but one family of brethren named James, Joseph, Jude, and Simon. The following answers may be given:

Object 1. — "They are called brethren." It is a sound rule of criticism that words are to be understood in their most simple and literal acceptation; but there is a limit to this rule. When greater difficulties are caused by adhering to the literal meaning of a word, than by interpreting it more liberally, it is the part of the critic to interpret more liberally, rather than to cling to the ordinary and literal meaning of a word. Now it is clearly not necessary to understand ἀδελφοί as "brothers" in the nearest sense of brotherhood. It need not mean more than rather (comp. LXX. Gen. xiii. 8, xiv. 14, xx. 12, xxiii. 21, xxiv. 23; Lev. xxv. 48; Deut. ii. 8; Job xiv. 15, xlii. 11; Gen. x. 14.); § 47: Isra. Penaot, 29; Plut. Phal. 57; Crit. 16; see also Civ. ad Att. 15: Tac. Ann. iii. 38; Quint. Curt. vi. 10, § 34; comp. Suidas and Schollen, in voc.). But perhaps the circum
names of the case would lead us to translate it brethren? On the contrary, such a translation appears to produce very great difficulties. For, first, it introduces two sets of four first-cousins, bearing the same names of James, Joses, Jude, and Simon, who appear upon the stage without anything to show which is the son of Clopas, and which his brother James, and secondly, it drives us to choose between three doubtful and improbable hypotheses as to the parentage of this second set of James, Joses, Jude, and Simon. There are three such hypotheses: (a.) The Eastern hypothesis, that they were the children of Joseph by a former wife. This notion originated in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (Orig. in Matt. xiii. 35, Op. tom. iii. p. 402, E. ed. Deharo), and was adopted by St. Epiphanius, St. Hilary, and St. Ambrose, and handed on to the later Greek Church (Ephiph. Har. xxvii. 1, Op. tom. i. p. 115; Hill. in Matt. i. St. Anmbr. Op. tom. ii. p. 260, Ed. Bened.). (b.) The Helvidian hypothesis, put forward at first by Bononus, Helvidius, and Jovinian, and revived by Strauss and Herder in Germany, and by Davidson and Alford in England, that James, Joses, Jude, Simon, and the three sisters, were children of Joseph and Mary; and James. This notion is opposed, whether rightly or wrongly, to the general sentiment of the Christian body in all ages of the Church; like the other two hypotheses, it constructs two sets of cousins with the same name: it seems to be scarcely compatible with our Lord's recommending His mother to the care of St. John at His own death (see Jerome, Op. tom. ii. p. 19); for if, as has been suggested, though with great improbability, his sons might at that time have been unbelievers (Bosan. Theol. p. 67, Lond. Bot.: Neander, Plaustus, etc., iv. 1), Jesus would have known that such an unbelief was only to continue for a few days. That the προφῆται ἔστε of Luke ii. 7, and the ἔστε oi ἔρηκε of Matt. i. 23, imply the birth of after children, is not now often urged (see Pearson, On the Creed, i. 304, ii. 230). (c.) The Levirate hypothesis may be passed by. It was a mere attempt made in the nineteenth century to reconcile the Greek and Latin traditions by supposing that Joseph and Clopas were brothers, and that Joseph raised up seed to his dead brother (Theoph. in Matt. xiii. 53; Op. tom. i. p. 71, E. ed. Venet. 1764).

Objectio 2. — "The four brothers and their sisters are always found living and moving about with the Virgin Mary." If they were the children of Clopas, the Virgin Mary was their aunt. Her own husband would appear without doubt to have died at some time between A. D. 8 and A. D. 26. Nor have we any reason for believing Clopas to have been alive during our Lord's ministry. (We need not pause here to prove that the Clophas of Luke xxiv. is an entirely different person and name from Clopas.) What difficulty is there in supposing that the two widowed sisters should have lived together, the more so as one of them had lost one son, and he was often taken from her by his ministerial duties? And would it not be most natural that two families of first cousins thus living together should be popularly looked upon as one family, and spoken of as brothers and sisters instead of cousins? It is noticeable that St. Mary is nowhere called the mother of the four brothers.

Objectio 3. — "James the Apostle is said to be the son of Alpheus, but not of Clopas. But Alphus and Japas are the same name rendered into the Greek language in two different but ordinary and recognized ways, from the Aramaic אַלפֵה. (See Mill, Accounts of our Lord's Brethren vindicated, etc. p. 236, who compares the two forms Clovis and Aloyisius; Arnaud, Recherches etc.)."

Objectio 4. — Dean Alford considers John vii. 5, compared with vi. 67-70, to decide that none of the brothers of the Lord were of the number of the Twelve (Proleg. to Ep. of James, Tr. Test. iv. 88, and Conn. in loc.). If this verse, as he states, makes "the crowning difficulty" to the hypothesis of the identity of James the son of Alphæus, the Apostle, with James the brother of the Lord, the difficulties are not too formidable to be overcome. Many of the disciples having left Jesus, St. Peter bursts out in the name of the Twelve with a warm expression of faith and love; and after that — very likely (see Gresswell's Harmony) full six months afterwards — the Evangelist states that "neither did his brethren believe on Him." Does it follow from hence that all his brethren disbelieved? Let us compare other passages in Scripture. St. Matthew and St. Mark state that the thieves railed on our Lord upon the Cross. Are we therefore to disbelieve St. Luke, who says that one of the thieves was penitent, and did not rail? (Luke xxiii. 40, 49). St. Luke and St. John say that the soldiers offered vinegar. Can we believe that all did so? or, as St. Matthew and St. Mark tell us, that only one did it? (Luke xxiii. 36; John xix. 29; Mark xv. 36; Matt. xxvii. 48). St. Matthew tells us that "his disciples" had indignation when Mary poured the ointment on the Lord's head. Are we to suppose this true of all? or of Judas Iscariot, and perhaps some others, according to John xii. 4 and Mark xiv. 4? It is not at all necessary to suppose that St. John is here speaking of all the brethren. If Joses, Simon, and the three sisters disbelieved, it would be quite sufficient ground for the statement of the Evangelist. The same may be said of Matt. xii. 47, Mark iii. 32, where it is reported to Him that his mother and his brethren, designated by St. Mark (iii. 21) as οἱ πατὶς αὐτοῦ, were standing without. Nor does it necessarily follow that the disbelief of the brethren was of a nature which prevented the Apostles though they were, and vouched for half a year before by the warm-tempered Peter, could have had no share in it. It might have been similar to that feeling of unfaultless restlessness which perhaps moved St. John Baptist to send his disciples to make their inquiry of the Lord (see Grotius in loc., and Lardner, vi. p. 497, Lond. 1738). With regard to John, ii. 12, Acts i. 14, we may say that "his brethren" are no more excluded from the disciples in the first passage, and from the Apostles in the second, by being mentioned parallel with them, than the other Apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas' (1 Cor. ix. 5), excludes Peter from the Apostolic band.

Objectio 5. — "If the title of brethren of the Lord had belonged to James and Jude, they would have been designated by it in the list of the Apostles." The omission of a title is so slight a ground for an argument that we may pass this by.

Objectio 6. — "That Mary the wife of Clopas was designated by the title of Mary the mother of James and Joses, to the exclusion of Jude, if James and Jude were Apostles, appears to Dr. Davidson (Intro. to N. T., iii. 295, London

(1833) Neander, Michaelis, Winer, Alford. Still this is not often, if ever, the case, when \( \text{i} \) \( \text{i} \text{f} \) follows \( \text{έπερω} \) (Schenklenburger, Alford. ad Epist. Inc. perpet. p. 144, Stuttg. 1832: see also Winer Gramma. 5th ed., p. 647, and Meyer, Komm. in loc.:)

and if St. Paul had not intended to include St. James among the Apostles, we should rather have expounded the regular \( \text{παντώς} \) than the plural \( \text{τῶς \text{πνεύματος}} \) (Arnald. Recherches, etc.).

The more natural interpretation of the verse would appear to be that which includes James among the Twelve, identifying him with the son of Alphaxus. But, as we have said, such a conclusion does not necessarily follow. Compare, however, this verse with Acts ix. 27, and the probability is increased by several reasons. St. Luke there asserts that Barnabas brought Paul to the Apostle, \( \text{έπερως \text{πνεύματος} \text{παντώς}} \). St. Paul, as we have seen, asserts that during that visit to Jerusalem he saw Peter, and none other of the Apostles, save James the Lord's brother. Peter and James, then, were the two Apostles to whom Barnabas brought Paul. Of course, it may be said here also that \( \text{παντώς} \) is used in its last sense; but it appears to be a more natural conclusion that James with St. Luke's brother was one of the Twelve Apostles, being identical with James the son of Alphaxus, or James the Little.

11. We must now turn for a short time from Scripture to the early testimony of uninspired writers. Here, as among modern writers, we find the same three hypotheses which we have already mentioned:

For the identity of James the Lord's brother with James the Apostle, the son of Alphaxus, we find Papas of Hieraplis, a contemporary of the Apostles (see Routh, Relig. Sacr. i. 16, 43, 230, Oxon, 1846), St. Clement of Alexandria (Hypotyposeis, bk. vii. apud Euseb. H. E. ii. 11), St. Chrysostom (in Gal. i. 19).

Family with this opinion there existed another in favor of the hypothesis that James was the son of Joseph by a former marriage, and therefore not identical with the son of Alphaxus. This is first found in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (see Origen, in Matt. xiii. 55), in the Protevangelium of James, and the Pseudo-Apostolical Constitutions of the third century (Thilo, Cod. Apost. i. 228; Const. Apost. vi. 12). It is adopted by Eusebius (Comm. in Esd. iii. 6; H. E. i. 12, ii. 1). Perhaps it is Origen's opinion (see Comm. in Joh. ii. 19), and it is followed by the Epiphanius, St. Hilary, and St. Ambrose, who have already mentioned as being on the same side.

Now there is a still further variant, a second, and as it were a third hypothesis. This is the variant of the two in the New Testament, and being warmly defended by St. Jerome (in Matt. xii. 24), and supported by St. Augustine (Contra Faust. xii. 35, A.), it became the recognized belief of the Western Church.

The third hypothesis was unknown until it was put forward by Bunsen in Macedonia, and by Hesidius and Jerovian in Italy, as an opinion which seemed to them conformable with Scripture. Their followers were called Antidicomarianites. The fact a Here, too, the older Papis is confounded with his later namesake. See note, vol. i. p. 329. b.

of their having a name given them shows that their numbers must have been considerable; they date from the latter part of the fourth century.

English theological writers have divided between the first mention of these views, with, however, a preference on the whole for the first hypothesis. See, for example, Lardner, vi. 495, Lond. 1788; Pearson, Minor Works, i. 350, Oxf. 1844, and On the Creed, i. 308, 224, Oxf. 1833; Thorndike, i. 5, Oxf. 1844; Horne's Introd. to H. S. iv. 427, Lond. 1834, &c. On the same side are Lightfoot, Witsius, Lampe, Baumgarten, Seiliger, Giebel, Eichhorn, Hug, Bertholdt, Ginter, Schneckenburger, Meier, Steiger, Gieseler, Theile, Lange.

Taylor (Osy. tom. v. p. 29, Lond. 1849), Wilson (Osy. tom. vi. p. 673, Oxf. 1859), Cave (Life of St. James) maintain the second hypothesis, with Vossius, Bausanje, Valetius, etc. The third is held by Dr. Davidson (Introd. N. T. vol. iii.) and by Dean Alford (Greek Test. iv. 87).

The chief treatises on the subject are Dr. Mill's Accounts of our Lord's brethren, cambridge, 1813; Alford, as above referred to; Lange's Artikel in Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, Stuttgart, 1856; Neander's Pflanzung und Leitung; Schneckenburger's Annotatio ad Epist. Jac. perpetuam, Stuttgart, 1832; Arnaud's Recherches critiques sur l'Epître de Jude, Strasbourg, 1851; Schaff's Das Verhältniss des Jacobus Brossels des Herrn und Jacobus Alphæi, Berlin, 1842; Gabel's De Jacobi Epistola eilten næripite Auctori, Altorf, 1877.

Had we not identified James the son of Alpheus with the brother of the Lord we should have but little to write of him. When we had said that his name appears twice in the catalogue of the Twelve Apostles, our history of him would be complete. In like manner the early history of the Lord's brother would be confined to the fact that he lived and moved from place to place with his brothers and sisters, and with the Virgin Mary: and, except the appearance of the risen Lord to him, we should have nothing more to recounts of him until after the death of James the son of Zebedee, in the year 44, or at least, till St. Paul's first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion, in the year 49. Of James the Little, who would probably be distinct from each of the above (for an argument against the identity of the four brothers, or that of the identity of Alpheus and Clopas), we should know nothing, except that he had a mother named Mary, who was the sister of the Virgin Mary and the wife of Clopas.

James the Little, the Son of Alpheus, the Brother of the Lord. — Of James' father Ἀλφαίου, rendered by St. Matthew and St. Mark Alpheus (Ἀλφαίος), and by St. John Clopas (Κλαπασ), we know nothing, except that he married Mary, the sister of the Virgin Mary, and had by her four sons and three or more daughters. He appears to have died before the commencement of our Lord's ministry, and after his death it would seem that his wife and her sisters, a widow like herself, and in poor circumstances, lived together in one house, generally at Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 55), but sometimes also at Capernaum (John ii. 12) and Jerusalem (Acts i. 14). It is probable that these — and introduced him to Peter and James (Acts ix. 27; Gal. i. 18, 19), and by their authority he was admitted into the society of the Christians, and allowed to associate freely with them during the fifteen days of his stay. Here we find James on a level with Peter, and with him deciding on the admission of St. Paul into fellowship with the Church at Jerusalem; and from henceforth we always find him equal, or in his own department superior, to the very chiefest Apostles Peter, John, and Paul. For by this time he had been apostled (at what exact date we know not) to preside over the infant Church in its most important centre, in a position equivalent to that of Bishop. This pre-eminence is evident throughout the after history of the Apostles, whether we read it in the Acts, in the Epistles, or in ecclesiastical writers. Thus in the year 44, when Peter is released from prison, he desires that information of his escape may be given to "James, and to the brethren" (Acts xii. 17). In the year 49 he presides at the Apostolic Council, and delivers the judgment of the Assembly, with the expression διό εὐθύς καίραι (Acts xx. 13, 19; see St. Chrys. in loc.). In the same year (or perhaps in the year 51, on his fourth visit to Jerusalem) St. Paul recognizes James as one of the pillars of the Church, together with Cephas and John (Gal. ii. 9). Shortly afterwards it is "certain who came from James," that is, from the mother church of Jerusalem, designated by the name of its Bishop, who lead Peter into trengeneration at Antioch. And in the year 57 Paul pays a formal visit to James in the presence of all his presbyters, after having been previously welcomed with joy the day before by the brethren in an official manner (Acts xxii. 18).

Entirely accordant with these notices of Scripture is the universal testimony of Christian antiquity to the high office held by James in the Church of Jerusalem. That he was formally appointed Bishop of Jerusalem by the Lord himself, as reported by Eusebius (Hist. xi. viii.; Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in 1 Cor. viii.); Proclus of Constantinople (De Trad. Did. Liturg.); and Photius (Ep. 157), is not likely. Eusebius follows this account in a passage of his history, but says elsewhere that he was appointed by the Apostles (Hist. ii. 23). Clement of Alexandria is the first author who speaks of his Episcopate (Hypotyposeis, bk. vi. ap. Euseb. Hist. ii. 1), and he alludes to it as a thing of which the chief Apostles, Peter, James, and John, might well have been ambitious. The same Clement reports that the Lord, after his resurrection, delivered the gift of knowledge to James the Just, to John, and Peter, who delivered to the rest of the Apostles, and they to the Seventy. This at least shows the estimation in which James was held. But the author to whom we are chiefly indebted for an account of the life and death of James is Hegesippus (c. c. Joseph), a Christian of Jewish origin, who lived in the middle of the second century. His narrative gives us such an insight into the position of St. James in the Church of Jerusalem that it is best to let him relate it in his own words:

"Tradition respecting James, as given by Hegesippus. — With the Apostles James, the brother of the Lord, succeeds to the charge of the Church — that James, who has been called Just from the time of the Lord to our own days, for there were many of the name of James. He was holy from his mother's womb, he drank no wine or strong drink, nor did he eat animal food; a razor came not upon his head; he did not anoint himself with oil, but did not use the bath. He alone might go into the holy place; for he wore no woolen clothes, but linen. And alone he used to go into the Temple, and there he was commonly found upon his knees, praying for forgiveness for the people, so that his knees grew dry and thin [generally translated karpi] like a camel's, from his constantly bending them in prayer, and entreating forgiveness for the people. On account of his exceeding righteousness he was called Just, and of Olives, which means in Greek the bulwark of the people, and righteousness, as the prophets declare of him. Some of the seven sects then that I have mentioned inquired of him, 'What is the door of Jesus?' And he said that this man was the Saviour, wherefore some believed that Jesus is the Christ. Now the fore-mentioned sects did not believe in the Resurrection, nor in the coming of one who shall recompense every man according to his works; but all who became believers believed through James. When many therefore of the rulers believed, there was a disturbance among the Jews, and Scribes, and Pharisees, saying, 'There is a risk that the whole people will expect Jesus to be the Christ.' They came therefore together to James, and said, 'We pray thee, stop the people, for they have gone astray under the name of Jesus. We beseech thee to persuade all that come to the Passover concerning Jesus: for we all give heed to thee, and all the people testify to thee that thou art just, and acceptest not the person of man. Persuade the people therefore not to go astray about Jesus, for the whole people and all of us give heed to thee. Stand therefore on the gable of the Temple, that thou mayest be visible, and that thy words may be heard by all the people for all the tribes and even the Gentiles are come together for the Passover. Therefore the forementioned Scribes and Pharisees placed James upon the gable of the Temple, and cried out to him, and said, 'O Just one, to whom we ought all to give heed, seeing that the people are going astray after Jesus who was crucified, tell us what is the door of Jesus?' And he answered with a loud voice, 'Why ask ye me about Jesus the Man of Just, and of Olives, which means in hand of great power, and will come on the clouds of heaven.' And many were convinced and gave glory on the testimony of James, crying Hosanna to the Son of David. Whereupon the same Scribes and Pharisees said to each other, 'We have done ill in bringing forward such a witness to Jesus; but let us go up, and throw him down; that they may be terrified, and not believe on him.' And they cried out, saying, 'O! oh! even the Just is gone astray.' And they fulfilled that which is written in Isaiah, 'Let us take away the just man, for he is displeasing to us; therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their deeds.' They went up therefore, and threw down the Just one, and said to one another, 'Let us stone James the Just.' And they began to stone him, for he was not killed by the fall; but he turned round, and linked his chains, and cried, 'I beseech thee, Lord God Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' And whist they were stoning him, one of the priests, of the sons of Rechab, a son of the Rechabites to whom Jeremia the prophet bears testimony, cried out and said, 'Stop! What are you about? The Just one is praying for you!' Then one of them, who was a follower, took the club with which they pressed the clothes and brought it down on the head of the

JAMES, EPISTLE OF

1:1. And so he bore his witness. And they buried him on the spot by the Temple, and the column still remains by the Temple. This man was a true witness to Jews and Greeks that Jesus is the Christ. And immediately Vespasian commenced the siege (Euseb. II. 23, and Iohou, Rel. Scir. p. 121). He was preserved down to this time; on which see Heinichen's Excursus (Exc. vi. ad Euseb. II. vii. 19, iv. p. 957, ed. Burton).

For the difficulties which occur in this extract, reference may be made to Routh's Reliquiae Savorae (vol. i. p. 228), and to Cano Stanley's Apostolical Age (p. 319, Ox. 1847). It represents St. James in his life and in his death more vividly than any modern words could picture him. We see him, a married man perhaps (1 Cor. ix. 5), but in all other respects a rigid and ascetic follower after righteousness, keeping the Nazarite rule, like Anna the prophetess (Luke ii. 37), serving the Lord in the Temple "with fasting and prayers night and day," regarded by the Jews themselves as one who had attained to the sanctity of the priesthood, though not of the priestly family or tribe (unless indeed we argue from this that Clopas did belong to the tribe of Levi, and draw thence another argument for the identity of James the son of Clopas, and James the Lord's brother), and as the very type of what a righteous or just man ought to be. If any man could have converted the Jews as a nation to Christianity, it would have been James.

Josephus' narrative of his death is apparently somewhat different. He says that in the interval between the death of Festus and the coming of Albinus, Ananus, the high-priest assembled the Sanhedrim, and "brought before it James the brother of him who is called Christ, and some others, and having charged them with breaking the laws, delivered them over to be stoned." But if we are to reconcile this statement with that of Hegesippus, we must suppose that they were not actually stoned on this occasion. The historian adds that the better part of the citizens disliked what was done, and complained of Ananus to Agrippa and Albinus, whereupon Albinus threatened to punish him for having assembled the Sanhedrin without his consent, and Agrippa deprived him of the high-priesthood (Ant. x. 9). The words "brother of him who is called Christ," are judged by Le Clerc, Lardner, etc., to be spurious.

Epiphanius gives the same account that Hegesippus does in somewhat different words, having evidently copied it for the most part from him. He adds a few particulars which are probably mere assertions or conclusions of his own (Heres. xix. 4, and Ixxviii. 13). He considers James to have been the son of Joseph by a former wife, and calculates that he must have been 96 years old at the time of his death; and adds, on the authority, as he says, of Eusebius, Clement, and others, that he wore the siptalov on his forehead, in which he probably confounded him with St. John (Polyer.

3 The monument—part excavation, part edifice—which is now commonly known as the "Tomb of St. James," is on the east side of the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat, and therefore at a considerable distance from the spot on which the Apostles was killed, which the Jews would seem to have been somewhere under the southeast corner of the wall of the Haram, or perhaps farther down the slope nearer the "Fountain of the Virgin." [EN-KODEL] It cannot at any rate be said to stand by the Temple. The tradition is that in the time of Claudius it was possessed down to St. James took refuge there after the capture of Christ, and remained, eating and drinking nothing, until our apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24. But see Cotta, De itna pont. Apol. Hebr. Joc. et Marci, Tub. 1755.

Gregory of Tours reports that he was buried not where he fell, but on the Mount of Olives, in a tomb in which he had already buried Zacharias and Simeon (De glor. Mart. i. 27). Eusebius tells us (Hist. III. 4), that it was "immediately" after this time; on which see Heinichen's Excursus (Exc. vi. ad Euseb. II. vii. 19, iv. p. 957, ed. Burton).

We must add a strange Talmudic legend, which appears to relate to James. It is found in the Midrash Koheleth, or Commentary on Ecclesiastes and also in the Tract Abobab Zarah of the Jerusalem Talmud. It is as follows:—R. Eliezer, the son of Dana, was bitten by a serpent; and there came to him Jacob, a man of Caphar Sacaus, to heal him by the name of Jesus the son of Pandera; but R. Ismael suffered him not, saying, 'That is not allowed thee, son of Dana.' He answered, 'Suffer me, and I will produce an authority against thee that it is lawful;' but he could not produce the authority before he expired. And what was the authority?—This:—'Which if a man do, he shall not be stoned (Ex. xix. 14). But it is not said that he shall die in them.' The son of Pandera is the name that the Jews have always given to our Lord, when representing him as a magician.

The same name is given in Epiphanius (Heres. xxviii.) to the grandfather of Joseph, and by John Damascene (De Fide Orth. iv. 13) to the grandfather of Josephim, the supposed father of the Virgin Mary. For the identification of James of Sceaus (a place in Upper Galilee) with James the Just, see Mill (Historic. Critic. of the Gospel, p. 318, Camb. 1840). The passage quoted by Origen and Eusebius from Josephus, in which the latter speaks of the death of James as being one of the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem, seems to be spurious (Orig. in Matt. xiii. 55; Euseb. H. E. ii. 23).

It is possible that there may be a reference to James in Heb. iii. 17 (see Theodore in loc.), which would fix his death at some time previous to the writing of that epistle. His apprehension by Ananus was probably about the year 62 or 63 (Lardner. Pearson, Mill, Whitby, Le Clerc, Tillonmont). There is nothing to fix the date of his martyrdom as narrated by Hegesippus, except that it must have been shortly before the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem. We may conjecture that he was between 70 and 80 years old. F. M.

JAMES, THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF. I. Its Genuineness and Canonicity.—In the third book of his Ecclesiastical History, Eusebius makes his well-known division of the books, or pretended books, of the New Testament into four classes. Under the head of διαλογίσματα he places the Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline Epistles, the First Epistle of St. John, and the First Epistle to Mithridath; the Second to the Jews, and the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians. While, however, the latter is perhaps best considered as a work sui generis, yet the second of the former three is certainly a work of serious consequence, and is to be reckoned as an important testimony to the primitive use of the Gospels. Thus, according to the legend, Lord appeared to him on the day of his resurrection (See Quaresmis, etc., quoted in Tobler, Sauloth, etc. 299.) The legend of his death there seems to be first mentioned by Manville (a. n. 132): see Early Test. 176). By the old travellers it is often called the "Church of St. James." [EX-KODEL] And it is not necessary to say that the Jacobite churches of the East—consisting of the Armenians, the Copts, and other Monophysists, or Bucharish bodies—do not derive their title from St. James, but from the latter person was the same as St. James the brother of our Lord, who died Bishop of Edessa in Ptolemais.
I'o but I'o or chiefly not and the Apocalypse of St. Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Doctrines of the Apostles, the Gospel to the Hebrews. The \textit{apostolical} consist of the Gospels of Peter, Thomas, Matthias, and others, the Acts of Andrew, John, and others. The \textit{apostolica}, amongst which \textit{he} places the Epistle of St. James, are, he says, \textit{γραφή για τοις σοιοι}; that is, the expression means that they were acknowledged by, or merely that they were known to, the majorit}y (\textit{H. E.} iii. 25). Elsewhere he refers the epistle to the class of \textit{προφανεια}, for this is the meaning of \textit{προφανεια} \textit{των}, which was apparently misunderstood by \textit{St. Jerome} (\textit{De Fr. Hist.}); but he bears witness that it was publicly read in most churches as genuine (\textit{H. E.} ii. 23), and as such accepts it himself. This then was the state of the question in the time of Eusebius; the epistle was accepted as canonical, and as the writing of James, the brother of the Lord, by the majority, but not universally. Origen bears the same testimony as Eusebius (tom. iv. p. 306), and probably like him, himself accepted the epistle as genuine (tom. iv. p. 555, &c.). It is found in the Syriac version, and appears to be referred to by Clement of Rome (\textit{off Cor. x.}). Herman (ib. ii. \textit{Mairn.}, xii. 5), Irenaeus (\textit{ib. Hærns.} [ib. iv. c.] 16, $ 2), and is quoted by almost all the Fathers of the 4th century, e. g. Athanasius, Cyril, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius, Chrysostom (see Davidson, \textit{Intro. to N. T.}, iii. p. 338). In 367 the Council of Carthage regarded it as canonical, and from that time there has been no further question of its genuineness on the score of external testimony. But at the time of the Reformation the question of its authenticity was again raised, and now upon the ground of internal evidence. Erasmus and Cardinal Cajetan in the Church of Rome, Cyril Lactant in the Greek Church, Luther and the Magdeburg Centurians among Protestants, all objected to it. Luther seems to have withdrawn his expression that it was \textit{a richt strawy epistle}, compared with the Gospel of St. John and the Epistles of St. Paul and St. Peter, after that expression had been two years before the world. The chief objection on external grounds is a supposed opposition between St. Paul and St. James, on the doctrine of Justification, concerning which we shall presently make some remarks. At present we need only say that it is easy to account for the non-universal reception of the epistle in the Early Church, by the fact that it was meant only for Jewish believers, and was not likely therefore to circulate widely among Gentile Christians, for whose spiritual necessities it was primarily not adapted; and that the objection on internal grounds proves nothing except against the objectors, for it really rests on a mistake.

H. \textit{Its Author.} — The author of the epistle must be either James the son of Zebedee, according to the subscription of the Syriac version; or James the son of Alpheus, according to Dr. Davidson's view (\textit{Intro. to N. T.}, iii. 312); or James the brother of the Lord, which is the general opinion (see Euseb. \textit{H. E.} ii. 27; Alford, \textit{G. T.} iv. p. 28; or an unknown James (Luther). The likelihood of this last hypothesis falls to the ground when the \textit{canonical} character of the epistle is admitted. James the son of Zebedee could not have written it, because of the death of his\textit{ nephew}, only seven years after the martyrdom of Stephen, does not give time for the growth of a sufficient number of Jewish Christians, \textit{εν τις διασπορα}. Internal evidence (see Stanley, \textit{Apost. Age}, p. 212) points unmistakably to James the Just as the writer, and we have already identified James the Just with the son of Alpheus.

The Jewish Christians, whether residing at Jerusalem or living scattered among the Gentiles, and only visiting that city from time to time, were the especial charge of James. To them he addressed this epistle; not to the unbelieving Jews (Lardner, Macknight, Hug, etc.), but only to believers in Christ, as is undoubtedly proved by li. ii. i. ii. 7; v. 7. The rich men of v. 1 may be the unbelieving Jews (Stanley, p. 289), but it does not follow that the epistle was written to them. It is usual for an orator to denounce in the second person. It was written from Jerusalem, which St. James does not seem to have ever left. The time at which he wrote it has been fixed as late as 62, and as early as 45. Those who see in its writer a desire to counteract the effects of a misconstruction of St. Paul's doctrine of Justification by faith in ii. 14-21 (Wiesinguer), and those who see a reference to the immediate destruction of Jerusalem in v. 1 (Macknight), and an allusion to the name Christian in ii. 7 (De Wette), argue in favor of the later date. The earlier date is advocated by Schneckenburger, Neander, Thiersch, Davidson, Stanley, and Alford; chiefly on the ground that the epistle could not have been written by St. James after the Council in Jerusalem, without some allusion to what was there decided, and because the Gentile Christian does not yet appear to be recognized.

H. \textit{Its Object.} — The main object of the epistle, is not to teach doctrine, but to improve morality. St. James is the moral teacher of the N. T.; not in such sense a moral teacher as not to be at the same time a maintainer and teacher of Christian doctrine, but yet mainly in this epistle a moral teacher. There are two ways of explaining this characteristic of the epistle. Some commentators and writers see in St. James a man who had not realized the essential principles and peculiarities of Christianity, but was in a transition state, half-Jew and half-Christian. Schneckenburger thinks that Christianity had not penetrated his spiritual life. Neander is of much the same opinion (\textit{Pflanzung und Leitung}, p. 579). And the same notion may perhaps be traced in Prof. Stanley and Dean Alford; but there is another and much more natural way of accounting for the fact. St. James was writing for a special class of persons, and knew what that class especially needed; and therefore, under the guidance of God's Spirit, he adapted his instructions to their capacities and wants. Those for whom he wrote were, as we have said, the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem or St. James, living in the centre of Judaism, saw what were the chief sins and vices of his countrymen; and, fearing that his flock might share in them, he lifted up his voice to warn them against the corruptions from which they not only might, but did in part, suffer. This was his main object; but there is another closely connected with it. As Christians, his readers were exposed to trials which they did not bear with the patience and faith that would have become them. Here then are the two objects of the Epistle — (1) To warn against the sins to which as Jews they were most liable; (2) To counsel and exhibited among the suffering to which as Christians they were most exposed. The warnings and consolations are mixed together, for the writer does not seem to have set himself down by mere composition an essay or a letter of which he had previously arranged the heads; but, like one of the old prophets, to have poured out what was uppermost in his thoughts, or closest to his heart, without waiting to connect his matter, or to throw bridges across from subject to subject. While, in the purity of his Greek and the vigor of his thoughts, we mark a man of education, in the abruptness of his transitions and the abruptness of the arguments we meet in the course of the family of the Davidians, who disarmed Domitian by the simplicity of their minds and by exhibiting their hands hard with toil (Hegesipp. apud Euseb. ii. 20).

The Jewish vices against which he warns them are—Formalism, which made the service (βαρεσία) of God consist in washings and outward ceremonies, whereas he reminds them (i. 27) that it consists rather in death, and the purity (see Coloss. ii. 23) and the scrupulosity (Aids to Reflection, Apul. 23; note also Active Love = Bp. Butler's "Benovelenza," and Purity = Bp. Butler's "Temperance"); fanaticism, which under the cloak of religious zeal was tearing Jerusalem to pieces (i. 29); formalism, which threw its sins on God (i. 13); meanness, which crouched before the rich (ii. 2); falsehood, which had made words and oaths playthings (iii. 12); partisanship (iii. 14); evil-speaking (iv. 11); boasting (iv. 16); oppression (v. 4). The great lesson which he teaches them, as Christians, is patience—patience in trial (i. 2); patience in good works (i. 22-25); patience under provocations (iii. 17); patience under oppression (v. 7); patience under persecution (v. 10); and the ground of their patience is, that the coming of the Lord draweth nigh, which is to right all wrongs (v. 8).

IV. There are two points in the epistle which demand a somewhat more lengthened notice. These are (a) ii. 14-26, which has been represented as a formal opposition to St. Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, and (b) v. 14, 15, which is quoted as the authority for the sacrament of extreme unction.

(a) Justification being an act not of man but of God, the unpolluted roughness of his style and "justification by works" are exact. Justification must either be by grace, or of reward. Therefore our question is, Did or did not St. James hold justification by grace? If he did, there is no contradiction between the Apostles. Now there is not one word in St. James to the effect that a man can earn his justification by works; and this would be necessary in order to prove that he held justification of active love, and Peter (see Coloss. iii. 22) does not use the expression "justified by faith" (Rom. v. 1), and St. James, the expression, "justified by works, not by faith only." And here is an apparent opposition. But, if we consider the meaning of the two Apostles, we see at once that there is no contradiction either intended or possible. St. Paul was opposing the Judaizing party, which claimed to earn acceptance by good works, whether the works of the Mosaic law, or works of piety done by themselves. In opposition to these, St. Paul lays down the great truth that acceptance cannot be earned by man at all, but is the free gift of God to the Christian man, for the sake of the merits of Jesus Christ, appropriated by each individual, and made his own by the instrumentality of faith. —St. James, on the other hand, was opposing the old Jewish tenet that to be a child of Abraham was all in all; that Godliness was not necessary, so that the belief was correct. This presumption confidence had transferred itself, with perhaps double force, to the Christianized Jews. They had said, "Lord, Lord," and that was enough, without doing His Father's will. They had recognized the Messiah: what more was wanted? They had faith: what more was required of them? It is plain that their "faith" was a totally different thing from the "faith" of St. Paul. St. Paul tells us again and again that his "faith" was a faith that we possessed by grace and the Spirit, whereas St. James, says, it was by grace and the Spirit; but the very characteristic of the "faith" which St. James is attacking, and the very reason why he attacked it, was that it did not work by love, but was a bare assent of the head, not influencing the heart, a faith such as devils can have, and tremble. St. James tells us that "fides informis" is not sufficient on the part of man for justification; St. Paul tells us that "fides formata" is sufficient: and it is plain that the reason why "fides informis" will not do for us is, according to St. James, because it lacks that special quality, the addition of which constitutes it "fides formata." See on this subject Bull's Harmonia Apostolicæ et Externæ Consœuræ; Taylor's Sermon on "Faith working by love," vol. viii. p. 281, Lond. 1850; and, as a corrective of Bull's view, Laurence's Bampton Lectures, i., v., vi.

(b) With respect to v. 14, 15, it is enough to say that the ceremony of extreme unction and the ceremony described by St. James differ both in their subject and in their object. The subject of extreme unction is a sick man who is about to die; and its object is not his cure. The subject of the ceremony described by St. James is a sick man who is not about to die; and its object is his cure, together with the spiritual benefit of absolution. St. James is plainly giving directions with respect to the manner of administering one of those extraordinary gifts of the Spirit with which the Church was endowed only in the Apostolic age and the age immediately succeeding the Apostles.

The following editions, etc., of St. James's Epistle may be mentioned as worthy of notice. The edition of Benson and Michaelis, Halle Magdeburgiæ, 1746; Seller's Paraphrasis, Halle, 1781; Mori Predications, Groedde. De Epist. James 1794; Schneckenburger's Annotatio ad Epist. Jesus perpetuæ, Stuttg. 1832; Davidson's Introduction to the New Test. iii. 296 ff., Lond. 1851; Alford's Greek Test. vol. iv. p. 274, Lond. 1859 [4th ed., 1865].

The following spurious works have been attributed to St. James: (1.) The Protevangelium. (2.) Historia de Nativitate Mariae. (3.) De miraculis Infantius Iesu Christi, etc. Of these, the Proteevangelium is worth a passing notice, not for its contents, which are a mere parody on the early chapters of St. Luke, transferring the events which occurred at our Lord's birth to the birth of St. Mary his mother, but because it appears to have been known so early in the Church. It is possible that Justin Martyr (Dial. evan Tryph. c. 78), and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 38) refer to Oribasius speaks of it (in Matt. xiii. 56); Gregory Nyssen (Opp. p. 349, ed. Paris), Epiphanius (Haer. lxxix.), John Damascene (Orat. i., ii. in Notic. Maric.), Photius (Orat. in Notic. Maric.), and others allude to it. It was first published in Latin in 1552, in Greek in 1564. The oldest MS. of it now existing is of the 10th century. (Sæ...

Thiele's Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, tom. i. pp. 45, 108, 159, 337, Lips. 1832.) F. M.

* It deserves notice that this epistle of James, like that of Jude, but unlike that of the other apostolic writings, never alludes to the outward facts of the Saviour's life. Yet James speaks expressly of the Lord Jesus Christ (see i. 1, ii. 7, 8), and asserts the faith as shown by works on which he lays such emphasis as that which rests on Christ as the Saviour of men. At the same time the language of James * offers the most striking coincidences with the language of our Lord's discourses." Compare James i. 5, 6 with Matt. vii. 7, xxi. 22; i. 22 with Matt. vii. 21; ii. 13 with Matt. v. 7; iii. 1 with Matt. xxiii. 8; iii. 12 with Matt. vii. 16; and v. 12 with Matt. v. 34-37. See Westcott's "Introduction to the Study of the Gospels," p. 185 (Amer. ed.).

In speaking of the sources from which the Apostle Paul derives his favorite metaphors, Dr. Howson points out in this respect a striking difference between him and the Apostle James. The figures of Paul are drawn almost exclusively from the practical relations or business of men, as military life, architecture, agriculture, and the contests of the gymnasion and race-course: while the figures of James are taken from some of the varied aspects or phenomena of nature. It is remarked that there is more imagery of this latter kind in the one short epistle of James than in all Paul's epistles put together. This trait of his style appears in his allusions to " the waves of the sea driven with the wind and tossed " (i. 6), " the flower of the grass " (ver. 10), " the sun risen with a burning heat " (ver. 11), " the fierce wind " (iii. 4), " the kindling of the fire " (ver. 5), " the beasts, birds, and serpents and things in the sea " (ver. 7), " the fig, olive, and vine," " the salt water and fresh " (ver. 12), " the vapor that appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away " (iv. 14), " the moth-eaten garments " (v. 2), " the rust " (ver. 3), " the early and latter rain " (ver. 7), " and the earth bringing forth her fruit " (ver. 8)." (Lectures on the Character of St. Paul, pp. 1-7, London. 1864.)

Among the commentaries on this epistle (see above) may be mentioned Geller, Der Brief Jacobi ubersetzt u. erklart, in which special reference is made to the views of the ancient Greek and Latin interpreters (1828); Theile, Comm. in Epist. Jacobi (1834); Kern, Der Brief Jacobi untersucht u. erklart (1838); Vellner, Einleitung in die Psalmen, Adresse de St. Jacques (1850); Wesiger, Oldsbaum's Bibl. Komm. vi. pt. i. For a list of some of the older works, see a brochure beside the N. Test. p. 131 (3d Ausg. 1860).

Valuable articles on the epistle of James will be found in Herzog's Real-Encycl. vi. 417 ff. by Lange; in Zeller's Bibl. Wörterb. i. 658 ff. by Zeller (this analysis specially good); and in Kittel's Cyclo. of Bibl. Literature, by Dr. Edie (3d ed. 1866). I have a compendious view of the critical questions relating to the authorship, destination, and doctrines of the letter, see Bleek's Einleitung in das N. Test. pp. 530-533 (1862). Rev. T. D. Maurice gives an outline of the apostle's thoughts in his Unity of the New Testament, pp. 316-331. See also Stanley's Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, pp. 267-324. The monographic literature is somewhat extensive. The theologian George Chr. Knapp, treats of "The Doctrine of Paul and James respecting Faith and Works, compared with the Teaching of our Lord," in his Scriptura Viva Argumenti, i. 411-456. See a translation of the same by Prof. W. Thompson in the Biblical Repository, iii. 189-228. Neander has an essay in his Geleigten- schriften (3te Ausg. 1827) entitled Pauius et Jacobi, in which he illustrates the "Unity of the Evangelical Spirit in different forms." Some extracts from this essay are appended to the above translation. Prof. E. P. Barrows has written on the "Alleged Disagreement between Paul and James" on the subject of justification, in the Bibl. Sacra, i. 451-782. On this topic see also Neander's "Pfynnung u. Leitung," ii. 838-873 (Robinson's transl. p. 498 ff.; Lechler's Das apost. und nachapost. Zeitalter, p. 225-262; and Schaff's History of the Apostolic Church, p. 625 ff. (N. Y. 1853). Stier has published Der Brief des Jacobus in 32 Betrachtungen ausgelegt (1845). For some other similar works or discussions, see Lange's Bibelwerk as above (p. 24 f.), or Dr. Schaff's translation of Lange's Commentary (p. 35 f.).

2. (Ejacbert [2d ed.]. Alex. Iacuere) A man of Judah, of the great house of Horeb; second son of Zimri the Jerahmeelite (1 Chr. ii. 27).

3. [Comp. Iacuere] One of the Levites who under Ezra and Nehemiah read and expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii. 7). By the I.XX. (Rom., Vat., Alex.) the greater part of the names in this passage are omitted.

JAMINITES, THE (Lat. "Iacuerei""). The descendants of Jamin the son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 12).

JAMLECH (Lat. [II., i. e. God, makes king] : Iaculax. [Comp. Ald.] Alex. "Amouk, etc."] Jamich, one of the chief men ("rion, A. V. "princes") of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 34), probably in the time of Hezekiah (see ver. 41).

JAMNIA (Iacuera, Iacuere, and so Josephus; [in 1 Macr. iv. 15, Alex. Iacuere, Sin. Iacueria] Jamminia, 1 Macr. iv. 15, v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40. [Jam-n.])

"Tell talk." This use of the word is well illustrated by a quotation from Chaucer's Parson's Tale, given in Eastwood and Wright's Bible Word-Book:

"Jangelympo is when a man spekith to moche bilbor folk, and clippith as a mille, and taketh no keep he saith."

JAN’NA (Ijawr, Lachmi, and Tisch. Iwawli), son of Joseph, and father of Melch (in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 24). It is perhaps only a variation of Jeunnas or John.

A. C. H.

JAN’NES and JAM’BRES (Ijawrap, Iwabra), the names of two Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses. St. Paul alone of the sacred writers mentions them by name, and says no more than that they were opposed Moses, and that their folly in doing so became manifest (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9). It appears from the Jewish commentators that these names were held to be those of the magicians who opposed Moses and Aaron, spoken of in Exodus (or perhaps their leaders), of whom we there read that they first imitated the wonders wrought by Moses and Aaron, but, after-wards failing, confessed that the power of God was with those whom they had withstood (chap. vii. 11, where the Targum of Jonathan interprets these names, viii. 18, 19). With this St. Paul's words perfectly agree.

Jannes is written in some codices Mammeha; both forms, the latter being slightly varied, are found in the Jewish commentaries (אָנָּא, מַמְמֶה). The former appears to be the earlier form. We have been unable to discover an Egyptian name resembling Jamakes or Mammeha. The termination is like that of many Egyptian compounds ending with ha "the sun;" as Men-kau-ra, Menepthah (Manetho, IVth Dyn.).

Jannes appears to be a transcription of the Egyptian name Aan, probably pronounced Ian. It was the nomen of two kings: one of the Xth Dynasty, the father or ancestor of Sesostris I. of the Xth; the other, according to our arrangement, fourth or fifth king of the Xth Dyn., called by Manetho Iawas or Iawis (Jos.) or Seraa (Afr.). (See Hefner Egyptico, pp. 174, 175.) There is also a king bearing the name Anmu, whom we assign to the IId Dyn. (Hor. Ep., p. 101). The signification of Aian is doubtful: the cognate word Aint means a valley or plain. The earlier king Aian may be assigned to the twenty-first century B.C. The latter one we hold to be probably the second predecessor of Joseph's Pharaoh. This shows that a name which may be reasonably supposed to be the original of James, was in use at or near the period of the sojourn in Egypt. The names of the ancient Egyptians were extremely numerous and very fluctuating in use; generally the most prevalent at any time were those of kings then reigning or not long dead.

Our result as to the name of James throws light upon a curious question raised by the supposition that St. Paul took the names of the magicians from a prevalent tradition of the Jews. This conjecture is as old as the time of Theodoret, who makes the supposed tradition oral. (Τα μεντο τουτων άνωκατα οιν εκ της θειας γαρφης μεμακην ο δειος άντοσκολοι, άλλα εκ της αγράφου των Ιουδαιων θεασακαλιν: ad loc.) This opinion would be little importance were it not for the circumstance that these names were known to the Greeks and Romans long before the early period to us to suppose that their information was derived from St. Paul's men-

It has therefore been generally supposed that St. Paul took these names from Jewish tradition. It seems, however, inconsistent with the character of an inspired record for a baseless or incorrect current tradition to have been adopted, it is therefore satisfactory to find there is good reason for thinking that the names were to be authentic. Whether James and Jamaces were mentioned in some long-lost book relating to the early history of the Israelites, or whether there were a verbal oral tradition respecting them, cannot now be determined. The former is the more probable supposition — if, as we believe, the names are correct — since oral tradition is rarely exact in minute particulars.

The conjecture of Majus (Oxerv. Sacr. ii. 42 f., ap. Wis. Revelativ. s. v.) that James and Jamaces were merely meaningless words put for lost proper names, is scarcely worth refuting. The words are not sufficiently similar to give a color to the idea, and there is no known instance of the kind in the Bible. The Rabbinists say that James and Jamaces were sons of Pharaoh, and among various forms of their names goe Johannes and Ambrosius. There was an apocryphal work called Jannes and Manabres, condemned by Pope Gelasius.

The Arabs mention the names of several magicians who opposed Moses; among them are none resembling Jamaces and Jamaces (Dr. Herbelot, art. Moses Ben Amran).

There are several dissertations on this subject (J. Grotius, Diss. de Jann et Jamaces, Hafn. 1677; J. G. Michaelis, Id. Hal., 1747; Zendewd, Id. Argent. 1669; Lightfoot, Sermon on Jannes and Jamaces, etc. [Fabriucius, Col. pseudopigr. Vid. Test. i. 813-825].

There is a question of considerable interest as to these Egyptian magicians which we cannot here discuss: Is their temporary success attributable to pure imposture? The passages relating to them in the Bible would lead us to reply affirmatively, as we have already said, in speaking of another Egyptian magic. [Egypt.]

JANOAH (גַּנָּה, rest, quiet; יָאָוּא; Alex. Iawѹ; Jawaw), a place apparently in the north of Galilee, or the "land of Naphtali" — one of the territories assigned by God to Naphtali, Gen. ii. 21, or the junction of Palestine (2 K. xv. 29). No trace of it appears elsewhere. By Eusebius and Jerome (*Onom. 'Ionan"), and even by Ralidan (Pal. p. 826), it is confounded with Janohaw, in the centre of the country.

G.

JANOHAH (גַּנְוָה, i. e. Yancoah [with גנanh local, unto rest]; Iawaw, but in next verse Mayaw; Alex. Iawaw; Comp. Iawavah: Jawaw), a place on the boundary of Ephraim (possibly that between it and Manasses). It is named between Tannath-Shihok and Atharoth, the enumeration proceeding from west to east (Josh. xvi. 6, 7). Eusebius (Onomasticon, "Jawa") gives it as twelve miles east of Neapolis. A little less than that distance from Noblal, and about S. E. in direction, two miles from Akrotheh, is the village of Yanun, doubtless identical with the ancient Janohah. It seems to have been first visited in modern times by Van de Velde (Israel Mag., 1582; also in Eusebius, *Onom. 'Ionan"; see also Bibl. iii. 297). It is in a valley descending sharply eastward towards the Jordan. The modern village is very small, but the ancient ruins "extensive and interesting." "I have not seen," says V., "any of Israel's ancient cities in such a condition: entire houses and walls exist, covered with immense heaps of earth." But there are also ruins on the hill N. E. of Tzurah, called Kirbet Y, which may be the site of the original place (Rob. p. 297).

JANUM (גַּנּוּמ), following the Keri of the Masorets, but in the original text, Ēthib, it is גַּנּוּמ. Janum [slumber]: [Iešāv] (Vat. -eša); Alex. Enc. (vii. 350). A town of Judah in the mountain district, apparently not far from Hebron, and named between Hezeph and Beth-aphidnah (Josh. xv. 54). It was not known to Eusebius and Jerome (see Onomast. [Janum]), nor does it appear to have been yet met with by any modern investigator.

G.

JAPETH (גַּפֵּת, יָפֵת): Japheth, one of the three sons of Noah. From the order in which their names invariably occur (Gen. v. 25, vi. 10) we should naturally infer that Japheth was the youngest, but we learn from ix. 24 that Ham held that position, and the precedence of Japheth before this one of the three is indicated in the order of the names in x. 2, 6. It has been generally supposed from x. 21 that Japheth was the eldest; but it should be observed that the word goel in that sentence is better connected with "brother," as in the Vulg. "fratris Japhet magnum." Not only does the usage of the Hebrew language disencumber the other construction, but the sense of the passage requires that the age of Shem rather than of Japheth should be there specified. We infer therefore that Japheth was the second son of Noah. The origin of the name is referred by the sacred writer to the root pathōh (פַּתָח), "to extend," as predictive of the wide spread of his descendants over the northern and western regions of the world (Gen. ix. 27). The name has also been referred to the root yaphōh (יָפָח), "to be fair," as indicative of the light complexion of the Japhetic races (Genicenus, Thes. p. 1138; Knobel, Vol. p. 22). From the resemblance of the name to the mythological Japetus, some writers have sought to establish a connection between them. Japetus was regarded by the Greeks as the ancestor of the human race. The descendants of Japheth occupied the "isles of the Gentiles" (Gen. x. 2, 3), i.e. the coast-lands of the Mediterranean Sea in Europe and Asia Minor, whence they spread northwards over the whole continent of Europe and a considerable portion of Asia. JAPHIA (גַּפְיָה, רָפָיָה; [fair, splendid]: Ḥayyā). Alex. Ḥayāyū; [Comp. Ḥayyāh; Alt. Ḥāyāh]: Japhia). The boundary of Zebulun ascended from Daberath to Japhia, and thence passed to Gab- ḫer (Josh. xix. 12). Daberath appears to be on the slopes of Mount Tabor, and Gab- ḫher may possibly be el-Mekhen, 2 miles N. of Nazareth. Six miles W. of the former, and 2 miles S. of Nazareth, is Ḥayyāh which is not unlikely to be identical with Japhia (Rob. ii. 343-41): at least

It should be remarked that Ḥayyāh. לַעַיָה, is the modern representative of both לַעַיָה, i.e. Joppa, and לַעַיָה, Japhia, two names originally very distinct.

This is much more probable than Chal. (Syrac. inscription in the bay of Akka — the suggestion of Eusebius (Onomast. [Japheth]), and endorsed by Reckend (Pol. p. 820) — an identification which is neither etymologically nor topographically admissible. Ḥayyāh may also be the same with the Ḥayyāh which was occupied by Josephus during his struggle with the Romans — "a very large village of Lower Galilee, fortified with walls and full of people." (Vit. 45; comp. 37, and B. J. li. 20, § 6), of whom 15,000 were killed and 2,120 taken prisoners by the Romans (B. J. lii. 7, § 31); though if Ḥayyāh be Japatata this can hardly be, as the two are more than ten miles apart, and he expressly says that they were neighbors to each other.

A tradition, which first appears in Sir John Maundeville, makes Ḥayyāh the birthplace of Zebedee and of the Apostles James and John, his sons. It is therefore called by the Latin monks of Nazareth "San Gianerno." See Quaresimus, Eliac Litio, ii. 843; and Early Trav., p. 180; Maundeville calls it the "castle of Saffrin." So too Von Harff, L. D. 1486: "Saffra, eym castel van welchen Alphens und Seledens geboren waren" (Pilgerfahrt, p. 195).

G.

JAPHIA (גַּפְיָה, רָפָיָה; [fair, splendid]: Ḥayyā). Alex. Ḥayā; [Japhia]. I. King of Lachish at the time of the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites (Josh. x. 3); one of the five "kings of the Amorites" who entered into a confederacy against Joshua, and who were defeated at Beth-horon, and lost their lives at Makkedah. The king of Lachish is mentioned more than once in this narrative (ver. 5, 25), but his name occurs only as above.

2. Ḥayyāh, Ḥayyāh (Vat. in I Chr. xiv. 4o, Javan [so F.]): Alex. Ḥayāh, [Japhia]. (one of the sons of David, tenth of the fourteen born to him by his wives after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. iii. 7, xiv. 6). In the Hebrew form of this name there are no variations. The Pesetha has Naphia, and, in 1 Chr. iii., Nepheg: In the list given by Josephus (Ant. vi. 25, § 3), but it is not repeated: It is possible that Ḥayyāh may be from Ḥayyāh or it may be Ḥayyān. There do not appear to be any traditions concerning Japhia. The genealogy is given under MAJIA, vol. i. p. 560.

G.

JAPHLET (גַּפְלֵט, [whom God delivers]: Ḥayyālāṯ; [Vat. Ḥalūn, Ḥiṭālāṯ]: Alex. Ḥayālāṯ; [Japhlet]. A descendant of Asher through Beriah, his youngest son; named as the father of three Bene-Japhlet (1 Chr. vii. 32, 33).

JAPHLETI (גַּפְלֵט, [whom God delivers]: Ḥayyālāṯ; [Vat. Ḥalūn, Ḥiṭālāṯ]; Alex. Ḥayālāṯ; [Japhlet]. The "boundary of the Japhleti" is one of the landmarks on the south boundary-line of Pharnaka (Josh. vii. 3), west of Beth-horon the lower, and between it and Maroth. Who is the "Japhleti" was who is thus perpetuated we cannot ascertain. Possibly the name preserves the memory of some ancient tribe who at a remote age dwelt on these hills, just as the former presence of other tribes in the neighborhood may be inferred from the names of Zemaraini, Ophra (the Ophniite), Ephraim-Ammon, and others [BENJAMIN, p. 277, note h]. We can hardly suppose any connection with JAPHEL of the remote Asher. No trace of the name has yet been discovered in the district.

G.

JAPHO (גַּפוּה, [beauty]: Ḥayyāh). Joppa.
JARAH This word occurs in the A. V. but once, Josh. xix. 16. It is the accurate representation of the Hebrew word which on its other occurrences is rendered in the better known form of JOPPA (2 Chr. ii. 16; Ezra iii. 7; Jon. i. 3). In its modern garb it is Yifīt (ילף), which is also the Arabic name of Japhia, a very different word in Hebrew. [JOPPA; JOPPE.]

JARAH (יהָרָה), and in some MSS. יַרְאָה [honey]: 'ilād: Jorio, a man among the descendants of Saul; son of Micaiah, and great-grandson of Meribbaal, or Mephibosheth (1 Chr. xix. 42, comp. 40). In the parallel list of ch. viii. the name is materially altered to JEHODAH.

JAREB (גָּרֶב) [an adversary, hostlile]: 'iaprēb, as if יַרְבִּ, in both Hos. v. 13 and x. 6; a word, though Theodoret gives 'iaprēb in the former passage, and 'iaprēa in the latter (and Comp. in x. 6 has 'iaprēb); and Jerome has Jarib for the Greek equivalent of the LXX.) is either to be explained as the proper name of a country or person, as a noun in apposition, or as a verb from a root יָרִב, rub, "to contend, plead." All these senses are represented in the A. V. and the marginal read- ings, and, as has been not uncommonly the case, the least preferable has been inserted in the text. Had Jareb been the proper name of the king of Assyria, as it would be if this rendering were correct, the word preceding יָרִב, melec, "king") would have required the article. R. D. Kimchi saw this difficulty, and therefore explained Jareb as the name of some city of Assyria, or as another name of the country itself. The Syriac gives יָרְבִּ, yibrīb, as a name of a country, which is applied by Ephrem Syrus to Egypt, reference being made to Hoshea king of Israel, who had sent to the king of Egypt for assistance in his conspiracy against Shalmanezer (2 K. xviii. 4). So also the 'iaprēb or 'iaprēa of Theodoret is Egypt. The clause in which it occurs is supposed by many to refer to Judah, in order to make the parallelism complete; and with this in view Jarbi interprets it of Ahaz, who sent to Tithalth-Pleser (2 K. xvi. 8) to aid him against the combined forces of Syria and Israel. But there is no reason to suppose that the two clauses do not both refer to Ephraim, and the allusion would then be, as explained by Jerome, to Jel, who was subsidized by Menahem (2 K. xv. 10), and Judah would be indirectly included. The rendering of the Vulgate, "avenger" ("ad reorem utorem"), which follows Synagmaticus, as well as those of Aquila (סינאゲרנא) and Theodotion, "judge," are justified by Jerome from a reference to Jerubbaal, the name of Gideon, which he renders "uliscatur se Baal," or "judicet eum Baal," "let Baal avenge himself," or "let Baal judge him." The Targumist evidently looked upon it as a verb, the apecoated future Hiphil of יָרִב, rub, and translated the clause, "and sent to the king that he might come to avenge them." If it be a Hebrew word, it is most probably a noun formed from the above-mentioned root, like יָרִיב, yibrīb (Is. xli. 25; Ps. xxxv. 1), and is applied to the land of Assyria, or to its king, not in the sense in which it is understood in the Targum, but as indicating their determined hostility to Israel, and their general aggressive character. Cocceius had this idea before him when he translated it "rex adversarius." Michaelis (Synag. ad Lex. Hebr.), dissatisfied with the usual explanations, looked for the true meaning of Jareb in the Syriac root יָרְבִּ, treb, "to be great," and for "king Jarel" substituted "the great king," a title frequently applied to the kings of Assyria. If it were the proper name of a place, he says it would denote that of a castle or palace in which the kings of Assyria resided. But of this there can be no proof, the name has not descended to us, and it is better to take it in a symbolic sense as indicating the hostile character of Assyria. That it is rather to be applied to the country than to the king may be inferred from its standing in conjunction with Assur. Such is the opinion of Fürst (Itinere, s. v.), who illustrates the symbolic usage by a comparison with Rahab as applied to Egypt. At the same time he hazards a conjecture that it may have been an old Assyrian word, adopted into the Hebrew language, and so modified as to express an intelligible idea, while retaining something of its original form. Hitzig (die 12 M. Prop.) goes further, and finds in a mixed dialect, akin to the Assyrian, a verb יבשון, which denotes "struggle or fight," and ייבש, the Ethiopic for "a hero or bold warrior;" but it would be desirable to have more evidence on the point.

Two mystical interpretations, alluded to by Jerome as current among commentators in his time, are remarkable for the singularly opposite conclusions at which they arrived; the one referring the word to the Devil, the other to Christ. Rivetts (quoted by Glassius, Philol. Sacra, iv. tr. 3) was of opinion that the title Jareb or "avenger" was assumed by the powerful king of Assyria, as that of "Defender of the Faith" by our own monarchs.

JARED (גָּרֵד [descent, low ground], i. e. Jered, as the name is given in A. V. of Chr., but in pause יַרְד, from which the present form may have been derived, though more probably from the Vulgate: יָרְד, Alex. also יָרְד and [Lachm.] יָרְד [Tisch. יָרְד]: Joseph. יָרְד: Jareed), one of the antifilipian patriarchs, the fifth from Adam; son of Mahalaleel, and father of Enoch (Gen. v. 15, 16, 18, 19, 20; Luke iii. 37). In the list of Chronicles the name is given in the A. V. [as] Jered.

JARESFATH (גָּרֶסֶף [whom Jehovah nourishes]): Iarsafa: [Vat. tarapama: Jersio], a Benjamite, one of the Bene-Jeroham [sons of J.]; a chief man of his tribe, but of whom nothing is recorded (1 Chr. viii. 37).

JARHIA (גָּרְהִיא) [see at end of the art.]: Yarephai: [Comp. 'iaprēb: Abd. 'iaprād: Jeroa], the Egyptian servant of Sheshan, about the time of Eli, to whom his master gave his daughter and heir in marriage, and who thus became the founder of a chief house of the Jerneumelites, which continued at least to the time of King Hezekiah, and

5 In another place he gives "Jarib: יָדִיעָדיס vel uliscæus" (de Nom. Heb.)
from which sprung several illustrious persons such as Zalad in the reign of David, and Azariah in the reign of Josiah (1 Chr. ii. 31 ff.). [Azariah 5: Zara]. It is a matter of somewhat curious inquiry what was the name of Jarah's wife. In ver. 31 we read "the children of Shezban, Abiah," and in ver. 34, "Shezban and his daughter Attai." In ver. 35, Shezban's daughter "lived with Attai," whose grandson was Zalad; and in ch. xi. 41, "Zalad the son of Abiah." Hence some have imagined that Jarah in his marriage with Shezban's daughter had the name of Abiah (interpreted as a "brother-to-me") given him by Shezban, to signify his adoption into Israel. Others, that Abiah and Attai are merely clerical variations of the same name. Others, that Abiah was a son of Shezban, born after the marriage of his daughter. But the view which the A. V. adopts, as appears by their rendering [22 22] in ver. 31, the children of Shezban, instead of sons, is undoubtedly the right one; namely, that Abiah is the name of Shezban's daughter. Her descendants were called after her, just as Josiah and Ahilash, and Asahel, were always called "the sons of Zeruiah," and as Abigail stands at the head of Amasa's pedigree, 1 Chr. ii. 17. It may be noticed as an undoubted coincidence that Jarah the Egyptian was living with Shezban, a Jerahmeelite, and that the Jerahmeelites had their possessions on the side of Judah nearest to Egypt, 1 Sam. xxii. 10; comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, 21; Josh. xv. 21; 1 Chr. iv. 18. [Jeremiah; Judith.] The etymology of Jarah's name is quite unknown (Gen. Thes.; First, Concord., etc. [in his Wüster, Egyptian]; Burrington's General; Beeston, General; H giving every day, 198-203). It is the specification of the boundaries of Issachar, no mention is made of Jarah (see Josh. xix. 17-23), but a Remath is mentioned there (ver. 21); and in the duplicate list of Levitical cities (1 Chr. vi. 73) Ramath occupies the place of Jarash. The two names are modifications of the same root, and might without difficulty be interchanged. This Jarash does not appear to have been yet identified. [Remath.]

JAROH [i. aor. Theme]. "The"; Alex. Alexi; [comp, "Igap;", Jarash], a chief man of the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 14).

JASAEEL [jassa-lay], [Alex. Alexi; Jasa:--Jashen], a sone of David's guard in 2 Sam. xxiii. 32. In the Hebrew, as accepted by the Masorets, the words have no necessary connection with the names preceding or following them; but in the A. V. they are attached to the latter "of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan." The passage has every appearance of being imperfect, and accordingly, in the parallel list in Chronicles, it stands, "the sons of Hashen the Gibeonite (1 Chr. xi. 34). Kennicott has examined it at length (Disertation, pp. 188-203), and, on grounds which cannot here be stated, has shown good cause for believing that a name has escaped, and that the genuine text was, "of the Bene-Hashen, Gomi, Jonathan Jene-Shamah."

JRIB [i. aor. Theme]. "The,"; Alex. Alex; [comp, "Igap;", Jarash], a tribe of Gad. 1 Esdr. ix. 30. [Shelal]

JASHEN [i. aor. Theme]. "The,"; Alex. Alexi:--Jashen, Bene-Jashen — "sons of Jashen." — are named in the catalogue of the heroes of David's guard in 2 Sam. xxiii. 32. In the Hebrew, as accepted by the Masorets, the words have no necessary connection with the names preceding or following them; but in the A. V. they are attached to the latter — "of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan." The passage has every appearance of being imperfect, and accordingly, in the parallel list in Chronicles, it stands, "the sons of Hashen the Gibeonite (1 Chr. xi. 34). Kennicott has examined it at length (Disertation, pp. 188-203), and, on grounds which cannot here be stated, has shown good cause for believing that a name has escaped, and that the genuine text was, "of the Bene-Hashen, Gomi, Jonathan Jene-Shamah."

a * This design of the translators is not certain; for the A. V. often renders [22 22] "children," where it should be "sons."
JA\'SHER, BOOK OF

in the list given by Jerome in his Questions Hebraicæ, Jashen and Jonathan are both omitted.

JA\'SHER, BOOK OF (נשְׂרִי יאשׁר), or, as the margin of the A. V. gives it, the book of the upright, a record alluded to in two passages only of the O. T. (Josh. x. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18), and consequently the subject of much dispute. The former passage is omitted in the LXX, while in the latter the expression is rendered βιβλιον του ειρηνων: the Vulgate has liber iustitiae in both instances. The Peshito Syriac in Josh. has "the book of praises or hymns," reading יאשׁר for יאשׁר, and a similar transposition will account for the rendering of the same version in Sam., the "book of Ashir." The Targum interprets it "the book of the law," and this is followed by Jarchi, who, as the passage alluded to in Joshua, the prophecy of Jacob with regard to the future greatness of Ephraim (Gen. xliii. 19), which was fulfilled when the sun stood still at Joshua's bidding. The same Rabbi, in his commentary on Samuel, refers to Genesis as "the book of the upright, Abrah- am, Isaac, and Jacob," to explain the allusion to the book of Jasher; and Jerome, while discussing the etymology of "Israel," which he interprets as "rectus Dei," incidentally mentions the fact that Genesis was called "the book of the just" (litter Genesis appelatur eidoth, id est, justorum), from its containing the histories of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel (Comm. in Jes. xiv. 2). The Talmudists attribute this tradition to R. Johanan. R. Eliezer thought that by the book of Jasher was signified the book of Deuteronomy, from the expressions in Deut. vii. 7, xxviii. 7, the latter being quoted in proof of the skill of the Hebrews in archery. In the opinion of R. Samuel ben Nachman, the book of Judges was alluded to as the book of Jasher (Aboda Zara, c. ii.); and that it was the book of the twelve minor prophets was held by some Hebrew writers, quoted without name by Sixtus Senensis (Bibl. Sentic. lib. ii.). R. Levi ben Gershon recognizes, though he does not follow, the tradition given by Jarchi, while Kimchi and Abirahamel adopt the rendering of the Targum. This diversity of opinions proves, if it prove nothing more, that no book was known to have survived which could by any claim to the title of the book of Jasher.

Josephus, in relating the miracle narrated in Joshua x., appeals for confirmation of his account to certain documents deposited in the Temple (Ant. v. 1, § 17), and his words are supposed to contain a covert allusion to the book of Jasher as the source of his authority. But in his treatise against Apion (lib. i.) he says the Jews did not possess any book of Joshua, discordant and contradictory, but twenty-two only; from which Alück concludes that the books of Scripture were the sacred books hinted at in the former passage, while Masius understood by the same the Annals which were written by the prophets or by the royal scribes. Theodoret (Quast. xiv. in Jesuam Nota) explains the words in Josh. ii. 13, which he quotes as το του Βιβλίου του εἰρήνου (prob. an error for τον Βιβλίου, as he has in Quast. iv. 5, 2 Reg.), as referring to the ancient record from which the compiler of the book of Joshua derived the materials of his history, and applies the passage in 2 Sam. ii. 18 to prove that other documents, written by the prophets, were made use of in the composition of the historical books. Jerome, or rather the author of the Questions Hebraicæ, understood by the book of Jasher the books of Samuel themselves, insomuch as they contained the history of the last prophets; Samuel, Joshua, and Nathan. Another opinion, quoted by Sixtus Senensis, but on no authority, that it was the book of eternal procrastination, is scarcely worth more than the bare mention.

That the book of Jasher was one of the writings which perished in the Captivity was held by R. Levi ben Gershon, though he gives the traditional explanation above mentioned. His opinion has been adopted by Junius, Hottinger (Theor. Phil. ii. 2, § 2), and many other modern writers (Wolfio Bibl. Heb. ii. 223). What the nature of the book may have been can only be inferred from the two passages in which it is mentioned and their context, and, this being the case, there is clearly wide room for conjecture. The theory of Masius (quoted by Abicht) was, that in ancient times whatever was worthy of being recorded for the instruction of posterity, was written in the form of Annals by learned men, and that among those Annals or records was the book of Jasher, so called from the trustworthiness and methodical arrangement of the narrative, or because it contained the relation of the deeds of the people of Israel, who are elsewhere spoken of under the symbolic name Jeshurun. Of the later hypothesis First approves (Histoire, s. v.). Sanetus (Comm. ad 2 Reg. i.) conjectured that it was a collection of pious hymns written by different authors and sung on various occasions, and that from this collection the Psalter was compiled. That it was written in verse may reasonably be inferred from the only specimen extant, which exhibit unmistakable signs of metrical rhythm, but that it took its name from this circumstance is not supported by etymology. Lowth, indeed (Pref. pp. 306, 307), imagined that it was a collection of national songs, so called because it probably commenced with יאשׁר יאשׁר, וזו יישר, "then sang," etc., like the song of Moses in Ex. xvi. 1; his view of the question was that of the Syrian and Arabic translators, and was adopted by Herder. But, granting that the form of the book was poetical, a difficulty still remains as to its subject. That the book of Jasher contained the deeds of national heroes of all ages enshrined in verse, among which David's lament over Saul and Jonathan had an appropriate place, was the opinion of Calovius. A fragment of a similar kind is thought to appear in Num. xxxi. 14. Gesenius conjectured that it was an anthology of ancient songs, which acquired its name, "the book of the just or upright," from being written in praise of upright men. He quotes but does not approve, the theory of Ilglen that like the Hamasa of the Arabs, it celebrated the achievements of illustrious warriors, and from this derived the title of "the book of valor." But the idea of warriorlike valor is entirely foreign to the root יישר, Dupin contended from 2 Sam. i. 18, that the contents of the book were of a military nature; but Montanus, regarding rather the etymology, considered it a collection of political and moral precepts. Abicht, taking the lament of David as a sample of the whole, maintained that the fragment

a Dr. Donaldson had overlooked this passage when he wrote that his own analysis of the word "Israel" had hitherto escaped the notice of all commentators (Jashar, p. 23).
quoted in the book of Joshua was part of a funeral ode composed upon the death of that hero, and narrating his achievements. At the same time he does not conceive it necessary to suppose that one book only was composed to this event. It must be admitted, however, that there is very slight ground for any conclusion beyond that which affords the form, and that nothing can be confidently asserted with regard to the contents.

But, though conjecture might almost be thought to have exhausted itself on a subject so barren of premises, a scholar of our own day has not despaired of being able, not only to decide what the book of Jasher was in itself, but to reconstruct it from the fragments which, according to his theory, it traces throughout the several books of the O. T. In the preface to his Jashar, or Frag menta Arcvetigen Carminum Hebraicarum in Masoretico Versione Testamenti textu passim tesserunt, Dr. Donnaldson advances a scheme for the restoration of this ancient record, in accordance with his own idea of its scope and contents. Assuming that, during the tranquil and prosperous reign of Solomon, an unwonted impulse was given to Hebrew literature, and that the worshippers of Jehovah were desirous of possessing something on which their faith might rest, the book of "Jashar," or "uprightness," he asserts, was written, or rather compiled, to meet this want. Its object was to show that in the beginning man was upright, but had by carnal wisdom forsaken the spiritual law; that the Israelites had been chosen to preserve and transmit this law of uprightness; that David had been made king for his religious integrity, leaving the kingdom to his son Solomon, in whose reign, after the dedication of the Temple, the prosperity of the chosen people reached its culminating point. The compiler of the book was probably Nathan the prophet, asssisted perhaps by Gad the seer. It was thus "the first offspring of the prophetic school, and ministered spiritual food to the greater prophets."

Rejecting, therefore, the authority of the Masoretic text, as founded entirely on tradition, and adhering to his own theory of the origin and subject of the book of Jasher, Dr. Donnaldson proceeds to show that it contains the religious marrow of Holy Scripture. In such a case, of course, absolute proof is not to be looked for, and it would be impossible here to discuss what measure of probability should be assigned to a scheme elaborated with considerable ingenuity. Whatever ancient fragments in the sacred books of the Hebrews exhibit the nature of uprightness, celebrate the victories of the true Israelites, predict their prosperity, or promise future blessedness, have, according to this theory, a claim to be considered among the relics of the book of Jasher. Following such a principle of selection, the fragments fall into seven groups. The first part, the object of which is to show that man was created upright (יהוה, yishbhu), but fell into sin by carnal wisdom, contains two fragments. An Elohistic and a Jehovistic, both poetical, the latter being the more full.

The first of these includes Gen. i. 27, 28, vi. 1, 2, 4, 5, vii. 21, vi. 6, 3; the other is made up of Gen. ii. 7-9, 15-18, 25, iii. 1-19, 21, 23, 24. The second part, consisting of four fragments, shows how the descendants of Abraham, as being upright (יהוה, yeshurim), were adopted by God, while the neighboring nations were rejected. Fragment (1) Gen. ix. 18-31; fragment (2) Gen. iv. 2-8 8-16; fragment (3) Gen. xvi. 1-4, 15, 16, xvii. 9-16, 18-26, xxi. 1-14, 20, 21; fragment (4) Gen. xxv. 29-34, xxvii. 1-10, 14, 19-20, 25-40, iv. 18, 19, xxvii. 34, xxxvi. 2, iv. 25, 24, xxxvi. 8, xviii. 19, 21, 26, xxix. 1, xxvii. 24, 26, xxxv. 22-26, xxxiv. 25-30, xxxv. 9-14, 15, xxiii. 31. In the third part is related under the figure of the deluge how the Israelites escaped from Egypt, wandered forty years in the wilderness, and finally, in the reign of Solomon, built a temple to Jehovah. The passages in which this is found are Gen. v. 5-14, vii. 6, 11, 12, viii. 6, 7, 8, 12, v. 29, viii. 4; 1 K. vi., viii. 43; Is. xv. 18; and Judges, chapters of the fourth part contain the divine laws to be observed by the upright people, and are found (1) Dent. v. 1-22; (2) vi. 1-5; Lev. xix. 18; Dent. x. 12-21, xi. 1, 5-7, 9; (3) viii. 1-3, vi. 6-18, 20-25. The blessings of the upright and their admonitions are the subject of the fifth part, which contains the songs of Jacob (Gen. xxvi.), Isakamum (Num. xxii., xxiii.), and Moses (Dent. xxxii., xxxiii.). The wonderful victories and deliverances of Israel are celebrated in the sixth part, in the triumphal songs of Moses and Miriam (Ex. xv. 1-19), of Joshua (Josh. x. 12-13), and of Deborah (Judg. v. 1-20). The seventh is a collection of various hymns composed in the reigns of David and Solomon, and contains David's song of triumph over Goliath (1 Sam. ii. 1-10); his lament for Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 19-27), and for Abner (2 Sam. iii. 33, 34); his psalm of Thanksgiving (Ps. xvii., 2 Sam. xxii.); his triumphal ode on the conquest of the Edonites (Ps. l.), and his prophecy of Messiah's kingdom (2 Sam. xxii. 1-7), together with Solomon's epithalamium (Ps. lxxxv.), and the hymn sung at the dedication of the Temple (Ps. lxxviii.).

Among the many strange results of this arrangement, Shem, Ham, and Japhet are no longer the sons of Noah, who is Israel under a figure, but of Adam; and the circumstances of Noah's life related in Gen. ix. 18-27 are transferred to the latter. Cain and Abel are the sons of Shem, Abraham is the son of Abel, and Esau becomes Lamech the son of Methuselah.

There are also extant, under the title of "the Book of Jasher," two cabalistical works, written in A. D. 1394 by R. Shabbatai (a cabalistic copy in the Madrid Ms. exists in the Vatican Library; the other, by R. Thams, treats of the laws of the Jews in eighteen chapters, and was printed in Italy in 1544, and at Cracow in 1586. An anonymous work, printed at Venic and Prague in 1625, and said to have made its first appearance at Naples, was believed by some Jews to be the record alluded to in Joshua. It contains the historical narratives of the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, with many fabulous additions. R. Jacob translated it into German, and printed his version at Frankfurt on the Maine in 1674. It is said in the preface to the 1st ed. to have been thus covered at the destruction of Jerusalem, by Sidrus, one of the officers of Titus, who, while searching a house for the purpose of plunder, found in a secret chamber a vessel containing the books of the Law, the Prophets, and Hagiographa, with many others, which a vengeful man was reading. Sidrus took the old man under his protection and built for him.

A house at Seville, where the books were safely deposited. The book in question is probably the production of a Spanish Jew of the 13th century (Abicht, De Libro Recto, in Thes. Nov. Theol.-Phil. i. 525-534). A clumsy forgery in English, which first appeared in 1751 under the title of "The Book of Jasher," deserves notice solely for the unmerited success with which it was pushed upon the public. It professed to be a translation from the Hebrew into English by Alcuin of Britain, who discovered it in Persia during his pilgrimage. It was reprinted at Bristol in 1827, and was again published in 1833, in each case accompanied by a fictitious explanatory note by Wickliffe. [On this forgery, see Horne's Introduction, iv. 741 ff., 10th ed.—A.]

JASHOBEAM (יָשֹּבֶא) [the people return]]; 'ישבֶא, [Theo.; 'יָשֹּב] (Vat. שְּבָא); Alex. ישבֶא, ישָּבַי, ישָּבַי; Jeshuam, [Jeshobam]. Possibly one and the same follower of David, bearing this name, is described as a Hachmonite (1 Chr. xi. 11), a Korhite (1 Chr. xii. 8), and son of Zabdiel (1 Chr. xxvii. 2). He came to David at Ziklag. His distinguishing exploit was that he slew 300 (or 800, 2 Sam. xxii. 8) men at one time. He is named first among the chief of the mighty men of David (1 Chr. xi. 11); and he was set over the first of the twelve monthly courses of 24,000 men who served the king (xxvii. 2). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, his name seems to be erroneously transcribed, יָשֹּב (A. V. "that sat in the seat"), instead of ישָּבַי; and in the same place "Adino the Ezrite" is possibly a corruption either of יָשֹּב or ישָּבַי, "he set up his spear" (1 Chr. xi. 11), or, as Gesenius conjectures, of ישָּבַי or ישָּבַי, which he translated, "he shook it, even his spear." [EZRITE.] W. T. B.

JASHUB (יָשֹּב, [he who returns]); in the Cena of 1 Chr. vii. 1 it is יָשֹּב; in the Samaritan Cod. of Num. xxvi. יָשֹּב; [Vat. in 1 Chr. יָשֹּב;] Jashub. 1. The third son of Issachar, and founder of the family of the Jashubites (Num. xxvi. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 1). In the list of Gen. xlvii. the name is given (possibly in a contracted or erroneous form, Gen. Thee. p. 583) as Joub; but in the Samaritan Codex—followed by the I. X. X. — Jashub. 2. [Vat. Jăshuam, F.A. Jăshuam, by union with the preceding word.] One of the sons of Bani, a lyman in the time of Ezra, who had to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 29). In Ezra's name is Jăshu'am. JASHUBI-LEHEM (יָשֹּבִי-לֶהֶם) in some copies [בְּיָשֹּבִי לֶהֶם] (see below); [kai ἀνέστησον αὐτῶν, in both MSS.; et qui reversi sunt in Lehem], a person or a place named among the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah by Bath-sheba the Canaanite (1 Chr. iv. 22). The name does not occur again. It is probably a place, and we should infer from its connection with Maresha and Chezib— if Chezib be Cæzib or Achzib—that they lay on the western side of the tribe, in or near the Shefelah. The Jewish explanations of this and the following verse are very curious. They may be seen in Jerome's Quest. Hebr. on this passage, and, in a slightly different form, in the Targum on the Chronicles (ed. Wilkins, 29, 30). The mention of Moxb gives the key to the whole. Chezeba is Elimekech; Josah and Saraph are Mahlon and Chilion, who "had the dominion in Moxb" from marrying the two Moabitic damsels: Jashubi-Lehem is Naomi and Ruth, who returned (Jushub, from בָּשָׁב, "to return") to bread, or to Beth-lehem, after the famine: and the "ancient words" point to the book of Ruth as the source of the whole.

JASHUBITES, THE (יָשֹּבִיהָ) [patronym.]; Samaritan, יָשֹּבִיהָ; & 'iραεβί [Vat. -βεί]; Familia Jashubitana. The family founded by Jashub the son of Issachar (Num. xxvi. 24). [Jashub, i.]

JASIEL (יַסִּיאָל) [God creates]; 'יסיּאל; [Vat. Eσισβα; F.A. Εσισβα;] Alex. Εσισβα: Jisiel, the last named on the list of the heroes in 1 Chr. xi. 47. He is described as the Mesorah. Nothing more is known of him.

JASON (Ἰασών), a common Greek name which was frequently adopted by Hellenizing Jews as the equivalent of Jesus, Joshua (Ἰωσίου; comp. Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 1,) probably with some reference to its supposed connection with Ἰωσία (i.e. the Heider). A parallel change occurs in Alcimus (Elastim); while Nicodemos, Josithen, Memochus, etc., were direct translations of Hebrew names.

1. JASON THE SON OF ELEAZAR (cf. Esclus. i. 27, Ἰσίων ἱππότης Σαμαρίτης Ἰερουσαλημ; Cod. A.) was one of the commissioners sent by Judas Maccabees to conclude a treaty with the Romans b.c. 161 (1 Macc. viii. 17; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10, § 6).

2. JASON THE FATHER OF ANTIPATER, who was an envoy to Rome at a later period (1 Macc. xii. 16, vxx. 22), is probably the same person as No. 1.

3. JASON OF TYRENE, a Jewish historian who wrote "in five books," a history of the Jewish war of liberation, which supplied the chief materials for the second book of the Maccabees. (2 MACCABEES.) His name and the place of his residence seem to mark Jason as a Hellenistic Jew, and it is probable on internal grounds that his history was written in Greek. This narrative included the wars under Antiochus Epipator, and he must therefore have written after n. c. 192; but nothing more is known of him than that he can be gathered from 2 Macc. ii. 19-23.

4. [In 2 Macc. iv. 13, Alex. Εασών. JASON THE HIGH-PRIEST, the second son of Simon II., and brother of Onias III., who succeeded in obtaining the high-priesthood from Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 175 n. c.) to the exclusion of his elder brother (2 Macc. iv. 7-26; 4 Macc. iv. 17; Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 1). He labored in every way to introduce Greek customs among the people, and that with great success (2 Macc. iv. Joseph, l. c.). In order to give permanence to the changes which he designed, he established a gymnasium at Jerusalem, and even the priests neglected their sacred functions to take part in the games (2 Macc. iv. 9, 14), and at

With Mes Silas, it seems 1 to the 1 "onyx" to the LXX. 18). It is often used in the Book of Exodus (xxviii. 13), and the first of the twelve used in the foundations of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19): the difference in the order seems to show that no emblematical importance was attached to that feature. It was the stone employed in the superstructure (οὐδόμαςις) of the wall of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 18). It further appears among the stones which adorned the king of Tyre (Ez. xxviii. 13). Lastly, it is the emblematical image of the glory of the Divine Being (Rev. iv. 3). The characteristics of the stone, as far as they are specified in Scripture (Rev. xxi. 11), are that it was "most precious," and "like crystal" (κρυσταλλίαςωv; not exactly "clear as crystal," as in A. V., but of a crystal hue; the term is applied to it in this sense by Dioscorides (v. 160; λίθος ἰδιός, ὁ μῖν τίς ἦσσα σμαιρετής, ὁ δὲ κρυστάλλιαςωv;): we may also infer from Rev. iv. 3, that it was a stone of brilliant and transparent light. The stone which we name "jasper" does not accord with this description: it is an opaque species of quartz, of a red, yellow, green, or mixed brownish-yellow hue, sometimes striped and sometimes spotted, in no respect presenting the characteristics of the crystal. The only feature in the stone which at all agrees with the Scriptural account is that it admits of a high polish, and this appears to be indicated in the Hebrew name. With regard to the Hebrew name, LXX. and Vulg. render it by the "onyx" and "rubyl" respectively, and represent the jasper by the term γαθόβαν (A. V. "emerald"). There can be no doubt that the diamond would more adequately answer to the description in the book of Revelation, and unless that beautiful and valuable stone is represented by the Hebrew γαθόβαν and the Greek δαμάς, it does not appear at all in the passages quoted; for the term rendered "diamond" in Ex. xxviii. 18 really refers to the emerald. We are disposed to think, therefore, that though the names γαθόβαν, δαμάς, and jasper are identical, side of the hill lay the under stone of a very large all press — an undeniable evidence of the existence of olive-trees of old, where neither trace of tree or shrub remains. In several places we could perceive the ancient terracing in the hills, and there were many wells, all run dry, and partially choked with rubbish. The eastern face of the knoll consisted chiefly of natural caves once used as dwellings, enlarged, and with outer extensions of adobe. JAVAN (יוֹנָן: [in Is. and Ez., Ἰα- λάδι; in Dan. and Zech.] Ἑλληνείς: Greci or Greci· J a· v· a· ν· o· v). 1. A son of Japheth, and the father of Shishah and Tarshish, Kittim and Dodanim (Gen. xx. 4). The name appears in Is. xvi. 19, where it is coupled with Tarshish, Pulp, and Lud, and more particularly with Tultural and the “isles afar off,” as representatives of the Gentile world: again in Ez. xxvii. 13, where it is coupled with Tubal and Meshech, as carrying on considerable commerce with the Tyrians, who imported from these countries slaves and brazen weapons: in Dan. ii. 21, xi. 2, in reference to the Macedonian empire; and lastly in Zech. ix. 13, in reference to the Graeco-Syrian empire. From a comparison of these various passages there can be no doubt that Javan was regarded as the representative of the Greek race: the similarity of the name to that branch of the Hellenic family with which the Orientals were best acquainted, namely, the Ionians, particularly in the older form in which their name appears (Ἰωάνν) is too close to be regarded as accidental: and the occurrence of the name in the cuneiform inscriptions of the time of Sargon (about n. c. 709), in the form of ῾Ιωάνν or ῾Ιωνν, as descriptive of the isle of Cyprus, where the Assyrians first came in contact with the power of the Greeks, further shows that its use was not confined to the Hebrews, but was widely spread throughout the East. The name was probably introduced into Asia by the Phoenicians, to whom the Ionians were naturally better known than any other of the Hellenic races, on account of their commercial activity and the high prosperity of their towns on the western coast of Asia Minor. The extension of the name westward to the general body of the Greeks, as they became known to the Hebrews through the Phoenicians, was but a natural process, analogous to that which we have already had to notice in the case of Chittim. It can hardly be imagined that the early Hebrews themselves had any actual acquaintance with the Greeks: it is, however, worth mentioning as illustrative of the communication which existed between the Greeks and the East, that among the artists who contributed to the ornamentation of Esrahalbin’s palaces the names of several Greek artists appear in one of the inscriptions (Rawlinson’s Herod., i. 484). At a later period the Hebrews must have gained considerable knowledge of the Greeks through the Egyptians. Pammachemus (n. c. 664-610) employed Ionians and Carianis as mercenaries, and showed them so much favor that the war-caste of Egypt forsook him in a body: the Greeks were settled near Bulusatis, in a part of the country with which the Jews were familiar (Herod. ii. 154). The same policy was followed by the succeeding monarchs, especially Anaxias (571-529), who gave the Greeks Naucratia as a commercial emporium. It is tolerably certain that any information which the Hebrews acquired in relation to the Greeks must have been through the indirect means to which we have adverted: the Greeks themselves were very slightly acquainted with the eastern coast of Syria until the invasion of Alexander the Great. The earliest notices of Palestine occur in the works of Hecataeus (n. c. 549-486), who mentions only the towns Canytis and Car- dutys; the next are in Herodotus, who describes the country as Syria Palastina, and notices incidentally the towns Ascalon, Azotus, Ezelatana (Ezetanoe?), and Cydysis, the same as the Canytis of Hecataeus, probably Gaza. These towns were on the border of Egypt, with the exception of the uncertain Ezelatana: and it is therefore highly probable that no Greek had, down to this late period, travelled through Palestine.

2. [Rom. Vat. Alex. omit: Comp. Ἰωάνν]: Ἱωάνν; Ἱωάννα: Græcia.] A town in the southern part of Arabia (Yemen), whither the Phenicians traded (Ez. xxvii. 19): the connection with Uzal decides in favor of this place rather than Greece, as in the Vulg. The same place may be noticed in Joel iii. 6; the parallelism to the Sabæans in ver. 8, and the fact that the Phenicians bought instead of selling slaves to the Greeks (Ez. xxvii. 13), are in favor of this view.

JAVAN, SONS OF (יוֹנָן יִשְׂרְאֵל; ᾿Ιωάνν ᾿Ισραήλ; ᾿Ιωᾶνν ῾Ισραήλ) in the A. V., “the Grecians,” and in the margin, “sons of the Grecians,” Joel iii. 6 (iv. 6 Heb.). That the Ionians or Greeks are meant in this passage of Joel, and not a place or tribe in Arabia (see JAVAN, 2), is the generally adopted view of scholars (Hitzig, Havernick, Ritschel, Delitzsch). According to this supposition, it is true, the Sidonians and Tyrians are said by Joel to sell their Jewish captives to the Greeks, and by Ezekiel (xxvii. 13), to purchase prisoners possibly among them Greek slaves, from the Greeks themselves. The one statement, however, does not exclude the other. The traffic of the Phenician slave-dealers, like that of modern slave-dealers, would consist almost inevitably of both the buying and selling of slaves. Greek female slaves were in great request among the oriental nations, especially the Persians (see Herod. iii. 134), and Tyre and Sidon were the ports to which they would naturally be brought in the prosecution of this trade. The Greeks loved liberty for themselves, but, especially in the anti-historic times to which Joel belonged, were not above enslaving and selling those of their own race for the sake of gain. On the other hand, it is notorious that the Greeks at all periods were accustomed to capture or buy men of other nations as slaves, either for their own use, or to sell them to foreigners. On the slave-trade of the Phenicians and the Greeks, see the statements of Dr. Pusey, Joel, p. 134 f.

The name of the Arabian Javan (Ez. xxvii. 19) had no doubt the same origin as the Ionian or Greek Javan. But what that origin was is not certain. Some conjecture that Javan in Arabia was originally a Greek colony which had gone...

quite similarity enough to allow of the one being a corruption of the other, though the fact is not ascertainable.

JEBERECHIAH (גֵּרֶכְיָה), with the final father of a certain Zechariah, in the reign of Ahaz, mentioned Is. vii. 2. As this form occurs nowhere else, and both the LXX. and Vulgate have Berechiah, it is probably only an accidental corruption.
Possibly a was in some copy by mistake attached to the preceding תֹּז, so as to make it plural, and thence was transferred to the following word, Berechiah. Berechiah and Zechariah are both common names among the priests (Zech. i. 1). These are not the Zacharias and Barachias mentioned as father and son, Matt. xxvii. 55, as it is certain that Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, in the reign of Josiah, is the same name, but here, be of the same family; and if Berechiah was the father of the house, not of the individuals, the same person might be meant in Is. vii. 2 and Matt. xxvii.
35. It is singular that Josephus (B. J. iv. 5, § 4) mentions another Zacharias, son of Barchus, who was slain by the Jews in the Temple shortly before the last siege of Jerusalem began. (See Whiston's note, ad loc.)

JEBUS (גָּבָע) [see infra:] JEBOUS: Jebus), one of the names of Jerusalem, the city of the Je-bsites, also called Jerus. It occurs only twice:
first in connection with the journey of the Levite and his unhappy encounter with Bethlehem to Gilead (Judg. xii. 9, 11); and secondly, in the narrative of the capture of the place by David in 1
Ch. xi. 4, 5. In 2 Sam. v. 9-9 the name Jerusalem is employed. By Gesenius (Thes. 189, בֶּהָד) and Furst (Hebrah. 477) Jebus is interpreted to mean a place dry or down-trodden like a threshing-floor; an interpretation which by Delitzsch (55) and Stanley (§ 0. p. 177) is taken to prove that Jebus must have been the south-western hill of the "dry rock" of the modern Zion, and "not the Mount Moriah, the city of Solomon, in whose centre rose the perennial spring." But in the great uncertainty which attends these ancient names, this is, to say the least, very doubtful. Jebus was the city of the Jebusites. Either the name of the town is derived from the name of the tribe, or the reverse.
If the former, then the interpretation just quoted falls to the ground. If the latter, then the origin of the name of Jesus is thrown back to the very beginning of the Canaanite race — so far at any rate as to make its connection with a Hebrew root extremely uncertain.

* Jebus and Jerusalem need not be understood as interchangeable or coextensive names in 2 Sam.
v. 6, but differing only as a part from the whole, like Zion and Jerusalem in Joel ii. 32 (iii. 5, Hebr.).
For evidence that Jesus was the southwest hill, afterward called Mount Zion or the City of David, see Dr. Weckott's addition to Jerusalem (Amer.
ed.). It has seemed hitherto almost inadmissible that the Jebusites could have kept this aeropilo for so long a time, while the Hebrews dwelt almost under its shadow (Judg. i. 21). Recent excavations have thrown light on this singular fact, for the Jebusites placed their citadel on this very hill; for though Jebus appears at present almost on a level with some parts of the city, it is now proved beyond a ques-
JEBUSI

In that it was originally an isolated summit, picturesque as implied in the account of its capture by David. It was protected not only by the deep ravine of Hinnom on the south and west, and the Tyropoön on the east, but by a valley which ran from the Jaffa gate to the Tyropoön on the north side of the mount. This last valley has been laid bare, showing at different points a depth of 20 and 33 feet below the present surface, and in one instance a depth of nearly 80 feet below the brow of Zion. It is one spot a fragment of the ancient northern rampart of Zion was brought to light. "It was built close against the cliff, and though only rising to the top of the rock behind, it was yet 30 feet high toward the ravine in front." (Recent Researches in Jerusalem, reprinted from the British Quarterly Review, October, 1897, in the Theol. Eccle. c. 393; and Ordinance Survey of Jerusalem, p. 61, Lond. 1889). It is not surprising, therefore, that the subjugation of this stronghold should be reserved for the prowess of David, and be recorded as one of his greatest exploits (2 Sam. v. 6-8).

The occurrence of this name in the account of the Levite's homeward journey (Judg. xix. 10 ff.) suggests a remark or two on the local allusions which occur in the narrative. Jebus or Jerusalem is a short 2 hours from Bethlehem, and hence, the party leaving the latter place somewhat late in the afternoon (as appears more clearly from the Hebrew than in the A. V., see Judg. ix. 9, 11), they would be off against Jerusalem near the close of the day, as stated in ver. 11. Their journey lay along the west side of that city: and this may be a reason why it is spoken of as Jebus rather than Jerusalem. The servant proposed that they should remain here over night, as the time now left was barely sufficient to enable them to reach the next halting-place. But the Levite objected to this, and insisted that they should proceed further and lodge either in Gibeah or in Kiriath, an association of the places which implies that they were near each other and on the route of the travellers. One of these exists still under its ancient name Er-Ruma, and the other, such explorers as Robinson, Van de Velde, Porter, identify with Tell el-Ful: both of them on heights which overlook the road, nearly opposite each other, 2 or 3 hours further north from Jerusalem. According to the road they that as the Levite and his company drew near Gibeah "the sun went down upon them," in precise accordance with the time and the distance. Here occurred the terrible crime which stands almost without a parallel in Jewish history. Shiloh was the Levite's destination, and on the morrow, pursuing still further this northern road, he would come into a few hours to that seat of the Tabernacle, or "house of the Lord," as it is called, ver. 18.

JEBUSI (יְבֻשִּׁי; יבושי; [Tisch.; יבושי], Holmes, Bes; Alex. יבושי) Jevousis, [Jebus], the name employed by the interpreter for the inhabitants only in the account do not describing the landmarks and the towns of the allotment of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16, 28). In the first and last place the explanatory words, "which is Jerusalem," are added. In the first, however, our translators have given it as "the Jebusites." A parallel to this mode of designating the town by its inhabitants is found in this very list in Zemaraim (xviii. 22), Avim (23), Ophni (24); and Japhletite (xvi. 3), etc.

G.

JEBUSITE, JEBUSITES, THE. Although these two forms are indiscriminately employed in the A. V., yet in the original the name, whether applied to individuals or to the nation, is never found in the plural; always singular. The usual form is יְבֻשִּׁי; but in a few places — namely, 2 Sam. v. 6, xxiv. 16, 18; 1 Chr. xxii. 18 only — it is יבושי. Without the article, יבושי, it occurs in 2 Sam. v. 8; 1 Chr. xi. 6; Zech. ix. 7.

In the two first of these the force is much increased by removing the article introduced in the A. V., and reading "and smiteh a Jebusite." We do not hear of a progenitor to the tribe, but the name which would have been his, had he existed, has attached itself to the city in which we meet with the Jebusites in historic times. [Jerms.] The LXX. give the name Ἰβουράζων: [In Judg. xix. 11, Ιβουράων, Βατ. -ςει; in Ezek. i. 1, Ιβουράων, Βατ. Αλεξ.-ετίς] Vulg. Jebusus. 1. According to the table in Genesis x., the "Jebusite" is the third son of Canaan. His place in the list is between Heth and the Amorites (Gen. x. 16; 1 Chr. i. 14), a position which the tribe maintained in later times (Num. xxiv. 20; Lev. xxv. 35, 36), and the same connection is traceable in the words of Ezekiel (xiii. 4, 45), who addresses Jerusalem as the fruit of the union of an Amorite with a Hittite. But in the formula by which the Promised Land is so often designated, the Jebusites are uniformly placed last, which may have arisen from their small number, or their quiet disposition. See Gen. xv. 21; Ex. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5, xxiii. 39, xxxiii. 2, xxiv. 11; Deut. vii. 1, xx. 17; Josh. iii. 10, ix. 4, xii. 8, xxiv. 11; 1 K. ix. 20; 2 Chr. vii. 7; Ezek. i. 1; Neh. ix. 3.

2. Our first glimpse of the actual people in the invaluable report of the spies — "the Hittite, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite dwell in the mountain" (Num. xiii. 29). This was forty years before the entrance into Palestine, but no change in their habitat had been made in the interval; for when Joshua organized his rising against Jehovah he sent amongst others "to the Amorite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountain" (Josh. xi. 3). A mountain-tripe they were, and mountain-tripe they remained, "Jebus, which is Jerusalem," lost its king in the slaughter of Beth-horon (Josh. x. 1, 5, 26; comp. xii. 10) — was sacked and burnt by the men of Judah (Judg. ii. 21), and its citadel finally sealed and occupied by David (2 Sam. v. 9), and still the Jebusite, who inhabited Jerusalem, the "inhabitants of the land," could not be expelled from their mountain-seat, but continued to dwell with the children of Judah and Benjamin to a very late date (Josh. xvi. 8, 63; Judg. i. 21, xix. 11). This obstinacy is characteristic of mountain-dwellers, and the few traits we possess of the Jebusites show them as a warlike people. Before the conquest under Jabin, Adoni-Zedek, the king of Jerusalem, had himself headed the attack on the Gibeonites, which ended in the slaughter of Beth-horon, and cost him his life on that eventful evening under the trees at Makkedah. That they were established in the strongest natural a In ver. 5 the king of Jerusalem is styled one of the "five kings of the Amorites." But the LXX. [both MSS.] have τιν εβουραζον of the Jebusites'

JECAMIAH

After this they emerge from the darkness but once, in the person of Araunah the Jebusite, "Aramman the king (אֶרְמָן הַרְוָי), who appears before us in true kingly dignity in his well-known transaction with David (2 Sam. xxiv. 23; 1 Chr. xxi. 2). The picture presented us in these well-known passages is a very interesting one. We see the fallen Jebusite king and his four sons on their threshing-floor on the bald top of Mount Moriah, treading out their wheat (-hashem; A. V. "threshing") by driving the oven with the heavy sledges (קָרָא הָעַד). A. V. "threshing instruments") over the corn, round the central heap. We see Araunah on the approach of David fall on his face on the ground, and we hear him ask, "Why is my lord the king come to his slave?" followed by his willing surrender of all his property. But this reveals no traits peculiar to the Jebusites, or characteristic of them more than of their contemporaries in Israel, or in the other nations of Canaan. The early Judges and kings of Israel threshed wheat in the wine-press (Judg. vi. 11), followed the herd out of the field (1 Sam. xi. 5), and were taken from the sheep-cotes (2 Sam. vii. 8), and the pressing courtesy of Araunah is closely paralleled by that of Epherion the Hittite in his negotiation with Abraham.

We are not favored with further traits of the Jebusites, nor with any clue to their religion or race.

Two names of individual Jebusites are preserved. In אָדוֹנֵי-זֶבֶק the only remarkable thing is its Hebrew form, in which it means "Lord of justice."

That of Aramman is much more uncertain — so much as to lead to the belief that we possess it more nearly in its original shape. In the short narrative of Samuel alone it is given in three forms — "the Aramman" (ver. 10); Araunah (18); Araonah, or Uzziah (20, 21). In Chronicles it is Aram, while by the LXX. it is ὁ πρεσβύτερος, and by Josephus ‘Οφρεών. [Aramah; Orion.]

In the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles the ashes of Barnabas, after his martyrdom in Cyprus, are said to have been buried in a cave, "where the race of the Jebusites formerly dwelt," and previously to this is mentioned the arrival in the island of a "pious Jebusite, a kinsman of Ner" (Act. Apoc. Apoc. pp. 72, 73, ed. Tisch.).

JECAMIAH (יהכמן), i. e. Jekhamiah, as the name is elsewhere given [he who assembles the people]: יְהֹהֵךְ, [Vat. Alex. πρεσβύτερος; Jerusalem.]

This is the name of one of David's chief friends (2 Sam. xxi. 26; 2 Chr. xi. 14), and to have been expressly spared by him when the citadel was taken. If there is any truth in this, David no doubt made his friendship during his wanderings, when he also acquired that of Uriah the Hittite, Abimelech, Sibbecah, and others of his associates who belonged to the old nations.

Amaziah king of Judah, and mother of Amaziah or Uzziah his successor (2 K. xx. 2). Both this queen and Jehoadaiah, the mother of her husband, are specified as "of Jerusalem." In the A. V. of Chronicles her name is given as Jehocalia.

JECHONIYAS (ירכונייהו; Jerchonias). 1. The Greek form of the name of Jehochaniah, followed by our translators in the books rendered from the Greek, namely, Esth. xi. 4; Bar. i. 3, 9. Matt. i. 11, 12. 2. 1 Esdr. viii. 92. [Scherenhausi.

JECOLIAH (יהכלייהו; see above]: יְכַלִּיהו; [Vat. Alex. דניאל; Jer. xxviii. 3. In the original the name differs from its form in the parallel passage in Kings, only in not having the final n. [Jecollya.]

JECONIAH (יהכנייהו; excpeting once, יְכַנייהו, with the final n., Jer. xxviii. 1; and once in Esth. xxii. 3. Jer. xxviii. 20 [Jehovah esatablished]: יְכַנְיָהו; Jerchonia]. an altered form of the name of Jehovah, last but one of the kings of Judah, which is found in the following passages: 1 Chr. iii. 16, 17; Jer. xxiv. xvi. xxvii. xxviii. iv, xxiv. 2; Esth. ii. 6. It is still further abbreviated to Coniah. See also Jechonias and Joaam.

JECONTAS (ירכוניתא, Jerchoniah), 1 Esdr. i. 9. [Jechonias, 3.]

JEDAIJAH (יְדֹאֶיָהו; Jeshua joam): יְדֹאֶיָהו, יְדוֹאֶיָהו, יְדוֹאֶיָהו, etc.: [I. D.; Jeoh, Jeoh, Jeoh, Jeoh; Jer. xxxvii. 1]. Head of the second course of priests, as they were divided in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 7). Some of them survived to return to Jerusalem after the Babylonian Captivity, as appears from Esth. iv. 36, Neh. vii. 30 — "the children of Jedahiah, of the house of Jehuah, 973." The addition of "the house of Jehuah" indicates that there were two priestly families of the name of Jedahiah, which, it appears from Neh. xii. 6, 7, 19, 21, was actually the case. If these sons of Jedahiah had for their head Jeshua, the high-priest in the time of Zerubbabel, as the Jewish tradition says they had (Levi's Orig. Rel. ii. c. 1); this may be the reason why, in 1 Chr. xix. 10, and Neh. xi. 10, the course of Jedahiah is named before that of Joiarib, though Joiarib's was the first course. But perhaps Jehuah was another priest descended from Jehuah, from whom this branch sprung. It is certainly a corrupt reading in Neh. xi. 10 which makes Jehuah son of Joiarib. 1 Chr. xi. 10 preserves the true text. In Esdras the name is Jedahiah.

2. [u יְדֹאֶיָהו יַעֲלֵי: Jedubia]: A priest in the time of Jehuah the high-priest (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

JEDAIJAH [3 syl.] (יְדֹאֶיָהו; [praise of Je- roboh, Gen.]). This is a different name from the last, though the two are identical in the A. V.

1. (I. D.; [Vat. Edia]; Alex. Edia: Iedubia): A man named in the genealogies of Simeon as a forefather of Ziza, one of the chiefs of the tribe.

A. C. II.

JECHOLIYAH (יהכולייהו; Jerobiah is mighty), with the final n: יְכַלִּיָהו; [Vat. Xelia, Alex. יְכַלִּיָהו: Joseph, יְכַלִּיָהו: Jecheleth], wife a By Josephus (Ant. xiii. 7, § 9) Aramman is said to have been the son of David's chief friends (2 Sam. xxi. 26; 2 Chr. xi. 14), and to have been expressly spared by him when the citadel was taken. If there is any truth in this, David no doubt made his friendship during his wanderings, when he also acquired that of Uriah the Hittite, Abimelech, Sibbecah, and others of his associates who belonged to the old nations.

2. ('Iṣaḥa; [Vat. Iṣaḥa; C'] Jēbūd; 1 Esdr. v. 24). Son of Harumaph; a man who did his part in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

A chief patriarch of the tribe of Benjamin, from whom sprung many Benjaminite houses of fathers, numbering 17,250 mighty men of valor, in the days of David (1 Chr. vii. 6, 11). It is usually assumed that Jedidiah is the same as Ashbel (Gen. xlv. 31; Num. xxvi. 38; 1 Chr. viii. 1). But though this may be so, it cannot be affirmed with certainty. [Becher; Bella.]. Jedidiah might be a later descendant of Benjamin not mentioned in the Pentateuch, but who, from the fruitfulness of his house and the decadence of elder branches, rose to the first rank.

3. [ʼIṣḥāḏā; Vat. Ḫēḏerā; Jēdīlēk]. Son of Shimi; one of the heroes of David's guard in the enlarged catalogue of Chronicles (1 Chr. xii. 49). In the absence of further information, we cannot decide whether or not he is the same person as

JEDI'DAH (ʼiṣḥāḏá), darling [or only one]: ʼIṣḥāḏa; [Vat. Iṣḥa; Alex. Ḩēḏāš; [C+w.] [产业园; Iṭēḏāša]: ʼIṣḥāḏa,] queen of Amon, and mother of the good king Josiah (2 K. xxii. 1). She was a native of Boshath near Lechith, the daughter of a certain Adiah. By Josephus (Ant. x. 4, § 1) her name is given as ʾIṣḥāḏa.

JEDID'AH (ʼiṣḥāḏā; [darling of Jehovah]; ʾIṣḥāḏā; [Vat. ʾIṣḥa; Alex. Eḏāša; Amonbale Dominc]: ʾIṣḥāḏa), the name bestowed, through Nathan the prophet, on David's son Solomon (2 Sam. xii. 25).

Bath-seba's first child had died — "Jehovah struck it" (ver. 15). A second son was born, and David — whether in allusion to the state of his external affairs, or to his own restored peace of mind — called his name Shelomōh ("Peaceful"); and Jehovah loved the child, i. e. allowed him to live. (1 K. i. 1). "Jedidah" was sent by the hand of Nathan to obtain through him some oracle or token of the Divine favor on the babe, and the babe's name was called Jedidah. It is then added that this was done "because of Jehovah." The clue to the meaning of these last words, and indeed of the whole circumstance, seems to reside in the fact that "Jedidah" and "David" are both derived from the same root, or from two very closely related (see Gesen. Thes. 565 a — "ʾiṣḥāḏ, idem quad ʾiṣḥāḏ"). To us these plays on words have little or no significance: but to the old Hebrews, as to the modern Orientals, they were full of meaning. To David himself, the "darling" of his family and his people, no more happyomen, no more precious seal of his restoration to the Divine favor after his late fall, could have been afforded, than this announcement by the prophet, that the name of his child was to combine his own name with that of Jehovah; "ah — Jehovah and peace." The practice of bestowing a second name on children, in addition to that given immediately on birth — such second name having a religious bearing, as Noor-ed-Din, Saleh-ed-Din (Saladin), etc. — still exists in the East.

* JEDITHUN. [Jeduthun.]

JEDUTHUN (ʼiṣḥuṯuṯ), except in 1 Chr. xvi. 38; Neh. xi. 7; Ps. xxxix. title; and lvii. title, where it is ʼIṣḥuṯuṯ, i. e. Jeduthun [pronosing, or he who pronounces], ʼIṣḥuṭuṯ, or ʼIṣḥuṭo; [Vat. Ḧēḏuṭuṯ, ʼIṣḥuṯuṯ, Ḧēḏuṭuṯ, etc.]: Ḧōḏuṭuṯ, Jeduthun, 15, Ḧēḏuṭuṯ, Vat. Ḫēḏuṭuṯ, Jedidum], a Levite of the family of Merari, who was associated with Heman the Kohathite, and Asaph the Gershonite, in the conduct of the musical service of the tabernacle, in the time of David; according to what is said 1 Chr. xxiii. 6, that David divided the Levites into courses among the sons of Levi, namely, Gershom, Kohath, and Merari. The prefix of his name being Merari, it depends upon his identification with Ethan in 1 Chr. xv. 17, who, we learn from that passage as well as from the genealogy in vi. 44 (A. V.), was a Merarite [Heb.]. But it may be added that the very circumstance of Ethan being a Merarite, which Jeduthun must have been (since the only reason of there being three musical chiefs was to have one for each division of the Levites), is a strong additional proof of this identity. Another proof may be found in the mention of Hosah (xvi. 38, 42), as a son of Jeduthun, and a gatekeeper, compared with xxvi. 10, where we read that Hosah was of the children of Merari. Assuming then that, as regards 1 Chr. vii. 44, xv. 17, 19, Ḧēḏuṯuṯ is a mere clerical variation for ʾIṣḥuṯuṯ — which a comparison of xv. 17, 19 with xvi. 41, 42, xxv. 1, 3, 6, 2 Chr. xxxv. 15, makes almost certain — we have Jeduthun's descents as son of Kish, or Kushhiah, from Mahli, the son of Mushli, the son of Merari, the son of Levi, being the fourteenth generation from Levi inclusive. His office was generally to preside over the music of the temple service, consisting of the nebel, or nabiim, the shoom, or harp, and the cymbals, together with the human voice (the trumpets being confined to the priests). But his peculiar part, as well as that of his two colleagues Heman and Asaph, was "to blow with the trumpets of brass," while the others played on the nabiim and the harp. This appointment to the office was by election of the chiefs of the Levites (ʾIṣḥuṯuṯ).

[2 Sam. vi. 10] mentioned in the same verse who was probably a Kohathite (Josh. xxi. 24).
at David's command, each of the three divisions probably choosing one. The first occasion of Jeda- thun's ministering was when David brought up the ark to Jerusalem. He then took his place in the procession, and played on the cymbals. But when the division of the Levitical services took place, owing to the tabernacle being at Gibeaon and the ark at Jerusalem, while Asaph and his brethren were appointed to minister before the ark, it fell to Jehuthun and Heman to be located with Zadok the priest, to give thanks "before the tabernacle of the Lord in the high place that was at Gibeon," still by playing the cymbals in accommodation to the other musical instruments (comp. Ps. cl. 5). In the account of Josiah's Passover in 2 Chr. xxxv. reference is made to the singing as conducted in accordance with the arrangements made by David, and by Asaph, Heman, and Jehuthun the king's (1224 1245 (HEMAN.). Perhaps the phrase rather means the king's adviser in matters connected with the musical service. The sons of Jehuthun were employed (1 Chr. xxv.) partly in music, namely, six of them, who prophesied with the harp — Gedaliah, head of the 20th, Zerii, or Zeri, of the 4th, Josiah of the 8th, Shimeii of the 10th, Hashbshiah of the 12th, and Mat- tithiah of the 14th; and partly as gatekeepers (A. V. "porters") (xxxv. 42), namely, Obed-Edom and Hosah (v. 38), which last had thirteen sons and brothers (xxxv. 11). The triple division of the Levitical musicians seems to have lasted as long as the Temple, and each to have been called after their respective leaders. At the dedication of Sol- omon's temple the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jehuthun, performed their proper part. In the reign of Hez- kiah, again, we find the sons of Asaph, the sons of Heman, and the sons of Jehuthun, taking their part in purifying the Temple (2 Chr. xxi. 13, 14): they are mentioned, we have seen, in Josiah's reign, and so late as Nehemiah's time we still find de- scendants of Jehuthun employed about the singing; (Neh xi. 17, 1 Chr. ix. 16). His name stands at the head of the 39th, 62d, and 77th Psalms, indicat- ing probably that they were to be sung by his choir. A. C. H.

In the title of Ps. xxxix. Jehuthun doth not appear as the precursor or choir-master under whose lead the psalm was to be sung. But in the titles of Ps. liii. and lxxvii. (where the proposition is the 32nd, and not the 31st, as in the other case) Jehuthun probably denotes a body of singers named after this chorister, and consisting in part, at least, of his sons or descendants (see 2 Chr. xxiii. 14), though not excluding others. The A. V. does not recog- nize this difference of the propositions. Of all the conjectures, that least satisfactory, says Hulpefeld, which makes Jehuthun the name of a musical instru- ment, or of a particular melody. The ready interchange of 59, and 57 accounts for the two-fold orthography of the name.

JEEZER (JEEZER [father, or author of help] (Myriotes: Hizer), the form assumed in the list in Numbers (xxvi. 40) by the name of a descendent of Manasseh, eldest son of Gilead, and founder of one of the chief families of the tribe 47; as exa- rist). In parallel lists the name is given as ABEZER, and the family as the ABEZERITES — the house of Gideon. Whether this change has arisen from the accidental addition or omission of a letter, or is an intentional variation, akin to that in the case of Abel and Jethul, cannot be ascer- tained. The LXX. perhaps read BAEZER.

JEEZERITES. THE (JEEZER) [patronym.] - (Alex. Myriotes; famille Hizereret), the family of the foregoing (Num. xxxv. 9).

JEGAR SAHADUTHA (Margar-Saddutha; Jager, magus, heep of testimony: Bovnus tis maioritias [see below]: tumultus testis). The Armenian name given by Laban the Syrian to the heap of stones which he erected as a memorial of the compact between Jacob and himself, while Jacob commemorated the same by giving it a pillar (Gen. xxxv. 17), as was his custom on several other occasions. Galeed, a "witness heap," which is given as the Hebrew equivalent, does not exactly represent Jegar-sahadutha. The LXX. have preserved the distinction accurately in rendering the latter by Bovnus tis majoritias [Alex. magistros], and the former by Μαρτύρας [Alex. marturos]. The Vulgate, oddly enough, has transposed the two, and translated Galeed by "acervus testimoni," and Jegar-sahadutha by "tumultus testis." But in the mind of the writer they were evidently all but identical, and the manner in which he has adapted the name to the circumstances narrated, and to the locality which was the scene of the transaction, is a curious instance of a tendency on the part of the Hebrews, of which there are many examples in the O. T., so to modify an already existing name that it might convey to a Hebrew an intellligible idea, and at the same time preserve essentially its original form. There is every reason to believe that the name Gil- ead is derived from a root which points to the natural features of the region to which it is applied, and to which it was in all probability attached be- fore the meeting of Jacob and Laban, or at any rate before the time at which the historian was writing. In fact it is used in verses 23 and 25 of this chapter. The memorial heap erected by Laban marked a crisis in Jacob's life which severed him from all further intercourse with his Syrian kindred, and henceforth his wanderings were mainly confined to the land which his descendants were to inherit. Such a crisis, so commemorated, was thought by the historian of sufficient importance to have left its impress upon the whole region, and in Galeed "the witness heap" was found the original name of the mountainous district Gilead. A similar etymology is given for Mizraim in the parenthetical clause consisting of the latter part of illustrations of this ; and there are many such. This tendency is not peculiar to the Hebrews. It exists in every language, but has not yet been recognized in the case of Hebrew.

48 and 49, which is not likely to have been suggested, though it is not so stated, by the similarity between הָאַלְעָה, nitegeh, and הָאַלְעָה, natazethah, the “standing stone” or “statue” which Jacob set up to be his memorial of the transmigration, as the heap of stones was Laban’s. On this pillar or standing stone he swore by Jehovah, the “fear of his father’s house,” as Laban over his heap invoked the God of Abraham, and Nahor, the God of their father Terah; each marking, by the most solemn form of adjuration he could employ, his own sense of the grave nature of the compact.

JEHALELEEL (םֹּלְכֹּל) [he who praises God]: [Vat. יָבָּהָל; Alex. יָבָּהָל Jaledel]. Four men of the Bene-Jehaleleel are introduced abruptly into the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 16). The name is identical with that rendered in the A. V. JEHALELEEL. Neither form is, however, quite correct.

JEHALLELEL (םֹּלְלֹל) [as above]: [Vat. יָבָּהָל; Alex. יָבָּהָל: Jabuleel], a Moraite Levite, whose son Azariah took part in the restoration of the Temple in Hezekiah’s time (2 Chr. xxix. 12).

JEHDEIAH [3 syl.] (יהַדִּיָּה), i.e., Yechde-ya’hu; [whom Jehovah makes joyful]. 1. (יְהַדִּיָּה: [Vat. יָהַדִּיָּה]: Alex. יָהַדִּיָּה: Jadael). The representative of the Bene-Shubael, — descendants of Gershom, son of Moses — in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 20). But in xxvi. 21, a man of the name of Shubael or Shubal, is recorded as the head of the house; charge in this passage the family itself, and not an individual, be intended.

2. (יְהַדִּיָּה: Judatis). A Meronothite who had charge of the she-asses — the riding and breeding stock — of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 30).

JEHEZEKEEL (יהַזֵּקֵל) [whom God makes strong]: [Vat. יֵהַזֵּקֵל: Alex. יֵהַזֵּקֵל: Hexeziel], a priest to whom was given the charge of David the twenty-four courses in the service of the house of Jehovah (1 Chr. xxiv. 10). The name in the original is almost exactly similar to EZEKIEL.

JEHIAH (יהִיָּה) [perh. = יָיָה, see below, Ges.]: [Vat. יִהְיָה: Alex. יִהְיָה: Jehite]. He and Obad-edom were “doorkeepers for the ark” (יְהִיָּה, the word elsewhere expressed by “porters”) at the time of its establishment in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xxv. 24). The name does not recur, but it is possible it may be exchanged for the similar JEHIEL or JIEKEL in xvi. 5.

JEHIEL (יהִיֵּל) [God lives]: Jehiel.

1. (יְהִיֵּל: [Vat. FA. in xv. 20 corrupt; Vat. xvi. 5. יֵהַיֵּל]): One of the Levites appointed by David to assist in the service of the house of God (1 Chr. xv. 18, 20; xvi. 5). One of the sons of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, who was put to death by his brother Jehoram shortly after his becoming king (2 Chr. xxi. 2).

2. (יְהִיֵּל): One of the rulers of the house of God at the time of the reforms of Josiah (2 Chr. xxv. 6). [SYELEUS.]

3. (יְהִיֵּל): A Gershonite Levite, head of the Bene-Laadan in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 8), who had charge of the treasures (xxix. 9). His family — JEHIEL, i.e. Jehielite, or as we should say now Jehielites — is mentioned, xxvi. 21.

5. (ייֵהִיֵּל, Alex. יֵהַיֵּל: Son of Hachmoni, or of a Hachmonite, named in the list of David’s officers (1 Chr. xxvii. 32) as “with (םָנֶא) the king’s sons,” whatever that may mean. The mention of Abibophel (33) seems to fix the date of this list as before the revolt. In Jerome’s Questions HEBRAICAE this passage, Jehiel is said to be David’s son Chileab or Daniel; and “Achimoni,” interpreted as Sippenielus, is taken as an alias of David himself.

6. (In the original text, יֵהַיֵּל: Jehuel — the A. V. follows the alteration of the Keri: יֵהַיֵּל: [Vat. יֵהַיֵּל]). A Levite of the Bene-Heman, who took part in the restorations of king Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 14).

7. (Vat. יֵהַיֵּל: Another Levite at the same period (2 Chr. xxxii. 13), one of the “oversers” (םֹּלְלֹל) of the articles offered to Jehovah. His parentage is not mentioned.

8. (יְהִיֵּל: [Vat. יֵהָיֵל]: Alex. יֵהָיֵל). Father of Obadiah, who headed 215 men of the Bene-Josh in the return from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 9). In Esdras the name is YELEUS, and the number of his clan is stated at 212.

9. (יְהִיֵּל, Alex. יֵהָיֵל: Jehiel). One of the Bene-Iam, father of Shechaniah, who encouraged Ezra to put away the foreign wives of the people (Ezr. x. 2). In Esdras it is JIEKEL.

10. (יְהִיֵּל: [Vat. יֵהָיֵל]: Alex. יֵהָיֵל: Jiekel). A member of the same family, who had himself to part with his wife (Ezr. x. 26). [HIEKELUS.]

11. (יְהִיֵּל, Alex. יֵהָיֵל: Jehiel). A priest, one of the Bene-Harim, who also had to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 21). [HIEKEL.]

JEHIEL,a a perfectly distinct name from the last, though the same in the A. V. 1. (יֵהִיִּל): so the Keri, but the Tetbal has יֵהָיִל, i.e. Jeuel; יִהְיִל: [Vat. יֵהָיִל: Alex. יֵהָיִל: Jiekel], a man described as Abi-Gibeon — father of Gibeon; a forfather of king Saul (1 Chr. ix. 35). In vii. 29 the name is omitted. The presence of the stubborn letter Aia in Jehiel forbids our identifying it with Abiel in 1 Sam. ix. 1, as some have been tempted to do.

2. (Here the name is as given in No. 1). [Vat. FA. 1ea.]: One of the sons of Itham the Arcorite; a member of the guard of David, included in the extended list of 1 Chr. xi. 44.

JEHIELI (יֵהָיֵל, Alex.: [Vat. FA. 1ea.]: Jehiel), according to the A. V. a Gershouite Levite of the family of LAADAN. The Bene-Jehiel had charge of the treasures of the house of Jehovah (1 Chr. xxvi. 21, 32). In other lists it is given as JEHIEL. The name appears to be strictly a patronymic — Jehielite.

Vat. Ioanav, &c. Alex. Ioanav (in 2 Ch. xliii).
Vat. Ioanav; Iouas; Jowhd. 1. The son and successor of Jehu, reigned 17 years u. c. 830-813 over Israel in Samaria. His inglorious history is given in 2 K. xiii. 1-9. Throughout his reign (ver. 22) he was kept in subjection by Hazael king of Damascus, who, following up the successes which he had previously achieved against Jehu, compelled Jehoaddah to reduce his army to 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 infantry. Jehoaddah maintained the idolatry of Jeroboam; but in the extremity of his humiliation he besought Jehovah; and Jehovah gave Israel a deliverer—probably either Jehoach (vv. 23 and 24), or Jeroboam II. (2 K. xiv. 24, 25) (see Keil, Commentary on Kings). The prophet Elisha survived Jehoaddah; and Ewald (Gesch. Isr. iii. 557) is disposed to place in his reign the incursions of the Syrians mentioned in 2 K. v. 2, vi. 8, and of the Ammonites mentioned in Amos i. 13.

2. [Vat. in 2 K., Ioanav, and so Alex. 2 K. xxi. 41.] Jehoaddah, otherwise called Stramma, the fourth (see to 1 Chr. iii. 15), or third, if Zedekiah's age be correctly stated (2 Chr. xxxvi. 11), son of Josiah, whom he succeeded as king of Judah.
He was chosen by the people in preference to his elder (2 Chr. xxxii. 31 and 36) brother, u. c. 610, and he reigned three months in Jerusalem.
His anointing (ver. 30) was probably some addi tional ceremony, or it is mentioned with peculiar emphasis in order to make up for his want of the ordinary title to the throne. He is described by his contemporaries as an evil-doer (2 K. xiii. 32) and an oppressor (Ez. xiii. 3), and such is his tradi tional character in Josephus (Ant. x. 5, § 2); but his deposition seems to have been lamented by the people (Jer. xxvii. 10, and Ez. xiii. 1). Pharaoh nachal on his return from Carchemish, perhaps recollecting the election of Jehoaddah, sent to Jeru usalem to depose him, and to fetch him to Rabbah.

There he was cast into chains, and from thence he was taken into Egypt, where he died (see Prideaux, Connection, anno 610; Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 719; Eisenmuller, Schlo in Jerem. xiii. 11).

JEHOAHANAN (יהוֹהָנָן, also Jehovah's gift, answering to Theodore: [Vat. Ioanav, &c. Alex. Ioanav (in 2 K., Ioanav, and so Alex. 2 K. xxi. 41.) A Levite, one of the bookkeepers (A. V. "porters") to the house of Jehovah, i. e. the Tri-eruca, according to the appointment of David (1 Chr. xxxvi. 3; comp. xxxv. 1). He was the sixth of the seven sons of Mehemediah: a Koheshite, that is descended from Korah, the founder of that great Kohathite house. He is also said (ver. 1) to have been of the Bene-Assaph; but Asaph is a contraction for Bashan, as is seen from the genealogy in xvi. 18. The well-known Asaph too was not a Kohathite but a Gershonite.

2. [Ioanav.] One of the principal men of Judah, under king Jehoshaphat; he commanded 280,000 men, apparently in and about Jerusalem
(2 Chr. xviii. 15; comp 13 and 19). He is named second on the list, and is entitled "the captain," a title also given to Jehu in the pre ceeding verse, though there rendered "the chief.

He is probably the same person as —

3. Father of Ishmael, one of the "captains (2 Chr. xxiv.), as before of hundred," evidently residing in or near Jerusalem; whom Jehoiada the priest took into his confidence about the restoration of the line of Judah (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).

4. [Ioanav.] Fa. Ioanav. One of the Bene

Behai [sons of B.], a levy Israelite who was forced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 28)
In Edras the name is JOAHANIS.
5. [*To Ward.] A priest (Neh. xii. 15); the representative of the house of Amariah (comp. 2), during the high-priesthood of Joiakim (ver. 12), that is to say in the generation after the first return from Captivity.

6. (Vat. LXX. omits [so Alex. FA.; Comp. FA.; To Ward;]) A priest who took part in the musical service of thanksgiving, at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42). In two other cases this name is given in the A. V. as Joahaz.

JEHOIACHIN (יהואכן;) = appointed of Jehovah; once only, Ex. i. 2, contrasted to יְהוֹיָהָן; in Kings لֹא יָהָן. Chron. Τύχων, Jer. and Ez. Ιωακίμ [Vat. Alex. Iωακέων throughout except in Chron.; Joseph. Ιωακίμος: Joachin]. Elsewhere the name is altered to Jecosiah, and Coniah. See also JECOZIAS, JOAIZIK, and JOAICHIN.

Son of Jehoiakim and Nebushta, and for three months and ten days king of Judah, after the death of his father, being the nineteenth king from David, or twentieth, counting Jehoiakaz. According to 2 K. xiv. 8, Jehoiachin was eighteen years old at his accession; but 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9, as well as 1 Esdr. i. 43, has the far more probable reading eight years, which fixes his birth to the time of his father's captivity, according to Matt. i. 11.

Jehoiachin came to the throne at a time when Egypt was still prostrate in consequence of the victory at Carchemish, and when the Jews had been for three or four years harassed and distracted by the incursions of the armed bands of Chaldeans, Ammonites, and Jebelites, sent against them by Nebuchadnezzar in consequence of Jehoiakim's rebellion. [JEHOIACHIN.] Jerusalem at this time, therefore, was quite defenseless, and unable to offer any resistance to the regular army which, Nebuchadnezzar sent to besiege it in the 8th year of his reign, and which he seems to have joined in person after the siege was commenced (2 K. xxiv. 10, 11). In a very short time, apparently, and without any losses from famine or fighting which would indicate a serious resistance, Jehoiachin surrendered at discretion; and he, and the queen-mother, and all his servants, captains, and officers, came out and gave themselves up to Nebuchadnezzar, who carried them, with the harem and the eunuchs, to Babylon (Jer. xxix. 2; Ez. xii. 12, xix. 9). All the king's treasures, and all the treasures of the Temple, were seized, and the golden vessels of the Temple, which the king of Babylon had left when he pillaged it in the fourth of Jehoiakim, were now either cut up or carried away to Babylon, with all the nobles, and men of war, and skilled artisans, none but the poorest and weakest being left behind (2 K. xxiv. 13: 2 Chr. xxxvi. 19). According to 2 K. xxiv. 14, 16, the number taken at this time into captivity was 10,000, namely, 7,000 soldiers, 1,000 craftsmen and smiths, and 3,000 whose calling is not specified. But, according to Jer. ii. 28 (a passage which is omitted in the LXX.), the number carried away captive at this time (called the seventh of Nebuchadnezzar, 2 K. xxiv. 13) was 3,023. Whether this difference arises from any corruption of the numerals, or whether only a portion of those originally taken captive were actually carried to Babylon, the others being left with Zedekiah, upon his swearing allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, cannot perhaps be decided. The numbers in Jeremiah are certainly very small, only 4,000 in all, whereas the numbers who returned from captivity, as given in Esr. ii. and Neh. vii. were 42,300. However, Jehoiachin himself fled away captive to Babylon, and there he remained a prisoner, actually in prison (2 K. xxiv. 2, and Jer. ii. 28, 30), and wearing prison garments, for thirty-six years, namely, till the death of Nebuchadnezzar, when Evil-Merodach, succeeding to the throne of Babylon, treated him with much kindness, brought him out of prison, changed his garments, raised him above the other subject or captive kings, and made him sit at his own table. Whether Jehoiachin outlived the two years of Evil-Merodach's reign or not does not appear, nor have we any particulars of his life at Babylon. The general description of him in 2 K. xxiv. 9, "He did evil in the sight of Jehovah, according to all that his father had done," seems to apply to his character at the time he was king, and lost a child: and so does the prophecy of Jeremiah (xxii. 24-30; Ez. xix. 5-9). We also learn from Jer. xxviii. 4, that four years after Jehoiachin had gone to Babylon, there was a great expectation at Jerusalem of his return, but it does not appear whether Jehoiachin himself shared this hope at Babylon. [HAY-AMAN.] The tenor of Jeremiah's letter to the elders of the Captivity (xxix.) would, however, indicate that there was a party among the Captivity, encouraged by false prophets, who were at this time looking forward to Nebuchadnezzar's overthrow and Jehoiachin's return; and perhaps the fearful death of Ahik the son of Kohah (ib. v. 22), and the close confinement of Jehoiachin through Nebuchadnezzar's reign, may have been the result of some disposition to conspire against Nebuchadnezzar on the part of a portion of the Captivity. But neither Daniel nor Ezekiel, who were Jehoiachin's fellow-captives, make any further allusion to him, except that Ezekiel dates his prophecies by the year + of King Jehoiachin's captivity" (i. 2, viii. 1. xxv. 1, &c.; the latest date being the twenty-seventh year") (xxix. 17, xl. 1). We also learn from Nebuchadnezzar, that from Evil-Merodach, when Evil-Merodach...

which suits Jehoiachin. Africanus (Ep. ad Orig.; Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 113) expressly calls Susanna's husband "king," and says that the king of Babylon had made him his royal companion (σεφαρωσα). He is also mentioned 1 Esdr. v. 5, but the text seems to be corrupt. It probably should be "Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, the son of Joaah," i.e. Jehoiachin. It does not appear certain from Scripture whether Jehoiachin was married or had any children. That Zedekiah, who in 1 Chr. iii. 16 is called "his son," is the same as Zedekiah his uncle called "his brother," 2 Chr. xxxvi. 10, who was his successor on the throne, seems certain. But it is not impossible that Assir (נפח = captive), who is reckoned among the "sons of Jehonniah" in 1 Chr. iii. 17, may have been so really, and either have died young or been made an eunuch (Is. xxxix. 7). This is quite in accordance with the term "childless," נפח, applied to Jehonapha by Jerem. (xxii. 30). [GENEALOGY OF CHRIST, vol. i. p. 886.]

Jehoiachin was the last of Solomon's line, and on its failure in his person, the right to the succession passed to the line of Nathan, whose descendant, Shalliel, or Salathiel, the son of Neri, was consequently reckoned in the genealogy of Christ. Hence his place in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i. 11, 12). For the variations in the Hebrew forms of Jehonniah's name see HANNAH, 8; and for the confusion in Greek and Latin writers between Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin, Ioseph. and Ioseph., see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, and Hervey's Genealogy, pp. 71-73.

X. B. The compiler of 1 Esdr. gives the name of Jehoanina to Jehoaah, the son of Josiah, who reigned three months after Josiah's death, and was deposed and carried to Egypt by Pharaoh-Necho (1 Esdr. i. 34; 2 K. xxiii. 30). He is followed in this blunder by Epiphanius (vol. i. p. 21), who says, "Josiah begat Jehoanina, who is also called Shallum. This Jehoanina begat Jehoninah who is called Zedekiah and Joakim." It has its origin doubtless in the confusion of the names when written in Greek by writers ignorant of Hebrew. A. C. H.

JEHOIADA (יהויא = known of Jehovah; товд: Alex. Iωνας, Iωάνας, Iωανάς, and also as Vat.; Ιωάνας: Iωάνα): In the latter books the name is contracted to JOIAH.

1. Father of BENAIAH, David's well known warrior (2 Sam. viii. 18; 1 K. i. and ii. passion; 1 Chr. xvii. 17, &c.). From 1 Chr. xxvii. 5, we learn that Beniah's father was the chief priest, and he is therefore doubtless identical with —

2. (Iωανάν: [Vat. Τωανας: ΠA Τωανάς: Alex. Iωανας.] Leader (יויא) of the Aaronites (accurately "of Aaron") i.e. the priests; who joined David at Hebron, bringing with him 3,700 priests (1 Chr. xxi. 27).

3. According to 1 Chr. xxvii. 34, son of Benahad, and one of David's chief counsellors, apparently having succeeded Ahithophel in that office. But in all probability Benahad the son of Jehoiada is meant, by a confusion similar to that which has arisen with regard to Ahimelech and Abiathar (1 Chr. xiii. 16; 2 Sam. viii. 17).

4. High-priest at the time of Athaliah's usurpation of the throne of Judah (n. 848-878), and during the greater portion of the 40 years' reign of Joash. It does not appear when he first became high-priest, but it may have been as early as the latter part of Jehoshaphat's reign. Anyhow, he probably succeeded Amariah. [HIGH-PRIEST.] He married Jehoshera or Jehovahbeath, daughter of king Jehoram, and sister of king Ahaziah (2 Chr. xxii. 11); and when Athaliah slew all the royal family of Judah after Ahaziah had been put to death by Jeho, he and his family, among the king's sons, and hid him for six years in the Temple, and eventually replaced him on the throne of his ancestors. [JOASH; ATHALIAH.] In effecting this happy revolution, by which both the throne of David and the worship of the true God according to the law of Moses were rescued from imminent danger of destruction, Jehoiada displayed great ability and prudence. Waiting patiently till the tyranny of Athaliah, and, we may presume, her foreign practices and preferences, had produced disgust in the land, he at length, in the 7th year of her reign, entered into secret alliance with all the chief partisans of the house of David and of the true religion. He also collected at Jerusalem the Levites from the different cities of Judah and Israel, probably under cover of providing for the Temple services, and then concentrated them and armed them for the Temple, by an expedient of not dismissing the old corps of priests and Levites when their successors came to relieve them on the Sabbath. By means of the consecrated shields and spears which David had taken in his wars, and which were preserved in the treasure of the Temple (comp. 1 Chr. xviii. 7-11, xxvi. 20-23; 1 K. xiv. 29, 27), he supplied the captains of hundreds with arms for their men. During their division the priests and Levites into three bands, which were posted at the principal entrances, and filled the courts with people favorable to the cause, he produced the young king before the whole assembly, and crowned and anointed him, and presented to him a copy of the Law, according to Deut. xvii. 18-20. [HILKIHITE.] The excitement of the moment did not make him forget the sanctity of God's honor. None but the priests and ministering Levites were permitted by him to enter the Temple; and he gave strict orders that Athaliah should be carried without its precincts before she was put to death. In the same spirit he inaugurated the new reign by a solemn covenant between himself, as high priest, and the people and the king, to renounce the Baal-worship which had been introduced by the house of Ahab, and to serve Jehovah. This was followed up by the immediate destruction of the altar and temple of Baal, and the death of Mattan his priest. He then took order for the due celebration of the Temple service, and at the same time for the perfect reestablishment of the monarchy; all which seems to have been effected with great vigor and success, and without any cruelty or violence. The young king himself, under this wise and virtuous counsellor, ruled his kingdom well and prosperously, and was forward in works of piety during the lifetime of Jehoiada. The reparation of the Temple in the 23rd year of his reign, of which a full and interesting account is given 2 K. xii. and 2 Chr. xxiv., was one of the most important works at this period. At length, however, Jehoiada died, n. c. 834, and though for advanced years, too soon for the welfare of his country, and the weak, unstable character of Joash. The text of 2 Chr. xxiv. 15, supported by the L.XX. and Josephus, makes him 130 years old when he died. But supposing him to vare lived to the 36th year of Josiah (which only cares 5 years for all the subsequent events of the reign), he would in that case have been 95 at the time of the insurrection against Athaliah; and 15 years before, when Jehoram, whose daughter was his wife, was only 32 years old, he would have been 50: than which nothing can be more improbable.

There must therefore be some early corruption of the numeral.

Perhaps we ought to read "כְּלָאָה (83), instead of כְּלָאָה (80). Even 103 (as suggested, Gener. of our Lord, p. 304) would have an improbable age at the two above named epochs. If 93 at his death, he would have been 33 years old at Joram's accession. For his signal services to his God, his king and his coun ty, which have earned him a place among the very foremost well-doers in Israel, he had the unique honor of burial among the kings of Judah in the city of David. He was probably succeeded by his son Zechariah. In Josephus's list (Ant. xviii. § 6), the name of כְּלָאָה by an easy corruption is transformed into קְלָאָה, and in the Seder Olam into Phaedia.

In Matt. xxiii. 35, Zechariah the son of Jehoiada is mentioned as the "son of Barachiah," i.e. Bere chiah. This is omitted in Luke (xvi. 51), and has probably been inserted from a confusion between this Zechariah and 2, the prophet, who was son of Berechiah; or with the son of Jehorechiah (Is. viii.

[5. [Vulg. pro Joiaide.] Second priest, or sagan, to Serahai the high priest. He was deposed at the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, probably for adhering to the prophet Jeremiah; when Zepha iah was appointed sagan in his room (Jer. xxix.
25-28; 2 K. xxi. 18). This is a clear instance of the title "the priest" being applied to the second priest. The passage in Jeremiah shows the nature of the sagan's authority at this time, when he was doubtless "ruler of the house of Jehovah" (דר נַיְנָה נְנָה).

[High-priest.] Winer (Recon.) has quite misunderstood the passage, and makes Jeremiah the same as the high-priest in the reign of Josiah.

6. (יֵוָי, i.e. Josiah: [Vulg. Iovinae:] Alex. Iovina: Jiojuda), son of Paseah, who as istered to repair the "old gate" of Jerusalem (Neh.
iii. 6).

A. C. H.

JEHOIAKIM (רֵוָי נָי: [Jehoreh sets up or appoints]: יֵוָי, or -el: Joseph. Iovikymos: Josikia), 18th (or, counting Jehohaz, 19th) king of Judah from David inclusive — 56 years old at his accession, and originally called Eliaah. He was the son of Josiah and Zebadah, daughter of Pe deiah of Ramah, possibly identical with Arumah of Judg. ix. 41 (where the Vulg. has Romach), and in that case in the tribe of Manasseh.

His younger brother Jehohaz, or Shallum, as he is called (Jer. xxii. 11), was in the first instance made king by the people on the land on the death of his father Josiah, probably with the intention of fol lowing up Josiah's policy, which was to side with Nebuchadnezzar against Egypt, being, as Profess thinks, bound by oath to the kings of Babylon (1.
50). Pharaoh-Necho, therefore, having borne down all resistance with his victorious army, immediately deposed Jehoahaz, and had him brought in chains to Riblah, where, it seems, he was on his way to Carcemies (2 K. xiii. 36, 94; Jer. xxii. 10-12).
He then set Eliakim, his elder brother, upon the throne, changed his name to Jehoiakim, and hav charged him with the task of collecting a tribu ute of 100 talents of silver, and 1 talent of gold = nearly 40,000l, in which he muleted the land for the part Josiah had taken in the war with Babylon, he eventually returned to Egypt taking Jehoahaz with him, who died there in captivity (2 K. xiii.
94; Jer. xxi. 20-22; Ez. xix. 4)." Pharaoh-Necho also himself returned no more to Jerusalem, for after his great defeat at Carcemies in the fourth year of Jehoiakim he lost all his Syrian possessions
(2 K. xiv. 7; Jer. xvi. 2), and his successor Pianmis (Herod. ii. cxx.) made no attempt to re recover them. Egypt, therefore, played no part in Jewish politics during the seven or eight years of Jehoiakim's reign. After the battle of Carcemies Nebuchadnezzar came into Palestine as one of the Egyptian tributary kings, the capture and robbery of which was the natural fruit of his victory over Necho. He found Jehoiakim quite defenseless. After a short siege he entered Jerusalem, took the king prisoner, bound him in fetters to carry him to Ba y lion, and took also some of the precious vessels of the Temple and carried them to the land of Shinar to the temple of Bel his god. It was at this time, in the fourth, or, as Daniel reckons, in the third year of his reign, that Daniel, and Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, were taken captives to Ba ylon; but Nebuchadnezzar seems to have changed his purpose as regarded Jehoiakim, and to have ac sumed his submission, and reinstated him on the throne, perhaps in remembrance of the fidelity of his father Josiah. What is certain is, that Jehoi aked became tributary to Nebuchadnezzar after his invasion of Judah, and continued so for three years, until that time broke his resistance to captivity, and rebelled against him (2 K. xxiv. 1). What moved or encouraged Jehoiakim to this rebellion it is dif cult to say, unless it was the rest less turbulence of his own bad disposition and the dislike of paying tribute to the king of Babylon, which he would have rather lavished upon his own luxury and pride (Jer. xxi. 13-17), for there is nothing to bear out Winer's conjecture, or Josep hus's assertion, that there was anything in the attitude of Egypt at this time to account for such a step. It seems more probable that, seeing Egypt entirely severed from the affairs of Syria since the battle of Carcemies, and the king of Babylon wholly occupied with distant wars, he hoped to make himself independent. But whatever was the motive of this foolish and wicked proceeding, which was contrary to the repeated warnings of the prophet Jeremiah, it is certain that it brought misery and ruin upon the king and his country. Though Nebuchadnezzar was not at that time to come in person to chastise his rebellious vassal, he sent against him numerous bands of Chaldeans, with Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, who were all now subject to Babylon (2 K. xxiv. 7), and who cruelly harassed the whole country. It was perhaps at this time that the great drought occurred described in Jer. xiv. (comp. Jer. xx. 4 with 2 K. xxiv. 2, 3). The closing years of this reign must have been a time of extreme suffering; the Ammonites appear to have overrun the land of Gad (Jer. xiv. 1), and the other neighboring nations to have taken advantage of the helplessness of Israel to ravage their land to the utmost (Ex. xxvii.). There was no rest or safety out of the walled cities. We are not acquainted with the details of the close of the reign. Probably as the time approached for Nebuchadnezzar himself to come against Judaea the desultory attacks and invasions of his troops became more concentrated. Either in an engagement with some of these forces, or else by the hand of his own oppressed subjects, who thought to condescend the Babylonians by the murder of their king, Jehoiakim came to a violent end in the 11th year of his reign. His body was cast out ignominiously on the ground; perhaps thrown over the walls of Jerusalem, in a manner that he was dead; and then, after being left exposed for some time, was dragged away and buried "with the burial of an ass," without pomp or lamentation, "beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxii. 18, 19, xxxvi. 30). Within three months of his death Nebuchadnezzar arrived, and put an end to his dynasty by carrying Jehoiachin off to Babylon. [Jehoiachin.] All the evidences we have of Jehoiachin concur in ascribing to him a vioiy and irreligious character. The writer of 2 Chr. xxii. 37 tells us that "he did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah," a statement which is repeated xxiv. 9, and 2 Chr. xxxvi. 5. The latter writer uses the yet stronger expression, "the acts of Jehoiakim, and the abominations which he did." (ver. 8.) But it is in the writings of Jeremiah that we have the fullest portrait of him. It is probable, the 14th chapter of Jeremiah belongs to this reign, and have a detailed of the abominations of idolatry practiced at Jerusalem under the king's sanction, with which Ezekiel's vision of what was going on six years later, within the very precincts of the Temple, exactly agrees; incense offered up to "abominable beasts:" "women weeping for Tammuz," and men in the inner court of the Temple "with their backs towards the temple of the Lord," worshipping "the sun towards the east." (Ex. vii.) The vindictive pursuit and murder of Urijah the son of Shemaria, and the indignities offered to his corpse by the king's command, in revenge for his faithful prophesying of evil against Jerusalem and Judah,

"the passage seems to be corrupt. The words χωριωμενων χωριωμενων, to be repeated, the present transit time but one, and ἀποκροτρικαῖς ἀποκροτρικαῖς is a paraphrase of Jeremiah.

35. Nothing can be more improbable than an invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar at this time. All the Syrian possessions of Egypt fell into the power of Babylon soon after the victory at Carchemish, and the king of Egypt retired thenceforth into his own country no more. The Syrian wars seem to have engaged Nebuchadnezzar's attention for the next 7 years; and in like manner the king of Egypt seems to have confined himself to his own boundaries, the first hint we have of Egypt aiming at recovering her lost influence in Syria is at the accession of Pharaoh-Hophra, in the 4th of Zedekiah. [Hammah.] He made several abortive attempts against Nebuchadnezzar in Zede-

xxvi. 20-24). The curious notice of him in 1 Esdr. i. 38, that he put his nobles in chains, and caused Zerubb to his brother in Egypt a and brought him up thence to Jerusalem, also points to his cruelty. His daring impetivity in cutting up and burning the roll containing Jeremiah's prophecy, at the very moment when the national fast was being celebrated, is another specimen of his character, and drew down upon him the sentence, "He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David" (Jer. xxxixi.). His oppression, injustice, covetousness, luxury, and tyranny, are most severely relaxed (xxiii. 13-17), and it has been frequently observed, as indicating his thorough selfishness and indifference to the sufferings of his people, that, at a time when the land was so impoverished by the heavy tributes laid upon it by Egypt and Babylon in turn, he should have squandered large sums in building luxurious palaces for himself (xxii. 14, 15). Josephus's history of Jehoiakim's reign is consistent neither with Scripture nor with itself. His account of Jehoiakim's death and Jehoiachin's accesi appears to be only his own inference from the Scripture narrative. According to Josephus (Ant. x. 6) Nebuchadnezzar came against Judaea in the 8th year of Jehoiakim's reign, and compelled him to pay tribute, which he did for three years, and then revoked in the 11th year, on hearing that the king of Babylon was gone to invade Egypt. b He then inserts the account of Jehoiakim's burning Jeremiah's prophecy, in his 5th year, and con- cludes by saying, that a little time afterwards the king of Babylon made an expedition against Jehoi-akim, who admitted Nebuchadnezzar into the city. upon certain conditions, which Nebuchadnezzar immediately broke: that he slew Jehoiakim and the flower of the citizens, and sent 3,400 captives to Babylon, and set up Jehoiachin for king, but least the young king should avenge his father's death, and so sent back his army to besiege Jerusalem; that Jehoiakim, being a man of just and gentle disposition, did not like to lose the city without regaining on his own account, and therefore surrendered himself, his mother, and kindred, to the king of Babylon's officers on condition of the city suffering no harm; but that Nebuchadnezzar, in direct violation of the conditions, took 10,852 prisoners, and made Zedekiah king in the room of Jehoiachin, whom he kept in custody—a statement the principal portion of which seems to have no foundation whatever in facts. The account given above is derived from the various statements in Scripture, and seems to agree perfectly with the probabilities of Nebuchadnezzar's movements and with what the most recent discoveries have brought to light con- cerning him. [Nebuchadnezzar.] The reign

a The name is sagu.
JEHOIAKIM

Jehoiakim extends from n. c. 609 to b. c. 598, as some reckon, 589.

The name of Jehoiakim appears in a contracted form in JORAIM, a high-priest. A. C. II.

Hardly any single act of Jehoiakim reveals so much of his own character and that of his times as his burning of Jeremiah's "roll." It was the "roll," on which Baruch, the prophet's amanuensis, and the scribe of his drudges, had written the warnings uttered by Jeremiah, to arouse the king and nobles to a sense of their danger. An attempt was made to read these warnings to the people, on one of the public fasts. "On that day," as Stanley describes the scene, "a wintry day in December, Baruch appeared in the chamber of a friendly noble, Gemariah, the son of Shaphan, which was apparently over the new gateway already mentioned. There, from the window or balcony of the chamber, or from the platform or pillar on which the kings had stood on solemn occasions, he recited the long alteration of lament and inventive to the vast congregation assembled for the national fast. Miciah, the son of his host, alarmed by what he heard, descended the Temple hill, and communicated it to the princes who, as usual through these disturbed reigns, were seated in council in the palace in the apartments of the chief secretary. One of them, Jehudi, the descendant of a noble house, acted apparently as an agent or spokesman of the rest, and was sent to summon Baruch to their presence. He sat down in the attitude of an eastern teacher (Jer. xxxvi. 13, comp. Luke iv. 20), and as he went on his recital struck terror into the hearts of his hearers. They saw his drudges; they charged him and his master to conceal themselves, and deposited the sacred scroll in the chamber where they had heard it, whilst they announced to the fierce and lawless king its fearful contents. A third time it was recited — this time not by Baruch, but by the courtier Jehudi — to the king as he sat warming himself over the charcoal brazier, with his princes standing round him. Three or four columns exhausted the royal patience. He seized a knife, such as eastern scribes wear for the sake of erasures, cut the parchment into strips, and threw it into the brazier till it was burnt to ashes. Those who had heard from their fathers of the effect produced on Josiah by the recital of the warnings of Deuteronomy, might well be startled at the contrast. None of those well-known signs of astonishment and grief were seen; neither king nor attendants rent their clothes. It was an outrage long remembered. Baruch, in his hiding-place, was overwhelmed with despair (Jer. xlv. 3) at this failure of his mission. But Jeremiah had now ceased to waver. He bade his timid disciples take up the pen, and record once more the terrible messages. The country was doomed. It was only individuals who could be saved.

But the divine oracle could not be destroyed in the destruction of its outward framework. It was the new form of the vision of the 'Flash burning, but not consumed'; a sacred book, the form in which Divine truths were now first beginning to be known, burnt as sacred books have been burnt again and again, in the persecutions of the fourth or of the sixteenth century, yet multiplied by that very cause: springing from the flames to do their work, living in the voice and life of men, even when their outward letter seemed to be lost. Then took Jeremiah another roll, and gave it to Baruch the scribe, the son of Neriah, who wrote therein the mouth of Jeremiah. And the king, which Jehoiakim, the king of Judah, had burned in the fire, and there were added besides unto them many like words (Jer. xxxvi. 32). In this record of the prophet's feeling, thus emphasized by his own repetition, is contained the germ of the 'Liberty of Unlicensed Printing,' the inextinguishable vitality of the written word. (History of the Jewish Church, ii. 291 ff.)

JEHOARIB (Jer. xxvii. 20). 1 Chr. ix. 10, xxiv. 7, only; elsewhere, both in Hebrew and A. V., the name is abbreviated to JOARIB (Jehorib a defender): 'Isepiai [N. of Isepiai, Isepiai, A. J. 'Isepiai and Irepia; Jorib], head of the first of the 24 courses of priests, according to the arrangement of King David (1 Chr. xxiv. 7). Some of his descendants returned from the Babylonish Captivity, as we learn from 1 Chr. ix. 10, Neh. xi. 10. [JEZIRAH]. Their chief in the days of Josiah the son of Jehosua was Mattenai (Neh. xii. 6, 10). They were probably of the house of Eleazar. To the course of Josiah belonged the Asmonean family (1 Macc. ii. 1), and Josephus, as he informs us (Ant. xii. 6, § 1, and Life, § 1). [HIGH-PRIEST]. Prideaux indeed (Connection, i. 129), following the Jewish tradition, affirms that only 4 of the courses returned from Babylon, Eleazar, Immer, Pashur, and Harim — for which last, however, the Babylonian Talmud has Jorib — because these 4 only are enumerated in Ex. ii. 30-39, Neh. vii. 39-42. And he accounts for the omission of other courses, as of Jorib (1 Macc. ii. 1), and Abiah (Luke i. 5), by saying that those 4 courses were subdivided into 6 each, so as to keep up the old number of 24, which took the names of the original courses, though not really descended from them. But this is probably an invention of the Jews, to account for the mention of only these 4 families of priests in the list of Ex. ii. and Neh. vii. And however difficult it may be to say with certainty why only those 4 courses are mentioned in that particular list, we have the positive authority of 1 Chr. ix. 10, and Neh. xi. 10, for asserting that Jorib did return; and we have two other lists of courses, one of the time of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 2-8), the other of Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 1-7); the former enumerating 21, the latter 22 courses; and the latter naming Jorib as one of them, and adding, at ver. 19, the name of the chief of the course of Jorib in the days of Josiah. So that there can be no reasonable doubt that Jorib did return. The notion of the Jews does not receive any confirmation from the statement in the Latin version of Josephus (Cont. Apion. ii. § 8), that there were 4 courses of priests, as it is a manifest corruption of the text of 39 as Whiston and others have shown (Notes of Life of Josephus, § 1). The subjoined table gives the three lists of courses which

A. C. II.

JEHONADAB, and JONADAB (the longer form, לֶוֶת יְהוֹנָדָב לֶוֶת יְהוֹנָדָב; is employed in 2 K. x. and 1 Chr. xxv. 8, 14, 16, 18; the shorter one, לֶוֶת יְהוֹנָדָב; in Jer. xxxvii. 4, 6, 10, 19) [Jehovah makes, Ges.]:

Jehovah is mentioned by the name of Jehoahaz, the son of Rechab, founder of the Rechabites. It appears from 1 Chr. ii. 56, that his father or ancestor Rechab ("the rider") belonged to a branch of the Kenites: the Arabian tribe which entered Palestine with the Israelites. One settlement of them was to be found in the extreme north, under the chieftainship of Heber (Judg. iv. 11), retaining their Bedouin customs under the oak which derived its name from their nomadic habits. The main settlement was in the south. Of these, one branch had nestled in the cliffs of Euegeli (Judea: i. 16; Num. xxiv. 21). Another had returned to the frontier of their native wilderness on the south of Judah (Judg. i. 16). A third was established, under a fourfold division, at or near the town of Jabesh in Judah (1 Chr. ii. 55). To these last belonged Rechab and his son Jehoahaz. The Bedouin habits, which were kept up by the other branches of the Kenite tribe, were inculcated by Jehovah, and the utmost minute-ness on his descendants; the more so, perhaps, from their being brought into closer connection with the inhabitants of the settled districts. The vow or rule which he prescribed to them is preserved to us: "Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye nor your sons for ever. Neither shall ye build houses, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers" (Jer. xxxv. 6, 7). This life, partly monastic, partly Bedouin, was observed with the tendency which from generation to generation such customs are continued in Arab tribes; and when, many years after the death of Jehovah, the Rechabites (as they were called from his father) were forced to take refuge from the Chaldaean invasion within the walls of Jerusalem, nothing would induce them to transgress the rule of their ancestor: and in consequence a blessing was pronounced upon him and them by the prophet Jeremiah (xxxv. 19): "Jehonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before me for ever." [Rechabites.]

Bearing in mind this general character of Jehovah as an Arab chief, and the founder of a half-religious sect, perhaps in connection with the austere Elijah, and the Nazarites mentioned in Amos ii. 11 (as Ewald, Afterbester, pp. 92, 93), we are the better able to understand the single occasion on which he appears before us in the historical narrative.

Jehu was advancing, after the slaughter of Bethon, on the city of Samaria, when he suddenly met the austere Beduin coming towards him (2 K. x. 15). It seems that they were already known to each other (Jos. Ant. ix. 6, § 6). The king was in his chariot; the Arab was on foot. It is not clear, from the present state of the text, which was the first to speak. The Hebrew text— followed by the A. V. — implies that the king blessed (A. V., "saluted") Jehonadab. The LXX. and Josephus (Ant. ix. 6, § 6) imply that Jehonadab blessed the king. Each would have its peculiar appropriateness. The king then proposed their close union — "Is thy heart right, as my heart is with thy heart"? The answer of Jehonadab is slightly varied. In the Hebrew text he vehemently replies — "It is, it is: give me thine hand." In the LXX., and in the A. V., he replies simply, "It is;" and Jehu now rejoins them hands, "If it be so, give me thine hand." The hand, whether of Jehonadab or Jehu, was offered and grasped. The king lifted him up to the edge of the chariot, apparently that he might whisper his secret into his ear, and said, "Come with me, and see my zeal for Jehovah." It was the first indication of Jehu's design upon the wor ship of Baal, for which he perceived that the stern zealot would be a fit coadjutor. Having intrusted him with the secret, he (lxx.) or his attendants (Heb. and A. V.) caused Jehonadab to proceed with him to Samaria in the royal chariot.

So completely had the worship of Baal become the national religion, that even Jehonadab was able to conceal his purpose under the mask of conformity. No doubt a great number had started with Jehonadab out; but the only occasion on which he is expressly mentioned is when (probably from his previous knowledge of the secret worshippers of Jehovah) he went with Jehu through the temple of Baal to turn out any that there might happen to be in the mass of Pagan worshippers (2 K. x. 23). [Jehu.] This is the last we hear of him.

A. P. S.

JEHONATHAN (יהונתן) [jehom Jehovah gave = his gift]: 'Toradav: Jonathan], the more accurate rendering of the Hebrew name, which is most frequently given in the A. V. as JONATHAN.

It is ascribed to three persons:—

1. Son of Uzziah; superintendent of certain of king David's storehouses (הנהנ traditions = treasures) earlier in the verse, and in 27, 28 "cells";) 1 Chr. xxvii. 23. 2. One of the Levites who were sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah to teach the people (2 Chr. xvii. 8). 3. [Vat. Alex. FA.] omit. A priest (Neh. xii. 18); the representative of the family of Shemaiah (ver. 6), when Joakim was high-priest, that is in the next generation after the return from Babylon under Zerubbabel and Jeshua.

JEHORAM (יהורם = exalted by Jehovah: 'Torad: Joseph, 'ta'orups: Jorʾim). The name is more often found in the contracted form of JORAM. 1. Son of Ahaziah of Israel, who succeeded his brother Ahaziah (who had no son) upon the throne at Samaria, n. c. 899, and died n. c. 884. During the first four years of his reign he contemporary on the throne of Judah was Jehoshaphat, and for the next seven years and upwards Joram the son of Jehosaphat, and for the last year, or portion of a year, Ahaziah the son of Joram, who was killed the same day that he was (2 K. ix. 27). The alliance between the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, commenced by his father and Jehoshaphat, was very close throughout his reign.

We first find him associated with Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom, at that time a tributary of the kingdom of Judah, in a war against the Moabites. Meshah, their king, on the death of Ahab, had revolted from Israel, and refused to pay the customary tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams. Jorʾam asked and obtained Jehoshaphat's help to reduce him to his obedience, and accordingly the three kings, of Israel, Judah, and Edom, marched through the wilderness of Edom to attack him. The three armies were in the utmost danger of perishing for want of water. The piety of Jehoshaphat suggested an inquiry of some prophet of Jehovah, and Elisha the son of Shaphat, at that time and since the latter part of Ahah's reign Elijah's attendant (2 K. iii. 11; 1 K. xix. 19-21), was found with the host. [Elisha 3, vol. i. p. 717.] From him Jehoram received a severe rebuke, and was bid to inquire of the prophets of his father and mother, the prophets of Baal. Nevertheless for Jehoshaphat's sake Elisha inquired of Jehovah, and received the promise of an abundant supply of water, and of a great victory over the Moabites; promise which was immediately fulfilled.

The same water which, filling the valley, and the trenches dug by the Israelites, supplied the whole army and all their cattle with drink, appeared to the Moabites, who were advancing, like blood, when the morning sun shone upon it. Concluding that the allies had fallen out and slain each other, they marched slowly enough to the attack, and were put to the rout. The allies pursued them and sent great slaughter into their own land, which they utterly ravaged and destroyed with all its cities. Kirha-raseth alone remained, and there the king of Moab made his last stand. An attempt to break through the besieging army having failed, he resorted to the desperate expedient of offering up his eldest son, the heir to his throne, as a burnt-offering, upon the wall of the city, the sight of the enemy. Upon this the Israelites retired and returned to their own land (2 K. iii.). It was perhaps in consequence of Elisha's rebuke, and of the above remarkable deliverance granted to the allied armies according to his word, that Jehoram, on his return to Samaria, put away the image of Baal which Ahab his father had made (2 K. iii. 2). For in 2 K. iv. we have an evidence of Elijah's being on friendly terms with Jehoram, in the offer made by him to speak to the king in favor of the Shunammite. The impression on the king's mind was probably strengthened by the subsequent incident of Nahum's cure, and the temporary cessation of the invasions of the Syrians, which doubtless resulted from it (2 K. v.). Accordingly when, a little later war broke out between Syria and Israel, we find Elisha befriending Jehoram. The king was made acquainted by the prophet with the secret councils of the king of Syria, and was thus enabled to defeat them; and on the other hand, when Elisha had led a large band of Syrian soldiers whom God had blinded, into the midst of Samaria, Jehoram reverently asked him, "My father, shall I smite them?" and, at the prophet's bidding, not only forbore to kill them, but made a feast for them, and then sent them home unhurt. This procured another cessation from the Syrian invasions for the Israelites (2 K. vi. 23). What happened after this to change the relations between the king and the prophet, we can only conjecture. But putting together the general bad character given of Jehoram (2 K. iii. 2, 3) with the fact of the prevalence of Baal-worship at the end of his reign (2 K. x. 21, 28), it seems probable that when the Syrian invasions ceased, and he felt less dependent upon the aid of the prophet, he relapsed into idleness, and was rebuked by Elisha, and threatened with a return of the calamities from which he had escaped. Refusing to repent, a fresh invasion by the Syrians, and a close siege of Samaria, actually came to pass, according probably to the word of the prophet. Hence, when the terrible incident arose, in consequence of a famine, of a woman having slain her own child, the king immediately attributed the evil to Elisha the son of Shaphat, and determined to take away his life. The message which he sent by the messenger whom he commissioned to cut off the prophet's head, "Behold this evil is from Jehovah, why should I wait for Jehovah any longer?" coupled with the fact of his having on sackcloth at the time (2 K. vi. 30, 31), indicates that many misfortunes and warnings, similar to those given by Jeremiah to the kings of his day, had passed between the prophet and the weak and unstable son of Ahabs. The providential interposition by which both Elisha's life was saved and the city delivered, is narrated 2 K. vii. viii. Jehoram appears to have returned to friendly feelings towards Elisha (2 K. viii. 4). His life, however, was now drawing near to its close. It was very soon after the above events that Elisha went to Damascus, and predicted the revolt of Hazael, and his accession to the throne of Syria in the room of Benhadad; and it was during Elisha's absence, probably, that the conversation between Jehoram and Gideon appeared in the vision of the Shunammite for did not begin to reign till the fifth of Jehoram (2 K. viii. 16); and it seems highly probable that the note of time in 2 K. i. 17, "in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat," which is obviously and certainly out of its place where it now is, properly belongs to the narrative in ch. ii. With regard to the other discordant dates at this epoch, it must suffice to remark that all attempts to reconcile them are vain. That which is based upon the supposition of Joram having been associated with his father in the kingdom for three or seven years, is of all perhaps the most unfortunate, as being utterly inconsistent with the history, annihilating his independent reign, and after all failing to produce even a verbal consistency. The table given below is intended on the supposition that Jehoshaphat's reign really lasted only 8 years, and Ahaziah only 2 as years from the texts cited; that the statement that Jehoshaphat reigned 25 years is caused by the probable circumstance of his having taken part in the government during the three last years of Asa's reign, when his father was incapacitated by the disease in his feet (2 Chr. xvi. 12); and that three years were then added to Ahaziah's reign, to make the whole number of the years of the kings of Israel agree with the whole number of these of the kings of Judah, thus unduly lengthened by an addition of three years to Jehoshaphat's reign. This arrangement, it is believed, reconciles the greatest number of existing texts, agrees best with history, and especially coincides with what is the most certain of all the elements of the chronology of this time, namely, that the twelve years' reign of Jehoram son of Ahab, and the few months' reign of Ahaziah, the successor of Joram son of Jehoshaphat, ended simultaneously at the accession of Jehu.

order of time to ch. iii., or that, though the raising from the dead of the Shunammite's son was subsequent to it, it probably was not the only effect; and therefore all the preliminary circumstances related in ch. iv. were so likewise. Neither again does the expression (2 K. iii. 11), "Here is Elisha," which poured water on the hands of Elijah," imply that this ministration had at that time ceased, and still less that Elijah was removed from the earth. We learn, on the contrary, from 2 Cor. xxi. 12, that he was still on earth in the reign of Jehoram. (See Jas. vii. 16.) This, and the supposition of Jehoram's son of Jehoshaphat who did not begin to reign till the fifth of Jehoram (2 K. viii. 16); and it seems highly probable that the note of time in 2 K. i. 17, "in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat," which is obviously and certainly out of its place where it now is, properly belongs to the narrative in ch. ii. JEHOASHABEATH

JEHOSHABEATH ([רעהב] [perh. sweeter by Jehovih, i.e. his worshippers]: Iowaab- *Beeth; Vat. Iowaabeet. Alex. Iowaabub: Josaboth), the form in which the name of JEHOSHABEATH is given in 2 Chr. xxii. 11. We are here informed, what is not told us in Kings, that she was the wife of Jehoada the high-priest.

JEHOASHAPAT ([ירעהב] [Jehorah is judge]: Iowaab: Josaphat). 1. The son of Azariah and Azubah, succeeded to the throne n. c. 914, when he was 32 years old, and reigned 25 years. His history is to be found among the events recorded in 1 K. xv. 34; 2 K. viii. 16, or in a continuous narrative in 2 Chr. xxi. i-xxi. 3. He was contemporary with Abah, Abashah, and Jehoram. At first he strengthened himself against Israel by bribing and garrisoning the cities of Judah and the Ephraimitish conquas of Asa. But soon after, when he was son Jehoram, who was Jehoshaphat's brother, they being common danger from Damascus and the tribes on their eastern frontier, came to an understanding. Israel and Judah drew together for the first time since they parted at Shechem sixty years previously. Jehoshaphat's eldest son Jehoram married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. His marriage was not in accordance with the Levitical laws, and he did not appear how far Jehoshaphat encouraged that ill-starred union. The closeness of the alliance between the two kings is shown by many circumstances: Athaliah's reluctance when in exile to set foot within the territory of Judah (2 Kings, xii. 26-33); the identity of names given to the children of the two royal families; the admission of names compounded with the name of Jehovah into the family of Jezreel, the zealous worshipper of Baal; and the extreme acerbity with which Jehoshaphat afterwards accompanied Ahab to the field of battle.

But in his own kingdom Jehoshaphat ever showed himself a zealous follower of the commandments of God: he tried, it would seem not quite successfully, to put down the high places and the groves in which the people of Judah burnt incense. In his third year, apprehending perhaps the evil example of Israel and foreign idolatry, and considering that the Levites were not fulfilling satisfactorily their function of teaching the people, Jehoshaphat sent out a commission of certain princes, priests, and Levites, to go through the cities of Judah, teaching the people out of the Book of the Law. He made a generous provision for each of his sons as they grew up, perhaps with a foreboding of their melancholy end (2 Chr. xxi. 4). Riches and honors increased around him. He received tribute from the Philistines and Aramans; and kept up a large standing army in Jerusalem.

It was probably about the 16th year of his reign (n. c. 898) when he went to Samaria to visit Ahab and to become his ally in the great battle of Ramoth-gilead—not very decisive in its result, though fatal to Ahab. From thence Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem in peace; and, after receiving a rebuke from the prophet Jehu, went himself through the people "from Beer-sheba to Mount Ephraim," reclaiming them to the law of God. He also took measures for the better administration of justice throughout his dominions; on which see Selden, De Synodis ii. cap. 8, §4. Turning his attention to the religious duties, he built Ezion-geber, with the help of Ahaziah, a navy designed to go to Tarshish: but, in accordance with a prediction of a prophet, Eliezer, it was wrecked at Ezion-geber; and Jehoshaphat resisted Ahaziah's proposal to renew their joint attempt.

Before the close of his reign he was engaged in two additional wars. He was miraculously delivered from a threatened attack of the people of Ammon, Moab, and Seir; the result of which is thought by some critics to be celebrated in Ps. 48 and 92, and to be alluded to by the prophet Joel, iii. 2, 12. After this, perhaps, must be dated the war which Jehoshaphat, in conjunction with Jehoram king of Israel and the king of Edom, carried on against the rebellious king of Moab (2 K. iii.). After this the realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet. In his declining years the administration of affairs was placed (probably n. c. 901) in the hands of his son Jehoram, who was able to defend the land against foreign attack, and to mediate between the tribes of Judah and the Ephraimites. But when the more pressing danger of Damascus and the tribes on their eastern frontier came to an understanding, Israel and Judah drew together for the first time

*Geuenius and Professor Newman are of opinion that the narratives in 2 K. iii. and 2 Chr. xx. relate to one event. Their view has been successfully opposed by Keil and Movers in Germany, and by the Rev. H. Browne, Unda Sacrorum, p. 335.*
contact, we cannot describe the character of this good king without a mixture of blame. Emissarily pious, gentle, just, devoted to the spiritual and temporal welfare of his subjects, active in mind and body, he was wanting in firmness and consistency. His character has been carefully sketched in a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Kessey, *Biographies from whence, at a stated season of the year, he collected such taxes as were paid in kind, and sent them to the king's court.

JEHOUSHAPAT, VALLEY OF (יהוֹשֶׁפאת)
[valley where Jehovah judges]; Koldai
Isaiah (Tallis Josephat), a valley mentioned by the prophet Joel only, as the spot in which, after the return of Judah and Jerusalem from captivity, Jehovah would gather all the heathen Joel iii. 2; Heb. iv. 2, and would there sit to judge them for their misdeeds to Israel (iii. 12; Heb. v. 4). The passage is one of great boldness, ascending in the verbal turns in which Hebrew poetry so much delights, and in particular there is a play between the name given to the spot — Jehoshapat, i. e. "Jehovah's judgment," and the "judgment" there to be pronounced. The Hebrew prophets often refer to the ancient glories of their nation: thus Isaiah speaks of the "day of Micah," and of the triumphs of David and of Joshua in "Mount Perazim," and in the "Valley of Gideon:" and in like manner Joel, in announcing the vengeance to be taken on the strangers who were annoying his country (iii.
14), seems to have glanced back to that triumphant day when king Jehoshapat, the greatest king the nation had seen since Solomon, and the greatest champion of Jehovah, led out his people to a valley in the wilderness of Tekoa, and was there blessed with such a victory over the hordes of his enemies as was without a parallel in the national records (2 Chr. xx.).

But though such a reference to Jehoshapat is both natural and characteristic, it is not certain that it is intended. The name may be only an imaginary one conferred on a spot which existed nowhere but in the vision of the prophet. Such was the view of some of the ancient translators.

Thus Theodotion renders it γάναι επιεικείας; and so the Targum of Jonathan — "the plain of the division of judgment." Michaelis (Ribe für Ungelehrten, Remarks on Joel) takes a similar view, and considers the passage to be a prediction of the Maccabean victories. By others, however, the prophet has been supposed to have had the end of the world in view. And not only this, but the scene of "Jehovah's judgment" has been localized, and the name has come down to us attached to the deep ravine which separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives, through which at one time the Kedron forced its stream. At what period the name was first applied to this spot is not known.
There is no trace of it in the Bible or in Josephus.
In both the only name used for this gorge is Kir-ron (N. T. Codex). We first encounter its new title in the middle of the 4th century in the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome (art. Calus), and in the Commentary of the latter father on Joel. Since that time the name has been recognized and adopted by travellers of all ages and all faiths. It is used by Christians — as Arnulfl at 700 (Everett Tetr. i. 4), the author of the Ciz de Hermesiole in 1187 (Rob. ii. 592), and Mansfield in 1607 (Ever. Tetr. p. 490); and by Jews — as Benjamin of Tudela about 1170 (Asher, i. 71; and see Rekud, p. 556). By the Moslems it is still said to be called Wadi Jishefet (Seetzen, ii. 23, 26), or Shoafat, though the name usually given to the valley is Wadi Silt-Maryam. Both Moslems and Jews believe that the last judgment is to take place there. To find a grave there is the desire of the latter (Briins, Heathen and Holy Lands, p. 290), and the former show — as they have done for certainly two centuries — the place on which Mohammed is to be seated at the Last Judgment, a stone jutting out from the east wall of the Haram area near the south corner, one of the pillars which once adorned the churches of Helena or Justinian, and of which mutilations are now imbedded in the rude masonry of the more modern mosque and buildings. The steep sides of the ravine, wherever a level strip allows the opportunity, are crowded — in places almost paved — by the sepultures of the Moslems, or the simpler shas of the Jewish tombs, alike awaiting the assembly of the Last Judgment.

So narrow and precipitous a] a glen is quite unsuited for such an event; but this inconsistency does not appear to have disturbed those who framed or those who held the tradition. It is however implied in the Hebrew terms employed in the two cases. That by Joel is Enmek (אֶ- נְמָק), a word applied to spacious valleys, such as those of Esdrachen or Gileon (Stanley, N. & P. App. § 1).
On the other hand the ravine of the Kidron is in-vitably designated by Nachal (גַָנָּה) answering b St. Cyril of Alexandria] either did not know the spot, or has another valley in his eye; probably the former. He describes it as not many stadia from Jerusalem; and says he is told (φησι) that it is "bare and apt for horses" (ψάραι καὶ ἑρμομένη. Comm. on Joel, quoted by Rekud, p. 336). Perhaps this indicates that the tradition was not at that time quite fixed.
and this fact alone would warrant the inference that the tradition of the identity of the Emek of Jehoshaphat with the Valley of the Kerdonan, and not vice versa until Hebrew had begun to define a dead language. A. The grounds on which it did arise were probably two: (1.) The frequent mention throughout this passage of Joel of Mount Zion, Jerusalem, and the Temple (ii. 32; iii. 1, 6, 16, 17, 18), may have led to the belief that the locality of the great judgment would be in their immediate neighborhood. This would be assisted by the mention of the Mount of Olives in the somewhat similar passage in Zechariah (xiv. 3, 4).

(2.) The belief that Christ would reappear in judgment on the Mount of Olives, from which He had ascended. This was at one time a received article of Christian belief, and was grounded on the words of the Angels, "He shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." A (Adrichonius, Theatr. Ter. Suntet, Jerusalem, § 192; Corn. d' Lapidé, on Acts i.)

(3.) There is the alternative that the Valley of Jehoshaphat was really an ancient name of the Valley of the Kerdon, and that from the name, the connection with Joel's prophecy, and the belief in its being the scene of Jehoval's last judgment have followed. This may be so; but then we should expect to find some trace of the existence of the name before the 4th century after Christ. It was certainly used as a burying-place as early as the reign of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 6), but no inference can fairly be drawn from this.

But whatever originated the tradition, it has held its ground most firmly. (a) In the valley itself, one of the four remarkable monuments which exist at the foot of Olivet was at a very early date connected with Jehoshaphat. At Arculf's visit (about 700) the name appears to have been borne by that now called "Absalom's tomb," but then the "tower of Jehoshaphat." (Enc. Trac. p. 4).

In the time of Maunder the "tomb of Jehoshaphat" was, what it still is, an excavation, with an architectural front, in the face of the rock behind "Absalom's tomb." A tolerable view of this is given in plate 33 of Munk's Palæstina, and a photograph by Salzmann, with a description in the Texte (p. 31) to the same. The name may, as already observed, really point to Jehoshaphat himself, though not to his tomb, as he was buried like the other kings in the city of David (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). (b)

One of the gates of the city in the east wall, opening on the valley, bore the same name. This is plain from the Cité de Jérusalem, where the Porte de Jofia is said to have been a "postern" close to the golden gateway (Porte d'Or), and to the south of that gate (pars devers mids; § iv., near the end, Rob. ii. 559). It was therefore at or near the small walled-up doorway, to which M. de Saulcy has restored the name of the Porte de Joseph, and which is but a few feet to the south of the golden gateway. However this may be, this postern is evidently of later date than the wall in which it occurs, as some of the enormous stones of the wall have been cut through to admit it; and so far, therefore, it is a witness to the date of the tradition being subsequent to the time of Herod, by whom this wall was built. It is probably the "little gate" leading down by steps to the valley," of which Arculf speaks (Early Trac.). Benjamin of Tudela (1163) also mentions the gate of Jehoshaphat, but without any nearer indication of its position than that it led to the valley and the monuments (Aher, i. 71). (c) Lastly, leading to this gate was a street called the street of Jehoshaphat (Cité de J. § vii., Rob. ii. 551).

The name would seem to be generally confined by travellers to the upper part of the glen, from about the "Tomb of the Virgin" to the southeast corner of the wall of Jerusalem. [Tomb.]

* First speaks of the present Valley of Jehoshaphat as on the south of Jerusalem (Húndr., i. 497). That must be an oversight. He thinks that the valley was so named from a victory or victories achieved there by Jehoshaphat over heathen enemies, but that the name was not actually given to the place till after the time of Joel.

The correct view, no doubt, is that the valley to which Joel refers is not one to be sought on any topographical map, of one period of Jerusalem's history or another, but is a name formed to localize an idealized scene. It is an instance of a bold, but truthful figure, to set forth the idea that God's persecuted, suffering people have always in Him an Almighty defender, and that all opposition to His kingdom and His servants must in the end prove vanishing. To convey this teaching the more impressively the prophet represents Jehovah as appointing a time and a place for meeting his enemies; they are commanded to assemble with all their forces, to concentrate, as it were, both their enmity and their power in one single effort of resistance to his purposes and will. They accept the challenge. Jehovah meets them thus united, and making trial of their strength against his omnipotence. The conflict then follows. The irresistible One scatters the adversaries at a single blow; he overwhelms them with horror (iii. 2-17; A. V., and iv. 12-17, Heb.). The prophet calls the scene of this encounter "the Valley of Jehoshaphat," (i. e. where "Jehovah judges"), on account of this display of God's power and justice, and the pledge thus given to his people of the final issue of all their labors and sufferings for his name's sake. With the same import Joel interchanges this expression in ver. 14 with "valley of decision," (ג릇), i. e. of a case decided, judgment declared.

H. JEHOSEPHA [Jehoshaphat, the south, by whom one sweats] C. LXIX. ix.. Joseph. "Iosaphath,(h) daughter of Joram king of Israel, and wife of Jehoahaz the high-priest (2 K. xi. 2). Her name in the Chronicles is given Jaho-SHABATHI. It thus exactly resembles the name of the only two other wives of Jewish priests who are known to us, namely, Elissera (LXX. and N. T. Elissaer, whence our Elisabeth), the wife of Aaron, Ex. vi. 23, and the wife of Zechariah, Luke i. 7. In the former case the word signifies "Jehovah's oath"; in the second "God's oath."
JEHOSHUA

JEHOVAH

As she is called, 2 K. ii. 2, "the daughter of Jocum, sister of Athaliah," it has been conjectured that she was the daughter, not of Athaliah, but of Joram, by another wife; and Josephus (Ant. i. 7, § 1) calls her Ωχρια ἡ αδελφή τοῦ Ἰσραήλ. This may be; but it is also possible that the omission of Athaliah's name may have been occasioned by the detestation in which it was held — in the same way as modern commentators have, for the same reason, eagerly embraced this hypothesis. That it is not absolutely needed is shown by the fact that the worship of Jehovah was tolerated under the reigns both of Joram and Athaliah — and that the name of Jehovah was incorporated into both of their names.

She is the only recorded instance of the marriage of a princess of the royal house with a high-priest. Only Joram ( xxii. 11) was permitted to be present in the temple on this provisoial occasion ("for she was the sister of Athaliah," 2 Ch. xxii. 11), as inducing and probably enabling her to rescue the infant Josiah from the massacre of his brothers. By her, he and his nurse were concealed in the palace, and afterwards in the Temple (2 K. ii. 2-3; 2 Chr. xxii. 11), where he was brought up probably with her sons (2 Chr. xxii. 11), who assisted at his coronation. One of these was Zechariah, who succeeded her husband in his office, and was afterwards murdered (2 Chr. xxiv. 20). A. P. S.

JEHOVASHUA (יהושוע; [Jehovah a helper]: "I̓ηραός; Josue"). In this form — contracted in the Hebrew, but fully the usual in the A. V. — is given the name of Joshua in Num. xiii. 16, on the occasion of its bestowal by Moses. The addition of the name of Jehovah probably marks the recognition by Moses of the important part taken in the affair of the spies by him, who till this time had been Hoshen, "helper," but henceforward to be Je-hoshua, "help of Jehovah" (Ewshw, i. 306). Once more only the name appears in its full form in the A. V. — this time with a redundant letter — as—

JEHOVAH (the Hebrew is as above: "Iηραός, in both MSS.: Josue"). In the genealogy of Ephram (1 Chr. vii. 27). We should be thankful to the translators of the A. V. for giving the first syllables of this great name their full form, if only in these two cases; though why in these only it is difficult to understand. Nor is it easier to see whence they got the final h in the latter of the two. [The final h is not found in the original edition of the A. V., 1611. — A.]

JEHOVAH (יְהוָּה), usually with the vowel points of יְהוֹוה; but when the two occur together the former is pointed יְהוָָה; that is, with the vowels of יְהוֹוה; as in Odad. i. 1, Hab. iii. 19; 1 the LXX. generally render it by Κύσων, the Vulgate by Dominus; and in this respect they have been followed by the A. V., where it is translated "The Lord". The true pronunciation of this name, by which God was known to the Hebrews, has been entirely lost, the Jews themselves scrupu-ously avoiding every mention of it, and substituting in its stead one or other of the words with whose proper vowel-points it may happen to be written. This custom, which has its origin in reverence, and has almost degenerated into superstition, was founded upon an erroneous rendering of Lev. xxiv. 16, from which it was inferred that the mere utterance of the name constituted a capital offense. In the rabbinical writings it is distinguished by various euphemistic expressions; as simply "the name," or "the name of four letters" (the Greek tetragrammaton); or "the great and terrible name;" "the perfect name;" i.e. appropriated to God alone; "the separate name," etc. whether the name which is separated or removed from human knowledge, or, as some render, "the name which has been interpreted or revealed" (נְאָנִית, skethumusaphiash). The Samaritans followed the same custom, and in reading the Pentateuch substituted for Jehovah (יְהוָָה, sketha) "the name," at the same time perpetuating the practice in their alphabetical poems and later writings (Geiger, Uerschrift, etc. p. 292). According to Jewish tradition, it was pronounced but once a year by the high-priest on the day of Atonement when he entered the Holy of Holies. At this point there is some doubt. Maimonides (Mor. Neb. i. 61) asserting that the use of the word was confined to the blessings of the priests, and restricted to the sanctuary, without limiting it still further to the high-priest alone. On the same authority we learn that it ceased with Simeon the Just (Ant. c. 14, § 10), having lasted through two generations, that of the men of the Great Synagogue and the age of Schneid, while others include the generation of Zedekiah among those who possessed the use of the skethumusaphiash (Midrash on Ps. xxxvi. 11, quoted by Buxtorf in Ireland's Deos Exercit.). But even after the destruction of the second temple we meet with instances of individuals who were in possession of the mysteries se-cet. A certain Bar Kanizaz is mentioned in the Mishna (Yoma, iii. § 11) who was able to write this name in Hebrew; but whether his evidence or such evidence as may conclude that after the siege of Jerusalem the true pronunciation almost if not entirely disappeared, the probability being that it had been lost long before. Josephus, himself a priest, confesses that on this point he was not permitted to speak (Ant. ii. 12, § 4); and Philo states (de Leg. Mos. iii. 519) that for those alone whose ears and tongue were purged by wisdom it was lawful to hear or utter this awful name. It is evident, therefore, that no reference to ancient writers can be expected to throw any light upon the question, and any quotation of them will only render the darkness in which it is involved more palpable. At the same time the discussion, though barred of actual results, may on other accounts be interesting; and as it is one in which great names are ranged on both sides, it would for this reason alone be impertinent to dismiss it with a cursory notice. In the decade of dissertations collected by Ewald, Fuller, Gataker, and Lensden do battle for the pronunciation Jehovah, against such formidable antagonists as Perins, Amama, Cappellus, Buxtorf, and Altingus, who, it is scarcely necessary to say, fairly beat their opponents out of the field; the only argument, in fact, of any weight, which has been played by the advocates of the pronunciation of the word as it is written being that derived from the form in which it appears in proper names, such as Jehovah, Jehovah, etc. Their antagonists make a strong point of the fact that, as has been noticed above, two different sets of vowels are applied to the same consonants under certain circumstances. To this Leusden, of all the champions on his side, but feebly replies. The same may be said of the argument derived from the fact that the letters יוהס, when prefixed to ייוהו, take, not the vowels which they would regularly receive were the present punctuation true, but those with which they would be written if ייוהו, were the reading; and that the letters ordinarily taking דגשׂ לenes when following ייוהו would, according to the rules of the Hebrew points, be written without dagesh, whereas it is uniformly inserted. Whatever, therefore, be the true pronunciation of the word, there can be little doubt that it is not Jehovah.

In Greek writers it appears under the several forms of Ιαω (Diod. Sic. i. 94; Iren. i. 4, § 1), 'Ιαω (Euseb. Præpar. Evang. iii. 9, § 31), ΑΑω (Opp. Alex. Stenom. p. 606), and in a catena to the Pentateuch in a MS. at Turin 'אוה; both Theodoret (Quast. 15 in Exod.) and Epiphanius (Her. xx.) give ΑΑω, the former distinguishing it as the pronunciation of the Samaritans, while Αה represents that of the Jews. But even if these writers were entitled to speak with authority, their evidence only tends to show in how many different ways the four letters of the word ייוהו could be represented in Greek characters, and throws no light either upon its real pronunciation or its punctuation. In like manner Jerome (on Ps. viii.), who acknowledges that the Jews considered it an ineffable name, at the same time says it may be read יָהוּ,—of course, supposing the passage in question to be genuine, which is open to doubt. In the absence, therefore, of anything satisfactory from these sources, there is plainly left a wide field for conjecture. What has been done in this the following pages will show. It will be better perhaps to ascend from the most improbable hypotheses to those which carry with them more show of reason, and thus prepare the way for the considerations which will follow.

I. Von Bohlen, at once most skeptical and most credulous, whose hasty conclusions are only paralleled by the rashness of his assumptions, unequivocally asserts that beyond all doubt the word Jehovah is not Semitic in its origin. Pinning his faith upon the Abraxas genus, in which he finds it in the form Jero, he connects it with the Sanskrit देवस, devo, the Greek Διός, and Latin Jovis or Diius. But, apart from the consideration that his authority is at least questionable, he omits to explain the striking phenomenon that the older form which has the झ should be preserved in the younger languages, the Greek and ancient Latin, while not a trace of it appears in the Hebrew. It would be desirable also that, before a philological argument of this nature can be admitted, the relation between the Semitic and Indo-Germanic languages should be more clearly established. In the absence of this any inferences which may be drawn from apparent resemblances (the resemblance in the present case not being even apparent) will lead to certain error.

That the Hebrews learned the word from the Egyptians is a theory which has found some advocates. The foundations for this theory are sufficiently slight. As has been mentioned above, Diodorus (i. 94) gives the Greek from 'Iah'; and from this it has been inferred that 'Iah was a deity of the Egyptians, whereas nothing can be clearer from the context than that the historian is speaking especially of the God of the Jews. Again, in Macrobius (Sat. i. c. 18), a line is quoted from an oracular response of Apollo Clarius:

Φασέρε τον πάντων ὑπατόν θεόν Ἰησοῦν 'Ιαω, which has been made use of for the same purpose. But Jablonsky (Panth. Ag. ii. § 5) has proved incontrovertibly that the author of the verses from which the above is quoted, was one of the Judaizing Gnostics, who were in the habit of making the names יאא and יסנְד the subjects of mystical speculations. The Egyptians, who were Egyptians, are known to have given the name יאא to the Moon (Neanders, Gnost. 252), but this, as Tholuck suggests, may have arisen from the fact that in Copit the Moon is called יאא (Verm. Schriften, i. 858). Movers (Phön. i. 540), while defending the genuineness of the passage of Macrobius, connects יאא, which denotes the Sun or Dionysus, with the root ייוהו, so that it signifies "the life-giver."

In any case, the fact that the name יאא is found among the Greeks and Egyptians, or among the Orientals of Further Asia, in the 6th or 3rd century, cannot be made use of as an argument that the Hebrews derived their knowledge of the word from any one of these nations. On the contrary, that can be but little doubt that the process in reality was reversed, and that in this case the Hebrews were, not the borrowers, but the lenders. We have indisputable evidence that it existed among them, whatever may have been its origin, many centuries before it is found in other records; of the contrary we have no evidence whatever. Of the singular manner in which the word has been introduced into other languages, we have a remarkable instance in a passage quoted by M. Rémusat, from one of the works of the Chinese philosopher Lao-tseu, who flourished, according to Chinese chronology, about the 6th or 7th century n. c., and hold the opinions commonly attributed to Pythagoras, Plato, and others of the Greeks. This passage M. Rémusat translates as follows: "Celui que vous regardez et que vous ne voyez pas, se nomme Hi; celui que vous écoutez et que vous n'entendez pas, se nomme Hi; ce sont trois êtres qu'on ne peut comprendre, et qui, confondus, n'en font qu'un." In these three letters J H V Rémusat thinks that he recognizes the name Jehovah of the Hebrews, which might have been learnt by the philosopher himself or some of his pupils in the course of his travels; or it might have been brought into China by some exiled Jews or Gnostics. The Chinese interpreter of the passage maintains that these mystical letters signify "the void," so that in his time every trace of the origin of the word had in all probability been lost. And not only does it appear, though perhaps in a questionable form, in the literature of the Chinese. In a letter from the missionary Plissant to the Vicar Apostolic Bouché, dated 18th Feb. 1847, there is mention made of a tradition which existed among a tribe in the jungles of Burmah, that the divine being was called Jora or Karu-Jova, and that the peculiarities of the Jehovah of the Old Testament were attributed to him (Ricnke, Beiträge, iii. 65). But all this is very vague and more curious than convincing. The inscription in front of the temple of Isis at Sais quoted by Plutarch (de Is. et Os. § 9), "I am all that hath been, and that is, and that shall be," which has been employed as an argument to prove that the name Jehovah was known among the Egyptians, is mentioned neither by Herodotus, Diodorus, nor Strabo; and Proclus, who does allude to it, says it was in the admixture of the temple.

But, even if it be genuine, its authority is worthless for the purpose for which it is adduced. For, supposing that Jehovah is the name to which such meaning is attached, it follows rather that the Egyptians borrowed it and learned its significance from the Jews, unless it can be proved that both in Egyptian and Hebrew the same combination of letters conveyed the same idea. Without, however, having recourse to any hypothesis of this kind, the peculiarity of the inscription is sufficiently explained by the place which, as is well known, Isis holds in the Egyptian mythology as the universal mother. The advocates of the Egyptian origin of the name have shown no lack of ingenuity in trying to find in the name itself in connection to their aid authorities the most unpromising. A passage from a treatise on interpretation (προφητευματα, § 71), written by one Demetrius, in which it is said that the Egyptians hymned their gods by means of the seven vowels, has been tortured to give evidence on the point. Scaliger was in doubt whether it referred to Serapis, called by Hesychius "Serapis of seven letters" (τὰ ἑπτά γράμματα Σαράπις), or to the exclamation τυχερ, "He is Jehovah." Of the latter there can be but little doubt. Gesner took the seven Greek vowels, and arranging them in the order ἹΕΘΟΤΑ, found therein Jehovah. But he was triumphantly refuted by Didymus, who maintained that the vowels were merely used for musical notes, and in this very probable conjecture he is supported by the Milesian inscription elucidated by Hartenberg and others. In this the invocation of God is denoted by the seven vowels five times repeated in different arrangements, ἹΕΘΟΣΑ, ἹΕΘΟΑ, ἹΕΘΟΙ, ἹΕΘΟΕ, ἹΕΘΟΥ: each group of vowels precedes a "holy" (ὅσιά), and the whole concludes with the following: "the city of the Milesians and all the inhabitants are guarded by archangels." Muller, with much probability, concludes that the seven vowels represented the seven notes of the cataract. One more argument for the Egyptian origin of Jehovah remains to be noticed. It is found in the circumstance that Pharaoh changed the name of Eliakim to Jehoiakim (2 K. xxiii. 31), which it is asserted is not in accordance with the practice of conquerors towards the conquered, unless the Egyptian king imposed upon the king of Judah the name of one of his own gods. But the same reasoning would prove that the origin of the word was Babylonian, for the king of Babylon changed the name of Mattaniah to Zedekiah (2 K. xxi. 17).

But many, abandoning as untenable the theory of an Egyptian origin, have sought to trace the name among the Phoenicians and Canaanite tribes. In support of this, Hartmann brings forward a passage from a pretended fragment of Sanchoniatho quoted by Philo Byblius, a writer of the age of Nero. But it is now generally admitted that the so-called fragments of Sanchoniatho, the ancient Phoenician chronicler, are most impudent forgeries concocted by Philo Byblius himself. Besides, the passage to which Hartmann refers is not found in Philo Byblius, but is quoted from Porphyry by Eusebius (Prep. Evan. i. 9, § 21), and genuine or not, evidently alludes to the Jehovah of the Jews.

It is there stated that the most trustworthy authority in matters connected with the Jews was Sanchoniatho of Beyrut, who received his information from Hieromades (Joseph. Antiq. x. 3). The priest of the god Tēmōk. From the occurrence of Jehovah as a compound in the proper names of many who were not Hebrews, Hammack (Misc. Phan. p. 174, &c.), contends that it must be known among heathen people. But such knowledge, if it existed, was no more than might have been obtained by their necessary contact with the Hebrews. The names of Urijah the Hitite, of Aramah or Arana, and the Jehofer, the Ammonite, and of the cunamitish town Biţjadhjah, may be all explained without having recourse to Hammack's hypothesis. Of as little value is his appeal to 1 K. v. 7, where we find the name Jehovah in the mouth of Hiram, king of Tyre. Apart from the consideration that Hiram would necessarily be acquainted with the name as that of the Hebrews' national god, its occurrence is sufficiently explained by the tenor of Solomon's message (1 K. v. 5–5). Another point on which Hammack relies for support is the name Ἀββαῖος, which occurs as that of a Tyrian suflete in Menander (Joseph. Ajphon. i. 21), and which he identifies with Obadiah (יוֹבָדָה). But both Furst and Hengstenberg represent it in Hebrew characters by יַבָּדָה, 'abadah, which even Hammack thinks more probable.

II. Such are the principal hypotheses which have been constructed in order to account for a non-Hellenic origin of Jehovah. To attribute much value to them requires a large share of faith. It remains now to examine the theories on the opposite side: for on this point authorities are by no means agreed, and have frequently gone to the contrary extreme. S. D. Luzzatto (*Subi. in Jes. Vat. in Rosenmüller's Compend. xxiv) advances with singular naivete the extraordinary statement that Jehovah, or rather לִבְדִּית, divided points of, is compounded of two interjections, לִבְדִּית, of pain, and לִבְדִּית, of joy, and denotes the author of good and evil. Such an etymology, from one who is unquestionably among the first of modern Jewish scholars, is a remarkable phenomenon. Ewald, referring to Gen. xix. 24, suggests as the origin of Jehovah, the Arabic אֲבָדָה, which signifies 'height, heaven,' 'a conjecture, of the honor of which no one will desire to rob him. But must have taken for the basis of their explanations, and the different methods of pronunciation which they propose, the passage in Ex. iii. 14, to which we must naturally look for a solution of the question. When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty, who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the name which he should give as the credentials of his mission: 'And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM (Ex. iii. 14), נָאֵל אַהֲבָדָה (shahok abar shahok); and he said, Thus

That thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you: That this passage is intended to indicate the etymology of Jehovah, as understood by the Hebrews, no one has ventured to doubt: it is in fact the key to the whole mystery. But, though it certainly supplies the etymology, the interpretation must be determined from other considerations. According to this view then, יְהוָה must be the 3d sing. masc. fut. of the substantive verb יְהֹウェ, the older form of which was יִהֹוָאָה, still found in the Chaldee יַהֹוה, and Syriac יַהֹוה, a fact which will be referred to hereafter in discussing the antiquity of the name. If this etymology be correct, and there seems little reason to call it in question, one step towards the true punctuation and pronunciation is already gained. Many learned men, and among them Grotius, Galatinus, Crusius, and Leusden, in an age when such fancies were rife, imagined that, reading the name with the vowel points usually attached to it, they discovered an indication of the eternity of God in the fact that the name by which He revealed himself to the Hebrews was compounded of the present participle, and the future and preterite tenses of the substantive verb. This derivative verb, as has already been suggested by the expression in Rev. iv. 8 (ד וֹיֶלֶה יַהֹוה יְהֹוה יְהֹוה יִדּוּקֹנָו), and received apparent confirmation from the Targ. Jon. on Deut. xxxii. 39, and Targ. Jer. on Ex. iii. 14. These passages, however, throw no light upon the composition of the name, and merely assert that in its significance it embraces past, present, and future. But having agreed to reject the present punctuation, it is useless to discuss any theories which may be based upon it, had they even greater probability in their favor than the one just mentioned. As one of the forms in which Jehovah appears in Greek characters is Ιαω, it has been proposed by Cappellus to punctuate it יַהֹוָא, which is clearly contrary to the analogy of יַהֹוה verbs. Gussetius suggested יַהֹוה, יַהֹוה, or יַהֹוה, יַהֹוה, in the former of which he is supported by the authority of First; and Mercer and Corn. a Lapide read it יַהֹוה, יַהֹוה: but on all these suppositions we should have יַהֹוה for יַהֹוה in the terminations of compound proper names. The suffrages of others are divided between יַהֹוה or יַהֹוה, supposed to be represented by the יַהֹוה of Epiphanius above mentioned, and יַהֹוה or יַהֹוה, which First holds to be the יַהֹוה of Porphyry, or the יַהֹוה of Clemens Alexandrinus. Caspari (Mikhe, p. 5, &c.) decides in favor of the former on the ground that this form only would give rise to the contraction יַהֹוה in proper names, and opposes both First's punctuation יַהֹוה or יַהֹוה, as well as that of יַהֹוה or יַהֹוה, which would be contracted into יַהֹוה. Gesenius punctuates the word יַהֹוה, from which, or from יַהֹוה, are derived the abbreviated form יַהֹוה, יַהֹוה, used in poetry, and the form יַהֹוה (so יַהֹוה becomes יַהֹוה) which occurs at the commencement of compound proper names.

JEHOVAH

Hitzig, Jerusa, p. 4. Delitzsch maintains that, whichever punctuation be adopted, the quiescent sheva under יָהֹוה is ungrammatical, and Chatepl. Vatich is the proper vowel. He therefore writes יָהֹוה, יָהֹוה, to which he says the 'Ašā of Theodoret corresponds; the last vowel being Kanetz instead of Segel, according to the analogy of proper names derived from יָהֹוה verbs (e.g. יָהֹוה, יָהֹוה, יָהֹוה, and others). In his opinion the form יָהֹוה is not an abbreviation, but a concentration of the Tetragrammaton (Comm. über den Psalter, Einl.). There remains to be noticed the suggestion of Gesenius that the form יָהֹוה, which he adopted, might be the High. fut. of the substantive verb. Of the same opinion was Renn. Others again would make it Piel, and read יַהֹוה. Fürst (Handb. s. v.) mentions some other etymologies which affect the meaning rather than the punctuation of the name; such, for instance, as that it is derived from a root יָהֹוה, "to overthrow," and signifies "the destroyer or storm-sender;" or that it denotes "the light or heaven," from a root יָהֹוה יָהֹוה, "to be bright," or "the life-giver," from the same root יָהֹוה יָהֹוה, "to live." We have therefore to decide between יָהֹוה or יָהֹוה, and accept the former, i.e. יָהֹוה, as the more probable punctuation, continuing at the same time for the sake of convenience to adopt the form "Jehovah" in what follows, on account of its familiarity to English readers.

III. The next point for consideration is of vastly more importance: what is the meaning of Jehovah, and what does it express of the being and nature of God, more than or in distinction from the other names applied to the deity in the O. T.? That there was some distinction in these different appellations was early perceived, and various explanations were employed to account for it. Tertullian (Onir. Hermog. c. 3) observed that God was not called Lord (καιόπος) till after the Creation, and in consequence of it: while Augustine found in it an indication of the absolute dependence of creation, and of the necessity of a personal God (De Gen. ad Lit. viii. 2). Chrysostom (Hom. xiv. in Gen.) considered the two names, Lord and God, as equivalent, and the alternate use of them arbitrary. But all their arguments proceed upon the supposition that the καιόπος of the LXX. is the true rendering of the original, whereas it is merely the translation of יָהֹוה, דִּדְוַא, whose points it bears. With regard to יָהֹוה יָהֹוה, דִּדְוַא, the other chief name by which the Deity is designated in the O. T., it has been held by many, and the opinion does not even now want supporters, that in the plural form of the word was shadowed forth the plurality of persons in the godhead, and the mystery of the Trinity was inferred therefrom. Such, according to Peter Lombard, was the true significance of Elohim. But Calvin, Mercer, Drusius, and Beltramini have given the weight of their authority against an explanation so fanciful and arbitrary. Among the Jewish writers of the Middle Ages the question much more nearly approached its solution. R. Jehuda Hallevi (12th cent.), the author of the book Conri, known as the usage of Elohim a protest against idolaters, who call each personified power "Elah, and all collectively Elohim. He interpreted it as the most general name of the Deity, distinguishing Him as manifested in the exhibition of his power, without reference to moral qualities, or any special relation which He bears to man. Jehovah, on the contrary, is the revealed and known God. While the meaning of the former could be evolved by reasoning, the true significance of the latter could only be apprehended by that prophetic vision by which a man is, as it were, separated and withdrawn from his own kind, and approaches to the angelic, and another spirit enters into him." In like manner Mainmonides (Maimon. ii. 6) saw in Jehovah the name which teaches the substance of the Creator, and Abarbanel (quoted by Buxtorf, de Nom. Dei, § 34) distinguishes Jehovah, as denoting God according to what He is in himself, from Elohim which conveys the idea of the impression made by his power. In the opinion of Astry, a Belgian physician, with whom the documentary hypothesis originated, the alternate use of the two names was arbitrary, and determined by no essential difference. Hasse (Entdeckungen) considered them as historical names, and Sauck (de Leg Novi. Dei, etc.) regarded Elohim as a vague term denoting "a certain infinite, omnipotent, incomprehensible existence, from which things finite and visible have derived their origin," while to God, as Revealing himself, the more definite title of Jehovah was applied. Elohim, in his tract on the composition of names (written when he was nineteen), maintained that Elohim denoted the Deity in general, and is the common or lower name, while Jehovah was the national god of the Israelites. But in order to carry out his theory he was compelled in many places to alter the text, and was afterwards induced to modify his statements, which were opposed by Cranberg and Stihelin. Doubtless Elohim is used in many cases of the gods of the heathen, who included in the same title the God of the Hebrews, and denoted generally the Deity when spoken of as a supernatural being, and when no national feeling influenced the speaker. It was Elohim who, in the eyes of the heathen, delivered the Israelites from Egypt (1 Sam. iv. 8), and the Egyptian had adjured David by Elohim, rather than by Jehovah, of whom he would have no knowledge (1 Sam. xxx. 15). So Elohim announces to the Moabite king a message from Elohim (Judg. iii. 21); to the Syrians the Jehovah of the Hebrews was only their national God, one of the Elohim (1 K. xx. 24. 28), and in the mouth of a heathen the name Jehovah would convey no more intelligible meaning than this. It is to be observed also that when a Hebrew speaks with a heathen he uses the more general term Elohim. Joseph, in addressing the king of Meah to protect his family (2 Sam. xxi. 3), designate the Deity by the less specific title; and on the other hand the same rule is generally followed when the heathen are the speakers, as in the case of Amos (Gen. xxii. 23), the Hittites (Gen. xxvii. 6), the Midianites (Judg. vii. 14), and Joseph in his assumed character as an Egyptian (Gen. xlii. 8). But, although this distinction between Elohim, as the general appellation of Deity, and Jehovah, the national God of the Israelites, contains some superficial truth, the real nature of their difference must be sought for far deeper, and as a foundation for the arguments which will be adduced recourse must again be had to etymology.

IV. With regard to the derivation of מַלְכָּם, Elohim, the pl. of מַלְכָּם, etymologists are divided in their opinions; some connecting it with מַלְכָּם, -ל, "to be strong," while others refer it to the Arabic מַלְכָּם, אָדָם, "to worship, adore," Elohim thus denoting the Supreme Being who was worthy of all worship and adoration, the dread and awful One. But, first, with much greater probability, takes the noun in this as the primitive from which is derived the idea of worship contained in the verb, and gives as the true root מַלְכָּם = מַלְכָּם, to be strong; Delitzsch would prefer a root מַלְכָּם, מַלְכָּם = מַלְכָּם (Symb. ad Parad. illu. p. 29). From whatever root, however, the word may be derived, most are of opinion that the primary idea contained in it is that of strength, power, so that Elohim is the proper appellation of the Deity, as manifested in his creative and universally sustaining agency, and in the general divine guidance and government of the world. Hengstenberg, who adheres to the derivation above mentioned from the Arab., אָדָם and אָדָם, deduces from this etymology his theory that Elohim indicates a lower, and Jehovah a higher stage of the knowledge of God, on the ground that the feeling of fear is the lowest which can exist in reference to God, and merely in respect of this feeling is God marked by this designation. But the same inference might also be drawn on the supposition that the idea of simple power or strength is the most prominent in the word; and it is more natural that the Divine Being should be conceived of as strong before He became the object of fear and adoration. To this view Gesenius accedes, when he says that the notion of worshipping and fearing is rather derived from the power of the Deity which is expressed in his name. The question now arises, What is the meaning to be attached to the plural form of the word? As has been already mentioned, some have discovered therein the mystery of the Trinity, while others maintain that it points to polytheism. The Rabbis generally explain it as the plural of majesty; Rabbi Iechai, as signifying the lord of all powers. Abraham and Kimchi consider it a title of honor, in accordance with the Hebrew idiom, of which examples will be found in Is. liv. 5, Job xxxvi. 10, Gen. xxxiii. 19, xili. 30. In Prov. ix. 1, the plural מַלְכָּם, מַלְכָּם, "wisdoms," is used for wisdom in the abstract, as including all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Hence it is probable that the plural form Elohim, instead of pointing to polytheism, is applied to God as comprehending in himself the fullness of all power, and uniting in a perfect degree all that which the name signifies, and all the attributes which the heathen ascribe to the several divinities of their pantheon. The singular מַלְכָּם, Elohim, with few exceptions (Neh. ix. 17; 2 Chr. xxxii. 13), occurs only in poetry. The Jehovah will be found, upon examination of the passages in which Elohim occurs, that it is chiefly in places where God is exhibited only in the plentitude of his power, and where no especial reference is made to his unity, personality, or holiness, or to his relation to Israel and the theocracy. (See Ps. xvi. 1, xix. 1, 7, 8.) Hengstenberg's etymology of the word is disputed by Delitzsch (Synth. od Pros. illustr. p. 29 n.), who refers it, as has been mentioned above, to a root indicating power or might, and sees in it an expression not of what men think of God, but of what He is in Himself, as far as He is life omnipotent in Himself, and according as He is the beginning and end of all life. For the true explanation of the name he refers to the revelation of the mystery of the Trinity. But it is at least extremely doubtful whether to the ancient Israelites any idea of this nature was conveyed by Elohim: and in making use of the more advanced knowledge supplied by the New Testament, there is some danger of discovering more meaning and a more subtle significance than was ever intended to be expressed.

V. While Elohim exhibits God displayed in his power as the creator and governor of the physical universe, the name Jehovah designates his nature as He stands in relation to man, as the only, almighty, true, personal, holy Being, a spirit, and "the Holy One of Israel" (Num. xvi. 17); and it is by John iv. 24), who revealed himself to his people, a made a covenant with them, and became their lawgiver, and to whom all honor and worship are due. If the etymology above given be accepted, and the name be derived from the future tense of the substantive verb, it would denote, in accordance with the general analogy of proper names of a similar form, "He that is," "the Being," whose chief attribute is eternal existence. Jehovah is represented as eternal (Gen. xxvi. 33; comp. I Tim. vi. 16), unchangeable (Ex. iii. 14; Mal. iii. 6), the only being (Josh. xxii. 22; Ps. l. 1), creator and lord of all things (Ex. xx. 11; comp. Num. xvii. 22 with xxvii. 16; Is. xii. 5). It is Jehovah who made the covenant with his people (Gen. xv. 18; Num. x. 33, &c.). In this connection Elohim occurs but once (Ps. lxxiii. 10), and even with the article, in which Elohim is used. Where such expression as Elohim alone, without Elohim, is found but seldom (Judg. xx. 27; I Sam. iv. 4). The Israelites were enjoined to observe the commandments of Jehovah (Lev. iv. 27, &c.), to keep his law, and to worship Him alone. Hence the phrase "to serve Jehovah" (Ex. x. 7, 8, &c.) is applied to denote true worship, whereas "to serve his-Elohim" is used but once in this sense (Ex. iii. 12), and Elohim occurs in the same association only when the worship of idols is spoken of (Deut. iv. 28; Judg. iii. 6). As Jehovah, the only true God, is the only object of true worship, to Him belong the sabbaths and festivals, and all the ordinances connected with the religious services of the Israelites (Ex. x. 9, xii. 11; Lev. xxvii. 2). His are the altars on which offerings are made to the true God; the priests and ministers are his (1 Sam. ii. 11, xiv. 3), and so on. Hence, what a prominent place is always associated with idolatrous worship. To Jehovah alone are offerings made (Ex. viii. 8), and if Elohim is ever used in this connection, it is always qualified by pronoun suffixes, or some word in construction with it, so as to indicate the true God: in all other cases it refers to idols (Ex. xxii. 20, xxxiv. 15). It follows naturally that the Temple and Tabernacle are Jehovah's, and if they are attributed to Elohim, the latter is in some manner restricted as before. The prophets are the prophets of Jehovah, and their announcements proceed from him, seldom from Elohim. The Israelites are the people of Jehovah (Ex. xxvii. 20), the congregation of Jehovah (Num. xvi. 3), as the Moabites are the people of Chemosh (Jer. xlviii. 46). Their king is the mounted of Jehovah; their wars are the wars of Jehovah (Ex. xiv. 25; 1 Sam. xviii. 17); their enemies are the enemies of Jehovah (2 Sam. xii. 14); it is the hand of Jehovah that delivers them up to their foes (Judg. vi. 1, xiii. 1, &c.), and be it is who raises up for them deliverers and judges, and on whom they call in times of peril (Judg. ii. 18, iii. 9, 15; Josh. xxiv. 7; 1 Sam. xvii. 37). In fine, Jehovah is the theocratic king of his people (Judg. viii. 21), by him their kings reign and achieve success against the national enemies (1 Sam. xix. 14. xxv. 3). Their heroes are inspired by his Spirit (Judg. iii. 10, vi. 34), and their hand steed their foes (2 Sam. vii. 23); the watchword of Gideon was "The Sword of Jehovah, and of Gideon!" (Judg. xvi. 20). The day on which God executes judgment on the wicked is the day of Jehovah (Is. ii. 12, xxxiv. 8; comp. Rev. xvi. 14). As the Israelites were in a remarkable manner distinguished as the people of Jehovah, who became their lawgiver and government ruler, it is not strange that He should be put in strong contrast with Chemosh (Judg. xii. 4), Ashtaroth (Judg. x. 6), and the Baalim (Judg. iii. 7), the national deities of the surrounding nations, and thus be preeminently distinguished as the tutelary deity of the Hebrews in one aspect of his character. Such and no more was He to the heathen (1 K. xxii. 25); but all this and much more to the Israelites, to whom Jehovah was a distinct personal subsistence,—the living God, who reveals himself to man by word and deed, helps, guides, saves, and delivers, and is to the old what Christ is to the New Testament. Jehovah was no abstract name, but thoroughly practical, and stood in intimate connection with the religious life of the people. While Elohim represents God only in his most outward relation to man, and distinguished as his name expresses his character; Jehovah describes him according to his inwardmost being. In Jehovah the moral attributes are presented as constituting the essence of his nature, whereas in Elohim there is no reference to personality or moral character. The relation of Elohim to Jehovah has been variously explained. The former, in Hengstenberg's opinion, indicates a lower and the latter a higher, stage of consciousness of God: Elohim becoming Jehovah by a historical process, and to show how he became so being the main object of the sacred history. Kurtz considers the two names as related to each other as power and evolution; Elohim the God of the beginning, Jehovah the God of the beginning, Jehovah the mediator. Elohim is God of the beginning and end, the creator and the judge; Jehovah the God of the middle, the promised, which lies between the beginning and end (Die Einheit der Gen.). That Jehovah is identical with Elohim, and not a separate being, is indicated by the joint use of the names Jehovah-Elohim.

VI. The antiquity of the name Jehovah among the Hebrews has formed the subject of much discussion. That it was not known before the age of Moses has been inferred from Ex. vi. 3; while Von Bohlen assigns it to a much more recent date, and contends that we have "no conclusive proof of the worship of Jehovah anterior to the ancient hymns of David" (Int. to Gen. i. 150, Eng. tr.). But, on the other hand, it should be inclined to infer from the etymology of the word that it originated in an age long prior to that of Moses, in whose time the root יְהוָֹה, יְהוָֹה, was already antiquated. From the Aramaic form in which it appears (comp. Chald. יְהוָֹה, Syr. יהוה), Jahh refers to the earliest times of Abraham for its date, and to Mesopotamia or Ur of the Chaldees for its place of birth. Its usage in Genesis cannot be explained, as Le Clerc suggests, by supposing it to be employed by anticipation, for it is introduced where the persons to whom this Scripture relates are speaking, and not only where the narrator adopts terms familiar to himself; and the same difficulty remains whatever hypothesis be assumed with regard to the original documents which formed the basis of the history. At the same time it is distinctly stated in Ex. vi. 3, that to the patriarchs God was not known by the name Jehovah. If, therefore, this passage be a reference to the first revelation of Jehovah simply as a name and title of God, there is clearly a discrepancy which requires to be explained. In renewing his promise of deliverance from Egypt, "God spake unto Moses and said unto him, I am Jehovah; and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by (the name of) God Almighty (El Shaddai, יְהוָֹה reiterated), but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them." It follows then that, if the reference were merely to the name as a name, the passage in question would prove equally that before this time Elohim was unknown as an appellation of the Deity, and God would appear to Jahh only as El Shaddai, the patriarchal history. But although it was held by Theodore (Quast. xx. in Ec.) and many of the Fathers, who have been followed by a long list of moderns, that the name was first made known by God to Moses, and then introduced by him among the Israelites, the contrary was maintained by Cajetan, Lyra, Calvin, Rosenmuller, Hengstenberg, and others, who deny that the passage in Ex. vi. alludes to the introduction of the name. Calvin saw at once that the knowledge there spoken of could not refer to the syllables and letters, but to the recognition of God's glory and majesty. It was, he said, the true name, but the true depth of its significance which was unknown to and uncomprehended by the patriarchs. They had known God as the omnipotent, El Shaddai (Gen. xiii. 1, xviii. 3), the ruler of the physical universe, and of man as one of that greatness as a god eternal, immutable, and true to his promises he was yet to be revealed. In the character expressed by the name Jehovah he had not hitherto been fully known; his true attributes had not been recognized (comp. Jarchi on Ex. vi. 3) in his working and acts for Israel. Aben Ezra explained the occurrence of the name in Genesis as simply indicating the knowledge of it as a proper name, no more a qualitative expressing the attributes and qualities of God. Referring to other passages in which the phrase "the name of God" occurs, it is clear he had something more is intended by it than a mere appellation, and that the proclamation of the name of God is a revelation of his moral attributes, and of his true character as Jehovah (Ex. xxxii. 3, xxxiv. 6, 7) the God of the covenant. Maimonides (Mor. Neb. i. 64, ed. Buxtorf) explains the name of God as signifying his essence and his truth, and Oldhauser (on Matt. xviii. 20) interprets "name" (לְוָֹה) as denoting "personality and essential being, and that not as is incomprehensible or unknown, but in its manifestation." The name of a thing represents the thing itself, so far as it can be expressed in words. That Jehovah was not a new name Havernick concludes from Ex. iii. 14, where "the name of God Jehovah is evidently presupposed as already in use, and is only explained, interpreted, and applied... . It is certainly not a new name that is introduced; on the contrary, the יְהוָֹה יְהוָֹה יְהוָֹה יְהוָֹה יְהוָֹה יְהוָֹה (I am that I am) would be unintelligible, if the name itself were not presupposed as already known. The old name of antiquity, whose precious significance had been forgotten and neglected by the children of Israel, here is it to rise again to life and is again brought home to the consciousness of the people;" (Introd. to the Pent. p. 61). The same passage supplies an argument to prove that by "name" we are not to understand merely letters and syllables, for Jehovah appears at first in another form, נְּכֹּֽה. The correct collective view of Ex. vi. 3, Hengstenberg conceives to be the following — "Hitherto that Being, who in one aspect was Jehovah, in another had always been Elohim. The great crisis now drew nigh in which Jehovah Elohim would be changed into Jehovah. In prospect of this event God solemnly announced himself as Jehovah." Great stress has been laid, by those who deny the antiquity of the name Jehovah, upon the fact that proper names compounded with it occur but seldom before the age of Samuel and David. It is undoubtedly true that, after the revival of the true faith among the Israelites, proper names so compounded did become more frequent, but if it can be shown that prior to the time of Moses any such names existed, it will be sufficient to prove that the name Jehovah was not entirely unknown. Among those which have been quoted for this purpose are Jechebed the mother of Moses, and daughter of Levi, and Moriah, the mountain on which Abraham was commanded to offer up Isaac. Against the former it is urged that Moses might have changed her name to Jechebed after the name Jehovah had been communicated by God; but this is very improbable, as he was at this time eighty years old, and his mother in all probability dead. If this only be admitted as a genuine instance of a name compounded with Jehovah, it takes us at once back into the patriarchal age, and proves that a word which was employed in forming the proper name of Jacob's grand-daughter could not have been unknown to that patriarch himself. The name Moriah (מֹרְחָא) is of more importance, for in one passage in which it occurs it is accompanied by an etymology intended to indicate what was then understood by it (2 Chr. iii. 1). Hengstenberg regards it as a compound of מֹרְחָא, the Hiph. Part. of מֹרָֽה, and יָּהָה, the abbreviated form of יְהוָֹה, so that, according to this etymology, it would signify "shown by Jehovah." Gesenius, adopting the meaning of מֹרָֽה in Gen. xiv. 8, renders it: cho-

"men by Jehovah," but suggests at the same time what he considers a more probable derivation, according to which Jehovah does not form a part of the compound word. But there is reason to believe from various allusions in Gen. xxii. that the former was regarded as the true etymology.

Having thus considered the origin, significance, and antiquity of the name Jehovah, the reader will be in a position to judge how much of truth there is in the assertion of Schwind (quoted by Reiske, Bibelkrit. iii. 135, n. 10) that the terms Elohim, Jehovah Elohim, and then Jehovah alone applied to God, show "to the philosophic inquirer the progress of the human mind from a plurality of gods to a superior god, and from this to a single Almighty Creator and ruler of the world."

The principal authorities which have been made use of in this article are Hengstenberg, On the Authenticity of the Pentateuch, i. 215-307, Engl. trans.; Reiske, Phil. hist. * In regard to the use of יְהֹוָה in the O. T., especially in the Pentateuch and the Psalms, considered as a mark of antiquity and authorship, the reader is referred to the articles on those books. The article by Dr. Tholuck (see above) first published in his Literarischer Anzeiger (1832, May, §), was translated by Dr. Robinson in the Bibl. Repository, iv. 89-108. It examines "the hypothesis of the Egyptian and Indian origin of the name Jehovah," and shows that it has no proper foundation. It is held that "the true derivation of the word is that which the earliest Hebrew records present, namely, from the verb יָהַה." Prof. E. Ballentine discusses the significance of the name in the same periodical (iii. 730-744), under the head of "Interpretation of Ex. vi. 2, 3." Of the eleven different explanations which he reviews, he adopts the one which supposes Jehovah "to imply simply real existence, that which is, as distinguished from that which is not." Hence, when it is said that God appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as El Shaddai (the Almighty), but was not known to them as Jehovah, it is "a formal declaration by God himself of the commencement of a new dispensation of religion and providence, the grand design of which was to make known God as Jehovah, the only true and living God," in opposition to idols and all other false gods. It is not meant that the name itself of Jehovah was unknown to the patriarchs; but that the object of God's dealing with them was different from that of the Mosaic dispensation, namely, to vindicate the truth concerning Him (expressed by יָהַה), that He alone is the living God. Dr. Wordsworth's view of the introduction of the name is very similar to this. There is not a contrast in the passage (Ex. vi. 2, 3) between the two names Shaddai and Jehovah; but a comparison of attributes, and of the degree of blessings with which they were revealed. Hence the assertion is not that "the name Jehovah was not known before, but that its full meaning had not been made known" (Holy Bible, with Notes, ii. 216).

The more common view (stated in the preceding article), restricts the idea of this fuller revelation to God's immutability as the one essential to his promises. This explanation is preferred by Rev. J. Quarry, in his able work on Genesis and its Authorship (Lond., 1869). "The Patriarchs had only the promises unfulfilled; in respect to the fulfillment of them they received not the promises." God is now about to fulfill the great promise to give the land of Canaan to their seed, and so He announces himself to Moses in the words, 'I am Jehovah,' and tells him that while the Patriarchs had manifestations of God in his character as El Shaddai, they had no experience of him as regards this name, which implied the continuousness and unchangeableness of his gracious purpose toward them (p. 296). Ebrard (Historische Theol. Zeitschrift, 1849, iv.) agrees with those who infer the later origin of the name from Ex. vi. 2, 3. He maintains that "Jehovah" occurs in Genesis only as prophetic, and on that ground denies that its use there affords any argument against the unity of the authorship of that book. Recent discussions have rendered this latter branch of the subject specially important. (For the fuller literature which belongs here, see under Pentateuch, Amer. ed.) In regard to the representation of יְהֹוָה by קְיוֹפָא in the Septuagint, we refer the reader to Prof. Stuart's article on קְיוֹפָא in the Bibl. Repository, i. 786 ff. It is shown that this Greek title is employed in the great majority of instances to designate that most sacred of all the Divine appellations. II.

JEHOVAH-JIREH (יְהֹוָה-יִרְּה): Kýpios oéteS: Dominus videt, i.e. Jehovah wilt see, or provide, the name given by Abraham to the place on which he had been commanded to offer Isaac, to commemorate the interposition of the angel of Jehovah, who appeared to prevent the sacrifice (Gen. xxii. 14) and provided another victim. The immediate allusion is to the expression in the 8th verse, "God will look out for Himself a lamb for a burnt offering," but it is not unlikely that there is at the same time a covert reference to Moriah, the scene of the whole occurrence. The play upon words is followed up in the latter clause of ver. 11, which appears in the form of a popular proverb: "as it is said this day, In the mountain of Jehovah, He will be seen," or "provision shall be made." Such must be the rendering if the received punctuation be accepted, but on this point there is a division of opinion. The text from which the LXX. made their translation must have been יִרְּה יְהֹוָה-יִרְּה, וְזֶה אֵשׁ קְיוֹפָא אֱלֹהִים, "on the mountain Jehovah appeared," and the same, with the exception of יִרְּה יְהֹוָה, for the last Jehovah "(i.e. as regards my name Jehovah) I was not known to them." The A. V. interpolates "the name of" in the first part of the verse, and then, at it for the sake of correspondence, says, by my name' in the second part.
word, must have been the reading of the Vulgate and Syriac. The Targum of Onkelos is obscure.

W. A. W.

JEHOVAH-NISSI (עְנַיִים) : Kêpôs karaôpôrôn noun: Dominus exaltatio ment; i. e. Jeho\rth n.bunner, the name given by Moses to the altar which he built in commemoration of the dis-\conquur of the Amalekites by Joshua and his\nchosen warriors at Kadesh-Baali (Ex. xxvii. 15). It was erected either upon the hill overlooking the battle-field, upon which Moses sat with the staff of God in his hand, or upon the battle-field itself. According to Aen. Ezra it was on the Horeb. The Targum of Onkelos paraphrases the verse thus: "Moses built an altar and worshipped upon it before Jehovah, who had wrought for him miracles (נְיִים, nûm)." Such too is Jarchi's explanation of the name, referring to the miraculous interposi-\tion of God in the defeat of the Amalekites. The LXX. in their translation, "the Lord my refuge;" evidently supposed nûm to be derived from the root נְיִים, nûm, "to flee," and the Vulgate traced it to נוּמ, "to lift up." The significance of the name is probably contained in the allusion to the staff which Moses held in his hand as a banner during the engagement, and the raising or lowering of which turned the fortune of battle in favor of the Israelites or their enemies. God is thus recognized in the memorial altar as the deliverer of his people, who leads them to victory, and in their rallying point in time of peril. On the figurative use of "banner," see Ps. lx. 4; Is. xi. 10.

W. A. W.

JEHOVAH-SHATOM (עְנַיִים) : Kêpôs wajî: Domini pres, i. e. Jehovah (is) peace, or, with the ellipsis of נְיִים, нûm, "Jehovah, the God of peace." The altar erected by Gideon in Ophrah was so called in memory of the salvation addressed to him by the angel of Jehovah; "Peace be unto thee" (Judg. vi. 24). Piscator, however, following the Hebrew accentuation, which he says requires a different translation, renders the whole passage, without introducing the proper name, "when Jehovah had proclaimed peace to him:" but his alteration is harsh and unnecessary. The LXX. and Vulg. appear to have inserted the words as they stand in the present Hebrew text, and to have read נְיִים, נûm, but they are supported by no MS. authority.

* JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (עְנַיִים) : Kêpôs xamâh: Dominus ibolom, i. e. Jehovah there, or, lit. builder, is the marginal reading (A. V.) of Ezek. xxviii. 35. In the text the trans-\lators have put "The Lord is there." In both respects the A. V. has followed the Bishops' Bible. It is the name that was to be given to the new city which Ezekiel saw in his Vision, and has so gorgeously described (chap. xl-xlviii.). Compare Rev. xxii. 3, 4.

W. A. W.

* JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (עְנַיִים) : Jehovah our righteousness; in Jer. xxxii. 6 and xxiii. 10, where the text has "The Lord our righteousness." It will be seen that the LXX. makes a proper name of יִים (our righteousness) in the first of the above passages. The hesitation of our translators whether they should render or transfer the expression may have been the \greater from their supposing it to be one of the Messianic titles. The long exegetical note in the margin of the Bishops' Bible (Jer. xxxiii. 16) is curious and deserves to be read.

JEHOZ'ABAD (עְנַיִים) (jemeh Jehovah gives): 'Iwâgâîd: [Alex. Iwâigâîd.] Jozabed. 1. A Korachite Levite, second son of Obed-edom, and one of the porters of the south gate of the temple, and of the storeroom there (סִדָּּר הַיּוֹם) in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvi. 4, 15, compared with Neh. xii. 25).

2. (Iwâigâîd.) Joseph. 'Oxîbârôn. A Benja-nite, captain of 180,000 armed men, in the days of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xiv. 18).

3. (In 2 K., Iwâigâîd: in 2 Chr., Iwââîdâî: Vat. Zhââîdâîd: Alex. Zâ'dh.) Son of Shomer or Shammah, a Calebite woman, and possibly a de-scendant of the preceding, who with another as-\pired against king Josiah and slew him in his bed (2 K. xii. 21; 2 Chr. xxiv. 20). [Joash.] The similarity in the names of both conspirators and their parents is worth notice.

This name is commonly abbreviated in the He-\brew to JOZABAD.

JEHOZ'ADAK (עְנַיִים) (jemeh Jehovah makes just): 'Iwasâ'âîdâî: [Alex. Iwasâ'âîdâî: Jowashe.] son of the high-priest JEREMIAH (1 Chr. vi. 14, 15) in the reign of Zedekiah. When his father was slain at Riblah by order of Nebuchadnezzar, in the 11th of Zedekiah (2 K. xxv. 18, 21), Jehozadak was led away captive to Babylon (1 Chr. vi. 15), where he doubtless spent the remainder of his days. He himself never attained the high-priesthood, the Temple being burnt to the ground, and so con-\tinuing, and he himself being a captive all his life. But he was the father of JESUS the high-priest — who with Zerubbabel headed the Return from Captivity — and of all his successors till the pontificate of M. Akib (Exod. xxiii. 16; Neh. xii. 26). [Hasan-\pries!]. Nothing more is known about him. It is perhaps worth remarking that his name is com-\bounded of the same elements, and has exactly the same meaning, as that of the contemporary king Zedekiah — "God is righteous:" and that the righteousness of God was signally displayed in the simultaneous suspension of the throne of David and the priesthood of Aaron, on account of the sins of Zedekiah. This remark perhaps acquires weight from the fact of his successor Josiah, who restored the priesthood and rebuilt the Temple, having the same name as Joshua, who brought the nation into the land of promise, and JESUS, a name significative of salvation.

In Haggai and Zechariah, though the name in the original is exactly as above, yet our translators have chosen to follow the Greek form, and present it as JOSIDBACH.

In Ezra and Nehemiah it is all-revivified, both in Hebrew and A. V., to JOZADAK.

His father's name was Jehoshaphat (2 K. ix. 2); his grandfather's, as being better known, was sometimes affixed to his own—(2 K. ix.) was Nausith. In his youth he had been one of the goodly sons of Israel. His place of appearance in history is when, with a comrade in arms, Bidkar, 2 Bar-Dahar (Ephrem. Syr. Opq. iv. 540), he rode a behind Atha in the fatal journey from Samaria to Jezreel, and laid up in his heart, the warning of Elijah against the murder of Naboth (2 K. ix. 25). But he had already, as it seemed, been known to Elijah as a youth of promise, and, accordingly, in the vision at Horeb he is mentioned as the future king of Israel, whom Elijah is to anoint as the minister of vengeance on Israel (1 K. xix. 16, 17). This injunction, for reasons unknown to us, Elijah never fulfilled. It was reserved long afterwards for his successor Elisha.

Jehu meantime, in the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, had risen to importance. The same activity and vehemence which had fitted him for his earlier distinctions still continued, and he was known far and wide as a charioteer whose rapid driving, as if of a madman (2 K. x. 20), could be distinguished even from a distance. He was, under the last-named king, captain of the host in the siege of Ramoth-Gilead. According to Ephraim Syrus (who omits the words "saw the Lord" in 2 K. xi. 26, and makes "I" refer to Jehu) he had, in a dream the night before, seen the blood of Naboth and his sons (Ephrem. Syr. Opq. iv. 540). Whilst in the midst of the officers of the besieging army a youth suddenly entered, of wild appearance (2 K. x. 11), and insisted on a private interview with Jehu. They retired into a secret chamber. The youth uncovered a vial of the sacred oil (Jos. Ant. ix. 6, 1) which he had brought with him, poured it over Jehu's head, and after announcing to him the message from Elisha, that he was appointed to be king of Israel and destroyer of the house of Ahab, rushed out of the house and disappeared.

Jehu's countenance, as he reentered the assembly of officers, showed that some strange tidings had reached him. He tried at first to evade their questions, but then revealed the situation in which he found himself placed by the prophetic call. In a moment the enthusiasm of the army took fire. They threw their garments—the large square blanket, similar to a wrapper or plaid—under his feet, so as to form a rough carpet of state, placed him on the throne of the stairs, as on an extemporaneous throne, blew the royal salute on their trumpets, and thus ordained him king. He then cut off all communication between Ramoth-Gilead and Jezreel, and set off full speed, with his ancient comrade Bidkar, whom he had made captain of the host in his place, and a band of horsemen. From the tower of Jezreel a watchman saw the cloud of dust (τρονίσματος, κοινόρωτον; A. V. "company") and announced his coming (2 K. ix. 17). The messengers that were sent out to him he detained, on the same principle of secrecy which had guided all his movements. It was not till he had almost reached the city, and was identified by the watchman, that alarm was taken. But even then it seems as if the two kings in Jezreel anticipated news from the Syrian war rather than a revolution at home. It was not till he had answered the watchman's question, "Is it peace, Jehu?" that Jehu's fierce denunciation of Jezebel at once revealed the danger. Jehu seized his opportunity, and taking full aim at Jehoram, with the bow which, as captain of the host, was always with him, shot him through the heart (ix. 24). The body was thrown out on the fatal field, and whilst his soldiers pursued and killed the king of Judæa, Jehu-gan (A. V. "the garden-house"), probably Engannim, Jehu himself advanced to the gates of Jezreel and fulfilled the divine warning on Jezebel as already on Jehoram.

[JEZEBEL.] He then entered on a work of extermination hitherto unparalleled in the history of the Jewish monarchy. All the descendants of Ahab that remained in Jezreel, together with the officers of the court, and hierarchy of Astarte, were swept away. His next step was to secure Samaria. Every stage of his progress was marked with blood. At the gates of Jezreel he found the heads of seventy princes of the house of Ahab, ranged in two heaps, sent to him as a propitiation by their guardians in Samaria, whom he had defied to withstand him, and on whom he thus threw the responsibility of destroying their own royal charge. Next, at "the shearing-house" (or Beth-elek) between Jezreel and Samaria he encountered forty-two sons or nephews (2 Chr. xxiii. 8) of the late king of Judah, and therefore connected by marriage with Ahab, on a visit of compliment to their relatives, of whose fall, seemingly, they had not heard. These also were put to the sword at the fatal well, as, in the later history, of Mizzah, and, in our own days, of Cawnpore (2 K. x. 14). [ISHMAEL, 6.] As he drove on he met and subdued a strong figure, such as might have reminded him of the great Elijah, but it was Jehonadab, the austere Arabian sexton, the son of Rechab. In him his keen eye discovered a ready ally. He took him into his chariot, and they concocted their schemes as they entered Samaria (x. 15, 16). [JEHONADAB.] Some stragglers of the house of Ahab in that city still remained to be destroyed. But the great stroke was yet to come; and it was conceived and a The Hebrew word is דַּבָּרָא, usually employed for the coupling together of oxen. This the LXX understood as though the two soldiers rode in separate chariots—ἐνιαύτεις ξύλοι ἐν ἑαυτῷ (2 K. ix. 25). Josephus (Ant. ix. 6, § 8) as though they sat in the same chariot with the king (καταταγμένοι ἐπιστειάδας τοῦ ἄρματος τοῦ 'Αχαβίου).

b This is the force of the Hebrew word, which, as in 2 K. xi. 11, the LXX translate ἐν παραλλαγῇ. Josephus (Ant. ix. 6, § 8) says συναντοῦσιν τὰ καὶ μὲν ἑαυτὸν τὰ γυναικῶν, τὰ δὲ βραγμάτεια.

c The expression translated "on the top of the stairs" is one the clue to which is lost. The word is שָׁיְיָא.
He must be regarded, like many others in history, as an instrument for accomplishing great purposes rather than as great or good in himself in the long period during which his destiny, though known to others and perhaps to himself, lay dormant; in the suddenness of his rise to power; in the ruthless with which he carried out his purposes; in the union of profound silence and sudden and violent action, of wild, fanatic, wayward zeal,—he has not been without his likenesses in modern times. The Scripture narrative, although it fixes our attention on the services which he rendered to the cause of religion by the extermination of a worthless dynasty and a degrading worship, yet on the whole leaves the sense that it was a reign barren in great results. His dynasty, indeed, was firmly seated on the throne longer than any other royal house of Israel (2 K. x.), and under Jeroboam II. it acquired a high name amongst the oriental nations. But Elisha, who had raised him to power, as far as we know, never saw him.

In other respects it was a failure; the original sin of Jeroboam's worship continued; and in the Prophet Hosea there seems to be a retribution exacted for the bloodshed by which he had mounted the throne:

"I will avenge the blood of Jeroboam upon the house of Jehu" (Hos. i. 4). As in the similar condemnation of Baasha (1 K. xii. 2). See a striking poem to this effect on the character of Jehu in the Lyra Apostolica.

2. [In 1 K., 166, Vat. Sinon, Alex. Sinon.: 2 Chr., 166, Vat. Sin. in, Sinon.] Jehu, son of Hanani: a prophet of Judah, but whose ministrations were chiefly directed to Israel. His father was probably the seer who accredited Asa (2 Chr. xvi. 7). He must have begun his career as a prophet when very young. He first denounced Baasha, both for his imitation of the dynasty of Jeroboam, and also (as it would seem) for his cruelty in destroying it (1 K. xvi. 1, 7), and then, after an interval of thirty years, reappears to denounce Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab (2 Chr. xix. 2, 5). He survived Jehoshaphat and wrote his life (xv. 25). From another district in the text of 1 K. xvi. 7 the Vulgate has represented him as killed by Baasha. But this is not required by the words, and (except on the improbable hypothesis of two Jehus, both sons of Hanani) is contradicted by the later appearance of this prophet.

3. [160; Vat. Sinon. in: Jehua:] A man of Judah of the house of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 28). He was the son of a certain Ileed, descended from the union of an Egyptian, Jada, with the daughter of Sheshan, whose slave Jarha was (comp. 34).

4. [160; Vat. uro.]; A Ninevite, son of Josiah (1 Chr. iv. 35). He was one of the chief men of the tribe, apparently in the reign of Hezekiah (comp. 41).

5. [160;] Jehu the Antiiothite, i.e. native of Anthoth, was one of the chief of the heroes of Benjamin, who forsaw the cause of Saul for Ahab, king of Samaria, seeing the import of the crisis, sent a contingent of 10,000 men, and 2,000 chariots to the confederate force,—a contingent which took part in the first great battle between the armies of Israel and the united kingdom of Syria. The text gives the interesting information that among Benhadad's allies, when he was attacked by the Assyrians in b. c. 853, was "Jehu of Israel." It appears that the common danger of subjection by the Assyrian arms, united in one, not only the Hitites, Hamathites, Syrians of Damascus, Phœnicians, and Ezion-geber, but the people of Israel also...

that of David when the latter was at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 3). He does not reappear in any of the later lists.

A. P. S.

JEBUBBAH (יהָבְבָא) [the verb will be hidden]:

'tashâ: [Vat. corrupt:] Alex. Ḍbâa: Hebâh, a man of Asher; son of Shamer or Shomer, of the house of Beriah (1 Chr. vii. 34).

JEHU'CAL (יהָעָל) [potent, Ges.]: δ 'Ιαυδιά: Alex. Ἰαώκχοι; [FA. Ἰαώκχοι] (Jehudah), son of Shekoniah; one of the personages so called in the genealogy of Zedekiah to Jeremiah, to entreat his prayer and advice (Jer. xxxvii. 3). His name is also given as "Jucal, and he appears to have been one of the "princes of the king" (comp. xxxviii. 1, 4).

JEHUD (יהָעָד) [praise]: ἈχGreek: 1. Jehud; Alex. Ieouθ: Judah, one of the towns of the tribe of Dan (Jos. xix. 45), named between Baalath and Bne-bereak.

Neither of these two places, however, has been identified. By Eusebius and Jerome Jehud is not named. Dr. Robinson (ii. 242) mentions that a place called el-'Tchudiah exists in the neighborhood of Lydda, but he did not visit it. It is, however, inserted on Van de Velde's map at 7 miles east of Jersi and 5 north of Lydli. This agrees with the statement of Schlag (141) that "Jehud is the village Jehudid, 7 1/2 miles S. E. of Jaffa," except as to the direction, which is nearer E. than S. E.

JEHUDI'I (יהָעֲדִי) = Jews: δ 'Iowdhâ: Alex. Iouθί: Judi, son of Nathaniah, a man employed by the princes of Jehoiakin's court to fetch Baruch to read Jeremiah's denunciation (Jer. xxxvi. 14), and then by the king to fetch the volume itself and read it to him (21, 23).

JEHUDI'JAH (יהָעֲדִיָה) [the Jewess]: Ἀδαία; [Vat. Αδαῖα] Alex. Ἀδαία: Judivio. There is really no such name in the Heb. Bible as that which our A. V. exhibits at 1 Chr. iv. 18. If it is a proper name at all it is Ha-jehudiyah, like Ham-melech, Hak-koz, etc.; and it seems to be rather an appellative, "the Jewess." As far as an opinion can be formed of so obscure and apparently corrupt a passage, Mered, a descendant of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, and whose towns, Gedor, Soco, Adullam, Lachish, and Jericho, were assigned to the tribe of Judah, married two wives—one a Jewess, the other an Egyptian, a daughter of Pharaoh. The Jewess was sister of Nahum, the father of the cities of Kielah and Eshtheno. The descendants of Mered by his two wives are given in vv. 18, 19, and perhaps in the latter part of ver. 17. Hodiah in ver. 19 is doubtless a corruption of Ha-jehudiyah, "the Jewess," the letters היל having fallen out from the end of היל and the beginning of the following word; and the full stop at the end of ver. 18 should be removed, so as to read as a recapitulation of what precedes: "These are the sons of Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh, which Mered took (for his wife), and the sons of his wife, the Jewess, the sister of Nahum (which Nahum was) the father of Kielah, whose inhabitants are Garnites, and of Eshtheno, whose inhabitants are Maakahites: the last being named possibly from Mashaach, Caleb's conspicuous, as the Ephrathites were from Ephrata. Bertheau (Chronik) arrives at the same general result, by proposing to place the closing words of ver. 18 before the words "And she bare Miriam," etc., in ver. 17. See also Vatpalus. A. C. H.

JEBUSH (יהָעָשּו) [collecting, bringing together]: First, Dicht.: Πἐρ: [Vat. Γαύτης] Alex. Ιας; son of Eshok, a remote descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 39). The parallel genealogy in ch. ix. stops short of this man.

For the representation of Ain by Π, see JEHEIL, MEHUNIM, etc.

JEEP'EL (יהָעָפֶל) [perh. treasure of God, Ges.]: Jebel. 1. (Ἰαφελ). A chief man among the Reubenites, one of the house of Joel (1 Chr. vi. 7).

2. (Ἰεφάλα: Alex. once Ἰεφάλα: [Vat. FA. in xvi. 5, Eeuben.] A Merarite Levite, one of the gatekeepers (Ἰαφελά) A. V. "porters," and "doorkeepers") to the sacred tent, at the first establishment of the Ark in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 18). His duty was also to play the harp (ver. 21), or the psaltery and harp (xvi. 5), in the service before the Ark.

3. (Ἐαφελά, [Vat. Εαϕελά] Alex. Εαφελά) A Gershonite Levite, one of the Bene-Assaph sons of A., forefather of Jahaziel in the time of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xxii. 14).

4. (Ἰαφελλι, i. e. Jebel, but the A. V. follows the correction of the Keri: Ἰεφαλῆ) The Scribe (Ἰαφελίων) who kept the account of the numerals of king Uzziah's irregular predatory warriors (Ἰαφελίων), A. V. "bands," 2 Chr. xxvi. 11.

5. (Jebel, as in the preceding; but the A. V. again follows the Keri: Ἰεψάλα: Jabieh.) A Gershonite Levite, one of the Bene-Eliaphan, who assisted in the restoration of the house of Jehovah under king Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxiii. 13).

6. (Ἰεφάλα, [Vat. Ειφαλά] Alex. Ιεφάλα) One of the chiefs (Ἰεπαλῶν) of the Levites in the time of Josiah, and an assistant in the rites at his great Passover (2 Chr. xxviii. 9).

7. (Jebel as above, but in Keri and A. V. Jeiel: Ἰεψάλα, [Vat. Εωςα] Alex. Ειψάλα) One of the Bene-Aduinum who formed part of the caravan of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ez. viii. 13). In Esdras the name is Jeuel.

8. (Ἰαφελά, Alex. Ιεψάλα) A layman, of the Bene Necho, who had taken a foreign wife and had relinquished her (Ez. x. 43). In Esdras it is omitted from the Greek and A. V., though the Vulgate has Ιεψαλα.

JEKAB'ZEEEL (יְקָבְצֵיא) [god who assembles, brings, collects]: Vat. [Alex. FA.1 onlt; FA.3 Comp.] קבציא; Cibzuel), a fuller form of the name of KERZIEEL, the most remote city of Judah on the southern frontier. This form occurs only in the list of the places reoccupied after the Captivity (Neh. xii. 25).

JEK'AMAM (יְקָם) [who assembles the people]: [Vat. Ιεκαμάν; Alex. [in xxiv. 23.] Ἰκαμάνος; Jecamman, Jecamman], a Levite in the time of King David: fourth of the sons of Hebron, the son of Kohath (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).

JEKAMIAH (יְקָמְיָה) [Jehovah collects, or assembles]: Ἰκαμάια; [Vat. μείρι; Alex. Ἰκαμάια; Icamias], son of Shallum, in the line of Ahik, about contemporary with king Ahas.
was led, as well by the unsettled character of the age as by his own family circumstances, to adopt a kind of life unrestrained, adventurous, and insecure as that of a Scottish border-chieftain in the middle ages. It was not unlike the life which David afterwards led at Ziklag, with this exception, that Jephthah's subjects and friends owned the headmen in whose land he lived. His fame as a bold and successful captain was carried back to his native Gilead; and when the time was ripe for throwing off the yoke of Ammon, the Gileadite elders sought in vain for any leader, who in an equal degree with the base-born outcast could command the confidence of his countrymen. Jephthah consented to become their captain, on the condition solemnly ratified before the Lord in Mizpeh—that in the event of his success against Ammon he should still remain as their acknowledged head. Messages, urging their respective claims to occupy the trans-Jordanic region, were exchanged between the Amnonitish king and Jephthah. Then the Spirit of the Lord (i.e. "force of mind for great undertakings, and bodily strength.") came upon Jephthah. The Ammonites were routed with great slaughter. Twenty cities, from Aroer on the Arnon to Meecham and to Abel Keramim, were taken from them. But as the conqueror returned to Mizpeh there came out to meet him a procession of dances with dances and timbrels, and among them—the first person from his own house—his daughter and only child. "Ahah! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low," was the greeting of the heart-stricken father. But the high-minded maiden is ready for any personal suffering in the hour of her father's triumph. Only she asks for a respite of two months to withdraw to her native mountains, and in their recesses to weep with her virgin-friends over the early disappearance of her life. When that time was ended she returned to her father; and "he did unto her as she desired." But Jephthah had not long leisure, even if he were to spare himself for the indulgence of domestic grief. The proud tribe of Ephraim challenged his right to go to war, as he had done without their concurrence, against Ammon; and they proceeded to vindicate the absurd claim by invading Jephthah in Gilead. They did but add to his triumph which they envied. He first defeated them, then intercepted the fugitives at the ford of Jordan, and there, having insultingly identified them as Ephraimites by a peculiar expression, xi. 34, faithfully translated in the margin of the A. V., has been interpreted as signifying that Jephthah had step-children.

That the daughter of Jephthah was really offered up to God in sacrifice, slain by the hand of her but and then burned— is a horrible conclusion; but one which it seems impossible to avoid. This was unanimously supposed to be unequivocally stated by Josephus, Ant. v. 7, § 10, and by perhaps all the early Christian Fathers, as Origen, in Joannem, tom. vi. cap. 36; Chrysostom, Hom. ad pop. Antioch. xiv. 3, Opp. ii. 115: Theodoret, Quest. in Jud. xx.; Jerome, Ep. ad Jud. 118, Opp. i. 791, &c.; Augustine, Quest. in Jud. viii. § 46, Opp. iii. 1, p. 610.

For the first eleven centuries of the Christian era this was the current, perhaps the universal opinion of Jews and Christians. Yet none of them extenuates the act of Jephthah. Josephus calls it neither lawful nor pleasing to God. Jewish writers say that he ought to have referred it to the high-priest; but either he failed to do so, or the high-priest culpably omitted to prevent the rash act. Origen strictly confines his praise to the heroism of Jephthah's daughter.

Another interpretation was suggested by Joseph Kimchi. He supposed that, instead of being sacrificed, she was shut up in a house which her father built for the purpose, and that she was there visited by the daughters of Israel four days in each year so long as she lived. This interpretation has been adopted by many eminent men, as by Levi ben Gerson and Bechay among the Jews, and by Dusias, Grotius, Estius, de Dieu, Bishop Hall, Waterland, Dr. Hales, and others. More names of the same period, and of not less authority, might however be added on the other side. Lightfoot once thought (Ewshhin, § 16) that Jephthah did not slay her daughter; but upon more mature reflection he came to the opposite conclusion (Horuminy, etc.; Judg. xi., Works, i. 51).

Each of these two opinions is supported by arguments grounded on the original text and on the customs of the Jews. (1.) In Judg. xi. 31, the word translated in the A. V. " whatsoever " knows no distinction of gender, and may as correctly be translated " whosoever;" and in favor of the latter version it is urged that Jephthah could not have expected to be met by an ox or other animal fit for sacrifice, coming forth from the door of his house; and that it was obviously his intention to signalize his thanksgiving for victory by devoting some human creature (the text, or a substitute for the statute, Lev. xxvii. 23, 29) (given with another purpose, on which see Jahn, Archæologia, § 234, or Ewald, Alterthümer, 89), to the taking of a life which was not forit to the law. (2.) To J. Kimchi's proposal to translate "and I will offer," verse 31, " or I will offer," it has been replied that this sense of the conjunction is rare, that it is not intended in two vocal words in parallel phraseology, Gen. xxviii. 21, 22, and I Sam. i. 11, and that it does not give two alternatives between which there is no opposition. (3.) The word rendered in A. V. " to lament," or " to talk with," verse 40, is translated by later scholars, as in Judg. v. 11, " to celebrate." (4.) It has been said that if Jephthah put his daughter to death, according to verse 39, it is unmeaning to add that she " knew no man;" but on the other hand it is urged that this circumstant is in the text, perhaps the universal opinion of the rashness of Jephthah and the heroism of his daughter. (5.) It has been argued that human sacrifices were opposed to the principles of the Jewish law, and therefore a Jew could not have intended to make a thank-offering of that sort; but it is replied that a Gileadite born in a lawless age, living as a freebooter in the midst of rude and idolatrous people who practiced such sacrifices, was not likely to be unusually acquainted with or to pay unusual respect to the pure and humane laws of Israel. (6.) Lastly, it has been argued that a life of religious celibacy is without injunction or example to favor it in the O. T.

Some persons, mindful of the enrollment of Jephthah among the heroes of faith in Heb. xi. 32, as well as of the expression "the Spirit of the Lord came upon him," Judg. xi. 29, have therefore scrupled to believe that he could be guilty of such a sin as the murder of his child. But it must be remembered also that deep sins of several other faithful men are recorded in Scripture, sometimes without comment; and as Jephthah had time afterwards, so he may have had grace to repent of his vow and his fulfillment of it. At least we know that he felt remorse, which is often the forerunner of retribution and the harbinger of repentance.

Doubtless theological opinions have sometimes had the effect of leading men to prefer one view of Jephthah's vow to the other. Selden mentions that Genebrard was told by a Jew that Kimchi's interpretation was devised in order to prevent Christians quoting the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter as a type of the sacrifice of the Son of God. And Christians, who desire or fear an example alleged in favor of celibate vows or of the fullblility of inspired men, may become partial judges of the question.

The subject is discussed at length in Augustine, l. c. Opp. iii. 1, p. 610; a Treatise by L. Capellus inserted in Crit. Sacr. on Judg. xi. 21; Hall's Contemplations on O. T., bk. x.; Selden, De jure natural et gentium, iv. § 11; Lightfoot, Sermon on Judg. xi. 30, in Works, ii. 1215; Pfeiffer, De voto Jepthah, Opp. 391; Dr. Hales' Analysis of Chronology, ii. 258; and in Rosenmüller's Scholia.

W. T. B.

* It may be well to remind the reader that Kimchi's suggestion (mentioned above) appears as a marginal reading of the A. V.: It " shall surely be the Lord's, or I will offer it up for a burnt-offering."

This disjunctive construction makes the vow of Jephthah not absolute, but conditional: it leaves him at liberty to pursue one course or another, according to the nature of the offering which he might be called to make, on ascertaining who or what should come forth to meet him from his house. But this solution does violence to the Hebrew sentence. Prof. Cassel, in his elaborate article on this subject (Hertzog's Real-Encycl. vi. 490-478), maintains that Jephthah, when he made his vow, was not thinking of the possibility of a human sacrifice, or of an animal sacrifice of any sort, but that he employed the term " burnt-offering " in a spiritual sense; that is, using the expressive word to denote completeness of consecration, he meant that he would devote to God's special and perpetual service the first person of his household whom he should meet.

The event showed that among all the contingencies he had no thought that this person would be his own child; but so it proved, and he proved her to himself in a manner that was impossible of any other, and the sadness of Jephthah's remorse and the heroism of his daughter. The first clause of the vow, it is argued, defines the second: a literal burnt-offering cannot be meant, but one which consists in being the Lord's. It must be admitted that no exact parallel can be found to justify this peculiar meaning of the word
(��). This author presents the same view in his Richter und Rath, pp. 106-114. Keil and Delitzsch discuss the question (Bibl. Commentary on the O. T., iv. 386-395), and decide, in like manner, against the idea of a literal sacrifice.

Wordsworth (Holy Bible, with Notes, ii. p. 128) makes up his review of the different explanations with the remark, that the predominance of argument and authority favors the opinion that Jephthah did actually offer his daughter, not against her will, but with her consent, a burnt-offering to the Lord. . . . But we may not pause here. There is a beautiful light shed upon the gloom of this dark history, reflected from the youthful form of the maiden of Gilead, Jephthah's daughter. . . . She is not like the Iphigenia of the Greek story. She offers her own life as a willing sacrifice; and in her love for her father's name, and in calm resolve that all should know she is a willing sacrifice, and with tender and delicate consideration for her father, and in order that no one may charge him with having sacrificed her against her own free will, she craves respect and liberty for two months, that she may range freely on the mountains, apart from the world, and prepare herself for another life of suffering, and for another life. In full foresight of death, she comes down from her mountain liberty at the appointed time to offer her virgin soul for the fulfillment of her father's vow. Her name was held in honor in Israel. The daughters of Israel went yearly to lament her—or rather to celebrate her—“for four days.”

Finally, let it be said, this is one of those acts which the Scripture history simply relates, but leaves the judgment of them to the reader. We cannot, without being unjust to the morality of the Bible, insist too much on this distinction. In itself considered, it is immaterial to the correctness or incorrectness of our interpretation of Jephthah's vow, whether this interpretation exalts or lowers our estimate of his character. The commendation of his faith (Heb. xi. 32) does not extend to all his actions. The same allowance is due to him for frailty and aberrations that we make in behalf of others associated with him in the same catalogue of examples of heroic faith.

JEPHUN'NE (יפונא; Jephone), Echon, xiv. 7. [JEPHUNNEH].

JEPHUN'NEH (יפונא; [perh. for whom a way is prepared]; Jephone). 1. (יפונא). Father of Caleb the scribe, who is usually designated as "Caleb the son of Jephunneh." He appears to have belonged to an Edomitish tribe called Kenzites from Kenez their founder; but his father or other ancestors are not named. [Caleb, 2; KENAZ]. (See Num. xiii. 6, &c.; xxxii. 12, &c.; Josh. xiv. 14, &c.; 1 Chr. iv. 15.)

2. (יפונא in both MSS. [rather, Rom. Alex.; Vat. 1cor.]—A descendant of Asher, eldest of the three sons of Jether (1 Chr vii. 38). A. C. H.

JERAH (ירח). [new moon]: [in Gen.] ירח [Alex. 1999, Comp. ירח; in 1 Chr., Rom. Vat. Alex. omit; Afr. 1999, Comp. ירח; Jere], the fourth in order of the sons of Johanan (Gen. x. 26: 1 Chr. i. 29) and the progenitor of a tribe of southern Arabia. He has not been satisfactorily identified with the name of any Arabian place or tribe, though a fortress (and probably an old town, like the numerous fortified places in the Yemen of the old Himyrrite kingdom) named Yerakh (ירח) is mentioned as belonging to the district of the Nijjaj (Mervizid, s. v. Yerakh), which is in Mahrah, at the extremity of the Yemen (Kamoua, in article KAMOUA; cf. ARABIA). The similarity of name, however, and the other indications, we are not disposed to lay much stress on.

A very different identification has been proposed by Bochart (Phalieg, ii. 19). He translates Jerah = "the moon" into Arabic, and finds the descendants of Jerah in the Allai, a people dwelling near the Red Sea (Agatharch. ap. Hid. Sic. iii. 45), on the strength of a passage in Herodotus (iii. 8), in which he says of the Arabs, "Bacchus they call in their language Otrud; and Uamnu, Allat." He further suggests that these Allai are the Benee-Hild of more modern times, Hili; being near the sun, it shows a narrow rim of light." Gesenius does not object to this theory, which he quotes; but says that the opinion of Michaelis (Spicileg. ii. 60) is more probable: the latter scholar finding Jerah in the "coast of the moon" (correctly, "low land of the moon," أرض القمر, "the mountain of the moon") in each case the moon being "kamar," not "bihil." The former is "a place between Zatari and Esb-Sihir" (Kamoua); the latter in the same part, but more inland: both being, as Gesenius remarks, near to Hadramiut, next to which, in the order of the names, is Jerah in the record in Genesis; and the same argument may be added in favor of our own possible identification with the fortress of Yerakh, named at the commencement of this article. Whatever may be said in support of translating Jerah, as both Bochart and Michaelis have done, the former's theory involves some grave difficulties, which must be stated.

The statement of Herodotus above quoted (cf. i. 131, "the Arabsian call Venus Alitfa"), that Allat signifies Uramia, cannot be accepted without further evidence than we at present possess. Allat was almost doubtless the same as the object of worship called by the Arabs "El-Latt," and any new information respecting the latter is therefore important. It would require too much space in this work to state the various opinions of the Arabs respecting El-Latt, its etymology, etc., as collected in the great MS. Lexicon entitled the "Mohkam," a work little known in Europe; from which (articles لط and لو) we give the following particulars. "El-Latt" is [generally] said to be originally "El-Lath," the name of an object of worship, so called by the appellation of a man who used to moisten mead of parched barley (sawke) with clarified butter or the like, at the place thereof; for the pilgrims: "El-Latt" signifying "the person who performs that operation." The object of worship itself is said to have been a mass of rock upon which he moistened the mead; and which was more properly mish "the Rock of El-Latt"; after the death of the man above mentioned this rock was worshipped. But some say that "El-Latt" is originally "El-Nakhleh." (El Nakhleh), meaning [not "the Goddess," but] "the Serpent." To this we may add from El-Beydawee (Kur 'an, lii. 19 and 20), El-Latt was an idol of Thakeef, at El-Tuff, or of Kureysh, at Nakhleh; and was so called from 'I'lafeef, because they used to go round about it: or it was called "El-Latt," because it was the image of a man who used to moisten mead of parched barley with clarified butter, and to feed the pilgrims. Our own opinion is that it may be a contraction of "El-Hihat" ("the Serpent," or perhaps "the Goddess"), pronounced according to the dialect of Hinjer, with "t" instead of "h" in the case of a pause. (See the Sihah, MS., art. "Thakeef.") It is said in the Lexicon entitled the Thohidkeel (MS., art. "El-Latt"). El-Kis-i-ee used to pronounce it, in the case of a pause, "El-Liih:" and that those who worshipped it compared its name with that of "El-Hihat.

Pooecke has some remarks on the subject of El-Latt, which the reader may consult (Spec. Hist. Arab., p. 90); and also Sir G. Wilkinson, in his notes to Herodotus (ed. Rawlinson, ii. 402, footnote, and Essay i. to bk. iii.): he seems to be wrong, however, in saying that the Arabic "a'awel," "first," "correctly, "a'awali" is "related to "el-Latt, or Allah, etc.; and that Alitta and Myllita are Semitic names derived from "skekel, wodau, 'to bear children." (Essay i. 537). The comparison of Alitta and Myllita is also extremely doubtful; and probably Herodotus assimilated the former name to the latter.

It is necessary to observe, in endeavoring to elucidate the ancient religion of the Ismaeeli Arabes, that fetishism was largely developed among them: and that their idols were generally absurdly rude and primitive. Beyond that relic of primeval revelation which is found in most beliefs — a recognition of one universal and supreme God — the practices of fetishism obtained more or less throughout Arabia: on the north giving place to the faith of the patriarchs: on the south merging into the cosmic worship of the Hinjerites.

That the Alitaei were worshippers of Allat is an assumption unsupported by facts: but, whatever may be said in its favor, the people in question are not the Benue-Hilid, who take their name from a kinsman of Mohameed, in the fifth generation before him, of the well-known stock of Keys. JERAMIEEL ('Isrā'emāl) [object of God's mercy]: 'Isrāemāl: [Vat. 'Isrā'emāl, 'Isrēmēl, -ēl, Ra'atā, Al'ras'māl, 'Isrēmēl, -ēl:] Jeremeelel.

1. First-born son of Henzon, the son of Pharez, the son of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 9, 25-27, 39, 42). His descendants are given at length in the same chap. (Azariah, 5: Zarah). They inhabited the southern border of Judah (1 Sam. xvi. 10, comp. 8; xxx. 29).

2. [Vat. Alex. 'Isrāmēl] A Merarite Levite; the representative, at the time of the organization of the Divine service by king David, of the family of Kish, the son of Mahli (1 Chr. xxiv. 29; comp. xxvii. 21).

3. [Iṣeremāl, Alex. -ēl, FA. -ēla: Jeremiael.] Son of Hammelech, or, as the LXX. render it, "the king," who was employed by Jehoshakim to make Jeremiah and Baruch prisoners, after he had burnt the roll of Jeremiah's prophecy (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

JERÁHEELITÉS, THE (Ele-Latt) [patronym. from the above]: Iṣeremāli, b 'Iṣeremēl: [Vat. in xxx. 29, Iṣeremēl: Iṣeremēli: Jeremiahel]. The tribe descended from the first of the foregoing persons (1 Sam. xxvii. 10). Their cities are also named amongst those to which David sent presents from his Anakileite booty (xxx. 29), although to Achish he had represented that he had attacked them.

JERÉCHUS (Iṣreghōs) [or i-čsēt; Vat. Iṣreevōs]: Jericus, I Esdr. v. 22. [Jericho.]

JERED (Iṣregh) [descent, going down]: Iṣregh: Jered. 1. One of the patriarchs before the flood, son of Mahaleel and father of Enoch (1 Chr. i. 2).

In Genesis the name is given as JARED.
