where assumed that God and man should be in all respects in harmonious relations, at-one. Such is the ideal picture of Adam and Eve in Eden. Such is the assumption in 1. Primary Assumption the Garden it: God and Man ought to be at home with God, at peace in the Father's house (Lk 16). Such also is the ideal of Jesus as seen esp. in Jn 14-17; of particularly rank. Cf also 2 Cor 1 22-25: 1 Cor 15 28.

This is quite possibly the underlying idea of all those offerings in which the priests—God's representatives—and the people joined in eating at a common meal part of what had been presented to God. The prohibition of the use of blood in food or drink is grounded on the statement that the life is in the blood (Lev 17 10ff) or is the blood (Gen 9 4; Dt 12 23). Blood was used in the consecration of tabernacle, temple, vessels, altars, priests, all things and persons set apart for God. Then blood was required in offerings made to atone for sin and uncleanness. The reason for all this is not easy to see; but if we seek an explanation that will account for all the facts on a single principle, we shall not find it in mere t-emel; or certainly the life-symbol, over persons and things set apart for God they were, so to say, visibly taken up into the life of God, and His life extending over them made them essentially of His own person. Further, the blood of sacrifice was the returning to God of the life of the man for whom the beasts stood. And this blood was not burned with the dead sacrifice but poured out beside the holy. The offering of sin burning was burned, but the blood, the life, returned to God. In peace offerings of various sorts there was the common meal in which the common life was typified.

In the claim of the first-fruits of all crops, of all walks of all increase, God emphasized the common life in production; asserted His claim to the total life of His people and their products. God claimed the lives of all as belonging essentially to Himself and a man must recognize this by paying a ransom price (Ex 20 13; Dt 22 29). This is not purchase for a man a right to his own life in separation from God, for it was in no sense an equivalent in value to the man's time. It the rather committed the man to living the common life with God, without whose recognition the man was not fit to live at all. And the use of this recognition-money by the priests in the temple was regarded as placing the man who paid his money in a sort of continuous worshipful service in the tabernacle (or temple) itself (Ex 30 11).

In both OT and NT the assumption of unity between God and man stands over against the contrasted fact that there is a radical breach in this unity. This breach is recognized in all God's relations to men; and even when healed it is always subject to new failures which must be provided for, by the daily oblations in the OT, by the continuous intercession of the Christ (He 7 25; 9 24) in the NT. Even when there is no conscious breach, man is taught to recognize that it may exist and he must avail himself of the appointed means for its healing, e.g. daily sacrifices. This breach is universally attributed to some behavior on man's part. This may be moral or ceremonial, as the man has broken with God fundamentally in character or conduct and so by committing sin have incurred guilt; or he may have neglected the fitting recognition that his life is in common with God and so by his disregard have incurred uncleanness. After the first breach between God and man it was always approach God on the assumption that this breach needs healing, and so always come with an offering. In human nature the sin breach is rooted and universal (Rom 3 9-19; 5 12-14).

Numerous and various means were employed for expressing this essential unity of life, for restoring it since it was broken off in sin, and for maintaining it. These means for Express—were primarily spiritual and ethical, the religion, Restor—but made extensive use of material and maintaining, religious ceremonies; and these tended to always obscure and supplant the spiritual and ethical qualities which it was their function to exhibit. The prophet came to the rescue of the spiritual and ethical and reached his highest insight and function in the doctrine of the Suffering Servant of Jeh through whom God was to be united with a redeemed race (of among many passages, Is 52 13-15; 53 16ff; Ps 22 27ff).

Atonement is conceived in both OT and NT as partly personal and partly social, extending to the universal conception. The acts and attitudes by which it is procured, restored and maintained are in the series of offerings, e.g., in the OT, sacrifices, in the NT, the life of Christ. Sacrifice was the offering of life for life, the blood of the animal (Ex 22 13), making atonement for sin (Lev 17 10ff) and the life of the guilty victim. The NT atonement was broader, personal and social, as also were both sin and uncleanness. Atonement was made for the group by the priest without specific participation by the people although they were, originally at least, to take cognizance of the fact and at the time. At all the great feasts, especially upon the Day of Atonement (q.v.) the whole group was receptively to take conscious part in the work of atonement (Nu 29 7-11).

The various sacrifices and offerings by means of which atonement was effected in the life and worship of Israel will be found to be discussed under the proper words and are to be spoken of here only summarily. The series of offerings, guilt, burnt, peace-offerings, revealed how the breach with God, a conviction of the sin making the breach and an ethical appreciation of the holiness of God entirely unique among religions of ancient and modern times, and the fact of the atonement was looked in interpreting the NT Christian doctrine of the Atonement. In the OT there are sins and sinful circumstances for which no atonement is possible. Many passages, indeed, almost seem to provide against atonement for any voluntary wrongdoing (e.g. Lev 4 2.13:22.27; 5 14ff). This is, no doubt, an extreme interpretation, out of harmony with the general spirit of the OT, but it does show how seriously sin ought to be taken under the OT regime. No atonement for murder could make possible the residence of the murderer again in that section of the land where the murder was done (Nu 35 33), although the land was not by the murder rendered unfit for occupation by others. When Israel sinned in making the golden calf, God refused to accept any atonement (Ex 32 30) until there had been a great loss of life from among the sinners. No repentance could find atonement for the refusal to follow Jeh's lead at Kedesh-barners (Nu 14 20-25), and complete atonement was not effected only when all man's creaturely life had died in the wilderness (Nu 35 65; 32 10ff); i.e. no atonement was possible, but the people died... in that sin, outside the Land of Promise, although the sin was not allowed to cut off finally from Jeh (Nu 14:29 f).

Permanent uncleanness or confirmed disease of any sort caused permanent separation from the temple and the people of Jeh (e.g. Lev 7:20 f), and every uncleanness must be properly removed (Lev 6:20; 17:15; 22:2-8; Dt 23:10 f). A house in which an unclean disease was found must be cleansed—have atonement made for it (Lev 14:53), and in extreme cases must be utterly destroyed (Lev 14:43 f).

After childbirth (Lev 12:7) and in all cases of hemorrhage (cf Lev 15:30) atonement must be effected by prescribed offerings, a loss, diminution, or pollution of blood, wherein is the life, having been suffered. All this elaborate application of the principle of atonement shows the comprehensiveness with which it was sought by the religious teachers to impress the people with the unity of all life in the perfectly holy and majestic God whom they were called upon to serve. Not only must the priests be clean who bear the vessels of the Lord (Isa 52:11), but all the people must be clean also from all defilement, and that partly, perhaps, with reference to the blood of their Redeemer in the fear of their God (cf 2 Cor 7:1).

III. The Atonement of Jesus Christ.—All the symbols, doctrine and examples of atonement in the OT among the Hebrews find their counterpart in the NT, and each is explained in the new covenant in the blood of Jesus Christ (Mt 26:28; He 12:24). By interpreting the inner spirit of the sacrificial system, by insisting on the unity of the person of God, by passionate plea for purity in the people, and especially by teaching the principle of vicarious suffering for sin, the Prophets laid the foundation in thought-forms and in religious atmosphere for such a doctrine of atonement as is presented in the life and teaching of Jesus and as is unfolded in the teaching of His apostles.

The personal, parabolic sufferings of Hosea, the remarkable elaboration of the redemption of a spiritual Israel through a Suffering Servant of Jehovah and the extension of that redemption to all mankind as presented in Isa 40-66, and the same element in such psalms as Ps 22, constitute a key to the understanding of the work of the Christ who unifies the entire revelation of God's righteousness and grace in His plan over the ages. Yet it is remarkable that such a conception of the way of atonement was as far as possible from the general and average Jewish mind when Jesus came. In no sense can the NT doctrine of the Atonement be said to be the product of the thought and spirit of the ages.

However much theologians may disagree as to the rationale of the Atonement, there is, as there can be, no question that Jesus and His apostles understood His death to be radically connected with this Atonement.

3. How Shall We Understand the Atonement? Features may be stated positively and negatively, while others must be presented interrogatively, recognizing that interpretations may differ.

John has this element so prominent in his Gospel that radical criticism questions its authorship partly on that account, while the epistles of Jn and the Revelation are, on the same ground, attributed to later Gr. thought. (cf 1 Jn 1:7; 2:2; 3:5; 4:10; Rev 1:5; 5:9). The Epistle to the Hebrews presents the fulfillment and extension of all the sacrificial system of Judaism and holds that the shedding of blood seems essential to the very idea of remission of sins (9:22; cf 2:17; 7:26; 9:28).

When we come to systematize the teaching concerning the Atonement we find, as in all doctrine, that definite system is not offered us in the NT, but all system, if it is to have any value for Christianity, must be consistent with the whole system of Biblical teaching. The NT. Proceeding in this way some Atonement? features may be stated positively and finally, while others must be presented interrogatively, recognizing that interpretations may differ.

(1) An initial consideration is that the Atonement originates with God who "was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself" (2 Cor 5:19), and whose love gave Jesus to redeem sinful men (Rom 5:8). In all atonement in OT and NT the initiative of God who not only devises and reveals the way to reconciliation, but by means of angels, prophets, priests, and ultimately Jesus His only begotten Son applies the means of atonement to men's salvation and persuades men to accept the proffered reconciliation. Nothing in the speculation concerning the Atonement can be more false to its true nature than making a breach between God and His Christ in their attitude toward sinful men.

It follows that atonement is fundamental in the nature of God in His relations to men, and that redemption is in the heart of God's dealings in history. The "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev 13:8 AV and ERV; cf 5:5-7) is the interpreter of God's presence and mediates His presence in history. In Jesus we behold the Lamb of God taking away the sin of the world (Jn 1:29).
(3) The question will arise in the analysis of the doctrine: How does the death of Christ save us? No specific answer has ever been generally satisfactory. We have numerous theories of the Atonement. We have already intimated that the answer to this question will depend upon the identity of the nature of God, the nature of sin, the content of salvation, the nature of man, and our idea of Satan and evil spirits. We ought at once to dismiss all merely quantitative and commercial conceptions of exchange of merit. There is no longer any question that the doctrines of imputation, both of Adam's sin and of Christ's righteousness, were overworked and applied by the early theologians with a fatal exclusiveness, without warrant in the Word of God. On the other hand no theory can hold much weight that presupposes that sin is a thing of light consequence in the nature of man and in the economy of God. Unless one is prepared to resist unto blood swirling against sin (He 12:2-4), he cannot know the meaning of the Christ. Again, it may be said that the notion that the death of Christ is to be considered apart from His life, eternal and incarnate life, as the atoning work, is far too narrow to express the teaching of the Bible and far too shallow to meet the ethical conscience.

It would serve clearness if we reminded ourselves that the question of how in the Atonement may involve various elements. We may inquire: (a) for the ground on which God may rightfully receive the sinner; (b) for the means by which God places the restoration within the reach of the sinner; (c) for the influence by which the sinner is persuaded to accept the reconciliation; (d) for the attitude or exercise of the sinner toward God in Christ wherein he actually enters the state of restored union with God. These theories have been tended to be exclusive, or at least mutually antagonistic, largely because they have taken partial views of the whole subject and have emphasized some one feature of the whole content. All serious theories partly express the truth and all together are inadequate fully to declare how the Daystar from on high doth guide our feet into the way of peace (Lk 1:79).

(4) Another question over which the theologians have sorely vexed themselves and each other concerned the Atonement whether it is available for all men or for certain particular elect ones. That controversy may now be passed by. It is no longer possible to read the Bible and suppose that God relates himself sympathetically with all men. The segregal passages of Scripture formerly employed in support of such a view have now taken their place in the progressive self-interpretation of God to men through Christ who is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (1 Jn 2:2). No man cometh unto the Father but by Him (Jn 14:6); but whosoever does thus call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved (Joel 2:32; Acts 2:21). In Lev 23:26-32 mention is made in the list of festivals of the Day of Atonement, on the 10th day of the 7th month. It is ordered that for this day there shall be a holy convocation at the sanctuary, a fast, an offering by fire, and rest from labor from the 9th day of the 7th month in the evening.

According to Lev 25:9 the year of jubilee begins with the Day of Atonement.

Nu 18 speaks of the duties and the rights of the priests and the Levites. In contrast with the latter, according to ver 7, Aaron and his sons are to perform the duties of the priesthood in all matters pertaining to the altar and of the service within the veil and shall render this service. We have here doubtless a comprehensive law for the entire priestly order, so that from this alone it cannot be determined that the service within the veil, by which reference is made to the ceremony of the Day of Atonement, has been reserved for the high priest alone. As in De 10:8; 33:8 ff., everything that pertains to the whole tribe of Levi is found combined, without thereby the division into high priest, priests and Levites, being regarded as excluded (cf. Ezekiel, II, 2, (1), (6).

Nu 29:7 contains in connection with the laws treating of sacrifices also the enactment, that on the 10th day of the 7th month there shall take place a holy convocation at the sanctuary, fasting and rest from labor. In addition to the sin offering, which is brought for the purpose of atonement for sin, and in addition to the regular burnt offerings and the accompanying meal offerings and drink offerings, burnt offerings also are to be brought, viz. one young bullock, one young ram, seven lambs of the first year (all without blemish); then meal offerings, viz. the other offerings, of finely ground flour mingled with oil for each bullock; two-tenths for each ram; one-tenth for each lamb; then a sin offering, viz. one he-goat.

Ezekiel in his vision of the new temple of the holy city and the holy country (chs 40-48), in 45 18 ff., gives a series of enactments for the festivals and the sacrifices. According to these, on the 1st day of the 1st month and on the 7th day of the 1st month (on the 1st day of the 7th month according to the LXX), on the 8th day, after the self-sacrifices through a young bullock without blemish, the priest taking some of the blood of the sin offering and putting it on the posts of the temple, on the four corners of the altar and on the posts of the gate of the inner court; and this is to be done for the sake of those who perhaps have sinned through error or ignorance. Further, that sacrifice which is to be brought on the Passover by the princes for themselves and all the people of the land (cf. 22) appears to present a new element. For, lest any rest, Ezek. 40–48 cannot without further consideration be put on the same level with the other legal enactments, but are to be regarded as an ideal scheme, the realization of which is conditioned on the entrance of the wonderful feature (of Ezekiel).

1. Contents, structure and position.—Lev 16:1–28 contains instructions given by Jehovah to Moses for his brother Aaron (ver. 1,2). (a) Ver. 1–10 contain presuppositions, preparations and opening statements of the ceremonies on the Day of Atonement. According to ver. 1.2 Aaron is not allowed to enter the holy place at any time whatever, lest he may die as did his sons with their unanointed fire offering (cf. Lev 10:1 ff.); ver. 3–5 tell what is necessary for the ceremony: For himself four things: a young bullock as a sin-offering (cf. 6:11, 14, 15, 27); a ram for burnt offering (cf. ver. 24); sacred garments, viz., a linen coat, linen breeches, linen girdle, linen mitre (cf. 29:2); a cartouch in the form of a he-goat as a sin-offering (cf. 7:15–22, 25, 27, 28, 32, 33), a ram as a burnt offering (cf. ver. 24). The passages in parentheses show how closely the succeeding parts of this account are connected with this introductory section. But it is often found that the materials used for the sacrifices are mentioned first, before anything is said in detail of what to be done with this material. Cf. 8:1.2 with 6:7 ff. 10, 14, 18, 22, 26 and 9:2–4 with 8:12. Aaron’s sin-offering bullock is to be used as an atonement for himself; ver. 7–10 refer to the two goats: they are to be placed at the door of the tent of meeting (ver. 7); lots are to be cast upon them for Jehovah and Azazel (ver. 8); the first to be prepared as a sin offering for Jehovah (ver. 9); the second, in accordance with the law, to be sent into the desert (ver. 10).

(b) Ver. 11–24 describe the ceremony itself and give fuller directions as to how the different sacrificial materials mentioned under (a) are to be used by Aaron: (1) Ver. 11–14 speak of the atonement for Aaron and his house; ver. 11, of his sin-offering bullock to be killed; ver. 12, of burning coal from the altar and two handfuls of sweet incense beaten small to be placed behind this, of the chaff of incense to be made in the Holy of Holies, so that the top covering is hidden and protected from the danger of death; ver. 14, of some of the blood to be sprinkled once on the front of the top covering and seven times in front of it. Ver. 15–19 prescribe the ceremony with the first sin-offering goat for the congregation: In ver. 15, the ceremony described in ver. 14 is directed also to be carried out with the goat, as an atonement for the inner sanctuary; clearly the same name, in ver. 16 the same thing is directed to be done in regard to the tabernacle of revelation, i.e., the holy place; in ver. 17, no one is permitted to be present even in the holy place when these ceremonies take place; in ver. 18, the altar too is directed to be cleansed by an atonement, some of the blood of both sin-offering animals being smeared on the horns and sprinkled seven times on the ground. Ver. 20–22 prescribe the ceremony with the second sin-offering goat for the congregation: In ver. 20 direction is given; in ver. 21, directions for what there takes place the transfer of guilt; Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the goat; shall confess all guilt over him; shall lay them upon the head of the goat; shall through a man send him into the desert; in ver. 22a, the goat carries the guilt of the uncleanliness of the land; in ver. 22b, he is not to be let go until he is in the desert. Ver. 23,24, the concluding act: in ver. 23a, Aaron takes off his linen garments in the tent of meeting, and in ver. 23b puts them down there; in ver. 24a, he bathes in the holy place and again puts on his garments: then in ver. 24b, the burnt offering for himself and his people. (The statement for himself and his people at this place concludes the ritual as such.)

(c) Ver. 25–28 are explanatory, with three additional directions where ver. 25, the fat of the sin-offering is directed to be consumed into smoke on the altar; ver. 26, who has taken away the second goat must wash his clothes and bathe himself, and only then is he permitted to enter the camp; ver. 27, the fat, flesh and dung of the sin-offering animals, and then the blood that was brought into the inner sanctuary, are to be burned outside of the camp; ver. 28, he who has burned these must wash his clothes, and must bathe, and only after this can he enter the camp. (In this case ver 25 and 27 correspond, and also ver. 26 and 28; and in addition ver. 26, 27 and 28 are united by their reference to the camp.)

(d) Ver. 29–34: Over against these sections (a)–(c) (ver. 1–28), which contain the instructions for the private sanctuaries, there are two sections, already through the address in the second person plur. and also by its contents is intended for the congregation. In ver. 29–31, the demand is made of the congregation. As in Lev. 23:6 ff., in Nu. 29:1–6 ff., a fast, a sacrifice of the 10th day of the 7th month as the Day of Atonement; in ver. 32–34, a number of directions are given in a summary to the congregation on the basis of 16 ff., viz. ver. 32, how the atonement is to take place: the people bring before Aaron a bullock and a he-goat sin-sectrated; that he perform the service in his father’s place; in his linen garments; ver. 33 prescribes when and for whom the atonement is to take place: for the holy of holies; for the holy place; for the altar; for the order of priests and all the people; in ver. 34, the one Day of Atonement in the year for all sins is declared to be an everlasting statute. The statement that Aaron (ver. 2), according to Jehovah’s command, did as Moses directed atply closes the whole chapter.

The number four appears to occupy a predominating place in this chapter, as the bird’s-eye view above already shows, and as this can be traced still further in the details of the accounts. But even if in ch. 13, of the cleansing of the blood and the division of the chapter is accidental, although this number appears almost as a matter of course, and in Ex. 26,4–40,35, in Gen. 12,25, in the story of Abraham, Lev. 11–15, and Dt. 12,36 naturally fall into four pericopes with four subdivisions, yet this chapter is, as far as contents are concerned, so closely connected, and so well organized as a whole, that all attempts to ascribe it to different sources, concerning which we shall speak immediately, must come to naught, as will be seen from the fact that at this point we first of all draw attention to the fact that ch. 16 has its well-established place in the whole of the Book of Lev (cf. Leviticus). The whole book has as it were to regulate the dealings of the Israelites with their God, and it does this in such a way that the first part (chs. 1–17) removes the hindrances that have been caused by sin. In this the ordinances with reference to the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), and with reference to the significance of the blood (Lev. 17), constitute a natural and excellent conclusion, while this prepares for the positive sanctification, which is discussed in chs. 18 ff. In 16,31 we find in addition a clear transition to the thoughts of Lev. 16, for in this passage mention is made of the uncleanliness of the person who enters the dwelling-place of Jehovah that is in their midst.
Modern attempts to disprove unity of chapter. — A large number of attempts have been made to destroy the unity of this chapter, which has been demonstrated in division (1) above. Thus Stade separates vs 3–10 as the original kernel from the expository or expounding parts in the last eight verses, and variously adds the former part in vs 11–28. But we have already seen that vs 3–10 are the preparation for all that follows, so that these verses demand vs 11ff as a necessary complement. Again Oort separates vs 1–4, 116–12.18a.19.23.24a.25.26a of the rest, by urging the purification of the sanctuary and the atonement of the people as the measure for this separation; but above all it is proved by Ezek 45 18–20 that just these two thoughts are inseparably united. In recent times it has become the custom, following the leadership of Benzingter, to divide the text into three parts. Baentsch divides as follows: (a) 16 1–4.6.12.13.4b contains a single peripeteia, which on the basis of the fate of the sons of Aaron, described in ch 10, determines under what circumstances Aaron alone is permitted to enter the Holy of Holies; (b) vs 29–34a contain "an older, relatively simpler law in reference to the yearly day of penitence and atonement;" (c) vs 35–38 a fragmentary description of a "priestly ritual, with a more complicated blood rite," and above all with "the rite of the sin goat." Of these three pieces only (a) is thought to belong to the original Priest Codex, as proved esp. by its reference back once in a "house of Aaron," (b) belongs to the secondary parts, because the day of repentance is not yet mentioned in Neh 8ff; cf II. 1; at any rate the anointing of all the priests is there not yet presupposed (cf Leviticus); (c), however, is declared to be very late and its separate parts are regarded as having originated only after the others (thus recently also Bertholot). It is impossible here to enter into all the minor parts eliminated by the exegetes, and in the same way we do not intend in our examination to enter into all the incorrect views found in these criticisms. We confine ourselves to the chief matter. The very foundation of the criticism is wrong. What Aaron's sons experienced according to Lev 10 could very easily have been permitted to be repeated, if not actually introduced in vs 2ff, but could never have furnished the occasion for the composition of the pericope described above (a); for Nadab and Abihu had not entered into the Holy of Holies at all. Judging by the statement from ch 10, that ch 16 originally followed immediately on ch 10. For who could possibly have conceived the thought of inserting chs 11–16 in an altogether unsuitable place between chs 10 and 16 and thus have split asunder a connection so transparent? In general, the different attempts to break the unity of this chapter show how subjective and arbitrary these attempts are. They are a characteristic example of the tendency in which the Priest Codex is now being further divided (cf Leviticus). In general, sufficient material for the positive refutation of such attempts has been given above.

II. The Significance of the Day of Atonement. —The significance of the day is expressed in the name "Day of Atonement" (Yom ha-Kippurim; Lev 23 27ff; 25 9) in Significance the same manner as it is in the fast for Israel which was enjoined on the congregation as a sign of sorrow for their sins (this fast is brought into connection with the law: Lev 16 29.31; 23 26ff; Nu 29 7ff), as also finally and chiefly in the entire ritual (Ex 30 10; Lev 23 28; Nu 29 11; Lev 16; cf also Ezek 45 18–20.22). Then, too, the atonement takes place for the sanctuary which has been defiled by the contamination of the Israelites (Ex 30 10); Lev 16 16–20.33; cf also Ezek 45 18–20). In particular, mention is made of the Holy of Holies (Lev 16 33, called Mekidash ha-kohën; otherwise in Lev regularly ha-kohën), then of the holy place (Lev 16 10b–20.33), and then of the altar (16 18.20.33). The main object of the discussion whether the altar of incense is meant, as is claimed by Jewish tradition, on the basis of Ex 30 10, or the altar of burnt offerings, for which reference could be made to the additional statements in Lev 17, to those of ver 16, and to the conclusion in ver 17. The altar of incense (Ex 30 10) would then be included in the atonement of the tent of meeting. The somewhat remarkable position of ver 17b would then at the same time find its motive in this, that, while vs 6 and 11b mention an atonement only for Aaron and his house, the atonement of the Holy of Holies and of the holy place in ver 17 is for Aaron, his house, and the whole congregation, while the atonement of the burnt-offering altar in the forecourt (vs 18) would be intended only for the sins of the congregation. The atonement, however, takes place for all the transgressions of the congregation since the last Day of Atonement (cf vs 21 5f.30.34). In reference to the separation of the second goat of sin offering, cf vs 8ff.20ff, and Azazel, II. 1. In this way Deltzsch has correctly called the Day of Atonement "the good Friday of the Old Testament." How deeply the consciousness of sin has been awakened, if the many otherwise commanded private and congregational sacrifices did not make such an institution superfluous, and if even the high priest himself stood before God as a sinner (vs 6.11ff). On this day, with the exception of the mitre, he does not wear the insignia of his high-priestly office, but wears white garments, which in their simplicity correspond to the earnestness of the situation. The repetition of the bath, both in his case and in that of the other persons engaged in the ceremony (vs 24.26.28), was necessary, because the mere washing of the hands and feet (Ex 30 19f) would not suffice on this occasion (cf Nu 19 7ff.19.21). The flesh of the sin-offering animals was not permitted to be eaten, for it was not sacrificed as such, because it was sacrificed also for Aaron's sin, and its blood was carried not only into the holy place but also into the Holy of Holies (cf 16 27 with Lev 6 29; 4 11f.21; Ex 29 14; Lev 8 17; 9 11f.10 9). The name of the sin that had been atoned, how great must on the other hand God's grace appear, when once in each year a general remission of all the sins that had been forgiven was guaranteed.

"The Day of Atonement, the good Friday of the Old Testament" —these words express not only the highest significance of the day but also its limitations. As the tabernacle, the sacrificial system, the entire Christian law, thus too the Day of Atonement in particular contained only the shadow of future good things, but not these things themselves (He 10 1), and is "like in pattern to the true" (He 9 24). Christ Himself entered into the holy place, which was not made with hands, namely, into heaven itself, and has now appeared before God, by once for all giving Himself as a sacrifice for the removal of sin (He 9 23f). By this act the purpose of the OT sacrificial cult is fulfilled. The Day of Atonement, understood in its typical significance, has been fulfilled, and at the same time surpassed and thereby abrogated (cf Leviticus). Accordingly, our hope, too, like an anchor (He 6 19), penetrates to the inner part of the veil in the higher sense of the term, i.e. to heaven.
III. On the History of the Day of Atonement.—

(1) The facts and the false conclusions.—The Day of Atonement is stated to have been instituted in the times of Moses (Lev 16 1); the reason is not discussed in the table; nor is the day, which the Mosaic future will take away the guilt of the land in a single day; but this too presents no more than an analogy to the results of the Day of Atonement. On the other hand, there is no reference made to the day where we could expect it. Nor only 2 Ch 7 7–9 in connection with the consecration of Solomon’s temple, and Ezr 3 1–6, in the account of the reestablishment of the sacrificial services after the return from the Exile, are silent on the subject, which fact could possibly be explained in an easy manner; but Neh 8 17–18, where Ezra begins on the 1st day of the 7th month in the year 444 BC to read from the law; on the 21st day of the 7th month remembrance is made of the ordinance of the feast of tabernacles, and on the 22nd day of the 7th month (8 13 ff.), this festival is observed; on the 24th day of the 7th month a day of penance is observed (9 1); but of the Day of Atonement coming in between ch 8 1 and ch 9 1, viz., on the 10th day of the 7th month, which is the form to make the day of penance superfluous, nothing is said. From these facts the Wellhausen school has drawn the conclusion, in accordance with its principles elsewhere observed, that all those legal enactments that have not in the history a sufficient evidence of having been observed, did not exist until the time when they have such historical evidence; that therefore the Day of Atonement did not originate until after the year 444 BC. It is claimed that the day originated in the day of atonement on the 7th day of the 7th month (cf under I, 1); in the four national fast days of Zec 7 5, and 8 19, and in the day of penance of 444 BC, just mentioned, on the 24th day of the 7th month, which is said to have been repeated on the 10th day of the New Year’s day of the 7th month; and that by the sacred character of its observance it soon crowded the New Year day upon the 1st day of the 7th month (cf Lev 23 25 ff.; Nu 29 1 ff; contrary to Lev 25 9 and Ezk 40 1). In this way it is thought that Lev 16 20 ff. first originated, and that at a still later time the complicated blood ritual had been added (cf under I, 1, 2). But it is to be observed that in still later times there is found no more frequent mention of the Day of Atonement than in the earlier, although it is the custom of modern criticism to place a much larger bulk of Biblical lit. into this later period. It is only when we come to Jesus Sirach (Eccles 50 5 ff) that the high priest Simon is praised, when he came forth from behind the veil; and there is certainly a reference to the Day of Atonement, although no further mention is made at this place of the ceremony as such. Then there is a further silence on the subject down to Philo and the Rabbis; to the Hebraic Church (under II, 1, 2). It is probable too that the fasting mentioned in Acts 27 9 is based on the Day of Atonement. We have in this manner a characteristic example to show how carefully we must handle the argument from silence, if we do not want to arrive at unacceptable results.

(2) The historicity of the Day of Atonement.—Since Lev 16 constitutes only one part of the Levitical legislation, the question as to the original and historical character of the day cannot be fully discussed at present (see Levitical Laws). At a later period, naturally all the facts that would lead to an explanation of the origin of such a fundamental institution as the Day of Atonement are lacking. It is all the more impossible to separate Lev 16 from the other priestly ordinances, because the name of the lid of the ark of the covenant, at-kapporeth: Ex 25 17 ff; 26 34) stands in the clearest relation to the ceremony that takes place with this ark on the Day of Atonement. The impossibility of splitting up Lev 16 as it is the manner of critics, or even of Lev 11–16, has been sufficiently demonstrated above (cf under I). Against the view which forces the Priest Codex down at least to the Exile and to claim the tabernacle as the prototype of imagination and as the copy of the temple of Solomon (see Exodus), we have still the following to add: If the ark of the covenant was no longer in existence after the Exile and if, according to Jer 3 16, the Israelites no longer expected its restoration, then it would be long to 8 Ch Ezra. Ezra begins on the 1st day of the 7th month (8 13 ff.), this festival is observed; on the 24th day of the 7th month a day of penance is observed (9 1); but of the Day of Atonement coming in between ch 8 1 and ch 9 1, viz., on the 10th day of the 7th month, which is the form to make the day of penance superfluous, nothing is said. From these facts the Wellhausen school has drawn the conclusion, in accordance with its principles elsewhere observed, that all those legal enactments that have not in the history a sufficient evidence of having been observed, did not exist until the time when they have such historical evidence; that therefore the Day of Atonement did not originate until after the year 444 BC. It is claimed that the day originated in the day of atonement on the 7th day of the 7th month (cf under I, 1); in the four national fast days of Zec 7 5, and 8 19, and in the day of penance of 444 BC, just mentioned, on the 24th day of the 7th month, which is said to have been repeated on the 10th day of the New Year’s day of the 7th month; and that by the sacred character of its observance it soon crowded the New Year day upon the 1st day of the 7th month (cf Lev 23 25 ff.; Nu 29 1 ff; contrary to Lev 25 9 and Ezk 40 1). In this way it is thought that Lev 16 20 ff. first originated, and that at a still later time the complicated blood ritual had been added (cf under I, 1, 2). But it is to be observed that in still later times there is found no more frequent mention of the Day of Atonement than in the earlier, although it is the custom of modern criticism to place a much larger bulk of Biblical lit. into this later period. We have in this manner a characteristic example to show how carefully we must handle the argument from silence, if we do not want to arrive at unacceptable results.

The Day of Atonement, in accordance with its purpose in later times, came more and more into the foreground and was called "the great day," or "the great day," or merely Develop-...

The last night he was not allowed to sleep and had to spend time in studying the sacred writings. On the Day of Atonement he took five baths and ten washings. Four times he enters the Holy of Holies (with the incense), with the blood of both sin offerings, and when he brings out the utensils used with the incense he makes three confessions of sins (for himself, for himself and his house, for Israel); 10 times in all he utters the name of Jeh; 43 times he sprinkles; in addition he must read certain sections of the Scriptures or repeat them from memory (cf also Azazel). When he returns home he celebrates a festival of rejoicing, because he has without harm been able to leave the sanctuary. In addition, he had performed severe physical work, and especially difficult was the manipulation of the incense. The modern estimate on the Day of Atonement comes from the following citation of Wellhausen: "The rite and the sacrifice through the unfavorable circumstances of the times have disappeared; but it has retained the same sacred form. He who has not yet entirely broken with Judaism observes this day, no matter how indifferent he may be otherwise to old customs and festivals."

ATROTH-BETH-JAB, at-roth-beth-jab (237b) ATROTH-BETH-JADB, at-roth-beth-jad (Ἀτρόθ, Ἀτρόθ βῆθι Ἰαβδ, 'atróth bêth yâbdôb, "crowns of the house of Jab'd"): AV "Ataroth-Jabad," the house of Jabad (Avijah Abarbanel, 159-138 BC), hence its name Attalia, which during the Middle Ages was corrupted to Satalia; its modern name is Adalia. Attalia stood on a flat terrace of limestone, about 120 ft. high, near the point where the Catarractes River flowed into the river. The river now, however, has practically disappeared, for the greater part of its water is turned into the fields for irrigation purposes. The early city did not enjoy the ecclesiastical importance of the neighboring city of Perga; but in 1084 when Seljuk declined, Attalia became a metropolis. In 1148 the troops of Louis IV sailed from there to Syria; in 1214 the Seljuks restored the city walls, and erected several public buildings. The city continued to be the chief port for ships from Syria and Egypt, and the point of entry to the interior until modern times, when the harbor at Mersin was reopened; it has now become a place of little importance.

The town possesses considerable which is of archaeological interest. The outer harbor was protected by ancient walls and towers now in ruins; its entrance was closed with a chain. The inner harbor was but a recess in the cliff. The city was surrounded by two walls which were constructed at various times. He who has not yet entirely broken with Judaism observes this day, no matter how indifferent he may be otherwise to old customs and festivals.

These passages show how diversely and elastically the term "attire" was used among the Hebrews. The numerous synonyms for "dress," "attire," "apparel," "garment," "clothes," "raiment," "garment," etc., found in EVV, reflect a similar wealth of nomenclature in the original Heb and Gr; but the lack of exactness and consistency in the renderings of translators makes the identification of the various articles of dress referred to very difficult, sometimes impossible. Attitudes, at'ti-tuds: Customs change slowly in Bible lands. This becomes clear by a comparison of the many references found in the Bible and other literatures of the Orient with existing circumstances and conditions. The same fact is attested by the pictures illustrating daily life upon the monuments of Assyria, Babylonia and Egypt in the centuries between the Tide and the Persian. Many of these, dating back to the second or third millennium before our era, prove conclusively that the same practices and usages as are now common among the inhabitants of those lands were in vogue in the days of Hammurabi and the early rulers of Egypt. This is esp. true of matters pertaining to the worship of the gods, and of the attitudes or positions assumed in homage and respect to monarchs and those in authority.

The many references found in the Bible to these same usages prove that the Hebrews too had much in common with the nations around them, not only in creed, but also in the mode of worship, as well as in general everyday etiquette. This is not strange, at least among the Sem peoples, for there is more or less agreement, even among all nations, ancient and modern, in the attitude of the worshipper in temple and high place.

There are several Heb words used to describe the various attitudes assumed by those who worshiped Jeh and heathen gods; these same words are constantly employed in speaking of the homage or respect paid to rulers and persons in authority. The most common terms are those rendered "to stand," "to bow," "to kneel" and "prostrate oneself" or "fall on the face." It is not always easy to differentiate between them, for often one passes imperceptibly into the other. No doubt several attitudes were assumed by the worshipper or supplicant while offering a prayer or petition. The intensity, the ardor or earnestness with which such a petition or prayer was presented would naturally have much to do with the words and posture of the petitioner, though the same reverence might be depicted by the same posture or attitude. Thus "to fall on the face" might be done in many different ways. The Moslems observe a regular course of nine or more different postures in their worship. These are more or less faithfully observed by the faithful everywhere. It is almost certain that the Hebrews in common with other Orientals observed and went through almost every one of these attitudes as they presented themselves in prayer to Jeh. We shall call attention to just four postures: (1) standing, (2) bowing, (3) kneeling, and (4) falling on the face or prostration.

This was one of the very common postures in prayer to God, esp. in public worship. It is still customary to stand either erect or

1. Standing with slightly bowed head while offering the public prayers in the synagogue. This is likewise the common practice of a large number of Christians in this and other lands, and no doubt such a posture is sanctioned by the example of the early church and primitive Christians, who, in turn, adopted the usages of the Jewish church. The same practice was in vogue among the Persians, Egyptians and Babylonians and many ancient peoples is evidenced by their sculptures and paintings. The famous stela of Hammurabi shows this great king in a standing position as he receives the famous Code from the sun-god. There are numerous Bab and Assy seal impressions which are pictured a priest in a standing posture before the throne of Sin or Shamash. In this attitude with uplifted hands, he is sometimes accompanied by the person in whose behalf prayers are made. A beautiful rock sculpture at Jbritz, S.E. of Ereq in Lycosia, shows us a king or satrap in a standing position, worshiping a local Baal.

Rev. E. J. Davies, the discoverer of this Hittite monument, in describing it, makes this remark, which we cannot refrain from inserting, inasmuch as it gives another proof of the unchangeable East. He says: "If [the god] wears boots turned up in front, and bound round the leg above the ankle by thongs and a piece of leather reaching half-way up the shin, exactly as it is worn to this day by the peasants of the plains of Cilicia," King Solomon, during at least a portion of his prayer at the dedication of the temple, stood at the altar with his hands stretched out toward
2. Kneeling The monumets afford abundant proof for this statement; so the many refercences in the Bible. Solomon not only stood before the altar on the occasion of dedicating his famous temple, but he also kneeled (1 K 8 54; 2 Ch 6 13).
Jos. describing this ceremony, says that the king at the conclusion of his prayer prostrated himself on the ground and in this posture continued worshipping for a long time.
Eza fell upon his knees as he addressed Jeh in prayer (Ezr 9 5). Daniel, too, kneel upon his knees and prayed three times a day (Dnl 6 10). The same practice was observed by the apostles and the early church; for we read that Stephen (Acts 7 60), Peter (9 40), Paul (20 36) and others (21 5) assumed this posture as they prayed.
As already stated, it is not always easy to determine the exact posture of these described as kneeling or bowing, for this varied with the temperamant of the supplant and the intensity of his prayer or supplication. Elizer when sent to select a wife for his master, Isaac, bowed before Jeh (Gen 24 26). The Hebrews on leaving Egypt were commanded to bow to Jeh (Ex 11 8; 12 27 28). The injunction of the Psalmists shows the prevalence of this posture in prayer: "Come let us worship and bow down" (Ps 96 6). Isaiah refers to the same when he says: "Every knee shall bow" to God (ISA 46 23). St. Paul too bowed his knees to the Father (Eph 3 14). The same practice obtained among the heathen nations as they worshipped their gods at Naaman bowed before Rimmon, his god. The numerous prohibitions in the Heb Scriptures against bowing down at the shrines of the nations around Israel prove the prevalence of this method of adoration. Indeed, one of the ten commandments is directly explicity against bowing to or worshipping idols (Ex 20 5).
The same prohibition was often repeated, as by Joshua (23 7) and the author of 2 K (17 35). Unfortunately Israel did transgress in this very thing, for while still in the Wilderness they bowed down to the gods of Moab (Nu 25 2) and again after their settlement in Canaan (Jgs 2 12). Amaaziah bowed down to the gods of Edom (2 Ch 26 14).

3. Bowing

4. Prostrational

Jeh appeared to him and promised him a son, with profoundest gratitude and greatest joy fell prostrate on his face (Gen 17 3).
Moses and Aaron were anointed in this posture (Nu 14 5; 16 4 45; 20 6). Elijah, eccentric in many ways, cast himself upon the earth and placed his face between his knees (cf 1 K 18 42).
Job fell on the ground and worshipped Jeh (Job 1 20). Such homage was often shown to our Saviour (Mk 5 22; Jn 11 32), not because men realized that He was God in the flesh, but simply as a mark of respect for a great teacher and miracle-worker.
It is to be noticed that our Saviour never refused such homage, but accepted it and perpetuated, and proper. Did He not realize that honor and worship Divine belonged to Him, We would have refused them just as Peter did when Cornelius fell down at his feet and worshipped him (Acts 10 25) or as the angel in Rev 19 10, who said to John, prostrate at his feet, "See thou do it not! I am a fellow serviant," etc. See ADORATION, III. W. W. DAVIES AUDIENCE, o'di-en'a: Trd from the Heb תוש, 'ozen, "ear." In Gen 23 10 f "in the audience of" is equal to "in the presence of," or "while they listened." Cf Ex 24 7; 1 S 25 24 (RV "in thine cars"); 1 Ch 28 8; Neh 13 1. In the NT the expression "to give audience" (Acts 22 22; 13 16, RV "arken") or "they heartened") is trd from the Gr ήκον, akolóu, "to hear" or derivatives, and means "to listen," "to pay attention." In AV Lk 7 1 (RV "in the ears of") and AV 20 45 (RV "in the hearing of") the usage is similar to that of the OT.

AUGIA, o'ji-a (A'lya, A'ugia): The wife of Juddas, whose sons were removed from priesthood because their names were not found in the register, their ancestors having usurped the office of the priesthood (1 Esd 5 38). Omitted in Ezr 2 and Neh 7.

AUGURS' OAK, o'grs' ok: If we tr the Heb vb. ידנה, "to practise augury" (see AUGURY) we should in Jgs 9 37 for "the oak of Meonemim" render the 'augurs' oak" as in AV, for the last word is simply the part. of the same vb. and means "one who practises augury," though there is some doubt as to the exact connotation of the word. See under DIVINATION. Both the EVV make this noun the name of a place but no such place is known and the derivation and form of the word are clear and certain. We have a similar phrase similarly misunderstood by our translators in Gen 12 6 where the "oak of Moreh" should be "the oak" (or "terebinth"?) of "the diviners" or "augur," for Moreh is also a part. -"one who teaches" or "directs." Probably the same tree is meant, since in each case the neighborhood is that of Shechem. The worship of trees, or rather the deity supposed to make his home, has prevailed very widely. See W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem., 2, 195; cf Jgs 4 5; 2 S 5 24 and "the oak of Zeus at Dodona." In Jgs 9 6 we read of a "myrz g'bhak, oak tree": the tree with an altar on which sacrifices were offered. The oak trees of Gen 12 6, or of Jgs 9 37 if the oak trees are meant, would be trees which the Canaanites had been in the habit of consulting: hence the name.

AUGURY, o'gú-rí, o'grí: This word occurs in the Kt, 17 Lk 14 26; 1 T 18 Lk 20 20; 2 K 21 151 and the p 2 Ch 33 6. In all these cases the vb. "practise augury" is in the AV "to observe times." The vb. thus trd is תִּשְׁר, 'ozen, which means probably to utter a low croaking sound as was done in divining. See DIVINATION.

1. Definition.—The derivation of "augury" is doubtless, but that it means strictly to divine from the flight of birds is suggested by its likeliest etymology (אֵוָעֵר, gur) and esp. from the fact that in early Lat the augur was called auspex (= ask spece). But both words came to be applied to all forms of divining by omens.

2. Augury among the Romans.—The Rom augur was a government official, paid to guide the councils of the nation in times of peace and of war. The principal signs from which these augurs deduced their omens were these: (1) signs, chiefly lightning and thunder, the direction of the former (right to left a good sign, and vice versa); (2) signs from the flight, cries and feeding of birds; (3) signs from the movements and audible sounds of animals, including serpents; (4) signs from the examination of the entrails of animals; (5) elomancy, or divination by arrows; (6) sorcery, or divination by lot. Among the Romans as among other nations (Babylonians, etc), a sacrifice was offered before omens were taken, so as to propitiate the gods.

3. Augury among the Greeks.—Almost the only kind of divination practised or even known among the Romans was that by signs or omens, though Cicero (de Div. i.1 f) notices another kind which may be called divining by direct inspiration from the gods. It is this higher and more spiritual mode of divining that obtained most largely among the Greeks, whose chief word for diviner (mnditis) implies this. Yet the lower kind of divination known as augury was to some extent practised among the Greeks.

4. Augury among the Hebrews.—In general it may be said that the religion of Israel set itself steadfastly and consistently against augury; a very remarkable fact when one remembers how rife it was among the surrounding peoples—Arabs, Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, etc. Surely there is in this evidence of special Divine guidance, for those ancient Hebrews are not fit to be compared with the Babylonians or Egyptians or Romans for achievement, art and general progress. For the attitude of the OT toward augury see the passages enumerated in the opening of this article. Several kinds of augury are mentioned in the OT, and in some cases without explicit condemnation.

Belomancy was a method of divination by arrows, a number of which were marked in certain ways, then mixed and drawn at random. We have a reference to this in Hos 4 12: "My people ask counsel from the wood [lit. "tree"] and their staff [i.e. "arrow"] tells them [their oracles]; and also in Ezk 21 21: 'For the king of Babylon . . . used divination, shaking the arrows to and fro.' The first passage shows that belomancy was practised by Israelites though the prophet condemned it. The second is interesting as showing how the Babylonian used his arrows. It is to be noticed that the prophet Ezekiel records the incident without making any comment on it, favorable or otherwise. He would, however, had he spoken, almost certainly have condemned it. Mohammed forbade this use of arrows as "an abomination of Satan's work" (Koran, Sur. 6 92).

Hydromancy, or divination by water, was practised by Joseph (Gen 37 3 f) who threw a stone into the water on the part of the writer. There were don't have a reference to these cases, as in the cases enumerated above, God was supposed to control the result. A proper tr of 1 S 14 41 f, based on a text corrected according to the LXX of Lucian, is the following: "And Saul said, O Lord the God of Israel, what hast thou not answered them this day? If the iniquity be in me or in Jonathan my son, give Urim; and if thou sayest thus, The iniquity is in the people, give Thummim. It seems almost certain that these words refer to two balls put into a urim and thummim and drawn by him at random, the one divining one answer, and the other the contrary.

We meet with several other signs. The prophet Elisha directs King Joash to throw two arrows through the window in order to find out whether the king will be victorious or not (2 K 13 14-19). If Gideon’s fleece were wet and the ground dry this was to be a sign of coming victory over the Midianites. There is nothing in the narrative disproving the course taken (Jgs 6 36-40). In 1 K 14 8 ff Jonathan is represented as deciding whether or not he is to attack the Philistines by the words he will hear them speak. See further Gen 24 12-19; 2 K 20 9.

Dreams are very commonly mentioned in the Bible as a means of forecasting the future. See Gen 20 3-6f (Abimelech); 31 10-13

5. Dreams (Jacob); 37 5; 40 3 ff (Joseph), and also Jgs 7 13; 1 K 3 5f; Mt 1 20; 2 19 ff; 27 19, etc. The part of the Pent ascribed by Wellhausen, etc, to E abounds with accounts of such significant dreams.

That omens were taken from the heavenly bodies by the Babylonians, and other ancient nations is matter of definite knowledge, but it is not easy to determine how far the practice was maintained in the OT. Indeed the only explicit reference to it in the Heb Scriptures occurs in Isa. 47 13 where the Exilic author mockingly urges Babylon to turn to her astrologers that they may save her from her threatened doom.

Several cuneiform inscriptions give lists of celestial omens by which Bab augurs prognosticated the future. In Mt 2 the wise men received their first intimation of the birth of the child Jesus from a bright star which they saw in the East. V. Higher Character of Hebrew Prophecy.—Though OT prophecy in its lowest forms has features in common with heathen divination, it stands on an infinitely higher level. The prophet speaks under a strong impulse and from a sense of duty. The heathen diviner plied his calling for money. The Gr μηθίστης worked himself into a state of frenzy, thought to imply inspiration, by music and certain drugs. The prophet believed himself directly guided by God. See Astrology, 1; Divination.

AUGUSTAN, ὀ-γοῦ-ταν (AUGUSTUS’) BAND. See Army, Roman.

AUGUSTUS, ὀ-γοῦτας (Aὐγοῦςτος, Αὐγοῦςτος): (1) The first Rom emperor, and noteworthy in Bible history as the emperor in whose reign the Incarnation took place (Lk 2 1). His original name was Caio Octavius Caeaspi and he was born in 63 BC, the year of Cicero’s consulship. He was the grand-nephew of Julius Caesar, his mother Atia having been the daughter of Julia, Caesar’s younger sister. He was only 19 years of age when Caesar was murdered in the Senate house (44 BC), but with great talent for statesmanship he steered his course through the intrigues and dangers of the closing years of the republic, and after the battle of Actium was left without a rival. Some difficulty was experienced in finding a name that would exactly define the position of the new ruler of the state. He himself declined the names of rex and dictator, and in 27 BC he was by the decree of the Senate styled Augustus. The epithet implied respect and veneration beyond what is bestowed on human things: “Sancta vocant augusta patres: augusta vocantur Tempora a Caesare sacer datam.”—Ovid Fasti I 609; cf Dion Cass., 5316

The Greeks rendered the word by Σεβάστος, Σεβαστός, lit. “reverend” (Acts 25 21-25). The name was connected by the Romans with augire—“one consecrated by religion”—and also with the vb. augere. In this way it came to form one of the German imperial titles “Mehrer des Reicks” (extender of the empire). The length of the reign of A, extending as it did over 44 years from the battle of Actium (31 BC) to the death of AD), doubtless contributed much to the settlement and consolidation of the new regime after the troublous times of the civil wars.

Coin of Augustus.

It is chiefly through the connection of Judaea and Palestine with the Rom regime that Augustus comes in contact with early Christianity, or rather with the political and religious life of the Jewish people at the time of the birth of Christ: “Now it came to pass in those days, there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus, that all the world should be enrolled!” (Lk 2 1). During the reign of Herod, the Great the government of Palestine was conducted practically without interference from Rome except, of course, as regarded the exaction of the tribute; but on the death of that able and capable ruler (4 BC) none of his three sons among whom his kingdom was divided showed the capacity of their father. In the year 6 AD the intervention of Augustus was invited by the Jews themselves to provide a remedy for the incapacity of their ruler, Archelaus, who was deposed by the emperor from the rule of Judaea; at the same time, while Cæsarea was still the center of the Rom administration, a small Rom garrison was stationed permanently in Judea. The city, however, was left to the control of the Jewish Sanhedrin with complete judicial and executive authority except that the death sentence required confirmation by the Rom procurator. There is no reason to believe that Augustus entertained any specially favorable appreciation of Judaism, but from policy he showed himself favorable to the Jews in Pal and did everything to keep them from feeling the pressure of the Rom yoke. To the Jews of the eastern Diaspora he allowed great privileges. It has even been held that his aim was to render them pro-Rom, as a counterpoise in some degree to the pronounced Hellenism of the East; but in the West autonomous bodies of Jews were never allowed (see Mommsen, Provinces of the Rom Empire, ch. 11).

(2) For Augustus in Acts 25 21-25 AV, see Emperor.

AUL, ᾨλ. See AUL.

AUNT, ἀύτη (ἡ αὐτήν, δόθεν, “loving”): A father’s sister (Ex 6 20); an uncle’s wife (Lev 18 14; 20). See Relationships, Family.

AURANITIS, ἀ-ταν-τίς: Used by Jos for Hauran (q.v.).

AUSTERE, ἀ-τέρ- (ἀστερός, αὐστέρος, “harsh,” “rough”): Twice used by Christ in the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19 21,22), and of special signifi-ncence as illustrating the false conception of God cherished by the sinful and disobedient. The fear resident in a guilty conscience sees only sternness and severity in God's perfect righteousness. The word may be made an eminent study in the psychology of an evil heart. Wrongdoing eclipses the soul's vision of God's love and pictures His righteousness as harsh, unfeeling, partial, unjust, forbidding. The awfulness of sin may thus be seen in its power so to perpetue the soul as to make goodness seem evil, justice unjust, and even love unlovely. Cf "hard" (טowski, שָׂלֵד, 'dried up,' "harsh") in the parable of the Talents (Mt 25:24).

AUTHOR, δ'θερ: This word is used to translate two Gr words: (a) αρους, αιτος, lit. "cause," hence "author." He 5:9, He "became the author of eternal salvation." (b) αρχηγος, αρχηγος, lit. "chief leader, prince," "captain"; then author, originator. It is rendered "author" in the following passages: (a) He 12:2, "looking unto Jesus, the author [AV, RV] and finisher [RV "perfecter"] of our faith." But here it seems better to take αρχηγος in its primary sense, "leader" (βασιλα "captain"), rather than in its secondary sense "author." The meaning is, not that He is the originator of faith in us, but that He Himself is the pioneer in the life of faith. He is first in the company of the faithful (cf references to His "faithfulness" 2:23; 5:5), far surpassing in His fidelity even the OT prophets mentioned in ch 11; and therefore we are to look to Him as our perfect pattern of faith. Faith has not only Christ for its object, but Christ for its supreme example. So Bengel, Black, Brauns, Alford, A. B. Davidson, Grimm-Thayer. Others, however, take the word in the sense of "author." (b) He 2:10, "to make the author [AV "captain"] of their salvation perfect through sufferings." Here the idea of Christ as originator or author of our salvation is present (cf the passage He 6:9, where however a different word is used; see above). But here again the original meaning of "leader" is not to be lost sight of. He, being the first possessor of salvation, becomes the author of it for others. The idea that the Son goes before the saved in the same path ought perhaps to be retained (Davidson). Cf He 6:20, where Jesus is said to be our "forerunner." (c) Acts 3:15, AVm and RVm have "author," where text has "prince." Here again it is possible that the two ideas are present. D. Miall Edwards

2. Internal Authority
(2) Internal.—Martineau distinguishes the two types of authority to reject the former and accept the latter. "The mere resort to testimony for information beyond our province does not fill the meaning of 'authority', which we never acknowledge till it strikes home and wakes the echoes in ourselves, and is thereby instantly transferred from external attestation to self-evidence. And this response it is which makes the moral intuitions, started by outward appeal, redirected back by inward veneration, more than egotistic phenomena, and turning them into correspondency between the universal and the individual mind, invests them with true authority!" (Seat of Authority, Preface, ed 1890).

Confusion would disappear if the fact were recognized that for different persons, and even for the same persons at different times, authority means different things. For a child his father's or his teacher's word is a decree of absolute authority. He accepts its truth and recognizes its obligation to allow it to determine his conduct. But when reason awakes in him, he may doubt their knowledge or wisdom, and he will seek other guides or authorities. So it is in religious development. Some canons of the ancient church acknowledged that no one has a monopoly of the term or concept, and no one may justly say to Dr. Martineau or anybody else that he has no right to speak of 'authority' at all.

All religion involves a certain attitude of thought and will toward God and the Universe. The feeling element is also present, but that is ignored in the theories of external authority. All religion then involves a certain idea of or beliefs about God, and conducting corresponding to them, but ideas may be true or false, and conduct right or wrong. Men need to know what is true, that they may do that which is right. They need some test or standard of court or appeal which distinguishes and enforces the truth; forbids the wrong and commands the right. As in all government there is a legislative and an executive function, the one issuing out of the other, so in every kind of religious authority recognized as such, men require a test which should tell them what ideas they ought to believe and what deeds to perform.

In this general sense authority is recognized in every realm beyond the one which is usually called religious life. Science builds up systems in conformity with natural phenomena. Art has its ideals of beauty. Politics seeks to realize some idea of the state. Metaphysics reconstructs the universe in conformity with some principle of truth or reality.

"If we are ... to attach any definite intelligible meaning to the distinction between things as they really are, and things as they merely appear to be, we must clearly have some universal criterion or test by which the distinction may be made.

3. There Must be an Infallible Criterion of Truth

This criterion must be in the first place infallible; that is, must be such that we cannot doubt its validity without falling into a contradiction in our thought. ... Freedom from contradiction is a characteristic that belongs to everything that is real ... and we may therefore use it as a test of criterion of reality." (Taylor, Elements of Metaphysics, 18-19).

A more skeptical writer writes: "That the truth itself is one and whole and complete, and that all thinking and all experience moves within its recognition, and subject to its manifest authority, this I have never doubted!" (Joachim, The Nature of Truth, 178). It is only a thoroughgoing skeptic that could dispense with authority, a "Pyrrho," who holds suspense of judgment to be the only right attitude of mind, and he, to be logical, must also suspend all action and cease to be. There can be no question, therefore, except in total nescience, as to the fact of authority in general; and the problem to decide is, "What is the authority in religion?" It is a problem involved in the difficulties of all ultimate problems, and all argument about it is apt to move in a circle. For the ultimate must bear witness of its own ultimate, the absolute and incommunicable Nature of authority of its own sovereignty. If there were a court of appeal or a standard of reference to which anything called ultimate, absolute and supreme, could apply for its credentials, it would therefore become relative and subordinate to that other criterion. There is a sense in which Mr. Balfour's saying is true, "that authority is dumb in the presence of argument." No process of mediate reasoning can establish it, for no premise can be found from which it issues as a conclusion. It judges all things, but is judged of none. It is its own witness and judge. All that reason can say about it is the dictum of Parmenides: 'it is.'

In this sense, there can be no question again among religious people, that the authority is God. The one idea involves the other. He is, therefore, the ultimate criterion and power and subordinate to that other criterion. There is a sense in which Mr. Balfour's saying is true, "that authority is dumb in the presence of argument." No process of mediate reasoning can establish it, for no premise can be found from which it issues as a conclusion. It judges all things, but is judged of none. It is its own witness and judge. All that reason can say about it is the dictum of Parmenides: 'it is.'

5. It is God alone is self-existent and supreme, who is what He is of His own right. If God exists, He is the ultimate criterion of truth and reality. All truth inheres in Him and issues from Him. The problem of authority thus becomes one with the proof and definition of God. These questions lie beyond the purpose of the present article (see art. God). Their solution is assumed in this discussion of authority, although different theories of authority do not involve different ideas of God. External theories generally involve what is called a deistic conception of God. Spiritualistic theories of authority correspond to theistic views of God. If He is all-inclusive and all-transcendent, their idea of theism makes no sense in the autotelic system in conformity with natural phenomena. Art has its ideals of beauty. Politics seeks to realize some idea of the state. Metaphysics reconstructs the universe in conformity with some principle of truth or reality.

6. Different Ideas of God Involve Different Views of Authority

He speaks directly to men, and has no need of interpreters. His worship is a naturalistic theory of truth. The mind of God is the law of Nature. But pantheism in practice tends to become polytheism, and then to issue in a crude anarchy which is the denial of God. In its subordination to Christendom the problem of authority lies between those who agree in believing in one God, who is personal, transcendent and to some extent immanent. The differences on these points are really consequences of differences of views as to His mode of self-communication. It is, therefore, a problem of epistemology rather than of ontology. The question is, in what way does God make known His will to men generally? The purpose of this article is the exposition of the Biblical teaching of authority, with some attempt to place it in its true position in the life of the church.

II. The Biblical References.—Only for (1) rabbah (Prov 29 2): "to be great" or "many." "When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice." So AV and RVm, but BDB translates, "Then they are increased" (so BDB). Toy in loc. remarks, "The Heb has: 'When the righteous increase,' the suggestion being that they then have control of affairs; the change of a letter gives the reading 'rule' which is required by the 'govern' of the second line." (2) lishoph (Est 9 29): "Ex-ther the queen . . . wrote with all authority to confirm this second letter of Purim" (RVv "strong" [so DBD]).

(1) Most generally for exousia, exousiás and katoexousiás: (a) of God's authority (Acts 1:7): as the potter's over clay (Rom 9:21, "a right"); Jude ver 25, "power"; Rev 16 NT 9, "power"); (b) of Christ's teaching and works (Mt 7:29; 21:23.24.27 = Mk 1 22:27; Mk 11:28-29.33 = Lk 4:30; 20:28; Jn 5:27, authority to execute judgment. The same Gr word, tr""power" in AV but generally "authority" in RV or RVv, appears also in Mt 9:6.8, to forgive sins: 28:18; Mk 10:2; Lk 4:32; Jn 5:24; Jn 10:18; 17:2; Rev 12:10); (c) of the disciples, as Christ's representatives and witnesses (Lk 9:1, the twelve; 2 Cor 10:8, Paul); also of their rights and privileges; (the same Gr word in Mt 10:1; Mk 3:15; Lk 18:19 = RV "authority"); Jn 1:12; Acts 8:19; 2 Cor 13:10; 2 Thes 3:9; He 13:10; Rev 2:26; 22:14 = RV "right"); (d) of subordiate heavenly authorities or powers (1 Cor 15:24; 1 Pet 3:22); and the same Gr word in Eph 1:21; Heb 1:2; Col 1:16; 2:10.15; Rev 1:18; 14:1; 19:1; 20:1). Of (e) of civil authority, and of king, magistrate or steward (Lk 7:8 = Mt 8:9 [centurion]; Mk 13:34; Lk 19:17; 20:20; 22:25 = Mt 20:25 = Mk 10:42; and Acts 9:14; 26:10.12 [of Saul]; and the same Gr word in Lk 12:11; 13:20; Lk 16:4 = Mt 16:13). Of (f) of man's inward power of self-control (the same Gr word in 1 Cor 7:37; 8:9; "liberty"); 6:12; 7:4; 9:4.5.6.12.18, RV "right"; 11:10).

2. In the (2) For epiteug: commandment, authority to exhort and reprove the church (Tit 2:15)

(3) For hypereuchè: "for kings and all that are in high place" (RV 1 Tim 2:2).

(4) For authenteu: "I permit not a woman . . . to have dominion over a man" (RV 1 Tim 2:12).

Of the words tr4 authority," exousia alone expresses the idea of religious authority, whether of God or of man, and is applied to: 3. Common uses of this word are here instructive Elements in as bringing out the common element Their in secular and religious authority. Meaning The control of the state over its subjects, whether as supreme in the person of emperor or king, or as delegated to and exercised by proconsul, magistrate or soldiers, and the control of a householder over his family and servants and property, exercised directly or indirectly through stewards, have some characteristics which also pertain to religious authority; and the differences, essential though they are, must be derived from the context and the circumstances of the case. In one passage indeed the civil type of authority is mentioned to be repudiated as something that should not obtain within the religious community (Mt 20:25-27 = Mk 10:42-44 = Lk 22:25.26). But though its principle and power are so entirely different in different realms, the fact of authority as determining religious thought, conduct and relations between people is expressed by many terms and phrases besides those trd authority.

III. Biblical Teaching.—A summary of the Biblical account of authority is given in He 1:1: "God, having of old time sworn to a father, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in a Son [RVv]." Behind all persons and institutions stands God, who reveals His mind and exercises His sovereignty in many ways. He is the Father of the persons and institutions, piecemeal and progressively, until His final revelation of His mind and will culminates in Jesus Christ.

(1) The earliest form of authority is patriarchal. The father of the family is at once its prophet, priest and king. The consciousness of individuality was as yet weak. The Teaching unit of life was the family, and the father sums up the family in himself before God and stands to it as God. The earliest picture of religious life found in the Bible. For whatever view may be taken of the historicity of Gen, there can be little doubt that the stories of the patriarchs represent an early stage of religious life, before the national or even the tribal consciousness had developed.

(2) When the tribal consciousness emerges, it is clad in a network of customs and traditions which had grown with it, and which governed the greater part of the life of the tribe. The father had now become the elder and judge who exercised authority over the larger family, the tribe. But also, men of commanding personality and influence appear, who change and fashion the tribal customs. They may be men of practical wisdom like Jethro, great men in time of emergency like the judges. Moses stands apart, a prophet and reformer who knew that he bore a message from God to reform his people's religion, and gave Israel a knowledge of God and a covenant with God which at first set them forever apart from all other tribes. Other tribes might have a Jethro, a Joshua and a Jephthah, but Israel alone had its Moses. His authority has remained a large factor in the life of Israel to the present day and should hereafter be assumed as existing side by side with other authorities mentioned.

(3) In our earliest glimpses of Heb life in Canaan we find bands of seers or prophets associated with religion in Israel, as well as a disorganized priesthood which conducted the public worship of Jehe. These features were probably common to Israel and neighboring Sem tribes. Here again the individual person emerges who rises above custom and tradition, and exercises an individual authority from God over the life of the people. Samuel, too, was a prophet, priest and king, but he regarded his function as so entirely ministerial, that God might be said to govern His people directly and personally, though He made known His will through the prophet.

(4) In the period of the kingship, religious authority became more organized, institutional and external. The occasional cooperation of the tribes developed into nationality, and the sporadic leadership of emergency chieftains gave way to the perpetual rule of the king. Priests and prophets became organized and recognized guilds which acted together under the protection and influence of the king, along the lines of traditional morality and religion. The Heb church in its middle ages was an established church and thoroughly "Eristian." We know very little of the details of its organization, but it is clear that the religious orders as a rule offered little resistance to the corrupting influences of the court and of the surrounding heathenism.

(5) Opposes it to monarchies, as advanced to higher levels of religious life invariably originated outside the recognized religious authorities. God raised for Himself prophets such as Elijah, Amos, Isaiah and Jeremiah, who spoke out of the consciousness of the people or from a personal command or order from God. In turn they influenced the established religious authorities, as may be seen in the reformatory of Hezekiah and Josiah. All that is distinctive in the religion of Israel, all revelation of God in the OT, proceeded from the inner economy of which the prophecies were a readaptation of religious authorities. The relative position of the priesthood was greatly enhanced. Its chiefs became princes of Jera, and exercised all the powers of theocracy that remained under foreign rule. And new developments emerged. The formation of the canon of the OT set up a body of writings which has furnished religious and extensive standard of doctrine and worship. But the necessity was felt to interpret the Scriptures and to apply them to existing conditions. The place of the old prophetic guilds was taken by the new order of rabbis and scribes. Gradually they secured a share with the priests in the administration of the law. "In the last two pre-Christian centuries. and throughout the Talmudic times, the scribes (sofhrim), also called the wise (bikkathom), who claimed to have received the true interpretation of the Law, as 'the tradition of the Elders and Fathers' in direct line from Moses, the prophets, and the men of the great synagogue, included people from all classes. They formed the court of justice in every town, whose decisions, in which the Sanhedrin in Jerus. (Köhler in Jew Enc, II, 337).

In the time of Christ, these courts were the recognized authorities in all matters of religion.

1. Of Jesus Christ. — When He began to teach in Par, all knew Him, and many of God's authority were mediated through the priests and scribes, who however claimed the OT as their source. Christ was neither the destroyer nor the creator of institutions. All His teachings declared the abstract right or capacity of the Jewish orders to be religious teachers. He enjoined obedience to their teaching (Mt 23 23). Still less did He question the authority of the OT. He came not to destroy, but to fulfil the law and the prophets (Mt 5 17). But He did two things which involved the assertion of a new and superior authority in Himself. He repudiated the scribes' interpretation of the law (Mt 23 13-16), and He declared that certain provisions of the OT laws were temporary and tentative, and to be replaced or supplemented by His own more adequate teaching (Mt 5 32-34; 39:44; 19 8.9). In doing this, He was really fulfilling a line of thought which permeated the entire OT. All its writers disclaimed finality and look forward to a fuller revelation of the mind of God in a day of Jeh or a new covenant or a Messiah. Jesus Christ regarded these expectations as being realized in Himself, and claimed to complete and fulfil the development which had run through the OT. As such, He claims finality in His teaching of the will of God, and absolute authority in the realm of religion and morals. (a) His teaching is with authority. His hearers contrast it with that of the scribes, who, with all the prestige of tradition and establishment, in comparison with Him, entirely lacked authority (Mt 7:29; Mk 1:22; Lk 4:32; Jn 7:46). (b) His authority as a teacher is closely associated with His teaching. Thus, He is often described as the consummator of the OT authority over all spirits whose influence was felt in the mental disorders that afflicted people (Mk 1:27; Lk 4:36). (c) In His claim to forgive sins, sanctioned by works of healing, He seemed to exceed the power of Moses (Mt 9:6; Mk 2:5; Lk 5:19; Jn 10:14). It implied an infallible moral judgment, a power to dispense with the recognized laws of retribution and to remove guilt, which could only inhere in God. All these powers are asserted in another form in the statement that He is the final judge (Jn 5:27). (d) He therefore possesses authority over all flesh. The Father gave Him authority over all flesh. "that whatsoever thou hast given them, to them he should give eternal life" (Jn 17:2 ARVm). This authority begins in His power over His own life to give it in sacrifice (Mt 16:21). By faith in Him and obedience to Him, men obtain salvation (Mt 10:32; 11:28-30). Their relation to Him determines their relation to God and to the kingdom of heaven (Mt 10:40; Lk 12:8). (e) When challenged by the chief priest and elders, the establishment of the kingdom was determined by what authority He taught, He gives no categorical reply, but tells them the parable of the Vineyard. All the prophets and teachers that had come from God before Him were servants, but He is the Son (Mt 21:23-27:37; Mk 11:28-33; Lk 20 2:8-13). The Fourth Gospel definitely finds His authority upon His sonship (5 19-27). Paul deduces it from His self-sacrifice (Phil 2:5-11). (f) In His ascended state, all authority in heaven and on earth is given unto Him (Mt 28:18). It is not only authority in the church, and in the moral kingdom, but in the universe. God has set Him "far above all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also that which is to come" (Col 1:16). (g) His authority in the church as revealer of truth and Lord of spirits is not limited or completed within His earthly life. By His resurrection and exaltation He lives on. He is "the Prince of life, and ye were gathered .... in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Mt 18 20). "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Mt 28:20). Greater works than He did in the flesh will be done in the church, because of His exaltation (Jn 14:12) and by His sending the Paraclete, "Comforter" (ARV) (Jn 14:16). The Paraclete, which is the Holy Spirit, will teach the disciples all things, and bring to their remembrance all that He said unto them (14:26). He has many things to tell them which in the days of His flesh they cannot receive, but the Spirit of truth shall guide them into all truth (16 12-13). And the Paraclete is neither separated nor distinct from Him in His exalted and permanent life (14:16). The OT law is not made complete and permanent. His teaching, works and character, as facts outside of men, even while He lived, and still more when He was dead, could only partially and imperfectly rule their spirits. (h) Have I been so long time with you, and ye not know me, Philip? (Jn 14:9). In the day of the Spirit's revelation "ye shall know that I am in my Father" (Jn 14:9). Nor, again, did or could He define the truth as it applied to every contingency throughout all time, while He lived under the limitations of time and place. Such a revelation, if it could have been given, would have been quite useless, for men can only apprehend the truth progressively and in relation to the position they occupy in time and place. But by His permanent spiritual presence in the church, He enters into, inhabits and governs its whole life and determines for it what is true and right at every stage of its development. (See Forrest, Authority of Christ, 202-3.) To ask whence Christ derives or how He possesses the authority above described, is to raise the whole question of His metaphysical existence. Empirically, we see it issuing from two facts, which are essentially one—His filial consciousness and His moral character. These are the empirical facts which the church has sought to express in the metaphysical doctrine of the Incarnation. (See Forrest, op. cit.)
(2) Of the disciples.—The first disciples acknowledged Christ in all things as their Lord and Master; not the teaching they had heard, nor the example they had witnessed, but Christ in His permanent, living presence. They pray to Him to fill Judas' place among the Twelve (Acts 1:24-25). He gave the Spirit to the Pentecost (Acts 2:33). In His name they perform their miracles (3:6; 9:34). With Him Saul meets on the way to Damascus (9:5; Gal 1:12). From Him they receive the teaching and commands which they deliver to the churches (1 Cor 11:23).

But they too exercised an authority which is derivative, secondary, and dependent upon Him. (a) While Jesus Christ yet lived He gave the Twelve, and again the Seventy, authority to cast out unclean spirits and to heal all manner of diseases, while they went about preaching (Mt 10:1; Mk 3:15; 6:7; Lk 9:1; 10:19). After His resurrection He gave them commission to bear witness for Him, to baptize and to teach all nations (Mt 28:18-20; Lk 24:47-48). Paul also traced his authority to preaching the Gospel directly to Jesus Christ (Gal 1:12). From Him they received their endowment with the Holy Spirit for the work (Acts 1:5; 2:38). (b) Paul claimed for himself, and by inference, for the other apostles, authority to exercise discipline in the churches, "...would the Lord have to build you up' (2 Cor 10:8; 13:10). All the church’s ministers exercise oversight and administration over the churches (1 Thess 5:12; 2 Tim 4:2; 2:2). (c) The authority of sonship, and of participation in the life of life belongs to all believers (Jn 1:12; Rev 22:14). (d) And in virtue of their faith they have authority over the nations (Rev 2:26; 20:4). Christ makes them to be kings (Rev 1:6), a royal priesthood (1 Pet 2:9).

In all this we are to see the authority of faith, of character, of men who are messengers of Christ because they are in living union with Him. It pertains to no office or institution, and exists only where Christ reigns in men, and therefore, through them.

(3) Of the church.—It is moral and personal and more concerned with life than with doctrine. Paul was the greatest teacher of the early church, but he claims no infallibility, promulgates no dogmas, imparts no orthodox or infallible faith in Christ. He reasons, argues and persuades men to accept the gospel he had received of the Lord, but he knows no other authority than the truth as it is a living fact in Jesus Christ.

The apostles were certainly read of a “sound doctrine” which should be taught and believed, but it has not crystallized into a creed, and the only condition of salvation laid down is living faith in Jesus Christ. See Doctrine.

The authority of the apostolic church, then, is in the first place that of individual men in whom Jesus Christ lives, a direct personal and individual authority. It is true that the individual can only live the Christian life, and thereby know the Christian truth, in a society, but that does not impair the individual and personal character of his witness. Yet as the church lives a collective life, there is a sense in which it may be said to bear a collective witness. Men are naturally more readily impressed by an idea held by the many. That is right so far as the probability of the truth of a doctrine increases with the number of minds which approve it. That is the element of truth in the Catholic dictum quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus credendum est (“what is believed everywhere by all”). But the assent of the many does not constitute the truth of an idea or fact, nor enhance its authority. And there are levels of truth to which only few minds can attain, so that the assent of the many may be a presumption against the truth of an idea. And in the last resort, men do not accept ideas with mind and heart, because many believe them, but because of their inherent truth, their power to govern their minds. And the essential truth of a doctrine is no greater, whether one or a million accept it.

The apostolic church recognized this principle, for it never claimed for itself greater authority than that of a tutor to bring men to Christ, the one Lord. Peter, Paul, John, each knew Christ in a degree, and each spoke of Him as well as he could, but none of them claims to say all, or demands that his own teaching should absolutely rule men’s minds; and the collective authority of the church can never rise higher than that of its best spirits.

(4) Of the Bible.—And the authority of the Bible as a whole is of the same nature as that of the church. It is a record of the experiences of men who knew God in various ways and degrees, but among them all there is only one Master. 'No one knows the Son but the Father, and He to whom ever sover the Son will reveal to Him.' In varying degrees obedience should be rendered to many men in the church and outside of it, as they satisfy the demands of reason and conscience, but in the last resort every man must obey his own mind and obey its own King. For Christians Christ alone is King, as He revealed Himself in His human personality, in the experience and history of the church, and ultimately in the personal experience of every believer. (A different view see J. H. Leckie, Authority in Religion.)

IV. Outline History of Ecclesiastical Doctrine of Authority.—Different ideas, drawn from many sources, soon replaced NT principles of the authority in the church. The Gr apologists as Reason and as dogma and Fathers were generally dominated by the Platonic doctrine of the Logos, and thought of God as dwelling in man and communicating His mind to him by giving him a share of His own mind and reason. While they accepted the Scriptures and the traditions of the church as Divine teaching, they did not regard them as external and sovereign authorities, but rather as copies of the Divine Word which dwelt in those who had been enriched by them, to preserve the traditions of the church in their purity and to hand them on in complete and perfect manner only in Jesus Christ.

Neo-Platonism followed, and it underlies much of the church teaching from Origen to Augustine. God as pure being could not make known His essence to any but the Logos, and His Logos in His manifestation tended to become a spoken word which God had sent forth from Himself, rather than the living indwelling of God with men. When the Logos ceased to be living, it tended to become external and stereotyped, and upon this basis grew up Gr orthodoxy. Men who knew but little of the living personal Word felt the need of defining and establishing the central truths of Christianity in fixed and permanent forms which should become the standard of all thinking. The inward witness of the Logos disappears, and the external authority of tradition and dogma as defined by the councils took its place. The bishops preserved the tradition and constituted the councils and thus became the organs of authority. The Scriptures were still venerated in words, but in fact subordinated to the episcopacy.

Aristotle's philosophy dominated the Middle Ages, or rather the intellectual stage in the history of Christian thought, and in that stage the strict and formal logic only. The forms of thought were mistaken for its essence. Aristotle's philosophy dominated the Middle Ages, or rather the intellectual stage in the history of the Church, and in that stage the strict and formal logic only. The forms of thought were mistaken for its essence. The theologians of the Middle Ages were always preserved the tradition and constituted the councils and thus became the organs of authority. The Scriptures were still venerated in words, but in fact subordinated to the episcopacy.
which to deduce, by syllogistic inference, the whole structure of the church and its organs and sacraments, as the infallible representatives of God on earth.

Nominalism emptied the forms of thought of all reality and reared the ecclesiastical system upon negation. All the more necessary, then, was it to affirm the absolute and unquestioned authority of the church, since it rested upon no reason or reality to which appeal could be made to justify its position and teaching. Thus the growth of absolutism in the church went pari passu with the disappearance of idealism, of any contact of the mind with reality, truth and God. Another way of saying this truth is that the doctrine of the Holy Spirit and of the living Christ suffered a total eclipse during the Middle Ages, while the form of the church as the organ of revelation became absolute.

The Reformation was not consciously based upon any philosophic principles. It was the product of practical necessities. Reason's spiritual needs drove them back to God, and they found Him in two sources, in the Bible, which was the record of His self-revelation through prophet, psalmist, apostle and precentors, through Jesus Christ, and in the accordant testimony of the Holy Spirit in their own hearts. But the underlying principles of this teaching were not articulated in a philosophy of knowledge and revelation for two centuries.

Therefore the second and third generations of Reformers, no longer possessed by the visions and convictions of Luther and Calvin, were thrown back upon the old scholastic philosophy, recognized no kinship of mind between God and man, and knew no direct communication between them. Hence it was necessary to find a new external author, and this they discovered in the Bible which they made into a law of truth, as defined anew by ecclesiastical councils.

But the mystical side of the Reformers' teaching was not altogether lost, and a few obscure bodies of Christians continued to hold the doctrine of the Spirit, and the scholastic Protestants took only half—the objective half of the Reformers' teaching—the mystics only took the subjective half, and every man's imagination tended to become a law unto himself.

Kant did for philosophy what Luther had done for religion. He rejected its dogmas and external authorities in order to come back to its realities. He was the first philosopher of the Protestant principle. He sought to discover a direct relation between man's mind and reality. He did not fully succeed. The old dogma of the nonmenon as something that lay completely beyond man's ken clung to him, and within his system. But through man's moral nature, he found a way to the heart of reality and to God. His idealistic principles were developed by his successors into the modern idealism, upon which it has been possible to erect a theory of knowledge that brings man's mind into direct contact with God, and therefore, a theory of authority which represents God as directly the sovereign of the soul.

But the other side of Kant's philosophy, too, was developed into a theory of religious skepticism and external authority. Man's reason, 9. Distress of Reason he had taught, could not come into contact with reality, with the thing-in-itself, and therefore it could know nothing of God. This distress of reason was made the basis of two different systems of external authority by Dean Mansel and Cardinal Newman. The skeptical element really descended from Locke and Hume, but men who would have disdained to learn their theology from Hume accepted Hume's principles from Kant, and built upon them, as a house upon sand, one, the authority of Anglicanism, and the other, the authority of Romanism.

Kant's skepticism also allied itself with elements of Luther's teaching and traveled a middle course in the school of Ritschl. While holding that man may have knowledge and experience of Divine things in Jesus Christ, who is of the practical value of God for religious experience, the Ritschilians scruple to affirm that it is a direct and actual knowledge of God as He is essentially. This they will neither deny nor affirm, but the refusal to affirm has for many minds the effect of denial, and it leads to a subjectivism which is not far removed from skepticism and the denial of all authority.

V. Classification of Theories.—The various theories of authority may be now classified as follows:

1. External

(a) Inception Catholicism in the 2d and 3d centuries.—All ideas of a living and present revelation were absorbed and developed as Catholicism. Three more or less coordinate authorities were set up which determined for individual Christians what was Christian truth and conduct. The canon of the New Testament was gradually formed in the Church, and, in addition to the OT taken over from the Jewish church, were inspired by the Holy Spirit and of Divine authority. The outline of a common creed or rule of faith grew up as the standard interpretation of Scripture. As the episcopacy, which was supposed to preserve in unbroken tradition the unwritten teaching of the apostles. As the only living factor in this system of authority the last easily secured the predominant place.

(ana) Harnack, History of Dogma, II, ch. ii, ET.}

(b) General councils.—The authority of the episcopacy was organized into a permanent and general form in the councils, to whose decision obedience was demanded on pain of excommunication. The councils did not, however, cease to separate the theological from the external questions, or to define dogma, which were only defining the teaching that had always obtained in the church, and therefore invested themselves and their decisions with the authority of Christ.

(c) Romanism.—During the Middle Ages, in the church of Rome, the doctrine of infallibility was added to the dogma of infallibility in the church; in other words, the Pope was declared, by faith and Roman councils, to be the ultimate authority on matters of faith and morals. The Papacy became the central and infallible authority of the Church.

ective increase since the days of the apostles," and "it is no change of doctrine when that which has always been implicitly becomes the subject of an explicit declaration" (Holy Baptism and Dogmatic Theology, I, 159, 164). Newman and recent modernists, however, concede a development in the doctrines of the church, but on the basis of the traditional meaning derived from the apostles. But once a development is conceded, questions arise as to its principles and conditions, and the whole authority that rests upon them falls to the ground by the mere fact of an appeal from it to the principles that govern its development. This is not quickened by positing a miraculous preservation of the tradition from error involves a further appeal from the supposed authority to a hypothetical miracle for which there is no tittle of evidence. All the evidence is against it. The history of the church shows that it has been as liable to error, and as readily influenced by natural conditions, as any other human institution.

(5) Inerrancy of Scripture.—When Protestants sought an external authority, they posited the inerrancy and infallibility of the Bible, and the whole Christian faith was founded upon that dogma. "Holy Scripture is the judge, or rather the voice of the supreme and infallible judge, the Holy Spirit, and the norm to which an inferior judge should refer any controversies of fact or of right into which alone he should give sentence" (Quenstedt, quoted in Hutterus Redivivus, 119, 10th ed). Protestants found it necessary to interpret Scripture, and to define doctrines in synods and councils, but their desire held authority only by their supposed to be expositions of Scripture, and in that sense, the expression of God's mind. They differed from the "Catholic" councils in that they claimed no authority of their own and repudiated any authority that might be derived from tradition or the ministerial office.

(6) Anglican appeal to antiquity.—In the Anglican church too, the Scriptures as infallible were the ultimate authority, but some kind of a coordinate authority was claimed for the priesthood as standing in the succession of the apostles, and for the church Fathers and councils of the first six cents. And the tendency has been to lay increasing emphasis on the latter factors, as criticism has undermined the literal and external authority of Scripture.

(7) Limitations of external authority.—All the above-mentioned theories contain an element of truth, and the authorities they posit have in their turns been held implicitly by the church; and none of them can be regarded as adequate and final expressions of the mind of God in man. (a) It is superfluous to demonstrate that they are not infallible; in spite of that they might still be all the authority that man can have or need. (b) They all rest on the assumption that God's self-revelation came to an end with the apostolic age. The Biblical theory admittedly does, and the tradition theories strictly interpreted are in exactly the same case. An authority resting upon a traditional teaching handed down faithfully from the apostles would differ in no essential respect from one resting upon the written words of the apostles. They would be equally limited, literal, external and mechanical. But problems of mind and conduct have arisen, for the apostles never contemplated, and which their teaching (whether preserved in written or oral tradition matters nothing) could not solve. (c) As a matter of fact no traditional teaching of the apostles supplementing their writings is discovered.. What has been put forward as such is in manifest contradiction to their writings. (d) The idea that there is a consensus of opinion among church Fathers is equally illusory. If there were, it would need to be proved that such opinion could have any binding authority. It is evident, for example, that there is no one body of truth all standing at the same level, and whatever view of its inspiration may be held, some further authority will be needed to discriminate between the lower and the higher in its teaching. (e) Above all, an authority which is merely external and objective is no authority at all to the mature religious life. Blind submission to any external authority, creed, church or book, is the condition of a slave, and in such case "our spiritual intelligence was raised to a higher plane, to compare with the infinite wisdom, but arrested and quenched. Only then, on the other hand, are we spiritually enfranchised when we receive a revelation as from God, not because we are awed or terrified or allured by our selfish interests into reception of it, but because our own minds and hearts respond to it, because we see and know it to be true" (J. Caird, University Sermons [1898], 204–5). Theories of external authority are in the nature of the case not easily classified or defined as those of external; nor have they as yet been held implicitly by the church.

2. Internal filled so large a place in the public Authority life of the church. But it would be a serious error to suppose that all the men who gave rise and accorded internal authority lived in mere subjection to them. The history of mysticism in the church is the history of independent thought; resting in a direct knowledge of God that transcended all external authority. Montanism and Gnosticism appealed to an inner criterion of truth. All heresies involved some independent judgment, and appealed to authorities that were neither objective nor established. The Protestant Reformation was an open revolt against external authority, and although it resulted for a time in the substitution of another external authority, neither its original motive, nor its permanent force had any kinship with it. Luther's free criticism of the Bible, and Calvin's appeal to the testimony of the Holy Spirit as the final principle of its interpretation, are well known. No body of Protestants at present founds its faith on the mere letter of Scripture or creed. Inward authority has been conceived in many ways and expressed by many terms (Quakers); individual experience (Peck); practical reason (Kant); religious feeling (Schleiermacher); the historical Christ (Ritschl); conscience (Martineau); the living Christ (R. W. Dale); the consciousness of Christ (A. M. Fairbairn); the Christ of history and of experience (D. W. Forest) and many more. The variety suggests at first the denial rather than the affirmation of authority, but it is only in such a variety that the principles of an adequate authority can be recognized.

The ultimate authority in religion is God as He reigns in men's hearts. But both the experience itself and the expression and interpretation of it vary with each individual. A religious authority to be real and effective must win the response of the human spirit, and in that personal relation of Spirit with spirit lie the conditions of variation. Yet human reason and conscience everywhere tend to acknowledge one standard, to recognize one ideal and to obey one Lord. Nothing of this sort a uniformity in the inward fitness of one soul to endorse the revelation to the common demands of humanity. No agreement yet exists as to the possibility or reality of such a revelation. But wherever men lend themselves to the spiritual contact of Jesus Christ with their souls, without the intervention of human creeds or institutions, their conscience and reason approve His moral supremacy and their spirits recognize His intimate knowledge of the Father.

T. REES

AUTHORIZED, δ’-thor-Is’d, VERSION. See English Versions.

AVAV, ἀ’ва. See AVVA.

AVAIL, a-val’ (חָשַׁע, shāshā, "to be equal," hence "to be enough," "to avail"): Used in the sense of "satisfy" (Est 5 13). Queen Esther’s exceptional favor availed not to satisfy Haman, because of his insane jealousy of his royal Mordecai. "They sat with him, to be strong," tr¢ also "prevail" (Rev 12 8), with a negative signifies incompetence, e.g. the impossibility of redemptive merit or power in an outward ceremony or act (Gal 5 6; 6 15 AV): "neither circumcision avail anything," contrasted with the efficacy of faith "in Christ Jesus." Used also to express the efficacy of prayer (Jas 5 16).

AVARAN, a’var-an: A surname of Eleazar, the third son of Mattathias (1 Macc 2 5). It is doubtfully conjectured that Eleazar received this surname from the episode related in 1 Macc 6 43-46; the word may mean "the piercer," referring to his stabbing of the elephant. Some connect it with כְּרֵי, ker, "to be white," and connect it with Eleazar’s white complexion. The Syr reads "Chav-ran" and the Vulg "Abaron."; the LXX in 6 43 gives Savorin which is an error for Eldazaros avaran; LXX V corrects to avaran.

AVEN, ἀ’ven (אֶֽוֹנֶ, awen, "emptiness," "vanity"): Used in Ezkr 30 17 for On or Heliopolis, in Egypt. See On. As a term of contempt Hosea calls Beth-el "Beth-aven" (4 15; 10 5). So Amos speaks of some valley near Damascus as "the valley of Aven" (i.e. of the idol, 1 5), in which Baalbek (Heliopolis) was situated. The word is rendered "idol" in Isa 66 3.

AVENGE, a-ven’j. AVENGER, a-ven’j’er: Avenge.—The general idea connected with this word is that of inflicting punishment upon the wrongdoer. Since emphasis may be placed upon the deed itself, the wrongdoer, or the injured party, the vb. is found an intransitive (only Lev 19 18; see below), transitive (2 S 4 8 et al.; and also active (Dt 32 43), passive (Ger 5 9) and reflexive (Est 8 13). In 3 25-26 avenge is tr¢ from גָּנֵא, gāneah, "to save" (RVm "thine own hand saving thee"), in Hos 1 4 from הָגָנֹא, pāneah, "to visit," and in 2 S 18 19 fr. from גָּנְא, shāneah, "to judge," but the usual Heb word is דָּגַנְא, nāgan, or derivatives, "to avenge." The tr in RV differs in some places from AV: Nu 31 3 (RV "execute Jeh’s vengeance"); of 2 S 22 48; Ps 48 17; Lev 26 20; Lev 19 18 (RV "take vengeance"); Jgs 6 25-26 ("for that the leaders took the lead, and Israel" from עָגַנֵא, pāneah, "to be free, to lead"); and in the NT avenge is tr¢ from the Gr ἔδοκε, ἐδικᾶσθαι, "to do justice," "to protect" (Lk 18 3 ff et al.) and AV Rev 18 20, ἀμβω, ἀμβά, "to judge" (RV "God hath judged your judgment").

Avenger.—The person who inflicts punishment upon the evil-doer for a wrong experienced by himself (from גָּנֵא, nāgan, "to avenge"); Ps 8 2 et al.) or by someone else from גָּנְא, shāneah, "to redeem"; Nu 35 12 ff et al.). In the NT avenger occurs only once: "the Lord is an avenger in all things" (1 Thess 4 6). It was the duty of the nearest relative to execute vengeance upon the murder of his kin: he became the gael. With reference to the protective legislation and custom, see GÖELL. Cf BLOOD; REVENGE, REVENGER.

AVERSE, a-v’rs (אֱוָר, shābāh, "to turn back," "retreat"): Quiet, peaceful wanderers (Mic 2 8).

AVIM, a’vim. See AVIM.

AVIMS, a’vims (Dt 2 23). See AVIM.

AVITES, a’vits. See AVIM.

AVITH, a’vith (אֱוָת, "avath"): The royal city of Hadad king of Edom (Gen 36 35; 1 Ch 1 46). The LXX reads Ἀβνα, Geolaim. There is no clue to its identification.

AVOID, a-void’l: Archaic use in 1 S 18 11 for "escaped." In RV of NT only in 2 Cor 8 20 (σταθμάων, staidomenai with negative), lit. "arranging that not," etc. i.e. by anticipation providing that something should not occur. In AV for "turn away from," ἐκλείπει, ekklípean: Rom 16 17; 1 Tim 6 20; "refuse," παραστατέ, parastattoi, 2 Tim 2 23; πενθολογο, peristatho, Tit 3 8.

AVOUCH, a-v’ouch’: In RV only in Dt 26 17, 18, in the sense of "to confess," "avow," "publicly and solemnly declare." The Heb form is likewise unique (Hiph. of 'amor).

AVVA, a’va (אַב, ’awv; AV AVA, ἀ’ва): A province, the people of which Shalmanesar king of Assyria placed in the cities of Samaria in the room of the children of Israel taken into exile by him (2 K 17 24). It is probably the same as Ivva (2 K 18 34; 19 12; Isa 37 13), a province conquered by Assyria.

AVVIM, a’vim. AVITES, a’vits (אַב, ’awv; AV AVIM; אִוָית, Ezioni, Heuwtai, also unspelled; also used to represent the name of the Hittites): The early inhabitants of the southern extremity of Canaan afterward occupied by the Philis (Dt 2 23; of Josh 13 34, AV "Avim," Ś’vim). The Avvim of Josh 18 23 was a town of Benjamin, not a people. Geosenius supposes the name to mean "dwellers in the desert," but it was more probably the name of some pre-Sem tribe. The Avvim are described as living in Ḥagirim or "encampments" and extending as far as the outskirts of Gaza.

AWAIT, a-wa’t: Only in Acts 9 24 AV, in its now obsolete sense as a noun, "ambush;" "their laying wait was known of Saul." RV "their plot."

AKE, a-ke” (אֱוָק, yāq, "to waken"); PED. ἀ’κε, אָק, "to rouse up" from sleep; ἀκῆ, ēkērō, ekekērō, "to arouse from sleep"): The ordinary terms for awakening from natural slumber: as of Jacob at Bethel (Gen 28 16); of Solomon at Gibeon (1 K 3 15); of Jesus in the storm-tossed boat (Lk 8 24). Used esp. with striking effect of awakening from mental, moral and spiritual sleep: as when Deborah calls upon herself to awake to the fervor and eloquence of poetry (Jgs 5 12); of Zion's awaking to moral vigor and beauty (Isa 62 1); of waking from spiritual death (Eph 5 14); from the grave in resurrection (Dn 12 2); Poetically used of the rising north wind (Cant 4 16); of music (Ps 100 2); of the sword in battle (Zec 13 7); of a lover's affection (Cant 2 7); of God Himself responding to prayer (Ps 69 4). Also used of moral awaking, as from drunkenness: εκερτθα, εκερτθα, "to become sober" (cf Joel 1 5).

Dwight M. Pratt

Away with: (1) "To endure," "to bear with" (Isa 1 13), "I cannot away with iniquity and the solemn meeting," i.e. endure the combination of wickedness and worship. In the Heb merely, "I am unable iniquity and the solemn meeting." (2) To destroy (אָבְד, אָבְד). Found in such expressions as Acts 22 22, "Away with such a fellow from the earth."

Awe, 6: Fear mingled with reverence and wonder, a state of mind inspired by something terrible or sublime. In AV and RV it occurs in Ps 4 4: "Stand in awe, and sin not" (where RVVm has, "Be ye angry," so LXX; cf Eph 4 26); Ps 33 8; 119 161. In the following passages RV substitutes "stand in awe of" for AV "fear": Ps 22 23 (Gr phobolmenos); Isa 29 23; 1 S 18 15; Mal 2 5; and in He 12 25 it substitutes "awe" for AV "reverence" (Gr ἀφοβος, here only in NT). In all these passages, except 1 S 18 15 (Gr euolabesto, where it describes Saul's feeling toward David), the word stands for man's attitude of reverential fear toward God. This is the characteristic attitude of the pious soul toward God in the Scriptures, esp. in the OT. It arises from a consciousness of the infinite power, sublimity and holiness of God, which fills the mind with the "fear of the Lord," and a dread of violating His law. See Fear.

Awl, 6 (אָר), מַרְסֶה): "Bore his ear through with an awl" (Ex 21 6; Dt 15 17). The ear was pierced as being the organ of hearing, thus signifying the servant's promise of obedience. See Bore.

Ax (Ax), Ax-Head, ax'梳d: Nine different Heb words have been rendered "ax":

(1) פֶּשֶׁן, garzen. This unquestionably was one of the larger chopping instruments, as the uses to which it was put would imply (Dt 19 5; 20 19; 1 K 6 7; Isa 10 15). The modern ax used by the woodchoppers in Syria has a shape much like the ancient stone and bronze axes, with the exception that it is fastened to the handle by passing the latter through a hole in the ax-head, whereas the Egypt sculptures show that their ax-heads were held to the handle by means of thongs. The so-called battle-ax found at Tell el-Hesy was probably fastened in this way. Syrian peasants are frequently seen carrying in their belts small hatchets the heads of which are shaped like a battle-ax and which are bound to the handles by thongs.

(2) 매ָהָר, מַתָּה, מַתָּה, is used in Isa 44 12 (AV renders "tonges") and in Jer 10 3.

Assyrian Ax.

(3) אֲרֹן, bardom, is used in Jgs 9 48; 1 S 13 20; Ps 74 5; Jer 46 22. The present Arab. word, ẖadīm, which is the name for the native adze, is from the same origin. Ancient forms of the adze are shown in Figs. 4 and 7. The adze is the only chopping instrument of the Syrian carpenter. He uses it for many purposes, where a foreigner would use a saw or chisel or plane, and with a skill which the foreigner envies. Many students of Syrian life believe that the adze is a tool which has survived from the early Heb times.

Egyptian Ax.

(4) אַבְרֶל, barzel (Dt 19 5; 2 K 6 5): The interest associated with this word is that it literally means "iron," although the context indicates that it means "ax." If the word iron was not used here to mean "metal," then iron axes were used by the children of Israel. If iron axes existed, however, they have long since disappeared as the result of corrosion, since the only one ever discovered have been of stone, copper or bronze. See Bronze.

(5) מגַּז, maghzerah (2 S 12 31) is lit. "a cutting instrument," and might be rendered, "a blade" or sickle.

Axes.

(6) מַנְעַר, mənəər, məphərə (1 Ch 20 20), tr4 in this one passage as axes, but better tr4 "saws."

(7) צֶר, horeb (Ezk 26 9), rendered ax in this passage only. It is usually tr4 sword. It could also mean pickax.
AYIN, a'yan (אָיִן, 'eye' or "fountain"): The 16th letter of the Heb alphabet, so named, probably, because the original form resembled the eye. 'Ayn (אָיִן) is usually neglected in pronunciation, and the inverted comma (') is the sign most commonly employed to represent it in transliteration. The same sound is found in the Arab. and other Sem. languages. The Arabs have two pronunciations, one a very strong guttural formed at the back of the palate, something like a rattled r or rg, the other similar in quality, only less harsh and guttural. The LXX reproduced 'aiyn in some cases by gamma, γ. The numerical value of this letter is 80. Its use begins each verse of the 16th section of Ps 119 in the Heb. W. W. Davies.

AZARIAH, az-a'rah (עֶזָרַיָה, 'dazaryah, "Jeh has given ear"): A son of Joshua, a Levite who signed the covenant (Neh 10 9).

AZARIEL, az-a'riel (עֶזָרִיאֵל, 'azar'el, "God is helper"); AV reads Azarel in nos. 1-5, Azariel in no. 6: (1) A Korahite who entered the army of David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 6). (2) A Judahite in the temple appointed by lot; son of Heman (1 Ch 25 18; cf Uzziel, ver 4). (3) A captain of the tribe of Dan in the service of David (1 Ch 27 22). (4) One of those who had "Strange wives," a son of Bani (Ezr 10 41). (5) The father of Amashai, a priest who dwelt in Jerus after the Exile (Neh 11 13). (6) A priest's son who played the trumpet in the procession when the wall was dedicated (Neh 12 36). A. L. Bresliah

AZARIAS, az-ar'i-as (עֶזָרְיָאָס, Azar'ias, and 'Azariyas, Azar'ei-ye): (1) A, who put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 21); cf Uzziah (Ezr 10 21). (2) A, who stood at the right side of Ezra when the law was read to the people (1 Esd 9 43); omitted in Ezr 4. (3) A, who interpreted the law to the people (1 Esd 9 48); cf Azariah (Neh 8 7). (4) A, a name assumed by the angel Raphael (Tob 5 12; 6 16 7 8 9 2). See Raphael. (5) A, a general in the service of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 5 18 56 60). (6) A, one of the three men thrown into the fiery furnace (Three vs 266); cf Azariah (Dn 1 6 ff; 2 17), Abed-nego (Dn 1 7; 2 49; 3 12 ff). A. L. Bresliah

AZARU, az-ar'u (עֶזָרֻו, Azaru; 'Azərū, Azoru; AV Azuran): The descendants of A. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 15); omitted in Ezr and Neh; cf however Azur (Neh 10 17).

AZAZ, a'azaz (אָזוֹז, 'dazaz, "powerful"): A descendant of Reuben (1 Ch 5 8).

AZAZEL, a'az-az'el (עַזַּזְאֵל, 'dazazel; ἀτσατσαναίος, apopompaioi; AV Scapogoat, RV'm "removal"): I. The Meaning of the Word 1. The Passages to Be Considered 2. The Proposed Interpretations (1) The Etymology (2) The Explanation II. What Is Done in Connection with Azazel 1. The Significance of This Action 2. The Jewish Liturgy
I. The Meaning of the Word. — This word is found in connection with the ceremony of the Day of Atonement (q.v.). According to Lev 16:8, Aaron is to cast lots upon the two goats which on the part of the congregation serve as a sin offering (ver 5), "one lot for Jehovah, and the other lot for Azazel." In ver 10, after the first goat has been set apart as a sin offering for Jehovah, we read: "But the goat, on which the lot fell for Azazel, shall be set alive before Jehovah, to make atonement for him, to send him away for Azazel into the wilderness." In ver 26 we read: "And he that letteth go the goat for Azazel shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water." Before this, in vs 21 f mention had been made of what should be done with the goat. After the purification of the (inner) sanctuary, of the tent of meeting, and of the altar, the living goat is to be brought, "and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over all their iniquities and all their transgressions which they have transgressed against Jehovah, and shall send him away by the hand of a man that is in readiness into the wilderness: and the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities and all their transgressions, and shall send them away for Azazel into the wilderness." But in this last mentioned and most important passage the term under consideration is not found.

1. The Passages to Be Considered. — There have derived the word from 'az-l'azal (Jewish origin, "passing away"; in his "strength") or from an intentional alteration of 'el-'azaz, robur Dei, "strength of God"; cf below the angel of the Book of Enoch); while others have regarded this word as a broken plur. of a sub. in the Arab. 'azalāt, and it as "lonesomeness," "desert." Now there is an inclination to regard it as a reduplication from 'azalāt, derived from the root 'azal. If we accept this view, although it is without certainty and an exact analogue cannot be found, we could conclude from the way in which this noun has been formed that we have before us not an abstract term (remoto, "removal," or abitus, "departure"), but a concrete noun, or an adj., longe remota ("far removed") or porro avis ("going far away").

2. The Proposed Interpretations. — In vs 10, 22, 26, we would have an acceptable sense, if we regarded this word as expressive of a distinct locality in the wilderness (cf a node, a solitudo, "alone, in the wilderness") and accordingly presupposed a constant change in the encampment, even if this should be regarded only by the historical background. From the same proposition b) in connection with Jehovah and Azazel, it seems natural to regard the expressions as entirely || and to think of some personal being. Some interpret this word as referring to a demon of the wilderness (cf Ps 106:37; Du 32:17; Lev 17:7; 2 Ch 11:15; Isa 13:21; 34:14; Mt 12:45 ff; Lk 11:24 ff; Rev 18:2) and explain the term as "one who has separated himself from God," or "he who has separated himself," or "he who misleads others." But a demon of this kind could not possibly be placed in contrast to Jehovah in this way; and as in the Book of En 6:6; 8:1 ff; 9:6; 10:4 ff; 13:1 ff; 69:2 one of the most prominent of the fallen angels who taught mankind the arts of war and luxury, revealed secrets, and is regarded as a seducer, to them, and is removed to the wilderness, is there preserved for the final judgment, because he was mainly responsible for the presence of evil in the world, is called Azazel (also Azazel, or Azael), it is highly probable that this name was taken from Lev 16. In later times the word Azazel was by many Jews and also by Christian theologians, such as Origen, regarded as that Satan himself who had fallen away from God. In this interpretation the contrast found in ver 8, in case it is to be regarded as a full parallelism, would be perfectly correct.

But it must be observed that Satan is nowhere called by the name of Azazel, and just as little is the wilderness regarded as his permanent place of abode. Against these last two interpretations we must also recall that in the most significant passage, viz. vs 20 ff, the term Azazel is not found at all. The same is true in the case of the ceremony in connection with the purification of lepers and houses (Lev 14:7 ff, 49 ff), which throughout suggests Lev 16. In this place we have also the sevenfold sprinkling (cf 16:14 with Lev 16:14 f); and in addition two animals, in this case birds, are used, of which the one is to be slain for the purpose of sprinkling the blood, but the other, after it has been dipped into the blood of the one that has been slain, is to be allowed to fly away. In this way the essential thought in Lev 16 as also in Lev 14 seems to be the removal of the animal in either case, and it is accordingly advisable to interpret Azazel adjectively, i.e. to forego finding a corpse in the wilderness, but to understand the connection in connection with Jehovah as used differently from its use with Azazel, and to translate as follows: "And Aaron shall cast lots over both goats, the one lot [i.e. for the one goat] for Jehovah, and one lot for the goat that is destined to go far away." On the proposition b) used with the second Azazel in ver 10 of Ex 21:2. With this interpretation a certain hardness yet remains for our linguistic sense, because we cannot find a good tr. (for the adj.) in favor of this interpretation and against the personal interpretation we can appeal also to the feeling of the LXX translators who translate apopompalos, diestalmenos, and also to that of Aquilus, who translates trago apoklomenos, apoludamenos, zebralmenos, and of Symmachus who translates aperchiomenos, aphiemenos. (The general idea expressed by all these words is "removal," "sending away," "releasing" or "dismissal.") It is true that the LXX in one place translates etis fén apopompen, aposphalmenos, with however correct but however abstract circumlocution for a conception that, though used elsewhere, is yet awkward. In the Vulg we have caper emissarius and Luther says "der lêgende Bock," which are probably based on a wrong etymology, since this interpretation is impossible, since the law in Lev 16 was given during the wanderings in the wilderness and accordingly presupposed a constant change in the encampment, even if this should be regarded only by the historical background. From the same proposition b) in connection with Jehovah and Azazel, it seems natural to regard the expressions as entirely || and to think of some personal being. Some interpret this word as referring to a demon of the wilderness (cf Ps 106:37; Du 32:17; Lev 17:7; 2 Ch 11:15; Isa 13:21; 34:14; Mt 12:45 ff; Lk 11:24 ff; Rev 18:2) and explain the term as "one who has separated himself from God," or "he who has separated himself," or "he who misleads others." But a demon of this kind could not possibly be placed in contrast to Jehovah in this way; and as in the Book of En 6:6; 8:1 ff; 9:6; 10:4 ff; 13:1 ff; 69:2 one of the most prominent of the fallen angels who taught mankind the arts of war and luxury, revealed secrets, and is regarded as a seducer, to them, and is removed to the wilderness, is there preserved for the final judgment, because he was mainly responsible for the presence of evil in the world, is called Azazel (also Azazel, or Azael), it is highly probable that this name was taken from Lev 16. In later times the word Azazel was by

II. What Is Done in Connection with Azazel. — Both goats, according to ver 5, are to be regarded as a single sin-sacrifice, even should we interpret Azazel as demon or Satan. But we are accordingly not at all to understand that a sacrificial action brought to those beings. This too is made impossible by the whole tenor of the OT in general, as of Lev 16 in particular, so that in ver 8 the two members introduced by the proposition b) would not at all be beings of exactly the same importance. Both goats, so to say, represent two sides of the same thing. The second is necessary to make clear what the first one, which has been slain, can no longer represent, namely, the removal of the sin-sacrifice, that has apopompalos been called the hicaz rēdīvius. But what is to be represented finds its expression in the ceremony described in vs 20f. Whatever may be the significance of the laying on of hands in other connections, whether the emphasis is placed on the disposal or on the appropriation of the property, at this place it certainly is only a symbol of the transfer of guilt, which is confessed over the goat and is then carried into the wilderness by the goat upon which it has been laid. In order to make this transfer all the more impressive, both the hands are here brought into action, while e.g. in Lev 1 4 only one hand is used. The fact that the goat is accompanied by somebody and that it is to be taken to an uninhabited place is to indicate the absolute impossibility of its return, i.e. the guilt has been absolutely forgiven and erased, a deep thought made objectively evident in a transparent manner and independently of the explanation of Azazel, which is even yet not altogether certain. In the personal interpretation, we could have, in addition to the idea of the removal of the guilt, also a second idea, namely, that Azazel can do no harm to Israel, but must be content with his claim to a goat which takes Israel's place.

The actions in connection with Azazel, as was also the case with the Day of Atonement, were interpreted more fully by the Talm and the traditions based on it (cf. Jewish ATONEMENT, DAY OF, III, 2). The lots could be made of different materials; in later times they were made of gold. The manner of casting the lots was described in full. The goat that was to be sent into the wilderness was designated by a black mark on the head, the other by one on the neck. On the way from Jerusalem to the wilderness, huts were erected. From a distance it was possible to see that the goat was hurled backward from a certain cliff, called Bēth-Haddōn (Bēth-haddōn, 12 miles E. of Jerusalem). By means of signals made with garments, news was at once sent to Jerusalem when the wilderness had been reached.

AZAZIAH, az-a-zē'a (אָזָזְיָה, 'azazyähá, "Yahwe is strong," or "strengthens"): (1) A Levite musician who participated in the services held on the return of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Ch 25). His name is omitted from the list in ver 18.
(2) Father of Hoshea, who was the leader of Ephraim at the time that David enumerated the people (1 Ch 27 9; 2 Ch 31 9).
(3) A Levite who had charge of the offerings brought to the temple in the days of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 13).

AZBASARETH, az-bas'ā-reth: The name of an Assyrian king. AV form "Azbasareth" comes from the Vulg. See AZBASARETH.

AZBUK, az-būk (אֹזְבּוּק, "āzṓbūkh"): The father of a certain Nehemiah—not the great governor of the same name, though a contemporary (Neh 3 16).

AZEKAH, az-ě'kah (אֵזֶקָה, "āzekāh"): A town of some importance in the Shephelah of Judah mentioned (Josh 15 55) next to Socoh. In Josh 10 10 the defeated kings of the Amorites are described as flying before Joshua "by the way of the ascent of Beth-horon . . . . to Azekah, and unto Makkedah" and (ver 11) as the host fled "as Jehoshaphat over against them unto Azekah, and they died." In 1 S 17 1 it is recorded that before David's combat with Goliath, the Philis "gathred together at Socho, which be longeth to Judah, and encamped between Socho and Azekah, in Ephes-dammim" (1 S 11 9). It was one of the frontier cities which Reboaom fortified and in Jer 34 7, it is one of the two fortified cities remaining to Judah in the Shephelah which Nebuchadnezzar was besieging. "Azekah and the towns [m, "daughters"] thereof" is mentioned among the cities reoccupied by Jews returning after the Exile (Neh 11 30). In all the three last references the place is mentioned along with Lachish.

All the data suit Tell Zakariteh on the N. side of the Vale of Elah (Wady es-Sund) and some 3 miles N.W. of Socoh (Qa. Shawweikah). This site, which was partially excavated by the Palestine Exploration Fund, is one of great, natural strength. "The hill stands almost isolated, rising abruptly for almost 350 ft. above the Vale of Elah; . . . . to the W. the fall is also very great, while to the S. the tell is joined by a neck of land (about 100 ft. below the summit) to a hill behind." The summit is about 350 yds. by 150 yds., and is much larger than Tell el-Hesay (Lachish) (Bliss). Excavations showed that it was a very ancient site which had been powerfully fortified, and the rock under the city was excavated in a series of very extraordinary underground chambers which could be used as places of refuge. The site suits the narrative of Joshua's battle very well, as there is a long-used high route running N. to S. from the neighborhood of Ajalon. Its position as a frontier fortress is comparable with that of Lachish: the name Zakariteh, seems to be a survival of Azekah.

AZEL, a'zēl (אֵזֶל, "āzel"): (1) A descendant of King Saul, through Jonathan (1 Ch 37 9 f; 9 43 f).
(2) Azel, a'zēl, AV Azal (אָזָל, "āzāl"). See A-SELAH, A-SEL; Zec 14 5: A place not far from Jerusal. There may be an echo of the name in that of Wady Yaal, to the right of 'Aim el-Los, in Wady en-Nar.

AZEM, a'zem: AV form for Ezem (thus RV) (Josh 15 29; 19 3).

AZEPHURITH, a'zō-fō'rich. See ARSIPHURITH.

AZETAS, a'zē-tas (אֵזֶתָס, Azētās): The head of a family accompanying Zerubbabel out of captivity (1 Esd 5 15). Neither Ezra nor Nehemiah gives this name in his list.

AZGAD, a'zgād (אֵזָגָד, "āzgād, "strong is Gadd"): In the list of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel are mentioned "the children of Azgad" (1 Esd 2 22; Ezr 2 12; 2 Esd 2 32; Neh 7 17). 110 males are given their children by Ezra (Ezr 8 12). Azgad was among the leaders who signed the Covenant after Nehemiah (Neh 10 15).

AZIEL, a'zē'l: An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1 2). Cf. Azariah (Ezr 7 3) and Otniel (1 Esd 8 2; AV Ezias).

AZI'AEL, a'zi-ēl (אֵזְיָאֵל, "āzi'ēl, "God is power"): cf HPN, 210, 309: A Levite singer who played the psalteries (1 Ch 15 20); cf Jaaaziel (1 Ch 15 18).

AZIZA, a'zi-zā (אֵזְיזָא, "āzīzā, "the powerful"): A. had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 27); cf Zardes (1 Esd 9 28 RV).

AZMAVETH, az-mā'veth (אֵזוֹמַוֶ֥ת, "āzō'maveth"): (1) One of David's 30 mighty men (2 S 23 31; 1 Ch 11 33).
(2) A descendant of Jonathan, the son of Saul (1 Ch 8 35; 9 42).
(3) Father of two warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 3).
(4) The name of one set over David's treasures (1 Ch 27 25). Some identify him with (1) and (5).
AZMAVETH, az-mā'veth (אֶזְמַעְבֶּת, 'azmāveth; 'אמוֹת, 'ezmōth; 'אַמּוֹת או 'זְמַעְבֶּת, Asmōth or Azmōth, 'strong one of death'—Ezk 20:4). Is probably identical with el-Ḥammā, a village a little to the N. of 'Anāṯ (Anakoth). It corresponds to Beth-azmaveth (Neh 7 28).

AZMON, az'mōn (אֶזְמוֹן, 'azmōn; 'אַמּוֹן, Asmōn; Asmōna, 'strong'). On the S.W. border of Israel (Nu 34 4, 5; Josh 15 4). Trumbull identifies it with 'Ain el-Quseimeh, N.W. of Kadesh Barnea (Kad. Bar., 117, 289 f).

AZNOTH-TABOR, az'noth-tā'bor (אֶזְנְוָת-תָּבֹר, 'aznōth tābor, 'peaks of Tabor'). A place in western Naphtali, evidently in the vicinity of Mt. Tabor (Josh 19 34). The exact locality is not known.

AZOR, az'or ('Aẓôr, Azôr, 'help'?): An ancestor of Jesus Christ (Mt 1 13 f).

AZOTUS, a-zō'tus. See ASIDON (1 Mace 9 15; Acts 8 40).

AZRIEL, az'ri-ēl (אֶזְרִיאֵל, 'āzrī'ēl, 'God's help').
1. One of the leading men of the half-tribe of Manasseh, E. of the Jordan, who with others of his tribe was carried captive by the king of Assyria (1 Ch 5 24 f).
2. The father of Jerimoth of the tribe of Naphtali in the reign of King David (1 Ch 27 19).
3. The father of Seraiah, one of the officers sent by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36 26).

Baal (בָּאָל, bā'al, Baal, Bel, or Baal, Baal): The Babelu or Bel, 'Lord,' was the title of the supreme god among the Canaanites.

I. NAME AND CHARACTER OF BAAL.

In Babylonia it was the title specially applied to Merodach of Babylon, which in time came to be used in place of its actual name. As the word in Heb also means 'possessor,' it has been supposed to have originally signified, when used in a religious sense, the god of a particular piece of land or soil. Of this, however, there is no proof, and the sense of "possessor" is derived from that of 'lord.' The Bab Bel-Merodach was a Sun-god, and so too was the Can Baal whose full title was Baal-Shemaim, 'lord of heaven.' The Phoen writer Sanchuniathon (Philo Byblius, Fragmenta II) accordingly says that the children of the first generation of mankind "in time of drought stretched forth their hands to heaven toward the sun; for they regarded him as the sole Lord of heaven, and called him Bel-samān, which means 'Lord of Heaven' in the Phoen language and is equivalent to Zeus in Gr." Baal-Shemaim had a temple at Umm el-Awāmidi between Acre and Tyre, and his name is found in inscriptions from the Phoen colonies of Sardinia and Carthage.

II. ATTRIBUTES OF BAAL.

As the Sun-god, Baal was worshipped under two aspects, beneficent and destructive. On the one hand he gave light and warmth to his worshippers; on the other hand the fierce heats of summer destroyed the vegetation he had himself brought into being. Hence human victims were sacrificed to him in order to appease his anger in time of plague or other trouble, the victims being usually the first-born of the sacrificer and being burnt alive. In the OT this is euphemistically termed 'passing' the victim "through the fire" (2 K 16 3; 21 6). The forms under which Baal was worshipped were necessarily as numerous as the communities which worshipped him. Each locality had its own Baal or divine "Lord" who frequently took his name from the city or place to which he belonged. Hence there was a Baal-Zur, "Baal of Tyre:" Baal-hermon, "Baal of Hermon" (Jgs 3 8); Baal-Lebanon, "Baal of Lebanon"; Baal-Tarz, "Baal of Tarsus." At other times the title was attached to the name of an individual god; thus we have Bel-Merodach, "the Lord Merodach" (or "Bel is Merodach") at Babylon, Baal-Melkarth.
at Tyre, Baal-gad (Josh 11:17) in the north of Palestine. Occasionally the second element was a noun as in Baal-Shemaim, "lord of heaven," Baalzebub (2 K 1:2), "Lord of flies," Baal-Hamman, usually interpreted as "Lord of health," and more probably "Lord of the sunburnt," the tutelary deity of Carthage. All these various forms of the Sun-god were collectively known as the Baalim or "Baals" who took their place by the side of the female Ash-taroth and Ashterim. At Carthage the female consort of Baal was termed Pené-Baal, "the face" or "reflection of Baal."

III. Baal-Worship.—In the earlier days of Hebrew history the title Baal, or "lord," was applied to the national God of Israel, a usage which was revived in later times, and is familiar to us in the AV. Hence both Jonathan and David had sons called Merib-baal (1 Ch 8:34; 9:40) and Beeliada (1 Ch 14:7). After the time of Ahab, however, the name became associated with the worship and rites of the Phoen deity introduced into Samaria by Jezebel, and its idolatrous associations accordingly caused it to fall into disrepute. Hosea (2:16) declares that henceforth the God of Israel should have no more to do with Baal, "say Baal," and personal names like Es-baal (1 Ch 8:33; 9:39), and Beeliada into which it entered were changed in form, Baal being turned into bošteth which in Heb at any rate conveyed the sense of "shame."

IV. Temples, etc.—Temples of Baal at Samaria and Jerusalem were mentioned in 1 K 16:32; 2 K 11:18; where they had been erected at the time when the Ahab dynasty endeavored to fuse Israelites and Jews and Phoenicians into a single people under the same national Phoen god. Altars on which incense was burned to Baal were set up in all the streets of Jerusalem according to Jeremiah (11:13), apparently on the flat roofs of the houses (Jer 32:20); and the temple of Baal contained an image of the god in the shape of a pillar or Bethel (2 K 10:26.27). In the reign of Ahab, Baal was served in Israel by 450 priests (1 K 18:19), as well as by prophets (2 K 10:19), and his worshippers wore special vestments when his ritual was performed (2 K 10:22). The ordinary offering made to the god consisted of corn (Jer 7:19) and burnt sacrifices; on extraordinary occasions the victim was human (Jer 19:5). At times the priests worked themselves into a state of ecstacy, and dancing round the altar slashed themselves with knives (1 K 19:20). Jewish orders were said in Islam (Qur'an 6:154).

V. Use of the Name.—In accordance with its signification the name of Baal is generally used with Meni, the Assyrian Manu (AV “trump” and "number”).

Baal-hamon (בֵּאל חָמוֹן, ba'al ūhamōn; Beel-aššur, Beelamenôn) is known only from the fact that Solomon had a garden at a place of that name (Gen 14:13). The name is usually explained to mean "Baal of the multitude," but the cuneiform tablets of the Tell el-Amarna age found in Pal show that the Egyptian god Amon was worshipped in Canaan and identified there with Baal. We are therefore justified in reading the name Baal-Amon, a parallel to the Bab Bel-Merodach. The name has no connection with that of the Carthaginian deity Baal-hamman.

Baal-hermon (בֵּאל הֵרֹם, ba'al ĕrōm; Baal-nimroth, Baalermôn) is found in the name of the "mountain of Baal-hermon" (Jgs 3:3; of the second name being applied to it by the Phoenicians and the third by the Amorites (De 11:29). The name will consequently be a formation similar to Baal-Lebanon in an inscription from Cyprus; according to the Phoen writer Sanchuniahan (Phil. Bybl., Fragmenta II) the third generation of men "begat sons of surprising size and stature, whose names were given to the mountains of which they had obtained possession."

Baal-peor (בֵּאל פֶּוֹר, ba'al pe'ôr; Beelphago, Beelphégor) was god of the Moabite mountains, who took his name from Mount Peor (Nu 23:28), the modern Fu'tar, and was probably a form of Chemosh (Jerome, Comm., Is 15:1). The sensual rites with which he was worshipped (Nu 25:1-3) indicate his connection with the Phoen Baal.

Baal-zebub (בֵּאל צָבּבּ, ba'al zebubh; Baalµyēa Theós, Baalmutsa Thēdos ("Baal the fly god") was worshipped at Ekron where he had a famous oracle (2 K 1.2)."

Baal-hermon is a name generally used with the flies which swarm in Pal during the earlier summer months. It is met with in Assyrian inscriptions. In the NT the name assumes the form of Beelzebul (Phil. Bybl.), in AV Beelzebub (q.v.).

A. H. SAYCE

BAAL, ba'el (בֶּל, Baal), "lord," "master," "possessor":
(1) A descendant of Reuben, Jacob's first-born son, and the father of Beerah, prince of the Reubenites, "whom Tegalath-pileser (1 Ch 5:5) king of Assyria carried away captive."

(2) The fourth of ten sons of Jeiel (AV "Jeheileh") father and founder of Gibeon. His mother was Maacha; his brother Kish father of Saul (1 Ch 8:29); 8:36.39; cf 1 S 14:50). These passages identify Jeiel and Abiel as the father of Kish and thus of Baal. For study of confusions in the genealogical record, in 1 Ch 9:36.39, see NER; KISH; ABIEL; JEIEL.

(3) In composition often the name of a man and not of the heathen god, e.g. Baal-hanan, a king of Edom (Gen 36:38; 1 Ch 1:49); also a royal palef of the same name (1 Ch 27:28). Gesenius thinks that Baal in compound words rarely refers to the god by that name. See BAAL (deity).

(4) A city of the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 4:33).
See BAILATH-BEER.

BAAL (בֶּל, Baal; Bâlû, Bâlû): 1 Ch 4:33.
See BAILATH-BEER.

See BAILATH-BEER.
BAALAH, bā'î-la (בּאָלָה, ba'îlah; "possessor," "mistress"): Three occurrences of this name:
(1) Kiriath-Jearim (q.v.). (Josh 15 12, 10; I Ch 13 6).
(2) A city in the Negeb of Judah (Josh 16 29).
In Josh 19 3 Balah and in I Ch 4 29 Bilihah; perhaps also Bealoth of Josh 16 24. The site is unknown; but cf JEB, II, 29.
(3) Mount Baalah (Josh 15 11), a mountain ridge between Shikkeron (Ekron) and Jabneel unless, as seems probable, the suggestion of M.
Clermont-Ganneau (Rev. Crit., 1897, 902) is correct that for "ת"ר, har ("mount"), we should read "נהדר, nahdr ("tiber"). In this case the border in question would be the Nahr rubin. Here there is an annual feast held—attended by all classes and famous all over Syria—which appears to be a real survival of 'Baal worship.'

BAALATH, bā'î-lath (בּאָלָת, ba'îlath; A. Baal-lav, Baalôn):
(1) A town on the border of Dan (Josh 19 44) associated with Eltekeh and Gibeoneth—possibly Bela'si.
(2) "Mistress-ship": A store city of Solomon, mentioned with Beth-horon (1 K 9 18; 2 Ch 8 6) and possibly the same as (1).

BAALATH-BEEER, bā'î-lath-bē'îr (בּאָלָת-בַּעֵר, ba'îlath bē'îr), "lady of the well": Josh 19 8 [in 1 Ch 4 33, Baal]. In Josh 19 this place is designated "Ramah of the South," i.e. of the Negeb, while in I S 30 27 it is described as Ramoth of the Negeb. It must have been a prominent hill (ramah = "height") in the far south of the Negeb and near a well (bē'îr). The site is unknown though Conder suggests that the shrine Kubbet el Baal may retain the old name.

BAALBEK, bāl'bek, bāl'bek'. See AVEN; ON.

BAAL-BERITH, bā'î-al-bē'îrith (בּאָל-בְּרֵית, ba'îl bē'îrith) "Baal of the Covenant": An idol worsipped by the Shechemites after Gideon's death (Jgs 8 33), as protector and guardian of engagemints. His temple is also referred to in Jgs 9 4.
See BAAL.

BAALE-JUDAH, bā'î-lé-jō'îyā. See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

BAAL-GAD, bā'î-gād (בּאָלָגָד, ba'î-gād; Beal-yad, Balgad, Baljad): Joshua in his conquest reached as far north as Baal-Gad in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon (Josh 11 17). This definitely locates it in the valley between the Lebanons, to the W. or N.W. of Her-
mon. It must not be confused with Baal-heron.
Conder thinks it may be represented by Atn Jedeideh.

BAAL-HAMON, bā'î-hā'îmon. See BAAL (1).

BAAL-HANAN, bā'î-hā'înān (בּאָלָה-הָנָא, ba'î-hā'înān, "the Lord is gracious"):
(1) A king of Edom (Gen 36 38 f.; 1 Ch 1 49 f).
(2) A gardener in the service of David (1 Ch 27 28).

BAAL-HAZOR, bā'î-hā'îzōr (בּאָלָה-הָצָּר, ba'î-hā'îzōr; Balaasôr, Balasôr, Bèl-là-sôr): A place on the property of Absalom where his sheep-shearers were gathered, beside Ephraim (2 S 15 29). The sheep-shearings was evidently the occasion of a festival which was attended by Absalom's brethren. Here he compassed the death of Ammon in revenge for the outrage upon his sister. The place may be identified with Tell 'Asûr, a mountain which rises 3,318 ft. above the sea, 4 miles N.E. of Bethel.

BAAL-HERMON, bā'î-hā'îrmōn (בּאָלָה-הָרְמֹנָן, ba'î-hā'îrmōn; Bāal 'Ermān, Bāal Ermōn): Baalgad under Mount Hermon is described as "toward the sunrise" in Josh 13 5. If Mount Lebanon proper is herein included the reading may be taken as correct. But in Jgs 3 3 Baal-gad is replaced by Baal-hermon. One or the other must be due to a scribal error. The Baal-hermon of 1 Ch 5 23 lay somewhere E. of the Jordan, near to Mount Hermon. It may possibly be identical with Bāntás.

BAALI, bā'î-li (בּאָלָי, ba'î-li, "my master"): Baal, a common name for all heathen gods, had in common practice been used also of Jeh. Hosea
(2 16 17) demands that Jeh be no longer called Ba'âl
("my Baal" = "my lord") but 'Ishî ("my husband") and we find that later the Israelites abandoned the use of Ba'âl for Jeh.

BAALIM, bā'î-lîm (בּאָלָי-לִים, ba'î-lîm): Plur.
of BAAL (q.v.).

BAALIS, bā'î-lîs (בּאָלָי-לִס, ba'î-lîs, perhaps for Baalim, "gods"): I X X Belāsôr, Beledāsôr, Balārāsôr, Baalāsôr, Baalôsôr, Balôsôr, Belôsôr, Bālāsôr, Bālāsôr, BAALASôR: King of the children of Ammon, the instigator of the murder of Gedaliah (Jer 40 14).
Cf Ant., X, ix, 3.

BAAL-MEON, bā'î-mō'ôn (בּאָל-מוֹן, ba'î-mō'ôn; Beel-môn, Beelmeon): A town built by the children of Reuben along with Nebo, "their names being changed" (Nu 32 38), identical with Beon of ver 3. As Beth-ba'al-meon it was given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben (Josh 13 17).
Mesa names it as fortified by him (MS, I, 9).
It appears in Jer 48 23 as Beth-meon, one of the cities of Moab. Onom speaks of it as a large village near the hot springs, i.e. Calirrhoe, in Wādy Zerkā Ma'n, 9 miles from Reshhon. This points to the ruined site of Mâ'ta', about 4 miles S.W. of Madâbâ.
The ruins now visible however are not older than Rom times.

BAAL-PEOR, bā'î-pē'ôr. See BAAL (1).

BAAL-PERAZIM, bā'î-pē-râ'îzîm, bā'î-per-azîm (בּאָל-פֶּרָּזִים, bā'î-pē-râ'îzîm; Baal-paraśîvîm, "the lord of breakings through"): The spot in or near the Valley of Rephaim where David obtained a signal victory over the Philis; it was higher than Jerus for David asked, "Shall I go up against the Philis?" (2 S 5 20; 1 Ch 14 11).
The exact site is unknown, but if the Vale of Rephiaim is el Bekâ'a, the open valley between Jerus and Mar Elias, then Baal-perazim would probably be the mountains to the E. near what is called the "Mount of Evil Counsel" (see JERUSALEM). The Mount Perazim of Is 28 21 would appear to be the same spot.
E. W. G. MASTERMANN

BAALSAMUS, bā'î-sā-mus (Baalšāmuîs, Baal-samos; Av Balasamus): B. stood at the right side of Ezra, when the law was read to the people (1 Ead 9 43). Cf Maaseiah (Neh 8 7).

BAAL-SHALISHAH, bā'î-shâ'î-sâ'hâ (בּאָל-שָׁלִישָּה, ba'î-shâ'î-sâ'hâ; Baalshalishäh, Baalsarâ, Ba'âlsarâ): Whence a man came to Gilgal with first-fruits (2 K 4 42) was probably not far from the latter place. According to the Talm (Sanh. 12a)
the fruits of the earth nowhere ripened so quickly.
It is called by Eusebius Baitha-rith (Jerome "Bethsalisses"), and located 15 miles N. of Diospolis (Lydda). Khirbet Sirinā almost exactly fits this description. Gilgal (גִּלְגָּל) lies in the plain about 4½ miles to the N.W. Khirbet Kefr Thilḥ, 3½ miles farther north, has also been suggested. The Arab Khilṭh exactly corresponds to the Heb Shādī khálah.

BAAL-TAMAR, bā-al-tā'mar (בַּאל-תָּמָר), bā'al tamār; Baal Θεοφαί, Baal Thammar, "Baal of the palm tree"): Evidently a seat of heathen worship (Jgs 20 23) between Bethel and Gibeah (cf vs 18, 31). The place was known to Eusebius (Onom s.v.), but all trace of the name is now lost. Conder suggests that it may be connected with the palm tree of Deborah (Jgs 4 5) which was between Bethel and Ramah (HDB, s.v.).

BAALZEBUB, bā-al-zē'ub (בַּאל-צֶבּ) (bā'al zē'eb, bā'al zē'bāhāh = "lord of flies"); Baal-μυαν, Baal-mīyān): A deity worshipped by the Phœnis at Ekron (2 K 1 2; 3.16.6). All that can be gathered from this one reference to him in ancient lit. is that he had some fame as a god that gave oracles. Ahaziah, son of Ahab, and king of Israel, went to consult him whether he should recover of his sickness, and was therefore rebuked by Elijah, who declared that his death would be the result of this insult to Jeh. Why he was called "lord of flies," or whether his real name has not been corrupted and lost are matters of conjecture. See Baal (1).

BAAL-ZEPHON, bā-al-zē'fon (בַּאל-צֶפּוֹן), bā'al zē'fānōn; Beelzeβon, Beelzephon; Ex 14 2, 9; Nū 33 7): The name means "lord of the North," and the place was opposite the Heb camp, which was between Migdol and Tanis. It may have been the sitræne of a Sem deity, but the position is unknown (see Ezech.). Goodwin (see Brugsch, Hist. Egt., II, 363) found the name Baal-Żappan as that of a god mentioned in an Egyptian papyrus in the British Museum.

BAANA, bā'-a-na (OT and Apoc; Baavá, Baanád, נַעַן, "son of oppression"): (1, 2) Two commissariat-officers in the service of Solomon (1 K 4 16; 2 K 11 16). AV (see Baanah). (3) Father of Zadok, the builder (Neh 3 4). (4) A leader who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (1 Esd 6 8). Cf Baanah (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7; 10 27).

Baanah, bā'-a-nā (בַּאן, bā'nāh, "son of oppression"): (1) Captain in the army of Ish-bosheth (2 S 4 2 ff). (2) Father of Heleb, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 29; 1 Ch 11 30). (3) Returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem; a leader and one who sealed the covenant (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7; 10 27). See Baana (4).

BAANAI, bā'-a-ni (A, Baavá, Baanit; B, Baawé, Baanéi; AV Maani = Bani [Ex 10 34]): The descendants of B. put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 34).

Baanias, bā'-a-nī's. See BANNEAS (Apoc).

BAARA, bā'-a-ra (בַּאָר, bā'arê), "the burning one": A wife of the Benjamite Shaherah (1 Ch 8 8).

BAASEIAH, bā'-a-sē'ā, bā'-a-sē'ya (בַּאָשִיָּא, bā'ēshīya, "the Lord is bold"): Perhaps for בַּאָשִיָּא (bā'ēshīya), after the Gr Maasai, B, Maasai, "the work of the Lord." Cf HPN, 355. An ancestor of Asaph, the musician (1 Ch 6 40).

BAASIAH, bā'-a-shā (בַּאָשְׁא, bā'ēsha, "boldness"): King of Israel. B, son of Ahijah, and of common birth (1 K 16 2), usurped the throne of Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, killed Nadab and exterminated the house of Jeroboam. He carried on a long warfare with Asa, the king of Judah (cf 18 19), began to build Ramah, but was prevented from completing this work by Ben-hadad, the king of Syria. He is told by the prophet Jehu that because of his sinful ren ing the fate of his house would be like that of Jeroboam. He reigned 24 years. His son Elah who succeeded him and all the members of his family were murdered by the usurper Zimri (1 K 15 16 ff; 16 1 ff; 2 Ch 16 1 ff). The fate of his house is referred to in 1 K 21 22; 2 K 9 9. Cf Asa; Elah; Zimri. A. L. BRESLICH BABBLER, bab'ler (בַּבְּלוּר, bā'ēl-lōr), bā'al ha-lōshān; AV of Eccl 10 11 lit. "master of the tongue"); RV CHARMER, лαυτοτης, latostēs, AV of Eccles 10 20; RV BRAG, ART; εατερος, spermologos, AV and RV of Acts 17 18): The latter Gr word is used of birds, such as the crow, that live by picking up small seeds (σπερμα, "a seed," λεγειν, "to gather"), and of men, for "hangers on" and "parasites" who obtained their living by picking up odds and ends off merchants. In the parts of commerce and medicine it carries the "suggestion of picking up refuse and scraps, and in lit. of plagiarism without the capacity to use correctly" (Ramsay). The Athenian philosophers in calling Paul a spermologos, or "ignorant plagiarist," meant that he retailed odds and ends of knowledge which he had picked up from others, without possessing himself any system of thought or skill of language—without culture. In fact it was a fairly correct description of the Athenian philosophers themselves in Paul's day.

Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, 141 ff. T. REES

BABBLING, bab'ling (בַּבְּלָימ, bā'ēl-līm; RV COMPLAINING): The consequence of tarrying long at the wine (Prov 23 29 AV); λαυα, laia, RV "talk" (Eccles 19 6; 20 5 AV); κεχοφωρια, kephophnia, lit. "making an empty sound" (1 Tim 6 20; 2 Tim 2 16 AV and RV of Acts 17 18).

Babe, bāb (1) בַּב, "a door"; פָּתא, "passage, a male infant 3 months old (Ex 2 6) trd elsewhere "boy" or "lad.

(2) בַּב, בַּב, בַּב, "child" in the general sense of "child" (Ps 8 2; 17 14; Isa 3 4). (3) (βηβος, brēbos) an unborn or newborn child (AV and RV of Lk 1 41, 44; 2 12, 16; 1 Pet 2 2 and RV of Lk 18 15 [AV "infant"]; Acts 7 19 [AV "young children"] and 2 Tim 3 15 [AV "child"]).

(4) (νεφιος, nēphios = Lat infans) "a child that cannot speak." (AV and RV of Mt 11 25; 21 16; Lk 10 21; Rom 2 20; 1 Cor 3 1; He 5 13) the same word is trd "child," plur. "children" (in AV and RV of 1 Cor 13 11; Gal 4 1, 13; Eph 4 14) the vb. ἐφερτεται is trd in AV "he ye children" and in RV "he ye babes" (1 Cor 14 20). Nēphios is used metaphorically of those who are like children, of simple and single minds, as opposed to the "wise and understanding" (Mt 11 25 = Lk 10 21; cf 1 Cor 14 20). "Babes in Christ" are men of little spiritual growth, carnal as opposed to spiritual (1 Cor 3 1; cf He 5 13; Eph 4 14). Nēphios is also used of a child as a minor or infant in the eye of the law (Gal 4 1, 3). T. REES BABEL, bab'el, BABYLON, bab'i-lon (Topographically): Babylon was the Gr name of the city written in the cuneiform script of the Babyloniants bab-il, which means in Sem., "the gate of god." The Hebrews called the country, as well as the city, Babel. This name they came from the root, balai, "to confound!" (Gen 11:9). The name in Sumerian ideographs was written Din-ir, which means "life of the forest," and yet ancient etymologists explained it as meaning "place of the seat of life" (shubat balate). Ka-di-nigirra, which also means "gate of god," was another form of the name in Sumerian. It was also called Su-anna (which is of uncertain meaning) and Uru-asagga, "the holy city.

Herodotus, the Gr historian, has given us a picture of Babylon in his day. He says that the city was a great square, 42 miles in circuit. Ctesias makes it 56 miles. This, he writes, was surrounded by a moat or rampart 300 ft. high, and 75 ft. broad. The earliest mention of Babylon is in the time of Sargon I, about 2700 B.C. That monarch laid the foundations of the temple of Anunit, and also those of the temple of Amal. In the time of Dungi we learn that the place was sacked. The city evidently played a very unimportant part in the political history of Babylonia of the early period, for besides these references it is almost unknown until the time of Hammurabi, when its rise brought about a new epoch in the history of Babylonia. The seat of power was then transferred permanently from the southern states. This resulted in the closing of the political history of the Sumerians. The organization of the empire by Hammurabi, with Babylon as its capital, placed it in a position from which it was never dislodged during the remaining history of Babylonia.

The mounds covering the ancient city have frequently been explored, but systematic excavations of the city were not undertaken until 1899, when Koldewey, the German excavator, began to uncover its ancient ruins in a methodical manner. In spite of what ancient writers say, certain scholars maintain that they grossly exaggerated the size of the city, which was comparatively small, especially when considered in connection with large cities of the present era.

In the northern part of the city there was situated what is called the North Palace on the east side of the Euphrates, which passed through the city. A little distance below this point the Arakhtu canal left the Euphrates, and passing through the southern wall rejoined the river. There was also a Middle and Southern Palace. Near the latter was located the Ishtar gate. The temple E-makh was close to the east side of the gate. Other canals in the city were called Merodach and Lilibkhegala. In the southern portion of the city was located the famous temple E-sag-ila. This fame was called by the Gr historian, "the temple of Belus." Marduk or Merodach (as written in the OT), the patron deity of the city, received from Enlil, as Hammurabi informs us, after he had driven the Elamites out of Babylonia, the title bel matate, "lord of lands," not the name which Enlil of Nippur had possessed. In the past there has been a confusion. The ideogram Enil or Eilil had been incorrectly read Bel. This necessitated speaking of the old Bel and the young Bel. Beyond being called bel, "lord," as all other gods were called, Enil's name was not Bel. Marduk is the Bel of the OT, as well as the god called Bel in the Assyrd and Bab inscriptions.

The temple area included an outer, central and inner court. The shrine of Ishtar and Zamama occupied the central court, and the zigzurrat the inner court. In the temple proper, the shrine E-kuk was located, in which stood the golden image of Marduk. This, the ancient writers say, was 40 ft. high. On the topmost stage there was a shrine dedicated to Marduk. It is assumed that it was 50 ft. long by 70 ft. broad and 50 ft. in height.

Nabopolassar rebuilt the temple and its tower. Nebuchadrezzar enlarged and embellished the sanctuary. He raised the tower so that "its head was in the heavens," an expression found in the story of the Tower of Babel in Gen. as well as in many of the building inscriptions. See LOT B, 121 ff., and the art. on BABEL, TOWER OF.

One of the Chief works of Nebuchadrezzar was the building of Alburashabu, the famous procession street of the city, which extended from the Ishtar gate to E-sag-ila. It was a great and magnificent causeway, built higher than the houses. Walls lined it on either side, which were decorated with glazed tiles, portraying lions, life size in relief. The pavement was laid with blocks of stone brought from the mountains. This procession street figured prominently on the New Year's festal day, when the procession of the gods took place.

A knowledge of the work of Nebuchadrezzar did serve as a fitting commentary to the passage in...
Dnl 4:30: "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built?" He had made the city one of the wonders of the world.

The two sieges by Darius Hystaspes and the one by Xerxes destroyed much of the beauty of the city. Alexander desired to make it again a great center and to build an immense fortress in the city; but in the midst of this undertaking he was murdered, while exploring the palace of Nebuchadrezzar. The temple, though frequently destroyed, was in existence in the time of the Seleucids, but the city had long since ceased to be of any importance. See also BABYLONIA. A. T. CLAY

The name of the great capital of ancient Babylonia, the Shinar of Gen 10:10; 14:1, other names of the city being Tîn-dîr, "seat of life," E (ib), probably an abbre viation of Ėribatu (ib) "the good city of the City (of Babylon)." The name is known by its many forms, and in the phrase "the city of Babylon" it was commonly used.

According to Herodotus, the city, which lay in a great plain, was square in its plan and measured about 17 miles along one side. It was divided into two parts by a broad moat of 390 furlongs (14,400 meters), and was about 21 miles long. The area of the city was 4,250,000 acres. The city walls were 16 miles long and contained about 12,000 buildings. The walls were about 12 feet thick, and the rampart was 90 feet high. The city was surrounded by a canal 3 miles wide, and the river flowed through a canal 111 feet wide. The river was guarded by a brazen gate. Within the great outer wall was another, not much weaker, but enclosing a smaller space. Each division of the city contained a great building, the one being the king's palace, strongly fortified around, and the other the temple of Zeus Belos—an erection with brazen gates measuring two furlongs each way. Within this sacred precinct was a solid tower measuring a furlong each way, and surmounted by other towers to the number of eight. An ascent ran around these towers, with a stopping-place about the middle where the visitor might rest. Upon the topmost tower a large cell was built, wherein was a couch and a golden table. No image was placed in the building, neither was there except a woman of the people, chosen by the god. In another cell below was a golden image of Zeus sitting, his seat and footstool being likewise of gold, with near by, a large golden table. The total cost of the work was said to have been 800 talents of silver.

Upon a small golden altar outside the cell young sucklings only were sacrificed, and upon another (not of gold) full-grown animals were offered.

The hydraulic works of Babylon are attributed by Herodotus to two queens, Semiramis and Nitocris. The former made banks of Semiramis ing the plain like a sea. The second, and Nitocris Nitocris, altered the channel of the River in such a way that it flowed three times in its course to the village Andirica, and the traveler by water therefore took three days to pass this spot. She also raised the banks of the river, and dug a great lake above Babylon. The place which was dug out she made into a swamp, the object being to retard the course of the river. The many bends and the swamp were on the shortest route to Media, to prevent the Medes from having dealings with her kingdom and learning of her affairs. Other works were raising the Capitol gate, and a tomb for herself on the most frequented gate of the city.

Both Herodotus and Ctesias were eyewitnesses.
of the glory of Babylon, though only at the period when it had begun to wane. It is exceedingly probable, however, that their accounts will be superseded in the end, by those of the people who best knew the city, namely, the inhabitants of Babylon itself.

According to Ctesias, the circuit of the city was not 480, but 360 furlongs—the number of the days in the Bab year—and somewhat under 42 miles. The E. and W. districts were bordered by a bridge 5 furlongs or 1,050 yards long, about 30 ft. broad. At each end of the bridge was a royal palace, that on the eastern bank being the more magnificent of the two.

6. Ctesias' Description of the Palace and Their Decorated Walls This palace was defended by three walls, the outermost being 60 furlongs or 7 miles in circuit; the second, a circular wall, 40 furlongs (4½ miles), and the third 20 furlongs (2¼ miles). The height of the middle wall was 300 ft., and that of its towers 420 ft., but this was exceeded by the height of the innermost wall. Ctesias states that the walls of the second and third inclosures were of colored brick, showing hunting-scenes—the chase of the leopard and the lion, with male and female figures, which he regarded as Niusim and Semiramis. The other palace (that on the W. bank) was smaller and less ornate, and was inclosed only by a single wall 30 furlongs (3¼ miles) in circuit. This also had representations of hunting-scenes and bronze statues of Niusim, Semiramis and Jupiter-Belus (Bel-Merodach). Besides the bridge, he states that there was also a tunnel under the river. He seems to speak of the temple of Belus (see Babel, Tower of) as being surmounted by three statues—Bel (Bel-Merodach), 40 ft. high, his mother Rhea (Dawkina), the Daughter of Damascu- cius, and Bel-Merodach's spouse Juno or Beltis (Zer-pa·ntu). The celebrated Hanging Gardens he seems to describe as a square of which each side measured 400 ft., rising in terraces, the topmost of which was planted with trees of various kinds. If this was the case, it must have resembled a temple-tower covered with verdure. The Assyrian sources, however, indicate something different (see sec. 27).

With regard to the size of the city as given by other authorities, Pliny copies Herodotus, and makes its circuit 480 furlongs (Nat. Hist. i. 26); Strabo quotes Diodorus (sec. 6), 385; Q. Curtius (v.i. sec. 26), 386; Clitarchus (apud Diod. Sic. ii. 7), 365.

Though the difference between the highest and the lowest is considerable, it is only what might be expected from independent estimates, for it is doubtful whether any of them are based on actual measurements. Diodorus (ii.9, end) states that but a small part of the inclosure was inhabited in his time (he was a contemporary of Caesar and Augustus), but the abandonment of the city must then have been practically completed, and the greater part given over, as he states, to cultivation—even, perhaps, within the space inclosed by the remains of walls today. It is noteworthy that Q. Curtius says (v.i. sec. 27) that as much as nine-tenths consisted, even during Babylon's most prosperous period, of gardens, parks, parades, fields and lawns; in this the latest excavations in this the latest contract-tablets confirm. Though there is no confirmation of the height of the walls as given by these different authorities, the name given to the city, Su-an·na, "the high walled" (see above), indicated that it was renowned for the height of its defensive structures.

Among the native accounts of the city, that of Nebuchadrezzar is the best and most instructive. From this record it would seem that there were two principal defensive structures, Imur-Enil and Némitti-Enil, respectively called "Ennil's foundation" and "Enil's mountain." The construction of these, which protected the inner city only, on the eastern and western sides of the Euphrates, he attributes to his father Naboloni- dus, as well as the digging of the moat, with the two "strong walls" on its banks, and the embankment of the Araphtu canal. He had also lined the Euphrates with quays or embankments—probably the structures to which the Gr writers refer—but he had not finished the work. Within Babylon itself he made a roadway from Du-azaga, the place where the fates were declared, to Aa-bur-sabū, Babylon's festival-street, which lay by the gate of Belfis or Mal, for the great New-Year's festival of Merodach and the gods.

Nebuchadrezzar, after his accession, completed the two great walls, lined the ditches with brick, and increased the thickness of the two walls which his father had built. He also built a wall on the Euphrates which are apparently extant, on the W. side of Babylon (he apparently refers to what may be called the "city," in contradistinction to "greater Babylon"), and raised the level of Aa-bur-sabū from the "holy gate" to the gate of Nānā; together with the gateways (in consequence of the higher level of the pathway) through which it passed. The gates themselves were constructed of cedar overlaid with copper (bronze), and probably none of Babylon's gates of solid bronze, notwithstanding the statements of Herod- otus; but the thresholds were wholly of that metal, stone being very rare, and perhaps less durable. These gates were guarded by images of bulls and giant serpents or composite dragons of the same metal. Nebuchadrezzar also built a wall on the E. bank of the Euphrates, with 4,000 cubits (800 ft.) thick, called "the mountain" to prevent the approach of an enemy. This wall also had cedar gates covered with copper. An additional defense made by him was an enormous lake, "like unto the broad sea to cross," which was kept in by embankments.

The royal palaces next claimed the great king's attention. The palace in which Nabopolassar had lived, and wherein, in all probability, Nebuchadrezzar had passed his younger days, had suffered from the floods when the river was high. The foundations of this extensive edifice, which extended from the wall called Imur-Enil to Libb-Shēghā, the eastern canal, and from the banks of the Euphrates to Aa-bur-sabū, the festi- val-street, were thoroughly repaired with burnt brick and bitumen, and the doorways, which had become too low in consequence of the raising of that street, were raised to a suitable height. He caused the whole to tower aloft, as he has it, "mountainlike" (suggesting a building more than one story high). The roof of this palace was built of cedar, and the doors were of the same wood covered with bronze. Their thresholds, as in other cases, were broad, and the interior of the palace was decorated with gold, silver, precious stones and other costly material.

Four hundred and ninety cubits from Némitti-Enil lay, as the king says, the principal wall, Imur-Enil, and in order to guarantee the former against attack, he built two strong embankments, and an outer wall "like a mountain," with a great building between which served both as a fortress and a palace, and attached to the old palace built by his father. According to Nebuchadrezzar's account, which is confirmed, really, as Herodotus states, straight, and arranged at right angles, this was probably outside the walls of the ancient (inner) city, and most likely due to some wise Bab king or ruler. Details of the streets have been obtained at the point called Merkes (sec. 22) and elsewhere, and seem to show that the Babylonians liked the rooms of their houses to be square. Such streets as slanted were therefore full of rectangles, and must have presented a quite peculiar appearance.

It is this inner city which has most attracted the attention of explorers, both English and German, and it is on its site that the latter have carried on their systematic excavations. Indeed, it is probable that the houses of the most numerous class of the people—artisans, merchants, workmen, etc.—lay outside the walls to which the Bab royal inscriptions refer. It may be supposed that the houses in this district were mainly low buildings of unbaked clay (of which, indeed, portions of the temples and palaces were built), and these would naturally disappear more easily than if they had been built of baked brick. Even when baked, however, the brick-built ruins of Babylon and Assyria have a tendency to disappear, owing to the value which bricks, both baked and unbaked, have for the erection of new houses in the neighborhood. Concerning the extent of the exterior city much doubt naturally exists, but it may well have covered the tract attributed to it (see sec. 3, above). Nineveh, at the time of its prosperity, also had enormous suburbs (see Ninveh).

The ruins of Babylon lie between 80 and 90 kilometers (50 miles or less) from Bagdad. The first thing seen on approaching them is the broad high ridge of Babil, which marks the site of the ruins of the Northern Palace. After some time, the ruins of The Eastern Walls are still several yards high, and slope down gently to the plain. Starting to the N. of Babil, the wall stretches for about 875 yds. due E., and then runs southwards for another 390 yds., taking at that point a course to the S.E. for about 2 miles 160 yds. (3,500 meters). A wide gap occurs here, after which it runs to the S.W., and is lost in the open fields at the end of about 1$^{1/2}$ miles (2 kilometers). "That this is the old city-wall," says Weissbach, "there can be no doubt, and the name Sur, 'city-wall,' given it by the Arabs, proves that they have fully recognized its nature. At the northern end it exists in its original extent, the plain out of which it rises being the old bed of the Euphrates, which, in the course of the centuries, has become filled up by the desert sand. At the period of Babylon's glory, the river had a much straighter course than at present, but it reoccupies its old bed about 600 meters (656 yds.) S. of Babil, leaving it afterward to make a sharp bend to the W. From the point where the city wall first becomes recognizable on the N. to its apparent southernmost extremity is about 3 miles. On the W. side of the river the traces of the wall are much less, the two angles, with the parts adjoining them, being all that is recognizable. Beginning on the N. where the Euphrates has reached its midpoint in its course through the city, it runs westward about 547 yds. (500 meters) W.S.W., and then, bending almost at a right angle S.S.E., turns E. again toward the Euphrates, but is lost in the plain before reaching the river. The distance of the two angles from each other is about 1 mile, 205 yds. (1,800 meters), and its distance from the Euphrates is at most \( \frac{1}{2} \) of a mile (1 kilometer). The western portion of the city therefore formed a rectangle with an area of about 1.5 square miles and a perimeter of about 208 miles. According to Fried. Dohle, the size of Babylon was about the same as Munich or Dresden. This, of course, is an estimate from the extent remains—as has been indicated above, there was probably a large suburban extension beyond the walls, which would account for the enormous size attributed to the city by the ancients.

Among the Arabs, the northern ruin is called Babil, though it is only the remains of a palace. Its present height is 30 meters (98 ft.), and its rectangular outline is still easily recognizable. Its sides face the cardinal points, the longest being those of the N. and S. This building, which measures 100 meters (109 yds.) by 50 meters (55 yds.), was well protected by the city wall on the N. and E., the Euphrates protecting it on the W. Continuing to the S., the path at present leads through orchards and palm groves, beyond which is a rugged tract evidently containing the remains of ancient structures, probably of considerable height. After further palm groves, an enormous ruin is encountered, steep on the E. and S., sloping on the N. and W. This is the Qasr (Qasr), also called Emjellibeh (Mujelleh), "the overturned," identical with the great palace of Nabopolassar and his son Nebuchadrezzar, referred to so prominently by the latter king in his records. Its longest side skirts the old Euphrates bed, and measures 300 meters (330 yds.). Its surface is very uneven, projections of 15 meters (over 49 ft.) alternating with deep depressions. On the N.W. side enormous walls of exceedingly hard yellow brick still tower to a considerable height. S. of this the plain, broken only by a few incon siderable mounds, extends for a distance of half a kilometer (\( \frac{1}{2} \) mile), and terminates on the S. with another enormous ruin-mound, called Ishan Amran ibn 'Ali. It measures 600 meters (656 yds.) from N. to S., and 400 (437 yds.) from E. to W., its average height being 25 meters (82 ft.). About the middle, and close to each other, are two Moslem domed tombs, the first called Ibrahim al-Khalil ("Abraham the Friend" [of God]—probably a late addition to the name of another Abraham than the Patriarch), and the other Amran ibn 'Ali, from which the ruin receives its modern name.

Near the S. termination of the plain on which the village of Jim-jimeh lies, there is a square depression several yards deep, measuring nearly 100 meters (over 100 yds.) each way. The Site of Babylon's Great Tower is in the middle of this depression, the sides of which do not quite face the cardinal points, there rises, to a height of about 13 ft., a platform of sun-dried brick about 60 meters (197 ft.) each way, its sides being parallel with the outer boundary of the depression. This depression, at present called Sahah, "the dish," is partly filled with foundation water. Centered in its southern side is a rectangular hollowing-out similarly formed, about 50 meters (164 ft.) long, extending toward the ruin called Amran.

The Qasr and Emjellibeh are several mounds bearing the name of Ehmerch, so called from the principal mound on the S.E. named Tirmun al-Othmar, "the red ruin," from the color of its bricks. Close to the S.E. corner of the Qasr lies the ruin called Merkes, "the central-point," and to the S. of that again is a long and irregularly shaped mound bearing the name of Iṣhān al-Aswad, "the black ruin." From this enumeration of the principal remains on the site of Babylon, it will be easily seen that public buildings in this, the most ancient quarter of the city, were exceedingly numerous. Indeed, the district was regarded as being of such importance that the surrounding walls were not thought altogether sufficient to protect it, so another seemingly isolated rampart, on the E., was built, running N. and S., as an additional protection.

The remains on the western side of the river are insignificant, the changed course of the river being in all probability responsible for the destruction of at least some of the buildings. There is much work to be done before a really been seen when taking a walk through Babylon the more interesting portion, which, as we know from Herodotus' narratives, could be visited by strangers, though it is possible that permission had to be obtained beforehand. Entering by the Uraš-gate, some distance to the E. of the Euphrates, one found oneself in Aa-ibur-šabú-street. This was the continuation of the royal roadway without the inner wall, coming from the S. This street ran alongside the Arābytu canal, on its western bank. After a time, one had the small temple of Ninip on the right (on the other side of the canal), and E-ṣagila, the great temple of Belus, on the left. This celebrated shrine was dedicated to Merodach and other deities associated with him, notably his spouse Zer-pantum (= Juno), and Nebu, "the teacher," probably as the one who inaugurated Merodach's faith. The shrine of Merodach therein, which was called E-sagila, is said by Nebuchadrezzar to have been magnificently decorated, and into the temple itself that king had caused to be brought many costly gifts, acquired by him in the lands over which he had dominion. Connected with E-sagila on the N.W. by a causeway and probably a staircase, was the great temple-tower E-tumon-an-ki, which, as is indicated above, is not now represented by a tower, but by a depression in the surface. This is said to be the site of the Hindiyeh canal. This great building was a striking monument of the city, and must have been visible for a considerable distance, its height being something over 300 ft. The stages of the tower, which had to have been colored like those of the similar tower laid bare by the French excavations at Khorsabad (Dur-Šarru-ukin) in Assyria. Causeways or streets united this building with Aa-ibur-šabú, the festival-street along which the traveler is supposed to be proceeding. Continuing to the N., the visitor crossed a canal at right angles, named Libibi-hegali, "may he [the god] bring fertility," and found himself immediately opposite the royal palace, the extensive building now known as the Qasr. According to Weissbach, its area occupied no less than 4½ hectares (rather more than 11 acres) and it was divided, as we know from the inscriptions of Nebuchadrezzar, into two parts, connected by a corridor. The building was richly decorated, as the Babylonians understood such things, the interior walls being lined with enameled brick and other material.

Passing along the western side of the palace, the visitor came to the Istar-gate—a large doorway faced with enameled brick in Nebuchadrezzar's time, and decorated with colored enameled reliefs of the lion, the bull and the dragon of Babylon. On the right of this gateway was to be seen the temple of the goddess Nin-mah, Merodach's spouse—a temple of sun-dried brick with traces of white coloring. It was a celebrated shrine of the Babylonians, in the usual architectural style with recessed buttresses, but modest from our modern point of view. Nin-mah was the goddess of reproduction, who, under the name of Aruru, had aided Merodach in the attainment of the honor in which she was held by the Babylonians.

The Istar-gate was apparently a part of the more ancient fortifications of Babylon, but which portion of the primitive city it enclosed is doubtful. In the time of Nebuchadrezzar it pierced the continuation, as it were, of the wall on the western bank of the river. Passing through this gateway, the visitor saw, on the W., the "middle-palace," an enormous structure, built by Nebuchadrezzar, as he boasts, in 15 days—a statement which seems somewhat of an exaggeration, when we come to consider the massiveness of the walls, some of which have a thickness of several yards. He describes this as having been "a fortress" (ādur), "mountainlike" (sadaniš), and on its summit he built an abode for himself—a "great palace," which was joined with his father's palace on the S. of the intervening wall. It is possible that in the 10th or 11th days he did not the whole structure, including the fortresses. It was raised "high as the forests," and decorated with cedar and all kinds of costly woods, its doors being of palm, cedar, cypress, ebony(?) and ivory, framed in silver and gold, and plated with copper. The thresholds and hinges of its gates were bronze, and the cornice round its top was in an imitation of lapis-lazuli. It was a house for men to admire; and it is not improbable that this was the palace upon which he was regarding as he was walking when he referred to "great Babylon," which he had built.

But the street Aa-ibur-šabú, along which the visitor is conceived to be walking, was also a highly decorated causeway, fitted for the pathway of the great gods. Its width varied from 11 to 22 yds., and it was paved with regularly hewn and fitted natural stones—limestone and a brownish-red stone with white veins, and its walls were provided with a covering of brick enameled in various colors with representations of lions, some of them in relief. The inscriptions which it bore were white on a rich dark-blue ground, also enameled. These reliefs were seen in Babylon, but these have still to be identified.

At the end of the Procession-street, and at right angle to it, was the Merodach canal, which communicated directly with the Euphrates. At this point also, and forming its end-portion, was the Chamber of the Fates (Parak ānātu), where, yearly, the oracles were asked and declared. In close connection with this was the Temple of Offerings (Bīt nēba) or festival-house (Bīt āšīt). Concerning these places little is needed, but it would seem that, before Nebuchadrezzar's time, the Chamber of Fates was simply decorated with silver—he, however, made it glorious with pure gold. It is at this point that the Procession-street is at its widest. The position of the Temple of Offerings is at present uncertain.

What may have lain on the other side of the Arābytu-canal, which here made a bend to the N.W., and flowed out of the Euphrates some time later, we do not know. In the extreme N. of the city was the palace now represented by the ruin of the Northern Palace and the Gardens called Babil. This was likewise built by Nebuchadrezzar, but it may be doubted whether it was really founded by him.
The presence of traces of wells here made Hormuzd Rassam think that this was probably the site of the Hanging Gardens, but further exploration is needed to decide the point, though it may be regarded as not unlikely that this identification is correct. A well-known series of columns shown in the Assyrian saloon at the British Museum—a building apparently protected by three walls, and adorned with columns resting on the backs of lions in an attitude of walking. On the adjoining slab is a representation of a small building—columns with columns—on a hill. A figure of a king sculptured on a stele is seen on the left, with an altar in front of it, showing that divine honors were paid to him. The hill is thickly wooded with trees which may be olives, poplars, etc., and on the right is a series of arches on which other trees are planted. Irrigation channels stretch in a long stream to the left and in shorter streams to the right. As this belongs to the time of Assur-bani-apli, about 650 BC, and refers to that king's operations against his brother Samas-sum-ukin, the king of Babylon, it is clear that something similar to the Hanging Gardens existed before the time of Nebuchadrezzar, and therefore, if it was his queen who had them made, before the time of their reputed founder. This would be the first reach by the Assyrian army when advancing to the attack. Such a park as is represented here with its hills and streams, and thickly planted trees, must have made the palace in the vicinity the pleasantest, in all probability, in all Babylonian, at least the admiration of every one who visited the sights of the city.

The architectural history of the city of Babylon has still to be written, but something is already known about it, especially its central point of interest, the temple E-sagila, wherein Merodach was worshipped. The 5th year of Sumu-la-ila was known as that in which the great fortress of Babylon was built; and his 22d year was that in which a throne of gold and silver was completed and made for Merodach's supreme abode (parnawra). Later on Abil-Sin, in his 17th year, made a throne (?) for Samas of Babylon; and Hammurabi, in his 3rd, 12th and 14th years, also made thrones for the gods Nannar of Babylon (the Moon-god) and Zeb-pantun, Merodach's consort and listar of Babylon. Samas-iluna, his son, in his 6th year, placed a "praying statue" in E-sagila before Merodach, followed, in his 8th, by the dedication of some bright-shining object (mace?) of gold and silver, to the god; and on that occasion it is stated that he made E-sagila to shine like the stars of heaven. Passing over many other references to kings who adorned the temples of the city, the work done there by Agukakrine (circa 1480 BC) may be mentioned. This ruler, who belonged to the Kassite dynasty, not only brought back the images of Merodach and Zeb-pantun to their temple, but also restored the building and its shrine, and made rich offerings thereto. Later on, after the destruction of the city by Sennacherib, his son Esarhaddon, and his grandson Samas-sum-ukin, king of Babylon, and Assur- bani-apli, king of Assyria, all took part in the restoration of Babylon's temples and palaces. The work of Nabopolasar and Nebuchadrezzar has already been referred to. In 330 BC (reign of Alexander the Great), an attempt was made to clear away the rubbish around E-sagila (E-sagila), but to all appearance no real restorations were made—or, at least, the stage at which they could have been put in hand was not reached. In the year 269 BC Antiochus Soter claims, like Nebuchadrezzar and other Bab kings, to have restored the temples E-sagila and E-zida (the latter at Borsippa). Though in late times the temples were more or less dilapidated, the services to all appearance continued to be performed, and may even have gone on until well in the Christian era. The temple E-sagila was definitely held in honor as late as the 4th cent. The downfall of Babylon as a city began with the founding of Seleucia on the Tigris, in the reign of Seleucus Nicator (after 312 BC). The inhabitants of Babylon soon began to move to this new site, and the ruined houses and walls of the old capital ultimately became the haunts of robbers and outlaws. It is said that the walls were demolished by later ( Seleucid) kings on that account, and it is not improbable that, with the walls of Babylon, however, remained habitable were cleared away. Fortunately, the palaces restored by Nebuchadrezzar were too firmly built to be easily demolished, hence their preservation to the present day.

which is probably, but as these structures were of no great height, it is possible that, in the clear atmosphere of the Bab plains, there was no real necessity to go above the surface of the earth when making their observations.

There has been much difference of opinion as to the geographical position of the Tower of Babel. Most writers upon the subject, following the tradition handed down by the Jews and the Christians, have identified the tithe of the plains, or near away, the rubbish around E-sagila (E-sagila), but to all appearance no real restorations were made—or, at least, the stage at which they could have been put in hand was not reached. In the year 269 BC Antiochus Soter claims, like Nebuchadrezzar and other Bab good reason that it was not situated in Babylon, but in Borsippa, which, though called, in later times, "the second Babylon," was naturally not the original city of that name. The erection regarded by the Babylonians as the great Tower of their ancient city was E-temen-anak, "the Temple of the foundation of heaven and earth," called by Nabopolassar and Nebuchadrezzar ziggurat Babel, "the Tower of Babylon"—the world-renowned fane dedicated to Merodach and his consort Zer-pa-niitu, Babylon's chief deities. This structure was situated in the southern portion of the city, not far from the right bank of the Euphrates, and according to Weissbach, is now represented by a depression within which is the original rectangular core of unburnt brick. From its shape, the Arabs have made this site Sahânah, "the dish." These remains of the great temple-tower of Babylon, within the memory of men not so very old, towered, even in its ruined state, high above the surrounding plain. The burnt bricks of the ancient Babylonians, however, who "had brick for stone, and slime [bitumen] for mortar" (11 3 m), are still good and have a commercial value, so they were all cleared out, with whatever precious material in the way of antiquities they may have contained, to repair, it is said, the banks of the Hindiyeh Canal. Certain records in the shape of conical "cylinders," however, came into the market, and were acquired by the museums of Europe and America. As these refer to the restoration of the building by Nabopolassar, and the part taken by his son Nebuchadrezzar and Nabû-sum-bîlîrîn in the ceremonies attending the rebuilding, it is very probable that they formed part of the spoils acquired.

E-temen-anak, to give the Bab (Sumerian) name, consisted of six stages built upon a platform, and provided with a sanctuary at the top. A tablet seemingly giving a detailed description of this building was for a time in the hands of the late George Smith in the year 1876. Unfortunately he had not time to give a translation of the document, or to publish the text, but his detailed account of it (Athenaeum, February 12, 1876) is exceedingly interesting. First there was the outer court called the "grand court," measuring, according to G. Smith's estimate, 1,156 ft. by 900 ft. and a smaller one, called "the court of Istar and Zagaga," 1,056 ft. by 450 ft. Round the court were six gates admitting to the temples: (1) the grand gate; (2) the gate of the rising sun (east); (3) the great gate; (4) the gate of the colossi; (5) the gate of the canal; and (6) the gate of the tower-view. After this came a space or platform apparently walled—a ki-galûu square in form, and measuring 5 ku each way. Its size is doubtful, and that of the ku, unknown. The sides of this inclosure faced the cardinal points. In its walls were four gates, one on each side, and named from the points toward which they looked. Within this inclosure stood a large building measuring 10 gar (Smith: 200 ft.) each way. Unfortunately, the name of this erection was damaged, so that its nature and use are uncertain. Round the base of the Tower were small temples or chapels dedicated to the various gods of the Babylonians. On the E. were 16 shrines, the principal of them being shrines to Nebo and Tashmetû, his wife, and shrines to the two great gods, Anu and Bel (Enlil). It was on the W., however, that the principal buildings lay—a double house with a court between the wings 35 cubits (Smith: 58 ft.) wide. These two wings were not alike in dimensions, the erection on one side being 100 cubits by 20 (166 ft. by 34 ft.) and on the other 100 cubits by 65 (166 ft. by 108 ft.). In these western chambers stood the couch of the god, and the golden throne mentioned by Herodotus, with other objects of great value. The couch was stated to have measured 9 cubits by 4 (15 ft. by 6 ft. 8 in.).

In the center of these groups of buildings stood the great Tower in stages, called by the Babylonians "the Tower of Babel" (ziqqurat Babel). The stages decreased from the lowest upward, but each was square in plan. The first or foundation-stage was 15 gar each way by 51 gar high (300 ft. by 110 ft. high), and seems to have been decorated with the usual double recesses which are a characteristic of Assy-Bab architecture.

The second stage was 13 gar square and 3 gar high (260 ft. by 60 ft.). A term was applied to it which G. Smith did not understand, but he notes that it probably had sloping sides. The stages from the third to the fifth were all of equal height, namely, 1 gar (20 ft.), and were respectively 50 gar (200 ft.), 83 gar (170 ft.) and 7 gar (140 ft.) square. The dimensions of the sixth stage were omitted, but may be restored in accordance with the others, namely, 51 gar sq. (110 ft.) by 1 gar (20 ft.) high.

On this was raised what Smith calls the 7th stage, namely, the upper temple or sanctuary of the god Bel-Merodach, 4 gar long, 51 gar broad and 2½ gar high (80, 60 and 50 ft. respectively). He does not mention the statue of the god, but it may be supposed that it was set up in this topmost erection. The total height of the tower above its foundation was therefore 15 gar (300 ft.), same as the breadth of its base. It cannot be said that it was by any means a beautiful erection, but there was probably some symbolism in its measurements, and in appearance it probably resembled the winds and the temple-towers of Nineveh. The tower of Calah as restored in the facsimile to Layard's Monuments of Nineveh, 1st series, in which a step-pyramid with a similarly high basement-stage is shown.

With this detailed description, which is quite what would be expected in a Bab account of such a celebrated fame, the description in Herodotus (i.181 ft) agrees. He states that it was a temple square in form, two furlongs (1,213 ft.) each way, in the midst of which was built a solid tower a furlong square (nearly 607 ft.). This, however, must have been the platform, which, with the six stages and the chapel on the top, would make up the total of eight stages of which Herodotus speaks. The ascent by which the top was reached he describes as running ‘outside round about all the towers’—wording which suggests, though not necessarily, that it was spiral—i.e. one had to walk round and start upwards 7 times to reach the top. Representations on Bab sculptured stones suggest that this view would be correct, though a symmetrical arrangement of inclined paths might have been constructed which would have greatly improved the design. At the middle of the ascent, Herodotus says, there was a stepped-place where the seats to rest upon, which rather favours this idea.

At the top of the last tower there was a large cell, and in the cell a large couch was laid, well covered; and by it a golden table. There was another there, made any human being spend the night there except only a woman of the native of the place chosen by the god, ‘as say the Chaldeans who are the priests of this god.’ These men told Herodotus that the god often came to the cell, and rested upon the couch, ‘but,’ he adds, ‘I do not believe them.’ After mentioning parallels to this at Egyp Thebes and Patara in Lycia, he goes on to speak of another cell below (that referred to in G. Smith’s tablet) wherein was a great image of Zeus (Bel-Marduk) sitting, with a footstool and a large table, all of gold, and weighing no less than 800 talents. Outside of this cell was an altar to the god, made of gold; and also another altar, wherein full-grown animals were sacrificed, the gold altar being set up in the midst of the building, a statue 12 cubits high, and of solid gold. Darius Hystaspis desired to take possession of this valuable object, but did not venture. His son Xerxes, however, was not so considerate of the feelings of the people and the priesthood, for he also killed the priest when he forbade him to meddle with it.

The Bible record does not state who the people were who journeyed in the East and built the city and the Tower. The indefinite ‘they’ might be taken to mean whatever people were there at the time the record was written, and probably presupposes that the reader would certainly know. It is possible that the builders referred to belonged to that race. It is noteworthy that nothing is said in Gen concerning the stoppage of the building works and the destruction of the city. ### 11. Herodotus’ Description

Herodotus agrees that it was a temple square in form, two furlongs (1,213 ft.) each way, in the midst of which was built a solid tower a furlong square (nearly 607 ft.). This, however, must have been the platform, which, with the six stages and the chapel on the top, would make up the total of eight stages of which Herodotus speaks. The ascent by which the top was reached he describes as running ‘outside round about all the towers’—wording which suggests, though not necessarily, that it was spiral—i.e. one had to walk round and start upwards 7 times to reach the top. Representations on Bab sculptured stones suggest that this view would be correct, though a symmetrical arrangement of inclined paths might have been constructed which would have greatly improved the design. At the middle of the ascent, Herodotus says, there was a stepped-place where the seats to rest upon, which rather favours this idea.

At the top of the last tower there was a large cell, and in the cell a large couch was laid, well covered; and by it a golden table. There was another there, made any human being spend the night there except only a woman of the native of the place chosen by the god, ‘as say the Chaldeans who are the priests of this god.’ These men told Herodotus that the god often came to the cell, and rested upon the couch, ‘but,’ he adds, ‘I do not believe them.’ After mentioning parallels to this at Egyp Thebes and Patara in Lycia, he goes on to speak of another cell below (that referred to in G. Smith’s tablet) wherein was a great image of Zeus (Bel-Marduk) sitting, with a footstool and a large table, all of gold, and weighing no less than 800 talents. Outside of this cell was an altar to the god, made of gold; and also another altar, wherein full-grown animals were sacrificed, the gold altar being set up in the midst of the building, a statue 12 cubits high, and of solid gold. Darius Hystaspis desired to take possession of this valuable object, but did not venture. His son Xerxes, however, was not so considerate of the feelings of the people and the priesthood, for he also killed the priest when he forbade him to meddle with it.

The Bible record does not state who the people were who journeyed in the East and built the city and the Tower. The indefinite ‘they’ might be taken to mean whatever people were there at the time the record was written, and probably presupposes that the reader would certainly know. It is possible that the builders referred to belonged to that race. It is noteworthy that nothing is said in Gen concerning the stoppage of the building works and the destruction of the city. ### 12. The Builders of the Tower

The indefinite ‘they’ might be taken to mean whatever people were there at the time the record was written, and probably presupposes that the reader would certainly know. It is possible that the builders referred to belonged to that race. It is noteworthy that nothing is said in Gen concerning the stoppage of the building works and the destruction of the city. Bochart records a Jewish tradition which makes the tower to have been split through to its foundation by fire which fell from heaven and suggested it to the builders of the tower of the second Babylon,” i.e. the Birs Nimroud. Another tradition, recorded by Eusebius (Prep. Evang., ix; Chronicon, 13; Synca. Chron., 44) makes it to have been blown down by the winds; “but when it approached the heavens, the winds, assisted by the temple winds, work upon its contrivers: and the gods introduced a diversity of tongues among men, who, until that time, had all spoken the same language.” The place where they built the Tower was called Babylon, on account of the confusion of languages. Here we have again the statement as in Gen that the meaning of Babylon is “confusion.” This, as is well known, of “Bab” is based upon the purely Heb etymological law, which makes bâb, “to confuse,” or “mingle,” assume a reduplicate form; but as far as the cuneiform inscriptions, which are now very numerous, give us information, Babylon, from bâbât, “to mingle” (the root in question), was an impossibility. But on the Bab side, that the rendering of the name as Bâb-lî (šûm-lî), “gate of god!” (“of the gods”) was a folk-etymology, is undoubted, notwithstanding that the Sumerico-Akkadian form ka-dingiru, with the same meaning, is far from trustworthy. It is not at one of the forms used by Nebuchadrezzar is Babîlum, with the mimmination or “emming,” which is a characteristic of the Bab language; moreover, a place-name Babâlam also occurs, which may be a still earlier word, perhaps that with the emmition-breaking out in emminence. But notwithstanding that one would like to see in Babûlam, “the place of bringing together,” and in Babîlam, “the bringer together,” the termination -am would seem to be an insurmountable difficulty.

That the building of the Tower was stopped when the confusion of tongues took place is natural—the departure of the greater part of the inhabitants made this inevitable. When the population increased again, the building of the city was continued, with the result that the Tower Babylon ultimately became the greatest city of the then known world. The Tower, notwithstanding what had been said as to its destruction, remained, and when, as happened from time to time, its condition became ruinous, some energetic Bab king would restore it. Alexander and Philip of Macedon began clearing away the rubbish to rebuild the great temple of Belus (Bel-Marduk) at Babylon, which had been destroyed in the midst of the building, a statue 12 cubits high, and of solid gold. Darius Hystaspis desired to take possession of this valuable object, but did not venture. His son Xerxes, however, was not so considerate of the feelings of the people and the priesthood, for he also killed the priest when he forbade him to meddle with it.

13. Traditions Concerning Its Destruction

Concerning the reputed intention of the builders of the Tower, to carry it as high as the heavens, that, notwithstanding the Talm and other writings, may be dismissed at once. The intention was to build a very high tower, and that is all that Heaven is implied by the words employed. That the Babylonians would have liked their tower to reach heaven may be conceded, and the idea may be taken as symbolic of Babylon’s pride, the more especially as they regarded it as “the house of the foundation of heaven and earth.” Though at present brought lower than the other temple-towers of Babylonia, its renown remains as one of the great glories of the national. Dedicated temples to the gods whom they worshipped, and chiefly to the glory of Merodach, the representative of Bab monotheism, the Babyloni-ans' descendants, the native Christians, have no reason to remember this erection of their forefathers with shame, but rather with pride. The rallying-point of nations, Babylon, while it existed, was always a commercial center and many are the languages which have resounded in the Tower's vicinity. The confusion of tongues led to the Jewish fiction that the air of Babylon and Borsippa caused forgetfulness, and was therefore injurious to students of the Law, causing them to forget it as the builders of the Tower had of old forgotten their speech (Rashi, Sanhedrin, 109, 1). This, however, did not prevent the rabbis of Babylon from being more celebrated than those of the Holy Land, and even of Jerus. itself. See also Astronomy.

BABYLON IN THE NT. Babylon (Bab古典, Babylon), is used in NT in at least two different senses:

1. Mesopotamian

All the references to Babylon in Rev are evidently symbolic. Some of the most important passages are 14 8; 16 19; 17 5; 18 20-21. In 17 5 Babylon is designated as mysterioriam. This undoubtedly indicates that the name is to be understood further.

2. Symbolic in fig.

A few interpreters have be- lieved that Jerus. was the city that was designated as Babylon, but most schol- ars hold that Rome was the city that was meant. That interpretation goes back at least to the time of Tertullian (Ad. Marc., iii.13). This interpretation was adopted by Jerome and Augustine and has been commonly accepted by the church. There are some striking facts which point to Rome as the city that is designated as Babylon.

(1) The characteristics ascribed to this Babylon apply to Rome rather than to any other city of that age: (a) as ruling over the kings of the earth (17 18); (b) as sitting on seven mountains (17 9); (c) as the center of the world's merchandise (18 3-11); (d) as the corrupter of the nations (17 5; 18 19); (e) as the persecutor of the saints (17 6).

(2) Rome is designated as Babylon in the Sibyl- line Oracles (E 143), and this is perhaps an early Jewish portion of the book. The comparison of Rome to Babylon is common in Jewish apocalyptic literature (see 2 Esd and the Apoc Bar).

(3) Rome was regarded by both Jews and Chris- tians as being antagonistic to the kingdom of God, and its downfall was confidently expected. This conviction is in accord with the predicted downfall of Babylon (Rev 14 8; 18 20-21). As Babylon had been the oppressor of Israel, it was natural that this new power, which was oppressing the people of God, should be designated as Babylon.

In 5 13 Babylon is designated as the place from which 1 Pet was written. Down to the time of the Reformation this was generally under- stood.

In 1 Peter stood to mean Rome, and two cursives added "en Romm." Since the Reforma- tion, many scholars have followed Erasmus and Calvin and have urged that the Mesop Babylon is meant. Three theories should be noted:

(1) That the Egyptian Babylon, or Old Cairo, is meant. Strabo (XVII, 807) who wrote as late as 18 AD, says the Egyptian Babylon was a strong for- tress, founded by certain refugees from the Mesop Babylon. But during the 1st cent. this was not much more than a military station, and it is quite improbable that Peter would have gone there. There is no tradition that connects Peter in any way with Egypt.

(2) That the statement is to be taken lit. and that the Mesop Babylon is meant. Many good scholars hold to this view, and among these are Weiss and Thayer, but there is no evidence that Peter was ever in Babylon, or that there was even a city of that name. Mark and Silvanus are associated with Peter in the letter and there is no tradition that connects either of them with Babylon. According to Jos (Ant, XVIII, ix, 5-9), the Jews at this time had largely been driven out of Babylon and were confined to neighboring towns, and it seems improbable that Peter would have made that his missionary field.

(3) That Rome was the city that was design- ated as Babylon. The Apocalypse would indi- cate that the churches would understand the symbolic reference, and it seems to have been so understood until the time of the Reformation. The denial of this position was in line with the effort to refute Peter's supposed connection with the Church. Ancient tradition makes it seem quite probable that Peter did make a visit to Rome (see Lightfoot, Clement, II, 493 ff).

Internal evidence helps to substantiate the theory that Rome was the place from which the letter was written. Mayrk sends greetings (1 Pet 5 13), and we know he had been summoned to Rome by the apostle Paul (2 Tim 4 11). The whole passage, "She that is in Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you," seems to be fig., and that being true, it is natural that Babylon should have been used instead of Rome. The character of the letter as a whole would point to Rome as the place of writing. Ramsay thinks this book is impregnated with Rom thought beyond any other book in the Bible (see The Church in the Rom Empire, 286).

Babylonia is a plain which is made up of the alluvial deposits of the mountainous regions in the North, where the Tigris and Euphrates have their sources. The land is bounded on the N. by Assyria and Mesopotamia; on the E. by Elam, separated by the mountains of Elam; on the S. by the sea marshes, and the country Kaldu (Chaldaea); and on the W. by the Syrian desert. Some of the cities of the lower Euphrates were ancient in the early period, but now are far inland. This land-making process continues even at the present time at the rate of about 70 ft. a year.

This plain, in the days when Babylonia flourished, sustained a dense population. It was covered with a network of canals, skillfully planned and regulated, which brought prosperity to the land, because of the wonderful fertility of the soil. The neglect of these canals and doubtless, also, the change of climate, have resulted in altered conditions in the country. It has become a cheerless waste. During some months of the year, when the inundations take place, large portions of the land are partially covered with swamps and marshes. At other times it looks like a desolate plain.

Throughout the land there are seen, at the present time, ruin-hills or mounds of accumulation of débris, which mark the site of ancient cities.

1. Mounds Some of these cities were destroyed in a very early era, and were never rebuilt. Others were occupied for millenniums, and their history extends far into the Christian era. The antiquities generally found in the upper stratum of the mounds which were occupied up to so late a period, show that they were generally inhabited by the Jews, who lived there after the Babylonians had disappeared.

The excavations conducted at various sites have resulted in the discovery, besides antiquities of almost every character, of hundreds of thousands of inscriptions on clay and stone, but principally on the former material. At Tello more than 60,000 tablets were found, belonging largely to the administrative archives of the temple of the 3d millennium BC. At Nippur about 50,000 inscriptions were found, many of these also belonging to temple archives. But about 20,000 tablets and fragments found in that city came from the library of the school of the priests, which had been written in the 3d millennium BC. At Sippar, fully 30,000 tablets were found, many being of the same general character, also representing a library. At Delchem and Djojkha, temple archives of the same period as those found at Tello have come to light in great numbers, through the illicit diggings of Arabs. Babylon, Borsippa, Kish, Erech and many other cities have yielded to the explorer and the Arab diggers inscribed documents of every period of Bab history, and embracing almost every kind of lit., so that the museums and libraries of America and Europe have stored up unread inscriptions numbering hundreds of thousands. Many also are in the possession of private individuals. After the work of excavating Babylonia has been completed and the inscriptions deciphered, many of the pre-Christian cents, in Bab history will be better known than some of those of our Christian era. The ancient history of the Babylonians will be reconstructed by the help of these original sources. Lengthy family genealogies will be known, as indeed in some instances is now the case, as well as the Bab contemporaries of Ezekiel, Abraham and all the other Bib. characters.

2. Explorations The Gr name of Babylonia which is in use at the present time is derived from the name of the city of Babylon, the capital and chief city of the land from the time of the First Dynasty of Babylon, about 2000 BC (see Babylon). The name of the land in the very earliest period which is represented by antiquities, and even inscribed objects, is not known. But in a comparatively early age the northern part is called Uri, and the southern part, Engi or En-gira. The second part of the latter name is perhaps the same as in Su-gir, which is thought to be the origin of the OT Shutur. Su-gir and Su-mer are names of the same country. And inasmuch as Mer and Gir were names of the same west Sem deity, who played an important rôle in the early history of Babylonia, it is not improbable that the element Su is also to be identified with the ancient name of Mesopotamia. Su is also in Su-bartu, the name of the country to the N. This name is also written Su-Gir.

Subsequent to 2000 BC the ideograms read in Sumerian, Uri and Engi, were pronounced in Sem-Bab, Accad and Sumer. The former received its name from the capital of the kingdom Accad, one of the cities mentioned in Gen 10. 10. The title, “king of Accad and Sumer” was used by rulers as late as the 1st millennium BC.

The name by which the land is known in the 2d millennium BC is Kar-Duniash, the exact derivation of which is in doubt. Kar means “garden, land” in Sem and Sumerian; and Duniash being preceded by the determinative for deity, has been regarded as a name of a Canaanite god. A more recently advanced explanation is that Duniash is equivalent to Bal-matū, which means “lord of land in the Gr period was called Chaldaea.

THE HOME OF THE SEMITES

Two distinct races are found occupying the land

when we obtain the first glimpses of its history.

The northern part is occupied by the Semites, who are closely allied to the Amorites, Aramaeans and Arabs; and the southern part by a non-Sem people called Sumerians. Their cultures had been originally distinct, but when they first become known to us

there has taken place such an amalgamation that it is only by the knowledge of other Sem cultures that it is possible to make even a partial differentiation of what was Sem-Bab and what was Sumerian.

The Semites, it would almost seem, entered the land after the Sumerians had established themselves, but this can only be regarded as a conjecture.

Although the earliest Sumerian settlement belongs to a remote period, few traces of the pre-historic Sumerian have been found. The archaeological remains indicate that this non-Sem race is not indigenous to the land, and that when they came into the country they had already attained to a fair degree of culture. But there is no evidence, as yet, in what part of the ancient world the elements of their culture were evolved, although various attempts have been made by scholars to locate their original home.

The home of the Semites has been placed in different parts of the ancient world. A number of scholars look to Arabia and others

6. Home of to Africa for their original habitation, the Semites although their theories generally are not based upon much archaeological evidence. Unquestionably, the previous, if not the original home of the Sem Babylonians, is to be found in the land of the Amorites, that is in Syria.

In the earliest known period of Bab history, which apparently belongs to the age not very far removed from the time when the Semites entered Babylonia, Amurru was an important factor in the affairs of the nations, and it was a land which the world conquerors of Babylonia, both Sumerian and Sem, endeavored to subjugate. This points to the fact that the culture of Amurru was then already old.

Egypt inscriptions fully substantiate this. We look to the land of the Amorites as the home of the Sem

Babylonians, because of the important part played by the chief god of that land Amurru or Ur, in the Bab religion and nomenclature. In fact nearly all of the original names of the Sem Bab sun-deities are derived from the names and epithets of the great Sun-god of the Amorites and Aramaeans (see Amurru, 106 ff). These and many other considerations point to Amurru, or the land of the Amorites, as the previous home of the Semites who migrated into Babylonia and who eventually became masters of the

The original settlements in Babylonia, as stated above, belong to a prehistoric time, but throughout the history of the land fresh Sem migrations have been recognized. In the immigrations

Isin and First Dynasty of Babylonia,

Amorites or Canaanites seem to flood the country. In the 2d millennium a foreign people known as Cassites ruled Babylonia for nearly six centuries. The nomenclature of the period shows that many Hittites and Mittaneseans as well as Cassites lived in Babylonia. In the 1st millennium the thousands of names that appear in the contract list, indicate a veritable Babel of races: Egyptians, Elamites, Persians, Medes, Tabalites, Hittites, Canaanites, Amorites, and others. Only peoples are among the peoples that occupied the land. The deportation of the Israelites by the Assyrian kings and of the Jews by the Bab kings, find confirmation besides the historical inscriptions in the names of Hebrews living in Babylonia in the corresponding periods.

The languages of Babylonia are Sem and Sumerian. The latter is an agglutinative tongue like the Turkish, and belongs to that great unclassifiable group of languages, called for the sake of convenience, Turanian. It has not been shown, as yet, to be allied to any other known language.

The Sem language known as the Bab, with which the Assyrian is practically identical, is of the common Sem stock. After the Semites entered the land, their language was greatly influenced by the Semarian tongue. The Semites being originally dependent upon the Semarian scribes, with whom the script had originated, considered in connection with the fact that the highly developed culture of the Semarians greatly influenced that of the Semites, brought about the peculiar amalgamation known as Bab. The language is, however, distinctively Sem, but it has a very large percentage of Semarian loan-words. Not knowing the cuneiform tongue of the Semarians, and having a poor understanding of the pronunciation of that language, it is impossible to ascertain, on the other hand, how much the Semarian language was influenced by the Sem. Castiglione states that another Sem stock influence was used extensively in the land. It was not because of the position occupied by the Arameans in the politi-cal history of western Asia, that their language became the lingua franca of the 1st millennium BC. It must have been on account of the widespread migrations of the people. In the time of Sennacherib it seems to have been used as the diplomatic language in Assyria as well as among the Hebrews, as the episode in 2 Kgs. 18:26 would show. Then we recall the story of Belshazzar, and the edicts of the late period referred to in the OT, which were in Aram. (Ezr 4:7, etc.). In Assyria and Babylonia, many contract tablets have been found with Aram. reference notes written in them, showing that this was the language of those who held the documents. The Hebrews after the exile used Aramaic. This would seem to point to Babylonia as the place where they learned the language. The Bab language and the cuneiform script continued to be used until the 3rd or 2nd cent. BC, and perhaps even later, but it seems that the Aram. had generally supplanted it, except as the literary and legal language. In short the tongue of the common people or the spoken language in all probability in the late period was Aramaic.

The cuneiform writing upon clay was used both by the Semarians and the Semites. Whether this script had its origin in the land, or in the earlier home of the Semarians, remains a question. It is now known that the Elamites, Hittites, and Chaldeans had their own system of writing as early as that of the earliest found in Babylonia; and perhaps it will be found that other ancient peoples, who are at the present unknown to us, also used the cuneiform script, and that Bab was using similar to that of an early time in Cappadocia. The Hittites and other peoples of that region also employed it. The origin of the use of clay as a writing material, therefore, is shrouded in mystery, but as stated above, the system used by the Semites in Babylonia was developed from the Semarian.

The script is not alphabetic, but ideographic and phonetic, in that respect similar to the Chinese. There are over 500 characters, each one of which has from one to many values. The combination of two or more characters also has many values. The compilation of the values of the different signs used in various periods by both the Sumerians and Assyrians numbers at the present about 25,000, and the number will probably reach 30,000.

The architecture of Babylonia is influenced by the fact that the building material, in this alluvial plain, had to be of brick, which was largely sun-dried, although in certain prosperous eras there is much evidence of kiln-dried bricks having been used. The baked brick used in the earliest period was the smallest ever employed, being about the size of the ordinary brick used at the present time. The size of the bricks in the era prior to the 3rd millennium varied from this to about 6 x 10 x 3 in. At Nippur, near the Tigris, Sargon and the Amor-Sin used a brick of the largest found, about 20 in. square, and about 4 in. in thickness. Following the operations of these kings at Nippur is the work of Ur-Engur, who used a brick about 14 in. square and nearly 4 in. in thickness. This size had been used at Tellu prior to Sargon's time, and was thereafter generally employed. It remained the standard size of brick throughout the succeeding centuries. Of Bab history. Adobes, of which the greater portion of the buildings were constructed, were usually double the thickness of kilndried bricks. The pillar made of bricks, as well as the pilaster constructed of the same material, seems to have come into use at a very early age, as is shown by the excavations at Tellu.

A large number of Bab builders had the brick makers employ brick stamps which gave their names and frequently their titles, besides the name of the temple for which the bricks were intended. These enable the excavator to determine who the builders or restorers were of the buildings uncovered. Naturally, in a building like the temple of Enlil at Nippur, inscribed bricks of many builders covering a period of over 2,000 years were found. These by the help of building inscriptions, which have been found, enable scholars to rewrite considerably the history of certain Bab temples.

The walls of the city were also built of clay bricks, principally adobe. The walls usually were of very great thickness.

Clay was also employed extensively in the manufacture of weights, seals, and playthings, such as animals, baby rattles, etc., and of inscriptions of every kind. Pottery, with the exception of the blue glaze employed in the late period, was usually plain, although some traces of painted pottery have been found. Although every particle of stone found in Babylonia was carried into the country, either by man or by inundations, still in certain periods it was used freely for statues, steles, votive objects, and in all periods for door sockets, weights and seal cylinders. Building operations in stone are scarcely known in Babylonia until perhaps the time of the greatest of all ancient builders, Nebuchadrezzar II, who laid a pavement in the causeway of Babylon, Aa-ibur-sabu, with blocks of stone from a mountain quarry. See BABYLON.

The sculpture of the Sumerians, although in most instances the hardest of materials was used, is one of the great achievements of their civilization. Enough examples have been found to trace the development of their art from comparatively rude reliefs of the archaic period to the finished sculpture of Gudea's time, 3d millennium BC, when it reached a high degree of excellence. The work of the sculpture of this age shows spirit and originality in many respects unique. In the earliest period the Babyloniens attempted the round, giving frequently the main figures in full face. The perfection of detail, in their efforts to render true to life, makes their modeling very superior in the history of art. The Sumerian seems to have been able to overcome difficulties of technique which later sculptors systematically avoided.

Practically every Babylonian had his own personal seal. How it is that the signature is used at the present time or rather as the little stamp upon which is engraved the name of the individual at the present time, in the Orient, to make an impression upon the letter which was written for him by a public scribe. Thousands of these ancient seals have been found. They were cut out of all kinds of stone and metal. The style in the early period was usually cylindrical, with a hole passing lengthwise through them. In the late period the signet was common used. Many of these gems were exquisitely cut by lapidaries of rare ability. Some of the very best work of this art belongs to the 3d millennium BC. The boldness in outline, and the action displayed are often remarkable. The most delicate saws, drills and other tools must have been employed by the early lapidist. Some of his early work is scarcely surpassed in the present age.

The gold and silver smiths of the early age have left us some beautiful examples of their art and skill. A notable one is the silver vase of Entemena of Lagash, mounted on a bronze pedestal, which stands on four feet. There is a votive inscription engraved about its neck. The bowl is divided into two compartments. On the upper are engraved seven heifers, and on the lower four eagles with extended wings, in some respects related to the totem or the coat of arms of Lagash. While attention to detail is too pronounced, yet the whole is well rendered and indicates remarkable skill, no less striking than the well-known work of their Egypt contemporaries. Bronze was also used extensively for works of art and utensils. Some remarkable specimens of this craft have been found at Tello.

In studying the magnificent remains of their art, one is thoroughly impressed with the skill displayed, and with the fact that there must have been a long period of development prior to the age to which these works belong, before such creations could have been possible. Although much of the craftsman's work is crude, there is considerable in the sculpture and engraving that is well worthy of study. And in studying these remains one is also impressed with the fact that they were produced in an alluvial plain.

11. Art

The literature in a narrow sense is almost entirely confined to the epics, which are of a religious character, and the psalms, hymns, incantations, omens, etc. These are the chief remains of their culture. See BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.

In a general sense almost every kind of literature is found among the hundreds of thousands of clay tablets unearthed in Babylonia. The inscribed votive objects are of all kinds and descriptions. The stone vase taken in booty was dedicated to the deity of the conqueror. The beautiful piece of lapis lazuli, agate, cornelian, etc., obtained, was inscribed and devoted in the same way. Slabs, tablets and cones of all shapes and sizes, were inscribed with the king's name and titles, giving the different cities over which he ruled and referring to the work that he had accomplished for his deity. From the decipherment of these votive objects much valuable data are gathered for the reconstruction of the ancient history of the land.

The same is true of what are known as building inscriptions, in which accounts of the operations of the kings in restoring and enlarging temples, shrines, walls and other city works are given. Canal digging and dredging, and such works by which the people benefited, are frequently mentioned in these inscriptions.

Epitaphic literature, for example, the royal letters of Hammurabi, the diplomatic correspondence found in Egypt (see TELL EL-AMARNA) or the royal letters from the Library of Ashurbanipal (see ASHURBANIPAL), as well as the private correspondence of the people, furnishes valuable historical and philological data.

The thousands of tablets found in the school libraries of Sippar and Nippur, as well as of the library of Ashurbanipal, among which are all kinds of inscriptions used in the schools of the priests and scribes, have furnished a great deal of material for the Assyrian dictionary, and have thrown much light upon the grammar of the language. The legal literature is of the greatest importance for an understanding of the social conditions of the people. It is also valuable for comparative purposes in studying the codes of other peoples. See Code of Hammurabi.

The commercial or legal transactions, dated in all periods, from the earliest times until the latest, also throw important light upon the social conditions of the people. Many thousands of these documents have been found, by the help of which the very life that pulsed in the streets of Babylonia is restored.

The administrative documents from the temple archives also have their value, in that they furnish important data as regards the maintenance of the temples and other institutions; and incidentally much light on the nationality and religion of the people, whose names appear in great numbers upon them. The records are receipts of taxes or rents from districts close by the temples, and of commercial transactions conducted with this revenue. A large portion of these archives consists of the salary payments of storehouse officials and priests. There seems to have been a host of tradesmen and functionaries in connection with the temple; but beside the priest, elder, seer, seeress, sorcerer, sorceress, singer, etc., there were the farmer, weaver, miller, carpenter, smith, butcher, baker, porter, overseer, scribe, measurer, watchman, etc. These documents give us an insight into the system of bookkeeping, and show how carefully the administrative affairs of the temple were conducted. In fact the temple was provided for and maintained along lines quite similar to many of our modern institutions.

The discovery of the Library of Ashurbanipal at Nineveh speaks volumes for the culture of Assyria, but that culture was largely borrowed.

13. Libraries from the Babylonians. Much that this library contained had been secured from Babylonia by the scribes employed by Ashurbanipal. In every important center there doubtless existed schools and libraries in connection with the temples. At Nippur, in 1890, Dr. J. P. Peters found such a library, but unfortunately, although he termed it such, his Assyriologists did not recognize that one of the greatest discoveries of antiquity had been made. It remained for Dr. J. H. Haynes, a decade later, to discover another portion of this library, which he regarded as such, because of the large number of tablets which he uncovered. Père Scheil, prior to Dr. Haynes's discovery, had the good fortune while at Sippar to discover a portion of the school and library of that important center. Since Professor Scheil's excavations, Arabs have unearthed many inscriptions of this library, which have found their way to museums and into the hands of private individuals.

The plan of the Nippur Library, unearthed by Dr. Haynes, has been published by Mr. C. S. Fisher, the architect of the Nippur expedition (see LOTB, 183). Professor Scheil, in publishing his results, has also given a plan of the school he discovered, and a full description of its arrangements, as well as the pedagogical methods that had been employed in that institution of learning. This has also been attempted by others, but in a less scientific manner. One of the striking features of these libraries is the use of the large reference cylinders, quadrangular, pentagonal and hexagonal in shape. There was a hole cut lengthwise through them for the purpose of mounting them like revolving stands. These libraries, doubtless, contained all the works the Babylonians possessed on law, science, literature and religion. There are lexical lists, paradigm tablets, lists of names, of places, countries, temples, rivers, officers, stones, gods, etc. Sufficient tablets have been deciphered to determine tables, most, however, of a large. Considering for instance that the ideographic and phonetic values of the cuneiform signs in use numbered perhaps 30,000, even the syllabaries which were required to contain these different values must have been drawn in number, and esp. as tablets, unlike books made of paper, have only two sides to them. And when we take into consideration all the different kinds of lit. which have been found, we must realize that these libraries were immense, and numbered many thousands of tablets.

In modern times the meaning of names given children is rarely considered; in fact, in many instances the name has suffered so much through changes that it is difficult to ascertain its original meaning.

Then also, at present, in order to avoid confusion the child is given two or more names. It was not so with the ancient Babylonian. Originally the giving of a name was connected with some special circumstance, and though this was not always the case throughout the history of Babylonia, the correct form of the name was always preserved.

The name may have been an expression of their religious faith. It may have told of the joy experienced at the birth of an heir. It may even betray the suffering that was involved at the birth of the child, or the life that the parents had lived. In short, the names afford us an intimate glimpse into the everyday life of the people.

The average Bab name is theoporous, and indicates one of the deities worshipped by the family, and often the city. For example, it is suggestive that persons with names compounded with Enlil and Ninh haul from Nippur. Knowing the deities... of the surrounding people we have also important evidence in determining the origin of peoples in Babylonia having foreign names. For example, if a name is composed of the Sumerian deity Tashput or the Amorite deity Amurru, or the Aramaean god Dagan, or the Egyptian god Esu (Isis), foreign influence is naturally looked for from the countries represented. Quite frequently the names of foreign deities are compounded with Babylonian elements, often resulting from mixed marriages.

16. History of foreign elements in the names of City-Kingdoms

Possible to ascertain what the original pictures were by knowing the values which the signs possessed. The same conclusion is ascertained by a study of the art and literature. Naturally, as mentioned above, it is not impossible that this development took place in a previous home of the inhabitants.

The history of early Babylonia is at present a conflict of two kings and patesis (prest-kings) of the different city-kingdoms, for supremacy over each other, as well as over the surrounding peoples. The principal states that figure in the early history are: Kish, Lagash, Nippur, Akkad, Umma, Erech, Ur and Opis. At the present time more is known of Lagash, because the excavations conducted at that site were more extensive than at others. This makes much of our knowledge of the history of the land center about that city. And yet it should be stated that the hegemony of Lagash lasted for a long period, and the kingdom will ultimately occupy a prominent position when the final history of the land is written. Nippur, where considerable work was also done, was not the seat of rulers, but the sacred city of the god Enlil, to whom the inhabitants of other cities generally did obeisance. Following is a list of known rulers of the different city-kingdoms.

El-Ohemir, identified as the ancient city of Kish, not far from Babylon, the seat of the oldest Sem centers of the land. No systematic excavations have been conducted at this site, but besides the inscriptions which the Arabs have unearthed, several of the rulers are known to us through votive inscriptions discovered at Nippur and elsewhere. The rulers of Kish are: Utug p. (patesi), c. 4200 BC; Mesilim k. (king), c. 4000 BC; Lugal-tarsī k.; Enbi-Ishtar k.; Manishtusu k., c. 2600 BC; Urussuk k., c. 2000 BC; Manana k.; Sumu-ditana k. and Tanik k.

The excavations by the French under De Sarsez and Cross at Telé, the ancient city Lagash, have yielded more inscriptions of ancient Babylonia than any other site. Lagash was destroyed about 2000 BC, and only partially rebuilt in the post-Bab period. The known rulers are: Lugal-shag-Engur patesi, c. 4000 BC, contemporary with Mesilim k. of Kish; Lugal-Addu k.; Tashkheshep k.; Ur-Sinji k.; Akertu k.; Eninnam p. and k.; Enannatum I p.; Etemenapu p.; Enannatum II p.; Enetari p.; Enlitaris p.; Lugal-anda p.; Uru-kagina k., contemporary with Lugal-zaggisi, k. of Uruk; English p., contemporary with Manishtusu k. of Kish; Lugal-ushumgal p., contemporary with Sargon of Accad: Ur-Babbar p., contemporary with Naram-Sin of Accad; Ur-Engur p.; Lugal-bur p.; Babir Kama p.; Ur-Mama p.; Ug-Me p.; Ur-Bau p.; Guéda p.; Nammanchushi p.; Ur-gar p.; Ka-azzu p.; Galu-Bau p.; Galu-Gala p.; Ur-Ninsun p.; Ur-Ningirsu p.; contemporary with Lugal-engur k. of Ur-abba p.; Galu-kazal p.; Galu-andul p.; Ur-Lama I p.; All a, Ur-Lama II p.; contemporary with Dungi k. of Ur; Arad-Namna p. Unfortunately, with the exception of about one-third of these rulers, the exact order is yet to be ascertained. (Asterisk denotes unidentified forms.)

The mounds of Bismaya which have been identified as Adab were partially excavated by Dr. Edgar J. Banks, for the University of Chicago. Its remains indicate that it is one of the oldest cities discovered. A ruler named Esar, c. 4200 BC, is known from a number of inscriptions, as well as a magnificent statue of the king, discovered by Dr. Banks. The large group of mounds covering an area, the circumference of which is thirty miles, is called in ancient times Nippur, but now Nounar.

19. Nippur was excavated as mentioned above by Drs. Peters and Haynes for the University of Pennsylvania. While a great number of Bab kings and pasesis are represented by inscriptions discovered at Nippur, practically all had their seats of government at other places, it being the sacred city.

The mounds at the present called Warka, but representing ancient Erech (Gen 10:10), covering an area whose circumference is 6 miles.

20. Erech have been tentatively examined by Loftus and other explorers. Many inscriptions have also been unearthed by the Arabs at this site. The rulers of this city known to us are: Ilu-(m)al-itu, Lugalzagge, Uru-kagina of Lagash; Lugal-kishali k.; Sin-gashid k., eir 2200 BC, and Sin-gamil k.

Senkerah known in the O.T as Ellasar (Gen 14:1), and in the inscriptions as Larsa, has been explored by Loftus and others. The known rulers of the city are: Gungunu k., contemporary of Ur-Ninib, k. of Isin; Sumu-ili; Manishtusuk., Sin-idinnam, Eukaku (Bib. Arioch) eir 2000 BC, son of Kuppu, Mahag of Nippur, and Rim-Sin (or Rim-Aku), his brother.

The present Fara, in which ancient times was called Shuruppak, was partially excavated by the Germans under Koldewey, Andrase, and Noeddeke. It is also a very ancient city. It yielded little to the spade of the excavator. It is close by Abu-Hatab, and known as the place where the scenes of the Bab Deluge story occurred. Two rulers known from the inscriptions found there are Dada and Haladda, belonging to a comparatively early period.

The site now known as Abu-Hatab is the ancient Kisurra. It was partially excavated by the Germans, and flourished as a city in the 3d millennium BC.

23. Kisurra 3d millennium BC. The two rulers of this city that are known are Idinilu p., and Ibr-Shamash p.

The site now called Jokha lying to the N.W. of Lagash is an ancient Sumerian city known as Umma. The site has been explored by Dr.

24. Umma Peters and others, but more recently surveyed by Andrase and Noeddeke.

It proved to be a city destroyed in the early period. Archaic inscriptions have also been unearthed by the excavators of the ancient archives of the city. Some of the rulers known are: Acc p., Enakali and Urramma p., contemporaries of Eannatum I of Lagash; Ili p., appointed by Entemana p., of Lagash; Kur-Shesh p., time of Manishtusuk, of Nippur; Ur-nesh p., contemporary of Dungi k., of Ur.

The city mentioned in Gen 10:10 as Accad, one of Nimrod's cities, has not been explored, but is well known by the inscriptions of Sargon and his son Naram-Sin as well as omen-texts of later eras. Sargon was a usurper. He was born in concealment, and sent adrift in an ark of bulrushes like Moses. He was rescued and brought up by Akki, a farmer. He assumed the title of king of the city "Sarru-ili" (Rec. Ur), or "king of Ur" (Rec. Ur). He then conquered the entire country, and became the "king of Accad and Sumer." In his latter years he extended his conquests to Elam, Amurr and Subartu, and earned for himself the title "king of the Four Quarters" which his son Naram-Sin inherited. The latter followed up the successes of his father and marched into Magan, in the Sinaitic peninsula.

Naram-Sin, as well as his father, was a great builder. Evidences of their operations are seen in many cities.

Naram-Sin was succeeded by Bingani, who apparently lost the title "king of the Four Quarters," being only called "king of the City, or of Ur.

The exact site of the city of Opis is still in doubt, but the city is represented by the ruler Zuzu k., who was defeated by Iblum p., of Lagash.

The city Basime also remains unidentified, but is represented by Iblum p., a contemporary of Manishtusuk, k. of Kish, and son of Ishubari, apparently another patesi of that city.

26. Opis have recently yielded thousands of tablets from the Temple archives dated in the reign of kings in the Ur Dynasty.

The extensive group of mounds lying on the west side of the Euphrates, called Mugayyar, and generally known as Ur of the Chaldees, is 27. Basime the ancient Urumma. It was explored by Taylor and others, and proved to have been an important capital from the middle of the 3d millennium BC. The dynasty which had made the city its capital is known through inscriptions discovered there and at Tello, Nippur, Erech and Drehem. Thousands of inscriptions dated in what is commonly called the Ur Dynasty have been published. The dynasty was founded by Ur-Engur, who is conspicuous for his building operations at Nippur and other cities. A dynastic tablet of a much later period, the provenience of which is in doubt, gives the rulers of this dynasty founded about 2400 BC, and the number of years that they reigned.

URUMMA DYNASTY

Ur-Engur, 18 years
Dangi (son), 58 years
Bur-Sin (son), 9 years
Ilu-Sin (son), 7 years
Ilu-Sin (son), 25 years
Five kings, 117 years

The same tablet gives also the following list of the rulers of Isin. Ishbi-Urria, the founder, lived about 2283 BC.

ISIN DYNASTY

Ishbi-Urria, 32 years
Gimil-diashu (son), 10 years
Idin-Dagan (son), 21 years
Isin-Dagan (son), 20 years
Libit-Ishtar (son), 11 years
Ur-Ninib, 28 years
Bur-Sin II (son), 28 years
Itur-ugish (son), 5 years
Uruk-umittu (brother), 7 years Sin-ugish, 6 months
Enil-bani, 24 years
Zambus, 3 years
- 7 years
Ea-um, 4 years
Sin-magir, 11 years
Dami-itishu (son), 23 years
19 other kings, 225 years and 6 months

About the time the Name Dynasty came to a close, and while the Larsa Dynasty was ruling, the First Dynasty of Babylon was established. Following is a list of 11 Dynasts of this dynasty who ruled 300 years:

20. First Dynasty of Babylon

I. FIRST DYNASTY OF BABYLON

Sumu-abum, 14 years
Sumu-la-al, 36 years
THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

Babylonia

Sabium (son), 14 years
Abil-Sin (son), 18 years Sin-misbit (son), 20 years
Hammu-rabi (son), 43 years
Samusuluna (son), 38 years
Abi-eshuh (son), 28 years
Ammi-Ditana (son), 37 years
Ammi-Zaduga (son), 21 years
Samsut-Ditana (son), 32 years

31. Sealant Dynasty

The First Dynasty of Babylon came into prominence in the reign of Sin-misbitil who captured Nine. Eri-Aku of the Larsa Dynasty shortly afterward took the city. When Hammurabi came to the throne he was subject to Eri-Aku (Bib. Arioeh) of Larsa, the son of the Elamite king, Kudur-Mabug. The latter informs us that he was suzerain of Amurr (Pal and Syria), which makes intelligible the statement in Gen 14, that the kings of Canaan were subject to the king of Elam, whose name was Chedarlamer (Kudur-Lagamar). In his 31st year, Hammurabi, who is the Anraphel of Gen 14:1, succeeded in throwing off the Elamite yoke, and not only established his independence but also became the complete master of Babylonia by driving out the Elamites.

In the region of the Pers Gulf, south of Babylonia, ruled a dynasty partly contemporaneously with the First Dynasty, extending over the reigns of about five of the last kings, and over several of the Cassite Dynasty, known as the Sealant Dynasty. The annalistic records for the latter followed the list of 11 kings which ruled 368 years:

II. Sealant Dynasty

Ulla-iliu, 60 years
Ishkil-ili, 55 years
Damqil-ilishu, 56 years
Iekikal, 15 years
Shushishi (brother), 27 years
Gulkishar, 55 years
Pesh-gal-ilamash, 50 years
Adara-kalama (son), 28 years
Ekur-ul-anna, 26 years
Melama-kurkura, 7 years
Ea-gamil, 9 years

The First Dynasty of Babylon came to an end through an invasion of the Hittites. They plundered Babylon and perhaps ruled that city for a number of years. A new dynasty was then established about 1750 BC by a foreign people known as Cassites. There were 36 kings in this dynasty ruling 576 years and 9 months. Unfortunately the tablet containing the list is fragmentary.

III. Cassite Dynasty

Gandash, 16 years
Agum I (s), 22 years
Kashitiliash, usurer, 22 years; b. of Ulambur-ishi and s. of Buanna-burisha Du(t) shi (s), 8 years
Abirattash (b)?
Tazzigurumas (s)
Agum II (s); Long gap

32. Cassite Dynasty

Cassite city for a number of years. A new dynasty was then established about 1750 BC by a foreign people known as Cassites. There were 36 kings in this dynasty ruling 576 years and 9 months. Unfortunately the tablet containing the list is fragmentary.

Kuri-Galzu II (s. of Buanna-burisha), 23 years; contemporary of Ashur-uluballit, and Enlil-nirari, kings of Assyria Nazi-Maruttas (s), 26 years; contemporary of Adad-nirari I, p. of Assyria Kadashman-Turgu (s), 17 years
Kadashman-Enlil II, 7 years
Kudur-Enlil (s), 9 years
Shagarakti-Shurias (s), 13 years
Kashitiliash II (s), 8 years
Enlil-nadin-shum, 17 years
Kadashman-Kharbe II, 13 years
Adad-shum-iddin, 6 years
Adad-shum-usur, 30 years;
Moli-Shipak (s?), 15 years
Marduk-apil-iddin (s), 13 years
Zamama-shum-iddin, 1 year
Bel-mu, 3 years

The region from which these Cassites came has not yet been determined, although it seems to be the district N.E. of Assyria. Gandash, the first king, seems to have enjoyed the all-encompassing title, "King of the Four Quarters of the World." Little is known of the other rulers until Agum II, who claims the rule of the Cassites, Aced, Babel, and Babylonia.

33. Cassite Dynasty

11 Kings; began to rule about 1172 BC
Marduk . . . . 17 years
Wanting, 6 years
Neuchadrezzar, 1, contemporary of Assyria
34. Isin Dynasty

Asur-shesh-ishi, k. of Assyria
Enlil-nadin-apid
Marduk-enlil-achhi, k. of Assyria
Tiglath-Pileser I, k. of Assyria
Marduk-shapik-zer-mat, contemporary of Assyria
Ashur-bel-kala, k. of Assyria
Adad-apid-iddin, 22 years
Marduk-akkh-erba, 11/2
Marduk-ser, 12 years
Nabu-shum-libur, 8(?)/7 years

The most famous king of this dynasty, in fact of this era, was Nebuchadrezzar I, who reestablished firmly the rule of Babylon. He carried on a successful expedition into Elam as well as into Amurru where he fought against the Hittites. He also conquered the Lulubites. But in contest for supremacy with Assyria Ashur-reshishi triumphed, and he was forced to retreat ingloriously to Babylon. His successors failed to withstand the Assyrians, esp. under Tiglath-Pileser I, and were allowed to rule only by sufferance. The Babylonians had lost their prestige; the Assyrians had become the dominant people of the land. few rulers of the dynasty which followed are known except by name. The dynasties with one exception were of short duration.

V. SEALAND DYNASTY
3 Kings
Simash-Shipak, 18 years; about

X. BABYLONIAN DYNASTY

Following is a partial list of the 22 kings who ruled until the destruction of Babylon by Sennaacherib, when the Assyrians assumed direct control. Ashurbanipal, however, introduced a new policy and viceroyalty were appointed.
Shamash-mudammiq
Nabu-shar-isskun I

Merodach-baladan I; 722-710 BC
Sargon; 710-703 BC
Sennacherib; 704-702 BC
Marduk-sakir-shum (1 month)
Merodach-baladan II (9 months)
Bel-ibni; 702-700 BC
Ashur-nadin-shum; 700-694 BC
Nergal-ushub; 694-693 BC
Mushezib-Marduk; 692-689 BC
Sennacherib; 689-681 BC
Esarhaddon; 681-668 BC
Ashurbanipal; 668-626 BC
Shamash-shum-ukin; 668-648 BC
Kandalanu; 648-626 BC
Ashur-eti-ilani-ukin; 626-Nabopolassar; 626-

During the time of Sennacherib, Merodachbaladan the Chaldaean became a great obstacle to Assyria's maintaining its supremacy over Babylonia. Three times he gained possession of Babylon, and twice had himself proclaimed king. For ty years he plotted against Assyria. What is learned from the inscriptions concerning him furnishes an interesting commentary on the sending of the embassy, in 704 BC, to Hezekiah (2 K 20 12; Isa 39 1) in order to induce him to revolt against Assyria, which he knew would help his own cause. Finally Sennacherib, in 690, after he had experienced much trouble by the repeated uprisings of the Babylonians, and the aspirations of Mer-dach-baladan, endeavored to obliterate Babylon from the map. His son and successor Esarhaddon, however, tried to make Babylon again happy and prosperous. One of his first acts was to send back to Babylon the statue of Bel-Merodach. He rebuilt the city, and also restored other Bab temples, for instance, that of Enil at Nippur. The Babylonians solemnly declared him king. Ashurbanipal, his son and successor, followed his policy. The evidence of his operations at Nippur is everywhere seen in the shape of stamped, kiln-dried bricks.

Before Esarhaddon died, he had planned that Babylonia should become independent and be ruled by his son, Shamma-shum-ukin, while Assyria he handed down to Ashurbanipal. But when the latter came to the throne, Assyria permitted the former only to be appointed viceroy of Babylon. It seems also that even some portions of Babylon were ruled directly by Ashurbanipal.

After fifteen years Shamma-shum-ukin rebelled and attempted to establish his independence, but Sennacherib besieged Babylon and took it, when Shamma-shum-ukin destroyed himself. Kadalunu was then appointed viceroy, and ruled over part of the country. Nabopolassar was the last vicegerent appointed by Assyria. At last the time had arrived for the Babylonians to come again unto their own. Nabopolassar who perhaps was a Chaldaean by origin, made an alliance with the Urman Manda.
This he strengthened by the marriage of his son Nebuchadrezzar to the daughter of Astyages, the king. Nineveh fell before the Urman Manda hordes, and was razed to the ground.
This people took possession of Northern Assyria. The Armenian vassal states, and Southern Assyria, as well as the title to Pal, Syria and Egypt, fell to Babylon.

Nabopolassar having established himself king of Babylon became the founder of the neo-Babylonian empire. He was succeeded by his son, Nebuchadrezzar II, who like Hammurabi and Sargon is among the greatest known characters in Bab history. He is the Bib of the Chaldaean who carried the Jews into captivity. There are a number of lengthy records of Nebuchadrezzar concerning the buildings he erected, as well as of other public acts, but unfortunately only a fragment of a historical inscription referring to him has been found.
The building inscriptions portray him as the great builder he is represented to be in the OT (see BABYLON). He made Babylon the mistress of the civilized world.

Evil-Merodach, his son and successor, is also mentioned in the OT. Two short reigns followed when the ruling dynasty was overthrown and Nabonidus was placed upon the throne. The king, who delighted in exploring and restoring ancient temples and placed his son at the head of the army. Nabonidus desiring to centralize the religion of Babylonia, brought to Babylon many of the images of deities from other cities. This greatly dispelled the people, and excited a strong feeling against him. The hiearchy was alienated, and the military party was displeased with him, for in his antiquarian pursuits he left the defence of the empire to others. So when Cyrus, king of Anshan and ruler of Persia, entered the country, he had little difficulty in defeating the Babylonians in a battle at Opis. Shippur immediately surrendered to the invader, and the gates of Babylon were thrown open to his army under Gobryas, his general. Nabonidus was imprisoned. Three months later Cyrus entered Babylon; Belshazzar, who doubtless had set up his throne after his father had been deposed, was slain a week later on the night of the dance of the Marchesvan. This event may have occurred in the palace built by Nebuchadnezzar. This event, told by the chronicler, is a remarkable verification of the interesting story related of Belshazzar in Dan. The title used by the kings who follow the BAB Dynasty is "King of Babylon and King of Countries."

Alexander the Great conquered Babylonia 331 BC. Several of the Pers rulers figured prominently in the OT narratives. Cyrus in a cylinder inscription, which is preserved in a fragmentary form, endeavors to justify himself in the eyes of the people. He claims that the god Marduk raised him up to take the place of Nabonidus, and to defend the religion of the people. He tries to show how considerate he was by returning to their respective cities the gods that had been removed from their shrines; and esp. by liberating foreign peoples held in bond-age. While he does not mention what exiles were allowed to return to their native homes, the OT informs us that the Jews were among those delivered. And the returning of the images to their respective places is also an interesting commentary on Ezra 17, in which we are told that the Jews were allowed to take with them their sacred vessels. The spirit manifest in the proclamation for the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 1:4) seems also to have been in accordance with his policy on ascending the Bab throne. A year before his death he associated with himself Cambyses his son, another character mentioned in the OT. He gave him the title "King of Babylon," but retained for himself "King of Countries." A usurper Smerdis, the Magian, called Barzais in the inscriptions, assumed the throne of Babylonia, but Darius Hystaspes, who was an Aryan and Zoroastrian in religion, finally killed Smerdis and made himself king of Babylon. But before he was acknowledged king he had to reconquer the Babylonians. By so doing the ancient tradition that Bel of Babylon conferred the legitimate right to rule that part of the world ceased to be acknowledged. Under Nidintu-Bel, who assumed the name Nebuchadnezzar III, the Babylonians regained their independence, but it was of short duration, lasting less than a year.

must be taken into consideration. The laws also have in large measure a religious basis, and the business inscriptions frequently invoke deities at the end. The records of the astronomers, the state despatches of kings, the reports of general officers from the field, the handbooks of medicine, all these and many other divisions of a vast lit. contribute each its share of religious material. Furthermore, as the religion was not only the faith of the king, but also the faith of the state itself, the progress of the commonwealth to greater power oftentimes carried some local god into a new relationship to other gods, or the decadence of the commonwealth deprived a god of some of his powers or attributes, so that even the distinctively political inscriptions have importance in helping us to reconstruct the ancient literature.

III. The History.—The origin of the Bab religion is hid from our eyes in those ancient days of which we know little and can never hope to know much.

In the earliest documents which have come down to us written in the Sumerian language, there are found Sem words or constructions or both. It seems now to be definitely determined that a Sumerian people whose origin is unknown inhabited Babylonia before the coming of the Semites, whose original home was in Arabia. Of the Sumerian faith before a union was formed with the Semites, we know very little indeed. But we may perhaps safely say that among that ancient people, beneath the belied in gods there lay deep in their consciousness the belief in animism. They thought that every object, animate or inanimate, had a zi or spirit. The word seems originally to have meant life. Life manifests itself to us as motion; everything which moves has life. The power of motion separates the animate from the inanimate. All that moves possesses life, the motionless is lifeless or dead.

Besides this belief in animism, the early Sumerians seem to have believed in ghosts that were related to the world of the dead as the zi was related to the world of the living. The lil or ghost was a night demon of baleful influence upon men, and only to be cast out by many incantations. The lil was attended by a serving-maid (ardat lil, "maid of night") which in the later Sem development was transformed into the feminine lidiu. It is most curious and interesting that this ghost demon of the Sumerians lived on through all the history of the Bab religion, and is mentioned even in one of the OT prophets (Isa. 34:14; Heb Lidad, tr. "night monster"). The origin of the Sem religion brought by the ancient Sem people and united with this Sumerian faith is also lost in the past.

It seems to be quite clear that the gods and the religious ideas which these Semites brought with them from the desert had very little if any importance for the religion which they afterwards professed in Babylonia. Some of the names of their gods and images of these they very probably brought with them, but the important thing, it must always be remembered, about the gods is not the names but the attributes which were ascribed to them and these must have been completely changed during the long history which follows their first contact with the Sumerians. From the Sumerians there flowed a great stream of religious ideas, subject indeed to modifications from time to time down the succeeding centuries. In our study of the pantheon we shall see from time to time how the gods changed their places and how the ideas concerning them were modified by political and other movements. In the very earliest times, besides these ideas of spirits and ghosts, we find only in numbers. It is quite to be expected that many of these strange, not to say grotesque, names will some day prove to be quite simple, and easy to utter: En-il (Elil), Be-lit, Nin-khar-sag, Nin-ger-shu, who also were called En-Aruru, Be-ul, A-nin-tash, Nin-dug, Ea, Nin-a-gal, Gal-dim-zi-ab, Nin-ki, Damgal-nun-na, Nergal, Shamash, A or Malkatu, the wife of Shamash, Nannar, or Sin, Nin-Urum, Inanna, Nana, Anunit, Nin, Ishtar, Anu, Nin-dingir a, Gal-alim, Nin-shulak, Don-shub-landa, with a consort Nin-sum, Dumu-zi-ab, Dumuzi, Lugal-Erim, Nin-e-gal and Nin-gal, Nin-gish-zi-da, Dun-pa-uddu, Nin-mar, Pa-sag, Ninidaba, Ki(-?)anna, Shid, Nin-aggal-kha-du, Nin-dingir, En-gubarra, Im-ni-khu(?) Ur-du-si, Kadi, gods. Every center of human habitation had its special patron deity and this deity is always associated with some great natural phenomenon. It was natural that the sun and moon should be prominent among these gods, but other natural objects and forces were personified and deified, streams, stones and many others.

Our chief source of information concerning the gods of the first period of religious development before the days of Hammurabi is found in the historical inscriptions of the early kings and rulers. Many of these describe offerings of temples and treasures made to the gods, and all of them are religious in tone and filled with ascriptions of praise to the gods. From these early texts Professor Jastrow has extricated the names of the following deities, gods and goddesses. I reproduce his list as the best yet made, but keep in mind that some of the readings are doubtful and many of the others are otherwise read by the Babylonians or Sumerians, though we do not now know how they ought to be read. The progress of Assyrian research is continually providing corrected readings for words hitherto known to us only in cuneiform.
was, however, a strong tendency to diminish the number of the gods. They are in early days mentioned by the score, but as time goes on many of these vanish away and only the few remain. As Jastrow has pointed out, Shamash-Bel (850-825 BC) had only eleven gods in his pantheon: Ashur, Anu, Bel, Ea, Sin, Shamash, Ninib, Nergal, Nusku, Belit and Ishtar. Sennacherib (704-681 BC) usually mentions only eight, namely, Ashur, Sin, Shamash, Bel (that is, Marduk), Nabu, Nergal, Ishtar of Nineveh and Ishtar of Arbelu. But we must not lay much emphasis upon the smallness of this number, for in his building inscriptions at the end he invokes twenty-five deities, and even though some of these are duplicates of other gods, as Jastrow correctly explains, nevertheless the enumerations considerably increased over the eight above mentioned. In the late Babylon period the worship seems chiefly devoted to Marduk, Nabu, Sin, Shamash and Ishtar. Often there seem little faint indications of a further step forward. Some of the hymns addressed to Shamash seem almost upon the verge of exalting him in such a way as to exude the other deities, but the step is never taken. The Babylonians, with all their wonderful gifts, were never able to conceive of one god, of one god alone, of one god whose very existence makes logically impossible the existence of any other deity. Monotheism transcends the spiritual grasp of the Bab mind.

Amid all this company of gods, amid all these speculations and combinations, we must keep our minds clear, and fasten our eyes upon the one significant fact that stands out above all others. It is that the Babylonians were not able to rise above polytheism; that beyond them, far beyond them, lay that great series of thoughts about God that ascribe to him aloneness, to which we may add the great spiritual ideas which today may roughly be grouped under ethical monotheism. Here and there great thinkers in Babylonia grasped after higher ideas, and pulled at the thread of a sort of pantheism of a speculative kind. A personal god, righteous and holy, who loved righteousness and hated sin, this was not given to them to conceive.

The character of the gods changed indeed as the people who revered them changed. The Babylonians who built vast temples and composed many inscriptions emphasizing the works of peace rather than of war, naturally conceived their deities in a manner different from the Assyrians whose powers were chiefly devoted to conquests in war, but neither the Babylonians nor the Assyrians arose to any such heights as distinguish the Hebrew book of Psalms. As the influence of the Babylonians and Assyrians waned by their gods declined in power, and none of them survived the onrush of Gr civilization in the period of Alexander.

IV. The Pantheon.—The chief gods of the Bab and Assyrian pantheon may now be characterized in turn.

In the earliest times known to us the greatest of the gods is the god of Nippur whose name in the Sumerian texts is Enlil or Ellil. In the 1. Enlil Sem pantheon of later times he was identified with the god Bel, and it is as Bel he has been chiefly known. During the whole of the first epoch of Bab history up to the period of Hammurabi, he is the Lord of the World and the King of the Land. He was originally the hero of the Flood story, but in the form in which it has come down to us Marduk of Babylon has deprived him of these honors. In Nippur was his chief temple, called E-kur or "mountain house." It was built and rebuilt by the kings of Babylonia again and again from the days of Sargon I (3800 BC onward, and no less than twenty kings are known to us who pride themselves on their work of rebuilding this one temple. He is saluted as "the Great Lord, the command of whose mouth cannot be altered and whose grace is steadfast." He would seem, judging from the name of his temple and from some of his attributes, to have been originally a god of the mountains where he must have had his original dwelling-place.

The name of the god Anu was interpreted as meaning heaven, corresponding to the Sumerian word "gris." 2. Anu

thus to be regarded as the god of heaven as over against Enlil who was the god of earth, and Ea who was the god of the waters. Anu appears first among the great gods in an inscription of Lagasaggi, and in somewhat later times he made his way to the top of the earliest triad which consists of Anu, Enlil and Ea. His chief seat of worship was Uruk, but in the Assyrian period he was associated with the god Adad in a temple in the city of Assur. In the myths and epics he fills an important rôle as the disposer of all events, but he cannot be thought of as quite equal in rank with Enlil in spite of his position in the heavens. Antu or Anatu is mentioned as the wife of Anu, but hers is a colorless figure, and she may probably be regarded as little else than a grammatical inversion owing to the desire of the Semites to associate the feminine with the masculine in their languages.

The reading of the name of the god Ea still remains uncertain. It may perhaps have been 'Ae, as the Gr. Aeas would seem to indicate. His chief city of worship was Eridu, which in the earliest period was situated on the Pers Gulf, near the mouths of the Euphrates and the Tigris. His temple was there called A-bau, which means "house of the deeps," interpreted also as "house of wisdom." He must have been a god of great importance in early times, but was left behind by the influence of Ellil and in a later period retained honor chiefly because he was assumed to be the father of the god Marduk.
and so was reverenced by the people of the city of Babylon. As the lord of wisdom he filled a great role in exorcisms down to the very last, and was believed to be the god who was the most ready to respond to human need in direful circumstances. Ea’s wife is called Damkina.

Sin was the city god of Uru (Ur of the Chaldeans in the OT). He was originally a local god who came early to a lofty position in the canon because he seems always to have been identified with the moon, and in Babylon the moon was always of more importance than the sun because of its use in the calendar. His temple was called E-kishshigal, i.e. “house of light.” His worship was widespread, for at a very early date he had a shrine at Harran in Mesopotamia. His wife is called Ningal, the Great Lady, the Queen, and his name probably appears in Mt. Sinai. He is addressed in hymns of great beauty and was regarded as a most kindly god.

The Sun-god, Shamash, ranks next after Sin in the second or later triad, and there can be no doubt that he was from the beginning associated with the sun in the heavens. His seats of worship were Larsa in southern Babylonia and Sippar in northern Babylonia, in both of which his temple was called E-babbar, “shining house.” He is also honored in magnificent hymns in which he is saluted as the enemy and the avenger of evil, but as the benignant furtherer of all good, esp. of that which concerns the races of men. All legislation is ascribed to him as the supreme judge in heaven. To him the Babylonians also ascribe similar powers in war to those which the Egyptians accorded to Re. From some of the texts one might suppose that he would have come to the top of the triad, but this appears not to have been the case, and his influence extended rather in the direction of influencing minor local deities who were judged to be characterized by attributes similar to those ascribed to him in the greater hymns.

The origin and the meaning of the name of the goddess Ishtar are still disputed, but of her rank there can be no doubt. In the very earliest inscriptions known to us she does not seem to have been associated with the planet Venus as she is in later times. She seems rather to have been a goddess of fruitfulness and of love, and in her temple at Uruk temple-prostitution was a feature. In the mythological lit. she occupies a high place as the goddess of war and of the chase. Because of this later identification she became the chief goddess of the warlike Assyrians. Little by little she absorbed all the other goddesses and her name became the general word for goddess. Her chief seats of worship were Uruk in southern Babylonia, where she was worshipped in earliest times under the name of Nana, and Akkad in northern Babylonia, where she was called Amnitu, and Nineveh and Arbela in Assyria. Some of the hymns addressed to her are among the noblest products of Bab and Assy religion and reach a considerable ethical position. This development of a sexual goddess into a goddess who severely judged the sins of men is one of the strangest phenomena in the history of this religion.

Marduk (in the OT Merodach) is the city-god of Babylon where his temple was called E-sagila (“lofty house”) and its tower E-temen-nanki (“house of the foundation of heaven and earth”). His wife is Sarpanitu, and, as we have already seen, his father was Ea, and in later days Nabu was considered his son. The city of Babylon in the earliest period was insignificant in importance compared with Nippur and Eridu, and the city-god could not therefore lay claim to a position comparable with the gods of these cities, but after Hammurabi had made Babylon the chief city of all Babylonia its god rapidly increased in importance until he absorbed the attributes of the earlier gods and displaced them in the great myths. The speculative philosophers of the neo-Bab period went so far as to identify all the earlier gods with him, elevating his worship into a sort of heathenism. His proper name in the later periods was gradually displaced by the apppellative Belu “lord,” so that finally he was commonly spoken of as Bel, and his consort was called Belp. He shares with Ishtar and Shamash the honor of having some of the finest hymns, which have come down to us, sung to his name.

Nabu (in the OT Nebo) was the city-god of Borsippa. His name is clearly Sem, and means “speaker” or “announcer.” In earlier times he seems to have been a more important god than Marduk and was worshipped as the god of vegetation. His temple in Borsippa bore the name E-zida (“perpetual house”) with the tower E-ur-minaaki (“house of the seven rulers of heaven and earth”). In later times he was identified with the planet Mercury. Nergal, the city-god of Kutu (in the OT Cuthah), was the god of the underworld and his wife Eresh-kigal was the sovereign lady of the underworld. He was also the god of plague and of fever, and in later days was associated with the planet Mars, though scholars who are attached to the astral theory...

Unfortunately the correct pronunciation of the name of the god has not yet been secured. He seems originally to have been a god of vegetation, but in the later philosophical period was associated with the planet Saturn, called Kaimanu (Kewen, Chius, Am. 26 AV, E. V.) by a god of vegetation he becomes also a god of healing and his wife Gula was the chief patroness of physicians. He comes also to be regarded as a mighty hero in war, and, in this capacity generally, he fills a great role in the Assyr. religion.

Ramman is the god of storms and thunder among the Babylonians and in the Assyr. pantheon he is usually called Adad. This form of the name is doubtless connected with the Aram. god Hadad. In the Sumerian period his name seems to have been Iskur. His wife is called Shala.

The name Tammuz is derived from the Sumerian Dumuzi-uzab (“real child of the water depths”). He is a god of vegetation which is revived by the rains of the spring.

Tammuz never became one of the great gods of the pantheon, but his popularity far exceeded that of the many gods who were regarded as greater than he. His worship is associated with that of Ishtar whose paramour he was, and the beautiful story of the descent of Ish-tar to Hades was written to describe Ishtar’s pursuit of him to the depths of the under-world seeking to bring him up again. His disappearance in the under-world is associated with the disappearance of vegetation under the midsummer heat which revives again when the rain comes and the god appears once more on the earth. The cult of Tammuz survived the decay of Bab and Assyr. civilization and made its way into the western world. It was similar in some respects to that of Osiris in Egypt, but was not so beautiful or so humane.

The supreme god of Assyr., Assur, was originally the local god of the city which bears the same name. During the whole of Assyr. history his chief role is as the god of the capital. Many of the philosophers of Assyr. absorbed into him many of the characteristics of Ellil and Marduk, going even so far as to ascribe to him the chief place in the conflict with the sea monster Tiamat in the creation epoch.

5. Hymns and Prayers. The religious lit. of the Babylonians and Assyrians culminated in a great series of hymns to the gods. These have come down to us from almost all periods of the religious history of the people. Some of them go back to the days of the old city-kingdoms and others were composed during the reign of Naboni dus when the fall of Babylon at the hands of Cyrus was imminent. The greatest number of those that have come down to us are dedicated to Shamash, the Sun-god, but many of the finest, as we have already seen, were composed in honor of Sin, the Moon-god. None of these reached monotheism. All are polytheistic, with perhaps tendencies in the direction of pantheism or henotheism. This incapacity to reach monotheism may have been partially due to the influence of the local city whose tendency was always to hold tightly to the honor of the local god. Babylonia might struggle never so hard to lift Marduk to high and still higher position, but in spite of all its efforts he remained to be the chief god among many. And even the greatest of the Bab kings, Nebuchadrezzar and Nabonidus, continued to pay honor to Shamash in Sippur, whose temple they continually rebuilt and adorned with ever greater magnificence. Better than any description of the hymns is a specimen adequate to show their quality. Here are some lines taken from an ancient Sumerian hymn to the Moon-god which had been copied and preserved with an Assyr. tr in the library of Ashurbanipal:

O Lord, chief of the gods, who alone art exalted on earth as a god in heaven.

Father Nannar, Lord, Anshar, chief of the gods.

Father Nannar, Lord, great Anu, child of the gods, Sin, chief of the gods.

Father Nannar, Lord of Ur, chief of the gods.

Father Nannar, Lord of Eshshir-bal, chief of the gods.

Father Nannar, Lord of the veil, brilliant one, chief of the gods.

Father Nannar, whose rule is perfect, chief of the gods, Father Nannar, who does march in great majesty, chief of the gods.

O strong, young bull, with strong horns, perfect in muscles, with braid of lapis lazuli color, full of glory and perfection.

Self-created, full of developed fruit, beautiful to look upon, in whose being one cannot sufficiently sate himself;

Mother womb, begetter of all things, who has taken up his exalted position among living creatures;

O merciful, gracious father, in whose hand rests the life of the whole world;

O Lord, thy divinity is full of awe, like the far-off heaven and the | broad ocean;

O creator of mankind, founder of sanctuaries, proclaimer of their names.

O father, benevolent of gods and men, who dost build dwellings and establish offerings.

Who dost call to lordship, dost bestow the scepter, determinest destinies for far-off days.

Much of this is full of fine religious feeling, and the exaltation of Sin sounds as though the poet could scarcely acknowledge any other god, but the proof that other gods were invoked in the same terms and by the same kings is plentiful.

Some of these hymns are accompanied with magical and incantation lit., for they serve to introduce passages which are intended to drive away evil demons. A very few of them on the other hand rise to very lofty conceptions in which the god is praised as a judge of righteousness. A few lines from the greatest of all the hymns addressed to Shamash, the Sun-god, will make this plain:

Who plans evil—his horn thou dost destroy.

Whoever fixing boundaries and rights.

The unjust judge thou restrainest with force.

Whoever accepts a bribe, who does not judge justly, thou dost destroy.

But he who does not accept a bribe, who has a care for the oppressed.

To him Shamash is gracious, his life he prolongs.

The judge who renders a just decision

Shall he in a palace, the place of princes shall he be dwelling.
rezar, reach lofty conceptions. The following may serve as a sufficient example:

O eternal ruler, lord of all being, grant that the name of the king that thou hast proclaimed, may flourish as seems pleasing to thee. Lead him in the right way. I am the prince that obeys thee, the servant of thy name. Thou hast intrusted me, hast intrusted to me dominion over mankind. According to my word, which thou hast intrusted upon me, may thy supreme rule be merciful! The worship of thy divinity implant in my heart! Grant me what seems good to thee, for thou art he that hast fashioned my life.

VI. Magic.—Next in importance to the gods in the Bab religion are the demons who had the power to afflict men with manifold diseases of body or mind. A large number of the religion seems to have been given up to an agonized struggle against these demons, and the gods were everywhere approached by prayer to assist men against these demons. An immense mass of incantations, supposed to have the power of driving the demons out, has come down to us. The use of these incantations lay chiefly in the hands of the priests who attached great importance to specific words or sets of words.

The test of time was supposed to have shown that certain words were effectual in certain instances. If in any case the result was not secured, it could only be ascribed to the use of the wrong formula; hence there grew up a great desire to preserve exactly the words which in some cases had brought happy results. These incantations were gathered into groups or rituals classified according to purpose or use. Of the rituals which have come down to us, the following are the most important:

1. Maqû, i.e. “burning,” so called because there are in it many symbolic burnings of images or witches. This series is used in the delivering of sufferers from witches or sorcerers.

2. Shurpu

In these incantations we make the acquaintance of a large number of strange demons such as the rabûa, a demon that springs unaware on its victims; the labartu, which attacks women and children; and the lilitu and the lilitu, to which reference has been made before, and the ušitu, a strong demon.

These incantations are for the most part a wordless dialogue between a man and a god, and a sad commentary on the low position occupied by the religion which has attained such noble heights as that represented in the hymns and prayers. It is strange that the higher forms of religion were not able to drive out the lower, but these incantations continued to be carefully copied and used down to the very end of the Bab commonwealth.

VII. The Last Things.—In Babylonia, the great question of all the ages—“If a man die shall he live again?”—was a frequent one; and the answer was usually sad and depressing. After death the souls of men were supposed to continue in existence. It can hardly be called life. The place to which they have gone is called the “land of no return.” There they lived in dark rooms amidst the dust and the bats covered with a garment of feathers, and under the dominion of Nergal and Ereshkigal. When the soul arrived among the dead he had to pass judgment before the judges of the dead. The right words were preserved for each concerning the manner of this judgment. There seems to have been at times an idea that it might be possible for the dead to return again to life, for in this under-world there was the water of life, which was reserved for them when the god Tammuz returned again to earth. The Babylonians seem not to have attached so much importance to this after-existence as did the Egyptians, but they did practice burial and not cremation, and placed often with the dead articles which might be used in his future existence. In earlier times the dead were buried in tumuli, and among the rich this custom seems to have prevailed until the very latest times. For others the custom of burying in an acropolis was adopted, and near the city of Kutha was an acropolis which was especially famous. In the future world there seem to have been distinctions made among the dead. Those who fell in battle seem to have had special favor. They received fresh water to drink, while those who had no posterity to put offerings at their graves suffered sore and many deprivations. It is to be hoped that later discoveries of religious texts may shed more light upon this phase of the religion which is still obscure.

VIII. Myths and Epics.—In ancient religions the myth fills a very important place, serving many of the functions of dogma in modern religions. These myths have come down to us associated usually with epics, or made a part of ancient stories which belong to the library of Ashurbanipal. Most of these have been copied from earlier originals, which go back in origin to the wonderful period of intellectual and political development which began with Hammurabi. The most interesting of those which have been preserved for us are those found in the Epic of Adapa and the story of the “house of the fishes.” Angered by his misfortune, he broke the wings of the south wind, and for seven days it was unable to bring the comfort of the sea coolness over the hot land. And Anu said:

“Why has the south wind for seven days not blown over the land?”

His messenger Ilabrat answered him:

“My Lord,
Adapa, the son of Ea, hath broken the wing of The south wind.”

Then Anu ordered the culprit brought before him, and before he departed to this ordeal Ea gave him instructions. He is to go up to the gatekeepers of heaven, Gil-Gal and Gil-Galath, and give the cry: “Bring him food of life that he may eat it.” They brought him food of life, but he did not eat. They brought him water of life, but he did not drink. They brought him a garment; he put it on. They brought him oil; he anointed himself with it.

Adapa had obeyed Ea literally, and by so doing had missed the priceless boon of immortality. Some of the motives in the beautiful myth are similar to those in the Gen. Food of life seems to belong to the same category as the tree of life in Gen. The Bab doctrine was that man, though of Divine origin, did not share in the Divine attribute of immortality. In the Gen story Adam lost immortality because he ate the apple like God. Adapa, on the other hand, was already endowed with knowledge and wisdom and failed of immortality, not because he was disobedient like Adam, but because he was obedient to Ea his creator. The legend would seem to be the Bab attempt to explain death.

The greatest of all the Bab epics is the story of Gilgames, for in it the greatest of the myths seem to pour into one great stream of epic. It was written upon twelve big tablets in the library of Ashurbanipal, some of which have been badly broken. It was, however, copied from earlier tablets which go back to the First Dynasty of Babylon. The whole story is interesting and important, but its greatest significance lies in the eleventh tablet which contains a description of the great flood and is curiously parallel to the Flood story in the Book of Gen.

IX. The Astral Theory of the Universe.—We have now passed in review the main features of the Bab and Assy religion. We have come all the way from a primitive animism to a higher organized polytheism with much theoretical speculation ending in a hope for existence after death, and we must now ask whether there is any great organizing idea which will bring all this religion and speculation into one great comprehensive system. A theory has been propounded which owes its exposition generally to Professor Hugo Winckler of the University of Berlin, who in a series of volumes and pamphlets has attempted to prove that the whole of the serious thinking and writing in the realm of religion among both the Babylonians and Assyrians rests down upon a Weltanschauung, a theory of the universe. This theory of Winckler's has found acceptance and propagation at the hands of Dr. Alfred Jeremias, and portions of it have been accepted by other scholars. The doctrine is extremely complicated and even those who accept it in part decline it in other parts and the exposition of it is difficult. In the form which it takes in the writings of Winckler and Jeremias, it has been still further complicated quite recently by sundry alterations which make it still more difficult. Most of these can only be regarded as efforts to shield the theory from criticisms which have been successful in pointing out its weakness.

According to Winckler and Jeremias, the Babylonians conceived of the cosmos as divided primarily into a heavenly and an earthly world, each of which is further subdivided into three parts. The heavenly world consists of (1) the northern ocean; (2) the zodiac; (3) the heavenly ocean; while the earthly world consists of (1) the heaven, i.e. the air above the earth; (2) the earth itself; (3) the waters beneath the earth. These great subdivisions were ruled by the gods Anu in the heavens, Ea and Enki in the earth and air, and Ena in the waters beneath. More important than these is the zodiac, the twelve heavenly figures which span the heavens and through which the moon passes every month, the sun once a year, and the five great planets which are visible to the naked eye have their courses. These moving stars serve as the interpreters of the Divine will while the fixed stars, so says Jeremias, are related thereto as the commentary written on the margin of the Book of Rev. The rulers of the zodiac are Sin, Shamas and Ishtar, and according to the law of correspondence, the Divine power manifested in them is identical with the power of Anu, Bel and Ea. The zodiac represents the world-cycle in the year, and also in the world-year, one of these gods may represent the total Divine power which reveals itself in the cycle. By the side of these three, Sin, Shamas and Ishtar, which represent respectively the moon, sun and Venus, there are arranged five others which are Jupiter, Nabu which is Mercury, Nibib which is Mars, and Nergal which is Saturn, these being the planets known to the ancients. Now upon these foundations, according to Winckler, and his school, the ancient religion of Babylonia built a closely thought-out and carefully thought-out world-system of an astral character, and this world-system forms the kernel of the ancient and oriental conception of the universe. This conception of the universe as a double-sided principle is of the utmost importance. First, the heavenly world with its three divisions corresponds exactly to the earthly world with its three divisions. Everything on earth corresponds to its counterpart in heaven. The heavens are a mirror of earth, and in them the gods reveal their will and purpose. Everything which has happened is only an earthly copy of the heavenly original. It is still written in the heavens above and still to be read there. All the myths and all the legends, not only of Babylonia, but of all the rest of the ancient world, are to be interpreted in accordance with this theory; nothing even in history is to be understood otherwise. “An oriental history without consideration of the world era is unthinkable, it argues rule by cycles of ages” (Jeremias). The consequences of this theory are so overpowering that it is difficult to deal with it in fairness to its authors and in justice to the enormous labor and knowledge which they have put upon it.

It is impossible within the reasonable limits which are here imposed to discuss the theory in detail, and for our purpose it will be sufficient to say that to the great majority of modern scholars who have carefully considered its details it seems to lack evidence sufficient to support so enormous a structure. That an astrological structure similar at least to this actually did arise in the Hellenistic period is not here disputed. The sole dispute is as to the antiquity of it. Now it does not appear that Winckler and Jeremias have been able to produce proof, first, that the Babylonians had enough knowledge of astronomy before the 7th cent. B.C. to have constructed such a system; second, that in the second place there is no evidence that all the Bab gods had any astral character in the earlier period. On the contrary, there seems, as we have already attempted to show in the discussion of the pantheon, to be good reason to believe that many of the deities had no relation whatever to them; that in early times the gods of vegetation or of water or of other natural forces visible in earthly manifestations. The theory indeed may be said to have broken down by its own weight, for Winckler and Jeremias attempted to demonstrate the theory of the creation of the Babylons and Assyria, the Greeks and to the Romans, and that it affords the only satisfactory explanation of the religion and of the history of the entire ancient world. An attempt has been made similar to previous abortive efforts to unlock all the doors of the ancient past with one key (see an interesting example cited in Rogers, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 224-25). Instead of gaining adherence in recent times, the theory would appear to have lost, and even those who have given a tentative adherence to its claims, cautiously qualify the extent of their submission.

X. The Relations with the Religion of Israel.—No question concerning the religion of Babylonia and Assyria is of so great interest and importance to students of the Bible as the question of the relation between this religion and the faith of Jeh, as professed by Israel. It seems now to be clearly demonstrated that the religion of Israel has borrowed various literary materials from its more ancient neighbors, the stories of creation and of the flood, both of them, as far as the literary contents are concerned, certainly rest upon Bab. originals. This dependence has, however, been exaggerated by some scholars into an attempt to demonstrate that the whole book of Job is based on these materials bodily; whereas the shifting and comparison to which they have been subjected in the past few years would seem to demonstrate beyond peradventure that Israel stamped whatever she borrowed with her own genius and reproduced it entirely new fabric. The religious and spiritual current came from Israel and from Israel's God. The word Sabbath is Bab indeed, but the great social and religious institution which it represents in Israel is not Bab but distinctively Heb. The Divine name Yahweh appears among other peoples over into Babylonia and afterward is used by Israel, but the spiritual God who bears the name in Israel is no Bab or Kenite deity. The Babylonians, during all their history and in all their speculations, never conceived a god like unto Him. He belongs to the Hebrews alone. The gods of Babylonia are connected, as we have seen, with primitive animism or they are merely local deities. The God of Israel, on the other hand, is the God revealed in history. He brought Israel out of Egypt. He is continually made known to His people through the prophets as a God revealed in history. His religion is not developed out of Bab polytheism which existed as polytheism in the earliest periods and endured as polytheism until to the present. The religion of Israel, on the other hand, though some of its material origins are humble, moved steadily onward and upward until the great monothelistic idea found universal acceptance in Israel. The religions of Philistia and of Judah, and of Edom, were subject to the same play of influences from Babylonia and Egypt, but no larger faith developed out of them. In Israel alone ethical monotheism arose, and ethical monotheism has no roots in Babylonia. The study of the religion of Babylonia is indeed of the highest importance for the understanding of Israel's faith, but it is of less importance than some modern scholars have attempted to demonstrate.

BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY. See Captivity.

BABYLONIANS, bab-i-lan'ianz: The inhabitants of Babylonia (q.v.). They were among the colonists planted in Samaria by the Assyrians (Ezr 4 9). "The likeness of the Babyloniae" (Ezk 23 13) refers to the pictures which were common on the walls of Bab palaces, and the reports of them being heard in Jerus, or copies of them seen there, awakened the nation's desire for these unknown lovers, which justified an ample occasion to repent of (vs 17 23; cf 2 K 24).

BABYLONISH GARMENT: bab-i-lon'ish gar'ment: In Av, Josh 7 21, for Babylonish Mantle, which see.

BABYLONISH MANTEL, man'tl (AV Babylonian Garment): One of the articles taken by Achan from the spoil of Jericho. In the Heb "a mantle of Shinar." Entirely gratuitous is the supposed correction of Shinar to såär, making "a hairy mantle." The Gr has παλέων ποσκίλων, which Jos apparently understood to mean "a royal garment all woven out of gold and silver" (Ant 5 10). The Vulg calls it a "scarlet pallium," and some of the rabbinical traditions make it a purple robe. Such classical writers as Pliny and Martial speak of the weaving of embroidered stuffs as a famous industry of Babylonia. M. Jastrow has deciphered industry and that the industry was indeed widely extended, that its costly products were of great variety and that some of them were exported to distant markets; in fine, that the account in Joshua is characterized by a greater verisimilitude.

BACA, bā'ka (בָּקה, bākhā)" In Av in Ps 84 6, where RV has "the valley of Weeping," with a marginal variant which is best put in the form, "the valley of the balsam-trees." The word is derived based only in the religion of Babylonia of David's battles (2 S 5 23 24; 1 Ch 14 14 15). There the is "the mulberry tree," with "the balsam-trees" in the margin in RV. Conjecturally the word is, by variant spelling, of the stem which denotes weeping; the tree is called "weeper" from some habit of the trickling of its gum or of the moisture on it; the valley of weeping is not a geographical locality, but a picturesque expression for the experiences of those whose strength is in Jeh, and who through His grace find their sorrow changed into blessings.

BACHHIDES, bab-ik'hids (Βαχχίδαι, Babchideis): B., ruler over Mesopotamia and a faithful friend of both Antiochus Epiphanes and Demetrius Soter, established at the request of the latter the rulership over Judaea for Aleimus, who, desiring to become high priest, had made false accusations against Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 7 S 7 f; Ant, XII, x, 2). B. is sent the second time to Judaea after the Syrian general Nicanor was killed near Adasa and Judas Maccabaeus had gained control of the government (1 Mac 9 1 f; Ant, XII, x). B. after an unsuccessful battle near Bethbaath or Bethora made peace with Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabee (1 Mac 9 58 f; Ant, XIII, i). In 1 Mac 10 12 and 2 Mac 8 30 reference is made to the strongholds B. built during his 2d campaign against Jerus (1 Macc 9:50). Cf Alcimus; Bithriasis; Jonathan Maccabees; Judas Maccabaeus; Adasa; Nicanaor. A. L. Breisch

BACCHUS, bā-kūs (Bacchos, Bakhchos): One of the "holy singers" who put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9:24). Omitted in Ex 10.

BACCHUS, Bac't'rus (Baχεχ'φος, Bakchois): The god of wine. His worship had extended over the whole Gr and Rom world cents. Before the Christian era, and had degenerated into an orgy of drunkenness and unmanly immoralities, possibly under the influence of oriental Baal worship, such as the Heb prophets condemned. It has been surmised that Dionysus was originally not a Gr, but an oriental deity. His worship had been introduced into Egypt, perhaps by the Ptolemies, and Ptolemy Philopator (222-204 BC) had branded the Jews there with his emblem, the sign of the ivy. When Antiochus Epiphanes made his assault upon Jerusalem in the year 168 BC, he determined to exterminate the worship of Jeh, which he recognized as the strength of the Jewish resistance, and to replace it by Gr religion. All worship of Jeh and the observance of Jewish rites, such as the Sabbath and circumcision, was prohibited. Heathen worship soon set up all over Judaea, and in the temple at Jerus on the altar of burnt offering an altar to Jupiter was erected, "the abomination that maketh desolate" (Dan 11:31), and a swine was sacrificed upon it (see ABDONATION, DESTRUCTION). The immoral practices associated with heathen worship in those days established themselves in the temple. When this feast of Bacchus (Dionysus) with all its revelry came round, the Jews were compelled to go in procession in honor of Bacchus (Dionysus), wearing wreaths of ivy, the emblem of the god (2 Macc 6:7). Some years later, when the worship of Jeh had been restored, Nicanaor the general of Demetrius I, in conducting the war against Judas Maccabaeus, threatened the priests that, unless they delivered Judas up as a prisoner, "he would raise the temple of God even with the ground, break down the altar, and erect there a temple unto Bacchus (Dionysus) for all to see" (2 Macc 14:13). See DIONYSUS.

BACCHUS, B. of Grece, said "Bacchus," Sc. Kent, Hist of the Jewish People, I, 328-29; Jos, Ant, XII, v. 4. T. REES

BACCHUS, Bac-s'nor (Bac'h'phn, Bakh'n): An officer in the army of Judas Maccabaeus engaged in war against Gorgias, governor of Idumaea (2 Macc 12:55). Cf Ant, XII, viii, 6.

BACHRISTE, bak'řt. See BECHRER.

BACK, BACK PARTS: (1) (uכנ, aẖar, "back side" as in AV): "He led the flock to the back of the wilderness" (Ex 3:1), i.e., "to the pasture-lands on the other side of the desert from the Midianite encampments." (2) (נִנ, aẖor, "hinder part," "the West"): Used of God in an anthropomorphic sense ("Thou shalt see my back," Ex 33:23) to signify "the afterglow of the Divine radiance," the faint reflection of God's essential glory. See also Isa 36:17 and of Jeh 9:2 9. (3) (דָּבֶר, qibit, "back side"): A book written within and on the back (Rev 5:1), "but the back of a book is not the same as the reverse side of a roll. St. John was struck, not only with the contents of the double roll, but with the amount of writing it contained" (HDB, I, 231). Cf Ezk 2:10. M. O. EVANS

BACKBITE, bak'bit (גַּרְגֶּל, rāqhal; סֹלָדוֹ, do-lō): To slander the absent, like a dog biting behind the back, where one cannot see; to go about as a tablebearer. He that backbiteth (RV slandereth) not with his tongue" (Ps 15:3).

Backbiters, bak'bit-ërs (Gr κατάλαλοι, katālaloi): Men who speak against. Vulg "detractors" (Rom 1:30).

BACKSIDE, bak'sid'. See BACK.

BACKSIDE, bak'sl'd (גַּרְשֶׁם, rēsheb, hushābad; Hos 11:7; 14:4 and often in Hos and Jer, שֹׁבֶכָּה, shōbēkah; יִזְדּוֹ, shōdēb, in Jer, 4 times: all meaning "turning back or away," "apostate," "rebellious"; רְכִּי, rēky, in Hos 4:15 = "stubborn," "rebellious"; RV "stubborn"): In all places the word is used of Israel forsaking Jeh, and with a reference to the covenant relation between Jeh and the nation, conceived as a marriage tie which Israel had violated. The word is used of a husband and wife. In Jer, when the other gods she had proved unfaithful (Jer 3:8-14; 14:7; Hos 14:4). It may be questioned whether Israel was guilty so much of apostasy and defection, as of failure to grow with the growing revelation of God. The prophets saw that their contemporaries fell far short of all their own ideal, but they did not realize how far their predecessors also had fallen short of the rising prophetic standard in ideal and action. See APOSTASY.

Backslider, bak'sl'd'r (גרָשֲד, ṣārēb): "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways" (Prov 14:14). But RV "backslider" conveys the wrong impression of an apostate. The Hebrew expression here implies simply non-adherence to the right, "the bad man reaps the fruit of his act" (Toy, Prov, in loc.). T. REES

BADGER, bād'ēr (בָּדֶג, bdag; taḥash or taḥash): The word taḥash occurs in the descriptions of the tabernacle in Ex 25, 26, 35, 36 and 39, in the directions for making the ark (Ex 25:10), the tabernacle (Ex 25:10), the table (Ex 25:10), and in Nu 4, and in only one other passage, Ezk 16:10, where Jerus is spoken of as a maid clothed and adorned by her Lord. In nearly all these passages the word taḥash occurs with ב or, "skin," rendered: AV "badgers' skins," RV "sealskin," RV "papoose-skin," LXX δέρνατα ὁρακίθνη. In all the passages cited in Ex and Nu these skins are mentioned as being used for coverings of the tabernacle; in Ezk 16:10, for shoes or sandals. The LXX rendering would mean purple or blue skins, which however is not favored by Talmudic writers or by modern grammarians, who incline to believe that taḥash is the name of an animal. The rendering, "badger," is favored by the Talmudic writers and by the possible etymological connection of the word with the Lat taxua and the German Dachs. The main objection seems to be that badgers' skins would probably not have been easily available to the Israelitcs. The badger, Meles taxus, while fairly abundant in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, does not seem to occur in Sinai or Egypt. A seal, Monachus albinotus (Arab. fukmeh), the porpoise, Phocoena communis, and the common dolphin, Delphinus delphis, are all found in the Mediterranean (cf. dugong, Haliaetha dugong), inhabits the Indian Ocean and adjoining waters from the Red Sea to Australia. The Arab. takhas or dakhas is near to tahash and is applied to the dolphin, which is also called delfin. It may be used also for the porpoise or even the seal, and is said by Strittram and others to be applied to the dugong. The statement of Gesenius (Boston, 1850, s.v. "tahash") that the Arabs of Sinai wear sandals of dugong skin is confirmed by recent travelers, and is of interest with reference to Ezek 16 10, "I... shod thee with badgers' skin" (AV). The dugong is a marine animal from 5 to 9 ft. in length, frequenting the shore and feeding upon seaweed. It belongs to the order Sirenia. While outwardly resembling Cetacea (whales and porpoises), the Sirenia are really more allied to the Dugongidae, or hoofed animals. The dugong of the Indian Ocean and the manatee of the Atlantic and of certain rivers of Africa and South America, are the only living representatives of the Sirenia. A third species, the sea-cow of Behring Sea, became extinct in the 19th cent. The seal and porpoise of the RV, the dolphin, and the dugong are all of about the same size and all inhabit the seas bordering on Egypt and Sinai, so that all are possible candidates for identification with the tahash. Of the four, recent opinion seems most in favor of the dugong.

Mr. S. M. Perdann has suggested (Zoologist, ser. 4, XII, 236, 1908) that the okapi is the animal indicated by tahash.

Gesenius (Leipzig, 1905) cites Bondi (Agysulacae, i. f.) who adduces the Egyptian root tbs and makes the expression "*for tahash" mean "soft-dressed skin." This suits the context in every passage and is a very promising explanation. Alfred Ely Day

BAEAN, bē'ān (vulg. Baalāv, huwāl Baalan; AV Bean; 1 Mac 5:4): A tribe mentioned only because of its malignant hatred of the Jews. Its aggressive hostility against their religion and the rebuilding of their sanctuary duplicated the conspiracy of Sanballat and his confederates against the restoration of Jerusalem and the temple in the days of Nehemiah (cf Neh 4:7,8). Utterly exterminanted by Judas Maccabaeanus who burned alive, in towers, many of the imprisoned people. See M.LON.

BAG: Bags of various kinds are mentioned in the Eng. Bible, but often in a way to obscure rather than to render the original.

(1) "Bag" is used for a Heb word which means a shepherd's "bag," rendered "wallet" in RV. This "bag" of the shepherd or "haversack" of the traveler was of size sufficient for one or more days' provisions. It was made of the skin of an animal, ordinarily undressed, as most of the other "bags" of ancient times were, and was carried slung across the shoulder. This is the "scrip for the journey" (rābān, pārāa) mentioned in Mt 10:10 and Jn 11:15 (AV). ("Scrip" is OE, now obsolete.) A similar word appears in 1 S 17:40-49 which had to be explained even to Heb readers by the gloss, "the shepherd's bag," but which is likewise rendered "wallet" by the ARV.

(2) "Bag" translates also a word (βαλανίον, bαλλανίον) which stands for the more finished leather pouch, or satchel which served as a "purse" (see Christ's words, Lk 10:4 AV: "Carry neither purse, nor scrip," and 12:33 AV: "Provide yourselves bags which wax not old"). The word rendered "purse" in Mt 10:9: "Get you no gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses;" Mk 6:8: "No money in their purse," is a different word entirely (τὸν, zōnd, the true rendering of which is "girdle" (RVn). The oriental "girdle," though sometimes of crude leather, or woven camel's hair (see Gen), is often of fine material and elegant workmanship, and was either made hollow so as to carry money, or when of silk or cloth, worn in folds, when the money was carried in the folds.

(3) The small "merchant's bag" often knotted in a handkerchief for carrying the weights such as is mentioned in Dt 25:13: "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small," was another variety. This too was used as a "purse," as in the case of the proposed common purse of the wicked mentioned in Prov 1:14: "We will all have one purse," and sometimes carried in the girdle (cf Isa 46:6).

!Bag: Scrip.

(4) Then there was the "bag" (גֶלֶפֶת, ge'ūr, rendered "bundle" in Gen 42:35) which was the favorite receptacle for valuables, jewels, as well as money, used fig. with fine effect in 1 S 25:29: "The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life;" ("the Jewels-case") (see K 25:10 where the money of the temple was said to be put up "tied up in bags"). This was a "bag" that could be tied with a string: "Behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack," and (cf Prov 7:20) "He hath taken a bag of money with him" (cf Bag 1:6: "earnest wages to put it into a bag with holes"). A seal was sometimes put on the knot, which occasioned the figure of speech used in Job 14:16-17, "Dost thou not watch over my sin? My transgression is sealed up in a bag;" i.e., it is securely kept and reckoned against me (cf also 1 S 7:5; 21:5 where the Heb ḫāl, ḫālī, is rendered by "vessels" and stands for receptacles for carrying food, not necessarily bags).

(5) Another Heb word ḫālīn, hārīf; Aram. hārīf, is used, on the one hand, for a "bag" large enough to hold a talent of silver (see 2 K 8:23, "bound two talents of silver in two bags"), and on the other, for a dainty lady's satchel, such as is found in Isa 3:22 (wrongly rendered "crisping pins" in AV). This is the most adequate Heb word for a large bag.

(6) The "bag" which Judas carried (see Jn 12:6 AV, "He was a thief and had the bag"); cf 13:29) was in reality the small "bag" (RVn) originally used for holding the mouthpieces of wind instruments (Kennedy, in 1-vol HDB). The Heb (גֶלֶפֶת, gēlef, found only here) of 1 S 6:8, rendered "coffer" in EV and tr. γλωσσόκομος, glossókōmos, by Jos, appears to stand for a small "chest" used to hold the gold figures sent by the Philis as a guilt offering. It is from a word that means "to wag," "to move to and fro," of the similar word in Aram meaning a bag filled with stones hung at the side of the camel to preserve equilibrium (Gesenius). But the same word Jos uses is found in modern Gr and means "purse" or "bag" (Hdtch). Labeled to "carry the bag" came to mean to be treasurer.

BAGGAGE, bag'āj: (1) (בֶּאַרְכָּה, bārakah, the "impedimenta of an army"): "David left his b. in the hand of the keeper of the b." (1 S 17:22); "at Michmash he layeth up his b." (1 S 10:28). ARV gives b. for "stuff" at 1 S 10:22; 25:13; 30:24.

(2) (ἐροτοκείον, apostekēo: "Beside the b."

(3) "a great and much b." (1 Mac 9:35,39),
“the women and the children and also the b.” (AV “and other b.”); 2 Mac 12 21).

(3) ἀποστολοῖς, apostoloi, “to make ready for leaving,” “to pack up baggage”. “We took up [made ready RV] our b.” (Act 21 15, AV “carriages”); i.e. what they could call “Eng., luggages”; but others understand the term of the loading of the baggage animals.

BAGO, bāgō (A. Bayýt, Bagó; B. BAYH, Banaí = Bigvai [Ezr 8 14]): The descendants of B. returned with Ezra to Jerus (1 Esd 8 40).

BAGOAS, ba-go’as (Bayúsas, Bagóso): The eunuch in charge of the household of Holofernes whom the latter engaged to bring Judith to his palace (Jth 12 11 ff; 13 18; 14 14). Cf Judit.

BAGOI, bag’o (A. Bayó, Bagó; B. Boraí, Bosaí = Bigvai [Ezr 2 14; Neh 7 19]): The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 14).

BAHARUMITE, ba-hā’rum-it, BAHUMITE, bār-hā’mitt (1 Ch 11 33; 2 8 23 81): A native of Bahurim (q.v.).

BAHURIM, ba-hū’rim (ב,’”ר), Bahurim; Ba’orim, Baoraim, usually, but there are variants): A place in the territory of Benjamin which lay on an old road from Jerus to Jericho followed by David in his flight from Absalom (2 S 15 32—16 5 ff.). It ran over the Mount of Olives and down the slopes to the E. The Talm identifies it with Alemath, the modern Almít, about a mile beyond ‘Arámít, going from Jerus. If this identification is correct Vady ‘Arámát may be the brook of water (2 S 17 20). Here Paltiel was parted from his wife Michal by Abner (2 S 3 16). It was the home of Shimei, who ran along a ridge of the hill cursing and throwing stones at the fugitive king (2 S 16 5; 1 K 2 5). In Bahurim Jonathan and Ahimaaz, the messengers of David, were concealed in a well by a loyal woman (2 S 17 18 ff). Asmaveth, one of David’s heroes, was a native of Bahurim. In 2 S 23 31 we should read, as in 1 Ch 11 33, Barahumite.

BAITERUS, bāt’ér-us (Ba‘toro, Baî-toréos; AV Meterus): The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 17). Omitted in Ezr 2 and Neh 7.

BAJITH, bā’ith. See BAYITH.

BAKBAKKAR, bak-bâ’kar (“bebek̩ar”, bakbâkar, “investigator”): A Levite (1 Ch 9 15).

BAKBUK, bak-buk (“bebek̩”, bakbûk, “bottle”): perhaps eponymostical, referring to the clacking noise created by the pouring out of the contents of a bottle=Acub [1 Esd 5 31]): The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 58).

BAKBUKIAH, bak-bû’ki-a (“bebek̩yâh”, bakbukiah, “the Lord pours out”):

(1) A Levite who “dwelt in Jerus” after the return from Babylon (Neh 11 17).

(2) A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (Neh 12 9).

(3) A Levite and porter keeping “the watch at the store-houses of the gates” (Neh 12 25).

BAKEMEATS, bâk’mē’es: Only in Gen 40 17 AV and ERV. “All manner of baked food for Pharaoh” ARV. Any kind of meat baked or cooked. See BREAD; FOOD.

BAKING, bâ’king. See BREAD.

BAKING PAN. See BREAD; PAN.

BALAAM, bâl’âm (בּלָא, bil’âm, “deceiver”): The son of Beor, from a city in Mesopotamia called Pethor, a man possessing the gift of prophecy, whose remarkable history may be found in Nu 22 24; cf 31 8; 10; Dt 23 4; Josh 13 22; 24 9; Neh 13 2; Mic 6 5; 2 Pet 2 15; Jude ver 11; Rev 2 14.

When the children of Israel pitched their tents in the plains of Moab, the Moabites entered into an agreement with the Moabites of the East, and one sort of an alliance with the Midianites. At the instigation of Balak, at that time king of the Moabites, the elders of the two nations were sent to Balaam to induce him, by means of a bribe, to pronounce a curse on the advancing hosts of the Israelites. But in compliance with God’s command B. refused to go with the elders. Quite different was the result of a second request enhanced by the higher rank of the messengers and by the more alluring promises on the part of Balak. Not only did God permit B. to go with the men, but he actually commanded him to do so, cautioning him, however, to act according to further instructions. While on his way to Balak, this instruction was strongly impressed on the mind of B. by the strange behavior of his ass and by his encounter with the Angel of the Lord.

Accompanied by Balak who had gone out to meet the prophet, B. came to Kiriat-husoth. On the next morning he was brought up “into the high places of Baal” commanding a partial view of the camp of the Israelites. But instead of a curse he pronounced a blessing. From there he was taken to the top of Peor, yet this change of places and external views did not alter the tendency of B.’s parables; in fact, his spirit even soared to greater heights and from his lips fell glowing words of praise and admiration, of benediction and glorious prophecy. This, of course, fully convinced Balak that all further endeavors to persuade the seer to comply with his wishes would be in vain, and the two parted.

Nothing else is said of B., until we reach Nu 31. Here in ver 8 we are told of his violent death at the hands of the Israelites, and in ver 16 we learn of his shameful counsel which brought disgrace and disaster into the ranks of the chosen people.

Now, there are a number of interesting problems connected with this remarkable story. We shall try to solve at least some of the more important ones.

2. Problems

(1) Was B. a prophet of Jeh?

For an answer we must look to Nu 22—24. Nowhere is he called a prophet. He is introduced as the son of Beor and as a man reputed to be of great personal power (cf Nu 22 60). The cause of this is to be found in the fact that he had intercourse of some kind with God (cf Nu 22 9.20; 22 22—35; 23 4; 23 16). Furthermore, it is interesting to note how B. was enabled to deliver his parables. First it is said: “And Jeh put a word in B.’s mouth” (Nu 23 5; cf ver 16), a procedure seemingly rather mechanical, while nothing of the kind is mentioned in Nu 24. Instead we meet with the remarkable sentence: “And when B. saw that it pleased the Lord to show Jael, he went not, as at the other times, to meet with enchantments ... ” (Nu 24 1), and then: “the Spirit of God came upon him” (ver 26). All this is very noteworthy and highly instructive, esp. if we compare it with that vision of the man whose eye is opened saith; he saith, who heard the words of God, who seeth the vision of the of God: such is the character of B., the remarkable 3T type and, in a sense, the prototype of Judas Iscariot.

In 2 Pet 2 15 B.'s example is used as a means to illustrate the pernicious influence of insincere Christian teachers. The author might have alluded to B. in the passage immediately preceding. 2 Pet 2 15 because of his abominable counsel. This is done in Rev 2 14. Here, of course, B. is the type of a teacher of the church who attempts to advance the cause of God by advocating an unholy alliance with the ungodly and worldly, and so conforming the life of the church to the spirit of the flesh.

BALAC, bāl’āk. See Balak.

BALADAN, bal’a-dan (74972, bal’dād’ān, "He [i.e. Merodach] has given a son"): Baladan is said in 2 K 20 12 and Isa 39 1 to have been the father of Berodach (Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon). Some have thought that the Bib. writer was wrong here, inasmuch as it is said in the inscriptions of Sargon (Annals, 228, 315; P., 122), that Merodach-Baladan was the son of Yakin. It is evident, however, from the analogy of Jehu, who is called by the Assyrians the king of Omri, that Yakin is to be looked upon as the founder of the dynasty or kingdom, rather than as the father of Merodach-Baladan. The Bith Yakin, over which Merodach-Baladan is said to have been king, corresponds exactly to the phrase Bith Khumria, or House of Omri, over which Jehu is said to have ruled. There is no reason, then, for supposing that there is an error in either case. There is, however, good reason for believing that the Merodach-Baladan of the Book of Kings was the son of another king of the same name. That only the latter part of the father's name is here mentioned may be compared with the Shimlan of Hos 10 14 for the more fully written Shalmaneser of 2 K 17 3, and with the Jareb of Hos 5 13 and 10 6, probably for Sennacherib. Such abbreviation of proper names was usual among the Assyrians and Babylonians. See Tallquist, Nomenbuch, xiv—civ.

BALAH, bā’la (74972, bāl’āh; Be’lah, Bālā): A place, unidentified, in the territory of Simeon (Josh 19 3), called Bilhah in 1 Ch 4 29. It may be identical with Baalath in Judah (Josh 15 29).

BALAK, bāl’āk (74972, bālāh, "devastator" or "one who lays waste"): Mentioned in connection with the story of Balaam (Nu 22-24; of Josh 24 9; Jgs 11 25; Mic 6 5; Rev 2 14). He was the king of Moab who hired Balaam to pronounce a curse on the Israelites. See Balaam.

BALAMON, bal’a-mon (Balāwān, Balāmān; AV Balam): In the field between Balamon and Dothaim Manasseh, the husband of Judith, was buried (Jud 8 3). Cf Baal-hamon (Cant 8 11).

BALANCE, bal’āns: The Eng. word "balance" is from the Lat. bilans "having two scales" (bi = "two" and lance = "plate," or "scale"). It is used to render three Heb. words: (1) דַּבֵּשׁ, mōšēnayim (Lev 19 36; Job 6 2; Ps 62 9; Prov 11 1; Isa 40 12 15; Jer 32 10, etc); (2) דִּבְנָא, kāneh (Isa 46 6), and (3) כֹּפֶל, peles (Prov 16 11). It is found in the sing., e.g. "a just balance" (Prov 16 11); "a pair of balances" (Rev 6 5, etc), as well as in the plur., e.g. "just balances" (Lev 19:36), "weighed in the balances" (Dul 5:27, etc).

1. Balances among the Ancient Hebrews; parts, e.g. for similar balances, or suspended from a cord and held in the hand, the arms of the bar were pans, or hooks, from which the things to be weighed were suspended, sometimes in bags.

2. The weights were of stone at first and are so named in Dt 25:13 AVm. A pair of scales (AV "a pair of balances") is used in Rev 6:5 by a figure of speech for the balance as a whole; only once is the beam so used, in Isa 46:6, lit. "weigh silver in the beam." Abraham, we are told (Gen 33:16), "weighed the silver."

3. The System of Weighing Fraud was liable to be exact. The system was liable, however, to various other subtle abuses, which as no mention of them is made in the Bible, is a matter of speculation.

4. "A false balance is an abomination to Jehovah" (Prov 11:1; 20:23), and "the beam balances" (Prov 11:16; 20:23), and "the balance and scales are Jehovah's" (Prov 15:11). Hos 12:4. "Wicked" 7 condemns "the balances of deceit" in the hand of the wicked; Am (8:5 AV) Condemns or expresses on "falsifying the balances by deceit," and Mic (6:11) denounces "false balances." Indeed, the righteousness of a just balance and true weights, and the iniquity of false ones are everywhere emphasized by the law-makers, prophets and moral teachers of Israel, and the preacher or teacher who would expose and denounce such things in God's name today need be at no loss for texts and precedents. See Weights and Measures.

Balancings, bal'ans-ins: "The balancings of the clouds" (Job 37:16), the manner in which they are poised and supported in the air, alike with their mysterious spreadings and motions, challenge the strongest intellect to explain.

Balasamus, ba-las'a-mus. See Balasamus.

Balldocust, bold lô'kust. See Locust.

Balldness, bold'ness (בָּלָד, korhâh): The reference in the Bible to baldness is not to the natural loss of hair, but to baldness produced by shaving the head. This was practised as a mark of mourning for the dead (Lev 21:5; Isa 15:2; 22:12); as the result of any disaster (Am 8:10; Mic 1:16). The custom arose from the fact that the hair was regarded as a special ornament. It was the custom of the people of the land, and the Israelites were strictly forbidden to practise it (Lev 21:5; Deut 14:1). These are striking passages with reference to the knowledge the Israelites had concerning the future life. This is saying to them what Paul said to the Thessalonians (1 Thess 4:13). To call one a "bald head" was an epithet of contempt, and was sometimes applied to persons who were not naturally bald. It was the epithet applied by certain infidel young men to Elisha...
(2 K 2:34:24.) In a fig. sense it is used to express the barrenness of the country (Jer 47:5). See H AIR; SHA VE.

JACOB W. KAPP

BALL, böv (בּוֹ, dôr): A rare Heb word used in this sense in Isa 22:18, and correctly rendered in RV "He will return to the city round and round, and toss thee like a ball into a large country." De Or., Böttcher, Jastrow, following Talm, regard the noun as kaddôr, but perhaps incorrectly. See also Gameus.

BALM, bâm (בּּם, ἐκβόλιον, ἐκβολίως, LXX ἐκβολίως, ἐκβολίωτα): The name of an odoriferous resin said to be brought from Gilead by Ishmaelite Arabs on their way to Egypt (Gen 37:25). It is translated "balm" in AV and RV, but is called "mastic," RVm. In Gen 43:11 it is one of the gifts sent by Jacob to Joseph, and in Ezek 27:17 it is named as one of the exports from Judaea to Tyre. The prophet Jeremiah refers, fig., to its medicinal properties as an application to wounds and as a sedative (8:22; 46:11; 51:8). The name is derived from a root signifying "to leak," and is applied to it as being an exudation. There is a sticky, honey-like gum resin prepared at the present day at Jericho, extracted from the Balansodaiglæpsa, grow in the Ghôr, and sold to travelers in small tin boxes as "Balm of Gilad," but it is improbable that this is the real σκορπικός and it has no medicinal value. The material to which the classic authors applied the name is that known as Mecca balsam, which is still imported from Egypt to Arabia, as it was in early times. This is the exudation from the Balansodoiglæpsa, opobalsamus, a native of southern Arabia and Abyssinia. The tree is small, ragged-looking and with a yellowish bark like that of a plane tree, and the exudation is said to be gathered from its smaller branches. At the present day it grows nowhere in Pal. Dr. Post and other botanists have sought for it on the Ghôr and in Gilead, and have not found it, and there is no trace of it in the neighborhood of Jericho, which Pliny says is its only habitat. Strabo describes it as growing by the Sea of Galilee, as well as at Jericho, but both these and other ancient writers give inconsistent and incorrect descriptions of the hand. We learn from Theophrastus that many of the spices of the farther East reached the Mediterranean shore through Pal, being brought by Arab caravans which would traverse the indefinitely bounded tracts of Jordan in which the name Gilad is given, and it was probably thus that the balm reached its local name. Mecca balsam is an orange-yellow, tenacious fluid, mildly irritating to the skin, possibly a weak local stimulant and antiseptic, but of very little remedial value.

ALEX. MACALISTER

BALM OF GILEAD: The people of Jericho today prepare for the benefit of pilgrims a "Balm of Gilead" from the zakâtâm (Balanites Aegyptiaca), but this has no serious claims to be the balm of antiquity. If we are to look beyond the borders of modern Pal we may credit the tradition which claims that Mecca balsam, a product of Balansodendron Gileadense and B. opobalsamus, was the true "balm," and Post (HDB, I, 236) produces evidence to show that these plants were once grown in the Jordan valley. Yet another suggestion, made by Lagarde, is that the σκορπικός was the inspissated juice of the Storax-tree (Styrax officinalis), a common inhabitant of Gilead. See also Balm.

BALNUUS, bal-nû̄s (A, Balōvós, Balōnós; B, Balñōvós, Balñōús = Binnuı́; [Est 10:30]): B put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9:31).

BALSAM, bôl'zam (בּולְצָם, bāzām, בּזָם; ᾠδοματα, ἐκβολίωτα, ὑποματα, thumidomata): Is usually "spices" but in RVm (Cant 5:13; 6:2) is rendered as "balsam." It was an ingredient in the anointing oil of the priests (Ex 25:6; 30:25). The Queen of Sheba brought it as a present to Solomon (1 K 10:10), and of a finer quality (2 Ch 9:9) than that brought as a regular tribute by other visitors (1 K 10:25). In the later monarchy Hezekiah had a treasure of this perfume (2 Ch 32:27) which he displayed to his Bab visitors (Isa 39:20); and after the captivity the priests kept a store of it in the temple (1 Ch 9:30). According to Ezekiel the Syrians imported it from Sheba (27:22). There is a tradition preserved in Jos (Ant, VIII, vi, 6) that the Queen of Sheba brought roots of the plant to Solomon, who grew them in a garden of spices at Jericho, probably derived from the reference to such a garden in Cant 6:13; 8:2. This may be the source of the statements of Strabo, Trogus and Pliny quoted above (see Balm). It was probably of the same substance as the Balm described above, but from the reference in Ex 30:7; 35:8, it may have been used as a generic name for fragrant resins. The root from which the word is derived signifies "to be fragrant," and fragrant balsams or resins are known in modern Arab as bâshâm. The trees called in 2 S 5:23:24 (RVm) "balsam-trees" were certainly not those which yielded this substance, for there are none in the Skrophálēth, but there are both mastic trees and teakwoods in the district between Rephaem and Gezer. When used as a perfume the name bâzām seems to have been adopted, but as a medicinal remedy it is called σκορπικός.

BALTASAR, bâl-tâ'sar (Bal'tasárap, Baltasáar; AV Balbasaar): (1) The Gr of Heb, ἐκβόλιον, bôl'shâ'char, or ἐκβόλιος, bôl'shâ'exar, perhaps corresponding to Bal'dis-kar-usur, "protect the life of the king," the Bab cognomen of Daniel. Cf Belteshazzar (Dnl 1:7; 2:26; 4:8 ff., et al.). (2) B. is also the Gr of the Heb ἐκβόλιον, bôl'shâ'char, or ἐκβόλιος, bôl'shâ'exar, the last king of the Chaldeans corresponding to the Bab Bél-kar-usur; ΚΑΤ, III, 396; Syr Blitshazzar; Vulg Baltassar). Cf Bar 1:11 and Beltschassar (Dnl 5:1ff; 7:1; 8:1). (3) The name of one of the Magi who according to the legend visited Jesus at Bethlehem: Melchior. (4) Gileon from Nínib, Balbasaar from Godasa, Cupar from Tharsis.

A. L. BRESLICH

BAMAH, bâ'má, bâ'mâ (בּמָה, bā'mâh, "high place"): The word appears in Ezek 20:29 where reference is made to former "high-place worship," the prophet speaking with contempt of such manner of worship. Ewald suggests a play of words, בּא, bâ, "come," and מָה, māh, "what," "what māh is the high place [bā-māh] whereunto ye come [bâ]?" It is possible that reference is made to a prominent high place like the one at Gibeon (cf 1 K 3:4; 1 Ch 16:39; 21:29; 2 Ch 1:3) for which the name "Bamah" was retained after the reform mentioned by the prophet.

BAMOTH, bâ'moth, BAMOTH-BAAL, bâ'moth-bâ'al (בּמאּות בּאל, bāmâoth-bâ'al, "high places of Baal"): Bamoth is referred to in Nu 21:19:20, as a station in the journeyings of Israel N. of the Arnon. It is probably the same place as the Bamoth-baal of Nu 22:41 (RVm), whither Balak, king of Moab, conducted Balaam to view and to curse Israel. Bamoth-baal is named in Josh 13:17 as one of the cities given to Reuben, Mesha, on the M. S. speaks of having "rebuilt" Beth-hamoth.

BAN (A. Bān., Bānāni; B. Baniāv., Baǐänd; 1 Esd 5 37 = Tobiah [Ex 2 60; Neh 7 62]; some MSS of the LXX read Bōdā, Bōdā). The descenders of B. are traced through their ancestry to show "how they were of Israel."

BANAIAS, ban-d'IAS (Banaías, Banaisas; 1 Esd 9 35 = Baniānah, [Ex 10 43]): B. put away his "strange wife."

BAND: The Eng. word has two generic meanings, each shading off into several specific meanings: (1) that which holds together, bonds or encircles: a bond; (2) a company of men. The second sense may philologically and logically have been derived from the first, men being held together by social ties. Both meanings appear in OT and NT representing various Heb and Gr words.

BAND: A flaxen rope ('Ps 15 14'); a band of iron and brass (Dnl 4 15 23); metaphorically of a false woman's hands (Ecc 7 26).

(a) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): "The bands of the wicked have robbed me" (AV of Ps 119 61), where "bands" = "troops" by mistr; RV "The cords of the wicked have wrapped me round"; plur. קָרֵבָה = "bands" (cf Isr 26 20) signifies the prophet's symbolic staff representing the brotherhood between Judah and Israel (Zec 11 7 14). (b) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): "I drew them with cords of men, with bands of love" (Hos 11 4; cf Ezek 3 25; 4 8; Job 39 10). (c) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): the edge of the round opening in the robe of the ephod with a band (RV "hinging") refers often to the side of the robe of Israel (cf Ps 132 7). (d) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): bands (RV "bonds") of wickedness (Isa 56 6); bands (= pains) in death (Ps 73 4); RV ("pangs"). (e) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): the cross bar of oxen's yoke, holding them together (Lev 26 18; Ezek 34 27 AV; RV "bars."). (g) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): a fetter: "Who hath loosed the bonds of the swift stag?" (Job 39 5; Ps 4 3); bond (4). (i) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): bands (cf Ezek 34 27 AV; RV "bards."). (h) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): Canst thou . . . lose the bands of Orion?" (only in Job 38 31).

(i) (בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס): a fetter: that which binds together: of the chains of a lunatic or prisoner (Lk 8 39; Acts 16 26; 26 30 AV), metaphorically of the mystic union of Christ and the church (Col 2 19). These words are often trd by "bond" in AV and RV. (j) (בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס): the rudder's bands (only in Acts 27 40).

(2) A company of men (a) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): a band of soldiers (S. G. K. 11 24 A; S. K. 13 6 B; 26 13; 13 20 21; 24 2; 1 Ch 7 4; 12 18 21; 2 Ch 22 1). So RV (except in 1 K 11 24, "troop"). (b) (בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס, בָּנֹס): "head" = "division": "The Chaldeans made three bands" (Job 1 17); 1 Ch 12 23 RV translates "heads." (c) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): "a band of men" RV the "host" (only in 1 S 19 26). (d) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): the wings of an army," only in Ezek armes of the King of Judah (12 14; 17 21); of Gomer and of Togarmah (38 6); of Gog (RV "hordes") (38 9 22; 39 4). (e) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): camp: only in Gen 32 7 10; RV "companies." (f) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): the meeting place of the tribes to discuss the war (Num 24 27). (g) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): a "company" (see RVm) of Rom soldiers; the tenth part of a legion, about 600 men: (Mt 27 27; Mk 15 16; Acts 10 1; 21 31; 27 1). A smaller detachment of soldiers (Jn 18 3 12; cf 2 Macc 8 23; Jth 14 11). (h) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): to make a conspiracy": "The Jews banded together" (Acts 23 12). (i) (קָרֵבָה, קָרֵבָה): the Roman Band (σταυροσφαίρα Σταυροσφαίρα) to which Julius, the Roman centurion who had charge of St. Paul as a prisoner on his voyage to Rome, belonged, was a cohort apparently stationed at Caesarea at the time (Acts 27 1). Schürer (GJV, P 461 f) is of opinion that it was one of five cohorts mentioned by Jos, recruited in Samaria and called Sebastanes from the Gr name of the city of Samaria (Sebastos). This particular cohort had in all likelihood for its full name Cohors Augusta Sebastanorum, Augusta being an honorific title of which examples are found in the case of auxiliary troops. Sir William Ramsay, following Mommsen (St. Paul the Traveller, 315, 348), thinks it denotes a body of legionary centurions, selected from legions serving abroad, who were employed by the emperor on confidential business between the provinces and Rome, the title Augusta being conferred upon them as a mark of favor and distinction. The grounds on which the views of Mommsen and Ramsay rest are questioned by Professor Zahn (Introduction to the NT, I, 551 f), and more evidence is needed to establish them. See ARMY (Roman).

(4) The Italian Band (σταυροσφαίρα Σταυροσφαίρα) was a cohort composed of volunteer Rom citizens born in Italy and stationed at Caesarea at this time (Acts 10 1). Schürer maintains that there could have been no Rom cohort there at this time, although he accepts the testimony of inscriptions to the presence of an Italian cohort at a later time. He accordingly rejects the story of Cornelius, holding that the author of the Acts has given in this narrative conditions belonging to a later time (GJV, P 462 f). In reply to Schürer, Blass asks why one of the five cohorts mentioned by Jos may not have been composed of Rom citizens living at Caesarea or Sebastos, and bearing this name (Blass, Acta Apostolorum, 124). From a recently discovered inscription, Sir W. M. Ramsay has ascertained that there was an Italian cohort stationed in Syria in 69 AD, which heightens the probability of one actually being found in Caesarea at 41-44 AD, and he shows that even if his cohort was at the time on duty elsewhere a centurion like Cornelius may well have been known. The cohort time mentioned (Expositor, 5th ser., IV, V, with Schürer's rejoinder). The subject of detached service in the provinces of the Rom Empire is admittedly obscure, but nothing emerges in this discussion to cast doubt upon the historical character of St. Luke's narrative. 8. Three Levites mentioned in connection with the temple worship at Ezra's time (Neh 9 4.5).
9. A Levite who sealed the covenant with Neh (Neh 10 13).
10. A leader of the people who also signed the covenant (Neh 10 14).
11. One whose son Uzzi was overseer of the Levites at Jerus (Neh 11 22). See BENNUI.

BANIAS, ba-nil'as (B, Bawias, Bantis; A, Bati, Banis; AV Band; L, Bann: B. BANIAS, (1 Esd 8 30)). An ancestor of Shecaniah. The descendants of B. returned with Ezra to Jerus. The name is omitted (Ezr 8 10), perhaps due to the oversight of a copyist or a mistaken reading of "bānū, bā-ne, "sons of," for "bāhānā, bānä.

BANIAS. See CAESAREA PHILIPPPI.

BANID, ba-nid (1 Esd 8 36): In RV BANIAS, which see.

7. (םבש, bēsah, "mound," "rampart"): "Cast up a b. against the city" (2 S 20 15, ERV "mount"; ARV "mound") (cf 2 K 22 22; Isa 37 35).
8. (םבש, bēsah, "mound," "rampart"): "Cast up a b. against the city" (2 S 20 15, ERV "mount"; ARV "mound") (cf 2 K 22 22; Isa 37 35).

BANK, Banking: "Banking" in the full modern sense, of taking money on deposit and lending it out on interest, is of comparatively recent origin. A few "banks of deposit" were founded in Italy in the Middle Ages, but the earliest "banks of issue," of the modern sort, were those of Amsterdam (1609) and Hamburg (1619), beginning in the 17th cent. The law of Moses forbade Israelites to charge each other interest (Ex 22 25; Lev 25 35-37; Dt 23 19), but let them lend on interest to Gentiles (Dt 23 20), though this law was often evaded or disregarded (Neh 5 10.12). Banks and banking, however, are found in operation in the Gr cities; "money-changers," sitting at their tables (trápeza) in the market place, both changed coins and took money on deposit, giving high interest; and banking of a sort, in its incipient stages, existed among the ancient Hebrews. But the Phoenicians are now thought to have been the inventors of the money-changing, money-lending system which is found in more or less modified and developed forms among ancient peoples and in full development and operation in the palmy days of the Rom Empire. In the Gr-Rom period, without doubt, bankers both received money on deposit, paying interest, and let it out at a higher rate, or employed it in trade, as the publicani at Rome did, in farming the revenues of a province (Plumptre).

1. The Gr money-changer, like his modern Syrian counterpart, the sardj (see PEFS, 1904, 40 ff, where the complexity of exchange in places among the Ancients is graphically described), changed the large coins current into those of smaller denominations, e.g. "silver, or silver for gold, or copper for silver.

2. But no mean part of his business was the exchanging of foreign money, and even the money of the country of a non-Phoen standard, for shekels and half-shekels on this standard, the latter being accepted only in payment of the temple dues (see MONEY). The "money-changers" of Mt 21 12, as the Gr signifies, were men who made small change. Such men may be seen in Jerus now with various coins piled in slender pillars on a table (cf epi trápeza, Lk 19 23), ready to be used in changing money for a premium into such forms, or denominations, as would be more current or more convenient to immediate use.

3. "Usury" in EV is simply OE for what we today call "interest," i.e. the sum paid for the use of money, Lat usura; and "interest" should take the place of it in all passages in the OT and NT, where it has such significance.

4. The Gr word rendered (τάξις, "usury") in the NT (see Lk 19 23) means lit. "what is born of money," "what money brings forth or produces." "Usury" has come to mean "absorb interest," but did not mean this at the time of AV, 1611.

5. In Christ's time, and immediately following, there was great need for money-changers and their services, esp. on the part of foreign Jews whom custom forbade in NT to put any but Jewish coins into the temple treasury (see Mk 12 41). It was mainly for the convenience of these Jews of the Dispersion, and because it was in order to a sacred use, that the people thought it proper to allow the money-changers to set up their tables in the outer court of the temple (see Mt 21 12 ff).

Bank: Money Changer.
money," Jn 2 14, and "changers," Jn 2 15 EV.

Christ upholds the "slothful servant" because he had not given his pound to "the bank" (or "banker," ev trapazer, lit. "on a banker's table"), who, if implied, would have kept it safe and paid interest for it (Lk 19 23 ff). It is noteworthy that the "ten minae" of ver 24 are those acquired by "the good servant" from the 'one' which was first lent him. So these wealthier bankers even then in a way received money on deposit for investment and paid interest on it, after the fashion of the Greeks.

(1) In Christ's parable (Lk 19 23 ff) "the bank" (lit. "a bank," "table") is taken by some to mean "the synagogue," by others to mean 4. Interprete the "church!" (Lange, L, J, I, 1, 414); tations, i.e. it is thought that Christ meant Figurative to teach that the organized body, "synagogue" or "church," might use the gifts or powers of an adherent or disciple, when he himself could not exercise them (cf DCG, art. "Bank").

(2) Then some have thought that Christ was here pointing to prayer as a substitute for good works, when the disciple was unable to do such. Such views seem far-fetched and unnecessary (cf Bruce, Parabola Teaching of Christ, 209 f).

(3) The "money-changers," then as now, had ever to be on guard against false money, which gives point to the oft-quoted extra-scripual saying (agraphon) of Jesus to His disciples: "Be ye expert money-changers" (Gr ginotthai trapestai dikimai; see Origen, in Joann, XIX), which was taken (Clem., Hom., III, 61) to mean, "Be skillful in distinguishing true doctrine from false" (HDB, 1-vol).

BANNAIA, ba-nä'-ya. See SABANNEUS.

BANNAS, ban'-as (Bávos, Binnos; AV Banas): A name occurring in the lists of those who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 26). Bannas and Sudias are represented by Hoodaviah in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

BANNAES, ban'-as (Bəwâs, Bannâs; AV Bannas [1 Esd 9 26]) = Benaiah (Exr 10 25): B. put away his "strange wife."

BANNER, ban'er (Ensign, Standard): The Eng. word "banner" is from bandera, Low Lat, meaning a banner (cf bandum, Lat, which meant first a "band," an organized military troop, and then a "flag"). It has come to mean a flag, or standard, carried at the head of a military band or body, to indicate the line of march, or the rallying point, and it is now applied, in its more extended significance, to royal, national, or ecclesiastical "banners" also. We find it applied sometimes to a streamer on the end of a lance, such as is used by the Arab sheik today. "B." occurs in the following significant OT passages: (1) in the sing., "Lift ye up a b. upon the high mountain" (Isa 13 2 AV); "a b. to them that fear thee" (Ps 60 4); and (2) in the plur., "In the name of our God we will set up our b." (Ps 20 5); "terrible as an army with b." (Cant 6 4).

The Hebrews, it would seem, like the Assyrians, the Egyptians, and other ancient nations, had military ensigns. As bearing upon this question, a very significant passage is that found in Nu 2 2: "The children of Israel shall encamp every man by his own standard, with the ensigns of their fathers' houses." "Standard-bearer" in Is 10 18 AV. They shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth, is not a case in point, but is to be rendered as in RVm, "as when a sick man pineth away."

1. Military Ensigns among the Hebrews

In this noted passage a distinction seems intentionally made (another view is held by some) between the "ensigns of their fathers' houses" (lit. "signs"); cf Ps 74 4, where the reference is thought by some today to be to the standards of Antiochus' army), and "the standards" of the four great divisions of the Heb tribes in the wilderness (cf the "banner" of Cant 2 4 and 6 10). The relation of these to the "standard" of Nu 21 8 f (Heb nês, AV and RV "standard") is by no means clear. The word nês, here transliterated "standard," seems to have meant at first a pole set up on an eminence as a signal for mustering troops (cf "mast" Isa 30 17 ERVm). But it occurs frequently in the prophets both in this lit. and original sense, and in the fig. or derived sense of a rallying point for God's people (see Isa 5 26; 11 10; Jer 4 21 and elsewhere). Here the rendering in EV alternates between "ensign" and "banner" (see HDB, 1-vol, art. "Banner").

Geo. B. Eager

BANNUS, ban'-as (Bəwəs, Bannəs [1 Esd 9 34]) = Bani or Binnui (Exr 10 29,30): The sons of B. put away their "strange wives."

BANQUET, ban'kwet: (1) "Banquet" and "banqueting" in AV always include and stand for wine-drinking, not simply "feast" or "feasting" in our sense. Thus (Cant 2 4), Ancient "He brought me to the banqueting-house" is lit. "the house of wine," and Customs est 7 2 has in the Heb "a banquet of wine." In the NT we see a reflection of the same fact in 1 Pet 4 3 AV. "We walked in excess of wine, banquetings" (Gr "drinkings"); RV "carousing." Of Amos 6 7 AV, "The banquet of them that stretched themselves," where the reference seems to be to reclining at wine-drinkings. See Meals.

The Heb of Job 1 4 (הַֽעַרְבָּאָה, hârâba'ah) AV tr. "make a banquet," which refers to a feast of an arable sort (cf 41 6 AV), though the Heb הַרְבָּאָה, hârâba'ah, "to drink" is not a wine.

See Symposion.
Music, dancing and merriment usually attended all such festivities. Certainly the ancient Hebrews, like other peoples of the ancient East, were very fond of social feasting, and in Christ's day had acquired, with contact with Greeks and Roman luxurious and bibulous habits, that often carried them to excess in their social feasts.

Among the Greeks the word for "feast" (dodechē) is from ἔδοχαμαι "to receive" (cf our Engl. usage, "to receive" and "reception"). This word dodechē is used with πρέπει "it is proper to make" or "give a feast." Cf Mk 5:29 where Levi "made a feast."

(1) "In view of existing customs and abuses, Christ taught His followers when they gave a banquet to invite the poor, etc (Lk 14:13), rather than, as the fashion of the day called for, to bid the rich West and the rich West.

(2) "Banquets" were usually given in the house of the host to specially invited guests (Lk 14:15; Jn 2:2), but much more freedom was accorded to the uninvited than we of the West are accustomed to, as one finds to be true everywhere in the East today. The custom of reclining at meals (see Meals; Tischgäste, etc) was everywhere in vogue among the well-to-do in Christ's day, even in the case of the ordinary meals, the guest leaning upon the left arm and eating with the aid of the right (cf Mt 25:60 "reclining," and 1 Cor 11:20, "the Lord's supper").

(3) "Banquets" were considered normal parts of weddings as they are now throughout the East. Jesus and His disciples were bidden to one at Cana in Galilee, and accepted the invitation (Jn 2:2), and wine-drinking was a part of the feast. The "banquet" Levi gave was in Christ's honor (Lk 5:29). There were numbers present and marked gradations in the places at table (Mt 23:6; Mk 12:39; Lk 14:7; 20:46). Guests were invited in advance, and then, as time-pieces were scarce, specially notified when the feast was ready, which helps to explain Christ's words (Mt 22:4), "All things are ready: come to the marriage" (cf Lk 14:17; Est 5:8; 6:14).

(4) Matthew tells us (22:6) that the Pharisees "love the chief place ("uppermost rooms") AV at feasts."

In Mt 22:34 "made a marriage feast," is rendered by some simply "a feast," because Gr γάμος marriage was used by LXX to translate the Heb for "feast" in Est 1:5. But, as this is the only known example of such a use of γάμος, it is better to take it here in the lit. sense of "marriage feast," as would seem to be required by the words "for his son (Messiah). The Gr is plur. (γάμοις) and the LXX plural in the several passages or stages of the feast (Button, 23; cf Engl. "nuptials")."

The "ruler of the feast" (architrōkimos, Jn 2:8.9), was usually one of the guests, and his business was to see that wine was provided, superintend the drinking, etc (cf Lk 22:27).

(5) Matthew tells us (22:5) that Jesus was to see that wine was provided, superintend the drinking, etc (cf Lk 22:27).

"I have made ready my dinner," "dinner" in Gr is ἀριστον (cf Lk 11:38). "Supper" (Gr δεῖπνον) is found in Mt 23:6 and often in the NT. Both words are used LXX to translate the Heb for "dinner." What was the distinction? A question Thus much may be said in answer: The ἀριστον (EV "dinner") was a meal usually taken about the middle of the forenoon, with variations of earlier or later; the δεῖπνον (EV "supper"), the one taken at the close of the day, often after dark. In Acts, 2:40-2:64, supposes ἦργον's guards (Jgs 3:24) were negligent about noon, "both because of the heat and because their attention was turned to dinner" (ariston). So the "dinner" (ariston) was sometimes as late as noon. Yet Jn (Jn 2:13.15) says of Christ's breakfast "It was seven in the morning when the Lord's breakfast was on some occasions taken shortly after dawn.

(2) Another question raised is this, Were the ancient Jews accustomed to have two or three meals a day? Vambray, quoted by Morison, gives a saying of the Turks that is in point: "There are only two meals a day, the smaller at 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning, the second and larger after sunset." There seems no evidence to sustain the view, maintained by Grimm and entertained by others, that the Jews of Christ's day were accustomed to take a separate and slight meal on rising, as the later Greeks and some of the later Romans did. There is certainly no clear evidence that the Jews of that day had more than two meals a day (see DB, art. "Meals").

(3) The marriage feast of Mt 22:3 f was an ariston, somewhat like an Eng. "wedding-breakfast"; but that in Lk 14:16 f was a deîpnon, which was as usual delayed till after dark (ver 17). Perhaps the ariston in this case was preliminary, while the marriage with its accompanying deîpnon was after dark; such things are not unheard of today (cf Mt 26:20 and 1 Cor 11:20, "the Lord's deîpnon").

LITERATURE

This art. is not a discussion of the whole subject, but is merely a presentation of the Baptist interpretation of the ordinance. The origin and history of the ordinance, as a whole, do not come within the range of the present treatment.

I. Meaning of Baptism.—The vb. used in the NT is βαπτίζω (baptized). The subst. βάπτισμα and its derivatives βαπτιστής are not found in the NT, in the only use in the NT of the nomenclature of baptism except by implication (He 6:2; "the teaching of baptism") where the reference is to the distinction between the Christian ordinance and the Jewish ceremonial ablutions. Some documents have it also in Col 2:12 (cf He 9:10, "divers washings") for a reference purely to the Jewish purifications (of the dispute about purifying in Jn 3:25). The "baptism of the Lord" appears in this sense in Lk 11:38 where the Pharisees marveled that Jesus "had not first bathed himself before breakfast" (noon-day meal). The Mosaic regulations required the bath of the whole body (Lev 14:8) for certain uncleanness. The Mystical (de Baptismo, XV) says that the Jew required almost daily washing. Herodotus (ii.47) says that if an Egyptian "touches a swine in passing with his clothes, he goes to the river and dipes himself (βαπτίζεται) from it" (quoted by Broadus in Comm. on John). See also the Jewish scrupulosity illustrated in Sir 34:25 and Jth 12:7 where baptized occurs. The same thing appears in the correct text in Mk 7:4. "And when they come from the market-place, except they bathe themselves, they eat not the host. Here baptism (the use of ῥαθμός ("sprinkle") is due to the difficulty felt by copyists not familiar with Jewish customs.

B. O.
See also the omission of “couches” in the same verse. The couches were “pallets” and could be dipped into water. It is noteworthy that here rhατίζω is used in contrast with βαπτίζω, showing the difference of βαπτισμός occurs in Jos (Ant, XVIII, v, 2) in connection with John’s baptism (cf also Irenaeus 686 B about Christ’s baptism). In general, however, βαπτίσμα is the subst. found for the ordinance. The vb. βαπτίζω is in reality a frequentative or intensive of βαπτό (“dip”). Examples occur where that idea is still appropriate, as in 2 K 15 14 (LXX) where Naaman is said to have “dipped himself seven times in the Jordan” (εἰς βαπτίσεα). The notion of repetition may occur also in Jos (Ant, XV, iii, 3) in connection with the death of Aristobulus, brother of Mariamne, for Herod’s friends “dipped him as he was swimming, and plunged him under water, in the dark of the evening.” But in general the term βαπτίσμα, as is common with such forms in the late Gr, is simply equivalent to βαπτό (cf Lk 16 24) and means “dip,” “immerse,” just as ριατίζω, like ριατίζω, means simply “sprinkle.”

If βαπτίσμα never occurred in connection with a ceremony, however, there would be no bent in the word on the meaning of the word. There are, indeed, fig. or metaphorical uses of the word as of other words, but the fig. is that of immersion, like our “immersed in cares,” “plunged in grief,” etc. It remains for the reader whether he is to understand for a ceremony or ordinance has changed its significance in the NT as compared with ancient Gr.

It may be remarked that no Baptist has written a lexic of the Gr language, and yet the standard lexic of modern scholars, New English Dictionary, Div ii, II, 319 ff; also Ebersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, Appendix, xii, Baptism of Proselytes). It matters nothing at all to the Baptist contention what is true in this regard. It would not be strange if a bath was required for a Gentile who became a Jew, when the Jews themselves required such frequent ceremonial ablutions. But what was the Jewish initiatory rite called proselyte baptism? Lightfoot (Horae Hebraicae, Mt 3 7) gives the law for the initiatory rite (Laws of Liddell and Scott, Div ii, II, 319 f; also Ebersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, Appendix, xii, Baptism of Proselytes). It would not be strange if a bath was required for a Gentile who became a Jew, when the Jews themselves required such frequent ceremonial ablutions.

2. Prose-lyte Ba-p-tism

Schirer argues ably, if not conclusively, for the idea that this proselyte baptism was in use long before the first mention of it in the 2d cent. (Ecclesiastical History of the Church of Christ, Div ii, II, 319 f; also Ebersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, Appendix, xii, Baptism of Proselytes). It matters nothing at all to the Baptist contention what is true in this regard. It would not be strange if a bath was required for a Gentile who became a Jew, when the Jews themselves required such frequent ceremonial ablutions. But what was the Jewish initiatory rite called proselyte baptism? It matters nothing at all to the Baptist contention what is true in this regard. It would not be strange if a bath was required for a Gentile who became a Jew, when the Jews themselves required such frequent ceremonial ablutions.

But the NT itself makes the whole matter perfectly plain. As soon as he grew to the full age of the son of men, he was circumcised, and according to the custom of his kindred he was immersed in water in order to be received into the covenant of Israel. This is by no means a phrase based on the use of εἰς or βαπτίζω and the use of the river Jordan as the place for baptizing by John the Baptist makes inevitable the notion of immersion unless there is some direct contradictory testimony. It is a matter that should be lifted above verbal quibbling or any effort to disprove the obvious facts. The simple narrative in Mt 3 6 is that “they were baptized of him in the river Jordan.” In Mk 1 9.10 the baptism is described as mergētō a fit in the use of και and ἐκ of Jesus. “was baptized of John in [εἰς] the river Jordan,” a fact straightway coming up out of [εἰς] the water, he saw.” So in Acts 8:38 we read: “They both went down into [εἰς] the water, both Philip and the Convert,” and they were immersed. And when they came up out of [εἰς] the water, Philip caught away Philip.” If one could still be in doubt... about the matter, Paul sets it at rest by the symbolism used in Rom 6:4, "We were buried therefore with him through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so also might we walk in newness of life. The likeness of the submersion and emergence of immersion thus, according to Paul, symbolize the death and burial to sin on the one hand and the resurrection to the new life in Christ on the other. Sunday and Headlam (Church of England) put it thus in their Comm. on Romans (p. 135): "It even symbolically a series of acts corresponding to the redeeming acts of Christ. Immersion = Death. Submersion = Burial (the ratification of death). Emergence = Resurrection." In Col 2:12 Paul again says: "having been buried with him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with him through faith in the working of God, who raised him from the dead." The same image is here presented. Lightfoot (Church of England) on Colossians (p. 182) says: "Baptism is the grave of the old man, and the birth of the new. As he sinks beneath the baptismal waters, the believer buries there all his corrupt affections and past sins; as he emerges thence, he rises regenerate, quickened to new hopes and new life." There is nothing else in the NT to offset this obvious and inevitable interpretation. There are some things which are brought up, but they vanish on examination. The use of "with" after baptism in the English tr is appealed to as disproving immersion. It is quoted to represent the majority of the American Standard Revision, which had no Baptist member at the final revision, substituted "in" for "with." Thus: "I indeed baptized you in water unto repentance" (Mt 3:11; cf also Mk 1:11). But in Mk 1:8 the tr is a needless sticking for the use of the Gr en with the locative case. In Mk 1:8 en is absent in the best MSS, and yet the American Revisers correctly render "in." In Acts 1:5 they seek to draw the distinction between the mere locative and en and the locative. As a matter of fact the locative case alone is amply sufficient in Gr without en for the notion of "in." Thus in Jn 21:8 the tr is: "But the other disciples came in the little boat." There is no thought put "the boat" only the locative case. If it be argued that we have the instrumental case (of the instrumental case of en as in Rev 6:8, "kill with sword"); the answer is that the way to use water as an instrument in dipping is that the water itself is the natural instrument to use the boat (Jn 21:8) as an instrument to get into it. The presence or absence of en with baptizó is wholly immaterial. In either case "dip" is the meaning of the vb. The objection that three thousand people could not have been immersed in Jesus on the day of Pentecost is superficial. Jesus was abundantly supplied with pools. There were 120 disciples on hand, most of whom were probably men (cf the 70 sent out before by Jesus). It is not at all necessary to suppose that the 3 (Matthias was now one of them) apostles did all the baptizing. But even so, that would be only 250 apiece. I myself have baptized 42 candidates in a half-hour in a creek where there would be no delay. It would at most be only a matter of four or five hours for each of the twelve. Among the Telugus this record has been far exceeded. It is sometimes objected that Paul could not have immersed the jailer in the prison; but the answer is that Luke does not say so. Indeed Luke implies just the opposite that Luke 22:51. And he has nothing as in the Gr, parted their ears. "As Amphipolis and nearby Stavropolis, it was the practice to wash the dead, so that the body would not be unduly bloated, and that the mouth might be closed. It was a privilege and duty, not a necessity. It is a picture that is lost when something else is substituted in its place. See Baptismal Regeneration.

5. The "Didache"

Nothing need be said about the Didache, which appears to be the collection of materials used by Clement of Alexandria (c. 150-215). There are some references to baptism in it, but none of the conceptions held by any of the NT writers. The baptismal conception of the Did is a mixture of traditional views and the influence of the Jewish method of purification. It is not the case, as some have supposed, that the Did is a kind of "early" form of the NT baptismal idea, but rather that it is a collection of material from various sources, some of which may date back to the 1st century, but others to later times. The Didache contains only one explicit reference to baptism, and that is in the context of the ordination of elders. It states that the newly ordained elders should be baptized, and that the baptism should be performed by the bishop and his assistants. This reference is important because it indicates that the Didache was written at a time when the church had already begun to establish a formal structure of ordination and leadership. Therefore, the reference to baptism in the context of ordination suggests that the institution of baptism was already well established by the time the Didache was written.

6. Baptismal Regeneration

Baptismal regeneration is necessary to salvation or the means of regeneration, then the sick, the dying, infants, must be baptized, or at any rate something must be done for them if the real baptism (immersion) cannot be performed because of extreme illness or want of water. The Baptismal conception is to protest against the perversion of the significance of baptism as the ruin of the symbol. Baptism, as taught in the NT, is the picture of death and burial to sin and resurrection to new life, a picture that has already, deep in the heart, not the means by which spiritual change is wrought. It is a privilege and duty, not a necessity. It is a picture that is lost when something else is substituted in its place. See Baptismal Regeneration.
II. The Subjects of Baptism.—It is significant that even the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles with its exaggerated notion of the importance of baptism does not allow baptism of infants. It says: "Having first taught all these things," Instruction precedes baptism. That is a distinct denial of infant baptism. The uniform practice in the NT is that baptism follows confession. The people "confessing their sins" were baptized by John (Mt 3:6). It is frankly admitted by Paedobaptist scholars that the NT gives no warrant for infant baptism. Churh Jacobs (Congregationalist) in the "Pre-Cristian Baptism" states: "We would be able to prove that the NT contains no explicit reference to the baptism of infants," Plummer (Church of England), HDB, says: "The infancy of baptism was required to repent and believe." Marcus Dods (Presbyterian, DCG), says: "A rite wherein by immersion in water the participant symbolizes and signifies his transition from an infant into a new purificative, his death, his burial, and his new birth to a future he desires." It would be hard to state the Baptist interpretation in better terms. Thus no room is found in the NT for infant baptism which would symbolize what the infant did not experience or understand, or, what his symbols were to cause the regeneration in the child, a form of sacramentalism repugnant to the NT teaching as understood by Baptists. The dominant Baptist note is the soul's personal relation to God apart from ordinance, church or priest. The infant who dies unbaptized is saved without baptism. The baptized individual, child (for children are often baptized by Baptists, children who show signs of conversion, or who pray, is converted before his baptism. The baptism is the symbol of the change already wrought. So clear is this to the Baptist that he bears constant protest against that perversion of this beautiful ordinance by those who treat it as a means of salvation or who make it meaningless when performed before conversion. Baptism is a preacher of the spiritual life. The Baptist contention is for a regenerated church membership, placing the kingdom before the local church. The Baptists are a distinct minority members in the church. The passages quoted from the NT in support of the notion of infant baptism are wholly irrelevant, as, for instance, in Acts 2:39 where there is no such idea as baptism of infants. So more note have been and would be. The point is that the marriage relation is sanctified and the children are legitimate, though husband or wife be heathen. The marriage relation is to be maintained. It is begging the question to assume the presence of infants in the various household baptisms in Acts. In the case of the family of Cornelius they all spake with tongues and magnified God (Acts 10:46). The jailer's household "rejoiced greatly" (Acts 16:34). We do not even know who used a similar reception. It may have been merely her employés in her business. The NT presents no exceptions in this matter.

III. The Present Obligation.—The Baptists make one more point concerning baptism. It is that, since Jesus himself submitted to it and joined it upon His disciples, the ordinance is of perpetual obligation. The arguments for the later ecclesiastical origin of Mt 28:19 are not convincing. If it seem strange that Jesus should mention the three persons of the Trinity in connection with the command to baptize, it should be remembered that the Father and the Spirit were both manifested to Him at His baptism. It was not a mere ceremonial ablation like the Jewish rites. It was the public and formal avowal of fealty to God, and the names of the Trinity thereby uttered. The new heart is wrought by the Holy Spirit. Reconciliation with the Father is wrought on the basis of the work of the Son, who has manifested the Father's love in His life and death for sin. The fact that in the Acts the examples of baptism only the name of Jesus occurs, that no other name was the exact formula used. It may be a mere historical summary of the essential fact. The name of Jesus stood for the other two persons of the Trinity. On the other hand the command of Jesus may not have been regarded as a formula for baptism; while in no sense sacramentally correct, it is yet obligatory and of perpetual significance. It is not to be dropped as one of the Jewish excrescences on Christianity. The form itself is necessary to the significance of the rite. Hence Baptists hold that immersion alone is to be practised, since immersion alone was commanded by Jesus and practised in the NT times. Immersion alone sets forth the death to sin, and burial in the grave the resurrection to new life in Christ. Baptism as taught in the NT is "a could of washing off that he abom- ined, and his new birth to a future he desires." It would be hard to state the Baptist interpretation in better terms. Thus no room is found in the NT for infant baptism which would symbolize what the infant did not experience or understand, or, what his symbols were to cause the regeneration in the child, a form of sacramentalism repugnant to the NT teaching as understood by Baptists. The dominant Baptist note is the soul's personal relation to God apart from ordinance, church or priest. The infant who dies unbaptized is saved without baptism. Baptism (Baptisma, bapismata, baptismos, Bapatismo, baptismi) has been from the earliest times the initiatory rite signifying the recognition of entrance into or of presence within the Christian church. We find the earliest mention of the ceremony in the Epistle to the Gal (3:27), written about 20 years after the death of Jesus. There and in 1 Cor (1:13; 12:13) St. Paul takes for granted that everybody who becomes a Christian (himself included) must be baptized. The rite seems also to have existed among the discipleship of Jesus before His death. We are told (Jn 1:23) that, although Jesus Himself did not baptize, His disciples baptized. Hence these baptisms were more numerous than those of John.

I. Scriptural Names for the Rite.—The words commonly used in the NT to denote the rite are the verb baptize, and the nouns baptism and baptismal, although they are not used in their frequent ceremonial usages. In the baptism of the rite is reserved for the Christian rite; but the distinction can hardly be maintained. The former word indicates a ceremonial purification, and that baptism is reserved for the Christian rite.

2. Pre-Christian Baptism.—Converts in the early centuries, whether Jews or Gentiles, could not have found this initiatory rite, in which they expressed their new-born faith, utterly unfamiliar. Water is the ancient natural symbol of purification, and its significance was entered into almost every cult; and into none more completely than the Jewish, whose ceremonial washings were proverbial. Besides those the Jew had what would seem to the convert a counterpart of the Christian rite. The threefold washing of the rite of baptism is contrasted by the bridal bath taken by the bride before she was handed over to the bridalgroom; and perhaps the rite of purification was slowly making its way in the pagan world. pagan piety had deserted the official religions and taken refuge within the Mysteries, and that these Mysteries represented the popular pagan religions of the times. They were all private cults into which men and women were received one by one, and that by rites of initiation which each had to pass through personally. When admitted the converts became members of coteries, large or small, of like-minded persons, who had become initiated because their souls craved something which they believed they would receive in and through the rites of the cult. These initiations were secret, jealously guarded from the knowledge of all outsiders; still enough is known about them for us to be sure that among them baptism took an important place (Apuleius Metamorphoses xi). The rite was therefore as familiar to pagan as to Jewish converts, and it was no unexpected requirement for the convert to know that baptism was the doorway into the Christian church. These heathen baptisms, like the baptism of proselytes, were for the most part simply ceremonial purifications; for while it is true that both in the cult of the Mysteries and beyond it we see the mode of purification or washing or bathing, there was bathing in flowing water (Eurip. phoiba Tauri 167) or in the sea, yet it would appear that only ceremonial purification was thought of. Nor were ceremonial rites involving the use of water confined to the paganism of the early centuries. Such a ceremony denoted the reception of the newly born child into pagan Scandinavian households. The father decided whether the infant was to be reared or exposed to perish. If he resolved to preserve the babe, water was poured over it and a name was given to it at the argument of silence.

III. Christian Baptism.—In the administration of the rite of Christian baptism three things have to be looked at: the art of baptizing; the baptisms and the recipients or those entitled to receive it. A complete act of baptism involves three things: what has been called the materia sacramenti; the method of its use; and the formula or the words of consecration or of blessing. These latter two are the words accompanying the use of the water. The materia sacramenti is water and for this reason baptism is called the Water Sacrament. The oldest ecclesiastical manual of discipline which has descended to us, the Didache, says that the water to be preferred is “living,” i.e. running water, water in a stream or river, or fresh flowing from a fountain; “But if thou hast not living water, baptize in other water; and if thou canst not in cold, then in warm” (e. 7). In those directions the prescriptions of the ceremonial for the Jewish baptism of proselytes are closely followed. The earlier canons of the church permit any kind of water, fresh or salt, provided only it be true and natural water (aquæ vera et naturalis).

(1) Immersion.—The use of the water is called ablution. According to the rules of by far the largest portion of the Christian church the water may be used in any one of three ways: immersion, where the recipient enters bodily into the water, and where, during the action, the head is plunged either once or three times beneath the surface; affusion, where water was poured upon the head of the recipient who stood either in water or on dry ground; and aspersion where water was sprinkled on the head or on the face.

It has frequently been argued that the word baptizein invariably means “to dip” or immerse, and that therefore Christian baptism must have been performed originally by immersion only, and that the two other forms of affusion and aspersion or sprinkling of local saints as well as the poor may be poor in baptism unless the method of immersion be used. But the word which invariably means “to dip” is not baptizein but baptizw. Baptizein has a wider signification; and its use to denote the Jewish ceremonial of pouring water on the hands (Lk 11:38; Mk 7:4), as has already been said, proves conclusively that it is impossible to conclude from the word itself that immersion is the only valid method of performing the rite. It may be admitted, however, that since the days of Cyprian, and including the head is plunged into a pool of pure water, gives a more vivid picture of the cleansing of the soul from sin; and that complete surrounding with water suits better the metaphors of burial in Rom 6:4 and Col 2:12, and of being surrounded by cloud in 1 Cor 10:2.

(2) Affusion.—On the other hand affusion is certainly a more vivid picture of the bestowal of the Holy Spirit which is equally symbolized in baptism. Many accounts of the practice of the early church as to which baptism was administered in apostolic times. Such phrases as “coming up out of the water,” “went down into the water” (Mk 1:10; Acts 8:38) are as applicable to affusion as to immersion. The earlier use of what in the modern formulas is the Didache (c. 7), where it is said: “Now concerning Baptism, thus baptize ye: having first uttered all these things, baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, in living water. But if thou hast not living water, baptize in other water; and if thou canst not in cold, then in warm. But if thou hast neither, pour water upon the head thrice in the name of Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost. This seems to say that to baptize by immersion was the practice usually followed in the early cen., of the Christian church. Immersion was in common use: but affusion was also widely practised: and both were esteemed usual and valid forms of baptizing. When immersion was used then the head of the recipient was plunged thrice beneath the surface at the mention of each name of the Trinity; when there was of real fusion the same reference to the Trinity was kept by pouring water thrice upon the head. The two usages which were recognized and prescribed by the beginning of the 2d cent. may have been in use throughout the apostolic period although definite information is lacking. When we remember the various pools in Jerus, and their use for ceremonial washings it is not impossible to suppose that the 3,000 who were baptized on the day of Pentecost may have been immersed, but, when the furnishing and conditions of Palestinian houses and_outlets are taken into account, it is difficult to conceive that at the baptisms of Cornelius and of the jailer, the ceremony was performed otherwise than by affusion. It is a somewhat curious fact that if the evidence from written texts, whether ancient canons or writings of the earlier Fathers, be studied by themselves, the natural conclusion would seem to be that immersion was the almost universal form of administering the rite; but if the witness of the earliest pictorial representation be collected, then we must infer that affusion was the usual method and that immersion was exceptional; for the pictorial representations, almost without exception, display baptism performed by affusion, i.e. the recipient is seen standing in water while the minister pours water on the head. It may therefore be inferred that evidence for the almost universal practice of immersion, drawn from the fact that baptisms took place in river pools (it is more than probable that when we find the names of the pools where the pagan Greeks were their favorite places of administering the rite), or from the large size of almost all early mediaeval baptisterys, is by no means so conclusive as many have supposed, such places being equally applicable to affusion.

It was interesting to remember that when most of the Anabaptists of the 16th cent. insisted on adult baptism (re-baptism was their name for it) immersion was not the method practised by them. During the great baptismal scene in the market-place at Ephesus, the office of the bishop was to administere by pouring three cans of water on the heads of the recipients. They baptized by affusion and not by immersion. This was also the practice among the Mennonites or Baptist at early Baptists. This double mode of administering the sacrament—by immersion or by affusion—prevailed in the churches of the first twelve cents., and it was not until about the 13th that the practice of aspersio or sprinkling was almost universally employed.

(3) Aspersio.—A method of administering baptism, viz. by aspersio or sprinkling, has a different history from the other two. It was in the early centr. exclusively reserved for sick and infirm persons too weak to be submitted to immersion or to affusion. This is evident from the evidence of those who received the rite in this form were somewhat despised; for the nicknames clinici and grabatori were, unworthy Cyprian declares, bestowed on them by neighbors. The question was even raised in the middle of the 3d cent., whether baptism by aspersio was a valid baptism and Cyprian was asked for his opinion on the matter. His answer is contained in his lxvxth epistle (ixx Hartel's ed.). There he contends that the ordinance administered for a general use, and quotes in support of his opinion various OT texts which assert the purifying effects of water sprinkled (Ezk 36 25.26; Nu 8 5; 19 8.9.12.13). It is not the amount of the water or the method of its application which can cleanse from sin: “Whence it appears that the sprinkling also of water prevails equally with the washing of salvation . . . . and that while the faith of the giver and receiver is sound, all things hold and may be consummated and perfected by the method of faith.” His opinion prevailed. Aspersio was recognized as a valid, though exceptional, form of baptism. But it was long of commending itself to ministers and people, and did not attain to almost general use until the 10th cent.
The idea that baptism is valid when practised in the one method only of immersion can scarcely be looked on as anything else than a ritualistic idea. The Scripture nowhere describes or limits the qualifications of those who have it performed for the rite of baptism. We find apostles, wandering preachers (Acts 8:38), a private member of a small and persecuted community (Acts 9:18) performing the rite. So in the subject-apostolic church we find the same liberty of practice. Clement of Alexandria tells us that the services of Christian women were necessary for the work of Christian missions; for they alone could have access to the gynæaeum and carry the message of the gospel there (Strom., III, 6). Such women missionaries did not hesitate to baptize. Whatever credit may be given to the Acts of Paul and Thekla, it is at least historical that Thekla did exist, that she was converted by Paul, that she worked as a missionary and that she baptized her converts. Speaking generally it may be said that as a sacrament has always been looked upon as the recognition of presence within the Christian church, it is a mark of this of the individual believer; and therefore no one is entitled to perform the act who is not in some way a representative of the Christian community—the representative character ought to be maintained as an essential and regular and organized form the act of baptism was suitably performed by those who, as office-bearers, naturally represented the community. It was recognized that the pastor or bishop (for these terms were synonymous) should at least have the right to preside at the administration of the sacrament; but in the early church the power of delegation was recognized and practised, and elders and deacons presided at this and even at the Eucharist. What has been called lay-baptism is not forbidden in the NT and has the sanction of the early church. When superstitious views of baptism entered largely into the church and it was held that unbaptized child could be saved, the practice arose of encouraging the baptism of all newborn infants by nurses. The Reformed church protested against this and was at pains to repudiate the superstitious thought of any mechanical efficacy in the rite by deprecating its exercise by any save approved and ordained members of the church. St. Paul, in commanding lay-baptism as irregular, it may be questioned whether they would assert any administration of the rite to be invalid, provided only it had been performed with devout faith on the part of giver and receiver.

The recipients of Christian baptism are all those who make a sincerely sincere profession of repentance of sin and of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour; together with the children of believing parents. The requirements are set forth in the accounts given us of the performance of the rite in the NT, in which we see how the apostles obeyed the commands of their Master. Jesus had ordered them to "make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt. 28:19)—to "preach the gospel to the whole creation. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall perish" (Mk. 16:15-16). The apostle Peter said to the inquirers on the Day of Pentecost, "Repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit"; and 3,000 were added to the church through the initiatory rite of baptism. The Samaritans, who believed on Jesus through the preaching of Philip, were admitted to the Christian community through baptism; though in this case one of the baptized, Simon Magus, after his reception, was pronounced by Peter to be unworthy of the name (Acts 8:12, 22). The jailer and all his, Lydia and her household, at Philippi, were baptized by St. Paul on his and her profession of faith on Jesus, the Saviour. There is no evidence in any of the accounts we have of apostolic baptisms that any prolonged course of instruction was thought to be necessary; nothing of classes for catechumens such as we find in the early church by the close of the 2d cent., or in modern missionary enterprise. We find no mention of baptismal creeds, declarative or interrogative, in the NT accounts of baptisms. The profession of faith in the Lord Jesus, the Saviour, made by the head of the family appears, so far as the NT records afford us information, to have been sufficient to secure the baptism of the "household"—a word which in these days included both servants and children.

Baptism of infants.—This brings us to the much-debated question whether infants are to be baptized in the Christian church. No distinction is made in the NT between infant and adult baptism. The NT Scriptures do not in so many words either forbid or command the baptism of children. The question is in this respect on all fours with the change of the holy day from the seventh to the first day. The NT authorizes the universal usage with regard to the Christian Sabbath day; that the change is authorized must be settled by a weighing of evidence. So it is with the case of infant baptism. It is not either commanded nor forbidden in the NT; and the question cannot be decided on such a basis. The strongest argument against the baptizing of infants lies in the thought that the conditions of the rite are repentance and faith; that these must be exercised by individuals, each one for himself and for herself; and that infants are incapable either of repentance or of faith of this kind. The argument seems weak in its second statement; it is more dogmatic than historical; and will be referred to later when the doctrine lying at the basis of the rite is examined. On the other hand a great deal of evidence supports the view that the baptism of infants, if not commanded, was at least permitted and practised within the apostolic church. St. Paul with other references (Acts 16:29-33; 1 Cor. 1:16; 1 Cor. 15:5) that under the gospel the former takes the place of the latter (Col. 2:12); and that children were circumcised on the 8th day after birth, the inference follows naturally that children were also to be baptized. In the OT, promises to parents included their children. In his sermon on the Day of Pentecost St. Peter declares to his hearers that the gospel promise is "to you and to your children and connect this with the invitation to baptism of the "households"—were baptized—of Lydia (Acts 16:15), of the jailer at Philippi (Acts 16:34), of Stephanas (1 Cor. 1:16). It is never said that the children of the household were exempted from the sacred rite. One has only to remember the position of the head of the household in that ancient world, to recollect how the household was thought to be embalmed in the head, to see how the repentance and faith of the head of the household was looked upon as including those of all the members, not merely children but servants, to feel that had the children been excluded from the sharing in the rite the exclusion would have been an unusual thing that it would have at least been mentioned and explained. Our Lord expressly made very young children the types of those who entered into His kingdom (Mt 19:14-16); and St. Paul so unites parents with children in the faith of Christ that he does not hesitate to call the children of the believing husband or wife "holy," and to imply that the children had passed from a state of "unholiness" to a state of "holiness" through the faith of a parent. All these things seem to point to the fact that the rite which was the door of entrance into the visible community of the followers of Jesus was shared in by the children of believing parents. Because there is evidence that baptism of children goes back to the earliest times of the sub-apostolic church. Ireneaus was the disciple of Polycarp, who had been the disciple of St. John, and it is difficult to draw any other conclusion from his story to cite that the baptism of infants had been an established practice in the church long before his days (Adv. Haer., II, 22; cf. 39). The witness of Tertullian is specially interesting; for he himself plainly thinks that adults seem to show that in the early church baptism of infants was usual. He makes it plain that the custom of baptizing infants existed in his days, and we may be sure from the character and the learning of the man, that had he been able to affirm that infant baptism had been a long-established usage descending from apostolic times, he would certainly have had no hesitation in using what would have seemed to him a very convincing way of dealing with his opponents. Tertullian, therefore, cannot have been the last to contest the custom of baptism of infants. Origen, the most learned Christian writer during the first three centuries, and who comes a little later than Tertullian, in his 4th Book of the Life of Christ, witnesses to the fact that the baptism of infants was usual. He argues that original sin belongs to children because the church baptizes them. At the same time it is plain from a variety of evidence to show that the baptism of infants was a universal practice in the early church. The church of the early centuries, was a mission church. It drew large numbers of its members from heathendom. In every mission church the baptism of adults was naturally the first step that took place, and be most in evidence. But is is clear that many Christians were of the opinion of Tertullian and believed that baptism ought not to be administered to children but should be confined to adults. Nor were they alone in this opinion; it was handed down from one generation to another in some Christian families. In the 4th cent. few Christian leaders took a more important place than Basil the Great and his brother Gregory of Nyssa. They belonged to a family that had been Christians for some generations; yet neither of the brothers was baptized until after his personal conversion, which does not appear to have come until they had attained the years of manhood. The whole evidence seems to show that even in the early church, down to the end of the 4th cent. at least, infant and adult baptism were open questions and that the two practices existed side by side with each other without disturbing the unity of the churches. In the later Pelagian controversy it became evident that the theory and practice of infant baptism had been able to assert itself and that the ordinance was always administered to children of members of the church.

(2) Baptism for the dead.—St. Paul refers to a custom of "baptizing for the dead" (1 Cor 15:29). What this "vicarious baptism" or "baptism for the dead" was it is impossible to say, even whether it was practised within the primitive Christian church. The passage is a very difficult one and has called forth a very large number of explanations, which are mere guesses. Paul neither commends it nor disapproves of it; he simply mentions its existence and uses the fact as an argument for the resurrection. See Baptism for the Dead.

IV. The Formula of Baptism.—The Formula of Christian baptism, in the mode which prevailed, is given in Mt 28:19: "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But it is curious that the words are not given in any description of Christian baptism until the time of Justin Martyr: and there they are not repeated exactly but in a slightly extended and explanatory form. He says that Christians "receive the washing with water in the name of God, the Ruler and Father of the universe, and of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit" (I Apol., 61). In every account of the performance of the rite in apostolic times a much shorter formula is in use. The 3,000 believers were baptized on the Day of Pentecost "in the name of Jesus" (Acts 2:38); and the same formula was used at the baptism of Cornelius and his household (Acts 10:48). Indeed it would appear to have been the usual one, from St. Paul's question to the Corinthians: "Were ye baptized in the name of Paul?" (1 Cor 1:13). The Samaritans were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus, and had in their rite a formula (a common one in acts of devotion) was used in the case of the disciples at Ephesus. In some instances it is recorded that before baptism the converts were asked to make some confession of their faith, which took the form of a prayer: "Jesus was the Lord or that Jesus Christ was the Son of God. It may be inferred from a phrase in 1 Pet 3:21 that a formal interrogation was made, and that the answer was an acknowledgment that Jesus Christ was the Lord. Some scholars have emphasized the terror of ingenuity in trying to explain how, with what appear to be the very words of Jesus given in the Gospel of Mt, another and much shorter formula seems to have been used throughout the apostolic church. Some have imagined that the shorter formula was that used in baptizing disciples during the lifetime of Our Lord (Jn 4:1,2), and that the apostles having become accustomed to it continued to use it after the death of Jesus. They maintain that the phrases "in the name of Jesus Christ" or "of the Lord Jesus" are not meant to give the formula of baptism, but simply to denote that the rite was Christian. Others think that the full formula was used by the disciples when the narrative in the Book of Acts and in the Pauline Epistles are merely brief summaries of what took place— an idea rather difficult to believe in the absence of any single reference to the longer formula. Others, again, insist that baptism in the name of one of the persons of the Trinity implies baptism in the name of the Three. While others declare that St. Matthew does not give the very words of Jesus but puts in His mouth what was the common formula used at the date and in the district where the First Gospel was written. Whatever may be the case it can be given is plain that the longer formula became universal or almost universal in the sub-apostolic church. Justin Martyr has been already quoted. Tertullian, nearly half a century later, declares expressly that the "law of baptism has been imposed and the formula prescribed" in Mt 28:19 (De Bapt., 13); and he adds in his Adversus Praxeon (c. 26): "And it is not once only, but thrice, that we are immersed into the Three Persons, at each several mention of the Three names." It is plain that the formula given by St. Matthew became the established usage is overwhelming; but it is more than likely that the use of the shorter formula did not altogether die out, or, if it did, that it was revived. The historian Socrates informs us that some of the more extreme Arians "corrupted" baptism by using the name of Christ only in the formula; while injunctions to use the longer formula and punishments, including deposition, threatened to those who would ingraft the shorter which meet us in collections of ecclesiastical canons (Apos. Canons, 43, 50), prove that the practice of using the shorter formula existed in the 5th and 6th cent., at all events in the East.

V. The Doctrine of Baptism.—The sacraments, and baptism as one of them, are always described to be (1) signs representing as in a picture or figure spiritual benefits (1 Pet 3 21), and also (2) as seals or personal tokens and attestations confirmatory of solemn promises of spiritual benefits. Hence the sacrament is said to have two parts: "the one an outward and sensible sign, used according to Christ's appointment; the other an inward and spiritual grace thereby signified." It is held, moreover, that when the rite of baptism has been duly and devoutly performed with faith on the part of both giver and receiver, the spiritual benefits do follow the performance of the rite. The question therefore arises: What are the spiritual and evangelical blessings portrayed and solemnly promised in this sacrament? In the first place we find that baptism is intimately connected with the following: with remission of sins, as in Acts 22 16 ("Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins"), and in He 10 22; with regeneration or the new birth, as in Jn 3 5; with ingrafting into Christ, with union with Him, as in Gal 3 27—"and union in definite ways, in His death, His burial and His resurrection, as in Rom 6 3-6; with entering into a new relationship with God, that of sonship, as in Gal 3 26,27; with the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, as in 1 Cor 12,13; with belonging to the church, as in Acts 2 41; with the gift of salvation, as in Mk (?) 16 16; Jn 3 5. From these and similar passages theologians conclude that baptism is a sign and seal of other things, chiefly of the divine union with Christ, of remission of sins, regeneration, adoption and life eternal; that the water in baptism represents and signifies both the blood of Christ, which takes away all our sins, and also the sanctifying influence of the Holy Ghost. The influences which few of them would accept. There is as essential to salvation, on all evangelical theology, as it is for the right use of the sacrament; and every one of the arguments brought against the baptism of infants is equally applicable to the denial of their salvation. Nor can the Baptist position be said to be true to the facts of ordinary human nature. Faith, in its evangelical sense of fiducaea or trust, is not such an abrupt thing as they make it. Their demand for such a conscious, intelligent, strictly individualist act of faith sets aside some of the deepest facts of human nature. No one, young or old, is entirely self-dependent; nor are our thoughts and trust always or even frequently entirely independent and free from the unconscious influences of others. We are interwoven together in society; and what is true generally reveals itself still more strongly in the intimate relations of the family. Is it possible in all cases to trace the creative effects of the subtle imperceptible influences which surround formed,和完善ing dawning intelligence is first able to appreciate enough to trust in half-conscious ways? It is not a shallow view of human nature which sets all such considerations on the one side and insists on regarding nothing but isolated acts of knowledge or of faith. With all these thoughts in their minds, the sacrament. They separate on the question of its efficacy. The former understand by the right use simply the correct performance of the rite and the placing no obstacle in the way of the flow of efficacy. The latter insist that the sacrament unless the recipient exercises faith, that without faith the sacrament is not efficacious and the inward and spiritual blessings do not accompany the external and visible signs. Whatever minor differences divide Protestant evangelical churches on this sacrament they are all agreed upon this, that where there is no faith there can be no regeneration. Here emerges doctrinally the difference between those who give and who refuse to give the sacrament to infants.

The latter taking their stand on the fundamental doctrine of all evangelical Christians that faith is necessary to make any sacrament efficacious, and assuming that the effect of an ordinance is always tied to the precise time of its administration, insist that only adults can perform such a conscious, intelligent, and individually independent act of faith, as they believe all Protestants insist on scriptural grounds to be the necessary condition of receiving the sacrament before they refuse to baptize infants and young children.

The great majority of evangelical Protestants practise infant baptism and do not think, due explanations being given, that it in any way conflicts with the idea that faith is necessary to the efficacy of the sacrament. The Baptist position appears to them to conflict with much of the teaching of the NT. It implies that all who are brought up in the faith of Christ and within the Christian church can, before they refuse to baptize infants and young children.
great majority of evangelical churches admit and enjoin the baptism of infants. They believe that the children of believing parents are "born within the church and have interest in the covenant of grace and a right to be received into the church." They explain that the efficacy of a sacrament is not rigidly tied to the exact time of administration, and can be appropriated whenever faith is kindled and is able to rest on the external sign, and that the spiritual blessings signified in the rite can be appropriated again and again with each fresh kindling of faith. They declare that no one can tell how soon the dawning intelligence may awaken to the act of appropriation. Therefore these churches instruct their ministers in dispensing the sacrament to be "lows" on parents that they will train up the infants "in the knowledge and fear of the Lord," and will teach them the great blessings promised to them in and through the sacrament and teach them to appropriate these blessings for themselves. They further enjoin their ministers to admonish all who may witness a baptismal service to look back on their own baptism in order that their faith may be stirred afresh to appropriate for themselves the blessings which accompany the proper use of the rite.

I. The Term.—The word "baptism" is the Anglicized form of the Gr. baptisma, or baptismos. These Gr words are verbal nouns derived from baptizō, which, again, is from *bap*ō, "I dip, wash, "washing," and tizō (pasi, "consent, decision, to be one"). For baptismos see the following main passages:

1. Mt 28 19, 10; Mk 16 16, 17; Lk 10 1; Jn 3 5, 7; Acts 1 8, 2 43, 8 12, 19, 15 18, 24 5; Rom 6 4; Eph 5 25; Col 2 12; Heb 3 1; 5 12; 6 20; 10 32, 33; 1 Pet 3 21; Rev 1 5; 18 3, 4; 21 22; 22 17; 1 Cor 10 4, 5, 11, 12; Gal 3 27; Tit 3 5, 6; 1 Pet 3 1; 1 John 2 13; Rev 1 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23.

The NT words from which our Eng, "baptism," has been formed are used by Gr writers, in classical antiquity, in the LXX and in the NT, with a great latitude of meaning. The Gr writers do not necessarily contrast to that, of Flummer, who infers from Mk 7 4 and He 9 10 that baptismos usually means afflictions or ceremonial washings, and from Rom 6 4; Eph 5 5; 1 Pet 3 21 that baptisma denotes baptism proper (NID)

The Gr words from which our Eng, "baptism," has been formed are used by Gr writers, in classical antiquity, in the LXX and in the NT, with a great latitude of meaning. The Gr words express may be performed by plunging, drenching, stealing, dipping, sprinkling. The nouns baptisma and baptismos do not mean the same in the LXX and in the NT. While in the LXX baptism occurs only in four places, and in two of them in a fig. sense (K 15 4; Jth 12 7; Isa 21 14; Ecclus 31 24, 25). Wherever these words occur in the NT, the context or, in the case of quotations, a comparison with the OT will in many instances suggest which of the various renderings noted above is correct. Acts 8 37, 11, 14; Mk 1 5, 9; 10 10; Mt 28 19, 18 19; 8 7; Ex 24 4–6; Acts 2 16 17. A popular interpretation of the verb baptizō is to "wash with water." Water is distinctly mentioned as the baptism of the element in Acts 3:38; 8:38; 11:16; 16:13; 26:18; Heb 10:22. "There is no mention of any other element" (Plummer). The phraseology of Eph 5:26, "the washing of water with the word," shows that not the external element alone, nor the physical action of applying the water, constitutes baptism; but "the word" must be added to the element, and the action, in order that there may be a baptism. (Detrache verbum, et quid est aqua nisi aqua? Accedet verbum ad elementum, et fit sacramentum, "Remove the word and what is water but water? The word is added to the element and it becomes a sacrament." Augustine.) "Without the Word of God the water is simple water, and no baptism" (Luther). The command prescribes (b) exercitium oculi, i.e. it enjoins a continued exercise of this function of the messengers of Christ for all time.

(2) A clear declaration of the object in view.—The participle "baptizing" qualifies the imperative "make disciples," and expresses that, what the imperative states as the end, is to be attained by what the preceding word describes as the means to that end. The participle "baptizing," again, is qualified by "teaching" (ver 20). The second participle is not connected by "and" with the first, hence, is subordinate to the first (Meyer). Discipleship is to be obtained by baptism, but no rigid rules regarding the order and sequence of these actions laid down in these words; they merely state that Christ desires His disciples to be both baptized and fully informed as to His teaching.

(3) A definite promise of build and support ( Mk 16:16), i.e. complete and final deliverance from all evil, the securing of the "end of faith" (1 Pet 1:9). This is a comprehensive statement, as in 1 Pet 3:21, of the blessing of baptism. Scripture also states, in direct, particular way, the assurance of baptism: Regeneration, Tit 3:5; Jn 3:35. Despite Calvin and others, the overwhelming consensus of interpreters still agrees with the ancient church and with Luther in explaining both these texts of baptism.

(b) Remission of sins, or justification (Acts 2:38; 22:16; 1 Cor 6:11; Eph 5:20; Heb 10:22). This blessing, no doubt, is also intended in 1 Pet 3:21, where eperdóma has been rendered "answer" by the AV while the RV renders it "integrity" (so James, which a person has a right to set up (see Cremer a.v. and Rom 8:1). (c) The establishment of a spiritual union with Christ, and a new relationship with God (Gal 3:26-27; Rom 6:3-4; Col 2:12; Acts 20:32). What baptism is in the NT connects may be noted. Baptizein eis, "to baptize into," always denotes the relation into which the party baptized is placed. The only exception is Mk 1:9. Baptizein eis, or epi, "to baptize in" (Acts 10:48; 2:38), denotes the basis on which the new relation into which the baptized enters, is made to rest (Cremer). (d) The sanctifying gifts of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 12:13; Tit 3:5). All these blessings Scripture declares to be effects of baptism (Wirkung der Taufe, Riehm; Handwörterb.). "Baptism is called 'washing of regeneration,' not merely because it symbolizes it, or pledges a man to it, but also, and chiefly, because it effects it" (Holtzmann, Huther, Peider, Weiss). "Regeneration, or being begotten of God, does not mean merely a new capacity for change in the direction of goodness, but an actual change. The legal washings were actual external purifications. Baptism is actual internal purification (Plummer). To these modern authors would here be added. He says: "Baptism worketh forgiveness of sin, delivers from death and the devil, and gives eternal salvation to all who believe, as the words and promises of God declare" (Smaller Catech.). In Tit 3:5 AV the force of the preposition did, "by," deserves to be noted: it declares baptism to be the regenerating, renewing, justifying, glorifying medium to the heirs of eternal life. The baptismal promise is supported, not only in a general way, by the veracity and sincerity of the Speaker, who is the Divine Truth Incarnate, but also in a special way, by the Author's appeal to His sovereign majesty (Mt 28:18), and by the significant assurance of His personal ("I" =eπη, is emphatic: Meyer) presence with the disciples in their afore-mentioned activity (Mt 28:20; cf Mk 16:17). (4) A plain indication of the scope: "all nations," "the whole creation" (πάσα τῆς κτίσεως to be understood as in Col 1:23 ="all men"). Baptism is of universal application; it is a cosmopolitan ordinance before which differences such as of nationality, race, age, sex, social or civil status, are leveled (of Col 3:11 with 1 Cor 12:13). Accordingly, Christ orders baptism to be practised "always" (lit. "all days"), "even unto the end of the world," i.e. unto the consummation of the present age, until the Second Advent of the Lord. For, throughout this period Christ promises His cooperative presence with the efforts of His disciples to make disciples.

(5) A prescribed formula for administering the ordinance: "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." The belief in the Trinity is fundamental to Christianity; accordingly, the sacred rite by which men are initiated into the Christian religion justly emphasizes this belief.

The three localities are mentioned as distinct from one another, but the baptismal command is issued upon their joint and coequal authority ("in the name," not "names"), thus indicating the Unity in Trinity. This ancient baptismal formula represents "the declaration of Christ as the Mediator, the Holy Ghost as the Realization, and the vital and vitalizing blessing of the promise and fulfillment," which is extended to men in this ordinance (Cremer).

After the Lord had entered into His glory, we find that in the era of the apostles and in the primitive Christian church baptism is the established and universally acknowledged rite by which persons are admitted to the Christian communion. (Acts 2:38; 8:12; 18:17). Thus, baptism occupied among the Gentile converts to Christianity, and later among all Christians, the same position as circumcision in the Old Covenant (Col 2:11; Gal 5:2). It is, essentially, part of the foundation on which the unity of the Christian society rested from the beginning (Eph 4:5; 1 Cor 12:13; Gal 3:27 f) (Riehm, Handwörterb.).

In 1 Cor 10:1-2 the apostle states that the Israelites "were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." Farrar attempts the following solution of this type: of Baptism "The passing under the cloud (Ex 14:10) and through the sea, constituting as it did their deliverance from bondage into freedom, their death to Egypt, and their birth to a new covenant, was a general type or dim shadow of Christian baptism (compare our collect, figuring thereby Thy holy baptism'). But the typology is quite incidental; it is the connection which is paramount. 'Unto Moses'; rather, into. By this 'baptism' they accepted Moses as their Heavenly guide and teacher' (Pulpit Comm.). In 1 Pet 3:21 the apostle calls baptism the anástasis of the tism was not unknown to the Jews, still the baptism of John startled them (Jn 1:25). Such passages as Is 42:1; 16:1; 35:6; Joel 3:1; Eph 4:15; Col 2:13-14, had no doubt, led them to expect a rite of purification in the days of the Messiah, which would supersede their Levitical purification. The delegation which they sent to John was to determine the Messianic character of John and his preaching and baptizing. Johannic baptism has been a fruitful theme of debate. The question does not affect the personal faith of any Christian at the present time; for there is no person living who has received infant baptism, and yet the entire subject and certain features of it, as the incident recorded Acts 19:1-7, will continue to be debated. It is best to fix in our minds a few essential facts, which will enable us to put the Scriptural estimate on the baptism of John. John had received a Divine commission to preach and baptize (Lk 3:2; Jn 1:35; Mt 21:25). He baptized with water (Jn 3:23). His baptism was honored by a wonderful manifestation of the holy Trinity (Mt 3:16,17), and by the Redeemer, in His capacity as the Repentant one. He washed the repentant sinner with the foretaste of the heavenly Lamb of God, accepting baptism at John's hand (Mt 3:13 f; Jn 1:9 f). It was of the necessity of receiving John's baptism that Christ spoke to Nicodemus (Jn 3:5 f). When Jesus began His public ministry, He took up the preaching and baptism of John, and His disciples practised it with such success that John rejoiced (Jn 3:22-25; 4:1-2). All this evidence fairly compels the belief that there was no essential difference between the baptism of John and the baptism instituted by Christ; that what the risen Christ did in Mt 28:18-20 was merely to elevate a rite that had previously been adopted by an order "from above" to a permanent institution of His church, and to proclaim its universal application. The contrast which John himself declares between his baptism and that of Christ is not a contrast between two baptisms with water. The baptism of Christ, "in the name of the Lord Jesus," is the baptism of the Ghost and with fire, the Pentecostal baptism. But for the general purpose of begetting men unto a new life, sanctifying and saving them, the Spirit was also bestowed through John's baptism (Jn 3:5). The controversy that is here mounting up to a new and embracing; so is the statement concerning the necessity of baptism in Jn 3:5. After

4. Should Infants Be Baptized? Why should they not be baptized? The omnis praeformis rests on those who reject infant baptism. The desire to have their infants baptized must have been manifested on the day when the first three thousand were baptized at Pentecost, assuming that they were all adults. The old covenant had provided for their children; was the new to be inferior to the old in this respect? (See Plummer in HDB.) The baptism of entire households is presumptive evidence that children and infants were baptized in apostolic times (Acts 16:15; 18:8; 1 Cor 1:16). The arguments against infant baptism imply defective views on the subject of original sin and the efficacy of baptism. Infant faith—for, faith is as necessary to the infant as to the adult—may baffie our attempts at explanation and definition. Does His promises also to children (Acts 2:39), who established His covenant even with beasts (Gen 9:16,17); Christ who blessed also little children (Mt

The Trinitarian formula in Mt 28:19 is spurious, and that the text in Mk belongs to a section which was added to the Gospel of John. The former claim had first been advanced by Coneybear, but later research by Riggenbach has established the genuineness of the Trinitarian formula in Mt. Feine still maintains his doubts, and has discovered influential backgrounds. As to the concluding section in Mk (16:9-20), Jerome is the first to call attention to its omission in most GR MSS to which he had access. Here, Jerome, following the allegorized Gospel of the Monophysite Gregory of Nyssa reports that, while this section is missing in some MSS, in the more accurate ones many MSS contain it. No doctrinal scruple can arise on account of this section; for it contains nothing that is contrary to the doctrine of Scripture in other places on the same subject; and it has always been treated as genuine by the Christian church. The question is a purely historical one (see Bengel, Apparatus Criticus, 170 f).

No records in such an order can be discovered in the Acts or the epistles of the apostles. The baptisms recorded in the NT after the Day of Pentecost are administered in "the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 2:38), "in the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 8:16), "into Christ" (Rom 6:3; Gal 3:27). This difficulty was considered by the Fathers; Ambrose says: Quod verbo tacitum fuerat, expressum est fide, 'What had not been expressed before, is now spoken in faith.' On close inspection the difficulty is found to rest on the assumption that the above are records of baptismal formulas used on those occasions. The fact is that these records contain no baptismal formula at all, but are 'acts that can be done in the name of Jesus, as acknowledged Jesus to be the Lord and the Christ' (Plummer). The same can be said of any person baptized in our day with the Trinitarian formula. That this formula was the established usage in the Christian church is proven by records of baptisms in Justin (Apol., I, 61) and Tertullian (Ado. Prax., XXVI).

Baptism was practiced among the Jews prior to the solemn inauguration of this ordinance by the risen Christ. The ceremonial washings of the Jews are classed with the transient forms of the Levitical worship (He 9:9,10), which had not been intended to endure except 'until a time of reformation.' They were removed when Christian baptism was erected into an abiding ordinance of the church of God (Col 2:11-13). It is erroneous to say that those ancient washings developed into Christian baptism; the ceremonial washings are essentially the same as those of the Jews, who were baptized by immersion. A further question, not developed into a substance. Nor do we find the origin of Christian baptism in the baptism of proselytes, which seems to have been a Jewish church custom in the days of Christ. Though the rite of bap-10 13 f), and spoke of them as believers (Mt 18 6), certainly does not consider the regeneration of a child or infant a greater task than that of an adult (cf Mt 18 3.4).

Paul did baptize Crespus, Gains and Stephanas with his household. These baptisms he performed along with Corinth alone; we have no record of them elsewhere. What Paul not Paul declares in 1 Cor 14-17 is, that by his baptizing he could not have become the cause of the divisions in the Corinthian congregation, because he had baptized only a few persons in Corinth, and, moreover, he had not baptized in his own name, hence had attached no one to his person. The statement, "Christ sent me not to baptize," is made after the Sem idiom, and means: "not so much to baptize as to preach" (Farrar in Pulpit Comm.). If they are taken in any other sense, it is impossible to protect Paul against the charge that he did something that he was not authorized to do, when he baptized Crespus, etc.

1 Cor 15 29 is sometimes taken to mean that the early Christians practised baptism by proxy. After they had been converted to Christianity, it is held, they desired the Baptism to convey the benefits of their faith to their departed friends who had died in paganism, by having themselves baptized "in their behalf," perhaps on their graves. We have no evidence from history that such a practice prevailed in the early Christian churches. Nor does the text suggest it. The Gr preposition ἐπὶ expresses also the motive that may prompt a person to a certain action. In this case the motive was suggested by the dead, viz. by the dead in so far as they shall rise. The context shows this to be the meaning: If a person has sought baptism in view of the fact that the dead are to rise to be judged, his baptism is valueless, if the dead do not rise. See Baptism for the dead.

W. H. J. Dau

BAPTISMAL REGENERATION, bap-tiz'mal ré-jen-ěr-shún: As indicated in the general arts on Baptism and Sacrament, the doctrine ordinarily held by Anglicans, Congregationalists, Methodists, and also by Low-Church Episcopalians, differs from that of the Roman and Greek churches, and of High-Church Anglicans, in its rejection of the idea that baptism is the instrumental cause of regeneration and that the effects of baptism are effectively conveyed through the administration of that rite wherever duly performed. The teaching of Scripture on this subject is held to be that salvation is immediately dependent on faith, which, as a fruit of the operation of the Spirit in the soul, already, in its reception of Christ, implies the regenerating action of that Spirit, and is itself one evidence of it. To faith in Christ is attached the promise of forgiveness, and of all other blessings. Baptism is to be considered as the means (at least professed) of this faith, and symbolizes the dying to sin and rising to righteousness implicit in the act of faith (Rom 6). It is the symbol of a cleansing from sin and renewal by God's Spirit, but not the agency effecting that renewal, even instrumentally. Baptism is not, indeed, to be regarded as a bare symbol. It may be expected that its believing reception will be accompanied by fresh measures of grace, strengthening and fitting for the new life, as the life is already there, hence nothing to do with the idea of baptism as an opus operatwm, working a spiritual change in virtue of its mere administration. In Scripture the agency with which regeneration is especially connected is the Divine "word" (cf 1 Pet 1 23). Without living faith, in those capable of its exercise, the outward rite can avail nothing. The supposed "regeneration" may be received—in multitudes of instances is received—without the least apparent change in heart or life. The above, naturally, applies to adults; the case of children is more involved. In the Christian community, is on a different footing. Those who recognize the right of such to baptism hold that in the normal Christian development children of believing parents should be the subjects of Divine grace from the commencement (Eph 4 4); they therefore properly receive the initiatory rite of the Christian Church. The faith of the parent, in presenting his child for baptism, lays hold on God's promise to be a God to him and to his children; and he is entitled to hope for that which baptism pledges to him. But this, again, has no relation to the idea of regeneration through baptism.

JAMES ORR

ANGlicAN (HIgh-ChurcH) DOCTRINE

Regeneration, the initial gift of life in Christ, is, in the church's normal system, associated with the sacrament of baptism. The basis for this teaching and practice of the church is found primarily in Our Lord's words in Mk 16 16. "Whoever baptizes may not enter into the kingdom of God." Wherein the new birth is associated not only with the quickening Spirit but with the element of water. The Saviour's words, lit. τίς, are as follows: "Except one be born [out] of water and Spirit (ἐκ ἑνδαυτῶν καὶ πνεύματος), he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (That it is the impersonal aspect of the Divine Spirit, i.e. as equivalent to "spiritual life") which is here presented, is indicated by the absence of the art. in the Gr and ver 5. Baptism of the Spirit (ἐν πνεύματι) implies entrance into the church as the outward and visible embodiment of that God. Our Lord, in the passage above cited, does not limit the possibility or the need of "new birth" to those who have arrived at adult age, or "years of discretion"," but uses the general pronoun τίς, τίς, "anyone." The Anglican church does not, however, teach that baptism is unconditionally necessary, but only that it is "generally necessary to salvation (συναποκατάστασις)." Baptism and共享单车 with the qualification mentioned in the Prayer-Book "Office for the Baptism of Those of Riper Years," "Whereby ye may perceive the great necessity of this sacrament, where it may be had." It is not to be a mere instrument of regeneration, but unconditionally bound to the external means, but only that these sacramental agencies are the ordinary and normal channels of Divine grace.

The typical form of baptism is that appropriate to the initiation of adults into the Christian body. Justin Martyr in his First Apology (eh xi) no doubt testifies to what was the general view of Christians in the 2nd cent. (cir 150 AD): "As many as are persuaded and believe that the things taught and said by these true and, moreover, take upon them to live accordingly, are taught to pray and ask of God with fasting for forgiveness of their former sins; and then they are brought to a place of water, and there regenerated after the same manner with ourselves; for they are washed in the name of God, the Father and Lord of the universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit." For the due administration of this sacrament, personal faith and repentance on the part of the candidate is the indispensable condition. However, "the baptism of young children" (i.e. of infants) "is in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable to the institution of Christ" (XXXIX Articles, Art. XXXVII, sub fn.). In the service "For the Baptism of Infants," repenti ance and faith are promised for the children by their "sureties" (ordinarily known as "sponsors" or "godparents"). "which promise, when they come to age [the children] themselves are bound to perform."

The person, whether adult or infant, receives in his baptism a seal of forgiveness; a washing away of all sins, whether original or actual. He also receives, at least in germ, the beginnings of new life in Christ; which life, however, must be developed and brought to perfection through his personal cooperation with the grace of God. But regeneration, as such, as not conversion, it is not even faith or love, strictly speaking. These latter, while they are conditions, or effects, or evidences of regeneration, are not regeneration itself, which is purely a judicial act of grace, or operating by the creative power, through the Holy Ghost. The moral test of the existence of spiritual life is the presence in heart and conduct of the love of God and of obedience to His commandments (see 1 Jn 2:15).

It may be added that the bestowment of the gifts of spiritual strength—of the manifold graces and of the fulness of the Holy Spirit—is primarily associated with the laying on of hands (confirmation) rather than with baptism proper; the rite of confirmation and baptism, however, originally connected was, as being baptism service, the laying on of hands.

The newly-made Christian is not to rest content with the initial gift of life; he is bound to strive forward unto perfection. Confirmation, is a second scene in the drama of spiritual life, the laying on of hands is accordingly connected with the "doctrine of baptisms," and both are reckoned by the author of the Epistle to the He as among "the first principles of Christ."

Lutheran Doctrine

Regeneration is here taken in its strict meaning to denote that internal spiritual change, not of the substance, but of the qualities, of the intellect and will of natural man, by which he is enabled to appreciate, receive, appropriate the Lord Jesus Christ and the merits of His atoning sacrifice, as its only hope for a God-pleasing life here in time and a life in glory hereafter. Regeneration in the strict sense signifies the first spiritual movements and impulses in man, the beginning of his thinking Divine thoughts, cherishing holy desires and willing God-like volitions. But it does not signify the radical extinction of sin in man; for evil conceptions remains also in the regenerate as a hostile element to the new life (Rom 7:25; Gal 5:17).

Water and the doctrine of laying on of hands is accordingly connected with the "doctrine of baptisms," and both are reckoned by the author of the Epistle to the He as among "the first principles of Christ."

1. Definition of terms

Spiritual matters, esp. the gospel, is removed from the former, and spiritual bondage, impotency, death from the latter (2 Cor 3:5; Acts 26:18; Phil 2:13), and the heart of the sinner is made to knowingly and appropriately the Lord Jesus Christ and the merits of His atoning sacrifice, as its only hope for a God-pleasing life here in time and a life in glory hereafter. Regeneration in the strict sense signifies the first spiritual movements and impulses in man, the beginning of his thinking Divine thoughts, cherishing holy desires and willing God-like volitions. But it does not signify the radical extinction of sin in man; for evil conceptions remains also in the regenerate as a hostile element to the new life (Rom 7:25; Gal 5:17).

2. Scriptural Basis

The two leading texts of Scripture which declare in plain terms that baptism is a means for effecting regeneration in the strict sense are Jn 3:5 and Tit 3:5. But this doctrine is implied in Acts 2:38; Eph 5:26; Gal 3:27; 1 Pet 3:21. In Jn 3:5, it is immaterial whether and other spiritual regeneration is rendered "to be born from above" or "to be born a second time. For the second birth is never of the flesh (Jn 1:3, 4.5); hence, is always of divine origin, "from above."

It is ascribed to the agency of the entire Trinity: the Father (Jas 1:18; 1 Pet 1:3); the Son (Jn 1:12); and the Spirit (Tit 3:5). But only appropriately, as it is generally held that the Holy Spirit alone, whose particular function is that of Quickener (see Cremer, Bibl. theol. Worterb., 9th ed., s.v. "pneuma," 894 f). Baptism is an instrument by which the Holy Spirit effects regeneration.

3. Faith in baptism

Baptism does not produce salutary effects e.g. operae operato, i.e. by the mere external performance of the baptismal action. No instrumentality, men are saved. Meyer is right when, correcting a former view of his, he states: "According to the context, Paul calls baptism the bath of the new birth, not meaning that it pledges us to the new birth (to complete the process of moral purification, of expiation and sanctification, Matthæus), nor that it is a visible image of the new birth (De Wette), for neither in the one sense nor in the other could it be regarded as a means of saving. Paul uses that name for it as the bath by means of which God actually brings about the new birth." The application of baptism and the operation of the Spirit must be viewed as one undivided action. Thus the offense of Spurgeon, Weiss and others at "regeneration by water-baptism" can be removed.
faith which trusts such word of God in the water (man’s receiving hand).” But this faith, which is required for a salutary use of the gospel and baptism, would be void, as instruments which the Holy Spirit employs to produce faith; not by imparting to them a magical power but by uniting His Divine power with them (Rom 10:17; 2 Cor 4:6; Eph 5:26).

The comprehensive statements in Jn 3:6; Eph 2:3 (“by nature”) show that infants are in need of being regenerated, and Mt 18:3, 6; and adults not more difficult for the Holy Spirit to produce faith infants by baptism, than in adults by the preaching of the gospel. And infant faith, though it may baffie our attempts at exact definition, is nevertheless honored in Scripture with the word which denotes genuine faith, πιστεύω, i.e. trustingly relying on Christ (Mt 18:6; cf 2 Tim 3:15; 1:5). In the case of adults who have received faith through hearing and reading the gospel (Jas 1:18; 1 Pet 1:23; 1 Cor 4:15), baptism is still “the washing of regeneration,” because it is as real to them of the righteousness which these people have previously obtained by believing the gospel (Rom 4:11–13; Gal 3:7); and it reminds them of, and enables them to discharge, their daily duty of putting away the old and putting on the new man (Eph 4:22, 24), just as the Lord is still the regenerating power of truth (Jas 1:18) though it be preached to persons who are regenerated a long time ago. Accordingly, Luther rightly extends the regenerating and renewing influences of baptism throughout the life of a Christian, who says “Baptism with water signifies with us the old Adam in us should, by daily contrition and repentance, be drowned and die, with all sins and evil lusts; and again, a new man should come forth and arise, who shall live before God in righteousness and purity forever” (Smaller Catech.).

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (βαπτίζομαι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, baptizomai hapér tôn nekron): Some of the Corinthian Christians denied the resurrection of the dead, and Paul advances three arguments to convince them that the dead will be raised: (1) “If there is no resurrection of the dead, neither hath Christ been raised,” but Christ is the firstfruits of them that sleep (1 Cor 15:18). (2) If the dead are not raised, why are men being baptized for the dead (ib 29)? (3) Why should the apostle himself wage his spiritual warfare (ib 30)? The first argument rests upon the central fact of Christianity, and the other two appeals to the consistency of the Corinthians, and of Paul himself. Whatever “baptism for the dead” meant, it was, in Paul’s opinion, as real, valid and legitimate a premise from which to conclude that the dead would rise as his own sufferings. The natural meaning of the words is obvious. Men in Corinth, and possibly elsewhere, were being continually baptized on behalf of others who were at the time dead, with a view to benefiting them in the resurrection, but if there be no resurrection, what shall they thus accomplish, and why do they do it? “The only legitimate reference is to a practice of . . . of survivors allowing themselves to be baptized on behalf of (believing?) friends who had died without baptism” (Alford in loc.).

Tertullian believed that Paul referred to a custom of variegated baptism (Res., 48c; Adv. Marc., 5:10). There is evidence that the early church knew such a practice. Epiphanius mentions a tradition that the custom originated among the Marcionites (Haer. 26:8). And Chrysostom states that it prevailed among the Marcionites.

But commentators have offered between thirty and forty other interpretations, more or less strained, of the passage. (For a summary of views, see C. H. Edwards and Stanley, Comms., ad loc.) Two of the most reasonable views from recent commentators are: “What shall they do who receive baptism on account of the dead? i.e. with a view to the resurrection of the dead?” and therefore to sharing in it themselves (Canon Evans, Speaker’s Comms., ad loc.): “that the death of Christians led to the conversion of survivors, who in the first instance ‘for the sake of the dead’ (thou who art dead) in the spirit of reunion, turn to Christ” (Findlay, Expositor’s Greek Text, ad loc.). Both ideas may be true, but they are simply imported into this passage, and the latter also is quite irrelevant to the argument and makes Paul identify conversion with baptism.

But why is all this ingenuity expended to evade the natural meaning? Because (1) such a custom would be a superstition involving the principle of opus operatur; and (2) it is a contemporary idea which is now regarded as superstition. To reply (with Alford) that Paul does not approve the custom will not serve the purpose, for he would scarcely base so great an argument, even as a principle of truth, on a practice which he regarded as wholly false and superstitious. The retort of those who denied the resurrection would be too obvious. But why should it be necessary to suppose that Paul rose above all limitations? At least the idea that symbolic acts had a vicarious significance had sunk deeply into the Jewish mind, and it would not be surprising if it took more than twenty years for the leaven of the gospel to work all the Jew out of Paul. At least it serves the apostle’s credit ill to make his argument meaningless or absurd in order to save him from sharing at all in the inadequate conceptions of his age. He made for himself no claim of infallibility.

BAPTISM OF FIRE (ἐν πυρί, ἐν πυρί, πῦρ ἐν δύναμιν καὶ πυρί): This expression is used in Mt 3:11. The copulative καὶ requires that the baptism “in the Holy Ghost and in fire,” should be regarded as two and the same thing. It evades violence to the construction, therefore, to make this statement refer to the fire of judgment. The difficulty has always been in associating fire with the person of the Holy Ghost. But in the connection of fire with the work or influence of the Holy Ghost the difficulty disappears. The thought of John is that the Saviour would give them the Divine Sanc-tifier as purifying water to wash away their sins and as a refining fire to consume their dross; to kindle in their hearts the holy flame of Divine love and zeal; to illuminate their souls with heavenly wisdom. The statement, therefore, in this verse indicates the manner in which Christ will admit them to discipleship and prepare them for His service. See Baptism; Fire.

BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT: The expression “baptism of the Holy Spirit” is based on a number of predictions found in our four Gospels and in connection with these the record of their fulfilment in the Book of Acts. The passages in the Gospels are as follows: Mt 3:11: “I indeed baptize you in water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire.” The last clause is αὐτὸς ὑμῖν βαπτίσει ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ
The baptism of Jesus was an event of great significance in the life of our Lord. It is recorded in the New Testament in three different places: Matthew 3:13-17, Mark 1:9-11, and Luke 3:21-22. In each Gospel, the event is described in detail, with some minor differences. The baptism of Jesus is significant for several reasons:

1. Preparation for Ministry: The baptism of Jesus signified the beginning of his public ministry. It was a symbolic act of purification, marking his readiness to undertake the task of salvation for humanity.

2. Confirmation of Identity: The baptism of Jesus validated his identity as the Messiah. God's voice from heaven confirmed his identity, declaring him to be the chosen one.

3. Empowerment of the Holy Spirit: The baptism of Jesus was accompanied by the descent of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove (Matthew 3:16). This event marked the beginning of the Spirit's active presence in Jesus' life, which was essential for his ministry.

4. Initialization of the Church: The baptism of Jesus was the first step in the establishment of the Christian church. The significance of the baptism of Jesus is further highlighted by the fact that other people also received baptism during Jesus' ministry, indicating the spread of the gospel and the initiation of the church.

5. Foundation of the Church: The baptism of Jesus laid the foundation for the church, which is often referred to as the body of Christ (1 Corinthians 12:27). This event exemplifies the concept of believers being baptized into the death of Christ, symbolizing their identification with him and his sacrificial death (Romans 6:3-5).

6. Sign of Faith: The baptism of Jesus also serves as a sign of faith, encouraging believers to follow his example and be baptized as a public declaration of their faith in him.

The baptism of Jesus is a central event in the New Testament, and its significance is further emphasized by the subsequent events of Jesus' ministry, such as the crucifixion and resurrection, which culminate in the establishment of the church and the spread of the gospel.
(1) In the first ch. of Acts Jesus predicts, according to Luke's account, that the baptism of the Holy Spirit would take place, 'not many days hence' (Acts 1:5). This would seem to point to a definite and specific event rather than to a continuous process.

(2) Again, Peter's citation in Acts 2:17-21 of Joel's prophecy shows that in Peter's mind the event which his hearers were then witnessing was the definite fulfillment of the words of Joel.

(3) Notice in the third place that only one other event in the NT is described as the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and for special reasons this may be regarded as the completion of the Pentecostal baptism. The passage is that contained in Acts 10:1-11:18 in which the record is given of the following events: (a) miraculous vision given to Peter on the housetop (10:11-16) indicating that the things about to occur are of unique importance; (b) the speaking with tongues (10:44-46); (c) Peter declares to the brethren at Jersus that the Holy Ghost fell on the Gentiles in this instance of Cornelius and his household "as on us at the beginning" (11:15); (d) Peter also declares that this was a fulfillment of the promise of the baptism of the Holy Spirit (11:16); (e) the Jewish Christians who heard Peter's account of the matter acknowledged this as proof that God had extended the privileges of the gospel to the Gentiles (11:18). The baptism of the Holy Spirit in Cornelius and his household is thus directly linked with the first outpouring at Pentecost, and as the event which signaled the opening of the door of the gospel formally to the Gentiles it is in complete harmony with the missionary significance of the first great Pentecostal outpouring. It was a turning point or crisis in the Messianic kingdom and seems designed to complete the Pentecostal gift by showing that Gentiles as well as Jews are to be embraced in all the privileges of the new dispensation.

(4) We observe again that nowhere in the epistles do we find a repetition of the baptism of the Spirit. This would be remarkable if it had been understood by the writers of the epistles that the baptism of the Spirit was to be repeated. There is no evidence outside the Book of Acts that the baptism of the Spirit ever occurred in the later NT times. In 1 Cor 12:13 Paul says, "For in one Spirit were we all baptized into one body..." But here the reference is not to the baptism of the Spirit, but rather to a baptism into the church which is the body of Christ. We conclude, therefore, that the Pentecostal baptism taken in conjunction with the baptism of the Spirit in the case of Cornelius completes the baptism of the Holy Spirit according to the NT teaching. The baptism of the Spirit as thus bestowed was, however, the definite gift of the Spirit in His fulness for every form of spiritual blessing and the possession of the kingdom and as the permanent and abiding gift of God to His people. In all subsequent NT writings there is the assumption of this presence of the Spirit and of His availability for all believers. The various commands and exhortations of the epistles are based on the assumption that the baptism of the Holy Spirit has already taken place, and that, according to the prediction of Jesus to the disciples, the Spirit was to abide with them forever (Acts 1:7). The baptism of the Holy Spirit would not therefore confound other forms of expression found in the NT with the baptism of the Holy Spirit. When Christians are enjoined to "walk by the Spirit" (Gal 5:16) and "be filled with the Spirit" (Eph 5:18), or when the Spirit is described as the "common gift" (1 Cor 12:4), in 1 Cor 12:27, and as the "crown of our inheritance" (2 Cor 1:22), and as Eph 5:14, and when various other similar expressions are employed in the epistles of the NT, we are not to understand the baptism of the Holy Spirit. These expressions refer to a different aspect of the Spirit's work in believers or of the believer's appropriation of the gifts and blessings of the Spirit rather than the historical baptism of the Spirit.

Three final points require brief attention, viz., the relation of the baptism of the Spirit to the baptism in water, and to the baptism in fire, and to the laying on of hands.

4. Relation of Baptism (1) We note that the baptism in fire is coupled with the baptism of the Holy Spirit in Mt 3:11 and in Lk 3:16. Other paragraphs give the word of John the Baptist. John speaks of the coming One who "shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire" (Lk 3:16). This baptism in fire is often taken as being parallel and synonymous with the baptism in water. The context however in both Mt and Lk seems to favor another meaning. Jesus' Messianic work will be both cleansing and destructive. The "you" addressed by John included the people generally and might naturally embrace both attitudes to Jesus would be believing and those who would refuse to believe. His action as Messiah would affect all men. Some He would regenerate and purify through the Holy Ghost. Others He would destroy through the fire of punishment. This view is favored by the context in both gospels.

In both the destructive energy of Christ is coupled with His saving power in other terms which admit of no doubt. In the same breath He gathers into the garner the chaff and the chaff He binds in bundles to burn. (2) The baptism of the Holy Spirit was not meant to supersede water baptism. This is clear from the whole of the history in the Book of Acts, where water baptism is uniformly administered to converts after the Pentecostal baptism of the Spirit, as well as from the numerous references to water baptisms in the epistles. The evidence here is so abundant that it is unnecessary to develop it in detail. See Rom 6:3; 1 Cor 12:14-17; Acts 12:13; 15:29; Gal 3:27; Eph 5:4; Col 2:12; 1 Pet 3:21.

(3) In Acts 8:17 and 19:6 the Holy Spirit is bestowed in connection with the laying on of the hands of apostles, but these are not to be regarded as instances of the baptism of the Holy Spirit in the historic sense, but rather as instances of the reception by believers of the Spirit which had already been bestowed in fullness at Pentecost.

BAR, bär (prefix): Aram. for the Heb 'ăr, 'ben,"son." Cf Aram. sections of Ezr and Dnl. In the OT the word is found three times in Prov 31:2 and once in Syr Ps 2:12 (Hier. translates "pure"). In the NT "bar" is frequently prefixed to names of persons. Of Barabbas; Bar-Jesus; Bar-Jonah; Barnabas; Barsabbas; Bartholomew; Bartimaeus. See B'n.
BARACHIEL, bar'a-kel (בַּראֲכִיל, bāraḵiš, “God blesses”), B.; the Busite, of the family of Ram, was the father of Elijhu, who was the last one to reason with Job (Job 32 2-6). Cf Buz; Ram.

BARACHIAH, bar-a-k'ah (בַּראֲחִיאָה, Barachias; AV Barachias; Mt 23 35): Father of Zachariah who was murdered between the sanctuary and the altar. It is possible that reference is made to Zachariah, the son of Jehoiada (2 Ch 24 20 f.), whom Matthew by mistake calls Z., the son of B.” Lk 11. 51 omits the name of the father of Z. (of Zahn’s Kommentar, 649, note).

BARACHIAS, bar-a-k'ahs. See Barachiah.

BARAK, bā'rák (בָּרָק, bārak, “lightning flash”): The name occurs in Sabaean בָּרָק, in Palmyrene بَرْك, and in Panic Baraco, as surname of Hamilcar; and as Divine name in Assyr Ramman-Birku and Gibi-Birku (Del. Assyr. WHB, 187). Barak was the son of Abinoam of Kedesh, a refuge city in Mt. Naphtali. He was summoned by the prophetess Deborah to lead his countrymen to war against the Canaanites under the leadership of Sisera. From the celebrated ode of Deborah we gather that Israel suffered at the hand of the enemy; the caravan roads were in danger; traffic almost ceased; the idolatrous country was plundered (Jgs 5 6-7). The fighting men in Israel were disarmed, a shield was not to be seen nor a spear among forty thousand men (ver 8). The prophetess raised the signal of struggle for independence. Gloom Barak came to her aid. With an army of 10,000 men—according to Jgs 4 10 they were all drawn from Zebulun and Naphtali, whereas Jgs 5 13-18 adds Benjamin, Machir and Issachar to the list of tribal tribes—Barak, accompanied by Deborah, rushed to the summit of Mt. Tabor. This location was very favorable to the rude armed Israelites in warding off the danger of the well-armed enemy. The wooded slopes protected them against the chariots of the Canaanites. In addition they were within striking distance should the enemy expose himself on the march. Under the heavy rainfall the alluvial plain became a morass, in which the heavy-armed troops found it impossible to move. So the little stream Kishon was filled with chariots, horses and Canaan- ites. Sisera abandoned his chariot and fled on foot. Barak pursued him and found him murdered by Jael in her tent. This completed the victory. See DEBAN; MOORE, ‘Judges,’ ad loc.

BARBARIAN, bār-bā'ri-an, BARBAROUS, bār-bā'rus (legate, bāri-mon, bābaros): A word probably formed by imitation of the unintelligible sounds of foreign speech, and hence in the mouth of a Greek it meant anything that was not Greek, language, or people or customs. With the spread of Gr language and culture, it came to be used generally for all that was non-Greek. Philo and Jos sometimes called their own nation “barbarians,” and so did Rom writers up to the Augustan age, when they adopted Gr culture, and reckoned themselves with the Greeks as the only cultured people in the world. Therefore Greek and barbarian meant the whole human race (Rom 1 14).

In Col 3 11, “barbarian, Scythian” is not a classification of the thesis but “a felix” (Abbott) = “barbarians, even Scythians, the lowest type of barbarians.” In Christ, all racial distinctions, even the most pronounced, disappear.

In 1 Cor 14 11 Paul uses the term in its more primitive sense of one speaking a foreign, and therefore, an unintelligible language: “If then I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me." The speaking with tongues would not be a means of communication. The excited inarticulate ejaculations of the Corinthian revivalists were worse than useless unless someone had the gift of articulating in intelligible language the force of feeling that produced them (dynamis tès phōnès, lit. "the power of the sound").

In Acts 28 2 4 (in AV of ver 2 "barbarous peoples") the writer, perhaps from the Gr-Rom standpoint, calls the inhabitants of Melita barbarians, as being descendants of the old Phoen settlers, or possibly in the more general sense of "strangers." For the later sense of "brutal," "cruel," "savage," see 2 Mac 2 21; 4 25; 15 2.

BARBER, băr'ber:
(1) The Eng. word "barber" is from Lat barba, "beard"—a man who shaves the beard. Dressing and trimming the hair came to be added to his work. "Barber" is found only once EV, in Ezk 5 1, "Take thee a sharp sword; as a barber's razor shalt thou take it unto thee, and shalt cause it to pass upon thy head and upon thy beard" (cf Hāgittq'ab 4b, Shab, §6).

BARFROST (barefoot):
(2) In Gen 41 14 we probably have a case of conformity to Egypt, rather than Palestinian custom, where Joseph "shaved himself, and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh." It is known that Egyptians of the higher classes shaved the beard regularly and completely (as the Hittites, Elamites and early Babylonians seem to have done), except that fashion allowed, as an exception to the rule, a small tuft, or "goatee," under the chin.

(3) We learn from various Scriptural allusions, as well as from other sources (cf W. Max Müller, Asien und Europa, 296 ff), that the business of the oriental barber included, besides ceremonial shaving with the razor, the trimming and polling of the hair and the beard. Cf 2 S 19 24 where it appears that the moustache (Heb sāphām; AV "beard") received regular trimming; and 1 S 21 14, where the neglect of the beard is set down as a sign of madness.

That men wore wigs and false beards in ancient days, the later writer showing the mark of the wearer, appears from Herod. ii 36; iii 12; and Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, II, 324, etc. Jos. Vīta, II, gives one case where false hair appears to have been used as an intentional disguise. See also Polyb. iii 78.

(4) The business of the barber (see Ezk 5 1, "as a barber's razor shalt thou take it unto thee, and shalt cause it to pass upon thy head and upon thy beard"), outside of ceremonial shaving, may have consisted in trimming and polling the beard and the hair of the head. Of other nations with whom Israel and old Egypt came in contact—Téthites and Elamites, it is now known, shaved the beard completely, as the earliest Babylonians also seem to have done.

(5) The prohibition enjoined in the Mosaic law upon "the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok" (Ezk 44 15 20) forbidding either "shaving the head," or "suffering their locks to grow long," or shaving off the corners of their beard (Lev 21 5), was clearly, in a sense peculiar to the priests, etc: "They [the priests] shall only cut off", i.e. trim, not shave, "the hair of their heads" (Ezk 44 20b). But in the Apos Const, I, 3, insistence is laid upon the Bib. prohibition as applicable to all as regards the removal of the beard (cf Clement of Alex., Paed., III, ed Migne, I, 580 f). Jerome on Ezk 44 20 and some of the Jewish sages find the basis of this prohibition in the fact that God gave a beard to man to distinguish him from the woman—so, they reasoned, it is wrong thus to go against Nature (cf Bahya, on Lev 19 27).

(6) In the Pal of the Gr period, say in the 3d cent. BC, when there was a large infusion of Hellenic population and influence, clipping of the beard prevailed in some circles, being omitted only in times of mourning, etc. The Egyptian people, however, seem to have seen little distinction between clipping the beard and shaving. But see pictures of captive Jews with clipped beard in the British Museum.

BARCHUS, bär'kūs (B, Bāχoūs, Bāchoūs; A, Bāχwā, Barchou; AV Charchus, from Aldine ed, Charchoās; 1 Esd 5 52 = Barkos [Ezr 5 53; Neh 7 55]): The descendants of B. (temple-servants) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus.

BAREFOOT, băr'fō't: The word is found in the following passages: EV, "He went barefoot" (2 S 15 30); "[Isaiah] did so, walking barefoot" (Isa 20 2; and like the dactylic Egyptian, "naked and barefoot" (Isa 20 34). It seems that David in his flight before Absalom "went barefoot," not to facilitate his flight, but to show his grief (2 S 15 30), and that Micah (1 8) makes "going barefoot" a sign of mourning (LXX "to be barefoot"); AV "striped"). The nakedness and bare feet of the prophet Isaiah (20 2) may have been intended to symbolize and express sympathy for the forlorn condition of captives (cf Job 12 17 19), where AV and RV have "spoiled," but some authorities give as the true tr "barefoot".

Jastrow, in art. on "Tearing the Garments" (Jour. of the Am. Oriental Soc., XXI, 23-39) presents a view worth considering as barefoot as a sign of mourning; for Jewish interment was then of grief in general (cf. also Jow Enc., art. "Barefoot"). All these passages seem to imply the discomfort of going barefoot on long journeys or through sand; but, then, as now, in the Oriental sandy deserts, feet seem to have been little worn ordinarily in and around the house.

See Shoes.

The "shoes" of the ancients, as we know from many sources, were "sandals," i.e. simply soles, for the most part of rawhide, tied to the feet to protect them against the gravel, stones or thorns of the road.

Ancient Oriental Shoes of the modern sort, as well as socks and stockings, were unknown.

In ancient times it was certainly a common custom in Bible lands to go about in and around one's house without sandals. The peasantry, indeed, like the jellohaem of today, being hardened to it, often went afield barefoot. But for a king, or a prophet, a priest or a worshipper, to go barefoot was another matter, as it was also for a mourner, for one in great distress, to be found walking the streets of a city, or going any distance in bare feet. Here we come again to customs peculiar to the Orient, and of various significance. For instance, the ancient considered then, as it is now in the Moslem world, profound and ceremonial, nothing short of a desecration, to enter a sanctuary, or walk on "holy ground," with dust-covered shoes, or unwashed feet. Moses and Joshua were commanded to take off their shoes when they "on "holy ground" (Ex 3:5; Josh 5:15), "No one was allowed to walk on the temple ground with shoes on, or with dust on his feet" (Ber., IX, 5; cf. Jamblichus, Pythagoras, § 105). No one in the East today is allowed to enter any mosques with shoes on, or without first putting slippers furnished for the purpose over his shoes. As a rule, too, the feet must be cleansed by ablution in every such case, as well as hands and feet before each meal.

The priests of Israel, as would seem true of the priests in general among the ancients, wore no shoes when ministering (see Silius on Duty Ex 31, questio 7; and Ver. H., 5, 48d). Anciendly, to walk barefoot, as priests of Israel, when going on the platform to serve before the ark, in Tabernacle or temple, as later in the synagogue to bless the congregation, went barefoot; though today, such a custom is not among the Jews wear stockings, and are not supposed to be barefoot (Sotah, 40a; RH, 316; Shulhan 'Arakh, 'Orah Hayyim, 128, 5; see Jow Enc., art. "Barefoot").

The reason or reasons for the removal of the shoes in such cases as the above, we are not at a loss to divine; but when it comes to the removal of the shoes in times of mourning, etc., opinions differ. Some see in such customs a trace of ancestor-worship; others find simply a reversion or return to primitive modes of life; while others still, in agreement with a widely prevalent Jewish view, suggest that it was adopted as a perfectly natural symbol of humility and simplicity of life, appropriate to circumstances of grief, distress and deep solemnity of feeling. The shoes are set aside now by many modern Jews on the Day of Atonement and on the Ninth of Ab.

BARIAH, ba'-rə-ə (בֵּית, "fugitive"): B. was a descendant of David in the line of Solomon (1 Ch 3:22).

BAR-JESUS, bər-je'əzus (בַּר-יְזָעַס, Bariżona): A "certain sorcerer (Gr magos), a false prophet, a" thief" (whom Paul and Silas found at Paphos in Cyprus in the train of Sergius Paulus, the Rom proconsul (Acts 13:6 ff.). The proconsul was a "man of understanding" (lit. a prudent or sagacious man), of an inquiring mind, interested in the thought and magic of his times. This character-

BARLEY, bär′lē (לֵעָם, sēḇrāh):

(1) In the Bible, as in modern times, barley was a characteristic product of Pal—"a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees," etc (Dt 8 8), the failure of whose crop was a national disaster (Jd 1 11). It was, and is, grown chiefly as provender for horses and asses (1 K 4 28), oats being practically unknown, but it was, as it now is, to some extent, the food of the poor in country districts (Ruth 2 17; 2 K 4 42; Jn 6 9.13). Probably this is the meaning of the dream of the Midianite concerning Gideon: "Behold, I dreamed a dream; and, lo, a cake of barley bread tumbled into the camp of Midian, and came unto the tent, and smote it so that it fell, and turned it upside down, so that the tent lay flat. And his fellow answered and said, This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, the son of Joash, a man of Israel" (Jgs 7 13 f.). Here the barley loaf is type of the peasant origin of Gideon's army and perhaps, too, of his own lowly condition.

Bringing Home the barley Harvest.

Barley was (Ezk 4 9) one of the ingredients from which the prophet was to make bread and "eat it as barley cakes" after having baked it under repulsive conditions (ver 12), as a sign to the people. The false prophetesses (Ezk 13 19) are said to have produced God among the people for "handfuls of barley and for pieces of bread."

Barley was also used in the Ordeal of Jealousy (s.v.). It was with five barley loaves and two fishes that Our Lord fed the five thousand (Jn 6 9.10).

(2) Several varieties of barley are grown in Pal. The Hordeum distichum or two-rowed barley is probably the nearest to the original stock, but Hordeum tetrastichum, with grains in four rows, and Hordeum herzaichinum, with six rows, are also common and ancient; the last is found depicted upon Egyptian monuments.

Barley is always sown in the autumn, after the "early rains," and the barley harvest, which for any given locality precedes the wheat harvest (Ex 9 31 f.), begins near Jericho in April—or even March—but in the hill country of Pal is not concluded until the end of May or beginning of June.

The barley harvest was a well-marked season of the year (see TIME) and the barley corn was a well-known measure of length. See Weights and Measures.

BARN, bārn (בָּרָן, mibhārān, "a granary, "farm"), Jg 2 19; בָּרָא, "a storehouse."

Prov 3 10; לֵעָם, manmibhārāh, "a repository," Joel 1 17; תַּפּוֹנָה, apôthēkē, Mt 6 26; 13 30; Lk 12 18.24): A place for the storing of grain, usually a dry cistern in the ground, covered over with a thick layer of earth. "Grain is not stored in the East until it is threshed and winnowed. The apothēkē in Rom times was probably a building of some kind. But the immemorial usage of the East has been to conceal the grain, in carefully prepared pits or caves, which, being perfectly dry, will preserve it for years. It thus escaped, as far as possible, the attentions of the tax-gatherer and, as well as of the robber—not always easily distinguished in the East; cf Jer 41 8" (Temple Dictionary, 215).

Figurative of heaven (Mt 13 30). See Agriculture; Garner.

BARNABAS, bär′ná-bas (BapvdPas, Barnabas, "son of exhortation," or possibly "son of Nebo"): This name was applied to the associate of Paul, who was originally called Joses or Joseph (Acts 4 36), as a testimony to his eloquence. Its lit. meaning is "son of prophecy" (bar, "son"; nabhādh, "prophecy"). Cf word for prophet in Gen 20 7; Dt 18 15.18, etc. This is interpreted in Acts 4 36 as "son of exhortation" RV, or "son of consolation" AV, expressing two sides of the Gr paraklēsis, that are not exclusive. The office of a prophet being more than to foretell, all these interpretations are admissible in estimating Barnabas as a preacher; "Deismann (Bibelstudien, 175-78) considers Barnabas the Jewish Grecized form of Barnebous, a personal Sem name recently discovered in Asia Minor inscriptions, and meaning "son of Nebo" (Standard BD in loc.).

He was a Levite from the island of Cyprus, and cousin, not "nephew" (AV), of the evangelist Mark, the word anēpios (Col 4 10), being used in Nu 36 11, for "father's brothers' sons." When we first learn of him, he had removed to Jerus, and acquired some property there. He sold his property and contributed its price to the support of the poorer members of the church (Acts 4 36 f). In Acts 11 24 he is described as "a good man and full of the Holy Spirit" (cf Isa 11 2, 1 Cor 12 8.11) "and of faith," traits that gave him influence and leadership. Possibly on the ground of former acquaintance, interceding as Paul's sponsor and surety, he removed the distrust of the disciples at Jerus and secured the admission of the former persecutor into their fellowship. It is probable that some of the countrymen of Barnabas had begun a movement toward Christianity among the Greeks at Antioch. Barnabas was sent from Jerus to give it encouragement and direction, and, after a personal visit, to ascertain their needs, sought out Paul at Tarsus, and brought him back as his associate. At the close of a year's successful work, Barnabas and Paul were sent to Jerus with contributions from the infant church for the famine sufferers in the older congregation (11 30). Ordained as missionaries on their return (13 3), and accompanied by John Mark, they proceeded upon what is ordinarily known as the "First Missionary Journey" of Paul (Acts 13 4.5). Its history belongs to Paul's life. Barnabas was as Paul designated "an apostle" (Acts 14 14). Up to Acts 13 43, the precedence is constantly ascribed to Barnabas; from that point, except in 14 13 and 16 12.25, we read "Paul and Barnabas," instead of "Barnabas and Saul." The latter became the chief spokesman. The people at Lystra named Paul, because of his fervid oratory, Mercurius, while the quiet dignity and reserved strength of Barnabas gave him the title of Jupiter (Acts 14 12). Barnabas escaped the violence which Paul suffered at Iconium (14 19).

Upon their return from this first missionary tour, they were sent, with other representatives of the church at Antioch, to confer with the apostles and elders of the church at Jerus concerning the obligation of circumcision and the ceremonial law in general under the NT—the synod of Jesus. A separation from Paul seems to begin with a temporary yielding of Barnabas in favor of the inconsistent course of Peter (Gal 2 13). This was followed by a more serious rupture concerning Mark. On the second journey, Paul proceeded alone, while Barnabas and Mark went to Cyprus. Luther and Calvin regard 2 Cor 8 18.19 as meaning Barnabas by “the brother whose praise is spread through all the churches,” and indicating, therefore, subsequent joint work. The incidental allusions in 1 Cor 9 6 and Gal 2 13 ("even Barnabas") show at any rate Paul's continued appreciation of his former associate. Like Paul, he accepted no support from those to whom he ministered.

Tertullian, followed in recent years by Grau and Zahn, regard him as the author of the Epistle to the He. The document published among patristic writings as the Epistle of Barnabas, and found in the 25th folio of the Codex Argenteus, in uncial letters assigned today to a later period. "The writer nowhere claims to be the apostle Barnabas; possibly his author was some unknown namesake of "the son of consolation"" (Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 239 f.). H. E. Jacobs

BARNABAS, GOSPEL OF. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

BARODIS, ba-ro'dis (Bærodis, Baroādis, 1 Ead 5 31): The descendants of J. (sons of the servants of Solomon) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem. Omitted in Ezra 2 and Neh 7.

BARREL, bar'el: The word "barrel" in AV (see 1 K 17 12.14.16; 18 33: "The barrel of meal," "fill four barrels with water," etc) stands for the large earthenware jar (so ARV) used in the East for carrying water from the spring or well, and for storing grain, etc., according to a custom that still persists. It is elsewhere (EV) more fitly rendered "pitcher." See House; Pitcher, etc.

BARNEN, bar'en, BARRENNESS, bar'en-nes (בָּרֶן, giyâh; בָּרֶנֶנֶס, mélâthâh, בָּרֶנֶס, shâkhâh; בָּרֶנְו, ì'kâr; סְדָרָה, seîros; סְדָרָה, yâyôp, ì'kâr): (1) Of land that bears no crop, either (a) because it is naturally poor and sterile: giyâh "dry" (Job 2 20), mélâthâh, "salt" (Job 39 6 AV), shâkhâh, "miscarrying" (2 K 2 19.21), or (b) because it is, under God's curse, turned into a mélâthâh or salt desert, for the wickedness of the people that dwell therein (Ps 107 34 AV; cf Gen 3 17). (2) Of females that bear no issue: ì'kâr: Sarah (Gen 11 30); Rebekah (25 21); Rachel (39 31); Manoah's wife (Jgs 13 23); Hannah (1 S 2 5); seîros: Elisabeth (Lk 1 7 36).

In Israel and among oriental peoples generally barrenness was a woman's and a family's greatest misfortune. The highest sanctions of religion and patriotism blessed the fruitful woman, because children were necessary for the perpetuation of the tribe and its religion. It is significant that the mothers of the Heb race, Sarah, Rebekah and Rachel, were by nature sterile, and therefore God's special intervention shows His particular favor to Israel. Fruitfulness was God's special blessing to His people (Ex 23 26; Dt 7 14; Ps 113 9). A complete family is an emblem of beauty (Cant 4 2; 6 6). Metaphorically, Israel, in her days of adversity, when her children were exiled, was barren, but in her restoration she shall rejoice in many children (Isa 54 1; Gal 4 27)

The utter despair and terror of the destruction of Jesus could go no farther than that the barren should be called blessed (Lk 23 29).

(3) Arpôs is ter in AV "barren," but in RV more accurately "idle" (2 Pet 1 8).

BARTACUS, bår-ta'kus (Bârtakos, Bârtokos; Jos Epa'hta, Ehabedâskos; Vulg. Bezae [1 Ead 4 29]): The father of Apame. He is called "the illustrious," probably because of rank and merits. The family seems to be of Pers origin since the name Bartacus (Syr ÊN) in the form of Artachaeas is mentioned by Hierod. (22 22.117) as a person of rank in the Pers army of Xerxes and the name of his daughter Apame is identical with that of a Persian princess who married Seleucus I, Nicator, and became the mother of Antiochus I. Apame, a city in Asia Minor founded by Seleucus I, is named in honor of his wife Apame. Cf Apame; ILLUSTRIOS.

BARTHOLOMÆW, bår-th öl'-mô (Bartholómaos, Bartholomaios, i.e. "son of Tolmai or Tal- maia"): One of the Twelve Apostles (Mt 10 8; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 14; Acts 1 13). There is no further reference to him in the NT. According to the "Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles" (Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 50) "Bartholomew was of the house of Naphatli. Now his name was formerly John, but Our Lord changed it because of John the son of Zebedee, His beloved." A "Gospel of Bartholomew" is mentioned by Hieronymus (Comm. Proem ad Matth.), and Gelasius gives the tradition that Barodeis, or Bartholomew, brought the Heb gospel of St. Matthew to India. In the "Preaching of St. Bartholomew in the Oasis" (cf Budge, II, 90) he is referred to as preaching probably in the oasis of Al Bahmâd, and according to the "Preaching of St. Andrew and St. Bartholomew" he labored among the Parthians (Budge, II, 158). The "Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew" states that he was placed in a sack and cast into the sea.

From the 9th cent. onward, Bartholomew has generally been identified with Nathanael, but this view has not been conclusively established. See Nathanael.

BARTIMAÆS, bår-tî-mä's (Bartímaous, Bartímaios): A hybrid word from Aram. bâr="son," and Gr timaios="honorable." For the improbability of the derivation of bar-tim'aô "son of the unclean," and of the allegorical meaning the Gentiles or spiritually blind, see Schmiedel in EB.

In Mk (10 46-52) Bartimæus is given as the name of a blind beggar, whose eyes Jesus Christ opened as He went out from Jericho on His last journey to Jerusalem. An almost identical account is given by Lk (18 35-43), except that the incident occurred "as He drew nigh unto Jericho," and the name of the blind man is not given. Again, according to Mt (20 20-34), "as they went out from Jericho" (like Mk) too blind men (unlike Mk and Lk) receive their sight. It is not absolutely impossible that two or even three events are recorded, but so close is the similarity of the three accounts that it is highly improbable. Regarding them as referring to the same event, it is easy to understand how the discrepancies arose in the passage of the story from mouth to mouth. The main incident is clear enough, and on purely historical grounds, the miracle cannot be denied. The discrepancies BARUCH, bā'rukh, bār'uk (בָּרוּךְ, bārûḵ; Baróch, Barōch, "blessed"): (1) Son of Neriah and brother of Seraiah, King Zedekiah's chamberlain (Jer 51:59). He was the devoted friend (Jer 32:12), the amanuensis (36:4 ff.; 52) and faithful attendant (36:10; Jos, Ant, X, x, 2) of the prophet Jeremiah. He seems to have been of noble family (see Ant, X, ix, 1; cf. Jer 51:59; Bar 1:1). He was also according to Jos a man of unusual acquisitions (Ant, X, ix, 1).

He might have risen to a high position and seemed conscious of this, but under Jeremiah's influence (see Jer 45:5) he repressed his ambition, being content to throw in his lot with the great prophet whose secretary and companion he became. Jeremiah dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read them to the people (Jer 36). The king (Jehoiakim) was greatly angered at these prophecies and had Baruch arrested and the roll burnt. Baruch however rewrote the prophet's oracles. In the final siege of Jerusalem Baruch stood by his master, witnessing the people of his age and residence being taken to Anathoth (Jer 33). According to Jos (Ant, X, ix, 1) he continued to reside with Jeremiah at Mispa after the fall of Jerusalem. Subsequent to the murder of Gedaliah, he was accused of having unduly influenced Jeremiah. When the latter urged the people to remain in Judah—a fact which shows how great was the influence which Baruch was believed to have had over his master (Jer 43:3). He was carried with Jeremiah to Egypt (Jer 43:6; Ant, X, ix, 6), and thereafter our knowledge of him is merely legendary. According to a tradition preserved by Jerome (on Isa 30:6 f.) he died in Egypt soon after reaching that country. Two other traditions say that he went, or by Nebuchadnezzar was carried, to Babylon after this king conquered Egypt. The high character of Baruch and the important part he played in the life and work of Jeremiah induced later generations still further to enhance his reputation, and a large number of spurious writings passed under his name, among them (a) The Apocalypse of Baruch (q.v.); (b) the Book of Baruch; (c) the Rest of the Words of Baruch; (d) the gnostic Book of Baruch; (e) the Lat Book of Baruch, composed originally in Lat; (f) a Gr Apocalypse of Baruch belonging to the 2nd cent. of our era; (g) another Book of Baruch belonging to the 4th or 5th cent.

(2) A son of Zabbai who aided Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:20).

(3) One of the priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:6).

(4) The son of Colhozeh, a descendant of Perez, the son of Judah (Neh 11:5).

BARUCH, APOCALYPSE OF. See Apocalyptic Literature.

BARUCH, BOOK OF: One of the Apocalyptic or Deutero-canonical books, standing between Jer and Lam in the LXX, but in the Vulg after these two books.

I. Name.—See under Baruch for the meaning of the word and for the history of the best-known Bib. personage bearing the name. Though Jewish traditions link this book with Jeremiah's amanuensis also leave ample room for the author, neither is certain that it was not written or compiled for hundreds of years after the death of this Baruch. According to Jer 45:1 it was in the 4th year (604 BC) of the reign of Jehoiakim (608-597 BC) that Baruch wrote down Jeremiah's words in a book and read them in the ears of the nobles (EV "princes"); but King's sons are not necessarily meant; Jer 36). The Book of Baruch belongs in its present form to the latter half of the 1st cent. of our era; yet some modern Roman Catholic scholars strongly maintain that it is the work of Jeremiah's friend and secretary.

II. Contents.—This book and also the Epistle of Jeremy have closer affinities with the canonical Book of Jer than any other part of the Apoc. It is probably to this fact that they owe their name and also their position in the LXX and in the Vulg. The book is apparently made up of four separate parts by independent writers, brought together by an R, owing it is very likely to a mere accident—each being too small to occupy the space on one roll they were all four written on one and the same roll. The following is a brief analysis of the four portions of the book:

Historical Introduction, giving an account of the origin and purpose of the book (1-14).

1. Historical Introduction

2. Confession and Prayer

3. The Prophet's Dream

4. The Book of Baruch

5. Apocryphal Books

1. Historical Introduction, giving an account of the origin and purpose of the book (1-14).

The writer of this book at Babylon in the fifth month [not "year" as LXX], in the seventh day of the month, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem and burnt it with fire" (with all the connotations of this expression), the writers read: "In the fifth year, in the month Sivan [see ver 8], in the seventh day of the month," etc. Um gives the date of the Feast Pentecost, and the supposition is that the party who made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem did so in order to observe that festival. According to vs 3-14, Baruch read his book to King Jehoiachin and his court by the (unidentified) river Sud. King and people on hearing the book fell to weeping, fasting and praying. As a result money was collected and together with Baruch's book, to the high priest Jehoiakim,1 to the priests and to the people at Jerusalem. The money is to be used in order to make it possible to carry on the services of the temple, and in particular that prayers may be offered in the temple for the king and his family and also for the superior lord King Nebuchadnezzar and his son Biltasar (= the Belshazzar of Dnl 6).

Confession and prayer (15-28) (1) of the Palestinian remnant. (15-25). The speakers are resident in Judah not in Babylon (ver 15; cf. 2:4), as J. T. Marshall and R. H. Charles rightly hold. This section follows throughout the arrangement and phrases contained in Dnl 9 7-15. It is quite impossible to think of Dnl as being based on Bar, for the writer of the former is far more original than the author or authors of Bar. But in the present section the original passage in Dnl is altered in a very significant way. Thus in Dnl 9 (7) the writer describes those for whom he wrote as "the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem and all Israel[ites]: those near and those far off, in all the lands [countries] whether thou hast driven them on account of their unfaithfulness toward thee." The italized words are omitted from Bar 15, though the remaining part of Dnl 9 7 is added. Why this difference? It is evident, as Marshall has ably pointed out, that the R of the section intends to put the confession and prayer of 15—25 into the mouths of Jews who had not been removed into exile. Ewald (History, V, 208, 6) holds that Dnl 9 7-9 is dependent on Bar 15—22. The section may thus be analyzed:

(a) 15-22: Confession of the sins of the nation from the days of Moses down to the exile. The

1 So spelt in the canonical books; but it is Joasim or Joaschim in Apoc AV, and in the Apoc RV it is invariably Joasim.
principle of solidarity' (see Century Bible, "Psalms," II, 15, 195, 215) so governed the thoughts of the ancient Israelites that the inequities of their forefathers were in effect their own.

(b) 2 1–5: God's righteous judgment on the nation in humbling and scattering them.

Confession and prayer (2) of the exiles in Babylon 2 16–3 8. These words in this section are supposed to be uttered by Bab exiles appears from 2 13 f; 3 7 f and from the general character of the whole. This portion of the book is almost as dependent on older Scriptures as the foregoing. Three sources of the work, particular to each, are used.

(a) The Book of Jer has been freely drawn upon.

(b) Deuteronomic phrases occur frequently, esp. in the beginning and end. These are perhaps taken second-hand from Jer, a book well known to the author of these verses and deeply loved by him.

(c) Solomon's prayer as recorded in 1 K 8 is another quarry from which our author appears to have dug.

This section may be thus divided:

1 5–12: Confession, opening as the former (see 1 15) with words extracted from Dnl 9 7.

2 3 1–3 8: Prayer for restoration.

3 1–8 shows more independence than the rest, for the author at this point makes use of language not known to any older source given to us. In 3 4 such verses are important as a clue to the writer's position, views and character.

In 3 4 we have the petition: "Hear now the prayer of the dead Israelites," etc. words which as the author of the lines that the dead (Solomon, Daniel, etc) are still alive and make intercession to God on behalf of the living. But this teaching is in opposition to 2 17 which occurs in the same context. Without making any change in the Hebrew columns we can and should read for "dead [māṭhē] Israelites" the "men of [māṭhē] Israel." The LXX confuses the same words in Isa 5 13.

The praise of "Wisdom," for neglecting which Israel is now in a strange land. God alone is the author of wisdom, and He bestows it not upon the great and mighty of this world, but upon His own chosen people, in order to keep them spiritually alive. The passage 3 10–13 (Israel's rejection of "Wisdom" the cause of her exile), goes badly with the context and looks much like an interpolation. The dominant idea in the section is that God has made Israel a type of all other nations, of the gift of "Wisdom," which is highly extolled. Besides standing apart from the context these four verses lack the rhythm which characterizes the other verses. What is so cordially described is described in three ways, each showing up a different facet, as do the eight synonyms for the Divine word in each of the 22 strophes in Ps 119 (see Century Bible, "Psalms," II, 254).

1. It is called most frequently "Wisdom."

(2) In 4 1 it is described as the Commandments of God or as the Law, or more correctly as authoritative instruction. The Heb word for the last (יְהוָ֣ה) bears in this connection, it is probable, the technical meaning of the Pent, a sense which it never has in the OT. Cf Dt 4 6, where the keeping of the commandments is said to be the gift of "Wisdom" and understanding.

(1) The line of thought here resembles closely that pursued in Job in 28, which modern scholars rightly regard as a later interpolation.

4. The Dependence of the Wisdom on the Bar Section 28 12; cf Bar 3 14 f, where a similar question forms the basis of the greater portion of the section of Job 38 f. Wisdom is here known as in Prov hypostatized, and the same is true of Job 28. This in itself is a sign of early date, for the personifying of "wisdom" is a later development (cf Philo, John 1).

(2) The language in this section is modeled largely on that of Dt, perhaps however through Jer, which is also esp. after ch 10 Deuteronomist in thought and phraseology. See ante II, 2 (3 16).

The most original part of this division of the book is where the writer enumerates the various classes of men who failed to be good "wisdom": princes of the heathen, wealthy men, silversmiths, merchants, theologians, philosophers, etc (3 16 ff). See Wisdom.

The general thought that pervades the section, 4 5–6 9, is words of cheer to Israel (i.e. Judah) in exile, but we have here really, according to Rothstein, a compilation edited so skillfully as to give it the appearance of a unity which is not real. Either Bib. writing has throughout been largely drawn upon. Rothstein (Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen, etc, 213–15) divides the section in the following manner:

(1) 4 5–9a: Introductory section, giving the whole its kernel, "the fear of God, etc." etc; 4 7 f follows Dt 32 15–18.

(2) 4 9b–29: A song, divisible into two parts.

(a) Personified Jerus deplores the calamities of Israel in exile (vs 9b–16).

(b) She urges her unfortunate children to give themselves to hope and prayer, amending their ways so that God may bring about their deliverance (vs 17–29).

(c) 4 30–5 9: A second song, beginning as the first with the words, "Be of good cheer," and having the same general aim, to comfort exiled and oppressed Israel.

In all three parts earlier Scriptures have been largely used, and in particular Deutero-Isaiah has had much influence upon the author. But there do not seem to the present writer reasons cogent enough for concluding, with Rothstein, that these three portions are by as many different writers.

5. Words of Cheer to Israel

There is throughout the same recurring thought "Be of good cheer!" and there is nothing in the style to suggest divergent authorship.

(3) The relation between 4 36–5 9 and Ps Sol 11. It was perhaps Ewald, Geschichte, IV, 498 who first pointed out the similarity of language and viewpoint between Bar 4 36–5 9 and Ps Sol 11, esp. 11 3–8. The only possible explanation is that which makes Bar 4 36 f an imitation of Ps Sol 11. So Ewald (op. cit.;) Ryle and James (Ps Sol, lxx, ii ff).

Ps Sol were written originally in Heb, and references to Pompey (d. 48 BC) and to the capture of Jerus (63 BC) show that this pseudographical Psalter must have been written in the first half of the 1st cent. BC. Bar, as will be shown, is of much later date than this. Besides it is now almost certain that the part of Bar under discussion was written in Gr (see below, IV) and that it never had a Heb original. Now it is exceedingly unlikely that a writer of a Heb psalm would copy a Gr original, though the contrary supposition is a very likely one.

On the other hand A. Geiger (Psalt. Sol., XI, 137–39, 1811), followed by W. B. Stevenson (Temple Bible), and many others argue for the priority of Bar, using this as a reason for giving Bar an earlier date than is actually done. It is possible, of course, that the Pseudo-Solomon and the Pseudo-Baruch have been digging in the same quarry; and that the real original used by both is lost.
III. Language.—For our present purpose the book must be divided into two principal parts: (1) 1–3: (2) 4–5. 9. The former is general agreement among the best recent scholars from Ewald downward that the first portion of the book at least was written originally in Heb. (1) In the Syro-Hex. text there are margin notes to 1 17 and 2 3 to the effect that the verses are lacking in the Heb, i.e. in the original Heb text.

(2) There are many linguistic features in this first part which are best explained on the supposition that the Gr text is from a Heb original. In 2 25 the LXX EV apostate at the end of the verse means "in the place of" (which, without somewhat sloppy copying of the Heb, would not be found. The construction called parataxis characterizes Heb; in good Gr we meet with hypotaxis.

The Heb way of expressing "where" is put into the Gr text in 4 13, 29; 8 3. Many other Heb idioms, due, is probable, to the translator's imitations of his original, occur: in "to speak in the ears of" (1 3); the word "man" (anabripse) in the sense "every one" (2 3); "spoken by the servants of the house of the servants," which is good Heb but bad Gr. Many other such examples could be added.

There is much less agreement among scholars as to the original language or languages of the second part of the book (3 9–5 9). That this part too was written in Heb, so that in that case the whole book appeared first in that language, is the position held and defended by Ewald (op. cit.), Kneucker (op. cit.), König (Eben), Rothstein (op. cit.) and Bissell (Lange). It is said by these writers that this second part of Bar equally with the first carries with it marks of being a tr from the Heb. But one may safely deny this statement. It must be admitted by anyone who has examined the text of the book that the largest number of them occur in the first part of the book. Bissell writes quite fully and warmly in defense of the view that the whole book was at first written in Heb, but the Hebraisms which he cites are all by him except one taken from the first part of the book. This one exception is in 4 15 where the Gr conjunction kómi is used for the relative kó, the Heb 'asher having the meaning of both. There seems to be a Hebraism in 4 21: "He shall deliver them from the hand of your enemies," and there are probably others. But there are Hebraisms in Hellenistic Gr always—the present writer designates them "Hebraisms" or "Semiticisms" notwithstanding what Deissman, Thumb and Moulton say. In the first part of this book it is their overwhelming number and their striking character that tell so powerfully in favor of a Heb original.

(3) The following writers maintain that the second part of the book was written first of all in Gr. Fritzsche, Hole, Hengel, Reuss, Schürer, Gifford, Cornill and R. H. Charles, though they agree that the first part had a Heb original. This is probably the likeliest view, though much may be written in favor of a Heb original for the whole book and quite decisively against it. J. Turner Marshall (HDB, I, 253) tries to prove that 3 9–4 4 was written first in Aram., the rest of the book (4 5–5 9) in Gr. But though he defends his case with great ability he does not succeed in making it appear to the reader that the Gr text is not a translation of an original Heb version. Ewald (op. cit.), Hitzig (Penselen, II, 113), Dillmann, Reusche, Fritzsche and Bissell were so greatly impressed by the close likeness between the Gr of Bar and that of the LXX of Jer, that they came to the conclusion that both books were tr by the same person. Subsequently Hitzig decided that Bar was not written until after 70 AD, and therefore abandoned his earlier opinion in favor of this one—that the translator of Bar was well acquainted with the LXX of Jer and was strongly influenced by it.

IV. Date or Dates.—It is important to distinguish between the date of the completion of the entire book in its present form and the dates of the several parts which in some or all cases may be much older than that of the whole as such.

1 1–14 was written after the completion of the book expressly to form a prologue or historical explanation of the circumstances under 1. The His— which the rest of the book came to be called.

To superficial readers it would appear that the whole book was written by one man, but a careful examination shows that the book is a comp. One may conclude that the introduction was the last part of the book to be composed and that therefore the date is that of the writing of the book. Reasons will be given (see below) for believing that 4 5–5 9 belongs to a time subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in 70 AD. This is still more true of this introduction itself, 4 1–5 8.

The following points bear on the date of the section 1 15–3 8, assuming it to have one date:

(1) The generation of Israelites to which the writer belonged were suffering for the sins of their ancestors; see esp. 3 1–8.

(2) The second temple was in existence in the writer's day. 2 26 must (with the best scholars) be tr as follows: "And thou hast made the house over which the name of the temple is this day," i.e. the temple—still in being—is shorn of its former glory. Moreover though Dtn 9 7–14 is largely quoted in 1 15–2 12, the prayer for the sanctuary and for Jerusalem in Dtn 9 16 is omitted, because the writer does not think that the temple is repaired.

(3) Though it is implied (see above II, 2 [1]) that there are Jews in Judah who have never left their land there are a large number in foreign lands, and nothing is said that they were servants of the Bab king.

(4) The dependence of 2 13–3 8 on Dt, Jer and I K 8 (Solomon's prayer) shows that this part of the book is later than these writings, i.e. later than 550 BC.

(5) The fact that Dtn 9 7–14 has influenced Bar 1 15–2 12 proves that a date later than Dtn must be assumed for at least this portion of Bar.

Ewald, Gifford and Marshall think that this section belongs to the period following the conquest of Jerusalem by Titus (70 AD). According to Ewald the author of 1 1–8 (regarded as by one hand) was a Jew living in Babylon or Persia. But Dtn had not in 320 BC been written. Fritzsche, Schrader, Keil, Toy and Charles assign the section to the Maccabean age—a quite likely date. On the other hand Hitzig, Kneucker and Schürer prefer a date subsequent to 70 AD, and argue for the unity of this section, though he admits that the middle of ch 1 comports ill with its context.
It has been pointed out (see above, II, 3) that 3:10-13 does not belong to this section, being manifestly a later interpolation. The dependence of this Wisdom portion on Job 38-41 implies a post-exilic date. The reasons advanced by Kneucker and Marshall for a date immediately before or soon after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 AD have not convinced the present writer. The situation implied in these words may be thus set forth: (1) A great calamity has happened to Jerusalem (4:9 f.). Nothing is said of Cheer, but Saul's 5:11. The version of the Text of the books is from the Syriac and is a later restoration of the Hexap. Syr Bible.

3. The Wisdom Section

The identification of Wisdom with the 3:9-4:14 Torah which is evidently a synonym for the Pent, argues a date at any rate not earlier than 300 BC. But how much later we have no means of ascertaining. The reasons adduced by Kneucker and Marshall for a date immediately before or soon after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 AD have not convinced the present writer. The situation implied in these words may be thus set forth: (1) A great calamity has happened to Jerusalem (4:9 f.). Nothing is said of Cheer, but Saul's 5:11. with the equally mythical Cockatrice (q.v.). In all the passages cited, it denotes a venomous serpent (see Adder; Serpents), but it is impossible to tell what, if any, particular species is referred to. It must be borne in mind that while there are poisonous snakes in Pal, there are more which are not poisonous, and most of the latter, as well as some harmless lizards, are commonly regarded as deadly. Several of the harmless snakes have crown-like markings on their heads, and it is quite conceivable that the basilisk myth may have been founded upon one of these. ALFRED ELY DAY

BASIN, bás'n, BASON: The AV has "basin," the AV and RV "bason," the preferred spelling of the Eng. revisers. In the Appendix to the Revised OT the American Terms Used Revisers (§ viii) say, "The modern and their spelling is preferred for the following meaning words;" then follow among others "basin" for "bason;" but no similar statement appears in the Appendix to the Revised NT. The Heb word so rendered in EV is chiefly used for the large bowl of bronze (AV "brass") employed by the priests to receive the blood of the sacrificial victims (Ex 27 3; of 29 16; 1 K 7 45, etc.). It is found only once in secular use (Am 6 6, "drink wine in bowls"), if the text there is correct; the LXX has it otherwise. See BowL The "basins" of Ex 12 22; 2 S 17 28 were probably of earthenware.

While the priests' bowls were of bronze, similar bowls or basins of silver were presented by the prince of the congregation, according to Nu 7 13 f; and those spoken of in 1 K 7 50 as destined for Solomon's temple were of gold (cf 1 Ch 28 17).

(1) The well-known eastern mode of washing the hands was and is by pouring water on the hands, not by dipping them in water, an act, of course, calling for the aid of an attendant. Eliasha "poured water on the hands of Elijah" (2 K 3 11; see Kitto's note in Pictorial Bible, II, 330). A disciple came to be known as "one who poured water on the hands of another." Such was beyond question the prevailing custom among the ancient Hebrews, as it was, and is, among eastern peoples in general. They incline to look with disgust, if not with horror, upon our western practice of washing face and hands in water retained in a basin.

(2) The typical vessel of the East used in such ablutions has a long spout, not unlike our large coffee-pot (see Kitto, Pict. Bib., II, 331, note). While the EV unfortunately often suggests nothing like such pouring, the Heb expresses it, e.g. in 1 S 25 41, where we have the Qal of roháq (רְוָ֣ק); of Kennedy in 1-vol HDB, and HDB, arts. "Bath," "Bathe," "Bathing." Kennedy shows that "affusion," "pouring on" of water, was meant in many cases where we read "bathe" or "wash" in EV. Lane (Med. Egypt. § 150) says, "the basin and ewer (called tššt and střšk) of tinned copper or brass. The first has a cover with holes, with a raised receptacle for the soap; and the water is poured upon the hands and passes through the ewer into the space below; or when the basin is brought to the second person the water with which the former has washed is not seen."

(1) A wash-basin of a special sort was used by Jesus for washing the disciples' feet (see Jn 13 5). The Gr is niptér (νίπτρ), esta báilei. 4. A Basin hadó't ein toń niptéra, trá RV, "then of a Unique he poureth water into the basin."

Sort This word niptér is not found elsewhere in the NT, nor in the LXX, nor, indeed, in Gr profane lit. But fortunately the general sense is here made plain by the context and by comparison of the cognate verbs niptoin and nixea. It evidently denotes an article, not necessarily a vessel, specifically suited to the use of washing a part of the body, e.g. the hands or the feet, and hence is used with a similar sense in the RV. It is doubtful, therefore, if "basin," or "bason," conveys a true idea of either the oriental article here meant or the scene portrayed. The fact that, according to the custom of the day, the position of the disciples here was reclining, precludes the possibility of the use of a "basin" of our sort, in the way we are accustomed to, i.e. for immersing the feet in the water, in whole or in part.

(2) So it is likely that the niptér was a jug, or ewer, with a dish, saucer, or basin placed under it and combined with it to catch the dripping water. We know from other sources that such a vessel was kept in the Jewish house regularly for ordinary handwashes, etc (see Mt 15 2; Mk 7 3), and for ceremonial ablutions. Hence it would naturally be ready here in the upper room as a normal part of the preparation of the "goodman of the house" for his guests (AV Mk 14 14; Lk 22 12), and so it is distinguished by the Gr art. tón. Jesus Himself used the niptér, standing, doubtless, to impress upon His disciples the lessons of humility, self-abasement and loving service which He ever sought to impart and illustrate.

(3) Our conclusion, we may say with George Farmer in his art. "Bason," is that niptér was not simply one large basin, but the set of ewer and basin combined, such a set as was commonly kept in the Jewish house for the purpose of cleansing either the hands or the feet by means of affusion. The Arab. (čššt, authorities tell us, is the exact rendering of niptér, and it comes from a root which means "to pour," or "rain slightly." (See Anton Tien, reviser of the Arab. prayer-book, author of Arab. and Mod. Gr Grammars, etc, quoted in DCG, art. "Bason.")

GEORGE E. EAGEN

BASKET, bas'ket: Four kinds of "baskets" come to view in the OT under the Heb names, ššd, lene, and lššb. There is little, however, in these names, or in the narratives where they are found, to indicate definitely what the differences of size and shape and use were. The Mish renders us some help in our uncertainty, giving numerous names and descriptions of "baskets" in use among the ancient Hebrews; see Kreugel, Das Habelgerät in der Mischnah, 39–45). They were variously made of willow, rush, palm-leaf, etc, and were used for various purposes, domestic and agricultural, for instance, in gathering and serving fruit, collecting alms in kind for the poor, etc. Some had handles, others lida, some both, others neither.

1. Meaning

(a) In the OT, 'basket' is used as a symbol of Egypt bondage, and especially in the OT is used for offering presents to Yahweh (Gen. 40:16).

(b) In the NT, 'basket' is used for bricks (of Ps. 81:6), probably a large, shallow basket, made of wicker-work. It stood for a basket that was used in fruit-gathering (see Jer. 24:1), but it did not differ from Amos' "basket of summer fruit" (Amos 8:1).

2. Meaning

(a) The noun is used in the sacrificial offering (Ex. 29:41), showing probably that a pot-shaped "basket" was known by this name. Then it seems to have stood for a basket tapering toward the bottom like the calathus of the Romans. So we seem forced to conclude that the term was generic, not specific.

(b) The commonest basket in use in OT times was the gaal. It was the "basket" in which the court-baker of Egypt carried about his confectionery on his head (Gen. 40:16). It was made in later times at least of peeled willows, or palm-leaves, and was sometimes at least large and flat like the calathus of the Romans, and, like it, was used for carrying bread and other articles of food (Gen. 40:16; Jgs 6:19). Meat for the meat offerings and the unleavened bread, were placed in it (Ex. 29:41; Lev. 8:2; Nu. 6:15). It is expressly required that the unleavened cakes be placed and offered in such a "basket." While a "basket," it was dish-shaped, larger or smaller in size, it would seem, according to demand, and perhaps of finer texture than the dath.

(c) The tena was a large, deep basket, in which grain and other products of garden or field were carried home and kept (Dt. 25:5,17), in which the first-fruits were preserved (Dt. 26:2), and the tithes transported to the sanctuary ( Dt. 26:2). It has been thought probable that the baby, the basket of clay and straw of the Pal. peasants of today, is a sort of survival or counterpart of it. It has the general shape of a jar, and is used for storing and keeping wheat, barley, oats, etc. At the top is the mouth into which the grain is poured, and at the bottom is an orifice through which it can be taken out as needed, when the opening is again closed with a rag. The LXX translates tene' by kártallos, which denotes a basket of the shape of an inverted cone.

(d) The term kóphtos, found in Am. 8:1 for a "fruit-basket," is used in Jer. 5:27 (AV and RV "cage") for a bird-cage. It is not at all unreasonable to suppose that a coarsely woven basket with a cover would be used by a fowler to carry home his feathered captives.

In the NT interest centers in two kinds of "basket," distinguished by the evangelists in their accounts of the feeding of the 5,000 and the 4,000, called in Gr. kóphi'nos and spura (WIL spuralis).

Terms

(a) The kóphi'noi (Mt. 14:20; Mk 6:43; Lk 9:17; Jn. 6:13) may be confidently identified with the kóphi'ntos of the Mish., which was provided with a cord for a handle by means of which it could be carried on the back with such provisions as the disciples on the occasions under consideration would naturally have with them (cf. Kreugel, and Broadus, Comm. in loc.).

(b) The Jews of Juvenal's day carried such a specific "provision-basket" with them on their journeys regularly, and the Lat for it is a transliteration of this Gr word, cophinus (cf. Juvenal 11:14, and Jastrow, Dict., art. "Basket"). Some idea of its size may be drawn from the fact that in CIG 1625, 46, the word denotes a Boeotian measure of about two gallons.

(c) The spuralis (Mt. 15:37; Mk. 8:8) we may be sure, from its being used in letting Paul down from the wall at Damascus (Acts 9:25, etc.), was considerably larger than the kóphi'nos and quite different in shape and use. It might for distinction fitly be rendered "hamper," as Professor Kennedy suggests. Certainly neither the Gr nor ancient usage justifies any confusion.

(d) The sargánā (2 Cor. 11:33) means anything plaited, or sometimes more specifically a fish-basket.

BASTARD, bas'tard (חֶסֶד, namer; υδος, nathos): In Dt. 23:2 probably the offspring of an incestuous union, or of a marriage within the prohibited degrees of affinity (Lev. 18:6—20; 20:10—21). He and his descendants to the tenth generation are excluded from the assembly of the Lord. (See Driver, ad loc.). Zechariah (9:6), after prophesying the overthrow of three Phil. cities, declares of the fourth: "And a bastard [RV 'a bastard race'] shall dwell in Ashdoth," meaning probably that a "mixed population" (BDII) of aliens shall invade and settle in the capital of the Philis. In He (12:8) in its proper sense of "born out of wedlock," and therefore not admitted to the privileges of paternal care and responsibility as a legitimate son.

BASTHAI, bas'thā-ı, bas'thi (Basthāi, Basthai; AV Bastai; 1 Esd 5 31 = Besai [Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 52]): The descendants of B. (temple-servants) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem.

BAT (םתָּלֶפֶח, ʿālāēph; Lev 11 19; Dt 14 18; Isa 2 20): Bats are the most widely distributed mammals, reaching even the oceanic islands, and modern science has revealed the existence of an astonishing number of species, nearly twenty being recorded from Pal. These include both fruit-eating and insect-eating bats, the latter being the smaller.

It has not always been realized that they are mammals, and so it is not surprising that they should be mentioned at the end of the list of unclean birds in Lev 11 19 and Dt 14 18. It may, however, be significant that they are at the end of the list and not in the middle of it. The fruit bats are a pest to horticulturists and often strip apricot and other trees before the fruit has ripened enough to be picked. On this account the fruit is often inclosed in bags, or the whole tree may be surrounded with a great sheet or net. They commonly pick the fruit and eat it on some distant perch beneath which the seeds and the ordure of these animals are scattered. The insect bats, as in other countries, flit about at dusk and through the night catching mosquitoes and larger insects, and so are distinctly beneficial.

The reference in Isa 2 20, “cast . . . . idols . . . . to the moles and to the bats” refers of course to these animals as inhabitants of dark and deserted places. As in the case of many animal names the etymology of ʿālāēph is doubtful. Various derivations have been proposed but none can be regarded as satisfactory. The Arab. name, ʿawāṭḥ, throws no light on the question. ALFRED ELY DAY

BATANAEA, bat-a-nē'a: The name used in Gr times for Bashan (q.v.), Jos, Life, II; Ant, XV, x, 1; XVII, ii, 1, “toparchy of Batanaea.”

BATH (בַּח, bath): A liquid measure equal to about 9 gallons, Eng. measure. It seems to have been regarded as a liquid standard (Ezk 45 10), as in the case of the molten sea and the laver in Solomon’s temple (1 K 7 26 38), and for measuring oil and wine (2 Ch 2 10; Ezr 7 22; Isa 5 10; Ezk 45 14). Its relation to the homer is given in Ezk 45 11.14. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BATH, bath, BATHING, bathing: Bathing in the ordinary, non-religious sense, public or private, is rarely met with in the Scriptures.

1. Ordinary

We find, however, three exceptional cases: (1) that of Pharaoh’s daughter, resorting to the Nile (Ex 2 5); (2) that of Bath-sheba, bathing on the house-top (2 S 11 2 RV); (3) the curious case mentioned in 1 K 22 38. (To wash with royal blood was supposed to be beneficial to the complexion.)

The dusty, limestone soil of Pal and the open foot-gear of the Orient on stockless feet, called for frequent washing of the feet (Gen 24 32; 43 24; Jgs 19 24; 1 S 35 41; 2 S 11 8; Cant 5 3, etc), and bathing of the body for refreshment; but the chief concern of the writers of Scripture was with bathing of another sort. Indeed, something of the religious sense and aspect of bathing, in addition to that of bodily refreshment, seems to have entered into the ordinary use of water, as in the washing of the hands before meals, etc (see Gen 18 4; 19 2; Lk 7 44).

The streams and ponds, when available, were the usual resorts for bathing (Ex 2 5; 2 K 6 10, etc), but the water-supply of large cities, Resorts stored up in great pools or large cisterns, was certainly available at times to some degree for bathing (2 S 11 2); though, as Benzinger says, no traces of bathrooms have been found in old Heb houses, even in royal palaces. In Babylon, it would seem from Sus 15, there were bathing pools in gardens, though this passage may refer simply to bathing in the open air. Certainly public baths are now known, or plunge-baths of the Gr type, were unknown among the Hebrews until they were brought in contact with the Gr civilization. Such baths first come into view during the Gr-Rom period, when they are found to be regularly included in the gymnasia, or “places of exercise” (1 Mac 1 14). Remains of them, of varying degrees of richness and architectural completeness, may be seen today in various parts of the Eust, those left of the cities of the Decapolis, esp. at Gerasa and Amman, being excellent examples (cf also those at Pompeii). A remarkable series of bath-chambers has recently been discovered by Mr. R. A. S. Macalister at Gezer (PEF).

When we consider that in Pal six months of the year are rainless, and how scarce and pricelessly valuable water is during most of the year, and in many places all the year round; and when we recall how the Bedouin of today looks on the use of water for cleansing in such times and places of scarcity, viewing it as a wanton waste (see Benzinger, Heb. Arch., 108, note), the rigid requirement of it for so many ritual purposes by the Mosaic law is, to say the least, remarkable (see Ablution; Clean and Unclean, etc.). Certainly there was a marked contrast between the Gr idea of bathing and that of the Hebrews and Asians in general, when they came in contact. But when Gr culture invaded Pal under Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 168 BC), it brought Gr ideas and Gr bathing establishments with it; and under Herod (40-44 BC) it was given the right of way and prevailed to no mean degree (see Anecdote of Gamaliel II in Schürer, HJP, II, 1, 18, 53).

4. Ceremonial Purification or "under the ban," etc. (see Clean and Unclean, etc.). The Heb of the OT does not sharply distinguish between bathing and partial washing—both are expressed by rabeh, and the RV rightly renders "wash" instead of "bathe" in some cases. Talmudic usage simply codified custom which had been long in vogue, according to Schürer. But Kennedy grants that the "bath at last became, even for the laity, "an important factor in the religious life of Israel." We read of daily bathing by the Essenes (Jos, BJ, II, viii, 5). Then later we find John, the Baptistizer, immersing, as the record clearly shows the apostles of Christ did also (Acts 8:38; Rom 6:3). If of Lk 11:38 where baptiseō, baptizo, in passive = "washed."

In Jn 6:2-7 we have an example of bathing for health. There are remains of ancient baths at Gadara and at Callirhoe, E. of the Jordan, baths which were once celebrated as resorts for health-seekers. There are hot baths in full operation today, near Tiberias, on the southwestern shore of the Lake of Galilee, which have been a health resort from time immemorial. It is probably true, however, as some one has said, that in OT times and in NT times, the masses of the people had neither privacy nor inclination for bathing. Geo. B. Egerer

BATH KOL, bath'kol, bath kol (יָדַקׁ, bath kol, "the daughter of the voice"): Originally signifying no more than "sound," "tone," "call" (e.g., water in pouring gives forth a "sound," bath kol, while oil does not), sometimes also "echo." The expression acquired among the rabbis a special use, signifying the Divine voice, audible to man and unaccompanied by a visible Divine manifestation. Thus conceived, bath kol is to be distinguished from God's speaking to Moses and the prophets; for at Sinai the voice of God was part of a larger theophany, while for the prophets it was the resultant inward demonstration of the Divine

But "bathing" in the Bible stands chiefly for ritual acts—purification from ceremonial uncleanness, from contact with the dead, with defiled persons or things, with "holy things; i.e., things "devoted," or "under the ban," etc. (see Clean and Unclean, etc.). The Heb of the OT does not sharply distinguish between bathing and partial washing—both are expressed by rabeh, and the RV rightly renders "wash" instead of "bath" in some cases. Talmudic usage simply codified custom which had been long in vogue, according to Schürer. But Kennedy grants that the "bath at last became, even for the laity, "an important factor in the religious life of Israel." We read of daily bathing by the Essenes (Jos, BJ, II, viii, 5). Then later we find John, the Baptistizer, immersing, as the record clearly shows the apostles of Christ did also (Acts 8:38; Rom 6:3). If of Lk 11:38 where baptiseō, baptizo, in passive = "washed."

In Jn 6:2-7 we have an example of bathing for health. There are remains of ancient baths at Gadara and at Callirhoe, E. of the Jordan, baths which were once celebrated as resorts for health-seekers. There are hot baths in full operation today, near Tiberias, on the southwestern shore of will, by whatever means effected, given to them to declare (see Voice). It is further to be distinguished from all natural sounds and voices, even where these were interpreted as conveying Divine instruction. The conception appears for the first time in Dan 4:28 (EV 31)—it is in the Aram. portion—where, however, kol=kol, "voice" stands without *berath=bath, "daughter": "A voice fell from heaven." Jos (Ant, XIII, x, 8) relates that John Hyrcanus (135-104 BC) heard a voice while offering a burnt sacrifice in the temple, which Jos expressly interprets as the voice of God (cf Bab Sinah 35a and Jesus Sinah 24b, where it is called bath kol). In the NT mention of "a voice from heaven" occurs in the following passages: Mt 3:17; Mk 1:11; Lk 3:22 (at the baptism of Jesus); Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7; Lk 9:35 (at His transfiguration); Jn 12:28 (shortly before His passion); Acts 9:4; 22:7; 36:14 (conversion of Paul), and 10:13.15 (instruction of Peter concerning clean and unclean). In the period of the Tannaim (c. 100 BC-200 AD) the term bath kol was in very frequent use and was understood to signify not the direct voice of God, which was held to be super-sensible, but the echo of the voice (the bath being somewhat arbitrarily taken to express the distinction). The rabbis held that bath kol had been an occasional means of Divine communication throughout the whole history of Israel and that since the cessation of the prophetic gift it was the sole means of Divine revelation. It is noteworthy that the rabbinical conception of bath šōḥā sprang up in the decline of the prophetic era and flourished in the period of extreme traditionalism. Where the gift of prophecy was clearly lacking—perhaps even because of this lack—there grew up an inordinate desire for special Divine manifestations. When a voice from heaven was looked for to clear up matters of doubt and even to decide between conflicting interpretations of the law. So strong had this tendency become that Rabbi Joshua (cir 100 AD) felt it to be necessary to oppose it and to insist upon the supremacy and the sufficiency of the written law. It is clear that we have here to do with a conception of the nature and means of Divine revelation that is distinctly inferior to the Bib. view. Even for the Bib. passages where mention is made of the voice from heaven, all that is really essential to the revelation is already present, at least in principle, without the audible voice.

θεσπόρων πολλῶν, en πύλαις θεσπόρων πολλῶν, lit. "in the gates of the daughter of many." The gate of Heshbon near which were the pools compared to the Shulammite's eyes (Cant 7 4). Gothe would translate "by the gate of the populous city." Cheyney amended the passage and read: "Thine eyes are like Solomon's pools, By the wood of Beth-ecorn," and transfer the scene to the pools of Solomon, S. of Bethlehem (EB, s.v.). But this is surely very violent. One of the pools of Heshbon still survives, measuring 191 ft. X 189 ft., and is 10 ft. deep. The walls have however been rent by earthquakes, and now no longer retain the water. W. Ewing.

BATH-SHEBA, bath-shē'ba, bath'she'ba (בַּת-שֵּׁבָה), bath-sheba", "the seventh daughter," or "the daughter of an oath," also called Bathshuah (בַּתְשָׁה), bath-shō'ah; "the daughter of opulence" [1 Ch 3 5]; the LXX however reads Bērsābē everywhere; of Bathshuah; HPN, 65, 67, 77, 296 for Bath-sheba, and 65, 69, n. 8, for Bathshuah. Bath-sheba was the daughter of Eliam (2 S 11 3) or Ammiel (1 Ch 3 5); both names have the same meaning. She was the beautiful wife of Uriah the Hittite, and because of her beauty was forced by David to commit adultery (2 S 11 2 ff.; Ps 51). Her husband Uriah was treacherously killed by order of David (2 S 11 6 ff.). After the death of her husband David made her his wife and she lived with him in the palace (2 S 11 27). Four sons sprang from this marriage (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 3 5), after the first child, the adulterine, had died (2 S 12 14 ff.). With the help of the prophet Nathan she renders futile the usurpation of Adonijah and craftily secures the throne for her son Solomon (1 K 1 11 ff.). Later Adonijah succeeds in deceiving Bath-sheba, but his plan is frustrated by the king (1 K 2 13 ff.). According to Jewish tradition, Prov 31 is written by Solomon in memory of his mother. In the genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1 6) Bath-sheba is mentioned as the former wife of Uriah and the mother of Solomon by David. See Adonijah; Ammiel; Bathshuah; David; Eliam; Nathan; Solomon.

BATH-SHEUA, bath-shā'ah, "the daughter of opulence" or "the daughter of Shua"; Bath-sheba; for derivation see HPN, 67, 69, n. 3: (1) In Gen 38 2 and 1 Ch 2 3, where the name is tr "Shua's daughter," the wife of Judah. (2) In 1 Ch 3 5, the daughter of Ammiel and wife of David. See Bath-sheba.

BATTERING-RAM, bat'èr-ing-ram. See Siege.

BATTLE. See War.

BATTLE-AXE, bat'èl-ak. See Armor, Arms, III, 1; Ax (Axel).

BATTLE-BOW, bat'èl-bō. Found in the striking Messianic prophecy: "The battle bow shall be cut off" (Zec 9 10). The prophet is predicting the peace that shall prevail when Zion's king cometh, "just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt the foal of an ass." The words convey their full significance only when read in the light of the context: "I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem; and the battle bow shall be cut off; and he shall speak peace unto the nations," (cf 10 4). The battle-bow was sometimes made of tough wood, sometimes of two straight horns joined together (Hom. II. iv. 105-11), and sometimes of bronze. In Ps 18 34 RV we find "bow of brass," but it probably should be of "bronze" (נְבָשֶׁת, n'boseth), a metal very different from our brass, which is a mixture of copper and zinc. The point of the passage in this connection ("He teacheth my hands to war; so that mine arms do bend a bow of bronze"), as well as of that in 2 K 9 24 ("And Jehu drew his bow with his full strength") is that it required great strength to bend the battle-bow. See Archery; Armor. Geo. B. Eager.

BATTLEMENT, bat'l-ment. See Fortifica-

BAYAV, bay'av. See Bayv.

Bayv, bay'-v. See Bayv.

BAYVAY, bay'v-ē (בַּיִּו, bayvayy; LXX A. Bavis, Bené; B. Besb, Bedel; AV Bayvai, "wisher"?) (Neh 3 18): Perhaps identical with or a brother of Binnui (Neh 3 24). See Binnui. B., "the son of Henadad, the ruler of half the district of Keilah," was of a Levitical family. He is mentioned as one of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh 3 17 f.).

BAY, bā. See Colors.

Bay, bā (בַּע, bāśāh, lit. "tongue"); ἀκοινός, kálpōs): The word occurs in the sense of inlet of the sea in the OT only in Josh 15 25; 18 19, and in NT only in Acts 27 39 (of Malta, AV "creek").

Bayith, bay'ēth (בַּיִת, bayith; AV Bayith, "house") (Isa 15 2): A town in the country of Moab. The reading of RVm, "Bayith and Dibon are gone up to the high places to weep," seems to be the proper rendering of this passage. Duham al., by changing the text, read either "house of" or "daughter of." The construct of this word bath is frequently used in compound words. See Betz.
BEAK, bêk' In 2 S 17:28, the word translated "beak" in the LXX may be better rendered "claw," indicating a bear's claw. The Hebrew word may also denote "shoofa", a type of fish cruelly poked in the eye by a spearhead to render it blind. The word may also be translated "beak" when referring to the beak of a bird. See BEAKED.
BEAR, bär (vb.), BORN, børn (טֹא, yâölāh): Occurs frequently in its lit, sense, alluding to motherhood (Gen 16 11; 17 17.19.21; 18 13; 22 23; 30 3; Lev 12 5; Jgs 13 3; 5 7; Ruth 1 12; 1 Ki 3 21; Jer 29 6); in the NT τερένω, γεννάω, in the same sense (Lk 1 13).

Figurative: It is often used with reference to the beginning of the spiritual life or regeneration (Jn 1 13; 3 3-8; 1 Jn 2 29; 3 9; 4 7; 5 1.4.18 AV). See Regeneration.

BEAR, bär, BORNEN, børn (טֹאָו, râdâd; λαμπάω, lambâo, ἀναφέρω, anapherô, ἀπαγάγω, bastâo): In EV the physical sense is familiar, of supporting or carrying any weight or burden. The tr of RV is to be preferred in Ps 75 5 (‘have set up’); Lam 3 28 (‘hath laid it upon him’); Zeph 1 11 (‘were laden with silver’); Lk 18 7 (‘he is longsuffering over them’); Jn 12 6 (‘took away what was put there-in’); Acts 27 15 (‘could not face the wind’).

Figurative: The words are used in the fig. sense of enduring or taking the consequences of, be it for oneself or as representative for others: one’s own iniquity (Lev 5 17 and often) and chastisement (Job 34 31); reproach (Ps 69 7; 89 50) or the sins of others (Isa 63 4.11.12; Mt 5 17; Heb 9 28; 1 Pet 2 24). In Isa 46 1-7 a striking contrast is presented between the idols of Babylon whom His worshippers had carried (borne) about and which would be borne away by the conquerors, and Jeh who had carried (borne) Israel from the beginning. “Jacob and Israel ... borne by me from their birth ... and I will bear; yea, I will carry.” “They bear it upon the shoulder,” etc. M. O. EVANS

BEARD, bûrd: (1) Western Semites in general, according to the monuments, wore full round beards, to which they evidently devoted great care. The nomads of the desert, in distinction from the settled Semites, wore a chipped and pointed beard (see Jer 9 26: “all that have the corners of their hair cut off, that dwell in the wilderness”; and cf 26 25; 49 32, etc).

(2) Long beards are found on Assyrian and Babylonian monuments and sculptures as a mark of the highest aristocracy (of Egypt monuments, esp. representations by W. Max Müller, Asien und Europa, 140). It is not clear that it was ever so with the Jews. Yet it is significant that the Heb ‘elder’ (זֶהָן) seems to have received his name from his long beard (of bene barbatus).

(3) The view of some that it was customary among the Hebrews to shave the upper lip is considered by the best authorities as without foundation. The monastic (Heb σαφάλων, ‘beard’), according to 2 S 19 24, received regular “trimming” (thus EV after the Vulg, but the Heb is generic, not specific: “He had neither dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard”).

(4) In one case (1 S 21 13.14) the neglect of the beard is set down as a sign of madness. [He] let his spittle fall down upon his beard. Then said Achish, ... yo see the man that is on the road.”

(5) It was common Sct to cut both hair and beard as a token of grief or distress. Isaiah 15 2, describing the heathen who have “gone up to the high places to weep,” says “Moab waithed as others Neo, and over Medeba; on all their heads is baldness, every beard is cut off.” Jeremiah 41 5, describing the grief of the men of Samaria for their slain governor, Gedaliah, says, “There came men from ... Samaria [his sorrowing subjects]... four sore men, having their beards shaven and their clothes rent,” etc. And Amos, in his prophecy of the vision of the “basket of summer fruits” (8 1 ff), makes Jeh say to His people: “I will turn your feasts into mourning; ... I will bring a scorching wind upon you. ... I will pluck off the hair.” The shaving of the head of a captive slave-girl who was to be married to her captor marked her change of condition and prospects (Dt 21 12; W. R. Smith, Kinship, 209).

BEAST, bést: This word occurs often in both Old and New Testaments and denotes generally a mammal (Ho, bovine) in distinction to a man, a bird or a fish. In this distinction the Eng. is fairly in accord with the Heb and Gr originals. The commonest Heb words בֵּרִםָה and בָּאָה have their counterpart in the Arab. as do three others less often used, بَاّر (Gen 45 17; Ex 22 5; Nu 20 8 AV), נֶפֶש (Lev 24 18) and תְּפָאָה (Prov 9 2). Бěrmah and Arab. бахмам are from a root signifying vagueness or dumbness and so denote primarily a dumb beast. Хáт and Arab. ūdádû are from the root ūdâd (Arab. ٍبٍَ) “to live,” and denote primarily living creatures. Бa'ás, "cattle," and its root-verb, бa'а, "to graze," are identical with the Arab. ba'âr and ba'a‘a, but with a curious difference in meaning. Бa'âr is a common word for camel among the Bedawin and the root-verb, бa‘a‘ar, means "to drop dung." Бa'âr being a common word for the dung of camels, goats, and sheep. Nephesh corresponds in every way with the Arab. nephâs, "breath," "soul" or "self." Тépha'âh from 이ְפָה (yâphah) "slaughter," is equivalent to the Arab. dîthîn from dîthaba, with the meaning of "killing." Both φιλος, θέριον ("wild beast") and ἰδού, ἱδον ("living thing") occur often in the Apocalypse. They are found in a few other places, as mammals (He 11 13) or fig. (Tit 1 12). Θérian is used also of the viper which fastened on Paul's hand, and this has parallels in classical Gr. Beasts of burden and beasts used for food were and are an important form of property. Hence the word ἐξοπλίσθη ("possession"), the word used for the good Samaritan's beast (Lk 10:34) and for the beasts with which Lyasios provided Paul for his journey to Caesarea (Acts 20:3). For "swift beast," kirkārub, "dromelary" (Iaa 66:20 AV), see Camel. For "swift beast," rekheš, see Hosea (Mic 1:13 AV; 1 K 4:28 AVm; cf Est 8:10-14). See also Wild Beast.

BEATITUDES, bě-at'i-tūdēs. The word "beatitude" is not found in the Eng. Bible, but the Lat. beatitudo, from which it is derived, occurs in the Vulgate version of Rom. Name 4:6, where, with reference to Ps 32:12, David is said to pronounce the "beatitude" of the man whose transgressions are forgiven. In the Lat. church, beatitudo was used not only as an abstract term denoting blessedness, but in the secondary, concrete sense of a particular declaration of blessedness and esp. of such a declaration coming from the lips of Jesus Christ. Beatiudes in this derivative meaning of the word occur frequently in the OT, particularly in the Ps (32:12; 41:1; 65:4, etc.), and Jesus on various occasions threw His utterances into this form (Mt 11:6; 13:16; 16:17; 24:46, with the Lukan parallels; 20:27); 27:20, 29), apart from individual sayings of this type the name Beatiudes, ever since the days of Ambrose, has been attached specifically to those words of blessing with which, according to both Mt and Lk, Jesus began that great discourse which is known as the Sermon on the Mount.

When we compare these Beatiudes as we find them in Mt 5:3-12 and Lk 6:20-23 (24-26), we are immediately struck by the resemblance in thought and differences between them.

2. The Two Groups. To the ordinary reader, most familiar with Mt's version, it is the differences that first present themselves; and he will be apt to account for the discrepancy of the two reports, as Augustine did, by assigning them to two distinct occasions in the Lord's ministry. A careful comparative study of the two narratives, however, with some attention to the introductory circumstances in each case, to the whole progress of the discourses themselves, and to the parabolas sayings with which they conclude, makes this view improbable, and points rather to the conclusion that what we have to do with is two varying versions given by the Evangelists of the material drawn from an underlying source consisting of Logia of Jesus. The differences, it must be admitted, are very marked. (a) Mt has 8 Beatiudes; Lk has 4, with 4 following Woes. (b) In Mt the sayings, except the last, are in the 3d per.; in Lk they are in the 2d. (c) In Mt the blessings, except the last, are attached to spiritual qualifications; in Lk they are attached to spiritual qualities, and to external conditions of poverty and suffering. Assuming that both Evangelists derived their reports from some common Logian source, the question arises as to which of them has adhered more closely to the original.

The question is difficult, and still gives rise to quite contrary opinions. One set of scholars decides in favor of Mt, and accounts for Lk's deviation from the Matthean version by ascribing to him, on very insufficient grounds, an ascetic bias by which he was led to impart a materialistic tone to the utterances of Jesus. Another set in its kēnōs ("possession"), the word used for the good Samaritan's beast (Lk 10:34) and for the beasts with which Lyasios provided Paul for his journey to Caesarea (Acts 20:3). For "swift beast," kirkārub, "dromelary" (Iaa 66:20 AV), see Camel. For "swift beast," rekheš, see Hosea (Mic 1:13 AV; 1 K 4:28 AVm; cf Est 8:10-14). See also Wild Beast.

and active. The first four, again, have been represented as pertaining to the desire for salvation, the second four to the granting to and possession. Some writers have endeavored to trace in the group as a whole the steadily ascending stages in the development of the Christian character. The truth in this last suggestion lies in the reminder it brings that the Beatitudes are not to be thought of as setting forth separate types of Christian character, but as enumerating qualities and experiences that are combined in the ideal character as conceived by Christ—and as exemplified, it may be added, in the life of his person.

In respect of their structure, the Beatitudes are all alike in associating the blessing with a promise—a promise which is sometimes represented as having an immediate realization (v. 3-10), but in most cases has a future or even (cf. ver. 12) an eschatological outlook. The declaration of blessedness, therefore, is based not only on the possession of the quality or experience described, but on the present or future rewards in which it issues. The poor in spirit are called blessed not merely because they are poor in spirit, but because the kingdom of heaven is theirs; the mourners because they shall be comforted; those that hunger and thirst after righteousness because they shall be filled; those who are persecuted for righteousness sake are blessed, and the reward is set up for them in heaven. The Beatitudes have often been criticized as holding up an ideal of which limitation, privation and self-renunciation are the essence, and which lacks those positive elements that are indispensable to any full conception of blessedness. But when it is recognized that the blessing in every case rests on the associated promise, the criticism fails to the ground. Christ does demand of His followers a renunciation of many things that seem inconsistent with a natural heart and a readiness to endure many other things from which men naturally shrink. But just as in His own case the great self-emptying was followed by the glorious exaltation (Phil 2 6 ff.), so in the case of His disciples spiritual poverty and the bearing of the cross carry with them the inheritance of the earth and a great reward in heaven.

BEAUTIFUL, bō'ti-fōl, GATE, gāt. See Temple.

BEAUTY, bō'ti: The space allotted to this topic allows liberty only for the statement of two problems to students of the Bible. They should give distinct attention to the interblending of aesthetics with ethics in the Scripture. They should observe the extent and meaning of aesthetics in Nature.

The Bible is an ethical book is evident. Righteousness in all the relations of man as a moral being is the key to its inspiration, the guiding light to correct understanding of its utterance. But it is everywhere insinuated and written in an atmosphere of aesthetics. Study will bring out this fact from Gen to Rev. The first pair make their appearance in a garden where grow "every tree that is pleasant to the sight" (Gen 2 9), and the last vision for the race is an abode in a city whose gates are of pearl and streets of gold (Rev 21 21). Such is the imagery that from beginning to end is pictured as the home of ethics—at first in its untried innocence and at last in its stalwart right. But we cannot ignore the intermingling of these two elements—the beautiful and the good—in the whole Scripture range. A few texts will set before us this kinship and then the Bible student can detect it as he reads.

"One thing have I asked of Jehovah, that will I seek after: That I may inhabit in the house of Jehovah all the days of my life, To behold the beauty of Jehovah, And to inquire in his temple" (Ps 27 4).

"For all the gods of the peoples are idols: But Jehovah made the heavens. Honor and beauty are before him: Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary" (Ps 96 5, 6).

If we catch the spirit set forth in such and similar Psalms, we can use it as a magnetic needle to detect its like wherever we shall read: and we shall find that like in abundance. It is only necessary to turn our gaze to the direction given for making the Ark of the Covenant and its encircling tabernacle, and the decorations of the priests that were to minister in the worship of Jehovah in the ceremonies described, as given in Ex 25 ff., to see that every resource of Israel was brought to bear to render ark and tabernacle and their service beautiful. One will find in a concordance half a column of references under the word "Ark" and a column and a half under the word "Tabernacle." By looking up these references one can realize how much care was spent to give and preserve to these aids to worship the attractiveness of beauty.

In 1 Ch 15 and 16 we have an account of David's bringing in the Ark of the Covenant into the temple he had provided for it. On this occasion a demonstration was made with all the aesthetics of which the music of that day was capable. "And David spake to the chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren the singers, with instruments of music, psalteries and harps and cymbals, sounding aloud and lifting up the voice with joy." And David himself gave to the celebration the aesthetics of one of the noblest of his psalms (1 Ch 16 8-30).

It is almost as easy to refer to Solomon and his temple (1 K 6 ff.; 2 Ch 3 ff.) It is a common understanding that the civilization of Solomon's day was drawn upon to its utmost in every department of aesthetics, in the building of that house for Jehovah and in the appointments for the worship there to be conducted. Beauty of form and color and harmony of sound were then and there integrated—made one—with worship in holiness. The propriety of that association has been seen and felt through the centuries.

There is beauty in speech. It is a fact that the supreme classics in the lit. of the tongues of two of the dominant nations of the earth, the Eng. and the German, are tr's of the Bible. There is no explanation of such fact except that the original justified the tr. You can read indifferently from one tr to the other and catch the same aesthetic gleam. Nobility and poetry of thought lay in what was to be tr'd. Here is proof that cannot be gainsaid that the Scripture authors sought the aid of aesthetics as garb for the ethics they taught. So they wrote in poetry. So they used allegory, illustration, figure, metaphor that would charm and hold. The parables of Jesus are examples of this method of clothing thought. They do their ethical work because they have swept into it figure and imagery from familiar aesthetic perceptions. "The sower went forth to sow" (Mt 13 3). That is a glad sight—always has been and always will be. That is why a picture of "The Sower" hangs on the walls of a Christian home. Just the parable and every beholder remembers the parable and cannot forget its ethics. The intensity of thought concentrated upon ethics in the NT has drawn away attention to observe the partnership between these two principles in religion. But in there, and we shall see it when once we look for it. It is something to which we do not wake up till late in life—to wit, the illimitableness of the provision in Nature for beauty. Common consent awards beauty to the rainbow. Reflect that every drop of water in the dimension, or in the 2. Aesthet- ics in Nature of rainbow coloring. In fact all matter has color of which the rainbow is only specimen. Any element incandescent has a spectrum partially coincident with that of water and ranging above and below it in the infinite capacity it has to start other undulations. As apparently the larger part of the matter of the universe is incandescent, we can see that the field for expression in color is infinite. No one but the infinite God can see it all.

If we come down to this plain, plodding earth, cultivation of aesthetic sense will bring out beauty everywhere, from the grandeur of mountain scenery to aesthetic curves and colors revealed only by the microscope. We say the butterfly is beautiful. But the larva from which it is derived often carries as much beauty in molting of color and of the fineness of finish of spine and membrable. Looking across the scale in this way the evidence of theism from beauty itself becomes convincing. Beauty becomes a messenger of and from God—as Iris was to the Greek and the rainbow to the Hebrew (Ecc 3 11).

This from Amiel's Journal Intime, I, 233, sets forth the radical, inexpugnable position of beauty in Nature and in philosophy thereof correctly interpretative: "To the materialist philosopher the beautiful is a mere accident, and therefore rare. To the spiritualist philosopher the beautiful is the rule, the law, the universal foundation of things, to which every form returns as soon as the force of accident is withdrawn. As we accustom ourselves to make larger and larger synthesis in the department of aesthetics, what dispensation of theistic message may we not hear? Beauty wherever and however expressed is a medium of revelation. It is a bush ever burning, never consumed. Before it "put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." That beauty should be—to that intent, for that end, from everlasting hath wrought the Ancient of Days. C. CAVENZO BEAUTY, bû'ti, AND BANDS, bandz (בּד), נֹדְם, and בּדֵּשֶׁת, בּדָהּלím): The names given in Zec 11 7.14 to two symbological staves, the first signifying Jeh's covenant of grace with the peoples, and the second representing the brotherhood of Judah and Israel. The breaking of the two staves is symbolic of the breaking of Jeh's covenant and of the union between Judah and Israel.

BEBAI, bēbôÍ, behô'et (בּבֵּאָי, bēbî'; LXX Βαβαί, Bēbai, "fatherly"): (1) Descendants of B. returned with Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezr 8 11 called Babi; 1 Esd 8 37); one of these is Zechariah, the son of Bébaí (Ezr 8 11, Zacharias; 1 Esd 8 37). 623 returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezr 2 11; 1 Esd 8 13; Neh 7 18 gives the number 628); some of these had married "strange wives" (Ezr 10 28; 1 Esd 9 29). (2) A chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 15). (3) An unknown town (Jth 16 4). Omitted in B and Vulg.

BECAUSE, bê-kôs' (בּאָש, hêna, "in order that"): "The multitude reproved them, b. [AV: RV "that"] they should hold their peace" (Mt 20 31).

BECHER, bê-kêr (בּכֶּר, bekheer, "the firstborn"); cf HPN, 88): (1) Son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21; 1 Ch 7 6-8). (2) w. of Ephraim whose family is called Becherites (AV "Bachrites"), Nu 26 35 (1 Ch 7 20 called Bered). Cf BERED.

BECHORATH, bê-kôr'ath. See BECORATH.

BECK, bek, BECKON, bek'n (בּקָא, neká): This word from nêdâ, "to nod," "beckon," "make a sign" by moving the head or eyes (Lk 5 7; Jn 13 24; Acts 21 40; 24 10), occurs only in 2 Macc 8 18, "Almighty God who at a beck can cast down both them that come against us, and also all the world," RV, "able at a beck." So Shaks, "troops of soldiers at their beck;" "nod" is now generally used.

BECOME, bê-kum': (1) Gr gínoma, used in NT for a change of state, corresponding to Heb hâyâh of OT. Cf Mt 18 3 with Dt 27 9. (2) For what is fitting, suitable, proper, in NT: "προεπιω" (Mt 3 15; Eph 6 3; 1 Tim 2 10); in OT, נֹדְדָה, נֹדְדָה, נֹדְדָה, Ps 95 5: "Holiness becometh thy house." In this sense, the adv. "becomingly" may be interpreted: "Walk becomingly toward them that are without" (1 Thess 4 12), i.e. in a way that is consistent with your profession.

BECORATH, bê-kôr'ath (בּקְאִית, bêkârâth, "the first birth"); AV BECORATH: A forefather of Saul of the tribe of Benjamin (1 S 9 1).

BECTILETH, bek'ti-leth (בּכְכִילֵתָה, to pedion Biskitelaith): A plain which is defined as "near the mountain which is at the left hand of the upper Cilicia" (Jth 2 21). The name in Syr is Beth Ke'tifal, "house of slaughter." So far there is no clue to its identification.

BED, BEDCHAMBER, BEDSTEAD: For the very poor of the East, in ancient times as now, the "bed" was and is, as a rule, the bare ground; and the bedclothes, the gown, simlah, or "outer garment," worn during the day ("for that is his only covering, it is his garment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?") (Ex 22 27); of Dt 24 13, "Thou shalt surely restore to him the pledge when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his garment").

When one was on a journey, or watching his flock by night as a shepherd, such a "bed" was the most natural, and often a stone would serve as a pillow. (See Gen 28 11, where Jacob "took one of the stones of the place, and put it under his head, and lay down in that place to sleep;")

Mat.

An advance on this custom, which came in due course of time, or under change of circumstances, was the use of a mat on the floor as a bed, with or without covering. At first it was lit. laid on the floor, which was generally of one common level, in some convenient place near the wall; but later it was put on an elevation, either a raised part of the floor or on a bedstead, which gave rise to the expression "going up to the bed" (cf Gen 49 33 EV, "He gathered up his feet into the bed," and Ps 132 3, "go up into my bed").

With a later development and civilization, "beds" came to be built upon supports and constructed in different forms, which fact is reflected in the variety of names given the "bed" in the Heb and related languages.

(1) The following Heb words are used in the Bible for "bed," or, though it is impossible to remove of time and place and custom to differentiate them sharply, they will repa: יָבֶּן, mishkabh, (Gen 48 2, Bed, and Sleeping Customs...), shall come into thy bedchamber, of the Hebrews (cf Gen 49 4, Jacob to Reuben: "Because thou wentest up to thy father's bed; then defilest thou it"); יָבְנָה, mag'd (once only, Isa 28 20, "For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it"); and יָבֶנֶה, y'wv (Job 17 13, "I have spread my couch in the darkness"); 1 Ch 6 1, "He defiled his father's couch"; cf Gen 4 4 where the same "father's bed" is mishkabh; Ps 63 6, "when I remember thee upon my bed"; Ps 132 3, "nor go up into my bed"

(3) It is a far cry from the simple sleeping customs of Dt 4 13 to the luxurious arts and customs of the post-exilic days, when beds of fine wood and ivory are found in use among the Hebrews, as well as pillows of the most costly materials elaborately embroidered (see Jth 10 21; Est 1 6; cf Cant 3 10); but it all came about as a natural, as well as artificial development, with changed conditions and contacts and increasing civilization and luxury. As marking the several stages of that development, we find pictures of the poor, first sleeping upon the ground without mat or mattresses, then in a simple sleeping-room for the whole family, often without a separate bed, then with "beds" that were simply wadded quilts, or thin mattresses, and mats for keeping them off the ground; then with still better "beita" laid upon light portable, wooden frames, or upon more elevated bedsteads (cf Ps 132 3 and Mk 4 21 RV "under the bed"). The degree of richness depended, of course, upon time and place, in a measure, but more upon the wealth and station of the family and the style of the house or tent in which they lived. It does even with the Bedouin of today. The prophet Amos gives a vivid and significnt picture of the luxury of certain children of Israel, "that sit in Samaria in the corner of a couch, and on the silken cushions of a bed" (3 12); and of certain children of luxury "that lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock . . . . that drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief oils; but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph" (Am 6 4-6; cf Rev 18 10-13).

(3) We find that the poor, while sleeping for the most part in their ordinary clothing, often, in cold weather, made their beds of the skins of animals, old cloaks, or rugs, as they did still in the East. The "beds" and "bedding" now in ordinary use among Orientals are much the same, we may be sure, as they were in olden times. "Bedsteads" of any pretension were and are rare among the common people; but the richness of "beds" and "bedsteads" among Asiatics of wealth and rank was quite equal to that of the Greeks and Romans (cf Prov 7 17, 16, "I have spread my couch with carpets of tapestry, with striped cloths of the yarn of Egypt. I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon"); Cant 1 16-17: "The beams of our house are cedar, and our rafters are fir . . . .

also our couch is green." Cf the "palanquin" of Solomon, "the wood of Lebanon," "the pillars thereof of silver," "the bottom of gold," and "the seat of purple" (3 9-10).

(4) As soon as any family could afford it, a special bedroom would be set apart, and the whole family would sleep in it (see Jer 11 8-9, "My children are with me in bed"). When the house had two stories the upper story was used for sleeping, or, during very hot weather, preferably the roof, or the room on the roof. See HOUSE. When morning came the "bed," a wadded quilt or mattress, used with or without covering according to the season, was rolled up, aired and sunned, and then put aside on the raised platform, or packed away in a chest or closet.

The words mishkabh and mishkabh, came to have a figurative meaning signifying the final resting-place: and erea used of the "bedstead" of the King of Og (Dt 4 11) is thought by some to mean his sarcophagus (Koeniger, Heb Arch., 293; Novack, 1 493). Gen 47 31, and Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head is not rightly rendered (see SCHR. and Cri, Comm. in loc).

(1) We find several Gr words, αἰθήμ, kline, κραβάμα, κραθήσας, κράθησας, and κατήν, kathè, used in the NT somewhat indiscriminately and rendered EV by "bed," "couch," etc; but, as with the Heb words noted, there is little to indicate just exactly what they severally stand for, or how they are related to the Heb terms "bed" or "couch" in the OT. Of one thing we can be sure, reasoning from Mattress with Pillow.

1. OT Terms for Bed, and Sleeping Customs...

2. NT Terms for Bed, Their Meaning, etc what we know of "the unchanging East," the "beds" and sleeping customs of the Hebrews in Christ's time were in the main about what they were in later OT times.

(2) An interesting case for study is that of the man "sick of the palsy," whom they brought to Jesus "lying on a bed," and whom when healed "took up his bed and walked," and when the man was healed Jesus commanded him, as Luke says, to "take up his [his] couch and go unto [his] house," and he "took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his house, glorifying God" (5:25). It seems, therefore, that this "bed" was a "pallet" and "couch" combined, a thin mattress upon a light portable frame, such as we have already seen was in use among the ancients. Another kindred case was that of the sick man at the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5:2) whom Jesus healed and commanded to "take up his bed and walk," and he "took up his bed and walked"; only in this case the "bed" is a "pallet" without the frame, it would seem.

(3) Jesus in His teaching (Mk 4:21; cf Lk 8:10) speaks of a "seed which grows in the way," and it is significant in this connection: "Is the lamp brought to be put under the bed? or under the floor? but is set on a lampstand." Here, clearly, "the bed" is the "lamp," it is "draped" and "cushioned," and all under which "the lamp" would be obscured and hindered in its function of "giving light to all in the room." Again (Lk 17:34) Jesus says, "In that night there shall be two men in one bed," which is incidental evidence that the "bed" or "beds" of that day were not all "pallets" or "couches" for one only (cf Lk 11:7, "My children are with me in bed"); Cant 1:16; 3:10; Prov 7:16.18).

(4) For fig. use in the prophets (e.g. Ezk 23:17) and in the NT (e.g. "Let the bed be unfeigned," He 13:4), see commentaries in loc. Geo. B. Eager BEDAD, bē'dad (772, brkhah, "alone"): Father of Hadad, king of Edom "before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen 36:35; 1 Ch 1:41).

BEDAN, bē'dan (772, brdham, "son of judgment" [?]): (1) One of the leaders in Israel who with Jerubbaal, Jephthah and Samuel is mentioned as a deliverer of the nation (1 S 12:11). The text is questioned because LXX, Syr and Arabic read Barak instead.

(2) A son of Ulam of the house of Manasseh (1 Ch 7:17).

BEDCHAMBER, bed'cham-bér. See Bed.

BEDEHIAH, bo-de'ya (772, bēdēythāb, "servant of Jehovah"): A son of Beni who had married a "strange wife" (Ex 10:5).

BEDSTEAD, bed'stēd. See Bed.

BEE, bē (772), d'bhārāh; cf Arab. dabr, "a swarm of bees," also Arab. debbr, "a wasp," said to be a corruption of zwnbr, "a wasp"; all are apparently from the Heb dabhar, "to speak," "arrange," "lead," "follow," or from Arab. dbrān, "follow" (cf Arab. dabbar, "arrange"), though the context (in building is not apparent): Honey is mentioned many times in the Bible, esp. in the OT, but the word "bee" occurs only four times, and only one of the four times in connection with honey, in the story of Samson (Jgs 14:12). Both wild and domesticated bees are found today in Pol, but it is not clear that bees were kept in Bible times, although it would seem very probable. The frequently recurring phrase, "a land flowing with milk and honey," certainly suggests that the honey as well as the milk is a domestic product. The hives now in use are very primitive and wasteful as compared with hives that are made in Europe and America. Sometimes a large water jar is used. More frequently a cylinder about 3 or 4 ft. long and 6 in. in diameter, is made of an berry withes piled together and plastered with mud or cow dung. A number of these cylinders are placed horizontally, being piled up together under some rude structure which serves as a protection from the direct rays of the sun. In the passage already cited it is related that Samson found a swarm of bees and honey in the carcase of the lion which he had killed on his previous visit. We are not told how much time had intervened, but it does not take long in the dry climate of Pol for scavenging birds and insects to strip the flesh from the bones and make the skeleton a possible home for a swarm of bees. The other three passages refer to the offensive power of bees. In Dt 1:44, in the speech of Moses he says, "Bees, wasps, scorpions, and vipers, are not found among" (cf Ps 104:18, "bees, wasps, beetles, skorpions, and adders," but in LXX, "bees, wasps, beetles, scorpions, and vipers"); in Ps 118:12, the psalmist says, "They compassed me about like bees"; in Is 7:18, the bee is the type of the chastisement that the Lord will bring from the land of Assyria. BEEL, bēf. See Cattle.

BEELIADA, bē-lē'ē-da (772, bēlēyēda, "the Lord knows"); ELIADA, which see; cf HPN, 144, 192, n. 1:202); A son of David (1 Ch 14:7).

BEELASARUS, bē-lēs'ā-rus, bē-lē-sā'rus (Bel-pz_adsar, Belasdros): One who accompanied Zerubbabel in the return from the captivity (1 Ead 6:8), called Bilshan in Ezr 2:2 and Neh 7:7.

BEELTETHMUS, bē-lē-tēth'mūs (Belētēthmos, Beelitethmos; Balthemus): One of the officers of King Artaxerxes in Pol (1 Ead 2:25). According to Professor Sayce, the name means "lord or official intelligence," or "postmaster." Rendered "chancellor" in 1 Ead 4:8 and "story-writer" in 1 Ead 2:17.

BEELZEBUB, bēl'ēz-būb (in Av and RV is an error [after Vulg] for Beelzebul [RVm], Beelze' boh, Bælezboh, BH, Bælezboh, Beezebub): In the time of Christ this was the current name for the chief or prince of demons, and was identified with Satan (q.v.) and the Devil (q.v.). The Jews committed the unpardonable sin of ascribing Christ's work of casting out demons to Beelzebul, thus ascribing to the worst source the supreme manifestation of goodness (25:15; 15:20; 13:31, 20:19). There can be little doubt that it is the same name as BAALZEBUB (q.v.). It is a well-known phenomenon in the history of religions that the gods of one nation become the devils of its neighbors and enemies. When the Aryans divided into Indians and Iranians, the Devas remained gods for the Indians, but became devils (daevas) for the Iranians, while the Ahuras remained gods for the Iranians and became devils (auras) for the Indians. Why Baalzebul became Beelzebul, why the change in names is a matter of conjecture. It may have been an accident of popular pronunciation, or a conscious perversion (Beelzebul in Syr = "lord of dung"), or OT z'bhāh may have been a perversion, accidental or intentional of z'bhāh BEEROTH, bê'ê-roth, bê'ê-oth (בֵּיתֵר, בֵּיתֶרֹת; Bpâbath, Bêrôth): The place is not identified.

2. (The town to which Jotham fled from his brother Abimelech after declaring his parable from Mt. Gerizim (Jgs 9 21)). This may be identical with Beeroth, which see.

BEEROTH BENE-JAAKAN, benê-bê'ê-jakôn (בֵּיתֵר בֵּנֵי יַעַקָּן; "the wells of the children of Jaakan"): A desert camp of the Israelites mentioned before Moserah (Dt 10 6). In Nu 33 31.32 the name is given simply "Bene-jaakan," and the situation after Moseroth. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

BEEROTHITE, bê'ê-ôth-îth, bê'ê-ôth-it, BEEROTHITE (בֵּיתֵר, בֵּיתֶרֹת; 2 S 4 5.9; 2 S 23 37; shortened form, 1 Ch 11 39). See BEEROTH.

BEERSHEBA, bê'ê-rîsh'bah (בֵּיתֶר-רִשָּׁבָה; Bpâbâsêth, Bersâbêth): Allotted originally to Simeon (Josh 19 2), one of "the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah" (Josh 19 25).

The place is not identified.

1. (The town named in Gen 31 21 Abraham and Abimelech took the name an oath of witness that the former had dug the well and seven ewe lambs were offered in sacrifice, "Wherefore he called that place Beer-sheba; because there two of them. Here the name is ascribed to the Heb root בֵּית רִשָּׁבָה, "to swear," but this same root is connected with the idea of seven, seven victims being offered and to take an oath, meaning "to come under the influence of seven"

Another account is given (Gen 26 23-33), where Isaac takes an oath and just afterward, "the same day Isaac's servants came, and told him concerning the well which they had dug, and said unto him, We have found water. And he called it Shiloh: therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba unto this day." (2) Beer-sheba was a sacred shrine. "Abraham planted a tamarisk tree in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of Jeh, the Ever-lasting God" (Gen 21 33). Theophanies occurred there to Hagar (Gen 21 17), to Isaac (26 24), to Jacob (46 2), and to Elijah (1 K 19 5). By Amos (6 5) it is classed with Bethel and Gilgal as one of the rival shrines of the people of Jeh. In and in another place (8 14) he writes "They shall fall, and never rise up again," who swear, "As the way [i.e. cultus] of Beer-sheba liveth." The two unworthy sons of Samuel were judges in Beer-sheba (2 S 2) and the priest of Kk. Jehoahud, was born there (2 K 12 1; 2 Ch 24 1).

3. Its Shrine. Geographically Beer-sheba marked the southern limit of Judah, though theoretically this extended to the "river of Egypt." (Gen 15 18)—the modern Wady el-Aisah.

Position 60 miles farther south. It was the extreme border of the cultivated land. From Dan to Beer-sheba (2 S 17 11, etc) or from Beer-sheba to Dan (1 Ch 21 2; 2 Ch 30 5) were the proverbial oppressions of the worship of Jeh, and in another place (8 14) he writes "They shall fall, and never rise up again," who swear, "As the way [i.e. cultus] of Beer-sheba liveth." The two unworthy sons of Samuel were judges in Beer-sheba (2 S 2) and the priest of Kk. Jehoahud, was born there (2 K 12 1; 2 Ch 24 1).

4. Modern Beer-sheba is Bt râ-šâbâ' in the Wady es-Sheba, 28 miles S.W. of.Hebron on "the southern border of a vast rolling plain broken by the torrent beds of Wady Khallil Beersheba and Wady Seba" (Robinson). The plain is treeless but is covered by verdure in the extreme spring; it is dry and monotonous most of the year. Within the last few years this long-deserted spot—a wide stretch of shapeless ruins, the haunt of the lawless Bedouin—has been re-occupied; the Turks have stationed there an enlightened Kaimerekhan (subgovernor); government offices and shops have been built; wells have been cleared, and the women of Jericho, with supply pumped even to the separate houses. Robinson (BW, XVII, 247 ff) has described how he found seven ancient wells there—probably still more will yet be found. The whole neighborhood is now a ruin of the Byzantine city which once flourished there; it was an episcopal see. It is probable that the city of OT times stood where Tell es Seba‘ now is, some 2½ miles to the E.; from the summit a commanding view can be obtained (PEF, III, 394, Sheet XXV, 13).

BEESHTERAH, bĕ-esh'ter-rah (Josh 21:27). See ASHTEROTH.

BEETLE, bĕ-tĕl (RV CRICKET; hâ-phô, harpûlı̂'; see LOCUST; this name occurs only in Lev 14:23 as one of four winged jumping insects (sheqec hâ-ôeph) which may be eaten. It certainly is not a beetle and is probably not a cricket. Probably all four are names of locusts, of which more than 30 species have been described from Syria and Pal., and for which there are at least 8 Arab. names in use, though with little distinction of species. Closely allied to harpûlı̂‘ are the Arab. harjâdet, a troop of horses or a flight of locusts, from harjâl, “to gallop,” and harjûn, “a wingless locust.”

BEES, bĕv (Lev 22:21 AV). See CATTLE.

BEFORE, bĕ-fôr: The tr of a great variety of Heb. and Gr. words. “Haran died b. ERY “in the presence of,” lit. “before the face of,”” his father Terah” (Gen 11:28). To be “before” God is to enjoy His favor (Ps 31:22). “The Syrians before” (Isa 9:12 RVm “on the east,” as “behind,” owing to the position of Canaan, relative to Syria, implies the west).

BEG, BEGGAR, BEGGING: It is significant that the Mosaic law contains no enactment concerning beggars, or begging, though it makes ample provision for the relief and care of “the poor in the land.” Bib. Heb seems to have no term for professional begging, the nearest approach to it being the expression “to ask (or seek) bread” and “to wander.” This omission certainly is not accidental; it comports with the very nature of the Mosaic law, the spirit of which is breathed in this, among other kindness provisions, that the poor Hebrew who even sold himself for debt to his wealthy brother was allowed to serve him only until the Jubilee (see JUBILEE), and his master was forbidden to treat him as a slave (Lev 25:39). These laws, as far as actually practised, have always virtually done away with beggars and begging among the Jews.

Begging, however, came to be known to the Jews in the course of time with the development of the larger cities, either as occurring among themselves, or among neighboring or intermingling peoples, as may be inferred from Ps 69:15; cf. the poor Hebrew who even sold himself for debt to his wealthy brother who was allowed to serve him only until the Jubilee (see JUBILEE), and his master was forbidden to treat him as a slave (Lev 25:39). These laws, as far as actually practised, have always virtually done away with beggars and begging among the Jews.

BEGGING, NOT UN-KNOWN TO THE ANCIENT JEWS

1. No Law Concerning Beggars or Begging in Israel

2. Begging Not Unknown to the Ancient Jews

3. Begging and Alms-Taking Denounced in Jewish Literature

The first clear denunciation of beggary and almsgiving in Jewish lit. is found in Eclesius (Sirach) 40:13-30, where the Heb for “begging” is to “wander,” etc, as in Ps

4. Professional Beggars and a Despised Class

5. In the Gospel Age

Beggars was well known and beggars formed a considerable class in the gospel age. Proof of this is found in the references to almsgiving in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7 and parallels), and in the accounts of beggars in connection with public places, e.g., the entrance to Jericho (Mt 20:30 and parallels), which was a gateway to pilgrims going up to Jerusalem to the great festivals and in the neighborhood of rich men’s houses (Lk 16:20), and esp. the gates of the Temple at Jerusalem (Acts 3:2). This prevalence of begging was due largely to the want of any adequate system of ministering relief, to the lack of any true medical science and the resulting ignorance of remedies for common diseases like ophthalmia, for instance, and to the impoverishment of the land under the excessive taxation of the Rom government (Hastrath, Hist of NT Times, I, 188 [Eng. tr Williams and Norgeate], at Ederехim, L and T of Jesus, II, 178). That begging was looked down upon is incidentally evidenced by the remark of the unjust steward, “To beg I am ashamed!” (Lk 16:3); and that, when associated with indolence, it was strongly condemned by public opinion appears from Sir 40:28-30.

The words used for “beg,” “beggar” of EV in the NT differ radically in idea; in these formed from atiās (Mt 10:46; Lk 16:3; 18:35; Jn 9:8 RV) the root idea is Jerusalem Beggars.

As to professional beggars, originally, certainly, and for a long time, they were a despised class among the Hebrews; and the Jewish communities are forbidden to support them from the general charity fund (BB, 9a; Yoreh De’ah, 240, 3). But the spirit of the law is evinced again in that it is likewise forbidden to drive a beggar away without an alms (ha-Yadh ha-Hasa’akah, 1.c. 7:7).

Begging was well known and beggars formed a considerable class in the gospel age. Proof of this is found in the references to almsgiving in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7 and parallels), and in the accounts of beggars in connection with public places, e.g., the entrance to Jericho (Mt 20:30 and parallels), which was a gateway to pilgrims going up to Jerusalem to the great festivals and in the neighborhood of rich men’s houses (Lk 16:20), and esp. the gates of the Temple at Jerusalem (Acts 3:2). This prevalence of begging was due largely to the want of any adequate system of ministering relief, to the lack of any true medical science and the resulting ignorance of remedies for common diseases like ophthalmia, for instance, and to the impoverishment of the land under the excessive taxation of the Rom government (Hastrath, Hist of NT Times, I, 188 [Eng. tr Williams and Norgeate], at Ederехim, L and T of Jesus, II, 178). That begging was looked down upon is incidentally evidenced by the remark of the unjust steward, “To beg I am ashamed!” (Lk 16:3); and that, when associated with indolence, it was strongly condemned by public opinion appears from Sir 40:28-30.

The words used for "beg," "beggar" of EV in the NT differ radically in idea; in these formed from atiās (Mt 10:46; Lk 16:3; 18:35; Jn 9:8 RV) the root idea is Jerusalem Beggars.

As to professional beggars, originally, certainly, and for a long time, they were a despised class among the Hebrews; and the Jewish communities are forbidden to support them from the general charity fund (BB, 9a; Yoreh De’ah, 240, 3). But the spirit of the law is evinced again in that it is likewise forbidden to drive a beggar away without an alms (ha-Yadh ha-Hasa’akah, 1.c. 7:7).

Proof of this is found in the references to almsgiving in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7 and parallels), and in the accounts of beggars in connection with public places, e.g., the entrance to Jericho (Mt 20:30 and parallels), which was a gateway to pilgrims going up to Jerusalem to the great festivals and in the neighborhood of rich men’s houses (Lk 16:20), and esp. the gates of the Temple at Jerusalem (Acts 3:2). that of "asking," while ἴπτοχός (Lk 16 20:22) suggests the character of a beggar. But see Mt 5:3 where the word for "humble" is ἴπτοχος.

A marked change has come over Jewish life in modern times, in this as well as in other respects.

Since the 17th cent., the Jewish poor in many parts of the world have made a practice, esp. on Fridays and on the eves of certain festivals, to go systematically from house to house asking alms. In parts of Europe today it is a full-grown abuse: crowds of Jewish beggars push their way and ply their trade about the synagogue doors (Abrahams, E B, art. "Alms", 310). So the Jewish beggar, in spite of the spirit of the law and ancient Jewish custom, has, under modern conditions too well known to require explanation here, become a troublesome figure and problem in modern Jewish society. For such beggars and begging, see JEW Enc. arts. "Schnorrers," "Alms," etc. and for another kind of begging among modern Jews, and collections for poverty-stricken Jewish settlers in Pal, seearts. "Hanukkah," "Charity," etc.

BEGGARLY, beg'gar-lí (στασιαὶς, ἴπτοχός): The word has the thought of "to crouch" or "cringe," such as is common with professional beggars. It is used in Mt 5:3 and Gal 4:9, and in both cases means complete spiritual destitution. As used in Gal it expresses the contrast between their present condition and the former estate, toward which he says they are again tending. Paul has in mind both the Jewish and heathen systems of religion with all their outward show. He therefore here emphasizes the immeasurable superiority of the riches and liberty in Christ. He further expresses this same thought of the law in Rom 8:3 and He 7:18. In view of the wretchedness of the condition indicated by the word "beggarly," he states his astonishment that they should so little appreciate the liberty and riches which they now enjoy as even to think of going back to the former condition.

BEGIN, bé-gín': To make the first movement toward a given end (πρόκειται, ἑλᾶτω; ἀρχώμενος, ἀρχομαι). Those who interpret it in many passages platonically mean by this, that in such passages as "began to teach" or "began to speak" nothing more is intended than to express vividly and graphically the thought of the dependent infinitive. Mt 4:17; Lk 3:23; Acts 1:1 are so understood. For contrary opinion, see Thayer's Lexicon and Winer's Grammar of NT Greek. The noun, ἀρχή, archē, "beginning," in the writings of John, is used sometimes in an abstract sense, to designate a previous stage (Jn 1:1:2; 8:25; 1 Jn 1:1; 3:8) and, sometimes, the Source or First Cause (Rev 3:14; 21:6; 22:13). Often used also, not for the absolute beginning, but, relatively, for the starting-point of some important movement (1 Jn 2:7; 2:24; Acts 11:15; Phil 4:15).

BEGINNING, bé-gín'ing (πρόκειται), ἑλᾶςθησθ; ἀρχῆς; archē): The natural meaning of the word is with reference to time. The primitive Gr root means "to be long," "to draw out." Thus it is used to refer to a point of time drawn out, or long past (Gen 1:1). It is used also to express the inauguration of a particular event (Ex 12:2). The principal interest in the word centers in the use of it in Jn 1:1. It must be interpreted here by that which follows in the statement as to the relation of the Logos to the Eternal God and the use of the word "wast," is true that the Logos cannot be separated from the idea of time, but when time began He already was, and therefore He was from eternity. See TIME; ETERNITY.

Figureative: In a fig. sense it is used of that which is most excellent, the chief part (Prov 1:7); of the most eminent person (Col 1:18); the author (Rev 3:14).

JACOB W. KAPP

BEGOTTEN, bég-ot'tēn ("?, γαλαθή; "to bear," "bring forth," "beget"); denotes the physical relation of either parent to child, Gen 3:16; 4:18.

Used metaphorically of God's relation to Israel (Dt 32:18) and to the Messianic king (Ps 2:7); (σκανδάλος, γεννᾶθ); "to beget," or "bear"); generally used of a father (Mt 1:16); more rarely of a mother (Lk 1:15). Used metaphorically of causing or engendering moral and spiritual relations and states (1 Cor 4:15; Phil 1:10) of the new birth of the Holy Spirit (Jn 3:8). Men who were begotten by and love God as sons are begotten of Him (Jn 1:13; 1 Jn 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:14:18; cf 1 Pet 1:23).

Used esp. of God's act in making Christ His Son: "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee" (Ps 2:7) quoted in Acts 13:33 in reference to His resurrection (cf 1 Cor 15:20, 23). The passage is cited (He 1:5) as proving Christ's filial dignity, transcending the angels in that "he hath inherited a more excellent name than they," i.e. the name of son; and again (He 5:5) of God conferring upon Christ the glory of the special office of sonship.

Commentators differ as to whether the act of begetting the Son in these two passages is (a) the eternal generation, or (b) the incarnation in time, or (c) the resurrection and ascension. The immediate context of 1:5 (see 1:3) seems to favor the last view (Westcott). The first view would not be foreign to the author's thought: with 5:5 of ch 20, "a high priest forever" (Alford). The author of Hebrews thinks of the eternal and essential sonship of Christ as realized in history in His ascension to the "right hand of the Majesty" (1:3). What is emphatic is the fact and status of sonship, rather than the time of begetting.

T. RESEX

BEQUEILE, bég'-il': In 2 Pet 2:14 AV (of Jas 1:14) the word ὑποτείνω, delesko, is tr. "beguile," and means particularly to "entice," "catch by bait.

Doubtless Peter got this idea from his old business of fishing, baiting the hook to beguile the fish. In Rom 7:11; 13:18; 1 Cor 3:18. the word ἐξαιρεῖν, ἐξαπαιτάω, and means "to cheat," or "to thoroughly deceive." The thought is to be so completely deceived as to accept falsehood for the truth, believing it to be the truth. In Col 2:14 AV; Jas 1:22 the word is ἀπεφωνίασαν, paraighetmmai, and means "to miscalculate," "to be imposed upon." It refers particularly to being beguiled by mere probability. See DECEIT; DELUSION.

JACOB W. KAPP

BEHALF, bé-hálf: "On the part of" (Ex 27:21, i.e. so far as it affects them); "on the side of" (Job 36:2). For ἐπιπέδω, "over," in the sense of furnishing assistance, as in 2 Cor 5:20, "in the interest of Christ" (ver 21); "for our good," "in his cause" (Phil 1:29); also, often in 2 Cor, in general sense of "engaging" (6:12; 6:20; 8:20; 9:2; 12:5). ἐπιπέδω does not of itself indicate substitution, although one who shelters ("is over") another, suffers "in his stead" (AV 2 Cor 5:20), as well as "in his behalf.

BEHAVIOR, bê-hāv'yér (ποιμέν, τα' αμν, "taste," "flavor," hence "intellectual taste," i.e. judgment, reason, understanding): Of significance as referring to David's feigning madness before Achish, king of Gath, being "sore afraid." Gesenius renders it "changed his understanding," i.e. his mental behavior and outward manner (1 S 21 13, and title to Ps 34).

Twice used in the NT (AV) of the well-ordered life of the Christian (καταργοῖος, κόσμοιος, "well-arranged," "modest," i.e. living with decorum: 1 Tim 3 2), defining the blameless life expected of a minister (overseer). "A bishop must be . . . . of good behavior," RV "orderly" (εὐπνοοῦς, κατάσταμα, "deacon," "deportment"), including, according to Dean Alfred, "gesture and habit," as the outward expression of a reverent spirit (1 Pet 5 1 3). "Aged women . . . . in behavior as becometh holiness" (Tit 3 8; RV "reverent in deportment").

Dwight M. Pratt

BEHEADING, bê-hed'ing. See PUNISHMENTS.

BEHEMOTH, bê-hê-moth, bê-hê-moth (תֶּהוֹמֶת, bêhômoth; Job 40:15): Apparently the pl. of bêhômah, "a beast," used of domestic or wild animals. The same form, bêhômat, occurs in other passages, e.g. Dt 28 26; 32 24; Isa 18 8; Hab 2 17, where it is rendered "beast" but "beasts." According to some, the word bêhémoth, occurring in Job 40 15, is not a Heb word, the pl. of bêhémah, but a word of Egypt origin signifying "water ox." This etymology is denied by Cheyne and others. The word has by various writers been understood to mean rhinoceros and elephant, but the description (Job 40 15-24) applies on the whole very well to the hippopotamus (Hippopotamus amphibius) which inhabits the Nile and other rivers of Africa, and on account of the weapons it bears is an enormous quantity in caves in Malta and Sicily.

For an elaborate explanation of behemoth and leviathan (q.v.) as mythical creatures, see Cheyne, EB, s.v.

Alfred Ely Day

BEHELDING, bê-hôld'ing: Many Hebrew and Gr words are so rendered in EV, but ἐποταισιαντας, ἐποταισιαντας, "your good works, which they beheld" (1 Pet 2 12), "beholding your chaste behavior" (Tit 2 4) and ῥηγας, ῥηγας, "We were eyewitnesses of his majesty" (2 Pet 1 16) are peculiar to Peter. The fact that this word is used only by Peter and is used in both epistles is an argument for identity of authorship. The term ἐποται σιατα denotes one who had been initiated into the innermost secrets of his faith and who enjoyed the highest religious privileges; but now in contradiction to the secrecy of all pagan "mysteries" (Eleusinian, etc) the apostles would share with all the faithful every spiritual vision which they enjoyed ("we are made known to you").

In 2 Cor 3 18, for καταρτίζομενα, καταρτίζομενοι, the ERV gives "reflecting (as a mirror) the glory of the Lord," ARV "behaving (as in a mirror), etc." Kátoptrion was a mirror of polished metal. We cannot clearly and fully behold the outshining of spiritual grandeur in Christ Jesus, but in the gospel God accommodates and adjusts the vision as we are able to bear it, and the glory beheld becomes glory imparted to (and reflected by) the beholder.

John's Gospel gives us ἰδεῖσαν, ἰδεῖσαν ("to look closely at"), and θεαθεῖται, ἰδεῖσαν ("to discern"). "We beheld [i.e., saw] his glory." (Jn 1 14), "that they may behold [theodotein] thy glory." (17 24). In classic lit., the former word is closely associated with theatrical scenes and the latter with athletic games, and they both convey the idea of unceasing interest, deepening in this connection into love and joy.

M. O. Evans

BEHOOKE, bê-hô-kô: Used in the NT for two Gr words διώκει (Lk 24 26; Acts 17 3) and ὀπέθελο (He 2 17); the former referring to a physical, and the latter to a moral, necessity (Bengel, 1 Cor 11 10). The former means "must," that is, it is required by the order which God has ordained; the latter, "ought," that is, it is required as a debt.

BEIRUT, bê-root'. See BEYTUS.

BEKA, bê'kah (בַּקָּה, beka'ı̂): Half a shekel, the amount contributed by each male of the Israelites for the use of the Sanctuary (Ex 35 26). Its value varied according to the standard used, but on the ordinary, or Phoen, standard it would represent about 122 grains. See WEIGHTS and MEASURES.

BEL, bel, bêl (בֵּל, bêl): Appellative name of a Bab god (of BAAL), in the OT and Apos identified with Marduk or Merodach, the tutelary deity of Babylon (cf Isa 46 1; Jer 51 44; Bar 6 41). See BABYLONIA and ASYRIA, THE RELIGION OF.

Heb or Aram. words: בֶּל, בֵּל, "to seal"; נֶפֶל, נֶפֶל, "pitch"; נֶפֶל, נֶפֶל, "storm"; נֶפֶל, נֶפֶל, "wind"; נֶפֶל, נֶפֶל, "snake"; נֶפֶל, נֶפֶל, "sea monster"): I. INTRODUCTION

VI. TEACHING

Little is known in this work that is distinctly Jewish. God is great, absolute and ever-living; angels intervene for special ends; the absurdity of idolworship.

VII. AUTHOR, PLACE AND DATE OF COMPOSITION

Probably not in Babylon; perhaps the Heb text originated in Pal about 146 BC or later. The first complete version produced in Egypt about 106 BC, which may be the date and language of the Book of Daniel. The Septuagint version, was produced probably at Ephesus about 180 AD.
Bel and Dragon THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

VIII. Canonity and Authenticity

Accepted as canonical by the Jews of Egypt but rejected by the Jews of Pal. Accepted as part of the Bible by Or and Lat church fathers, by the Council of Trent and therefore by the Rom church; denied by Protestants to be canonical.

Literature

I. Introductory.—Bel and the Dragon is the third of the three Apocryphal additions to Daniel, The Song of the Three Children and Susanna (q.v.) being the other two. In the Gr and Lat VSS (see below, "IV. Textual Authorities") these “additions” form an integral part of the canonical Book of Dnl, and they are recognized as such and therefore as themselves canonical by the Council of Trent. But the Song of the Three Children is the only piece having a necessary connection with the Heb canonical Book of Dnl; in the Gr and Lat texts it follows Dnl 3 24. The other two are appended and appear to have an origin independent of the book to which they are appended and also of each other, though in all three as also in the Heb Book of Dnl the name and fame of Daniel stand out prominently.

II. Name.—Since in the Gr and Lat recensions or VSS Bel forms a portion of the Book of Dnl it does not bear a special name. But in the only two known Syr VSS (see below, "IV. Textual Authorities") these "additions" stand at the head of the "addition" now under consideration: "From [or "a part of"] the prophecy of Habakkuk son of Josua of the tribe of Levi. That the Bel, writing prophet of that name is meant is beyond question. In θ this fact is distinctly stated (see ver 33); and it is equally beyond question that these tales could never have come from the prophet so called (see below "VIII. Canonity and Authenticity").

In cod. A and B of the title is: Horasis 12, i.e. ch 12 of Dnl, canonical Dnl being comprised in 11 chs. In the Vulg, Bel forms ch 14, but, as in the case of the earlier chs, it has no heading.

In the Syr Pesh (W) the story of Bel is preceded by "Bel the idol," and that of the Dragon by "Then follows the Dragon." Bel and the Dragon is the title in all Protestant VSS of the Apocrypha, which rigidly keep the latter separate from the books of the Heb canon.

III. Contents.—The stories of Bel and of the Dragon have a separate origin and existed apart: they are brought together because they both agree in holding up idolatry to ridicule and in encouraging Jews to believe in their religion. The glorification of Daniel is also another point in which both agree, though while the Daniel of the Bel story appears as a shrewd judge corresponding to the etymology of that name, he of the Dragon story is but a fearless puritan who will die rather than be faithless to his religion.

It is evident however that the editor of the "additions" has fused both stories into one, making the Dragon story depend on that which precedes (see vs 7 11) and probably rather likely that, in a Nestorian list mentioned by Churton (Uncanonical and Apocryphal Scriptures, 391), Bel and the Dragon is comprised under the title, The Little Daniel.

The two stories as told in common by LXX and θ may be thus summarized:

1. The Story of Bel

Bel requests being granted, he is shown by desired expression the lectisternon, the sacred tables being covered by food which the god is to consume during the night. The doors are all sealed by arrangement, and after the priests have departed Daniel has the temple floor strewed, with lighted torches. When the morning breaks it is found that the doors are still sealed, but the food has disappeared. Upon examination the tracks of bare feet are found on the ash-strewn floor, showing that the priests have entered the temple by a secret way and removed the food. Anarched by the trick played on him the king has the priests put to death and the image destroyed.

The word Bel, a short form of Baal, occurs in the OT in Isa 46 1; Jer 50 2; 51 44, where it stands for Morochar or Marduk, chief of the Bab deities. Originally however it denotes any one of the Bab local deities, and esp. the principal deity worshipped at Nippur (for similar use of the Heb "Baal" see art. on this word). In θ Cyrus appears as an abettor of Bel-worship, which is quite in accordance with the practice of the early Pers kings to show favor to the worship of the countries they conquered. See Century Bible, "Ezr, Neh and Est," 40.

There is in Babylon a great live dragon worshiped by a large number of the inhabitants, who lavishly feed it. In the present case the god is or is represented by the Dragon a living creature which can be fed.

2. The Story of Dragon

A dragon, a living creature which can be fed, and in the present needs feeding. Daniel refuses to bow down before the dragon and makes an offer to the king to kill it. Believing the god well able to care for himself, the king accepts Daniel’s challenge. Daniel makes a mixture of which pitch forms the principal ingredient and thrusts it down the dragon’s throat, so that “it bursts asunder and dies.” The people are infuriated at the death of their god and demand that the king shall have the god-murderer put to death, a demand to which the royal master yields by having Daniel cast into a den of lions, as was done to other culprits found guilty of capital charges. But though the prophet remained in the company of 7 lions for 6 days he suffered no injury. On the last day when Daniel was naturally hungry, a miracle was performed by way of supplying him with food. Habakkuk (see above, "II. Name"), when cooking food for his reapers, heard the angel’s voice inviting him to carry the food he had prepared to Daniel in the lions’ den in Babylon. Upon his replying that he did not know where the den, or even Babylon, was, the angel laid hold of his hair and by it carried the prophet to the very part of the den where Daniel was. Having handed the latter the meat intended for the reapers, he was safely brought back by the angel to his own home. It would seem that Habakkuk was protected from the lions as well as Daniel. Seeing all this the king worshipped God, set Daniel free, and in his stead cast the lions into the lions’ den, where they were instantly devoured.

Zöckler in his commentary (p. 215) speaks of the “fluidity” of the Dragon myth, and he has been followed by Marshall and Daubney. But what in reality does the Gr word drakón, rendered “dragon,” mean? In the LXX the word is used generally (15 times) to translate the Heb tannin which denotes a serpent or sea monster. It is this word (tannin) which in the Aram, version of the Dragon the story translates with the delinquent Hebrew, pointing out to him the immense amount of food consumed daily by Bel, who thus proves himself to be a living god. Daniel, doubting the king’s statement, as to the food, asks to be allowed to test the alleged fact.
form of a serpent (see Sayce, Hibbert Lectures, 281 f.), and it is more probable that it is the worship of this god or of some other serpent deity that is here meant, than that there is any allusion to the Bab story according to which Marduk the supreme deity of Babylon engaged in a conflict with Tiamat the mother goddess of the sea, and then with her gave birth to the gods of heaven; these gods subsequently led by their mother Tiamat engaged in a fierce contest with Marduk.

Since Gunkel published his book, Schöpfung und Chaos (1895), it has been the fashion to see reflections of the Marduk-Tiamat conflict throughout the OT. But recent investigations tend to show that Bab mythology has not dominated Hebrew thought to the extent that was formerly thought, and with this statement Gunkel himself now agrees, as the last ed. of his commentary on Genesis proves.

IV. Textual Authorities.

(1) Greek.—There exist in Gr two forms of the text (see below). (a) The LXX text has been preserved in but one MS, the codex Christianus (from the Chigi family who owned it, published in Rome in 1772). This belongs to the 9th cent. This text has been printed also in Cozza’s Sacrorum Biblicorum vestigia (fragments Graeco et Latina, part iii, Rome, 1887, and in Swete’s ed. of the LXX side by side with Θ. In Tischendorf’s LXX it occurs at the close of the ordinary text of the LXX. (b) Of Θ (the text of Theodotion) we have the following important MSS: B, A, Q (cod Marcellianus), P (vers 1-2.4 only) and Δ (from ver 21 to ver 41).

(2) Syriac.—There exists in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, a MS of the 8th cent. of the Syro-Hexaplar version made by Paul of Tella in 617 AD at Alexandria from col vi (LXX) of Origen’s Hexapla. This most valuable MS has been edited and published by Ceriani.

(1) Greek.—(a) The LXX: Of this we have but one MS (see above under “Manuscripts”) and until its publication in Rome in 1772 what is now known is derived from Θ, who was believed to be the real LXX version, notwithstanding the fact that the name of the canonical Daniel, of a Heb (or Aram.) original, now lost. It is much less pedantic than Aquila’s Gr tr which preceded it, and its Gr is better. It is also a better tr than the LXX; yet it has many translatiorial Heb words instead of tr.

This version of Daniel displaced that of the LXX at a very early time, for though Origen gave place to the LXX in his Hexapla, in his writings he almost always cites from Θ. In his preface to Daniel Jerome points to the fact that in his own time the church had rejected the LXX in favor of Θ, mentioning the defectiveness of the former as the ground. Even Irenaeus (d. 202) and Origen (d. 203) preferred Θ to the LXX. Field was the first to point out that it is the work of Theodotion (not the LXX) that we have in 1 Esd, etc.

(2) Syriac.—In addition to the Syro-Hexaplar version (see above, under “Manuscripts”) the Peshi must be noted. It follows Θ closely, and is printed in Water’s Polyglotte (parts of the Diligoro) and in a revised text edited by Lagarde in 1881; not as R. H. Charles (Enc Brit, VII, 807) erroneously says in The Book of Tobit by Neubauer.

(3) Latin.—(a) The old Lat version, which rests on Θ, fragments of which occur in Sabatier’s work, Biblitorum sacrament Latiniae versiones antiquae (1743, etc., II). (b) The Vulg, which follows Jerome’s tr, is also based on Θ, and follows it closely.

(4) Aramaic.—For the Aram. version published by M. Gaster (see above) in Bahr’s edition of the book as first written, see below, “V. Original Language.”

V. Original Language.—It has been until recent years most generally maintained that Bel and the Dragon was composed and first edited in the Gr language. So Eichhorn, de Wette, Schrader, Fritzsch, Schürer and König. In favor of this the following reasons have been given: (1) No Sem original with reasonable claims has been discovered. Origen, Eusebius and Jerome distinctly say that no Heb (or Aram.) form of this tract existed or was known in their time. (2) The Hebraisms in which this work undoubtedly abounds are no more numerous or more crucial than can be found in works by Jewish authors which are known to have been composed in the Gr language, such as the continuai recurrence of kai (="and"), kai eite ("and he said"), etc.

On the other hand, the opinion has been growing among recent critics that there is no doubt that the story was first of all either in Heb or Aram. Some of the grounds are the following: (1) It is known that Theodotion in making his tr of other parts of the OT (Dn) endeavored to correct the LXX with the aid of the Gr. A comparison of the LXX and of Θ of Bel and the Dragon reveal differences of a similar character. How can we account for them unless we assume that Theodotion had before him a Sem original? A very weak argument, however, for the translator might have corrected on a priori principles, using his own judgment; or there might well have been in his time different recensions of the LXX. Westcott (DB, 1, 397a; 2d ed, 714a) holds that some of Θ’s changes are due to a desire to give consistency to the facts. (2) Much has been made of the Semitisms in the work, and it must be admitted that they are numerous and striking. But are these Hebraisms or Aramaisms? The commonest and most undoubted Semitism is the repetition of the word in the same sense, with the force of the waw-consecutive and only to be explained and understood in the light of that construction. But the waw-consecutive exists only in classical Heb; Aram. and post-Bib. Heb, including late parts of the Gr must be a repetition of nothing of it. It must be assumed then that if the Semitisms of this work imply a Sem original, that original was Heb, not Aram.

The following Hebraisms found in the LXX and in Θ may briefly be noted: (1) The use of the Gr kai with all the varied meanings of the waw-consecutive (see below, under "VI. Teaching"). The beginning of a sentence with kai etn ("and there was") (vs 1.3 in LXX; 2 f, etc, in Θ) agrees with the Heb waw-consecutive construction but makes poor Gr. In ver 15 kai egeneto can be understood only in the light of the Heb for which it stands. (2) The syntactical feature called parataxy (coordination) presents itself throughout the Gr of this piece, and it has been reproduced in the Eng. tr (AV, RV) as any Eng. reader can see. In the classical languages it is hypotaxy that prevails. If, as seems likely, those responsible for LXX and Θ followed a Heb original, they failed to make sufficient allowance for the peculiar force of the waw-consecutive idiom, for this does not presuppose hypotaxy to any considerable extent. (3) The constant occurrence of kaios ("Lord") without the art. implies the Heb Yahwe; and the phrase the "Lord God" is also Heb. (4) There are difficulties and differences best explained by assuming a Heb origin. The Gr word sprogasmonos has no sense in ver 14 (LXX) for, retaining it, we should read of a sealing of the temple (of Bel) and also of a sealing with signet rings of the doors. The Heb word "shut" (בָּשַּׁם) is written much like that for "seal" (כָּבָּד). The rabbis probably suggested this mistake for the latter. The temple was "shut" and the doors "sealed." In ver 10 the LXX (chóris) and Θ (ἐκθόσ) have 2 words of similar sense, which are best explained as independent renderings of one Heb word.

Marshall identifying this dragon story with the Bab creation-myth of Marduk and Tiamat, thinks instead of "pitch" used in making the obolus with which Daniel destroyed the dragon, the original Aram. document has "storm wind," the two words being in Aram. written much alike (אזדפק = "storm wind," and אצפק = "pitch"). But the fact is quite overlooked that the obolus contained not only pitch, but also "fat" and "hair" (see ver 27). Besides, in the Aram. version, published by Gaster, to which Marshall attaches great importance as at least a real source, we have four ingredients, viz. pitch (אצפק), fat, flax (בּיתָן) and hair. Dr. Marshall's suggestion involves therefore not only the omission of the word "pitch" in Aram., but the substitution of 3 or 4 terms for one in the original draft. Moreover in Bel and the Dragon the several ingredients are made up into a cake with which the dragon was gorged. Dr. Marshall's view assumes also an Aram. original which is against the evidence. But the suggestion would not have been made but for a desire to assimilate the dragon story to the Bab creation-myth, though in motive and details both differ so essentially.

Apart from Marshall many writers have cited the fact that forms of the story have been found in Heb and Aram. In the 13th cent. Raymond Martini in his Pugio Fides (written against the Jews) quotes Bel and the Dragon from a Heb Midr on Gen which Neubauer discovered and which is almost verbatim identical with the unique MS containing Midr Rabba de Rabba (see Neubauer, Tobit, vii, and Franz Delitzsch, de Habacucii, 82). Still other Heb forms of these stories have been found even in that country, like that in the remains of Yosippon," the "Heb Josephus" as he has been called. He wrote in the 10th cent.

But most important of all is the discovery by Dr. M. Gaster of the dragon story in Aram., in the "Addenda" of a Sem original. Several modern writers have cited the fact that forms of the story have been found in Heb and Aram. In the 10th cent. Dr. Gaster maintains that in this Aram. fragment we have a portion of the original Bel and the Dragon (see PSBA, 1894, 250 ff [Introd.], 312 [Text] and 1895 [for notes and tr]). The present writer does not think Dr. Gaster has made out his case. (1) If such an Aram. original did really exist at any time we should have learned something definite about it from early writers, Jewish and Christian. (2) Dr. Gaster has discovered an Aram. form of the three "additions," those of the Song of the Three Children and of the dragon story. What of the rest of the Aram. document? (3) It has already been pointed out that the waw-consecutive constructions implied in the Gr text go back to a Heb, not an Aram. original. (4) The Aram. text of the Dragon story not seldom differs both from the LXX and Θ as in the following and many other cases: The two Gr VSS have in ver 24 "The king [said]," which the Aram. has in the 35 the Heb phraseology. "And Habakkuk said" adds "to the angel," which the LXX and Θ are without. (5) The compiler of the Yerahmed Chronicle says distinctly that he had taken the Song of the Three Children and the dragon story from the writings of Theodotion (see PSBA, 1895, 283), he having, it is quite evident, himself put them into Aram. Dr. Gaster lays stress on the words of the compiler, that what he gives in Aram. is that which "Theodotion found" (loc. cit.). But the reference can be only to the LXX which this translator made the basis of his own version; it is far too much to say, that the Chronicler means an Aram. form of the stories.

VI. Teaching.—The two stories teach the doctrine of the oneness and absoluteness of Yahwe, called throughout καθαρός ("Lord"), a lit. rendering of the Heb word קסדתא ("Lord") which the Jews substituted for Yahwe in reading the Heb as do now-a-day Jews. In the Gr and Lat VSS it is the word read (the κρυπτή perpetuum), not that written (Κήρθ), which is τρε. It would have been more consonant with universal practice if the proper name Yahwe had been transliterated as proper names usually are.

But very little is said of the character of Yahwe. He is great and the only (true) God (ver 41), the living God in contrast with Bel (ver 57). Of the nature of His demands on His worshippers, ritualistic and ethical, nothing is said. There is no reference to any distinctly Jewish beliefs or practices; nothing about the tóth or about any Divine revelation to the Jews. But the idea of Yahwe as a god of the people, except that in the LXX (not in Θ) Daniel the prophet is spoken of as a priest—strong evidence of the low place assigned by the writer to the external side of the religion he professed. We do however find mention of an angel, a sort of deus ex machina in the Dragon story (vs 34 ff); cf Dn 6 22.

The incident of the transportation of Habakkuk to Babylon shows that the writer had strong faith in supernatural intervention on behalf of the pious. Apart from this incident the two stories steer fairly clearly of anything that is supernatural. But vs 33-39 are a late interpolation.

VII. Author, Place and Date of Composition.—Nothing whatever is known of the author of the book and nothing definite or certain of the place or date of composition. It has been commonly felt, as by Bissell, etc., that it reflects a Bab origin. Clay (see ver 7) abounded in Babylon (but surely not only in Babylon); bronze (ver 7) was often used in that country; the phrase in Heb 139-128 (and the lion, it is known, was native to the country (but that was the case also in Pal in Bib. and even post-Bib. times). None of the arguments for a Bab origin have much weight, and there are contrary arguments, a work of the 1st half of the 1st cent. BC. The anachronisms and inconsistencies are more easily explained on the assumption of a non-Bab origin. Besides, the Judaism of Babylon was of a very strict and regulation kind, great attention being given to the law and to matters of ritual. There is nothing in Bel and the Dragon regarding these points (see above under "Teaching").

If we assume a Heb original, as there are good grounds for doing, it is quite possible that these legends were written in Pal at a time when the Jewish religion was severely persecuted: perhaps when Antiochus VII (Sidetes, 130-128 BC) re-conquered Judah for Syria and sorely oppressed the subject people. Yet nothing very dogmatic can be said as to this. We cannot infer much from the style of the Heb (or Aram.?), since no Sem original has come down to us. It is quite clear that these "additions" imply the existence of the canonical Book of Dn1 and belong to a subsequent date, for they contain later developments of traditions respecting the Daniel. The Dn1 is dated by modern scholars about 160 BC, so that a date about 136 BC (see above) could not be far amiss.

If, on the other hand, we take for granted that the LXX is the original text of the book, the date of that recension is the date of the work itself. It seems probable that this recension of Dnl was made in Egypt about 150 BC (see 1 Mac 1:54; 2:30), and there have evidently been three additions, of which the "three additions" formed no part of the book, though they exist in all Gr and Syr MSS of Dnl, which have come down to us. Probably the "additions" existed as separate compositions for some time before they were joined to Dnl proper, but it is hardly too much to assume that they were united no later than 100 BC. Yet the data for reaching a conclusion are very slight. It may be added that the Gr of the LXX is distinctly Alex in its character, as well as Bessell and others have pointed out. Theodotion's version is supposed to have been made at Ephesus toward the end of the 2d cent. AD.

VIII. Canonicity and Authenticity. The Alex Jews, recognizing the LXX as their Bible, accepted the whole of the Apoc as canonical. The Pal Jews, on the other hand, limited their canonical Scriptures to the Heb OT. There is, of course, some uncertainty (largely no doubt because it was originally a tr from the Heb) as to whether the LXX added the Apoc in its whole extent or not, but all the evidence points to the fact that it did, though individual books like Dnl existed apart before they formed a portion of the Gr or Egyp canon.

In the early Christian church all the three "additions" were quoted as integral parts of Dnl by Gr and by Lat Fathers, as e.g. by Irenaeus (IV, 5, 2; 3); Tertullian (De idololatria, c.18); Cyprian (Ad fortunatum, c.11). By a decree of the Council of Trent these "additions" were for the Rom church made as much a part of the Bible canon as the Heb Book of Dnl. Protestant churches have as a rule excluded the whole of the Apoc from their Bibles, regarding its books as either "Deutero-canonical" or "non-canonical." In consequence of this attitude among Protestants the Apoc has until lately been greatly neglected by Protestant writers. But a great change is setting in, and some of the best commentators by Protestant scholars produced in recent years deal with the Apoc and its teaching.

Julius Africanus (fl. first half of 3d cent. AD) was the first to impugn the truth of the stories embodied in the "additions" to Daniel. In the letter to Origen to which the recipient vigorously replied. The improbabilities and contradictions of these three pieces have often been pointed out from the time of Julius Africanus down to the present day. The following points may be set down as specimens: (1) Daniel is called a priest in the LXX (ver 1), and yet he is identified with the prophet of that name. (2) Habakkuk the prophet (he is so called in 9 [see ver 33], and no other commentators by Protes- tant scholars produce a commentary of Daniel and also of the Pers king Cyrus (see vs 1 and 33 in the Eng. Bible). Now Cyrus conquered Babylon in 538 BC, the principal Jews in Babylon returning to Pal the following year. The events narrated in Bel and the Dragon could not have occurred during the time Cyrus was king of Babylon, but the LXX speaks of "the king" without naming him. (3) It was not Cyrus but Xerxes who destroyed the image of Bel, this being in 475 BC (see H. 1:158; Strabo, 16:14; Herod. Hist. 3:31, 2). (4) It is further objected that dragon-worship in Babylon, such as is implied in the dragon story, is contrary to fact. Star-worship, it has been said, did exist, but not animal-worship. So Eichhorn and Fritsche. But there are every reason to believe that the worship of living animals, representing deity, and esp. of the living serpent, existed in Babylon as among other nations of antiquity, including the Greeks and Romans (see Herzog, 1st ed. art. "Drachе zu Baby- lon," by J. G. Müller). It has already been pointed out (see list of meanings) that the word "dragon" denotes a serpent.

BEILA, bê'la. See ZORAH.

BELA, BELAH, bê'la (בָּלָה), "destruction"; AV Belah, Gen 46 21): (1) B, the son of Beor, was the first king of Edom previous to the kingdom of Israel and reigned in the city of Dinhabah (Gen 36 32 f.; 1 Chr 1 43 f). LXX, Belai, Belak.

(2) B, the firstborn son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21; 1 Chr 7 6 f; 1 Chr 8 1). He was the head of the family of the Belaites (Nu 26 38), the father of Adin (called Ar, Nu 26 40), Gera, Abhidab, Abishua, Naaman, Ahohah, Gera, Shephupham (of Shephupham, Nu 26 39), Huram (1 Chr 8 3 5; Nu 26 40).

(3) B, a son of Azaz, of the tribe of Reuben, was a man of great power and wealth. His possessions reached from Nebo to the Euphrates (1 Chr 5 9 f). A. L. BREBACH BELAITES, bê'la-te (בָּלָה), "belonging to Bela"); The descendants of Bela (Nu 26 38). Cf Bela (2).

BELCH, belah: The primary idea of this word is "to gush forth" as a fountain. As used in Ps 59 7 the thought is that these enemies had so cherished these evil thoughts and bitter wrath that now the heart is very fountain of waters, as the tongue to how to give utterance thereto. But the previous verse shows that the Priest also had in mind the holding and barking of the dogs about the city. The imprecations of his enemies are like the snarling, howling, barking of dogs who in an eastern city makes the night hideous with the noise, and is continued until the daybreak. JACOB W. KAPP

BELEMSUS, bel'e-mus (בֶּלֶם, בֵּיתָם; Balsamus): An officer of King Artaxerxes in Pal associated with Beseuthes in hindering the rebuilding of the temple (1 Esd 2 16): called Bishlam in Ezra 4 7.

BEILAH, bê'ilah, bê'yal (בֵּיתָל, בֵּיתָל): This name, occurring very frequently in the OT, has the sense of "worthlessness" (cf 2 S 23 6m); accordingly in such phrases as "sons of Belial" (Jgs 20 13; 1 S 10 27, etc), "men of Belial" (1 S 30 22; 1 K 21 13, etc), which the AV usually retains, though the ARV more correctly renders, "base fellows" (so "daughter of Belial") 1 S 1 16, "wicked woman"). There is here no suggestion of a proper name. Afterward, however, "Belial" became a proper name for Satan, or the Antichrist (very frequently in the Jewish Apocalyptic writings, e.g. in XII P, Bk Jub, Asc Isa, Sib Or). In this sense Paul used the Belie, bē-lē'. See Faith.

Believers, bē-lē'vĕrs (in AV and RV of Acts 5 14, for πιστεων, pistéontes, RV 'believing'; in AV of 1 Tim 4 12 for ὁ πιστός, hoi pistōs, RV 'the believers')—These persons (they, he, she) that believe (for πιστεων, hoi pepisteu-kōteis; ὁ πιστεων, hoi pistéontes; στάσις [adj.], pistōs, etc) occur frequently as a regular description of those who professed their faith in Christ, and attached themselves to the Christian church. Then as the one essential condition of admission into the Christian community was, that men should believe in Jesus Christ (Acts 16 31). The actual experience of the men thus denoted varied with all the possible degrees and modifications of faith (q.v.). Believers are nowhere in the NT distinguished as a subordinate class from the "Christians who know" as in the gnostic antithesis of pistis Kai gnōstikos, "believers" and "knowers." T. Rees

Bell (בֵּל, mešišhāth, נֵב, pa'ānôn): The former of these terms occurs only once (Zec 14 20) where it is thus tr.' It is derived from a verb meaning "to tingle" or "ditzl" (I S 3 11), and there is, therefore, no objection etymologically to rendering the noun by "bells." But the little bell attached to the harness of horses would hardly be a suitable place for a fairly long inscription, and as buckles shaped cymbals (see below) were used as ornaments for horses, "cymbals" is probably a better rendering.

The other Heb word for bell is found only in Ex 28 33 f.; 39 25 26, where "bells of gold" are directed to be attached to the hem of Aaron's robe, that the people may hear when he enters and quits the sanctuary. Bells were not employed by the Hebrews to summon the congregation to worship, nor do Mohammedans so use them at the present day. The church bell is a peculiarly Christian institution, said to have been introduced by Bishop Paulinus of Nola in Campania, who lived about the end of the 4th cent. Little bells, however, like those attached to the hem of Aaron's robe, frequently form part of the harness of horses, or are fastened to the necks of the he-goats or wethers that lead the flock in eastern lands. James Millar

Belbows, bel'ōs, bel'ōs: The word occurs once only in EV, in Jer 6 29, where the prophet is predicting the coming of the destroyer (ver 26), "a great nation" from "the north country" (ver 22), destined "to devour all the land corruptly" (ver 28). "The bel lows blow fiercely; the lead is consumed of the fire." Here the imagery is drawn from the refiner's art, and the "bel lows" are those used to make the refiner's fire burn fiercely. See Crafts, 11, 10.

Belly, bel'ī. גֵּבָה, gābhān "the external abdomen" (Gen 3 14; Lev 11 42). גָּבָה, ḡōbāh = "the abdominal cavity" (Nu 25 8 ARV "body"). כָּבָה, καβά "the internal abdomen," ("the womb") (1 K 7 20; Job 16 3 23 AV; 20 15.23; 40 16; Ps 17 14; Prov 13 25; 18 20; Jer 1 5; Ezk 3 3) also fig. "the internal regions," "the body of anything" (Jon 2 2). קְבָה, me'veh = "intestines,""abdomen" (Dn 2 32; Jon 1 17; 2 12). In the NT κοσμία, κοσμία = "a cavity," esp. the abdominal (Mt 12 40; 15 17; Mk 7 19); the seat of appetite and of the carnal affections (Rom 16 18; 1 Cor 6 13; Phil 3 19; Rev 10 9.10); the innermost of the soul (ARV "Je 38 7").

BELMAIM, bel'mā-im, AV Belmen (Belmai, Belmait, Jth 7 3; Bel'maiv, Bel'maitn, 4 4): A place in the neighborhood of Dothan (7 3), to which warning was sent to prepare for the invasion of Holoternes (4 4). It probably answers to the modern Bel Bileme (Bileam), a ruined site about half a mile S. of Jeän'in.

BELMEN, bel'men, BELMON, bel'mon. See Belmaim.

BELOMANCE, bel'o-man-si. See Augury, IV, 2.

Beloved, bē-lūv'ed, bē-lūv'd (ἀγαπητός, agapatōs): A term of affectionate endearment common to both Testaments; in the OT found, 26 out of 42 times, in Solomon's Song of Love. Limited chiefly to two Heb words and their derivatives: פַּלַע, 'kehbeh, "to breathe" or "long for," hence to love, corresponding to the NT, ἀγαπάω, ἀγαπᾶω, "to prefer," i.e. a love based on respect and benevolent regard; פַּלַע, דָּבָר, "love," chiefly love between the sexes, based on sense and emotion, akin to φιλέω, φιλέω (Lat amore). Used occasionally, in their nobler sense, interchangeably, e.g. the former of a husband's love for his wife (Dt 21 15.16); twice of a lover (Cant 1 14.16), thus lifting the affection of the Song of Sol out of mere amorinosness into the realm of the spiritual and possibly Messianic. Both words used of God's love for His chosen; e.g. Solomon, "b. of his God" (Neh 13 26); Benjamin "b. of Jehovah" (Dt 33 12); so even of wayward Israel (Jer 11 15).

In the NT "beloved" used exclusively of Divine and Christian love, an affection begotten in the community of the new spiritual life in Christ, e.g. "b. in the Lord" (Rom 15 5). The beauty, unity, endearment of this love is historically unique, being peculiarly Christian. "Brethren" in Christ are "beloved" (1 Thess 1 4; 1 Cor 16 28; Jas 1 16; 2 5). Many individuals are specified by name: Timothy (2 Tim 1 2); Philemon (Philem ver 1); Amplias, Urbanus, Stachys, Persis (Rom 16 8.9.12), etc. The aged John is the conspicuous NT illustration of the depth and tenderness of Christian love. In his epistles alone he addresses his disciples 12 times as "beloved," Paul terms "God's elect" and "beloved" (Col. 1:2).

The term rises to still Divine significance as an epithet of Christ, whom Paul, grateful for His "freely bestowed" grace, terms "the Beloved." This is the word used repeatedly to express God the Father's infinite affection for Jesus His "beloved Son" (Mt. 3:17; 12:18; 17:5; Mk. 11:9; 9:7; Lk. 3:22; 20:13).

Agapélos rendered as above 47 times is 9 times "dearly beloved" (RV uniformly omits "dearly") and 3 times "well beloved" (RV omits "well"). The former rendering found only once in the OT (742), yāhāḏatū, "something beloved"); portraying God's tender love for His people: "dearly beloved of my soul" (Jer. 12:7). Thrice is Daniel spoken of as "greatly beloved" of Gabriel and of God (393), hâmāḏāthō, "precious," i.e. delight =beloved; Dnl 9:23; 10:11.19. Through the apostles the word has become familiar in pastoral and sermonic address. A few words better illustrate the power and impress of the Christian love in succeeding centuries than this.

BELSHAZZAR, bel-ē-shā'ar (בעַלְשָׁנָּאָר, belšaḥar; Baktārīdār, Belshar-usur): According to some he was the youngest son under whom Babylon was taken by Darius the Mede. The Bab monuments speak a number of a Bel-shar-usur who was the "firstborn son, the offspring of the heart" of Nabunaid, the last king of the Bab empire, that had been founded by Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, at the time of the death of Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, in 626 BC. There is no doubt that this Belshazzar is the same as the Belshazzar of Dnl. It is not necessary to suppose that Belshazzar was at any time king of the Bab empire in the sense that Nebuchadnezzar and Nabunaid were. It is probable, as M. Pogson argues, that a son of Nabunaid, called Nabunaid after his father, was king of Babylonia, or Bab king, in Harran (Harān), while his father was overlord in Babylon. This second Nabunaid is called "the son of the offspring of the heart" of Nabunaid his father. It is possible that this second Nabunaid was the king who was killed by Cyrus, who crosses the Tigris above Arbela in the 9th year of Nabunaid his father, and put to death the king of the country (see the Nabunaid-Cyrus Chronicle, col. ii, 17); since according to the Eshki-Harran inscription, Nabunaid the second died in the 9th year of Nabunaid the first. Belshazzar may have been the son of the king who is said in the same chronicle to have commanded the Bab army in Accad from the 6th to the 11th year of Nabunaid I; or, possibly longer, for the annals before the 6th and after the 11th are most part illegible. This same son of the king is most probably mentioned again in the same chronicle as having died in the year in which Babylon was captured by Gobrytas of Gutium. As Nabunaid II, though reigning at Harrān under the overlordship of his father, is called king of Babylon on the same inscription on which his father's is called by the same title; so Belshazzar may have been called king of Babylon, although he was only crown prince. It is probable, also, that as Nabunaid I had made another of his sons king of Harrān, so he had made another king of Chaldaea. This would account for Belshazzar's being called in Dnl 5 30 the Chaldaean king, although to be sure, this word Chaldean may describe his race rather than his kingdom. The 3d year of Belshazzar, spoken of in Dnl 8 1, would then refer to his 3d year as sub-king of the Chaldaeans under his father Nabunaid, king of Babylon, just as Cambyses was later sub-king of Babylon, while his father Cyrus was king of the lands. From this we may infer that this subkingdom embraced Chaldaea and Susiana, and possibly the province of Babylon; and from the Nabunaid-Cyrus Chronicle that it extended over Accad as well.

That the city of Babylon alone was sometimes at least governed by an official called king is highly probable, since the father of Nergal-asher-usur is certainly, and the father of Nabunaid I is probably, called king of Babylon, in both of which cases, the city, or at most the province, of Babylon must have been meant, since we know to a certainty all of the kings who had been ruling over the empire of Babylon since 626 BC, when Nabopolassar became king, and the names of neither of these fathers of kings is found among them.

In addition to Nabunaid II, Belshazzar seems to have had another brother named Nebuchadnezzar, since the two Bab rebels against Darius Hystaspis both assumed the name of Nebuchadnezzar the son of Nabunaid (see the Behistun Inscription, I, 85, 89, 95). He was a successor of his brother, and a second named probably Ukabu-sha'ī-nan.

Belshazzar had his own house in Babylon, where he seems to have been engaged in the woolen or clothing trade. Hasean, another Bab name, of which he made large gifts to the gods. His father joins his name with his own in some of his prayers to the gods, and apparently appointed him commander of the army of Accad, whose especial duty it was to defend the city of Babylon against the attacks of the armies of Media and Persia.

It would appear from the Nabunaid-Cyrus Chronicle, that Belshazzar was de facto king of the Bab empire, all that was left of it, from the 4th to the 5th month of the 17th year of the reign of his father Nabunaid, and that he died on the night in which Babylon was taken by Gobrytas of Gutium (that is, probably, Darius the Mede q.v.).

The objection to the historical character of the narrative of Dnl, based upon the fact that Belshazzar in 5 11.18 is said to have been the son of Nebuchadnezzar, whereas the monuments state that he was the son of Nabunaid, is fully met by supposing that one of them was his real and the other his adoptive father; or by supposing that the queen-mother and Daniel referred to the greatest of his predecessors as his father, just as Omri is called by the Assyrians the father of Juhu, and as the claimants to the Medo-Pers throne are called on the Behistun Inscription the sons of Cyaxares, and as at present the reigning sheikhs of northern Arabia are all called the sons of Rashid, although in reality they are not his sons.

BELTEHSHAZZAR, bel-tē-shā'ar (בעַלְתֶּשָׁנָּאָר, baltšaḥar; Bab Balad-mšarur, "protect his life"); Dnl 6 8): The Bab name given to Daniel (Dnl 1 7; 2 28; 6 12). Not to be confounded with Belshazzar.

Ben- (ben prefix) (sing. בֶּן, "son of"); pl. בְּנֵי, bne' (sons of" in Aram. בנים, bōn): This word is used in sing. or pl. to express relationship of almost any kind: (1) to a person; as such it is found as part of many compound names like Benjamin, Ben-hur, etc (cf Bar); (2) to a clan; in this connection it is found in the pl. only: "children of Israel," "children of Ammon," etc; (3) to a town; perhaps a reading of the name Jabesh (2 K 15 10 ff); (4) to occupation, state of life, age, character, quality even of things; (5) peculiarly employed in the sense of "scholar," "disciple" ("son of prophet") or in phrases like "son of death," etc; (6) in poetry: "sons of flame" for "sparks" (Job 5 7m), etc. The frequent metaphorical use of the word indicates that it was rarely used to express the relation of father to son like the Arab. Tbn. Cf HPN, 64 ff.

BEN, ben (בֶּן, "son"): A Levite appointed to assist as musician in the temple service (1 Ch 15 18). The text seems to be doubtful, since the name is omitted in ver 20 and not mentioned at all in the LX.

BEN-ABINADAB, ben-a-bin'a-dab, ben-ab-i-ná'dab (בֵּן אֵבִּיו נָדַב, ben ēḇi-yô naḏāḇ, "son of Abinadab"): One of the "captains" of Solomon who provided for the king and his household, each for a month in the year (1 K 4 11). His district was the region of Dor. In AV he is called "the son of Abinadab." His wife was Tappath, the daughter of Solomon.

BENAIAH, bē-ná'ya, bō-ni'a (בֶּן יָאָי, bēn yā'ī, bōna'ā; יָיָה, yā'yāh, "Jeh has built.") Cf HPN, 182, 280 (188): (1) B., the son of Jehoiada of Kabzeel (cf Josh 15 21), was a man of "mighty deeds" and was more honorable than any of the mighty men of David except the three chiefs. Therefore David made him his chief counselor (2 S 23 23m; cf 1 Ch 27 34 where the order of names seems to be reversed) and set him over the Cherethites (of Carites, 2 K 11 4 ff and m) and Pelethites and he was made the 3d captain of the host and chief over the course of the 3d month (1 Ch 27 5 f; 2 S 28 18; 20 25; 1 Ch 18 17; 2 S 23 20 ff; 11 22 ff). Being a true friend of David (cf 2 S 15 18) he did not take part in the usurpation of Adonijah (1 K 8 8, 10), and was therefore with others chosen by the king to proclaim Solomon king over Israel (1 K 2 32 ff) and later by Solomon to execute Adonijah (1 K 2 25), Joab (1 K 2 29 ff), and Sheine (1 K 2 46). In recognition of his services Solomon appointed him over the host in Joab's place (1 K 2 35; 4 4).

(2) B., a Pirathonite (cf Jgs 12 13,15), was one of David's 50 mighty men (2 S 23 30; 1 Ch 11 31). He was captain over the course of the 11th month numbering 24,000 (1 Ch 27 14).

(3) A ruler of the house of Simeon (1 Ch 4 36).

(4) A Levite of second degree appointed as singer (1 Ch 25 18) with "paralters set to Asa'moth" (1 Ch 15 20; 16 5).

(5) A priest appointed "to blow the trumpet before the ark of God" (1 Ch 15 24; 16 5).

(6) The father of Jehoiada (1 Ch 27 34), but see (1) above.

(7) A (or, an ancestor of) Nahashel, the house of Asaph (2 Ch 20 14).

(8) An overseer in the service of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 13).

(9, 10, 11, 12) Four different men of Israel who had taken "strange wives" (Ezr 10 35.30.35.43).

(13) The father of Pelatiah who was seen by Ezekiel in his vision (Ezr 11 13).

BEN-AMMI, ben-am'mi (בֵּן אָמַמִּי, ben âm'miy, "son of my kinsman," Gen 19 38): The progenitor of the Ammonites was a son of Lot's younger daughter, born after the destruction of Sodom. The account of his birth as well as that of Moab was commonly regarded as an expression of Israel's interest and contempt toward these "nations." However, this idea is rather unwarranted, in view of the fact that the origin of the tribe of Judah (which is held in especial honor by J) is accounted for in a similar way (Gen 38). Gunkel (Söding und Chaos, 195) suggests that the narrative (19 30-38) was originally a Moabite account tracing the common origin of Moab and Ammon to Lot. It presupposes a universal catastrophe—such as the conflagration of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim suggesting—in which all the human race, save Lot and his two daughters, perished. In order to avert the extinction of the race, his daughters resorted to incestuous practices. In this case we have here a Moabite parallel to the Deluge story (Skinner, Genesis, 313-14). While the common origin of the two brother tribes is undoubtedly a fact (Jgs 10 6; 11 15.18.25; Dt 2 19; 2 Ch 20, etc), the folk-etymology of their names is rather suspicious. The name Ben-Ammi is probably derived from the deity "Emu," which seems to be the name for Nergal among the Shuhiotes on the W. of the Euphrates, a land which corresponds to the position of the Bne'-Amm, "children of his people" (Nu 22 5). The chief god of the Kataban Arabs was called Ammi (Bom., ZDMG V, 65, 1905, n. 1). In euneiform inscriptions this name appears as part of the title of the Ammonite rulers (HDB). Neubauer (Studia Biblica, 1-26) suggests that the name Balsam is a compound of Bel + Am, that is, "Am is Lord." For other compounds with Ammi see Gray, HPN, 41-43.

S. COHON

BENCH (בֵּן, koresh): Found only in EV in Ezek 27 6, in the prophet's "lamentation over Tyre": "They have made thy benches of ivory inlaid in boxwood, from the islands of Kittim," where the word evidently stands for the "benches" of the boat whose "most" (ver 5) and "oars" (ver 6) have just been described, in the vivid figs. of speech in which the city itself is pictured as a merchant- ship. Cf ver 8, "Thy wise men of Tyre, were in thee, they were thy pilots." See StA.

BEN-DEKER, ben-dek'ér (בֵּן דָּכֵר, ben-der'kér, "son of Deker," AV "son of Dekar"): The word is derived from a Heb root meaning "to pierce." Cf HPN, 69. One of the 12 officers who provided virtuals for King Solomon and his household (1 K 4 9).

BENEATH, bē-nē'kth: The adv. for "under" (kôdôt). In Jn 8 23, the words "ye are from beneath," suggest hell in contrast to heaven. But the succeeding clause, "ye are of this world," gives the key for the interpretation. Earth, not hell, is expressed, although "what more awful meaning surely is not excluded" (Alford).

BEN-E-BERAK, ben-e-bē'raḵ (בֵּן-בְּרָאָק, benē bērāḵ; Bnēbērāḵ, Bnēbērāḵ): A town in the territory of Dan (Josh 19 45), represented by the modern village Ibn Tairak, about an hour S.E. of Jaffa.

BENEDICTION, ben-ē-dik'shun: From the earliest times the records bear testimony that pronouncing the benediction or giving the blessing was a common practice. In the temple service, this duty was assigned to the Aaronites and was made an impressive part of the service. The form of the benediction used is given in Nu 6 22-27. Refer-enches to this practice may be found in Lev 9:22; Dt 10:8; 2 Ch 30:27. After a time, minute directions were given concerning it and careful preparation was made for this part of the service. All Aaronites, of proper age, were entitled to perform the service, except those covered by previous conduct or an account of physical defect were disqualified. One who had killed another, whether intentionally or otherwise, or who had violated the marriage vows, had given himself excessively to wine drinking or other excesses, or indeed had become guilty of unbridled conduct or life, was not only prohibited from pronouncing the blessing, but was required to withdraw before this part of the service was performed. If one was blind even of one eye, or had a defect in his hands or speech, or was a hatchet back, he was also excluded. Before the priest could engage in this service he was required to wash his hands. Then, with uplifted hands, while the people stood, he uttered the words of blessing. The main idea was that thus the name of Jehovah was put upon the people. Later it came to be regarded as having some special blessing in and of itself, a result against which the more spiritual of the priests protested.

It was common not only to pronounce the benediction in public worship but also in the family. We have such instances in Gen 9:26-27; 27:27-30. This practice prevailed also on many other occasions not only in Israel, but among the heathen as well. We may readily see, therefore, that from the very beginning of the Christian church the name of the benediction was common. In the course of time an extensive lit. developed on this subject and it may be said that there are now three distinct ideas in the church as to the benediction. That which is most common is that which regards the minister, as clothed with sacrificial powers, holds that the blessings pronounced are actually conferred in the act of the utterance of the words, because of the powers conferred upon him when he was set aside for the sacred office. On the other hand it is held that it is merely a prayer that God may bestow certain blessings on the people. From this position others dissent, and teach that it is the declaration of the special privileges and relations in which those who are baptized are united into Christ fellowshio by Christ; that the blessings now declared are theirs by right of that relation, and are conferred upon them by the Holy Spirit. The Gr and Rom Catholic churches take the first position, and accordingly we find among them much of detail and minutiae to the manner in which it should be pronounced. In the Gr church the priest raises his hand with the thumb touching the third finger, signifying the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone; or according to others to form the sacred name LHS. In the Rom church the form is, the thumb, first and second fingers are to be open, to symbolize the Trinity. In this church too, the benediction is pronounced in a multitude of cases and in each case the thing so blessed by the priest is made sacred. Crosses, church vessels, houses, paschal eggs, churchyards, are thus blessed. Every parish has a collection of these forms of blessing in what is known as the "Benedictional." The authority for this is based on some documents claiming to reach back to early church history, but as they belong to the forged decretal class, the position of the Rom church on this subject is untenable.

Apostolic benedictions, as we find them in the epistles, are of considerable variety. One of the striking features is that in a number of cases there is the omission of the Holy Ghost. The best explanation seems to be that the Father and the Son effect the redemption of the world and the Holy Ghost applies the blessing so wrought out. "Grace, mercy and peace" may then be said to be sent from the Father and the Son through the Holy Ghost to be the possession of all who have come into the kingdom. The third person of the Trinity, being thus in the act of applying the blessing, is not mentioned. The fact that in other cases Father, Son and Holy Ghost are mentioned, proves that the writers knew the character and office of the Holy Ghost. The most common form used today is that in 2 Cor 13:14. Occasionally some changes are introduced by ministers, but it would seem best to adhere strictly to the formal terms.

BeneFACTOR, ben′-e-fak′-ter (Gr euergereta, Lk 22:25): There is here a probable allusion to two kings of Egypt (Ptolemy III and VII), who had the surname "Euergetes," of whom the period of the first was 247-242 BC, and of the second, 147-117 BC. Jesus draws the contrast between worldly kingdoms, in which the title "benefactor" is given those who rule with all the splendor of earthly display and luxury, and His kingdom, in which it belongs only to those whose work is that of humble, obscure and often menial service.

BeneFIT, ben′-e-fit (יוֹדָה, g'mal= "a deed," 2 Ch 32:25); יַעֲדָה, yādāh= (causat.) "to make well," "to do good" (Jer 18:10). The pl. of יוֹדָה, g'mal, is found in Ps 103:2. Ps 68:19 (AV) should be tr' "Blessed be the Lord. Day by day he sustains us; God is our salvation." χαρή, chērē= "gift"; "grace" (2 Cor 1:15, "a second benefit," that is, two visits in the same journey). ἐρευνα, euergetai= "good deed done!" (1 Tim 6:2: "because they that partake of the benefit [of their service] are believing and beloved"). δωρέα, agathēs= "good" (Phil. ver. 14 AV; RV "goodness").

Bene-JAAKAN, ben′-e-jā′-a-kān, bēn-mē-jā′-a-kān (בנָיָאָקִן, bēn-mē yā′ākān; Nu 33:31,32). See Beeroth Bene-JA\n
BeneVOLENCE, bē-nev′-o-lens: AV tr of phrase in YR of 1 Cor 7:3, rejected by RV which following WH translates Gr ophōthē, "due." This reference to the marriage relation is explained in ver 4. Cf Ex 21:10.

Ben-GEBER, ben-gē′-ber (בֵּן-גֶּבֶר, ben-geberh, "son of Geber": AV son of Geber; the word is derived from a Heb root meaning "to be strong." Cf HPN, 66, 69): One of the twelve commissariat officers in the service of Solomon (1 K 4:13).

The name of three kings of Syria mentioned in the historical books. Hadad is the Syrian god of storms, and is apparently identical with Rimmon (2 K 8 12), the Assyrian “the Thunderer,” whose temple was in Damascus.

The Name The name Benhadad, “son of Hadad,” accords with the custom which obtained in Sem mythology of calling a king or a nation the hearth of the national god, as we have Mesha, son of Chemosh, and the Midianites, children of Chemosh. Benhadad seems to have become a general designation for the kings of Syria (Am 1 4; Jer 49 27).

1. Benhadad I was the son of Tabrimon, who is called (1 K 15 18) “the son of Hexion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus.”

1. The Kingdom of Syria had been founded by Rezon (1 K 11 23-25) who founded the kingdom of Damascus and imparted to Syria that temper of hostility to Israel which became hereditary. Meanwhile the Aramaeans had shaken themselves free from the rule of the Hittites, and with Damascus for a center had planted strong settlements in the plains westward from the Euphrates. By the time that Benhadad entered into this succession, Syria was the strongest power in this region of Western Asia, and ready to take advantage of every opportunity of increasing her dominions.

Such an opportunity presented itself in the appeal of Asa, king of Judah, for help against Baasha, king of Israel. The two Heb kingdoms had been at feud ever since the disruption. Baasha had pushed his frontier southward to Ramah, within 5 miles of Jerusalem, and this commanding eminence he proceeded to fortify. The danger of a hostile fortress overlooking his capital, and the humiliation of his rival’s presence so near, were more than Asa could bear. It was at this juncture that he beheld Benhadad. Taking all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasury of the house of the Lord, and the treasury of the king’s house, he sent them to Benhadad with a request for an alliance, begging him at the same time to break off the league he had with Baasha and thus enable Asa to dislodge his enemy. Benhadad saw an opening for the aggrandizement of his kingdom and broke off his alliance, but not with the same fair-mindedness. He invaded the territory of his neighbor and Baasha. By an invasion of Northern Israel he obliged Baasha to withdraw from Ramah and confine himself to the neighborhood of his own capital (1 K 15 16 ff). Judah obtained relief, but the price paid for it was too great. Asa had surrendered his treasures, and very likely some of his independence.

For his shortsightedness in laying himself under obligation to Benhadad and relying upon the help of Syria rather than upon the Lord his God, Asa was rebuked by the prophet Hanani (2 Ch 16 1 ff). Benhadad had extended his territory by the transaction and seems to have exercised henceforward some sort of sovereignty over both the Heb kingdoms.

II. Benhadad II was in all probability the son of Benhadad I. He is the Hadad-ezer, or Hadad-idri, of the monuments. He comes first upon the scene of the Bib. history as king of the land of Israel with a large host, in which were 32 tributary kings, and horses and chariots. He had penetrated as far as Samaria, the newly built city of Omri, now the capital of his son Ahab. Benhadad and his Syrian host had laid siege to Samaria and Ahab had been summoned to surrender. Ahab was disposed to come to terms, but the intolerable proposals made by Benhadad drove him to resistance. Encouraged by the elders of the people, and acting on the counsel of a prophet, Ahab made a sortie and falling upon the carousing Syrians put them so completely to rout that Benhadad himself only escaped on a horse with the horsemen.

Monolith of Shalmaneser II.

Next year the Syrians resolved to retrieve their defeat saying of the Israelites, “Their God is a god of the hills; therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they.” Ahab had been warned to expect the return of the Syrians and was prepared for the fresh attack. For seven days the two armies faced each other, the Israelites “like two little flocks of kids” before a host that filled the country. On the seventh day they joined battle near to Aphek, and the Syrians met again an overwhelming defeat. Jehu was proved to be God both of the plains and of the hills. Benhadad was taken prisoner, and appealing to the eminency of the victor, he persuaded Ahab to spare his life. A treaty was agreed upon between the two monarchs under which Ahab's people were to have bazaars of their own in Damascus, as it would appear Benhadad I had had for his subjects before (2 Kings 3:1-25). The treaty was denounced by a prophet, and Ahab was warned that this man whom God had devoted to destruction would be the destruction of himself and his people. Under the treaty, however, there were three years without war between Syria and Israel.

The treaty and the resulting period of peace receive striking confirmation from the monuments. From the monolith inscription of Shalmaneser II we learn that this treaty Assyrian king in the 6th year of his reign (854 BC) had crossed the Tigris and made his way across the Euphrates Monuments on boats of sheepskin into Syria to Halan (Aleppo). At Karkar he encountered the combined forces of Damascus, Hamath, Israel and the states which had united to oppose his progress westward. Ahabbii Sir-l'ai, Ahab of Israel and Dad'idri, Hadadezer (Benhadad II) of Damascus are named in the inscription with chariots. This seems to make common cause against Shalmaneser and fighting on the same side. It was Benhadad, as we gather, that bore the brunt of the assault, but the result of the battle was the complete rout of the allies with the loss of 14,000 men. That the assistance of Israel on the occasion was the outcome of the treaty between Ahab and Benhadad, and that the combination against Shalmaneser took place during the three years of peace, are in the highest degree probable.

The disaster to the allies, however, seems to have broken up the confederacy. When the king of Syria is next mentioned in Bib. history, it is defending the city of Ramoth-Gilead against the attack made upon it by Ahab, who is found now in alliance with Jechoshaphat, the king of Judah, attempting unsuccessfully and with fatal results to himself, to recover this city of Israel from the weakened power of Damascus. At Ramoth-Gilead Benhadad is not said to have 32 tributary kings in his train, but 32 military commanders who have taken their place (1 Kings 22:29-31).

The peace between Israel and Syria having been broken, there were frequent wars between the kingdoms, in which the prophet Elisha is a prominent figure.

6. Benhadad and Elisha

He healed of his leprosy Naaman, Benhadad's commander-in-chief. He disclosed to the king of Israel the places wherever Benhadad pitched his camp. He smote with blindness a great host whom Benhadad had sent with horses and chariots to seize him at Dothan, and led them into Samaria where he saw them treated kindly and sent back to their master (2 Kings 6:8-23).

Some time after Benhadad again assembled all his host and laid siege to Samaria. So great was the famine that women ate their own children. The king of Israel sent to one of his men to put Elisha to death, but Elisha closed his house against him and announced that on the morrow there would be great plenty in the city. And so it happened. Certain lepers, despairing of relief, had got horses and learned that the Syrians had abandoned their camp in a panic, believing that the king of Israel had hired the kings of the Muṣri and the northern Hittites to raise the siege (2 Kings 6:24-7:20; cf Burney's note, 7:6).

Still another notice of Benhadad II is found in the Annals of Shalmaneser, who records that in the 11th year of his reign he defeated a combination of 12 kings of the Hittites with Benhadad at their head, and among them Syrian men. The record in Bib. history, but it must have been shortly before the tragedy which ended the career of the Syrian king. Benhadad had fallen sick and sent his commander-in-chief, Hazael, to inquire as to the issue of his sickness of the prophet Elisha, who was visiting Damascus. Elisha foretold the king's death, and went as he read to Hazael the cruel purpose which the Syrian commander was even then maturing. Hazael professed to be incredulous, but he departed from Elisha and the very next day in cold blood put his master to death and ascended the throne (2 Kings 8:7-15). Thus ingloriously ended the reign of one of the most powerful of the Syrian kings.

1. His Confessions and death contemporaneous with Amaziah, king of Judah; Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, king of Israel; and Ramman-Nirari III, king of Assyria. The fortunes of Israel had fallen low in the days of Jehoahaz, and Israel and Benhadad III were the instruments of Jeh's displeasure with the nation. At this time Jehoahaz had no more than 53 horsemen and 10 chariots and 10,000 footmen; for the king of Syria had destroyed them and made them like the dust in threshing (2 Kings 13:7). It was when the fortunes of Israel were at the lowest ebb by reason of the oppression of the king of Syria—by this time Benhadad—that help came to them and Jeh gave Israel a savior, so that Israel went out from under the hands of the Syrians, "and the children of Israel dwelt in their tents [in their homes] as beforetime" (2 Kings 13:5). The "saviour" of the Bib. narrative is the one allusion in Scripture to the king of Assyria of that day, Ramman-Nirari III, whose inscription records his victorious expedition to the West.

2. The Assyrians "From the Euphrates to the land of the Hittites," runs an inscription, Edom, Philistia as far as the Great Sea of the sunsetting, I subjected to my yoke; payment of tribute I imposed upon them. Against Syria of Damascus I marched; Mari, the king of Syria, in Damascus his royal city I besieged. He then proceeds to tell of the subjugation of the monarch and of the spoils obtained from his capital. That Mari, which means in Aramaic 'lord,' is Benhadad III, the son of Hazael, is now generally believed.

With the capture of Damascus and the collapse of the Syrian power under Mari (Benhadad III), an era of recuperation and prosperity began. So it came to pass that "Jehoash the son of Jehoahaz took again out of the hand of Benhadad the son of Hazael the cities which he had taken out of the hand of Jehoahaz by war. Three times did Josiah smite him, and recovered the cities of Israel" (2 Kings 13:27). In the time of Josiah, Israel was able to live freely for a time and Jeroboam II restored the Northern Kingdom to its former extent and glory. But the flame for Israel of war which had been sent into the house of Hazael and which devoured the palace of Benhadad (Amos 1:4f) was only

(1) The youngest of Jacob's sons. His mother Rachel died in giving him birth. As she felt death approaching she called him Benoni, "son of my sorrow." "Paring, probably, that this might bode evil for the child—for names have always preserved a peculiar significance in the East.—Jacob called him Benjamin, "son of the right hand" (Gen 48:17 ff). He was of Jacob's sons born in Paddan-aram, between Bethel and Ephraim. Later, in the ch, in the general enumeration of the children born in Paddan-aram, the writer fails to except Benjamin (ver 24). Joseph was his full brother. In the history where Benjamin appears as an object of solicitude to his father and brothers, we must not forget that he was already a grown man. At the time of the descent of Israel to Egypt Joseph was about 40 years of age. Benjamin was not much younger, and was himself the father of a family. The phrase in Gen 44:20, "a little one," only describes in oriental fashion one much younger than the speaker. And as the youngest of the family no doubt he was made much of. Renorse over their heartless treatment of his brother Joseph may have made the other brothers especially tender toward Benjamin. The conduct of his brethren all through the trying experiences in Egypt places them in a more attractive light than we should have expected; and it must have been a gratification to their father (Gen 42 ff). Ten sons of Benjamin are named at the time of their settlement in Egypt (Gen 46:21).

(2) At the Exodus the number of men of war in the tribe is given as 35,400. At the second census it is 45,600 (Nu 26:41).

2. The Tribe

Their place in the host was with the standard of the camp of Ephraim on the west of the tabernacle, their prince being Abianah the son of Gedeon (Nu 2:22 f). Benjamin was represented among the spies by Palti the son of Raphu; and at the division of the land the prince of Benjamin was Eldad the son of Chilson (Nu 13:9; 34:21).

(3) The boundaries of the lot that fell to Benjamin are pretty clearly indicated (Josh 18:11 f). It lay between Ephraim on the north and the Jordan on the south. The northern frontier started from the Jordan over against Jericho, and ran to the north of that town up through the mountain westward past Beth-aven, taking in Bethel. It then went down by Ataroth-addar to Beth-horon the northern boundary. From this point the western frontier ran southward to Kiriath-jearim. The southern boundary ran from Kiriath-jearim eastward to the fountain of the waters of Netophah, swept round by the south of Jerus, and passed down through the wilderness by Gethloth and the stone of Botan, to the northern shore of the Dead Sea at the mouth of the Jordan. The river formed the eastern boundary. The lot was comparatively small. This, according to Jos, was owing to "the goodness of the land" (14:8, v. 22); a description that would apply mainly to the plains of Jericho. The uplands are stony, mountainous, and poor in water; but there is much good land on the western slopes. It will be clear from the above that Benjamin held the main avenues of approach to the highlands from both E. and W.; that by which Joshua led Israel past Ai from Gilgal, and the longer and easier approaches from the W., notably that along which the tides of battle so often rolled, the Valley of Ajalon, by way of the Beth-horons. Benjamin also sat astride the great highway connecting N. and S., which ran along the ridge of the southern range, where it was easiest of defense. It was a position calling for occupation by a brave and warlike tribe such as Benjamin proved to be. His warriors were skilful archers and slingers, and they seem to have cultivated the use of both hands, which gave them a great advantage in battle (Jgs 20:16; 1 Ch 8:40; 12:2, etc). These characteristics are reflected in the Blessing of Jacob (Gen 49:27). The second deliverer of Israel in the period of Judges was Ehud, the Benjamite, Judg 3:15, 16, 20.

The Benjamites fought against Sisera under Deborah and Barak (Jgs 5:14). The story told in Jgs 20:21 presents many difficulties.

5. History which cannot be discussed here. It is perhaps true that certain of the features of life in these lawless times when there was no king in Israel. Whatever may be said of the details, it certainly reflects the memory of some atrocity in which the Benjamites were involved and for which they suffered terrible punishment. The election of Saul as first king over united Israel naturally lent a certain prestige to the tribe. After the death of Saul they formed the backbone of Ish-bosheth's party, and most unwillingly conceded precedence to Judah in the person of David (1 Sa 16:1; 22:15; 19:20). The tribe, probably the larger part, went against Judah at the disruption of the kingdom, taking Bethel with them. 1 K 12:20 says that none followed the house of David but the house of Judah only. But tell tells us that the Rehoboam gathered the men of Judah and Benjamin to fight against Jeroboam. It seems probable that as Jerus had now become the royal city of the house of David, the adjoining parts of Benjamin proved loyal, while the more distant joined the Northern Kingdom. After the downfall of Samaria Judah assumed control of practically the whole territory of Benjamin (2 K 23 15-19, etc.). Nehemiah gives the Valley of Hinnom as the south boundary of Benjamin in his time (Neh 11 30), while westward it extended to include Lod and Ophel. Saul of Tarsus was a member of this tribe (Phil 3 5).

(4) A great-grandson of Benjamin, son of Jacob (1 Ch 7 11). (5) One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 32, and probably also Neh 3 23, 12 34).

BENJAMINE, ben'ja-mîth. One belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, such as Ehud (Jgs 3 15), Saul (1 S 9 1.2), Sheba (2 S 20 1), Shimei (1 K 2 8), etc.

BENO, bê'no (ךנ, b'nâ; 'his son'). The son of Jaziah of the house of Levi (1 Ch 24 26 27).

BEN-ONI, ben'o-nî (ךנוני, ben'ônî; úôs ðêvûs mûc, huâs ðônêns mûn, 'son of my sorrow'). The name given by the dying Rachel to her new-born son; changed by his father Jacob to BENJAMIN (Gen 35 18) q.v.

BEN-ZOHEH, ben-zô'hek (בַּנָּצְהֶ, ben-zô-hâh; 'son of Zopheth,' from a Heb root meaning "to be strong!"): A son of Ishi of the house of Judah (1 Ch 4 20).

BEON, bê'on (Nu 32 3). See BAAL-MEON.

BEOR, bê'o-r (בֵּרוֹ, b'rôr, 'destroyer'?): (1) Father of Bela, the first king of Edom (Gen 36 32; 1 Ch 1 43). (2) The father of the seed Balaam (Nu 22 5; 24 3.15; 31 8; Dt 23 4; Josh 13 22; 24 9, omitted in LXX; Mic 6 5; 2 Pet 2 15, AV and RVm 'Bosor').

BERA, bê'râ (בֹּרָ, bê'râh, 'gift'?): cf HPN, 74 n.; King of Sodom (Gen 14 2) who in the battle of Siddim was subdued by Chedorlaomer.

BERACHAH, bê'râ'ka (בַּרְךָ, b'râ'khâh, 'blessing,' AV Berachah): A Benjaminite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 3).

BERACHAH, bê'râ'ka, ber'a-ka, VALLEY OF (AV Berachah; בַּרְךָה, b'râ'khâ, 'name of b'râ'khâh; kôlás ékâlôyâs, kôlás eukloigôs): After the victory of Jehoshaphat and his people over Moab and Ammon "On the fourth day they assembled themselves in the valley of Berachah [i.e. of blessing] unto this day" (2 Ch 20 26). In the Wady 'Arrâb there is a ruin called Bækâbât and the valley in its proximity receives the same name. This is on the main road from Hebron to Jerus and not far from Tekoa; it suits the narrative well (see PET, III, 362).

BERACHIAH, ber-a-ka'. See BERECHIAH.

BERAIÁH, bê'ra-îa (בְּרָאָה, b'ra'âh, 'Jeh hath created'): A son of Shimei of the house of Benjamin (1 Ch 2 21).

BEREA, bê'ra. See BEREKA.

BEREAVE, bê-re'v, BEREAVER, bê-re'v'er, BEREFT, bê-reft': Bereave is frequently used in the OT in the (now almost obsolete) meaning of "to deprive," "to take away," esp. with reference to loss of children. The Heb word used here is בִּשָּׁקָּה, "to be childless," or in the Piel "to make childless" (cf Gen 42 36 et al.). In AV Eccl 4 8 (from the Heb בִּשָּׁקָּה, b'shâkâh, "to lack") we read "and bereave my soul of good" (RV "deprive"), and in Ezek 36 14 (from Heb בִּשָּׁקָּה, b'shâkâh, "to be childless"), "bither bereave thy nations any more" (RVm "cause to stumble").

Bereaver, otherwise very rare, is found RV Esk 36 13 (from Heb בִּשָּׁקָּה, b'shâkâh, "to be childless") , "a bereaver of thy nation" (AV "hast bereaved").

Bereft is found in 1 Tim 6 5 (from the Gr θεραπεύει, "to rob") "bereft of the truth" (AV "destitute"). The expression bereavement (RV Isa 49 20) in the phrase "the children of thy b." means "the children born to thee in the time when God had afflicted thee." A. L. BRESLICH

BERECHIAH, ber-e'-kî, (בַּרְךָיָה, b'râkiyâh, berekhyâh, berekhyâhk; "Jehblesses," HPN, 216, 287):

(1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 20).
(2) The father of Asaph, the singer (1 Ch 6 39 AV "Berechiah"); 15 17).
(3) A former inhabitant of Jerus, a Levite (1 Ch 9 16).
(4) A doorkeeper for the ark at David's time (1 Ch 15 23).
(5) One of the heads of the children of Ephraim (2 Ch 26 12).
(6) The father of Meshullam the builder (Neh 3 4.30; 6 18).
(7) The father of the prophet Zechariah (Zec 1 1.7).

BERED, bê'red (בֶּרֶדּ, berêd, "hail," from a Heb root meaning "to be cold!"): The son of Shothelah of the house of Ephraim (1 Ch 7 20). Cf Bezzer.

BERED, bê'red (בֶּרֶדּ, berêd; Bez'êd, Barâd): A place in the Negev mentioned in the story of Hagar (Gen 16 14). The well Beer-lahai-roi was "between Kadesh and Bereid." The Onkelos Tg renders it Haggârâh, which is the usual equivalent of Shur, while the Jerus Tg renders it Halaqât which is also Shur (Ex 15 22). Halaqât is clearly the city of Eliasus mentioned by Ptolemy and from the 4th to the 7th cents. by various ecclesiastical writers. It was an important town on the road from Pal to Kadesh and Mt. Sinai. This is without doubt the very large and important ruin Kh. Khalaqâ, some 70 miles S. of Jerus on the road from Beerseheba and Bebohot. These ruins cover an area of 15 to 20 acres, throughout which the foundations and inclosures of houses are distinctly to be traced. . . . We judged that here there must have been a city with room enough for a population of 15,000 to 20,000 souls" (Robinson, BR, I, 201).

BERIAH, bê'-rîa, BERIITES, bê'-rîts (בֵּרִי, b'rî, "in shouting," prob. derived from a Heb root meaning "to make noise," or "in evil," from another Heb root): (1) A son of Asher and father of Heber and Malchiel (Gen 46 17; 1 Ch 7 30.31; the head of the family of the Berities, Nu 26 44 ff).

(2) A son of Ephraim, called B. by his father because "it went evil with his house" (1 Ch 7 23).
(3) A descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 15.16).
(4) A Levite in the line of Gershon (1 Ch 23 10 f).

BERITES, bê'rites (בֵּרִיָּת, bê'rîyāh; bê'rîm; according to Klostermann and others, בֵּרִית, bê'rit); The word is found only in the passage in the Acts 20 14. The passage seems to be doubtful. The suggestion of Klostermann does not improve matters any; the other proposed reading, בֵּרִית, bê'rit (Vulg. viri electi), “choice young men,” is to be preferred.

BERITH, bê'ri-th (בֵּרִית, bê'rit, “covenant”). See BAAL-berith.

BERNICE, bêr-nîsê (Βερνίκη, Berníkê, “victorious”): One of the shameless women of the Bible, mentioned in Acts 25 13-23; 26 30. She was the eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12 1.6.11.21) who ruled from 38-44 AD. She whole life from the Jewish standpoint was inconstant (101) relating to the year 43 BC probably refers to another place of the same name, but an inscription (Inscr Graec, II, 5, 296) proves its existence at the end of the 4th cent. BC, and it is twice mentioned by Polybius (xxvii.8; xxviii.8). After the battle of Ptolemais in AD BC Bernice was the first city to surrender to Rome and fell in the third of the four regions into which Macedonia was divided (Livy xiv.45; xlv.20). Paul and Silas came to Berea from Thessalonica, which they had been forced by an order of Jerusalem to leave, and preached in the synagogue to the Jews, many of whom believed after a candid examination of the apostolic message in the light of their Scriptures (Acts 17 10.11). Her first husband was her own uncle, Herod of Cæcæchis. After her death she consorted with her own brother Agrippa II, with whom she listened to the impassioned discourses of Paul at Caesarea before Felix. For while she was married to King Ptolemy or Polemo of Sicily, who for her sake embraced Judaism, by the rite of circumcision. But she left him soon to return to Agrippa. Later on she figures shamefully in the lives of Silvanus and Thaddeus, father and son. If heredity stands for anything, its lessons are forcibly taught in the history of the Herodian family.

BERECA, be'rê-kâ (בֵּרֵכָא or בֵּרֵכָה, Bérekâ). (1) A town of southwestern Macedonia, in the district of Emathia. It lay at the foot of Mt. Berenus, on a tributary of the Haliacmon, and seems to have been an ancient town, though the date of its foundation is uncertain. A passage in Thucydides (ii.71) relating to the year 432 BC probably refers to another place of the same name, but an inscription (Inscr Graec, II, 5, 296) proves its existence at the end of the 4th cent. BC, and it is twice mentioned by Polybius (xxvii.8; xxviii.8). BEROTH, bê'roth (1 Esd 5 19). See BEE ROTH.

BEROTHAI, bê-ro'tha (Ezk 47 16: מִבְּרֹת, berôthâh; LXX B, Ἀββᾶπος, Abbâpēs; or BEROTHAI, 2 S 8 8; בּרֹהָת, bô'rothâh, where for מִבְּרֹת, mibbôrâthai, LXX reads ἀπετέλεσεν πολεόν, “from the select cities”): Probably two forms of the same name. Ezek 47 16 places it on the ideal northern frontier of Israel, between Damascus and Hamath. According to 2 S 8 8 it was a city of Hadadezer, king of Zobah. In the passage (1 Ch 18 8) Cun is given in place of Berothai. Its site is unknown. Ewald connected it with Beirut (so also apparently H. P. Smith, ICC, “Samuel,” 307), but Ezekiel's description excludes this view. Others have sought it in the Wady Brissa, in the E. slope of Lebanon, N. of Baalbec. A more plausible conjecture identifies it with Bereith (Briton), a village somewhat S. of Baalbec (Baederker, POP, 369). Possibly, however, the ideal northern frontier line should be drawn farther south. See HETHLON; ZEDAD; ZOBÂH.

BEROTHITE, bê-rothīt. See BEE ROTH T I T E.

BERRIES, ber'ēz-ies: Occurs in Jas 3 12 (AV) in the phrase “olive berries” (חָאָה, elathâi). The RV reads simply “olives.”

BERYL, ber'il. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

BERYTUS, ber'i-tus; be-rē'tus (Βερυτος, Berytōs; Arabic. بيرات; med. Beirāt, Beyrouth, Bey routh): An ancient Phoen city situated on the N. side of a promontory jutting from the base of Lebanon to the W., into the Mediterranean and forming a bay on the N. connected with the fable of St. George and the Dragon, and hence called St. George's Bay. The city is about 25 miles N. of Sidon and about 12 S. of the famous Lyre or Dog River, at the mouth of which are found the sculptured rocks bearing the monuments of the ancient kings of Egypt, Babylonia and Assyria. The city has been thought by some to be the Berothai of 2 S 8 8 or the Berothai of Ezk 47 16, but the connection bears in which these cities are mentioned seems to preclude the identification. The town is, however, an ancient one, for it occurs in Am Tab as Berytus, where it is closely connected with Gebal of which it may have been a dependency.
Though not mentioned in OT or NT it appears in the history of Herod the Great as an important town where was assembled a court of 150 judges, presided over by Saturninus, a former Rom consul, to try the case which Herod brought against his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, who were condemned there by the Rom court (Ant. XVI, xi. 2).

Beirut was a Rom colony at this time where many veterans settled and it afterward became the seat of a great Rom law school which was attended, in the days of Justinian, by thousands of students. It was utterly destroyed by an earthquake in 551 AD, and for a time was abandoned. Many remains of temples and public buildings of the Rom period remain. It rose to some importance during the Crusades and is at present the chief seaport of Syria, and has the only harbor on the coast. It is a town of about 125,000 inhabitants.

BERZELUS, bér-ze-lus. See ZORZELEUS.

BESAI, bés'ä-i, bés'ä-yi, "downtown"; The descendants of B. (Nehemiah) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus. (Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 52-Bastachi, 1 Esd 5 31).

BESET, bés-ët (κεφαλαίωσε, euperistatōs): The most common sense of this word is "to surround." This is the thought in Ps 139 5, and teaches the omnipresence of God. Often wicked men find that the things which they have done so envelope them that they cannot escape ruin (Hos 7 2). The reference in He 12 1 is first of all against the sin of apostasy against which repeated warning is given in this book. But the warning is also against any sin that is esp. dangerous to us. It, again and again, surrounds us like a besieging army. To surrender would be traitorous and disgraceful, since the Captain of the Lord's host is with us.

JACOB W. KAPP

BESIDE, bés-sid: Near to, or close to (Ps 23 2). It is often used to refer to the mental state, to the derangement of the mind (κεφαλαίωσε, euperistatōs, Mk 3 21; Acts 26 24 AV). Or it may refer to the condition of being out of the ordinary course of life. A life consecrated to God and spent in the interest of humanity is so designated (2 Cor 5 13). It has the sense also of a state of being out of one's usual mind, but not of mental derangement, occasioned by something that causes amazement or astonishment (Mk 5 42). Or it may refer to a state in which one is not conscious of present conditions, but is rapt in vision (Acts 10 10).

Besides is used in the sense of in addition to or that which is over and above what has been said or is possessed (Lk 16 26; see AV in "in"; Phil. ver 19).

JACOB W. KAPP

BESIEGE, bés-ëj: See SEIGE.

BESODEIAH, bes-o-dé'ya, bes-o-dé'a (בּוֹדֵדַyah, "in the confidence or counsel of Jeh"; cf Jer 23 18; 22; and HFN, 207, 221, 286): Father of Meshullam, the builder (Neh 3 6).

BESOM, bés'om: Occurs only once in Scripture: "I will sweep it with the besom of destruction" (Isa 14 23). Refers to what was in store for Babylon. The Heb word מָפֵטָדָן, rendered "besom," is close of kin to the one (מַטֵּטָה) rendered "sweep." In early Eng. "besom" was synonymous with "broom," and is still used in some parts of England.

BESOR, bés'or, THE BROOK (בּוֹדֵד לִיפְי), nahal bror; A, Bech'or, Bechor, B, Beav, Bead; 1 S 30 9.10.21; Jos, Ant, VI, xiv, 6): A torrent-bed (nahal) mentioned in the account of David's pursuit of the Amalekites. Thought to be Wady Ghaza, which enters the sea S.W. of Gaza.

BEST: Of five Heb originals the chief is בּוֹדֵד, "good," expressing quality, character. Various used of objects pleasing to the senses, feelings, mind, moral sense, e.g. "best of the land" (Gen 47 6); "of sheep" (1 S 15 9); it being an object to whom they think best" (Nu 36 6); of abode, "where it liketh [RV "pleasant"] him best" (Dt 23 16).

In Nu 18 12 the revenues of the priests were to be "holy gifts," e.g. the "best of the oil," etc (גּוֹדֵד, בּוֹדֵד, "fat"); also versus 29-30-32, the gifts of the Levites-offering were to be "of all the best," indicating that the richest elements of life were to go into the support and service of the sanctuary. So the "choice [best] fruits" (תֶּרֶם, zimrah, lit. "the song of the land"); a beautifully poetic expression for the most celebrated fruits (Gen 43 11); equally choice is מָפֵטָה, pazas, "separate," the "finest [best] gold," hence "purified" (1 K 10 18).

Used but twice in the NT: (1) of spiritual gifts (πνεύματα, kretation, "better" [RV "greater"]; 1 Cor 12 31); (2) of raiment (πόδια, πρόσωπον, πράσινον), "best robe" (Lk 15 22), of special significance as expressing the Father's lavish love for the repenting and returning sinner.

Dwight M. Pratt

BESTEAD, bés-tëd (בּוֹדֵד, נֶשֶׁב, "caught in a snare," "entraped"; as Judah hard pressed in their own land by the Assyrians (Isa 8 21 AV); Found only here. OE word steden meaning "place," hence "set," "beset"; usually with "ill," "sorely beset." In RV rendered "sore distressed." BESITALLITY, bes-ti-al'-i-ti. See CRIMES.

BESTOW, bés-tō: The seven Heb words rendered by this term variously mean "to put" or "place," "to give," "do," "deposit," as e.g. to locate chariots and horsemen in cities (1 K 10 26); or give a blessing (Ex 32 29). Four Gr words so signify "to give," "to labor," "to feed," "to place around," as σωτώ, σωτάρ, to "stow away goods" (Lk 15 17); or παράστηκα, "gave away" (1 Cor 13 3). The term has richest significance in expressing God's abundant gift of grace and love, δόθη, didōmi (2 Cor 8 1 AV; 1 Jn 3 1).

BETHA, bê'ta (2 S 8 8). See TIBHATH.

BETANE, be'tâ-nê (בְּתַנָּה, Beitânâh): A place named in Jth 1 9, among those to which the messengers of Nebuchadnezzar were sent. From the order in which they are named we should seek for it S. of Jerus. It may be identical with Beilt 'Ainân, about 3 miles N. of Hebron.

BETEN, be'ten (בְּתֵן, be'en; Baitâ, Baitâ): A city of Asher mentioned between Halil and Achshaph (Jesh 19 25). Onom places it S. Rom miles E. of Ptolemais, giving it the name Bethoten. It may be identical with the modern village el-B'ar'eh, but no certainty is possible.

BETH, bâth (;): The second letter of the Heb alphabet. With the daghesh it is transliterated in this dictionary as b, and, without, as bh (=v). It came also to be used for the number two (2) and with the diacesis for 2,000. For name, etc, see ALPHABET; BAVITH.

BETH, beth (in proper names; Gr transliteration in LXX, βῆθ, beth, bith, or beth): This is the Eng.

transliteration for the Heb בֵּית, beth, meaning "house," "tent," "place." It occurs in many compound proper names formed similarly to the method of compounding words in the German language, as shown in the arts. immediately following. Thus we have beth 'anath or 'anath= "house of replies" (Josh 19 38; Jgs 1 33); beth'el="house of God" (Gen 12 8; 13 3), etc. We also find the word in hybrid formations, e.g. Bethb-sarh, Bethphage= Bethphage= "fig house" (Mt 21 1).

BETHABARA, beth-ab'a-ra (בֵּית-בָּארָה, beth 'abharah; בֵּית-בָּארָה, Bethabara, "house of the ford"); According to AV (following TR) the place where John baptized (Jn 1 29). RV (with Tisch, WH following εὐαγγέλιον) reads BETHANY. It is distinguished from the Bethany of Lazarus and his sisters as being "beyond the Jordan." The reading "Bethabara" became current owing to the advocacy of Origen. Various suggestions have been made to explain the readings. G. A. Smith (HGHL) suggests that Bethany ("house of the ship") and Bethabara ("house of the ford") are names for the same place. Bethabara has also been identified with Bethphage, which, however, was probably not on the Jordan but among the streams flowing into it (Jgs 7 24). It is interesting to note that LXXβ reads Baitahabara for MT בֵּית-בָּארָה, one of the cities of Benjamin (Josh 18 22). If this be correct, the site is in Judaea.

Another solution is sought in the idea of a corruption of the original name into Bethany and Bethabara, the name having the consonants s, b and r after Beth. In Josh 13 27 (LXXβ) we find Baitahabara for Bethnimrah (MT), and Sir George Grove in DB (arts. "Bethabara" and "Bethnimrah") identifies Bethabara and Beth-nimrah. The site of the latter was a few miles above Jericho (see BETH-NIMRAH), "immediately accessible to Jerus and all Judaea" (cf Mt 3 5; Mk 1 5, and see art. "Bethany" in EB). This view has much in its favor.

Then, again, as Dr. G. Frederick Wright observes: "The traditional site is at the ford east of Jericho; but as according to Jn 1 29.35.43 it was only one day's journey from Cana of Galilee, while according to Jn 10 40; 11 36.17 it was two or three days from Bethany, it must have been well up the river toward Galilee. Conder discov-BETHANY, beth'a-ni (בֶּתַּנִּיא, Bithanai): (1) A village, 15 furlongs from Jerus (Jn 11 18), on the road to Jericho, at the Mount of Olives (Mk 11 1; Lk 19 29), where lived "Simon the leper" (Mk 14 3) and Mary, Martha and Lazarus (Jn 11 18 f). This village may justifiably be called the Judaean home of Jesus, as He appears to have preferred to lodge there rather than in Jerus itself (Mt 21 17; Mk 11 11). Here occurred the incident of the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11) and the feast at the house of Simon (Mt 26 1-13; Mk 14 3-9; Lk 7 36-50; Jn 12 1-8). The Ascension as recorded in Lk 24 50-51 is thus described: "He led them out until they were over against Bethany: and he lifted up his hands, and blessed them. And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he parted from them, and was carried up into heaven." Bethany is today el'Azar'eyeh ("the place of Lazarus")—the L being displaced to form the art.). It is a miserably untidy and tumble-down village facing E. on the S.E. slope of the Mount of Olives, upon the carriage road to Jericho. A fair number of fig, almond and olive trees surround the houses. The traditional tomb of Lazarus is shown and there are some remains of mediaeval buildings, besides rock-cut tombs of much earlier date (PEF, III, 27, Sheet XVII).

(2) "Bethany beyond the Jordan" (Jn 1:28; A.V. BETHABARA; בֵּיתָבָּרָה; BETHABARAD, a reading against the majority of the MSS, supported by Origen on geographical grounds): No such place is known. Grove suggested that the place intended is BETH-NIMRAH (which see), the modern Tell nimrin, a singularly suitable place, but hard to fit in with Jn 1:28, sq. 21. The traditional site is the ford E. of Jericho.

BETH-ARABAH, beth-ar'as-ba (בְּיתָ-אָרָבָּה, bēth hâ'-arâḇâh; Bâthârabâd, Bithabarad, "place of the Arabah").

(1) One of the 6 cities of Judah "in the wilderness" (Jos 15:61), on the borders of Benjamin and Judah (Jos 15:6; 18:1 LXX). "The wilderness of Judah" is the barren land W. of the Dead Sea. Beth-arabah is not yet identified.

(2) One of the cities of Benjamin (Jos 18:22). LXX reads Bithabarada, and this may be correct. The names are easily confounded. See Bethabara.

Betharam, beth-ar'am (בְּיתָר-אָם, bēth hārām). See Beth-ar'am.

BETH-ARBEL, beth-ar'bel (בְּיתָ-אָרֶבֶל, bēth 'arēḇel): The scene of a terrific disaster inflicted on the inhabitants by Shalman (Hos 10:14). If the place intended was in Pal, and was not the famous city of that name on the Ephrathes, then probably it should be identified either with Irbîd (or Irbid) in Galilee, or with Irbid, which corresponds to Arhaba of the Onom. E. of the Jordan, about 12 miles S.E. of Gadara. If, as Schrader thinks (COT, II, 140), Shalman stands for the Moabite king, Shalmanu, a tributary of Tiglath-pileser, the eastern town would be the more natural identification. Possibly however the reference is to Shalmaneser III or IV. For the Galillean site, see Arbel; see also DB, s.v.

Bethasmoth, beth-az'moth (AV Bezethamos; Baathgarb, Baithasmoth [1 Esd 5:18]; corresponds to Beth-mazveth in Neh 7:28): A town in the territory of Benjamin, and may be identified with the modern el-Harem. See Ezemveth.

Beth-Azveth, beth-as'matheth (Neh 7:28). See Ezemveth.

Beth-Babah, beth-bâ'ra (בְּיתָ-בָּרָה, bēth hârâh; Bâthârah, Bithârahêd): Perhaps Beth-dârahûrâ, the guttural being lost in copying. It is a ford which the Midianites were expected to pass in fleeing from Gideon. Messengers were therefore sent by Gideon to the Ephrámites bidding them "takl before them the waters," as far as Beth-babal, even (RVm 'and also') the Jordan" (Jgs 7:24). "The waters" were the streams emptying themselves into the Jordan: "even the Jordan is a goss on 'the waters." Between the Jordan and the modern Wady Fârâh an enemy could be entraped; it is therefore probable that Beth-babal was on that stream near its entrance into the Jordan. See Bethabara.

Bethbas, beth-bâ'si (Baathâri, Baitbasî): The name may mean 'place of marshes'; Heb bâth-be't. According to G. A. Smith there is a place Wady el-Bassah E. of Tekoa in the wilderness of Judæa. The name means "marsh," which Dr. Smith thinks impossible, and really "an echo of an ancient name." Jonathan and Simon repaired the ruins of the fortified place 'in the desert' (1 Mac 9:62-64). Jos reads Bethalaga, i.e. Beth-hoglah (Ant. XIII, i, 5). Pesh VS reads Beth-Yarah (see Eshemânâh), which Dr. Cheyne thinks is probably correct. Thus the origin of the name and the site of the town are merely conjectural.

Beth-Biri, beth-bi'rî (AV Beth-birei, beth-bè'rî [בְּיתָ-בִּרֵי]; iôsîs Bēthâria, iôsîs Bomunsofri, iôsîs Brounsoucra; 1 Ch 4:31 [called in Josh 18:6, Beth-leboath, "abode of lions"]; i.e. a site belonging to Simon in the Negeb—unidentified.

Beth-Car, beth-kâr (בְּיתָ-כָּר, bēth-kâr; Bâth-chôr, Bâlchôr, Belchôr): "And the men of Israel went out against Mizpah, and pursued the Philistines until they came to a ford, near the city, which is called Beth-Dajan, about six miles S.E. of Jaffa. This however is a modern site, and not in the Shephelah. Nearly 2 miles to the south is Khirbet Dajân, a Rom site. The connection in which it occurs leads us to expect a position farther S.E.

(2) A city on the border of Asher (Jos 19:27) which Conder would identify with Tell D'auk, near the mouth of the Belus, in the plain of Acre.

The name seems to have been of frequent occurrence. There is a Beth Dejan about 6 miles E. of Nablus, and Jos speaks of a fortress called Dagon above Jericho (Ant. XII, viii, 1; BJ, I, i, 3). This would seem to indicate a widespread worship of Dagon. But the name may mean 'house of corn.'

Beth-diblathaim, beth-dib-la-thî'îm (בְּיתָ-דִּבְלָתָהִים, bēth diblahâthîym; iôsîs Bēthâlamâth, iôsîs Debâlamâth, lit. 'house of D.'): A town in Moab mentioned with Dibon and Nebo (Jer 48:22). It is probably identical with Almon-diblathaim (Nu 33:46). Mesha claims to have fortified it along with Mechedeba and Baal-me'ôn (see Moabite Stone). The place is not yet identified.

Beth-Eden, beth'-ê'den (Am 1:5 AVm; EV 'house of Eden'). See Children of Eden.

Bethel, beth'-êl (בְּיתָל, bēth-ēl; Bâthâl, Baithil and iôsîs Be'tûl, iôsîs thô'ûl, lit. 'house of God'): (1) A town near the place where Abraham halted and offered sacrifice on his way south from Shechem. It lay W. of Ai (Gen 12:8). It is named as on the northern border of Benjamin (Josh 19:41). It may be represented by the modern Beth Djan, about 6 miles S.E. of Jaffa. This however is a modern site, and not in the Shephelah. Nearly 2 miles to the south is Khirbet Dajân, a Rom site. The connection in which it occurs leads us to expect a position farther S.E.

road to Neapolis. It is represented by the modern Beitin, a village of some 400 inhabitants, which stands on a knoll E. of the road to Nablus. There are four springs which yield supplies of good water. In ancient times these were supplemented by a reservoir hewn in the rock S. of the town. The surrounding country is bleak and barren, the hills being marked by a succession of stony terraces, which may have suggested the form of the ladder in Jacob's famous dream.

Bethel.

The town was originally called Luz (Gen 28 19, etc). When Jacob came hither on his way to Padan-aram we are told that he lighted upon "the place" (Gen 28 11, Sanctuary Heb). The Heb makkôn, like the cognate Arab. makâm, denotes a sacred place or sanctuary. The makkôn was doubtless that at which Abraham had sacrificed, E. of the town. In the morning Jacob set up "for a pillar" the stone which had served as his pillow (Gen 28 18; see Pillar—maqşebâhâ), poured oil upon it and called the name of the place Bethel, "house of God"; that is, of God whose epiphany was for him associated with the pillar. This spot became a center of great interest, lending growing importance to the town. In process of time the name Luz disappeared, giving place to that of the adjoining sanctuary, town and sanctuary being identified. Jacob revisited the place on his return from Padan-aram; here Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, died and was buried under "the oak" (Gen 35 6 f). Probably on rising ground E. of Bethel Abraham and Lot stood to view the uninviting highlands and the rich lands of the Jordan valley (Gen 13 9 f).

Bethel was a royal city of the Canaanites (Josh 12 16). It appears to have been captured by Joshua (8 7), and it was allotted to Benjamin (Josh 18 22). In Jgs 1 22 ff it is represented as held by Canaanites, from whom the house of Joseph took it by treachery (cf 1 Ch 7 28). Hither the ark was brought from Gilgal (Jgs 3 1 LXX). Israel came to Bethel to consult the Divine oracle (30 18), and it became an important center of worship (1 S 10 3). The home of the prophetess Deborah was not far off (Jgs 4 5). Samuel visited Bethel on circuit, judging Israel (1 S 7 10).

With the disruption of the kingdom came Bethel's greatest period of splendor and significance. To counteract the influence of Jerus as the national religious center Jeroboam embarked on the policy which won for him the unenviable reputation of having "made Israel to sin." Here he erected a temple, set up an image, the golden calf, and established an imposing ritual. It became the royal sanctuary and the religious center of his kingdom (1 K 12 29 f; Am 7 13). He placed in Bethel the priests of the high places which he had made (1 K 12 32). To Bethel came the men of Judah in loom against Jeroboam (1 K 13), and who, having been seduced from duty by an aged prophet in Bethel, was slain by a lion. According to the prophets Amos and Hosea the splendid idolatries of Bethel were accompanied by terrible moral and religious degradation. Against the place they launched the most scathing denunciations, declaring the vengeance such things must entail (Am 3 14; 4 4; 6 11m; 9 1; Hos 4 15; 5 8; 10 5.8.13). With the latter the name Bethel gives place in mockery to Beth-aven. Bethel shared in the downfall of Samaria brought by the Assyrians; and according to an old tradition, Shalmaneser possessed himself of the golden calf (cf Jer 46 15). The priest, sent by the Assyrians to teach the people whom they had settled in the land how to serve Jh, dwelt in Bethel (2 K 17 28). King Josiah completed the demolition of the sanctuary at Bethel, destroying all the instruments of idolatry, and burying the tombs of the idolaters. The monument of the man of God from Judah he allowed to stand (2 K 23 4.15). The men of Bethel were among those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2 28; Neh 7 32), and it is mentioned as reoccupied by the Benjaminites (Neh 11 31). Zechariah (7 2) records the coming of certain men from Jerus in the 4th year of King Darius to inquire regarding particular religious practices. Bethel was one of the towns fortified by Bachiades in the time of the Maccabees (1 Mac 9 17, 18, 26). It was again as a small town which, along with Ephraim, was taken by Vespasian as he approached Jerus (BJ, IV, ix, 9).

(2) A city in Judah which in 1 S 30 27 is called Bethel; in Josh 19 4 Bethul; and in 1 Ch 4 30 Bethuel. The site has not been identified. In Josh 15 30 LXX gives Baithel in Judah, where the Heb has Kêsil probably a scribal error.

Bethelite, bethel-ite: The term applied to a man who in the days of Ahab rebuilt Jericho (1 K 16 34). See Hriel.

Bethel, Mount (בֵּית־אֵל, har bêt-hîl; בֵּית־אֵל, Baithel loisâ, Baithîl loisâ [1 S 13 2, RV "the mount of Bethel"; Josh 16 1]): The hill which stretches from the N. of the town to Tell 'Ajûr. The road to Shechem lies along the ridge. An army in possession of these heights easily commanded the route from north to south.

Beth-emek, beth-emek (בֵּית־אֵמֶק, bêt-hâ-emêk; בֵּיתאֵמֶק, Bîthâemék, "house of the valley"): A town in the territory of Zebulun (Josh 19 37). It has not been identified, but must be sought somewhere E. of Acre, not far from Kâbal, the ancient Cabul.

Bether, bêther (בֵּית, bêther): In Cant 2 17 mention is made of "the mountains of Bether." It is doubtful if a proper name is intended. The RVm has, "perhaps, the spice malabatleon." A Bether is prominent in late Jewish history as the place where the Jews resisted Hadrian under Bar Cochba in 135 AD. Its identity with Bîthâ, 7 miles S.W. of Jerus, is attested by an inscription.

Bethesda, bê-thez-dâ (בֵּיתָשָׁד, Bethesdâ; TR, Jn 5 2 [probably יֵשׁוּד, bêt-hîshed, "house of mercy"]; other forms occur as Bîthâsha and Bîthashâ): (1) The only data we have is the statement in Jn 5 2-4: "Now there is in Jerus by the sheep gate a pool, which is called in Hebrew Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a multitude of them that were sick, blind, halt, withered. Many ancient authorities add (as in RVm) "waiting for the moving of the water: for an angel of the Lord went down at certain seasons into the pool, and troubled the water," etc.

The name does not help as to the site, no such name occurs elsewhere in Jerusalem, the mention of the sheep gate is of little assistance because the word "gate" is supplied, and even 2. The Traditional Site 55 ft. long x 12 ft. broad, and is approached by a steep and winding flight of steps. The floor of the rediscovered early Christian church roofs over the pool, being supported upon five arches in commemoration of the five porches. At the western end of the church, where probably the font was situated, there was a frass, now much defaced and fast fading, representing the angel troubling the waters.

(3) Although public opinion supports this site, there is much to be said for the proposal, promulgated by Robinson and supported by Conder and other good authorities, that the pool was at the "Virgin's Site" (see Gihon), which is today an intermittent spring whose "troubled" waters are still visited by Jews for purposes of cure. As the only source of "living water" near Jerusalem, it is a likely spot for there to have been a "sheep pool" or "sheep place" for the vast flocks of sheep coming to Jerusalem in connection with the temple ritual. See BW, XXX, 80 ff.

BETH-EZEL, beth-e'zel (בָּיתָאֵל, bêt-hé'ēl), beth hā'-ēl; oikos οἰκῶν ἀετῆς, oikos ecodynamōn autēs; lit. "adjointing house"); A place named along with other cities of the Philistines (Mic 1:10). The site has not been identified. By some it is thought to be the same as Azel of Zec 14:5; but see Azel.

BETH-GADER, beth-gā'där (בָּיתָגָדָר, bēth-gādâr; בָּית-גדָר, bēth-gādār; בָּית-גָּדוֹד, bēth-gādōd): The name occurs between those of Bethlehem and Kirjath-jearim in 1 Ch 2:51. It is possibly identical with Geder of Josh 12:13.

BETH-GAMUL, beth-gā'mul (בָּית-גָּמֵּל, bēth-gāmēl; oikos Γαμώλ, oikos Gamōl; S. Gamolak, Gamolā): A city in Moab named with Dibon, Kirjathaim and Beth-meon (Jer 48:23). Conder places it at Umm el-Jamāl, toward E. of the plateau, S. of Medeba (MBB, a.v.). Others (Gath, Kurz, bib. Witterbach, a.v.; Buhl, GAP, 288, etc.) favor Jemiel, a site 6 miles E. of Dhibbōn. Since the town is not mentioned among the cities of Israel Buhl doubts if it should be sought N. of the Arnon.

BETH-HACCHEREM, beth-ha-kē'rem, beth-hakkē'rem (AV Beth-haccherem; בֵּית-הָכָהְרֵם, bēth-hē-kārēm; Βηθαχχαρέμ, Bithachcharam; see DB), "place of the vineyard"): A district (in Neh 3:14) ruled over by one, Malchijah; mentioned in Jer 6:1 as a suitable signal station. From its association with Tekoa (Jer 6:1) and from the statement by Jerome that it was a village which he could see daily from Bethlehem, the Frank mountain (Herodium) has been suggested. It certainly would be a unique place for a beacon. More suitable is the fertile vineyard country around 'Ain Karem (the "spring of the vineyard"). On the top of Jebel 'Ain, above this village, there are some remarkable cairns which, whatever their other uses, would appear to have been once beacons. 'Ain Kārem appears as Carem in the LXX (Jos 15:50). See Beth-carr. E. W. G. Masterman

BETH-HAGGAN, beth-hag'gan (בָּית-הָגָּן, bēth-hā-gān, "house of the garden"). The place where Ahaziah was slain by Jehu (2 K 9:27). The words are rendered in RV "the garden house," but some take them to be a proper name. The location is doubtful.

BETH-HANAN, beth-hā'nan (1 K 4:9), ELON-BETH-HANAN. See Elon.
BETH-HARAM, beth-hârâm (בְּתֵי חָרָם, bêth hârâm), Beth-haran; Bethâphaph, Batthârân; A, Bethâphâ, Batthârâd; AV wrongly, Beth-Aram: An Amorite city taken and fortified by the Gadites (Josh 13:27; Nu 32:36; in the latter passage the name appears as Beth-haran perhaps the original form). It corresponds to Bethramphtha of Jos (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1), which, according to Eusebius, was the name used by the Syrians. Here was a palace of Herod (Ant, XVII, x, 6; BJ, II, iv, 2). Onom says it was called Liviana; Jos says it was fortified by Herod Antipas, who called it Julias for the wife of Augustus (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1). The name would be changed to Julias when Livia, by the will of the emperor, was received into the Gens Julia. It is represented by Tell er-Raneke in Wady Ḥesbân, about 6 miles E. of Jordan. W. EWING

BETH-HARAN, beth-hârăn (בְּתֵי הָרָן, bêth hârân): A fenced city E. of the Jordan (Nu 32:36) identical with Beth-haram, which see.

BETH-HOGLAH, beth-hogÅ la (בְּתֵי חֹגוֹלָה, bêth-hogÅ lah; LXX Bâthgulhâm, Bâathgulham, “house of partridge”): Mentioned in Josh 16:6; 18:19, identified with Ain Hajlah (“partridge spring”) lying between Jericho and the Jordan, where in 1574 a ruined Greek monastery called Kasr Hajlah, dating from the 12th cent. The ruins are now destroyed. In Josh 16:5; 18:19 it is said to be at the mouth of the Jordan on a Tongue (Isâhān) of the Salt Sea. But it is now several miles inland, probably because the Jordan has silted up a delta to that extent. See DEAD SEA.

BETH-HORON, beth-hôrôn (בְּתֵי הֹרֹן, bêth-hôrôn [other Heb forms occur]; Bethâphaph, Bethôrân, probably the “place of the hollow”; cf Hauran, the hollow): The ancient city on the plateau of Jordan from about 20 miles N.E. of its present course. In this position it was the key of the Jordan valley, and there were here strongholds.

1. The Ancient Towns: Benjamin and Ephraim passed by the Beth- horons (Josh 16:6; 21:22), the cities belonging to the tribe and therefore, later on, to the Northern Kingdom; Solomon “built Bethhoron the Upper, and Bethhoron the Lower,” and fortified cities, with walls, gates, and bars” (2 Ch 8:5; 1 K 9:17).

... From Egyptian sources (Müller, As. und Europa, etc.) it appears that Beth-horôn was one of the places conquered by Shishak of Egypt from Rehoboam. Again, many cents. later, Baackides repaired Bethhoron, “with high walls, with gates and with bars and in them he set a garrison, that they might work malice upon [. . .]” (1 Mace 9:50,51), and at another time the Jews fortified it against Holofernes (Jtn 4:4,5).

(2) These two towns are now known as Beít Ur el Foka (i.e. “the upper”) and Beít Ur el tahtâ (i.e. “the lower”), two villages crowning hill tops, less than 2 miles apart; the former is some 800 ft. higher than the latter. Today these villages are sunk into insignificance and are off any important lines of communication; but for many cents. the towns occupying their sites dominated one of the most historic roads in history.

(3) When (Josh 10:10) Joshua discomfited the kings of the Amorites “he slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them by the way of the ‘Ascent of Beth-horon.’” When the Philistines were opposing King Saul at Michmash they sent a company of their men to hold “the way of Beth- horon.” This pass ascends from the plain of Ajalon (now Yâlo) and climbs in about 1 1/2 hr. to

3. The Pass Beít Ur el tahtâ (1,210 ft.); it then along the Jordan branches along the ridge, with valleys Beth-horons lying to north and south, and reaches Beít Ur el foka (2,023 ft.), and pursuing the same ridge arrives in another 4½ miles at the plateau to the N. of el Jib (Gibeon). At intervals along this historic route traces of the ancient Rom leaving are visible. It was the great highroad into the heart of the land from the earliest times until about three or four cents. ago. Along this route came Canaanites, Israelites, Phìlìs, Egyptians, Syrians, Romans, Saracens and Crusaders. Since the days of Josua (Josh 10:10) it has frequently been the scene of a rout. Here the Syrian general Seron was defeated by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mace 3:13–24), and six years later Nicanaor, retreating from Jerus., was here defeated and slain (1 Mace 7:39 40; Jos, Ant, XII, x, 5). Along this pass in 66 AD the Rom general Cæsius Gallus was driven in headlong flight before the Jews.

Now the changed direction of the highroad to Jerus. has left the route forsaken and almost forgotten. See PEF, 111, 186; Sh. 1877 VII. E. W. G. MASTERMÄN

BETH-HORON, THE BATTLE OF:

1. The Political Situation. In invading Pal the Israelis were not attacking a single coherent state, but a country occupied by different races and divided, like Greece at a later period, into a number of communities, each consisting practically of but a single city and the cultivated country around it. Thus Joshua met the net results of the destruction of Jericho and Ai without any interference from the other Amorites. The destruction of Jericho gave him full possession of the fertile valley of the Jordan; the taking of Ai opened his way up to the ridge which forms the backbone of the country, and he was able to lead the people unopposed to the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim for the solemn reading of the Law. But when the Israelis returned from this ceremony a significant division showed itself amongst their forces. The Amorites of Jericho and Ai was the most recent conquest, was Beeroth, a small town inhabited by Hivites; and no doubt because in the natural order of events Beeroth might look to be next attacked, the Hivites determined to make terms with Israel. An embassy was therefore sent from Gibeon, their chief city, and Joshua and the Israelis, believing that it came from a distant land not under the Ban, entered into the proposed alliance.

The effect on the political situation was immediately. The Hivites formed a considerable state, relatively speaking; their cities were well placed on the southern highland, and Gibeon, their capital, was one of the most important fortresses of this district, and only 6 miles distant from Jerus., the chief Amorite stronghold. This was recognized at once that, in view of this important defe-tion, it was imperative for them to crush the Gibeonites before the Israelites could unite with them, and this they endeavored to do. The Gibeonites, seeing themselves attacked, sent an urgent message to Joshua, and he at the head of his picked men made a night march up from Gilgal and fell upon the Amorites at Gibeon the next day and put them to flight.

exposed to a great danger, for the Amorites might have caught him before he had gained a footing on the plateau, and have taken him at a complete disadvantage. It was thus that the eleven tribes suffered such terrible loss at the hands of the Benjamites in this very region during the first inter-tribal war, and probably the military significance of the first repulse from Ai was of the

We are not told by which route he marched, but it is significant that the Amorites fled by the way of Beth-horon; that is to say, not toward their own cities, but away from them. A glance at the map shows that this means that Joshua had succeeded in cutting their line of retreat to Jerus. He had probably therefore advanced upon Gibeon from the south, instead of by the obvious route past Ai which he had destroyed and Beeroth with which he was in alliance. But, coming up from Gilgal by the ravines in the neighborhood of Jerus, he was same character; the forces holding the high ground being able to overwhelm their opponents without any fear of reprisals.

It would seem possible, therefore, that Joshua may have repeated, on a larger scale, the tactics he employed in his successful attack upon Ai. He may have sent one force to draw the Amorites away from Gibeon, and when this was safely done, may have led the rest of his army to seize the road to Jerus, and to break up the forces besieging Gibeon. If so, his strategy was successful up to a certain point. He evidently led the Israelites without loss up to Gibeon, crushed the Amorites there, and cut off their retreat toward Jerus. He failed in one thing. In spite of the prodigious efforts which he and his men had made, the greater part of the Amorite army succeeded in escaping him and gained a long start in their flight, toward the northwest, through the two Beth-herons. It was at this point that the incident occurred upon which attention has been chiefly fixed. The Book of Jashar (which seems to have Command 3. Joshua's been a collection of war songs and other ballads) ascribes to Joshua the command:

"Sun, be thou silent upon (be) Gibeon [cf RFm];
And thou, Moon, in (be) the valley of Ajalon.
And the Moon stayed, Until the nation had avenged themselves of their enemies" (Josh 10:12-15).

And the prose narrative continues, "The sun stayed in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day." In these two, the ballad and the prose chronicle, we have several distinct astronomical relations indicated. The sun, the moon, Joshua was associated with Gibeon, and the sun can naturally be associated with a locality in either of two positions: it may be overhead to the observer, in which case he would consider it as being above the place where he himself was standing; or on the other hand, he might see the locality on the skyline and the sun rising or setting just behind it. In the present instance there is no ambiguity, for the chronicle distinctly states that the sun was in "the midst of heaven"; i.e., in the halving of the heaven, that is to say overhead. This is very important because it assures us that Joshua must have been at Gibeon when he spoke, and that it must have been noonday or summer when the sun in southern Pal is only about 8° or 12° from the exact zenith. Next, the moon appeared to be associated with the valley of Ajalon; that is, it must have been low down on the horizon in that direction, and since Ajalon is N.W. of Gibeon it must have been about to set, which would imply that it was about half full, in its "third quarter," the sun being, as we have seen, on the meridian. Thirdly, "the sun hasted not to go down," that is to say, it had already attained the meridian, its culmination; and henceforward its motion was downward. The statement that it was noonday is here implicitly repeated, but a further detail is added. The going down of the sun appeared to be slow. This is the work of the afternoon, that is of half the day, but on this occasion the half-day appeared equal in length to an ordinary whole day. There is therefore no question at all of the sun becoming stationary in the sky: the statement does not admit of that, but only of its slower progress.

The idea that the sun was fixed in the sky, in other words, that the earth ceased for a time to rotate on its axis, has arisen from the unfortunate rendering of the Heb vb. "be silent," by "stand thou, the Sun still." It is our own poetic "dumb," both being onomatopoetic words from the sound made when a man firmly closes his lips upon his speech. The primary meaning of the word therefore is "to be silent," but its secondary meaning is "to desist," "to cease," and therefore in some cases "to stand still."

From what was it then that Joshua wished the sun to cease: from its moving or from its shining? It is not possible to suppose that, engaged as he was in a desperate battle, he was even so much as thinking of the sun's motion at all. But its shining, its scorching heat, must have been most seriously felt by him. At noon, in high summer, the highland of southern Pal is one of the hottest countries of the world. It is impossible to suppose that Joshua wished the sun to be displaced from its position in the sky. But it must have been distressing his men who had already been 17 hours on foot. A very arduous pursuit lay before them and the enemy not only had a long start but must have been fresher than themselves. The sun's heat therefore must have been a serious hindrance, and Joshua must have desired it to be tempered. And the Lord hearkened to his voice and gave him this and much more. A great hailstorm swept up from the west, bringing with it a sudden lowering of temperature, and no doubt hiding the sun and putting it to "silence." And "Jehovah fought for Israel," for the storm burst with such violence upon the Amorites as they fled down the steep descent between the Beth-herons, that "they were more who died with the hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword" (ver 11). This was the culminating incident of the day, the only such so great a historian. "There was no day like that before it or after it, that Jehovah hearkened unto the voice of a man" (ver 14). It was not the hailstorm in itself nor the veiling of the sun that made the day so memorable. It was that Joshua had spoken, not in prayer or supplication, but in command, as if all Nature was at his disposal, and the Lord had hearkened and had, as it were, obeyed a human voice: an anticipation of the time when a greater Joshua should command even the winds and the sea, and they should obey Him (Mt 8:23-27).

The explanation of the statement that the sun "hasted not to go down about a whole day" is found in ver 10, in which it is stated that the Lord discomfited the Amorites before Israel, "and he slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them by the way of the ascent of Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah." The Israelites were no time-keepers, no clocks or watches, and the only mode of measuring time available to them was the number of miles they marched. Now from Gibeon to Makkedah by the route indicated is some 30 miles, a full day's march for the Israelites. It is possible that, at the end of the campaign, the Israelites on their return found the march from Makkedah to Gibeon heavy work for an entire day. Measured by the only means available to them, that afternoon seemed to be double the ordinary length. The sun had "hasted not to go down about a whole day."

Joshua's reference to the moon in connection with the Valley of Ajalon appears at first sight irrelevant, and has frequently been assumed to be merely inserted to complete the parallelism of the poem. But when examined anatomically it becomes clear that it cannot have independent been inserted haphazard. Joshua must have mentioned the moon because he actually saw it at the moment of speaking. Given that the sun was "in the midst of heaven," above Gibeon, there was only a very restricted arc of the horizon in which the moon could appear in association with a terrestrial object; and from Gibeon, the Valley of Ajalon does lie within that narrow arc. It follows therefore that unless the position assigned to the moon had been obtained from actual observation at the moment, it would in all probability have been an impossible one. The next point is esp. interesting. The ballad does not expressly state whether the sun was upon Gibeon in the sense of being upon it, or only distant from it, and whether the sense of being overhead both to Joshua and to that city. But the moon being above the Valley of Aijalon, it becomes clear that the latter is the only possible solution. The sun and moon cannot both have been setting—though this is the idea that has been generally held, it being supposed that the day was far spent and that Joshua desired it to be prolonged—for then sun and moon would have been close together, and the moon would be invisible. The sun cannot have been setting, and the moon rising: for Aijalon is W. of Gibeon. Nor can the sun have been rising, and the moon setting, since this would imply that the time of year was either about October 30 of our present calendar, or about February 12. The month of February was already past, since the Israelites had kept the Feast of the Passover. October cannot have come; for, since Beeroth, Gibeon and Jerus were so close together, it is certain that the events between the return of the Israelites to Gilgal and the battle of Beth-horon cannot have occurred over several months, but must have occupied only a few days. The poem therefore contains implicitly the same fact that is explicitly stated in the prose narrative—that the sun was overhead—but the one statement cannot, in its entirety, be inferred from the other.

A third point of interest is that the position of the moon gives an indication of the time of the year. The Valley of Aijalon is 17° N. of W. from Gibeon, of which the latitude is 35° N. With those N. and S. details, and assuming the time to be nearly noon, the date must have been about the 21st day of the 4th month of the Jewish calendar, corresponding to July 22 of our present calendar, with a possible uncertainty of one or two days on either side. The sun's declination would then be about 21° N., so that at noon it was within 11° of the zenith. It had risen almost exactly at 5 AM and would set almost exactly at 7 PM. The moon was now about her third quarter, and in N. lat. about 5°. It had risen at 11 o'clock the previous night, and was now at an altitude of under 7°, and within about half an hour of setting. The conditions are not sufficient to fix the year, since from the nature of the lunar-solar cycle there will always be one or two years in each cycle of 19 that will satisfy the conditions of the case, and the date of the Heb invasion of Pal is not known with sufficient certainty to limit the inquiry to any particular cycle.

It will be seen however that the astronomical conditions introduced by the mention of the moon are much more stringent than might have been expected. They supply therefore proof of a high order that the astronomical details, both of the poet and prose chronicle, were derived from actual observation at the time and have been preserved to us unaltered. Each, therefore, supplies a strictly contemporaneous and independent record.

This great occurrence appears to be referred to in one of Scripture—the Prayer of Habakkuk. Here again the rendering of the Eng. VSS is unfortunate, and the passage should stand:

"The sun and moon ceased (to shine) in their habitation; At the light of Thine arrows they waxed dim, And the sheen of Thy spear, Thou didst march through the land in indignation; Thou didst thresh the nations in anger." (Isa 3 11,12).

BETHINK, b-think' (בְּחַנָּה, ḫāthabh 'el lēbh, "to lay to heart," hence "recall to mind"); Anglo-Saxon word used only in seventh petition of Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple. If the people, carried into captivity, because of sin, should "take it to heart," then God (be prayed) would hear and forgive (1 K 8 47; 2 Ch 6 37). A choice illustration of the mental and heart process in reflection, repentance and conversion.

BETH-JESHIMOTH, beth-jesh-i-moth (בְּחַשִׁימְתָּה, bēth ha-jeshimoth); B. Arabic, Haythim; A. Assyr., Assimoth, and other variants (see DB, s.v.). Mentioned as the point in the south from which the camp of Israel stretched to Abelshittim in the plains of Moab (Nu 33 49). In Josh 12 3 the way to Beth-jeshimoth is described as S. of the Arabah, near the Dead Sea. It was in the lot assigned to Ruben (Josh 13 20). At what times and how long it was actually held by Israel we do not know; but it appears in Eze 25 9 as belonging to Moab. It may be indentical with Kūhrêt ex-Süeineh, where there are some ruins and a well, about 3 miles E. of the mouth of the Jordan.

BETH-LE'APRAH, beth-le-'aprah; LXX Ἱξάρα, LXX Ἱξάρα, "house of dust"): The name of a place found only in Mic 1 10. From the connection in which it is placed, it was probably a place of waste and desolation. There seems to be a play upon the name in the sentence, "at Beth le'aprah have I rolled myself in the dust," aprah meaning "dust," and possibly another on Philistines in rolled, יִשְׁרִית, hithpallathith; (see G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, called Minor, in loc.).

BETH-LEBAOTH, beth-le-ba'o-th, beth-leb'a-oth (בְּלֶבַת, bēth lev' bā'/oth; Bāṭṭalbāth, Baitth-albāth, "house of lionsesses"); A town in the territory of Simeon (Josh 19 6). In 1 Ch 4 31 the name is given as Beth-birei; RV Berin-bi'ah (q.v.).

BETHLEHEM, beth-le'hem (בְּלֵת הָעָם, beth-lehem); Bātha‘, Bathlehem, or Beth-lēlah, Bethlehem, "house of David," or possibly "the house of Lakhmū," an Assyr. deity.

I. Bethlehem Judah, or Ephrath or Ephrathah (q.v.) is now Biltlahm (Arab. = "house of meat"); a town of upward of 10,000 inhabitants, 5 miles S. of Jerus and 2,350 ft. above sea level. It occupies an outstanding position upon a spur running from the watershed with deep valleys to the N.E. and S. It is just off the main road to Hebron and the south, but upon the highroad to Tekoa and En-gedi. The position is one of natural strength; it was occupied by a garrison of the Philis in the days of David (2 S 23 14; 1 Ch 11 16), and was fortified by Reheboam (2 Ch 11 6). The surrounding country is fertile, cornfields, fig and olive yards and vineyards abound. Bethlehem is not naturally well supplied with water, the nearest spring is 800 yds. to the S.E.; but for many cents, the "low level aqueduct" from "Solomon's Pools" in the Artas valley, which has here been tunneled through the hill, has been tapped by the inhabitants; there are also many rock-cut cisterns.

In 1 Ch 2 51 Salma, the son of Caleb, is described as the "Founder of Bethlehem." In Gen 35 19; 48 7 it is recorded that Rachel "was 1. Early buried in the way to Ephrath (the same History is Beth-lehem). Tradition points out the site of Rachel's tomb near where the road to Bethlehem leaves the main road. The Levites of the events of Jgs 17, 19 were Bethlehemites. In the list of the towns of Judah the name Bethlehem occurs, in the LXX version only in Josh 15:57.

Ruth, famous chiefly as the ancestress of David, and of the Messiah, settled in Bethlehem with her second husband Boaz, and it is noticeable that from her new home she could view the mountains of Moab, her native land. David himself was the son of that Ephrathite of Bethlehem, whose name was Jesse" (1 S 17:12). To Bethlehem came Samuel to anoint a successor to unworthy Saul (1 S 16:4): "David went to and fro from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem" (1 S 17:15). David's "three mighty men"

2. David, the Bethlehemite, his native land.

Bethlehem, whose name was Jesse" (1 S 17:12). To Bethlehem came Samuel to anoint a successor to unworthy Saul (1 S 16:4): "David went to and fro from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem" (1 S 17:15). David's "three mighty men"

The Shepherd's Field and Field of Boaz.

"break through the host of the Philis, and drew water out of the well of Bethlehem, that was by the gate, and took it, and brought it to David" (2 S 23:14, 16). Tradition still points out the well. From this town came those famous "sons of Zeruiah, David's nephews, whose loyalty and whose ruthless cruelty became at once a protection and a menace to their royal relative: in 2 S 2:32 it is mentioned that one of them, Asahel, was buried "in the sepulchre of his father, which was in Bethlehem.

After the time of David, Bethlehem would appear to have sunk into insignificance. But its future fame is pointed at by Micah (6:5): "But thou, Beth-lemeh Ephrathah, which art little to be among the thousands of Judah, out of thee shall one come forth unto me that is to ruler in Israel; whose going forth are from of old, from everlasting." In the return of the Jews captive Bethlemites re-inhabited the place (Ezr 2:21; Neh 7:26) "men"; 1 Esd 5:7 "sons".

In the NT Bethlehem is mentioned as the birth-place of the Messiah Jesus (Mt 2:1-5; Lk 2:1-15) in consequence of which event occurred Herod's "massacre of the innocents" (Mt 2:8-16). Inasmuch as Herod devastated Bethlehem and set up there a sacred grove to Adonis (Jerome, Ep. ad Paul., viii:3) it is clear that veneration of this spot as the site of the Nativity must go back before 132 AD. Constantine (circa 330) founded a basilica over the cave-stable which tradition pointed out as the scene of the birth, and his church, unchanged in general structure though enlarged by Justinian and frequently adorned, repaired and damaged, remains today the chief attraction of the town. During the Crusades, Bethlehem became of great importance and prosperity; it remained in Christian hands after the overthrow of the Latin kingdom, and at the present day it is in material things one of the most prosperous Christian centers in the Holy Land.

If Bethlehem of Zebulan (Jos 19:15) was probably the home of Ibbaz (523 BC) the high Jewish tradition is in support of (1). See Jos. Ant. V, vii. 13. This is now the small village of Bethlehem, some 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth on the edge of the oak forest. Some antiquities have been found here recently, showing that in earlier days it was a place of some importance. It is now the site of a small German colony. See PEF, I, 270, Sh V.

BETH-LYON, beth-lonian (בֵּית לָיִו, Bāth-le-môn; בֵּית לִי-וֹן, Bāth-lyon): The inhabitants of this city are mentioned as returning with Zerubbabel from Babylon (1 Esd 5:17). It is the city of Bethlehem in Judah, the modern Be'i Lahm (Ezr 2:21).

BETH-MACAH, beth-mä'ka-ka. See Abel-Beth-macaah.

BETH-MARABOTH, beth-mär'aboth (בֵּית מָרָב אֹתָם, bêt ha-Marabbót; בֵּית מָרָב אֹתָה, Bāth-márābōth, Bāth-marāboth, "the house of chariots"). Mentioned along with Hazer-musah, "the station of horses" (Josh 19:5; 1 Ch 4:21) as cities in the Negeb near Ziklag. It is tempting to connect these stations with "the cities for his chariots, and the cities for his horsemen" which Solomon built (1 K 9:19; of 1 K 10:26). The site of Beth-maraboth has not been identified, but Guérin (La Terre Sainte, 215) suggests Khan Yunes, S. W. of Gaza, as a suitable chariot city.

BETH-MEON, beth-me'ôn (בֵּית מֵאֹנ, Bāth-me'on): A city of Moab (Jer 49:22), identical with Baal-meeon (q. v.).

BETH-MERHAK, beth-mër'ka (בֵּית מְרָהָק, bêt ha-marērēk; בֵּית מְרָהָק, Bāth-me-rāk, Bāth-mērkāh, "to the house of chariots"). Mentioned among the Nether isles of the dead (Ezek 26:4). A place mentioned in the account of David's flight from Absalom. No town of this name is known on the route which he followed. Some scholars think the name denotes simply the outermost of the houses of the city.

BETH-MILLO, beth-mil'lo. See Jerusalem.

BETH-NIMRAH, beth-nim'ra (בֵּית נִמְרָא, Bāth-nēmrā, Bāth-nēmrāh, "house of leopard," Nu 32:36, but in ver 3 it is simply Nimrah): In Josh 13:27 the full name appears. In Isa 16:6 the name appears as Nimrim, identified as Tel Nimrin, between Jericho and the mountains on the east, where there is a fountain of large size. The city was assigned to Gad. In the 4th cent. AD it was located as five Roman miles N. of Livia. Eusebius calls it Bethamnaram (SEP, 1, Tel Nimrin).

BETH-PALET, beth-päl'æt. See Beth-pelet.

BETH-PAZZEZ, beth-pæz'æz (בֵּית פָּצֶזֶ, bêt paţez; בֵּית פָּצֶזֶ, Bāth-pāţēz, Beth-pæzet; בֵּית פָּצֶזֶ, Bāth-pāţēz, "house of escape"). A town in the territory of Issachar, named with Gannim and En-haddah (Josh 19:21). The site has not been discovered; it probably lay near the modern Jenin.

BETH-PELET, beth-pe'let (בֵּית פֵּל, bêt pe'let; בֵּית פֵּל, Bāth-pēlēth, "house of escape"); AV Beth-pælet; Josh 15:27; Beth-pelet, AV Neh 11 26). One of the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah toward the border of Edom in the [Negeb] South (Josh 15 21 27). Site unknown.

BETH-Peor, beth-pér' or (בֵּית פֵּר, beth pr'd; סֵפֶּה פִּיְר, sēpha phēr; in Josh (B), Bašphôṣap, Bašthphôṣap, or בֵּית, bēth;): Over against Beth-peor the Israelites were encamped, beyond the Jordan, in the valley, when Moses uttered the speeches recorded in Dt (Dt 3 29; 4 46). "In the valley in the land of Moab against Beth-peor" Moses was buried (Dt 34 6). Beth-peor and the slopes of Pisgah (AV "Asheethphisagah") are mentioned in close connection in Josh 13 20. According to Onom, Beth-peor was situated near Mt. Peor (Fogor) opposite Jericho, 6 miles above Livias. Mt. Peor is the "top" or "head" of Peor (Nu 23 28). Some height commanding a view of the plain E. of the river in the lower Jordan valley is clearly intended, but thus far no identification is possible. "The slopes of Pisgah" are probably the lower slopes of the mountain toward Wady 'Ayātn Māsā. Somewhere N. of this the summit we are in search of may be found. Conder located the site at Minyeh, S. of Wady Jedeideh, and of Pisgah; and would locate Beth-peor at el-Ma'reighāb, "the smeared things," evidently an ancient place of worship, with a stone circle and standing stones, about 4 miles E., on the same ridge. This seems, however, too far S., and more difficult to reach from Shittim than we should gather from Nu 25 1 ff.

BETHPHAGE, beth'fa-jē, beth'fā-jī (from בֶּית פַּאָגָה, bēth pāghāh; בִּתְפַּאָגָה, Bethfagh, Bethphagh, or בּיתפָּאָגָה, Bethphagh; in Aram. "place of young figs"): Near the Mount of Olives and to the road from Jerus. to Jericho; mentioned together with Bethany (Mt 21 1; Mk 11 1; Lk 19 29). The place occurs in several Talmudic passages where it may be inferred that it was near but outside Jerus.; it was at the Sabbathian distance limit E. of Jerus., and was surrounded by some kind of wall. The mediaeval Bethphage was between the summit and Bethany. The site is now inclosed by the Roman Catholics. As regards the Bethphage of the NT, the most probable suggestion was that it occupied the summit itself where Kfr et Tār stands today. This village certainly occupies an ancient site and no other name is known. This is much more probable than the suggestion that the modern Abu Dīs is on the site of Bethphage.

BETH-RAPHA, beth-rā'fa (בֵּית רַפָּה, bēth rāphā; בִּית רַפָּה, bīth rāphā; בִּית דָּוָה, B; בִּית דָּוָה, Baḥtra, Baḥṭra, Baṭḥra, Bathrephah): The name occurs only in the genealogical list in 1 Ch 4 12. It does not seem possible now to associate it with any particular place or clan.

BETH-REHOB, beth-re'hōb (בֵּית רְהֹב, bēth rēḥōb; סֵפֶּה רְהֹב, sēpha rēḥōb): An Aramaean town and district which, along with Zobah and Maacah, assisted Ammon against David (2 Sm 10 18; Rehob). It is probably identical with Rehob (Nu 13 21), the northern limit of the spies' journey. Laish-Dan (probably Tell el-Kadi) was situated near it (Jgs 18 28). The site of the town is unknown. It has been conjecturally identified with Tell Minin, W. of Bethania near Jordan, and with Bethania itself (Thomson, The Land and the Book, 218; Buhl, Geog., 240; Moore, ICC, Jgs, 390).

BETHSAIDA, beth-sā'da (בֵּית סָדָא, Bethsāaida, "house of fishing"): (1) A city E. of the Jordan, in a "desert place" (that is, uncultivated ground used for grazing) at which Jesus miraculously fed the multitude with five loaves and two fishes (Mk 6 32 ff; Lk 9 10). This is doubtless to be identified with the village of Bethsaida in Lower Galonitis which the Tetrarch Philip raised to the rank of a city, called Julia, in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus. It lay near the place where the Jordan enters the Sea of Gennesaret (Ant. XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1, III, x, 7; Vg, 72). This city may be located at Tell el-Tell, a ruined site on the Jordan, on rising ground, fully a mile from the sea. As this is too far from the sea for a fishing village, Schumacher (The Jauān, 246) suggests that el-'Arūq, "a large, completely destroyed site close to the lake, connected in ancient times with el-Tell "by the beautiful roads still visible," may have been the fishing village, and el-Tell the princely residence. He is however inclined to favor el-Mer'ādiyeh, a ruin and winter village of Arab el-Tallāwūtāyeh, which stands on an artificial mound, about a mile and a half from the mouth of the Jordan. It should be noted, however, that the name is in origin radically different from Bethsaida. The substitution of sin for sad is easy; but the insertion of the guttural ws is impossible. No trace of the name Bethsaida has been found in the district; but any one of the sites named would meet the requirements.

To this neighborhood Jesus retired by boat with His disciples to rest awhile. The multitude followed on foot along the northern shore of the lake which would cross the Jordan by the ford at its mouth which is used by foot travelers to this day. The "desert" of the narrative is just the barāṭyah of the Arabs where the animals are driven for pasture. The "green grass" of Mk 6 39, and the "much grass" of Jn 6 10, point to some place in the plain of el-Baṭēqāh, on the rich soil of which the grass is green and plentiful compared with the scanty herbage on the higher slopes.

(2) Bethsaida of Galilee, where dwelt Philip, Andrew, Peter (Jn 1 44; 12 21), and perhaps also James and John. The house of Andrew and Peter seems to have been not far from the synagogue in Capernaum (Mk 8 14; Mk 1 28, etc). Unless they had moved their residence from Bethsaida to Capernaum, of which there is no record, and which for fishermen was unlikely, Bethsaida must have lain close to Capernaum. It may have been the fishing town adjoining the larger city. As in the case of the other Bethsaias, no name has been recovered to guide us to the site. On the rocky promontory, however, E. of Khān Minyeh we find Sheikh 'Ali es-Sayyādīn, "Sheikh Aly of the Fishermen," as the name of a ruined weyke, in which the second element in the name Bethsaida is represented. Near by is the site at 'Āin et-Tābih where many have identified with Bethsaida of Galilee. The warm water from copious springs runs into a little bay of the sea in which fishes congregate in great numbers. This has therefore always been a favorite haunt of fishermen. If Capernaum were at Kfar Kama, some writers think, the slopes of Galilee toward the west would be a natural place for a city. The names of many ancient places have been lost, and others have strayed from their original localities. The absence of any name resembling Bethsaida need not concern us.

Many scholars maintain that all the NT references to Bethsaida apply to one place, viz. Bethsaida Julias. The arguments for and against this view may be summarized as follows.

Bethsaida? (a) Galilee ran right round the lake, including most of the level coastland on the E. Thus Gamala, on the eastern shore, was within the jurisdiction of Jos, who commanded in Galilee (BJ, II, xx, 4). Judas of Gamala (Ant, XVIII, 1) is also called Judas of Galilee (ib, i, 6). If Gamala, far down the eastern shore of the sea, were in Galilee, a fortiori Bethsaida, a town which lay on the very edge of the Jordan, may be described as in Galilee. But Jos makes it plain that Gamala, while added to his jurisdiction, was not in Galilee, but in Gaulonitis (BJ, II, xx, 6). Even if Judas were born in Gamala, and so properly might be called a Gaulonite, he may, like others, have come to be known as belonging to that province in which his active life was spent. "Jesus of Nazareth" was born in Bethlehem. Then Jos explicitly says that Bethsaida was in Lower Gaulonitis (BJ, II, ix, 1). Further, Luke places the country of the Gerasenes on the other side of the sea from Galilee (8:26)—"ante peras Galileaea" ("over against Galilee").

(b) To go to the other side—^eis to pérán ( Mk 6:45)—does not of necessity imply passing from the E. to the W. coast of the lake, since Jos uses the vb. diaperaidó of a passage from Tiberias to Tarichaea (Vita, 59). But (a) this involved a passage from a point on the W. to a point on the S. shore, "crossing over" two considerable bays; whereas if the boat started from any point in el-Bateihah, to which we seem to be limited by the "much grass," and by the definition of the district as belonging to Bethsaida, to sail to et-Tell, it was a matter of coasting not more than a couple of miles, with not too much. (b) No case can be cited where the phrase ^eis to pérán certainly means anything else than "to the other side." (y) Mark says that the boat started to go unto the other side to Bethsaida, while John gives the direction "over them unto Capernaum." (y) It was therefore practically in the same line. Now there is no question that Capernaum was on "the other side," nor is there any suggestion that the boat was driven out of its course; and it is quite obvious that, sailing toward Capernaum, whether at Tell Hûrin or at Khân Minyâ, it would never reach Bethsaida Julias. (8) The present writer is familiar with these waters in both storm and calm. If the boat was taken from any point in el-Bateihah towards et-Tell, no east wind would have distressed the rowers, protected as that part is by the mountains. Therefore it was no contrary wind that carried them toward Capernaum and the "land of Gennesaret." On the other hand, with a wind from the W., such is often experienced, eight or nine hours might easily be occupied in covering the four or five miles from el-Bateihah to the neighborhood of Capernaum.

(c) The words of Mark (6:45), it is suggested (Sunday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 42), have been too freely translated: "apparently at Rome," its author being a native, not of Galilee, but of Jerus. Want of precision on topographical points, therefore, need not surprise us.

But as we have seen above, the "want of precision" must also be attributed to the writer of Jn 617. The agreement of these two favors the strict interpretation. But if the fact that Mark embodies the recollections of Peter, when he heard of the murder of John by Antipas, and would not have sought again the territories of the Galilean so soon after leaving the Medaieval works of travel notice only one Bethsaida. (y) The E. coast of the sea was definitely attached to Galilee in AD 84, and Ptolemy (cir 140) places Julias in Galilee. It is therefore significant that only the Fourth Gospel speaks of "Bethsaida of Galilee." (8) There could hardly have been two Bethsidas so close together.

But: (a) It is not said that Jesus came hither that he might leave the territory of Antipas for that of Philip; and in view of Mk 6:30 ff., and Lk 9:10 ff., the inference from Mt 14:13 that Philip was the author is not warranted. (8) The Bethsaida of mediaeval writers was evidently on the W. of the Jordan. If it lay on the E. it is inconceivable that none of them should have mentioned the river in this connection. (y) If the 4th Gospel was not written until the 2nd cent., then the apostle was not the author; but this is a very precarious assumption. John, writing after AD 94, would hardly have used the phrase "Bethsaida of Galilee" of a place only recently attached to that province, writing, as he was, at a distance from the scene, and recalling the former familiar conditions. (8) In view of the frequent repetition of names in Pal the nearness of the two Bethsidas raises no difficulty. The abundance of fish at each place furnished a good reason for the recurrence of the name.

BETH-SHEAN, beth-shē'an, Beth-shan, beth-shān, or bēth-shān; in Apoc Bāṭerōn or Bēth-rāh, Batheithin or Bethshā: A city in the territory of Issachar assigned to Manasseh, out of which the Canaanites were not driven (Josh 17:11; Jgs 1:27); in the days of Israel's strength they were put to taskwork (Jgs 5:14; 18:9). The remains of the city were therefore practically in the same line. Now there is no question that Capernaum was on "the other side," nor is there any suggestion that the boat was driven out of its course; and it is quite obvious that, sailing toward Capernaum, whether at Tell Hûrin or at Khân Minyâ, it would never reach Bethsaida Julias. BETHSAMOS, beth-sā'mos. See Bethharmon.

BETH-SHEAN, beth-shē'an, Beth-shan, beth-shān, or bēth-shān; in Apoc Bāṭerōn or Bēth-rāh, Batheithin or Bethshā: A city in the territory of Issachar assigned to Manasseh, out of which the Canaanites were not driven (Josh 17:11; Jgs 1:27); in the days of Israel's strength they were put to taskwork (Jgs 5:14; 18:9). The remains of the city were therefore practically in the same line. Now there is no question that Capernaum was on "the other side," nor is there any suggestion that the boat was driven out of its course; and it is quite obvious that, sailing toward Capernaum, whether at Tell Hûrin or at Khân Minyâ, it would never reach Bethsaida Julias. (8) The present writer is familiar with these waters in both storm and calm. If the boat was taken from any point in el-Bateihah towards et-Tell, no east wind would have distressed the rowers, protected as that part is by the mountains. Therefore it was no contrary wind that carried them toward Capernaum and the "land of Gennesaret." On the other hand, with a wind from the W., such is often experienced, eight or nine hours might easily be occupied in covering the four or five miles from el-Bateihah to the neighborhood of Capernaum.
Jordan valley, on the southern side of the stream from 'Ain Jalād. The ruins of the ancient city are found on the plain, and on the great mound where probably stood the Beth-shemesh and the stretch of marsh land to the S. runs the old road from E. to W. up the Vale of Jezreel, uniting in Edrael with the great caravan road from N. to S.

BETH-SHEMESH, beth-shēmesh, beth'shēmesh (בֵּית-שֶׁמֶשׁ, beth-shēmesh; Βηθσάμουσ, Baith-sāmus, "house of the sun"): This name for a place doubtless arose in every instance from the presence of a sanctuary of that name, in accordance with the meaning and origin of the word, it is quite to be expected that there should be several places of this name in Bible lands, and the expectation is not disappointed. Analysis and comparison of the passages in the Bible where a Beth-shemesh is mentioned show four places of this name.

1. Beth-shemesh of Judah, the city mentioned in the description of the border of the territory of Judah (Josh 15:10), which 'went down to B.' This topographical indication "down" puts the place toward the lowlands on the E. or W. side of Pal, but does not indicate which. This point is clearly fixed by the statements of E. W. Kidder, who was the first to fixed the account of the town of the ark by the Phili lords from Ekron (1 S 6 9–19). They returned the ark to Beth-shemesh, the location of which they indicated by the remark that if their affliction was from Jehovah, the king would bear the ark "by the way of his own border." The Philistines lay along the western border of Judah and the location of B. of Judah is thus clearly fixed near the western lowland, close to the border between the territory of Judah and that claimed by the Philistines. This is confirmed by the account of the twelve officers of the commissariat of King Solomon. One of these, the son of Dekar, had a Beth-shemesh in his territory. By excluding the territory assigned to the other eleven officers, the territory of this son of Dekar is found to be in Judah and near the Phili border (1 K 4 9). A Phili attack upon the border-land of Judah testifies to the same effect (2 Ch 28 18). Finally, the battle between Amaziah of Judah and Jehovah of Israel, who "looked one another in the face at Beth-shemesh," puts B. most probably near the border between Judah and Israel, which would locate it near the northern part of the western border of Judah's territory. In the assignment of cities to the Levitees, Judah gave Beth-shemesh with its suburbs (Josh 21 16). It has been identified with a good degree of certainty with the modern 'Ain Shems.

2. Beth-shemesh of Issachar (Josh 19 22), "And the border reached to Tabor, and Shahazumah, and Beth-shemesh; and the境界 out of their Issachar in the eastern part of Issachar's territory. The exact location of the city is not known.

There is no clear indication of the location of this city. Its association with Beth-anath may indicate that they were near each other in the central part of the tribal possession. As at Gezer, another of the cities of the Levites, the Canaanites were not driven out from Beth-shemesh.

A doom is pronounced upon "Beth-shemesh, that is in the land of Egypt" (Jer 41 13). The Seventy identify it with Heliopolis. There is some uncertainty about this identification. If Beth-shemesh, "house of the sun," is here a description of Heliopolis, why does it not also be the site of the sun? If it is a proper name, how does it come that a sanctuary in Egypt is called by a Hebr name? It may be that the large number of Jews in Egypt with Jeramiah gave this Hebr name to Heliopolis for use among themselves, B. being a tr of Egypt Perre as suggested by Griffith. Otherwise, B. cannot have been Heliopolis, but must have been some other, at present unknown, place of Sem worship. This latter view, however, fails to explain the double threat: "He shall also break the pillars of Beth-shemesh, that is in the land of Egypt; and the houses of the gods of Egypt shall he burn with fire" (ib.). If B. were the "house of the sun," then the temple would be destroyed, as would the "pillars" and "houses," but it seems more naturally to be between Beth-shemesh, a Sem place of worship "that is in the land of Egypt" on one hand, and the Egyptian place of worship, "the houses of the gods of Egypt on the other.

But the Seventy lived in Egypt and in their interpretation of this passage were probably guided by accurate knowledge of facts unknown now, such as surviving names, tradition and even written history. Until there is further light on the subject, it is better to accept their interpretation and identify this Beth-shemesh with Heliopolis. See ON.

BETH-SHITTAH, beth-shī'tah (בֵּית-שִׁיתָה, beth ha-shīthāh, "house of the acacia"): A place on the route followed by the Midianites in their flight before Gideon (Jgs 7 22). It is probably identical with the modern Tusha, a village in the Vale of Jezreel, about 6 miles N.W. of Besa'am.

BETHSURA, beth-sū'ra (בֵּית-שׁורי, Bethshura) [1 Macc 4 29, etc], BETHSURON (2 Macc 11 5 RV): The Or form of the name Beth-Zur (q.v.).

BETH-TAPPUH, beth-tap'pū-h (בֵּית-תֶּפַּעַה, beth-tappū'ah; Behsh-thapha'ah, Bethshaphu'ah, "place of apples" [see however Apple]): A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 53), probably near Hebron (of Lament. 10 20 49), possibly the same as Tephah (1 Macc 9 50). The village of Taffah, about 3 miles N.W. of Hebron, is the probable site; it stands on the edge of a high ridge, surrounded by very fruitful gardens; an ancient highroad runs through the village, and there are many old cisterns and caves. (See PEF, XXI, 310, 379, Sh XXI.) E. W. G. Masterman

BETHUEL, bēthū'ēl (בֶּית-יעֵל, beth'ū'ēl; "dweller in God"): A son of Nahor and Milcah, Abrahan's nephew, father of Laban (Gen 24 21 22 25 24 47 50; 25 20; 25 2.5). In the last-named passage, he is surnamed "the Syrian." The only place where he appears as a leading character in the narrative is in connection with Rebekah's betrothal to Isaac; and even here, his son Laban stands out more prominently than he—a fact explainable on the ground of the custom which recognized the right of the brother to take a special interest in the welfare of the sister (cf Gen 34.11.25; 2 S 13 20.22). Ant. 1, xvi, 2 states that Bethuel was dead at this time.

Fritz E. Hirsch

BETHUEL, be-tho'el, beth-o-he'el (בֵּיתוֹל, bethulh), "destroyed of God": A town of Simeon (1 Ch 4 30), the same as Bethul (Josh 19 4), and, probably, as the Bethel of 1 S 30 27.

BETHUL, beth'ul, bethu'l (בְּתֻהל, bethulh): See BETHUEL; CHEHEL.

BETHULIA, be-tho'li-a (בְּתֻהלָה, bethoulah): A town named only in the Book of Jth (4 6; 10 6; 11 7; 12 8; 13 12; 15 8; 16 6 21 15). From these references we gather that it stood beside a valley, lay on rock, at the foot of which was a spring, not far from Jenin; and that it guarded the passes by which an army might march to the S. The site most fully meeting these conditions is Bethul in the Anti-Lebanon. The road of which it stands is sheer from the edge of Merj el-Gharit, on the main highway, some 7 miles S. of Jenin. Other identifications are suggested: Corner favoring Muthlilayye, a little farther north; while the other the article "Bethulia" in E.B. argues for identification with Jerus. W. Ewing

BETH-ZACHARIAS, be-thak-ak-'ri-as (בֵּית-צָחָרָאָס, bethzacharâs): Here Judges Machabaeus (4 2) describes a battle with Antiochus Epiphanes, and his brother Eleazar fell in conflict with an elephant (1 Mac 6 32 ff; AV "Bethazaras"). It was a position of great strength, crowning a promontory which juts out between two deep valleys. It still bears the ancient name with slight change, Beil Zakaria. It lies about 4 miles S.W. of Bethlehem (BR, III, 283 ff; Ant, XII, ix, 4).

BETH-ZUR, be-tho'ar (בֵּיתָיעה, betho-ar; Bād-sūr, Baith-soor, "house of rock"); less probably "house of the god Zur":

(1) Mentioned (Josh 15 58) as near Halhul and Gedor in the hill country of Judah; fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 7). In Neh 3 16 mention is made of the "house of Rechab, the son of half the district of Beth-zur." During the Maccabean wars it (Bethuara) came into great importance (1 Mac 4 29.61; 6 7.26.31.49.50; 9 52; 10 14; 14 65; 14 7.33). Jos describes it as the strongest place in all Judaea (Ant, XIII, v, 6). It was inhabited in the days of Eusebius and Jerome.

(2) It is the ruined site Beit Sūr, near the main road from Jerus to Hebron, and some 4 miles N. of the latter. It's importance lay in its natural strength, on a hilltop dominating the highroad, and also in its guarding the one southerly approach for a hostile army by the Vale of Elah to the Jebusite plateau. The site today is conspicuous from a distance through the presence of a ruined medieval tower. (See PEF, III, 311, Sh XXI).

BETIMES, be-tim'ez: In the sense of "early" is the tr of two Heb words: (1) יָפָה (yapha, "shababah"); a root meaning "to incline the shoulder to a load," hence "to succumb to trials early": (2) יָפָה (yapha, "shabah"); a root meaning "to dawn" in Job 8 5; 24 5, ARV "diligently," and in Ps 13 24, "daughters him betimes."

In the Apoc (Sir 6 36) "betimes" is the tr of ἀρχητος, orthetiוז, lit. "to rise early in the morning," while in Bel ver 10 the same word is tr "betime."

In other cases AV "times" appears as "before the time" (Sir 51 30); "early" (1 Mac 4 52; 11 67); "the morning" (1 Mac 5 30).

BETOLION, be-to'li-on (בְּתוֹלָי, betholây; בּתֹלָל, betholâl; AV Betholus, be-tol'-i-us): A town the people of which to the number of 52 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 21). It corresponds to Bethel in Ezr 2 28.

BETOMESTHAIM, be-to-mes'thâm, AV Be¬tomesthim, be-to'mes'tham (בְּתֹסָטֹה, betosatherineh; בְּתֹסָטָה, betosathâm): A town of the people of which the number of 36, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 21). It may be identical with Betnah, about 3 miles S.W. of es-Salt.

BETRAY, be-tra' (בָּטָר, râmah; παραδίδειμι, paradidômi): In the OT only once (1 Ch 12 17). David warns those who had deserted to him from Saul: "If ye be come to betray me to mine adversaries . . . the God of our fathers look thereon." The same Heb word is elsewhere tr 4ת (beguile) (Gen 29 25; Josh 9 22), "deceive" (1 S 19 17; 28 12; 2 S 19 26; Prov 28 19; Lam 1 19).

In the NT, for paradidômi: 36 times, of the betrayal of Jesus Christ, and only 3 times besides (Mt 24 10; Mk 13 12; Lk 21 16) of kinsmen delivering up one another to prosecution. In these three places RV translates according to the more general meaning, "to deliver up," and also (in Mt 17 22; 20 18; 26 16; Mk 14 10.11; Lk 22 46) where it refers to the delivering up of Jesus. The Revisers' idea was perhaps to retain "betray" only in direct references to Judas' act, but they have not strictly followed that rule. Judas' act was more than to betray, giving a personal fidelity: he did it under circumstances of treachery which modified its character: (a) he took advantage of his intimate relation with Jesus Christ as a disciple to put Him in the hands of His enemies; (b) he did it stealthily by night, and (c) by a kiss, an act which professed affection and friendliness; (d) he did it for money, and (e) he knew that Jesus Christ was innocent of any crime (Mt 27 4).

T. Kees

BETRAYERS, be-tra'ers (παραδόται, prothletai; "betrayers," "traitors"): Stephen charged the Jews with being betrayers of the Righteous One (Acts 7 52) i.e. as having made Judas act on their own; cf Lk 6 16: "Judas Iscariot, who became a traitor"; 2 Tim 3 4, "traitors."

BETROTH, be-troth', be-trouch' (בָּתוֹר, qarah): On betrothal as a social custom see MARRIAGE. Hosea, in his great parable of the prodigal wife, surpassed only by a greater Teacher's parable of the Prodigal Son, uses betrothal as the symbol of Jeh's pledge of His love and favor to penitent Israel (Hos 2 19.20). In Ez 21 8-9 the RV renders "espouse" for the "betroth" of AV, the context implying the actual marriage relation.

As the title indicates, the historical period in the life of Israel extends from the cession of OT prophesy to the beginning of the Christian era.

I. The Period in General.—The Exile left its ineffaceable stamp on Judaism as well as on the Jews. Their return to the land of their fathers was marked by the last rays and the declining sun of prophecy. With Malachi it set. Modern historical criticism has projected some of the canonical books of the Bible far into this post-exile period. Thus Kent (111JF, 1899), following the lead of the German criticism, which all its later leaders, has charted the period between 600 BC, the date of the first captivity, to 160 BC, the beginning of the Hasmonean period of Jewish history, in comparative contemporaneous blocks of double decades. Following the path of Koster, the historical position of Ezr and Neh is inverted, and the former is placed in the period 400–380 BC, contemporaneously with Artaxerxes II; Joel is assigned to the same period; portions of Isa (chs 65–66, 24–27) are placed about 250 BC; Zec is assigned to the period 260–240, and Dnl is shot way down the line into the reign of the Seleucidae, between 200 and 160 BC. Now all this is very striking and no doubt very critical, but the ground of this historical readjustment is wholly subjective, and has the weight only of a hypothetical conjecture. Whatever may be our attitude to the critical hypothesis of the late origin of some of the OT lit., it seems improbable that any portion of it could have reached far into the post-exilic centuries. The interval between the Old and the New Testaments is the dark period in the history of Israel. It stretches itself out over about four centuries, during which time there was neither prophet nor inspired writer in Israel. All we know of it we owe to Jos, to some of the apocryphal books, and to scattered references in Gr and Lat historians. The seat of empire passed over from the East to the West, from Asia to Europe. The Pers Empire collapsed, under the fierce attacks of the Macedonians, and the Gr Empire in turn gave way to the Rom rule.

II. A Glance at Contemporaneous History.—For the better understanding of this period in the history of Israel, it may be well to pause for a moment to glance at the wider field of the history of the world in the cents. Under contemplation, for the words “fulness of time” deal with the all-embracing history of mankind, for whose salvation Christ appeared, and whose every movement led to its realization.

1. The Egyptian Empire

The 29th or Mendesian Dynasty, made place, in 834 BC, for the 30th or Sebennitic Dynasty, which was swallowed up, half a century later, by the Pers Dynasty.

The Macedonian or 32d replaced this in 332 BC, only to give way, a decade later, to the last or 33d, the Ptolemaic Dynasty. The whole history of Egypt in this period was therefore one of endless and swiftly succeeding changes. In the Ptolemaic Dynasty there was a faint revival of the old glory of the past, but the star of empire had set for Egypt, and the mailed hand of Rome finally smote down a civilization whose beginnings are lost in the dim twilight of history. The Cæsarian conquest of 47 BC was followed, 17 years later, by the annexation of Egypt to the new world-power, as a Rom province. Manetho’s history is the one great literary monument of Egypt history in this period. Her priests had been famous for their wisdom, to which Lycurgus and Solon, the Gr legislators, had been attracted, as well as Pythagoras and Plato, the world’s greatest philosophers.

(2) In Greece also the old glory was passing away. Endless wars sapped the strength of the national life. The strength of Athens and Sparta, of Corinth and Thebes had departed, and when about the beginning of our period, in 357 BC, the congress of Gr states was elected to give form to the hegemony of united Greece, the knell of doom sounded for all Gr liberty. First Philip and after him Alexander wiped out the last remnants of this liberty, and Greece became a fighting machine for the conquest of the world, as Hannibal of Carthage was to be of Alexander the Great. But what a galaxy of illustrious names adorn the pages of Gr history, in this period, so dark for Israel! Think of Aristophanes and Hippocrates, of Xenophon and Democritus, of Plato and Apelles, of the liberators, of Aristotle and Praxites and Archimedes, all figuring, amid the decay of Gr liberty, in the 4th and 3d cents. before Christ! Surely if the political glory of Greece had left its mark on the ages, its intellectual brilliancy is their pride.

(3) Rome meanwhile was strengthening herself, by interminable wars, for the great task of world-conquest that lay before her. By the 3. Rome

Lat and Samnite and Punic wars she trained her sons in the art of war, extended her territorial power and made her name dreaded everywhere. Italy and north Africa, Greece and Asia Minor and the northern barbarians were conquered in turn. Her intellectual brilliancy was developed, not only was it refreshed by the influx of knowledge from the East, but it was cultivated as a fashion, but in the cent. immediately preceding the Christian era we find such names as Lucrètius and Hortenius, Cato and Cicero, Salust and Diodorus Siculus, Virgil and Horace. At the close of the period between the Testaments, Rome had become the mistress of the world and every road led to her capital.

(4) In Asia the Pers empire, heir to the civilization and traditions of the great Assyra-Dab world, was fast growing, and was ultimately utterly wiped out by the younger Gr empire and civilization.

In far-away India the old ethnic religion of Brahma a cent. or more before the beginning of our period passed through the reformatory crisis inaugurated by Gautama Buddha or Sakya Mouni, and thus Buddhism, one of the great ethnic religions, was born. Another reformer of the Tauistic faith was Confucius, the sage of China, a contemporary of Buddha, who brought in new concepts of his dualistic world-view. In every sense and in every direction, the period between the Testaments was therefore one of political and intellectual ferment.

III. HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENTS.—As regards Jewish history the period between the Testaments may be divided as follows: (1) The Pers period;
(2) the Alexandrian period; (3) the Egyptian period; (4) the Syrian period; (5) the Maccabean period; (6) the Roman period.

(1) The Persian period extends from the cessation of prophecy to 334 BC. It was in the main uneventful in the history of the Jews, a breathing spell between great national crises, and comparatively little is known about it. The land of Pal was a portion of the Syrian satrapy, while the true government of the Jewish people was semi-theocratic, or rather sacerdotal, under the rule of the high priests, who were responsible to the satrap. Alexander's march was a matter of revenge, because it was the object of all Jewish ambition and it aroused the darkest passions. Thus John, the son of Judas, son of Eliaishib, through the lust of power, killed his brother Jesus, who was a favorite of Bagases, a general of Artaxerxes in command of the district. The guilt of the fratricide was enhanced, because the crime was committed in the temple itself, and before the very altar. A storm of wrath, the only notable one of this period, thereupon swept over Judaea. The Persians occupied Jerus., the temple was defiled, the city laid waste in part, a heavy fine was imposed on the people and a general persecution followed, which lasted for many years (Ant, XI, 7; Kent, H.P., 251). Then as later on, in the many persecutions that followed, the Hellenizer Jews, ever pliable and willing to obey the tyrant of the day, went practically scot free.

(2) The Alexandrian period was very brief, 334-323 BC. It simply covers the periods of the Asiatic and Cyrenean rule of Alexander. Many things had been moving swiftly. The Alexandrian Spartan hegemony, which had been unbroken since the fall of Athens, was now destroyed by the Thebans under Epaminondas, in the great battles of Leuctra and Mantinea. But the new power was soon crushed by Philip of Macedon, who was thereupon chosen general leader by the unwilling Greeks. Persia was the object of Philip's ambition and vengeance, but the dagger of Pausanias (Ant, XI, viii, 1) forestalled the execution of his plans. His son Alexander, a youth of 20 years, succeeded him, and thus the "great he-goat," of which Daniel had spoken (Dan 8:5; 10:20), appeared on the scene. In the twelve years of his reign (323-311 BC) he revolutionized the world. Swift as an eagle he moved. All Greece was laid at his feet. Thence he moved to Asia, where he defeated Darius in the memorable battles of Granicus and Issus. Passing southward, he conquered the Medes and Persia and then moved eastward again, for the complete subjugation of Asia, when he was struck down in the height of his power, at Babylon, in the 33d year of his age. In the Syrian campaign he had come in contact with the Jews. Unwilling to leave any stronghold at his back, he reduced Tyre after a siege of several months, and advancing southward demanded the surrender of Jerusalem. But the Jews, taught by bitter experience, desired to remain loyal to Persia. As Alexander approached the city, Jaddua the high priest, with a train of priests in their official dress, went out to meet him, to supplicate mercy. A previous dream of this occurrence is said to have foreshadowed this event, and Alexander spared the city, sacrificed to Jeh, had the prophecies of Daniel concerning him rehearsed in his hearing, and showed the Jews many favors (Ant, XI, vii, 5). From that day on they became his favorites; he employed them in his army and gave them rights with the Greeks, as citizens of Alexandria, and other cities, which he founded. Thus the strong Hellenistic spirit of the Jews was created, which marked so large a portion of the nation, in the subsequent periods of their history.

(3) The Egyptian period (324-264 BC). The death of Alexander temporarily turned everything into chaos. The empire, welded together by his towering genius, fell apart under four of his generals—

3. The Egyptian Period

Ptolemy, Lysimachus, Cassander, and Seleucus (Dni 8 & 21, 22). Egypt fell to the share of Ptolemy Soter and Judaea was made part of it. At first Ptolemy was harsh in his treatment of the Jews, but later on he learned to respect them and became their patron as Alexander had been. He was kind to his time scholars, who have studied the Jews, through information received from Hezekiah, an Egyptian Jewish immigrant, and to have written a Jewish history from the time of Abraham till his own day. This book, quoted by Jos and Origens, is totally lost. Soter was succeeded by Ptolemy Philadelphus, an enlightened ruler, famous through the erection of the light-house of Pharos, and esp. through the founding of the celebrated Alexandrian library. Like his brother he was very friendly to the Jews, and in his reign the celebrated Gr. of the OT Scriptures, the LXX, was made, according to tradition (Ant, XII, ii). As however the power of the Syrian princes, the Seleucidae, grew, Pal increasingly became the scene of struggle and contention. Events of the decisive battle between Ptolemy Philopator and Antiochus the Great, at Raphnia near Gaza, the latter was crushed and during Philopator's reign Judaea remained an Egyptian province. And yet this battle formed the turning-point of the history of the Jews in their relation to Egypt. For when Ptolemy, drunk with victory, came to Jerusalem, he endeavored to enter the holy of holies of the temple, although he retreated, in confusion, from the holy place. But he wreaked his vengeance on the Jews, for opposing his plan, by a cruel persecution. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of 5 years. The long-planned vengeance of Antiochus now took form in an invasion of Egypt. Coele-Syria and Judaea were occupied by the Syrians and passed over into the possession of the Seleucidae.

(4) The Syrian period (204-166 BC). Israel now entered into the valley of the shadow of death. The Jewish war began, and an uninterrupted martyrdom. Antiochus was succeeded by Seleucus Philopator. But harsh as was their attitude to the Jews, neither of these two was notorious for his cruelty to them. Their successors, as in former periods, were still their nominal rulers. But the aspect of everything changed when Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 BC) came to the throne. He may fitly be called the Nero of Jewish history. The nationalists among the Jews were at that time wrangling with the Hellenists for the control of affairs. Onias III, a faithful high priest, was expelled from office through the machinations of his brother Jason or Jason (2 Macc 4:7-10). Onias went to Egypt, where at Helopolis he built a temple and officiated as high priest. Meanwhile Jason in turn was turned out of the holy office by the bribes of still another brother, Menelaus, worse by far than Jason, a Jew-hater and an avowed defender of Gr. life and morals. The wrangle between the brothers gave the high priest an opportunity he craved to wreak his bitter hatred on the Jews, in the spoliation of Jerusalem, in the wanton and total defilement of the temple, and in a most horrible persecution of the Jews (1 Macc 16:28; 2 Macc 8:6-9; Dni 11:24-31). Thousands were slain, women and children were sold into captivity, the city wall was torn down, all sacrifices ceased, and in the temple on the altar of burnt offering a statue was erected to Jupiter Olympus (1 Mac 1:43; 2 Mac 6:1–2). Circumcision, wine, and the cult of idols were introduced, and all the people of Israel were to be forcibly paganized.

As in the Pers persecution, the Samarians again played into the hands of the Syrians and implicitly obeyed the will of the Seleucids. But the very rigor of the persecution caused it to fail of its purpose and Israel proved to be made of sterner stuff than Antiochus imagined. A priestly family dwelling at Modin, west of Jerus, named Hamon, after one of its ancestors, consisting of Mattathias and his five sons, raised the standard of revolt, which proved successful after a severe struggle. See ASMONAEN.

(5) The Maccabean period (165–63 BC). The slaying of an idolatrous Jew at the very altar was the signal of revolt. The land of Judæa is specially adapted to guerrilla tactics, and Judas Maccabæus, who succeeded his father, as leader of the Jewish patriots, was a past master in this kind of warfare. All efforts of Antiochus to drive the Jews from the temple and to compel them to worship heathen gods were in vain. The war was as difficult for him as for his predecessors, and it was only through the efforts of Mattathias, Judas, and Simon that the nation was saved from complete destruction.

(6) The Roman period (63–4 BC). Judaea now became a Roman province. Hyrcanus, stripped of the hereditary royal power, retained only the high-priestly office. Rome exacted an annual tribute, and Aristobulus and Hyrcanus were forced to appeal to the capital. He turned however to escape and renewed the unequal struggle, in which he was succeeded by his sons Alexander and Antigonus. In the war between Pompey and Caesar, Judaea was temporarily forgotten, but after Caesar's death, under the triumvirate of Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus, Antony, the eastern triumvir, favored Herod the Great, whose intrigues secured for him at last the crown of Judæa and enabled him completely to extinguish the old Maccabean line of Judæan princes.

IV. Internal Developments in This Period.—One thing remains, and that is a review of the developments within the bosom of Judaism itself in the period under consideration. It is quite self-evident that the Jewish people, which remained loyal to the national traditions and to the national faith, must have been radically affected by the terrible cataclysms which mark their history, during the four cents. before Christ. What, if any, was the literary activity of the Jews in this period? What was the result of the manifest difference of opinion within the Jewish economy? What preparation does this period afford for the "fulness of time"? These and other questions present themselves, as we study this period of the history of the Jews.

(1) The voice of prophecy was utterly hushed in this period, but the old literary instinct of the nation asserted itself; it was part and parcel of the Jewish traditions and Activity would not be denied. Thus in this period many writings were produced, which although they lack canonical authority, among Protestants at least, still are extremely helpful for a correct understanding of the life of Israel in the dark ages before Christ.

(a) The Apocrypha.—First of all among the fruits of this literary activity stand the apocryphal books of the OT. It is enough here to mention them. They are fourteen in number: 1 and 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, 2 Maccabees, and Daniel, or at least, parts of them.

(b) Pseudo-Histories.—These are from the spurious character of the authors' names they bear. Two of these writings very probably belong to our period, while a host of them evidently belong to a later date. In this class of writings there is a mute confession of the conscious poverty of the Jews. First of all, we have the Psalter of Solomon, originally written in Heb and tr4 into Gr—a collection of songs for worship, touching in their spirit, and evincing the fact that true faith never died in the heart of the true believer. The second is the Book of Enoch, a production of an apocalyptic nature, named after Enoch the patriarch, and widely known about the beginning of the Christian era. This book is quoted in the NT (Jude ver 14). It was originally written in Heb and translated into Gr. As there is no trace of a Christian influence in the book, the presumption is that the greater part of it was written at an earlier period. Both Jude and the author of Revelation must have known it, as a comparative study of both books will show. The question of these quotations or allusions is a veritable crux interpretum: how to reconcile the inspiration of these books with these quotations?

(c) The Septuagint.—The tradition of the LXX is told by Arno Aristeas and Aristobulus, a priest in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (2 Mac 1:10), are also quoted in support of it by Clement of Alexandria and by Eusebius. See Septuagint. The truth of the matter is most probably that this great tr of the OT Scriptures was begun at the instance of Ptolemy Phila- delphus 285–247 BC, under the direction of Demetrius Phalearenus, and was completed somewhere about the middle of the 2d cent. BC. Internal evidence abundantly shows that the tr was made by different hands and at different times. If the tr was in any way literal, the text of the LXX raises various interesting questions in regard to the Heb text that was used in the tr, as compared with the one we now possess. The LXX also showed a spirit of piety and contributed perhaps more than any other thing to prepare the world for the "fulness of time."

The return from Babylonia marked a turning-point in the spiritual history of the Jews. From that time onward, the lust of idolatry, 2. Spiritual which had marked their whole previous Conditions history, utterly disappears. In the main, there came an almost intolerable spirit of exclusiveness, a striving after legal holiness, these two in combination forming the very heart and core of the later Pharisaism. The holy books, but especially the law, became an object of almost idolatrious reverence; the spirit was utterly lost in the form. And as their own tongue, the classic Heb, gradually gave way to the common Aram., the rabbis and their schools strove ever more earnestly to keep the ancient tongue pure, worship and life each demanding a separate language. Thus the Jews became in a sense bilingual, the Heb tongue being used in their synagogues, the Aram. in their daily life, and later on, in part at least, the Gr tongue of the conqueror, the lingua franca of the period. A spiritual aristocracy very largely replaced the former rule of their princes and nobles.

As the core of their religion died, the bark of the tree flourished. Thus tithes were zealously paid by the believer (cf Mt 23 23), the Sabbath became a positive burden, the spirit of mere law and duty, as God were replaced by cambrons human inventions, in which later times were to form the bulk of the Talm, and which crushed down all spiritual liberty in the days of Christ (Mt 11 28; 23 4-23).

The substitution of the name "Elahim" for the old glorious historic name "Jah-veh" is an eloquent commentary on all that has been said before and on the spiritual condition of Israel in this period (Ewald, H of J, p 198), in which the change was inaugurated. The old centripetal force, the old ideal of centralization, gave way to an almost haughty indifference to the land of promise. The Jews became, as they are today, a nation without a country. For, for every Jew that came back to the old national home, a thousand remained in the land of their adoption. And yet scattered far and wide, in all sorts of environments, they remained Jews, and the national consciousness was never extinguished. It was God's mark on them never to be effaced, and thus they became missionaries of the knowledge of the true God, of a gospel of hope for a world that was hopeless, a gospel which wholly against their own will directed the eyes of the world to the fulness of time and which paved the way of human hearts for the rapid spread of Christianity when it ultimately appeared.

During the Gr period the more conservative and zealous of the Jews were all the time confronted with a tendency of a very considerable 3. Parties portion of the people, especially the younger and wealthier set, to adopt the manners of life and thought and speech of their masters, the Greeks. Thus the Hellenistic party was born, which was bitterly hated by all true- hearted Jews, but which left its mark on their history, till the date of the final dispersion 70 AD. From the day of Mattathias, the Chasids or Hasid- deans (1 Mac 2 42) were the true Jewish patriots. Thus the party of the Pharisees came into existence (Ant, XIII, x; 6; XVIII, i; 2; BJ, i; v; 2). See PHARISEES. They were opposed by the more secular-minded Sadducees (Ant, XIII, x; 5; XVIII, i; 2; BJ, ii, viii, 14), wealthy, of fine social standing, wholly free from the restraints of tradition, unfettered by the spirit of the future, and close akin to the Gr Epicureans. See SADDUCEES. These parties bitterly opposed each other till the very end of the national existence of the Jews in Pal., and incessantly fought for the mastery, through the high-priestly office. Common hatred for Christ, for a while, afforded them a community of interests.

Throughout this entire dark period of Israel's history, God was working out His own Divine plan with them. Their Scriptures were tr1 into Gr, after the conquest of Alex- andry of the Great, the common language for Christianity in the East. Thus they were prepared for the word of God, even as the latter in turn prepared the world for the reception of the gift of God, in the gospel of His Son. The LXX thus is a distinct forward movement in the fulfillment of the Abrahamic promise (Gen 12 3; 18 18). As the sacrificial part of Jewish worship declined, through their wide separation from the temple, the eyes of Israel were more firmly fixed on their Scriptures, read every Sabbath in their synagogues, and, as we have seen, these Scriptures, through the rendering of the LXX, had become the property of the entire world. Thus the synagogue everywhere became the great missionary institute, imparting to the world Israel's exalted Messianic hopes. On the other hand, the Jews themselves, embittered by long-continued martyrdoms and suffering, utterly carnalized this Messianic expectation in an increasing ratio as the yoke of the oppressor grew heavier and the hope of deliverance grew fainter. And thus when their Messiah came, Israel recognized Him not, while the heart-hungry heathen, who through the LXX had become familiar with the promise, humbly received Him (Jn 1 9-14). The eyes of Israel were blinded for a season, 'till the fulness of the Gentiles shall be gathered in' (Rom 9 32; 11 25).

BEULAH, בֵּית הָאָרֶץ, bê’t-hârês, "married"). A name symbolically applied to Israel. "Thy land [shall be] called Beulah, thy land a Bride." (Isa 62 4 f). In this figure, frequently used since Hosea, the prophet wishes to express the future prosperity of Israel. The land once desolate shall again be populated.

BEWAIL, בֵּּאָיוֹל (אֶסוֹרֶא, אַפּוֹתֵי), be-wâl, "bewitch." In the middle voice, this word has the thought of striking on the breast and of loud lamentation, so common among Oriental peoples. The word occurs in the NT, to express the most intense grief, a sorrow that compels outward demonstration (Lk 8 52; 23 27). A striking instance of this grief is that of the daughter of Jephthah (Jgs 11 37; Lev 10 6). See BURIAL, IV, 4, 5; GRIEF.

BEWITH, בֵּּאָוֶיץ (אָבַּיָּה, אָבַּיָּתַּן), be-wîch, (I) "bewitch." (1) There are two Gr words in the NT tr1 "bewitch." The one given above (Acts 8 9 11 AV "bewitched," RV "amazed") has reference to the work of Simon Magus. It means "to be out of one's mind," "to astonish," "to overwhelm with wonder." The other word, pàrakwôs, bâskârâ (Gal 3 1), means "to fascinate by false representation." It is by this means the apostle complains they have been led to accept a teaching wholly contrary to the gospel of Christ. Both these words reveal to us something of the difficulty the early teachers had to eradicate the idea so widely held by the Jews and Egyptians especially, that there were certain powers, dark and mysterious, which by certain occult forces they could control. For a long time this had to be contended with as one of the corrupt practices brought into the church by the converts, both from Judaism and heathenism. The words have reference not to the evil eye which for cents, was, and even today is, an important factor in the life of the people of the East. 2 Tim 6 20 is a reference to this thought and explains the word "science" (AV) as there used. See DIVINATION; EVIL EYE; SORCERY; SUPERSTITION.

BEZANANNIM, bē-zān-an-ānim (Josh 19:33 RVm). See Zaanannim.

BEZAI, bē-zā’îl (םֶבֶזַי, bēsey, “shining”?):
(1) A chief who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh 10:18).
(2) The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (323, Ezra 2:17; 324, Neh 7:23 = Bassai, 1 Esd 5:16).

BEZALEL, bez’ə-lēl (םֵבֶזַל, bezalā’a, “in the shadow [protection] of El [God]”): Besorēl, Bezelēl; AV Bezaleel:
(1) A master workman under Moses; son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah. Jeh gave him especial wisdom and skill for his task, which was, with the aid of Ohliab of the tribe of Dan, to superintend the making of the tabernacle and its furniture (Ex 31:2; 35:30; 36:1.2 (8); 37:1; 38:22; 1 Ch 2:20; 2 Ch 1:5).
(2) An Israelite of the time of Ezra who put away a foreign wife (Ezr 10:30).

BEZER, bē’zər (בֶּזֶר, bēzer; Bēser, Bēzēk, B, Ḫōzer, Abēzer):
(1) The city of Adoni-bezek taken by Judah and Simeon (Jud 19:4), in the area allotted to Judah. It is somewhat doubtfully identified with Bezek, about 3 miles N.E. of Gezer.
(2) The place where Saul marshaled his army before marching to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (1 S 11:8). Onoes speaks of two villages of this name 17 Rom miles from Shechem, on the way to Scythopolis. No doubt Kairūt Ibaek is intended. Here, or on the neighboring height, Rēs Ibaek, a mountain 2,404 ft. above sea level, the army probably assembled. W. Ewing

BEZER, bē’tär (בֶּצֶר, bezer; Bōser, Bosor, “strong”):
(1) A city of refuge, set apart by Moses for the Reubenites and located in the “plain country” (or table-land, Mihārē) of the Jordan, later assigned to this tribe by Joshua (Dt 4:43; Josh 20:8). The same city was assigned by lot as place of residence to the children of Merari of the Levite tribe (Josh 21:36; 1 Ch 6:63-76). Driver, HDD, suggests the identity of B. with Bezerah (LXX Bosor) (Jer 48:24). Bezaih has been suggested as the present site. According to the MS it was fortified by Mesha.
(2) A son of Zophah of the house of Asher (1 Ch 7:37).

BEZETH, bē’zeth (בֶּצֶת, Bezeth): A place in the neighborhood of Jerus to which Baccides withdrew and where he slew several deserters (1 Macc 7:19). Possibly the same as Bezetha (see Jerusalem).

BEZETHA, be’zē-tha: Also called by Jos the “New City” (BJ, V, iv, 2), certain suburbs of Jerus, N. of the Temple, which were outside the second but included within the third wall. Bezeth (q.v.) may be the same place. See Jerusalem.

BEWARY, bē’rē, BEWAYER, bē’rē’á: In its derivation is entirely different from betray (Lat tradere), and meant originally “to disclose,” “reveal” (of Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, II, iv, 3). “Write down the ground, betray thy meaning slowly”; but has been affected by the former word and is used almost synonymously. It is the tr of three Hebr words:
(1) נִּכְרָא, nē’rā‘, meaning “to call out” (Prov 27:16), “the ointment of his right hand which bewrayeth itself” (ARV “his right hand encountereth oil”), “ARV ‘mym” oil” (of his right hand betrayeth itself’);
(2) נָנָגָד, nāgād, meaning “to forefront,” “to announce” (by word of mouth); Prov 29:24, “heareth cursing and bewrayeth it not” (ARV “heareth the adjuration and uttereth nothing”);
(3) נִכְרָא, nē’rā‘, gālād, “to denude,” fig., “to reveal” (Isa 16:3), “bewray not him that wandereth” (ARV “betray not the fugitive”).

In Sir 27:17 “bewray [RV ‘reveal’] his secrets” is the tr of עָרָא מְנִיָּהוֹ, apokalēth, lit. “to uncover”; also in Sir 27:21 (RV ‘revealeth’). Bewayer of 2 Macc 4:1 (“bewarier of the money and of his country,” RV “had given information of the money and had betrayed his country”) is the tr on the Latin word. “Ione” shows.

In the NT “bewrayeth” is the AV of Mt 26:73, “thy speech bewrayeth thee” is the tr of the phrase διὰ τοῦ λόγου, δίὸν ποιεῖν, which the ARV renders “maketh thee known.” A. R. J. Kinsella

BEYOND, bē-yōnd’: Found in the Heb only in its application to space and time, and for these ideas three words are employed: עָלֵיהּ, ‘ālḗhā, “to the distance”; עָלָה, ‘alā, “to go beyond,” “to cross,” derivative עָלָה, ‘alāh (Chal. ‘alēh, ‘alā, “across,” “beyond”); (Dt 30:13; Josh 18:7; Jgs 3:26; 1 S 20:36; 2 Ch 20:2; Ez 4:17; Jer 25:22), and עָלָה, ’al (Lev 15:25) “beyond the time.” In the NT πέραν, pērān, is used to express “beyond” in the spatial sense (Mt 4:15), while other words and phrases are employed for adversal ideas of degree: περιπατέω, huperpásetai (Mc 7:37); νεώπρ, hupér (2 Cor 8:8; 10:16); καθαρσίβολον, katharpsión (Gal 1:13). In the AV עָלַב, ’alāb, “to bewray,” is occasionally tr “beyond,” and when this word is joined to עָלַב, ’alāb, “Jordan,” “as it usually is, it becomes critically important.” ARV עָלַב (or עָלַב), ’alāb, “beyond the Jordan,” in Gen 50:10-11; Dt 3:20-25; Josh 10:10; Jgs 5:17, “on this side Jordan” in Dt 1:15, Josh 1:14:15, “on the other side Jordan” in Dt 11:30; Josh 12:1; 22:4; 24:8 (of AV and RV, vs 14:15; see River, Tiber); Jgs 10:8; 1 S 31:7; and “on the side of Jordan” in Jos 5:1. ARV gives “beyond the Jordan” throughout עָלַב, ’alāb, “to bewray,” is used with עָלַב, ’alāb in Nu 34:15; 35:14; Josh 13:32; Jgs 7:25; and עָלַב, ’alāf, alone in Dt 4:49 (AV “on this side’”); Josh 13:27 (AV “on the other side”). It is clear that the phrase may be tr “across Jordan,” that it is used of either side of the Jordan (Dt 3:8 speaks of the eastern, 3:20-25 of the western); that “beyond Jordan” may be used of the side of the Jordan on which the writer stands (Josh 5:1; 9:1; 12:7); but from the fact that Dt 1:1-3; 4:41; 46:47-49, where statements are made about Moses, the reference is to the country E. of the Jordan, while in Dt 3:20-25; 11:30, where Moses is represented as speaking, the W. is indicated, critics have concluded that the author (at least of Dt) must have lived after Moses, being careful to distinguish between himself and the prophet.

LITERATURE

This word designates the collection of the Scriptures of the OT and NT recognized and in use in the Christian churches. Different religious denominations (such as the Zoroastrian, Hindu, Buddhist, Mohammedan) have their collections of sacred writings, sometimes spoken of as their "Bibles." The Jews acknowledge only the Scriptures of the OT; Christians add the writings contained in the NT. The present art. deals with the origin, character, contents and purpose of the Christian Scriptures, regarded as the depository and authoritative record of God's revelations of Himself and of His will to the fathers by the prophets, and through His Son, the church of a later age (He 1 12). Reference is made throughout to the arts, in which the several topics are more fully treated.

1. THE NAMES. —The word "Bible" is the equivalent of the Greek word biblia (dim. from biblos, the inner bark of the papyrus), meaning originally "books." The phrase "the books" (ta biblia) occurs in Dn 9 2 (LXX) for prophetic writings. In the Prologue to Sir ("the rest of the books") it designates generally the OT Scriptures, similarly in 1 Mace 12 9 ("the holy books"). The usage passed into the Christian church for OT (2 Clem 14 2), and by and by (cir 5th cent.) was extended to the whole Scriptures. Jerome's name for the Bible (4th cent.) was "the Divine Library" (bibliotheca Divina). Afterward came an important change from pl. to sin. meaning. In process of time this name, with many others of Gr origin, passed into the vocabulary of the western church; and in the 13th cent., by a happy synon., the new, pl. came to be regarded as a fem. sing., and 'The Books' became by common consent 'The Book' (biblia, sing.), in which form the word was passed into the languages of modern Europe (Westcott, Bible in the Church, 5). Its earliest occurrences in Eng. are in Piers Plowman, Chaucer and Wycliffe.

There is naturally no name in the NT for the complete body of Scripture; the only Scriptures then known being those of the OT. In 2 Pet 3 16, however, Paul's epithets seem brought under this category.

2. Other
   - (2) Designations—The common designations for the Scriptures, OT books by Our Lord and His apostles were "the scriptures" (writings) (Mt 23 2; Mk 12 29; Lk 24 25; 1 Cor 14 21. 26; 2 Th 2 15). Paul uses the phrase "the oracles of God" as a name for the OT Scriptures (Rom 3 2; cf Acts 7 38; He 12 1; 1 Pet 4 11). Special interest attaches to the names "Old" and "New Testament," now and since the close of the 2d cent. in common use to distinguish the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures. "Testament" (lit. "a will") is used in the NT (AV) to represent the Gr diaideth, in classical usage also "a will," but in the LXX and NT employed to translate the Heb brith, "a covenant." In RV, accordingly, "testament" is, with two exceptions (He 9 16), changed to "covenant" (Mt 26 28; 2 Cor 3 6; Gal 3 15; He 7 22; 9 15, etc). Applied to the Scriptures, therefore, "Old" and "New Testament" mean, strictly, "Old" and "New Covenant," though the older usage is now too firmly fixed to be altered. The name is a continuation of the OT designation for the law, "the book of the covenant" (2 K 23 2). In this sense Paul applies it (2 Cor 3 14) to the OT law; "the reading of the old testament" (RV "Covenant"). When, after the middle of the 2d cent., a definite collection began to be made among the Christian writings, these were named "the New Testament," and were placed as of equal authority alongside the "Old." The name Novum Testamentum (also Instrumentum) occurs first in Tertullian (190-220 AD), and soon came into general use. The idea of a Christian Bible may be said to be complete.

II. LANGUAGES. —The OT, it is well known, is written mostly in Heb; the NT is written wholly in Gr. The parts of the OT in Heb, viz., Ex 4 8 - 6 18; 7 8 - 26; Jer 10 11 - 28; Dn 3 7-29, are in Aram. (the so-called Chaldee), a related dialect, which, after the Exile, gradually displaced Heb as the spoken language of the Jews (see ARAMAIC; LANGUAGE AND TEXT OF OT). The ancient Heb text was "unpointed," i.e., without the vowel-marks now in use. These are due to the labors of the Massoretic scholars (after 6th cent. AD).

The Gr of the NT, on which so much light has recently been thrown by the labors of Deissmann and others from the Egyp papyrus, showing it to be a form of the "common" (Heb hodos) of the time (see LANGUAGE OF NT), still remains, from its penetration by Heb ideas, the influence of the LXX, peculiarities of training and culture in the writers, above all, the vitalizing and transforming power of Christian conceptions in vocabulary and exposition, a study by itself. "We speak," the apostle
The story of the origin, collection, and final stamping with canonical authority of the books which compose our present Bible involves many points still keenly in dispute. Before touching on these debatable matters, certain more external facts fail to be noticed relating to the general structure and content of the Bible, and the main divisions of its contents.

A first step is to ascertain the character and contents of the Jewish Bible—the Bible in use by Christ and His apostles. Apart from references in the NT itself, an important aid is here afforded by a passage in Jos (CAp, I, 8), which may be taken to represent the current belief of the Jews in the 1st cent. AD. After speaking of the prophets as writing their histories "through the inspiration of God," Jos says: "For we have not myths of discordant and conflicting books, but 22 only, comprising the record of all time, and justly accredited as Divine. Of these, 5 are books of history, whereas 17 recorded the traditions of mankind until his own death, a period of almost 3,000 years. From the death of Moses till the reign of Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, king of Persia, the prophets who followed Moses narrated the events of their time in 13 books. The remaining 4 books consist of hymns to God, and maxims of conduct for men. From Artaxerxes to our own age, the history has been written in detail, but it is not esteemed worthy of the same credit, on account of the exact succession of the prophets having been no longer maintained."

He goes on to declare that, in this long interval, "no one has dared either to add anything to the writings, or to take anything from them, or to alter anything," and speaks of them as "the decrees [dogmata] of God," for which the Jews would willingly die. Philo (20 BC—cir 50 AD) uses similar strong language about the law of Moses (in Eusebius, Pr. Ec., VIII, 6).

In this enumeration of Jos, it will be seen that the Jewish sacred books in our Bible—are reckoned as 22 (after the no. of letters in the Heb alphabet), viz. 5 of the law, 13 of the prophets and 4 remaining books. These last are Ps, Prov, Cant, and Ecc. The middle class includes all the historical books, together with Job, and the reduction in the no. from 30 to 13 is explained by Jgs—Ruth, 1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr—Neh, Jer—Lam and the 12 minor prophets, each being counted as one book. In his 22 books, therefore, Jos includes all those in the present Heb canon, and none besides—not the books known as the Apocrypha, though he was acquainted with and used some of these.

Other lists and divisions.—The statement of Jos as to the 22 books acknowledged by the Jews is confirmed, with some variation of enumeration, by the lists preserved by Eusebius (HE, vi,26) from Melito of Sardis (cir 172 AD) and Origen (185—254 AD), and by Jerome (Pref to OT, cir 400) —all following Jewish authorities. Jerome knew also a rabbinical division into 24 books. The celebrated passage from the Talm (Babha' Bathri, 14b: see Canon of OT; of Westcott, Bible in Church, 35; Driver, LOT, vi) counts also 24.

This no. is obtained by placing the laws and historical books in 6 groups, with Job and the 12 minor prophets. The threefold division of the books, into Law, Prophets, and other sacred Writings (Hagiographa), is old. It is already implied in the Prologue to Sir (cir 130 BC), "the law, the prophets, and the rest of the books;" is glanced at in a work ascribed to Philo (De vita contempl., 3); is indicated, as formerly seen, in Lk 24 44. It really reflects stages in the formation of the Heb canon (see below). The rabbinical division, however, differed materially from that of Jos in reckoning only 10 books of the prophets (including 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr—Neh, Est, Job and Dnl to the Hagiographa, thus enlarging that group to 9 (Westcott, op. cit., 28; DB, I, "Canon"). When Ruth and Lam were separated, they were added to the list, raising the no. to 11. Some, however, take this to be the original arrangement. In printed Heb Bibles the books in all the divisions are separate. The Jewish schools further divided the "Prophets" into "the former prophets" (the historical books—Josh, Jgs, S and K), and "the latter prophets" (Isa, Jer, Ezek and the 12 minor prophets as one book).

NT references.—It may be concluded that the above lists, excluding the Apoc, represent the Heb Bible as it existed in the time of Our Lord (the opinion, held by some, that the Sadducees received only the 5 books of the law rests on no sufficient evidence). This result is borne out by the evidence of quotations in Jos and Philo (cf Westcott, op. cit., 40). There are many lists of OT quotations and references in the NT. It was seen above that the main divisions of the OT are recognized in the NT, and that, under the name "Scriptures," a Divine authority is ascribed to them. It is therefore highly significant that, although the writers of the NT were familiar with the LXX, which contained the Apoc (see below), no quotation from any book of the Apoc occurs in their pages. One or two allusions, at most, suggest acquaintance with the Book of Wisdom (e.g. Job 18 22; 13 17). On the other hand, "every book in the Heb Bible is distinctly quoted in the NT with the exception of Josh, Jgs, Ch, Cant, Ecc, Ezr, Neh, Est, Ob, Zeph and Nah" (Westcott). Enumerations differ, but about 175 direct quotations may be reckoned in the Gospels, Acts and Epistles; if references are included, the no. is raised to about 700 (see Quotations in NT). In four or five places (Lk 11 49—51; Jas 4 5; 1 Cor 2 9; Eph 2 12; 1 Tim 5 18) NT quotations occur to sources other than the OT; it is doubtful whether most of them are really so (cf Westcott, op. cit., 46—48; Eph 5 14 may be from a Christian hymn). An undeniable influence of Apocalyptic literature is seen in some historical NT quotations—e.g. Matt 1 21 (Pss 80 5—6; Dan 7 13—14; Ezk 34 15). It does not follow that Jude regarded this book as a proper part of Scripture.

Hitherto we have been dealing with the Heb OT; marked changes are apparent when we turn to the Septuagint, or Gr version of the LXX.

The LXX current in the Gr-speaking world at the commencement of the Christian era. The importance of this version lies in the fact that it was practically the OT of the early church. It was used by the apostles and their converts, and is freely quoted in the NT, sometimes even when its renderings vary considerably from the Heb. Its influence was necessarily, therefore, very great.

Origin.—The special problems connected with origin, text and literary relations of the LXX are dealt with elsewhere (see Septuagint). The version took its rise, under one of the early Polynomials, from the needs of the Jews in Egypt, before the middle of the 3d cent. BC; was confirmed by an examination, executed, and completed hardly later than cir 100 BC; thereafter spread into all parts. Its renderings reveal frequent divergence in MSS from the present MT, but show also that the translators... permitted themselves considerable liberties in enlarging, abbreviating, transposing and otherwise modifying the texts they had at their disposal, by insertion of materials borrowed from other sources.

The Apocrypha.—The most noteworthy differences are in the departure from Jewish tradition in the arrangement of the books (this varies greatly; cf. Swete, Intro to OT in Gr; II, ch 1), and in the inclusion in the list of the other books, unknown to the Heb canon, now grouped as the Apocrypha. These form an extensive addition. They include, the whole of the existing Apoc, with the exception of Tob and Add (in Mar. and Syr.); those are in Gr, though Sir had a Heb original which has been partly recovered. They are not collected, but are interspersed among the OT books in what are taken to be their appropriate places. The Gr fragments, e.g. are incorporated in that book; Susa and Bel form part of Dn; 1 Bar is joined with Jer, etc. The most important books are Wisd, Sir and 1 Mac (cir 100 BC). The fact that Sir, originally in Heb (cir 200 BC), and of high repute, was not included in the Gr canon, has a weighty bearing on the period of the closing of the latter.

Ecclesiastical use.—It is, as already remarked, singular that, notwithstanding this extensive enlargement of the canon by the LXX, the books just named received no canonical recognition from the writers of the NT. The more scholarly of the Fathers, likewise (Melito, Origen, Athanasius, Cyril, Jerome, etc.), adhere to the Heb list, and most draw a sharp distinction between the canonical books, and those due to the LXX (which is, however, admitted for edification; cf. Westcott, op. cit., 135–36, 168, 180, 182–83). Where slight divergencies occur (e.g. Est is omitted by Melito and placed by Athanasius among the Apoc; Origen and Athanasius add to the LXX, these are readily explained by doubts as to canonicity or by imperfect knowledge. On the other hand, familiarity with the LXX in writers ignorant of Heb could not but tend to break down the limits of the Jewish canon, and to lend a Scriptural sanction to the additions to that canon. This was aided in the West by the fact that the Old Lat VSS (2nd cent.) based on the LXX, included these additions (the Syr Pesh followed the Heb). In many quarters, therefore, the distinction broken down, and ecclesiastical writers (Clement, Barnabas, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clem. Alex., Basil, etc.) quote freely from books like Wisd, Sir, Bar, Tob, 2 Esd, etc. from parts of the OT.

An important landmark is reached in the Vulg or Lat version of Jerome. Jerome, on grounds explained in his Preface, recognized only the Heb Scriptures as canonical; under pressure he executed later a hasty tr of Tob and Jud. Feeling ran strongly, however, in favor of the other books, and ere long these were added to Jerome’s version of the Old Lat (see VULGATE). It is this enlarged Vulg which received official recognition, under anathema, at the Council of Treves (1543), and, with revision, from Clement VIII (1592), though, earlier, leading Romish scholars (Ximenes, Erasmus, Cajetan) had made plain the true state of the facts. The Gr church vassillated in its decisions, sometimes approving the limited, sometimes the extended, canon (cf. Westcott, op. cit., 217–29). The churches of the Reformation (Lutheran, Swiss), as was to be expected, went back to the Heb canon, giving only a qualified sanction to the reading and ecclesiastical use of the Apoc. The early English obtained a similar tr of Tylcndale (1530) to include, but separate, the apocryphal books (see ENGLISH VERSIONS). The Anglican Articles express the general estimate of these books: “And the other books (as Jerome saith) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners, yet both it not any part of the word of God, or any doctrine” (Art. VIII). Modern Protestant Bibles usually exclude the Apoc altogether.

From this survey of the course of opinion on the compass of the OT, we come to the NT. This admixture of being more briefly treated.

4. The NT. It has been seen that a Christian NT did not, in the strict sense, arise till after the middle of the 2d century. Gospels and Epistles had long existed, collections had begun to be made, at least since the time of Justin, and in the assemblies of the Christians (Justin, 1 Apol., 67), before the attempt was made to bring together, and take formal account of, all the books which enjoyed apostolic authority (see CANON OF NT). The needs of the church, however, and very spectably controversy with gnostic opponents, made it necessary that this work should be done; collections also had to be formed for purposes of tr into other tongues. Genuine gospels had to be distinguished from spurious gnostic writings from those of later date, or falsely bearing apostolic names. When this task was undertaken, a distinction soon revealed itself between two classes of books, setting aside those recognized on all hands as spurious: (1) books acknowledged—those named afterward by Eusebius the homologomena; and (2) books only partially acknowledged, or on which some doubt rested—the Eusebian antiægomena (HE, ii, 25). It is on this distinction that differences as to the precise extent of the NT turned.

(1) “Acknowledged books.”—The “acknowledged” books present little difficulty. They are enumerated by Eusebius, whose statements are confirmed by early lists (e.g. that of Muratori, c. 170 AD), as regards authentic, and patristic use. At the head stand the Four Gospels and the Acts, then come the 13 epistles of Paul, then 1 Pet and 1 Jn. These, Westcott says, toward the close of the 2d cent., “were universally received in every church, without doubt or limitation, as part of the written rule of Christian faith, equal in authority with the Old Scriptures, and ratified (as it seemed) by a tradition reaching back to the date of their composition” (op. cit., 133). With them may almost be placed Revelation (as by Eusebius) and He, the double regarding the latter in Pauline authority than to genuineness (e.g. Origen).

(2) “Disputed books.”—The “disputed” books were the epistles of Jas, Jude, 2 and 3 Jn and 2 Pet. These, however, do not all stand in the same rank as regards authentication, is the silence of the western Fathers regarding Jas, 2 Pet and 3 Jn. On the other hand, Jas is known to Origen and is included in the Syr Pesh; the Muratorian Fragment attests Jude and 2 Jn as “held in the Catholic church” (Jude also in Tertullian, Clem. Alex., Origen); none of the books are treated as spurious. The weakest in attestation is 2 Pet, which is not distinctly traceable before the 3d cent. (See CANON OF NT; arts. s.v.) It is to be added that, in a few instances, as in the case of the NT Apoc, early Fathers cite as Scripture books not generally accepted as canonical (e.g. Barnabas, Hermas, Apoc of Pet).

The complete acceptance of all the books in our present NT canon may be dated from the Councils of Laodiaca (cir 363 AD) and of Carthage (397 AD), confirming the lists of Cyril of Jerusalem, Jerome and Augustine.

IV. Literary Origin and Growth.—Canonicity.—Thus far the NT, as the OT, have been taken simply as given, and no attempt has been made to inquire how or when they were written or compiled, or how they came to acquire the dignity and authority implied in their reception into a sacred canon. The field here entered is one bristling with controversy, and it is necessary to choose one's steps with caution to find a safe way through it. Details in the survey are left, as before, to the special articles.

Attention here is naturally directed, first, to the OT. This, it is obvious, and is on all sides admitted, has a long literary history prior to its final settlement in a canon. As to the course of that history traditional and modern critical views very widely differ. It may possibly turn out that the truth lies somewhere midway between them.

(1) OT indications.—If the indications furnished by the OT itself be accepted, the results are something like the following:

(a) Patriarchal age: No mention is made of writing in the patriarchal age, though it is now known that a high literary culture then prevailed in Babylonia, Egypt and Palestine, and it is not improbable, indeed seems likely, that records in some form came down from that age, and are, in parts, incorporated in the early history of the Bible. In the OT itself, the first mention of writing was in use, and Moses himself was trained in the learning of the Egyptians (Ex 2 10; Acts 7 22). In no place is the composition of the whole Pent (as traditionally believed) ascribed to Moses, but no intact record of a poetic work that is directly attributed to Moses (e.g. Ps 90), nor any other book (except Ps 119) is ascribed to him, creating the presumption that there was more, even when the fact is not stated. Moses wrote "all the words of Jehovah" in the "book of the covenant" (Ex 21-23; 24 4-7). He wrote "the words of Jehovah in the law of the book of Moses, until they were finished" (Deut 31 24-26). This was given to the priests to be put by the side of the ark for preservation (vs 25-26). Other notices occur of the writing of Moses (Ex 17 14; Nu 33 2; Dt 31 9-22; cf Nu 11 28). The song of Miriam, and the matches of songs in Nu 21, the first (perhaps all) quoted from the "book of the Wars of Jehovah" (Nu 21 14 ff), plainly belong to Mosaic times. In this connection, it should be noticed that the discourses and law of Dt imply the history and legislation of the earlier JE history (see below). The priestly laws (Lev, Nu) bear a considerable stamp of the wilderness that they can hardly have originated anywhere else, and were probably then, or soon after, written down. Joshua, too, is likewise familiar with writing (Josh 20-21; cf Dt 27 8), and is stated to have written his farewell address "in the book of the law of Jehovah" (Josh 24 26; cf 1 7-8). These statements already imply the beginning of a sacred literature.

(b) The Judges: The song of Deborah (Jgs 5) is an indubitably authentic monument of the age of the Judges, and the older parts of Jgs, at least, must have been nearly contemporary with the events which they record. A knowledge of writing among the common people seems implied in Jgs 8 14 (ARVvms). Samuel, like Joshua, wrote "in a book" (1 S 10 25), and laid it up, evidently among other writings, "before Jehovah."

(d) The age of David and Solomon was one of high development in poetical and historical composition: witness the elegies of David (2 S 1 17 ff; 3 33.34), and the finely-finished narrative of David's reign (2 S 9-20), the so-called "Jerusalem-Source," admitted to date from "a period very little later than that of the long Moabite Stone" (2 S 17, 193). There were court scribes and chroniclers.

David and the Monarchy: David, as befits his piety and poetical and musical gifts (cf on this POF, 440 ff), is credited with laying the foundations of a sacred psalmody (2 S 23 1 ff, see PSLMs), and a whole collection of psalms (4-72, with exclusion of the distinct collection, 42-50), once forming a separate book (cf Ps 72 20), are, with others, ascribed to him by their titles (Pss 1, 2, 10 are entitled). It is hardly possible that a book like this can be wholly wrong, and a Davidic basis of the Psalter may safely be assumed. Numerous psalms, by their mention of the "king" (as Ps 2, 18, 20, 21, 25, 33, 45, 61, 63, 72, 101, 110), are naturally referred to the period of this monarchy (some, as Ps 18 certainly, David's). Other groups of psalms are referred to the temple guilds (Sons of Korah, Asaph).

(c) Wisdom literature: Solomon is renowned as founder of the wisdom literature and the author of Proverbs (1 K 4 32; Prov 1 1; 10 1; Eccl 12 9; Eccl itself appears to be late), and of the Song (Cant 1 1). The "men of Hezekiah" are said to have copied out a collection of his proverbs (Prov 26 1; see PROVMSAS). Here also may be placed the Book of Job. Hezekiah's reign appears to have been one of literary activity: to it, probably, are to be referred certain of the Ps (e.g. Ps 46, 48; cf Perowne, Delitzsch). In history, during the monarchy, the prophets would seem to have acted as "scribes" ("secretaries") of their memoirs of the successive reigns, as the later books testify (1 Ch 29 29; 2 Ch 9 29; 12 15, etc), are compiled most of the narratives in our canonical writings (hence the name 'former prophets'). The latest date in the OT is 430 BC, and the body of the book is probably earlier.

(f) Prophecy: With the rise of written prophecy a new form of literature entered, called forth by, and vividly mirroring, the religious and political conditions of the time in Israel and Judah (see PROPHETS). On the older view, Obadiah and Joel stood at the head of the series in the pre-Assyrian period (9th cent.), and this seems the preferable view still. On the newer view, these prophets are late, and written prophecy begins in the Assyrian period with Amos (Jeroboam II, c. 750 BC) and Hosea (c. 745-735). When the latter prophet wrote, Samaria was tottering to its fall (721 BC). A little later, in Judah, come Isaiah (c. 740-690) and Micah (c. 720-705). Isaiah, in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, is the greatest of the prophets in the Assyrian age, and his ministry reaches its climax in the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib (2 K 18, 19; Isa 36-39 familiar with the battle). The oracles of an Isianian school are not mingled with the prophet's own writings, and most scholars now regard the 2d part of the book (chs 40-66) as exilic (or in part) post-exilic in date. The standpoint of much in these chs is certainly in the Exile: whether the composition of the whole can be placed there is extremely doubtful (see ISAIAH). Nahum, who prophesies against Nineveh, belongs to the very close of this period (c. 680).

The prophecies of Zephaniah (c. 630 BC) and Habakkuk (c. 606) may be regarded as forming the transition to the next—the Chaldaean period. The Chaldeans (unnamed in Zeph) are advancing but are not yet come (Hab 1 6). The great prophetic figure here, however, is Jeremiah, whose sorrowful ministry, beginning in the 13th year of Josiah (626 BC), extended through the succeeding reigns till after the fall of Jerusalem (586 BC). The prophet elected to remain with the remnant in the land, and shortly after, was forcibly carried away into Egypt (Jer 43). Here he also prophesied (chs 43, 44). From the reign of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah consistently declared the success of the Chaldaean arms, and foretold the 70 years' captivity (26 12). Baruch acted as his secretary in writing out and editing his prophecies (chs 36, 45).
(g) Josiah's reformation: A highly important event in this period was Josiah's reformation in his 18th year (621 BC), and the discovery, during repairs of the temple, of 'the book of the law,' i.e. the 'law of Moses' (2 K 22 8; 23 22.25). The finding of this book, identified by most authorities with the Book of Dt, produced an extraordinary sensation. On no side was there the least question that it was a genuine ancient work. Jeremiah, strangely, makes no allusion to this discovery, but his prophecies are deeply saturated with the ideas and style of Dt.

(a) Exilic and post-exilic: The bulk of Isa 40-56 belongs, at least in spirit, to the Exile, but the one prophet of the Exile known to us by name is the priestly Ezekiel. Carried captive under Jehoiachin (597 BC), Ezekiel labored among his fellow-exiles for at least 22 years (Ezk 1 2; 29 17). A man of the strongest moral courage, his symbolic visions on the banks of the Chebar alternated with the most direct exhortation, exhortation, warning and promise. In the description of an ideal temple and its worship with which his book closes (chs 40-48), critics think they discern the suggestion of a new temple, but Ezekiel would have been silent had he lived (see Ezekiel).

(i) Daniel: After Ezekiel the voice of prophecy is silent till it revives in Daniel, in Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar and his successors. Depicted in 605 BC, Daniel rose to power, and 'continued until the 1st year of Cyrus' (336 BC: Dnl 1 21). Criticism will have it that his prophecies are a product of the Maccabean age, but powerful considerations on the other side are ignored (see Daniel). Jonah may have been written about this time, though the prophet's mission itself was pre-Assyr (9th cent.). The rebuilding of the temple after the return, under Zerubbabel, furnished the occasion for the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah (520 BC). Scholars are disposed to regard only Zec 1-8 as belonging to this period—the remainder being placed earlier or later. Malachi, nearly a cent. after (cir 430), brings up the rear of prophecy, rebuking unfaithfulness, and predicting the advent of the 'messenger of the covenant' (Mal 3 1-2). The restored community, later, belongs to the post-exilic psalms (e.g. Pss 124, 125), the books of Ezr, Neh, Ch, Est and apparently Ecl.

(j) A pre-exilic Bible: If, in this rapid sketch, the facts are correctly represented, it will be apparent that the older, pre-exilic literature, besides the large body of sacred lit. existed (laws, histories, psalms, wisdom-books, prophecies), and was recognized long before the Exile. God's ancient people had 'Scriptures'—had a Bible—if not yet in collected form. This is strikingly borne out by the numerous OT passages referring to what appears to be a code of sacred writings in the hands of the priests in Israel. Such are the references to, and praise of, the "law" and "word" of God in many of the Ps (e.g. 1, 13, 113, 122; 17 4; 18 21.22), with the references to God's known "words," "ways," "commandments," "statutes," in other books of the OT (Job 8 8; Hos 8 12; Dnl 9 2). In brief, Scriptures, which must have contained records of God's dealings with His people, a knowledge of which is constantly presupposed, "laws" of God for the regulation of the heart and conduct, "statutes," "ordinances," "words" of God, are a postulate of a great part of the OT.

Critical Comment:—The account of the origin and growth of the OT above presented is in marked contrast with that given in the textbooks of the newer critical schools. The main features of these critical views are sketched in the art. Again (q.v.), here a brief indication will suffice. Generally, the books of the OT are brought down to late dates; are regarded as highly composite; the earlier books, from their distance from the events recorded, are deprived of historical worth. Neither histories nor laws in the Pent belong to the Mosaic age: Josh is a "romantic epoch," and "the law of Moses" a "statutes." This, however, is not the case. There are numerous passages which are important fragments, but in bulk is unhistorical. The earliest fragments of Israelitish literature are lyric pieces like those preserved in Gen 4 23.24; 5 25-27; Nu 21; the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5) is probably genuine. Historical writing begins about the age of David or soon thereafter. The folklore of the Hebrews and traditions of the Mosaic age began to be reduced to writing about the 9th cent. BC.

(a) The Pentateuch: Our present Pent (enlarged to a "Hezateuch," including Joshua) consists of 4 main strands (themselves composite), the oldest of which (called J, from its use of the name Jehovah) goes back to about 850 BC. This was Judaean. A parallel history book (called E, from its use of the name Elohim, God) was written in the Northern kingdom about a century later (c 750). Later still these two were united (JE). These histories, "prophetic" in spirit, were originally attributed to individual authors, distinguished by minute criteria of style: the more recent fashion is to regard them as the product of "schools" or "passages" of "writers." The laws known were those of the (post-Mosaic) Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23). Later, in Josiah's reign, the desire for centralization of worship led to the composition of the Book of Dt. This, secreted in the temple, was found by Hilkiah (2 K 22), and brought about the reformation of Josiah formerly mentioned. Dt (D), thus produced, is the third strand in the Pentateuchal compilation. With the destruction of the city and temple, under the impulse of Ezra, a new period of law-construction, now priestly in spirit. Old laws and usages were codified; new laws were invented; the history of institutions was recast; finally, the extensive complex of Levitical legislation was brought into being, clothed with a wilderness dress, and ascribed to Moses. This elaborate Priestly Code (PC), with its accompanying history, was brought from Babylon by Ezra, and, united with the already existing JE and D, was given forth by him to the restored community (cir 434 BC: Neh 8) as "the law of Moses." Their acceptance of it was the inauguration of "Judaism."

(b) Histories: In its theory of the Pent the newer criticism lays down the determinative positions of the earlier critical view, but with a few changes.

The historical books show but a continuation of the processes of literary construction exemplified in the books ascribed to Moses. The Deuteronomic element, e.g. in Josh, Jgs, 1, 2 S, 1, 2 K, proves them, in these parts, to be later than Josiah, and historically untrustworthy. The Levitical element in 1, 2 Ch demonstrates its pictures of David and his successors to be distorted and false. The same canon applies to the prophets. Joel, e.g. must be post-exilic, because it presupposes the priestly law. The priestly and Mosaic histories being converted, it is not permitted to assume any high religious ideas in early Israel. David, therefore, could not have written the Ps. Most, if not practically all, of these are post-exilic.

(c) Psalms and prophecies: Mesopotamia came in—at least first obtained recognition—through Amos and Hosea. The prophets could not have the foresight and far-reaching hopes seen in their writings: these passages, therefore, must be removed. Generally the tendency is to put Mesopotamia to the only credible and many books, regarded before as pre-exilic, are carried down in whole or part, to exilic, post-exilic, and even late Gr times (PC, Psalter, Job, Prov, Cant, Ecc, 2 Isa, Joel, Lam). Dnls is Maccabean and unhistorical (cir 185-167 BC).
It is not proposed here to discuss this theory, which is not accepted in the present art., and is considered elsewhere (see CRITICAL; PENTATEUCH). The few points calling for remark relate to canonical acceptance.

(3) Formation of the canon.—The general lines of the completed Jewish canon have already been sketched, and some light has now been thrown on the process by which the several books obtained a sacred authority. As to the actual stages in the formation of the canon opinions again widely diverge (see CANON OF THE OT).

(a) Critical theory: On the theory at present in favor, no collections of sacred books were made prior to the return from Babylon. The only books that had authority before the Exile were, perhaps, the old Book of the Covenant, and, from Josiah's time, the Book of Dt. Both, after the return, were, on this theory, embodied, with the JE histories, and the PC, in Ezra's completed Book of the Law (with Josh [9]), in which, accordingly, the foundation of a canon was laid. The fivefold division of the law was later. Subsequently, answering to the 2d division of the Jewish canon, a collection was made of the prophetic writings. As this includes books which, on the critical view, go down to Gr times (Jon; Zec 9-14), the science cannot be earlier than well down in the 3d cent. BC. Latest of all came the collection of the "Hagiographa"—a division of the canon, on the theory, kept open to receive additions certainly till the 2d cent., some think after. Into it were received such late writings as Psalms, Maccabean Ps., Dtn. Even then one or two books (Eccle, Est) remained subjects of dispute.

(b) More positive view: It will appear from the foregoing, that this theory is not here accepted without caution. The critics point to the Bible as such not having been written down, their system is not without its difficulties. The writer of the Bible was asked, What constituted a right to a place in the canon? The answer can hardly be other than that suggested by Jos in the passage formerly quoted—a real or supposed inspiration in the author of the book. Books were received if men had the prophetic spirit (in higher or lower degree: that, e.g., of wisdom); they ceased to be received when the succession of prophets was thought to fail (after Mal). In any case the writings of truly inspired men before the prophets proper were accepted as of authority. It was sought, however, to be shown above, that such books, many of them, already existed from Moses down, long before the Exile (the law, collections of psalms, of proverbs, etc.) collections peculiar to the prophets receive, if they did not mean their prophecies to be circulated and preserved?; and such writings, to the godly who knew and used them, had the full value of Scripture. A canon began with the first laying up of the "book of the law" before Jeh (Dt 31 25-26; Josh 24 26). The age of Ezra and Nehemiah, therefore, is not that of the beginning, but, as Jewish tradition rightly held (Jos; 2 Macc 2 13; Talm), rather that of the compilation, systematic arrangement or codification of the formal and final close of the canon. The divisions of "law, prophets, and holy writings" would thus have their place from the beginning, and be nearly contemporaneous. The Samaritans accepted only the 5 books of the law, with apparently Jos (see SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH).

(c) Close of the canon: There is no need for dogmatism as to an absolute date for the close of the canon. If inspired voices continued to be heard, their utterances were even of the sacred writ. Books duly and officially added might be added, but the non-inclusion of such as a book as Sir (Eccles: in Heb, c1 200 BC) shows that the limits of the canon were jealously guarded, and the onus of proof rests on those who affirm that there were such books.

Calvin, e.g. held that there were Maccabean Ps. Many modern scholars do the same, but it is doubtful if they are right. Eecl is thought on linguistic grounds to be late, but it and other books need not be so late as critics make them. Dn. is confidently declared to be Maccabean, but it does not give reasons for maintaining a Late date (see DANIEL). As formerly noticed, the threefold division into "the law, the prophets, and the rest (tâ loipâde, a definite number) of the books" is already attested in the Prologue to Sir.

Critical controversy, long occupied with the OT, has again keenly attached itself to the NT, with similar disturbing results (see CRITICISM). Extremer opinions may be here neglected, and account be taken only of those that can claim reasonable support. The NT writings are conveniently grouped into the historical books (Gospels and Acts); Epistles (Pauline and other); and a Prophetic book (Rev.). In order of writing, the Epistles, generally, are earlier than the Gospels, but in order of subject, the Gospels naturally claim attention first.

(1) The Gospels and Acts.—The main facts about the origin of the Gospels can perhaps be distinguished from the complicated literary theories which scholars may be disposed to entertain. The first three Gospels, known as the Synoptics, evidently embody a common tradition, and draw from common sources. The Fourth Gospel—that of John—presents problems by itself.

(a) The Synoptics in main sources: The Gospels of Mt, Mk, and Lk—fall in date well within the apostolic age, and are, in the 2d cent., uniformly connected with the authors whose names they bear. Mark is spoken of as the "interpreter of Pet" (Papias, in Marcion’s ap.) only the companion of Paul. A difficulty arises about Matthew, whose Gospel is stated to have been written in Aram. (Papias, ut supra, etc), while the gospel bearing his name is in Gr. The Gr gospel seems at least to have been sufficiently identified with the apostle to admit of the early church always treating it as his.

The older theory of origin assumed an oral basis for all 3 Gospels. The tendency in recent criticism is to distinguish between the reception of tradition in earlier oral form, and the composition of the earliest gospel, a record of the preaching of Peter; (2) a collection of the sayings and discourses of Jesus, attributed to Matthew (the Eusebian Logia, now called Q); with (3) a source used by Luke in the 2d Gospels (compare, for the first Gospels, investigations (Lk 1 1-4)). Mt and Lk are supposed to be based on Mk and the Logia (Q); in Luke’s case with the addition of his special material. Oral tradition furnished what remains. A simpler theory may be to substitute for (1) a Petrine tradition already firmly fixed while yet the apostles were working together in Jerusalem. Peter, as foremost spokesman, would naturally stamp his own type upon the oral narratives of Christ’s sayings and doings. Mark, as he himself would be, in part written, would be the chief source for the longer discourses. The instruction imparted by the apostles and those taught by them would everywhere be made the basis of careful catechetical teaching, and records of all this, more or less fragmentary, would be early in circulation (Lk 1 1-4). This would explain the Petrine type of narrative, and the seeming dependence of Mt and Lk, without the necessity of supposing a direct use of Mt, gospel. So Mt’s gospel would hardly be included in the "attempts" of Lk 1 1.

(b) The Fourth Gospel: The Fourth Gospel (Jn), the genuineness of which is assumed (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF), differs entirely in character and style. It is less a narrative than a didactic work.
written to convince its readers that Jesus is "the Son of God" (Jn 20:31). The gospel may be presumed to have been composed at Ephesus, in the last years of the apostle's residence there. With this its character corresponds. The other gospels had long been known; John does not therefore traverse the ground already covered by them. He confines himself chiefly to matters drawn from his personal recollections: the Judean ministry, the visits of Christ to Jerusalem, His last private discourses to His disciples. John had so often retold, and so long brooded over, the thoughts and words of Jesus, that in a manner part of his thought, and, in reproducing them, he necessarily did so with a subjective tinge, and in a partially paraphrasical and interpretative manner. Yet it is truly the words, thoughts and deeds of his beloved Lord that he narrates. His gospel is the needful complement to the others—the "spiritual" gospel.

(c) The Acts: The Acts narrates the origin and early fortunes of the church, with, as its special motive (of 1:8), the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles, and the labor of Paul and his co-laborers. Its author was Luke, Paul's companion, whose gospel it continues (1:1). Certain sections—the so-called "we-sections" (16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1-28:16)—are transcribed directly from Luke's journal of Paul's travels. The book closes abruptly with Paul's 2d imprisonment at Rome (28:30-31; 60-61 AD), and not a hint is given of the issue of the imprisonment—trial, liberation or death. Does this mean that a 3d "treatise" was contemplated? Or that the book was written while the imprisonment still continued? (thus now Harnack). If the latter, the Third Gospel must be very early.

(2) The Epistles.—(a) Pauline: Doubt never rested in the church on the 13 epistles of Paul (3:17). Of these 7 form the "Pastoral Epistles." Most are letters to churches he himself had founded (1, 2 Cor, Gal, Eph [?], Phil, 1, 2 Thess). : two are to churches he had not himself visited, but with which he stood in affectionate relations (Rom, Col); one (1 Thess) is primarily practical in character, addressed to individuals, but with official responsibilities (1, 2 Tim, Tit). The larger number were written during his missionary labors, and reflect his personal situation, anxieties and companionships at the places of their composition; four are epistles of the 1st Rom imprisonment (Eph, Phil, Col, Philem): 2 Tim is a voice from the dungeon, in his 2d imprisonment, shortly before his martyrdom. Doctrine, counsel, rebuke, admonition, tender solicitude, ethical instruction, prayer, thanksgiving, blend in living fusion in their contents. So marvelous a collection of letters, on such magnificent themes, was never before given to the world.

The earliest epistles, in point of date, are generally held to be those to the Thessalonians, written from Corinth (52, 53 AD). The church, newly-founded, had passed through much affliction (1 Thess 1:6; 2:14; 3:3,4, etc), and Paul writes to comfort and exhort it. His words the Second Coming (4:13ff) led to mistaken expectations and some danger. The 2d epistle was written to correct (2 Thess 2:1-3; 3:6, etc).

Corinth itself received the next epistles—the 1st called forth by reports received at Ephesus of grave divisions and irregularities (1 Cor 1:11; 3:3; 11:18ff, etc), joined with pride of knowledge, doctrinal heresy (15:12ff), and at least one case of gross immorality (ch 6) in the church; the 2d, written at Philippi, expressing joy at the repentance of the offender, and removing the severe sentence that had been passed upon him (12 Cor 2:10-18); 1 Cor 5:3-5, likewise vindicating Paul's own apostleship (chs 10-13). The date of both is 57 AD. 1 Cor contains the beautiful hymn on love (ch 13), and the noble chapter on resurrection (ch 15).

In the following year (58 BC) Paul penned from Corinth the Epistle to the Romans—the greatest of his doctrinal epistles. In it he develops his great theme of the impossibility of justification before God through works of law (chs 1-3), and the Divine provision for human salvation in a "righteousness of God" in Christ Jesus, received through faith. He exhibits first the objective side of this redemption in the deliverance from condemnation effected through Christ's reconciling death (chs 5-8); then the subjective side in the new life imparted by the spirit, giving deliverance from the power of sin (chs 6-8). A discussion follows of the Divine sovereignty in God's dealings with Israel, and of the end of these dealings (chs 9-14), and the epistle proceeds with counsels for forbearance and prayers (chs 12-16).

Closely connected with the Epistle to the Romans is that to the Galatians, in which the same truths are handled, but now with a polemical intent in expositions and reproach. The Galatian church had apostatized from the gospel of faith to Jewish legalism, and the apostle, sorely grieved, writes this powerful letter to rebuke their faithlessness, and recall them to their allegiance to the truth. It is the reasonable, perhaps the most nearly related in place and time. The question is complicated, however, by the dispute which has arisen as to whether the churches intended are those of Northern Galatia (the older view; of Conybeare and Howson, Lightfoot) or those of Southern Galatia (Sir Wm. Ramsey), i.e. the churches of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, in Paul's time embraced in the Roman province of Galatia (see GALATIA; GALLIANS). If the latter view is accepted, many matters and place are uncertain; if the former, the epistle may have been written from Ephesus (cir 57 AD).

The 4 epistles of the imprisonment all fall within the years 60, 61 AD. That to the Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, and Ephesians, 4:18-19, possibly the latest of the group, was sent by the hand of Epaphroditus, who had come to Rome with a present from the Philippian church, and had there been overtaken by a serious illness (Phil 2:25-30; 4:18-19). The remaining 3 epistles (Eph, Col, and Philem) were written at one time, and were carried to their destinations by Epaphras. Eph and Col are twin epistles, similar in thought and style, exalting the preeminence of Christ, but it is doubtful whether the former was not really a "circular" epistle, or even, perhaps, the lost Epistle to the Laodiceans (Col 4:16; see EPISTLE TO THE LAODICEANS). The Colossian epistle has in view an early form of gnostic heresy (of Lightfoot, Gal). Philem is a personal letter to a friend of the apostle's at Colossae, whose runaway slave, Onesimus, now a Christian, is being sent back to him with warm commendations. See CAPTIVITY EPISTLES.

Latest from Paul's pen are the Pastoral Epistles (1, 2 Tim, Tit), implying his liberation from his 2d imprisonment, and a new period of missionary labor in Ephesus, Macedonia and Crete (see Pastoral Epistles). Timothy was left at Ephesus (1 Tim 1:3), Titus at Crete (Tit 1:5), for the regulation and superintendence of the churches.
The epistles, the altered style of which shows the deep impress of advancing years and changed conditions, contain admonitions to pastoral duty, with warnings as to perils that had arisen or would arise. 1 Tim and Tit were written while the apostle was still at liberty (65 AD); 2 Tim is from his Roman imprisonment, and Jud was partly heard, and the end was impending (2 Tim 4:6,16,17).

(b) Epistle to the Hebrews: These are the Pauline Epistles proper. The Epistle to the Hebrews, though ascribed to Paul in the title of the AV, is not really his. It is an early writing (probably before 61), the author being the great Christian writer of the 1st century, friend of the apostle's (in Italy, c3 23,24), designed, by a reasoned exhibition of the superiority of Jesus to Moses and the Levitical priesthood, and of the fulfilment of OT types and institutions in His person and sacrifice, to remove the difficulties of Jewish Christians, who clung with natural affection to their temple and divinely appointed ritual. It was included by Eusebius, with others in the East (not, however, by Origen), among the epistles of Paul; in the MS tradition the epistle was not admitted. Many, nevertheless, with Origen, upheld a connection with Paul ("the thoughts are Paul's"). Ideas and style suggest an Alexandrian training; hence Luther's conjecture of Apollos as the writer, the formula for the subject can be no uncertain. The value of the Epistle is unimpaired, whoever was the author.

(c) Catholic Epistles: Of the 7 so-called "Catholic" Epistles, Jas and Jude are by "brethren" of the Lord James, the Lord's brother," was head of the church at Jerus, Acts 15:13; 21:18; Gal 1:19, etc.; Peter and John, to whom the others were ascribed, were apostles. Jas and 1 Pet are addressed to the Jews of the Dispersion (1 Pet 1:1; Jas 1:1). The doubt respecting certain of these writings has already been mentioned. The early date and acceptance of Jas is attested by numerous allusions (Clem. of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Did). Many regard it as the earliest of the epistles—before Paul's. Its tone is throughout practical. The seeming conflict with Paul on faith and works, which led Luther to speak slightly of it, is only verbal. Paul, too, held that a dead faith avails nothing (1 Cor 13:2; Gal 5:6). 1 Jn, like 1 Pet, was undisputed (if the Fourth Gospel is genuine, 1 Jn is internal) ground, and the shorter epistles (2, 3 Jn) need not be doubted (see Epistles of John). Jude, rugged in style, with allusions to Jewish Apocalypses (vs 9,14), is well attested, and 2 Pet seems to found on it. The last-named epistle must rely for acceptance on its own claim (2 Pet 1:18), and on internal evidence of sincerity. It is to be observed, that though late in being noticed, it never appears to have been treated as spurious. The style certainly differs from 1 Pet; this may be due to the use of an amanuensis. If accepted, it must be placed late in Peter's life (before 65 AD). 1 Pet and Jude, in that case, must be earlier (see Catholic Epistles).

(3) Prophecy—The Book of Revelation: The one prophetic book of the NT—the apocalyptic counterpart of Dn in the OT—is the Book of Rev. The external evidence for the Johannine authorship is strong (see Apocalypse). Tradition and internal evidence ascribe it to the reign of Domitian (cir 95 AD). Its contents were in complete conflict in vision in the time of Patmos (Rev 1:9). The theory which connects it with the reign of Nero through the supposed fitness of this name to express the mystic no. 666 is entirely precariously (cf Salmon, Intro to NT, 245-54). The main intent is to exhibit the approaching conflicts of Christ and his Church with anti-Christian powers—with secular world-power (Beast), with intellectual anti-Christianism (False Prophet), with ecclesiastical anti-Christianism (Woman)—these conflicts issuing in victory and a period of triumph, prefacing, after a sharp, final struggle, the last scenes (resurrection, judgment), and the eternal state. When the visions are taken, not as poetic imaginings, but as true apocalyptic unveilings, the change in style from the gospel, which may be regarded as already written, can readily be understood. These mighty revelations in Patmos brought about, as by volcanic force, a tremendous upheaval in the seer's soul, breaking through all previous strata of thought and feeling, and presenting everything in a new and unique perspective. On the resultant high keynote: "Amen: Come, Lord Jesus" (Rev 22:20), the NT closes.

(4) Canonicity.—The principal steps by which the books now enumerated were gradually formed into a NT "canon," have been indicated in previous sections. The test of canonicity here, as in the OT, is the presence of inspiration. Some would prefer the word "apostolic," which comes to the same thing. All the NT list the epistles ascribed to be the works of apostles or of apostolic men, and on this ground were admitted into the list of books having authority in the church. Barnabas (cir 100-120 AD) already quotes Mt 20:16, with citations from the epistles, as "apostolic literature" (1 Tim 5:18) a passage found only in Lk (10:7). Paul's Epistles are classed with "other scriptures" in 2 Pet 3:16. Post-apostolic Fathers draw a clear distinction between their own writings and those of apostles like Paul and Peter (Polyarp, Ignatius, Barnabas). The Fathers of the close of the 2d cent. treat the NT writings as in the fullest degree inspired (cf Westcott, Intro to Study of Gospels, Append. B). An important impulse to the formation of a canon came from the gnostic Marcion (cir 140 AD), who made a canon for himself in 2 parts, "Gospel" and "Apostolic," consisting of one gospel (a mutilated Lk) and 10 epistles of Paul (excluding Pastoral). A challenge of this kind had to be taken up, and lists of NT writings began to be made (Melito, Muratorian Fragment, etc), with the results previously described. By the commencement of the 4th cent. unanimity had practically been attained as far as the 27 books were concerned. At the Council of Nicæa (325 AD), Westcott says, "the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were silently admitted on all sides to have a final authority" (Bible in Church, 155). See Canon, 2.

V. Unity of the Original Purpose—Inspiration.—Holy Scripture is not simply a collection of religious books: still less does it consist of mere 1. Scrip- fragments of Jewish and Christian ture a Unity literature. It belongs to the concep-ion of Scripture that, though origi-ating "by divers portions and in divers manners" (He 1:1), it should yet, in its completeness, constitute a unity, evincing, in the spirit and purpose that bind its parts together, the Divine source from which its revelation comes. The Bible is the record of God's revelations of Himself to men in successive ages and dispensations (Eph 1:8-10; 3:5-9; Col 1:19,26), till the revelation culminates in the advent and work of the Son, and the mission of the Spirit. It is this aspect of the Bible which constitutes its great distinction from all collections of sacred writings—the so-called "Bibles" of heathen religions—in the world. These, as the slightest inspection of them shows, have no unity. They are accumulations of heterogeneous materials, presenting in no order, progression, or plan. The reason is, that they embody no historical revelation working out a purpose in consecutive stages from germinal beginnings to perfect close.

Bible, The
The Bible, by contrast, is a single book because it embodies such a revelation, and its contents such a purpose. The unity of the book, made up of so many parts, is the attestation of the reality of the revelation it contains.

This feature of "spiritual purpose" in the Bible is one of the most obvious things about it (cf. POF, 302). It gives to the Bible what is sometimes termed its "organic unity."

2. The Purpose of Grace

The Bible has a beginning, middle and end. The opening chaps of Gen have their counterpart in the "new heaven and new earth," and the last parable of the closing chapters of Rev (21, 22). Man's sin is made the starting-point for disclosures of God's grace. The patriarchal history, with its covenants and promises, is continued in the story of the Exodus and the events that follow, in fulfillment of these promises. Dt recapitulates the lawgiving at Sinai. Jos1 sees the people put in possession of the promised land. Backsliding, rebellion, failure, do not defeat God's purpose, but are overruled to carry it on to a successful conclusion. The monarchy made the occasion of new promises to the house of David (2 S 7).

The prophets root themselves in the past, but, at the very hour when the nation seems sinking in ruin, hold out bright hopes of a greater future in the extension of God's kingdom to the Gentiles, under Messiah's rule. A critical writer, Kautzsch, has justly said: "The abiding value of the OT lies above all in this, that it guarantees to us with absolute certainty the fact and the process of a Divine plan and way of salvation, which, from its conclusion and fulfillment in the new covenant, in the person and work of Jesus Christ" (Bleibende Bedeutung des AT, 22, 24, 28-29, 30-31).

Fulfillment in Christ.—How truly all that was imperfect, transitory, in the OT was brought to realization and completion in the redemption and spiritual kingdom of Christ need not here be dwelt upon. Christ is the prophet, priest and king of the New Covenant. His perfect sacrifice, "once for all," superseded and abolishes the typical sacrifices of the old economy (He 9, 10). His gift of the Spirit realizes what the prophets had foretold of God's law being written in men's hearts (Jer 31 31-34; 32 39-40; Ezek 11 19.30, etc.). His kingdom moves on unmovable foundations, and can have no end (Phil 2 9-11; He 12 28; Rev 5 13, etc.). In tracing the lines of this redeeming purpose of God, brought to light in Christ, we gain the key which unlocks the innermost meaning of the whole Bible. It is the revelation of a "gospel."

"Inspiration" is a word round which many debates have gathered. If, however, what has been said is true of the Bible as the record of a progressive revelation, of its contents as the discovery of the will of God for man's salvation, of the prophetic and apostolic standing of its writers, of the unity of spirit and purpose that pervades it, it will be difficult to deny that a quite peculiar presence, operation, and guidance of the Spirit of God are manifest in its production. The belief in inspiration, it has been seen, is implied in the formation of these books into a sacred canon. The full discussion of the subject belongs to a special art. (see INSPIRATION).

Biblical claim.—Here it need only be said that the claim for inspiration in the Bible is one made in fullest measure by the Bible itself. It is not denied by any that Jesus and His apostles regarded the OT Scriptures as in the fullest sense inspired. The appeal of Jesus was always to the Scriptures, and the whole plan of salvation with its "Have ye not read?" (Mt 19 4). "Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God" (Mt 22 29). This because "God" speaks in them (Mt 19 4). Prophecies and psalms were fulfilled in Him (Lk 18 31; 22 37; 24 27.44). Paul esteemed the Scriptures "the oracles of God" (Rom 3 2). They are "God-inspired" (2 Tim 3 16).

That NT prophets and apostles were not placed on any lower level than the OT is manifest from Paul's explicit words regarding himself and his fellow-apostles. Paul never faltered in his claim to be an "apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God" (Eph 1 1, etc)—"separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom 1 1). He heard his message, not from man, but by "revelation" from heaven (Gal 1 11.12).

The "myth of Christ" had now been revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit," in consequence of which the church is declared to be "built upon the foundations of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone" (Eph 2 20; 3 5).

Marks of inspiration.—It might be shown that these claims made by NT writers for the OT and for themselves are borne out by what the OT itself teaches of prophetic inspiration; that the gift of God's spirit, and of the light, holiness, saving virtue and sanctifying power continually ascribed to God's "law," "words," "statutes," "commandments," "judgments" (see above). This is the ultimate test of "inspiration": that it likewise appeals—its power to "make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim 3 15)—its profitableness "for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness" (ver 16)—all to the end "that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work" (ver 17).

Nothing is here determined as to "inerrancy" in minor historical, geographical, chronological details, in which some would wrongly put the essence of inspiration; but it seems implied that at least there is no error which can interfere with or nullify the utility of Scripture for the ends specified. What that brings Scripture to its own tests of inspiration, will deny that, judged as a whole, it fulfills them? 3. The claim of the Bible to a Divine origin is justified by its historical influence. Regarded even as lit., the Bible has an unexampled place in history. Ten or fifteen MSS of it go back to an ancient classic; the MSS of writers or parts of the NT are reckoned by thousands, the oldest going back to the 4th or 5th cent. Another test is the. Books of the NT had hardly begun to be put together before we find tr's being made of them in Lat, Syr, Egyp, later into Gothic and other barbarous tongues (see VERSIONS). In the Middle Ages, before the invention of printing, tr's were made into the vernacular of most (or all) of Europe. Today there is not a language in the civilized world, hardly a language among uncivilized tribes, wherever missions have gone, into which this word of God has not been rendered. Thanks to the labors of Bible Societies, the circulation of the Bible in the different countries of the world in recent years surpasses all previous records. No book has ever been so minutely studied, has had so many books written on it, has founded so vast a lit. of hymns, liturgies, devotional writings, sermons, has been so keenly debated, has excited such special interest as the Bible. Its spiritual influence cannot be estimated. To tell all the Bible has been and done for the world would be to rewrite in large part the history of modern civilization. Without it, in heathen lands, the moral, social and intellectual life would have been paralyzed. With it, even in the absence of the missionary, wondrous results are often effected.
In national life the Bible is the source of our highest social and national aspirations. Professor Huxley, though an agnostic, argued for the reading of the Bible in the schools on this very ground. "By the study of what other books," he asked, "could children be so much humanized, and made to feel each figure in that vast historical procession fills, like themselves, but a momentary space in the interval between two eternities, and earns the blessings or the curses of all times, according to its effort to do good and to hate evil, or to be doing their payment for their work?" (Critiques and Addresses, 61).

VI. Addenda.—A few notes may be added, in closing, on special points not touched in the preceding sections.

Already in pre-Talmud times, for purposes of reading in the synagogues, the Jews had larger divisions of the law into sections called Paráshá, and of the prophets into similar sections called Hopharáshá. They had also smaller divisions into P'siqót, corresponding nearly with our verses. The division into chapters is much later (13th cent.). It is ascribed to Cardinal Hugo de St. Caro (d. 1248); by others to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1227). It was adopted into the Vulg. and from this was transferred by R. Nathan (cir 1440) to the Heb Bible (Bleek, Kerl). Verses are marked in the Vulg as early as 1568. They first appear in the NT in Robert Stephens' edition of the Gr Testament in 1551. Henry Stephens, Robert's son, reports that they were devised by his father during a journey on horseback from Paris to Lyons.

The AV of 1611, based in part on earlier English VSS, esp. Tyndale's, justly holds rank as one of the noblest monuments of the English AV and language of its own, or any age. RV

Necessarily, however, the Gr text used by the translators ("Textus Receptus"), resting on a few late MSS, was very imperfect. With the discovery of more ancient MSS, and multiplication of appliances for criticism, the need and call for a revised text and tr became urgent. In the instance of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, the task of revision was undertaken by Committees representing the best English and American scholarship. Their labors resulted in the publication, in 1885, of the Revised NT, in 1885, of the Revised OT (a revised edition of the Apoc was published in 1896). The preferences of the American Revisers were printed in an appendix, a pledge being given that no further changes should be made for 14 years. The English Companies were disbanded shortly after 1885, but the American Committee, adhering to its own renderings, and believing that further improvements on the English RV were possible, continued its organization and work. This issued, in 1901, in the production of the ARV, which aims at greater consistency and accuracy in a number of important respects, and is supplied, also, with carefully selected marginal references (see American Revised Version).

Little could be done, in either ERV or ARV, in the absence of reliable data for comparison, with the text of the OT, but certain obvious corrections have been made, or noted in the margin.

In recent years abundant helps have been furnished, apart from Commentaries and Dictionaries, for the intelligent study of the English is thus the more objective science, it has no need of dogmatism; dogmatism, on the other hand, cannot be without the aid of Biblical theology. The Biblical theologian should be a Christian philosopher, not an apologist, a scholar, not a historian. The Bible is not the word of God in its place in history; rather, it is considered the teaching, in whole, of each of the sacred writers. Each writing it studies in itself, in its relation to the others, and in its place in history taken as a whole. Its method is historical-genetic.

The proper place of Biblical theology is at the head of historical theology, where it shines as a center of light. Its ideal as a science is to present a clear, complete, and comprehensive survey of the Bible teachings.

In pursuance of this end, Biblical theology is served by scientific exegesis, whose results it presents in its interpretation of the Bible.

4. Relation to Exegesis

Biblical theology lies in the way it directs, corrects and refines all moral and doctrinal theology by bringing it to the original founts of truth. Its spirit is one of impartial historical inquiry.

4. OT Theology in First Half of 19th Cent.

5. NT Theology in the 19th and 20th Cent.

The Bible is the OT and NT. It was the second quarter of the 19th century that the Bible, the object of the OT, began to receive the full attention it deserved. It has been declared the merit of Hegel's philosophy to have taught men to see, in the various Biblical systems of dogma, doctrine, and teaching, a historical process, no doubt, exerting a fertilizing influence on historical theology. But it must also be said that the Hegelian philosophy affected Biblical theology in a prejudicial manner, as may be seen in Vatke's a priori construction of history and doctrine in his work, Die bibl. Theologie (1835), and in Bruno Bauer's Die Religion des AT (1838-39), which controverted, but did not improve upon, Vatke's. Steudel (1840), Oehler (1845) and Havernick (1848) are worthy of particularly honorable mention in this OT connection. In his Theology of the OT (3d ed., 1891; Amer. ed., 1883) G. F. Oehler excellently maintained the close connection between the OT and the NT, which Hengstenberg had already emphasized in 1829.

The OT was first issued by Immanuel Kant. In 1832, he first issued his History of Dogma, and his History of the Christian Theology of the Apostolic Age, a complete and critical work, but not sufficiently objective in its treatment. The Prelections on NT Theology of F. C. Baur, head of the Tubingen school, exemplify both the former and the latter. They are critical, independent and suggestive, but lacking in impartiality. They were published by his son after his death (1864). A new ed of these lectures on NT theology was issued by Pflieger in 1883.

Having first dealt with the teachings of Jesus, Baur then set out the materials of the NT theology in three periods, making Paul well-nigh the founder of Christianity. For him only four epistles of Paul were genuine products of the apostolic age, namely Romans, the two Corinthians, Galatians, together with the Revelation. To the growth and history of the NT Baur applied the method of the Hegelian dialectic, and, though powerful and profound, was only a lack of sound, well-balanced judgment. Yet so conservative a scholar as Weiss gave Baur the credit of having "first made it the problem of criticism to assign to each book of the NT its place in the history of the development of primitive Christianity, to determine the relations to which it owes its origin, the context at which it aims, and the views it represents." Among Baur's followers may be noted Pflieger, in his Paulinism (1873).

The Theology of the NT, by J. J. Van Oosterzee (Eng. ed., 1870), is a serviceable book for students, and the NT Theology of A. Immer (1875), already famous for his hermeneutical studies, is noteworthy. Chief among subsequent cultivators of the Bib. theology of the NT must be reckoned B. Weiss, whose work in two volumes (Eng. ed., 1882–85) constitutes a most critical and complete, thorough, and accurate treatment of the subject in all its details: W. Böseloh, whose NT Theology (Eng. ed. in 2 vols, 1895) is also valuable; H. Holtzmann, whose treatise on NT Theology (1897) dealt in a critical fashion with the doctrinal contents of the NT. Holtzmann's learning and ability are great, but his work is marred by naturalistic presuppositions. The French work on Theology of the NT, by J. Bovon (2 vols, 1893–94) is marked by great independence, skill and fairness. The Theology of the NT, by W. F. Adney (1884), and the yet more recent, and very attractively written, work with the same title, by G. B. Stevens (1899), bring us pretty well up to the present state of our science in respect of the NT.

Coming back to the Bib. theology of the OT in the second half of the 19th cent., we find A. Klostermann's Investigations into the OT Theology, which appeared in 1886. Theology in Second Hel. Theology, by H. H. Halbicker (1869), and the OT of the 19th Cent. 6. OT Theology. The OT theology, no less than that of the NT, was set forth by that great scholar, and lit. of the history of the OT, 19 vols, 1875; Eng. ed. (first part), 1888. His interest in NT theology was due to his strong feeling that the NT is really the second part of the record of Israel's revelation. A. Kuenen dealt with the history of the OT in only the two volumes (Eng. ed., 1874–75), writing nobly but with defective insight into, and comprehension of, the higher religious ideas of Israel. F. Hitzig's Prelections (1880) deal with the theology of the OT, as part of the whole OT. Cf. Weiss' The OT Theology in two vols (1st ed, 1889; 5th ed, 1896; Eng. ed, 1892), in a careful, mainly just, and, by comparison, well-balanced handling of the development of its religious ideas.

We have not touched upon writers like Smend, for example, in his History of OT Religion (1893), and J. Robertson, in his Early Religion of Israel (2d ed, 1892), who treat of the Bib. theology of the OT only in a way subsidiary to the consideration of its history. The whole problem of the relationship of the OT to the theology of the NT has been dealt with by F. E. König in 1882 in a careful and comprehensive manner, and with regard to the order and relation of the documents, revelation in Israel being taken by him in its naturalistic development. Significant also for the progress of OT Bib. theology was The Theological and the Historical View of the OT, by C. Siegfried (1890), who insisted on the development of the higher religion of Israel being studied from the elder prophets as starting-point, instead of the law.

Mention should be made of Biblical Study: Its Principles, Methods and History, by C. A. Briggs (1853; 4th ed, 1891); of the important Compendium of the Bib. Theology of the NT by K. Schlotfmann (1889); of E. Richau's valuable OT Theology (1889); and of G. Dalman's Studies in Bib. Theology—the divine name and its history—in 1889. Also, of the OT Theology of A. Duff (1891); A. Dillmann's Handbuch of OT Theology, edited by Kittel (1896); and of Marti's ed. of the Theology of the OT of A. Kayser (3d ed, 1897).

Of Theology of the OT, by A. B. Davidson (1904), it may be said that it does full justice to the idea of a progressive development of doctrine in the OT, and contains divergent from the view of those who, like Cheyne, treat the OT writings as so many fragments, from which no theology can be extracted. Biblical Theology of the OT, by B. Stade (1905), is the work of a distinguished representative of the modern critical views, already famous for his work on the history of Israel (1887). The Theology of the OT by W. H. Bennett (1906) is a clear and useful compendium of the subject.

Recent works like The Problem of the OT by James Orr (1904), OT Criticisms by G. von Hvitell (1908), and Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, by Harold M. Wiener (1909), of Criticism deal with the critical questions, and do not concern us here, save to remark that they are not without bearing, in their result, upon the view of the OT. Such results are, e.g., the insinances, in Orr's work, on the unity of the OT, the higher than naturalistic view of Israel's religious development, the discriminate use of Divine names like Elohim and Jehovah, and the higher view of theOTScholar, such as Dillmann, Dillmann, Kittel, Kautsch, Schultz and others, who feel the inadequacy of natural development or "human reflection" to account for OT theology, and the immediacy of God's contact with man in OT times to be more than sufficient to allow for revelation so weighty, organically connected, dynamically bound together, monotheistic and progressive.

III. Divisions of Biblical Theology.—The divisions of OT theology are matters of grave difference for the student. For the most part it was practically transformed that mode of representing the process of Israel's religious development, which had been customary or traditional. On this latter view, the Priestly Age was succeeded by the Mosaic Age, with its law-giving under Moses, followed, after an intercalated period of Judges and monarchy, by the splendid Age of Prophecy. Then there was the Exile preparing the way, after the Return, for the new theocracy, when the Law of Moses was sought with more persistent endeavor, though not without darkly legalistic result. Such were the historic bases for OT theology, but the modifications proposed by the new criticism are sufficiently serious. These it will be necessary to indicate, without going beyond the scope of this art. and attempting criticism of either the one view or the other. It is the more necessary to do so, that finality has not been reached by criticism. We are only concerned with the difference which these divergent views make for OT Bib. theology, whose reconstruction is very far from perfected.

That they do mean serious difference has been indicated in the historical part of this art. Most obscure of these differences is the proposal to invert the order of law and prophecy, and speak rather of the Prophets and the Law. For the Law is, on the newer view, taken to belong to the postprophetic period—in short, to the
2. Law and period of the return from the Exile, Prophecy whereas, in the traditional scheme of the Law, as it does after the teachings of the prophets and the discipline of the Exile. Against this, the older scheme prefers the objection that an external and legalistic system is made the outcome of the lofty spiritual teaching of the prophets but, that appears upon the spirit.
Criticism, however, postulates for the ritual codes of the Pent an influence parallel in time with that of prophesies.

Besides the adjustments of prophecy and law just referred to, the critical views postulate a primary period in which the religion
3. Prophet- of the prophets, with their view of Ism and Judaism: a final period of Judaism, intercalated between the Exodus and the Return, and the Maccabees, in which are seen at work the Levitical law, and various anti-legal tendencies. It must be obvious that attempts to integrate the OT theology amid the prevailing uncertainties of criticism must be far from final, for the need and importance be felt of keeping the religious interest before even the historical in OT study. For the OT writers, religion was primary, history secondary and incidental, we may well believe of the religious
We must be content to know less of the remote beginnings and initial stages of Israel's religious development, for, as A. B. Davidson remarked, "in matters like this we never know". J. Robertson accepts criticism in no low allowing "a sufficient starting-point for the development," by which he means that pure prophetic religion needs "a pure pre-prophetic religion" to explain its more than "moral or elementary character." It may be noted, too, how much greater place and importance are attached to Mosaicism or Moses by critics like Reuss, Schults, Bredenkamp and Strack, than by Wellhausen, who, yllos allows a certain substratum of actual and historitical fact. It may be observed, further, that no one is under any compulsion to account for such a transformation, as even Wellhausen allows, in the slow growth from very low beginnings over the idea of Jeh to pure and
5. Israel's Religious Development perfect monotheism—a nonmetaphysical people—by the simple supposition of naturalistic theory.
Evolutionary, the hypothesis that the religious development of Israel may be that development was clearly not so exclusively controlled by human elements or factors as to exclude the presence of supernatural energy or power of revelation. It had God within it—had, in Dorrer's phrase, "teology as its soul." Thus, as even Gunkel declares, "Israel is, and remains, the people of revelation." This is why Israel was able to make—despite all retrograde tendencies—rectilinear progness toward a prefixed goal—the goal of being what Ewald styled a "purely immortal and spiritual Israel." OT theology does not seem to have sufficiently realized that the OT really presents us with theologies rather than a theology—with the progressive development of a religion rather than with theological ideas resting on one historic plane.

BICHR, bik’r, (קְבִּיר, first born); cf HPN, 88, 102): Father of Sheba who rebelled against David. B is of the house of Benjamin and the word probably means a "descendant of Becher" (2 20 11). Of Bechen 1.

BID, Variously signifying, according to six Heb and as many Gr originals: (1) "to command" (Nu 14 10; Mt 1 24 AV, póρατε τὸ προτίθημι; (2) "to prescribe" or "order" (Jn 2 3); (3) "to concurerate," and so rendered in RV (Zeph 1 7; cf 1 S 16 5); (4) ἔφαντο, εἶπον, "to say" or "tell" (Mt 16 12); (5) "to call" i.e. "invite" (καλέσας, kalóô); conspicuously used in this word in Christ for the Sacrifice Feast (Mt 22 3-9) and of the Great Supper (Lk 14 7-24); (6) "to take leave of," ἀφοροῦσα, apōuôsôs (Lk 9 61).

BIDDEN, bid’nh: "Called," "invited" (I 8 13).

BIDE, bid: A variant of "abide" (q.v.); is the rendering of παρήκομαι, parēkomai, in Wis 8 12 (RV "they shall wait for me."); in Acts 4 1 the same word is τάλαν, wait for,"

BIDKAR, bid’khur (בִּיתָר, bidkat; "son of Deker") [cf HPN, 69]; a captain in the service of Jehu, formerly his fellow-officer (2 K 9 25).

BIER, bër, (1) Found in the OT only in 2 S 3 1 and king David called "bier"; and in the Nab. in Lk 14 14, "he (Jesus) came and touched the bier." The Heb word rendered "bier" (מָיתָל) and its Gr equivalent (σῶρος) mean strictly "coffin." The so-called "bier" among the ancient Hebrews was simply an open coffin or a flat wooden frame, on which the body of the dead was carried from the house to the grave.

Bilgah, Bilgai
(2) Closed coffins, so universal now in the West, were unknown to common usage among the Hebrews of olden times, though not unknown to Egyptians, Greeks and Romans. At the burial of Abner the people were commanded to "rend their clothes" and "gird themselves with sackcloth," and the king himself in token of his grief and royal regard, "followed the bier" in the procession to the grave (2 S 3:31).

(3) Of Jesus, when He met the procession that went out of the gate of the city of Nain, bearing to the grave the only son of the widow mother, Luke says, 'When the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her . . . and he came nigh and touched the bier,' and commanded the young man to arise, etc. We should recall that contact with a dead body was forbidden by the law as a source of defilement (Nu 19:11); so Jesus here "came nigh" and "touched the bier" only in raising the young man, thus avoiding any criticism for infraction of the law. In Jn 11:35, as here, we have a miracle of Jesus which clearly pointed to a higher law—the eternal law of compassion which received its first expression in the life of Jesus and forms one of the distinctive features of the gospel.

BIGTHA, big'tha (נביא, bigh'vah'; LXX Beqâth, Barâzî, B, Beqâth, Bârâzî; A, 'Opeqâdâ, Opeqqâdâ): One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains having charge of the harem of King Xerxes ("Abuaserus") and commanded to bring Vashti to the king's banquet (Est 1:10).

BIGTHAN, big'than, BIGTHANA, big-thâ'na (גכ'ח, גכ'חנה, bigh'than, bigh'thana'; LXX omits name): One of the two chamberlains or eunuchs of Xerxes ("Abuaserus") who conspired against the king's life, the conspiracy being detected by Mordecai and the culprits hanged (Est 2:21). Possibly these men had been partially superseded by the degradation of Vashti and were thus prompted to take revenge on Xerxes.

BIGVAL, big'vâ (גבד, big'vah; Bœga, Bœgê, Bôvôd, Bôvôd): (1) The head of one of the families who returned with Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:2; Neh 7:7), having a large number of his retainers (2,056, according to Ezr 2:14; 2,067, according to Neh 7:19), besides 72 males later under Ezra (8:14). (2) One of those who subscribed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:16).

BILKATH-AVEN, bik'ath-'a'ven (גכ'כ, bikh'ath 'awen, "valley of vanity" [Am 1:5 AVm]). See AVEN; BETH-EDEN.

BILDAD, bil'dad (גכ'ד, bildâd, "Bel has loved"): The second of the three friends of Job who, coming from distant regions, make an appointment together to console with and comfort him in his affliction (Job 2:1). He is from Shuah, an unknown place somewhere in the countries E. and S.E. of Pal (or the designation Shuhihe may be intended to refer to his ancestor Shuah, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, Gen 25:2), and from his name (compoundd with Bel, the name of a Baal deity) would seem to represent the wisdom of the distant East. His three speeches are contained in Job 8, 18 and 25. For substance they are largely an echo of what Eliphaz has maintained, but charged with somewhat increased vehemence (of 8:2; 19:3-4) because he deems Job's words so impious and wrathful. He is the first to attribute Job's calamity to actual wickedness; but he gets at it indirectly by accusing his children (who were destroyed, 1:19) of sin to warrant their punishment (8:4). For his contribution to the discussion he appeals to tradition (8:8-10), and taking Eliphaz's cue of cause and effect (ver 11) he gives, evidently from the literary stores of wisdom, a description of the precarious state of the wicked, to which he contrasts, with whatever implication it involves, the felicitous state of the righteous (8:11-22). His second speech is an intensified description of the wicked man's woes, made as if to match Job's description of his own desperation (18:5-21 with 16:6-22), thus tacitly identifying Job with the reprobate wicked. His third speech (25), which is the last utterance of the friends, is brief, subdued in tone, and for substance is a kind of Parthian shot, reiterating Eliphaz's depravity idea, the doctrine that dies hardest. This speech marks the final silencing of the friends.

BILEAM, bil'è-am (גכ'א, bil'è'am; 'iblâmî, 'ib-lâmî): A town in the territory of Manasseh assigned to the Kohathite Levites (1 Ch 6:70), probably the same as Iblem (Josh 17:11, etc.), and identical with the modern Bel'dameh, half a mile S. of Jenën.

BILGAI, bil'ga, BILGAI, bil'gâ (גכ', bilgâ, "cheerfulness"): A priest of priestly family in the time of the Return (Neh 12:5), and (under the form of "Biligai," Neh 10:8) in the time of Nehemiah. According to 1 Ch 24:14, Bilgai is the 15th of the 24 divisions of the priests who officiated in the Temple. In the LXX, the names rend Bêvôs, Belgai, Belgô and Boldôs. The traditional explanation of the name is "rejuvenation"; modern exegetes explain it as "cheerfulness."
BILHAH, bil'ha (persona) (بلاد, bil'hā; Balālā, Baldīł): A slave girl whom Laban gave to Rachel (Gen 29:29), and whom the latter gave to Jacob as a collateral pledge (Gen 30:34); the mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gen 30:4; 35:26; 46:25; 1 Ch 1:13); guilty of incest with Reuben (Gen 35:22).

BILHAH, bil'ha (place) (بلاد, bil'hā; A, Balād, Balad; B, 'Ab'elālā, 'Abelālā): A city in Simeon (1 Ch 4:29) =Baalah (Josh 15:29). Balah (19:3), and Baalath (19:44). Unidentified.

BILHAH, bil'han (بلاد, bil'hān; Balalāv, Balādn): (1) A Morite chief, son of Ezer (Gen 36:27; 1 Ch 1:42). (2) A descendant of Benjamin, son of Jediel, father of seven sons who were heads of houses in their tribes (1 Ch 7:10).

BILL, BOND, etc.: (1) In the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16:6 f) "bill," AV, better "bond," RV, is used to translate the Gr γραμματα, which is the equivalent of the contemporary Heb legal term sh'tar, "contract" or "deed," "obligation," and "bond." In the usage of the times, was an acknowledgment of the taking over or receiving of goods or money that had to be written and signed by the debtor himself. (See Bāḥād Bahlah 10.) Edersheim's averment that the Gr word was adopted into the Heb (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, II, 279), is based, according to competent textual critics, upon a false reading. The Gr, according to Tisch., Treg. and WH, is ἐγγραμματα, not ἐγγραμματα (TR). The words, "the bond," and "to determine," nothing involved in controversy.

(2) A question much discussed is, Was "the bond" (RV) merely an acknowledgment of debt, or was it an obligation to pay a fixed annual rental from the produce of a farm? Edersheim, for instance, holds the former view, Lightfoot the latter. That the obligation is stated in the parable in kind—wheat and oil—and not in money—seems to bear against the simple debt theory. Edersheim sets down the reasons spoken of as authorized by the steward as amounting in money value to only about £5 and £25 respectively, and thinks they represented not a single but an annual payment (cf. Kennedy, 1-vol HDB, and Fraser, DOG, art. "Bill.").

(3) A similar question has arisen: Was the old "bond" simply altered, or was a new one substituted for it? Here again Lightfoot and Eder- sheim are in the controversy and on opposite sides. The alteration of the old bond is suggested through in the language here, and, moreover, would be, Eder-sheim thinks, in accordance with the probabilities of the case. Such bonds were usually written, not on vellum or papyrus, but on wax-covered tablets, and so could be easily erased or altered by the stylog with its flat, thick "eraser" (mōbēk). (4) It is probably safe to conclude: (a) that the "bill" or "bond" had to be written and signed by the person assuming the obligation; (b) that it was the only formal or legal evidence of the debt incurred; and (c) that the supervision of the whole transaction belonged of right to "the steward." Should the "steward" conpire with the debtor against the master, the latter, it would appear, would have the fraud.

BILL OF DIVORCEMENT, di-vōr's-ment. See DIVORCE in OT.

BILLOW, bil'o (נָבָל, "a great rolling wave"): Figuratively, of trouble, "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me." (Ps 42:7; cf Jon 2:5).

BILSHAN, bil'shan (بيلشان, bil'shān): An Israelite who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:2 =Neh 7:7). The name may be explained as "inquirer" (new Heb and Aram.), בָּילָח, bilash, the ב (b) being an abbreviation of ד (d), ben, as in יִבְּרִי, bidhār, and יִבְּרִית, bimhāl. Bilshan would then be a compound of תָּנ, ben, and לֶשֶׁם, lāshān. J. Halévy (Revue études juives, X, 3) translates the name "père de la langue," יִבְּרִי לֶשֶׁם, "abhi lāshān.

In 1 Ed 5:8, he is called "Beelasrus," which is akin to the form "Belshar" = "Belshar-usur" or "O Bel, protect the king." Bilshan points to "Belshon," "his lord." The rabbis take Bilshan as a surname to the preceding Mordecai. H. J. Wolf.

BIMHAL, bim'hal (بيلح, bimhāl): A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7:33).

BIND, bind, BOUND (בָּעַד, bā'ad;): There are a number of Heb words used to express this word in its various meanings, 'alam (Gen 37:7), 'aṣar (42:24), 'ābah (Dt 32:20). It sometimes means "to fasten" (Ex 28:28; Dute 14:25). It was used also with reference to an agreement in a judicial sense (Nu 30:2.3), or to make one a prisoner (Jgs 16:16; Ps 149:8). It means also "to control" (Job 38:31).

Figurative: In a fig. sense, to bind heavy and burdensome (extra) so-called religious duties on men (Mt 23:4). This fig. use of the word in Mt 16:19 and 18:18 has given special interest to it. Necessarily certain powers for administration must be conferred on this company of men to carry out the purpose of Christ. That this power was not conferred on Peter alone is evident from the fact that in Mt 18:18 it is conferred on all the apostles. The use of the word in the NT is to declare a thing to be binding or obligatory (Jn 20:23). This sense this authority is used by some denominations in the service in preparation for the Lord's Supper, in which after the confession of sin by the people the minister says, "I declare to you who have sincerely repented of your sins and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ the entire forgiveness of your sins." This statement is followed by the further declaration that if any have not so repented God will not forgive them, but will retain them and call them to account. The church of Rome that these statements of Our Lord confer on the priests and bishops, or primarily on the pope, the power to retain or forgive sins, is without historical validity and does violence to the Scriptures. See AUTHORITY; FORGIVENESS; PETER.

BINEA, bin'ē-a (ביןא, bin'ah): A name in the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch 8:37 =9:43).

BINNU, bin'ē-a (ביןא, bin'ah, a proper name, "a building up"): (1) A Levite, living in the time of Ezra (Ezr 8:33; Neh 10:9; 12:8). (2) One of the הֶבֶל פַּהֲלָה-מֹשֶׁב, who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10:30—Balnuus of 1 Esd 9:31) and one of the הֶבֶל בֵּן (Ezr 10:36) who had also intermarried. (3) The son of Henadad, who built part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:24), and sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:9). In all probability he is identical with "Bayvai, the son of Henadad" mentioned in 3:18. "Bayvai" is either a corruption of "Binnui," or is the name of the Levitical house of which Bayvai was the chief representative.

Birnui is mentioned in 10 9 as a leading Levite, and, besides, the names in these vs are obviously those of priestly Levites; so the former theory is probably correct.

BIRD-CATCHER, bûrd'katch'er. See Fowler.

BIRDS, bûrds (םִּילָה, 'ayyl; Gr variously τὰ πτερύγια, tâ peteryâ [Mt 13 4], τὰ ὅρνια τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, tâ ormâi toû ouranou [Rev 18 17], δρόνας, drônas [Mt 25 34]; Gen 1 21; Ex 8 7]).

I. Meaning of the Word.—All authorities agree that the exact origin of the word bird, as we apply it to feathered creatures, is unknown.

1. In Early Hebrew *ayyl means to "tear and scratch the face," and in its original form undoubtedly applied to birds of prey. It is probable that no spot of equal size on the face of the globe ever collected such numbers of vultures, eagles and hawks as ancient Pal. The land was so luxuriant that flocks and herds fed from the face of Nature. In cities, villages, and among tent-dwellers incessant slaughter went on for food, while the heavens must almost have been obscured by the ascending smoke from the burning of slain animals and by the breath of every man and woman. From all these slain creatures the offal was thrown to the birds. There were no guns; the arrows of bowmen or "throw sticks" were the only protection against them, and these arrows made no noise and also knew no feathered creatures, and did small damage. So easily it can be seen that the birds would increase in large numbers and become so bold that men were often in actual conflict with them, and no doubt their faces and hands were torn and scratched.

Later, as birds of song and those useful for food came into their lives, the word was stretched to cover all feathered creatures. In the AV ayyl is translated "fowl," and occurs several times: "And when the fowls came down upon the carcases, Abram drove them away" (Gen 15 11). "They shall be left together unto the fowls of the mountains, and to the beasts of the earth; and the fowls shall summer upon them, and all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them" (Isa 16 8). "There is a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen" (Job 28 7). The ARV changes these and all other references to feathered creatures to "birds," making a long list. The Hebrew ayyl in its final acceptance was used in Ps 44 12 as "bird" is with us.

Our earliest known form of the word is the OE word "bird," but they applied the term to the young of any creature.

Later its meaning was narrowed to young produced from English eggs, and the form changed to "bird."

II. Natural History of Birds.—The first known traces of birds appear in the formation of the Triassic period, and are found in the shape of footprints on the red sandstone of the Connecticut valley.

This must have been an ancient sea bed over which stalked large birds, leaving deeply impressed impressions of their feet. These impressions baked in the sun, and were drifted full of fine wind-driven sand before the return of the tide. Thus were preserved to us the traces of 33 species of birds all of which are known to have left footprints as much larger than our birds of today. The largest impressions ever found measured 15 in. in length by 10 in. in width, and were set from 4 ft. to 6 ft. apart. This evidence would form the basis for an estimate of a bird at least four times as large as an ostrich. That a bird of this size ever nested was not possible, and the finding of the remains of the dinornis in New Zealand. The largest specimen of this bird stood 19 ft. in height. The first complete skeleton of a bird was found in the limestone of the Jurassic period in Selenhofen, Bavaria. This bird had 12 teeth above and 3 below, each set in a separate socket, wings ending in three-fingered claws much longer than the claws of the feet, and a tail of 20 vertebrae, as long as the body, having a row of long feathers on it. It is 6 ft. high, the highest close to the size of a crow. The first preserved likeness of a bird was found frescoed on the inside of a tomb of Maydon, and is supposed to antedate the time of Moses 3,000 years. It is now carefully preserved in the museum of Cairo. The painting represents six geese, four of which can be recognized readily as the ancestors of two species known today. Scientists now admit that Moses was right in assigning the origin of birds to the water, as their structure is closer reptilian than mammalian, and they reproduce by eggs. To us it seems a long stretch between the reptile with a frame most nearly bird-like and a feathered creature, but there is a possibility that forms making closer connection yet will be discovered by later research.

The trunk of a bird is compact and in almost all instances boat-shaped. Without doubt prehistoric man conceived his idea of navigation and fashioned his vessel from the body of a few birds that do not fly, the wings are beaten to assist in attaining speed in running, as the ostrich, or to help in swimming under the water, as the auk. The skull of a young bird is made up of parts, as is that of man or animal; but with age these parts join so evenly that they appear in a seamless formation. The jaws extend beyond the face, forming a bill that varies in length and shape with species, and it is used in securing food, in defense, feather dressing, noising the earth, and in the start of the mouth and hand of man. The spine is practically immovable, because of the ribs attached to the upper half and the bony structure supporting the pelvic joints of the lower. In contrast with these the neck is formed of from 10 to 23 vertebrae, and is so flexible that a bird can turn its head completely around, a thing impossible to man or beast. The breast bone is large, strong, and provided with a ridge in the middle. In birds of strong flight, smallest in swimmers, and lacking only in birds that do not fly, as the ostrich. The wings correspond to the arms of man, and are now used in flight and swimming only. Such skeletons as the Archaeopteryx with the tail of the worm were once claws. This shows that as birds spread over land and developed wing power in searching longer distances for food or when driven by varying conditions of climate, the wings were used in flight, and the claws gradually joined in a tip and were given covering that grew feathers, while the bill became the instrument for taking food and for defense. At the same time the long tail proving an incumbrance, it gradually withered away and contracted to its present size. Studied in detail of bony structure, muscle, and complicated arrangement of feathers of differing sizes, the wing of a bird proves one of Nature's marvels. The legs are used in walking or swimming, the thigh joint being so enveloped in the body that the true leg is often mistaken for it. This makes the knee of a man correspond to the heel of a bird, and in young birds of prey especially, the shank or tarsus is used in walking, until the bones harden and the birds are enabled to bear their weight on the feet and straighten the shank. The toes vary with species. Pliny classified birds by them: "The first and principal difference and distinction in birds is taken from their feet; for they have either hooked talons, as Hawkes, or long round claws as Hens, or else they be broad, flat and whole-footed as Geese." Flight is only possible to a bird when both wings are balanced, and the bird is in a position that the legs balance perfectly. In sleep almost every bird places its head under its wing and stands on one foot. The arrangement by which this is accomplished, without tiring the bird in the least, is little short of a miracle. As a result of this slow ages of evolution. In the most finished degree this provision for the comfort of the bird is found among cranes and other long-legged water birds. The bone of one part of the leg fits into the bone of the other part in such a way that it can be made to fit into place with no exertion on the part of the bird. At the same time the muscles that work the claws, cross the joints of the leg so that they are stretched by the weight of the bird, and with no effort, it stands on earth or perch even on a branch. This explains the question so frequently asked as to why the feet of a perching bird do not become so cramped and tired that it falls. Birds feed according to their nature, some on prey taken live some on the carrion of dead bodies, some on fish and vegetable products of the water, some on fruit seed, insects and worms of the land. 3. Birds' Food, Blood, etc. Almost every bird indulges in a combination of differing foods. Their blood is from 12° to 10° warmer than that of the rest of the animal kingdom, and they exhibit a corresponding exhilaration of spirits. Some indulge in hours of singing and song, some in bubbling notes of song, while others dart near earth in playful dashes of flight. Birds are supposed to be rather deficient in the senses of taste and touch, and to have unusually keen vision. The young of birds of prey, song birds, and some water birds, remain in the nests for differing lengths of time and are fed by their mothers; while others of the water birds and most of the game birds leave the nest as soon as the down is dry, and find food as they are taught by their elders, being sheltered at night so long as needful. 4. Birds of the Bible.—The birds of the Bible were the same species and form as exist in PAL today. Because of their wonderful coloring, powerful flight, joyous song, and their similarity to humanity in home-making and the business of raising their young, birds have been much noticed, and have held conspicuous place since the dawn of history. When the brain of man was young and more credulous than today he saw omens, signs and miracles in the characteristic acts of birds, and attributed to them various marvelous powers: some were considered of good omen and a blessing, and some were bad and a curse. The historians of the Bible frequently used birds in comparison, simile, and metaphor. They are much mentioned in Gen 7 14-15, 1. Earliest "They, and every beast after its kind, Mention and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after its kind, and every bird after its kind, every bird of every sort." This is the enumeration of the feathered creatures taken into the ark to be preserved for the perpetuation of species after the flood abated. They are next found in the description of Abram, where it was specified that he was to use, with the animals slaughtered, a turtle dove and a young pigeon, the birds got to be divided. It is also recorded that the birds of prey were attracted by the carcasses as described in Gen 15 9-11, "And he said unto him, Take me a heifer three years old, and a she-goat three years old, and a ram three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon." And he took him all these, and parted them in the midst, and laid each half over against the other: but the birds divided he not. And the birds of prey came down upon the carcasses, and Abram drove them away." PAL abounded in several varieties of "doves" (q.v.) and their devotion to each other, and tender, gentle characteristics had marked them as a loved possession of the land; while the clay cotes of pigeons were reckoned in establishing an estimate of a man's wealth. In an abandon of gratitude to God these people offered of their best-loved and most prized possessions as sacrifice; and so it is not surprising to find the history of burnt offerings frequently mentioning these birds. One variety of pigeon was set above all others. Their use is first commanded in Lev 1 14-17, "And if his oblation to Jeh be a burnt-offering of birds, then he shall offer his oblation of turtle-doves, or of young pigeons. And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and shall burn off its head, and burn it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be drained out on the side of the altar; and he shall take away its crop with the fifth thereof, and cast it beside the altar on the east part, in the place of the ashes." Again in Lev 6 7-10, we read: "And if his means suffice not for a lamb, then he shall bring his trespass-offering for that wherein he hath sinned, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, unto Jeh, for an offering, and the other for a burnt-offering." Throughout the Bible these birds figure in the history of sacrifice (Lev 12 8; 14 4-8; Nu 6 10, etc.). The custom of weaving cages of willow wands, in which to keep young birds or fowls seems to be referred to when Job asks (41 5): "Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? Or wilt thou bind him for thy maldens?" See Job 12 7: "But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; And the fowl of the air, and they shall tell thee." David was thinking of the swift homeward flight of an eagle when he wrote: "In Jehovah do I take refuge: How say ye to my soul, flee as a bird to your mountain ?" (Ps 11 1). His early days guarding the flocks of his father no doubt suggested to him the statement found in Ps 50 11: "I know all the birds of the mountains; And the wild beasts of the field are mine" (RVm "In my mind"). In describing Lebanon, the Psalmist wrote of its waters: "By them the birds of the heavens have their habitation; They sing among the branches" (104 12). He mentioned its trees: "Where the birds make their nests: As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house" (104 17). See also 78 27; 148 10. The origin of the oft-quoted phrase, "A little bird told me," can be found in Ecel 10 20: "Revel not the king, no, not in thy thought; and reveile not the rich in thy bedchamber: for a bird of the heavens shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.”

In a poetical description of spring in the Song of Solomon, we read:

“The flowers appear on the earth;
The time of the singing of birds is come;
The voice of the turtle-dove is heard in our land”
(Can 2 13).

In his prophecy concerning Ethiopia, Isaiah wrote, “They shall be left together unto the ravenous birds of the mountains, and to the beasts of the earth; and the ravenous birds shall summer upon them, and all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them” (Isa 18 6). In foretelling God’s judgment upon Babylon, Isaiah (46 11) refers to Cyrus as “a ravenous bird [called] from the east, the man of my counsel from a far country”; “probably in allusion to the fact that the griffon was the emblem of Persia; and embroidered on its standard” (HDB, I, 632); (see Eagle). Jer 4 25 describes the habit of birds, which invariably seek shelter before an approaching storm. In his denunciation of Israel, Jer, questions, in Jer 12 9, “Is my heritage unto me as a speckled bird of prey? are the birds of prey against her round about?” When Jeremiah threatened the destruction of Jerusalem, he warned, “They shall be left together unto the ravenous birds of the mountains, and to the beasts of the earth; and the ravenous birds shall summer upon them, and by the hand of the band that seek their life: and their dead bodies will I give to be food for the birds of the heavens” (19 7): that is, He would leave them for the carrion eaters. Ezekiel threatens the same fate to the heirlooms of God (Ezek 43 17). Hosae (9 11) promises of Ephraim, “Their glory shall fly away like a bird.” In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus mentions the birds, as recorded by Mt 6 26: “Behold the birds of the heavens, they neither sow nor reap, nor gather into barns; and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are not ye of much more value than they?” In the sermon from the boat where He spoke the parable of the Sower He again mentioned the birds: “As he sowed, some seeds fell by the way side, and the birds came and devoured them” (13 4). Mark describes the same sermon in 4 4, and ver 32 of the same ch quotes the parable of the Mustard Seed: “Yet when it is sown, [it] groweth up, and become greater than of the herbs of the field, and shall gather out great branches; so that the birds of the heaven can lodge under the shadow thereof.” In 8 5, Luke gives his version of the parable of the Sower, and in 13 19 of the Mustard Seed. See also Rev 19 17: “I will take the reprobate of birds out of the eyes of the earth.” Also Birds of YPNA:

BIRDS OF ABOMINATION. See ABOMINATION, BIRDS OF.

BIRDS OF PREY, præ: They were undoubtedly the first birds noticed by the compilers of Bib. record. They followed the droves of cattle and perched on the walls of cities. They were offensive in manner and odor, and of a boldness unknown to us in birds. They flocked in untold numbers, there was small defence against them, and the largest and strongest not only carried away meat prepared for food and sacrifice, but also preyed upon the much-prized house pigeons, newly born of the smaller animals, and even at times attacked young children. See Gen 15 11, “And the birds of prey, and the father avian drove them away.”

Because they were attracted from above the clouds by anything suitable for food, people recognized that these were birds of unusual vision. When Job wanted to tell how perfectly the path to the gold mine was concealed, he wrote, “There path no bird of prey knoweth” (Job 28 7). The inference is, that, if it were so perfectly concealed that it escaped the piercing eyes of these birds, it was not probable that man would find it. These birds were so strong, fierce and impudant that everyone feared them, and when the prophecy was fulfilled, that people would be left for birds of prey to ravage, they fully understood what was meant, and they were afraid (Isa 18 6). In His complaint against His heritage, Jesh questions, “Is my heritage unto me as a speckled bird of prey? are the birds of prey against her round about?” (Jer 12 9). And when He prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem, Jeremiah painted a dreadful picture, but one no doubt often seen in that land of pilage and warfare: “Their dead bodies will I give to be food for the birds of the heavens, and for the beasts of the earth” (19 7).

BIRDS, UNCLEAN, un-kînā: The lists of birds forbidden as food are given in Lev 11 13–19 and Dt 14 12–18. The names are almost identical, Dt containing one more than Lev and varying the order slightly. In Dt 14 13 the first name, hârâ’îh, is almost certainly a corruption of ha-dâlîh, but the following bird, called "kîte" in Lev, while in Dt it is tâ’lîh. The additional one in Dt is ha-dây’yâh, and is tâ’lîh. Doubtless the three words, ha-dâlîh, ha-dây’yâh and ha-dây’yâh, are generic and refer to different birds of the kite or perhaps falcon family, so it is impossible to give specific meanings to them. There are twenty-one names in all, counting the extra one in Dt. The tr of many of these words is disputed. The ARV gives them as follows: eagle, gier eagle, osprey, kite, falcon, gleece, every raven, owl, night-hawk, sea-net, hawk, little owl, corncrane, great owl, horned owl, pelican, vulture, stork, heron, hoopoe and bat. It will be observed that all of them are either carrion-eaters, birds of prey, or water fowl. The names of those birds which may be eaten are not given, the principle of classification is that of elimination. No principle of separation is given as is the case with the animals. The reason for the prohibition doubtless lies in the unsanitary and repulsive habits of the birds, and the Divine command endorsing the instincts which were repelled by such food. For particulars, see separate arts. on each of these birds. See also ABOMINATION, BIRDS OF.

BIRSHA, bâr-shâ (בָּרְשָׁא, birsha): King of Go- morrah (Gen 14 2), who joined the league against Chedorlaomer. The name is probably corrupt; some have tried to explain it as בָּרֶשָׁא, the wickedness," a name purposely used by the writer in referring to this king.

BIRTH, bîr̂ (בִּרְ, bîr̂): (1) It was said by the angel beforehand of John the Baptist, “Many shall rejoice at his birth,” and when he was born Elisabeth said, “Blessed be the Lord done unto me, for he hath taken away my reproach among men” (Lk 1 14 25). Among the ancient Hebrews barrenness was a “reproach,” and the birth of a child, of a son esp., an occasion for rejoicing.

(2) This, no doubt, was due in part to the Messianic hope inspired and sustained by prophecy (see Gen 3 15, where it was foretold that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent’s head; and subsequent prophecies too numerous to mention). Cases in point worth studying are found in Gen 4 1, where Eve rejoices over the birth of her firstborn and eircis, “I have gotten a man with the help of Jeh’; and 1 S 1:20, where Hannah exults over her firstborn, calling his name "Samuel," "because," she says, "I have asked him of Jeh." (3) The marvelous passage in Isa 7:14, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel," must have intensified the longing everywhere and among Jewish maidens to be a mother, if mayhap, under God, she might be the mother of Messiah—Immanuel! BIRTHDAY, bürth’day. (1) The custom of observing birthdays of great men, esp. of kings, was widespread in ancient times (see Gen 40:20 ff., "the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday," etc; cf 2 Macc 6:7; and Herod. ix:10; in the Attic Gr, cf Mt 1:26; Mk 6:21; "He [a birthday made a supper to his lords," etc. i.e. Herod Antipas). Here we see the ancient custom reflected in two conspicuous instances. apart: (a) Pharaoh, on his birthday "made a feast unto all his servants," etc. (his birthday made a supper to his lords, and the high captains), etc. The AV (Mt 14:6) has it "when Herod's birthday was kept," etc.

The correct text here (Tisch. HH) has a very peculiar corrupt action, that is, material derivative of meaning. The locative case gives the time of the principal action, danced on Herod's birthday, when it occurred. The construction is not unexamined (see Jull. 1699). This need not be called "a case absolute," although it corresponds to the Lat ablative (locative) absolute; and the Gr genitive absolute is itself not really "absolute," i.e. it is not cut loose from the rest of the construction, but gives some event (which the principal action is referred, for the indication of its circumstances.

(2) The term "birthday" (ëravēra, tō̂n genēfēs) was applied also to the anniversary of a king's accession to the throne (Edersheim); but Wissler's argument that such is the case here is not conclusive. It is easy to suppose that when Herod's birthday approached he was sojourning at the castle of Machaerus, accompanied by leading military and civil notables (Mt 2:21). Ptolemy, as he was, not properly "king" at all, he affected kingly ways (cf Est 5:6, 7:2).

(3) Genestica, which in Attic Gr means the commemoration of the dead, in later Gr is interchangeable with the gentile праздничный "birthday celebration," and there is no good reason why the rendering of the AV and RV here, "birthday," should not be right. (See Swete on Mt 6:21, and HUD, s.v.) For date of Christ's birth, etc. see Jesus Christ; Calendar, etc.

BIRTHRIGHT, bürth'right (ḇūtĥ’ātĥ, bikhōrātĥ, from bikhōr, "firstborn"); πρωτότοκια, prótotokía: Birthright is the right which naturally belonged to the firstborn son. Where there were more wives than one, the firstborn was the son who in point of time was born before the others, apparently whether his mother was a wife or a concubine. Sarah protests against Ishmael being heir along with Isaac, but it is possible that the bestowal of the rights of the firstborn on Isaac was not due to any law, but rather to the influence of a favorite wife (Gen 21:10). The birthright of the firstborn consisted in the first place of a double portion of what his father had to leave. This probably means that he had a double share of such property as corn. We have no knowledge of the manner in which property was inherited in the patriarchal age, but it seems probable that the lands and flocks which were the possession of the family as a whole, remained so after the death of the father. The firstborn became head of the family and thus succeeded to the charge of the family property, becoming responsible for the maintenance of the younger sons, the widow or widows, and the unmarried daughters. He also, as head, succeeded to a considerable amount of authority over the other members. Further, be generally received the blessing, which placed him close and honored among the posterity of his father. According to the accounts which have come down to us, all these gifts and privileges could be diverted from the firstborn son. This could happen with his own consent, as in the case of Esau, who sold his birthright to Jacob (Gen 25:29-34), or by the decision of the father, as in the case of Reuben (Gen 48:22; 49:3.4; 1 Ch 5:1.2) and of Shemir (1 Ch 26:10). In the Deuteronomic version of the law, a provision is made, prohibiting the father from making the younger son the possessor of the birthright, just because his mother was specially beloved (Dt 21:15-17). The blessing also could be diverted from the eldest son. This was done when Jacob blessed the children of Joseph, and deliberately put the younger before the elder (Gen 48:13,14,17-19); even when the blessing was obtained by the younger son in a fraudulent manner, it could not be recalled (Gen 27). Jacob does not appear to have inherited any of the property of his father; he had obtained both the birthright and the blessing.

In the NT "birthright," prototokia, is mentioned only once (He 12:16), where the reference is to Esau. In various passages where Our Lord is spoken of as the firstborn (Mt 1:25; Mk 12:28) He 1:2, the association of ideas with the OT conception of birthright is easy to trace. See also First-born; Family; Heir; Inheritance; Law.

BIRTH-STOOL, bürth'sool (from Birthright). Found only in Ex 1:16, in connection with Heb women in Egypt when oppressed by Pharaoh. The Heb (ḇbŵnayim) here rendered "birth-stool" is used in Jer 18:3, and is there rendered "potters' wheel." The word is used in both places in the dual form, which points, no doubt, to the fact that the potter's wheel was composed of two discs, and suggests that the birth-stool was similarly double. See Stool.

BiraZIITH, bûr-zâ'ith, AV Birzavith, bûr-zâ’vith (בּירְצַיָּה, birzavith or birzayith; בּירְצַזְיָה, Birzazit, or Bérsále, Bérzale): The name of a town in Asher founded by Malchid (1 Ch 7:31). It probably corresponds to the modern Bir ez-Zait, "well of olive," near Tyre.

BISHLAM, bish'lam (בּישָלָם, bisshālām, "peaceful" [?]: One of three foreign colonists who wrote a letter of complaint against the Jews to Artaxerxes (Ezr 4:7-11; Esd 2:16). In 1 Esd the reading is "Bélusm." "And in the days of Artaxerxes wrote Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel, and the rest of his companions, unto Artaxerxes, king of Persia," etc (Ezr 4:7). The LXX renders Bishlam en eβραίoν "in peace," as though it were a phrase rather than a proper name; this is clearly an error.

Bishop, bish'up: The word is evidently an abbreviation of the Gr ἐπισκόπως, episkopos; Lat episcopus.

General

The LXX gives it the generic meaning of "superintendence, oversight, searching" (Nu 4:16; 31:14) in matters pertaining to the church, in matters pertaining to the church, the LXX 2 K 12:11; 2 Ch 34:12,17; 2 Sam and 1 Chr 1:54; Wisd 1:6). Nor is it unknown Gr to classical Gr. Thus Homer in the ἱδαί applied it to the gods (xkx.255), also Plutarch, Con., 5. In Athens the governors of conquered states were called by this name.
The word is once applied to Christ himself, "unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (1 Pet 2:25). For the church, Pauline liturgies often included, as an alternative for presbíterus or elder (Tit 1:7; 1 Tim 3:1; 4:14; 5:17.19). The earliest ecclesiastical offices instituted in the church were those of elders and deacons, or rather the reverse, inasmuch as the latter office grew almost immediately out of the needs of the Christian community at Acts (6.1–6). The presbyterial constitution of Jerusalem must have been very old (Acts 11:30) and was distinct from the apostolate (Acts 15:24,6.28; 16:4). As early as 50 AD Paul appointed "elders" in every church, with prayer and fasting (Acts 14:23), referring to the Asiatic churches before established. But in writing to the Philippians (1:1) he speaks of "bishops" and "deacons." In the gentile Christian churches this title evidently had been adopted; and it is only in the Pastoral Epistles that we find the name "presbyters" applied. The name "presbyter" or "elder," familiar to the Jews, signifies their age and place in the church; while the other term "bishop" refers rather to their office. But both evidently have reference to the same persons. Their office is defined as "ruling" (Rom 12:8), "overseeing" (Acts 20:17.28; 1 Pet 5:2), or perhaps for the flock of God (Acts 20:28). But the word archon, "to rule," in the hierarchical sense, is never used. Moreover each church had a college of presbyter-bishops (Acts 20:17,28; Phil 1:1; 1 Tim 4:14). During Paul's lifetime the church was evidently still unaware of the distinction between presbyters and bishops.

Of a formal ordination, in the later hierarchical order, there is no trace as yet. The word "ordained" used in the AV was a 16th century interpolation, rightly emended in the RV. Neither the word cheirotoníasantes (Acts 14:23, trd "appointed" ARV) nor katastáseis (Tit 1:5, trd "appoint" ARV) is capable of this rich sense. In rendering these words invariably by "ordain," the AV shows a vitium originis. No one doubts that the idea of ordination is extremely old in the history of the church, but the laying on of hands, mentioned in the NT (Acts 13:3; 1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6; of Acts 14:25-26; 20:28) was perhaps an appropriation of an infant gift or to its invocation, rather than to the imparting of an official status.

According to Rome, as finally expressed by the Council of Trent, and to the episcopal idea in general, the hierarchical order originated in the 3rd cent., existed from the beginning in the NT church. But besides the NT as above quoted, the early testimony of the church still maintains the identity of "presbyters" and "bishops." Thus Clement of Rome (Ep. 1, ch. 42, 44, 57), the Did. ch. 15; perhaps the Constitutions, II, 33, 34, in the use of the pl. form; Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., II.2, 3), Ambrosiaster (on 1 Tim 3:10), Chrysostom (Hom. 9 in Ep. ad Tim.), in an unequivocal statement, the "presbyters of old were called bishops . . . and the bishops presbyters," equally unequivocally Jerome (Ad Th., I, 7), "the same is the presbyter, who is also the bishop." Augustine and other Fathers of the 4th and 5th centuries hold this view, and even Peter Lombard, who preceded Aquinas as the great teacher of the church of the Middle Ages. Hefich of Oxford and Harnack of Berlin, in the face of all this testimony, maintain a distinction between the presbyters, having charge of the law and discipline of the church, and the bishops, as being charged with the pastoral care of the church, preaching and worship.

The theory is built upon the argument of prevailing social conditions and institutions, as adopted and imitated by the church of the East. So far as textual and patristical evidence is concerned, the distinction between presbyters and bishops can only be maintained by a forced exegesis of the Scripture. The later and rapid growth of the hierarchial idea arose from the accession of the bishops of the Christian view of the church, as a necessary continuation of the OT dispensation, which has so largely influenced the history of the inner development of the church in the first six centuries of her existence.

HENRY E. DOKER

ANGELICAN VIEW

1. Episcopacy Defined.—Episcopacy is the government in the Christian church by bishops. The rule of the Orthodox churches in the East, of the Roman Catholics, and of the Anglesic is that the consecration of other bishops, and the ordination of priests and deacons can only be by a bishop; and with them, a bishop is one who claims historic descent from apostolic or sub-apostolic times.

H. OFFICE IN THE EARLY CHURCH.—In the NT, the office of bishop is not clearly defined. Indeed there appear to have been many degrees of ministry in the infant church: apostles, prophets, evangelists, teachers, presbyters or elders, bishops or overseers, and deacons for the flock of God. Due allowance is not generally made for the mental attitude of the apostles and early Christians. They were looking for the speedy return of Christ, and consequently did not organize the church in its infancy or later in any way to do. For this reason, while the different persons who composed the body of Christian ministers did not overlap or infringe on each other's work, yet the relative rank or priority of each minister was not clearly defined.

The apostles were undoubtedly first, and in them rested the whole authority, and they were the depository of the power committed to them by Christ.

1. Apostles unto them by Christ.

Next to the apostles in rank, and first in point of mention (Acts 11:27), came the prophets. So important were these officers in the early church that they were sent from Antioch to Barnabas and Saul.

2. Prophets Jesus to warn the rapidly growing church of the impending famine. Then it appears that there were resident prophets at Antioch, men of considerable importance since their names are recorded, Barnabas, Symeon, Lucius, Manaen, and Saul (Acts 13:1). These men received a command from the Holy Spirit to "separate a Barnabas and Saul," on whom they laid their hands and sent them forth on their work.

The election is conducted on the same lines as the election by the eleven apostles of St. Matthias, and Barnabas and Paul are hereafter called apostles. It is an ordination to the highest order in the Christian ministry by "prophets and teachers." Whether "prophets and teachers" refers to two distinct ministrers, or whether the term used for the same one is uncertain. It may be that of the five men mentioned, some were prophets, and others teachers.

In Acts 16:32 we have given us the names of two other prophets, Judas and Silas. St. Paul tells the Corinthians (1 Cor 12:28) that God hath set some in his church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, and writing to the Ephesians he places the prophets in the same rank. "He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry" (Eph 4:11.12 AV). And again, he says that the mystery of Christ is now "revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit" (Eph
3.5. The same apostle in that wonderful imagery of Christians being built up for a habitation of God, says they are "being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone" (Eph 2 20).

In the case of the ordination of Timothy, which St. Paul says distinctly was by his own laying on of hands and that of the presbytery, it is of great consequence to note that St. Paul says to Timothy that his ordination was "according to the prophesies which went before on thee" (1 Tim 1 18 AV). From this it would appear that the prophets, as in the case of St. Paul himself, guided by the Holy Ghost, chose Timothy for the oversight or bishopric, or it may be, which is just as likely, that Timothy was set apart by the laying on of hands by some prophets, to the rank of elder or presbyter which did not carry with it the "overservship." It is at any rate found in the case of Timothy that St. Paul is consistent in pointing out that it was through the prophets (cf 1 Tim 1 18; 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6).

In revelation, the term prophet constantly occurs as a term denoting rank equivalent to that of apostle: "ye saints, and ye apostles, and ye prophets" (Rev 18 20); "blood of prophets and of saints" (Rev 16 6; 18 24). The angel calls himself in a vision of himself as a prophet, and "the prophet of God" (Rev 22 9 AV). The words prophesy and prophesying are used in a general sense, and it does not mean that they were in every case the formal utterances of prophets.

The ministry of the elders of the Christian church was modeled after that of the synagogue in which there were elders and teachers.

3. Elders or The Christian elders or presbyters were Presbyters most likely a council of advice in each local Christian society. They appear to act conjointly and not separately (Acts 15 4 6 22; 16 4; 20 17; Jas 5 14).

Teachers were the equivalent of those teachers or catechists of the synagogue before whom Our Lord would be found in the temple. Even teachers were persons who probably had the gift of oratory and whose function it was to preach the glad tidings. Philip was one of them (Acts 21 8). In the instructions given to them, St. Paul enjoins them to do the work of an evangelist, that is to say, to preach the gospel. This was to be part of his work in the ministry.

In writing to Timothy, St. Paul twice says that he himself ordained presbyters or teachers. This does not mean that he held three grades of the ministry, but that his duties as an apostle were to preach and to teach. The fact that the apostles called themselves elders does not thereby confirm the view that the bishops mentioned by them were not superior to elders, any more than the fact that the apostles called themselves, teachers, or preachers, makes for the view that teachers, or preachers, were the equals of apseles.

Bishops or overseers were probably certain elders chosen out of the body of local elders. Under the Jewish dispensation, the elders stayed at home, that is, they did no ministerial visiting, but it was soon found necessary as the Christian church grew to have someone to attend to outside work to win over by persuasion and exposition of the Scriptures those inclined to embrace Christianity. This necessitated visiting families in their own homes. Then it became necessary to shepherd the sheep. Someone had to oversee or superintend the general work. The Jewish elders always had a head and in a large synagogue the conditions laid down for its head, or legatus, were almost identical with those laid down by St. Paul to Timothy. He was to be a father of a family, not merely a teacher, possessing a good voice, apt to teach, etc.

The term episkopos was one with which the Hellenistic Jews and Gentiles were well acquainted; and it became thus a fitting term by which to designate the men called out of the body of elders to take special work of oversight. Then, again, the term episkopos was endowed to the early Christians as the one applied to Our Lord—"the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (1 Pet 2 25). The duties of elders, or presbyters, are not clearly defined in the NT.

In the Acts, the term is found only twice, one in reference to Judas, "his bishopric [or overseership] let another take" (Acts 1 20 AV), and in St. Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus, he warns them to feed the church over which they have been made overseers or bishops (Acts 20 28). It is impossible to say whether this "overservship" refers to all the elders addressed, or to such of those elders as had been made "overservors," or "bishops." In the epistles, we find the church more clearly organized, and in these writings we find more definite allusions to bishops and their duties (Phil 1 1; 1 Tim 3 1 2; Tit 1 7; 1 Pet 2 25).

St. Paul tells Timothy, "If a man desire the office of a bishop he desireth a good work. If a man desire the office of a bishop [or overseer] must be blameless" (1 Tim 3 1 2 AV). He tells Titus that "he is to ordain elders in every city" and that a "bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God" (Tit 1 5 7 AV).

On the other hand, there are numerous texts where elders and their duties are mentioned and where there is no reference whatever to bishopric or oversight. The epistles show that of necessity there had grown to be a more distinct organization of the ministerial body of the church, and, so the term "bishops" as a title is applicable to the heads of the synagogues to some of the elders who had been committed a bishopric or oversight. At the same time the rank of a bishop, or overseer, was not yet one of the highest. St. Paul does not enumerate it in the order of ministry which he gives to the Ephesians—apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers.

That Timothy had an oversight over the elders or presbyters is evident from the fact that St. Paul enjoins him to show himself apt to teach and that he may be an elder; that is, that elder receive not an accusation, except at the mouth of two or three witnesses. Then that sin reprove in the sight of all" (1 Tim 5 19 20). This, of course, refers to a formal trial by one in authority.

It has been asserted that the terms elder and bishop in the NT were equivalent and denoted the same office or grade in the ministry. This assertion seems unwarranted. They do not naturally denote the same grade any more than do apostle and teacher, or angel and prophet.

The deacons were the seven appointed to take charge of the temporal affairs of the church. Their appointment was perhaps suggested by the alms-collectors of the synagogue. In the NT they do not appear as deacons to have had any part in the sacred ministry, except, in the case of Philip the evangelist, if it be assumed that he was a deacon, which is uncertain. Nowhere is it recorded that they laid hands on anyone, or were considered as capable of bestowing any grace. In the epistles they are mentioned with the bishops—"bishops and deacons" (Phil 1 1), thus showing the nature of their in- stance as the helpers of the "bishops" in the management of the giving funds, or properties of the church.

III. Episcopacy according to the NT.—The passages where the Gr word occurs which has been either as bishops, or overseers, are so few that they are enumerated: Acts 20 17, 28: the Ephesian elders are stated to be bishops [or overseers] to feed the church; Phil 1 1: the salutation of Paul and Timothy to bishops [or overseers] and deacons at Ephesus; Tit 3 1: to give them charge over the house of God: see also 1 Tim 3 10, where it is said that the bishop is the shepherd of the flock. The apostles, however, did not always appoint the bishops of a church as it was supposed they did at Rome; Tim 2 25, where the apostle referring to Christ says, "unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls."

IV. The "Apostolic".—Passing out of the NT, we come to the early Christian writing, the so-called Teaching of the Twelve Apostles. Setting aside the question for what class of Christians this document was intended, the clear fact stands out that at the date of its writing the two highest grades in the Christian ministry were still called apostles and prophets. Various dates have been assigned to this document ranging from 80 to 160 AD.

At the end of ch. 10, which deals with the thanksgiving or eucharist, the remark is made, "But permit the prophets to make thanksgiving as much as they desire." Chs 11 and 13 deal with apostles and prophets. They were to be treated "according to the ordinances of the gospel." A prophet could be on behalf of others, but not for himself, but a prophet could settle among a congregation, and in that case he was to receive the same first-fruits "of money and raiment and of every possession" as the chief priest did under the old dispensation. It is to be noted that in reality the prophets, though placed second in order, were to be treated with the greater respect. If the prophet settles down, he becomes the man of the first rank in that Christian community.

Ch. 15 deals with bishops and deacons, and we are told that if appointed they rendered the ministry of prophets and teachers, but the warning is given, "Despise them not, therefore, for they are your honoured ones, together with the prophets and teachers. I knew that bishops were locally called; and that while they could be appointed over a community, they were not considered as of equal rank with the prophets.

V. Clement of Rome.—Clement of Rome in his Epistle to the Corinthians says that the apostles preaching through countries and cities appointed the first-fruits of their labors to be bishops and deacons (ch 42). It is usually said that Clement meant elders by the term "bishops," but it is much more likely that he meant what he said; that according to the tradition received by him, the apostles appointed bishops, that is, appointed bishops out of the elders—mentioned in the Acts. In ch 44 Clement warns against the sin of ejecting from the episcopate those who have presented the offering, and says, "Blessed are those presbyters who have finished their course."

The reason why the terms apostles and prophets fell into desuetude was, as regards the first, not so much out of reverence to the original apostles, but because the apostles in the sub-apostolic age became apparently only wandering evangelists of little standing; while the prophets lowered their great office by descending to be soothsayers, as the Shepherd of Hermas plainly states. With the fall of the episcopate and the prophets, there rose into prominence the bishops and deacons.

VI. Bishops and Deacons.—The deacons acted as secretaries and treasurers to the bishops. They were their right-hand men, representing them in all secular matters. As the numbers of Christians increased, it was found absolutely necessary for the bishops to delegate some of their spiritual authority to a second order.

VII. Bishops and Presbyters (Priests).—Thus very slowly emerged out of the body of elders the officials presbyters or priests, of which the apostles delegated the power to teach, to preach, to baptize, to celebrate the Holy Eucharist; but how slowly is evidenced by the fact that so late as 755 AD the Council of Worm forbade priests to baptize, except by direct permission of their bishop.

VIII. Ignatian Epistles on the Three Orders.—When we come to the Ignatian epistles written between 110-17 AD, we find a distinct threefold order. We have given us the names of Damas, for bishop, Bassus and Apollonius for presbyters, Zotion for deacons. They were gradually raised. There is no question that the bishop is supreme. Apostles and prophets are not even mentioned. The bishop succeeds to all the powers the apostles and prophets had. On the other hand, as with the Jewish elders, so with the Christian bishops, they form a council with the bishop. Here we see in clear day what we had all along suspected to be the case in apostolic times: a council of presbyters with a ruler at their head and deacons to attend to such matters.

It is quite immaterial as to whether a bishop had ten or a hundred presbyter-elders under him, whether he was bishop in a small town or in a large city. The question of numbers under him would not affect his authority as has been claimed. The greatness of the city in which he exercised this rule would add dignity to his position, but: nothing to his inherent authority.

For this reason it is admitted by all that bishops, priests, and deacons have been continuously in existence. Their powers and duties have varied, have been curtailed as one order has encroached on the power of the other, but still there the three orders have been, gradually the presbyters or priests encroached on the power of the bishop, till now, according to Anglican usage, only the power of ordaining, confirming and consecrating churches is left to them.

IX. Views of Reformers.—At the time of the Reformation there was a great outcry against bishops. This was caused by the fact that under feudalism the bishops had come to be great temporal lords immersed in schemes of political and material aggrandizement, and often actually leading their subjects in the ways of despotism. Many of the bishops were proud and arrogant, forgetful that their duties as fathers of the children of Christ were to look after those committed to them with fatherly kindness and charity or that as pastors they had to tend the erring sheep with Divine patience and infinite love.

The bulk of the adherents to the Reformed religion, looking upon the bishops as they were and as their fathers had known them, received them retaining the titles, although their principal men, like Calvin, deplored the loss of bishops, and hoped that bishops of the primitive order would some day be restored. The present modern Anglican bishop seems to stand in his person and office the requirements laid down by Calvin.

Thus the claim put forth by the Anglicans in the preface to the Ordinal may be considered sound: "It is evident unto all men, and hath been intimated and acknowledged by Authors, that from the Apostles' time there have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons."

CONGREGATIONAL VIEW

As a spiritual and social democracy, Congregationalism finds no warrant or precedent in the NT for the episcopal conception of the spiritual Church. The NT uses the words "bishop," "presbyter," and "Church" a "elder." It interprets ἐπίσκοπος, ἐπίσκοπος, lit. as overseers—not an ecclesiastical authority. It finds the Romanist view of Peter's primacy, founded alone on Mt 16:18, contradicted by the entire trend of Christ's teaching, as e.g. when referring to the Gentiles exercising "lordship and authority," things which Christ says: "Not so shall it be among you. Whoever would be great among you must become servant of all. For even the Son of man did not come to be ministered to but to minister, and to give his life as a ransom for many." (Mt 20:26 ff.) To set the precedent of official greatness, when he said "the Son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister," and that "whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister (servant).

The NT thus gives us the church in its purest form in the church among the apostles and prophets, but making "Christ... himself... the chief corner stone" (Eph 2:20). The organization and history of the early Christian church establish this view of its simplicity and democracy. In Acts 20:20 the RV corrects the rendering "bishops" (given by the King James translators, who were officers in the Episcopal church) to "office," thus relieving the verse of possible ecclesiastical pretensions.

The了吧, the day of Pentecost was the spontaneous coming together of the original 120 disciples and the 3,000 Christian converts, for fellowship, worship and work, under the inspiration and guidance of the Holy Spirit. Its only creed was belief in the risen Christ and the renewing power of the Holy Spirit; its only condition of membership, repentance and baptism.

The apostles naturally took leadership but, abrogating all authority, committed to the church as a whole the choice of its officers.

1. The NT defines the office of bishops to be the spiritual and office of elders to be the popular or popular vote.

2. Election and the conduct of its temporal and of officers spiritual affairs. Judges' place in the "apostolate was not filled by succession or episcopal appointment (Acts 1:25-26). The seven deacons were elected by popular vote (Acts 6:1-6). One of the seven—Philip—preached and, without protest, administered the rite of baptism (Acts 8:12, 13).

The churches in the apostolic era were independent and self-governing, and the absence of anything like a centralized ecclesiastical authority is seen by the fact that the council at Antioch, called to consider whether the church at Antioch should receive the uncircumcised into membership, was a delegated body, composed in part of lay members, and having only advisory power (Acts 15:1-29).

The apostolic letters, forming so large a part of the NT, are not official documents but letters of love and pastoral instruction and counsel.

3. The Episcopal not official document. The terms bishops, elders, and deacons are used synonymously and interchangeably, thus limiting the officers of the early church to two orders: pastors and deacons.

Dissenting bodies, chiefly the Congregationalists, returned to the simplicity and spiritual freedom of the primitive church. The issue of Restoration of Parliament under Elizabeth; the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity. The unreasonable demands by religious and political tyranny of the Congregationalists was won at the cost of many martyrs. These struggles and persecutions brought into the successors of Robert Browne, the father of modern Congregationalism, a deep-seated and permanent resentment against all forms of autocratic power in church and state. They challenged, at the cost of life, both the Divine Right of Kings, and of bishops. They believed that in Christ Jesus all believers are literally and inalienably made "kings and priests unto God." (Rev. 1:6 AV) actual spiritual sovereigns, independent of all human domination, and of bishops. The Pilgrims expatriated themselves to secure this spiritual liberty: and to their inherent antagonism to inherited and self-perpetuated power, whether civil or ecclesiastical, must be credited the religious freedom and civil democracy of America.

BIT AND BRIDLE, brid'úl (πλευκή, meghéth; regein): The two words occur in conjunction (Ps 32:9 AV, "Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding; whose mouth is in a bridle, and his head with a mule's head near unto thee"); RV "else they will not come near unto thee," RV "they that come not near." Meheq, trd "bit," above, is properly a bridle or halter in which the bit was a loop passed round the under jaw of the animal; regein has a similar meaning. The counsel in the ver is that men should render a willing obedience to God and not be like the animals that man has to bridle and curb in order to get them to do his will. Cf Jas 3:3, where we have "bit" and of chalutis, "a bit," or "curb," "We put bits (RV 'bridles') in the horses' mouths that they may obey us." "Bridle" occurs separately as tr of meheq (2 Sam 8:1), "David took Meheq-ammah," AV "the bridle of Ammah," RV "the bridle of the mother.
city," m, as AV; the meaning may be that he took the control or dominion of it: "I will put ... my bridle in thy lips" (2 K 19 28; Isa 37 29); "a bridle for the ass" (Prov 26 3); of rejen (Job 30 11), They have also let loose the bridle before me," RV "and they have cast off the bridle before me" (acted in an unbridled [unrestrained] manner); 41 13, said of "leviathan" (RV "the hippopotamus"), "Who can come to him with his double bridle?" ARV "within his jaws?" ERV "within his double bridle," others, "into the double row of his teeth?" Isa 30 28, "a bridle in the jaws of the people causing them to err," RV "a bridle that causeth to err?" of mahkôm, which means "a muzzle" (Ps 39 1), "I will keep my mouth with a bridle," AVM "Heb, a bridle, or muzzle for my mouth"; so RVm.

To "bridle" occurs (Jas 1 26, "bridlestth not his tongue?" 3 2 "able to bridle the whole body"; chalinagôgô, "to lead" or "guide with a bit"). In 1 Esd 3 6, and 2 Macc 10 29, we have "bridles of gold" (chrosochalinê). W. L. Walker

BITHIAH, bi-th'î-a (τῇ Βήθία, bithyâh; Bêthâ, Bith-thîa; B, Ïâdâ, Galô, "daughter of Jeha"): The daughter of a Pharaoh who married Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 18). Whether she was a daughter of a Pharaoh was an Egyptian king, or whether it was in this case a Heb name, it is difficult to say. The name Bithiah seems to designate one who had become converted to the worship of Jehi, and this would favor the first supposition. If, as the RV reads, the other wife of Mered is distinguished as "the Jewess" (instead of AV "Jehudijah"), this supposition would receive further support. Frank E. Weirach BITHRON, bîth'ro-n (בִּיתרונ, his bithrôn; ᾿ουξαν τῆς παρατεινουσαν, kàlos tēn parateinounan, lit. "the entire [land] extending"); 2 S 2 29, "the Bithron," i.e. the gorge or groove): Does not seem to be a proper name; rather it indicates the gorge by which Abner approached Manahaim. Buhl (6 AP, 121) favors identification with Wady Aj-fân, along which in later times a Rom road connected "Aj-fân and Mahanaim. Others (Guthrie, Kurz, bib. Wörterbuch, s.v.) incline to Wady esh Sha'b.

BITHYRUM, bi-thîn'i-a (Βιθυρία, Bithumia): A coast province in northwestern Asia Minor on the Propontis and the Euxine. Its narrowest compass includes the districts on both sides of the Sangarius, its one large river, but in prosperous times its boundaries reached from the Rhynacaus on the west to and beyond the Parthenius on the east. The Myrian Olympus rose in grandeur to a height of 6,400 ft. in the southwest, and in general the face of Nature was wrinkled with rugged mountains and teemed with fertile valleys sloping toward the Black Sea.

Hittites may have occupied Bithynia in the remote past, for Trajan of Trajan found some of his stoutest enemies among the Amazons on the upper Sangarius in Phrygia, and these may have been Hittites, and may easily have settled along the river to its mouth. The earliest discernible Bithynians, however, were Thracian immigrants from the European side of the Hellespont. The country was overcame by Croesus, and passed with Lydia under Pers control, 546 BC. After Alexander the Great, Bithynia became independent, and Nicomedes I, Prusias I, and II, and Nicomedes II, and within his double bridle, used with the same significance according to the context, are found in Ex 1 14; 12 8; Nu 9 11; Job 13 26; Isa 24 9. The derivatives mér and mérê occur in Dt 32 24; Job 33 23; and; and , tamrûr, is found in Jer 6 26; 31 15. In the NT the verb περιαίρει, περιψάω is "to embitter"; the adj. περιφρ, περιφρ by kings whose names they bear; the other chief cities, Nicea and Chalcedon, had been built by Gr enterprise earlier. There were highways leading from Nicomedia and Nicea to Dorylaeum and to Angora (see Ramsay, Historical Geography of Asia Minor, and The Church in the Rom Empire before A.D. 114; also Black Sea liter- tural as far as Amisus was more or less closely joined with Bithynia in administration.

Paul and Silas essayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered them not (Acts 16 7). Other evangelists, however, must have labored there early and with marked success. Bithynia is one of the provinces addressed in 1 Pet 1 1.

Internal difficulties and disorders led to the sending of Pliny, the lawyer and literary man, as governor, 111 to 113 AD. He found Christians under his jurisdiction in such numbers that the heathen temples were almost deserted, and the trade in sacrificial animals languished. A memorable correspondence followed between the Rom governor and the emperor Trajan, in which the moral character of the Christians was completely vindicated, and the repressive measures required of officials were interpreted with leniency (see E. G. Hardy, Pliny's Correspondence with Trajan, and Christianity and the Rom Government). Under this Rom policy Christianity was confirmed in strength and in public position. Subsequently the first Ecumenical Council of the church was held in Nicaea, and two later councils convened in Chalcedon (451) and in Ephesus (431); all of which were closely connected with Bithynia.

Bithynia was for a thousand years part of the Byzantine Empire, and shared the fortunes and misfortunes of that state. On the advent of the Turks its territory was quickly overrun, and Orchan, sultan in 1530, selected Brousia as his capital, since which time this has been one of the chief Ottoman cities.

"bitter," and the noun πίπλα, πιέρια, "bitterness," supply the same ideas in CoL 3 19; Jas 3 14; Rev 3 16 (οὐ κακοῦντος). It will be noted that the word is employed with three principal spheres of application: (1) the physical sense of taste; (2) a fig. meaning in the objective sense of cruel, biting words; intense misery resulting from forsaking God, from a life of sin and insecurity; the misery of servitude; the misfortune of bereavement; (3) more subjectively, bitter and bitterness describe emotions of sympathy; the sorrow of childlessness; of disappointment; the feeling of misery and wretchedness, giving rise to the expression "bitter tears." (4) The ethical sense, characterizing untruth and immorality as the bitter thing in opposition to the sweetness of truth and the gospel; (5) Nu 5 18 RV speaks of "the water of bitterness that causeth the curse." Here it is employed as a technical term.

BITTER HERBS, herbs, or orbs (ἐμπρός, m'ρός): Originally in the primitive Passover (Ex 12 8; Nu 9 11) these were probably merely salads, the simplest and quickest prepared form of vegetable accompaniment to the roasted lamb. Such salads have always been favorites in the Orient. Cucumbers, lettuce, water-cress, parsley and endive are some of those commonly used. Later on the Passover ritual (as it does today) laid emphasis on the idea of "bitterness" as symbolical of Israel's lot in Egypt. In modern Pal the Jews use chiefly lettuce and endive for the "bitter herbs" of their Passover. In Lam 3 15 the same word is used: "He hath filled me with bitterness m'ρός, he hath sated me with wormwood." Here the parallelism with "wormwood" suggests some plant more distinctly bitter than the mild salads mentioned above, such, for example, as the colocynthis (Citrullus colocynthis) or the violently irritating squirting cucumber (Echium elatum).

BITTERN, bit'ern (בַּטֶן, bipōdāh; Lat Botaurus stellaris; Gr ἐχίνος, echinos): A nocturnal member of the heron family, frequenting swamps and marshy places. Its Heb name means a creature of waste and desert places. The bittern is the most individual branch of the heron (Ardeidae) family, on account of being primarily a bird of night. There are observable differences from the heron in proportion, and it differs widely in coloration. It is one of the birds of most ancient history, and as far back as records extend is known to have inhabited Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia and America. The African bird that Bible historians were familiar with was 2½ ft. in length. It had a 4-in. bill, bright eyes and plumage of buff and chestnut, mottled with black. It lived around swamps and marshes, hunting mostly at night, and its food was much the same as that of all members of the heron family, frogs being its staple article of diet. Its meat has not the fatty taste of most members of the heron family, and in former times was considered a great delicacy of food. In the days of falconry it was protected in England because of the sport afforded in hunting it. Aristotle mentions that previous to his time the bittern was called ὀξως, which name indicates "an idle disposition." It was probably bestowed by people who found the bird hiding in swamps during the daytime, and saw that it would almost allow itself to be stepped upon before it would fly. They did not understand that it fed and nestled at night. Pliny wrote of it as a bird that "bellowed like oxen," for which reason it was called Taurus. Other mediaeval writers called it botaurus, from which our term bittern is derived. There seems to be much confusion as to the early form of the name; but all authorities agree that it was bestowed on the bird on account of its voice. Turner states that in 1544 the British called it "miredromble," and "botley bump," from its voice. Rolland says the French called it Bœuf d'eau. In later days "bog-bull," "stake-driver" and "thunder-pumper" have attached themselves to it as terms fully descriptive of its voice. Nuttall says its cry is "like the interrupted bellowing of a bull, but hollower and louder, and is heard at a mile's distance, as if issuing from some formidable being that resided at the bottom of the waters." Tristram says, "Its strange booming note, disturbing the stillness of night, gives an idea of desolation which nothing but the wail of a hyena can equal." Thoreau thought its voice like the stroke of an ax on the head of a deeply driven stake. In ancient times it was believed the bird thrust its sharp beak into a reed to produce the sound. Later it was supposed to be made by pushing the bill into muck and water while it cried. Now the membrane by which the sound is produced has been located in the lungs of the bird. In all time it has been the voice that attracted attention to the bittern, and it was solely upon the ground of its vocal attainments that it entered the Bible. There are three references, all of which originated in its cry. Isaiah in prophesying the destruction of Babylon (44 23 AV) wrote: "I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water"; in other words he would make of it a desolate and lonely swamp. Again in 34 11 AV, in pronouncing judgment against Idumaea, he wrote, "But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it." In the RV, "cormorant" and "bittern" are changed to "pelican" and "porcupine." The change from the cormorant to pelican makes less difference, as both are water birds, and the Heb שָׁזְדַּקַּה, which means "a plunging bird," would apply equally to either of them. If they were used to bear out the idea that they would fill the ruins with terrifying sound, then it is well to remember that the cormorant had something of a voice, while the pelican is notoriously the most silent of birds.
The change from bittern to porcupine is one with which no ornithologist would agree. About 620 BC, the prophet Zephaniah (2:14) clearly indicates this bird: "And herds shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations: both the hill of the daughter of Sion, and the capital thereof; their voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds: for he hath laid bare the cedar work." This should forever settle the question raised by some modern commentators as to whether a bird or beast is intended by the word ẓippâdâ. In some instances it seems to have been confounded with kusfuth, the hedgehog or porcupine. No natural historian ever would agree to this, because these animals are not at home in the conditions that were known to exist here. Even granting that Nineveh was to be made dry, it must be remembered that the marshes of the Tigris lay very close, and the bird is of night, with a voice easily carrying over a mile. Also it was to "sing" and to "lodge" on the "upper lintels" which were the top timbers of the doors and windows. These formed just the location a bittern would probably perch upon when it left its marshy home and went booming through the night in search of a mate. The reason for the change from bittern to porcupine in the RV, of the paragraph quoted, is a great mystery, as is also that of cormorant to pelican.

LXX reads "and her daughters," only the latter part of MT being rendered. Whether so We, Hollenberg, Di et al. The LXX has probably preserved the original text (cf Neh 11:27).

BIZTHA, biz’tha (LXX Μαζάν, Mazân; also Bazaín and Bazeá): One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of King Ahasuerus (Xerxes). It is possible that the name is derived from the Pers. beštēx, "bound," hence "eunuch" (Est 1:10).

BLACKNESS (זֵרְעָה, kār’āh, "obscurations"); מָדָּה, madâh, "darkness"); γόας, gōías, "darkness"); ẓopher, ẓophos, "darkness"): Terms rarely used but of special significance in picturing the fearful gloom and blackness of moral darkness and calamity. Job, cursing the day of his birth, wishes that it, a des aer ("dead black day"), might be swallowed up in darkness (Job 3:5). Because of Israel's spiritual infidelity Jehovah cloths the heavens with the blackness of sackcloth (Isa 50:3), the figure being that of the blackness of onyx, typical of thunder clouds. The fearful judgment against sin under the old dispensation is illustrated by the appalling blackness that enveloped smoking, burning, quaking Sinaï at the giving of the law (He 12:18; cf Ex 19:16-19; 20:18). The horror of darkness culminates in the impenetrable blackness of the under-world, the eternal abode of fallen angels and riotously immoral and ungodly men (Jude ver 13; see also ver 6 and 2 Pet 2 4.17). Human language is here too feeble to picture the moral gloom and rayless night of the lost: the AY reads "blackness of darkness (cf the ninth plague of Egypt, "darkness which may be felt" [Ex 10:21]). Wicked men are "wandering stars," comets that disappear in "blackness of darkness . . . reserved for ever." In art this blackest light, language and art, was the expression in Dore's illustrations of Dante's Purgatory and Milton's Paradise Lost.

this world, nor in that which is to come" (Mt 12:32 = Mk 3:28-29; Lk 12:10). As in the OT "to sin with a high hand" and to blaspheme the name of God incurred the death penalty, so the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit remains the one unpardonable sin. These passages at least imply beyond cavil the personality of the Holy Spirit, for sin and blasphemy can only be committed against persons. In Mt and Mk a particular case of this blasphemy is the allegation of the Pharisees that Jesus Christ casts out devils by Beelzabub. The general idea is that to attribute to an evil source acts which are clearly those of the Holy Spirit, to call good evil, is blasphemy against the Spirit, and sin that will not be pardoned. "A distinction is made between Christ's other acts and those which manifestly reveal the Holy Spirit in Him, and between slander directed against Him personally as He appears in His ordinary acts, and that which is aimed at those acts in which the Spirit is manifest" (Gould, Mark ad loc.). Luke does not particularize the case, and seems to connect it with the denial of Christ, although he, too, gives the saying that "who shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven." But which of Christ's acts are not acts of the Holy Spirit? It is therefore clear that He was not blasphemy against Him not also blasphemy against the Holy Spirit? John identifies the Holy Spirit with the exalted Christ (Jn 14:16-18.26.28). The solution generally offered of this most difficult problem is to conceive of a Christ exalted and consummate opposition to the influence of the Holy Spirit, because of a deliberate preference of darkness to light, render repentance and therefore forgiveness morally impossible. A similar idea is taught in Rom 8:15. But there it is assumed that there is and always was a word made speaker among the reprobate and His so-called contemporaries. See Holy Spirit. T. Reese

BLAST  (םַשָּׁהַם, n'shāmah, נשׁה, n'rāh):

(1) The blowing of the breath of Jeh, expressive of the manifestation of God's power in Nature and Providence. "With the blast of thy nostrils the waters were piled up" (Ex 15:8), referring to the east wind (14:21); or 2 S 22:16 and Ps 18:15. "I will send a blast upon him" (2 K 19:7 AV; RV "put a spirit upon thee") i.e. the panic (Dumham "blow" in loc.; cf Isa 37:7). "By the blast of his anger are they consumed" (Job 4:9; cf Isa 37:36). (2) The word n'rāh is used with reference to the tyranny and violence of the wicked (Isa 25:4). (3) The blowing of a wind instrument: "When they make a long blast with the ram's horn" (Josh 6:5). M. O. Evans

BLAST, BLASTING, blast'ing (םַשַּׁדַּחְפָּה, shiddah-phah—root, שׁדָּח, shiddah; lit. "scorching"): This is the effect produced upon grain or other plants by the hot east winds which blow from the desert of Arabia. They usually continue to blow for two or three days at a time. If they occur in the spring near ripening time, the grain is often turned yellow and does not properly mature. The farmers dread this wind. In some localities, if they suspect that the east wind is coming, they set up a great shouting and beating of pans, hoping to drive it off. Sometimes this wind is a double pestilence, when it brings with it a cloud of locusts (2 Ch 6:28). The writer, while journeying in the northern part of the Arabian desert, the source of these winds, witnessed such a cloud of locusts on their way toward habitable regions. It did not call for a very vivid imagination on the part of the children of Israel to realize the meaning of the passage and an allusion to it would befall those who would not hearken to the voice of Jeh. Dt 28:22-24 could easily be considered a poetic description of the east winds (Arab. hawwā sharā'ib) which visit Pal and Syria at irregular intervals today. The heat is fiery; it dries up the vegetation, and blasts the grain; the sky is hazy and there is a glare as if the sun were reflected from a huge brass tray. Woodwork cracks and warps; the covers of books curl up. Instead of rain, the wind brings dust and sand which penetrate into the innermost corners of the dwellings. This dust fills the eyes and inflames them. The skin becomes hot and dry. To one first experiencing this storm it seems as though some volcano must be belching forth heat and气 at once". It might be inferred that mildew (lit. "a paleness") must mean the sickly color which plants assume for other causes than the blasting of the east wind, such, as for instance, fungus diseases or parasites (1 K 8:37; Am 4:9; Hag 2:17). JAMES A. PATE

BLASTUS, blast'tus (Bládòtos, Błástos, "shout"): The chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I, whose services as an intermediary between them and the king were gained by the people of Tyre and Sidon. These cities were dependent on Pal for corn and other provisions, and when Herod, on the occasion of some commercial dispute, forbade the export of foodstuffs from Tyre and Sidon, they were at his mercy and were compelled to consent to anything made Blastus the king's chamberlain their friend." probably by means of a bribe, the Phoen embryo was given an opportunity of settling their case before Herod (Acts 12:20-23). S. F. Hunter

BLAZE, bläze ("to publish"): Found only in AV of Mk 1:45, for Gr diaphēmētēsin, τῷ by RV "spread abroad," as in Mt 9:51; 28:15.

BLEMISH, blemish:

(1) דָּשִׁן, dāshîn, דַּשָּׁן, dāshān; μόρος, mōros: This word signifies no particular skin disease, as has been supposed; but it is used generally for any and all disfiguring affections of the skin, such as eczema, herpes, scabies, etc. The only case in which it has been supposed that the "blemish" was a "mark of distinction" is in Lev 26:33 ("if the blemish be blotted out of the land of his possession"), where the only possible idea is that of a temporary blemish, how it may be removed. (2) מָתָּן, mātan; μόρος, mōros: This word signifies either a thick, hard or ridged spot, generally a "blemish" in the sense of a "mark of distinction" (cf Acts 10:38; Jam 1:5). (3) מָתָּן, mātan; מָתָּן, mātan: This word signifies a "blemish" in the sense of an "aberration" from the common type, such as a crooked foot or the like (cf Acts 7:55). B. C. H. BEATTIE

(2) Blemish in the eye, יִשָּׁבֶל, yishābel, ophthallos (from a root יָפָל, yāfall, balal, "to overflow"); Arab. یَفَل, yalâl, BLESSING (בָּרָך, bărakah; εὐλογία, eulogia): Sometimes means the form of words used in invoking the bestowal of good, as in Dt 33 1; Josh 8 34; and Jas 3 10. Sometimes it means the good or the benefit itself which has been conferred, as in Gen 27 36, “Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?” (Gen 30 22). “The blessing of Jeh, it maketh rich.” “The cup of blessing” (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, a special use of the word in 1 Cor 10 16), means the cup for which we bless God, or which represents to us so much blessing from God in the sense of 1 Cor 10 16.

JAMES M. GRAY

BLESSING, CUP OF (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, “the consecrated cup,” 1 Cor 10 16): A technical term from the Jewish liturgy transferred to the Christian Supper. It expresses the idea that this treatment was recorded Christ by his persecutors (Lk 22 64).

BLENDING, blind’ing. See Punishments.

BLINDNESS, blind’ness (בּוּל, bū’l, and variants; τυφλός, tυφλός): The word blind is used as a vb., as Jn 12 40, usually in the sense of obscuring spiritual perception. In reference to physical blindness it is used as a noun frequently or else as an adj. with the noun man. There are 54 references to this condition, and there is no reason to believe, as has been surmised, that blindness was any less rife in ancient times than it is now, when defective eyes and bleared, inflamed lids are among the commonest and most disgusting sights in a Pal. crowd. In the Papyrus Ebers (1500 BC) there are enumerated a number of diseases of the eye and a hundred prescriptions are given for their treatment. That disease occurred in children and caused destruction and atrophy of the eyeball is testified to by the occurrence of a considerable number of mummy heads, in which there is marked diminution in size of one orbit. The commonest disease is a scar, and ophthalmia, a highly infectious condition propagated largely by the flies which can be seen infesting the crusts of dried secretion undisturbed even on the eyes of infants. (In Egypt there is a superstition that it is unlucky to disturb the fly in the eye.) The disease is marked by the eyes damaged with bleared lids, opacities of the cornea, and sometimes extensive internal injury as well. Like other plagues, this disease was thought to be a Divine infliction (Ex 4 11). Minor forms of the disease destroy the eyelashes and produce the unsightly tender-eyes (in Gen 29 17 the word rakah may mean simply “weak”).

Blindness from birth is the result of a form of this disease known as ophthalmia neonatorum which sets in a few days after birth. I have seen cases of this disease in Pal. Sometimes ophthalmia accompanies malarial fever (Lev 26 16). All these diseases are aggravated by sand, and the sun glare, to which the unprotected inflamed eyes are exposed. Most of the extreme cases which one sees are beyond remedy—and hence the giving of sight to

BLESS, Blindness

Bless’d, bless’d (בָּרָך, bărakah: Where God is referred to, this word has the sense of “praise,” as in 1 S 26 32, “Blessed be Jeh the God of Israel.” But where man is in mind it is used in the sense of “happy” or “blessed,” and most frequently in the Psalms and the Gospels, as for example, “Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the wicked” (Ps 1 1); “Blessed art thou among women” (Lk 1 42); “Blessed are the poor in spirit” (Mt 5 3). See BEAUTITUDES.

BLENDEDNESS, bless’ed-nes: This tr of μακρυμός, makarismos (a word signifying “beatitude” or “the ascension of blessing”) as used in Rom 4 6, 9, 11 and Gal 4 15, in AV only. In the first two instances it refers to the happy state or condition of a man to whom Christ’s righteousness is imputed by faith, and in the last to a man’s experience of that condition. See HAPPINESS.
blindness is generally put in the front of the mighty works of healing by our Lord. The methods used by Him in these miracles varied probably according to the degree of faith in the blind man; all were merely tokens, not intended as remedies. The case of the man in Mk 9:22 whose healing seems to be merely an instance of the phenomenon met with in cases where, by operation, sight has been given to one congenitally blind, where it takes some time before he can interpret his new sensations.

The blindness of old age, probably from senile cataract, is the case of Eli at 95 years of age (1S 3:2; 4:15), Alijah (1K 14:4), and Isaac (Gen 27:1). The smiting of Elymas (Acts 13:11) and the Syrian soldiers (2K 15:18) was either a miraculous intervention or more probably a temporary hypnotism; that of Paul (Acts 9:8) was doubtless a temporary paralysis of the retinal cells from the bright light. The "scars" mentioned were not material but in the restoration of his sight it seemed as if scales had fallen from his eyes. It probably left behind a weakness (1 in the eyes and THORN IN THE FLESH). That blindness of Tobit (Tob 2:10), from the irritation of sparrows' dung, may have been some form of conjunctivitis, and the case of the blindness of the lion (1K 8:18), an account given in Pliny (xxxii:24) where the gait of the fish Calionymus Lyra is recommended as an application in some cases of blindness. The hypothesis that the gait was used as a pigment to obscure the whiteness of an opaque cornea (for which Indian ink tattooing has been recommended, not as a cure but in order to remove the unsightliness of a white spot) has nothing in its favor for thereby the sight would not be restored. The only other reference to medicaments is the fig. mention of eyesalve in Rev 3:18.

Blindness unfitted a man for the priesthood (Lev 21:18); but care of the blind was specially enjoined in the Law (Lev 19:14), and offences against them are regarded as breaches of Law (Dt 27:18).

Figuratively, blindness is used to represent want of mental perception, want of prevision, recklessness, and incapacity to perceive moral distinctions (Isa 42:16-18;19; Mt 23:16-17; Mk 16:18).

ALEX. MACALISTER

BLINDNESS, JUDICAL, jô-dîsh'al, jôô-dîsh'âl: Among the ancient Israelites in the pre-Can. period disputes within the family or clan or tribe would be settled by the head of the family or clan or tribe. According to Ex 18 Moses, as the leader of the tribes, settled all disputes. But he was compelled to appoint a body of magistrates—heads of families—to act in conjunction with himself, and under his judicial oversight. These magistrates settled ordinary disputes while he reserved for himself the more difficult cases. After the conquest of Canaan, the conditions of life became so complex, and questions of a difficult nature so constantly arose, that we find by the close of the period official judges—elders of the city (Josh 8:33; Jgs 8:3; 1K 21:8); (2) to codify ancient custom, and (3) to place the administration of justice on an organized basis. It is significant that in one of the oldest documents in the Pent—viz., in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20:20–23:33)—the miscarriage of justice was of such frequent occurrence as to require special mention (23:1–3.6–8). In fact the OT abounds with allusions to the corruptions and brutality of the judicial bench (Dt 16:19; Lev 19:15; Am 5:12; Mic 3:11; 7:3; Isa 1:23; 5:23; Zeph 3:3; Ps 16:5; Prov 17:23). According to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 23:8) "a bribe blindeth the eyes of the opened-eyes." This descriptive phrase indicates a prolific cause of the miscarriage of justice—an exceedingly common thing in the East, in the present no less than in the past. The prohibition in ver 3, "Neither shalt thou favor a poor man in his cause," is rather remarkable and many scholars are of opinion that "a great man" should be read for "a poor man," according to which the fault was "wresting the judgment of the poor." The rich alone could offer a satisfactory bribe. But it should be pointed out that Lev (19:15) legis¬lates in view of both tendencies — "respecting the poor," i.e., "the person of the poor," and "reserving the person of the mighty." Sympathy with the poor no less than a bribe from the well-to-do might affect the judgment of the bench. Dt (16:19) reproduces the words of the Book of the Covenant with a slight alteration—viz., "eyes of the wise" for "eyes of the opened-eyed" ("them that have sight"). Both phrases vividly bring out the baneful effect of bribery—a magistrate otherwise upright and honest—opened-eyed and wise—may be unconsciously yet effect¬ively influenced in his judicial decisions by a gift sufficiently large. A similar phrase is found in the story of Abraham's life (Gen 20:16). A gift of a thousand shekels to Abraham was intended to be a "covering of the eyes" for Sarah, i.e., compensa¬tion for the wrong done. For a gift of such magnitude she ought to wink at the injury. Job (9:24) declares in his bitterness that God "covereth the faces of the judges"—inflicts judicial blindness on them so that justice in this case is totally out of the question. Judica¬l corruption was the burden of the prophets' preaching—"judges loved bribes, and followed after rewards," with the result that "the fatherless" and "the widow" were helpless to have their grievances redressed (Isa 1:23). A satisfactory reward would always secure the acquittal of the offender (Isa 5:23). Micah combines judges, priests and prophets under a similar charge; they are all guilty of gross venality (3:11). Prov (17:23) defines the wicked person as one who is always prepared to take a "bribe out of the bosom, to pervert the ways of justice"; on the other hand the good man is he who will not take a reward against the innocent (Ps 15:5) or shaketh his hands from taking a bribe (Isa 33:15). In regard to God alone it is impossible to deny his justice—liability affirmed—he "regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward" (Dt 10:17).

T. LEWIS

BLOOD, blûd (27, dâm, probably from 578, 'betham, "to be red"); alâ'â, hâ'mâ: Used in the OT to designate the life principle in either animal or vegetable, as the blood of man or the juice of the grape (Lev 17:11, et al.); in the NT for the blood of an animal, the atoning blood of Christ, and in both OT and NT in a fig. sense for bloodshed or murder (Gen 37:26; Hos 4:2; Rev 16:6).

Although the real function of the blood in the human system was not fully known until the fact that its circulation was established by Harvey in 1615, nevertheless ideas from the earliest times a singular mystery has been attached to it by all peoples. Blood rites, blood ceremonies and blood feuds are common among primitive tribes. It came to be recognized as the life principle long before it was scientifically proved to be. Naturally a feeling of fear, awe and reverence would be attached to the shedding of blood. With many uncivilized peoples scarification of the body until blood flowed was a material benefaction. Blood brother- or blood friendship is established by African tribes by the mutual shedding of blood and either drinking it or rubbing it on another one's body. Thus and by the inter-transfusion of blood by other means it was thought that a community of life and interest could be established.
Notwithstanding the ignorance and superstition surrounding this suggestive beautiful idea, it grew to become more than merely human.

2. Heb and OT Customs

Human blood there came to be a symbolic substitution of animal blood in sprinkling or pouring. The first reference in the OT to blood (Gen 4:10) is fig., but highly illustrative of the reverential fear manifested upon the shedding of blood and the first teaching regarding it.

The rite of circumcision is an OT form of blood coagulation. From the probable sanitary importance of the act is derived the meaning in the establishment of a bond of friendship between the one upon whom the act is performed and Jeh Himself. In order that Abraham might become "the friend of God," he was commanded that he should be circumcised as a token of the covenant between him and God (Gen 17:10-11; see CIRCUMCISION).

It is significant that the eating of blood was prohibited in earliest Bible times (Gen 9:4). The custom probably prevailed among heathen nations as a religious rite (cf. Ps 16:4), and its hygienic influence together doubtless led to its becoming taboo. The same prohibition was made under the Mosaic code (Lev 7:26; see SACRIFICE).

Blood was commanded to be used also for purificatory ceremonial cleansing (Lev 14:5-7, 51,52; Nu 19:4), provided, however, that it be taken from a clean animal (see PURIFICATION).

In all probability there is no trace of the superstitious use of blood in the OT, unless perchance in 1 K 22:38 (see BATHING); but everywhere it is vested with cleansing, expiatory, and reverently symbolic qualities.

As in the transition from ancient to Heb practice, so from the OT to the NT we see an exaltation of the conception of blood and blood ceremonies. In Abraham's covenant his own blood had to be shed. Later an expiatory animal was to shed blood (Lev 5:6; see ATONEMENT), but there must always be a shedding of blood. "Apart from shedding of blood there is no remission" (He 9:22). The exalting of this idea finds its highest development then in the vicarious shedding of blood by Christ Himself (1 Jn 1:7). As in the OT "blood" was also used to signify the juice of grapes, the most natural substitute for the drinking of blood would be the use of wine. Thus takes advantage of this, and introduces the beautiful and significant custom (Mt 26:28) of drinking wine and eating bread as symbolic of the primitive intertransfusion of blood and flesh in a pledge of eternal friendship (cf. Ex 24:6-7; Jn 6:53-58). This is the climactic observance of blood rites recorded in the Bible.

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

BLOOD AND WATER (αἷμα καὶ νεκρέα, haïma kai ἁλίκα): The remarkable passage (Jn 19:34) from which this expression is taken refers to the piercing of the Saviour's side by the soldier. The evangelist notes here what he, as an eyewitness of the crucifixion, had seen with reasonable assurance. Whereon this surprise was founded cannot now be more than guessed at. Nor is it necessary here to discuss the reason or reasons why the apostle mentions the fact at all in his report, whether merely for historical accuracy or, as some think, as a possible proof of the actual death of Christ, which at an early date became a subject of doubt among certain Christian sects, or whether by it he wished to refer to the mystical relation of baptismal cleansing ("water") and the atonement ("blood") as signified thereby. Let it suffice to state that a reference often occurs to 1 Jn 5:6 as the place of this passage, though used by certain Fathers of the church as a proof of the last-named doctrine, does not indeed refer to this wonderful incident of the crucifixion story. The argument of 1 Jn 5:6 concerns the Messiahship of Jesus, which is proved by a threefold witness, for He is the one whom at the baptism of John ("water") God attested as the Messiah by the heavenly voice, "This is my beloved Son," who at the crucifixion ("blood") God has provided, has been accepted His atoning sacrifice, and whose promise of sending the Comforter fulfilled on Pentecost ("spirit") we present us with the final proof of the completed Messianic task. The same expression in 1 Jn 5:6 refers probably to the same argument with the implied meaning that Jesus came not only by the merely ceremonial water of baptism, but also by the more important, because vivifying, blood of atonement.

The physiological aspect of this incident of the crucifixion has been first discussed by Gruner (Commentatio de morte Jesu Christi vera, Halle, 1805), who has shown that the blood released by the spear-thrust of the soldier must have been extraneous to the open heart, and its shedding be a place, for only so could it have been poured forth in the described manner. While a number of commentators have opposed this view as a fanciful explanation, and have preferred to give the statement of the evangelist a symbolic meaning, in the sense of the doctrines of baptism and eucharist (so Baur, Strauss, Reuss and others), some modern physiologists are convinced that in this passage a wonderful phenomenon is reported to us, which, inexplicable to the sacred historian, contains for us an almost certain clue to the real cause of the Saviour's death. Dr. Stroud (On the Physiological Cause of the Death of Christ, London, 1847) basing his remarks on numerous postmortems, pronounced the opinion that here we had a proof of the death of Christ being due not to the effects of crucifixion but to "laceration or rupture of the heart" as a consequence of supreme mental agony and sorrow. It is well attested that usually the suffering on the cross was very prolonged. In three days, when death would supervene from exhaustion. There were no physical reasons why Christ should not have lived very much longer on the cross than He did. On the other hand, death caused by laceration of the heart in consequence of great mental suffering would be almost instantaneous. In such a case the phrase "of a broken heart," becomes lit. true. The life blood flowing through the aperture or laceration into the pericardium or cæcum of the heart, being thrown into blood, soon coagulates into the red clot (blood) and the limpid serum (water). This accumulation in the heart-sac was released by the spear-thrust of the soldier which takes provisionally the place of a postmortem without which it would have been impossible to determine the real cause of death, and from the gaping wound there flow the two component parts of blood distinctly visible.

Several distinguished physicians have accepted Dr. Stroud's argument, and some have strengthened it by the observation of additional symptoms. We may mention Dr. James Begbie, fellow and late president of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, Sir J. Y. Simpson, professor at the University of Edinburgh; or, as Simpson, "Our Lord's Life on Earth, Appendix I). The latter refers to the loud cry, mentioned by the Synoptists (Mt 27:50; Mk 16:37; Lk 23:40), which preceded the actual death of Jesus, as a symptom characteristic of cases of "broken heart." He adds that Dr. Walshe, professor of medicine in University College, London, one of the greatest authorities on diseases of the heart, says that a "piercing shriek" is always uttered in such cases immediately before the end. While we may never reach a state of absolute certainty on this subject, there is no valid reason to deny the possibility of a disease of the heart, or to discount the view of the death of Christ. It certainly gives a more solemn insight into Christ's spiritual anguish, "the travail of his soul" on our behalf, which weighed upon Him so heavily that long before the usual term of bodily and therefore endurable suffering of crucified persons Christ's loving heart broke, achieving the great atoning sacrifice for all mankind.

BLOOD, AVENGER OF. See AVENGER.

BLOOD, ISSUE, ish'ā. OF. See BLOODY FLUX.

BLOODGUILTINESS, blūd-gilt'i-nes: Found in the AV only in Ps 51 14. RV adds Ex 22 23; 1 S 26 23. "BLOODY" (Ex 18 13) seems to indicate that the phrase does not necessarily signify bloodshed, but any grievous sin which, if it remains, will block God's favor to His land and people (cf Dr 21 5; Isa 1 15). Ps 51 is to be interpreted in this light.

BLOOD-REVENGE, blūd-rē-vi-jē': See AVENGER.

BLOODHEDGING, blūd'hed-ing (ἀγαπετεχωρία, hatmatezechusia, He 9 22): In this passage the indispensability of expiating sacrifice is positively set forth.

BLOODHIRSTY, blūd'thär's-tē (κόρων, 'anahē dōmēm, "men of blood"): This occurs in the AV only in Prov 29 10; in RV, Ps 5 6; 55 23; 59 2; 139 19. See BLOOD.

BLOODY, blūd'ē (דם, dōm = "blood" of man or animal; and where the King James translators have rendered with the adj. "bloody," the Heb employs the noun in the concrete case, "of blood"): "A bloody record" (Ex 4 21; AV blood husband). Zipparoth, not being an Israelite, probably objected to the circumcision of infants, if not to the rite altogether; apprehending, however, that her husband's life was imperiled possibly through some grievous sickness (4 24) because of their disobedience in this particular, she performed the ceremony herself upon her son, saying, "A bridegroom of blood art thou to me." In RV the expression (AV "bloody") is variously rendered, "man of blood" (2 S 16 7 8); "men of blood" (Ps 26 9); "bloodthirsty" (6 6; 59 2; 139 19). In 2 S 21 1, "it is for Saul, and for his bloody house," might be rendered "Upon Saul and his house rests bloodshed." Ezekiel calls Jesus "the bloody city" (Ezk 22 2; 24 6; cf 7 23), referring to those unjustly put to death by the wicked rulers of Jerus. Nineveh also is called "the bloody city" (Nah 3 1). The capital here virtually stands for the kingdom, and history bears witness to the enormous cruelties perpetrated by the Assyrian rulers. It is seen on siege, pools of blood everywhere, the flaying of men alive, "great baskets stuffed with the salted heads of their foes." For two hundred years it is the story of brute force and ruthless cruelty. "The prey departeth not." And now every cruelty which they have visited upon others is to be turned upon themselves (3 19).

BLOODY FLUX, flūks (πυρετός καὶ δυσεντερία, purētōs kai dusenteiría, lit. "fever and dysentery"): The disease by which the father of Publius was afflicted in Malta (Acts 28 8). RV calls it "dysentery": a common and dangerous disease in Malta is often fatal to soldiers of the garrison even at the present day (Aitken, Pract. of Medicine, II, 841). It is also prevalent in Pal at certain seasons, and in Egypt its mortality was formerly about 20 per cent of the garrison. As the name means due to the discharge of blood from the intestine. Sometimes portions of the bowel become gangrenous and slough, the condition described as affecting Jehoram (2 Ch 21 19). There seems to have been an epidemic of the disease at the time of his seizure (2 Ch 21 14 15), and in the case of the king it left behind it a chronic ulcerated condition, ending in gangrene. Somewhat similar conditions of chronic intestinal ulceration following epidemic dysentery I have seen in persons who had suffered from this disease in India.

BLOODY SWEAT, swet (ἄρει θρόμβου αἵματος, ārēi thrōmboi haimatos): Described in Lk 22 44 as a physical accompaniment of Our Lord's agony at Gethsemani. (See on the passage which is absent in some MSS, see WH). Many old writers take this to mean that the perspiration dropped in the same manner as clots of blood drop from a wound, regarding the Gr term prefixed as expressing merely a comparison as in Mt 23 3, where lexōn has chlōrō (me "white as snow"). Cases of actual exudation of blood are described in several of the medieaval accounts of stigmatization, and Lefévre describes the occurrence of something similar in his account of Louise Lateau in 1870. For references to these cases see art. "Stigmatization" in Enc Brit, XXII, 550. It is perhaps in favor of the older interpretation that the word used by Aeschylus for drops of blood is staγpha (Agam. 1122) and by Eu-ripides stalaγmōns, not thrōmboi. None of the instances given by Tissot (Traité des nerfs, 279), or Schenck (Observ. méd., III, 455), can be said to be unimpeachable; but as the agony of Our Lord was unexampled in human experience, it is conceivable that it may have been attended with physical conditions of a unique nature.

BLOOM, blōm, BLOSSOM, blōs'um. See FLOWERS.

BLOT, blot (κύττάρος, kūttaros, from δέκα, dēka, "spot"): Occurs in the sense of sores (Prov 9 7). In Job 31 7 (AV) it is used fig. of a moral defect; RV has "spot." Blot out (κατακύτταρα, kattaκύttarā, "to wipe out," ἐκκύτταρα, ekküttrā, "to smear out"), to obliterate or destroy; "That a tribe be not blotted out" (AV "destroyed," Jgs 21 17). To blot men out of God's book is to cut them off by an untimely death (Ex 32 32).

Figuratively: "To blot out sin" is to forgive sin fully (Ps 81 19; Acts 3 19; Col 2 14), or to blot out sin is to reserve for punishment (Neh 4 5). The names of those who inherit eternal life are not blotted out of the "book of life" (Rev 3 5). See BOOK OF LIFE; BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE; FORGIVENESS.

BLOW, blō (ㄚ, nāshaph): Used with reference to the wind (Ex 15 10; Ps 78 26; 147 18; ינוש, yinōš, "to breathe," Lk 12 55; Jn 3 8; Rev 7 1); ידֶק, yēḏā, with reference to trumpet sound (Nu 10 5 4 10; 31 14; AV, Jgs 7 18 20; 1 K 1 34; 1 Ch 15 24; Ps 81 3; Ezek 3 7, Hos 8 11; Joel 2 15 15; 16, pēḇē, with reference to the strong expulsion of the breath (Ezk 21 31; 22 20 21; Hag

BOANERGES, bo-a-nō'rgēz (Boa'negy, Boanager; bo'ngə'rag, bō' nephēkhs, "sons of thunder"): The surname bestowed by Jesus upon James and John, the sons of Zebedee, when they were ordained to the apostleship (Mk 3.17). See James, Son of Zebedee. This has also been regarded as an equivalent of the "Heavenly Twins," the sons of Zeus or Thunder. According to this interpretation, the name Boanerges would represent the Dioscuri in some form or other of their varied presentation in the cults of the Mediterranean (of Professor J. Rendel Harris in Expos., vii, 116).

C. M. KERN

BOAR, bōr (גֵּבָה, ḫârî): In lamenting the troubled state of the Jewish nation the Psalmist (69.13) says: "The bear out of the wood doth ravage it, and the wild beast of the field feed on it," with evident reference to Israel's enemies, the Assyrians, etc. The wild boar is abundant in certain parts of Pal and Syria, esp. in the thickets which border the lakes and rivers, as about the Hula Lake. It is a descendant of the Galilee, the Jordan, and in the deltas of streams flowing into the Dead Sea, as Ghaur-us-Sâfieyh. Several fountains in Lebanon bear the name, Ḥir-ūn-Ḥaziy, though ḫârî is not an Arab word, hâzîr being the Arab, for "swine." See SWINE.

ALFRED ELY DAY

BOARD, börd (בּוּר, bōrēsh), kerevsh, "a slab or plank," "deck of a ship," "bench," "board"). This word is found in Ex 26.16–21; 36.21 ff; its pl. occurs in Ex 26.15–17; 26.15; 36.11; 36.20–24; 39.33; 40.18; Nu 3.36; 4.31. This word also is used in tr of בָּבַל, ḫâbîl (Ex 27.8; 38.7; Cant 8.9; Ezek 27.5 AV) = "a tablet" (of stone, wood or metal), "board," "plate," "table"; also of גָּלָד = "rib," hence a "side," "timber," "plank" (1 K 16.5 f.). In 1 K 6.9, 12, Sū³hîrâth = "a rank," "a row," hence, "a range" or "board" is used. In the NT we find the expression "on board" in Acts 27.44 AV, in tr of εἶναι συνέκτω, epi συνέκτω = "planks."

ness"[?] Ruth 2.4; 1 Ch 2.11.12; Mt 1.5; Lk 3.32): (1) A resident of Bethlehem and kinsman of Elimelech, Naomi's husband. In Ruth 2.1 he is described as a gīḇōr ḥayyâl, a phrase which can mean either "a mighty man of valor" or else "a man of position and wealth." The latter is probably the sense in which the phrase is applied to Boaz (1.6 8 1). He had fields outside the town, and to them Ruth went to glean. Boaz noticed her and extended special kindness and protection to her, bidding her remain with his female workers, and charging the men not to illtreat her, and also giving her of the reapers' food at mealtime. Boaz awoke one night and found Ruth lying at his feet. He praised her virtue, and promised to take charge of her if her dead husband's next-of-kin failed to do so. He laid her case before the next-of-kin, and finally redeemed the family property himself and bought as well the right to take Ruth in marriage.

Field of Boaz.

The son of Boaz and Ruth was Obed, father of Jesse, and grandfather of David. 1 Ch 2.11.12 makes Boaz a descendant of Hezron, and so probably a chief of the Hezronite clan in Bethlehem. Jewish tradition identifies Boaz with Bera (Jgs 12.8–10).

Boaz "is set before us as a model of piety, generosity and chastity." (H. P. Smith, OT History, 398). He found virtue and rewarded it. HPM, §§ 501–8, gives a picture of the life of "a well-to-do landed proprietor of central Pal., much of which could aptly be taken as a description of Boaz.

(2) The name of one of the two bronze pillars erected in front of Solomon's temple, the other being Jachin (1 K 7.18; 2 Ch 3.17). See JACHIN AND BOAZ; TEMPLE.

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

BOCCAS, bōk'as (Bok'kas, Bokkâde): A priest in the line of Ezra (1 Esd 8.2) called Bukki in Ezr 7.4 and Boroith in 2 Esd 1.2.

BOCHERU, bōk'ērū (בּוֹכֵר, Bok'ērā): A son of Azriakam, Saul's descendant (1 Ch 8.38 = 9.34). For the ending ב (b), of the forms בּוֹכֵר, gashmā (Neh 6.16) and בּוֹכֵר, milḥkā (12.14 AV and RVm).

BOCHIM, bōk'īm (בּוֹכִים, bo-bōkhīm): A place on the mountain W. of Gilgal said to have been so named (lit. "the weepers") because Israel wept there at the remembrance of the angel (Jgs 2.15). No name resembling this has been discovered. Given on the occasion mentioned, it may not have endured. Many, following LXX, identify it with Bethel.

BODY, bod'i: PHILOLOGICAL.

(1) Generally speaking, the OT language employs no fixed term for the human body as an entire organism in exact opposition to "soul" or "spirit." Various terms were employed, each of which denotes only one part or element of the physical nature, such as "trunk," "bones," "belly," "bowels," "heart," "flesh," these parts being used, by synecdoche, for the whole: בּוֹם, qe'm = "bone," or "skeleton," hence "body," is found in Ex 24.10 AV; Lam 4.7; בּוֹן, nephesh = "living organism" (Lev 21.11; Nu 6.6.7.11; 19.11.13.16; Hag 2.13; מָכָה, nāḥēdîh = "a flabby thing," "carcass" (Dt 21.23; Isa 26.19; Jer 26.23; 36 30); ἴματι, belen = "womb" (Dt 28 4.11.18.53; 30 9; Job 19 17 AV; Ps 132 11; Mic 6 7); ἴματι, ἀμφέθης = "thigh," "generative parts," "body" (Jgs 8 30); ἴματι, ἄμοιον = "a body, whether alive or dead" (1 S 31 10.12; 2 K 5 5 AV; Dnl 10 6); ἵματι, ἰματία (Cant 5 14); ἰματία = "corpse" (1 Ch 10 12); ἰμάθη = "the back," i.e., by (extension) "person" (Job 20 25); ἰμάθη = "flesh, as living or for food," "body" (Ezk 10 12); ἰμάθη, γεσθάemos = "a hard shower of rain," hence "a body" (Dnl 4 33; 5 21; 7 11); ἰματία, κρίνθαι = "a sheath," hence the receptacle of the soul, "body" (Dnl 7 15).

The Gr. word which is used almost exclusively for "body" in the NT is σῶμα, σῶma, Lat. corpus (Mt 5 29.30; 6 22.23.25; 26 26; Jn 21 21; Acts 9 40; 1 Cor 15 35.37.38.44; Eph 1 23; 2 16; 4 12.16; 6 23.30); ἱμάθη, ἱματία, signifying primarily the "surface" or "skin" (Acts 19 12). The word is employed in the NT to designate the sublimated substance with which we are to be clothed after the resurrection when he speaks of the "spiritual body" (1 Cor 15 44).

FRANK E. HIRSCH

GENERAL

(2) σῶμα, σῶma, Lat. corpus: The term "body" is not found in the Heb. of the OT in the sense in which it occurs in the Gr. "The Heb. term around which questions relating to the body must gather is flesh" (Davidson, OT Theol., 188). Various terms are used in the OT to indicate certain elements or component parts of the body, such as flesh, "bones," "bowels," "belly," etc., some of which have received a new meaning in the NT. Thus the OT "belly" (Heb belen, Gr kolota), "Our soul is bowed down to the dust; our belly cleaveth unto the earth" (Ps 44 25 AV)—the carnal appetite—has its counterpart in the NT: "They serve . . . their own belly" (Rom 16 18). So also the word τὰ μῆκος τῶν ἰμάτων (Rom 11.28) refers to the sense of comparison, as in Jer 31 20 AV.

Therefore my bowels are troubled for him," is found in more than one place in the NT. Thus in Phil 1 8 AV, "I long after you all in the bowels of Christ," and again, "if there be any bowels (πνεύματα) and mercies (Phl 2 1 AV)."

A "body" in the NT is largely used in a figurative, sense, either as indicating the "whole man" (Rom 6 12; Col 3 10), or as that which is morally corrupt—the "body of this death" (Rom 6 6 AV). In the expression, "buxing my body" (1 Cor 9 27), the word adopted from the prize-rings, "buxing" (πνεύματα), the body being considered as the lurching-place and instrument of evil. (Cf Rom 8 13 AV."

Mortify the deeds of the body."

Between these two, and the other meanings seem to range. On the one hand we find the church called "the body of Christ" (Eph 4 14; 1 Cor 12 13), with diversity of gifts, enjoying the "united body" of the Spirit and other gifts. On the other we read of a spiritual, incorruptible body, a resurrection-body as opposed to the natural body, which is doomed to corruption in death (1 Cor 15 44).

Not only do we find these meanings in the word itself, but also in some of its combinations. On the one hand we find in Eph 3 6, as partakers of the promise, Christ as "fellow-heirs," and of "the same body" (αὐθηματία) in corporate union with all who put their trust in the Redeemer of mankind; on the other, we read of mere "bodily [omatic] exercises," which are not profitable (1 Tim 4 8)—which body evidently is contrasted with "spirit." And again, we read of the Holy Ghost descending in "bodily" (omatic) shape upon the "Son of God" (Lk 3 22), in whom dwelt the "fulness of the Godhead bodily" (somatico) (Col 2 9). So, too, the "body" is called a temple of the Holy Ghost: "Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit?" (1 Cor 6 19).

From all this it is apparent that the body in itself is not necessarily evil, a doctrine which is taught in Gr. philosophy, but nowhere in the OT and NT. The rigid and harsh dualism met with in Plato is absent from St. Paul's writings, and is utterly foreign to the whole of Scripture. There are distinct differences. On the one hand, that the body is subordinated to the soul, but on the other, with equal clearness, that the human body has a dignity, originally conferred upon it by the Creator, who shaped it out of earth, and glorified it by the incorruptible, "the sinless One, though born of a woman. Julius Müller has well said: "Paul denies the presence of evil in Christ, who was partaker of our fleshly nature (Gal 4 4), and he recognizes it in spirits who are not partakers of the flesh" (Eph 2 2)."

Is it not therefore in the highest degree probable that according to him evil does not necessarily pertain to man's sensuous nature, and that that (say body) denotes something different from this? (The Christian Doctrine of Sin, I, 321, Eng. ed.) He further shows that the derivation of sin from sense is utterly irreconcilable with the central principle of the apostle's doctrine as to the perfect holiness of the Redeemer, and that "the doctrine of the future resurrection—even taking into account the distinction between the soma psuchikon and the soma pneumatikon (1 Cor 16 44)—is clearly at variance with the doctrine that sin springs from the corporeal nature as its source." (Phil 2 5).

The very first sin was spiritual in its origin—an act of rebellion against God—the will of the creature in opposition to the will of the Creator (Gen 3). It was conceived in doubt—"Hath God said?" it was born in desire—"The tree was good for food"; it was stimulated by a rebellious hankering after equality with God: "Ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil," it was introduced from without, from the spiritual world, through the agency of a mysterious, supernatural being, employing "a beast of the field more subtle than any which Jehovah God had made." That the serpent in the form not identified with Satan, and that the clearest utterance in pre-Christian times on the subject is to be found in the Book of Wisdom 2 24 ("by the envy of the devil death entered into the world"), may be true. That the narrative of the Fall is fig or symbolical may also be granted. But the whole tendency of the early narrative is to connect the first human sin with a superhuman being, employing an agent known to man, and making that agent its representative in the "subtle" of the great temptation as a prelude to the menial fall. (Eph 4 24; 16 11; 2 Cor 11 3; 1 Tim 2 14; He 2 14; Rev 12 9). Great historic truths are imbedded in that narrative, whatever we may think of the form which that narrative has assumed. There can be no doubt that the oldest and truest traditions of the human race are to be found in the sacred books. It is not denied that sin has desolated the temple of the living God, which is the body. That body indeed has become defiled and polluted by sin. Paul recognizes an abnormal development of the sen- suous in fallen man, and regards sin as having in a special manner entrenched itself in the body, which becomes liable to death on this very account (Rom 6:6; 7:24) "(Enc of Rel. and Ethics, 1, 761). But we may safely say that the theory which con- nects sin with the physical body, as the man is a purely sensuous origin, is alien to the whole spirit and letter of revelation.

FIGURATIVE

(3) In the NT (ρύγα, σώμα, “the body” both of men and animals) the word has a rich fig. and spiritual use: (1) the temporary home of the soul (2 Cor 5:6); (2) “the temple of the Holy Spirit” (1 Cor 6:19); (3) “temple” (Jn 2:21); (4) the old man, the flesh as the servant of sin or the sphere in which moral evil comes to outward expression (Rom 6:6; 7:7; cf Paul’s use of σάρξ, “flesh”); (5) the “church” as Christ’s body, the organism through which He manifests His life and in which His spirit dwells (Rom 12:3; 1 Cor 12:27); (6) “manifestations” of His grace (1 Cor 12:7); (7) "substance" (spiritual reality or life in Christ) v. "shadow" (Col 2:17); (8) the ascended and glorified body (Phil 3:21); (9) the resurrection or "spiritual" (v. natural) body of the redeemed in heaven (1 Cor 15:44); (10) the whole personality, e.g. the spiritual presence, power and sacrificial work of Christ, the mystical meaning of “the body and the blood” symbolized in the bread and cup of the sacrament (1 Cor 11:27). The term body is exceptionally rich in connection with the self-giving, sacrificial, atoning work of Christ. It was the outward sphere or manifestation of His suffer- ing. Through the physical He revealed the extent of His redeeming and sacrificial love. He “bare our sins in his body upon the tree” (1 Pet 2:24), thus forever discharging all the ceaseless and costly sacrifices of the old dispensation (He 9:24-28). St. Paul describes the body of his Lord in terms of sin (Rom 6:6); of His death (Rom 7:24); of His glory (Phil 3:21).

BODY-GUARD. bodi-gárd. The expression occurs in Apoc (1 Esd 3:4), “the body-guard that kept the king’s person.”

BODY OF DEATH, deth (ρύγα τοῦ θανάτου, σώμα τοῦ θανάτου): These words are found in Paul’s impassioned argument on the reign of the law, which dooms man to continuous disappoint- ment and convinces him of the terrible power of indwelling sin. “O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?” (Rom 7:24 AV). It is the “picture of the still unredeemed man in his relation to the law” (Meyer). The tr. “this body of death,” though grammatic- ally possible, is logically inept and impermissible. The phrase forces the mind of the apostle is not physical but ethical. Death points to the dominion of sin, to the reign of the law, as revealed in his physical life, from which he is delivered only through regeneration, by faith in Christ. It points to “this nature” and to the “I cannot.” It is therefore the bondage under the law of sin, the body as the seat of this conscious and bitter struggle, that the figure points at. And yet the ethical may have a physical background. There may be a distant reference here to the dreadful punishment of the body of the thief cast into a body to a corpse, that the constant corruption of death might extinguish the life of the victim of this exquisite torture.

HENRY E. DOKER

BODY OF HEAVEN: The AV translates the Heb idiom, דעֶּשׁ הַשָּׁמָּאָם, by “the body of heaven” (Ex 24:10). A more correct rendering is given in the RV, “the very heaven,” taking the word ’e ven in its idiomatic use as an intensifier, with the thought “bone,” “strength,” “substance,” and then as “self” (cf Job 21:23); the substance of the blue, unclouded sky, hence the clear sky itself.

BODY, SPIRITUAL, spir-it-ú-al: Paul describes the body after the resurrection as a spiritual body (σῶμα ψυχικόν) and contrasts it with the natural (psychical body, σῶμα πνευματικόν, 1 Cor 15:44). Our present natural body has for its life-principle the soul (ψυχή); but the resur- rection body is adapted and subordinated to the spirit (pneuma). See PSYCHOLOGY. The apostle does not argue for a literal and material identity of that future body with the present one, but thinks of it as that future “sacrificial, spiritual organism so conditioned as to be adapted to a state of existence which lies wholly within the sphere of the spirit. Against his Corinthian readers he argues that the resurrection cannot be suc- ceeded by a state of coexistence, of being wont to admit a mere etherealized state. There must be a body, but between it and our present body there is a similar difference to that between the first and second Adam. The present body and the first Adam were alike dominated by the soul (ψυχή); but as the second Adam became a life-giving spirit, so will the resurrection body be a spiritual one. Christ became a life-giving spirit through the resurrection (Meyer on 1 Cor 15:44); and since we are to bear His image (ver 49), it be- comes evident that Christ’s resurrection-body is the nearest possible approach to a sensible represen- tation of the spiritual body. For this Paul argues more directly when he affirms that our condition is not “like the man of sin” (Rom 7:24, 1 Cor 15:45), but “like the body of His glory” (Phil 3:21; of 1 Jn 3:2). The body of Christ after the resurrection was con- formed in many respects to the body of His earthly life, yet with some marked differences. He ate (Lk 24:42,43); He breathed (Jn 20:22) assed flesh and bones (Lk 24:39), and could be apprehended by the bodily senses (Lk 24:40; Jn 20:27). His body possessed characteristics which differentiated it entirely from the popular fantasy of ghosts or apparitions (Lk 24:36-43). Yet His body was superior to the usual barriers which restrict human movements. Barred doors and distances did not impede His going (Jn 20:19-26; Lk 24:31-36). The context shows that the purpose of His eating was to convince the disciples that it was really He (Lk 24:41-43), and not to sustain life which His body was probably capable of maintaining in other ways. John speaks of His appearances after His resurrection as “manifestations” (Jn 21:1-21). A change in His person and appearance had certainly taken place, for those who knew Him best did not at once recognize Him (Lk 24:16; Jn 20:14). It is evident therefore that the post-resurrection-body of Jesus was in some way that had the character of realiz- ing itself to natural senses, or withdrawing itself at will. It was this same body which was taken into the heavens at the ascension, and which remains in heaven (Acts 1 11; 3 21). There is no hint that it underwent any change in its removal from earth. Hence the spiritual body of which Paul speaks is not to be unlike the body which Jesus possessed after His resurrection (Phil 3 10), the presence of which is to be held in absence of the desires and passions which belong naturally to the present bodily existence (Mt 22 30; Lk 20 35 36).

BOHAN, bohan (but, bōhan, “thumb,” “stumpy”): A son of Reuben according to Josh 15 6; 21 17. There is no mention made of B. in the genealogies of Reuben. “The stone of Bohan (eben bōhan) was a boundary mark on the N.E. frontier of Judah, separating it from Benjamin. Site unidentified.

BOIL (noun) (נָשִׁים, sh'ln; πασος, hēlos): A localized inflamed swelling. The Heb word is derived, due to the morbo tr meaning “to burn,” and is used as a generic term for the sores in the sixth plague of Egypt (Ex 9 9–11); for a sore which might be confused with leprosy (Lev 13 18–23); for Job’s malady (26 7) and Hezekiah’s disease (2 K 20 1). Isw. was derived from the vb. “to boil,” i.e. to suppurate, now obsolete except as a dialect word in Scotland and Ireland. Wyclif uses the name for Lazarus’ sores (Lk 16 20), “hounds licked his byls.” The constant theme is the healing of abscess, and occurs in the reduplicated form hūghn in Papyrus. Ebers, CV. The plague of boils in Egypt came without warning immediately after the insect plagues of kiwnh (sandflies) and that of ’druk or flies, and followed the epidemic murrain, which is suggestive in the light of the transmission of toxic germs by insects. It has been supposed by some to be elephantiasis, as Pliny says that this disease was peculiar to Egypt (A.D. 19). A stronger case has been made out for its identity with confluent smallpox; but as it is not described as being a fatal disease, it may more probably have been an aggravated form of the ordinary gregarious furuncles or carbuncles.

Job’s body is said to have been covered with itchy, irritating sores which made his face unrecognizable (2 12), caused continual burning pain (3 24; 6 4), and which were infested with maggots (7 5) and exhausted a nauseous fetor (17 17). His sleep was destroyed and his nervous system enfeebled (26 26) so that he required assistance to move, as he sat in the ashes (2 8). Various diagnoses have been made of his malady, but it is most probable that it was a form of the disease known as “oriental sore,” or “Bagdad boil,” called in Algeria “Biskra batton,” in which the intensely itchy sores are often multiple, affecting the face, hands, and other exposed parts. The cases which I have seen have been very intractable and disfiguring.

Hezekiah’s boil was apparently more localized, and the indefinite description would accord with that of a carbuncle. It seems to have rendered him unclean (Isa 38 22), though the reference may be to the practice referred to in Lev 13 18 f. The “botch” of Egypt (Dt 28 27 35 AV) is a tr of the same word, as is “boil” in RV. Botch is an old Eng. name for boil and occurs in Piers Plowman, and the adj. “botchy” is used in Troilus and Cressida (II, 1 6). The word is cognate to the old French boche or poche, a form of our later word “pock.” The sores of Lazarus (Lk 16 20) were probably old varicose ulcers, such as are common on the legs of the old and poor in the East as they are in the West.

BOIL (verb) (נָשָׁה, bōshah, כָּבָשָׁה, rātahah): “Boil” is the tr of bāshah, “to bubble up,” “to boil,” “to be boiled,” “to boil.” (Lev 8 31; 1 K 19 21; 2 K 6 29; Ezk 46 20 24 bis); of rātah, “to be hot,” “to boil,” “to be made to boil,” “to be greatly moved” under strong emotion (the bowels); Hiph. “to cause to boil” (Job 30 27 AV “My bowels boiled, and rested not,” ERV “My bowels boil.” ARV “My heart is inditing”; 41 31, “He maketh the deep to boil like a pot”; Ezk 24 5, “make it boil well”; of nārāth, “to boil” or “be well up” (Isa 64 21, 2 in Heb) “The fire causeth the waters to boil”); in AVm of Ps 45 1 (“My heart is inditing a good matter”) we have Heb “boilleth” or “bubbleth up” (rātash, “to boil” or “bubble up,” RV text, “My heart overfloweth with a goodly matter”).

“Boiling-places,” occurs in Ezk 46 23 as the tr of mtbāhashālāth, “hearts,” “boiling-places.” ARV has “boiling-houses” for “places of them that boil” (Ezk 46 24), “boil well” for “consume” (24 10); ARV has “boiling over” for “unstable” (Gen 49 4; ERV “bubbling over”).

BOLDNESS, bold’nes (μαρτυρία, parāthēa, “confidence,” “fearelessness,” “freedom”). This was one of the results of discipleship (Acts 4 13 29 31; Eph 3 12; Phil 1 20, 3 17; 1 Jn 1 17). It was a necessary qualification for the work assigned them. They were not only subject to violent persecutions, but also were required to make personal sacrifices. Paul uses the word in the sense of plainness in 2 Cor 3 12. In He 10 19; 1 Jn 2 28; 4 17, it has the sense of freedom resulting from confidence. In Philem ver 8, the reference is to the authority which Paul claims in this case. JACOB W. KAPP

BOILED, boil (גָּרָה, gibb‘ol, “the calyx of flowers”): Hence “in bloom,” and so rendered, in RV, of flowering flax (Ex 9 31).

BOLSTER, bolt’stār: Found in AV only in 2 S 5 15, 16, “Behold, the teraphim was in the bed, with the pillow of goat’s hair at the head thereof” (AV “for his bolster”), and 26 7 11 12 16, “Saul lay sleeping, . . . with his spear stuck in the ground at his head.” “Bolster” in these passages in AV was used to translate a Heb word whose true significance is “the place of the head,” or “the head-place.” It will be noted that it has disappeared from the RV, which rightly has throughout “head,” instead of “bolster.” See CUSHION.

BOLT, bolt (גֲּל, nā’al, “to bind up”): The ancient Hebrews had fastenings of wood or iron for the doors of houses (2 S 13 17 18; Cant 5 8), city gates (Neh 3 3 6), prison doors, etc (Isa 46 2), which were in the form of bolts. These were sometimes pushed back from within; but there were others which, by means of a key, could be unfastened and pushed back from without (Jgs 3 23 ff). These were almost the only form of locks known to the Israelites. See BAIL;

In Hab 3 5, resheph (a poetic word for “flame”) is rendered “fiery bolts” (AV “burning coals”). It seems to denote “the fiery bolts, by which Jah was imagined to produce pestilence or fever” (Driver, Drv 367).

BOND. See Band; Bill; Chain.

BONDAGE, bon’dāj: Used in two senses in Scripture, a literal and a metaphorical sense. (1) In the former sense it refers (a) to the condition of the Hebrews (גָּרֶה, ’abhādālāh) in Egypt (Ex 1 14 AV; 2 23 and often) which is frequently called “the house of bondage” (“slaves,” BONDMAID, bond'maid: Occurs but three times in AV (Lev 19:20; 25:44; Gal 4:22 ["handmaid"]). It is the first instance in Genesis, 28(10) of a Heb. girl who has by birth, purchase or otherwise come into temporary slavery. The word here is נָשִּׁית, nēshîth. It occurs often in the OT, but is elsewhere tr£ "maid," "handmaid," "woman servant," "maidservant," etc. The other instance (Lev 25:44) refers to foreign slave girls and has a different word, נָשִּׁית, nēshîth, which also occurs a number of times, but is elsewhere tr£ "handmaid," etc. The NT instance (Gal 4:22) refers to Abigail, Abraham’s Egyptian slave girl. The original word παίδησις, pheidēsís, occurs several other times, but in AV is elsewhere tr£ "maid," "damsel," etc. It means a slave girl. See SLAVERY.

WILLIAM JOSEPH McGLOTHLIN

BONDSERVANT, bond'sər-vant: Appears only once in AV (Lev 25:39) where it translates אֶבֶּדֶה, 'ebēdēh, "a slave": "Thou shalt not cause him to render the service of a bondservant" or slave. RV frequently uses bondservant (δούλος, doulos) instead of the word "servant" of AV (Jn 8:44; 35; 1 Cor 7:21; Gal 4:7). See SLAVERY.

WILLIAM JOSEPH McGLOTHLIN

BONE, bōn, BONES (בֵּן, ben, בְּנֵי, bēnê, בְּנֵיהּ, bēnēyâh), "egem, "egem; Aram. דֶּנֶה, demân, "crem, by extension used for "bony frame," "body," "strength," etc. Ps 35:10; "the whole man"; Lk 24:39, "flesh and bones"—the solid and tangible framework of the body: fig. the substance, the idea of a thing, the thing, per se: Figurative: Very often we find the use of these words in metaphorical phrases, in which a disease or a discomfort of the body denotes certain emotions or mental attitudes. Thus the expression "rottenness of the bones" (Prov 12:4; 1; 44) signifies the feelings of a man whose wife causes him shame and confusion, or is equivalent to "envy," "jealousy." The tr of the LXX in these passages by εἰκόνας, ikônas, "worm," and etc., ἁς, "maggot," "moth" is incorrect. The same phrase is used in Hab 2:16 for utter dejectedness through the anticipation of approaching evil. Similarly the "shaking of the bones" (Job 4:14) is expressive of fear, and, of dejection and sadness in Jer 23:3. The "burning of the bones" is found as a symptom of Job’s disease (Job 30:30), and stands for grief, depression of spirits in Ps 102:3 and Lam 1:13, and also for the feeling of Jeremiah, when he attempted to hot back the Divine message (Jer 20:10), while "dryness of bones" (Prov 17:22) is the opposite of "good health." Other similar expressions of mental distress are the "piercing of the bones" (Job 30:17), the bones are "troubled" (Ps 6:2), "out of weevil" (Ps 22:11), "consumed" (Ps 31:10 AV), "wasted away" or "waxed old" (Ps 33:3), "broken" (Ps 61:8; Lam 3:4), "ill at rest" (Ps 38:3), "bone of my bones," etc (Gen 2:23), having the same nature, and the nearest relation (2 S 5:1) and affection (Eph 5:30). In the last-mentioned passage, RV omits "of his flesh, and of his bones" as an interpolation from Gen 2:23. The figs. in Mic 3:3 are expressive of the most cruel oppression and murder.

BONNET, bon'et: In AV the designation of the special headdress of the rank and file of the priesthood, RV "head-tire" (Ex 28:40). It consisted of a long swathe of white linen wound around the head in Oriental fashion. The Heb word found in Ex 29:9 RV, "to bind head-tires," etc. "to wind head-tires," means, in the light of usage, "to form an egg-shaped turban." Cf Jos, Ant, III, vii, 3, and see Rich, Dict. Rom and Gr Ant, s.v. piloos, for illustration of the egg-shaped cap of Ulysses, with which Jerome compared the priestly turban. See DRESS; Mitre, etc.

[Other entries follow in the same format.]
A book is any record of thought in words. It consists of a fixed form of words embodied in some kind of substance. The form of words is the main factor, but it has no existence without the record. The kind of record is indifferent; it may be carved on stone, stamped on clay, written or printed on vellum, papyrus or paper, or only stamped on the mind of author or hearer, if so be it keeps the words in fixed form. Looked on as a form of words the book is called a work, and looked on as a record it is called a volume, document, inscription, etc., as the case may be; but neither volume nor work has any real existence as book save as united.

The Bib. words for book, both Gr and Heb, oscillate in meaning (as they do in all languages) between the two elements, the form of words and the material form. The common words for book in the NT, from which too the word "Bible" comes, refer back to the papyrus plant or the material on which the book is written, just as the Eng. word "book" was long supposed to be derived from the beech tree, on whose bark the book was written.

The usual word in the Heb of the OT (sépher) may possibly refer to the act of writing, just as the Gr word gramma and the Eng. "writing" do, but more likely, as its other meanings of "numbering" and "narration" or even "missive" indicate, it refers neither to the material nor to the writing process but to the literary work itself. It suggests at least the fact that the material did, indeed, bear on tallies. The knot-books and various notch-book tallies are true books. In the King James' version the word "word" (dábhár) is sometimes tr' book, and, although changed in these places in the RV to "acts" or "deeds," it was nevertheless quite properly tr a book, just as the "word" in Gr is used for book, and indeed in Eng. when the Bible is called the Word. Besides these terms commonly tr book in the EV, various book forms are referred to in the Bible as roll or volume (which is the same in origin), tablet, and perhaps rock inscription (Job 19 23.24). The fact that the Bible is a book, or indeed a library of many kinds of books, makes necessary that to approach its study one should have some systematic idea of the nature of the book; the origin of new forms and their survival, oral and manuscript transmission, the nature of the inward book and the various kinds of inward books. Apart from the matter of general archaeological use for historical interpretation, the questions of inspiration, the incarnate, creative, and indwelling word and many other doctrines are wholly bound up with this question of the nature of the book, and many phrases, such as the Book of Life, can hardly be understood without knowing with some degree of clearness what a book is.

The archaeology, text criticism and higher criticism of the past few years have revolutionized book history and theory in their respective fields. Above all the young science of experimental psychology has, in its short life, contributed more than the others to a new understanding of the OT. On these lines the new exegetical approach is that the Bible, the word of God and the Word of God, the Bible and Jesus Christ.

Modern experimental psychology by its study of inward images, inward speech, inward writings and lips may change the kind of inward book forms has.

2. Inward Books

Inward books may be originals or copies. Every book is, to begin with, inward. Men sometimes speak of an autograph as the "original," but it is in fact only a first-hand copy of the original, which is inward, and never by any chance becomes or can become outward. Besides these there are also inward copies of the books of others. The fact that a book may be memorized is no new thing, but the analysis of the process is. It seems that a book may be inwardly copied through eye or ear or touch or any sense from some outward book; or again it may be copied back and forth within, from sense copy to motor copy, from visual to oral, auditory to inward writing. In reading aloud the visual image is copied over into oral; in taking dictation or the auditory speech or manual into inward writing. Many men, even in reading from print, cannot understand unless they translate as they go into oral images or even move their lips. Many others either hearing or reading a French book have to translate into English and have in the end two memory copies, one French and one English, both of which may be recalled. In whatever way they are recorded, these memory impressions are real copies of outward books, and in the case of tribal medicine men, Vedic priests, the ancient minstrels, village glossaries, and professional story-tellers of all kinds, the inward collection of books may become a veritable library.

The end for which a book is created is in general to reach another mind. This means the utterance or copying into some outward material and the re-copying by another into publication memory. The commonest modes of utterance are oral speech and writing; but there are many others, some appealing to eye, some to ear, some to touch: e.g. gesture language of the Indian and the deaf mute, pressure signs for the blind and deaf, signal codes, drum language, the telegraph click, etc. If the persons to be reached are of a kind incapable of writing, the script may be enough to supply all needs of publication, but if there are very many the speech or writing must somehow be multiplied. This may be done by the author himself. Blind Homer, it is alleged, repeated the Iliad in many cities; and the modern political orator might repeat the same speech.
several times in the same evening to different audiences. So too the author may, as many Lat writers did, copy out several autographs. If the audience is still too great to be reached by authors’ utterances, the aid of heralds, minstrels, scribes and the printing-press must be called in to copy from the autographs or other author’s utterances; and in case of need more help yet is called in, copies made from these copies, and copies again, and so on to perhaps hundreds of copyings. This process may be represented as $x^n$, $x^n$; where $x$ is an original, $x^1$ a first-hand copy of author's utterance, $x^2$ a second-hand copy, $x^3$ a third-hand, etc.

Books may thus be divided into originals, first-hand or authors' copies and re-copies. Re-copies in turn whether at second-, third-, fourth- or nth-hand, may be either mechanical or personal, according as the copy is direct from outward material to outward material or from the outward material to a human memory.

(1) Mechanical copies include photographic copies of MSS, or of the lips in speaking, or of gesture, or any other form of utterance which may be photographed. They include also phonographic records, telegraph records, and any other mechanical records of sound or other forms of utterance. Besides photographic and phonographic processes, mechanical copies include founding, stamping by wax or gelatine, gelatine pad and printing-press processes, any processes, in short, which do not pass $via$ the human mind, but direct from copy to copy by material means. They do not include composition in movable types or by type-setting machines (typewriting machines and the like, which, like writing, require the interposition of a human mind. These mechanical copies are subject to defects of material, but are free from psychological defects and error, and defect of material is practically negligible.

(2) Personal copies include inward copies, or memory books, and the re-uttered copies from these copies, to which latter class belong all copied MSS. The memory copy may be by eye from writing, or from the lips of a speaker in the case of the deaf. Or it may be by ear from oral speech, telegraph key, drum or other sound utterances. Or it may be again from touch, as in the case of finger-tip lip-reading or the reading of raised characters by the blind. Each of these kinds may perhaps be located in a different part of the mind or brain, and its molecular substratum may be as different from other kinds of inward record as a wave of light is different from a wave of sound, or a photograph from the wax roll of a phonograph, but whatever the form or nature, it somehow records a certain fixed form of words which is substantially equivalent to the original. This memory copy, unlike the mechanical copy, is liable to substantial error. This may arise from defects of sense or of the inward processes of record and it is nearly always present. Why this need be so is one of the mysteries of human nature, but that it is, is one of the obvious facts; and when memory copies are re-uttered there is still another crop of errors, "slips of tongue and pen," equally mysterious but equally inevitable. It comes to pass, therefore, that where oral or manuscript transmission exists, there is sure to be a double crop of errors between the successive outward copies. When thus a form of words is frequently re-copied or reprinted $via$ the human mind the resulting book becomes more and more unlike the original as to its form of words, until in the late manuscript copies of early works there may often be thousands of variations from the original. Even an inspired revelation would thus be subject to at least one and perhaps two or three sets of errors from copying before it reached even the autograph stage.

Before the knowledge of handwriting became general, oral publication was usual, and it is still not uncommon. The king's laws and proclamations, the works of poets and historians, and the sacred books were antediluvially published orally by heralds and minstrels and prophets; and these primitive publishers are survived still by town criers, actors, reciters, and Scripture readers.

Up to the point of the first impression on another mind, oral publication has many advantages. The impression is generally more vivid, and the voice conveys many fine shades of feeling through inflection, stress, and the delicate variations in tone quality which cannot be expressed in writing. When it comes to transmission, however, oral transmission tends to rapid deterioration with each re-copy. It is true that such transmission may be quite exact with enough painstaking and repetition; thus the modern stage affords many examples of actors with large and exact repertories, and the Vedas were, it is alleged, handed down for cents.
by a rigidly trained body of memorizers. The memorizing of Confucian books by Chinese students and of the Koran by Moslem students is very exact. Nevertheless exact transmission orally is rare, and exists only under strictly artificial conditions. Ear impressions, to begin with, tend to be less exact than eye impressions, in any event, because they depend on a brief sense impression, while in reading the eye lingers until the matter is understood. Moreover, the memory copy is not fixed and tends to fade away rapidly; unless very rigidly guarded and frequently repeated it soon breaks up its verbal form. This is readily seen by the great variety in the related legends of closely related tribes; and in modern times in the tales of village gossips and after-dinner stories, which soon lose their fixed verbal form, save as to the main point.

There is great difference of opinion as to the part which oral transmission played in the composition of the OT. The prevailing theory of the higher critics of the 19th cent., made transmission of pre-Biblical material to at least the 8th cent. BC, but the recent remarkable revelations of archaeology regarding the use of written documents in Pal at the time of the Exodus and before has changed the situation somewhat. The chief developments as to the Sem character of Pal before the invasion of the Israelites, together with the growing evidence of the prevailing use of handwriting all over Pal by not later than the 9th cent., point in the other direction. It is far from clear that the Semic wave was from the north rather than the south, in which case the only possible ground for ascribing illiteracy to the Hebrews at the time of the conquest, and therefore exclusive oral transmission, begins to recede.

Whatever may be the facts, it may be said with some definiteness that the theory which implies two sets of traditions, handed down for several cents. and retaining a considerable amount of verbal likeness, implies written tradition, not oral. For no popular tradition keeps identical verbal forms for so long a time, and there is little ground for supposing artificial transmission by professional memorizers. The facts of the period, on the other hand, have served as such, but there is no evidence that they did; and it would have been curious if, writing being within easy reach, this should have been done. As in almost all literatures, it is far more likely that the popular records were derived and refreshed by literary sources, than that lit. was compiled from traditions with long oral transmission.

Bib. references to oral publication are found in the references to heralds (see s.,v.), to Solomon's wisdom as "spoken" (1 K 4 32-34). proclamations and edicts, the public reading of the law in the OT, and the reading in the synagogue in the NT. All the oracles, "thus saith the Lord" and "the word of Jeh," to Moses, etc., and all allusions to preaching the word, belong to this class of oral publication and transmission. A direct allusion to oral transmission is found in Ps 44 1, "We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us.

The distinction of handwriting as against oral utterance lies first in the permanence of the record, but it has also a curious psychological advantage over speech. The latter reaches the mind through hearing one letter at a time as uttered. With writing, on the other hand, the eye grasps three to six letters at a time, and takes it as wholes instead of spelling them out. The ear always lags, therefore, the eye anticipates, although it may also linger if it needs to. While therefore impressions from hearing may perhaps be deeper, one may gather many more in the same time from reading.

When it comes to transmission, the advantage of handwriting is obvious. In the first place, even the poorest ink hardly fades as rapidly as memory. Then at best few men reach a hundred years, and therefore no memory copy, while on the other hand the living life of是不会 has been reached. We have writings that have lasted 6,000 years, at least; while if the Palerine stone, e.g. had been orally transmitted it must needs have passed through some 200 copyists at least, each producing two sets of errors. The advantage of manuscript transmission over oral tradition in its permanence is thus very great. It is true, of course, that in the case of fragile material like papyrus, paper, or even leather, transmission ordinarily implies many re-copyings and corresponding corruption, but even at worst these will be very much better than the best popular oral tradition.

In the broad sense MSS include all kinds of written books without regard to material, form or instruments used. In the narrowest sense they are limited to rolls and codices, i.e. to literary manuscripts. Inscriptions are properly written matter engraved or inscribed on hard material. Documents, whether private letters or official records, are characteristically folded in pliable material. Literary transmission, and the latter is the usual form of the printed books as well. These three classes of written books have their corresponding sciences in epigraphy, diplomatic and paleography.

(1) "Epigraphy" is attributed to ascribe inscriptions set up for record in public places. These include published laws, inscriptions, biographical memorials like the modern gravestone inscriptions and those on memorial statues, battle monuments, and the like. The latter includes inscriptions on gems, jewels, weights and measures, weapons, utensils, etc. Seals and coins from all points of view belong here and form another division under printing. These have their own sciences in numismatics and archeology. The chief Bibli. reference is to the "tables of stone" (Ex 24 12). See Table; Alphabet; Weight; Writing, etc.

(2) "Numismatics" is the science of seals. Scriptural references to the seal or signet (Gen 38 18; Job 38 14; Rev 5 1; etc) are many. See Seal; Signet.

(3) "Archeology" has to do with inscriptions on coins and medals, and is becoming one of the greatest sources of our knowledge of ancient history, esp. on account of the aid derived from coins in the matter of dating, and because of the vast quantity of them discovered. See Money.

(4) "Diplomatics," or the science of documents, has to do with contracts of sale and purchase (Jer 3 8; 32 14), bills of divorce (Dt 24 1) and certificates of all sorts of the nature of those registered in the modern public records. These may be on clay tablets, as in Babylonia and the neighboring regions, or on ostraca as found esp. in Egypt, but everywhere in the ancient Mediterranean world, and notably for Bib. history, in Samaria, as discovered by the Harvard expedition. Multitudes of the Egypt papyri discovered in modern times are of this character as well as the Italian papyri until papyrus was succeeded by vellum. Many are also found on wax, gold, silver, brass, lead tablets, etc. See Letters; Ostraca; Palaeography.

(5) "Palaeography" has to do with volumes or books of considerable bulk. Chiefly it is, therefore, to do mainly with literary works of all sorts, but it shades into diplomatics when official documents, such as collections of laws (e.g. Deuteronomy), treaties, such as the famous treaty between the Hittites and Egypt, and modern leases are of such bulk as to be best transmitted in volume form. It has to do chiefly with the clay tablets, papyrus, leather, vellum and paper volumes. The clay tablet is mentioned in the OT at various points (see Tablet), the roll in both OT and NT (see Roll). The leather roll is the traditional form for the Heb Scriptures up to the present day, although the codex or modern volume form had been invented before the conclusion of the NT, and the earliest extant copies are in this form. The books of the OT and NT were all probably first written on rolls. For the different methods of producing these various forms—graving, casting, pressing, pen and ink, etc., see Writing.

Printing differs from writing chiefly in being executed in two dimensions. In writing, a chisel or brush or pen follows a continuous or interrupted line, while printing stamps a letter or a part of a letter, a line, a page, or many pages at a stroke.

The die, the wedge for clay tablets, seals, molds, xylographic plates, as well as the typewriter, movable type or electrotype plates, etc., belong largely to printing rather than writing. The wedge stamp, or single-letter die, the typewriter, the matrix and movable type form, however, a sort of transition between the pen point and the printing-press in that they follow letter after letter. Coins and seals, on the other hand, differ little from true printing save in the lengths of the writing; Bab seals and the rotary press are one in principle. Sphragiatics, or the science of seals, and numismatics, or the science of coins, medals, etc., belong thus with printing from this point of view, but are more commonly and conveniently classed with epigraphy, on the principle that they depend on the light and shade of incision or relief in one color as distinguished from the color contrasts of ink or paint. Printed books include the xylographic process of Chinese and early European printing, page and form printing from movable type, and all electrotype, stencil, gelatine pad, etc., processes.

The advantage of printing over writing is in the more rapid multiplication of copies, and still more in the accuracy of the copies. The first setting in movable type is as liable to error as any written copy, but all impressions from this are wholly without textual variations. For printed editions of the Bible see Text; Versions, etc.

In the natural process of transmission all reprints in movable type, manuscripts or oral repetitions accumulate variations with each re-copying. These are, in general, errors, and the process is one of degeneration. In oral transmission the average error with each generation is very great, and it is only with incredible pains that the best copies are made equal to even these manuscripts, although at its best only equals the first type-set copy. The same expenditure of care on this type-set copy produces thousands of copies in printing where it produces one in manuscript. The photogranent, the typewriter, type-bar composition, photographic and electrotype methods have reduced the average error in modern books to a very low point. But even after incredible pains on the part of the authors and professional proofreaders, the offered reward of a guinea for each detected error in the Oxford revised version of the Bible brought several errors to light. This version is however about as nearly free from textual error as any large book ever made, and millions of copies of it are now printed wholly without textual variation.

But textual errors are not the only variations. It often happens that the author or someone else undertakes to correct the errors and makes substitutions or additions of one sort or another. This result is a revised edition, which is in general an improvement, or evolution upward. Variations are thus of two kinds: involuntary and intentional, corresponding pretty well with the words "copies" and "editions" of a work.

Strictly speaking, every book with intentional changes is a new work, but colloquially it is counted the "same work" until the changes become so great that the resemblance of the form of words to the original is hard to recognize. It is a common thing for a work to be edited and credited to a certain author's name (Herzog), then become known by the joint name of the author and editor (Herzog-Plitt or Schaff-Herzog), and finally become known under the name of the latest editor (Hauck). In this case it is often described for a time on a title-page as "founded" on its predecessor, but generally the original author's name is dropped from the title-page altogether when no great portions retain the original verbal form. All editions of a work are not so recognized in common speech in the same sense as new works; and in the bookshop or library a man is careful to specify the latest ed of Smith, or Brown's ed of Smith, to avoid getting the older and outdated original work.

Sometimes a new original work and the additions, corrections, explanations, etc., are kept quite separate and distinct—additional matter being given in MSS in the margins, or between lines, and in printed books as footnotes or in brackets or parentheses. This is commonly the case with the text-and-comment eds of Bib. books and great writers. Sometimes, as often in ancient MSS, it happens in copying that what were marginal and interlinear notes become run in as an undistinguished part of the text and, still more often, what was indicated as quotation in an original work loses its indications and becomes an undistinguished part of the work. In the case of the paraphrase the comment is intentionally run in with the words of the text; and most editors of scientific works likewise make no attempt to distinguish between the original matter and additions by another hand, the whole responsibility being thrown forward on the editor. Sometimes the original work itself to begin with is largely made up of quotation, or is a mere collection of works in which the "originality" is confined to title-page or preface or even a mere title, as in the case of the OT, the NT, and the Bible, and the order of arrangement of parts.

Almost all books are thus composite. Even in a manuscript copy of a manuscript, or an oral repe-tion of an oral tale, two human minds have contributed to the net result, and the work of each may perhaps be distinguished from that of the other. In the case of a new ed by the same author, the result is still composite—a new work composed of old and new material. With all new eds by other authors the compositeness increases until, e.g. an ed of the Bible with textual variants and select comments from various writers becomes the combined work of thousands of writers, each distinguished as to his work from all the rest by his name or some symbol.

The text proper or work unchanged, save for involuntary error, includes thus copies, at* abridgments, selections and quotations; the revised work or work with voluntary changes includes eds and paraphrases (which are simply texts with commentary run into the text), digests, redactions, etc., and perhaps compilations.

These two kinds of variations give rise to the two sciences of text-criticism and higher or historical criticism. The former distinguishes all accidental errors of transmission, the latter all the voluntary changes; the former aims to reconstruct the original, the latter to separate in any given book between the work of the original and each ed.

In this connection it must not be forgotten that the original itself may be a composite work—containing long quotations, made up wholly of selections or even made up of whole works bound together, etc. This makes textual criticism restore not the original of each, but the original text of the whole, while higher criticism takes up the task of separating out the elements first of later eds and redactions of this original, then of the notations.

The involuntary variations of MSS or oral tradition give rise to the science of text-criticism. The point of the science is to reconstruct exactly the original form of words or text. Formerly the method for this was a more balancing of probabilities, but since Tregelles it has become a rigid logical process which traces copies to their near ancestors, and these in turn farther back, until a genealogical tree of all surviving copies is constructed. The law of this is in effect that "like variations point to a common ancestor," the biological law of "homology," and if the groupings reveal as many as three independent lines of copies from the original, the one of each of its variants is reconstructed separately, and the readings of two lines will always be right against the third—granting a very small margin of error in the psychological tendency of habit in a scribal to repeat the same error. The method proceeds (1) to describe all variations of each MS (or equally of each oral or printed copy) from the standard text; (2) to group the MSS which have the most pronounced variations; (3) to unite these groups on the principle of homology into larger and larger units until the ultimate units have been reached and through these the originalward. The results are expressed in a text and variants—the text being a corrected copy of the original, and the variants showing the exact contribution of each copyist to the MSS which he produced.

It is carefully to be remembered that text-criticism proper has only to do with a particular form of words. Every tr or ed is a separate problem complete in itself when the very words used by translator or editor have been reconstructed. These may in turn be useful in reconstructing the original, but care must be had not to amend, tr or ed from the original, and the original in turn, when it contains quotations from other writers, must not be amended from the originals of these writers.

The task of textual criticism is to set forth each man's words—each original author, each copyist, each translator, each editor, just as his words were—no more and no less. (See Text of OT; Text of NT.)

Higher criticism has to do with voluntary variations or variations in subject-matter. Like text-criticism it has to do with distinguishing the share of each of several cooperators in a composite work; and like it higher criticism traces the contributions of various authors each to its source. It differs, however, in dealing with original matter. While the variations by officious scribes, or intelligent scribes who correct spelling, grammar, wrong dates and the like, come pretty closely into the region of editing, and on the other hand the redactor is sometimes little more than an officious copyist, still the line of involuntary and voluntary change holds good, whether it be the grafting into an original work by the author of many quotations, or the grafting onto the work by others not regarded as the work of themselves or of other authors. It is not the business of the textual critic to separate out either of these (it is expressly his business not to), although his work may greatly help and even furnish results which can be classified automatically, but this double field of composite authorship belongs to higher criticism.

In the case of most modern works the task of the higher critic is a simple one. Quotation marks, a growing standard, are not too rigorous, the mechanical conveniences of typographical display, and the like, all contribute to a careful separation of the work of each contributor. Nevertheless, in many cases as, for example, in the editing of textbooks and of compilers, editors, or newspapers. While the signed article in the Encyclopaedia is now nearly universal, the signed review more and more common, the signed editorial is still rare, and the others by no means universal. It is still a matter of interest to many to pick out by his "style" the author of an unsigned article, review or editorial—which is higher criticism.

In ancient lit., where there were few such mechanical conveniences in discriminating, and little or no sense of conscience left about it, the task was anything which suited the purpose of the writer in part or as a whole, the result was often a complete patchwork of verbal forms of many writers. The task of higher criticism is to sort out the original and reconstruct its textual variants, and to trace these variants to their originals. The net result in the case of any work does not differ much from an ordinary modern work with quotation marks and footnotes referring to the sources of the quotations. It restores, so to speak, the punctuation and footnotes which the author omitted or later copyists lost. It includes many nice questions of discrimination through style and the historical connection of the fragments with the works from which they were taken; and after these have been analyzed out, many nice questions also of tracing their authorship or at least the time, place and environment of their composition. It includes thus the questions of superhuman authorship and inspiration.

Literary criticism has to do with originals as originals, or, in composite works, the original parts of originals. An original work may be cut up, and reconstructed. This quotation contains thousands of words.

9. Higher Criticism

In the case of several cooperators in a composite work; and like it higher criticism traces the contributions of various authors each to its source. It differs, however, in dealing with original matter. While the variations by officious scribes, or intelligent scribes who correct spelling, grammar, wrong dates and the like, come pretty closely into the region of editing, and on the other hand the redactor is sometimes little more than an officious copyist, still the line of involuntary and voluntary change holds good, whether it be the grafting into an original work by the author of many quotations, or the grafting onto the work by others not regarded as the work of themselves or of other authors. It is not the business of the textual critic to separate out either of these (it is expressly his business not to), although his work may greatly help and even furnish results which can be classified automatically, but this double field of composite authorship belongs to higher criticism.

proverbs or idiomatic phrases. In general, however, originality means that literary food has been digested—reduced to its chemical elements of word or briefest phrase and rebuilt into a wholly new structure and form. Involving a dual being of the old and new, doorways and ornaments may be a part of the literary architect's originality, but they themselves were not "original" with him.

The literary critic has thus to do with a man's originality—the contribution that he has made to the subject, the peculiar quality of this in its fitness to influence other minds which is effected by the "reaction of the whole personality," all his learning and emotional experience, on every part of his mind. Defined in short we call style. This involves a judgment or comparison with all other works on the same subject as to its contribution of new matter and its readability.

The chief problems of book science may be described in the words of biological science as (1) the origin of new forms, (2) survival.

11. Origin

The question of the origin of a new literary work and its survival is so like that of the origin of a new species that it may be regarded less as analogy than as falling under the same laws of variations, multiplication, heredity and natural selection. The origin of variant forms of the same original through involuntary and voluntary changes is regarded as an effect of the same process. Editorial variants overwhelm the original and a new author's name takes the place of the old. After this step has been taken it is a new work, and at bottom the origin of all new works is the same. The process is more clearly seen in the treatises of some branch of science, say physics. A general treatise, say on Heat, is published, giving the state of knowledge on the subject at that time. Then monographs begin to be produced. The monograph may and generally does include, in bibliographical or historical outline, the substance of previous works, and in every event it implies the previous total. The point of the monograph itself is, however, not the summary of common knowledge but the contribution that it makes, or, in the language of natural science, the "useful variant" of the subject which it produces. After some accumulation of these monographs, or useful variants of previous treatises, some author gathers them together and unites them with previous discussions into a new treatise or text-book, which is in effect the latest previous treatise with all variants developed in the meantime.

In either case a permanent new form has been produced—the old common knowledge with a difference, and the process goes on again: the new work is multiplied by publication into many like individuals; these like individuals develop each its variations; the variations in the same direction unite in some new highly important form; common knowledge with this new variation forms a new general work which again is multiplied, and so on.

And what is true of scientific monographs is just as true in substance of literature, of oral tradition and of the whole history of ideas. It is the perpetuating putting together of variations experienced two or more times by one individual or one or more times each by two or more individuals, with the common body of our ideas, and producing thus a new form. For proverbs, for example, and all poetry, fiction and the like, come thus to sum up a long human experience.

And carrying the matter still farther back, what is true of the scientific book and of received and folk-literature, is true also of the inward evolution of every weight, even those phrased for conversa-

12. Survival

The individual book, and (2) the survival of the work, i.e., and the life of the original whose text does not very far so that it may not be recognized as the "same" work. The original book is in a man's mind and survives only so long as its author survives. In the same sense the author survives in the book, which becomes a new book, therefore, survives its author. If, however, by survival is meant the existence of any copy, or copy of a copy of this original, containing much (but never quite) the same form of words, then the book survives in this world. In the same sense that the author survives, i.e. in its descendants; it is the difference between personal immortality and race immortality. At the same time, however, the survival of species depends on the individual. A work or a species is no metaphysical reality, but a given number of individuals with, of course, their relations to one another.

On the average, the chance of long survival for any individual copy of a book is small. Every new book enters into a struggle for existence; wind and weather, wear and tear conspire to destroy it. On the whole they succeed sooner or later. Some books live longer than others, but however durable the material, and however carefully treated they may be, it is an autonomic trait in books. Their survival depended on permanence of the individual, there would be no Bible and no classics.

The average chance of an individual book for long life depends (1) on the intrinsic durability of its material, or its ability to resist hostile environment, (2) on isolation.

The enemies to which books are exposed are various: wind, fire, moisture, mold, human negligence and vandalism, and human use. Some materials are more susceptible to these than others. Stone and metal inscriptions survive better than wood or clay, vellum than papyrus or paper.

On the other hand, however, if isolated or protected from hostile environment, very fragile material may outlast more substantial. Papyrus has survived in the mounds of Egypt, and unbaked clay tablets in the mounds of Babylonia, while millions of stone and metal inscriptions written thousands of years later have already perished. Here the factor of isolation is the determining one. In pillage, moth and rust and the bookworm destroy for the most part without respect of persons. It is only those books which are out of the way of destructive agencies which survive. An unbaked tablet which has been perceived 5,000 years ago may crumble to dust in 5 years after it has been dug up and exposed to the air. This isolation may be accidental or "natural," as when tablets and papyri are preserved under ruins, but it may also be artificial and the result of human care. A third factor of survival is therefore the ability of a work to procure for itself human protection, or artificial insulation, which is the "value" of a book to its owner. This value may lie in the material, artistic excellence, association or rarity. Any variation in the direction of value which may be expressed financially tends to preserve. In fire or shipwreck, these are the ones saved, in pillage the ones spared. They are the ones for whom fireproof buildings and special guardians are provided. An exception to this rule is when the material is more valuable for other than book purposes. In times of war the book engraved on gold or lead or paper may be melted down for coin or bullets or torn up for cartridges, while stone and vellum books are spared. The general law is, however, that value tends to preserve, and it has been remarked that all the oldest codices which have survived in free environment are sumptuous copies.

Literary value on the other hand is, on the whole, a factor of destruction for the individual rather than of survival. The better a book is the more it is likely to be worn out. The worthless book on the top shelf outlasts all the rest. In cases of fire or shipwreck an owner will save books which cannot be replaced and the books most easily replaced are those with literary value. It is the atypical book, his favorite books, and does treat them often with a certain reverent care, which tends to preserve but, on the whole, literary value tends to destruction.

When it comes to the survival of the work or race of survival, matters are reversed. Literary value is the prime factor. It is the ability of a book to get itself multiplied or recopied which counts—the quality, whatever it may be, which tends to make a man wish to replace his copy when it is worn out, and to make many men wish to read the work.

This literary interest operates first to produce a large number of copies in order to meet the demand, each of which copies has its chance of survival. It operates, however, such men as use the very best material, paper, ink, binding, etc., which results in giving each individual book a longer time to produce a new copy.

The modern newspaper published in a million copies circulates, in the first place, because it is printed upon paper which cannot last, save in very favorable conditions of isolation, for more than forty or fifty years. In the second place, it is very rarely reprinted save for an occasional memorial copy. Books like the Bible or Virgil, Dante or Shakespeare, on the other hand, are reprinted in multitudes of editions and in many instances in the most permanent material that art can devise.

It often happens that a book is popular for a short time but will not survive a changed environment. The newspaper is popular for a few hours, but the time environment changes and interest is gone. It sometimes happens that a book is very popular in one country and wholly fails to interest in another. Millions of copies of Uncle Tom's Cabin and Ben Hur were required to fill the demand of one generation where a few hundreds may suffice for the next.

All the time popular taste, which is only another name for the average human experience, is judging a book. A book survives because it is popular—not necessarily because it is popular with the uneducated majority, but because it appeals continuously to the average human experience of some considerable class, good or bad. Survival is, therefore, natural. Skilled critics help popular judge-ment, and select lists aids, but in the long run the test is simply of its correspondence with human experience; in short, it is because men "like" it that a book survives.

There is thus going on all the time a process of struggle and "natural selection" which in the end is a survival of the fittest in the true evolutionary sense, i.e. books survive because fitted to their environment of human experience or taste. There grows up, therefore, continually in every country a certain class of books which are counted classes. These are those which have survived their tests, and are being still further tested. Some have been tested from remote antiquity, and it is the books which survive the test of many periods of time, many kinds of geographical environment, and many varieties of intellectual environment, i.e. which appeal to many classes of readers, which are the true classics and which, on the other hand, show that they do correspond with the fundamental facts of human experience, simply because they have survived. In general it is the religious books which have survived in all nations, and the only books which have been tested in all lands and ages and appeal to Oriental and Western, ancient and modern alike, are those of the Christian religion.

It has been noticed above that the process of forming a new work is the bringing together of all works on the same subject in order to unite all their variations in the new work. It is for this purpose that every student brings together the working library on his specialty; it is what the librarian does when he brings together all the books on a subject for the use of students. Every man who reads up on a subject is performing the same task for himself, and likewise every man who does general reading.

There are few libraries, however, which attempt to get together all the books on a subject. Most libraries are select libraries containing the best books on the subject: by this is meant all books which have anything new or in short have a useful variation. This is an artificial process of the critical human mind, but in humanity in general it is the work of the human mind to be perpetually at work choosing their "five-foot shelves," the collections of the very "best of best books." The reason for this lies in the fact that the average human mind can read and hold only a limited number of books. This process is all the time going on, tending to pick out the small number of books which on the whole contain the greatest amount of human experience to the average page. The mass of world's books, however enormous, is thus boiled down by a natural selection to a few books, which contain the essence of all the rest. The process tends to go on in every country and every language. The most universal example is the Bible, which represents a long process of natural selection through many periods of time and considerable variety of geographical influence. It unites the quintessence of Sem ideas with the corresponding quintessence of Indo-European ideas, each embodied in a correspondingly perfect language—for language itself is in the last analysis the quintessence of the experience of any people in its likeness and unlikeness to other peoples. It is therefore by the mere fact of "survival" and "natural selection" proved to be the "fittest" to survive, i.e. that which corresponds to universal human experience. Councils do not form the canon of Scripture: they simply set a seal upon a natural process. The Bible is thus the climax of evolution among books as man is among animals. It is as unique among books as man is unique among all living things. See Libraries.
BOOK OF NOAH. See APOCYPTC LITERATURE.

BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE. re-men’brans (יִדְבָּגֵר אֲנָחָנוּ, śĕpher zikkûrôn, “book of record”): Is related in meaning to the “Book of Life.” It refers to a list of the righteous, recorded in a book that lies before God (Mal 3 16; cf Dn 7 10). See BOOK OF LIFE.

BOOKS OF ADAM. See APOCYPTC LITERATURE; ADAM, BOOKS OF.

BOOK, boōt (בּוּט, qṑt; AV battle; ARV “armor”: ARVfm “boot”): The word qṑt, found only in Jgs 9 5 (He 9 4), is probably a loanword from the Assyrian set[ū], meaning “shoe,” “sandals.” The root has the same meaning in Aram. and Ethiopic. The passage should be tī “every boot of the booted warrior.”

BOOTH, boōth, bōōth: The Heb word zikkāh (rendered in the AV “booth” or “booths,” seven times; “tabernacle” or “tabernacles,” ten times; “palisson” or “palvions,” five times; “cottage” once) means a hut made of wattled twigs or branches (Lev 23 42; Neh 8 15). In countries where trees are abundant such wattled structures are common as temporary buildings as they can be constructed in a very short time. Cattle were probably housed in them (Gen 33 17). Such huts were made by soldiers (2 S 11 11; 1 K 20 12) and by harvesters—hence the name feast of “booths” or “tabernacles” (see TABERNACLES, FEAST OF). Job (27 18) uses booth (יָנוֹת) house) as a symbol of impermanence. Similar huts were erected in vineyards, etc., to protect them from robbers and beasts of prey. The isolated condition of Jesus in the time of the prophet Isaiah is compared to a “booth in a vineyard” (Isa 1 8).

BOOTS, FEAST OF. See FEASTS AND FASTS, 1, 2.

BOOTY, boō’ti (תַּכּוֹת, תַּכּוֹת; bāz, bōz): “Booty” is the tr of bāz or bōz, usually rendered “prey” and “spoil” (Jer 49 32); of maltē’ēth, “prey,” “booty” (Nu 31 32; “the booty—the rest of the prey,” RV the prey, the spoil, and about above); of mwē’ēshēth, “spoil” (Hab 2 7; Zeph 1 13; RV “spoil”); of ḥē’ěleq, “gain” (2 Macc 8 20). “Booty respects what is of personal service to the captor; spoils whatever serves to designate his triumph; prey includes whatever gratifies the appetite and is to be consumed” (Crabb, English Synonyms). Persons (for slaves, etc.) might be part of the booty. See also SPOIL.

W. L. WALKER

BOOZ, boō’z (TR, Be’d, Boș; WH, Boēs, Bođa): AV, Gr format of Boas (thus RV) (Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32).

BOR-ASHAN, bōr-ash’an: A correction of the MT in ARV in 1 S 30 30 for AV “Chor-ashan” and ERV “Cor-ashan.” Probably the same as ASHAN (JOSH 15 42; 1 CH 4 32; 6 59), which see.

BOR, bōr’der, BORDERS: Indicating in both sing. and pl. the outlines or territory of a country. In the sense of “limits,” “boundaries” or “territory,” it occurs as a tr of דַּבָּר (and its fem. דִּבְרָה, דִּבְרָה, in Ps 74 17) in numerous passages in OT, esp. in Josh. דַּבָּר = “the talk, the side, the coast,” hence “the border” occurring in Gen 4 13; also לָיָבָר = “an extremity” = “boundary,” “brink,” “edge” (Ex 16 35; 19 12; Josh 4 19); לְיָבָר, מִיוֹגֶרֶת = something inclosing, i.e. “a margin” (Ex 37 12–14;
1 K 7 28 f.31 f.36 f AV; 2 K 18 17 AV); רֵעָל or רֵעִית, saphah, or sepheth = "the lip" (as a natural boundary) hence "a margin," "brim," "brink," "edge," (Ex 28 26; 39 19 AV); יַעֲרֵשׁ, יִשְׁרֵה = "an extremity," "end" (2 K 19 23 AV); יְשַׁדְאָה = "exit," hence "boundary" (1 Ch 5 16); יַרְדֵּנָה, יָרְדֶנָה = "a succession," "a string," "row," hence "border" (Cant 1 11 AV); צא, יָדָה = "hand," used in a great variety of applications, both lit. and fig., probably as the term of a country; this may be the reason why Job 1 11:10; 10 18:10 could be interpreted with "border" in 1 Ch 7 29 is not clear; better would be: "in the hands of the children of Manasseh." Three Gr words occur for the idea: σκαρ- πέδος, kardspedon = "a margin," "fringe" (Mt 29 5; Mk 6 56; Lk 8 44); ἔκτελος, ἐκτήλον = "a boundary line" (Mt 4 13); ἠθνήκος, méthethos = "contiguous" (neuter pl. as noun, "frontier," "border") in Mk 7 24).

FRANK E. HIRSCH

ménous): One who dwells on the borders or confines of a country. Only in 2 Mac 9 25, "The princes that are borderers and neighbors unto my kingdom."

BORE, bôr: According to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20 20—23 33) a slave whom his master had purchased was to be released after six years. Should he choose to remain in his master's service a religious ceremony was necessary to ratify his decision. "Then his master shall bring him unto God" (better than "unto the judges" of the AV), "and shall bring him to the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl" (Cant 14). It is highly probable that "unto God" means "to a sanctuary"; for there was no special reason for performing this ceremony near the door of a sanctuary. On the other hand the entrance to a private house was a sacred spot. According to Jer 16 16 (kicking near the door) dwell the household gods whose function it was to guard the house and its occupants, e.g. against the entry of disease. It was natural that the ceremony of attaching the slave permanently to the master's household should be performed in the presence of the household gods. "The boring of the ear of slaves was a common practice in antiquity, possibly to symbolize the duty of obedience, as the ear was the organ of hearing" (Barnett). The Deuteronomist (Dt 15 17) rejects the religious aspect of the ceremony—probably as a relic of Can. religion—and looks upon it as a secular and nubical operation. According to his view, the awl was thrust through the ear of the slave to the door. The slave in question was permanently attached to the household. T. LEWIS BOROTH, bôrith: Mentioned in the genealogical table which traces the descent of Esdras (Ezra) from Aaron (2 Ezra 1 2). In Ezra 8 2 it has the name appears as Boccas (q.v.), and in 1 Ch 6 5,51; Ezr 7 4, Bukki (q.v.).

BORN. See Bear, Born.

BORN AGAIN. See Regeneration.

BORNE. See Bear, Born.

BORROWING. See Bear, Borrow.

1. In the OT period loans were not of a commercial nature, i.e. they were not granted to enable a man to start or run a business. They were really a form of charity, and were made by the lender only to meet the pressure of poverty. To the borrower they were esteemed a form of misfortune (Dt 28 121), and by the lender a form of beneficence. Hence the tone of the Mosaic legislation on the subject.

(2) Laying interest upon the poor of Israel was forbidden in all the codes (see Ex 22 25 [J]; Dt 23 19; Lev 25 36 H), because it was looked upon as making unwarranted profit out of a brother's distress: 'If thou lend money to any of my people with thee that is poor, thou shalt not be to him as a creditor; neither shall ye lay upon him interest . . . and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious.'

(3) The Law, however, allowed interest to be taken of a foreigner, or non-Jew (Dt 23 20; 'Unto a foreigner thou mayest lend upon interest'); cf Dt 15 3; and even among Jews pledges were allowed under limitations, or taken against the law (Dt 24 10; cf Job 24 2-3; 'There are that remove the landmarks . . . they take the widow's ox for a pledge'). In Dt 15 5ff there is a remarkable law providing a "release" by the creditor every "seven years," a "letting drop of loans" (see Driver in loc.). In Ex 33 22, AV 'shall borrow' is rendered 'shall ask' in RV.

BOSCATH, bos'kath. See BOKATH.

BOSOM, bô'sum: In the ordinary signification of the anterior upper portion of the trunk of the body, פָּרָע, פָרָעָה, hök or hëk; "inlet, "lap" (Ex 4 6,7; Nu 11 12; Dt 13 6; 28 54,56; Ruth 4 16; Ps 74 11; Isa 65 6,7; Lam 2 12). "A present in the bosom" (Prov 21 14): bribes carried ready for use in the fold of the robe. פָּרָע, פָּרָעָה = "bosom" (with special reference to that portion of the body which is between the arms), occurs in Ps 139 7; יִתְנֶה, יִתְנֶה = "a cherisher," hence "the bosom" (Job 31 33); פָּרָע, פָּרָעָה, callathah = something advanced or deep, "a bowl," fig. "the bosom" (Prov 19 24 AV; 26 15 AV). The Gr employs κλάρος, κλάρος (Lk 6 38; Jn 13 23). For Abraham's bosom, see separate art.

Figurative: In a fig. sense it denotes intimacy and unrestrained intercourse (Gen 16 5; 2 S 12 8); tender care and watchfulness (Isa 40 11): closest intimacy and most perfect knowledge (Jn 1 18): "into their bosom" (Ps 73 15) indicates the bosom as the seat of thought and reflection.

BOSOM, ABRAHAM'S. See ABRAHAM's Bosom.

BOSOR, bôsôr (Borôpôr, Borsôr): One of the strong cities of Gilead taken by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac 5 26,36). From the towns named it is evident that this phrase is elastic, covering territory beyond the name. Possibly therefore Bosor may be identical with Buṣir al-Harîrî, in the Lubîf, S.E. of el-Lejîd. In 2 Pet 2 15 AV, the Gr form of Bosor (q.v.).

BOSORA, bosô-ra (Bosepôa, Bosora): One of the strong cities of Gilead taken by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac 5 26,36). It is identical with the Rom Bosra, the city whose extensive ruins lie on the S.E. border of the Hawârîn, on the old Rom road that runs between Der'ah and Salhâd. The modern name is Bosra eski-Sham. It cannot be identified with Boraq or either (1) or (2), as it lies much too far north. It appears for the first time in history in the 3rd century B.C. The name does not give the ruins show it to have been a place of great strength and importance. In the time of Herod the Great it was in the hands of the Nabataeans. When Aulus Cornelius Palma conquered these regions, Bosra was made capital of the province under the name of Nova Trajana Bosra, in honor of the emperor Trajan. This was in 105 AD, from which year the Bostrian era was reckoned. It was taken by the Moslems under Khalid—"the sword of God." It resisted the attack of Baldwin III. Later it fell on evil days. Now, if it be true that the prophecy of Hosea says, that "the prosperity of Bozra is the prosperity of the Hauran," the case of the latter is sad indeed.

BOSS, bos: Occurs only in the pl. as a tr of אב, "arch," or "protuberance," referring to the curved ornaments of a shield (Job 16:20), the central knob of the buckler.

BOTANY, bot-a-ni: On account of the great diversity in the climatic and topographical conditions Pal is peculiarly rich in the variety of its flora—the best authority, Post, distinguishes 3,500 species. The land as a whole belongs to the botanical area known as the "Mediterranean region," a region characterized climatically by very dry, hot summers and fairly mild winters. Plants here grow in spring, rest in the hot, dry season and grow again in autumn; the long-continued, scorching sunlight and the absence of shade have or six months at a stretch lead to the destruction of vast quantities of seeds and young plants imported by various natural means and by human agency. Among these xerophile or drought-resistant plants, some of the most characteristic features are the thick, leathery rind admitting of little transpiration, e.g., cactus, stonecrops, etc., and the presence of bulbs, rigid stalks, or fleshy leaves, of which the flora of Pal abounds with examples. Equally well characterized are the dry, multibranched spiny trees or shrubs with scanty foliage and small leaves, such as the acacias and the thorny burnet. In connection with this last, it may be mentioned that, next to the strong sunlight and drought, the greatest enemy of vegetation over a great part of the "Mediterranean region"—emphatically so in Pal—is the goat. He is one of the most destructive of animals, and as he has for long ages been allowed to graze freely all over the hillsides, it is not wonderful that in many spots only plants like thorny burnet or with its powerful spines which have survived.

The common plants of Pal will be referred to in order shortly, but among those esp. characteristic of the whole region are the oaks, of which there is a great variety; the alder, the arbutus and the sumach. A number of trees and shrubs which have been imported into this region within comparatively recent times have become so acclimatized as to be today among the most common feature in pictures by artists who have painted Scripture scenes in the Holy Land. The common variety, Opuntia ficus-Indica with its innumerable sharp prickles makes impenetrable hedges round many of the village gardens, while the Opuntia cochinillifera, cultivated specially round Nabíls and introduced from tropical America with the cochinile insect, is almost unarmad. The American aloe (Argave Americana)—quite a different plant be it noted from either the Aloe (which see) of the Cape or the well-known medicinal aloes, established itself in many parts as a garden ornament and will doubtless in time become thoroughly indigenous. More important and more recent of introduction is the group of eucalypts or gum trees, of which some 500 species have been imported. As is well known, they all come from Australia, where they flourish in climatic conditions somewhat similar to those of the Mediterranean region. Seeds of eucalypts were first introduced into Europe in 1854, having been sent from Melbourne, Pa. Then, and for a time they have found their way to all parts. The most common variety is the Eucalyptus globulus which is now to be found everywhere in the Mediterranean region. It was introduced into Pal through the late Baron E. de Rothschild of Paris, and great plantations of it have been made specially in the neighborhood of the Jewish colonies. In the marshy plains between Sammarin and Caesarea over a million have been planted, and here, and also on the marshy shores of Lake Holch, this tree has attained magnificent proportions. Many specimens will be found with trunks two or three feet in circumference and of a height of upward of 100 feet. This size is nothing for a eucalyptus, many of these trees attaining in their native haunts a height of 300, or even 400 ft., but time is required, and it may be that eventually many of the eucalypti of the Holy Land will also acquire giant proportions. That this group of trees has come to stay is evident. Not only in hill-forested regions are they planted, but also in isolated groups all over the land they may be found. Their quick growth, fresh, evergreen foliage and their reputed health-giving properties account for their wide cultivation. Concerning this last it may be mentioned that some of the leaves are used as a prophylactic against malaria have been much exaggerated. The most malignant cases of malaria may sometimes be found in houses shaded by eucalyptus boughs, and the Anopheles, or malarial-bearing mosquito, is often found swarming among its leaves. Probably the beneficial action of the eucalyptus is simply one of drying up marshy lands by absorbing great quantities of water into its deep-running roots.

Other trees which have been recently introduced but now flourish even better than the indigenous trees are the locust tree (Robinia pseudo-acacia), from America, the "Pride of India" (Melia Azedarach) called in Arab. zinuak, a native from India, very excessively grown, the so-called Spanish pepper tree" (Schinus molle), the Caesalpinia striata from America, the very common atlantis (A. glandulosa), a native of China, and many others. Of fruit trees the apricot, mulberry, orange, cherry, lemon, and persimmon, the fig, the date, and others are introduced into Syria within historic times; as have almost all the best varieties of the indigenous fruits.

A question of great interest to Bible students is, How far has the fertility of the land altered in historic times? Two facts are important in and Climate (1) The general features of the in Modern climate and Ancient climate have been the same since the days of the patriarchs, probably since the days of the Patriarchs. We may gather this from the many Bib. references to the seasonal rain (Lev 26:4)—the "early" and the "latter" (e.g. Dt 11:14; Jer 5:24; Hos 6:3)—to the frequent droughts (e.g. 1 K 17; Am 4:6;), to the grateful mention of the "dew" (Dt 32:2; 2 S 1:21; 17:12; Mic 5:7, etc.), to the repeated mention of the most characteristic products of modern Pal—the olive and fig, the vine and almond, the oak and the terebinth. In the present evil day, everywhere over the ruins of ancient terraces on the hillsides and of the "broken cisterns" which are found at every site where once cultivation flourished.

3. Fertility answering this:

(2) It is undeniable that the destruction of forest and thickets all over the land has been immense during the past fifty years. The increasing demands for fires by resident Europeans and the development of steam mills, the result of European enterprise, are largely responsible. The firewood brought to Jerus comes from ever-increasing distances, as the wood in the neighborhood is consumed, and the destruction has been increasingly ruthless. First the hillsides, then the trees are leveled, and finally the very roots are dug out of the soil. At a greater distance, as for example in the once extensive forests E. of the Jordan, a terrible des- truction is being wrought by the charcoal burners. Thousands of acres of forest land in Jordan during the autumn mouths, chiefly in the care of Circassian settlers in the E. Jordan lands; but a similar work is pursued by other charcoal burners in the northern parts of upper Galilee. All the tree trunks are soon cut, their branches are cut as soon as they reach any size, so that miles of country which, within the memory of many now living, were forest are now either entirely treeless or covered with nothing but brushwood. This last consists largely of shrubby growth or thickets of bramble, wild olive and hawthorn—all capable of development into noble trees. The process having been commenced by the hand of man is assisted by the goats which crop the tender leaves and shoots, and thus speed the work of destruction. At present inhabitants can remember that between Bethlehem and Hebron, where today scarcely a twig is visible, there were trees and brushwood all the way, and in the 7th cent. the pilgrim Arcophius writes of a palm tree on top of it. This destruction is common all over the land. The only trees which have any chance of surviving are those which from their near proximity to some sacred Well or grave, or from some other cause, have been left uninjured from motives of superstition. Such "holy" trees occur all over the land, sometimes singly, at others in groves; they may be any species of tree. Commonly they are oak, terebinth, carob, meis (nettles tree), sida (zizyphus) or hawthorn. Besides the wilful destruction of trees for firewood or charcoal another agent has in places been in operation. It is a common thing for the fellahin to cut a large area for ploughing by burning all the vegetation; such fires sometimes extend far beyond the area intended (cf Ps 83 14). There is a large and almost entirely sterile district, chiefly of bare rock, between Safed and Jebel Merom in Galilee which we, in a few weeks time, found which eyewitnesses state blazed for a week. The destruction of all this vegetation has led to the washing away of almost all the soil, so that now great labor would be required to make this area productive. The removal of the natural vegetation produces sterility in two ways. Firstly, whereas the deep roots of trees and shrubs support the soil even on hillsides of considerable slope, and slowly but surely cause the disintegration of the under- lying rocks, whereas their fall in some case from their accumulating decaying leaves and twigs ever make more and richer soil, so the destruction of these plants leads to the washing away of the soil by the torrential winter's rain, until the bare rock—never on the hillslopes very far from the surface—is laid open to the sky. Secondly, the rainfall, which was once largely absorbed by this soil, now rapidly rushes off the denuded rocks and flows away to the valleys. The consequent result of this—combined with the destruction of many miles of the artificial soil-surfaces of terraces—is that a large proportion of the rainfall which once found its way slowly through the soil to the sources of the springs—never very deep in Pal—now rapidly runs down the valley bottoms to the low divides beyond the width of the springs in the way described above. Remove the vegetation, and the soil gradually leaves the hillsides and the rainfall is largely wasted. This is what has happened over large districts in the Holy Land; and the consequent diminution of some of the springs even within half a cent. has been scientifically noted. While therefore, from the permanent climatic conditions, Pal could never have been a land of verdure such, for example, as England, yet we know with certainty that its native vegetation has much diminished within the memory of many now living. But besides this, we have abundant historical evi- dence that at several periods it was much more productive. This is shown, for example, abundantly in the writings of Jos. and, for later periods, in the accounts of many pilgrims. But indeed the mere fact that for many cents. Pal had a population far greater than today is in itself a proof; for as things are now, modern Pal is not able to support a much greater population than at present. Great expenditure of capital and labor on the restoring of ancient terraces, the construction of dams and systems of irrigation and the planting of trees is one essential preparation for any future development of the land. Perhaps of these three to be possible a radical change in the attitude of the Turkish government is an essential preliminary. With regard to Bible evidence it is clear from very many references from the historical books of the OT that "forest" or "woodland was very plentiful in those days. In a large proportion where the word ya'ar ("forest") occurs it is definitely as- sociated with trees. (For references see Fortst.). Whether these references are always to tall trees or also to the brushwood such as is plentiful in parts of Galilee today, is immaterial, as the latter consists of the same elements as the former, only stunted through the interference of man. It would cer- tainly appear probable that at the time of the arriv- al of the Hebrews there were considerable forests of trees—oaks, terebinths, pines, etc.—over a great part of the higher mountains. In Josh 17 14-18 we have reference to Joshua's twice-repeated com- mand to destroy all the inhabited area—"or the inhabited areas were too narrow for them. In later ages, e.g. in NT times, the cultivation of the land must have been so thorough that, to the W. of the Jordan especially, the area left for forest trees must necessarily have been much circumscribed; but the land then with its millions of olive trees and countless vineyards in the mountains and its great palm groves at Jericho and the coast, not to mention all kinds of imported fruit trees, must have presented a remarkable appearance and its present comparative barrenness. As a single example we may compare the glowing description by Jos of the extraordinary fertility of Gennesaret with its present condition (Jos, BJ, III, x, 8). Two periods in history stand out preeminently in the his- tory of Pal as times of prosperity and fertility: that about and immediately succeeding the rise of Chris- tianity and that of the Lat kingdom of Jerus (see Conder, The Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, 239-41: "The present cultivated area of Pal does not perhaps, attain to a tenth of that which enriched the Lat. for the 1st cent. of their rule"). In both these periods the land was highly cultivated and the population large, in the former more so than the latter. That the benefit of the Ottoman Turks is largely responsible for the decrease in agriculture and forestation in recent centuries is undoubted, but it is more than possible that at one if not at both these periods another factor was at work. It is difficult to be certain in this the days of Palmyra was a vast city and Petra a great emporium, the horse of a highly developed civilization, these sites were not better supplied by springs than at present; at those times great tracts of country E. of the Jordan were swallowed up by the desert, were sites of flourishing cities whose melancholy and lonely ruins are the wonder of all. No afforestation and no increased cultivation will account for the supplies of water which must have sustained such a development; and it is only reasonable to suppose, and there is important evidence to suppose, that these sites must have been then a rainfall somewhat greater or more prolonged than today. It must be remembered the increased rainfall of, say, only one inch per annum over a long series of years, or a sustained extension of the rainfall to two or three inches later in the season, or even a few degrees of greater cold producing heavy snow instead of rain, would, any of them, greatly improve the fertility of the soil and the output of the springs. All the evidence seems to confirm the theory that there have been cycles of greater and of lesser rainfall extending over centuries, and that the periods we have mentioned, certainly the Rom period, coincided with one of these cycles. At the present time there is some evidence of a rainfall increase, which increasing during the last 50 years and the cultivated area of the land, as contrasted with the natural forest land, is also slowly extending.

In dealing briefly with some of the more characteristic and remarkable of the flora of the Holy Land we must recognize at least four distinct plant zones: (1) The coast plains and the western mountains, with a distinctively Mediterranean flora; (2) The Jordan valley or Ghur, with a very peculiar semi-tropical flora in which a considerable number of African forms occur; (3) The steppe or desert zones, especially those of the E. of the Jordan and to the south. The higher western slopes to the E. of the Jordan also have a very similar flora; (4) The Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon above 4,000 ft, in which Alpine forms occur, and in the higher regions of which there is a flora entirely distinct from the three other zones. The blackberry of course needs no introduction. Everywhere the western slopes are more fertile than the eastern, so that the land to the E. of the water-parting in western Pal partakes more of the desert flora than that opposite to it on the east. Vegetation in all is more abundant on the hill slopes with a northern aspect, as it gets more shade; this is particularly noticeable in the drier areas.

(1) The coast-plains and western mountains.—
(a) In the maritime plain there is a rich red alluvial soil with abundance of water deep under the surface. The annual mean temperature is 70° F.; frost is extremely rare, and the atmosphere is distinctly humid, though the rainfall is less than in the higher hills. Citrons, oranges and lemons here flourish, palms grow in places on the coast, melons and pomegranates reach perfection. Vines have been extensively planted by Jewish colonists in the neighborhood of Jaffa. Cereals—wheat, barley and Egyptian maize (Sorghum alnum)—are extensively grown. The wild flora is similar to that of the mountains. The sycamore fig (Arab. jimmah) flourishes around Jaffa—it is a tree which requires a warm climate; it was in Talmudic writings one of the distinctions between “lower” and “upper” Galilee that the sycamore fig flourished in the former while in the latter it was not far more plentiful in olden times (see Sycamore). A closely allied tree, the mulberry, is common everywhere, though not really indigenous. Two varieties occur, the Morus nigra (Arab. ‘al-ham’i) a native of central Asia, cultivated for its delicious fruit, and the Morus alba (Arab. ghirsh) which was brought from China introduced as food for silk worms. See SYCAMORE.

Another tree which reaches perfection only in the warmer regions of the plain—and that too in the Jordan valley—is the tamarisk (Arab. ‘al-hak) of which Post recognizes 9 species. It is characterized by its brittle feathery branches covered by minute scale-like leaves; a bedraggled, wind-torn tamarisk half buried in sea-sand is a characteristic sight all along the Syrian coast. Under favorable conditions, that these trees will attain considerable size. See TAMARISK.

(b) In the higher mountain regions there is an average temperature of 62° F. and extreme variations between a maximum of 100° or 80° in the shade in the summer and a few degrees of frost in the winter. Here the fig, vine and olive do admirably, their late fruiting corresponding with the “dew”—or clouds of fine mist—which settle over the mountains after sunset, particularly in the north. Apricots, plumbs, quince, apples and pears (chiefly from imported grafts), peaches and plums, almonds and walnuts do well in sheltered spots. Wheat and barley are grown on hill slopes or in valley bottoms all over the mountain regions.

In the valleys along the water the oleander (Nerium oleander; Arab. dijleh) abounds—a plant beautiful in foliage and flower but poisonous and not uncommonly imparting its poison to the water in which it grows. In similar situations occurs the nightshade (Solanum vulgaris), a variety of verbena whose lilac or purple flowers are, wherever they occur, a sure sign of the presence of water on or near the surface.

In similar situations flourishes the oriental plane (Platanus orientalis; Arab. ‘ilbas), a tree which often attains great size (see PLANE TREE), and also the elder (Alnus orientalis; Arab. naghf), a tree of mumber growth. There are some 8 varieties of willow (Arab. sibayf), a tree very common along the water courses (see WILLOW). Poplars (Arab. haur) are plentiful in places, esp. near water. Three native varieties are known, but the cylindrical Lombardy poplar, an imported variety, is most widely cultivated (see POPLAR). The southern blackberry (Rubus suavissimus; Arab. mas) a member of the Rosaceae closely allied to the elm, is an indigenous tree which is widely planted; it is not uncommonly seen beside Moslem shrines. It grows to a height of 20 to 30 ft., and yields a close-grained timber taking a high polish. The walnut (Juglans regia; Arab. jaus) is a valuable timber tree and grows to noble proportions. It flourishes around Damascus, being a water-loving tree: some of the most magnificent specimens occur at Sheba, a village in the lower slopes of Hermon. The walnut is really an imported tree, its native home being Persia and the Himalayas, but it has been long naturalized.

The carob (Ceratonia siliquea; Arab. kharra) is a handsome evergreen tree whose dense, dark glistening foliage renders it everywhere conspicuous. It is widely distributed, esp. in the lower mountain regions. Its pods are the husks (which see) of Lk 15 16. Oaks are among the most important and characteristic of all the trees and shrubs of Pal: the evergreen oak which forms, it is estimated, two-thirds of all the shrubby vegetation of Carmel and attains noble proportions at some of the Moslem shrines, the Valonica oak, plentiful on the hills E. of Nazareth, and the ilex or holm oak, commonest of all the trees. The olive, so essential in the Bible, is no longer to be found in the Holy Land. The recent destruction of timber in the Holy Land has esp. fallen upon the oaks, which afford the best of all fuel; as their growth is very slow and there is no attempt to plant young trees this is most regrettable. (For fuller account see OAK.) Closely allied to the oak both in the botanical and economic standpoint—though botanically very distinct—is the terebinth or turpentine tree (Pistacia terebinthus; Arab. butm), one of the finest trees in Pal. Although from a distance superficially like an oak, the foliage is very different. In many spots in Pal where terebinths are for various reasons regarded as "sacred" they have obtained splendid proportions. See TEREBINTH.

Pines, although they flourish on the coast and, where mountains rise, are, together with junipers and cedars, reserved to the discussion of the flora of the fourth division of the country—the Alpine regions.

The hawthorn (Craeægus; Arab. za‘rûr), of which there are 4 varieties, occurs as a shrub or small tree everywhere, its sweet-scented white or pink blossom being much in evidence in the spring. Among the more important shrubs which make up the thickets over the limestone hills the following may be briefly enumerated: The sumach (Rhus conaria), usually a shrub but occasionally a small tree, grows in considerable quantities in fertile spots in the mountains; from its fruit an acid drink is concocted and the fruit, when dried, is used in making dye. A plant closely allied to this, and also to the terebinth, is the lentisk (Pistacia lentiscus; Arab. serrîs), a common shrub in the lower mountain region, e.g. on Carmel, which yields mastich, a white powder and knight by many to be the Balm of the OT (which see). The bay laurel (Laurus nobilis; Arab. el ghâr) occurs in clumps in many places. It is the Daphne of the Greeks and was sacred to Apollo. From its large, leathery, shining leaves were made the laurel crowns of victory in classical times. This, it may be mentioned in passing, is quite a distinct plant from our familiar "cherry laurel," which is allied to the hawthorn. The butcher's broom (Ruscus aculeatus) is very plentiful. It is a plant peculiar in having its leaf-petioles flattened out like a leaf (philodia), so that the flower and berry appear to arise from the middle of a flat circular "leaf." The myrtle (Myrtus communis; Arab. ribân or adûs) is exceedingly common, esp. in northern Pal, and when it grows near water it attains a good size. See MYRTLE.

A showy shrub, which sometimes attains to the dimensions of a tree 20 or 30 ft. high, is the arbutus (Arab. golîbb) or strawberry tree. Two kinds occur, the less common Arbutus unedo or true "strawberry tree" which has a rough, warty fruit of a scarlet color, and Arbutus andrachne with a smooth, red bark, which when peeled off leaves a reddish inner surface. It has small orange-colored, non-edible berries. The red stems of this arbutus may be seen conspicuous in thickets all over the land, but very few allowed to come to full growth. Among some of the more showy shrubs we may mention the oleaster (Eleagnus hortensis; Arab. zaizâfûn) with its beautiful silvery leaves and white blossom (see OL. TREE); the styrax (Styrax officinalis; Arab. Obe’ or labar), a shrub or small tree, with beautiful white flowers, somewhat resembling orange blossoms, the dried juice from whose bark is the official Storax (which see); the Judas tree (Cercis siliqueastrum; Arab. zemzarê), a straggling shrub or tree with very showy pink flowers, and the espar (Gypsophila repens; Arab. as’drî), which is very common on old walls and about ruins (see CAPER BERRY). The beautiful rockrose or Cistus (Arab. ghîbrâh) is found on many shrubby hillsides, even on the bare mountain tops. The C. villosus has pink and the C. salviaefolius white blossoms, the petals being curiously crumpled and falling off almost as fast as they open. Where the Cistus is obtained the gum called Ladanum (Arab. ladanunnûn; Heb lîd) for which see MYRHL. Many of the hill tops near the watershed, which should be clothed by forests of oaks and pines, are now almost bare and support upon the dry and scanty soil nothing but low bushes of thorny burnet, mingled with wild thyme and mint, with, in places, small bushes of the Cistus. This thorny burnet (Poterium spinosum; Arab. ballân) is also the most ubiquitous, hardy, and tiny leaves enable it to survive the goats. It is of considerable economic importance, as from masses of this plant the felahîn fire almost all the limekilns in the land; and they use it extensively too for their ovens. It is a common sight in the late summer, when the harvest is gathered in, to see companies of peasants gathering this plant into clumps all over the hillsides, and conveying it on the women's heads in huge masses to the kilns. They pile around the kilns enormous heaps, enough to keep the furnaces continually burning for several days. They may well be the "thorns under the pot" of Eccl 7 6. See THORNS.

Of the myriad spring flowers which make such a brilliant annual display it is impossible here to write in any detail. Earliest after the rains appear the crocuses and the cyclamen, then the narcissi, anemones—scarlet, white and purple—the scarlet ranunculi, gladioli, irises, dwarf orchids, pink and yellow flax, mountain lilies and other flowers, with the primrose-colored Pelascious, and vast numbers of small Compositae all appear in quick succession. When these fade many brilliant thistles continue to add some color to the otherwise dry roadsides, and last of all, in the late summer, numbers of tall stalks of squill, shot from the now leafless bulbs, remain scattered in groups over the dry and leafless ground as last survivors of the season's display. The varieties of flowers are enormous, but those mentioned are almost universally present.

Of cultivated vegetables mention may be made of Cucumbers (q.v.), lettuce, onions, Garlic (q.v.), Melons (q.v.), cauliflower and cabbage, potatoes (a fairly recent introduction), sweet potatoes, the egg plant (Melongena), artichokes (which also grow wild) and the bâmilâh (Hibiscus esculentus).

(2) The Jordan valley.—The flora of this region is of a very special kind, and has affinities to Africa. Several trees and shrubs are of great economic value. Firstly, mention may be made of the group of true acacias. One variety, the 'anbar (Acacia Farnesiana), is by no means peculiar to the Ghor, but is used for making hedges in many parts of the land; its little yellow, fluffy, scented flowers are a great favorite with the natives; it is usually a shrub rather than a tree. The remaining acacias are desert inhabitants and in many places are the only trees. The seyal, which includes A. tortilis and A. seydil, flourish on the west shores of the Dead Sea, at 'Ain Jidy and southward; from it is obtained the gum arabic of commerce; it probably yielded the wood known in the OT as SHITTIM Wood (q.v.).

The semitropical Ghor is the home of many other thorny trees. Extremely characteristic of the whole area are the jujube trees of which the nabk or sidr tree (Zizygus spina-Christi), is the most common. It has rounded yellowish fruit; in very favorable conditions it develops into a tall and handsome tree. Sometimes the common small-leaved 'ennabh (Z. vulgaris) which bears an edible fruit of the shape and size of an olive. A third kind, the dôm (Z. lotus), is merely a shrub and has small pea-sized fruit. These various kinds of jujube trees are found in every part of the Jordan desert, and the shrubbery is dense and lofty. Closely allied botanically to these throaty shrubs is the samâr (Paliurus aculeatus) or "Christ thorn," widely used for the making of hedges (see Brenis). Another common shrub, or small tree, in the hotter parts of the Ghôr near Jericho and the Dead Sea, is the sakhsâm (Balanites áegyptiaca) from whose oval berries the monks of Jericho extract a resinous substance which they term "Balm of Gilead."

The dîbîk (Cordaia myrta), a giant borage, which grows to 7 or 8 ft. high is but sparsely cultivated, but grows in the Ghôr spontaneously. The fruit, which is edible, is used principally for making bird lime.

A very striking tree near Jericho and the Dead Sea is the 'oshr (Calotropis procera), a member of the N.O. Aesclepiadaceae. It has large obovate leaves, cabbage-like in consistency—a great contrast to the small, dry, dull-colored leaves of most of its neighbors. The trunk has a cork-like bark and white, many juices and the fruit consists of queer apple-like follicles which, though solid looking, are only inflated with air and contain but thin threads and seeds. These have been supposed to be the apples of Sodôm of Jos, which he describes as looking like tempting fruit but which on examination prove to contain no edible part. A much more likely theory is that he refers to the equally common colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis). See WILD GOURED.

Another abundant herb is the Sallumān coagulans (Arab. khâdab), whose apple-like fruit has also received (without serious claim) the name of "apple of Sodôm."

Then there are in the immediate neighborhood of the Dead Sea a whole group of salt-loving plants which grow in the salina and marshes such, for example, as the soft or glasswort (Salicornia fruticosa and S. herbacea). The latter of these is called the kâli plant, because it is burnt in order to obtain potash (el kâli). Another group is included under the name of sea bristle or suede (Arab. suweid) of which there are several varieties.

Along the banks of the Jordan willows (Silex sahaf) and tamarisks (especially Tamarix jordaniae) abound.

Agricultural parts of the Jordan valley, but particularly to the north of Lake Huleh, flourishes the papyrus reed (Cyparissus papyrus), known in Arab. as babîr, the source of the earliest paper.

Of cultivated plants, palms, as we know from history, grow here well, though their cultivation has been neglected; sterile wild palms still occur in some of the warmer valleys, esp. to the E. of the Dead Sea. Many dead palm-tree trunks lie scattered along the shores of the Dead Sea.

In situations well supplied with water, bananas flourish—they have cultivated both near Jericho and near the Lake of Galilee. Oranges, lemons and citrons also grow well. All kinds of ordinary vegetables are grown in various parts of this region. Wheat and barley yield an early crop and are abundant in irrigated regions on both sides of the Jordan; rice and Indian maize are cultivated in irrigated fields N. of Lake Huleh, and cotton at several spots. With scientific irrigation this region might be one of the most productive upon earth.

The "Desert Zones" are chiefly noticeable for the absence of trees and the stunted condition of the small shrubs and herbs which grow there. Thorny plants like Poterium, Astragalus (the most characteristic order) and Cowesia thistles flourish. With the moist rains a rapid growth of wild flowers appears which dries up soon after the rainy season ends. Botanically the region stands somewhat distinct by the occurrence of Pers and Indian plant-forms. This region includes the great corn land of the Hauran and Nukra—some of the richest of Syria. (4) The flora of the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon consists, in the lower slopes, of similar plants to those mentioned under (1). The Conifera are specially characteristic of this northern region, the destruction of these trees in Pal proper being in many parts complete. Of the indigenous cypress (Arab. Saru) we have one species, the Cypressus sempervirens, a handsome tree than the cylindrical kind—a cultivated variety—planted so frequently in Turkish cemeteries (see Cyprus).

There are 6 varieties of juniper known, and one species of yew. Of pines the two important kinds are—the Aleppo pine (Pinus Halepensis), which grows with considerable rapidity and is widely planted, and the handsome stone pine (Pinus pinea), the true pine of the Alps, which is more truly the native tree (see PINE TREE). The most important and characteristic member of this order of trees is the cedar which still flourishes in a very few spots (see Cedar). On the Lebanon occurs a single species of Ephedra (Ephedra), a tree which, though it is of heather (Erica verticillata). Above the height of 7,000 ft. these trees and shrubs disappear and vegetation is chiefly represented by low, rounded, thorny bushes, chiefly varieties of Astrapadus, by clumps of Acantholimon, and various species of thistles. Below this height, wild crops of Cerasus prostrata—a member of the cherry family—and the Coloneaster nummularia with scarlet berries. Even on the summit of Hermon it is astonishing how many tiny flowers are in bloom in the late summer and after the snows have melted. The most curious feature of this region is the almost complete absence of Arctic forms such as are found in the Alps and even in the Himalayas.

Botany

Bottle

Botrys, bot'ris (Bôrtus, Bôrrus; mod. Botrân): A town of Phœnicia on the coast, on the Greek island of Gebal (Byblos) on the southern side of the broad promontory called in classic times Tyreopsis. It is said to have been founded by Ithobal (Ethbaal), king of Tyre, whose daughter married Ahab (Jos, Aní, VIII, xii, 2). The town is not mentioned in Scripture.

 BOTRYX, bot'ris (Bôrtus, Bôrrus; mod. Botrân): A town of Phœnicia on the coast, in the narrow neck of Gebal (Byblos) on the southern side of the bold promontory called in classic times Tyreopsis. It is said to have been founded by Ithobal (Ethbaal), king of Tyre, whose daughter married Ahab (Jos, Aní, VIII, xii, 2). The town is not mentioned in Scripture.

Bottle, bot'l (רבד, hêmath, יֵֽבִּ֝וּד, לְבִּ֝וּד, nôd'hîth, לְבִּ֝וּד, כֹּֽבָּבְּקָמְל, בִּ֝וּד, כְּוָֽסָקָא,.askó): The most lit. rendering of all the words for b. in E.V. is"skin," or "wine-skin," RV. The primitive b. among eastern peoples was really a big made from skins, at least, of kid, goat, cow, camel or buffalo—in most cases drawn off of the animal entire, after the legs and head were cut off, and, when filled, grotesquely retaining the shape of the animal. The skins in common use today, as anciantly no doubt, contained water, milk, butter and cheese. These were kept in the hair left on and are far from cleanly-looking. These used for wine and oil are tanned by means of oak bark and seasoning in smoke, a process that gives a peculiar as- triguing flavor to the wine that gav rise to the parable of Jesus about putting new wine into old wine-skins (Mt. 9 17; Mk 2 22; Lk 5 37). The fact that the leather underwent parable: "No man putteth new wine into old wineskins; else the wine will burst the skins, and the wine perishabk, and the skins: but they put new wine into fresh wine-skins." All such "bottles" today are liable to crack and become worthless.

Pliny Fisk used fresh goat-skins to carry water, but he says this gave the water a reddish color and an exceedingly loathsome taste. Harmer tells of carrying liquids in smoked skin-bottles, which when rent "were mended by putting in a new piece, or by gathering up the piece, or by inserting a flat bit of wood." Burekhardt says he saw Arabs keeping water for their horses on journeys in "large bags made of tanned camel-skin." They would sew the skins up well on four sides, but would leave two openings, one to admit the air, one to let out the water. Two such bags made a good load for a camel. Edwin Wilbur Rice says the leather or skin-bottles are of different sizes and kinds, usually made from the skin of the goat, rarely ever from that of the sheep, as it is not considered strong enough. But sometimes they are made from the skin of the camel, or the ox, which is then prepared by tanning. When leather bags are sewed up the joinings are smeared with grease, as the skin-bottles of all sorts are, as they grow older, lest the water, or other liquid, ooze through.

Such bottles, being more portable and less breakable than earthenware, were peculiarly well suited to the use of primitive and nomad peoples, as they are to the roving Bedouin of today. The mention of them, however, in such various accounts and connections as those for instance of the story of Hagar (Gen 21 19), of the Gibeonites (Josh 9 4), and of David (I S 25 18) shows that they were in common use among ancient, Oriental, pastoral and peasant alike. Tourists still find that they are admirably suited to travelers in waterless districts, or districts where the water is brackish and bad. One of the characteristic figures even in oriental centers like Damascus today is the waterman who sells from his dripping goat-skin water cooled with the snow of Hermon, flavored with lemon, rose, or licorice, temptingly offered up and down the streets by his clapping his brass cup and crying in the most pleasing but pleasing tones, "Drink, drink, thirsty one" (cf Isa 55 1). But, as Dr. Mackie, of Beirbt, says, "While the bottle is thus highly prized, and the water thus kept in it is a grateful necessity, the luxury of the East belongs to the spring itself, to the draught from the fountain of living waters. Hence the comparison Jesus made at Jacob's well (Jn 4 14), and the one blessed terminus of all, the Shepherd's leading (Rev 7 17). See HDB, s.v.

Of course in the settled life of the Orient, milk, wine and other liquids are often kept in earthen jars or other receptacles. For such "bottles" see Pitcher; Vessel. Glass bottles are not mentioned in the Bible; but those now found in tombs, for keeping perfume in, may have been known in OT times.

Figurative: (1) For the clouds (Job 38 37). (2) For intoxication, through which, because of their headstrong continuance in sin, Israel shall be helpless to resist the enemy's attack (Jer 13 12). (3) For sorrow: "Put thou my tears into thy bottle" (Ps 56 8). The Psalmist's sorrows were so many that he would need a great wine-skin to hold them all. There is no allusion to the little lacrimarys of fashionable and fanciful Romans: it is a robust metaphor by far; such floods of tears had the Psalmist wept that a leathern bottle would scarce hold them" (Treasury of David, III, 39). "God treasure His servants' tears as if they were water or wine." St. Bernard says, "The tears of penitents are the wine of angels" (Dummeilow's Comm., 351).

Geo. B. EAGER

BOTTOM, bot'um: Rendered by several Heb words: (1) יְשֶׁר, šēres, "root"; Chald. מַשְׁר, šēresh (Job 36 30, "the b. of the soin"). (2) פָּקָר, ḫarkā, "soil," "pavement of tesserae" (Am 9 3). (3) בּּ, ḫe'ēḇā, "cutting," "chop," "extremity" (Jon 2 6, "the bottoms of the mountains"). (4) פָּקַע, ḫ'āqā, "dripping," "railing," "couch" (Cant 3 10, "the b. thereof of gold"). (5) יְשָׁב, ḫā'bā, "boscum," "lap" (Exk 43 13.14.17, RVm "hollow"). (6) יְשֶׁב, ḫaḇā, "to be dark," "shadowy place," from prim. root ħāḇāl, "to stumble down," i.e. "settle"; hence the idea of a valley ("the myrtle-trees that were in the bottom,” Zec 1 8 RVm “(shady place)”. The prophet may have been wont to frequent the myrtle grove in the glen or bottoms in the neighborhood of Jerus, for meditation and prayer (BTP II, 283).

M. O. EVANS

BOTTLELESS, bot'um-less, PIT (to fill up, fill full) Rev 9 1.2 AV: In RV, hē abassōs (always an adj. in classical authors = “bottomless”) is uniformly rendered “the abyss” (q.v.) (Le 8 31; Rom 10 7; Rev 9 11; 11 7; 17 8; 20 13).

BOUGH, bou. See BRANCH.

BOUGHT, bout (יָבוּחַ, tāwekh, “bisection,” “middle”): The best part of a sling that contains one stone, “in the midst of the bought of a sling” (1 S 26 29 AVm, AV “out of the middle,” RV “from the hollow”).

BOUGHT, bût (adj. and vb.). See BUTING.

BOUND. See BIND.

BOUNDS, bounda: בּוּדַת, ḡābol = “to twist” (as a rope), “to make an enclosure” (as by a line) occurs in Ex 19 12-23; Ps 104 9. בּוּדֵה, ḡōdēh = “a cord,” hence “a boundary,” “territory” (Ex 23 31 AV), with its fem. form בּוּדֶה, ḡōdēlah (Dt 32 8; Isa 10 13); בּוּדַק = “enactment,” “appointment” (of time, space, quantity, labor, or usage), hence “commandment,” “deree,” “ordinance” (Job 14 5; 26 10 AV); in the Gr. ἀποθεσία, ἀρουθοθεσία, in the sense of “a limit,” “boundary line,” occurs in Acts 17 26.

BOUNTIFULNESS, boun’ti-fōl-nes, BOUNTY, boun’ti (ὀμορφότης, ἡπάλλης, “singleness,” “benevolence,”) 2 Cor 9 11 AV; מָרָה, “to be good” [Prov 22 9]; εὐαγγια, εὐλογία, “good speech,” “blessing” [2 Cor 9 6]; μαγαλ, “to treat well” [Ps 119 17]; מַחְשַׁב, “to be liberal” [Isa 32 5]; יד, yāḏ, “hand,” “power”: Paul speaks of the church at Corinth “being enriched in everything unto all liberality” (AV “bountifulness,”) 2 Cor 9 11).

The offering of the church at Corinth for the Christians of Judaea is termed a “bounty,” a blessing, liberally given: “and not in covetousness” (as of covetous murmurings) 1 Cor 16 19.) The word occurs also in 1 K 10 13: “Besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty,” lit. “according to the hand of King Solomon.” I. KAISER

BOW, bō. See ARCHERY.

BOW, bō, BOWING, bou’ing. See ADORATION; ATTITUDES.

BOW, bō, IN THE CLOUD: Reference to the promise made to Noah (Gen 9 13) preserved in the the Constellations figures. See ASTRONOMY, II, 4.

BOWELS, bou’el’s (יָבוּלֵת, maḇêt, pl. ḡōḇêt, maḇēm, מָבֵית, reḥem, pl. רְחֵה, rahāḥāmim; σπλάγχνον, splágchnon):

(1) Literal: The lit. meaning of these words is intestines, then the abdomen, the womb (matrix and uterus). As will be seen there is not much definiteness in the use of these expressions from the standpoint of physiology; but not less so than in modern oriental languages and even in many occidental languages, as popularly used. The remarkable phrases used in 2 Ch 21 18-19, “Jehovah smote him in his bowels,” and “His bowels fell out by reason of his sickness,” refer to a severe and fatal case of hemorrhoids.

(2) Figurative: In fig. language these words denote deep emotions of various kinds. As in physiology we speak of the “nervous sympathies,” in the ancients expressed by these terms “affection,” “sympathy” and “mercy,” feelings of distress and sorrow, as in Job 30 27 AV; Lam 1 20 AV; 21 11 AV. In one passage we have to translate me’im by “heart,” being the seat of affection and devotion (Ps 71 6): “Thy law is within my heart” (40 8). In the NT (RV) the word is only given in Acts 1 18.

H. L. É. LUERING

BOWING, bou’ing (נַשַּׁב, nāḵāb, “to incline,” “buckle”): The Psalmist’s assailants expected that he would be “like a leaning [AV “bowing’] wall” (Ps 62 3) before their united attack, as when an ill-built, bulging wall gives way under a sudden and heavy fall of rain (cf Eze 13 11; 38 22).

BOWL, bōl: (1) The primitive Hebrews, like the wandering Bedouin of today, probably used bowls of wood, as less breakable than earthenware. Some hollow dish or dish-like vessel would be indispensable even in the lowest stage of nomad life, to receive the milk of the flock, and as the common dish in which to serve the family meal. We have abundant proof, however, that vessels of earthenware of various sorts were in use by the settled peoples of Canaan in the earliest times. Many interesting specimens, characteristic of different peoples and ages, have been found by excavators of the PEF, esp. recently by Flinders Petrie and Fred. Bliss at Tell el-Hesi (see Tell el-Hesi (Laophis), by Petrie, and A MOUND OF MANY CIIES, by Bliss) and by Macalister and others at Gezer, Tannach, Megiddo, etc (see PEF).

It was probably in some such dish—“a b. fit for lords” (EV “a lordly dish”)—that Joel offered Sisera a draught of sour milk (Jgs 5 25; of Arab. leben), and the b. into which Gideon wrung the water from his fleece (Jgs 6 38) is denoted by the same word בּוּלוֹן, šēphel; LXX λεκάνη, though this may have been of earthenware instead of wood. Certainly the šēphel was a dish of goodly size.

(2) Another word rendered sometimes “bowl” and sometimes “basin” is בּוּלוֹן, mišrāk. It is used of the large silver bowls presented by “the princes of the congregation” (Nu 7 13f). See BOWL. It is also applied by Amos (6 6) to the costly bowls used by the nobles of Samaria in their debaucheries.

(3) A still larger b. is mentioned by Jer (35 5), AV “pot” (בּוּלוֹן, gābbōr). This same word is used of Joseph’s cup (Gen 44 2 f): “Put my cup, the silver cup, in the sacker’s mouth.” As used at banquets it corresponds to the crater, from which the drinking cups (קַנף, kānāf) were replenished. The material seems to have been uniformly silver. But see (4).

(4) B. is used in AV to tr בּוּלוֹן, gābhar: “the bowls made like almonds” (Ex 26 33 AV), as applied to the “cups” (RV), or calyces, used to ornament the gold candlestick (see TABERNACLE). It seems to have been an elastic term.

(5) The b. of Zec 4 3 (גּוֹלָה, gōlāh, found also in 6 2 correct text), is represented as the receptacle for oil in the candlestick of the prophet’s vision. It is likewise used of “the cups” (Gen 19 16) and to designate the bowl-shaped capitals of Jachin and Boaz (1 K 7 41.42; 2 Ch 4 12.13).

(6) B. is found in Isa 51 17.22 RV, “of the cup” (AV “dregs of the cup”). Some think the second word here (יָבוּלֵת, ḡōḇēl) is a gloss to explain the unusual preceding word.
(7) In Rev where AV has “vial” (phiale) RV has “bowl.” See Basen. Geo. B. Eager

BOWMAN, bō-man: Israel seems not to have been equal to the surrounding peoples in the use of the bow. The battle of Gibboa was clearly lost through the superior skill of the Phili bowmen. This seems to have moved David to encourage archery practice in Judah (2 S 1 18; cf Driver in loc.). It is thought probable that the revival of Israel’s military power under Jeroboam, son of Joash, was due to improvement in archery. Hoses, a contemporary, speaks of the bow as the national weapon of Israel (1 5.7). The most skilled bowmen of antiquity were the Assyrians (cf Isa 5 28; 37 33). From Assyrian reliefs it seems that it was their practice to overwhelm their enemies with the bow, and to use sword and spear only when the foe had been demoralized and put to flight. See ARCHERY. Geo. B. Eager BOWSHOT, bō-shot: Found only in Gen 21 16 in the account of Hagar and her child: “And she went, and sat down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot,” lit. “stretchings of a bow,” a typical oriental way of indicating distance.

BOX: The passages in which this word occurs are 2 K 9 1.3 (Heb pakh, “crust,” “flask,” RV vial) and the synoptic passages Mt 26 7 AV; Mk 14 3 AV; Lk 7 37 AV (Gr abbastron). “Perfume-boxes” are mentioned in Isa 3 20; in the NT passages RV renders “alabaster cruse.” “Alabaster” was a white stone much used in ornamentation; and out of it small vessels were made for holding precious ointment. “She brake the cruse” (Mk 14 3), i.e. the seal, not the vessel.

In Isa 41 19 and 60 13, “box” is found in connection with “tree,” as “box-tree” (q.v.).

BOXING. See Games.

BOX-TREE, box’tre (נִבְשָׁר, t’ashchir; Isa 41 19; 60 13, “boxwood” Ezek 27 6): A tree of uncertain identity, which must once have been common in the forests of Lebanon. According to Post (HDB, I, 313), “The only species of box found in Bible lands is Buxus longifolia, which is a shrub from 2 to 3 ft. high. It does not grow S. of Mt. Cæsarius and it is unlikely that it did in historical times.”

As an alternative to the box the cypress, Cupressus sempervirens—known in Arab as Sherbān—has been suggested. It is a fine tree and was probably once plentiful, but as it seems to answer to the brash (see Frin), it cannot well be the t’ashchir. There is nothing certain to go upon.

BOY (בָּנָיה, yedeth, “child”; בֵּית, “house,” “lad,” “youth”: manus, ho and he paiah): Refers to a child of any age, and is sometimes used of either sex: Joel 3 3; Ezek 8 5; Mt 17 18; Lk 4 43; 8 51.54 fem.; 9 42. In the East the word applies also to an adult who is a servant (Mt 8 6 RVm). The boy occupied a place of special importance in the family life of all ancient people. In Syria the father even was called by the name of his son. A boy was known as the father of Joseph or other name might be. As is true among all oriental people, while the father had absolute control in his case as well as in the case of the rest of the household, yet the boy received a consideration and advantages not accorded to the daughter. In the Jewish family his religious life began at the fourth year. He was expected to learn the Scriptures at five, the Mish at ten, and to fulfil the whole law at thirteen. At twelve years he was expected to learn the trade, and attained to something of independence at that age, though he did not come into full rights as a citizen until he was twenty. Among many nations there was special rejoicing at the birth of the boy, and sometimes a feast. One of the most ancient customs was the planting of a cedir tree on this occasion. See CHILD; FAMILY; SON. Jacob W. Kapp

BOZCATH, boz’kath (בֹּקָת, boz’kath). See BOZKATH.

BOZEZ, boz’ez (בֹּצֶז, bōtēz): Baños, Basās, probably from an obsolete root bāqās, corresponding to the Arab. bāṣṣa, “to shine” or “to ooze”: The name of the northern of the two cliffs that stand one on each side of the gorge of Michmash (1 S 14 4). It catches the sun during most of the day, while the southern cliff is in the shade. To this circumstance it may owe its name, “shining.” “The contrast is surprising and picturesque between the dark coal color of the south side, and the reddish or tawny tints of the northern cliff, crowned with the gleaming white of the upper chalky strata. The picture is unchanged since the day when Jonathan looked over to the white camping ground of the Philis, and Bozez must have then shone as brighty as it does now in the full light of an eastern sun” (Conder, Tent Work, 256).

BOZKATH, boz’kath (בּזֶצ, boz’kath): “Stony”: LXX Bapareφ, Basèzeth: A town in the Shephelah of Judah named between Lachish and Eglon (Josh 15 39). It was the birthplace of Adiah the mother of King Josiah (2 K 22 1; AV “Boseath”). The site is not identified.

BOZRAH, boz’rah (בּזֵרָה, bozráh, “sheepfold”): Borôphà, Bosorcha, Bosrah, Bosor:

BRACELET, brás’let (בּצַרְס, qṣadäh, ḫab, ḫâb, ֵצַרְס, zamēkh, ḫâb, pithi, ḫenē, šērōh): Used to translate a number of Heb words, only one of which means a band for the arm (’eṣdābhāh), as in Gen 36:10, "the bracelet that was on his arm." In Ex 36:22, where both men and women are said to have brought gifts and gave among the "jewels of gold" ("bracelets") (RV "brooches"), another word (bāḥ) is used, meaning most likely nose-rings (see rings). The b. asked of Judah by Tamar as a pledge ("Thy signet, and thy b., and thy staff that is in thy hand,"). Gen 38:18-26 AV) was probably the cord of softly-twisted wool for the shepherd's headress (pāṭḥith; RV "cord"). The bracelets ("two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight of gold") which Abraham's servant gave to Rebekah stand for still another word (gāmādēth). These "bracelets" are always spoken of as "bracelets for the hands," or as "put upon the hands" (Gen 24:47; cf Ex 16:11; 33:42). Isaiah, predicting the day when Jeh will smite the haughty daughters of Zion, who "walk with outstretched necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinking with their feet," says, "In that day the Lord will take away the beauty of their anklets . . . the bracelets" (3:19, šēḇōrēth) etc., where some translate "twisted ornaments," leaving it uncertain as to just what is specifically meant. In 2 S 1 10 the b. appears with the crown as one of the royal insignia. In 2 K 11:12, according to Wellhausen, W. R. Smith (OTTC, 311n.) and others, we should read, "Then he brought out the king's son, and put the crown and bracelets [מְזַנְכִּי] for "testimony" [םְתָנְכִּי]. See DB.

Today, as of old, the bracelet is multifform and a favorite ornament in the East. It is made of gold, silver, copper, brass, glass and even enamelled earthware, and in many designs: flat band, plain ring, interlinked rings, as well as of twisted wires, connected squares, solid or perforated, with or without pendants (Mackie).

When owned by women, bracelets had the special recommendation, along with other jewelry, of being inalienable—not to be taken by the husband in case of divorce, nor seized and sold for his debts. "Even now," says Rice (Orientalisms, etc, 41), "in Moæmul lands a woman may be divorced without legal process at the freak of her husband, but she can carry away undisputed any amount of gold, silver, jewels, precious stones, or apparel that she has loaded on her person; so she usually wears all her treasures on her person, not knowing when the fateful word may be spoken."

G. B. Exel

BRAG (meye'law, megalavĉēh, "proud brags"): Occurs only in the Apoc (2 Mace 15:32), not being sufficiently dignified to be given a place in the canonical Scriptures by the King James translators (cf Jth 15:5).

BRAIDED, brád'ed, BRAIDING, brád'ing (rō'pēlmag, rō'plem'mag, "that which is plaited,"); 1 Tim 2:9; ἄμπληκέ., ἀμπληκότ., "a plaiting," 1 Pet 3:3): Used with reference to Christian women in two passages where the apostles emphasized the superiority of good works and spiritual grace over outward adornment. See EMBROIDERY.

BRAMBLE, bram'bl. See THORN.

BRAN (rō' pi'truwa, tā' pi'truha): The women of Babylon are described as burning "bran for incense" in their unholy idolatrous worship (Bar 6:48).

BRANCH, branch, and BOUGH: Represented by very many words in the Heb.

(1) מְזַנְכִּי, z'mānēkh, used esp. of a vine branch. The spies "cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes" (Nu 13:23). See also Ezek 15:2; Nah 2:2. "They put the branch to their nose" (Ezek 17:17), refers to some unknown idolatrous practice, as does also Isa 17:10, "thou planted pleasant plants, and settest it with strange slips," or "vine slips of a strange [god]" RVm.

(2) מְזַנְכִּי, yānēketh, lit. "a sucker." The tender branch thereof will not cease" (Job 14:7). Used fig. of Israel, Ps 80:11 (RV "shoots"); Ezek 17:22 AV; Hos 14:6, and of the wicked, Job 8:16 (RV "shoots").

(3) מְזַנְכִּי, kippah, Job 15:32. Isa 9:14; 19:15, RV has "palms-branch," "Therefore Jeh will cut off from Israel head and tail, palm-branch and rush, in one day" (9:14).

(4) מְזַנְכִּי, נַפְר, nēfār, of the same Heb root, according to many commentators, as Nazareth, lit. "a little shoot springing from the root." ("out of a shoot from her roots"). Dnl 11:7, which may be planted out to grow (Isa 11:1; 60:21), or may be rooted out and thrown away (Isa 14:10).

(5) מְזַנְכִּי, kēnāb, the "branch" of Messianic prophecy. See PROPHECY. "In that day shall the branch (m "shoot" or "sprout") of Jeh be beautiful and glorious" (Isa 4:2); "a shoot out of the stock of Jesse" (Isa 11:1); "a righteous branch" (Jer 23:5; 33:15); "my servant the Branch!" (Zec 3:8); "the man whose name is the Branch" (Zec 6:12).

(6) מְזַנְכִּי, kēnāb, is used for the "branches" of the golden candlesticks (Ex 25:32; 37:18 f). Lit. kēnāb means a "reed.

There are a number of words, less frequently used, meaning "branch":

(7) מְזַנְכִּי, baddīm (pl. only used; Ezek 17:6; 19:14).

(8) מְזַנְכִּי, dālūth (pl. only used; Jer 11:16).

(9) מְזַנְכִּי, ma'yēḵ (Ezek 19:11).

(10) מְזַנְכִּי, ṣā'ēph (Isa 18:5; מְזַנְכִּי, ṣ'ā'pāh (pl. Ezek 31:6; מְזַנְכִּי, šār'ēpāh (Ezek 31:5).

(11) מְזַנְכִּי, ānāpēr (Mal 4:1; Ps 80:11); מְזַנְכִּי, ūnāpēr (Dnl 4:14.21); מְזַנְכִּי, rēnēph (Ezek 36:8).

(12) מְזַנְכִּי, ṣāpērāh, "a bough" (Isa 10:33; מְזַנְכִּי, pō'rēth (pl. only) (Ezek 31:5.8).

(13) מְזַנְכִּי, kāmmerērath, "foliage" or "boughs of trees," lit. "locks" or "fleece" of trees (Ezek 17:3; 31:3).

(14) מְזַנְכִּי, kākēr (collective) (Job 14:9), "boughs" (Ps 80:11), "branches."

(15) מְזַנְכִּי, shibbeleth, the two olive branches of Zec 4:12.

(16) מְזַנְכִּי, sŏbēh, root meaning "to interweave" (Jgs 9:40); מְזַנְכִּי, sōkākh (Jgs 9:48), "boughs." (17) מְזַנְכִּי, sārīṣ (pl. only, מְזַנְכִּי, sārīṣim, "branches" (of the vine) (Gen 40:10; Joel 1:7).
Represented in Gr in the NT:
(1) βαλον, balon (Jn 12 13), “a palm branch.”
(2) κλάδος, klados (Mt 13 32; 21 8; 24 32; Mk 14 7; 15 25; Lk 13 19; Rom 11 16.17.18.19.21).
(3) γλύφω, gliña, a slip or cutting of the vine, esp. one cut off to be grafted into another plant (Ju 15 2.4.5.6).
(4) στόμαχα, στόμα, a “twitch” or “bough” (Mk 11 8). E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BRAND: In the double signification of an object on fire and of objects used to feed a fire. The first meaning was made by the Gr word γέφυρ, “a bent stick” for stirring fire (Am 4 11; Ze 3 2; cf Isa 7 4); the second by τίθην, lappidah, in Jgs 16 4.5. A third meaning is found in לַטִּמָּה, zikthah, indicating the brand as a spreader of fire (Prov 26 18).

BRASEN, brā'z'n. See Brass.

BRASS, brass, BAZEN (בֹזָן, nḥōbēkh): The use of the word brass has always been more or less indefinite in its application. At the present time the term brass is applied to an alloy of copper and zinc or of copper and tin. The word "brass" in the AV would be more correctly rendered bronze, since the alloy used was copper and tin (Ex 27 4). In some passages however copper is meant (Dt 8 9), as bronze is an artificial product. This alloy was known in Egypt in at least 1600 BC. It was probably known in Europe still earlier (2000 BC), which helps to answer the question as to the source of the tin. Bronze was probably of European origin and was carried to Egypt. At a later period the Egyptians made the alloy themselves, bringing their copper from Sinai, Cyprus or northern Syria (see Copper), and their tin from the Balkan regions or from Spain or the British Isles (see Tin). When the Children of Israel came into the promised land, they found the Canaanites already skilled in the making and use of bronze instruments. This period marked the transition from the bronze age to the iron age in Pal. Museums possessing antiquities from Bible lands have among their collections many varied bronze objects. Among the most common are nails, lamps, hand mirrors, locks, cutting instruments, etc. Within comparatively recent times brass, meaning an alloy of copper and zinc, has been introduced into Syria. The alloy is made by the native workmen (see Crafts). Sheet brass is now being extensively imported for the making of bowls, vases, etc. Bronze is practically unknown in the modern native arts.

Figurative: "Brass," naturally, is used in Scripture as the symbol of what is firm, strong, lasting; hence "gates of brass" (Ps 107 16), "hoofs of brass" (Mic 4 13), "walls of brass" (Jeremiah is made as a "brass wall," 1 18; 16 20), "mountains of brass" (Dul 2 35, the Macedonian empire; the armies of Alexander were mostly of brass). It becomes a symbol, therefore, of hardness, obstinacy, insensibility, in sin, as "brow of brass" (Isa 48 4); "they are brass and iron" (Jer 6 28, of the wicked); "all of them are brass" (Ezk 22 18, of Israel). James A. Patch

BRAVERY, brāv'ēr-ā; ננה, ננה, tiph'arēth, or ננה, tiph'arēth = "beauty," "glory," "honor" and "majesty," hence "splendor of bravery." "The bravery of their tinkling ornaments" (Isa 3 18 AV), "the beauty of their anklets" (AV). Cf brauada, braura.

BRAWLER, brāl'er (Kt הָרָעָר, mēdḥāyānām; K'thīb הָרָעָר, mēhdhāvānām, "quarrelsome ness"); "smoaks, amachts, "not fighting"): Spoken of the quarrelsome woman; "a contentious [AV "brawling"] woman" (Prov 21 9). He who seeks the office of a bishop should be "no brawler" (τάραντος, pērōtōs, AV "given to wine," Tit 1 7); "not contentious" (AV "not a brawler," 1 Tim 3 3; Tit 3 2).

BRAY, brā (םִנָּה, nḥāh), "to bray," of the ass; מִנָּה, kāthōsh, "to pound in a mortar": This word occurs with two distinct meanings: (a) The harsh cry of the ass (Job 9 3). Job argued that as the sounds instinctively uttered by animals denote their wants, even so his words were but the natural expression of his longing for some adequate explanation of his sufferings, or, failing this, for death itself. Used fig. of Job's mockers (Job 30 7), (b) "To beat small in a mortar," "to chastise," Prov 27 22 refers to a more elaborate process than threshing for separating grain (ERV "corn") from its husk and impurities; used fig. of a thorough but useless course of discipline; or still more probably with reference to the Syrian custom of braying meat and bruised corn together in a mortar with a pestle, "till the meat and grain become a uniform indistinguishable pulp" (see Expos T, VIII, 321).

LITERATURE

The art of bread-making is very ancient. It was even known to the Egyptians at a very early day (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians), to the Hebrews of the Exodus (Nowack, Lehrbuch der hebr. Archäologie) and, of course, to the Greeks and Romans of a later day. Bread played a large part in the vocabulary and in the life of the ancient Hebrews.
I. Dietary Preéminence.—(1) In the East bread is primary, other articles of food merely accessory; while in the West meat and other things chiefly constitute the meal, and bread is merely secondary. Accordingly “bread” in the OT, from Gen 3:19 onward, stands for “food” in general. (2) Moreover in ancient times, as now, most probably, when the peasant, carpenter, blacksmith or mason left home for the day’s work, or when the mulletor or messenger set out on a journey, he wrapped other articles of food, if there were any, as the thin leaves of bread, and thus kept them ready for his use as needed. (3) Often the thin, glutinous loaf, puffed out with air, is seen today, opened on one side and used as to form a natural pouch, in which meat, cheese, raisins and olives are inclosed to be eaten with the bread (see Mackie in DCG, art. “Bread”). The loaf of bread is thus made to include everything and, for this reason also, it may fitly be spoken of as synonymous with food in general. To the disciples of Jesus, no doubt, “Give us this day our daily bread” would naturally be a petition for all needed food, and in the case of the miraculous feeding of the multitude it was enough to provide them with “bread” (Mt 14:15 ff.).

II. Materials.—Barley was in early times, as it is today, the main breadstuff of the Palæopasturality (see Jgs 7:13, where “the cake of barley bread” is said to be “the sword of Gideon”), and of the poorer classes of the East in general (see Jn 6:13, where the multitude were fed on the miraculous increase of the “five barley loaves,” and of Jos, B.J. V, x, 2). But wheat, also, was widely used as a breadstuff then, as it is now, the wheat of the Syrian plains and uplands being remarkable for its nutritious and keeping qualities.

Three kinds, or qualities, of flour, are distinguished, according to the way of making: (1) a coarser sort, usually made by the use of pestle and mortar, the “beaten corn” of Lev 2:14,16 (RV “bruised”); (2) the “flour” or “meal” of ordinary use (Ex 39:2; Lev 2:2; 6:15), and (3) the “fine meal” for honored guests (see Gen 18:6, where Abraam in command of Sarah to “make ready . . . three measures of fine meal”) with which we may compare the “fine flour” for the king’s kitchen (1 K 4:22) and the “fine flour” required for the ritual meal offering, as in Lev 2:1; 6:11; 7:14, 16; 13:15; 14:5; etc.

III. Bread-Making.—After thoroughly sifting and cleaning the grain, the first step in the process was to reduce it to “meal” or “flour” by grinding in a mill by rubbing, pounding, or grinding. (In Nu 11:8 it is said of the manna “the people went about, and gathered it and ground it in mills, or beat it in mortars.”) It has been shown that by a process, which is not yet extinct in Egypt, it was customary to rub the grain between two stones, called the “corn-rollers” or “corn grinders,” of which many specimens have been found by Petrie, Bliss, Macalister and others, at Lachish, Gezer and elsewhere (PEFS, 1902, 326; 1903, 118; cf. Ermag, Egypt, 180, for illustrations of actual use). For detailed descriptions of the other processes, see Mortar; Mill.

The “flour” was then ordinarily mixed simply with water, kneaded in a wooden basin or kneading-trough (Ex 3:23), and, in case of emergency, at once made into “cakes” and baked. (See Ex 12:34, “And the people took their dough before it was leavened.”) The Hebrews called such cakes _maggōd_, and they were the only kind allowed for use on the altar during Passover, and immediately following the Feast of Unleavened Bread (also called _maggōd_). Commonly however the process was as follows: a lump of leavened dough of yesterday’s baking, preserved for the purpose, was broken up and mixed with the day’s “batch,” and the whole was then set aside and kept standing until it was thoroughly leavened (see Ex 12:15).

We find in the OT, as in the practice of the East today, three modes of firing or baking bread: (1) that represented by Elijah’s cake baked on the hot stones (1 K 19:6,13); cf. “the cakes upon the hearth,” Gen 18:6 AV, and see Robinson, Researches, II, 406). The stones were laid together and a fire was lighted upon them. When the stones were well heated the coinders were raked off, and the cakes laid on the stones and covered with ashes. After a while the ashes were again removed and the cake was turned (see Hos 7:8) and once more covered with the glowing ashes. It was thus cooked on both sides evenly and made ready for eating (cf. Vul, Ponts subcineraris, and Delagarde, Symmotic, II, 188, where _eywthēs, egwthēs_ is referred to as “the hiding” of the cakes under the ashes). Out of these primitive usages of the pastoral tribes and peasants grew other improved forms of baking. (2) An ancient method of baking, peculiar to the Bedouin of Syria and Arabia, is to employ a heated convex iron plate, or griddle, what we would call a frying pan, in lieu of the heated sand or stones. The Heb “baking-pan” (כְסָל, _malābbēḥ_), Lev 2:5; 7:9; (Ex 4:3) has must have been of this species of “griddle.” The reference in 1 Ch 9:31 is probably to bread baked in this way. There it is said that one of the sons of the priests “had the office of trust over the things that were baked in pans.”

גֵּט, _tannār_ (of Arab.), no doubt were used by the Hebrews, when they settled in Pal, as they were used by the settled populations of the

4. Ovens

Orient in general, more and more as they approached civilized conditions. These “ovens” were of various kinds: (1) The simplest used by the ancients were hardly more primitive than the kind quite commonly used in Pal today. It may be called the “bowl-oven.” It consists of a large clay-bowl, which is provided with a movable lid. This bowl is placed inverted upon small stones and then heated with a fuel distinctly oriental, consisting of dried dung heaped over and around it. The bread is baked on the stones, then covered by the inverted oven, which is heated by the firing of the fuel of dung on the outside of the cover. (2) The jar-oven is another form of oven found in use there today. This is a large earthenware jar that is heated by fuel of grass (Mt 6:30), stubble (Mal 4:1), dry twigs or thorns (1 K 17:12) and the like, which are placed within the jar for firing. When the jar is thus heated the cakes are stuck upon the hot inside walls. (3) The pit-oven was doubtless a development from this type. It was formed partly in the ground and partly built up of clay and plastered throughout, narrowing toward the top. The ancient Egyptians, as the monuments and mural paintings show, laid the cakes upon the inside of the oven (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptian); but in Pal, in general, if the customs of today are conclusive, the fire was kindled in the inside of the pit-oven. Great numbers of such ovens have been unearthed in recent excavations, and we may well believe them to be exact counterparts of the oven of the professional bakers in the street named after them in Jerus "the bakers' street" (Jer 37:21). The largest and most developed form of oven is still the public oven of the town or city of this sort; but the primitive rural types still survive, and the fuel of thorns, and of the grass, "which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven," are still in evidence.

(1) The large poned or thick, light loaf of the West is unknown in the East. The common oriental cake or loaf is proverbially thin. The thin home-made bread is really named both in Heb and Arab, from its thinness as is reflected in the tr "wafer" in Ex 16:31; 29:26; Nu 6:19; 1 Ch 23:29. Such bread was called in Heb ṭēřēḵ (panion, ṭēřēḵ, of modern Arab. ṭawāriḵ, from warāḵ = "fellowship, "paper").

(2) It is still a piece of significant customary at a Syrian meal to take a piece of such bread and, with the ease and skill of long habit, to fold it over at the end held in the hand so as to make a sort of spoon of it, which then is eaten along with whatever is lifted by it out of the common dish (cf Mt 26:23). But this "dipping in the common dish" is so accomplished as not to allow the contents of the dish to be touched by the fingers, or by anything that has been in contact with the lips of those who sit at meat (cf Mackie, DCG, art. "Bread").

(3) Such "loaves" are generally today about 7 in. in diameter and from half an inch to an inch thick. Such, notably, were the lad's "barred loaves" brought to Christ at the time of the feeding of the 5,000 (Jn 6:9.13). Even thinner cakes, of both leavened and unleavened bread, are sometimes made now, as of old, esp. at times of religious festivals. Often they are coated on the upper surface with olive oil and take on a glossy brown color in cooking; and sometimes they are sprinkled over with aromatic seeds, which adhere and impart a spicy flavor. They may well recall to us the "oiled bread" of Lev 8:26 and the "wafers anointed with oil" of Ex 29:2 and Lev 2:4.

(4) Sometimes large discs of dough about 1 in. thick and 8 in. in diameter are prepared and laid in rows on long, thin boards like canoe paddles, and thus inserted into the oven; then, by a quick, deft jerk of the hand, they are slipped off upon the hot pavement and baked. These are so made and baked that when done they are soft and flexible, and for this reason are preferred by many to the thinner cakes which are cooked stiff and brown.

Arab Women Preparing Bread.

(5) The precise nature of the cakes (the "cakes") is not known. A variety of bakemates (Gen 40:17, lit. "food, the work of the baker") are met with in the OT, but only in a few cases is it possible or important to identify their nature or forms (see Enc. Bibl., col. 46ff). A cake used for ritual purposes (Ex 29:2 and often) seems, from its name, to have been pierced with holes, like the modern Passover cakes (cf Kennedy, 1-vol HDB, art. "Bread").

(6) Every oriental household of importance seems to have had its own oven, and bread-making for the most part was in the hands of women. Even when and where baking, as under advancing civilization, became a recognized public industry, and men were the professional bakers, a large part of the baker's work, as is true today, was to fire the bread prepared and in a sense pre-baked by the women at home. (b) The women of the East are often now seen taking a hand in sowing, harvesting and winnowing the grain, as well as in the processes of "grinding" (Ex 13:3; Mt 24:41; Lk 17:35), "kneading" (Gen 18:6; 1 S 28:24; 2 S 13:8; Jer 7:18) and "baking" (1 S 8:13), and doubtless it was so in ancient times to an equal extent.

IV. Sanctity and Symbolism of Bread.—It would seem that the sanctity of bread remains as unchanged in the Orient as the sanctity of shrines and graves (cf Mackie, DCG, art. "Bread," and Robinson's Researches). As in Egypt everything depended for life on the Nile, and as the Nile was considered "sacred," so in Pal, as everything depended upon the wheat and barley harvest, "bread" was in a peculiar sense "sacred." The psychology of the matter seems to be about this: all life was seen to be dependent upon the grain harvest, this in turn depended upon rain in its season, and so bread, the product at bottom of these Divine processes, was regarded as peculiarly a gift of God, a daily reminder of his continual and often undeserved care (Mt 5:45; consider in this connection the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," Mt 6:11; cf Lk 11:1). Travelers generally note as a special characteristic of the Oriental of today that, seeing a scrap of breads on the roadside, he will pick it up and throw it to a street dog, or place it in a crevice of the wall, or on a tree-branch where the birds may get it. One thing is settled with him, it must not be trodden under foot in common dust, for in the estimation of all, it has in it element of mystery and sacredness as coming from the Giver of all good.

(a) In partaking of the hospitality of the primitive peoples of Pal today, east and west of the Jordan, one sees what a sign and symbol of friendship is the giving and receiving of bread.

Among the Arabs, indeed, it has become a proverb, which may be put into English thus: "Eat salt, together, be friends forever.

Once let the Arab break bread with you and you are safe. You may find the bread the poorest barley loaf, still marked by the indentations of the pebbles, with small patches of the gray ash of the hearth, and here and there an inlaid bit of singed grass or charred horn, the result of their primitive process of baking; but it is bread, the best that the poor man can give you, "a gift of God," indeed, and it is offered by the wildest Arab, with some sense of its sacredness and with somewhat of the fear and respect for the high and holy nature of hospitality.

No wonder, therefore, that it is considered the height of discourtesy, yes, a violation of the sacred law of hospitality, to decline it or to set it aside as unfit for use.

(b) Christ must have been influenced by the knowledge of some such custom and law as this when, on sending forth His disciples, He charged them to "take no bread with them" (Mk 6:8). Not to have expected such hospitality, and not to have used what would thus be freely offered to them by the people, would have been a rudeness, not to say offense, on the part of the disciples, which would have hindered the reception of the good tidings of the Kingdom.

(c) It has well been pointed out that God's gift of natural food to His people enters in for the praises of the Magnificent One when He called Himself the "bread of life" (Jn 6:35). He really appealed to all these endeared and indissoluble associations connected in the eastern mind with the meaning and use of bread. Most naturally and appropriately in the inauguration of the New Covenant Christ adopted as His memorial, not a monument of stone or brass, but this humble yet sacred article of food, familiar and accessible to all, to become, with the "wine" of common use, in the Lord's Supper, the personal symbol among His disciples of the communion of saints.

GEO. B. EAGLE.

BREADTH, breadth (בָּשָׁב, "beshab), the root idea being to make wide, spacious): A term of expanse or measurement used of the altar (Ex 27:15; 29:35; 2 Kings 25:14); of the tabernacle (Ex 27:19, 20); of Solomon's temple (1 K 6:2). בָּשָׁב, בָּשָׁב, "breadth," as of the celestial city (Rev 21:16). Figuratively, of the comprehensiveness of God's law (Ps 119:96); of the heart (1 K 4:29, rendered "largeness of heart" HE); of God's unmeasurable love (Eph 3:18).

BREAK, break: בָּשֶׁב, shabbah = "break" (down, off, in pieces, up), "destroy," "quench." (Isa 14:25; Jer 19:10:11; Ezek 4:16; Am 3:5); בָּשָׁב, "to break of" "easen"; "fig.

Bread (Gen 27:40 AV); בָּשֶׁב, "to break the neck," hence "to destroy" (Ex 13:13); בָּשֶׁב, hâras = "to break through" (19:21:24); בָּשֶׁב, fray, = "to break" (forth, away) occurs in 19:22:24; 1 S 25:10; "breaking faith," Hos 4:2; בָּשֶׁב, "to break forth as a bud" (Lev 13:12); בָּשֶׁב, בָּשֶׁב, nathâh, or nâhâh = "destroy" (Ezk 23:34 AV, RV "gnaw"); see BREAST: בָּשֶׁב, "ealal = "profane," "defile," "stain" (Nun 30:2; Ps 89:31:34); בָּשֶׁב, bâch," = "rip open" (2 K 3:29; Isa 58:8); בָּשֶׁב, "to spoil by breaking to pieces," "to break open nothing" (Job 34:24; Ps 2:9; Jer 15:12). "Shall iron break northern iron?"

BREADTH, bread: Signifying the front view of the bust in humans and the corresponding part of the body in animals. בָּשֶׁב, "bread," occurs in Ex 29:20:27; Lev 7:30:31:34; 8:29; 10:14:15; Nu 6:20; 18:18; and בָּשֶׁב, הָכָּה, in Dnl 2:32. מָשַׁב, מָשַׁב, or מָשַׁב, "bread" in the sense of a pop of a woman or animal; (Job 24:9; Cant 8:1:10; Is 60:16; Lam 4:3). Only one word occurs with this significiation in the NT: σπόρος, spôros, = "bread" (Matt 13:17; 26:28; Hos 13:25; 21:20). See Way-offering.

Figurative: "The breads of virginity," pressed and bruised (Ezk 23:3 AV), indicative of Ezekiel's belief that Israel practiced idolatry in Egypt (cf. 20:8).

To "be serious..." (23:34) denotes the anguish of the people in parting with their beloved sin (of Hos 2:2). "Its bread of silver" (Dnl 2:32) is possibly expressive of the humanity and wealth of the Medo-Pers empire.

FRANK E. HIRSCH.

BREASTPLATE, breast-plate. See ARMOR.

BREASTPLATE OF THE HIGH PRIEST: The Heb word בְּשָׁב, "breast," rendered in AV "breastplate" means roughly a "purse" or "case."

The references to it are found almost exclusively in the PC (Ex 26:7; 28:29; 35:1-27; 39:25; Lev 8:8). The descriptions of its composition and particularly the directions with regard to wearing it are exceedingly obscure. According to Ecr 26:8 and Nu 7:35 the Urim and Thummim, which were carried in the priestly pouch, were lost during the Bab exile. The actual pouch was a "span in length and a span in breadth," i.e. about 9 in. square. It was made, like the ephod, of "gold, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen" (Ex 26:15 f.). In it were twelve precious stones, in rows of four, representing the twelve tribes of Israel. Apparently the pouch had two rings (perhaps four) through which passed two gold chains by which it was fastened to the ephod supplied for the purpose withouches or clasps. It was worn by the high priest over his heart when he entered the "holy place" (for a memorial before Jeh."
The presence of the high priest, the representative of the people, with the names of the separate tribes on his person, brought each tribe before the notice of Jeh and thereby directed His attention to them. The full designation was kōhen mishpāṭ, 'pouch of judgment' or 'decision.' It was the distinctive symbol of the priest in his capacity as the giver of oracles. As already suggested the priestly pouch contained the Urim and Thummim which were used as lots in giving decisions. In all probability the restored text of 1 S 18 41 preserves the true custom. On one side stood Saul and Jonathan, and on the other side stood the real Urim, Saul and Jonathan would be the guilty parties. If the result was Thummim, the guilt would fasten on the people.

BREATH, breath, BREATHE, brēth, BREATHING, brē̂th̆-ing, brē̂th̆-ing: in the EV of the OT "breath" is the rendering of רַחֲמָד (rəḥəmdāh), and of רַחֲמָד (rəḥamād). These words differ but slightly in meaning, both signifying primarily 'wind,' then 'breath,' though the former is more usually blowing, the latter often a blast. As applied to persons there is no very clear distinction between the words. Yet in general one may say that of the two רַחֲמָד is employed preferably of breath regarded physiologically: "vital breath," hence the vital principle, or breath as an act or force—and so is related to the vital or the emotions, whence the meaning "spirit," also sometimes "thought," "purpose" (cf Job 4 9; 9 18; Ps 15 14; Ezek 37 6.8.9.10). The examples cited, however, and other passages reveal a lack of uniformity of usage. Yet generally רַחֲמָד is the expression, רַחֲמָד, the principle, of life.

Yet when employed of God they of course signify the principle, not of His own life, but of that individual to whom it is applied. Breathed in the EV of the OT requires no remark except at Ps 27 12 ("such as breathe out cruelty"), from יָֽשָׁפָח (yəshaphah, "to breathe hard," "to snort") (cf Acts 9 1). In the NT ρηπό̂ς (rēpōs, psalō) occurs once Acts 17 25 in the plain sense of vital principle, the gift of God. "Breathed" is employed in Jn 20 22 of Our Lord's concrete symbolim of the giving of the Spirit. In Acts 9 1 Saul's "breathing threatening and slaughter" is lit. 'smoring,' etc, and the nouns are reflective genitives, the "breathing of which he breathed. See also SPIRIT. J. R. Van-Pelt

BREECHES, břěch'ı̂s: A garment, extending from the waist to or just below the knee or to the ankle, and covering each leg separately. Breeches are not listed among the garments of an ordinary wardrobe, but the priests in later times (Ex 20 26) wore a garment resembling modern trousers. The earliest linen breeches, הָֽבָד (hāḇāḏ, mikhāvāḏ bhāḏāh), were worn along with the linen coat, the linen girdle and the linen turban by Aaron on the Day of Atonement, when he entered the 'holy place.' (The word כְּבָד (kāḇāḏ) is derived from kōḇāḏ, "to wear," and is used to denote the appearance of being heavy, or "clothed," or "dressed," or "arrayed") (Ex 28 42; 39 28; Lev 6 10; Ezek 44 18). Apart from the breeches just referred to, the only reference to a similar garment among the Israelites is found in Dnl 3 21, where the מַמְשַׁח (məmeshākh, RV "hosen") is mentioned. (The AV translates "clothes.") The rendering of the AV is the more likely, though the meaning of the Aram. מַמְשַׁח is obscure (cf the thorough discussion in Gen, Theaurus). In Tg and Talm (cf Lev, Nehwed, s.v.), and is so taken by the rabbinical commentators. Still, Aq. and Theod. (אַמְשַׁח, maschākh), LXX in ver 27, Symm, and Theod. Pesh, express the meaning "trousers" (of a looser kind than those worn by us), a garment known (from Herodotus and other sources) to have been worn by the ancient Scythians and Persians, and to have been called by them sarabara. The word, with the same connotation, was brought into the Arab. in the form sirwāl. In both these senses the word may be originally Pers. in that of mantle, meaning properly (according to Andrae) a "head-covering" (sarabara), or for which he supplied the priestly person with mantle; in that of "trousers," corresponding to the mod. Pers shalwar, "under-breeches." Cook has pointed out that "mantles, long-flowing robes, and therefore extremely liable to catch the flames," are more likely than the esp. mentioned in this ch than trousers, or (RV) "hosen."

The word בּרֶפֶשׁ, battash (Dnl 3 21), is also uncertain. The LXX and Theod. render τιναράς, "turbans"; Pesh has the same word, which is variously taken by Syriac lexicographers as "tunic," "trousers," or a kind of "gaiters" (Payne Smith, Thes. Syr., col. 3008). (For further discussion of these words, cf commentaries on Dnl of Jour. Phil., XXVI, 307 ff.)

In general, we must remember that a thorough discussion of Israelitish 'dress' is impossible, because of the limitations of our sources.

BREED, brē̂d: Found in the past tense in Ex 16 20 as a tr of בּרֶפֶשׁ, "bring up," "to rise." In this ver, the manna is said to have arisen, i.e., it become alive (with warmth) and thus, "as such arise" God's gifts are spoiled by selfish and miserly hoarding. The pres. act. occurs in Gen 8 17 for בּרֶפֶשׁ, s̄̄hāraḥ = "to wriggle," "swarm," "abound," hence "breed abundantly"; and in Dt 32 14 for בּרֶפֶשׁ, bēn = "son," "descendant," "child," "calf," "calf," "breed." The pres. part. is found in Zeph 3 9 AV for בּרֶפֶשׁ, mishphāhāk, a derivative of בּרֶפֶשׁ, meashēk = "possession," "territory," "held." The passage in question should therefore be tēth "field of nettles" (RV "possession of nettles"). FRANK E. HIRSCH

that He was making, declare in an interrogative form, that they know all about the entire family, mother, brothers, and sisters. They name the brothers. Bengel suggests that there is a tune of contempt in the omission of the names of the sisters, as though not worth mentioning. In Jn 2 12, they are said to have accompanied Jesus and His mother and disciples, from the wedding at Cana.
In Jn 7 3 13, they are described as unbelieving, and ridiculing His claims with bitter sarcasm.
This attitude of hostility has disappeared, when,
at Jesus, after the resurrection and ascension (Acts 1 14), in the company of Mary and the Eleven, and at the Pentecost (Acts 2 14). The brethren steadfastly, as awaiting the promise of the gift of the Holy Spirit. Their subsequent participation in the missionary activity of the apostolic church appears in 1 Cor 9 5, "Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a believer, even as the rest of the apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas?"
In Gal 1 19, James, bishop of the church at Jerus, is designated "the Lord's brother," thus harmonizing with Mt 13 55, where His name is recorded as James the Just, Simon and Judas. When, then, "Jude, . . . brother of James" is mentioned (Jude ver 1), the immediate reference is that Jude is another brother of the Lord.
In reading these passages, the natural inference is that Joseph was called "brother" of Jesus and Mary, born after Jesus, living with Mary and her daughters, in the home at Nazareth, accompanying the mother on her journeys, and called the "brehnren" of the Lord in a sense similar to that in which Joseph is called his "brother," because they were disciples of the common relationship to Mary.
This impression is strengthened by the fact that Jesus is called her protokos, "first-born son" (Lk 2 7), as well as by the very decided implication of Mt 13 55. Even though each particular, taken separately, might, with some difficulty, be explained otherwise, the force of the argument is cumulative.
There are too many items to be explained away, in order to establish any other inference. This view is not the most ancient. It has been traced to Tertullian, and has been more fully developed by Belvivdus, an obscure writer of the 4th cent.
Two other views have been advocated with much learning and earnestness. The earlier, which section of a group of Clospes, and was revealed and supported by Origen, Eusebius, Gregory of Nyssa and Ambrose, Epiphanius being his chief ad-dovate, regards these "brethren" as the children of Joseph by a former marriage, and Mary as his second wife. Joseph disappears from sight when Jesus is twelve years old. We know nothing of him after the narrative of the child Jesus in the temple. That there is no allusion to him in the account of the family in Mk 6 3 indicates that Mary had been a widow long before she stood by the Cross without the support of any member of her immediate family. In the Apocalypse Gospels, the attempt is made to supply what the canonical Gospels omit. They report that Joseph was over eighty years of age at his second marriage, and the names of both sons and daughters by his first marriage are given. As Lightfoot (comm. on Galatians) has remarked, "they are pure fabrications." The-ophylact even advanced the theory that they were the children of Joseph by a levirate marriage, with the widow of his brother, and thus the "brethren" of Joseph whom, after the death of his brother Clopas, he had taken into his own home, and who thus became members of his family, and were accounted as though they were the children of Joseph and Mary.

According to this view, the whole family at Nazareth were no blood relatives of Jesus. It is a Docetic conception in the interest of the dogma of the perpetual virginity of Mary. All its details, even that of the advanced age and deceptu of Joseph, start from that point.

Another view, first propounded by Jerome when a very young man, in antagonizing Belvivdus, but afterward qualified by its author, was followed by Augustine, the Roman Catholic writers generally, and carried over into Protestantism at the Reformation, and accepted, even though not urged by Luther, Chemnitz, Bengel, etc, understands the word
"brother" in the general sense of "kinsman," and interprets it here as equivalent to "cousin." According to this view, Jesus and his brethren were actually blood-relatives of Jesus, and not of Joseph.
They were the children of Alphaeus, otherwise known as Clopas (Jn 19 25), and the sister of Mary. This Mary, in Mt 27 56, is described as "the mother of James and Joses," and in Mk 16 40, "the mother of James the less and of Joses, and Salome."
This theory as completely developed points to the three names, James, Judas and Simon found both in the list of the apostles and of the "brethren," and argues that it would be a remarkable coincidence if they referred to different persons, and the two sisters, both named Mary, had found the very same names for their sons. The advocates of this theory argue also that the expression "James the brother" shows in a very prominent way the use of the name James in the circle of those who were most nearly connected with Jesus. They say, further, that, after the death of Joseph, Mary became an inmate of the home of her sister, and the families were probably connected, if not actually one, by nephews and nieces upon her can be explained without much difficulty, and the words of the people at Nazareth be understood. But this complicated theory labors under many difficulties. The identity of Clopas and Alphaeus cannot be established; resting, as it does, upon obscure philological resemblances of the Aram. form of the two names (see Alphaeus). The most that such argument affords is a mere possibility. Nor is the identity of "Mary the wife of Clopas" with the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, established beyond a doubt. Jn 21 25, upon which it rests, can with equal correctness be interpreted as teaching that four women stood by the cross, of whom "Mary the mother of Clopas" and "Mary the mother of James and another. The decision depends upon the question as to whether "Mary" be in apposition to "sister."
If the ver be read so as to present two pairs, it would not be a construction without precedent in the NT, and would avoid the difficulties resulting from the two sisters with the same name—a difficulty greater yet than that of three cousins with the same name. Nor is the identity of "James the less" with the son of Alphaeus beyond a doubt. Any argument concerning the comparability of the name as above explained, fails when it is found that in the Gr there is no comparative, but only "James the little," the implication being probably that of his stature as considerably below the average, so as to occasion remark. Nor is the difficulty less when it is proposed to identify three of these brethren of Jesus with apostles of the same name. For the "brethren" and the apostles are repeatedly distinguished. In Mt 15 40, while the former stood without, the latter are gathered around Jesus. In Jn 2 2, we read: "his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples." In Acts 1 13 the Eleven, including James the son of Alphaeus, and Simon, and Judas of Jerusalem, and then it is said that they were accompanied by "this brother."
the growing difficulty of this hypothesis of Jerome is the record of the unbelief of the brethren and of their derision of His claims in Jn 7 3-5.
On the other hand, the arguments against regarding them as sons of Mary and Joseph are not formidable. When it is urged that their attempts to interfere with Jesus indicate a superiority which, according to the context (Matt 10 35), in no way consists in the position of younger brothers, it may be answered that those who pursue an unjustifiable course are not models of consistency. When an argument is sought from the fact that Jesus on the cross conceded His mother to John, the implication is immediate that she had no sons of her own to whom to turn in her grief and desolation; the answer need not be restricted to the consideration that unknown domestic circumstances may explain the omission of her sons. A more patent explanation is that as they did not understand their brother, they could not understand their mother, whose whole life and interests were bound up in her first-born. But, on the other hand, no one of the disciples of these brethren associated His work and treasured up His words as did John. A bond of fellowship had thus been established between John and Mary that was closer than her nearer blood relationship with her own sons, who, up to this time, the church had condemned Jesus with disapproval, and had no sympathy with His mission. In the home of John she would find consolation for her loss, as the memories of the wonderful life of her son would be recalled, and she would converse with him who had received the bosom of Jesus and whom Jesus loved. Even with the conversion of these brethren within a few days into faithful confessors, before the view of Jesus, provision was made for her deeper spiritual communion with her risen and ascended Son through the testimony of Jesus which John treasured in his deeply contemplative spirit. There was much that was alike in the characters of Mary and John. This may have had its ground in relationship, as many regard Salome his mother, the sister of the mother of Jesus mentioned in Joh 19 25. Underneath both the stepbrother (Epiphanian) and the cousin (Hieronymian) theories, which coincide in denying that Mary was the actual mother of Jesus, a thought lies the idea of the perpetual virginity of Mary. This theory which has as its watchword the stereotyped expression in liturgy and hymn, "Maria semper Virgo," although without any support from Holy Scripture, pervades the theology and the worship of the ancient and the mediæval churches. From the Gr and Rom churches it has passed into Protestantism in a modified form. Its plea is that it is repugnant to Christian feeling to think of the womb of Mary, in which the Word, made flesh, dwelt in peculiar way, as the habitation of other babies. In this idea there lies the further thought, most prominent in mediaeval theology, of a sinfulness of the act in itself whereby new human lives come into existence, and of the ultimate implantation from the creation, upon which all family life is founded. (1 Tim 4 3, 4; Heb 13 4 are sufficient answer. The taint of sin lies not in marriage, and the use of that which is included in its institution, and which God has blessed (of Acts 10 15), but in its perversion and abuse. It is by an inconsistency that Protestants have conceded this much to the theory of Rome, that celibacy is a holier estate than matrimony, and that virginity in marriage is better than marriage itself. The theory also is connected with the denial of Mary from the sphere of ordinary life and duties as too commonplace for one who is to be surrounded with the halo of a demi-god, and to be idealized in order to be worshipped. The interpretation that they are the Lord's real brethren conceived and given to Him in His relations and duties, and sanctified motherhood with all its cares and trials as holier than a selfish isolation from the world, in order to evade the annoyances and humiliations inseparable from fidelity to our callings. Not only Mary, but Jesus with her, knew what it was to grieve over a house divided against itself (cf. Matt 10 33). Unbelief and indifference gave way before the clearer light of the resurrection of Jesus is shown by the presence of these brethren in the company of the disciples in Jerusalem (Acts 1 14). The reference to His post-resurrection appearance to James (1 Cor 15 7) is probably connected with this change in their attitude. 1 Cor 9 5 shows that at least two of these brethren were active as missionaries, undoubtedly within the Holy Land, and to Jews, according to the agreement into which James entered in Gal 2, and his well-known attitude on questions pertaining to the Gentiles. Zahn regards James as an ascetic and celibate not included in 1 Cor 9 5, which is limited then to Jude and Simon. Their marriage indicates "the absence in the Holy Family of that pseudo-asceticism which has so much confused the tradition concerning them" (Alford). See also James; Jude.

BRIBERY, brīb’er-i (παραβαίνειν, shōhabdēn, "a gift," in a corrupt sense, "a bribe"): The Heb law condemns everything that would tend to impair the impartial administration of justice, particularly the giving and receiving of gifts or bribes, in order to pervert judgment (Ex 23 8). Allusions are frequent to the prevailing corruption of oriental judges and rulers. "And fire shall consume the tents of bribery" (Job 15 34; 1 S 8 3; Ps 26 10; Isa 1 23; 33 15; Ezek 22 12). Samuel speaks of a "ransom" in the sense of a bribe: "Of whose hand have I taken a ransom (ḥūbér, "covering," AV "bribe") to blind mine eyes therewith?" (1 S 12 3; Am 9 12; cf Am 2 6). See Crimes; Justice; Punishments. L. Kaisler

BRICK (בְּנֵב, Pḥbrēnāh): The ancient Egyptian word appears in the med. Egypt Arab. toōb. In Syria the sun-baked bricks are commonly called ṭōb or lebit, from the same Sem root as the Heb word.

Bricks are mentioned only a few times in the Bible. The story of how the Children of Israel, while in bondage in Egypt, had their task of brick-making made more irksome by being required to collect their own straw from one of the most familiar of Bible narratives (Ex 1 14; 5 19-21).

Modern excavations at Pithom in Egypt (Ex 1 11) show that most of the bricks of which that store-city was built were made of mud and straw baked in the sun. These ruins are chosen as an example from the long list of ancient brick structures because they probably represent the work of the very Heb slaves who complained so bitterly of their royal taskmaster. In some of the upper courses rushes had been substituted for straw, and still other bricks had no fibrous material. These variations could be explained by a scarcity of straw at that time, since, when there was a shortage in the crops, all the straw (Arab. ṭōb) was needed for feeding the animals. It may be that when the master came for the workmen to provide their own straw they found it impossible, so that and still furnish the required number of bricks.
Brickmaking in early Egypt history was a government monopoly. The fact that the government pressed into service her Asiatic captives, among whom were the Children of Israel, made it impossible for independent makers to compete. The early bricks usually bore the government stamp or the stamp of some temple authorized to use the captives for brick manufacture. The methods employed by the ancient Egyptians differ in no respect from the modern procedure in that country. The Nile mud is thoroughly slipped or mixed and then rendered more cohesive by the addition of chopped straw or stubble. The pasty mass is next worked into a mould made in the shape of a box without a bottom. If the sides of the mould have been dusted with dry earth it will easily slip off and the brick is allowed to dry in the sun until it becomes so hard that the blow of a hammer is often necessary to break it.

When the children of Israel emigrated to their new country they found the same methods of brickmaking employed by the inhabitants, methods which are still in vogue throughout the greater part of Pal and Syria. In the interior of the country, esp. where the building stone is scarce or of poor quality, the houses are made of sun-baked brick (lbn). Frequently the west and south walls, which are exposed most to the winter storms, are made of hewn stone and the rest of the structure of bricks. When the brick-laying is finished the house is plastered inside and outside with the same material of which the bricks are made and finally whitewashed or painted with grey- or yellow-colored earth. The outer coating of plaster must be renewed from year to year. In some of the villages of northern Syria the brick houses are dome-shaped, looking much like beehives. In the defiant assertion of Isa 9:10 the superiority of hewn stone over bricks implied a greater difference in cost and stability than exists between a frame house and a stone house in western lands today.

In the buildings of ancient Babylonia burnt bricks were used. These have been found by modern excavators, which confirms the description of Gen 11:3. Burnt bricks were rarely used in Egypt before the Rom period and in Pal their use for building purposes was unknown. Specimens of partially burnt, glazed bricks have been found in Babylonia and recently in one of the Hittite mounds of northern Syria. These were probably used for decorative purposes only. If burnt bricks had been generally used in Pal, traces of them would have been found with the pottery which is so abundant in the ruins (see Pottery).

The fact that unburnt bricks were so commonly used explains how the sites of such cities as ancient Jericho could have become lost for so many centuries. When the houses and walls fell they formed a heap of earth not distinguishable from the surrounding soil. The wood rotted and the iron rusted away, leaving for the excavator a few bronze and stone implements and the fragments of pottery which are so precious as a means of identification. The "tiles" or mounds of Pal and Syria often represent the ruins of several such cities one above the other.

BRICK-KILN, brīk’kīn, kīn (יַבִּיקי, malāḇnēn): The Heb word is better tr. by "brick-mound." In Syria the brick-mound is still called malīn. In Jer 43 9 the ARV rendering is "brickwork!" and the ARV "pavement." 2 S 12 31 becomes much clearer if the ARV is incorporated. Being put to work at the brick-mound was considered the task of those taken as slaves. The ancestors of the new taskmasters had themselves been put to similar toil.

BRID, brid. See Marriage.

BRID'CHAMB'ER, brid’chām-bār (יוֹמָפֹן, nām’phōn): The room in which the marriage ceremonies were held (Jos 19 15; Mk 2 19; Lk 5 34; cf Mt 22 10). See Chamber; Marriage.

BRID'CHAMB'ERS, SONS (CHILDREN) OF THE (אֵלֵי תֹּם νομπῶν, Κοκντέλ τόκ ναμ’φων): These were friends or companions of the bridegroom and were usually very numerous (Mt 9 15; Mk 2 19; Lk 5 34). Any wedding guest might be included in the expression, or anyone who took part in the bridal procession and remained for the wedding festivities (see Marriage). In the above passages "the sons of the bride-chamber" are the disciples of Christ.

BRIDEGROOM, brid’g्रō’m; BRIDEGROOM, FRIEND OF. See Marriage.

BRIDGE, brid’ (יוֹפָה, gēphōra, 2 Mac 12 13 AV; RV GEFYRHNUN): Does not occur in the canonical Scriptures, unless it be indirectly in the proper name Geshur (גֶּשֶׁר, gēshār, 2 S 3 3; 13 37; 16 8; 1 Ch 2 23, and others). The so-called Jacob's bridge is said to mark the site where Jacob crossed the upper Jordan on his return from Padan-aram, but, of course, does not date from the time of the patriarch. There are traces of ancient bridges across the Jordan in the vicinity of the Lake of Gennesaret, over the Arnon and over other rivers which enter the Jordan from the east; but none of them seem to date farther back than the Roman period. Nah 2 6, in which the Chaldaic paraphrase renders "bridges," evidently refers to dikes or weirs. Judas Maccabaeus is said to have planted a bridge in order to besiege the town of Casparh (2 Mac 12 16). Jos (Ant, V i, 3) tells us that the Jordan, before the passage of the Israelites, had never been bridged, evidently implying that in his own time bridges had been constructed over it, which was the case, under the Romans. The bridge connecting the temple with the upper part of the city of which Jos speaks (War, VI, vi, 2; Ant, XV, vi, 5) probably was a viaduct.

BRIDLE, brid’l. See Brt.

BRIER, bri’er. See Thorns.

BRIGANDINE, brig’ən-dēn. See Arms (Defensive, 5); Coat of Mail.

BRIGHTNESS, brit’ness: Used by AV in He 1 3 for "effulgence of his glory," as in RV and ARV. The Gr apaisisma may mean either "reflection" or "radiation." Patristic usage favors the latter; cf Wis 7 26; also the Nicene Creed: "Light of Light," i.e. the Son not only manifests the Father, but is of the same substance. (What emanates from light, must have the nature of light) (Delitzsch).

BRIM: בּרִית, kāpeh or בֵּית, kāpeh = "an extremity" (in a variety of applications and idioms), "border," "edge," "side," "shore" (Josh 3 15 AV; RV "brink"); also בֵּית or בּר, sēphēd or sephēd = "edge," "lip" (1 K 7 23, 24, 26; 2 Ch 4 2, 5). In Jn 2 7 the adv. dōn, dōn, is used to emphasize the vb. ἐκβλήσαι, ἐκβλήσαι = "to fill," thus giving the idea of "filling to the top."

BRIMSTONE, brīm’stōn, brīm’stun (וֹסְפֶד, gophrith; τὸ φθόνον, τὸ θελήμα): The word tr. "brimstone" probably referred originally to the pitch of trees, like the cypress. By analogy it has been rendered "brimstone" because of the inflammability of both substances. Sulphur existed in Pal in early times and was known by most of the ancient nations as a combustible substance. In the vicinity of the Dead Sea, even at the present time, deposits of sulphur are being formed. Blankenheim (ZDPV, 1896) believes that this formation is due to the action of bituminous matter upon gypsum, as these two substances are found associated with each other in this district. Travelers going from Jericho to the Dead Sea may pick up lumps of sulphur, which are usually incrusted with crystals of gypsum. Dt 32 21 probably represents the present aspect of this region. That the inhabitants of the land had experienced the terrors of burning sulphur is very probable. Once one of these deposits took fire it would melt and run in burning streams down the ravines spreading everywhere suffocating fumes such as come from the ordinary brimstone match. No more realistic figure could be chosen to depict terrible suffering and destruction. It is not at all unlikely that during some of the disastrous earthquakes which took place in this part of the world, the hot lava sent forth ignited not only the sulphur, but also the bitumen, and added to the horrors of the destruction caused by burning pitch and brimstone.

The figurative sense of the word brimstone to denote punishment and destruction is illustrated by such passages as Dt 29 23; Job 18 15; Ps 11 6; Isa 30 33; Ezek 38 22; Lk 17 39; Rev 9 17.

BRING: נָשָׁה, דָאשָׁה = "to sprout"; "spring" (Gen 1 11 AV); יְנָשָׁה, shāran = "to wriggle," "swarm" (Gen 1 20 f.; 9 7; Ex 8 3); יָנָה, yaḥalath = "to bear," "beget" (Gen 3 16; 2 K 9 3; Job 15 35; 39 12); "what a day may bring forth," Prov 27 1; "before the decree bring forth," Zep 2 2; יָנָה, tanan = "to cloud over," "to darken (Gen 9 14); יָנָה, šahalath = "to send on," "to escort" (18 16); יָנָה, šaḥath = "to turn back," "bring back" (again, back again) (Isa 27 9); יָנָה, šaḥath = "to establish" (24 5, 6, 8; Job 10 9; Ps 66 22; "bring him back to see," Ecel 3 22; Zac 10 6, 10); יָנָה, nāḥash = "present," "adventure" (an argument) (I S 13 9; 15 32; 23 9; 30 7; "bring forth your strong reasons," Isa 41 21, 22); יָנָה, yāanath = "to do," "cause to be," "accomplice" (Ps 37 5); יָנָה, "daah = "to carry up," "exalt," "restore" (Gen 46 4; Ex 3 8, 17; 33 1); Ps 71 20; Rom 13 13); יָנָה, "lay hand upon," "reach to" (Lev 5 7); יָנָה, kāhbdath, or יָנָה, kāhbdēḵ = "to be heavy" (cause, "to make weighty"); "to be glorious" (Prov 4 8); יָנָה, kāna = "to bend the knee," hence "humiliate," "bring" (down, into subjection, under), "subdue" (Dt 9 3; Isa 25 5); יָנָה, zēkhar = "to mark," "call to, put (put in) remembrance" (Ps 38 10, 11, 17; Ps 101); יָנָה, ḥālādāh = "to flow," "bring" (esp. with pomp) (60 9; 68 29; 76 11; Zep 3 10); יָנָה, ḥāl, or יָנָה, hāl = "to writh in pain," "to be in travail" (Isa 66 8); יָנָה, qā'adh = "to step regularly," "march," "hurl!" (Job 18 18); יָנָה, ḥālādāh = "to walk," "get" (Hos 2 14); יָנָה, qā'adh = "be up," "increase" (9 12).
The NT employs τελεσφορά, telesphorós = "to bring to maturity," "to ripen" (Lk 8:14); ἀναμφίβολον, anamphíbolon = "to bring to mind," "suggest," "bring to remembrance" (Jn 14:26); δουλευύω, douléuúō (Acts 7:6). "broken" translates ἄλοχος = "brought up with" (13 1 RV, "the foster-brother of"); διασώκω, diasowc = "to save," "to care," "rescue" (32:24); ἀνθέω, anthéew = "to set aside," "cast off," "bring to naught" (1 Cor 1:19); κατάρχω, katárhc = "to abolish," "destroy," "do away," "put away," "cast out" (1:28); ἀπρομπότως = "to send forward," "to bring forward" (1 Cor 16 6 AV; Tit 3 13 AV; 3 Jn ver 6 AV); ἐκτέρπεω, ektérpeo = "to rear up to maturity," "to cherish," "to nourish" (Eph 6:4 AV). Frank E. Hirsch

BRINK, brink: ἄλοχος, alóchοs, or ἄλοχος, sepheth = "the lip," "margin," "bank," "edge" (Gen 41:3; Ex 2:3; 7:15); ἄλοπχος, kóchex, or ἄλοπχος, kóchex = "an extremity," "border," "brim" (Josh 3:15; Isa 19:7; Dn 12:5). See Bavn.

BROAD, brōd (בּרָד, brōd), "width;" בּרָד, brōd, "a broadway," "street," "court"; ἀρχέωμενος, archéwmenos, "spacious": Occurs frequently as a term of dimension (Ex 27:1; 1 K 6:6; Ex 40:6). AV "broad" long means "a width of strength" (Neh 3:8; Jer 51:58). The centers of communal life are called the "broad places," often rendered "streets" (Jer 5:1; Cant 3:2; Nah 2:4). A court before the temple: "the broad place on the east" (AV "the east street," 2 Ch 29:4); "broad places" (Nu 16:38,39, RV "beaten").

Figurative: Relief from distress: "Yea, he would have allured thee out of [Heb "the mouth of"] distress into a broad place!" (Job 35:16); the liberty of obedience or liberty within the law (Ps 119:96, "broad," "roomy," "at liberty"); the all-sufficiency of God for His people (Isa 33:21). Jesus could not boast of a river or navy—Jeh's presence with and within her would more than supply these deficiencies; the road to destruction: "Broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction" (Mt 7:13); the ostentatious piety of the Pharisees: "They make broad [παραπολεμῶν, parapolemôn, "widen"] their phylacteries" (Mt 23:5). See CITY: Gates.

BROAD PLACE. See CITY.

BROADER, broidérd: (1) הָרָהָב, haráháv, "variegation of color" (Ex 16:13,18; 26:19; 27:7,16,24); (2) גַּלַּחַ, galákh, "checkered stuff" (as reticulated). The high priest's garments consisted of "a breastplate, and an ephod, and a robe, and a broader coat [Ex 28:4 AV; RV "a coat of checker work"], a miter, and a girdle; (2) ניָדִים, niydím, "tinned or plated work" (1 Tim 2:9 AV). See BRANDED; EMBROIDERY.

BROKEN: brōk'kn. Occurs both as past part. of the vb. trd "to break" and as an adj. The former use will be dealt with here only so far as vbs. occur which are thus trd but do not present the non-participial forms. Such are: כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "bruised," "emasculated" (Lev 21:20); כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "to frustrate," hence "to break down" either by violence or by confusion and fear (1 S 2:19; Jer 37:20,39); דָּקַף, dākôt = "to collapse" (Ps 44:10; 51:8); כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "to crack in pieces," "to crush" (Eccl 12:6); כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "to bruise or violently strike," "break in pieces" (Isa 30:14); Jer 2:16 should evidently be rendered: "have grazed on the crown of thy head," instead of AV "have broken," etc. for כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "to tend a flock," "pasture," "graZe," but gives no hint of the meaning "to break"; כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "to arise," "depart" (Jer 37:11); כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "to dash together," "shatter" (Mt 21:44); כָּבֵד, kāvēd = "to dig through," "to extract," "to remove" (Mk 2:4). See BREAK. Frank E. Hirsch BROKENFOOTED, brōk'kn-foo'ted; shebheber reg'el: In Lev 21:19, one of the blemishes which prevented a man of priestly descent from the execution of the priestly office.

BROKENHANDED, brōk'kn-land'ed; shebheber yād'h: In Lev 21:19 one of the blemishes which prevented a man of priestly descent from the execution of the priestly office.

BROKENHEARTED, brōk'kn-hār-ted (בּהֵרֵשׁ, bēresh, "shabbār lebb; σοφορομένος την καρδίαν, sun- tetrimménoi tôn kardían), Ps 69:20 AV; Isa 61:1; Lk 4:18 AV; "of a broken heart," Ps 34:18; "broken in heart," 147:3): People who feel their spiritual bankruptcy and helplessness, and who long for the help and salvation of God. Such people are in the right condition to be met, blessed by God. Cf "of contrite spirit" (Ps 34:18; Isa 66:2).

BROOCH, brōch (בּרוּצָה, bōtā; Hebrew word for the Jewish "bracelet") for a class of "jewels of gold" brought as offerings by both men and women of Israel (Ex 26:9; Brooches, as Mackie says, is oriental. The Hebrew word means most likely nose-rings. See BACELET; RING.

BROOK, brōk (בּרדָה, bōdāh; יָעַס, yā'as, "aphik, הָדָּשׁ, hadash, y'or, לְבִנָּא, levina, מִיכָהֵל, mikhā'el; χειμορραχ, cheimorrhus): In Pal there are few large streams. Of the smaller ones only may flow only during the winter, or after a heavy rain. The commonest Heb word for brook is nāhab, which is also used for rīver and for valley, and it is not always clear whether the valley or the stream in the valley is meant (Nu 13:23; Dl 2:15; 2 S 15:29). The Arab. wādī, which is sometimes referred to in this connection, is not an exact ʒ, for while it may be used of a dry valley or of a valley containing a stream, it means the valley and not the stream, "Aphik and y'or are trδ both "brook" and "river," y'or being generally used of the Nile (Ex 4:22, etc.), though in Dn 12:5-7, of the Tigris. Cheimorrhus, "winter-flowing," is applied in Jn 18:1 to the Kidron. Many of the streams of Pal which are commonly called rivers would in other countries be called brooks, but in such a dry country any perennial stream assumes a peculiar importance.

BROOK OF EGYPT, THE (בּרָדָה, nāhab = "a flowing stream," "a valley"); best trδ by the oriental word wady, which means, as the Heb word does, both a stream and its valley): The Brook of Egypt is mentioned six times in the OT (Nu 34:5; Josh 16:44; 1 K 8:65; Isa 27:12); once, Gen 15:18, by another word, μνή, nāhār. The Brook of E. was not an Egy stream at all, but a little desert stream near the borderland of Egypt, a wady of the desert, and, perhaps, the dividing line between Canaan and Egypt. It is usually identified with the Wady el 'Arish of modern geography.

The Brook of E. comes down from the plateau et Tih in the Sinai peninsula and falls into the Mediterranean Sea at lat. 31 5 N., long. 33

2. Descrip - 42 E. Its source is at the foot of the tion central mountain group of the peninsula. The upper portion of the wady is some 400 ft. above the sea. Its course, with one sharp bend to the W. in the upper part, runs nearly due N. along the western slope of the plateau. Its whole course of 140 miles lies through the desert. These streams in the Sinai peninsula are usually dry water-courses, which at times become raging rivers, but are very seldom babbling "brooks." The floods are apt to come with little or no warning when cloudbursts occur in the mountain region drained.

The use of the Heb word nahal for this wady points to a curious and most interesting and important piece of archaeological evidence on the critical question of the origin of the Pent. In the Pent, the streams of Egypt are designated by an Egyptian word ("SN, y"ör) which belongs to Egypt, as the word bəyōn does to the lower Mississippi valley, while every other stream mentioned, not excepting this desert stream, "the Brook of E.," is designated by one or other of two Heb words, nahal and nāḥār.

Each of these words occurs 13 times in the Pent, but never of the streams of Egypt. The use of nāḥār in Ex 7:19 in the account of the plagues is not really an exception for the word is then used generically in contrast with y"ör to distinguish between the "flowing streams," rōḥāth, and the sluggish irrigation branches of the Nile, y"orrīm, "canals" (cf. Canals) (Isa 19:6; 33:21), while y"ör occurs 30 times but never of any other than the streams of Egypt. There is thus a most exact discrimination in the use of these various words, a discrimination which is found alike in P, J, and E of the documentary theory, and also where R is supposed to have altered the documents. Such discrimination is scarcely credible on the hypothesis that the Pent is by more than one author, in later than Mosaic times, or that it is by any author without Egyptian training. The documentary theory which requires these instances of the use of these various words for "river" to have been recorded by several different authors or redactors, in different ages and all several cents, after the Exodus, far away from Egypt, and opportunities for accurate knowledge of its language, seems utterly incom-

The author, just as any foreign religious writer might with propriety speak of the "streams of Louisiana," though a Louisiana would certainly call them "bayous." How does the author come to use y"ör even where his native Heb words might have been used appropriately? Why never, where its appropriateness is even doubtful, not even saying y"ör for nahal of the "Brook of E.?" It is not art, but experience, in the use of a language which gives such skill as to attend to so small a thing in so extensive use without a single mistake. The only time and place at which such experience in the use of Egyptian words is to be expected in Israel is among the people of the Exodus not long subsequent to that event.

BROTH, broth (םָדָר, mərāḵ): Equivalent to our "soup." When Gideon (Jgs 6:19) made ready a kid, "the flesh he put in a basket," but, it is added, "he put the broth in a pot!" and he is told the angel to "pour out the broth" (ver 20). Isaiah (65:4) makes Jeh speak of rebellious Israel as "a people that provoke me to my face continually sacrificing in gardens, and adds in description "a pot of live flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels" (מָדָר, pārāḵ). See Food.

BROTHEL, brot·həl (רָדָן, ṭôrān): Used extensively in both OT and NT of other relations and relationships, and expanding under Christ's teaching to include the universal brotherhood of man. Chiefly employed in the natural sense, as of Cain and Abel (Gen 4:8); of Joseph and his brethren (Gen 42:3); of Peter and Andrew, of James and John (Mt 10:2). Of other relationships: (1) Abram's nephew, Lot, is termed "brother" (Gen 14:14); (2) Moses' fellow-countrymen are "brethren" (Ex 2:11; Acts 3:22; cf. He 7:5); (3) a member of the same tribe (2 S 19:12); (4) an ally (Am 1:9), or an allied or cognate people (Nu 20:14); (5) used of common discipleship or the kinship of humanity (Mt 23:8); (6) of moral likeness or kinship (Prov 19:8); (7) of friends (Job 6:15); (8) an equal in rank or office (1 K 3:3), or homophous of the same faith (Acts 11:29; 1 Cor 15:11); (10) a favorite oriental metaphor used to express likeness or similarity (Job 30:29, "I am a brother to jackals"); (11) a fellow-priest or office-bearer (Est 3:2); Paul called Sosthenes of "brother" (1 Cor 1:1) and Timothy his spiritual son and associate (2 Cor 1:12); a brother-man, any member of the human family (Mt 7:3–5; He 2:17; 8:11; 1 Jn 2:20); (13) signifies spiritual kinship (Matt 12:50); (14) a term adopted by the early disciples and Christians to express their fraternal love for each other in Christ, and universally adopted as the language of love and brotherhood in His Kingdom in all subsequent time (2 Pet 3:15; Col 4:7–9.15). The granting conception of mankind as a brotherhood is the outcome of this Christian view of believers as a household, a family (Eph 2:19; 3:15; cf. Acts 17:26). Jesus has made "neighbor" equivalent to "brother," and the sense of fraternal affection and obligation essential to human, and convivial, and cohesive with the world. The rabbis distinguished between "brother" and "neighbor," applying "brother" to Israelites by blood, "neighbor" to proselytes, but allowing neither title to the Gentiles. Christ and the apostles gave the same love "by the bond of Christ, and "neighbor" to all the world (1 Cor 15:11; Lk 10:29 ff). The missionary passion and aggressiveness of the Christian church is the natural product of this Christian conception of man's true relation to man. See also Family Relationships.

Dwight M. Pratt

BROTHERHOOD, brarth·ər·hood (the rare occurrence of the term (only Zac 11:14 and 1 Pet 2:17) in contrast with the abundant use of "brother," "brethren," seems to indicate that the sense of the vital relation naturally called for the most concrete expression. In 1 Pet 3:17 the abstract is used for the concrete. In the OT the brotherhood of all Israelites was emphasized; but in the NT the brotherhood in Christ is a relation so much deeper and stronger as to eclipse the other. See also Brother; Brethren.

BROTHER-IN-LAW, See Relationships, Family.

BROTHERLY, brarth·ər·li (םָדָר, ṭôrān), "brother," phil·a·dē·phi·a, phil·a·de·phi·a), "brotherly love"): Like a brother in all the large human relationships indicated above; e.g. the early friendly and fraternal alliance between Tyre and Israel as illustrated by "brotherly covenant" between David and Solomon, and Hiram, king of Tyre (2 S 5:11; 1 K 5:12), and repudiated in a later generation by the treachery of Tyre (Am 1:9). See Brotherly Kindness (Love).

BROTHERLY KINDNESS, kind·nes (AV 2 Pet 1:7), or LOVE (AV Rom 12:10; 1 These 4:9; He 13:1; phil·a·dē·phi·a, phil·a·de·phi·a): In 1. As Moral RV, "love of the brethren" in all ideal places, and so in AV of 1 Pet 1:22, thus defining the disposition as love, and its objects as brethren. Since God is Father and men are His sons, they are therefore brethren of one another. As sonship is the most essential factor in man's right relation to God, so is brotherhood in his relation to his fellow-man. Brotherhood is first known as the relation between sons of the same parent, a relation of tender affection and benevolence. It becomes gradually extended to kindred, and to members of the same tribe or nation. And the Christian ideal of society is that a similar relation should exist between all men without limit or distinction. ἀδελφός, "love" (see Charity), is the word in the NT that generally denotes this idea, "I shall love thee neighbor as thyself." In the second sense of conduct as between man and man (Mt 22:39–40); and neighbor includes every man within one's reach (Lk 10:29 ff), even enemies (Mt 5:44; Lk 6:35). Without the love of man, the love of God is imperfect. "That abideth in love abideth in God" (1 Jn 4:16.20).

But man's sonship to God may be potential or actual. He may not respond to God's love or know His Fatherhood. Likewise love to man may not be reciprocated, and therefore may be incomplete. Yet, it is the Christian's duty, like God, to maintain his disposition of love and to be benevolent to those that hate and curse him (Lk 6:27–28). But within the Christian community, love should respond to love, and find its fulfillment, for there all men are, or should be, God's sons actually, "because the love of God hath been shed abroad in our hearts, through the Holy Spirit which was given unto us" (Rom 5:5). And this mutual love within the Christian brotherhood (1 Pet 5:9) is called philadelphia.

This twofold ideal of social morality as universal benevolence and mutual affection had been foreshadowed by the love of the wise man (Ecc 10:20 ff).

3. Stoic Teaching an attitude of justice and mercy toward all men, even slaves; but within the community of the "wise" there should be the mutual affection of friendship. Christianity succeeded in organizing and realizing in intense and practical fellowship, the ideal that remained vague and abstract in the Gr. schools: "See how these Christians love one another." It was their Master's example followed, and His commandment and promise fulfilled: "Love one another . . . as I have loved you . . .; by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples" (Jn 13:34-35). Paul in his earliest epistles bears witness that the Thessalonians practise love "toward all the brethren that are in all Macedonia," even as they had been taught of God, but urges them to "abound more and more" (1 Thes 4:9-10). For the healing of differences, and to build up the church in a Christian order and unity, he urges the Romans advance on "in love of the brethren (to be tenderly) Heathen affectioned one to another" (Rom 12: 10). Christians must even forgive one another in love (Eph 4: 2) and "walk in love, even as Christ also loved you" (Eph 5:2; Phil 2:1.2). It involves some suffering and sacrifice. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes "love of the brethren" and urges them that it may continue (He 13:1). It is the direct result of regeneration, of purity and obedience to the truth (1 Pet 2:23). It proceeds from godliness and issues in love (2 Pet 1:7). Love of the brethren is the one practical topic by John's epistles. It is the message heard from the beginning, "that we should love one another" (1 Jn 3:11). It is the test of light and darkness (2:10); and life and death (3:14). Children of God or circling the oil (3:10; 4:7-12). Yet, if there can be no knowledge or love of God (4:20), but when men love God and obey Him, they necessarily love His children (5:2). No man can be of God's family, unless his love extends to all its members.

BROW, brou: Is found in Isa 48:4, "thy brow brasse", as the tr of הַמַּעַד, mēḥād, meaning "to be clear," i.e. conspicuous. In Lk 4:29 "led him unto the brow of the hill" is the rendering of ὁφρός, ophōrēs, lit. "the eyewr,, but used throughout Gr. lit. as any prominent point or projection of land (use of supercilium in Verg. Georg. 1.108).

BROWN, See Colors.

BRUISE, bruōs, BRUSAED, bruōd: The noun occurs in Isa 1:6 AV, "bruises and puttingry sores," as the tr of בָּזָל, bāzāl. The vb. is a number of Heb. words, the principal ones being (1) בָּזָל, bazāl, "bruised" (Gen 3:15 [bīs]); (2) בָּזָל, bāzāl (Isa 28:28 [bīs] [AV "ground," "and though the wheel of his cart and his horses scatter it, he doth not grind it"] for the AV "nor break it with the wheels of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen"); (3) בָּזָל, bāzāl, "daddhā\[d, in the classical passage, Isa 53:6, "He was bruised for our iniquities," ver 10, "Yet is pleased Jeho to bruise him"]; (4) בָּזָל, bāzāl, "A bruised reed shall he not break," Isa 42:3 (quoted in Mt 12:20).

In the NT bruise is the tr of σπαραγεῖν, sparassō, "to rend" (AV "bruising him sorely") Lk 9:39; of σπαραγεῖν, suntrōbō, "to break to pieces" (Mt 12:20); "shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom 10:17); of ἱδρατωρόν, in Lk 4:18 in the quotation from Isa 58:6, "to set at liberty them that are bruised" (WH omits the verse).

A. J. Hunt

BRUT, bruō, BRUTISH, bruōtia: A word no longer in common use (marked "archaic" and "obsolete" by Murray), signifying a rumor or report. The word occurs in AV Jer 10:22 (RV "rumour"); AV "tiding") and AV Nah 3:10 (RV "bruit," app. "report," AV "report").

BRUTE, bruōt, BRUTISH, bruōtia: "stupid"; ἅλογος, ἅλος, "without speech," hence irrational, unreasonable [Acts 25:27; 2 Pet 2:12; Jude ver 10 AV]: The man who denies God acts in an irrational way. Such persons are described as brutish (Ps 49:10; 92:6; 94:8; Jer 10:14, 21; 51:17). These are stupid, unteachable. This is a graphic description of the atheist. The proverb, "No fool like the learned fool," is esp. true of the ignorance of the unbeliever of the Scriptures. Their objections to the Bible, as a rule, are utterly ridiculous. The word is occasionally used in the sense of thoughtless ignorance. Brutish counsel is counseled that is foolish, unreasonable (Isa 19:11). The term is used by Agur (Prov 30:2) to express the low estimate he has of himself and his conscious lack of knowledge.

BUBASTIS, bū-bā'stis. See PI-RESHEST.

BUCKET, buk'et (בּתֵ, dāśī): The word is found only in Isa 40:15; Nu 24:7, in the latter passage as a fig. use. The bucket was doubtless a water-skin with two cross-pieces at the top to fit it for use in drawing water, like those now in use in Pal. The ordinary word for water-skin is a different one (נָדָד).

BUCKLE, buk'1 (περίγρας, pi̇rē̇grē̇s): As a mark of favor Jonathan Maccabaeus was presented by Alexander Balas with a buckle of gold (1 Macc 10:89), the wearing of which was restricted to the blood royal. The buckle was used for fastening the mantle or outer robe on the shoulder or chest.

BUCKLER, buk'1: God is called a "buckler" (RV "shield") to them that trust Him (Ps 18:20; 2 S 22:31; Prov 2:7). See Aman.
BUD. See Flower.

BUFFALO, buf’a-dö. See Cattle.

BUFFET, buf’et 1. kola’di-ka, kolaphýsa, “to beat with the fist”: 1. to bodily maltreatment and violence: “Then did they beat him in his face and buffet him” (Mt 26:67; Mk 14:65; 1 Cor 4:11; 1 Pet 2:20). Paul speaks of "a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me" (2 Cor 12:7). Used 5xg. of our Selves: "I buffet [AV ‘keep under’, RVV ‘bear up by self-control’] my body, and bring it into bondage." (1 Cor 9:27). The Gr. in this passage reads ἀπεισάθη, ἀπεισοδιάζησις, "to give a blow beneath the eye." In Lk 18:5 the same word is rendered "wear out": "Let her wear me out by her continual coming’ (AV ‘weary me’, RV ‘bruise me’); (see Pape’s Lex., s.v.).

BUGEAN, bû-jé-an, bû-jé-an (Bougâios, Bou- gâlos): An epitaph given to Haman in Apos, Ad Eas (18 6, RV; AV has ‘Agagite’).

BUILD, bûld, BUILDING, bûld’ing (יָבֵד, bânâh, יָכִין, bîynâh, once [Ezk 41:13]; οἰκοδομέω, oikodo- mēô: The building conditions ex- isting at the time of the Heb con- ditions were rude and untutored, and, 1. a part of the work of the Solomon period, there was still little or no effort made to introduce a higher state, until the time when Gr influence began to be felt (cir 3rd cent. BC). In localities where stone was not available, mud bricks were used, and their perishable nature being realized, stone slab facing came into use. These slabs were a protection against the weather and had no constructive value. Probably the hand of the "jerry" builder can be seen in an attempt to make such mud construction appear to be solid stone. In stone localities buildings were of stone, but the class of building was only that of the rude stone waller. Random rubble masonry, 2. Masonry unskilfully laid, was the prevailing characteristic. Occasionally a piece of carefully dressed masonry is found, but it is the exception and is often a re-use of an earlier type akin to "sawed stone" (1 K 7:9). The re- mains of Jewish walls of the period of the early kings in Jerusalem skill which does not appear to have existed elsewhere. The boss and margin stones, with wide mud joint, were, in part, the actual masonry of the early fortifications, and were re-used and imitated over and over again. The type crops up in feeble imitation at different sites throughout the country, but hammer-picked and rough hammer-dressed stones are also common. The fine comb pick and marginal dressing of the walls of the Temple area belong to the Herodian period (see Bless and Dickie, "Excavations at Jeru- salem," 273 ff, PEFS, 1898). The absence of line is a striking characteristic. There is no distinctive type which can be named exclusively Jewish, although there is good reason for believing that the boss and margin type has a Jewish origin. Wilson (Golgotha, 124) points out that the projecting bosses had a defensive value, in breaking the force of the battering-ram, and here again the nec- essity of defense shows its vitality in the exist- ence of such a well-engineered detail. The absence of the hammer quoining of building craft can be traced to the same source. Foundations of fortifications were usually on rock which was sometimes squared for a bed, but more often leveled up with small stones. A peculiar type of Jerusa- lem, certainly late (5th cent. AD), was laid on a foundation of small rubble rest- ing on debris, accumulated over an earlier wall.

(See Plate IV, Excavations at Jerusalem, p. 29.) In smaller buildings, the foundations were usually laid on the debris of earlier structures. At Lachish and brick walls were laid on a foundation of stone. A peculiar method of spreading a layer of sand under the foundations was also noted (see A Mound of Many Cities, 125-26).

The mission wall of today is less rudely built and is bedded in lime mortar. It is a broad wall usually about 3 ft. thick, with inner and outer faces of large stones, filled in between with small rubble without proper bond, somewhat in the manner of an ancient building. To make up for the want of bond, it is a common habit to insert a piece of steel joint across the return angle (see Beam). The building and masonry methods, in all probability, are the same as they were in early Jewish times. Hewers sit at their work, with the plane of the stone on which they operate, lying obliquely from them. Stones are conveyed from the quarry, if at a distance from the building site, on donkeys, thence on men’s backs to the top of the wall, by rude gangs. Every man digs his "own cistern" (Iss 36:16), which is sunk in the rock under the site of the house, and used as a quarry from which stones for the building are supplied. If water is scarce, the cistern is sunk first, and the water therefrom is required to water the work of the day, and provide the necessary water for the building.

To build up is often used in the sense of giving increase and prosperity, or of establishing and strengthening. Thus in Job 22:23; Ps 18:35, the word "build up" means to restore what was decayed, as in Isa 68:12. To "build an house" for a person is to grant him children or a numerous posterity (Ruth 4:11; of David, 2 S 7:27; 1 Ch 17:10). Spiritual work can be "built up" in Christ (Col 2:7), and are exhorted to build themselves up on their most holy faith (Jude ve 20). See Architecture; House; Foundation.

BUILDER, bûld’er (יָבֵד, bânâh; οἰκοδομεῖν, oikodo- mēô, τιθνήτα, technētēs): "To build," "builder," etc. are in the OT commonly the tr of bânâh, "to build," occurring very frequently; see Build, Building. The lit. significance leads also to several fig. applications, esp. to God as Divine Builder (1) as establishing, e.g. the nation (Ps 69:35; 102:16; Jer 12:16), the throne of David (Ps 89:4), Jesus (147:2); (2) in restoration—rebuiding (Isa 1:1; 24:4; 60:21; Jer 31:4.28; 42:10; Ezk 36:36; Am 9:11; cf Acts 15:16); (3) as establishing in prosperity (Job 22:23; 1 S 2; 35; Jer 24:6; cf Gen 16:2). RVM, Heb, "be built by her"; (4) the firm es- tablishment of the Divine attributes (Ps 89:5); (5) Divine opposition (Lam 3:5, "He hath built against me"); of Job 19:8; (6) the choosing of a corner-stone which the builders rejected (Ps 118:22:22), quoted by Christ (Mt 21:42; Mk 12:10; Lk 20:14); Peter (Acts 4:11), the NT Christians are represented as being (1) built (1 Cor 3:9.16) on Christ as the one foundation (Mt 16:18, on Jesus as the Christ; 1 Pet 2 57; Acts 9:31 RVM; Rom 15:20; 1 Cor
BUKKI, buk'î (בּוּקִי, bukkî, “mouth of Jah”): (1) A Danite, son of the tribal prince Jogli (Nu 34:22); he was one of the representative chiefs who assisted in the division of the land. (2) Son of Abishua and father of Izai, a priest, fourth in descent from Aaron, in the line of Eleazar (1 Ch 6:551), and ancestor of Ezra (Ezr 7:4). In 2 Esd 1:2 the name appears as Borchith, and in 1 Esd 5:2 as Bocceas.

BUKKAH, buk'kâ (בּוּקָא, bukká, “proved of God”): A Levite, son of Heman (1 Ch 25:4.13). See Bukkker.

BUL, bu'l (בּוּל, bûl): Name of the 8th month of the Jewish year (1 K 6:38). It is of Phoen origin and signifies the month of rain, the beginning of the rainy season. See Calendar.

BUNAH, bûn'â (בּוּנָה, bunăh): A son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2:25).

BUNCH, bûnch: Is used of (1) a “bunch of hyssop” (Ex 12:22, בּוּן, bûn, “aghudath”); (2) a “cluster of raisins” (2 S 16:1 AV, 1 Ch 12:40 AV בּוּן, bûn, “ガラニシ=something dried or shriveled”); (3) a “camel’s hump” (Isa 30:6 AV בּוּן, bûn, “dobbesheth”): of obscure etymology.

BUNDLE, bûn’dl: Represents in EV the words בּוּנית, bûnî’t, בּונתי, bûntî, בונטי, bûntî; of Bani):

(1) A Levite (Neh 9:4). The repetition of Bani’s name in this passage is probably a scribal error. The Syr version for the second “Bani” reads “Binniu;” but as, in 10:9 and 12:8, Binnui’s name comes as here, between those of Jeshua and Kadmiel, we may have a variant here for the first Bani. The LXX renders all three names as if the Heb in each case had been בּונת, bûnt, “sons of,” reducing the proper names in the ver to five. The names probably stand for chief Levitical houses rather than individuals.

(2) Another Levite, one of the overseers of the temple, father of Hashabiah, according to Neh 11:15; but, according to 1 Ch 9:14, Hashabiah is “of the sons of Merari.” The reading in Neh is a corruption of the one in Ch. H. J. Wolf.

(1) בּוּשֶׁה, masâd, “from a root בונת, masâd, “he lifted up.” Thus lit. any load is called masâd (Ex 15:14; Nu 4:15; Ezr 2:25; 7:23). In the 3:9). Figuratively, people are a burden OT (Nun 11:17; Dt 1:12; 2 S 15:33; 19:35). A man may be a burden to himself (Job 7:20). Iniquities are a burden (Ps 38:4).

(2) Taxes may be a burden (Hos 14:4). In both AV and RV massa’s is tr’id “burden,” as applied to certain prophetic utterances; but both ARVm and RVm have “oracle.” Examples are Isa 13:1; 14:28, and often; Jer 23:33-36.65, no marginal reading; Ezek 12:10; Nah 1:1; Hab 1:1; Zec 9:1; 12:1; Mal 1:1. As was natural under the circumstances, some oracles usually denounced judgment upon people or race. Hence probably the tr “burden.” But some of these prophetic utterances do not contain denunciation or threat (Zec 13). The passage in Jer, moreover, implies that the prophet used the term in the sense of “oracle,” for scoffers are reproved for perverting the word and giving it the meaning “burden.” Massâd, therefore, means something taken up with solemnity upon the lips, with the connotation of speech, or the rendering, “burden,” ought most likely to be given up.

The word בּוּשֶׁה, masâd, of the same derivation as massa’s, is applied to foolish oracles (Lam 2:14 AV, oracles ARVm, burdens ARVm, burdens RV, oracles RV, Am 5:11, burdens AV, excisions ARVm and RV). Massâd is used also in Prov 30:1 and 31:1, and is variously rendered prophecy (AV), oracle (ARVm), burden, or the name of the speaker’s country (RVm, ARVm), oracle (RV). The rendering is doubtful, but probably the reference is to the speaker’s country—“Jachin, of Massa.” (cf Gen 26:14), “Lemuel king of Massa.”

(3) Other words tr’id “burden” are from the root בּוּשֶׁה,keesha’, “to bear a load” (Neh 4:17; Ps 51:6; 1 K 11:29; RVm, charge AV, labor ARVm and RV, burden ARVm and RVm, Ex 5:45; 6:6; Isa 10:27; 14:24).

In the NT several Gr words mean “burden.”

(1) βάρος, bâros, “something heavy.” Burdens of the day (Mt 20:12), the burden of duty to be borne, a difficult requirement (Mt 20:29). The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with Jech thy God,” or perhaps better, “in the bundle of the living in the care of Jech”—an assurance of perfect safety.

J. R. Van Felt
something to be borne, whether heavy or light, whilst baros may be an oppressive load. According to Lightfoot baros may suggest a load of which a man may rightly feel ashamed, a burden not to be shouldered, but phobos, a burden which he is expected to bear, as every soldier carries his own pack. But most likely too much weight should not be given to these distinctions. (3) There is also the word phos, phanos, "the freight" of a ship (Acts 21 3); cf Synos, orqos, weight or encumbrance which impedes the runner's progress to the goal (He 12 1), with particular reference to the superfluous flesh which an athlete seeks to get rid of in training (cf 1 Cor 9 24-27), and fig. what hinders the overall development of Christian manhood. VI. PLACES OF BURIAL: HOW MARKED

LITERATURE

It is well to recall at the outset that there are points of likeness and of marked contrast between oriental and occidental burial customs in general, as well as between the burial customs of ancient Israel and those of other ancient peoples. These will be brought out, or suggested later in this art.

I. IMMEDIATE BURIAL CONSIDERED URGENT—The burial of the dead in the East in general was and is attended in such a way as to suggest to the westerner indescribably and the ceremonies in this respect attended by the dead to remain long in the houses of the living, explain what seems to us the indecency of haste. Dr. Post says that burial among the people of Syria today seldom takes place later than ten hours after death, often earlier; but, he adds, "the rapidity of decomposition, the excessive violence of grief, the reluctance of Orientals to allow the dead to remain long in the houses of the living, explain what seems to us the indecency of haste." This still requires the survival, as in the case of Abraham on the death of Sarah, to bury their dead out of their sight (Gen 23 1-4); and it in part explains the quickness with which the bodies of Nadab and Abihu were carried out of the camp (Lev 10 4), and those of Ananias and Sapphira were hastened off to burial (Acts 5 1-11).

Then, of course, the dejection to which contact with a dead body gave occasion, and the judgment that might come upon a house for harboring the body of one dying under a Divine judgment, further explain such urgency and haste.

It was in strict accordance with such customs and the provision of the Mosaic law (Dt 21 23; cf Gal 3 13), as well as in compliance with the impulses of true humanity, that Joseph of Arimathaea went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus for burial on the very day of the crucifixion (Mt 27 39 ff).

The dead are often in their graves, according to present custom, within two or three hours after death. Among oriental Jews burial takes place, if possible, within four hours after death, and frequently on the day of death. Likewise Mohammedans bury their dead on the day of death, if death takes place in the morning; but if in the afternoon or at night, not until the following day.

As soon as the breath is gone the oldest son, or failing him, the nearest of kin present, closes the eyes of the dead (cf Gen 46 4, "and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes, and thou shalt die," the mouth and the jaws are bound up (cf Jn 11 44, "and his face was bound about with a napkin"). The death is announced, as it was of old, by a tumult of lamentation preceded by a shrill cry, and the weeping and wailing of professional mourners (cf Mk 5 38 ff). See Mourning.

II. PREPARATIONS FOR BURIAL—These are often informal and hasty. Under the tyranny of such customs as those noted, it is often impossible to make them elaborate. Informal and Hasty take place at latest on the evening of the day of death, and frequently at night, there can be no elaborate preparations. The corpse, dressing in such clothes as were worn in life, is stretched on a bier with a cloth thrown over it, until carried forth for burial" (Eastern Customs, 94). In Acts 5 6 we read of Ananias, "The young men . . . wrapped him round, and they carried him out and were buried him" (cf Jn 19 38-40; cf Dr. Nicoll says, "was likely this: they unfastened his girdle, and then taking the loose under-garment and the wide cloak which was worn above it, used them as a winding-sheet to cover the corpse from head to foot". In other words, there was little ceremony and much haste.

Usually, however, there was more ceremony and more time taken. Missionaries and natives of Syria tell us that it is still customary in such places to anoint it with aromatic ointments while the body was lying in state (cf Jn 11 44b), and cover the face and head and anoint it with a handkerchief (Jn 11 44b). It is still common to place in the wrappings of the body aromatic spices and other preparations to retard decomposition. Thus the friends at Bethany prepared the body of Lazarus, and he came forth wrapped in grave-bandages and with a napkin bound about his face. And, we are further told that after the burial of Jesus, Nicodemus brought "a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds," and that they "took the body of Jesus, and bound it in spicery, with cloths with the spices, as the custom of the Jews is to bury," and that Mary Magdalene and two other women brought spices for the same purpose (Jn 19 39-40; Mk 16 1; Lk 24 1), swathe bands and feet in grave-bandages, usually of linen (Jn 11 44a), and cover the face and head and anoint it with a handkerchief (Jn 11 44b). This was a very old custom is witnessed by such passages as 2 Ch 16 14, where it is said that Asa, the king, was laid "in the bed which was filled with sweet odors and divers kinds of spices prepared by the perfumers' art" (cf Jn 11 57; Sir 35 18). From Acts 5 6; 8 2 it appears that there was in later times a confraternity of young men whose business it was to attend to these proprieties and preparations on behalf of the dead; but it was probably only in exceptional cases that they were called upon, as in the case of a young man, and it has been now that they have been, according to the exception, and as such is still attended, as they do now, upon loving relatives and friends, and mostly women, among the Jews as well as among the Greeks. The practice among the Greeks, both by similarity and contrast, affords an interesting illustration. The following instance is aptly cited in DB (art. "Burial"): Eleazar went to visit his uncle, who was buried in the sepulchral urn (Sop. Electra 1136-52), addresses him thus: "Woe is me! These loving hands have not washed or decked thy corpse, nor taken, as was meet, their sad burden from the flaming pyre. At the hands of strangers, haply, or thou hast been too late; and so art come to us, a little dust in a narrow urn."

This brings us to note two marked contrasts between customs in Israel and among other peoples.

1. With the Greeks it was customary to cremate the dead (see between Cremaston); but there was nothing Jewish in Jewish practice exactly corresponding to this. Tacitus (Hist. v.5) expressly says, in noting the contrast with Rom custom, that it was a matter of piety with the Jews "to bury rather than to burn dead bodies." The burning of the bodies of Saul and his sons by the men of Jabesh-Gilead (1 S 31:11-13) seems to have been rather a case of afiting demonstration of conformity to such custom, as the charred bones were buried by the same men under the tamarisk at Jabesh, and later, by David's order, removed and laid to rest in the sepulcher of Kish (2 S 21:12-14). According to the Mosaic law, burning was reserved, either for the living who had been found guilty of unnatural sins (Lev 20:4; 21:9), or for those who died under a curse, as in the case of Achan and his family, who--after they had been stoned to death, with all their belongings, burned with fire (Josh 7:25).

2. As the burning practised by the Greeks found no place in Jewish law and custom, so embalming, as practised by the Egyptians, was unknown in Israel, the cases of Jacob and Joseph being clearly special, and in conformity to Egypt custom under justifying circumstances. When Jacob died it was Joseph, the Egyptians, who "commanded his servants to embalm his father" (Gen 50:2), and it was conventionally the fitting thing that when Joseph himself died his body was embalmed and "put in a coffin (sarcophagus) in Egypt" (Gen 50:26).

III. On the Way to the Grave.—When the preparations were made and the time came, the corpse was carried to the grave on a bier, or litter (πρῦνος, mithith). Coffins were unknown in ancient Israel, as they are among the Jews of the East to this day. The only one mentioned in the Bible is the sarcophagus in which the embalmed body of Joseph was preserved, unless Assai's bed (2 Ch 16:14) be another, as some think. No. elms, like eastern Jews, never use Coffins. The bier sometimes has a pole at each corner by means of which it is carried on the shoulders to the tomb. See Bier.

The procession of mourners is made up largely, of course, of relatives and friends of the deceased, but is led by professional mourners, who make the air resound with their shrieks and lamentations (cf Eed 12:5; Jer 9:17; Am 5:16). See Mourners. Am 5:16 alludes to this custom in describing the mourning that shall be over the desolations of Israel: "Wailing shall be in all the broad ways; and they shall say in all the streets, Alas! alas! and they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skilled in laying them down to be dead and his ashes breaks out: "Call for the mourning women, that they may come; . . . and let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that our eyes may run down with tears, and our eyelids gush out with waters." Dr. Fred, Blish tells of a mourn ing delegation at the mokah, or mourning house, of a great man. "No matter how truly they may be charging as they approach, when they reach the house they rush forward, handkerchiefs to face, sobbing, weeping, with utmost demonstrations of grief, going through them time after time as occasion requires.

Ameila B. Edwards gives a vivid account of her first experience with such mourning: "It rose like the far-off wawering sound of many owls. It shrilled, swelled, waved, dropt, and then died away, like the mourning of the wind at sea." We never heard anything so wild and plaintive."

Among some Jews of today, it is said, the funeral procession moves swiftly, because there are supposed to be innumerable evil spirits (shedhim) hovering about, desirous to attack the soul, which is thought to be in the body until interment takes place and the corpse is actually covered (see DB, art. "Burial").

IV. At the Grave.—When the grave, or place of entombment, is reached ceremonies more or less characteristic and peculiar to the place begin.

1. Graves. In the Orient take place. When the body (Dug in the earth) is laid down into the ground, the bier, of course, is set aside, and at first a heap of stones only is piled over the shallow grave—to preserve the dead from the dreaded depredations of hyenas, jackals or thieves.

Beyond question graves among ancient Jews were often simply dug in the earth, as they are with us, and as they are with Jews at Jerusalem and elsewhere in the East today.

But originally, it would seem to have been customary for each family to have a family tomb; either a natural cave, prepared with stone shelves to receive the bodies, or else hewn out of rock in the hillsides, each tomb, or sepulcher, having many niches for the relatives, or descendants of the family, who wished to be buried with their ancestors.

Many generations of a family could thus be placed in the ancestral tomb. Countless numbers of such tombs are to be found all over Pal, but Machpelah, of course, is the chief example (Gen 23).

Compare the cases of Joshua buried in his inheritance at Timnath-sareh (Josh 21:30), Samuel in his house at Ramah (1 S 25:1), Jesus in his native town of Nazareth, in the wilderness (1 K 2:34), Manasseh in the garden of his house (2 K 21:18), Josiah in the same tomb, it would seem, as his father and grandfather (2 K 23:30; Jer 9:17), which breaks out: "Call for the mourning women, that they may come; . . . and let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that our eyes may is quite different—burying-places of Moslem, Jewish and Christian peoples, while distinct from each other, are community rather than family burying-places.

3. Sealed Stones

When the tomb was a cave, or was dug out from some rock, the entrance was often closed with a large circular stone set up on its edge or rim and rolled in its groove to the front of the mouth of the tomb, so as to close it securely. This stone was then often further secured by a strap, or by sealing. In such case it could easily be seen or known if the tomb had been disturbed. Pilate, it will be recalled, directed that the tomb of Joseph of Arimathaea, in which the body of Jesus was laid, should be carefully sealed and made as secure as the officials could make it. "So they went, and made the sepulchre secure, sealing the stone, the guard being with them" (Mt 27:66).

In Syria, as elsewhere in the East, it is customary to have stated times after the burial for mourning at the tomb—for example on the third, seventh, and fortieth days, and again on the anniversary of the burial. The relatives or friends then go to the tomb without ornaments, often with hair disheveled; sometimes with head covered and faces blackened with soot, or ashes, or earth, in their oldest and poorest clothing, which is sometimes violently rent, and, sitting or moving in a circle around or near to the tomb, they break out in spells into weird, dirge-like singing or wailing.

5. Excessive Mourning

The violence of grief at times leads to lacerations of the body and the shedding of blood. Morter (Second Journey through Persia), descriptive of a celebration which takes place annually to commemorate the death of the grandson of Mohammed, says: "I have seen the most violent of them, as they vociferated Ya Hosten! walk the streets with their bodies streaming with blood by the voluntary cuts they had given themselves." Such cutting of the flesh in mourning for the dead was specifically forbidden by the Mosaic law (Lev 19:28; 21:5; Dt 14:1). But excessive mourning for the dead is often alluded to in Scripture (see Ps 1 11.12; Ps 6 6; 119 136; Lam 1 16; 3 48; Jer 9 1).

The custom of dirge-songs seems to be alluded to (Mt 9 23; Mk 5 38) in the narrative of the scene of the healing of the ruler's daughter: "Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the crowd making a tumult." A characteristic oriental funeral procession and burial are vividly pictured in the narrative of the burial of Jacob (Gen 50 6–13).

V. Failure to Receive Burial Counted a Calamity or a Judgment.—Any lack of proper burial is still regarded in the East, as it was in ancient times, as a great indignity or a judgment from God. It is esteemed the greatest calamity that can befal a person. It gives men still untold distress to think they shall not receive suitable burial, according to the customs of their respective race, or family, or religion—a fact or sentiment that is often alluded to or appealed to by way of illustration in the Scriptures. For a corpse to remain unburied and become food for beasts of prey was the climax of indignity or judgment (2 S 21 10.11; 1 K 13 22; 14 11; 16 4; 21 24; 2 K 9 37; Jer 7 33; 8 1; Ezk 29 5; Ps 79 3; Rev 11 9), and uncoverted blood cried for vengeance (Ezk 24 6 f; 39 11–16), the idea being the same as among other oriental peoples, that the unburied dead would not only inflict trouble upon his family, but bring defilement also and a curse upon the whole land. It was, therefore, an obligation resting upon all to bury even the dead found by the way (Tob 1 18; 2 5). Even malefactors were to be allowed burial (Dt 21 22,23), and the exceptional denial of it to the sons of Rizpah gave occasion for the touching story of her self-denying care of the dead found in 2 S 21 10–11.

VI. Places of Burial: How Marked.—Ordinary graves were marked by the heaping of crude stones, but hewn stones and sometimes costly pillars were set up as memorials of the dead (Ezk 39 15; 2 K 23 17 RV, "What monument is that which I see?" the reference being to a sepulchral pillar). Jacob set up a pillar over Rachel's grave (Gen 35 20), and her tomb is marked by a monument to this day. Absalom's grave in the wood of Ephraim had a heap of stones raised over it (2 S 18 17), but in this case, as in the case of Achan, it was not for honor but for dishonor. In NT times the place of burial was uniformly outside the cities and villages (see Lk 7 12; Jn 11 30). There was public provision made for the burial of strangers (Mt 27 7), as in the closing days of the monarchy there was a public burying-ground at Jerusalem (Jer 26 23), probably where it is to this day between the city wall and the Kidron Valley. Thousands of Jewish graves on the sloping sides of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, where the Jews have come from all lands to be buried, bear witness today to the belief that associate the coming of Messiah with a blessed resurrection. Many Jews hold that Messiah, when He comes, will descend upon the Mount of Olives, and will pass through these resting-places of the dead as He enters the Holy City in glory.

BURIER, ber'i-er (םבירה, bābhar): "Set up a sign by it, till the buriers have buried it" (Ex 39 15). "When the searchers found any human remains as they passed through the land, they were to set up a mark to attract the attention of the buriers, who followed them" (Dummelow's Comm., in loc.). See BEIRAH.

BURN, bûrn, BURNING, bûrn'ing: Figurative: In addition to the ordinary meaning, burn is used metaphorically in the following passages of the N.T.

(1) εἰρ νείτε, kəlθ (Lk 24 32), "Was not our heart burning within us," i.e. greatly moved.
(2) φωιθάνε, purād, used twice, once in the sense of inflamed with sexual desire (1 Cor 7 9), "For it is better to marry than to burn," and in 2 Cor 11 29 of the heat of the passions, here of grief, or anger. "Who is offended [ARV "caused to stumble"] and I burn not?" See also PUNISHMENTS.

BUSH, bōōsh:

(1) (מבר, sreph, Ex 3 2-4; Dt 33 16; βατος, batos, Mk 12 26; Lk 6 44, "bramble bush"; 20 37; Acts 7 30-35. All the OT references and the NT references, except Lk 6 44, are to the same "bush, viz. Moses' "burning bush"). From its etymology it clearly denotes a "thorny" plant, as does the corresponding batos in the LXX and NT. In the Lat VSS rubus, i.e. "bramble," is used as equivalent. Various species of bramble flourish in Pal, of which the most common is Rubus discolor, but this is not an indigenous plant in Sinai. It is stated by Post that a bush of this plant has been planted by the monks of the Convent of St. Catherine at Sinai to the rear of the "Chapel of the Burning Bush." In spite of tradition there is but little doubt that Moses' "burning bush" must actually have been a shrub of one of the various thorny acacias, or allied plants, indigenous in the Sin peninsula.

(2) (בְּשָׁם, sâm, "plant," Gen 2 5; "shrub," Gen 21 15; "bush," Job 30 4-7). In the first reference any kind of plant may be meant, but in the other passages the reference is to the low bushes or scrub, such as are found in the desert.

(3) (מברשת, nāhālōt, AV bushes, RV PASTURES, m "bushes," Isa 7 19). The meaning appears to be rather a place for watering flocks, the corresponding Arab. root הָנַח, nahal, having the meaning "to quench one's thirst," and the corresponding noun of meaning a watering-place in the desert. BUSH, THE BURNING, bûrn'ing: The scene at the burning bush (יְנוֹר הָנָה, "a bush," LXX βάτος, "blackberry bush") reveals God to the world in one of the theophanies with fire, of which there is more than one in the Bible (Ex 3 2; 13 21; 19 18; also 2 Thess 1 8 AV, yet to be fulfilled). Many other Divine manifestations were associated with fire. The Burning Bush is mentioned elsewhere in Dt 33 16; Mk 12 26; Lk 20 37; Acts 7 30-31.

1. Meaning. The bush in the vibration of its first mention (Ex 3 1-6), is the "bush," the "burning bush," the "blackberry bush," of the area of the Sinai Peninsula. The "bush," "burning bush" (Ex 3 1-6), is not the bush, but is the bush with the fire, the "burning bush," of the area of the Sinai Peninsula. The "bush," "burning bush" (Ex 3 1-6), is not the bush, but is the bush with the fire, the "burning bush," of the area of the Sinai Peninsula. The "bush," "burning bush" (Ex 3 1-6), is not the bush, but is the bush with the fire, the "burning bush," of the area of the Sinai Peninsula. The "bush," "burning bush" (Ex 3 1-6), is not the bush, but is the bush with the fire, the "burning bush," of the area of the Sinai Peninsula.

2. Identification. The bush, the "burning bush," is the LXX and also by the monks of the Convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai who grow the blackberry there in token of their tradition. The cassis has also been suggested. Both identifications are failures, the former because the blackberry does not grow in that region unless imported and transplanted, the latter for philological reasons. Nothing in the language used gives any clue to the species of the bush. The generally accepted view that it was some kind of thorn bush is an assumption with scarcely other ground than that there are many thorn bushes in that region. It is not, however, give to the assumption much probability.

The old Jewish commentators have many things to say in explanation of this theophany (cf Jep 24 11). That one thing is clear: the prophetic vision.

3. Interpretations. One thing meet with much response from the nation. Christian history is that the unconsumed bush with the fire in the midst of it indicated that the Israelites would not be consumed by the affictions in Egypt. The application of this view to God's people under affliction in all ages is often made by Christian homilists. But this cannot have been the primary meaning of the theophany. Of the many theophanies and other Divine manifestations with fire, the specific significance must be learned from a careful study of the circumstances in each case. The fire does not seem to have any one fundamental meaning running through them all. In addition to the references already given, cf Ps 18 8-12; 80 3; Exk 1 4; Mic 1 1-4; Hab 3 3-6; He 12 29.

The exact meaning of the Burning Bush as a method or medium of revelation may appear as follows: (1) The flame in this bush was not the framework of permutation by God's enemies without, but the flame of God's presence or fire that dwells within His angel within. (2) The idea of burning and yet not being consumed is brought into the narrative by Moses' wonderment in the moment of his ignorance, before he knew that God was in the bush. (3) The real significance of the flame in this case seems to be that God manifests Himself graciously. This is the universal idea of revealed religion. The prevailing idea of God in the religions round about was that God dwelt in darkness. The approach to the gods in Egypt temples was through ever-deepening gloom. It was thought that God was very dangerous and apt to be a destroyer, so that a priest must always intervene. God as a gracious Saviour was the new idea revelation was bringing to the world. This was now first clearly announced, but was not to be fully revealed throughout the time of the long line of priests until the Great High Priest should come and make a "way of approach" that we may come "with boldness unto the throne of grace." BUŞHÉL, bōosh'el (μοῦσας, mōthos): A dry measure containing about a peck, but as it is used in the NT (Mt 6 15; Mk 4 21; Lk 11 33) it does not refer to capacity but is used only to indicate a covering to conceal the light.
BUSINESS, biz'nes: Is the rendering of four Hebrew words: (1)ritable, m't'dhah, in Gen 3 11 (ARV "work"); 1 Ch 26 29.30; 2 Ch 13 10 (ARV "in their work"); 17 13 (ARV "many works"); Neh 11 16.22; 13 30 (ARV "in his work"); Est 3 9; Ps 107 23; Prov 22 29; Dn 8 27. (2)דבְּרָה, dabhar, lit. "a word," is so tr* in Dt 24 5; Josh 2 14.20; Jgs 18 7 (ARV "dealings"); 18 28 (ARV "dealings"); 1 S 21 2.8. (3)מַצְּבָה, ma'aseh, "an action" (1 S 20 19). (4)מאֹבּ, me'ob, "employment" (Eccl 3 8; 5 16).

In the NT "business" in Lk 2 49 is the rendering of the phrase τὸ τῶν πάτρων ἡμῶν, en tois tou patrois mou, lit. "in the things of my Father," which ARV renders "in my Father's house," with "about my Father's business" as the marginal reading. "Business" is also used in the tr of χρήμα, chrema, lit. "a thing or an instrument of exchange," as in Acts 6 3 as "the right ofSlots" and lit. "haste" of Rom 12 11 (ARV "diligence"); of πρᾶγμα, pragma, lit. "thing done," of Rom 16 2 (ARV "matter"); of πρόσευξις τὰ τῆς, prosesin ta tis, lit. "to one's own business," of 1 Thes 4 11. In Acts 24 23, in Paul's account of the riot in Ephesus, ἐργασία, ergasia, lit. "working," "performing," is tr* "little business" in ver 24 (ARV "small gain"), and "by this business" in ver 25 (ARV "by this craft").

BUSYBODY, biz'i-bod-i (πιεργος, pertergos, αλλοτροπυσκος, allotropyskocos): The word is found twice in Pauline lit.: 1 Tim 5 13, "not only idle, but tattlers and busybodies," and 2 Thess 3 11, "work not at all, but are busybodies." It is also found in 1 Pet 4 15 AV (RV "meddler"); "or as a busybody in other men's matters." If these passages be coupled with such others as Jas 3 2-10; 4 11; Eph 4 29.31; Tit 3 2, it becomes evident that sins against the eighth commandment were as common in the apostolic church as they are today. To this day backbiting is a common trait of oriental peoples. And it is this sin which is so repeatedly warned against by the apostles, as in direct conflict with the ethics of Christianity, and in violation of that spirit of brotherly love and mutual trust which Christ has enjoined on His followers, and which is the very marrow of the outward revelation of the Christian faith (1 Cor 13).

HENRY E. DOSKER

BUTLER, but'ler: An officer in households of kings, or other dignitaries, having charge of wines and other potables. מפת, mashkhah, "one who gives drink" (Gen 40 1-23; 41 9), rendered "cupbearer" in 1 K 10 5; 2 Ch 9 4; Neh 1 11. The office was one of considerable importance in oriental courts, because of the danger to the king's life through plots of poison. Nehemiah held this position to King Artaxerxes. Wealthy courts, as that of Solomon, usually had more than one (1 K 10 5); over these cupbearers or butlers was the sar ha-mashkhim, or chief butler (Gen 40 9).

I. IN THE EARLIEST PERIODS AND AMONG NOMADS.

—Among primitive races and nomads there can be, of course, no organized commerce. Yet they buy and sell, barter and exchange, in rude and simple ways.

1. The Primitive Stage: the "Shop" When tribes become settled and live in villages the "shop" is established—usually at first the simple "stall" of the grocer (ḥakkel) where one can buy bread, cheese, salt, and dried fish, olives, oil, bundles of wood or charcoal, and even earthenware vessels for the passing traveler. At a later stage the village will have also, according to demand, other shops, as for instance, those of the baker, the blacksmith, the cobbler, and, today, will be found in many obscure places in the East the butcher's shop, and the coffee house.

These gradations and the gradual rise to the more organized commerce of the Gr-Rom period are indicated in a way by the succession of words for "buying" used in the Bible Times and the conditions and circumstances pictured and implied in the various accounts of buying and selling. Even as early as Abraham's time, however, there were buying and weighing of silver in exchange. "Fear me," pleads Abraham with the children of Heth, "and entreat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar, that he may give me the cave of Machpelah which is in the end of his field; for the full price let him give it to me." And Ephron said, "Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein." But Abraham said, "If thou wilt, I will give the price of the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there. And Ephron answered . . . . My lord, hearken unto me: a piece of land worth four hundred shekels of silver, what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead. . . . And Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver . . . . four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant. So . . . . the field, and the cave, and all the trees that were in the field, . . . . were made sure unto Abraham for a possession." (Gen 23 3-18). Other examples of primitive buying are found in Josh 24 32 ("the parcel 21-24, where David is said to have "bought the threshing-floor" of A. at "a price." Such cases, however, are in a sense exceptional; trade in general at that time was by barter and exchange, without intermediary or market-place.

In NT times things have so changed that the word most commonly used for buying (agorazo) means "to use the market-place," and another (emporium) points to a class of traders or merchants who go on from city to city—"continue" here or there "and buy and sell" (Jas 4 13 AV).

II. Oriental Buying often a Tediuous Process.—Something of this is seen even in the fine examples given above. Doubtless, however, eastern buyers and sellers of old haggled over prices with controversy and heat, even as such buyers do today. Everywhere you find them now keen for bargains, but "striking a bargain" is a tedious process. They grow warm and then cool off; they are swept into a frenzy by some new turn of the strife and then calm down; but soon the haggling and arguing begin over again, becoming more heated and seemingly more hopeless than ever, and often they become so excited as to threaten to come to blows. But they don't mean it all, and at last they find a common basis; the sale is made with flattering compliments to one another, and, if we may believe appearances, to the rapturous delight of both parties to the bargain.

The native Oriental clearly takes pleasure in such exercise, and sees great possibilities before him. He graciously assures you at the outset that the bargain shall be "just as you like it—just as you like it!" Is he not a servant of God? What cares he for money? What he most wants is your happiness and good will—that is the sweetest thing in life—the love and favor of brothers. After a while you offer a price. He says, "What is such a trifle between us? Take it for nothing!" But he is far from meaning it, and so the haggling begins and the fire and heat of controversy follow—perhaps for hours.

III. Shops and Bazaars.—Oriental shops are all of a pattern—the workshop and the place to store and sell goods is one and the same.

1. Oriental Shops

The shop is on the street, of course, and a platform, usually about 2 ft. high, extends along the whole front. A small door opens to a room back, which, as far as such a thing is possible in the Orient, is private. The goods, particularly the best articles, are displayed in front, somewhat as they are in the windows of our department stores. In the center of the platform is a sejadeh, a rug or mat. Upon this the keeper sits in true oriental fashion—cross-legged. He is never too busy with his accounts to let the passersby escape his keen eye. He will give up his nargileh any time to hear the stranger, display his goods, and coaxingly invite him to look at the special beauty and quality of his articles.

All the shops or storerooms of the oriental village line the "market," which as a rule, is in the center of the village, or on the chief street. This is the Arabs call sukh, sookh (cf. Mt 20 3). Here the peasant is found with his donkeys or camels laden with food-stuffs and country produce. The gardener is there with his small fruits, and the fisherman with his latest "catch." All the shopkeepers, too, are on or near to this street or market center. "The sukh in a country village," says J. Garrow Duncan, "is one of the most interesting sights of modern Egypt. Formerly the cattle and dry-goods markets were uniformly held in an open space in the center of each village. Now the government compels them to go to fenced enclosures outside of the town. At Belbeys the ordinary market is still held in the center of the town, but the cattle market is a mile away, across the canal. As in a bazaar, such as the traveler sees in Cairo, the merchants of the various trades dispose themselves here, all easily accessible from the main street, which is thus left clear. On the left are the dealers in copper utensils, busily plying their trade; next to them the makers of sieves and riddles; then comes a large space filled with pottery ware, and, close by, the vegetable vendors. There, jammed in between the pottery space and the coppersmiths, is a lane of gold- and silversmiths—the greatest sharks in the market, their chief prey being the women. On the other side of the main street are the shoemakers' lane, the drapers' lane, the grocers, the seed men, the sweetmeat-sellers, fruit merchants, dealers in glass and carnelian jewelry and, lastly, the butchers' stalls, all arranged in lanes, and all equally ready to trade or to enjoy a joke at each other's expense. There is apparently little eagerness to trade—except when a tourist appears." To one who is ignorant of the value of his wares, the oriental dealer has no fixed price. This is really regulated by the supposed ignorance of the purchaser. If you choose, you may give him what he asks, and be later called round the sookh. If you are wise, you will offer something near to the real value and firmly refuse to vary or haggle, and he will come to terms.

Professor Elihu Grant tells of a shop in a Syrian village—a small room, 6 to 12 ft. by 1 door, but no window, a counter or bench, and shelves and bins along the sides, where sugar, flour, oil, matches, candies, spice, starch, coffee, rice, dried figs, etc., were found, but no wrapping-paper. The buyer must bring his own dish for liquids; other things he carries away in the ample folds of his skirt or in a handkerchief."

"Every considerable Turkish town," says Van Lennep, "has a bazaar, bezesten, or 'arcade'; a stone structure, open at both ends, a narrow alley or street running through it, with an arched roof, the sides pierced with openings or windows. This covered street is lined on both sides with shops, narrow and shallow. Dealers in similar goods and articles flock together here, as do the artisans of like trades in all oriental cities." Such shops can yet be seen in quite characteristic form in Damascos, Bagdad, Cairo and Constantinople, as in ancient days they were found in Babylon, Jerus and Noph (see Ezk 27:15—20).

IV. Buying on Credit.—The shop-keeper does not always get cash from the native buyer. Dr. Post found that debt was well-nigh universal in Syria. The peasant sows "borrowed" seed in "borrowed" soil, plants and reaps with "borrowed" tools and lives in a "borrowed" house. Even in case of an abundant harvest the proportion of the crop left by the landlord and the tax-gatherer leaves the man and his family but the barest living at best; at times he can barely pay the debt accumulated and in market and gathering in the crop, and sometimes fails in doing this. In the rare cases when the buyer pays cash for his purchases, he makes payment, after a true oriental fashion, Paying in coin of the most various or varying Cash (Money) value, or in rings of copper, silver or gold, such as are now common in the market-places of China. This throws light upon some Scriptural passages, as, for example, Gen 43:21-22, where the language implies that the "rings" or "strings of money" were weighed: "Behold, every man's money was in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight . . . and other money have we brought down in our hand to buy food." In Ezr 2:69, three kinds of currency are mentioned, "daries of gold," "pounds of silver," and "priests' garments," as having been given into the treasury for the house of God. The term rendered "darics of gold," आधर्कोट्ठम्, stands for Pera coins, which were similar to the Gr "darics." The Persians are said to have got the idea of coined money from Lydia, at the capture of Sardis, 564 BC. Early Lydian coins were of electrum, but Croesus changed this to coins of gold and silver, probably about 568 BC. Examples of these ancient coins are now known (Rice, Orientalisms in Bible Lands, 234).

V. Open-Air Markets and Fairs.—In inland towns and cities, markets and market-places are often found in the open air, as well as under cover. Great fairs are held thus on certain days of the week. Several towns will agree upon different days as market days and will offer in turn whatever they have for sale: lambs, sheep, cattle, horses, mules, chickens, eggs, butter, cheese, vegetables, fruits, and even jewelry and garments. In such a case it is as if the whole town for the day was turned into a market or exhibition, where everything is for sale. On such days peasants and townspeople come together in much larger numbers than is ordinary, and mingle freely together. The day thus chosen now, as in olden times, is often a holy day—Friday, which is the Moslem Sabbath, or the Christian Sunday, where Christians abound. Such instances form a side-light on such passages as Neh 13:15-22: "In those days saw I in Judah some men treading winepresses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lording assays thereon;" as also honey, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerus on the sabbath day: and I testified against them." Morier testifies that he attended similar fairs in Persia, where were gathered sellers of all sorts of goods in temporary shops or tents, such as sellers of barley and flour, as it was at the gate of Samaria after the famine (2 K 7). Layard also speaks of having seen at the gate of the modern town of Mosul, opposite the site of ancient Nineveh, shops for the sale of wheat, barley, bread-stuffs, and drinks for the thirsty. It will be recalled that it was "as the gate" that Boaz (Ruth 4:1-3) called the elders and people to witness that he had bought all that was Elimelech's. For similar allusions see Job 5:4; Prov 21:23; Ps 127:5; Lam 5:14. See Money; Trade; etc; also DB, DCG, etc.

CABIN, kab'în (כָּבִּין, kābîn; μπάντ, “vaults”); Jer 37 16 RV, “cells”: In the East the prison often consisted of a pit (of “dungeon-house” RV and “house of the pit” RVm) with vaulted cells around it for the confinement of prisoners. The word is probably a gloss. The phrase “into the cells” seems superfluous after “into the dungeon-house.”

CABUL, kâ'bul (כַּבּוּל, kābûl; Χαβοναμωᾶ, Chobamonâvôl, A, Χαβολ ἀπὸ ἀριστερῶν, Chabôl apô aristērôn): (1) A city on the boundary between Asher and Zebulon (Josh 19 27). It corresponds to the Chabolo of Jos (Vîdâ, 43, etc), and is represented by the modern village Kâbûl, about nine miles S.E. of Acre. It is transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as ç (almost ts). It came also to be used for the number 90. For name, etc, see ALPHABET; Tsâdhè.

CEASAR, sê'zar (Kaisâr, Kaisar): Originally the surname of the Julian gens (thus, Caius Julius Caesar); afterward a name borne by the Roman emperors. In the NT the name is definitely applied to Augustus (Lk 2 1, “Caesar Augustus”), to whom it belonged by adoption, and to Tiberius (Lk 3 1, “Tiberius Caesar”; of Mt 22 17 21). The “Caesar” to whom Paul appealed (Acts 25 11 12 21) was Nero. The form is perpetuated in “Kaiser” and “Czar.”

CEASAREA, see-a-rè'a, sê-za-rè'a (Καισαρεία, Kaisareia): (1) Caesarea Palestine (pal-es'tînâ). The ancient name in the Arab. form Kaisariyeh still clings to the ruins on the sea shore, about 30 miles N. of Jaffa. It was built by Herod the Great on the site of Strato's Tower (Ant, XIII, xi, 2; XV, ix, 6), and the name Caesarea Sebaste was given it in honor of Augustus (ib, XVI, v, 1). With his usual magnificence Herod lavished adornments on the city. He erected sumptuous palaces and public buildings, a theater, and amphitheater with prospect to the sea; while a spacious system of sewers under the city secured cleanliness and health. But “the greatest and most laborious work of all” was a magnificent harbor “always free from the waves of the sea,” which Jos says was not less than the Piraeus; this however is an exaggeration. It was of excellent workmanship, and all the more remarkable because the place itself was not suitable for such noble structures. The whole coast line, indeed, is singularly ill-fitted for the formation of harbors. The mighty breakwater was constructed by letting down stones 50×18×9 ft. in size into twenty fathoms deep. The mole was 200 ft. wide. Part was surmounted by a wall and towers. A promenade and dwellings for mariners were also provided. The work was done in ten or twelve years. It became the residence of the Roman procurator. It passed into the hands of Agrippa I; and here he miserably died (Acts 13 19 23). Here dwelt Philip the Evangelist (Acts 8 40; 21 8). To Caesarea Peter was sent to minister to the Rom centurion Cornelius (Acts 10). Thrice Paul passed into Moslem hands in 638. In the time of the Crusades it fell, now to the Christians and now to the Moslems; and was finally overthrown by Sultan Bibars in 1265 AD.

The cathedral stood on the site of a temple built by Herod, where the ruins are seen today; as are also those of two aqueducts which conveyed water from Nahr ez-Zerbâ. The landward wall of the Rom city was nearly 3 miles in length.

(2) Caesarea Philippi (Kaicrapeia, Καισαρεία Ψηλᾶ) (Kaisareia hê Philippou). At the S.W. base of Mt. Hermon, on a rocky terrace, 1,150 ft. above sea-level, between Wâday Khasshebe and Wâday Za'arâch, lie the ruins of the ancient city. It was the chief center of the worship of Pan; whence the name Paneas, applied not only to the whole district but to the whole district (Ant, XV, x, 3). It is possible that this may have been the site of ancient Basil-hermon; while Principal G. A. Smith would place Dan here (HIGHL, 480). The district was given by Augustus to Herod the Great 20 BC, by whom a temple of white marble was built in honor of the emperor. Paneas formed part of the tetrarchy of Philip. He rebuilt and beautified the town, calling it Caesarea as a compliment to Augustus, and adding his own name to distinguish it from Caesarea on the coast of Sharon (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1). From Bethsaida Jesus and His disciples came hither, and on the way Peter made his famous confession, after which Jesus began to tell them of His coming passion (Mt 16 13 f; Mk 8 27 f). Some think that on a height near Caesarea Philippi Jesus was transfigured. See TRANSFIGURATION, MOUNT OF. Agrippa II renamed the town Ne- ronias (Ant, XX, ix, 4). The ancient name however outlived both Caesarea and Neronias, and survives in the Arab. form Bânitâs. The modern village, built among the ruins, contains 350 inhabitants. The walls and towers of which the remains are seen date from Crusading times. The castle, ez-Sâhibeh, crowning hill behind the town, and must have been a place of strength from the earliest times. Its possession must always have been essential to the holding of the valley to the west. Immediately to the north of the town, at the foot of a steep crag, the fountain of the Jordan rises. Formerly the waters issued from a cave, Magdāret ruṣ Hanēqē, on the northern side of the mountain, but now are filled up with débris. Two niches cut in the face of the rock recall the idolatries practised here in olden times. A shrine of el-Khudr stands on the west of the spring. With the rich soil and plentiful supplies of water, in a comparatively healthy climate, average industry might turn the whole district into a garden. As it is, the surroundings are wonderfully beautiful.

W. EWING

CAESAR’S HOUSEHOLD, household (οἱ εἰς τὴν Καίσαρος οἰκίαν, οἱ εἰς τὴν Καίσαρος οἰκίαν). "they that are of Caesar’s household," Phil 4:22): These words occur in the epistle which Paul wrote from Rome near the end of his first imprisonment there, probably in the end of 61 AD, to the church in Philippi. They give us most interesting information in regard to the progress made in the propagation of the gospel in Rome.

It is necessary to ask, in the first place, What is meant by the words “Caesar’s household”? And when the meaning of that phrase is known, then it is needful to discuss the question which arises at once, In what way did the gospel enter Caesar’s household? How is it that the gospel, which at the first chiefly advanced among the poorest classes in the Empire, made its way at a bound into the very palace of the Caesars?

"Caesar’s household" meant the whole of the persons, slaves and freemen alike, composing the establishment in place on the Palatine Hill at Rome. Caesars Household formed a host in themselves. At a time when many a private citizen in Rome owned several hundreds of slaves, it need not surprise anyone to know that there was a vastly larger number of such persons in the palace of the emperor. This was a period when the city of Rome and the court of the Caesars swarmed with Asiatics, many of whom were slaves, and many of the Caesars would be in slavery, or in employment, in the imperial court. It cannot be forgotten that Poppaea, Nero’s shameless consort, was a proselyte to Judaism and that she continued to advocate successfully the cause of the Jews before their extermination arose.

These persons in the emperor’s palace would be employed in every conceivable capacity as household servants, cooks, bathmen, gardeners, grocers, kennel-keepers, porters, doorkeeps, messengers, secretaries, amanuenses, teachers, librarians, architects, carpenters, shoemakers, and in all other forms of service. Of course they were not all slaves: there was a very large number of freemen. The domus or familia Caesaris (represented by the Gr. οἰκία Καίσαρ) included the whole of the imperial household, the meanest slaves as well as the most powerful courtiers. On the character and constitution of this household we happen to possess more information than perhaps on any other department of social life in Rome. In Rome itself were recorded by these inscriptions, the domus Augusta must have formed inconsiderable fraction of the whole population; but it comprised likewise all persons in the emperor’s service, whether slaves or freemen; in Italy and the provinces, by rights as well as in Rome. (Comm. auf ob. Phil. 171). In the list of offices filled by members of the imperial household were also such functions as those of keepers of the wardrobe or of the plate-chest; even the "tasters" formed a separate class of servants under a chief of their own. To belong to Caesar’s household would secure even to the lowest grade of slaves substantial privileges and immunities, and would give a certain social importance, which made this position a valued one. An office in the emperor’s household involved a thought of so highly, that in the monumental inscriptions such a fact is recorded with scrupulous care.

The next inquiry is, How did the gospel win its way into Caesar’s household? And, first, there was no need at all to suppose that the

2. How Did the Gospel Enter into Caesar’s Household?

2. How Did the Gospel Enter into Caesar’s Household?

As soon therefore as the gospel entered Rome, as soon as it was proclaimed in the many synagogues there, these members of Caesar’s household could not fail, equally with the other members of the synagogue, to hear the story of Jesus Christ and of His cross and resurrection. And, precisely, is that the gospel was known in Rome previous to Paul’s arrival there, is quite sufficient to account for the other fact, that the gospel was known in Caesar’s palace.

But the propagation of the gospel received a great impetus and help forward, when Paul arrived in the city. For although he was a "bound prisoner," his wrist fastened by an iron chain, day and night, to the same column of the palace to "preach the kingdom of God and to teach those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him" (Acts 28:31 AV). And in this way the gospel would again reach members of the emperor’s household. Immediately after his arrival in Rome, Paul had put himself in communication with “the chief of the Jews”—probably the rulers of the synagogues in Rome—and many of them came to him. As his lodging was in the palace, those chief men of the Jews expressed their great desire to hear from him what his thoughts were in regard to the hope of Israel (ver 22); and naturally all the Jews in Rome would be equally desirous to receive this information. It was an outstanding position and character of Paul. The Jewish community in Rome had for years past been permeated with the hope of the coming of the Messiah; indeed successive rumors of false Christs had kept them in a fever of excitement, which, on one occasion at least, had broken out in tumult, so strong was their hope of His speedy appearing. Thus it would come about, as a matter of course, that the gospel would reach all the Jews in Rome, and from this knowledge of Jesus Christ Paul proclaimed, the Jews who were in the service of the emperor could not possibly be excluded.

But besides this, the fact that Paul was in daily contact and intercourse with the soldiers who guarded him could not fail to lead to the introduction of the gospel into the regiment. And as part of the Praetorian Guard was quartered in the buildings on the Palatine Hill, attached to the emperor’s palace there was another one channel through which the gospel would be made known to some of those who resided in the palace of Caesar. It is thus seen that there is nothing at all surprising in the fact that there were Christians in Caesar’s household.
6. Light-foot's Conjecture

Some of Lightfoot's suggestions and conjectures on this subject are exceedingly interesting. He reviews the names of the persons to whom Paul sends greeting in Rom 16 and compares them with the names of persons who lived at that time, and which have been found in monumental inscriptions on the columbaria or places of sepulture exhumed on the Appian Way. Many of the occupants of those columbaria were freedmen or slaves of the emperors, and were contemporaries of the apostle Paul. Lightfoot's conjecture of the names is that he claims to have established a fair presumption that among the salutations in Rom 16 some members at least of the imperial household are included (Phil. 177).

In the household of the emperor there were necessarily many persons of high rank. Perhaps we may find a hint that the gospel had been embraced by some in the higher grades of society, in such strange facts as the execution of Titus Flavius Clemens, a man of consular rank and cousin to the emperor, and in the fact that Flavia Domitilla, the wife of Flavius Clemens, was banished by Domitian, notwithstanding her near relationship to him, for she was the emperor's niece. Her daughter, Flavia Domitilla, was also banished under the same punishment.

The charges brought against all three were atheism and inclination to Jewish customs: surely such charges were sufficiently vague and even self-contradictory. The opinion has been suggested that probably these three persons in the inner circle of the emperor's kinmen were Christians.

Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, etc, 353), speaking of Lightfoot's conjectures, already referred to, writes, "In all probability he is right in thinking that all the slaves of Aristobulus (son of Herod the Great) and of Narcissus (Claudius' favorite freedman) had passed into the imperial household, and that members of their two families are saluted as Christians by Paul (Rom. 16 10)."

The fact of greatest interest in the whole subject is, that in society so profane and corrupt as the court of Nero, there were "saints," Christian men whose garments were clean and who kept themselves unspotted from the world and unmarred by the dreadfulness in and temptation so unceasing that the gospel was known and obeyed and loved, and that hearts and lives were loyal to Christ even in the palace of Nero Caesar.

CAGE, kā́j (κάγα), kā́lāḅh; φωλακῆ, phulakē): The earliest known form of cage made to confine a bird, for the pleasure of its song or the beauty of its coloring, was a crude affair of willows or other pliable twigs. Later cages were made of pottery, and now they are mostly made of wire. References in the Bible make it very clear that people were accustomed to confine in cages such birds as they esp. prized for pets, or to detain them for market purposes. James indicates that cages were common when he wrote (Jn 8 27): "For every kind of beasts and birds . . . is tamed, and hath been tamed by mankind." In Job (41 5) we find these lines

"Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? Or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?"

The only way to play with a bird is to confine it so that it grows accustomed to you and thus loses fear. Jeremiah compared Judah to a "cage [crate] full of birds" (Jn 5 27), "the houses of the rich being stuffed with craftily-obtained wealth and articles of luxury" (HD). The sale of sparrow as an article of food still continues in the eastern markets. Jesus referred to this (Mt 10 29) and it was He who entered the temple and overturned "the seats of them that sold the doves" (Mt 21 12). In Rev 18 2 we find a reference to "a hold [AV "cage"] of every unclean and hateful bird." See also Ecles 11 30.

CAIAPHAS, kā́f-a-fas, kā́f-a-fas (Καίαφας, Καίαφας; Caiaphasis = Kephas [cf Dods in Expositor's Gr Test, i, 803], and has also been interpreted as meaning "depression"): Caiaphasis was the surname of Joseph, a son-in-law of Anna (of Jn 18 13), who filled the priestly office of High Priest in AD, when he was deposed by Vitellius (cf Jos, Ant. XVIII, ii, 2; iv, 3). He is mentioned by Lk as holding office at the time of John the Baptist's preaching in the wilderness (Lk 3 2).

Caiaphasis took a leading part in the trial and condemnation of Jesus. It was in his court or palace that the chief priests (Sadaduces) and Pharisees, who together constituted the Sanhedrin, assembled "that they might take Jesus by subtlety, and, kill him" (cf Mt 26 3; Mk 14 19). The regal claims of the new Messiah and the growing fame of His works had made them to dread both the vengeance of imperial Rome upon their nation, and the loss of their own personal authority and prestige. But Caiaphasis pointed a way out of their dilemma: let them bide their time till the momentary enthusiasm of the populace was spent (cf Mt 26 5), and then by the single sacrifice of Jesus they could at once get rid of a dangerous rival and pacify the frowns of Rome (cf Jn 11 48). The commentary of St. John upon this (Jn 51 52) indicates how the death of Jesus was indeed to prove a blessing not only for Israel but also for all the children of God; but not in the manner in which the cold-blooded statecraft of Caiaphasis intended. The advice of the high priest was accepted by the Sanhedrin (ver 53), and they succeeded in arresting Jesus. After being led "to Anmas first" (18 13), Jesus was conducted thence in bonds to Caiaphasis (ver 24). According to Mt He was led immediately upon His arrest to Caiaphasis (Mt 26 57). Mk and Lk do not refer to Caiaphasis by name. His conduct at this preliminary trial of Jesus (vs 57-68), its time and its procedures, were almost entirely illegal from the standpoint of the then existing Jewish law: "the Trial or; and A. Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ." False witnesses were first called, and when Jesus refused to reply to their charges, Caiaphasis asked of him if He were "the Christ, the Son of God" (ver 63). Upon Our Lord's answering "Thou hast said" (ver 64), Caiaphasis "rent his garments, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard the blasphemy" (ver 65). Upon this charge Jesus was found "worthy of death" (ver 66). Caiaphasis is also mentioned in Acts 4 6 as being among those who presided over the trial of Peter and John.

CAIN, kā́n (קָנָן, kā́n), "spear" or "smith," resembling in sound the root קָנָה, "get," "acquire," Gen 4 1 RVm, but not necessarily derived from that root: LXX Κάν, Kān): (1) In Gen 4 1-24 Cain is the first son of Adam and Eve. His birth is hailed as a manifestation of Yah's help. He becomes "a tiller of the ground," and brings to Yah an offering of the produce of the soil, his brother Abel, the shepherd, bringing the same time the fat of the firstlings born of his own flock. From Cain's offering Yah withholds the sign of acceptance which he grants to Abel. That the ground of this difference of treatment is to be found (so He 11 4) in Cain's lack of right disposition toward Jeh is shown by his behavior (see Aust.). Instead of humbling himself he gives signs of strong indignation at Jeh's refusal. Under the just rebuke of Jeh he hardens his heart and is further confirmed in impenitence. His jealousy of Abel, unperturbed of, increases until it culminates in deliberate murder. Deliberate, for in Gen 4:5 we must restore a clause to the Heb text, the ancient VSS bearing witness, and read "And Cain said unto Abel his brother, Let us go into the field," etc. In the vain attempt to conceal his crime Cain adds falsehood to his other sins. He is cursed "from," i.e. away from, that soil upon which he poured out his brother's blood, and becomes a wanderer and a wanderer, far from the immediate presence of Jeh. Although his remonstrance against the severity of his sentence displays no genuine contrition, still Jeh in pity appoints a "sign" for his protection. Cain takes up his abode in the land of Nod ("wandering"), and there builds a city and becomes the ancestor of a line which includes Jubal, forefather of tent-dwelling cattle-keepers; Jubal, forefather of musicians; Tubal-cain, forefather of smiths; and Lamech, the founder of the race of soldiers. Cain's character we see "a terrible outburst of self-will, pride, and jealousy, leading to a total and relentless renunciation of all human ties and affection." Among the lessons or truths which the narrative teaches may be included the nature of temptation, and the manner in which it should be resisted; the consequences to which an unsubdued temper may lead a man; the gradual steps by which in the end a deadly crime may be committed; the need of sincerity of purpose lest our offering should be rejected; God's patience towards the sinner after he has been punished; the interdependence upon one another of members of the human race; and the duties and obligations which we all owe to each other" (Driver). In He 11:4 Cain's spiritual deficiency is pointed out; 1 Jn 3:12 observes his envy and jealousy, as "of the wicked one," and Jude ver 11 makes him a very type of the ungodly. With few and bold strokes the story of Cain as it stands paints for us the character of the first of murderers and the scene of his destruction and condemnation. To the relatives ligious purpose of the narrative all other things are made tributary. But if we cannot refrain from putting the familiar quicksight of Cain's wife upon close study of Gen 4, as it stands, to avoid asking what was the nature of the sign of Jeh's acceptance (ver 4), or of the "sign" appointed for Cain (ver 15); or what we are to think of the introduction in the midst of the narrative, without explanation, of such important institutions as sacrifice (vs 3.4) and blood-revenge (ver 14); who were the persons of whom Cain stood in fear (ver 14); who inhabited the city he built (ver 17); how the wanderer and fugitive could become the city-builder; and why the shepherd life should be represented as beginning with Abel (ver 2) and again with Jubal (ver 20); also whether the narrator means that not only the collection of men in cities (ver 17), but also animal husbandry, music and metal (vs 20-22) are to be looked upon with disfavor as having sprung from Cain or from his descendants? Most of these questions find their answers in one consideration: the narrative is not exhaustively complete and is not intended to be so. The body of the narrative consists of a body of summaries extended, from which, with the severest condensation, the author of Gen selected his material, is the conclusion forced by close examination of the Gen narrative and comparison of it with the most ancient extant traditions. "In Gen 4 these old stories are not told for their own sakes. The incompleteness and the difficulties left unsolved do not allow this assumption to be made. They form simply the material foundation to which higher ideas and doctrine are attached" (Dillmann).

Without going outside the Scripture text we may find strong evidence that the narrative has been considerably modified by tradition and as the result of criticism. Let the line of Cain (4:17-24) be compared with that of Seth (5:1-29): CAINTE SERHTE Adam ("man") Adam ("man") Seth Enosh ("man") Seth Cain Kenan Enoch Mahalalel Jarched Enoch Methuselah Methuselah Lamech Lamech Jubal, Jubal, Tubal-cain Noah Shem, Ham, Japhet The Heb forms of the names show even more clearly than Caine—Cain—Cainan—CAINAN, that of the biblical traditions have been borrowed from the Semitic, viz., 36), and likewise the singular names Methushalath and Methuselah. Thus we have six names nearly or quite identical; seven additional names in the text, and in cases with a branching into three important characters. Illustrations, similar, though not by any means so obvious, exist between the names in this double list and the names of the ten kings of Babylonia who reigned before the Flood, as the latter are given by Berossus, the Babylonian historian of the 3d cent. BC (see Skinner, Driver, Singer, etc.). The proof that the author in Gen 4 made use appears to have been an ancient list in genealogical form, by which the first ten mankind was linked with the beginnings of civilized institutions and arts. Another part of his material was the story of a brother's murder of a brother (4:16). Many maintain at this point that the narrative must be based upon the doings of tribes, rather than of individuals. It is true for the present, as in the OT tribal history is related under individual names (of Gen 4:1, and the table in geneas 3:24; 36): yet the tribe referred to can hardly be the Kenites of the OT, who appear as the close allies of Israel, not sep, blood-thirsty or revengeful, and haunted by no shadow of early crime against a brother tribe (see Kenites). The indications in 4:1-16 of a developed state of society and a considerable population may go to show that the narrative of the murder was not originally associated with the sons of the first man. Thus there is room to suppose that in the process of condensation and arrangement Cain, son of Adam; Cain, the murderer; and Cain, city-builder and head of a line of patriarchs, have been made one. The critical conclusion here epitomized is demonstrable by a delicate and difficult process; but it is asserted in defense of their favor. We may set up difficulties which could be explained in no other manner. The question which will arise with many, What theory of inspiration can be held consistently with the imposition of such critical processes? is dealt with at length by most modern commentators (see Criticism; Inspiration).

CALAH, kâ'â (7727), kâ'âh; Xâ'âx, Chatlah, also Chalak or Khâlakh; in Assy Kâlkh, Kolâh, Kâlhi, Kalâh (Kal). The same as one of the cities of Nimrod (Gen 10:11), or rather, Asshur (text), which formed, with Nineveh, Rezin between Calah and Nineveh, and Rehoboth-ir (probably lying more to the N.), Asshur's great fourfold capital. The meaning of the name is unknown, but if a Sumerian etymology be accepted, some such sig-nification as "Holy Gate" (Ka-lah) or the like—a parallel to Ka-dingir-a-Bab-ilu, "Gate of God" (see Babel, Babylon)—might be regarded as possible.

As Nineveh is mentioned by Hammurabi, who reigned about 2000 BC, it is clear that that city was already, in his time, an important place; and the passage in Gen 10:11 implies, though it does not actually prove, that Calah was of about the same period. The Assyrian king Asûr-nasir-âpli (cir 885 BC) states that Calah was made (probably founded) by Shalmaneser (1) cir 1300 BC, but this is possibly simply an indication that he rebuilt it. Lator on, the site seems to have become neglected, for Asûr-nasir-âpli states that, the city having fallen into ruin, he rebuilt it, and it thereafter became practically the capital of the country, for he not only repaired or restored its shrines and temples—the temple of the Lady of the Land, and the temples of Sin, Gula, and Enlil—but he also received tribute there. Among his works of art were the water-channel Pati-hengala, and the plantations, whose fruits, apparently, he offered to the god Asûr (Assur), and the temples of the city. It also became a favorite place of residence for the later kings of Assyria who built and restored the city's temples from time to time.

Calah occupied the roughly triangular tract formed by the junction of the Greater Zab (r.) with the Tigris (l.), which latter stream among other things formed the main river, having been rather closer to the western wall than it does now, and would seem to have separated the small town represented by Selamiyeh from the extensive ruins of Calah, which now bear the name of Nineved. The main ruins are situated on a large, rectangular platform on the bank of the old bed of the Tigris. The most prominent edifice was the great Temple-tower at the N.W. corner—a step-pyramid (saq-qua) like the Bab towers, constructed of brick faced with stone, and rising, in stages, to a height of cir 126 ft., probably with a sanctuary at the top (see Babel, Tower of).

A long vault occupies the basement-stage of this structure, and enables Layard to discover its lower part, to regard it as the probable chambered tomb of Ninus, under whose shadow the tragedy of Pyramus and Thisbe took place. Ovid (Metam. iv.96) describes the tomb of Nins as having been situated "at the entrance of Nineveh," and, if this be correct, Calah must have been regarded as the southern portion of that great city, which, on a preaching journey, may well have taken three days (Jon 3:3) to traverse, provided Khorsabad was in reality the Nineved extremity. The platform upon which the temple-tower of Calah was situated measures cir 700×400 yds., and the portion not occupied by that erection offered a space for temples and palaces. In the center of the E. side of this platform lie the remains of the palace of Asûr-nasir-âpli, the chambers and halls of which were paneled with sculptured and inscribed slabs, the principal doorways being flanked with finely carved winged human-headed lions and bulls. In the S.E. corner are the remains of the palace of Esarrhaddon, built, at least in part, with material taken from the palace of Tigrath-pileser IV, which was situated in the S. portion of the platform, and on the west side of the palace of Six in the last quarter of the 7th century B.C., at least as a result of this spoliation, exceedingly meager. The S.W. corner of the platform contains the remains of the last palace built on the site—a very inferior erection constructed for Assûr-bilînî (cir 626 BC). One of the temples on this platform was at first dedicated to Ningîl, situated at the S.W. corner of the temple-tower. The left-hand entrance was flanked by man-headed lions, while the sides of the right-hand entrance were decorated with slabs showing the expulsion of the evil spirit from the temple, fragments of which are now in the Nimroud Gallery of the British Museum. On the right-hand side of the entrance was an arch-headed slab with a representation of King Asûr-nasir-âpli in low relief, standing in a conventional attitude. Before it stood a stone tripod altar, implying that Divine honors were paid to this king. (Both these are now in the British Museum.) The remains of another temple were found to the E. of this, and there are traces of further buildings at other points of the platform.

The slabs from Asûr-nasir-âpli's palace show this king's warlike expeditions, but as descriptive lettering is wanting, the campaigns cannot be identified. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, however, they announce the king's journeys, showing, as they do, incidents of his various campaigns—the crossing of rivers, the march of his armies, the besieging of cities, the reception of tribute, the life of the camp and hunting the lion and the wild boar. The palaces, which are much larger and finer, show the king engaged in various religious ceremonies and ritual acts, and are among the most striking examples of Assyrian sculpture. When looking at these works of art, the student's thoughts go back with thankfulness to those Assyrians who, through the generations, cared for and preserved these monuments, though the vandalism of Esarrhaddon in dressing off the slabs of Tigrath-pileser IV to carve his own bas-reliefs thereon will ever be regretted.

The site is described as being 14 miles S. of Kouyunjik (Nineveh) and consists of an inclosure formed by narrow morrows still having the appearance of walls. Trace of walls of no less than 108 towers, the city's ancient defences, are said to be visible even now on the N. and E., where the walls were square, and caused by a collapse of the area which the walls inclosed—over 2,300×2,006 yds.—would contain about 1,000,000 acres.

Layard, Nineveh and Its Remains, and Nineveh and Babylon, still remain the standard works upon the subject, and his Monuments of Nineveh gives the most complete collection of the sculptures found. See also George Smith, Assyrian Discoveries, and Rassam, Assur and the Land of Nimrod.

CALAMITY, ka-lam'i-ti (תָּכָלִית, "load" or "burden" under which one is crushed; hence "misfortune"); כָלַת, hayyâh, כָּלַת, haywâh; "fall," "ruin," the latter word used only in pl.; כַּל, ra', "evil in essence," hence "adversity," once only, Ps 141:5, RV "wickedness"); Purely an OT term, signifying adversities—natural, but more often those that result from wickedness or moral evil. Various kinds of calamity, as a result of sin, are used in the Bible: (1) disease, poverty, bereavement, as in Job's experience (Job 6:2; 30:13); (2) persecution (2 S 22:19; Ps 18:18); (4) Divine abomination, and judgment (De 32:35); of ruin of the wicked (Prov 18:14), also 27:25 for "dishonour" AV); (5) the devastation of war (Jer 46:21); (6) adversities of any kind (Prov 27:10).

CALAMOLALUS, kal-a-mol-a-lus, -mol'-i-sus (A, Kalamolalous, Kalamolalos, B, Calamolados, Kalumolados): This name is corrupt (Gen 5:22). It has evidently arisen through combining the two names Lod and Hadid, in the lists of Ezra (2:33) and Neh (7:37).

CALAMUS, kal'a-mus. See REED.

CALCOL, kal'kol, CHALKOL, kal'kol (כָּלָכּל, kalahol): Mentioned in 1 K 4:21 as one of the wise men with whom Solomon was compared. The better orthography is Calcol which AV gives for the same name in 1 Ch 2:61. In the former passage, Calcol is the son of Makol, while in the latter he is called the son of Zerah of the tribe of Judah, and a brother of Heman and Ethan.

CALDRON, kol'drun (the rendering of כּלַכּל, kallakhal, סֶּרֶץ, sârêts, דֶּדֶח, dâdâkh, אָפָהִון, ʾaphâhôn): Kallahath is found only in 1 S 2:14; Mic 3:3. It is a pot for cooking, of undefined size and characteristics, in the former passage for sanctuary use, in the latter for domestic. Sîr is tr' caldron in Jer 1:13(RV); 22:18(RV); Ezk 11:5.7.11. It was evidently a large pot, employed both for domestic use and in the sanctuary. Dôdîn is tr' caldron only in 2 Ch 35:13. It was also a pot for cooking. ʾAphôhôn is tr' caldron by AV in Job 41:20, but it is a mistranslation; RV correctly has "rusher." GEORGE RICKER BERRY

CALEB, kal'leb (כָּלֶב, kalah; in the light of the cognate Syr and Arab. words, the meaning is not "dog," which is כָּלָכּל, kalākh, in Heb, but "raging with canine madness"; Xαλῆβ, Chelab): As a person, Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, occurs in the story of the spies (Nu 13:6). He represents the tribe of Judah as its prince (Nu 13:6; of ver 2). While the majority of the men sent out by Moses bring back evil report, Caleb and Hoshea, or Joshua, the son of Nun, are the only ones to counsel the invasion of the promised land (ib, 30; 14:6ff). Accordingly, these two alone are permitted to survive (14:38; 32:12). Upon the conquest and distribution of the land by Joshua, Caleb reminds the leader of the promise made by God through Moses, and sets himself and his descendants (Josh 14:6–15), after driving out from thence the Anakim who were in possession of the city (15:14). In the account in Jgs 1:8f, the disposition of the Can inhabitants of Hebron is ascribed to Judah (ver 19). Both accounts agree in mentioning Otniel, a younger brother of Caleb, as the conqueror of Kirathsepher or Debir; as his reward he receives the hand of Achsah, Caleb's daughter. Achsah is given by her father a portion of the Southland; but, upon request, she obtains a more fruitful locality with upper and nether springs (Josh 15:15-19; Jgs 1:12–15).

In 1 S 30:14 Caleb is undoubtedly the name of a clan which is, moreover, differentiated from Judah. Modern scholars therefore assume that Caleb was originally an independent clan which in historical times merged with Judah. As Caleb is the son of Kenaz (Jgs 1:13) or the Kenizite (Nu 32:12), it is further believed that the Calebites were originally a branch of the clan named Kenaz (Gen 36:11), and that they entered their future homes in the southern part of Pal from the south. Their migration up north would then be reflected in the story of the spies.

In the genealogical tables (1 Ch 2), Caleb is made a descendant of Epher through his father Hezron. He is the brother of Jerahmeel, and the "father" of Hebron and of other towns in Judah. (Chelubai, ver 9, is apparently identical with Caleb.) Caleb, with his brother David had a encounter, is called a Calebite, i.e. one belonging to the house of Caleb (1 S 25:8).

MAX L. MARGOLIS

CALEB-EPRATHAH, kal'leb ʾe-prat'hah (AV Caleb-eprahath, -e-prat'hah, -e-prah'tâh, etc.): The place where Hezron died (1 Ch 2:24). Many scholars, however, would read with the LXX "after the death of Hezron, Caleb came unto Ephrath, the wife of Hezron, his father." The name does not occur elsewhere, and none resembling it has been recovered.

CALENDAR, kal'en-dar (Lat calendarium, "an account book," from calendae, "day on which accounts were due"): The Heb or Jewish calendar had three stages of development: the preliturgical, or Bib.; the postexilic, or Talmudic; and the post-Talmudic. The first rested on observation merely, the second on observation coupled with calculation, and the third on calculation only. In the first period the priests determined the beginning of each month by the appearance of the new moon and the recurrence of the prescribed feasts from the vernal and autumnal equinoxes. Thus the month Abib (ʾāḇib), the first month of the year according to the Jewish law, in the preexilic period to be celebrated, was determined by observation (Ex 12:2; Dt 16).

After the exile more accurate methods of determining the months and seasons came into vogue, and calculation was employed to supplement the other. Observation and calculation were in that calendar regulated according to the Bab system, as is evidenced by the names of the months which are derived from it. In later times the calendar was fixed by mathematical methods (see art. "Calendar" in Jev Enc.). The difficulty of ascertaining the first day of the new moon by observation, in the early period, led to the celebration of two days, as seems to be indicated in 1 S 20:27. We have only four names of months belonging to the preexilic period, and they are Phoen. Of these Abib (ʾāḇib) was the first month, as already indicated, and it corresponded to Nisan (ʾîṣṭân) in the later calendar. It was the month in which the Exodus occurred and the month of the Passover (Ex 13:4; 20:26f; Dt 16:1).

The 21st calendar of this month was Ziv (ʾûw) (1 K 6:137); Ethanim (ʾethânim) was the 7th (1 K 8:2), corresponding to Tishri of the later calendar, and Bul (bull) the 8th, corresponded to Marheness (marēbēnās) (1 K 8:23). There were of course other month names in this old calendar, but they have not come down to us. These names refer to the aspects of the seasons: thus Abib (ʾāḇib) means grain in the ear, just ripeening (Lev 2:14; Ex 9:31); Ziv (ʾûw) refers to the beauty and splendor of the flowers in the spring; Ethanim (ʾethânim) means perennial, probably referring to living fountains; and Bul (bull) means rain or showers, being the month when the rainy season commenced. The full calendar of months used in the postexilic period is given in a table accompanying this art. The names given in the table are not all found in the Bible, as the months are usually referred to by number, but we find Nisan in Neh 2:1 and Est 3:7; Ševan in Est 8:9; Tamûnas in Est 8:14, which is used used refers to a Phoen god after whom the month was named; Šēth in Neh 6:15; Kishlōw (AV "chislew") in Neh 1:1 and Zec 7:1; Ṭebâhēth in Est 2:16; Shēhūth in Zec 1:7 and Azâhar in Est 6:1. The last several months were lunar and began with the new moon, but their position in regard to the seasons varied... somewhat because of the intercalary month about every three years.

The year (נַשְׁנָה, shānāh) originally began in the autumn, as appears from Ex 23:16 and 34:22, where it is stated that the feast of Ingathering should be at the end of the year; the Sabbatical year began also, in the 7th month of the calendar year (Lev 25:8–10), indicating that this had been the beginning of the year. This seems to have been a reckoning for civil purposes, while the year beginning with Nisan was for ritual and sacred purposes. This resulted from the fact that the great feast of the Passover occurred in this month and the other feasts were regulated by this, as we see from such passages as Ex 13:14–16 and Dt 16:1–17. Jos (Ant, I, iii, 3) says: “Moses appointed that Nisan, which is the same with Χριστός, should be the first month of their festivals, because he brought them out of Egypt in that month; so that this month began the year as to all solemnities they observed to the honor of God, although he preserved the original order of the months as to selling and buying and other ordinary affairs.” A similar custom is still followed in Turkey, where the Mohammedan year is observed for feasts, the pilgrimage to Mecca and other sacred purposes, while the civil year begins in March.

The year was composed of 12 or 13 months according as to whether it was ordinary or leap year. Intercalation is not mentioned in Scripture, but it was employed to make the lunar counterpart approximately to the solar year, a month being added whenever the discrepancy of the seasons rendered it necessary. This was regulated by the priests, who had to see that the feasts were duly observed at the proper season. The intercalary month was added after the month of Adar and was called the second Adar (אֲדָר, shēnā, ἠδάρ), “and Adar” (Gen 15:13), and, as already indicated, was added about once in 3 years. More exactly, 4 years out of every 11 years were leap years of 13 months (Jew Enc, art. “Calendar”), this being derived from the Babylonian. If, on the 16th of the month Nisan, the sun had not reached the vernal equinox, that month would be declared to be the second Adar and the following one Nisan. This method, of course, was not exact and about the 4th cent. of our era the mathematical method was adopted. The number of days in each month was fixed, seven having 30 days, and the rest 29. When the intercalary month was added, the first Adar had 30 and the second 29 days. H. PETER

Calf, kāf, ʿayeqel; נְבֵל, nēḇel, or נָב, nēḇ, often rendered “bullcock”): The etymology of both words is uncertain, but the former has a close | in the Arabic, ʿilḥ, “calf.” Par is generally used of animals for sacrifice, ʿayeqel, in that and other senses. ʿAyeqel is used of the golden calves and frequently in the expression, “tatted calf,” or “calf of the stall,” the latter being the literal meaning (I S 25:24; Jer 46:21; Am 6:4; Mal 4:2).

At the present day heef is not highly esteemed by the people of the country, but mutton is much prized. In the houses of the peasantry it is common to see a young ram being literally stuffed with food, mulberry or other leaves being forced into its mouth by one of the women, who then works the sheep’s jaw with one hand. The animal has a daily bath of cold water. The result is deleterious to its health and a tender mutton in due season is called a ma‘laf. From the same root we have ma‘laf, “manger,” suggestive of the Heb marḥb, “stall.”

The calf for sacrifice was usually a male of a year old. Other references to calves are: “to skip like a calf” (Ps 29:6), “the calf and the young lion and the fattening together” (Isa 11:6), “a habitation deserted . . . there shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down, and consume the branches thereof” (Isa 27:10). LITERATURE

I. The Name.—The term ʿayeqel, ʿayeqel, is the ordinary Heb name for a male calf and is as flexible as the Eng. name, applying to any animal from one year old (Mic 6:6) or perhaps younger (Lev 9:3; 12:6) to one three years old (Gen 15:9; cf Jer 34:18,19). It has been thought that the habitual use of this diminutive term for the golden bulls which Aaron and Jeroboam set up—esp. as it is twice made feminine (Hos 10:5; 13:2)—was intended to indicate their small size and thus to express contempt for them. This however, though plausible, is by no means certain. It was not their size which made these bulls contemptible in the eyes of the prophets, and besides there were no life-size bulls of molten gold in any surrounding countries so far as known. The reference to female calves that were kissed (13:2), presumably at Bethel, may refer not to the worship of the bulls, but to their female counterparts. In all such feminine deities invariably accompanied the bull gods. Bethel may be esp. mentioned because it was the “king’s sanctuary” (Am 7:13) or because of the multitude of altars and high places found there (Hos 10:8; cf 8:8; 11:5; Am 5:5). False worship is also mentioned in connection with Jeroboam’s apostacy, at Gilgal and Gilead (Hos 4:15; 12:11;
II. Ancient Calf Worship.—The origin of animal worship is hidden in obscurity, but reverence for the bull and cow is found widespread among the most ancient historic cults. Even in the prehistoric age the influence of the bull symbol was so very powerful that it gave its name to one of the most important signs of the Zodiac, and from early historic times the horns of the bull were the familiar emblem of the rays of the sun, and solar gods were very commonly represented as bull-gods (Jensen, Kosmologie, 62–90; Winckler, Altorientalische Forschungen, 1901–5, passim; Jeremias, Das Alter der bab. Astronomie, 1909, passim). The Egyptians, close neighbors of the Hebrews, in all eras from that of the 13th dynasty, worshipped bulls at Memphis (not Mendes, as E B) and Heliopolis as incarnations of Ptah and Ra, while one of the most elaborate rituals was connected with the life-size image of the Hathor-cow (Naville, Deir el Bahari, Part I [1907], 626–67), while the sun was regarded as the "valiant bull" and the reigning Pharaoh as "Bull of Bulls." But far more important in this connection is the fact that "calf" worship was almost if not quite universal among all the ancient Sem peoples, the immediate ancestors of Abraham did not revere this deity, they were certainly quite unlike their relatives, the Babylonians, among whom, according to all tradition, they lived before they migrated to Pal (Gen 11:29–30; Jos, Ant. I, vi, 6), for the Babylonians revered the bull as the symbol of their greatest gods, Anu and Sin and Marduk—the ideograph of a young bull forming a part of the latter's name—while Hadadrimmon, an important Amorite deity, whose attributes markingly resemble those of Jebel (Jebel B Ward, ATSJ, XXV, 175–85; Clay, Amurru [1909], 87–89), is pictured standing on the back of a bull. In Phoenicia also the bull was a sacred animal, as well as in northern Syria where it ranked as one of the chief deities of the Palaeo-Phoenician images receiving animal worship (see further, Sayce, Enc of Rel. and Ethics, s. v. "Bull"). Among all these peoples the cow goddess was given at least equal honor. In Babylonia the goddess Ishtar has the cow for her symbol on half- or nude seal cylinders, and when this nude or half-nude goddess appears in Pal she often stands on a bull or cow (see William Hayes Ward, Cylinders and Other Ancient Oriental Seals), and under slightly different forms this same goddess is revered in Arabia, Moab, Phoenicia, Syria and elsewhere, while among the Sem Canaanites the bull was the symbol of Baal, and the cow of Astarte (see particularly Barton, Hebratia, IX, 133–43; X, 1–74, and Semitic Origins, ch vii; Driver, Astarte, in Dag. Encyc., xx; see further excavations in Pal have shown that during all eras no heathen worship was as popular as that of Astarte in her various forms (see S. A. Cook, Rel. of Ancient Pal, 1909). That she once is found wearing ram's horns (PEFS [1905], 227) only reveals her nature more clearly as the goddess of fertility. Her liaison to the sacred fish at Carnion in Gilead and to the doves of Ascalon, as well as to female prostitution and to Nature's "resurrection" and fruitage, had been previously noticed, as also her relation to the moon which governs the seasons. Is there any rational motif which can account for this widespread "calf" worship? Is it conceivable that this cult could so powerfully influence such intelligent and rather spiritually-minded nations as the Egyptians and Babylonians that it would wholly have attained no spiritual content? And is there no rational explanation behind this constant fusion of the deity which controls the breeding of cattle with the deity which controls vegetation? How did the bull come to represent the "corn spirit" so that the running of a bull through the corn (the most destructive act) came to pressage good crops; and how did the rending of a bull, spilling its life blood on the soil, increase fertility? (See Fraser, Golden Bough, 11, 291–95, 344.). The one real controlling motif of all these various representations and functions of the "calf" god may be found in the ancient awe, esp. among the Semites, for the Mystery of Life. This seems to offer a sufficient reason why the bull, which is a most conspicuous exaltation of life and hence a god, should be so closely connected with the reproductive processes of the animal and vegetable kingdoms and also with the sun, which from earliest historic times was considered as preeminently the "giver of life." Bull worship was the most impressive exhibition of gross animalism, but, certainly in Bible times, often represented a concept which was the product of reflection upon one of the deepest mysteries of Nature. Few hymns in Egypt or Babylon exist on higher than the bull as a symbol of aspiration than those addressed to the bull gods or to others honored with this title, e.g. this one to the god Sin of Ur, the "heifer of Anu," "Strong young bull, with strong horns, . . . with beard of lapis-lazuli color and golden self-created fruit. . . . Mother-womb who has taken up his abode, begetter of all things, exalted habitation among living creatures; O merciful gracious father, in whose hand rests the life of the whole world; O Lord, thy divinity is full of awe like the far-off heavens and the broad ocean!" (Rogers, Religion of Babylon and Assyroia [1908], 164). Many modern scholars believe that the primitive Egyptians and Babylonians really thought of their earthly and heavenly gods as animals (see esp. Maspero, Bulletin critique, 1886; Rense de l'histoire des religions, 1888), but it seems certain that at least as early as the date of the Exodus these stars and beasts were not regarded as all being themselves deities, but rather as symbols or representations of deity (Davis and Coben, Ancient Egypt, 281–89; Brugsch, Die Aegyptologie, 1, 135; Chwolson, Die Storber u. der Storberis, II, 134).

The text of Ex 32 is certainly composite (see e.g. Bacon's "Exodus" in loc. and DB), and some words and phrases are a verbal duplicate of the narrative of Jeroboam's calf worship (cf Ex 32 4 with 1 K 12 28, and see columns in Driver's "Apologetical Golden Calf"). Some Bible critics so analyze the text as to make the entire calf story a later element, without ancient content, added to some short original statement like Ex 32 7–11, for the sake of glorifying Jeroboam's bull worship and its non-Levitical priesthood (see e.g. Kuenen, Hexateuch). Most recent critics have however accepted the incident as an ancient memory or historic fact attested by the oldest sources, and used the verb, though the verbal form may have been affected by the later editor's scorn of the northern apostasy. It seems clearly unreasonable to suppose that a Heb writer at any era would so fiercely abuse his own ancestors, without any traditional basis for his statement, as that of adding a little more which cast reproach upon his northern neighbors, and it seems equally unlikely Am 4 4; 5 5), Samaria. (Hos 8 6; 10 5; 13 2 16); and Beersheba (Am 5 5; 8 14), where no bulls had been set up by Jeroboam so far as stated. That these places receive more censure than Dan—people is on the immediate foundations of one passage (8 14) though it was a chief center of the bull worship (1 K 12 30)—may be due to the fact that the worship of the female deity was the more popular. This was certainly true in neighboring countries also in other cities in Pal, as has recently been proved by the excavations (see below).

that any such baseless charges would have been accepted as true by the slandered nation. The old expositors, accepting the essential historicity of the account, generally followed Philo and the early Fathers in supposing this calf of gold was an imitation of the 18th or Mowris bulls of Egypt, and this is occasionally yet advocated by some Egyptologists (e.g. Steinendorf, Ancient Egypt [1903], 167; cf. also Jeremias, OT in Light of Ancient East [1911], II, 138). The objections made to this view by the skeptics of the 18th cent. based on the supposed impossibility of such chemical and mechanical skill being possessed at that era, have mostly been made obsolete by recent discovery. The common modern objection that this could not have been Apis worship and nowhere more Apis worship than in Canaan has been conclusively established, since images of Apis are not uncommon and were probably worshipped in the temple itself. It may be added that a renaissance of this worship occurred at this very era. So Erman, Hay, and Egypt in the Holy Land (1909), 279-280, note that during the reign of Horemheb, the god known to be the god of a particular country and it would seem impossible that a native Egyptian god should be thought of as joining with Egyptian enemies and assisting them to reach a land over which he had no control. (3) The Old Testament is a religious document which was codified from Egypt, but was immensely influenced from Canaan and Babylon, Apis only being mentioned once (Jer 46:20 [tvr "heifer"]; cf. Ezek 20:7,8, and see Brugsch, Steininschrift und Bibelwort, passim, and Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, 217). (3) The bull and cow are now known to have been ordinary symbols for the most popular deities which were worshipped by all the races-relatives of the Hebrews and Egyptians as well as some people in Canaan and the adjoining districts (see above). (4) Some of the chief gods of the pastoral land of Goshen, where the Hebrews had resided for centuries (Gen 47:6; 50:8), were Sem gods which were worshipped not only by the Egyptians but also by the foreign element living there by the "pools of Pithom" (cf. Ex 1 11) but by the native Egyptians, Ramses II even naming a daughter after one of these. The special god of this district had as its symbol a bull calf, and one of the ordinary symbols was a statue of a golden calf of 600 pounds weight which it was the custom to dedicate annually to one of these Sem gods, while another inscription mentions a statue of gold of "a cubit in height" (Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt [1905], III, 690-38; Naville, Goshen, Store City of Pithon; Erman, Handbook, 173-74; Brugsch, op. cit.). (5) The chief proof, however, is the statement of the text that the feast in connection with this worship was a "feast to Jehovah" (Ex 23:14). When Jehovah appeared on forty days in the Mount, it was not unnatural that the people should turn back to the visible symbols worshipped by their ancestors, and should give to them the new name or new attributes which had been attached to deity by Moses. The worship was condemned for much the same reason as that of Jeroboam's calves (see next section).

Though this passage (1 K 12:26-33; cf. 2 Ch 10:14.15) has been riddled further, "there is no reason to infer that any detail of fact is underridden by history" (Burney, Heb Text of Kings [1902], and DB). These calves which Jeroboam set up were doubtless bulls (1 K 12:28, 36) but at least as early as Hosea's time it seems probable (see above) that the more licentious worship of the feminine prin-

- II. Attitude of Elijah to the Bull Symbols. This surprising silence is variously explained. A few scholars, though without any historic or textual evidence for the charge, are sure that the Bible narratives (though written by southern men) are fundamentally defective at this point, otherwise they would report Elijah's antagonism to this cult. Other Jews, however, admit it but severely criticize the testimony of this book. Still others, more probably, explain his position on the ground that, though he may not have favored the bull symbol—which was never used by the Hebrews so far as known, and certainly was not used as a symbol of Jehovah. The text itself identifies these images with Aaron's calf (1 K 12:28), so that nearly all the reasons given above to prove that Aaron's image represented not an Egyptian but an ancient Sem (Deity or goddess) are here applied to the calf of Jeroboam. To these various other arguments may be added: (1) The text itself states that it is Jehovah who brought them from Egypt (Hos 2:15; 15:4). They would be called "my lord," and to whom they swear (Hos 2:16). (2) There is no evidence of any similar sacrifices, offerings, sacrifices and feasts (Hos 8:5, 8:5, 5). (3) The ritual, though freer, was essentially that of the calves from Egypt, and there is no evidence that this bull worship was anything but an inheritance from Egypt, and that nothing was copied from Egypt. (4) The southern prophets recognized that it was Jehovah who had given Jeroboam the kingdom (1 K 11:21; 12:15-24) and only Jehovah and the worship of Jehovah. The Israelites never realized Jeroboam's purpose of attaching to the throne by this cult such devout citizens as would otherwise be driven to Jehovah. It was to the advantage of the royal family to have the national sanctuary made to devote souls that this counter worship had been established. As Budde says, "A foreign cult would only have driven the devout Ephraimites the more surely over to Jerusalem" (see Oppenheim, Israel, 113). Jeroboam was not attempting to shock the conscience of his adherents by making heathenism the state religion, but rather to win these pious worshippers of Jehovah to his cause. (5) The places selected for the bull worship were strongholds of his. This was the manner of the Bethel which, before Jerus had been captured from the Jebusites, had been identified with special revelations of Jehovah's presence (Gen 12:4; 28:19; 31:13; 35:15; 1 S 7:16; Hos 12:9-4). (6) The history shows that the allegiance of his most pious subjects was retained (1 K 12:20) and that not even Jehovah fled to Jerusalem, supposing that the Northern Kingdom had accepted the worship of heathen gods as true, rather he sent the prophet who was to avenge of this, Elijah, though he was the boldest opponent of the worship of false gods (though never reported as uttering one word against the bull worship at Dan and Bethel.

- III. Attitude of Elijah to the Bull Symbols. This surprising silence is variously explained. A few scholars, though without any historic or textual evidence for the charge, are sure that the Bible narratives (though written by southern men) are fundamentally defective at this point, otherwise they would report Elijah's antagonism to this cult. Other Jews, however, admit it but severely criticize the testimony of this book. Still others, more probably, explain his position on the ground that, though he may not have favored the bull symbol—which was never used by the Hebrews so far as known, and certainly was not used as a symbol of Jehovah.
Southern Kingdom, or Hosea the northern prophet would have spoken of it—yet being himself a northern man of old ideals and simple habits, Elijah may have believed that, even with this handicap, the freer and more democratic worship carried on at the ancient holy places in the north was far better than the elaborate and luxurious ritual of the aristocratic and exclusive priesthood of the S, which insisted upon political and religious centralization, and was dependent upon such enormous revenues for its support (cf 1 K 12 10,14). At any rate it is self-evident that if Elijah had turned against Jeroboam and the state religion, it would have divided seriously the forces which needed to unite, in order to oppose with all energy the much fouler worship of Baal which just at this crisis, as never before or afterward, threatened completely to overwhelm the worship of Jeh.

IV. Attitude of Amos and Hosea to the Bull Symbols.—It is easy to see why Hosea might fiercely condemn a ritual which Elijah might rightly tolerate. (1) The calf worship may have deteriorated. Elijah lived closer to the time when the new state ritual was inaugurated and would naturally be at its best. Hosea lived at an era when he could trace the history of the experiment for nearly two centuries, and could see clearly that these images had not helped but greatly hindered the development of the ethical and spiritual religion of Jeh. Even if at first recognized as symbols, these images had become common idols (Hos 12 11; 13 2) and passion 3: “This thing became a sin” (1 K 13 30; 13:34). The history of religion shows many such instances where the visible or verbal symbol which in one era had been a real aid to devotion at a later time became positively antagonistic to religion. As Baal was a worshiped under the form of a calf and as Jeh himself was at times called “Baal” (Isa 54 5; Jer 31 32; Hos 2 16 Heb) this unethical tendency would be accelerated, as also by the political antagonism between Judah and Ephraim and the bitter hatred between the two rival priesthoods (cf 2 Ch 11 15; 13 9). Certain it is that by the middle of the 8th cent. the worship at Dan and Bethel had extended itself to many other points and had become so closely affiliated to the heathen worship as to be practically indistinguishable—at least when viewed from the later prophetic standpoint. But (2) it cannot be doubted that the prophetic standpoint had changed in 200 years. As the influence of the northern worship had tended toward heathenism, so the influence of the southern worship of an imageless God had tended toward higher spiritual ideals. Elijah could not have recognized the epoch-making importance of an imageless temple. The constant pressure of this idea—God is Spirit—had developed a new spiritual conscience, which by the 5th cent. was so keen that the worship of Jeh under the form of an image was not improperly considered as almost if not quite as bad as out-and-out heathenism just as the Reformation of the 16th cent. regarded the Roman Catholic images as little better than idols (Hos 8 5,6; 11 2; 13 2; cf 2 K 17 16,17). The influence of this new conscience is also seen in the fact that it is not simply or perhaps chiefly the “calves” which are condemned, but the spirit of the deity as the place of the soul. The N. was too far away to have lost its importance when unaccompanied by kind-ness and spiritual knowledge (Hos 6 6; 7 1), and it is the absence of this essential spirit, rather than the form of worship, which Amos and Hosea condemned in the Northern Kingdom (Am 2 6,8; 3 10; I 41; 5 7,12-15,21-24; 6 12; 8 4-6; Hos 4 23; 9 1; 10 12-14). These later prophets could also see, as Elijah could not possibly have seen, that unity of worship was imperfectly needed, and that sacrifices in the old sacred “high places” must be discontinued. Religious芊, intolerance, or religious disintegration be avoided. A miscellaneous and unregulated Jeh cult might become almost as bad as heathenism. Indeed it might be worse if it gave the Baal spirit and interpretation to Jeh worship. See also, Bible Dictionary, II 2.

Calf Image. See Images.

Caltitas, kal-i-tas (Kali-atis, Kaliatis, or Kali-vas, Kaliavas): One of the Levites who put away their foreign wives at the request of Esdras (Ezra), 1 Esd 9 23, “Colius, who was called Calitas.” Je 9 9, where the Gr form, καλητις “priest” is used. See also passage, Ezr 10 23, “Kelaiah, the same is Kelta.” He is also named with those who explained the law when read to the people by Esdras (1 Esd 9 48; cf Neh 8 7). It is not certain whether he is to be identified with the Kieita of the Northern Kingdom, Hosea 11 1, 2 (the Levites who signed the covenant made by Neb- niah). The word probably means “dwart.”

Calling, kalling (καλλίγος, kalligós, from kaló, “call”): Is a NT expression. The word is used chiefly by Paul, though the idea and term are found also elsewhere. It has a definite, technical sense, the invitation given to men by God to accept salvation in His kingdom through Jesus Christ. This invitation is given outwardly by the preaching of the gospel, inwardly by the work of the Holy Spirit. With reference to Israel, it is on the part of God irrecoverable, not repented of. Having in His eternal counsel called this people, He intrusted them with great gifts, and because He did thus enrich them, He also, in the course of time, summoned them to fulfill the task of witness to the world into the way of salvation, and of preparing salvation for the world. Therefore He will not desert His people, for He will not revoke that call (Rom 11 29). This calling is high or upward, in Christ, that is, in made in heaven by God through account of Christ and calling man to heaven (Phil 3 14). Similarly it is a heavenly calling (He 3 1); also a holy calling, holy in aim, means, and end (2 Tim 1 9). Christians are urged to work worthy of this calling (Eph 4 1) (AV and RV, but AV has “vocation”). In it there hope; it is the inspirer of hope, and furnishes for hope its supreme object (Eph 4 4). Men are exhorted so to live that God will count worthy of their calling (2 Thess 1 11). They are also exhorted to make sure of their election sure (2 Pet 1 10). See ELECTION. There is somewhat peculiar use of the word in 1 Cor 1 26 and 7 20, namely, that condition of life in which men were when God called them, not of many of them wise after the flesh, neither of mighty, nor noble born, but circumscribed, some uncircum- cised, some bond, some free, some male, some female, some married, some unmarried.

Callisthenes, ka-li-sthe-nès (Kaloidhēnes, Kaloidhēnēs): An officer of Nicamor who was charged with the burning of the sacred portals of the temple at the time of the desecration under Antiochus Epiphanes (168 BC). After the decisive defeat of Nicanor's army at Emmaus (165 BC) the Jews celebrated the victory in the city of their fathers and buried C. who had fled into an outhouse with others who had set the sacred gates on fire, "the meet reward of their impiety" (2 Macc 8:33).

CALNEH, kal'ne, CALNO, kal'no (קַנָּה, kalnā; Χαλάννη, Chalanna): The name of the fourth city of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen 10:10), the three identified preceding it being Babel, Erech, and with Accad, i.e. the capital of the realm of Nippur, Babylonia and the chief cities of three of the principal states. The meaning of the name is unknown, and many regard the identification as uncertain. G. Rawlinson thought it to be the modern Niffer (or Nofour), comparing the Talmudic (ד' Ḥoma) Nopher, which is said to be the same as Calneh. What place-name Calneh corresponds with in cuneiform is doubtful. Fried. Delitzsch (Wo lag die Paradiese?) compared it with כלה, and as we are told to pronounce this glosсa as Kullaba, it seems unlikely that there is any connection between the two. The identification proposed by G. Rawlinson, however, may be regarded as being supported by the bilingual Creation-legend, in which Mesh (Nimrod) is the founder of Babylon, Erech and Nippur, which would in that case be three of the four cities mentioned in Gen 10:10.

The inscriptions refer to us Nippur as a city with a glorious past. Sargon of Agade, Sur-Engur, Dunq and all the more prominent 2. Nippur's kings of Babylon in its larger sense Importance interested themselves in the rebuilding and restoration of its renowned temples, so as to gain the favor of their great divinities. The city's earlier divine patrons were Enil and Ninlil, theolder Bel and Bēltis, whose shrines were at the great temple-tower called E-kura, "the house of the land," and a poetical legend in Sumerian (dialectical) re-creating their visit to the city, and Their enmounting its sacred places, still Legends exists (PSBA, March, 1911, 85 ff.). Later, the chief divinities of the city seem to have been Ninlīp, the son of Enlī, and his spouse Nin-Niprī, the lady of Ninpir. These two divine beings likewise evoked the use of the city-scribes, who dealt with the glories of the god in a composition extending over several tablets, in which his favor to his spouse Nin-Niprī is extolled; and to whom a career very similar to that of Merodach, the head of the Bāb pantheon, is attributed (PSBA, December, 1906, 270 ff.). The great temple-tower of Nisser, which was dedicated to the god Enlī, was a very striking object among the buildings and temples of the city, and the lower stages are still in an extremely perfect condition. Most interesting, 4. Its Ruins also, are the remains of streets and Today houses which enable the general conditions of life in ancient Babylon to be estimated, and suggest that they are similar to those subsisting even at the present day. Our knowledge of the city is almost entirely due to the American excavations at Nisser, inaugurated by Rev. J. P. Peters, who have been most fruitful, and have shed a new light on the city's history. See Peters' Nipper (2 vols., 1887); the many volumes written or edited by Professor H. V. Hilprecht under the general title The Babylonian Expedition of the University of Pennsylvania; and Professor A. T. Clay's Light on the OT from Babel (Philadelphia, 1907).

CALVES, kal'vēs, OF THE LIPS (LXX καρποὶ χαλαννίων, καρπὸν χαλαννίων): This is the AV rendering of a dubious Heb text in Hos 14:2 (קַנָּה הַפְּרוֹת, pārūn sphāthēnā); The RV runs "So will we render as bullocks the offering of our lips." Strange as the text is, it may be retained, and it admits of at least a possible explanation. The prophet calls on his contemporaries to return in penitence to Jeh. Their worship should consist not of meaningless dumb ritual, but of "words"—hymns and prayers, expressive of real gratitude and of actual pledges of repentance and reform. The people respond and undertake that their worship shall consist of "calves or bullocks of lips," i.e. not of animal offerings, but of promises of reform or vows of obedience. But this explanation is forced and most modern commentators follow the LXX, which presupposes a slightly different Hebrew text, and renders קַנָּה הַפְּרוֹת, pārūn sphāthēnā, "fruit of our lips," i.e. adoring gratitude or, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who quotes this verse from the LXX, explains it, "sacrifice of praise" (He 13:15). The same phrase occurs in Isa 57:15, where it signifies gladsmance gratitude.

CAMBYSES, kam'-bi-sēz (Aram., חzbek; Pers, Kambýzísa; Assy, Kambuzea; Egypt, Kamhýzeō; Susan, Kambuteja): The older son of Cyrus, king of Persia. Some have thought that he is the Ahasuerus of Ezr 4:6. This seems to be most improbable, inasmuch as the Heb form of Ahasuerus is the exact equivalent of the Old Pers form of Xerxes, and we have no evidence that Cambyses was ever called Xerxes.

Ancient authorities differ as to who was the mother of Cambyses. It is variously said that she was Cassandane, a Pers princess, Amytis, a Median princess, or Atossa, a daughter of Darius the Great of Egypt. He had one brother, Bardes or Smerdes, whom he put to death secretly shortly after his accession, probably because of an attempted rebellion. Cambyses organized an expedition for the conquest of Egypt, which was rendered successful by internal treachery and by the aid of the Phoen, Cyprian and Gr fleets. During this campaign Cambyses seems to have acted with good generalship and with clemency toward the conquered. After the subjugation of Egypt, Cypria and Barca, the modern Tripoli, submitted to his sway. He then desired to undertake the conquest of Carthage, but was compelled to give it up, because his Phoen allies, without whose ships it was impossible for him to conduct his army in safety, refused to lend an attack upon a country that had been colonized by them. He is said to have sent an army of 50,000 men against the oasis of Jupiter Ammon. This army is said to have perished in the sands. A little less unsuccessful expedition was made against Ethiopia. After some initial successes, Cambyses was forced to return to Egypt with the shattered remains of his army. He found that the Egyptians were in revolt, led by their king Psmennaicus III, whose life he had formerly spared. This revolt was put down with great harshness, the Egypt king, being taken and executed, and many of the temples being destroyed. Shortly after this, Cambyses heard that a certain Magian, who claimed to be his brother Smerdes whom he had secretly put to death, had set himself up as king of Persia. Cambyses, with the whole of his Asiatic dominions had acknowledged him as king. With the fragments of his army he started toward Persia to attack the usurper, but on the way was killed by a wound inflicted by himself, it is certain whether by accident or with intention. His general and cousin, Darius Hystaspis, soon put down the false Smerdes and reigned in his stead.

For two or more years Cambyses was king of Babylon, while his father was king of the lands. The son was a drunkard and subject to fits of unbridled passion, but seems to have been of good capacity as a general and as an administrator. Many of the tales that have been told against him were doubtless invented by his enemies, and he has left us no records of his own. That he married his own sisters is probable; but it must be remembered that this was the custom of the Egypt kings of that time and may have been of the Pers kings as well. As to his conduct in Egypt, the only contemporary Egypt authority says that he worshipped before the holiness of Neit as all the pious kings had done; that he ordered that the temple of Neit should be purified, and that its revenues should be restored as they had been before they had been confiscated by Akhmes for his Gr troops. He adds also that not merely were the strangers who had taken up their abode in the temple of Neit ejected from her sanctuary, but that their goods were taken away and their houses destroyed. Darius Hystaspis, the only other contemporary source of information, says of him simply that he was the son of Cyrus, of the same father and mother as Barzis, whom he slew secretly at some time before he set out on his Egypt campaign; and that he died by suicide shortly after he had heard of the rebellion of Persia. Media, and the other provinces against him, and of the establishment of Cambyses the Magian as king under the claim that he was “Barzis, the son of Cyrus and brother of Cambyses.”

The name of Cambyses is found in three of the Elephantine papyri recently published (September, 1911) by Professor Sachau of Berlin. The fragment numbered 59 is so broken that it is impossible to make out the connection or the sense. In papyrus I, we are told that when Cambyses came to Egypt he found in the fortress of Jeb (Elephantine) a temple or synagogue (agoras), which had been built in the days of the Egypt kings; and that although he had torn down the temples of the Egypt gods, he had allowed no harm to be done to that of Jeh. The third papyrus is so interesting, because of its mention of Bagoas, the Persa governor of Jerus in 407 BC, who had hitherto been known only from Jos, and of Dalaiah the son of the Sanballat who opposed the rebuilding of the wall of Jerus in the time of Ezra-Nehemiah, that we shall now give a tr of it in full: "A messenger of that which Bagous and Dalaiah said to me: Thou shalt say in Egypt unto Arames with regard to the house of the altar of the God of heaven that was built in the fortress of Yeb before the time of Cambyses and which the accused (?) Wadars destroyed in the 14th year of Darius the king, that it shall be built and set upon its place as it was before, and that meal-offerings and incense-offerings shall be offered upon that altar as they used to be."

Camel’s Hair

nearly the only reference to their use by the later Israelites was when David was made king over all Israel at Hebron, when camels were mentioned among the animals used for bringing food for the celebration (1 Ch 12 40). David had a herd of camels, but the herdman was Ohol, an Ishmaelite (1 Ch 27 30). Nearly all the other Bib. references to camels are to those possessed by Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Ishmaelites, Amalekites, Midianites, Hagrites and the “children of the East” (see East). Two references to camels (Gen 13 16; Ex 9 3) are regarded as puzzling because the testimony of the Egyptian monuments is said to be against the presence of camels in ancient Egypt. For this reason, Gen 12 16, in connection with Abram’s visit to Egypt, is turned to account by Canon Cheyne to substantiate his theory that the Israelites were not in Egypt but in a north Arab. land of M’sri (EB s.v. “Camel”), 4. While the flesh of the camel was forbidden to the Israelites, it is freely eaten by the Arabs.

There are three references to the camel in NT: (1) to John’s raiment of camel’s hair (Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6); (2) the words of Jesus that “it is easier for a camel to go through a needle’s eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God” (Mt 19 24; Mk 10 25; Lk 18 25); (3) the proverb applied to the Pharisees as blind guides, “that strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel” (Mt 23 24). Some MSS read kómilos, “a cable,” in Mt 19 24 and Lk 18 25.

There are a few unusual words which have been trad “camel” in text or margin of one or the other version. (See list of words at beginning of art.) Bekher and bikhráh clearly mean a young animal, and the Arab. root word and derivatives are used similarly to the Heb. Rákhásh, the root of rekhes, is compared with the Arab. rakád, “to run,” and, in RV, rekhes is tr “swift steeds.” Kārkrádh, ram-mákhím and ‘dasháhránim must be admitted to be of doubtful etymology and uncertain meaning.

CAMEL’S HAIR (Γενίκες καμηλίου, triches kamé- lou): In Mt 3 4 and Mk 1 6 the description of John’s raiment is explicit to the extent of telling the kind of hair of which his raiment was made. It is probable that his garment was made of a caved camel skin, for the more expensive woven camel’s hair garment would not be in keeping with the rest of the description. It is still common among the poor in some parts of Syria, when a camel or other animal dies, to remove its skin and, after treating the inner surface to stop decomposition, to make it up into various domestic articles. The writer once saw a peasant dragging a skin along the road which proved to be that of a donkey which had just died on the route. His intention was probably to make it up into a cloak. Some believe that Elijah’s mantle was of camel’s hair (2 K 1 8; cf Zec 13 4). Of that we cannot be sure, for in the East today the hairy garment is usually goat’s hair or wool either woven or still clinging to the skin. It was much more likely to have been one of these latter. See SHEEP Raising. Camel’s hair, when woven into fabrics, as in rugs, makes an article of even softer and more glossy texture than wool. See WEAVING.
Middle Ages seem to be fairly divided as to the two sites. Saeulfi (1102), Brocardus (1183), Marinus Sanutus (1321), Breydenbach (1483) and Anselm (1507) favor the northern site; while on the other side, Kefr Kenna may be reckoned St. Paula (383), St. Willibald (720), Isaac Chelo (1334) and Quaresimus (1616). It seems pretty certain that the Crusaders adopted the identification with Khirbet Kana (Conder, Tent Work, 691). While no absolute decision is possible, on the available evidence probable points to the northern site.

Col. Conder puts in a claim for a third site, that of 'Ain Kana on the road from er-Reineh (a village about 1/4 mile from Nazareth on the Tiberias road) to Tabor (Tent Work, 81).

Canaan is stated in Gen 10 6 to have been a son of Ham and brother of Miriam, or Egypt. This indicates the Mosaic period when the conquerors of the XVIIIth and XIXth Egypt Dynasties made Canaan for a time a province of the Egypt empire. Under the Pharaoh Menephta, at the time of the Exodus, it ceased to be connected with Egypt, and the Egyptian garrisons in the S. of the country were expelled by the Philis, who probably made themselves masters of the larger portion of it, thus causing the name of Philistia or Philistia to become synonymous with that of Canaan (see Zeph 2 5). In the Am. Tab., Canaan is written Kinakh and Kinakhi. The latter form corresponds with the Gr Xēla (Chnå), a name given to Phoenicia (Heqat. Fragments 254; Eusebius, Praep. Ev., 110; ix 17).

In Nu 13 29 the Canaanites are described as dwelling "by the sea, and along by the side of the Jordan," i.e., in the lowlands of Pal.

1. Geography
   1. The name was confined to the country
   2. The Am. Tab. so in the OT, Canaan is used in an extended sense to denote the whole of Pal W. of the Jordan (Gen 12 5; 23 219; 28 1; 31 18; 35 6; 36 2; 37 1; 48 7; Ex 15 16; Nu 13 2; Josh 14 1; 21 2; Js 13 20); hence Sidon is called the "firstborn" of Canaan (Gen 10 15, though of Js 3 3), and the LXX translates "Canaanitae" by "Phoenicians" and "Canaan" by the "land of the Phoenicians" (Ex 16 35; Josh 5 12). Kinakhki is used in the same restricted sense in the Am Tab., but it is also extended so as to include all Pal generally. On the other hand, on the Egyptian monuments Seti I calls a town in the extreme S. of Pal "the city of Pa-Kana'ana" or "the Canaan," which Conder identifies with the modern Khirbet Kenna near Hebron.

As in the Am Tab., so in the OT, Canaan is used in an extended sense to denote the whole of Pal W. of the Jordan (Gen 12 5; 23 219; 28 1; 31 18; 35 6; 36 2; 37 1; 48 7; Ex 15 16; Nu 13 2; Josh 14 1; 21 2; Js 13 20); hence in the sense of "the land of the Canaanites" (Ex 16 3), and Isa (19 18) terms Hebrew, which was shared by the Israelites with the Phoenicians and, apparently, also the Amorites, "the language of Canaan." Jabin is called "the king of Canaan" in Js 4 22.22; but whether the name is employed here in a restricted or extended sense is uncertain.

As the Phoenicians were famous as traders, it has been supposed that the name "Canaanite" is a synonym of "merchant." This, however, is uncertain.

2. Meaning of the OT. The pursuit of the trade, however, was characteristic only of the maritime cities of Phoenicia, not of the Canaanitish towns conquered by the Israelites. In Isa 23 14 we should read "Canaan" (as LXX) instead of "merchant city." AV; in Hos 12 7 (8), "as for Canaan" (LXX), instead of "he is a merchant." AV; in Zeph 1 11, "people of Canaan" (LXX), instead of "merchant people" (AV); on the other hand, "the Amorite" seems to have acquired the sense of "merchant," as "Chaldean" did of "astrologer," in Isa 23 8, and Prov 31 24, though probably not in Zec 14 21, and Job 41 6 (Heb 40 30).

Much light has been thrown upon the history of Canaan prior to the Israelitish occupation by recent excavation, supplemented by the monuments of Babylonia and Egypt. The Results of Pal Exploration led the way by its excavation of sites in 1890-92 at Tell el-Amarna Tablets, Tell Ma'ad, the supposed site of Gat; at Tell Sandahanna, the ancient Marissa, a mile S. of Bēt Jibrin, where interesting relics of the Gr period were found, and at Jerus, where an attempt was made to trace the city walls.

Next to Lachish, the most fruitful excavations have been at Gezer, which has been explored by Mr. Macalister with scientific thoroughness and skill, and where a large necropolis has been discovered as well as the remains of seven successive settlements, the last of which is dated to the Seleucid era, the third corresponding with the first settlement at Lachish. The two first settlements go back to the neolithic age. With the third the Sem or "Amorite" period of Canaan begins; bronze smelting makes its appearance; high places and altars are erected, and inhuman rites are eliminated, while the cities are surrounded with great walls of stone. While Mr. Macalister has been working at Gezer, German and Austrian expeditions led by Dr. Schumacher have been excavating at Tell en-Mutesellim, the site of Megido, and under Dr. Sellin first at Tell Taanach, the ancient Tanach, and then at Jericho. At Taanach cuneiform tablets of the Mosaic age were found in the house of the governor of the town; at Tell en-Nasbeh and Gezer cuneiform tablets have also been found, but they belong to the late Assyrian and Babylonian periods.

At Jericho, on the flat roof of a house adjoining the wall of the Canaanitish city, destroyed by the Israelites, a number of clay tablets were discovered laid out to dry before being inscribed with cuneiform characters. Before the letters were written and dispatched, however, the town, it seems, was captured and burnt.

An American expedition, under Dr. Reinsch, is now exploring Sebastiyeh (Samaria), where the remains of Ahab's palace, discovered by E. Reimann, and Hebrew inscriptions, have been brought to light, as well as a great city wall built in the age of Nebuchadrezzar.

(1) The stone age.—The history of Canaan begins with the palaeolithic age, palaeolithic implements having been found in the lowlands. Our first knowledge of its population dates from the neolithic period. The neolithic inhabitants of Gezer were of short stature (about 5 ft. 4 in. in height), and lived in caves—at least in the time of the first prehistoric settlement—and burned their dead. Their sacred place was a double cave with which cup-marks in the rock were connected, and their pottery was rude; some of it was ornamented with streaks of red or black on a yellow or red wash. In the time of the second settlement a rude stone wall was built around the town. The debris of the two neolithic settlements is as much as 12 ft. in depth, implying a long period of accumulation.

The neolithic population was succeeded by one of Sem type, which introduced the use of metal, and buried its dead. The name of Amorite has been given to it, this being the name under which the Sem population of Canaan was known to the Babylonians. Gezer was surrounded by a great wall of stone intersected by brick towers; at Lachish the Amorite wall was of crude brick, nearly 20 ft. in thickness (cf Dt 11:28). A “high-place” was erected at Gezer consisting of 9 monoliths, running from N. to S., and surrounded by a platform of large stones. The second monolith has been polished by the kisses of the worshippers; the seventh was brought from a distance. Under the pavement of the sanctuary lay the bones of children, more rarely of adults, who had been sacrificed and sometimes burnt, and the remains deposited in jars. Similar evidences of human sacrifice were met with under the walls of houses both here and at Taanach and Megiddo. In the Israelitish strata the food-bowl and lamp for lighting the dead in the other world are retained, but all trace of human sacrifice is gone. At Lachish in Israelitish times the bowls and lamp were filled with sand. The second “Amorite” city at Gezer had a long existence. The high-place was enlarged, and an Egyptian of the age of the XIXth Dynasty was buried within its precincts. Egypt scarabs of the XIIth and XIIIth Dynasties are now met with; these give rise to the scarabs of the Hyksos kings, and finally to those of the XVIIIth Dynasty (1600 BC). Hittite painted pottery of Cappadocian type is also found in the later debris of the city as well as seal-cylinders of the Bab pattern.

Meanwhile Canaan had for a time formed part of the Bab empire. Gudea, viceroy of Lagus under the kings of the Dynasty of Ur (2500 BC), had brought “limestone” from the “land of the Amorites,” alabaster from Mt. Lebanon, cedar-beams from Amanus, and gold-dust from the desert between Pal and Egypt. A cadastral survey was drawn up about the same time by Uru-malki, “the governor of the land of the Amorites,” the name by which Syria and Canaan were known to the Babylonians, and colonies of “Amorites” emerged in trade were settled in the cities of Babylonia. After the fall of the Dynasty of Ur, Babylonia was itself conquered by the Amorites who founded the dynasty to which Khammurabi, the Amraphel of Gen 14, belonged (see Hammurabi, Code of). An inscription found near Ha-biruk the only title given to Khammu-rabi is “king of the land of the Amorites.” Bab now became the official, literary and commercial language of Canaan, and schools were established there in which the cuneiform script was taught. Canaanitish culture became wholly Bab; even its theology and gods were derived from Babylonia. The famous legal code of Khammu-rabi (see Hammurabi, Code of) was enforced in Canaan as in other parts of the empire, and traces of its provisions were found in Abram’s adoption of his slave Eliezer, Sara’s conduct to Hagar, and Rebekah’s receipt of a dowry from the father of the bridegroom are examples of this. So, too, the sale of the cave of Machpelah was in accordance with the Bab legal forms of the Khammu-rabi age. The petty kings of Canaan paid tribute to their Bab suzerain, and Bab officials and commercial travelers (damgari) frequented the country.

Jerusalems founded.—We must ascribe to this period the foundation of Jerus, which bears a Bab name (Uru-Salim, “the city of Salim”), and commanded the road to the naphtha springs of the Dead Sea. Jerus was one of the most important articles of Bab trade on account of its employment for building and lighting purposes, and seems to have been a government monopoly. Hence the rebellion of the Canaanitish princes in the naphtha district (Gen 14) was sufficiently serious to require a considerable force for its suppression.

The Hyksos. The Amorite dynasty in Babylonia was overthrown by a Hittite invasion, and Bab authority in Canaan came to an end, though the influence of Bab culture continued undiminished. In the N. the Hittites were driven out of Egypt where Egypt influence had been powerful since the age of the XIXth Dynasty, the Hyksos conquest of Egypt united Pal with the Delta. The Hyksos kings bear Canaanitish names, and their invasion of Egypt probably formed part of that general movement which led to the establishment of an “Amorite” dynasty in Babylonia. Egypt now became an appanage of Canaan, with its capital, accordingly, near its Asiatic frontier. One of the Hyksos kings bears the characteristic Canaanitish name of Jacob-er, written in the same way as on Bab tablets of the age of Khammu-rabi, and a place of the same name is mentioned by Thothmes III as existing in southern Pal.
XVIIth Dynasty expelled the Hyksos and conquered Pal and Syria. For about 200 years Canaan was an Egyptian province. With the Egyptian conquest the history of the second Amorite city at Gezer came to an end. The old wall was partially destroyed, doubtless by Thothmes IV (1440 BC). At Lachish the remains of the third city were full of similar remains, and among them was a cuneiform tablet referring to a governor of Lachish mentioned in the Am Tab. At Taanach cuneiform tablets of the same age have been discovered, written by Canaanites to one another but all in the Bab script and language.

(7) Tell el-Amarna tablets. — In the Am Tab we have a picture of Canaan at the moment when the Asiatic empire of Egypt was breaking up through the religious and social troubles that marked the end of the reign of Amon-hotep IV. The Hittites were attacking it in the N.; in the S. of Canaan the Khabori or "confederate" bands of free-lancers were acquiring principalities for themselves. The petty kings of the area had fought in the war against which they fought one against the other; and their mercenaries readily transferred their allegiance from one paymaster to another, or seized the city they were engaged to defend. Hittites, Mitannians from Cappadocia, and other foreigners appear as governors of the towns; the Egyptian government was too weak to depose them and content if they professed themselves loyal. At times the Canaanite princes intrigued with the Assyrians against their Egyptian neighbors; at other times with the Mitannians of "Aram-Naharaim" or the Hittites of Cappadocia. The troops sent by the Egyptian Pharaoh were insufficient to suppress the rebellion, and the authority of the Egyptian commissioners grew less and less. Eventually the king of the Amorites was compelled to pass openly over to the Hittite king, and Canaan was lost to the Pharaohs.

Gaza and the neighboring towns, however, still remained in their hands, and with the recovery of Egyptian power under the XIXth Dynasty set 1 to march once more into Canaan and reduce it again. The Israelites and their Canaanite conquerors made a treaty which fixed the frontier pretty much where the Israelite frontier afterward ran. A work, known as The Travels of the Mahar, which satirizes the misadventures of a tourist in Canaan, gives a picture of Canaan in the days of Ramses II. With the death of Ramses II an end was put to the marching of Egyptian forces from the Egyptian province of Canaan through the military road through Canaan, and the long war with the Hittites exhausted the inland towns, so that they made but a feeble resistance to the Israelites who assailed them shortly afterward. The Egyptians, however, never regained the ground they lost in the earlier days of the Israeli invasion, which came to be called the conquest of Canaan, and when the Pharaoh power had been overthrown by David we find the Egyptian king again marching northward and capturing Gezer (1 K 9 16). Meanwhile the country had become a mixed eminence, in which the former inhabitants were absorbed, the oracles of Canaan, and the Pharaohs were driven out by the Israelites, and the mixed race was the result. The portraits accompanying the names of the places taken by Shishak in southern Pal have Amorite features, and the modern tell el-stela in Pal are Canaanite rather than Jewish in type.

Canaanite culture was based on that of Babylonia, and begins with the introduction of the use of the skin into the dress and a large mixed population. The local Baal or "lord" of the soil made way for the "lord of heaven," the Sun-god of the Babylonians. The "high-place" gradually became a temple built after a Babylonian fashion. The sacred stone, once the supreme object of Canaanite worship, was transformed into a Bethel or shrine of an indwelling god. The gods and goddesses of Babylonia migrated to Canaan; places received their names from Nebo or Nin-ip; Hadad became Amurrü "the Amorite god"; Istar passed into Ashtoreth, and Asytu, the female counterpart of Asir, the national god of Assyria, became Asherah, while her sanctuary, which in Assyria was a temple, was identified in Canaan with the old fetish of an upright stone or log. But human sacrifice, and more esp. the sacrifice of female children, which we find few traces in Babylonia, continued to be practised with undiminished frequency until, as we learn from the excavations, the Israelite conquest brought about its suppression. The human victim is also absent from the later sacrificial rites of Carthage and Marseilles, its place being taken in them by the Pharaohs. According to these tariffs the sacrifices and offerings were of two kinds, the zaqat or sin offering and the shedem or thank-offering. The sin offering was given wholly to the god, the part of the thank-offering would be taken by the offerer. Birds which were not allowed as a sin offering might constitute a thank-offering. Besides the sacrifices, there were also offerings of corn, wine, fruit, and oil.

What primitive Canaanite art was like may be seen from the rude sculptures in the Wadi el-Qana near Tyre. Under Bab influence it rapidly developed. Among the Canaanite works of art invented by Thothmes III were tables, chairs, and stools of cedrine wood painted with gold or simply gilded, richly embroidered robes, chariots chased with silver, iron tent poles studded with precious stones, "bowls with goats' heads on them, and one with a lion's head, the wall-workmanship of which are upon the wing," iron armor with gold inlay, and rings of gold and silver that were used as money. At Taanach, gold and silver ornaments have been found of high artistic merit. To the Israelites, fresh from the desert, the life of the wealthy Canaanite would have appeared luxurious in the extreme.

The position of Canaan made it the meeting-place of the commercial routes of the ancient world. The Phoenician cities were the chief centers of commerce. On the other hand, the commerce of the towns on the Mediterranean coast (Canaan, Phenicia, Tyre) was dependent not only on agriculture but also on a carrying trade: caravans as well as "commercial travelers" came to them from Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia. The commerce of the ports was to a large extent dependent on the prosperity of the temples in Canaan.

6. Culture became a Bab province, it naturally shared in the civilization of the ruling power. The religious beliefs and deities of Babylonia were superimposed upon those of the primitive Canaanite. The local Baal or "lord" of the soil made way for the "lord of heaven," the Sun-god of the Babylonians. The "high-place" gradually became a temple built after a Babylonian fashion. The sacred stone, once the supreme object of Canaanite worship, was transformed into a Bethel or shrine of an indwelling god. As far back as 2500 BC, alabaster and limestone had been sent to Babylonia from the quarries of the Lebanon.

Long before the age of Abraham the Bab seal-cylinder had become known and been imitated in Syria and Canaan. But it was not until Canaan had been made a Bab province under the Khammu-rabi dynasty that the cuneiform system of writing was introduced together with the Bab language and literature. Henceforward schools were established and libraries or archive-chambers formed where the foreign language and its complicated syllabary could be taught and stored. In the Mosaic age the Tanach tablets show that the inhabitants of a small country town could correspond with one another on local matters in the foreign language and script, and two of the Tell el-Amarna letters are from a Canaanitish lady. The naturally to convey the idea of sluggishness. In the account of the plagues (Ex 7 19), names are used descriptively to designate the different waters of Egypt: יָמִּרְדָּה, "flowing streams," for the main channels of the river, and יָעוֹר for other streams, which by contrast must mean, as it should according to its use by the Egyptians, "the sluggish streams," i.e. "canals," as it is rendered by the Revisers. This meaning of the word being thus clearly established, it is appropriately used in the RVm in the other instances of its occurrence in like circumstances.

CANDLE, kan'dl, CANDLESTICK, kan'dl-stik (ךנָֽנְאֵל, נֶר; לְחֹנִים, לְחֹנִים; מְנ֣וֹרָה, מְנוֹרָה; לֹוָֽיִ֑א, לֹוָֽיִ֑א):

(1) "Candle" is found in the OT, AV, as the rendering of נֶר, and in the NT for λυχνος. In all places except Jer 26 10 and Zeph 1 12 (see m) RV gives the exact rendering "lamp." See Lamp. Candle, in our sense of the term, was unknown to antiquity.

(2) "Candlestick" stands for what was a common and indispensable article of ancient house furniture, a lamp-stand (מְנ֥וֹרָה). Accordingly we find it mentioned in a case thoroughly representative of the furnishings of an oriental room of the planner sort, in the account of "the prophet's chamber" given in 2 K 4 10. Here we find that the furniture consisted of a "bed," a "table," a "seat," and a "candlestick," or lamp-stand. The excavations of Petrie and Bliss at Lachish (Tell el-Hesy, 104), not to mention others, help to make it clear that a lampstand is meant in passages where the Heb word, מְנ֥וֹרָה, or its Gr equivalent luchnia, is used. Accordingly throughout the NT, RV has consistently rendered luchnia by "stand" (Mt 5 15; Mk 4 21; Lk 8 16; 11 33).

(3) The "candlestick" of Dn 5 5 is rather the candelabrum (עֲבְרָשִׁלּוֹ) of Belshazzar's ban.

CANAANS, קַֽנַּנָּאִ֑ים, yə'ōrōm: The word "canals" occurs in several places in the RVm (Ex 7 19; 8 5; Isa 19 6; Nah 3 8). יָעוֹר is an Egyptian word, the designation of the Nile (Brugsch, Geogr. 1, 8, 78). The proper name of the Nile as a god was Hapi. There were several common designations of the Nile, but the usual one was yə'ōr, Heb pl. yə'ōrōm. The primary meaning of yə'ōr in Egypt is not certain, but its significance in use for the Nile is plain enough. All the waters in Egypt were of the Nile and this word yə'ōr was used to denote all of them, the Nile and all its ramifications through the whole irrigating system. Thus yə'ōrōm, Niles, came to be used. As only the main channels of the Nile had much current, the yə'ōrōm came...
Candlestick, kan’d’stık, THE GOLDEN, gold’n (יוֹנָדָה, m’norah, lit. “lamp-stand”): An important part of the furniture of the tabernacle and temple. See Tabernacle; Temple; Lamp.

The candlestick is first met with in the descriptions of the tabernacle (Ex 25 31–39; 37 17–24).

It was, with the utensils connected with it (snuffers, snuff dishes), to be made of pure beaten gold, of one piece, a talent in weight (Ex 25 39). It consisted of a pedestal or base, of a central stem (the name “candlestick” is specially given to this), of six curving branches—three on each side—and of seven lamps resting on the tops of the branches and stem. Stem and branches were ornamented with cups like almond-blossoms, knops and flowers—four of this series on the stem, and three on each of the branches. Some, however, understand the “cup” to embrace the “knop” and “flower” (calyx and corolla). The shape of the pedestal is uncertain. Jewish tradition suggests three small feet; the representation of the candlestick on the Arch of Titus has a solid, hexagonal base (see Fig. 1).

The position of the candlestick was on the S. side of the holy place (Ex 40 24).

In Solomon’s temple the single golden candlestick was multiplied to ten, and the position altered. The candlesticks were now placed in front of the Holy of Holies, five on one side, five on the other (1 K 7 49; 2 Ch 4 7). Further details are not given in the texts, from which it may be presumed that the model of the tabernacle candlestick was followed.

The second temple reverted to the single golden candlestick. When the temple was plundered by Antiochus Epiphanes, the candlestick was taken away (1 Mac 1 21; 6 25). It was replaced by Judas Maccabaeus (4 49.50).

The same arrangement of a single golden candlestick, placed on the S. side of the holy place, was continued in Herod’s Temple (Jos, Bu, V). The temple now contained two, one made by Judas Maccabaeus, the other by Titus, was represented on his Arch at Rome. The immediate object of the candlestick was to give light in the holy place. The lamps were lighted in the evening and burned till the morning. See Use and Symbolism (below).

CANNEH, kān’ē (קנָה, kānāh, Xanā, Chanda): Mentioned in Ezk 27 23 in connection with Hanan and Eden as one of the places with which Tyre had commercial relations. This is the only reference to the place and the site is unknown. Gesenius and others think it is probably the same as Calneh of Am 6 2 or of Gen 10 10, and Calno of Isa 10 9. According to the Tgs. Eusebius, and Jerome, this place is identical with Ctesiphon, which was situated on the Tigris. One codex of De Rossi has made this identification in the passage in Ezk 27 23. Cornill thinks Canneh is the Calneh of Am 6 2, but Cheyne thinks the name is non-existent. He says the words rendered “and Canneh and Eden” should rather be “and the sons of Eden.” A. W. Fortune
Canon of the OT

LITERATURE
1. Introductory—The problem of how we came by 39 books known as OT "Scripture" is a purely historical investigation. The question involved is, not who wrote the several books, but who made them canon, not their divine or other elements, but their history; not God's part, but man's. Our present aim, accordingly, must be to trace the process by which the various writings became "Scripture." The word "canon" is of Christian origin, from the Gr word κανών, kanōn, which in turn is probably borrowed from the Heb word הגדנה, kādānah, meaning a reed or measuring rod, hence norm or rule. Later it came to mean a rule of faith, and eventually a catalogue or list. In present usage it signifies a collection of religious writings divinely inspired and hence authoritative, normative, sacred and binding. The term occurs in Gal 6:16; 2 Cor 10:13-16; but it is first employed of the books of Scripture in the technical sense of a standard collection or body of sacred writings, by the church Fathers of the 4th cent.; e.g. in the 59th canon of the Council of Laodicea (363 A.D.); in the Festal Epistle of Athanasius (365 A.D.); and by Amphionius, archbishop of Arles (385 A.D.).

How the ancient Hebrews expressed the conception of canonicity is not known; but it is safe to say that the idea, as an idea, existed long before there was any special devices invented to express it. In the NT the word "Scriptures" unqualifiedly the notion of sacredness (Mt 21:42; Jn 5:39; Acts 18:24). From the 1st cent. AD and following, however, according to the Talm. the Jews employed the phrase "defile the hands." Writings which were suitable to be read in the synagogue were designated as books which "defile the hands." What this very peculiar oriental expression may have originally signified no one definitely knows. Probably Lev 16:24 gives a hint of the true interpretation. According to this passage the high priest on the great Day of Atonement washed not only when he put on the holy garments of his office, but also when he put them off. Quite possibly, therefore, the expression defile the hands signified that the hands which had touched the sacred writings must first be washed before touching aught else. The idea expressed, accordingly, was one akin to that of taboos. That is to say, just as certain garments worn by workers on encircling metal at Karah at Mecca are taboo to the Mohammedans of today, i.e. cannot be worn outside the mosque, but must be left at the door as the worshippers quit the sanctuary, so the Heb writings which were fit to be read in the synagogue rendered the hands of those who touched them taboo, defiling them. As they were said to be so that they must be washed before engaging in any secular business. This seems to be the best explanation of this enigmatical phrase. Various other and somewhat fanciful explanations of it, however, have been given: for example, to prevent profane use of worn-out synagogue rolls (Buhl); or to prevent placing consecrated grain alongside of the sacred rolls in the synagogues that it might become holy, as the grain would attract the mice and the mice would gnaw the rolls (Strack, Wildeboer and others); or to prevent the sacred, worn-out parchments from being used as coverings for animals (Graetz); or to "declare the hands to be unclean unless previously washed" (Furst, Green). But no one of these explanations satisfies. The idea of taboo is more likely imbedded in the phrase.

The rabbis invented a special phrase to designate those rolls that were worn-out or disputed. They called מֹרְטָם, morātim, meaning "hidden away." Consequently they did not put by them any of the manuscripts which have long been buried are frequently found today in Egypt in connection with Jewish synagogues. Such rolls might first be placed in a קְרֵיָה, kārēyāh, or the synagogue. They were not, however, apocryphal or uncanonical in the sense of being extraneous or outside the regular collection. For such the Jews had a special term מֹחַרְבִּים, ḫarbīm, "books that are outside," that could not be read in the synagogues. "Hidden books" were rather worn-out parchments, or canonical rolls which might by some be temporarily disputed. See APOCRYPHA.

Who had the right to declare a writing canonical? To this question widely divergent answers have been given. According to a certain class of theologians the several books of the OT were composed by authors who were conscious not only of their Divine inspiration but also that their writings were destined to be handed down to the church of future generations as sacred. In other words each writer canonized, as it were, his own writings. For example, Dr. H. Green (p. 180) says: "No formal declaration of their canonicity was needed to give them sanction. They were from the first not only eagerly read by the devout but believed to be Divinely obligatory. . . . Each individual book of an acknowledged prophet or of Jeh, or of anyone accredited as inspired by Him to make known His will, was accepted as the word of God immediately upon its appearance. . . . Those books and those only were accepted as the Divine standards of their later and regulating their conduct which were written for this definite purpose by those whom they believed to be inspired of God. It was this which made them canonical. The spiritual profit found in them corresponded with and confirmed the belief in their heavenly origin. And the public official action which further attested, though it did not initiate, their canonicity, followed in the wake of the popular recognition of their Divine authority. . . . The writings of the prophets, delivered to their people as a declaration of the Divine will, possessed canonical authority from the moment of their appearance. . . . The canon does not derive its authority from the church, whether Jewish or Christian; the office of the church merely that of a custodian and a witness." So likewise Dr. A. B. Davis (Pres. and Ref. Review, April, 1902, 182).
On the contrary, Dillmann (Jahr. für deutsche Theol., 111, 420) more scientically claims that "history knows nothing of the individual books having been closed after its origin. . . . These books bore indeed in themselves from the first those characteristics on account of which they were subsequently admitted into the sacred collection, but yet always had first to pass through a shorter or longer period of verification, and make trial of the Divine power resident within them upon the hearts of the church before they were outwardly and formally acknowledged by it as Divine books." As a matter of fact, the books of the OT are still on trial, and will be so, for it is known, the greater majority of the writers of Holy Scripture did not arbitrarily hand over their productions to the church and expect them to be regarded as canon Scripture. Two parties are involved in the making of canonical Scripture—the original authors and the church—both of whom were inspired by the same Spirit. The authors wrote inspired by the Divine Spirit, and the church ever since—Jewish and Christian alike—has been inspired to recognize the authoritative character of their writings. As the church will not accept anything as Divine unless it be certain that anything comes from God unless it bring us personally something evidently Divine" (Briggs, The Study of Holy Scripture, 162).

5. The Tripartite Division The Tôrah included the 5 books of the Pentateuch (Gen, Ex, Lev, Nu, De), which were called "the prophetic books of the Law." The Nôbhôthím embraced (a) the four so-called Former Prophets, Josh, Jgs, 1 and 2 S, counted as one book, 1 and 2 K, also counted as one book; and (b) the four so-called Latter Prophets, Isa, Jer, Ezek, and the Twelve Minor Prophets, counted as one book; a total of 8 books. The Kôthôthím, or Writings, were 11 in all, including Ps, Prov, and Job, the five Môphilôth or Rolls (Cant, Ruth, Lam, Ecc, Est), DnL, Ezr-Neh, counted as one book, and 1 and 2 Ch, also counted as one book; in all 24 books, exactly the same as those of the Protestant canon. This was the original count of the Jews as far as we can trace it back. Later certain Jewish authorities appended Ruth to Jgs, and divided the books of number 22, which corresponded to the number of letters in the Heb alphabet; but this manner of counting was secondary and fanciful. Still later others divided 8, K, Ch, Ezr-Neh and Jer-Lam into two books each respectively and thereby obtained 27, which they fancifully regarded as equivalent to the 22 letters of the Heb alphabet plus 5, the number of letters having a peculiar final form when standing at the end of a word. Jerome states that 22 is the correct reckoning, but adds, "since the number of books in the Hagiographa, and so get 24." 4 Esd, which is the oldest (85–96 AD) witness to the number of books in the OT, gives 24.

The answer to the question of how to account for the tripartite division involves the most careful investigation of the whole process by which the canon actually took shape. If the entire canon of the OT were formed, as some allege, by one man, or the church, to the end of time, in a single age, then it is obvious that the books must have been separated into three groups on the basis of some material differences in their contents. If, on the other hand, the process of canonization was gradual and extended over several generations, then the various books were separated from one another probably because one section of the canon was closed before certain other books of similar character were written. At any rate it is difficult to see where 1 K and Ch are not included in the same division, and especially strange that DnL does not stand among the prophecies. To explain this mystery, mediaeval Jews were wont to say that "the Prophets were inspired by the spirit of prophecy, whereas the Writings by the Holy Spirit," implying different degrees of inspiration. But this is a distinction without a difference, the Holy Spirit and the spirit of prophecy are one and the same. Modern Protestants distinguish between the doinva propheticam and the visionary propheticam, i.e., between the gift and the office of prophecy. They allow that Daniel possessed the gift of prophecy, but they deny that he was Divinely appointed to the office of prophet. But compare Mt 24 15, which speaks of "Daniel the prophet," and on the other hand, Am 7 14, in which Amos represents being considered a prophet. Oehler modifies this explanation, claiming that the threefold division of the canon corresponds to the three stages of development in the religion of Israel, namely, the Levitical, the Messianic, and the prophetic. According to Oehler, the Law was the foundation of the entire canon. From it there were two lines of development, one objective, the Prophets, the other subjective, the Writings. But Oehler's theory does not satisfy the canonist for, counting 1 K, 2 K, and Ps, being in the third division; for in what sense can they be said to be more subjective than Jgs, S, and K? The LXX version (250–150 BC) takes no notice of the tripartite division. The true solution probably is that the process as gradual and extended as the witnesses have been examined, we shall probably discover that the Law was canonized first, the Prophets considerably later, and the Writings last of all. And it may further become evident that the two last divisions were collected synchronously, and hence that the tripartite divisions of the canon are due to material differences in their contents as well as to chronology.

II. Examination of the Witnesses—Though the OT does not tell us anything about the processes of its own canonization, it does furnish valuable hints as to how the ancient Hebrews preserved their writings. Thus in Ex 20 20 it is stated (cf. Deut 4 9) that God meant the two tables of the Law containing the Ten Commandments, was put into the Ark of the Covenant for safekeeping. In Dt 31 26, the laws of Dt are said to have been delivered to the sons of Levi, and by them deposited "by the side of the ark ... that it may be there for a witness against thee." Such language indicates that the new law-book was regarded "as a standard of faith and action" (Driver, Deut 345). According to 1 K 8 9, when Solomon brought the Ark up from the city of David to the Temple, the two tables were still its only contents, which continued to be carefully preserved. According to 2 K 11 12, when Josiah was crowned king, Jehoiada the high priest is said to have given (lit. "put upon") him "the testimony," which doubtless contained "the substance of the fundamental laws of the covenant," and was regarded as "the fundamental charter of the constitution" (cf. H. E. Caldecott, Canon of the OT, 48). Otherwise in Prov 25 1, it is stated that a large number of proverbs were copied out by Hezekiah's men. Now all these, and still other passages which might be summoned, witness to the preservation of certain portions of the OT. But what is the stage of canonization without canonization. A writing might easily be preserved without being made a standard of faith and conduct. Nevertheless the two ideas are closely related; for, when religious writings are sedulously preserved it is but natural to infer that their intrinsic value was regarded as corresponding to its preciousness.

Two other passages of paramount importance remain to be considered. The first is 2 K 22 8 f., describing the finding of the "Book of the Law," and how Josiah the king on the basis of it instituted a religious reformation and bound the people to obey its precepts. Here is an instance in which the Law, or some portion of it (how much no one can say), is regarded as of normative and authoritative character. The king and his coadjutors recognize at once that it is ancient and that it contains the words of Jeh (2 K 22 13-18.19). Its authority is undisputed. Yet nothing is said of its "canonicity," or that it would "deify the hands;" consequently there is no real ground for speaking of it as "the beginning of the canon," for in the same historic sense the beginnings of the canon are to be found in Ex 24 7. The other passage of paramount importance is Neh 8 8 f., according to which Ezra is said to have "read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly." Neh knew the Law; the Law he accompanied it with an interpretation. This seems to imply, almost beyond question, that in Ezra's time (444 BC) the Law, i.e. the Pentateuch, was regarded as canonical Scripture. This is practically all that the OT says about the historical significance of the other books, such as Jer 7 12 and Dn 9 2 might be brought forward to show the deep regard which the later prophets had for the writings of their predecessors. The former of these passages is known in lit. OT, testimony of the inspiration of the Prophets; it is the OT = to 2 Tim 3 16.

Chronologically the OT is of course our most ancient witness. It brings us down to 444 BC. The next in order is the Samaritan Pentateuch.

2. The Samaritan Pentateuch

About 432 BC, as we know from Neh 8 11-12 and Jos (Ant, XI, vii, 2-8, vii, 4), Nehemiah expelled from the Jewish community in Jerus. Manasseh, the polyamorous grandson of Eliahshib the high priest and son-in-law of Sanballat, Manasseh founded the schismatic community of the Samaritans, and instituted on Mt. Gerizim a rival temple-worship to that of Jerus. He had polygamous relations, and was still surviving today some 170 souls; they reside in Shechem and are known as "the smallest religious sect in the world." It is true that Jos, speaking of this event, confuses chronology somewhat, making Nehemiah and Alexander the Great contemporaries, whereas a cent. separated them, but the time element is of little moment. The bearing of the whole matter upon the history of the formation of the canon is this: the Samaritans possess the Pentateuch; hence it is inferred that an ancient book, possibly Manasseh's expulsion the Jewish canon included the Pent and the Pent only. Budde (EB col. 659) says: "If alongside of the Law there had been other sacred writings, it would be inexplicable why these last also did not pass into currency with the Samaritans." Such a conclusion, however, is not fully warranted. It is an argument from silence. There are patent reasons on the other hand why the Samaritans should have rejected the Prophets, even though they were already canonized. For the Samaritans would not have adopted books that glorified the temple at Jerus. It cannot, accordingly, be inferred with certainty that the Samaritans accept the Pent only, that therefore the Pent at the time of Manasses's expulsion was alone, and hence it may be considered a reasonable presumption.

The LXX version in Gr is the first tr of the OT ever made; indeed the OT is the first book of any note in all lit. to receive the honor of being translated into another t. This fact in itself is indicative of the esteem in which it was held at the time. The work of tr was inaugurated by Tolemen Philadeph, (285-247 BC) and probably continued for well-nigh a cent. (circa 250-150 BC). Among a distinguished officer of Tolemen, records how it came about. It appears that Tolemen was exceedingly fond of books, and set his heart on adding to his famous collection in Alexandria a tr of the Heb Pent. In order to obtain it, he sent the king, the king set 188,000 Jewish slaves, and sent them with presents to Jerus. to ask Eleazar the high priest for their Law and Jewish scholars capable of translating it. Six learned rabbis from each tribe (6 x 12 x 72) were sent. They were royally feasted; 70 questions were asked them to test their wisdom, and after 72 days of cooperation and conference they gave the world the OT in the Gr language, which is known as the LXX version. To this fabulously story, Christian ads that Philadephus, the son-in-law of Ptolemy, made the work of translating in 72 (some say 36) separate cells on the island of Pharos, all working independently of each other, and that it was found at the expiration of their seclusion that each had produced a tr, and about it is thus that Philadephus about the middle of the 3d cent. BC succeeded in obtaining a tr of the Law. The other books were tr's subsequently, perhaps for private use. The lack of unity of plan in the books outside the Law indicates that probably many different hands at different times were engaged upon them. There is a subscription, moreover, at the close of the tr of Est which states that Lysimachus, the son of Ptolemy in Jerus, tr it. But the whole was apparently completed before Jesus ben Sirach the younger wrote his Prologue to Eclusus (circa 132 BC).

Now the LXX version, which was the Bible of Our Lord and His apostles, is supposed to have included originally many of the Apocryphal Books. Furthermore, the Samaritans the Jews, and Apocryphal books stand intermingled and in an order which shows that the translators knew nothing of the tripartite division of later Judaism, or if they did they quite ignored it. The order of the books in our English OT is of course derived from the LXX through the Vulg of St. Jerome. The books in the LXX are arranged as follows: Pent, Jos, Josh, Jgs, Ruth, 1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch, 1 and 2 Esd, Neh, Tob, Jth, Est, Job, Ps, Prov, Ecc, Eccles, Song, Is, Jer, Lam, Eze, Dan, Joel, Ob, Am, Nah, Hab, Zeph, Hag, Zec, Mal, Isa, Jer, Bar, Lam, Ep, Jer, Ezk, Dnl, 1, 2 and 3 Macc. On the basis of the LXX, Catholics advocate what is known as the "larger" canon of the Jews in Alexandria; Protestants, on the other hand, deny the existence of an independent canon in Alexandria in view of the "smaller" canon of the Jews in Pal. The actual difference between the Catholic and Protestant OTs is a matter of 7 complete books and portions of other works: viz. Tob, Jth, Wd, Eccles, etc. The smaller canon, that of the Jews, is thus: 10 (10 4-16 24) and to Dnl (3 24-90; three Sus ver 13 and Bel ver 14). These Protestants reject as apocryphal because there is not sufficient evidence that they were ever reckoned as canonical by the Jews, whereas the present LXX includes them is far from conclusive that the original LXX did, for the following reasons: (1) The design of the LXX was purely literary; Ptolemy and the Alexandrians were interested in building up a library. (2) All the extant MSS of the LXX are of Christian not Jewish origin. Between the actual tr of the LXX (cir 250–150 BC) and the oldest MS (cir 247 BC) the book of Tr was chasmed of truly 500 years, during which it is highly possible that the so-called Apocryphal books crept in. (3) In the various extant MSS of the LXX, the Apocryphal books vary in number and name. For example, the great Vatican MS, which is probably the truest which remains of the Alexandrian Bible," and which comes down to us from the 4th cent. AD, contains no Book of Macc whatever, but does include 1 Esd, which St. Jerome and Catholics generally treat as apocryphal. On the other hand, the Alexandrian MS, another of the great MSS of the LXX, dat- ing from the 5th cent. AD, contains not only the extra-canonical book of 1 Esd, but 3 and 4 Macc, and in the NT the 1st and 2d Epistles of Clement, none of which whatever, is found by Rome. Likewise the great Sinaitic MS, hardly less important than the Vatican as a witness to the LXX and like it dating from the 4th cent. AD, omits Bar (which Catholics consider canonical), but retains the 1st and 2d Epistles of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas; all of which are excluded from the canon by Catholics. In other MSS, 3 Macc, 3 Esd and Pr Man are occasionally included. The problem as to how many books the original LXX version actually included is a very complicated one. The probability is that it included no one of these variants. (4) Still another reason for thinking that there never existed in Egypt a separate or "larger" canon is the fact that during the 2d cent. AD, the Alexan- drian Jews adopted Aquila's Gr version of the tr in lieu of their own, and it is known that Aquila's text excluded all Apocryphal books. Add to all this the fact that Philo, who lived in Alexandria from cir 20 BC till 50 AD, never quotes from any of these Apocryphal books though he often does from the canonical, and that Origen, who also resided in Alexandria (cir 200 AD), never set his imprimatur upon them, and it becomes reasonably convincing that there was no "larger" canon in Alexandria. The evidence derived from the LXX, accordingly, is largely negative. It only indicates that when the tr of the OT into Gr was made in Alexandria, the process of canonization was still incomplete. For had it been actually complete, it is reasonable to suppose the work of tr would have proceeded according to some well-defined plan, and would have been executed with greater accuracy. As it is, the translators seem to have taken all sorts of liberties with the text, adding to the books of Esd and Del and omitting fully one-eighth of the text of Jer. Such work also indicates that they were not executing a public or ecclesiastical trust, but rather a private enter- prise. Our necessary conclusion, therefore, is that the work of canonization was probably going on in Par while the work of tr was proceeding in Alex- dria.

Our next witness is Jesus ben Sirach who (cir 170 BC) wrote a formidable work entitled Eccles, otherwise known as Sir. Jesus ben Sirach was a man of the Hebrew style. His book is a book of Wisdom resembling Prov; some of his precepts approach the high level of the Gospel. In many respects Eccles is the most important of the Apocryphal books; thematically it is the chief monument of primitive Sadduceism. In chs 44-50, the author sings a "hymn to the Fathers," eulogizing the mighty heroes of Israel from Enoch to Nehemiah, in fact from Adam to Simon, including the most famous men described in the OT, and making explicit mention of the Twelve Prophets. These facts would indicate that the whole or, at least, the most of this great book was already in his day (150 BC) the so-called Minor Prophets were regarded as a special group of writings by themselves. What the value of Eccles as a witness, however, depends upon the inter- pretation of the passage 24:33, which reads: "I will yet pour out doctrine and leave it unto generations of ages." From this it is in- ferred by some that he feels himself inspired and capable of adding to the canon already in existence, and that, though he knew the full prophetic canon, he did not draw any very definite line of demarca- tion between his own work and the inspired writ- ings of the prophets. For example, he passes over from the patriarchs and prophets of Israel to Simon the son of Onias, who was probably the high priest in his own city. The book was probably not canonized, but alongside of these a body of lit. was being gathered and gradually augmented of a nature not foreign to his own writings, and therefore not clearly marked off from literary com- positions like the first five books of the Law. Yet it is clear he regarded the Law as everything. He identifies it with the highest wisdom; indeed, all wisdom in his judgment is derived from a study of the Law (cf 19:1-4; 21:5-18; 24:23; 24:33; 39:1). The Prologue to Eccles is our next witness to the formation of the canon. It was written by the grandson of Jesus ben Sirach, who bore his grandfather's name (cir 132 BC). Jesus ben Sirach was a man of the Hebrew style. His book is a book of Wisdom resembling Prov; some of his precepts approach the high level of the Gospel. In many respects Eccles is the most important of the Apocryphal books; thematically it is the chief monument of primitive Sadduceism. In chs 44-50, the author sings a "hymn to the Fathers," eulogizing the mighty heroes of Israel from Enoch to Nehemiah, in fact from Adam to Simon, including the most famous men described in the OT, and making explicit mention of the Twelve Prophets. These facts would indicate that the whole or, at least, the most of this great book was already in his day (150 BC) the so-called Minor Prophets were regarded as a special group of writings by themselves. What the value of Eccles as a witness, however, depends upon the inter- pretation of the passage 24:33, which reads: "I will yet pour out doctrine and leave it unto generations of ages." From this it is in- ferred by some that he feels himself inspired and capable of adding to the canon already in existence, and that, though he knew the full prophetic canon, he did not draw any very definite line of demar- cation between his own work and the inspired writ- ings of the prophets. For example, he passes over from the patriarchs and prophets of Israel to Simon the son of Onias, who was probably the high priest in his own city. The book was probably not canonized, but alongside of these a body of lit. was being gathered and gradually augmented of a nature not foreign to his own writings, and therefore not clearly marked off from literary com- positions like the first five books of the Law. Yet it is clear he regarded the Law as everything. He identifies it with the highest wisdom; indeed, all wisdom in his judgment is derived from a study of the Law (cf 19:1-4; 21:5-18; 24:23; 24:33; 39:1). The Prologue to Eccles is our next witness to the formation of the canon. It was written by the grandson of Jesus ben Sirach, who bore his grandfather's name (cir 132 BC). Jesus ben Sirach was a man of the Hebrew style. His book is a book of Wisdom resembling Prov; some of his precepts approach the high level of the Gospel. Jesus ben Sirach was a man of the Hebrew style. His book is a book of Wisdom resembling Prov; some of his precepts approach the high level of the Gospel. In many respects Eccles is the most important of the Apocryphal books; thematically it is the chief monument of primitive Sadduceism. In chs 44-50, the author thing for the profit of others, it may be inferred that in his time there was as yet no definite gulf fixed between the writings of the wise and the works of other men, and that the sifting process was still going on (cf W. R. Smith, OTJC1, 178-79).

1 Macc was written originally in Heb; 2 Macc in Gr, somewhere between 125 and 70 BC. The author of 1 Macc is acquainted, on the one hand, with the deeds of John Hyrcanus (135 to 105 BC), and knows nothing on the other of the conquest of Pal by Pompey (63 BC). The value of the book is its witness to the history of the canon centers about his allusions to Daniel and the Psalms. In 1 Macc 1:54, he tells how Antiochus Epiphanes "set up the abomination of desolation" upon the altar at Jerusalem, referring most likely to Dan 9:24-27; and in 1 Macc 2:59-60 he speaks of Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, who by believing were saved from the fiery furnace, and of Daniel, who was delivered from the mouths of the lions (cf Dan 1:7; 6:26; 6:23). From these allusions, it would seem as though the Book of Dan was at that time regarded as normative or canonical.
This is confirmed by 1 Macc 7:16:17, which introduces a quotation from Ps 79:2, with the solemn formula, "According to the words which he wrote"; which would suggest that the Ps also were already canonical.

2 Macc, written c124 BC, also contains a couple of passages of considerable importance to us in this investigation. Both, however, are found in the spurious portions purporting to have been sent by the inhabitants of Judea to their fellow-countrymen residing in Egypt. The first passage (2 Macc 2:13) tells how Nehemiah, "founding a library, gathered together the acts of the kings, and the poetry of Solomon, and the music of the kings concerning holy gifts." These words throw no special light upon the formation of the canon, but they do connect with the name of Nehemiah the preservation of public documents and historical records of national interest, and how he, as a lover of books, founded a library. This is in perfect agreement with what we know of Nehemiah's character, for he compiled the genealogy of Neh 7:13, besides, collection precedes selection. The other, in like manner, like quantities of also Judas gathered together all things that were lost by reason of the war we had, and they remain with us." Though found in a letter, supposed to be spurious, there is every reason for believing this statement to be true. For, the enmity of the Jewish enemy of the nation, sought to stamp out the religion of the Jews by destroying their books (cf 1 Macc 1:56-57), what would have been more natural for a true patriot like Judas than to attempt to re-collect their sacred writings? "This statement, therefore," as Wiedenboer says, "may well be when of the credibility!" (The Origin of the Canon of the OT, 40).

Though it yields nothing definite as to the number of the books recovered, it is obvious that the books collected were the most precious documents which the nation possessed. They were doubtless religious, as was the age.

Philo is our next witness. He flourished in Alexandria between c20 BC and 50 AD, leaving behind him a voluminous literature.

7. Philo
Philo, unfortunately, he does not yield us much (c20 BC - 50 AD) of positive value for our present
Ad
purpose. His evidence is largely negative. True, he nowhere mentions the tripartition of the OT. (Which is known to have existed in his day. Nor does he quote from Ezk, the Five Megilloth (Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est), Dan, Ch, or from the Twelve Minor Prophets, except Hos,Jon, and Zee. Moreover he held a loose view of inspiration. According to Philo, inspiration was by no means confined to the sacred trust of a few of the men are inspired and capable of expressing the hidden things of God. But as Dr. Green (Canon, 130) rightfully contends, "Philo's loose views of inspiration cannot be declared irreconcilable with the acceptance of a fixed canon, unless it is first shown that he places others whom he thinks inspired on a level with the writers of Scripture.
This he never does." Philo's reverence for the "Law" was unbounded. In this respect he is the familiar type of the Alexandrian, so insomniatingly from the Law. Moses was to him the source of all wisdom, even the wisdom of the Gentiles.
Concerning the laws of Moses, he is reported by Eusebius as saying: "They have not changed so much as a single word in them. They would rather die a thousand deaths than detract anything from these laws and statutes." On the other hand, Philo never quotes any of the Apocryphal books. Hence it may safely be assumed that his canon was essentially ours.

The evidence furnished by the NT is of the highest importance. When summed up, it gives the unmistakable impression that 8. The NT
When the NT was written (cir 50-AD) there was no fixed canon of the NT, fixed canon of OT Scripture, to which
-100 AD
authoritative appeal could be made.
And first, too much importance can scarcely be attached to the names or titles ascribed to the OT writings by the authors of the NT; thus,
"the scriptures" (Jn 10:35; 19:36; 2 Pet
1:20), "the scriptures" (Mt 22:29; Acts 18:24),
"holy scriptures" (Rom 1:2), "sacred writings"
(2 Tim 3:15), "the law" (Jn 10:34; 13:34; Acts 15:25; 1 Cor 14:21), "the law and prophets" Mt
5:17; 7:12; 22:40; Lk 16:16; 24:44; Acts 13:15; 28:23). Such names or titles, though they do not define the limits of the canon, certainly assumed the existence of a complete and sacred collection of Jewish writings which are already marked off from all other lit. as separate and fixed.
One passage (Jn 10:35) in which the term "scripture," is employed seems to refer to the OT canon as a whole; and the scripture cannot be broken.
(2 Tim 3:16). In like manner, the NT says that "the scriptures" is often used in a generic sense, referring to much more than merely the 1st and 2d divisions of the OT; it seems rather to refer to the old dispensation as a whole; but the term "the law" is the most frequently applied to the entire OT, and apparently held in Christ's time among the Jews a place akin to that which the term "the Bible" does with us. For example, in Jn 10:34; 12:34; 15:25, texts from the prophets or even from the Ps are quoted as part of "the Law"; in 1 Cor 14:21 also, Paul speaks of Isa 28:11 as a part of "the law." These names and titles, accordingly, are exceedingly important; they are never applied by NT writers to the Apocrypha.

One passage (Lk 24:44) furnishes clear evidence of the threefold division of the canon. But here again, as in the Prologue of Sir, there is great uncertainty as to the limits of the 3d division.
Instead of saying, "the law, the prophets and the writings," Luke says, "the law, the prophets and the psalms." But it is obvious enough that this should have been added by Jesus in support of His resurrection. It is because they especially testify of Christ: they were, therefore, the most important part. For His immediate purpose, and it may be that they are to stand a potiori for the whole of the 3d division (cf Budd, EB, col. 669).
Another passage (Mt 23 35; cf Lk 11 51) seems to point to the final order and arrangement of the books in the OT. That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed on the earth, from the blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the sanctuary and the altar." Now, in order to grasp the bearing of this verse upon the matter in hand, it must be remembered that in the modern arrangement of the OT books in Heb, Ch stands last; and that the murder of Zachariah is the last recorded instance in this arrangement, being found in 2 Ch 24 20.21. But this murder took place in the reign of Jehoahaz, in the 40th cent. BC. There is another which is chronologically later, namely, that of Uriah son of Shemaiah who was murdered in Jehoiakim's reign in the 7th cent. BC. (Jer 26 23). Accordingly, the argument is this, unless Ch already stood last in Christ's OT, why did He not say, "from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Uriah"? He would then have been speaking chronologically and would have included all the martyrs whose martyrdom is recorded in the OT. But He rather says, "from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zachariah," as though He were including the whole range of OT Scripture, just as we would say "from Genesis to Malachi." Hence it is inferred, with some degree of confidence, that Ch must have stood as it does today in the Heb Bible of the Massorets, the last book of an already closed canon. Of course, in answer to this, there is the possible objection that in those early days the Scriptures were still written by the Jews on separate rolls. Another ground for thinking that the OT canon was closed before the NT was written is the numerous citations made in the NT from the OT. Every book is quoted except Est, Ecc, Cant, Ezr, Neh, Ob, Nah, and Zeph. But these exceptions are not serious. The Twelve Minor Prophets were always treated by the Jews en bloc as one canonical work; hence if one of the twelve were quoted all were recognized. And the fact that 2 Ch 24 20.21 is quoted in Mt 23 35 and Lk 11 51 presupposes also the canonicity of Ezr-Neh, as originally these books were one with Ch, though they may possibly have already been divided in Jesus' day. As for Est, Ecc, and Cant, it is easy to see why they are not quoted: they probably failed to furnish NT material, that is, the NT writers simply had no occasion to make citations from them. What is much more noteworthy, they never quote from the Apocryphal books, though they show an acquaintance with them. Professor Gigot, one of the greatest of Roman Catholic authorities, frankly admits this. In his General Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, 43, he says: "They never quote them explicitly, it is true, but time and again they borrow expressions and ideas from them." As a matter of fact, NT writers felt free to quote from any source; for example, Paul on Mars' Hill cites to the learned Athenians an astronomical work of the Stoic Aratus of Cilicia, or perhaps from a Hymn to Jupiter by Cleanthes of Lydia, when he says, "For we are also his offspring in the Acts 17 28." And Jude vs 14.15 almost undeniably quotes from En (1 9; 60 8)—a work which is not recognized as canonical by any except the church of Abyssinia. But in any case, the mere quoting of a book does not canonize it nor, vice versa, the failure to quote it to exclude it. Quotation does not necessarily imply sanction; no more than reference to contemporary lit. is incompatible with strict views of the canon. Everything depends upon the manner in which the quotation is made and in no case is an Apocryphal book cited by NT authors as "Scripture," or as the work of the Holy Spirit. And the force of this statement is not weakened by the fact that the authors of NT writings cited the LXX instead of the original while they were doing so for the inherent truthfulness of each passage in the form which they actually adopt" (Green, Canon, 145). As a witness, therefore, the NT is of paramount importance. For, though it nowhere tells us the exact number of books contained in the OT canon, it gives abundant evidence of the existence already in the 1st cent. AD of a definite and fixed canon. 4 Eds in Lat. (2 Eds in Eng.) is a Jewish apocalypse which was written originally in Ch and is known by the close of the 1st cent. (cir 81–96 AD). The passage of special interest (cir 81–96 to us is 14 19–48 which relates in most fabulous style how Ezra is given spiritual illumination to reproduce the Law which had been burned, and how, at the Divine command, he excludes himself for a period of 40 days, after which he betakes himself with five skilled scribes to the open country. There, a cup of water is offered him; he drinks, and then dictates to his five amanuenses continuously for 40 days and nights, producing 94 books of which 70 are kept secret and 24 published. The section of supreme importance reads as follows: "And it fell upon him one time to make Christ's sacrifice, that the Most High spake, saying, 'The first that thou hast written, publish openly, that the worthy may read it; but keep the seventy last, that thou mayest deliver them only to such as be wise among the people; for they are the spiritual lights, the fountain of wisdom, and the stream of knowledge. And I did so'" (4 Eds 14 45–48). The story is obviously pure fiction. No wonder that a new version of it arose in the 16th cent., according to which the canon was completed, not by Ezra alone, but by a company of men known as the Great Synagogue. From the legend of 4 Eds it is commonly inferred that the 24 books which remain after subtracting 70 from 94 are the canonical books of the OT. If so, then this legend is the first witness we have to the number of books contained in the OT canon. This number corresponds exactly with the usual number of sacred books according to Jewish count, as we saw in § 5 above. The legend, accordingly, is not without value. Even Kellermann and his admirers have not neglected, in the last, 70 to 24, a tradition which existed as early as the 1st Christian cent., to the effect that the Jews possessed 24 specially sacred books. It also points to Ezra as the chief factor in the making of Scripture, in that the OT canon has long since been virtually closed. Flavius Josephus, the celebrated Jewish historian, was born 37 AD. He was a priest and a Pharisee. About 100 AD, he wrote a controversial treatise, known as Contra Apionem, in defence of the Jews against their assailants, of whom Apion is taken as a leading representative. Now Apion was a famous grammarian, who in his life had been hostile to the Jews. He had died some 50 years before Contra Apionem was written. Jos wrote in Gr to Greeks. The important passage in his treatise (I, 8) reads as follows: "For it is not the case with us to have vast numbers of books disagreeing among themselves, but in one another. We have but twenty-two, containing the history of all time, books that are justly believed in. And of these, five are the books of Moses, which comprise the laws and the earliest traditions from the creation of the world down to the death of Moses' death. This period falls short by but a little of three thousand years. From the death of Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, the successor of Xerxes, the prophets who succeeded Moses wrote the history of the events that occurred in the next thirteen books. The remaining four documents comprise hymns to God and practical precepts to men. From the days of Artaxerxes our own time every event has actually been recorded. But these recent records have not been designed worthy of equal credit with those which preceded them, because the exact succession of the prophets ceased. But what faith we have placed in our own writings is evident by our conduct; for though so great an interval of time (i.e.
three hundred years), the book of the written, not one soul has ventured either to add, or to remove,
or to alter a syllable. But it is instinctive in all Jews at once from their very birth to regard them as commanded of God, and to abide by them, and, if need be, willingly to die for them.

The value of this remarkable passage for our study is obviously very great. In the first place Jesu fixes the number of Jewish writings which are recognized as sacred at 22, joining probably Ruth to Lg, and Larm to Jer. He also classifies them according to a threefold division, which is quite peculiar to himself: 5 of Moses, 13 of the prophets, and 4 hymns and maxims for human life. The 5 of Moses were of course the Pent; the 13 of the prophets, including the later Jewish Prophets, plus dn, job, ch, Ezr, Neh, and Est; the four hymns and maxims would most naturally consist of Ps, Prov, Cant, and Eccl. There is little doubt that his 23 books are those of our present Heb canon.

Another very remarkable fact about Jesu's statement is the standard he gives of canonicity, namely, antiquity; because, as he says, since Artaxerxes' age the succession of prophets had ceased. It was the uniform tradition of Jesu's time that prophetic inspiration had ceased with Malachi (cir 445-432 BC):
Hence, according to him, the canon was closed in the reign of Artaxerxes (465-425 BC). He does not pause to give any account of the closing of the canon; he simply assumes it, treating it as unnecessary.

Prophecy had ceased, and the canon was according-antly closed; the fact did not require to be officially proclaimed. As remarked above, the value of Jesu as a witness is very great. But just here an incident arises: How can we interpret his language? Was the OT canon actually closed before 425 BC? Were not there books and parts of books composed and added to the canon subsequent to his reign? Dr. Green seems to take Jesu literally (canon, 40, 79). But Jesu is not always reliable in his chronology. For example, in his Antiquities (XI, vi, 13) he dates the story of Esther as occurring in the reign of Artaxerxes I (whereas it belongs to Xerxes' reign), while in the same work (XI, v, 1) he puts Ezra and Nehemiah under Xerxes
(whereas they belong to the time of Artaxerxes).
On the whole, it seems safer on internal grounds to regard Jesu's statements concerning the antiquity of the Jewish canon as the language not of a careful historian, but of a partisan in debate. Instead of expressing absolute fact in this case, he was reflecting the popular belief of his age. Reduced to its lowest terms, the element of real truth in what he says was simply this, that he voiced a tradition which was at that time universal and undisputed;
one, however, which had required a long period, perhaps hundreds of years, to develop. Hence we conclude that the complete OT canon, numbering 22 books, was not new thing 100 AD.

According to the traditions preserved in the Mish, two canons were held (90 and 118 AD respectively) at Jabne, or Jamnia, not far S. of Joppa, on the Mediterranean coast, at which the books of the OT, notably Ecc and Cant, were discussed and their canonicity ratified. Rabbi Gamaliel II probably presided as high priest and head of the rabbis and as the spirit of the council. What was actually determined by these rabbis was generally not synods has not been preserved to us accurately, but by many authorities it is thought that the great canonicity which had been going on for over a cent. between the rival Jewish schools of Hillel and Shammai was brought to a close, and that the canon was formally restricted to our 39 books.
Perhaps it is within reason to say that at Jamnia the Jews were finally and finally determined by Jewish authority. Not that official sanction created public opinion, however, but rather confirmed it.

The Talmud consists of two parts: (1) The Mish (compiled cir 200 AD), a collection of systematized tradition; and (2) the Gemara, G'mara (completed about 500 AD), a vast and desultory commentary on the Mish.
A Baraita's, or unauthorized gloss, to the 2d section, is called the Babylonian Talmud. As a witness, therefore, this tractate is of little value, except that it confirms the tripartite division and is a good specimen of rabbinic speculation.
For the full text of the passage see Kyle, Canon of the OT, 273 ff.

During the 2d cent. AD, doubts arose in Jewish minds concerning four books, Prov, Cant, Ecc, and Est. In a certain Talmudic tractate it is related that an attempt doubts in 208 was made to withdraw (g{ma'ar, "con-seal," "hide") the Book of Prov on 2d AD account of contradictions which were found in it (cf 26 4,5), but on deeper investigation it was not withdrawn. In another section of the Talmud, Rabbi Akiba is represented as saying concerning Cant: "God forbid that any man of Israel should deny that the Song of Songs defileth the hands, for the whole world is not equal to the day in which the Song of Songs was given to Israel; if it were so, God would not have given the Song of Songs is the holiest of the holy." Such elevating language inclines one to feel that real doubt must have existed in the minds of some concerning the book. But the protestations were much stronger again Ecc. Thus stated: "The wise men desired to hide it because its language was often self-contradictory (of Ecc 7 3 and 2 2; 4 2 and 9 4), but they did not hide it because the beginning and the end of it consist of words from the Torah (cf 1 3; 12 13, 14)."
Likewise Est was vigorously disputed by both the Jews and Bab Garnas, because the name of God was not found in it; but a Rabbi Simeon ben Lakshir (cir 300 AD) defended its canonicity, putting Esther on an equality with the Law and above the Prophets and the other Writings. Other books, for example, Ezekiel and Jonah, were discussed in post-Talmudic writings, but no serious objections were ever raised by the Jews against either. Jonah was really never doubted till the 12th cent. AD. In the cause of no one of these disputed books were there serious doubts; nor did scholastic controversies affect public opinion.

This brings us to the end of our examination of the witness of our sources. We have discovered
(1) that the OT says nothing of the order of ition, but does emphasize the manner in which the Law was preserved and recognized as authoritative;
(2) that to conclude that the Jews possessed the Law only, when the renegade Manasseh was expelled by Nehemiah from Jerus, because the Samaritans admit of the Law alone as the true canon, is unwarrantable; (3) that in the LXX as we know it from the Christian MSS extant by no means a sufficient proof that the Alexandrians possessed a "larger" canon which included the Apoc; (4) that Jesus ben Sirach is a witness to the fact that the Prophets in his day (180 BC) were not yet acknowledged as canonical; (5) that his grandson in his Prologue is the first witness to the customary tripartite division of OT writings, but does not speak of the 3d division as though it were already closed; (6) that the Books of Mace seem to indicate that the Ps and Dul are already included in the canon of the Jews; (7) that Philo's testimony is negative, in that he witnesses against the Apocryphal books as an integral part of Holy Scripture; (8) that the NT is the most explicit witness of the series, because of the names and titles it ascribes to the OT books which it quotes; (9) that 4 Esd is the first witness to the number of books in the OT canon—24; (10) that Jos also fixes the number of books, but in arguing for the antiquity of the canon speaks as an advocate for a canon considerably later, rather than as a scientific historian; (11) that the Councils of Jamnia may, with some ground, be considered the official occasion on which the Jews pronounced upon the limits of their canon; but that (12) doubts existed in the 2d cent. concerning certain books; which books, however, were not seriously questioned. From all this we conclude, that the Law was canonized, or as we would better say, was recognized as authoritative, first, cir 444 BC, that the Prophets were included as books as early as cir 200 BC; and that the Writings received authoritative sanction still later, cir 100 BC. There probably never were three separate canons, but there were three separate classes of writings, which between 450 and 100 BC doubtless stood on different bases, and only gradually became authoritative. There, is, therefore, ground for thinking, as suggested above (§ 6), that the tripartite division of the OT canon is due to material differences in the content, to the practice of making the English in the transition from the Jewish to the Christian church, we find the same canon cherished by all. Christians on this point have always been disposed to accept without question the canon of the Jews. For cents. all branches of the Christian church were practically agreed on the limits set by the Jews, but eventually the western church became divided, some alleging that Christ sanctioned the "larger" canon of Alexandria, including the Apocrypha, while others adhered, as the Jews have always done, to the canon of the Jews in Pal. Taking the eastern or oriental church first, the evidence is that. The Psalms of Pesh, or Syr version, dating from cir 150 AD, omits Ch; Justin Martyr (164 AD) held to a canon identical with that of the Jews; the Canon of Melito, bishop of Sardis, who (cir 170 AD) made a journey to Pal in order carefully to investigate the matter, omits Est. His list, which is the first Christian list we have, has been preserved to us by Eusebius in his Eccl. Hist., IV, 26; Origen (d. 254 AD), who was educated in Alexandria, and was one of the most learned of the Gr. Churchmen up to his day, who, in the "Hebrew" of the OT text, and gives us a list (also preserved to us by Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., VI, 5) in which he reckons the number of books as 22 (thus agreeing with Jos). Inadvertently he omits the Twelve Minor Prophets, but this is manifestly an oversight on the part of either a scribe or of Eusebius, as he states the number of books is 22 and then names but 21. The so-called Canon of Laodicea (cir 365 AD) included the 14 remaining books of the apocryphal group. Athanasius (d. 365 AD) gives a list in which Est is classed among the non-canonical books, but he elsewhere admits that "Est is considered canonical by the Hebrews." However, he included Bar and the Epistle of Jeremiah with Jeremiah. Athanasius, bishop of Iconium (cir 390 AD), speaks of Est as received by some only. Cyril, bishop of Jerus (d. 386 AD), gives a list corresponding with the Heb canon, except that he includes Bar and the Epistle of Jeremiah. Gregory of Nazianzus in Cappadocia (d. 390 AD) omits Est. But Anastasius, patriarch of Antioch (560 AD), and Leontius of Byzantium (580 AD) both held to the strict Jewish canon of 22 books. The Nestorians generally doubted Est. This was due doubtless to the influence of Theodoret of Mopsuestia (cir 390-457 AD) who disputed the authority of He, Ezr, Neh, Est and Job. The oriental churches as a whole, however, never canonized the Apocrypha. Between 400 and 500 AD the NT writings became canonical, occupying in the Christian church a place of authority and sacredness equal to those of the OT. The tendency of the period was to receive everything which had been traditionally read in the churches. But the transference of this principle to the OT writings produced great confusion. Usage and theory were often in conflict. A church Father might declare that the Apocryphal books were "canonized," or the other, that they were "Scripture," and even introduce them with the accepted formula, "As the Holy Ghost saith." Theologically they held to a strict canon, homiletically they used a larger one. But even usage was not uniform. 3 and 4 Esd and the Book of En are sometimes quoted as "Holy Writ," yet the western church never received these books as canonical. The criterion of usage, therefore, is too broad. The theory of the Fathers was gradually forgotten, and the prevalent use of the LXX and other OT canons, the canon of the Heb, and the distinction between the undisputed books of the Heb canon and the most popular Apocryphal books; and being often publicly read in the churches they finally received a quasi-canonical status. Tertullian (cir 150-230 AD) is the first of the Lat Fathers whose writings have been preserved. He gives the number of OT books as 24, the same as in the Tanh. Hilary, bishop of Poitiers in France (350-385 AD), gives a catalogue in which he speaks of "Jeremiah and his epistles," yet his list numbers only 22. Rufinus of Aquileia in Italy (d. 410 AD) likewise gives a complete list of 22 books. Jerome also, the learned monk of Bethlehem (d. 420 AD), gives the number of canonical books as 22, corresponding to the 22 letters of the Heb alphabet, and explains that the five double books (1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr-Neh, Jer-Lam) correspond to the five final letters of the Heb alphabet. In his famous Prologus Gallicus or "Helled Preface" to the books of S and K, he declares himself for the strict canon of the Jews; rejecting the authority of the deuter-canonical books in the most outspoken manner, even distinguishing carefully the apocryphal additions to Est and to Dtn. As a Catholic writer, D. Gigot, very frankly allows, "Time and again this illustrious doctor [Jerome] of the Lat church rejects the authority of the deuter- canonical books in the most explicit manner" (General Intro, 56).
Contemporaneous with Jerome in Bethlehem lived Augustine in North Africa (355–430 AD). He was the bishop of Hippo; renowned as thinker, theologian and saint. In the three great Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397 and 419 AD), of which he was the leading spirit, he closed, as it were, the great debate of the previous generations on the subject of how large shall be the Bible. In his essay on Christian Doctrine, he catalogues the books of Scripture, which had been transmitted by the Fathers for public reading in the church, giving the distinctive names with which he signed “the authenticity of the OT is ended.” These probably correspond with the present canon of Catholics. But it is not to be supposed that Augustine made no distinction between the proto- and deutero-canonical books. On the contrary, he limited the term “canonical” in its strict sense to the books which are inspired and received by the Jews, and denied that in the support of doctrine the books of Wied and Eclerus were of unquestioned authority, though long custom had enabled them to respect. And when in 2nd June 417 Augustine referred to his opponents in defence of suicide, he rejected their proof by showing that the book was not received into the Heb canon to which Christ was witness. At the third Council of Carthage (397 AD), however, a vote was passed, meeting with his approval, which in effect placed all the canonical and deutero-canonical books on the same level, and in the course of time they actually became considered by some as of equal authority (see Durmense Canonical Books). A few years later, another council at Carthage (419 AD) took the additional step of voting that their own decision concerning the canon should be confirmed by Boniface, the bishop of Rome; accordingly, thereafter, the question of how to separate the books of the Bible made between inspired and uninspired writings. Cassiodorus (556 AD) and Isidore of Seville (636 AD) place the lists of Jerome and Augustine side by side, deciding nothing between them. Two bishops of North Africa, Priscillian (of Numilius 550 AD) reckon 24 books as strictly canonical and explicitly state that the others are not of the same grade. Popular usage, however, was indeterminate. Outside the Jews there was no sound Heb tradition. Accordingly, at the Council of Florence (1442 AD), “Eugenius IV, with the approval of the Fathers of that assembly, declared all the books found in the Lat Bibles then in use to be inspired by the same Holy Spirit, without distinguishing them into two classes or categories” (cf Gigot, General Intro, 71). Though this bull of Eugenius IV did not deal with the canonicity of the Apocryphal books, it did proclaim their inspiration. Nevertheless, down to the Council of Trent (1546 AD), the Apocryphal books possessed an inferior authority; and when men spoke of canonical Scripture in the strict sense, these were not included.

Luther, the great Saxon Reformer of the 16th century, marks an epoch in the history of the Christian OT canon. In translating the Scriptures into German, he gave the deutero-canonical books an intermediate position between the OT and the NT. The Lutheran church, also, while it does not expressly define the limits of the canon, yet places the Apocryphal writings by themselves as distinct and separate from Holy Scripture. This indeed was the attitude of all the early Reformers. In the Zürich Bible of 1529, as in the Genevan version in English of 1560, the Apocryphal books were placed apart with special headings by themselves. The early Reformers did not entirely reject the Apocryphal writings, for it was not an easy task to do so in view of the usage and traditions of centuries.

Rome had vacillated long enough. She realized that something must be done. The Reformers had sided with those who thought that because Rome had therefore resolved to settle the matter in an ecclesiastical and dogmatic manner. Accordingly the Council of Trent decreed at their fourth sitting (April 8, 1546), that the Apocryphal books were equal in authority and canonicity to the other books of sacred Scripture; and to make this decree effective they added: “If, however, anyone receive not as sacred and canonical the said books entire with all their facts, and as they have been used to be read in the churches, he shall be anathema.” The decree was the logical outcome of the ever-accumulating snowball tendency in the western church. The historical effect of it was that the Protestants separated themselves from the field of Bib. study against all free research. Naturally, therefore, the Vatican Council of 1870 not only reiterated the decree but found it easy to take still another step and canonize tradition.

Repeated endeavors were made during the 16th and 17th cents. to have the Apocryphal books removed from the Scriptures. The Synod of Dort (1618–19), Gomarus, Deodatus and others, sought to accomplish it, but failed. The only success that was achieved was in getting them separated from the true canonical writings and grouped by themselves, as in the Gallican Confession of 1559, the Anglican Confession of 1562, and the Second Helvetic Confession of 1566. The Puritan Confession went farther, and declared that they were of a purely secular character. The various continental and Eng. versions of the Bible then being made likewise placed them by themselves, apart from the acknowledged books, as a kind of appendix. For example, the English Bible of 1535, Coverdale’s English tr of 1556, Matthew’s of 1557, the second ed. of the Great Bible, 1540, the Bishops’ of 1568, and the AV of 1611. The first Eng. version to omit them altogether was that of the Geneva Version published in 1629; but the custom of printing them by themselves, between the OT and the NT, continued until 1828, when the Edinburgh Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society protested that the Society should no longer translate these Apocryphal writings and send them to the heathen. The Society finally yielded and decided to exclude them (May 3, 1827). Since then, Protestants in Great Britain and America have given up the practice of publishing the Apoc as a part of sacred Scripture. In Europe, also, since 1850, the tendency has been in the same direction. The Church of England, however, and the American Episcopal church, do not wholly exclude them; certain “readings” being selected from Wied, Eclerus and Bar. and read out in week days between October 28 and November 17. Yet, when the ERV appeared in 1885, though it was a special product of the Church of England, there was not so much as a reference to the Apocryphal writings. The Irish church likewise removed them; and the ARV ignores them altogether.

LITERATURE

I. Two Preliminary Considerations.—The canon is the collection of 27 books which the church (generally) receives as its NT Scriptures. The history of the canon is the history of the process by which these books were brought together and their value as sacred Scriptures officially recognized. That process was gradual, furthered by definite needs, and, though unquestionably continuous, is in its earlier stages difficult to trace. It is always well in coming to the study of it to bear in mind two considerations which bear upon the earliest phases of the whole movement. These are:

1. The early Christians had in their hands what was a Bible to them, viz. the OT Scriptures. These were used in church instruction. They were used in church reading, and their value was recognized.
   a. In Christian instruction. For a whole generation cent. after the death of Jesus this had the OT was the case. These Scriptures were read in the churches, and there could be at first no idea of placing beside them new books which could for a moment rank with them in honor and authority. It has been once and again discussed whether Christianity from the first was a "book-religion." The decision of the matter depends upon what is referred to by the word "Scripture." Until Christianity had from the very beginning a book which it revered—its OT—but years passed before it had even the beginnings of a book of its own. What has been called "the wealth of living canonical material," namely, prophetic and prophetical literature, was written in written words of subordinate value. In this very teaching, however, with its oral traditions lay the beginnings of that movement which was ultimately to issue in a canon of writings.
   b. We do not say that no one who sent forth an epistle or framed a gospel had before him the definite purpose of contributing toward the formation of what we call "the Bible." All the NT writers looked for "the end" as near. Their words, therefore, were to meet definite needs in the life of those with whom they were associated. They had no thought of creating a new sacred lit. And yet these incidental occasional writings have come to be our choicest Scripture. The circumstances and influences which brought about this result are here briefly set forth.

II. Three Stages of the Process.—For convenience of arrangement and definiteness of impression the whole process may be marked off in three stages: (1) that from the time of the apostles until about 170 AD; (2) that of the closing years of the 2d cent. and the opening of the 3d (170-220 AD); (3) that of the 3d and 4th cents. In the first we see for the evidences of the growth in appreciation of the peculiar value of the NT writings; in the second we discover the clear, full recognition of that large part of these writings as sacred and authoritative; in the third the acceptance of the complete canon in the East and in the West.

1. The Early period extending to 170 AD.—It does not lie within the scope of this art. to recount the origin of the several books of the NT from the NT. This belongs properly to NT Apostles to Introduction (q.v.). From the end of the 1st cent. all of the books of the NT were in existence. They were then as treasures of given churches, widely separated and honored as containing the word of Jesus or the teaching of the apostles. From the very first the authority of Jesus had full recognition in all the Christian world. The whole work of the apostles was in interpreting Him to the growing church. His sayings and His life were in part for the illumination of the OT; wholly for the understanding of the life and its meaning. In every church and from the earliest days He was taught as well as the OT. In each church to which an epistle was written that epistle was likewise read. Paul asked that his letters be read in this way (1 Thess 2:7; Col 4:16). In this attitude listened to the exposition of some event in the life of Jesus or to the reading of the epistle of an apostle began the "authorization" of the traditions concerning Jesus and the apostolic writings. The widening of the area of the church and the church itself and the apostles from earth emphasized increasingly the value of that which the writers of the NT left behind them. Quite early the desire to have the benefit of all possible instruction led to the interchange of the writings of the churches. From 170 AD (?) writes to the Philippians, "I have received letters from you and from Ignatius. You recommend me to send on yours to Syria; I shall do so either personally or by some other means. In return I send you the letter of Ignatius as well as others which I have in my hands and for which you made request. I add them to the present one; they will serve to edify your faith and perseverance" (Epistle to Phil, XIII). This is an illustration of what must have happened after the authorizing of the knowledge of the writings of the apostles. Just when and to what extent "collections" of our NT books began to be made it is impossible to say, but it is fair to infer that a collection of the Pauline epistles existed at the time Polycarp wrote to the Phil and when Ignatius wrote his seven letters to the churches of Asia Minor, i.e. about 115 AD. There is good reason to think also that the four Gospels were brought together in some places as early as this. A clear distinction, however, is to be kept in mind between the "collections" and the ultimate recognition as we imply in the word "canonical." The gathering of books was one of the steps preliminary to this. Examination of the testimony to the NT in this early time indicates also that it is given with no intention of framing the canonicity of NT books. In numerous instances only "echoes" of the thought of the earlier quotations are incorporated; both showing that Scripture words are used as the natural expression of Christian thought. In the same way the Apostolic Fathers refer to the teachings and deeds of Jesus. They witness to the substance and not to the authenticity of the Gospels." That this all may be more evident let us note in more detail the witness of the sub-apostolic age.

Clement of Rome, in 95 AD, wrote a letter in the name of the Christians of Rome to those in Corinth. In this letter he uses material found in Mt, Lk, giving it a free rendering (see chs 46 and 13); he has been much influenced by the Epistle to the He (see chs 9, 10, 17, 19, 36). He knows Rom, Cor, and there are found echoes of 1 Tim, Tit, 1 Pet and Eph.

The Epistles of Ignatius (115 AD) have correspondences with our gospels in several places (Eph 8; Rom 6, 7) and incorporate language from nearly all of the Pauline epistles. The Epistle to Polycarp makes large use of Phil, and besides this cites nine of the other Pauline epistles. Ignatius quotes from Mt, apparently from memory; also from 1 Pet and 1 Jn. In regard to all these three writers of what were at once— it is not enough to say that they bring us reminiscences or quotations from this or that book. Their thought is tinted all through with NT truth. As we move a little farther down the years we come to "the interpreter of the Twelve Apostles" (cir 120 AD in its present form; see Didache); the Epistle of Barnabas (cir 130 AD) and the Shepherd of Hermas (cir 130 AD). These exhibit the same phenomena as appear in the writings of Clement, Irenaeus, and Polycarp as far as the NT is concerned. Some books are quoted, and the thought of the three writings echoes again and again the teachings of the NT. They bear distinct witness to the value of "the gospel" and the doctrine of the apostles, so much so as to place these clearly above their own words. It is in the Epistle of Barnabas that we first come upon the phrase "it is written," referring to a NT book (Mt) (see Epis., iv.14). In this deepening sense of value and the feeling of the authority of the NT which slowly was to find expression. It is well to add that what we have so far discovered was true in widely separated parts of the Christian world as e.g. Rome and Asia Minor.

The lit of the period we are examining was not, however, wholly of the kind of which we have been speaking. Two forces were calling out other expressions of the singular value of the writings of the apostles, whether gospels or epistles. These were (a) the attention of the civil government in view of the rapid growth of the Christian church and (b) heresy. The first brought to the defence or commendation of Christianity the Apologists, among whom were Justin Martyr, Aristides, Melito of Sardis and Theophilus of Antioch. By far the most important of these was Justin Martyr, and his work may be taken as representative. He was born about 100 AD at Shechem, and died as a martyr at Rome in 165 AD. His two Apologies and the Dialogue with Trypho are the sources for the study of his testimony. He speaks of the "Memoirs of the Apostles, called Gospels" (Ap., i.66) which were read on Sunday interchangeably with the prophets (i.67). Here emerges that equivalence in value of these "Gospels" with the OT which lay at the beginning of canonization. That these Gospels were our four Gospels as we now have them is yet a disputed question; but the evidence is weighty that they were. (See Purves, Testimonies of Justin Martyr to the Early Church, Lect. V.)

The fact that Tatian, his pupil, made a harmony of the Gospels, i.e. of our four Gospels, also bears upon our interpretation of Justin's "Memoirs." (See Hemphill, The Diatessaron of Tatian.) The only other NT book which Justin mentions is the Apocalypse, but he appears to have known the Acts, six epistles of Paul, He and 1 Jn, and echoes of still other epistles are perceptible. When he speaks of the apostles it is after this fashion: "By the power of God they proclaimed to every race of men that they were sent by Christ to teach to all the Word of God." (Ap., i.39). It is debatable, however, whether this refers to more than the actual preaching of the apostles. The beginning of the formation of the canon is in the position and authority given to the Gospels.

While the Apologists were busy commending or defending Christianity, heresy in the form of Gnosticism was also compelling attention to the matter of the writings of the apostles. From the beginning gnostic teachers claimed that Jesus had favored chosen ones of His apostles with a body of esoteric truth which had been handed down by secret tradition. This the church denied, and in the controversy that went on through years the question of the origin of the NT writings was more and more pronounced. Basiliades e.g., who taught in Alexandria during the reign of Hadrian (AD 117-38), had for his secret authority the secret tradition of the apostle Matthias and of Glaucias, an alleged interpreter of the Gospels, but he bears witness to Mt, Lk, Jn, Rom, 1 Cor, Eph, and Col in the effort to recommend his doctrines, and, what is more, gives them the value of Scripture in order to support more securely his teachings. (See Philosophoumena of Basiliades.) Valentinus, tracing his authority through Theodas to Paul, makes the same general use of NT books, and Tertullian tells us that he appeared to use the whole NT as then known.

The most noted of the Gnostics was Marcion, a native of Pontus. He went to Rome (cir 140 AD), there broke with the church and became a dangerous heretic. In support of his peculiar views, he formed a canon of his own which consisted of Luke's Gospel and ten of the Pauline epistles. He rejected the four Gospels, the Catholic epistles and the Apocalypse, and made a recension of both the gospels of Lk and the Pauline epistles which he accepted. His importance, for us, however, is in the fact that he gives us the first clear evidence of the canon and of the time of its formation. Such use of the Scriptures inevitably called forth both criticism and a clearer marking off of those books which were to be used in the churches opposed to heresy, and so "in the struggle with Gnosticism the canon was made." We are thus brought to the end of the first period in which we have marked the collection of NT books in greater or smaller compass, the increasing valuation of them as depositions of the truth of Jesus and His apostles, and finally the movement toward the claim of their authoritative as over against perverted teaching. No sharp line as to a given year can be drawn between the first stage of the process and the second. Forces working in the first go on into the second, but results are accomplished in the second which give it its right to separate consideration.

(2) The period from 170 AD to 220 AD.—This is the age of a voluminous theological literature busy with the great issues of church canon and creed. It is the period of the growth of Alexandria, and Tertullian, representing respectively Asia Minor, Egypt and North Africa. In passing into it we come into the clear light of Christian history. There is no longer any question as to a NT canon; the only difference of judgment is as to its extent. What has been slowly but surely shaping itself in the consciousness of the church now comes to clear expression.

Irenaeus.—That expression we may study in Irenaeus as representative of the period. He was born in Asia Minor, lived and taught in Rome and became afterward bishop of Lyons. He had, therefore, a more intimate acquaintance with the churches, and was peculiarly competent to speak concerning the general judgment of the Christian world. As a pupil of Polycarp, who was a disciple of John, he is connected with the apostles themselves. An earnest defender of the truth, he makes the NT in great part his authority, and often appeals to it. The four Gospels, the Acts, the epistles of Paul, several of the Catholic epistles and the Apocalypse are to him Scripture in the fullest sense. They are genuine and authoritative, as much so as the OT was. He dwells upon the fact that there are four gospels, the very number being prefigured in the four winds and the four quarters of the earth. Every attempt to increase or diminish the number is hereby. Tertullian takes virtually the same position ( Adv. Marc., 2d). Irenaeus quotes all four gospels as "Scripture." By the end of the 2d cent. the canon of the gospels was settled. The same is true also of the Pauline epistles. Irenaeus makes more than two hundred citations from Paul, and looks upon his epistles as Scripture ( Adv. Haer., iii, 12, 12). Indeed, at this time it may be said that the new canon was known under the designation "The Gospel and the Apostles'" in contradistinction to the old as "the Law and the Prophets," of which the apocryphal fragment of 1 Enoch (c. 198 AD). It occurs frequently after this in Origen and later writers. In considering all this testimony two facts should have emphasis: (1) its wide extent: Clement and Irenaeus represent parts of Christendom which are widely separated; (2) the relation of these men to those who have gone before them. Their lives together with those before them spanned nearly one century, and they all laid down the judgment which silently, gradually, had been selecting the "Scripture" which they freely and fully acknowledged and to which they made appeal.

Muratorian Fragment.—Just here we come upon the Muratorian Fragment, so called because discovered in 1740 by the librarian of Milan, Muratori. It dates from some time near the end of the 2d cent., is of vital interest in the study of the history of the canon, since it gives us a list of NT books and is concerned with the question of the canon itself. The document comes from Rome, and Lightfoot assigns it to Hippolytus. Its list contains the Gospels (the first line of the fragment is incomplete beginning with Mk, but Mk is clearly implied, the Acts, the Pauline epistles, the Apocalypse, 1 and 2 Jn (perhaps by implication the third) and Jude. It does not mention He, 1 and 2 Pet, Jas. In this list we have virtually the real position of the canon at the close of the 2d cent. Complete unanimity had not been attained in reference to all the books which are now between the covers of our NT. Seven books had not yet found a secure place beside the gospel and Paul in all parts of the church. The Palestinian and Syriac Marc, is, in a sense, a long reflected the Apocalypse, while some of the Catholic epistles were in Egypt considered doubtful. The history of the final acceptance of these belongs to the third period.

(3) The period included by the 3d and 4th cents.—It has been said that "the question of the canon did not make much progress in the course of the 3d cent." (Reuss, History of the Canon of Holy Scripture, 125). In the 3d cent. the theologians have the help of available teachers mostly from one center, Alexandria. Their consideration of the question of the disputed book serves just here one purpose. By far the most distinguished name of the 3d cent. is Origen. He was born in Alexandria about 185 AD, and before he was seventeen became an instructor in the school for catechumens. In 203 he was appointed bishop, experienced various fortunes, and died in 254. His fame rests upon his ability as an exegete, though he worked laboriously and successfully in other fields. His testimony is of high value, not simply because of his own studies, but also because of his wide knowledge of what was thought in other Christian centers in the world of his time. Space permits us only to give in summary form his conclusions as, in regard to the books still in doubt. The Gospels, the Pauline epistles, the Acts, he accepts without question. He discusses at some length the authorship of He, believes that "God alone knows who wrote it," and accepts it as Scripture. He is of the opinion that the "defender" is given in the sentence, "Therefore John the son of Zebedee says in the Revelation." He also gives sure witness to Jude, but wavers in regard to Jas, 2 Pet, and 3 Jn. Another noted name of this cent. is Dionysius of Alexandria, a pupil of Origen (d. 265). His most interesting discussion is regarding the Apocalypse, which he attributes to an unknown John, but he does not dispute its inspiration. He is a singular witness to the widespread use of this book from the first, while its position in the East was variable. Conversely the Epistle to the He was more insecure in the West than in the East. In regard to the Catholic epistles Dionysius supports Jas, 2 and 3 Jn, but not 2 Pet or Jude. In the West the name of Cyprian, bishop of Carthage (248–58 AD), was most influential. He was much engaged in controversy, but a man of great personal force. The Apocalypse he highly honored and he was silent about the apocryphal books. "I have this book from the first, and while its position in the East was variable. Conversely the Epistle to the He was more insecure in the West than in the East. In regard to the Catholic epistles Dionysius supports Jas, 2 and 3 Jn, but not 2 Pet or Jude. In the West the name of Cyprian, bishop of Carthage (248–58 AD), was most influential. He was much engaged in controversy, but a man of great personal force. The Apocalypse he highly honored and he was silent about the apocryphal books. "I have this book from the first, and while its position in the East was variable. obtained only partial recognition, to which he assigned Jas, Jude, 2 Pet and 2 Jn. About the Apocalypse also he was not sure. In this testimony there is not much advance over that of the 3d cent. It is virtually the canon of Origen. All this makes the fact that no official decision nor uniformity of usage in the church gave a completed canon. The time, however, was drawing on when various forces at work were to bring much nearer this unanimity and enlarge the list of acknowledged books. In the second half of the 4th cent. repeated efforts were made to put an end to uncertainty. Athanasius in one of his pastoral letters in connection with the publishing of the ecclesiastical calendar gives a list of the books comprising Scripture, and in the NT portion are included all the 27 books which we now recognize. “These are the wells of salvation,” he writes, “so that he who thirsts may be satisfied with the sayings in these. Let no one add to these. Let nothing be taken away.” Gregory of Nazianzen (d. 390 AD) also published a list omitting Rev, as did Cyril of Jesus (d. 386), and quite at the end of the cent. (4th) Isidore of Pelusium speaks of the “canon of truth, the Divine Scriptures.” For a considerable time the Apocalypse was not accepted in the Syrian church. Athanasius helped toward its acceptance in the church of Alexandria. Some differences of opinion, however, continued. The Syrian church did not accept all of the Catholic epistles until much later.

The controversy (Carthage in 397, in connection with its decree “that aside from the canonical Scriptures nothing is to be read in church under the name of Divine Scriptures,” gives a list of the books of the NT. After this fashion there was an early tendency to reject all books that did not meet the criteria of the center, time differences of judgment and practice continued. The books which had varied treatment through these early cents. were He, the Apocalypse and the five minor Catholic epistles. The advance of Christianity under Constantine had much to do with the reception of the whole group of books in the East. The task which the emperor gave to Eusebius to prepare “fifty copies of the Divine Scriptures” established a standard which in time gave recognition to all books. In the West, Jerome and Augustine were the controlling factors in its settlement of the canon. The publication of the Vulg virtually determined the matter.

In conclusion let it be noted how much the human element is involved in the whole process of forming our NT. No one would wish to dispute a providential overruling of it all. Also it is well to bear in mind that all the books have not the same clear title to their places in the canon as far as the history of their attestation is concerned. Clear and full and unanimous, however, has been the judgment from the beginning upon the Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline epistles, 1 Pet and 1 Jn.

CANOPY, kan’-pi (καπνός, ἱππαρχα, from a root meaning “to incline” or “cover”): Isa 4 5 AV has “defence,” ERV “canopy,” ALF “covering,” the last being opposed. “The last being,” however, is in its favor. In Ps 19 5 (He 19 6) ἱππαρχα is used of the bridegroom’s chamber and in Joel 2 16 of the bride’s. Among the Hebrews the ἱππαρχα was originally the chamber in which the bride awaited the groom for the marital union. In Jth 10 21; 13 9 15; 16 19 the word canopy occurs as the Eng. equivalent of the Gr καπνός, ἱππαρχα, which was primarily a mosquito-net and then a canopy over a bed, whether for useful or for decorative purposes. CAPERBERRY, kā’per-ber-i (קפררביה, ἁβηγηνδα: καπαρρας, καπαρραις; Eccl 12 v RV): The “caperberrry shall fail” (AV “burst”) instead of “desire shall fail” (AV) has the support of the LXX and of some Talmudic writers (see G. F. Moore, JBL, X, 55-64), but it is doubtful.

The caperberry is the fruit of the thorny capper, Capparis spinosa (N.O. Capparidaceae), a common Pale plant with pretty white flowers and brightly colored stamens. Largely on account of its habit of growing out of crevasses in old walls it has been identified by some with the fraxap (q.v.). The familiar “capers” of commerce are the young buds, but the berries were the parts most used in ancient times; their repute as excitants of sexual desire is ancient and widespread. Various parts of this plant are still used for medical purposes by the modern peasants ofPale.

CAPERNAUM, ka-pér-naw-um (Καπαρναουσ, Καφαρναους [TR], Καφαρναον, Καφαρναον: The woe spoken by the Master against this great city has been fulfilled to the uttermost (Mt 11 19; Lk 10 15). So completely has it perished that the very site is a matter of dispute today. In Scripture Capernaum is not mentioned outside the Gospels. When Jesus finally departed from Nazareth, He dwelt in Capernaum (Mt 4 13) and made it the center of His teaching activity during a large part of His public ministry. Near by He called the fishermen to follow Him (Mt 1 16), and the publican from the receipt of custom (Mt 9 9, etc.). It was the scene of many mighty works (Mt 11 23; Mk 1 34). Here Jesus healed the centurion’s son (Mt 8 5, etc.), the nobleman’s son (Jn 4 46), Simon Peter’s mother-in-law (Mk 1 31, etc.), and the paralytic (Mt 9 1, etc.); cast out the unclean spirit (Mk 1 25, etc.); and here He also, probably in Capernaum (Mt 5 22, etc.). In Capernaum the little child was used to teach the disciples humility, while in the synagogue Jesus delivered His ever-memorable discourse on the Bread of Life (Jn 6).

From the notices in the Gospels we gather that Capernaum was a city of considerable importance. Some think that the words “shalt thou be exalted,” etc (Mt 11 23; Lk 10 15), mean that it stood on an elevated site. Perhaps more naturally they refer to the excessive pride of the inhabitants in their city. It was a customs station, and the residence of a high officer of the king (Mt 9 9; Jn 4 46, etc.). It was occupied by a detachment of Rom soldiers, whose commander thought the good will of the people was worth a building for them a synagogue (Mt 8 5; Lk 7 5). It stood by the sea (Mt 4 13) and from Jn 6 17 ff (cf Mt 14 34; Mk 6 53), we see that it was either in or near the plain of Gennesaret.

Jos twice mentions Capernaum. It played no great part in the history of his time, and seems to have declined in importance, as he refers to it as a “village.” In battle in el-Batashah his horse fell into a quagmire, and he suffered injury which disabled him for days; his men carried him to the village of Capernaum (this reference is however doubtful; the name as it stands is Kapharnom which Niese corrects to Kapharnikhon), whence he was removed to Tarichaena (Vita, 72). Again he eulogizes the plain of Gennesaret for its wonderful fruits, and says it is watered by a most fertile fountain which the people of the country call Capernaum. In the water of this fountain the Coracinus is found (BJ, III, x, 8). Jos therefore corroborates the Bib. data, and adds the information as to the fountain and the Coracinus fish.
The fish has for it four or other fountains near the lake, and is therefore no help toward identification.

The two chief rivals for the honor of representing Capernaum are Tell Ḥām, a ruined site on the lake shore, nearly 2½ miles W. of the mouth of the Jordan; and Khan Minyeh, fully 2½ miles farther west, at the N.E. corner of the plain of Gennesaret.
Dr. Tristram suggested 'Āin El-Madawwarah, a large spring inclosed by a circular wall, on the western edge of the plain. But it stands about a mile from the sea; there are no ruins to indicate that any considerable village ever stood here; and the water is available for only a small part of the plain.

In favor of Tell Ḥām is Onom, which places Cho-razin 2 miles from Capernaum. If Kerazeh is Cho-razin, this suits Tell Ḥām better than Khan Minyeh.
To this may be added the testimony of Theodosius (cir 530), Antoninus Martyr (600), and John of Würzburg (1100). Jewish tradition speaks of Tankhum, in which are the graves of Nahum and Rabbi Tankhum. Identifying Kafs Nahum with Tankhum, and then deriving Tell Ḥām from Tank-hum, some have sought to vindicate the claims of this site. But every link in that chain of argument is extremely precarious. A highway ran through Tell Ḥām, along which passed the caravans to and from the E.; but the place was not in touch with the great north-and-south traffic.

There is also no fountain near Tell Ḥām answering the description of Jos. Of recent advocates of Tell Ḥām, it is sufficient to name Schürer (IJL, IV, 71) and Buhl (GAP, 224). In this connection it may be interesting to note that the present writer, when visiting the place recently (1911), drew his boatman’s attention to a bit of ruined wall rising above the greensery W. of the lagoon, and asked what it was called. Kanset el Kufry, was the reply, which may be freely rendered, “church of the infidel.” This is just the Arab. equivalent of the Jewish “church of the mimām.”

For Khan Minyeh it may be noted that Gennesaret corresponds to el-Ghousier, the plain lying on the N.W. shore, and that Khan Minyeh stands at the N.E. extremity of the plain; thus answering, as Tell Ḥām cannot do, the description of the Gospels.
The copious fountains at el-Tāibgha, half a mile to the E., supplied water which was conducted round the face of the rock toward Khan Minyeh at a height which made it possible to water a large portion of the plain. If it be said that Jos must have been carried to Tell Ḥām as being nearer the scene of his accident—see however, the comment above—it does not at all follow that he was taken to the nearest point. Arculf (1670) described Capernaum as on a “narrow piece of ground between the mountain and the lake.” This does not apply to Tell Ḥām; but it accurately fits Khan Minyeh.
Isaac Chele (1334) says that Capernaum, then in ruins, had been inhabited by Mīrām, that is, Jewish converts to Christianity. The name Minyeh may have been derived from them. Quaresimus (1620–26) notes a Khan called Minieh which stood by the site of Capernaum. Between the ruined Khan and the sea there are traces of ancient buildings. Here the road from the E., united with that which came down from the N. by way of Khan Jubb Yusef, so that this must have been an importtant center, alike from the military point of view, and for trade. This is corroborated, among others,
G. A. Smith (HCHL, 456 f.; EB, a.v.) and Conder.
Saulay argued in favor of Khan Minyeh in his book, The Sacred Sites of the Gospel, but later, owing to what the present writer thinks a mistaken view of the relation between Tell Ḥām and the fountain at el-Tāibgha, changed his mind (Expos, T, XV, 100 ff.). There is no instance of a fountain 2 miles distant being called by the name of a town. Tell Ḥām, standing on the sea shore, was independent of this fountain, whose strength also was spent in a westward direction, away from Tell Ḥām.

The balance of evidence was therefore heavily in favor of Khan Minyeh until Professor R. A. S.
Macalister published the results of his researches.
He seems to be wrong in rejecting the name Tell Ḥām in favor of Tellulah; and he falls into a curious error regarding the use of the word tell. No one who speaks Arab., he says, “would be likely to apply the word Tell, ‘mound,’ to this flat widespread ruin.” In Egypt Arab., however, tell means “ruin”; and Rev. Asad Mansur, a man of education whose native language is Arab., writes:
“I do not understand what the objectors mean by the word ‘tell.’ In Arabic, ‘tell’ is used for any heap of ruins, or mound. So that the ruins of Tell Ḥām themselves are today a ‘tell’” (Expos, April, 1907, 370). Professor Macalister is on surer ground in discussing the pottery found at Khan Minyeh. He asserts that he found nothing older than the Arab. period, while at Tell Ḥām pottery of the Rom period abounds—“exactly the period of the story of Capernaum.” (PEFS, April and July, 1907). If this is not confirmed by further examination, it disposes of the claim of Khan Minyeh.
Important Rom remains have now been found between the ruined Khan and the sea. It is no longer open to doubt that this was the site of a great Rom city.
The Rom period however covers a long space. The buildings at Tell Ḥām are by many assigned to the days of the Antonines. Is it possible from the remains of pottery to make certain that the city flourished in the time of the Herods? If the city at Tell Ḥām had not yet arisen in the days of Herod, those who dispute its claim to be Capernaum are under no obligation to show which city the ruins represent. They are not the only extensive ruins in the country of whose history we are in ignorance.

1. First Theory: Country and people whence came the Crete Philis (Gen 10 14 = Ch 1 12 [here the clause "whereas went forth the Philis" should probably come after Caphtorim]; Dt 2 23; Jer 47 4; Am 9 7). Jer (loc. cit.) calls it "the land", there is evidence of ancient connexion between Crete and Philistia; and the Philis are called Chereethis, which may mean Cretans (see CHERETHITES). These considerations have led many to identify Caphtor with the important island of Crete. It should be noted, however, that the word "Ḳāftōr", used by Jeremiah, denotes not only "isle", but also "coastland.

Ebers (Egypten und die Bücher Moses, 130 ff) thought that Caphtor represented the Egypt Kaph-ar, holding that Kaph was the Egyptian name for the colonies of Phoenicians in the Delta, extended to cover the Phoenicians in the north and their colonies. Kaph-ar, therefore, would mean "Greater Phoenicia.

But the discovery of Kappadokia among the names of countries conquered by Ptolemy Anteges in an inscription on the Temple of Kom Ombo is fatal to this theory.

A third theory would identify Caphtor with the Kaf of the Egyptian inscriptions. As early as the time of Thotmes III the inhabitants of this land, the Kafit, are mentioned in the records. In the trilingual inscription of Canopus the name is rendered "Kaphitis", or "Phoenicia." This seems to be an error, as the Kafit portrayed on the monuments have no features in common with the Semites. They certainly represent a western type.

It is held that the Egypt Kafis was a district in Asia Minor, probably Cilicia. The sea-pirates, the parusati, whom Ramesses III subdued (cir 1200 BC), entered Syria from the north. The "r in the name is the Egyptian equivalent of the Semitic r. Therefore Parusat = Pilihsot = the Philihtines. And so it is proposed to identify Caphtor with Cilicia. A serious objection to this theory, however, is that the final "t" in Kafis (Jer 47 4) is represented by a verb; whereas in the original Kafis, does not carry conviction.

It is impossible to give a certain decision; but the balance of probability seems still inclined to the first theory.

CAPPADOCIA, kag-ā-do'shē-a (Καππαδοκία, he Kappadokia): An extensive province in eastern Asia Minor, bounded by the Taurus mountains on the S., the Anti-Taurus and the Euphrates on the E., and, less definitely, by Pontus and Galatia on the N. and W. At Malatia the country unrolls itself as a fertile plain; elsewhere the province is for the most part composed of hill-billy and rather barren uplands, and bleak mountain peaks and pastures.

David" (1 Mac 7 26-32). The first part of the word, "Caphtor," means village or hamlet; the last part has been identified with Siloam and also with Kherbet Deir Sollān, about 12½ miles W. of Jerus.

CAPPADOCIA, kap-ā-dō'shē-ə.

The Gr geographers called Cappodocia the son of Ninus, the son of Sogdian, and the first city of Cappadocian culture to Assyria. Cuneiform tablets from Kul Tepe (Kara Eyuk), deciphered by Professors Pinches and Sayce, show that in the era of Khumurrabi (see HAMURABI) this extensive ruin on the ox-bow of the Halys and near Caesarea Phrygia, was an outpost of the Assyry-Bab Empire.

A Hittite civilization followed, from about 2000 BC onward. Malatia, Gurun, Tyana and other old sites contain important and undoubted Hittite remains, while sporadic examples of Hittite art, architecture and inscriptions are found in many places, and the number is being steadily increased by fresh discovery. After the Hittites fade from sight, following the fall of Carchemish, about 718 BC, Cappadocia emerges as a satrapy of Persia.

At the time of Alexander the Great, it received a top-dressing of Gr culture, and a line of native kings established an independent throne, which lasted until Cappadocia was incorporated in the Rom Empire, 17 AD. Nine rulers bore the name of Ariarathes (RV Arathes) the founder of the dynasty, and two were named Ariobarzanes. One of these kings is referred to in 1 Mac 16 22. The history of this Cappadocian kingdom is involved, obscure, and but poorly known.

Pagan religion had a deep hold upon the population prior to the advent of Christianity. Comana was famous for its worship of the great goddess Ma, who was served, according to Strabo, by 6,000 priestesses, who "worshipped the star Phrygia." The cult of Zeus at Venus.

Representatives from Cappadocia were present at Pentecost (Acts 2 9), and Peter includes the converts in this province in the address of his letter (1 Pet 1 1). Caucasus became one of the most important early centers of Christianity. Here the Armenian youth of noble blood, Krikore, or Gregory the Illuminator, was instructed in the faith to which he afterward won the formal assent of his whole nation. Here Basil governed the churches of his wide diocese and organized monasticism. His brother, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nisianzene, lived and labored not far away. Cappadocia passed with the rest of Asia Minor into the Byzantine Empire, but from its exposed position early fell under the domination of the Turks, having been conquered by the Seljukids in 1074.

CAPTAIN, kāp'tīn: In AV there are no fewer than 13 Heb words, and 4 different Gr words, which are rendered by this one Eng. word. In the RV some of these are rendered by other Eng. words, and so we find for "captain": "marshal" (Jer 51 27; Nah 3 17), "prince" (I S 9 16), "governor" (Jer 51 23,28), while in the case of one of these Heb words a different construction is found altogether (Jer 13:21).

Of Heb words in the OT rendered by "captain" (1) the most common is נָבַי, nāḇāy, which denotes "a military commander," whether of thousands or hundreds or fifties of OT (Nu 31:48; 1 S 8:12 and many other places). Sar is the chief officer of any department, civil and religious, as well as military—captain of the guard (1 S 23:6, AV, chief of the executioners RV) (Gen 37:30); chief butler (Gen 40:9); chief baker (Gen 40:10); chief of a district (Neh 3:15); chiefs of tribes (Naphtali; Zebulun, Ps 68:27); chiefs over ganges of slaves (Ex 11); chiefs of the priests and the Levites (Ex 28:2). (2) פֶּהַּ, pehāh, later Heb for chief of the executioners or captain of the guard, a title always given to Nebuzar-adan (2 K 25:8); Jer 39:9 (RSV) and to Arioch (Dnl 2:14). Compare also Rub-mag, chief of the magians (Jer 39:13), and Asahan, chief of the eunuchs (Dnl 1:3). (3) סְנִיָּה, sēnîyâ, "head" over a host (Israel in the wilderness, Nu 14:4), over tribes (Dt 20:10, where RV renders "heads"), over thousands (1 Ch 27:20). Abijah, king of Judah, before joining battle against Jeroboam, claimed "God himself is with us," "my captain," AV, "captain," RV at our "head" RV (2 Ch 13:12). (4) מַשְׁלָתָה, mashâlāth, originally the third man in the chariot, who, when the chief occupant was the king, or commander-in-chief, was of the rank of captain (2 K 7:2; 9:25), the term "third man" being used to mean "a captain" in 2 K 10:9; 2 Ch 9:9, where "chief of the king's captains" combines (1 and 4). (5) נְגַדְתָּה, nēgdâthâ, leader by Divine appointment: of Saul (1 S 9:16, "captain," AV, "prince," RV 10:1); of David (2 S 6:2); of Hezekiah (2 K 20:5); with a charge in connection with the temple (2 Ch 31:13). It is the word used of Menahâth the "prince" (Dnl 9:25), who was also Prince of the Covenant (11:22). (6) מַטְיָה, màtiyâ, "nâšî," rendered "captain" in AV Nu 2:3.5.7 only, there in RV and in other places, both AV and RV, rendered "prince." In 1 Ch 7:40 "chief of the princes" combines (3). (7) פַּרְוֹת, fârōth, is found almost entirely in a foreign title signifying "governor," and belongs to the later history of Israel (Neh 2:7; 9:36; Hag 1:1), rendered "captain" in exclusively foreign associations (1 K 20:24; 2 K 18:24; Dnl 3:27). (8) קֹדִית, qōdît (from root qôdî, Arab. for "judge"), denotes dictator almost "usurper," or "ruler of Sodom" AV and RV, "judges of Sodom" RV (Isa 1:10), used of Jephthah in sense of "captain" AV, "chief" RV (Jgs 11:6), found combined with (3), "head and captain" (AV, "head and chief" RV Jgs 11:11). In Josh 10:24 it denotes commanders of troops, AV "captains of the men of war," RV "chiefs of the men of war." (9) בָּאָל, bâ'âl, only once in "captain of the ward" (Jer 37:13). (11) מַטְפַּח, màtfāh, a dignitary belonging to an oriental court, in AV rendered "captain," in RV "marashal" (Nah 3:17; Jer 61:27). (12) מַשְׁלָתָה, shalîthâ, in Dnl 5:15 of Arioch, the king's captain; in Eccl 5:8, the "prince over power over," and in 7:19, "mighty men" (RV "rulers").

Of Gr words rendered by "captain" in NT there are the following: (1) διακόνας, archēgos, rendered "captain" in He 2:10 AV but relegated to the margin in RV, where "author" (of their salvation) is preferred, this rendering of He 12:2 AV and RV, "author" (and finisher of our faith), "captain" being still retained in RVm. Of Acts 3:15 and 5:31, where the same Gr word is rendered "Prince," the RVm of the former passage giving "Author," the RVm of the latter, the Ascended Christ, the various conceptions thus expressed are found to be bound. (2) χιλιάρχος, chiltarchos, the Lat tribunus mälitum of which there were six to a legion, commanding the six cohorts of which it was composed. In its lit. acceptance it would be "a commander of a thousand," and it is so used in Acts 22:28 where it designates the commander of the Rom garrison in Jerusalem, consisting of a cohort, and is rendered "chief captain" (Jn 19:12; Acts 21:31; 22:24; 24:24). It is used more vaguely in the sense of "military officer" in Mk 6:21; Rev 6:15; 19:18. (3) στρατηγός, strelagōs, used only by St. Luke in the NT, and almost exclusively of (a) officials in charge of the Temple (Lk 22:45; Acts 4:1; 5:24-26). The captain of the Temple had the superintendence of the Levites and priests who were on guard in and around the Temple, and under him were strelagōs, who were also captains of the Temple police, although they took their instruction from him as their head. He was not only a priest, but second in dignity only to the high priest himself; (b) the exception to St. Luke's general usage is where the word is used of the chief authorities in civil affairs at Philippi; where "the magistrates" as a whole is rendered (Acts 16:20), called themselves "praetors" (strelagōs). In the case of Paul and Silas they placed themselves in peril of removal from their office by ordering them to be beaten, being Romans and uncondemned. (4) στρατιώτης, stratiōtēs, the commander of the guard to whom Julius of the Augustan band (according to the TR, Acts 28:16) delivered St. Paul and his fellow-prisoners. The word has disappeared from RV, but the passage in which it ocurs has attestation which satisfies Blase, Sir William Ramsay, and other scholars. It was supposed that this was the captain of the Praetorian guard, but Mommersen and Ramsey believe him to be the princeps peregrinorum castrorum. See Augustan Band; Army, Roman. T. Nicol CAPTIVITY, kap’tiv (נָבַי, nāḇāy, shabbāh; αἵναι, askhēmos, and its derivatives): The frequent references in the OT to captives as men forcibly deported (from the Heb root נָבַי, nāḇāy, shabbāh) or inhabiting a land foreign to them (from Heb נָבַי, nāḇāy) reflect the universal practice of the ancient world. The treatment of captives was barbarous (2 S 8:2) but not always so (2 K 6:21, 22). See further under Assur and War.

Figurative: Except in Job 42:10 the fig. use of the idea is confused to the NT, where reference is made to the triumphal reign of the Lord Jesus (Lk 4:18; Eph 4:8), or on the other hand, to the power of the devil (2 Tim 2:26), or of false teachers (3:6); cf also Rom 7:23; 2 Cor 10:5. LITERATURE

1. Of the Northern Kingdom.—The captivity of the Northern Kingdom was the work of the great Assyrian power having its seat at Nineveh on the Tigris. The em-Power- pire of Assyria, founded nearly 2000 years before the Christian era, had a long history behind it: the names of its kings are engraved on the stone columns of its palace at Balawat, and the texts engraved on the bronze gates of Balawat, discovered by Hormuzd Rassam in 1872, and recognized as the swaying gates of Shalmaneser's palace. From these texts we learn that in his 6th year he encountered the combined forces of Damascus, Hamath, Israel, and other states which had united to oppose his progress westward, and completely routed them in the battle of Karkar (584 BC). The danger which threatened the western states in common had brought Syria and Israel together; and this is in accord with the Scripture narrative which tells of a covenant, denounced by God's prophet, between Ahab and Benhadad (1 K 20:34 f.), and signed in a period of three years when there was no war between Syria and Israel. The defeat of the allies seems, however, to have broken up the confederacy, for, soon after, Ahab is found, with the aid of Jehoshaphat of Judah, attempting unsuccessfully, with fatal result to himself, to recover from the weakened power of Syria the city of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22). In another campaign to the West, which likewise finds no record in Scripture, Shalmaneser received the tribute of Tyre and Sidon, and of "Yahua of Khumi," that is, of Jehu, of the land of Omri, as Israel is called on the monuments.

The next Assyrian monarch who turned his arms against the West was Rimmon-nirari III (810–781 BC), grandson of Shalmaneser II. Although he is not mentioned by name in Scripture, his presence and activity had their influence upon the condition of the people in Judah during the remaining years of the first millennium, and upon the later history of the country. He caused Syria to let go her hold of Israel; and although he brought Israel into subjection, the people of the Northern Kingdom would rather have a ruler exercising a nominal sovereignty over them in distant Nineveh than a king opposing them in Damascus. Hence Rimmon-nirari has been taken for the saviour whom God gave to Israel, "so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians" (2 K 13:5; 13:7; Jer 24).

With the death of Rimmon-nirari in 781 BC, the power of Assyria received a temporary check, and on the other hand the kingdom of Judah under Uzziah and the kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam II reached the zenith of their political prosperity. In 745 BC, however, a usurper, Pul, or Puli, ascended the throne of Assyria, and reigned as Tlath-pileser III. It is by the former name that he is first mentioned in the Scripture narrative (2 K 15:19; 17:3), and by the latter that he is mentioned on the monuments. The two names belong to one man is now held to be certain (Schrader, COT, I, 230 f.).

Tlath-pileser was one of the greatest monarchs of antiquity. He was the first to attempt to consolidate an empire over to which the world has become accustomed since Rom times. He was not content to receive tribute from the kings and rulers of the states which he conquered. The countries which he conquered became subject provinces of his empire, governed by Assyrian satraps and contributing to the imperial treasury. Not long after he had seated himself on the throne, Tlath-pileser, like his predecessors, turned his attention to the West. After the siege of Arpad, northward of Aleppo, the Assyrian forces made their way into Syria, and putting into operation the Assyrian method of deportation and repopulation, the conqueror annexed Hamath which had sought the alliance and assistance of Arziah, that is Uzziah, king of Judah. Whether he then refrained from molesting Judah, or whether his prestige was broken by this campaign of the Assyrian king, it is not easy to say. In another campaign he completely subjugated Menahem of Israel with other kings to tribute. What is stated in a word or two in the Annals of Tlath-pileser is recorded at length in the Bible history (2 K 15: 19 f.): "Now came against the land Pul the king of Assyria; and Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver, that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand. And Menahem exacted the money of Israel, even of all the mighty men of wealth, of each man fifty shekels of silver, to give to the king of Assyria." In the reign of Pekah, under his proper name of Tlath-pileser, he is recorded to have raided the northern parts of Israel, and carried the inhabitants away into the land of Assyria (2 K 15:29). We next hear of Ahaz, king of Judah, appealing to the Assyrians for help against these two tails of smoking firebrands, "Resin of Syria and Pekah, the son of Remaliah (Isa 7:4). To secure this help he took the silver and gold out of the House of the Lord, and sent it as a present to the king of Assyria (2 K 16:8). Meanwhile Tlath-pileser was setting out on a new campaign to the West. He carried fire and sword through Syria, and the neighboring lands and as Gaza, and on his return he captured Samaria, without, however, razing it to the ground. Pekah having been slain by his own people, the Assyrian monarch left Hosea, the leader of the conspiracy, on the throne of Israel as the vassal of Assyria.

In 727 BC Tiglath-pileser III died and was succeeded by Shalmaneser IV. His reign was short and no annals of it have come to light. In 2 K 17 and 18, however, we read that Hosea, relying upon help from the king of Egypt, thought the death of Tiglath-pileser a good opportunity for striking a blow for independence. It was a vain endeavor, for the end of the kingdom of Israel was at hand. They were more grievously given over to oppression and wickedness, which the prophets Amos and Hosea vigorously denounced. Hosea, in particular, was "the prophet of Israel's decline and fall." Prophesying at this very time he says: "As for Samaria, her king is cut off, as foam upon the water. The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed: the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars; and they shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us" (Hos 10:7,8; cf vs 14-15).

No other account are the narratives by Isaiah and Micah of the dooms that is to overtake Samaria: "Woe to the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim, and to the fading flower of his glorious beauty, which is on the head of the fat valley of them that were at Zarephath. For the transgression of Jacob is all this, and for the sins of the house of Israel. What is the transgression of Jacob? is it not Samaria? . . . Therefore I will make Samaria a heap as a heap of the field, and as places for planting vineyards, and as the Jebusites did to The Lord. No help came from Egypt. With the unaided and enfeebled resources of his kingdom Hosea had to face the chastising forces of his sovereign. He was made prisoner outside Samaria and was most likely carried away to Nineveh. Meanwhile the land was over-run and the capital doomed to destruction, as the prophets had declared.

Not without a stubborn resistance on the part of her defenders died "the fortress cease of Ephraim" (Isa 17:3). It was only his covenant, even all that Moses, the servant of Jehovah, commanded, and would not hear it, nor do after it." (2 K 17:15,16).

6. Depopulation and Repopulation of Samaria. --The population of the conquered territory is also described by the sacred historian: "And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Avva, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel; and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof" (2 K 17:24). The fact that Sargon introduced foreign settlers taken in war into Samaria is certain. There were various episodes of deportation and repopulation in connection with the captivity of the Northern Kingdom appears to be certain. We have seen already that Tiglath-pileser III deported the population of the northern tribes to Assyria and placed over the depopulated country governors of his own. And at a time considerably later, we learn that Sargon's grandson Esarhaddon, and his great-grandson Ashur-bani-pal, "the great and noble Omonapa, imported to the region of Samaria settlers of nations conquered by them in the East" (Esr 4:16). Of the original settlers, whom a priest, carried away by the king of Assyria but brought back to Bethel, taught "the law of the god of the land," it is said that they "died and served their own gods, after the manner of the nations from among whom they had been carried away" (2 K 17:33). The hybrid stock descended from those settlers is known to us in later history and in the prophecies of the Southern Kingdom.

We must not suppose that a clean sweep was made of the inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom. No doubt, as in the Bab captivity, "the poorest of the land were left, the tribes in vineyards and husbandmen" (2 K Captivity 25:12). The numbers actually deported were but a moiety of the whole population. But the kingdom of the Ten Tribes was now at an end. Israel had become an Assyrian province, with a governor established in Samaria. As regards the Golah—the captives of Israel in the cities of the Medes—it must not be supposed that they became wholly absorbed in the population among whom they were settled. We can well believe that they preserved their own traditions and usages with sufficient clearness and tenacity, and that they became part of the Jewish dispersion so widespread throughout the East. It is quite possible that at length they blended with the exiles of Judah carried off by Nebuchadnezzar, and that then Judah and Ephraim became one nation as never before. The name Jew, therefore, naturally came to include members of what had earlier been the Northern Confederacy of Israel as well as those of the Southern Kingdom to which it properly belonged, so that in the post-exilic period, Jehudi, or Jew, means an adherent of Judaism without regard to local nationality.

II. Of the Southern Kingdom of Judah. —The captivity of Judah was the work of the great Chaldaean power seated at Babylon on the Euphrates. While the Northern Kingdom had new dynasties to rule it in quick succession, Judah and Jerusalem remained true to the House of David to the end. The Southern Kingdom rested on a firmer foundation, and Jerusalem with its temple and priesthood secured the throne against the enemies who overthrew Samaria for nearly a cent. and a half longer.

Sargon, who captured Samaria in 722 BC, was followed by his generals, who with the cultivators and builders and patrons of lit., Sonnacherib, Esarhaddon, Ashurbanipal. When Ashurbanipal died in 625 BC, the dissolution of the Assyr Empire was not far off. Its hold over the West had greatly slackened, and the tributary peoples were breaking out into revolt. Bands of Scythians, Aryan races from the region of Assyria between the Caspian and the Caspian, were sweeping through the Assyrian Empire as far as Pal and Egypt, and the prophecies of Jeremiah and Zephaniah reflect their methods of warfare and fierce characteristics. They were driven back, however, at the frontier of Egypt, and appear to have returned to the North without invading Judah.

From the North these horses were closing in upon Nineveh, and on and on the Assyrian war was being weakened. In the "Burden of Assyria," foretells the joy of the kingdom of Judah at the tidings of its approaching downfall: "Behold, upon the mountains of Judah, shall the Assyrian no more come." (Nah 1:15, et 2:4-11.) The Medes regained their independence and under their king, Cyaxares, formed an alliance with the Chaldaeans, who soon after revolted under the leadership of Nabopolassar, viceroy of Babylon. Ralliing these various elements to his standard, Nabopolassar laid siege to the Assyrian capital, and in 605 BC, Nineveh, which had been the capital city of great conquerors, and had "multiplied her merchants above the stars of heaven" (Nah 3:15), fell before the combined forces of the Medes and Babylonians, and finally, to rise no more. Of the new Bab Empire upon which the Chaldaeans now entered, Nebuchadrezzar, whose father Nabopolassar had associated him with him on the throne, was the first and most eminent ruler.

The people of Judah should exult in the overthrow of Nineveh and the empire for which it stood we can well understand. Jerusalemites had good reason to be glad that the power of Babylon was lessened, and that the Ninevites were no longer able to threaten them. They had been subjected to heavy tribute for many years, and the Medes and Babylonians were sufficiently strong to hold them in subjection. Nebuchadrezzar had even taken the Babylonians as hostages in 606 BC. (2 K 25:31.)

Nebuchadrezzar, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, 608-597 BC. The fourth year of Nebuchadrezzar, who, fresh from the victory of Carchemish, was making his sovereignty felt in the western world. The despicable king of Judah became Nebuchadrezzar's vassal and continued in his allegiance three years, after which he turned and rebelled against him. But he received neither encouragement nor help from the neighboring peoples. "Jehovah sent against him bands of the Chaldaeans, and bands of the Syrians, and bands of the Moabites, and bands of the children of Ammon, and sent them to destroy Judah, according to the word of Jehovah, which he spake by the prophets" (2 K 24:2). The history of the latter part of Jehoiakim's reign is obscure. The Heb historian says that after a reign of eleven years he slept with his fathers, from which we infer that he died a natural death. From Daniel we learn that in the third year of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadrezzar came upon Judah and besieged it, and carried off, along with vessels of the house of God, members of the royal family, and of the nobility of Judah, among whom was Daniel, the prophet, who foretold the prophet, that Jehoiakim would be in what seems to be a first instalment of the captivity of Judah is expressly affirmed by the Chronicler who says: "Against him [Jehoiakim] came up Nebuchadnezzar . . . and bound him in fetters, to carry him to Babylon" (2 Ch 36:6). However the facts really stand, the historian adds to the record of the death of Jehoiakim and of the succession of Jehoiachin the significant comment: "And the king of Egypt came not again any more as before the king of Babylon had taken, from the brook of Egypt, into the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt." (2 K 24:7.)

Jehoiachin who succeeded Jehoiakim reigned only three months, when he was carried off as an unfortunate predecessor Jehozachar (2 K 23:31). The captivity of Jehoahaz in Egypt and the captivity of Jehoiachin in Babylon are lamented in a striking elegy by Ezekiel, who compares them to young lions, the offspring of the mother lioness Israel, which learned to catch their prey and devoured men, but were taken in the pit of the nations and put in rags, so that their roar was no more heard in the mountains of Israel (Ezek 19:1-9). Nebuchadrezzar came in person while his servants were besieging Jerusalem, and Jehoiachin surrendered at discretion. So the king and his mother and his servants and the princes and his officers were carried off with the mighty men of valor, even ten thousand captives. None remained, save the poorest sort of the people of the land. He carried out thence all the treasures of the house of Jehovah, and the treasures of the king's house, and cut in pieces all the vessels of gold, which Solomon king of Israel had made in the temple of Jehovah, as Jehovah had said. And all the men of might, even seven thousands and three hundred, and the swift as a horse, were taken captive to Babylon.

8. First Deportation, a thousand, all of them strong and 597 BC apt for war, even them the king of Babylon brought captive to Babylon. And the king of Babylon made Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's brother, king in his stead, and changed his name to Zedekiah (2 K 24:10-17). From Jehoiachin dates the carrying away into Babylon, the year being 597 BC. The unfortunate monarch lived in exile in Babylon 38 years, and seems to have retained the respect and loyalty of the exiles among whom he dwelt.

It was with reference to the deportation of the prince and craftsmen and smiths that Jeremiah had his vision of the baskets of figs—one containing figs very good, like the first ripe figs: the other very bad, so bad that they could not be eaten (Jer 24:1-3). The good figs were the captives of Judah carried away into the land of the Chaldaeans for good; the bad figs were the king Zedekiah and his princes and the residue of Jerusalem, upon whom severe judgments were yet to fall till they were consumed from off the land (vs 4-10).

Among the captives thus carried to Babylon and placed on the banks of the Chebar was the priest prince Ezekiel. The prophet Ezekiel, in the captivity he began to have his wonderful "visions" of God, and to declare their import to the exiles by the rivers of Babylon. To the desponding captives he uttered such thoughts of the kingdom of Judah, not yet dissolved, and of the Holy City, yet not burned up with fire, Ezekiel could only proclaim by symbol and allegory the destruction of city and nation, till the day when the distressing tidings reached them of its complete overthrow. Thus to the crushed and despairing captives he utters no lamentations like those of Jeremiah, but rather joyful predictions of a rebuilt city, of a reconstituted kingdom, and of a renovated and glorious temple.

Although the flower of the population had been carried away into Babylon and the Temple had been despoiled of its treasures, Jerus and the Temple still stood. To the inhabitants who were left behind, and the captives in Babylon, Jeremiah had a message. To the latter he offered counsel of submission and contentment, assured that the hateful and repulsive idolatries around them, and that they throw them back upon the laws and precepts of their God, and thus promote the rink of moral and spiritual re-

They fled from the city by night "by the way of the king's garden, through the gate betwixt the two walls," and made eastward for the Arabah. But the army of the Chaldaeans would not follow, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho. They took him prisoner and brought him to Nebuchadrezzar at Riblah, where the king of Babylon first slew the son of Zedekiah, and then put out his eyes.
the sons of the captives mouth were slain all the nobles of Judah. This time neither city nor temple nor palace were burned. The king and the king’s house; and all the houses of Jerusalem, every great house, burnt he with fire’ (2 K 25 9). His soldiers, too, broke down the walls of Jerusalem round about. The treasure and the Nethinim furnishings of the Temple, in so far as they had escaped the former spoliation, were carried away to Babylon. The ruin of Jerusalem was complete. The Book of Lamentations utters the grief and shame and penitence of an eyewitness of the captures and destruction of the Holy City: ‘Jehovah hath accomplished his wrath, he hath poured out his fierce anger; and he hath kindled a fire in Zion, which hath devoured the foundations thereof. The kings of the earth believed not, neither all the inhabitants of the world, that the adversary and the enemy would enter into the gates of Jerusalem. Woe unto us! for we have sinned. For this our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim; for the mountain of Zion, which is desolate: the foxes walk upon it’ (Lam 4 11.12; 5 16.18).

“So Judah,” says the prophet who had been through the siege and the capture (if not rather the editor of his prophecies), “was carried away out of his land and out of his place, and overthrown; and his seed was cut off” (Jer 37 17). The statements of the numbers carried away are, however, conflicting. In Jer (52 28–30) we read of three deportations: that of 597 BC which carried 10 000 persons; a second of 586 BC when Nebuchadrezzar carried off 832 persons; and one later than both in 581 BC when Nebuzaradan carried away captive of the Jews 745 persons—a total of 4,600. From Haggai and Zechariah we learn how the work of rebuilding the Temple was conceived and carried out. Of the social condition of the Exiles an interesting revelation is given by the excavations at Nippur. From cuneiform tablets, now in the Imperial Ottoman Archives and by the inscriptions observed among the business archives of the wealthy firm of Murashu, sons of Nippur, in the reign of Artaxerxes I and Darius II (464–405 BC), there can be read quite a number of Jewish names. And the remarkable thing is that many of these names are those known to us from the genealogical and other lists of the Books of K and Ch and Ezra and Neh. Professor Hilprecht (The Babylonian Expedition, IX, 13 ff) infers from an examination of these that a considerable residue of the people that were left in the city, but he “left of the poorest of the land to be vinedressers and husbandmen” (2 K 25 12). “They were, as the Bib. narratives testify, the poorest of the land, from whom every man of substance and every had been stièp; mere groups of peasants, without a leader and without a center; disorganized and depressed; bitten by hunger and compassed by enemies; uneducated and an easy prey to the heathenism by which they were surrounded. We can appreciate the silence which reigns in the Bible regarding them, and which has misled us as to their numbers. They were a negligible quantity in the religious future of Israel: without initiative or any influence except that of a dead weight upon the efforts of the children of the nation, when these at last returned from Babylon” (Jerusalem, II, 269–70).

Over those who were left behind, Gedaliah was appointed governor, with his residence at Mizpah, where also a Bab contingent remained on guard. Jeremiah had the choice of being taken to Babylon or of remaining in Judah. He preferred to remain with the residue of the people under the care of Gedaliah. With the murder of Gedaliah by Ishmael, son of Sheshan, governor of the royal house, who in turn had fled to flee and made good his escape, it looked as if the last trace of the former kingdom of Judah was wiped out. Against the counsel of Jeremiah, the remnant, led by Johanan the son of Kareah, resolved to take refuge in Egypt and insisted that Johanan and the elderly elders should accompany them. It is in Egypt, amid disappointment and misrepresentation which he had to endure, that we have our last glimpse of the prophet of the downfall of Judah. Of the descendants of those settlers in Egypt remarkable remains have been discovered within the last few years. They consist of Aram. papyri which were found at Assuan, the ancient Syene, and which belong to a time not more than a cent. after the destruction documents are accounts and contracts and deeds of various kinds, from which we gather that in the 5th cent. BC there were Jews keeping themselves apart as they do still, worshipping Jehovah, and no other God, and even having a temple and an altar of sacrifice to which they brought offerings from their fathers did at Jerusalem before the destruction of the Temple. These papyri give us valuable glimpses of the social condition and religious interest of the settlers. See Dispersion.

The Exiles in Babylon

The Jewish captives carried off by Nebuchadrezzar and settled by the rivers of Babylon, we learn something from the prophecies of Daniel which are now generally believed to belong to the Macca- bæan strata. Those prophecies of Ezekiel, from the Psalms of the Captivity, and from the Second Isaiah, whose glowing messages of encouragement and comfort were inspired by the thought of the Return. From Haggai and Zechariah we learn how the work of rebuilding the Temple was conceived and carried out. Of the social condition of the Exiles an interesting revelation is given by the excavations at Nippur. From cuneiform tablets, now in the Imperial Ottoman Archives and by the inscriptions observed among the business archives of the wealthy firm of Murashu, sons of Nippur, in the reign of Artaxerxes I and Darius II (464–405 BC), there can be read quite a number of Jewish names. The influence of the Captivity as a factor in the development of Judaism can hardly be overestimated. “The captivity of Judah,” says Dr. Foakes-Jackson (Biblical Rise and Development of Judaism the history of Israel ends, and the history of the Jew commences.” Placed in the midst of heathen and idolatrous surroundings the Godly recoiled from the abominations of their neighbors and clung to the faith of their fathers in the God of Abraham. Exposed to the taunts and the scorn of nations that despised them, they formed an inner circle of their own, and cultivated that exclusiveness which has marked them ever since. By living one social and spiritual system, without any material basis for their life as a people, they learned as never before to prize those spiritual possessions which had come down to them from the past. They built up their nationality in their new surroundings upon the foundation of their religion. Their prophets, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, had encouraged and stimulated them with the assurance of spiritual blessings, and the promise of restoration. For their whole social and domestic and spiritual life there was needed some steady and continuous regulative principle or scheme. The need of this threw their leaders and thinkers back upon the Law of Moses. The rabbi and the scribe took the place of the sacrificing priest. The synagogue and the Sabbath came to occupy a new place in the religious practice of the people. These and other institutions of Judaism only attained to maturity after the Return, but the Captivity and the Exile created the needs they were meant to supply. While the prophets were clear and explicit in setting forth the Captivity, they were not less so in predicting the Return. Isaiah with his doctrine of the Remnant, Micah, Zechariah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and others gifted with the vision of God, cheered the nation, each in their day, with the hope of restoration and return, not for Judah only but for Israel as well. Vineyards were to be planted again upon the mountains of Samaria as well as in the valleys of Judah. Jeremiah had even predicted the length of the period of the Exile, when he declared that the habitants of the land should serve the king of Babylon for seventy years (Jer 25.12; 29.10).

It was in Cyrus, who brought about the fall of Babylon and ended the New Babylonian Empire in 539 BC, that the hopes of the exiles came to be centered. He was "the battle-axe" with which God was to shatter Babylon (Jer 51.20), and as he proceeded on his path of victory the unknown Seer whom we call the Second Isaiah welcomed him as the liberator of his people. Thus saith Jehovah . . . of Judah, They shall be inhabited; and of the cities of Judah, They shall be built, and I will raise up the waste places thereof; that saith of the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers; that saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure, even saying of Jerusalem, She shall be built; and of the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid" (Isa 44.26–28).

Within a year of the entry of Cyrus into Babylon an edict was issued (2 Ch 36.22-23; Ezr 1.1 ff), granting permission to the exiles to rebuild the House of the Lord in Jerusalem.

19. Rebuilding of the Temple, 536 BC

Within a year of Cyrus' return and build a house for the Lord in Jerusalem. He also brought forth the vessels of the Temple which Nebuchadnezzar had carried away and handed them over to Sheshbazzar, the prince of the captivity, and Sheshbazzar brought them with him when they of the Captivity were brought up from Babylon unto Jerusalem.

Particulars of the Return are given in the Books of Ezr and Neh, and in the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah. Of the exiles 42,500 returned under Sheshbazzar, besides slaves; and under Jeshua the son of Jozadak the priest, and Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, first an altar was built and then the foundations of the Temple were laid. In consequence of the opposition of the Samaritans, who were refused any share in the restoration of the Temple, the work of rebuilding was greatly hindered, and came to a stop. It was then that Haggai and Zechariah urged the resumption of the work and partly by denouncing the negligence of the people who were watching the glorious future in store for the Temple, hastened forward the enterprise. At length in the month Adar, in the 6th year of Darius (519 BC) the work was completed and the Passover celebrated within the courts of the restored Sanctuary (Ezr 6.15–18).

For some decades the history is silent, and it was in 545 BC that Ezra set out for Jerusalem taking 1,800 Jews along with him. He found that the returned Jews had become allied in marriage with the people of the land and were in danger of losing their racial characteristics by absorption among the heathen (Ezr 9). It was due no doubt to his efforts and those of Nehemiah, supported by the searching and powerful utterances of Malachi, that this peril was averted. Thirteen years later (445 BC) Nehemiah, the cupbearer of Artaxerxes, having heard of the desolate condition of the Holy City, the place of his fathers' sepulchres, obtained leave of his master to visit Jerusalem. With letters to the governors on the route and to the keeper of the king's forest, he set out, and came safely to Jerusalem. Having himself inspected the walls he called the people to the work of repairing the ruins, and despite the taunts and calumny and active hostility of the Samaritans, who opposed the work, the people completed the gates set up and the city repopulated. Nehemiah and Ezra then gathered the people.
CARAVAN, kar-a-van, kar-a-van' (תֶּבַע, 'ørá): This word is not found in AV, but RV employs it three times, viz, in Job 6 18.19 ('øráh), where AV renders "paths" (ver 18) and "troops" (ver 19); in Isa 21 13 ('øráh), where AV and EV give "travelling companies," and in Ezk 27 28 (םָיְרָה), where AV gives "sea." It totally differs from the Heb term. The Heb term in Ezk is dubious, but in Isa and Job "caravan" is undoubtedly a correct rendering of the Heb (cf also Gen 37 25). The inhabitants of Pal were familiar with the caravans—the goods trains of the Sem word—which traveled between Babylon and Syria on the one hand to Arabia and on the other to Egypt. The main routes between these countries passed through Canaan. Isaiah refers to "caravans of Jedidites"—a trading Arab tribe who conveyed their wares to Babylon. Job compares his would-be friends to a deceitful brook, full in the rainy season, but dry in summer, which entices caravans to turn aside from the main route in the hope of a plentiful supply of water, but which fails to satisfy the thirsters when they do need it most.

CARCASS, CARCASE, kär'kas: The dead body of a beast; used sometimes in a contemptuous way of the dead body of a human being. The use of the word as applied to a living body is not found in either OT or NT. (1) It occurs as a tr of the Heb יִגְנָת, yegnáth, in Gen 15 11; this Heb word is also trd "dead body" in Nu 14 29; 1 S 17 46; Isa 34 3; 66 24; Ezk 6 5; 43 7,9, and "corpse" in Nah 3 3. (4) In Mt 24 28 the word "carrion" (not "carrasses") is used to render the Gr πτύωσα, ptyósa, the reference here being to the dead body of an animal. For the body of a human being the Gr is τρόφος, corpse (Mt 14 12; Mk 6 29; 15 45), and "dead bodies" (Rev 11 8,9). W. N. STEARNS

CARCHEMISH, kär'ke-mish (קֶרכֶמֶישׁ, kär'kemish): Xarâmêš, Carachemish, Carakâmish, Carchemish: An exceedingly ancient Hittite city on the banks of the Euphrates, identified with Jerablus (Hierapolis), about 23 hours from Aleppo, between Birejik and Membil. The Assyry form of the name is Karpamîš or Garpamîš, but its meaning is doubtful, the interpretation "Port of the god Chemish" having been supposed before it was known that the Assur-Bab form of Chemosh was not Kamish or Gamish, but Kammûšu (Kammos). Systematic excavations on the site have apparently only just been made, those undertaken by Condl J. Henderson, after the death of G. Smith the Assyriologist, having been mainly devoted to the excavation of sculptures, etc. The site has vast walls and palace-mounds about 8,000 ft. in circumference. The earliest occurrence of the name is in an adjectival form, namely, Karkamish, "Carchemishite," applied to a vase or measure of 200 qa, in a list of property at Sippur in the reign of Amsi-nadu-aga (cir 1900 BC). Later on, the Egypt poet known as Pontaur refers to the passage of the Assyrians, and exhibits a manner-

1. Evidence of the City's Early forming, with the men of Arvad, Existence Aleppo and Cozana, part of "the host of the miserable king of the Hittites" (Hattu-sil), who fought against Ramesses II at the battle of Kadesh. The first Assyrian king to mention Carchemish is Tiglath-pileser I (cir 1298 BC), who states that he plundered "from the neighborhood of the land of Sulu [the Shuhites] as far as Carchemish of the land of Hattu" in one day.

Later, the city attracted the attention of the Assyrian king Assur-nazir-apil, who started on the wish of Iyyar, about the year 870 BC.

2. Its Later History received tribute from the son of Bit-

Dalbani, and, a little later, from Sangara of Carchemish, who is described as king of the Hittites. This tribute consisted of 20 talents of silver, various objects of gold, 100 talents of copper, 250 talents of iron, furniture, chariots and horses—an enormous treasure. Shalmaneser II, son of Assur-Nazir-Apil, and his successor, Shalmaneser III, were both plunderers of Carchemish.

The tribute paid by the Hittite king on this occasion is depicted on strip F of the bronze coverings of the gates of Balawkt, which has four representations of the place—two in the upper and two in the lower row of reliefs. The Kurkh monolith states that the tribute consisted of "2 talents of gold, 70 talents of silver, 80 talents of bronze, 100 talents of iron, 30 talents of purple stuff, 500 weapons, his daughter with a dowry, and 100 daughters of his great men, 500 oxen, and 5,000 sheep." A yearly tax was also imposed. The reliefs show two long trains of tribute-bearers, that in the lower row escorting the princess, who, apparently accompanied by her father, goes to meet the Assyrian king. Samsi-Adad, Shalmaneser II's son, merely mention Carchemish and its king on their defeat of the king of the Hittites, later on the accession of Sargon of Assyria, however, Pisiris tried to throw off the Assyrian yoke, and made alliance with Moschok (Mosekh) and other rulers, but was taken prisoner in the operations which followed. In the subsequent plundering of the city, those who suffered most were the inhabitants of the city who had been most active against Assyria. These were carried captive, and their places filled, as was the custom, by Assyrian settlers. The empire continued, the "mass of Carchemish" being one of the standard weights in use at Nineveh. After incorporation into the Assyrian empire it was ruled by Assyrian governors, one of whom, Bêl-emarani, was eponym for the year 3042 of the reign of Sen-

4. Sculpture and Inscriptions Found at Carchemish natural objects and implements in relief arranged in boucropshod bands between division-lines. It is not improbable, however, that cuneiform was also used, and texts in Phoen characters may, by chance, be found. The patron-deity of the city was the Asiatic goddess Atargatis, whose worship, when the place lost its importance, was removed to the new Hierapolis now represented by the ruins of Memhibh. T. G. CARE, kăr, CAREFULNESS, kăr'fōl-ness, CAREFUL, kăr'fōl: The Eng. word "care" has such a variety of meanings, and so many Heb and Gr words in the Bible are translated by this Eng. expression and its compounds, that it is difficult to organize them into a single brief article. We may do so, however, by remembering that into our word are really woven two strands, one Teutonic and one Lat. The former etymologically derives a sense from "care," as in one troubled, or sorrow, as the pain from a blow, a throb, a distress in the mind; the latter, from Lat cura, implies a stretching forward, attention to some person or thing. We can often discern these two senses side by side in the Bible, and sometimes they almost run into one another. This is so esp. in the AV. We can treat the subject best by keeping separate, as far as possible, these two senses.

1. In the Sense of Anxiety, Solicitude.—In the OT several words are trans. "care" in this sense. "They father hath left off caring for the asses," concern about them lit. substantives "matters of the asses" (יְתָם, dibbërē, 1 S 10 2). "They shall eat bread by weight, and with care" (יְתָם, dəqədûh, "carefulness" RV; "fearfulness" ARV, Ezek 4 16). The same word is rendered carelessness (AV and RV; "fearlessness," ARV, Ezek 12 18-19); and "fear" (AV; "carefulness," RV and ARV, Josh 22 24). Again, "heaviness" (AV, RV, and ARV); "care" (RVm and ARVm, Prov 25 25). These RVm and ARVm, Jer 49 23. There is also the word מַרְאֶה, מַרְאֶה, "trembling," "fear," "anxiety." It is rendered "trembling" (Gen 27 33 AV). But "thou hast been careful for us with all this care" ("showed us all this reverence," RVm, ARVm, 2 K 14 3).

In the NT care, in the sense of anxiety, is the meaning given to μεθυα, merimnōma, the condition of being drawn mentally in different directions, distraction of mind. "Care of the world" (Mt 13 22: Mk 4 19; Lk 8 14, "c. of this life," Lk 21 34); "care of all the churches" (2 Cor 11 28) ("anxiety," RV and ARV); "casting all your care upon him" ("anxiety," RV, ARV, 1 Pet 5 7). Also in the Apoc., the importance of care! "My heart failed for care" (1 Mac 6 10); "Care bringeth old age before the time" (Sir 30 24). To these may be added the adj. amērimnos, "I would have you without carefulness" (AV; "free from cares," RV and ARV, 1 Cor 7 32).

In the C, (2877, dəqeph, "to have concern or anxiety for"; "Not be careful in the year of drought!" (Jer 17 8). (ט הַיָּרָה, stam lēb, "to set the heart upon"). "If we flee away, they will not care for us" ("set their heart upon us" AVm, 2 S 18 3). In the NT (μεθυα, merimnōma), "Thou art careful and troubled!” ("anxious" RV and ARV, Lk 10 41). “He that is unmarried cares for things that belong to the Lord” (“is careful for,” RV and ARV, 1 Cor 7 32-34). “Members should have the same care one for another” (1 Cor 12 25). “Who naturally cares for your souls” (Phl 2 20). “Be careful for nothing” (“in nothing be anxious,” RV and ARV, Phil 4 6). The Apos has “careful” (Bar 3 18) and the RV has “be not careful overmuch,” where a distinction is plainly made between care in the sense of anxiety and of attention, for a person cannot be too attentive, but he may be too anxious (2 Esd 2 27).

The impersonal vb. (meye, milyt), though not quite so strong as merimean, always implies a degree of concern higher than is felt in mere attention. “Carest thou not that we perish?” (Mk 4 38). “Carest not for anyone” (AV “no man,” Mt 22 16; Mk 12 14). “Dost thou not care that my sister did leave me to serve alone?” (Lk 10 40). “Careth not for the sheep” (Jn 10 13). “Cared for the poor” (Jn 12 6). “Gallio cared for none of these things” (Acts 18 17). “Care not for it?” (1 Cor 7 21). “He careth for you” (1 Pet 5 7). “Doth God care for oxen?” (better, “Is he for the oxen that God careth?” RV and ARV, 1 Cor 9 9).

2. In the Sense of Attention.—In the sense of attention, with the flavor of earnestness added from the original Teutonic meaning of the word care, we have the word of σκοπέω, spoudai, “speed,” earnest care.

What carefulness it wrought in you (“earnest care,” RV, ARV, 2 Cor 7 11). “Our care for you in the sight of God” (“earnest care, RV, ARV, 2 Cor 12). “Put the same care into the heart of Titus” (“earnest care,” RV, ARV, 2 Cor 8 16). We have also φυσιριος, phronis, the infin. used as a subst. “Your care for me hath flourished” (“thought,” RV, ARV, Phil 4 10). Also φυσιριος, phrontis, “thought” (“care” ARV, Wisd 6 17; 7 4).

“A land which Jehovah thy God careth for” (בַּנְיָן, dōrans, “seek after”) (“seeketh after,” RVm, ARVm, Dt 11 12). “No man careth for my soul” (“sought” AVm, Ps 142 4; φύσιριος, boshak). “We are not careful to answer” (AV, AVm, ARVm; “We have no need to answer,” RV, ARV, Dtn 3 16). In the NT teumelinai, epimerismoi, “Take care of him” (Lk 10 34 35). “How shall we take care of the church of God?” (1 Tim 3 5). “φυσιριος, phrontis, “to be thoughtful or mindful of,” “may be careful to maintain good works” (Tit 3 8).

CAREAH, ka-rē-a. See CAREAH.

CAREFUL, CAREFULNESS. See CARE.

CAREFULLY, kār′thōl-i: The same two strans of anxiety and of attention appear in this word as in care. Several words in the Heb and Gr are thus rendered in the Eng. VSS. “Anxiously” is the thought in “The inhabitants of Maroth waited carefully for good” (תָּבְח, bōhash, “to be in pain,” “was grieved” AVm, “waiteth anxiously” RV, ARV, “is in travail” RVm, ARVm, Mic 1 12). RV, ARVm, “care of attention,” the Heb emphatic expression, the infinite absolute with the finite vb. is rendered “carefully” in, “Shall shalt carefully hearken” (lit. “hearing, thou shalt hear,” “diligently hearken” RV, ARV, Dt 15 5). The same Heb is rendered “diligently hearken” RV, “hearken diligently” RV, ARV (Dt 11 13; 26 1).

In the Apos merimean is τρε “carefully,” as “We should carefully think of thy goodness” (“ponder” RV, Wisd 12 22).

G. H. TAYLOR

CARELESS, kār′les, CARELESSLY, kār′les-li: These words always mean, “without anxiety,” the confidence springing from a sense of security. There is both the vb. μηθυ, bōhash, “he trusted,” and the noun μηθυ, bōhash, “Ye careless daughters” (RVm “confident”) (Isa 33 9-11). People dwelt careless (“in security” RV, ARV, Jsa 18 7); “careless Ethiopians” (Ezk 30 9). “Thou that dwellest carelessly” (“securely” RV, ARV, “confidently” AVm, Ezk 39 6). “The city that dwelt carelessly” (Zeph 2 15). ARV and RV add μηθυ, bōhash, “he despaired,” using the participle in “He that is careless of his ways shall die,” “despiseth” AV, ARVm, RVm (Prov 19 16).

CAREM, kār′em (Kari, Karėm): A city of Judah interpolated by the LXX (Josh 15 59). Probably Bēth-haccherem (q.v.).

CARIA, kā′ri-a (Kari, Karia): A country in the S.W. of Asia Minor which extended, however, on the N. to Lydia, on the E. to Phrygia, on the S. to Lycia, and the W. to the Aegean Sea. Its borders, however, like those of most of the ancient countries of Asia Minor, were never definitely fixed; hence the difficulty presented by the study of the political divisions. The general surface of the country is rugged, consisting of mountainous ridges running across the country, and terminating as promontories jutting into the sea. Its history consists chiefly of that of its practically independent cities of which Miletus (Acts 10 19-20) and Cnidus (Acts 27 7) are the chief. For some time previous to 168 BC it had lost its independence, and belonging to the island of Rhodes, but in that year Rome made it again free. According to 1 Macc 15 23, Caria was one of several places to which the Rom senate in 139-138 BC sent letters in favor of the Jews, a fact showing that its population was mixed. Its coast cities, however, were peopled chiefly by Greeks. In 129 BC Caria became a part of the Rom province of Asia, and from that date its history coincides with that of the province. Though Paul and others of the apostles traversed Caria in their missionary journeys, only its cities are mentioned by name in that connection.

CARITES, kār′ti-tēz (καρίτες, kār′i-tez, “one ready,” “life-savers,” “battalions.” A body of troops mentioned in 2 K 11 4-10 (AV “captains”). Instead of Greek thrites (q.v.), the Kethibh of 2 S 30 23 offers the reading Carites.

CARAMEL, kār’-mēl (חֵלְבָּא), or, with art., לֶקְהָדָא, karmēl, “fruit garden,” or ha-karmēl; Jos. 6, 6 Karēph-lōs, ho Kārmēlos, Ka rēph-lōn orsos, Karēph-lōn oros; Karēph-lōn oros): (1) A beautifully wooded mountain range running for about 15 miles along the southern shore of the Mediterranean and rising to an elevation of more than 1,200 ft. above sea level; it is the scene of the battle between David and the men of Jabesh-gilead (1 K 18 30). We may assume that there was also a temple of Baal, since the worshippers of these deities chose the place as common ground for the great festival (1 K 18). The scene is traditionally located at el-Mabreshah, “the place at which the burnt sacrifice,” which is still held sacred by the Druses. A Lat chapel stands near, with a great cistern. A good spring is found lower down the slope. Just below, on the N. bank of the Kishon stands the mound called Tell el-kheis, “mound of the priest.” From the crest of Carmel Elijah directed the coming storm, and, descending the mountain, ran before the chariot of Ahab to the gate of Jezreel (1 K 18 42 ff.). Under the monastery on the western promontory is a cave, said to be that of Elijah. An older tradition locates the cave of the prophet at ed-Der, near As-Sinnah. It may have been the scene of the events narrated in 2 K 1 19 ff. Elisha also was a familiar visitor to Mt. Carmel. It was within the territory allotted to Asher; in later times it passed into the hands of Tyre (1 K 11, iii, 4). (2) A city of Judah, in the uplands near Hebron, named with Maon and Ziph (Josh 15 55). Here Saul for some reason not stated set up a monument or trophy (1 S 15 12; lit. “hand”). It was the home of Nabal the churlish and drunken flockmaster, whose widow Abigail David married (1 S 25); and also of Hezro, one of David’s mighty men (2 S 23 35; 1 Ch 11 37). It is represented by the modern el-Karmel, about 10 miles to the S.E. of Hebron. Karīm is the pronunciation given me by several natives this spring. There are considerable ruins, the most outstanding feature being a square tower dating from the 12th cent., now going swiftly to ruin. There are also caves, tombs and a large reservoir.

CARMELITE, kār’mel-īt (קָרֶמֶלִית), karmēlīt; Kārmēltis, Karmēltis, Karēph-lētis, Karmēltēs): A native of the Judean Carmel. Those who are thus named are Nabat, the husband of Abigail (1 S 29 5, etc.), and Hezro (AV Hezrai), one of David’s mighty men (2 S 23 35). In 2 S 3 3 LXX reads ίδεις Ἀβγαίας τοὺς Κάρμελιτας, “of Abigail the Carmelites” (1 S 27 3; 1 Ch 3 1). See following art., CARMELITESS.

CARMELITESS, kār’mel-īt-ēs, kār-mel-ītēs (קָרֶמֶלִיתֶס, karmēlith; Kārmēltis, Karmēltis): A name applied only to Abigail, the wife of Nabat, and subsequently of David, a native of Carmel in Judah (1 S 27 3; 1 Ch 3 1).

CARI, kār’mī (קַרְמִי, karmī, “fruitful,” “noble”): (1) A son of Reuben who came to Egypt with Jacob (Gen 46 9; Ex 6 14; 1 Ch 5 3). Also the name of a family of which Carmi was the head (Num 26 6). (2) A Judahite (1 Ch 2 7), son of Zabdi, according to Josh 7 1, and father of Achan, who is given the name of “Achar” in 1 Ch 2 7. This last form “Achar” is preferred to the usual “Achan” in order to bring out the play on the Heb word for “troubler.” The Heb אֲכָר, ākhar, “troublesome, ‘Achar, the troubler of Israel.” As regards the phrase “the sons of Carmi” (1 Ch 2 7), Carmi is probably to be taken as the son of Zimri (= Zabdi, Josh 7 1). The Tg. however, has “Carmi who is Zimri.” The LXX identifies Zimri and Zabdi.

HORACE J. WOLF
CAROUSINGS, ka-rou-sings (μεταί, ποίπια, dactylic s. ποίπια) P. 4 22 13. The AV renders it "banquetings." It is one of the gentle excesses of fleshly indulgence against which the Christians are warned by Peter.

CARNAL, kär-'nål: In the OT there is an expression which indicates sexual intercourse (בָּשָׂם, šibbə-bēith zera', "lying of seed," Lev 18 20; 19 20; Num 5 13). In the NT the words rendered "carnal" are derived from σάρκος, sarkos, "flesh." This refers to the flesh as opposed to the pneuma, "spirit," and denotes, in an ethical sense, mere human nature, the lower side of man as apart from the Divine influence, and therefore estranged from God and prone to sin; whatever in the soul is weak and tends toward ungodliness (see FLESH). Thus one may be carnal (σάρκινος, sarkinos), sold under sin (Rom 7 14). Christians may be carnal (sarkinos, 1 Cor 3 1; sarkikos, 1 Cor 3 3); the lower side of their being is dominant and not the spirit, hence they fall into sins of envy and strife. The weapons of the Christian warfare are not carnal, not merely human (of the flesh RV, ARV), but spiritual (1 Cor 10 4; "not after the carnal commandment" [He 1 16]); "the carnal mind is enmity against God" ("mind of the flesh" RV, ARV, Rom 8 7). So, "to be carnally minded is death" ("mind of the flesh" RV, ARV, Rom 8 6). There are "carnal" ordinances in contrast to the spiritual ones of the gospel (He 9 10); "Minister unto them in carnal things," those that pertain to the body in contrast to spiritual things (Rom 15 27; 1 Cor 10 11). The same expressions are elsewhere rendered "fleshy" (2 Cor 1 12; 3 3 RV "hearts of flesh"; 1 Pet 2 11).

Is there any difference between sarkinos and sarkikos? The former more definitely denotes the material of which an object is made. It may express with emphasis the idea of sarkikos, the spiritual given up as it were to the flesh. See MAN (The Natural). G. H. TREVER

CARNIUM, kär-'në-um. See CARNAIM.

CARNITES, kär-nit-ës (καρνίτες): Gr, karnites; tēktos, tekton). This word, which is a general word for a graver or craftsman, is tr4 "carpenter" in 2 K 22 6; 2 Ch 24 12; Ezr 3 7; Isa 41 7. The same word is rendered "craftsmen" in the ARV of Jer 24 1 and 25 2 and "smiths" in the ARV of Zec 1 20. In 2 S 5 11; 2 K 12 11; 1 Ch 14 1; and Isa 44 13, kādrēk occurs with 'yāqôb (Mal 4:1). More exactly tr4 "carpenter" or "worker in wood." Tekton, the corresponding Gr word for artificer, is tr4 "carpenter" in Mt 13 55 and Mk 6 3. See CARVING; CRAFTS.

CARRIAGE, kar-i'j (כרַכַרְג, qarkār, krūdādāh, ḫūţāt; ḥūša'emon, ṣāqīḫa'emon; RV "We took up our baggage"; ARVm "made ready"): One or the other of the above words occurs in six different places and all have been tr4 in the AV by "carriage" in its obsolete meaning (Job 18 19; 1 S 17 22 [twice]; Isa 10 28; 46 1; Acts 21 15). The RV and ARV these are tr4 by the more modern expressions "goods," "baggage," or "the things that you carried." In 1 S 17 20 AVm "place of the carriage" occurs as the equivalent of "trench." The Heb mā'ūdāh may mean "the place of waggons" as tr4 in RV, it is not at all improbably that the encampment was surrounded by the baggage train. JAMES A. PATCH

CARRY, kar-i (בָּשָׂם, nāšā', cār, nābāgh): The RV rendering of a number of Heb and Gr words, and it has several shades of meaning, of which the following are the most important:

(1) "To take up," "to bear," "to transport from one place to another," as, "to carry away handkerchiefs" (Acts 19 12), "to carry a corpse" (Gen 50 13), and "to be carried away by the wind" (Dn 2 35).

(2) "To cause to go" or "come," "to lead," "to drive," as, "to be carried away to Babylon" (2 K 20 17), "to be carried away to Pilate" (Mk 15 1), "to carry away cattle" (Gen 31 18), and "to carry away daughters" (Gen 31 26).

(3) "To uphold," or "sustain," and "even to howl hairs will I carry you" (Isa 46 4).

(4) "To bear," or "endure," as, "to carry sorrow" (Isa 53 4).

(5) "To overwhelm," "to bear away," "to destroy," as, "to carry away as with a flood" (Ps 44 3).

(6) "To influence," "to move," as, "to carry away with dissimulation" (Gal 2 13), "to carry away with error" (2 Pet 3 17), "to be carried away by strange teachings" (He 13 9). A. W. FORTUNE

CARSHENA, kär-shē'na, kar-shē'na (כַּרְשֶּנָא, karshēnā): The first named among the "seven princes of Persia and Media" under Ahasuerus (Est 1 14). See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.
CART, kart (יוֹדֵד, āḏālāh): The Heb word has been tr "in some passages "cart," and in others "wagon." In one verse only has it been tr "chariot." The context of the various passages indicates that a distinction was made between vehicles which were used for carrying baggage or produce and those used for carrying riders (chariots), although in their primitive form of construction they were much the same (cf Eng. "cart" and "carriage").

Carts, like "chariots" (q.v.), were of Assyrian origin. They were early carried to Egypt where the flat nature of the country readily led to their adoption. From Egypt they gradually found their way among the people of the Palestinian plains. In the hills of Judaea and Central Pal, except where highways were built (1 S 6 12), the nature of the country prevented the use of wheeled vehicles. 1 S 7.8.10.11.14 show that the people of the plains used carts. The men of Kir'ath-jearim found it easier to carry the ark (1 S 7 1). Their attempt to use a cart later (2 S 6 3.6; 1 Ch 13 7) proved disastrous and they abandoned it for a safer way (2 S 6 13).

That carts were used at a very early date is indicated by Nu 7 3.7.8. That these vehicles were not the common mode of conveyance in Pal is shown in Gen 40. Pharaoh commanded that Joseph's brethren should return to their father with their beasts of burden (46 21) and take with them Egypt wagons (45 19.21; 46 6) for bringing back their father and their families. The very unusual sight of the wagons was proof to Jacob of Joseph's existence (46 27).

Bible descriptions and ancient Bab and Egypt pictures indicate that the cart was usually two-wheeled and drawn by two oxen.

With the Arabian conquests and subsequent ruin of the roads wheeled vehicles disappeared from Syria and Pal. History is again repeating itself. The Circassians, whom the Turkish government has settled near Caesarea, Jerash (Gerasa) and Amman (Philadelphia), have introduced a crude cart which must be similar to that used in OT times. The two wheels are of solid wood. A straight shaft is joined to the wooden axle, and to this a yoke of oxen is attached. On the Philistine plains may be seen carts of present-day Egypt origin but of a pattern many centuries old. With the establishment of government roads during the last 50 years, European vehicles of all descriptions are fast coming into the country.

One figurative reference is made to the cart (Isa 5 18), but its meaning is obscure.

CARVING, kärv'ing: Carving, or engraving, was extensively used among the peoples of Bible lands. There were no materials used in the arts which were not subjected to the graver's skill. Carved objects of wood, stone, ivory, clay, bronze, gold, silver and glass discovered today show how skilful the ancient carvers were. Carving was principally done in bas-relief, although Ex 25 11 shows that incised lines were also used. The signets and scarabs are examples of this class of carving. Several Heb words have been tr "carved" in the AV. Pesel or pršl is found in Jgs 18 18; 2 Ch 33 7.22; 34 3.4; kābāh in 1 K 6 35. The tr "graven" appears in the RV of all these passages. In 1 K 6 29.32.35, kāba' appears; in 1 K 6 18.32, miskālah; in 1 K 6 29 and Ps 74 6, pitā̄th; in Ex 31 5; 35 33, kārō-seth (see Carpenter); kābabāh in Prov 7 16 is better tr "striped" as in the RV. For further notes on carving, see Crafts. JAMES A. PATCH

CASDIM, kāz' dim. See Chased.

CASE, kāz: Ordinarily to describe the circumstances or condition of things; sometimes, juridically (airā, āita, Mt 19 10; Acts 25 14), as that for which a reckoning has to be given, as frequently the Lat réa. In Ex 5 19, "they were in evil case," is interpreted by RV as "were set on mischief."

CASEMENT, kāz'ment. See House.

CASPHIA, ka-sif'-a, ka-sif'-ə (קָסְפִּיה, kāspīh-ya'): An unidentified place in North Babylonia, near the river Ahava, to which Ezra sent for "ministers for the house of our God" (Ezr 8 17). Some have thought the name to be connected with keqeph, "silver" or "money." IXX renders argu-riū toki lōyoc, as in 1 Esd 8 45, "the place of the treasury."

CASLUHIM, kas'l'-him, kas-lu'-him (קָסְלוֹהים, kaslōhim; Chasluhim, Chasmelaim): The name of a people mentioned in Gen 10 14; 1 Ch 1 12 as descended from Mizraim. The parentage should probably follow Caphtorim. From them, it is said, sprang the Philistines, which see.

CASPHON, kās' f. See Casiphon.

CASPHOR, kas'for (AV Casphon; Kasaph, Kasph, 1 Mac 5 26; Kasaḫôn, Chasaph, Kasaph, Chasaphôth, ver 36; Kaơphôth, Kasphor, 2 Mac 12 13): A city E. of the Jordan captured by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 5 36). It is probably identical with Caspis of 2 Mac 12 13. It was a fortress of great strength, with a lake near it. This has led some to think it may be represented by el-Muṣirib, an important station on the pilgrim route to Mecca. The ancient name of this city, however, has not been discovered. See Ashhtaroth.

CASPIN, kas'pin, CASPI, kas'pis. See Casphor.
CASSIA, kash'a: Two Heb words, (1) קֶסֶף, kēsēph, which is mentioned, along with myrrh, cinnamon, calamus and olive oil, as one of the ingredients of the “holy anointing oil” (Ex 30:24); it was, too, one of the woods in which Zophar and Javan traded with Tyre (Ezk 27:19); it is identified in the Pesh and the Tg with (2). (2) קְשֵׁד, kēshēd (plur. only, probably referring to the strips of bark), a word from which is derived the Gr κασσια, kasia, and hence cassia (Ps 45:8). It is probable that both (1) and (2) refer to Cassia lignea, the inner bark of Cinnamomum cassia, a plant growing in eastern Asia closely allied to that which bears the cinnamon of commerce. It is a fragrant, aromatic bark and was probably used in a powdered form. Both as an ingredient in ungents and as one of the perfumes at funerals, cassia, like cinnamon, was much used by the Romans. The cassia of Scripture must be clearly distinguished from the entirely distinct Cassia lanceolata and C. obtusata which yield the familiar senna. The proper name Κέσσια (q.v.) is the sing. form of κησέδ.

CAST: In general “to throw,” with various degrees of violence; usually, with force, but not so necessarily, as e.g. in “cast a net,” “cast lots.” When applied to molten metal, as in Eng. first, “to run let into molds,” with reference to the way in which the liquid is poured, and then, “to form,” as in Ex 25:12, etc. Usually in the NT for βάλλω, ballō, but not always. Thus, in Lk 1:29 “cast in her mind” means “considered” (διατρέχω, diathēkō); “cast reproach” for Gr ψιλοτροφος, psilitrophos, “reproached” (Mt 27:44; “casting down” for καταπέτασις, katapetasis, “demolishing”) (2 Cor 10:4); “casting all anxiety upon” (1 Pet 5:7), a still stronger term, as in Lk 17:2, Acts 27:19. As a fundamental Gr word, it is completed with many prepositions, “about,” “away,” “down,” “forth,” “in,” “into,” “off,” “out,” “up,” “upon.” “Cast down in” 2 Cor 4:9 AV is used in a military sense of one prostrated, but not killed in battle. Cf Ps 42:9 with RV. The AV of AV in 1 Cor 17:27, is in R.V., “rejected” (cf He 6:8), ἀδυνάμως, adynamous, i.e., what the application of a test shows to be counterfeit, or unfit; tr “reprobate” in Rom 1:28; 2 Cor 13 5. 6:7, etc.

CASTANETS, kas'ta-nets, kas-ta-nets (Στράτης, m'na'an'tim): Are mentioned in 2 S 6:5 among the musical instruments upon which David and the house of Israel played at the time of the bringing up of the Ark of the Covenant. This word is incorrectly tr “cornets” in the AV. The castanet was probably about the same kind of instrument as the Egyptian sistra, and the RV has “sistrar” in the margin of 2 S 6:5. The sistra were long oval-shaped metal plates through which were passed loose rods at the ends of which were rings. The instrument was held by a long handle and was rattled during songs and dances. It was used in Egypt in religious worship or to scare away evil influences. There is only one reference to this instrument in the Bible.

CASTAWAY, kast'-a-wā (ἄδοκοσμος, adókosmos, from δώκιμος, “I test,” “I approve” or “I test, I approve, unless determined.” This word is rendered “castaway” only in AV: “I myself should be a cast-away” (“rejected”) RV, ARV, 1 Cor 9:27. But the same word occurs a number of times usually tr “reprobate” (Rom 1:28; 2 Cor 13 5–7; 2 Tim 3:8; Tit 1:10; “rejected” (He 6:8).

CASTLE, kas′l. See FORTIFICATION.

CASTOR, kas'ter, AND POLLUX, pol'ucks. See DISCOUR; ASTRONOMY.

CAT (αἰνοφος, ailouros): The only mention of this animal is in Bar 6:22. It is not mentioned in the canonical Scriptures, though Boechari (Hieros., 862) gives “two cats” as the equivalent of γύλιτ in Isa 13:21; 34:14; Jer 50:39; Ps 74:19, where RV gives “wild beasts of the desert.” Mention is, however, made of cats, καθολος, in the Welsh Bible (Isa 34:14). The only mention of the cat in classical Lat writers is in Martial xii.69. The cat was regarded in Egypt is described in Herod. ii.66 and Rawlinson’s notes. In Bar 6:22 cats are mentioned with “bats, swallows and birds” as sitting with impunity on the images of the heathen gods which are unable to drive them off. See also ZOOLOGY.

CATECHIST, kat′e-kist, CATECHUMEN, kat′e-kum (κατ’εκμί, katēkēm, “to resound,” “to teach,” “to instruct”): A catechist is a teacher who instructs his pupils in the elements of his own religion. In the OT he teaches them the rudiments of OT truth; in the NT he teaches the principles of the Christian faith. A catechumen, one whom the catechist instructs or catechizes, in preparation for the ceremony of baptism.

The words are derived from κατακημις, kathēkin, meaning “to give a sound,” “to answer,” “to echo.” Classically it was used of the sounding down of rushing water, of the falling of music from a ship to the sea. Then it came to signify the sounding down of words of command or instruction. The preposition κατ’ strengthened the meaning, bringing out more emphatically the back or return sound, the echo, the answer. So it came to mean familiar verbal instruction, a free informal discussion between teacher and pupil. Luke informs Theophilus (Lk 1:4) that he intends to give him a succinct and orderly account of those things which he had previously received by word of mouth (περί ήμων κατέκεχισε). See also the Gr in Acts 13:25, 21:11; Rom 2:18; 1 Cor 14:19; Gal 6:6. In all these passages the Gr vb is “catechised.”

We do not find in the NT an organized catechumenate, such as we find in the 3d and 4th cents. The apostles preached mainly to synagogues-instructed Jews who were familiar with the law and the prophets and the Psalms, or to Gentiles who had learned from the Jews and had become “proselytes” (q.v.). The first apostolic preaching and teaching was to converts of the heathen. Jesus was to promised Messiah, the Saviour of the world. As believers multiplied, the contrast between them and those who rejected the teaching became more and more marked. Opposition, scorn and persecution became more bold and bitter. The Christians were compelled to set forth and defend their beliefs more clearly. They had to meet and answer keen and persistent objections. And so the necessity for clear, systematic and organized teaching grew more and more into the more ordered catechumenate. The Apostles Conants, from the latter part of the 3d cent. show the institution in a fair state of development. A Jew, pagan, or heretic of good moral standing, upon application to the deacon, presbyter, or bishop, was admitted into the state of catechumen by the laying on of hands (Sch-Herz. s.v.).
The basis for the Christian catechumenate we find in the great commission (Mt 28:19,20). The aim of this commission was to make disciples, i.e., believing followers. The means for this discipling are baptism and teaching. The result of using the means is that those who have become disciples are to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded.

Jesus Himself at twelve years of age had become a child of the law, and education. He increased in wisdom and learned obedience. He became the great Catechist instructing His disciples, other private individuals and the multitudes. See an example of His cateching in Mt 16:13 ff.

Paul was a master in method. See examples of use of the modern pedagogical method of application in Acts 14:14 ff; 17:16 ff; 19:8 ff. The catechetical method is frequently found in the epistles (see 1 Cor 1:2; He 5:11-14; 6:12; 1 Pet 2:2; 1 Jn 2:13), and so the idea of religious nurture and instruction is found useful in daily life. The catechist and the catechumen are there.

It was not something new in the NT. Its roots lie back and run through the OT. The narrative of God's first communication with man, inside the sin of Adam, and the consequences, i.e., the death, the fall, etc., and the consequent, i.e., the remedy, takes a catechetical form. The importance of systematic instruction, both public and private, is emphasized throughout the OT and NT, although it might not always take the form of catechizing in the modern pedagogical sense.

In the patriarchal age the father was the prophet, the teacher, the catechist, in his house, which often included several families with their servants (see Gen 19:19). Matthew Henry explains, "Abraham had not only the care of his children, but his whole household, including his servants, were catechized" (see also Ex 12:26; Dt 6:1-9; Josh 4:67; 24:15; Ps 34:11). Priests and Levites in addition to their sacrificial functions were catechists (instructors) among the people (Lev 10:11; Dt 33:10; 2 Ch 15:3; Exk 44:23). In later times the synagogues had regular instruction in the law and the prophets.

CATERPILLAR, kat-er-pil-er (חָטַּם, ḥēṣāt; Ps 78:46; Joel 1:4, etc; פַּתָּם, pāttām [Ps 105:34 AV, ARV 'grasseropper']; Jer 51:14.27 AV; elsewhere 'canker-worm'): A name given to a larval stage of the Locust (q.v.).

CATHOLIC, kath'-o-lik, EPISTLES (ἐπιστολάς καθολικὰς, epistolai katolikaias): In distinction from the apostolic or Pauline epistles which were addressed to individual churches or persons, the term "catholic," in the sense of universal or general, was applied by Origen and the other church Fathers to the seven epistles written by James, Peter, John and Jude. As early as the 3d cent., it came to be used in the sense of "encycloped," "universal," as Theodoret says, "they are not addressed to single churches, but generally [katolikos] to the faithful, whether to the Jews of the Dispersion, as Peter writes, or even to all who are living as Christians under the same faith." Three other explanations of the term have been given, viz. (1) that it was intended to indicate a common apostolic authorship (only a few support this view); (2) that it signifies that the seven epistles were universally received as genuine; (3) that it records the commandment, law, doctrine, i.e., "catholic," "universal," authoritative versus heretical epistles whose teachings were in harmony with Christian truth. By some misconception of the word "catholic" the Western Church interpreted it as signifying "canonical" and sometimes called these epistles epistolae canonicae. That it was originally used in the sense of "general" epistles is now commonly received.

This is evident from their form of address. St. James wrote to the Jews, "of the Dispersion," who had embraced the Christian faith. In his first epistle St. Peter addressed the same Christians, including also gentle converts, resident in five provinces of Asia Minor: "elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion." His second epistle is to all Christians everywhere. St. John's first letter was evidently written to a cycle of churches and intended for universal use. St. Jude also had in mind all Christians when he said "to them that are called beloved in God," etc. The seeming exceptions are 2 and 3 Jn, addressed to individuals, but included with the Catholic epistles as properly belonging with St. John's first epistle and of value to the general reader. The character and contents of these seven epistles are treated under their various heads. The letters of St. James and St. Jude belong to the Judaic school of Christianity; those of St. Peter to a broad and non-partisan type of faith that both includes and mediates between the Judaists and Paulinists. St. John's letters were written after the Jerusalem church had ceased to exist, and the pressure of opposition and error from without tended to unite his "little children" in a new community of love and spiritual life.

CATHUA, ka-thoo'-a (Καθουά, Kathoud; B. Koua, Koud): Head of a family of temple-servants who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5:30); corresponds to Giddel in Ezra 2:47.

CATTLE, kat'-l (בָּקָר, bākār, "a dumb beast"); פָּר, par; מְכֵה, mkeh, "a possession," from יְבָרֵך, yîbârēk, "to acquire" (cf Arab. kana, "to acquire," and Gr κτής, kthēs, "beast," and pl. κτήσεις, kthēsa; flock, from κτῆμα, kthēma, "to acquire," flocks being both with the Homeric peoples and with the patriarchs an important form of property; of Eng. "flock"); נַחַל, nachal, "small cattle," "sheep" or goats (cf Arab. dān, "sheep"); שְׁק, shek, a single sheep or goat (cf Arab. sahab); יָטֵל, yattle; מְלַדְקָה, "property," from işû, ldâkh, "to minister" (cf Arab. malâkah; malâk, "property," from malak, "to possess"); מִשְׁמַה, mishma, "failing"; [1 K 9:7] מִשְּמַע, mishma, [Js 4:12], "cattle," i.e. "that which is nourished," from תֶּפֶרְוּה, tefrōw, "to nourish"; פַּר, par, "kine," or "oxen" (cf Arab. bakar, "cattle"); יִשְׂרָאֵל, yisra'el, tor (Dnl 4:23), rōpēs, ta'āros (Mt 22:4), "ox" or "bull"; בֹּאֶש, bōōs, "ox" (Lk 13:15); בַּלָּהָם, bálāhām, "oxen," only in pl. (Ps 8:7): From the foregoing and by examination of the many references to "cattle," "kine" or "oxen," it is apparent that there are important points of contact in derivation and usage in the Heb, Gr and Eng. terms. It is evident that neat cattle were possessed in abundance by the patriarchs and later Israelites, which is far from being the case in Pal at the present day. The Bedawin usually have no cattle. The fellahīn in most parts of the country keep them in small numbers, mostly for plowing, and but little for milk or for slaughtering. Travelers in the Holy Land realize that goat's milk is a great asset to obtain from cow's milk. The commonest cattle of the fellahīn are a small black breed. In the vicinity of Damascus are many large, fine milk cattle which furnish the delicious milk and cream of the Damascene bazaars. For some reason, probably because they are not confined and highly fed, the bulls of Pal are meek creatures as compared with their European or American fellows.

In EV the word "cattie" is more often used in a wide sense to include sheep and goats than to denote merely neat cattle. In fact, bakar, which distinctly denotes neat cattle, is often rendered "herds," as גַּנֵּן, lit., "sheep," is in a large number of instances translated "flocks." A good illustration is found in Gen 32:7: "Then Jacob . . . divided the people [עַמִּים] that were with him, and the flocks [גַּנֵּן], and the herds [בָּקָר], and the camels [גֵּרְמוֹן], into two companies [מַהֲרָדָת]." For the last word AV has "drove" in Gen 33:8, RV "company."

Next to the גַּנֵּן, the word most commonly rendered "flock" is בֵּן, from root "to arrange," "to set in order." 'Edher is rendered "herd" in Prov 27:23, and in Joel 1:18 it occurs twice, being rendered "herds of cattle," כָּבָּר בֵּן, and "flocks of sheep," כָּבָּר חֶטְנִים. Migroh is rendered "flock" in Nu 32:26, "herd" in Gen 47:18, and "cattle" in a large number of passages. Other words rendered "flock" are: מַחֲנֶה (t. r. לָעַשׁ [Arab. 1'a], "to pasture"), once in Jer 10:21; נַחֲלָה מַעֲמֹן, "flocks of thy sheep," RV "young of thy flock," in Dt 7:13, etc. אַשְּהַרְוֶת being pl. of אַשְּהַרְוֶת, or Ashoreth; קָשָׁף, once in 1 K 20:27: "The children of Israel encamped before them [the Syræans] like two little flocks of kids," קָשָׁף signify "something stripped off or separated," from root קָשָׁף, "to strip," or "to peel," like the Arabic حَلْف, "flock," from root חָלֶף, "to cut off"; φυλήν, φωλείν (Mt 25:31): "The sheep of the flock shall be scattered," and (Lk 2:8): "keeping watch by night over their flock"; φυλήν, φωλείν (Lk 12:32): "Fear not, little flock," and (1 Pet 5:2): "Tend the flock of God which is among you."

Figurative: Not only בנים and גַּנֵּן but also оδήρ and γόνα are used fig. of God's people; e.g. Isa 40:11: "He will feed his flock like a shepherd!"; Zec 10:8: "Ich of hosts hath visited his flock ["ether], the house of Judah"; Isa 66:10: "And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks" (גַּנֵּן), Jer 23:2: "Ye have scattered my flock" (גַּנֵּן); Ezek 34:22: "Therefore will I save my flock (גַּנֵּן);" in 19:11: "Feed . . . the flock [גַּנֵּן] of thy heritage." The wild ox or wild bull, RV "antelope" (v. o' or tō of Dt 14:5 and Isa 51:20), is considered by the writer to be probably the Arabian oryx, and in this he is in agreement with Tristram (N.H.H.). Tristram however thinks that the unicorn (כִּבָּר or כִּבָּר) was the aurochs, while the present writer believes that this also may well have been the oryx, which at the present day has at least three names in Arab., one of which, bakar-ul-wa'ash, means "wild ox." See ANTELOPE.

Our domestic cattle are believed by some of the best authorities to be of the same species as the ancient European wild ox or aurochs, Bos taurus, which is by others accounted as a distinct species under the title of Bos primigenius. The aurochs was widely spread over Europe in Roman times. Some of these once roam wild cattle are preserved in some British parks, but these according to Lydekker in the Royal Natural History are probably for the most part descendants of early domesticated beasts.

The writer, however thinks that this is a deposit accumulated by prehistoric man of an unknown antiquity to be variously estimated according to the predilections of the geologist at a few thousands or a few score of thousands of years, and is far from proving that this animal existed in Pal in Bible times or at any time.

The European bison (Bos or Bison bonasus) is thought by some to be the wild ox of the Bible. This is a forest-dwelling species and is now confined to the forests of Lithuania and the Caucasus. It was formerly more widely distributed, but there is no certain evidence that it ever lived as far S. as Pal, and there have probably never existed in Pal forests suitable to be the haunts of this animal.

About the sea of Tiberias and the Jordan valley and in the plain of Coele-syria there exist today Indian bufaloes (Bos bubalus), some feral and some in a state of domestication, which are believed to have been introduced in comparatively recent times. See BISON. CAUDA.

ALFRED ELY DAY

CAUDA, къода (Kosea, Koida); also called Klaoda, Klaboda; AV Clouda; the modern Gr name Caucho supports the form Cauda): An island 23 miles W. of Cape Matulas. It is a small island, and can never have supported a large population, or have been of any importance. Its elevation to the rank of a bishopric in Byzantine times must have been due to its association with the voyage of St. Paul. The ship with Paul on board was driven under the lee of Cauda (Acts 27:18); in the calm water south of the island the crew succeeded in hauling in the boat, undergirding the ship and slackening sail. W. M. CALDER

CAUL, къл: (1) כַּל, yōtheth (Ex 29:13), the large lobe or flap of the liver, which is usually mentioned together with the kidneys and the fat as the special portions set aside for the burnt offering (Lev 3:10.15; 4:9; 7:4; 8:16.25; 9:19). (2) כַּלּ, sūghor (from the root sūghar, "to inclose," "shut up"), Hos 13:8, lit. the inclosure or covering of the heart, the caul or periurium, or perhaps the outermost wrapping of the heart. It must not be forgotten, however, that the expression may be taken in the sense of "mailcoat of the heart," i.e. hardened heart, which is shut to the influence of God's grace. So Luther and many modern translators and commentators.

H. L. E. LUTERING
CAUSE, κόσ: In both AV and RV "for this cause" (AV "cause") occurs in Ex 9 16 as the rendering of κόσον,

ba'ahoh zôth = "in order that"; "to the end that"; so also in Dnl 2 12 for יִּירָשׁ, kol-khoth d'nah, and in 2 Ch 32 20 AV for רִׁשׁ הָנָה, 'al-zôth, where RVS read "because of." In the NT the word is used adverbially in the tr of several Gr phrases: ἔσχε τὸ ὑπέρ, ἔσχε τὸ ὑπέρ (Mt 19 5; Mk 10 7); ἐδίδον τὸ ὑπέρ, Jn 12 27; Rom 1 26; 16 9 (RV "therefore"); 1 Cor 11 30; 1 Thess 2 13; 2 Thess 2 11; 1 Tim 1 16; He 9 15; εἰς τὸ ὑπέρ, εἰς τὸ ὑπέρ, Jn 18 37 (where AV varying the phraseology reads "to this end," "for this cause"); 1 Pet 4 6 AV; τοῦ χάρου, τοῦ χάρου ch'rin, Eph 3 14. Unusual renderings occur, as "for his cause" (="because of"). 2 Cor 7 12; as "affair," "thing," obs. in AV 1 K 12 15; 2 Ch 10 15, where the word occurs as a paraphrase of הָנָה, "turn of affairs." In 1 S 35 31 (AV, RV) "causeless" (=without cause ARV) occurs arbitrarily in adv. sense.

CAUSEWAY, κόσ'wâ (more correctly CAUSEY, kô'zî): This word occurs in 1 Ch 26 16.18 for the Heb הָנָה, mêtillâh; LXX παστοφόροι τῆς ἀναβάσεως, pastophorion tês anakaisov. In 2 Ch 9 11 the word is τραχέα "terraces" (LXX ἀνάβασις, anakaisis). Of BDB, s.v., where הָנָה, mêtillâth, is an error for נָה, נָה, (1 K 10 12). In all the above passages reference is made to a series or flight of steps leading up into the temple. The word also signifies a prepared, traveled road, as in Nu 20 19; Jgs 20 31.45; 1 S 8 12; 2 S 20 12f; 2 K 18 17 (Isa 38 2); Isa 7 3; 11 16; 19 23; 33 8; 40 3; 49 11; Jer 31 21.

Figurative: In Isa 59 7 the word (mêtillâh) occurs in a fig. sense, so also in Jgs 5 20; Prov 16 17.

CAVE, kâv (נָה, mêtêrôth [cf Arab. maghârah],

.heap, hôr [Job 30 6 AV]. יָנָה, yâhâl [Isa 2 19]; בָּיו, bâwâ [He 11 38], σπῆλαιον, spélah [Jn 11 38]; hôr, more often rendered "hole," is akin to Arab. khawr, "gulf" or "inlet," but is also related to mêtêrôth [cf also Arab. ghawr "low-land," esp. of the Jordan valley and Dead Sea]. Yâhâl [ר. חַלָּל, "to pierce" (cf Arab. khall, "to pierce")] occurs only in Isa 2 19, where AV has "cave," and translates mêtêrôth in the same ver by "holes." In RV these words are very properly changed about. Spélah is a common Gr word for "cave"; opé means rather "hole"). In Pal as in other limestone countries, caves are of frequent occurrence, and not a few of large size are known. Water from the rain and snow, seeping down through cracks, enlarges the passages through which it goes by dissolving away the substance of the rock. Just as upon the surface of the land the trickling streams unite to form brooks and rivers, so many subterranean streams may come together in a spacious channel, and may issue upon the surface as a bold spring. The cave of the Dog River near Bérâût and that of 'Afka (perhaps Aphek [Josh 13 4]) in Lebanon are excellent examples of this. Not infrequently after forming a cave the stream of water may find some lower outlet by a different route, leaving its former course dry. In some cases the hinder part of the roof of the cave may fall in, leaving the front part standing as a natural bridge. Numerous shallow caves, esp. in the faces of cliffs, are formed not by seeping water, but by atmospheric erosion, a portion of a relatively soft stratum of rock being hollowed out, while harder strata above and below it are but little worn away. Many of the hermits' caves originated in this way and were artificially enlarged and walled up at the mouth. The principal caves mentioned in the Bible are those of Mâchpelâh, Märedef and Aqûlîm (q.v.). See DEN.

CEASE, sës: A remarkable array of 20 Heb and 6 Gr words is so têî. In the AV 16 of the former Stream Issuing from Cave at 'Afka, Lebanon.

Natural Bridge at Lebanon.

Cave in Lebanon Converted into a Shrine.
and 3 of the latter are used only once with this rendering. The originals most frequently in use are לְנָו, קַדוֹד, "to leave off"; רָאֶשׁ, שָׁבָבָה, "to rest from" (labor); פַּעַם, פַּעְמָא, "to make to cease." Few words illustrate better the fertility of the Heb in expressing limitless shades of meaning, impoverished by the use of one Eng. word. This extensive variety has, however, with expressed "cease": i.e. stop, come to an end, e.g. ceasing of tears (Jer 14:17); work (Exz 4:24); grinders (Ecc 12:3); thunder (Ex 9:20); the wicked (Job 3:17); anger (Ps 37:8). The significance of šabbath lies in its being the Heb for Sabbath, implying complete cessation: as of manna (Joel 5:12); strife and ignominy (Prov 22:10); occurs with negative to show the ceaseless Providence of God in Nature: "summer and winter . . . shall not cease." (Gen 8:22). In the NT it illustrates Christ's power over Nature: wind and raging sea ceased (Lk 8:24); over a sinner's heart: "not ceased to kiss my feet" (διατέρω, διάτερον) (Lk 7:45); devotion of the early disciples, "ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus as the Christ" (Acts 5:42); the eternity and blessedness of the believer's sabbatic rest (ἀπολεῖται, ἀπολέται) (He 4:10 AV).

Dwight M. Pratt

CEDAR, אֶזֶר, אֶזְדֶר (טְנָץ), 'erez, from Heb root meaning "to be firm"; אִירוֹס, 'irōs): The 'erez was in ancient days the OT reference to the true cedar, Cedrus libani, but the name may have been applied in a loose way to allied trees, such as junipers and pines. In Nu 24:6—"as cedar-trees beside the waters"—the reference must, as it is most probable, be purely poetical (see Aonos) or the 'ārōs must signify some other kind of tree which flourishes beside water.

Cedar is twice mentioned as a substance for ritual cleansing. In Lev 14:4 the cleansed leper was sprinkled with the blood of a "clean bird" into which had been put for Ritual Cleansing in Nu 19:6 "cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop." The voice which breaketh the cedars: Yea, Jeh breaketh in pieces the cedars of Lebanon" (Ps 29:4-5).

The cedars are tall—"whose height was like the height of the cedars"—(Am 2:9; 9:19 23); majestic (2 K 14:9), and excellent (Cant 5:15). The Assy power is compared to—"a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a forest-like shade, and of high stature; and its top was among the thick boughs . . . its stature was exalted above all the trees of the field; and its boughs were multiplied, and its branches became long" (Ezk 31:3-5). They are in particular God's trees—"The trees of Jeh are filled with moisture, The cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted." (Ps 104:16).

The wood of the cedar has always been highly prized—much more so than the aycamore (1 K 10:27; 1 10:10). David had a house of cedar built for him by Hiram, king of Tyre (2 S 5:11), and he prepared "cedar-trees without number" for the temple which his son was to build (1 Ch 22:4). Cedar timber was very much used in the construction of Solomon's temple and palace, the trees being cut in the Lebanon by Sidonians by order of the king of Tyre—"Hiram gave Solomon timber of cedar and timber of fir according to all his desire" (1 K 5:6-10). One of Solomon's most important buildings was known as "the house of the forest of Lebanon" (1 K 7:2; 10:17; 2 Ch 9:16), on account of the source of its materials. While cedar was well adapted for beams (1 K 6:9; Cant 1:17), boards (Cant 8:9), pillars (1 K 7:2) and ceilings (Jer 22:14), it was suited as well for carved work, such as idols (Isa 44:14-15). It was also used for ships' masts (Ezk 27:5).

The Cedrus libani still survives in the mountains of Syria and flourishes in many greater numbers in the Taurus mountains. "There are Cedar groves of cedars above el-Ma'asir, in modern Barlik, 'Abu Zekliah, Hadith, Be-shehri, and Stv' (Post, Flora, 751). Of these the grove at Besheri is of world-wide renown. It consists of a group of about 400 trees, among them some magnificent old patriarchs, which lie on the bare slopes of the Lebanon

Cedars of Lebanon at the Besheri Grove.

Doubtless as a reminiscence of this the Syrians today call the cedar 'ars er rubb, "the cedar of the Lord." The growth of the cedar is typical of that of the righteous man (Ps 92:12).

That cedars were once very abundant in the Lebanon is evident (1 K 6:9-18; 20:27). What they contributed to the glory and beauty of that district may be seen in Zec 11:1-2:

"Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars. Wall, O Tyre, for the cedar is fallen, because the glorious [BVM] ones are destroyed; Wall, O ye oaks of Bashan, for the strong forest is come down."

The wood of the cedar has always been highly prized—much more so than the aycamore (1 K 10:27; 1 10:10). David had a house of cedar built for him by Hiram, king of Tyre (2 S 5:11), and he prepared "cedar-trees without number" for the temple which his son was to build (1 Ch 22:4). some 6,000 ft. above the sea. Doubtless they are survivors of a forest which here once covered the mountain slopes for miles. The half a dozen highest specimens reach a height of between 70 and 80 ft., and have trunks of a circumference of 40 ft. or more. It is impossible to ascertain with any certainty their age, but they may be as much as 800, or even 1,000, years old. Though magnificent, these are by no means the largest of their kind. Some of the cedars of Amazans are quite 100 ft. high and the Himalayan cedar, Cedrus deodara, a variety of Cedrus libani, reaches a height of 150 ft. The impressiveness of the cedar lies, however, not so much in its height and massive trunk, as in the wonderful lateral spread of its branches, which often exceeds its height. The branches grow out horizontally in successive tiers, each horizontal plane presenting, when looked at from above, the appearance of a green sward. The leaves are about an inch long, arranged in clusters; at first they are bright green, but they change with age to a deeper tint with a glaucous hue; the foliage is evergreen, the successive annual growths of leaves each lasting two years. The cones, 4 to 6 in. long, are oval or oblong-ovate, with a depression at times at the apex; they remain to two years to reach maturity and then, unlike other conifers, they remain attached to the tree, dropping out their scales bearing the seeds.

The wood of the cedar, specially grown under the conditions of its natural habitat, is hard, close grained, and takes a high polish. It is full of resin and, its surface being rough, its appearance is very attractive. It is used for floorboards, sills, mantels, and in the ceiling, where it often appears in the form of horizontal tiers, which are 6 ft. or more in length, and 3 ft. or more in width. It is also very durable, and can be used for external purposes, such as window sills, and is often used to advantage in the form of cornices or pilasters. It is not attacked by insects, and will not warp, split, or warp.

Amanus (Cedrus libani) is also used in the eastern Mediterranean region, and is particularly prized for its fragrance. It is a tree of the cedar family, and is native to the mountains of Lebanon and Syria. It is a tall tree, reaching a height of 40 to 50 ft., with a trunk of 1 to 2 ft. in diameter. The wood is hard, close grained, and takes a high polish. It is used for floorboards, sills, mantels, and in the ceiling, where it often appears in the form of horizontal tiers, which are 6 ft. or more in length, and 3 ft. or more in width. It is also very durable, and can be used for external purposes, such as window sills, and is often used to advantage in the form of cornices or pilasters. It is not attacked by insects, and will not warp, split, or warp.

CEDRON, sē′dron. See Kidron.

CELIAN, sē′li-an. See Kilan.

CEILED, sē′led, CEILING, sē′ling (AV and ERV)

Cieling, The Hebrew words for "ceiling" are היפְּא, hiphâ, הַפָּה, sâphan, דַּלָּה, sâlîh; for "ceiling," לֶכ, lekcon: Ceiling occurs only in 1 K 6 15. It comes from the root sâphan, meaning "to cover." It has its common meaning of the upper surface of a room; there is, however, some doubt of the text. Ceiling is found in 2 Ch 3 5 (hippâh; Jer 22 14; Hag 1 4 sâphan in both; Ezek 41 16 sâlîh), the last text of the pastage being doubtful. In none of these cases does "ceiled" refer to the upper surface of a room, but to the covering or paneling of the inner walls of a house with cedar or other costly wood. This is in accordance with a common early use of the Eng. word, no longer frequent. GEORGE RICKER BERRY

CELEBRATE, sē′lbrat: Of the three Heb words so rendered מֹסָל, mosal, "to praise," is preeminently significant. It is an onomatopoetic word meaning "to give a clear, sharp sound," as in vocal rejoicing, celebration. Its equivalent in Ethiopic is ellel, Ger. hallen, Eng. halloo, and appears in the great choral word Hallelujah of the Heb religion. Passing into Christian use it has become the term most expressive of majestic praise. Ps 113 118 and 136 are called Hallel psalms. Found in Hekdekh's psalm of praise for his miraculous recovery: "Death came to celebrate the", (Ex 35 8) מֹסָל, mosal, הַפָּה, hiphâh, root meaning "to move in a circle," hence "to keep a festival" by sacred leaping and dancing; "celebrate (RV "keep") a feast" (Lev 23 41); מֹסָל, mosal, שֶׁבַח, shabbath, "to rest," i.e. keep or observe a holy day; "celebrate (RV "keep") your sabbath" (Lev 23 32).

DWIGHT M. PRATT

CELESTIAL, sē′les-choal (Ἰπράνωάς, epouraníos, "above the sky," "heavenly"): Peculiar to Paul's majestic argument on the resurrection: celestial vs. terrestrial bodies (1 Cor 15 40) with reference possibly to sun and moon, etc., but more probably to the bodies of terrestrial beings from those of beasts and mortal men (cf. Christ's words, Mt 22 30; Lk 20 36); including also doubtless in the apostle's thought the resurrection-body of Jesus and of the saints already taken into glory. Light is thrown on its meaning by the rendering of the same Gr word "heavenly" in the Septuagint ("heavenly places") (Eph 1 3 20; 2 6; 3 10); "heavenly" (1 Cor 15 48). Hence "celestial" as used by Paul indicates the soul's continued life beyond the grave, the spiritual body of the redeemed in heaven, who, in Christ, have put on immortality.

CELLAR, sē′lar, sē′lar (κρύπτη, krupâ; θαύμ, thôμ): Kruptê is found only in Lk 11 33, and is rendered "cellar" in RV; AV has "secret place." In this passage it doubtless means a cellar beneath a house. Etymologically the Gr word means "a covered place," and in classical Gr its usage includes vaults and crypts as well as cellars. It seems evident that it was not used for human dwellings but for places in which cellars were used with any frequency. It is shown by the excavations that in rebuilding a town which was in ruins the old houses were sometimes utilized as cellars for the new. θαύμ, rendered cellar only in 1 Th 27 27 f., is more correctly rendering, the correct meaning being stores, or supplies, of wine and oil.

CELOSYRIA, see′lo-sir′i-a. See COELE-SYRIA.

CENCHREA, sē′nkrē′a; CAPH, Kaphchre; WH Kenchreus; AV Cenchrea: A seaport of Corinth on the eastern side of the isthmus (see CORINTH). Here according to Acts 18 15, St. Paul had his hair shorn before sailing for Syria, since he had a vow. A local church must have been established there by St. Paul, since Phoebe, the deaconess of Cenchreae, was intrusted with the Epistle to the Romans, and was commended to them in the highest terms by the apostle, who charged them to "assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need" (Rom 16 1 2).

CENDEBAEUS, see′n-de′bîus (Ko′ndēbaos, Kondebaos; AV Candebeus): A general of Antiochus VII who was appointed "captain of the seacoast" of Pal (1 Macc 16 38 f) after the defeat of Tryphon by Antiochus 138 BC. He fortified Kedron and harassed the Jews in various ways. As Simon Maccabaeus was too old to attack C., in person he sent his two eldest sons, Judas and John, who defeated him with great loss at Modin (1 Macc 16 10).

CENSOR, see′nor: In AV censor is used as a tr of two Heb words, viz. מֶלֶךְ, melēk, and מָכָּח, makhn, mikrêth. The former word is generally rendered "censor," sometimes "firepan," and in three cases (Ex 35 19; 37 25; Num 20 19) rendered "firepan," made of bronze, used in connection with the altar of burnt offering (Ex 37 19). The latter word, מַכָּח, makhn, is more frequently rendered to hold pieces of a burnt-lamb-removed by tongs or shovels (Ex 26 38). Probably in all these cases the same kind of vessel was meant, viz., a bowl-shaped utensil with a handle, not unlike a saucepan. The other Heb word (derived from the same root as the word for "incense") denoted a vessel for conveying incense (Ez 8 11; 2 Ch 26 19).
19. The Gr word ὑθασσαζων, θυμασατριον, by which the LXX rendered μάκεραθ, is used also in He 9 4, where AV gives "censer," but ARV is probably more correct, viz. "altar of incense" (see Commentaries s.v.). Cf also Rev 8 3.5, where λαβονται, λιβανόδως, properly the adj. of "frankincense," is trl. "censer." T. Lewis

CENTURION, see-thi-'un: As the name implies, ἱκατοντάρχης or -ος, ἱκατοντάρχως or -ος; κατορφ, κατορφον, Lat centurio, was the commander of a hundred men, more or less, in a Rom legion. St. Matthew and St. Luke use the Gr word while St. Mark prefers the Lat form, as he does in the case of other words, seeing that he wrote primarily for Rom readers. The number of centurions in a legion was 60, that being at all epochs the number of centurions, although the number varied in the cohort or stipela. The ordinary duties of the centurion were to drill his men, inspect their arms, food and clothing, and to command them in the camp and in the field. Centurions were sometimes employed on detached service the conditions of which in the provinces are somewhat obscure. Men like Cornelius and Julius (Acts 10 1; 27 1) may have been separated from the legion to which they properly belonged for the discharge of special duties. They and other centurions mentioned in the Gospels and the Acts (Mt 8 5; Mk 15 39.44.45; Lk 23 47) are represented by the sacred writers in a favorable light. See Augustan Band. T. Nicol

CERTAIN, see-tin, CERTAINLY, see-tin-li, CERTAINTY, see-tin-ti: The rendering of some Heb words and forms expressive of what is definitely settled or determined.

(1) Tr of the Heb יִהְיֶה, יִנֹּקָה, "to be established" or "fixed," as in Dt 13 14 (Heb 15); 17 4; 1 S 25 23 (cf Ex 16 4, "a certain rate every day") AV. In the NT it is the rendering of ἀφηλος, αφθαλη, ἀφθαληα, αφθαλεα, from "a" privative and ἀφθαλειν, "to shake" or "move;" as in Lk 1 4, "the certainty of those things," actual circumstances; Acts 21 34; 22 30; 25 26.

(2) The word "c." is also employed in the OT to bring out the force of the absolute infinitive form used with the finite vb. to express emphasis or to strengthen the idea of the main vb. (Kautzsch-

CENSOI CERTIFY, see-ti-fi: Occurs in (1) 2 S 15 28 (15, heggid, "to show," "announce," from יִדְאָה, יָדָהא); (2) Ezr 4 14.16; 5 10; 7 24 (15, hō'da, "to make known," "to be known," from 15, yō'da; Aram. for 15, yā'da); (3) Est 2 22 AV (15, ἀμαρ, "to say," "tell," so RV); and (4) Gal 1 11 AV (γνωρίζω, gnorizo, "to make to know," so RV). In the EV, accordingly, the word has not the strong, specific sense of "to make certain," but only the broader sense of "to make to know," so RV. Ps 39 5 (Prayer Book version), "that I may be certified how long I have to live." See Ketab.

CHABRIS, keb-'ris (Aḇōpēs, Aḇris, Xaḇēs, Chabreis, Chabreis): Son of Gideon, one of the three rulers of Bethulia in the time of Judith (Jh 6 15; 8 10; 10 6).

CHADIAS, keb-di-'as, THEY OF (RV CHADIA-SAI, Kē-di-'as); A, Xašārā, Chadbassat; B, of Xašārā, hoī Chadāsatsa): The inhabitants of the city here referred to returned with Zerubbabel, along with the Ammonidae (1 Est 5 20). The name is not found in Ezra and Neh. The Chadiasai have been taken for the people of Kadesh and the Ammonidae for the people of Hamutah (Jsh 15 54). Possibly the place is identical with Kedesh of Jsh 15 25.

CHAREAS, keb-re-'as (Xaḇēs, Chairēs, AV Cheræas): Brother of Timotheus, the Ammonite leader against Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 5 6). He held the fortress of Gazer (the "Jazer" of 1 Mac 5 8) to which Timotheus fled from Judas. The latter pursued him and captured the fortress after a vigorous siege. In the slaughter which followed the two brothers, Ch. and Tim., were killed (2 Mac 10 32.37).

CHAFE, chav ("to, mar, "bitter"); hence bitter of soul, deadly, destructive, ferocious, "as a bear robbed of her whelp(s)"); Occurs only in 2 S 17 8; used by Hushai to characterize David's supposedly fierce mood at the time of Absalom's armed rebellion.

CHAFF, chav: Four different words have been trd. "chaff" in the OT:

(1) 15, mōc, is found in Job 21 18; Ps 1 4; 35 5; Isa 17 13; 29 5; 41 15; Hos 13 3; Zeph 2 2.

(2) 15, hāshash, occurs in two vs (Isa 5 24 and 33 11). Of "hashash," an Arab word which, as commonly used, denotes grass either standing or cut, green or dry, although, strictly speaking, dry or cut grass alone. In RV Isa 5 24 the tr is "dry grass."

(3) 15, tebhen, is trd. "chaff" in AV (Jer 23 28). The same word is rendered "straw" in RV (cf Arab. tābūn).
(4) 'ār, a Chalde word, occurs in Dnl 2 35.
In the NT ἄγαθος, ἀγαθόν, is found in Mt 3 12 and Lk 3 17.
In the process of winnowing, as it has been carried on in the East for thousands of years, the grain is tossed into the air so that the wind may cause a separation of chaff and straw. The light husks from the wheat and fine particles of straw are dispersed by the wind in the form of a fine dust; the heavier straw which has been broken into short pieces by the threshing process falls near at hand on the edge of the threshing-floor, while the grain falls back upon the pile. In Syria and Pal, that which falls near at hand and as cut straw is called tibn. This word occurs in the Arab. tr of Mt 3 12 and Lk 3 17. This straw is ordinarily saved and fed as “roughage” to the animals. It could easily be gathered and burned, as indicated in the above-mentioned vs, while the chaff is blown away beyond recovery, a strong figure to depict complete annihilation (Job 21 18; Isa 29 5; 41 16; Hos 13 3, Dnl 2 35). See AGRICULTURE; STRAW; WINnowing.

CHAIN, chān. CHAINS, chānān. Chains were used by the Hebrews:

(1) As ornaments: יִשְׂרָאֵל, 'egāḏāh, יִשְׂרָאֵל, nīṭpāhā, יִנְרֶאָל, יַרְבִּיחָד, יִנְרֶאָל, shār-šōrāh, יִנְרֶאָל, rōtāk. As ornaments for the person they were worn about the ankles (Nu 31 50; Isa
3 20) and about the neck (Cant 4 9; Ezek 16 11).
They were used as ornaments for the ephod and breastplate of the high priest (Ex 28 14; 39 15).
These chains were sometimes put on by God.
Solomon placed chains before the oracle in the temple
(1 K 6 21), and these were also of pure gold.
They were used as ornaments for graven images (Isa 40 19) and around the necks of prized animals. This was true of the camels taken from the Midianites by Gideon (Jgs 8 21 26).

(2) As marks of distinction: יַרְבִּיחָד, yārḇāḥāḏ, יִנְרֶאָל (יִנְרֶאָל) hāmānēnkh (hāmānkḥ):
That seems to be true of the chain which Pharaoh placed about the neck of Joseph (Gen 41 42), and of the one which the king of Babylon promised to the wise men (Dnl 5 7).

(3) Names of confining prisoners: יִנְרֶאָל, nīṭāḥēth; איווא, āwēwā: A number of passages that were tō “chains” in the AV are tō “fetters” in the RV (see Jgs 16 21; 2 S 3 34). Among the Romans the prisoner was chained to one or two guards (Acts 12 6 7; 21 33; Eph 6 20; 2 Tim 1 18). These chains were perhaps made of copper or an alloy of copper and tin.

(4) As a figurative expression: יָנָרְבִּיחָד, yānāḇāḥāḏ. The Psalmist likens pride to a chain about the neck
(73 6), and in Prov it is stated that the young man who hears the instruction of his father and forsakes not the law of his mother shall find that they are chains about his neck (1 9). In Rev 20 1 the angel is described as descending with a great chain in his hand. According to the AV Peter speaks of the fallen angels as having been delivered into “chains of darkness” (2 Pet 2 4). ἀνέκτημα, σεῦρα, and Jude speaks of them as being reserved in “everlasting chains” (Jude ver 6, RV “bonds”), δεσμὸς, desmōs. See also PUNISHMENTS. A. W. FORTUNE

The Chaldeans as Learned Men

See KADISH, “land of Kadish” or “the Chaldean,” is the usual designation, in the OT, for the land and the people (Jer 50 10; 51 24; 24 5; 25 12). The corresponding Gr form with ἱθορ for follows the Assyry-Bab Kaldu, mast Kal’dh, “Chaldean, land of the Chaldeans.” Kadish is possibly connected with the name of Keshed. (Keshd), nephew of Abraham (Gen 22 22), and may be derived from the Assyry-Bab root kāshdū, “to capture,” suggesting that the Chaldeans were originally tribes of nomadic plunderers (of Job 1 17).

In its widest acceptance, Chaldea is the name of the whole of Babylonia, owing to the fact that the Chaldeans had given more than one king to the country. In the strict geographical sense, however, their domain was the tract at the N.W. end of the Pers Gulf, which was often called by the Assyro-BABYLONIANS mast Tāmtim, “the Land of the Sea,” a province of unknown extent. When these tribes migrated into Babylonia is uncertain, as is also their original home; but as they are closely related to the Aramaeans, it is possible that their first settlements lay in the neighborhood of the Aramaean states bordering on the Holy Land. Tiglathpileser IV (742 BC) speaks of the rāasāt or chiefs of the Kadā, and the mention of numerous Aramaean tribes in Babylonia itself shows that their example of settling there soon found imitators, as did the Anglo-Saxons when they invaded Britain.
Among the Chaldean tribes in Babylonia may be mentioned Bit Amukkānō, whose capital was Sapas; Bit Yākīn, which furnished the name by which Merodach-baladan II belonged; and probably also Bit Dakkuri, as all three lay near the Pers Gulf.
Sargon of Assyria excludes Bit-Amukkānō and Bit-Dakkuri, and speaks of “the whole of the land of Chaldea, as much as there is; the land of Bit-Yākīn, on the shore of the Salt River [the Pers Gulf], to the border of Tilmūn” (the island of Bahrein and the adjacent mainland) (Pavement Inscription, IV, l. 92, 83, 85, 86). It was probably the influence of the Babylonians among whom they settled which changed these nomads into city-dwellers. Sennacherib refers to 75 (var. 89) strong cities and fortresses of Chaldea, and 420 (var.
800) smaller towns which were enclosed among them;
there were also Chaldeans (and Aramaeans) in Erebah, Nippur (Culheh), Kis, Ḥursag-カルama, Cuthah, and probably Babylon.

The “land of the sea” (mast Tāmtim) is mentioned in the chronicle of the early Bab. kings (rev. 14) as being governed by Eaqam, contempory of Samsu-titana (cir 1900 BC), but that at that early date it was one of the original Sumero-Akkadian states of Babylonia. It is doubtful that at that date, that is, before the early date, the Chaldeans had entered Babylonia and founded settlements there, though the record mentions Aramaean somewhat later on.

One of the earliest references to the Chaldeans is that of Shalmaneser II of Assyria, who, on invading Babylon in the eponymy of Bel-bunaya (851 BC), captured the city and took it prisoner to Adini, capital of the Chaldean tribe of Dakuri. After plundering and destroying the place, Shalmaneser arrested Enzudi, the capital, whereupon Adini submitted and paid tribute. On this occasion Yakkîn, “of the Land of the Sea,” also paid tribute, as did Musallâm-Marduk, son of Amukâni (the Bt-Amukkâni mentioned above). The next Assyrian ruler to mention the country is Adad-nirari III (810 BC), who speaks of all the kings of the Chaldeans, which evidently refers to the various states into which the Chaldean tribes were divided. Later on, Sargon of Assyria, in his 12th year, decided to break the power of Merodach-baladan, who had made himself master of Babylon. To effect this, he first defeated the Gambulians, who were the Chaldean king’s supporters, and the Elamites, his allies over the border. The Chaldean, however, did not want the Assyrian king’s attack, but escaped to Yatbûru in Elam, leaving considerable spoil behind him. Though extensive operations were carried out, and much booty taken, the end of the campaign seems on the whole to have been brought about when Dûr-Yakkîn was destroyed by fire and reduced to ruins. In the “Annals of Half XIV” Sargon claims to have taken Merodach-baladan prisoner, but this seems doubtful. Merodach-baladan fled, but returned and mounted the throne again on Sargon’s death in 705 BC. Six months later Sennacherib, in his turn, attacked him, and he again sought safety in flight. A Chaldean chief named Susûbi, however, now came forward, and proclaimed himself king of Babylon, but being defeated, he likewise fled. Later on, Sennacherib attacked the Chaldeans at Naghûtu and other settlements in Elamite-territory which Merodach-baladan and his followers had founded. After the death of Merodach-baladan, yet another Chaldean, whom Sennacherib calls likewise Susûbi, but whose full name was Muṣṣêb-Marduk, mounted the throne. This Chaldean was probably a puppet and was perhaps a natural son of the late Monarchy (Eusebius, Chronicles, Book I). His name, however, revolted against the Assyrians, and made himself master of Babylon. As, in other cases, the Assyrians seem to have been exceedingly faithful to their king, it has been thought possible that this general, who was none other than Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, was not really an Assyrian, but a Babylonian, and probably a Chaldean. This theory, if correct, would explain how Babylon, in its fullest sense, obtained the name of Chaldeas, and was no longer known as the land of Shinar (Gen 10 10). The reputation of Merodach-baladan, the contemporary of Hezekiah, may have been partly responsible for the change of name.

It was not in the restricted sense, but as a synonym of Babylonian, that the name Chaldean obtained the signification of “wise man.” That the Chaldeans in the restricted and correct sense were more learned than, or even as learned as, the Babylonians in general, is unlikely. The inscriptions give no indication that this was the case. The Babylonians in general, on the other hand, were enthusiastic students from very early times. From their inscriptions, it is certain that among their centers of learning may be included Sippur and Assur, the chief seats of sun-worship; Nippur, identified as learned fled with the Calneh of Gen 10:10; Men Babylon, the capital; Borsippa in the neighborhood of Babylon; Ur of the Chaldees; and Erech. There is, also, every probability that this list could be extended, and will be extended, when we know more; for wherever an important temple existed, there was to be found also a priestly school. "The learning of the Chaldeans" (Dan 4:1; 2:2; 1:47; 5:7,11) comprised the old languages of Babylonia (the two dialects of Sumerian, with a certain knowledge of Kassite, which seems to have been allied to the Hittite; and other languages of the immediate neighborhood); some knowledge of astronomy and astrology; mathematics, which their sexagesimal system of numeration seems to have facilitated; and a certain amount of natural history. To this must be added a store of mythological learning, including legends of the Creation, the Flood (closely resembling in all its main points the description of the Babel of Genesis). Then comes apparently also the Temptation and the Fall. They had likewise a good knowledge of agriculture, and were no mean architects, as the many celebrated buildings of Babylonia show—compare not only the descriptions of the Belus (see BABEL, TOWER OF) and the Hanging Gardens, but also the remains of Gudea's great palace at Lagas (Tell-loh), where that ruler, who lived about 2500 BC, is twice represented as an architect, with plan and with rules and measuring-sticks (all these statues are now in the Louvre). That their architecture never attained the elegance which characterized that of the West, is probably due to the absence of stone, necessitating the employment of brick as a substitute (Gen 11:3). See BABYLONIA; SUMER.

CHALDÉANS, Chal'dé-aus (Xaλδη, Chal'dha; AV Calphi): Father of Judas, who, along with Mattathias, steadily supported Jonathan at the battle of Gennesar when the hosts of Demetrius' princes were routed (1 Macc 11:70).

CHALPHI, käl'fî (Xaλδη, Chal'dha; AV Calphi): Father of Judas, who, along with Mattathias, steadily supported Jonathan at the battle of Gennesar when the hosts of Demetrius' princes were routed (1 Macc 11:70).

CHALPHI, käl'fî (Xaλδη, Chal'dha; AV Calphi): Father of Judas, who, along with Mattathias, steadily supported Jonathan at the battle of Gennesar when the hosts of Demetrius' princes were routed (1 Macc 11:70).

（דיות, masbith): The reference (Ezek 8 12) is to chambers in the temple where the elders of Israel were wont to assemble and practise rites of an idolatrous character. What the imagery consisted of,
we may gather from ver 10: symbolic representations of beasts and reptiles and "detestable things." It is thought that these symbols were of a zodiacal character. The worship of the planets was in vogue at the time of the prophet among the degenerate Israelites.

LAND CROCODILE [Lev 11 30]; ב, tím-shemeth, AV mole, RV CHAMELEON [Lev 11 30]): Kôbôh, which in the AV is rendered "chameleon" and in the RV "land crocodile," means also "strength" or "power," as in Gen 4 12; 1 S 2 9; Ps 22 15;
Isa 40 29, and many other passages. The LXX has χαμάλεων, chalaméon, but account of the ordinary meaning of the word, kôbôh, it has been thought that some large lizard should be understood here. The desert monitor, Varanus griseus, one of the largest of lizards, sometime containing the length of 4 ft., is common in Pal and may be the animal here referred to. The name "monitor" is a tr of the German warnen, "to warn," with which has been confused the Arab, name of this animal, waron or waral, a word of uncertain etymology.

The word tímshemeth in the same verse is rendered in AV "mole" and in RV "chameleon." The LXX has αρπαλαξ (= spólaζ, "mole"). Timshemeth also occurs in the lists of unclean birds in Lev 11 18 and Dt 14 16, where it is rendered: AV "swan"; RV "horned owl"; LXX "προφο\(\text{πουλε}\) προφο\(\text{πουλε}\) (= "coot"); acc. to some, "heron"); Vulg cygnus, "swan." It appears to come from the root násambah, "to breathe"; cf násambah, "breath" (Gen 2 7; Job 27 3 AV, etc.). It has therefore in Lev 11 30 been referred to the chameleon on account of the chameleon's habit of puffing up its body with air and hissing, and in the other passages to the pelican, on account of the pelican's great pouched bill.

The common chameleon is abundant in Pal, being found also in North Africa and in Spain. The other species of chameleons are found principally in Africa and Madagascar. It is not only a harmless but a decidedly useful creature, as it feeds upon insects, esp. flies. Its mode of capturing its prey is most interesting. It slowly and cautiously advances until its head is from 4 to 6 in.
from the insects, which it then seizes by darting out its tongue with great rapidity. The pigment cells in its skin enable it to change its color from pale yellow to bright green, dark green and almost black, so that it can harmonize very perfectly with its surroundings. Its peculiar toe and prehensile tail help it to lie in the leaves of the trees. Its prominent eyes with circular lls, like iris diaphragms, can be moved independently of each other,

leaves of the trees. Its prominent eyes with circular lls, like iris diaphragms, can be moved independently of each other,
a definite region, i.e. the valley of the Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea (Dt 2 8; 3 17; 4 49; Josh 3 16; 8 14; 11 16; 12 1.3.8; 2 S 22 9; 4 7; 2 K 14 25; 26 4; Jer 39 4; 62 7), and also the valley running southward from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akaba (Dt 1 1). Ezek 47 8 has for hā-ārāřāh "the desert," AV "plain," RV "the Arabah." The pl. is used in Josh 5 10; 2 K 25 5, "the plains of Jericho," and in Nu 22 1 and 26 3, "the plains of Moab." Elsewhere "ārārah is rendered in RV "desert," or "wilderness" (Joh 24 5; 39 6; Isa 33 9; 35 1.6; 40 3; 41 19; 51 3; Jer 2 6; 17 6; 50 12). At the present day, the Jordan valley is called the Ghaur (of Heb 'ār, "to dig," nm'reār, "cave," and Arab. maghārah, "cave"). This name is also applied to the deltas of streams flowing into the Dead Sea from the E., which are clothed with thickets of thorny trees and shrubs, i.e. Ghaur-ul-Mesrā'ah, at the mouths of Wādī-Karak and Wādī-Bent-Ḥammād, Ghawr-us-Sā'īyeh, at the mouth of Wādī-ul-Bāṣa. The name "Arabah" (Arab. al-ʿArabah) is now continued to the valley running southward from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akaba, separating the mountains of Edom from Sinai and the plateau of al-Tih. See ARABAH.

[1.3.16] Ezek 37 2 AV has "champaign" for bīk'āh, which is elsewhere rendered "valle" or "valley." Bīk'āh seems to be applied to wide, open valleys, as: "the valley of Jericho" (Dt 34 3), "the valley of Megiddo" (2 Ch 35 22; Zec 12 11), "the valley of Lebanon" (Joh 11 17). If Bāb and be Bīl'ābēk and "the valley of Lebanon" be Coele-syria, the present name of Coele-syria, al-Bīkā (pl. of būk'āh, "a low, wet place or meadow"), may be regarded as a survival of the Heb bīk'āh.

At this ELY DAY.

CHAMPION, champi-'un (םְכַפְּרָה, 'ish ha-bēnāyim): In 1 S 17 43 this unusual expression occurs in the description of Goliath. It means "the man of the two spaces," "spaces," or "space between," and is perhaps to be explained by the fact that there was a brook flowing through the valley separating the two armies. In 1 S 17 51 the word champion is the rendering of the Heb gībbōr, "mighty man.

CHANAAN, ka-nan, ka-ān (Χαναάν, Chana-an) Chanaanite, ka-nan-it, AV in the Apoc (Joh 5 3.16) and NT (Acts 7 11; 13 19) for RV CANAAN, CANAANITE (q.v.).

CHANGE, chān: The idea of change in the sense of something wholly fortuitous was utterly foreign to the Heb creed. Throughout the whole course of Israel's history, to the Heb mind, law, not chance, ruled the universe, and that law was not something blindly mechanical, but the expression of the personal Jehovah. Israel's belief upon this subject may be summed up in the couplet:

"The lot is cast into the lap, But the whole disposing thereof is of Jehovah." (Ps 16 33).

A number of Heb and Gr expressions have been translated "change," or something nearly equivalent, but it is noteworthy that of the classical words for change, συνφύτω, συντυχεῖς, and τύχε, τύχη, the former never occurs in the Bible and the latter only twice in the LXX.

The closest approach to the idea of change is found in the statement of the Philis that if their device for ascertaining the cause of their calamities turned out a certain way they would call them a chance, that is, bad luck (חָזְבָה, mākher, 1 S 6 9). But note that it was a heathen people who said this. We have the same Heb noun and the vb, from which the noun is taken, a number of times, but variously rendered into Eng.: Unclenessness that "chancehit him by night" (Dt 23 10). "Her harp was to light on the portion of the field" (Ruth 2 3). "Something hath befallen him" (1 S 20 26). "One which befalleth the sons of men" (sons of men are a chance," RV (Ecc 3 19). "There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked" (Ecc 9 2.3). Here the idea certainly is not something independent of the will of God, but something unexpected by man.

There is also סָפָה, ārāh, "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way" (Dt 22 6). Both the above Heb words are combined in the statement "As I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa" (2 S 1 6). "And Absalom chanced to meet the servants of David" (met the servants," 18 9, AV). "And there happened to be there a base fellow" (2 S 20 1).

We have also פָּטַה, pegha, "Time and chance happeneth to them all, meaning simply occurrence (Ecc 9 11). "Neither adversary, nor evil occurrence" (1 K 6 4).

In the NT we have ὀργάνω, sugkoria, "coincidence," a meeting apparently accidental, a coincidence. "By chance a certain priest was going down that way" (Lk 10 31). Also in Acts 21 21, "It may chance that some will run to you, or of some other kind," i.e. we cannot tell which (1 Cor 15 17). "It may be" (1 Cor 14 10).

If we look at the LXX we find tuchē used twice. "And Leah said, [En tuchē] With fortune! (a troop cometh," AV; "fortunate," RV; "with fortune," RV, Gen 30 11). Note, it was not Israelite, but Leah who said this. "That prepare a table for Fortune, and that fill up mingled wine unto Destiny" ("fate," Isa 66 11). In this passage tuchē stands for the Heb פָּטַה, māṣîr, the god of destiny, and Fortune is for Gâd, the old Sem name for the god of fortune found in inscriptions, private names, etc. Note here, however, also that the prophet was rebuking idolatrous ones for apostasy to heathen divinities. We have also in the Apoc, "these things which have chanced," RV "to be opened unto thee" (2 Esd 10 49). See also Gen; MENE.

GEORGE HENRY TAYLOR.

CHANCELLOR, chan, sel-bôn, the rendering in Est 4 8.9.17 of the Heb פָּטַה, bēl tē'em, LXX Bēnā, Bēîl (9), Bēlôm, Bēlethom (17), the latter being an incorrect tr of Heb ב על. In 1 Esd 2 16.25, Beîlēthos, Beîlēthos (of Est 4 8) occurs as a corruption, doubtless of פָּטַה, bēl tē'em. The term in question designates an Assyrian officer, viz. that of the "master or lord of official intelligence, or postmaster" (Sayoe).

CHANGE, chān: A word which seeks to express the many shades of meaning contained in 13 variations of 9 Heb words and 5 Gr. These signify, in turn, "to change," "to exchange," "to put or place," "to make other," i.e. "alter," "to disguise oneself," סָפָה, hālaph, and its derivatives, occurring often, indicates "to pass away," hence alter, renew, e.g. (1) "changes of raiment" (Gen 45 22; Jgs 14 12.13.19); (2) "changed my wages ten times" (Gen 51 7-41); (3) heavens changed "as a vessel is turned" (Ps 104 26); or "turns and warfare" (Job 10 17), i.e. relays of soldiers as illustrated in 1 K 5 14 (RVm "host after host is against me"); (5) "till my change come" (RV "release," i.e. death (Job 14 14); (6) changed the ordinances" (AV "violated the statutes"), i.e. disregarded law (Isa 24 5); (7) change of mind
CHANGE OF RAIMENT, raiment. See Dress.

CHANGER, chan'jer (קֶלֶב, kolēḇ, kolēḇaṭ; kolōḇaṭē, "money-changer," and so rendered Mt 21:12; Mk 11:15). A banker or other person who changed money at a fixed rate. Indignant at the profane traffic in the temple Jesus "poured out the changers' money" (Jn 2 15). So used only here. For fuller treatment see Bank; Money-Exchange.

CHANNEL, chan'el (תַחֲלוֹן, ṣ̄ḥalāh [r. ṣ̄ḥāl], ṣ̄ḥāḥak, "to hold or contain," "to be strong"; cf Arab. ṣ̄ḥal, "to overcome," and ṣ̄ḥēf, "preeminent"); גְּדֶש, gēdēš, shabbōlēth [r. š̄abbāl], šabbāhal, "to go," "to go up or grow," "to flow"; cf Arab. ṣ̄alāb, "to flow," "to rain," "to put forth ears"; sabōlāt, "an ear of grain"; sabōl, "a road," "a public fountain"): In Job 12:21; 40:18; 41:15 we have ṣ̄ḥēlāh in the sense of "strong" (but cf 40:18, RV "tubes" [of brass]). Elsewhere it is treated "river," "brook," "stream," "channel," or "watercourse." Shabbōlēth (in the dialect of Ephraim shabbōlēṯ (Jas 12:6)) means "an ear of grain" (Gen 41:5; ff; Ruth 2:2; Isa 17:5) or "a flood of water" (Ps 69:2.15; Isa 27:13). In 2 S 22:16 (of Ps 18:15) we have:

The foundations of the earth were laid bare.

The rebuke of Jehu.

At the blast of the breath of his nostrils.

This is reminiscent of "fountains of the deep" (Gen 7:11; 8:2; Prov 8:28). It is a question how far we should attribute to these ancient writers a share in modern notions of oceanography, but the idea seems to be that of a withdrawal of the water of the sea and the laying bare of submarine declivities and channels such as we know to exist as the result of erosion during a previous period of elevation, when the given portion of ocean floor was dry land. The fact that many streams of Pād flow only during the rainy season seems to refer to in Job 6:15; and perhaps also in Ps 126:4. See Brook; River.

CHANT (חָנֹן, pārōṭ): Occurs only once in AV in Am 6:5, and the meaning of the Heb. is uncertain. Pārōṭ corresponds to an Arab. root meaning to anticipate. It may therefore signify to improvise, to sing without care or preparation. RV "to sing idle songs" suits the context. See Driver, Joel and Amos.

CHANEUS, ka-nun'ē-us (Χάνεουσας, Chanounas; AV Channeus): A Levite in the list of 1 Esd 8:48, probably corresponding to "Merari" in Ezr 8:19.

CHAPEL, chap'el (חַפֶל, mishmēr), "a holy place"); RV SANCTUARY, g.v.; "It is the king's chapel" (Am 7:13 AV), an expression indicating the dependence of this sanctuary on the court.

CHAPENATHA, ka-fen'a-tha (Χαπηνάθα, Chaphenatha; AV Capenatha): A name apparently given to part of the eastern wall of Jerusalem or a fort in that neighborhood which is said (1 Mac 12:37) to have been repaired by Jonathan Maccabeus. The place cannot now be identified. Various speculations have been made as to the origin of the name, but they can hardly be said to throw any light on the passage cited.

CHAPTER, chap'i-tōr. See Architecture; Jachin and Boaz; Temple, II, 4.

CHAPMAN, chap'man (πλατεία ἔρημος, ἀράχη ha-taim): Word used only once in AV (2 Ch 9:14, ARV "the traders"); cf also 1 K 10:15 RV, where the Heb uses the same expression). The Eng. word means "merchant;" of the vb, "to charger," and the Germ. Kaufmann. The Heb means "those who go about" as merchants.

CHAPT (חָפָל, kāhath): The Heb term kāhath means "broken," "terrified" or "dismayed." This term as it occurs in Jer 14:4 is rendered "chapt" in EV, "cracked" in ARV, and "dismayed" in RVm. Inasmuch as the Heb term means "broken," it is not incorrectly rendered "chapt" or "chapped," which means to be cracked open.

CHARAATHALAN, kar-a-ath'ah-lan (Χαρααθαλάν, Charaathalán; AV Charaathalar [1 Esd 5:36]): Most probably a corruption of the text. The names "Cherub, Addan, and Immer" in the lists of Ezr 2:59 and Neh 7:61 are presented in the text cited as "Charaathalian leading them, and Allar."

CHARACA, kar-a-ka. See Charax.

CHARASHIM, kar-a-šim (חֶרֶשֶׁים, hāreshēm, "craftsmen"). See Ge-harashim.

CHARAX, kar-ax (eis tōv Xápana, eis tōn Chara-ke, AV Charas; kar-a-ka; Xána, Charāz): A place mentioned only in 2 Mac 12:17. It lay E of the Jordan and is said to be 750 stadia from Caspia, and to be inhabited by Jews called Tubieni, that is, of Tobie (Tobi) in Gilead (1 Mac 5:9.13; 2 Mac 12:17). There is no clue as to the direction in which Ch. lay from Caspia. Possibly Kerak (Kir-moab), in post-Bib. times called Charomaba and Mōbocharax, may represent the place. It lay about 100 miles S. of el-Mezibir, S.E. of the Dead Sea.

CHARCHEMISH, kār'ke-mish. See Carchemish.

CHARCUS, kā'kus. See Barchus.

CHAREA, kar'ē-a (Xāpeia, Charāia): Head of a family of temple-servants (1 Esd 5:32); called "Haraha" in Ezr 2:53; Neh 7:54.

CHARGE, chār'j. CHARGEABLE, chār'j-ə-b'l (from Lat currus, "a wagon," hence "to lay or put a load on or in"); "to burden, or be a burden." Figurative: (1) of a special duty (πλεονομία, mishmērōth, "thing to be watched"), "the c. of Jeh" chariot was distinguished by its lightness of build. It was so reduced in weight that it was possible for a man to carry his chariot on his shoulders without fatigue. The ordinary chariot was made of wood and leather, and had only two occupants, the fighting man and his shield-bearer. The royal chariots were ornamented with gold and silver, and in the battle of Megiddo Thothmes III is represented as standing in his chariot of electrum like the god of war, brandishing his lance. In the battle the victorious Egyptians captured 2,041 horses and 924 chariots from the Syrian allies.

CHARGERS, char'ä-jär (ARV "platter"): A word which meant in the older Eng. speech a flat dish or platter. It is used in the Bible as the tr (1) of ἁράν, ὡράν, which in Nu 7:19 AV (RV "platter") and repeatedly in that chapter denotes one of the gifts made by the several princes at the dedication of the tabernacle; (2) of ἀγχαρτός, ἀγχαρταί, a word of uncertain derivation used in Ezr 1:9 (AV) twice to designate certain temple vessels which might better be called "libation bowls"; (3) of πῖναι, πίναξ, used Mt 14:8.11; Mk 6:25.28 (EV) for the dish in which the head of John the Baptist was presented.

David Foster Estes

CHARGES, char'iz (סַרַּצַּו, דָּפַנְדָּו, יָסַרְדוּ, "to spend"): "Be at charges for them" (Acts 21:24, RV "with them"), i.e. pay the sacrificial expenses of these poorer Nazirites (cf Jos, Am, XLIX, xvi, 1).

CHARIOT, char'ät-öt (כַּרְדַּת, merkâbb, כַּרְדַּת, merkâbôh, "riding-chariot," כַּרְדַּת, rekhabb, "war-chariot"; ἄρμα, ἀρμανά):

1. Chariots of Egypt
2. of the Canaanites
3. of Solomon and Later Kings
4. of the Assyrians
5. of the Chaldæans, Persians, Greeks
6. In the NT
7. Figurative Use

LITÉRATURE

It is to the chariots of ancient Egypt that reference is first made in Scripture. Joseph was honored by being made to ride in the second

1. Chariots chariot of King Pharaoh (Gen 41:43).

of Egypt

Joseph paid honor to his father on his arrival in Goshen by meeting him in his chariot (Gen 46:29). In the state ceremonial with which the remains of Jacob were escorted to Canaan, chariots and horsemen were conspicuous (Gen 50:9). In the narrative of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt and of Pharaoh’s futile attempts to detain them the chariots and horsemen of Pharaoh were largely (Ex 14:17-18, 22-23; 15:4-19). It was with the Hyksos invasion, some cents, before the Exodus, that the horse, and subsequently the chariot, were introduced for purposes of war into Egypt; and it may have been the possession of chariots that enabled these hated shepherd warriors to overpower the native Egyptians. The Egyptian

The Canaanites had long been possessed of horses and chariots when Joshua houghed their horses and burnt their chariots with fire at the waters of Merom. (Josh 11:6-9). of the

The chariots of iron which the Canaanites used could manoeuvre in the plains and valleys proved a formidable obstacle to the complete conquest of the land (Jgs 1:19). Jabin had 900 chariots of iron, and with them he was able to oppress the children of Israel twenty years (Jgs 5:19). The Philistines of the low country and the maritime plain, of whom we read in Jgs and S, were a warlike people, were disciplined and well armed and their possession of chariots gave them a great advantage over the Israelites. In the war of Michmas they put into the field the incredible number of 30,000 chariots and 6,000 horsemen, only in the end to suffer a grievous defeat (1 S 13:5; 14:20). In the battle of Gibboa, however, the chariots and horsemen of the Philistines were not in opposition, and proved the destruction of Saul and his house. Of these chariots there have come down to us no detailed description and no representation. But we cannot be far wrong in turning to the chariot of the Hittites as a type of the Canaanite and Philistine chariot. It is not from the monuments of the Hittites themselves, however, but from the representations of the Kheta of the Egypt monuments, that we know what their chariots were like. Their chariots were their chief arm of offence and defense. The Hittite chariot was used, too, for hunting; but a heavier car with paneled sides was employed for war. The Egypt monuments represent three Hittite in each car, a practice which derived from that of Egypt and attracted attention. Of the three, one guided the chariot, another did the fighting with sword and lance, and the third was the shield-bearer.
The Israelites living in a mountainous country were tardy in adopting the chariot for purposes of war. David houghed all the chariot horses of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and ‘reserved of them for a hundred chariots’ (2 S 8 4), and Adonijah prepared for Major, and chariots and horsemen with a view to contest the throne of his father (1 K 1 5). But Solomon was the first in Israel to acquire chariots and horses on a national scale, to build cities for their accommodation (1 K 9 19). In NT times we read that Solomon had agents who received droves of horses from Egypt, and it is added: ‘And a chariot came up and went out of Egypt for 600 shekels of silver, and a horse for 150; and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, did they bring them out by their means’ (1 K 10 29). On the strength of a warrantable emendation of the text it is now proposed to read the preceding (ver 28): ‘And Solomon’s import of horses was from Musri and from Kue; the king’s traders received them from Kue at a price’—where Musri and Kue are North Syria and Cilicia. No doubt it was Egypt out of which the nation was forbidden by the Deuteronomic law to multiply horses (Dt 17 16), but on the other hand the statement of Ezek (27 14) that Israel derived horses, chargers and mules not from Egypt but from Togarmah—North Syria and Asia Minor—agrees with the new rendering (Burney, Notes on Hebrew Text of Books of Kings, in loc.). From Solomon’s time onward chariots were in use in both kingdoms. Zimm, who slew Elah, son of Baasha, king of Israel, was captain of half his chariots (2 K 15 29). It was when sitting in his chariot in disguise beside the driver that Ahab received his fatal wound at Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22 34). The floor of the royal chariot was a pool of blood, and ‘they washed the chariot by the pool of Samaria’ (vs 30-32). It was in his war-chariot that his servants carried Josiah dead from the fatal field of Megiddo (2 K 23 30). The chief pieces of the Heb chariot were (1) the pole to which the two horses were yoked, (2) the axle—resting upon two wheels with six or eight spokes each (2 K 23 28)—of which the pole was fixed, (3) a frame or body open behind, standing upon the axle and fitted by a leather band to the pole. The chariots of iron of which we read (2 K 8 13) were of wood strengthened or studded with iron. Like that of the Hittite, the Heb chariot probably carried three men, although in the chariot of Ahab (1 K 22 34) and in that of Jehu (2 K 9 24 f) we read of only two.

In the later days when the Assyrians overran the lands of the West, the Israelites had to face the chariots and the hosts of Sennacherib and of the kings of the Assyrians (2 K 19 23). And they faced them with chariots of their own. An inscription of Shalmanasar II of Assyria tells how in the battle of Karkar (854 BC) Ahab of the land of Israel had put into the field 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers. But the Assyrian chariotry was too numerous and powerful for Israel. The Assyrian chariot was larger and heavier than the Egypt or the Heb.; it had usually three and sometimes four occupants (Maspéro, Life in Ancient Egypt and Assyria, 252). When we read in Nahum’s prophecy of ‘chariots flashing with steel’, ‘rushing to and fro in the broad ways’ (Nah 2 3 4), it is of the Assyrian chariots that we are to think being hastily got together for the defence of Nineveh.

In early Bab inscriptions of the 3d millennium before Christ there is evidence of the use of the war-chariots, and Nebuchadrezzar in his campaigns to the West had chariots as part of his victorious host (Jer 51 3). It was the Persians who first employed scythed chariots in war; and Greeks we find Antiochus Eupator in the Seleucid period equipping a Gr force against Judaea which had 800 chariots armed with scythes (2 Macc 13 2).

In the NT the chariot is only twice mentioned. Besides the chariot in which the Ethiopian eunuch was traveling when Philip the evangelist made up to him (Acts 8 28 29 38), there is only the mention of the din of war-chariots to which the outrush of locusts in Apocalyptic vision is compared (Rev 9 9).

In the fig. language of Scripture, the chariot has a place. It is a tribute to the powerful influence of Elijah and Elisha when they are separately called ‘the chariots of Israel and the charioteers thereof’ (2 K 2 12; 13 14). The angelic hosts are declared to be God’s chariots, twelve thousand, thousands upon thousands (Ps 68 17). But chariots and horses themselves are a poor substitute for the might of God (Ps 20 7). God Himself is represented as riding upon His chariots of salvation for the defence of His people (Nah 3 8). In the Book of Zec, the four chariots with their horses of various colors have an apocalyptic significance (Zec 6). In the worship of the host of heaven which prevailed in the later days of the kingdom of Judah, ‘the chariots of the sun’ (see art.) were symbols which led the people into gross idolatry, and King Josiah burnt them with fire (2 K 23 11).

CHARIOTS OF THE SUN (אַשְׂרֵי הָשָׁמֶשׁ, markbhōhîth ha-shamesh): These, together with ‘horses of the sun’ are mentioned in 2 K 23 11. They are said to have stood in the temple, a gift of the kings of the East. Josiah removed the horses from the precincts of the temple and burned the chariots. Among the Greeks, Helios was endowed with horses and chariots. Thus the course of the sun as he sped across the skies was understood by the mythological mind of antiquity. The Bab god Shamash (=Heb Shemesh) likewise had his chariot and horses as well as his charioteer. The cult of the sun and other heavenly bodies which was particularly in vogue during the latter days of the Judaean monarchy (of 2 K 23 5; Ezek 18 16 f; Dt 17 3; Jer 8 2) seems to have constituted an element of the Canaanite religion (of the frames of localities like Beth-shemesh and the like). The chariots of Helios are referred to in En 72 5 37; 75 4, and Gr Apoc of Bar 6.

CHARITABLY, charl'ta-bli (κατὰ ἀγάπην, katá apá̂n): The RV, which substituted ‘love’ for ‘charity’ regularly, removing the latter word from the vocabulary of Scripture, makes a like change in Rom 14; 15, the only occurrence of “charitably” in AV; RV “in love.” See Charity.

CHARITY, char'i-ti (ἀγάπη, agapē):
1. A New Word
2. A New Ideal
3. An Apostolic Term
4. Latin Equivalents
5. English Translation
6. Inward Motive
7. Character
8. Ultimate Ideal
9. Almsgiving
10. Tolerance

In AV in 26 places from 1 Cor 8; 1 onward. The same Gr word, which appears in the NT 115 times, is elsewhere tr* by “love.”

The subset, agāpē is mainly, if not exclusively, a Bih. and ecclesiastical word (see Deissmann, Bible Studies, 198 fn), not found in profane writings, although the vb. ἀγαπέω, from which it is derived, is used in classical Gr in the sense of “love, founded in admiration, veneration, esteem, like the Lat dilegere” (Grimm-Thayer), rather than natural emotion (Lat amore). It is a significant evidence of the sense of a new ideal and principle of life that permitted the Christian consciousness of the earliest communities, that they should have made current a new word to express it, and that they should derive that word, not from the current or philosophical language of Gr morality, but from the LXX.

In the NT the word is apostolic, and appears first and predominantly in the Pauline writings. It is found only twice in the Synoptics (Mt 24; 12; Lk 11; 42), and although it is in both places put in the mouth of the Saviour, it can easily be understood how the language of a later time may have been used by the narrator, when it is considered that these gospels were compiled and reduced to writing many years after the spread of the Pauline epistles. The word is not found in Jas, Mk or Acts, but it appears in Paul 75 times, in Jn 30 times, in Pet 4 times, in Jude twice and in He twice. Jesus Christ gave the thing and the spirit in the church, and the apostles (probably Paul) invented the term to express it. When Jerome came to translate the Gospels into Latin, he put it in the place of dilectio and caritas, words which, however, in their original meanings were too weak and colorless to represent agāpē adequately. No principle seems to have guided him in the choice of the one word or the other in particular places. Caritas in Eng, became “charity,” and was taken over by the Eng. translators from the Vulg. though not with any regularity."

5. Latin Equivalents Amor was too gross, and he fell back on dilectio and caritas, words which, however, in their original meanings were too weak and colorless to represent agāpē adequately. No principle seems to have guided him in the choice of the one word or the other in particular places. Caritas in Eng, became “charity,” and was taken over by the Eng. translators from the Vulg. though not with any regularity, nor as far as can be judged, according to any definite principle, except that it is used of agāpē only in man, never as it denotes a quality or action of God, which is always tr* by “love.” When agāpē is tr* by “charity” it means either (1) a disposition in man which may qualify his own character (1 Cor 8; 1) and be ready to go forth to God (1 Cor 8; 3) or to men; or (2) an active and actual relation with other men, generally within the church (Col 3; 14; 1 Thess 1; 5; 1 Pet 4; 8; 5; 14), but also absolutely and universally (1 Cor 13). In the earlier epistles it stands first and unique as the supreme principle of the Christian life (1 Cor 13), but in the later writings, it is enumerated as one among the Christian virtues (1 Tim 6; 11), and is also in 1 Thess 4; 7, 8; 2 Thess 3; 10; Tit 2; 2 Pet 1; 7; Rev 2; 19). In Paul’s psalm of love (1 Cor 13): it is set forth as an innermost principle contrasted with prophecy and knowledge, faith and works, as the motive that determines the quality of the whole inner life, and gives value to all its activities. If a man should have all the gifts of miracles and intellect, and perform all the works of goodness and devotion, “and have not love, it profiteth nothing,” for they would be purely external and legal, and lacking in the quality of moral choice and personal relation which “without love profiteth nothing.” In the last, its negative meaning, the word “countercharm” (German, Gegenzauber) is commonly used.

CHARM, charm: Definition.—The word charm is derived from the Latin carmen, “song.” The word denotes strictly what is sung; then it comes to mean a magical formula chanted or recited with a view to certain desired results. Charm is distinguished from amulet in this, that the latter is a material object having as such a magical potency, though it is frequently an inscribed formula on it that gives this object its power (see Amulet). The word charm stands primarily for the incantation, though it is often applied to an inscribed amulet.

A charm is regarded as having a positive or a negative effect. In the first case it is supposed to secure some desired object or result (see Amulet). In the second, it is conceived as having the power of warding off evils, as the evil eye, the inflections of evil spirits and the like. In the last, its negative meaning, the word “countercharm” (German, Gegenzauber) is commonly used.

Charms are divisible into two general classes according as they are written (or printed) or merely spoken:

(1) Written charms.—Of these we have examples in the phylacteries and the ἔμφυτα noticed in the art. Amulet. In Acts 19: 13–20 we read of written charms used by the Ephesians, such as are elsewhere called ὀψέα ἔμφυτα (ephsia grmmata). Such magical formulas were written generally on leather, though sometimes on papyrus, on lead, and even on gold. Those mentioned in the above passage must have been inscribed on some very valuable material, gold perhaps, or they could not have cost £2,000 (= 50,000 drachmas). Charms of the kind have been found from the ruins of Ephesus. Modern Egypt drinking-bowls are used, inscribed with passages from the Koran, and it is considered very lucky to drink from such a "lucky bowl," as it is called. Parts of the Koran and often complete miscellaneous verses are reproduced by Egyptians and expat Egyptians soldiers during war. Those are buried with the dead bodies, just as the ancient Egyptians interred with their dead portions of the Book of the Dead or even the whole book, and as the early Abyssinians buried with dead bodies certain magical tokens. (Ant. VIII. 4.5) says that Solomon composed incantations by which demons were exorcised and diseases healed.

(2) Spoken charms are at least as widespread as those inscribed. Much importance was attached by the ancients (Egyp. and Bib.) to words, phrases, in which the incantations were recited, as well as to the substance of the formulae. If beautifully uttered, and with sufficient frequency, such incantations possessed unlimited power. The stress laid on the mode of reciting magical charms necessitated the existence of a priestly class and did much to increase the power of such a class. The binding force of the uttered word is implied in many parts of the OT (see Josh 9 20). Though the princes of Egypt, and the magicians under Pharaoh, make a covenant on behalf of Israel with the Gibeonites, they refused to break their promise because the word had been given. The words of blessing and curse were believed to have in themselves the power of self-realization. A curse was a means of destruction, not a mere realization (see Nu 22-24, Balaam's curses; Jgs 5 23; Job 31). In a similar way the word of blessing was believed to insure its own realization. In Gen 18:8-22 the greatness of Ephraim and Manasseh is ascribed to the blessing of Jacob upon them (see further Ex 12 32; Jgs 17 2; 2 S 21 3). It is no doubt to be understood that the witch of Endor raised Samuel from the dead by the realisation of this divine name the appellative ḥāḇōnāh = "Lord." In a similar way among the Jews of post-Bib. and perhaps of even Bib. times, the pronunciation of the Aaronic blessing (Nu 6 24-26) was supposed to possess great efficacy and to be a means of certain good to the person or persons involved. Evil spirits were exorcised by Jews of Paul's day through the use of the name of the Lord Jesus (Acts 19 13). In the Talm (P'sh'ṭim 110a) it is an invariable rule that if a man makes a witch he should say, "May a pot of boiling dung be stuffed into your mouth, you ugly witch," and her power is gone. For literature see Amulet.

CHARME, kār'mē (RV AV Carme; Ḫarmē, Charnē): A Gr transliteration of Heb hārīm. The name of a priestly family in the list of those who returned from the Exile (1 Esd 5 25 = Harim in Ezra 2 39 = Neh 7 42).

CHARMIS, kār'mēs (Χαρμίς, Chārmēs, Χαρμής, Charnēs, A, Ḫarmēs, Chalmeis): The son of Melchiel, one of the three elders or rulers of the town of Bethulia (Jeh 6 15; 8 10; 10 6).

CHARRAN, kar'an (Χαρράν, Charrān): Gr form of Hāran (q.v.) (Acts 7 24).

CHASE, chās. See Hunting.

CHASEBA, kas'ē-ba (Χασσῆβα, Chasebhō): The name of a family of temple-servants in the list of those who returned from Babylon (1 Esd 31). The name is not given in the passages in Ezra and Neh.

CHASTE, chast, CHASTITY, chas'ti-ti. See Crimes; Marriage.

CHASTENING, chā's-ning, CHASTISEMENT, chast-ise-ment: These two words corresponding to Heb ḥāṭē, mūṣār, and Gr ἁστία, poĩēia, are distinguished in Eng. use, in that "chastisement" wraps, but "I will chastise you with some punishment or for recalling to duty, while "chastening" is a wider term, indicating the discipline or training to which one is subjected, without, as in the other term, referring to the means employed to this end. The narrow sense is the one used in the OT and then in its verbal form, Lk 23 16: "I will therefore chastise him." AV uses it also in He 12 8.

The meaning of the word poĩēia grows with the progress of revelation. Its full significance is unfolded in the NT, when reconciliation through Christ has brought into prominence the true fatherhood of God (He 12 5-10). In the OT, where it occurs about 40 times, the radical meaning is that simple punishment, as in Deut 5 24, "A man chasteneth his son, so Jeh thy God chasteneth thee." But, as in a dispensation where the distinguishing feature is that of the strictest justice, retributive punishment becomes not only an important, but a controlling factor in the training, as in Lev 26 28: "I will chastise you seven times for your sins." In this sense, it is used of chastisements inflicted by man even unjustly: "My father chastised you with rods, but I will chastise you with some punishment" (1 K 12 11). As, therefore, the thought of the suffering inflicted, or that of the end toward which it is directed, preponderates, the Psalmist can pray: "Neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure!" (Ps 8 14), and take comfort in the words: "But he is the man whom thou chastenest!" (Ps 94 12). Hence it is common in both AV and RV to find the Heb mūṣār and Gr poĩēia as "instruction." Illustrations are most numerous in Prov.

In the NT, the term is used with a variety similar to its corresponding Heb in the OT. Examples of the fundamental idea, viz. that of "training," are found in such passages as Acts 7 22; 22 3, where Moses and Paul are said to have been "instructed," and 2 Tim 3 16, where Scripture is said to be "profitable . . . for instruction" (cf. 1 Tim 1 20; 2 Tim 2 25; Tit 1 22; Rom 2 20). A similar, but not identical, thought, is found in Eph 6 4: "Nurture them in the chastening and instruction of the Lord," when sufferings are described as bringing pain, the mystery of suffering, which in the OT is most fully treated in the Book of Job, at last finds its explanation. The child of God realizes that he cannot be beneath God's wrath, and hence that the chastening which he endures is not destructive, but corrective (1 Cor 10 13; 11 32; 2 Cor 6 9; Rev 3 19). In He 12 5-11, such consolation is afforded, not, as in the above passages, by incidental allusions, but by a full argument upon the basis of Prov 11 14, an OT text that has depth and richness that can be understood and appropriated only by those who through Christ have learned to recognize the Omnigent Ruler of heaven and earth, as their loving and considerate Father. On the meaning of this passage, a distinction is often drawn between punishment and chastisement; the former, as an act of justice, revealing wrath, and the latter, as an act of mercy, love. Since to them that are in Christ Jesus, there is no condemnation (Rom 8:1) they can suffer no punishment, but only chastisement. Where there is guilt, there is punishment; but where guilt has been removed, there can be no punishment. There being no degrees of justification, no one can be forgiven in part, with a partial guilt still set to his account for which he must yet give a reckoning, either here or hereafter. If, then, all the righteousness of Christ belongs to him, and no sin whatever remains to be forgiven, either in whole or in part, all life’s sorrows are remedial agencies against danger and to train for the kingdom of heaven.

CHATTER, chat’er (חָתָר, chathahr): This word, which means to “peep,” “twitter,” or “chirp,” as small birds do, is used in Isa 38:14, “Like a swallow or a crane, so did I chatter.” See Cúrra.

CHAVAH, kā’va (LXX Zωή, Zōē): A transliteration of the Heb הָזְמָה, hazōmah or hazānah, which means “life giver,” “living,” and appears in our Eng. VSS as Eve (Gen 3:20 AVm).

CHEVAR, ke’var (קְבַר, kabhār, “joining” [Young], “length” [Strong]; Χεβόρ, Chobdr): The river by the side of which his first vision was vouchsafed to Ezekiel (3:1). It is described as in “the land of the Chaldeans,” and therefore to be sought in northern Mesopotamia. This rules out the Habor, the mod. Chabour, with which it is often identified. The two names are radically distinct: קְבַר could not be derived from קבר. One of these great Babylon canals is doubtless intended. Hilprecht found mention made of (נזר) קברא, one of these canals large enough to be navigable, to the E. of Nippur, “in the land of the Chaldeans.” This “great canal” he identifies with the mod. shatt en-Nāl, in which probably we should recognize the ancient Chebar.

CHECK (קדָר, māgār): Occurs in Job 20:3 AV, “I have heard the check of my reproach” (RV “the reproof which putted me to shame”), i.e. a check or reproof, such as that which closes the last speech of Job (ch 19), and intended to put Zophar to shame.

CHECKER-WORK, chek’er-wûrk (NETWORK) (קדָרָב, ebbakāhāhā): This was a kind of ornamentation used on the tops of the pillars of Jachin and Boaz before the porch of the Temple (1 K 7:17). Its exact form is not known. See TEMPLE. For “a brodered coat” (Ex 25:4 AV), RV gives “a coat of checker work.” See BRODERED; EMBROIDERY.

The name of the Elamite overlords with whom Amraphel, Arioch and Tidal marched against Sodom and Gomorrah and the other cities of the plain (Gen 14:1ff). The Gk (LXX) form of the name is Χεδολόγαμος, implying a different vocalization, the assimilation of r with l, and the pronunciation of o as o as gho (Cedorlamomer). This suggests that the Elamite form, in cuneiform, would be Kudur-lahgumal, the second element being the name of a god, and the whole therefore meaning “servant of La’omer” (La-gamar), or the like. A Bab deity worshipped at Dilmu, Lagamal, may be the same as the Elamite Lagamar. This name is not found in the cuneiform inscriptions unless The flat possibility of written Kudur-lahgumal (or Kadorlāhgalom) of three late Bab legends, one of which is in poetic form. Besides this Elamite ruler, two of these tablets mention also certain Eri-Akas or Eri-Akuwa, son of Durmah-lānī, and another one of them refers to Tudhul(a) or Tidal. See Eri-akua, 4.

Objections have been made to the identification of Chedorlamer with the Kudur-lahgumal of these texts, some Assyriologists having flately pressed the opinion that, though these names were respectively those with which they have been identified, they were not the personages referred to in Gen 14, and many have refused from expressing an opinion at all. The main reason for the identification of Kudur-lahgumal? with Chedorlamer is its association with the names Eri-Ekua and Tudhul(a) found on two of the tablets: no clear reference to the expedition against the Cities of the Plain, however, have been found in these texts. The longer of the two prose compositions (Brū. Mus., Sp. II, 987) refers to the bond of heaven (Judg 20:16)? to the Tidal?) and the name which he (Merodach?) gets for [the Elamites] in Babylon, the city and the [his] glory. So [the gods], in their Babylonia faithful (or everlasting) counsel, desired to join and to Kudur-lahgumal, king of Elam, [their favor?]. He came down, and [performed] what was good to them, and exercised dominion in Babylon, the city of Kar-Dumiš (Babylonia). When in power, however, he acted in a way which did not please the gods, for he was a man of excess, fowl, and favoured the dog which crushed the bone. “What? (king of Elam was there who had (ever) known favor to?) the shrine of E-saggili?” (E-sagal, the great temple of Belus at Babylon). A letter from inscriptions Durmah-lānī son of Eri-Akas (Tāroche), 3. The Son of is at this point quoted, and possibly of Eri-Ekua forms the justification for the sentences which had preceded, giving, as they do, reasons for the intervention of the native ruler. The mutilation of the inscription makes the sense and sequence very difficult to follow.

The less perfect fragment (Sp. III, 2) contains, near the beginning, the word hamma, and if this be, as Professor F. Hommel has suggested, part of the name Hammurabi (Amraphel), it would in all probability Durmah-lānī, Tudhul(a) and Kudur-lahgumal? with Chedorlamer beyond a doubt. This inscription states, that Merodach, the fatherless of his heart, caused the ruler not supporting [the temples of Babylonia] to be slain with the sword. The name of Durmah-lānī then occurs, and it seems to be stated of him that he carried off spoil, and Babylon and the temple E-saggili were inundated. He, however, was apparently murdered by his son, and old and young (were slain) with the sword. Then came Tudhul(a) or Tidal, son of Gazzâl(ni?), who also carried off spoil, and again the waters devastated Babylon and E-saggili. But to all appearances Tudhul(a) was taken by his fate, for “his son shattered his head with the weapon of his hands.” At this point there is a reference to Elam, to the city Abēbâ? ( ), and to the land of Rabbûtu, which he (the king of Elam) had spoiled. Whether this refers to no expedition to Palestine or not is uncertain, and probably unlikely, as the next phrase speaks of devastation inflicted in Babylonia. But an untoward fate overtook this ruler likewise.

Charmo

Chedorlamer

5. The Fate of Sinful Rulers

Kudur-lagum's son pierced his heart with the steel sword of his girdle. All these references to violent deaths are apparently cited to show the dreadful end of certain kings, "lords of sin," with whom Merodach, the king of the gods, was angry.

The third text is of a poetical nature, and refers several times to "the enemy, the Elamite"—apparently Kudur-lagum[mal]. In this noteworthy inscription, which, even in its present imperfect state, contains the destruction wrought by him is related in detail. He cast down the door (of the temple) of Istar; entered Du-mah, the place where the gates were declared (see BEELD, BABYLON), and told his war-chariot take the spoil and the god of the temple. He was afraid, however, to proceed to extremities, as the god of the place "flashed like lightning, and shook the earth" (see the above passage). Then the two parties agree, that he set his face to go down to Tiamtu (the sea-coast; see CHALDEA), whither Ihi-Tutu, apparently the king of that district, had hastened, and founded a pseudo-capital. But the Elamite seems afterward to have taken his way north again, and after visiting Bor-sippa near Babylon, traversed "the road of darkness—the road to Meskû" (Mesheh). He destroyed the palace, subdued the princess, carried off the spoil of all the temples and took the goods of the people to Elam.

Where these remarkable inscriptions came from there ought to be more of the same nature, and if they be found, the mystery of Cheeklosmer and Kudur-lagum will probably be solved. At present it can only be said, that the names all point to the early period of the Elamite rulers in Babylonia, and that the land of Tiamtu or Tâmdû was settled by the Chaldaeans. Evidently it was one of the heroic periods of Babylonian history, and some scribe of about 350 B.C. had collected together a number of texts referring to it. All these tablets were purchased (not excavated) by the British Museum, and reached that institution through the same channel. See the Journal of the Victoria Institute, 1889–96, and Professor Sayce in PSBA (1906), 183 ff.; 241 ff.; (1907), 7 ff.

CHEEK, chēk, CHEEKBONE, chēkbōn:
(1) נַפְיָ֥ת, נַפַיָת; סַּאָ֥גֵן, סַאָגָּן, "the jaw," "jaw-bone," "side of the face." The Heb word denotes originally freshness and rounded softness of the cheek, a sign of beauty in youth and maiden (Cant 1:13; 5:15). The oriental guards with jealous care his cheek from touch or defilement. Therefore a stroke on the cheek was, and is to this day, regarded as an act of extreme rudeness of behavior, a deadly affront. Our Saviour, however, teaches us in Mt 5:39 and Lk 6:29 that even this insult is to be ignored and pardoned.

Jawbones of animals have been frequently used as tools and weapons among primitive people. We see this sufficiently proven from cave deposits in many parts of the world, and from recent ethnological researches, esp. in Australia. In the light of this evidence it is interesting to note that Samson used a jawbone of an ass with success against his enemies the Philistines (Jgs 15:15).

(2) נֲנֵפְיָת, malḵēnā (Ps 22:15), is a dual form indicative of the two jaws, to which a parched tongue seems to cleave.

(3) נַפְיָת, m’tahl’āh (Job 29:17), better "cheek teeth" (q.v.).

H. E. Luering

CHEEK TEETH (נִפְיָֹת), m’tahl’āh, transposed from נַפְיָֹת, malḵēnā [only in Ps 56:6], lit. "the biter," "crusher," "molar," "jaw-teeth," "great teeth" [Job 29:17 m; Joel 1:6].

Figurative: The word is used as a synonym of recklessness and cruelty.

CHEER, chēr, CHEERFULNESS, chēr’fūl-nēs: The Eng. word "cheer" meant (1) originally face, countenance (Gr. ἄγων, ἄγρα, "head," through O.Fr. chere, "face"), (2) then the expression on the face, esp. (3) the expression of good spirits, and finally (4) good spirits, without any reference to the facial expression. The noun "cheer" in EV is only found with adj. "good" (except 1 Esd 9:54, "great cheer"), the word not having quite lost its earlier neutral character (e.g., face expression, whether joyous or otherwise). In OT, בּוֹּ֥ת, בּוֹּת, is tr. "cheer," "let thy heart cheer thee" (see Goan); יַּנְפֶּ֥ח, sāmēnî, "to rejoice," is so tr. in Dt 24:5, "shall cheer his wife" (AV "cheer up his wife"), and Jgs 9:13, "wine, which cheery God [teloom] and man." The phrase "of good cheer" occurs in OT in Job 6:27 (AV "comfort"); in Apoc. 1 Esd 9:54; Wisd. 18:6; Bar 4:5.30; Sir 18:32 AV (RV "luxury"); in NT for Gr euthuméo, euthumos, in Acts 27:22.25.36, and for thars6o in Mt 9:22 (AV "comfort"); 14:27; Mk 6:50; 10:49 (RV, "comfort" in AV); Jn 16:33; 21:17. "Cheer" as vb. trans. occurs in Ecyd 11:9; Deut 24:5; Jgs 9:13.

Cheerful occurs in Prov 15:13.15 (AV "merry"); Zec 8:19; 9:17 AV; Sir 30:25; 2 Cor 9:7.

CHELLUS, kel’us [Χελλοῦς, Chellous], a place named (Jth 9) among those W. of the Jordan to which Nebuchadnezzar sent out his summons. It is mentioned along with "Kades" and is said by N. of the "children of Ishmael" it may with some probability be taken as lying S.W. of Jerus. It has been conjectured that it may be Chalutza (Reland, Pal, 717), a place under the form Elusa well known to the ancient geographers.

CHELOD, kē’lod [Χελός, Cheleus, Χελός, Chelous]: In Jth 1:6 it is said that "many nations of the sons of C. assembled themselves to the battle." They are mentioned as obeying the summons of Nebuchadnezzar to his war against Arphaxad. No very probable suggestion has been made as to the meaning of Chelod.

CHELUB, kē’lub:
(1) לְבֹּ֥ב, lēbōb, father of Mehr (1 Ch 4:11); the name is probably a variation of Caleb. Well-

1. Moabites by the prophet is evidenced by the presenting him as going into captivity with the People of Chemosh, their priests and princes together, and Moab is to be ashamed of him as Israel was of the Golden Calf of Bethel, which did not avail to save the Northern tribes from the conquering Assyrian power (Jer 48 713-16).

For Chemosh, "the abomination of Moab," as for Moloch, "the abomination of the children of Ammon, Chemosh, Solomon, under the influence of his idolatrous wives, built a high place in the mount before Chemosh. It was natural that they should desire to worship still after the manner of the gods of their native land, but although the effect of all this was seen in the moral and spiritual degradation of Solomon himself there is no indication that the immorality and cruelties associated with such worship were then practised in Jerusalem. In the days of Ahab and Manasseh, even as early as the days of Abijam of Judah, they were (1 K 15 12-13). Josiah found these abominations of idolatry, which had been introduced by Solomon and added to by Ahab and Manasseh, flourishing when he came to the throne, and he was restrained by the prohibitions of the Book of Chemosh the Law (Dt 12 29-31; 18 10). Josiah pulled down and defiled the high places and the altars, in order to make a clean sweep of the idolatrous figures, "the brake in pieces the pillars," or obelisks, "and cut down the Asherim," or sacred poles, "and filled their places with the bones of men" (2 K 23 1-20).

There is one passage where Chemosh is designated the god of the Ammonites (Jer 49 7). Jephthah is disputing the right of Chemosh Ammonites to invade territory which and belongs to Israel because Jeh has Ammonites given it to them by conquest. And he asks: "Shouldst thou possess the territory of those whom Chemosh, thy god, dispose ess, and we the territory of all whom Jeh, our god, disposest?" It may be that he is called here the god of the Ammonites by a mere oversight of the historian for that Jeh is kindred nation descended from a common ancestor, Lot, Chemosh may in a sense belong to both. We notice, however, that Jephthah's argument in meeting the claim preferred by the king of Ammon passes on to Israel's relation to the Moabites makes mention only of well-known Moabite cities. Chemosh is accordingly named because of his association with Moab, the cities of which are being spoken of, although strictly and literally Milcom should have been named in an appeal addressed as a whole to the Ammonites (vs 12-28; of Moore ad loc.).

The discovery of the Moabite Stone in 1868 at Dibon has thrown light upon Chemosh and the relations of Moab to its national god.

5. Moabite Stone The monument, which is now one of the most precious treasures of the Louvre in Paris, bears an inscription which is the oldest specimen of Sem alphabetic writing extant, commemorating the successful effort made about 860 or 850 BC by Mesha', king of Moab, to throw off the yoke of Israel. We know from the OT record that Moab had been reduced to subjection by David (2 S 8 2); that it paid a heavy tribute to him (2 K 3 4); and that, on the death of Ahab, Mesha' its king rebelled against Israelite rule (2 K 3 5). Not till the reign of Jehoram was any effort made to recover the lost dominion. The King of Israel then allied himself with the kings of Judah and Edom, and marching against Moab by the way of the Red Sea, inflicted upon Mësha' a defeat so decisive that the king of Moab, naturally enough, appeared only by the sacrifice of his son (2 K 3 6 ff).

The historical situation described in the OT narrative is fully confirmed by Mësha's inscription. There are, however, divergences in its detail. In the Book of K the revolt of Moab is ascribed to Chemosh, while the inscription of Mësha' is said to have taken place after the death of Ahab. The inscription implies that it must have taken place by the middle of Ahab's reign. The inscription implies that the subjection of Moab to Israel had not been continuous from the time of David, and says that 'Omri, the father of Ahab, had reasserted the power of Israel and had occupied at least a part of the land.

It is with the history of Chemosh that we are chiefly concerned. On the monument the name appears twelve times, and it was for Chemosh that he built the temple in the monument was found. He built it because among other reasons Chemosh had made him see his desire upon them that hated him. It was because Chemosh was angry with his land that 'Omri many times forged Chemosh to take possession of the land of Medeba and Israel dwelt in it his days and half his son's days, but Chemosh restored it in Mësha' days. Mësha' took 'Astaroth which the king of Israel had built for himself, and placed the pagodas above the city, and made them a gazeng-stock to Chemosh and to Moab. Mësha' brought thence the altar-hearth of Dodo, and dragged it before Chemosh in Kerieth. By command of Chemosh, Mësha' attacked Nebo and fought against Israel, and after a fierce struggle he took the place, slaying the inhabitants en masse, 7,000 men and women and maid servants, devoting the city to 'Ashtor-Chemosh and dragging the altar vessels of Israel to Chemosh, and taking the ark of Chem, too, which the king of Israel had built, Chemosh drove him before Mësha'. At the instigation of Chemosh, Mësha' fought against Horanain, and, although the text is defective in the closing paragraph, we may suppose that Chemosh did not fail him but restored it to his dominions.

Naturally enough there is considerable obscurity in local and personal allusions. Dodo may have been a local god worshipped by the Israelites E. of the Jordan. Ashtor between Chemosh may be a compound divinity of a kind not unknown to Sem mystical and OT theology, Ashtor representing possibly the Phœn Ashthoreth. What is of the occurrence of so many phrases and expressions applied to Chemosh which are used of Jehovah in the OT narratives. The religious conceptions of the Moabites reflected in the inscription are so strikingly like those of the Israelites that if only the name of Chemosh were substituted for that of Chemosh we might think we were reading a chapter of the Books of K. It is not in the inscriptions, however, but in the OT narrative that we find a reference to the demand of Chemosh for human sacrifice: "He took his eldest son," says the Heb annalist, "that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall. And there was great wrath against Israel; and they departed from him, and returned to their own land" (2 K 3 27). This appears to indicate that the Israelites had to give up their purpose to fasten the yoke of bondage again upon Mësha' and that they returned empty-handed to their own land. But this fortunate result for Moab was due to the favor of Chemosh, and in particular to the human sacrifice by which he was propitiated.

If we find in these representations of Chemosh in the OT narratives a striking similarity to the Hebrew conception of Jehovah, we cannot fail to notice the lack of the higher moral and spiritual elements supplied to the religion of Israel by the prophets and indeed from Moses and Abraham downward. "Chemosh," says W. Baudissin, "is indeed the ruler of his people whom he protects as Yahweh the Israelites, whom he chastises in his indignation, and from whom he accepts propitiatory gifts. But of a God of grace whose long-suffering leads back even the erring to Himself, of a Holy God to whom the offering of a pure and obedient heart is more acceptable than bloody sacrifices, of such a God as is depicted in Israel's prophets and speech; there is no trace in the Moabite picture of Chemosh. While Mësha' is represented as offering up his own son in accordance with the stern requirements of his religion, OT law-givers and prophets from the beginning condemned human sacrifices (R E, art. 'Kemosh').

CHENAANAH, ke-nà'-a-nà (יִבְנָנָה, k'ina'dáh, fem. form of "Canaan," though others explain it as "toward Canaan"): The name of two men:

(1) The fourth-named of the seven sons of Bîl-ham, son of Jehiel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a leading warrior in the time of David (1 Ch 7 10).

(2) Father of the false prophet Zedekiah, who encouraged Ahab against Micaiah (1 K 22 11.24; 2 Ch 18 10.23).

CHENAI, ke-nà'-nî (ךְנַנָי, "planted")

One of the names mentioned in Neh 9 4, in connection with the constitution of the congregation, and the names represent houses or clans. The eight Levitical houses probably sang some well-known psalm on this occasion. If they are names of individuals, they were probably deputed to recite or chant some special prayer in order to lead the worship of the people.

CHENANIAH, ke-nà'-ni (ךְנַנְיָה, k'nya'yáh, andךְנַנְיָה, k'nanyáh, lit. "established by God"): Chief of the Levites who was over "the songs," or "the carrying," (viz. of the ark") from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Ch 15 22.27; 26 29).

CHEPHAR-AMMONI, ke-fâr-am-mô-nî (AV Chephar-ammon; כְּפַר-הָעָם, k'far-hâ'am'môn; B, Kephirâ'ot; Kephiréth; Kephiréth; Kephireth; Chephar-almon, "village of the Ammonites"): A place in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 24). It may be identical with Kefr ’Aná, a ruined site about two miles to the N.E. of Bethel.

CHEPHAR-HAAMONI, ke-fâr-ha-am'-ô-nî. See CHEPHAR-AMMONI.

CHEPHIRAH, ke-fîrâ'ah (ךְפִירָה, kophé'rah), ha-kophé'rah; B, Kâphürâ'ot; Kephirâ'at; A has Chephèriad, B has ka-fîrâ'ah, kaphé'rah; Kephirâ'mô, Kephirérâ'mô, "village of the Ammonites"): One of the cities of the tribe of the Ephrâimites through which the priests of the High-Priest Kâphirah, together with W. of Gibon, and N. of Kârtpat el-Abân. It stands on high ground, with many ancient remains.
CHERAN, ke'ran (ךֵּרָן, k'rân): A Horite clan-name, occurring in the genealogy of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36:26), and in the list in 1 Ch 1:41. Dillmann derives it from kar, "a lamb."

CHERETHITES, ker'eth-tits (ךְֶרֶתְּתִים, k'rêthîm, ha-k'rêthîh); Xoloê, Chelethi "executioners," "life-guardsmen": A people in South Pal whose territory bordered upon that of Judah (1 S 30:14). In ver 16 this land is apparently identified with that of the Philis. In Ezek 25:16 the Philis and the Cherethites are threatened together; while in Zeph 2:5 the Cherethites are evidently the dwellers in "the land of the Philis," "the inhabitants of the sea-coast." LXX in both Ezek and Zeph renders the name "Cretans." The translators may have been "guided only by the sound." But Zeus Cretagens in Gaza suggests a connection with the island of Crete. See, however, Caprous. It may be taken as certain that the Cherethites were a Phil clan. In conjunction with the Peleteths they are frequently named as forming the guard of David (2 S 8:18, etc). It was the custom of many ancient monarchs to have a guard of foreign mercenaries.

CHERISH, cher'ish (ךְֶרֶשׁ, sâkhan; בָּאָשׁ, bâ'ash, thâpqah): Sâkhan, "to act the friend," "to be useful," is the "cherish" (K 1:24); thâpqah, "to make warm," "to foster" (Eph 5:29), said of the regard the husband should have for his wife, even as his own flesh which he "nouriseth and cherisheth, even as Christ also the church," and in 1 Thess 2:7, of Paul amongst his converts, "as when a nurse cherisheth her own children."

CHERITH, kérith, THE BROOK (ךְֶרֶית, k'rêth; nahal k'rith, Xopâdov Xoâjâth, Chaimárrohes Charidhâ): The place where Elijah hid and was miraculously fed, after announcing the drought to Ahab.

CHERUB, k'erub (ךְָרוּב, k'rûb; Xe'roûb, Cherûôb, Xe'roûb, Charôôb): A place in Babylonia from which people whose genealogies had fallen into confusion went up to the court at the return from the Exile (Neh 7:61); unidentified. In 1 Esd 5:36 we read "Charaathalân leading them, and Allar," a phrase that seems to have arisen through confusion of the names in the passages cited above.

CHERUBIC, che-roô'ô bik, FORMS IN THE CON- STELLATIONS. See Astronomy.

CHERUBIM, cher'u-beem, cher'ô-beem (ךְֶרֶבִים, k'rûûm, pl. of cherub, כֹּרְעָב, k'rôûb): Through the influence of the Sept., "cherubim" was used in the earlier Eng. VSS, also as a song, hence the pl. was made to sound "cherubims." The etymology of the word cannot be ascertained.

1. As the Guardians way of the tree of life." In their function as guardians of Paradise the cherubim bear an analogy to the winged bulls and lions of Babylonia and Assyria, colossal figures with human faces standing guard at the entrance of temples (and palaces), just as in Egypt the approaches to the sanctuaries are guarded by recumbent figures. But the Babylonian name of lamassû, or shedu; no designation at all approaching the Heb k'rûh has so far been found in the Assyr language. Nor are thus named the winged figures, half human and half animal, which in Bab and Pers art are found in both styles of the "sacred tree." Thus a Bab origin of the Heb cherubim is neither proved nor disproved. If we look for further analogies which, of course, do not indicate a borrowing on the part of the Hebrews, we may mention the fabulous griffins (γρίφος, grîfpos), usually represented as having the heads and wings of an eagle and the body and hind quarters of a lion; they were believed by the Greeks to inhabit Scythia, and to keep jealous watch over the gold of that country.

If we read between the lines of the Paradise account in Gen (of 3:8), the garden of Eden, the primeval abode of man, reveals itself more than that: it was apparently the dwelling-place of God. In the polytheistic story of the creation of the world and early life of man, which, while in several respects analogous (of 3:22), is devoid of the more spiritual notions of Hebrewism, the garden was the abode of the gods who alone had access to the tree of life from the fruit of which they derived their immortality. Adam, before the fall, is conceived as a superhuman being; for while he is forbidden to taste of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, the way to immortality is open to him; for it is only after transgressing the Divine command that he merits death and becomes mortal.

The choice of immortal innocence and mortal knowledge lay before him; he elected death with knowledge.

The mythical elements of the Paradise story are still more patent in Ezek 28:13ff, where the fall of the king of Tyre is likened to that of the primeval man. The garden is situated on a holy mountain of Elohim (= God to Ezekiel, but gods in the primitive source), the 'mountain of assembly' of Isa 14:13, high above the stars in the midst of the North. It is a temple, placed on a plain adorned with all manner of precious stones. There man, perfect from the day he was created, resplendent with beauty, excelling in wisdom, walks among the fiery stones, like a cherub with outstretched wings. The cherubs are apparently the attendants of the Deity, beautiful angels, of whom mankind is but the dust hurled from the sanctuary which he had polluted. Some of the angelic attendants of the Deity within are placed in Gen. without, to do service as guardians of the unapproachable holy garden.

As attendants of God, they bear the throne upon which He descends from His high abode. Thus in the description of a theophany in Ps 18:4, as read: "He bowed the heavens also, and came down; And He rode upon a cherub, and did fly; You understood the wings of the wind." (vs 9 and 10).

Hence the Lord, or, as the fuller title goes, the Lord of Hosts, is repeatedly styled "He that sitteth [throned] above the cherubim." (Ps 80:1; 99:1; 1 S 4:4, and elsewhere). There is certainly no trace here of bull figures: bulls do not fly. The underlying conception is, it seems, rather that of the storm cloud. Cf Ps 104:3:

"Who maketh the clouds his chariot; Who walketh upon the wings of the wind..."

The Heb for "chariot" is שְׂמַע, r'khubh, a sort of inverted סָמַע, "to hear." But the function of the cherubim as bearers and movers of the Divine throne is brought out most clearly in the vision of Ezekiel (ch 1, with which ch 10). In ch 1 the prophet designates them as "living creatures" (בָּשָׂמַע; the full form) when bearing God's words addressed to the "man clothed in linen" (10:2) he perceives that the living creatures which he saw in the first vision were cherubim (ver 20); hence in 9:3 the chariots or throne, from which the glory of God went up, is spoken of as a cherub. The following is a description in detail of the cherubim as seen by Ezekiel.

They are represented as four living creatures, each with four faces, man, lion, ox (replaced in the ) ch by cherub), and eagle (10:16; 10:14), having the figure and hands of men (1:5,8), and the feet of calves (ver 7). Each has four wings, two of which are stretched upward (ver 11), meeting above and sustaining the "furniture," the other two are stretched downward, conformable the one to the other, so as to cover their bodies (11:23). In appearance, the living creatures resemble coals of fire (of 10:6 and 8, where the "man clothed in linen" is shown to fill both his hands with coal of fire from between the cherubim), burning like torches, the fire flashing up and down among the creatures, a bright fire out of which lightning goes forth (1:13). Thus the creatures run and vanish as the appearance of a flash of lightning (ver 14). The cherubim do not turn as they change direction, but always go straight forward (1:9,17; 10:11), as do the wheels of the cherubim chariot with rings full of eyes round about it (1:18; 10:12). The "cherub" represent the spirit, or will, in the wheels; as the direction of the spirit, the wheels are lifted up from the bottom and the chariot moves upward (1:19f; 10:16f). The cherubim are thus the moving force of the vehicle.

Ezekiel's cherubim are clearly related to the seraphim in Isaiah's inaugurual vision (Isa 6). Like the cherubim, the seraphim are the attendants on God as He is seated to Seraphim upon a throne high and exalted; they and other also winged creatures: with twain they cover their faces, and with twain they cover their feet, and with twain they fly. Like the Levites in the sanctuary below, they sing a hymn of adoration: "Holy, holy, holy, is Jeh of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory." In the Book of Enoch, the cherubim, or Seraphim, as glory and wailing of the angels of power constitute the "host of God," the guardians of His throne, the singers of praise ascribing blessedness to "the Lord of Spirits," with the archangel Gabriel at their head (see 20:7; 40; 61 10; 71). And so in the Jewish daily liturgy the seraphim, officanir, and "living creatures" constitute the heavenly choir who, the elect ministers of the Living God, ready to do the will of their maker with trembling, intone in sweet harmony the triple "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God, the Almighty, who was and is and who is to come."

In the temple of Solomon, two gigantic cherubic images of olive-wood plated with gold, ten cubits high, standing in the innermost sanctuary (the דבּ'בֵּה תְּרוֹמָה), facing the door, whose wings, five cubits each, extended, two of them meeting in the middle of the room to constitute the throne, while two extended to the walls (1 K 6:23-28; 2 Chr 3:7). These were painted in the veil of the Temple, while two were in the Holy of Holies. Ezekiel represents the inner walls of the temple as carved with alternating palm trees and cherubim, each with two faces, the lion looking on one side, the man on the other.

In the Tabernacle, there were two cherubim of solid gold upon the golden slab of the "lid," or "mercy-seat," facing each other, with wings outstretched above, as to constitute a throne upon which the glory of the Lord appeared, and from which He spake (Ex 25:18-22; 37:7-9; Nu 7:89; He 9:5). There were also cherubim woven into the texture of the inner curtain of the Tabernacle and the veil (Ex 26:131; 36:8,35). There were no cherubim in the temple of Herod, but the walls were painted with figures of them (see Talm Yoma 54a). In the times of Jos no one knew what the Scriptural cherubim looked like (Ant, VIII, iii, 3).

Chesalon, קֶסָלוֹן ( quiere, ke'galon; Χασιλος, Chasalos, Chasalon; Khasalon): One of the cities
on the N. boundary of Judah (Josh 15:10). In the 4th cent. it was a "very large village." It is now Kestil, 2,087 ft. above sea-level, a small village perched on a mountain ridge to the S. of Wady el Humar. See PEF, III, 25, 26; Sh XVII.

CHESEB, kē'sēd, kē'sed (כֵּסֶד, kasādōn; Χήσεβ, Chāsēb): One of the sons of Nahor and Milcah (Gen 22:22); was probably the father of the Casdarn. The early Bab form Kasēd appears in Assyry as Kaldū or Kadū. ETV follows the Assyry and Gr style of writing the name and uses Chaldes or Chaldaeans instead of Casdarn. The Chaldaeans dwelt in the lower valley of the Euphrates, at the head of the Persian Gulf. Abram came from Ur of the Chaldes (Gen 11:28:31; 15:7; Neh 9:7). In Job 1:17 the Casdarn are described as invading the land of Uz, the eldest brother of Chedan (Gen 22:21:22). In the days of Nebuchadrezzar the Casdarn overran Syria and Pal and carried the people of Judah in successive deportations into captivity (2 K 24:1 f.10 ff; 25:1 f). In Dn 2:5 the Casdarn are named with the magicians and astrologers as a learned class, skilled in interpretations. Casdarn is sometimes used in Heb for the land of Chaldes (Ezk 23:15 f; 11:24).

CHESIL, kē'sil, kē'sîl (כֵּסֵיל, kēśîl; A, Xoșeû, Chosēr): A town in the extreme S. of Judah named with Elothod, Hormah and Ziklag (Josh 15:30). The name does not occur again. In Josh 19:13 it is replaced by Bethul (LXX Bath, Bathil), and in 1 Ch 4:30 by Bethuel. "Chaisel" may have arisen from a misreading of the text.

CHESNUT, ches'nut. See CHESNUT.

CHEST (ךֵּת, 'ărōn, יָרָן, g'nāzinim; κβρτός, κβόδος):

(1) The ark of the covenant in OT is invariably denoted by the word 'ărōn, elsewhere rendered AV and RV "chest." See Ark.

(2) 'Ărōn is also the word rendered "coffin" (Gen 50:26: "and he was put in a coffin in E."). See Coffin.

(3) In K and Ch (2 K 12:9:10; 2 Ch 24:8:10, 11) 'ărōn stands uniformly for a money chest. It is the "chest of the Levithods," the priest, placed in the court "beside the altar" and "bored a hole in the lid of" that the priests might "put therein all the money that was brought into the house of Jeh" (2 K 12:9); and "the chest" that King Josiah commanded to be made and set "without at the gate of the house of Neh" to receive "the tax that Moses the servant of God laid upon Israel" (2 Ch 24:8:10.11). One feature is common to the thing meant in all these applications—the c. was rectangular in shape, and, most probably in every instance, made of wood.

(4) Jos (Ant VI, 1.2) uses the equivalent of the word to denote the "coffin" (1 S 6:8 ff EV), or small chest, in which the princes of Philadelphia deposited the gold mice.

(5) In NT times the "chests" that were provided in the court of the women, in the temple of Herod, to receive the various kinds of money gifts had the exceptional shape of a trumpet (if shr'tālom, vi.5 may be trusted)—wide at the bottom and gradually narrowing toward the top, hence called קֵתָלָח, shōphārāzīh. It was into these that the Master was watching the multitude giving in their money when He saw the poor widow cast in her two mites (Mk 12:41:2).

(6) In Ezek 27:24, where the prophet is giving an inventory of the merchandise of Tyre, another word entirely is used (g'nāzinim), and it is rendered in AV and RV "chests" ("chests of rich apparel, bound with cords and made of cedar"). According to Cornill, Davidson, Smend and others this rendering is without sufficient support (see DB and comm. in loc.).

"bringing up") [ARVm], i.e. "chewing the cud," from gē'rā, "to roll," "ruminate"): One of the marks of cleanliness, in the sense of fitness for food, of a quadruped, given in Lev 11:3 and Dt 14:6, is the chewing of the animals considered clean are therefore included the ox, the sheep, the goat, the hart, the gazelle, the roe-buck, the wild goat, the pygarg, the antelope and the chamois. Several of the forbidden animals are expressly named in the passages, e.g. the camel, the rock-badger, the hare and the swine. In addition to the distinctions between clean and unclean animals mentioned in the Bible, the Talm points out that the clean animals have no upper teeth, that their horns are either forked, or if not forked they are clear of splinters, notched with scales and round, and that certain portions of the meat of clean animals bear lengthwise as well as across. Many theories have been advanced as to the reasons for the distinctions with regard to the chewing of the cud and the cloven hoof. See JEV Enc, s.v. "Clean." The most obvious is that ruminating animals and animals without claws were apparently cleaner-feeding animals than the others.

CHICKEN, chik'n, chik'in (אֱלֹהֵם, אָלֹהֵם; Lat. Gallus ferrugineus; ἀλεόσκον, aleokson, macc. and fem.): The barnyard fowl's scientific name is GALLUS domesticus. This record is to be found in the books of the disciples, but Jesus is responsible for the only direct mention of chickens in the Bible. Mt 23:37, contains this: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto her! how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" Luke's version of the same scene says: "Even as a hen gathereth her own brood under her wings" (13:34). There is no reference to chickens in the OT sufficiently clear to specify our common domestic bird. The many references to "fatted fowl" in these older records, in accordance with the text and the history of the other nations, were pigeons, quinweets, ducks, geese and swans. The importation of peafowl by Solomon is mentioned. The cock and hen are distinctive birds and would have been equally a married worth recording had they been introduced at that time. From the history of the bird in other countries it is a safe estimate to place their entrance into Pal between five and six hundred years BC. That would allow sufficient time for them to increase and spread until they would be well known and common enough to be used effectively in the ministry of Jesus Christ. Every historical fact and indication points to the capture and domestication of the red jungle fowl in Burmah. The Chinese records prove that they first secured imported fowl from the West in 1400 BC. Their use for food dated from 800 BC, in the time of Shen Nung, but it was specified that only those that ran wild were to be eaten. From these countries they were imported to Greece and Italy, and from there carried south into Pal. Homer (A 10; cf also alektorn, P 902) names a man Cock, alektorn, which seems to indicate that he knew the bird. Pindar gives them slight mention; Aristophanes wrote of them as "Pars birds," which indicates that they worked their way westward by importation. I cannot find them in the records of Aristotle, but Aristophanes advanced the idea that not the gods, but the birds were rulers of men in ancient times, and compared the comb of the cock with the crown of a king, and pointed out that when he "merely crows at dawn all jump up to their work" (Aesop, 480-90). They were common in Italy in the days of Pliny, who was ten years old at the time of the crucifixion of Christ.

Pliny gave many rules for raising chickens, proving that much was known of their habits in his time. Yet he and such was his saturated with superstition, that mixed with his instructions for preserving eggs, brooding and raising chickens, is the statement that on account of the fighting power of the cocks the lions feared them. He wrote that as in a name it is the thing, the consuls, Lepidus and Catulus, owned a barnyard fowl that spoke. He names Lenius Strabo as the first man to devise a "coupe" to keep fowl in and "cram" them to fatness. He gave the laws governing the use of fowl at public meals, and said that in Egypt eggs were hatched in manure beds, which is conclusive proof that birds had been carried across the Mediterranean several centuries. The records of Babylon, 600 BC, contain figures undoubtedly intended for cocks, and they were reproduced in marble in Lyca at that time. In all these reproductions the birds have the drooping tail of the wild, and there is no record of the date at which they erected the tail, lifted the head and assumed the upright bearing of today.

CHIDE, child: Only in the OT, translating Heb "chide", ῥίβα, a word which is more frequently rendered "strive." Since in Gen 31 30; Jgs 81; Ps 103 9"strive" is a technical term denoting a subdivision of a tribe, ῥίβα is rendered lit. "head," when it occurs in connection with this phrase, so that "chief fathers" (Num 31 26) and "chief of the fathers" (Ex 1 5) become "heads of fathers' houses"; (2) a technical term denoting "prince" in such passages as 1 Ch 5 2; Nu 3 32; and (3) the misinterpretations which brought about the tr "chief" for ῥίβα, "cornern," Isa 41 9, and for ma'ālekh, "ascend," in 2 Ch 32 33, are corrected. In the NT "chief" is in most of its appearances the tr of Gr prībes, "first;" the RV renders "first" for AV "chief," in Acts 7 20-22, Mk 1 14; Acts 16 12. The reading in the latter passage is a difficult one, but the AV "Phileippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia," seems to imply a political authority which Philippi did not possess; RV "chief of the city," Mt 21 14; Acts 14 1. On "chief of Asia" (Acts 19 31 AV) see ASIARCH.

CHIEF MUSICIAN, μα-ζиσθατες. See ASAPH.

CHIEF SEATS, chief στῆς, πρώτοκαθαρία, προ-

tokatharia: It was one of the reproaches urged by Our Lord against the scribes and Pharisees that they loved the chief seats and the great seats in the synagogues (Mt 23 6; Mk 12 39; Lk 11 43; 20 46). These were special seats set in front of the ark containing the Scriptures and of the reader's platform, and facing the congregation. They were specially reserved for those who were held in the highest honor in the congregation. There were seventy-one such seats in the great synagogue of Alexandria, which were occupied by the members of the great Council in that city (see SYNAGOGUE).

CHILD, child, CHILDREN, child'ren (72, bēn, "son," τέκνον, παιδί, παιδεία, παιδίον): The Hebrews regarded the possession of children in family as a mark of Divine favor and greatly to be desired (Gen 15 2; 30 1; 1 S 1 11:20; Ps 127 3; Lk 1 7-28). The birth of a male child was esp. a cause for rejoicing (Ps 128 3, Heb); more men, more defenders for the tribe. If there were no sons born to a household, that family or branch became lost. If the wife proved childless, other solutions of the problem might be adopted to the family (Gen 30 16). Further, each Jewish mother, at least in later times, hoped that her son might prove to be the Messiah. The custom of Levirate marriage, which was not limited to the Heb people, rested on the principle that if a man died childless his brother should marry his widow, the children of such union being considered as belonging to the brother whose name and line were thus preserved from extinction (Dt 25 5; Gen 36 26; Mt 22 24).

Children were sometimes dedicated to God, even before their birth (1 S 1 11). Names often were significant: Moses (Ex 2 10); Samuel (1 S 1 20); Ichabod (4 21; of Gen 30) (see PROPER NAMES). The firstborn son belonged to God (Num 3 44 f). The ceremony of redeeming the firstborn occurred on the thirtieth day. Friends of the family were invited to a feast, the rabbi also being present. The child was placed in the hands of the priest. The father carried some gold or silver in a cup or vessel. The priest asked the mother whether this was her firstborn, and, on being answered in the affirmative, claimed the child as Jehovah's. The father offered the redemption money, which was accepted in exchange for the child. See FIRSTBORN. Other stages in the life of the child were celebrated with fitting ceremonies. In the fourth year, in Pal, on the second day of the Passover occurred the ceremony of the first cutting of the boy's hair, the friends sharing the privilege. Children of the wealthy, the weight of the child in currency was as a sign of the poor. In common with the custom of other eastern peoples, male children were circumcised (Gen 17 12), the rite being performed on the eighth day.

Early education was cared for in the home, the children growing the more or less with the mother (Prov 6 20; 31 1; 2 Tim 1 5; 3 14,15), and the girl continuing with her mother until her marriage. In wealthier families tutors were employed (1 Chr 27 32). Schools for children are first mentioned (Amos 5 25), and the Talm the first school for children was established about 100 BC, but in the time of Jesus such schools were common. Children were taught to read and to write even in families of moderate means, these arts being widely diffused as early as 600 BC, if not earlier (Isa 8 1; 10 19). Great stress was laid on the Torah, i.e. the law of Moses. Boys were trained also in farming, the tending of cattle, and in the trades. Religious training of the boy began his fourth year, and so that he could speak distinctly. The religious life of the girl also began early. In later times at least children took part in the Sabbath and Passover festivals and boys attended synagogue and school regularly.

Children were subject to the father (Neh 5 5 marks the extreme), who in turn was bound to protect them, though he himself had the power of life and death (Lev 18 21; 20 2). Respect for and obedience to parents were stoutly upheld by public opinion (Ex 20 12; Deut 5 16; of Prov 6 20; Mt 19 9; Lk 14 21; Ex 20 12—21) and by the law.

Both the OT and NT afford abundant evidence of the strength of the bond that bound the Heb family together (Gen 21 16; 2 S 18 33; 1 K 3 23 ff.; 2 K 4 19; Isa 8 4; Job 29 5; Mt 19 13; 20 20; Mk 9 24; Lk 2 48; Jn 4 47; He 2 13; 11 23). The gift of a son from Jch was the height of joy; the loss of a child marked the depth of woe. A hint occurs in the custom of naming a man as the father of his firstborn son (HDB, I, 382), or even the use of the father's name as a surname (Bar-jonah, Bartimaeus) and such continues in Syria at the present day. This idea is further instanced in the use, in both OT and NT, of the terms to express the relation between God and men (Ex 22:22; Deut 14:1; 23:6; Jer 3:4; Zec 12 10; Mal 1 6). See also FAMILY RELATIONSHIPS; Sons.

Figurative: Child is the EV rendering of the Gr παιδίον, tekōν. The corresponding Heb words (יוֹן, bēn, and תינן, yeledh, are usually tr. "son") but they have practically the same significance in the fig. use of the term. Child is used fig. to describe:

(1) An affectionate greeting, Jesus addressed the sick of the eye as "child" (Mat 2 5 RVM).

(2) The disciples, or followers, of a teacher. Jesus addressed His disciples as children (Mk 10 24). Paul referred to Timothy as his child (1 Tim 1 2), and also to Onesimus (Philem ver 10). John also designated the disciples whom He wrote as writing a "little child" (1 Jn 2:1; 3 24). The same use of "children" or "sons" is common in the OT (see 1 K 20 35; 2 K 2 3.5.7; 4 38). As a term of special endearment, disciples are sometimes called "little children" (τινες, tekōn).

(3) Jesus addressed His disciples when He was speaking about His departure (15 33). Paul thus addressed the Galatians (Gal 4 19), and that was a favorite expression with John (see 1 Jn 2 1; 4 4; 5 21). A term that was even more endearing was παῖς, which means 'little ones' or 'babes.' Jesus used this term of a child at a donation (Mark 10 16) after His resurrection (21 5), and John also used this term occasionally in saluting those to whom he was writing (1 Jn 2 18).

(3) Those who belong to God. Children of God is a common expression in both the OT and the NT. It is based on the relation between parents and children, and in general describes God's affection for His own, and their dependence upon Him, and moral likeness to Him. The term is sometimes used of those who are disloyal to God, and they are designated as "rebellious children" (see Is 30 1). See CHILDREN OF GOD.

(4) Those who belong to the devil. Those who are like the devil in thought and action are designated "children of the devil" (1 Jn 3 10).

(5) One's relation to something to which he belongs, or by which he is dominated in his affection for it. Thus we have (a) the children of a city or country (see Jer 2 19; Mt 23 37), and this designates those who belong to that particular city or country; (b) children of wisdom (Mt 11 19 AV; Lk 7 35), and these are the ones whose lives are dominated by wisdom. WH adopted ἐργάται for τεκόν in Mt 11 19, but this seems to be without any good reason; (c) children of the covenant (Rom 11 14), and these are the ones who are eager to obey; (d) children of light ( Eph 5 8), and this designates those whose souls are illuminated by the light.

(6) Those who are liable to some particular fate. Thus we have (a) children of cursing, or those who are exposed to cursing (2 Pet 2 14), and (b) children of wrath or those who are exposed to wrath (Eph 2 3).

(7) Moral likeness or spiritual kinship (Gal 3 7 AV; if of Jn 8 39; "the children of Abraham"). See secs. (3), (4).

CHILD-BEARING, child'br-ing: Only in 1 Tim 2 15: "She shall be saved through her (τοῦ "the") child-bearing" (διὰ τῆς τεκονογίας, did τῆς τεκονογίας). The reference is to the calling of woman as wife and mother, as her ordinary lot in life, and to the anxieties, pains and perils of maternity, as the culmination and representation of the penalties woman has incurred because of the Fall (Gen 3 16). "She shall be saved by keeping faithfully and simply to her allotted sphere as wife and mother" (Dum-melow). The preposition διὰ is not used here instrumentally, as though child-bearing were a means of her salvation, but locally, as in 1 Cor 3 15, "saved so as through fire," where life is saved by rushing through the flames. The explanation by reference to the incarnation, with an appeal to Gal 4 4, favored by Elliott and others, seems very mechanical.

CHILDREN OF EDEN, chil' dr̩n of ed'en: In 2 K 19 12; Is 37 12 "the children of Eden that were in Telassar" are mentioned in connection with "Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph" as having been the home of the Assyrians who were before the time of Sennacherib. The expression, "the c. of. E. that were in T.," undoubtedly referred to a tribe which inhabited a region of which Telas-sar was the center. Telassar means "the hill of Asshur" and the "hills" thus are a place that might have been given to any place where a temple had been built to Asshur. Inasmuch as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph were in Mesopotamia; it would seem probable that the "c. of E." that were in T." belonged to the same locality. The "c. of E." is quite probably to be identified with the Bt 'Adoni of the inscriptions and this reference to the children of God on the middle Euphrates. According to the inscriptions Gozan, Haran, Rezeph, and Bt 'Adoni were destroyed by Senachirib's forefathers, and this is in accord with the account in 2 K and Isa.

The "Eeden of the fathers" of Ecclus 27:23 is usually taken as the name of a place in Mesopotamia with which Tyre had commercial relations, and probably belongs to the region of "the c. of E.", discussed above.

Some writers think the "Beth-eden" of Am 1:5 RV "Aven," to be identified with the Bt 'Adoni of the inscriptions and hence with "the c. of E.," but this is doubtful. This was perhaps in Syria in the neighborhood of Damascus.

Children (Sons and Daughters) of God (יַעֲבֹד and דַּעֲבֹד, the former translated "son," and the latter "son of God." They contain the idea of origin or descent, but also that of personal relationship, and is often used metaphorically: "that intimate and reciprocal relationship that unites between men by the bonds of love, friendship, trust, just as between parents and children" (Grüm-Thaiy). This idea, too, conveys the idea of origin, and of personal relationship, but the latter in the fuller form in which it appears as a part of the age. The difference between these terms and teknon appears to be that whereas teknon denotes the natural relationship of child to parent, huios implies in addition to this the recognized status and legal privileges reserved for sons" (Sunday and Headlam, on Rom 8:14). This difference obtains, however, only in a very general sense.

The above phrases denote the relation in which men are conceived to stand to God, either as deriving their being from Him and depending upon Him, or as standing in that personal relation of intimate love and trust toward Him which constitutes the psychological fact of sonship. The exact significance of the expression depends upon the conception of God, and particularly of His Fatherhood, to which it corresponds. It therefore attains to its full significance only in the NT, and its meaning in the OT differs considerably, even though it marks stages of development up to the NT idea.

1. OT Teaching.

The most primitive form of the idea appears in Gen 1:26, where the sons of God by marrying the fair daughters of men become the fathers of the giants. These were a subordinate order of Divine beings or demi-gods, and the title here may mean no more, although it was probably a survival of an earlier idea of the actual descent of these gods from a higher God. The idea of a heavenly court where the sons of God come to present themselves before Jeh is found in quite late lit. (Job 1:6; 21:1; 38:7; Ps 29:1; 89:6). In all these cases the phrase implies that certain kinds of godly men, called sons of God, are principal members of the heavenly court. It is not clear whether these are simply the sons of God by marriage, or the children of godly men who have been chosen to fill this high office. In any case, the phrase indicates that certain kinds of godly men, called sons of God, are principal members of the heavenly court, in much the same way as the idea of the sons of God in Israel, whatever their number, shall be called the "sons of the living God." (Hos 1:10). Jehovah's marriage relations with Israel as a nation individually, and with individual members of the nation, is asserted (cf Ps 128:3). Chastisement and pity alike God deals forth as Father to His children (Dt 1:31; 8:5; Ps 103:13), and these are intimate personal relations which can only obtain between individuals.

A. W. Fortune
In another direction the idea of God as the father of Israel tends to be modified by the inclusion of the Gentiles. It is therefore an inner change, a change of feeling and motive, of ideal and attitude, that may be compared to a new birth (Jn 3.3). Man must turn and return from disobedience and alienation through repentance to childlike submission (Lk 15.19–20). It is not the submission of slaves, but the submission of sons, in which they have liberty and confidence before God (Gal 4.6), and a heritage from Him for their possession (Gal 4.6.7; Rom 8.17). It is the liberty of self-realization. As sons they recognize their kinship with God, and share his mind and purpose, so that they become their pleasure: “For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous” (1 Jn 5.3).

They have boldness and access to God (Eph 2.18; 3.12). With this free union of love with God there comes a sense of power, of independence of circumstances, of mastery over the world, and of the possession of all things necessary which become the heirs of God (Mt 6.26.32; 7.11). “Whosoever is begotten of God overcometh the world” (1 Jn 5.4). They learn that the whole course and destiny of creation is for the “revealing of the sons of God” (Rom 8.19.21).

Christ’s sonship involved His moral harmony with the Father. The Father kept His commandments, and abides in His Son” (Jn 14.10; 8.53).

3. As Moral (Jn 16.10; 8.53). He accomplished Condition, the work which the Father gave Him or Ethical to do (Jn 17.4; 5.19), “becoming the Fact of Him even unto death, even the death of the cross” (Phil 2.8). And sonship makes the same demand upon men. The peacemakers and those who forgive like God are His children (Mt 5.45; Lk 6.35). “For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these [are] sons of God” (Rom 8.14). God will be Father to the holy (2 Cor 6.18). The test and mark of the children of God is that they do righteousness and love the brethren (1 Jn 3.10). They are blameless and harmless, without blemish, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation (Phil 2.15). Therefore their ideal of life is to be "imitators of God" and to walk in love even as Christ did (Eph 5.1). Sonship grows to its consummation when it grows in the likeness of Christ, and the final destiny of all sons is to be ever like Him (1 Jn 3.2).

Sonship is properly and primarily a relation, but it may so dominate and transform the whole of a man’s life, thought and conduct as to become his essential being, the most comprehensive category under which all that he is may be summed up.

4. As State of Being, or Ontological Fact (1) Essence of sonship in Christ.

It is so that the NT comprehends the person of Christ. Everything that He did, He did as God’s son, so that He is the Son, always and over Son. In the beginning, in the bosom of the Father, He is the Only Begotten (q.v.). Son (Jn 1.18). He is born a Son of God (Lk 1.35). He begins life in the things of His Father (Lk 2.49). His whole life is that of the beloved Son (Mt 3.17; 17.5). As Son of God He dies (Mt 26.63; Lk 22.70; Mt 27.40–43; cf. Jn 5.18). In His resurrection He was declared to be the Son of God with power (Rom 1.4); as Jesus the Son of God He is our great high priest in heaven (He 4.14), and in the glory of His father He will come to judge in the last day (Mt 16.27).

(2) Men’s sonship.—Unlike Him, men’s moral sonship is neither eternal nor universal. Are they therefore sons in any sense always and everywhere? All children are heirs of the kingdom of moral harmony with Him. It differs from His experience in one essential fact, at least in most men. It is, as with a woman, a change of attitude, of attitude and consciousness, that may be compared to a new birth (Jn 3.3).
God and objects of the Father's care (Lk 18:16; Mt 18:10). But men may turn away from the Father and become unworthy to be called His sons (1 Jn 20:43). They are turned over to the devil (1 Jn 3:10; Jn 8:44), and children of wrath (Eph 2:3). Then they lose the actuality, but not the potentiality, of sonship. They have not the experience or character of sons, but they are still moral and rational beings made in the image of God, open to the appeal and influence of His love and able to "rise and go to their Father." They are objects of God's love (Jn 15:13; Rom 5:8) and of His gracious search and seeking (Lk 15:4; Jn 11:52). But they are actual sons only when they are led by the Spirit of God (Rom 8:29) and even then their sonship will only be consummated in the resurrection (Rom 8:23; Lk 20:36).

In the relation of father and son, fatherhood is original and creative. That does not necessarily mean:

5. As Relation to God, one of the eternal generation of Christ, or Theological Fact always stood in the relation of Father and Son to one another, is a just interpretation of the NT idea that the Son "was in the beginning with God" (pròs tòn Theòn). But Jesus was conscious of His dependence upon the Father, and His sonship was derived from Him (Jn 5:19-36). Still more certain is it that men derive their sonship from God. He made them for Himself, and whatever in human nature qualifies men to become sons of God is the free gift of God. But men in their sin and disobedience could not come to a knowledge of the Father, had He not "sent forth his Son... that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal 4:4-5): "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God" (1 Jn 3:1); "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son" (v.q.) who gave men "the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name" (Jn 3:16; 1:12). It is not the children of the flesh but the children of the promise who are children of God (Rom 9:4).

The mere act of birth does not constitute men into children of God, but His covenant of free grace must be added. God being essentially Father made men His sons. He sends His Son, sent Him to earth, "for the revealing of the sons of God." But they can only know the Father, and realize their sonship when they respond to His manifestation of fatherly love, by faith in God and obedience to Him.

In the work of grace.—The question whether sonship is natural and universal or conditional upon grace working through faith, does not admit of a categorical answer. The alternatives are not strict antitheses. God does all things as Father. To every man with rational and moral nature capable of his becoming a son was an act of love and grace, but its whole purpose can be communicated only in response to faith in Christ. But a natural sonship which is not actual is meaningless. A man's moral condition and his attitude toward God are the most essential elements of his nature, for a man's nature is just the sum total of his thoughts, acts and states. If these are hostile or indifferent to God, there is nothing left that can have the reality or bear the name of son. For if the word son be used of mere creaturehood and potentiality, that is to give it a meaning entirely different from NT usage. All men by nature are potential sons, because God has made them for sonship and does not make them other than sons. But to call men sons of God is to make them sons of God in a very imperfect and elementary manner. The sharp transitions of Pauline and Johannine theology are rather abstract distinctions for thought than actual descriptions of spiritual processes. But Paul and John also contemplate a growth in sonship, "till we all attain unto the unity of the children of God," the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Eph 4:13). CHILDREN OF ISRAEL, isrî-ä (אֲבִיכֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, bnei yišrâ'î): A very common term in both the OT and the NT, and it refers to the Israelites as the descendants of Abraham, whose name was changed to Israel (see Gen 32:24-32). It is customary to designate the members of the various tribes as the children of the one from whom the tribe originated (see Nu 1:20-45; Ezr 2:3-61), and it was natural that the people who boasted of Israel as their ancestor should be designated as his children. The first reference to the descendants of Jacob is found in the account of the changing of Jacob's name to Israel, and the purpose is to connect them with the experience in Jacob's life which led to the change in his name: "Therefore the children of Israel eat not the sinew of the hip, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: because he touched the hollow of the thigh, that same day his name was called Jacob" (Gen 32:30). It was customary (see Nu 1:20-45; Ezr 2:3-61), and it was natural that the people who boasted of Israel as their ancestor should be designated as his children. After a time, it is quite likely that the term "c. of I." lost its peculiar significance and was simply one of the popular terms designating the inhabitants of Pal, but at first it was intended to connect these people with their ancestor Jacob whose name was changed to Israel. The Jews of the NT times connected themselves with Abraham rather than with Jacob (see see Jn 8:39; Rom 9:7; Selâ, tâkâ, or vâl 'Abâmay, huwa 'Abrahaî).

CHILDREN OF THE EAST, 1st (ים ג'ב, bnî kohehem): A term which in a general way designated the inhabitants of the country E. of Pal. The Hebrews thought of their own country as occupying the central plane, and of the other parts of the world in relation to this. They spoke of the "queen of the south" (Mt 12:42), and of the "king of the south" (Dnl 11:6-8). They spoke of people coming from "the east and the west" and sitting down with the patriarchs (Mt 8:11).

The term "children of the east" seems to have been applied to the inhabitants of any part of the country E. of Pal. It is stated that Jacob, when he fled from Esau, "came to the land of the children of the east" (Gen 32:1), and the place to which he came was Haran in Mesopotamia. In Jer 49:28 the inhabitants of Kedar are called "the children of the east," and in later Jewish lit. Kedar is identified with the Arabs (see Keder). Job was designated as "the greatest of all the children of the east" (Job 1:1), and the land of Uz was mentioned as his home (Job 1:1). While it is impossible absolutely to locate the land of Uz, it must have been on the edge of the desert which was E. of Pal. The Hebrews seem to have been more familiar for their wisdom. It is said that "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east" (1 K 4:30), and "Wise-men from the east" came to Jerus seeking the one that was born king of the Jews (Mt 2:1).

Many of the inhabitants of the east country were regarded as descending from Abraham (see Gen 25:6), and hence they were related to Israel.

CHILEAB, kil'ē-b (צִילֶאָבָה), Δαλουία, Dalouia, “restraint of father”): A son of David, born to him at Hebron. His mother was Abigail, whom David married after the death of her husband Nabal, the Carmelite (2 S 3:3). In the corresponding account (1 Ch 3:1) he is called “Daniel,” the meaning of the name, and the expression “my judge” points to its having been given in order to commemorate God’s judgment upon Nabal (1 S 25:30; cf Gen 30:6). Some suppose that he bore both names, but the LXX reading here Dalouia (1 Ch 3:2) and the identity of the last three letters of the Heb word “Chileab” with the first three of the following word, seems to indicate that the text of Samuel is corrupt.

CHILION, kil'-ion (කිලියන්, kiliyon, “pinning,” “wresting away”): One of the two sons of Elemelech and Naomi, “Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Bethlehem-judah” (Ruth 1:2). With his mother and brother he entered into Moab and there both married Moabite women, Orpah being the name of Chilion’s wife and Ruth that of the wife of Mahlon (4:9-10). Both died early and Orpah remained in Moab while Ruth accompanied Naomi back to Bethlehem. When Boaz married Ruth he “bought all that was left of Mahlon’s and Mahalon’s, of the hand of Naomi” (4:9).

CHILMAD, kil'mad (צִיְלָמַד, kilmad; Κάπτων, Charmós): A city or district mentioned after Sheba and Asshur as supplying merchandise to Tyre (Ezk 27:23). By changing m into w (common in Assyrian) this has been compared with Kādūdha near Baghdad (G. Smith, PSBA, 1, 61; Delitzsch, P., and the latter identification seems improbable. Though regarded as the name of a country in the LXX and the Vulg (Charmos; Chelmad), there is some doubt whether this view of the word is correct. The Tg substitutes Madhai, “Media,” and on this account Mez (Stadt Harren, 24) reminds us of Kol Madhai, “all Media.” The absence of the copula “and” has caused others to further modify the vocalization, and by reading קְרִמְמָד instead of Chilmad, the sense “Assur was as the accumulator of thievish cunning” (Kuhn, E. W. Cassel) is obtained, but is not satisfactory. Probably both text and tr are susceptible of improvement.

CHIMHAM, kim'ham (胼, kinham [2 S 19 37:38] or קִינַמּ, kinham [2 S 19 40] or כִּינָמֹן, kinnamon [Jer 41 17 K t.]): this reading, however, probably can be safely ignored: One of the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, who supported David while the latter was in exile in Mahanaim (2 S 19:37). After the death of Abshalom, Barzillai was invited to spend the remainder of his life with the king; but he refused, and sent his son Chimham in his stead. From the mention of “the habitation of Chimham, which is by Beth-lehem” (Jer 41 17 AV), it has been inferred that Chimham received a grant of land from David’s patrimony at Bethlehem, which it retained for which four years. It has been suggested that his name was probably Ahinoam (אַחְיָנָאָם, ‘akhyn’am).

CHIMNEY, chim'ni. See HOUSE.

CHINNERETH, kin'ē-roth (קינרֶר, knårēth [Dt 3 17; Josh 19 35, etc]) or CHINNEROTH, kin'ē-roth (קינרֶרָה, knârērāh; B, קִנָרְרֶה, Kinnerath, A, קִנָרְרֶה, Chenereth [Josh 11 21]): Taking the order in which the towns are named it seems to have lain N. of Rabbah (Tiberias). It may have occupied the site of el-Mejdel, at the 8 W. corner of the plain of Gennesaret. From this city the sea took its O T name (Nu 34 11, etc).

CHIOS, ki'os, ki'os (Χίος, Chios): An island belonging to Turkey in the Aegean Sea, S. of Lesbos, and very near the mainland of Asia Minor. St. Paul’s vessel passed it on his last voyage to Jerusalem (Acts 27:7). Chios is a picturesque. From St. Luke’s expression, “we came the following day over against Chios,” it has been conjectured that they were becalmed; more probably it simply means that, because of the dark moon, they lay at anchor for the night on the Asian coast opposite the island (HDB, s.v.). Herod, when on his way to Agrippa at the Bosphorus, “continued many days at Chios” and conferred many royal benefactions upon the inhabitants (Jos, Ant, XVI, ii, 2).

The soil is sterile (though well cultivated), the climate mild. Earthquakes are frequent. In the mountains (highest 4,000 ft.) beautiful blue marble with white veins, and excellent potter’s clay, were quarried in ancient times. In the clay quantities of ochre are mined. The chief industry is the culture of the silkworm, the cocoons being sent to Lyons. Oranges, lemons, almonds, brandy, wine, mastich and leather are also exported. The inhabitants, who are almost entirely Greeks, number about 60,000. The capital, Castro, has a population of 15,000. The place where Homer is said to have collected his pupils around him is still pointed out to the traveler at the foot of Mt. Egos, near the coast. Chios is in reality probably a very old sanctuary of Cybele, the Mother of the Gods. The tragic poet Ion, the historian Theopompus and the sophist Theocritus were natives of Chios. The Chians were especially famous for their skill in telling stories, and for their levity. A familiar proverb says that “it is easier to find a green horse than a sober-minded Scot” (Conybeare and Howson, XX, 349).

The oldest inhabitants of the island were Lelges, Cretans and Carians, who were conquered by the Ionians. The latter made Chios one of the most flourishing states in Ionia. When the Persians overran Asia Minor and oppressed the Greek colonies, the Chians showed a Pan-Hellenic spirit. They surrendered, however, to Cyrus the Persian. Nevertheless, 46 years later they joined in the rebellion of Aristagoras against the Persians. In the naval engagement off the island Lade they fought with 100 ships and displayed great bravery. Again they fell into the power of Persia; but after the battle of Mycale (479) the Chians joined the Athenian confederacy. In 412 they sided with the Peloponnesians, in the 10th year of the war which Athens had been waging against Sparta and her allies. For this act of treason the Athenians exiled the island. At the end of the war the Chians revolted from Sparta and, after the battle of Naxos (376), became an ally of Athens once more. Oppressed now by Athens, as she had been by Sparta, Chios made an alliance with Thebes in 363 and defended herself successfully against the Athenian general, Chares; and in 355 Athens was forced to recognize the island’s independence. Later the Chians became friends of the Romans and in the war with Mithridates they were obliged to surrender their ships to the Pontic king and in addition pay him 2,000 talents.

In 1307 AD Turkish pirates subjugated and laid waste the island. The Turks themselves became masters of Chios in 1866. In the war of the Gr revolution the Chians joined the Greeks (Feb. 1821) but were overpowered by the Turks. The Pasha decreed that the island should be utterly devastated. 3,000 Chians were massacred and 47,000 sold into slavery. Only 5,000 escaped. A second attempt to regain their freedom was made in 1827, but with failure. The kingdom of Greece was established two years later. Chios was not included. After 1881, the island was visited by a terrible earthquake, the city of Castro being almost entirely destroyed.

CHIRP, chérp (צֶּרֶפֶּךְ, ṣārāphah). "Chirp" occurs in the AV and RVm of Isa 29 4. "Thy voice shall be as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper [in, "chirp"] out of the dust." The reference is to "the sounds made by wizards and ventriloquists, who imitated the chirping of the bats which was supposed to proceed from the lower world," hence for "peep" of AV in Isa 8 19 we have "chirp"—"wizards, that chirp and that mutter.

Figurative: We have also in Isa 10 14 RV, in a fig. allusion to young birds, "chirped" instead of "peeped." See CHIRP.

CHISLEU, kis'lu, CHISLEV, kis'lev. See Kis-lev.

CHISLON, kis'lon, kiz'lon (קִזְלון, kiqılón, "strength"): A prince of Benjamin, the father of Elidad (Nu 34 21).

CHISLOTH-TABOR, kiz-lot'thá'bor, kiz'loth-. See CHESULOTHE.

CHITTIM, kî'tîm. See KITTIM.

CHIUIN, kî'în: Thus Heb יִכְוֶי, kî'yîn, is transliterated in Am 5 26 AV. The vowels represent an assimilation to some such word as shikkēq, "detestable thing," or gillāl, "idol" (properly "a filthy thing"), in consonance with the well-known habit of the punctuators (of מִלָה, mîlāh, Molech with the vowels of bōshēh, "bile," "shame"). The Syr VS has preserved the correct vocalization; apparently also the Sept, albeit the consonants have suffered corruption (so particularly in the Gr MSS of Acts 7 43). There can be no doubt that we should vocalize יִכְוֶי, kîvōn = the Assyr Kāt(s)awān = Kasmu-an which at least in late Bab Saturn was indicated. The passage in Amoz refers to the Saturn worship which appears to have been in vogue in the prophet's days. The Israelites shall carry with them into exile the images of their gods (render with the m of RV: "Yea, ye shall take up," etc). The received vocalization is as old as Aggila and Sennacherib.

CHIUN, kî'în (Am 5 26 AV): Called in Acts 7 43 "Rephan" (Ῥεπθάν, Rhemphán), the planet Saturn. See ASPICE VEY.

CHLOE, kloē (Χλωή, Chlēh, "a tender shoot"): A woman, presumably a Christian, mentioned only in 1 Cor 1 1. She was a resident either of Corinth or of Ephesus. Paul had been informed by some of her household, probably Christian slaves, of the dissensions in the church at Corinth. Nothing more is known of her.

CHOBAL, ko'ba, CHOBAL, ko'bā (Χοβά, Chobá, Jth I 4 4; Xeβα, Xobā, 16 4): A place named along with Jericho, Arreta, and the valley of Salem (Jth 4 4; 15 4). Reland's (Pal, 721) suggestion of Chobsis, which the Peutinger Tables give as 12 Rom miles from Scythopolis, seems probable. It may be identical with el-Mekhubby, about 11 miles from Beisan (Scythopolis), and 3 miles from Tubbah.

CHOENIX, kě'niks (Χιήνηξ, chònix): A Gr dry measure, almost equal to one quart. Mentioned in the NT only in Rev 6 6, where RV would read "choenix" instead of the indefinite "measure." The ver is then obviously a threat of famine.

CHOICE, chois. See CHOOSE; WILL.

CHOK, chōk (πνεῦμα, pnē̂mā, and its compounds): Is used in its primary sense of "to strange," or "to suffocate," in describing the fate of the swine (Lk 8 35 AV). The RV has "drowned," but "choaked" is the correct rendering of the Gr word.

Figurative: It is used in the sense of "to strange," "smother," "suffocate," as if by depriving of breath, in describing the fate of the young grain growing in the midst of thorns (Mt 13 7). The RV is correct. The little farther out the word way, planted in the heart, is overcome by the care of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches (Mt 13 22).

A. W. FORTUNE

CHOLA, ko'la (Χωλά, Chòla; AV Cola): This name occurs only with that of Chobai (see CHOBA) in Jth 16 4. It may be identical with the modern Kā'tun, between el-Mekhubby and Beisan.

CHOLER, kol'fer: Lit. "bile," is used in the sense of a disease (τοῖχεα, cholēa) (Sir 31 20; 37 30), and in the sense of bitter anger (τίγρα, mārār) (Dan 8 7; 11 11 EV, ARV "anger").

CHOOSE, choōz, CHOSEN, chō'z'n (בְּקָרוּ, bēkāro, בֻּקָר, būkār; κλήσω, oklēsō): I. IN THE OT—For bēkār and its derivatives: men choosing wives (Gen 6 2); Lot choosing the cities of the Plain (Gen 13 11); often of kings and generals choosing soldiers for their prowess (e.g. Ex 17 9; Josh 8 3; 11 13 2; 2 10 9; 17 1). The word bēkār is often used for "young men," as being choice, in the prime of manhood. The most important use of bēkār are those: of Israel choosing a king (1 S 8 19; 12 13); of moral and religious choice: choosing Jeh as God (Josh 24 15 22), or other gods (Isa 5 8; 10 14); the way of truth (Ps 119 30); to refuse the evil and choose the good (Isa 7 15 6); of a man as God's choice on the side of God and Israel. The leading idea is that of God choosing Moses as leader (Nu 16 5 7; 17 5); the Levites to the priesthood (1 S 2 28; 2 Ch 29 11); Saul as king (1 S 10 24), David (2 S 6 21; 1 K 11 34), Solomon (1 Ch 28 5). All this follows from the theocratic idea that God rules personally over Israel as His peculiar people, but still secondary, idea is that of Jeh choosing Jesus as the place of His habitation and worship (Dt 12 5); and 20 other times, Josh 27 1; K 8 44:8; Ps 132 13; Zec 1 17; 2 12; 3 2). This was the ruling idea of Josiah's reformation which was instrumental in putting down polytheistic ideas and idolatrous practices in Israel, and was therefore an important factor in the development of Heb monotheism; but it was an idea that Heb monotheism had to transcend and work out to its full growth. "The hour cometh, when neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father" (Jn 4 21).

But the fundamental idea of choosing, which governs all others in the OT, is that of God choosing Israel to be His peculiar people. He chose Abraham, and made a covenant with him, to give him the land of Canaan (Neh 9 7 ff): "For thou art a holy people unto Jeh thy God: Jeh thy God hath chosen thee to be a people for his own possession, above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth." (Dt 7 6-8). Historically this idea originated in the old conception of Jeh as the tribal God of Israel, bound to her by natural and indissoluble ties (see God). But as their conception of Jeh became more moral, and the idea of His righteousness predominated, it was recognized that there was no natural and necessary relation and harmony between Israel and Jeh that accounted for the favor of a righteous God toward her, for Israel was no better than her neighbors (Am 2 7). Why then was Jeh Israel's God, and Israel His people? It was by an act of free choice and sovereign grace on God's part. "You only have I known of all the families of the earth" (Am 3 2). In this the relation is described under the figure of a marriage tie. Jeh is Israel's husband: and to realize the force of the figure, it is necessary to recall what ancient and oriental marriage customs were. Choice and favor were almost entirely made by the husband. The idea of the covenant which Jeh out of His free grace made with Israel comes to the forefront in Dt and Jer. Because He loved her, and for no other reason, He has chosen Israel to be His peculiar people. In Isa 40-66 the idea is carried farther still. The sovereign grace of Israel rests ultimately on His absolute sovereignty: "O Jacob my servant, and Israel, whom I have chosen: thus saith Jeh that made thee, and formed thee from the womb!" (44 1:2; cf Isa 29 16; Jer 18 6; Isa 64 8). For Israel's deliverance Cyrus and his world-empire are in Jeh's hands as clay in the potter's hands (Isa 66 9-10). (2) "Israel is elect for the sake of mankind." This is the moral interpretation of a choice which otherwise appears arbitrary and irrational. God's purpose and call of salvation are unto all mankind. "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." (Isa 45 6). And Israel is His servant, chosen, the messenger He sends, "to bring forth justice to the Gentiles" (Isa 42 19). 3. God Chooses Jerusalem (Jor Israel choosing Free Grace 5), 17; Cor (Jeh Choosing God's choice of evils (1 Ch 21 11), and the covenant, and worth of the choice. God has chosen her, not for any merit in her, but of His free grace, and according to His purpose of salvation, but if Israel fails to respond by faithful conduct, fitting her to be His servant and messenger, He may cease to treat her as His chosen one of her as proves unworthy. See Oehler, OT Theol., I, 256 ff, 287 f.

Three other Heb words expressing choice in minor matters are: ἱσοθά, for David's choice of evils (1 Ch 21 11); ἀνακλητικός, to select singers and porters for the temple (1 Ch 9 22; 16 41); ἀνακλητικός, to choose a man to represent Israel against Goliath (1 S 17 8).

II. In the NT—The whole conception of God, of His relation to Israel, and of His action in history indicated above, constituted the religious heritage of Jesus Christ and His Meanings discipline. The national consciousness of the Jews was so considerable an extent, given place to that of the individual saving and salvation extended beyond the present life into a state of blessedness in a future world. But the central ideas remain, and are only modified in the NT in so far as Jesus Christ becomes the Mediator and Agent of God's sovereign grace. "Ekklēsia" and its derivatives are the words that generally express the idea in the NT. They are used (1) of the general idea of selecting one out of many (Lk 14 7); (2) of choosing man for a particular purpose of the church: choosing the seven (Acts 6 5); of the choice of delegates from the Council of Jews (Acts 15 22 25; cf 2 Cor 8 19), cheirbōtelē; choose by vote (RV "appoint") (cf Acts 10 41), procheirrōtelē; (3) of moral choice (Mt 13 20); "Mary hath chosen the good part" (Lk 10 42); (4) of Christ as the chosen Messiah of God (Lk 23 35; 1 Pet 2 4 AV); (5) of Christ choosing His apostles (Lk 6 13; Jn 6 70; 13 18; 15 16 19; Acts 1 2 24); Paul (Acts 19 5; cf 22 14 AV), choosing the church from the world; (6) of God (a) choosing Israel (Acts 13 17; cf Rom 9 11), (b) choosing the Christian church as the new Israel (1 Pet 2 9 AV), (c) choosing the members of the Church from the whole world. (d) choosing to be weak and despised (1 Cor 27 27), (d) choosing into His favor and salvation a few out of many: "Many are called, but few are chosen" (Mt 20 16 [omitted in RV]; 22 14); God shortens the days of the destruction of Jer, "for the elect's sake, whom he chose" (Mk 13 20).

In Eph 1 4-6 every phrase tells a different phase of the conception: (1) God chose (and foreordained) the saints in Christ before the foundation of the world; (2) according to the good pleasure of His will; (3) unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ unto Himself; (4) to be holy and without blemish before Him in love; (5) to the praise of the glory of His grace; (6) which He freely bestowed on them in the Beloved. And in Rev 17 4, the triumphant church in heaven is described as "called and chosen and faithful." God's sovereign choice governs the experience and testing of the saints at every point in life. This is the Free Grace 17 14).

Thus in the NT as in the OT (1) God's covenant of grace is free and unconditional. It is unto all men, now as individuals rather than nations, and without distinction of race or class. It is no less free and sovereign, because it is a father’s grace. (2) Israel is still a chosen race for a special purpose. (3) The church and the saints that constitute it are chosen to the full experience and privileges of sonship. (4) God’s purpose of grace is fully revealed and realized through Jesus Christ.

This doctrine raises certain theological and metaphysical difficulties that have never yet been satisfactorily solved. (1) How can 3. Ultimate God be free if all His acts are pre-Antinomies ordained from eternity? This is an antimony which indeed lies at the root of all personality. It is the presence of the idea of personality that a person should freely determine himself and yet act in conformity with his own character. Every person in practice and experience solves this antimony continually, though he may have no intellectual category that can coordinate these two apparently contradictory principles in all personality. (2) How can God be just, if a few are chosen and many are left? And (3) How can man be free if his moral character proceeds out of God’s sovereign grace? It is certain that if God chose all or left all He would be neither just nor gracious, nor would man have any vestige of freedom. The doctrine describes accurately (a) the moral fact, that some accept salvation and others reject it; (b) the religious fact that God’s sovereign and unconditional love is the beginning and cause Corre- responds to; of salvation. The meeting-point of Experience the action of grace, and of man’s liberty as a moral and responsible being, it does not define. Nor has the category as yet been dis- covered wherewith to construe and coordinate these two facts of religious experience together, although it is a fact known in every Christian experience that where God is most sovereign, man is most free.

Chorazin, kôr-az’in (Χωραζίν, Chorazín, Mt 11 21; Ἡωραζίν, Chorazín, Lk 10 13; WH Ἡω- ραζίν, Chorazín); A city whose name appears only in the woe pronounced against it by Christ (Mt 11 21; Lk 10 13). Its appearance there, however, shows that it must have been a place of some importance, and highly privileged by the ministry of Jesus. It was already deserted in the time of Eusebius, who places it 2 miles from Capernaum (Onom, s.v.). We can hardly doubt that it is represented by the extensive ruins of Keräzeh, on the heights to the north of Tell Hâm. It is utterly desolate: a few carved stones being seen among the heaps. There are traces of a Rom road which connected the ancient city with the great highway between north and south which touched the lake shore at Khâh Mînîgheh.

Chorbé, kôr-bé (Χορβή, Chorbé; AV Corbea): Head of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 12). The name apparently corresponds to Zaccai in Ezr 2 9 and Neh 7 14.

Chosamaeus, kos-ô-ma’us (ΑΆκίος Χοσάμα- αως, Simon Chosamassos; B, Χοσάμαως, Chosama- oes): Occurs in 1 Esd 9 32 as the name of one of the sons of Amas. But in the | passage (Esr 10 31) the name is simply Shimeon, followed by “Benjamin, Malchus, Shemarish,” which are omitted in 1 Esd. The LXX of Ezr 2 (Sequâr, Sequan) is followed by the three omitted names. The difference may have arisen from a mistake of a copyist, or from the use of an imperfect MS.

Christian, the Exaltation, egz-ôl-tâ’shun, of:

I. The Resurrection
1. Its Glorification of Christ
2. Resurrection Body—Identity, Change, Present Locality
3. The Agent of the Resurrection

II. Ascension of Our Lord
1. Its Reality
2. Its Essential Necessity

III. Exaltation to the Right Hand of God
1. Its Subject
2. Its Essential Necessity

IV. The Second Advent
1. Reality
2. Judgment

This term is given to that condition of blessedness, glory and dominion into which Our Lord entered after the completion of His earthly career of humiliation and suffering, and which is to be regarded as the reward of His meritorious obedience, and the issue of His victorious struggle, and at the same time the means of His prosecution and completion of His work as Redeemer and Saviour of the world. The classic passage of Scripture, rich in suggestion, and the source of much controversy in the development of Christian theology, is Phil 2 5–11. The word “exalted” or of ver 9, ἐνθronoς, ἐξανθρωπ- σσος, occurs only in this place in the NT and, like its Lat representative, is limited to ecclesiastical use. Cf Rom 14 9; Eph 1 19–23; 1 Pet 3 21–22.

Christ’s exaltation includes His Resurrection, Ascension, Session at the right hand of God, and Advent as Judge and Consumator of the world’s redemption.

I. The Resurrection.--The historic place and validity of this event will be found under other heads; our concern is with the event 1. Its Glor-i as it relates to the glorification of Our Lord. (1) It revealed His power over death. (2) It confirms all His claims to Divine Sonship (3) It attests His acceptance and that of His work by God. (4) It crowns the process of the redemption of the world. (5) It forms the beginning of that new creation which is life eternal, and over which death can have no power. (6) It is the entrance of the Son of God into the power and glory of the New Kingdom, or the restored Kingdom of the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe. The following Scriptures among many others may be consulted: Rev 1 18; Acts 2 24; Rom 1 4; 1 Cor 15 20; Jn 5 25; Rom 4 25; Rom 6 45; Col 2 12; Phil 3 10; Rom 6 9.

An interesting and important question arises in connection with Christ’s exaltation, relating to the nature of the body of the risen Lord.

2. Christ’s.--It was clearly identical with that of Resurrection—His natural life. It was recognized as the Body by the marks which were upon it: Lk 24 39–40; Jn 20 24–29. It received food: Lk 24 43 (cf 24 30); Jn 21 12–19;

ACTS 10:41). Nevertheless it was changed. After the resurrection it was not at once recognized: Jn 20:15; 21:7; Lk 24:31. It appears under apparently new conditions of relation to material substance: Jn 20:19; Lk 24:36. It suddenly became visible, and as suddenly vanished. These facts suggest what reverently may be surmised as to the eons of condition as to its eons of condition as to its eons of condition as to its eons of condition as to its eons of condition as to its eons of condition as to the resurrection-body of the redeemed furnished in some hints: 1 Cor 15:35-49; Eph 3:21. We may cautiously, from the history of the resurrection and the Pauline doctrine, conclude, that our Lord still possesses human body. It is of material substance, with new properties. It occupies space. It was seen by Paul, by Stephen, by the seer of the Apocalypse. It is glorious, incorruptible, spiritual.

By whom was the resurrection effected? It is referred by some Scriptures to God. See Ps 18:10 (of Acts 2:27-31); and the distinct affirmation by Peter (Acts 2:32). Paul declares that Christ was “raised... through the glory of the Father” (Rom 6:4). In Eph 1:19-20, it was the mighty power of God which was wrought in Christ “when he raised him from the dead.” Elsewhere it is ascribed to Christ Himself. He declared: “Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up” (Jn 2:19). “I lay down my life, that I may take it again” (Jn 10:17-18). Our Lord declares: “I lay down my life, that I might take it again” (Jn 10:17-18). Our Lord declares: “I lay down my life, that I may take it again.” The efficient agent is said, according to the generally accepted reading of Rom 8:2, to have been the Spirit of God, and thus the resurrection is referred to each person of the Godhead. The doctrine of the Lutheran church refers the act to the human power of the Lord Himself, which by incarnation had been endowed with attributes of Deity. This view is consistent with the teaching of the omnipresence of the body of Jesus (see below on the section “Ascension”).

II. The Ascension of Our Lord.—The exaltation of Christ consisted further in His ascension. Some have held that the resurrection and ascension of Jesus ought to be regarded as aspects of the same event. But Mary saw the risen Lord, though she was forbidden to touch Him, for “I am not yet ascended unto my Father, but go to prepare a place and say to them, I ascend,” etc (Jn 20:17). This, compared with the invitation to Thomas to touch Him, eight days later, suggests something in the ascension added to that which the resurrection implied, and of which thought in the church was consistently regarded the latter as a further step in the exaltation of the Lord. The fact of ascension is recorded in Mk 16:19, and Lk 24:50,51, and much greater detail in Acts 1:9-11. According to these accounts, the ascension was seen by the disciples, and this suggests that heaven is a locality, where are the angels, who are not ubiquitous, and where Christ’s disciples will find the place which He declared He was going to prepare for them (Jn 14:2). Heaven is also undoubtedly referred to as a state (Eph 2:6; Phil 3:20), but Christ’s body must be in some place, and where He is, there is Heaven.

This is certainly the doctrine of the church in general, and seems to be consistent with the Scriptural teaching. But the Lutherans have maintained that the ascension of the Lord merely involved a change in the human body of Christ. He possessed during His life on earth the Divine attributes of omnipresence, omnipotence and omniscience, but He voluntarily abstained from their exercise. But at His ascension He returned to the full use of these powers. The ascension is Christ’s return to immortality. The community of natures which these Divine qualities possess at the ascension of Jesus, which Luther declared involved its ubiquity, and that as He was at the right hand of God, and God was everywhere; so Christ in His human personality was in no specific place but everywhere. This omnipresence is not of the infinite extension of the body of the Lord, but He is present as God is everywhere present in knowledge and power.

Another theory of the ascended humanity of the Lord depends upon the conception of the Son of God as taking aside the “existence-form of God,” and while affording that Christ’s body is now in a definite place, it proceeds to hold that at the ascension the accidental and variable qualities of humanity were laid aside, and that He dwells in heaven as a glorified man. Ebrard says: “He has laid aside forever the existence form of God, and assumed that of man in perpetuity, in which form by His Spirit He governs the church and the world. He is thus dynamically present to all His people.” This form of doctrine seems to involve as the result of the incarnation of the Son of God His complete and sole humanity. He is no more than a man. His ascension is not His resurrection, for the ascension did not involve the reasumption of the “existence-form of God,” Christ in glory is only a glorified man.

The ascension was necessary, in conformity with the spiritual nature of the kingdom which Christ founded. Its life is that of faith, not sight. A perpetual life of even Necessity was the resurrected Christ on earth would have been wholly inconsistent with the spiritual nature of the new order. The return of Christ to the special presence of God was also part of His high-priestly service (see CHURCH, OFFICES OF) and His corporal absence from His people was the condition of that gift of the Spirit by which salvation was to be secured to all believers and promulgated throughout the world, as declared by Himself (Jn 16:7). Finally, the ascension was that physical departure of the Lord to the place which He was to prepare for His people (Jn 14:1-3). The resurrection was that of the individual, the objective conditions of redemption. The ascension was the initial step in the carrying out of redemptive work in the final salvation of mankind.

III. Exaltation Complete: Right Hand of God.—The term “the right hand of God” is Scriptural (Acts 7:55-56; Rom 8:34; 1. Its Scriptural basis is in Eph 1:20; He 1:3; 10:12; 12:2; Significance 1 Pet 3:22) and expresses the final step in the Lord’s exaltation. Care must be taken in the use of the expression. It is a figure to express the association of Christ with God in glory and power. It must not be employed as by Luther to denote the relation of the body of Christ to space, neither must it be limited to the Divine nature of the Logos reinstated in the conditions laid aside in incarnation. Christ thus glorified is the God-man, theanthropic person, Divine and human. This exaltation is based upon the essential glory of the Son of God, who “being without sin, and so bright and shining, and having passed through death unto glory.”

2. Its Es- It is the claim which the Lord makes for Himself in His prayer (Jn 17:4,5), and is thus declared of Christ (He 1:3 AV, “God highly exalted Him.” But in His glory Christ received the power universal and Divine. In Eph 1:20–22 His supreme dignity and power are affirmed "far above . . . every name," "all things . . . under His feet" (of Heb 2:8; 1 Cor 15:27; 1 Pet 3:22). Christ, He who will come at the end of the age (Mt 24:30), is the highly suggestive picture of His universal dominion asserted by Himself (Mt 28:18): "All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth." It is vain to speculate upon the relation of Christ's nature in this exalted state. We cannot distinguish between the human and Divine. We can only believe in, and trust and submit to the One Glorified Person who thus administers the kingdom in perfect harmony with its Divine laws in all the ages, and His own revelation of the will of God given to man in His own earthly career: pitiful, tender, serving, helping, restoring, saving, triumphant. The exaltation is for His mediatorial and finally saving work. He is the Head of His church; He is the Lord of angels and men; He is the Master of the ages.

IV. The Second Advent.—The exaltation of Christ is to be completed by His coming again at the close of the dispensation, to complete His redemptive work and judge the world, and so establish the final Kingdom of God. This belief has found a place in all the ecumenical symbols. Theology has ever included it in its eschatology. It is clear that the apostles and the early church expected the second coming of the incarnate God in an immediate event, the significance of which, and especially the effect of the nonfulfilment of which expectation, does not fall within the province of this article to consider. The various theories of the Parousia, the different ideas as to its place and form, etc., in the second Advent, do not concern its relation to the exaltation of the Lord. Whenever and however He may return; whether He is ever coming to the church and to the world, His visible or His spiritual presence or activity do not affect the fact that He has been exalted to the position of ultimate Lord and final judge of men. We may therefore define this crowning condition of exaltation as:

(1) An advent, real, personal and visible. We must guard against the extremes of limiting this advent on the one side to a final and reverent silence as to the unrevealed is a becoming attitude for the believer, we are sure that He will come, and He will come in a glorified Word incarnate, and it will be the judgment of a wisdom and justice and love that will be the complete glory of the Christ. LITERATURE

This term has been used by theologians to describe the various characters of Our Lord's redemptive work. Many appellative and general metaphorical titles are found in Titles of Scripture for Christ, designative of Our Lord His Divine and human natures and His work: God (Jn 20:28); Lord (Mt 22:43; 44); Word (Jn 1:14); Son of God (Mt 3:17; Lk 3:22; Col 1:15); Firstborn from the dead (Col 1:18); Beginning of the Creation of God (Rev 3:14); Image of God (2 Cor 4:4); Express Image of His Person (He 1:3); Alpha and Omega (Rev 1:8; 22:13); Son of God (Mt 3:28; Jn 1:51; Acts 7:36); Son of David (Mt 9:27; 21:9); Last Adam (1 Cor 15:45,47); Captain of Salvation (He 2:10 m.); Saviour (Lk 2:11; Jn 4:42; Acts 5:31); Redeemer (lsa 59:20; Tit 2:14); Author and Perfecter of Faith (He 12:2); Light of the World (Jn 8:12); Lamb of God (Jn 1:29); Creator of all things (Jn 1:3:10); Mediator (1 Tim 2:5); Prophet (De 18:15; Lk 24:19); Great High Priest (He 4:14); King (Lk 1:36; Rev 17:14; 19:16); Way, Truth and Life (Jn 14:6); These and many others express the mediatorial office of the Lord. As mediator, He stands between God and Man, revealing the Father to man, and expressing the true relation of man to God. The term (Gr μετάρρηξις, metàrkhēsis), moreover, signifies messenger, interpreter, advocate, surety or pledge in Gal 3:19,20, where a covenant is declared to be assured by the hand of one who intervenes. Thus the covenant is confirmed and fulfilled by Him who secures that its stipulations should be carried out, and harmony is restored where before there had been difference and separation (1 Tim 2:5; He 8:6; 9:15; 12:24). Thus is expressed the purpose of God to redeem mankind by mediation.
I. Christ's Mediation Expressed in the Specific Offices.—In presenting a systematic idea of this Redemptive Work of Christ by Mediation, Christian thought gave to it a harmonious character by choosing the most general and familiar titles of the Lord and the mediator, we cannot but the Office of the Chief mode of Redemption. These were prophetic, priestly and regal.

The first trace of this division is found in Esseb. HE, 1, 3, and his Demonstratio Evangelii, IV, 15. It was accepted by the entire body of the Church, and continues to be used by Russian ecclesiastical writers. The Theory Rom church has not so generally followed it, though it is found in the writings of many Rom theologians. The earlier reformers, especially Luther, I ignored it. But Gerhard employed it and the Lutheran theologians followed his example, although some of these repudiated it, as Ernesti, Doderlein and Knapp. Calvin employed the division in his Institutes, II, 15. It was incorporated in the Heidelberg Catechism and has been adopted by most theologians of the Reformed church and by Eng. and American divines. In Germany most theological writers, such as De Wette, Marburger, Tholuck, Schleiermacher, adopt it, affirming it as expressive of the essential quality of the work of redemption, and the most complete presentation of its contentl. The justification of this position is found in the important place occupied in the progress of redemption by those to whom were intrusted the duties of teaching and leading men in relation to God in the offices of prophet, priest and king. Even the modern development of Christian thought which extends the view of Divine dispensation to man over the entire history of the world's life and the unfolding of the will of God in the purposes of human salvation, cannot discover any better form of expressing Christ's relation to man than in terms of the prophetic, the priestly and the governmental offices. The prophet is the instrument of teaching: the priest expresses the ethical relation of man to God; while the king furnishes the typical form of that exercise of sovereign authority in the history of the Church and the State, which concerns the practical life of the race.

II. The Threefold Office as Presented in the OT.—From the close relation which Jesus in both His person and work bore to the OT dispensation, and from the parallel between the prophetic and the priestly offices, it is evident that a threefold disposition of prophetic, priestly and regal was the characteristic and peculiar office of the whole OT dispensation. The early patriarchal period especially may be said to have been exercised in the persons and duties of the prophet, priest and king. The early patriarchs contained in themselves the threefold dignity, and discharged the threefold duty. As the family became tribal, and the tribe national, these duties were divided. The order of the household was lost for a while in the chaos of the larger and less homogeneous society. The domestic altar was multiplied in many "high places." Professional interpreters of more or less religious value began to be engaged in the prophetic. The leadership of the people was occasionally ephemeral and uncertain. But the men of Divine calling appeared from time to time; the foundation work of Moses was built on it; the regular order of the worship of Jehovah, notwithstanding many lapses, steadily prevailed. Samuel gave dignity to his post as judge, and he again held the open vision of the Lord; he offered the appointed sacrifices; he established the kingly office; and although he was not permitted to see the family of David crowned on the throne, he predicted the promised land of a Divinely appointed kingdom. With the accession of the House of David, the three offices of God's service were completely developed. The king was seated on the throne, the priest was ministering at the altar, and the prophet with the Divine message was ever at hand to teach, to guide and to rebuke.

Notwithstanding this growth of the special institutions—prophet, priest and king—the religious and national condition was by no means satisfactory. The kingdom was divided; external foes threatened the existence of the nation; idolatry was not extinguished, and the prophets who were true to Jehovah were compelled to warn and rebuke the sins of the rulers and the people, and even to testify against the priests for their unfaithfulness to the truth and purity of the religion which they professed. The OT church and the Divine promises seem thus to be contradicted by the constant failure of the people to realize their best ideals. Hence slowly arose a vague expectation of reform. The idea of the better condition which was coming grew more distinct, and settled down at length to Israel's Messianic hope, expressed in various forms, finally converging to the looking for of one who should in some mysterious way gather into himself the ideas which belonged especially to the three dispensations of religious history.

III. The Prophet.—In this art. we are concerned only with the offices as they tend to their fulfillment in Christ. For the more general treatment of each office, reference must be made to the special arts.

The first appearance of the idea of the special prophet of Jehovah is in Dt 18. 15. Moses had been sent by the people to hear the Lord's words on their behalf (Ex 20:19; Deut. 18:15). The later passage of Dt 18:15-22 is connected with the prophecy of a prophet, while at the same time reference is made to the general fact of prophecy and the conditions of its ascendency. From this passage we may draw the germ of the expectation of the prophet, which occupied so large a place in the mind of Israel. In the act of the people sending Moses to receive the word, and Jehu's promise to send a prophet whom they would accept, we see also the suggestion of a distinction between the first dispensation and the latter. The Divine promise was to the effect that what was given by Moses would be consummated in a prophetic revelation through a person. The conception of this prophecy is found in the second half of Isa (40:6-66). Isaiah's mission was vain, Isa 49:4, but the coming one shall prevail, 49:5-63 (passim). But the success of this servant of Jehovah was not to be only as a prophet, but by taking on himself the penalty of sin (53:4), and by being made an offering for sin; and as Mighty Victor triumphing over all foes (53:10-12), the dignities of whose kingship are set forth in various parts of the prophetic writings. Thus the general effect of the course of the earlier revelation may be summed up in this prophetic hope of a prophet which has been combined a priestly and a royal character. It was an ever-advancing manifestation of the nature and will of God, delivered by inspired men who spake at sundry times and in divers manners, but whose message was perfected and extended.

by Jesus Christ (He 1:1), who thus became the Prophet of the Lord.

IV. Christ, the Prophet.—Christ’s ministry illustrates the prophetic office in the most extensive and exalted sense of the term. He was designed and anointed to be the Prophet of God (Lk 4:16-19; Mt 17:5). In 1 Cor 1:30, Christ is declared to be made to us wisdom. His intimate knowledge of God (Jn 1:18; Mt 11:27; Jn 16:15), the qualifications of His teaching dependent upon His nature, both Divine and human (Jn 3:34); His authority (Jn 1:19; 4:17-18; Lk 4:18-21); His knowledge of God (Mk 12:29; Jn 4:24; Mt 11:25; Jn 17:25; Mt 13:35)—these all peculiarly fitted Christ to be the Revealor of God. Besides His doctrine of God, His ministry included the truth concerning Himself. His nature, claims, mission, the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and the religious life of man. He taught as none other the foundation of religion, the facts on which it was based, the essence of Divine service, the nature of sin, the grace of God, the means of attainment, the laws of the kingdom of God and the future state. By the acknowledgment of even those who have denied His Divine nature and redeemptive work, He has been recognized as the Supernatural Power of the world. It is He, who claims to be the Prophet, is seen in that He is the source of the everlasting revelation of the eternal. His own words and works He declared were only part of the fuller knowledge which would be furnished by the system which He established on earth (Mt 16:15; Lk 24:45; Jn 12:16; 14:26; 15:24; 16:12.13.14).

How remarkable was His method of teaching! Parable, proverb, absolute affirmation, suggestion, allusion to simple objects, practical life habits, many methods were used in His teaching.

1. Christ’s Ministry was well understood, living; sometimes Teaching His action was His word—and all with a commanding dignity and gracious winsomeness, that was felt by His hearers and has ever been recognized (Mt 7:29). So perfect and exalted was the teaching of Jesus that many have supposed that revelation ceased with Him, and the immediate followers whom He especially inspired to be His witnesses and interpreters. Certainly in the prophecy culminating in Christ.

An important aspect of Christ’s prophetic office is that of His relation to the church as the source, through the instrumentality of His Church in the Gospels, as well as in the Church itself.

2. Christ as Spirit, of ever-enlarging knowledge of the Church, to gain. This is the real significance of the claim which some churches make to be the custodians and interpreters of the tradition of faith, with which has also gone the theory of development—not as a human act but as a ministration of the Lord through His Spirit, which is granted to the church. Even those who hold that all Divine truth is to be found in the sacred Scriptures have yet maintained that God has much truth still to bring out of His word by the leading and direction of the Spirit of Jesus. The Scripture itself declares that Christ was the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world (Jn 1:9). He Himself promised that the Spirit which He would give would guide His followers into all truth (Jn 16:13). The apostles claimed to receive their teaching and direction of the church from the Lord (1 Cor 11:23). The testimony of Jesus is definitely declared to be the spirit of prophecy (Rev 19:10). Indeed, almost the whole of the New Testament every living church affirms that what they teach is received from the Spirit, who is the Spirit of the Lord.

V. The Priesthood of Christ.—For the history of the development of the priesthood of Israel on which Our Lord’s High-Priesthood is ideally based, reference must be made to the art. esp. dealing with that subject. The bearings of that institution upon the work of Jesus as Redeemer alone fall under this section. Judaism as a religion developed an extensive system of priestly service. As the moral teaching of its people became more distinct, the original simplicity of sacrifice, especially as a commensal act, in which the unity of the celebrants with each other and with God was expressed, was expanded into acts regularly performed by officers in which worship, thanksgiving, covenant and priestly expiation and atonement were clearly and definitely expressed. The progress of sacrifice may be seen in the history of the OT from Cain and Abel’s (Gen 4:3-4), Noah’s (Gen 8:20), Abraham’s covenant (Gen 15:9-18) etc. to the elaborate services of the Mosaic ritual set forth in Lev, the full development of which is found only in the later days of Israel. When Christ appeared, the entire sacedral system had become incorporated in the mind, customs and language of the people. They had learned more or less distinctly the truth of man’s relation to God in its natural character, and esp. in that aspect where man by his sin had separated himself from God and laid himself open to the terrible throng of judgment which the priesthood had thus grown in the consciousness of Israel, as the necessary instrument of mediation between man and God. Priestly acts were performed on behalf of the worshipper. The priest was to secure for man the Divine blessing and favor by an act of expiation. Something must be done in order to set forth the sin of man, his acknowledgment of guilt, the satisfaction of the law, and the assurance of the Divine forgiveness, the restored favor of God and the powerful

That the work of Christ partook of the nature of priestly service is already indicated by references in the Gospels. He was called “Jesu; for it is he that shall save his people from their sins” (Mt 1:21). Salvation from sin, in the habit of Christ in the temple, in thought at which the Jew had arrived, the Jews must have expressed itself most clearly in the symbolic signification of sacrifices in the temple, the sacrifice of which Our Lord received His priesthood is suggested. The frankness of the Magi’s offering is not without its mystical meaning (Mt 2:11). Some may find in the Baptist’s words, “baptize you in the Holy Spirit, as has been said of the Lamb of God” (Jn 1:33). The idea is the sacredness of priestly action, the understanding of John’s declaration must be found in the conventional ideas of the Jewish thought of the period, determined as they undoubtedly were by the history of priestly service in the past, and the fully developed ritual of the temple. The baptizing of the proswlyte was not necessarily a priestly act, as indeed we cannot be certain that the baptism was always necessary at the introduction of a proselyte into the Jewish church. But the association of circumcision with the inauguration of the proselyte certainly introduced the priest, and the sprinkling of the congregation by the priest was a familiar part of his official duties. It is quite probable therefore that John’s use of the expression carrel with it something of the sacedral idea.

The spirit of Our Lord’s teaching, as seen in the Sermon on the Mount, etc., as it reflects the thought of the Galilean ministry, may be regarded as prophetic rather than priestly. Should it be said that the teaching of the apostles is intended to bring righteousness, and it was impossible for a Jew to conceive of the securing of righteousness without some reference to priestly administration and influence. The contrast of the effect of Christ’s teaching with that of the scribes (Mt 7:29) keeps us in the vicinity of the law as applied through the sacerdotal service of which the scribes were the interpreters and teachers, and surely therefore a hint of Our Lord's relation to priesthood may have found its way into the minds of His immediate hearers. He was careful to recognize the authority of the priest (Mt 8:4).

The doctrine of sacrifice emerges somewhat more distinctly in the reference to the cross, which Our Lord associates with the thought of finding life by losing it (Mt 16:24-25), when the crossing of the cross is interpreted by following Christ, and this hint is soon followed by Christ's distinct reference to His coming sufferings (Mt 17:9.12), more definitely referred to in vs 22.23. Now the object of the work of the Lord takes clearer form. The Son of Man is come to save that which was lost (Mt 18:11 ARVm). As the time of the catastrophe drew nearer, the Lord became still more distinct in His references to His coming death (Mt 20:18.19), and at length declares that 'the Son of man came to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20:28). Our Lord's quotations (Mt 21:42; 23:39) concerning the rejected 'corner stone,' and the Blessed One 'that cometh in the name of the Lord' (Ps 118:22.26), are the principal in Christ's spirit of the priestly service of the temple, and in their reference to Himself again illustrate the ever-increasing recognition of His priesthood. He also uses the official term 'Christ' (Messiah, the anointed one) more frequently (Mt 24:5; 26:54), as the cross of the betrayal and trial the crucifixion is clearly foretold (Mt 26:2); and the death (26:12). The full significance of the death is asserted at the institution of the Lord's Supper. The bread is 'my body,' the wine is 'my blood of the new covenant,' and it is declared to be 'poured out for many unto remission of sins' (Mt 26:26-28 m).

A similar succession of ideas of Our Lord's priestly work may be found in the other gospels (see Mk 8:44; Lk 9:1); see below on the significance of the term Christ; Confirmation of the Synoptics

4. Mutual recognition of the disciples to understand the life that was to follow death here is indicated in the setting of John's own mission (Jn 1). The name Jesus (Lk 1:31); the special relation of the new kingdom to sin, necessarily connected with sacrifice in the mind of a priest, found in Zacharias' psalm (Lk 1:77-78); the subtle suggestion of the Suffering One in the 'also' of 2:35 AV (ARVm omits) shows that the third Gospel is quite in line with the two other Synoptics (see also Lk 3:3; 5:14). The claim to forgive sins must have suggested the sacrificial symbol of remission (Lk 5:24; 9:23; 13:35; 14:27; 15:31; 20:14; 22:19.20; 24:7.30; 46:47). In the Fourth Gospel, we have the word of the Baptist, 'Behold, the Lamb of God' (Jn 1:29.36), where Christ's relation to sin is distinctly expressed (see LAMb OF GOd)—the baptism in the Spirit (1:33), it is high, that the word 'other' with the 'other' of the two disciples, (4:10) and, having heard the Baptist's words, is the only evangelist who records them, thus introducing from his personal knowledge the sacrificial idea earlier into his history than the Synoptics. Christ declares that He will give His life for the life of the world (5:25). The entire passage (vs 47-65) is suffused with the conception of "life for life," one of the elements constituting the conception of the sacrificial act. In 8:28 (of 13:23) Scripture predicts His crucifixion. The Good Shepherd gives His life for the sheep (10:15). In 17:18, Christ claims the power to lay down His life and to take it again. He is the sacrifice and the Sacrifice.

Here appears for the first time the double relation of Christ to the sacrificial idea, worked out in the thought of the church into the full significance of Our Lord's priestly office. In 11:25-26 Christ is Dual Outgrowth of the sacrifice of life, and life after death. The sacrifice, it is hardly possible that this conception: Victim and sacrifice should not have, even if remotely suggested, some reference to the significance of sacrifice; for in the sacrificial the Divine claim for the blood, as a specially to be set apart as the Divine portion, was ever present of God ever claimed the blood as His; for to Him the life was forfeited by sin. And moreover He alone possesses life and gives it. Of that sacrifice and that Divine sovereignty of life, sacrifice is the expression. This is fully realized and made more actual in Christ. He is the spirit of the priestly service of the temple, and in their reference to Himself again illustrate the ever-increasing recognition of His priesthood. He also uses the official term 'Christ' (Messiah, the anointed one) more frequently (Mt 24:5; 26:54), as the cross of the betrayal and trial the crucifixion is clearly foretold (Mt 26:2); and the death (26:12). The full significance of the death is asserted at the institution of the Lord's Supper. The bread is 'my body,' the wine is 'my blood of the new covenant,' and it is declared to be 'poured out for many unto remission of sins' (Mt 26:26-28 m).

A similar succession of ideas of Our Lord's priestly work may be found in the other gospels (see Mk 8:44; Lk 9:1); see below on the significance of the term Christ; Confirmation of the Synoptics

4. Mutual recognition of the disciples to understand the life that was to follow death here is indicated in the setting of John's own mission (Jn 1). The name Jesus (Lk 1:31); the special relation of the new kingdom to sin, necessarily connected with sacrifice in the mind of a priest, found in Zacharias' psalm (Lk 1:77-78); the subtle suggestion of the Suffering One in the 'also' of 2:35 AV (ARVm omits) shows that the third Gospel is quite in line with the two other Synoptics (see also Lk 3:3; 5:14). The claim to forgive sins must have suggested the sacrificial symbol of remission (Lk 5:24; 9:23; 13:35; 14:27; 15:31; 20:14; 22:19.20; 24:7.30; 46:47). In the Fourth Gospel, we have the word of the Baptist, 'Behold, the Lamb of God' (Jn 1:29.36), where Christ's relation to sin is distinctly expressed (see LAMb OF GOd)—the baptism in the Spirit (1:33), it is high, that the word 'other' with the 'other' of the two disciples, (4:10) and, having heard the Baptist's words, is the only evangelist who records them, thus introducing from his personal knowledge the sacrificial idea earlier into his history than the Synoptics. Christ declares that He will give His life for the
As the epistles express the more elaborated thought of the apostolic ministry, the sacrifice of Our Lord naturally finds more definite exposition, and inasmuch as He was both active and passive in the offering of Himself, the conception of sacrifice is more fully developed in the two epistles to the Hebrews, the object of which was to set Him forth as a propitiatory sacrifice through faith in His blood (Rom 3:14). He was delivered for our offences and raised for our justification (Rom 4:25). Through Him we have access to the conditions of justification and peace (Rom 5:2). Christ died for the ungodly, and we are justified by His blood (Rom 5:9). The conception of life both as forfeit from man and gift by God, expressed by sacrifice, runs through the reasoning of Rom 6 (see esp. 11:32-34), where Christ who died for man rises from the dead, and becomes the representative of us all (Rom 5:14). The High Priest are thus united in the Lord, and thus He becomes the full expression and supplier of the love of God which is the perfect life. In 1 Cor 1:21 Paul affirms the precession of the cross as the manner of Our message. The subject of his teaching was not merely Christ, but Christ and Him crucified (1 Cor 2:2). In 1 Cor 5:7 Christ is declared to be the Passover, and sacrificed for us (1 Cor 10:16-18). The manifestation of the death of the Lord by the bread and wine is given in the account of the institution of the Supper (1 Cor 11:26). In 1 Cor 15:3 Christ is said expressly to have died for our sins. Christ's sacrifice lies at the basis of all the thought of the Galatian epistle (1:4; 2:20; 3:13). In Eph we have the definite statement of redemption through the blood of Christ (Eph 1:7). Christ's humiliation to the cross is given in Phil 2:8; community with Christ's death, one of the important elements of sacrifice, in Phil 3:10. Forgiveness, the essence of redemption, is declared to be through the blood of Christ (Col 1:14). Peace is secured through the blood of the cross, and reconciliation (Col 1:20); the presentation of us in Christ with blood (Col 1:22) is an unanswerable and unproveable to God (Col 2:22). The community of sacrifice sets forth the oneness of believers with Christ (Col 3:1-4). Christ is declared to be the one Mediator between God and man, who gave Himself for us all (1 Tim 2:5). The chief source of the priestly conception of Our Lord is the Epistle to the Hebrews. Christ is declared to have by Himself purged our sins (He 2:18); to taste of death for every man (He 2:9); that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest (He 4:15); the authority and power of Christ's priesthood fully set forth (He 5). Christ was made a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek (He 6:20). The priesthood of Christ being the order of Melchizedek is more excellent than the Aaronic priesthood (He 7). Christ's priesthood being eternal, that of the Aaronic is abolished (He 8). Christ's high-priesthood is made effectual by His own blood; and this blood is the means to a holy place, and has become the Mediator of a New Covenant (He 9:11-15). Christ is forever the representative of man in heaven (He 9:24-28). Christ by the sacrifice of Himself forever takes away sin, and has consecrated the new and living way to God (He 10). He is the Mediator of the New Covenant (He 12:24). The entire Epistle is steeped in the conception of Christ's priesthood.

In 1 Pet 1:2 the sacrificial element appears in the "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." The sufferings of the Lord were prophesied, the spirit of Christ's people was described in the time of the Anointed One (the object of the offering), and the object of the offering was Christ, the object desired to know (1:11); the redemption by the precious blood of Christ is of "a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1:19); the priesthood of believers was through Christ (2:5), who carried up our sins in His body to the tree (2:24 R.V.).

In the Johannine writings we have the cleansing from sin by the blood of Jesus Christ (1 Jn 1:7). Christ is said to have laid down His life for us (1 Jn 3:16). The sacrifice as well as the teaching of Christ is insisted on in the coming by blood as well as by water (6:6).

The appearance of Christ in Rev 1:13 is high-priestly; His robe is the talar, the high-priestly garment. The sacrificial place of Christ is indicated by "a Lamb," as though it had been slain" (Rev 5:6,9,12). The repeated figure of Christ throughout the Apocalypse is The Lamb.

This review of the Scripture teaching on priesthood clearly indicates the development of thought to the idea of Our Lord's mediatorial function.

8. Christ's Relation to the Sin Expressed in the Sacrificial Terms

The idea of sin was intimately associated with the priestly service of the temple. The sacrifice was in some cases sin offerings, and in these there ever appeared, by the function of the blood which is the life, the fatal loss of life by sin, the punishment of which was the withdrawal of the Divine gift of life. The doctrine of sin has never been absent for God. It was natural therefore when Christ appeared that His work in taking away sin should have been interpreted in the light of sacrificial thought. We find the idea steadily developed in the NT. He was the sacrifice, the Lamb of God. The question as to who offered the sacrifice was answered—Himself. Then He became in the conception of apostolic teaching, esp. emphasized in the Epistle to the Hebrews, as the priest as well as the sacrifice. The priestly sacrifice was developed in the theology of the church, and has generally been accepted as setting forth an important aspect of Our Lord's redemptive work.

VI. Christ's Kingly Office

The association of King of Israel with sacrifice is found in Divine revelation. It is the Break-down of the covenant with Abraham contains the covenant with Abraham contains (Gen 3:15; 22:17); the blessing of the Monarchy (Gen 49:10). After the successive attempts to establish a visible and earthly monarchy, its settlement in the family of David was associated with Divine premonitions of continued and gracious royalty (2 Sam 7:12-16; 22:57-62; 1 Chron 16:22-30; 2 Chron 1:7; Ps 45:23, 72:10). The failure of the earthly monarchy and the initial experiences of the kingdom turned the thought of the devout, esp. guided by prophetic testimony, to a coming king who should restore the glory of the Davidic house and the people of Israel. Here and there the conception appears of the more extended reign of the Coming One, and the royal authority finds a growing place in the prophetic Scriptures (Isa 2:1-4; 9:6-7; 11:1-10; 45:1-3; 62:13-15; 63:12; 66:7; Jer 23:5, 19; Baruch 4:20; Dan 7:13-14; Zech 4:7-11,14-27; Mic 5:1-4; Zec 3). The postexilic conception of the king became one of the supreme and most active ideas in the Jewish mind. The reign of the Messiah was to be earthly, and all nations were to be subject to the Jew. The Jews of Paul seem to have retained the more patriotic and the more material form of the idea (see 1 Macc 14:41), while the Egyptian and dispersed Jews began to regard the more spiritual character of the coming Messiah. References to the future blessedness of Israel under the restored royalty do not appear so largely in the Apoc writings which it must be remembered reflect chiefly their Egyptian-Jewish sources. Still there are some passages of interest (Bar 4:21—26; 1 Enoch 35:18.19; 36:11—16; 47:11.22). In the NT we have references to the strong expectation of the restored royalty and kingdom (Jn 1:49; 6:15; 12:12—15; Acts 1:6). Christ's kingship was speedily recognized by those who saw Him as theawned to acknowledge His authority. He Himself clearly claimed this authority (Mt 22:43—45; Jn 18:36.37). It was however not a kingdom based upon material and external power and rule, but on the foundation of truth and righteousness. The Kingdom of Heaven or of God is familiar to every reader of the words of Jesus. It was thus He described the new order which He had come to establish, of which He was to be the Lord and Administrator; not an earthly dominion after the fashion of this world's kingdoms; it was to be the rule of an eternal, spiriual and heavenly kingdom, by ethical forces, and the principle of its authority was centered in Christ Himself. It was to be developed on earth but perfected in the future and eternal life. Some divines have distinguished Christ's regal power and character, and life and work, and kingship (Mt 11:2.3:15): "The Kingship of Christ.

VII. The Messianic Basis of the Threefold Office of the Lord.—That the developments of Jewish thought centered round what may conveniently be called the idea of the Messiah is plain to any student of the OT and other Jewish writings. They sprang from the ethical and theological ideas of this people, interpreted and expressed in their political and religious forms, and continually nurtured by their experiences in the varied course of their national life. The essence of Messianic belief was a personal deliverer. Jewish history had always been marked by the appearance and the exploits of a great man. The capacity of the production of exceptional, creative individuals has been the characteristic of the race in all its ages. A judge, a lawgiver, a teacher, a seer, a king—each had helped, or even saved the people in some critical period. Each had added to the knowledge of God, whether received or rejected by the people. The issues of such service had remained, cherished in a growing lit., or made permanent in a finally centralized and unified ritual, recorded in chronic and lyric. The hope of Israel at one time did not take the completely personal form. Instead, it is probably easy to exaggerate the Messianic element as we look back from the perfect realization of it, in the Christian revelation and history. Much that has been called Messianic has been the result of reading into the OT what has been derived from Christian thought and experience. Zeph has been described as a picture of Israel's restoration and triumph. Yet apparently it has no reference to the personal element. Still the "Messianic" begins to appear in the prophetic writings (see e.g. in Isa. 41:3—5; 53:7). It is at this point that the meaning of the term is to be considered. "Jeh's anointed" is found as applied to a king, and familiar in this use in the OT. But anointing belonged to the priesthood and to the prophetic order, if not actually, at least metaphorically, as setting apart (see 1 K 19:16; 1 Pr 106:15; Isa 61:1). And the word Messiah (Christ) the Anointed, came to be used for that conception of a person, perhaps first employed definitely (Dtn 9:1—4), who shall be the Deliverer; sometimes even more widely, a Redeemer. In the age immediately preceding the Christian idea, the idea had been handed to others not only of the Jews, but also of the Samarians (Jn 4:25); and was not altogether unknown in the Hellenistic World (e.g. St. Or. II.97; Virgil Ecl. IV. It involves certain the prophetic and royal offices and, in the idea of a Suffering Servant, was closely allied to the objects of the sacrificial order.

The claims of Jesus to be the Christ, and the recognition of this claim by His followers and apostles, gave a new meaning to the teaching of the OT, and the writings lying outside the canon, but which were familiar to the people. Especially was the suffering and death of the Lord and His relation to this King of Glory established. Many believe that there is a personal visible reign of Christ upon the earth. Some hold that this will be produced by His advent prior to an age of millennial glory. Other views regard the advent as closely connected with the end of the present age and the judgment. The Church is the age, the new Testament, the kingdom of Christ.

LITERATURE.

The word Christian occurs only three times in the NT (Acts 11:26; 26:28, and 1 Pet 4:16). The first passage, Acts 11:26, gives the origin of the term, "The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." The other two, Acts 26:28, and 1 Pet 4:16, are older generation of critical scholars disputed the historicity of this statement. It was agreed that, had the term originated so early, it must have been found far more frequently in the records of early Christianity; sometimes also that the terminology points to a later origin. But there is general agreement now that these objections are groundless. The historicity of the Lukan account is upheld not only by Harnack, but by the more radical Klopfer in Die Schriften des NT, edited by Johann Weiss. In the adjectival termination -ianos was widely diffused throughout the whole empire. Originally applied to the slaves belonging to the great households, it had passed into regular use to denote the adherents of Jesus. A Christian is thus simply an adherent of Christ. The name, therefore, as Ramsay says, to the popular slang, as indeed sect and party names generally do. It is only after a considerable interval, and very often under protest, that such names are accepted as self-designations. The name, then, did not originate with the Christians themselves. Nor would the Jews have applied it to the followers of Jesus, whose claim to be the Christ they apparently did not accept. The term was applied by the early Christians as 'the sect of the Nazarenes' (Acts 24:5); perhaps also as 'Galileans,' a term which the emperor Julian attempted later vainly to revive. The word must have been coined by the heathen population of Antioch, as the Christian church emerged from the synagogue, and a Christianity predominantly gentle took its place among the religions of the world.

Perhaps the earliest occurrence of Christian as a self-designation is in Did 12.4. In the Apologist and Ignatius on the other hand the word is in regular use. 1 Pet simply takes it over from the anti-Christian judicial procedure of the law courts, where it is used as a way implying that the Christians used it among themselves. There is every probability, however, that it was the danger which thus began at an early date to attach to the name which commended it to the Christians themselves as a title of honor. Deissmann (Licht vom Osten, 286) suggests that Christian means slave of Christ, as Caesarian means slave of Caesar. But the word can scarcely have had that fulness of meaning till the Christians themselves had come to be proud of it.

According to tradition, Luke himself belonged to Antioch. In Acts 11:27-28 Codex D reads 'There was much rejoicing, and when we had assembled, there stood up,' etc. In view of the greater authority now so frequently accorded to the so-called Western text, we cannot summarily dispose of such a reading as an interpolation. If the historian was not only an Antiochene, but a member of the Antiochite Christian church, we have the explanation alike of his interest in the origin of the name Christian, and of the detailed precision of his information.

In all three NT passages the uncorrected Codex Sinaiticus reads 'the Christians.' We know from many sources that this variant was widely current in the 2d cent. Blass in his edition of Acts not only consistently reads 'the Christian,' but conjectures that Christians is the correct reading in Tacitus (Annals, xv.44), the earliest extra-Biblical testimony to the word. The Tacitus MS has since been published in facsimile. This has shown, according to Harnack (Mission and Expansion, E.T., I, 413, 414), that 'Christian' actually was the original reading, though the name 'Christian' is correctly given. Harnack accordingly thinks that the Latin historian intended to correct the popular appellation of c. 64 AD, in the light of his own knowledge, of a people who were more accurately called 'Christians' than the common people used to call them 'Christians,' but the real name of their founder was Christ.' Be this as it may, a confusion between 'Christos' and the familiar Gr slave name 'Christos' is more intelligible at an earlier date, than that self-designation was better known. There must have been a strong tendency to conform the earlier witnesses to the later, familiar, and etymologically correct, usage. It is all the more remarkable, therefore, that N reads 'Christians.' On the whole it seems probable that this designation, though bestowed in error, was the original one.

The fuller discussion of this subject more appropriately falls under the arts. dealing with the relation of the church and empire.

5. The Christians and the Empire

Empire a religio licita would be established throughout the empire, and that Pet belongs to a time when the mere profession of Christianity was a crime in the eyes of the state, but that in all probability to the period of Nero's affairs.

That early Christianity was essentially a movement among the lower non-literate classes has been rightly emphasized—above all by Deissmann. This is a circumstance of the utmost importance for the early history of our faith, though probably Deissmann in some degree exaggerates and misplaces the significance. Is it correct to say, for example, that 'primitive Christianity was relatively indifferent to politics, as Christianity, but as a movement of the humber folk, whose lot on the whole had certainly been lightened by the Empire' (Licht vom Osten, 254)? Very probably however in the days of the Pastoral gentile mission were appreciably increased by the fact that he touched a lower social stratum than that of the original Jewish Christianity of Pal. No class more recently been associated in any way with the "submerged masses" than the self-respecting peasant or artisan, who seems to have formed the backbone of the Phil., the apostle had consequently to fight against social, no less than racial and religious, prejudices.

The Christians originally called themselves "Disciples," a term afterward restricted to personal hearers of the Lord, and regarded as a title of high distinction. The ordinary self-designations of the apostolic age—believers (Acts 4:14; Rom 1:7), brethren (Acts 6:3; 10:23, etc.), "the elect" (Col 3:12; 2 Tim 2:10), "the church of God" (Acts 20:28 m.), "servants [slaves] to God" (Rom 6:22; Eph 2:19). Without any reference to the name, they refer to themselves as "servants [slaves] of Christ Jesus" (Phil 1:1). Other expressions are occasionally met with, of which perhaps the most significant is: "Those that call upon the name of the Lord" (Acts 19:14; Rom 10:13; 1 Cor 12.2). Cf. Pliny's report to Trajan (Epi.tes, X, 97): "They affirmed that . . . they had been wont to assemble and address a hymn to Christ as to a god."

LITERATURE.—The most recent discussion of the names of Christian believers, including 'Christ,' is in Ehrman's Mission and Expansion of Christianity, E.T. (2d ed. 1908). I, 386. See also EB, DB, DB, WPG, with the lit. there cited. LITERATURE

1. In Principle and Essence.—Unlike "Christian" (AV), the term "Christianity," so far as is known, was first used by the Christianists themselves, but does not occur in the NT. Use of the term exactly parallel to "Judaism" ("the Jews' religion"), found not only in Gal 1:13,14, but in 2 Macc 2:21, etc. Our earliest authority for the word "Christianism" is Ignatius of Antioch. Christian is now a title of honor, and the Christian's glory is "to live according to Christianity." (Ignatius, Ad magnes, 10)

While, however, the name is foreign to the NT, the NT is by universal consent our most important source of information regarding the thing Christianity arose out of the life and work of Jesus of Nazareth, who claimed to be "the Christ." During Jesus' lifetime this claim was admitted by a circle of adherents, in whose view, afterwards, it was triumphantly vindicated by His resurrection from the dead. By resurrection He "was declared to be the Son of God with power" (Rom 1:4). With this united was from the first the recognition of Christ as the God-sent Redeemer, through whom all have come to be reconciled to God through the act of reconciliation with God and Divine spiritual power.

Pauline summaries.—One of the oldest summaries of Christianity is that of Paul in 1 Cor 15:3-4: "For I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received: that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures." Of similar purport are the apostle's words in 2 Cor 5:18,19: "God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses." From this reconciliation springs the new life of believers (Rom 6:2; 2 Cor 5:14-17).

More recent writers have denied that Jesus advanced any such claim to Messianship, but always upon purely arbitrary and subjective grounds. On the one hand these writers have been profoundly impressed by the gravity of Jesus' character; on the other they have looked upon the claim to stand in such a unique relation to God and man as unfounded or meaningless. They have sought, accordingly, to escape the difficulty by denying that Jesus regarded Himself as the Anointed of the Lord (thus, e.g. Wrede). Sometimes they have gone the length even of affirming that Jesus was not so regarded by His personal disciples. Divine honors were accorded Him only gradually, as the memory of what He actually was faded away, and an idealization begotten of Christian faith took its place. The notion of Messiah is merely a piece of Jewish folklore. This position in its distinctively modern form has been answered, it seems to us, with absolute conclusiveness, by Professor James Denney in his Jesus and the Gospel. In a historical point of view, Jesus' life is more than certain that He regarded Himself as the Christ, the culmination and fulfillment of the Divine revelation given to Israel. This conviction of His is the point round which His whole message revolves. The most recent NT theology, that, e.g. of Dr. Paul Feine (1910), rightly starts from Jesus' Messianic consciousness, and seeks to understand His whole teaching in the light of it. Doubtless, like everything else which Jesus touched, the concept of Messiahship becomes transmuted and glorified in His hands. Our Lord was in no way dependent upon current beliefs and expectations for the content of His Messianic consciousness.

But is it not the case that His followers, with His authority, would have attributed Messianship to one so utterly unlike the Messiah of popular fancy?

The NT proves not only that the Christians from the very outset were fully persuaded, on what they regarded as adequate grounds in history and experience, that their Messiah—Lord had risen from the dead, but also that this conviction mastered them, giving direction and purpose to their whole lives. Historical Christianity was erected on the foundation of a Risen Lord.

Its evidence.—On this point Professor Denney says (Jesus and the Gospel, 111): "The real historical evidence for the resurrection is the fact that it was believed, preached, propagated, and produced its fruit and effect, in the new phenomenon of the Christian church, long before any of our gospels were written. . . . Faith in the resurrection was not only prevalent but immensely powerful before any of our NT books were written. Not one of them would have been written without faith. It is not this or that in the NT—it is not the story of the empty tomb, or of the appearing of Jesus in Jerusalem or in Galilee—which is the primary evidence for the resurrection: it is the NT itself. The life that thrives in it from beginning to end, the life that always fills us again with wonder, as it beats upon us from its pages, is the life which the Risen Saviour has quickened in Christian souls. The evidence for the resurrection of Jesus is the existence of the church in that extraordinary spiritual vitality which confronts us in the NT. This is its own explanation of its being."

The best Christian thought of our day has no more difficulty than had the apostles in holding and establishing what Principal Pusey fittingly calls "the superhistoric Contrasted finality of Christ." In the very nature of the case, wherever the problem of Our Lord's person has been seriously faced, there have always been two distinct estimates of His value, that of assured faith, based upon personal experience of His redemptive power, and that of mere externalism.

(1) The "historical" or "historical estimate has no more right now to call itself 'historical' or 'scientific,' than it had, nearly nineteen hundred years ago, to crucify the Lord of glory. The priests doubtless thought that they understood Jesus better than the ignorant, deluded Galileans. Yet the boldest champion of "the religio-historic method" would scarcely claim that theirs was the correct judgment. As a matter of fact, the so-called historical school are no more free from presuppositions than is the most thoroughgoing traditionalist. Nor have they a monopoly either of historical knowledge or of critical acumen. No truths are accessible to them which are not equally available for the Christian believer. No proof exists, beyond their own unsupported assertions, that they are better interpreters of the common truth. On the other hand, that whole range of experience and conviction in which the Christian believer finds the supreme assurance of the truth of his religion is to them a sealed book. Surely, then, it is the height of absurdity to maintain that the external, non-believing, estimate of Our Lord's person is likely to be the basis of their faith.

(2) The believing estimate of Our Lord's person is the essence of Christianity as a historical religion. But according to the NT this estimate is itself Divinely inwrought and Divinely attested (Mt 16 16; Lk 10 22; Jn 14 6; see particularly Mt 21 21 and Jn 14:21). It is the perfect object of our-manifestation of God in Jesus Christ on the one hand, and the subjective appropriation of this revelation by faith on the other. No argument against the reality of the revealed external, not our-man-man, manifestation that the Deity of Our Lord and the supernatural origin of our religion can neither be proved nor denied. It is the exponent of one's personal attitude to Christianity. This follows necessarily from the nature of the apprehension of Divine truth. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned. There can be no impersonal knowledge of religious, any more than of aesthetic, truth. In these realms another's knowledge has no real meaning for anyone till he has felt its power and tested it in his own experience. Evangelical Christians do not accept the Deity of Our Lord as the cardinal and absolute of their faith; they are not externally inspired by the authority whether of Scripture or of tradition, or even of His own recorded words apart from experience of Christ. They accept it precisely as they accept the authority of Scripture itself, because of the witness of the Spirit with their spiritual attitude. And the combined testimony of Scripture and tradition is confirmed in their religious life, when by receiving Jesus as Our Lord and Saviour they experience the Christian power. This power is the great experienced reality in the light of which alone the other realities become intelligible. "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see" (Jn 9:25). "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life" (Jn 6:68).

The true church of Christ consists of all who have experienced the power of Christ, delivering them from the guilt, the stain, and the dominion of sin and bringing the peace of God into their souls. Nothing less for less than this is either the gospel of Salvation Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, or the historic faith of Christendom, or a religion adequate to human need. The Christian doctrine is partly the assertion of the reality of this power, partly its interpretation. Facts of history and theological propositions are vital to our faith, just in proportion as they are vitally related to this power. The Christian essential are those elements, historical and dogmatic, without which Christianity would lose in whole or in part its living power to reconcile sinful man to the all-righteous, loving God.

7. Jesus and the Gospel

Yes, it is the heart and core of it. Christianity is both a rule of life and a doctrine. But in it is the most natural, pure expression of the Deity of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in His life, death and resurrection.

8. NT Types of DOCTRINES

As regards NT theological writing, there are essentially two extremes in the interpretation of the New Testament, one a thoroughly historical and the other a thoroughly philosophical. The former is represented by such writers as BDB, the so-called Biblical Dictionary, or by various modern interpretations of the NT. The latter is represented by such writers as Fenton Robinson, who seeks to reduce the NT to a mere collection of statements about the life and moral teaching of our Lord and Saviour. The former is the more thoroughgoing, and both are equally inadequate, whether they are a mere commentary on facts or a mere exegesis of a great religious system.

9. Natural-INTERPRETATION

The Religion of the NT, as the religion, as the religion of the NT, is not a mere collection of facts, but an expression of the religious thoughts and aspirations of the people of the time. The NT is not a mere collection of facts, but a religious system, in which the religious ideas of the time are embodied. The NT is not a mere collection of facts, but a religious system, in which the religious ideas of the time are embodied. The NT is not a mere collection of facts, but a religious system, in which the religious ideas of the time are embodied. The NT is not a mere collection of facts, but a religious system, in which the religious ideas of the time are embodied. The NT is not a mere collection of facts, but a religious system, in which the religious ideas of the time are embodied.
242 ff) between "the religion of Christ" and "the Christian religion"—a distinction which still exactly marks the attitude to Christianity of the modern world. It is a distinction of historical and not of theological character. The "Christian religion," "Christianity," "Christian" are terms in which the idea of the Messiah and the kingdom of God are embodied. The Christian religion is a revelation which Christ made to the world and the church. It is a revelation of God, of the nature of God, of the way of salvation. This revelation is the foundation of the Christian church and its institutions. It is not a revelation of the past, but a revelation of the present and the future. It is not a revelation of a single being, but a revelation of the whole of human nature. It is not a revelation of a single person, but a revelation of the whole of humanity. It is not a revelation of a single place, but a revelation of the whole of the world. It is not a revelation of a single event, but a revelation of the whole of history. It is not a revelation of a single time, but a revelation of the whole of eternity. It is not a revelation of a single space, but a revelation of the whole of the universe. It is not a revelation of a single person, but a revelation of the whole of humanity. It is not a revelation of a single place, but a revelation of the whole of the world. It is not a revelation of a single event, but a revelation of the whole of history. It is not a revelation of a single time, but a revelation of the whole of eternity. It is not a revelation of a single space, but a revelation of the whole of the universe.

1. "Religion of Christ school. By "the religion of Christ" meant the religion which Christ Himself acknowledged and practised as man; by "the Christian religion" meant the view which regards Christ as more than man, and exalts Him as an object of worship. From this standpoint the problem for the historian is to show how the religion of Christ came to develop into the Christian religion in modern times, how the "Jesus of history" became the "Christ of faith."

(1) The historical Jesus is supernatural. It has already been pointed out (under I above) that the view of Jesus on which the assumed contrast rests is not one truly historical. The fallacy lies in regarding the Jesus of history as simply a man among men—holier, diviner in insight, but not essentially distinguished from the race of which He was a member. This is not the Christ of apostolic faith, but as little is it the picture of the historical Jesus as described by Paul. Paul never for an instant dreamt of putting Himself on the same plane with Christ. Christ was saviour; Christ was divine; He was the Christ. Paul was a disciple; Christ was the Messiah. Paul was a teacher; Christ was the Son of God. Jesus achieved redemption; Paul appropriated it. These things involved the widest contrasts in attitude and speech.

(2) Essence of Christianity in redemption. Thoroughly, therefore, Christ, in His relations of love and trust to the Father, and perfection of holy character, necessarily ever remains the Great Exemplar to whose image His people are to be conformed (Rom 8 29), in whose steps they are to follow (1 Pet 2 21), it is not correct to describe Christianity as the religion of which Christ practised. Christianity takes into account also the work which Christ came to do, the redemption He achieved, the blessings which, through Him, are bestowed on those who accept Him as their Saviour, and acknowledge Him as their Lord. Essentially Christianity is a religion of redemption; not, therefore, a religion practised by Jesus for Himself, but one based on a work He has accomplished for others. Experimentally, it may be described as consisting, above all, in the new creation, the forgiveness of sins, from sin and reconciliation to God through Jesus Christ, and in the possession of a new life of sonship and holiness through Christ's Spirit. Everything in the way of holy obedience is included here. This, at least, reduced to its simplest terms, is undoubtedly what Christianity meant for its first preachers and teachers, and what historically it has meant for the church ever since.

Definitions of Christianity are as numerous as the writers who have attempted the task, but one or two definitions may be glanced at as illustrative of the positions above assumed.

2. Modern Definitions As modern types, Schleiermacher and Ritschl may be selected in preference to writers of more conspicuous originality. (1) Schleiermacher, in his Der Christliche Glaube, has an interesting definition of Christianity. Christianity he speaks of as "a form of monothestic faith, of the teleological order of religion (i.e. in which the natural is subordinated to the moral), the peculiarity of which, in distinction from other religions of this type, essentially is, that nothing is referred to the redemption accomplished through Jesus of Nazareth" (sec. 11). As, in general, Schleiermacher's merit is recognized to lie in his bringing back, in a time of religious decay, the person of Christ to a central place in his religion, so here his true religious feeling is manifested in his fixing on the reference to redemption by Christ as the distinctive thing in Christianity.

(2) Ritschl's definition is more complicated, and need not here be cited in full (cf his Justif. and Recov., III; ET, 13). The important point is that, like Schleiermacher, Ritschl gives, together with the idea of the kingdom of God, an essential place to the idea of redemption in the conception of Christianity. Ritschl, "he says, "the Christian religion,不过, one of the historical religions in a historical context; has, like some of them, a personal founder; claims, as they also do, or did, the allegiance of multitudes of the population of the world; presents in externals (e.g. the possession of Scriptures), sometimes in ideas, analogies to features in these religions. For this reason, an influential modern school is disposed to treat Christianity, as before it, the religion of Israel, as simply, one of these historical religions, as "nothing less, but also nothing more"—explaining it from the inherent laws of religious development, and rejecting the idea of any special, authoritative revelation. Sacred books are pitted against sacred books; moral codes, against others; the idea of the virgin birth, the incarnation, the resurrection, against seeming parallels on other soils. For examination of the principal of the alleged resemblances, see Comparative Religion.

(1) This place unique. Here it is desirable to look at the place of Christianity in the series of historical religions in certain of its wider aspects. The uniqueness of Christ's religion, and justification of its claim to a special, Divine origin, will only appear the more clearly from the comparison. In general, it need only be remarked that no other religion in the world has ever even professed to present a plain, historically developed, progressive revelation, advancing through successive stages in the unfolding of a Divine purpose of grace, till it culminates in the appearance of a person, life, character and work, like that of Jesus Christ; not in one single instance.

(2) Universality of Christianity. A distinction is commonly made between national and universal religions, and Christianity is classed as one of the three universal religions—the other two being Buddhism and Mohammedanism (cf e.g. Kuenen's Hibbert Lectures on National Religions and Universal Religions). There is certainly agreement in the fact that the two religions named with Chris-Christianity is not "national" religions; that they are "universal" in the sense in which Christianity is, may be denied. Neither Buddhism nor Mohammedanism has any fitness to become a religion for the world, nor, with all their remarkable extension, has Judaism, which, as it appointment in Old World and in New. Mohammed boasted that he would plant his religion wherever the palm tree grew (Palgrave), and this still marks very nearly the range of its conquests. It is not a religious influence, but a blight on all higher civilization. It degrades woman, perpetuates slavery, fosters intolerance, and brings no real healing for the spiritual woes of mankind. Buddhism, again, notwithstanding its wide spread in China and neighboring lands, has in it no real spring of moral progress, and is today withering up at the root. Its system of "salvation"—attainment of Nirvana—is not for the many but the few. It has not a message for all men alike. Buddha does not profess that all can accept his method, or ought to be asked to do so. For the multitude it is impossible of attainment. In practice, therefore, instead of one, he has three codes of duty—one for the laity, who are the others, one for the monks, who do not aspire to Arhatship or saint- hood: and one for those who would reach the goal of Nirvana. These last are very few; only two cases are specified, besides Buddha himself, of success in Nirvana. In contrast with these Christianity approves itself as a strictly universal religion—the only religion of its kind in the world. In its doctrines of the one God and Father, and of the brotherhood of all mankind; its teaching on universal need through sin, and universal provision for salvation in Christ; its gospel of reconciliation addressed to all; its pure spirituality in worship and morality; its elevating and emancipating tendency in all the relations of human life, it approves itself not as a religion for all sections and races of mankind, for all grades of civilization and stages of culture, appealing to that which is deepest in man, capable of being understood and received by all, and renewing and blessing each one who accepts and lives in the history of its growth, even one of the most degraded races, in all parts of the globe, is the demonstration of this truth. (On the universalism of Christianity, see, for example, Church Hist of the First Three Cent, I, Pt 1.)

1. Exposition of Christianity. Even in circles where the full supernatural claims of Christianity are not admitted, to speak of Christ's religion as, in comparison with others, "the absolute religion," meaning by this that in Christianity the true idea of religion, which in other faiths is only striven after, attains to complete and final expression. Hegel, e.g. speaks of Christianity as the "Absolute or Revealed Religion" in the sense that in it the idea is discovered of the essential unity of God and man (thus also T. H. Green, E. Caird, etc.); others (e.g. Pfeiderer) in the meaning that it expresses the absolute "principle" of religion—a Divine sonship. Christianity also claims for itself, though in a more positive way, to be the absolute religion. It is the final and perfect revelation of God for which not only revelation in Israel, but the whole providential history of the race, was a Divinely ordained preparation (Gal 4 4). It is absolute in the sense that a larger and fuller revelation than Christ's is needed, and is not to be looked for. Not only in this religion is all truth of Nature about God's being, attributes and character, with all truth of OT revelation, purely gathered up and preserved, but in the person and work of the incarnate Son a higher and more complete disclosure is made of God's Fatherly love and gracious purposes to mankind, and a redemption is presented as actually accomplished adequate to all the needs of a sinful world. Mankind can never hope to attain to a higher idea of God, a truer idea of man, a profounder conception of the end of life, a more pious devotion, a more perfect self-conception, a more perfect satisfaction in fellowship with God, a grander hope of eternal life, than is opened to it in the gospel. In this respect again, Christianity stands alone (of W. Douglas MacKenzie, The Final Faith, a Statement of the Nature and Authority of Christianity as the Religion of the World).

4. Religion of redemption.—A third aspect in which Christianity as a historical religion is sometimes regarded is as a religion of redemption. In this light a comparison is frequently instituted between it and Buddhism, which also in some sort is a religion of redemption. But the comparison brings out only the more conspicuously the unique and original character of the Christian system. Buddhism starts from the conception of the inherent evil and misery of existence, and the salvation it promises as the result of indefinitely prolonged striving through many successive lives is the eternal rest and peace of non-being; Christianity, on the contrary, is based on the conviction that everything in its original nature and in the intent of Its Creator is good, and that the evil of the world is the result of wrong and perverted development— holds, therefore, that redemption from it is possible by a use of appropriate means. And redemption here includes, not merely deliverance from existing evils, but restoration of the Divine likeness which has been lost by man, and ultimate blessedness of the life everlasting. Dr. Boyd Carpenter sums up the contrast thus: "In Buddhism redemption comes from below; in Christianity it is from above; in Buddhism it comes from man; in Christianity it comes from God" (Permanent Elements in Religion, Intro, 94).

Christianity, as an external magnitude, has a long and chequered history, into the details of which it is not the purpose of this art. 4. Development and influence are left untouched. But a little may be said of its outward expansion of the influences that helped to mould its doctrinal forms, and of the influence which it in turn has exercised on the thought and life of the peoples into whose midst it came.

(a) The apostolic age: It is the peculiarly of the Pauline message, as Professor W. M. Ramsay points out, that it followed the great lines of Rom communication, and aimed at establishing itself in the large cities—the centers of civilization (Church in Roman Empire, 147, etc.). The Book of Acts and the Epistles show how striking were the results. Churches were planted in all the great cities of Asia Minor and Macedonia. Irenaeus testifies that by the time of Nero's persecution (64 AD) the Christians were a "great multitude" ("inmensa multitudine" (Annals xv. 44)).

(b) Succeeding period: Our materials for estimating the progress of Christianity in the post-Christianity

apostolic age are scanty, but they suffice to show us the church pursuing its way, and casting its spell alike on East and West, in centers of civilization and in regions of barbarism. From the last quarter of the 2d cent. great churches like those of Carthage and Alexandria burst into visibility, and reveal how firm a hold the new religion was taking of the empire. Deadly persecution could not stop this march of the church to victory. From the middle of the 3d cent. there is no question that it was progressing by leaps and bounds. This is the period in which Harnack puts its great expansion (Expansion, II, 455, E). On the back of the more relentless of it that had yet endured, the Diocletian, it suddenly found itself raised by the arms of Constantine to a position of acknowledged supremacy. By this time it had penetrated into all ranks of society, and reckoned among its adherents many of noble birth.

(c) Modern missions: It is unnecessary to trace the subsequent course of Christianity in its conquest of the northern nations. For a time the zeal for expansion slumbered, but, with the revival of the missionary spirit at the close of the 18th cent., and the development of the metropolis as a center of the world, in the various regions of the heathen world are only now beginning to be realized. It is impossible to read without a thrill what was accomplished by the pioneers of Christian missions in the South Seas and on the Far East (cf. Lightfoot). It is being done in India, China, Japan, Korea, Africa and elsewhere, by Christian preaching and education, awaken even more astonishment. Countries long closed against the gospel are now opened, and the standard of the cross is being carried into all the world. The church is arousing to its missionary obligations as never before. Still, with all this progress, immense obstacles remain to be overcome. Including all the populations of nominally Christian lands, the adherents of the Christian religion are reckoned to amount only to some 560,000,000, out of a total of over 1,600,000,000 of the population of the world (Hickmann). This looks discouraging, but it is to be remembered that it is the Christian peoples that represent the really progressive portion of the human race.

(2) The doctrinal shaping of Christianity has taken place largely as the result of conflict with opposing errors. First, as inevitable, its conflict was a natural march within the apostolic age of (Lightfoot, Colossians). This strange compound of oriental theosophy and ideas borrowed from Christianity (see Gnosticism) would have dissolved Christ's religion into a tissue of phantasies, and all the strength and learning of the Church were needed to combat its influence. Its opposition was overruled for good in leading to a fixing of the earliest creed (see Apostles' Creed), the formation of an authoritative NT canon (see Bible; Canon), and the firm assertion of the reality of Christ's humanity.

(b) Monarchianism: Christianity had now entered the world of Gr thought, and ere long had contests to sustain within its own borders. First came assaults (3d cent.) on the idea of the Trinity itself. what are known as the Monarchian heresies—the assertion that the Father Himself was incarnate and suffered in Christ (Patripassianism), or that the Trinity consisted only in "modes" of the Divine self-revelation (Sabelianism).

(c) Arianism: the Church were hardly repelled when a yet greater danger overtook the church in the outbreak (318 AD) of the violent Arian controversy, the Son Himself being now declared to be a creature, exalted, before all worlds, but not truly of the nature of God. The comtion produced by this controversy led to the adustment of the first ecumenical council—that of Nicaea (325 AD), and the framing of the Nicene Creed, affirming the full deity of the Son. A like controversy about the Spirit (the Macedonian, 4th cent.), led to the confirming of this creed, and adoption of additional clauses, at the Council of Constantinople (381 AD).

(d) Sin and grace: The doctrine of the Trinity was now settled, but new controversies speedily sprang up—in the West on sin and grace (Pelagius and Augustine) (411-18 AD), and in the East in the long series of controversies known as the Christological, bearing on the right apprehension of the person of Christ (4th to 7th cents.): as against Pelagius, who denied original sin, and affirmed man's natural ability to reach God and work his salvation. Augustine vindicated the complete dependence of man on the grace of God for his salvation.

(e) Person of Christ: And as against errors successively denying the reality of a human soul in Jesus (Arianism and Monarchianism), the person of Christ (325 AD), or conversely, fusing together the Divine and human into one nature (Eutychianism, Monophysitism), the church maintained, and embodied in a Creed at Chalcedon (418 AD), the true divinity and humanity of Christ: Divine and human, in the one Divine person of the Lord. These decisions are upheld by all branches of the church—Gr, Lat, Protestant.

(f) The atonement: The mediatorial scholastic period made one great advance in the attempt of Anselm in his Cur Deus Homo (1089) to lay deep the foundations of a doctrine of atonement in the idea of the necessity of a satisfaction for human sin: Ablard, on the other hand, denied the need of satisfaction, and became the representative of what are known as moral theories of the atonement. It was reserved for the Protestant Reformers, however, to bring this doctrine to its true bearing, as furnishing the ground for man's free justification (Calvin), as the ground of God's exalted grace (Luther), as making full satisfaction for his guilt. There have been many theories of atonement, but the idea that Christ has "satisfied Divine justice" is too firmly imbedded in all the Reformation creeds, and has too profound a Scriptural support, to be removed.

(g) The 16th cent. Reformation, on its outward side, was a revolt against the errors and corruptions of the papacy, but in its positive aspect it may be described as the reassertion of the sole mediator-ship of Christ in the intercession of the Church (see Papal Power). the sole authority of Scripture (as against tradition), and justification by faith alone (as against salvation by works of merit). The schism meant a separation of the great Protestant communities and nations from the church of Rome, which, by its claim of papal supremacy, had already separated from itself the great Gr communion.

(h) Lutheran and Reformed: Within Protestantism itself a difference of genus between the Swiss and Reformed Reformers, with divergences of view on the sacraments, led to the formation of two main types—the Lutheran (German) and the Reformed (Swiss)—and between these two, as respects theology and church order, later Protestantism has mostly been divided. With the rise of Arminianism and other forms of dissent from the peculiarities of Calvinism, the aspect of Protestantism became more variegated. Or, taking another point of view, we may see the numerous modern sects which yet own allegiance to the common head (Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, etc.), it is not necessary here to speak. The unity of spirit revealed in creed, worship and combined endeavors in Christ's service goes deeper than all outward differences.

(3) Its influence.—Christianity preaches a kingdom of God, or supremacy of God's will in human history and human affairs, by which it is meant, on its earthly side, nothing less than a complete reconstruction of society on the two great bases of love to God and love to man—"Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth" (Mt 6:10). The influence of Christianity is paramount in all the great advances that have been made in the moral and social amelioration of the state of mankind.

(a) The ancient world: It was so undoubtedly in the ancient world. The world into which Christianity came was one fast sinking into dissolution that was an induction of its own conceptions. In that world Christianity brought a totally new idea of man as being of infinite dignity and immortal worth. It restored the well-nigh lost sense of responsibility to be conformed to a new world, a new spirit of love and charity. It created that wealth of charitable and beneficent institutions with which Christian lands are now full (Lecky speaks of it as "covering the globe with cemeteries in institutions of mercy, absolutely unknown in the whole pagan world"). "Hut of Morals," II, 91; set up a new moral ideal and standard of integrity which has acted as an elevating force on moral conceptions till the present hour; restored woman to her rightful place in man's halls and homes; created the Christian home; gave the slave an equal place with his master in the kingdom of God, and struck at the foundations of slavery by its doctrines of the natural brotherhood and dignity of man; created self-respect, and a sense of duty in the use of one's powers for self-support and the benefit of others; urged to honest labors; and in a myriad other ways, by direct teaching, by the protest of holy lives, and by its general spirit, struck at the evils, the malpractices, the cruelties of the time.

(b) The modern world: Despite many failures, and gross backslidings in the church itself, these ideas, implanted in the world, and liberating other forces, have since done good and accelerated the progress of the race. They exist and operate far beyond the limits of the church. They have been taken up and contended for by men outside the church—by unbelievers even—where the church itself had become unfaithful to them. None the less they are of Christian parentage. They lie at the basis of our modern assertion of equal rights, of justice to the individual in social and state arrangements, of the desire for brotherhood, peace and unity among classes and nations. It is Christian love which is sustaining the best, purest and most self-sacrificing efforts for the raising of the fallen, the rescue of the drunkard, the promotion of enlightenment, virtue, social order and happiness. It is proving itself the grand civilizing agency in other regions of the world. Christian missions, with their benign effects in the spread of education, the checking of social evils and barbarities, the creation of trade and industry, the change in the status of women, the work for the physical and spiritual uplift generally, is the demonstration of it (see Dennis, Christian Missions and Social Progress).

(c) Testimony of Huxley: Professor Huxley will not be regarded as a biased witness on behalf of Christianity. Yet this is what he writes on the influence of the Christian Scriptures, and his words may be a fitting close to this article: "Throughout the history of the modern world," he says, "the Scriptures, Jewish, and Christian, have been the great instigators of revolt against the worst forms of clerical and political despotism. The Bible has been the Magna Charta of the poor, and of the oppressed; down to modern times no state has had a constitution in which the interests of the people are so largely taken into account, in which the duties, so much more than the privileges, of rulers are insisted upon and that drawn up for Israel in Dt and Lev; nowhere is the fundamental truth that the welfare of the State, in the long run, depends upon the uprightness of the citizen so strongly laid down. Assuredly the Bible talks no trash about the rights of man; but it insists upon the equality of duties, on the liberty to bring about that righteousness which is somewhat different from struggling for 'rights'; on the fraternity of taking thought for one's neighbor as for one's self."

CHRISTOLOGY, kris-to-l'o-ji. See Person of Christ.

CHRISTS, kri茨. See Christians, False; Messiah.

CHRISTS, FALSE, fals (φασάρχριτοι, pseudochristoi): In His discourse on the last things, uttered by Him on the Tuesday of the 1. Christ's week of His Passion, Jesus solemnly forewarned His disciples that many would come in His name, saying I am the Christ," who would deceive many; that there would arise false Christs and false prophets, who would show great signs and wonders, so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect; that, therefore, if any man said to them, 'Lo, here is the Christ,' or 'Lo, there,' they were not to believe it (Mt 24:5; 11:23-25; Mk 13:21-23; Lk 21:8).

The warning was needed. De Wette, Meyer, and others have, indeed, pointed out that there is no historical record of anyone expressly claiming to be the Christ prior to the destruction of Jesus. This, however, is probably only in appearance (cf. Lange, Comm. on Mt 24:3). Edersheim remarks: Though in the multitude of impostors, who, in the troubled time between the rise of Palestine and the destruction of Jerusalem, promised Messianic deliverance to Israel, few names and claims of this kind have been specially recorded, yet the hints in the NT, and the references, however guarded, in the Jewish historian imply the appearance of many such seducers (Jesus the Messiah, V. ch vi; in 1906 ed, II, 446). The revolts in this period were generally connected with religious pretensions in the leaders (Jos, BJ, XII, xx. 4—"deceived and deluded the people under pretense of divine inspiration"), and the generally, is the demonstration of it (see Dennis, Christian Missions and Social Progress).

2. Early claiming to be the Christ prior to the destruction of Jesus. This, however, is probably only in appearance (cf. Lange, Comm. on Mt 24:3). Edersheim remarks: Though in the multitude of impostors, who, in the troubled time between the rise of Palestine and the destruction of Jerusalem, promised Messianic deliverance to Israel, few names and claims of this kind have been specially recorded, yet the hints in the NT, and the references, however guarded, in the Jewish historian imply the appearance of many such seducers (Jesus the Messiah, V. ch vi; in 1906 ed, II, 446). The revolts in this period were generally connected with religious pretensions in the leaders (Jos, BJ, XII, xx. 4—"deceived and deluded the people under pretense of divine inspiration"), and the generally, is the demonstration of it (see Dennis, Christian Missions and Social Progress).
by many of whom, according to Origen (Hom. on Lk, 26), he was regarded as the Messiah (cf DB, s.v.). The Theudas of Acts 5 36, "giving himself out to be somebody," may or may not be the same as the Theudas of Acts 11, 26; v. 13 but the latter, at least, made prophetic claims and deluded many. He promised to divide the river Jordan by a word. Another instance is the "Egyptian" for whom Paul was mistaken, who had made an "uproot" (Acts 21 38; RV "seduction") — one of a multitude of "impostors and deceivers." Jos tells us, who persuaded multitudes to follow them into the wilderness, pretending that they would exhibit wonders and signs (Ant, XX, viii, 6).

This Egyptian was to show them his command, the walls of Jerusalem would fall down (BJ, II, xiii, 5). Of another class was the Samaritan Dosiheus, with whom Simon Magus was said to be connected (see ref to Eusebius, Origin, Hippolytus, Clemetine writings, etc, in DB, s.v.). He is alleged to have been regarded as "the prophet like unto Moses," whom God was to raise up.

The most celebrated case of a false Christ is that of Bar-Cochba (to give the name its usual form), the leader of the great insurrection under Simon in 132 AD (Eus., HJP, I, 2, pp. 297 ff, ET). The insurrection was on a scale which it required the whole force of the Roman empire to put down (cf Schurer). The leader's own name was Simon, but the title, "Bar-Cochba" ("son of a star"), was given him with reference to the prophecy in Nu 24 17 of the star that should come out of Jacob. Rabbi Akiba, the most celebrated of his contemporaries, attached the time, upon interpreting this prophecy, with that in Hag 2 6 7, to Simon, and announced him as the Messiah. He is commonly known in Jewish lit. as Barcosiba, probably from his birthplace. Immense multitudes flocked to his standard, and the Christians in Pal were severely persecuted. Coins were issued in his name. After tremendous efforts the rebellion was crushed, and Jesus was converted into a Rom colony (Aelia Capitolina), which Jews were forbidden to enter.

Among the Jews themselves in later times, many pseudo-Messiahs have arisen. An interesting account of some of these is given by Mr Elkan Adler in his Introduction to the volume, A History of the Hebrew Bible (London, Routledge, 1910). "Such there had been," this writer says, "from time to time ever since the destruction of the Temple." In the 16th and 17th cents., however, the belief in pseudo-Messiahs took new and remarkable shapes. Among the names mentioned is that of David Reuben, or David of the tribe of Reuben (1524), who ultimately fell a sacrifice to the Inquisition. Under his influence a Portuguese royal secretary, Diego Pires, adopted the Jewish faith, changed his name to Solomon Molko, and finally proclaimed himself the Messiah. In 1529 he published some of his addresses under the title of The Book of Wonder. He was burned at the stake at Mantua. "Other Kabbalists, such as Isaac Luria and Chajim Vital and Abraham Shalom, proclaimed themselves to be Messiahs or forerunners of the Messiah, and their works and MSS are still piously studied by many oriental Jews." The chief of all these false Messiahs was Sabbat Zevi, born at Smyrna in 1626. He, it is said, was a tremendous spirit in western Europe." He ultimately became an apostate to Islam; notwithstanding which fact he had a line of successors, in whom the sect of Domneh, in Salonica, continue to believe. Another mentioning is Jacob Frank, of Podolia, who revealed himself in 1755 as the Holy Lord, in whom there dwelt the same Messiah-soul that had dwelt in David, Elijah, Jesus, Mohammed, Sabbatai Zevi, and his followers. Jewish lit. in the 19th cent. is full of controversy with Sabbatianism. As a special source of information on modern false Messiahs among the Jews, Lange mentions the serial Dibhreh 'emeth, or Words of Truth (Breslaw, 1853–54).

LITERATURE

The analogy of this title to such Eng words as diary, journal, chronicle, is obvious. The title is one which frequently appears in the

1. The Heb of the OT. It is used to denote the records of the Medo-Pers monarchy (Est 2 3; 6 10 2), and to denote public records, either Pers or Jewish, made in late postexilic times (Neh 12 23) and to denote public records of Jesus David (1 Ch 27 24). But its most common use is to denote the Judaistic and Israelite records referred to in the Books of K as sources (1 K 14 19; 15 7 and about 30 other places). The references in K are not to our present Books of Ch, for a large proportion of them are to matters not mentioned in these. Either directly or indirectly they refer the reader to public archives.

As applied to our present Books of Ch this title was certainly not intended to indicate that they are strictly contemporary public documents, though it may indicate that they have a certain official character distinguishing them from other contemporary or future writings. The Gr title is Paraleipomenon, "Of Things that have been Left Untold." Some copies add "concerning the kings of Judah," and this is perhaps the original form of the title. That is, the Gr translators thought of Ch as a supplement to the other narrative Scriptural books. Jerome accepted the Gr title, but suggested that the Heb title would be better represented by a derivative from the Gr word chronos, and that this would fit the character of the book, which is a chronicle of the whole sacred history. Jerome's suggestion is followed in the title given to the book in the Eng. and other languages.

In most of the VSS, as in the Eng., the Books of Ch are placed after the Books of K, as being a later account of the matters narrated in chronologically arranged order. This is a convenient method of arranging the contents, since it is the order in which the adventures are told in the OT; it is a tremendous story in western Europe.

2. The Position of Chronicles in the OT

K; and Ezr and Neh follow Ch as being continuations of the narrative. Chronicles is the name of only the Heb Bibles the Books of Ezr and Neh and 1 and 2 Ch are placed last. By common opinion, based on proof that is entirely sufficient, the three books constitute a single literary work or group of works, by one author or school of authors. It is convenient to use the form "the Chronicles" to designate the author, or the authors if there were more than one.
It is the regulation thing to say that 1 and 2 Ch were originally one book, which has been divided into two. The fact is that Ch is counted as one book in the count which regards the OT as 22 or 24 books and as two books in the count which regards the whole number of books as 39; and that both ways of counting have been in use as far back as the matter can be traced. Both ways of counting appear in the earliest Christian lists, those of Origen and Melito, for example. 1 Ch closes with a summary which may naturally be regarded as the closing of a book.

With respect to their contents the Books of Ch are naturally divided into three parts. The first part is preliminary, consisting mostly of genealogical matters with accompanying facts and incidents (1 Ch 1–9). The second part is an account of the accession and reign of David (1 Ch 10–29). The third part is an account of the events under David’s successors in the dynasty (2 Ch).

The genealogies begin with Adam (1 Ch 1:1) and extend to the latest OT times (1 Ch 9; cf Neh 11, and the latest names in the genealogical lines, e.g. 1 Ch 3:24). The genealogies are incidentally mentioned in connection with them as being numerous and of more importance than the casual reader would imagine. They are some dozens in number. Some of them are repeated from the parts of the OT from which the Chronicler draws as sources—for example, such statements as that Nimrod was a mighty one, or that in the time of Peleg the earth was divided, or the details concerning the kings of Edom (1 Ch 1 10.19.43 ff; cf Gen 10.28.5; 36.31 ff). Other sources have been used for the genealogies than those of the OT—for instance, the story of Jabez, or the accounts of the Simeonite conquests of the Neuman and of Amalek (1 Ch 4 9.10.38–43).

The accession and reign of David divides itself into three parts. The first part (1 Ch 10–21) is a series of sections giving a general view, including the death of Saul, the crowning of David over the twelve tribes, his associates, his wars, the building of the temple, and the great Davidic promise, the plague that led to the purchase of the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite. The second part (1 Ch 22–29.22a) deals with one particular event and the preparations for it. The event is the making of a great assembly (1 Ch 22.1; 28.1 ff). The preparations for it include arrangements for the site and materials and labor for the temple that is to be built, and the organizing of Levites, priests, singers, doorkeepers, captains, for the service of the temple and the kingdom. The third part (1 Ch 29.29–30) is a brief account of Solomon’s being made king “a second time” (cf 1 K 1), with a summary and references for the reign of David.

The history of the successors of David, as given in 2 Ch, need not here be commented upon. The sources of the Books of Ch classify themselves as Biblical and extra-Biblical. Considerably more than half the contents come from the other OT books, especially Biblical and from S and K. Other sources mentioned in the Books of Ch are the Extra-Biblical following:

1. The Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel (2 Ch 11–25; 36.22–33.22).
2. The Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah (2 Ch 27.7; 35.27; 36.8).
3. The Book of the Kings of Israel (2 Ch 20.34).
4. The Book of the Kings (2 Ch 24.27).

It is possible that these may be four variant forms of the same title. It is also possible that they may be references to our present Books of K, though in that case we must regard the formulas of reference as conventional rather than exact.

1. The Book of the Kings of Israel (1 Ch 9.1), a genealogical order;
2. The Midrash of the Book of the Kings (2 Ch 34.27).
3. The Words of the Kings of Israel (2 Ch 33.18), referred to for details concerning Manasseh.
4. Observe that these are books of Kings, and that the contents of the last three do not at all correspond with those of our Biblical books. In the seventh title and in several of the titles that are yet to be mentioned it is commonly understood that “Words” is the equivalent of “acts” or “history”; but it is here preferred to retain the form “Words,” as lending itself better than the others to the syntactical adjustments.

5. The Words of Samuel the Man of Vision and the Words of Nathan the Prophet and the Words of Gad the Seer (1 Ch 29.29) are perhaps to be counted as one work, and identified with our Books of Jgs and S.
6. The Words of Nathan the Prophet (2 Ch 9.28; cf 1 K 5.5) and the Words of Solomon.
7. The Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilohite (2 Ch 9.29; cf 1 K 11.29 ff; 14.2 ff, etc). Solomon.
8. The Visions of Jeho the Seer (2 Ch 9.29; cf 1 K 13).
10. The Words of Shemaiha the Prophet (2 Ch 12.15; cf 1 K 12.22 ff). Rehoboam.
11. “Shemaiha wrote” (1 Ch 24.6). David.
12. Iddo the Seer in Reckoning Genealogies (2 Ch 12.15). Rehoboam.
14. “The rest of the acts of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the Prophet, the son of Amoz, write” (2 Ch 26.22; cf Isa 1 1; 6).

These numbers, from 12 to 20, are referred to as works of prophets. At first thought there is plausibility in the idea that the references may be to the sections in S and K where these several prophets are mentioned; but in nearly all the cases this explanation fades out on examination. The Chronicler had access to prophetic writings not now known to be in existence.

19. Liturgical writings of David and Solomon (2 Ch 35.4; cf Ezr 3.10). Josiah.
22. Chronicles of King David (1 Ch 27.24).
23. Last Words of David (1 Ch 29.27).

Add to these many mentions of genealogical works, connected with particular times, those for example of David, Jotham, Jeroboam II (1 Ch 9 22; 5 17), and mentions of matters that imply record-keeping, from Samuel and onward (e.g. 1 Ch 26.26–28). Add also the fact that the Chronicler had a habit, exhibited in Ezra and Neh, of using and quoting what he represents to be public documents, for example, letters to and from Cyrus and Artaxerxes and Darius and Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezr 1 1; 6 3; 4 7.17; 5 6; 6 6; 7 11; Neh 2 7). It is no exaggeration to say that the Chronicler claims to have had a considerable library at his command. If such a library as this existed we should perhaps expect to find some mention of it somewhere. Such a mention I think there is in the much discussed passage in 2 Macc 2 13-15. It occurs in what purports to be a letter written after 164 BC by the high priest Acazib to Jerusalem to Aristobulus in Egypt. The letter has a good deal to say concerning Nehemiah, and among other things this: "And how he, founding a library, gathered together the books about the kings and prophets, and the [books] of David, and letters of kings about sacred gifts." It says that these writings have been scattered by reason of the war, but that Judas has now gathered them again, and that they may be at the service of Aristobulus and his friends.

This alleged letter contains statements that seem fabulous to most modern readers, though they may not have seemed so to Judas and his compatriots.

Leaving out of view, however, the intrinsic credibility of the writing, the shifting of the statement into certain other traditions, the phenomena presented in Chronicles is a thing too remarkable to be neglected. In the past, men have cited this passage as an account of the framing of a canon of Scripture, the canon of the Prophets, or of the Prophets and the Hagiographa. But it proofs to be an account of a library, not of a body of Scripture; and its list of contents does not appear to be that of either the Prophets or the Hagiographa or both. But it is an exact list of the sources to which the author (or authors) of Ch and Ezr and Neh claim to have access—"books about the kings" (see above, Nos. 1-7), "and prophets" (Nos. 8-20), "and of David" (Nos. 21-25 ff.), "and letters of kings about sacred gifts" (those cited in Ezr and Neh). The library attributed to Neh corresponds to the one the Chronicler claims to have used; and the two independent pieces of evidence strongly confirm each other.

The method in which the Biblical sources are used in Ch presents certain peculiarities.

As a typical instance study 1 Ch 10 in comparison with 1 S 31. In verses 1-12 the passage in Chronicles is just a transcription, with slight changes, of the passage in 1 S 31. In verses 13-15, however, the Chronicler has used the larger pool of all available sources to make up of his passages transcribed from S and K. The alternative is that the Chronicler transcribed from sources which had earlier been transcribed in S and K, and this alternative may in some cases be the true one.

This phenomenon is interesting for many reasons. It has its bearings on the trustworthiness of the information given; a copy of an ancient document is of higher character as evidence than a mere report of the contents of the document. It has a bearing on questions as to what the meanings of the various differences in K and Ch to be regarded as two recensions. It is especially interesting as illustrating the literary processes in use among the writers of our Scriptures.

It is sometimes said that they used their sources not for restating the contents as a modern compiler would do, but by just copying. It would be more correct to say that they do this part of the time. In 1 Ch 10 the copying process ceases with the 12th ver. In vs 13 and 14 the Chronicler converges into a sentence a large part of the contents of 1 S; one clause in particular is a condensation of 1 S 28. So it is with other parts. 1 Ch 1 1-4 is abridged from Gen 5 at the rate of a name for a section; so is 1 Ch 1 24-27 from Gen 11 10-28. In the various parts of Ch we find all the methods that are used by any compiler; the differentiating fact is simply that the method of transcribing is more used than it would be by a modern compiler.

In the transcribed passages, almost without exception, there has been a systematic editorial revision. Words and clauses have been in a grammatical roughness smoothed away. Regularly the text in Chronicles is somewhat briefer, and more fluent than in S or K. If we give the matter careful attention we will be sure that this revisional process took place, and that it accounts for most of the textual differences between Ch and the earlier writings, not leaving many to be accounted for as corruptions.

Of course the most significant changes made by the Chronicler are those which consist in additions and omissions. It is a familiar fact that the added passages in Ch which fill in the gaps of the oldest lists of the kings and their reigns by the bulk largest are those which deal with Chronicler the temple and its worship and its attendants—its priests, Levites, musicians, singers, doorkeepers. Witness for example the added matter in connection with the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem, the preparations for the temple, the priests' joining Rehoboam, the war between Abijah and Jeroboam, the building of the temple by Solomon and Jehoshaphat, details concerning Uzziah, Zechariah's passover, the reform of Manasseh, the passover of Josiah (1 Ch 15-16; 22-29; 2 Ch 11 13-17; 13; 14; 15; 17; 19; 20; 26 16-21; 29-31; 33 10-20; 35). It has been less used than it should be that which the Chronicler in these passages magnifies the ceremonial laws of Moses, he magnifies those of David yet more.

Next in bulk comes the added genealogical and statistical material. For example, the largest part of the preliminary genealogies, details as to David's followers, Rehoboam's fortified cities and family affairs with details concerning the Shishak invasion, Asa's military preparations and the invasion by Zerah, with numbers and dates, Jehoshaphat's military arrangements, with numbers, Jehoram's brothers and other details concerning him, Uzziah's army and his civil enterprises (1 Ch 2-9; 12; 27; 2 Ch 11 5-12.18-23; 13 3-9; 14 3-15; 17 1-6.10-19; 21). As to these features.

The Chronicler is sometimes spoken of as interested in priestly affairs, and not in the prophets. That is a mistake. He takes particular pains to magnify the prophets (e.g. 2 Ch 20 20; 36 12.16). He uses the two words for "seer" (qôshîh and rô'êh) respectively 5 and 11 times. He gives us additional information concerning many of the prophets—for example, Samuel, Gad, Nathan, Abijah, Shemai, Hanani, Jehu, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah. He has taken pains to preserve for us a record of many prophets concerning whom we should otherwise be ignorant—Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun, Jeddo (2 Ch 9 29.1), Iddo, the Oded of Ass's time, Jahaziel the son of Zechariah, Elizezer the son of Dodsavah, two Zechariah's (2 Ch 24 20; 26 13, 15), and the prophets of the time of Amos (2 Ch 25 5-10.15.16), Oded of the time of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 9).

In addition, however, to the materials that can be thus classified, it is the method of the Chronicler to preserve interesting incidents of all kinds by working them into his narrative. When he reaches Jair in his genealogical list, he finds himself in possession of a bit of information not contained in the older writings, and he inserts it (1 Ch 2 21 ff.). He finds the content of the "families of scribes which dwelt at Jabez" (1 Ch 2 55). He has found items concerning craftsmen, and concerning a linen industry, and a potters' industry, and he connects these with names in his list (1 Ch 4 14.21.29). He has come across a bit of a hymn in the name of Jabez, and he attaches the hymn to his list of names as an annotation (1 Ch 4:9-10). There are matters concerning the sickness and the burial of Asa, and concerning the last acts of Josiah, the work of Jehoiachin, and concerning constructions by Hezekiah (2 Ch 16:12-13; 24:15-27; 32:27-30), that seem to the Chronicler worth preserving, though they are not recorded in the earlier writings. The fruits of the habit appear, in many scores of instances, in all parts of the Books of Ch.

As the Books of Ch thus add matters not found in the older books, so they leave out much that is contained in the Books of S and K. Here, however, the question should rather be as to what the Chronicler has retained from his sources than as to what he has omitted. He writes for readers whom he assumes to be familiar with the earlier books, and he retains so much of the older narrative as seems to him necessary for defining the relations of his new statements of fact to that narrative. From the point where the history of David begins he has omitted everything that is not strictly connected with David or his dynasty—the history of the part of Israel as summed up in the long narratives concerning the prophets, such distressing affairs as those of Amnon and Absalom and Adonijah and the faithlessness of Solomon, and a multitude of minor particulars. We have already noticed his systematic shortening of the passages which he transcribes.

There are two marked phenomena in the parts of Ch which were not taken from the other canonical books. They are written in later Heb of a pretty uniform type, many parts of them are fragmentary. The Heb of the parts that were copied from S and K is of course the classical Biblical Sources. The Heb of those books, generally made more classical by the revision to which it has been subjected. The Heb of the other parts is presumably that of the Chronicler himself. The difference is unmistakable. An obvious way of accounting for it is by supposing that the Chronicler treated his Scriptural sources with especial respect, and his other sources with more freedom. We will presently consider whether this is the true account.

There are indications that some of the non-Biblical material was in a much, or otherwise fragmentary condition when the Chronicler used them. Broken sentences and passages and constructions abound. In the text these are largely concealed, the translators having guessed the meanings into shape, but the roughnesses are palpable in the Heb. They appear less in the long narratives than in the genealogies and descriptive passages. They are sometimes spoken of as if they were characteristic of the later Heb, but there is no sense in this.

For example, most of the genealogies are incomplete. The priestly genealogies omit some of the names that are most distinguished in the history, such names as those of Jehoiada and two Azariahs (2 K 11:3; etc.; 2 Ch 26:17; 31:10). Many of the genealogies are given more than once, and in variant forms, but with their incompleteness still palpable. There are many breaks in the lists. We read the names of one group, and we suddenly find ourselves in the midst of names that belong to another group, with no clue to the transition. The same phenomena appear in the sections in 1 Ch 23:2-27. These contain a succession of matters arranged in absolutely systematic order in chronicles and subchronicles, while many of the statements thus arranged are afterwards as to be hardly intelligible. The most natural explanation of these phenomena assumes that the writer had a quantity of fragments in writing—clay tablets, perhaps, or pottery or papyrus, or what not, more or less mutilated, and that he copied them, as brought to him, as well as he could. An modern writer, doing such work, would indicate the lacunae by dots or dashes or other devices. The ancient copyist simply wrote the bits of text one after another, without such indications. In regard to many of the supposed lacunae in Ch scholars would differ, but there are a large number in regard to which all would agree. If some one would print a text of Ch in which these should be indicated, he would make an important contribution to the intelligibility of the books.

On the basis of these phenomena what judgment can we form as to the purposes for which the books of Ch were written? There are those who find the answer to this question a very simple one. They say that the interests of the writer were those of the temple priesthood, that it seemed to him that the older histories did not emphasize these interests as they ought, and that he therefore wrote a new history, putting into it the very facts that he thought ought to be there. If this statement were modified so as not to impugn the good faith of the Chronicler, it would be nearly correct as a statement of part of his purpose. His purpose was to preserve what he regarded as Scriptural materials that were in danger of being lost, materials concerning the temple-worship, but also concerning a large variety of other matters. He had the historian's instinct for laying hold of all sorts of details, and putting them into permanent form. His interest in the temple (we do not here discuss the nature of that inspiration) led him this way. He wanted to save for the future that which he regarded as historical fact. The contents of the book, determined in part by his enthusiasm for the temple, were also determined in part by the nature of the materials that were providentially at his disposal. There seems also to have been present in his consciousness the idea of bringing to completion the body of sacred writings which had then been accomplished. The OT.

Or of the Books of Ch a title which expressed the idea they had of the work. They regarded it as the presentation of matters which had been omitted in the earlier Scriptures, and as such, the Chronicler used them, but to supplement them, as being, along with Ezr and Neh, a work that brought the Scriptures up to date, and made them complete.

The text of the Books of Ch has been less carefully preserved than that of some other parts of the OT. Witness for example the numbers.

12. The Text

42 and 8 for the ages of Ahaziah and Text Jehosachin (2 Ch 23:2; of 2 K 8:26; 36:9; of 2 K 8:8). There is no proof, however, of important textual corruption. As we have seen, the fragmentary character of certain parts is probably in the main due to exactness in following fragmentary sources, and not to bad text; and the differences between S or K and Ch, in the transcribed passages, are mostly due to intended revision rather than to text variations.

In critical discussions less resemblance of fair play has been accorded to Ch than even to most of the other Scriptures. It is not unusual for nothing at all to be claimed as certain, and nothing, for example, as being certain, that "he has cited sources simply to produce the impression that he is writing with authority." Others hurry to the generalization that the Books of K were consulted in Ch (see Nos. 1-7 above) are all of this work, which must therefore have been an extensive Midr (commentary, exegetical and anecdotal) on the canonical Books of K; and that the Mosaic prophetical writings are to sections in this Midr; so that the canonical midrashic history of Israel; and that "it is impossible to determine" whether he gathered any bits of information from any other sources. In the historical theories concerning Ch enters a hypothesis of an earlier Book of K that was more extensive than our present canonical books. And in recent publications of such men as Bühler, Ben-enger, and Kittel are theories of an analysis of Ch into document types, for example, a pre-interim that made no distinction between priests and Levites, or an earlier writing which dealt freely with the canonical books; and the later writing of the Chronicler proper.

What we know in the matter is that three sets of authors combined in producing the Books of Ch—first, the men who produced the canonical sources, second, the men who produced the other sources, and third, the man or men who directly or indirectly put the contents of these sources together into the book which we have. We have no means of knowing what most of the intermediate processes were, and it is superlatively useless to guess. It is gratuitous to say that the mention of sources in it is not contemporaneous. It is probable that among the sources were Midrashim that were nearly contemporaneous. It is exceedingly improbable that none of the sources mentioned were genuine and ancient. All probabilities agree to the effect that A were returned exiles and their near descendants were likely to study the ancient history of their race, and to gather materials for that purpose. As we have seen, the phenomena of the book indicate the presence of an antiquarian motive which was sure to be interested in genuine items of evidence from the remote past.

The current opinion sixty years ago was that the Books of Ch and the whole OT were completed about 404 BC, near the time when Artaxerxes Longimanus succeeded Darius. The statement is now fashionable that the Books of Ch were completed not later than about 250 BC, and this constantly degenerates into the statement that they were written about 250 BC or 300 BC. This view is founded on a few facts of the life of Nehemiah, not later or not much later than 400 BC. In discussing this we cannot ignore the fact that Ch and Ezr and Neh are one work, or, if you prefer, one series. The closing vs of Ch duplicate the opening vs of Ezr. This is not, probably, an inadvertent repetition. The Books of Ch were written later than the other parts of the series. The closing vs are the Chronicler's notification to his readers that he has brought up the earlier history to the point at which he had previously begun the narrative in Ezr.

The testimony concerning Ezra and the "men of the Great Synagogue" and Nehemiah and their work on the Scriptures does not deserve the contempt with which some persons treat it. We know not concerning the Great Synagogue as an organization, but we know much concerning the succession of men, from Daniel to Simon the Just, who are called the men of the Great Synagogue. The old traditions do not say that Ezra was the founder of this succession, but they make him the typical person in it. Two bits of tradition are not necessarily inconsistent if one attributes work to Ezra which the other attributes to the men of the Great Synagogue. The regular fact to remark is that the tradition attributes historical work to Ezra and not to Nehemiah is untrue. Nehemiah was one of the men of the Great Synagogue, and prominent as such. He is introduced to us as a handsome boy, a king's favorite, coming to Jerusalem in 444 BC. In 433 BC he was called" to the Chaldean throne; and the interval of time he came back to Judaea, and presumably spent the remainder of his long life there, dying some years or some decades after 400 BC.

The placing of the work of the Ch at the close of the Heb Scriptures is in itself the nature of testimony. The men who placed it there testify thereby to their belief that these are the latest writings of the OT aggregate. We are familiar with the Book of Ecclesiastes. It is the effect that most of the later books of the OT were due to the men of the Great Synagogue and to Ezra, but that Nehemiah completed the Books of Ch. We cannot avoid including the Ch among the 22 books which Jos says were written before the death of Artaxerxes Longimanus (C Ap, I, 8). Of course the limit of time here really intended by Jos is not the death of Artaxerxes, but the life-time of men who were contemporary with him. It is likely that of Nehemiah, for example. We have already noted the testimony concerning Nehemiah's library (2 Mac 2 13–15). The time when the library was being gathered was the most likely time for it to be used as the Chronicler has used it. Add the important (44–39 Bc) notes of Neh. This mentions Nehemiah latest in its list of OT worthies.

Internal marks, also, justify the conclusion that the work of the Chronicler was complete before Nehemiah died. The abundant presence of Pers words and writing and facts, seems conclusive to the effect that the work was done before the conquests of Alexander rendered the Gr influence paramount. In some of the sections (e.g. Ezr 7 28 ff; Neh passim) Ezra and Nehemiah speak in the first person. The whole work makes the impression of being written up to date. The latest situation in Ch is the same with that in Neh (1 Ch 9; cf Neh 11 3–12 26). The latest event mentioned is the differentiating of the Samaritan schism. Certain enrolment was made (Neh 12 22–26) in the reign of Darius, up to the high-priesthood of Johanan (elsewhere called Jonathan and John), but including Jaddua the son of Johanan in the high-priestly succession. Ezra and Nehemiah were set in the office (Neh 11 3–12 26) and certain natural connections with the expulsions of the Samaritans' brother Manasseh for marrying into the family of Sanballat (Neh 13 25; Jos, Ant, XI, 7–8). Jaddua belongs to the fifth generation from Joshua, who was high priest when Sanballat held a commission from Darius. He mentions a certain Bagoas, "general of another Artaxerxes' army," as in relations with the high priest John.

Arguments for a later date.—Jos, however, apparently regards the Darius who commissioned Sanballat as the last of the kings of that name, and says that Jaddua was contemporary with Alexander the Great, thus dating the Samaritan schism a little before 331 BC. All scholars reject these statements when they are used for dating the Samaritan schism, but some scholars eagerly accept them for the purpose of proving the late date of the last books of the Heb Bible. The argument was valid, and it is completely exploded by the Aram. papyri recently discovered in Egypt, which show that Bagoas and the high priest Johanan and the sons of Sanballat were contemporaries in 407 BC, the 17th year of Darius Nothus, and for some years earlier.

Dr. Driver (LOT, ed 1897, 518) expresses an opinion very commonly held concerning the Chronicles: "The only positive clue which the book contains as to the date at which it was composed is the genealogy in 1 Ch 3:17-24, carried down to the sixth generation after Zerubbabel, implying a date earlier than about 350 BC." Turn to the passage and do your own arithmetic on it. Jecohiah was born 614 BC (2 K 24:8). If as an average each of the sons in the succession was born when his father was about 25 years old, that would bring the first birth in the 6th generation from Zerubbabel to about 414 BC, and not 350 BC. This is not an improbable showing.

Dr. Miller suggests, however, that in verse 21 we should follow the Gr reading instead of the Heb. This would give us: "And the sons of Hananiah: Pelatiah, and Jeshaijah his son, Rephaiah his son; Arnan his son, Obadiah his son, Shecaniah his son." The meaning here is ambiguous. It may be understood to be that each of the six men named after Hananiah was the son of the man named before him (cf vs 10-14, or 1 Ch 6:20-30:50-53); or as counting the six as the sons of Hananiah (cf 3:16; 7:20:21, etc). Understanding it in the first of these two ways the number of generations after Zerubbabel would be increased to 11. So many generations before the early decades of the 4th cent. BC would be exceptional, though not impossible. But the statement that there were 11 generations is undoubtedly correct, and it is probably the case that the apparent 12th generation is an unproven text emendation, and standing unconfirmed in opposition to credible proof.

"The Books of Ch are a tendency writing of little historical value": a distorted picture in the interest of postexilic Judaism"; "some ancient facts, having fullness and tricked down through oral or written tradition, are doubtless preserved. . . . They are few indeed compared with the products of the imagination, and must be sifted like kernels of wheat from a mass of chaff."

These statements, taken at random from the book that happens to be handiest, fairly represent the opinion held by many. They regard the Ch as a fabrication made in the interest of a religious party, a fabrication in which the history has been intentionally falsified.

A principal motive for this opinion is to discredit the history of Ch or certain critical theories, the said testimony being more full and detailed than that in S and K and the prophets. But on the whole question the testimony of Ch is to the same effect with that of the other books. The testimony of those other books is in favor of the Ch. The discrediting of Ch is part of a theory which denies the historical trustworthiness of practically all parts of the OT and NT.

(1) Alleged proofs of untruthfulness. Against the Ch it is alleged that they sometimes contradict the older books; but nearly all the instances are capable of satisfactory solution. The large numerals in Ch, for example those concerning the armies of David, Abijah, Jeroboam, Asa, Zerah, Jehoshaphat, Amaziah, Uzziah, are added as extravagant and incredible. Most of the difficulty in connection with such numbers, whether in Ch or Ex or Nu or Jgs or S, disappears when we observe that they clearly belong to an artificial way of counting. These numbers are given in even thousands or even hundreds (even fifties or tens in a very few instances), which would not be the case if the hundreds and thousands were merely numerical. It is alleged that the Chronicler views the stories of the past as on a larger scale than that in the older books. This is not uniformly the case. On the basis of these allegations the Chronicler is charged with an extravagance that is inconsistent with sober truthfulness, but this charge follows the fate of the others. It is said that the Chronicler lacked trustworthy sources, but that is a thing to be proved, not taken for granted, and we have seen that it is improbable. It is alleged that the text is in such bad shape as to render the contents unreliable. This may be balanced against the counter objections that, since the Books of Ch have not been so often copied as the Books of K, their text is in the transcribed passages to be preferred to that of K. In fine, the reasons alleged against the historicity of Ch dwindle on examination, though there remain some problems that cannot be so easily disposed of.

(2) Truthfulness in the several parts. Different parts of the Ch have their own separate problems of historicity. Take the genealogies, for example. If anyone had fabricated them, he would not have put them in their present fragmentary form, in which they have no story interest, and are of no direct use to anybody. On the other hand it is reasonable to account for their present form by the hypothesis that the writer used such materials as he had. This hypothesis is not derogatory to the inspiration of the writer. Deity saw fit to give these materials placed in the Scriptures, and to this end He influenced men of different generations through providential leadings and through impulses of the Spirit. No one thinks that the Spirit is guided man does not put the good form received from them as miraculous revelations. He received them as the product of effort in study—his own efforts and those of his predecessors. He is entitled to be counted as truthful if he used good judgment and fidelity in selecting and recording his materials.

Similar statements would be true in regard to the other statistical matter, and in regard to the many incidents that are mentioned in connection with the genealogies and other matters. To think of them as inventions by the Chronicler is not congruous with human experience. They are too brief and broken to have interest by themselves as stories. You can assign no possible reason that one could have for inventing them. They bear the marks of being genuine antiquarian discoveries. The final writer believed that he had come across facts which would be of interest if put into connection with the history as currently narrated. These matters are much more real than as facts than as inventions. And furthermore, a good many of them, first and last, have been corroborated by exploration. Take, for example, Manasseh's being carried to Babylon by the captives of the kind of Assyria, Amaziah's military greatness (2 Ch 33:11; 26:6 ff), or the references to industries in 1 Ch 4:14-23 (cf PEFS, 1905, 243, 328; or Bible Sidelights from Gezer, 150 ff) are possible.

Possibly on a different footing is such a passage as the account of Abijah and Jeroboam (2 Ch 13:3-18). It says that Abijah had 400,000 men and Jeroboam 800,000, of whom 500,000 were slain in the battle. One might plausibly argue that these numbers were intended as a notice to the reader that he is to understand the story, not as fact, but as a work of the imagination, a religious parable, a midrashic narrative sermon, taken from the Midr of Iddo (ver 22). Whether or no one finds this argument convincing, anyone can see that it does not accuse the Books of Ch of being untruthful. If the passage is a parable it is true in the sense in which it was intended to be understood. A similar case is the account of Jehoshaphat's peril from the invading nations and the ingathering of the remnant (1 Ch 18). On still a different footing are such narratives as those concerning the bringing up of the ark, the first making of Solomon king, the reforms under

Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Josiah. These are some narratives, with nothing in them to suggest flights of the imagination. Probably no one doubts that the Chronicler intended them to be understood as historical fact. If one is under bondage to the modern tradition which dates Dt from the time of Josiah and the priestly laws from after the exile, he must not count these parts of Ch as falsified history; but if he is free from that bondage he will see no strong reason for counting them so.

In fine men are correct when they say that the greatest values of the Books of Ch lie in their availability for vividly illustrating the great truths of religion. They are correct when they assign great value to these books as depicting the ideas of the time when they were written.

But they are none the less of great value as repeating from other Scriptures the outline of the history of the religion of Jeh, and presenting additional material for the filling in of that outline.

Literature.-Among the older commentaries on Ch see a. Beil in the Kelly-Litzmann series, and, in Eng. in 1725; that of Zeckl in the Lange series, 1876; that of the "Pulpit Commentary," after 1900. Among more recent works, from the point of view which denies the historicity of Ch, see R. Kittel in the Polybiblical Bible and Curtis and Mason in the International Critical Commentary, 1910. A brilliant challenge to this position is made by W. C. van Rheenen, "The Chronicler as Editor and as Independent Narrator" in AJSL, January, 1909, and subsequent number. On the other side see Beecher, Reasonable Biblical Criticism, 1911, chs viii and xxi; "Is the Chronicler a Pious Historian?" in Bible Student (October, 1909 and subsequent numbers). is a defense of the historicity. All works on OT introduction discuss the question of periods of the Ch. In view of the many proper names in Ch, such a book as Gray, Studies in Heb Proper Names, has its place in the chronology of facts, especially in connection with the closing of the OT history, see Beecher, Dated Events of the OT, 1907. For the Egyptian papyri see Drei Aramdische Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantis, Scharer, Berlin, 1907, or the Appendix to Toufan, Historic Research, also Sprengling's article in AJSL, April, 1911. As to light on the Ch from explorations, see "The Excavations of Gezer, 1902-5, and 1907-9," PEP, or Bible Dictionary from the Mount of Olives, 1906. For other books see the lists in EB and HDB.

Literature:

1. Introductory.—For evident reasons the student of Biblical chronology must meet many difficulties, and must always be severely handicapped. First of all, the OT is not purely nor intentionally a book of history. Nor does it present a formulated system of chronology, its many numbers and dates being used principally with a view to the spiritual facts and truths with which the authors were concerned. We are not, therefore, to expect to find perfectly arranged order of periods and dates, though happily for us in our investigation we shall indeed find many accurately dated events, frequent concatenations of events, and orderly successions of officials; as, for example, the numerous genealogical tables, the succession of the kings of Israel.

Furthermore, there is not to be found in the OT one particular and definitely fixed era, from which all of its events are dated, as is the case in Christian history. The points of departure, or reckoning, are found to vary in different periods of the advancing history; being at one stage the Creation, at another the migration of Abraham, or the Exodus, or again the disruption of the kingdom. Ordinarily dates and all-time-allusions are comparative, i.e. they are related to the reign of some contemporary monarch or dynasty. As they are, say that "king Uzziah died" (Isa 6:1), or to some unusual occurrence, historical or natural, as the great earthquake (Am 1:1; Zec 14:5). Only occasional reference is found to some event, which marks an era-beginning; such as the Exodus (Deut 13:16; 26:1 K 6:1).

The general lack of uniformity among writers on Bib. chronology contributes further toward increase of the already perplexing confusion. It is almost impossible to make a fair test of the reliability and proposed harmonies are with each other most inharmonious. The two arts, OT chronology in a recent work (Murray, Illus. Bible Dictionary, 1908), for example, are several hundred years apart at certain points, and the list of dates is so varied that one is handicapped. As the case of Abraham and the age of his famous contemporary Hammurabi, the year of the Exodus, and the beginning of Solomon's temple. Naturally there is least chance of reliance on dates of the very distant past, some of which, e.g. the fall of Samaria and the destruction of Jerusalem, may be considered as fixed. A like wide range of opinion prevails among archaeologists with regard to events in contemporary history, the difference between Godspeed and Hommel in the dates of early Bab history being five hundred years, and the beginning and extent of the Hyksos period in Egypt varying in different "authorities" by hundreds of years. Nor should the difference in the various and total numbers of the Heb, Samaritan and LXX texts of the pre-Abramian ages be left out of sight in any statement of the difficulties attending the discussion of this subject.

These difficulties, and others as serious, have determined the plan of this article. The usual method of development has been to begin with the sources of OT history, in order to follow its chronology downward. While such a system may have its advantages, there is, however, this serious disadvantage connected with it: that the least certain dates are confessedly those at the beginning of the records, and the use of them at the foundation renders the whole structure of the discussion more or less uncertain. Archaeology and comparative history have done much to fix dates from the Exodus downward, bringing these later centuries by discovery and translation almost into the position of accepted history. But the ages before the Exodus, and particularly before Abraham, still lie from the very nature of the case in great obscurity. And thus any system beginning with the indistinct early past, with its compacts of evidence and uncertainty, is much like a chain hung on thin air. The writer purposes, therefore, beginning with certain familiar, important and pivotal dates, to gather around and relate to these the events and persons of the rest. Such accepted dates are: the completion of the Second Temple in 516, the fall of Jerusalem in 586, the fall of Samaria in 721, tribute to Shalmanezer II from Jehu in 842, and from a member of Omri's dynasty in 854. Such OT events as mark the beginning of eras are the Disruption, Solomon’s temple, the Exodus and Abraham’s Call. The material and the plan, then, almost necessarily require that we begin at the end of the history and work logically backward to the earlier stages, at which we may hope to arrive with firm ground under our feet for the disposition of the more uncertain problems. It is hoped that on this plan the system of chronology will not be more speculation, nor a personal theory, but of some certainty and affording some assurance in days of wild assertion and free manipulation.

It should be remembered that this is a study of Bible chronology, and therefore full value will be given to the explicit and positive statements of the Bible. Surely the time has come, when all fair-minded men should recognize that a clear and straightforward declaration of the sacred Scriptures is not to be summarily rejected because of its apparent contradiction by some unknown and irresponsible person, who could stamp clay or chisel stone. It has been all too common that archaeological and historical data have doubtless and required accurate proof of every Bible statement, but have been ready enough to give credence to any statement from ancient pagan sources. We assume, as we have every reason to do, the trustworthiness of the Bible record, which has been corroborated by countless instances; and we shall follow their guidance in preference to any other. The help of contemporaneous history and the witness of archaeology can be used to advantage, but should not be substituted for the plain facts of the Scriptures, which are full worthy of our trust and regard. The province of a chronology of the Bible is properly to present in system the dates therein given, with an honest effort to harmonize the difficulties, using the external helps, but ever regardful of Scripture authority and rights.

II. The Ages between the Testaments.—Between the coming of Christ and the end of OT history there lie in round numbers four hundred years. But while these were extra-Biblical ages, they were neither barren nor uneventful years; for in them will be found much of the highest value in the development of Jewish life, and in the preparation for the Messiah. And thus they have their proper place in Bible history (see below the Table). The birth of Jesus could not have been later than 4 BC, since Herod the Great died in April of that year. Herod became king of Judaea in 37 BC. Paul had been conquered and Jews entered by the Romans under Pompey in 50 BC, the Jews coming in this way under the power of Rome. The Rom age was preceded by the government of priest-kings, with which the Idumaean Antipater became identified by marriage, so that Herod, whom Rome made king, was a Jew by birth.

The period of the Maccabees, which ended in 39 BC with the removal of Antigonus by the Romans in favor of Herod, began 168 BC with Judas. Antipater, who was appointed procurator of Judaea in 47, was assassinated in 43 BC. The period of the Seleucidae stretches from its close with the regency of Antiochus VII in 128 back to its founder, Seleucus, 312 BC. The most notable of these monarchs from the Jewish point of view was Antiochus Epiphanes, who reigned from 175 to 164, and in 168 gave occasion to the rise of the Maccabees by his many acts of impiety and oppression, particularly the desecration of the Jerus. temple. In 200 BC Antiochus the Great, who had been defeated in 260 BC and driven out, and again in 198, annexed Judaea to Syria. Previous to this Judaea had been an Egyp dependency, as after the death of Alexander the Great, 323 BC, and the division of his empire, it had been annexed by Ptolemy Soter to Egypt. Ptolemy Philadelphus, becoming king 280 BC, encouraged the tr of the Heb Scriptures. Work long, the result being the LXX. version, and all it meant by way of preparation for the spread of Christianity. Alexander’s defeat of Darius III, or Codomannus, at Arbela in 331 brought the Pers empire to an end, fulfilling the long-cherished ambition of this Greeks for mastery of Asia. The long reign of the Biblical king of Persia, Artaxerxes Longimanus, extended from 465 to 424 BC, and in reaching his reign we find ourselves in the region of the OT history. Reversing the order of this brief review and setting out from OT point of view, we have the following table for the cents. between the Testaments:

III. The Persian Period.—Entering now the last period of OT history, which may be called the Pers period, we find that the activities of Ezr, Nehemiah and other Jewish leaders are dated by the regnal years of the kings of Persia (e.g. Hag 1; Zec 1 1; Ear 1 1; Neh 2 1); and consequently the difficulties in the chronology of this period are not great. Recently a careful effort has been made to place the events narrated in Esther, Ezr and Nehemiah in the time of the Bab Captivity, claiming Scripture warrant from the occurrence of these names, with Mordecai, in Ez 2 2 and Neh 7 7; but altogether without success (see Prince of Judah, or Days of Nehemiah Redated). These names were doubtless of common occurrence, and their appearance among those returning with Zerubbabel is not sufficient to affect the historical account based on the accepted dates of Ezr and Nehemiah. The attempt to move back these dates into the 6th cent. to associate Nehemiah with Daniel and Mordecai and to place his work before Zerubbabel may be dismissed as purely fanciful, and last impossibly of reconciliation with the OT narrative.

Artaxerxes I began his reign, which gives date to Ezra and Nehemiah, in 465 BC. In his 7th year, 458, Ezra went from Babylon to Jerusalem by the king's decree (Ezr 7 7), taking back with him the vessels of the Temple and much besides for the worship at Jerusalem, accompanied also by a great company of returning Jews. Nehemiah followed from Shushan in the 20th year of the king (Neh 1 1), having heard of and being distressed by the partial failure of Ezra's efforts. Under his wise and courageous leadership, the city walls were speedily restored, and many reforms accomplished. He returned after twelve years (433) to the service of the king in Shushan (Neh 13 6), but in a short time, hearing evil tidings from Jerusalem, went back to complete his reforms, and apparently spent the rest of his life in that work. Although the Bible is silent, such is the testimony of Jos. The Book of Mal, reflecting the difficulties and evils of this time, is evidently to be placed here, but not with exactness, as it might have been written as early as 420 or even later as 400.

The period from the return under Ezra (458) back to the completion of the Temple in the reign of Darius I (516) is, with the exception of incidental references and the assignment of undated books and incidents, practically a blank. Here belong, with Ezra and Nehemiah, Mal, besides Psalms, the first book of the Ps, and those social and religious tendencies among the returned exiles, which made the vigorous reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah so necessary. But the OT does not draw the curtain from the mystery of that half-century that we may know the happenings and watch the development. Beyond this blank we come again to explicit dates. The second temple, begun with the Return under Zerubbabel, was completed in the 6th year of Darius, i.e. 520. The building of it, which had been early suspended for selfish reasons, was resumed in the 2d year of Darius under the exhortation of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah ( Hag 1 1; Zec 1 1). Darius the Great began his reign in 521. Cambyses succeeded Cyrus in 527. Babylon was taken by the Persians in 538, and shortly after the Jews, under the edict of Cyrus, began their return to Jerusalem, reaching their destination by 536 at the latest. Cyrus overthrew Lydia in 545, the Medes five years earlier, and must have come to the Persians' aid not later than 540. His conquest of Asia Minor opened the contest between Persia and Greece for supremacy, to be continued by Darius and Xerxes, resulting finally at Arbela (331) in Gr triumph under Alexander, and the inauguration of a new age.

The Bible from the Pers period of OT history, following the stream upward, is therefore as follows:

IV. Babylonian Period.—Just preceding the Pers is the Bab period of OT chronology, overlapping, of course, the former, and finally superseded by it in Cyrus' conquest of Babylonia. This period may properly be said to begin with the death in 626 BC of Asshurbanapal, the last great ruler of Assyria. At this time, Nabopolassar, who had been made governor of Babylonia, subject to the supremacy of Assyria. With Asshurbanapal's death Nabopolassar became independent sovereign of Babylonia, and shortly entered into league with the Medes, to conquer Nineveh and then to divide its empire between them. This was accomplished in the fall of Nineveh (606) which brought the end of the mighty Assyrian empire, the last king being Sinsharishkun (the historic Sarsæus), a son of Asshurbanapal. Some years before his death in 604 Nabopolassar associated with him on the throne of Babylonia his son Nebuchadnezzar, most illustrious ruler of the new Bab empire, and intimately connected with the history of Judah in the last years of that kingdom. His long reign came to an end in 600.

While the conflict, which brought Assyria to its end, and the attendant confusion, were absorbing the attention of Mesopotamian countries, Egypt, under a new king, Psammetichus I, was developing her ambitions and intrigues for dominion in Asia. Pharaoh-necho II taking advantage of the confusion and helplessness of Assyria invaded Pal in 609, intending to march on through Pal to attack Mesopotamia. King Josiah in loyalty to his Assyrian overlord opposed him, but was defeated and slain at the battle of Megiddo, after a reign of 31 years; apparently an unnecessary and foolish opposition on Josiah's part, as the plan of Necho's march shows that Judah was not directly affected. After the victory at Megiddo, Necho continued his march north-eastward, subduing Syria and hoping to have a hand in Mesopotamian affairs. But in 606 or 607 BC he was defeated at Carchemish and driven back to Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, fresh from victory over Nineveh. In the same year Nebuchadnezzar marched against Egypt, receiving the submission of Jerus as he passed through Pal, and sending noble hostages back to Babylon, among whom were Jerus' son and his wife. After the death of his father and his endangered succession recalled Nebuchadnezzar suddenly to Babylon, where he became sole ruler in 604. It appears that Necho must have returned to Egypt after Megiddo and before the battle of Carchemish, and it was the Jehoiakim king in place of Jehoahaz, whom he carried captive to Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar's victory at Carchemish and his march southward brought Judah in close relations with Babylon, and opened up the dramatic chapter of Jerusalem's fall and exile. These historic events fix the dates of the last kings and the closing incidents of the kingdom of Judah, as shown in the following table:

Asshurbanipal's long reign began in 668 on the death of his father Esarhaddon; who succeeded his father Sennacherib in 681. Sargon usurped the Assyrian throne in 722, and died in 705. Shalmanezer IV, successor of Tiglath-pileser III, reigned for the brief space between 727 and 722. In Egypt the XXVIIth, or Phoenician Dynasty, of which Necho II reigned circa 720 to 667, two of its kings, So and Tahhak, having mention in the OT (2 K 17 4; 19 9; Isa 37 9), and after this the XXVIIth (a native) Dynasty appeared, Pharaoh-necho being one of its kings. V. Assyrian Period and Judah after Fall of Samaria.—This section, which may for convenience be treated as a division, is the chronology of Judah under Assyria after the fall of the Northern Kingdom in 721. As the Scripture time-references are frequent and explicit, and the contemporary records full, the Assyr records are full, and explicit also, the problems of this period are neither many nor insoluble. One difficulty is found in the fact that the aggregate years of the reigns of Hezekiah, Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah (626-609) are greater than 20 years. Another 10 years have also been reconciled, one attempt has been to take the beginning of Hezekiah's reign in 715, which is out of the question entirely, as it disregards the exact terms in which the beginning of his reign is placed before the fall of Samaria (2 K 18 10). Another suggestion has been that "24th" be read instead of "14th"; but this is pure conjecture. There is a simple and satisfactory solution in the chapters which contain the record (2 K 21 22-24) and it is evident that these passages are described. Frequently in the Scriptures records are topical rather than chronological, and just so in this instance the topic is Sennacherib's manœuvre of Judah, and the ultimate deliverance by the Assyrian help. The Assyrian history includes two invasions: the first in the 14th year of Hezekiah (713) when Sennacherib led the armies of his father Sargon, the end of which, so far as Jerus was concerned, was the payment of tribute by Hezekiah, as is accurately stated in 2 Ch 32 18-23. The second invasion, of which begins with the following year (17), was the more serious, and is probably identified as that of 701, when the Netheramor had become king. The necessary insertion of a paragraph indicator between vs 16 and 17 satisfies every demand for harmony.

From 609 BC, the year of Josiah's death, we count back 31 years to the beginning of his reign in 639; he attained his majority in the 8th year (632; '2 Ch 34 3'); the reformation in his 12th year, at the time of the Scythian irruption, would fall in 628 ('2 Ch 34 3'); in the following year Jeremiah began to prophecy; and in Josiah's 18th year (621) the temple was cleaned and the Book of the Law found ('2 Ch 34 9). Allowing a year or two from the beginning of his reign in 642, and Manasseh's long reign of 55 years in 669, Hezekiah's reign of 20 years dating back to 726. Some fixed important dates of contemporaneous history are: death of Asshurbanipal, Assyria's last great king, in 626, with the consequent independence of Babylon and beginning of the 2d Bab empire.

as correct and to assume that the 51 years have been omitted from the Assyry lists (see W. J. Beecher, Dated Events of OT, 18, 19); (2) to harmonize the OT numbers with the Assyry numbers by taking into account the overlapping of reigns of kings who were, for brief periods, associated on the throne. Instances of such overlapping are the co-regency of Uzziah and Jotham in Judah (2 K 15 5), and possibly the reign of Pekah contemporaneously with Menahem and Pekahiah in Israel (2 K 15 23–28). The latter method yields the most satisfactory results, and will be adopted in this article. The chief point of difference will be the age of Solomon and the foundation-laying of the Temple. This may be found by the former method by adding 51 years to the dates as given below. That the method of following the aggregate of the OT numbers must assume arbitrarily that there have been omissions from the Assyry lists, and that it also must resort to some overlapping and adjustment of the numbers as they are given in the text, are sufficient reasons against its adoption. And in meeting the difficulties of this period it should always be borne in mind that the OT is not a book of history, and that dates are given not for any special interest in them, but to correlate and emphasize events. Ordinarily dates are given with reference to local situations and contemporary persons, and not as fixed by some great epoch-marking event. Uzziah's revolt is cited as an example of this, regarding the Disruption not as the Temple building, but by relation to his Israelite contemporary, Jeroboam II.

However, there are some fixed dates, which are so by reason of their international significance, and upon these we may rest with reasonable assurance. Such are the fall of Samaria (721 BC); the accession of Tlithath-pileser III (745); the tribute paid to Shalmaneser II by Jehu in 842, and by Ahab, or one of his dynasty, in 854; and the invasion of Judah by Pharaoh-shishak in the fifth year of Rehoboam (1 K 14 25). There are also certain coincident dates, fixed with fair accuracy, in the history of the two kingdoms, which serve both as starting-points and as checks upon each other. The most prominent of these are: the beginning of Hezekiah's reign, 5 years before the fall of Samaria (2 K 18 10); the synod of Jeroboam I and Jotham (1 Ch 5 17), Jotham's accession being used as a basis of calculation for the reigns of Israelite kings (2 K 16 30); the coincidence of the end of the Omri Dynasty and the death of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 9), Jehu and Athaliah therefore beginning their reigns at the same time; and, primarily, the division of the kingdom and the synchronous beginning of the reigns of Jeroboam I and Rehoboam. Using these fixed dates and coincidences, we may fix the boundaries of the reigns of Israelite and Jewish kings between 724, the 9th year of Hoshea and the 6th of Hezekiah, and 843, the beginning of the reigns of Jehu and Athaliah, to be 122 years each; and likewise the summaries from 843 back to the Disruption to be the sum of several Kinds are found near the end of the period, when conditions in the Northern Kingdom were becoming anarchical, and, also evident coregencies of the extent and evident, of the 2 K 15 27; and yet Menahem paid tribute to Assyria in 738, and he was succeeded for two years by his son Pekahiah, from whom Pekah seized the kingdom. This would sow Pekah only 6 years of sovereignty. The explanation lies in the context: in the confusion which followed the death of Jeroboam, Pekah established his authority over the section E of the Jordan, and to that extent the numbers in 2 K 15 27–32; 2 K 16 1 refer. Uzziah was leprous the last 16 years of his life, and Jotham his son was over the kingdom (2 K 16 5). The length of Jotham's reign was just 16 years, not additional to the 16 of the coregency, as this would result in the absurdity of making a coregent at the age of 9 years (2 K 16 33). Therefore nearly his whole reign is included in the 52 years of his father. For some reason Ahaz was associated with his father Jotham before the death of the latter, since the 16 years of his reign plus the 6 of Hezekiah before the fall of Samaria bring his accession before the death of Uzziah and Jotham, i.e. in 741. So that for approximately 6 years the three reigns were contemporaneous. That these 6 years may not be accounted for by a coregency with Hezekiah at the other end of Ahaz' reign is evident from the age of Hezekiah at his accession (2 K 18 2), and from the radical difference in the policy of the two kings. Isa 7 1 may suggest that Uzziah and Jotham died about the same time. Another difficulty is found at the beginning of Uzziah's reign, where it is said to have succeeded his father Amaziah at the age of 16, but is also said to have succeeded not without reference to the Disruption or the Temple building, but by relation to his Israelite contemporary, Jeroboam II.

However, there are some fixed dates, which are so by reason of their international significance, and upon these we may rest with reasonable assurance. Such are the fall of Samaria (721 BC); the accession of Tlithath-pileser III (745); the tribute paid to Shalmaneser II by Jehu in 842, and by Ahab, or one of his dynasty, in 854; and the invasion of Judah by Pharaoh-shishak in the fifth year of Rehoboam (1 K 14 25). The most certain coregencies are found near the end of the period, when conditions in the Northern Kingdom were becoming anarchical, and, also evident coregencies of the extent and evident, of the we place the accession of Shishak about 950, his invasion of Judah in 929, and the Disruption in 935 BC.

An interesting instance of coregency in this period is that of Jehoshaphat and Jehoram, for while Ahaziah of Israel began to reign in the 17th year of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22:51) and died in the 2d year of Jehoram (2 K 1:17), the year of his death since the precocious Jewish sovereigns attained their majority at 15 years of age (cf 2 Ch 34:3). The coregency for 2 years of Joash and Amaziah (2 Ch 24:23) brings the aggregate years of the reigns of the kings of both kingdoms down to the accession of Jeroboam II, three years before Uzziah’s accession, into exact accord. Finally, the difference of three years in the totals of reigns in was also the 18th of Jehoshaphat, so that the father and son reigned together about 5 years. It is evident that Jehoshaphat ruled before his father’s death, as his age at the time of his reign is counted from the coregency’s beginning (1 K 22:41), but certain events are dated from his sole reign on the death of Ass (1 K 22:51; 2 K 3:1). It is probable that the 6 years of Athaliah were included in the 40 years of the reign of Joash, the legitimate king. The age of his son, Amaziah, at his accession (2 Ch 25:1) does not operate against this probability, the two kingdoms from Jehu to the Disruption is explained by the fact that in Israel the first year of a king was coincident with the last of his predecessor, whereas in Judah, certainly at the beginning of this period, the first year of a king followed the death of his predecessor; e.g. while Asa began to reign in the 20th year of Jeroboam (1 K 16:9), Jeroboam, who reigned 22 years, died three years later in the 11th year of Asa (1 K 15:25). Observation of this principle in the accessions of the first three kings after Jeroboam removes the difference, the long numbers of the reign of Ass being found to corroborate. The preceding table will illustrate these facts of the records, as harmonizing the dates of the two contemporaneous kingdoms.

VII. From the Disruption to the Exodus.—The period now to be considered extends from the disruption of the kingdom back to the Exodus. The reasons for combining the Biblical events within these widely separated dates into one period of such length are evident, viz. (1) the regular sequence of the history; (2) the occurrence of comprehensive numbers for the period as a whole, e.g. Jgs 11 26 and 1 K 6 1; the chronological data of the Book of Jgs, which lead directly up to the developments in the time of the united kingdom, e.g. the narrative of Ruth preparing the way for the reign of David. Characteristic of this period is the frequent occurrence of the general numbers 80, 40 and 20, which (Acts 13 21), are given as 40 years each; and here there may be some overlapping, Solomon, e.g. becoming king before David's death (1 K 1 43-48). We are rather surprised to find that there is no statement of the length of Samuel's ministry, such as its important place in the national life would lead us to expect. The probable reason for this is that his life was paralleled largely by the reign of Saul and the administration of Eli. A period of 40 years is assigned to Eli (1 S 4 18); the aggregate of numbers given for the Judges is 410 years; Joshua rules for 40 years (Jgs 8 3); and finally the wilderness wanderings covered another 40-year period. The sum total of all these numbers is 670—far beyond the comprehensive reckonings of Jgs 11 26; 1 K 6 1; and Acts 13 19. It is evident from Jgs 10 17; 13 1 that the periods of Ammonite and Phili oppression were either con-are not necessarily to be taken always as exact, but possibly at times indicating a round, or generation, number. In order to get the time limits of this period, it is necessary to count back 37 years from the end of Solomon's reign in 933 BC, and this brings us to that epoch-marking event, the laying of the foundations of the Temple in 969 or 970, the 4th year of his reign (1 K 6 1); and from this event we are brought by the addition of the comprehensive number 479, given in the same verse, back to the year of the Exodus, approximately 1448 BC, making the total length of the period about 516 years.

But the addition of the numbers given for the various reigns and administrations of the period indicates over-lapping, which will bring the narrative into harmony with itself. The reigns of Solomon (1 K 11 42; David (1 K 2 11) and Saul temporary or very near together, and therefore that the comprehensive number, 300 years, of Jgs 11 26, reaches from the entrance into Canaan under Joshua down to the age of Samson, as well as of Jephthah. The administrations of Ibsan, Elon and Abdon (Jgs 12 8-13) should then be regarded as practically synchronous with Jephthah and Samson, and the number of their years should, in part at least, be left out of account. The numbers from Samson and Eli to Solomon are approximately fixed, 20 to Samson, 40 to Eli, 40 to Saul and 40 to David; and their total accords with the 300 before Jephthah, and the 40 of wilderness wanderings in making up the grand total (1 K 1 43-48) from Solomon to the Exodus. This proportion before and after Jephthah, or Samson, and the Phili oppression, approximately 330 and 150 years, is in agreement with the genealogies of Ruth 4 18-22; 1 S 11 4; 23 9; 1 Ch 2 6, 24. The shortening therefore of the excessive aggregate of 670 years must be sought in the records from Samson back to Joshua. Assuming that the oppressions may be synchronous with the administrations of preceding or succeeding judges, that Abimelech's abortive attempt to become king (Jgs 9) should be considered as not related in their narrative, his reigns are possible in the three judges just after Jephthah (Jgs 12:8–13) and the two just before (Jgs 10:1–5), it is possible to bring the detailed time-references of the Books of Jgs into satisfactory agreement with the comprehensive numbers. Thus the period of the Judges is shorter than the aggregate of the numbers assigned to each is further indicated by the manner in which the brief narratives at the end of the book—the migration of the Danites, the sin and punishment of Benjamin—and the Book of Ruth, bring the earlier generations into close touch with the later; of the genealogy of David (Ruth 4:18–22).

The preceding table (p. 641) shows the dates of events according to the longer reckoning, and also according to the suggested shortening by bringing into account the possible synchronisms. It should be remembered that these figures are not indisputable, but merely tentative and suggestive.

Chronology of OT THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPEDIA

The Exodus to the Birth of Abraham.—The period of OT chronology now to receive our attention is that which extends from the Exodus in c. 1448 BC back to the call and migration of Abraham. This may be called the period of the patriarchal wanderings, the formative or infancy period of the nation, and therefore of the highest interest historically and religiously. But it is not possible to fix its dates with indisputable accuracy, since, with rare exceptions, the events of the OT record are not related in their narrative to closer or definite persons of the contemporary nations; and since also the chronology of these nations is much in dispute among historians and archaeologists, with variations of hundreds of years.

The chief points at issue here for determination of the chronological problems are the time of the Exodus, the duration of Israel's sojourn in Egypt and the date of Hammurabi. Considering these in their various aspects,(1) since opinions have been divided among the XVIIIth, XIXth and XXth dynasties as the time of the oppression and Exodus of Israel, and there are plausible arguments for, and serious objections against, each, we cannot consider it seems best to fix upon the XVIIth Dynasty as the age of the oppression and Exodus, Thothmes III as the Pharaoh of the oppression, and the years immediately following his death as the time of the Exodus, for the following reasons: (a) This is in harmony with the time-reckoning from the Temple of Solomon back to the Exodus (1 K 6:1), and fully satisfies the Biblical numbers for the intervening period, as shown above; while either later or earlier dynastic period would necessitate either unnatural compounding or ruthless rejection of Biblical numbers. To place the Exodus so late as Ramses III, after 1200 BC, is in the light of the Biblical reckoning an evident absurdity. (b) In the XVIIIth Dynasty we can look best for the Pharaoh that knew not Joseph, as it was the leader of this dynasty, Ahmes I, who conquered and drove out the Hyksos, and left to his followers as a legacy cordial hatred of the Asiatics. (c) Thothmes III was a great builder, and the heavy tasks of the Hebrews would fall within his reign. He was also the champion of Amon, the god of Thebes, having been a priest of that god; therefore the religious significance of the Exodus and the struggle preceding it were most natural in his age. (d) An inscription of Menepthah, son of Ramses II, indicates that Israel was in Pal in his time, therefore he could not have been the Pharaoh of the Exodus, nor his father the oppressor. (e) The objection that Pharaohs of the XIXth and XXth dynasties invaded and claimed sovereignty over Pal is of little consequence, since we have no parallel instance of a sea-plain, and any city or district might secure immunity and maintain its status quo by payment of tribute. In later centuries many foreign invasions swept through Egypt without disturbing the national integrity. As is the objection that the events of Ramses and Pithom indicate the age of Ramses II, it is altogether probable that they were built long before his time, and only restored by him. For these reasons the earlier date is assigned to the Exodus. (2) Whether the duration of the sojourn in Egypt was 430 or 215 years will depend upon the interpretation of the comprehensive 430, or roughly 400, which is of frequent occurrence in the Bible as indicating the extent of the period of the Hebrew wanderings among and oppression by, the nations (Gen 15:13; Ex 12:40; Acts 7:4; Gal 3:17). These passages have been, and may properly be, interpreted as indicating the time of the actual sojourn in Egypt, or the time from the departure of Abraham into Canaan to the Exodus. Modern archaeological discoveries and conclusions from them, our better knowledge of the history and conditions of contemporaneous Egypt, the shortening of the Hyksos period, as of Meyer, Manetho and Breasted, and the acceptance of a later date for Hammurabi, all seem to favor the shorter, or 215-year, view of the sojourn. The remaining 215 years cover the period from Jacob's descent into Egypt back to the migration of Abraham. The shorter period is favored by the reasons already given; but by the addition of 215 the dates from the death of Joseph backward may be confirmed to the theory of the longer period. (3) Accepting the almost universal and well-grounded judgment that the Amarna of Gen 14 is the famous Hammurabi of the 1st Babylon Dynasty, we should have assistance in determining the date of his Biblical contemporary Abraham, if the opinions of scholars about the age of Hammurabi were not simultaneously Goodspeed (Hist Bab. and Assy.) places his reign at 2290–2231 BC; Hommel (art. on "Babylonia," HDB) fixes the probable date at 1772–1717, an astonishing divergence of 500 years, and suggestive of the spendthrift manner in which chronologists are accustomed to dispense of the past. The difference in this instance is caused by the disposition of the IIId Babylon Dynasty, Goodspeed making its more than 360 years follow the Hammurabi Dynasty, and adding the years of the two; Hommel on the other hand regarding the IIId, or Southern, Dynasty as contemporaneous with the ISt, or Northern. But it is more probable that the truth lies between these extremes, since the IIId Dynasty must have had some independent standing, and must have taken a political or religious consideration as a dynasty. This moderate reckoning is now commonly adopted, Breasted placing Hammurabi at 1900 BC, Davis (in DB) about 1750, and Pinches (in Murray's "A. B. Dict." later than 2000 BC. It is in accord with the Bible numbers, as the following table shows, and does not vary materially from the reckoning of Ussher, which was based upon those numbers. Therefore the age of Hammurabi and Abraham may be considered to fit. We may therefore estimate the sojourn in Egypt at 430 years. The former is more reasonable. The Am Tab, preserving correspondence of the 14th and 15th cents. between the Pharaohs of the XVIIth Dynasty and Pal and Babylon, by showing the contemporary sovereigns
IX. From Abraham to the Creation.—One other general period of OT chronology remains for consideration: from the age of Abraham back to the creation of the world, about which in the nature of the case there can be no absolute certainty, and in which there is neither reason nor need for inflexible accuracy. The system, or succession, of numbers in the early chapters of Gen (5 and 11 10-26) has given rise, in the effort to explain these numbers, to several theories.

(1) The literal interpretation, the best known advocate of which was Archbishop Ussher (d. 1656), whose literal arrangement was introduced into the margin of the AV after his death. This theory takes the birth- and death-numbers just as they are, and by addition of the time intervals between the birth of each patriarch, together with Adam's age at the birth of Seth, shows that 1,656 years elapsed from the Creation to the Flood, and 290 years from the Flood to Abraham's birth, according to the MT. But it must be apparent at the very outset, that, on the most literal arrangement of the numbers and the most conservative geological and anthropological estimate, this reckoning is not sufficiently long to satisfy the known facts of the age of the earth, of the life of man upon it, and of established historic dates. Even the conservative system of Professor Breasted (Anc. Egypt) places the first certain date of Egypt history, viz. the introduction of the Sothic calendar, as early as 4241 BC, which is more than two centuries beyond Ussher's beginning of the world. Moreover, at that time an astronomic reckoning time was in existence, implying an age of culture already gone before. This difficulty was appreciated by the earlier interpreters, as indicated by the variations of the Sam and LXX texts, the latter increasing the total of the age about 1,500 years and inserting a new name into the genealogical list of Gen 11. An interesting commentary on the literal method is that it makes Noah live until Abraham was seventy years old, and prolongs the life of Shem to within the lifetime of Jacob.

(2) A second theory is the dynastic: that the long number of a patriarch's lifetime indicates the era during which his house or dynasty prevailed, to be followed by the long number of the next dynasty; e.g. the 930 years of Adam were followed by the 912 of Seth, and so on until the period is stretched to cover thousands of years. But there are evident objections to this view: it does not account for the invariable origin of each succeeding dynasty so near the beginning of its predecessor, and it disregards the manifest trend of the inspired author to narrate the descent of the human race through families and not by eras or empires.

(3) By others it has been conjectured that the units of time have been different in the ancient ages of man; that originally the time-unit was the lunar cycle, by which the 969 lunar cycles of Methuselah's life really should be reduced to a little more than 80 years of more recent times; and that in the days of Abraham a year measured from equinox to equinox had superseded the lunar time-measurement. It is possible that the LXX variations were based upon this idea, since it increased the age at which every father begot a son to at least 162 in the generations before the Flood. But even this expedient would not remove all difficulties from the physical side; nor have we the slightest indication of the points at which these radical changes of the time-units were made. On the contrary the decrease of man's years seems to have come by somewhat gradual process, and not by sharp and tremendous breaks.

(4) Others have thought to meet the difficulties by suggesting the omission of links in the chain of descent, in accordance with Heb custom of omitting inconsequential names from a genealogical list. The omission by Matthew of certain names from his genealogy of Jesus Christ, in order to preserve his symmetrical scheme of fourteen (Mt 1 8), is an illustration in point. As corroborative of this it might be urged that the LXX does insert a name between Arpachshad and Shelah (Gen 11 12). It may be said confidently that whatever theory of the genealogies before Abraham one may adopt, it is altogether reasonable to suppose that one name, or many, may have been omitted from the line of descent.

The dates resulting from the literal and exact interpretation of the genealogical lists of Gen 5 and 11 may be tabulated as follows:

| Death of Eber | 1716 BC |
| Death of Shem | 1745 |
| Death of Shelah | 1777 |
| Death of Arpachshad | 1800 |
| Death of Tsavor | 1820 |
| Death of Serug | 1854 |
| Death of Reu | 1877 |
| Death of Noah | 1885 |
| Death of Shem | 1902 |
| Death of Peleg | 1907 |
If the 130 years of Kainan, whom the LXX inserts between Shelah and Arpachshad, be added, the date for Adam’s creation is increased to 4651 BC. This table is more interesting and suggestive. Noah, Shem, Arpachshad, Shelah, Eber, Peleg, Joktan are contemporaries of Abraham. Shem, Shelah and Eber were living after Jacob’s birth. Adam, Enoch, Methuselah and Lamech were contemporaries; and Methuselah’s long life came to an end in the year of the Flood.

These genealogical lists of the early chapters of Genesis appear therefore not to have been given as an exact and exclusive system of chronology, but it is more probable that they were written to present an interpretation general, compact, or mere outline statement of the origin, early experience and apostasy of the human race, given without the purpose of recording every possible link in the chain of descent, or every incident in the early racial experience. There are many indications, or suggestions at least, that this is the sensible and Divinely intended interpretation, some of which have been the variant items and summaries of the MT, LXX and Sarn; the frequent omission in Heb genealogies of one or more generations, the third, or later, descendant being truly regarded as a son; the age of the world; the comparative antiquity of man; and the more ancient dates disclosed by archaeology. It should be noticed further that the inspired writer gives ten generations from Adam to the Flood, and ten also from the Flood to Abraham, as if by the use of these numbers the human, number he would indicate to us that he is dealing with comprehensively complete numbers and not with those that are minutely complete, arranging in symbolic form the account of man’s descent. See Antediluvian Patriarchs.

But while the age of man may be greater than the mechanical and exact sum of the Gen numbers, we should not be deduced into the belief that it is so great as some anthropologists and geologists, who are prodigal of their numbers, would have us think. The numbers of Gen are much nearer the facts than these dreary stretches and wastes of time. The formation of the Nile and the Euphrates valleys, which furnished historic man’s first home, is quite recent, possibly not antedating 7000 BC; the account of the Flood is the record of a great cataclysm which came upon historic man within these millennia; we have the records of the presence of intelligent man in these fertile and recently formed centers without traces of his origin and development in, and movement from, other homes. Archaeology and ancient history bring civilization much closer to us, somewhat of suddenness, well established in homelands of recent formation. Whence came these peoples whose great works and thoughts are found near the beginning of an era so clearly limited by history and geography? If they came from elsewhere and developed tediously, why have they left no trail of their movement and no trace of the evolution? So late as the 3d millennium BC Mesopotamia was sparsely settled, and Pal in the first half of the 2d millennium was still thinly settled. It is a legitimate conclusion, then, that intelligent man’s life on the earth does not extend far beyond the total of the Bible numbers (see Antediluvians; Deluge).

At the same time it is far from necessary to force a literal and exact interpretation on these numbers, which were given rather to trace lineage, keep relationships, show development under the Divine purpose, and fix responsibility, than to mark particular years.

LITERATURE

The current Christian era is reckoned from the birth of Jesus and is based upon the calculations of Dionysius (6th cent.). Subsequent investigation has shown that the Dionysian date at least four years too late. Several eras were in use in the time of Jesus; but of these only the Varronian will be used coordinately with the Dionysian in the discussion of the chronology of the life of Jesus, 733 A.U.C. = Ionian synchronous with 1 BC and 754 A.U.C. with 1 AD.
I. Chronology of the Life of Jesus.—Jesus was born before the death of Herod the Great (Mt 2:11) at the time of a census or enrolment made in the territory of Herod in accordance with a decree of Augustus, when Quirinius was the procurator of Syria (Lk 2:1). Shortly before Augustus died, the six months older than Jesus (Lk 1:36) and he was born in the days of Herod (Lk 1:5; cf. 2:1) after his father, Zacharias, of the priestly course of Abijah, had been performing the functions of his office in the temple.

(1) Death of Herod.—The death of Herod the Great occurred in the spring of 750/4.* He ruled from his appointment in Rome 714/40 (Ant., XIV, xiv, 4–5, in the consulsip of Caius Domitius Calvinus and Caius Asinius Pollio) 37 years, and from his accession in Judea after the capture of the city 717/37 (Ant., XIV, xvi, 1–3; BJ, I, xvii, 9, I, xvi, 1–3; Dio Cassius xlix.22; cf. Schürer, Geschichte, I, 358, n. 11) 34 years (Ant., XVII, xvii, 2; BJ, I, xxi, 7–8; cf. Schürer, op. cit., I, 415, n. 167 where it is shown that Jos reckons a year too much, probably counting from Nisan 1 and including partial years).

Before Herod's death there was an eclipse of the moon (Ant., XVII, vi, 4). According to astro-nomical calculations an eclipse was visible in Pal on March 23 and September 15, 749/5; March 12, 750/4, and January 9, 753/1. Of these the most probable is that of March 12, 750/4. Soon after the eclipse Herod put to death his son Antipater and died five days later (Ant., XVII, vii, 4; BJ, I, xxi, 7). Shortly afterwards the Roman Passover was near at hand (Ant., XVII, vi, 4–ix, 3). In this year Passover (Nisan 15) fell on April 11; and as Archelaus had observed seven days of mourning for his father before this, Herod's death would fall between March 17 and April 4. As the 37th (24th) year of his reign was probably reckoned from Nisan 1 or March 28, his death may be dated between March 28 and April 4, 750/4.

This date for Herod’s death is confirmed by the evidence for the duration of the reign of his three sons who are supposed to have been enrolled in 750/6 (Dio Cassius lv.27 in the consulsip of Aemilius Lepidus and Lucius Arruntius) in the 10th year of his reign (Ant., XVII, xiii, 2; cf. BJ, II, vii, 3 which gives the year as the 9th). Antipas was the lawful heir of Tiberius and therefore of Philip (792/39) (Ant., XVII, vii, 1–2; cf. XVIII, vii, 11; XIX, vii, 2; BJ, II, ix, 6; Schürer, op. cit., I, 448, n. 46 and 416, n. 167). There are coins of Antipas from his 43rd year (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 121 ff). The genuineness of a coin from the 44th year is questioned by Schürer but accepted by Madden. The coin from the 45th year is most probably spurious (Schürer, op. cit., I, 417, n. 167). Philip died after reigning 37 years, in the 20th year of Tiberius—August 18, 786/3—787/6 (Ant., XVIII, iv, 6). There is also a coin of Philip from his 37th year (Madden, op. cit., 126). Thus Archelaus, Antipas and Philip began to reign in 750/4.

(2) Census of Quirinius.—The census or enrolment, which, according to Lk 2:1 ff, was the occasion for the visit of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem where Jesus was born, is connected with a decree of Augustus embracing the Gr-Rom world. This decree must have been carried out in Pal by Herod and probably in accordance with the Romeuish method—each one's own city—rather than the Roman (Digg., 15, 4, 2; Zumpt, Das Geburtsjahr Christi, 195; Kenyon, Greek Papyri in the British Museum, III, 124 ff; Schürer, Theol. Ztg., 1907, 683 ff; and on the other hand, Ramsay, Expositor, 1908, I, 19, n.).

Certainly there is no intimation of an inscription such as characterized a later census (Acts 5:37; Ant., XVIII, i, 1; BJ, II, xvii, 7; cf. Tac. Ann. xi.41; Livy, Periochae, 44, 12). However, according to Schürer, Staat und Kirche, 1911, II, 215, col. ii, 36) and this may have been due in no small measure to a difference in method. BothJos and Luke mention the later census which was made by Quirinius on the deposition of Archelaus, together with the inscription of Judas which accompanied it. But while Jos does not mention the Herodian census—although there may be some intimation of it in Ant., XVI, ix, 3; XVII, ii, 4; cf. Sanclemente, De vulto. aerrar. emend., 458 ff; Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Beth.?, 176 ff—Luke carefully distinguishes the two, characterizing the census at the time of Jesus' birth as "first," i.e. first in a series of enrolments connected either with Quirinius or with the imperial policy inaugurated by the decree of Augustus. The Gr-Rom writers of the time do not mention this decree and later writers (Cassiodor, Suidas and Suidas) cannot be relied upon with certainty as independent witnesses (Zumpt, Geburtsjahr, 145 ff). Yet the geographical work of Augustus (1912, I, 750/4.) and the inscription lex et urbs imperii by Augustus (Tac. Ann. i.11; Suet. Aug. 101 and Dio Cassius liii.30; liv.33; cf. Mommsen, Staat und Kirche, 11025, n. 3), together with the interest of the emperor in the organization and finances of the new province and the attention which he gave to the provinces (Marquardt, Rom. Staatsverwaltung, II, 211 ff; cf. 217), are indirectly corroborative of Luke's statement. Augustus himself conducted a census in Italy in 726/25, 740/5, 775/4 (Mommsen, Reichszeit, 34 ff) and in Gaul in 757/2 (Dio Cassius liii.22, 5; Livy Eplt. cxxxvii and had a census taken in other provinces (Paulus-Wissowa, Realencyclop., s. v. "Census," 1918 ff; Marquardt, op. cit., II, 213). For Egypt there is evidence of a regular periodic census every 14 years extending back to 773/20 (Ramsay, op. cit., 131 ff; Grenfell and Hunt, *Oxy. Pap., II, 207 ff; Wilcken, Griech. Ostro,ika, i, 444 ff) and it is not improbable that this procedure was introduced by Augustus (Schürer, op. cit., I, 444, n. 46 and 167). There is no certain evidence of other conditions in other provinces must indeed be made cautiously (Wilcken, op. cit., 449; Marquardt, op. cit., 441); yet in Syria the regular tributum capitatum seems to imply some such preliminary work (Dig., i, 15, 3; Appian, Bell. civ., 360; Schürer, op. cit., I, 448, n. 2; Paulus-Wissowa, op. cit., 1921; Ramsay, op. cit., 154). The time of the decree is stated only in general terms by Luke, and it may have been as early as 727/27 (Zumpt, op. cit., 159; Marquardt, op. cit., II, 212) or later in 746–8 (Huchel, Census, 34; Ramsay, op. cit., 155 ff), its execution in different provinces and subject kingdoms being carried out at different times. Hence Luke dates the census in the kingdom of Herod specifically by connecting it with the administrative function of Quirinius in Syria. But as P. Quintillius Varus was the legate of Syria just before and after the death of Herod from 745/7/250/6 (Ant., XVII, v, 3; XVII, ix, 3 and 9; XVII, vii, 1; Tac. Hist. v, 9; and coins in Eckel, Doctr. num., I, 75) and his predecessor was C. Sentius Saturninus from 745/9/748/6 (Ant., XVI, ix, 1; x, 8; xi, 3; XVII, ix, 1, ii, 1, iii, 1), there seems to be no place for Quirinius during the closing years of Herod's reign. The text of Luke does not specify the time at which Jesus' birth (Ado. Marc., iv.9). The interpretation of Luke's statement as indicating a date for the census before Quirinius was legate (Wieseler, Chron. Syn., 116; Lagrange, Revue Bijb., 1911, 80 ff) is inadmissible. It is possible that the connection of the census with Quirinius may be due to his having brought to completion what was begun by one of his predecessors; or Quirinius may have been commissioned especially by the emperor as legatus ad census accipiendo to conduct a census in Syria and the Decapolis. They have been connected temporally with his campaign against the Hasmoneans in Cilicia (Tac. Ann. iii.48; cf. Noris, Cenotaph. Pis., 320 f; Sandelmente, op. cit., 426 passim; Ramsay, op. cit., 238). It has also been suggested by Baur (L’Inscription de Qufa) that by this decree Quirinius may have been an imperial procurator specially charged with authority in the matter of the Herodian census. The titulus Tiburtinus (CIL XIV, 2613; Dassau, Insocr. Lat. Sed., 915)—if rightly assigned to him—and there seems to be no sufficient reason for questioning the conclusiveness of Mommsen’s defence of this attribution (e. Liebenam, Vervallungsges. 365)—proves that he was twice legate of Syria, and the titulus Venetus (CIL III, 6897; Dassau, op. cit., 2659) gives evidence of a census conducted by him in Syria. His administration is dated by Ramsay (op. cit., 243) in 747/7; by Mommsen in the end of 750/4 or the beginning of 751/3 (op. cit., 172 f). Zahn (Neue kritische Studien, 1895, IV, 5, 4, followed by Svetitschew (Zeitschr. f. d. Wiss. in Wien, 1906, VII, 288 f) rejects the historicity of the later census connected by Jos with the deposition of Archelaus, basing his view on internal grounds, and assigns the Lucan census to a time shortly after the death of Herod. This is rendered improbable by the evidence upon which the birth of Jesus is assigned to a time before the death of Herod (Mt 2 1 f; Lk 1 5; 2 1 f); by the differentiation of the census of 747/7 by its use of the 774/6 consuls, and by its designation of the census in Jos with Syria and the territory of Archelaus (cf also the tit. Venet.). and by the general imperial policy in the formation of a new province (Marquardt, op. cit., II, 213). Moreover there seems to be no adequate ground for identifying the Sabinus of Jos with Quirinius as urged by Weber, who regards the two accounts (Ant. XVII, viii, 1 f and XVI, iv, 5; XVIII, i, 2; ii, 1 f) as due to the separation by Jos of accounts of the same person; nor is it probable that the census of Sabinius (Sabinus, Quirinius being assigned to 4 BC, just after the death of Herod the Great. The synchronism of the second census of Quirinius with the periodic year of the Egyptians (Ramsay, op. cit., 215 f) as a result of the reflection, for which occasioned by the deposition of Archelaus; but its extension to Syria may be indicative of its connection with the imperial policy inaugurated by Augustus (Tac. Ann. vi.41; Ramsay, op. cit., 161 f).

3 (3) Star of the Magi.—The identification of the star of the Magi (Mt 2 2; cf 2 7 9 16; Macrob., Sat., II, 4; Sanclemente, op. cit., 456; Ramsay, op. cit., 215 f) and the determination of the time of its appearance cannot be made with certainty, although it has been associated with a conjunction in 747/7 and 748/9 (cf Ramsay and Jupiter in the sign of Pisces—a constellation which was thought to stand in close relation with the Jewish nation (Ideler, Handbuch d. math. u. tech. Chron., II, 400 f). When the Magi came to Jerusalem, however, Herod was present in the city; and this must have been at least several months before his death, for during that time he was sick and absent from Jerusalem (Ant. XVII, vi, 1 f; BJ, I, xxxii, 1 f).

(4) Course of Abijah.—The chronological calculations of the time of the service of the priestly course of Abijah are based on the testimony of Josephus in the course of Jehoiarib which, according to Jewish tradition, was serving at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. are uncertain (Schürer, op. cit., II, 337, n. 3; cf Lewin, Festi Sacri, 836).

(5) Day and month.—The day and month of Jesus’ birth are also uncertain. December 25 was celebrated by the church in the West as early as the 2nd cent.—if the date in Hippolytus on Dan., IV, 23, be genuine (cf Ehrhardt, Altehr. Lit., 1850–1900, 385); but January 6 has been connected temporally with the anniversary both of the birth and of the baptism. The fact that shepherds were feeding their flocks at night when Jesus was born (Lk 2 8) makes it improbable that the season of the year was winter.

(6) Summary.—The birth of Jesus may therefore be assigned to the period 747/7 to 751/5, before the death of Herod, at the time of a census made by Herod in accordance with a decree of Augustus and when Quirinius was exercising extraordinary authority in Syria—Varus being the regular legate of the province, i.e. probably in 748/6. See Jesus Christ.

The Synoptic Gospels begin their description of the public ministry of Jesus with an account of the ministry of John the Baptist.

2. Baptism (Mt 3 1 f; Mk 1 1 f; Lk 3 2 f; of Jesus cf Jn 1 19 ff; 4 24; Jas, Ant., XVIII, iii, 3) and Luke definitely dates the baptism of Jesus by John in the 15th year of Tiberias. Luke, however, indicates the beginning of Jesus’ ministry, and by stating Jesus’ age approximately brings it into connection with the date of His birth. If Luke reckoned the reign of Tiberius from the death of Augustus, August 19, 751/3, the 15th year would extend from August 19, 751/3 to August 18, 752/29; and if Jesus was about thirty years old at this time, His birth would fall in 751/3 to 752/2—or sometime after the death of Herod, which is inconsistent with Luke’s own account of the reigns of Sustius and his son, and was one of the common modes of reckoning the imperial reigns. The mode of reckoning from the assumption of the tribunician power or from the designation as imperator is altogether unlikely in Luke’s case and intrinsically improbable, since for Tiberius the one began in 748/6 and the other in 745/11 (Dio Cassius iv.9; liv.33; Vell. ii.99; Suet. Tb. xi.11). But, if as seems likely, the method of reckoning by imperial years rather than by the yearly consuls was not definitely fixed when Luke wrote, it is possible that he may have counted the years of Tiberius from his appointment in 764/11 or 765/12 to equal authority with Augustus in the provinces (Vell. ii. 121; Suet. Tb. xx.21; Tac. Ann. i.3). This method of reckoning was no longer employed by Josephus or Lewin, op. cit., 1143 f; cf Ramsay, op. cit., 202 f). The coins of Antioch in which it is found are regarded as spurious (Eckel, op. cit., III, 276), the genuine coins reckoning the reign of Tiberius from the death of Augustus (ib. III, 278). If Luke reckoned the reign of Tiberius from 764/11 or 765/12, the 15th year would fall in 779/25 or 779/26, probably the latter, and Jesus’ birth about thirty years earlier, i.e. about 748/6 or 749/5.

At the time of the first Passover in Jesus’ ministry the Herodian king had been reigning 40 years (Jn 2 20). Herod began the temple in the 18th year of his reign (Ant., Passover XV, xi, 1, which probably corrects the statement in BJ, I, xxi, 1 that it was the 15th year; cf Schürer, op. cit., I, 309 f, n. 12). As Jos reckons from the accession of Herod in 717/37, the 18th year would be 734/20 to 735/21 and 46 years later would be 780/27 to 781/28. The interval implied in John between this Passover and the beginning of Jesus is in no way well with the Lucan dating of the baptism in 779/26.

The imprisonment of John the Baptist, which preceded the beginning of Jesus’ Galilean work, was continued for a time (Mt 11 2–19; Lk 7 18–35) but was finally terminated by beheading at the order of Herod Antipas. Announcement of the death was made to Jesus while in the midst of His Galilean ministry (Mt 14:3-12; Mk 6:14-29; Lk 9:7-9). Jos reports that Herod feared the death of Jesus by Aretas, in the summer of 789/36, was popularly regarded as a Divine punishment for the murder of John (Ant, XVIII, v, 2). But although Jos mentions the divorce of Aretas' daughter by Antipas as one of the causes of hostilities, no inference can be drawn from this or from the popular interpretation of Antipas' defeat, by which the interval between John's death and this defeat can be fixed (Schürer, op. cit., I, 443 f).

The Synoptic Gospels mention the Passion Passover at which Jesus' ministry was terminated, but they contain no data by which the interval between the imprisonment of John the Baptist and this Passover ministry could be fixed with certainty. Yet indications are not wanting that the interval consisted of at least two years. The Sabbath controversy broke out in Galilee when the grain was still standing in the fields (Mt 12:1; Mk 2:23; Lk 6:1-5) and the condition of the grass when the Five Thousand were fed (Mt 15:36; Mk 6:39; Lk 9:12) points to the springtime, the Passion Passover marking the return of still another springtime (cf also Lk 13:7; Mt 23:37). But the Gospel of John mentions explicitly three Passovers (2:23; 6:4; 11:53) and probably implies a fourth (6:1), thus necessitating a ministry of at least two years and making probable a ministry of three years after the first Passover. The Passover of 6:4 cannot be eliminated on textual grounds, for the documentary evidence is conclusive in its favor and the argument against it is based on statements of certain patristic writers is unconvincing (cf Turner, HDB, I, 407 f; Zahn, Kom., IV, 708 f). The indications of time from 6:4 to the Passion when the Five Thousand were fed in Galilee—to 11:55—the Passion Passover—are definite and clear (7:2; 10:22). But the interval between the first Passover (2:23) and the Galilean Passover (6:4) must have been one and may have been two years. The following considerations favor the latter view: Jesus was present in Jerus at a feast, (5:1) which is not named but is called simply "a" or "the" feast of the Jews. The best authorities for the text are divided, some supporting the rendering at the end of the verse (5:1) -art. before "feast." If the art. formed part of the original text, the feast may have been either Tabernacles—from the Jewish point of view—or Passover—from the Christian point of view. If the art. was wanting in the original text, the identification of the feast must be made on contextual and other grounds. But the note of time in 4:35 indicates the lapse of about nine months since the Passover of 2:23 and it is not likely that the Galilean ministry which preceded the feeding of the Five Thousand lasted only about three months. In fact this is rendered impossible by the condition of the grain in the fields at the time of the Sabbath controversy. The identification of the feast of Jn 5:1 with Purim, even if the art. be not genuine, is extremely improbable; and no, a Passover must have intervened between 2:23 and 6:4, making the ministry of Jesus extend over a period of three years and the months which preceded the Passover of 2:23. While the identification cannot be made with certainty, if the feast was Purim the controversy with the Jews in Jerus as well as the season of the year would harmonize with the Synoptic account of the Sabbath controversy in Galilee which probably followed this Passover (cf the variant reading in Lk 6:1).

Jesus was put to death in Jerus at the time of the Passover when Pontius Pilate was procurator of Judaea (Mt 27:2 f; Mk 15:1 f; Jn 18 ff). But there is no evidence for the date of the death of Jesus by Aretas, in the summer of 789/36, was popularly regarded as a Divine punishment for the murder of John (Ant, XVIII, v, 2). But although Jos mentions the divorce of Aretas' daughter by Antipas as one of the causes of hostilities, no inference can be drawn from this or from the popular interpretation of Antipas' defeat, by which the interval between John's death and this defeat can be fixed (Schürer, op. cit., I, 443 f).

The Synoptic Gospels mention the Passion Passover at which Jesus' ministry was terminated, but they contain no data by which the interval between the imprisonment of John the Baptist and this Passover ministry could be fixed with certainty. Yet indications are not wanting that the interval consisted of at least two years. The Sabbath controversy broke out in Galilee when the grain was still standing in the fields (Mt 12:1; Mk 2:23; Lk 6:1-5) and the condition of the grass when the Five Thousand were fed (Mt 15:36; Mk 6:39; Lk 9:12) points to the springtime, the Passion Passover marking the return of still another springtime (cf also Lk 13:7; Mt 23:37). But the Gospel of John mentions explicitly three Passovers (2:23; 6:4; 11:53) and probably implies a fourth (6:1), thus necessitating a ministry of at least two years and making probable a ministry of three years after the first Passover. The Passover of 6:4 cannot be eliminated on textual grounds, for the documentary evidence is conclusive in its favor and the argument against it is based on statements of certain patristic writers is unconvincing (cf Turner, HDB, I, 407 f; Zahn, Kom., IV, 708 f). The indications of time from 6:4 to the Passion when the Five Thousand were fed in Galilee—to 11:55—the Passion Passover—are definite and clear (7:2; 10:22). But the interval between the first Passover (2:23) and the Galilean Passover (6:4) must have been one and may have been two years. The following considerations favor the latter view: Jesus was present in Jerus at a feast, (5:1) which is not named but is called simply "a" or "the" feast of the Jews. and reigned until about 40 AD. Damascus was taken by the Romans in 62 BC and probably continued under their control until the death of Tiberius (March 37 AD). Rom coins of Damascus exist from the time of Augustus, Tiberius and Nero, but there are no such coins from the time of Caligula and Claudius (Schürer, op. cit., I, 737; II, 159). Moreover the relations of Aretas to Augustus and Tiberius make it extremely improbable that he held Damascus during their reign as part of his kingdom or acquired it by conquest. The statement of Paul however seems to imply Nabataean control of the city, and this is best explained if the supposition that Damascus was given to Aretas by Caligula, the change in the imperial attitude being due perhaps to the influence primarily of Agrippa and possibly also of Vitellius (Steinmann, Aretas IV, 1909, 34 f). Pallas therefore assumed that Damascus was not earlier than 37 AD, his conversion cannot be placed earlier than 34 or 35 AD, and the journey to Jerusalem 14 years later (Gal 2 1) not earlier than 50 or 51 AD.

Herod Agrippa I died in Caesarea shortly after a Passover season (Acts 12 23; cf 12 3.19). Caligula had given him the tetrarchy Herod Agrippa I with the title of king (Ant., XVIII, vi, 10; BJ, II, ix, 6) and this was increased in 40 AD by the tetrarchy of Antipas (Ant., XVIII, vii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 6). Claudius gave him also Judea and Samaria (Ant., XIX, v, 1; BJ, II, 4, 5) thus making his territory even more extensive than that of his grandfather, Herod the Great. Agrippa reigned over "all Judea" for three years under Claudius (Ant., XIX, viii, 2; BJ, II, xi, 6), his death falling in the year of 44 AD, in the 7th year of his reign. The games mentioned by Jos in this connection are probably those that were celebrated in honor of the return of Claudius from Britain in 44 AD. There are coins of Agrippa from his 6th year, but the attribution to him of coins from other years is questioned (Schürer, op. cit., 560, n. 40; Madden, op. cit., 132).

The prophecy of a famine and its fulfilment under Claudius (Acts 11 28) are associated in Acts with the prophecy of Haggai (11 30). It is said that a famine would come upon the city (Acts 11 28). The famine of 44 AD, which is possibly the "famine of the Lord" which will come in the last days (Luke 21 24), or the "famine of the Lord" (Rev. 6 6) is probably meant by this prophecy. The famine of 44 AD is mentioned by Tacitus (Annals xii, 43) and Orosius (vi, 24, 3) in the year of Claudius, 44 AD, and the generosity of Helena during a famine in Pal. (Ant., XX, ii, 5), but subsequently dates the famine generally in the year of Tiberus and Alexander. The famine in Pal would fall therefore at some time between 44 and 45. (Schürer, op. cit., I, 597, n. 9).

When Paul visited Cyprus with Barnabas the island was administered by Sergius Paulus (Acts 13 7 f), a proconsul with the title of proconsul (Marquardt, op. cit., I, 931). Paul

4. Sergius Paulus

Paulus was an inscription from Cyprus (Cagnat, Inscr. grcece. ad res rom. pertin., III, 930) dating from the 1st cent., and probably from the year 53 (Zahn, Neue kirch. Zeitschr., 1904, XV, 194) in which an incident in the career of a certain Apollonius is dated in the province of Paulus (v1 Paulou [apollou] ep Peoulou [anthi upou]). From another inscription (CIG, 2632), dated in the 12th year of Claudius, it appears that L. Annius Bassus was proconsul in 52. If the Julius Corvus mentioned by Bassus was his immediate predecessor, the proconsulship of Sergius Paulus may be dated at some time before 51.

When Paul came to Corinth for the first time he met Aquila and Priscilla, who had left Rome because of an edict of Claudius expelling the Jews from the city (Acts 18 2). Suetonius mentions an expulsion of the Jews from Rome by Claudius but gives no date (Claud. xxv; cf Dio Cassius ix, 6, 4). Orosius however dates the edict in the 9th year of Claudius or 49 AD (Hist. vi, 5, 15) and although Jos, from whom he quotes, does not mention this edict but records the favor shown by Claudius to the Jews and to Herod Agrippa I (Ant., XIX, v, 1-3; cf Dio Cassius ix, 6, 9, 10; 8, 2), it is not improbable that the date is approximately accurate (Schurer, op. cit., II, 62 n. 92).

During Paul's first sojourn in Corinth the apostle was brought before the proconsul Gallio (Acts 18 12). This could not have happened before the year 44 when Claudius gave Achæa back to the Senate, and the province was therefore permitted by Praetor with the title of proconsul (Dio Cassius ix, 24; Marquardt, op. cit., I, 331 f; Ramsay, Expos., 1897, I, 207). Moreover the career of Seneca makes it improbable that his brother would advance to this position before 49 or 50 (Harmack, Chron., I, 237; Wieseler, Chron. d. apos. Zeitalters, 119).

There is a fragmentary inscription from Delphi containing a letter from the emperor Claudius in which mention is made of an edict by which this position is dated by the title of the emperor which contains the number 26. This is referred naturally to the acclamatio as "imperator" and dated in the year 52 before August, after which time the number 27 occurs in the title of Claudian inscriptions. Gallio may therefore have been proconsul from the spring or summer of the year 51-52 or 52-53. The latter seems the more probable time (cf. Astm. Bourget, De rebus Delphiensis, 1905, 63; Ramsay, Expos., 1907, 285). There is no reference to Gal. (Schurer, op. cit., II, 92).

When Paul had been for two years a prisoner in Caesarea Felix was succeeded by Festus as procurator of Judea (Acts 24 27). The

7. Festus accession of Festus, which is placed by Eusebius in the Church History in the reign of Nero (HE, II, 23, 1), is dated in the Chronicle in the reign of Nero at that time (Act. XX, viii, 9). Pallas was removed from office before February 13, 55 AD (Tac. Ann. xiii, 14, I; cf 15, 1), but apparently continued to have influence with the emperor; for he fixed the terms of his removal and was permitted to enjoy his fortune for several years (Tac. Ann. xiii, 14, I; cf 23, 1-5). His death occurred in 62 AD (Tac. Ann. xiv, 65, 1). The trial of Felix must therefore have occurred before 62; but it is impossible to place it before the removal of Pallas, for this would necessitate the removal of Felix in 54 AD, and this is excluded by the fact that the first summer of Nero's reign fell in 55 AD. But if Eusebius reckoned the imperial years from September 1st after the accession (Turner, Jour. of Theol. Studies, 1902, 120; III, 5, 3, 418 f.), the summer of the 1st year of Nero fell in 57. In any event the removal and trial of Felix must have taken place before the removal of Pallas. The date of the Eusebian Chronicle is therefore without support from Tacitus or Jos, and its value depends on the character of the source from which it was obtained—if there was such a source, for it is at least possible to date it to a late date by the internal evidence of the Chronicle. It is not unlikely that the error of 5 years made by Eusebius in the reign of Agrippa I may be the source of a similar error in regard to Festus in spite of the fact that the framework of the Chronicle is generally furnished not by the years of the Jewish kings but by the imperial years (Erbes in Gebhardt u. Harnack, Texte und Unter- suchungen, N.F., IV, 1, 1890, Die Todesstage d. Apost. Paulus u. Petrus; Turner, Jour. of Theol. Studies, iii, 1906, 350 ff.). There is evidence however in Acts 21: 38 that Paul's arrest could not have been earlier than the spring of 55 AD. For Paul was supposed by the chief captain to be the Egyptian who had led an insurrection that had been suppressed by Felix during the reign of Nero (Ant., XX, viii, 6; BJ, II, 13, 5). Thus the accession of Festus, two years later (Acts 24: 27), could not have been earlier than 57 AD.

But if the summer of 57 AD is the earliest date possible for the accession of Festus, the summer of 60 AD is the latest date that is possible. Albinus, the successor of Festus, was present in Jerusalem in October, 62 AD (Ant., XX, ix, 1 ff.), and while the addressee of the letter is the same as that of Felix (of Ant., XX, viii, 9-11; BJ, II, xiv, 1 with Ant., XX, vii, 1–8; BJ, II, 12–13), it is not likely that it lasted less than two years. But as between 57 and 60 AD, probability favors the latter. Furthermore, to this day the words of Paul to Felix: "Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation," etc. (Acts 24: 10), Felix was appointed by Claudius in 52 AD (Tac. Ann. xii. 54; Ant., XX, v, 2) and was continued in office by Nero. Most of the events of his administration are narrated by Jos under Nero (Ant., XX, viii, 5 ff.); and although Tacitus mentions an administration of Felix in Samaria when Cumanus was administering Galilee (Ann. xii. 54), the omission of any direct reference to Judæa, the unusual character of such a double administration and the explicit statement of Jos that Claudius sent Felix as successor of Cumanus, make it unlikely that Paul's statement is to be understood of an administration beginning earlier than that of Felix. Since the summer of 60 AD, Paul's arrest would fall in 58 and the "many years" of Felix's administration would cover a period of 6 years, from 52 AD to 58 AD (cf Schürer, op. cit., I, 577 f., n. 38). Ramsay argues in favor of 60 AD as the year of Paul's arrest and 59 AD as the year of the accession of Festus (Pauline and Other Studies, 1906, 345 ff.).

If Festus succeeded Felix in the summer of 60 AD, Paul would reach Rome in the spring of 61 AD, and the narrative in Acts would terminate in 63 AD (28: 30). Paul's arrest in Jerusalem 2 years before the accession of Festus (24: 27) would fall in the spring of 58 AD. Previous to the first day of this period, Paul had spent 3 months in Corinth (20: 3) and 3 years in Ephesus (20: 31; cf 19: 10), which would make the beginning of the third missionary journey fall about 54 AD. There was an interval between the second and the third journeys (18: 23), and as Paul spent 18 months at Corinth (21: 1), the end of the second journey would fall about 51 AD. The Apostolic Council preceded the second journey and may be dated about 50 AD—14 years subsequent to Paul's first visit to Jerusalem (37 AD) in the third year after his conversion in 35 AD. The first missionary journey was made after the visit of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem with the alms from the church at Antioch (11: 30; 12: 25), about the time of the death of Herod Agrippa I, and would fall between 44 AD and 50 AD. The growth of the church previous to Paul's conversion would thus extend over a period of about 5 years from 30 AD to 35 AD.

Ten of the thirteen Pauline epistles were written during a period of about ten years between Paul's conversion and his arrival in Corinth and the close of his first Rom. imprisonment. These epistles fall into three groups, each possessing certain distinctive characteristics; and although each reflects the difference in the circumstances of Paul's life and his relation to the churches he left behind, it possesses an essential continuity of thought and a similarity of style which evidences unity of authorship. The earliest group consists of the Thessalonian epistles, both of which were written from Corinth on the second missionary journey about 52 or 53 AD, while Silas (Silvanus) was still in Paul's company and shortly after Paul's visit to Athens (1 Thess 1: 1; 3: 1.2.6; 2 Thess 1: 1). The major epistles belong to the third missionary journey. 1 Cor was written from Ephesus about 55 AD; Gal probably from Ephesus, either before or after 1 Cor, (or Paul had been twice in Galatia (Gal 4: 13); 2 Cor from Macedonia about 57 AD; and Rom from Corinth about 57 or 58 AD. The imprisonment epistles—Ephesians, Philemon; and Philemon about 62 AD, and Phil about 63 AD.

When Paul wrote to Philemon (Philem ver 22) and to the Philippians (Phil 2: 24; cf 1: 25), he expected a favorable issue of his trial and looked forward to another visit to the East. Before his arrest he had planned a journey to Spain by way of Rome (Rom 15: 28), and when he bade farewell to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts 20: 25) he must have had in mind not only the dangers of his journey to Jerusalem, but also his determination to enter another field of labor. 1 Clement 6, the Muratori Canon and the Apocryphal Acts of Peter (Zahn, Einl., p. 1, 444 f.) witness to the Spanish journey, and the Pastoral Epistles to a journey to the East and to another imprisonment in Rome. The two lines of evidence for Paul's release are independent and neither can be explained as derived merely from the statement of Paul's imprisonment in Romans 8 and Phil. The historical situation implied in the Pastoral Epistles can be interpreted with artificiality only on the hypothesis that Paul was not released from his first Rom. imprisonment. The data of these epistles cannot be fitted into any period of Paul's life previous to his imprisonment. But these data are embodied in just those parts of the Pastoral Epistles which are admitted to be Pauline by those who regard the epistles as containing only genuine fragments from Paul but assign the epistles in their present form to a later writer. On any hypothesis of authorship, however, the tradition which these epistles contain cannot be much later than the first quarter of the 2d cent. It is highly probable therefore that Paul was released from his first Rom. imprisonment that he visited Spain and the East; and that he was imprisoned a second time in Rome where he met his death in the closing years of Nero's reign, i.e. in 67 or 68 AD. According to early tradition, Paul suffered martyrdom by beheading with the sword (Tac. Ann. xiv. 98, xxxvi), but there is nothing to connect his death with the persecution of the Christians in Rome by Nero in 64 AD.

Little is known of Peter beside what is recorded of him in the NT. The tradition of his bishopric of 20 or 25 years in Rome (Placidianus, d. altahr. Lit., ii; Die Chronologie, i. 243 f.) accords neither with the implications of Acts and Gal nor with Paul's silence in Rom. But 1 Pet was probably written from Rome (5:13; cf Euseb., HE, ii.15, 2) and the testimony to Peter's martyrdom in Rom (1:9) under Nero in Rome by crucifixion (Tert., De praes. haer., xxxvi; cf 1 Clem 5:1 ff) is early and probably trustworthy. Tradition also associates Peter and Paul in their Rom labors and martyrdom (Dionysius in Euseb., HE, i.25, 8; Iren., Adv. haer., iii.1, 2; iii.3, 1). The mention of the Vatican as the place of Peter's interment (Caius in Euseb., HE, ii.25, 6 f) may indicate a connection of his martyrdom with the persecution of Nero in 64 AD: but this is not certain. Peter's death may therefore be dated with some probability in Rome between 64 and 67 AD. His two epistles were written at some time before his death, probably the first about 64 and the Second at some time afterward and subsequent to the Epistle of Jude which it apparently uses. (The arguments against the Rom sojourn and martyrdom of Peter are stated fully by Schmiedel in the EB, s.v. "Simon Peter," esp. col. 458 ff; on the other hand cf Zahn, Einleitung, II, 17 ff; Eng. tr., II, 158 ff.)

James the Just, the brother of the Lord, was prominent in the church of Jerusalem at the time of the Apostolic Council (Acts 15:13 ff; Gal ii.19; iii.1; and later when Paul was arrested he seems still to have occupied this position (Acts 21:18 ff), laboring with impressive devotion for the Jewish people until his martyrdom about the end of Nero's reign (Ant. Xix. 11, 1; Euseb., HE, ii.23, 3 f; HRE, VIII, 581; Zahn, Einleitung, I, 76). The Epistle of Jas contains numerous indications of its early origin and equally clear evidence that it was not written during the period when the questions which are discussed in the major epistles of Paul were agitating the church. It is probably the earliest book of the NT, written before the Apostolic Council.

In the decade just preceding the fall of Jerusalem, the traditions of the life and teaching of Jesus were committed to writing in the Synoptic Gospels. Early tradition dates the composition of Matthew's Gospel in the lifetime of Peter and Paul (Iren., haer., iii.11, 1; Euseb., HE, ii.23, 3 f; Adv. haer., iii.11, 1; Presbyter of Paphos in Euseb., HE, iii.39, 15; cf 2 Pet 1:15). The Lucan writings —both the Gospel and Acts—probably fall also in this period, for the Gospel contains no intimation that Jesus' prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem had been fulfilled (cf Lk 21:21; Acts 1:29), and the silence of the NT about the issue of Paul's trial is best explained on the hypothesis of an early date (Jerome, De vir. illustr., vii; Harnack, Neue Untersuch. zur Apostelgesch., 1911; cf also Lk 10:7; 1 Tim 6:18). To this period belong also the Epistle of Jude and the Epistle to the He (if addressed to Jewish Christians of Pal; but later, about 80 AD, if addressed to Jewish Christians of Rome [Zahn, Einleitung, II, 152]), the former being used in 2 Pet and the latter in 1 Clem.

Early tradition connects John with Ephesus and mentions his continuing in life until the time of Trajan (Irenaeus, Adv. haer., ii.22, 5; Polycarp, Epistles, HE, iii.31, 3; v.24, 3; Justin, Dialogue, lxxxi; cf Rev 1:4; 2:8; 3:1; 19 35). He died probably about the end of the 1st cent. There is another but less well-attested tradition of martyrdom based chiefly on the De Boor fragment of Papias (Teztc u. Untcrs., 1885), a Syr Martyrology of the 4th cent. (Wright, Jour of Sacred Lit., 1863-66; VI, 71, 56, 423 ff), the Codex Cislianinum 305 of Georgius Hamartolus. This tradition, it is thought, finds confirmation in Mk 10:35-40; Mt 20:20-22 (cf Bouret, Theologische Rundschau, 1905, 225 ff, 277 ff). During the closing years of his life John wrote the Revelation, the Fourth Gospel and the three Epistles.

The word "church," which is derived from συνέλευσις, συνελεύσεως, "of or belonging to the Lord," represents in the EV of the NT the Gr εκκλησία, ἐκκλησία, Lat. ecclesia. It is with the signification of this word ἐκκλησία as it meets us in the NT, and with the nature of the society which the word is there used to describe, that the present art. is concerned.

1. Pre-Christian History of the Term.—Although ἐκκλησία soon became a distinctively Christian word, it has its own pre-Christian history; and to those, who are Jewish readers, who first heard it, it would come with looks at the conceptions of the Jews regarding such societies. Throughout the Gospels and right down to NT times (cf Acts 19, 39), ἐκκλησία was the designation of the regular assembly of the whole body of citizens in a free city-state, "called out" (Gr ek, "out," and καλεσθαι, "to call") by the herald for the discussion and decision of public business. The LXX translators, again, had used the word to render the Heb כהֶלֶד, which in the OT denotes the "assembly" or community of Israel, esp. in its political aspect as the people of God. In this OT sense we find ἐκκλησία employed by Stephen in the Book of Acts, where he describes Moses as "he that was in the church (RVm "congregation") in the wilderness" (Acts 7, 38). The NT carried on the Jewish background history of associations alike for the Greek and the Jew. To the Greek it would suggest a self-governing democratic society; to the Jew a theocratic society whose members were the subjects of the Heavenly King. The pre-Christian history of the word had a direct bearing upon its Christian meaning, for the ἐκκλησία of the NT is a "theocratic democracy" (Lindsay, Church and Ministry in the Early Cent., 4), a society of those who are free, but are always conscious that their freedom springs from obedience to their King.

II. Its Adoption by Jesus.—According to Mt 16, 18 the name ἐκκλησία was first applied to the Christian society by Jesus Himself, the occasion being that of His benediction of Peter at Caesarea Philippi. The authenticity of the utterance has been called in question by certain critics, but on grounds that have no textual support and are made up of quite arbitrary presuppositions as to the conception of the OT God, Jesus had hitherto described the society He came to found as the "kingdom of God" or the "kingdom of heaven," a designation which had its roots in OT teaching and which the Messianic expectations of Israel had made familiar. Yet but now was it clear that He was to be rejected by the Jewish people (cf ver 21), and that His society must move on independent lines of its own, it was natural that He should employ a new name for this new body which He was about to create, and thus should say to Peter, on the ground of the apostle's believing confession, "Upon this rock I will build my church." The adoption of this name, however, did not imply any abandonment of the ideas suggested by the conception of the kingdom. In this very passage (ver 19) "the kingdom of heaven" is employed in a manner which, if it does not make the two expressions church and kingdom perfectly synonymous, at least compels us to regard them as closely correlative and as capable of translation into each other. The comparative clause by the apostolic writers of the name "kingdom," together with their emphasis on the church, so far from showing that Christ's disciples had failed to understand His doctrine of the kingdom, and had substituted for it another notion of the assembly of the Church, only shows that they had followed their Master's guidance in substituting for a name and a conception that were peculiarly Jewish, another name whose associations would enable them to commend their message more readily to the world at large.

III. Its Use in the NT.—Apart from the passage just referred to, the word ἐκκλησία occurs in the Gospels on one other occasion only (Mt 18, 17). Here, moreover, it may be questioned whether Our Lord is referring to the Christian church, or to Jewish congregations commonly known as synagogues (see RVm). The latter view is more in keeping with the situation, but the promise immediately given to the disciples of a power to bind and loose (ver 18) and the assumption of two or three gathered together in my name, are in the midst of them" (ver 20) are evidently meant for the people of Christ. If, as is probable, the ἐκκλησία of ver 17 is the Christian ἐκκλησία of which Christ had already spoken to Peter, the words show that He conceived of the church as a society possessing powers of self-government, in which questions of discipline were to be decided by the collective judgment of the members.

In Acts the ἐκκλησία is to be the regular designation for the society of Christian believers, but is employed in two distinct senses.

2. In Acts First in a local sense, to denote the body of Christians in a particular place or district (cf Acts 16, 15; 20, 6), "the church at Corinth" (13, 1; 15, 22), in Caesarea (18, 22)—a usage which reappears in the Apocalypse in the letters to the Seven Churches. Then in a wider and what may be called a universal sense, to denote the sum total of existing churches, or the Christian society in the world (see RVm), which are thus regarded as forming one body.

In the Pauline Epistles both of these usages are frequent. Thus the apostle writes of "the church which is at Philippi" (1 Thess 1, 1), "the church of God which is at Corinth" (1 Cor 1, 2; 2 Cor 1, 1). In the Pauline "church" Pauline "churches" (Rom 1, 7; Col 1, 21) it is the usage which is peculiar to himself, which may be described as the ideal use. The church, now, is the body of which Christ is the head (Eph 1, 22; Col 1, 18, 24). It is the medium, through which God's manifold wisdom and eternal purpose are to be made known not only to all men, but to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places (Eph 3, 9-11). It is the bride of whom He is the head, the Bridegroom, the One "for whom in His love He gave Himself up, that He might cleanse and sanctify her and present her to Himself a glorious church, a church without blemish, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing (5, 25 ff). This church clearly is not the actual church as we know it on earth, with its divisions, its blemishes, its shortcomings in faith and love and obedience. It is the holy and catholic church that is to be when the Bridegroom has completed the process of illustration, having fully "cleansed it by the washing of water with the word," to the ideal which the actual church must keep before it and strive after, the ideal up to which it shall finally be guided by that Divine in-working power which is able to conform the body to the head, to make the bride worthy of the Bridegroom, so that God may receive in the church the glory that is His (Eph 3:21).

IV. The Notes of the Church.—Although a systematic doctrine of the church is neither to be found nor to be looked for in the NT, certain characteristic notes or features of the Christian society are brought before us from which we can form some conception as to its nature. The fundamental note is faith. It was Peter confessing his faith in Christ that the promise came, Upon this rock I will build my church; and until Jesus found a man full of faith He could not begin to build His church; and unless Peter had been the prototype of others whose faith was like his own, the walls of the church would never have risen into the air. Primarily the church is a society not of thinkers or workers or even of worshippers, but of believers. Hence we find that “believers” or “they that believed” is constantly used as a synonym for the members of the Christian society (e.g. Acts 2:41; 8:32; 10:41; 11:19; 11:28). Hence, too, the rite of baptism, which from the first was the condition of entrance into the apostolic church and the seal of membership in it, was recognized as a sacrament of faith and of confession (Acts 2:41; 8:12; Rom 6:3—Col 2:12). This church-founding and church-building faith, of which baptism was the seal, was much more than an act of intellectual assent. It was a personal laying hold of the personal Saviour, the bond of a vital union between Christ and the believer which resulted in nothing less than a new creation (Rom 6:4; 8:12; 2:2 Cor 5:17).

If faith in Christ is the fundamental note of the Christian society, the next is fellowship among the believers. This follows from the very nature of faith as just described; for fellowship—nature of faith as just described; for ship— if each believer is vitally joined to Christ, all believers must stand in a living relation to the other. In Paul’s favorite figure, Christians are members one of another because they are members in particular of the body of Christ (Rom 12:5; 1 Cor 12:27). That the Christian society was recognized from the first as a fellowship of the members of the primitive church is so commonly applied to those who belong to it. As Acts the name is of very frequent occurrence (9:30, etc.), and it is employed by Paul in the epistles of every period of his career (1 Thess 4:10; 1 Cor 1:9; 1 Thess 5:28). The “koinonia” (EV “fellowship”) takes its place in the earliest meetings of the church side by side with the apostles’ teaching and the breaking of bread and prayers (Acts 2:42). See COMMUNION. The koinonia at first carried with it a community of goods (Acts 2:44; 4:32), but afterward found expression in the fellowship of ministration (2 Cor 8:4) and in such acts of Christian charity as are inspired by Christian faith (He 13:16). In the Lord’s Supper, the other sacraments, the fellowship of Christians received its most striking and most sacred expression. For if baptism was the sacrament of faith, the Supper was distinctively the sacrament of love and fellowship— a communion or common participation in Christ’s death and its fruits which carried with it a communion of hearts and spirits between the participants themselves.

Although local congregations sprang up wherever the gospel was preached, and each of these enjoyed an independent life of its own, the

3. Unity unity of the church was clearly recognized from the first. The intercourse between Jesus and Antioch (Acts 11:22; 15:2), the conference held in the former city (16:6 ff), the right hand of fellowship given by the elder apostles to Paul and Barnabas (Gal 2:9), the uniting efforts made by Paul himself to forge strong links of love and mutual service between gentile and Jewish Christians (2 Cor 8)—all these things serve to show how fully it was realized that though there were many churches, there was one church. This truth comes to its complete expression in the epistles of Paul’s imprisonment, with their vision of the church as a body of which Christ is the head, a body animated by one spirit, and having one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all (Eph 4:4 ff; Col 1:18; 3:11). And this unity, it is to be noticed, is conceived of as a visible unity. Jesus Himself evidently conceived it so when He prayed for His disciples that they all might be one, so that the world might believe (Jn 17:21). And the unity of which Paul writes and for which he strove is a unity that finds visible expression. Not, it is true, in any uniformity of outward polity, but through the manifestation of a common faith in acts of mutual love (Eph 4:3.13; 2 Cor 9).

Another dominant note of the NT church lay in the consecration of its members. “Saints” is one of the most frequently recurring designations for them that we find. As thus employed, the word has in one place an objective meaning; the sainthood of the Christian society consisted in its separation from the world by God’s electing grace; in this respect it has succeeded to the prerogatives of Israel under the old covenant. The members of the church, as Peter declared, “are a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God’s own possession” (1 Pet 2:9). But side by side with this sense of an outward and priestly consecration, there came “saints” carried within it the thought of an ethical holiness—a holiness consisting, not merely in a status determined by relation to Christ, but in an actual and practical saintliness, a consecration to God that finds expression in character and conduct. No doubt the members of the church are called saints even when the living evidences of saintliness are sadly lacking. Writing to the Corinthian church in which he found so much to blame, Paul addresses its members by this title (1 Cor. 1:2). Yet it is true that the word is often used as a title than formal reasons—not only because consecration to God is their outward calling and status as believers, but also because he is assured that a work of real sanctification is going on, and must continue to go on, in the fact that He has given His Spirit to be with and in the church (Rom 8:9).

Yet another note of the church was spiritual power. When the name ekklesia was given by Jesus to the society He came to found, 5. Power His promise to Peter included the bestowment of the gift of power (Mt 16:18).19 The key word was the word of the phrase “the keys,” i.e. he was to exercise the privilege of opening the doors of the kingdom of heaven to the Jew (Acts 2:41) and to the Gentile (10:34—38; 15:17). He was further to have the power of binding and loosing, i.e. of forbidding and permitting; in other words he was to possess the functions of a legislator within the spiritual sphere of the church. The legislative powers then bestowed upon Peter personally as the reward of his believing confidence forward were given upon the disciples generally (Mt 18 18; ver 19.20), and at the conference in Jerusalem was exercised by the church as a whole (Acts 15 4 22). The power to open the gates of the kingdom of heaven was expanded into the great missionary commission, “Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations” (Mt 28 19)—a commission that was understood by the apostolic church to be addressed not to the eleven apostles only, but to all Christians followers without distinction (Acts 8 4, etc.). To the Christian society thus belonged the double power of legislating for its own members and of opening the kingdom of heaven to all believers. But these double functions of teaching and government were clearly recognized as delegated gifts. The church taught the nations because Christ had bid her go and do it. She laid down laws for her own members because He had conferred upon her authority to bind and to loose. But in every exercise of her authority she relied upon Him from whom she derived all power. Christ was with her always, even unto the end of the world (Mt 28 20), and that the power with which she was endued was power from on high (Lk 24 49).

V. The Organization of the Church.—It seems evident from the NT that Jesus gave His disciples no formal prescriptions for the organization of the church. In the first days after Pentecost they had no thought of separating themselves from the religious life of Israel, and would not realize the need of any distinct organization of their own. The temple-worship was still adhered to (Acts 2 46; 3 1), though it was supplemented by apostolic teaching, by prayer and fellowship, and by the breaking of bread (2 42 46). Organization was a thing of gradual growth suggested by emerging needs, and the differentiation of function among those who were drawn into the service of the church was due to the difference in the gifts bestowed by God upon the church members. It was not the need of any distinct organization of their own. The church was with her always, even unto the end of the world (Mt 28 20), and that the power with which she was endued was power from on high (Lk 24 49).

From Acts 6 1 ff we see that the Twelve recognized that they were Divinely called as apostles to proclaim the gospel, and Paul expressly makes the same claim for himself (1 Cor 1 17; 9 16; 2 Cor 3 6; 4 1; Col 1 23). But apostleship was by no means confined to the Twelve (Acts 14 14; Rom 15 7; of whom there is extensive mention in Acts 15 4); and it is evident that the ministry of the word was exercised in differing ways by prophets, evangelists, and teachers, as well as by apostles (1 Cor 12 28 29; Eph 4 11). The fact that Paul himself is variously described as an apostle, a prophet, a teacher (Acts 13 1; 14 1; 1 Tim 2 7; 2 Tim 1 11) appears to show that the prophetic ministry was not a ministry of stated office, but one of special gifts and functions. The apostle carried the good tidings of salvation to the ignorant and unbelieving (Gal 2 7 8), the prophet in the matter of the kingdom of heaven employed medium of fresh revelations (1 Cor 14 25 30 31; Eph 3 5; cf Did 4 1).

The earliest examples of this are the Seven of Jesus who were intrusted with the care of the ‘daily ministration’ (Acts 6 1 ff). With the growth of the church, however, other needs arose, and the local ministry was seen developing in two distinct directions. First there is the presbytery of elders, or bishops, as known to the bishop or overseer, whose duties, while still local, are chiefly of a spiritual kind (Acts 20 17 28 35; 1 Tim 3 2 5; Jas 5 14; 1 Pet 5 2). See Bishop. Next there are the deacon and the deaconess (Phil 1 1; 1 Tim 3 7 8; Tit 1 9; 1 Tim 5 11). The functions of the general ministry of prophets and apostles were discharged by a local ministry. The general ministry, however, was still recognized to be the higher of the two. Paul addresses the presbytery of Ephesus in a tone of lofty spiritual authority (Acts 20 17 ff). According to the Did, a true prophet when he visits a church is to take precedence over the resident bishops and deacons (Did 10 7; 13 3).

HOMESTAFF

The object here sought is to discover what kind of church government is mirrored in the NT. To do this with perfect definiteness is, no doubt, quite impossible. Certain general features, however, may clearly be seen.

I. APPROACH TO THE SUBJECT.—The subject is best approached through the Gr word ἐκκλησία, τή 'church.” Passing by the history of this word, and its connection with the Heb words 'ĕḵkhāh and ḫālā (which the LXX sometimes renders ἔκκλησια, ekkleshia), we come at once to the NT usage. Two perfectly distinct senses are found, viz. a general and a local.
Christ is "head over all things to the church, which is his body . . . ." (Eph 1:22); "the general assembly and church of the firstborn, who are enrolled in heaven" (He 12:23). Here we have "church" in the Sense broadest sense, including all the redeemed in earth and heaven, and in all ages (see also Eph 1:22; 3:10; 5:22-27; Col 1:24; He 12:23).

Here the Scripture passages are very numerous. In some cases, the word is used in the sing., and in others the pl.; in some it is used with reference to a specified church, as in Acts 11:26, Paul and Barnabas were "gathered together with the church," where the church at Antioch is meant. In Acts 14:23, Paul and Barnabas are said to have "appointed elders in every church," that is, churches which they had planted. In Rev 2 and 3 the seven churches of Asia Minor are addressed. In Acts 16:5 we are told that the churches were strengthened in the faith." On the local sense see, further, Acts 8:1; 15:4; 16:5; 20:17; Rom 16:4; 1 Cor 1:2; 6:4; 11:16; Gal 1:22, and many other places.

There are a few passages that do not seem exactly to fit into either of the above categories. Such for example Mt 18:17; 1 Cor 12:28, where it seems best to understand a generic sense. Such, also, are passages like Acts 9:31, and 1 Cor 10:32, where a collective sense best suits the cases. Church government in the NT applies only to the local bodies.

II. Internal Order.—With respect to the constitution and life of these NT churches, several points may be made out beyond reasonable doubt.

They were composed of persons who professed faith in Christ, and who were believed to have been regenerated, and who had been baptized. See Acts 2:41.44.47 (RV "added to them"); 8:12; Rom 1:8; 6:4; 10:9.10; 1 Cor 1:2; Col 1:24; 1 Tim 6:12, and others, where they are called "saints," "sons of God," "faithful brethren," "sacraments in Christ Jesus."

They are definitely and permanently organized bodies, and have temporary and loose aggregations of individuals. It is quite imposing, for example, to regard the church at Antioch as a loose aggregation of people for a passing purpose. The letter of Paul to the churches at Rome, Corinth, Philippi, Thessalonica, cannot be regarded as addressed to other than permanent and definitely organized bodies. They were served by two classes of ministers—one general, the other local.

(1) General.—At the head of these is the "apostle" (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:11). His official relation to the churches was general. He did not necessarily belong to the group of the original Eleven. Besides Mat-mias (Acts 1:26), Paul and Barnabas (1 Cor 9:5.6), James, the Lord's brother (Gal 1:19), Andronicus and Junia (Rom 16:7) are reckoned as "apostles." The one invariable and necessary qualification of an apostle was that he should have seen the Lord after the Resurrection (Acts 1:22; 1 Cor 9:1). Another qualification was to have wrought "the signs of an apostle" (2 Cor 12:12; cf 1 Cor 9:2). He was to bear witness to what he had seen and heard, to preach the gospel of the kingdom (Acts 1:8; 1 Cor 17), to found churches and have a general care of them (2 Cor 11:28). From the nature of his chief qualification, his office was temporary.

Next comes the "prophet." His relation to the churches, also, was general. It was not necessary that he should have been the Lord, but it appertained to his spiritual function that he should have revelations (Eph 3:5). There is no indication that his office was in any sense administrative.

After the "prophet" come the "evangelist" and "teacher," the first, a traveling preacher, the second, one who had special aptitude for giving instruction.

After the "teacher" and "evangelist" follow a group of special gifts of "healing," "helps," "governments," that is, "head" and "governments" are to be identified with "deacons" and "bishops," to be spoken of later. The other items in this part of Paul's list seem to refer to special charisms.

(2) Local.—There were two clearly distinct offices of a local and permanent kind in the NT churches. Paul (Phil 1:1) addresses all the saints in Christ Jesus that are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." See Bishop; Deacon.

First, the most common designation of the first of these officers is "elder" (πρεσβύτερος, presbýteros). In one passage (Eph 4:11) he is called "pastor" (προειδός, poimēn). In Acts 19:27, it becomes clear that the office of elder, bishop, and pastor are the same. For there the apostle charges the elders of the church at Ephesus to teach the church in which the Holy Spirit has made them bishops (cf Titus 1:5.7; 1 Pet 5:1.2).

The function of the elders was, in general, spiritual, but involved an oversight of all the affairs of the church (1 Tim 3:2; 5:17).

As to the second of the local church officers, it has to be said that little is given us in the NT. That the office of deacon originated with the appointment of the Seven in Acts 6 is not certain. If we compare the qualifications there given by the apostles with those given by Paul in 1 Tim 3:8–13, it seems quite probable that the necessity which arose at Jerusalem, and which led to the appointment of the Seven was really the occasion for originating the office of deacon in the churches. The work assigned the Seven was secular, that is to say, the "service of tables." They were to relieve the apostles of that part of the work. A similar relation to the work of the elders seems to have been borne by these deacons.

Again, they exercised the highest ecclesiastical functions.

(1) They had control of membership.—In Mt 18:17, Our Lord, by anticipation, lodges final action, in the sphere of the local church, with the church. When the church has taken action, the matter is ended.

4. Ecclesi- siastical Functions There is no direction to take it to a higher court. In the church at Corinth, there was a man who was guilty of an infamous offence against purity. With regard to the case, Paul urged the most summary discipline (1 Cor 5:5). If the church should act upon the judgment which he communicated to them, they would act when "gathered together"; that is to say, action would be taken in conference of the church. In 2 Cor 2, a reference to the case shows that they had acted upon his advice, and that the action was "unto the majority of the many, the more, 2 Cor 2:6"). In 2 Cor 2 he counsels restoration of this excluded member now repentant. Exclusion and restoration of members were to be effected by a church. This, of course, carried with it the reception of members in the first instance.

This was true in case of the Seven (Acts 6:3–13; see other cases in Acts 15:22; 1 Cor 16:3; 2 Cor 8:1 f; Phil 2:25). Acts 14:23 and Titus 1:5

Churl, churl (יֵשָׁא or יֵשָׁא, kīlay or kīlay). The Heb word occurs only in Isa 32:5.7, in the latter ver in a form slightly modified so as to produce a pleasing assonance with the word immediately following. The word probably means "crafty" or "miserly," both ideas being suitable to the context, though "miserly" accords with the setting in Isa somewhat better than "crafty." In I S 25:3 the Heb ëkāshe which means "hard," "severe," "rough," is rendered "churlish." In Saxon, churl, as the name for the lowest order of freemen, came to be used of persons boorish in man-
ter. The rough and ill-mannered Nabal is aptly described as churlish. John Richard Sampey

Chushan-Rishathaim, kū-shan-rish-a-thā'im. See CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.

Chusi, kū′ši, kū′ši (Χωΐς, Chois). A place only named in Jth 7 18, as near Ekrebel on the brook Mochar. It was in central Pal, and has with some probability been identified with Qūzā, a village 51 miles S. of Nablus and 5 miles W. of Agrābeh (Ekrebel).

Chuzas, kū′zas, chū′zas (Χουζάς, Chouzas; AV Chusa). The steward of Herod Antipas. In Luke 8 3 we are told that such men should be good citizens (Mt 22 15-22); so did the apostles (Rom 13 1-7; 1 Pet 2 13-16). Jesus also taught the spirituality of His Kingdom: "My kingdom is not of this world" (Jn 18 36). It follows that if there be life in a church touches the civic life of the community has the civil authority any right to interfere.

IV. Co-operative Relations.—While each local church, according to the NT, is independent of every other in the sense that no other has jurisdiction over it, yet cooperative relations were entered into by NT churches. Examples and indications of that may be found in Rom 16 26-27; 2 Cor 8, 9; Gal 2 10; Rom 15 1; 3 Jn ver 8. The principle of cooperation effective in those cases is susceptible of indefinite expansion. Churches may properly cooperate in matters of discipline, by seeking and giving counsel, and by respecting each other's disciplinary measures. In the great, paramount business of evangelizing and teaching the nations they may cooperate in a multitude of ways. There is no sphere of general Christian activity in which the churches may not voluntarily and freely cooperate for the betterment of the world, the salvation of humanity. For other statements see Bishop; Government; Ministry, etc.

Cilicia, si-lish′i-a (ἡ Κιλλίκεια, hē Kilkīkia): An important province at the S.E. angle of Asia Minor, corresponding nearly with the modern Turkish vilasyet of Adamas; enfolded between the Taurus mountains and the Mediterranean Sea, with the Amuq plain on the E. and Pamphylia on the W.; chief rivers, the Pyramus, Sarus, Cydnus and Caecus. The character of Cilician history has been largely determined by the physical features of the province. It is divided by nature into mountainous part to the W., called Trachela, and a broad, alluvial plain, hot and fertile, toward the E., termed Campestris or Pedias. Cilicia has always been isolated from its neighbors by land by its enfolding mountains, save for its two famous mountain passes, the "Syrian Gates," which provide an easy road to Antioch and the S., and the wonderful "Cilician Gates," which open a road to central and western Asia Minor. Through these passes the armies and the pilgrims, the trade and the travel of the cents, have made their way. Alexander was one of the most renowned leaders of such expeditions, and at Issus he met and shateted the power of the Pers empire.

The early settlers of Cilicia are held to have been Sem Syriens and Pheonicians, but in the still earlier days the inhabitants must have been Hittites. While few Hittite remains have been brought to light in Cilicia proper, the province was so surrounded by Hittites, and such important works of Hittite art and industry remain on the outskirts of the province, as at Ivriz, Marash, Sinjri-Jv and Sakhe Gezti, that the intervening territory could hardly be divided by a line not surrounding the Hittite art and industry.

Cilicia appears as independent under Syrenness, a contemporary of Alyattes of Lydia, 610 BC. Later it passed under the Persians, 510–50 BC. It retains its separate line of kings. After Alexander the Seleucid rulers governed Cilicia from Antioch. The disturbances of the times enabled the pirates so to multiply and establish themselves in their home base, Cilicia, Trachis, that they became the scourge of the Mediterranean until their power was broken by Pompey (67–66 BC). Cilicia was by degrees incorporated in the Rom administration, and Cleus, the orator, was governor (51–50 BC).

Armenians migrating from the N. founded a kingdom in Cilicia under Roupen which was terminated by the overburden of Persic dominion, or by the conquering Turks in 1393. A remnant of this kingdom survives in the separate Armenian catholic of Sis, which has jurisdiction over a few bishoprics, and Armenians are among the most virile of the present inhabitants of that province.

CINNAMON, sin'a-mon (ניִנָמ, קינָנָם, קִינָן), kínán).—Mentioned, like cassia, as a perfume. In Ex 30 23 it is one of the ingredients of the “holy anointing oil”; in Prov 7 17 it is, along with myrrh and aloes, a perfume for a bed; in Cant 4 14 it is a very precious spice. Cinnamon is (Rev 18 13) part of the merchandise of “Babylon the great.”

Cinnamon is the product of Cinnamomum zeylanicum, a laurel-like plant widely cultivated in Ceylon and Java. It has a profuse white blossom, succeeded by a nut from which the fragrant oil is obtained. The wood is the inner bark from branches which have reached a diameter of from 2 to 3 inches; the epidermis and pulpy matter are carefully scraped off before drying. In commerce the cheaper Cinnamomum burmanicum, a laurel-like plant widely cultivated in Ceylon and Java.

proofs of conservatism in religion. According to the strange measure account of the circumcisc by Zipporah of her eldest son (Ex 4:25) the performance of the rite in the case of the son aprently possesses a vicarious value, for thereby Moses becomes a "bridegroom of blood." The marriage bond is ratified by the rite of blood (see 4 below).
But it is possible that the authorities, meaning that is owing to the fact that Moses had not been circumcised (the "reproof of Egypt") he was not fit to enter the matrimonial estate (see 3 below).

The different theories with regard to the origin of the ancient circumcision among the Egyptians or of Origin suggest, that it was a sanitary operation. But all suggestions of a secular, i.e. non-religious, origin to the rite, fall to do justice to the place and importance of religion in the life of the primitive man.
(2) It was a tribal mark. Tattooed marks frequently answered the purpose, although they may have been originally charms. The tribal mark engraved on the member of the tribe to recognize another and thus avoid injuring or slaying a fellow-tribe-man. It also enabled the tribal deity to recognize a member of the tribe which was under his special protection. A mark was placed on Cain to indicate the special protection the Lord gave to Yahweh (Gen 15). It has been suggested, in the light of Isa 44:5 RVm, that the employer's mark was engraved (tattooed) on the slave's hand.
The prophet represents Jews as inscribing on their hands that they belong to Yahweh. The walls of Jerus are engraved on Yahweh's palms (Isa 49:16). On the other hand "cuttings in the flesh" are prohibited in Lev 19:28 because they were common in the case of the non-Jewish religions. Such tattooed marks might be made in conspicuous places when it was necessary that they should be easily seen, but there might be reason for secrecy so that the marks might be known only to the members of the tribe in question.
(3) It was a rite which celebrated the coming of age of the person. It signified the attainment of puberty and of the right to marry and to enjoy full civic privileges.
(4) As human sacrifices began to be done away with, the sacrifice of the most easily removed portion of the anatomy provided a victim for his offering.
(5) It was a sacramental operation. "The shedding of blood" was necessary to the validity of any covenant between tribes or individuals.
The rite of blood signifies the exchange of blood, the establishing of a blood bond and therefore the establishment of physical affinity between them. An alliance based on blood-relationship was inviolable. In the same way the tribal god was supposed to share in the blood of the sacrificed animal, and a sacred bond was established between him and the tribe. It is not quite obvious why circumcision should be necessary in connection with such a ceremony. But it may be pointed out that the process of generation excited the wonder and awe of primitive man. The prosperity of the tribe depended on the successful issue of the marriage bond, and a part of the body which had so much to do with the continuation and numerical strength of the tribe would naturally be fixed upon in connection with the covenant of blood. In confirmation of the last explanation it is urged that in the case of the covenant between Jeh and Abraham circumcision was the rite that ratified the agreement. In opposition to (3) it has been urged that among the Hebrews circumcision was performed in the child was 8 days old. But this might have been an innovation among the Hebrews, due to ignorance of the original significance of the rite. If circumcision conferred upon the person circumcised the right to the enjoyment of the blessings connected with membership in the tribe it was natural that particular ceremonies such that such an initiatory act should be performed early in life. The question of adult and infant baptism is capable of similar explanation. When we examine explanations (2), (3), (4), (5), we find that they are really different forms of the same theory. There can be no doubt that circumcision was originally a religious act. Membership in the tribe, entrance upon the rights of citizenship, partici-patation in the religious practices of the tribe—these privileges are interdependent. If a person had experienced the rite of blood stood within the scope of the covenant which existed between the tribe and the tribal god, and enjoyed all the privileges of tribal society. It is easily understood why the historian carefully relates the circumcision of the Israelites by Joshua on their arrival in Canaan.
It was necessary, in view of the possible intermingling of the conquerors and the conquered, that the distinctive marks of the Abrahamic covenant should be preserved, and that it should be emphasized that they are no better than Egyptians, Edomites, Moabites and Ammonites.
They are uncircumcised in heart. Paul uses the term circumcision for this outward circumcision unaccompanied by any spiritual change (Phil 3:2).
The question of circumcision occasioned a protracted strife among the early Christians. Judaizing Christians argued for the necessity of circumcision. It was a reminiscence of the unrelenting particularism which had sprung up during the prolonged oppression of the Gr and Rom period.
According to their view salvation was of the Jews and for the Jews. It was necessary to become a Jew in order to become a Christian. Paul consented to circumcision in the case of Timothy "because of the Jews" (Acts 16:3). But he saw that a principle was at stake and in most of his epistles he points out the sheer futility of the contention of the Judaizers. (See commentary on Ro, Ho, and Co).

In a few suggestive passages we find a fig. application of the term. For three years after the settlement in Canaan the "fruit of the land" was to be considered as uncircumcircumcised (Jer 6:10). "The fruit of the land" (Lev 25:23) meant the property of the Baalim, the gods of Pal. The fruit of the fourth year belonged to Yahweh. Moses with characteristic humility described himself as a man of "uncircumcised lips" (Ex 6:30). Jeremiah charges his contemporaries with having their ears uncircumcised (Jer 6:10) and their heart (9:26). "An uncircumcised heart is one which is, as it were, closed in, and so impervious to good influences and good impressions, just as an uncircumcised ear (Jer 6:10) is an ear which,
from the same cause, hears imperfectly; and uncircumcised lips (cf Ex 6:12-30) are lips which open and speak with difficulty" (Driver on Dt 10:16).

Several words are rendered by “cistern,” “well,” “pool,” the relations of which in AV and RV are as follows: (Cistern)”אָבָר, bēr (Jer 2 13, etc), or לְמַעַן, bār (2 K 18 31). The latter word is frequently in AV ‘well.’ RV in these cases changes to “cistern” (1 Ch 27 10; Neh 9 25) or to the more correct “cistern” (Isa 30 14, 21). Use of Terms The words נַח, gebeh ( Isa 30 14, 21; גֶּבֶר, Jer 14 3) rendered “pit” in AV are changed to “cistern” (RV) in the latter in ARV only. The proper Heb word for “well” is לָיֵין, ’ayin (seen in Beer-sheba, “well of the earth,” Gen 21 31), but other terms are thus rendered in AV, as לְמַעַן, ayin (Gen 24 13 16, etc, and frequently), לָיֵין, ’ayin (Josh 18 15), בֶּרֶקֶד, ma‘ker (Prov 10 11). In these cases RV usually changes to “fountain”: in Ex 15 27, however, it renders ayin by “springs,” and in Ps 84 6, ma‘yan by “place of springs.” “Pool,” לָיֵין, ‘apham (Isa 14 23, etc; in AV, Ex 7 19; § 5, rendered “ponds”); more frequently לֶמֶנָּה, berakkhah (2 § 1 12; 4 12, etc). In Ps 84 6 the cognate מַעֲנָה, ma‘annah, is changed to “blessing.” In the NT “well” represents the two words: πηγή, pēgh (Jn 4 1 14; in RV “spring”); 2 Pet 2 17; RV renders “springs,” and φραγμός, phragmos (Jn 4 11 12). “Pool” is κολοσσή, kolossē, in Jn 5 2 4 7; 9 7 11.

The efforts made to supplement the natural water supply, both in agricultural and in populated areas, before as well as after the

1. General Conquest, are clearly seen in the innumerable cisterns, wells and pools which abound throughout Pal. The rainy season, upon which the various storage systems depend, commences at the end of October and ends in the beginning of May. In Jerus, the mean rainfall in 41 years up to 1901 was 25.81 in., falling in a mean number of 56 days (see Glasser, Meteorological Observations, 24). Toward the end of summer, springs and wells, where they have not actually dried up, diminish very considerably, and cisterns and open reservoirs become at times the only sources of supply. Cisterns are fed from surface and roof drainage. Except in the rare instances where springs occur, wells depend upon percolation. The great open reservoirs or pools are fed from surface drainage and, in some cases, by aqueducts from springs or from more distant collecting pools. In the case of private cisterns, it is the custom of the country today to close up the inlets during the early days of the rain, so as to permit of a general wash down of gathering surfaces, before admitting the water. Cisterns, belonging to the common natives, are rarely cleansed, and the inevitable scum which collects is dispersed by plunging the pitcher several times before drawing water. When the water is considered to be bad, a somewhat primitive cure is seen-sheba, “well of the earth,” Gen 21 31, to as to sink all impurities with it, to the bottom. The accumulation often found in ancient cisterns probably owes some of its presence to this same habit.

It is necessary to include wells under the head of cisterns, as there appears to be some confusion in the use of the two terms. Wells, so called, were more often deep cylindrical reservoirs, the lower part of which was sunk in the rock and cemented, the upper part being built with open joints, to receive the surface percolation. They were often of great depth. Job's well at Jerus, which is certainly of great antiquity, is 125 ft. deep (see PEF, "Jerus, 371.

Fig. 2.—Reservoir at Gezer.

The discovery of “living water” when digging a well, recorded in Gen 26 19, appears to have been an unusual incident. Uzziah hewed out many cisterns in the valley for his cattle (2 Ch 26 9 10 RV), and he built towers, presumably to keep watch over both cattle and cisterns. Isaac "dug again the wells" which had been filled in by the Philis (Gen 26 18). Wells were frequently dug in the plain, far from villages, for flocks and herds, and rude stone troughs were provided nearby. The well was usually covered with a stone, through which a hole was pierced sufficiently large to allow of free access for the pitchers. A stone was placed over this hole (Gen 29 10) when the well was not in use. The great amount of pottery found in ancient cisterns suggests that clay pots were used for drawing water (see Bible Sideights, 88). Jos (Ant, IV, VIII, 37) elucidates the passage in Ex 21 33 requiring the mouth of a “pét” or “well” to be covered with planks against accidents. This would seem to apply to wide-mouthed wells which had not been narrowed over to receive a stone cover. It may have been a well or cistern similar to these into which Joseph was cast (Gen 37 24). In fact, dry-wells and cisterns formed such effective dungeons, that it is very probable they were often used for purposes of detention. From earliest times, wells have been the cause of much strife. The covenant between Abimelech and Abraham at Beer-sheba (Gen 21 32) was a necessity, no less pressing than it is now. The well, today, is a center of life in the East. Women gather around it in pursuit of their daily duties, and travelers, man and beast, divert their course thereto, if needs be, for refreshment; and news of the outer world is carried to and from the well. It is, in fact, an all-important center, and daily presents a series of characteristic Bible scenes. The scene between Rebeckah and the servant of Abraham (Gen 24 11 ff) is one with frequent parallels. The well lies usually at some little distance from the village or city. Abraham’s servant made his “camels to kneel down without the city by the well of water at the time of the evening, the time that women go out to draw water.” Saul and his servant found young maidens going out of the city to draw water (1 S 9 11). Moses helped the daughters of the priest of Midian at the well, which was evidently at some distance from habitation (Ex 2 16 ff).

Private cisterns must be distinguished from public cisterns or wells. They were smaller and were sunk in the rocks within private boundaries, each owner having his own cistern or well. Ancient sites are honeycombed with these cisterns. A common type in Jerus seems to have been bottle-shaped in section, the extended bottom part being in the softer rock, and the narrow neck in the hard upper stratum. Many irregularly shaped cisterns occur with rock vaults supported by rock or masonry piers. Macalister tells of the discovery at Gezer of a small silt catch-pit attached to a private cistern, and provided with an overflow channel leading to the cistern. It is an early instance of a now well-known method of purification. The universal use of cement rendering to the walls of the cisterns was most necessary to seal up the fissures of the rock. The "broken cisterns" (Jer 2:13) probably refer to insufficiently sealed cisterns.

Besides private cisterns there were huge public rock-cut cisterns within the city walls. The great water caverns under the Temple area at 4. Public Jerus show a most extensive system of Cisterns. water storage (see Recovery of Jerus, ch vii). There are 37 of these described in PEF, "Jerus," 217 ft., and the greatest is an immense rock-cut cavern the roof of which is partly rock and partly stone, supported by rock piers (see Fig. 1, PEF). It is 83 ft. deep with a storage capacity of over two million gallons and there are numerous access manholes. This cistern is fed by an aqueduct from Solomon's Pools about 10 miles distant by road, and is locally known as Bahar el Kebir, the "Great Sea." One of the most recent and one of the most interesting rock-cut reservoirs yet discovered is that at Gezer. (See PEF, 1908, 96 ft.) In this example, the pool of spring water is reached by a great rock-tunnel staircase which descends 94 ft. 6 in. from the surface. The staircase diminishes in size as it descends, and at its greatest, it is 23 ft. high and 12 ft. 10 in. wide (see section Fig. 2). These proportions may seem unnecessarily large, but may be accounted for by the necessity for providing light at the water level. As a matter of fact, the brim of the pool receives the light from above. The work dates back to pre-Israelite times.

Open pools were common in every city. They were cut out of the rock and were built and cemented at points where occasion demanded. They were often of great and Aqueducts. size. The pool outside Jerus known as Birket es Sultan measures 555 ft. × 220 ft. × 36 ft. deep, and the so-called Hezekiah's Pool within the walls, is 240 ft. × 144 ft. × about 20 ft. deep. The latter probably owes its origin to the rock-cut fosse of early Jewish date. The Birket as Sultan, on the other hand, probably dates from the time of the Turkish occupation.

They may, however, be taken as examples, which, if somewhat larger, are still in accord with the pool system of earlier history. Pools were usually fed by surface drainage, and in some cases by aqueducts from springs at some distance away. They seem to have been at the public service, freely accessible to both man and beast. Pools situated outside the city walls were sometimes connected by aqueducts with pools within the city, so that the water could be drawn within the walls in time of siege. The so-called Pools of Solomon, three in number (see Fig. 3), situated about 10 miles by road from Jerus, are of large proportions and are fed by surface water and by aqueducts from springs. The water from these pools is conveyed in a wonderfully engineered course, known as the lower-level aqueduct, which searches the winding contours of the Judaean hills for a distance of about 15 miles, before reaching its destination in "the great sea" under the Temple area (Fig. 1). This aqueduct is still in use, but its date is uncertain (see G. A. Smith, Jerus, 131, where the author finds reason for assigning it to the period of Herod). The course and destination of another aqueduct known as the high-level aqueduct is less definite. These aqueducts are of varying dimensions. The low-level aqueduct at a point just before it enters the Temple area was found to measure 3 ft. high × 2 ft. wide, partly rock-cut and partly built, and rendered in smooth-troweled cement, with well-squared stone covers (see PEF, Excavations at Jerus, 53 ft.). There are many remains of rock-cut aqueducts throughout Pal (see Fig. 4) which seem to indicate their use in early Heb times, but the lack of OT references to these works is difficult to account for, unless it is argued that in some cases they date back to pre-Israelite times. The great tunnel and pool at Gezer lends a measure of support to this hypothesis. On the other hand, a plea for a Heb origin is also in a measure strengthened by the very slight reference in the OT to such a great engineering feat as the cutting of the Siloam tunnel, which is doubtless the work of Hezekiah. The pool of Siloam was originally a simple rock-cut reservoir within the walls, and was constructed by Hezekiah (2 Ch 32:30). It measures 75 ft. × 71 ft. It is the upper pool of Isa 7:3. A lower overflow pool existed immediately beyond, contained by the city wall across the Tyropoeon valley. The aqueduct which supplies the upper pool takes a tortuous course of about 1,700 ft. through the solid rock from the Virgin's fountain, an intermittent spring on the E. slope of the hill. The water reaches the pool on the S.W. of the spur of Ophel, and it was in the rock walls of a cistern that the famous main inscription recording the completion of the work was discovered.

Herod embellished the upper pool, lining it with stone and building arches around its four sides (see PEF, Excavations at Jerus., 154 ff.), and the pool was most likely in this condition in the time of Christ (Jn 9:6). There are numerous other pools, cisterns and aqueducts in and around Jericho, which provide abundant evidence of the continual struggle after water, made by its occupants of all times (see C. A. Smith, Jerus., ch v, vol I). See also Pev, Wise, etc.

Good wives are described as cisterns (Prov 6:15 ff.). "The left ventricle of the heart, which retains the blood till it be dispersed through the body, is called a cistern." (Ecc 12:6). Idols, armies and material objects in which Israel trusted were "broken cisterns" (Jer 2:13, see above) "soon emptied of all the ayl and comfort which they possess, and cannot fill themselves again."

CITADEL, sīt'ā-del (1 Mac 1:33; 3:45). See FORTIFICATION.

CITHERN, sīt'hərn (kūdza, kithāra; 1 Mac 4:34 AV, kithārasa kai kinirasa is tr. "citherns and harps" RV and lutes; of guitar, either): As the Macc. was originally written in Heb., it is natural to suppose that these two Gr. words stand for Heb 'nḥḥāṯām and kinnōrōth; but this is to be objected that kithara and kinura are not used elsewhere together to represent two different instruments. On the contrary we have either kinura kai nabada or kithara kai psaltērhoi. The most probable explanation of the unusual collocation of these two words in 1 Mac 4 is that kithara was a gloss meant to explain the obsolente kinura. See Music.

CITIES, LEVITICAL. See LEVITICAL CITIES; City.

CITIES OF REFUGE. See REFUGE, CITIES OF.

CITIES, sīt'iz, OF THE PLAIN, plan, CICCAR (14:7; 22, kikkar ha-garden): Included Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim and Zoar. The locality is first referred to in Gen 13:10, where it is said that Lot "lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the Plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered every where, before Jeh destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, like the garden of Egypt, as thou goest unto Zoar." The word tr. plan is kikkār, "circle." In this ver, and in the 11th, as well as in 1 K 7:46 and Mt 3:5, we have the full phrase "circle of the Jordan." Elsewhere (Gen 13:12; 15:17,20; Dt 4:35; 2 S 18:23) the word for "circle" is used alone with the art. Until recently the traditional view that this circle of the Jordan was at the south end of the Dead Sea was universally maintained. The arguments in favor of this view are: (1) The name of Sodom is preserved in Jebel Tuslum—Tuslum having the same consonants with Sodom; moreover, the name is known to have referred to a place in that region as early as the days of Galen (De Simplic. med. Facult., 4.19) who describes certain "saits of Sodom" from the mount of Maqua; this which is called Sodoma. (2) Zoar seems to have been represented in the Middle Ages by a place which the Crusaders called Segore, and Arab. writers Zughar. Under the name Zughar or Sughar the place is often referred to by mediaeval Arabian geographers as situated 1st S. of Jericho "at the end of the Dead Sea" and as a city on "the wall of Jericho." Two days' journey from Jericho. Pottery (v.17.5) reckons Zoar as belonging to Arabia Petraea. Eusebius (Onom, 261) describes the Dead Sea as lying between Jericho and Zoar. Jos (Ant, 1, xi, 4) makes the Dead Sea extend 380 stadia "as far as Zoar of Arabia." (Wars, IV, viii, 4). These references would locate Zoar at the base of the mountains just S.E. of the Dead Sea, and, as it was within easy reach of Sodom, from which Lot fled, would fix the Cities of the Plain in that locality. Josephus (Comm. 3:10) says that Zoar was in the borders of Moab.

On the other hand, it is maintained that the "kikkar of the Jordan" lay N. of the Dead Sea for the following reasons: (1) That is the region which is visible from the heights of Bethel whence Abraham and Lot looked down upon it (Gen 13:10), while the south end of the lake is not visible. But it may be answered that the phrase need not be limited to the actual region in sight, but may have included the whole known extension of the valley. (2) Zoar was said to be in range of Moses' vision from the top of Pisgah (De 34:1-3), whereas the south end of the Dead Sea is invisible from that point, on account of intervening mountains. But this description of De evidently is not to be limited to the points which are actually visible, but should be understood as describing the extreme limits of the land some points of which are visible in their near vicinity. Central Arabia did not comprehend all portions of Dan or Judah "unto the hinder sea." The phrase from Jericho to Zoar is like "from Dan to Beersheba." The mountain heights overlooking Zoar were certainly visible. (3) In Gen 14 the four kings coming up from Kadesh attacked the Amorites "that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar" before reaching Sodom, and Hazezon-tamar is to be identified with Engedi.

On the other hand, it is possible that it is to be identified with the Tamar of Ezek 47:19; 48:26, and that this place lay S.W. of the Dead Sea. Or, if that explanation is not accepted, it is proper to note that the course of this expedition led at first a considerable distance S. of the Dead Sea through Mt. Seir to El-paran, when "Michtom of the south country of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites." In accomplishing this they would naturally be led along the highland to Hebron from which they could easily descend to Engedi, whence they could proceed without difficulty to the south end of the Dead Sea. Besides, it is by no means certain that there was not an easy passage along the whole western shore of the Dead Sea at that time. See DEED SEA. (4) It is argued that the region at the south end of the Dead Sea could not be described "as the garden of the Lord," etc. Neither, for that matter, could the region around the north end be so described in its present condition. But, on the other hand, the region S. of the sea is by no means as devoid of vegetation as is sometimes represented, while there are convincing arguments to prove that formerly it was much more extensive and fertile than now. To the fertility of this area there is no more capable witness than Professor Hull, though he is an ardent advocate of the location of these cities at the north end of the lake. This appears both in his original diary, and in his more mature and condensed account contained in his article on the Dead Sea in HDB, where he writes, "When, in December, 1883, the discoverer found himself standing on a terrace overlooking the Ghâr, he beheld at his feet a wide plain stretching away northward toward of the margin of the Dead Sea, and to a large extent green with vegetation and thickets of small trees. To the right in an open space were seen several large bedouin tents, from which the shouts of wild men, the barking of dogs, and the bellows of camels ascended. Numerous flocks of black goats and white sheep were being tended by women in long blue cloaks; and on the party of travelers being observed, groups of merry children came tripping up toward the path accompanied by a few of the elders, and, ranging themselves in a line, courteously returned salutations. Here the Arabs remain enjoying the warmth of the plain till the increasing heat of the summer's sun calls them away to their moist pasture grounds on the table-land of Edom and Moab. At a short distance farther toward the shore of the lake is the village of Es-Safieh, inhabited by a tribe of fellahin called the Ghawarneh, who by means of irrigation from the Wady el-Hessi cultivate with success fields of wheat, maize, dhurah, indigo and cotton, while they herd camels and flocks of sheep and goats. On the produce of these fields the Arabs largely depend for their supplies of food and raiment, which they obtain from the Mohammedan citizens.

Cities, Store, Stor. See City.

CITIZENSHIP, sit′i-zên-ship. All the words in use connected with this subject are derived from πόλις, polis, "city." These words, with the meanings which they have in the philosophical Bible, are the nouns, πόλις, polis, "citizen," πολείτης, politeitas, "citizenship," πολείτισμα, politeitism, "commonwealth;" πολιτικός, politeikos, "fellow-citizen;" and the verb, πολέμειν, politeo, "to behave as a citizen." Each will be considered more fully in its proper place.

1. Philosophical. The word for citizen is sometimes used to indicate little if anything more than the inhabitant of a city. It is a kind of a word for a man of his own country (Lu 15 15); "His citizens hated him" (Lk 19 14). Also the quotation from the LXX, "They shall not teach every man his fellow-citizen" (He 8 11; cf. Jer 31 34). So also in the Apoc (2 Mac 4 30; 5 6; 9 19).

2. Civil. Roman citizenship.—This is of especial interest to the Bible student because of the apostle Paul's relation to it. It was one of his qualifications as the apostle to the Gentiles. Luke shows him in Acts as a Roman citizen, who, though a Jew and a Christian, receives, for the most part, justice and courtesy from the Roman officials, and more than once successfully claims its privileges. He himself declares that he was a citizen of Tarsus (Acts 21 39). He was not only born in that city but had a citizen's rights in it. See Paul; Tarsus. But this citizenship in Tarsus did not of itself confer upon Paul the higher dignity of Roman citizenship. Had it done so, Claudius Lysias would not have ordered him to be scourged, as he did, after he had been a citizen of Tarsus (Acts 21 39; cf. 22 25). So, over and above this Tarsian citizenship, was the Roman one, which availed for him not in one city only, but throughout the Roman world and secured for him everywhere certain immunities and rights. It is to be noticed that all of these were not certain, but we know that, by the Valerian and Porcia laws, exemption from shameful punishments, such as scourging with cords or whips, and esp. crucifixion, was secured to every Roman citizen; also the right of appeal to the emperor in cases of wrong. The dignity of person had become almost a part of their religion, so that any violation was esteemed a sacrilege. Cicero's oration against Verres indicates the almost fanatical extreme to which this feeling had been carried. Yet Paul had been thrice beaten with rods, and five times received from the Jews forty stripes save one (2 Cor 11 23-25). Perhaps it was as at Philippi before he made known his citizenship (Acts 16 22-23), or the Jews had the right to whip those who came before their own tribunals. Roman citizenship included also the right of appeal to the emperor in all cases, after sentence had been passed, and no needless impediment must be interposed against a trial. Furthermore, the citizen had the right to be sent to Rome for trial before the emperor himself, when charged with capital offences (Acts 16 37; 22 25-29; 26 11). How then had Paul, a Jew, acquired this valued dignity? He himself tells us. In contrast to the rights of the citizen jury the Scribes say, "We have thought that Paul also must have purchased it, though apparently too poor, Paul quietly says, "But I was free born" (AV; "a Roman born" RV, Acts 22 28). Thus either Paul's father or some other ancestor had acquired the right and had transmitted it to the son.

What more natural than that Paul should sometimes use this civic privilege to illustrate spiritual truths? He does so a number of times. But here the Suthees say all the parochial and words of our Eng. VSS. "I have lived Spiritual before God in all good conscience" (Acts 23 1). But this tr does not bring out the sense. Paul uses a noticeable word, πολιτικός, which means as a citizen. He adds, "to God" (πολιτικός, to Geh). That is to say, he had lived conscientiously as God's citizen, as a member of God's commonwealth. The day before, by appealing to his Roman citizenship, he had saved himself from ignominious whipping, and now what more natural than that he should declare that he had been true to his citizenship in a higher state? What was this higher commonwealth in which he has enjoyed the rights and performed the duties of a citizen? What are the theocratic rights of his heavenly country, the ancient church, of which the Suthees is still the ostensible representative, but which was really continued in the kingdom of Christ without the national restrictions of the older out? Paul does not mean to say simply, "I have lived conscientiously before God," but "I have lived as a citizen to God, of the body of which He is the immediate Sovereign." He had lived theocratically as a faithful member of the Jewish church, from which his enemies claimed him a representative, and now, as a Christian, rejoicing in his new citizen's rights, in the ancient church, of which the Suthees is still the ostensible representative, but which was really continued in the kingdom of Christ without the national restrictions of the older out. Thus Paul's conception was a kind of blending of two ideas or feelings, one of which came from the old theocracy, and the other from his Roman citizenship.

Later, writing from Rome itself to the Philippians, who were proud of their own citizenship as members of a colonia, a reproduction on a small scale of the parent commonwealth, where he had once successfully maintained his own Roman rights, Paul forcibly brings out the idea that Christians are the citizens of a heavenly commonwealth, living among them to live worthy of such honor (Phil 1 27 m). A similar thought is brought out when he says, "For our commonwealth [politeuma] is in heaven" (Phil 3 20 m). The state to which we belong is heaven. Therefore the heavenly commonwealth, as was Paul from Rome when he asserted his rights, believers still enjoy its civic privileges and protections; sojourners upon earth, citizens of heaven. The OT conception, as in Isa 60-62, would easily lend itself to this idea, which appears in He 11.10.16; 12.22-24; Gal 4.26, and possibly in Rev 21. See also Rome.

form a casing to the earthen ramparts, with which the site was afterwards surrounded and which served as a protection against the intrusion of enemies. Later Sem intruders occupied the site, stone houses were built, and high stone defence walls were substituted for the earthen stone-cased ramparts. These later walls were much higher and stronger than those of the Neolithic occupation and were the walls seen by the Israelites when they viewed the country of their promise.

"The people that dwell in the land are strong, and the cities are fortified, and very great" (Nu 13.28) was the report of the spies sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan, to see "what cities they are that they dwell in, whether in camps, or in strongholds" (Nu 13.19.20). The difficulties of the task set before the advancing Israelites and their appreciation of the strength of the cities, is here recorded, and also in Dt 1.28: "The people are greater and taller than we; the cities are great and fortified up to heaven; and moreover we have seen the sons of the Anakim there." This assessment of greatness was based upon comparative ignorance of such fortifications and the want of war experience and the necessary implements of assault. It need not, therefore, be supposed that the cities were...
"great" except by comparison in the eyes of a tent-dwelling and pastoral people. On the contrary, most recent exploration has proved that they were small (see Père Vincent, Canaan, 27, n. 3, and Pl. I, where comparative measurements of the areas of ancient cities show that, in nine cities compared, Tell Sandahannah [barely 6 acres] is the smallest). Gezer measures approximately 22½ acres and Tell el-Hesy somewhat greater. By way of illustration, it is interesting to note that the Acropolis at Athens, roughly computed, measures 7½ acres, while the Castle Rock at Edinburgh is about 6 acres, or the same as the whole Seleucidian city of Tell Sandahannah (see Fig. 1). The Acro- plis at Tell Zaykarya measures about 2 acres or nearly one-fourth of the area of the whole city (about 8½ acres). It is unlikely that Jebus (Jerusalem) itself was an exception, although in Solomonian and later times it extended to a far greater area.

Besides the walled cities there were "unwalled [country] towns a great many" (Dt 3:5), "villages," unfortified suburbs, lying near to and under the protection of the walled cities and occupied by the surplus population.

The almost incredible number of cities and their villages mentioned in the OT, while proving the clannishness of their occupants, proves, at the same time, their comparatively small scale. Trace of similar populations that rise and fall are seen in China and Japan today. As a little poem says of Karakura:

"Where were palaces and merchants and the blades of warriors, Now are only the cicadas and waving blades of grass."

"Cities that stood on their mounds" (Josh 11:13; Jer 30:18) as at Lachish and Tzanneh are distinguished from those built on natural hills or spurs of hills, such as Jebus, Gezer, Tell es Safi (Gath?), Bethshemesh (see Vincent, Canaan, 26ff). The Arab. name "Tell" is applied to all mounds of ancient cities, whether situated on a natural eminence or on a plain, and the word is common in the geographical nomenclature of Palestine. Sites were chosen near a water supply, which was ever the most essential qualification. For purposes of defence, the nearest knoll or spur was selected. Sometimes these knolls were of no great height and their subsequent elevation is accounted for by the gradual accumulation of debris from town refuse and from frequent demolitions; restoration being effected after a leveling up of the ruins of the razed city (see Fig. 2: Tell el-Hesy, PEF; mound at the meeting-point of the meandering paths on the plain below (see Fig. 3). The walls of Tell el-Hesty Judaeah has been strengthened by towers in the inside, and preserved an unbroken circuit of wall to the outside view (see Fig. 4, PEF). Houses on the wall (Josh 2:15; 2 Cor 11:33) may have been seen from the outside; but it is unlikely that any building within the walls was visible, except possibly the inner tower or stronghold. The whole of the interior of the early Jerus (Jebus) was visible from the hills to the E., but this peculiarity of position is not common. Strongholds, garrisoned by men-at-arms seen only through the battlements, showed no weakness, and the gates, with their narrow and steep approaches and protecting defence towers, looked uninviting traps (Fig. 5).

The mystery of these unseen interiors did therefore be easily conjured into an exaggeration of strength.

The inhabitants of the villages (תֵּל, bânôth, "daughters," Nu 32:42) held feudal occupation and gave service to their lord of the

6. General city (גּוֹר, "mother," 2 S 20:19), in defence of their own or in attacks on their neighbor's property. Such were the cities of the truculent, marauding kings of Canaan, whose broken territories lent themselves to the upkeep of a condition, of the weakness of which, the Israelites, in their solid advance, took ready advantage.

II. Jewish Occupation.—After the conquest, and the abandonment of the pastoral life for that of agriculture, the condition of the cities varied but little, except that they were, from time to time, enlarged and strengthened. Solomon's work at Jerus was a step forward, but there is little evidence that in the city which he is credited with having put his hands to, there was any embellishment. Megiddo and Gezer at least show nothing worthy of the name. Greek influence brought with it the first real improvements in city building; and the later work of Herod raised cities to a grandeur which was previously undreamed of among the Jews. Within the walls, the main points considered in the "layout" were, the Tower or Stronghold, the High Place, the Broad Place by the Gate, and the Market Place.

The Tower or Stronghold was an inner fort which held a garrison and commander, and was provisioned with "victuals, and oil and wine" (2 Ch 11:11), to which the Tower or defenders of the city when hard pressed betook themselves, as a last resource. The men of the tower of Shechem held out against Abimelech (Jgs 9:49) who was afterward killed by a stone thrown by a woman from the Tower of Thebes "within the city" (Jgs 9:51.53). David took the stronghold of Zion, "the same is the city of David" (2 S 5:7), which name (Zion) was afterward applied to the whole city. It is not unlikely that the king's house was which shows a section of the Tell from which the levels of the successive cities in distinct stratification were recovered. Closely packed houses, in narrow alleys, with low, rude mud, brick, or stone and mud walls, with timber and mud roofs, burned readily and were easily razed to the ground (Josh 8:1ff; 11:11).

It would seem that, viewed from the outside, these cities showed the appearance of isolated forts, the surrounding walls being strengthened at frequent intervals, with towers. The gates were approached by narrow roads, which mounted the slopes of the included in the stronghold. Macalister (PEFS, 1907, 192 ff) reports the discovery of a Canaanite castle with enormously thick walls abutting against the inside of the city wall. The strongholds at Taanach and Tell el-Hesey are similarly placed; and the Acropolis at Tell Zakarlya lies close to, but independent of, the city wall.

The High Place was an important feature in all Can. cities and retained its importance long after the conquest (1 S 9 12 ff; 1 K 3 2; Am 7 9). It was a sanctuary, where sacrifices were offered and feasts were held, and men did "eat before Jeh." (Dt 14 26). The priests, as was their custom, received their portion of the flesh (1 S 2 12 ff). The High Place discovered at Gezer (Bible Side-lights, ch iii) is at a lower level than the city surrounding it, and lies N. and S. It is about 100 ft. in length, and when complete consisted of a row of ten rude undressed standing stones, of which eight are still remaining, the largest being 10 ft. 6 in. high, and the others varying to much smaller sizes. See High Place.

The Broad Place (Neh 8 1.3.16; Jer 5 1) seems to have been, usually, immediately inside the city gate. It was not, in early Jewish cities, an extensive open area, but Broad Place simply a widening of the street, and was designated "broad" by comparison with the neighboring alleys, dignified by the name of street. It took the place of a general exchange. Justice was dispensed (Ruth 4 2) and punishment was administered. Jeremiah was put in "the stocks that were in the upper gate of Benjamin" (Jer 20 2), proclamations were read, business was transacted, and the news and gossip of the day were exchanged. It was a place for all classes to congregate (Job 29 7 m; Prov 31 23), and was also a market-place (2 K 7 1). In later times, the market-place became more typically a market square of the Gr agora plan, with an open area surrounded by covered shelters. The present market-place at Haina resembles this. Probably was this type of market-place referred to in Mt 11 16; 20 3 and Lk 7 32; 11 43. The street inside the Damascus gate of Jerus today is, in many ways, similar to the Broad Place, and retains many of its ancient uses. Here, Bedouin and Fellahin meet from the outlying districts to barter, to arbitrate, to find debtors and to learn the news of the day. Lying as it did immediately inside the gate, the Broad Place had a defensive value, in that it admitted of concentration against the forcing of the gate. There does not seem to have been any plan of either a Can. or early Jewish city, in which this question of defence did not predominate. Open areas within the city were "waste places" (Isa 58 12) and were not an integral part of the plan.

The streets serving these quarters were not laid out on any fixed plan. They were, in fact, narrow, unpaved alleys, all seeming of equal importance, gathering themselves simply to the various centers. Having fixed the positions of the City Gates, the Stronghold and the High Place, the inhabitants appear to have been allowed to situate themselves the best way they could, without restriction of line or frontage. Houses were of modest proportions and were poorly built; planned, most often, in utter disregard of the square, and presenting to the street more or less dead walls, which were either topped by parapets or covered with projecting wood and mud roofs (see Architecture, Fig. 1; House).

The streets, as in the present day in Pal, were allocated to separate trades: "bakers' street" (Jer 37 21), place "of the merchants" (Neh 3 31.32 AV), "goldsmiths," etc. The Valley of the Cheesemakers was a street in the Tyropean Valley at Jerus.

For a discussion of the subject of "cisterns," see the separate art. s.v.
The people pursued the industries consequent upon their own self-establishment. Agriculture claimed first place, and was their most highly esteemed occupation. The king's lands were farmed by his subjects for his own benefit, and considerable profits were evidently ploughed to the aristocracy. The most of the lands, however, belonged to the cities and villages, and were allotted among the free husbandmen. Various cereals were raised, wheat and barley being most commonly cultivated. The soil was tilled and the crops reaped and threshed in much the same manner and with much the same implements as are now used in Syria. Cities lying in main trade routes developed various industries more quickly than those whose positions were out of touch with foreign traffic. Crafts and trades, unknown to the early Jews, were at first monopolized by foreigners who, as a matter of course, were elbowed out as time progressed. Cities on the seaboard of Phoenicia depended chiefly on maritime trade. Money, in the form of ingots and bars of precious metals, "weighed out" (2 K 12 11), was current in preëxile times, and continued in use after foreign coinage had been introduced. The first native coinage dates from the Persian period (see also Jewish Coinage, ch iv). Slavery was freely trafficked in, and a certain number of slaves were attached to the households of the more wealthy. Although they were the absolute property of their masters, they enjoyed certain privileges of lands not extended to the "sojourners" or "strangers" who sought the protection of the cities, often in considerable numbers.

The king's private property, from which he drew full revenue, lay partly within the city, but to a greater extent beyond it (1 S 15 16). In addition to his private property, he received tithes of fields and flocks, "the tenth part of your seed." He also drew a tax in the shape of certain "king's mowings" (Am 7 1). Vassal kings paid tribute; Mesha, king of Moab, rendered wool "unto the king of Israel!" (2 K 4 4).

See A. S. Smith, Jerusalem, I, chs v-x, for detailed account of the conditions of Jewish city life. For details of government, see Elders; Judges; Sanhedrin.

III. Store Cities.—These were selected by Solomon and set aside for stores of victuals, chariots, horsemen, etc (1 K 9 19). Jeoshaphat "built in Judah castles and cities of store" (2 Ch 17 15). Twelve officers were appointed by Solomon to supervision his household, each officer being responsible for the supply in one month in the year (1 K 4 7). There were also "storehouses in the fields, in the cities, and in the villages" (1 Ch 27 25 AV).

IV. The Levitical Cities.—These were apportioned 13 to the children of Aaron, 10 to Kohath, 13 to Gershon, 12 to Merari, 48 cities in all (Josh 21 13 ff), 6 of which were cities of Refuge (Nu 35 6); see Refuges, Cities of. For further details see Architecture, Houses.

CITY OF CONFUSION, kon-fu-shun (קֹּנְפָּשִׁים, kōn-fušîm, kīrīyath-tōhā): A name applied to Jerus (Isa 24 10 AV).

CITY OF DAVID. See Zion.

CITY OF DESTRUCTION, de-struk'shun (דְּסָךְ הָעָרֹת, dē-sakhā'arōt; LXX Basidéis, Basidéis; dēsōc): In his prediction of the future return of Egypt to Jeh, Isaiah declares, "In that day there shall be five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jeh of hosts; one shall be called 'The city of destruction'" (Isa 19 18). The name 'ir ha-heřets, 'the city of overturn,' is evidently ploughed up, 'city of the sun,' a designation of Heliopolis (same meaning; cf. the name for this city, Beth-shemesh, Jer 43 13), in Egyptian, On (Gen 41 45), which last name Ezekiel, by a similar play on sound, changes into Aven. See On. Some codices, however, as in the RVm notes, read here 'ir ha-heřets, the actual name of the city. James Orr

CITY, RULERS, rōōlĕr, OF: The EV rendering of the ναήραξα, poikítaráxai, of Thessalonica, before whom Jason and the other Christians were dragged by the mob (Acts 17 6). It distinguishes the magistrates of a free Gr city from the ordinary Rom officials. It primarily denotes "rulers of the citizens," and hence was used only of magistrates of free cities. The term seems to have been confined largely to Macedonia, although there have been found a few inscriptions elsewhere in which it is used. The use of this term well illustrates the accuracy of the author of the Book of Acts, for while poikítaráxai is not used by classical authors, this form is attested by a number of Macedonian inscriptions. Much work has been done in this field in recent years and the results throw light on the evidence in Acts. Of the inscriptions that have been found at least five belong to Thessalonica (see art. by Professor Burton, in the AJT of 1898, "The Politarchae")." The "rulers" of Philippi, before whom Paul and Silas were brought, is the EV rendering of ποικίταρς, archontos, which is commonly used in the NT (Acts 15 19). This is the same as "rulers" and is not the same as "rulers of the city.

CLAP: An emphatic expression of joy; "They clapped their hands [māhād], and sang a song." Long live [AV "God save"] the king! (2 K 11 12); "Oh clap your hands [tišāk], all ye peoples!" (Ps 47 1); or exultation (šāphak, Lam 2 15; māhād, Ezk 26 6; tākā; Nah 3 19); or repudiation (šāphak, Job 27 23; 34 37).

Figurative: To denote Nature's "sympathy" with God's people. "Let the floods clap [māhād] their hands!" (Ps 98 8); "All the trees of the field shall clap their hands" (Isa 55 12; of Jgs 5 20).

CLASPS, klap, klap (קֻלָּפ, kūlāp), kere): The word occurs nine times in Ex 26, 36, and 39, which record the specifications for the erection of the tabernacle and their subsequent carrying out. In each of these passages the AV renders "taches"—an early Eng. word of French origin embodied in our "attachment." 50 clasps or taches of gold were ordered to be used in connecting together the two sets of inner tapestry curtains (10 in number) of the tabernacle (Ex 26 6), and 50 clasps of brass (bronze) were similarly to be used in joining the two sets of goats' hair curtains (11 in number).
which formed the outer covering (26:11). See TABERNACLES. As to the nature of the chaps itself, it seems to have belonged to a double set of loops, opposite to each other, to one of which, required to be of blue cord, a gold or brass button or pin was attached, which, being inserted into the loop opposite, kept the curtains in position (26:4-5).

A difficulty arises from the direction in Ex 26:33 that the veil which divided the “dwelling” into two parts—the holy place and the most holy—was to be suspended “under the clasps.” If the clasps are not to cut across the middle of the total length of the tabernacle, this would make the two holy places to be of equal size, contrary to the usual assumption that the outer was twice the length of the inner. The term “under” must therefore be understood to mean “over” the middle, or of the arrangement of the curtains, or of the size of the holy places will have to be revised (the dimensions are not actually given in the description).

W. SHAW CALDECOTT

CLAUDA, klō'da. See CAUDA.

CLAUDIA, klō'di-a (Klō'dia, Klō'dia): A member of the Christian congregation at Rome, who, with other members of that church, sends her greetings through others to Paul, but with none more than this concerning her cannot be said with certainty. The Apostolical Constitutions (VII, 21) name her as the mother of Linus, mentioned subsequently by Irenaeus and Eusebius as bishop of Rome, and by Cajetan in the Isidore of Seville's Etymologies (VII, 38, 15), upon the basis of the mention of Claudia and Pudens as husband and wife in an epigram of Martial, that they are identical with the persons of the same name mentioned in the Acts. See also Apology of the Gnostics (p. 10) and the passage of Tacitus (Annals iv, 29) in which a Claudia is said to have been the mother of Lucilius. This is against the statement of early non-Christian writers that Claudia was the wife of the Roman emperor Claudius. The statement of Tacitus is based on information found in Chester, England, and has been used in favor of the further statement that this Claudia was a daughter of a Jewish king, Cogudubus. See also JERUSALEM, 3:27—28.

It is an example of how a few dates may be used to construct a plausible theory. If it be true, the contrast between their two friends, the apostle Paul, on the one hand, and the licentious poet, Martial, on the other, is certainly unusual. If in 2 Tim 4:21, Pudens and Claudia be husband and wife, it is difficult to explain how Lucius occurs between them. See also light, The Apostolic Fathers. H. E. JACOBS

CLAUDIUS, klō'di-us (Klō'diōs, Klō'diōs): Fourth Rom emperor. He reigned for over 13 years (41-54 AD), having succeeded Caius (Caligula) who had seriously altered the conciliatory policy of his predecessors regarding the Jews and, considering himself a real and corporeal god, had deeply offended the Jews by ordering a statue of himself to be placed in the temple of Jerusalem, as he was ready to suppress the ancient and well-recognized, laws and customs in a free and peaceable manner, special consideration being given to the Jews of Alexandria who were to enjoy without molestation all their ancient rights and privileges. The Jews, however, who had become very numerous, were not allowed to hold assemblages there (Dio LX, vi, 6), an enactment in full correspondence with the general policy of Augustus regarding Judaism in the West. The edicts mentioned in the earlier part of this chapter, with Herod Agrippa, grandson of Herod the Great, who had been living in Rome and had been in some measure instrumental in securing the succession for Claudius. As a reward for this service, the Holy Land had a king once more. Judea was added to the tetrarchies of Philip and Antipas; and Herod Agrippa I was made ruler over the Judean territory which had been governed by his grandfather, his father. The transfer of Caligula had given “rest” (ARK “peace”) to the churches “throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria” (Acts 9:31). But after the settlement of these troubles, “Herod the king put forth his hands to afflict some of the church, and slewed one apostle and when he saw that it pleased the Jews, he proceeded to seize” another (Acts 12:3). His miserable death is recorded in Acts 12:20-23, and in Ant., XIX, 8. This event which took place in the year 44 AD is held to have been coincident with one of the visits of Paul to Jerusalem. It has proved one of the chronological pivots of the apostolic history.

Whatever concessions to the Jews Claudius may have been made in the beginning of his reign, Suetonius records (Claud. ch 25) “Judaeos impulso Chresto assidue tumultuantas Romanem expulit,” an event assigned by some to the year 50 AD, by others to the years 52 and 53. He was prevented from doing the same later. Among the Jews thus banished from Rome were Aquila and Priscilla with whom Paul became associated at Corinth (Acts 18:2). With the reign of Claudius is also associated the famine which was occasioned by the invasion of Carthage (26:1). Classical writers also report that the reign of Claudius was, from bad harvest or other causes, a period of general distress and scarcity over the whole world (Dio LXVII, 16; Tac. Ann. xix, 4; xiii, 43; see MOMMSEN, Provinces of the Roman Empire, ch ix; and Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1).

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, klō'di-is lis'is-əs (Klō'diōs Lυ'sias, Klō'diōs Lυ'sias): A chief captain who intervened when the Jews sought to do violence to Paul at Jerusalem (Acts 21:31; 24:22). Lysias, who was probably a Greek by birth (cf. 21:37), and who had probably assumed out of friendship for Herod Agrippa to make at the beginning of his reign, Suetonius records (Claud. ch 25) “Judaeos impulso Chresto assidue tumultuantas Romanem expulit,” an event assigned by some to the year 50 AD, by others to the years 52 and 53. He was prevented from doing the same later. Among the Jews thus banished from Rome were Aquila and Priscilla with whom Paul became associated at Corinth (Acts 18:2). With the reign of Claudius is also associated the famine which was occasioned by the invasion of Carthage (26:1). Classical writers also report that the reign of Claudius was, from bad harvest or other causes, a period of general distress and scarcity over the whole world (Dio LXVII, 16; Tac. Ann. xix, 4; xiii, 43; see MOMMSEN, Provinces of the Roman Empire, ch ix; and Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1).

letter explaining the circumstances (23 26-30). The genuineness of this letter has been questioned by some, but without sufficient reason.) In this letter he took care to safeguard his own conduct, and to shield his honesty in binding Paul. There is evidence (of Acts 24 22) that Lysias was also summoned to Caesarea at a later date to give his testimony, but no mention is made of his arrival there. It is probable, however, that he was among the chief captives who witnessed the trial of Paul before King Agrippa and Festus (cf 25 22). For the reference to him in the speech of Tertullus (see 24 7 RVm), see TERTULLUS.

C. M. KERR

CLAW, kló (κέλν, pārṣāh, lit. "hoof"): One of the marks of a "clean" animal is stated thus: "Every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws, ye shall eat!" (Dt 14 6 AV; RV "hath the hoof cloven in two"). See CREW; CUD. AV uses the word "claws" where RV supplies '"hoofs."' In Zec 11 16, "and will tear their hoofs in pieces," as the sheep are being overdriven. In the only other passage containing the word (Dn 4 33) there is no Heb equivalent in the original—"his nails like birds' claws."

CLAY, klā (κώμη, hōmer, ἅγαπα, hāgaph, ὑθύ, κτῖ, אִיל, melet, āḇḇī, āḇḇēh, ma'āḇḇēh, cḥēḇ, 'abḥē; ἔλατος, πέλας, "wet clay," "mud"): True clay, which is a highly aluminous soil, is found in certain localities in Pal, and is used in making pottery. The Heb and Gr words, as well as the Eng "clay," are, however, used loosely for any sticky mud. In making mud bricks, true clay is not always used, but ordinary soil is worked up with water and mixed with straw, molded and left to dry in the sun. Hōmer (of kāḇēr, "gāmē" or "bitumen") is rendered both "clay" and "mortar." Ṭū is rendered "clay" or "mire." In Is 41 25 we have: "He shall come upon rulers as upon mortar [hōmer], and as the potter treadeth clay" (Ṭū). In Nah 3 14, "Go into the clay [Ṭū], and tread the mortar [hōmer]; make strong the brickkiln (i.e. make the walls ready to withstand a siege). Ḥāgāph is the clay of the image in Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Dn 2 35 ff.). Melet occurs only in Jer 43 9, where "Take great stones and hide them in the clay in the brickkiln" (RV); "hide them in mortar in the brickwork." RVm, "lay them with mortar in the pavement." In Hab 2 6, "āḇḥē (found only here) is rendered in AV "brick clay," though in Tū, but RV has "pledges rendering the word to r. ṭūbah, "to give a pledge." In 1 K 7 46, ma'āḇḇēh hā-āḇḇāhām (of 2 Ch 4 17, 'āḇḇē hā-āḇḇāhām) is the compact or clayey soil in the plain of Jordan between Succoth and Zarethan, in which Hiram cast the vessels of brass for Solomon's temple. In Jn 6 11-14, Thayer gives "made mud of the spittle;" in Rom 3 21, "wet clay."

CLEAN, klēn (Anglo-Saxon clēne, "clean," "pure"): Rendering four Heb roots: ב, הב, etc, "purify", "select", "make shining"; מ, zak, etc, "bright", "clean", "pure"; נ, נאָט, "free from," "exempt"; ד, tāhār, "clean," "pure," "empty," "bright" (?) the principal root, rendered "clean" 80 times (AV); occurring in all its forms in various renderings about 2000 times; also one Gr root, σάρκα, katárhas, etc, akin to castus, chaste; "free from admixture or admission of anything that soils, adulterates, corrupts" (Thayer's Lexicon). The physical, ritual, ethical, spiritual, figurative uses continually overlap, esp. the last for the first. The physical use is infrequent: "Wash . . . with snow water, and make my hands never so clean" (zākkāh, Job 9 30; figurative also; "clean provider" (hōmīc, RV "savor"); RVm "salted"). "Clean . . . . . . of the cup and

1. Physical of the platter, that the outside thereof may become clean also." (katharos, Mt 23 26); "arranged in fine linen, clean (katharos) and white" (Rev 19 8; ARV "bright and pure").

The principal use was the ceremonial; applied to persons, places, things, "undefiled," "not causing defilement, or from which defilement has just been removed.

2. Ceremonial tāhār, almost exclusively ceremonial, being the chief Heb root. Katharos (NT), or derivatives, has this use clearly in Mk 1 44; Lk 6 14: "Offer for thy cleansing the things [holēmos, etc.];" He 9 13-22 bar "clean (katārēs of the flesh), etc."

"Clean" is applied to animals and birds: "of every clean beast" (Gen 7 2); "of all clean birds" (Dt 14 11); (for list of unclean creatures see Lev 1 4-20); to places: "Carry forth . . . unto a clean place" (2 K 14 20); to persons: "A clean person shall take hyssop" (Nu 19 18); to clothing: "garment . . . washed the second time, and shall be clean" (Lev 18 5); and to objects of all sorts, free or freed from defilement.

The ethical or spiritual meaning, other directly or figuratively, is found in the OT chiefly in Job, Ps, the Prophets, whose interest is often in a more restricted, but not necessarily so, as the NT: "Cleanse yourselves [hāṭarē, ye] that bear the vessels of Jehovah" (Isa 52 11). How can be clean (zākkāhō) that is born of woman? (Job 29 4) (principally moral, perhaps with allusion to the ceremonial defilement of childbirth); "The fear of Jehovah is clean" (Ps 13 9); that is, the religion of Jehovah is morally undefiled, in contrast to heathen rites, etc; "He that washeth his hands, and a pure heart," (Ps 24 4); "Purify me with hyssop, and I shall be clean" (tāḥēr, Ps 51 7); "Therefore said he, Ye are not all clean" (katharos, Jn 13 11). Here, as in Ps 51 7 and many others, the ritual furnishes a figure for the spiritual, illustrating the Divine purpose in the ritual, to impress, purify and prepare for the spiritual. A somewhat similar figurative moral use is found in Acts 18 6; "Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean" (kāṭarē, Greek equivalent). See also Unclean; Purification; Defilement.

Clean—Adverb (in one case adj.), "utterly,""wholly"; usually rendering an intensive use of the Heb vb. as Joel 1 7: "He hath made it clean bare" (lit. "st scrape of the earth, etc."); "Arm . . . clean dried up" (Isa 24 19 AV; "Earth is clean dissolved." Twice it renders a principal vb. Josh 3 17: "Passed clean over the Jordan" (lit. "finished with regard to J."); Lev 25 22 AV: "Shall not make a clean riddance (qābhāhām, "corners") ARV "shall not wholly reap." Once it renders a noun: Ps 77 8: "Is his lovingkindness clean gone for ever?" (end), he-āḇḥē, "has his lovingkindness come to an end?"; and once an adv., "clean (tāḥēr, טט, actually, "really") escaped" (2 Pet 2 18); but ARV, following the reading "obligō, "a little," "scarcely," renders "just escaping." CLEANSE, klēn: "Make clean," "purify" being a frequent rendering of the original. It is found often (ARV) instead of "purg," "purify" (AV), renders nearly the same roots, and has the same overlapping phases, as "clean."

1. Physical—The physical cleansal is additive or "figuratively used: "Stripes that wound cleanse away [āmārēh] evil" (Prov 20 30); A hot wind not to winnow, nor to cleanse” (bōrar, Jer 4:11); “Straightway his leprosy was cleansed” (kārhēs, Mt 8:3).

In the ceremonial sense: (1) With a very strong religious announcement, from the altar, by the offering of the Day of Atonement (ḥaṭā’); e.g. the altar, by the sin offering (Ex 29:36); the leprous house (Lev 14:48–53); the people, by the offering of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:30); with the sanctuary, by the blood of the sin offering (Ezk 45:18 f). (2) To expiate (kāphār, “cover,” “hide”); sin (in this case blood-guiltiness): “The land cannot be cleansed of the blood!” (AV Nu 35:33; ARV “no expiation can be made for the land!”). (3) To remove ceremonial defilement, the principal use, for which the chief root is ṭābēr: “Take the Levites . . . and cleanse them” (Nu 8:6); “and she shall be cleansed [after childbirth] from the fountain of her blood” (Lev 12:7). “Cleanse the uncleannesses of the children of Israel” (16:19), etc. This use is infrequent in the NT, except figuratively. Clear instances are Mk 1:44: “Offer for thy cleansing [katharismos] . . . for a test-imony offering” (Lev 16:19). “Elohe, thou hast cleansed, make not thou common” uses the figure of the ritual to declare the complete abolition of ceremonial defilement and hence of ceremonial cleaning. For the elaborate system of ceremonial cleansing, see Lev 15–16; Num 19. UNCLEAN; PURIFICATION. Its principal agencies were water, alone, as in minor or indirect defilements, like those produced by contact with the unclean (Lev 15:1–18, etc.); or combined with a sin offering and burnt offering, as with a woman after childbirth (12:6–8); fire, as with gentile booty (Nu 31:23; by water, when it would not endure the fire); the ashes of a red heifer without spot (Lev 14:4–7); water mingled with running water, or those defiled by contact with the dead (Nu 19:2ff). For the complex ceremonial in cases of leprosy, combining water, cedar, hyssop, crimson thread, the blood and flight of birds, the trespass offering, sin offering, burnt offering (Lev 14:4–7); the vehicle and emblem of life, plays a large part in the major cleansings, in which propitiation for sin, as well as the removal of ceremonial defilement, is prominent, as of the temple, altar, etc.: “According to the burning, so may it be; all things are cleansed with blood” (He 9:22).

In the ethical and spiritual sense, using the symbolism chiefly of 2. This embodies two phases: (1) the actual removal of sin by the ceremonial cleansing, “Where with shall a young man cleanse [zākēh] Spiritual his way?” (Ps 119:9); “Cleanse your hands, ye sinners” (Jas 4:8); “Let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement” (2 Cor 7:1); (2) God’s removal of the guilt and power of sin, by discipline or punishment: “He cleanseth it” (Jn 16:2, AV “purgeth”); “I have cleansed thee” (Ezk 24:13); or in justification, justification, sanctification. In these latter cases the exculpatory idea is sometimes the prominent, although the other is not absent: “I will cleanse [ṭābēr] them from all their iniquity, whereby they have sinned against me; and I will pardon all their iniquities” (Jer 33:8); “Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse [kāphār, “declare me clean”] me from my sin” (Ps 51:2). “Cleanse [nākkēh; ARV “clear”] thou me from hidden faults” (Ps 19:12), while formally to be understood “hold innocent,” really connotes forgiveness. In Eph 5:26, it is hard to determine whether pardon or God-given holiness is predominant: “That he might sanctify it [the church], having cleansed it by the washing of water with the word.” In 2 Tim 2:22 it seems almost wholly to absorb the other: “The blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us [“is purifying, sanctifying”] from all sin”; but in verse 9 it is again hard to determine the predominance: “He is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sin, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.” The uncertainty lies in that the second clause may not, as in our speech, add a distinct idea, but may be Heb synonymous parallelism. Perhaps it is not wise to seek too curiously to disentangle the two ideas, since they cannot be separated. God never “clears” where he has not begun to “cleanse,” and never “cleanses” by the Spirit without “cleansing” through the blood.

CLEAR, klēf, CLEARANCE, klēfes (אָכָל, ἀκαλόσ; ἀφάπτω, ἀφάπτος): Equivalent of several Heb and Gr words for bright, unclouded, shining without obstruction, distinct, brilliant; “clearer than the noon-day” (Job 11:17); “clear as the sun” (Cant 6:10); “clear shining after rain” (2 Sam 24:14); “clear as crystal” (Rev 21:11). Advb, “clearly,” for distinctly (Mt 7:5; Mk 8:20; Rom 1:20). Noun, “clearness,” for brilliancy, in Ex 24:10, “as the very heaven for clearness.”

From this primary sense, “clearness,” sense of transparency, as pertaining to character, as spotless and free from guilt, or charge, or obligation, “from oath” (Gen 24:8); “from transgression” (Ps 18:13). Hence the vb. to “clear” means juridically to declare or prove innocent, to vindicate (Gen 45:19; Nu 14:18; cf. ἁγνός, 2 Cor 7:11, RV “pure”). “Be clear when thou judgest” (Ps 51:4) refers to the proof and vindication of the righteousness of God.

CLEAVE, klēf: Is used in the Bible in two different senses: (1) יָרָשׁ, bāqê, “to split,” or “to rend.” We are told that Avraham “clave the wood for the burnt-offering” (Gen 22:3), and that “they clave the wood of the cart” (1 Sam 6:14). The Psalmist speaks of Jeh cleaving fountain and flood (74:15), and the plowman cleaving the earth (141:7). For other examples see Jgs 15:19; Ex 10:19; Ps 78:16; Hab 3:14. Bible marg. 16:1. (2) יָרָשׁ, dābhôk; κόλλαω, kollā, “to adhere to,” or “to join one’s self to.” This meaning is the reverse of the preceding. The Psalmist speaks of his tongue cleaving to the roof of his mouth (137:6). We are told that a man should cleave unto his wife (Gen 2:24; Mt 19:5). It is said that Ruth clave unto her mother-in-law (Ruth 1:14), and that certain men clave unto Paul (Acts 17:34; of 4:23; 11:23 m.).

“Cleave” is also used in this sense to describe one’s adherence to principles. Paul admonished the Romans to cleave to that which is good (Rom 12:9).

CLEFT, kleft, CLIFF, klf, CLIF, klf; klf: The first of these words, from cleave, to “split,” is a crevice or narrow opening, as “of the ragged rocks” (Isa 2:21); “under the clefts of the rocks” (Isa 57:5). “Cliff” is an obsolete form of cleft, found in AV Ex 33:22; Isa 67:5, but not in RV. “Cliff” an abrupt, precipitous, towering rock, is not in RV, but is found in AV 2 Ch 20:16, RV “ascent,” Job 30:6.
