It is evident that this characteristic of the Israelites would tend to preserve the seclusion which, under God's providence, was intended for them, and would in its turn be fostered by it. We may notice, in connection with this part of the subject, many subordinate provisions tending to the same direction. Such are the establishment of an agricultural basis of society and property, and the prohibition against its accumulation in a few hands; the discouragement of commerce by the strict laws as to usury, and of foreign conquest by the laws against the maintenance of horses and chariots; as well as the direct prohibition of intermarriage with idolaters, and the indirect prevention of all familiar intercourse with them by the laws as to meats—all these things tended to impress on the Israelitish polity the character of permanence in a few hands and comparative isolation. Like the nature and position of the country to which it was in great measure adapted, it was intended to preserve in purity the witness borne by Israel for God in the darkness of heathenism, until the time should come for the gathering in of all nations to enjoy the blessing promised to Abraham.

III. In considering the relation of the Law to the future, it is important to be guided by the general principle laid down in Heb. vii. 10, "The Law made nothing perfect." (Otius eteleasfer & Ναγος:) This principle will be applied in different degrees to its bearing (v) on the after history of the Jewish commonwealth before the coming of Christ; (b) on the coming of our Lord Himself; and (c) on the dispensation of the Gospel.

(a.) To that after-history the Law was, to a great extent, the key; for in ceremonial and criminal law it was complete and final; while, even in civil and constitutional law, it laid down clearly the general principles to be afterwards more fully developed. It was indeed often neglected, and even forgotten. Its fundamental assertion of the Theocracy was violated by the constant lapses into idolatry, and its provisions for the good of man overthrown by the natural course of human selflessness (Jer. xxxiv. 12-17); till at last, in the reign of Josiah, its very existence was unknown, and its discovery was to the king and the people as a second publication; yet still it formed the standard from which they knowingly departed, and to which they constantly returned; and to it therefore they looked for protection which was peculiarly national, and in which individual character was due. Its direct influence was probably greatest in the periods before the establishment of the kingdom, and after the Babylonish Captivity. The last act of Joshua was to bind the Israelites to it as the charter of their occupation of the conquered land (Josh. xxiv. 24-27); and, in the semi-anarchical period of the judges, the Law and the Tabernacle were the only centres of anything like national unity. The establishment of the kingdom was due to an impatience of this position, and a desire for a visible and personal centre of authority, much the same in nature as that which plunged them so often in idolatry. The people were warned (1 Sam. xii. 6-23) that it involved much danger of their forgetting and rejecting the main principle of the Law—that "Jehovah their God was their King." The nature of the prophetic office was soon assumed. Even under Solomon, as soon as the monarchy became one of great splendor and power, it assumed a heathenish and polytheistic character, breaking the Law, both by its dishonor towards God, and its forbidden tyranny over man. Indeed if the Law was looked upon as a collection of abstract rules, and not as a means of knowledge of a Personal God, it was inevitable that it should be overthrown by the 'presence of a visible and personal authority.'

Therefore it was, that from the time of the establishment of the kingdom began the prophetic office. Its object was to enforce and to perfect the Law, by bearing witness to the great truths on which it was built, namely, the truth of God's government over all, kings, priests, and people alike, and the consequent certainty of a righteous retribution. It was incumbent at the same time this witness was not beyond the Law as a definite code of institutions. It dwelt rather on its great principles, which were to transcend the special forms in which they were embodied. It frequently contrasted (as in Is. i., etc.) the external observance of form with the spiritual homage of the heart. It tended therefore, at least indirectly, to the time when, assuming to the well-known contrast drawn by Jeremiah, the Law written on the tables of stone should give place to a new Covenant, depending on a law written on the heart, and therefore cease no longer (Jer. xxxi. 31-34). In this they did but carry out the prediction of the Law itself (Deut. xxxii. 26, 27), and prepare the way for "the Prophet" who was to come.

Still the Law remained as the distinctive standard of the people. In the kingdom of Israel, after the separation, the deliberate rejection of its leading principles by Jeroboam and his successors was the beginning of a gradual declension into idolatry and heathenism. But in the kingdom of Judah the very division of the monarchy and consequent diminution of its splendor, and the need of a principle to assert against the superior material power of Israel, brought out the Law once more in increased honor and influence. In the days of Jehoshaphat we find, for the first time, that it was taken by the Levites in their circuits through the land, and the people taught by it (2 Chr. xvii. 9). We find it especially spoken of in the oath taken by the king "at his pillars in the Temple, and made the standard of reference in the reformation of Hezekiah and Josiah (2 K. xi. 14, xxiii. 2; 2 Chr. xxx., xxxiv. 11-31).

Far more was this the case after the Captivity. The revival of the existence of Israel was followed by the new and solemn publication of the Law by Ezra, and the institution of the synagogues, through which it became deeply and familiarly known. Ezra. The loss of the independent monarchy, and the cessation of prophecy, both combined to throw the Jews back upon the Law alone, as their only distinctive pledge of nationality, and sure guide to truth. The more they mingled with the other subject-nations under the Persian and Grecian empires, the more eagerly they clung to it as their distinction and safeguard; and opening the knowledge of it to the heathen, by the translation of the LXX., based on it their proverbial earnestness to proselytize. This love for the Law, rather than any abstract patriotism, was the strength of the Maccabean struggle against the Syrians, and the success of that struggle, enthroning a Levitical power, deepened the feeling from which it sprang. It so entered into the heart of the people that open idolatry became impossible. The certainty and authority of the Law's commandments amidst the perils of paganism, and the spirituality of its doctrine as contrasted with sensual and carnal idolatries, were the favorite boast of the Jew, and the secret of his influence among the heathen. The Law thus became the moulding influence of the Jewish character; and, instead of being hocked upon as subsidiary to the promise, and a means to its fulfillment, was exalted to supreme importance as an end in itself, and a pledge of national and individual sanctity.

This feeling held hold of and satisfied the mass of the people, harmonizing as it did with their ever-increasing spirit of an almost fanatic nationality, until the destruction of the city. The Pharisees, truly representing the chief strength of the people, systematized this feeling; they gave it fresh food, and assumed a predominant leadership over it by the floating mass of tradition which they gradually accumulated around the Law as a nucleus. The popular use of the word "lawless" (ἀρετών) as a term of contempt (Acts ii. 23; 1 Cor. ix. 21) for the heathen, and even for the uneducated mass of their followers (John vii. 49), marked and stereotyped their principle.

Against this idolatry of the Law (which when imported into the Christian Church is described and vehemently denounced by St. Paul), there were two reactions. The first was that of the Sadducees; one which had its basis, according to common tradition, in the idea of a higher love and service of God, independent of the Law and its sanctions; but which degenerated into a speculative infidelity, and an anti-national system of politics, and which probably had but little hold of the people. The other, that of the Essenes, was an attempt to burst the bonds of the formal law, and assert its ideas in all fullness, freedom, and purity. In its practical form it assumed the character of high and ascetic devotion to God; its speculative guise is seen in the school of Philo, as a tendency not merely to treat the commands and history of the Law as the foundation and model of a new spiritual kingdom, but to allegorize them into mere abstractions. In neither form could it be permanent, because it had no sufficient relation to the needs and realities of human nature, or to the personal Subject of all the Jewish promises; but it was still a declaration of the insufficiency of the Law in itself, and a preparation for its absorption into a higher principle of unity. Such was the history of the Law before the coming of Christ. It was full of effort and blessing, when used as a means; it became hollow and insufficient, when made an end.

(b) The relation of the Law to the advent of Christ is also laid down clearly by St. Paul. "The Law was the παλαιαγωγης εις Χριστον, the servant that is), whose task it was to guide the child to the true teacher (Gal. iii. 24); and Christ was the "end" or object of "the Law" (Rom. x. 4). As being subsidiary to the promise, it had accomplished its purpose when the promise was fulfilled. In its national aspect it had existed to guard the faith in theocracy. The chief hindrance to that faith had been the difficulty of realizing the invisible presence of God, and of conceiving a communion with the infinite Godhead which should not crush or absorb the finite creature (comp. Deut. v. 24; Gal. iii. 21, 22; Is. xlv. 14, xlv. 1, xc.). From that had come in earlier times open idolatry, and a half-idolatrous longing for and trust in the kingdom; in aftertimes the substitution of the Law for the promise. This difficulty was now to pass away forever, in the incarnation of the Godhead in one truly and visibly man. The guardianship of the Law was no longer needed, for the visible and personal presence of the Messiah required no further witness. Moreover, in the Law itself there had always been a tendency of the fundamental idea to burst the formal bonds which confined it. In looking to God as especially their King, the Israelites were inheriting a privilege, belonging originally to all mankind, and divinely to revert to them. Yet that element in the Law which was national and national to be prized by all the Jews, tended to limit this gift to them, and place them in a position antagonistic to the rest of the world. It needed therefore to pass away, before all men could be brought into a kingdom, where there was to be neither Jew nor Gentile, barbarian, Scythian, bond or free."
LAW OF MOSES

In its individual, or what is usually called its "moral" aspect, the Law bore equally the stamp of transitoriness and insufficiency. It had, as we have seen, declared the authority of truth and goodness over man's will, and taken for granted in man the existence of a spirit which could recognize that authority; but it had done no more. Its presence had therefore detected the existence and the sinfulness of sin, as alien alike to God's will and man's true nature; but it had also brought out with more vehement and desperate antagonism the power of sin dwelling in man as fallen (Rom. vii. 7-25). It only showed therefore the need of a Saviour from sin, and of an indwelling power which should enable the spirit of man to conquer the "law" of evil. Hence it bore witness of its own insufficiency, and led men to Christ. Already the prophets, speaking by a living and indwelling spirit, ever fresh and powerful, had been passing beyond the dead letter of the law, and indirectly condemning it of insufficiency. But there was need of "the Prophet" who should not only have the fullness of the spirit dwelling in Himself, but should have the power to give it to others, and so open the new dispensation already foretold. When He had come, and by the gift of the Spirit implanted in man a free internal power of action tending to God, the restraint of the Law needed to train the childhood of the world, became unnecessary and even injurious to the free development of its manhood.

The relation of the Law to Christ in its sacrificial and ceremonial aspect, will be more fully considered elsewhere. [Sacrifice.] It is here only necessary to remark on the evidently typical character of the whole system of sacrifices, on which alone their virtue depended; and on the imperfect embodiment, in any body of mere men, of the great truth which was represented in the priesthood. By the former declaring the need of Atonement, by the latter the possibility of Mediation, and yet in itself doing nothing adequately to realize either, the Law again led men to Him, who was at once the only Mediator and the true Sacrifice.

Thus the Law had trained and guided man to the acceptance of the Messiah in his threefold character of King, Prophet, and Priest; and when its work being done, it became, in the minds of those who trusted in it, not only an encumbrance but a snare. To resist its claim to allegiance was therefore a matter of life and death in the days of St. Paul, and, in a less degree, in after-ages of the Church.

(c.) It remains to consider how far it has any obligation whatever, under the dispensation of the Gospel. As a means of justification or salvation, it ought never to have been regarded, even before Christ; it needs no proof to show that still less can this be so since He has come. But yet the question remains whether it is binding on Christians, even when they do not depend on it for salvation.

It seems clear enough, that its formal coercive authority as a whole ended with the close of the Jewish dispensation. It is impossible to separate, though we may distinguish, its various elements: 't must be regarded as a whole, for he who offended "in one point against it was guilty of all" (James i. 10). Yet it referred throughout to the Jewish covenant, and in many points to the constitution, the customs, and even the local circumstances of the people. That covenant was preparatory to the Christian, in which it is now absorbed; those customs and covenances have passed away. It follows, by the very nature of the case, that the formal obligation to the Law must have ceased with the basis on which it is grounded. This conclusion is stamped most unequivocally with the authority of St. Paul through the whole argument of the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians That we are "not under law" (Rom. vi. 14, 15; Gal. v. 18); "that we are dead to law" (Rom. vii. 4-6, Gal. ii. 19), "redeemed from under law" (Gal. iv. 5), etc., etc., is not only stated without any limitation or exception, but in many places is made the prominent feature of the contrast between the earlier and later covenants. It is impossible, therefore, to make distinctions in this respect between the various parts of the Law, or to avoid the conclusion that the formal code, promulgated by Moses and sealed with the prediction of the blessing and the curse, cannot, as it bore, be binding on the Christian.

But what then becomes of the declaration of our Lord, that He came "not to destroy the Law, but to perfect it," and that "not one jot or one tittle of it shall pass away?" what of the fact consequent upon it, that the Law has been reverence? in all Christian churches, and had an important influence on much Christian legislation? The answer is that the explanation of the apparent contradiction is to be found in the difference between positive and moral obligation. The positive obligation of the Law, as such, has passed away; but every revelation of God's Will, and of the righteousness and love which are its elements, imposes a moral obligation, by the very fact of its being known, even on those to whom it is not primarily addressed. So far as the Law of Moses is such a revelation of the will of God to mankind at large, occupying a certain place in the education of the world as a whole, so far its declarations remain for our guidance, though their coercion and their penalties may be no longer needed. It is in its general principle, of course, that they remain, not in their outward form; and our Lord has taught us, in the Sermon on the Mount, that these principles should be accepted by us in a more extended and spiritual development than they could receive in the hands of Moses.

To apply this principle practically there is need of much study and discretion, in order to distinguish what is local and temporary from what is universal, and what is mere external form from what is the essence of an ordinance. The moral law undoubtedly must be most permanent in its influence, because it is based on the nature of man generally, although at the same time it is modified by the greater prominence of love in the Christian system. Yet the political law, in the main principles which it lays down as to the sacredness and responsibility of all authorities, and the rights which belong to each individual, and which neither slavery nor even guilt can quite eradicate, has its permanent value. Even the ceremonial law, by its enforcement of the purity and perfection needed in any service offered, and in its disregard of mere coöperation on such service, and limitation of it strictly to the prescribed will of God, is still in many respects our best guide. In special cases (as for example that of the sabbatical law and the prohibition of marriage within the degrees) the question of its authority must depend on the further inquiry, whether the basis of such laws is one common to all human nature, or one peculiar to the Jewish people. This inquiry will be difficult, especi...
LAZARUS

ADĄ đàoos: Lazarus. In this name, which meets us as belonging to two characters in the N. T., we may recognize an abbreviated form of the old Hellenic Lazarus (Tertull. De Idol., Grotilus, et al.). The corresponding "ZΔ]or< appears in the Talmud (Winer, Rechub. s. v.). In Josephus, and in the historical books of the Apocalypse (1 Mac. vii. 17; 2 Mac. vi. 18), the more frequent form is "ΔΔΔ'στοσ: but ADΔδος occurs also (B. J. v. 13, § 7).)

L. Lazarus of Bethany, the brother of Martha and Mary (John xi. 1). All that we know of him is derived from the Gospel of St. John, and that records little more than the facts of his death and resurrection. We are able, however, without doing violence to the principles of a true historical criticism, to arrive at some conclusions helping us, with at least some measure of probability, to fill up these scanty outlines. In proportion as we bring the scattered notices together, we find them combining to make a picture far more distinct and interesting than at first seemed possible; and the distinctness in this case, though it is not to be mistaken for certainty, is yet less misleading than that which, in other cases, seems to arise from the strong statements of apocryphal traditions. (1) The language of John xi. 1 implies that the sisters were the better known. Lazarus is "of" (ἀπό) Bethany, of the village (ἐπὶ τὴν καώμας) of Mary and her sister Martha."

No stress can be laid on the difference of the propositions (Meyer and Lange, in loc.), but it seems as possible the inference that while Lazarus was, at the time of St. John's narrative, of Bethany, he was yet described as from the καώμα τἴς of Luke x. 38, already known as the dwelling-place of the two sisters (Gresswell. On the Village of Martha and Mary, Dissert. V. ii. 548.).

If the common reading in Luke xi. 44, 45, 46, be correct, it will be decisive against this; for there, after our Lord's denunciation of the "scribes and Pharisees," we find that a lawyer said, "Master, thus saying, thou reproachest us also." And Jesus said, Woe unto you also ye lawyers." But it is likely that the true reading refers the passage to the Pharisees alone. By the use of the word ἱεράς (in Tit. iii. 9) as a simple adjective, it seems more probable that the title "scribe" was a legal and official designation, but that the name Ῥευμάς was properly a mere epithet signifying one "learned in the law" (somewhat like the αἱ ἐκ νόμου in Rom. iv. 14), and only used as a title in common parlance (comp. the use of it in Tit. iii. 13; "Zenas the lawyer"). This would account for the comparative infrequency of the word, and the fact that it is always used in connection with "Pharisees," never, as the word "scribe" so often is, in connection with "chief priests" and "elders." From this, and from the order of the three names in John xi. 5, we may reasonably infer that Lazarus was the youngest of the family. The absence of the name from the narrative of Luke x. 38-42, and his subordinate position (ēis τῶν ἀνωτέρων) in the feast of John xii. 2, lead to the same conclusion. (2.) The house in which the feast is held appears, from John xii. 2, to be that of the sisters. Martha "serves," as in Luke x. 40. Mary takes upon herself that which was the special duty of hosts towards an honored guest (comp. Luke vii. 46). The impression left on our minds by this account, if it stood alone, would be that they were the givers of the feast. In Matt. xxvi. 6, Mark xiv. 3, the same fact appears as occurring in "the house of Simon the Leper:" "but a leper, as such, would have been compelled to lead a separate life, and certainly could not have given a feast and received a multitude of guests. Among the conjectural explanations which have been given of this difference, the hypothesis that this Simon was the father of the two sisters and of Lazarus, that he had been smitten with leprosy, and that actual death, or the civil death that followed on his disease, had left his children free to act for themselves, is at least as probable as any other, and has some support in early ecclesiastical traditions (Niceph. H. E. i. 27; Theophyl. in loc.; comp. Ewald, Geschichtle., v. 527). Why, if this were so, the house should be described by St. Matthew and St. Mark as it is; why the name of the sister of Lazarus should be altogether passed over, will be questions that will meet us further on. (3.) All the circumstances of John xi. and xii., — the feast for so many guests, the number of friends who come from Jerusalem to condescend with the sisters, left with female relations, but without a brother or near kinsman (John xi. 19), the alabaster-box, the ointment of spicaeurly costly, the funeral vault of their own, — point to wealth and social position above the average (comp. Trench, Miracles, 29). The peculiar sense which attaches to St. John's use of Ὠλοκληρόν (comp. Meyer on John xii. 19), as the leaders of the opposition to the teaching of Christ, in other words, as equivalent to Scribes and Elders and Pharisees, suggests the further inference that these visitors or friends belonged to that class, and that previous relations had been excited through the teaching of Bethany. (4.) A comparison of Matt. xxvi. 6, Mark xiv. 3, with Luke xii. 35, 44, suggests another conjecture that harmonizes with and in part explains the foregoing. To assume the identity of the anointing of the latter narrative with that of the former (so Grotius), of the woman that was a sinner with Mary the sister of Lazarus, and of one or both of these with Mary Magdeline (Lightfoot, Harm., § 53, vol. iii. 75), is indeed (in spite of the authorities, critical and patristic, which may be arrayed on either side) altogether arbitrary and unenlightened. It would hardly less so to infer, from the mere recurrence of so common a name as Simon, the identity of the leper of the one narrative with the Pharisee of the other; nor would the case be much strengthened by an appeal to the interpreters who have maintained that opinion (comp. Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. xxx.; Grotius, in Matt. xxvii. 16; Lightfoot. L. c.; Winer, Realb. s. v. Simon). [Comp. Mary Magdeline and Simon.] There are however some other facts which fall in with this hypothesis, and to that extent confirm it. If Simon the leper were also a Pharisee, it would explain the fact just noticed of the friendship between the sisters of Lazarus and the members of that party in Jerusalem. It would account also for the ready utterance by Martha of the chief article of the creed of the Pharisees (John xii. 24). Mary's lavish act of love would gain a fresh interest for us if we thought of it (as this conjecture would lead us to think) as growing out of the recollection of that which had been offered by the woman that was a sinner. The disease which gave occasion to the later name may have supervened after the incident which St. Luke records. The difference between the localities of the two histories (that of Luke vii. being apparently in Galilee near Nain, that of Matt. xxvii. and Mark xiv. in Bethany) is not greater than that which meets us on comparing Luke x. 38 with John xi. 1. (5.) An admission may be made of this assumption that the Pharisee, whom we thus far identify with the father of Lazarus, was probably one of the members of that sect, sent down from Jerusalem to watch the new teacher (comp. Ellipton's Holmen Lectures, p. 169): that he looked on him partly with reverence, partly with suspicion: that in his dwelling there was a manifestation of the sympathy and love of Christ, which could not but leave on those who witnessed or heard of it, and had not hardened themselves in formalism, a deep and permanent impression. (5.) One other conjecture, bold perhaps than the others, may yet be hazarded. Admitting, as must be admitted, the absence at once of all direct evidence and of traditional authority, there are yet some coincidences, at least remarkable enough to deserve attention, and which suggest the identification of Lazarus with the young ruler that had great possessions, of Mark x. xxvii. (see Gess. Comm., Matt. xix. 22) agrees with what has been before inferred (see above, 1), as does the fact of wealth above the average with what we know of the condition of the family at Bethany (see 2). If the father were an influential Pharisee, if there were ties of some kind uniting the family with that body, it would be natural enough that the son, even in comparative youth, should occupy the position of an αὐτός. The character of the young ruler, the reverence of his salvation (διδοσκέω σωτηρία, Mark x. 17) and of his attitude (γωνατίζει)

sor, which, his eager yearning after eternal life, the strict training of his youth in the commandments of God, the blameless piety of his outward life, all these would agree with what we might expect in the son of a Pharisee, in the brother of one who had chosen "the good part." It may be noticed further, that as his spiritual condition is essentially that which we find about the same period in Martha, so the answer returned to him, "One thing thou hast lacked," and that given to her, "One thing is needful," are substantially identical. But further, it is of this rich young man that St. Mark uses the emphatic word (το Ιησον, I heeding him, λοβελ) "for which is used of no others in the Gospel-history, save of the beloved Apostle and of Lazarus and his sisters (John xi. 5). We can hardly due to believe that that love, with all the yearning pity and the fervent prayer which it implied, would be altogether fruitless. There might be an answer to the one, and even to the other, but the half-prophetic words, "with God all things are possible," "there are last that shall be first," forbid our hasty condemnation, as they foreshade that of the disciples, and prepare us to hope that some discipline would yet be found to overcome the evil which was eating into and would otherwise destroy so noble and beautiful a soul. However strongly the absence of the name of Lazarus, or of the locality to which he belonged, may seem to militate against this hypothesis, it must be remembered that there is just the same singular and perplexing omission in the narrative of the mounting in Matt. xxvi. and Mark xiv.

Combining these inferences then, we get, with some measure of likelihood, an insight into one aspect of the life of the Divine Teacher and Friend, full of the most living interest. The village of Bethany and its neighborhood were—probably from the first, certainly at a later period of our Lord's ministry—a frequent retreat from the controversies and tone of Jerusalem (John viii. 2; Luke xxi. 37, xxii. 39). At some time or other one household, wealthy, honorable, belonging to the better or Nicodemus section of the Pharisees (see above, 1, 2, 3), learns to know and revere him. There may have been within their knowledge or in their presence, one of the most signal proofs of his love and compassion for the outcast (sup. 4). Disease or death removed the father from the scene and the two sisters are left with their younger brother to do as they think right. They appear at Bethany, or in some other village, where also they had a home (Luke x. 38, and Gresswell, l. c.), as loving and reverential disciples, each according to her character. In them and in the brother over whom they watch, He finds that which is worthy of his love, the craving for truth and holiness, the hungering and thirsting after righteousness which shall assuredly be filled. But two at least need an education in the spiritual life. Martha tends to rest in outward activity and Pharisaic dogmatism, and does not rise to the thought of an eternal life as actually present. Lazarus (see 5) oscillates between the attractions of the higher life and those of the wealth and honor which surround the path way of his life, and does not see how deep and wide were the commandments which, as he thought, he had "kept from his youth up." The searching words, the loving look and act, fail to undo the evil which has been corralling his inner life. The discipline which could provide a remedy for it was among the things that were "impossible with men," and "impossible with God only." A few weeks pass away, and then comes the sickness of John xi. One of the sharp malignant fevers of Palestine cuts off the life that was so precious. The sisters know how truly the Divine Friend has loved him on whom their love and their hopes centered. They send to Him in the belief that the tidings of the sickness will at once draw Him to them (John xi. 3). Slowly, and in words which (though afterwards understood otherwise) must at the time have seemed to the disciples those of one upon whom the truth came not at once but by degrees, He prepares them for the worst. "This sickness is not unto death"—"Our friend Lazarus sleepeth"—"Lazarus is dead." The work which He was doing as a teacher or a healer (John x. 41, 42) in Bethabara, or the other Bethany (John x. 40, and i. 28), was not interrupted, and continues for two days after the message reaches Him. Then comes the journey, occupying two days more. When He and His disciples come, three days have passed since the burial. The friends from Jerusalem, chiefly of the Pharisees and ruler class, are there with their consolations. The sisters receive the Prophet, each according to her character, Martha hastening on to meet Him, Mary sitting still in the house, both giving answer to the sorrowful, half-reproachful thought, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died" (John xi. 21-32). His sympathy with their sorrow leads Him also to weep as if He felt it in all the power of its hopelessness, though He came with the purpose and the power to remove it. Men wonder at what they look on as a sign of the intensity of his affection for him who had been cut off (John xi. 35, 36). They do not perhaps see that with this emotion there minglest indignation (ἐσταυρωμένος, John xi. 33, 38); at their want of faith. Then come the words which might at the moment of the death of which the Son offers to the Father (John xi. 41, 42). The stone is rolled away from the mouth of the rock-chamber in which the body had been placed. The Evangelist writes as if he were once again living through every sight and sound of that hour. He records what could never fade from his memory any more than could the recollection of his glance into that other sepulchre (comp. John xi. 44, with xx. 7). "He that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin." It is well not to break in upon the silence which hangs over the interval of that "four days' sleep" (comp. Trench, Miracles, l. c.). In nothing does the Gospel narrative contrast more strongly with the mythical histories which men have imagined of those who have returned from the unseen world, of QANRA and with the legends which in a later age have gathered round the name of Lazarus (Wright's St. Patrick's Purgatory, p. 167), than in this absence of all attempt to describe the experiences of the human soul that had passed from the life of sense to the land of the shadow of death. But thus much at least must be borne in mind in order that we may understand what has yet to be told of the manner in which the youth was thus recalled as on eagle's wings from the kingdom of the grave (comp. the language of the complaint of Hades in the Apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemos, Tischendorf, Evangel. Apoc. p. 305) must have learnt "what it is to die" (comp. a passage of great beauty in Tennyson's In Memoriam, xxxi., xxxii.). The soul that had looked with open gaze upon the things behind the veil had passed through a discipline sufficient to burn out all selfish love of the accidents of his outward life. There may have been an inward resurrection parallel with the outward (comp. Olshausen ad loc.). What men had given over as impossible had been shown in a twofold sense to be possible with God.

One scene more meets us, and then the life of the family which has come before us with such day-light clearness lapses again into obscurity. The fame of the wonder spreads rapidly; as it was likely to do, among the ruling class, some of whom had witnessed it. It becomes one of the proximate occasions of the plots of the Sanhedrin against our Lord's life (John xii. 47-53). It brings Lazarus no less than Jesus within the range of their enmity (John xii. 10), and leads perhaps to his withdrawing for a time from Bethany (Greswell). They persuade themselves apparently that they see in him one who has been a sharer in a great imposture, or who has been restored to life through some demonic agency. But others gather round to wonder and congratulate. In the house which, though it still bore the father's name (supra 1), was the dwelling of the sisters and the brother, there is a supper, and Lazarus is there, and Martha serves, no longer jealously, and Mary pours out her love in the costly offering of the spikenard ointment, and finds herself once again marginalized and hastily continued. The current which has been ventured on above connects itself with this fact also. The indignant question of Judas and the other disciples implies the expectation of a lavish distribution among the poor. They look on the feast as like that which they had seen in the house of Matthew the publican, the farewell banquet given to large numbers (comp. John xii. 9, 12) by one who was renouncing the habits of his former life. If they had in their minds the recollection of the words, "Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor," we can understand with what a sharpened edge their reproach would come as they contrasted the command which their Lord had given with the "waste" which He thus approved. After this all direct knowledge of Lazarus ceases. We may think of him, however, as sharing in or witnessing the kingly nuptial from Bethany to Jerusalem (Mark xi. 1), "enduring life again that Passover to keep" (Keble, Christian Year, Advent Sunday). The sisters and the brother must have watched eagerly, during those days of rapid change and wonderful expectation, for the evening's return to Bethany and the hours during which He lodged there" (Matt. xxvi. 17). It would be as plausible an explanation of the strangeness of the reference to the mark alone (xix. 51) as any other, if we were to suppose that Lazarus, whose home was near, who must have known the place to which the Lord "oftentimes resorted," was drawn to the garden of Gethsemane by the approach of the officers with their torches and lanterns and weapons (John xviii. 3), and in the haste of the night, alarum, rushed eagerly, "with the linen cloth cast about his naked body," to see whether he was in time to render any help. Whoever it may have been, it was not one of the company of professéd disciples. It was one who was drawn by some strong impulse to follow Jesus when they, all of them, "forsook him and fled." It was one whom the high-priest's servants were eager to seize, as if destined for a second victim (comp. John xii. 10); when they made no effort to detain any other. The linen-cloth (ἀμμάλλον), forming, as it did, one of the "ornament" of Matt. xi. 8, used in the dress and in the funerals of the rich (Mark xv. 40; Matt. xxvii. 59), points to a form of life like that which we have seen reason to assign to Lazarus (comp. also the use of the word in the LXX. of Judg. xiv. 12, and Prov. xxxvi. 24). Uncertain as all inferences of this kind must be, this is perhaps at least as plausible as those which identify the form that appeared so startlingly with St. John (Ambrose, Chrysostom, Greg. Mag.); or St. Mark (Olshausen, Lange, Isaac Williams, On the Passion, p. 30); or James the brother of the Lord (Epiphani. Her. p. 87, 13; comp. Meyer, ad loc.); and, on this hypothesis, the omission of the name is in harmony with the noticeable reticence of the first three Gospels throughout as to the members of the family at Bethany. We can hardly help believing that to their as to others ("the grave fourscore hours before," 1 Cor. xv. 5), was manifested the presence of their risen Lord; that they must have been sharers in the Pentecostal gifts, and have taken their place among the members of the infant Church at Jerusalem in the first days of its overflowing love; that then, if not before, the command, "Sell that thou hast and give to the poor," was obeyed by the heir of Bethany, as it was by other possessors of lands or houses (Acts ii. 44, 45). But they had chosen now, it would seem, the better part of a humble and a holy life, and their names appear no more in the history of the N. T. Apocryphal traditions even are singularly scanty and jejune, as if the silence which "sealed the lips of the Evangelists" had restrained others also. We almost wonder, looking at the wild luxuriance with which they gather round other names, that they have be taken as two typical instances, appearing under circumstances the most contrasting possible, yet having not a few features in common.

a The explanation, "He casteth out devils by Beel zeboi" (Matt. ix. 34, x. 25; Mark iii. 22, &c.), which originated with the scribes of Jerusalem, would naturally be applied to such a case as this. That it was so applied we may infer from the statement in the Sophocles Toloeth Jesus (the rabbinic antipetation of another Lecho Jesus), that this and other like miracles were wrought by the mystic power of the cabalistic ben-hamphoras, or other magical formula (Lamp. Comm. in Joan. xii. 44).
nothing more to tell of Lazarus than the meagre tale that follows: He lived for thirty years after his resurrection, and died at the age of sixty (Eph. vi. 522). When he came forth from the tomb, it was with the bloom and fragrance of a spring morning (Acts xvi. 22). His friends, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and other disciples, were sent out to sea by the Jews in a leaky boat, but miraculously escaped destruction, and were brought safe to Marseilles. There he preached the Gospel, and founded a church, and became its bishop. After many years, he suffered martyrdom, and was buried, some said, there; others, at Citium in Cyprus. Finally his bones and those of his brother Mary Magdalen were brought from Cyprus to Constantinople by the Emperor Leo the Philosopher, and a church erected to his honor. Some apocryphal books were extant bearing his name (comp. Thilo, Cod. Apoc. N. T. p. 711; Baronius, ad Martyres, Rom. Dec. xvii.; and for some old Panecalian legends as to the later adventures of Martha, Migne, Dict. de la Biblia, s. v. “Marthe”). These traditions have no personal or historical interest for us. In one instance only do they connect themselves with any fact of importance in the later history of Christendom. The Canons of St. Victor at Paris occupied a Priory dedicated (as one of the chief churches at Marseilles had been) to St. Lazarus. This was assigned, in 1633, to the fraternity of the Congregation founded by St. Vincent de Paul, and the mission-priests sent forth by it consequently became conspicuous as the Lazarists (Butler’s Lives of the Saints, July xix.).

The question why the first three Gospels omit all mention of so wonderful a fact as the resurrection of Lazarus, has from a comparatively early period forced itself upon interpreters and apologists. Rationalist critics have made it one of their chief points of attack, directly on the trustworthiness of St. John, indirectly on the credibility of the Gospel history as a whole. Spinoza professed to make this the crucial instance by which, if he had but proof of it, he would be determined to embrace the common faith of Christians (Bayle, Dict. s. v. “Spinoza”). Woolston, the mediolocutissiumas of English Deists, asserts that the story is “brimful of absurdities,” “a contexture of folly and fraud” (Disc. On Miracles, v.; comp. N. Lardner’s Vindications, Works, ii. 1-54). Strauss (Leben Jesu, pt. ii. ch. ix. § 108) scatter with triumphant scorn the subterfuges of Paulus and the naturalist interpreters (such, for example, as the hypothesis of suspended animation), and pronounces the narrative to have all the characteristics of a mythus. Ewald (gesch. v. p. 404), on the other hand, in marked contrast to Strauss, recognizes, not only the tenderness and beauty of St. John’s narrative, and its value as a representation of the quickening power of Christ, but also its distinct historical character. The explanations given of the perplexing phenomenon are briefly these: (1.) That fear of drawing down persecution on one already singled out for it kept the three Evangelists, writing during the lifetime of Lazarus, from all mention of him; and that, this reason for silence being removed by his death, St. John could write freely. By some (Grotius, and ben.) this has perhaps been urged too exclusively. By others (Alth., and ben., Trench, On Miracles, l. c.) it has perhaps been too hastily rejected as extravagant. (2.) That the writers of the first three Gospels confine themselves, as by a deliberate plan, to the miracles wrought in Galilee (that of the blind man at Jericho being the only exception), and that they therefore abstained from all mention of any fact, however interesting, that lay outside that limit (Meyer, and ben.). This too has its weight, as showing that in this connection, the three Evangelists were at all consistent with themselves. But it leaves the question, “what led to that consistency?” unanswered. (3.) That the narrative, in its beauty and simplicity, its human sympathies and marvelous transparency, carries with it the evidence of its own truthfulness, and is as far removed as possible from the embellishments and rhetoric of a writer of myths, bent upon the invention of a miracle which should outdo all others (Meyer, l. c.). In this there is no doubt great truth. To invent and tell any story as this told would require a power equal to that of the highest artistic skill of our later age, and that skill we should hardly expect to find combined at once with the deepest yearnings after truth and a deliberate perversion of it. There would seem, to any but a rationalist critic, an improbability quite infinite, in the union, in any single writer, of the characteristics of a Goethe, an Irold, and an Encke. (4.) Another explanation suggested by the attempt to represent to one’s self what must have been the sequel of such a fact as that now in question upon the life of him who had been affected by it, may perhaps be added. The history of monastic orders, of sudden conversions after great critical deliverances from disease or danger, offers an analogy which may help to guide us. In such cases it has happened, in a thousand instances, that the man has felt as if the thread of his life was broken, the past buried forever, old things vanished away. He retires from the world, changes his name, speaks to no one, or speaks only in hints, of all that belongs to his former life, shrinks above all from making his conversion, his resurrection from the death of sin, the subject of common talk. The instance already referred to in Pede offers a very striking illustration of this. Cunningham, in that history, gives up all to his wife, his children, and the poor, retires to the monastery of Melrose, takes the new name of Dithelm, and “would not relate these and other things which he had seen to such persons and such as lived negligently.” Assume only that the laws of the spiritual life worked in some such way on Lazarus; that the feeling would be strong in proportion to the greatness of the wonder to which it owed its birth; that there was the recollection, in him alone among others, that, in the nearest parallel instance, silence and secrecy had been solemnly enjoined (Mark v. 43), and it will seem hardly wonderful that such a man should shrink from publicity, and should wish to take his place as the last and lowest in the company of believers. Is it strange that it should come to be tacitly recognized among the members of the church of Jerusalem, that, as long as he and those dear to him survived, the great wonder of their lives was a thing to be remembered with awe by those who knew it, not to be talked or written about to those who knew it not?

The facts of the case are, at any rate, singularly in harmony with this last explanation. St. Matthew and St. Mark, who (the one writing for the Hebrews, the other under the guidance of St. Peter) represent what may be described as the feeling of the Jerusalem church, omit equally all mention of the three names. They use words which may indeed have been ωφθαται ενδικασθηση, but they avoid the names. Mary's costly offering is that of "a woman" (Matt. xxvii. 3; Mark xiv. 3). The house in which the feast was made is described so as to indicate it sufficiently to the place, and yet to keep the name of Lazarus out of sight. The hypothesis stated above would add two more instances of the same reticence. St. Luke, coming later (probably after St. Matthew and St. Mark had left the Church of Jerusalem with the materials afterwards shaped into their Gospels), collecting from all informants all the facts they will communicate, comes across one in which the two sides of the story are mentioned by name, and is not thus unexpressing, or not having learnt, that of the locality. St. John, writing long afterwards, when all three had "fallen asleep," feels that the restraint is no longer necessary, and puts on record, as the Spirit brings all things to his remembrance, the whole of the wonderful history. The circumstances of his life, too, his residence in or near Jerusalem as the protector of the bereaved mother of his Lord (John xix. 27), his agreement from the prominence of his activity for so long a period (John the Apostle, the insight we find he had into the thoughts and feelings of those who would be the natural companions and friends of the sisters of Lazarus (John xx. 1, 11-18); all these indicate that he more than any other Evangelist was likely to have lived in that immense circle of disciples, where these things would be most lovingly and reverently remembered. Thus much of truth there is, as usual, in the idealism of some interpreters, that what to most other disciples would seem simply a miracle (σημεια), a work of power (δυναμεα), like other works, and therefore one which they could without much reluctance omit, would be to him a sign (σημειωμα) manifesting the glory of God, witnessing that Jesus was "the resurrection and the life," which he could in no wise pass over, but must when the right time came record in its fullness. (Comp. for this significance of the miracle, and for its probable use in the spiritual education of Lazarus, Olschausen, ad loc.) It is of course obvious, that if this supposition accounts for the omission in the three Gospels of the name and history of Lazarus, it accounts also for the chronological dislocation and harmonic difficulties which were its inevitable consequences.

2. The name Lazarus occurs also in the well-known parable of Luke xvi. 19-31. What there is chiefly remarkable is, that while in all other cases persons are introduced as in certain stations, belonging to certain classes, here, and here only, we meet with a proper name. Is this exceptional fact to be looked on as simply one of the accessories of the parable, giving as it were a dramatic semblance of reality to what was, like other parables, only an illustration? Were the thoughts of men called to the etymology of the name, as signifying that he who bore it had in his poverty no help but God (comp. Germ. "Gotthil"), or as meaning, in the shortened form, one who had become altogether "helpless"? (So Theophyl. ad loc., who explains it as = βοηθητος, recognizing possibly the derivation which has been suggested by later critics from το βοηθητος, "there is no help." Comp. Suicer, s. v.; Lampe, ad loc.) Or was it again not a parlable, but, in its starting-point at least, a history, so that Lazarus was some actual beggar, like him who lay at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple, familiar therefore both to the disciples and the Pharisees? (So Theophyl. ad loc.; Chrysost., Malbov; Suicer, s. v. Λαζάρος.) Whatever the merit of either of these suggestions, no one of them can be accepted as quite satisfactory, and it adds something to the force of the hypothesis ventured on above, to find that it connects itself with this question also. The key which has served to open other doors fits into the wards here. If we assume the identity suggested in (3), or if, leaving that as unproved, we remember only that the historic Lazarus belonged by birth to the class of the wealthy and influential Pharisees, as in (3), then, though we may not think of him as among those who were "covetous," and who therefore deserved by scornful look and gesture (ἐξευτελησαν, Luke xvi. 14) Him who taught that they could not serve God and Mammon, we may yet look on him as one of the same class, known to them, associating with them, too often, in spite of all the promise of his youth, to be drawn away by that which had corrupted them. Could anything be more significant, if this were so, than the introduction of this name into such a parable? Not Eleazar the Pharisee, rich, honored, blameless among men, but Eleazar the beggar, full of leprous sores, lying at the rich man's gate, was the true heir of blessedness, for whom was reserved the glory of being in Abraham's bosom. Very striking too, it must be added, is the coincidence between the teaching of the parable and of the history in another point. The Lazarus of the one remains in Abraham's bosom because "if men hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead." The Lazarus of the other returned from it, and yet bears no witness to the unbelieving Jews of the wonders or the terrors of Hades.

In this instance also the name of Lazarus has been perpetuated in an institution of the Christian Church. The parable did its work, even in the dark days of her life, in leading men to dread simply selfish luxury, and to help even the most loathsome forms of suffering. The leper of the Middle Ages appears as a Lazarus. Among the orders, half-military and half-monastic, of the 12th century, was one which bore the title of the Knights of St. Lazarus (A. D. 1119), whose special work it was to minister to the lepers, first of Syria, and afterwards of Europe. The use of lazaretto and lazaret-house for the leper-hospitals then founded in all parts of Western Christendom, no less than that of lazzaroni for the mendicants of Italian towns, are indications of the effect of the parable upon the mind of Europe in the Middle Ages, and hence upon its later speech. In some cases there seems to have been a singular transfer of the attributes of the one Lazarus to the other. Thus in Paris the prison of St. Lazarus (the Clôs St. Lazare..."
so famous in 1818: had been originally a hospital for lepers. In the 17th century it was assigned to the Society of Lazarists, who took their name, as has been said, from Lazarus of Bethany, and St. Vincent de Paul died there in 1660. In the immediate neighborhood of the prison, however, are two streets, the Rue d'Enfer and Rue de Paradis, the names of which indicate the earlier associations with the Lazarus of the parable.

It may be mentioned incidentally, as there has been no article under the head of Divus, that the occurrence of this word, used as a quasi-proper name, in our early English literature, is another proof of the impression which was made on the minds of men, either by the parable itself, or by dramatic representations of it in the mediæval mysteries. The writer does not know where it is found for the first time in this sense, but it appears as early as Chaucer (Lazar and Dives; Southern's Tale) and Pliers Ploughan (Dives in the deynetary hyede, 1. 9158), and in later theological literature its use has been all but universal. In no other instance has a descriptive adjective passed in this way into the received name of an individual. The name Nimesius, which Ethymius gives as that of the rich man (Trench, Parables, 1 c.), seems never to have come into any general use.

The view proposed above (5) that Lazarus of Bethany and the rich ruler were the same person, deserves a brief consideration. It is not only a conjecture incapable of proof, but is open to manifold objections. In the first place, it requires us to reverse the probable order of events in the Evangelic history. Christ's interview with the young ruler is recorded by each of the first three Evangelists, and in all three is preceded and followed by the same incidents. Its connection with these incidents, since not obviously logical, may be presumed to be chronological. But Matt. (xix. 1; xx. 17, 29) and Mark (x. 1, 32, 46) both represent these transactions as occurring when our Lord was approaching Jerusalem by the way of Jericho. As respects this passage through Jericho, Luke (xviii. 35; xix. 1) agrees with them; and all three then coincide with John (xii. 1) in the arrival at Bethany. This arrival occurred after the resurrection of Lazarus. And it seems fair to infer, therefore, that the inquiry of the rich ruler, which three Evangelists concur in connecting with the journey, and apparently with its close, actually belongs where it stands. This harmonistic result is corroborated by the circumstance, that of the various visits Christ made to Jerusalem during his ministry, Matthew, Mark, and Luke record only the last; so that what they connect with that visit may be presumed to pertain to it. Further, the journeys thither shortly antecedent (John vii., x.), seem both to have been characterized by privacy; but the progress to which the interview with the rich man belonged was marked by publicity. We may conclude, therefore, with considerable confidence, that the interview with the rich man took place after the resurrection of Lazarus.

* The arrangement of occurrences by which the hypothesis under consideration becomes possible, is not only at variance with the intimations of the sacred text, but is rejected by the majority of critics. (Com-
LEAD (λίθωμα; μέταλλον, μεταλλακτική), one of the most common of metals, found generally in veins of rocks, though seldom in a metallic state, and most commonly in combination with sulphur. It was early known to the ancients, and the allusions to it in Scripture indicate that the Hebrews were well acquainted with its uses. The rocks in the neighborhood of Sinai yielded it in large quantities, and it was found in Egypt. That it was common in Palestine is shown by the expression in Eccles. xvi. 18, where it is said, in apostrophizing Solomon, "Thou didst multiply silver as lead;" the writer having in view the hyperbolic description of Solomon's wealth in 1 K. x. 27: "the king made the silver to be in Jerusalem as stones." It was among the spoils of the Midianites which the children of Israel bought with them to the plains of Moab, after their return from the slaughter of the tribe (Num. xxxi. 22). The ships of Tarshish supplied the market of Tyre with lead, as with other metals (Ex. xxvi. 12). Its heaviness, to which allusion is made in Ex. xv. 10 and Eccles. xxi. 14, caused it to be used for weights, which were either in the form of a round flat cake (Zech. v. 7), or a rough unfinished lump or "stone" (ver. 8); stones having in ancient times served the purpose of weights (comp. Prov. xvi. 11). This fact may perhaps explain the substitution of "lead" for "stones" in the passage of Ecclesiastics above quoted; the commonest use of the commonest metal being present to the mind of the writer. If Genesis is correct in rendering θόκος, ānōde, by "lead," in Am. vii. 7, 8, we have another instance of the purposes to which this metal was applied in forming the ball or lob of the plumb-line. ["Plumb-line."] Its use for weighting fishing-lines was known in the time of Homer (Il. xxiv. 80). But Bochart and others identify ānōde with tin, and derive from it the etymology of "Britain."

In modern metallurgy lead is used with tin in the composition of solders for fastening metals together. That the ancient Hebrews were acquainted with the use of lead in solders is indicated by the allusion given by the prophet Isaiah of the processes which accompanied the formation of an image for idolatrous worship. The method by which two pieces of metal were joined together was identical with that employed in modern times: the substances to be united being first clamped before being sol-dered. No hint is given as to the composition of the solder, but in all probability lead was one of the materials employed, its usage for such a purpose being of great antiquity. The ancient Egyptians used it for fastening stones together in the rough parts of a building, and it was found by Mr. Layard among the ruins at Nineveh (Nin. and Octb. p. 337). Mr. Napier (Metallurgy of the Bible, p. 130) conjectures that "the solder used in early times or lead, and termed lead, was the same as is now used—a mixture of lead and tin."

But, in addition to these more obvious uses of this metal, the Hebrews were acquainted with another method of employing it, which indicates some acquaintance in the arts at an early period. Job (xix. 14) utters a wish that his words, "with a pen of iron and lead, were graven in the rock for ever." The allusion is supposed to be to the practice of carving inscriptions upon stone, and pouring molten lead into the cavities of the letters, to render them legible, and at the same time preserve them from the action of the air. Frequent references to the use of leaded tablets for inscriptions are found in ancient writers. Panainoss (ix. 31) saw Hesiod's Works and Days graven on lead, but almost illegible with age. Public proclamations, according to Pliny (xiii. 21), were written on lead, and the name of Germanicus was carved on leaden tablets (Tac. Ann. li. 60). Envyarius (Ann. A.D. x. p. 390) relates that the history of the Seven Sleepers was engraved on lead by the Cadi.

Oxide of lead is employed largely in modern pottery for the formation of glazes, and its presence has been discovered in analyzing the articles of earthenware found in Egypt and Nineveh, proving that the ancients were acquainted with its use for the same purpose. The A. V. of Eccles. xxviii. 30 assumes that the usage was known to the Hebrews, though the original is not explicit upon the point. Speaking of the potter's art in finishing off his work, "he applieth himself to lead it over," is the rendering of what in the Greek is simply "he giveth his heart to complete the smearing," the material employed for the purpose not being indicated.

In modern metallurgy lead is employed for the purpose of purifying silver from other mineral products. The alloy is mixed with lead, exposed to fusion upon an earthen vessel, and submitted to a blast of air. By this means the dross is consumed. This process is called the expelling operation, with which the description in Ex. xxiii. 18-20, in the opinion of Mr. Napier (Met. of Bible, pp. 20-24), accurately coincides. "The vessel containing the alloy is surrounded by the fire, or placed in the midst of it, and the blowing is not applied to the fire, but to the fused metals. . . . And when this is done, nothing but the perfect metals, gold and silver, can resist the scourifying influence." And in support of his conclusion he quotes Jer. vi. 28-30, adding: "This description is perfect. If we take silver having the impurities in it described in the text, namely, iron, copper, and tin, and mix it with lead, and place it in the fire upon a cupel, it soon melts; the lead will oxidize and form a thick coarse crust upon the surface, and thus consume away, but effecting no purifying influence. The alloy remains, if anything, worse than before. . . . The silver is not refined, because the bellows were burned —there existed nothing to blow upon it. Lead is the purifier, but only so in connection with a blast blowing upon the precious metals." An allusion to this use of lead is to be found in Theognis (Gnom. 1127, 28; ed. Wecker), and it is mentioned by Pliny (xxxiii. 31) as indispensable to the purifica-tion of silver from alloy.

LEAH

(2) Leaves of the oaks of the Temple. (3) Leaves of the roll of a book.

1. LEAF (תֵּפָּר, ṣîḇ; תֵּפָּח, ṣîḇ; תֵּפִּיה, ṣîḇ): φυλλον, στεφάνιος; κέρας: φύλλον, κέρας, κέρατον. The olive-leaf is mentioned in Gen. viii. 11. Fig-leaves formed the first covering of our parents in Eden. The barren fig-tree (Matt. xxii. 13; Mark xi. 13) on the road between Bethan and Jerusalem "had on it nothing but leaves." The fig-leaf is alluded to by our Lord (Matt. xxiv. 32; Mark xiii. 28); "When his branch is yet tender, and pitheth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh." The oak-leaf is mentioned in Isa. i. 30, and vii. 13. The righteous are often compared to green leaves (Jer. xvii. 8), "her leaf shall be green" — to leaves that fade not (Ps. i. 3), "his leaf also shall not wither." The ungodly on the other hand are as "an oak whose leaf faileth" (Is. i. 30); as a tree which "shall wither in all the leaves of her spring" (Ez. xvii. 9); the "soul of a saken lot shall cease them" (Lev. xxvi. 39). In Ezekiel's vision of the holy waters, the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom are spoken of under the image of trees growing on a river's bank: there "shall grow all trees for food, whose leaf shall not fade" (Ez. xiii. 12). In this passage it is said that "the fruit of these trees shall be for food, and the leaf thereof for medicine" (margin, for branches and leaves). With this compare (Rev. xxi. i, 2) St. John's vision of the heavenly Jerusalem. "In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life . . . and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." There is probably here an allusion to some tree whose leaves were used by the Jews as a medicine or ointment; indeed, it is very likely that many plants and leaves were thus made use of by them, as by the old English herbalists.

2. LEAVES OF DOORS (תֵּפָּקָה, tēḇâḵ; תֵּפָּח, ṣîḇ; תֵּפִּיה, ṣîḇ): τοπιάξι, βήπακα: ostium, ostium). The Hebrew word, which occurs very many times in the Bible, and which in 1 K. vi. 32 (margin) and 34 is translated "leaves" in the A.V., signifies šefer, shafer, shafera, shaferet. In Ez. xxvi. 24: And the doors had two leaves apiece." The Hebrew word deloth is the representative of both doors and leaves. By the expression two-leaved doors, we are no doubt to understand what we term folding-doors.

3. LEAVES OF A BOOK OR ROLL (תֵּפָּח, ṣîḇ; תֵּפִּיה, ṣîḇ): σκόλις: petgella occurs in this sense only in Jer. xxxi. 22. The Hebrew word (literally doors) would perhaps be more correctly translated columns. The Latin column, and the English column, as applied to a book, are probably derived from resemblance to a column of a building.

LEATHER (חַלְָכִּית, chal kiít; חַלֵּכָה, chal kāh; חַלַּכָה, chal kāh): Aloa, Aia: Liv. The elder daughter of Laban (Gen. xxix. 16). The dullness or weakness of her eyes was so notable, that it is mentioned as a contrast to the beautiful form and appearance of her younger sister Rachel. Her father took advantage of the opportunity which the local marriage-rite afforded to pass her off in her sister's stead as the unconscious bridegroom, and expressed his own application to Jacob by alleging the custom of the country forbade the younger sister to be given first in marriage. Rosenmuller cites instances of these customs prevailing to this day in some parts of the East. Jacob's preference of Rachel grew into hatred of Leah, after he had married both sisters. Leah, however, bore to him in quick succession Reuben, Simon, Levi, Judah, then Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah, before Rachel had a child. Leah was conscious and respectful (ch. xxxv.) of the smaller share she possessed in her husband's affections; yet in Jacob's differences with his father-in-law, his two wives appear to be attached to him with equal fidelity. In the critical moment when he expected an attack from Esau, his discriminate regard for the several members of his family was shown by his placing Rachel and her child hindermost, in the least exposed situation, Leah and her children next, attempting to handmaidens with their children in the front. Leah probably lived to witness the dishonor of her daughter (ch. xxxiv.), so cruelly avenged by two of her sons: and the subsequent deaths of Deborah at Bethel, and of Rachel near Bethlehem. She died some time after Jacob reached the south country in which his father Isaac lived. Her name is not mentioned in the list of Jacob's family (ch. xvi. 8) when they went down into Egypt. She was buried in the family grave in Machpelah (ch. xlix. 31).

LEASING, "falsehood." This word is retained in the A. V. of Ps. iv. 2, v. 6, from the older English versions; but the Hebrew word of which it is the rendering is elsewhere almost uniformly translated "lies" (Ps. x. 4, liii. 3, &c.). It is derived from the Anglo-Saxon haxos, "false," whence leasung, "leasing," "falsehood," and is of frequent occurrence in old English writers. So in Piers Ploughman's Vision, 21:3:

"Tell me no tales, No leasung to bring upon me.
And in Wiclef's New Testament, John viii. 44, "Whanne he spekith a leasung, he spekith of his owne thinges, for he is a lyere, and falsit of it." It is used both by Spencer and Shakespeare.

LEATHER (חַלְָכִּית, chal kiít; חַלֵּכָה, chal kāh; חַלַּכָה, chal kāh): Aloa, Aia: Liv. The notices of leather in the Bible are singularly few; indeed the word occurs but twice in the A. V., and in each instance in reference to the same object, a girdle (2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4). There are, however, other instances in which the word "leather" might with propriety be substituted for "skin," as in the passages in which vessels (Lev. xii. 32; Num. xxxi. 20) or raiment (Lev. xiii. 49) are spoken of; for in these cases the skins must have been prepared. Though the material itself is seldom noticed, yet we cannot doubt that it was extensively used by the Jews: shoes, botelles, thongs, garments, tending-toughs, ropes, and other articles, were made of it. For the mode of preparing it see TANNER [Amer. ed.].

LEAVEN (ἐπιρρέω, see: ξύππον: fermentum). The Hebrew word seor has the radical sense of 'affluence or fermentation,' and therefore corresponds in point of etymology to the Greek ξύππος (from ξύππον, the Latin fermentum (from ferreo), and the English leaven (from levere). It occurs only five times in the Bible (Ex. xii. 13, 19, xiii. 7; Lev. ii. 11; Deut. xvi. 4), and is translated "leaven" in the first four of the passages quoted, and "leavened bread" in the last. In connection with it, we must notice the terms chametz and matzoth; the former signifying "fermented" or "leavened," literally "sharpened," bread; the latter "unleavened," the radical force of the word being variously understood to signify sweetness or purity.

The three words appear in juxtaposition in Ex. xiii. 7: "Unleavened bread (matzoth) shall be eaten seven days; and there shall no leavened bread (chametz) be seen with thee, neither shall there be leaven (seor) seen with thee in all thy quarters."

Various substances were known to have fermenting qualities; but the ordinary leaven consisted of a lump of old dough in a high state of fermentation, which was inserted into the mass of dough prepared for baking. [Bread.] As the process of producing the leaven itself, or even of leavening bread when the substance was at hand, required some time, unleavened cakes were more usually produced in sudden emergencies (Gen. xvi. 6; Judg. vi. 19). The use of leaven was strictly forbidden in all offerings made to the Lord by fire; as in the case of the meat-offering (Lev. ii. 11), the trespass-offering, (Lev. vii. 12), the consecration-offering (Ex. xxix. 2; Lev. viii. 2), the Nazarite-offering (Num. vi. 15), and more particularly in regard to the feast of the Passover, when the Israelites were not only prohibited on pain of death from eating leavened bread, but even from having any leaven in their houses (Ex. xii. 15, 19) or in their land (Ex. xiii. 7; Deut. xvi. 4) during seven days commencing with the 14th of Nisan. It is in reference to these prohibitions that Amos (i. 5) irascibly bids the Jews of his day to "offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven;" and hence even the earliest case was prohibited which Lev. xvi. 13 speaks of its occasionally producing fermentation. In other instances, where the offering was to be consumed by the priests, and not on the altar, leaven might be used, as in the case of the peace-offering (Lev. vii. 13), and the Pentecostal loaves (Lev. xxiii. 17). Various ideas were associated with the prohibition of leaven in the instances above quoted; in the feast of the Passover it served to remind the Israelites of the haste with which they fled out of Egypt (Ex. xii. 39), and of the sufferings that they had undergone in that land, the insipidity of unleavened bread rendering it a not inapt emblem of affliction (Deut. xvi. 3). But the most prominent idea, and the one which applies equally to all the cases of prohibition, is connected with the corruption which leaven itself had undergone, and which it communicated to bread in the process of fermentation. It is to this property of leaven that our Saviour points when he speaks of the "leaven" (i.e. the corrupt doctrine) of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees* (Matt. xvi. 6); and St. Paul, when he speaks of the "old leaven" (1 Cor. v. 7). This association of ideas was not peculiar to the Jews, it was familiar to the Romans, who forbade the priest of Jupiter to touch flour mixed with leaven (Gell. x. 15, 19), and who occasionally used the word fermentum as "corruption" (Pers. Sat. i. 24). Plutarch's explanation is very much to the point: "The leaven itself is born from corruption, and corrupts the mass with which it is mixed" (Quast. Rom. 109). Another quality in leaven is noticed in the Bible, namely, its secretly penetrating and diffusing power; hence the proverbial saying, "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump" (1 Cor. v. 6; Gal. v. 9). In this respect it was emblematic of moral influence generally, whether good or bad, and hence our Saviour adopts it as illustrating the growth of the kingdom of heaven in the individual heart and in the world at large (Matt. xiii. 33).

LEBANON (in prose with the art. المَّبَايِن, I. k. v. 6 (Heb. 20); in poetry without the art. المَّبَايِن: Ps. xiii. 6; Διαβάρος: Libanus), a mountain range in the north of Palestine. The name Lebanon signifies "white," and was applied either on account of the snow, which, during a great part of the year, covers its whole summit,* or on account of the white color of its limestone cliffs and peaks. It is the "white mountain" — the Mont Blanc of Palestine; an appellation which seems to be given, in one form or another, to the highest mountains in all the countries of the old world. Lebanon is represented in Scripture as lying upon the northern border of the land of Israel (Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4). Two distinct ranges bear this name. They both begin in lat. 33° 20', and run in parallel lines from S. W. to N. E. for about 90 Geo. miles, enclosing between them a long fertile valley from 5 to 8 miles wide, anciently called Cedia-Syrira. The modern name is el-Bâdis, and the valley is correspondingly limited to "the valley of Lebanon" (Gen. xvi. 17). It is a northern prolongation of the Jordan valley, and likewise a southern prolongation of that of the Orontes (Porter's Handbook, p. xvi.). The western range is the "Libanus" of the old geographers, and the Lebanon of Scripture where Solomon got timber for the Temple (I. K. v. 9, 40), and where the Hivites and Gidrites dwelt (Judg. iii. 9; Josh. xiii. 5). The eastern range was called "Anti-Libanus" by geographers, and "Lebanon toward the sun-rising" by the sacred writers (Josh. xiii. 5). Strabo describes (xvi. p. 754) the two as commencing near the Mediterranean — the former at Tripolis, and the latter at Sidon — and running in parallel lines toward Damascus; and strange to say, this error has, in part at least, been followed by most modern writers, who represent the mountain-range between Tyre and the lake of Meron as a branch of Anti-Libanus (Winer, Reedits., s. v. "Anti-Libanus;" Robinson, 1st ed. iii. 346; but see the corrections in the new edition). The topography of Anti-Libanus was first clearly described by Ptolemy's Diomnusios (v. 227, &c., iii. 399, &c.). A deep valley called Wadi el-Khāsa separates the southern section of Anti-Libanus from both Lebanon and the hills of Galilee. Lebanon—the western range—commences on the south at the deep ravine of the Litān, the ancient river Leontes, which drains the valley of Cæle-Syria, and falls into the Mediterranean five miles north of Tyre. It runs N. E. in a straight line parallel to the coast, to the opening from the Mediterranean into the plain of Emesa, called in Scripture the "Entrance of Hamath" (Num. xxiv. 8). Here Nuhel el-Khāsa—the ancient river Leontes—sweps round its northern end, as the Leontes does round its southern. The average elevation of the range is from 6000 to 8000 f.; but two peaks rise considerably higher. One of these is Samnaus, nearly on the parallel of Bayrut, which is more than 9000 f.; the other is Jobel Machra, which was measured in September, 1800, by the hydrographer, to be nearly 10,200 feet high (Not. Hist. Res., XI. V. p. 11). It is the highest mountain in Syria. On the summits of both these peaks the snow remains in patches during the whole summer.

The central ridge or backbone of Lebanon has smooth, barren sides, and gray rounded summits. It is entirely destitute of verdure, and is covered with small fragments of limestone, from which white crowns and jagged points of naked rock shoot up at intervals. Here and there a few stunted pine-trees or dwarf oaks are met with. The line of cultivation runs along at the height of about 8000 f.; and below this the features of the western slopes are entirely different. The descent is gradual; but is everywhere broken by precipices and towering rocks which time and the elements have chiseled into strange, fantastic shapes. Ravines of singular wildness and grandeur furnish the whole mountain side, looking in many places like huge rents. Here and there, too, bold promontories shoot out, and dip perpendicularly into the bosom of the Mediterranean. Smaller mountain-strewn limestone hills are scantily clothed with the evergreen oak, and the sandstone with pines; while every available spot is carefully cultivated. The cultivation is wonderful, and shows what all Syria might be if under a good government. Minor fields of grain are often seen where one would suppose the eagles alone, which hover round them, could have planted the seed. Figs cling to the naked rock; vines are trained along narrow ledges; long ranges of mulberries, terraces like steps of stairs, cover the more gentle declivities; and dense groves of olives fill up the bosoms of the glens. Hundreds of villages are seen—here built amid labyrinth of rocks; there rearing like swallow's nests to the sides of cliffs; while covents, no less numerous, are perched on the top of every peak. When viewed from the sea on a morning in early spring, Lebanon presents a picture which, once seen, is never forgotten; but deeper still is the impression left on the mind when one looks down over its terraced slopes clothed in their gorgeous foliage, and through the vistas of its immeasurable ranges, the distant Anti-Libanus.

How beautifully do these noble features illustrate the words of the prophet: "Israel shall grow as the lily, and strike forth his roots as Lebanon" (Hos. xiv. 5). And the fresh mountain breezes, filled in early summer with the fragrance of the budding vines, and throughout the year with the rich odors of numerous aromatic shrubs, call to mind the words of Solomon—"The smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon" (Cant. iv. 11; see also Hos. xiv. 6). When the plains of Palestine are burned up with the scorching sun, and when the air in them is like the breath of a furnace, the snowy tops and ice-cold streams of Lebanon temper the breezes, and make the mountain-range a pleasant and luxurious retreat, —

Shall a man leave the snow of Lebanon . . . or shall the cold-flowing waters be forsaken?" (Jer. xviii. 14). The vine is still largely cultivated in every part of the mountain; and the wine is excellent, notwithstanding the clumsy apparatus and unskilful workmen employed in its manufacture (Hos. xiv. 7). Lebanon also abounds in olives, figs, and mulberries; while some remnants exist of the forests of pine, oak, and cedar, which formerly covered it (1 K. v. 6; Ps. xxix. 5; Is. xiv. 8; Ezr. iii. 7; Diod. Sic. xix. 58). Considerable numbers of wild beasts still inhabit its retired glens and higher peaks: the writer has seen jackals, hyenas, wolves, bears, and panthers (2 K. xiv. 9; Cant. iv. 8; Hab. i. 17).

Some noble streams of Cæsælīea celebrity have their sources high up in Lebanon, and rush down in sheets of foam through sublime gorges, to stain with their ruby waters the transparent bosom of the Mediterranean. The Leontes is on the south. Next comes Nahr el-Mordy—the "gracious BBTN" of Diodorus Siculi (905). Then follows the Dünarun—the "Elamurus" of Strabo (xvi. p. 726), and the "Dunumrus" of Polybius (v. 68). Next, just on the north side of Beyrut, Nahr Beyrut, the "Magorius" of Pliny (v. 20). A few miles beyond it is Nahr el-Kibh, the "Lycus fluminis" of the old geographers (Plin. v. 20). At its mouth is the celebrated pass where Egyptian, Assyrian, and Roman conquerors have left, on tables of stone, records of their routes and their victories (Porter's Handbook, p. 107). Nahr Ibnbain, the classic river Adonis," follows, bursting from a cave beneath the lofty brow of Simnain, beside the ruins of Aphrodis. From its native rock it runs "Paralle to the sea, supposed with blood of Thannan, yearly wounded." —Lucrius *s. o., * Dea, 6-8; Strab. xvi. 755; Plin. v. 17; Porter's Handbook, ii. 205.) Lastly, we have the "sacred river," Kudshah—descending

* Pliny was more accurate than Strabo. He says, (v. 24) "A large Lebanon, much Lebanon teens, mili quingentis stadiis Syriam usque peritgitur, qua Cœle-Syria communiter. Hie pura interjecte radile morte adversus obtinentur, muro conjugato."

* Prokynus v. 15 follows Strabo; but Eusebius (Onom. gr. v. 4, Antyllianus) says, "Διαφορ συνοικίας, παρ' αυτού τον Ἀδαμον προς ἀνατολάδα, παρ' Δαμασκίνοις γεφυραν.*
from the side of the loftiest peak in the whole range, through a gorge of surpassing grandeur. Upon its banks, in a notch of a towering cliff, is perched the great convent of Koubin, the residence of the Maronite patriarch.

The situation of the little group of cedars—the last remnant of that noble forest, once the glory of Lebanon—is very remarkable. Round the head of the sublime Valley of the Kadisha sweep the highest summits of Lebanon in the form of a semicircle. Their sides rise up, bare, smooth, majestic, to the rounded snow-capped heads. In the centre of this vast recess, far removed from all other foliage and verdure, stand, in strange solitude, the cedars of Lebanon, as if they scorned to mingle their giant arms, and graceful fan-like branches, with the degenerate trees of a later age.

Along the base of Lebanon runs the irregular plain of Phoenicia; nowhere more than two miles wide, and often interrupted by bold rocky spurs, that dip into the sea.

The eastern slopes of Lebanon are much less imposing and less fertile than the western. In the southern half of the range there is an abrupt descent from the summit into the plain of Coele-Syria, which has an elevation of about 2,500 ft. Along the proper base of the northern half runs a low side ridge partially covered with dwarf oaks.

The northern half of the mountain-range is peopled almost exclusively by Maronite Christians—a brave, industrious, and hardy race; but sadly oppressed by an ignorant set of priests. In the southern half the Berunes predominate, who, though they number only some 26,000 fighting men, form one of the most powerful parties in Syria.

The main ridge of Lebanon is composed of Jura limestone, and abounds in fossils. Long belts of more recent sandstone run along the western slopes.

The whole mountain range was assigned to the Israelites, but was never conquered by them (Josh. xvii. 2-6; Judg. iii. 1-3). During the Jewish monarchy it appears to have been subject to the Phoenicians (1 K. v. 2-6; Ezr. iii. 7). From the Greek conquest until modern times Lebanon had no separate history.

Anti-Libanus.—The main chain of Anti-Libanus commences in the plateau of Bashan, near the parallel of Caesarea-Philippi, runs north to Hermon, and then northeast in a straight line till it sinks down into the great plain of Emesa, not far from the site of Riblah. HERMON is the loftiest peak, and has already been described; the next highest is a few miles north of the site of Adala, beside the village of Blukan, and has an elevation of about

7,000 ft. The rest of the ridge averages about 5,000 ft.; it is in general bleak and barren, with shelving gray declivities, gray cliffs, and gray rounded summits. Here and there we meet with thin forests of dwarf oak and juniper. The western slopes descend abruptly into the Bekâ‘a; but the features of the eastern are entirely different. Three side-ridges here radiate from Hermon, like the ribs of an open fan, and form the supporting walls of three great terraces. The last and lowest of these terraces takes a course nearly due east, bounding the plain of Damascus, and running out into the desert as far as Palmyra. The greater part of the terraces thus formed are parched flatly deserts, though here and there are sections with a rich soil. Anti-Libanus can only boast of two streams — the Harbar, now Nahr c‘I‘ayrj, which rises high up on the side of Hermon; and the Alana, now called Borâ‘el. The fountain of the latter is in the beautiful little plain of Zelbâ‘yeh, on the western side of the main chain, through which it eats in a sublime gorge, and then divides successively each of the side-ridges in its course to Damascus. A small streamlet flows down the Valley of Helben parallel to the Alana.

Anti-Libanus is more thinly peopled than its sister range; and it is more abundantly stocked with wild beasts. Eagles, vultures, and other birds of prey, may be seen day after day sweeping in circles round the keel-cliffs. Wild swine are numerous; and vast herds of gazelles roam over the bleak eastern steppes.

Anti-Libanus is only once distinctly mentioned in Scripture, where it is accurately described as "Lebanon toward the sun-rising" (Josh. viii. 5); but the southern section of the chain is frequently referred to under other names. [See Hermon.] The words of Solomon in Cant. iv. 8 are very striking — "Look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions’ den, from the mountains of the leopards." The reference is, in all probability, to the highest peaks of Anti-Libanus. — Hermon, and that near the fountain of the Alana; and in both places panthers still exist. "The tower of Lebanon, which looketh toward Damascus" (Cant. vii. 4) is doubtless Hermon, which forms the most striking feature in the whole panorama round that city. Josephus mentions Lebanon as lying near Ban and the fountains of the Jordan (Ant. v. 3, § 1); and as bounding the province of Gabbinitus on the north (B. J. iii. 5, § 5); he of course means Anti-Libanus.

The old city of Abila stood in one of the wildest gles of Anti-Libanus, on the banks of the Alana, and its territory embraced a large section of the range. [Ambiente.] Damascus owns its existence to these mountains: so did the once great and splendid city of Heliopolis; and its chief sources of both the Leontes and Orontes lie along their western base (Porter’s Handbook, pp. xviii., xix.).

* For a long time it was contended that the cedar was not found in any part of Lebanon except the famous grove near Betheryck, and that no trees resembling it in other localities were only cognate species, but not the true Larix cedrus. I have, however, settled this point by a laborious search and botanical examination. There are certainly in existence the following groves:

1. An extensive one near c‘I‘ainel, described by previous authors, consisting of many thousand small trees.

2. A small grove was in existence up to October 1866, east of ‘Ain Zulatta, on the crest of the ridge overlooking the Bekâ‘a. I visited the same grove in company with Rev. H. H. Jesup, D. D., in October 1865, and at that time we counted about twenty trees, some of them of considerable size. One isolated from the grove, distant a mile, would have measured twenty feet in circumference. This grove was felled when I visited it in 1866, and the last timbers were being sawn for roofing purposes.

3. A large grove of very young trees east of ‘Ain Zulatta, in the valleys and on the western slopes of Lebanon. I estimated the number at 10,000 trees. This grove a few years since consisted of very large trees, many of them from 6 to 13 feet in diameter. But a few years ago they were sold to a company of pitch-burners from Bostâ‘el for the pulpary sum of 30,000 piastres, and all cut down, and consumed in making rosin and tar. The new sprouts are now beginning to re-clothe the hill-sides and valleys, and in a couple of centuries may claim the name of a forest.

4. A grove beginning above Bribek and stretching southward two or three miles, terminating in a cluster of noble trees overhanging the village of Helbin, lying near the grove at Bribek in magnitude and beauty. The northernmost end of this grove above Bribek has a few score of large trees, one or two of which are gigantic. The central portion, clothing the western slope of the mountain, consists of large trees, but so miserably hacked and burned by the wood-cutters, that most of its trees are dead or dying. They may number 20,000 to 30,000 in all, small and large. The southernmost portion is a grand collection of about two hundred and fifty trees. One measures 27 feet in circumference, another 23, and many from 15 to 20. Some of them spread widely their horizontal branches, and bear numerous cones. The granduer of their situation on the declivity of a deep gorge enhances the interest which always attends the sight of this venerable tree.

It will be seen by these remarks, that, were the groves mentioned protected from spoliation, and allowed to increase, Mount Lebanon might be again covered with lofty forests of its royal tree.

A word on the value of the cedar for building purposes. In Syria, where the woods so soon destroy the softer woods, and where the long soaking to which roof timbers are subjected, owing to the cooing of water from the earth-roofs during the rainy season, causes the timbers to rot, a resinos indestructible wood like the cedar is invaluable for the rafters which are universally used as supports for the roofs throughout the Lebanon. It is true that the timber as now found cannot be worked into very long straight columns, as it is gnarled and twisted like the oak, but for most of the purposes for which timber is used here it would be invaluable. What might be its character, were the trees allowed to grow naturally, without being lopped and mutilated, cannot be positively ascertained. I am of opinion, however, from the symmetry of some of the older trees, that much of the disarrangement which has been used in speaking of this wood is due to the deformity and disease inflicted on the tree by the careless hand of man, and I can readily believe that Solomon found all that he desired for the stately columns and beams and rafters of his Temple and palace in the uninjured primeval forests of which we see a faint type near Bethrech and el-Mornit.

Since the massacres of 1860, Lebanon has constituted a separate government, tributary to the Turkish Sultan, but in many important respects independent. Its governor, Daud Pacha, is a Christian, of the American Catholic sect. He was nominated by the Porte, subject to the ratification of the Five Powers. He governs the mountains with the aid of a police force enrolled by volunteer enlistments from among the various populations of the mountains—Druze, Maronite, Greek, and Greek Catholic. No Turkish troops are stationed in his district, which includes all of both slopes of Lebanon, and a part of the Jubeil. He is a man of enlightened judgment and views, and has succeeded in establishing a government which is an honor to himself and the great powers to which he is responsible, and an unspoilable relief to the country after the centuries of misrule and anarchy which have desolated it. He has even introduced the franchise, and has organized local governments, elective by the people. He is not under the jurisdiction of the governor-general of Syria, but is answerable directly to the Sublime Porte, and the representatives of England, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia. Under his benign administration the fruitful mountains, now visibly covered by native pine and cedar beauty, and the thrifty aspect of its villages bears testimony to the sense of security which is so sadly wanting in the neighboring plains and mountains.

LEB^OOTH (777177] [Irons]: Lebass; Alex. Abbath: Lebath), a town which forms one of the last group of the cities of “the South” in the enumeration of the possessions of Judah (Josh. xv. 32). It is named between Sansannah and Shilhim; and is very probably identical with Beth-Lebath, elsewhere called Beth-Meill. No trace of any names answering to these appears to have been yet discovered. If we may adopt the Hebrew signification of the name (“houseless”), it furnishes an indication of the existence of wild animals in the south of Palestine.

LEBREUS (Lebassios). This name occurs in Matt. x. 3, according to Codex D (Rezeit Cantabrigiensis) of the sixth century [and most other MSS.], and in the Received Text. In Matt. xii. 18 it is substituted in a few unimportant MSS. for Thaddaeus. The words “Lebassios who is called” (Matt. x. 3) are not found in the Vatican MS. [B] nor the Sinaitic, and Lachmann rejects them as, in his opinion, not received by the most ancient Eastern churches. [So also Tregelles.] The Vulgate omits them; but Jerome (Comm. in Matt.) says that Thaddeus, or Judas the brother of James, is elsewhere called Lebasseus; and he concludes that this Apostle had three names. It is much easier to suppose that a strange name has been omitted than that it has been inserted by later transcribers. [Lebasseus is retained in Tischendorf's 8th critical edition of the Greek Testament, but he omits ως ἐπεξεργάτης Θαδαθαοί.—A.] It is admitted into the authorised version of the text in 1881, and in the English versions (except the Rhemish) since Tyndale's in 1534. For the signification of the name, and for the life of the Apostle, see Jude, p. 1584.

LEBO'NNAH (7777777] [frankincense, and in that sense also 7777777] τῆς Λεβωναίας; Alex. τοῦ Λεβωνοῦ τῆς Λεβωναίας: Lebourn], a place named in Judges xxii. 19 only; and there but as a landmark to determine the position of Shiloh, which is stated to have lain south of it. Lebanon has survived to our times under the almost identical form of el-Lubboun. It lies to the west of, and close to, the Nobâas road, about eight miles north of Beitin (Bethel), and two from Selation (Shiloh), in relation to which it stands, however, nearer W. than N. The village is on the northern acclivity of the wady to which it gives its name. Its appearance is ancient; and in the rocks above it are excavated sepulchres (Rob. ii. 272). To Eusebius and Jerome it does not appear to have been known. The earliest mention of it yet met with is in the itinerary of the Jewish traveller hap-harch (A. p. c. 1320), who describes it under the name of Lobin, and refers especially to its correspondence with the passages in Judges (see Asher's Benj. of Tudeh, ii. 435). It was visited by Mannriell (March 24, 25), who mentions the identification with Lebanon, but in such terms as may imply that he was only repeating a tradition. Since then it has been passed and noticed by most travellers to the Holy Land (Rob. ii. 372; Wilson, ii. 292, 293; Donor, 363; Mislin, iii. 319, &c., &c.).

LECAH (77777777) [walking, course]: [Rom. Anax; Vat.] Anco: Alex. Anco: Lecce], a name mentioned in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 21) only, as one of the descendants of Shelah, the third son of Judah by the Canaanitis Batsh. The immediate progenitor of Lecce was Ete. Many of the names in this genealogy, especially when the word “father” is attached, are towns (comp. Eshtemoa, Keilah, Marshesh, &c.), but this, though probably the case with Lecce, is not certain, because it is not mentioned again, either in the Bible or the Onomasticon, nor have any traces of it been since discovered.

LEECOH. [HORSE-LEECOH.]

LEEXS (77777777), châhîv: 5á prâța, Btûrîn xâhrî, xâhôrô, xâharô: herba, porro, fenum, prutrum). The word cähîv, which in Num. x. 5 is translated leeks, occurs twenty times in the Hebrew text. In 1 K. xviii. 5; Job x1. 15; Ps. civ. 14, civii. 8, cxxix. 6, cxxvii. 2, x. 5, cii. 15; Is. xxxvi. 27, xl. 6, 7, 8, xiv. 4, li. 12, it is rendered gross; in Job xiii. 12, it is rendered herb; in Prov. xxv. 25, Is. x. 6, it is erroneously translated of it are eaten by the people. Forskål mentions the Trigonella as being grown in the gardens at Cairo; its native name is Halbech (Flor. Aegypt., p. 81).

Sonnini (Voyage, i. 373) says, “In this fertile country, the Egyptians themselves eat the fenn-grec so largely, that it may be properly called the food of man. In the month of November they eat ‘green halbech for sale!’ in the streets of the town; it is tied up in large bunches, which the inhabitants purchase at a low price, and which they eat with incredible greediness without any kind of seasoning.”

The seeds of this plant, which is also cultivated in Greece, are often used; they are eaten boiled or raw, mixed with honey. Forskål includes it in the Materia Medica of Egypt (MOTT. Med. Kohir, p. 156). However plausibly may be this theory of Hengstenberg, there does not appear sufficient reason for ignoring the old versions, which seem all agreed that the leck is the plant denoted by chaldis, a vegetable from the earliest times a great favorite with the Egyptians, as both a nourishing and savory food. Some have objected that, as the Egyptians held the leck, onion, etc., sacred, they would abstain from eating these vegetables themselves, and would not allow the Israelites to use them. We have, however, the testimony of Herodotus (ii. 125) to show that onions were eaten by the Egyptian poor, for he says that on one of the pyramids is shown an inscription, which was explained to him by an interpreter, showing how much money was spent in providing onions, garlic, and garlic, for the workmen. The priests were not allowed to eat these things, and Plutarch (De Is. et Osir. lii, p. 373) tells us the reasons. The Welshman reverences his leek, and wears one on St. David’s Day — he eats the leck nevertheless; and doubtless the Egyptians were not over-scrupulous (Scip. Herod., p. 230). The "look" is too well known to need description. Its botanical name is "Allium porrum"; it belongs to the order Liliaceae. W. H.

LEES (לְיָאָשׁ) [πορφυρᾶς: facies]. The Hebrew word bears the radical sense of preservation, and was applied to "lees" from the custom of allowing the wine to stand on the lees in order that its color and body might be better preserved. Hence the expression "wine on the lees," as meaning a generous, full-bodied liquor (I. Sam. xxv. 6). The wine in this state remained, of course, unadulterated in its essence, and became thick and syrupy; hence the proverb, "to settle upon one's lees," to express the sloth, indolence, and gross stupidity of the ungodly (Jer. xlvii. 10; Zeph. i. 12). Before the wine was consumed, it was necessary to strain off the lees; such wine was then termed "well refined" (Is. xxxv. 6). To drink the lees, or "dregs," was an expression for the endurance of extreme punishment (Ps. Ixxxv. 3). W. L. B.

LEGION (legate): [Tisch. 8th ed.; Legeth.] Legio, the chief subdivision of the Roman army, containing about 6,000 infantry, with a contingent of cavalry. The term does not occur in the Bible in its primary sense, but has been adopted in order to express any large number, with the necessary idea of order and subordination. Thus it is applied by our Lord to the angels (Matt. xxvi. 53), and in this sense it answers to the "hosts" of the Old Testament (Gen. xxxiii. 2; Ps. cxlviii. 2). It is again the name which the demoniac assumes, "My name is Legion (Legeth); for we are many" (Mark v. 9), implying the presence of a spirit of superior power in addition to subordinate ones. W. L. LEHABIM (לְהָבֵים) [perh. fiery, flaming]: Lebens; [in 1 Chr., Rom. xvi. 14, Alex. "Leavos"]; Ljudaim, occurring only in Gen. x. 13 and 1 Chr. i. 11, the name of a Mizrite people or tribe, supposed to be the same as the Lubim, mentioned in several places in the Scriptures as mercenaries or allies of the Egyptians. There can be no doubt that the Lubim are the same as the Rebu or Lebu of the Egyptian inscriptions, and that from them Libya and the Libyans derived their name. These primitive Libyans appear, in the period at which they are mentioned in these two historical sources, that is, from the tip of Mesopotamia, n. c. cir. 1250, to that of Jeremiah's notice of them late in the 6th century B. C., and probably in the case of Daniel's, prophetically to the earlier part of the second century B. C., to have inhabited the northern part of Africa to the west of Egypt, though latterly driven from the coast by the Greek colonists of the Cyrenaica, as is more fully shown under LUBIM. Phillographically, the interchanges of these middle letter of a root into a quiescent, is frequent, although it is important to remark that Gesenius considers the form with Π to be more common in the later dialects, as the Semitic languages are now found (Thes. art. 77). There seems, however, to be strong reason for considering many of these lower reconstructions to primitive forms. Geographically, the position of the Libdibim in the enumeration of the Mizrdates immediately before the Naphtalim, suggests that they at first settled to the westward of Egypt, and nearer to it, or not more distant from it than the tribes or peoples mentioned before them (Mizraim). Historically and ethnologically, the connection of the Rebu and Libyans with Egypt and its people suggests the resemblance shown with the Egyptians (Lubim). On these grounds there can be no reasonable doubt of the identity of the Libdibim and Lubim. I. S. P.

LEHI (with the def. article, לֶהַי) except in ver. 14 [the javelion]; in ver. 9, [Rom. Λέχη, Vat.] Aevius, Alex. Aevus; [in vv. 14, 19.] Lechû, id est mazilus, a place in Judah, probably on the confines of the Philistia, between it and the cliff Etam; the scene of Samson's well-known exploit with the javelin (Judg. xv. 9, 14, 19). It contained an eminence — Ramath-lehi, and a spring of great and lasting repute — En-hak-ker. Whether the name existed before the exploit or the exploit originated the name cannot now be determined from the narrative. On the one hand, in vv. 9 and 19, Lehi is named as if existing before this occurrence, while on the other the play of the story and the statement of the bestowal of the name Ramath-lehi look as if the reverse were intended. The analogy of similar names in other countries is in favor of its having existed previously. Even taken as a Hebrew word, "Lehi" has another meaning besides a javelin; and after all there is throughout a difference between the two words, while, though similar, their forms to us, would be much more marked to those of a Hebrew, and which so far betrays the accommodation. A similar discrepancy in the case of Beer Lahai-
LEMUEL

LEMUEL, and a great similarity between the two names in the original (Ges. Thes. 175 b), has led to the supposition that that place was the same as Lehi. But the situations do not suit. The well Ladnai-roi was below Kadesh, very far from the locality to which Samson’s adventures seem to have been confined. The same consideration would also appear fatal to the identification proposed by M. Van de Velde (Memoire, p. 344) at Tell el-Lekheiah, in the extreme south of Palestine, only four miles above Kerk-sheh, a distance to which we have no authority for believing that either Samson’s achievements or the possession of the Philistines (at least in those days) extended. As far as the name goes, a more feasible suggestion would be Brat-Likheyah, a village in the northern slopes of the great Wady Sukkam, about two miles below the upper Beth-horon (see Tolev, loc. Wunderung). Here is a position at once on the borders of both Judah and the Philistines, and within reasonable proximity to Zerah, Eshcol, Timnah, and other places familiar to the history of the great Danite hero. On this, however, we must await further investigation; and in the mean time it should not be overlooked that there are reasons for placing the cliff Etam—which seems to have been near Lehi—in the neighborhood of Bethlehem. [ETAM, THE ROCK.]

The spring of En hak-kore is mentioned by Jerome (Epitaph. Pauly, § 14) in such terms as to imply that it was then known, and that it was near Morasthi, the native place of the prophet Micah, which he elsewhere (Onom. a. v.: Prof. ad Med.) mentions as east of Elothepolis (Bid. Biblia).

Lehi is possibly mentioned in 2 Sam. xxiii. 11— the relation of another encounter by the Philistines hardly less disastrous than that of Samson. The word rendered in the A. V., “into a troop,” by alteration of the vowel-points becomes “to Lehi,” which gives a new and certainly an appropriate sense. This reading first appears in Josephus (Ant. vii. 12, § 4), who gives it “a place called Slagona”—the jaw—the word which he employs in the story of Samson (Ant. v. 8, § 9). It is also given in the Complutensian LXX., and among modern interpreters by Bechtart (Hieroz. ii. 2, ch. 13), Kennicott (Disser. 140), J. D. Michaelis (Ethos für Ungeltilted), Ewald (Geschichte, iii. 180, note). G.

Lentile (λέντιλλα), and لينتل: Lentiel, the name of an unknown king to whom his mother addressed the prudential maxims contained in Prov. xxxi. 1–9. The version of this chapter in the LXX. is so obscure that it is difficult to discover what text they could have had before them. In the rendering of Lentiel by יסוי, in Prov. xxxi. 1, none of the traces of the original are discernible, but in v. 4 it is entirely lost. The rabbinical commentators identify Lentiel with Solomon, and tell a strange tale how that when he married the daughter of Pharaoh, on the day of the dedication of the Temple, he assembled musicians of all kinds, and passed the night awake. On the morrow he slept till the fourth hour, with the keys of the Temple beneath his pillow, when his mother entered the room, and finding him in the words of Prov. xxxi. 2–3, Grosch, adopting a fanciful etym olory from the Arabic, makes Lentiel the same as Hezekiah. Hitzig and others regard him as king or chief of an Arab tribe dwelling on the borders of Palestine, and elder brother of Agur, whose name stands at the head of Prov. xxx. [See JAROSL.] According to this view מַעְלֶא (A. V., “the prophecy”) is Massa in Arabia; a region mentioned twice in close connection with Danah, and peopled by the descendants of Ishmael. In the reign of Hezekiah a roving band of Simeonites drove out the Amalekites from Mount Seir and settled in their stead (1 Chr. iv. 38–44), and from these exiles of Israelitish origin Hitzig conjectures that Lentiel and Agur were descended, the former having been born in the land of Israel; and that the name Lentiel is an older form of Nenem, the first-born of Simon (Dit. Sprachleben, pp. 310–314). But it is more probable, as Eichhorn and Ewald suggest, that Lentiel is a poetical appellation, selected by the author of these maxims for the guidance of a king, for the purpose of putting in a striking form the lessons which they conveyed. Signifying as it does “to God,” i.e. dedicated or devoted to God, like the similar word Lael, it is in keeping with the whole sense of the passage, which contains the portrait of a virtuous and righteous king, and belongs to the latest period of the proverbial literature of the Hebrews.

LENTILES (λέντιλλα, adhæsin: fæcilis: levis). There cannot be the least doubt that the A. V. is correct in its translation of the Hebrew word which occurs in the four following passages: Gen. xxxiv. 34, 2 Sam. xvii. 28, 2 Sam. xiii. 11, and Ez. iv. 9; from which last we learn that in times of scarcity lentiles were sometimes used in making bread. There are three or four kinds of lentils, all of which are still much esteemed in those countries where they are grown, namely, the South of Europe, Asia, and North Africa: the red lentile is still a favorite article of food in the East; it is a small kind, the seeds of which after being decorticated, are commonly sold in the bazaars of India. The modern Arabic name of this plant is identical with the Hebrew; it is known in Egypt and Arabia, Syria, etc., by the name أَدَسَعِ, as we learn from the testimony of several travellers. When Dr. Robinson was staying at the castle of Al-Kibeh, he partook of lentiles, which he says he "found very palatable, and could well conceive that rendered "troop." In the parallel narrative of 1 Chronicles (xi. 15), the word לְנֵלָל, a "camp," is substituted.

 eléin (Judges, p. 416 b, Eng. transl.). See also Studer, Richter, p. 320. The version of the Société biblique provoqante de Paris (1899) follows this interpretation.

^ Hebrew נלָל, as if נלָל, from the root נל (Gen. T. p. 470). In this sense the word very rarely occurs (see A. V. of Ps. lixii. 10, 39, lxiv. 19). It elsewhere has the sense of "living," and thence of wild animals, which is adopted by the LXX. in this place as remarked above. In ver. 13 it is again rendered "troop." In the parallel narrative of 1 Chronicles (xi. 15), the word נלָל, a "camp," is substituted.

b The Vatican and Alex. MS. read sic ἐνάπα (ἐνάπα), as if the Philistines had come on a hunting expedition.

Lentiles

The lentile, Ervum lens, is much used in Arab cuisine, particularly among the Bedouin tribes of the desert, where it is a staple of the diet. It is a small, round bean that is easy to cook and is rich in protein and other nutrients. The lentile is often used to make soups and stews, and it is a common ingredient in many traditional Arab dishes.

The word "lentile" is derived from the Arabic word "أَلْنَسْ" (al-nas), which is related to the Hebrew word "לנטילו" (lentilu), which means "to make heavy" or "to add weight." This reflects the lentile's starchy nature and its ability to add body to dishes.

The leopard, Leopardus pardus, is a large cat species that is widespread in the Americas. It is known for its distinctive black rosette markings on a golden-brown background and its powerful limbs. The leopard is an apex predator and plays a crucial role in maintaining the balance of ecosystems.

The leopard is named Leopardus pardus in Latin, which means "leopard." This reflects the animal's distinctive rosette markings, which are a common characteristic of the genus Leopardus.

The name "leopard" itself comes from the Latin word "leopardus,* which is derived from the Latin word "lapis," meaning "stone" or "precious stone." This reflects the leopard's association with precious stones and gemstones in ancient cultures.

In modern Arabic, the word for leopard is "نَابِض" (nabīs), which is derived from the root "بِيْسَ" (besa), meaning "to vomit." This reflects the leopard's association with sickness and disease in some cultures.

 mentions that leopards have sometimes been killed in "the low and rocky chain of the Bichel mountain," but he calls them onouces (Baruc. Syr. i, p. 152). In another passage (p. 335) he says, "in the wooded part of Mount Faber are wild bears and onouces." Mariti says that the "groottes at Kedron cannot be entered at all seasons without danger, for in the middle of summer it is frequented by tigers, who retire hither to shun the heat." (Mariti, Trans., iii, 28). By "tigers" he undoubtedly means leopards, for the tiger does not occur in Palestine. Under the name Saimar, which means "sported," it is not improbable that another animal, namely, the cheetah (Acinonyx jubata), may be included; which is named by the Mohammedans of Syria, who employ it in hunting the gazelle. These animals are represented on the Egyptian monuments; they were chased as an amusement for the sake of their skins, which were worn by the priests during their ceremonies, or they were hunted as enemies of the farnyard (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ch. viii. 20).

Sir G. Wilkinson also draws attention to the fact that there is no appearance of the leopard (cheetah) having been employed for the purpose of the chase, on the monuments of Egypt; nor is it now used by any of the African races for hunting. The natives of Africa seem in some way to connect the leopard skin with the idea of royalty, and to lock upon it as part of the insignia of majesty (Wood's Nat. Hist. i. 160). The leopard (Leopardus vivus) belongs to the family Felida, sub-order Digitigrade, order Carniva. The panther is now considered to be only a variety of the same animal.

The leopard is still found in Syria. It has been seen, a fine specimen from near Jerzien. One was killed near Albe in the winter of 1866-67, after it had killed about 60 goats. A young one was taken near Banie in Akkar the same winter. They are not rare in the neighborhood of the castle of el-Sharaf, opposite Deir Minas. They work much mischief by their sandgum attacks on the herds of goats and sheep which pasture in that vicinity. The shepherds invariably keep up a loud shouting to keep them off, when their fleeces are ascending by the mountain side from the Valley of the Litany, at dusk or at dawn, returning from the water. Native authorities profess to find a difference between the and the , the former standing for the leopard, and the latter for the panther. It is more probable that the trivial difference in color, and the arrangement of the spots, are only such mark varieties, not distinct species.

LEPER, LEPROSY. The Egyptian and Syrian climates, but especially the rainless atmosphere of the former, are very prolific in skin-diseases; including, in an exaggerated form, some which are common in the cooler regions of western Europe. The heat and drought acting for long periods upon the skin, and the exposure of a large surface of the latter to their influence, combine to predispose it to such affections. Even the modified forms known to our western hospitals show a perplexing variety and at times a wide departure from the best-known and recorded types; much more then may we expect departure from any routine of symptoms amidst the fatal fecundity of the Levant in this class of disorders (Good's Study of Medicine, vol. iv. p. 445, &c., 4th ed.). It seems likely that diseases also tend to exhaust their old types, and to reappear under new modifications. [MEDICINE]

This special report, however, exhibiting in wide variety that class of maladies which disfigures the person and makes the presence horrible to the beholder, it is no wonder that notice was early drawn to their more popular symptoms. The Greek imagination dwelt on them as the proper scourge of an offended deity, and perhaps foreign forms of disease may be implied by the expressions used (Eschyl. Chor. 271, &c.), or such as an intercourse with Persia and Egypt would introduce to the Greeks. But, whatever the variety of form, there seems strong general testimony to the cause of all alike, as being to be sought in hard labor in a heated atmosphere, amongst dry or powdery substances, rendering the proper care of the skin difficult or impossible. This would be aggravated by unwholesome or injurious diet, want of personal cleanliness, of clean garments, etc. Thus a of a leopard's skin and a bricklayer's tith, are recorded by the faculty (Butenhan, On Skin Diseases, Phthisis; Good's Study of Med., lib. pp. 450 and 484).

The predominant and characteristic form of leprosy in Scripture is a white variety, covering either the entire body or a large tract of its surface; which has obtained the name of leper Monica. Such were the cases of Moses, Mirian, Naaman, and Gehazi (Ex. iv. 6; Num. xiii. 10; 2 K. v. 1, 27; comp. Lev. xvii. 13). But, remarkably enough, in the Mosaic ritual-diagnosis of the disease (Lev. xiii., xiv.), this kind, when overspreading the whole surface, appears to be regarded as a clean (xiii. 12, 13, 16, 17). The first question which occurs as we read the entire passage is, have we any right to assume one disease as spoken of throughout? or rather— for the point of view in the whole passage is essential reason—that is not made clear of certain symptoms, marking the afflicted person as under a Divine judgment, all that is meant, without raising the question of a plurality of diseases? But beyond this preliminary question, and supposing the symptoms ascertained, there are circumstances which, only weighted, will prevent us expecting the identity of these with modern symptoms in the same class of maladies. The Egyptian bondage, with its studied degradations and privations, and especially the work of the kid under an Egyptian sun, must have had a frightful tendency to generate this class of disorders; hence Manetho (Joseph. Cont. Apis. i. 26) asserts that the Egyptians drove out the Israelites as infected with leprosy—a strange reflex, perhaps, of the Mosaic narrative of the plagues of Egypt, yet probably also containing a truth. The wide recorded total change of food, air, dwelling, and mode of life, caused by the Exod. to this nation of newlyenunciated slaves, may possibly have had a further tendency to skin-disorders, and now and severe regressive measures may have been required in the desert-moving camp to secure the public health, or to allay the panic of infection. Hence it is possible that many, perhaps most, of this repertory of symptoms may have disappeared with the period of the Exodus, and the snow-white form, which had pre-existed, may alone have ordinarily continued in a later age. But it is observable that, amongst these prevalent symptoms, the scaling, or peeling off of the surface, is nowhere mentioned, nor is there any expression in the Hebrew text which points to exfoliation of the cuticle. a The principalorpitudi features are a rising or swelling, c a scan baldness; and a bright or white d spot of the body. [Balsam.] But especially a white swelling in the skin, with a change of the hair of the part from the natural black to white or yellow (3, 10, 4, 20, 25, 30), or an appearance of a faint going "deeper than the skin," or again, "raw flesh," appearing in the swelling (10, 14, 15), were critical signs of pollution. The mere swelling, or scan, or bright spot, was remedied for a week as doubtful (4, 21, 26, 31), and for a second such period, if it had not yet pronounced (5). If it then spread (7, 22, 27, 35), it was decided as polluting. But if after the second period of quarantine the trace died away and showed no symptom of spreading, it was a mere scan, and he was adjudged clean (6, 23, 34). This tendency to spread seems especially to have been relied on. A spot most innocent in all other respects, if it "spread much abroad," was unclean; whereas, as before remarked, the man so wholly overspread with the evil that it could find no further range, was on the contrary "clean" (12, 13). These two opposite criteria seem to show, that whilst the disease manifested activity, the Mosaic law imputed pollution to and imposed segregation on the sufferer, but that the point at which it might be viewed as having run its course was the signal for his readmission to communion. The question then arises, supposing contagion were dreaded, and the sufferer on that account suspended from human society, would not one who offered the whole area of his body as a means of propagating the pest be more shunned than the partially afflicted? This leads us to regard the disease in its sacred character as being perhaps most vividly impressed upon the mind of the people, that it was of God's peculiar people. His time, his food and raiment, his head and beard, his field and fruit-tree, all were touched by the finger of ceremonial; nor was his bodily condition exempt. Disease itself had its sacred relations arbitrarily imposed. Certainly contagion need not be the basis of our views in tracing these relations. In the contact of a dead body there was not contagion, for the body the moment life was extinct was as much externally unclean as in a state of decay. Many of the unclean of beasts, etc., are as wholesome as the clean. Why then in leprosy must we have recourse to a theory of contagion? To cherish an undefined horror in the mind was perhaps the primary object; such horror, however, always tends to some definite dread, in this case most naturally to the dread of contagion. Thus religious awe would ally itself with and rest upon a lower motive, and there would thus be a motive to weigh with carnal and spiritual natures alike. It would perhaps be nearer the truth to say, that uncleanness was imputed, rather to inspire the dread of contagion, than in order to check contamination as an actual process. Thus this disease was a living plague set in the man by the finger of God whilst it showed its life by activity—he "spread"; but when no more showing signs of life, it lost its character as a curse from him. Such as dreaded contagion—and the immense majority in every country have an exaggerated alarm of it—would feel on the safe side through the Levitical ordinance; if any did not fear, the loathsomeness of the aspect of the malady would prevent them from wishing to infringe the ordinance.

It is not our purpose to enter into the question whether the contagion existed, nor is there perhaps any more vexed question in pathology than how to fix a rule of contagiousness; but whatever was currently believed, unless opposed to morals or humanity, would have been a sufficient basis for the lawgiver on this subject. The panic of infection is often as distressing, or rather far more so, in proportion as it is far more widely diffused, than actual disease. Nor need we exclude popular notions, so far as they do not conflict with higher views of the Mosaic economy. A degree of deference to them is perhaps apparent in the special reference to the "head" and "beard" as the seat of some form of polluting disorder. The sanctity and honor attaching to the head and beard (1 Cor. xii. 4, 5, see also Brædley) made a scan thereon seem a heinous disfigurement, and even baldness, though not unclean, yet was unusual and provoked reproach (2 K. ii. 23), and when a diseased appearance arose "out of a baldness," even without "spreading abroad," it was at once adjudged "unclean." On the whole, though we decline to rest leprous definitions merely on popular notions of uncleanliness, yet a deference to them may be admitted to have been shown, especially at the time when the people were, from previous habit and associations, up to the moment of the actual Exodus, most strongly imbued with the scrupulous purity and refined ceremonial example of the Egyptians on these subjects.

To trace the symptoms, so far as they are recorded, is a simple task, if we keep merely to the text of Levitical, and do not insist on finding new definitions in the broad and simple language of an a The raw flesh of xil. 10 might be discovered in this way, or by the skin merely cracking, an abscess forming, or the like. Or—what is more probable—"raw flesh" means granulations forming on patches where the surface had become excoriated. These transgressions would form into a fungous flesh which might be aptly called "raw flesh." b לְעַנֵּי. c לְעַנֵּי, לְעַנֵּי. Gesenius, s. v., says, "strictly a bald place on the head occasioned by the wuh or itch." d לָעַנֵּי. The root appears to be לָעַנֵּי, which in Chaldee and Arabic means "to be white, or shining." (Gen. s. v.) e The word in the Heb. is לָעַנֵּי, which means a languish or fade away; hence the A. V. hardly conveys the sense adequately by "be somewhat dark." Perhaps the expressions of Hippocrates, who speaks of a leper κατά συμπληρώματα, and of Celsius, who mentions one υἱὸν συμπληρώματος, may have led our translators to endeavor to find equivalents for them in the Hebrew.

early period. It appears that not only the before-mentioned appearances, but any open sore which exposed raw flesh was to be judged by its effect on the hair, by its being in sight lower than the skin, by its tendency to spread; and that any one of these symptoms would argue uncleanness. It seems also that from a boil and from the effects of a burn a similar disease might be developed. Nor does modern pathology lead us to doubt that, given a constitutional tendency, such causes of indubia-tion may result in various disorders of the skin or tissues. Cicatrices after burns are known sometimes to assume a peculiar tuberculated appearance thickened and raised above the level of the surrounding skin — the keloid tumor, which, however, may also appear independently of a burn.

The language into which the I.LX. has rendered the simple phrases of the Hebrew text shows traces of a later school of medicine, and suggests an acquaintance with the terminology of Hippocrates. This has given a hint, on which, apparently wishing to reconcile early Biblical notices with the results of later observation, Dr. Mason Good and some other professional expositors of leprosy have drawn out a comparative table of parallel terms.

It is clear then that the leprosy of Lev. xiii., xiv.
means any severe disease spreading on the surface of the body in the way described, and so shadowing of aspect, or so generally suspected of infection, that public feeling called for separation. No doubt such diseases as syphilis, elephantiasis, cancer, and all others which not merely have their seat in the skin, but which invade and disorganize the underlying and deeper-seated tissues, would have been classed levitically as "leprosy," had they been so generally prevalent as to require notice.

It is not astounding that the "leprosy" of moder Syria, and which has a wide range in Spain, Greece, and Norway, is the Elephantiasis Greco-rum. The Arabian physicians perhaps caused the confusion of terms, who, when they translated the Greek of Hippocrates, rendered his elephantiasis by leprosy, there being another disease to which they gave a name derived from the elephant, and which is now known as Elephantiasis Arabum, — the "Baradoss leg," Bouchaud Tropie. The Elephantiasis Greco-rum is said to have been brought home by the crusaders into the various countries of Western and Northern Europe. Thus an article on "Leprosy," in the Proceedings of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London, Jan., 1830, vol. iii. p. 164, &c., by Dr. Webster, describes what is evidently this disease. Thus Michaelis (Smith's translation, vol. iii. p. 283, Art. cex.)

speaks of what he calls lepra Arubum, the symptoms of which are plainly elephantiasic. For a discussion of the question whether this disease was known in the early Biblical period, see Medicine.
It certainly was not that distinctive white leprosy of which we are now speaking, nor do any of the described symptoms in Lev. xiii. point to elephantisis. "White as snow" (2 K. v. 27) would be as inapplicable to elephantiasis as to small-pox.
Further, the most striking and fearful results of this modern so-called "leprosy" are wanting in the Mosaic description — the transformation of the features to a leonine expression, and the corrosion of the joints, so that the fingers drop piecemeal, from which the Arabic name, مَالِكٌ, dudam,
i. e. mutilation, seems derived. b Yet before we question the affinity of this disease with Mosaic leprosy, a description of Rayner's (Tract Theorique, etc., des Maladies de la Peau,
s. v. Elephantiasis) is worth quoting. He mentions two characteristic species, the one tuberculated, probably the commoner kind at present (to judge from the concurrence of modern authorities in describing this type), the other characterized by des plaques fawtes, larges, etendues, fétides, rides, insensibles, accompagnées d'une légère desquamation et d'une déformation particulière des pieds et

But the Hebrew of (1) is in Lev. xiii. 39 predicated of a subject compounded of the phraseology of (2) and (3), whereas those (1), (2), and 3 of Hipp. and of Celsius are respectively distinct and mutually exclusive of one another. Further, the word ἄλογος appears sub-translated by "black" or "dark," meaning rather "lun-etic," "tanned," or "dim," as an old man's eyes, an expiring and feeble flame, etc. Now it is remarkable that the Hippocratic terms ἄλογος and λεύκης are found in the LXX.
The phraseology of the latter is also more specific than will adequately represent the Hebrew, suggesting shades of meaning. a where this has a wide general word, or substituting a word denoting one symptom as ἄλογος, "crust," formed probably by humor corning, for ἄλογος, "expansion."

This is clearly and forcibly pointed out in an arti-tle by Dr. Robert Smith in the Medical Times, April 14, 1830, whose long hospital experience in Jerusalem entitles his remarks to great weight.

a Thus the expression ἅρπαξ ἄλογος μᾶλλον, "deeper than the skin of the flesh," is rendered in ver. 8 by τασπίζω ἀότῳ τῷ διάφραστα; in ver. 10 by ἐκαλοπίνη τῷ διάφραστας, elephantiasis itself has also passed current under the name of the "black leprosy." It is possible that the "freckled spot" of the A. V. Lev. xvii. 39. e may correspond with the harmless L. alpholoe, since it is noted as "clean." "The ed. of Paulus Egin. by the Sydenham Society (vol. ii. p. 17 if.) gives the following summary of the opinions of classical medicine on this subject: "Galen is very deficient on the subject of lepra, having nowhere given a complete description of it, though he notices it incidentally in many parts of his works. In one place he calls elephans, leuce, and alphos cutaneous affections. Alphos, he says, is much more superficial than leuce. Lepra is said to participate more of the nature of ulceration. According to Oribasius, lepra affects mostly the deep-seated parts, and psora the superficial. Actius states that lepra is next to elephantia in malignity, and that it is distinguished from psora by spreading deeper and having scales of a circular shape like those of fishes. Leuce holds the same place to that psora does to lepra. In other words, says he, leuce is more deep-seated and affects the color of the hair, while alphos is more superficial, and the hair in general is unchanged. . . . Alexander Aphrodiasienis mentions psora among the contagious diseases, but says that lepra and leuce are not contagious. Chrysostom alludes to the common opinion that psora was among the contagious diseases. . . . Celsus describes alphos, melas, and leuce, very intelligently, connecting them together by the generic term of vitiligo." There is a remarkable concurrence between the Elychian description of the disease which was to produce "lichen"趁着 over the flesh, eroding with fierce voracity the former natural structure, and white hairs shooting up over the part diseased, and some of the Mosaic symptoms; the spreading energy of the evil is dwelt upon both by Moses and by Elychus, as vindicating its character as a scourge of God. But the symptoms of "white hairs" is a curious and exact confirmation of the genuineness of the detail in the Mosaic account, especially as the poet's language would rather imply that the disease spoken of was not then domesticated in Greece, but the strange horror of some other land. Still, nothing very remote from our own experience is implied in the more changed color of the hair: it is common to see horses with galled backs, etc., in which the hair has turned white through the destruction of those follicles which, secrete the coloring matter.

There remains a curious question, before we quit Leviticus, as regards the leprosy of garments and houses. Some have thought garments worn by leprous patients intended. The discharges of the diseased skin absorbed into the apparel would, if infection was possible, probably convey disease; and it is known to be highly dangerous in some cases to allow clothes which have so imbued the discharges of an ulcer to be worn again. . . . And the words of

f Still it is known that black secretions, sometimes carried to the extent of negro blackness, have been produced under the skin, as in the nata murusum of the African. See Meso-Chirurgical Rec., New Series, vol. v. p. 215, January, 1847.

Jude 23 may seem to countenance this, a - hating even the garment spotted by the flesh. But 1st. no mention of infection occurs: 2dly, no connection of the garment with leprosy; human wearers is hinted at; 3dly, this would not help us to account for a leprosy of stone-walls and plaster. Thus Dr. Mead (ut sup.) speaks at any rate plausibly of the leprosy of garments, but becomes unreasonable when he extends his explanation to that of walls. Michaelis thought that wool from sheep which had died of a particular disease might fret into holes, and exhibit an appearance like that described, I. ev. xxi. 32-35 (Michaelis, art. exi. iii. 290-291). But woolen cloth is far from being the only material mentionable; nay, there is even some reason to think that the words rendered in the A. V. "warp" and "woof," are not those distinct parts of the texture, but distinct materials. Linen, however, and leather are distinctly particularized, and the latter not only as regards garments, but "any thing (lit. vessel) made of skin," for instance, bottles. This classing of garments and house-walls with the human epidermis, as leprosy, has moved the nirth of some, and the wonder of others. Yet modern science has established what goes far to vindicate the Mosaic classification as more philosophical than such cavils. It is now known that there are some skin-diseases which originate in an acarus, and others which proceed from a fungus. In these we may probably find the solution of the paradox. The analogy between the insect which frets the human skin and that which frets the garment that covers it, between the fungous growth that lines the crevices of the epidermis and that which creeps within the interstices of masonry, b is close enough for the purposes of a ceremonial law, to which it is essential that there should be an arbitrary element intermingled with provisions manifestly reasonable. Michaelis (ib. art. exi. iii. 290-93) has suggested a nitrous efflorescence on the surface of the stone, produced by salpetre, or rather an acid containing it, and issuing in red spots, and cited the example of a house in Lubeck; he mentions also exfoliation of the stone from other causes; but probably these appearances would not be developed without a greater degree of damp than is common in Palestine and Arabia. It is manifest also that a disease in the human subject caused by an acarus or by a fungus would be certain to cause the propagation of those fungous causes to be transferred from person to person. c Some physicians indeed assert that only such skin diseases are contagious. Hence perhaps arose a further reason for marking, even in their analogies among hideless substances, the strictness with which forms of disease so arising were to be shunned. The sacrificial law attending the purgation of the leper will be more conveniently treated under LEVITANNS.

The lepers of the New Testament do not seem to offer occasion for special remark, save that by the N. T. period the disease, as known in Palestine, probably did not differ materially from the Hippocratic record of it, and that when St. Luke at any rate uses the words λέπρα, λέπρος, he does so with a recognition of their strict medical significance.

From Surenhusius (Mishna, Negaim), we find that some rabbinical commentators enumerate 16, 36, or 72 diverse species of leprosy, but they do so by including all the phases which each passes through, reckoning a red and a green variety in garments, the same in a house, etc., and counting coelitum, reculco, abulatia, and even veles, as so many distinct forms of leprosy.

LEUSHEM (λήσθεμ, [strong, fortress, Furst]): Leseon, a variation in the form of the name of Laisit, afterwards DAX, occurring only in Josh. xix. 47 (twice). The Vat. LXX. is very corrupt, having λαῖσχ and λασθαναβ (Rom. λαίσχ und λασθαναβ), (see Mai's ed.); but the Alex., as usual, is in the second case much closer to the Hebrew, λαεσηα and λασθαναβ.

The commentators and lexicographers afford no clue to the reason of this variation in form. G.

* LET is used in a few passages of the A. V. (Ex. v. 4; Num. xxii. 16; mars.; Josh. xiii. 13; Rom. i. 13; 2 Thess. i. 7; Wisd. vii. 22) in the sense of to hinder, being derived from the Anglo-Saxon letten, connected with het, late. "Let" in the sense of "permit" is a word of different origin.

LETUS (Λετος): [Val. omits.] Alex. A不得不: Archias, the same as HARTHUS (1 Esdr. viii. 29). The Alex. MS. has evidently the correct rendering, of which the name as it appears in the Vat. MS. (Roman ed.) is a mere corruption, from the similarity of the uncial A and Λ.

LEUTUSIM (λετουσίμων, [bare ground, sharpened]: Λετοςιμως: Lutusim, Lutosim), the name of the son of the sons of Dedan, son of Jobel, (Gen. xxv. 3 and 1 Chr. i. 32, Vulg.). Fresnèi (Journ. Archit. iii. seric, vol. vi. pp. 217, 218) identifies it with Tawos, one of the ancient and extinct agios, in both of which scales are formed upon the skin. Galen remarks on the tendency of this disease to pass into lepra and scabies.

tribes of Arabia, like as he compares Leummim with Uzmeiyim. The names may perhaps be regarded as commencing with the Hebrew article. Nevertheless, the identification in each case seems to be quite untenable. (Respecting these tribes, see LEUUMMIM and ARARAH.) It is noteworthy that the three sons of the Keturite Dedan are named in the plural form, evidently as tribes descended from him. E. S. P.

LEUUMMIM (לועים, Loomim), from לוע (people): Λαμμίρια: [Alex. Λαμμούρι, and in 1 Chr. Λαμμούρι]: Loomin, Lunamin, the name of the third of the descendants of Dedan, son of Jokshan, Gen. xxv. 3 (1 Chr. i. 32, Vulg.), being in the plural form like his brethren, Asharim and Letushim. It evidently refers to a tribe or people sprung from Dedan, and indeed in its present form literally signifies "peoples," "nations;" but it has been observed in art. LETUSHIM, that these names perhaps commence with the Hebrew article. Leummim has been identified with the Αλαμμίρια of Ptolemy (vi. 7, § 24; see Dist. of Geogr.), and by Frenzel (in the Journ. Asiat. litter., vol. vi. p. 217) with an Arab tribe called Outsiyt. a Of the former, the writer knows no historical trace: the latter was one of the very ancient tribes of Arabia of which no genealogy is given by the Arabs, and who appear to have been anti-Arabian, and possibly aboriginal inhabitants of the country. LEVI. 1. (לוי) [perh. crown, wreath, Gen.]: Nouns: Levi: Levi. The name of the third son of Jacob by his wife Leah. This, like most other names in the patriarchal history, was connected with the thoughts and feelings that gathered round the child's birth. As derived from לוי, "to ad-here," it gave utterance to the hope of the mother that the affections of her husband, which had hitherto rested on the favored Rachel, would at last be drawn to her. "This time will my husband be joined unto me, because I have borne him three sons" (Gen. xxix. 24). The new-born child was to be a נועם בדליות (Jos. Ant. i. 19, § 8), a new bliss binding the parents to each other more closely than before. b But one fact is recorded in which he appears prominent. The sons of Jacob have come from Padan-Aram to Canaan with their father, and are with him "at Shalem, a city of Shechem." Their sister Dinah goes out "to see the daughters of the land" (Gen. xxxiv. 1), i.e. as the words probably indicate, and as Josephus distinctly states (Ant. i. 21), to be present at one of their great annual gatherings for some festival of nature-worship, analogous to that which we meet with afterwards among the Midianites (Num. xxv. 2). The license of the time or the absence of her natural guardians exposes her, though yet in earliest youth, to lust and outrage. A stain is left, not only on her, but on the honor of her kindred, which, according to the rough justice of the time, nothing but blood could wash out. The duty of extorting that revenge fell, as in the case of Jael and Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 22), and in most other states of society in which polygamy has prevailed (comp. for the customs of modern Arabs, J. D. Michaelis, quoted by Kurtz, Hist. of Old Covenant, i. § 82, p. 349), on the brothers rather than the father, just as in the case of Rekabah, it belonged to the brother to conduct the negotiations for the marriage. We are left to conjecture why Heben, as the first-born, was not foremost in the work, but the sin of which he was afterwards guilty, makes it possible that his zeal for his sister's purity was not so sensitive as theirs. The same explanation may perhaps apply to the non-appearance of Judah in the history. Simeon and Levi, as the next in succession to the first-born, take the task upon themselves. Though not named in the Hebrew text of the O. T. till xxxiv. 25, there can be little doubt that they were "the sons of Jacob" who heard from their father the wrong over which he had brooded in silence, and who planned their revenge accordingly. The LXX. version does introduce their names in ver. 14. The history that follows is that of a cowardly and revolting crime. The two brothers exhibit, in its broadest contrasts, that union of the noble and the base, of characteristics above and below the level of the heathen tribes around them, which marks the whole history of Israel. They have learned to hate and scorn the impurity in the midst of which they lived, to regard themselves as a peculiar people, to glory in the sign of the covenant. They have learnt only too well from Jacob and from Laban the lessons of treachery and falsehood. They lie to the men of Shechem as the Druses and the Maronites lie to each other in the prosecution of their blood-feuds. For the offense of one man, they destroy and plunder a whole city. They cover their murderous schemes with fair words and professions of friendship. They make the very token of their religion the instrument of their perfidy and revenge.c Their father, timid and anxious as ever, utters a feeble lamentation (Blunt's Script. Coincidences, Part i. § 8), "Ye have made me to stink among the inhabitants of the land . . . I being few in number, they shall gather themselves against me." With a zeal that, though mixed with baser elements, fire-shadows the zeal of Phineas, they glory in their deed, and make all avowance with the question, "Should he deal with our sister as with a harlot?" Of other facts in the life of Levi, there are none in which he takes, as in this, a prominent and distinct part. He shares in the hatred which his brothers bear to Joseph, and joins in the plots against him (Gen. xxxvi. 4). Heben and Judah interfere severally to prevent the consummation of the crime (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 29). Simeon appears, as being made afterwards the subject of a sharper discipline than the others, to have been foremost — as his position among the sons of Leah made it likely that he would be — in this attack on the favored son of Rachel; and it is at least probable that in this, as in their former guilt, Simeon and Levi were brethren. The rivalry of the mothers was perpetuated in the jealousies of their children; and the two who had shown themselves so keenly sensitive when their sister had been wronged, make themselves the instruments and authors of

b Josephus (Ant. i. c.) characteristically glosses over all that connects the attack with the circumcision of the Shechemites, and represents it as made in a time of heating and rejoicing.

complies of the hatred which originated, we are zeal, with the laser-horn sons of the concubines (Gen. xxxvii. 2). Then comes for him, as for the others, the discipline of suffering and danger, the special education by which the brother whom they had wounded led them back to falsehood and natural alienation. The detention of Simeon in Egypt may have been designed at once to be the punishment for the large share which he had taken in the common crime, and to separate the two brothers who had hitherto been such close companions in evil. The discipline does its work. Those who had been relentless to Joseph became self-sacrificing for Benjamin.

After this we trace Levi as joining in the migration of the tribe that owned Jacob as its patriarch. He, with his three sons, Gershon, Kohath, Merari, went down into Egypt (Gen. xvi. 11). As one of the four eldest sons we may think of him as among the five (Gen. xvi. 2) that were specially presented before Pharaoh.a Then comes the last scene in which his name appears. When his father's death draws near, and the sons are gathered round him, he hears the old crime brought up again to receive its sentence from the lips that are no longer feeble and hesitating. They, no less than the incestuous first-born, had forfeited the privileges of their birthright. “In their anger they slew men, and in their wantonness they maimed oxen” (margin reading of A. V.: comp. LXX. ἐν ξυροτροφίᾳ ἐπεκυότον.) And therefore the sentence on those who had been united for evil was, that they were to be divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel.” How that condemnation was at once fulfilled and turned into a benediction, how the zeal of the patriarch reappeared purified and strengthened in his descendants; how the very name came to have a new significance, will be found elsewhere. [LEVITES.]

The history of Levi has been dealt with here in what seems the only true and natural way of treating it, as a history of an individual person. Of the theory that sees in the sons of Jacob the mythical Eponymic of the tribes that claimed descent from them—which finds in the crimes and chances of their lives the outlines of a national or tribal chronicle— which refuses to recognize that Jacob had twelve sons, and insists that the history of Dinah records an attempt on the part of the Canaanites to enslave and degrade a Hebrew tribe (Ewald, Geschichten, i. 406-496)—of this one may be content to say, as the author says of other hypotheses hardly more extravagant, “die Wissenschaft verschnechtet alle solche Gespenster” (dtbd. i. 406). The book of Genesis tells us of the lives of men and women, not of ethnological phantoms.

A yet wilder conjecture has been hazarded by another German critic. P. Redshaw (Die alttestamentl. Namen, Hamburg, 1846, pp. 24, 25), recognizing the meaning of the name of Levi as given above, finds in it evidence of the existence of a confederacy or council of the priests that had been connected with the several local worship of Canaan, and who, in the time of Samuel and Saul, were gathered together, “round the Central Pantheon in Jerusalem.” Here also we may borrow the terms of our judgment from the language of the writer himself. If there are “aiggeschmackten etymologischen Mühren” (Redshob, p. 82) connected with the name of Levi, they are hardly those we meet with in the narrative of Genesis. E. H. P.

2. (Aeβας: Rec. Text. Aeβ: Levi.) Son of Melchii, one of the near ancestors of Joseph, in fact the great-grandfather of Joseph (Luke iii. 24). This name is omitted in the list given by Africaus.

3. A more remote ancestor of Christ, son of Simeon (Luke iii. 29). Lord A. Hervey considers that the name of Levi reappears in his descendant Labbaeus (General of Christ, p. 132, and sect 30, 46).

LEVIAHAN (λεβιαθαν, λεβιαθαν, τὸ μέγα κυότος, δρακόντας: Leviathan, leviathan, devore) occurs five times in the text of the A. V., and once in the margin of Job iii. 9, where the margin has “serpent.” The name is found in the Bible the word λεβιαθαν which is, with the foregoing exception, always left untranslated in the A. V., is found only in the following passages: Job iii. 8, xlii. 25 (xliii. 5, A. V.); Ps. lixiv. 14, civ. 26; Is. xxvii. 1. In the margin of Job iii. 8, and text of Job xli. 16 the crocodile is most clearly the animal denoted by the Hebrew word. Ps. lixiv. 14 also clearly points to this same animal. The context of Is. xiv. 26, “There go the ships: there is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein,” seems to show that in this passage the name represents some animal of the whole tribe: but it is somewhat uncertain what animal is denoted in Is. xxvii. 1. It would be out of place here to attempt any detailed explanation of the passages quoted above, but the following remarks are offered. The passage in Job iii. 8 is best with difficulties, and it is evident from the two widely different readings of the text and margin that our translators were at a loss. There can however be little doubt that the margin is the correct rendering, and this is supported by the LXX., Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus, the Vulgate and the Syriac. There appears to be some reference to those who practiced enchantments. Job is lamenting the day on which he was born, and he says, “Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up a leviathan: i. e. c. Let those be hired to implicate evil on my natal day who say they are able by their incantations to render days propitious or unpropitious, yea, let such as are skillful enough to raise up even leviathan (the crocodile) from his watery bed, be summoned to curse that day;” c. F. Mason Good has translated the passage, “O! that night! let it be a barren rock! let no sprites issue into it! let the serpents of the day curse it; the expert among them that can conjure up leviathan!”

The detailed description of leviathan given in Job xli. indisputably belongs to the crocodile, and it is astonishing that it should ever have been understood to apply to a whale or a dolphin; but Levi (Gen. c. Job xli.), following Haunou (Planc. de lrv. Job et Cot. Jomn. Brux., 1723), has labored hard, though unsuccessfully, to prove that the leviathan of this passage is some species of whale, probably, he says, the Delphinus oreo, or common grampus. That it can be said to be the pride of any cetacean that his "scales shut up together as with a close seal," is an assertion that no one can accept, since every member of this group has a body almost hald and smooth.

The Egyptian crocodile also is certainly the animal denoted by levithan in Ps. xxviii. 14: "a Thon, O God, didst destroy the princes of Pharaoh, the great crocodile or dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers." (Ex. xxviii. 3) in the Red Sea, and didst give their bodies to be food for the wild beasts of the desert." The levithan of Ps. civ. 21 seems clearly enough to allude to some great cetacean. The "great and wide sea" must surely be the Mediterranean, "the great sea," as it is usually called in Scripture; it would certainly be stretching the point too far to understand the expression to represent any part of the Nile. The crocodile, as is well known, is a fresh-water, not a marine animal; it is very probable therefore that some whale is signified by the term levithan in this passage, and it is quite an error to assert, as Dr. Harris (Dict. Nat. Hist. Bib.), Mason Good (Book of Job translated), Michaelis (Suppl.), and Rosenmuller (quoting Michaelis in not. ad Bochart Hist. i. 738) have done, that the whale is not found in the Mediterranean. The Orex gladiator (Gray)—the grampus mentioned above by Lee—the Phygelus antiquarius (Gray), or the River-crocodile of the Mediterranean (Cuvier), are not uncommon in the Mediterranean (Fis. her. Synops. Mar. 525, and Lacépède, H. N. des Cétac. 115), and in ancient times the species may have been more numerous.

There is some uncertainty about the levithan of Is. xxvii. 1. Rosenmüller (Schol. in l. c.) thinks that the word narkus, here rendered serpent, is to be taken in a wide sense as applicable to any monster; and that the prophet, under the term "levithan that crooked serpent," is speaking of Egypt, typified by the crocodile, the usual emblem of the prince of that kingdom. The Chaldee paraphrase understands the "levithan that piercing serpent" to refer to Pharaoh, and "levithan that crooked serpent" to refer to Sennacherib.

As the term levithan is evidently used in no limited sense, it is not improbable that the "levithan the piercing serpent," or "levithan the crooked serpent," may denote some species of the great rock-snakes (Bohier) which are common in South and West Africa, perhaps the Boa cuboidea, which Schneider (Anph. ii. 266), under the synonym Boa hieroglyphica, appears to identity with the huge serpent represented on the Egyptian monuments. This python, as well as the crocodile, was worstriped by the Egyptians, and may well therefore be understood in this passage to typify the Egyptian power. Perhaps the English word monster may be considered to be as good a translation of liyiththâh as any other that can be found; and though the crocodile seems to be the animal more particularly denoted by the Hebrew term. yet, as has been shown, the whale, and perhaps the rock-snake also, may be signified under this name. [WHALE.] Bochart (iii. 760, ed. Rosenmüller) says that the Talmudists use the word liyiththâh to denote the crocodile; this however is denied by Lewysohn (Zoöl. des Tuls. pp. 155, 593), who says that in the Talmud it always denotes a whale, and never a crocodile. For the Talmudical fables about the levithan, see Lewysohn (Zool. des Tuls.), in passages referred to above, and Buxtorf, Lex. Chal. Tula. s. v. leviththâh. W. H.

LEVIS (Aevus; [Vat. Aevus] Lervis), improperly given as a proper name in 1 Esdr. ix. 14. It is simply a corruption of the Levite in Ezr x. 15.

LE'VITES (אֱלִיִּטֵים) [Aevitae; [Vat. -ei-]: Levites: also לֶבְיִים [Vat. Aevi]; Bllī Levī]). The analogy of the names of the other tribes of Israel would lead us to include under these titles the whole tribe that traced its descent from Levi. The existence of another division, however, within the tribe itself, in the higher office of the priesthood as limited to the "sons of Aaron," gave to the common form, in this instance, a peculiar meaning. Most frequently the Levites of a contest between these animals. Cuvier thinks that a species of dogfish is meant (Aenbates vulgatius), on account of the dorsal spines of which Piley speaks, and which no species of dolphin possesses.

a The modern Arabic name of crocodile is rimâs. The word is derived from the Coptic, enas, ams, whence with the aspirate yâsûm (Herod. ii. 38). Wilkins, however (de L. Copt. p. 101), contends that the word is of Arabic origin. See Joublasson. Opera i. 867, 257, ed. To Water, 1804.
b The "people inhabiting the wilderness," a poetical expression to denote the wild beasts; comp. "the ants are not a strong people," "the conies are but a feeble folk." (Prov. xxx. 25, 26). For other interpretations of this passage see Rosenmüller, Schätz, and Bochart Psalms, p. 318.
c According to Warburton (Ceres. & Gr. 85), the crocodile is never now seen below Minyeh, but it should be stated that Pliny (N. H. viii. 25), not Herodotus, as Mr. Warburton asserts, speaks of crocodiles being attacked by dolphins at Cæ month of the Nile. Seneca (Nat. Questiv. iv. 2) gives an account of a contest between these animals. Cuvier thinks that a species of dogfish is meant (Aenbates vulgatius), on account of the dorsal spines of which Piley speaks, and which no species of dolphin possesses.
d The Heb. word לָכְו occurs about thirty times in the O. T., and it seems clear enough that in every case its use is limited to the serpent tribe. If the LXX. interpretation of לָכְו be taken, the fertile a. 1 not piercing serpent is the rendering: the Heb. לָכְו לָכְו is tortuus, is more applicable to a serpent than to any other animal. The expression, "He shall slay the dragon that is in the sea," refers also to the Egyptian power, and is merely expressive — the dragon being the crocodile, which is in this part of the verse an emblem of Pharaoh, as the serpent is in the former part of the verse.
are distinguished, as such, from the priests (1 K. viii. 4; Ezr. ii. 70; John i. 13, &c.), and this is the meaning which has perpetuated itself. Sometimes the word extends to the whole tribe, the priest included (Num. xxxii. 2; Josh. xxi. 3, 41; Ex. vi. 20; Lev. xxv. 32, &c.). Sometimes again it is added as an epithet of the smaller portion of the tribe and of the "priests the Levites." (Josh. iii. 3; Ez. xlv. 15). The history of the tribe, and of the functions attached to its several orders, is obviously essential to any right apprehension of the history of Israel as a people. They are the representatives of its faith, the ministers of its worship. They play at least as prominent a part in the growth of its institutions, in fostering or in pressing the higher life of the nation, as the clergy of the Christian Church have played in the history of any European kingdom. It will be the object of this article to trace the outlines of that history, marking out the functions which at different periods were assigned to the tribe, and the influence which its members exercised. This is, it is believed, a truer method than that which would attempt to give a more complete picture by combing into one whole the fragmentary notices which are separated from each other by wide intervals of time, or treating them as if they represented the permanent characteristics of the order. In the history of all priestly or quasi-priestly bodies, functions vary with the changes of time and circumstances, and to ignore those changes is a sufficient proof of incompetency for dealing with the history. As a matter of convenience, whatever belongs exclusively to the functions and influence of the priesthood will be found under that head [Priests]; but it is proposed to treat here of all that is common to the priests and Levites, as being together the sacerdotal tribe, the "priests of Israel." The history will fall naturally into four great periods

I. The time of the Exodus.
II. The period of the Judges.
III. That of the Monarchy.
IV. That from the Captivity to the destruction of Jerusalem.

I. The absence of all reference to the consecrated character of the Levites in the book of Genesis is noticeable enough. The prophecy ascribed to Jacob (Gen. xlix. 5-7) was indeed fulfilled with singular precision; but the terms of the prophecy are hardly such as would have been framed by a later writer, after the tribe had gained its subsequent prominence; and unless we frame some hypothesis to account for this omission as deliberate, it takes its place, so far as it goes, among the evidences of the antiquity of that section of Genesis in which these prophecies are found. The only occasion on which the priesthead of the tribe appears — the massacre of the Shechemites — may indeed have contributed to influence the history of his descendants, by fostering in them the same fierce wild zeal against all that threatened the purity of their race; but generally what strikes us is the absence of all recognition of the later character. In the genealogy of Gen. xvi. 11, in like manner, the list does not go lower than the three sons of Levi, and they are given in the order of their birth, not in that which would have corresponded to the official superiority of the Kohathites. There are no signs, again, that the tribe of Levi had any special precedence over the others during the Egyptian bondage. As tracing its descent from Leah, it would take its place among the six chief tribes sprung from the wives of Jacob, and share with them a recognized superiority over those that bore the names of the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah. Within the tribe itself there are some slight tokens that the Kohathites are gaining the first place. The classification of Ex. vi. 16-25 gives to that section of the tribe four clans or houses, while those of Gershon and Merari have but two each. To it belonged the house of Amram; and "Aaron the Levite" (Ex. iv. 14) is spoken of as one to whom the people will be sure to listen. He marries the daughter of the chief of the tribe of Judah (Ex. vi. 23). The work accomplished by him, and by his yet greater brother, would tend naturally to give prominence to the family and the tribe to which they belonged; but as yet there are no traces of a caste-character, no signs of any intention to establish an hereditary priesthood. Up to this time the Israelites had worshipped the God of their fathers after their fathers' manner. The first-born of the people were the priests of the people. The eldest son of each house inherited the priestly office. His youth made him, in his father's lifetime, the representative of the purity which was connected from the beginning with the thought of worship (Ewald, Afterthwm. p. 273, and comp. Priest). It was apparently with this as their ancestral worship that the Israelites came up out of Egypt. The "young men" of the sons of Israel offer sacrifices (Ex. xxv. 5). They, we may infer, are the priests who remain with the people while Moses ascends the heights of Sinai (xx. 22-24). They represented the truth that the whole people were "a kingdom of priests" (xix. 6). Neither they, nor the "officials and judges" appointed to assist Moses in a Ewald (Gesch. ii. 454) refers the language of Gen. xlix. 7 not to the distribution of the Levites in their 1st cite, but to the time when they had fallen into iniquity, and become, as in Judg. xxi., a wander- ing, intransigent order. But see Kalisch, Genesis, vol. i.

b The later genealogies, it should be noticed, reproduce the same order. This was natural enough; but a genealogy originating in a later age, and reflecting its feelings, would probably have changed the order. (Comp. Ex. vi. 16, Num. iii. 17, 1 Chr. vi. 16.)
c As the names of the lesser houses recur, some of them frequently, it may be well to give them here.

"This is expressly stated in the Targ. Pseudoon this verse: "And he sent the first-born of the Ch

administering justice (xviii. 25) are connected in any special manner with the tribe of Levi. The first step towards a change was made in the institution of a hereditary priesthood in the family of Aaron, during the first withdrawal of Moses to the solitude of Sinai (xxviii. 1). This, however, was one thing: it was quite another to set apart a whole tribe of Israel as a priestly caste. The directions given for the construction of the tabernacle imply no preeminence of the Levites. The chief workmanship in it is done by the Levites and the tribe of Judah and of Dan (Ex. xxi. 2-6). The next extension of the idea of the priesthood grew out of the terrible crisis of Ex. xxxii. If the Levites had been sharers in the sin of the golden calf, they were at any rate the foremost to rally round their leader when he called on them to help him in stemming the progress of the evil. And then came that terrible consecration of themselves, when every man was against his son and against his brother, and the offering with which they filled their hands (יִבְעָסֹת סֹחֲרָה, Ex. xxxii. 23, comp. Ex. xxvii. 41) was the blood of their nearest of kin. The tribe stood forth, separate and apart, recognizing even in this stern work the spiritual as higher than the natural, and therefore conformed worthily to be the custodians of that sacred life of the people, 'an Israel within an Israel' (Ewalt, Alterheim, p. 279), chosen in its higher representatives to offer incense and burnt-sacrifice before the Lord (Deut. xxxiii. 9, 10), not without a share in the glory of the Urin and Thummim that were worn by the prince and chief-tain of the tribe. From this time accordingly they occupied a distinct position. Experience had shown how easily the people might fall back into idolatry how necessary it was that there should be a body of men, an order, numerically large, and when the people were in their promised home, equally diffused throughout the country, as witnesses and guardians of the truth. Without this the individualism of the older worship would have been fruitful in an ever-multiplying idolatry. The tribe of Levi was therefore to take the place of that earlier priesthood of the first-born as representatives of the holiness of the people. This was the case in the consecration of this tribe, the purpose of which was to be drawn to the fact of the substitution by the close numerical correspondence of the consecrated tribe with that of those whom they replaced. The first-born males were numbered, and found to be 22,273; the census of the Levites gave 22,000, reckoning in each case from children of one month upwards a (Num. iii.). The fixed price for the redemption of a victim vowed in sacrifice (comp. Lev. xxvii. 6; Num. xviii. 16) was to be paid for each of the odd number by which the first-born were in excess of the Levites (Num. iii. 47). In this way the latter obtained a sacrificial as well as a priestly character. b They for the first-born of men, and their cattle for the firstlings of beasts, fulfilled the idea that had been asserted at the time of the destruction of the first-born of Egypt (Ex. xiii. 12, 13). The commencement of the march from Sinai gave a prominence to their new character. As the Tabernacle was the sign of the presence among the people of their unseen King so the Levites were, among the other tribes of Israel, as the royal guard that waited exclusively on Him. The wardlike title of 'host' is specially applied to them (comp. use of צְבָאֹת, in Num. iv. 3, 39; and of צְבָאֹת, in 1 Chr. ix. 19). As such they were not included in the number of the armies of Israel (Num. i. 47, ii. 33, xxvi. 62), but reckoned separately by themselves. When the people were at rest they encamped as guardians round the sacred tent; no one else might come near it under pain of death (Num. i. 51, xviii. 22). They were to occupy a middle position in that ascending scale of consecration, which, starting from the idea of the whole nation as a priestly people, reached its culminating point in the high-priest who, alone of all the people, might enter 'within the veil.' The Levites might come nearer than the other tribes: but they might not sacrifice, nor burn incense, nor see the 'holy things' of the sanctuary till they were covered (Num. iv. 13). When on the march, no host but theirs might strike the tent at the commencement of the day's journey, or carry the parts of its structure during it, or pitch the tent once again when they halted (Num. i. 51). It was obviously essential for such a work that there should be a fixed assignment of duties; and now accordingly we meet with the first outlines of the organization which afterwards became permanent. The division of the tribe into the three sections that traced their descent from the sons of Levi, formed the groundwork of it. The work which they all had to do required a man's full strength, and therefore, though twenty was the starting-point for military service (Num. i.) they were not to enter on their active service till they were thirty (Num. iv. 23, 30, 35). At fifty they were to be free from all duties but those of superintendence (Num. viii. 25, 26). The result of this limitation gave to the Kohathites 2,750 on active service out of 8,900: to the sons of Gershon 2,630 out of 7,560; to those of Merari 3,290 out of 6,290 (Num. iv.). Of these the Kohathites, as nearest of kin to the priests, held from the first the highest offices. They were to bear all the vessels of the sanctuary, the ark itself included d (Num. iii. 31, iv. 15; Deut. xxxi. 25), after the priests had covered them with the dark-blue cloth which was to hide them from all profane gaze: and thus they became also the guar-

a The separate numbers in Num. iii. (Gershom, 7,500; Kohath, 8,900; Merari, 6,290) give a total of 23,380. The received solution of the discrepancy is that 300 were the first-born of the Levites, who as such were already consecrated, and therefore could not take the place of others. Talmudic traditions (Genar. R. wisdom, 2. Sankdruin, quoted by Patrick) add that the question, which of the Israelites should be redeemed by a Levite, or which should pay the five shekels, was settled by lot. The number of the first-born appears disproportionately small, as compared with the population. It must be remembered, however, that the conditions to be fulfilled were that they should be at (1) the first child of the father, (2) the first child of the mother, (3) males. (Comp. on this question, and on that of the difference of numbers, Kurtz, History of the Old Covenant, iii. 20.)

c The mention of twenty-five in Num. viii. 24, as the age of entrance, must be understood either of a probationary period during which they were trained for their offices, or of the length of the time of the tabernacle. The ages of the tabernacle.

dians of all the sacred treasures which the people had so freely offered. The Gershonites, in their turn, had to carry the tent-hangings and curtains (Num. iv. 22-26). The heavier burden of the boards, bars, and pillars of the Tabernacle fell on the sons of Merari. The two latter companies were allowed, however, to use the oxen and the wagons which were furnished for the carrying of the congregation, in consideration of its heavier work, having two-thirds of the number (Num. vii. 1-9). The more sacred vessels of the Kohathites were to be borne by them on their own shoulders (Num. vii. 9). The Kohathites in this arrangement were placed under the command of Eleazar, Gershon and Merari under Ithamar (Num. iv. 28, 33). Before the march began, the whole tribe was once again solemnly set apart. The rites (some of them at least) were such as the people might have witnessed in Egypt, and all would understand their meaning. Their clothes were to be washed. They themselves, as if they were, prior to their separation, polluted and unclea, like the leper, or those that had touched the dead, were to be sprinkled with water of purifying (Num. vii. 7, comp. with xix. 13; Lev. xiv. 8, 9), and then to cleave their flesh. They were then to lay their hands upon the heads of the consecrated tribe and offer them up as their representatives (Num. vii. 10). Aaron, as high-priest, was then to present them as a wave-offering (turning them, i.e. this way and that; while they bowed themselves to the four points of the compass), comp. Abaranadl on Num. vii. 11, and Kuritz, iii. 208, in token that all their powers of mind and body were henceforth to be devoted to that service. They, in their turn, were to lay their hands on the two bullocks which were to be slain as a sin-offering and burnt-offering for an atonement (יִנְטָא, Num. viii. 12). Then they entered on their work; from one point of view given by the people to Jehovah, from another given by Jehovah to Aaron and his sons (Num. iii. 9, viii. 19, xviii. 6). Their very name is turned into an mon, that they will elevate to the service of the Lord (comp. the play on וְיָנֶס in Num. xviii. 2, 4).

The new institution was, however, to receive a severe shock from those who were most interested in it. The section of the Levites whose position brought them into contact with the tribe of Reuben's required with it to receive the oil patriarchal system of a household priesthood. The leader of that revolt may have been impelled by a desire to gain the same height as that which Aaron had attained; but the ostensible pretext, that the "whole congregation were holy" (Num. xvi. 3), was one which would have cut away all the distinctive privileges of the tribe of which he was a member. When their self-willed ambition had been punished, when all danger of the sons of Levi "taking upon them" was for the time checked, it was time also to provide more definitely for them, and so to give them more reason to be satisfied with what they actually had; and this involved a permanent organization for the future, as well as for the present. If they were to have, like other tribes, a distinct territory assigned to them, their influence over the people at large would be diminished, and they themselves would be likely to forget, in labors common to them with others, their own peculiar calling. Jehovah therefore was to be their inheritance (Num. xviii. 29; Deut. x. 9, xviii. 2). They were to have no territorial possessions. In place of them they were to receive from the others the tithes of the produce of the land, from which they, in their turn, offered a tithe to the priests, as a recognition of their higher consecration (Num. xviii. 21, 24, 26; Neh. x. 37). As if to provide for the contingency of failing crops or the like, and the consequent inadequacy of the tithes thus assigned to them, the Levite, not less than the widow and the stranger, was to share the special kindness of the people (Deut. xii. 19, xiv. 27, 29). When the wanderings of the people should be over and the tabernacle have a settled place, great part of the labor that had fallen on them would come to an end, and they too would need a fixed abode. Concentration round the Tabernacle would lead to evils nearly as great, though of a different kind, as an assignment of special territory. Their ministerial character might thus be intensified, but their preserving influence as witnesses and teachers would be sacrificed to it. Distinction and diffusion were both to be secured by the assignment to the whole tribe (the priests included) of forty-eight cities, with an outlying "suburb" (יִנְטָא, Num. xxxv. 2), of meadow-land for the pasturage of their flocks and herds. The reverence of the people for them was to be heightened by the selection of six of these cities of refuge, in which the Levites were to present themselves as the protectors of the fugitives who, though they had not incurred the guilt, were yet liable to the punishment of murder. How rapidly the feeling of reverence gained strength, we may judge from the fact that within the space of thirty years it was extended to the men and women of the conquered Midianites (Num. xxxi. 27, 46). The same victory led to the dedication of gold and silver vessels of great value, and thus increased the importance of the tribe as guardians of the national treasures (Num. xxxi. 50-54).

The book of Deuteronomy is interesting as indicating more clearly than had been done before a Comp. the analogous practice differing, however, in being constantly repeated of the Egyptian priest (Herod. II. 37; comp. Strabo, De Leg. Heb. ii. 5. c. 5). b Solomon, as this dedication is, it fell short of the consecration of the priests, and was expressed by a different word. פְּעַר. The Levites were purified, not consecrated (comp. Gesen. s. v. יָנֶס and יָנֶס). c 15. c. "Levi," in Herzog's Real-Encycl. d In the encampment in the wilderness, the sons of Aaron occupied the foremost place of honor on the west. The Kohathites were at their right, on the south, the Gershonites to their west, the sons of Merari on the north of the tabernacle. On the south were Sebbeun, Simon, and Gad (Num. ii. and iii.). e Heliodorus (Strabo, xvii. 1), Thales and Memnon in Egypt, and Benaues in Hindustan, have been referred to as parallels. The segregation of priests round a great national sanctuary, so as to make it as it were the centre of a collegiate life, was however different in its object and results from that of the polity of Israel. (Comp. Ewald, i. 402.) f The impulse of giving a sacred character to such an asylum is sufficient to account for the assignment of the cities of refuge to the Levites. Philo, however, with his characteristic love of an inner meaning, sees in it the truth that the Levites themselves, were led to flee to the cities of refuge from the world of sense, who had found their place of refuge in God.

The sole occupiers of the cities thus allotted, or whether — as the rule for the redemption of their houses in Lev. xxv. 32 might seem to indicate — others were allowed to reside when they had been provided for, must remain uncertain. The principle of a widely diffused influence was maintained by allotting, as a rule, four cities from the district of each tribe; but it is interesting to notice how, in the details of the distribution, the divisions of the Levites in the order of their precedence coincided with the relative importance of the tribes with which they were connected. The following table will help the reader to form a judgment on this point, and to trace the influence of the tribe in the subsequent events of Jewish history.3

The scanty memorials that are left us in the book of Judges fail to show how far, for any length of time, the reality answered to the idea. The ravages of invasion, and the pressure of an alien rule, marred the working of the organization which seemed so perfect. Levitical cities, such as Aljabin (Josh. xxiv. 24; Judg. i. 35) and Gezer (Josh. xxxi. 21; 1 Chr. vi. 67), fall into the hands of their enemies. Sometimes, as in the case of Nob, others apparently took their place. The wandering, unsettled habits of the Levites who are mentioned in the later chapters of Judges, are probably to be traced to this loss of a fixed abode, and the consequent necessity of taking refuge in other cities, even though their tribe as such had no portion in them. The tendency of the people to fall into the idolatry of the neighboring nations, showed either that the Levites failed to bear their witness to the truth or had no power to enforce it. Even in the lifetime of Phinehas, when the high-priest was still consulted as an oracle, the reverence which the people felt for the tribe of Levi becomes the occasion of a rival worship (Judg. xviii.). The old household priesthood revives, and there is the risk of the national worship breaking up into individualism. Meah first consecrates one of his own sons, and then tempts a helpless Levite to dwell with him as "a father and a priest " for little more

David in later wars, who were assigned to the service of the Tabernacle, replacing possibly the Gibonites who had been slain by Saul (2 Sam. xxii. 1).
For the local position of the forty-eight Levitical cities, as distributed among the different tribes, see especially Pinto iv. No. 9 (p. 27) in Clark's "Bible Atlas of Mapa and Plans" (Lon. 1908). For convenience of reference small capitals are employed to distinguish the Priests' cities, the letter R to distinguish the cities of refuge, and an asterisk to denote those which are not identified.

Twenty out of the forty-eight belong to this third class.

Compare, on the extent of this relapse into an earlier system, Kalsich, On transes, xlix. 7.

a This phraseology, characteristic of Deuteronomy and Joshua, appears to indicate that the functions spoken of belonged to them as the chief members of the sacred tribe, as a clergy rather than as priests in the narrower sense of the word.

b To this there is one remarkable exception. Deut. viii. 6 provides for a permanent dedication as the result of personal zeal going beyond the fixed period of service that came in rotation, and entailed accordingly to its reward.

c Comp. as indicating their presence and functions at a later date, 1 Chr. xxv. 5, 6.

d The Nethinim (Deo datti) of 1 Chr. ix. 2, Ezr. 4:43 were probably sprung from captives taken by 3 Other functions, over and above their ministrations in the Tabernacle, which were to be allotted to the tribe of Levi. Through the whole land they were to take the place of the old household priests (subject, of course, to the special rights of the Aaronic priesthood), sharing in all festivals and rejoicings (Deut. xii. 19, xiv. 26, 27, xxvi. 11). Every third year they were to have an additional share in the produce of the land (Deut. xiv. 28, xxvi. 12). The people were charged never to forsake them. To the priests the Levites 4 a was to belong; the office of preserving, transcribing, and interpreting the Law (Deut. xvi. 9—12; xxvi. 25).

They were solemnly to read it every seventh year at the Feast of Tabernacles (Deut. xxxi. 9—13). They were to pronounce the curses from Mount Ebal (Deut. xxvii. 14).

Such, if one may so speak, was the ideal of the religious organization which was present to the mind of the lawgiver. Details were left to be developed as the altered circumstances of the people might require.4 The great principle was, that the warrior-caste who had guarded the tent of the captain of the hosts of Israel, should be throughout the land as witnesses that the people still owed allegiance to Him. It deserves notice that, as yet, with the exception of the few passages that refer to the priests, no traces appear of their character as a learned caste, and of the work which afterwards belonged to them as hymn-writers and musicians. The hymns of this period were probably occasional, not recurring (comp. Ex. xv.; Num. xii. 17; Deut. xxxii.). Women bore a large share in singing them (Ex. xv. 20; Ps. lxxviii. 25). It is not unlikely that the wives and daughters of the Levites, who must have been with them in all their encampments, as afterwards in their cities, took the foremost part among the damsels playing with their timbrels,6 or among the wise-hearted, who wove hangings for the decoration of the Tabernacle. There are at any rate signs of their presence there, in the mention of the "women that assembled" at its door (Ex. xxxvii. 8, and comp. Ewald, Altertum, p. 297).

II. The successor of Moses, though belonging to another tribe, did faithfully all that could be done to convert this idea into a reality. The submission of the Gibeonites, after they had obtained a promise that their lives should be spared, enabled him to relieve the tribe-divisions of Gershon and Merari of the most burdensome of their duties. The conquered Hivites became 7 hewers of wood and drawers of water 7 for the house of Jehovah and for the congregation (Josh. ix. 27).9 As soon as the conquerors had advanced far enough to proceed to a partition of the country, the forty-eight cities were assigned to them. Whether they were to be the than his food and raiment. The Levite, though probably the grandson of Moses himself, repeats the sin of Korah. [JOHANNES.] First in the house of Mieah, and then for the emigrants of Dan, he exercises the office of a priest with an anaphor, and a turban and a golden image. "With this exception the whole tribe appears to have fallen into a condition analogous to that of the clergy in the darkest period and in the most outlying districts of the Medieval Church, going through a ritual routine, but exercising no influence for good, at once corrupted and corrupting. The shameless license of the sons of Eli may be looked upon as the result of a long period of decay, affecting the whole order. When the priests were such as Hophni and Phinehas, we may fairly assume that the Levites were not doing much to sustain the moral life of the people.

The work of Samuel was the starting point of a better time. Himself a Levite, and, though not a priest, belonging to that section of the Levites which was nearest to the priesthood (1 Chr. vi. 28), adopted, as it were, by a special dedication, into the priestly line and trained for its office. (1 Sam. ii. 18.) He appears as infusing a fresh life, the author of a new organization. There is no reason to think, indeed, that the companies or schools of the sons of the prophets which appear in his time (1 Sam. x. 5), and are traditionally said to have been founded by him, consisted exclusively of Levites: but there are many signs that the members of that tribe formed a large element in the new order, and received new strength from it. It exhibited, indeed, the ideal of the Levite life as one of praise, devotion, teaching, standing in the same relation to the priests and Levites generally as the monastic institutions of the fifth century, or the mendicant orders of the thirteenth, did to the secular clergy of Western Europe. The fact that the Levites were thus brought under the influence of a system which addressed itself to the mind and heart in a greater degree than the sacrificial functions of the priesthood, may possibly have led them to apprehend the higher truths as to the nature of worship which begin to be asserted from this period, and which are nowhere prechained more clearly than in the great hymn that bears the name of Asaph (Ps. I. 7-15). The man who raises the name of prophet to a new significance is himself a Levite (1 Sam. ix. 9). It is among them that we find the first signs of that prophetic spirit which eventually pervades all Levites (1 Sam. x. 5). The order in which the Temple services were arranged is ascribed to two of the prophets, Nathan and Gad (2 Chr. xxix. 25), who must have grown up under Samuel’s superintendence, and in part to Samuel himself (1 Chr. ix. 22). Asaph and Heman, the Psalmists, bear the same title as Samuel the Seer (1 Chr. xxv. 3; 2 Chr. xxix. 30). The very term “prophesying” is applied not only to sudden bursts of song, but to the organized psalmody of the Temple (1 Chr. xxv. 2, 3). Even of those who bore the name of a prophet in a higher sense, a large number are traceable of this tribe.

III. The capture of the Ark by the Philistines did not entirely interrupt the worship of the Israelites, and the ministrations of the Levites went on, first at Shiloh (1 Sam. xiv. 3), then for a time at Nob (1 Sam. xxii. 11), afterwards at Gibea (1 K. iii. 3; 1 Chr. xvi. 39). The history of the return of the ark to Beth-shemesh after its capture by the Philistines, and its subsequent removal to Kirjath-jearim, points apparently to some strange complications, rising out of the anomalies of this period, and affecting, in some measure, the position of the tribe of Levi. Beth-shemesh was, by the original assignment of the conquered country, one of the cities of the priests (Josh. xxi. 15). They, however, do not appear in the narrative, unless we assume, against all probability, that the men of Beth-shemesh who were guilty of the act of profanation were themselves of the priestly order. Levites indeed are mentioned as doing their appointed work (1 Sam. vi. 15), but the sacrifices and burnt-offerings are offered by the men of the city, as though the special function of the priestly order had been usurped by others: and on this supposition it is easier to understand how those who had set aside the Law of Moses by one offense should defy it also by another. The singular reading of the LXX., in 1 Sam. xvi. 19 (και αυτοι γενναται εις τον άνθρωπον Βασιλευς οτι εδωκεν κυριος Κωρμον), indicates, if we assume that it rests upon some corresponding Hebrew text, a struggle between two opposed parties, one guilty of the profanation, the other — possibly the Levites who had been before mentioned — zealous in their renouncemances against it. Then comes, either as the result of this collision, or by direct supernatural influence, the great slaughter of the Beth-shemites, and they shrink from retaining the ark any longer among them. The great Eben (stone) becomes, by a slight paronomastic change in its form, the “great Abiel” (demonetation), and the name remains as a memorial of the sin and of its punishment. [BETHSHEM+EH.] We are left entirely in the dark as to the reasons which led them, after this, to send the ark of Jehovah, not to Hebron or some other priestly city, but to Kirjath-jearim, round which, so far as we know, there gathered legitimately no sacred associations. It has been commonly assumed indeed that Abinadab, under whose guardianship it remained for twenty years, must necessarily have been of the tribe of Levi. [ABINADAB.] Of this, however, there is not the slightest direct evidence, and which is certain is that there is the language of David in 1 Chr. xv. 2, “Nehemiah, tempestuous, and fury of God, hath taken the ark, the Levites, for them hath Jehovah chosen,” which would lose half its force if it were not meant as a protest against a recent innovation, and the ground of a return to the more ancient order. So far as one can see one’s way through these perplexities of a dark period, the most probable explanation — already suggested under KIRJATH-JEARIM — seems to be the following. The old names of Baal-ash (Josh. xvi. 9) and Kirjath-lain (Josh. xv. 69) suggest there had been of old some special sanctity attached to the place as the centre of a Canaanite local worship. The fact that the ark was taken to the house of Abinadab in the bill (1 Sam. vii. 1; the Gibeah of 2 Sam. vi. 3, connects itself with that old Canaanite reverence for high places, which through the whole history of the Israelites, continued to have such strong attractions for them. These may have seemed to the panic-stricken inhabitants of that district, mingling old things and new, the worship of Jehovah with the lingering superstitions of the con quer ed people, sufficient grounds to determine their choice of a locality. The conversion (the word used is the special sacerdotal term) of Eleazar as the guardian of the ark is, on this hypothesis, analogous in its way to the other irregular assumptions which characterize this period, though here the offense was less flagrant, and did not involve apparently the performance of any sacrificial acts. While, however, this aspect of the religious condition of the people brings us to the question of the priests, we should here note that as having lost the position they had previously occupied, there were other influences at work tending to reestablish them.

The rule of Samuel and his sons, and the prophetic character now connected with the tribe, tended to give them the position of a ruling caste. In the strong desire of the people for a king, we may perhaps trace a protest against the assumption by the Levites of a higher position than that originally assigned. The reign of Saul, in its later period, was at any rate the assertion of a self-willed power against the priestly order. The assumption of the sacrificial office, the massacre of the priests at Nob, the slaughter of the Gibeonites who were attached to their service, were parts of the same policy, and the narrative of the condemnation of Saul for the two former sins, no less than of the expiation required for the latter (2 Sam. xxv.), shows by what strong measures the truth, of which that policy was a subversion, had to be impressed on the minds of the Israelites. The reign of David, however, brought the change from persecution to honor. The Levites were ready to welcome a king who, though not of their tribe, had been brought up under their training, was skilled in their arts, prepared to share even in some of their ministrations, and to array himself in their apparel (2 Sam. vi. 14), and 4,680 of their number with 3,700 priests waited upon David at Hebron—itself, it should be remembered, one of the priestly cities—to tender their allegiance (1 Chr. xii. 26). When his kingdom was established, there came a fuller organization of the whole tribe. Its position in relation to the priesthood was once again definitely recognized. When the ark was carried up to its new resting-place in Jerusalem, their claim to be the bearers of it was publicly acknowledged (1 Chr. xvi. 2). When the sin of Uzzah stopped the procession, it was placed for a time under the care of Obed-Edom of Gath—probably Gath-rimmon—as one of the chief of the Kohathites (1 Chr. xiii. 13; Josh. xxii. 24; 1 Chr. xiv. 18).

In the procession which attended the ultimate conveyance of the ark to its new resting-place, the Levites were conspicuous, wearing their linen ephod, and appearing in their new character as mina There are 24 courses of the priests, 24,000 Levites in the general business of the Temple (1 Chr. xxiii. 4). The number of singers is 295 = 12 x 24 (1 Chr. xxv. 1).

b There is, however, a curious Jewish tradition that the schoolmasters of Israel were of the tribe of Simeon (Solum Jarchi on Ge. xvi. 7, in Godseya's Mishn. and Talm.).

c In 1 Chr. ii. 6 the four names of 1 K. iv. 31 appear belonging to the tribe of Judah, and in the second generation after Jacob. On the other hand, the strels (1 Chr. xxv. 27, 28). In the worship of the Tabernacle under David, as afterwards in that of the Temple, we may trace a development of the simpler arrangements of the wilderness and of Shiloh. The Levites were the gatekeepers, vergers, sacristans, choirsisters of the central sanctuary of the nation. They were, in the list of Levites, 24:32, to which we may refer as almost the locus classicus on this subject, "to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the house of Jehovah, in the courts, and the chambers, and the purifying of all holy things." This included the duty of providing for the shew-bread, and the fine flour for meat-offering, and for the unleavened bread. They were to study the mystery of God, to praise Jehovah, and likewise at events. They were lastly to "offer"—i. e., to assist the priests in offering—all burnt-sacrifices to Jehovah in the sabbaths and on the set feasts. They lived for the greater part of the year in their own cities, and came up at fixed periods to take their turn of work (1 Chr. xxv., xxvi.). How long it lasted we have no sufficient data for determining. The predominance of the Levites as a military element in the nation might seem to indicate monthly periods, and the festivals of the new moon would naturally suggest such an arrangement. The analogous order in the civil and military administration (1 Chr. xxvii. 1) would tend to the same conclusion. It appears, indeed, that there was a change of some kind every week (1 Chr. ix. 25; 2 Chr. xiii. 4, 8); but this is of course compatible with a system of rotation, which would give to each a longer period of residence, or with the permanent residence of the leader of each division within the precincts of the sanctuary. Whatever may have been the system, we must bear in mind that the duties now imposed upon the Levites were such as to require almost continuous practice. They would need, when their turn came, to be able to bear their parts in the great choral hymns of the Temple, and to take each his appointed share in the complex structure of a sacrificial liturgy, and for this a special study would be required. The education which the Levites received for their peculiar duties, no less than their connection, more or less intimate, with the schools of the prophets (see above), would tend to make them, so far as there was any obligation at all, the teachers of others; the transgressors and interpreters of the Law, the chroniclers of the times in which they lived. We have some striking instances of their appearance in this new character. One of them, Ethan the Ezrahite, takes his place among the old Hebrew sages who were worthy to be compared with Solomon, and (Ps. xxxix. title) his name appears as the writer of the 8th Psalm (1 K. iv. 31; 1 Chr. xv. 17). One of the first to bear the title of "Scribe" is a Levite (1 Chr. xxiv. 6), and this is mentioned as one of their special offices under Josiah (2 Chr. xxxiv. 19). They are described as names of Henan and Ethan are prominent among the Levites under Solomon (infra); and two psalms, one of which L. K.essen manifestly to a later date, are ascribed to them, with this title of Ezrahite attached (Ps. lxxvi. and lxxxix). The difficulty arises probably out of some confusion of the later and the earlier names. Ewald's conjecture, that conspicuous ministrers of other tribes were received into the choir of the Temple, and then reckoned as Levites, would give a new aspect to the influence of the tribe. (Comp Port. Eich. i. 213; De Wette, Psalm., Enrof § III.)

"officers and judges" under David (1 Chr. xxvi. 21), and as such are employed "in all the business of Jehovah, and in the service of the king." They are the agents of Jehovah and Hezekiah in their work of reformation, and are sent forth to proclaim and enforce the law (2 Chr. xvii. 6, xxx. 22). Under Josiah the function has passed into a title, and they are "the Levites that taught all Israel" (2 Chr. xxx. 3). The two books of Chronicles bear unmistakable marks of having been written by men whose interests were all gathered round the services of the Temple, and who were familiar with its records. The materials from which they compiled their narratives, and to which they refer as the works of seers and prophets, were written by men who were probably Levites themselves, or, if not, were associated with them.

The former subdivisions of the tribe were recognized in the assignment of the new duties, and the Kohathites retained their old preeminence. They have four "princes" (1 Chr. xv. 5-10), while Merari and Gershon have but one each. They supplied, from the families of the Izharites and Hebronites, the "officers and judges" (2 Chr. xxiv. 39). To them belonged the sons of Korah, with Heman at their head (1 Chr. ix. 19), playing upon psalteries and harps. They were "over the work of the service, keepers of the gates of the tabernacle" (l. c.). It was their work to prepare the sheen-break every Sabbath (1 Chr. ix. 32). The Gershonites were represented in like manner in the Temple-choir by the sons of Asaph (1 Chr. vi. 39, xxv. 17); Merari by the sons of Ethan or Jeduthun (1 Chr. vi. 44, xvi. 42, xxv. 17). Now that the heavier work of conveying the tabernacle and its equipments from place to place was no longer required of them, and that psalmody had become the most prominent of their duties, they were to enter on their work at the earlier age of twenty (1 Chr. xxiii. 24-27). 8

As in the old days of the Exodus, so in the organization under David, the Levites were not included in the general census of the people (1 Chr. xxii. 6), and formed accordingly no portion of its military strength. A separate census, made apparently before the change of age just mentioned (1 Chr. xxiii. 4), gives—

6,000 officers and judges.
4,000 porters, i.e. gate-keepers, and, as such, bearing arms (1 Chr. ix. 19; 2 Chr. xxxii. 2).
4,000 praising Jehovah with instruments.

The latter number, however, must have included the full chores of the Temple. The more skilled musicians among the sons of Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun are numbered at 288, in 24 sections of 12 each. Here again the Kohathites are prominent, having 14 out of the 24 sections; while Gershon has 4 and Merari 8 (1 Chr. xxv. 2-4). To these 288 were assigned apparently a more permanent residence in the Temple (1 Chr. ix. 34), and in the villages of the Netophathites near Bethlehem (1 Chr. ix. 16), mentioned long afterwards as inhabited by the "sons of the singers" (Neh. xii. 28).

The result of the ten tribes, and the policy pur- 8 The change is indicated in what are described as the last words of David. The king feels, in his old age, that a time of rest has come for himself and for the people, and that the Levites have a right to share suad by Jeroboam, led to a great charge in the position of the Levites. They were the witnesses of an appointed order and of a central worship. He wished to make the priests the creatures and instruments of the king, and to establish a provincial and divided worship. The natural result was, that they left the cities assigned to them in the territory of Israel, and gathered round the metropolis of Judah (2 Chr. xi. 13, 14). Their influence over the people at large was thus diminished, and the design of the Mosaic polity so far frustrated; but their power as a religious order was probably increased by this concentration within narrower limits. In the kingdom of Judah they were, from this time forward, a powerful body, politically as well as ecclesiastically. They brought with them the prophetic element of influence, in the wider as well as in the higher meaning of the word. We accordingly find them prominent in the war of Abijah against Jeroboam (2 Chr. xiii. 10-12). They are, as before noticed, sent out by Jehovah to instruct and judge the people (2 Chr. xix. 8-10). Prophets of their order encourage the king in his war against Joab and Amnon, and go before his army with their loud Hallelujahs (2 Chr. xx. 21), and join afterwards in the triumph of his return. The apostasy that followed on the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah exposed them for a time to a dominance of a hostile system; but the services of the Temple appear to have gone on, and the Levites were again conspicuous in the counter-revolution effected by Jehoiada (2 Chr. xxiii.), and in restoring the Temple to its former state under Josiah (2 Chr. xxiv. 5). They shared in the disasters of the reign of Amon (2 Chr. xxiv. 3), and in the prosperity of Uzziah, and were ready, we may believe, to support the priests, who, as representing their order, opposed the sacrilegious usurpation of the latter king (2 Chr. xxvi. 17). The closing of the Temple under Ahaz involved the cessation at once of their work and of their privileges (2 Chr. xxviii. 24). Under Hezekiah they again became prominent, as consecrating themselves to the special work of cleansing and repairing the Temple (2 Chr. xxix. 12-15); and the hymns of David and of Asaph were again renewed. In this instance it was thought worthy of special record that those who were simply Levites were more upright in heart than zealots than the priests themselves (2 Chr. xxix. 54); and thus, in the closing year, they took the lead of the unwilling or unprepared members of the priesthood. Their old privileges were restored, they were put forward as teachers (2 Chr. xxx. 22), and the payment of tithes, which had probably been discontinued under Ahaz, was renewed (2 Chr. xxxi. 4). The genealogies of the tribe were revised (ver. 17), and the old classification kept its ground. The reign of Manasseh was for them, during the greater part of it, a period of depression. That of Josiah witnessed a fresh revival and reorganization (2 Chr. xxxix. 8-13). In the great passover of his eighteenth year they took their place as teachers of the people, as well as leaders of their worship (2 Chr. xxx. 3, 15). Then came the Egyptian and Chaldean invasions, and the rule of cowardly and apostate kings. The sacred temple itself showed itself unfaithful. The repeated protests of the priest Ezekiel indicate that they had shared in the idolatry of the people. The prominence into which they had been brought in the reigns of the two reforming kings had apparently encouraged in them a love for the traditions and maintained the practices of their tribe. They, we may believe, were those who were specially called on to sing to their conquerors one of the songs of Zion (De Wette, on Ps. xxxviii.). It is noticeable, however, that in the first body of returning exiles they are present in a disproportionately small number (Ex. xi. 36-42). Those who do come take their old parts at the foundation and dedication of the second Temple (Ex. iii. 10, vi. 18). In the next movement under Ezra their reluctance (whatever may have been its origin) was even more strongly marked. None of them presented themselves at the first great gathering (Ezr. viii. 15). The special efforts of Ezra did not succeed in bringing together more than 38, and their place had to be filled by 221 of the Nethinim (ib. 20). Those who returned with him resumed their functions at the Feast of Tabernacles as teachers and interpreters (Neh. viii. 7), and those who were most active in that work were foremost also in chanting the hymn-like prayer which appears in Neh. ix. as the last great effort of Jewish psalmody. They are recognized in the great national covenant, and the offerings and titles which were their due are once more solemnly secured to them (Neh. x. 37-39). They take their old places in the Temple and in the villages near Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 21), and are present in full array at the great feast of the Dedication of the Wall. The two prophets who were active at the time of the Return, Haggai and Zechariah, if they did not belong to the tribe, helped it forward in the work of restoration. The stronger measures are adopted by Nehemiah, as before by Ezra, to guard the purity of their blood from the contamination of mixed marriages (Ex. x. vii. 4). They are not only the guardians of the holiness of the Sadduce (Neh. xii. 22). The last prophet of the O. T. sees, as part of his vision of the latter days, the time when the Lord "shall purify the sons of Levi" (Mal. iii. 3).

The guidance of the O. T. fails us at this point, and the history of the Levites in relation to the national life becomes consequently a matter of inference and conjecture. The synagogue worship, then originated, or receiving a new development, was organized irrespectively of them [SYNGOGUE], and thus throughout the whole of Palestine there were means of instruction in the Law with which they were not connected. This would tend naturally to diminish their peculiar claim on the reverence of the people; but where a priest or Levite was present in the synagogue they were still entitled to some kind of precedence, and special sections in the lessons for the day were assigned to them (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Matt. iv. 29). During the period that followed the Captivity they contributed to the formation of the so-called Great Synagogue. They, with the priests, theoretically constituted and practically formed the majority of the permanent Sanhedrim (Maimonides in Light- foot, Hor. Heb. on Matt. xxvi. 3), and as such had a large share in the administration of justice even in capital cases. In the characteristic feature of this period, as an age of scribes succeeding to an age of prophets, they too were likely to be sharers. The training and previous history of the tribe would predispose them to attach themselves to the new system as they had done to the old. They accordingly may have been among the scribes and elders, who accumulated traditions. They may have attached themselves to the sects of Pharisees and Sadducees. But in proportion as they thus acquired fame and reputation individually, their function as Levites became subordinate, and they were known simply as the inferior ministers of the Temple. They take no prominent part in the Maccabean struggles, though they must have been present at the great purification of the Temple.

They appear but seldom in the history of the N. T. Where we meet with their names it is as the type of a formal heartless worship, without sympathy and without love (Luke x. 32). The same parable indicates Jericho as having become—what it had not been originally (see Josh. xxi. 1 Chr. vi.)—one of the great stations at which they and the priests resided (Lightfoot, Cant. Chorograp. c. 47). In John i. 19 they appear as delegates of the Jews, that is of the Sanhedrim, coming to inquire into the credentials of the Baptist, and giving utterance to their own Messianic expectations. The mention of a Levite of Cyprus in Acts iv. 36 shows that the changes of the previous century had carried that tribe also into "the dispersed among the Gentiles." The conversion of Barnabas and Mark was probably no solitary instance of the reception by them of the new faith, which was the fulfillment of the old. If "a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith" (Acts vi. 7), it is not too bold to believe that their influence may have led Levites to follow their example. As old puritans they too were likely to be sharers of the old customs of the Temple-service, might be transmitted through the agency of those who had been specially trained in them, to be the inheritance of the Christian Church. Later on in the history of the first century, when the Temple had received its final completion under the younger Agrippa, we find one section of the tribe engaged in a new movement. With that strange unconsciousness of a coming doom which so often marks the last stage of a decaying system, the singers of the Temple thought it a fitting time to apply for the right of wearing the same linen garment as the priests, and persuaded the king that the concession of this privilege would be the glory of his reign (Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, § 6). The other Levites at the same time asked for and obtained the privilege of joining

May we conjecture that the language of Ezekiel led to some jealousy between the two orders? 9 There is a Jewish tradition (Surenhusius, Musivt. gen. x. 10) to the effect that, as a punishment for this backwardness, Ezra deprived them of their tithes, and transferred the right to the priests.

c The life of Josephus may be taken as an example of the education of the higher members of the order (Jos. Vita, c. 1).

d * Levites, though not named, are referred to as Temple-priests in Luke xxii. 52, Acts iv. 1, and v. 29 (Capp. v. 8).
in the Temple choruses, from which hitherto they had been excluded. The destruction of the Temple so soon after they had attained the object of their desire came as with a grim irony to sweep away the occupation and to deprive them of every vestige of that which had distinguished them from other Israelites. They were merged in the crowd of captives that were scattered over the Roman world, and disappear from the stage of history. The Rabbinic schools, that rose out of the ruins of the Jewish polity, fostered a studied and habitual depreciation of the Levite order as compared with their own teachers (M.T. ma. 66 P. 445). Individual families, it may be, cherished the tradition that their fathers, as priests or Levites, had taken part in the services of the Temple. If their claims were recognized, they received the old marks of reverence in the worship of the synagogue (comp. the Regulations of the Great Synagogue of London, in Margoliouth's History of Jews in Great Britain, iii. 270), took precedence in reading the lessons of the day (Lightfoot, Homilies, on Matt. iv. 25), and pronounced the blessing at the close (Bashnag, Hist. des Juifs, vi. 730). Their existence was acknowledged in some of the laws of the Christian emperors (Bashnag, l. c.). The tenacity with which the exiled race clung to these recollections is shown in the prevalence of the names (Ozen, Levita or Levy) which imply that those who bear them are of the sons of Aaron or the tribe of Levi; and in the custom which exempts the first-born of priestly or Levite families from the payments which are still offered, in the case of others, as the redemption of the first-born (Leo of Modena, in Picart's Cérémonies Religieuses, i. 26; Allen's Modern Judaism, p. 257). In the mean time the old name had acquired a new signification. The early writers of the Christian Church applied to the later hierarchy the language of the earlier, and gave to the bishops and presbyters the title (τέμπυς) that had belonged to the sons of Aaron: while the deacons were habitually spoken of as Levites (Saucer, Thes. s. v. Levites). The extinction or absorption of a tribe which had borne so prominent a part in the history of Israel, was, like other such changes, an instance of the order in which the shadow is succeeded by the substance — that which is decayed, is waxing old, and ready to vanish away, by a new and more living organization. It had done its work, and it had lost its life. It was bound up with a localized and exclusive worship, and had no place to occupy in that which was universal. In the Christian Church — supposing, by any effort of imagination, that it had had a recognized existence in it — it would have been simply an impediment. Looking at the long history of which the outline has been here traced, we find in it the light and darkness, the good and evil, which mingle in the character of most corporate or caste societies. On the one hand, the Levites, as a tribe, tended to fall into a formal worship, a narrow and exclusive exaltation of themselves and of their country. On the other hand, we must not forget that they were chosen together with the priesthood, to bear witness of great truths which might otherwise have perished from remembrance, and that they bore it well through a long succession of centuries. To members of this tribe we owe many separate books of the O. T., and probably also in great measure the preservation of the whole. The hymns which they sung, in part probably the music of which they were the originators, have been perpetuated in the worship of the Christian Church. In the company of prophets who have left behind them no written records they appear conspicuous, united by common work and common interests with the prophetic order. They did their work as a national clergy, instruments in raising the people to a higher life, educating them in the knowledge on which all order and civilization rest. It is not often, in the history of the world, that a religious caste or order has passed away with more claims to the respect and gratitude of mankind than the tribe of Levites.

LEVITICUS (ץיתיע), the first word in the book, giving its name: דַּוִּיתִּיָּה: Levitica: called also by the later Jews לְוָיִם, לְוָיָּם, "Law of the priests:" and לְוָיִים לְוָיִים, "Law of offerings."

CONTENTS. — The book consists of the following principal sections:

I. The laws touching sacrifices (cc. i. viii.).

II. An historical section containing, first, the consecration of Aaron and his sons (ch. viii.); next, his first offering for himself and the people (ch. ix.); and lastly, the destruction of Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, for their presumptions offense (ch. x.).

III. The laws concerning purity and impurity, and the appropriate sacrifices and ordinances for putting away impurity (cc. xi.-xvi.).

IV. Laws chiefly intended to mark the separation between Israel and the heathen nations (cc. xvii.-xx.).

V. Laws concerning the priests (xxi., xxii.); and certain holy days and festivals (xxiii., xxiv.), together with an episode (xxiv.). The section extends from ch. xxi. 1 to xxii. 2.

VI. Promises and threats (xxvi., 2-46).

VIII. An appendix containing the laws concerning vows (xxvii.).

I. The book of Exodus concludes with the account of the completion of the tabernacle. "So Moses finished the work," we read (xii. 33); and immediately there rests upon it a cloud, and it is a The tone of Josephus is noticeable as being that of a man who looked on the change as a dangerous innovation. As a priest, he saw in this movement of away their constitution, and so to the depredations of his order: and this was, in his judgment, one of the sons which brought on the destruction of the city and the Temple.

b Dr. Joseph Wolff, in his recent Tavris and Adversaries (p. 2), claims his descent from this tribe.

c In the literature of a later period the same name meets us applied to the same or nearly the same order, no longer, however, as the language of reverence, but as that of a cynical contempt for the less worthy portion of the clergy of the English Church (Macaulay Hist. of England, iii. 351).
filled with the glory of Jehovah. From the tabernacle, thus rendered glorious by the Divine Presence—(10) the legislation contained in the book of Leviticus. At first God spake to the people out of the thunder and lightning of Sinai, and gave them his holy commandments by the hand of a mediator. But henceforth his Presence is to dwell not on the secret top of Sinai, but in the midst of his people, both in their wanderings through the wilderness, and afterwards in the Land of Promise. Hence the first direction which Moses receives after the work is finished have reference to the offerings which were to be brought to the door of the Tabernacle. As Jehovah draws near to the people in the Tabernacle, so the people draw near to Jehovah in the offering. Without offerings none may approach Him. The regulations respecting the sacrifices fall into three groups, and each of these groups again consists of a declination of instructions. Bertheau has observed that this principle runs through all the laws of Moses. They are all modeled after the pattern of the ten commandments, so that each distinct subject of legislation is always treated of under ten several enactments or provisions.

Baumgarten in his Commentary on the Pentateuch, has adopted the arrangement of Bertheau, as set forth in his Sieben Gruppen des Mos. Rechts. On the whole, his principle seems sound. We find Bun- sen acknowledging it in part, in his division of the 10th chapter (see below). And though we cannot always agree with Bertheau, we have thought it worth while to give his arrangement as suggestive at least of the main structure of the book.

1. The first group of regulations (ce. i. iii.) deals with three kinds of offerings: the burnt-offering (תְּהֵיטָן), the meat-offering (תְּכִנָּה), and the thank-offering (תְּחֵיתָן), and

i. The burnt-offering (ch. i.) in three sections. It might be either (1) a male without blemish from the herd (תְּכִנָּה גָּםָה), vv. 3-9; or (2) a male without blemish from the flock, or lesser cattle (תְּכִנָּה בֶּן כִּבָּה), vv. 10-13; or (3) it might be fowls, an offering of turtle-doves or young pigeons, vv. 14-17. The subdivisions are here marked clearly enough, not only by the three kinds of sacrifice, but also by the form in which the enactment is put. Each begins with בֹּנֶה פָּרָשָׂה, "If his offering," etc., and each ends with הָיוֹתל הַנְוֵר הַמֶּ_chance. "an offering made by fire, of a sweet savor unto Jehovah." The next group (ch. ii.) presents many more difficulties. Its parts are not so clearly marked either by prominent features in the subject-matter, or by the more technical boundaries of certain initial and final phrases. We have here—

ii. The meat-offering, or bloodless offering in four sections: (1) in its uncooked form, consisting of fine flour with oil and frankincense, vv. 1-3; (2) in its cooked form, of which three different kinds are specified—baked in the oven, fried, or boiled, vv. 4-10; (3) to vindicate the prohibition of leaven, and the direction to use salt in all the meat-offerings, 11-13; (4) the obligation of first fruits, 14-16. This at least seems on the whole to be the best arrangement of the group, though we offer it with some hesitation.

(n.) Bertheau's arrangement is different. He divides (1) vv. 1-4, thus including the meat-offering baked in the oven with the uncooked offering; (2) vv. 5 and 6, the meat-offering when fried in the pan; (3) vv. 7-13, the meat-offering when boiled; (4) vv. 14-16, the offering of the first-fruits. But this is obviously open to many objections. For, first, it is exceedingly arbitrary to connect v. 4 with vv. 1-3, rather than with the verses which follow. Why should the meat-offering baked in the oven be classed with the uncooked meat-offering rather than with the other two which were in different ways supposed to be dressed with fire? Next, two of the divisions of the chapter are clearly marked by the recurrence of the formula, "It is a thing most holy of the offerings of Jehovah made by fire," vv. 3 and 10. Lastly, the directions in vv. 11-13 apply to every form of meat-offering, not only to that immediately preceding. The Masonic arrangement is in five sections: vv. 1-3; 4; 5, 6; 7-13; 14-16.

iii. The Shelomim—"peace-offering" (A. V.), or thank-offering" (Ewald), (ch. iii.) in three sections. Strictly speaking this falls under two heads: first, when it is of the herd; and secondly, when it is of the flock. But this has has again its subdivision: for the offering when of the flock may be either a lamb or a goat. Accordingly the three sections are, vv. 1-5; 7-11; 12-16. Ver. 6 is merely introductory to the second class of sacrifices, and ver. 17 a general conclusion, as in the case of other laws. This concludes the first declination of the book.

2. Ch. iv. v. The laws concerning the sin-offering and the trespass- (or guilt-) offering.

The sin-offering (chap. iv.) is treated of under four specified cases, after a short introduction to the whole in vv. 1, 2: (1) the sin-offering for the priest, 3-12; (2) for the whole congregation, 13-21; (3) for a ruler, 22-26; (4) for one of the common people, 27-35.

After these four cases in which the offering is to be made for four different classes, there follow provisions respecting three several kinds of transgression for which atonement must be made. It is not quite clear whether these three classes are treated under the head of the sin-offering or of the trespass-offering (see Winer, Redb). We may, however, follow Bertheau, Baumgarten, and Knobel, in regarding them as special instances in which a sin-offering was to be brought. The three cases are: first, when any one hears a curse and conceals what he hears (v. 1); secondly, when any one touches without knowing or intending it, any unclean thing (vv. 2, 3); lastly, when any one takes an oath inconsiderately (ver. 4). For each of these cases the same trespass-offering, "a female from the flock, a lamb or kid of the goats," is appointed; but with that mercyfulness which characterizes the Mosaic law, express provision is made for a less costly offering where the offerer is poor.

The declaration is then completed by the three resolutions respecting the guilt-offering (or trespass-offering) first, when a man sins through ignorance in the holy things of Jehovah (vv. 14-16); next, when a person without knowing it commits any of these things which are forbidden to be done by the commandments of Jehovah (17-19); lastly, when a man lies and swears falsely concerning that which was intrusted to him, etc.
LEVITICUS

With the holy oil; his sons also are arrayed in their garments, and the various offerings appointed are offered. In ch. ix. Aaron offers, eight days after his consecration, his first offering for himself and the people: this comprises for himself a sin- and burnt-offering (1-14), for the people a sin-offering, a burnt-offering and a peace- (or thank-) offering. He blesses the people, and fire comes down from heaven and consumes the burnt-offering. Ch. x. tells how Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, eager to enjoy the privileges of their new office, and perhaps too much elated by its dignity, forgot or despised the restrictions by which it was fenced round (Ex. xxx., 7, etc.), and daring to offer strange fire before Jehovah," perished because of their presumption.

With the house of Aaron began this wickedness in the sanctuary; with them therefore began also the divine punishment. Very touching is the story which follows. Aaron, though forbidden to mourn his loss (vv. 6, 7), will not eat the sin-offering in the holy place; and when rebuked by Moses, pleads in his defense, "Such things have befallen me; and if I had eaten the sin-offering to-day, should it have been accepted in the sight of Jehovah?" And Moses, the lawgiver and the judge, admits the plea, and bowers the natural feeling of the father's heart, even when it leads to a violation of the letter of the divine commandment.

Ii. Ce. xi.-xvi. The first seven decalogues had reference to the putting away of guilt. By the appointed sacrifices the separation between man and God was healed. The next seven concern themselves with the putting away of impurity. That ce. xi.-xv. hang together so as to form one series of laws there can be no doubt. Besides that they treat of kindred subjects, they have their characteristic words, נַעֲנָא, נַעֲנָה, "unclean," "uncleanliness," וְנַעֲנָה, "clean," which occur in almost every verse. The only question is about ch. xvi., which by its opening is connected immediately with the occurrence related in ch. x. Historically it would seem therefore that ch. xvi. ought to have followed ch. x. And as this order is neglected, it would lead us to suspect that some other principle of arrangement than that of historical sequence has been adopted. This we find in the advance in the observed significance of the Great Day of Atonement. The high-priest on that day made atonement, "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins" (xvi. 16), and he "reconciled the holy place and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar" (ver. 29). Delivered from their guilt and cleansed from their pollutions, from that day forward the children of Israel entered upon a new and holy life. This was typified both by the ordinance that the bullock and the goat for the sin-offering were burnt without the camp (ver. 27), and also by the sending away of the goat laden with the iniquities of the people into the wilderness. Hence ce. xvi. seems to stand most fitly at the end of this second group of seven decalogues.

It has reference, we believe, not only (as Bertheloum supposes) to the putting away, as by one solemn act, of all those uncleannesses mentioned in ce. xi.-xv., and for which the various expiations are only one of those instances in which the reader

(vv. 20-26). This decalogue, like the preceding one, has its characteristic words and expressions. The prominent word which introduces so many of the enactments, is הָעֵנָא, "unclean" (see iv. 27, vv. 1, 2, 4, 15, 17, vi. 2); and the phrase, "if a soul shall sin" (iv. 2), is, with occasional variations, having an equivalent meaning, the distinctive phrase of the section.

As in the former decalogue, the nature of the offerings, so in this the person and the nature of the offense are the chief features in the several statutes.

3. Ch. vi., vii. Naturally upon the law of sacrifices follows the lay of the priests' duties when they offer the sacrifices. Hence we find Moses directed to address himself immediately to Aaron and his sons (vi. 2, 18 = vi. 9, 25, A. V.).

In this group the different kinds of offerings are named in nearly the same order as in the two preceding decalogues, except that the offering at the consecration of a priest follows, instead of the thank-offering, immediately after the meat-offering, which it precedes in the thank-offering now appears after the trespass-offering. There are therefore, in all, six kinds of offering; and in the case of each of these the priest has his distinct duties. Bertheloum has very ingeniously so distributed the enactments in which these duties are prescribed as to arrange them all in five decalogues. We will briefly indicate his arrangement.

3. (a.) "This is the law of the burnt-offering" (vi. 9, A. V.), in five enactments, each verse (vv. 9-13) containing a separate enactment.

(b.) "And this is the law of the meat-offering" (ver. 14), again in five enactments, each of which is, as before, contained in a single verse (v. 4-18).

4. The next decalogue is contained in vv. 19-30. (a.) Verse 19 is merely introductory; then follow, in five verses, five distinct directions with regard to the offering at the time of the consecration of the priests, the first in ver. 20, the next two in ver. 21, the fourth in the former part of ver. 22, and the last in the latter part of ver. 22 and ver. 23.

(b.) "This is the law of the sin-offering" (ver. 25). Then the five enactments, each in one verse, except that two verses (27, 28) are given to the third.

5. The third decalogue is contained in ch. vii., 1-10, the laws of the trespass-offering. But it is impossible to avoid a misgiving as to the soundness of Bertheloum's system when we find him making the words "it is most holy," in ver. 1, the first of the ten enactments. This he is obliged to do, as vv. 3 and 4 evidently form but one.

6. The fourth decalogue, after an introductory verse (ver. 11), is contained in ten verses (12-21).

7. The last decalogue consists of certain general laws about the fat, the blood, the wave-breast, etc., and is comprised again in ten verses (22-30), the verses as before marking the divisions.

The chapter closes with a brief historical notice of the fact that these several commands were given to Moses on Mount Sinai (vv. 35-38).

Ii. Ch. viii., ix., x. This section is entirely historical. In ch. viii. we have the account of the consecration of Aaron and his sons by Moses before the whole congregation. They were washed; he is arrayed in the priestly vestments and anointed with the holy oil; his sons also are arrayed in their garments, and the various offerings appointed are offered. In ch. ix. Aaron offers, eight days after his consecration, his first offering for himself and the people: this comprises for himself a sin- and burnt-offering (1-14), for the people a sin-offering, a burnt-offering and a peace- (or thank-) offering. He blesses the people, and fire comes down from heaven and consumes the burnt-offering. Ch. x. tells how Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, eager to enjoy the privileges of their new office, and perhaps too much elated by its dignity, forgot or despised the restrictions by which it was fenced round (Ex. xxx., 7, etc.), and daring to offer strange fire before Jehovah," perished because of their presumption.

With the house of Aaron began this wickedness in the sanctuary; with them therefore began also the divine punishment. Very touching is the story which follows. Aaron, though forbidden to mourn his loss (vv. 6, 7), will not eat the sin-offering in the holy place; and when rebuked by Moses, pleads in his defense, "Such things have befallen me; and if I had eaten the sin-offering to-day, should it have been accepted in the sight of Jehovah?" And Moses, the lawgiver and the judge, admits the plea, and bowers the natural feeling of the father's heart, even when it leads to a violation of the letter of the divine commandment.

Ii. Ce. xi.-xvi. The first seven decalogues had reference to the putting away of guilt. By the appointed sacrifices the separation between man and God was healed. The next seven concern themselves with the putting away of impurity. That ce. xi.-xv. hang together so as to form one series of laws there can be no doubt. Besides that they treat of kindred subjects, they have their characteristic words, נַעֲנָא, נַעֲנָה, "unclean," "uncleanliness," וְנַעֲנָה, "clean," which occur in almost every verse. The only question is about ch. xvi., which by its opening is connected immediately with the occurrence related in ch. x. Historically it would seem therefore that ch. xvi. ought to have followed ch. x. And as this order is neglected, it would lead us to suspect that some other principle of arrangement than that of historical sequence has been adopted. This we find in the advance in the observed significance of the Great Day of Atonement. The high-priest on that day made atonement, "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins" (xvi. 16), and he "reconciled the holy place and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar" (ver. 29). Delivered from their guilt and cleansed from their pollutions, from that day forward the children of Israel entered upon a new and holy life. This was typified both by the ordinance that the bullock and the goat for the sin-offering were burnt without the camp (ver. 27), and also by the sending away of the goat laden with the iniquities of the people into the wilderness. Hence ce. xvi. seems to stand most fitly at the end of this second group of seven decalogues.

and cleansing there appointed were temporary and unsanctified; but also to the making atonement, in the sense of hiding sin or putting away its guilt. For not only do we find the idea of cleansing as from defilement, but far more prominently the idea of reconciliation. The often repeated word פה, "to cover, to atone," is the great word of the section.

1. The first decalogue in this group refers to clean and unclean flesh. Five classes of animals are pronounced unclean. The first four enunciations declare what animals may and may not be eaten, whether (1) beasts of the earth (2-8), or (2) fishes (9-12), or (3) birds (13-20), or (4) creeping things with wings. The next four are intended to guard against pollution by contact with the carcass of any of these animals; (5) vv. 24-26; (6) vv. 27, 28; (7) vv. 29-33; (8) vv. 39, 40. The ninth and tenth specify the last class of animals which are unclean for food, (9) vv. 41, 42, and forbid any other kind of pollution by means of them, (10) vv. 43-45. Vv. 46 and 47 are merely a concluding summary.

2. Ch. xii. Women's purification in childbed. The whole of this chapter, according to Bertheau, constitutes the first law of this decalogue. The remaining nine are to be found in the next chapter, which treats of the signs of leprosy in man and in garments. (2) vv. 1-5; (3) vv. 9-17; (4) vv. 18-23; (5) vv. 24-28; (6) vv. 29-37; (7) vv. 38, 39; (8) vv. 40-41; (9) vv. 42-46; (10) vv. 47-59. This arrangement of the several sections is not altogether free from objection; but it is certainly supported by the characteristic mode in which each section opens. Thus, for instance, ch. xii. 2 begins with דביה יִהְוָֽיִתַּֽנָּה; ch. xiii. 2, with בָּדִֽיתָּה יִהְוָֽיִתַּֽנָּה; and so on, the same order being always observed, the subst. being placed first, then לֹא, and then the verb, except only in ver. 42, where the subst. is placed after the verb.

3. Ch. xiv. 1-52. "The law of the leper in the day of his cleansing," i.e. the law which the priest is to observe in purifying the leper. The priest is mentioned in ten verses, each of which begins one of the ten sections of this law: vv. 3, 4, 5, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20. In each instance the word הָדָּוָּה is preceded by ו consecut. with the verb. It is true that in ver. 3, and also in ver. 14, the word הָדָּוָּה occurs twice; but in both verses there is M.S. authority, as well as that of the Vulg. and Arab. versions for the absence of the second. Verses 21-52 may be regarded as a supplemental provision in cases where the leper is too poor to bring the required offering.

4. Ch. xiv. 33-57. The leprosy in a house. It is not so easy here to trace the arrangement noticed in so many other laws. There are no characteristic words or phrases to guide us. Bertheau's division is as follows: (1) vv. 34, 35; (2) vv. 36, 37; (3) ver. 38; (4) ver. 39; (5) ver. 40; (6) vv. 41, 42; (7) vv. 43-45. Then as usual follows a short summary which closes the statute concerning leprosy, vv. 54-57.

5. Ch. xv. 1-15. 6. Ch. xv. 16-31. The law of uncleanness by issue, etc., in two decalogues. The division is clearly marked, as Bertheau observes, by the form of cleansing, which is so exactly similar in the two principal cases, and which closes each series, (1) vv. 13-15; (2) vv. 28-30. We again give his arrangement, though we do not profess to regard it as in all respects satisfactory.

6. (1) vv. 2, 3; (2) ver. 4; (3) ver. 5; (4) ver. 6; (5) ver. 7; (6) ver. 8; (7) ver. 9; (8) ver. 10; (9) vv. 11, 12; — these Bertheau considers as one enactment, because it is another way of saying that either the word or thing which the unclean person touches is unclean; but on the same principle vv. 4 and 5 might just as well form one enactment — (10) vv. 15-15.

7. (1) ver. 16; (2) ver. 17; (3) ver. 18; (4) ver. 19; (5) ver. 20; (6) ver. 21; (7) ver. 22; (8) ver. 23; (9) ver. 24; (10) vv. 28-30. In order to complete this arrangement, he considers verses 25-27 as a kind of supplementary enactment provided for an irregular uncleanness, leaving it as quite uncertain however whether this was a later addition or not. Verses 32 and 33 form merely the same general conclusion which we have had before in xiv. 54-57.

The last decalogue of the second group of seven decalogues is to be found in ch. xvi., which treats of the great Day of Atonement. The law itself is contained in vv. 1-28. The remaining verses, vv. 29-46, consist of an exhortation to its careful observance. In the act of atonement three persons are concerned. The high-priest — in this instance Aaron; the man who leads away the goat for Azazel into the wilderness; and he who burns the skin, flesh, and dung of the bullock and goat of the sin-offering without the camp. The two last have special purifications assigned them; the first because he has touched the goat laden with the guilt of the people; the last because he has come in contact with the sin-offering. The 9th and 10th enactments prescribe what these purifications are, each of them concluding with the same formula: הָדָּוָּה יִהְוָֽיִתַּֽנָּה, and hence distinguished from each other. The duties of Aaron consequently ought, if the division into decades is correct, to be comprised in eight enactments. Now the name of Aaron is repeated eight times, and in six of these it is preceded by ו consecut. as we observed was the case before when the priest was the prominent figure. According to this then the decalogue will stand thus: — (1) ver. 2, Aaron not to enter the Holy Place at all times; (2) vv. 3-5, With what sacrifices and in what dress Aaron is to enter the Holy Place; (3) vv. 6, 7, Aaron to offer the bullock for himself, and to set the two goats before Jehovah; (4) ver. 8, Aaron to cast lots on the two goats; (5) vv. 9, 10, Aaron to offer the goat on which the lot falls for Jehovah, and to send away the goat for Azazel into the wilderness; (6) vv. 11-19, Aaron to sprinkle the blood both of the bullock and of the goat to make atonement for himself, for his house, and for the whole congregation, as also to purify the altar of incense with the blood; (7) vv. 20-22, Aaron to lay his hands on the living goat, and confess over it all the sins of the children of Israel; (8) v. 23, Aaron after this to take off his linen garments, bathe himself and put on his priestly garments, and then offer his burnt-offering and that of the congregation; (9) ver. 26, The man by whom the goat is sent into the wilderness to purify himself; (10) vv. 27, 28, What is to be done by him who burns the sin-offering without the camp.
We have now reached the great central point of the book. All going before was but a preparation for this. Two great truths have been established: first, that God can only be approached by means of appointed sacrifices; next, that man in nature and life is full of pollution, which must be cleansed. And now a third is taught, namely, that not by several cleansing for several sins and pollutions can guilt be put away. The several acts of sin are but so many manifestations of the sinful nature.

For this, therefore, also must atonement be made: one solemn act, which shall cover all transgressions, and turn away God's righteous displeasure from Israel.

IV. ch. xii.—xx. And now Israel is reminded that it is the holy nation. The great atonement offered, it is to enter upon a new life. It is a separate nation, sanctified and set apart for the service of God. It may not therefore do after the abominations of the heathen by whom it is surrounded. Here consequently we find those laws and ordinances which especially distinguish the nation of Israel from all other nations of the earth.

Here again we may trace, as before, a group of seven dealings. But the several dealings are not so clearly marked; nor are the characteristic phrases and the introductions and conclusions so common. In ch. xiii. there are twenty enactments, and in ch. xix. thirty. In ch. xiii., on the other hand, there are only six, and in ch. xx. there are fourteen. As it is quite manifest that the enactments in ch. xiii. are entirely separated by a fresh introduction from those in ch. xii., Bertholet, in order to preserve the usual arrangement of the laws in decalogues, would transpose this chapter, and place it after ch. xix. He observes, that the laws in ch. xiii., and those in ch. xx. 1-9, are akin to one another, and may very well constitute a single decalogue; and what is of more importance, that the words in xiii. 1-5 form the natural introduction to this whole group of laws: "And Jehovah spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, I am Jehovah your God. After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, shall ye not do: and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do: neither shall ye offer there their ordinances, etc."

There is, however, a point of connection between ch. xii. and xiii., which must not be overlooked, and which seems to indicate that their position in our present text is the right one. All the six enactments in ch. xii. (vv. 3-5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10-12, 13, 14, 15) bear upon the nature and meaning of the sacrifice to Jehovah and compared with the sacrifices offered to false gods. It would seem too, that it was necessary to guard against any license to idolatrous practices, which might possibly be drawn from the sending of the goat for Azazel into the wilderness (Atonement, Day of), especially perhaps against the Egyptian custom of expiating the spirit of the wilderness and averting his malice (Hengstenberg, Moses u. Jsepjten, p. 178; Movers, Floniziter, i. 389).

To this there may be an allusion in ver. 7. Perhaps however it is better and more simple to regard the enactments in these two chapters (with Bunsen, Biblerick, 2te Ath., i. 187, p. 245) as directed against two prevalent heathen practices, the eating of blood and fornication. It is remarkable, as showing how intimately moral and ritual observances were blended together in the Jewish mind, that abstention "from blood and things strangled, and fornication," was laid down by the Apostles as the only condition of communion to be required of Gentile converts to Christianity. Before we quit this chapter one observation may be made.

The rendering of the A. V. in ver. 11, "for it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul," should be "for it is the blood that maketh an atonement by means of the life." This is important. It is not blood merely as such, but blood as having in it the principle of life that God accepts in sacrifice. For by thus giving vicariously the life of the dumb animal, the sinner confesses that his own life is forfeit.

In ch. xiii., after the introduction to which we have already alluded, vv. 1-5, — and in which God claims obedience on the double ground that He is Israel's God, and that to keep his commandments is life (ver. 5), — there follow twenty enactments concerning unlawful marriages and unnatural lusts. The first ten are contained one in each verse, vv. 6-15. The next ten range themselves in like manner with the verses, except that vv. 17 and 18 contain each two. Of the twenty the first fourteen are alike in form, as well as in the repeated nemi ykix npa xnu. niiv kx. niiv. xnu.

Ch. xix. Three dealings, introduced by the words, "Ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy," and ending with, "Ye shall be holy; and ye shall make yourselves no strange gods, nor accept of their ordinances," etc.

The interpretation of ver. 1 is of late been the subject of so much discussion, that we may perhaps be permitted to say a word upon it, even in a work which excludes all dogmatic controversies. The rendering of the English Version is supported by a whole array of authorities of the first rank, as may be seen by reference to Dr. McCaul's pamphlet, The Ancient Interpretation of Levitices XVIII. 1-4, etc. We may further remark, that the whole controversy, so far as the Scriptural question is concerned, might have been avoided if the Church had but acted in the spirit of Luther's golden words: "Ad rem veniamus et dicamus. Moses non mortuum, vidisse autem populo Judeorum, see obligari nos legibus illius. Ideo quippe ex Mose ut legislatore nunc idem ex legisbus nostris, e. g. naturalibus et politicis praeclare, ne adhiberemus antiquas et oris politicas. — Bertholet, De Wette's edit. p. 356.

It is a not little remarkable that six of these enactments should only be repetitions, for the most part in a shorter form, of commandments contained in the two Tables. This is only accounted for by remembering the great object of this section, which is to remind Israel that it is a separate nation, its laws being expressly framed to be a fence and a hedge about it, keeping it from profane contact with the
The next decalogue, vv. 14-25, Bertheau arranges thus: ver. 14, ver. 15, ver. 15b, ver. 16, ver. 17, ver. 18, ver. 19a, ver. 19b, vv. 20-22, vv. 23. We object, however, to making the words in 19a, "Ye shall keep my statutes," a separate enactment. There is no reason for this. A much better plan would be to consider ver. 17 as consisting of two enactments, which is manifestly the case.

The third decalogue may be thus distributed: --

Ver. 25a, vv. 26, 27, vv. 28, vv. 29, vv. 30, ver. 31, ver. 32, ver. 33, ver. 34, vv. 35, 36.

We have thus found five decalogues in this group, which completes the number seven by transposing, as we have seen, ch. xlii., and placing it immediately before ch. xx. He also transposes ver. 27 of ch. xx. to what he considers its proper place, namely, after ver. 6. It must be confessed that the enactment in ver. 27 stands very awkwardly at the end of the chapter, completely isolated as it is from all other enactments for vv. 22-26 are the natural conclusion to this whole section. But admitting this, another difficulty remains, that according to him the 7th decalogue begins at ver. 10, and another transposition is necessary, so that vv. 7, 8, may stand after ver. 9, and so conclude the preceding series of ten enactments. It is better perhaps to abandon the search for complete symmetry than to adopt a method so violent in order to obtain it.

It should be observed that ch. xlvii. 6-23 and ch. xx. 10-21 stand in this relation to one another: that the latter declares the penalties attached to the transgression of many of the commandments given in the former. But though we may not be able to trace seven decalogues, in accordance with the theory of which we have been speaking, in cc. xlvii.-xx. there can be no doubt that they form a distinct section of themselves, of which xx. 23-26 is the proper conclusion.

Like the other sections it has some characteristic expressions: (a) "Ye shall keep my judgments and my statutes" (נְפִילָתָן, נְפִילָתָן), occurs xlvii. 4, 5, 26, xlix. 37, 38, 22, but is not met with either in the preceding or the following chapters. (b) The constantly recurring phrases, "I am Jehovah;" "I am Jehovah your God;" "Be ye holy, for I am holy;" "I am Jehovah whom ye shall fear." In the earlier sections this phraseology is only found in Lev. xi. 44, 45, and Ex. xxxi. 13. In the section which follows (xlii.-xxiv.) it is much more common, this section being in a great measure a continuation of the preceding.

V. We come now to the last group of decalogues --that contained in cc. xlii.-xxviiii. 2. The subjects comprised in these enactments are --First, the personal purity of the priests. They may not defile themselves for the dead; their wives and daughters must be pure, and they themselves must be free from all personal blemish (ch. xlii.). Next, the eating of the holy things is permitted only to priests who are free from all uncleanness; they and their household only may eat them (xliii. 1-14). Thirdly, the offerings of Israel are to be pure and without blemish (xliii. 17-33). The fourth section provides for the due celebration of the great fest-vols when priests and people were to be gathered together before Jehovah in holy convocation.

Up to this point we trace system and purpose in the order of the legislation. Thus, for instance, cc. xi.-xvi. treat of external purity; cc. xvii.-xxii., of moral purity; cc. xxi.-xxviiii. of the holiness of the priests, and their duties with regard to holy things; the whole concluding with provisions for the solemn feasts on which all Israel appear before Jehovah. We will again briefly indicate Bertheau's groups, and then append some general observations on the section.

1. Ch. xxi. Ten laws, as follows: (1) ver. 1-3; (2) ver. 4; (3) vv. 5, 6; (4) vv. 7, 8; (5) ver. 9; (6) vv. 10, 11; (7) ver. 12; (8) vv. 13, 14; (9) vv. 17-21; (10) vv. 22, 23. The first five laws concern all the priests, the sixth to the eighth the high-priest; the ninth and tenth the effects of bodily blemish in particular cases.

2. Ch. xxii. 1-16. (1) ver. 2; (2) ver. 3; (3) ver. 4; (4) vv. 4-7; (5) vv. 8, 9; (6) ver. 10; (7) ver. 11; (8) vers. 12; (9) vers. 13; (10) vv. 14-16.

3. Ch. xxiii. 17-33. (1) vv. 18-20; (2) ver. 21; (3) vv. 22; (4) vv. 23; (5) vv. 24; (6) ver. 25; (7) ver. 27; (8) vv. 28, 29; (9) ver. 30; (10) ver. 31; and a general conclusion in vv. 32-33.

4. Ch. xxiv. (1) ver. 3; (2) ver. 4; (3) vv. 5, 6; (4) vv. 7, 8; (5) vv. 9, 10; (6) vv. 11, 12; (7) vv. 24, 25; (8) vv. 27-32; (9) vv. 34, 35; (10) vers. 36-38 contain the conclusion or general summing up of the decalogue. On the remainder of the chapter, as well as ch. xxv., see below.

5. Ch. xxv. 1-22. (1) ver. 2; (2) vv. 3, 4; (3) vers. 5; (4) vers. 6; (5) vv. 8-10; (6) vv. 11, 12; (7) vers. 13; (8) vers. 14; (9) vers. 15; (10) vers. 16; with a concluding formula in ch. xxi. xxiv., xxviii. xxix.

6. Ch. xxvi. 33-38. (1) vv. 23, 24; (2) ver. 25; (3) vv. 26, 27; (4) vv. 28; (5) vers. 29; (6) vers. 30; (7) vers. 31; (8) vers. 32, 33; (9) vers. 34; (10) vers. 35-37; the conclusion to the whole in ver. 38.

7. Ch. xxvii. 39-xxi. 2. (1) ver. 39; (2) vv. 40-42; (3) vers. 43; (4) vv. 44, 45; (5) vers. 46; (6) vv. 47-49; (7) vers. 50; (8) vers. 51, 52; (9) vers. 53; (10) vers. 54.

It will be observed that the above arrangement is only completed by omitting the latter part of ch. xxix., and the whole of ch. xxiv. But it is clear that ch. xxviiii. 33-44 is a later addition, containing further instructions respecting the Feast of Tabernacles. Ver. 39, as compared with ver. 34, shows that the same feast is referred to; whilst vv. 37, 38, are no less manifestly the original conclusion of the laws respecting the feasts which are enumerated in the previous part of the chapter. Ch. xxix., again, marks a peculiar character of its own. First, we have a command concerning the oil to be used in the lamps belonging to the Tabernacle, which is only a repetition of an enactment already given in Ex. xvi. 20, 21, which seems to be its natural place. Then follow directions about the shew-bread. These do not occur previously. In Ex. the shew-bread is spoken of always as a matter of course, consisting which no regulations are necessary (comp. Ex. xxx. xxxv. 13, xxxix. 36). Lastly, some certain enactments arising out of an historical occurrence. The son of an Egyptian father by an Israelitish woman blasphemes the name of Jehovah, and Moses is commanded to stone him in consequence: and this circumstance is the occasion of the following laws being given: (1.) That a blasphemer, whether Israelite or stranger, is to be stoned (comp. Ex. xxvii. 29). (2.) That he

that kills any man shall surely be put to death (comp. Ex. xxi. 12-27). (3.) That he that kills a beast shall makr it good (not found where we might have expected it, in the series of laws Ex. xxi. 28-xxii. 6). (4.) That if a man cause a blush to be in his neighbour he shall be requited in like manner (comp. Ex. xxi. 22-25). (5.) We have then a repetition in an inverse order of vv. 17, 18; and (6.) the injunction that there shall be one law for the stranger and the Israelite. Finally, a brief notice of the infliction of the punishment in the case of the son of Shelomith, who blasphemed. Not another instance is to be found in the whole collection in which any historical circumstance is made the occasion of enacting a law. Then again the laws (2), (3), (4), (6), are mostly repetitions of existing laws, and seem here to have no connection with the event to which they are referred. Either therefore some other circumstances took place at the same time with which we are not acquainted, or these isolated laws, detached from their proper connection, were grouped together here, in obedience perhaps to some traditional association.

VI. The seven decalogues are now distinctly ensued by words of promise and threat—promise of largest, richest blessing to those that hearken unto and do these commandments; threats of utter destruction to those that break the commandment of their God. Thus the second great division of the Law closes like the first, except that the first part, or Book of the Covenant, ends (Ex. xxi. 20-33) with promises of blessing only. There nothing is said of the judgments which are to follow transgression, because as yet the Covenant had not been made. But when once the nation had freely entered into that covenant, they bound themselves to accept its sanctions, its penalties, as well as its rewards. And we cannot wonder if in these sanctions the punishment of transgression holds a larger place than the rewards of obedience. For already was it but too plain that "Israel would not obey." From the first they were a stiffnecked and rebellious race, and from the first the doom of disobedience hung like some fury sword above their heads.

VII. The legislation is evidently completed in the last words of the preceding chapter. These are not references and allusions and laws which Jehovah made between Him and the children of Israel in Mount Sinai by the hand of Moses. Ch. xxvii. is a later appendix, again however closed by a similar form, which at least shows that the transcriber considered it to be an integral part of the original Mosaic legislation, though he might be at a loss to assign it its place. Herberc classes it with the other less regularly grouped laws at the beginning of the book of Numbers. He treats the section Lev. xvi.—Num. x. 10 as a series of supplements to the Sinaitic legislation.

Integrity. — This is very generally admitted. Those critics even who are in favor of different documents in the Pentateuch assign nearly the whole of this book to one writer, the Elohist, or author of the original document. According to Knobel the only portions which are not to be referred to the Elohist are Moses' rebuke of Aaron because the goat of the sin-offering had been burnt (x. 16-20); the group of laws in cc. xxvii.—xxxi.; certain additional enactments respecting the Sabbath and the Feasts of Weeks and of Tabernacles (xxviii., part of ver. 2, from 27 to 29, and ver. 3, vv. 18, 19, 22, 33-41); the punishments ordained for blasphemy, murder, etc. (xxiv. 10-23); the directions respecting the Sabbatical year (xxv. 8-22), and the promises and warnings contained in ch. xxvi.

With regard to the section ec. xvi., xxii., he does not consider the whole of it to have been borrowed from the same sources. Ch. xvi. he believes was introduced here by the Jehovah from some ancient document, whilst he admits nevertheless that it contains certain Elohistic forms of expression, as, "all flesh," "all flesh," "all flesh," ex. 14; """"soul"" in the sense of "person"", "ex. 10; """"leat," ex. 13; """"offering," ex. 1; """"a sweet savour," ex. 6; """"a statute for ever," and """"after your generations," ex. 7. But it cannot be from the Elohist, he argues, because (c) it would have placed it after ch. xvi., or at least after ch. xv. (b) he would not have repeated the prohibition of blood, etc., which he had already given; (c) it would have taken a more favorable view of his nation than that implied in ex. 7; and lastly (d) the phraseology has something of the coloring of ec. xvi.—xxvi., which are certainly not Elohistic. Such reasons are too transparently unsatisfactory to be entertained.

He observes further, that the chapter is not altogether Moses. The first enactment (ver. 1-7) does indeed apply only to Israelites, and holds good therefore for the time of Moses. But the remaining three contemplate the ease of strangers living amongst the people, and have a reference to all time.

Ec. xviii.—xx., though it has a hemoristic coloring, cannot have been originally from the Jehovah. The following peculiarities of language, which are worthy of notice, according to Knobel (Exod. und Levitcscn erklärt, in Kursi. com. Holm., 1851) forbid nowhere else in the O. T., """"lie down to"" and """"gender,"" xviii. 23, xix. 10, xx. 16; """"confusion," xviii. 23, xx. 12; """"grape," x. 10; """"near kinswomen," xviii. 17; """"soured," x. 20; """"free," ibid.; """"print marks," xix. 28; """"unceremonious," etc., as applied to fruit-trees, xix. 23; and """"born," xviii. 11, as well as the Egyptian word (for such it probably is) """"garment of divers sorts," which, however, does occur once beside in Deut. xxi. 11.

According to Bunsen, ch. xix. is a genuine part of the Israelite legislation, given however in its original form not on Sinai, but on the east side of the Jordan; whilst the general arrangement of the Mosaic laws may perhaps be as late as the time of the judges. He regards it as a very ancient document, based on the Two Tables, of which, and especially of the first, it is in fact an extension, and consisting of two decalogues and one penal part of laws. Certain expressions in it he considers imply that the people were already settled in the land (vv. 9, 10, 14, 15), while on the other hand ver. 23 supposes a future occupation of the land. Hence he LEWD, as used in Acts xvii. 5, signifies "wicked," "unprincipled" (σαρναπαί). The word is of Anglo-Saxon origin (wicde, people), and was employed to denote the common people, the laity, in distinction from the clergy. Though meaning at first no more than "by" or "unlearned" (comp. John vii. 49), it came at length to signify "sinful," "wicked." See Trench's Glossary of English Words, p. 110 f. (Amer. ed.). Its present restricted meaning is later than the date of the A. V. "Lewdness" (see Acts xviii. 14) has passed into like manner from a wider to a narrower sense.

LIBANUS (Διαβατός), the Greek form of the name LIBNVS (1 Esdr. iv. 48, v. 55; 2 Esdr. iv. 29; Jud. i. 7; Ezech. xxiv. 13, 1 12). Anti-

LIBERTRINES (Αλβερτίναι: Libertini). This word occurs once only in the N. T. In Acts vi. 9, we find the opponents of Stephen's preaching described as "ticos των ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς τῆς λεγομένης Διαβερτίναις καὶ Κορρίναις καὶ Ἀλεξάνδρεως καὶ τῶν ἀπὸ Κλαυσίας καὶ Λαύριας. The question is, who were these "Libertines," and in what relation did they stand to the others who are mentioned with them? The structure of the passage leaves it doubtful how many synagogues are implied in it. Some (t'akin, Beza, Bengel) have taken it as if there were but one synagogue, including men from all the different cities that are named. Winer (N. T. German. p. 179), on grammatical grounds, takes the repetition of the article as indicating a fresh group, and finds accordingly two synagogues, one including Libertines, Cynaeus, Alexandrians; the other those of Olbia and Asia. Meyer (ad loc.) thinks it unlikely that out of the 480 synagogues at Jerusalem (the number given by rabbinic writers, Megill. iv. 3, 4; Ketub. i. 105, 1), there should have been one, or even two only, for natives of cities and districts in which the Jewish population was so numerous, and on that ground assigns a separate synagogue to each of the proper names.

Of the name itself there have been several explanations. (1) The other name being local, this also has been referred to a town in Libyrium in the prosconsular province of Africa. This, it is said, would explain the close juxtaposition with Cyrene. Suidas recognizes Διαβερτίναι as θουαὶ θέρους, and in the Cornell of Carthage in 411 (Mastl. vol. iv. p. 265-274, quoted in Witsch, Handbuch der kirch. Geogr. § 96), we find an Episcopius Libertinensis (Simon, Omnium, N. T. p. 99; and Grégois, de Synag. Libert. Groning. 1736, in Winer, Realch.) Against this hypothesis it has been urged (1), that the existence of a town Libertum, in the first century, is not established; and (2) that if it existed, it can hardly have been important enough either to have a synagogue at Jerusalem for the Jews belonging to it, or to take precedence of Cyrene and Alexandrias in a synagogue common to the three. (2) Conjectural readings have been proposed, Διαβερτίναι (Leemenn, Beza, Terriers, Vulganae), Αλμήνων των κατὰ Κυρέφης (Schultes, de Chr. Sp. p. 162, in Meyer, ad loc.). The difficulty is thus removed; but every rule of textual criticism is against the reception of a reading unsupported by a single MS. or version.

(4.) Taking the word in its received meaning as a name of a town, Lightfoot finds in it a description of natives of Palestine, who, having fallen into slavery, had been manumitted by Jewish masters (Eer. on Acts vi. 9). In this case, however, it is hardly likely that a body of men so circumstances would have received a Roman name.

(4.) Grotius and Vitringa explain the word as describing Italian freedmen who had become converts to Judaism. In this case, however, the word "proscytes" would most probably have been used; and it is at least unlikely that a body of converts would have had a synagogue to themselves, or that proselytes from Italy would have been united with Jews from Cyrene and Alexandrias.

(5.) The earliest explanation of the word (Chrysot.) is also that which has been adopted by the most recent authorities (Winer, Realch., s. v.; Meyer, Kann. ad loc.). The Libertini are Jews who, having been taken prisoners by Pompey and other Roman generals in the Syrian wars, had been reduced to slavery, and had afterwards been emancipated, and returned, permanently or for a time, to the country of their fathers. Of the existence of a large body of Jews in this position at Rome we have abundant evidence. Under Tibertus, the Senatus-Consultum for the suppression of Egyptian and Jewish mysteries led to the banishment of 4,000 "libertini genera" to Sardinia, under the pretense of military or police duty, but really in the hope that the malaria of the island might be fatal to them. Others were to leave Italy unless they abandoned their religion (Tactit. Ann. xii. 88; comp. Josephus (Ant. xviii, 3, 5), narrating the same fact, speaks of the 4,000 who were sent to Sardinia as Jews, and thus identifies them with the "libertini genera" of Tacitus. Philo (Legat, ad Col. p. 1014, 4) in like manner says, that the greater part of the Jews of Rome were in the position of freedmen (παρελθενησαντες), and had been allowed by Augustus to settle in the Trans-Tiberine part of the city, and to follow their own religious customs unmolested (comp. Horace, Sat. i. 4, 143, i. 9, 70). The expulsion from Rome took place A. D. 19; and it is an ingenious conjecture of Mr. Humphry's (Comm. on Arts, ad loc.) that those who were thus banished from Italy may have found their way to Jerusalem, and that, as having suffered for the sake of their religion, they were likely to be foremost in the opposition to a teacher like Stephen, whom they looked on as impugning the sacredness of all that they most revered.

LIBNAH (םיבנה) [Hebrew, splenial]: [Rav.] אֲבָדָת, אֲבָדָת, אֲבָדָת. [Leid. אֲבָדָת, אֲבָדָת. Vat. abs. אֲבָדָת.] עַם, עַמָּה. [See also] אֲבָדָת, אֲבָדָת. [Rav.] אֲבָדָת, אֲבָדָת. [Sin. in Is. xxvii. 8.] [Asa] אֲבָדָת: אֲבָדָת; אֲבָדָת; אֲבָדָת; אֲבָדָת. A city which lay in the northwestern part of the Arab Desert. It was taken by Joshua immediately after the rout of Beth-horon. That eventful day was ended by the capture and destruction of Makkedah (Josh. 11:1) in modern Jewish customs in the East. At Jerusalem, for example, the Jews, who are mostly of foreign origin, are divided into communities more or less distinct according to the countries from which they come, and they assemble for religious services in different synagogues. At Noel, also, in Galilee, where the Jews are somewhat numerous, they appropriate four of their synagogues to the Spanish and Arabian Jews, and four to the German and Polish Jews. H.

c Witsch gives no information beyond the fact just mentioned.
and then the host — "Joshua, and all Israel with him." — moved on to Libnah, which was also totally destroyed, its king and all its inhabitants (Josh. x. 20, 30, 32, 30, xii. 13). The next place is Beis-Lebah.8 Libnah belonged to the district of the Shefedeh, the maritime lowland of Judah, among the cities of which it is enumerated (Josh. xv. 42), not in close connection with either Makkedah or Lachish, but in an independent group of nine towns, among which are Keibah, Maresiah, and Nezib. Libnah was appropriated with its territory to the priests (Josh. xxi. 13; 1 Chr. vi. 57). In the reign of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat it " revolted " from Judah at the same time with Edom (2 K. viii. 22; 2 Chr. xxi. 10); but, beyond the fact of their simultaneous occurrence, there is no apparent connection between the two events. On completing or relinquishing the siege of Lachish — which of the two is not quite certain — Sennacherib laid siege to Libnah (2 K. xix. 9; Is. xxxvii. 8). While there he was joined by Rab-shakeh and the part of the army which had visited Jerusalem (2 K. xix. 8; Is. xxxvii. 8), and received the intelligence of Tirikah's approach; and it would appear that at Libnah the destruction of the Assyrian army took place, though the statements of Herodotus (II. 141) and of Josephus (Ant. x. 1, § 4) place it at Pelusium.9 (See Rawlinson, Herod. i. 48.)

It was the native place of Hanutal, or Hanitah, the queen of Josiah, and mother of Jehoashah (2 K. xxii. 31) and Zelekhiah (xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1). It is in this connection that its name appears for the last time in the Bible. Libnah is described by Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon (c. v. A€&v and "Lebna") merely as a village of the district of Flentheropolis. Its site has hitherto escaped not only discovery, but, until lately, even conjecture. Professor Stanley (S. § of P. 307 note, 320 note), on the ground of the acquaintance of the name Libnah (white) with the "Blanchegare" of the Crusaders, and of both with the appearance of the place, would locate it at Tell es-Safjih, "a white-faced hill . . . which forms a conspicuous object in the eastern part of the plain," and is situated 5 miles N.W. of Beit- libnin. But Tell es-Safjih has claims to be identifified with Gatt, which are considered under that head in this work. Van de Velde places it with confidence at Arric el-Menshejeh, a hill about 4 miles W. of Beit-libnin, on the ground of its being "the only site between Sumel (Makkedah) and Um Labjis (Lachish) showing an ancient fortified position." (Memoir, 330; in his Syria and Palestine it is not named). But as neither Um Labjis nor Sumel, especially the latter, are identified with certainty, the conjecture must be left for further exploration. One thing must not be overlooked, that although Libnah is in the lists of Josh. xv. specified as being in the lowland, yet 3 of the 8 towns which form its group have been actually identified as situated among the mountains to the immediate S. and E. of Beil-libnin. — The name is also found in Shihor-Libnah. 10

LIB'NAH (linva) [white]: Lib'na; [Vat. M. -ren, exc. Ex. vi. 17:] Libni, and once, Num. iii. 18, Libni. 2. The eldest son of Gershon, the son of Levi (Ex. vi. 17; Num. iii. 18; Chr. vii. 19, 20), and ancestor of the family of the Libnites. 2. [Vat. Lib'nes,]. The son of Mahli, or Mahhali, son of Merari (1 Chr. vi. 29), as the text at present stands. It is probable, however, that he is the same with the preceding, and that something has been omitted (comp. vv. 29 with 20, 42) [Mahli, 1.]

LIB'NITES, THE (linvii) [str. see above]: δ Λιβνιτες; [Vat. Lib'nes,]. Libni, Libnites, etc., famili buses), the descendants of Libni, eldest son of Gershon, who formed one of the chief branches of the great Levitical family of Gershonites (Num. iii. 21, xxvi. 58).

LIB'Y A ( λιβυα; [Libyi]) occurs only in Acts ii. 10; c in the phrase "the parts of Libya about Cyrene." (τα μερη της Λιβυας της κατα Κυρηνης) which obviously means the Cyrenaica. Similar expressions are used by Dion Cas-sius (Λιβυαν η περι Κυρηνης, lili. 12) and Josephus

a The sites of these have all been discovered, not in the land, as they are specified, but in the mountains immediately to the south and east of Beil-libnin.8 The account of Berossus, quoted by Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 61) is that the destruction took place when Sannacherib had reached Jerusalem, after his Egyptian expedition, on the first night of the siege. His words ἤτοι ἤτοι των κορωνων αυτων, τον τοιχον και τα τειχη, των της τελωνης και πασας δειπονοιας, etc. Professor Stanley, on the other hand, inclines to agree with the Jewish tradition, which places the event in the pass of Beth-horon, and therefore on the road between Libnah and Jerusalem (S. § of P. 307 note).

LIBYANS

* LIBYANS (λιβύνοι). A: Bases: Lighter. A. V. Pan. vi. 44, should be Libum. In Jer. xvi. 9 it should be Pura (λίβυνοι; Libye).

LICE (λίκης, λίκες, λίκειον, chinium, chinun; σκινίδες, σκινίν: σκινίφες, σκινίφτης). This word occurs in the A. V. only in Ex. vii. 16, 17, 18, and in Ps. xxv. 31: both of which passages have reference to the third great plague of Egypt. In Exodus the miracle is recorded, while in the Psalm grateful remembrance of its issue. The Hebrew word shoph stands which, with some slight variation, occurs only in Ex. vii. 16, 17, 18, and in Ps. xxv. 31—has given occasion to whole pages of discussion: some commentators—amongst whom may be cited Michaelis (Suppl. s. v.), Oehleram (in Verzeich. Samen. i. v. p. 89), Rosenmuller (Schol. in Ex. vii. 12), Haremberg (Obs. Crit. de λίκης, in Mi.ell. Lipp. Nov. vol. ii. pt. iv. p. 617), Dr. Geelbrot (Crit. Rev. Ex. vii. 17), Dr. Harris (Var. Hist. of Bible), to which is to be added the authority of Philo (De Vit. Mos. ii. 97, ed. Magne) and Origen (Hom. Temp. in Exod.), and indeed modern writers generally—suppose that gnats are the animals intended by the original word; while, on the other hand, the Jewish halakha, Josephus (Ant. ii. 14, § 3), Bochart (Hier. iii. 457, ed. Rosenm. Montanus, Munster (Crit. Soc. in Ex. viii. 12), Bryant (Plagues of Egypt, p. 56), and Dr. Adam Clarke are in favor of the translation of the A. V. The old versions, the Chaldee paraphrase, the Targums of Jonathan and Onkelos, the Syriac, the Samaritan Pentateuch, the Arabic, are claimed by Bochart as supporting the opinion that lice are here intended. Another writer believes he can identify the chinun with some worm-like creatures (perhaps some kind of Scorpiones) called ventures, mentioned in V enus’s account of the expedition of Richard I. into the Holy Land, and which by their bites during the night-time occasioned extreme pain (Harmer’s Observ. Chrik’s ed. iii. 549).

With regard to this last theory it may fairly be said that, as it has not a word of proof or authority to support it, it may at once be rejected as fanciful. Those who believe that the plague was one of gnats or monyphids appear to ground their opinion solely on the authority of the LXX., or rather on the interpretation of the Greek word σκινίδες, as given by Philo (De Vit. Mos. ii. 97) and Origen (Hom. Hl. in Exodum). The advocates of the other theory, that lice are the animals meant by chinun and monyph, base their arguments upon these facts: (1) because the chinum sprang from the dust, whereas gnats come from the waters; (2) because gnats, though they may greatly irritate men and beasts, cannot properly be said to be “in” them; (3) because their name is derived from a root b which signifies “to establish,” or “to fix,” which cannot be said of gnats; (4) because if gnats are intended, then the fourth plague of ills would be more likely anticipated; (5) because the Talmudists use the word chinun in the singular number to mean a house; as it is said in the Tentsize on the Sabbath, “As is the man who slays a camel on the Sabbath, so is he who slays a house on the Sabbath.”

Let us examine these arguments as briefly as possible. First, the LXX. has been quoted as a direct proof that chinum means gnats; and certainly in such a matter as this the one before us it is almost impossible to exaggerate the authority of the translators, who dwelt in Egypt, and therefore must be considered good authorities on this subject. But is it quite clear that the Greek word they made use of has so limited a signification? Does the Greek σκινίδες or σκινίφ mean a gnat? Let the reader, however, read carefully the passages quoted in the foot-notes, and he will see at once that at any rate there is very considerable doubt whether any one particular animal is denoted by the Greek word. In the few passages where it occurs in Greek authors the word seems to point in some instances clearly enough to the well-known pests of field and garden, the plant-louse or aphides. By the ινετίς γάρ, the proverb referred to in the note, is very likely meant one of these small active jumping insects, common under leaves and under the bark of trees, known to entomologists by the name of spring-tails (Pneumolites). The Greek lexicographers, having the derivation of the word in view, generally define it to be some small worm-like creature that eats away wood; if they used the Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. ii. cap. ult.) speaks of σκινίδες, and calls them worms. Dioscorides (De Ura) speaks of the well-known visual secretion on the leaves of plants and trees, and says that when this moisture is dried up, animals like gnats appear (σκινίδες κατασκινίδες). In another place (v. 181) he calls them κυμαλοικα. No doubt plant-louse-like are meant. Aristides (ii. 9) speaks of σκινίδες, by which word he clearly means plant-louse, or aphides. Aristophanes speaks of the same class of insects (aphides) with σκινίδοι (gall-blies), and speaks of them as injuring the young shoots of the vines (Arv. p. 257). Aristotle (Hist. An. viii. 3, § 9) speaks of a bird, ωοντήρες, which he terms κυμαλος. Linnæus says they are for the most part taken on the wing: but the sceni here alluded to are doubtless the various kinds of ants, bees, aphides, psamidias, coriace, coronula, etc., etc. which are found on the leaves and under the bark of trees.

term winged the winged aphid is most likely intended, and perhaps veroniculax may sometimes refer to the wingless individual. Because, however, the lexicons occasionally say that the gnats are like a gnat (the "green and wing-flown insect" of Herod. ii. 37), many commentators have come to the hasty conclusion that some species of gnat is denoted by the Greek term; but resemblance by no means constitutes identity, and it will be seen that this insect, the aphid, even though it be winged, is far more closely allied to the wingless house (pediculus) than it is to the gnat, or to any species of the family Culicidae; for the term lice, as applied to the various kinds of rhipides (Phytophthirax, as is their appropriate scientific name), is by no means merely one of analogy. The wingless aphid is in appearance somewhat similar to the pediculus; and indeed a great authority, Barmerste, arranges the Anomala, the order to which the pediculus belongs, with the Rhipides, which contains the sub-order Homoptera, to which the aphides belong. Hence, by an appropriate transfer, the same word which in Arabic means pediculus is applied in one of its significations to the "thistle black with plant-lice." Every one who has observed the thistles of this country black with the peculiar species that infests them can see the force of the meaning assigned to it in the Arabic language.*

Again, almost all the passages where the Greek words lice speak of the animal, be it what it may, as being injurious to plants or trees; it cannot therefore be applied in a restricted sense to any gnat (culex or simulium), for the Culicidae are eminently blood-suckers, not vegetable-feeders.b

Oedermann (Propisch. Studiun, i. ch. vi.) is of opinion that the species of mosquito denoted by the chironax is probably some minute kind allied to the Culex reptans, c. pulicris of Linnaeus. That such an insect might have been the instrument God made use of in the third plague with which He visited the Egyptians is readily granted, so far as the irritating powers of the creature are concerned, for the members of the genus Simulium (sand-fly) are a terrible pest in those localities where they abound. But no proof at all can be brought forward in support of this theory.

Bryant, in illustrating the propriety of the plague being one of lice, has the following very just remarks: "The Egyptians affected great external purity, and were very nice both in their persons and clothing... Uncommon care was taken not to harbor any vermin. They were particularly solicitous on this head; thinking it would be a great profanation of the temple which they entered if any animalcule of this sort were concealed in their garments." And we learn from Herodotus that so scrupulous were the priests on this point that they used to shave the hair off their heads and bodies every third day for fear of harboring any house while occupied in their sacred duties (Herod. ii. 37). "We may hence see what an abhorrence the Egyptians showed towards this sort of vermin, and that the judgments inflicted by the hand of Moses were adapted to their prejudices." (Bryant's Observations, etc., p. 56).

The evidence of the old versions, adduced by Bochart in support of his opinion, has been called in question by Rosenmüller and Gildes, who will not allow that the words used by the Syriacs, the Chaldees, and the Arabic versions, as the representatives of the sacred versions of the Hebrew chironax, can properly be translated lice; but the interpretations which they themselves allow to these words apply better to lice than to gants; and it is almost certain that the normal meaning of the words in all these three versions, and indisputably in the Arabic, applies to lice. It is readily granted that some of the arguments brought forward by Bochart (Hier. iii. 437, ed. Rosenm.) and his commentators are unanswerable. As the plague was certainly an irritation, nothing can be deduced from the assertion made that the chironax sprang from the dust; neither is Bochart's derivation of the Hebrew word accepted by scholars generally. Much force however is contained in the Talmudical use of the word chironax, to express a house, though Gesenius asserts that nothing can be adduced thence.

On the whole, therefore, this much appears certain, that those commentators who assert that chironax means gants have arrived at this conclusion without sufficient authority; they have based their arguments solely on the evidence of the LXX., though it is by no means proved that the Greek word used by these translators has any reference to gants; the Greek word, which probably originally denoted any small irritating creature, being derived from a root which means to bite, to gnaw, was used in this general sense, and selected by the LXX. translators to express the original word, which has an origin kindred to that of the Greek word, but the precise meaning of which they did not know. They had in view the derivation of the Hebrew term chironax, from charrad, "to gnaw," and most appropriately rendered it by the Greek word knv, from knw, "to gnaw." It appears therefore that there is not sufficient authority for departing from the translation of the A. V., which renders the Hebrew word by lice; and as it is supported by the evidence of many of the old versions, it is best to rest contented with it. At any rate the point is still open, and no hasty conclusion can be adopted concerning it.

LIEUTENANTS ((!(zv-wtvwJ)). The use of the term was restricted to it by the LXX. translators. It has been shown, from the quotations given above, that the Greek word has a wide signification: it is an aphid, a worm, a flea, or a spring-tail—in fact any small insect-like animal that bites and all therefore that should legitimately be deduced from the words and that two writers in that instance to some irritating winged insect a term which, from its derivation, so appropriately describes its irritating properties. Their insect seems to refer to some species of midge (Ceratopogon).

c. If the LXX. understood gnats by the Hebrew term, why did not these translators use some well-known Greek name for gnats, as onowj or e? A Hebrew achashveiroshan was the official title of the satrap or viceroy who governed the provinces of the Persian empire; it is rendered "lieutenant" in Keth. iii. 12, viii. 9, ix. 3; Ezr. viii. 36, and "prince" in Dan. iii. 2, vi. 1, &c. W. L. B.

LIGN ALOES.

Ligure (λιγόρη, leshem: λεγόρις: Abk. ἀργύριον: lyciuris). A precious stone mentioned in Ex. xxvii. 19, xxxix. 12, as the first in the third row of the high-priest's breastplate. "And the third row, a ligure, an agate, and an amethyst." It is impossible to say, with any certainty, what stone is denoted by the Hebrew term. The LXX. version generally, the Vulgate and Josephus (B. J. v. 5, § 7), understand the liycurium or lycium; but it is a matter of considerable difficulty to identify the liycurium of the ancients with any known precious stone. Dr. Woodward and some old commentators have supposed that it was some kind of beryl, because, as these fossils consist of beryl-like particles, they have thought that they have been able to detect, upon heating or rubbing pieces of them, the absurd origin which Theophrastus (Frag. ii. 28, 31, xv. 2, ed. Schneider) and Pliny (H. N. xxxvii. iii.) ascribe to the lycium. Others have imagined that amber is denoted by this word; but Theophrastus, in the passage cited above, has given a detailed description of the stone, and clearly distinguishes it from electrum, or amber. Amber, moreover, is too soft for engraving upon; while the lycurium was a hard stone, out of which seals were made. Another interpretation seeks the origin of the word in the country of Liguria (Genoa), where the stone was found, but makes no attempt at identification. Others again, without reason, suppose the word to be meant (Rosenmüller. Schr. in Ex. xxvii. 19).

Dr. Watson (Phil. Trans. vol. iv. p. 391) identifies it with the tourmalie. Beckmann (Hist. Juxta. i. 87, Bohn) believes, with Braun, Ephraimius, and J. de Laet, that the description of the lycurium agrees well with the lycurium stone of modern mineralogists. With this supposition Hill (Notes on Theophrastus on Stones, p. 50, note 161) and Rosenmüller (Mineral. of Bibl., p. 56, Bib. Cod.) agree. It must be confessed, however, that this opinion is far from satisfactory, for there is the following difficulty in the identification of the lycurium with the lycurium. Theophrastus, speaking of the properties of the lycurium, says that it attracts not only particles of wood, but fragments of iron and brass. Now there is no peculiar attractive power in the hyacinth; nor is Beckmann's explanation of this point sufficient. He says: "If we consider its [the *lycurium's"] attracting of small bodies in the same manner as our hyacinth in common with all stones of the glassy species, I cannot see anything to controvert this opinion, and to induce us to believe the lycurium and the tourmalie to be the same." But surely the lycurium, what ever it be, had in a marked manner magmatic properties; indeed, the term was applied to the stone on this very account, for the Greek name lycurion appears to be derived from lyceies (λυκής), "to lick," "to attract," and doubtless was selected by the LXX. translators for this reason to express the Hebrew word, which has a similar derivation. More probable, though still inconclusive, appears the opinion of those who identify the lycurium with the tourmalie, or more definitely with the red variety known as rubellite, which is a hard stone and used as a gem, and sometimes sold for red sapphire. Theophrastus becomes, as is well known, electrically polar when heated. Beckmann's objection, that "had Theophrastus been acquainted with the tourmalie, he would have remarked that it did not acquire its attractive power till it was heated," is answered by his own admission on the passage, quoted from the Histoire de l'Académie for 1717, p. 7 (see Beckmann, i. 91).

Tourmalie is a mineral found in many parts of the world. The Duke de Nova purchased two of these stones in Holland, which are there called aschentrichter. Linnæus, in his preface to the Flora Zeylanica, mentions the stone under the name of boja electrica from Ceylon. The natives call it tourmalie ([Phil. Trans. in loc. cit.]). Many of the precious stones which were in the possession of the Isaraélites during their wanderings were no doubt obtained from the Egyptians, who might have procured from the Tyrian merchants specimens from even India and Ceylon, etc. The fine specimen of rubellite now in the British Museum belonged formerly to the King of Ava.

The word ligure is unknown in modern mineralogy. Phillips (Mineral. 87) mentions ligure, the fragments of which are meven and transparent, with a vitreous lustre. It occurs in a sort of talcose rock in the banks of a river in the Apennines. The claim of rubellite to be the leshem of Scripture is very uncertain, but it is perhaps better than that of the other minerals which writers have from time to time endeavored to identify with it.

a The LXX. give ἀργυρίῳ or ἀργυρίον, and ·έρως, the Vulgate lithargyrum and principis. Both the Hebrew and the Greek words are modifications of the same Sanskrit root: but philologists are not agreed as to the form or meaning of the word. Gesenius (Diss. p. 71) adopts the opinion of Von Bohlen that it comes from kotarpito, meaning "warror of the host." Pott (Rhetor. Graec. Prod. p. 65) associates other derivations more in consonance with the position of the satrap as arris or than military rulers.
Spanish version of the Canticles, shâbhin and shôshanâh are always translated by ros; but in Hos. xiv. 5 the latter is rendered lilin. But krînô or "lily," is the uniform rendering of the LXX, and is in all probability the true one, as it is supported by the analogy of the Arabic and Persian susan, which has the same meaning to this day, and by the existence of the same word in Syrian and Coptic. The Spanish azucena, a "white lily," is merely a modification of the Arabic.

But although there is little doubt that the word denotes some plant of the lily species, it is by no means certain what individual of this class it especially designates. Father Soucé (Recueil de doc. crit. 1715) labored to prove that the lily of Scripture is the "craven-imperial," the Persian tastît, the krînô basâlik of the Greeks, and the Fritillaria imperialis of Linnaus. So common was this plant in Persia, that it is supposed to have given its name to Susa, the capital (Athn. xii. 1: Bochart, Platyg. ii. 14). But there is no proof that it was at any time common in Palestine, and "the lily" per excellence of Persia would not of necessity be "the lily" of the Holy Land. Dioscorides (l. 62) bears witness to the beauty of the lilies of Syria and Fisidia, from which the best perfume was made. He says (ill. 106 [116]) of the krînô basâlik that the Syrians call it côsa (shushan), and the Africans âdâblâbun, which Bochart renders in Hebrew characters פֶלֶּט פֶלֶּט, "white shoot."

Kühn, in his note on the passage, identifies the plant in question with the Lilium candidum of Linnaeus. It is probably the same as that called in the Mishnah "king's lily" (Kid. v. 8). Pliny (xxi. 5) defines krînô as "rubens lillium;" and Dioscorides, in another passage, mentions the fact that there are lilies with purple flowers; but whether by this he intended the Lilium Martagon or Chelidonium, Kühn leaves undecided. Now in the passage of Athenæus above quoted it is said, Σώρον γάρ ἐναι τῇ Ἑλληνικῇ φωνῇ τὸ κρίνῳ. But in the Rhetoricianus Lilium (s. v. Σώρον) we find τὸ γάρ λεύκω ὑπὸ τῶν Φώκων σοφών εὐχων εὐχων.* As the shushan is thus identified both with krînô, the red or purple lily, and with lêpînô, the white lily, it is evidently impossible from the word itself to ascertain exactly the kind of lily which is referred to. If the shushan or shinkhun of the O. T. and the krînô of the Sermon on the Mount be identical, which there seems no reason to doubt, the plant designated by these terms must have been a conspicuous object on the shores of the Lake of Gennesaret (Matt. vi. 28; Luke xii. 27); it must have flourished in the deep broad valleys of Palestine (Cant. ii. 1), among the thorny shrubs (ibid. ii. 2), and pastures of the desert (ibid. ii. 16, iv. 5, vi. 3); and must have been remarkable for its rapid and luxuriant growth (Hos. xiv. 5; Ecclus. xxxix. 14). That its flowers were brilliant in color would seem to be indicated in Matt. vi. 28, where it is compared with the gorgeous robes of Solomon; and that this color was scarlet or purple is implied in Cant. v. 13.2 A There appears to be no species of lily which so completely answers all these requirements as the Lilium Chelidonium, or Scarlet Martagon, which grows in profusion in the Levant. But direct evidence on the point is still to be desired from the observation of travellers. We have, however, a letter from Dr. Bowring, referred to (Gard. Chron. ii. 534), in which, under the name of Lilia Spicata, Lindley identifies with the L. Chelidonium a flower which is "abundant in the district of Galilee" in the months of April and May. Sprangel (Ant. Bot. Spec. i. 9) identifies the Greek krînô with the L. Martagon.

With regard to the other plants which have been identified with the shushan, the difficulties are many and great. Gesenius derives the word from a root signifying "to be white," and it has hence been inferred that the shushan is the white lily. But it is by no means certain that the Lilium candidum grows wild in Palestine, though a specimen was found by Forskål at Zamulak in Arabia Felix.5 Dr. Boitoe (Kitto's Cyclop. art. "Shushan") identifies the "lily" of the Canticles with the lily of Egypt, in spite of the many allusions to "feeding among the lilies." The purple flowers of the khôb, or wild arborite, which abounds in the plain north of Tabor and in the Valley of Esdraelon, have been thought by some to be the "lilies of the field" alluded to in Matt. vi. 28 (Wilson, Levili of the Bible, ii. 110). A recent traveller mentions a plant, with lily flowers like the hyacinth, and called by the Arabs wassik, which he considered to be of the species denominated lily in Scripture (Bonar, Desert of Sinai, p. 239). Lynch enumerates the "lily" as among the plants seen by him on the shores of the Dead Sea, but gives no details which could lead to its identification (Leyden to Jordan, p. 286). He had previously observed the water-lily on the Jordan (p. 173), but omits to mention whether it was the yellow (Nymphae later) or the special mention of the L. candidum growing in Palestine; and in connection with the habitat given by Stram it is worth observing that the lily is mentioned in Ant. ii. 1 with the rose of Sharon. Now let this be compared with Jerome's Comment. at Is xxxii. 9: "Saron omnis juxta Jupon Lydiamque appellatui regio in qua lietstini campi fertilesque tenduntur." W. H.
white (Nymphaea alba). "The only lilies which I saw in Palestine," says Prof. Stanley, "in the months of March and April, were large yellow water-lilies, in the clear spring of 'Ain Melhah, near the Lake of Merom" (S. of P. p. 129). He suggests that the name "lily," "may include the numerous flowers of the tulip or amaryllis kind, which appear in the early summer, or the autumn of Palestine." The following description of the Hülhe-lily by Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, i. 394) were it more precise, would perhaps have enabled botanists to identify it: "This Hülhe-lily is very large, and the three inner petals next above and form a gorgeous canopy, such as art never approached, and king never sat under, even in his utmost glory. . . . We call it Hülhe-lily, because it was here that it was first discovered.

its botanical name, if it have one, I am unacquainted with. . . . Our flower delights most in the valleys, but is also found on the mountains. It grows among thorns, and I have easily located my hands in extricating it from them. Nothing can be in higher contrast than the luxuriant velvety softness of this lily, and the crinkled tangled hedge of thorns about it. Gazelles still delight to feed among them; and you can scarcely ride through the woods north of Tabor, where these lilies abound, without frightening them from their flowery pastures. If some future traveller would give a description of the Hülhe-lily somewhat less vague than the above, the question might be at once resolved. [PALESTINE — BOTANY.]

The Phcenician architects of Solomon's temple decorated the capitals of the columns with "lily-work," that is, with leaves and flowers of the lily (1 K. vii., corresponding to the loto-headed capitals of Egyptian architecture. The rim of the "bouquet" was possibly wrought in the form of the recurved margin of a lily flower (1 K. vii. 26). whether the shekhowna and sheboun mentioned in the titles of Ps. xlv., lxx., lxxv., and lxxv. were musical instruments in the form of lilies, or whether the word denoted a musical air, will be discussed under the article Shoshannim. W. A. W.

The description in Matt. vi. 28—30 implies that this plant was familiar to Christ's hearers. This consideration would at once exclude Lilium candidum, which, if found at all in Syria and Palestine, must be extremely rare, and probably only as escaped from cultivation.

It is impossible also that any of the water-lilies could be intended, as the lilies mentioned grew in the field.

The requirements of the text are the following:

(1) A plant of the order Liliaceae or one of the allied orders of Trillaeae or Amaryllidaceae. Any plant which would be vulgarly called a lily would suit the case, inasmuch as we are not to imagine language used here in the accurate style of a botanist.

(2) It must be a plant growing in the fields, with a stem of sufficient size and solidity to be an element of the fuel of the brazier or oriental oven. It is customary in the East to gather out the ears and various flowering plants from among the wheat, before the time of harvest, and to bind them in bundles, and either to feed them to the cattle, or burn them in the oven. The lily mentioned must be of this character, in order to suit the narrative.

(3) It must be a plant of rich colored flowers, probably purple, inasmuch as this color would better suit the comparison with the colors of royal garments.

There are several plants which have been supposed to represent the lily, which we can eliminate by the above tests. Lilium candidum has been already excluded. Anemono coronaria, with its two varieties of red and purple flowers, has been described as the plant in question. But in the first place it is the most distant possible from the lilies, being of the family of the Rutaceae. In the second place it is a low herbaceous plant, not occurring so much among wheat as in open grassy places, by roadsides. It has no stem, and is not gathered for the ovens. It is common enough, but for the two reasons mentioned is quite inadmissible.

The remaining hypotheses may all be grouped into one class. They consist in assuming one of the plants of the above named orders to be the plant here designated. Some have supposed the Lilium Chelidonioideum. Others have supposed the great Iris of the Hülhe, which Dr. Thomson calls the Hülhe lily. Others still have endeavored to prove the claims of others of these natural orders.

My own opinion is, that the term "lily" here is general, and that it does not refer to any species exclusively. There are several fine plants of these orders which are found more or less disflained through Palestine, as Tulipae orientales, Lilium Chelidonioideum, Iris reticulata, and others of that genus, and last, but not least likely to have been before the eyes and in the minds of the hearers of the sermon on the Mount, Gladiolus Hyoscire. Indeed, if any one species more than another be designated, I incline to think that this is the one.

This plant is a showy species, growing to a height of two or three feet, among the wheat and barley. It has a redly stem, and a large raceme of purple flowers, an inch and a half broad when open, and it is a sufficiently striking and showy flower to have been the subject of the comparison. Moreover, it is one of those wild plants which are constantly plucked up with the other weeds, and fed to cattle, or burned in the fire.

Still I incline to think that the Saviour, in speaking of the lilies, used the term in the same general way that an inhabitant of the Middle States would peak of wild lilies, in allusion to their bright colors, not particularly designating, or perhaps not being aware of the specific differences of the individuals of the genus. He might have seen a lily, and been struck with its beauty, and used that quality to illustrate his speech, without knowing whether he had seen Gilia stand employed as captives or as lilies. Nay, he might have seen an Ergobro-

N E, or a Gladiola, and called them lilies. Or he might have drawn his illustration from the combined impression produced on his mind by all the species and general names. I conceive the latter to have been the case in the Sermon on the Mount.

LIME (LAM). Acole. This substance is noticed only three times in the Bible, namely, in Deut. xxvii. 2, 4, where it is ordered to be laid on the great stones wherein the law was to be written (A. V. "thou shalt plaster them with plaster"); in Is. xxxiii. 12, where the "burnings of lime" are figuratively used to express " complete destruction," and in Am. ii. 11, where the prophet describes the outrage committed on the memory of the king of Edom by the Moabites, when they took his bones and burned them into "line," i. e. calcined them—an indignity of which we have another instance in 2 K. xxi. 16. That the Jews were ac-quisitied with the use of the lime-kiln, has been already noticed. [Furnace.] W. L. B.

LINEN. Several Hebrew words are so rendered, which in some passages admit of a closer discrimination. In addition to the ordinary applications it often denotes a line or cord used for mea-
xxiii. 13, 6 c.; 57, Ps. lxxviii. 55 (56); Am. vii.
17; Is. xiv. 13, where the A. V. has "rule," but in this last passage 174 is probably "graver," "style", "not line" as in A. V. A peculiar use of the measuring line occurs in 2 Sam. viii. 2 (where the word is 174). David, after a signal victory over the Moabites, who appear to have given him special provocation, put to death two thirds of his captives and spared one third. He required them to be down on the ground, and then with a line measured them off after that proportion. The line as employed for measuring, by a frequent metonymy stands often for lot, possession, or inheritance (as 174 in Jos. xvii. 14, xix. 9; Ps. xvi. 5 (6); Ezek. xlvii. 13 ff.). The sense of "their line" (174), i. e. of the heavens in Ps. xix. 5 (5), is uncertain. In this highly poetical passage it may well enough denote the expense of or expenditure on which the heavens measure off as they bend over all the earth, through-out which is to be heard the proclamation which they make of God's existence and attributes. So Hippelet (Die Psalmen, i. 410), who agrees here with Hengstenberg (Die Psalmen, i. 440 f.). Paul's citation of the passage (Rom. x. 18) follows the LXX. which has φιλογένος, "a sound" (A. V.), as from the strings of a lyre. By "plumb-line" 174, only Am. vii. 7, (twice) is usually understood a line with lead attached to it for determining the perpendicularity of objects. Jehovah, as repre-ented there by the prophet, stands on a straight-line wall with a line in his hand, as a symbol of the strict justice with which He will call his people to account for their sins (see Baur, Der

Prophet Amos, p. 407, and Keil, Die 12 kleinere

Propheten, p. 221). The proper rendering of 174, Gen. xxxviii. 18, is line or cord (in the A. V. "bracelets"), by which the signet-ring was attached to the neck. See Conant, Genesis, etc. p. 160. The literal and metaphorical senses blend themselves in Paul's expression (ἐν ἀλάτισσα κορώνα), 2 Cor. x. 16, i. e. another line or sphere of labor allotted to him by God's providence.

LINEN. Five different Hebrew words are thus rendered, and it is difficult to assign to each its precise significance. With regard to the Greek words so translated in the N. T. there is less ambiguity.

1. As Egypt was the great centre of the linen manufacture of antiquity, it is in connection with that country that we find the first allusion to it in the Bible. Joseph, when promoted to the dignity of ruler of the land of Egypt, was arrayed in "vestures of fine linen" (shēsh), marg. "silk," Gen. xli. 42); and among the offerings for the tabernacle of the things which the Israelites had brought out of Egypt were "purple, and blue, and fine twined linen" (Ex. xxvii. 6, xxvi. 5). Of twisted threads of this material were composed the ten embroidered hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi.

1), the vail which separated the holy place from the holy of holies (Ex. xxvii. 31), and the curtain for the entrance (ver. 36), wrought with needle-

plate of judgment, were of "fine twined linen" (Ex. xxviii. 6, 15). Of fine linen woven in checker-work were made the high-priest's tunic and mitre (Ex. xxviii. 39). The tunics, turbans, and drawers of the inferior priests (Ex. xxxix. 27, 28) are simply described as of woven work of fine linen.

2. But in Ex. xxviii. 42, and Lev. vi. 10, the drawers of the priests and their flowing robes are said to be of "linen" (bad) and the tunic of the high-priest, his girdle, and mitre, which he wore on the day of atonement, were made of the same material (Lev. xvi. 4). Conant (De Reg. Hebr. ii. c. i.) maintained that the robes worn by the high-priest throughout the year, which are called by the Talmudists "the golden vestments," were thus named because they were made of a more valuable kind of linen (shēsh) than that of which "white vestments," worn only on the day of atonement, were composed (bad). But in the Mishna (Cod. Joma, iii. 7) it is said that the dress worn by the high-priest on the morning of the day of atonement was of linen of Pefusium, that is, of the finest description. In the evening of the same day he wore garments of Indian linen, which was less costly than the Egyptian. From a comparison of Ex. xxviii. 42 with xxxix. 28, it seems clear that bad and shēsh were synonymous, or, if there be any difference between them, the latter probably de-

imkibot, c. 8) considered them as identical with regard to the material of which they were composed, for he says, "wherever in the Law bad or shēsh are mentioned, they signify flax, that is, byssus." And Abbaranel (on Ex. xxvii.) defines shēsh to be Egyptian flax, and distinguishes it as composed of six (Heb. šākēḥ, = six) threads twisted together, from bōd, which was single. But in opposition to this may be quoted Ex. xxxix. 28, where the drawers of the priests are said to be linen (bōd) or fine twined linen (šākēḥ). The wise-hearted among the women of the congregation spun the flax which was used by Bezaleel and Aholin for the hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. xxxv. 25), and the making of linen was one of the occupations of women of whose dress it forms an insipid part (Prov. xxxi. 22, A. V. "silks," Ex. xxxix. 10, 13; comp. Rev. xvi. 16). In Ez. xxvii. 7 šākēḥ is enumerated among the products of Egypt, which the Tyrians imported and used for the sails of their ships; and the vessel constructed for Tidoney Philopator is said by Athenæus to have had a sail of bōsus (βοσῦν ἔχων ἱστόν, Deipn. i. 27. 1). Hermippus (quoted by Athenæus) describes Egypt as the great emporium for sails—

"Ex 8 Ἀληθεύτω τὰ κηρύσσατα ἱστία καὶ βηθανάω.

Cleopatra's galley at the battle of Actium had a sail of purple canvas (Plin. xix. 5). The ephebōn worn by the priests (1 Sam. xxii. 18), by Samuel, though he was a Levite (1 Sam. ii. 18), and by David when he danced before the ark (2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Chr. xxv. 27), were all of linen (bōd). The man whom Daniel saw in vision by the river Hiddekel was clothed in linen (bōd, Dan. x. 5, xii. 6, 7; comp. Matt. xxviii. 3). In no case was linen used for other than a dress worn in religious ceremonies, though the other terms rendered "linen" are applied to the ordinary dress of women and persons in high rank.

3. Bōtēs, always translated "fine linen" except 2 Chr. v. 12, is apparently a late word, and probably the same with the Greek βατος, by which it is represented by the LXX. It was used for the dresses of the Levite choir in the temple (2 Chr. v. 12), for the loose upper garment worn by kings over the close-fitting tunics (1 Chr. xxv. 27), and for the veil of the Temple, embroidered by the skill of the Tyrian artificers (2 Chr. iii. 14). Morelacci was arrayed in robes of fine linen (bōtēs) and purple (Esth. viii. 15) when honored by the Persian king, and the dress of the rich man in the parable was purple and fine linen (βατος καὶ λευκός, Luke xvi. 19). The Tyrians were celebrated for their skill in linen-embroidery (2 Chr. ii. 14), and the house of Ashbeh, a family of the descendants of Shelah the son of Judah, were workers in fine linen, probably in the lowland country (1 Chr. iv. 21). Tradition adds that they wove the robes of the kings and priests (Targ. Joseph), and, according to Jarchi, the hangings of the sanctuary. The cords of the canopy over the garden-court of the palace at Shushan were of fine linen (bōtēs, Esth. i. 6). "Purple and brocaded work and fine linen" were brought by the Syrians to the market of Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 16), the ἐνδυματὰ of Syria being distinguished from the šākēḥ at Egypt, mentioned in ver. 7, as being in all probability an Aramaic word, while šākēḥ is referred o as an Egyptian original.\footnote{\textsuperscript{b}} "Fine linen" (βατος), with purple and silk are enumerated in Rev. xvii. 12 as among the merchandise of the mystical Babylon; and to the Lamb's wife (viii. 8) it was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen (βατος καὶ λευκός) clean and white: "the symbolical significance of this vesture being immediately explained, "for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints." And probably with the same intent the armies in heaven, who rode upon white horses and followed the "Faithful and True," were clad in "fine linen, white and clean," as they went forth to battle with the beast and his army (Rev. xix. 14).

4. Εἴθη occurs but once (Prov. vii. 16), and there in connection with Egypt. Schultens connects it with the Greek οἴθην, οἴθων, which he supposes were derived from it. The Talmudists translate it by תַּכְלָב, chabel, a cord or rope, in consequence of its identity in form with שֵׁית, which occurs in the Targ. on Josh. ii. 15, and Esth. i. 6: R. Parchon interpret it "a girdle of Egyptian work." But in what way these cords were applied to the decoration of beds is not clear. Probably Εἴθη was a kind of thread made of fine Egyptian flax, and used for ornamenting the coverings of beds with tapestry-work. In support of this may be quoted the ἄγωντας τοῦ ΛΧΧ., and the πίττες τοπιτας of the Vulgate, which represent the עַנָּה עַנָּה of the Hebrew. But Celsius renders the word "linen," and appeals to the Greek ἐθών, οἴθων, as decisive upon the point. See Jablonski, Opusc. i. 72, 73.

Schultens (Prov. vii. 16) suggests that the Greek σταυρωθήν is derived from the Hebrew שַׁדָיוֹת, which is used of the thirty linen garments which Maimon promised to his companions (Judg. xiv. 12, 13) at his weding, and which he stripped from the bodies of the Philistines whom he slew at Ashekron (ver. 19). It was made by women (Prov. xxxi. 24), and used for girdles and under-garments (Is. iii. 23; comp. Mark xiv. 51). The LXX. in Judg. and Prov. render it σταυρωθήν, but in Judg. xiv. 13 οἴθων is used synonymously: just as σταυρωθήν in Matt. xxvii. 59, Mark xv. 46, and Luke xxii. 53, is the same as οἴθων in Luke xxiv. 12; John xv. 5, 6, xii. 10. In these passages it is seen that linen was used for the winding-sheets of the dead by the Hebrews as well as by the Greeks (Hom. II. xxviii. 358, xxix. 235; comp. Eur. Iph. 819). Towels were made of it (Ἀμφικαμμεν, John xiii. 4, 5), and τάπαινας (σαπορία, John xi. 41), like the coarse linen of the Egyptians. The dress of the poor (Ezech. xi. 4) was probably unbleached flax (αὐτόρως), such as was used for barbers' towels (Plut. De terr. 1.).

The general term which included all those already mentioned was πίστης, corresponding to the Greek Αἰων, which was employed — like our "cotton" — to denote not only the flax (Judg. xv. 14) or raw material from which the linen was made, but also the plant itself (Josh. ii. 6), and the manufacture from it. It is generally opposed to wool, as a vegetable product to an animal (Lev. xii. 47, 48, 52.)

59: Deut. xxi. 11; Prov. xxxi. 13; Hos. ii. 5, 9), and was used for nets (Isa. ix. 9), girdles (Jer. xiii. 1), and measuring-lines (Ex. xl. 3), as well as for the dress of the priests (Ex. xlv. 17, 18). From a comparison of the last-quoted passages with Ex. xxxvii. 42, and Lev. vi. 10 (3), xvi. 4, 23, it is evident that "byd and phleket denote the same material, the former being the name given to it. It is equally apparent, from a comparison of Rev. xv. 6 with xix. 14, that λιθαυν and δισθοιες are essentially the same. Mr. Yates (Text. Antiq. Rom., p. 276) contends that λιθαυν denotes the common flax, and δισθοιες the finer variety, and that in this sense the terms are used by Pausanias (vi. 20, § 4). Till the time of Dr. Forster it was never doubted that δισθοια was a kind of flax, but it was maintained by him to be cotton. That the mummy-cloths used by the Egyptians were cotton and not linen was first asserted by Rouelle (Mem. de l'Acad. Roy. des Scienc. 1750), and he was supported in his opinion by Dr. Forster and Dr. Solander, after an examination of the mummies in the British Museum. But a more careful scrutiny by Mr. Bauer of about 400 specimens of mummy-cloth has shown that they were, or variously, linen. Dr. Urn arrived independently at the same conclusion (Yates, Text. Ant. b. ii.).

One word remains to be noticed, which our A. V. has translated "linen yarn" (1 K. x. 28; 2 Chr. i. 16), brought out of Egypt by Solomon's merchants. The Hebrew mikneh, or mikneh, is variously explained. In the LXX. of 1 Kings it appears as a proper name, Κοηνατε, and in the Vulgate Ose, a place in Arabia Felix. By the Syriac (2 Chr.) and Arabic translators it was also regarded as the name of a place. Bochart once referred it to Trogodyte Egypt, anciently called Michiohe, according to Pliny (vi. 34), but afterwards decided that it signified "a tax" (Hieroc. pt. 1. b. 2, c. 9). To these Michialis adds a conjecture of his own, that Κοηνατε in the interior of Africa, S. W. of Egypt, might be the place referred to, as the country whence Egypt procured its horses (Loeae of Moses, trans. Smith, ii. 493). In translating the word "linen yarn" the A. V. followed Junius and Tremellius, who are supported by Sebastian Schmid, De Dien, and Clericus. Gesenius has recourse to a very unnatural construction, and rendering the word "troop," refers it in the first clause to the king's merchants, and in the second to the horses which they brought.

From time immemorial Egypt was celebrated for its linen (Ex. xxvii. 7). It was the dress of the Egyptian priests (Her. ii. 37, 81), and was worn by them, according to Plutarch (Is. et Osir. 4), because the color of the flax-blossem resembled that of the circumambient ether (comp. Juv. vi. 533), of the priests of Isis). Panopolis or Chemmis (the modern Akhmim) was anciently inhabited by linen-workers (Strabo, xvii. 41, p. 819). According to Herodotus (ii. 80) the mummy-cloths were of bysusa; and Josephus (Ant. iii. 6, § 1) mentions among the contributions of the Israelites for the tabernacle, "bysusa of flax;" the hangings of the tabernacle were "sindon of bysusa" (§ 2), of which material the tunics of the priests were also made (Ant. iii. 7, § 2), the drawers being of bysusa (§ 1). Phile also says that the high-priest wore a garment of the finest bysusa. Combining the testimony of Herodotus as to the mummy-cloths with the results of microscopic examination, it seems clear that bysusa was linen, and not cotton; and moreover, that the dresses of the Jewish priests were made of the same, the purest of all materials. LINTEL. The beam which forms the upper part of the framework of a door. In the A. V. "lintel" is the rendering of three Hebrew words.

1. יָּלְתֶל, ayil (1 K. vi. 31); translated "post" throughout Ex. xl. xli. The true meaning of this word is extremely doubtful. In the LXX. it is left untranslated (αιλ, αἰλεί, αἰλαίδα); and in the Chaldee version it is represented by a modification of itself. Throughout the passages of Ezekiel in which it occurs the Vulg. uniformly renders it by from; which Gesenius quotes as favorable to his own view, provided that by from be understood the projections in front of the building.

The A. V. of 1 K. vi. 31, "lintel," is supported by the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and the Codex of Ex. xl. 21; while Kimchi explains it generally by "post." The Peshito-Syriac uniformly renders the word by a modification of the Greek παρατάξειοι, "pillars." Jarchi understands by ayil a round column like a large tree; Aquila (Ex. xl. 14) having in view the meaning "ramp," which the word elsewhere bears, renders it πλακας, apparently intending thereby to denote the volutes of columns, curved like rams' horns. J. D. Michaelis (Supp. ad Lex. s. v.) considers it to be the tympanum or triangular area of the pediment above a gate, supported by columns. Gesenius himself, after reviewing the passages in which the word occurs, arrives at the conclusion that in the singular it denotes the whole projecting framework of a door or gateway, including the jambs on either side, the threshold, and the lintel or architrave, with frieze and cornice. In the plural it is applied to denote the projections along the front of an edifice ornamented with columns or palm-trees, and with recesses or intercolumniations between them sometimes filled up by windows. Under the former head he places 1 K. vi. 31; Ex. xi. 9, 24, 26, 29, 31, 53, 24, 58, 48, 49, Ex. vili; while to the latter he refers xil. 10, 11, 16. No satisfactory explanation still is that of Boeotcher (quoted by Winer, Realb. ii. 575), who says that ayil is the projecting entrance and passage wall—which might appropriately be divided into compartments by paliards; and this view is adopted by Fürst (Handw. s. v.).

2. יָּלְתֶל, cophēr (Amos ix. 1; Zeph. ii. 14). The marginal rendering, "chapter or knop," of both these passages is undoubtedly the more correct, and in all other cases where the word occurs it is translated "knop." [Knop.]

3. יַכִּפָּה, maskabiph (Ex. xii. 22, 23); also rendered "upper door-post" in Ex. xi. 7. That this is the true rendering is admitted by all modern philologists, who connect it with a root which in Arabic and the cognate dialects signifies "to overlay with beams." The LXX. and Vulgate coincide in assigning to it the same meaning. Rabbi Sol. Jarchi derives it from a Chaldee root signifying "to beat," because the door in being shut "beat" against it. The signification "to look," or "peep," which was acquired by the Hebrew rea, induced
LINUS

Linus Ezra to translate maschoph by "window," such as the Arabs have over the doors of their houses; and in asserting to this rendering, Bochart observes "that it was so called on account of the grates and railings over the tops of the doors, through which those who desire entrance into the house could be seen before they were admitted" (Kalisch, Execheia). An illustration of one of these windows is given in the Art. House, vol. ii. p. 1103.

W. A. W.

LINUS (Luvis [luxn, luxn-ch66]), a Christian at Rome, known to St. Paul and by Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21). That the first bishop of Rome after the Apostles was named Linus is a statement in which all ancient writers agree (e. g. Jerome, *De Fidei Haeret. c. 15; August. Ep. lii. 2). The early and unequivocal assertion of Irenæus (iii. 3, § 3), corroborated by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 2) and Theodoret, (in 2 Tim. iv. 21), is sufficient to prove the identity of the bishop with St. Paul's friend.

The date of his appointment, the duration of his episcopate, and the limits to which his episcopal authority extended, are points which cannot be regarded as absolutely settled, although they have been discussed at great length. Eusebius and Theodoret, followed by Baronius and Tillemont (Hist. Eccle. ii. 163 and 591), state that he became bishop of Rome after the death of St. Peter. On the other hand, the words of Irenæus — [Peter and Paul] when they founded and built up the church of Rome "— certainly admit, or rather imply the meaning, that he held that office before the death of St. Peter: as if the two great Apostles, having, in the discharge of their own peculiar office, completed the organization of the church at Rome, left it under the government of Linus, and passed on to preach and teach in some new region. This proceeding would be in accordance with the practice of the Apostles in other places. And the earlier appointment of Linus is asserted as a fact by Ruffinus (Pref. in Clem. Recogn.), and by the author of ch. xlv. bk. vii. of the Apostolic Constitutions. It is accepted as the true statement of the case by Bishop Pearson (De Scire et Successione Prima Romae Episcoporum, ii. 6, § 1) and by Henry (Hist. Eccle. ii. 26). Some persons have objected that the undistinguished mention of the name of Linus between the names of two other Roman Christians in 2 Tim. iv. 21 is a proof that he was not at that time bishop of Rome. But even Tillemont admits that such a way of introducing the bishop's name is in accordance with the simplicity of that early age. No lofty preeminence was attributed to the episcopal office in the apostolic times.

The arguments by which the exact years of his episcopate are laid down are too long and minute to be recited here. Its duration is given by Eusebius (whose H. E. iii. 16 and Chronicon give inconsistent evidence) as A. D. 68-80; by Tillemont, who however reproaches Pearson, with departing from the chronology of Eusebius. In a later place (Ed. 1671), Eusebius gives Linus 67-73; and by Pearson as 55-67. Pearson, in the treatise already quoted (i. 10), gives weighty reasons for distrusting the chronology of Eusebius as regards the years of the early bishops of Rome; and he derives his own opinion from certain very ancient (but interpolated) lists of those bishops (see i. 13 and ii. 5). This point has been subsequently considered by Baratierius (De Successione Antiquissimae Episc. Rom. 1740), who gives A. D. 56-67 as the date of the episcopate of Linus.

The statement of Ruffinus, that Linus and Cletus were bishops in Rome whilst St. Peter was alive, has been quoted in support of a theory which sprang up in the 17th century, received the sanction even of Hammond in his controversy with Blondel († Works, ed. 1684, iv. 825; Episcopatis Juro, v. 1, § 11), was held with some slight modification by Baratierius, and has been recently revived. It is supposed that Linus was bishop in Rome only of the Christians of Gentile origin, while at the same time another bishop exercised the same authority over the Jewish Christians there. Tertullian's assertion (De Prasar. Hocret. § 32) that Clement [the third bishop] of Rome was consecrated by St. Peter, has been quoted as corroborating this theory. But it does not follow from the words of Tertullian that Clement's consecration took place immediately before he became bishop of Rome: and the statement of Ruffinus, so far as it lends any support to the above-named theory, is shown to be without foundation by Pearson (ii. 3, 4). Tillemont's observations (p. 590) in reply to Pearson only show that the establishment of two contemporaries bishops in one city was contemplated in ancient times as a possible provisional arrangement to meet certain temporary difficulties. The actual limitation of the authority of Linus to a section of the church at Rome remains to be proved.

Lions is reckoned by Pseudo-Hippolytus, and in the Greek Menon, among the seventy disciples. The name is stated by different authors to have been derived from the Western church, and by the Eastern Church, as the day of his death. A narrative of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, printed in the Bibliothea Petronum, and certain pontifical decretals, are incorrectly ascribed to Linus. He is said to have written an account of the dispute between St. Peter and Simon Magus.

LION

Rabbinical writers discover in the O. T. seven names of the lion, which they assign to the animal at seven periods of its life. 1. ־פ, gôr, or ליע, gôr, a cub (Gen xiii. 9; Dent. xxxii. 22; Jer. lii. 38; Nah. lii. 12). 2. יגו, ephira, a young lion (Judg. xiv. 5; Job iv. 10; Ez. xix. 2, 4). for two contemporaneous abbots residing in one monastery; and by (3) Rabbanus Maurus of Choraepiscopos: Op. ed. Migne, tom. iv. col. 1597, who ingeniously claims primitive authority for the institution of Choraepiscopos on the supposition that Linus and Cletus were never bishops with full powers, but were contemporaneous choraepriscopos employed by St. Peter in his absence from Rome, and at his request, to ordain clergymen for the church at Rome.

LaOi or widow, an old lion (Gen. xlix. 9: Job iv. 11, &c.). 7.IELD Lydia, a lion desceipit with age (Job iv. 11; Is. xxx. 6, &c.). Well might Bochart (Hieros. pt. i. b. iii. 1) say, "The grammarian videtur nire sibi indulgere." He differs from this arrangement in every point but the second. In the first place, gur is applied to the young of other animals besides the lion; for instance, the sea-monsters in Lam. iv. 3. Secondly, cephir differs from gur, as 'juvenescens from virilus. Art or argh is a generic term, applied to all lions without regard to age. In Judg. the "young lion" (cephir drvlyeth) of ver. 5 is in ver. 8 called the "lion" (argh). Bochart is palpably wrong in rendering skochel "a black lion" of the kind which, according to Pliny (viii. 17), was found in Syria. The word is only used in the poetical books, and most probably expresses some attribute of the lion. It is connected with an Arabic root, which signifies "to bray" like an ass, and is therefore simply the brayer." Skochel does not denote a lion at all. Lodi is properly a "brine," and is connected with the Coptic br, which has the same signification. Lodi (comp. 3po, Hom. Il. xv. 275) is another poetic name. So far from being applied to a lion weak with age, it denotes one in full vigor (Job iv. 11; Prov. xxx. 30). It has been derived from an Arabic root, which signifies "to be strong," and, if this etymology be true, the word would be an epithet of the lion, "the strong one."

At present lions do not exist in Palestine, though they are said to be found in the desert on the road to Egypt (Schwarz, Desc. of Pol.; see Is. xxx. 6). They abound on the banks of the Empirates between Busseolah and Bagdad (Russell, Barby Lion. (From specimen in Zoological Gardens.)

Aleppo, p. 61), and in the marshes and jungles near the rivers of Babylonia (Layard, Nin. & Bub., p. 566). This species, according to Layard, is without the dark and shaggy mane of the African Lion (id. p 487), though he adds in a note that he had seen lions on the river Karooun with a long black mane.

But, though lions have now disappeared from Palestine, they must in ancient times have been numerous. The names Lachothe (Josh. xv. 32), Beth-lachothe (Josh. xvi. 6), Arieh (2 K. xv. 25), and Laish (Judg. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxv. 44) were probably derived from the presence of or connection with lions, and point to the fact that they were at one time common. They had their lairs in the forests which have vanished with them (Jer. v. 6, xiii. 8; Am. iii. 4), in the tangled bushwood (Jer. iv. 7, xxv. 38: Job xxxviii. 40), and in the caves of the mountains (Cant. iv. 8; Ez. xix. 9; Nah. ii. 12). The cane-brake on the banks of the Jordan, the "pride" of the river, was their favorite haunt (Jer. xlix. 19, 1. 44; Zech. xi. 3), and in this reedy covert (Lam. iii. 10) they were to be found at a comparatively recent period; as we learn from a passage of Johannes Phocas, who travelled in Palestine towards the end of the 12th century (Reland, Pol. i. 274). They abounded in the jungles which skirt the rivers of Mesopotamia (Anmian. Marc. xviii. 7, § 9), and in the time of Xenophon (de Fenv. xi.) were found in Nysa.

Persian Lion. (From specimen in Zoological Gardens.)

The lion of Palestine was in all probability the Asiatic variety, described by Aristotle (H. A. ix 44) and Pliny (viii. 18) as distinguished by its short curly mane, and by being shorter and rounder in shape, like the sculptured lion found at Arban (Layard, Nin. & Bub., p. 258). It was less daring than the longer named species, but when driven by hunger it not only ventured to attack the fleecy sheep in the desert in presence of the shepherd (Is. xxiii. 4; 1 Sam. xvii. 34), but laid waste towns and villages (2 K. xvi. 25, 29; Prov. xiv. 13, xx. 18), and devoured men (1 K. xili. 24, xx. 36; 2 K. xvi. 25; Ez. xix. 3, 6). The shepherds sometimes ventured to encounter the lion single handed (1 Sam. xvii. 34), and the viril figure employed by Amos (iii. 12), the heathen of Heloah, was but the transcript of a scene which he must have often witnessed. At other times they pursued the animal in large bands, raising loud shouts to intimidate him (Is. xxxi. 4), and drive him into the net or pit they had prepared to catch him (Ez. xix. 8). This method of capturing wild beasts is described by Xenophon (de Ven. xi. 4) and by Shaw, who says, "The Arabs dig a pit where they are observed to enter: and, covering it over lightly with reeds or small branches of trees, they frequently decoy and catch them" (Travels, 2d ed. p. 172). Bezaiah, one of David's heroic body-guard, had distinguished him. self by slaying a lion in his den (2 Sam. xxiii. 20). The kings of Persia had a menagerie of lions (25-10

The strength (Judg. xiv. 13; Prov. xxx. 30; 2 Sam. i. 23), courage (2 Sam. xii. 10; Prov. xxviii. 1; Is. xxxi. 4; Nah. ii. 11), and ferocity (Gen. xlix. 9; Num. xxxiv. 9) of the lion were proverbial. The "lion-faced" warriors of God were among David's most valiant troopers (1 Chr. xii. 3), and the hero Judas Macabeus is described as "like a lion, and like a lion's whelp roaring for his prey" (1 Macc. iii. 4). The terrible roar of the lion is expressed in Hebrew by four different words, between which the following distinction appears to be maintained: —

Hunting with a lion, which has seized an ibex. (From Wilkinson's Egyptians, vol. i. p. 221.)

Leo. Among the Hebrews, and throughout the O. T., the lion was the achievement of the prizemost tribe of Judah, while in the closing book of the canon it received a deeper significance as the emblem of him who "prevailed to open the book and loose the seven seals thereof" (Rev. v. 5). On the other hand its fierceness and cruelty rendered it an appropriate metaphor for a fierce and malignant enemy (Ps. vii. 2, xxii. 21, lxxv. 4; 2 Tim. iv. 17), and hence for the arch-fiend himself (1 Pet. v. 8).

The figure of the lion was employed as an ornament both in architecture and sculpture. On each of the six steps leading up to the great ivory throne of Solomon stood two lions on either side, carved by the workmen of Hiram, and two others were beside the arms of the throne (1 K. x. 19, 20). The great bronze lion in like manner adorned with cherubins, lions, and palm-trees in graven work (1 K. vii. 20, 26).

* LIQUOR or LIQUORS. This word occurs three times in the A. V. and in every instance answers to a different Hebrew word. (1) יַּלִּיָּר, lit. tear, collect. singular in Ex. xii. 29: "Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors." It is a semitiename. philo expression for that which flows from the press, namely, wine and oil (as correctly given in the LXX:ἄραρξάς ἄξωνος καὶ λευκοῦ σαβ). (2) יַּלַיְר, properly wine that is mixed or spiced: '"A round goblet which wanteth not liquor."' (Cant. v. 2). (3) יַּלַיְר, only Num. vi. 3: "Neither shall he (the Nazarite) drink any liquor of grapes." Some suppose the word to denote "maceration" or "sweeping," and hence a species of strong white wine obtained from grapes by that particular process. Others make the word = "a crushing," "dislodging" wine, hence applicable, in itself considered, to wine of any sort, but here on account of the other connected specifications in the passage, the juice of grapes recently broken or crushed, i.e. new wine. See Knobel, Die Bücher Numerei, etc., p. 26. In the terms relating to wine see Rodiger in Ges. Theobur, p. 1140. [WINE.]

* LITTLETS, Is. xvi. 20. [WAGON, Amer. ed.]

* LIVELY, employed for "living" in 1 Pet. ii. 6: "Ye also as living stones (αινωνίας) are built up a spiritual house." By the same figure Christ himself is said in the previous verse to be a "living stone," i.e. in the spiritual edifice of the church or gospel. His place is that of the cornerstone (comp. Eph. ii. 20), and believers are built on him and into him. As the Greek is the same it should be rendered alike in both cases. "Lively" in Ex. i. 19 (for the adj. יַּלִּיָּר, said of the Hebrew women) comes nearer to the present usage, namely, "full of life," "vigoros," (comp. Acts viii. 38).

LIZARD

r. Lcc. x. 30, appears to be correctly translated by the A. V. Some species of lizard is mentioned amongst those "creeping things that creep upon the earth" which were to be considered unclean by the Israelites.

Lizards of various kinds abound in Egypt, Palestine, and Arabia; some of these are mentioned in the Bible under various Hebrew names, notices of which will be found under other articles. [See Geckos; Snail.] All the old versions agree in identifying the leddah with some saurom, and some concur as to the particular genus indicated. The LXX., the Vulg., the Targ. of Jonathan, &c., with the Arabic versions, understand a lizard by the Hebrew word. The Syrian has a word which is generally translated salamander, but, probably this name was applied also to the lizard. The Greek word, with its slight variations, which the LXX. use to express the letaddah, appears from what may be gathered from Aristotle, &c. and perhaps also from its derivation, to point to some lizard belonging to the Gekkotidae. Many members of this family of lizards are characterized by a peculiar lamellated structure on the under surface of the toes, by means of which they are enabled to run over the smoothest surfaces, and even in an inverted position, like that they can remain suspended beneath the large leaves of the tropical vegetation, and remain for hours in positions as extraordinary as the insects for which they watch; the wonderful apparatus with which their feet are furnished enabling them to overcome gravity. Now the Hebrew leddah appears to be derived from a root which, though not extant in that language, is found in its sister-tongue the Arabic; this root means to adhere to the ground; an expression which well agrees with the peculiar sucker-like properties of the feet of the geckos. Bochart has successfully argued that the lizard denoted by the Hebrew word is that kind which the Arabs call vekhara, the translation of which term is thus given by Gobius: "An animal like a lizard, of a red color, and adhering to the ground, also poison saucus inspired Gueneague contigua." This description will be found to agree with the character of the Fan-Foot Lizard (Ptydactylus Gecko), which is common in Egypt and in parts of Arabia, and perhaps is also found in Palestine. It is reddish brown, spotted with white. Hasselquist thus speaks of it: "The poison of this animal is very singular, as it exudes from the bottom of the toes. At Cairo I had an opportunity of observing how rapid the exhalations of the toes of this animal are. As it ran over the hand of a man who was endeavoring to catch it, there immediately rose little red pustules over all those parts which the animal had touched" (Voyages, p. 220). Forskål (Descri. Anim. p. 13) says that the Egyptians call this lizard Abu burs, "father of leprosy," in allusion to the leprous sores which contact with it produces; and to this day the same term is used by the Arabs to denote a lizard, probably of this same species. The geckos live on insects and worms, which they swallow whole. They derive their name from the peculiar sound which some of the species utter. This sound has been described as being similar to the double click often used in riding; they make it by some movement of the tongue against the palate. The Gekkotidae are nocturnal in their habits, and frequent houses, cracks in rocks, etc. They move very rapidly, and without making the slightest sound; hence probably the derivation of the Greek word for this lizard. They are found in all parts of the world: in the greatest abundance in warm climates. It is no doubt owing to their repulsive appearance that they have the character of being highly venomous, just as the unscientific in England attach similar properties to toads, newts, blind worms, etc., although these creatures are perfectly harmless. At the same time it must be admitted that there may be species of lizards which do secrete a venomous fluid, the effects of which are no doubt aggravated by the heat of the climate, the unhealthy condition of the subject, or other causes. The geckos belong to the sub-order Ptychoglossa.

b The following are the references to the Greek word ἀσαλαμάντς in Aristot. de Anim. Hist. (ed. Schneider: iv. 11, § 2; vili. 17, § 1; vili. 19, § 2; viili. 23, § 2; x. 5, § 5; ix. 19, § 2). That Aristotle understands some species of gecko by the Greek word is clear; for he says of the woodpecker, πορεύεται ἐπὶ τοὺς δέντρα, χείλοις καὶ οὔπως καθερίσαι αἱ ἀσαλαμάνται (ix. 10, § 2). He alludes also to a species in Italy, perhaps the Hemidactylus verticinatus, whose bite, he says, is fatal (?).
c Ἀσαλαμάντς, γάτων ἡδέα νῦν ἐπιτιγή καὶ τοῖς χείλεσι τοῖς ἀηδημαῖς. This seems to identify it with one of the Gekkotha, perhaps the Tarentula was best known to the Greeks. The noiseless (φινωμεν) and, at times, fixed habits of this lizard are referred to below (See Gekk. Etym. Mag.).

d See Ges. (Thes. x. r.). A similar root has the force of "hiding;" in which case the word will refer to the gecko's habit of frequenting holes in walls, etc.

e The Gr. ἀσαλαμάντς, and perhaps Lat. stellio, indicate the genus, the red color the species.

LO-AMMI

LO-AMMI (ἐλλαξένοις μοι: non repulsus mensus, i. e. "not my people," the figurative name given by the prophet Hosea to his second son by Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim (Hos. i. 9), to denote the rejection of the kingdom of Israel by Jehovah. Its significance is explained in vv. 9, 10.

LOAN. The law of Moses did not contemplate any raising of loans for the purpose of obtaining capital, a condition perhaps alluded to in the parables of the "pearl," and "hidden treasure" (Matt. xiii. 44, 45; Michaelis, Comm. on Laws of Moses, art. 147, ii. 297, ed. Smith). [COMMERCE.] Such persons as bankers and sureties, in the commercial sense (Prov. xxii. 26; Neh. v. 3), were unknown to the earlier ages of the Hebrew commonwealth.

The Law strictly forbade any interest to be taken for a loan to any poor person, either in the shape of money or of produce, and at first, as it seems, even in the case of a foreigner; but this prohibition was afterwards limited to Hebrews only, from whom, of whatever rank, not only was usury on any pretence to be exacted, but relief to the poor by way of loan was enjoined, and excuses for evading this duty were forbidden (Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 35, 37; Deut. xv. 3, 7); Ex. xxii. 19, 20). The instances of extortionate conduct mentioned with disapprobation in the book of Job probably represent a state of things previous to the Law, and such as the Law was intended to remedy (Job xxvi. 6, xxiv. 3, 7). As commerce increased, the practice of usury, and so also of usurship, grew up; but the exacting of it from a Hebrew appears to have been regarded to a late period as discreditable (Prov. vi. 1, 4, xi. 15, xvii. 18, xx. 16, xxii. 26; Ps. xv. 5; Jer. xv. 10; Ezek. xviii. 13, 12). Systematic breach of the Law in this respect was expected by Nehemiah after the return from captivity (see No. 6) (Neh. vi. 1, 13; Michaelis, ib. arts. 148, 151). In later times the practice of borrowing money appears to have prevailed without limitation of race, and to have been carried on on systematic principles, though the original spirit of the Law was approved by our Lord (Matt. v. 24, xxv. 27; Luke vii. 43, xix. 25).

The money-changers (κεραυνασται, and κολυμβεται), who had seats and tables in the temple courts, are whose credits arose chiefly from the exchange of money with those who came to pay their annual half-shekel (Pulux, iii. 84, vii. 170; Schleusner, Lex. N. T. s.v.; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.; Matt. xxii. 12). The documents relating to loans of money appear to have been deposited in public offices in Jerusalem (Joseph. B. ii. 17, §6).

In making loans no prohibition is pronounced in the Law against taking a pledge of the borrower, but certain limitations are prescribed in favor of the poor.

1. The outer garment, which formed the poor man's principal covering by night as well as by day, if taken in pledge, was to be returned before sun-set. A beast, however, might be taken (Ex. xxii. 26, 27; Deut. xxi. 12, 13; comp. Job xxii. 6; Prov. xxii. 27; Shaw, Prov. 224, 225; Richardit, Notes on Ezek. i. 47, 241; Nichol, Exe. de la France, 56; Luce, Med. Lit. i. 57, 58; Ges. Thes. 403; Michaelis, Lives of Moses, arts. 143 and 150). The prohibition was absolute in the case of (a) the widow's garment (Deut. xxiv. 17), and (b) a millstone of either kind (Deut. xxiv. 6). Michaelis (art. 150, li. 321) supposes also all inde-

LOCK. Where European locks have not been introduced, the locks of eastern houses are usually of wood, and consist of a partly hollow bolt from 14 inches to 2 feet long for external doors or gates, or from 7 to 9 inches for interior doors. The bolt passes through a groove in a piece attached to the door in a socket in the door-post. In the grooves are from 4 to 6 small iron or wooden sliding-pins or wires, which drop into corresponding holes in the bolt, and fix it in its place. The key is a piece of wood furnished with a like number of pins, which, when the key is introduced sideways, raise the sliding-pins in the lock, and allow the bolt to be drawn back. Ancient Egyptian doors were fastened with central bolts, and sometimes with bars passing from one door-post to the other. They were also sometimes sealed with clay. [CLAY.] Keys were made of bronze or iron, of a simple construction. The gates of Jerusalem set up under Nebuchadnezzar's direction had both bolts and locks. LOCUST, a well-known insect, which com-mitsterrific devastation to vegetation in the countries which it visits. In the Bible there are frequent allusions to locusts; and there are nine or tenHebrew words which are supposed to denote different varieties or species of this destructive family. They belong to that order of insects known by the term Orthoptera. This order is divided into two large groups or divisions, namely, Caelifera and Saltatoria. The first, as the name imports, includes only those families of Orthoptera which have legs formed for creeping, and which were considered unclean by the Jewish law. Under the second are comprised those whose two posterior legs, by their peculiar structure, enable them to move on the ground by leaps. This group contains, according to Serville’s arrangement, three families, the Gryllidae, Locustariide, and the Acrididae, distinguished one from the other by some peculiar nobles of the structure. The common house locust (Gryllus domesticus, Linn.) may be taken as an illustration of the Gryllidae; the green grasshopper (Locusta migratoria, Linn.) which the French call Sauterie verte, will represent the family Locustari-ide; and the Acrididae may be typified by the commonly migratory locust (Ephippus migratorius, Aud.
Serv.), which is an occasional visitor to this country.

try. Of the Gryllidae, G. cerisi has been found in Egypt, and G. domesticus, on the authority of Dr. Kitto, in Palestine; but doubtless other species also occur in these countries. Of the Locustariide, Phaneroptera fidelis, Serv. (G. fulc. Scopoli) has also, according to Kitto, been found in Palestine, Bradypus dosigos in Asia Minor, Turkey, etc., Suga Nilotica near Sivrya. Of the locusts proper, or Acrididae, four species of the genus Truxuia are recorded as having been seen in Egypt, Syria, or Arabia: namely, T. murat, T. variabilis, T. procer, and T. nitidus. The following kinds also occur: Dysacta pliciformis, in Egypt and the ooats of Harrat; Pakidorcerus hieroglyphicus, P. bifonius, P. punctiventris, P. vulvifacies, in the deserts of Cairo; Dericovia athisa in Egypt and Mount Lebanon. Of the genus Acridium, A. mestum, the most formidable perhaps of all the Acrididae, A. locusta (= G. Egypt. Linn.), which is a species commonly sold for food in the markets of Bagdad (Serv. Orthopt. 657), A. semiferaciscutum, A. pergcinus, one of the most destructive of the species, and A. marbutus, occur either in Egypt or Arabia.
Calyptratus serapis and Chrysothus myopius are found in Egypt, and in the cultivated lands about Cairo; Erechthe carinata, in the rocky places about Sinai. E. cist, E. paluchspinosis, E. ipicla.

ocferaciscutus, and E. migratoria (= G. migrat.
Linn.), complete the list of the Solitutudinal Orthptera of the Bible lands. From the above catalogue it will be seen how perfectly unavailing, for the most part, must be any attempt to identify the Hebrew names with ascertained species, especially when it is remembered that some of these names occur but seldom, others (Lev. xi. 22) only once in the Bible—that the only clue is in many instances the mere etymology of the Hebrew word—that such etymology has of necessity, from the fact of there being but a single word, a very wide meaning, and that the etymology is frequently very uncertain. The LXX. and Vulg. do not contriute much help, for the words used there are themselves of a very uncertain signification, and moreover employed in a most promiscuous manner. Still, though the possibility of identifying with certainty any one of the Hebrew names is a hopeless task, yet in one or two instances a fair approximation to identification may be arrived at.

From Lev. xi. 21, 22, we learn the Hebrew names of four different kinds of Solitutudinal Orthoptera.
These may ye eat of every flying creeping thing that goeth upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth; even those of them ye may eat, the orbeh after his kind,

the country in the month of July of the same year
They did great damage in Shropshire and Staffordshire, by eating the blossoms of the apple-trees; and especially the leaves of oaks, which looked as bare as at Christmas. The rooks did a good service in this case at least. See Gentleman’s Magazine, July 1748, pp. 331 and 414; also The Times, Oct. 4, 1845.

It is well known that all insects, properly so called, have six feet. But the Jews considered the two anterior pair only as true legs in the locust family, regarding them as additional instruments for lis-
and the sâdâm after his kind, and the chargid wrongly translated belde by the A. V., an insect which would be included amongst the flying creeping things forbidden as food in v. 23 and 42 after his kind, and the chayâb after his kind." Besides the names mentioned in this passage, there occur five others in the Bible, all of which locust (ii.) considers to represent so many distinct species of locusts, namely, gôb, gôdâm, châsid, yâhâ, and ûssâlâd.

(1.) Arbêkh (אָרַבְXE: •) arbôchos, ãrê- lêbos, ãrê-λεβος: in Joel ii. 25, ἄρβηξα: locust, "grasshopper") is the most common name for locust, the word occurring about twenty times in the Hebrew Bible, namely, in Ex. x. 4, 12, 13, 14, 19; Judg. vi. 5, viii. 12. Lev. xi. 22: Deut. xxxi. 15; 1 K. viii. 37; 2 Chr. vi. 28; Job xxxix. 22; Ps. cv. 34, cxxi. 39; Prov. xxii. 27; Jer. xvi. 23; Joel i. 4, ii. 20; Nah. iii. 15. The LXX. generally render arbêkh by ãpîs, the general Greek name for locust: in two passages, however, namely, Lev. xi. 22, and 1 K. viii. 37, they use bôs ãrê-ξôs as the representative of the original word. In Nah. iii. 17, arbêkh is rendered by ãrêlêbos: while the Arche version, in Joel ii. 25, has ãpîs, ãrêlêbos, the Vulg. has locusta in every instance except in Lev. xi. 22, where it has bruchus. The A. V. in the four following passages has grasshopper, Judg. vi. 5, viii. 12: Job xxxix. 20; and Jer. xvi. 24: in all the other places it has locust. The word arbêkh, which is derived from a root signifying "to be numerous," is probably sometimes used in a wide sense to express any of the larger devouring species. It is the locust of the Egyptian plague. In almost every passage where arbêkh occurs reference is made to its terribly destructive powers. It is one of the flying creeping creatures that were allowed as food by the law of Moses (Lev. xi. 21). In this passage it is clearly the representative of some species of winged orthoptera extremis, which must have possessed indications of form sufficient to distinguish the insect from the three other names which belong to the same division of orthoptera, and are mentioned in the same context. The opinion of Michaelis (Suppl. 657, 910), that the four words mentioned in Lev. xi. 22 denote the same insect in four different ages or stages of its growth, is quite untenable, for, whatever particular species are intended by these words, it is quite clear from ver. 21 that

In the next passage, in which the "grasshopper," as the A. V. translates it, occurs, we find that the LXX. renders it ãpîs, or ãpîs, locusta: in all of which passages it is rendered ãpîs by the LXX., and locusta by the Vulg. In 2 Chr. vii. 13 the A. V. reads "locust," in the other passages "grasshopper." From the use of the word the Chronic. says, "If I command the locusts to devour the land," compared with Lev. xi. 22, it would appear that some species of devouring locust is intended. In the passage of Numbers, "There we saw the giants the sons of Anak . . . and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers" (ãchôb), as well as in Ecclesiastes and Isaiah, reference seems to be made to some small species of locusts; and with ...locust, so called from its multitude, ã-chôb. See Gesen. Thes. a. v., who adopts the explanation of Michaelis that the four names in Lev. xi. 22 are not the representatives of four distinct genera or species, but denote the different stages of growth. The Gebrad grenomururus of Forskal: D. etc. A. etc. 18) is perhaps identical with the Acrad peregrinum.

this view Oedmann (\textit{Ferm. Sasan}, ii. 90) agrees. Tychsen (\textit{Coment. de Locust}, p. 70) supposes that \textit{chagdib} denotes the Gryllus coronatus, Linn.; but this is the \textit{Acridotta} corona, of Aud. Serv., a S. American species, and probably confined to that continent. Michaelis (\textit{Supp. 668}), who derives the word from an Arabic root signifying "to veil," conceives that \textit{chagdib} represents either a locust at the fourth stage of its growth, "ante quartas exuvias quod aultne veltas ete."

But is it a fact that the genus \textit{Tropulellis} is an exception to the rest of the \textit{Acrididae}, and is precociously inscitroventos. Servile (\textit{Orthop. Eurya}, p. 212) says that the nutriment of this family is \textit{plants} of various kinds. Mr. F. Smith, in a letter to the writer of this article, says he has no doubt that the \textit{Tropulellis} feed on \textit{plants}. What is Mr. Denham's authority for asserting that they are insectivorous? It is granted that there is a \textit{quasi} resemblance in external form between the \textit{Tropulellis} and some of the larger \textit{Ichneumo\-nide}, but the likeness is far from striking. Four species of the genus \textit{Tropulellis} are inhabitants of the Bible lands (see above).

The Jews, however, interpret \textit{chagdib} to mean a species of \textit{gamues}, \textit{Germainen Housebeck}, which M. \textbf{Sildain (\textit{Bacca} \textit{et a} \textit{a} \textit{a} \textit{a}: \textit{attacan}, Comp. \textit{attacan}: "bald locust") occurs only in Lev. xi. 32, as one of the four edible kinds of leaping insects. Tychsen, however, arguing from what is said of the \textit{sildain in the Tal-}

(5.) Gizzám (ג_globals). See Palmer-worm.

(6.) Gib (גיב, גיב), Arab. ghib, ghaba: *Ap. in Am. vii. 1, Spadóv: locusta: locusta locusta = גיב, גיב in Nah. iii. 17: "great grasshoppers;" "grasshoppers," margin "green worms," in Amos). This word is found only in Is. xxxiii. 4, and in the two places cited above. There is nothing in any of these passages that will help to point out the species denoted. That some kind of locust is intended seems probable from the passage in Nahum, "thy captains are as the great gibor which camp in the hedges in the cool of the day, but when the sun ariseth they flee away, and their place is not known where they are." Some writers, led by this passage, have believed that the gibor represented the larva state of some of the large locusts; the habit of halting at night, however, and encamping under the hedges, as described by the prophet, in all probability belongs to the winged locust as well as to the gibor, see Ex. x. 13, "the Lord brought an east wind upon the land all that day, and all that night; and when it was morning, the east wind brought the locusts." Mr. Barrow (i. p. 257-58), speaking of some species of S. African locusts, says, that when the larva, which are still more voracious than the parent insect, are on the march, it is impossible to make them turn out of the way, which is usually that of the wind. At sunset the troop halts and divides into separate groups, each occupying in bee-like clusters the neighboring eminences for the night. It is quite possible that the gib may represent the vera or nymphal state of the insect; nor is the passage from Nahum, "when the sun ariseth they flee away," any objection to this supposition, for the last stages of the vera differ but slightly from the nymphal, both which states may therefore be comprehended under one name; the gibor of Nah. iii. 17 may easily have been the nymphal (which in all the Amatut continue to feed as in their larva condition);

a גיב, according to Gesenius (Thes. s. v.), is from an unused root, מקר, the *Arab. *�كر, to emerge from the ground. First refers the word to a Hebrew origin. See note, Amah.

b Since the above was written it has been discovered that Dr. Kittel (Dict. Fisch., note on Nah. iii. 17) is of a similar opinion, that the gib probably denotes the nymphal species.

self (mat. gr.) and fleeth away," is no objection to the opinion that the gēlek may represent the harva or nymphula, for the same reason as was given in a former part of this article (666).

(10.) Tschalil (ךְַּחַל): epopaoz?  rubigo: "locust "). The derivation of this word seems to imply that some kind of locust is indicated by it. It occurs only in this sense in Deut. xxviii. 42: "All thy trees and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume." In the other passages where the Hebrew word occurs, it represents some kind of tinkling musical instrument, and is generally translated cymbala by the A. V. The word is evidently onomatopoetic, and is here perhaps a synonym for some one of the other names for locust. Michaelis (Spruch, p. 294) believes the word is identical with chahil, which he says denotes perhaps the mole-cricket, Gryllus talpiformis, from the stridulous sound it produces. Tychsen (pp. 79, 80) identifies it with the Gryllus striatulus, Linn. (= Edipoda striatula, Aud. Serv.). The notion conveyed by the Hebrew word will however apply to almost any kind of locust, and indeed to many kinds of insects; a similar word is dlafl, was applied by the Ethipians to a fly which the Arabs called tihib, which appears to be identical with the tecta fly of Dr. Livingstone and other African travellers. It can be positively known respecting the tschalil is, that it is some kind of insect injurious to trees and crops. The LXX. and Vulg. understand blight or mildew by the word.

The most destructive of the locust tribe that occur in the Bible lands are the Edipoda migratoria, and the Acridium peregrinum, and as both these species occur in Syria and Arabia, etc., it is most probable that one or other is denoted in those passages which speak of the dreadful devastations committed by these insects; nor is there any occasion to believe with Bochart, Tychsen, and others, that nine or ten distinct species are mentioned in the Bible. Some of the names may be synonyms; others may indicate the harva or nymphula conditions of the two preeminent devourers already named.

Locusts occur in great numbers, and sometimes Obscure the sun — Ex. x. 15; Jer. xlv. 23; Judg. vi. 3, vii. 12; Joel ii. 10; Nah. iii. 15; Lively, xii. 2; Ezran. N. A. iii. 12; Pliny, N. Their voracity is alluded to in Ex. x. 12, 15; Joel i. 4; 7, 12, and ii. 3; Deut. xxviii. 38; Ps. lxviii. 45, cv. 34; Is. xxxiii. 4; Shaw’s Trav. 187, and travellers in the East, pressia.

They are compared to horses — Joel ii. 4; Rev. ix. 7. The Italians call the locust "Cavalletta;" and Ray says, "Caput oblivium, equi instar prona" spectans." Comp. also the Arab’s description to Niebuhr, Deser. de l’Arabie.

They make a fearful noise in their flight — Joel ii. 5; Rev. ix. 9.

"Volney, Trav. i. 235.

They have no king — Prov. xxx. 27; Kirby and Sp. Int. ii. 17.

Their irresistible progress is referred to in Joel ii. 8, 9; Shaw, Trav. p. 187.

They enter dwellings, and devour even the wood-work of houses — Ex. x. 6; Joel ii. 9, 10; Pliny, N. H. xi. 29.

The sea sends the greater number — Ex. x. 10; Joel ii. 29; Pliny, xi. 39; Hasselk. Trav. p. 443 (Engl. transl. 1766); cf. also Hidu, xxxi. 12.

Their dead bodies taint the air — Joel ii. 29; Hasselk. Trav. p. 443.

They are used as food — Lev. xi. 21, 22; Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 6; Plinii. N. H. vi. 35, xi. 35; Dios. Sic. iii. 29 (the Acridophagoi); Aristoph. Achar. 1118; Ludolf, Hist. Ethiop. p. 67 (Gent’s transl.); Jackson’s Morocco, p. 52; Niebuhr, Deser. de l'Arabie, p. 150; Sparmann’s Trav. i. 367, who says the Hottentots are glad when the locusts come, for they fatten upon them: Hasselk. Trav. pp. 292, 413; Kirby and Stoskop, Trav. 1. 305.

There are different ways of preparing locusts for food; sometimes they are ground and pounded, and then mixed with flour and water and made into cakes, or they are salted and then eaten; sometimes smoked; boiled or roasted; stewed, or fried in butter. Dr. Kitto (Pict. Bibl. note on Lev. xi. 21), who tasted locusts, says they are more like shrimps than anything else; and an English clergyman, some years ago, cooked some of the green grass-hoppers, Locusta circulinalis, boiling them in water half an hour, throwing away the head, wings, and legs, and then sprinkling them with pepper and salt, he compares it in size to a swallow. The bird is about eight inches and a half in length. Yearell (Brit Birds, ii. 51, 21 ed.) says, "it is held sacred at Aleppo because it feeds on the locust;" and Col. Sykes bears testimony to the immense flocks in which they fly. He says (Catalogue of Birds of Dabobohn, "they darken the air by their numbers . . . forty or fifty have been killed at a shot." But he says, "they prove a calamity to the husbandman, as they are as destructive as locusts, and not much less numerous."
and adding batter; he found them excellent. How strange then, say, "how idle," to quote the words of Kirky and Spence (ibid. i. 305), "was the controversy concerning the locusts which formed part of the sustenance of John the Baptist, . . . and how apt even learned men are to perplex a plain question from ignorance of the customs of other countries!"

The following are some of the works which treat of locusts: Ludolf, Dissertation de Locustis, Frankfurt ad Mezn. 1694. This author believes that the quails which fed the Israelites in the wilderness were locusts (vid. his Distributa quae mutativa noce de Slevia, sive Locusts, descriptura). A more abstruse opinion was that held by Norrelus, who maintained that the four names of Lev. xi. 22 were birds (vid. his Schoelarchum de Aequis avium, Arch. Chrys. Salern. et Chrysol. in Bib. Bren. Ch. iii. p. 36). Faler, de Locustis Biblicis, et aliquot de Aequis Quadriappendicis, in loc. xi. 20, Wittgen. 1710-11. * On the subject of locusts the reader may see also Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, pp. 306-318 (Lonid. 1867); the art. Heuschrecken, by Vahlinger, in Herzog's Real-Encyc. vi. 68-71; and Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies, iii. 63 f., and iv. 79. This last writer's description of their ravages in Palestine and Southern Media and the present day reads almost as if it translated from Joel (i. and ii.):

"The destructive locust (the Acrorinn perserrima, probably) comes suddenly . . . in clouds that obscure the air, moving with a slow and steady flight, and with a sound like that of heavy rain, and settling in myriads on the fields, the gardens, the trees, the terraces of the houses, and even the streets which they sometimes cover completely.

6 There are people at this day who gravely assert that the locusts which formed part of the food of the Raphtans were not Israelites, but that the long-tract poets of the locust-tree (Centauroidea sphinga, Johannin, et al., St. John's bread," as the monks of Palestine call it. For other equally erroneous explanations, or unauthorized alterations, of Scripture, see Cot's Hebrews, vol. ii.

6 For the judgment of locusts referred to in the prophec. Joel, see Dr. Pusey's "Introduction" to that book. This writer maintains that the prophet, under the figure of the locust, foretold a judgment for greater evil for mighty than the locust. Pusey, pp. 27-32, namely, the Assyrian invasion of Palestine, because Joel calls the scourage the "northern army," which Dr. Pusey says cannot be said of the locusts, because almost always by a sort of law of their being they make their inroads from their birthplace in the north. This one point, however, may be fairly questioned. The usual direction of the flight of this insect is from east to west, or from south to north; but the Egyptra magna is believed to have its birthplace in Tartary (Serv. Orph. p. 758), from whence it visits Africa, the Mauritius, and part of the South of Europe. If this species be considered to be the locust of Joel, the expression, northern army, is more applicable to it. [Joth. vi. 11, 13, 27, 31, note a.]
LODGE

Lo-debar, though with different vowel-points. In favor of this conjecture, which is adopted by J. D. Michaelis (Bib. für Ungeln), is the fact that such a use of the preposition 7 is exceedingly rare (see Kiel, Jowett ad loc.).

If taken as a Hebrew word, the root of the name is possibly “pasture,” the driving out of flocks (Ges. Thes. p. 735 &; Stanley, S. &; P. App. § 9); but this must be very uncertain.

* LOOKED (προσέβουν), Acts xxviii. 6, where we should say at present “expected” or “looked for.” This sense, if not obsolete, is now obsolescent. Earlier versions (Tyndale, Cranmer, Geneva) have “waited” in that passage. See also Ezech. xx. 14. It.

LOOKING-GLASSES. [MIRRORS.]

LORD, as applied to the Deity, is the almost uniform rendering in the A. V. of the O. T. of the Heb. לנה, Jehovah, which would be more properly represented as a proper name. The reverence which the Jews entertained for the sacred name of God forbade them to pronounce it, and in reading they substituted for it either אביה, “Lord,” or אלהים, “God,” according to the vowel-points by which it was accompanied. [Jehovah, vol. ii. p. 1289.] This custom is observed in the version of the LXX., where Jehovah is most commonly transliterated by κυρίος, as in the N. 7. (Heb. i. 10, &c.), and in the Vulgate, where Dominius is the usual equivalent. The title אביה is also rendered “Lord” in the A. V., though, as applied to God, is of infrequent occurrence in the historical books. For instance, it is found in Genesis only in xv. 2, xxvi. 9 (where “say Lord” should be “say Jehovah”), 17, 39, 31, 32, xx. 4; once in Num. xiv. 17; twice in Deut. iii. 24, xx. 2; twice in Josh. vii. 7, 8; four times in Judges; and so on.

In other passages of these books “Lord” is the translation of Jehovah; except Ex. xxii. 17, xxiii. 23; Deut. x. 17; Josh. iii. 11, 13, where אביה is so rendered. But in the poetical and historical books it is more frequent, excepting Job, where it occurs only in xxvii. 28, and the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs, where it is not once found.

The difference between Jehovah and Adonai (אדונא) is generally marked in the A. V. by printing the word in small capitals (Lord) when it represents the former (Gen. xv. 4, &c.), and with an initial capital only when it is the translation of the latter (Ps. xxvii. 5, Is. i. 24, x. 16); except in Ex. xxiii. 17, xxviii. 30, where “the Lord God” should be more consistently “the Lord Jehovah.” A similar distinction prevails between יִתְנָה (the letters of Jehovah with the vowel-points of אדונא) and יִתְנָה, אדונא; the former being represented in the A. V. by “God” in small capitals (Gen. xv. 2, &c.), while אדונא is “God” with an initial capital only. And, generally, when the name of the Deity is printed in capitals, it indicates that the corresponding Hebrew is יִתְנָה, which is translated Lord or God according to the vowel-points by which it is accompanied.

In some instances it is difficult, on account of the pause accent, to say whether Adonai is the title of the Deity, or merely one of respect addressed to men. These have been noticed by the Masorites, who distinguish the former in their notes as “holy,” and the latter as “profane.” (See Gen. xviii. 9, xix. 18.)

* What can have led the LXX. to “translate the word יִתְנָה “heaps,” in Ps. lxix. 1, by δραπόκες εἰκόνες, which they employ for יִתְנָה in the above two passages, the writer is unable to conjecture.
LORD'S DAY, THE

LORD'S DAY, THE (ΤΟ ΚΥΡΙΑΚΗ ΥΠΕΡΑ: Ἴ μια σαββάτων). It has been questioned, though not seriously until of late years, what is the meaning of the Lord's Day, that is, to which Sunday is referred in one passage only of the Holy Scripture, Rev. i. 10, and is, in our English version, translated "the Lord's Day." The general consent both of Christian antiquity and of modern divines has referred it to the weekly festival of our Lord's resurrection, and identified it with "the first day of the week," on which He rose, with the patristical "eighth day," or "eighth," which is both the first and the eighth, in fact, with the ἱ πο τοῦ ΡΩΜΑ ΧΕΡΙΑ." "Sabbat Dies," or "Sunday," of every age of the Church.

But the views antagonistic to this general consent deserve at least a passing notice. (1.) Some have supposed St. John to be speaking, in the passage above referred to, of the Sabbath, because that institution is called in Isaiah liii. 13, by the Almighty Himself, "My holy day." To this it is replied — If St. John had intended to specify the Sabbath, he would surely have used that word which was by no means obsolete, or even exceptional, at the time of his composing the book of the Revelation. And it is added, that if an Apostle had set the example of confounding the seventh and the first days of the week, it would have been strange indeed that every week-sacred writer for the first five centuries should have avoided any approach to such confusion. They do avoid it — for as ζαββατον is never used by them for the first day, so Κυριακη is never used by them for the seventh day. (2.) Another theory is, that by the "Lord's day" St. John intended "the day of judgment," to which a large portion of the book of Revelation may be conceived to refer. Thus "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day." (Υπερα ἐν πνεύματι ἐν τῇ Κυριακῇ) would imply that he was rapt, in spiritual vision, to the date of that "great and terrible day," just as St. Paul represents himself as caught up bodily into Paradise. Now, not to dispute the interpretation of the passage from which the illustration is drawn (2 Cor. xii. 4), the abetors of this view seem to have put out of sight the following considerations. In the first place, St. John, as the Apostle who had shouldered the place in which he was writing, Parnes, and the causes which had brought him thither. It is but natural that he should further particularize the circumstances under which his mysterious work was composed, by stating the exact day on which the Revelations were communicated to him, and the employment, spiritual musing, in which he was then engaged. To suppose a mixture of the metaphysical and the literal would be strangely out of keeping. And though it be conceded that the day of judgment is in the New Testament spoken of as Η τοῦ Κυριου Χερια, the employment of the adjectival form constitutes a remarkable difference, which was observed and maintained ever afterwards. There is also a critical objection to this interpretation. This second theory then, which is sanctioned by the name of Augusti, must be abandoned. (3.) A third opinion is, that St. John intended by the "Lord's Day" that is, on which the Lord's resurrection was annually celebrated, or, as we now term it, Easter-day. On this it need only be observed, that, though it was never questioned that the weekly celebration of that event should take place on the first day of the Hebrew cycle, it was for a long time doubted on what day in the annual cycle it should be celebrated. Two schools at least existed on this point until considerably after the death of St. John. It therefore seems unlikely that, in a book intended for the whole Church, be would have employed a method of dating which was far from generally agreed upon. And it is to be added that no patristical authority can be quoted, either for the interpretation contended for in this opinion, or for the employment of Η Κυριακη Χερια to denote Easter-day.

All other conjectures upon this point may be permitted to confute themselves, but the following is so curious as to be omitted. In Scripture the first day of the week is called Η μια σαββατων, in post-Scripturnwriters it is called Η Κυριακη Χερια as well; therefore, the book of Revelation is not to be ascribed to an Apostle; or in other words, is not part of Scripture. The logic of this argument is only to be surpassed by its baldness. It says, in effect, because post-Scripturn writers have these two designations for the first day of the week; therefore, Scripturn writers must be confined to one of them. It was surely more reasonable to suppose that the adoption by post-Scripturn writers of a phrase so preeminently Christian as Η Κυριακη Χερια to denote the first day of the week, and a day so especially marked, can be traceable to nothing else than an Apostle's use of that phrase in the same meaning. Supposing then that Η Κυριακη Χερια of St. John is the Lord's Day,— What do we gather from Holy Scripture concerning that institution? How is it spoken of by early writers up to the time of Constantine? What change, if any, was brought upon it by the celebrated edict of that emperor, whom some have declared to have been its originator?

1. Scripture says very little concerning it. But that little seems to indicate that the divinely inspired Apostles, by their practice and by their precepts, marked the first day of the week as a day for meeting together to break bread, for communicating and receiving instruction, for laying out offerings in store for charitable purposes, for occupation in holy thought and prayer. The first day of the week so observed seems also to have been the day of the Lord's Resurrection, and therefore, to have been especially likely to be chosen for such purposes by those who "preached Jesus and the resurrection."

The Lord rose on the first day of the week (τη μια σαββατων), and appeared, on the very day of...

is rising, to his followers on five distinct occasions — to Mary Magdalene, to the other women, to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus, to St. Peter separately, to ten Apostles collected together. After eight days (μεθ' ἡμέρας ἀπόκρις), that is, according to the ordinary reckoning, on the first day of the next week, He appeared to the eleven. He does not now, as before, give it little is to be expected. It may be to render that day especially noticeable by the Apostles, or, it may be for other reasons. But, however this question be settled, on the day of the Pentecost, which in that year fell on the first day of the week (see Brunham, Disc. of the Sabbath and Lord's Day, in Works, vol. v. p. 51, Oxford edition), “they were all with one accord in one place,” had spiritual gifts conferred on them, and in their turn began to communicate those gifts, as accompaniments of instruction, to others. At Troas (Acts xx. 7), many years after the occurrence at Pentecost, when Christianity had begun to assume something like a settled form, St. Luke records the following circumstances. St. Paul and his companions arrived there, and “aboie seven days, and upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them.” In I Cor. vi. 1, 2, this practice, he writes thus: “Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches in Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.” In Heb. x. 25, the correspondents of the writer are desired not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is; but to prove their apprehensions of an injunction which seems to imply that a regular day for such assembling existed, and was well known; for otherwise no rebuke would lie. And lastly, in the passage given above, St. John describes himself as being in the Spirit “on the Lord’s day.”

Taken separately, perhaps, and even all together, these passages seem scarcely adequate to prove that the dedications of the first day of the week to the purposes above mentioned was a matter of apostolic institution, or even of apostolic practice. But, it may be observed, that it is at any rate an extraordinary coincidence, that almost immediately we emerge from Scripture, we find the same day mentioned in a similar manner, and directly associated with the Lord’s Resurrection; that it is an extraordinary fact that we never find its dedication questioned or argued about, but accepted as something equally apostolic with Confirmation, with Infant Baptism, with Ordination, at least spoken of in the same way. And as to direct support from Holy Scripture, it is noticeable that those other ordinances which are usually considered Scriptural, and in support of which Scripture is usually cited, are dependent, so far as mere quotation is concerned, upon fewer texts than the Lord’s Day is. Stating the case at the very lowest, the Lord’s Day has at least two probable instances in Scripture, “and so is superior to any other holy day, whether of hebdomadal celebration, as Friday in memory of the Crucifixion, or of annual celebration, as Easter-fay in memory of the Resurrection itself. These other days may be, and are, defensible on other grounds: but they do not possess anything like a Scriptural authority for their observance. And if we are inclined still to press for more pertinent Scriptural proof, and more frequent mention of the institution, for such we suppose it to be, in the writings of the Apostles, we must recollect how few instances of Baptism and the Lord’s Supper, and how vast a difference is naturally to be expected to exist between a sketch of the manners and habits of their age, which the authors of the Holy Scriptures did not write, and hints as to life and conduct, and regulation of known practices, which they did write.

2. On quitting the canonical writings, we turn naturally to Clement of Rome. He does not, however, directly mention “the Lord’s Day,” but in I Cor. i. 40, he says, πάντα τὰ τίτικν γενέσεως φόρμας, and he speaks of ἁγιάσμα τινον καὶ ὠραῖον, at which the Christian προσόροφα καὶ λειτουργια should be made.

Ignatius, the disciple of St. John (see Magn. e. 9), contrasts Judaism and Christianity, and as an exemplification of the contrast, opposes σαββατιστική to living according to the Lord’s life (κυριακή τοῦ Κυρίου). The epistle ascribed to St. Barnabas, which, though certainly not written by that Apostle, was in existence in the earlier part of the 2d century, has (c. 15) the following words, “We celebrate the eighth day with joy, on which too Jesus rose from the dead.”

A pagan document now comes into view. It is the well-known letter of Pliny to Trajan, written while he resided over Pontus and Bithynia. “The Christians (says he), affirm the whole of their guilt or error to be, that they were accustomed to meet together on a stated day (stato die), before it was light, and to sing hymns to Christ as a God, and to bind themselves by a Sacramentum, not for any wicked purpose, but never to commit fraud, theft, or adultery; never to break their word, or to refuse, when called upon, to deliver up any trust; after which they partake of food assembled again to take a meal, but a general one, and without guilty purpose.”

A thoroughly Christian authority, Justin Martyr, who flourished Α. d. 140, stands next on the list. He writes thus: “On the day called Sunday (η ημέρα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ Λεγομενὴ ἡμέρα), is an assembly of all those who live either in the cities or in the rural districts, and the memoirs of the Apostles and the writings of the prophets are read.” Then he goes on to describe the particulars of the religious acts which are entered upon at this assembly. They consist of prayer, of the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, and of collection of alms. He afterwards assigns the reasons which Christians had for meeting on Sunday. These are, because it is the First Day, on which God dispelled the darkness (το σκότος) and the original state of things (τον ἀοίδον), and formed the world, and because Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead upon it” (Apol. I. c. 67.). In another work (Did. c. Tryph.), he makes circumcision furnish a type of Sunday. “The command to circumcise infants on the eighth day was a type of the true circumcision by which we are circumcised from error and wickedness through our Lord Jesus Christ, who rose from the dead on the first day of the week (η μαθήσεως): therefore it remains the Christian and first of days. As for σαββατιστική, he uses that with exclusi reference to the Jewish law. He carefully distinguishes Saturday (ἡ χρωμή), the day after which our Lord was crucified, from Sunday (αυτή τήν κρομήν ητίς ήταν ἦ τοῦ Ἑλλοῦ μέρα), upon which He rose from the dead. (If any surprise is felt at Justin’s employment of the heathen designations for the seventh and first days of the week, it may be accounted for thus. Before the death of Hadrian, A. D. 138, the hebdomadal division (which Dion Cassius, writing in the 3rd century, derives, together with its nomenclature, from Egypt) had in matters of common life almost universally superseded in Greece, and even in Italy, the national divisions of the lunar month. Justin Martyr, writing to and for heathen, as well as to and for Jews, employs it, therefore, with a certainty of being understood.)

The strange heretic, Bardesanes, who however delighted to consider himself a sort of Christian, has the following words in his book on “Fate,” or on “the Laws of the countries,” which he addressed to the Emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus: “What then shall we say respecting the new race of ourselves who are Christians, whom in every country and in every region the Messiah established at his coming: for, lo! wherever we be, all of us are called by the one name of the Messiah, Christians; and upon one day, which is the first of the week, we assemble ourselves together, and on the appointed days we abstain from Lord.” (Curtier’s Translation.)

Two very short notices stand next on our list, but they are important from their casual and unstudied character. Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, A. D. 170, in a letter to the Church of Rome, a fragment of which is preserved by Eusèbe, says, τὸν άχυρον αὐτοὶ κυριακά τόμον ναμέαν διηγομένων, ἐν ἑαυτοῦν οὐκ ἡ προσώπων. And Melito, bishop of Sardis, his contemporary, is stated to have composed, among other works, a treatise on the Lord’s Day (Ὁ μείζονς Κυριακάς λέγων).

The next writer who may be quoted is Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, A. D. 178. He asserts that the Sabbath is abolished; but his evidence to the existence of the Lord’s Day is clear and distinct. It is spoken of in one of the best known of his Fragments, de Haerent. Irenæus, 15, 10, 3. But a record in Eusèbe (v. 23, 2), of the part which he took in the Quadrabcean controversy, shows that in his time it was an institution beyond dispute. The point in question was this: Should Easter be celebrated in connection with the Jewish Passover, on whatever day of the week that might happen to fall, with the Churches of Asia Minor, Syria, and Mesopotamia; or on the Lord’s Day, with the rest of the Christian world? The Churches of Gaul, then under the superintendence of Irenæus, agreed upon a synodical epistle to Victor, bishop of Rome, in which occurred words somewhat to this effect, “The mystery of the Lord’s Resurrection may not be celebrated on any other day than the Lord’s Day, and on this alone should we observe the ‘breaking off of the Paschal Fast.’” This confirms what was said above, that while, even towards the end of the 2nd century, tradition varied as to the yearly celebration of Christ’s Resurrection, the weekly celebration of it was one upon which no diversity existed or was even hinted at.

Clement of Alexandria, A. D. 194, comes next. One does not expect anything very definite from a writer of so mystical a tendency, but he has some things quite to our purpose. In his Strom. (iv. § 3), he speaks of τὴν ἄρχισον ἕμεραν, τὴν τῇ ἄνω αναστάσει ἤμων, τῇ δὲ καὶ πρῶτῃ τῇ ἐπί πατρός γενέσει, κ.τ.λ., words which Bishop Kaye interprets as contrasting the seventh day of the Law with the eighth day of the Gospel. And, as the same learned prelate observes, “When Clement says that the Gnostic, or transcendental Christian, does not pray in any fixed place, or on any stated days, but throughout his whole life, he gives us to understand that Christians in general did meet together in fixed places and at appointed times for the purposes of prayer.” But we are not left to mere inference on this important point, for Clement speaks of the Lord’s Day as a well-known and customary festival, and in one place gives a mystical interpretation of the name.

Tertullian, whose date is assignable to the close of the 2nd century, may, in spite of his conversion to Montanism, be quoted as a witness to facts. He terms the first day of the week sometimes Sunday (Dies Solis), sometimes Dies Dominica. He speaks of it as a day of joy (“Dies Solis institutum indiguum,” Apol. c. 16), and asserts that it is wrong to fast upon it, or to pray kneeling during its continuance (“Die Dominico jumilium nefas diximus, vel de geniculis adulcere,” De Cor. c. 3).

Even business is to be put off, lest we give place to the devil (De Differentia etam nonag, ne quem Diabolo hunc densius,” De Omen. c. 14).

Origin contralts that the Lord’s Day had its superiority to the Sabbath indicated by manner having been given on it to the Israelites, while it was withheld on the Sabbath. It is one of the marks of the perfect Christian to keep the Lord’s Day.

Minucius Felix, A. D. 210, makes the heathen interlocutor, in his dialogue called Octavius, assert that the Christians come together to a feast on a solemn day “(solo sancto die)” (solanum diec).

quippe et rerum, in a synodal letter A. D. 253, make the Jewish circumcision on the eighth day prefigure the newness of life of the Christian, to which Christ’s resurrection introduces him, and point to the Lord’s Day, which is at once the eighth and the first.

Commodian, cir. A. D. 270, mentions the Lord’s Day.

Victorinus, A. D. 290, contrasts it, in a very remarkable passage, with the Passover and the Sabbath:

And Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, A. D. 300, says of it, “We keep the Lord’s Day as a day of joy, because of Him who rose thereon.”

The results of our examination of the principal writers of the two centuries after the death of St. John are as follows: The Lord’s Day (a name which has now come out more prominently, and is connected more explicitly with our Lord’s resurrection than before) existed during these two centuries without a name and without any special observance, but in the Easter week of the Lord’s resurrection was considered a festal day.
turies as a part and parcel of apostolical, and so of Scriptural Christianity. It was never defended, for it was never impugned, or at least only impugned as other things received from the Apostles were. It was never conformed with the Sabbath, but carefully distinguished from it (though we have not quoted nearly all the passages by which this point might be proved). It was not an institution of severe Sabbatical character, but a day of joy (χαράταινα) and cheerfulness (εὐφορία), rather encouraging than forbidding relaxation. Religiously regarded, it was a day of solemn meeting for the Holy Eucharist, for united prayer, for instruction, for almsgiving; and though, being an institution under the law of liberty, work does not appear to have been formally interdicted, or rest formally enjoined, Tertullian seems to indicate that the character of the day was opposed to worldly business. Finally, whatever analogy may be supposed to exist between the Lord's Day and the Sabbath, in no passage that has come down to us is the Fourth Commandment appealed to as the ground of the obligation to observe the Lord's Day. Ecclesiastical writers reiterate again and again, in the strictest sense of the word, "Let no man therefore judge you in respect of an holiday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days" (Mq της ἡμέρας κρινόντων ἐν μέρει διυτίου, η γουνάρια, η σαββάτων, Col. ii. 16). Nor, again, is it referred to any Sabbatical foundation anterior to the promulgation of the Mosaic economy. On the contrary, those, those before the Mosaic era are constantly assumed to have had neither knowledge nor observance of the Sabbath. And as little is it anywhere asserted, that the Lord's Day is merely an ecclesiastical institution, dependent on the post-apostolic Church for its origin, and by consequence capable of being done away, should a time ever arrive when it appears to be no longer needed.

Our design does not necessarily lead us to do more than state facts; but if the facts be allowed to speak for themselves, they indicate that the Lord's Day is a purely Christian institution, sanctioned by apostolic practice, mentioned in apostolic writings, and so possessed of whatever divine authority all apostolic ordinances and doctrines (which were not obviously temporary, or were not abrogated by the Apostles themselves) can be supposed to possess.

3. But on whatever grounds "the Lord's Day" may be supposed to rest, it is a great and indisputable fact that four years before the Ecumenical Council of Nicaea, it was recognized by Constantine in his celebrated edict, as "the venerable Day of the Sun." The terms of the document are these:—

Omnibus ecclesiae urbebusque plebis et canonicorum archierarchia officiis venerandi Die Solis religiosi. Rursi tam est in principia liberae laetetur inscribantur, quantum frequentiores erectur un non aptiis alio die fruunt.

Ταν εντυχενευ κοιμουμενες ημερες, εν Επισκοπαι προτείνει της εξουσίας ὑποκάζονται, Ἑλέστε δὲ την ἱερατικὴν καταδίκην, καὶ την τοιοτῆς εἰσαγωγῆς ἐκκλησίαν καὶ τῶν ἄλλων πραγμάτων σχετικῶς ὑπερευπαίνεται, καὶ εν εὐχαῖς καὶ λατινὸς τοῦ θεοῦ θυσίας εὐπνεους διὰ τὴν κυρίαν, ὥστε τοῦ Κριτῶν οὐσιωδοῦ εὐαίσθεντος εἰκόνας, εἰς τοὺς τετράδες συνάρτησις εἰς χειρός τοῦ ἐκείνου τοῦ ἔτους εἰς ἡμέρας τοὺς ἐσταιρώμενους Τιττ. Χριστ. Ἰunct. i. c. 9.

Some have endeavored to explain away this document by alleging — 1st, that "Solis Dies" is not the Christian name of the Lord's Day, and that Constantine did not therefore intend to acknowledge it as a Christian institution.

2d. That, before his conversion, Constantine had professed himself to be especially under the guardianship of the sun, and that, at the very best, he intended to make a religious compromise between sun-worshippers, properly so-called, and the worshippers of the "Sun of Righteousness," i.e., Christians.

3d. That Constantine's edict was purely a kalendarial one, and intended to reduce the number of public holidays, "Dies Nefasti," or "Feriatii," which had, so long ago as the date of the "Actiones Ferrine," become a serious impediment to the transaction of business. And that this was to be effected by choosing a day which, while it would be accepted by the Paganism then in fashion, would of course be agreeable to the Christians.

4th. That Constantine then instituted Sunday for the first time as a religious day for Christians.

The fourth of these statements is absolutely refuted, both by the quotations made above from writers of the second and third centuries, and by the terms of the edict itself. It is evident that Constantine, accepting as facts the existence of the "Sulis Dies," and the reverence paid to it by some one or other, does nothing more than make that reverence practically universal. It is "venerabilis" already. And it is probable that this most natural interpretation would never have been disturbed, had not Sozomen asserted, without warrant from either the Justinian or the Theodosian Code, that Constantine did for the sixth day of the week what the codes assert he did for the first.

The three other statements concern themselves rather with what Constantine meant than with what he did. But with such considerations we have little or nothing to do. He may have purposely selected an ambiguous appellation. He may have been only half a Christian, wavering between allegiance to Christ and allegiance to Mithras. He may have affected a religious syncretism. He may have wished his people to adopt such syncretism. He may have feared to offend the Pagans. He may have hesitated to awow too openly his inward leanings to Christianity. He may have considered that community of religious days might lead by and by to community of religious thought and feeling. And he may have had in view the rectification of the calendar. But all this is nothing to the purpose.

It is, in fact, that in the year A.D. 321, in a public edict, which was to apply to Christians as well as to Pagans, he put especial honor upon a day already honored by the former — judiciously calling it by a name which Christians had long tam esse deceruit. " There is a passage also in Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. 15), which appears to assert the same thing of Saturday. It is, however, manifestly corrupt, and can scarcely be translated at all, except by the employment of an emendation; while, if we do thus emend it, it will speak of Friday, as Sozomen does, and not of Saturday; and, what is more to our purpose, to whichever of those days it does refer, what is said in it concerning the εἰκόνας της Παρασκευῆς remains.

employed without scruple, and to which, as it was in ordinary use, the Pagans could scarcely object. What he did for it was to insist that worthy purpose, whether by the functionaries of the law or by private citizens, should be intermitted during its continuance. An exception indeed was made in favor of the rural districts, avowedly from the necessity of the case, covertly perhaps to prevent those districts, where Paganism (as the word Pagan would intimate) still prevailed extensively, from feeling aggrieved by a sudden and stringent change. It need only be added here, that the readiness with which Christians acquiesced in the interference of business on the Lord's Day affords no small presumption that they had long considered it to be a day of rest, and that, so far as circumstances admitted, they had made it so long before.

Were any other testimony wanting to the existence of Sunday as a day of Christian worship at this period, it might be supplied by the Council of Nicaea, A. D. 325. The Fathers there and then assembled made no objection of the observance of that day — do not ordain it — do not detest it. They assume it as an existing fact, and only notice it incidentally in order to regulate an indifferent matter, the posture of Christian worshippers upon it.

Richard Baxter has well summed up the history of the Lord's Day at this point, and his words may not unaptly be inserted here: — "That the first Christian emperor, finding all Christians unanimous in the possession of the day, should make a law (as our kings do) for the due observing of it, and that the first Christian council should establish uniformity in the very gesture of worship on that day, are strong confirmations of the matter of fact, that the churches unanimously agreed in the holy use of it, as a separated day even from and in the Apostles' days." (Richard Baxter, On the Divine Appointment of the Lord's Day, p. 41, 1671.)

Here we conclude our inquiry. It patristical or ecclesiastical ground has been touched upon, it has been only so far as appeared necessary for the elucidation of the Scripture phrase, ἡ Κυρίας ἡμέρα. What became of the Sabbath after Christianity was fairly planted; what Christ said of it in the Gospels, and how his words are to be interpreted: what the Apostles said of that day, and how they treated it: what the early ecclesiastical writers held respecting it; and in what sense "There remaineth a Sabbath after the Commandment" (Heb. iv. 9): these are questions which fall rather under the head of Sabbath than under that of "Lord's Day." And as no debate arose in apostolic or in primitive times respecting the relation, by descent, of the Lord's Day to the Mosaic Sabbath, or to any Sabbathial institution of assumed higher antiquity, none need be raised here. [See SABBATH.]

The whole subject of the Lord's Day, including its "origin, history, and present obligation," is treated of by the writer of this article in the Bampton Lecture for 1800.

LORD'S SUPPER (Κυριακὸν δείνυμι: Eam Dominico). The words which thus describe the great central act of the worship of the Christian Church occur but in one single passage of the N. T. (1 Cor. xi. 20). Of the fact which lies under the same we have several notices, and from these, incidentals and fragmentary as they are, it is possible to form a tolerably distinct picture. To examine these notices in their relation to the life of the Christian society in the first stages of its growth, and so to learn what the "Supper of the Lord" actually was, will be the object of this article. It would be foreign to its purpose to trace the history of the sotely names which grew up out of it in the 2d and 3d centuries, except so far as any supply or suggest evidence as to the customs of the earlier period, or to touch upon the many controversies which then, or at a later age, have clustered round the original institution.

I. The starting-point of this inquiry is found in the history of that night when Jesus and his disciples met together to eat the Passover (Matt. xxvi. 19; Mark xiv. 16; Luke xxii. 13). The manner in which the Paschal feast was kept by the Jews of that period differed in many details from that originally prescribed by the rules of Ex. xii. The multitudes that came up to Jerusalem, met, as they could find accommodation, family by family, or in groups of friends, with one of their number as the celebrant, or "proclaimer" of the feast. The ceremonies of the feast took place in the following order (Lightfoot, Tempel Service, xxxii.; Meyer, Comm. in Matt. xxvi. 20). (1.) The members of the family that were joined for this purpose met in the evening and reclined on couches, this position being now as much a matter of rule as standing had been originally (comp. Matt. xxvi. 22, ἀνάκαρτο: Λουκ. xxii. 14; and John xiii. 23, 25). The head of the household, or celebrant, began by a form of blessing "for the day and for the wine," pronounced over a cup, of which he and the others then drank. The wine was, according to rabbinical traditions, to be mixed with water; and the reason of this custom being both a memorial of the ancient practice, and a mysterious reason, but because that was regarded as the best way of using the best wine (comp. 2 Macc. xx. 39). (2.) All who were present then washed their hands; this also having a special benediction. (3.) The table was then set out with the paschal lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and the dish known as Charoseth (τηροσθή), a sauce made of dates, figs, raisins, and vinegar, and designed to commemorate the mortar of their bondage in Egypt (Baxter, Lex. Rabb. 831). (4.) The celebrant first, and then the others, dipped a portion of the bitter herbs into the Charoseth and ate them. (5.) The dishes were then removed, and a cup of wine again brought. Then followed an interval which was allowed theoretically for the

The phraseology to which we are accustomed is to him only an example of the "ridicula Calvinistarum et Lutheranorum insinu," innovating on the received language of the Church. The keen detector of heresy, however, is in this instance at variance not only with the consensus of the chief fathers of the ancient Church (comp. Suicer. Thes. s. v. δείνυμι), but with the authoritative teaching of his own (Catechism Trident. c. iv. qu. 6) questions that might be asked by children or pro-selytes, who were astonished at such a strange beginning of a feast, and the cup was passed round and drunk at the close of it. (6.) The dishes being brought on again, the celebrant repeated the commemorative words which opened what was strictly the paschal supper, and pronounced a solemn thanksgiving. (7.) Then came a second washing of the hands, with a short form of blessing as before, and the celebrant broke one of the two loaves or cakes of unleavened bread, and gave thanks over it. All then took portions of the bread and dipped them, together with the bitter herbs, into the Chareseth, and so ate them. (8.) After this they ate the flesh of the paschal lamb, with bread, etc., as they liked; and after another blessing, a third cup, known especially as the “cup of blessing,” was handed round. (9.) This was succeeded by a fourth cup, and the recital of 1s. cxv.-cxviii. followed by a prayer, and this was accordingly known as the cup of the Hallel, or of the Song. (10.) There might be, in conclusion, a fifth cup, provided that the “great Hallel” (possibly Psalm cxv.-cxviii.) was sung over it.

Celebrating the ritual thus gathered from Rabbinic writers with the N. T., and assuming (1) that it represents substantially the common practice of our Lord’s time; and (2) that the meal of which He and his disciples partook, was either the Passover itself, or an anticipation of it, conducted according to the same rules, we are able to point, though not with absolute certainty, to the points of departure which the old practice presented for the institution of the new. To (1) or (3), or even to (8), we may refer the first words and the first distribution of the cup (Luke xxii. 17, 18); to (2) or (7), the dipping of the sop (φαγετον) of John xiii. 29; to (7), or to an interval during or after (8), the distribution of the bread (Matt. xxv. 25; Mark xiv. 22; Luke xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25); to (9) or (10) (“after supper.”) Luke xxii. 20), the thanksgiving, and distribution of the cup, and the hymn with which the meal was terminated. It will be noticed, according to this order of succession, the question whether Judas partook of what, in the language of a later age, would be called the consecrated elements, is most probably to be answered in the negative.

The narratives of the Gospels show how strongly the disciples were impressed with the words which had given a new meaning to the old familiar acts. They leave unnoticed all the ceremonies of the Passover, except those which had thus been transferred to the Christian Church and perpetuated in it. Old things were passing away, and all things becoming new. They had looked on the bread and the wine as memorials of the deliverance from Egypt. They were now told to partake of them in remembrance of their Master and Lord. The festival had been annual. No rule was given as to the time and frequency of the new feast that thus superseded on the old, but the command “Do this as oft as ye drink it” (1 Cor. xi. 25), suggested the more continual recurrence of that which was to be their memorial of one whom they would with never to forget. The words, “This is my body,” gave to the unleavened bread a new character. They had been prepared for language that would otherwise have been so startling, by the teaching of John (vi. 32-34), and they were thus taught to see in the bread that was broken the witness of the closest possible union and incorporation with their Lord. The cup which was “the new testament” (βαπτισμος) “in His blood,” would remind them, in like manner, of the wonderful prophecy in which that new covenant had been foretold (Jer. xxxi. 31-34) of which the crowning glory was in the promise, “I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more.”

His blood shed, as He told them, “for them and for many,” for that remission of sins which He had been proclaiming throughout his whole ministry, was to be to the new covenant what the blood of sprinkling had been to that of Moses. (Ex. xxiv. 8.) It is possible that there may have been yet another thought connected with these symbolic acts. The funeral customs of the Jews involved, at or after the burial, the administration to the mourners of bread (comp. Jer. xvi. 7. “neither shall they break bread for them in mourning,” in marginal reading of A. V.: Ewald and Hitzig, ad loc.; Ez. xxiv. 17; Hos. ix. 4; Tob. iv. 17), and of wine, known, when thus given, as the cup of consolation. May not the bread of Ps. cxiii, and the wine of the Last Supper have had something of that character, preparing the minds of Christ’s disciples for his departure by treating it as already accomplished? They were to think of his body as already anointed for the burial (Matt. xxv. 12; Mark xiv. 8; John xii. 7), of his body as already given up to death, of his blood as already shed. The passover-meal was also, little as they might dream of it, a funeral-feast.

The bread and the wine were to be signs of communication for their sorrow, analogous to the verbal promises of John xiv. 1, 27, xvi. 20. The word βαπτισμος might even have the twofold meaning which is connected with it in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

May we not conjecture, without leaving the region of history for that of controversy, that the thoughts, desires, emotions, of that hour of divine sorrow and communion would be such as to lead the disciples to crave earnestly to renew them? Would it not be natural that they should seek that renewal in the way which their Master had pointed out to them? From this time, accordingly, the words “to break bread,” appear to have had for

* It may be interesting to give the words, as showing what kind of forms may have served as types for the first worship of the Christian Church.

1. This is the passover, which we eat because the Lord passed over the houses of our fathers in Egypt.

2. These are the bitter herbs, which we eat in remembrance that the Egyptians made the lives of our fathers bitter in Egypt.

3. This is the unleavened bread, which we eat, because the dough of our fathers had not time to be leavened before the Lord revised himself and redeemed them out of hand.

4. Therefore are we bound to give thanks, to praise, to laud, to glorify, to extol, to honor, to praise, to magnify him that hath done for our fathers, and for us, all these wonders; who hath brought us from bondage to freedom, from sorrow to rejoicing, from mourning to a good time; from darkness to a great light, from affliction to redemption; therefore must we say before him, Hallelujah, praise ye the Lord . . . . followed by Ps. cxiii. (Lightfoot, l. c.)

* This reservation is made as being a possible alternative for explaining the difference between the three first Gospels and St. John.
the disciples a new significance. It may not have assumed indeed, as yet, the character of a distinct liturgical act; but when they met to break bread, it was with new thoughts and hopes, and with the meaning that even this could be natural that the Twelve should transmit the command to others who had not been present, and seek to lead them to the same obedience and the same blessings. The narrative of the two disciples to whom their Lord made himself known "in breaking of bread" at Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 30-35) would strengthen the belief that this was the way to an abiding fellowship with Him. In the same context, given by the writer of the Acts of the life of the first disciples at Jerusalem, a prominent place is given to this act, and to the phrase which indicated it. Writing, we must remember, with the definite associations that had gathered round the words during the thirty years that followed the events he records, he describes the baptized members of the Church as continuing steadfast in or to the teaching of the Apostles, in fellowship with them and with each other, and in breaking of bread and in prayers (Acts ii. 42). A few verses further on, their daily life is described as ranging itself under two heads: (1) that of public devotion, which still belonged to them as Jews ("continuing daily with one accord in the Temple"); (2) that of their distinct acts of fellowship - breaking bread from house to house (or "privately," Meyer). They did eat their meat in gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favor with all the people." Taken in connection with the account given in the preceding verses of the love which made them live as having all things common, we can scarcely doubt that this implies that the chief actual meal of each day was one in which they met as brothers, and which was either preceded or followed by the more solemn commemorative acts of the breaking of the bread and the drinking of the cup. It will be convenient to anticipate the language and the thoughts of a somewhat later date, and to say that, apparently, they thus united every day the Agape or feast of Love with the celebration of the Eucharist. So far as the former was concerned, they were reproducing in the streets of Jerusalem the simple and

The general consensus of patristic and Roman Catholic interpreters finds in this also a solemn celebration of the Eucharist. Here, they say, are the solemn benediction, and the technical words for the distribution of the elements as in the original institution, and as in the subsequent commemoration of the Acts. It should be remembered, however, that the phrase "to break bread" had been a synonym for the act of any one partaking at a meal (comp. Jer. xvi. 7; Iam iv. 4), and that the rabbinical rule required a blessing whenever three persons sat down together at it. (Comp. Mal. 4:11; and Meyer, ad loc.)

The meaning of κοιναίνοι in this passage is probably explained by the εἰς ἑαυτάκερα σύναρσιν that follows (comp. Meyer, ad loc.). The Vulg. rendering, "et communicatio fractionis pasi," probably comes in a wish to give to the word its later liturgical sense.

The fact is traceable to the earliest days of the Church. The origin of the name is obscure. It occurs in the sense only in two passages of the N. T. (1 Pet. ii. 19, 20) and that of Peter the apostle is the only one strongly supported by and other great MSS.; it is undisputed. The absence of any reference to it in St. Paul's memorable chapter on Agape (1 Cor. xiii.) makes it improbable that it was then and there in use. In the age after the Apostles, however, it is a currently accepted word for the meal here described (Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. c. 8; Tertull. Apol. c. 30; ad Mart. c. 2; Cyprian, Testim. ad Quirin. iii. 3).

The account given by Josephus (Bell. Jud. ii. 3, 4) deserves to be studied, both as coming from an eye-witness (Vita, c. 2), and as showing a type of holiness which could hardly have been unknown to the first Christian disciples. The description of the meal of the Essenes, it would be necessary to introduce words that would show that what was done was in remembrance of their Master. At some time, before or after the meal of which they partook as such, the bread and the wine would be given with some special form of words or acts, to indicate its character. New converts would need some explanation of the meaning and origin of the observance. What would be so fitting and so much in harmony with the precedents of the Paschal feast as the narrative of what had passed on the night of its institution (1 Cor. xvi. 23-27)? With this there would naturally be associated (as in Acts ii. 42) prayers for themselves and others. Their gladness would show itself in the psalms and hymns with which they praised God (Acts ii. 46, 47; James v. 13). The analogy of the Passover, the general

LORD'S SUPPER
The plural \textit{agap\ae} has been understood as implying that the congregation took part in the act of breaking bread and blessing the cup (1 Cor. xii. 16). It may be questioned, however, whether this is sufficient ground for an interpretation for which there is no support either in the analogues custom of the Jews or in the traditions of the Church. The practice of the Agape, which stands parallel to \\textit{Eucharistia}, can hardly be referred to the whole body of partakers. When the act is described historically, the singular is always used (Acts xx. 11, xlvii. 35). Tertullian, in his passage to which Prof. Stanley refers, speaks of the other practice

The Lord's Supper

The feeding of the Jews, and the practice of the Essenes may possibly have suggested allusions, partial or entire, as a preparation for the feast (Heb. x. 22; John xiii. 1-15; comp. Tertull. de \\textit{Eremit.} c. xli; and for the later practice of the Church, August. \textit{Sermon.} cxciv.). At some point in the feast those who were present, men and women sitting apart, would rise to salute each other with the "holy kiss" (1 Cor. vii. 38; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; Clem. Alex. \textit{Piq.\textit{Piq.}\textit{Piq.}} iii. c. 11; Tertull. de \\textit{Orat.} c. 14; Just. M. \textit{Apol.} ii.). Of the stages in the growth of the new worship we have, it is true, no direct evidence, but the contrasts mentioned between the earlier and later custom are confirmed by the fact that this order appears as the common element of all later liturgies.

The next traces that meet us are in 1 Cor., and the fact that we find them is in itself significant. The commemorative feast has not been confined to the personal disciples of Christ, or the Jewish converts whom they gathered round them at Jerusalem. It has been the law of the Church's expansion that this act should spring forth in its various places everywhere. Wherever the Apostles or their delegates have gone, they have taken this with them. The language of St. Paul, we must remember, is not that of a man who is setting forth a new truth, but of one who appeals to thoughts, words, phrases that are familiar to his readers, and we find accordingly evidence of a received liturgical terminology. The title of the "cup of blessing" (1 Cor. x. 16), Hebrew in its origin and form (see above), has been imported into the Greek Church. The synonym of "the cup of the Lord" (1 Cor. x. 21) distinguishes it from the other cups that belonged to the Agape. The word "fellowship" (\textit{Koinonia}) is passing by degrees into the special signification of "Communion." The Apostles refer to his own office as breaking the bread and blessing the cup (1 Cor. x. 16). A table on which the bread was placed was the Lord's Table, and that title was to the Jew not, as later controversies have made it, the antithesis of altar (\textit{Ostensorium}), but as nearly as possible a synonym (\textit{Mal. i. 17}, 2 Ex. xii. 22). But the practice of the Agape, as well as the observance of the commemorative feast, had been transferred to Corinth, and this called for a special notice. Evils had sprung up which had to be checked at once. The meeting of friends for a social purpose; the introduction of all sorts of rank, at once an obstacle and an encouragement to unscrupulous conduct; the making of a banquet out of the Lord's feast; the showing the ungodly to eat and drink with the saints; the making of a festival out of the Lord's Supper, have been condemned with great vehemence, constituting the subject of the five chapters of the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

"These things I do not approve," says St. Paul, "nor do I approve of the man who has the care of the Lord's feast making it a cause of his wrong doing." But we must notice, that the words of St. Paul are not fully comprehended by the first and last of the five chapters of the First Epistle to the Corinthians. The Apostle's instruction is clearly not addressed to those who, being profane, were plundering the Church of Christ, and actually committing sacrilege, but to such as had improperly introduced their own society into the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The instruction of the Apostle is, in the first place, one of teaching and warning; in the second of exhortation, and in the third of example. The words of St. Paul, properly understood and applied, are a corrective of sin, a comfort to the soul, and a guide to the Church. The Lord's Supper, in the hands of St. Paul, is not a support of vice, an argument for sloth, an occasion for intemperance, a source of corruption, but a comfort to the conscience, an exhortation to the spirit, and a guide to the Church.

The tendency of this language, and therefore probably of the order subsequently established, was to make the Lord's Supper a true sacrament, and to form it into a celebration solemn, serious, and sacred. This idea is the true foundation of the liturgy of the Church of Christ, and it is the Church that has lived up to the idea of St. Paul, and has for the last six hundred years with the utmost integrity and holiness performed the great duty of celebrating the Lord's Supper. This is the true and scriptural supposition of the Lord's Supper. The Church has lived up to the idea of St. Paul, and has for the last six hundred years with the utmost integrity and holiness performed the great duty of celebrating the Lord's Supper.
and finally dies out.\(^a\) Traces of it linger in some of the traditional practices of the Western Church.\(^b\) There have been attempts to revive it among the Moravians and other religious communities. The other also has it changes. The morning celebration takes the place of the evening. The names — Eucharist, Mass, Holy Name, — gather round it. New epithets and new ceremonies express the growing reverence of the people. The mode of celebration at the high altar of a basilica in the 4th century differs so widely from the circumstances of the original institution, that a careless eye would have found it hard to recognize their identity. Speculations, controversies, superstitions crystallize round this as their nucleus. Great disruptions and changes threaten to destroy the life and unity of the Church. Still, through all the changes, the Supper of the Lord vindicates its claim to universality, and bears a permanent witness of the truths with which it was associated.

In Acts xx. 11 we have an example of the way in which the transition may have been effected. The disciples at Troas meet together to break bread. The hour is not definitely stated, but the fact that St. Paul's discourse was protracted till past midnight, and the mention of the many hands that indicate a later time than that commonly fixed for the Greek ἐκκλησία. If we are not to suppose a scene at variance with St. Paul's rule in 1 Cor. xi. 34, they must have had each his own supper before they assembled. Then came the teaching and the prayers, and then, towards early dawn, the breaking of bread, which constituted the Lord's Supper, and for which they were gathered together. If this midnight meeting be taken as indicating a common practice, of evening in reverence for an ordinance which Christ had enjoined, we can easily understand how the next step would be (as circumstances rendered the midnight gatherings unnecessary or inexpedient) to transfer the celebration of the Eucharist permanently to the morning hour, to which it had gradually been approaching.\(^c\) Here also in later times there were traces of the original custom. Even when a later celebration was looked on as at variance with the general custom of the Church (Ssozomen, συνάγωνα), it was recognized as legitimate to hold an evening communion, as a special commemoration of the original institution, on the Thursday before Easter (August. Ep. p. 118; ad Jon. c. 57-77; and again on Easter eve, the celebration in the latter case probably taking place "very early in the morning while it was yet dark") (Tertull. ad Uxor. ii. 6. 4).

The recurrence of the same liturgical words in Acts xx. 35 makes it probable, though not certain, that the food of which St. Paul thus partook was intended to have, for himself and his Christian companions, the character at once of the Agape and the Eucharist. The heathen soldiers and sailors, it may be noticed, are said to have followed his example, not to have partaken of the bread which he had eaten. When we adopt the same conclusion, we have in this narrative another example of a celebration in the early hours between midnight and dawn (comp. vv. 27, 39), at the same time, i. e., as we have met with in the meeting at Troas.

All the distinct references to the Lord's Supper which occur within the limits of the N. T. have, it is believed, been noticed. To find, as a recent writer has done (Christian Remembrancer for April, 1880), quotations from the Liturgy of the Eastern Church in the Pauline Epistles, involves (ingeniously as the hypothesis is supported) assumptions too many and too bold to justify our acceptance of it.\(^d\) Extending the inquiry, however, to the times as well as the writings of the N. T., we find reason to believe that we can trace in the later worship of the Church some fragments of that which belonged to it from the beginning. The language of the four great families of liturgies implies the substratum of a common order. To that order may well have belonged the Hebrew words Hallelujah, Amen, Hosanna, Lord of Sabaoth; the salutations "Peace to all," "Peace to thee;" the Sumsur Corda (Ἄνω σχόλως τάς χαρίς), the Triregion, the Kyrie Eleison. We are justified in looking at these as having been portions of a liturgy that was really primitive; guarded from change by the tenacity with which the Christians of the second century clung to the traditions (the παραμόρφωσις of 2 Thess. ii. 15. iii. 6) of the first, forming part of the great deposit (παρασκηνεῖς) of faith and worship which they had received from the Apostles and have transmitted to later ages (comp. Bingham, Eccl. Antiq. b. x. c. 7; Augusti, Christi. Archid. b. viii.; Stanley on 1 Cor. x. and xi.).

\(a\) The history of the Agape, in their connection with the life of the Church, is full of interest, but would be out of place here. An outline of it may be found in Augusti, Christi. Archid. iii. 704-711.

\(b\) The practice of distributing bread, which has been blessed but not consecrated, to the congregation generally (children included), at the greater festivals of the Church, presents a vestige, or at least an analogue, of the old Agape. Liturgical writers refer it to the period (A. D. 318-356) when the earlier practice was falling into disuse, and this taking its place as the expression of the same feeling. The bread thus distributed is known in the Eastern Church as ἀγαπησ, in the Western as the pars brevica, the "pain boîle" of the modern French Church. The practice

\(d\) comp. the "antelucanum entity" of Tertull. (de Cor. Mor. c. 3). The annunciation in the ritual of the monastic order, of the Nocturnes, and Matins-Lauds, into the single office of Matins presents an instance of an analogous transition (Pulner, Orig. Liturg. l. 2:22).

\(e\) 1 Cor. ii. 9, compared with the recurrence of the same words in the Liturgy with an antecedent to the epitaph without one, is the passage on which most stress is laid 1 Pet. ii. 16 and Eph. v. 14, are added as further instances.
Haran died before the emigration of Terah and his family from Ur of the Chaldees (ver. 28), and Lot was therefore born there. He removed with the rest of his kindred to Charan, and again subsequently with Abram and Sarai to Canaan (xii. 4, 5). With them he took refuge in Egypt from a famine, and with them returned, first to the "South" (xiii. 1), and then to their original settlement between Bethel and Ai (vv. 3, 4), where Abram had built his first altar (xii. 6; comp. xii. 7), and invoked on it the name of Jehovah. But the pastures of the hills of Bethel, which had with ease contained the two strangers on their first arrival, were not able any longer to bear them, so much had their possessions of sheep, goats, and cattle increased since that time. It was not any disagreement between Abram and Lot—their relations continued good to the last; but between the slaves who tended their countless herds disputes arose, and a parting was necessary. The exact equality with which Jehovah treats Lot is very remarkable. It is as if they were really, according to the very ancient idiom of these records (Ewald on Gen. xxx.), "brethren," instead of uncle and nephew. From some one of the round swelling hills which surround Bethel—from none more likely than that which stands immediately on its east [Bethel, vol. I.]—the two Hebrews looked over the comparatively empty land, in the direction of Sodom, Gomorrah, and Zoar (xii. 10). "The occasion was to the two lords of Palestine—then almost 'free before them where to choose'—what in Grecian legends is represented under the figure of the Choice of Hercules: in the fables of Islam under the story of the Prophet turning back from Damascus." And Lot lifted up his eyes towards the left, and beheld all the precinct of the Jordan that it was well watered everywhere: like a garden of Jehovah: like that unutterably green and fertile land of Egypt he had only lately quitted. Even from that distance, through the clear air of Palestine, can be distinctly discovered the long and thick masses of vegetation which fringe the numerous streams that descend from the hills on either side, to meet the central stream in its tropical depths. And what it now is immediately opposite Bethel, such as it seems then to have been "even to Zoar," to the farthest extremity of the sea which now covers the "valley of the fields?"—the fields of Sodom and Gomorrah. "No crust of salt, no volcanic convulsions, had as yet blasted its verdure, or alarmed the secure civilization of the early Phoenician settlements which had struck root in its fertile depths." It was exactly the prospect to tempt a man who had no fixed purpose of his own, who had not like Abram observed a stern inward call of duty. So Lot left his uncle on the barren hills of Bethel, and he "chose all the precipice of the Jordan, and journeyed east," down the ravines which give access to the Jordan Valley; and then when he reached it turned again southward and advanced as far as Sodom (11, 12). Here he "pitched his tent," for he was still a nomad. But his nomad life was virtually at an end. He was now to relinquish the freedom and independence of the simple life of the tent—a mode of life destined to be one of the great methods of educating the descendants of Abram—and encounter the corruptions which seem always to have attended the life of cities in the East—"the men of Sodom were wicked, and sinners before Jehovah exceedingly." 2. The next occurrence in the life of Lot is his capture by the four kings of the East, and his rescue by Abram (Gen. xiv.). Whatever may be the age of this chapter in relation to those before and after it, there is no doubt that as far as the history of Lot is concerned, it is in its right position in the narrative. The events which it narrates must have occurred after those of ch. xiii., and before those of xviii. and xix. Abram has moved further south, and is living under the oaks of Mamre the Amorite, where he remained till the destruction of Sodom. There is little in it which calls for remark here. The term "brother" is once used (ver. 16) for Lot's relation to Abram (but comp. ver. 12, "brother's son"); and a word is employed for the possessions of Lot (ver. 11, A. v. "goods"), which, from its being elsewhere in these early records (xvi. 6; Num. xxx. 3) distinguished from "cattle," and employed specially for the spoil of Sodom and Gomorrah, may perhaps denote that Lot had exchanged the wealth of his pastoral condition for other possessions more peculiar to his new abode. Women are also named (ver. 16), though these may belong to the people of Sodom. 3. The last scene preserved to us in the history of Lot is too well known to need repetition. He is still living in Sodom (Gen. xix.). Some years have passed, for he is a well-known resident in the town, with wife, sons, and daughters, married and marriageable. But in the midst of the licentious corruption of Sodom—the eating and drinking, the buying and selling, the planting and building (Luke

Terah's sons are given above in the order in which they occur in the record (Gen. xi. 27-32). But the facts that Nahor and Isaac (and if Isaac be Sarai, Abram also) married wives out of their own generation, but of the next below them, and that Abram and Lot went together and behaved as if exactly on equal terms, seem to show that Haran was the eldest of Terah's three descendants, and Abram the youngest. It would be a parallel to the case of Shem, Ham, and Japhet, where Japhet was really the eldest, though enumerated last. [Abram, vol. I. p. 13, note d.]

vii. 28), and of the darker evils exposed in the ancient narrative — he still preserves some of the delightful characteristics of his wandering life, his fervent and chivalrous hospitality (xix. 2, 8), the undeserved grief of the righteous (ver. 3), the water for the feet of the wayfarers (ver. 2), affording his guests a reception identical with that which they had experienced that very morning in Abraham’s tent on the heights of Hebron (comp. xviii. 3, 6). It is this hospitality which receives the commendation of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews in words which have passed into a familiar proverb, “be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby have you entertained angels unawares.” (Heb. xiii. 2). On the other hand, it is his deliverance from the guilty and condemned city — the one just man in that mob of sensual lawless wretches — which points the allusion of St. Peter, to — the godly delivered out of temptations, the meek reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished, an example to those that should after him live ungodly” (2 Pet. ii. 5-6). Where Zoar was situated has been a matter of contention. Lassar has found a temporary refuge during the destruction of the other cities of the plain, we do not know with absolute certainty. It, as is most probable, was at the mouth of Wady Kerak (Rob. ii. 188, 517), then by “the mountain” is meant the very elevated ground east of the Dead Sea. If with De Sauley we place it in es-Zourer, on the precipitous descent from Hebron, “the mountain” was the high ground of Judah. Either would afford caves for his subsequent dwelling. The former situation — on the eastern side of the Dead Sea, has in its favor the fact that it is in accordance with the position subsequently occupied by the Ammonites and Moabites. But this will be best examined under Zoar.

The end of Lot’s life is commonly treated as one of the “difficulties” of the Bible. It surely need not be so. It cannot be necessary, as some have done, to create the details of the story where none are given — to describe “the unhappy woman struck dead” — a blackened corpse — smothered and stifled as she stood, and fixed for the time to the soil by saline or bituminous incrustations — like a pillar of salt.” On these points the record is silent. Its words are simply these: “His wife looked back from behind him, and became a pillar of salt,” — words which neither in themselves nor in their position in the narrative asked any warrant for such speculations. In fact, when taken with what has gone before, they contradict them, for it seems plain, from vv. 22, 23, that the work of destruction by fire did not commence till after Lot had entered Zoar. But this, like the rest of her fate, is left in mystery.

The value and the significance of the story to us are contained in the allusion Christ (Mar. xi. 32): “In that day he that is in the field let him not return back; remember Lot’s wife,” who did. “Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it.” It will be observed that there is no attempt in the narrative to invest the circumstance with permanence; no statement — as in the case of the pillar erected over Rachel’s grave (xxv. 20) — that it was to be seen at the time of the compilation of the history. And in this we surely have a remarkable instance of that sobriety which characterizes the statements of Scripture, even where the events narrated are most out of the ordinary course.

Later ages have not been satisfied so to leave the matter, but have insisted on identifying the “pillar” with some one of the fleeting forms which the perishable rock of the south end of the Dead Sea is constantly assuming in its process of decomposition and foliation (Josephus, Ant. xi. 19, 5; R. F. H. Tuch, “LOT,” 181). The first allusion of this kind is perhaps that in Wisd. x. 7, where “a standing pillar of salt, the monument (μνημείον) of an unbelieving soul,” is mentioned with the “waste land that smotheth,” and the “plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness,” as remaining to that day, a testimony to the wickedness of Sodom. Josephus also (Ant. i. 11, § 4) says that he had seen it, and that it was then remaining. So too do Clemens Romanus and Tertullus (quoted by Kitto, C. Y. “LOT”), if so does Benjamin of Tudela, whose account is more than usually circumstantial (ed. Asher, i. 72). And so don’tless have travellers in every age — they certainly have in our own times. See Mannreid, March 30; Lynch, Report, p. 13; and Anderson’s Off. Narratives, 181, where an account is given of a pillar or spur standing out detached from the general mass of the Jebel Cedron, about 40 feet in height, and which was recognized by the sailors of the expedition as “Lot’s wife.”

The story of the origin of the nations of Meab and Amnon from the incestuous intercourse between Lot and his two daughters, with which his history abruptly concludes, has been often treated as if it were a Hebrew legend which owed its origin to the litter of offspring existing from the earliest times between the “Children of Lot” and the children of Israel. The horrible nature of the transaction — not the result of impulse or passion, but a plan calculated and carried out, and that not the victims of many a similar catastrophe, was sufficed by the sulphurous smoke or killed by lightning. The body would lie where it fell, and in such a region soon would be incinerated with salt. Blocks of salt abound there at present and illustrate this fate of the unhappy woman. (See Rob. Rob. Res. ii. 452, and Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 294, 24 ed.) It is not sold,” as Dr. Conant remarks, “that she was changed into that substance, but, incinerated with it, she became a pillar of salt.” (Book of Genesis, etc., p. 72.)

4 Rob. Petahia, on the other hand, looked for it but “did not see it; it no longer exists” (ed. Bohden, G.)

5 See Tuch, Genesis, 399. Von Bomlen ascribes the legend to the latter part of the reign of Josiah.
...but twice, would prompt the wish that the legendary theory was true. But even the most destructive critics (as, for instance, Teich) allow that the narrative is a continuation without a break of that which precedes it, while they fail to point out any marks of later date in the language of this portion: and it cannot be questioned that the writer records it as an historical fact.

Even if the legendary theory were admissible, there is no doubt of the fact that Ammon and Moab sprang from Lot. It is affirmed in the statements of Deut. ii. 9 and 19, as well as in the later document of Ps. lxxxiii. 8, that Ewald ascribes to the time when Nehemiah and his newly-returned colony were suffering from the attacks and obstructions of Tobiah the Ammonite and Sanballat the Horonite (Ewald, Dochter, Ps. 88).

The Mohammedan traditions of Lot are contained in the Koran, chiefly in c. vii. 52 and xi. 17, and others are given by D'Herbelot (i.e. “Lot”). According to these statements he was sent to the inhabitants of the five cities as a preacher, to warn them against the unnatural and horrible sins which they practiced — sins which Mohammed is continually denouncing, but with less success than that of drunkenness, since the former is perhaps the most common, the latter the rarest vice, of Eastern cities. From Lot’s connection with the inhabitants of Sodom, his name is given now not only to the vice in question (Freytag, Leclin, iv. 129), but also to the people of the five cities themselves — the Lotites, or Katim Loti. The local name of the Dead Sea is Beher Lot — Sea of Lot.

LOT. The custom of deciding doubtful questions by lot is one of great extent and high antiquity, recommending itself as a sort of appeal to the Almighty, secure from all influence of passion or bias, and is a sort of divination employed even by the gods themselves (Horn. II. xxii. 299; Cie. de Dic. i. 34, ii. 41). The word sops is thus used for an official response (Cie. de Dic. ii. 58). [DIVINATION.] Among heathen instances the following may be cited: 1. Choice of a champion or of priority in combat (H. iii. 316, vii. 17; Her. iii. 108). 2. Decision of fate in battle (H. xx. 289). 3. Appointment of magistrates, jurymen, or other functionaries (Arist. Pol. iv. 16; Schol. On Aris. Top. Plut. 277; Her. vi. 193; Xen. Cyr. iv. 3, 59; Demosth. c. Aris. Top. i. 778, 16; Dict. ofHist. vii. 178, “Discretor.” 4. Priests (Gen. in Tim. p. 185, Beck.). 5. A German practice of deciding by marks on twigs, mentioned by Tacitus (Germ. 10). 6. Division of conquered or colonized land (Thuc. iii. 50; Plut. Peric. 84; Boeckh, Pub. Econ. of Ath. ii. 170).

Among the Jews also the use of lots, with a religious intention, direct or indirect, prevailed extensively. The religious estimate of them may be gathered from Prov. xvi. 34. The following historical or ritual instances correspond in most respects to those of a heathen kind mentioned above: 1. Choice of men for an invading force (Judg. 3, x. 9). 2. Partition, (a) of the soil of Palestine among the tribes (Num. xxvi. 53; Josh. xviii. 19; Judges xviii. 19); (b) of Jerusalem; i.e. probably its spoil.

or captives among captors (Olad. 11); of the land itself in a similar way (1 Mac. iii. 36). (c.) After the return from captivity, Jerusalem was populated by inhabitants drawn by lot in the proportion of 1 of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin (Ne. xi. 1, 2; see Ps. xvi. 5, 6, Ez. xxiv. 6). (d.) Apporportion of possessions, or spoil, or of prisoners, to foreigners or captors (Joel iii. 3; Nah. iii. 10, Matt. xxvii. 35). 3. (a.) Settlement of doubtful questions (Prov. xvii. 33, where “? “ is perhaps = urn; xviii. 18). (b.) A mode of divination among heathens by means of arrows. (c.) Two inscribed, and one without, mark. (d.) The lot was drawn (Hos. iv. 12; Ez. xxii. 21; Mauritius, de Sortiarn. c. 14, § 4; see also Euth. iii. 7, iv. 24-32; Mishna, Taanith, ii. 10). [DIVINATION. PRUR. (c.) Detection of a criminal, as in the case of Achan (Josh. vii. 14, 18). A notion prevailed among the Jews that this detection was performed by observing the shining of the stones in the high-priest’s breastplate (Mauritius, c. 21, § 4). Jonah was discovered by lot (1 Sam. xiv. 41, 42). (d.) Appointment of persons to offices or duties. Saul (1 Sam. x. 20, 21) said to have been chosen as above in Achan’s case. St. Matthias, to replace Judas among the Twelve (Acts i. 24-20). Distribution of priestly offices in the Temple-service among the sixteen of the family of Eleazar, and the eight of that of Ithamar (1 Chr. xxiv. 3, 5, 19; Luke i. 9). Also of the Levites for similar purposes (1 Chr. xxii. 8, xxiv. 20-21; xxv. 8, xxvi. 13; Mishna, Tamid, i. 2, ii. 1, v. 2; Joan, ii. 2, 3, 4; Shabb. xxii. 2; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Luke i. 8, 9, vol. ii. p. 489). The election by lot appears to have prevailed in the Christian Church as late as the 7th century (Bingham, Eccl. Antiq. iv. 1, vol. i. p. 429; Euseb., Conc. ii. 69).

(c.) Selection of the scape-goat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. vii. 8, 10). The two inscribed tablets of boxwood, afterwards of gold, were put into an urn, which was shaken, and the lots drawn out (Joan, iii. 9, iv. 1). [ATONEMENT, DAY OF.]

4. The use of words heard or passages chosen at random from Scripture. Sortes Bibliæ, like the Sortes Virgilianæ, prevailed among Jews, as they have also among Christians, though denounced by several writers (e.g. Dict. ofHist. “Sortes.” John¬ son, “Life of Cowley,” Works, ii. 8; Bingham, Eccl. Ant. xvi. 3, 5, id. vi. 53, &c.; Bruns, Conc. ii. 145-54, 166; Mauritius, ch. 15; Hofmann, Lex. “Sortes”).

H. W. P.

* In Prov. xxvi. 33 (see no. 3 (a) above), “?” is the true rendering, and there is no reference to an “urn.” In such a proverbial allusion or expression, we should expect to find, of course, the earliest and simplest, as well as the readiest, mode of using the lot. The “?” (or bosom of the outer garment) was a convenient receptacle, always at hand, into which the lots could be cast, and thence drawn forth. “Cast into the lot” was, therefore, the most suitable form of expression for a proverbial saying, the idea of which originated in the earliest and rudest stage of society, and was acted on under all circumstances. In the more formal and official use of the lot (as in Lev. xvi. 8 wards employed for the Cross, see FabriBritii, Cat. Pseudophr. V. T. i. 428-431.)

Josh. xviii. 6) when every convenience was at hand, a vessel in the shape of an urn was likely to be used, though there is no allusion to this in the Scriptures.

The Heb. word הלטונ ("lan" or "bosom," of the garment), is used metaphorically of a similar receptacle in any other object only in connection with the name of the object itself: as in 1 Kings xxii. 35, "into the bosom (hollow) of the chariot." (A. V. "midst of"), and in Ezek. xliii. 13, 14, 17, in the ideal description of the altar.

"To cast lots" (Lev. xvi. 18; Josh. xviii. 6) means to employ them in the decision of any matter. This was done by casting them into some convenient receptacle, from which they were drawn forth. Hence the phrase, "the lot came forth" (or "out"), Josh. xix. 1, 17, 24, 32, 40; 1 Chron. xxiv. 7; and also, "the lot came up," Josh. xix. 10, the lot being drawn up from the bottom of the receptacle. In 1 Chron. xxvi. 14 is found the full expression, "they cast lots, and his lot came out," etc.

The phrase, "the lot fell upon" (Lev. xvi. 9, 10), or "fell to" (1 Chron. xxvi. 14), expresses the result of an appeal to the lot, as coming upon, or affecting the person or object concerned. The full expression occurs in Jonah, i. 7, "they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah.

The suggestion of Lyezers (Herzog's Red-Engl. art. Eron, viii. 485), that the use of the word "tell" originated from the practice of casting the lots out of a vessel or the lap, is not consistent with Prov. xvi. 33, "the lot is cast into the lap." T. J. C.

LOTAN (לטונ [coveting]: Logos: Lotan) the eldest son of Seir the Horite, and a "duke" or chief of his tribe in the land of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 29, 24, 25; 1 Chr. i. 38, 39).

LOTHASUBUS (Λόθασου, Subus), a corruption of HASTUS in Neh. viii. 4, for which it is not easy to account (1 Esdr. ix. 44). The Vulg. is a further corruption of the LXX.

LOTS, FEAST OF. [PURIM.]

LOVE-FEASTS (αγάπη: epula, convivio; in this sense used only twice, Jude 12, and 2 Pet. ii. 13, in which latter place, however, ἀγάπη is also used as an entertainment in which the poorer members of the church partook, furnished from the contributions of Christians resorting to the Eucharistic celebration, but whether before or after it may be doubted. The true account of the matter is probably that given by Chrysostom, who says that after the early communions of goods had ceased, the richer members brought to the church contributions of food and drink, of which, after the conclusion of the service and the celebration of the Eucharist, all partook together, by this means helping to promote the principle of love among Christians (Hom. in 1 Cor. xi. 19, vol. iii. p. 235, and Hom. xxvii. in 1 Cor. xi. vol. x. p. 281, ed. Guenée). The intimate connection, especially in early times, between the Eucharist itself and the love-feast, has led several writers to speak of them almost as identical. Of those who either take this view, or regard the feast as subsequent to the Eucharist, may be mentioned Pliny, who says the Christians met and exchanged sacramental pledges against all sorts of immorality; after which they separated, and met again to partake in an entertainment. a

The same view is taken by Ignatius, ad S. Aug. ch. 8; Tertull. Apol. 39; Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 322 (vol. ii. p. 882), iii. 185 (vol. i. p. 514), but in Tert. ii. 61 (vol. i. p. 165), he seems to regard them as distinct: Apol. Const. ii. 28,1: and besides these, Jerome on 1 Cor. xi.; Theodoret and Eusebius, quoted by Bingham, who considers that the Agapè was subsequent (Orig. Eiccl. xv. 6, 7; vol. v. p. 284); Holmesc. LXX. "Agape." On the other side may be mentioned Grotius (on 2 Pet. ii. 13, in Crit. Sacri), Suicer (Theol. Eiccl. vol. i. s. c.), Hammond, Whity, Corn. A. Lapiude, and authorities quoted by Bingham, L. C. b

The almost universal custom to receive the Eucharist fasting proves that in later times the love-feasts must have followed, not preceded, the Eucharist (Sozomen, H. E. vii. 19; Aug. c. Fect. xx. 29; Ep. Ix. (alias cxxviii.); ad jamvar. c. 6, vol. ii. p. 203, ed. Migne; Conc. Carth. iii. A. D. 357, ch. 25; Bruns, Conc. i. p. 127): but the exception of one day from the general rule (the day called Cena Domini, or Maundy Thursday), seems to assume a previously different practice. The love-feasts were forbidden to be held in churches by the Council of Laodicea, A. D. 321 (367), Conc. Quinisext., A. D. 692, ch. 74, Aix-la-Chapelle, A. D. 816: but in some form or other they continued to a much later period.

Entertainments at births, deaths, and marriages were also in use under the names of ἄγαπη μεταμολογίας, μανδύας and ἤφαρχα (Reed, Hist. Eiccl. Gent. iii. 90; Ap. Const. viii. 41; Theodoret, Hom. viii. pp. 920, 924, ed. Sende; Greg. Naz. Ep. i. 14, and Carna. x. Hofmann, LXX. l. c.)

* LOW COUNTRY (לטונב), 2 Chron. xxv. 10, 16. [LOTAN, p. 1460.]

LOZON (לוזון) (Dothan), one of the sons of "Solomon's servants" who returned with Zorobabel (1 Esdr. x. 23).

The name corresponds with the parallel lists of Ezra. ii. 56 and Neh. vii. 58, and the variation may be an error of the transcriber, which is easily traceable when the word is written in the usual character.

LUBIM (לובים), 2 Chr. xii. 3, 8; Nah. iii. 9, p. 67, Dan. xi. 43 [perhaps, thence inhabitants of a dry land, Ges.]: Λοβίς: Libya: except Daniel Libya (Libyia, Van Ess), a nation mentioned as contributing, together with Cushites and Sukkim, to Shishak's army (2 Chr. xii. 3); and apparently as forming with Cushites the bulk of Zerah's service (2 Sam. xx. 9) with Put or Phut, as helping Ne-Amon (Thebes), of which Cush and Egypt were the strength; and by Daniel (xi. 43) as paying court with the Cushites to a conqueror of Egypt or the Egyptians. These particulars indicate an African nation under tribute to Egypt, if not under Egyptian rule, contributing, in the 10th century B.C., valuable aid in mercenaries or auxiliaries to the Egyptian armies, and down to Nahuim's time, and a period prophesied of by Daniel, probably the

reg. of Antiochus Epiphanes [Antiochus IV.], assisting, either politically or commercially, to sustain the Egyptian power, or, in the last case, dependent on it. These indications do not fix the geographical position of the Lubim, but they favor the supposition that their territory was near Egypt, either to the west or south.

For more precise information we look to the Egyptian monuments, upon which we find representations of a people called REB, or LEBI (R and L having no distinction in hieroglyphics), who cannot be doubted to correspond to the Lubim. These Rebu were a warlike people, with whom Memphites (the son and successor of Rameses II.) and Rameses III., who both ruled in the 13th century b. c., waged successful wars. The latter king routed them with much slaughter. The sculptures of the great temple he raised at Thebes, now called that of Medinet Haboo, give us representations of the Rebu, showing that they were fair, and of what is called a Semitic type, like the Berbers and Kabyles. They are distinguished as northern, that is, as parallel to, or north of, Lower Egypt. Of their being African there can be no reasonable doubt, and we may assign them to the coast of the Mediterranean, commencing not far to the westward of Egypt. We do not find them to have been mercenaries of Egypt from the monuments, but we know that the kindred Mashawasha-u were so employed by the Bubastei family, to which Shishak and probably Zerah also belonged; and it is not unlikely that the latter are intended by the Lubim, used in a more generic sense than Rebu, in the Biblical mention of the armies of these kings. (Brugsch, Geogr. Inschr. ii. 79 ff.) We have already shown that the Lubim are probably the Misseite LITABIM: if so, their so-called Semitic physical characteristics, as represented on the Egyptian monuments, afford evidence of great importance for the inquirer into primeval history. The mention in Manetho's Dynasties that, under Nechothes, or Nechochosis, the first Memphis king, and head of the third dynasty (n. c. cir. 2600), the Libyans revolted from the Egyptians, but returned to their allegiance through fear, on a wonderful increase of the moon, may refer to the Lubim, but may as probably relate to some other African people, perhaps the Naphilim, or Phunt (Punt). The historical indications of the Egyptian monuments thus lead us to place the seat of the Lubim, or primitive Libyans, on the African coast to the westward of Egypt, perhaps extending far beyond the Cyrenaica. From the earliest ages of which we have any record, a stream of colonization has flowed from the east along the coast of Africa, north of the Great Desert, as far as the Pillars of Hercules. The oldest of these colonists of this region were doubtless the Lubim and kindred tribes, particularly the Mashawasha-u and Taheunu of the Egyptian monuments, all of which appear to have ultimately taken their common name of Libyans from the Lubim. They seem to have been first reduced by the Egyptians about 1250 b. c., and to have been afterwards driven inland by the Phoenician and Greek colonists. Now, they still remain on the northern confines of the Great Desert, and even within it, and in the mountains, while their later Semite rivals posture their flocks in the rich plains. Many as are the Arab tribes of Africa, one great tribe, that of the Benue 'Alee, extends from Egypt to Morocco, illustrating the probable extent of the territory of the Lubim and their cognates. It is possible that in Ezek. xxx. 5, Lub, 267, should be read for Chub, 263; but there is no other instance of the use of this form: as, however, 267 and 2677 are used for one people, apparently the Misseite Lubim, most probably kindred to the Lubim, this objection is not conclusive (Chur; Lubim). In Jer. xlv. 9, the A. V. renders Phut "the Libyans;" and in Ezek. xxxviii. 8, "Lilyan." R. S. P.

LUCAS (Aoukas: Lucas), a friend and companion of St. Paul during his imprisonment at Rome (Phil. iv. 24). He is the same as Luke, the beloved physician, who is associated with Demas in Col. iv. 14, and who remained faithful to the Apostle when others forsook him (2 Tim. iv. 11), on his first examination before the emperor. For the grounds of his identification with the evangelist St. Luke, see article Luke.

LUCIFER [see below]: Εὐαφόφασ (Lucifer). The name is found in Is. xiv. 12, coupled with the epithet "son of the morning," and (being derived from 7ειας, to "shine") clearly signifies a "bright star," and probably what we call the morning star. In this passage it is a symbolical representation of the king of Babylon, in his splendor and in his fall; perhaps also it refers to his glory as paling before the unveiled presence of God. Its application (from St. Jerome downwards) to Satan in his fall from heaven arises probably from the fact that the Babylonian Empire is in Scripture represented as the type of tyrannical and self-indulging power, and especially connected with the empire of the Evil One in the Apocalypse. The fall of its material power before the unseen working of the providence of God is therefore a type of the defeat of all manifestations of the empire of Satan. This application of the name "Lucifer" as a proper name of the Devil, is plainly ungrounded; but the magnificence of the imagery of the prophet, far transcending in grandeur the fall of Nebuchadnezzar to which it immediately refers, has naturally given a color to the symbolical interpretation of the passage, and fixed that application in our modern language.

LUCIUS (Λευκιος, Λούχιος: [Lucius]), a Roman consul ( Epatoj Rarulav), who is said to have written the letter to Phoenemy (Energetes), which assured Simon I. of the protection of Rome (cir. b. c. 130-8; 1 Macc. x. 10, 15-24). The whole form of the letter — the mention of one consul only, the description of the consul by the prenomen, the omission of the senate and of the date (comp. Wernsdorf, De fide Macc. § 69x.), — shows that it cannot be an accurate copy of the original.

a The other interpretation, which makes 7ειας, an imperative of the verb 7ειας, in the sense of "wail" or "lament," injures the parallelism, and is generally regarded as untenable.
document; but there is nothing in the substance of the letter which is open to just suspicion.

The imperfect transcription of the name has led to the identification of Lucius with three distinct persons — (1.) Lucius Furinius Philo (the lists, Clinton, First Hist ii. 112, give Philo, Fusti), who was consul in C. 136, and is therefore at once excluded. (2.) Lucius Calpurnius Metellus Calvis, who was consul in c. 142, immediately after Simon assumed the government. On this supposition it might seem not unlikely that the answer which Simon received to an application for protection, which he made to Rome directly on his assumption of power (comp. 1 Mac xiv. 17, 18), in the consilium of Metellus, has been confused with the answer to the later embassy of Numenius (1 Mac. xiv. 24, xv. 18). (3.) But the third identification with Lucius Calpurnius Piso, who was consul c. 139, is most probably correct. The date exactly corresponds, and, though the praenomen of Calpurnius is not established beyond all question, the balance of evidence is decidedly against the common lists. The First Capitulii are defective for this year, and only give a fragment of the name of Popiliius, the fellow-consul of Calpurnius. Cassiodorus (Chron.) as edited, gives Ca. Calpurnius, but the eye of the scribe (if the reading is correct) was probably misled by the names in the years immediately before. On the other hand Valerius Maximus (i. 3) wrongly quoted from the printed text as giving the same praenomen. The passage in which the name occurs is in reality no part of Valerius Maximus, but a piece of the abstract of Julius Paris inserted in the text. Of eleven MSS. of Valerius which the writer has examined, it occurs only in one (Ms. Brit. Bude. 299), and there the name is given Lucius Calvus, as it is given by Mai in his edition of Julius Paris (Script. Vet. Novi Cod. iii. 7). Sigrinus says rightly (First Cons. p. 207): "Cassiodorus profet consules Ca. Pisone... epitome L. Calpurnium...". The chance of an error of transcription in Julius Paris is obviously less than in the Cassiodorus; and even if the evidence were equal, the authority of 1 Mac. might rightly be urged as decisive in such a case.

Josephus omits all mention of the letter of "Lucius" in his account of Simon, but gives one very similar in context (Ant. xiv. 8, § 5), as written on the motion of Lucius Valerius in the ninth (nineteenth) year of Hyrcanus II.; and unless the two letters and the two missions which led to them were purposely assimilated, which is not wholly improbable, it must be supposed that he has been guilty of a strange oversight in removing the incident from its proper place.

B. F. W.

LUCIUS (Λούκιος) was a kinsman or fellow-tribeman of St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 21), by whom he is said by tradition to have been ordained bishop of the church of Cenchrea, from whence the Epistle to the Romans was written (Apoc. Const. viii. 46). He is thought by some to be the same with Lucius of Cyrene. (See the following art.)

LUCIUS OF CYRENE (Λούκιος του Ἰλυταί) was a physician, born in Cenchrea (from whence St. Paul wrote to the Romans), and later, as the tradition goes, he was ordained bishop. Tradition makes him a disciple of St. Paul, and says that he was ordained by the apostle on the occasion of St. Paul's last visit to Cenchrea, when he had sent to him the above letter. It is assumed that Lucius was the ancestor of the Lydians, who, according to tradition, are stated to have been ordained by St. Paul. Lucius, however, was the name of two ancient persons: 1. Lucius of Cyrene, a disciple of St. Paul, and later, as the tradition goes, he was ordained bishop. 2. Lucius of Cyrene, a disciple of St. Paul, and later, as the tradition goes, he was ordained bishop.
with African nations, as mercenaries or auxiliaries of the king of Egypt, and therefore it would seem probable, prima jicio, that the Mizraite Ludim are intended. Ezekiel, in the description of Tyre, speaks thus of Lud: "Persia and Lud and Phut were in thine army, thy men of war: buckler (םת) and helmet hung they up in thee; they set thine adorning" (xxvii. 10). In this place Lud might seem to mean the Shemitte Lud, especially if the latter be connected with Lydia; but the association with Phunt renders it as likely that the nation or country is that of the African Ludim. In the rollup against Gog a similar passage occurs: "Persia, Cush, and Phut (A.V. "Libya") with them [the army of Gog]; all of them [with] buckler (םת) and helmet" (xxviii. 5). It seems from this that there were Persian mercenaries at this time, the prophet perhaps, if speaking of a remote future period, using their name and that of other well-known mercenaries in a general sense. The association of Persia and Lud in the former passage loses therefore somewhat of its weight. In one of the prophecies against Egypt Lud is thus mentioned among the supports of that country: "And the sword shall come upon Mizraim, and great pain shall be in Cush, at the falling of the skin in Mizraim, and they shall take away her multitude (םת) and her foundations shall be broken down. Cush, and Phunt, and Lud, and all the mingled people (םת), and Chub, and the children of the land of the covenant, shall fall by the sword with them" (xxx. 4, 5). Here Lud is associated with Cush and Phunt, as though an African nation. The Ereth, whom we have called a The manner in which these foreign troops in the Egyptian army are characterized is perfectly in accordance with the evidence of the monuments, which, although about six centuries earlier than the prophet's time, do not represent the same condition of military matters. The only people of Africa beyond Egypt, portrayed on the monuments, whom we can consider as most probably of the same stock as the Egyptians, are the Rebū, who are the Libim of the Bible, almost certainly the same as the Mizraite Libnim [Luz, Ezra, &c.]. Therefore we may take the Rebū as probably illustrating the Ludim, supposing the latter to be Mizraite, in which case they may indeed be included under the same name as the Libim, if the application Rebū be whiter than the Libim of the Bible, and also as illustrative of Cush and Phunt. The last two are spoken of as handling the buckler. The Egyptians are generally represented with small shields, frequently round: the Rebū with small round shields, for which the term here used, מות, the small shield, and the expression "that handle," are perfectly appropriate. That the Ludim should have been archers, and apparently armed with a long bow that was strong with the aid of the foot by treading (םת ות), is note-worthy, since the Africans were always famous for their archery. The Rebū, and one other of the foreign nations that served in the Egyptian army — the monuments show the former only as enemies — were bowmen, being armed with a bow of moderate length; the other mercenaries — of which we can only identify the Philibae, Cherethim, though they probably include certain of the mercenaries or auxiliaries mentioned in the Bible — carrying scimitar and javelins, but not bows. These points of agreement, founded on our examination of the monuments, are of no little weight, as showing the accuracy of the Bible.

LUDIM

"united people" rather than "strangers," appear to have been an Arab population of the Sinaitic peninsula, perhaps including Arab or half-Arab tribes of the Egyptian desert to the east of the Nile. Chab is a name nowhere else occurring, which probably should be read Judah, for the composite nation of the Ludioi. [Chim.; Ludim.] The "children of the land of the covenant" may be some league of tribes, as probably were the Nine Bows of the Egyptian inscriptions; or the expression may mean nations or tribes allied with Egypt, as though a general designation for the rest of its supporters besides those specified. It is noticeable that in this passage, although Judah is placed among the close allies or subjects of Egypt, yet it follows the Ludioi or African nations, and is followed by a nation or tribe at least partly inhabiting Asia, although possibly also partly inhabiting Africa.

There can be no doubt that but one nation is intended in these passages, and it seems that thus far the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the Mosaic Ludim. There are no indications in the Bible known to be positive of mercenaries or allied troops in the Egyptian armies, except of Africans, and perhaps of tribes bordering Egypt on the east. We have still to inquire how the evidence of the Egyptian monuments and of profane history may affect our supposition. From the former we learn that several foreign nations contributed allies or mercenaries to the Egyptian armies. Among them we identify the Erym with the Ludim, and the Shatyatam with the Cherethim, who also served in David's army. The latter were probably from the coast of Palestine, although they may have been drawn in the case of the Egyptian army from an insular portion of the same people. The rest of these foreign troops seem to have been of African nations, but this is not certain. The evidence of the monuments reaches no lower than the time of the Babasit line. There is a single contemporary inscription recorded on one of the colossi of the temple of Asho-Simbel in Nubia, recording the passage of Greek mercenaries of a Psammitechus, probably the first (Wilkinson, Modern Egypt and Thebes, p. 32).a From the Greek writers, who give us information from the time of Psammitechus I. downwards, we learn that Ionian, Carian, and other Greek mercenaries formed an important element in the Egyptian army in all times when the country was independent, from the reign of Psammitechus I. to that of the last kings of Egypt. These mercenaries were even settled in Egypt by Psammitechus. There does not seem to be any mention of them in the Bible, excepting they be intended by Judah and Ludim in the passages that have been considered. It must be recalled that it is reasonable to connect the Shemiute Lud and the Ludim in the passages that have been considered. some traces of that connection with St. Paul which these passages assume to exist; and although the name of St. Luke does not occur in the Acts, there is reason to believe that under the pronoun "we" several references to the Evangelist are to be added to the three places just quoted.

Combining the usual element with the Scriptural, the uncertain with the certain, we are able to trace the following dim outline of the Evangelist's life. He was born at Antioch in Syria (Eusebius, Hist. iii. 4); in what condition of life is uncertain. That he was taught the science of medicine does not prove that he was of higher birth than the rest of the disciples; medicine in its earlier and ruder state was sometimes practiced even by a slave. The well-known tradition that Luke was also a painter, and of no mean skill, rests on the authority of Nicephorus (ii. 43), of the Menology of the Emperor Basil, drawn up in 880, and of other late writers; but none of them are of historical authority, and the Acts and Epistles are wholly silent upon a point so likely to be mentioned. He was not born a Jew, for he is not reckoned among them in the circumcision by St. Paul (Comp. Col. ii. 2; but see ver. 14). If this he not thought conclusive, nothing can be argued from the Greek idiom in his style, for he might be a Hellenist Jew, nor from the Gentile tendency of his Gospel, for this it would share with the inspired writings of St. Paul, a Pharsee brought up at the feet of Gamaliel. The date of his conversion is uncertain. He was not indeed "an eye-witness and minister of the word from the beginning" (Luke i. 2), or he would have rested his claim as an Evangelist upon that ground. Still he may have been converted by the Lord Himself, some time before his departure: and the statement of Ephipanius (Cont. Her. li. 11) and others, that he was one of the seventy disciples, has nothing very improbable in it; whilst that which Theophylact adopts (on Luke xxiv.), that he was one of the two who journeyed to Emmaus with the risen Redeemer, has found modern defenders. Tertullian assumes that the conversion of Luke is to be ascribed to Paul — "Lucas non apostolus, sed apostolics; non magister, sed discipulus, utique magistro minor, certe tanto posterior quanto posterioris Apostoli sectator, Pauli sine dubio" (Ad. Marcion. iv. 2); and the balance of probability is on this side.

The first ray of historical light falls on the Evangelist when he joins St. Paul at Troas, and shares his journey into Macedonia. The sudden transition to the first person plural in Acts xvi. 10 is most naturally explained, after all the objections that have been urged, by supposing that Luke, the writer of the Acts, formed one of St. Paul's company from this point. His conversion had taken place before, since he silently assumes his place among the great Apostle's followers without any hint that this was his first admission to the knowledge and ministry of Christ. He may have found his way to Troas to preach the Gospel, sent possibly by St. Paul himself. As far as Philippi the Evangelist journeyed with the Apostle. The resumption of the third person on Paul's departure from that place (xvii. 1) would show that Luke was now left behind. During the rest of St. Paul's second missionary journey we hear of Luke no more. But on the third journey the same writer, who reminds us that Luke is again of the company (Acts xx. 5), having joined it apparently at Philippi, where he had been left. With the Apostle he passed through Miletus, Tyre, and Caesarea to Jerusalem (xx. 5, xxi. 18). Between the two visits of Paul to Philippi seven years had elapsed (A. D. 51 to A. D. 58), which the Evangelist may have spent in Philippi and its neighborhood, preaching the Gospel.

There remains one passage, which, if it refers to St. Luke, must belong to this period. "We have sent with him" (G. e. Titus) "the brother whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches" (2 Cor. viii. 18). The subscription of the epistle sets out that it was "written from Philippi, a city of Macedonia, by Titus and Lucas," and it is an old opinion that Luke was the companion of Titus, although he is not named in the body of the epistle. If this be so, we are to suppose that during the "three months" of Paul's sojourn at Philippi (Acts xx. 3) Luke was sent from that place to Corinth on this errand; and the words "whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches" enable us to form an estimate of his activity during the interval in which he has not been otherwise mentioned. It is needless to add that the praise lay in the activity with which he preached the Gospel, and that we need not doubt that his apostolic work was continued in his being the author of a written gospel. "Lucas . . . scriptit Evangelium de quo idem Paulus . . . Mischen, inquit, eum illo fratrem, cujus laus est in Evangelio per omnem ecclesias" (De Viris Ill. c. 7).

He again appears in the company of Paul in the memorable journey to Rome (Acts xxvii. 1). He remained at his side during his first imprisonment (Col. iv. 14; Phil. 24): and if it is to be supposed that the Second Epistle to Timothy was written during the second imprisonment, then the testimony of that epistle (iv. 11) shows that he continued faithful to the Apostle to the end of his afflictions.

After the death of St. Paul, the acts of his faithful companion are hopelessly obscure to us. In the well-known passage of Ephipanius (cont. Hier. li. 11, vol. ii. 464, in Dissert. recent edition), we find that "receiving the commission to preach the Gospel, [Luke] preaches first in Dalmatia and Gallia, in Italy and Macedonia, but first in Gallia, as Paul himself says of some of his companions, in his epistles, 'Crescens in Gallia,' for we are not to read 'in Galatia' as some mistakenly think, but 'in Gallia.'" But there seems to be as little authority for this account of St. Luke's ministry as there is for the reading Gallia in 2 Tim. iv. 9. How scanty are the data, and how vague the results, the reader may find by referring to the Acta Sanctorum, October, vol. viii., in the recent Brussels edition. It is, as perhaps the Evangelist wishes it to be: we only know him whilst he stands by the side of his beloved Paul; when the master departs the history of the follower becomes confusing and fable. As to the age and death of the Evangelist there is the utmost uncertainty. It seems probable that he died in advanced life; but whether he suffered martyrdom or died a natural death; whether Bithynia or Achaea, or some other country, witnessed his end, it is impossible to determine amid contradictory voices. That he died a martyr, between A. D. 75 and A. D. 100, would seem to have the balance of suffrages in its favor. It is enough for us, so far as regards the Gospel of St. Luke, that he wrote it in his father's name, was a tried and constant friend of the Apostle Paul, who shared his labors, and was not driven from his sire by danger.
LUKE, GOSPEL OF

LUKE, GOSPEL OF. The third Gospel is ascribed, by the general consent of ancient Christendom, to "the beloved physician," Luke, the friend and companion of the Apostle Paul. In the well-known Muratorian fragment (see vol. ii. p. 942) we find "Terrio evangeli librum secundum Lucam. Lucanum est, hic primum omnitatem, hic notitiam Christi divinum omnem eam. Paulus, quasi ut juris studium secundum admississet, nomine suo ex opinione conscripsit. Dominum tamen nec ipsa vidit in carne. Et idem prout assequi potuit. Ita et ab matritate Johannis incepit dicere." (Here Credner's restoration of the text is followed; see his Geschichte des N. T. Kiew., p. 153, § 79; comp. Rothe's Reliquiae, vol. iv.). The citations of Justin Martyr from the Gospel narrative show an acquaintance with and use of St. Luke's account (see Kirschhofer, Quellen-Ansammlung, p. 132, for the passages). Irenæus (cont. Hist. iii. 1) says that "Luke, the follower of Paul, preserved in a book the Gospel which that Apostle preached." The same writer affords (iii. 14) an account of the contents of the Gospel, which proves that in the book preserved to us we possess the genuine words of Luke. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 12) speaks without doubting, of the two books, the Gospel and the Acts, as the work of St. Luke. Both he and Jerome (Cred. Script. Eccl. c. 7) mention the opinion that when St. Paul uses the words "according to my Gospel" it is to the work of St. Luke that he refers; both mention that St. Luke derived his knowledge of divine things, not from Paul only, but from the rest of the Apostles, with whom (says Eusebius) he had active intercourse. Although St. Paul's words refer in all probability to no written Gospel at all, but to the substance of his own inspired preaching, the error is important, as showing how strong was the opinion in ancient times that Paul was in some way connected with the writing of the third Gospel.

It has been shown already [Gospels, vol. ii. p. 942 f.] that the Gospels were in use as one collection, and were spoken of and cited as the work of those whose names they bear, towards the end of the second century. But as regards the genuineness of St. Luke's any discussion is entangled with a somewhat difficult question, namely, what is the relation of the Gospel we possess to that which was used by the heretic Marcion? The ease may be briefly stated.

The religion of Jesus Christ announced salvation to men which he knew, through Him who was born a Jew, of the seed of David. The two sides of this fact produced very early two opposite tendencies in the Church. One party thought of Christ as the Messiah of the Jews; the other as the Redeemer of the human race. The former viewed the Lord as the Messiah of Jewish prophecy and tradition; the other as the revealer of a doctrine wholly new, in which divine and human salvation and enlightenment were offered to men for the first time. Marcion of Sinope, who flourished in the first half of the second century, expressed strongly the tendency opposed to Judaism. The scheme of redemption, so full of divine compassion and love, was adopted by him, though in a perverted form, with his whole heart. The aspersions on his sincerity are thrown out in the loose rhetoric of controversy, and are to be received with something more than caution. The heathen world, into the discard of which the music of that message had never come, appeared to him as the kingdom of darkness and of Satan. So far Marcion and his opponents would go to destroy the gospel. But that which Paul did, O.T.? He views it, not as a preparation for the coming of the Lord, but as something hostile in spirit to the Gospel. In God, as revealed in the O.T., he saw only a being jealous and cruel. The heretic Cerdo taught that the just and severe God of the Law and the Prophets was not the same as the merciful Father of the Lord Jesus. This dualism Marcion carried further, and blasphemously argued that the God of the O.T. was represented as doing evil and delighting in strife, as repenting of his decrees and inconsistent with Himself. This divergence of the N. T. from the Old was at the root of Marcion's doctrine. In his strange system the God of the O.T. was a lower being, to whom he gave the name of Δυναμερις, engaged in a constant conflict with matter (Τάφοί), over which he did not gain a complete victory. But the holy and eternal God, as the God of love and grace, comes not in contact with matter, and creates only what is like to and cognate with himself. In the O.T. we see the "Domninus;" the history of redemption is the history of the operation of the true God. Thus much it is necessary to state as bearing upon what follows: the life and doctrine of Marcion have received much fuller elucidation from Nestler, Kirchenwissenschaft, vol. ii., Antiochus, and Popemnngeschichte; and from Volkmar, Das Evangelium Marcionis, p. 25. The data in older writers are found in the Apology of Justin Martyr, in Tertullian against Marcion i.-v.; in Irenæus, i. ch. 27; and Epiphanius, Hær. xiii.

For the present purpose it is to be noticed that a teacher, determined as Marcion was to sever the connection between the Old and New Testament, would approach the Gospel history with strong prejudices, and would be unable to accept as it stands the written narrative of any of the three Evangelists, so far as it admitted allusions to the Old Testament as the soil and root of the New. It is clear, in fact, that he regarded Paul as the only Apostle who had remained faithful to his calling. He admitted the Epistles of St. Paul, and a Gospel which he regarded as Pauline, and rejected the rest of the N. T., not from any idea that the books were not genuine, but because they were, as he alleged, the genuine works of men who were not faithful teachers of the Gospel they had received.

But what was the Gospel which Marcion used? The ancient testimony is very strong on this point; it was the Gospel of St. Luke, altered to suit his peculiar tenets. "Et super hac," says Irenæus, 2. ch. 35, "est esset secundum Lucam Evangelium circumdedit; et enim quia sunt de generatione Domini conscripta autenses, et de doctrina sermorum Domini multa aurores, in quibus manifestissimam conditorem laius universitatis summum Patrem confitens Dominiu conscriptum est: sani intelligentissimae veracissimum quum sunt hi, qui Evangelium tradidunt apostoli, sancti disciplinis suis: non Evangelium found to exist between different MSS. A new witness as to the last, which is of the greatest importance, is published by, Hilgenfeld,Hist.

λεγεις γαβαδον appears. See, on all these pas-

and critical notes. Of four other places Volkmar speaks more doubtfully, as having been disturbed, but possibly before Marcion (vi. 17, xii. 32, xvii. 12,

Marcion was in the height of his activity about A.D. 138, soon after which Justin Martyr wrote his Apology; and he had probably forth his Gospel some years before, i.e. about A.D.

130. At the time when he composed it he found the Gospel of St. Luke so far diffused and accepted that he based his own Gospel upon it, altering and cutting. Therefore we may assume that, about

A.D. 120, the Gospel of St. Luke which we possess was in use, and was familiarly known. The theory that it was composed about the middle or end of the 2d century is thus overthrown; and there is no positive evidence of any kind to set against the harmonious assertion of all the ancient Church that this Gospel is the genuine production of St.

have touched the subject. The work of Volkmar is the most comprehensive and thorough; and,

though some of his views cannot be adopted, he has satisfactorily proved that our Gospel of St.

Luke existed before the time of Marcion.)
II. Date of the Gospel of Luke. We have seen that this Gospel was in use before the year 120; but from internal evidence the date can be more nearly fixed. From Acts i. 1, it is clear that it was written before the Acts of the Apostles. The latest time actually mentioned in the Acts is the term of two years during which Paul dwelt at Rome in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him (xxvii. 30, 31). The writer, who has tracked the footsteps of Paul hitherto with such exactness, leaves him here abruptly, without making known the result of his appeal to Caesar, or the works in which he engaged afterwards. No other motive for this silence can be suggested than that the writer, at the time when he published the Acts, had no more to tell; and in that case the Look of the Acts was completed about the end of the second year of St. Paul's imprisonment, that is, about A.D. 63 (Wieseler, Olschhausen, Alford). How much earlier the gospel, described as "the former treatise" (Acts i. 1), may have been written is uncertain. But Dean Alford (Prolegomena) remarks that the words imply some considerable interval between the two productions. The opinion of the younger Thiersch (Christian Church, p. 148, Carlyle's translation) thus becomes very probable, that it was written at Cesarea during St. Paul's imprisonment there, A.D. 58-60. The Gospel of St. Matthew is therefore probably written about the same time: and neither Evangelist appears to have used the other, although both made use of that form of oral teaching which the Apostles had gradually come to employ. [Gospels.] It is painful to remark how the opinions of many commentators, who refuse to fix the date of this Gospel earlier than the destruction of Jerusalem, have been influenced by the determination that nothing like prophecy shall be found in it. Believing that our Lord did really prophesy that event, we have no difficulty in believing that an Evangelist reported the prophecy before it was fulfilled (see Meyer's Commentary, Introduction).

III. Place where the Gospel was written. — If the time has been rightly indicated, the place would be Cesarea. Other suppositions are — that it was composed in Achaia and the region of Bœotia (Irenæus, in his Simplicius supra, 148, Ewald, etc.), in Achaia and Macedonia (Hilgenfeld), and Asia Minor (Köstlin). It is impossible to verify these traditions and conjectures.

IV. Origin of the Gospel. — The preface, contained in the first four verses of the Gospel, describes the object of its writer. "Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, even those which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word; it seemed good to me also, having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus, that thou mightest know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed." Here are several facts to be observed. There were many narratives of the life of our Lord current before the time when Luke wrote his Gospel. The word "many" cannot apply to Matthew and Mark, because it must at any rate include more than two, and because it is implied that former labours leave something still to do. And that the writer will supersede or supplement them either in whole or in part. The ground of fitness for the task St. Luke places in his having carefully followed out the whole course of events from the beginning. He does not claim the character of an eye-witness from the first; but possibly he may have been a witness of some part of our Lord's doings (see above Luke, Life).

The ancient opinion, that Luke wrote his Gospel under the influence of Paul, rests on the authority of Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusèbeus. The two first assert that we have in Luke the Gospel preached by Paul (Iren. cont. Marc. iii. 1; Tert. cont. Marc. iv. 5); Origen calls it "the Gospel quoted by Paul," alluding to Rom. ii. 16 (Eusèbe. Hist. vi. 25); and Eusèbeus refers Paul's words, "according to my Gospel" (2 Tim. ii. 8), to that of Luke (E. Hist. iii. 4), in which Jerome concurs (De Vir. Ill. 7). The language of the preface is against the notion of any exclusive influence of St. Paul. The Evangelist, a man on whom the Spirit of God was, made the history of the Saviour's life the subject of research, and with materials so obtained wrote, under the guidance of the Spirit that was upon him, the history now before us. The four verses could not have been put at the head of a book composed under the exclusive guidance of Paul or of any one Apostle, and as little could they have introduced a gospel simply communicated by another. Yet if we compare St. Paul's account of the institution of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. xi. 23-25) with that in St. Luke's Gospel (xxii. 19, 20), none will think the verbal similarity could be accidental. A less obvious parallel between 1 Cor. xv. 3 and Luke xxiv. 26, 27, more of thought than of expression, tends the same way. The truth seems to be that St. Luke, seeking information from every quarter, sought it from the preaching of his beloved master, St. Paul; and the Apostle in his turn employed the knowledge acquired from other sources by his disciple. Thus the preaching of the Apostle, founded on the same body of facts, and the same arrangement of them as the rest of the Apostles used, became assimilated especially to that which St. Luke set forth in his history. This does not detract from the worth of either. The preaching and the Gospel proceeded each from an inspired man; for it is certain that Luke, employed as he was by Paul, could have been no exception in that plentiful effusion of the Holy Ghost to which Paul himself bears witness. That the teaching of two men so linked together (see Life) should have become more and more assimilated is just what would be expected. But the influence was mutual, and not one-sided; and Luke still claims with right the position of an independent inquirer into historic facts.

I am to the question whether Luke made use of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, no opinion given here could be conclusive. [Gospels, vol. ii. p. 944.] Each reader should examine it for himself, with the aid of a Greek Harmony. It is probable that Matthew and Luke wrote independently, and about the same time. Some of their coincidences arise from their both incorporating the oral teaching of the Apostles, and others, it may be, from their common use of written documents, such as are hinted at in Luke i. 1. As regards St. Mark, some regard his Gospel as the oldest New Testament writing, whilst others infer, from apparent abbreviations (Mark i. 12, xvi. 12), from insertions of matter from other places (Mark iv. 38-48), and from the mode in which additional information is introduced — now with a seeming connection with Matthew and now with Luke — that Mark's Gospel is the last, and has been framed upon the other two (De Wette, Einleitung, § 94). The result of this controversy should be to inspire distrust of all such seeming proofs, which conduct different critics to exactly opposite results.

V. Purpose for which the Gospel was written. — The Evangelist professes to write that Theophilus "might know the certainty of those things wherein he had been instructed" (i. 4). Who was this Theophilus? Some have supposed that it is a significant name, applicable not to one man, but to any μανᾶς Δῆλος; but the addition of έκπαιδευτάς, a term of honor which would be used towards a man of more weight, or sometimes (see passages in Kiiiniid and Wetstein) by a person of rank, was added in this case against this. He was, then, an existing person. Conjecture has been wildly busy in endeavoring to identify him with some person known to history. Some indications are given in the Gospel about him, and beyond them we do not propose to go. He was not an inhabitant of Palestine, for the Evangelist minutely describes the position of places which to such a one would be well known. It is so with Capharnaum (x. 31), Nazareth (ii. 15), Arimathea (xxvii. 51), the country of the Gadarenes (viii. 26), the distance of Mount Olivet and Emmaus from Jerusalem (Acts i. 12; Luke xxiv. 13). If places in England — say Bristol, and Oxford, and Hampstead — were mentioned in this careful minute way, it would be a fair inference that the writer meant his work for other than English readers. By the same test he probably was not a Macedonian (Acts xvi. 12), nor an Athenian (Acts xvii. 21), nor a Cretan (Acts xxvii. 8, 12). But that he was a native of Italy, and perhaps an inhabitant of Rome, is probable from similar data. In tracing St. Paul's journey to Rome, places which an Italian might be supposed not to know are described minutely (Acts xxvii. 8, 12, 19); but when he comes to study Italy this is neglected. Cumaean and Rhegium, even the more obscure Putioli, and Aquis Forum and the Three Taverns, are mentioned as to one likely to know them. (For other theories see Marsh's Michaellis, vol. iii. part i. p. 296; Kuini's Prologomena, and Winer's Recl. art. Theophilus.) All that emerges from this argument is, that the person for whom Luke wrote in the first instance was a Gentile reader. We must admit, but with great caution, that on account of the abuses to which the notion has led, that there are traces in the Gospel of a leaning towards Gentile rather than Jewish converts. The genealogy of Jesus is traced to Adam, not from Abraham; so as to connect Him with the whole human race, and not merely with the Jews. Luke describes the mission of the Seventy, which number has been usually supposed to be typical of all nations; as twelve, the number of the Apostles, represents the Jews and their twelve tribes. As each Gospel has within certain limits its own character and mode of treatment, we shall recognize with Obsthann that "St. Luke has the peculiar power of exhibiting with great clearness of conception and truth (especially in the long account of Christ's journey, from ix. 51 to xvii. 34), not so much the discourses of Jesus as his conversations, with all the incidents that gave rise to them, with the remarks of those who were present, and what may result from them."

On the supposed "doctrinal tendency" of the Gospel, however, much has been written which it is painful to dwell on, but easy to refute. Some have endeavored to see in this divine book an attempt to engrat the teaching of St. Paul on the Jewish representations of the Messiah, and to elevate the doctrine of universal salvation, of which Paul was the most prominent preacher, over the Judaising tendencies, and to put St. Paul higher than the twelve Apostles! (See Zeller, Apost.; Baur, Koman. Evang.; and Hilgenfeld.) How two impartial historical narratives, the Gospel and the Acts, could have been taken for two tracts written for polemical and personal ends, is to an English mind hardly conceivable. Even its supporters found that the inspired author had carried out his purpose so badly, that they were forced to admit that the editor had altered the work with a view to work up together Jewish and Pauline elements into harmony (Baur, Koman. Evang. p. 502). Of this editing and re-editing there is no trace whatever; and the invention of the second editor is a gross device to cover the failure of the first hypothesis. By such a machinery, it will be possible to prove in after ages that Gibson's History was originally a plea for Christianity, or any parallel.

The passages which are supposed to bear out this "Pauline tendency," are brought together by Hilgenfeld with great care (Evangelien, p. 220); but Reuss has shown, by passages from St. Matthew which have the same "tendency" against the Jews, how brittle such an argument is, and has left no room for doubt that the two Evangelists wrote facts and not theories, and dealt with those facts with pure historical candor (Reuss, Histoire de la Théologie, vol. ii. p. 6). Writing to a Gentile convert, and through him addressing other Gentiles, St. Luke has adapted the form of his narrative to their needs; but not a trace of a subjective bias, not a vestige of a personal motive, has been suffered to tully the inspired page. Had the influence of Paul been the exclusive or principal source of this Gospel, we should have found in it more resemblance to the Epistle to the Ephesians, which contains (so to speak) the Gospel of St. Paul.

VI. Language and style of the Gospel. — It has never been doubted that the Evangelist wrote his Gospel in Greek. Whilst Hebraisms are frequent, classical idioms and Greek compound words abound. The number of words used by Luke only is unusually great, and many of them are compound words for which there is classical authority (see Dean Alford's valuable Greek Test.).

Some of the leading peculiarities of style are here noted: a more minute examination will be found in Prof. Davidson's Introduction to N. T. (Bagster, 1843), and in his new work, Intro. to the Study of the N. T. (Lond. 1868), ii. 59 sq. comp. p. 12 ff.

1. The very frequent use of ἀγάπη in introducing a new narrative or a transition, and of ἀγαπή ἐν τῷ with an infinitive, are traceable to the Hebrew.
LUKE, GOSPEL OF

2. The same may be said of the frequent use of χαίρε, answering to the Hebrew א.ir.
3. Ἰππομη, used six times instead of the usual γραμματές, and ἐπιστέφης used six times for Ῥαββί, διδάσκαλος, are cases of a preference for words more intelligible to Greeks or Gentiles.
4. The nearer particle is used frequently for a substantive, both in the Gospel and the Acts.
5. The infinitive with the genitive of the article, to indicate design or result, as in i. 9, is frequent in both books.
6. The frequent use of δι καὶ, for the sake of emphasis, as in iii. 9.
7. The frequent use of καὶ αἵτως, as in i. 17.
8. The preposition εἰς is used about seventy-five times in Gospel and Acts; in the other Gospels rarely.
9. ἀλλάζειν is used eleven times in Gospel and Acts; elsewhere only twice, by St. Paul (2 Cor.).
10. Εἰ δὲ μὴ γε is used five times for the εἰ δὲ μή of Mark and John.
11. Εἰπέναι πρὸς, which is frequent in St. Luke, is used elsewhere only by St. John: ἀλλὰ εἰπέναι, is, only three times by other writers.
12. St. Luke very frequently uses the auxiliary verb with a participle for the verb, as in v. 17, i. 20.
13. He makes remarkable use of verbs compounded with δια and εἰ.
14. Χάρος, very frequent in Luke, is only used thrice by John, and not at all by Matthew and Mark. ζωτίρ, σωτρία, σωτρίων, are frequent with Luke: the two first are used once each by John, and not by the other Evangelists.
15. The same may be said of εὐαγγελέσαι, once in Matthew, and not at all in Mark and John; ὑποτεύχειν, once in Mark, not in other Gospels; εὐστάται, not used in the other three Gospels; διήγεσθαι, thirty-two times in Luke's Gospel and the Acts, and only twice each in Matthew, Mark, and John: παραχρῆμα frequent in Luke, and only twice elsewhere, in Matthew.
16. The words δυσθυμοῦν, εὐλαβή, ἄνηρ, as a form of address and before substantives, are also characteristic of Luke.
17. Some Latin words are used by Luke: λεγέων (vii. 30), ὠνάγκας (x. 35), σωθάχον (xii. 20), κολωνία (Acts xvi. 12).

On comparing the Gospel with the Acts it is found that the style of the latter is more pure and free from Hebrew idioms; and the style of the former portion of the Acts is more pure than that of the latter. Where Luke used the materials he derived from others, oral or written, or both, his style reflects the Hebrew idioms of them; but when he comes to scenes of which he was an eye-witness and describes entirely in his own words, these disappear.

VII. Quotations from the Old Testament. — In the citations from the O. T., of the principal of which the following is a list, there are plain marks of the use of the Septuagint version: —

VIII. Integrity of the Gospel — the first two Chapters. — The Gospel of Luke is quoted by Justin Martyr and by the author of the Clementine Homilies. The silence of the apostolic fathers only indicates that it was admitted into the canon somewhat later, which was probably the case. The result of the Marcionite controversy is, as we have seen, that our Gospel was in use before A. D. 120. A special question, however, has been raised about the two first chapters. The critical history of these is best drawn out perhaps in Meyer's note. The chief objection against them is founded on the garbled opening of Marciou's Gospel, who omits the two first chapters, and connects i. 3 immediately with vi. 1. (So Tertullian, "Anno quintodecimo principatus Tiburtianus prope Deum descendisse in civitatem Galliae Cypriamnum," cont. Marc. iv. 7.) But any objection founded on this would apply to the third chapter as well; and the history of our Lord's childhood seems to have been known to and quoted by Justin Martyr (see Apology, i. § 53, and an allusion, Dial. cum Tryph. 100) about the time of Marciou. There is therefore no real ground for distinguishing between the two first chapters and the rest; and the arguments for the genuineness of St. Luke's Gospel apply to the whole inspired narrative as we now possess it (see Meyer's note; also Volkmar, p. 130).

IX. Contents of the Gospel. — This Gospel contains 1. A preface, i. 1-4. 2. An account of the time preceding the ministry of John, i. 5 to ii. 52. 3. Several accounts of discourses and acts of our Lord, common to Luke, Matthew; and Mark, related for the most part in their order, and belonging to Capernaum and the neighborhood, iii. 1 to ix. 50. 4. A collection of similar accounts, referring to a certain journey to Jerusalem, most of them peculiar to Luke, ix. 51 to xviii. 14. 5. An account of the sufferings, death, and resurrection of Jesus, common to Luke with the other Evangelists, except as to some of the accounts of what took place after the resurrection, xviii. 15 to the end.

* The most important works on the Gospel of Luke will be found referred to in the addition to the art. Gospels, p. 539 ff. Others worthy of notice are the following: Patristic: Origé, Homilies, excerpt in Jerome's Latin translation, with a few Greek fragments (Migne's Patrologia Graeca, vol. xii).
Matt. iv. 24, the "lunatics" are distinguished from the demoniacs; in Matt. xvii. 15, the name is applied to a boy who is expressly declared to have been possessed. It is evident, therefore, that the word itself refers to some disease, affecting both the body and the mind, which might, or might not, be a sign of possession (see on this subject DEMONIACS). By the description of Mark ix. 17-26, it is concluded that this disease was epilepsy (see Winer, "Realw.", p. 658). The origin of the name (as of σελενίακας and σελενίατης in earlier Greek, "lunatics" in Latin, and equivalent words in modern languages) is to be found in the belief that diseases of a paroxysmal character were affected by the light, or by the changes of the moon.

A. B. *LUST, not restricted formerly to one passion, but any strong desire or inclination. It occurs in the A. V. in the narrower and the wider sense. It is employed to translate ἐρωταεία, ἐρωταεία, ἐρωταεία, and εἰσία, εἰσία, εἰσία, διστάσεις, πάθος. In Ex. xxv. 9 (in the A. V. "inst") denotes strictly the soul as the seat of the desires. The meaning of "lust" as a verb (found six times in the A. V.) fluctuates in like manner.

H. *LUSTY. Judg. iii. 29, archaic for "stout," "vigorous"; but in the marg., "fat," as the A. V. renders "fatter" elsewhere, except Is. xxx. 23, where it is "plenteous." H.

LUX (לְעֵץ), and perhaps הָלַע, a. i. Luzah (luminares, Ges. see below), which is also the reading of the Samar. Codex and of its two versions: of the LXX. and Eusebius, Λωταί and Λουαται; b [Vat. once in Josh. xviii. 13 Κουαθαί] and the Vulgate Luzai. The uncertainty which attends the name attaches in a greater degree to the place itself. It seems impossible to discover with precision whether Luz and Bethel represent one and the same town — the former the Canaanite, the latter the Hebraic name — or whether they were distinct places, though in close proximity.

The latter is the natural inference from two of the passages in which Luz is spoken of. Jacob called the name of the place Bethel, but the name of the city was called Luz in the beginning "(Gen. xxviii. 19); as if the spot — the "certain place" — on which he had "lighted," where he saw his vision and erected his pillar, were outside the walls of the Canaanite town. And with this agree the terms of the specification of the common boundary of Ephraim and Benjamin. It ran from "from Bethel to Luz" (Josh. xvi. 2), or "from the wilderness of Bethaven ... to Luz, to the southward of Luzah southward, that is Bethel" (xviii. 13); as if Bethel were on the south side of the hill on which the other city stood.

Other passages, however, seem to speak of the a. In one case only do the LXX. omit the termination, namely, in Gen. xxviii. 19, and here they give the name as Ολαμαμαίων, Ολαμαμαίων [so in many MSS., but Rom. Ολαμαμαίων, Alex. Olaamamwv], incorporating with it the preceding Hebrew word Ulaam, as they have also done in the case of Laish (see p. 1581, note c). The eagerness with which Judea attack this monstrous name at every possible opportunity is very curious and characteristic.

b. The ground for this suggestion, besides the remarkable agreement of the ancient versions as given above, is Josh. xvii. 13, where the words הָלַע הָלַע are used twice in the N. T. In the enumeration of... two as identical — "Luz in the land of Canaan, that is Bethel" (Gen. xxxv. 6); and in the account of the capture of Bethel, after the conquest of the country, it is said that "the name of the city before was Luz" (Judg. i. 23). Nor should it be over-looked that, in the very first notice of Abram's arrival in Canaan, Bethel is mentioned without Luz (Gen. xiii. 18, xiv. 13), just as Luz is mentioned by Jacob without Bethel (xlviii. 3).

Perhaps there never was a point on which the evidence was so curiously contradictory. In the passages just quoted we find Bethel mentioned in the most express manner two generations before the occurrence of the event which gave it its name; while the patriarch to whom that event occurred, and who made there the most solemn vow of his life, in recurring to that very circumstance, calls the place by its heathen name. We further find the Israelite name attached, before the conquest of the country by the Israelites, to a city of the building of which we have no record, and which city is now in the possession of the Canaanites.

The conclusion of the writer is that the two places were, during the times preceding the con- quest, distinct. Luz being the city and Bethel the pillar and altar of Jacob: that after the destruction of Luz by the tribe of Ephraim the town of Bethel arose: that the close proximity of the two was sufficient to account for their being taken as identical in cases where there was no special reason for discriminating them, and that the great subsequent reputation of Bethel will account for the occurrence of its name in Abram's history in reference to a date prior to its existence, as well as in the records of the conquest.

2. When the original Luz was destroyed, through the treachery of one of its inhabitants, the man who had introduced the Israelites into the town went into the "land of the Hititites" and built a city, which he named after the former one. This city was standing at the date of the record (Judg. i. 28). But its situation, as well as that of the "land of the Hititites," has never been discovered since, and is one of the favorite puzzles of Scripture geographers. Eusebius (Onom. Agaè) mentions a place of the name as standing near Shechem, nine (some, three) miles from Nepolis (Nablaion).

The objection to this is the difficulty of placing in central Palestine, and at that period, a district exclusively Hititic. Some have imagined it to be in Cyprus, as if Chittim were the country of the Hitites; others in Arabia, as at Lyba, a Roman town in the desert south of Palestine, on the road to Akabah (Rob. i. 187).

The signification of the name is quite uncertain. It is usually taken as meaning "hazel," and denoting the presence of such trees; but the latest lexicographer (Farré, Enchirid. 693) has returned to the opinion of an earlier scholar (Onom. 70), that the notion at the root of the word is rather "beeding" or "sinking," as of a valley. G.

* The difficulties suggested in this article and in that on Bethel as to the use of the two names, are removed by careful attention to the narrative. There seems to have been no town in the locality in the time of Abraham; but he pitched his tent and built his altar in a place which Moses can only describe by means of the names of the places nearest thereto at the time of his writing (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3). Nor had any town yet been built at the time of Jacob's first (Gen. xxviii. 11-19), nor of his second (xxxv. 6) visit, the narrative implying that it was a solitary place. At his first visit Jacob named the place Bethel; but he remained there only thirteen days, and there was neither an angel to hear or give currency to the designation. At his second visit therefore, with his numerous household ("he and all the people that were with him") when he apparently sojourned there for some time, he repeated it, and it became thenceforward his descendants the rightful name of the locality.

When he removed thence, it again became an uninhabited place, and the Canaanites built a town which they called by their own name of Luz, and which continued quite down to the conquest. During the interval between the building of the town and the conquest there were therefore to the Israelites two names, that of fiecio of the town, Luz; and that of yere, of the locality (there was yet no such town, Bethel). Either name is used to describe the place. (Gen. xxxv. 6; Judg. i. 23, etc.) The Canaanite town was built in the interval between Jacob's second visit and the time of his death—probably before his going down to Egypt. This second visit having been before the birth of Benjamin (xxxv. 6, 10), there was ample time for the building. When Jacob speaks of the place at a later time (xlvii. 3), he naturally calls it by its existing name: while in Judges i. 23, after it had been destroyed and replaced by an Israelite town, it is as naturally called by the latter, with parenthesis mention of the former name. The suggestion in the above article, that the later town did not precisely cover the site of the earlier, in explanation of Josh. xvi. 2, seems altogether probable.

LYCAONIA (Lycaonia). This is one of those districts of Asia Minor, which, as mentioned in the N. T., are to be understood rather in their ethnological than a strictly political sense. From what is said in Acts xiv. 11 of "the speech of Lycaonia," it is evident that the inhabitants of the district, in St. Paul's day, spoke something very different from ordinary Greek. Whether this language was some Syriac dialect [CAPPAONIAC], or a corrupt form of Greek, has been much debated (Jabalonsky, Opusc. iii. 3; Gnilka, De Ling. Ly- caon. 1726). The fact that the Lycaonians were familiar with the Greek mythology is consistent with either supposition. It is deeply interesting to see these rude country people, when Paul and Barnabas worked miracles among them, rushing to the conclusion that the strangers were Mercury and Jupiter, whose visit to this very neighborhood forms the subject of one of Ovid's most charming stories (Ovid. Metam. viii. 625). Nor can we fail to notice how admirably St. Paul's address on the occasion was adapted to a simple and imperfectly civilized race (xiv. 15-17). This was at Lystra, in the heart of the country. Further to the east was Derga (ver. 65), not far from the chief pass which leads up through Taurus, from Lystra and the east, to the central table-land. At the western limit of Lycaonia was Iconium (ver. 1), in the direc-

The likeness of men." They were ignorant of the language in which this was spoken. It does not appear that the Apostles possessed any permanent gift of tongues to all them in preaching the Gospel. II.

LYCIA (LYCIA: [Logion], Acts xxvii. 5.) is the name of that southwestern region of the peninsula of Asia Minor which is immediately opposite the island of Rhodes. It is a remarkable district both physically and historically. The last eminences of the range of Taurus come down here in majestic masses to the sea, forming the heights of Cragus and Anticragus, with the river Xanthus winding between them, and ending in the long series of promontories called by modern sailors the "23 capes," many of which are deep inlets favorable to seafaring and piracy. In this district are those curious and very ancient architectural remains, which have been so fully illustrated by our English travellers, Sir C. Fellows, and Messrs. Spratt and Forbes, and many specimens of which are in the British Museum. Whatever may have been the political history of the earliest Lyceans, their country was incorporated in the Persian empire, and their ships were conspicuous in the great war against the Greeks (Herod. vii. 91, 92). After the death of Alexander the Great, Lycia was included in the Greek Seleucid kingdom, and was a part of the territory which the Romans forced Antiochus to cede (Livy. xxvii. 55.). It was made in the first place one of the continental possessions of Rhodes [CARIACI: but before long it was politically separated from that island, and allowed to be an independent state. This has been called the golden period of the history of Lycia. It is in this period that we find it mentioned (1 Macc. xvi. 23) as one of the countries to which the Romans sent deputies in favor of the Jews under Simon Macaeans. It was not till the reign of Claudius that Lycia became part of the Roman provincial system. At first it was combined with Pamphylia, and the governor bore the title of "Proconsul Lyciae et Pamphyliae" (Gruter, Thes. p. 458.);

LYCIA (Acts xxi. 1) and MYRA (Acts xxvii. 5). At a later period of the Roman empire it was a separate province, with Myra for its capital.

LYDIA

LYDDA (Lydha): The Greek form of the name which originally appears in the Hebrew records as LID. It is familiar to us as the scene of one of St. Peter's acts of healing, on the paralytic Aenas, one of "the saints who dwelt at Lydda" (Acts ix. 32), the consequence of which was the conversion of a very large number of the inhabitants of the town and of the neighboring plain of Sharon (ver. 35.). Here Peter was residing when the disciples of Joppa fetched him to that city in their distress at the death of Tabitha (ver. 38.).

Quite in accordance with these and the other scattered indications of Scripture is the situation of the modern town, which exactly retains its name, and probably its position. Lidii (Tobler, 36 Anc. Welt. pp. 69, 450), or Lidjfell (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 244), stands in the Meyr, or meadow, of Ion on the part of the great maritime plain which anciently bore the name of Sharon, and which, when covered with its great crops of corn, reminded the traveler of the rich wheat-fields of our own Lincolnshire (Rob. iii. 145; and see Thomson, Land and Book, ch. xxiv.). It is 9 miles from Joppa, and is the first town on the northermost of the two roads between that place and Jerusalem. Within a circle of 4 miles still stand Ono (Ono Antur), Hadid (el-Haditeh), and Nebalat (Beit-Nabalah), three places constantly associated with Lod in the ancient records. The watercourses outside the town is still to bear the name of Abit Batturus (Peter), in memory of the Apostle (Rob. ii. 248; Tobler, 471). Lying so surprisingly in this fertile plain, and upon the main road from the sea to the interior, Lydda could hardly escape an eventful history. It was in the time of Josephus a place of considerable size, which gave its name to one of the three (or four, xi. 57) "governments" or topharchies (see Joseph. B. J. ii. iii. 3, § 5) which Demetrius Soter (v. c. cir. 152), at the request of Jonathan Macaeans, released from tribute, and transferred from Samaria to the estate of the Temple at Jerusalem (1 Mace. xi. 34; comp. x. 30, 38; xi. 28, 57); though by whom these districts were originally defined does not appear (see Melchis, Bib. für Umgel.). A century later (n. c. cir. 45) Lydda, with Gophna, Emmas, and Thamna, became the prey of the insatiable Cassius, by whom the whole of the inhabitants were sold into slavery to raise the exorbitant taxes imposed (Joseph. Anti. xiv. 11, § 2). From this they were, it is true, soon released by Antony; but a few years only elapsed before their city (A.D. 66) was burnt by Cestius Gallus on his way from Caesarea to Jerusalem. He entered it when all the people of the place but fifty were absent at the feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem (Joseph. B. J. ii. 19, § 1). He must have passed the hardly cold ruins not more than a fortnight after, when flying for his life before the infuriated Jews of Jerusalem. Some repair appears to have been immediately made, for in less than two years, early in A.D. 68, it was in a condition to be again taken by Vespasian, then on his way to his campaign in the south of Judea. Vespasian introduced fresh inhabitants from the prisoners lately taken in Galilee (Joseph. B. J. iv. 8, § 1). But the substantial rebuilding of the town — lying as it did in the road of every invader and every countermove — can hardly have been effected till the disorders of this unhappy country were somewhat composed. Hadrian's reign, after the suppression of the revolt of Bar-Cocheba (A.D. cir. 136), when Paganism was triumphant, and Jerusalem rebuilding as Elia

Capitolina, would not be an improbable time for this, and for the bestowal on Lydda of the new name of Diospolis — City of Zeus — which is stated by Jerome to have accompanied the rebuild- ing. (See Quirinus, P. E. Grec. i., lib. 4, cap. 3.) We have already seen that this new name, as is so often the case in Palestine, has disappeared in favor of the ancient one. [Accio; K. X. X. T., etc.]

When Eusebius wrote (A. D. 326-330) Diospolis was a well-known and much-frequented town, to which he often refers, though the names of neither it nor Lydda occur in the actual catalogue of its Omomanticon. In Jerome's time (Epitaph. Palaiae, § 8), A. D. 404, it was an episcopal see. Tradition reports that the first bishop was "Zenodas the lawyer" (Tit. iii. 13), originally one of the seventy disciples (Dorotheus, in Eusebius, 879); but the first historical mention of the see is the signature of "Actus Lydensis" to the acts of the Council of Nicea (A. D. 325; Eusebius, 878). After this the name is found, now Diospolis, now Lydda, amongst the lists of the Councils down to A. D. 518 (Rob. ii. 245; Vis. 149). The bishop of Lydda, originally subject to Caesarea, became at a later date suffragan to Jerusalem (see the two lists in Von Ramer, 401): and this is still the case. In the latter end of 415 a Council of 14 bishops was held here, before which Pelagius appeared, and by whom, after much tumultuous debate, and in the absence of his two accusers, he was acquitted of heresy, and received as a Christian brother (Milner, Hist. of Ch. of Christ, Cent. V. ch. iii.). St. George, the patron saint of England, was a native of Lydda. After his martyrdom his remains were buried there (see quotations by Robinson, ii. 245), and over them a church was after wards built and dedicated to his honor. The erection of this church is commonly ascribed to Justinian, but there seems to be no real ground for the assertion, and at present it is quite uncertain by whom it was built. When the country was taken possession of by the Saracen in the early part of the 9th century, the church was destroyed; and in this ruined condition it was found by the Crusaders in A. D. 1099, who reinstated the see, and added to its endowment the neighboring city and lands of Remleh. Apparently at the same time the church was rebuilt and strongly fortified (Rob. ii. 247). It appears at that time to have been outside the city. Again destroyed by Saladin after the battle of Hattin in 1191, it was again rebuilt, if we are to believe the tradition, which, however, is not so consistent or trustworthy as one would desire, by Richard Cœur-de-lion (Will. Tyr.; but see Rob. ii. 245, 246). The remains of the church still form the most remarkable object in the modern village. A minute and picturesque account of them will be found in Robinson (ii. 244), and a view in LYDDA — Ruins of the Church of St. George. — Van de Velde.

Van de Velde's Pays d'Israel (plate 55). The town is, for a Mohammedan place, busy and prosperous (see Thomson, Land and Book; Van de Velde, Hist. of P. i. 244). Buried in palms, and with a surge well close to the entrance, it looks from a distance inviting enough, but its interior is very repulsive on account of the extraordinary number of persons, old and young, whom one encounters at every step, either totally blind or afflicted with both some diseases of the eyes. Indeed it is proverbial for this; and the writer was told on the spot in 1858, as a common saying, that in Lyd every man has either but one eye or none at all.

Lydda was, for some time previous to the de- struction of Jerusalem, the seat of a very famous Jewish school, scarcely second to that of Jaffa. About the time of the siege it was presided over by Labbi Granadi, second of the name (Lightfoot, Chor. Cent. xvi.). Some curious anecodes and short notices from the Talmuds concerning it are a Was this the Diospolis mentioned by Josephus Ant. xv. 5, § 1, and B. J. i. § 6? But it is difficult to discover if the two places are not intended, possibly neither of them identical with Lydda.

Can there be any connection, etymological or other, between the two names? In the Dict. of Geog. i. 778, a modern Egyptian village is mentioned named Lydda, of which the ancient name was also Diospolis.

b Jerome is wrong here in placing the raising of Dorcas at Lydda. So also Ritter (Palestina, p. 551) describes the miracle to St. Paul.

In their traditions the gate of the city will be the scene of the final conflict between Christ and Antichrist (Sale's Koran, note to ch. 45; and Pocc. Diciz. iv. § 4; also Jalil ad-Din. LYDIA (Ἀδηια: [Lydiq]), a maritime province in the west of Asia Minor, bounded by Mysia on the N., Phrygia on the E., and Caria on the S. The name occurs only in 1 Macc. viii. 8 (the rendering of the A. V. in Ez. xxx. 5 being incorrect for Ludim); it is there enumerated among the districts which the Romans took away from Antiochus the Great after the battle of Magnesia in B.C. 199, and transferred to Eumenes II., King of Pergamum. Some difficulty arises in the passage referred to from the names "India and Mela" found in connection with it: but if we regard these as incorrectly given either by the writer or by a copyist for "Ionia and Mysia," the agreement with Livy's account of the same transaction (xxxvii. 56) will be sufficiently established, the notice of the maritime provinces alone in the book of Maccabees being explicable on the ground of their being best known to the inhabitants of Palestine. For the connection between Lydias and the Lul and Ludim of the O. T., see Ludin. Lydia is included in the "Asia" of the N. T.

W. L. B.

LYDIA (Ἀδηια: [Lydiq]), the first European convert of St. Paul, and afterwards his hostess during his first stay at Philippi (Acts xvi. 14, 15, also 40). She was a Jewish proselyte (σεβομένη τον Θεόν) at the time of the Apostle's coming; and it was at the Jewish Sabbath-worship by the side of a stream (ver. 19) that the preaching of the Gospel reached her heart. She was probably only a temporary resident at Philippi. Her native place was Thyatira, in the province of Asia (ver. 14; Rev. ii. 18), and it is interesting to notice that through her, indirectly, the Gospel may have come into that very district, where St. Paul himself had recently been forbidden directly to preach it (Acts xvi. 6). Thyatira was famous for its dyeing-works; and Lydia was connected with this trade (πυρωποίησις), and was a seller of dye, or a dyer's goods.

We infer that she was a person of considerable wealth, partly from the fact that she gave a home to St. Paul and his companions, partly from the mention of the conversion of her "household," under which term, whether children are included or not, slaves are no doubt comprehended. Of Lydia's character we are led to form a high estimate, from her candid reception of the Gospel, her urgent hospitality, and her continued friendship to Paul and Silas when they were persecuted. Whether she was one of those women who lathed with Paul in the Gospel" at Philippi, as mentioned afterwards in the Epistle to that place (Phil. iv. 2), it is impossible to say. As regards her name, however, it is certainly curius that Thyatira was in the district anciently called "Lydia," there seems to reason for doubting that it was simply a proper name, or for supposing with Grotius that she was "its dieta a solo natali." LYSANIAS (Λυσάνιας: [Lyssanias]), mentioned by St. Luke in one of his chronological passages (iii. 1) as being tetrarch of Abilene (i. e. the district round Abila) in the 15th year of Tiberius, at the time when Herod Antipas was tetrarch of Galilee, and Herod Philip tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis. It happens that Josephus speaks of a prince named Lysanias who ruled over a territory in the neighborhood of Lebanon in the time of Antony and Cleopatra, and that he also mentions Abilene as associated with the name of a tetrarch Lysanias, while recounting events of the reigns of Caligula and Claudius. These circumstances have given to Strauss and others an opportunity for accusing the Evangelist of confusion and error: but we shall see that this accusation rests on a groundless assumption.

What Josephus says of the Lysanias who was contemporary with Antony and Cleopatra (i. e. who lived 60 years before the time referred to by St. Luke), is that he succeeded his father Polymy, the son of Menneas, in the government of Chaldea, under Mount Lebanon (B. J. i. 13, § 1; Ant. xiv. 7, § 4); and that he was put to death at the instance of Cleopatra (Ant. xv. 4, § 1), who seems to have received a good part of his territory. It is to be observed that Abila is not specified here at all, and that Lysanias is not called tetrarch.

What Josephus says of Abila and the tetrarchy in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius (i. e. about 20 years after the time mentioned in St. Luke's Gospel), is that the former emperor promised the "tetrarchy of Lysanias" to Agrippa (Ant. xviii. 6, § 10), and that the latter actually gave to him "Abila of Lysanias" and the territory near Lebanon (Ant. xiv. 5, § 1, with B. J. ii. 12, § 8).

Now, assuming Abilene to be included in both cases, and the former Lysanias and the latter to be identical, there is nothing to hinder a prince of the same name and family from having reigned as tetrarch over the territory in the intermediate period. But it is probable that the Lysanias mentioned by Josephus in the second instance is actually the prince referred to by St. Luke. Thus, instead of a contradiction, we obtain from the Jewish historian a confirmation of the Evangelist; and the argument becomes very decisive if, as some think, Abilene is to be excluded from the territory mentioned in the story which has reference to Cleopatra.

Fuller details are given in Davidson's Introduction to the N. T. i. 214-220; and there is a good brief notice of the subject in Rawlinson's Eusebium Lectures for 1859, p. 203 [p. 290, Amer. ed.], and note 113.

LYSIAS (Λυσιας), a nobleman of the blood-royal (1 Macc. iii. 32; 2 Macc. xi. 1), who was entrusted by Antiochus Epiphanes (cir. B. C. 166) with the government of southern Syria, and the guardianship of his son Antiochus Eupator (1 Macc. iii. 32; 2 Macc. x. 11). In the execution of his office Lysias armed a considerable force against Judas Maccabaeus. Two detachments of this army under Nicanor (2 Macc. vi. 7; and Gorgias were defeated by the Jews near Emmaus (1 Macc. iv. 11), and in the following year Lysias himself met with a much more serious reverse at Bethsura (B. C. 165), which was followed by the purification of the Temple. Shortly after this, Antiochus Epiphanes died B. C. 164, and Lysias assumed the government as guardian of his son, who was yet a child (App. Syr. 46; Ant. xiv. 6; 1 Macc. vi. 17). The war against the Jews was renewed, and, after a severe struggle, Lysias, who took the young king with him, captured Bethsura, and was besieging Jerusalem, when he received tidings of the approach of Philip, to whom Antiochus had transferred the guardianship of the prince (1 Macc. vi. 18 ff.; 2 Macc. xiii.). He defeated Philip (v. c. 160), and with his army and a train of his wife, togetherto with his warband, fell into the hands of Demetrius Soter [Demetrius I.], who put them both to death (1 Macc. vii. 2–4; 2 Macc. xiv. 2; Jos. Ant. xii. 12, §§ 15, 16; App. Syr. ce. 45–47; Polyb. xxxi. 15, 19).

There are considerable differences between the first and second books of Maccabees with regard to the campaign of Gogebas and the subsequent conduct of Lyias: the former places the defeat of Lyias in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes before the purification of the Temple (1 Macc. iv. 20–35), the latter in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes after the purification (2 Macc. x. 10, xi. 1, &c.). There is no sufficient ground for believing that the events recorded are different (Patrocinium, De Consecrat. Masee. §§ xvii. xviii.), for the mistake of date in 2 Maccabees was due to a possible misinterpretation (comp. Wermndorf, De julo Masee. § xvi.; Grimm, Grund 2 Masee. xi. 1). The idea of Grotius that 2 Macc. xi. and 2 Mace. xii. are duplicate records of the same event, in spite of Ewald's support (Geschichte, iv. 305 note), is scarcely tenable, and leaves half the difficulty unexplained.

LYSIAS (Λυσίας) summoned CLAUDIUS (Κλαύδιος) was the Roman filledarch (chief captain), A. V. who commanded the garrison at Jerusalem in the procuratorship of Felix (A.D. 50). See Wiewsekr's Chronology, p. 88. He was who rescued Paul from the Jewish mob when they were about to kill him for alleged profanation of the Temple (Acts xxii. 32 f.). Of his two names, LYSIAS reminds us of his Greek origin, and CLAUDIUS of his assumption of the rights of a Roman citizen, which (see Acts xxii. 28) he had acquired by purchase. [CITIZENSHIP.]

We have no knowledge of this Lyias out of the Acts: but what we learn there is not, on the whole, unfavorable to him. He arrested the scourging of Paul as soon as he knew that he was a Roman citizen. He allowed him to speak to his countrymen in self-defense, and rescued him from their rage on hearing his declaration that God had sent him to preach the Messiah to the heathen. He lodged him for safety in the castle, took him out of the hands of the Jewish Council when they were about to tear him in pieces, and on being informed of a conspiracy to kill him, sent him by night, under an escort of Roman soldiers, to Felix at Caesarea.

Luke has preserved to us the letter which Lyias wrote to Felix on that occasion (Acts xxii. 26–30). The letter contains, on one point, a palpable misstatement, proceeding of course not from Luke who copied the letter, but from Lyias by whom it was written. Lyias states as his reason for rescuing Paul with such promptness from the Jews that he learned (μαθημάτων, etc.) that he was a Roman citizen; whereas, in fact, he knew nothing of Paul's rank till after he had taken him into custody, and was even on the point of putting him to torture. Meyer very properly points out this deceit as a mark of the genuineness of the letter (Apostelgeschichte, p. 450). It was natural that the subject should wish to gain as much credit as possible with his superior. It might be presumed that the minute circumstances would be unknown to Felix.

We detect the inconsistency because we have in our hands Luke's narrative as well as the letter. It is impossible to say how Luke obtained a copy of this document. It pertained to a judicial process concerning which Felix might have to give account. It would therefore be preserved. Luke no doubt did so at Cesarea during the two years that Paul was confined there. He would naturally wish to know how the Apostle's case had been represented to the procurator, and may even at that time have formed his purpose to write the Acts. Considering his inquisitive habits (mentioned at the beginning of his Gospel) we can easily believe that he would find means, in some way, to see the letter, or at all events to learn its purport (Acts xxiii. 25). Luke's expression (ἐπιστ. περιευχέως τού πόσον τούτο) intimates that it is the substance rather than the full words of the letter, that he reports to us.

An incidental value of the document is that it transmitted to us an official Roman testimony to the integrity of Paul's character.

LYSIMACHUS (Λυσιμάχος, [wreter of of strife, peace-maker: Lysimachus].) 1. A son of Ptolemaeus of Jerusalem "(Πτολεμαῖος ὁ Ἴον ἰερουσαλήμ) the Greek translator of the book of Esther (Arristol. Comp. Esth. ix. 20), according to the subscription of the LXX. There is, however, no reason to suppose that the translator was also the author of the additions made to the Hebrew text (Exekiel). 2. A brother of the high-priest Menahem, who was left by him as his deputy (διάκονος) during his absence at the court of Antiochus. His tyranny and sacrilege excited an insurrection, during which he fell a victim to the fury of the people cir. n. c. 170 (2 Macc. xx. 19–42). The Valgate, by a mistranslation ("Menahem anatus est a sacrificio, succedente Lysimacho fratre suo") makes LYSIMACHUS the successor instead of the deputy of Menahem.

LYSTRA (Λυστρα [mender pl. Acts xiv. 8 and 2 Tim. iii. 11, but not sing., Acts iv. 6, 21, and xvi. 1; Lystro, also sing. and pl.) has two points of extreme interest in connection respectively with St. Paul's first and second missionary journeys — (1) as the place where divine honors were offered to him, and where he was presently stoned; (2) as the home of his chosen companion and fellow-missionary TIMOTHYES.

We are told in the 14th chapter of the Acts, that Paul and Barnabas, driven by persecution from Iconium (ver. 2), proceeded to Lystra and its neighborhood, and there preached the Gospel. In the course of this service a remarkable miracle was worked in the healing of a lame man (ver. 8). This occurrence produced such an effect on the minds of the ignorant and superstitious people of the place, that they supposed that the two gods, Merkury and Jupiter, who were said by the poets to have formerly visited this district in human form [LYSIMOIX] had again bestowed on it the same favor, and consequently were proceeding to offer sacrifice to the strangers (ver. 13). The Apostles rejected this worship with horror (ver. 14), and St. Paul addressed a speech to them, turning their minin, to the true Source of all the blessings of nature. The distinct proclamation of Christian doctrine is not mentioned, but it is implied, inasmuch as a church was founded at Lystra. The adoration of the Lystrians was rapidly followed by a change of feeling. The persecuting Jews arrived from Antioch in Pisidia and Iconium, and had such influence that Paul was stoned and left for dead (ver. 19). On his recovery he withdrew, with Barnabas, to Derbe (ver. 20), but before long retracted his steps through Lystra (ver. 21), encouraging the new disciples to be steadfast.

It is evident from 2 Tim. iii. 10, 11, that Timotheus was one of those who witnessed St. Paul's sufferings and courage on this occasion: and it can hardly be doubted that his conversion to Christianity resulted partly from these circumstances, combined with the teaching of his Jewish mother and grandmother, Eunice and Lois (2 Tim. i. 5). Thus, when the Apostle, accompanied by Silas, came, on his second missionary journey, to this place again (and here we should notice how accurately Derbe and Lystra are here mentioned in the inverse order), Timotheus was already a Christian (Acts xvi. 1). Here he received circumcision, because of the Jews in those parts (ver. 3); and from this point began his connection with St. Paul's travels. We are doubly reminded here of Jewish residents in and near Lystra. Their first settlement, and the ancestors of Timotheus among them, may very probably be traced to the establishment of Babylonian Jews in Phrygia by Antiochus three centuries before (Joseph. Ant. xii. 3, § 4). Still it is evident that there was no significant Jewish population at Lystra; no mention is made of any synagogue; and the whole aspect of the scene described by St. Luke (Acts xiv.) is thoroughly heathen. With regard to St. Paul, it is not absolutely stated that he was ever in Lystra again, but from the general description of the route of the third missionary journey (Acts xvii. 23) it is almost certain that he was.

Lystra was undoubtedly in the eastern part of the great plain of Lyceania; and there are very strong indications for regarding it as the ruin of an ancient city, called Egin-ter-Kilise, at the base of a conical mountain of volcanic structure, named the Kavurdagh (Hamilton, Res. in A. M. ii. 313). Here are the remains of a great number of churches: and it should be noticed that Lystra has its post-apostolic Christian history, the names of its bishops appearing in the records of early councils.

Pilny (v. 42) places this town in Galatia, and strong statements are quite consistent with its being placed in Lyceania by St. Luke, as it is by Hierocles (Synecd.)

a Gesenius (Thes. 811 n) suggests that the name may have been originally נְדָבָר, the נ having changed into י, in accordance with Phoenician custom. (See also Furst, Htrab. 708 b; though he derives the name itself from a root signifying depression—low-land.) It is perhaps some support to this idea, that Ephesus in the Oecumenicon gives the name Mysaâ, and that the LXX. read in one passage " Amalek," as above. Is it not also possible that in 2 Sam. viii. 12 " Amalek " may more accurately be Mysaâ? At least, no campaign against Amalek is recorded in these "—since that before the death of Saul (P. 675). As to its condition in heathen times, it is worth while to notice that the words in Acts xiv. 13 (τοῦ Δως τοῦ ὑπὸ πῦρ τῆς πλάκας) would lead us to conclude that it was under the tutelage of Jupiter. Wacher, in his Spicilegium Antiquitatis Lystraensium (Disc. in Acta Apostolorum, Jena 1766, vol. iii.), thinks that in this passage a statue not a temple, of the god is intended. J. S. H.

* The Apostle in his speech to the Lystrians addressed heathen and idolaters. It is interesting to compare the line of thought hinted here in regard to the means of knowledge furnished by the light of nature concerning the existence of God and his attributes with the fuller reasoning on this subject in Rom. i. 19 ff. The similarity (see also Acts xvii. 24 ff.) is precisely such as we should expect on the supposition that he who wrote the epistle delivered the speech. There is also some diversity, but of the kind which arises from applying the same system of truth to different occasions. Luke assigns the speech to its proper place in the history. Among the Lyceanians, whose local traditions were so peculiar, it is less surprising that the gross antropomorphism should show itself, which called forth the Apostle's remonstrance and led him to correct the error. The reader will find a good analysis of the argument, with exegetical remarks, in Stier's Reden der Apostel, ii. 1-23.

2. MA'ACAH, and (in Chron.) MAACHAH: in Samuel 'MAÂCÂKH, and so Josephus; in Chron. [Vat. FA.]: Maâkh and Maâkahh: Alex. in both [rather, in 2 Sam.] Maâkâh, [in Chron. Myâkâh, Maâkâ] Morechi, Maâkâh. A small kingdom in close proximity to Palestine, which appears to lie half inside ArgoL (Deut. i. 14) and Bashan (Josh. xii. 5). These districts, probably answering to the Lejoh and Jabin of modern Syria, occupied the space from the Jordan on the west to the Orontes (Sulhâh) and eastward to Mount Hermon on the north. There is therefore no alternative but to place Maâkah somewhere to the east of the Lejoh, in the country that lies between that remarkable district and the Sûfa, namely the stony desert of et-Krâ'dh (see Kiepert's map to Wetzstein's Hebräirn, etc., 1890), and which is to this day thickly studded with villages. In these remote eastern regions was also probably situated Tëlhadh, Têluch, or Bethach, which occurs more than once in connection with Maâkah [1 Chr. xvi. 18; Gen. xxii. 24; 2 Sam. (1 Sam. xxx.), which can hardly be referred to in this catalogue.

* The reading Maâkh instead of Maâkah is adopted by Jarso and Parthey in their edition of the Onomasticon of Eusebius (Berlin, 1852) on the authority of the Codex Leidensis.

b This is probably the origin of the name as attached to the great stony plain north of Mâdresdâ, in the ancient eastern districts.

c The ancient versions do not assist us much in fixing the position of Maâkah. The Syrian Peshito in 1 Chr. xix has Charr̄ā, Maâkâ'. If this could be identified with et Charr̄a, the district east of Sulhâh, viii. 8). Maachah is sometimes assumed to have been situated about ABIEL-BETH-MAACHAH; but, if Abil be the modern representative of that town, this is hardly probable, as it would bring the kingdom of Maachah west of the Jordan, and within the actual limits of Israel. It is possible that the town was a colony of the nation, though even this is rendered questionable by the conduct of Job towards it (2 Sam. xx. 22). That implacable soldier would hardly have left it standing and unharmed had it been the city of those who took so prominent a part against him in the Ammonite war.

That war was the only occasion on which the Maacathites came into contact with Israel, when their king assisted the Ben-Ammon [sons of A.] against Josh with a force which he led himself (2 Sam. x. 6, 8; 1 Chr. xix. 7. In the first of these passages, "of" is inaccurately omitted in the A. V.). The small extent of the country may be inferred from a comparison of the number of this force with that of the people of Zolah, Isdob, and Rebob (2 Sam. x. 6), combined with the expression "his people" in 1 Chr. xix. 7, which perhaps imply that a thousand men were the whole strength of his army. [MAACHATHI.]

To the connection which is always implied between Maachah and Geshur we have no clue. It is perhaps illustrated by the fact of the daughter of the king of Geshur—wife of David and mother of Absalom—being named Maachah. G.

MA'ACHAH (מַאָ'ָכָּה) [as above]: Ma'ah: Alex. Mayy: [Machalah]. 1. The daughter of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 21). Ewald connects her name with the district of Maachach in the Hermon range [Grosch., i. 414, note 1].

2. (Mas'ah: [Vat. Moad].) The father of Achish, who was king of Gath at the beginning of Solomon's reign (1 K. ii. 39). [Machich.]

3. [Vat. in 1 Chr. xi. 21, Ma'azar.]. The daughter, or more probably grand-daughter, of Absalom, named after his mother: the third and favorite wife of Rebah, and mother of Absijah (1 K. xxv. 2; 2 Chr. xi. 20-22). According to Josephs (Ant. viii. 10, § 1) her mother was Tamar, Absalom's daughter. But the mother of Absijah is elsewhere called "Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gilead" (2 Chr. xiii. 2). The LXX and Syriac, in the latter passage, have Maachah, as in xix. 2. The name of Michalina is a mere variation of Maachah, as has been asserted (the resemblance in English characters being much more close than in Hebrew), it would be easy to understand that Uriel of Gilead married Tamar the daughter of Absalom, whose grand-daughter therefore Maachah was. But it is more probable that "Michaiah" is the error of a transcriber, and that "Maachah" is the true reading in all cases (Cepeli G. Crit. Socr., vii. 7, § 4). Houbrigan proposed to alter the text, and to read "Maachah, the daughter of Absi'el (or Absalom, the son of Uriel." During the reign of her grandson Asa she occupied at the court of Judah and south of the Saph (see Wetstein, and Cyril Graham; it would support the view taken in the text, and would also fall in with the suggestion of Ewald [Gesen. iii. 167], that the Sapha is connected with Zolah. In Josh. xiii. the Peishita has Kema, כִּמֶּאֶדָּה, of which the writer can make nothing. The Targums of Onkelos, Jonathan, and Jerusalem have Apukeros, אַפּוּקְרָא with some slight variations in spelling) the high position of King's Mother" (comp. 1 K. ii. 19), which has been compared with that of the Saltana Valide in Turkey. It may be that at Absi'el's death, after a short reign of three years, Asa was left a minor, and Maachah acted as regent, like Athaliah under similar circumstances. If this conjecture be correct, it would serve to explain the influence by which she promoted the practice of idolatrous worship. The idol or "horror" which she had made for Asaheb (1 K. xx. 13; 2 Chr. xv. 16) is supposed to have been the emblem of Priapus, and was so understood by the Vulgate. [Eisel. vol. ii. p. 1118 b.] It was swept away in A's reformation, and Maachah was removed from her dignity. Josephus calls Maachah May'ah, perhaps a corruption of May'ah, and makes Ass the son of May'aia. See Burdington's Genealogies, i. 222-228, where the two Maacahs are considered distinct.

4. (May'ah.) The concubine of Caleb the son of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 48).

5. (May'ah.) The daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, and mother of Absalom (1 Chr. iii. 2): also called MA'ACHAH in A. V. of 2 Sam. iii. 9. Josephus gives her name May'ahiai (Ant. vii. 1, § 4). She is said, according to a Hebrew tradition recorded by Jerome (Qu. Hebr. in Reg.), to have been taken by David in battle and added to the number of his wives.

6. (May'ah: Alex. May'ah.) The wife of Machir the Manassean, the father or founder of Gilead, and sister of Huppim and Shupham (1 Chr. vii. 15, 16), who were of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 12). In the Peshito Syriac Maacah is made the mother of Machir.

7. (May'ah: [May'ah: [Ath. i. 41-vii. 8].) The wife of Jehiel, father or founder of Gileon, from whom was descended the family of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 29, ix. 35).

8. (May'ah: Alex. May'ah.) The father of Hanan, one of the heroes of David's body-guard (1 Chr. xi. 43), who is classed among the warriors selected from the eastern side of the Jordan. It is not improbable that Maachah in this instance may be the same as Saria-Maachah in 1 Chr. xix. 6, 7.

9. May'ah: [Vat. May'ah:] A Simeonite, father of Shephatiah, prince of his tribe in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxii. 16). W. A. W.

* MA'ACHATH (מַאָ'ָכָּת) Ma'ath (Lat.): Alex. May'ah: [Machaeth], Josh. xiii. 13, probably a variation of MA'ACHAH (which see), though Fuerst suggests that it may be abbreviated from מַאָ'ָכָּת. It occurs only as above, and there as patronymic (in the A. V., * Maachethites.*).  1. MA'ACHATH, and  2. MA'ACHATHTHITES, THE (מַאָ'ָכָּתִיתִּים) [patronymic]: [Rom. May'ath, May'ah, May'ath, etc.; Vat.]

This is probably intended for the Tanaimos of Pumbedita, which he mentions in company with Libinius, Calheneus, and Jocaster (*). [See Reimund, Pli., p. 422; and compare the expression of Josephus with regard to Machærum, B. J. vii. 6, § 2.) But this would surely be too far south for Maachah. The Targum Pseudo- Jonathan has Anteros, אֲנֵרְוָא, which remains obscure. It will be observed, however, that every one of these names contains krat or Chr.
MADAI, the Mazai, o Madai, [etc. — Alex. Madaya], [Mada, etc.] Madachi, Machuel, [Machuel], two words — the former taking the form of the Hebrew — which denote the inhabitants of the small kingdom of MADAIH (Deut. iii. 15; Josh. xii. 15, xiii. 11, 13). Individual Madachites were not unknown among the warriors of Israel. One, named simply, son of the Madachi, or possibly "Eliphlet, son of Alaadah the Machachi" (see Kennicott, Dissertation, 205, 206), was a member of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). Another, Jezeiah, was one of the chiefs who rallied round Geshlah the superintendent, after the first destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. xl. 8; 2 K. xxv. 23). Estemouo the Machachi (1 Chr. iv. 19) more probably derives that title from the confluence of Caleb (i. 48) than from the Syrian kingdom, (MA'ACHAI, 2.)

MA'ADAI [3 syl.] (תַּמַּדְיָא) [work of Jehovah]: MA'ADAI (36), sus C'hap^ had who Maavo Gese.: and or Vat.

MA'ALEH - ACHRAB'IM (תַּמַּאֵלְיָה - אֲכַרְבּ ה') (ascent of scorpions); הַפְּרַמְדַּבְסִים. (Acharabim [Rom. -bim: Alex. Acherabim]: ascen- sus Scorpionis). The full form of the name which in its other occurrences (in the current identical with the above) is given in the A. V. as the ascent of; [Num. xxxiv. 4], or "the going up to [Judg. i. 30], Achrabim." It is found only in Josh. xv. 5. For the probable situation of the pass, see ACHRAB- BIM.

* In Judg. i. 36 the marginal reading (A. V.) is Maale-Achrabim, with "the going up to Achrab- bim" in the text. The same place is always meant, and the expression is as much a proper name in one passage as another.

its name is mentioned by them (Qumostenon = Maroth").

By Gesenius (Thea. 1069 a) the name is derived from a root signifying openness or barreness, but may it not with equal accuracy and greater plausibility be derived from that which has pro- duced the similar word, morath, a cave? R. R. is, by a characteristic feature of the mountainous districts of Palestine, one of which, the Mearath-Adullam, or cave of Adullam, was probably at no great distance from this very locality. G.

MA'ASAI (3 syl.) [work of Jehovah]: MA'SASAI (36). 1. (Vat. Mea- sar:]: Alex. Maasria: FA. Maasria.) A descendant of Jeshua the priest, who in the time of Ezra had married a foreign wife, and was divorced from her (Ezr. x. 18). He is called MATTHEIAS in 1 Esdr. x. 19, but in the margin, MAASAI.

2. (FA. Maasria: [Comp. Maasia:)] A priest, of the sons of Harim, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's command (Ezr. x. 21). He is called MAASAI in 1 Esdr. ix. 19.

3. (Vat.) FA. Maasria: A priest of the sons of Pashur, who had married a foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezr. x. 22). He is called MAASAI in 1 Esdr. ix. 22.

4. (Alex. F.A.): Vat. F.A. Maasria: [Comp. MAARASAI: [Meesiri.]) One of the levites, a descendant of Phatsh-Moab, who put away his foreign wife in the time of Ezra (x. 30). Apparently the same as MASIAS in 1 Esdr. ix. 31.

5. (Maasia: [Vat. FA. Maasia: [Meesiri.): The father of Azariah, one of the priests from the city of the Jordan, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 30).

6. (Vat. M. Maasria;]: FA. Maasria: One of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the law to the people (Neh. viii. 4). He was probably a priest, but whether one of those mentioned in ch. xii. 41, 42, is uncertain. The corresponding name in 1 Esdr. ix. 43 is BALSA- MUS.

7. (Om. in LXX. [but Comp. MAARASAI:]); A Levite who assisted on the same occasion in ex- pounding the Law to the people (Neh. viii. 7). He is called MAIANES in 1 Esdr. ix. 48.

8. (Alex. MAARASAI: FA. MAARASAI: One of the heads of the people whose descendants signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 35).

13. (Osm. in LXX.) The father of Zedekiah the false prophet, in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah (Jer. xxxix. 21).

14. (םע"ם: Manuscr. [Manuscr; Vat. Manuscr. Manuscr.], Alex. Manuscr, [Manuscr; F.A. in rev. 24, Manuscr.]: Moa't, one of the Levites of the second rank, appointed by David to sound "with pipes on the ark," while the ark was brought from the house of Obed-edom. He was also one of the "porters" or gate-keepers for the ark (1 Chr. x. 18, 20).

15. (1 Rom. Manuscr: Vat. Manuscr.) Alex. Manuscr. The son of Adibah, and one of the captains of hundreds in the reign of Josiah king of Judah. He assisted Jehoiada in the revolution by which Josiah was placed on the throne (2 Chr. xxiii. 11).

16. (Macat. [Vat. Amurras:] Alex. Manuscr.) An officer of high rank (shokir) in the reign of Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi. 11). He was probably a Levite (comp. 1 Chr. xxiii. 4, and engaged in a semi-military capacity, corresponding to the civic functions of the judges, with whom the shokirim are frequently coupled.

17. (Manuscr. [Manuscr.]: Alex. Manuscr.) The "king's son," killed by Zekhri the Ephraimite hero in the invasion of Judah by Pekah king of Israel, during the reign of Alaz (2 Chr. xxvii. 7). The personage thus designated is twice mentioned in connection with the "governor of the city" (1 K. xxvii. 26; 2 Chr. xviii. 25), and appears to have held an office of importance at the Jewish court (perhaps acting as viceroy during the absence of the king), just as the queen dowager was honored with the title of "king's mother" (comp. 2 K. xxi. 2 with Jer. xxix. 2), or gebi'hot, i.e., "mistress," or "powerful lady." [MACRILLAM, 8.] For the conjecture of Geiger, see Joash, 4.

18. (Maoraz; [Alex. Manuscr.]:) The governor of Jerusalem in the reign of Josiah, patronized by the king, in conjunction with Shaphan and Joash, to superintend the restoration of the Temple (2 Chr. xxviii. 8).

19. (Manuscr; Alex. Manuscr.; [F.A. Manuscr.]: Manuscr.) The son of Shalum, a Levite of high rank, and one of the gatekeepers of the Temple in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxiv. 4; comp. 1 Chr. ix. 19).

20. (ויע"נ: Manuscr; Alex. Manuscr. Manuscr.); Jer. xxiv. 12; Alex. Manuscr. Manuscr, Jer. ii. 58.) A priest; ancestor of Baruch and Neriah, the sons of Neriah.

MAASIAI [properly MAASIAI, 3 syll.] (םע"ם: [Jehovih's work]; Manuscr. Alex. Manuscr. Manuscr.): Manuscr. a priest who after the return from Babylon dwelt in Jerusalem (1 Chr. ix. 12). He is apparently the same as AMASIAI in Neh. xi. 13.

* The forms MAASAI and MAASAI (the latter being the reading of the A.V. in the original edition of 1611 and other early editions) are doubtless both misprints for MAASAI. This is the reading of the Genevan version, and corresponds with the Hebrew וע"ם, the word being thus pointed in four MSS. collated by Michaelis (see his Bibl. Hebr. in loc.), and also by Gesenius and Furst.

MAASIAI (Manuscr. Manuscr.): The same as MAASIAI, 20, the ancestor of Baruch (Bar. i. 1).

* MAATH (Maath: Mahath), an ancestor of Jesus, according to the genealogy in Luke (iv. 26).

MAZ [ם"ם] (enger) Manuscr. Mose, son of Ram, the firstborn of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 27).

MAAIAH (ם"ם: [Jehovah's consolation]; Manuscr. [Vat. Na'as:] FA. AQA. Manuscr.) One of the priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 8). From the coincidence between many of the names of the priests in the lists of the twenty-four courses established by David, of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x.), and those who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii.), it would seem either that the names were hereditary in families, or that they were applied to the families themselves. This is evidently the case with the names of the "heads of the people" enumerated in Neh. x. 14-27.

2. (ם"ם see above): Manuscr. Alex. Manuscr. Manuscr. A priest in the reign of David, head of the twenty-fourth course (1 Chr. xxiv. 18). See the preceding.

MABDAI [2 syll.] (Ma'bdai; [Vat. Ioan. Manuscr.]: Manuscr. Manuscr. Ioan. Manuscr. Manuscr.) The same as BENALAIH (1 Esdr. ix. 34; see Ezra. x. 35).

MACALON (Manuscr., in both MSS. BENAIM, 1 Esdr. v. 21). This name is the equivalent of MAHOMAS in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

MACCABEES, THE (of Maccabaios; Manuscr.) This title, which was originally the surname of Judas, one of the sons of Mattathias (infra. § 2), was afterwards extended to the heroic family of which he was one of the noblest representatives, and in a still wider sense to the Palestinian patriots in the persecution of Antiochus Eupator [4 Maccabees], and even to the Alexandrine Jews who suffered for their faith at an earlier time [3 Maccabees]. The original term Maccabaios (or MacCABAEUS) has been variously derived. Some have maintained that it was formed from the combination of the initial letters of the Hebrew sentence, "Who among the gods is like unto thee, Jehovah?" (Exx. xv. 11, Heb. י"ע). Others, on the other hand, have supposed that it was formed from the lettering of the Hebrew, ו'ם, which is supposed to have been inserted upon the banners of the priests; or, again, of the initials of the simply descriptive title, "Mattathias, a priest, the son of Johanan." But even if the custom of forming such words was in use among the Jews at this early time, it is obvious that such a title would not be an individual title in the first instance, as MacCabeus undoubtedly was (1 Mac. ii. 4), and still remains among the Jews (Raphall, Hist. of Jews, i. 249). Moreover the orthography of the word in Greek and Syriac (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 532, note) points to the form ו'ם, and not ו'ם. Another derivation has been proposed, which, although direct evidence is wanting, seems satisfactory. According to this, the word is formed from...

Johannes Aristobulus. "Aronaucoz, comp. Ges. Thes. 534 b), great grandfather of Mattathias, seems certainly correct. How it came to pass that a man, otherwise obscure, gave his name to the family, cannot now be discovered; but no stress can be laid upon this difficulty, nor upon the fact that in Jewish prayers (Hersfeld, Gesch. d. Jud. i. 264) Mattathias himself is called Huskmonia.\(^a\)

The original authorities for the history of the Maccabees are extremely scanty; but for the course of the war itself the first book of Maccabees is a most trustworthy, if an incomplete witness. [Maccabees, Books of.] The second book adds some important details to the history of the earlier part of the struggle, and of the events which immediately preceded it; but all the statements which it contains require close examination, and must be received with caution. Josephus follows 1 Macc., for the period which it embraces, very closely, but slight additions of names and minute particulars indicate that he was in possession of other materials, probably oral traditions, which have not been elsewhere preserved. On the other hand there are cases, in which, from haste or carelessness, he has misinterpreted his authority. From other sources little can be gleaned. Hebrew and classical literature furnishes nothing more than a few trifling fragments which illustrate Maccabean history. So long an interval elapsed before the Hebrew traditions were committed to writing, that facts, when not embodied in rites or precepts, became wholly distorted. Classical writers, again, were little likely to chronicle a conflict which probably they could not have understood. Of the great work of Polybius—who alone might have been expected to appreciate the importance of the Jewish war—only fragments remain which refer to this period; but the omission of all mention of the Maccabean campaign in the corresponding sections of Livy, who follows very closely in the track of the Greek historian, seems to prove that Polybius also omitted them. The account of the Syrian kings in Appian is too meagre to make his silence remarkable; but indifference or contempt must be the explanation of a general silence which is too wide-spread to be accidental. Even when the fall of Jerusalem had directed unusual attention to the past fortunes of its defenders, Tacitus was able to dismiss the Maccabean conflict in a sentence remarkable for scornful carelessness. "During the dominion of the Assyrians, the Medes, and the Persians, the Jews," he says, "were the most abject of their dependent subjects. After the Macedonians obtained the supremacy of the East, King Antiochus endeavored

to do away with their superstition, and introduce Greek habits, but was induced by a Parthian war from earlier and later times. [Hist. i. 2.] Shortly afterwards Antiochus Epiphanes, whose resources had been impoverished by the war (1 Macc. iii. 27-31) left the government of the Palestinian provinces to Lysias, while he himself undertook an expedition against Persia in the hope of recruiting his treasury. Lysias organized an expedition against Judas; but his army, a part of which had been separated from the main body to effect a surprise, was defeated by Judas at Beth-horon (v. c. 109) after the Jews had kept a solemn fast at Mizpah (1 Macc. iii. 40-53), and in the next year Lysias himself was routed at Bethbura. After this success Judas was able to occupy Jerusalem except the "tower" (1 Macc. vi. 18, 19), and he purified the Temple (1 Macc. iv. 36, 41-53) on the 25th of Ikelon, exactly three years after its profanation (1 Macc. i. 50 [DEDICATION]; ii. 10). The next year was spent in wars with frontier nations (1 Macc. v.); but in spite of continued triumph the position of Judas was still precarious. In v. c. 163 Lysias, with the young king Anti- oehus Epiphanes, took Bethbura, which had been fortified by Judas as the key of the Idumean border (1 Macc. iv. 61), after having defeated the patriots who came to its relief; and next kid came to Jeru- salem. The city was on the point of surrendering, when the approach of Philip, who claimed the guardianship of the king, induced Lysias to guar- antee the Jews complete liberty of religion. The compact thus made was soon broken, but shortly afterwards Lysias fell into the hands of Demetrius, a new champion of the throne, and was put to death. The accession of Demetrius brought with it fresh troubles to the patriot Jews. A large party of their countrymen, with Alcilius's head, gained the ear of the king, and he sent Ni- cander against Judas. Nicander was defeated, first at Capharsalama, and again in a decisive battle at Adasa, near to the glorious field of Beth-horon (v. c. 161, on the 13th Adar; 1 Macc. vii. 49; 2 Macc. xv. 36), where he was slain. This victory was the greatest of Judas's successes, and practi- cally put an end to his successful career. The next year, 160, but it was followed by an unexpected reverse. Judas employed the short interval of peace which followed in negotiating a favorable league with the Romans. But in the same year, before the senate was returned, a new invasion under Bac- chides took place. The Roman alliance seems to have alienated many of the extreme Jewish party from Judas (Mids. Hanania, quoted by Raphall, Hist. of Jews, i. 327), and he was able only to gather a small force to meet the sudden danger. Of this a large part deserted him on the eve of the battle; but the courage of Judas was unshaken and he fell at Elkasa, the Jewish Thermopylae, fighting at desperate odds against the invaders. His body was recovered by his brothers, and buried at Modin in the sepulchre of his fathers (v. c. 101).a

b The later tradition, by a natural exaggeration, make him high-priest. Comp. Hefele, Gr. hist. i. 544, 270.
3. After the death of Judas the patriotic party seems to have been for a short time wholly disorganized, and it was only by the pressure of unparalleled sufferings that they were driven to renew the conflict. For this purpose they offered the command to Jonathan, surnamed Apphianus (Μάκαβειος, the wary), the youngest son of Mattathias. The policy of Jonathan shows the greatness of the loss involved in his brother's death. He made no attempt to maintain himself in the open country, but retired to the lowlands of the Jordan (1 Macc. x. 42), where he gained some advantage over Baccides (v. c. 161), who made an attempt to hem in and destroy his whole force. Not long afterwards Alexander Maccus died (v. c. 160), and Baccides losing, as it appears, the active support of the Grecizing party, retired from Palestine. Meanwhile Jonathan made such use of the interval of rest as to excite the fears of his Jewish enemies; and after two years Baccides, at their request, again took the field against Jonathan (v. c. 158).

This time he seems to have been but feebly supported, and after an unsuccessful campaign he accepted terms which Jonathan proposed; and after his departure Jonathan "judged the people at Michmass" (1 Macc. ix. 73), and gradually extended his power. The claim of Alexander Balas to the Syrian crown gave a new importance to Jonathan and his adherents. Demetrius I. empowered him to raise an army, a permission which was followed by the evacuation of all the outposts occupied by the Syrians except Bethsura, but Jonathan suspended the cause of Alexander, and refused the liberal offers which Demetrius made, when he heard that the Jews had resolved to join his rival (v. c. 153). The success of Alexander led to the elevation of Jonathan, who assumed the high-priestly office after the royal nomination at the Feast of Tabernacles (1 Macc. x. 21), "the greatest and holiest feast." (Joseph. Ant. viii. 4, § 1); and not long after he placed the king under fresh obligations by the defeat of Apollonius, a general of the younger Demetrius (1 Macc. x.). [APOLLONIUS.] On the death of Alexander, Demetrius II., in spite of the reverse which he had experienced, sought to gain the support of the Jews (v. c. 145); but after receiving important assistance from them he failed to fulfill his promises, and on the appearance of Antiochus VI., Jonathan attached himself to his party, and though he fell into a position of great peril gained an important victory over the generals of Demetrius. He then strengthened his position by alliances with Rome and "the Laconominius" [SPARTANS], and gained several additional successes in the field (v. c. 144); but at last fell a victim to the treachery of Tryphon (v. c. 144), who feared that he would prove an obstacle to the design which he had formed of usurping the crown after the murder of the young Antiochus (1 Macc. xi. 8-xii. 4).

4. As soon as Simon, the last remaining brother of the Maccabæan family, heard of the detention of Jonathan in Ptolemæis by Tryphon, he placed himself at the head of the patriot party, who were already beginning to despond, and effectually opposed the progress of the Syrians. His skill in war had been proved in the lifetime of Judas (1 Macc. v. 17-23), and he had taken an active share in the campaigns of Jonathan, when he was intrusted with a distinct command (1 Macc. xi. 59). He was soon enabled to consummate the object for which his family had fought gloriously, but in vain. Tryphon, after carrying Jonathan about as a prisoner for some little time, put him to death, and then, having murdered Antiochus, seized the throne. On this Simon made overtures to Demetrius II. (v. c. 143), which were favorably received, and the independence of the Jews was at length formally recognized. The long struggle was now triumphantly ended, and it remained only to reap the fruits of victory. This Simon hastened to do. In the next year he reduced "the tower" at Jerusalem, which up to this time had always been occupied by the Syrian faction; and during the remainder of his command extended and confirmed the power of his countrymen on all sides, in spite of the hostility of Antiochus Sidetes, who after a time abandoned the policy of Demetrius. [ΚΕΝΔΕΒΕΙΟΣ.] The prudence and wisdom for which he was already distinguished at the time of his father's death (1 Macc. ii. 65) gained for the Jews the active support of Rome (1 Macc. xv. 16-21), in addition to the confirmation of earlier treaties. After settling the external relations of the new state upon a sure basis, Simon regulated its internal administration. He encouraged trade and agriculture, and secured all the blessings of peace (1 Macc. xiv. 4-18). But in the midst of successes abroad and prosperity at home, he fell a victim to domestic treachery. Ptolemæus, the governor of Jericho, his son-in-law, aspired to usurp the supreme power, and having invited Simon and two of his sons to a banquet in his castle at Dok, he murdered them there (v. c. 135, 1 Macc. xvi. 11-16).

5. The treason of Ptolemæus failed in its object. JOHANNES HYRCANUS, one of the sons of Simon escaped from the plot by which his life was threatened, and assumed the government (v. c. 135). At first he was hard pressed by Antiochus Sidetes, and only able to preserve Jerusalem on condition of dismantling the fortifications and submitting to a tribute, v. c. 133. The foreign and civil wars of the Seleucæids gave him afterwards abundant opportunities to retrieve his losses. He reduced Idumæa (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 9, § 1), confirmed the alliance with Rome, and at length succeeded in destroying Samarias, the hated rival of Jerusalem, v. c. 109. The external splendor of his government was marred by the growth of internal divisions (Jos. Ant. xiii. 10, §§ 5, 6); but John escaped the fate of all the other members of his family, and died in peace v. c. 106-5. His eldest son Aristobulus I., who succeeded, was the first who assumed the kingly title, though Simon had enjoyed the fullness of the kingly power.

6. Two of the first generation of the Maccabæan family still remain to be mentioned. These, though they did not attain to the leadership of... their countrymen like their brothers, shared their fate—Eleazar [Eleazar, 8] by a noble act of self-devotion, John [John, 2], apparently the eldest brother, by treachery. The sacrifice of the family was complete, and probably history offers no parallel to the unflinching courage with which such a band dared to face death, one by one, in the maintenance of a holy cause. The result was worthy of the sacrifice. The Maccabees inspired a subject-peoples with independence; they found a few personal followers, and they left a nation.

7. The great outlines of the Maccabean contest, which are somewhat hidden in the annals thus briefly epitomized, admit of being traced with fair distinctness, though many points must always remain obscure from our ignorance of the numbers and distribution of the Jewish population, and of the general condition of the people at the time. The disputed succession to the Syrian throne (n. c. 153) was the political turning-point of the struggle, which may thus be divided into two great periods. During the first period (n. c. 158-153) the patriots maintained their cause with varying success against the whole strength of Syria: during the second (n. c. 153-139), they were counted by rival factions, and their independence was acknowledged. In the first period, though sometimes they were driven from town to town, they seldom gave in; in the second, though the danger was more often broken, when the danger was over. The paramount importance of Jerusalem is conspicuous throughout the whole war. The loss of the Holy City reduced the patriotic party at once to the condition of mere guerrillas, issuing from "the mountains" or "the wilderness," to make sudden forays on the neighboring towns. But the first aspect of the war (2 Macc. vii. 1-7; comp. 1 Macc. ii. 45) and the scene of the early exploits of Judas was the hill-country to the N. E. of Jerusalem, from which he drove the invading armies at the famous battle-fields of Beth-horon and Emmaus (Nicopolis). The occupation of Jerusalem closed the first act of the war (n. c. 165); and after this Judas made rapid attacks on every side—in Idumaea, Ammon, Gilead, Gadara—reconnoitring for a permanent settlement in the countries which he ravaged. Bethshemesh was fortified as a defense of Jerusalem on the S.; but the authority of Judas seems to have been limited to the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem, though the influence of his name extended more widely (1 Macc. vii. 50, 51 Ἰερουσαλημ). On the death of Judas the patriots were reduced to as great distress as at their first rising; and as Racchis held the keys of the "mountains of Ephraim" (ix. 50) they were forced to find a refuge in the lowlands near Jericho, and after some slight successes Jonathan was allowed to settle at Michmas undisputed, though the whole country remained absolutely under the sovereignty of Syria. So far it seemed that little had been gained, when the contest between Alexander Balas and Demetrius I. (Antiochus, n. c. 153) was renewed, and Judas was empowered to raise troops: the Jewish hostagings were restored; many of the fortresses were abandoned; and apparently a definite district was assigned to the government of the high-priest. The former unfruitful conflicts at length produced their full harvest. The defeat at Elasa, like the Swiss St. Jacob, had shown the worth of men who could face all odds, and no price seemed too great to secure their aid. When the Jewish leaders had once obtained legitimate power they proved able to maintain it, though their general success was checked by some reverses. The solid power of the national party was seen by the striking effect which was produced by the treacherous murder of Jonathan. Simon was able at once to occupy his place, and carry out his plans. The Syrian garrison was withdrawn from Jerusalem; Joppa was occupied as a seaport: and "four governments" (τεσσαράς ουαλι, x. 57, xii. 37)—probably the central districts of the old kingdom—were, with three districts taken from Samaria (x. 58, 39)—were subjected to the sovereign authority of the high-priest.

8. The war, thus brought to a noble issue, if less famous is not less glorious than any of those in which a few brave men have successfully maintained the cause of freedom or religion against overpowering might. The answer of Judas to those who counselled retreat (1 Macc. ix. 10) was true-hearted as that of Leonidas; and the exploits of his followers will bear favorable comparison with those of the Swiss, or the Dutch, or the Americans. It would be easy to point out parallels in Maccabean history to the noblest traits of patriotism and martyrs in other countries; but it may be enough here to claim for the contest the attention which it deserves. Nothing in the annals of classical writers were perpetuated in our own days, though there is no struggle—not even the wars of Joshua or David—which is more profoundly interesting to the Christian student. For it is not only in their victory over external difficulties that the heroism of the Maccabees is conspicuous: their real success was as much imperilled by internal divisions as by foreign force. They had to contend on the one hand against open and subtle attempts to introduce Greek customs, and, on the other against an extreme Pharisaic party, which is seen from time to time opposing their counsels (1 Macc. vii. 12-18; comp. § 2, end). And it was from Judas and those whom he inspired that the old faith received its last development and final impress before the coming of our Lord.

9. For that view of the Maccabean war which regards it only as a civil and not as a religious conflict, is essentially one-sided. If there were no other evidence than the book of Daniel—whatever opinion be held as to the date of it—that alone would show how deeply the noblest hopes of theocracy were centred in the success of the struggle. When the feelings of the nation were thus again turned with fresh power to their ancient faith, we might expect that there would be a new creative epoch in the national literature; or, if the form of Hebrew composition was already fixed by sacred types, a prophet or psalmist would express the thoughts of the new age after the models of old time. Yet in part at least the leaders of Maccabean times felt that they were separated by a red chasm from the times of the kingdom or of the exiles. If they looked for a prophet in Judah (there they assumed that the spirit of prophecy was not among them), the volume of the prophetic writings was completed, and, as far as appears, no one ventured to imitate its contents. But the Hagiographa, though they were already long fixed as a definite collection (1 Macc.), were not equally far removed from imitation. The apocalyptic visions of Daniel (Daniel, § 1) served as a pattern for the visions incorporated in the book of Enoch (Enoch, Book of); and it has been commonly supposed that the Psalter contains compositions of the Maccabean date. This supposition, which is at variance with the best evidence which can be obtained on the history of the Canon, can only be regarded as the inner light of the Spirit, and it may well be questioned whether the hypothesis is not as much at variance with sound interpretation as with the history of the Canon. The extreme forms of the hypothesis, as that of Hitzig, who represents Ps. 1, 2, 44, 60, and all the last three books of the Psalms (Ps. 73-150) as Maccabean (Grénon, 1 Macr. Einl. § 9, 3), or of Duss. Okehausen (quoted by Ewald, Jodav. 1853, p. 259 f.), who is inclined to bring the whole Psalter, with very few exceptions, to that date, need only be mentioned as indicating the kind of conjectures which find currency on such a subject. The real controversy is confined to a much narrower field; and the psalms which have been referred to the greatest show of reason to the Maccabean age are Ps. 44, 60, 74, 79, 80, 83. It has been argued that all these speak of the dangers to which the house and people of God were exposed from heathen enemies, at a period later than the Captivity; and the one ground for referring them to the time of the Maccabees is the general coincidence which they present with some features of the Greek oppression. But if it be admitted that the psalms in question are of a later date than the Captivity, it by no means follows that they are Maccabean. On the contrary, they do not contain the slightest traces of those internal divisions of the people which were the most marked features of the Maccabean struggle. The dangers then were as much from within as from without; and party jealousies brought the divine cause to the greatest peril (Ewald, Psalm. p. 355). It is incredible that a series of Maccabbean psalms should contain no allusion to a system of enforced idolatry, or to a temporeorizing priesthood, or to a faithless multitude. And while the obscurity which hangs over the history of the Persian supremacy from the time of Nebuchadnezzar to the invasion of Alexander makes it impossible to fix with any precision a date to which the psalms can be referred, any one glimpse which is given of the state of Jerusalem in the interval (Joseph. Ant. xi. 7) is such as to show that they may well have found some sufficient occasion in the wars and disorders which attended the decline of the Persian power (Ewald). It may, however, be doubted whether the arguments for a post-Babylonian date are conclusive. There is nothing in the psalms themselves which may not apply to the circumstances which attended the overthrow of the kingdom; and it seems incredible that the desolation of the Temple should have given occasion to no hymns of praise.

10. The collection of the so-called Psalms of Solomon furnishes a strong confirmation of the belief that all the canonical psalms are earlier than the Maccabean era. This collection, which bears the clearest traces of unity of authorship, is, almost beyond question, a true Maccabean work. There is every reason to believe (Ewald, Geschichte, iv. 144) that the book was originally composed in Aramaic, and some of the present intro-istics which are wanting in the other (conjectural) Maccabean Psalms. "The holy ones" (οἱ ἄγιοι, τοὺς ἅγιους [Ass. ηραβάνα]: 10 φόβοι τῶν κύριων) appear throughout as a distinct class, struggling against hypocrites and non-pleasers, who make the observance of the Law subservient to their own interests (Ps. Sol. iv., xiii.-xv.). The sanctuary is polluted by the abominations of professing servants of God before it is polluted by the heathen (Ps. Sol. i. 8, ii. 1 ff., viii. 8 ff., xvii. 15 ff.). Na-onal unfaithfulness is the cause of national punishment: and the end of trial is the " justification" of God (Ps. Sol. i. 16, iii. 3, iv. 9, viii. 7 ff., x.). On the other hand there is a holiness of works set up in some passages which violates the divine mean of Scripture (Ps. Sol. i. 2, 3, iii. 9): and, while the language is full of echoes of the Old Testament, it is impossible not to feel that it wants something which we find in all the canonical writings. The historical allusions in the Psalms of Solomon are as unequivocal as the description which they give of the state of the Jewish nation. An enemy "threw down the strong walls" of Jerusalem, and " Gentiles went up to the altar" (Ps. Sol. ii. 1-3; comp. 1 Macr. i. 31). In his pride "he brought all things in Jerusalem, as the Gentiles in their cities do for their gods" (Ps. Sol. xvi. 16). "Those who loved the assemblies of the saints (συναγωγάς ἰεών) wandered (λειτόμαατον) in deserts" (Ps. Sol. xvii. 1; comp. 1 Macr. i. 44, ii. 28); and there "was no one in the midst of Jerusalem who did mercy and truth" (Ps. Sol. xvii. 17; comp. 1 Macr. i. 38). One psalm (viii.) appears to refer to a somewhat later period. The people brought wickedly, and God sent upon them a spirit of error. He brought one "from the extremity of the earth" (viii. 19; comp. 1 Macr. vii. 1. — "Demetrius from Rome"). "The princes of the land met him Maccab. with joy" (viii. 15; comp. Macr. vii. 5-8); and he entered the land in safety (1 Macr. vii. 9-12; — Bunsen, this general,) "as a father in peace" (1 Macr. vii. 15). Then "he slew the princes and every one wise in counsel" (1 Macr. vii. 16) and "poured out the blood of those who dwelt in Jerusalem" (1 Macr. vii. 17). The purport of these evils, as a retiba-tive and purifying judgment, leads to the most remarkable feature of the Psalms, the distinct expression of Messianic hopes. In this respect they offer a direct contrast to the books of Maccabees (1 Macr. xiv. 41). The sorrow and the triumph are seen together in their spiritual aspect, and the expectation of "an anointed Lord" (χριστὸς Κύριος, Ps. Sol. xvii. 30 (xviii. 8); comp. Luke ii. 11) folows directly after the description of the injusious assaults of Gentile enemies (Ps. Sol. xvi.; comp.

Dan. xi. 45, xii.). "Blessed," it is said, "are they

by ἐργαζόμενοι, which is variously altered by different authorities.

c. The prominence given to the slaughter of the Ratingenists both in 1 Macr. and in the psalm, and the share which the Jews had directly in the second pollution of Jerusalem, seem to fix the events of the psalm to the time of Demetrius; but the close similarity (with this exception) between the invasions of Apollonius and Bacchides may leave some doubt as to the identification. (Compare 1 Macr. i. 28-38, with Ps. Sol. vii. 19-24.)

who are born in those days, to see the good things which the Lord shall do for the generation to come. [Verse 17] Then shall the covenant of an appointed Lord [or the Lord's appointed, הַנְּפָדָה וְאֵין יְוָדָא יָשָׁרָא חַיָּל] in the fear of his God, in wisdom of spirit and of righteousness and of might. Then there shall be a good generation in the fear of God, in the days of mercy. [P's. Sol. viii. 6-10.]

11. Elsewhere there is little which marks the distinguishing religious character of the era. The notice of the Maccabean heroes in the book of Daniel is much more general and brief than the corresponding notice of their great adversary; but it is not on that account less important as illustrating the relation of the famous chapter to the simple history of the period which it embraces. Nowhere is it more evident that facts are shadowed forth by the prophet only in their typical bearing on the development of God's kingdom. In this aspect the passage itself (Dan. xi. 29-35) will supersede in a great measure the necessity of a detailed comment. *At the time appointed [in the spring of 168 B.C.] he [Antiochus Epiph.] shall return and come towards the south [Egypt]: but it shall not be as the first time, nor also the last time [though his first attempts shall be successful, in the end he shall fail]. For the ships of Chittim [the Romans] shall come again against him, and he shall be cut down, and return, and he shall be weak against the holy covenant; and he shall do [his will]; yet he shall return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant (comp. Dan. viii. 24, 25). And forces from him [at his bidding] shall stand [remain in Judaea as garrisons; comp. 1 Macc. i. 33, 34]; and they shall pollute the sanctuary, the stronghold, and shall take away the daily [sacrifice]; and they shall set up the abomination that maketh desolate (1 Macc. i. 45-47). And such as are wickedly against (or rather such as condemn) the covenant shall be corrupt [to apostasy] by smooth words; but the people that know their God shall be strong and do [exploits]. And they that understand [know God and his law] among the people, shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity and by spoil [some copy (1 Macc. i. 32) read 'by spoil for them']. And they shall be helped with a little help (1 Macc. i. 28; 2 Macc. v. 27; Judas Macc. with nine others ...); and many shall cleave to them [the faithful followers of the Law] with hypocrisy [drawing the process of Judas, 1 Macc. ii. 46, and yet ready to fall away at the first opportunity, 1 Macc. vii. 6]; and some of them of understanding shall fall, to make trial among them, and to purify and to make white, unto the time of the end: because [the end is] yet for a time appointed.' From this point the prophet describes in detail the godlessness of the great oppressor (ver. 36-39), and then his last fortunes and death (ver. 40-45), but says nothing of the triumph of the Maccabees or of the restoration of the Temple, which preceded the last event by some months. This omission is scarcely intelligible unless we regard the facts as symbolizing a truth wrongly held by those who from early times referred 2 Macc. 26-45 only to Antichrist, the antitype of Antiochus—in which that recovery of the earthly temple had no place. And at any rate it shows the imperfection of that view of the whole chapter by which it is regarded as a mere transcription of history.

12. The history of the Maccabees does not contain much which illustrates in detail the religious history of the people of the Jews. It is obvious that the period must not only have intensified old beliefs, but also have called out elements which were latent in them. One doctrine at least, that of a resurrection, and even of a material resurrection (2 Macc. xiv. 46), was brought out into the most distinct apprehension by suffering. It is good to look for the hope from God, to be raised up again by Him (Acts xxiv. 9, 14), that is the substance of the martyr's answer to his judge: as for thee, shall not have resurrection to life (Acts xxiv. 26). And as it was believed that an interval elapsed between death and judgment, the dead were supposed to be in some measure still capable of profiting by the intercession of the living. Thus much is certainly expressed in the famous passage, 2 Macc. xii. 43-45, though the secondary notion of a purgatorial state is in no way implied in it. On the other hand it is not very clear how far the future judgment was supposed to extend. If the punishment of the wicked heathen in another life had formed a definite article of belief, it might have been expected to be put forward more prominently (2 Macc. xvii. 17, 19, 55, &c.), though the passages in question may be understood of sufferings after death, and not only of earthly sufferings; but for the apostate Jews there was a certain judgment in reserve (vi. 26). The firm faith in the righteous providence of God shown in the chastening of his people, as contrasted with his neglect of other nations, is one of the motifs of the whole of the Maccabean period, and of the wider history of the world, which is characteristic of the epoch (2 Macc. iv. 16, 17, v. 17-20, vi. 12-16, &c.). The lessons of the Captivity were reduced to moral teaching; and in the same way the doctrine of the ministry of angels assumed an importance which is without parallel except in patriarchical times [2 Maccabees]. It was perhaps from this cause also that the Messianic hope was limited in its range. The vivid perception of spiritual truths hindered the prospect of a hope which had been cherished in a material form; and a pause, as it were, was made, in which men gained new points of sight from which to contemplate the old promises.

13. The various glimpses of national life which can be gained during the period show on the whole

* The Psalms of Solomon were first published in Greek with a Latin translation by the Jesuit La Cerda at the end of his Adversaria Sacra, Lugd. 1581, afterwards by Faberius in his Opera Latina, T. v. Leiden, 1694; then by Moreau, Dibgen, and Wolf; and recently by S. M. Soggin, in the Zeitschrift f. wiss. Theol. 1888, p. 133 ff. He supposes the Psalms to have been written in Greek, not Hebrew, soon after the death of Pompey (in c. 48); comp. Ps. Sol. ii. 39 f. Moreau, Dibgen, and Wolf agree with him in referring them to a date subsequent to the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey (n. c. 63): on the other hand, Ewald, Grimm, and Buhnemann in Herzog's Real-Encyk. vii. 360 assign them to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes.
a steady adherence to the Mosaic Law. Probably the Law was never more rigorously fulfilled. The importance of the Antiochian persecution in fixing the Canon of the Old Testament has been already noticed. [Canova, vol. i. p. 658.] The books of the Law are found in the right hand section (1 Macc. i. 56, 57, iii. 48); and their distinctive value was in consequence proportionately increased. To use the words of 1 Macc., "the holy books" (τὰ βιβλία τὰ ἅγια τὰ ἐν χειρὶ ἡμῶν) were felt to give all comfort supernatural (1 Macc. xii. 9). The strict observance of the Sabbath (1 Macc. iii. 32; 2 Macc. vi. 11, viii. 26, &c.) and the observance of the law of the Nazarites (1 Macc. iii. 49), and the exemptions from military service (1 Macc. iii. 56), the solemn prayer and fastings (1 Macc. iii. 47; 2 Macc. x. 25, &c.), carry us back to early times. The provision for the mainled, the aged, and the bereaved (2 Macc. viii. 28, 39), was in the spirit of the Law; and the new Feast of the Dedication was a homage to the old rites (2 Macc. i. 9) while it was a proof of increasing popularity of the succession to the high-priesthood was the most important innovation which was made, and one which prepared the way for the dissolution of the state. After various arbitrary changes the office was left vacant for seven years upon the death of Alcimus. The last descendant of Jozachak (Onias), in whose family it had been for nearly four centuries, fled to Egypt, and established a schismatic worship; and at last, when the support of the Jews became important, the Maccabean leader, Jonathan, of the family of Joarib, was elected to the dignity by the nomination of the Syrian king (1 Macc. x. 29), whose will was confirmed, as it appears, by the voice of the people (comp. 1 Macc. xiv. 35).

14. Little can be said of the condition of literature and the arts which has not been already anticipated. In common intercourse the Jews used the Aramaic dialect which was established after the return: this was "their own language." (2 Macc. viii. 21, 27, xii. 37); but it is evident from the narrative quoted that they understood Greek, which must have spread widely through the influence of Syrian officers. There is not, however, the slightest evidence that Greek was employed in Palestinian literature till a much later date. The description of the monument which was erected by Simon at Medin in memory of his family (1 Macc. xiii. 27-30) is the only record of the architecture of the time. The description is obscure, but in some features the structure appears to have presented a resemblance to the tombs of Porsena and the Curitii (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 13), and perhaps to one still found in Idumea. An oblong basement, of which the two chief faces were built of polished white marble (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 6, § 3), supported seven cylinders in a line ranged one against another, "equal in number to the members of the Maccabean family, including Simon himself. To these he added "other works of art (μαγνηταρία) placing round (on the two chief faces?) great columns (Josephus adds, each of a single block), bearing trophies of arms, and sculptured ships, which might be visible from the sea below." The language of 1 Macc. and Josephus implies that these were originally placed upon the basement; otherwise it might be supposed that the columns rose only to the height of the basement, supporting the trophies on the same level as the pyramids. So much at least is evident, that the characteristics of this work—and probably of later Jewish architecture generally—bore closer affinity to the styles of Asia Minor and Greece than of Egypt or the East, a result which would follow equally from the Syrian dominion and the commerce which Simon opened by his Mediterranean (1 Macc. xiv. 34). 15. The only recognized relics of the time are the coins which bear the name of "Simon," or "Simon Prince (Nasi) of Israel" in Samaritan letters. The privilege of a national coinage was granted to Simon by Antiochus VII. Sidetes (1 Macc. xxv. 6, κοίμα τινα γνώμη τη χρύψ). and numerous examples occur which have the dates of the Simonian (21, third, and fourth) or the Seleucid (20) period. After the liberation of Jerusalem (Israel, Zion); and it is a remarkable confirmation of their genuineness, that in the first year the name Zion does not occur, as the citadel was not recovered till the second year of Simon's supremacy, while after the second year Zion alone is found (Bayer, de Numismis, 171). The privilege was first definitely accorded to Simon in n. C. 140, while the first year of Simon was n. C. 143 (Livy, xiv. 43); but this discrepancy is of little difficulty, as it is not unlikely that the concession of Antiochus was made in favor of a practice already existing. No date is given later than the fourth year, but coins of Simon occur without a date, which may belong to the four last years of his life. The evidences which the coins bear have generally a connection with Jewish history—a vine-leaf, a cluster of grapes, a vase (of nanna?); a triad, flowering rod, a palm branch surrounded by a wreath of laurel, a lyre (1 Macc. xiii. 34), a bundle of branches symbolic of the feast of tabernacles. The coins issued in the last war of independence by Bar-cochba repeat many of these emblems, and there is considerable difficulty in distinguishing the two series. The authenticity of all the Maccabean coins was impugned by Tychsen (Die Cinscheldt d. jüd. Münzen ... beiessen ... O. G. Tychsen, 1779), but on insufficient grounds. He was answered by Bayer, whose admirable essays (De Numismis Iudea, Samariaeis, Val. Ed. 1781; T-Jassie ... 1790) give the most complete account of the coins, though he reckons some apparently later types as Maccabean. Eckhel (Doctt. Numm. iii. p. 455 sq.) has given a good account of the controversy, and an accurate description of the chief types of the coins. Comp. De Saulcy, Numism. Judæae; Ewald, Gesch. vii. 366, 476. [Money.] The authorities for the Maccabean history have been given already. Of modern works, that of Ewald is by far the best. Herzfeld has collected a mass of details, chiefly from late sources, which are interesting and sometimes valuable; but the student of the period cannot but feel how difficult it is to realize it as a whole. Indeed, it seems that the instinct was true which named it from one chief hero. In this last stage of the history of Israel, as in the first, all life came from the leader; and it is the greatest glory of the Maccabees that while they found at first all turn upon their personal fortunes, they left a nation strong enough to preserve an independent faith till the typical kingdom gave place to a universal Church.

passel into the Vulgate. As forming part of the Vulgate they were received as canonical by the Council of Trent, and retained among the apocrypha by the reformed churches. The two other books obtained no such wide circulation, and have only a secondary connection with the Maccabean history. But all the books, though they differ most widely in character and date and worth, possess points of interest which make them a fruitful field for study.

If the historic order were observed, the so-called third book would come first, the fourth would be an appendix to the second which would retain its place, and the first would be placed last. It will be more convenient to examine the books in the order in which they are found in the MSS., which was probably decided by some vague tradition of their relative antiquity.

The controversy as to the mutual relations and historic worth of the first two books of Maccabees has given rise to much very ingenious and partial criticism. The subject was very nearly exhausted by a series of essays published in the last century, which contain in the midst of much unfair reasoning the substance of what has been written since.

The discussion was occasioned by F. Frölich's Anweld of Syria (Anmeld. . . . Syria . . . nunna exeretidus illustrati. Viandob. 1744). In this great work the author, a Jesuit, had claimed paramount authority for the books of Maccabees. This claim was denied by E. F. Wernsdorff in his Pseudos de fontibus historiac Syrie in Libris Macc. (Lips. 1745). Frölich replied to this essay in another, De fontibus hist. Syrie in Libris Macc. proditio . . . . in encom: vocato (Viandob. 1746); and then the argument fell into other hands. Wernsdorff's brother (Gib. Wernsdorff) undertook to support his cause, which he did in a Commentatio historicc critica de jide Librorum Macc. (Wrsitb. 1747); and nothing has been written on the same side which can be compared with his work. By the vigor and freedom of his style, by his surprising erudition and unwavering confidence — almost worthy of Bentley — he carries his reader often beyond the bounds of true criticism, and it is only after reflection that the littleness and sophistry of many of his arguments are apparent. But in spite of the injustice and arrogance of the book, it contains very useful facts which are the greatest value, and no abstract can give an adequate notion of its power.

The reply to Wernsdorff was published anonymously by another Jesuit: Auctorita utriusque Libri Macc. canonico-historica obtenta . . . . a quodam Soe. Jesu secludite (Viandob. 1749). The authorship of this was fixed upon J. Koll (Welt. Lex. p. 26, note); and while, in many points Koll is unequal to his adversary, his book contains some valuable information for the history of the canon. In more recent times, F. X. Patri- ticius (another Jesuit) has made a fresh attempt to establish the complete harmony of the books, and, on the whole, his essay (De Compendio utriusqve Libri Macc. Rome, 1856), though far from satisfactory, is the most able defense of the books which has been published.

The First Book of Maccabees.— I.

The first book of Maccabees contains a history of the patriotic struggle, from the first resistance of Mattathias to the settled sovereignty and death of Simon, a period of thirty-three years (B. C. 168-135). The opening chapter gives a short summary of the conquests of Alexander the Great as laying the foundations of the Greek empire in the East, and describes at greater length the oppression of Antiochus Epiphanes, culminating in his desperate attempt to extirpate Judaism. The great subject of the book begins with the enumeration of the Maccabean family (ii. 1-5), which is followed by an account of the part which the aged Mattathias took in running and guiding the spirit of his countrymen (ii. 6-70). The remainder of the narrative is occupied with the exploits of his five sons, three of whom in succession carried on with varying fortunes the work which he began, till it reached its triumphant issue. Each of the three divisions, into which the main portion of the book thus naturally falls, is stamped with an individual character derived from its special hero. First Judas, by a series of brilliant successes, and scarcely less noble reverses, fully roused his countrymen to their work, and then fell at a Jewish Thermopylae (iii. 1-ix. 22, n. c. 167-161). Next Jonathan confirmed by policy the advantages which his brother had gained by chivalrous daring, and fell not in open field, but by the sword, earlier in the same century (iii. 10-15, n. c. 161-143). Last of all Simon, by wisdom and vigor, gave shape and order to the new state, and was formally installed in the priestly office. He also fell, but by domestic and not by foreign treason; and his son succeeded to his power (xii.-xvi. n. c. 143, 135). The history, in this aspect, presents a kind of epic unity. The passing allusion to the achievements of after-times (xvi. 25, 26) relieves the impression caused by the number of Simon. But at his death the victory was already won — the life of Judaism had mastered the tyranny of Greece.

2. While the grandeur and unity of the subject invests the book with almost an epic beauty, it never loses the character of history. The earlier part of the narrative, including the exploits of Judas, is cast in a more poetic mould than any other part, except the brief eulogy of Simon (xiv. 4-15); but when the style is most poetical (i. 37- 40, ii. 7-13, 49-68, iii. 3-9, 18-22, iv. 8-11, 30-33, 38, vi. 10-13, vili. 37, 38, 41, 42) — and this poetical form is chiefly observable in the speeches — it seems to be true in spirit. The great marks of trustworthiness are everywhere conspicuous. Victory and failure and dependency are, on the whole, clearly indicated, and the author's method is a genuine attempt to bring into open display the working of Providence. In speaking of Antiochus Epiphanes (i. 10 f.) the writer betrays no unjust violence, while he marks in one expressive phrase (i. 10, μου διαμεμάχησε) the character of the Syrian type of Antichrist (cf. Is. xi. 10; Dan. xi. 36); and if no mention is made of the reckless profanity of Alexander Balas, it must be remembered that the treachery of a monarch to whom the book is under the dominion of Greece, and that alone fall within the scope of the history. So far as the circumstances admit, the general accuracy of the book is established by the evidence of other authorities; but for a considerable period it is the single source of our information. And, indeed, it has little need of external testimony to its worth. Its whole character bears adequate witness to its essential truthfulness; and neither — nor any other — judge expressed himself as not disbelieved, on internal grounds, to see it "reckoned among the books of Holy Scripture." (Nic. Buch . . . .

3. There are, however, some points in which the writer appears to have been imperfectly informed, especially in the history of foreign nations; and some, again, in which he has been supposed to have magnified the difficulties and successes of his countrymen. Of the former class of objections two, which turn upon the description given of the foundation of the Greek kingdom of the East (1 Macc. i.
5-9), and of the power of Rome (viii. 1-10) deserve notice from their intrinsic interest. After giving a rapid survey of the exploits of Alexander—the reading and interpretation of ver. 1 are too uncertain to allow of objections based upon the common text— the writer states that the king, conscious of approaching death, divided his king-don among his servants who had been brought up with him from his youth (1 Macc. i. 6, δι&£λεν αυτός τίνα βασιλιανα άυτού, έτι [σωτον αυτου],
...and after his death they all put on crowns). Various rumors, it is known (Curt. x.
10), prevailed about a will of Alexander, which decided the distribution of the provinces of his kingdom, but this narrative is evidently a different and independent tradition. It may rest upon some former indication of the king's wishes, but then in the absence of all corroborative evidence it can
Macc. pref. viii.), though it is a remarkable proof of the desire which men felt to attribute the constitution of the Greek power to the immediate counsels of its great founder. In this instance the author has probably accepted without inquiry the opinion of his countrymen; in the other it is distinctly said that the account of the greatness of Rome was brought to Judas by common report (1 Macc. viii.
1. 2, έκκοσεν ..., διήγησαν). The statements made give a lively impression of the popular estimation of the conquerors of the West, whose character and victories are described chiefly with open or covet allusion to the Greek powers. The subjugation of the Galatians, who were the terror of the neighboring people (Livy xxviii. 37), and the conquest of Spain, the Tarshish (comp. ver. 4) of Philip, and the other events notably historically natural from the immediate interest of the events;
but the wars with Carthage are wholly omitted (Josephus adds these in his narrative, Ant. xii.
10, § 6). The errors in detail — as the capture of Antiochus the Great by the Romans (ver. 7), the numbers of his armament (ver. 6), the constitutions of the Roman Senate (ver. 15), the one supreme yearly officer at Rome (ver. 16; comp. xiv. 16) — are only such as might be expected in oral accounts; and the endurance (ver. 4, μακροσθαιμια), the good faith (ver. 12), and the simplicity of the republic (ver. 14, ούκ ἐπεθέτο οὐδες αυτών διάχαι μη καὶ πειρεφάλλων πορφυρίες ὅστε διρυθνοίαν εν αυτή, contrast i. 9), were features likely to arrest the attention of Orientals. The very imperfection of the writer's knowledge — for it seems likely (ver. 11) that he remodels the rumors to suit his own time — is instructive, as affording a glimpse of the extent and manner in which the reputation of the Romans in the scene of their future conquests.
Nor are the mistakes as to the condition of foreign countries calculated to weaken the testimony of the book to national history. They are perfectly consistent with good faith in the nar-mator: and even if there are inaccuracies in recordning the relative numbers of the Jewish and Syrian forces (xi. 45-47, vii. 48), these need cause little surprise, and may in some degree be due to errors of transcription.4

4. Much has been written as to the sources from which the narrative was derived, but there does not seem to be evidence sufficient to indicate them with any certainty. In one passage (ix. 22) the author implied that written accounts of some of the actions of Judas were in existence (τα περασα ..., οἱ κατεγραφη:); and the pathetic character of the first section of the book, due in a great measure to the introduction of speeches, was probably borrowed from the writings on which that part was based. It appears, again, to be a reasonable conclusion from the mention of the official records of the life of Hyrcanus (xvi. 24, ηάηηα γηγηαίγηα επί βιβλίων ηηαιιαι άριχηρωτίθη αυτού), that similar records existed at least for the high-priesthood of Simon. There is nothing certainly to indicate that the writer designed to fill up any gap in the history; and the notice of the change of reclining which attended the elevation of Simon (xii. 42) seems to suggest the existence of some kind of public register. The constant appeal to official documents is a further proof both of the preservation of public records and of the sense of importance of the history. Many documents are inserted in the text of the history, but even when they are described as "copies" (ἀντίγραφα,) it is questionable whether the writer designed to give more than the substance of the originals.
Some bear clear marks of authenticity (viii. 22-32, xiv. 3-18), while others are open to grave difficulties and suspicion: but it is worthy of notice that the letters of the Syrian kings generally appear to be genuine (x. 19-24, 25-45, xi. 30-37, xii. 30-44, xiv. 2-24). What has been said will show the extent to which the writer may have used written authorities, but while the memory of the events was still recent it is not possible that he should have confined himself to them. If he was not himself engaged in the war of independence, he must have been familiar with those who were, and their information would supplement and connect the narratives which were already current, and which in themselves naturally bore the stamp of the isolated passages in the history. But whatever were the sources of different parts of the book, and in whatever way written, oral, and personal information was combined in its structure, the writer made the materials which he used truly his own; and the minute exactness of the geographical details carries the conviction that the whole finally rests upon the evidence of eye-witnesses.

5. The language of the book does not present any striking peculiarities. Both in diction and structure it is generally simple and unadorned, with a marked and yet not harsh Hebraistic character.
The number of peculiar words is not very considerable, especially when compared with those in 2 Macc. Some of these are late forms, as:
ψογέω (ψογώ), x. 5, 11, ἐξεδινώοις, i. 39;
ἡπολύσωμεν, xiv. 32: ἀπενενάθε, iv. 37: δειλάμα
iv. 8, 21, xvii. 6: ὁμορα. vii. 7, ix. 39, δὲ;
κοιμουμαι, ἀπεσενατοθεῖον, xii. 39: ἔχω κειμαι. x. 70: or compounds, such as ἀπαραγειοτίον,
x. 55: ἐπιστορεύομαι, xiv. 44: διελθεσθαι.
vi. 15, 51: φονεκτομαι, x. 24. Other words are used in new or strange senses, as ἀδιάφορος, viii. 14; παράδειγμα, xv. 32; διασταθή, vii. 7. Some phrases clearly express a semantic idiom (i. 48 διούσι κέρας τῷ ἀκρατ. vi. 23, x. 62, xii. 23), and the influence of the LXX. is continually perceptible (e. g. i. 54, ii. 63, vii. 17, ix. 23, xiv. 9); but in the main (comp. § 6) the Hebraisms which exist are such as might have been naturalized in the Lord-Greek of Palestine. Josephus undoubtedly made use of the Greek text (Jos. ii. 19, etc.); and apart from external evidence, this might have been supposed to be the original. But,

6. The testimony of antiquity leaves no doubt but that the book was first written in Hebrew. Origen, in his famous catalogue of the books of Scripture (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 25), after enumerating the contents of the O. T. according to the Hebrew canon, adds: "But without (i. e. excluded from the number of) these is the Maccabean history τα Macedonia, which is entitled κορινθίαντα, "of giving the names of the books of the O. T. he had subjoined the Hebrew to the Greek title in exactly the same manner, and there can be therefore no question but that he was acquainted with a Hebrew original for the Maccaebaei, as for the other books. The term Macedonian is, however, somewhat vague, though the analogy of the other parts of the list requires that it should be referred to one Greek, but the statement of Jerome is quite explicit: "The first book of the Maccabees," he says, "I found in Hebrew: the second is Greek, as can be shown in fact from its style alone" (Fest. Gall. ed Libr. Reg.). Admitting the evidence of these two fathers, who were alone able to speak with authority on a subject of Hebrew literature during the first four centuries, the fact of the Hebrew original of the book may be supported by several internal arguments which would be in themselves insufficient to establish it. Some of the Hebraisms are such as suggest rather than the immediate influence of a Hebrew text but the free adoption of a Hebrew idiom (i. 4, εὐγένετο εἰς φόρον; 18, ἠπόθανεν ὁ βασιλ. 21, δυο θύγαμος; 36, εἰς διάβολον πνεύματος. 58, ἐν πατρὶ μυρί και μυρίν, etc.; ii. 57, iii. 9, ἀπελευθεροῦν; iii. 2, v. 37, μετὰ τὰ βίαμα τίτων etc.), and difficulties in the Greek text are removed by a recurrence to the words which may be supposed to have been used in the original (i. 28, ἔτι τοὺς κατοικοῦντας ἥτα, ii. 26, ii. 8, iv. 13, xvi. 3). A question, however, might be raised whether the book was written in Biblical Hebrew, or in the later Aramaic (Chaldee); but it seems almost certain that the writer took the canonical histories as his model; and the use of the original text of Scripture by the learned class would preserve the Hebrew as a literary language which it had ceased to be the language of common life. But it is by no means unlikely (Grimm, L. c., § 4) that the Hebrew was corrupted by later idiom, as in the most recent books of the

O. T. It seems almost incredible that any one should have imagined that the worthless "Megilloth Antiochus," of which Bartolecit's Latin translation is printed by Fabricius (Col. Isceral. V. T. i. 1155-74), was the Hebrew original of which Origen and Jerome spoke. This tract, which occurs in some of the Jewish services for the Feast of Dedication (Fabricius, l. c.), is a perfectly unhistorical narrative of some of the incidents of the Macabean War, in which Judas the high-priest, and not Judah, plays by far the most conspicuous part. The order of events is so entirely disregarded in it that, after the death of Judah, Mattathias is represented as leading his other sons to the decisive victory which precedes the purification of the Temple.

7. The whole structure of 1 Macc. points to Palestine as the place of its composition. This fact itself is a strong proof for a Hebrew original, for there is no trace of a Greek Palestinian literature during the Hasmonean dynasty, though the wide use of the LXX. towards the close of the period, prepared the way for the apocryphal writings. But though the country of the writer can be thus fixed with certainty, there is considerable doubt as to his date. At the close of the book he mentions, in general terms, the acts of "Johannes Hyrcanus as written in the chronicles of his priesthood from the time that he was made high-priest after his father" (xvi. 23, 24). From this it has been concluded that he must have written after the death of Hyrcanus, n. c. 100; and the note in xiii. 30 τὰς ὑπαρχόντας τοιαύτας implies the lapse of a considerable time since the accession of Simon (n. c. 144). On the other hand, the omission of all mention of the close of the government of Hyrcanus, when the note of its commencement is given, may be urged as an argument for placing the book late in his long reign, but before his death. It cannot certainly have been composed long after his death; for it would have been almost impossible to write a history so full of simple faith and joyous triumph in the midst of the troubles which, early in the succeeding reign, threatened too distinctly the continuation of the state. Of the two limits, we may place the date of the original book between n. c. 120-100. The date and person of the Greek translator are wholly undetermined; but it is unlikely that such a book would remain long unknown or untranslated at Alexandria.

8. In a religious aspect the book is more remarkable negatively than positively. The historical instinct of the writer confines him to the bare recital of facts, and not even to the words of others which he records, it might seem that the true-ecumene aspect of national life had been lost. Not only does he relate no miracle, such as occur in 2 Macc., but he does not even refer the triumphant successes of the Jews to divine interposition. It is a characteristic of the same kind that he passes over without any clear notice the Maccabean hopes, which, as appears from the Psalms of Solomon and the Book of Enoch, were raised to the highest pitch by the successful struggle for independence. Yet he preserves faint traces of the national belief. He mentions the time from which "a prophet was not seen among them" (I Mcx. ix. 27, αὐτὸς ἀπόκεφαλεῖ προφήτης) as a marked epoch: and twice he anticipates the future coming of a prophet as of one who should make a direct revelation of the will of God to the people (iv. 45, ἀληθεία τῶν παραγωγικῶν προφήτων τοῦ αποκαλύφθαι περὶ πιστῶν), and super sede the temporary arrangements of a merely civil dynasty (xiv. 41, τῶν εἰσι Χιασσα ἡγομένων καὶ ἀρχιερεῖ εἰς τῶν αἰωνῶν ἦσαν ἡ ἀναπτύσσεσα προφήτης πιστῶν). But the hope or belief occupies no prominent place in the book; and, like the book of Esther, its greatest merit is, that it is throughout inspired by the faith to which it gives no definite expression, and shows, in deed rather than in word, both the action of Providence and a sustaining trust in his power.

9. The book does not seek to have been much used in early times. It offered far less for rhetorical purposes than the second book; and the history itself lay beyond the ordinary limits of Christian study. Fertilelll alludes generally to the conduct of the Maccabees was "mero.

10. The books of the Maccabees were not included by Jerome in his translation of the Bible. "The first book," he says, "is found in Hebrew" (Prod. Gall. in Resp.), but he takes no notice of the Latin version, and certainly did not revise it. The version of the two books which has been incorporated in the Roman Vulgate was consequently derived from the old Latin, current before Jerome's time. This version was obviously made from the Greek, and the main goal is closely. Besides the common text, Sabatier has published a version of a consderable part of the first book (ch. i.-xiv. 1) from a very ancient Paris MS. (S. Germ. 15) (enwos salio nonpentorin, in 1541), which exhibits an earlier form of the text. Grimm, strangely misquoting Sabatier (Eebez. Hundl. § 10), inverts the relation of the two versions; but a comparison of the two, even for a few verses, can leave no doubt but that the St. Germain MS. represents the most ancient text, following the Greek words and idioms with a slavish fidelity (Sabatier, p. 1014, "Quaenadmodum antem etiam unum invenire possit MSS. codices qui Psalmos ante omnes Hieronymi correctionem exhibent, ita pariter inventus est a nobis codex qui libri primi Maccihaeorum pariet continet majorem, minime quidem correctum, sed quilibet in omnibus MSS. antiquis reperiesatur"). Mai (Spicil. Rom. ix. App. 10) has published a fragment of another Latin translation (ch. ii. 49-64), which differs widely from both texts. The Syriac version given in the Polyglotts is, like the Latin, a close rendering of the Greek. From the rendering of the proper names, it has been supposed that the translator lived while the Semitic forms were still current (Grimm, Einl. § 10); but the arguments which have been urged to show that the Syriac was derived directly from the Hebrew original are of no weight against the overwhelming proof of the influence of the Greek text.

11. Of the early commentaries on the first two books of Maccabees, the most important are Drusius and Grotius, whose notes are reprinted in the Critici Sacri. The annotations of Calmet (Commentaire literal, etc., Paris, 1734) and Michaelis (Ueber den ersten Band. B. mit Anmerk., Leipzig, 1778), are of permanent interest; but for practical use the manual of Grimm (Kurzgefasste exeg. Handb. zu den Apokryphen, etc., Leipzig, 1854 §57) supplies everything which the student can require.

The Second Book of Maccabees. — 1. The history of the Second Book of the Maccabees begins some years earlier than that of the First Book, and closes with the victory of Judas Maccabees over Nicanor. It thus embraces a period of twenty years, from B. C. 180 (?) to B. C. 161. For the few events noticed during the earlier years, it is the chief authority: during the remainder of the time the narrative goes over the same ground as I Macc., but with very considerable differences.

The first two chapters are taken up by two letters supposed to be addressed by the Palestinian to the Alexandrian community, and by a sketch of the author's plan, which proceeds with the narrative from the close of the second letter. The main narrative occupies the remainder of the book. This presents several natural divisions, which appear to coincide with the five books" of Jason on which it was based. The first (xii. i.) contains the history of Heliodorus, as illustrating the fortunes of the Temple before the schism and apostasy of part of the nation (cir. B. C. 180). The second (iv.—xvii.) gives varied details of the beginning and course of the great persecution — the murder of Onias, the crimes of Menelaus, the martyrdom of Eleazar, and of the mother with her seven sons (B. C. 157—167). The third (viii.—x. 9) follows the fortunes of Judas to the triumphant restoration of the Temple service (B. C. 165, 164). The fourth (x. 10—to) includes the reign of Antiochus Eupator (B. C. 164—192) and the fifth (xiv.—xx.) records the treachery of Alexander, the death of Nicanor, and the beginning of the long success of Judas (B. C. 162, 161). Each of these divisions is closed by a phrase which seems to mark the end of a definite subject (iii. 40, vii. 42, x. 9, xii. 36, xiv. 37); and they correspond in fact with distinct stages in the national struggle.

2. The relation of the letters with which the book opens to the substance of the book is extremely obscure. The first (i. 1-9) is a solemn invitation to the Egyptian Jews to celebrate "the feast of tabernacles in the month Caslu" (i.e. the Feast of the Dedication, i. 9), as before they had sympathized with their brethren in Judea in "the extremity of their trouble" (i. 7). The second (i. 10—ii. 18, according to the received division), which bears a formal salutation from "the council and Judas" to "Aristobulus . . . and the Jews in Egypt," is a strange, rambling collection of legendary stories of the death of "Antiochus," of the preservation of the sacred fire and its recovery by Nehemiah, of the hiding of the vessels of the sanctuary by Jeremiah, ending — if indeed the letter can be said to have any end — with the same exhortation to observe the Feast of Dedication (ii. 10—18).

For it is impossible to point out any break in the construction or style after ver. 18, so that the writer passes insensibly from the epistolary form in ver. 16 to that of the epistologist in ver. 29 (Soaca). I or this Jason probably extended no farther than the epitome, for the description of its contents (2 Mac. ii. 19-22) does not carry us beyond the close of 2 Mac. The "brethren" of Judas, whose exploits he related, were already distinguished during the lifetime of "the Maccabees" (1 Mac. v. 17 ff., 21 ff. vi. 42-45; 2 Mac. viii. 22-29).

4. The Maccabean period of Cyrenae was most closely united with that of Alexandria. In both, the predominance of Greek literature and the Greek language was absolute. The work of Jason — like the poems of Callimachus — must therefore have been composed in Greek; and the style of the epitome, as Jerome remarked, proves beyond doubt that the Greek text is the original (Proef. Gill. = Scholia [Machabaeorum] Greeks est; quod ex ipsa quaque fabulae probat potius). It is scarcely less certain that 2 Mac. was compiled at Alexandria. The characteristics of the style and language are essentially Alexandrine; and though the Alexandrine style may have prevailed in Cyrenaica, the form of the allusion to Jason shows clearly that the compiler was not his fellow-countryman. But all attempts to determine more exactly who the compiler was are mere groundless guesses, without even plausible evidence of physical identity.

5. The style of the book is extremely uneven. At times it is elaborately ornate (iii. 15-29, v. 20, vi. 12-16, 23-28, vii. etc.); and again, it is so rude and broken, as to seem more like notes for an epitome than a finished composition (xii. 19-25); but it nowhere attains to the simple energy and pathos of the first book. The vocabulary corresponds to the style. It abounds in new or unusual words. Many of these forms which belong to the decay of a language, as: ἀλλοφυλεῖα, iv. 13, vi. 24; ἐλαλεῖμαι, iv. 13 (ἐλαλεῖμαι, iii. 9); ἐπαναταχθὲς, vii. 35; ἐρασκόμενος, vii. 9; ἐπικοινωνία, vi. 7, 21, vii. 42; or compounds which betray a false pursuit of emphasis or precision: διεπιστημόνω, iv. 9; ἑπεταλείπτης, xiv. 18; κατευθυνόμενος, xiv. 43; προσωπαλετηθέν, xv. 19; προσωποτριβηθέν, xix. 9; συνεκοπηθέν, x. 26.

Other words are employed in novel senses, as: διευρυτολογία, xii. 22; εἰκοσικελείπθης, ii. 24; εἰσαχαντισμός, xiv. 9; περιφερεύοντος, xi. 8; ψυχικός, iv. 35, vi. 24. Others bear a sense which is common in late Greek, as: ἀλλοκοτία, xiv. 8; ἀναλογία, ix. 2, xii. 2; διαλογία, iii. 32; ἐπειρεῖα, ix. 4; φωνησόιμα, vii. 31; περιπεβάλλει, vi. 4. Others appear to be peculiar to this book, as: διεπηρείζω, xii. 25; διεπεπιθέτω, v. 29; προσποιηθεῖς, x. 11; πολεμομακροπαθος, x. 14, 15; ἐπικεφαλεύω, vii. 27, 31; ἐπικεφαλεύω, vi. 28; δομίζω, viii. 35; ἀνυδρολογία, xii. 44. Hebraisms are very rare (vii. 15, ix. 5, xiv. 24). Idiomatic Greek phrases are much more common (iv. 40, xii. 22, xv. 12, &c.): and the writer evidently had a considerable command over the Greek language, though his taste was deformed by a love of rhetorical effect.

6. In the absence of all evidence as to the person of Jason — for the conjecture of Herzfeld (§ 3) is wholly unsupported by proof — there are no data which fix the time of the composition of his original work, or of the epitome given in 2 Mac., within very narrow limits. The superior limit of the age of the epitome, though not of Jason's work is determined by the year 121 B.C., which is too e tioned in one of the introductory letters (i. 10); but there is no ground for assigning so great an antiquity to the present book. It has, indeed, been concluded from xv. 57, ἂν ἔλεγεν τῶν καιρῶν κρατήρεις τῆς πόλεως ὑπὸ τῶν Ἐβραίων — which is written in the person of the epimelon, that it was written in the last days of the life and death of Judas; but the import of the words appears to be satisfied by the religious supremacy and the uninterrupted celebration of the Temple service, which the Jews maintained till the final ruin of their city; for the destruction of Jerusalem is the only inferior limit, below which the book cannot be placed. The supposed reference to the book in the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. xi. 55, “and others were tortured”) comp. vi. 18—20; it may perhaps be rather a reference to the current tradition than to the written text; and Josephus in his history shows no acquaintance with its contents.

On the other hand, it is probable that the author of 2 Macc. used either 1 Macc, or the work of Jason; but this at most could only determine that the book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, which is already clear from xv. 57. There is no explicit mention of the book before the time of Clement of Alexandria (Strum. v. 14, § 98).

Internal evidence is quite insufficient to settle the date, which is thus left undetermined within the limits 124 b. c. — 70 a. C. If a conjecture be admissible, I should be inclined to place the original work of Jason not later than 100 B. C., and the epistle half a century later. It is quite credible that a work might have been long current at Alexandria before it was known to the Jews of Palestine.

7. In order to estimate the historical worth of the book it is necessary to consider separately the two divisions into which it falls. The narrative in iii.—vii. is in part anterior (iii.—iv. 6) and in part (iv. 7—vii.) supplementary to the brief summary in 1 Macc. i. 10—64: that in vii.—xv. is, as a whole, parallel with 1 Macc. iii.—vii.

In the first section the book itself is, in the main, the sole source of information: in the second, its contents can be tested by the trustworthy records of the first book. It will be best to take the second section first, for the character of the book does not vary much; and if this can once be determined from sufficient evidence, the result may be extended to those parts which are independent of other testimony. The chief differences between the first and second books lie in the account of the campaigns of Lysias and Timotheus.

Differences of detail will always arise where the sources of information are partial and separate; but the differences alleged to exist as to these events are more serious. In 1 Macc. iv. 24—35 we read of an invasion of Judaea by Lysias from the side of Idumea, in which Judas met him at Bethsura and inflicted upon him a severe defeat. In consequence of this Lysias retired to Antioch to make greater preparations for a new attack, while Judas undertook the restoration of the sanctuary. In 2 Macc. the first mention of Lysias is on the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (v. 11). Not long after this he is said to have invaded Judaea and suffered a defeat at Bethsura, in consequence of which he made peace with Judas, giving him favorable terms (xi.). A later invasion is mentioned in both books, which took place in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. vi. 17—50; 2 Macc. viii. 2 ff.), in which Bethsura fell into the hands of Lysias. It is then necessary either to suppose that there were three distinct invasions, of which the first is mentioned only in 1 Macc., the second only in 2 Macc., and the third in both; or to con-

placed version of one of the other invasions (for the history in 1 Macc. iv. 29—61 bears every mark of truth and the position which is occupied by the character of the details, and the difficulty of reconciling the supposed results with the events which immediately followed. It is by no means equally clear that there is any mistake in 2 Macc. as to the history of Timotheus. The details in 1 Macc. v. 11 ff. are quite reconcilable with those in 2 Macc. xii. 2 ff., and it seems certain that both books record the same events; but there is no sufficient reason for supposing that 1 Macc. v. 6 ff. is parallel with 2 Macc. x. 24—37. The similarity of the names Jason and Gazar probably gave rise to the confusion of the two events, which differ in fact in almost all their circumstances; though the identification of the Timotheus mentioned in 2 Macc. x. 24, with the one mentioned in vii. 30, seems to have been determined to distinguish him from some other of the same name. With these exceptions, the general outlines of the history in the two books are the same; but the details are almost always independent and different. The numbers given in 2 Macc. often represent incredible results: c. g. viii. 29, 30: x. 23, 31; xi. 11; xii. 16, 19, 23, 26, 23; xv. 27. Some of the statements are obviously incorrect, and seem to have arisen from an erroneous interpretation and embellishment of the original source: vii. 5 (the presence of Antiocbus at the death of the Jewish martyrs); ix. (the death of Antiocbus in 257 b. c. by his father-in-law, etc.); vi. (the relation of Antiocbus the Younger to Lysias); xv. 31, 35 (the recovery of Acre); xiv. 7 (the forces of Demetrius). But on the other hand many of the peculiar details seem to be such as must have been derived from immediate testimony: ix. 29—50 (the intrigues of Menelaus); vi. 2 (the temple at Gerizim); x. 12, 13; xiv. 1 (the landing of Demetrius at Tripolis); viii. 1—7 (the character of the first exploits of Judas). The relations between the two books must be incomparably represented by that existing between the books of Kings and Chronicles. In each case the later book was composed with a special design, which regulated the character of the materials employed for its construction. But as the design in 2 Macc. is openly avowed by the compiler, so it seems to have been carried out with considerable license. Yet his errors appear to be those of one who interprets history to support his cause, rather than of one who falsifies its substance. The groundwork of facts is true, but the dress in which the facts are presented is due in part at least to the narrator. It is not at all improbable that the error with regard to the first campaign of Lysias arose from the mode in which it was introduced by Jason as an introduction to the more important measures of Lysias in the reign of Antiocbus Epiphanes. In other places (as very obviously in xii. 19 ff.) the compiler may have disregarded the historical dependence of events while selecting those which were best suited for the support of his theme. If these remarks are true, it follows that 2 Macc. viii.—xv. is to be regarded not as a connected and complete history, but as a series of special incidents from the life of Judas, illustrating the provential interference of God in behalf of his people, true in substance, but embellished in form; and this view of the book is supported by the character of the earlier chapters, in which the narrative is unchecked by independent evidence. There is not any ground for questioning the main facts in the history of Heliodorus (ch. iii.) or Meneelas (iv.); and while it is very probable that the narratives of the sufferings of the martyrs (vi., vii.) are highly colored, yet the grounds of the accusation, the forms of torture, in their essential characteristics, seem perfectly authentic.

8. Besides the differences which exist between the two books of Maccabees as to the sequence and details of common events, there is considerable difficulty as to the chronological data which they give.

All follow that the Seleucid era is the era of contracts; " "of the Greek kingdom" ; 1 Macc. i.
, in brief ...  and in some cases in which the two books give the date of the same event, the first book gives a date one year later than the second (1 Macc. vi. 16 | 2 Macc. xi.
21, 34; 1 Macc. vi. 20 | 2 Macc. xiii. 11); yet on the other hand they agree in 1 Macc. vii. 1 | 2 Macc. iv. 4. This discrepancy seems to be due to a mere error, but to a difference of reckoning for all attempts to explain away the discrepancy are untimely. The true era of the Seleucidae began in October (Bris) n. c. 312; but there is evidence that considerable variations existed in Syria in the reckoning by it. It is then reasonable to suppose that the discrepancies in the books of Maccabees, which proceeded from independent and widely-separated sources, are to be referred to this confusion; and a very probable mode of explaining (at least in part) the origin of the difference has been supported by most of the learned chroniclers.

Though the Jews may have reckoned two beginnings to the year from the time of the Exilus [Chronology, vol. i. p. 436], yet it appears that the Biblical dates are always reckoned by the so-called ecclesiastical year, which began with Nisan (April), and not by the civil year, which was afterwards in common use (Jos. Ant. i. 3, § 3), which began with Tisri (October; comp. Patriarchus, De Cons. Macc. p. 33 ff.). Now since the writer of 1 Macc. was a Palestinian Jew, and followed the ecclesiastical year in his reckoning of months (1 Macc. iv. 52), it is probable that he may have conmenced the Seleucid year not in autumn (Tisri), but in spring (Nisan).

The narrative of 1 Macc.
x. in fact demands a longer period than could be obtained (1 Macc. x. 1, 21, fourteen days) on the hypothesis that the year began with Tisri. If, however, the year began in Nisan (reckoning from spring 312 n. c.); the events which fell in the last month of the true Seleucid year would be dated a year forward, while the true and the Jewish dates would agree in the first half of the year. Nor is there any difficulty in supposing that the two events assigned to different years (Wernsrold, De Fide Macc. § 9) happened in one half of the year. On a The following is the parallelism which Patriarchus (De cons. vers. lib. Macr. 175-246) endeavors to establish between the common narratives of i. and ii. Macc.

When two or more passages are placed opposite to one,
the first only has a parallel in the other narrative; —

This arrangement, however, is that of an apologist for the books; and the succession of passages, no less than the large amount of passages peculiar to each book, indicates how little real parallelism there is between them.

b In 2 Macc. xv. 36 the same reckoning of months occurs, but with a distinct reference to the Palestinian decree.

c It is, however, possible that the years may have been dated from the following spring (311 n. c.); in which case the Jewish and true years would coincide for the last half of the year, and during the first half the Jewish date would fall six short by one year (Hebr.
(Gr. d. Volk) i. 41)).
... grounds, indeed, it is not unlikely that the difference in the reckoning of the two books is still greater than is thus accounted for. The Chaldaeans, as is proved by good authority (Pol. Met. cpi. ap. Clinton, II. ii. 111, 350, 370), dated their Seleucid era one year later than the true from 311 c. c., and probably from October (Dios. com. c. v. 21) from the beginning of the year. If, therefore, the writer of 2 Macc. — or rather Jason of Cyrene, whom he epitomized — used the Chaldaean dates, there may be a maximum difference between the two books of a year and half, which is sufficient to explain the difficulties of the chronology of the events connected with the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (Heclus, i. 531-534, quoted and supported by Browne. Osio Schol. 439, 490. Comp. Clinton, P. R. H. iii. 377 ff., who takes a different view; Patritius, l. c.; and Wernsfurth, § xx. ff., who states the difficulties with great acuteness).

9. The most interesting feature in 2 Macc. is its marked religious character, by which it is clearly distinguished from the first book. "The manifestations (ἐμφάνια) made from heaven on behalf of those who were zealous to manifold in defense of Judaism." (v. Macc. ii. 21) form the subject of the book. The events which are related historically in the former book are in this regarded theologically, if the word may be used. The calamities of persecution and the desolation of God's people are definitely referred to a temporary visitation of his anger (v. 17-20, vii. 12-17, vii. 32, 33), which shows itself even in details of the war (xii. 40; comp. Jos. vii. Before his great victory Judas is represented as addressing his god that "wrought two wonders" (σημαραγμον), thus, once his angels slew the host of the Assyrians, so then he would "send a good angel before his armies for a fear and dread to their enemies" (xx. 22-23; comp. 1 Macc. vii. 41, 42). A great "manifestation" wrought the punishment of Helioborus (iii. 24-21): a similar vision announced his cure (iii. 32, 31). Heavenly portents for forty days (σημαραγμον, v. 4) foreshadowed the coming judgment (v. 2). When three strong five comely men upon horses appear, of whom two cover Maccabeus from all danger (x. 23, 30). Again, in answer to the supplication of the Jews for a "good angel to deliver them," there appeared before them on horseback one in white clothing, and "they marched forward" to triumph, "having an helper from heaven" (vi. 6-11). And there no special vision is recorded, the rest of the enemy is still referred to "a manifestation of Him that seeth all things" (xii. 22). Closely connected with this belief in the active energy of the beings of the unseen world, is the importance assigned to dreams (xv. 11, άνευρου αξιοπιστου άπα: and the distinct assertion, not only of a personal "resurrection to life" (vi. 14, ανάστασις είς ζωήν; v. 9, ανάστασις ζωής), but of the influence which the living may yet exercise on the condition of the dead (xii. 44-45). The doctrine of Providence is carried out in a most minute parallelism of great crimes and their punishment. Thus, Andronicus was put to death on the very spot where he murdered Onias (iv. 38, του Κυπρου την άξιαν ύπερ ολοκληρως ανάστατον): Jason, who had "driven many out of their country," died an exile, without "solemn funeral," as he had "cast out many assembled" (v. 9, 10): the torments suffered by Antiochus are likened to those which he had inflicted (ix. 5, 6); Menelaus, who "had committees many sins about the altar," received his death in ashes" (xiii. 4-8): the hand and tongue of Nicaon, with which he had blasphemed, were hung up "as an evident and manifest sign unto all of the help of the Lord" (xv. 32-43). On a larger scale the same idea is presented in the contrasted martyrdoms of the two Valerius, and their vindication by the Divine Power. The former is "God's people," "God's portion" (v εις, l. 26; xiv. 15), who are cherished in love: the latter are left unpunished till the full measure of their sins ends in destruction (vi. 12-17). For in this book, as in I Macc., there are no traces of the glorious visions of the prophets, who foresaw the time when all nations should be united in one bond under one Lord.

10. The history of the book, as has been already noticed (§ 6), is extremely obscure. It is first mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria (L. c.); and Origen, in a Greek fragment of his commentaries on Exodus (Philoc. 26), quotes vi. 12-16, with very considerable variations of text, from "the Maccabean history" (τά Μακαβαίας: comp. I Macc. § 6). At a later time the history of the martyred brothers was a favorite subject with Christian writers (Cyp. Ep. iv. 6, &c.): and in the time of Jerome (Frg. Guliel.) and Augustine (D. Doct. Chri. ii. 8: De Cir. Dei, viii. 36) the book was in common and public use in the Western Church, where it maintained its position till it was at last definitely declared to be canonical at the council of Trent. [Canon, vol. i. p. 333.]

11. The Latin version adopted in the Vulgate, as in the case of the first book, is that current before the death of Jerome, who left wholly untaught in the apocryphal books, with the exception of Judith and Tobit. The St. German MS. from which Salatier edited an earlier text of 1 Macc., does not, unfortunately, contain the second book, being imperfect at the end; but the quotations of Lucifer of Cagliari (Salatier, ad Cyp. vi. 7) and a fragment published by Mai (Spicil. Rom. l. c. I Macc. § 10) indicate the existence and character of such an extant. The version is much less close to the Greek than in the former book and often gives no more than the sense of a clause (i. 13, vi. 21, vi. 5, &c.). The Syriac version is of still less value. The Arabic so-called version of 2 Macc. is really an independent work. [Fifth Book of Maccabees.]

12. The chief commentaries on 2 Macc. have been already noticed. [First Book of Maccabees, § 11.] The special edition of Hase (Jena, 1784) seems, from the account of Grimm, to be of no value. There are, however, many valuable historical observations in the essay of Patriicus (De Commen., etc. already cited).

III. The Third Book of the Maccabees contains the history of events which preceded the great Maccabean struggle. After the decisive battle of Raphia (v. c. 217), envays from Jerusalem, following the example of other cities, hastened to Ptolemy Philopator to congratulate him on his success. After receiving them the king resolved to visit the holy city. He offered sacrifice in the Temple, and was so much struck by its majesty that he urgently sought permission to enter the sanctuary. When this was refused he resolved to gratify his curiosity by force, regardless of the consequence with which his design was received (ch. 1.). On this Simon the high-priest, after the people had been with difficulty restrained from

... the king fell paralyzed into the arms of his attendants, and on his recovery returned at once to Egypt without prosecuting his intention. But angry at his failure he turned his vengeance on the Alexandrine Jews. Hitherto these had enjoyed the highest rights of citizenship, but the king commanded that those only who were voluntarily initiated into the heathen mysteries should be on an equal footing with the Alexandrians, and that the remainder should be enrolled in the lowest class (אֶל פֶּסְאָל יַעֲשָׂה נֶאֶשׁ לְגִבְּרֹת מִשְׁרַת אֶלֶּה, ii. 28), and branded with an ivy-leaf (ch. ii.). [endencies.] Not content with this order, which was evaded or despised, he commanded all the Jews in the country to be arrested and sent to Alexandria (ch. iii.). This was done as well as might be, though the greater part escaped (iv. 18), and the gathered multitudes were confined in the Hippodrome outside the city (comp. Joseph. Ant. xvii. 6, § 5). The resident Jews, who showed sympathy for their countrymen, were imprisoned with them: and the king ordered the names of all to be taken down preparatory to their execution. Here the first marvel happened: the series to whom the task was assigned totaled for forty days from morning till evening, and at last remained but one set. The king's plan was defeated (ch. iv.). However, regardless of this, the king ordered the keeper of his elephants to drive the animals, five hundred in number, with wine and incense, that they might trample the prisoners to death on the morrow. The Jews had no help but in prayer; and here a second marvel happened. The king was overpowered by a deep sleep, and when he awoke the next day it was already time for the banquet which he had ordered to be prepared, so that the execution was deferred. The Jews still prayed for help; but when the dawn came, the multitudes were assembled to witness their destruction, and the elephants stood ready for their bloody work. There was then another marvel. The king was visited by deep forgetfulness, and called the keeper of the elephants for the preparations which he had made, and the Jews were to be trampled with the beasts. But at the evening banquet the king recalled his purpose, and with terrible threats prepared for its immediate accomplishment at daybreak (ch. v.). Then Eleazar, an aged priest, prayed for his people, and as he ended the royal train came to the Hippodrome. On this there was seen a heavenly vision by all but the Jews (vi. 18). The elephants trampled down their attendants, and the wrath of the king was turned to pity. So the Jews were immediately set free, and a great feast was prepared for them; and they resolved to observe a festival, in memory of their deliverance, during the time of their sojourn in strange lands (ch. vi.). A royal letter to the governors of the provinces set forth the circumstances of their escape, and assured them of the king's protection. Permission was given to them to take vengeance on their renegade countrymen, and papers were returned to their homes in great triumph, crowned with flowers, and singing praises to the God of their fathers."

2. The form of the narrative, even in this bold outline, sufficiently shows that the object of the book has modified the facts which it records. The writer, in his zeal to bring out the action of Providence, has colored his history, so that it has lost all scabcndence of truth. In this respect the book offers an instructive contrast to the book of Esther, with which it is closely connected both in its purpose and in the general character of its incidents. In both a terrible calamity is averted by faithful prayer; royal anger is changed to royal favor; and the punishment devised for the innocent is directed to the guilty. But here the likeness ends. The divine service which is the peculiar object of the book of Esther, is exchanged in 3 Macc. for rhetorical exaggeration; and once again the words of inspiration stand emblazoned by the presence of their later counterpart.

3. But while it is impossible to accept the details of the book as historical, some basis of truth must be supposed to lie beneath them. The yearly festival (vi. 36; vii. 19) can hardly have been a mere fancy of the writer; and the pillar and synagogue (πρωτεύχη) at Potemus (vii. 20) must have been connected in some way with a signal deliverance. Besides this, Josephus (c. Ap. ii. 5) relates a very similar occurrence which took place in the reign of Ptolemy VII. (Philus)." "The king," as he says, "exasperated by the opposition which Onias, the Jewish general of the royal army, made to his usurpation, scolded all the Jews in Alexandria with a terrible threatening, and exposed them to intoxicated elephants. But the animals turned upon the king's friends; and forthwith the king saw a terrible visage which forced him to injure the Jews. On this he yielded to the prayers of his mistress, and repented of his attempt; and the Alexandrine Jews observed the day of their deliverance as a festal day." The essential points of the story are the same as those in the second part of 3 Macc., and there can be but little doubt that Josephus has preserved the events which the writer adapted to his narrative. If it be true that Ptolemy Philopator attempted to enter the Temple at Jerusalem, and was frustrated in his design—a supposition which is open to no reasonable objection—it is easily conceivable that tradition may have assigned to him the impious design of his successor; or the writer which is the peculiar object of the book have combined the two events for the sake of effect.

4. Assuming rightly that the book is an adaptation of history, Ewald and (at greater length) Grimm have endeavored to fix exactly the circumstances by which it was called forth. The writings of Philo, occasioned by the oppressions which the Alexandrine Jews suffered in the reign of Caligula, offer several points of connection with it; and the point which was occasioned at Jerusalem by the attempt of the emperor to erect his statue in the Temple is well known, Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8, § 2). It is then argued that the writer designed to portray Caligula under the name of the sensual tyrant who had in earlier times held Egypt and Syria, while he sought to nerve his countrymen for their struggle with heathen power, by reminding them of the events of early days. While this is not necessary, it seems necessary to restrict the various details in which the parallel between the acts of Caligula and the narrative fail. Such differences may have been part of the writer's disguise; but it may be well questioned whether the position of the Jews in the early time of the empire, or under the later Ptolemies, was not generally such persecuting civil power would, perhaps, always present the same general features.
that a narrative like 3 Macc. would find a ready audience.

The language of the book betrays most clearly its Alexandrine origin. Both in vocabulary and construction it is rich, affected, and exaggerated. Some words occur nowhere else (αλογορία, ii. 28; προστάτευσαι, ii. 21; ἐφάρμοσ, vi. 20; χαρτία, iv. 29; βουθρεία, vi. 8; Ψυχοκενταρίον, v. 23; μετάφορά, vi. 9; πυότομα, vi. 4; μεγαλοκατάρτα, vi. 2; μυροβρυχία, iv. 6; πρωικαιπορικοποιηθείς, i. 1; απενεργηθέντως, i. 20); others are used in strange senses (λειτουργία, Met. iii. 22; παραδεισάγητον, vi. 24; αποτροπή, iv. 9). The form of the sentences is strained (e. g. i. 15, 17, ii. 31, ii. 23, iv. 11, vii. 17, 10, 46), and every description is loaded with metaphorical ornament (e. g. iv. 2, 5; vii. 45). As a natural consequence the meaning is often obscure (e. g. i. 9, 14, 19, iv. 3, 14), and the writer is led into exaggerations which are historically incorrect (vii. 2, 23; vi. 2; comp. Grimm).

6. From the abruptness of the commencement (δὲ δὲν Φιλόσωπος) it has been thought (Ewald, Geschichte, iv. 515) that the book is a mere fragment of a larger work. Against this view it may be urged that the tenor of the book is one and distinct, and brought to a perfect issue. It must, however, be noticed that in some MSS. (44, 125, Parsons) the beginning is differently worded: "Now in these days king Ptolemy;" and the reference in ii. 25 (τῶν πρωικαιπορικοποιών) is to some passage not contained in the present narrative. It is possible that the narrative may have formed the sequel to an earlier history, as the Υἱοθετέων continues, without break or repetition, the history of Thucydides (μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα Νεώ. Ηλλ. i. 1); or we may suppose (Grimm, Einl. § 4) that the introductory chapter has been lost.

7. The evidence of language, which is quite sufficient to fix the place of the composition of the book at Alexandria, is not equally decisive as to the date. It might, indeed, seem to belong to the early period of the empire (n. c. 40-70), when for a Jew all hope lay in the record of past triumphs, which assumed a fabulous grandeur from the contrast with present oppression. But such a date is purely conjectural: and in the absence of any direct proof it is unsafe to trust to an impression which cannot claim any decisive authority, from the very imperfect knowledge which we possess of the religious history of the dispersion. If, however, Ewald's theory be correct, the date falls within the limits which have been suggested.

8. The uncertainty of the date of the composition of the book corresponds with the uncertainty of its history. In the Apostolical Canons (Canon 85) " three books of the Maccabees " are mentioned (Μακαδαίων τρία, one MS. reads δέ), of which this is the third. But the third, the third, occupies the third place in the oldest Greek MSS. which contain also the so-called fourth book. It is found in a Syriac translation, and is quoted with marked respect by Theodoret (vol. Dm. xi. 7) of Antioch (died eir. D. 457). " Three books of the Maccabees " (Μακαδαίων γάρ) are placed at the head of the Bibliotheca of the 1. v. in the catalogue of Nicephorus; and in the Synopsis, falsely ascribed to Athanasius, the third book is apparently described as " Πολεμαία, " from the name of the royal hero, and reckoned doubtfully among the disputed books. On the other hand the book seems to have found no acceptance in the Alexandrine or Western churches, a fact which confirms the late date assigned to the Alexandrine narrative. It is not quoted, as far as we know, in any Latin writer, and does not occur in the lists of canonical and apocryphal books in the Galician Decretals.

No ancient Latin version of it occurs: and as it is not contained in the Vulgate it has been excluded from the canon of the Roman church.

9. In its modern form it has been translated into Latin (first in the Complutensian Polyglott); German (Dr. Wetzel and August, Biblical and Church History, 1st ed.; and in an earlier version "by Jo. Ciremberger, Wittenberg, 1554;" Cotton, Five Books, etc., p. xx); and French (Calmet). The first English version was appended to "A brief and compendious table... opening the way to the principal histories of the whole Bible... London, 1550." This version with a few alterations (Cotton, p. xx) was included in a folio Bible published the next year by J. Day; and the book was again published in 1563. A better translation was published by Whiston in his Authentic Documents (1727); and a new version, with short notes by Dr. Cotton (The Five Books of Maccabees in English... Oxford, 1821). The Commentary of Grimm (Kurze... Handbuch) gives ample notices of the opinions of earlier commentators, and supersedes the necessity of using any other.

IV. THE FOURTH BOOK OF MACCABEES (Μακαδαίων δ', εἰς Μακαδαίων λόγος) contains a rhetorical narrative of the martyrdom of Eleazar and of the "Maccabean family," following in the main the same outline as 2 Macc. The second title of the book, On the Supreme Sovereignty of Reason (περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογίσμον), explains the moral use which is made of the history. The author of the introduction assumes the Alexandrine manner of reason and the character of its supremacy, which he then illustrates by examples taken from Jewish history (§§ 1-3, Hudson). Then turning to his principal proof of the triumphant power of reason, he gives a short summary of the causes which led to the persecution of Antiochus (§ 4), and in the remainder of the book describes at length the death of Eleazar (§§ 5-7), of the seven brethren (8-14), and of their mother (15-22). The author would enforce the lesson which he would teach by the words of the martyrs and the reflections which spring from them. The last section (20) is evidently by another hand.

2. The book was ascribed in early times to Josephus. Eusebius (H. E. III. 10, πεποίηται δὲ καὶ Δαλό οἰκεῖ άγαθον σπουδασμα τῷ ανδρὶ e. μ. Ιωάννου — περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογίσμον, δ τρεῖς Μακαδαίων οικογένειας), and Jerome, following him (De Vir. ill. 12), "Alius quoque libri ejus, qui inscribatur περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογίσμον vallab
6. The original Greek is the only ancient text in which the book has been published, but a Syrian version is said to be preserved in MS. at Milan (Grinn, Eisd. § 7). In recent times the work has hardly received so much attention as it deserves. The first and only complete commentary is that of Grinn, (Exeg. Handbuch), which errs only by extreme elaborateness. An English translation has been published by Dr. Cotton (The Fire Books of Maccabees, Oxf. 1832). The text is given in the best form by Bekker in his edition of Josephus (Lips. 1856-60).

7. Though it is certain that our present book is that which old writers described, Sixtus Sensus (Rik. Senes, p. 57, ed. 1575) gives a very interesting account of another fourth book of Maccabees, which he saw in a library at Lyons, which was afterwards burnt. It was in Greek, and contained the history of John Hyrcanus, continuing the narrative directly after the close of the first book. Sixtus quotes the first words: καὶ μετὰ τὸ ἀποκτηθῆναι τῶν Σίμωνος ἡγεμόνος ὑπὸ ἀστικὴς ἀρχῆς ἅπαντα ἀραβικαῖς ἀραβικά, but this is the only fragment which remains.

8. The history, he says, was nearly the same as that in Jos. xiii., though the style was very different from his, abounding in Hebrew idioms. The testimony is so exact and explicit, that we can see no reason for questioning its accuracy, and still less for supposing (withGainet) that Sixtus saw only the so-called fifth book, which is at present preserved in Arabic.

V. The Fifth Book of Maccabees just mentioned may call for a very brief notice. It is printed in Arabic in the Paris and London Polyglots, and contains a history of the Jews from the attempt of Helioborus to the birth of our Lord. The writer made use of the first two books of Maccabees and of Josephus, and has no claim to be considered an independent authority. His own knowledge was very imperfect, and he perpetuates the statements which he derives from others. He must have lived after the fall of Jerusalem, and probably out of Palestine, though the translation bears very clear traces of foreign authorship so that it has been supposed that the book was originally written in Hebrew, or at least that the tikkew was strongly modified by Hebrew influence. The book has been published in English by Dr. Cotton (Fire Books, etc.).

* MACCABEBUS, more correctly MACCAEBUS (Μακκαβαῖος; Maccabæus) occurs repeatedly in 1 and 2 Macc. as the surname of Judas the son of Matthias (1 Macc. ii. 4, iii. 1, v. 24, viii. 20; 2 Macc. ii. 19, v. 27, vii. 1, iv. 6), but more frequently alone, as the rendering of ὁ Μακκαβαῖος, "the Maccabee" (2 Macc. viii. 5, 16, x. 19, 21, 25, 39, 33, 35, xi. 6, 7, 15, xii. 19, 20, xxxi. 24, xxv. 27, 39, xx. 7, 21), Judas, however, being always referred to. In 2 Macc. x. 1 the article is omitted, and so in 1 Macc. x. 34 in the Roman edition (but Alex. δ. Mæcæbeus). On the name and family see the art. Maccabees.

A. MACEDONIA (Μακεδονία), the first part of Europe which received the Gospel directly from St. Paul, and an important scene of his subsequent missionary labors and the labors of his companions. So closely is this region associated with apostolic journeys, sufferings, and epistles, that it has truly been called by one of our English travellers a kind of Holy Land (Clarke's Travels, ch. xi.). For details see NEAROS, PHILIPPA, AMMIDON.
Macedonia

ATOLLONIA, THESSALONICA, and BEREA. We confine ourselves here to explaining the geographical and political import of the term "Macedonia" as employed in the New Testament, with some allusion to its earlier use in the Apocrypha, and one or two general remarks on St. Paul's journeys through the district, and the churches which he founded there. In a rough and popular description it is enough to say that Macedonia is the region bounded inland by the range of Haemus or the Balkan northwards, and the chain of Pindus westwards, beyond which the streams flow respectively to the Haliacmon and the Adriatic; that it is separated from Thessaly on the south by the Cambodian hills, running easterly from Pindus to Olympus and the Egean; and that it is divided on the east from Thrace by a less definite mountain-boundary running southwards from Haemus. Of the space thus enclosed, two of the most remarkable physical features are two great plains, one watered by the Axios, which comes to the sea at the Thermaic gulf, not far from Thessalonica; the other by the Strymon, which, after passing near Philippi, flows out below Amphipolis. Between the months of these two rivers a remarkable peninsula projects, dividing itself into three points, on the farthest of which Mount Athos rises nearly into the region of perpetual snow. Across the neck of this peninsula St. Paul travelled more than once with his companions Demas and Titus. This general sketch would sufficiently describe the Macedonia which was ruled over by Philip and Alexander, and which the Romans conquered from Perseus. At first the conquered country was divided by Emilius Paulus into four districts, Macedonia Prima was on the east of the Strymon, and had Amphipolis for the capital. Macedonia Secunda stretched between the Strymon and the Axios, with Thessalonica for its metropolis. The third and fourth districts lay to the south and the west. This division was only temporary. The whole of Macedonia, along with Thessaly and a large tract along the Adriatic, was made one province and centralised under the jurisdiction of a procurator, who resided at Thessalonica. We have now reached the definition which corresponds with the usage of the term in the N. T. (Acts xvi. 9, 10, 12, xx. 23), employed in the N. T., with some allusion to its earlier use in the Apocrypha, and in xxv. 1-2, xxvi. 2, xxi. 2, xvii. 3, xxvii. 1, 3, xxviii. 7, Rom. xxvii. 1; I Cor. viii. 5; 2 Cor. xliii. 5; vii. 2, viii. 1, 2, 4, vi. 9; Phil. iv. 15; 1 Thess. i. 7, 8, iv. 10; 1 Tim. i. 3). Three Roman provinces, all very familiar to us in the writings of St. Paul, divided the whole space between the basins of the Danube and Cape Matapan. The border-town of ILLYRICUM was Lissus on the Adriatic. The boundary-line of ACHIA nearly coincided, except in the western portion with that of the kingdom of modern Greece, and ran in an irregular line from the Acrocorinian promontory to the Bay of Thermopylae and the north of Euboea. By subtracting these two provinces, we define Macedonia. The history of Macedonia in the period between the Persian wars and the consolidation of the Roman provinces in the Levant is touched in a very interesting manner by passages in the Apocrypha. In Esdras iv. 10, the country is described as Macedon, and in xiv. 14 he is said to have contrived his plot for the purpose of transferring the kingdom of the Persians to the Macedonians. This sufficiently betrays the late date and spurious character of these apocryphal chapters: but it is curious thus to have our attention turned to the early struggle of Persia and Greece. Macedonia played a great part in this struggle, and there is little doubt that Alexander is Nereus. The history of the Macedonians opens with vivid allusions to Alexander the son of Philip, the Macedonian king ("ΑΛέξανδρος ὁ τῶν Φιλαδέλφων ντός Ἡλλάδος ἡ Μακεδόνα"); who came out of the land of Chettim and smote Da- rius king of the Persians and Medes (1 Maced. i. 1), and who reigned first among the Grecians (ib. vi. 2). A little later we have the Roman conquest of Persia ("king of the Cithare") recorded (ib. viii. 5). Subsequently in these Jewish annals we find that Macedonians were used for the soldiers of the Seleucid successors of Alexander (2 Mace. vii. 20). In what is called the Fifth Book of Maccabees this usage of the word is very frequent, and is applied not only to the Seleucid princes at Antioch, but to the Ptolemies at Alexandria (see Cotton's Five Books of Maccabees, Oxford, 1832). It is evident that the words "Macedonia" and "Macedonian" were fearfully familiar to the Jew- ish mind; and this gives a new significance to the vision by which St. Paul was invited at Troas to the country of Philip and Alexander.

Nothing can exceed the interesting and impressive nature of the occasion (Acts xvi. 9) when a new and religious meaning was given to the well-known ἄνωπλος Μακεδονίας of Demosthenes (Phil. i. p. 43) and when this part of Europe was designated as the first to be trod by an Apostle. The account of St. Paul's first journey through Macedonia (Acts xvi. 10-xvii. 15) is marked by copious detail and well-defined incidents. At the close of this journey he returned from Corinth to Syria by sea. On the next occasion of visiting Europe, though he both went and returned through Macedonia (Acts xx. 1-6), the narrative is a very slight sketch, and the route is left uncertain, except as regards Philippi. Many years elapsed before St. Paul visited this province again; but from 1 Tim. i. 3 it is evident that he did accomplish the wish expressed during his first imprisonment. (Phil. ii. 24.)

The character of the Macedonian Christians is set before us in Scripture in a very favorable light. The canons of the Bishops are highly commended (Acts xvii. 11); the Thessalonians were evidently objects of St. Paul's peculiar affection (1 Thess. ii 17-20, iii. 10); and the Philippians, besides their devotedness to him and his work, were remarkable for their liberality and self-sacrifice. (Phil. iv. 10, 14-19; see 2 Cor. ix. 2, 10. It is worth noticing, as a fact almost typical of the change which Christianity has produced in the social life of Europe, that the female element is conspicuous in the records of its introduction into Macedonia. The Gospel was first preached there to a small congregation of women (Acts xvi. 13); the first convert was a woman (ib. ver. 14); and, at least at Philippi, women were prominent as active workers in the cause of religion (Phil. iv. 2, 3).

It should be observed that, in St. Paul's time, Macedonia was well intersected by Roman roads, especially by the great Via Egnatia, which connected Philippi and Thessalonica, and also led towards Illyricum (Rom. xv. 19). The antiquities of the country have been described and described by many travellers. The two best works are those of Cousinèr (Voyage dans la Macedoine, Paris, 1831) and Leake (Travels in Northern Greece, London, 1835).

* It is still a question whether Luke's usage distinguishes Macedonia and Thrace from each other or regards them as one. This depends on part on the interpretation of the controverted ΜΑΧΑΡΙΟΣ (Macedonian) polis (Acts xvi. 12). Bettej (Querdenker Philippus) maintains that Thrace was not attached to Macedonia till the time of Vespasian, and that Luke, consistently with that fact, speaks of Philippis as the first city in Macedonia which Paul reached after crossing from Asia into Europe. Hence Neapolis (Kavodit), where he landed, belonged to Thrace and not to Macedonia, as was true at a later period. On one side see Lachter's Der Apostelgeschichte, p. 231 f. (Dr. Schaeffer's translation in Lange's Commentary, p. 304), and on the other, Meyer's Apostelgeschichte, p. 202 f. (1854). There is another supposition. Instead of speaking of Philippis as topographically "first" in Macedonia, because Luke meant to assign Neapolis to Thrace, he may have thought of the city and its harbor as one, whether this distinction of provinces existed at that time or not. That Luke was familiar with this identification of town and port is manifest for in Acts xvi. 11, he says that Paul and his companions sailed to Philippis (εφυλακτονεαμας), whereas they went thither by land from Neapolis, and in Acts xx. 6, that they sailed from Philippis (περαπλεομενοι), whereas they went down to the coast, and embarked at Neapolis.

MACEDONIAN (Μακεδος; [Macedo]) occurs in A. V. only in Acts xxii. 2. In the other cases (Acts xvi. 9, xix. 29, 2 Cor. ix. 2, 4), our translators render it "of Macedonia.

* "Macedonian" occurs also several times in the A. V. in the Apocrypha, namely, 1 Macc. i. 1, vi. 2; 2 Macc. viii. 29; Esth. xvi. 10, 14. For the wide sense in which it is used in 2 Macc. viii.

* MACHERUS (Μαχαριος) is the name of the castle in which, according to Josephus (Ant. xviii. 5, § 2; B. J. vii. 6, §§ 1-4), John the Baptist was imprisoned and put to death by Herod Antipas. (See Matt. xiv. 3-5.) In 1860 Setzer identified the place with the ruins of the present Makher, east of the Dead Sea, on a lofty crag overlooking the southern Zulek-Moun. See Reise, ii. 374 f. It was originally a tower built by Alexander Jannaeus as a check on the Arab freebooters in that quarter. It is surrounded by ravines, at some points not less than 175 feet deep, and in addition to its natural strength, was strongly fortified. In Herod's time it was rendered still more attractive by its splendid porticos and reservoirs, and is known to have been a favorite retreat of this luxurious prince. Pliny speaks of it as "seconda quondam arx Judææ ab Hierosolymis" (Nat. Hist. v. 15). It has been said that Macherus, though transferred from one occupant to another, was never actually reduced by siege or taken by storm. Its supplies of water are almost unfailing. After the destruction of Jerusalem it fell into the hands of the Securit, a band of outlaws of whom we read in Acts xii. 38.

The Evangelists state that John was cast into prison, but do not mention where the prison was situated, or where the feast was held at which the order was given for his execution. As nothing in their narrative, however, contradicts that view, we may conclude that Josephus was well informed, and that John was incarcerated and beheaded in Macherus (Tiberias). His confinement was not so strict as to exclude the visits of friends (Matt. xi. 2 ff.; Luke vii. 18); and hence it was from this castle, in all probability, that he sent two of his disciples to Christ to inquire of him whether he was the Messiah, or they should look for another (Luke vii. 20). Into one of the deep ravines beneath the fortress the headless body of John (το πτωμα αιτω, Mark vi. 29) may have been cast, which his disciples took up and buried, and then went and told Jesus (Matt. xiv. 12; Mark vi. 29). It was from this castle that the Arab wife of Herod, repudiated by him for the sake of Herodias, fled to her father, Antes king of Arabia, out of which grew the war between Herod and Aretas, which culminated in the defeat of Herod (Ant. xviii. 5-1), and the capture of Damascus (alluded to in 2 Cor. xii. 32). The crag on which the old fortress stood is said to be visible from Jerusalem. (See Jerusalem, ii. 1278, note.) It was a saying of the Jews that the torches on Olicet announcing the appearance of the Passover moon could be seen from Tabor and the rocky heights of Macherus (Schwartz, Das heil. Land, p. 54).

The history of Macherus is well sketched by Gaus (Johannes der Tanner im Gegenstand, pt 50-82). For other notices, mainly historical or topographical, see Just's Geschichte der Juden, ii. 221 ff.; Sepp's Das Leben Christi, ii. 400-414, and Das heil. Land, i. 678; Milman's History of the

him, and not on the Evangelists. Some time elapsed between the flight and Herod's war with Aretas (which was before John's death), and during the interval Herod may in some way have become master of the fortress. John need not however be supposed to have been kept all the time in one place.
That the tribe was divided, and that only the inferior families crossed the Jordan. So great was their power that the name of Machir occasionally supersedes that of Manasseh, not only for the eastern territory, but even for the western half of the tribe also; see Judges 11, where Machir occurs in the enumeration of the western tribes — "Gilgal" apparently standing for the eastern Manasseh in verse 17; and still more unmistakably in Joshua 21, compared with 29.

2. The son of Ammiel, a powerful shekh of one of the trans-Jordanic tribes, but whether of Manasseh — the tribe of his namesake — or of Gad, must remain uncertain till we know where Lo-debar, to which place he belonged, was situated. His name occurs but twice, but the part which he played was by no means an insignificant one. It was his fortune to render essential service to the cause of Saul and of David successively — in each case when they were in difficulty. Under his roof, when a cripple and friendless, after the death of his uncle and the ruin of his house, the unfortunate Mephibosheth found a home, from which he was summoned by David to the throne, and at the anxious solicitation of a resident at the court of Jerusalem (2 Samuel ix. 4, 5). When David himself, some years later, was driven from his throne to Mahanaim, Machir was one of the three great chiefs who lavished on the exiled king and his soldiers the wealth of the rich pastoral district of which they were the lords — "wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and beans, and lentiles, and parched pulse, and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cows' milk cheese" (2 Samuel xvii. 27—29). Josephus calls him the chief of the country of Gilead (Ant. vii. 9, § 8).

Mophabbi: Alex. o Mophabbi: Machnebebi; one of the sons of Baal who put away his foreign wife and burnt her image (Ezra x. 40). The marginal reading of A. V. is "Mehunadib", which is found in some copies. In the corresponding list of 1 Esdr. ix. 34 the place of this name is occupied by "of the sons of Ozora," which may be partly traced in the original.

MACHPELHAY (always with the article — בַּמֵּרְפֶלָה [the portion, lot]: to διαρροή, also το εύπαπλον το διαρροή: duplex, also speluncus duplex), the spot containing the timbered field, in the end of which was the cave which Abraham purchased from the Bene-Heth [sons of Heth], stratagem by which the Phenician Diko obtained land enough for her city of Byrsa. "Ibrahim asked only as much ground as could be covered with a cow's hide; but after the agreement was concluded he cut the hide into pieces, and surrounded the whole of the new property with the same."

The story is remarkable, not only for its repetition of the older Semitic tale, but for its complete departure from the simple and open character of Abraham, as set forth in the Biblical narrative. A similar story is told of other places, but, like Byrsa, their names contain something suggestive of the hide. The writer has not been able.

a The Targum characteristically says "circumcised."

b There are several considerations which may lead us to doubt whether we are warranted by the Biblical narrative in attributing a personal sense to the name of Gilead, such as the very remote period from which that name as attached to the district dates (Gen. xxxix.), and also such passages as Num. xxxii. 39, and Deut. xi. 35. (See Ewald, Gehb. ii. 477, 478, 493.)

c The story of the purchase current amongst the modern Arabs of Hebron, as told by Wilson (Lett. &c., i. 311, is a counterpart of the legend of the and which became the burial-place of Sarah, Abraham himself, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob. Abraham resided at Bethel, Hebron and Gerar, but the field which contained his tomb was the only spot which positively belonged to him in the Land of Promise. That the name applied to the general locality, and not to either the field or the cavern, is evident from Gen. xxiii. 17, "the field of Ephron which was in Machpelah . . . the field and the cave which was therein," although for convenience of expression both field and cave are occasionally called by the name. Its position is — with one exception uniformly — specified as "having 7Μ 7Μ<sup>ο</sup> Monre" (Gen. xxiii. 17, 19, xxv. 9, xlix. 30, I. 13). What the meaning of this ancient name — not met with beyond the book of Genesis — may be, appears quite uncertain. The older interpreters, the LXX., Vulgate, Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-jonathan, Peshito, Veneto-Greek, etc., explain it as meaning a double—the double cave or the double field — but the modern lexicographers interpret it, either by comparison with the

This text is a discussion about the name and location of the field of Machpelah, which is associated with the patriarchs of the Bible and the site of Abraham's burial. The text explores the meaning of the name, its usage in ancient manuscripts, and its significance in the context of the Bible. It also describes the physical characteristics of the site, including its ancient architecture and its role as a sacred place for centuries. The text references specific passages from the Bible and other ancient manuscripts to support its claims and provides a detailed description of the site at Hebron.

general monopoly of the town of Hebron. The ancient Jewish tradition ascribes its erection to David (Tichon ha-Abod in Hottinger, Cypel Heb. p. 30), thus making it coeval with the pool in the valley below; but, whatever the worth of this tradition, it may well be of the age of Solomon, for the masonry is even more antique in its character than that of the lower portion of the south and southwestern walls of the Haram at Jerusalem, and which many critics ascribe to Solomon, while even the severest allows it to be of the date of Herod. The date must always remain a mystery, but there are two considerations which may weigh in favor of fixing it very early. 1. That often as the town of Hebron may have been destroyed, this, being a tomb, would always be spared. 2. It cannot on architectural grounds be later than Herod's time, while on the other hand it is omitted from the catalogue given by Josephus of the places which he rebuilt or adorned. Had Herod erected the inclosure round the tombs of the fathers of the nation, it is hardly conceivable that Josephus would have omitted to extol it, especially when he mentions apparently the very structure now existing. His words on this occasion are “the monuments (μνημεία) of Abraham and his sons are still to be seen in the town, all of fine stone and admirably wrought” (Johann von der Schulenburg, Kil., iv. 9, § 7).

Of the contents of this inclosure we have only the most meagre and confused accounts. The spot is one of the most sacred of the Moslem sanctuaries, and since the occupation of Palestine by them it has been entirely closed to Christians, and partially so to Jews, who are allowed, on rare occasions only, to look in through a hole. A great part of the area is occupied by a building which is now a mosque, and was probably originally a church, but of its date or style nothing is known. The sepulchres of Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah, are shown on the floor of the mosque, covered in the usual Mohammedan style with rich carpets; but the real sepulchres are, as they were in the 12th and 16th centuries, in a cave beneath the floor (Leyb. d'Abd el-Monon, p. 180). If you give them the semblance of a tomb of Aaron on Mount Hor. (See p. 1087.) The cave, according to the earliest and the latest testimony, opens to the south. This was the report of Monro's servant in 1833; and Arcul particularly mentions the fact that the bodies lay with their heads to the north, as they would do if deposited from the south. A belief seems to prevail in the town that the cave communicates with some one of the modern sepulchres at a considerable distance, outside of Hebron (Locae, in Zeitschrift des Judenh. June 1, 1839).

The accounts of the sacred inclosure at Hebron will be found collected by Ritter (Erkldrude Pal., edition, 219, &c., but especially 219-250); Wilson (Lands, etc., i. 363-367); Robinson (Bibl. Des. ii. 75-79). The chief authorities are Archi (A. D. 700); Benjamin of Tudela (A. D. cir. 1170); the Jewish tract Jichus ha-Abod (in Hottinger, Cypel Hebrei); and also in Wilson, i. 365; Ali Bey (Travels, A. D. 1807, ii. 232, 233); Giovanni Finati (Life by Bankes, ii. 236); Monro (Summer Remble in 1835, i. 243); Locae (in Zeitschrift des Judenh. 1839, pp. 272, 285). In a note by Asher to his edition of Benjamin of Tudela (ii. 52), mention is made of an Arabic MS. in the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris, containing an account of the condition of the mosque under Saladin. This MS. has not yet been published. The travels of Ibrahim el-Khijari in 1669-70—a small portion of which from the MS. in the Ducal Library at Goa, has been published by Tuch, with Translation, etc. (Leipzig, Vogel, 1830)—are said to contain a minute description of the Mosque (Tuch, p. 2).

A few words about the exterior, a sketch of the masonry, and a view of the town, showing the inclosure standing prominently in the foreground, will be found in Bartlett's Visits, etc., 216-219. A photograph of the exterior, from the East (?) is given as No. 63 of Palestine as it is, by Rev. G. W. Bridges. A ground-plan exhibiting considerable detail, made by two Moslem architects who lately superintended some repairs in the Haram, and given by them to Dr. Horner of Jerusalem, is engraved in Oskon's Pol. Post and Present, p. 364.

* It is since the above article was written that this Moslem sanctuary over the cave of Machpeleh was visited and entered by the Prince of Wales and some of his attendants. We are indebted to Dean Stanley, who accompanied the party on that occasion for an interesting report of this visit (Somea in to the East, etc., p. 141 ff.) of which we make the following abstract:—

To overcome the difficulties which the fanaticism of the inhabitants of Hebron might place in the way of even a royal approach to the inclosure, a Firman was first requested from the Porte. But the government at Constantinople cautiously gave them only a discretionary letter of recommendation to the Governor of Jerusalem. It was necessary therefore to obtain the sanction of this intermediate functionary. This was not easily done. The Turkish governor not only had his own scruples with reference to such a profanation of the sacred place, but feared the personal consequences which he might suffer from the bigotry of the Mohammedans. After a refusal at first and much hesitation he consented, as an act of national courtesy, that the Prince should make the attempt to enter the Mosque (to guarantee his safety was out of the question), but unaccompanied either by two or three of his suite who were specially interested as savans and antiquaries.

The day of the arrival at Hebron was the 7th of April, 1862. They passed into and through the town strongly escorted, through streets deserted of Jerusalem; the sunken part round the edges (absurdly called the "bevel") very shallow, with no resemblance at all to more modern "rustic work." (3) The cross-joints are not always vertical, but some are at an angle. (4) The wall is divided by pilaster about 22 ft. in. wide, and 5 ft. apart, running the whole height of the ancient wall. It is very much to be wished that careful large photographs were taken of these walls from a near point. The writer is not aware that any such ye'ar exist.

except by the soldiery, whose presence was necessary to guard against any fanatical attempt to avenge the supposed sacrilegious act. Arriving within the enclosure, they were ceremoniously received by the representatives of the four hereditary guardians of the Mosque, into which they were immediately shown. The architecture of this plainly indicates its original use as a Christian church. The tombs, or rather cenotaphs which cover the actual sepulchres of the patriarchs, are inclosed each within a separate shrine closed with gates. On the right of the inner portico before entering the main building, is the shrine of Abraham, and on the left that of Sarah, each closed with silver gates. The shrine of Abraham, after some manifestations of dehoy and of grief on the part of the guardians, was thrash open. It is described as a coiff-like structure, about six feet high, built of plastered stone or marble, and hung with three green carpets embroidered with gold. The shrine of Sarah, as of the rest of the women, they were requested not to enter. Within the mosque are the tombs of Isaac and Rebekah, under separate chapels with windows in the walls, and inclosed with iron instead of silver gates. The shrines of Jacob and Leah in recesses corresponding to those of Abraham and Sarah, but opposite to the entrance of the mosque, are in a separate cloister inclosed with iron gates, through which may be seen two green banners resting against Leah's tomb, the meaning of which is unknown. The general structure of Jacob's tomb resembles that of Abraham, but the carpets are coarser.

The correspondence of these monuments with the Biblical narrative is remarkable, in view of Moslem ignorance and prejudice, and precludes the idea of a fanciful distribution of them. For, in the first place, the prominence given to Isaac is contrary to their prejudice in favor of Ishmael; and again, if they had followed mere probabilities, Rachel would have occupied the place of the less favored Leah.

Besides these six shrines, in a separate chamber reached by an aperture through the wall, is the shrine of Joseph, the situation of which varies from the Biblical account, but is in accordance with the tradition of the country, supported perhaps by an alleged tradition of Joseph himself. The effect that the body of Joseph, though first buried at Shechem, was afterwards brought to Hebron. There are also two ornamental shrines on the northern side of the mosque. But no traces of others were seen within the inclosure.

To the cave itself there was no access. One indication of it in the shape of a circular hole at the corner of the shrine of Abraham, about eight inches across, one of the upper part built of strong masonry, but the lower part of the living rock, was alone visible. This aperture has been left in order to allow the sacred air of the sepulchre to escape into the Mosque, and also to allow a lamp to be suspended by a chain and burn over the grave. Even this lamp was not lighted because, as they said, the saint did not like to have a lamp in his daylight." Whether the Moslems themselves are acquainted with any other entrance is doubtful.

The reader will find the same information also in Stanley's Jerusalem (Cres, i. Appendix ii. pp. 552 ff. A plan of the mosque accompanies the narrative. On the purchase of the cave of Machpehah, see Ephraim (Anmer. ed.). Of the antiquity of the site, says Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 385, "1 have no doubt."") We have the human remains of the identical cave, in which these patriarchs, with their wives, were reverently gathered "unto their people," one after another by their children. . . . Such a cave may last as long as the 'everlasting hills' of which it is a part; and from that to this day it has so come to pass, in the providence of God, that no nation or people has had possession of Machpehah who would have been disposed to disturb the ashes of the illustrious dead within it."

MACRON (Machair: Moser, the surname of Pourvoune, or Pollone, the son of Deymenes (1 Macc. iii. 38) and governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy Philometor (2 Macc. x. 12).)

MADAI (2 syl. (מַדָּי Mada'i; Alex. Māḏān Ḫaθairi; Madai), which occurs in Gen. x. 2 (and 1 Chr. i. 5) among the list of the sons of Japhet, has been commonly regarded as a personal appellation: and most commentators call Madai the third son of Japhet, and the progenitor of the Medes. But it is extremely doubtful whether, in the mind of the writer of Gen. x., the term Madai was regarded as representing a person. That the genealogies in the chapter are to some extent ethnic is universally allowed, and may be seen even in our Authorized Version (ver. 16-18). And as Gezer, Megg. Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, which are conjoined in Gen. x. 2 with Madai, are elsewhere in Scripture always ethnic and not personal appellatives (Ex. xxvii. 13, xxxvii. 6, xxxix. 6; Dan. viii. 21; Joel iii. 6; Ps. cxv. 5; Is. lxvii. 19, &c.), so it is probable that they stand for nations rather than persons here. In that case no one would regard Madai as a person; and we must remember that it is the exact word used elsewhere throughout Scripture for the well-known nation of the Medes. Probably therefore all that the writer intends to assert in Gen. x. 2 is, that the Medes, as well as the Gomerites, Greeks, T uberai, Moschi, etc., descended from Japhet. Modern science has found that, both in physical type and in language, the Medes are to be regarded as the family of the Gimir of the Assyrians, which embraces the Cymri and the Greco-Romans. (See Pritchard's Phys. Hist. of Mankind, iv. 6-50; Ch. x. § 24-1; and comp. the article on the Medes.)

MADIAN (Madi: Madioun; Alex. Isaou Madioun; [Ab]. Madioun). The sons of Madian, according to 1 Esdr. v. 59, were among the Levites who superintended at the restoration of the Temple under Zorobabel. The name does not occur in the para. narrative of Ezr. iii. 9, and is also omitted in the Vulgate; nor is it easy to conjecture the origin of the interpolation. Our translators followed the reading of the Alیدine edition.

MADMANNAH (מַדָּם מַדָּם: Madama; [Ab]. Madiam; Rom. Macada). This place, Madam, was the residence of the Amalekites, as was Madia (Judg. xiv. 5, 33), and is named closely the ordinary LXX. text: compare also MADMANNAH.
with Hornah, Zhikad, and other remote places, and therefore cannot be identical with the Madmanah of Isaiah. To Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon, * Medeian），it appears to have been well known. It was called in their time “Madmenah” and was not far from Gaza. The first stage southward from Gaza is now el-Minya (Rob. i. 692), which, in default of a better, is suggested by Kiepert (in his *Top., 1856) as the modern representative of Menoils, and therefore of Madmanah.

In the genealogical lists of 1 Chron., Madmanah is derived from Calh-ben-Hezron through his grandson Menahah, whose son Shuaah is recorded as the founder of the town (ii. 49).

For the termination compare the neighboring place Sansannah.

MAD' MEN (מָדִמֶנָה) [dunghill]: a niu'esi, a place in Moab, threatened with destruction in the denunciations of Jeremiah (xlvii. 2), but not otherwise known, of which nothing is yet known.

G.

MADmenah (מָדִמֶנָה) [as above].

MAD'Nエン: Medeena, one of the Benjamite villages north of Jerusalem, the inhabitants of which were frightened away by the approach of Sennacherib along the northern road (Is. x. 31). Like others of the places mentioned in this list, Madmenah is not elsewhere named; for to MADMANAH and MADMEN it can have no relation. Gesenius (Jesuvi, p. 414) points out that the verb in the sentence is active — "Madmenah dies;" not, as in A. V., "is removed" (so also Michaelis, Bibel fur Ungelernten).

Madmenah is not improperly alluded to by Isaiah (xxv. 10) in his denunciation of Moab, where the word rendered in A. V. "dunghill" is identical with that name. The original text (or Cethib), by a variation in the preposition (בַּע and בַּע), reads the "waters of Madmenah." If this is so, the reference may be either to the Madmenah of Benjamin — one of the towns in a district abounding with corn and threshing-floors — or more appropriately still to MADMEN, the Moabite town. Gesenius (Jesuvi, p. 789) appears to have overlooked this. It was in this way that the name was probably derived, and in the favor of this suggestion there seems to have been first made by John Kitcheh.

G.

The places on the march of Sennacherib to Jerusalem have usually been supposed to occur in a direct line; on this supposition Madmenah must have stood between Gibeath of Saul and Nob. But the army possibly may have moved in parallel columns, and thus some of the places mentioned have been lateral to each other and not successive. [Note.] For an elaborate defense of this theory on topographical grounds, the reader may see Dr. Valentin’s art. entitled Beltragn zur Topographie des Stammes Benjamin, in Zeitschr. der Jeclach, Mayr, Geschicht, xii. 164 ff., 169). H.

MADNESS. The words rendered by "mad;" "madman;" "madness;" etc., in the A. V., vary considerably in the Hebrew of the O. T. In Deut. xxvii. 23, 34, 1 Sam. xxi. 13, 14, 15, &c. (Scripture, etc., in the LXX.), they are derivatives of the root פָּנַשׁ, "to be stirred or excited;" in Jer. xxv. 18, i. 38, ii. 7, Ex. i. 17, &c. (περιμασία, LXX.), from the root פָּנַשׁ, "to flash out," applied (like the Greek φανείον) either to light or sound; in Is. xlv. 23, from פָּנַשׁ, "to make void or foolish" (πανασθίου, LXX.); in Zech. xii. 4, from פָּנַשׁ, "to wander" (πανασθίου, LXX.). In the N. T. they are generally used to render μανιαίως or ἁπασθιός (as in John x. 20; Acts xxvi. 24; 1 Cor. iv. 23); but in 2 Pet. ii. 10 the word is παρασθιοιο, and in Luke vi. 11 ἁπασθιοι. These passages show that in Scripture "madness" is recognized as a derangement, proceeding either from weakness and misdirection of intellect, or from unoverseemly violence of passion; and in both cases it is spoken of, sometimes as arising from the will and action of man himself, sometimes as inflicted judicially by the hand of God. In one passage alone (John x. 20) is madness expressly connected with demoniacal possession, by the Jews in their evil against our Lord [see DEMONIACS]; in none is it referred to any physical causes. It will easily be seen how entirely this usage of the word is accordant to the general spirit and object of Scripture, proceeding from physical causes, and dwelling on the moral and spiritual influences, by which men's hearts may be affected, either from within or from without.

It is well known that among oriental, as among most semi-civilized nations, madmen were looked upon with a kind of reverence, as possessed of a quasi-sacred character. This arises partly no doubt from the feeling, that on whom God's hand is laid heavily, should be safe from all other harm; but partly also from the belief that the loss of reason and self-control opened the mind to supernatural influence, and gave it therefore a supernatural sacredness. This belief was strengthened by the enthusiastic expression of idolatrous worship (see 1 K. xviii. 26, 28), and (occasionally) of real inspiration (see 1 Sam. xix. 21-24; comp. the application of "mad fellow" in 2 K. ix. 11, and see Jer. xxix. 21; Acts ii. 13). An illustration of it may be seen in the record of David's pretended madness at the court of Achish (1 Sam. xxi. 13-15), which shows it to be not inconsistent with a kind of contemptuous forbearance, such as is often manifested now, especially by the Turks, towards real or supposed madmen.

A. B.

MADON (מַדּון) [contention, strife]: Rom. Μανόν; Vat.] Μανών: Alex. Μανόν, Μάνων [?]; Madon), one of the principal cities of Canaan before the conquest. Its king joined Jabin and his confederates in their attempt against Joshua at the waters of Merom, and like the rest was killed (Josh. xii. 1, xii. 19). No later mention of it is found, and beyond the natural inference drawn from its occurrence with Hazor, Shimron, etc., that it was in the north of the country, we have no clues to its position. Schweers (90) proposes to discover Madon at Kefer Menba, a village with extensive ancient remains, at the western end of the Plain of Bathruf, 4 or 5 miles N. of Sephoris. His grounds for the identification are of the slightest: (a) the frequent transposition of letters in Arabic, and (b) a statement of the early Jewish traveller hap-Parchei (Asher's "Hist. of Tudea," 340), that the Arabs identify Kefer Mendi with Moladan, or, as Schwarzs would read it, Madan. The reader may judge for himself what worth there is in these suggestions.

In the LXX. version of 2 Sam. xxii. 20 the Hebrew words הַדָּם תִּנְסֵא, "a man of stature," are rendered ἄρπα Μαδαβα, "a man of Madan." This may refer to the town Madon, or may be merely an instance of the habit which these translators had of rendering literally in Greek letters Hebrew words which they did not understand. Other instances will be found in 2 K. vi. 8, ix. 13, xii. 9, xv. 10, &c., &c.

G. MAELUS (Małysz; [Vat. Malys]; Michal), for MIAMIN (1 Esdr. ix. 26; comp. Ezr. x. 25).

* MAG'DALAN. [MAGDALAH].

MAG'DISH (מגּדיש [a gathering, Ges.]; Marybix; [Vat. Marybix]; Magedin). A proper name in Ezr. ii. 30, but whether of a man or of a place is doubted by some; it is probably the latter, as all the names from Ezr. ii. 29 to 34, except Ham and Harim, are names of places. The meaning of the name too, which appears to be "freezing" or "congealing," seems better suited to a place than a man. One hundred and fifty-six of its inhabitants, called the children of Maglish, are included in the genealogical roll of Ezr. ii., but have fallen out from the parallel passage in Neh. vii. Maglish, however, is named (Neh. x. 29), as one of those who sealed the covenant, where Anathoth and Nebol (Nebai) also appear in the midst of proper names of men. Why in these three cases the names of the places are given instead of those of the family, or home, or individual, as in the case of all the other signatures, it is impossible to say for certain, though many reasons might be guessed. From the position of Maglish in the list in Ezr. ii., next to Bethel, Ai, and Nebo, and before Lod, Hoad, Ono, and Jericho, it would seem to be in the tribe of Benjamin. A. C. H.

MAG'DALA (Magdah; in MSS. B, D, and Sinait. — A being defective in this place; but Rec. Text. Marydela; St. Marydah; Vulg. Magdoyle). The name Magdala does not really exist in the Bible. It is found in the received Greek text and the A. V. of Matt. xv. 39 only; but the chief MSS. and versions exhibit the name as Magadan.

Into the limits of Magadan Christ comes by boat, over the lake of Gennesaret, after his miracle of feeding the four thousand on the mountain of the eastern side (Matt. xxv. 39); and from thence, after a short conference with the Pharisees and Sadducees, he returned in the same boat to the opposite shore. In the present text of the parallel narrative of St. Mark (viii. 10) we find the "ports of Dalmanutha," though in the time of Eusebius and Jerome the tw. were in agreement, both reading Megadan, as Mark still does in Codex D. They place it "round Gerasa" (Onomasticon, sub voce) as if the Magedo or Magday of Maceabees; but this is not in accordance with the requirements of the narrative, which indicates a place close to the water, and on its western side. The same, as far as distance is concerned, may be said of Megiddo — in its Greek form, Megedo, or, as Josephus spells it, Magedo — which, as a well-known locality of Lower Galilee, might not unnaturally suggest itself.

Dalmanutha was probably at or near Aiin el-Ba'reich, about a mile below el-Mijbil, on the western edge of the lake of Gennesaret. El-Mijbil is doubtless the representative of an ancient Migdal or Magdala, possibly that from which St. Mary came. Her native place was possibly not far distant from the Magdalan of our Lord's history, and we can only suppose that, owing to the familiar recurrence of the word Magdalen, the less known name was absorbed in the better, and Magdala usurped the name, and possibly also the position of Magadan. At any rate it has prevented any search being made for "the name, which may very possibly still be discovered in the country, though so strangely superseded in the records."

The Magdala which conferred her name on "Mary the Magdalene" (M. ḫ Magdalēn), one of the numerous Migdols, i. e. towers, which stood in Palestine — such as the Miqdal-el, or tower of God, in Naphtali, the Miqdad-gad and Miqdalgad of Judah — probably the place of that name which is mentioned in the Jerusalem Talmud as near Tiberias (Ohlo, Leg. Buba, 323; Schwartz, 189), and this again is as probably the modern el-Mijbil, "a miserable little Muslim village," rather more than an hour, or about three miles, above Tibr'lech, lying on the water's edge at the southeast corner of the plain of Gennesaret (Rob. ii. 286, 287). Professor Stanley's description seems to embrace every point worth notice. "Of all the numerous towns and villages in what must have been the most thickly peopled district of Palestine one only remains. A collection of a few hovels stands at the southeast corner of the plain of Gennesaret, its name hardly altered from the ancient Magdala or Migdol, so called probably from a watch-tower, of which ruins appear to remain, that guarded the entrance to the plain. Through its connection with her whom in the long tradition of the church identified with the penitent sinner, the name of that ancient tower has now been incorporated into all the languages of Europe. A large solitary thorn-tree stands beside it. The situation otherwise unmarked, is dignified by the high limestone rock which overhangs it on the southwest, perforated with caves; recalling, by a curious though the Magdala, or Magday, as the place of the long tradition of the church identified with the penitent sinner, the name of that ancient tower has now been incorporated into all the languages of Europe. The original form of the name may have been Migron; at least so we may infer from the LXX. version of Migran, which is Magdo or Magdon.

The statement of the Talmud is, that a person proud to be a Magdalan could not bear the presence of the eunuch in Tiberias. At three miles distance this would not be impossible in Palestine, where sound travels a distance far greater than in this country. [See Rob. iii. 17; Stanley, N. & P.; Thomson, Land and Esk.]
I. The position occupied by the Magi in the history of the O. T.

II. The transition stages in the history of the name and of the order between the close of the O. T. and the time of the N. T., so far as they affect the latter.

III. The Magi as they appear in the N. T.

IV. The later traditions which have gathered round the Magi of Matt. ii.

1. In the Hebrew text of the O. T. the word occurs but twice, and then only incidentally. In Jer. xxxix. 3 and 11 we meet, among the Chaldaean officers sent by Nebuchadnezzar to Jerusalem, one with the name or title of Rab-Mag (םלועב). This word is interpreted, after the analogy of Rab-shakeel and Rab-saris, as equivalent to chief of the Magi (Ewald, Freytag, and Hitzig, in loc., taking it as the title of Nergal-Saraezer), and we thus find both the name and the order occupying a conspicuous place under the government of the Chaldeans. Many questions of some difficulty are suggested by this fact.

Historically the Magi are conspicuous chiefly as a Persian religious caste. Herodotus connects them with another people by reckoning them among the six tribes of the Medes (i. 101). They appear in his history as enemies, and as interpreters of dreams (i. 129), the name having apparently lost its ethnological and acquired a caste significance. But in Jeremiah they appear at a still earlier period among the retinue of the Chaldean king. The very word Rab-Mag (if the received etymology of Magi be correct) presents a hybrid formation. The first syllable is unquestionably Semitic, the last is all but unquestionably Aryan. The problem thus presented admits of two solutions: (1.) If we believe the Chaldeans to have been a Humite people, closely connected with the Babylonians (CHALDEANS), we must then suppose that the colossal schemes of greatness which showed themselves in Nebuchadnezzar's conquests led him to gather round him the wise men and religious teachers of the nations which he subdued, and that thus the sacred tribe of the Medes rose under his rule to favor and power. (2.) The remnant of those who bore a like character among the Jews (Dan. i. 4) makes this hypothesis a natural one; and the alliance which existed between the Medes and the Chaldeans at the time of the overthrow of the old Assyrian empire would account for the intermixture of religious systems belonging to two different races. (2.) If, on the other hand, with Renan (Histoire des Langues & Nationes, pp. 68, 67), following Lassen and Ritter, we look on the Chaldeans as themselves belonging to the Aryan family, and possessing strong affinities with the Medes, there is even less difficulty in explaining the presence among the one people of the religious teachers of the other. It is likely enough, in either case, that the simpler Median religion which the Magi brought with them, corresponding more or less closely to

In the Persian dialect of the Zend, Magi = priest (Hylas, Euseb. Vita Pers., c. 21); and this is connected by philologists with the Sanskrit, makat (great, μεγάς), and magus (Gesenius, s. v. מגע ; Aquilius de Persico's Zendavesta, ii. 555). The coinage of a Sanskrit maga, in the sense of a illusion, magic, is remarkable; but it is probable that this, as well as the ambiguous Greek word, is derived rather than the original meaning (comp. Ebeling, Dezeichnung der Sprachen, ed Kaitschnick, p. 321). Hyde (loc. c.) notices another etymology, given by Arabian authors, which makes the word = crypt-exed (parambus unparis), but rejects it. Prideaux, on the other hand (Conнеction, under c. 522), accepts it, and seriously connects it with the story of the Pseudo-Serapis who had lost his ears in Wonder, i. 9. Spahnbek (Deb. Erenyi, xii. 62), speaks favorably, though not decisively of a Hebrew etymology.
the faith of the Zendavesta, lost some measure of its original purity through this contact with the darker superstitions of the old Babylonian population. From this time onward it is noticeable that the names both of the Magi and Chaldæans are identified with the astrologers, divination, interpretation of dreams, which had impressed themselves on the prophets of Israel as the most characteristic features of the old Babylonia religion (Is. xliv. 23, xlvii. 14). The Magi took their places among "the astrologers and star-gazers and monthly prognosticators." It is with such men that we have to think of Daniel and his fellow-exiles as associated. They are described as "ten times wiser than all the magicians (LXX. μαγους) and astrologers" (Dan. i. 29). Daniel himself so far sympathizes with the order into which he is thus, as it were, enrolled, as to intercede for them when Nebuchadnezzar gives the order for their death (Dan. ii. 24), and accepts an office which, as making him "master of the magicians, the astrologers, Chaldæans, soothsayers" (Dan. v. 11), was probably identical with that of the Ral-Mug who first came before us. May we conjecture that he found in the belief which the Magi had brought with them some elements of the truth that had been revealed to his fathers, and that the way was thus prepared for the strong sympathy which showed itself in a hundred ways when the purest Aryan and the purest Semitic faiths were brought face to face with each other (Dan. vi. 3, 16, 26; Eizr. i. 1-4; Is. xlv. 28), agreeing as they did in their hatred of idolatry and in their acknowledgment of the "God of Heaven"? The name of the Magi does not meet us in the Biblical account of the Medo-Persian kings, but, however, we identify the Artaxerxes who stops the building of the Temple (Ezr. iv. 17-22) with the Pseudo-Socrates of Herodotus (Artaxerxes) and the Gomates of the Behistun inscription, we may see here also another point of contact. The Magian attempt to resurrect Median supremacy, and with it probably a corrupted Chaldæan form of Magianism, in place of the purer faith in Ormuzd of which Cyrus had been the propagator, would naturally be accompanied by antagonism to the people whom the Persians had protected and supported. The immediate renewal of the suspended work on the triumph of Darius (Ezr. iv. 24, v. 1, 2, vi. 7, 8) falls in, it need hardly be added, with this hypothesis. The story of the actual massacre of the Magi throughout the dominions of Darius read the commemorative Magophonia (Herod.). They with whatever exaggerations it may be necessary indicates in like manner the triumphs of the Astartian system. If we accept the traditional date of Zoroaster as a contemporary of Darius, we may see in the changes which he effected a revival of the older system. It is at any rate striking that the word Magi does not appear in the Zendavesta, the priests being there described as Atharva (Guardians of the Fire), and that there are multiplied prohibitions in it of all forms of the magic which, in theory, would be possible in the East also, took its name from them, and with which, it would appear, they had already become tainted. All such arts, auguries, necromancy, and the like, are looked on as evil, and emasculated by Abrimmon, and are pursued by the hero-king Fereidoum with the most persistent hostility (Du Perron, Zendavesta, vol. i. part 2, pp. 268, 424). The name, however, kept its ground, and with it probably the order to which it was attached. Under Xerxes, the Magi occupy a position which indicates that they had recovered from their temporary depression. They are consulted by him as soothsayers (Herod. vii. 19), and are as influential as they had in the court of Astyages. The strangely and terrible sacrifices at the Strymon and the Nine Ways (Herod. vii. 114). They were said to have urged the destruction of the temples of Greece (Cic. De Legg. ii. 10). Traces of their influence may perhaps be seen in the regard paid by Mardonius to the oracles of the Greek god that offered the nearest analogue to their own Mithras (Herod. viii. 134), and in the like reverence which had previously been shown by the Median Datis towards the island of Lelles (Herod. vi. 97). They came before the Greeks as the representatives of the religion of the Persians. No sacrifices may be offered unless one of their order is present chanting the prescribed prayers, as in the ritual of the Zendavesta (Herod. i. 332). No great change is traceable in their position during the decline of the Persian monarchy. The position of Judas as a Persian prophet must have kept up some measure of contact between the two religious systems. The histories of Esther and Nehemiah probably in some manner traced back by members of the subject race. It might well be that the religious minds of the two nations would learn to respect each other, and that some measure of the prophetic hopes of Israel might mingle with the "... (Jowett's translation of the Behistun inscription): "The rite which Gomates the Magian had introduced I prohibited. I restored to the state the clients, and the worship, and to those families which tolerated the Magian had deprived of them.""

"The opinion that Zoroaster otherwise Zenduzuit, or Zardanist, and his work belonged to the 6th century, is derived chiefly on the mention in his life and in the Zendavesta of a king king, who has been identified with Hystaspes, the father of Darius Hyle, c. 24: Du Perron, Zendavesta, c. 29. On the other hand, the name of Zoroaster does not appear in any of the monumental or historical notices of Darius and Bactria, rather than Persia, appears as the scene of his labors. The Magi, at any rate, appear as a distinct order, and with a definite faith, before this time; and his work in reference to them, if contemporary with Darius, must have been that of the restorer rather than the founder of a system. The hypothesis of two Zoroasters is hardly more than an attempt to dissimulate the conflicting traditions that cluster round the same, so as to give some degree of historical credibility to each group. Most of these traditions lie outside the range of our present inquiry, but one or two come within the horizon of Biblical legend, if not of Biblical history. Unable to account for the truth they recognised in his system, except on the hypothesis that it had been derived from the faith of Israel, Christian and Mohammedan writers have seen in him the disciple of one of the prophets of the O. T. The ier Hahnz, the friend and disciple of Jeremias, some unanswerable dis- ciplets of this, i.e., as it may round have, in each his turn, been identified with the Ebranian sage. His name will meet us again in connection with the Magi of the N. T. (Hyde, i. c. Prideaux, Com., a. c. 521-495)" belief of the Magi. As an order they perpetuated themselves under the Parthenic kings. The name rose to fresh honor under the Sassanides. The classification which was ascribed to Zoroaster was recognized as the basis of a hierarchical system, after other and lower elements had mingled with the earlier Dualism, and might be traced even in the religion and worship of the Persians. According to this arrangement the Magi were divided — by a classification which has been compared to that of bishops, priests, and deacons — into disciples (Harbeds), teachers (M obese), and the more perfect teachers of a higher wisdom (Estur Magi). This division of the sacred class (Bar-jesus) is described (Acts xiii. 8) as having, in his cognomen Elymas, a title which was equivalent to Magnus. 4

Elymas.

In one memorable instance, however, the word remains (probably, at least) its better meaning. In the Gospel of St. Matthew, written (according to the general belief of early Christian writers) for the Hebrew Christians of Palestine, we find it, not as embodying the contempt which the franks of impostors had brought upon it through the whole Roman empire, but in the sense in which it had had, of old, as associated with a religion which they respected, and an order of which one of their own prophets had been the head. In spite of Patriotic authorities on the other side, asserting the Μάγοι ἀπὸ ἀποτομῶν of Matt. ii. 1 to have been sorcerers whose mysterious knowledge came from below, not from above, and who were thus translated out of darkness into light (Just. Martyr, Chrysostom, Theophylact, in Spanheim, Dab. Evang. xix.; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Matt. ii.), we are justified, not less by the consensus of later interpreters (including even Maldonatus) than by the general tenor of St. Matthew's narrative, in seeing in them men such as those that were in the minds of the LXX. translators of Daniel, and those described by Philo — at once astronomers and astrologers, but not mingling any conscious fraud with their efforts after a higher knowledge. The vagueness of the description leaves their country undefined, and implies that probably the Evangelist himself had no certain information. The same phrase is used as in passages where the express object is to include a wide range of country within the domain of the Magi, as in Matt. ii. 11, xiv. 27; Luke xii. 20. Probably the region chiefly present to the mind of the Palestine Jew would be the tract of country stretching eastward from the Jordan to the Euphrates, the land of "the children of the East" in the early period of the history of the O. T. (Gen. xxiv. i; Judg. vi. 3, vii. 12, xii. 10). It should be remembered, however, that the language of the O. T., and therefore probably that of St. Matthew, had included under this name countries that lay considerably to the north as well as to the east of Palestine.

Bahram came from "the mountains of the east," i.e. from Pethor on the Euphrates (Num. xxiii. 7, xxxii. 5). Aburham (or Cyrus?) is the righteous man raised up "from the east." (Is. xii. 2). The Persian conqueror is called "from the east, from a far country." (Is. xvi. 11).

We cannot wonder that there should have been very varying interpretations given of words that and men of letters might recognize the better meaning of which the word was capable (Cic. De Divin. i. 23, 41), yet in the language of public documents and of historians, they were treated as a class at once hateful and contemptible (Tacit. Ann. i. 32, xii. 27, xiii. 22, xiii. 59), and as such were the victims of repeated edicts of banishment.

III. We need not wonder, accordingly, to find that this is the predominant meaning of the word as it appears in the N. T. The noun and the verb derived from it (μαγεία and μαγεύειν) are used by St. Luke in describing the impostor, who is therefore known distinctively as Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9). The word of the second class (Bar-jesus) is described (Acts xiii. 8) as having, in his cognomen Elymas, a title which was equivalent to Magnus.4

4 The word "Mobeil," a contraction of the fuller form Magovul, is apparently identical with that which appears in Greek as Μάγος.

5 Instead of "sovereign," Acts xiii. 8, 9 (A. V.). allowed so wide a field for conjecture. Some of these are, for various reasons, worth noticing. (1.) The feeling of some early writers that the coming of the wise men was the fulfillment of the prophecy which spoke of the gifts of the men of Sheba and Solon (Is. xxi. 10; 15; comp. Is. ix. 6) led them to fix on Arabia as the country of the Magi (lust. Martyr, Tertullian, Epiphanius, Cyprian, in Spanheim, Dub. Evang. l. c.); and they have been followed by Baronius, Mabillon, Grotius, and Lightfoot. (2.) Others have conjectured Mesopotamia to be the great seat of Chaldaean meteorology (Tertullian, Hom. in Matt. vi. and vii.), or Egypt as the country in which magic was most prevalent (Meyer, ad loc.). (3.) The historical associations of the word led others again, with greater probability, to fix on Persia, and to see in these Magi members of the priestly order, to which the name of right belonged (Chrysostom, Theophylact, Calvin, Osiander, while Hyde (Rel. Pers. l. c.) suggests Parthia, as being at that time the conspicuous eastern monarchy in which the Magi were recognized and honored.

It is perhaps a legitimate inference from the narrative of Matt. ii. that in these Magi we may recognize, as the Church has done from a very early period, the first Gentile worshippers of the Christ. The name, by itself, indeed, applied as it is in Acts xiii. 8, to a Jewish false prophet, would hardly prove this; but the distinctive epithet "from the east," was probably intended to mark them out as different in character and race from the western Magi, Jews, and others, who swarmed over the Roman empire. So, when they come to Jerusalem it is to seek not after "our king" or "the king of Israel," but, as the men of another race might do, after "the king of the Jews." The language of the Old Testament prophets and the traditional interpretation of it are apparently new things to them.

The narrative of Matt. ii. supplies us with an outline which we may legitimately endeavor to fill up, as far as our knowledge enables us, with inference and illustration.

Some time after the birth of Jesus there appeared among the strangers who visited Jerusalem these men from the far East. They were not idolaters. Their form of worship was looked upon by the Jewish people with great toleration and sympathy than that of any other Gentiles (comp. Wisd. xiii. 6, 7). Whatever may have been their country, their name indicates that they would be watchers of the stars, seeking to read in them the destinies of nations. They say that they have seen a star in which they recognize such a prognostic. They are sure that one is born king of the Jews, and they come to pay their homage. It may have been simply that the quarter of the heavens in which the star appeared indicated the direction of Judaea. It may have been that some form of the prophecy of Isaiah that a "star should rise out of Jacob" (Num. xxiv. 17) had reached them, either through the Jews of the Dispersion, or through traditions running parallel with the O.T., and that this led them to recognize its fulfillment (Orig. r. Cels. i. Hom. in Num. xiii.; but the hypothesis is neither necessary nor satisfactory; comp. Elliott, Hulsean Lectures, p. 77). It may have been, lastly, that the traditional predictions ascribed to their own prophet Zoroaster, leading them to expect a succession of three delvers, two working as prophets in the West, and a third as king of the East (Tavernier, Travels, iv. 8), the third (Zosimuth), the greatest of the three, coming to be the head of the kingdom, to conquer Arminian and to raise the dead (Du Perron, Zambaco, i. 2, p. 46; Hyde, e. 31) Elliott, Hulsean Lect. l. c.), and in strange fantastic ways connecting these redeemers with the seed of Abraham (Tavernier, l. c.; and D'Herbelot, Bibliothee Orient, s. v. "Zerdiscus"), had reared their minds to an attitude of expectancy, and that their contact with a people cherishing like hopes on stronger grounds, may have prepared them to see in a king of the Jews, the Oslandersche (Homo Mamli, Hyde, l. c.), or the Zosimuth whom they expected. In any case they shared the "veto et constans opinio" which had spread itself over the whole East, that the Jews, as a people, crushed and broken as they were, were yet destined to arise again to great things.

It is not unlikely that they appeared, occupying the position of Destur-Mobeds in the later Zoroastrian hierarchy, as the representatives of many others who shared the same feeling. They come, at any rate, to pay their homage to the king whose birth was thus indicated, and with the gold and frankincense and myrrh, which were the customary gifts of subject nations (comp. Gen. xi. 11; Is. lx. 16; 1 K. x. 2; 2 Chr. ix. 24; Cant. iii. 6, iv. 14). The arrival of such a company, bound on so strange an errand, in the last years of the tyrannous and distrustful Herod, could hardly fail to attract notice and excite a people, among whom Messianic expectations had already begun to show themselves (Luke ii. 25, 38). "Herod was troubled; and all Jerusalem with him." The Sunehridim was convened, and the question whether the birth was to be born in the usual place, or in Bethlehem. It was in accordance with the subtle, fox-like character of the king that he should pretend to share the expectations of the people in order that he might find in what direction they pointed, and then take whatever steps were necessary to crush them [comp. Herod.]. The answer given, based upon the traditional interpretation of Mic. v. 2, that Bethlehem was to be the birthplace of the Christ, determined the king's plans. He had found out the locality. It remained to determine the time: with what was probably a real belief in astrology, he inquired of them diligently, when they had first seen the star. If he assumed that that was contemporaneous with the birth, he could not be far wrong. The Magi accordingly are sent on to Bethlehem, as if they were but the forerunners of the king's own hommage. As they journeyed they again saw the star, which for a time, it would seem, they had lost sight of, and it guided them on their way. [Comp. Star in the East for this and all other questions connected with its appearance.] The pressure of the crowds, which a fortnight, or four months, or well-nigh two years before, had driven Mary and Joseph to the rude stable of the innkeeper of Bethlehem, had apparently abated, and the Magi entering "the house" (Matt. ii. 11) fell down and paid their hommage and offered their gifts. Once more they receive guidance through the channel which their work and their studies had made familiar to them. From first to last, in Media, in Babylon, in Persia, the Magi had been famous as the interpreters of dreams. That which they received now need not have involved a disclosure of the plans of Herod to them. It was enough that it directed them to "return to their own country another way." With this their history, so far as the N.T. carries us, comes to an end.

It need hardly be said that this part of the Gospel narrative has had to bear the brunt of the attacks of a hostile criticism. The omission of all mention of the Magi in a gospel which enters so fully into all the circumstances of the infancy of Christ as that of St. Luke, and the difficulty of harmonising this incident with those which he narrates, have been urged as at least throwing suspicion on what St. Matthew alone has recorded. The advocate of a "mythical theory" sees in this almost the strongest confirmation of it (Strauss, Leben Jesu, i. p. 272). "There must be prodigies gathering round the cradle of the infant Christ. Other heroes and kings had had their stars, and so must he. He must receive in his childhood the homage of the representatives of other races and creeds. The facts recorded lie outside the range of history, and are not mentioned by any contemporary historian." The answers to these objections may be briefly stated. (1) Assuming the central fact of the early chapters of St. Matthew, no objection lies represented. The story of the delusions and the absence of a work which was spread against the appearance of their being wonderful and improbable. It would be in harmony with our expectations that there should be signs and wonders indicating its presence. The objection therefore postulates the absolute incredibility of that fact, and beds the point at issue (comp. Trench, Note of the Wise Men, p. 124). (2) The question whether this, or any other given narrative connected with the nativity of Christ, bears upon it the stamp of a myth, is therefore one to be determined by its own merits, on its own evidence; and then the case stands thus: A mythical story is characterized for the most part by a large admixture of what is wild, poetical, fantastic. A comparison of Matt. ii. with the Jewish or Mohammedan legends of a later time, or even with the Christian mythology which afterwards gathered round this very chapter, will show how wide is the distance that separates its simple narrative, without ornament, without explanation, from the exuberant luxuriance of those figures (comp. IV below). (3) The absence of any direct confirmatory evidence in other writers of the time may be accounted for, partly at least, by the want of any full chronicle of the events of the later years of Herod. The momentary excitement of the arrival of such travellers as the Magi, or of the slaughter of some score of children, would easily be effaced by the more agitating events that followed (comp. Herodotus). The silence of Josephus is not more conclusive against this fact than it is (assuming the spuriousness of Ant. xviii. 4, § 3) against the fact of the Crucifixion and the growth of the sect of the Nazarenes within the walls of Jerusalem. (4) The more perplexing absence of all mention of the Magi in St. Luke's Gospel may yet receive some probable explanation. So far as we cannot explain it, our ignorance of all, or nearly all, the circumstances of the composition of the Gospels is a sufficient answer. It is, however, at least possible that St. Luke, knowing that the facts related by St. Matthew were already current among the churches, sought rather to add what was not yet recorded. Something too may have been due to the leading thoughts of the two Gospels. St. Matthew, dwelling chiefly on the kingly office of Christ as the Son of David, sees it naturally on the first recognition of that character by the Magi of the East (comp. on the fitness of this Mill, Pantheistic Principles, p. 375). St. Luke, portraying the Son of Man in his sympathy with common men, in his compassion on the poor and humble, dwells as naturally on the manifestation to the shepherds on the hills of Bethlehem. It was no added, that everything tends to show that the latter Evanglist derived the materials for this part of his history more directly from the mother of the Lord, or her kindred, than did the former; and, if so, it is not difficult to understand how she might come to dwell on that which connected itself at once with the eternal blessedness of peace, good-will, salvation, rather than on the homage and the adoration of the earthly kings, and the peace of an earthly kingdom, and had proved to be the prelude to a life of poverty, and to the death upon the cross.

IV. In this instance, as in others, what is told by the Gospel-writers in plain simple words, has become the nucleus for a whole cycle of legends. A Christian mythology has overshadowed that which itself had nothing in common with it. The love of the strange and marvelous, the eager desire to fill up in detail a narrative which had been left in outline, and to make every detail the representative of an idea these, which tend everywhere to the growth of the mythical element within the region of history, fixed themselves, naturally enough, precisely on those portions of the life of Christ where the written records were the least complete. The stages of the facts of the Gospel history may have been mixed up with (1), but the expression of Augustus does not point to anything beyond. Herod's domestic tragedies. The genuineness of (2) is questionable; and both are too remote in time to be of any worth as evidence (comp. W. H. Mill, Pantheistic Principles, p. 373).

a It is perhaps not right to pass over the supposed testimony of heathen authors. These are found (2), in the saying of Augustus, recorded by Macrobius ("It is better to be Herod's swine than his son"), as connected with the slaughter of a child under two years of age. (2) In the remarkable passage of Chalcidius (Comment. in Thomas, vii. § 125), alluding to the star which had heralded the birth not of a conqueror or warrior, but of a divine and righteous king, the of this development present themselves in regular succession.

(1) The Magi are no longer thought of as simply "wise men," members of a sacred order. The proprieties of Ps. lxxii: 1, Is. xlix. 28, lx. 16, must be understood. The name once implied "royal," "royal," "rulers," "kings," or "royal.

This tends more and more to the dominant thought. When the arrival of the Magi, rather than the birth or the baptism of Christ, as the first of his mighty works, comes to be looked on as the great Epiphany of his divine power, the older title of the feast receives as a synonym, almost as a substitute, that of "the Feast of the Three Kings." The number of the Wise Men, which St. Matthew leaves altogether undefined, was arbitrarily fixed. They were three (Leo Magn. Serm. ad Epiph., Book De Collect., 3). Symbolic meanings were found for each of the three gifts. The gold they offered as to a king. With the myrrh they figured the bitterness of the Passion, the emolument for the Burial. With the frankincense they adored the divinity of the Son of God (Suerer, Thes. s. v. Mápny; AVR. Rom. in Epiph. passim). (4) Later on, in a tradition which, though appearing in a western writer, is traceable probably to reports brought back by pilgrims from Italy or the East, the names are added, and Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar, take their place among the objects of Christian reverence, and are honored as the patron saints of travellers. The passage from Bode (ibid Collect.) is, in many ways, interesting, and as it is not commonly quoted by commentators, though often referred to, it may be worth while to give it:

1. Primus ductor natus Melchior qui se ad montes, barbare prœxit et capulis, aurum obtint regi Domini. Secundus nomine Gaspar, juvens urbisilli, rubicundus, thure, quasi Poae obdictione digna, Deum honoravit. Tertius fuscus, integre baritus, Balthassar nomine, per myrrhan simiam hominum mortuorum professor."

We recognize at once in this description the received types of the early pictorial art of Western Europe. It is open to believe that Bode's text was the description, and that the art of his time may be traced to early quasi-dramatic representations of the facts of the Nativity. In any such representations names of some kind would become a matter of necessity, and were probably invented at random. Familiar as the names given by Bode now are to us, there was a time when they had no more authority than Bithiasara, Melchior, and Gathasar (Moroni, Hist. s. e. "Magi"); Magalath, Pan-

...pointing, or from the derivations of a miracle-play type, the account of each such a performance in Trench, Son of the Wise Men, p. 70). The account of the offerings, it will be noticed, does not agree with the traditional hexameter of the Latin Church:

"Gaspar ferit myrrham, quod Melchior, Balthasar aurum."

"Hyde quotes from Bar Bahlul the names of the thirteen who appear in the Eastern traditions. The three which the legends of the West have made famous are not among them.

a Vos autem, o fili mei, ante omnes gentes ortum eis perpétui estis" (Abulpharagius, Dyser. Lib. in Hyde, c. 41).
MAGIC, MAGICIANS

Milan had received the emperor's prefect Eustorgius called for some special mark of favor, and on his consecration as bishop of that city, he obtained for it the privilege of being the resting-place of the precious relics. There the fame of the three kings increased. The prominence given to all the feasts connected with the season of the Nativity—the transfer of the relic of the manger and joy of the old Saturnalia—the setting apart of a distinct day for the commemoration of the Epiphany in the 4th century—a—all this added to the veneration with which they were regarded. When Milan fell into the hands of Frederick Barbarossa (A. D. 1162) the influence of the archbishop of Cologne prevailed on the Emperor to transfer them to that city. The Milaneses, at a later period, consolod themselves by forming a special confraternity for perpetuating their veneration for the Magi by the annual performance of a "Mystery" (Moroni, L. C.); but the glory of possessing the relics of the first Gentile worshippers of Christ remained with Cologne.6 In that proud cathedral which is the glory of Tewtonic art the shrine of the Three Kings has, for six centuries, been shown as the greatest of its many treasures. The taleriiinacle in which the bones of some whose real name and history are lost forever lie enshrinod in honor, bears witness, in its gold and gems, to the faith with which the story of the wanderings of the Three Kings has been received. The reverence has sometimes taken stranger and more grotesque forms. As the patron-saints of travellers they have given a name to the inns of earlier or later date. The names of Melchior, Gaspar, and Baltazar were used as a charm against attacks of epilepsy (Spalding, Dub. Eng. cxxx).

MAGIC, MAGICIANS. The magical arts spoken of in the Bible are those practiced by the Egyptians, the Canaanites, and their neighbors, the Hebrews, the Chaldeans, and probably the Greeks. We therefore begin this article with an endeavor to state the position of magic in relation to religion and philosophy with the several races of mankind.

The degree of the civilization of a nation is not the measure of the importance of magic in its convictions. The natural features of a country are not the primary causes of what is termed superstition in its inhabitants. With nations as with men, and the analogy of Plato in the "Republic," is not always false,—the feelings on which magic fixes its hold are essential to the mental constitution. Contrary as are these assertions to the common opinions of our time, inductive reasoning forbids our doubting them.

With the lowest race magic is the chief part of religion. The Nigrinians, or blacks of this race, show this in their extreme use of amulets and their worship of objects which have no other value in their eyes but as a supposed magical character through the influence of supernatural agents. With the Turanians, or corresponding whites of the same great family,—we use the word whites for a group of nations mainly yellow, in contradistinction to black,—incantations and witchcraft occupy the same place, shamanism characterizing their tribes in both hemispheres. In the days of Herodotus the distinction in this matter between the Nigrinians and the Caucasian population of North Africa was what it now is. In his remarkable account of the journey of the Nasnonian young men,—the Nasons, he it remembered, were "a Libyan race" and dwellers on the northern coast, as the historian here says,—we are told that the adventurers passed through the inhabited maritime region, and the tract occupied by wild beasts, and the desert, and at last came upon a plain with trees, where they were seized by men of small stature who carried them across marches to a town of such men black in complexion. A great river, running from west to east and containing crocodiles, flowed by that town, and all that nation were sorcerers (δείνους ὑποστήνυμοι αὐθρόσυς, γονάτος εἶναί πάντας. ii. 32, 33). It little matters whether the conjecture that the great river was the Niger be true, which the idea adopted by Herodotus that it was the Upper Nile seems to favor; it is quite evident that the Nasonians came upon a nation of Nigrinians beyond the Great Desert and were struck with their fetishism. So, in our own days, the traveller is astonished at the height to which this superstition is carried among the Nigrinians, who have no religious practices that are not of the nature of sorcery, nor any priests who are not magicians, and magicians alone. The strength of this belief in magic in these two great divisions of the human race is shown in the case of each by its having maintained its hold in an instance in which its tenacity must have been severely tried. The ancient Egyptians show their partly-Nigrinian origin not alone in their physical characteristics and language but in their religion. They retained the strange low nature-worship of the Nigrinians, forbiddingly combining it with more intellectual kinds of belief, as they represented their gods with the heads of animals and the bodies of men, and even connecting it with truths which point to a primordial revelation. The Ritual, which was the great treasure of Egyptian belief and explained the means of gaining future happiness, is full of charms to be said, and contains directions for making and for using amulets. As the Nigrinian goes on a journey hung about with amulets, so amulets were placed on the Egyptian's embalmed body, and his soul went on its mysterious way fortified with incantations learnt while on earth. In China, although Buddhism has established itself, and the system of Conflagrism has gained the power its positivism would insure it with a highly-educated people of low type, another belief still maintains itself which there is strong reason to hold to be older than the other two, although it is usually supposed to have been of the same age as Conflagrism; in this theosophic magic is of the highest importance, the distinguishing characteristic by which it is known.

With the Shemites magic takes a lower place. Nowhere is it even part of religion; yet it is looked upon as a powerful engine, and generally unlawful or hateful according to the aid invoked. Among many of the Shemite peoples there linger the remnants of a primitive fetishism. Sacred trees and stones are reverenced from an old superstition, of which they do not always know the meaning, derived from the nations whose place they have taken. Thus fetishism remains, although in a kind of fossil state. The importance of astrology with the Shemites has tended to raise the character of their magic, which deals rather with the discovery of supposed existing influences than with the production of new influences. The only direct association of religion is where priests, as the educated class, have taken the functions of magicians; but this is far different from the case of the Nigerians, where the magicians are the only priests. The Shemites, however, when depending on human reason alone, seem never to have doubted the efficacy of magical arts, yet recourse to their aid was not usually with them the first idea of a man in doubt. Though the case of Saul cannot be taken as applying to the whole race, yet, even with the heathen Shemites, prayers must have been held to be of more value than incantations.

The Iranians assign to magic a still less important position. It can scarcely be traced in the relics of old nature-worship, which they with greater skill than the Egyptians interwove with their more intellectual beliefs, as the Greeks gave the objects of reverence in Arcadia and Crete a place in poetical myths and the Scythianarians united the hard remains of primitive superstition. The character of the ancient belief is utterly gone with the assigning of new reasons for the reverence of its sacred objects. Magic always maintained some hold on men's minds; but the stronger intellects despaired it, like the Roman commander who threw the sacred chickens overboard, and the Greek who defied an adverse omen at the beginning of a great battle. When any, oppressed by the sight of the calamities of mankind, sought to resolve the mysterious problem, they fixed, like Eschylus, not upon the childish notion of a chance government by many conflicting agencies, but upon the older idea of a dominating fate. Men of highly sensitive temperament have always inclined to a belief in magic, and there has therefore been a section of Iranian philosophers in all ages who have paid attention to its practice; but, expelled from religion, it has held but a low and precarious place in philosophy.

The Hebrews had no magic of their own. It was so strictly forbidden by the Law that it could never afterwards have had any recognized existence, save in times of general heresy or apostasy, and the same was doubtless the case in the patriarchal ages. The magical practices which obtained among the Hebrews were therefore borrowed from the nations around. The hold they gained was such as we should have expected with a Shemitic race, making allowance for the discredit thrown upon them by the prohibitions of the Law. From the first entrance into the Land of Promise until the destruction of Jerusalem we have constant glimpses of magic practiced in secret, or resorted to, not above a few places by numbers also by the great. The Talmud abounds in notices of contemporary magic among the Jews, showing that it survived idolatry notwithstanding its original connection, and was supposed to produce real effects. The Kur-an in like manner treats charms and incantations as capable of producing evil consequences when used against a man. It is a distinctive characteristic of the Bible that from first to last it warrants no sanctity or dread. In the Psalms, the most personal of all the books of Scripture, there is no prayer to be protected against magical influences. The believer prays to be delivered from every kind of evil that could hurt the body or the soul, but he says nothing of the machinations of sorcerers. Here and everywhere magic is passed by, or if mentioned, mentioned only to be condemned (comp. Ps. cxvi. 29). Let those who affirm that they see in the Psalms merely human piety, and in the Greek Eclesiastes merely human philosophy, explain the absence in them, and throughout the Scriptures, of the expression of superstitions feelings that are inherent in the Shemitic mind. Let them explain the luxuriant growth in the after-literature of the Hebrews and Arabs, and notably in the Talmud and the Kur-an, of these feelings with no root in those older writings from which that after-literature was derived. If the Bible, the Talmod, and the Kur-an, be but several expressions of the Shemitic mind, differing only through the effect of time, how can this contrast be accounted for? — the very opposite of what obtains elsewhere; for superstitions are generally strongest in the earlier literature of a race, and gradually fade, excepting a condition of barbarism to restore their vigor. Those who see in the Bible a Divine work can understand how a God-taught preacher could throw aside the miserable fears of his race, and boldly tell man to trust in his Maker alone. Here, as in all matters, the history of the Bible confirms its doctrine. In the doctrinal Scriptures magic is passed by with contempt, in the historical Scriptures the reasonableness of this contempt is shown. Whenever the practitioners of magic attempt to conduct the servants of God, they conspicuously fail. Pharœus's magicians how to the Divine power shown in the wonders wrought by Moses and Aaron. Balaam, the great enchantor, comes from afar to curse Israel and is forced to bless them.

In examining the mentions of magic in the Bible, we must keep in view the curious inquiry whether there be any reality in the art. We would at the outset protest against the idea that the use of magic was very prevalent, that the conviction that the seen and unseen worlds were often more manifestly in contact in the Biblical ages than now necessitates a belief in the reality of the magic spoken of in the Scriptures. We do indeed see a connection of a supernatural agency with magic in such a case as that of the damsel possessed with a spirit of divination mentioned in the Acts; yet the agency of certain persons had affected him with a kind of rheumatism.

4 The 13th chapter of the Kur-an was written when Muhammad believed that the magical practices appears to have been involuntary in the dansel, and shrewdly made profitable by her employers. This does not establish the possibility of man being able at his will to use supernatural powers to gain his own ends, which is magic, as such, an absolute triumph. Thus much we premise, lest we should be thought to hold intuitional opinions because we treat the reality of magic as an open question.

Without losing sight of the distinctions we have drawn between the magic of different races, we shall consider the notices of the subject in the Bible in the order in which they occur. It is possible in every case to assign the magical practice spoken of to a particular nation, or, when this can be done, to determine whether it be native or borrowed, and the general absence of details renders any other system of classification liable to error.

The theft and carrying away of Laban's teraphim (גֶּבֶר) by Rachel seems to indicate the practice of magic in Padan-aram at this early time. It appears that Laban attached great value to these objects, from which he was as to the theft, and his determined search for them (Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, 32-35). It may be supposed from the manner in which they were hidden that these teraphim were not very small. The most important point is that Laban calls them his "gods" (ibid. 30, 32), although he was not without belief in the true God (24, 49-53); for this makes it almost certain that we have here not an indication of the worship of strange gods, but the first notice of a superstition that afterwards obtained among those Israelites who added corrupt practices to the true religion. a The derivation of the name teraphim is extremely obscure. Gesenius takes it from an "unusual" root, תְרַפָּה, which he supposes, from the Arabic, probably signified "to live pleasantly" (Thee. s. v.). It may, however, be reasonably conjectured that such a root would have had, if not in Hebrew, in the language whence the Hebræans took it or its derivative, the proper meaning "to dance," corresponding to this, which would then be its true meaning. b We should prefer, if no other derivation be found, to suppose that the name teraphim might mean "givers," or "causers of dancing," with reference either to primitive nature-worship c or its magical rites of the character of shamanism rather than that it signifies, as Gesenius suggests "givers of pleasant life." There seems, however, to be a cognate word, unconnected with the "unusual" root just mentioned, in ancient Egyptian, whence we may obtain a conjectural derivation. We do not of course trace the worship of teraphim to the sojourn in Egypt. They were probably those objects of the pre-Abrahamic idolatry, put away by order of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 2-4), yet retained even in Joshua's time (Josh. xiv. 14); and, if so notwithstanding his exhortation, abandoned only for a season (Judg. xiii., xvii.); and they were also known to the Babyloniæ, being used by them for divination (Ez. xxi. 21). There is but great reason for supposing a close connection between the oldest language and religion of Chaldaea, and the ancient Egyptian language and religion. The Egyptian word TER signifies "a shape, type, transformation," c and has for its determinative a mummy: it is used in the Ritual, where the various transformations of the deceased in Hades are described (Todtenbuch, ed. Lepsins, ch. 76 ff.). The small mummy-shaped figure, SIEBTETE, usually made of baked clay covered with a fine vitreous varnish, representing the Egyptian as deceased, is of a nature connecting it with magic, since it was made with the idea that it secured benefits in Hades; and it is connected with the word TER, for it represents a mummy, the determinative of that word, and was considered to be of use in the state in which the deceased passed through transformations, TERU. The difficulty which forbids our doing more than conjecture a relation between TER and teraphim is the want in the former of the third radical of the latter; and in our present state of ignorance respecting the ancient Egyptian and the primitive language of Chaldaea in their verbal relations to the Semitic family it is impossible to say whether it is likely to be explained. The possible connection with the Egyptian religious magic is, however, not to be slighted, especially as it is not improbable that the household idolatri of the Hebrews was mono-theistic worship, and the SIEBTETE was the image of a deceased man or woman, as a mummy, and therefore as an Ostis, bearing the insignia of that divinity, and so in a manner as a deified dead person, although we do not know that it was used in the ancestral worship.

in the fragments ascribed to Sanchoniathon, which, whatever their age and author, cannot be doubted to be genuine, the Baalûtu are characterized in a manner that illustrates this supposition. The Baalûtu, it must be remembered, were sacred stones, the reverence of which in Syria in the historical times was a relic of the early low nature-worship with which fetishism or shamanism is now everywhere associated. The words used, "Everègnê thec Oôárôn Bââlûtu. Baalu ôôcôc kôcôc noôcôc têcôcôc (Cory. Asiat. Disc. p. 12), cannot be held to mean more than that the deity contrived living stones, but the idea of contriving and the term "living" imply motion in these stones.

Egyptologists have generally read this word TER. Mr. Birch, however, reads it CHEUPAR (SIEPER according to the writer's system of transliteration). The basis is decided by the discovery of the Coptic equivalent TOP, "transmutant," in which the absence of the final R is explained by a peculiar but regular modification which the writer was the first to point out (Hieroglyphics Encyclopaedia Brit.-am. 8th ed. p. 421).
of the Egyptians. It is important to notice that no singular is found of the word teraphim, and that the plural form is once used where only one statue seems to be meant (1 Sam. xix. 13, 16); in this instance, it may be a plural without the latter inference be true, this word must have become thoroughly Semiticized. There is no description of these images; but from the account of Michael's stratagem to deceive Saul's messengers, it is evident, if only one image be there meant, as is very probable, that they were at least sometimes of the size of a man, and perhaps in the head and shoulders, if not lower, of human shape, or of a similar form (I. L. 13-16).

The worship or use of teraphim after the occupation of the Promised Land cannot be doubted to have been one of the corrupt practices of those Hebrews who went to idolatry, but did not abandon their belief in the God of Israel. Although the Scriptures draw no marked distinction between those who forsook their religion and those who added to it such corruptions, it is evident that the latter always professed to be orthodox. Teraphim therefore cannot be regarded as among the Hebrews necessarily connected with strange gods, whatever may have been the case with other nations. The account of Michael's images in the Book of Judges, compared with a passage in Hosea, shows our conclusion to be correct. In the earliest days of the occupation of the Promised Land, in the time of anarchy that followed Joshua's rule, Michael, "a man of Mount Ephraim," made certain images and other objects of heretical worship, which were stolen from him by those Danites who took Laish and called it Dan, there setting up idolatry, where it continued the whole time that the ark was at Shiloh, the priests retaining their post "until the day of the captivity of the land" (Judg. xvii. xviii., esp. 30, 31). Probably this worship was somewhat changed, although not in its essential character, when Jeroboam set up the golden calf at Dan. Michael's idolatrous objects were a graven image, a molten image, an ephod, and teraphim (xvii. 3, 4, 5, xviii. 17, 18, 20). In Hosea there is a retrospect of this period where the prophet takes a harlot, and commands her to be faithful to him "many days." It is added: "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image [or "pillar,"  דודל], and without an ephod, and teraphim: afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek Jehovah their God, and David their king; and shall fear Jehovah and His goodness in the latter days" (iii. esp. 4, 5). The apostate people are long to be without their spurious king and false worship, and in the end are to return to their loyalty to the house of David and their faith in the true God. That Dan should be connected with Jeroboam "who made Israel to sin," and with the kingdom whose case it may be used natural; and it is therefore worthy of note that the images, ephod, and teraphim made by Michael and stolen and set up by the Danites at Dan should so nearly correspond with the objects spoken of by the prophet. It has been imagined that the use of teraphim and the similar abominations of the heretical Israelites are not so strongly condemned in the Scriptures as the worship of strange gods. This mistake arises from the mention of these kings who did not suppress the high places, which proves only their timidity, and not any lesser sinfulness in the spurious religion than in tube systems borrowed from the peoples of Canaan and neighboring countries. The cruel rites of the heathen are indeed especially reproved, but the heresy of the Israelites is too emphatically denounced, by Samuel in a passage to be soon examined, and in the repeated condemnation of Jeroboam the son of Nebat who made Israel to sin," for it to be possible that we should take a view of it consistent only with modern sophistry.a

We pass to the magical use of teraphim. By the Israelites they were consulted for oracular answers. This was apparently done by the Danites who asked Michael's Levite to inquire as to the success of their spring expedition (Judg. xviii. 5, 6). In later times this is distinctly stated of the Israelites where Zechaariah says, "to death the workers in spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie, and have told false dreams" (x. 2). It cannot be supposed that, as this first positive mention of the use of teraphim for divination by the Israelites is after the return from Babylon, and as that use obtained with the Babylonians in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, therefore the Israelites borrowed it from their conquerors; for these objects are mentioned in earlier places in such a manner that their connection with divination must be intended, if we hear in mind that this connection is undoubted in a subsequent period. Samuel's reproof of Saul for his disobedience in the matter of Amalek, associates "divination" with "vanity," or "idols" (1 Sam. xxxi), and "teraphim," however we render the difficult passage where these words occur (1 Sam. xx. 22, 23). (The word rendered "vanity," כַּלְכָּל, is especially used with reference to idols, and even in some places stands alone for an idol or idols.) When Jeroboam, in black arts, finding himself rejected of God in his extremity, sought the witch of Ebion, and asked to see Samuel, the prophet's apparition denounced his doom as the punishment of this very disobedience as to Amalek. The reproof would seem, therefore, to have been a prophecy that the self-confident king would at the last alienate himself from God, and take refuge in the very abominations he despised. This apparent reference tends to confirm the inference we have indicated. As to a later time, when Josiah's reform is related, he is said to have put away "the wizards, and the teraphim, and the idols" (2 K. xxii. 24); where the mention of the teraphim immediately after the wizards, and as distinct from the idols, seems to favor the inference that they are spoken of as objects used in divination.

The only account of the art of divining by teraphim is in a remarkable passage of Ezekiel relating to Nebuchadnezzar's advance against Jerusalem. "Also, thou son of man, appoint thee two ways, that the sword of the king of Babylon may come: both twain [two swords] shall come forth out of a Kalisch, in his Commentary on Genesis (pp 533, 534), considers the use of teraphim as a comparatively harmless form of idolatry, and explains the passage in Hosea quoted above as meaning that the Israelites should be deprived not alone of true religion, but even of the resources of their mind household superstitions. He thus entirely misses the sense of the passage and makes the Bible contradictory.

the way, at the head of the two ways, to use divination: he shuffled arrows, he consulted with teraphim, he looked in the liver. At his right hand was the tion together of consulting with teraphim and looking into the liver, may not indicate that the victim was offered to teraphim and its liver then looked into,

but may mean two separate acts of divining.
That the former is the right explanation seems, however;
probable from a comparison with the LXX. rendering of the account of Michael's stratagem. Perhaps Michal had been divining, and on the coming of the messengers seized the image and liver and hastily put them in the bed. — The accounts which the Rabbinus give of divining by ter-aphim are worthless.

Before speaking of the notices of the Egyptian magicians in Genesis and Exodus, there is one passage that may be examined out of the regular order. Joseph, when his brethren left after their second visit to buy corn, ordered his steward to hide his silver cup in Benjamin's sack, and afterwards sent him after them, ordering him to claim it, thus: "Is not this [it] in which my lord drinketh, and whereby Ile divineth?" (Gen. xlv. 5). The meaning of the latter clause has been contested, Gesenius translating, "he could surely foresee it" (ap. Barrett, Synopsis, in loc.), but the other rendering seems far more probable, especially as we read that Joseph afterwards said to his brethren, "Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divinity?" (xiv. 15), — the same word being used. If so, the reference would probable be to the use of the cup in divining, and we should have to infer that here Joseph was acting on his own judgment, divination being not alone doubtful a forbidden act, but one of which he called before Pharaoh had distinctly

Magicians, among the Arabs in the present day, and cups bearing Chaldean inscriptions in ink have been discovered by Mr. Layard, and probably show that this practice existed among the Jews in Babylonia in about the 7th century of the Christian era. In the other use the cup or bowl was of very secondary importance. It was merely the receptacle for water, in which, after the performance of magical rites, a boy looked to see what the magician desired. This is precisely the same as the practice of the modern Egyptian magicians, where the diffERENCE that ink is employed and is poured into the cup of the boy's hand is merely accidental.
A Gnostic papyrus in Greek, written in Egypt in the earlier centuries of the Christian era, now preserved in the British Museum, describes the practice of the boy with a bowl, and alleges results strikingly similar to the alleged results of the well-known modern Egyptian magician, whose divination would seem, therefore, to be a relic of the famous magic of ancient Egypt. As this latter use only is of the nature of divination, it is probable that to it Joseph referred. The practice may have been prevailing in his time, and hieroglyphic inscriptions upon the bowl may have given color to the idea that it had magical properties, and perhaps even that it had thus led to the discovery of its place of concentration, a discovery which must have struck Joseph's brethren with the utmost astonishment.

The Aegyptians of Egypt are spoken of as a class in the histories of Joseph and Moses. When Pharaoh's officers were troubled by their dreams, being in prison they were at a loss for an interpreter. Before Joseph explained the dreams he dismissed the power of interpreting save by the Divine aid, saying, "Do not interpretations [belong] to God? tell me [them], I pray you" (Gen. xi. 8). In like manner when Pharaoh had his two dreams we find that he had recourse to those who professed to interpret dreams. We read:

"He sent and called for all the scribes of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh" (xli. 8; comp. ver.
24). Joseph, being sent for on the report of the chief of the cup-bearers, was told by Pharaoh that he had heard that he could interpret dreams.
Pharaoh said to Joseph, "If thou art able to interpret God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace" (ver. 16). Thus, from the expectations of the Egyptians and Joseph's disavowals, we see that the interpretation of dreams was a branch of the knowledge to which the ancient Egyptian magicians pretended. The failure of the Egyptians in the case of Pharaoh's dreams must probably be regarded as the result of their inability to give a satisfactory explanation, for it is unlikely that they refused to attempt to interpret. The two a The Masoretic text reads, "And Michal took the teraphim, and laid [it] upon the bed, and the mattress (גניא) of she-goats [or goats' hair] she put at its head, and she covered [it] with a cloth " (or garment)

(1 Sam. xix. 13). The LXX. has "the liver of goats," having apparently found לֹא instead of לֹא.

however, considered to be a corruption.

The modern Persians apply the word Ján, signifying a cup, mirror, or even globe, to magical vessels of this kind, and relate marvels of two which they say belonged to their ancient king Jemshid and to Alex-under the Great. The former of these, called Jám-i-Jemmin or Jám-i-Jemshid, is famous in Persian poetry.

D'Herbelot quotes a Turkish poet who thus alludes to this belief in magical cups: "When I shall have been illuminated by the light of heaven my soul will become the mirror of the world, in which I shall discover the most hidden secrets" (Biographique Orientale, a. v. "Glam") words used to designate the interlocutors sent for by Pharaoh are אָשִּׁיָּהוּ, "scribes" (?), and אָשִּׁיָּהוּ, "wise men," a

We again hear of the magicians of Egypt in the narrative of the events before the Exodus. They were summoned by Pharaoh to oppose Moses. The account of what they effected requires to be carefully examined, from its bearing on the question whether magic be an imposture. We read: 9 And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, When Pharaoh shall speak unto you, saying, Show a miracle for you: then shall you say unto Aaron, Take thy rod, and cast [it] before Pharaoh, [and] it shall become a serpent. 10 It is then related that Aaron did thus, and afterwards: 11 Then Pharaoh also called as wise men c and the enchanters: d now they, the scribes c of Egypt, did so by their secret arts: f for they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents, but Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods e (Ex. vii. 8-12). The rods were probably long staves like those represented on the Egyptian monuments, not much less than the height of a man. If the word used mean here a serpent, the Egyptian magicians may have feigned a change: if it signify a crocodile they could scarcely have done so. The names by which the magicians are designated are to be noted. That which we render "scribes" seems here to have a general signification, including wise men and enchanters. The last term is more definite in its meaning, denoting users of incantations. 9 On the occasion of the first plague, the turning the rivers and waters of Egypt into blood, the opposition of the magicians again occurs. 10 And the scribes of Egypt did so by their secret arts (vii. 22). When the second plague, that of frogs, was sent, the magicians again made the same opposition (viii. 7). Once more they appear in the history. The plague of lice came, and we read that when Aaron had worked the wonder the magicians opposed him: 11 And the scribes did so by their secret arts to bring forth the lice, but they could not: so there were lice upon man and upon beast. And the scribes said unto Pharaoh, This [is] the finger of God: but Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said (viii. 18, 19, Heb. 14, 15). After this we hear no more of the magicians. All we can gather from the narrative is that the appearances produced by them were sufficient to deceive Pharaoh on three occasions. It is nowhere declared that they actually produced wonders, since the expression "the scribes did so by their secret arts:" is used on the occasion of their complete failure. Nor is their statement that in the wonders wrought by Aaron they saw the finger of God any proof that they recognized a power superior to the native objects of worship they invoked, for we find that the Egyptians frequently spoke of a supreme being as God. It seems rather as though they had said, "our juggles are of no avail against the work of a divinity." There is one later mention of these transactions, which adds to our information, but does not decide the main question. St. Paul mentions James and Jamies as having "withstood Moses," and says that their folly in doing so became manifest (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9). The Egyptian character of these names, the first of which is, in our opinion, found in hieroglyphics, does not favor the opinion, which seems inconsistent with the character of an inspired record, that the Apostle cited a prevalent tradition of the Jews. [JANES AND JAMES.]

We turn to the Egyptian illustrations of this part of the subject. Magic is a system of incantations and directions for making amulets, with the object of securing the future happiness of the disembodied soul. However obscure the belief of the Egyptians as to the actual character of the state of the soul after death may be to us, it cannot be doubted that the knowledge and use of the magical amulets and incantations treated of in the Ritual was held to be necessary for future happiness, although it was not believed that they alone could ensure it, since to have done good works, or, more strictly, not to have committed certain sins, was an essential condition to the idea that a similar Egyptian word was imitated: instances Abrech, Moses, and behemoth (יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם); but no one of these can be proved to be Egyptian in origin, and there is no strong ground for seeking any but a Hebrew etymology for the second and third (1 Tim. i. 13). The most similar word is Biminum, יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם (Ps. lxxxi. 31, Heb. 22), which we suppose to be Egyptian, meaning Hermopolites, with perhaps, in the one place where it occurs, a reference to the wisdom of the citizens of Hermopolis Magna, the city of Thoth, the Egyptian Hermes, [HARMONIM.] We prefer to keep in the Hebrew derivation simply from יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, and to read "scribes," the idea of magicians being probably understood. The other word, יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, does not seem to mean any special class, but merely the wise men of Egypt generally.

9 The word יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, elsewhere יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם (ver. 22 viii. 7, 18, Heb. 3, 11), signifies "secret" or "hidden arts," from יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, יִבְּהַמֹּת שַׁם, "he or it was vered ever hid, or wrapped up."
at the auspittal of the soul in the great trial in Hades. The thoroughly magical character of the Ritual is most strikingly evident in the minute directions given for making amulets (Tochenbach, sh. 100, 129, 134), and the secrecy enjoined in one case to those thus occupied (133). The later chapters of the Ritual (163-165), held to have been added after the composition or compilation of the rest, which theory, as M. Chalas has well remarked, does not prove their much more modern date (Le Papyrus Magique Harris, p. 162), contain mystical names not bearing an Egyptian etymology. These names have been thought to be Ethiopian: they either have no signification, and are mere magical gibberish, or else they are, mainly at least, of foreign origin. Besides the Ritual, the ancient Egyptians had books of a purely magical character, such as that which M. Chalas has just edited in his work referred to above. The main source of their belief in the efficacy of magic appears to have been the idea that the souls of the dead, whether justified or condemned, had the power of revisiting the earth and taking various forms. This belief is abundantly used in the moral tale of "The Two Brothers," of which the text has been recently published by the Trustees of the British Museum (Select Papyri, Part II.), and we learn from this ancient papyrus the age and source of much of the machinery of medicinal fictions, both eastern and western. A likeness that strikes us at once in the ease of a fiction is not less true of the Ritual; and the perils encountered by the soul in Hades are the first rude indications of the adventures of the heroes of Arab and German romance. The regions of terror traversed, the mystic portals that open alone to magical words, and the monsters whom magic alone can deprive of their power to injure, are here already in the book that in part was found in the reign of king Menæches four thousand years ago. Bearing in mind the Nigritarian nature of Egyptian magic, we may look for the source of these ideas in primitive Africa. There we find the realities of which the ideal form is not greatly distorted, though greatly intensified. The forests that clothe the southern slopes of snowy Atlas, full of fierce beasts; the vast desert, untemanted save by harmful reptiles, swept by sand-storms, and ever burning under an unchanging sun; the marshes of the south, teeming with countless brutes of vast size and strength, are the several zones of the Egyptian Hades. The creatures of the desert and the plains and slopes, the crocodile, the pachyderms, the lion, panther, the gorilla, are the genii that hold this land of fear. If what dread must the first scanty population have held dangers and enemies still feared by their swarming posterity. No wonder then that the imaginative Nigritians were struck with a superstitious fear that certain conditions of external nature always produce with races of a low type, where a higher feeling would only be touched by the analogies of life and death, of time and eternity. No wonder that, so struck, the primitive race imagined the evils of the unseen world to be the recurrence of those against which they struggled while on earth. That there is some ground for our theory, besides the reminiscence which leads us to it, is shown by a usual Egyptian name of Hades, "the West," and that the wild regions west of Egypt might directly give birth to such fancies as form the common ground of the machinery, not the general belief, of the Ritual, as well as of the machinery of medieval fiction, is shown by the fables that the rude Arabs of our own day tell of the wonders they have seen.

Like all nations who have practised magic generally, the Egyptians separated it into a lawful kind and an unlawful. M. Chalas has proved this from a papyrus which he finds to contain an account of the prosecution, in the reign of Rameses III. (B.C. cir. 1220), of an official for unlawfully acquiring and using magical books, the king's property. The culprit was convicted and punished with death (p. 169 ff.).

A belief in unlucky and lucky days, in actions to be avoided or done on certain days, and in the fortune attending birth on certain days, was extremely strong, as we learn from a remarkable ancient calendar (Select Papyri, Part I.) and the evidence of writers of antiquity. A religious prejudice, or the occurrence of some great calamity, probably has the root of this observance of days. Of the former, the birthday of Typhon, the fifth of the Egyptian month, is an instance. Astrology was also held in high honor, as the calendars of certain of the tombs of the kings, stating the positions of the stars and their influence on different parts of the body, show us; but it seems doubtful whether this branch of magical arts is older than the XVIIIth dynasty, although certain stars were held in reverence in the time of the XVth dynasty. The belief in omens probably did not take an important place in Egyptian magic, if we may judge from the absence of direct mention of them. The superstition as to "the evil eye" appears to have been known, but there is nothing else that we can class with phenomena of the nature of animal magnetism. Two classes of learned men had the charge of the magical books: one of these, the name of which has not been read phonetically, would seem to correspond to the "scribes," as we render the word, spoken of in the history of Joseph; whereas the other has the general sense of "wise men," like the other class there mentioned.

There are no representations on the monuments that can be held to relate directly to the practice of this art, but the secret passages in the thickness of the wall, lately opened in the great temple of Denderah, seem to have been intended for some purpose of imposture.

The Law contains very distinct prohibitions of all magical arts. Besides several passages condemning them, in one place there is a specification which is so full that it seems evident that its object is to include every kind of magical art. The reference is to the practices of Canaan, not to those of Egypt, which indeed do not seem to have been brought away by the Israelites, who, it may be remarked, apparently did not adopt Egyptian idolatry, but only that of foreigners settled in Egypt.

The Israelites are commanded, in the place referred to, not to learn the abominations of the peoples of the Promised Land. Then follows this prohibition: "There shall not be found with thee one who offereth his son or his daughter by fire, a practitioner of divinations (מַרְעִי הַבָּדַע), a worker of hidden arts (מַרְעִי הָיוֹת), an augur (מַרְעִי הַנָּבֹע), an enchanter (מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה), or a fabricator of charms (מַרְעִי הַנָּצָר), or an inquirer by a familiar spirit (מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה), or a wizard (מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה), or a consultant of the dead (מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה). It is added that these are abominations, and that on account of their practice the nations of Canaan were to be driven out (Deut. xviii. 9-14, comp. 10, 11). It is remarkable that the offering of children should be mentioned in connection with magical arts. The passage in Mica, which has been supposed to preserve a question of Balak and an answer of Balaam, when the soothsayer was sent for to curse Israel, should be here noticed, for the questioner asks, after speaking of sacrifices of usual kinds, "Shall I give my first-born [for] my transgression, the fruit of my body [for] the sin of my soul?" (vi. 5-8). Perhaps, however, child-sacrifice is specified on account of its atrocity, which would connect it with secret arts, which we know were frequently in later times the causes of cruelty. The terms which follow appear to refer properly to eight different kinds of magic, but some of them are elsewhere used in a general sense. 1. מַרְעִי הַנָּצָר is literally "a diviner of divinations." The verb מִרְעָה is used of false prophets, but also in a general sense for divining, as in the narrative of Saul's consultation of the witch of Endor, where the king says "divine unto me" (משי הינע תאני), I pray thee, by the familiar spirit" (1 Sam. xxviii. 8). 2. מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה conveys the idea of "one who acts covertly," and so "a worker of hidden arts." The meaning of the root הָיָה is covering, and the supposed connection with fascination by the eyes, like the notion of "the evil eye," as though the original root were "the eye" (הָיָה), seems untenable. 3. מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה, which we render "an augur," is from יָנָה, which is literally the "he who hisses or whispers," and in Lev. is applied to the practice of enchantments, but also to divining generally, as in the case of Joseph's cup, and where, evidently referring to it, he tells his brethren that he could divine, although in both places it has been read more vaguely with the sense to foresee or make trial (Gen. xlv. 5, 15). We therefore render it by a term which seems appropriate but not too definite. The supposed connection of יָנָה with יָנָה as "a serpent," as though meaning serpent-divination, must be rejected, the latter word rather coming from the former, with the signification "a hisser." 4. מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה signifies "an enchanter:" the original meaning of the verb was probably "he prayed," and the strict sense of this word "one who uses incantations." 5. מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה seems to mean "a fabricator of material charms or amulets," if מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה, when used of practicing sorcery, means to bind magical knots, and not to bind a person by spells. 6. מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה is "an inquirer by a familiar spirit." The second term signifies a "bottle," a familiar spirit consulted by a soothsayer, and a soothsayer having a familiar spirit. The LXX. usually render the plural מַרְעִי הַנָּצָר by ἡγαρτόν, which has been rashly translated "diviner," for it may not signify what we understand by the latter, but refer to the mode in which soothsayers of this kind gave out their responses: to this subject we shall recur later. The consulting of familiar spirits may mean no more than invoking them; but in the Acts we read of a damsel possessed with a spirit of divination (xxi. 16-18) in very distinct terms. This kind of sorcery — divination by a familiar spirit — was practised by the witch of Endor. 7. מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה, which we render "a wizard," is properly "a wise man," but is always applied to wizards and false prophets. Gesenius (Thes. s. v.) supposes that in Lev. xx. 27 it is used of a familiar spirit, but surely the reading "a wizard" is there more probable. 8. The last term, מַרְעִי הַנַּעֲרָה, is very explicit, meaning "a consultant of the dead:" necromancer is an exact translation if the original signification of the latter is retained, instead of the more general one it now usually bears. In the Law it was commanded that a man or woman who had a familiar spirit, or a wizard, should be stoned (Lev. xx. 27). An "enchantress" (משי הינע) was not to live (Ex. xxii. 18; Heb. xvi.). Using augury and hidden arts was also forbidden (Lev. xix. 26). The history of Balaam shows the belief of some ancient nations in the powers of soothsayers. When the Israelites had begun to conquer the land of Promise, Balak the king of Moab and the elders of Midian, resorting to Pharaon's expediency, sent by messengers with "the rewards of divination" (משי הינע) in their hands" (Num. xxii. 7) for Balaam the diviner (משי הינע), Josh. xiii. 22), whose fame was known to them though he dwelt in Aram. Balak's message shows what he believed Balaam's powers to be: "Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt: behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me: come now therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people: for they [are] too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, [that] we may smite them, and [that] I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that he whom thou blesses [is] blessed: and he whom thou cursest is curse" (Num. xxii. 5, 6). We are told, however, that Balaam, warned of God, first Ex. vi. 21: Ruth iv. 29, &c.), means "enchanter:" it was probably used as a proper name in a vague sense. This meaning suggests the probability that the Arab idea of the evil Jinn having been inclosed in bottles by Solomon was derived from some Jewish tradition.

said that he could not speak of himself, and then by inspiration blessed those whom he had been sent for to curse. He appears to have received the inspiration in a vision or a trance. In one place it is said, "And Balaam saw that it was good in the eyes of the Lord to bless Israel; and he went not, now as before, to the meeting enchanterments (בְּנֵי נֶדֶל), but he set his face to the wilderness" (xxiv. 1). From this it would seem that it was his wont to use enchantments, and that when on other occasions he went away after the sacrifices had been offered, he hoped that he could prevail to obtain the wish of those who had sent for him, but was constantly defeated. The building new altars of the mystic number of seven, and the offering of seven oxen and seven rams, seem to show that Balaam had some such idea; and the marked manner in which he declared "there is no enchantment (שֵׁלֶג) against Jacob, and no divination (כָּבָד) against Israel" (xxiii. 20), that he had come in the hope that they would have availed, the diviner here being made to declare his own powerlessness while he blessed those whom he was sent for to curse. The case is a very difficult one, since it shows a man who was used as an instrument of declaring God's will trusting in purposes of his own, and having availed himself of his divination for his own pleasure. The simplest explanation seems to be that Balaam was never a true prophet but on this occasion, when the enemies of Israel were to be singularly confounded. This history affords a notable instance of the failure of magicians in attempting to resist the Divine will.

The account of Saul's consulting the witch of En-dor is the foremost place in Scripture of those who appear to have received the spirit of divination, with which it is full cannot however be proved to be due to this art, for it has always been held by sober critics that the appearing of Samuel was permitted for the purpose of declaring the doom of Saul, and not that it was caused by the incantations of a sorceress. As, however, the narrative is allowed to be very difficult, we may look for a moment at the evidence of its authenticity. The details are strictly accordant with the account of the last time; there is a simplicity in the manners described that is foreign to a later time. The circumstances are agreeable with the rest of the history, and especially with all we know of Saul's character. Here, as ever, he is seen resolved to gain his ends without caring what wrong he does; he wishes to consult a prophet, and asks a witch to call up his shade. Most of all, the vigor of the narrative, showing us the scene in a few words, proves its antiquity and genuineness. We can see no reason whatever for supposing that it is an interpolation. "Now Samuel was dead, and all Israel had lamented him, and buried him in Ramah, even in his own city. And Saul had put away those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land. And the Philistines gathered themselves together, and came and pitched in Shunem; and Saul gathered all Israel together, and they pitched in Gilboa." That the Philistines had advanced so far, spreading in the plain of Esdraelon, the garden of the Holy Land, shows the straits to which Saul had come. Here in times of faith Sisera was defeated by Barak, and the Midianites were smitten by Gideon; some of the army of the former perishing at En- dor itself (Ps. lxxix. 9, 10).

And when Saul saw the host of the Philistines, he was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled. And when Saul inquired of the Lord, the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her, and enquire of her. And his servants said to him, Behold, [there is] a woman that hath a familiar spirit at En-dor. And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and he went, and two men with him, and they came to the woman by night." En-dor lay in the territory of Issachar, about 7 or 8 miles to the northward of Mount Gilboa. Its name, the "fountain of Dor," may connote it with the Phenician city Dor, which was on the coast to the westward. If so, it may have retained its stranger-population, and been therefore chosen by the witch as a place where she might with less danger than elsewhere practice her arts. It has been noticed that the mountain on whose slope the modern village stands is hollowed into rock-hewn caverns, in one of which the witch may probably have dwelt. [EN-DOR.] Saul's disguise, and his journeying by night, seem to have been taken that he might not alarm the woman, rather than because he may have passed through a part of the Philistine force. The Philistines held the plain, having their camp at Shunem, whither they had retired from their encampments. They were at first encamped a fountain at Jezreel, but when their enemies had advanced to Jezreel they appear to have retired to the slopes of Gilboa, whence there was a way of retreat either into the mountains to the south, or across Jordan. The latter seems to have been the line of flight, as, though Saul was slain on Mount Gilboa, his body was fastened to the wall of Beth-shan. Thus Saul could have scarcely reached En-dor without passing at least very near the army of the Philistines.

"And he said, Divine unto me, I pray thee, by the familiar spirit, and bring me [him] up, whom I shall name unto thee." It is noticeable that here witchcraft, the inquiring by a familiar spirit, and necromancy, are all connected as though but a single art, which favors the idea that the prohibited in Deuteronomy specifies every name by which magical arts were known. Rather than a single art, different kinds of arts, in order that no one should attempt to evade the condemnation of such practices by any subterfuge. It is evident that Saul thought he might be able to call up Samuel by the aid of the witch; but this does not prove what was his own general conviction, or the prevalent conviction of the Israelites on the subject. He was in a great extremity: his kingdom in danger: himself forsaken of God: he was weary with a night-journey, perhaps of risk, perhaps of great length to avoid the enemy, and faint with a day's fasting: he was conscious of wrong as, probably for the first time, he commanded unholy rites and heard in the gloom unholy incantations. In such a strait no man's judgment is steady, and Saul may have asked to see Samuel in a moment of sudden desperation when he had only meant to demand an oracular answer. It may even be thought that, yearning for the counsel of Samuel, and longing to learn if the net that he felt closing about him were one from which he should never escape, Saul had that keener sense that some say comes in the last hours of life, and so, conscious that the prophet's shade was near, or was about to come, at once sought to see and speak with it, though this had not been before purposed. Strange things we know occur at the moment when man feels he is about to die, and if there be any time when the unseen world is felt while yet unmentioned, it is when the soul comes first within the chink of its long-projected shadow. And the woman said unto him, Behold, thou knowest what Saul hath done, how he hath cut off those that have familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land: wherefore thou hast cast thy soul out for my life, to cause me to die? And Saul spake to thy Lor'd, saying, [As] the Loard liveth, [there] shall no punishment happen to thee for this thing.

Nothing more shows Saul's desperate resolution than his thus swearing when engaged in a most holy act—a terrible profanity that makes the horror of the scene complete. Everything being prepared, the final act takes place.

Then said the woman, Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel. And when the woman saw Samuel, she cried with a loud voice unto Samuel, saying, What hast thou done to me? for thou hast not called me this night. And the king said unto her, Be not afraid: for what sawest thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods ascending out of the earth. And he said unto her, What is [is] his form? And she said, An old man cometh up: and he is covered with a mantle. And Saul perceived that it was Samuel, and he stooped with [his] face to the ground, and bowed himself. And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted [or "disturbed"] me, to bring me up? And Saul answered, I am sore distressed: for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets, nor by dreams: therefore I have called thee, that thou mightest make known unto me what I shall do. Then said Saul, Wherefore then dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy? And the Lord hath hitherto from the kingdom out of thine hand, and given it to thy neighbor, [even] to David: because thou obeyest not the voice of the Lord, nor executest his fierce wrath upon Amalek, therefore hath the Lord done this thing unto thee this day. Moreover, the Lord will also deliver Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines, and thou shalt be no more a servant unto thine eyes and thy sons [be] with me: the Lord also shall deliver the host of Israel into the hand of the Philistines. Then Saul fell straightway all along on the earth, and was sore afraid, because of the words of Samuel; and there was no strength in him: for he had eaten no bread all the day, nor all the night. (1 Sam xxviii. 3-20.) The woman clearly was terrified by an unexpected apparition when she saw Samuel. She must therefore either have been a very jingler, or one who had no power of working magical wonders at will. The sight of Samuel at once showed her who had come to consult her. The prophet's shade seems to have been preceded by some majestic shapes which the witch called gods. Saul, as it seems, interrupting her, asked his form, and she described the prophet as he was in his last days on earth. He had no more shape than the most hideous specter, such as the prophets used to wear, or wrapped in his winding-sheet. Then Saul knew it was Samuel, and bowed to the ground, from respect or fear. It seems that the woman saw the appearances, and that Saul only knew of them through her, perhaps not daring to look, else why should he have asked what form Samuel had? The prophet's complaint we cannot understand, in our ignorance as to the separate states: thus much we know, that state is always described as one of perfect rest or sleep. That the woman should have been able to call him up cannot be hence inferred: her astonishment shows the contrary; and it would be explanation enough to suppose that he was sent to give Saul the last warning, or that the earnestness of the king's wish had been permitted to disquiet him in his thoughts. Although the word disquieted need not be pushed to an extreme sense, and seems merely to mean the interruption of a state of rest, our translators wisely, we think, preferring this rendering to "disturbed," it cannot be denied that, if we hold that Samuel appeared, this is a great difficulty. However, we suppose that the prophet's coming was ordered, it is not unanswerable.

The declaration of Saul's doom agrees with what Samuel had said before, and was fulfilled the next day, when the king and his sons fell on Mount Gilboa. It may, however, be asked—Was the apparition Samuel himself, or a supernatural messenger in his stead? Some may even object to our holding it to have been an aught but a phantom of a sick brain; but if so, what can we make of the woman's conviction that it was Samuel, and the king's horror at the words he heard, or, as these would say, that he thought he heard? It was not only the hearing his doom, but the hearing it in a voice from the other world that stretched the faithless strongly man on the ground. He must have felt the presence of the dead, and heard the sound of a sepulchral voice. How else could the doom have come true, and not the king alone, but his sons, have gone to the place of disembodied souls on the morrow? for to be with the dead concerned the soul, not the body: it is no difficulty that the king's corpse was buried to the generous men of Jableshzilde, mindful of his old kindness, rescued it from the wall of Bethshan. If then the apparition was real, should we suppose it Samuel's? A reasonable criticism would say it seems to have been so; (for the supposition that a messenger came in his stead must be rejected, as it would make the speech a mixture of truth and untruth) and if asked what sufficient cause there was for such a sending forth of the prophet from his rest, would reply that we know not the reason for such warnings as abound in the Bible, and that perhaps even at the eleventh hour, the door of repentance was not closed against the king, and his impuity might have been pardoned had he repented. Instead, he went forth in despair, and, when his sons had fallen and his army was put to the rout, sore wounded fell on his own sword.

9 We may instance the well-known circumstance that men who have been near death by drowning have asserted that in the last moments of consciousness all the events of their lives have passed before their minds. A friend of the writer assured him that he experienced this sensation, whenever he had a very bad fall in mountaineering, while he was actually falling. This is alluded to in the epistle.

From the beginning to the end of this strange history we have no warrant for attributing super-natural power to magicians. Viewed reasonably, it refers to the question of apparitions of the dead, as to which other places in the Bible leave no doubt. The connection with magic seems purely accidental. The witch is no more than a bystander after the first: she was Samuel, and that is all. The apparition may have been a terrible fulfillment of Saul's desire, but this does not prove that the measures he used were of any power. We have examined the narrative very carefully, from its detail and its remarkable character: the result leaves the main question unanswered.

In the later days of the two kingdoms magical practices of many kinds prevailed among the Hebrews, as we especially learn from the condemnation of them by the prophets. Every form of idola-trvry which the people had adopted in succession doubtless brought with it its magic, which seems to have remained with a strange tenacity that probably made it outweigh the false worship with which it was connected. Thus the use of teraphim, dating from the patriarchal age, was not abandoned even when the worship of the Canaanite, Phoenietian, and Syrian idols had been successively adopted.

In the historical books of Scripture there is little notice of magic, excepting that wherever the false prophets are mentioned we have no doubt an indication of the prevalence of magical practices. We are especially told of Josiah that he put away the workers with familiar spirits, the wizards, and the teraphim, as well as the idols and the other abominations of Judah and Jerusalem, in performance of the commands of the book of the Law which had been found (2 K. xxi. 24). But in the prophets we find several notices of the magic of the Hebrews in their times, and some of the magic of foreign nations. Isaiah says that the people had become "workers of hidden arts (דָּגַי בְּלָיָל) like the Philistines," and apparently alludes in the same place to the practice of magic by the Bene-Kedem (ii. 6). The nation had not only abandoned true religion, but had become generally addicted to magic in the manner of the Philistines, whose Egyptian origin (CAMPBELL) is consistent with such a condition. The origin of the Bene-Kedem is doubtful, but it seems certain that as late as the time of the Egyptian wars in Syria, under the XIXth dynasty, n. c. cir. 1800, a race, partly at least Mongoloid, inhabited the valley of the Orontes, among whom therefore we should again expect a national practice of magic, and its prevalence with their neighbors. Balbaam, too, dwell with the Bene-Kedem, though he may not have been of their race.

In another place the prophet reproves the people for seeking unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto the wizards that chirp, and that mutter" (viii. 19). The practices of one class of magicians are still more distinctly described, where it is thus said of Jerusalem: "And I will camp against thee round about, and will lay siege against thee with a mount, and I will raise forts against thee. And thou shalt be brought down, [and] shalt speak out of the ground, and thy speech shall be the voice of the dust, and thy voice shall be, as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper out of the dust" (xxix. 3, 4).

Isaiah alludes to the magic of the Egyptians when he says that in their calamity "they shall seek to the idols, and to the charmers (יוֹרֵדֵי נִפְלָיָה יִשְׂרָאֵל), and to them that have familiar spirits, and to the wizards" (xix. 3). And in the same manner he thus taunts Babylon: "Stand now with thy charmers, and with the multitude of thine enchantments, wherein thou hast labored from thy youth; if so be thou shalt be able to profit, if so be thou mayest prevail. Thou art weary in the multitude of thy counsels. Let now the viewers of the heavens [astrologers], the stargazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up, and save thee from these things that shall come upon thee" (xvii. 12, 13). The magic of Babylon is here characterized by the prominence given to astrology, no magicians being mentioned excepting practitioners of this art: unlike the case of the Egyptians, with whom astrology seems always to have held a lower place than with the Chaldean nation. In both instances the folly of those who seek the aid of magic is shown.

Micaiah, declaring the judgments coming for the crimes of his time, speaks of the prevalence of divination among prophets who most probably were such pretended prophets as the opponents of Jeremiah, not avowed prophets of idols, as Ahab's seem to have been. Concerning these prophets it is said, "Night [shall be] unto you, that ye shall not have a vision: and it shall be dark unto you, that ye shall not divide; and the sun shall go down over the prophets, and the day shall be dark over them. Then shall the seers be ashamed, and the diviners confounded: yea, they shall all cover their lip: for [there is] no answer of God." (iii. 6, 7). Later it is said as to Jerusalem, "The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divine for money: yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, [Is] not the Lord among us? none evil can come upon us?" (ver. 11). These prophets seem to have practiced unlawful arts, and yet to have expected revelations.

Jeremiah was constantly opposed by false prophets, who pretended to speak in the name of the Lord, saying that they had dreamt, when they told false visions, and who practiced various magical arts (xiv. 14, xviii. 25, etc.), that these are "words of the Lord among us? none evil can come upon us," which is the several designations applied to those who counselled the people not to serve the king of Babylon may be used in contempt of the false prophets — xxix. 8, 9).

Ezekiel, as we should have expected, affords some remarkable details of the magic of his time, in the clear and forcible descriptions of his visions. From him we learn that fetishism was among the idolatries which the Hebrews, in the latest days of the kingdom of Judah, had adopted from their neighbors, like the Romans in the age of general corruption that caused the decline of their empire. In a vision, in which the prophet saw the abominations of Jerusalem, he entered the chambers of imagery in the Temple itself: "I went in and saw: and there was all of every kind of abominable imagery, and abominable heads, and all the idols of the house of Israel, portrayed upon the wall round about." Here seventy elders were offering incense in the dark (viii. 7-12).

This imagery was probably borrowed from Egypt, for the description perfectly answers to that of the dark sanctuaries of Egyptian temples, with the sacred animals portrayed upon their walls, and does not accord with the character of the Assyrian sculptures, where creeping things are not represented as objects of worship. With this low form of idolatry an equally low kind of magic obtained, practiced by &ppleses who for small rewards made amulets by which the people were deceived, (xiii. 17, ad fin.). The passage must be allowed to be very difficult, but it can scarcely be doubted that amulets are referred to which were made and sold by these women, and perhaps also worn by &ppleses. Thus it is possible, and was probably the ease, that the women to whom Joseph, (ii. 18), refers, in the Hebrew text, "to the women that sew pillows upon all joints of the hands [elbows or armpits?], and make kerchiefs upon the head of every stature to hunt souls!" (xiii. 18). If so, we have a practice analogous to that of the modern Egyptians, who hang amulets of the kind called "hemhāb" upon the right side, and of the Nubians, who hang them on the upper part of the arm. We cannot, in any ease, see how the passage can be explained as simply referring to the luxurious dress of the women of that time, since the prophet distinctly alludes to pretended visions and to divinations (ver. 21), using almost the same expressions that he applies in another place to the practices of the false prophets (xxii. 28). The notice of Nebuchadnezzar's divination by arrows, where it is said "he shuffled arrows" (xiv. 21), must refer to a practice the same or similar to the kind of divination by arrows called El-Meyzar, in use among the pagan Arabs, and forbidden in the Korān. [See HOSPITALITY.]

The references to magic in the book of Daniel relate wholly to that of Babylon, and not so much to the art as to those who used it. Daniel, when taken captive, was instructed in the learning of the Chaldeans and placed among the wise men of Babylon (ii. 18), by whom we are to understand the Magi (תרגום התפיס), for the term is used as including magicians (תפיס ה', תפיס ח), sorcerers (תפיס נ), enchanters (תפיס נ), astrologers (תפיס נ), and Chaldeans, the last being apparently the most important class (ii. 2, 4, 5, 10, 12, 14, 18, 24, 27; comp. i. 29). As in other cases the true prophet was put to the test with the magicians, and he succeeded where they utterly failed. The case resembles Pharaoh's, excepting that Nebuchadnezzar asked a harder thing of the wise men. Having forgotten his dream, he not only required of them an interpretation, but that they should make known the dream itself. They were perfectly ready to tell the interpretation if only they heard the dream. The king at once saw that they were impostors, and that if they truly had supernatural powers they could as well tell him his dream as its meaning. Therefore he decreed the death of all the wise men of Babylon; but Daniel, praying that he and his fellows might escape this destruction, had a vision in which the matter was revealed to him. He was accordingly brought before the king. When the prophet, he answered with knowledge of his own. "The secret which the king hath demanded, the wise men, the sorcerers, the magicians, the astrologers, cannot show unto the king; but there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets" (vv. 27, 28). "But as for me, this secret is not revealed to me for [any] wisdom that I have more than any living" (30). He then related the dream and its interpretation, and was set over the province as well as over all the wise men of Babylon. Again the king dreamt: and though he told them the dream the wise men could not interpret it, and Daniel again showed the meaning (iv. 4, 5). In the relation of this event we read that the king called him "chief of the scribes," the second part of the title being the same as that applied to the Egyptian magicians (iv. 9; Chald. 6). A third time, when Belshazzar saw the writing on the wall, were sent to the wise men, and on the second day Daniel was brought before the king and the interpretation given (v.). These events are perfectly consistent with what always occurred in all other cases recorded in Scripture when the practitioners of magic were placed in opposition to true prophets. It may be asked by some how Daniel could take the post of chief of the wise men when he had himself proved their imposture. If, however, as we cannot doubt, the class was one of the learned generally, among whom some practiced magical arts, the case is very different from what it would have been had these wise men been magicians only. Besides, it seems almost certain that Daniel was providentially thus placed that, like another Joseph, he might further the welfare and ultimate return of his people. [MAGI.]

After the Captivity it is probable that the Jews gradually abandoned the practice of magic. Zechaariah speaks indeed of the deceit of teraphim and diviners (x. 2), and foretells a time when the very names of idols should be forgotten and false prophets have virtually ceased (xiv. 1-4), yet in neither case does it seem certain that he is alluding to the usages of his own day.

In the Apocrypha we find indications that in the later centuries preceding the Christian era magic was no longer practiced by the educated Jews. In the Wisdom of Solomon the writer, speaking of the Egyptian magicians, treats their art as an imposture (xiv. 7). The book of Tobit is an exceptional case. If we hold that it was written in Persia or a neighboring country, and, with Ewald, date its composition not long after the fall of the Persian empire, we may then assign this reference to a different state of society to [from] that of the Jews of Egypt and Palestine. If, however, it was written in Palestine about the time of the Maccabees, as others suppose, we must still recollect that it refers rather to the superstitions of the common people than to those of the learned. In either case its pretensions make it useless to follow as indicating the opinions of the time at whose writing it was done. It professes to relate to a period of which its writer could have known little, and borrows its idea of supernatural agency from Scripture, adding as much as was judged safe of current superstition.

In the N. T. we read very little of magic. The coming of Magi to worship Christ is indeed related Matt ii. 1-12, but we have no warrant for supposing that they were magicians from their name, which the A. V. not unreasonably renders "wise men" [MAGI]. Our Lord is not said to have been opposed by magicians, and the Apostles and other early teachers of the Gospel seem to have rarely encountered them. Philip the deacon, when he preached at Samaria, found there Simon a famous magician, commonly known as Simon Magus, who had had great power over the people; he is not said to have been able to work wonders, nor, had it been so, is it likely that he would have soon been admitted into the Church (Acts viii. 9-24). When St. Barnabas and St. Paul were at Paphos, as they preached to the proconsul Sergius Paulus, Euphis, a Jewish sorcerer and false prophet (τιμων άθομος άγαθος), withstood them, and was struck blind for a time at the word of St. Paul (xiii. 6-12). At Ephesus, certain Jewish exorcists naturally falling, both Jews and Greeks were afraid, and abandoned their practice of magical arts. * And many that believed came, and confessed, and showed their deeds. Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all: and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand [pieces] of silver (xix. 19). In the both Greek and Greeks seem to have been greatly addicted to magic, even after they had nominally joined the Church. In all these cases it appears that though the practitioners were generally or always Jews, the field of their success was with Gentiles, showing that among the Jews in general, or the educated class, the art had fallen into disrepute. Here, as before, there is no evidence of any real effect produced by the magicians. We have already noticed the remarkable case of the "damned having a spirit of divination" (σωτευμενοι, ἡμῶν ἀνώμονος πείρα τοῦ διανομοντωστι, which brought her master's much gain by foretelling) (Acts xix. 18), from whom St. Paul cast out the spirit of divination (xvi. 16-18). This is a matter belonging to another subject than that of magic.

Our examination of the various notices of magic in the Bible gives us this general result: They did not, as far as we know, exercise a real power positively that any but illusory results were produced by magical rites. They therefore afford no evidence that man can gain supernatural powers to use at his will. This consequence goes some way towards showing that we may conclude that there is no such thing as real magic: for although it is dangerous to reason on negative evidence, yet in a case of this kind it is especially strong. Had any but illusions been worked by magicians, surely the Scriptures would not have passed over a fact of so much importance, and one which would have rendered the prohibition of these arts far more necessary. The general belief of mankind in magic, or things akin to it, is of no worth, since the holding such current superstition in some of its branches, if we push it to its legitimate consequences, would lead to the rejection of faith in God's government of the world, and the adoption of a creed far below that of Plato.

From the conclusion at which we have arrived, that there is no evidence in the Bible of real results having been worked by supernatural agency used by magicians, we may draw this important inference, that the absence of any proof of the same in profane literature, ancient or modern, in no way militates against the credibility of the miracles recorded in Scripture.

MAGIDDO ([Rom.] Μαγιδδώ; but Mai [i. e. Vat.], μετὰ Αδώνιος: and Alex. Ἀτατίοιος: Magidado), the Greek form of the name McGuinn). It occurs only in I Esd. i. 29. [MAGIDDOX.]

* MAGISTRATES has its generic sense of rulers, civil officers, in Ezx. vii. 25; Luke xii. 11; Tit. iii. 1; but in Acts xvi. 20 ff. is a specific term (στρατηγοι) referring to the darmavoi or protors at Philippi [see COLONY, Amer. ed.].

MA'GOG [תֶּבְמַגָּג] [see below]: Ma'agô; in Ezx. xxxiii. 6 [אֵו, Alex. אכ; in 1 Chr., Alex. מָגָגו: Magog]). The name Magog is applied in Scripture both to a person and to a land or people. In Gen. x. 2 (and 1 Chr. i. 5) Magog appears as the second son of Japheth in connection with Go- mer (the Cimmerians) and Madai (the Medes): in Ezx. xxxviii. 2, xxxix. 1, 6, it appears as a country or people of which Gog was the prince, in conjunction with Meshech (the Moschici), Tubal (the Tibarren), and Rosh (the Roxonians). In the latter of these senses there is evidently implied an etymological connection between Gog and Ma='ag, on the Magog being regarded by Ezekiel as a prefix significative of a country. In this case Gog contains the original element of the name, which may possibly have its origin in some Persian root. * The notices of Magog would lead us to fix a northern locality: not only did all the tribes mentioned in connection with it belong to that quarter, but it is expressly stated by Ezekiel that he was to come up from "the sides of the north" (xxxix. 2), from a country adjacent to that of Toghrah or Armenia (xxxvii. 6), and not far from "the isles" or maritime regions of Europe (xxxix. 6). The people of Magog further appear as having a force of cavalry (xxxviii. 5), and as armed with the bow (xxxix. 3). From the above data, combined with the consideration of the time at which Ezekiel lived, the conclusion has been drawn that Magog represents the important race of the Scythians. Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 1) and Jerome (Quest. in Gen. xii. 2) among early writers adopted this view, and they have been followed in the main by modern writers. In identifying Magog with the Scythians, however, we must not be understood as using the latter term in a strictly ethnographical sense, but as a general expression for the tribes living north of the Caucasus. We regard Magog as essentially a geographical term, just as it was applied by the Syrians of the Middle Ages to Asiatic Tartary, and by the Arabs to the district between the Caspian and Euxine seas (Whitgift, Redb., v. s. v.). The inhabitants of this district in the time of Ezekiel were undoubtedly the people generally known by the classical name of Scythians. In the latter part of the 7th century B.C. they had become well known as a formidable power through the whole of western Asia. Forced from their original quarters north of the Caucasian range by the inroad of the Massagetae, they descended into Asia Minor, where they took Bithynia (v. c. 629), and maintained a long war with the Lydian monarchs; since they spread into Media (5th. c. 624), where they defeated Cyzicenes. They then directed their course to Egypt, and were bribed off by Permecedon: on their return they attacked the temple of Venus Frain at Ascalon. They were finally ejected in 519 B.C., after having made their name a terror to the whole eastern world (Herod. i. 192 ff.). The Scythians are described by classical writers as skilful in the use of the bow (Herod. i. 73, iv. 132; Xen. Anth. iii. 4, § 15), and even as the inventors of the bow and arrow (Plin. vii. 57): they were specially famous as mounted bowmen (psevzogarén: Herod. iv. 46; Thucyd. ii. 98); they also enjoyed vengeance executed upon them (xxxviii. 14-23) — a massacre so tremendous that seven months would hardly suffice for the burial of the corpses in the valley which should thenceforth be named Hamongog (xxxix. 11-16). The imagery of Ezekiel has been transferred in the Apocalypse to describe the final struggle between Christ and Antichrist (Rev. xx. 8). As a question of ethnology, the origin of the Scythians presents great difficulties: many eminent writers, with Niebuhr and Neumann at their head, regard them as a Mongolian, and therefore a non-Japhetic race. It is unnecessary for us to enter into the general question, which is complicated by the undefined and varying applications of the name Scythia and Scythians among ancient writers. As far as the Biblical notices are concerned, it is sufficient to state that the Scythians of Ezekiel's age — the Scythians of Herodotus — were in all probability a Japhetic race. They were distinguished on the one hand from the Arzigiata, a clearly Mongolian race (Herod. iv. 23), and they are connected on the other hand with the Agathyrsi, a clearly Indo-European race (iv. 10). The mere silence of so observant a writer as Herodotus, as to any striking features in the physical conformation of the Scythians, must further be regarded as a strong argument in favor of their Japhetic origin.

Vulg. in consequence of the name Rosh not occurring elsewhere in Scripture. [Rosh.]

* Various etymologies of the name have been suggested, none of which can be absolutely accepted. Knobel (Volkert, p. 63) proposes the Sanskrit mah or maha, "great," and a Persian word signifying "mountain," which case the reference would be the Caucasian range. The terms "gaghi and magh" are still applied to some of the heights of that range. This etymology is supported by Von Bohlen (Introcl, to Gen. ii. 211). On the other hand, Bihatz (Comm. in Ezx.) connects the first syllable with the Coptic ma, "place," or the Sanskrit maha, "land," and the second with a Persian root, koka, "the moon," as though the term had reference to moon-worshippers.

MAJOT-MISSARIE (Μαγωτος, Μισσαριος: Μέτωκος, Μισσαριος, literally, "terror on every side": the name given by Jeremiah to Ishur, the priest, when he smote him and put him in the stocks for prophesying against the holiness of Jerusalem (Jer. xx. 3)). The significance of the appellation is explained in the denunciation with which it was accompanied (ver. 4): "Thus saith Jehovah, Behold I will make thee a terror to thyself and to all thy friends." The LXX. must have connected the word with the original meaning of the root — to wander," for they keep up the play on the name in ver. 4. It is remarkable that the same phrase occurs in several other passages of Jeremiah (vi. 25, xx. 16, xlix. 3, xlix. 23; Lam. ii. 22), and is only found besides in Ps. xxxi. 13.

MAGUS/ASH (Μαγος, Ασηος, pers. moth-killer): Μαγος (Μαγος, Ασηος, [Vat.] Α. B. A. B., one of the heads of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 20). The name is probably not that of an individual, but of a family. It is supposed by Calmet and Junius to be the same as Magus in Ezr. ii. 30.

MAHALAH (Μαχαλα: sickness): Μαχαλα (Μαχαλα, [sickness]): Μαχαλα, one of the three children of Hamankoth, the sister of Gilead (1 Chr. vii. 18). The name is probably that of a woman, as it is the same with that of Mahalath, the daughter of Zelophehad, also a descendant of Gilead the Manasseh.

MAHALALEL (Μαχαλαλα, [part. f. of the former]: Μαχαλαλα, [praise of God]): Μαχαλαλα, [praise of God]): Μαχαλαλα, [praise of God]). 1. The fourth in descent from Adam, according to the Sethite genealogy, and son of Cainan (Gen. v. 12, 13, 15-17; 1 Chr. i. 2). In the LXX. the names of Mahalalel and Mehujael, the fourth from Adam in the genealogy of the descendants of Cain, are identical. Ewald recognizes in Mahalath the sung-god, or Apollo of the anteluvian mythology, and in his son Jared the god of water, the Indian Varuna (Gesch. i. 357), but his assertions are perfectly arbitrary.

2. [(Vat.] F.A. MA'ALEPH. A descendant of Perez, or the Perez, of the son of Judah, and ancestor of Athaliah, whose family resided in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xii. 4).

MA'HALATH (םהלת [verb, harp, lyre]): Ma'acheloth, the daughter of Ishmael, and one of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxviii. 9). In the Elomite genealogy (Gen. xxxvi. 3, 4, 10, 13, 17) she is called Basemath, sister of Nebajoth, and mother of Ielem; but the Hebrew-Samaritan text has Mahalath throughout. On the other hand Basemath, the wife of Esau, is described as the daughter of Elon the Hittite (Gen. xxvi. 34). [Bashemath.]

MA'HALATH (םהלת [verb, harp, lyre]): [Rom. Mark.] Mahalath (Alex Malath: Mahalath), one of the eighteen wives of King Rehoboam, apparently his first (2 Chr. xi. 18 only). She was her husband's cousin, being the daughter of King David's son Jerimoth, who was probably the child of a concubine, and not one of his regular family. Josephus, without naming Mahalath, speaks of her as "a kinswoman" (Συγγενής τοῦ τιμ. Ant. viii. 10, § 1). No children are attributed to the marriage, nor is she again named. The ancient Hebrew text (Crepid) in this passage has "son" instead of "daughter." The latter, however, is the correction of the K'ri, and is adopted by the LXX., Vulgate and Targums, as well as by the A. V. G.

MA'HALATH (םהלת [see below]: Ma'achel.) The title of Ps. lxi. in which this rare name occurs was rendered in the Geneva version, "To him that excelleth on Mahalath:" which was explained in the margin to be "an instrument or kind of note." This expresses in short the opinions of most commentators. Connecting the word with מָחֵל, machol (Ex. xv. 20; Ps. cl. 4), rendered "dance" in the A. V., but supposed by many from its connection with instruments of music to be one itself (Dance, vol. i. p. 538 b), Jerome renders the phrase "on Mahalath" by "per chordum," and in this he is supported by the translations of Theodotion (ἐπάνω τῆς κιθαρᾶς), Symmachus (בַּד אֵחֹד), and Aquila (אֶחֹד אֵחֹד), quoted by Theodoret (Comm. in Ps. lii.). Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. liii.) gives the title of the Psalm, "in finem pro Amulek intellectus ipsi David: "explaining "pro Amulech," as he says from the Hebrew, "for one in labor or sorrow" (pro parturiente sive dolore), by whom he understands Christ, as the subject of the psalm. But in another passage (Enarr. in Ps. lxxviii.) he gives the word in the form meloch, and interprets it by the Latin choras: having in the first instance made some confusion with מַחְלָל, "sorrow," which forms part of the proper name "Amulek." The title of Ps. liii. in the Chaldee and Syriac versions contains no trace of the word, which is also omitted in the almost identical Ps. xiv. From his fact alone it might be inferred that it was not attended to point etymologically to the contents of the psalm, as Hengstenberg and others are inclined to believe. Alas Ezra understands it by the name of a melody to which the psalm was sung, and R. Solomon Jarchi explains it as "the name of a musical instrument," adding however immediately, with a play upon the word, "another discourse of the sickness (macholah) of Israel when the Temple was hild waste." Calvin and J. H. Michaelis, among others, regarded it as an instrument of music or the commencement of a melody. Junius derived it from the root מַחֲלָל, child, "to bore, perforate," and understood it by a wind instrument of some kind, like Nebiloth in Ps. xii.: but his etymology is certainly wrong. Its connection with machol is equally uncertain. Joel B. in the second preface to his notes on the Psalms in Mendelssohn's Bible, mentions three opinions as current with regard to the meaning of Mahalath; some regarding it as a feminine form of machol, others as one of the stringed instruments (the flute, according to De Wette's translation of Ps. lii.), and others again as a stringed instrument. Between these conflicting conjectures, says he, it is impossible to decide. That it was a stringed instrument, played either with the fingers or a quill, is maintained by Simonis (Lex. Heb.), who derives it from an unused Arabic root ملأح, to sweep. But the most probable of all conjectures, and one which genealogists approves, is that of Lord, who quotes the Ethopic name, by which the subject of the LXX. is rendered in Gen. iv. 21 (Simonis, Apocryphon Enochum, p. 475). Fürst (Hebr. s. v.) explains Mahalath as the name of a musical corps dwelling at Axel-Mekhol, just as by gittith he understands the band of Levite minstrels at Gith Kinnmon.

On the other hand, the opinion that Mahalath contains an enigmatical indication of the subject of the psalm, which we have seen hinted at in the quotations from Jarchi given above, is adopted by Hengstenberg to the exclusion of every other. He translates "on Mahalath" by "on sickness," referring to the spiritual malady of the sons of men (Comm. über die Psalmen.). Lengerke (die Psalmen) adopts the same view, which had been previously advanced by Arias Montano. A third theory is that of Dlitzsch (Comm. ad. d. Psalter), who considers Mahalath as indicating to the choir the manner in which the psalm was to be sung, and compares the modern Italian method, in which the conductor leaves it untranslated and unexplained, regarding it as probably an abbreviation of a longer sentence (Dichter d. Alt. Tanzes, i. 174). The latest speculation upon the subject is that of Mr. Thrupp, who, after dismissing as mere conjecture the interpretation of Mahalath as a musical instrument, or as sickness, propounded, as more probable than either, that it is "a proper name borrowed from the, xxviii. 17, and used by Delitzsch, as an enigmatical designation of Abigail, in the same manner as, in Psalms vii., xxiv., the names Cush and Ahimelech are employed to denote Shimee and Achish. The real Mahalath, Esau's wife, was the sister of Nebajoth, from whom were descended an Arabian tribe famous for their wealth in sheep; the name might be therefore not unfitly applied to one who, though now married to David, had till recently been the wife of the rich sheep-owner of the village of Carmel" (Introit, to the Psalms, i. 314). It can scarcely be said that Mr. Thrupp has replaced conjecture by certainty.

MAHALATH LEANNOTH (מַחַלְת לֶאֲנָנֹת׃ Mæchlih thw ānānihā: Mahalath ad respondendum). The Geneva version of Ps. lxxxvii., in the title of which these words occur, has "upon Mahalath Leannoth," and in the margin, "that is, to humble. It was the beginning of a song, by the time whereof this Psalm was sung." It is a remarkable proof of the obscurity which envelops the former of the two words that the same commentator explains it differently in each of the passages in which it occurs. In De Wette's translation it is a "flute" in Ps. liii., a "guitar" in Ps. lxxviii.; and while Jarchi in the former passage explains it as a musical instrument, he describes the latter as referring to "one sick of love and affliction who was afflicted with the punishments of the Captivity," Symmachus, again, as quoted by Theodoret (Comm. in Ps. 87), has δίκαιος, unless this be a mistake of the copyst for Δίκαιός as in Ps. liii. Augustine and Theodoret both understand incubioth of responsive singing. Theophylact says "they danced while responding to the music of the organ," Jerome, in his version of the Hebrew, has περι χορομ α δρα πρε κενον δο μ ην. The Hebrew הַשָּׁם in the Ps. Conj., certainly signifies πρὸς σιγᾶ, as in Ex. xxxii. 18; Is. xxvii. 2; and in this sense it is taken by Ewald in the title of Ps. lxxviii. In like manner Junius and Tremellius render πρὸς Mahalath Leannoth πρὸς to be sung to the wind instruments. There is nothing, however, in the construction of the psalm to show that it was adapted for responsive singing; and if leannoth be simply πρὸς to sing, it would seem, as Olshausen observes, almost unnecessary. It has reference, more probably, to the character of the psalm, and might be rendered πρὸς to humble, or affliction, in which sense the root occurs in verse 7. In support of this may be compared, πρὸς to bring to remembrance, in the titles of Ps. xxxviii. and lix.; and πρὸς to thank, 1 Th. xvi. 7. Mr. Trapp remarks that this psalm (lxxviii.) "should be regarded as a solemn exercise of humiliation: it is more deeply melancholy than any other in the Psalter" (intr. to the Psalms, ii. 99). Hengstenberg, in accordance with the view he takes of Mahalath, regards Ps. lxxviii., as the prayer of one recovered from severe bodily sickness, rendering leannoth concerning affliction, and the whole πρὸς on the sickness of distress," Luscher has a similar explanation, which is the same with that of Tischendorf, but is too forced.

occupy any of the towns of Benjamin or Ephraim, which were then in the hands of the Philistines, he fixed on Mahanaim as his head-quarters. There the new king was crowned over all Israel, east as well as west of the Jordan (2 Sam. ii. 9). From thence Abner made his disastrous expedition to Gideon (ver. 12), and there apparently the unfortunate Ishboseth was murdered (iv. 5), the murderers making off to Hebron by the way of the valley of the Jordan.

The same causes which led Abner to fix Ishboseth's residence at Mahanaim probably induced David to take refuge there when driven out of the western part of his kingdom by Absalom. He proceeds thither without hesitation or inquiry, but as if when Jerusalem was lost it was the one alternative (2 Sam. xvii. 24; 1 K. ii. 8). It was then a walled town, capacious enough to contain the "hundreds" and the "thousands" of David's followers (viii. 1, 4; and compare "ten thousand," ver. 3); with gates, and the usual provision for the watchman of a fortified town (see the remark of Josephus quoted in the note). But its associations with royal persons were not fortunate. One king had already been murdered within its walls, and it was here that David received the news of the death of Absalom, and made the walls of the "chamber over the gate" resound with his cries.

Mahanaim was the seat of one of Solomon's commission officers (1 K. iv. 14); and it is alluded to in the Song which bears his name (vi. 13), in terms which, though very obscure, seem at any rate to show that at the date of the composition of that poem it was still in repute for sanctity, possibly famous for some ceremonial commemorating the original vision of the patriarch: "What will ye see in the Shishanite? We see as it were the dance (mehelbâh, a word usually applied to dances of a religious nature; see vol. i. p. 539) of the two hosts of Mahanaim.

On the monument of Sheshouk (Shishak) at Karmak, in the 22d cartouch — one of those which are believed to contain the names of Israelite cities conquered by that king — a name appears which is read as Mâ-hor-â-nâ, that is, Mahanaim. The adjoining cartouches contain names which are read as Mied-er-shem, Shumen, Megiddo, Beth-horon, Gideon, and other Israelite names, mucchuc, Geras, der Nuchwinder, Egypets, etc., p. 61). If this interpretation may be relied on, it shows that the "oasis of Shishak was more extensive than we should gather from the records of the Bible ([2 Chr. xii.]), which are occupied mainly with occurrences at the metropolises. Possibly the army entered by the plains of Philistia and Sharon, ravaged Edromick and some towns like Mahanaim just beyond Jordan, and then retraced, either by the same route or by the Jordan Valley, to Jerusalem, attacking it last. This would account for Rehobom's non-resistance, and also for the fact, of which special mention is made, that many of the chief men of the country had taken refuge in the city. It should, however, be remarked that the names occur in most promiscuous order, and that none has been found resembling them.

As to the identification of Mahanaim with any modern site or remains, little can be said. To Eusebius and Jerome it appears to have been unknown. A place called Mâhëkh does certainly exist among the villages of the east of Jordan, though its exact position is not so certain. The earliest mention of it appears to be that of the Jewish traveller hap-Parchi, according to whom "Mâhanim is Mâhëkh, and stands about half a day's journey not confined to Jebel from Beth- saman." (Zimm. in Ascher's Bej. of Tabitha, p. 482) Mahëkh is named in the lists of Dr. Eil Smith among the places of Jebel Ajlôn (Kob. Bibl. Res. 1st ed., iii. App. 168). It is marked on Kiepert's map (1566) as exactly east of Beth-shan, but about 30 miles distant therefrom — i. e. not half a long whole day's journey. It is also mentioned, and its identity with Mahanaim upheld, by Porter (Hunbok, ii. 643). The name Mähneh stands from the Jordan and from both the Wady Zârâk and the Yarnâk — each of which has claims to represent the torrent Jabokk — seems to forbid this conclusion. At any rate the point may be recommended to the investigation of future travellers east of the Jordan.

* Mr. Porter's remark (Hunbok, ii. 322) is merely that "perhaps" Mähneh may be the ancient Mahanaim; but he cannot be said to "uphold" that identity (see above). In his more recent article on this name in Kitto's Cyclo. of Biblical Literature (1856) he suggests that "the ruins of Gerasa, the most extensive and splendid east of the Jordan, may occupy the site of Mahanaim." On the other hand, Mr. Tristram, who visited Mahanaim, regards the other as altogether the better opinion. He describes the place as near "a fine natural pond, with traces of many buildings, grass-grown and beneath the soil," and "sufficiently extensive to have belonged to a considerable place," though "there is no trace of a wall, such as must have been there when David sat in the gate and wept for his son Absalom." He admits that the situation of Mähneh so far north of the Jabok presents some difficulty, but argues that this and other objections are not insuperable. "Mähneh is on the borders of Bashan (see Josh. xiii. 3), and though to the north, it is also to the east of the Jabok, and therefore outside of the line where the river was the boundary of Gilead and Bashan. It is probable, also, that in Genesis the "Mount of Gilead" may be used in a general significance for the "Jebel Gilead," including also Ajlôn, which was certainly a portion of Gilead. Considering the geography of the region, it would have been more natural for Jacob to take this course in his flight from Laban, than to have gone south to Jebel Osha, and then turned northwards again to cross the deep ravine of the Jabok. There is therefore, I conceive, every probability that the name of Mahanaim has been preserved in Mähneh, and that these grass-grown mounds represent all that is left of the capital of Ishboseth (2 Sam. ii. 8) and the refuge of David ("Land of Israel," 2d ed., p. 487 f.).

Mr. Grose also, who writes the above article, represents Mähneh as probably Mahanaim in his Index to Clark's Bible Atlas, p. 102. It must be that he would abate something at present from the force of his own objections as urged above. The region is still remarkable for its forests of oaks. It was in the boughs of such a tree that Absalom was caught by his hair, and, thus entangled, was killed. (2 Sam. xvi. 22). The defeat, too, of Absalom and his army was the more complete because "the battle was scattered over the face of all the country, and the wool..."
decoured more people that day than the sword decoured" (2 Sam. viii. 21). The ruins of Mahaneh-Dan are on one of the branches of Wady el-Mahaneh, which is known as Wady Melech on that account (Rob. Phys. Geogr. p. 86).

MAHANEH-DAN (מַחָנֵה-דָּן): [Rom. Trapf^-. H.].

A name which commemorates the last encampment of the band of six hundred Danite warriors before setting out on their expedition to Laish. The position of the spot is specified with great precision, as "behind Kirjath-jearim" (Judg. xvii. 12), and as "between Zorah and Eshtaol" (xii. 23); here the name is translated in the A.V., Kirjath-jearim is identified with tolerable certainty in Kavret el-Emeth, and Zorah in Socor, about 7 miles S.W. of it. But no site has yet been suggested for Eshtaol which would be compatible with the above conditions, requiring as they do that Kirjath-jearim should lie between it and Zorah. In Kastel, a "remarkable conical hill about an hour from Kavret el-Emeth, towards Jerusalem," south of the road, we have a site which is not dissimilar in name to Eshtaol, while its position sufficiently answers the requirements. Mr. Williams (Holy City, 1. 12 note) was shown a site on the north side of the Wady Isma'il, N. E. from Dir el-Horre, which bore the name of Kirjath Melemeneh, and which he suggests may be identical with Mahaneh-Dan. The position is certainly very suitable; but the name does not occur in the lists or maps of other travellers—not even of Tolkler (Duitsche Wunderwelt, 1839); and the question must be left with that started above, of the identity of Kastel and Eshtaol, for the investigation of future explorers and Arabic scholars.

The statement in xviii. 12 of the origin of the name is so precise, and has so historical an air, that it supplies a strong reason for believing that the event there recorded took place earlier than those in xii. 25, though in the present arrangement of the book they come after them.

MAHARAI [3 syll.] (מַהֲרָאִים): [hairy, aery?].

Nephi; Alex. Mara'ei, in 2 Sam. xxiii. 28; Mara'i; [Vat. F. Nephe], Alex. Mara'ei, 1 Chr. vii. 30; Meqa'ei, Alex. Mara'ei, 1 Chr. xxvii. 13: Mahulites, Merarites, 1 Chr. xxvii. 14), an inhabitant of Nezophah in the tribe of Judah, and one of David's captains. He was of the family of Zerah, and commanded the tenth monthly division of the army.

MAHATHIT (מַחַתית [perh. fere pin cencer]):

Ma'dit; [Vat. Me'ot; Meathoit]. 1. The son of Amosai, a Kohathite of the house of Korah, and ancestor of Heman the singer (1 Chr. vi. 33). In ver. 23 he is called AHIMAOTH (Hervey, General, p. 215).

2. [Alex. Me'ot, 2 Chr. xxvii. 12; [Vat., by inclusion of the following word, Chavwhranan, 2 Chr. xxvii. 13.]) Also a Kohathite, who, in the reign of Hezekiah, was appointed, as one of the representatives of his house, to assist in the purification of the Levites, by which they prepared themselves to cleanse the Temple from the traces of idolatrous worship. He was apparently the same who, with other Levites, had the charge of the tithes and dedicated offerings, under the superintendence of Zosoniah and Shimeon.

MAHITES, THE

MAHAVITE, THE (מַהֲוֹאִית, i. e. "the Mahavites"): [Rom. Ἄφατ; Vat. F.A.]. [Mias. o Mavater: Mahamathites], the designation of Edel, one of the warriors of king David's guard, whose name is preserved in the catalogue of 1 Chronicles only (xi. 46). It will be observed that the word is plural in the Hebrew text, but the whole of the list is evidently in the singular state, so that it is impossible to draw any inference from that circumstance. The Targum has מַהֲוֹאִית, "from Mahavana." Komitoff (Dissert. 213) conjectures that originally the Hebrew may have stood מַחֲוָא, "from the Halvites." Others have proposed to insert an N and read "the Mahamantine" (First, Helb. p. 721 a; Bertheau, Chronicl, p. 136).

MAHAKIOTH (מַהֲקֵי-וֹת, [vivious]):

Mea'-Coh; [Vat. in ver. 1, Me'a-Coh; Alex. Maa-Coath: Mahahoch], one of the 14 sons of Hemam the Kohathite, who formed part of the Temple choir, under the leadership of their father with Asaph and Jeduthun. He was chief of the 2nd course of twelve musicians (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 30), whose office to it was to blow the horns. [HOTHAU, Amer. ed.]

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (מַהֲרֵה-שָׁלָל-הַשַּׁלָּח בָּזָ:):

Tαχύως σκέπασθαι ζηως παρωμήνως: Accedent spoliis detrahente festina, son of Issah, and younger brother of Sheer-jashub, of whom nothing more is known than that his name was given by Divine direction, to indicate that Danascus and Zanaria were soon to be plundered by the kings of Assyria (2 Kings v. 26; comp. 153). In reference to the grammatical construction of the several parts of the name, whether the verbal parts are imperative, indicative, infinitives, or verbal adjectives, leading versions, as well as the opinions of critics, differ; though all agree as to its general import (comp. Borelchiser in loc.).

E. — II. e.

MAHAL (מַהֲלוֹא, [vivaceous]):

Maad; Num. xxxi. 33; Maada. [Alex. Maala]. Num. xxvii. i7; Josh. xxvii. 3: Maada, Num. xxxvi. 11; Maad; Alex. Moala; 1 Chr. vii. 18: Maada in all cases, except Moladi, 1 Chr. vii. 18), the eldest of the five daughters of Zelophehad, the grandson of Manasseh, in whose favor the law of succession to an inheritance was altered (Num. xxxvii. 1-14). She married her cousin, and received as her share a portion of the territory of Manasseh, east of the Jordan.

MAHL (מַהֲלָה, [sickly, pain]):

Mo'la; [Vat. Mo'la, and once Mo'la: Moladi]. 1. The son of Merari, the son of Levi, and ancestor of the family of the Mahites (Num. iii. 20; 1 Chr. vi. 19, 29; xxiv. 20). In the last quoted verse there is apparently a gap in the text, Lihani and Shimei belonging to the family of Gershom (comp. ver. 20, 42), and Eleazar and Kish being afterwards described as the sons of Mahal (1 Chr. xxiii. 21, xxiv. 28), one of his descendants. Sheborah, by the lineage of one of the ministers to the Temple in the days of Ezra (Ezr. viii. 18). He is called MAHALI in the A. V. of Ex. vi. 19, Moli in 1 Esdr. viii. 47, and MAHUL in the margin.

2. The son of Mushi, and grandson of Merari (1 Chr. vi. 47, xxiv. 23, xxiv. 39).

MAHLITES, THE (מַהֲלוֹאִים [see above])
MAHLON (םהלון) [pining]: Mahlah, the first husband of Ruth. He and his brother Chilion were sons of Eli'nechac and Naomi, and are described, exactly in the same terms with a subsequent member of their house — Jesse, as — "Ephratites of Bethlehem-judah" (Ruth i. 2, 5). Like his brother, Mahlon died in the land of Moab without issue, which in the Targum on Ruth (i. 5) is explained to have been a judgment for their transgression of the law in marrying a Moabitess. In the Targum on 1 Chr. iv. 22, Mahlon is identified with Joash, possibly on account of the double meaning of the Hebrew word which follows, and which signifies both "had dominion" and "married." (See that passage.) [CHILION, Amer. ed.]

MAHOL (םMahon) [a dance]: Mel: Alex. Mayhok: Mahol. The father of Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, the four men mentioned for wisdom next to Solomon himself (1 K. iv. 31), who in 1 Chr. ii. 6 are the sons and immediate descendants of Zerah. Mahol is evidently a proper name, but some consider it an appellative, and translate the "sons of Mahol" by "the sons of song," or "sons of the choir," in reference to their skill in music. In this case it would be more correct to render it "sons of the dance;" nakhol corresponding to the Greek χορός in its original sense of "a dance in a ring," though it has not followed the meanings which have been attached to its derivatives "chorus" and "choir." Jarchi says that "they were skilled in composing hymns which were recited in the dances of song;" an explanation still is that Ethan and his brethren the minstrels were called "the sons of Mahol," because nakhol is the name of an instrument of music in Ps. cl. 4. Josephus (Ant. vii. 2, § 5) calls him Iadov. W. A. W.

MAIA'NEAS [Maias]: Mi'nahas; [Ahd. Ma'ناس]; om. in Vulg.: = MAISEMATH, 7 (1 Esdr. iv. 48); probably a corruption of MAASAS.

*MAINSAIL, Acts xxvii. 40. [Simp. (6.)]

MA'KAZ (מַּקָּז) [enl., perh. border-town]: [Rom. M'కe; Vat. M'కe; Alex. M'कe; M'कe], a place, apparently a town, named once only (1 K. iv. 9), in the specification of the jurisdiction of Solomon's commissarial officer, Den-Dekar. The places which accompany it — Shocal, Beth-shemen, and Eloa-beth-hanan — seem to have been on the western slopes of the mountains of Judah and Benjamin, i. e. the district occupied by the tribe of Dan. But Makaz has not been discovered. Michmash — the reading of the LXX. (but of no other version) — is hardly possible both for distance and direction, though the position and subsequent importance of Michmash, and its great fertility of its neighborhood, render it not an unlikely seat for a commissarial officer.

MAKKEDAH (מַּקְּדָה) [place of shepherds]: Mekh'dah, once [Jos. xv. 41] Makkedah [Vat. An. Jos. x. 28]: Alex. M'ke; Syr. Mokor, and Naboth: M'ke'doth, a place memorable in the annals of the conquest of Canaan as the scene of the execution by Joshua of the five confederate kings: an act by which the victory of Beth-horon was sealed and consummated, and the subjection of the entire southern portion of the country insured. Makkedah is first mentioned (Jos. x. 10) with Azekah, in the narrative of the battle of Beth-horon, as the point to which the rout extended; but it is difficult to decide whether this refers to one of the operations in the earlier portion of the fight, or is not rather an anticipation of its close — of the circumstances related in detail in vv. 11 and 16, &c. But with regard to the event which has conferred immortality on Makkedah — the "crowning mercy" — (if we may be allowed to borrow an expression from a not dissimilar transaction in our own history) — there is fortunately no obscurity or uncertainty. It unconsciously occurred in the afternoon of that tremendous day, which was like no day before or after it." The order of the events of the twenty-four hours which elapsed after the departure from the ark and tabernacle on the camp seems to have been as follows. The march from the depths of the Jordan valley at Gilgal, through the rocky defiles of the ravines which lead up to the central hills, was made during the night. By or before dawn they had reached Gilzean: then — at the favorite hour for such surprises — came the sudden onset and the first carnage; then the chase and the appeal of Joshua to the rising sun, just darting his level rays over the ridge of the hill of

* MAKE has the sense of "do," "be occupied with," — "What makest thou in this place" (Judg. xvi. 3). The use also of "make" as signifying "pretend," "sigh" (Josh. viii. 15, 16; 2 Sam. xii. 6; Luke xxiv. 23) deserves notice.

MAKRED (M'ךד; Alex. M'ךד; Syr. Mokor, and Naboth: M'ךד), one of the "strong and great" cities of Gilead — Josephus says Galilee, but this must be an error — into which the Jews were driven by the Amorites under Moabus, and from which they were delivered by Judas Macacobaus (1 Macc. v. 26, 36; in the latter passage the name is given in the A. V. Makkedah). By Josephus (Ant. xii. 8, § 3) it is not mentioned. Some of the other cities named in this narrative have been identified; but no name corresponding to Makked has yet been discovered; and the conjecture of Schwarz (p. 230) that it is a corruption of MINNITH forミニ with, though ingenious, can hardly be accepted without further proof.

MACKELETH (מַּכּלֶת) [M'ךל': Mekeloth], a place only mentioned in Num. xxiii. 25 as that of a desert encampment of the Israelites. The name is plural in form, and may signify "places of meeting." H. H.

MAKKE'DAH (מַּקְּדַה) [place of shepherds]: Mekedah, once [Jos. xv. 41] Makkedah [Vat. An. Jos. x. 28]: Alex. M'ke; Syr. Mokor, and Naboth: M'ke'doth, a place memorable in the annals of the conquest of Canaan as the scene of the execution by Joshua of the five confederate kings: an act by which the victory of Beth-horon was sealed and consummated, and the subjection of the entire southern portion of the country insured. Gideon in the rear; then the furious storm assisting and completing the rout. In the mean time the detection of the five chiefs in their hiding-place was as communicated to Joshua, and, as soon as he matter in hand will allow, he rushes on with the whole of his force to Makkedah (ver. 21). The first thing to be done is to form a regular camp (ןַנְמָרֵב). The next to dispose of the five chiefs, and that by no hurried massacre, but in so deliberate and judicial a manner as at once to inflame terror into the Canaanites and confidence into his own followers, to show to both that "thus shall Jehovah do to all that enemies" of Israel. The cave in the recesses of which the wretched kings were hidden was a well-known one. It was close to the town; we may safely conclude that the whole preceding was in full view of the walls. At last the ceremony is over, the strange and significant parable has been acted, and the bodies of Adoni-zedek and his companions are swinging from the trees — possibly the trees of some grove sacred to the abominable rites of the Canaanite Ashtoth — in the afternoon sun. Then Joshua turns to the town itself. To force the walls, to put the king and all the inhabitants to the sword (ver. 28) is to that indomitable energy, still fresh after the gigantic labors and excitement of the last twenty-four hours — the work of an hour or two. And now the evening has arrived, the sun is at last sinking — the first sun that has set since the departure from Gilgal — and the tragedy is terminated by cutting down the five bodies from the trees, and restoring them to the cave, which is then so blocked up with stones as henceforth never again to become refuge for friend or foe of Israel.

The taking of Makkedah was the first in that series of sieges and destructions by which the Great Captain possessed himself of the main points of defense throughout this portion of the country. Its situation has hitherto eluded discovery. The catalogue of the cities of Judah in Joshua (xxv. 41) places it in the Shefelah or maritime plain, but unfortunately it forms one of a group of towns of which few or none are identified. The report of Eueschus and Jerome (Onomasticon, ounced Macedonia) is that it lay 8 miles to the east of Eleutheropolis, Beit-IIericho, a position irreconcilable with every report contained in the narrative. Porter (Handbook 224, 251) suggests a ruin on the northern slope of the Plain of Soreq, bearing the somewhat similar name of el-Khulah; but it is difficult to understand how this can have been the position of Makkedah, which we should imagine would be found, if it ever is found, considerably nearer Ramleh or Jimzn.

Vatke de Vlch (Moscow, p. 332) would place it at Nitzana, a village standing on a low hill 6 or 7 miles N.W. of Beit-Iheron; but the only claim of this site appears to be the reported existence in the neighborhood of a large cavern, while its position at least 8 miles further from Beth-horon than even el-Khulah — would make the view of the narrative taken above impossible.

MALACHI (מָלָכָי): Malikia in the title only: Malaki, the last, and therefore called "the seal" of the prophets, as his prophecies constitute the closing book of the canon. His name is probably contracted from Malachijah, "messenger of Jehovah," as Ahi (2 K. xviii. 2) from Abijah (2 Chr. xxxix. 1). Of his personal history nothing is known. A tradition preserved in Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Prophet) relates that Malachi was of the tribe of Zebulun, and born after the captivity at Sophah (Synag) in the territory of that tribe. According to the same apocryphal story he died young, and was buried with his fathers in his own country. Jerome, in the preface to his Commentary on Malachi, mentions a belief which was current among the Jews, that Malachi was identical with Ezra the priest, because the circumstances recorded in the narrative of the latter are also mentioned by the prophet. The Targum of Jonathan ben Uziel, on the words "by the hand of Malachi" (i. 1), gives the gloss "whose name is called Ezra the scribe." With equal probability Malachi has been identified with Mordecai, Nehemiah, and Zechariah. The LXX. renders "by Malachi" (Mal. i. 1), "by the hand of his angel;" and this translation appears to have given rise to the idea that Malachi, as well as Haggai and John the Baptist, this meaning. It is an entirely distinct term from מַלָּךְ, which, though also translated "hand," in the A.V., really means "authority." See Mesopotaem. 1 One of the few cases in which our translators have represented the Hebrew letter Caph by K, which they commonly reserve for Kop. [See also Mekonah.] 2 The literal Aramaic renders the words by תַּרְפָּא ; Teshubim, or תַּרְפָּא. The Hebrew term is the same as that employed in Judg. xix. 19 for the hollow basin or combe in Leth from which the spring burst forth for the relief of Samson.
was an angel in human shape (comp. Mal. iii. 1; 2 Esd. i. 40; Jerom., Comm. in Hag. i. 13). Cyril alludes to this belief only to express his disappointment, and characterizes those who held it as romancers (οὶ νάτην ἐφηβανεκαίνων κ. τ. λ.). Another Hebrew tradition associated Malachi with Haggai and Zechariah as the companions of Daniel when he saw the vision recorded in Dan. x. 7 (Smith's Select Discourses, p. 214; ed. 1669), and as among the first members of the Great Synagogue, which consisted of 120 cliers.

The time at which his prophecies were delivered it is not difficult to ascertain. Cyril makes him contemporaneous with Haggai and Zechariah, or a little later. Synedrus (p. 240 B) places these three prophets under Joshua the son of Josedec. That Malachi was contemporary with Nehemiah, is rendered probable by a comparison of ii. 8 with Neh. xii. 15; ii. 10-16 with Neh. xi. 23, &c.; and iii. 7-12 with Neh. xii. 10, &c. That he prophesied after the times of Haggai and Zechariah is inferred from his omitting to mention the restoration of the Temple, and from no allusion being made to him by Ezra. The Captivity was already a thing of the long past, and is not referred to. The existence of the Temple-service is presupposed in i. 10, iii. 1, 10. The Jewish nation had still a political chief (v. 8); distinct from, and not represented by, the high-priest. This is the case in Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 26), to which Gesenius assigns a Persian origin. Hence Vitringa concludes that Malachi delivered his prophecies after the second return of Nehemiah from Persia (Neh. xiii. 6), and subsequently to the 352d year of Artaxerxes Longimanus (cir. n. c. 420), which is the date adopted by Kennicott and Haile, and approved by Davidson (Introduct. p. 835). It may be mentioned that in the Seder Olam Rabba (p. 53, ed. Meyer), the date of Malachi's prophecy is assigned, with that of Haggai and Zechariah, to the second year of Darus; and his death in the Seder Olam Zuta (p. 105) is placed, with that of the same two prophets, in the 552d year of the Meles and Persians. The principal reasons adduced by Vitringa, and which appear conclusively to fix the time of Malachi's prophecy as contemporaneous with Nehemiah, are the following: The offenses denounced by Malachi as prevailing among the people, and especially the corruption of the priests by marrying foreign wives, correspond with the actual abuses with which Nehemiah had to contend in his efforts to bring about a reformation (comp. Mal. ii. 8 with Neh. xii. 29). The alliance of the high-priest's family with Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. xiii. 4, 28) and Sanballat the Horavite had introduced neglect of the customary Temple-service, and the offerings and tithes due to the Levites and priests, in consequence of which the Temple was forsaken (Neh. xiii. 4-13), and the Sabbath openly profaned (iv. 15-21).

The short interval of Nehemiah's absence from Jerusalem had been sufficient for the growth of these corruptions, and on his return he found it necessary to put them down with a strong hand, and to do over again the work that Ezra had done a few years before. From the striking parallelism between the state of things indicated in Malachi's prophecies and that actually existing on Nehemiah's return from the court of Artaxerxes, it is on all accounts highly probable that the efforts of the secular governor were on this occasion seconded by the preaching of "Jehovah's messenger," and that Malachi occupied the same position with regard to the reformation under Nehemiah, which Isaiah held in the time of Hezekiah, and Jeremiah in that of Josiah. The last chapter of canonical Jewish history is the key to the last chapter of its prophecies.

The book of Malachi is contained in four chapters in our version, as in the LXX., Vulgate, and Peshito-Syriac. In the Hebrew the 3d and 4th form but one chapter. The whole prophecy naturally divides itself into three sections, in the first of which Jehovah is represented as the loving father and ruler of his people (i. 2-ii. 9); in the second, as the supreme God and father of all (ii. 10-16); and in the third, as their righteous and final judge (ii. 17-end). These may be again subdivided into smaller sections, each of which follows a certain order: first, a short sentence; then the skeptical questions which might be raised by the people; and, finally, their full and triumphant refutation. The formal and almost scholastic manner of the prophecy seems to Eschyl to indicate that it was rather delivered in writing than spoken publicly. But though this may be true of the prophecy in its present shape, which probably presents the substance of oral discourses, there is no reason for supposing that it was not also pronounced orally in public, like the warnings and denunciations of the older prophets, however it may differ from them in vigor of conception and high poetic diction. The style of the prophet's language is unfitting to the manner of his prophecy. Smooth and easy to a remarkable degree, it is the style of the reasoner rather than of the poet. We miss the fiery prophetic eloquence of Isaiah, and have in its stead the calm and almost artificial discourse of the practiced orator, carefully modeled upon those of the ancient prophets; thus blending in one the characteristics of the old prophetic and the more modern dialectical structures.

I. The first section of the prophet's message consists of two parts: the first (i. 1-6) addressed to the people generally, in which Jehovah, by his messenger, asserts his love for them, and proves it, in answer to their reply, "Wherein hast thou loved us?" by referring to the punishment of Edom as an example. The second part (i. 6-ii. 9) is addressed to the priests (i. 6-ii. 5), who, had despised the name of Jehovah, and had been the chief movers of the detection from his worship and covenant. They are rebuked for the worthlessness of their sacrifices and offerings, and their profanation of the Temple there (i. 7-14). The denunciation of their offense is followed by the threat of punishment for future neglect (ii. 1-3), and the character of the true priest is drawn as the companion picture to their own (i. 5-9).

II. In the second section (ii. 10-16) the prophet reproves the people for their intermarriages with the idolatrous heathen, and the divorces by which they separated themselves from their legitimate wives, who wept at the altar of Jehovah; in violation of the great law of marriage which God, the father of all, established at the beginning. III. The judgment, which the people lightly regard, is announced with all solemnity, ushered in by the advent of the Messiah. The Lord, preceded by his messenger, shall come to his Temple suddenly, to purify the land from its iniquity, and to execute swift judgment upon those who violate their duty to God and their neighbor. The first part (ii. 17-iii. 5) of the section terminates with the threatened punishment; in the second (iii. 6-12) the faithfulness of God to his promises is vindicated, and the people exhorted to repentance.
its attendant blessings; in the third (iii. 13-iv. 6) they are reproved for their want of confidence in God, and for confusing good and evil. The final severance between the righteous and the wicked is then set forth, and the great day of judgment is depicted, to be announced by the coming of Elijah, or John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ (Matt. xi. 14, xvii. 10-13).

The prophecy of Malachi is alluded to in the N. T., and its canonical authority thereby established (comp. Mark i. 2, ix. 11, 12; Luke i. 17; Rom. ix. 13).

W. A. W.

It has been made a question (not distinctly adverted to here) whether the Hebrew term for Malachi in i. 1 denotes the actual name of the prophet or his mission and office. According to this form of the question the writing may be anonymous, and yet that not affect at all its canonical character or authority. This idea of the appellative import of the name probably appears in εν χειρι ἄγγελου αὐτοῦ of the LXX. Jerome also entertained this view.

Writings, among other later writers, support the statement (see Note on verse, ii. 31-32) that Hengstenberg (denying the reference to the prophet either as a personal or a symbolic name) maintains that it is identical with "my messenger" in iii. i. (Christologie, iii. 582 ff., 2. Ausg. or Keith's trans., iii. 272 ff.) The correspondence between the name and Malachi's errand as "Jehovah's messenger" or "my messenger," i. e. of Jehovah, does not show the name to be fictitious: for this correspondence between names and history of occurrence is a well-known characteristic of Hebrew names (for example, Elijah, Isaiah), and may be accounted for sometimes as accidental and sometimes as a change of the original name (subsequently lost) for the sake of the conformity. [NAMES, Amer. ed.] Hengstenberg urges that the title (i. i.) says nothing of the parentage or birth-place of the prophet. But this omission is not peculiar to Malachi; for of the sixteen prophets whose writings are preserved in the Canon, the fathers of only eight are named. The birth-place of only three (Amos, Micah, and Nahum) is mentioned, and in the case of Haggai and Haggai, nothing is added to the names except "the prophet".

Another of his arguments is that Nehemiah, the contemporary of Malachi, makes no mention of him. But history shows innumerable instances in which writers of the same period who are known in other ways to have been personally connected with each other, have left in their works no evidence of this knowledge and intimacy. Besides, in this case Nehemiah may possibly have been absent from Jerusalem at the time of Malachi's greatest activity (see Neh. xii. 6), and hence would have had so much less occasion for speaking of him. Further, the use of the same expression as a proper name in one place is not inconsistent with its literal sense in another place: and still more questionable is the identification if the Hebrew expression in i. 1 differs from that in iii. i. as "a messenger of Jehovah" differs from "my messenger." Hengstenberg denies, in opposition to the best authorities (First, Ges. s. r., that מָלָךְ is abridged from מְלָכָה). In support of that etymology see Havernick's Einl. in den A. Test., ii. 431, and especially Nisselovitch's article on "Malachi" in Her- sogg's R. d. Evangelii, vii. 755. Block remarks that the form itself of the name leads us much sooner to think of an actual name, as also by far most of the interpreters understand it." (Einl. in den A. Test. p. 566).

The unity which characterizes the contents of Malachi is unusual. Instead of being composed of detached messages or themes, as in the case of the other prophets, the parts here arise out of each other by a natural gradation. The ground-thought which pervades the book is that of the relations of God and his chosen people to each other under the ancient and the new economy.

Literature.—For the older writers on Malachi either separately or as one of the minor prophets (among whom may be mentioned Calvin, Barheb, Seb. Schmid, Faber, Pococke), see Winer's Handb. der theolog. Literatur, i. 222 ff. The later commentators (most of them in connection with the Minor Prophets) are Rosenmüller, Ewald, Umbreit, Hitzig, Maurer, Keil (ib. iv., Bibl. Comm. 1886), Loud. Reinke, Henderson (Amer. ed., 1860); and in this country Neyes, T. V. Moore (Prophecies of the Restoration, New York, 1856), and Cowles. (See the lists under AMOS and HABAKKUK.) Reinke's work (Der Prophet Malachi, Giessen, 1850) contains an introduction, the Hebrew text, and a translation, together with philological and historical notes, and is the most complete modern work on this prophet. On the Christology of the book, one may consult Haake's dass Christologie des O.T. MAL'ACHTA (Molochina), the prophet Malachi (2 Esdr. i. 40).

MAL'ACHAM (םָלָךְ their king): Mal- i. 1. One of the heads of the fathers of Benjamin, and son of Shallumah by his wife Hodesh (1 Chr. viii. 9), whom the Targum of R. Joseph identifies with Baara.

2. (ב בֶּן מָלָךְ their king): Malach. The idol Moloch, as some suppose (Zeph. i. 5). The word literally signifies "their king," as the margin of our version gives it, and is referred by Gesenius to an idol generally, as invested with regal honors by its worshippers. He quotes Is. viii. 21 and Am. 5. 26 as support of this view, though he refers Jer. xix. 1, 3, to Moloch (as the LXX., the present reading being evidently corrupt), and regards Malach as equivalent to Milcom (1 K. xi. 5, &c.). Hitzig (Kurzg. Hdb. Jeremia), while he considers the idol Moloch as unquestionably intended in Jer. xiv. 1, renders Malachim literally "their king" in ver. 3. The same ambiguity occurs in 2 Sam. xii. 30, where David, after his conquest of the Ammonites, is said to have taken the crown of "their king," or " Malachim" (see LXX. and Vulg., on 1 Chr. xx. 2). A legend is told in Jerome's Questions de loc. (1 Chr. xx. 2), how that, as it was unlawful for a Hebrew to touch anything of gold or silver belonging to an idol, Hittai the Gittite, who was a Philistine, snatched the crown from the head of Milcom, and gave it to David, who thus avoided the pollution. [Hittai; Moloch.]

Again, in 2 Sam. xii. 31, the Gittite has מָלָךְ where the Keri is מָלָךְ מָלָקָה (A. V. "through the [Joshua's king: [Malchias; [Vat. Melchias]: Melchias].] A descendant of Gershom the son of Levi, and ancestor of Asaph the minstrel (1 Chr. vi. 40).
Malchiah

* The A. V. ed. 1011 here reads Melchiah; the Bishops' Bible Melchisia.

1. [Vat. FA. Melchias: Melchias.] A priest, the father of Pashur (1 Chr. ix. 26; Neh. iii. 14).

2. [Vat. FA. Melchias: Melchias.] One of the sons of Parosh, who was married a foreign wife, and put her away at the command of Ezra (Ezr. x. 25; Neh. vii. 4).

3. [Vat. Alex. FA. Melchias: Melchias.] Enumerated among the sons of Harim, who lived in the time of Ezra, and had intermarried with the people of the land (Ezr. x. 31). In 1 Esdr. x. 32 he appears as Melchias, and in Neh. iii. 11 as Malchis [Melchias; [Vat. FA. Melchias]: Melchias].

4. Vat. Alex. Melchias.] Son of Rechab, and ruler of the circuit or environs of Bethcerehem. He took part in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah, and repaired the Dung Gate (Neh. iii. 14).

5. [Vat. FA. Melchias: Melchias.] "The goldsmith's son," who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 31). The word rendered "the goldsmith" is taken as a proper name by the LXX. (Zechariah), and in the Peshito-Syriac Malchiah is called "the son of Zephaniah." The A. V. has followed the Vulgate and Jarchi.

6. [Melchias: [Vat. FA. Alex. Melchias: Melchias.] One of the priests who stood at the left hand of Ezra when he read the Law to the people in the street before the Water Gate (Neh. viii. 4). In 1 Esdr. ix. 4 he is called Melchitas.

7. [Vat. Neh. Vat. M. Melchias: FA. Melchias.] A priest, the father of Paschur = Malchisiah 1 (Neh. xi. 12; Jer. xxxviii. 1), and Melchisiah (Jer. xxi. 1).

8. [Malchis [see above: Alex. Melchias: Melchias.] The son of Ham-melech (or "the king's son"), as it is translated in 1 K. xxii. 26; 2 Chr. xxvii. 7), into whose dungeon or cistern Jeremiah was cast (Jer. xxxvii. 6). The title "king's son" is applied to Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvi. 26), who was among those commissioned by the king to take prisoners Jeremiah and Baruch; to Joash, who appears to have held an office inferior to that of the governor of the city; and to whose custody Micaiah was committed by Ahah (1 K. xxi. 22); and to Zadokiah who was slain by Zichri the Ephraimite in the vasion of Judah by Pekah, in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxvii. 7). It would seem from these passages that the title "king's son" was applied to Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvi. 26), who was among those commissioned by the king to take prisoners Jeremiah and Baruch; to Joash, who appears to have held an office inferior to that of the governor of the city; and to whose custody Micaiah was committed by Ahah (1 K. xxi. 22); and to Zadokiah who was slain by Zichri the Ephraimite in the invasion of Judah by Pekah, in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxvii. 7). It would seem from these passages that the title "king's son" was applied to that of "king's mother," and applied to one of the royal family, who exercised functions somewhat similar to those of Potiphar in the court of Pharaoh.

Malchiel

[God's king, i. e. appointed by him: Melchias, Gen. xvi. 17; Melchis, in Num. and Chr., as Alex. in all cases; Vat. in Num. Melchis, in Chr. Melchiel; Melchiel, the son of Bethiah, the son of Asher, and ancestor of the family of the Malchielites (Num. xxvi. 45). In 1 Chr. vii. 31 he is called the father, that is founder, of Bizzizra or Berath; as is the reading of the Targum of J. Josephus (Ant. ii. 7, § 4) reckons him with Heber among the six sons of Asher, thus making up the number of Jacob's children and grandchildren to seventy, without reckoning great-grandchildren.

Malchiah 2

1. [Vat. FA. Melchias: Melchias.] A priest, the father of Pashur (1 Chr. ix. 12); the same as Malchisiah 7.

2. [Vat. FA. Melchias: Melchias.] A priest, chief of the fifth of the twenty-four courses appointed by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 9).

3. [Vat. Melchias: [Vat. Melchias: Melchias; [Vat. FA. Melchias: Melchis]: Josephas (2) An Israelite servant of the sons of Parosh, who at Ezra's command put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 25). In 1 Esdr. ix. 26 he is called Asirias, which agrees with the reading of the LXX.

4. [Melchias: [Vat. FA. Alex. Melchias: Melchias.] Son, that is, descendant of Harim, who with Hashub repaired the Tower of the Furnaces when the wall of Jerusalem was rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 11). He is probably the same as Malchisiah 3.

5. [Melchias: [Vat. Alex. Melchias: Melchias.] One of the priests who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 3). It seems probable that the names in the list referred to are rather those of families than of individuals (comp. 1 Chr. xxiv. 7-18, and Neh. xii. 1-7), and in this case Malchijah in Neh. x. 3 would be the same with the head of the fifth course of priests = Malchisiah 2.

6. [Melchias: [Vat. Alex. Melchias: Melchias.] One of the priests who assisted in the solemn dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).

Malchiram (Malchiram: [king of cedars]: Melchira; [Vat. Melchias: Melchiram], one of the sons of Jechoniah, or Jehoachin, the last but one of the kings of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 18).

Malchi-shua (Malchi-shua: [king of help]: [Rom. Alex. Melchi-shua: Vat. Alex. Melchi-shua: Melchis]: Melchisid, one of the sons of king Saul. His position in the family cannot be exactly determined. In the two genealogies of Saul's house preserved in Chronicles he is given as the second son next below Jonathan (1 Chr. viii. 53; ix. 39). But in the account of Saul's offspring in 1 Samuel he is named third—Isbi being between Jonathan (1 Sam. xiv. 49), and on the remaining occasion the same order is preserved, but Abinadab is substituted for Ishbi (1 Sam. xxi. 2). In both these latter passages the name is erroneously given in the A. V. as Melchi-shua. Nothing is known of Malchi-shua beyond the fact that he fell, with his two brothers, and before his father, in the early part of the battle of Gilboa. G MALCHUS (Mαλχος; Molluck, in 1 Chr. vi. 44, Neh. x. 4, &c., ruler or councillor; LXX. Μαλχος or Μαλθος; and Joseph. Μαλχος, Ant. xiii. 5, § 1, xiv. 14, § 1) is the name of the servant of the high-priest, whose right ear Peter cut off at the time of the Saviour's apprehension in the garden. See the narrative in Matt. xxvi. 51; Mark xiv. 47; Luke xxi. 49-51; John xviii. 10. He was the personal servant (διάλογος) of the high-priest, and not one of the hallifs or apparitors (ἀναπληρώτες) of the Sanhedrim. The high-priest intended is Caiaphas no doubt (though Anna is called ἀρχιερεύς in the same connection): for John, who was personally known to the former (John xviii. 15), is the only one of the Evangelists who gives the name of Malchus. This servant was probably stepping forward at the moment with others to handfast or pinion Jesus, when the zealous Peter struck at him with his sword. The blow was meant undoubtedly to be more effective, but reached only the ear. It may be as Stere remarks (Reisen Jean, vi. 268), that the man seeing the danger, threw his head or body to the let, so as to expose the right ear more than the other.

The allegation that the writers are inconsistent with each other, because Matthew, Mark, and John say either άτίνος, or άτραπωρ (as if that meant the lippet or tip of the ear), while Luke says άύς, is groundless. The Greek of the New Testament age, like the modern Romaine, made no distinction often between the primitive and diminutive. This is especially true of terms relating to parts of the human body. (See Lobeck ad Phara, p. 211.) In fact, Luke himself exchanges the one term for the other in this very narrative (vv. 50 and 51). The Saviour, as his pursuers were about to seize Him, asked to be left tree for a moment longer (τετέρα εις ταύτην [Luke xxi. 51]), and that moment He used in restoring the wounded man to soundness. The άφθανος τού άτίνος may indicate (which is not forbidden by άφθανετοι, απεκοφέτοι) that the ear still adhered slightly to its place. It is noticeable that Luke the physician is the only one of the writers who mentions the act of healing. It is a touching remembrance that this was our Lord's last miracle for the relief of human suffering. The hands which had been stretched forth so often to heal and bless mankind, were then bound, and his beneficent ministry in that form of his exercise was finished for ever. H. B. H.

MALE LEEL (Μαλλαλέεια; Molhlel). The same as MAHALALEL, the son of Caiman (Luke iii. 37; Gen. v. 12, marg.).

MALLOWS, THEY OF (Μαλλάδειαι; Molhlae), who, with the people of Tarsus, revolted from Antiochus Epiphanes because he had bestowed them on one of his concubines (2 Macc. iv. 30). The absence of the king from Antioch to put down the insurrection, gave the infamous Menelaus the high-priest an opportunity of plundering some of the sacred vessels from the Temple of Jerusalem (vv. 32, 39), an act which finally led to the murder of the good Onias (vv. 34, 35). Mallos was an important city of Cilicia, lying at the mouth of the Pyramus (Zeilaun), on the shore of the Mediterranean, N. E. of Cyprus, and about 20 miles from Tarsus (Tarsea). (See Dict. of Geography.)

MALLOTHI (Μαλλοθiggs [perh. Jecohiak is spurious]. First): Mollotti; (Vat. Masora, Mollotti.) Alex. Molloti, and Mollarv Mollotti, a Kohathite, one of the fourteen sons of Heman the singer, and chief of the nineteenth course of twelve Levites into which the Temple choir was divided (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 26). (Hovius, Amer. ed.)

MALLOWS (Μαλώς, malluoch [sc. Αλμα: herba et arborem cortices]. By the Hebrew word we are no doubt to understand some species of Orchis, and in all probability the Aristolochia mollissima of botanists. It occurs only in Job xxx. 4, where the patriarch launts that he is exposed to the derision of the lowest of the people, "whose fathers he would have disbained to have set with the dogs of his flock," and who from poverty were obliged to seek their sustenance in desert places amongst wild herbs—"who pluck off the sea orchis near the hedges and eat the bitter roots of the Spanish bower." Some writers, as R. Levi (Job xxx.) and Luther, with the Swedish and the old Danish versions, have understood "nelttes" to be denoted by malluoch, this troublesome weed having been from time immemorial an article of occasional diet.

Jew's Mallow (Corchorus olitorius).

amongst the poor, even as it is amongst ourselves at this day (1 Tim. II. V. xxi. 15; Athen. iv. c. 15). Others have conjectured that some species of “mallow” (malow) is intended, as Boedas and the A. V. Sprengel (Hist. Rei herb. 14) identifies the “Jew’s mallow” (Corchorus olitorius) with the mallow, and Lady Calcutt (Script. Herb. p. 255) is of a similar opinion. In Purchas’s Pilgrims,” observes this writer, “there is a letter from Master William Biddulph, who was travelling from Aleppo to Jerusalem in 1600, in which he says, “we saw many poor people gathering mallows and three-leaved grasse, and asked them what they did with it, and they answered that it was all their food and they did eat it.” See also Harmer’s Observations, iii. 169. There is no doubt that this same mallow is still eaten in Arabia and Palestine, the leaves and pods being used as a pot-herb. Dr. Shaw (Treat. i. 298, 8vo. 1808) mentions Mallow-Keachs, which he says is the same with the Corchorus, as being cultivated in the gardens of Barbary, and draws attention to the resemblance of this word with the mallowach of Job, but he thinks “some other plant of a more saltish taste.”

is rather intended. The Atriplex halimus has undoubtedly the best claim to represent the mallowach, as Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 233), and before him Drusius (Quodst. Hebr. i. qu. 17) have proved. Cædus (Hieroz. ii. 97), Hillel (Hierozol. i. 457), Rosenmüller (Schol. in Job xxx. 4, and Botany of the Bible, p. 115), and Dr. Kitto (Pictor. Bible on 16) adopt this opinion. The Greek word used by the LXX. is applied by Dioscorides (i. c. 120) to the Atriplex halimus, as Sprengel (Comment. in . c.) has shown. Dioscorides says of this plant, that it is a shrub which is used for hedges, and resembles the Rhamnus, being white and without horns; its leaves are like those of the olive, but broader and smoother, they are cooked as vegetables; the plant grows near the sea, and in hedges.” See also the quotation from the Arabian botanist, Alen-

MAMMON

Beitar (in Bochart, l.c. above), who says that the plant which Dioscorides calls “halimus” is the same with that which the Syrians call mallow, Galen (vi. 22), Scrapius in Bochart, and Prosper Alpinus (De Plant. Aegypt. cxxvii. 45).

The Hebrew name, like the Greek, has reference either to the bonyness where the plant grows — often grassy or leafy mat — or to its saline taste. The Atriplex halimus is a shrub from four to five feet high, with many thick branches; the leaves are rather sour to the taste; the flowers are purple and very small; it grows on the sea-coast in Greece, Arabia, Syria, etc., and belongs to the natural Order Chenopodiaceae. Atriplex hortensis, or garden Orach, is often cooked and eaten as spinach, to which it is by some persons preferred. W. H.

“The best authorities,” says Tristram (Not. Hist. of the Bible, p. 464), “are in favor of a species of Sea Purslane (Atriplex halimus), which grows abundantly on the shores of the Mediterranean, in salt marshes, and also on the shores of the Dead Sea still more luxuriantly. We found thickets of it of considerable extent on the west side of the sea, and it exclusively supplied us with fuel for many days. It grows there to the height of ten feet — more than double its size on the Mediterranean. It forms a dense mass of thin twigs without thorns, has very minute purple flowers close to the stem, and small, thick, sour-tasting leaves, which could be eaten, as is the Atriplex hortensis, or garden Orache, but it would be very miserable food.” Prof. Coman renders ממלעך “salt-plant” (Book of Job, in loc.).

MAL'LUCH [מַלְלֻךְ; ruler or counselor]:

Malḵû: Maloch.

1. A Levite of the family of Merari, and ancestor of Ethan the singer (1 Chr. vi. 44).

2. (Malḵû:) [Vat. with preceding word, Malḵû-malḵû:] Mallickh. One of the sons of Beni, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra’s command (Ezr. x. 3). He was probably of the tribe of Judah and line of Pharez (see 1 Chr. ix. 4). In the parallel list of 1 Esdr. ix. 30, he is called Mal-lechuch.

3. (Baḵû:) [Vat.] Alex. Malḵû: Malockey.

One of the descendants of Harim in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 32).

4. (Malḵû:) Mellukh. A priest or family of priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 4).

5. One of the “heads” of the people who signed the covenant on the same occasion (Neh. x. 27).

6. (Vat. Akuk.) One of the families of priests who returned with Zerubabel (Neh. xii. 23; probably the same as No. 4). It was represented in the time of Joashim by Jonathan (ver. 14). The same as Melicu.

MAM'ATAS [3 vbl.] (Saznayis: Sameon), apparently the same with Shemaleh in Ezr. viii. 16. In the Geneva version of 1 Esdr. viii. 44, it is written Samain. [See also Masmak.]

MAM'MON (מָעָם; Matt. vi. 24, and Luke xvi. 9), a word which often occurs in the Chaldee Targums of Onkelos, and later writers, and in the Syriac version, and which signifies “riches.” This meaning of the word is given by Tertullian, Adv. Marc. iv. 33, and by Augustine and Jerome commenting on St. Matthew: Augus-

b In the Jewish traditions he appears as encouraging Abraham to unburgo the pain of circumcision, from which his brothers would have divorced him — by a recurrence to the deliverance he had already experienced from far greater trials — the furnace of Chedron and the sound of Cherubim. (Beer, Livon Abrahams, 3d.)

A. It has been derived from 'man,' "he was sick," so as to mean weak, mortal; to which Gesenius objects that this verb comes from the theme 8 (Lxx. s v. 8).

q The opposite signification, strength and robust.

r. It has been suggested with a reference to the theme 8 (First. Concord. s v. 8). It seems more reasonable to suppose, with Gesenius, that this is a primitive word — Lxx. s v. 8. Perhaps the der of being may lie at its foundation.
of a son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen. iv. 26; 1 Chr. 1. 1). In the A. V. it is written Enos. It might be supposed that this was a case like that of Adam's name; but this cannot be admitted, since the variant Jsh and the fem. form Ishshah are used before the birth of Enos, as in the cases of the naming of Eve (Gen. ii. 23) and Cain (iv. 1). If it be objected that we must not lay too much stress upon verbal criticism, we reply that, if so, no stress can be laid upon the name of Enos, which might even be a translation, and that such forms as Methusel and Methuselah, which have the characteristics of a primitive state of Hebrew, oblige us to lay the greatest stress upon verbal criticism.a

3. Geber, γεβήρ, "a man," from γεβάω, b "to be strong," generally with reference to his strength, corresponding to sir and āvēp.

4. Méthim, מְתִימָ, c "men," always masculine. The singular is to be traced in the antediluvian proper names Methusel and Methuselah.b Perhaps it may be derived from the root מִיח, "he died,"c in which case its use would be very appropriate in Is. xii. 14, "Fear not, thou womb Jacob, ye men of Israel."d If this conjecture be admitted, this word would correspond to βρότος and might be read "mortals."

MANAEN: Manaen is mentioned in Acts xiii. 1 as one of the teachers and prophets in the church at Antioch at the time of the appointment of Saul and Barnabas as missionaries to the heathen. He is not known out of this passage. The name signifies consider (נכול, κοιτάζων), 2 K. xv. 17, &c.; and both that and his relation to Herod render it quite certain that he was a Jew. The Herod with whom he is said to have been brought up (συνήφη) could not have been Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xxv. 13), for as he was only seventeen old at the time of the death of his father, Herod Agrippa I. in A. D. 44 (Joseph. Ant. xix. 9, § 1), a comrade of that age would have been too young to be so prominent as a teacher at Antioch as Manaen was at the date of Paul's first missionary journey (Acts xiii. 3). The Herod in question must have been Herod Antipas, under whose jurisdiction the Saviour as a Galilean lived, and who beheaded John the Baptist. Since this Antipas was older than Archelaus, who succeeded Herod the Great soon after the birth of Christ, Manaen (his συνήφη) must have been somewhat advanced in years in A. D. 44, when he appears before us in Luke's history—older certainly than forty-five or fifty, as stated in Lange's Biblicalk (v. 192). The point of chief interest relating to him concerns the sense of συνήφη, which the historian regarded as sufficiently remarkable to connect with his name. We have a learned discussion of this question in Walch's Dissertationes in Acta Apostolorum (de Menachen, ii. 195-292). For the value of this treatise see Tholuck's Greek Syntax, p. 107.

The following are the principal views that have been advanced, and have still their advocates. One is that συνήφη means comrade, associate, or, more strictly, one brought up, educated with another. This is the more frequent sense of the word, and Calvin, Grotius, Schott, Baumgarten, and others, adopt it here. It was very common in ancient times for persons of rank to associate other children with their own, for the purpose of sharing their amusements (hence συνηστασία in Xenoph. Cyr. v. iii. 3, § 14) and their studies, and thus exciting them to greater activity and emulation. Josephus, Plutarch, Polybius, and others speak of this custom. Walch shows it to have existed among the Medes, Persians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans. Herod might have adopted it from the Romans, whom he was so much inclined to imitate (see Raphel's Annotationes, ii. 80, and Wetstein, Nov. Testament. ii. 532).

The other view is that συνήφη denotes foster-brother, brought up at the same breast (αυγογαλακτος, colostanches), and, as so taken, Manaen's mother, or the woman who reared him, would have been also Herod's nurse. So Kinoed, Olshausen, De Wette, Alford, and others. Walch's conclusion (not correctly represented by some recent writers) combines in a measure these two explanations. He thinks that Manaen was educated in Herod's family along with Antipas and some of his other children, and at the same time that he stood in the stricter relation to Antipas which συνήφη denotes as colostanches. He calls attention to the statement of Josephus (Ant. xvii. 1, § 3) that the brothers Antipas and Archelaus were educated in a private way at Rome (Ἀρχέλαος δὲ καὶ Ἀντίπας καὶ Ράφας παῖδα τὴν ἱδίατη τροφαζόν εὔγνων), and though not so supposing that Manaen accompanied them thither he thinks we may infer that Manaen enjoyed at home the same course of discipline and instruction (συνήφη) in that sense as the two brothers, who are not likely to have been separated in their earlier, any more than in their later education. Yet as Manaen is called the συνήφη of Herod, and whilst he suggests that there may have been the additional tie in their case which resulted from their having had a common nurse.

It is a singular circumstance, to say the least, that Josephus (Ant. xv. 10, § 5) mentions a certain Manaen (Μαναηᾶς), who was in high repute among the Essenes for wisdom and sanctity, and who foretold to Herod the Great, in early life, that he was destined to attain royal honors. After the fulfillment of the prediction he lived the prophet, with special favor, and honored the entire sect on his account (παται αὐτ' ἐκείνου τοῖς Ἑσσαῖοι is not, as Gessenius would make it, changed by the construct state, but has a case-ending 3, to be compared to the Arabic case-ending of the nominative, un. 3, 51, 1.

f מָנָה לָא; יבשונת יִשְׂרָאֵל. For the word "worm" compare Job xiv. 6; Ps. xiii. 6.
MANAHATH

There was a class of the Essenes who had families (Walsh, 257 i., though others had not; and it has been conjectured with some plausibility that, as one of the results of Herod's friendship for the lucky soothsayer, he may have adopted one of his sons (who took the father's name), so far as to receive him into his family, and make him the companion of his children (see Walsh, p. 234, &c.). Lichtfurst surmises, as one of the possibilities, that the Manaei of Josephus may be the one mentioned in the Acts (superscription, etc.); he has sought, however, in vain to make the name of the soothsayer may have been the prophet at Antioch. (See I뉴스. ii. 726 f.) The inevitable disparity in age which must have existed between the Essene of Josephus and Antipas, the son of Herod the Great, to say nothing of other difficulties, puts the former of their suppositions out of the question.

The precise interest which led Luke to recall the Herodian connection is not certain. Meyer's suggestion, that it may have been the contrast between the early relationship and Manaeus's later Christian position (though he makes it of the first only), applies to one sense of συντροφία as well as the other. A far-fetched motive need not be sought. Even such a close relation to the great Jewish family of the age (whether it was that of a foster-brother or a companion of princes) was peculiar and interesting, and would be mentioned without any special object merely as a part of the individual's history. Walch's citations show that συντροφία, as used of such intimacies (συντροφικά), was a title very esteemed among the ancients; that it was often borne through life as a sort of proper name, and was prefixed among the honorifics of the epitaph after death. It is found repeatedly on ancient monuments.

It may be added that Manaeus, as a resident in Palestine (he may have been one of Herod's courtiers till his banishment to Gaul), could hardly fail to have had some personal knowledge of the Saviour's ministry. He must have spent his youth at Jerusalem or in that neighborhood; and among his recollections of that period, connected as he was with Herod's family, may have been the tragic scene of the massacre at Bethlehem. MANASSEH

[Vat.] Manasses: [Rom. 6-12; Alex. Mushaeth.] Manasseh, a place named in 1 Chr. viii. 6 only, in connection with the genealogies of the tribe of Benjamin. The passage is very obscure, and is not made less so by the translation of the A. V.; but the meaning probably is that the family of Ephraim had the heads of the town of Gela, migrated thence, under the guidance of Manasseh, Ahiah, and Gera, and settled at Manasseh. Of the situation of Manasseh we know little or nothing. It is tempting to believe it identical with the Menammeh mentioned, according to many interpreters, in Judges xx. 44 b (in the A. V. translated "with ease"). This has in its favor the close proximity in which the place, if a place, evidently stood to Gibeah, which was one of the chief towns of Benjamin, even if not identical with Gela. [Meyers; Amer. ed.]. Manassath is usually identified with a place of similar name in Judah, but, considering how hostile the relations of Judah and Benjamin were at the earlier period of the history, this identification is difficult to receive. The Chaldee Targum adds, "in the land of the house of Esam," i. e. in Edom. The Syriac and Arabic versions connect the name with that immediately following, and read "to the plein or pasture of Naaman." But these explanations are no less obscure than that which they seek to explain. [Manashitehs.]

Of the situation or nature of the place or places we have as yet no knowledge. The town Manassteath naturally suggests itself, but it seems impossible to identify a Benjaminite town with a place occurring in the genealogies of Judah, and apparently in close connection with Bethlehem and with the horse of Job, the great opponent and murderer of Absol the Benjaminite. It is more probably identical with Manocho (Manassthes = מְנַשְׂחָת), one of the eleven cities which in the LXX. text are inserted between verses 59 and 60 of Josh. xiv., Bethlehem being another of the eleven. The writer of the Targum, playing on the word as if it were Menochah, "an offering," renders the passage in 1 Chr. ii. 52, "the priests and priests who looked to the division of the offerings." His interpretation of vers. of ver. 54 is too long to quote here. See the editions of Wilkins and Beek, with the learned notes of the latter.

MANASSEH (? [Manasseh: [Vat. Abd.] Alex. Marasaseth: w. Manasses = Manasseh 3, of the sons of Patheb Meab (1 Esdr. ix. 31; comp. Ezr. x. 30).
The position of the tribe of Manasseh during the march to Canaan was with Ephraim and Benjamin on the west side of the sacred Tent. The standard of the three sons of Rachel was the figure of a boy with the inscription, "The cloud of Jehovah rested on them until they went forth out of the camp" (Targ. PsuedoJoh. On Num. ii. 18). The Chief of the tribe at the time of the census at Sinai was Gannani ben-Pedalzur, and its numbers were then 32,200 (Num. i. 10, 35, ii. 20, 21, vii. 54-59). The numbers of Ephraim were at the same date 40,500. Forty years later, on the banks of Jordan, these proportions were reversed. Manasseh had then increased to 52,700, while Ephraim had diminished to 32,500 (Num. xxvi. 34, 37). On this occasion it is remarkable that Manasseh resumes his position in the catalogue as the eldest son of Joseph. Possibly this is due to the prowess which the tribe had shown in the conquest of Gilgal, for Manasseh was certainly at this time the most distinguished of all the tribes. Of the three who had elected to remain on that side of the Jordan, Reuben and Gad had chosen the lot because the country was suitable to their pastoral possessions and tendencies. But Machir, Jair, and Noboth, the sons of Manasseh, were no shepherds. They were pure warriors, who had taken the most prominent part in the conquest of those provinces which up to that time had been conquered, and whose deeds are constantly referred to (Num. xxxii. 20; Deut. iii. 13, 14, 15) with credit and renown. "Jair the son of Manasseh took all the tract of Argob, . . . sixty great cities" (Deut. iii. 14). "Noboth took Kenath and the daughter-towns thereof, and called it after his own name" (Num. xxxii. 43). "Because Machir was a man of war, therefore he had Gilead and Bashan" (Jesh. xvii. 1). The district which these ancient warriors conquered was among the most difficult, if not the most difficult, in the whole country. It embraced the hills of Gilead with their numerous heights and impassable ravines, and the almost impregnable tract of Argob, which derives its modern name of Lejoph from the secure "asylum" it affords to those who take refuge within its natural fortifications. Had they not remained a This seems to follow from the expressions of xviii. 5 and 9: "The two sons who were born unto thee in the land of Egypt" — "My sons whom thou hast given me in this place," and from the solemn invocation over them of Jacob's "name," and the "names" of Abraham and Isaac (ver. 16), combined with the fact of Joseph having married an Egyptian, a person of different race from his own. The Jewish commentators overcome the difficulty of Joseph's marrying an entire foreigner, by a tradition that Asenath was the daughter of Bithus and Shechem. See Targum PseudoJoh. on Gen. xlii. 45.

b "And like fish become a multitude." Such is the literal rendering of the words צ'ג"י צ'ג"י (Gen. xlviii. 16), which in the text of the A. V. are "grow into a multitude." The sense is preserved in the margin. The expression is no doubt derived from that which is to this day one of the most characteristic things in Egypt. Certainly, next to the vast stream itself, nothing could strike a native of Southern Palestine more, on his first visit to the banks of the Nile, than the abundance of its fish.

in these wild and inaccessible districts, but had gone forward and taken their lot with the rest, who shall say what changes might not have occurred in the history of the nation, through the presence of such energetic and warlike spirits? The few personalities of eminence whom we can with certainty identify as Manassites, such as Gideon and Jephthah—for Elijah and others may with equal probability have belonged to the neighboring tribe of Gad—were among the most remarkable characters that Israel produced. Gideon was in fact the greatest of the judges, and his children all but established hereditary monarchy in their own line (Stanley, S. of P., p. 230). But with the one exception of Gideon the warlike tendencies of Manasseh seem to have been confined to the east of the Jordan. There they drove exceedingly, pushing their way northward over the rich plains of Judaea and Jazer—the Golanites and Ituraeans of the Roman period—to the foot of Mount Hermon. At the time of the coronation of David at Hebron, while the western Manasseh sent 18,000, and Ephraim itself 20,800, the eastern Manasseh, with Gad and Reuben, mustered to the number of 120,000, thoroughly armed—a remarkable demonstration of strength, still more remarkable when we remember the fact that Saul's house, with David and Jonathan, was then residing at Mahanaim on the border of Manasseh and Gad. But, though thus outwardly prosperous, a similar fate awaited them in the end to that which befall Gad and Reuben; they gradually assimilated themselves to the old inhabitants of the country—they transgressed against the God of their fathers, and went a-wandering after the gods of the people of the land whom God destroyed before them (ib. v. 25). They relinquished too the settled mode of life and the defined limits which beffited the members of a federal nation, and gradually became Bedouins of the wilderness, spreading themselves over the vast deserts which lay between the allotted possessions of their tribe and the Ephraimites, and which had from time immemorial been the hunting-grounds and pastures of the wild Hafragites of Jazer, Nophili and Nobash (1 Chr. v. 19, 22). Up to that time the punishment which was ordained to be the inevitable consequence of such misdoing. They, first of all Israel, were carried away by Palt and Tuthith-Pischar, and settled in the Assyrian territories (ib. vii. 26). The connection, however, between east and west had been kept up to a certain degree. In Beth-shan, the most easterly city of the cis-Jordanic Manasseh, the two portions all but joined. David had judges or officers there for the western sacred and secular (1 Chr. xxvii. 32); and Solomon's commissariat officer, Ben-Giberel, ruled over the towns of Jair and the whole district of Argob (1 K. iv. 13), and transmitted their productions, doubtless not without their people, to the court of Jerusalem. The genealogies of the tribe are preserved in Num. xxvi. 28-41; Josh. xvii. 1, &c.; and 1 Chr. viii. 14-19. But it seems impossible to unravel these so as to ascertain for instance which of the families remained east of Jordan, and which advanced to the west. From the fact that Abi-ezer (the family of Gideon), Hophir (possibly Ophrah, the native place of the same hero), and Shechem (the well-known city of the Bene-Joseph) all occur among the names of the sons of Gilead the son of Machir, it seems probable that Gilead, whose name is so intimately connected with the eastern, was also the immediate progenitor of the western half of the tribe. Nor is it less difficult to fix the exact position of the territory allotted to the western half. In Josh. xvii. 14-18, a passage usually regarded by critics as an exceedingly ancient document, we find the two tribes of Joseph complaining that only one portion had been allotted to them, namely, Mount Ephraim (ver. 15), and that they could not extend into the plains of Jordan or Edaron, because these districts were still in the possession of the Canaanites, and secured by their chariots. In reply Joshua advises them to go up into the forest (ver. 15. A. V. "wood")—into the mountain which is a forest (ver. 18). This mountain clothed with forest can surely be nothing but Carmel, the mountain closely adjoining the portion of Ephraim, whose richness of wood was so proverbial. And it is in accordance with this view that the majority of the towns of Manasseh—which as the weaker portion of the tribe would naturally be pushed to seek its fortunes outside the limits originally bestowed—were actually on the slopes either of Carmel itself or of the contiguous ranges. Thus Tannach and Megiddon were on the northern spur of Carmel; Hileam appears to have been on the eastern continuation of the range, somewhere near the present Junin. Ex. XIX was on the slopes of the so-called "Little Hermon." The two remaining towns mentioned as belonging to Manasseh formed the extreme eastern and western limits of the tribe; the one, Beth-shan (Josh xvii. 11), was in the hollow of the Ghir, or Jordan-valley; the other, Dora (Dor), was on the coast of Tyre, and proclaims Carmel, and immediately opposite the bluff or shoulder which forms its highest point. The whole of these cities are specially mentioned as standing in the allotments of other tribes, though inhabited by Manassites and this, with the absence of any attempt to define a limit to the possessions of the tribe on the north, looks as if no boundary-line had existed on that side, but as if the territory failed gradually into those of the two contiguous tribes from whom it had borrowed its finest cities. On the south side the boundary between Manasseh and Ephraim is more definitely described, and may be generally traced with tolerable certainty. It began on the east in the territory of Issachar (xviii. 10) at a place called Aser, (ver. 7) now Jafir, a boundary line separating Ephraim and Manasseh. It cannot have been at any great distance from Shechem, because the next point in the boundary to the Merothath facing Shechem. But Eusebius and Jerome, in the Commentaries (ver. xvi. 4, "Askr"), it is mentioned, evidently from ancient knowledge, as still retaining its name, and lying on the high road from Nymphopolis (Nabla, that is Shechem, in Nephopolis (Becon), the ancient Beth-shan, fifteen Roman miles from the former. In the Antonine Itinerary (571) it occurs...

MANASSEH

12 miles N. E. of Nobla. There it ran to Michmæthath, described as facing Shechem (Nobla), though now unknown; then went to the right, i. e. apparently a northward, to the spring of Tappanu, also unknown; there it fell in with the watercourses of the torrent Kanah — probably the Naher Fudhak — along which it ran to the Mediterranean.

From the indications of the history it would appear that Manasseh took a very little part in public affairs. They either left all that to Ephraim, or were so far removed from the centre of the nation as to have little interest in what was taking place. That they attended David's coronation at Hebron has already been mentioned. When his rule was established over all Israel, each half had its distinct ruler — the western, Joel ben-Yeshah, the eastern, Ido ben-Zechariah (1 Chr. xxvii. 23, 24). From this time the eastern Manasseh fades entirely from our view, and the western is hardly kept before us by an occasional mention. Such scattered notices as we do find have almost all reference to the part taken by members of the tribe in the reforms of the good kings of Judah — the Jehovah-revival under Asa (2 Chr. xv. 9) — the Passover of Hezekiah (xxxi. 1, 10, 11, 18), and the subsequent enthusiasm among the people of Israel — the conclusion of Josiah (xxxvi. 6), and his restoration of the buildings of the Temple (ver. 9). It is gratifying to reflect that these notices, faint and scattered as they are, are all colored with good, and exhibit none of the repulsive traits of that most repulsive heathenism into which other tribes of Israel fell.

It may have been at some such time of revival, whether brought about by the invitation of Judah, or, as the title in the LXX. would imply, by the dread of invasion, that Ps. lxxvi. was composed. But on the other hand, the mention of Benjamin as in alliance with Ephraim and Manasseh, points to an earlier date than the disruption of the two kingdoms. Whatever its date may prove to be, there can be little doubt that the author of the psalm was a member of the house of Joseph.

A positive connection between Manasseh and Benjamin is implied in the genealogy (1 Chr. xvi. vii., where Machir is said to have married into the family of Huppim and Shuphim, chief houses in the latter tribe (ver. 15). No record of any such relation appears to have been yet discovered in the historical books, nor is it directly alluded to except in the genealogy just quoted. But we know that a connection existed between the tribe of Benjamin and the town of Jabesh-Gilead, inasmuch as from that town were procured wives for four hundred out of the six hundred Benjaminites who survived the slaughter of Gibeah (Judg. xii. 12); and if Jabesh-Gilead was a town of Manasseh — as is very probable, though the fact is certainly nowhere stated — it does appear very possible that this was the relationship referred to in the genealogies. According to the statement of the narrative two-thirds of the tribe of Benjamin must have been directly descended from Manasseh. Possibly we have here an explanation of the apparent connection between King Saul and the people of Jabesh. No appeal could have been more feasible to an oriental chieftain than that of his blood-relationships when threatened with invasion (1 Sam. xi. 4, 5), while no duty was more natural than that which they in their turn performed to his remains (1 Sam. xxxi. 11).

G.

MANASSEH (מָנָּשֶׁה) [see above]: Manas-ṣâ: Mamatæa), the thirteenth king of Judah. The reign of this monarch is longer than that of any other of the house of David. There is none of which we know so little. In part, it may be, this was the direct result of the character and policy of the man. In part, doubtless, it is to be traced to the abhorrence with which the following generation looked back upon it as the period of lowest degradation to which their country had ever fallen. Chroniclers and prophets pass it over, gathering from its horrors and disasters the great, broad moral lessons in which they saw the workings of a righteous retribution, the tokens of a Divine compassion, and then they avert their eyes and will see and say no more. This is in itself significant. It gives a meaning and a value to every fact which has escaped the sentence of oblivion. The very reticence of the historians of the O. T. shows how free they were from the rhetorical exaggerations and inaccuracies of a later age. The struggle of opposing worshippers must have been fierce under Manasseh as it was under Antiochus, or Decius, or Diocletian, or Mary. Men must have suffered and died in that struggle, of whom the world was not worthy, and yet no contrast can be greater than that between the short notices in Kings and Chronicles, and the martyrlogies which belong to those other periods of persecution.

The birth of Manasseh is fixed twelve years before the death of Hezekiah, B.C. 690 (2 K. xx. 1). We must, therefore, infer other that there had been no heir to the throne up to that comparatively late period in his reign, or that any that had been born had died, or that, as sometimes happened in the succession of Jewish and other eastern kings, the elder son was passed over for the younger. There are reasons which make the former the more probable alternative. The exceeding bitterness of Hezekiah's sorrow at the threatened approach of death (2 K. xx. 2, 3, 2Chr. xxxii. 24; Is. xxxviii. 1-4) is more natural if we think of him as sinking under the thought that he was dying childless, leaving no heir to his work and to his kingdom. When, a little later, Isaiah warns him of the cap-

Van de Velde suggests that this may have been the spot on which the Midianites encamped when surprised by Gideon; but that was merely further to the north, nearer the spring of Chisdul and the plain of Edraclon.

a The right (ןְָּבַּרְבַּר) is generally taken to signify the South; and so Keil understands it in the passage; but it seems more consonant with common sense, and also with the probable course of the boundary which could hardly have gone south of Shechem to take it as the right of the person tracing the line from East to West, i. e. North.
tivity and blame which will fall or his children, he speaks of those children as yet future (2 K. xx. 18).

This circumstance will explain one or two facts in the contemporary history. Hezekiah, it would seem, recovering from his sickness, anxious to avoid the danger that had threatened him of leaving his kingdom without an heir, marries, at or about this time, Hephzibah (2 K. xxi. 1), the daughter of one of the citizens or princes of Jerusalem (Joseph. Ant. x. 3, § 1). The prophets, we may well imagine, would welcome the prospect of a successor named by a king who had been so true and faithful. Isaiah (in a passage clearly belonging to a later date than the early portions of the book, and apparently suggested by some conspicuous marriage), with his characteristic fondness for tracing anguies in names, finds in that of the new queen a prophecy of the ultimate restoration of Israel and the glories of Jerusalem (Is. xxxii. 4, 5; comp. Himm. Scripturæ Cœnîl. Part iii. 5). The city also should be a Hephzibah, a delightful one. As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so would Jehovah rejoice over his people. The child that is born from this union is called Manasseh. This name too is strangely significant. It appears nowhere else in the history of the kingdom of Judah. The only associations connected with it were, that it belonged to the tribe which was all but the most powerful of the hostile kingdom of Israel. How are we to account for so singular and unlikely a choice? The answer is, that the name embodied what had been for years the cherished object of Hezekiah's policy and hope. To take advantage of the overthrow of the rival kingdom by Shalmaneser, and the anarchy in which its provinces had been left, to gather round him the remnant of the population, to bring them back to the worship and faith of their fathers, this had been the second step in his great national reformation (2 Chr. xxx. 6). It was at least partially successful. "Livers of Asher, Manasseh, and Zebulun, humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem." They were there at the great passover. The work of destroying idols went on in Ephraim and Manasseh as well as in Judah (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). What could be a more acceptable pledge of his desire to receive the fugitives as on the same footing with his own subjects than that he should give to the heir to his throne the name in which one of their tribes excelled? What could better show the desire to let all past discord and offenses be forgotten than the name which was itself an amnity? (Genesis.)

The had twelve years of Hezekiah's reign were not, however, it will be remembered, those which were likely to influence for good the character of his successor. His policy had succeeded. He had thrown off the yoke of the king of Assyria, which Ahaz had accepted, had defied his armies, had been delivered from external danger, and had made himself the head of an independent kingdom, receiving tribute from neighboring princes instead of paying it to the great king, a successor of Assyria. But he gave a step further. Not content with independence, he enters on a policy of aggression. He contracts an alliance with the rebellious viceroy of Babylon against their common enemy (2 K. xx. 12; Is. xxxix.). He displays the treasures of his kingdom to the ambassadors, in the belief that that will show them how powerful an ally he can prove himself. Isaiah protested against this step, but the ambition of being a great potentate continued, and it was to the results of this ambition that the boy Manasseh succeeded at the age of twelve. His accession appears to have been the signal for an entire change, if not in the foreign policy, at any rate in the religious administration of the kingdom. At so early an age he can scarcely have been the spontaneous author of so great an alteration, and we may justly infer that it was the work of the idolatrous, or Ahaz party, which had been repressed during the reign of Hezekiah, but had all along, like the Roman clergy under Edward VI. in England, looked on the reform with a sufficient acquiescence, and thwarted it when they dared. The change which the king's measures brought about was after all superficial. The idolatry which was publicly disowned, was practiced privately (Is. xix. 29, ii. 20, lv. 3). The priests and the prophets, in spite of their outward orthodoxy, were too often little better than licentious drunkards (Is. xxviii. 7). The nobles of Judah kept the new moons and Sabbaths much in the same way as those of France kept their Lentis, when Louis XIV. had made devotion a court ceremonial (Is. i. 13, 14). There are signs that even among the king's subjects there was a certain spirit of debasing national sentiment. Is. xi. 13, 15, and Jer. ii. xxvii. "Observe how the policy was simply that of a selfish ambition, himself possibly a foreigner (comp. Himm. Scripturæ Cœnîl. iii. 4), and whom Isaiah saw through and distrusted. It was, moreover, the traditional policy of the princes of Judah (comp. one remarkable instance in the reign of Josiah, 2 Chr. xiv. 17) to favor foreign alliances and the toleration of foreign worship, as it was that of the true priests and prophets to protest against it. It would seem, accordingly, as if they urged upon the young king that scheme of a close alliance with Babylon which Isaiah had condemned, and as the natural consequence of this, the adoption, as far as possible, of its worship, and that of other nations whom it was desirable to conciliate. In the widening of the range of their knowledge and penetrating into the mysteries of other systems of belief, may possibly have contributed now, as it had done in the days of Solomon, to increase the evil (Jer. ii. 10-25; Ewald. Gesch. Isr. iii. 666). The result was a delusion which had not been equalled even in the reign of Ahaz, uniting in one centre the abominations which elsewhere existed separately. Not content with sanctioning their presence in the Holy City, as Solomon and Rehoboam had done, he defiled with it the Sanctuary itself (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14). The worship thus introduced was, as has been said, predominantly Babylonian in its character. He observed times, and used enchantments, and used witchcraft, and dealt with a familiar spirit, and with wizards" (ibid. ver. 6). The worship of the Lord God of Sabaoth (2 K. xxii. 12; Is. lv. 1; Zeph. i. 5; Jer. viii. 2, xix. 13, xxxii. 29). With this, however, there was associated the old Medie workflows of the Ammonites. The fires were rekindled in the Valley of Hinnom. Topkhet was (for the first time) built a stately fabric (2 K. xxvi. 20; Is. xxx. 33, as compared with Jer. vii. 31. x. 7, 8; Ewald. Gesch. Isr. iii. 667). Even the king's sons have Menashe was 1773

Instead of being presented to Jehovah, received a horrible fire-baptism dedicating them to Molech (2 Chr. xxxiii. 6), while others were actually slaughtered (Ex. xxxiii. 37, 39). The Baal and Ashtaroth ritual, which had been imported under Solomon, from the Phoenicians, was revived with fresh splendor, and in the worship of the "Queen of heaven," fixed its roots deep into the habits of the people (Jer. vii. 18). Worse and more horrible than all, the Asherah, the image of Ashtaroth, or the obscene symbols of unholy worship (comp. Asherah, in addition to the authorities there cited, Mayer, De Reform. Juas., etc., in the Thes. theol. philol. Amstel. 1701,) was seen in the house of which Jehovah had said that He would there put His Name for ever (2 K. xxi. 7). All this was accompanied by the extreme moral degradation. The worship of those old Eastern religions has been well described as a kind of "sensuous intoxication," simply sensuous, and therefore associated inevitably with a fiendish cruelty, leading to the utter annihilation of the spiritual life of men (Hegel, Philos. of History, i. 3). So it was in Jerusalem in the days of Menasseh. Rival priests (the Chemarim of Zeph. i. 4) were consecrated for this hideous worship. Women dedicating themselves to a cultus like that of the Babylonian Mylitta, were hanged in the temple (Zach. ii. § 4). The Kadeshim, in closest neighborhood with them, gave themselves up to yet darker abominations (2 K. xxi. 7). The awful words of Isaiah (i. 10) had a terrible truth in them. Those to whom he spoke were literally "rulers of Sodom and princes of Gomorrah." Every faith was tolerated but the old faith of Israel. This was abandoned and proscribed. The altar of Jehovah was displaced (2 Chr. xxxiii. 16). The very ark of the covenant was removed from the sanctuary (2 Chr. xxxiv. 3). The sacred books of the people were so systematically destroyed, that fifty years later, men listened to the Book of the Law of Jehovah as a newly discovered treasure (2 K. xxii. 8). It may well be, according to a Jewish tradition, that this fanaticism of idolatry led Manasseh to order the name Jehovah to be erased from all documents and inscription. This, if true, was the most complete and systematic violation of the weekly Sabbath rest and the consequent loss of one witness against a merely animal life (Is. lv. 2, lvii. 13). The tide of corruption carried away some even of those who, as priests and prophets, should have been steadfast in resisting it (Zeph. iii. 4; Jer. ii. 26, v. 13, vi. 13).

It is easy to imagine the bitter grief and burning indignation of those who continued faithful. The fiercest zeal of Huguenots in France, of Covenanters in Scotland, against the hedges and symbols of the Latin Church, is perhaps but a faint shadow of that which grew to a white heat in the hearts of the worshippers of Jehovah. They spoke out in words of corresponding strength. Evil was coming on Jerusalem which should make the ears of men to tingle (2 K. xii. 12). The line of Samaritans and the plumes of the house of Ahab should be the "beaum of the Holy City. Like a vessel that had once been full of precious ointment (comp. the I.N.X. ἀραβάστρων), but had afterwards become bad, Jerusalem should be emptied and wiped out, and exposed to the winds of heaven till it was "drenched.

Foremost, we may well believe, among those who thus bore their witness, was the old prophet, now bent with the weight of fourscore years, who had in his earlier days protested with equal courage against the crimes of the king's grandfather. On him too, according to the old Jewish tradition, came the first shock of the persecution. [Isaiah.] Habakkuk may have shared his martyrdom (Kell on 2 K. xxi.; comp. Habakkuk). But the persecution did not stop there. It attacked the whole order of the true prophets, and those who followed them. Every day witnessed an execution (Joseph. Ant. x. 3, § 1).

The slaughter was like that under Ahab or Charles IX. (2 K. xxi. 16). The martyrs who were faithful unto death had to endure not torture only, but the mocks and taunts of a godless generation (Is. lvi. 1-4). Long afterwards the remembrance of that reign of terror lingered in the minds of men as a guilt for which nothing could atone (2 K. xxiv. 4). The persecution, like most other persecutions carried on with entire singleness of purpose, was for a time successful (Jer. ii. 30). The prophets appear no more in the long history of Manasseh's reign. The heart and the intellect of the nation were crushed out, and there would seem to have been no chroniclers left to record this portion of its history.

Rituation came soon in the natural sequence of events. There are indications that the neighboring nations — Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, &c. — who had been in the service of Assyria and were at some period in the reign of Manasseh, and asserted their independence (Zeph. ii. 4-15; Jer. xlvii., xlviii., xlix.). The Babylonian alliance bore the fruits which had been predicted. Hezekiah had been too hasty in attaching himself to the cause of the rebel-prince against Assyria. The rebellion of Merodach-Baladan was crushed, and then the wrath of the Assyrian king fell on those who had supported him. [Esdr. ii. 1-4.] Judah was again overrun by the Assyrian armies, and this time the invasion was more successful than that of Senacherib. The city apparently was taken. The king himself was made prisoner and carried off to Babylon. There his eyes were opened, and he repented, and his prayer was heard, and the Lord delivered him (2 Chr. xxxiii. 12, 13; comp. Maurice, Prophees and Kings, p. 362.)

Two questions arise at this point. (1.) Have we satisfactory grounds for believing that this statement is historically true? (2.) If we accept it, to what period in the reign of Manasseh is it to be assigned? It has been urged in regard to (1) that the silence of the writer of the books of Kings is conclusive against the trustworthiness of the narrative of 2 Chronicles. In the former there is no mention made of captivity or repentance or return. The latter, it has been said, yields to the temptation of pointing a moral, of making history appear more in harmony with his own notions of the Divine government than it actually is. His anxiety to deal leniently with the successors of David leads him to invent at once a reformation and the captivity which is represented as its cause (Winer, Reb. s. v. Manasseh; Rosenmiiller, Bibl. Alterth. i. 2, p. 101; Hitzig, begr. d. Kritik, p. 100, quoted by Kell). It will be necessary, in dealing with this objection, to meet the skeptical critic on his own ground. To say that he reasoning contradicts our belief in the inspiration of the historical books of Scripture, and is destructive of all reverence for them, would involve a petitio principii, and however strongly it may influence our feelings, we are bound to find another answer. It is believed that this answer is not far to seek. (1.) The silence of a writer who sums up the history of a reign of 55 years in 19 verses as to one alleged event in it is surely a weak ground for refusing to accept that event on the authority of another historian. (2.)

The omission is in part explained by the character of the narrative of 2 K. xxi. The writer deliberately turns away from the history of the days of shame, and not less from the personal biography of the king. He looks on the reign only as it contributed to the corruption and final overthrow of the kingdom, and no after repentance was able to undo the mischief that had been done at first. (3.) Still keeping on the level of human probabilities, the character of the writer of 2 Chronicles, obviously a Levite, and looking at the facts of the history from the Levite point of view, would lead him to attach greater importance to a partial re-annunciation of the old ritual and to the cessation of persecution, and so to give them in proportion a greater prominence. (4.) There is one peculiarity in the history which is, in some measure, of the nature of an undisguised coincidence, and so confirms it. The captains of the host of Assyria take Manasseh to Babylon. Would not a later writer, inventing the story, have made the Assyrian, and not the Babylonian capital, the scene of the captivity; or if the latter were chosen for the sake of harmony with the prophecy of Is. xxxix., have made the king of Babylon rather than of Assyria the captor? As it is, the narrative fits in, with the utmost accuracy, to the facts of oriental history. The first attempt of Babylon to assert its independence of Nineveh failed. It was crushed by Esarhaddon (the first or second of that name; comp. ESayMAKOD, and Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 654.), and for a time the Assyrian king held his court at Babylon, so as to effect more completely the reduction of the rebellious province. There is (5) the fact of agreement with the intervention of the Assyrian king in 2 K. xxi. 24, just at the same time. The king is not named there, but Ezra iv. 2, 10, gives Asnappar, and this is probably only another form of Assarpanar, and this = Esarhaddon (comp. Ewald, Gesch. iii. 678.; Tols. i. 21 gives Assarhaddon). The importation of tributes from Eastern Asia thus becomes part of the same policy as the attack on Judah. On the whole, then, the objection may well be dismissed as frivolous and vexatious. Like many other difficulties urged by the same school, it has in it something at once captious and puerile. Those who lay undue stress on them act in the spirit of a clever boy posing puzzling questions, or a sharp advocate getting up a case against the evidence on the other side, rather than in that of critics who have learnt how to construct a history and to value its materials rightly (comp. Keil, Comm. on 2 K. xxii.).

Ewald, a critic of a nobler stamp, whose fault is rather of fantastic reconstruction than needless skepticism (Gesch. Isr. iii. 678), admits the groundwork of truth. Would the prophecy of Isaiah, it may be asked, have been recorded and preserved if it had not been fulfilled? Might not Manasseh's release have been, as Ewald suggests, the direct consequence of the death of Esarhaddon?

The circumstance just noticed enables us to turn an approximate answer to the other question. The duration of Esarhaddon's Babylonian reign is calculated as from B.C. 680-667; and Manasseh's captivity must therefore have fallen within those limits. A Jewish tradition (Seder Olam Raba, c. 24) fixes the 221 year of his reign as the exact date; and this, according as we adopt the earlier or the later date of his accession, would give B.C. 676 or 673.

The period that followed is dwelt upon by the writer of 2 Chr. as one of a great change for the better. The discipline of exile made the king feel that the gods whom he had chosen were powerless to deliver, and he turned in his heart to Jehovah, the God of his fathers. The compulsion or death of Esarhaddon led to his release, and he returned after some uncertain interval of time to Jerusalem. It is not improbable that his absence from that city had given a breathing-time to the oppressed adherents of the ancient creed, and possibly had brought into prominence, as the provisional ruler and defender of the city, one of the chief members of the party. If the prophecy of Is. xxii. 15 received, as it probably did, its fulfillment in Shalman's sharing the captivity of his master, there is nothing extravagant in the belief that we may refer to the same period the notable words which speak of Eliasim the son of Hilkiah taken to Babylon as taken to Jerusalem, and who should leave vacant, and rising up is to be "a father unto the inhabitants of Jerusalem and to the house of Judah," having "the key of the house of David on his shoulder."

The return of Manasseh was at any rate followed by a new policy. The old faith of Israel was no longer persecuted. Foreign idolatries were no longer thrust, in all their falsities, into the sacred city. The altar of the Lord was again restored, and puerile offers and thank-offerings were sacrificed to Jehovah (2 Chr. xxxiii. 15, 16). But beyond this the reformation did not go. The ark was not restored to its place. The book of the Law of Jehovah remained in its concealment. Satisfied with the feeling that they were no longer worshipping the gods of other nations by name, they went on with a new mood of worship essentially idolatrous. "The people did sacrifice still in the high places, but to Jehovah their God only." (ibid. ver. 17.)

The other facts known of Manasseh's reign connect themselves with the state of the world round him. The Assyrian monarchy was tottering to its fall, and the king of Judah seems to have thought that it was still possible for him to rule as the head of a strong and independent kingdom. If he had to contend himself with a smaller territory, he might yet guard its capital against attack, by a new wall defending what had been before its weak side, "to the entering in of the fish-gate," and completing the tower of Ophel, which had been begun, with a like purpose, by Jotham (2 Chr. xxvi. 3). Nor were the preparations for defense limited to Jerusalem. "He put captains of war in all the fenced cities of Judah." There was, it must be remembered, a special reason for this attitude, over and above that afforded by the condition of Assyria. Egypt had emerged from the chaos of the Nebuchadnezzar and the Elamian intruders, and was become the city where it was most open to attack. Zephaniah points to the defenses, and says that they shall avail nothing. It is useless to trust in them; "There shall be no voice of a cry from the fish-gate."

A comparison of the description of these fortifications with Zeph. 10. 10 gives a special interest and force to the prophet's words. Manasseh had strengthened strong and aggressive under Pseudo-Aristeas. Pushing his arms northwards, he attacked the Philis-tines; and the twenty-nine years’ siege of Azotus must have fallen wholly or in part within the reign of Manasseh. So far his progress would not be unacceptable. It would be pleasant to see the old hereditary enemies of Israel, who had lately grown insolent and defiant, meet with their just deserts. About this time, accordingly, we find the thought of an Egyptian alliance again beginning to gain favor. The prophets, and those who were guided by them, dreaded this more than anything, and entered their protest against it. Not the less, however, from this time forth, did it continue to be the favorite idea which took possession of the minds of the lay-party of the princes of Judah. The very name of Manasseh’s son, Amon, barely admitting a possible Hebrew explanation, but identi-cal in form and sound with that of the great sun-god of Egypt (so Ewald, Gesch. iii. 665), is probably an indication of the gladness with which the alliance of Pseudo-Aristeas was welcomed. As one of its consequences, it involved probably the supply of troops from Judah to serve in the armies of the Egyptian king. Without adopting Ewald’s hypothesis, that this is referred to in Is. xxi. 18, it is yet likely enough in itself, and Jer. ii. 14-16 seems to allude to some such state of things. In return for this, Manasseh, we may believe, received the help of the chariots and horses for which Egypt was always famous (Is. xxxi. 1). (Comp. Aristaeus, Epist, et Philocr. in Havercomp’s Josephus, ii. p. 104). If this was the close of Manasseh’s reign, we can well understand how to the writer of the books of Kings it would seem hardly better than the beginning, leaving the root-evil uncorrected, preparing the way for worse evils than itself. We can understand how it was that on his death he was buried as Abaz had been, not with the burial of a king, in the sepulchres of the house of David, but in the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 20), and that, long afterwards, in spite of its repenance, the Jews held his name in abhorrence, as one of the three kings (the other two are Jeroboam and Ahaz) who had no part in eternal life (San- hedr. ch. xi. 1, quoted by Patrick on 2 Chr. xxxiiii. 13).

And the evil was irreparable. The habits of a sensuous and delirious worship had eaten into the life of the people; and though they might be repressed for a time by force, as in the reformation of Josiah, they burst out again, when the pressure was removed, with fresh violence, and rendered even the zeal of the best of the Jewish kings fruitful chiefly in hypocrisy and unreality.

The intellectual life of the people suffered in the same degree. The persecution cut off all who trained in the schools of the prophets, were the thinkers and teachers of the people. The reign of Manasseh witnessed the close of the work of Isaiah and Habakkuk at its beginning; and the youth of Jeremiah and Zephaniah at its conclusion, but no prophetic writings illumine that dreary half century of debasement. The most fearful symptom of all is that a prophet’s voice was heard during the majority of Josiah, was the atheism which, then as in other ages, followed on the con-fused adoption of a confluent polytheism (Zeph. i. 12). It is surely a strained, almost a fantastic hypothesis, to assign (as Ewald does) to such a period two such noble works as Deuteronomy and the Book of Job. Nor was this dying-out of a true faith the only evil. The systematic persecution of the worshipers of Jehovah accustomed the people to the horrors of a religious war; and when they in their turn gained the ascendency, they used the opportunity with a fiercer sternness than had been known before. Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah in their reforms had been content with restoring the true worship and destroying the instruments of the false. In that of Josiah, the destruction extends to the priests of the high places, whom he sacrifices on their stones (2 K. xxii. 20).

But little is added by later tradition to the O. T. narrative of Manasseh’s reign. The prayer that bears his name among the apocryphal books can hardly, in the absence of any Hebrew original, be considered as identical with that referred to in 2 Chr. xxxiii., and is probably rather the result of an attempt to work out the hint there supplied than the reproduction of an older document. There are reasons, however, for believing that there existed at some time, or other, a fuller history, probably legendary, of Manasseh and his conversion, from which the prayer may possibly have been an excerpt preserved for devotional purposes (it appears for the first time in the Apostolical Constitutions) when the rest was rejected as worthless. Scattered here and there, we find the disjecta membra of such a work. Among the offenses of Manasseh, the most prominent is, that he places in the sanctuary an altar of Zeus (the Aramaic name for Zeus, is Άγις τετεμπόρος of Ionzus, 1 Macc. viii. 21). The charge on which he condemns Isaiah to death is that of blasphemy, the words, "I saw the Lord" (Is. vi. 1) being treated as a presumptuous boast at variance with Ex. xxxvii. 20 (Nic. de Lyra, from a Jewish treatise: Jethnadoth, quoted by Ananias, in Crit. Sacri on 2 K. xxi. ). Isaiah is miraculously rescued. A cedar opens to receive him. Then comes the order that the cedar should be sawn through (Ibid.). That which made this sin the greater was, that the king’s mother, Heph- zibah, was the daughter of Isaiah. When Manas-seth was taken captive by Merodach and taken to Babylon (Sidias), he was thrown into prison and... fed daily with a scanty allowance of bran-bread and water mixed with vinegar. Then came his condemnation. He was execrated in a brazen image (the description suggests a punishment like that of the bull of Perillus), but he repented and prayed, and the image clave asunder, and he escaped (Suidas and Georg. Synellus). Then he returned to Jerusalem and lived righteously and justly.

2. (Manasseh; [Vat. Massorah: Manasses].) One of the descendents of Phahath-Moab, who in the days of Ezra had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30). In 1 Esdr. ix. 31 he is called Manasses.

3. One of the laymen, of the family of Hashum, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's command (Ezr. x. 34). He is called Manasses in 1 Esdr. ix. 33.

4. (Manasseh; Alex. Massorah: Moseps.) In the Hebrew text of Judith, xviii. 30, the name of the priest of the graven image of the Danites is given as "Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh"; the last word being written כנשמ, and a Masoretic note calling attention to the מ� suspended." "The fate of this superscription letter," says Kennicott (Diss. p. 51), "has been very mysterious, sometimes placed over the word, sometimes suspended half way, and sometimes uniformly inserted." Jarchi's note upon the passage is as follows: "On account of the honor of Moses he wrote these words to change the name; and it is written suspended to signify that it was not Manasseh but Moses." The LXX., Peschito-Syriac, and Talmud all read "Manasseh," but the Vulgate retains the original and undoubtedly the true reading. Moseps.

Three of De Rossi's MSS. had originally כנשמ, "Moses," and this was also the reading of three Greek MSS. in the Library of St. Germain at Paris, of one in the Library of the Carmelites of the same place, of a Greek MS. No. 331, in the Vatican, and of a MS. of the Octateuch in University College Library, Oxford (? Barrington, Genizothica, i. 86). A passage in Theodoret is either an attempt to reconcile the two readings, or indicates that in some copies at least of the Greek they must have existed. He quotes the clause in question in this form, "אֲנְשֵׁי דֵילָא ... וֹאֵי מַנָּסָא וֹאֵי פְּרֹתָא וֹאֵי מָשָּא; and this apparently gave rise to the assertion of Biller (Arevanum Keri et Kelath, p. 187, quoted by Rosenmuller on Judg. xviii. 30), that the מ� suspended" denotes that the previous word is transposed. He accordingly proposes to read כנשֶּנ, but although his judgment on the point is accepted as final by Rosenmuller, it has not the smallest authority. Kennicott attributes the presence of the מ� to the corruption of M.S. by Jewish transcribers. With regard to the chronological difficulty of accounting for the presence of a grandson of Moses at an apparently late period, there is every reason to believe that the last five chapters of Judges are more or less in the order of the events of the period after which they are placed. In xx. 28 Phinehas the son of Eleazar, and therefore the grandson of Aaron, is said to have stood before the ark, and there is therefore no difficulty in supposing that a grandson of Moses might be alive at the same time, which was not long after the death of Joshua. Josephus places the episode of the Benjamites before that of the Gadites, and introduces them both before the invasion of Chushanrishathaim and the deliverance of Israel by Othniel, narrated in Judg. iii. (Ant. v. 2, § 8-4, § 3; see also Kennicott's Dissections, ii. 180, § 442). It may be as well to mention a tradition recorded by R. David Kimchi, that in the genealogy of Jonathan, Manasses is written for Moses because he did the deed of Manasses, the idolatrous king of Judah. A note from the margin of a Hebrew MS. quoted by Kennicott (Disser. gen. p. 10) is as follows: "He is called by the name of Manasses the son of Hezekiah, for he also made the graven image in the Temple." It must be confessed that the point of this is not very apparent.

2. MANASSES (Massorah; [Vat. Massorah: Manasses]). 1. MANasses 1, of the sons of Hashum (1 Esdr. ix. 34; comp. Ezr. x. 33).

2. MANasses, king of Judah (Matt. i. 10), to whom the apocryphal prayer is attributed.

3. MANasses, the son of Joseph (Rev. vii. 6).

4. A wealthy inhabitant of Bethulia, and husband of Judith, according to the legend. He was slain with a smite while superintending the laborers in his fields, leaving Judith a widow with great possessions (Judg. viii. 2, 7, x. 3, xvi. 22, 23, 24), and was buried between Dodhan and Baalhamon.

MANasses, the prayer of (prawr) Massorah). 1. The repentance and restoration of Manasses (2 Chr. xxxiii. 12 ff.) furnished the subject of many legendary stories (Fabric. Gen. Apocr. i. 7. i. 1101 f). "His prayer unto his God" was still preserved "in the book of the kings of Israel" when the Chronicles were compiled (2 Chr. xxxiii. 18), and, after this record was lost, the subject was likely to attract the notice of later writers. "The Prayer of Manasses," which is found in some MSS. of the LXX., is the work of one who has endeavored to express, not without true feeling, the thoughts of the repentant king. It opens with a description of the majesty of God (1-5), which passes into a description of the mercy of God in granting repentance to sinners (6-8, ἐν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ). Then follows a personal confession and supplication to God as "the God of them that repent," "hymned by all the powers of heaven," to whom belongs "glory for ever" (9-15, εὐαγγελεῖ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰωναν). "And the Lord heard the voice of Manasses and pitied him," the legend continues, "and there came around him a flame of fire, and all the iron about him (τὸ ὁρτόν τοῦ μητρώου) were melted, and the Lord delivered him out of his affliction" (Const. Apost. ii. 22; comp. Jud. Afric. ap. Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 288).

2. The Greek text is undoubtedly original, and not a mere translation from the Hebrew; and even within the small space of fifteen verses some peculiarities are found (ἄστεκος, κλίνει γενόντας καρδιάς, παραγειοντέον ἑαυτής μετὰ τοῦ τινος ἐκείνου). Jesus was well acquainted with the LXX. (τὰ κατατάσσεται τῆς γῆς, το πλῆθος τῆς χρονοτοπητος ομ. πάντα η δύνασιν τῶν οὐρανῶν); but beyond this there is nothing to determine the point of the text at least no trace of such an origin of the Greek text

a. Kershi (Griech. lit. 675) is inclined to think that the Greek may have been based on the Hebrew. There

3. The earliest reference to the Prayer is contained in a fragment of Julius Africanus (cir. 221 A. D.), but it may be doubted whether the words in their original form clearly referred to the present composition (Jul. Afr. fr. 40). It is, however, given at length in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 22), in which it is followed by a narrative of the same apocryphal facts (§ 1) as are quoted from Africanus. The Prayer is found in the Alexandrine MS. in the collection of hymns and metrical prayers which is appended to the Psalter — a position which it generally occupies; but in the three Latin MSS. used by Schubert it is placed at the end of 2 Chr. (Sasbe. Bibl. Lett. iii. 1038).

4. The Prayer was never distinctly recognized as a canonical writing, though it was included in many MSS. of the LXX. and of the Latin version, and has been deservedly retained among the apocrypha in A. V. and by Luther. The Latin translation which occurs in Vulgate MS. is not by the hand of Jerome, and has some remarkable phrases (incipit solvete, importuna solvete, qui nos vitam cordebat); but there is no sufficient internal evidence to show whether it is earlier or later than his time. It does not, however, seem to have been used by any Latin writer of the first four centuries, and was not known to Victor Tunonensis in the 6th (Ambrosii, iv. 989, ed. Migne).

5. The Commentary of Fritzsche (Eexg. Histh. 1851) contains all that is necessary for the interpretation of the Prayer, which is, indeed, in little need of explanation. The Alexandrine text seems to have been interpolated in some places, while it also omits a whole clause; but at present the materials for settling a satisfactory text have not been collected.

MANASSITES, THE (מָנֶאשָטִים), i. e. "the Manassite": מָנֶאשָׂי or מָנָאשׂי; Alex. in Deut. and Judg; מָנָאשׂ or מָנָאשׁי (Manasse), that is the son of the tribe of Manasseh. The word occurs but thrice in the A. V. namely, Deut. iv. 43; Judg. xii. 4; and 2 K. x. 33. In the first and last of these the original is as given above, but in the other it is "Manasses" — "Fugitives of Ephraim are you, Gilead; in the midst of Ephraim, in the midst of Manasses." It may be well to take this opportunity of remarking, that the point of the verse following that just quoted is lost in the A. V., from the word which in ver. 4 is rightly rendered "fugitive" being there given as "those which were escaped." Ver. 5 would more accurately be, "And Gilead seized the fords of the Jordan-of-Ephraim: and it was so that when fugitives of Ephraim said, 'I will go over,' the men of Gilead said to him, 'Art thou an Ephraimite?' — the point being that the taunt of the Ephraimites was turned against themselves.

MAN DRAKES (מָנֶדרָקִים), dudhim: מִנְדָּרָק, מִנְדָּרָק, מִנָּדָרָק: mandrakes: "It were a weariness and a superfluous task," says Oedmann (Vernich. Samml. i. v. 85), "to quote and pass judgment on the multitude of authors who have written about dudhiam;" but the reader who cares to know the literature of the subject will find a long list of authorities in Celsius (Hieroh. i. 1 ff) and in Rudebeck (De Dudhiam Rubenis, Upsal, 1733). See also Winer (Bibl. Rerolb. "Araun."). The dudhiam (the word occurs only in the plural number) are mentioned in Gen. xxx. 14, 15, 16, and in Cant. vii. 13. From the former passage we learn that they were found in the fields of Mesopotamia, where Jacob and his wives were at one time living, and that the fruit (מִנְדָּרָק, LXX.) was gathered in the days of wheat-harvest, i. e. in May. There is evidently also an allusion to the supposed properties of this plant to promote conception, hence Rachel's desire of obtaining the fruit, for as yet she had not borne children. In Cant. vii. 13 it is said, "the dudhiam give a smell, and at our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits." — from this passage we learn that the plant in question was strong-scented, and that it grew in Palestine. Various attempts have been made to identify the dudhiam. Rudbeck the younger — the same who maintained that the quails which fed the Israelites in the wilderness were "flying fish," and who, as Oedmann has truly remarked, seems to have a special gift for demonstrating anything he pleases — supposed the dudhiam were "ternable berries" (Rhamnus cathartica, Lin.), a theory which deserves no serious consideration. Celsius, who supposes that a kind of Rhamus is meant, is far from satisfactory in his conclusions; he identifies the dudhiam with what he calls Lotus Cyperaceum, the Sūra of Arabic authors. This appears to be the lotus of the ancients, Zizyphus lotus. See Shaw's Tretula, i. 253, and Sprengel, Hist. Reichg. herb. i. 251; Freytag, Ap. Lex. s. v. ḫumār.

Celsius's argument is based entirely upon the authority of a certain Rabbi (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. p. 1292), who asserts the dudhiam to be the fruit of the pūyāh (the lotus); but the authority of a single Rabbi is of little weight against the almost unanimous testimony of the ancient versions. With still less reason have Castell (Lev. Sched. p. 411) and Rudolph (Hist. Eth. i. c. 9), and a few others, advanced a claim for the Musa paradisiaca, the banana, to denote the dudhiam. Faber, following Ant. Deusing (Disc. de Dudhiam), thought the dudhiam were small sweet-scented melons (Cucumis dudhian), which grow in Syria, Egypt, and Persia, known by the Persians as dūshān, a word which means "fragrance in the hand;" and Sprengel (Hist. i. 17) has, for the sake of having entertained a similar belief. This theory is certainly more plausible than many others that have been adduced, but it is unsupported except by the Persian version in Genesis. Various other conjectures have come from time to time to be made, as that the dudhiam are "lilies," or "citrons," or "baskets of figs" — all mere theories.

a Various etymologies have been proposed for this word; the most probable is that it comes from the root תֵּלָה, "to love," whence תֵּלָה, "love."

c Responds with the Arabic مِشْرَ، which, however, Sprengel identifies with Zizyphus Palurna.
The most satisfactory attempt at identification is certainly that which supposes the mandrake (Atropa mandragora) to be the plant denoted by the Hebrew word. The LXX., the Vulg., the Syriac, and the Arabic versions, the Targums, the most learned of the Rabbis, and many later commentators, are in favor of the translation of the A. V. The arguments which Celsius has adduced against the mandrake being the dubhaim have been most ably answered by Michaelis (see Supp. ad Lex. Heb. No. 451). It is well known that the mandrake is far from odoriferous, the whole plant being, in European estimation at all events, very fetid: on this account Celsius objected to its being the dubhaim, which he supposed were said in the Canticles to be fragrant. Michaelis has shown that nothing of the kind is asserted in Scripture: the dubhaim “give forth an odor,” which, however, may be one of no fragrant nature; the invocation to plants, the fruit of which he says “is of the size and color for a small apple, round and of a most agreeable color.” Bede, after quoting a number of authorities to show that the mandrakes were prized by the Arabs for their odor, makes the following just remark: “It is known that the Orientals set an especial value on strongly smelling things that to more delicate European senses are unpleasing: the intoxicating qualities of the mandrake, far from lessening its value, would rather add to it, for every one knows with what relish the Orientals use all kinds of preparations to produce intoxication.”

The Arabic version of Saadias has lyurfk in mandrake; in Onkelos y'hbrdn,h, and in Syriac y'hbrnk e express the Hebrew dubhaim: now we learn from Mariti (Trer., iii. 146, ed. Lond. 1792) that a word similar to this last was applied by the Arabs to the mandrake — he says, “The Arabs call it y'hrdhn.” Celsius asserts that the mandrake has not the property which has been attributed to it; it is, however, a matter of common belief in the East that this plant has the power to aid in the preservation of offspring. Schulz, Mannrell, Mariti, all allude to it: compare also Dioscorides, i. 76, Sprenger's Annotations; and Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. ix. 9, § 1. Venus was called Mandragoritis by the ancient Greeks (Hesych. s. v.), and the fruit of the plant was termed “apples of love.”

That the fruit was fit to be gathered at the time of wheat-harvest is clear from the testimony of several travellers. Schulz found mandrake-apples on the 15th of May. Hassequist saw them at Nazareth early in May. He says: “I had not the pleasure to see the plant in blossom, the fruit now (May 5, 6, 8) hanging ripe on the stem which lay withered on the ground;” — he conjectures that they are Rachel's dubhaim. Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 577) found mandrakes ripe on the lower ranges of Lebanon and Hermon towards the end of April.

From a certain rude resemblance of old roots of the mandrake to the human form, whence Pythagorians is said to have called the mandrake apxmyorapdov, and the Romans (10, 19 seminum) and Orientals (10, 19) to attribute strange superstitious notions have arisen concerning it. Josephus (B. J. vii. 6, § 3) evidently alludes to one of these superstitions, though he calls the plant huvovs. In a Vienna MS. of Dioscorides is a curious drawing which represents Eurus, the goddess of discovery, handing to Dioscorides a root of the mandrake; the dog employed for the purpose is depicted in the agonies of death (Daubeny's Euphoriam, p. 275).”

The mandrake is found abundantly in the Greek islands, and in some parts of the south of Europe. The root is spindle-shaped and often divided into two or three forks. The leaves, which are long, sharp-pointed, and hairy, rise immediately from the ground; they are of a dark-green color. The flowers are dingy white; stained with veins of purple. The fruit is of a pale orange color, and about the size of a nutmeg; but it would appear that the plant varies considerably in appearance.

MANEHE. [Weights and Measures.]

MANGER. This word occurs only in connection with the birth of Christ in Luke ii. 7, 12, 16. The original term is φάρημα, which is found but once besides in the N. T., namely, Luke xii., 15, where it is rendered by "stall." The word in classical Greek undeniably means a manger, crib, or feeding-trough (see Liddell and Scott, Lex. s. v.); but according to Schleusner it has a different signification in the N. T. It is the open court-yard, attached to the inn or khan, and enclosed by a rough fence of stones, wattle, or other slight material, into which the cattle would be shut at night, and where the poorer travellers might unpack their animals and take up their lodging, when they were either by want of room or want of means excluded from the house. This conclusion is supported by the rendering of the Vulg. — pastor, and of the Peshito-Syriac, λέσολο, both which terms mean "enclosures," and also by the customs of Palestine. Stables and mangers, in the sense in which we understand them, are of comparatively late introduction into the East. The quotations from Chardin and others in Harmer’s Observations, ii. 250, 260, and although they have furnished material to painters and poets, do not enter into the circumstances attending the birth of Christ — and are hardly less inaccurate than the "cradle" and the "stable," which are named in some descriptions of that event. [Curt., Amer. ed.]

This applies, however, only to the painters of the later schools. The early Christian artists seem almost invariably to represent the Nativity as in an open and detached court-yard. A crib or trough is occasionally shown, but not prominently, and more as if symbolic of the locality than as actually existing.

The above interpretation of φάρημα is of course at variance with the traditional belief that the Nativity took place in a cave. Professor Stanley has however shown (S. of P. pp. 440, 441; see also 159) how destitute of foundation this tradition is. And it should not be overlooked that Schleusner is not the only apocryphal Gospels which appear to be its main foundation, the Protevangelion and the Gospel of the Infancy, do not represent the cave as belonging to the inn — in fact, do not mention the inn in connection with the Nativity at all, while the former does not introduce the manger and the inn till a later period, that of the massacre of the innocents [Protev. chap. xvi.].

MANNA (Māna: Bounti). The same as ḤM, מanna (1 Esdr. ix. 39; comp. Ezra. x. 29).

-- Those who desire to see all that can be said on the meaning of φάρημα in the N. T. and in the L. X. may bearing in the N. T. will find it in the 9th chapter of the 24 book of P. Horreus, Miscel. criticorum libri duodecim, 1775.

MANLIUS, T. [Titus Mālius: Alex. Ald. with 5 MSS. T. Mānus: Titus Manlius]. In the account of the conclusion of the campaign of Lydias (6 B.C. 163) against the Jews given in 2 Mac. xi., four letters are introduced, of which the last purports to be from "G. Memmianus and T. Manlius, ambassadors (πρεσβύες) of the Romans" (vv. 34-38), confirming the concessions made by Lydias. There can be but little doubt that the letter is a fabrication. No such names occur among the many legates to Syria noticed by Polybius; and there is no room for the mission of another embassy between two recorded shortly before and after the death of Antiochus Ephiphanes (Polyb. xxxi. 9, 6; 12, 9; Grimm, ad loc.). If, as seems likely, the true reading is T. Manlius (not Memmianus), the writer was probably thinking of the former embassy when C. Sulpius and Manlius Sergius were sent to Syria. The form of the letter is no less fatal to the idea of its authenticity than the names in which it is written. The use of the era of the Seleucidae to fix the year, the omission of the name of the place at which it was dated, and the exact coincidence of the date of this letter with that of the young Antiochus, are all circumstances. Moreover, the first intercourse between the Jews and Romans is marked distinctly as taking place two years later (1 Mac. viii. 1 ff.), when Judas heard of their power and fidelity.

The remaining letters are of no more worth, though it is possible that some facts may have suggested special details (e. g. 2 Mac. xii. 29 ff.).

B. E. W.

MANNA (מָנָה: Massa: Manha, Man, Menna). The most important passages of the O. T. on this topic are the following: Ex. xvi. 14-36; Num. xi. 7-9; Deut. viii. 3-10; Josh. v. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 24, 25; Wisd. xvi. 20, 21. From these passages we learn that the manna came every morning except the Sabbath, in the form of a small round seed resembling the hoar frost; that it must be gathered early, before the sun became so hot as to melt it; that it must be gathered every day except the Sabbath; that the attempt to lay aside for a succeeding day, except on the day immediately preceding the Sabbath, fell under the same penalty: being worn away and offensive; that it was prepared for food by grinding and baking; that its taste was like fresh oil, and like wafers made with honey. Equally agreeable to all palates; that the whole nation subsisted upon it for forty years; that it suddenly ceased when they first got the new corn of the land of Canaan; and that it was always regarded as a miraculous gift directly from God, and not a product of nature.

The natural products of the Arabian deserts and other oriental regions, which bear the name of manna, have not the qualities or uses ascribed to the manna of Scripture. They are all condiments or medicines rather than food, stimulating or purgative rather than nutritious; they are produced only three or four months in the year, from May to August, and not all the year round; they come only in small quantities, never affording anything like 15,909,000 of pounds a week, which must have been requisite for the subsistence of the whole Israelitic camp, since each man had an oven (or three English quarts) a day, and that for forty years; they can be kept for a long time, and do not become useless in a day or two; they are just as liable to deteriorate on the Sabbath as on any other day; nor does a double quantity fall on the day preceding the Sabbath; nor would natural products cease at once and for ever, as the manna is represented as ceasing in the book of Joshua. The manna of Scripture we therefore regard as wholly miraculous, and not in any respect a product of nature.

The etymology and meaning of the word manna are best given by the old authorities, the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Josephus. The Septuagint translation of Ex. xvi. 15 is this: ἣ ποτες δε αὐτό οἴοι Ἰσραήλ ἴδε τῷ τοῦ ὑπ. τοῦ τοι ὡρ. τῇ ὁμβρίᾳ τοῦ ἔρημος ποιήσαται τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ἑβδόμῳ. "But the children of Israel saw it, and said to one another, What is that which the Lord hath given us?" The Vulgate, with a very careful reference to the Hebrew, thus: "Quod cum vidisset filii Israel, dixerunt ad invicem manna, quid significet? Quid est hoc? ignorantiam min quid esset." i. e. "Which when the children of Israel saw, they said to one another, MAnHH, which signifieth, What is this? for they knew not what it was." In Josephus (Ant. iii. 1, § 6) we have the following: Καλαίαν δὲ Εβραίων τῷ ἔρημῳ τοῦτο γίνεται, τῷ γὰρ μαν ἐπροστάσατο κατὰ τὴν ἡμέραν διάλεκτον, τῇ τοσί' ἐστιν ἦμασῖν. "Now the Hebrews call this food MANNA, for the particle MAN, in our language, is the asking of a question, What is this?"

According to all these authorities, with which the Syriac also agrees, the Hebrew word man, by which this substance is always designated in the Hebrew Scriptures, is the neuter interrogative pronoun (what?); and the name is derived from the inquiry ממה (man hU, what is this?), which the Hebrews made when they first saw it upon the ground. The other etymologies, which would derive the word from either of the Hebrew verbs ממה or ממה, are more recent and less worthy of confidence, and do not agree with the sacred text; a literal translation of which (Ex. xvi. 15) is this: "And the children of Israel saw and said, a man to his neighbor, what is this (man hU); for they knew not what it was."

The Arabian physician Avicenna gives the following description of the manna which in his time was used as a medicine: "Manna is a dew which falls on stones or bushes, becomes thick like honey; and can be hardened so as to be like grains of corn." The substance now called manna in the Arabian desert through which the Israelites passed, is collected in the month of June from the tamarisk shrub (Tamarix gallica). According to Burckhardt it drops from the thorns on the sticks and leaves with which the ground is covered, and must be gathered early in the day, or it will be melted by the sun. The Arabs cleanse and boil it, strain it through a cloth, and put it in leather bottles; and in this way it can be kept for several years. They use it like honey or butter with their unleavened bread, but never make it into cakes or eat it by itself. It abounds only in very wet years, and in dry seasons it sometimes disappears entirely. Various shrubs, all through the oriental world, from India to Syria, yield a substance of this kind. The tamarisk gum is by some supposed to be produced by the puncture of a small insect, which Ehrenberg has examined and described under the name of Scopos notiopterum. See Symbola Phytorum, p. 1.; Transact. of Literary Society of Bourbon, i. 251. This surely could not have been the food of the Israelites during their forty years' sojourn in the wilderness, though the

Ewald (Trans. i. 94) and some more recent travellers have observed that the dried grains of the oriental manna were like the coriander-seed. Gmelin (Trans. through Russia to Persia, pt. iii. p. 28) remarks this of the manna of Persia, which he says is white as snow. The peasants of Isphahan gather the leaves of a certain thorny shrub (the sweet thorn) and strike them with a stick, and the grains of manna are received in a sieve. Nicolai observed that at Mardini in Mesopotamia, the manna lies like meal on the leaves of a tree called in the East, balsam and afs or as, which he regards as a species of oak. The harvest is in July and August, and much more plentiful in wet than dry seasons.

* The balsam here spoken of is the Arabs
It is sometimes collected before sunrise by shaking it from the leaves onto a cloth, and thus collected it remains very white and pure. That which is not shaken off in the morning melts upon the leaves, and accumulates till it becomes very thick. The leaves are then gathered and put in boiling water, and the manna floats like oil upon the surface. This the natives call manna sesmeina, i. e. heavenly manna. In the valley of the Jordan Burehhardt found manna like gum on the leaves and branches of the tree yarob, which is as large as the olive tree, having a leaf like the poplar, though somewhat broader. It appears like dew upon the leaves, is of a brown or gray color, and drops on the ground. When first gathered it is sweet, but in a day or two becomes acrid. The Arabs use it like honey or butter, and eat it in their oatmeal gruel. They also use it in cleaning their leather bottles and making them air-tight.

The season for gathering this is May or June. Two other shrubs which have been supposed to yield the manna of Scripture, are the Alhagi mauroorum, or Persian manna, and the Alhagi desertorum, — thorny plants common in Syria.

The manna of European commerce comes mostly from Calabria and Sicily. It is gathered during the months of June and July from some species of ash (Ornus europaea and Ornus rotundifolia), from which it drops in consequence of a puncture by an insect resembling the bouscaut, but distinguished from it by having a sting under its body. The substance is fluid at night, and resembles the dew, but in the morning it begins to harden.

MANOA (םוֹא; [rest]: Manoeh: Joseph.
Manoeh shines: Manoeh, the father of Samson; a Danite, native of the town of Zorah (Judg. xiii. 2). The narrative of the Bible (xiii. 1-23), of the circumstances which preceded the birth of Samson, supplies us with very few and faint traits of Manoah's character or habits. He seems to have had some occupation which separated him during part of the day from his wife, though that was not field work, because it was in the field that his wife was found by the angel during his absence. He was hospitable, as his forefather Abiram had been before him; he was a worshipper of Jehovah, and reverent to a great degree of fear. These faint lineaments are brought into somewhat greater distinctness by Josephus (Ant. v. 8, §§ 2, 3), on what authority we have no means of judging, though his account is doubtless founded on some ancient Jewish tradition or record. "There was a certain Manoehes who was without controversy the best and choicest person of his country. This man had a wife of exceeding beauty, surpassing the other women of the place. Now, when they had no children, and were much distressed thereat, he besought God that He would grant unto them a lawful heir, and for that purpose resorted often with his wife to the suburbs (τὸ ποροτείων) of the city. And in that place was the great plain. Now the man loved his wife to distraction, and on that account was exceedingly jealous of her. And it came to pass that his wife being alone, an angel appeared to her ... and when he had said these things he departed, for he had come by the command of God. When her husband came she informed him of all things concerning the angel, wondering greatly at the beauty and size of the youth, insomuch that he was filled with jealousy and with suspicion thereof. Then the woman, desiring to procure her husband of his excessive grief, besought God that He would send again the angel, so that the man might behold him as well as she. And it came to pass that when they were in the suburbs again, by the favor of God the angel appeared the second time to the woman, while her husband was absent. And she having prayed him to tarry awhile till she should fetch her husband, went and brought Manoehes." The rest of the story agrees with the Bible.

We hear of Manoah once again in connection with the marriage of Samson to the Philistine of Timnath. His father and his mother remonstrated with him thereon, but to no purpose (xiv. 2, 3). They then accompanied him to Timnath, both on which the galls grow, which is some species of the oak.

Sprangle (Hist. Rel. Herb. 1. 270) identifies the gharb or gharbah with the Salix babylonica.

Possibly to consult the Levites, whose special property the suburbs of the city were. But Zorah is no where stated to have been a Levites' city.
MANSIONS

the preliminary visit (xxv. 5, 6), and to the marriage itself (9, 10). Manoah appears not to have survived his son: not he, but Samson's brothers, went down to Gaza for the body of the hero, and bringing it up to the family tomb between Zorah and Eshtaol, reunited the father to the son (xxvi. 31), whose birth had been the subject of so many prayers and so much anxiety. Milton, however, does not take this view. In Samson Agonistes Manoah bears a prominent part throughout, and lives to bear his son, G.

* MANSIONS (mapn: mansions) in the A. V. John xiv. 2 ("in my Father's house are many mansions") is used in its primary signification of "abodes," or "places of abode," not in the more specific sense which now belongs to the term. Mr. Norton translates, "there are many rooms in my Father's house." The reference is to the abundant provision made for the future blessedness of the followers of Christ, not to the different degrees of their reward, a thought which is foreign from the context.

MANS-AYER. a The principle on which the "man-layer" was to be allowed to escape, namely, that the person slain was regarded as "delivered into his hand" by the Almighty, was obviously open to much willful perversion (1 Sam. xxiv. 4, 18; xxvi. 8: Philo, De Spec. Leg. iii. 21, vol. ii. 320), though the cases mentioned appear to be a sufficient sample of the intention of the lawgiver. (a) Death by a blow in a sudden quarrel (Num. xxxv. 22). (b) Death by a stone or missile thrown at random (ib. 22, 23). (c) By the blade of an axe flying from its handle (Deut. xix. 5). (d) Whether the case of a person killed by falling from a roof unprovided with a parapet involved the guilt of manslaughter on the owner, is not clear; but the law seems intended to prevent the imputation of malice in any such case, by preventing as far as possible the occurrence of the fact itself (Deut. xxii. 8). (Michaelis, On the Laws of Moses, arts. 229, 280, ed. Smith.) In all these and the like cases the man-layer was allowed to retire to a city of refuge. [CITIES OF REFUGE.]

Besides these the following may be mentioned as cases of homicide. (a) An animal, not known to be vicious, causing death to a human being, was to be put to death, and regarded as maled. But if it was known to be vicious, the owner was liable to fine and even death (Ex. xxii. 28, 31). (b) A thief overtaken at night in the act might lawfully be put to death, but if the sun had risen the act of killing him was to be regarded as murder (Ex. xxii. 2, 3). Other cases are added by the Mishna, which, however, are included in the definitions given above. (Sabad. ix. 1, 2, 3; Maimon. ix. 2: 10th, Lec. Rohb. "Homicida." )[MENDE.] H. W. P.

MANTLE. The word employed in the A. V. translate no less than four Hebrew terms, entirely distinct and independent both in derivation and meaning.

1. מַנְתָּל מְנִノー, s'michah. This word occurs but once, namely, Judg. iv. 18, where it denotes the thing with which Jael covered Sisera. It has the definite article prefixed, and it may therefore be inferred that it was some part of the regular furniture of the tent. The clue to a more exact significance is given by the Arabic version of the Polyglot, which renders it by alantifah, مَايَنِّؤُثَ, a word which is explained by Doyen, b on the authority of Ibn Battru and other oriental authors, to mean certain articles of a thick fabric, in shape like a plaid or shawl, which are commonly used for beds by the Arabs: "When they sleep they spread them on the ground." "For the under part of the bed they are doubled several times, and one longer than the rest is used for a coverlet." Or, such a bed on the floor of Heber's tent to which the weary Sisera threw himself, and such a coverlet must the s'michah have been which Jael laid over him. The A. V. perhaps derived their word "mantle" from the pallium of the Valgate, and the mantel of Luther. [First thinks that it the "tent-carpet," which Jael threw over Sisera, Mantel, s. v. — 11.]

2. מַנְתָּל, meil. (Rendered "mantle" in 1 Sam. xxv. 27, xxviii. 14; Ezek. ix. 3, 5; Job i. 20, ii. 12; and Ps. cds. 29.) This word is in other passages of the A. V. rendered "cont.," "cloak," and "robe." This inconsistency is undesirable; but in one case only—that of Samuel—is it of importance. It is interesting to know that the garment which his mother made and brought to the infant prophet, lower her annual visit to the Holy Tent at Shiloh was a miniature of the official priestly tunic or robe; the same that the great Prophet wore in mature years (1 Sam. xxv. 27), and by which he was on one occasion actually identified. When the witch of Endor, in answer to Saul's inquiry, told him that "an old man was come up covered with a mantle," this of itself was enough to inform the king in whose presence he stood—"Saul perceived that it was Samuel" (xxviii. 14).

3. מַנְתָּל, muntaloph (the Hebrew word is found in Is. iii. 22 only). Apparently some article of a lady's dress ("mantles," A. V.); probably an outer garment or ample mantle, the thick internal one, and provided with sleeves. See Gesenius, Jeosin, i. 214; Schroeder, de Vestitu Hebraeorum, ch. xv. § 1—5.

But the most remarkable of the four is—

4. מַנְתָּל, adonath (rendered "mantle" in 1 K. xix. 13, 22; 2 K. ii. 8, 13, 14; elsewhere "garment," and "robe"); since by it, and it only, is denoted the cape or wrapper, which with the exception of a strip of skin or leather round his loins, formed, as we have every reason to believe, the sole garment of the prophet Elijah.

Such clothing, or absence of clothing, is commonly assumed by those who aspire to extraordinary sanctity in the East at the present day—"樘mage figures, with a cloak woven of canes" hair thrown over the shoulders, and tied in front on the breast, c But see the curious speculations of Dr. Maltby in Essay on Early Worship, p. 170, etc.

a מַנְתָּל, part. of מַנְתָּל, "pierce" or "crush," see p. 135: dovrejia: homilia: used also in the sense of number. The phrase מַנְתָּל מְנִ网投, M. A. 420, according to ignorance, Ges. p. 1392, must therefore be included, to denote the distinction which the Law gave to being on magnificent and involuntary homicide.
MAOCH

zaked except at the waist, round which is a girdle of skin, the hair flowing loose about the head.'"

But a description still more exactly in accordance with the habit of the great Israelite derelish, and supporting in a remarkable manner the view of the LXX., who render οὐκρινεῖαν by μακραίς, i.e., "a loincloth," is found in the account of a French traveller* in the 13th century: "l'enseigne que les deris portent pour montrer qu'ils sont religieux, est une peau de brebis sur leurs épaules: et ne portent autre vêtement sur eux sinon une seule peau de mouton on de brebis, et quelque chose devant leurs parties honteuses."

Inaccurately as the word "mantle" represents such a garment as the above, it has yet become so identified with Elijah that it is improper now to alter it. It is desirable therefore to substitute "mantle" for "garment" in Zech. xiii. 4; a passage from which it would appear that since the time of Elijah his garb had become the recognized sign of a prophet of Jehovah. G.

MA'ON (מָאֹון) [a poor one, Fürst: a browntailed? Ges.]: "Madoa': Alex. Maola: Maooch. the father of Achish, king of Gath, with whom David took refuge (1 Sam. xvii. 2). In the Syriac version he is called Maacah; and in 1 K. ii. 39 we find Maacah described as the father of Achish, who was king of Gath at the beginning of Solomon's reign. It is not impossible that the same Achish may be intended in both cases (Keil, Coma, on 1 K. ii. 30, and Maooch and Maacah would then be identical; or Achish may have been a title, like Abimelech and Pharaoh, which would still leave Maooch and Maacah the same: "son" in either case denoting descendant. G.

MA'OON (מַאָאוֹן habituation): Mada', Mado': [Vat. in 1 Sam. Maor, in Chr. Meoa'] Alex. Meoa: Moun, one of the cities of the tribe of Judah, in the district of the mountains; a member of the same group which contains also the names of Carmel and Ziph (Josh. xv. 55). Its interest for us lies in its connection with David. It was in the "wild" or waste pasture-ground of Maon (A. V. "wilderness") that he and his men were lurking when the treachery of the Ziphites brought Saul upon them, and they had the narrow escape of the cliff of ham-Macalheth (1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25). It seems from these passages to have formed part of a larger district called "the Arabah" (A. V. ver. 24, "plain"), which can hardly have been the depressed locality round the Dead Sea usually known by that name. To the north of it was another tract or spot called "the Jeshimon," possibly the dreary burnt-up hills lying on the immediate west of the Dead Sea. Close by was the hill or the cliff of Hachilah, and the milhoor itself probably extended over and about the mountain (ver. 29), round which Saul was pursuing his fugitives when the sudden alarm of the Philistine incursion drew him off. Over the pastures of Maon and Carmel ranged he three thousand sheep and the thousand goats of Nabal (xxv. 2). Those adjoining was the milhoor of Paran, which the LXX. make identical with Maon. Josephus's version of the passage is curious — "a certain man of the Ziphites from the city Emma" (Ant. vi. 13, § 6).

The name of Maon still exists all but unchanged in the months of the Arab herdsmen and peasants in the south of Palestine. Ma'nia is a lofty conical hill, south of, and about 7 miles distant from, Hebron. To the north there is an extensive prospect — on the one hand over the region bordering the Dead Sea, on the other as far as Hebron. Close in front is the lower eminence of Kurmul, the ancient Carmel, no less intimately associated with David's fortunes than Maon itself (Rob. i. 493, 494).

It is very much to be desired that some traveller would take the trouble to see how the actual locality of Maon agrees with the minute indications of the narrative cited above. See also Hacklau.

In the genealogical records of the trile of Judah in 1 Chronicles, Maon appears as a descendant of Hebron, through Rekem and Shammai, and in its turn the "father" or colonizer of Beth-sur (ii. 45). Hebron is of course the well-known metropolis of the southern country, and Beth-zur has been identified in Beitsur, 4 miles north of Hebron, and therefore about 16 from Maon.

It should not however be overlooked that in the original the name of Maon is identical with that of the Mehmim, and it is quite possible that before the conquest it may have been one of their towns, just as in the more central districts of Palestine there were places which preserved the memory of the Avites, the Zenarites, the Amonites, and other tribes who originally founded them. [Bick-

MA'ONITES, THE (מַאָאוֹנִים i. e. Maon, without the article [see above]: Madea in both MSS.: Μαονίων, a people mentioned in one of the addresses of Jehovah to the repellant Israelites, as having at some former time molested them: "the Ziphians also, and Amalek, and Maon did oppress you, and ye cried to me, and I delivered you out of their hand" (Judg. x. 12). The name agrees with that of a people residing in the desert far south of Palestine, elsewhere in the A. V. called Mehumim; but, as no invasion of Israel by this people is related before the date of the passage in question, various explanations and conjectures have been suggested as to the meaning of the LXX. — "Midian" — is remarkable as being found in both the great MSS., and having on that account a strong claim to be considered as the reading of the ancient Hebrew text. Ewald (Geach. i. 322 note) appeals to incline to this, which has also in its favor, that, if it be not genuine, Midian — whose ravages were then merely too recent to be forgotten — is omitted altogether from the enumeration. Still it is remarkable that no variation has hitherto been found in the Hebrew MSS. of this verse. Michaelis (Bibel für Ungelernte, and Suppeln. No. 1437), on the other hand, accepts the current reading, and explains the difficulty by assuming that Maon is included among the Bene-Kedem, or "children of the East," named in vi. 3: leaving, however, the equal difficulty of the omission of Israel's great foe, Midian, unnoticed. The reason which would lead us to accept Midian would lead us to c Belon, Observations (Paris, 1588), quoted by D'Arcy Dictionnaire, etc., p. 54.

A trace of the residence of the Moabites in the south of Palestine is perhaps extant in Ma'an, now Marah, the city of Judah so well known in connection with David.

A MARAH (Mara), or, according to the correction of the Kiri, "Mara", the name which Naomi adopted in the exclamation forced by her from the recognition of her fellow-citizens at Bethlehem (Ruth i. 20), "call me not Naomi (pleasant), but call me Mara (bitter), for Shalma hath dealt-bitterly (comely) with me." The LXX have preserved the play .... τεραστίον .... οὕτως; though hardly as well as Jerome, "İncute me Mara (hominem) quin amaritatem mea celebre Omnipotentibus." Marah is often assumed to have been the origin of the name Ma'an, but inaccurately, for Mary—in the N. T. Mariam—is merely a corruption of Miriam (see that article).

MARAH (Mara) [Bitterness]: Meppa, Popis, Popis [Vat. Popis]: Mara, a place which lay in the wilderness of Shur or Edom, three days' journey distant (Ex. xv. 23-24, Num. xxxiii. 8) from the place at which the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, and where was a spring of bitter water, sweated subsequently by the casting in of a tree which "the Lord showed" to Moses. It has been suggested (Burchardt, Syrie, p. 474) that Moses made use of the berries of the plant "Hibiscus" and which still it is implied would be found similarly to operate. Robinson, however (i. 67.), could not find that this or any tree was now known by the Arabs to possess such properties; nor would these berries, he says, have been found so early in the season as the time when the Israelites reached the region. It may be added that, had any such resource ever existed, its evident usefulness to the supply of human wants would hardly have let it perish from the traditions of the desert. Further, the expression "the Lord showed" seems surely to imply the miraculous character of the transaction. As regards the identity of Marah with any modern site, all travellers to look out for water which is bitter at this day, wherein if mirabes, the effort would surely have been permanent, as it clearly is intended to be in 2 K. ii. 21. On this supposition, however, Horvatok, distant 16 hours (Rob. Bibl. Res. i. 67) from Ayun Marah, has been identified by Robinson, as also by Burchardt, April 27, 1846, Schubert (274), and Wellbel, identified by them, apparently because it is the bitterest water in the neighborhood. Winer says (c. r.) that a still bitter well lies east of Marah, the claims of which Tischendorf, it appears, has supported. Lepsius prefers Judah Ginnul, Prof. Stanley thinks that the claim may be left between this and Horvatok, but adds in a note a mention of a spring south of Horvatok, "so bitter that neither men nor camels could drink it," of which "Dr. Graul (vol. ii p. 254) was told." The Ayun Marah, "wells of Marah," which local tradition assigns to Marah, are manifestly too close to the head of the gulf, and the probable spot of crossing it, to suit the distance of "three days' journey." The soil of this region is described as being alternately gravelly, stony and sandy; under the range of the Gebel Wardsch el-kawk and flints are plentiful, and on the direct line of route between Ayun Marah and Horvatok no water is found (Robinson, i. 67).

MAR'ALAH (Marahdah) [perh. earthquake, Ges.; declivity, Fasti]: Maryazda: Alex. Marala; [Comp. Mapalad]: Merada). one of the landmarks on the boundary of the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 11), which, with most of the places accompanying it, is unfortunately hitherto unknown. (Jes. Jeth, ad loc.) infers, though on the slightest grounds, that it was somewhere on the ridge of Carmel.

MARANATHA (Maranatad), an expression used by St. Paul at the conclusion of his first Epistle to the Corinthians (xvi. 22). It is a Grecized form of the Aramaic words 7787 27], "our Lord cometh.

The A. V. it is combined with the preceding "anathema," but this is unnecessary: at all events it can only be regarded as adding emphasis to the previous adjuration. It rather appears to be added as a weighty watch-word! to impress upon the disciples the important truth that the Lord was at hand, and that they should be ready to meet Him (Alford, Gr. Test. i. loc.). If, on the other hand, the phrase be taken to mean, as it may, "Our Lord has come," then the connection is, "the curse will remain, for the Lord has come who will take vengeance on those who reject Him." Thus the name "Maranite" is explained by a tradition that the Jews, in expectation of a Messiah, were constantly saying Maran, i. e. Lord: to which the Christians answered Maran atha, the Lord is come, why do you still expect Him? (Stanley, Corinthians, ad loc.).

MARBLE. Like the Greek ἱπαπάτω, No. 1 (see hot-note); the generic term for marble may be etymologically traced to almost any shining stone. The so-called marble of Solomon's architectural works, which Josephus calls Αριν ανατολής, may thus have been limestone—(a) from near Jerusalem; (b) from Lebanon (lava limestone), identified with the material of the Sun Temple at Baalbec; or (c) white marble from Arabia or elsewhere (Joseph. Ant. viii. 5, § 2; Bedd. Civ. ii. 52; Plin. H. N. xxi. 22; Jamieson, Mineralog., p. 41; Rümmer, Pol. p. 28; Vdove, Troj. ii. 211; Kittel, Phys. Geogr. of Pol. pp. 73, 88; Robinson, ii. 453, iii. 508; Stanley, S. O. P. pp. 307, 424; Wellsted, Troj. i. 426, ii. 141). That this stone must have been almost pure calcareous marble seems probable from the remark of Josephus, that whereas Solomon constructed his buildings of "white stone," he caused the roads which used in tessellated pavements, or one with circular spots (see G. B. 47). 5. Σικέρα: probably a stone with pearly appearance, like abalone (see G. S. 355). 5. Σικέρα: apparently copper, lapis marmaritae (see G. P. 12). The three last words used only in Esth 1. 6. 5. Marmor: mirror (Rev xxii. 12).

ed to Jerusalem to be made of “black stone,” probably the black basalt of the Harun; and also from his account of the porticoes of Herod's temple, which he says were μωτολίας λευκοτάτης μαρμάριον (Joseph. Ant. l. 6, and B. J. v. 5, § 1, 6; Kitto, pp. 74, 75, 80, 89) that whether the "costly stone" employed in Solomon's buildings was marble or not, it seems clear from the expressions both of Scripture and Josephus, that some at least of the "great stones," whose weight can scarcely have been less than 40 tons, must have come from Lebanon (I K. v. 14-18, vii. 10; Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, § 9).

There can be no doubt that Herod, both in the Temple and elsewhere, employed Parian or other marble. Remains of marble columns still exist in abundance at Jerusalem (Joseph Ant. xv. 9, §§ 4, 6, and 11, §§ 3, 5; Williams, Holy City, ii. 330; Sandys, p. 190; Robinson, i. 301, 305).

The marble pillars and tesserfe of various colors of the palace at Susa came doubtless from Persia itself, where marble of various colors is found, especially in the province of Hamadan, Susiana. (Esth. i. 6; Marco Polo, Travels, § 78, ed. Bohn; Charlin, Vigi. iii. 290, 308, 358, and viii. 253; P. della Valle, Vitiggi, ii. 260; Winer, s. v. "Mar- mor.")

MARESHAH (מַּרְשֵׁה: possession, First; at the head = elevated city or fortress, Gov.), in Josh. only; elsewhere in the shorter form of מַרְשֶׁה. [In Chron. Μαρσά, Μαρσαὶ, Μαρσά; Vat. Μαρσά, Μαρσαῖ, Μαρσά;] Alex. Μαρσά: [In Mic. l. 15, LXX. Μαρσαί; Marcus.]

1. One of the cities of Judah in the district of the Shefelah or low country; named in the same group with Keilah and Nezib (Josh. xv. 44). If we may so interpret the notices of the I Chronicles (see below), Hebron itself was colonized from Maresah. It was one of the cities fortified and garrisoned by Rehoboam after the rupture with the northern kingdom (2 Chr. xi. 8). The natural inference is, that it commanded some pass or position of approach, an inference which is supported by the fact that it is named as the point to which the enormous horde of Zerah the Cushite reached in his invasion of Judaea, before he was met and repulsed by Asa (2 Chr. xiv. 9). A ravine (ver. 10; Ge: A. V. "valley") bearing the name of Zephathah was near. In the rout which followed the encounter, the flying Cushites were pursued to the Bedouin station of Gerar (vv. 14, 15).

Maresah is mentioned once or twice in the history of the Macedonian struggles. Judah probably passed through it on his way from Hebron, to avenge the defeat of Joseph and Azarias (1 Macc. v. 69).

The reading of the LXX. and A. V. is Samaria: but Josephus, Ant. xii. 5, § 6, has Mарсиаun, and the position is exactly suitable, which that of Sama- ria is not. The same exchange, but reversed, will be found in 2 Macc. xii. 85. [Marcus.]

A few days later it afforded a refuge to Geoсias when severely wounded in the attack of Dositheus (2 Macc. xii. 35); here, as just remarked, the Syriac version would substitute Samaria,—a change quite unallowable.

Its subsequent fortunes were bad enough, but hardly worse than might be expected for a place which lay as it were at the junction of two cross-roads, north and south, east and west, each the constant thoroughfare of armies. It was first burnt by Judas in his Idumaean war, in passing from Hebron to Azotus (Ant. xii. 8, § 61). About the year 110 B. C. it was taken from the Idumaeans by John Hyrcanus. Some forty years after, about B. C. 63, its restoration was decreed by the element Pompey (Ant. xiv. 4, § 4), though it appears not to have been really reinstated till later (xiv. 5, § 5).

It was but rebuilt to become again a victim (b. c. 59), this time to the Parthians, who plundered and destroyed it in their rage at not finding in Jerusalem the treasure they anticipated (Ant. xiv. § 9; B. J. i. 13, § 9). It was in ruins in the 4th century, when Eusebius and Jerome describe it as in the second mile from Eleutherop- ropolis. S. S. W. of Dei-lithin—in all probability Eleutheropolis—and a little over a Roman mile therefrom, is a site called Maresah, which is very possibly the representative of the ancient Maresah. It is described by the indefatigable Tylor (Jubilees, pp. 129, 142) as lying on a gently swelling hill leading down from the mountains to the great western plain, from which it is but half an hour distant. The ruins are not extensive, and Dr. Robinson, to whom their discovery is due, has ingeniously conjectured (on grounds for which the reader is referred to Edb. Res. ii. 67, 68) that the materials were employed in building the neighboring Eleutheropolis.

On two other occasions Maresah comes forward in the O. T. It was the native place of Elizer ben-Dodavah, a prophet who predicted the destruction of the ships which king Jehoshaphat had built in conjunction with Abaziah of Israel (2 Chr. xx. 37). It is included by the prophet Micah among the towns of the low country which he attempts to rouse to some sense of the dangers their misconduct is bringing upon them (Mic. l. 19). Like the rest, the apostrophe to Maresah is a play on the name: "I will bring your heir (yoresh) to you, oh city of inheritance" (Mares- shah). The following verse (16) shows that the inhabitants had adopted the heathen and forbidden custom of cutting off the back hair as a sign of mourning.

only a probable conjecture. The names in these

gelist is probably the same as John whose surname was Mark " (Acts xii. 25). Grotius indeed maintains the contrary, on the ground that the earliest historical writers nowhere call the Evangelist by the name of John, and that they always describe him as the companion of Peter and not of Paul. But John was the Jewish name, and Mark, a name of frequent use amongst the Romans, was adopted afterwards, and gradually superseded the other. The places in the N. T. enable us to trace the process. The John Mark of Acts xii. 25, and the John of Acts xiii. 13, becomes Mark only in Acts xv. 39, Col. iv. 10, 2 Tim. iv. 11, Philen. 24. The change of John to Mark is anomalous to that of Saul to Paul; and we cannot doubt that the choice of the Jewish name in favor of the other is intentional, and has reference to the putting away of his former life, and entrance upon a proper ministry. No inconsistency arises from the accounts of his ministration to two Apostles. The descent of Paul (Acts xiii.
13) may have been prompted partly by a wish to rejoin Peter and the Apostles engaged in preaching in Palestine (ibid.; see Kueinel's note), though partly from a disinclination to a peripus and doubtful journey. There is nothing strange in the character of a warm impulsive young man, drawn almost equally towards the two great leaders of the faith, Paul and Peter. Had more sovereign been the cause of his withdrawal, Bar-alas would not so soon after have chosen him for another journey, nor would he have accepted the choice.

John Mark was the son of a certain Mary, who dwelt at Jerusalem and was therefore probably born in that city (Acts xii. 12). He was the con-(ἀρέσκοντα) of Barnabas (Col. iv. 10). [Sts.
Peter's Son, Amer. ed.] It was to Mary's house he went when Herod had him put in prison, but Peter conferred his deliverance from prison (Acts xii. 12), and there found "many gathered together praying;" and probably John Mark was converted by Peter from meeting him in his mother's house, for he speaks of "Marcus my son" (1 Peter v. 13). This natural link of connection between the two passages is broken by the supposition of two Marks, which is on all accounts improbable. The theory that he was one of the seventy disciples is without any warant. Another theory, that an event of the night of our Lord's betrayal, related by Mark alone, is one that befall himself (Olskansen, Lange), must not be so promptly dismissed. "There followed Him a certain young man, having a linen dress cast about his naked body; and the young man laid hold on him: and he fell the linen cloth, and fled naked." (Mark xiv. 51). The detail of facts is remarkably minute, the name only is wanting. The most probable view is that St.
Mark suppressed his own name, whilst telling a story which he had the best means of knowing.
Awakened out of sleep, or just preparing for it in some house in the Valley of Cedron, he comes out to see the seizure of the betrayed Teacher, known to him and in some degree beloved already. He is so deeply interested in his fate that he follows Him even in his thin linen robe. His demeanor is such that some of the crowd are about to arrest him;
there, "fear overcoming shame" (Bengel), he leaves his garment in their hands and flees. We can only say that if the name of Mark is supplied, the narrative receives its most probable explanation.
John (i. 40, xix. 20) introduces himself in this undistructive way, and perhaps Luke the same (xiv.
18). Mary the mother of Mark seems to have been a person of some means and influence, and her house a rallying point for Christians in these dangerous days. Her son, already an inquirer, would soon become more. Anxious to work for Christ, he went with Paul and Barnabas as their "minister" (ἐπίσκοπος) on their first journey; but at Perga, as we have seen above, turned back (Acts 7. 25, xiii. 15). On the second journey Paul would not accept him again as a companion, but Barnabas his kinsman was more indulgent; and hence he became the cause of the memorable "sharp convention" between them (Acts xv. 36-40).
Whatever was the cause of Mark's vacillation, it did not separate him forever from Paul, for we find him by the side of that Apostle in his first improvement at Rome (Col. iv. 10; Philen. 24). In the former place a possible journey of Mark to Asia is spoken of. Somewhat later he is with Peter at Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13). Some consider Babylon to be a name here given to Rome in a mystical sense; surely without reason, since the date of a letter is not the place to look for a figure of speech. Of the causes of this visit to Babylon there is no evidence. It may be conjectured that he made the journey to Asia Minor (Col. iv. 10), and thence went to join Peter at Babylon. On his return to Asia he seems to have been with Timothy at Ephesus when Paul wrote to him during his second imprisonment, and Paul was anxious for his return to Rome (2 Tim. iv. 11).

When we desert Scripture we find the facts doubtful and even inconsistent. If Papias be trusted (quoted in Eusibius, H. E. iii. 39), Mark never was a disciple of our Lord; which he probably infers from 1 Pet. v. 13. Epiphanius, on the other hand, willing to do honor to the Evangelist, adopts the tradition that he was one of the seventy-two disciples, who turned back from our Lord at the last saying in John vi. (Cont. Hier. i. 6, p. 457, Dindorf's recent edition). The same had been said of St. Luke. Nothing can be decided on this point.

The relation of Mark to Peter is of great importance for our view of his Gospel. Ancient writers with one consent make the Evangelist the interpreter (εμπνευστής) of the Apostle Peter (Papias in Euseb. H. E. iii. 35; Irenaeus, Hier. iii. 1, iii. 10, § 6; Tertullian, c. Marc. iv. 5; Hieronymus, ad Hebr. ix. &c.). Some explain this word to mean that the office of Mark was to translate into the Greek tongue the Aramaic discourses of the Apostle (Eichhorn, Beltz, &c.); whilst others adopt the more probable view that Mark wrote a Gospel which conformed more exactly than the others to Peter's preaching, and thus "interpreted" it to the church at large (Valesius, Alford, Lange, Friedlaender, E. Tischendorf). The passage from Euseb. favors the latter view; it is a quotation from Papias. "This also [John] the elder said: Mark, being the interpreter of Peter, wrote down exactly whatever things he remembered, but yet not in the order in which Christ either spoke or did them: for he was neither a hearer nor a follower of the Lord's, but he was afterwards, as I [Papias] said, a follower of Peter." The words in italics refer to the word interpreter above, and the passage describes a disciple writing down what his master preached, and not an interpreter orally translating his words. This tradition will be further examined below. [MARK, GOSPEL OF.] The report that Mark was the companion of Peter at Rome is no doubt of great antiquity. Clement of Alexandria is quoted by Eusebius as giving it for a tradition which he had received of the elders from the first. (Strom. ii. 15, 9; Tertullian, c. Marc. iv. 5; Hieronymus, H. E. vi. 14; Clem. Alex. Hær. iv. 5.) But the force of this is invalidated by the suspicion that it rests on a misunderstanding of 1 Pet. v. 13, Babylon being wrongly taken for a typical name of Rome (Euseb. H. E. ii. 15; Hieron. De Vir. ill. 8). Sent on a mission to Egypt by Peter (Eiphanius, Hier. ii. 6, p. 457, Dindorf; Euseb. H. E. ii. 16), Mark there founded the church of Alexandria (Hieron. De Vir. ill. 8), and preached in various places (Nepheph. H. E. ii. 43), then returned to Alexandria, of which church he was bishop, and suffered a martyr's death (Nepheph. ibid., and Hieron. De Vir. ill. 8). But none of these later details rest on sound authority. MARK, GOSPEL OF. The characteristics of this Gospel, the shortest of the four inspired records, will appear from the discussion of the various questions that have been raised about it.

1. Sources of this Gospel. — The tradition that it got its teaching from Peter, rather than of the rest of the Apostles, has been alluded to above. The witness of John the Presbyter, quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 39) through Papias, has been cited. [See Mark.] Irenaeus calls Mark "interpretes et sectator Petri," and cites the opening and the concluding words of the Gospel as we now possess them (iii. 10, § 6). He also alludes to a sect (the Cerinthians?) who hold "impassibilibus perscrucias Christum, passum vero Jeannium," and who prefer the Gospel of St. Mark to the rest (iii. 11, § 7). Eusebius says, on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, that the hearers of Peter at Rome desired Mark, the follower of Peter, to leave with them a record of his teaching; upon which Mark wrote his Gospel, which the Apostle afterwards sanctioned with his authority, and directed that it should be read in the Churches (Eus. H. E. ii. 15). Elsewhere, quoting Clement again, we have the same account, except that Peter is there described as "neither hindering nor urging" the undertaking (H. E. vi. 14). The apparent contradiction has been conciliated by supposing that Peter neither helped nor hindered the work before it was completed, but gave his approval afterwards ("hic fieri ipsum non jussit, tamen factum non prohibuit,"iffinus: see note of Valesius in loc. Eus.). Tertullian (Cont. Marcionem, iv. 5) speaks of the Gospel of Mark as being connected with Peter, "equus interpretis Maronis," and so having come from the Apostle. Eusebius says that it was immediately after St. Matthew, the task was laid on St. Mark, "the follower of St. Peter at Rome," of writing a Gospel (Hær. i.). Hieronymus (De Vir. ill. 8) repeats the story of Eusebius; and again says that the Gospel was written, "Petro narrante, et illo scribente" (ad Hebr. 2). If the evidence of the Apostle's connection with this Gospel rested wholly on these passages, it would not be sufficient, since the witnesses, though many in number, are not all independent of each other, and there are marks, in the former of the passages from Eusebius, of a wish to enhance the authority of the Gospel by Peter's approval, whilst the latter passage does not allege the same sanction. But there are peculiarities in the Gospel which are best explained by the supposition that Peter in some way superintended its composition. Whilst there is hardly a passage which does not supply the Gospel with common to it and some other Gospel, in the manner of the narrative there lies a marked character, which puts aside at once the supposition that we have here a mere epitome of Matthew and Luke. The picture of the same events is far more vivid: touches are introduced such as could only be noted by a vigilant eye-witness, and such as make us almost eye-witnesses of the Redeemer's doings. The most remarkable is the account of the demoniac in the country of the Gadarenes, where the following words are peculiar to Mark. And no man could bind him, no, not with chains: because that he had often been bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him. And the fetters in pieces: neither could any man tame him. And always night and day he was in the mountains, crying and cutting himself with stones. But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran, etc. Here we are indebted for the picture of the fierce and hopeless wanderer to the Evangelist whose work is the briefest, and whose style is the least perfect. He sometimes adds to the account of the others a notice of our Lord's look (iii. 34, viii. 33, x. 21, x. 23); he dwells on human feelings and the tokens of them; on our Lord's pity for the leper, and his strict charge not to publish the miracle (i. 41, 44); He "loved," the rich young man for his answers (x. 21); He "lashed round," with anger when another occasion called it out (iii. 5); He grieved in spirit (vii. 34, viii. 12). All these are peculiar to Mark; and they would be explained most readily by the theory that one of the disciples most near to Jesus had supplied them. To this must be added that whilst Mark goes over the same ground for the most part as the other Evangelists, and especially Matthew, there are many facts and events in which prove that we are listening to an independent witness. Thus the humble origin of Peter is made known through him (i. 16-20), and his connection with Cæcilia (i. 29); he tells us that Levi was "the son of Alphaeus" (i. 14), that Peter was the name given by our Lord to Simon (iii. 16), and Boanerges a surname added by Him to the names of two others (iii. 17); he assumes the existence of another body of disciples wider than the Twelve (iii. 24, iv. 10, 36, viii. 34, xiv. 51, 52; we owe to him the name of Jairus (v. 22), the word "carpenter" applied to our Lord (vi. 3), the nation of the "Syrophænian woman" (vii. 26); he substitutes Dalmannutha for the "Magdala" of Matthew (viii. 10); he names Bartimæus (x. 46); he alone mentions that our Lord would not suffer any man to carry any vessel into the temple (xi. 16); and that Simon of Cyrene was the man who bore the cross; Alexander and Kneus (xxv. 21). All these are tokens of an independent writer, different from Matthew and Luke, and in the absence of other traditions it is natural to look to Peter. One might hope that much light would be thrown on this question from the way in which Peter is mentioned in the Gospel; but the evidence is not so clear as might have been expected. Peter is often mentioned without any special occasion for it (i. 36, v. 37, xi. 20-25, xii. 3, xvi. 7); but on the other hand there are passages from which it might seem that the writer knew less of the great Apostle. Thus in Matt. xv. 15, we have "Peter, in the parallel place in Mark only the disciples." The Apostle's walking on the sea is omitted: so the blessing pronounced on him (Matt. xvi. 17-19), and the protest made to all the other disciples in another form to him (Matt. xvi. 28). Peter was one of those who were sent to prepare the Passover: yet Mark omits his name. The word "bitterly" of Matthew and Luke is omitted by Mark from the record of Peter's resistance: whilst the account of his denials is full and circumstantial. It has been sought to account for these omissions on the ground of humility; but some may think that this cannot be the clue to all the places. But what we generalize from these passages is, that the name Peter is peculiarly dealt with, added here, and there withdrawn, which would be explained if the writer had access to special information about Peter. On the whole, in spite of the doublingfulness of Eusebius's sources, and the almost self-contradiction into which he falls, the internal evidence inclines us to accept the account that this inspired Gospel has some connection with St. Peter, and records more exactly the preaching which he, guided by the Spirit of God, uttered for the instruction of the world.

II. Relation of Mark to Matthew and Luke. — The results of criticism as to the relation of the three Gospels are somewhat humiliating. Up to the last of the old theories are maintained by equal authority: (a) that Mark's Gospel is the original Gospel out of which the other two have been developed; (b) that it was a compilation from the other two, and therefore was written last; and (c) that it was compiled from Mark alone, and forms a link of transition between the other two. (a.) Of the first view Thiersch may serve as the expositor "No one," he says, "will now venture to call Mark a mere epitomizer of Matthew and Luke. Were his Gospel an epitome of theirs, it would bear the marks of the attempt to combine in one the excellences of both; else the labor of epitome would have been unnecessary. But the very opposite is the case. We miss the peculiarities of Mark and Luke. We find that which is common to both. And therefore, were Mark's Gospel a mere epitome of the others, we should have a third repetition of that which had been already twice related, with so little additional or more exact matter, that the intention and conduct of the writer would remain a puzzle. This difficulty disappears, and a great step is made in threading the labyrinth of the Gospel harmony, when we see that Mark formed the basis of Matthew and Luke. Where they follow him they agree. Where they do not, as in the history of our Lord's childhood, in his discourses, and in his appearances after his resurrection, they differ widely, and each takes his own way" (Thiersch, Church History, p. 54, Carlyle's translation). But the assumption of an independent narrative is too great in each of the others, and Mark having derived their Gospels from Mark; and in the places which they have in common, each treats the events in an independent way, and not as a copist. Still this opinion has been held by Hengst, Storr, Wilke, Weiss, Reuss, Ewald, and others. (b.) The theory that Mark's Gospel is a compilation and abridgment of that of Matthew is maintained by Augustin, and after him by Euthymius and Michaelis. The facts on which it rests are clear enough. There are in St. Mark only about three events which St. Matthew does not narrate (Mark i. 23, viii. 22, xii. 41); and thus the matter of the two may be regarded as almost the same. But the form in St. Mark is, as we have seen, much briefer, and the omissions are many and important. The Markan Gospel that of Matthew would have been, before him, and only condensed it. But many would make Mark a compiler from both the others (Griesbach, De Wette, etc.), arguing from passages where there is a curious resemblance to both (see De Wette, Handbuch, § 94 o). (c.) Lastly, the theory that the Gospel before us forms a sort of transition-link between the other two, standing midway between the Judaic tendency of Matthew and the Universalist or Gentile Gospel of St. Luke need not trouble us much here [see above, p. 1257]. An account of these views may be found in Hilgenfeld's Francilet. It is obvious that they refute one another: the same internal evidence suffices to prove that Mark is the first, the last, and the intermediate. Let us return to the facts, and, taught by these contradictions what is the worth of "internal evidence," let us carry our speculations no further than the facts. The Gospel of Mark contains scarcely any events that are not recited by the others. There are verbal coincidences with each of the others, and sometimes peculiar words from both meet together in the parallel place in Mark. On the other hand, there are unmistakable marks of independence. He has passages peculiar to himself (ii. 19, 20, 24, 26, 31; Mark ii. 22-26, xi. 11-14, xiv. 51, 52, xvi. 9-11), and a peculiar fullness of detail where he goes over the null ground as the others. The beginning of his gospel is peculiar; so is the end. Remarkable is the absence of passages quoted from the Old Testament by the writer him¬self, who, however, recites such passages when used by our Lord. There are only two exceptions to this, namely, the opening verses of the Gospel, where Mal. iii. 1 and Is. xi. 3 are cited; and a verse in the account of the crucifixion (xxv. 28), where he quotes the words, and He was numbered with the transgressors” (Is. lii. 12); but this is rejected by Alford and Tischendorf as spurious, inserted here from Luke xxii. 37. After deducting these exceptions, 25 quotations from or references to the Old Testament remain, in all of which it is either our Lord Himself who is speaking, or some one addressing Him.

The hypothesis which best meets these facts is, that whilst the matter common to all three Evangelists, or to two of them," is derived from the oral teaching of the Apostles, which they had purposely reduced to a common form, our Evangelist writes as an independent witness to the truth, and not as a commentator on this Josiah type of Gospel. He was written under the sanction of Peter, and its matter in some degree derived from him, is made probable by the evident traces of an eye-witness in many of the narratives. The omission and abridgment of our Lord’s discourses, and the sparing use of O. T. quotations, might be accounted for by the special destination of the Gospel, if we had super data for ascertaining it; but it was for Gentiles, with whom illustrations from the O. T. would have less weight, and the purpose of the writer was to present a clear and vivid picture of the acts of our Lord’s human life, rather than a full record of his divine doctrine. We may thankfully own that, with little that is in substance peculiar to himself, the Evangelist does occupy for us a distinct position, and supply a definite want, in virtue of these characteristics.

III. This Gospel written primarily for Gentiles. — We have seen that the Evangelist scarcely refers to the O. T. in his own person. The word Law (τοῦ νόμου) does not once occur. The genealogy of our Lord is likewise omitted. Other matters interesting chiefly to the Jews are likewise omitted; such as the references to the O. T. and Law in Matt. xii. 5-7, the reflections on the request of the Scribes and Pharisees for a sign, Matt. xii. 38-42; the parable of the king’s son, Matt. xxii. 1-14; and the awful denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees, in Matt. xxiii. Explanations are given in some places, which Jewish could not require: thus, Jordan is a “river” (Mark i. 5; Matt. iii. 6); the Pharisees, etc., “used to fast” (Mark ii. 18; Matt. ix. 14), and other customs of theirs are described (Mark vi. 1-4; Matt. xiv. 1, 2); “the time of firs was not yet” (al. c. at the season of the Passover (Mark xii. 13; Matt. xxi. 19); the Sadducees’ worst tenet is mentioned (Mark xii. 18); the Mount of Olives is “over against the temple” (Mark xiii. 3; Matt. xxiv. 3); at the Passover men eat “ unleavened bread” (Mark xiv. 1, 12; Matt. xxvii. 7, 17), and explanations are given which Jews would not need (Mark xvi. 5, 10, 42; Matt. xxvii. 57, 57). Matter that might offend is omitted, as Matt. v. 6, vi. 7, 8. Passages, not always peculiar to Mark, abound in his Gospel, in which the antagonism between the pharisaic legal spirit and the Gospel come out strongly (i. 22, ii. 19, 22, x. 5, viii. 15), which hold out hopes to the hopes of admission to the kingdom of heaven even without the Jews (xii. 9), and which put ritual forms below the worship of the heart (ii. 13). Mark alone preserves those words of Jesus, “The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath” (ii. 27). Whilst he omits the invective against the Pharisees, he indicates by a touch of his own how Jesus condemned them “with anger” (iii. 5). When the Lord purges the Temple of those that polluted it, He quotes a passage of Isaiah (vii. 9), but Mark alone reports ii. 13, and the words, “of all nations” (xi. 17). Mark alone makes the Scribe admit that love is better than sacrifices (xii. 33). From the general testimony of these places, whatever may be objected to an inference from one or other amongst them, there is little doubt but that the Gospel was meant for use in the first instance amongst Gentiles. But the facts give no warrant for the dream that the first Evangelist wrote for the benefit of the second. It is a theory of the third the Pauline: and that Mark occupies an intermediate position, marking the transition from one to the other! In St. Mark we have the Gospel as it was preached to all the world, and it is so presented as to suit the wants of Gentiles. But there is not a trace of the wish, conscious or unconscious, to assist in any change of Christian belief or modes of thinking. In all things it is a calm history, not a polemical pleading.

IV. Time when the Gospel was written. — It will be understood from what has been said, that nothing positive can be asserted as to the time when this Gospel was written. The traditions are contradictory. Irenaeus says that it was written after the death (εξ ζωῆς, but Grabe would translate, wrongly, διαφορα from Rome) of the Apostle Peter (Euseb. H. E. v. 8); but we have seen above, that in other passages it is supposed to be written during Peter’s lifetime (Eus. H. E. v. 14, and ii. 15). In the Bible there is nothing to decide the question. It is not likely that it dates before the reference to Mark in the Epistle to the Colossians (iv. 10), where he is only introduced as a relative of Barnabas, as if this were his greatest distinction; and this epistle was written about A. D. 62. If after coming to Asia Minor on Paul’s sending he went on and joined Peter at Babylon, he may have then acquired, or rather completed, that knowledge of Peter’s preaching, which tradition teaches us to look for in the Gospel, and of which there is so much internal evidence; and soon after this the Gospel may have been composed. On the other hand, it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem (xiii. 13, 24-30, 33, &c.). Probably, therefore, it was written between A. D. 65 and 70. But nothing can be certainly determined on this point.

V. Place where the Gospel was written. — The place is as uncertain as the time. Clement, Eusebius, Jerome, and Epiphanius, pronounce for Rome, and many moderns take the same view. The Latin expressions in the Gospel prove nothing; for there is little doubt that, wherever the Gospel was written, the writer had been at Rome, and so knew its language. Chrysostom thinks Alexandria; but this is not confirmed by other testimony.

VI. Language. — The Gospel was written in Greek; of this there can be no doubt if ancient testimony is to weigh. Baronius indeed in the authority of an old Striae translation, asserts that Latin was the original language; and some MSS., referred to in Scholz "Greek Test. p. xxx." repeat the same; but this arises no doubt from the belief that it was written at Rome and for Gentiles. This opinion and its grounds Walf has travelled by supposing that the Gospel was written at Alexandria in Greek. A Latin Gospel written for the use of Roman Christians would not have been lost without any mention of it in an ancient writer.

VII. "Genesis of the Gospel." Schlierenmacher was the first perhaps to question that we have in our present Gospel that of which Papias speaks, on the ground that his words would apply to a simpler and less orderly composition ("Schaude u. Kirchten", 1832). Accordingly the usual assumption of a later editor is brought in, as in the case of St. Luke's Gospel [see p. 1607]. But the words of Papias require no such aid (Eisenh. II. E. iii. 30), nor would such authority be decisive if they did. All ancient testimony marks Make the author of a certain Gospel, and that this is the Gospel which has come down to us, there is not the least historical ground for doubting. Owing to the very few sections peculiar to Mark, evidence from patristic quotation is somewhat difficult to produce. Justin Martyr, however, quotes ch. ix. 44, 46, 48, xii. 30, and Irenaeus cites both the opening and closing words (iii. 10, 6). An important testimony in any case, but doubly so from the doubt that has been cast on the closing verses (xii. 9-19).

Concerning these verses see Meyer's, Alford's, and Tischendorf's notes. The passage is rejected by the majority of modern critics, on the testimony of MSS. (particularly the Vatican and the Sinaitic) and of old writers and on the internal evidence of the diction. Though it is probable that this section is from a different hand, and was annexed to the Gospel soon after the time of the Apostles, it must be remembered that it is found in three of the four great mixed MSS. (A C D), and is quoted without any question by Irenaeus. Among late critics Olshausen still pronounces for its genuineness.

With the exception of these few verses the genuineness of the Gospel is placed above the reach of reasonable doubt.

VIII. Style and Diction. — The purpose of the Evangelist seems to be before us a vivid picture of the earthy acts of Jesus. The style is peculiarly suitable to this. He uses the present tense instead of the narrative aorist, almost in every chapter. The word ἀπεκρίθη, "straightway," is used by St. Mark forty-one times. The first person is preferred to the third (ix. 39. v. 8, 9, 12. vi. 2, 3, 31, 33, ix. 25, 33, vii. 6). Precise and minute details as to persons, places, and numbers, abound in the narrative. All these tend to give force and vivacity to the picture of the human life of our Lord. On the other side, the facts are not very exactly arranged; they are often connected by nothing more definite than καί and παλιρ. Its slowness sometimes makes this Gospel more obscure than the others (I. 13, ix. 5, 6, iv. 10-34).

Many peculiarities of diction may be noticed: amongst them the following: 1. Hebrew (Aramaic) words are used, but explained for Gentile readers (iii. 17, 22, v. 41, vii. 11, 34. ix. 43, 4 x. 46, xiv. 36, xx. 22, 34). 2. Latin words are very frequent, as δημάρχον, λεγέων, στεκόλοβος, κεντρον, κεντρον, κοιμάσθω, ψηφιλλωμα, ξυπνησθω, ἐκπέφανθον, κατενθημεν, προσευχήθος, ἐκπέφανθον, ix. 8; ἐσπονθήκε, ix. 25; προσευχήθος, x. 34; τόβας πιστικΗ, xiv. 3; ἐσπονθήκε, xiv. 40; ὄψε, i. 34, xi. 16; προσευχήθειοι (of προσευχήθειοι), xvi. 37; εἰς τα ρεπεπέλευσαν καθά, iv. 38; προσεβλέψεις, xiv. 8. 4. Dinitimative are frequent. 5. The substantive is often repeated instead of the pronoun: as (to cite from ch. ii. only) ii. 16, 18, 20, 22, 27, 28. 6. Negatives are accumulated for the sake of emphasis: as τότε ἐκείνη τῷ ημέρῃ; ii. 20; διαταγός φυσικός καὶ ήμερας; iv. 27; εἰ δολός μετά σπανίζει, vi. 23; also vi. 21, viii. 4, x. 20, xii. 29, xiv. 30, 43. 8. The same idea is often repeated under another expression, as i. 42, ii. 25, viii. 15, xiv. 68, etc. 9. And sometimes the repetition is effected by means of the opposite, as in i. 22, 44, and many other places. 10. Sometimes emphasis is increased by simple reiteration, as in ii. 13, 19, 11. The elliptic use of οἷς, like that of ὅτι in classical writers, is found, ver. 23. 12. The word ἐπιστράφης is used twenty-five times in this Gospel. 13. Instead of συμβολικος λαβανάριν of Matt., Mark has συμβολικος ποιεις, iii. 6, x. 14. There are many words peculiar to Mark; thus ἄλας, vii. 37, ix. 17, 29; ἡμερακρι- βίσιαν, ix. 15, xiv. 33, xiv. 5, 6; ἐναγιαλείρισθαι, ix. 30, x. 16; κεντρικά, ix. 39, 44, 45; προμορι- σμοι, xiii. 11; προσευχήθειοι, x. 35; σταῦλος, ix. 3; σταυρίζω, x. 8; συνθελής, x. 24, 31; σταῦλος, x. 44, 46, 48; παθωδηθε, x. 21; συμφο- ρίζω, x. 23.

The diction of St. Mark presents the difficulty that whilst it abounds in Latin words and in expressions that recall Latin equivalents, it is still much more akin to the Hebraistic diction of St. Matthew than to the purer style of St. Luke.

IX. Quotations from the Old Testament. — The following list of references to the Old Testament is nearly or quite complete: —

X. Contents of the Gospel. — Though this Gos- pel has little historical matter which is not shared with some other, it would be a great error to sup- pose that the voice of Mark could have been silenced without injury to the divine harmony. The minute painting of the scenes in which the Lord took part, the vivid and lively mode of the narration, the very absence of the precious discourses of Jesus, which, interposed between the deeds, would have delayed the action, all give to this Gospel a character of its own. It is the history of the war of Jesus against sin and evil in the world during the time that He dwelt as a Man among men. Its motto might well be, as Lange observes, those words of Peter: "How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the Devil: for God was with Him." (Acts x. 38). It develops a series of acts of this conflict, broken by intervals of rest and refreshment in the wilderness or on the mountain. It records the exploits of the Son of God in the war against Satan, and the retirement in which af-fter each He returned to commune with His Father, and bring back fresh strength for new encounters. Thus the passage from ii. 1 to iii. 6 describes his first conflict with the Pharisees, and it ends in a conspiracy of Pharisees and Herodians for his destruction, before which He retires to the sea (iii. 7). The passage from iii. 13 to vi. 6 contains the account of his conflict with the unbelievable of his own countrymen, urging with those remarkable words, "And He could there do no mighty work, save that He laid his hands upon a few sick folk and healed them;" then, constrained (so to speak) in his working by their resistance, He retired for that time from the struggle, and "went about the towns teaching" (iii. 31-38).

The principal divisions in the Gospel are these:
1. John the Baptist and Jesus (i. 1-13). 2. Acts of Jesus in Galilee (i. 14-ix. 50). 3. Teaching in Perea, where the spirit of the new kingdom of the Gospel is brought out (x. 1-34). 4. Teaching, trials, and sufferings in Jerusalem. Jesus revealing Himself as Founder of the new kingdom (x. 35-and xv. 47). 5. Resurrection (xvi.).

works on the Gospel of Mark are mentioned in the Wilke (1838), Hilgenfeld (1850), Baur (1851),

ferred to, and the commentaries of Kühnel, Oes-and Luke, see Holtzmann in Bunsen's Bibelwerk, vii. (1866), pp. 29-53. Many recent critics, besides those mentioned in the preceding article (p. 178), such as Smith of Jordanhill, Kenrick, Bleek, (Theol. Jour., 1851), Holtzmann, Weiss (Theol.

Stud. u. krit. 1861), Schenkel, Weissicker, and Meyer in the later editions of his Kommentar, remark Mark as the earliest and most original of the first three Gospels, most of them, however, resort-ting to the hypothesis of an earlier, perhaps Petrine Gospel, which forms its basis. The subject has been discussed with great fullness by Holtzmann. On the other hand, Hilgenfeld strenuously maintains the secondary and derivative character of Mark's Gospel, and Davidson, in his new Introduction (1893), as well as Bleek, adheres substantially to the view of Griesbach, arguing that it was mainly compiled from Matthew and Luke. Against the supposition that any one of the Evangelists copied from the others, see particularly the dissertation of Mr. Norton, "On the Origin of the Three Evangelists among MARMOTH (מָרְמוֹת; v. l. Māri-moth; Marı́mūth) = Mehrimoth the priest, the son of Uriah (1 Esdr. viii. 62; comp. Ezra viii. 33).

MARTH (מָרָת; בֵּיתָנֵיה, pl. Ges.) in both MSS.: and so also Jerome, in MARKET

Amritsalinbana), one of the towns of the western bowlad of Judah whose names are alluded to or placed upon by the prophet Micah in the warning with which his prophecy opens (i. 12). The allusion turns on the signification of Maroth — “bitternesses.” It is not elsewhere mentioned, nor has the name been encountered by travellers.
Schwarz’s conjecture (107), that it is a contraction of Maarath, is not very happy, as the latter contains the letter ain, which but very rarely disap-ppears under any process to which words are subjected.

G.

* MARKET occurs in the O. T. only in the 27th chap. of Ezekiel (vv. 13, 17, 19, 25), where it is the rendering of the Hebr. דָּשַׁר, which in the same chapter is five times (in vv. 9, 27, 33, 34) translated “merchandise.” In the N. T. it is used as the equivalent of the Greek word διασκόρ, which however, is rendered market-place in Matt. xx. 3; Mark xii. 38; Luke vii. 32; Acts xvi. 19: and in Mark vi. 56 is translated “street” (apparently after the Vulg. in plateis).

The market was not only a place of traffic, but also of general resort. It was frequented by persons in search of amusement (cf. Matt. xi. 16; Luke vii. 32) or of employment (Matt. xx. 3), and in time of calamity (Eccles. xii. 5 LXX.; cf. Is. xv. 3).

There justice was commonly administered, and many other public affairs transacted; there, too, prophets and public teachers found their auditors (cf. Jer. xvii. 19; Prov. i. 20 f., vii. 1 f.; Luke xiii. 25). They were “market-browsers” (γυράραδε who aided the Jewish persecutors of Paul at Thessalonic (Acts xvii. 5). Accordingly, the word sometimes appears to designate little more than a place of publicity (Matt. xiii. 7; Mark xii. 38; Luke xi. 43, xx. 46).

The market-places in the cities of Palestine, at least in the earlier times, lay just within the gates [GATES, vol. i. p. 871; see also Thomson’s Land and Book, i. 29 ff.]. They sometimes consisted of something more than a bare, open space, if we may judge from 1 Esdr. ii. 18 (17), where we read of a building (οἰκοδομοιον) the market-places; ” Icf. Joseph. B. J. i. 21, § 8. And it is doubtful whether they were always situated close to the city gates (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 1; v. 12, § 3; Vit. p.
22). Certainly in Jerusalem trade seems not to have been confined to the neighborhood of the gates, for we read in Jer. xxxvii. 21 of the bakers’ street (יַהְכָּר) (cf. also Neh. iii. 32), in Josephus
(B. J. v. 8, § 1), of the wool-mart, the copper-smiths’ shops, the clothes market, and (B. J. v. 4, § 1) of the valley of the cheese-makers, while in the rabbinical writings still other associated trades are mentioned, as the corn-market, meat-market, etc. (For illustrations of modern usages, see Tobler’s Denkschiter aus Jerusalem, pp. 139 ff., 142 f., 373 f., &c.) Accordingly, the supposition is not improbable one that in the larger cities a market for the sale of country produce, cattle, etc., was held in piazza near the gates, while traffic in manufactured articles was grouped in bazaars, or collections of shops within a usage not unknown in the East at the present day [STREET] (see Hackett’s I11utrations of Scripture, p. 69 ff.). On the approach of the Sabbath, or of a festival, a signal from a trumpet was given “between the two evenings” [DAY, vol. i. p. 568] that work should cease and the markets be closed. They remained shut also on days of public mourning. Foreigners seem to have been free to engage in traffic (Neh. xiii. 16, x. 31);
indeed, the wandering habits of oriental traders are indicated by the primary signification (“one who travels about”) of יַהְכָּר and יַהְכָּר, two of the most common Hebrew words to denote a merchant, (see Josh. iv. 13, and Hackett’s Illustrations, etc. p. 76 f.). The falsification of weights and measures was rigorously proscribed by Moses and the prophets (Lev. xix. 35, 36; Deut. xxv. 15; Ezek. xlv. 10 f.); Amos viii. 5; Micah vi. 10 f.; cf.
Prov. xi. 1, xvi. 11, xx. 10, 23). On the medium of trade see MONEY.

Respecting “the market” at Athens, where Paul “disputed daily,” according to the practice of pub-lc teachers, at least from the time of Socrates, see ATHENS, vol. i. p. 194. A detailed account (of course somewhat conjectural) of this place and its environs is given in Conybeare and Howson’s Life and Epp. of St. Paul, i. 354 f., Am. ed., and a lively description of the scenes that were to be witnessed there may be found in Felton’s Lectures on Ancient and Modern Greece, i. 375 ff.; cf. Beeler’s Char-icles, 21 Eng. ed., p. 277 ff. The “market-place” of Philippippi, and the proceedings before the “prestors” there, must derive illustration from the forenisis usages of Rome, of which Philippippi as a Roman colony was a miniature likeness.
