CLEMENS, klem-ant (Kλήμενος, Kλήματος, "ninth"): A fellow-worker with Paul of Philipi, mentioned with especial commendation in Phil 4 3. The name being common, no inference can be drawn from this statement as to any identity with the author of the Epistle to the Corinthians published under this name, who was also the third bishop of Rome. The truth of this supposition ("it cannot be called a tradition," Donaldson, The Apostolical Fathers, 120), although found in Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius and Jerome, can neither be proved nor disproved. Even Roman Catholic authorities dispute it (art. "Clements," Catholic Encyclopedia, 19.). The resemblance between the two in time and place is against it; "a wholly uncritical view" (Cruittwell, Literary History of Early Christianity, 31). H. E. JACOBS

CLEOPAS, klé-o-pas (Κλεόπας, Kléopás, "renewed father"): One of the two disciples whom Jesus met on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24 18). The name is a contraction of Cleopatros, not identical with Cleopas of Jn 19 25. See also APHLAeus, CLEOPAS.

CLOPATA, klé-o-pa-tra (Κλεόπατρα, Kléopatra, "from a famous father"): A daughter of Ptolemy VI (Philometor) and of Queen Cleopatra, who was married first to Alexander Balas 150 BC (1 Mac 10 58; Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 1) and was afterward taken from him by her father and given to Demetrius Nicator on the invasion of Syria by the latter (1 Mac 11 12; Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 7). Alexander was killed in battle against the joint forces of Ptolemy and Demetrius while Demetrius was in captivity in Parthia. Cleopatra married his brother Antiochus VII (Sidetes), who in the absence of Demetrius had gained possession of the Syrian throne (137 BC). She was probably privy (Appian, Syr., 68) to the murder of Demetrius on his return to Syria 125 BC, but Josephus (Ant, XIII, ix, 3) gives a different account of his death. She afterward murdered Seleucus, her eldest son by Nicator, who on his father's death had taken possession of the government without her consent. She attempted unsuccessfully to poison her second son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII (Grypus), for whom she had secured the succession, because he was unwilling to concede to her what she considered due her share of power. She was herself poisoned (120 BC) by the draught which she had prepared for their son (Justin 39). She had also a son by Antiochus VII (Sidetes Antiochus Cyzicenus), who took his name from the place where his father is said to have been killed in battle 95 BC. The name Cleopatra was borne by many Egyptian princesses, the first of whom was daughter of Antiochus III and was married to Ptolemy V (Epiphanes) 193 BC. J. HITCHCISON CLOAK, klök, CLOKE (κλῆκα, m'klês, νηκάς, simlēth, etc.; ἱμάτιον, himatión, ἱστόλη, ἱστὶλη, etc.): "Cloke" is retained in ERV, as in AV, instead of mod. "cloak" (ERV). In the OT, m'tl (of NT himation) uniformly stands for the ordinary upper garment worn over the coat (κλήθην). In Mt 5 40 both "cloak" and "coat" are mentioned together; cf Lk 6 29. In size and material the "cloak" differed according to age and sex, class and Cleophas, Cyclopes, V. 13). The word also occurs in or shawl. It might be sewed up to have the surplus form of the robe of the Ephod (Ex 39 23), or be worn loose and open like a Rom toga, the CLOD: In Job 7 5 (נָּדַּנ, niḏān, נָדַּנ, "a mass of earth"), "cloes of dust," the crust of the fields, formed by the dry, swolen skin—a symptom of leprosy, that is not peulcal to it. In Jb 21 33; 38 13 (כְּלַד, kēlād, "a soft clot," "lump of clay"), "The cloes of the valley shall be sweet unto him," The cloes cleave fast together. In Joel 1 17 (מֲוקַרָה, mōkārāh, "a furrow," "something thrown off" (by the spade), "The seeds rot in [shrive]'l under their cloes.") Figurative: "Jacob shall break his cloes" (Hos 10 11), i.e. "must harrow for himself," used fig. of spiritual discipline (cf Isa 28 24 AV).

CLOPHAS, klēpās (Κλόφας, Klōphas). CLEOPHAS: The former in RV, the latter in AV, of Jn 19 25, for the name of the husband of one of the women who stood by the cross of Christ. Upon the philological ground of a variety in pronunciation of the Heb root, sometimes identified with Aphaeus, the father of James the Less. Said by tradition to have been the brother of Joseph, the husband of Mary; see BRETHEIN OF THE LORD. Distinguished from Cleopas, a Gr word, while Clopas is Aram.

CLOSE, vb. kłōs; adj. and advb. kłōs (קָלַשׁ, kālāš, קָלַשׁ, sāgar; kāmēw, kāmām): Other words are hārāh, "to burn!": "Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedars?" (Jer 22 15 AV, RV "smallest measure of earth") "in the midst with the cedar?" (Ps 16 9); "at harden:" (Gen 20 18). In Lk 4 20, ptāsēs, "to fold up." RV has "was closed," m "is opened," for "are open" (Nu 24 3, 15), "closed" for "narrow" or "covered" (Ezk 40 16; 41 16, 26). To keep close, sigō (Lk 9 36), "hold their peace." We have also "kept close" (RV Nu 5 13; Heb sāhar, "to hide"); also Job 28 21; "kept himself close," RV "shut up" (1 Ch 12 1); "close places," misgērēth (2 S 22 46; Ps 18 45 = "castles or holds shut in with high walls"). W. L. WALKER

CLOSET, kloś-et: Is the rendering in AV of (1) קִנָּה, kīnah, and (2) רֹמאִים, lēmō, also rāmō, lēmō, etc. קינָה, derived from kānhāh, "to cover," was probably originally the name of the tent specially set apart for the bride, and later (Joel 2 16) used for the bride's chamber. The word is rendered originally storeroom wall, or the rude storeroom wall of our manuscript (of Lk 12 24, AV "storehouse:" RV "storechamber"), but since for safety it was the inner rooms of the Heb house which were used for storage purposes, the word came to mean inner room, as in Mt 6:6; Lk 12:3, in both AV “closet” (cf. Mt 24:26, AV “secret chamber”). In all cases RV uses “inner chamber.” See also House.

CLOTH, cloth, CLOTHING, clóth’ing. See Dress.

CLOTHED, klóthd, UPON (ἐπέδαδ, ependādē, “to put on over”) another garment): Used only in 2 Cor 5:24. In 4 in contrast with unclothed, of 1 Cor 15:51, in which the idea of putting on, as a garment, is expressed of resurrection and immortality. The meaning here is very subtle and difficult of interpretation. In all probability Paul thinks of a certain enshamement of his physical mortal body even in this life (“in this we groan, i.e. in this present body”), hence the force of the pre-fixed preposition. The body itself was regarded by the philosophers of his day as a covering of the soul, and hence it was to be clothed upon and at the same time transformed by the superimposed heavenly body. Ependētēs, an outer garment, is used several times in LXX for μαθῆ, an upper garment or robe (cf. Jn 21:7).

Walter G. Clippinger

CLOTHES, klóthz, RENDING OF (τα θύματα, thumata, kritēth býpādhim): This term is used to describe a person or individual being made in a garment. Samuel’s skirt was rent when Saul laid hold upon it (1 S 15:27). Jesus spoke about a rent being made in a garment (Mt 9:16). The term is also used to describe a Heb custom which indicated deep sorrow. Upon the death of a relative or important personage, or when there was a great calamity, it was customary for the Hebrews to tear their garments. Reuben rent his clothes when he found that Joseph had been taken from the pit (Gen 37:29). The sons of Jacob rent their clothes when the cup was found in Benjamin’s sack (Gen 44:13). A messenger came to Eli with his clothes rent to tell of the taking of the ark of God and of the death of his two sons (1 S 4:12). David rent his garments when he heard that Absalom had slain his brothers (2 S 13:31). See also 2 S 15:2; 2 K 18:37; Isa 36:22; Jer 41:5. Rending of clothes was also an expression of indignation. The high priest rent his garment when Jesus spoke what he thought was blasphemy (Mt 26:65). See also Mourning.

CLOUD, kloud (ἰδρᾶ, ‘āmân, 27’, ‘abh; νεφῶν, nephētē, νέφος, néphos): 1. Clouds in Palestine.—In the Bible few references are found of particular clouds or of clouds in connection with the phenomena of the weather conditions. The weather in Pal is more even and has less variety than that in other lands. It is a long, narrow country with sea on the W. and desert on the E. The wind coming from the W. is always moist and brings clouds with it. If the temperature over the land is low enough the clouds will be condensed and rain will fall, but if the temperature is high, as in the five months of summer, there can be no rain even though clouds are seen. As a whole the winter is cloudy and the summer clear.

In the autumn rain storms often arise suddenly from the sea, and what seems to be a mere haze, “as small as a man’s hand,” such as

1. Rain

Gezahi saw (1 K 18:44) over the sea a few hours before the black storm cloud pouring down torrents of rain (1 K 18:45). Fog is almost unknown and there is very seldom an overcast, gloomy day. The west and southwest winds bring rain (Lk 12:4).

In the months of April, May and September a hot east wind sometimes rises from the desert and brings with it a cloud of dust which fills the air and penetrates everywhere. In the summer afternoons, esp. in the month of August, on the seacoast there is apt to blow up from the S. a considerable number of low cirro-stratus clouds which seem to fill the air with dampness, making more oppressive the dead heat of summer. These are doubtless the dusted “clouds without water” mentioned in Jude ver 12, and “heat by the shade of a cloud” (Isa 28:5).

2. Disagreeable Clouds

In the OT, Jeh’s presence is made manifest and His glory shown forth in a cloud. The cloud is usually and Glory spoken of as bright and shining, and it could not be fathomed by man: “Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, so that no prayer can pass through” (Lam 3:44). Jeh Himself was present in the cloud (Ex 19:9; 24:16; 34:5) and His glory filled the places where the cloud was (Ex 16:10; 40:38; Nu 10:34); “The cloud filled the house of Jeh” (1 K 8:10). In the NE we often have “the Son of man coming” or “with clouds” (Mt 24:30; 26:64; 26:42; Mk 13:26; Lk 21:27) and received up by clouds (Acts 1:9). The glory of the second coming is indicated in Rev 1:7 for “he cometh with the clouds” and “we that are alive . . . shall catch up in the clouds, to meet the Lord” and dwell with Him (1 These 4:17).

The pillar of cloud was a symbol of God’s guidance and presence to the children of Israel in their journeys to the promised land. The Lord appeared in a pillar of cloud and forsook them not (Neh 9:19). They followed the guidance of this cloud (Ex 40:36; Ps 78:14). The clouds are spoken of in the OT as the symbol of God’s presence and care over His people; and so the “bow in the cloud” (Gen 9:13) is a sign of God’s protection.

As the black cloud covers the sky and blots out the sun from view, so Jeh promises “to blot out the sins” of Israel (Isa 44:22); Egypt also shall be conquered, “As for her, a Blot Out shall cloud cover her” (Ezk 30:18; cf. Lam 2:1).

There is usually a wide difference in temperature between day and night in Pal. The days are warm and clouds coming from the sea are often completely dissolved in the warm atmosphere over the land. As the temperature falls, the moisture again condenses into dew and mist over the hills and valleys. As the sun rises the “morning cloud” (Hos 6:4) is quickly dispelled and disappears entirely. Job compares the passing of His prosperity to the passing clouds (Job 4:15).

God “bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds” (Job 26:8) and the “clouds are the dust of his feet” (Nah 1:3). Jeh “commands the clouds to rain no rain” (Isa 5:6), but as for man, “who can number the clouds?” (Job 38:37); “Can any understand the spreadings of the clouds?” (Job 38:38).

6. God’s Omnipotence and Man’s Ignorance (Job 38:29); “Dost thou know the balancing of the clouds, the wondrous works of his hands, who is perfect in knowledge?” (Job 37:16). See Balancing. “He that regardeth the clouds shall not reap” (Ecc 11:4), for it is God who controls the clouds and man cannot fathom His wisdom. “Thick clouds are a covering to him” (Job 32:14).
Clouds are the central figure in many visions. Ezekiel beheld "a stormy wind ... out of the north, a great cloud!" (Ezk 1:4), and

7. Visions
John saw "a white cloud; and on the cloud one sitting" (Rev 14:14). See also Dan 11:13; Jer 7:5; Hab 3:10.

The cloud is also the symbol of the terrible and of destruction. The day of Jeh's reckoning is called the "day of clouds" (Ezk 30:3) and a day of "clouds and thick darkness" (Jer 1:15). The invaders and Uphaz are expected to "come up as clouds" (Jere 41:13).

Clouds are used in connection with various other figures. Rapidity of motion, "these that fly as a cloud." (Isa 60:8). As swaddling clothes of the newborn earth (Job 33:20). Other (9); indicating great height (Job 20:6).

Figures and in Isa 14:14, "I will ascend above the heights of clouds," portraying the self-esteem of Babylon. "A morning without clouds, a cloudy day" (Deu 32:4); partial cloudiness and hidden glory (Lev 16:2; Acts 1:9; Rev 1:7).

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. See CLOUD, II; PILLAR OF CLOUD.

CLOUT, klout: As subst. (תַּקּוּת, ha-qāḥbhōhā) a patch or piece of cloth, leather, or the like, a rag, a shred, or fragment. Old "cast clouts and old rotten clouts" (Jer 38:11,12, AV). As vb. (כָּחַל, tāḥal) "to brisk, to dart," or mend with a clout. "Old shoes and clouted [ARV "patched"] upon their feet!" (Josh 9:5; cf Shakespeare, Cym., IV, 2: "I thought he slept. And put my clouted brogues from off my feet!"); Milton, Comus: "And the dull swain treads on it daily with his clouted shoon.

CLOVEN, klōv'n: In the OT, represented by a participle from כַּבֵּשׁ, kāḇēš, "to split," and applied to beasts that divide the hoof (Lev 11:3; Deu 14:7). The beasts with hoofs divided completely into two parts, that were also ruminant, were allowed the Israelites as food; see CUD. HOOF. In the NT, for διασπασθεῖν, diaspasthein, in Acts 23:21, RV "tongues parting asunder," i.e. "bifurcated or branching", explanation found in Rev 1:16, applies the word, not to tongues, but to the multitude, "parting among them," or "distributing themselves among them," settling upon the head of each disciple.

CLUSTER, klus'ter-
(1) תַּקּוּת, tāḥal; of proper name VALE OF ESCHOL (q.v.), from root meaning "to bind together." A cluster or bunch of grapes (Gen 40:10; Nu 13:23; Isa 66:8; Cant 7:7; Mic 7:1, etc.); a cluster of henna flowers (Cant 1:14); a cluster of dates (Cant 7:7); "their grapes are of gall, their clusters are bitter" (Deu 32:32).

(2) בֵּרָעָם, bērāʿām, "gather the clusters of the vine of the earth" (Rev 14:18).

"cluster of raisins" (gimmeful) of 1 S 25:18; 30:12; should rather be "raisin cakes" or "dried raisins." E. W. G. MASTERMAN

CNIUS, nīdus, knī'dus (Knīdēs, Knīdēs, "age"); a city of Caria in the Rom province of Asia, past which, according to Acts 27:7, Paul sailed. At the S.W. corner of Asia Minor there projects for 90 miles into the sea a long, narrow peninsula, practically dividing the Aegean from the Mediterranean. It now bears the name of Cape Creo. Ships sailing south to Asia Minor here turn northward as they round the point. Upon the very end of the peninsula, and also upon a small island off its point was the city of Cnidus. The island which in ancient times was connected with the mainland by a causeway is now joined to it by a sandy bar. Thus were formed two harbors, one of which could be closed by a chain. Though Cnidus was in Caria, it held the rank of a free city. There were Jews here as early as the 2nd cent. BC.

The ruins of Cnidus are the only objects of interest on the long peninsula, and as such may be reached by land only with great difficulty, few travelers have visited them; they may, however, be reached more easily by boat. The nearest modern village is Yazi Keui, 6 miles away. The ruins of Cnidus are unusually interesting, for the entire plan of the city may easily be traced. The sea-walls and piers remain. The acropolis was upon the hill in the western portion of the town; upon the terraces below were the public buildings, among which were two theaters and the odeum still well preserved. The city was esp. noted for its shrine of Venus and for the statue of that goddess by Praxiteles. Here in 157-78 Sir C. Newton discovered the statue of Demeter in the British Museum. See also the Aphrodite of Cnidus in the South Kensington Museum, one of the love-liest statues in the world. From here also came the huge Cnidian lion. The vast necropolis W. of the ruins contains tombs of every size and shape, and from various ages.

COAL, kōl (קָאָל, pēhām, "charcoal"); of Arab. ḥām, "charcoal"; כַּבֵּשׁ, qābešheth, "burning coal" or "hot ember"; of Arab. ḥābām, "to kindle"; שִׁבְּר, shibr, "a black coal" [Lam 4:8]; of Arab. shhb, "scoot" or "dark-colored sandstone"; לְמַע, lēmah, "a leaden basin" [Lam 3:16]; cf. Cant 3:16; גַּבִּית, qābešēth, "a live coal" [Rom 12:20]; יָשָׁב, yāshāb, "to rest"; יָשָׁב, yāshāb, "to rest" [Isa 6:6], in "a hot stone"; cf לַמּוֹ, lamām, "the flame" [Can 8:6; Hab 3:5]; שָׁלַק, šālāq, "shuttlecock, a live coal" [Prov 25:22]; מַשַּׁבְע, mashāḇāth, "a live coal" [Jon 18:18; 21:9]. There is no reference to mineral coal in the Bible. Coal, or more properly anthracite, which is of excellent quality, is found in thin beds (not exceeding 3 ft.) in the sandstone formation (see GEOLOGY, Nubian Sandstone), but there is no evidence of its use in ancient times. Charcoal is manufactured in a primitive fashion which does not permit the conservation of any by-products. A flat, circular place (Arab. beidar, same name as for a threshing-floor) 10 or 15 ft. in diameter is prepared in or conveniently near to the forest. On this wood, to be converted into charcoal, is carefully stacked in a dome-shaped structure, leaving an open space in the middle for fine kindlings. All except the center is first covered with leaves, and then with earth. The kindlings in the center are then fired and afterward covered in the same manner as the rest. While it is burning or smoldering it is carefully watched, and earth is immediately placed upon any holes that may be formed in the covering by the burning of the wood below for several days, more or less, according to the size of the stump. When the wood is converted into charcoal and the heat is opened. The charcoal floor is also called in Arabic mashāḇarah, from shhab, "scoot"; of Heb sh̄ñhr. The characteristic odor of the mashāḇarah clings for months to the spot.
In Ps 120 4, there is mention of "coals of juniper," RV "broom," "rotheim." This is doubtless the Arab. redem, Retama roetam, Forsk, a kind of broom which is abundant in Judaea and Moab. Charcoal from oak woods, especially Quercus cerris L. Arab. sindyān, is much preferred to other kinds, and fetches a higher price.

In most of the passages where Eng. VSS have "coal," the reference is not necessarily to charcoal, but may be to coals of burning wood. Peḥom in Prov 26 21, however, seems to stand for charcoal:

"As coals are to hot embers, and wood to fire, so is a contentious man to inflame strife." The same may be true of peḥom in Isa 44 12 and 54 16; also of arḥor in Lam 4 8.

COAT, kōt. See CLOAK; DRESS, etc.

COAT OF MAIL, māl. See ARMOR, ARMS; BRIGANDINE.

Cock, kok (ἀλεπρα, ἀλεπύρι). Lat gallus): There is no reference in the OT to dressed or stuffed poultry, which was probably first introduced into Judaea after the Rom conquest. See CHICKEN. The cock is several times mentioned in the NT and always with reference to its habit of crowing in eastern countries with such regularity as to be almost clocklike. The first full salute comes almost to the minute at half-past eleven, the second at half-past one, and the third at dawn. So uniformly do the cocks keep time and proclaim these three periods of night that we find cock-crowing mentioned as a regular division of time: "Watch therefore: for ye know not when the lord of the house cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cockcrow, or in the morning." Mk 13 35. Jesus had these same periods of night in mind when he warned Peter that he would betray Him. Mt 26 34; Lk 22 34; Jn 13 38, give almost identical wording of the warning. But in all his writing Mark was more explicit, more given to exact detail. Remembering the divisions of night as the cocks kept them, his record reads: "And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say unto thee, that thou today, even this night, before the cock crow twice, shalt deny me thrice." Mk 14 30. See CHICKEN. It is hardly less possible that the cocks crow at irregular intervals as well as at the times indicated, according to the time of the year and the phase of the moon (being more liable to crow during the night if the moon is at the full), or if a storm threatens, or there is any disturbance in their neighborhood.

GENE SHATTAN-PORTER

Cockatrice, kok'-a-tris, kok'-a-tris (ܟܪܟܛܪܢܐ, ᵃ NEGLIGENCE; ܟܪܟܛܪܢܐ, cipḥānī; LXX, βασιλικοσ, basi- liskos, "basilisk" [q.v.], and ἀσπίς, ἀσπίς [see ADDER; ASP; SERPENT]): A fabulous, deadly, monster. The name "cockatrice" appears to be a corruption of Lat colatrix, from colaris, "to tread, to walk"; colatrix being in turn a tr of the Gr kreōμαι, chreōμαι, from ἐκρηγόμαι, εκρήγαμαι. Asp, "coiled, "twisted," "party," "footstep." Herpetes ichneumon, the ichneumon, Pharaoh's rat, or mongoose, a weasel-like animal, is a native of northern Africa and southern Spain. There are also other species, including the Indian mongoose. It preys on rats and snakes, and does not despise poultry and eggs.

Pliny (see Oxford Dictionary, s.v. "Cockatrices") relates that the ichneumon darts down the open mouth of the crocodile and destroys it by gnawing through its belly. In the course of time, as the story underwent changes, the animal was metamorphosed into a water snake, and was confused with the crocodile itself, and also with the basilisk. According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed., the cockatrice was believed as early as the 13th century to be produced from a cock's egg and hatched by a serpent, and "to possess the most deadly powers, plants withering at its touch, and men and animals being seized by its look. It stood in awe however of the cock, for the sound of cockcrowing (q.v.) was said to cause it to fall flat. It has been supposed to resort to a vegetable antidote when bitten. It actually dies however when bitten by a deadly snake, and does not possess a knowledge of herbs, but its extraordinary agility enables it to ordinarily escape any injury. It is interesting to note how the changing tale of this creature with its marvelous powers has made a badge-podice of ichneumon, weasel, crocodile, and serpent.

The Bib. references (AV Isa 11 8; 59 5; Jer 8 17) are doubtless to a serpent, the word "cockatrice," with its mediaeval implications, having been introduced by the translators of AV. See SERPENT.

ALFRED ELY DAY

Cock-Crowing, kok'krō-ing (ἀλεκτροφωνία, alectrophónia): An indefinite hour of the night between midnight and morning (Mk 13 35), referred to by all the evangelists in their account of Peter's denial (Mt 26 69-75; Mk 14 66-72; Lk 22 54-62; Jn 13 38). It is derived from the habit of the cock to crow esp. toward morning. See Cock.

Cocker, kok'er (ῥοδόν, τῆθερνυς, "to tourn," "coddle," "pamper"): Occurs only in Ecclus 30 9 with the meaning "to pamper:" "Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid:" Shakespere," "a cockered silken wanton"; now seldom used; Jean Ingelow, "Poor folk cannot afford to cocker themselves."

Cockle, kok'le (AV "stinking weeds, RV "noseme weeds"); ῥόδος, bo'shāth, from Heb root ῥοδ, bd'ash, "to stink"; βάρος, bātos, "Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley." (Job 31 40). On account of the meaning of the Heb root we should expect that the reference was rather to repulsive, offensive weeds than to the pretty corn cockle. It is very possible that no particular plant is here intended, though the common Mediterranean "stinking" arums have been suggested by Hooker.

CODE OF HAMMURABI. See HAMMURABI, CODE OF.

COELE-SYRIA, sē-lē-sir'ā (AV Celosyria; Kōlē Sūria, Kōlē Sūrta, "hollow Syria"): So the Greeks after the time of Alexander the Great named the valley lying between the two mountain ranges, Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. It is referred to in the OT as Bē śāth ha-Lēḇāhōn, "the valley of Lebanon" (Josh 11:17), a name the echo of which is still heard in el-Būkā', the designation applied today to the southern part of the valley. This valley, which extends about 300 miles in length, is the continuation northward of the Jordan valley. The main physical features are described under Lebanon q.v. The name, however, did not always indicate the same tract of territory. In Strabo (v.62) and Ptolemey (v.15), it covers the fertile land between the Jordan and the Anti-Lebanon which was then (as it is today) preserved over by Damascus. In 1 Esd 2:17; 2 Macc 3:8, etc., it indicates the country S. and E. of Mt. Lebanon, and along with Phoenicia it contributed the whole of the Seleucid dominions which lay S. of the river Eleutherus. Jos includes in Coele-Syria the country E. of the Jordan, along with Scythopolis (Beisan) which lay on the W., separated by the river from the other members of the Decapolis (Ant., XIII, xii, 2, etc.). In XIV, 4, 5, he says that "Pompey remitted Coele-Syria of A.D. 64 as the river Euphrates and Egypt to Scæurus." The term is therefore one of some elasticity.

COFFER, ko'fer (7326, argōs): A small box such as in which the Philis placed their golden mice and other offerings in returning the Ark (1 S 6:11.15).

COFFIN, ko'fin. See Chest; Burial.

COGITATION, ko-jī-ta'shūn, ra'yōn, "the act of thinking or reflecting," as in Dn 7:28, "my cogitations much troubled me" (RV "my thoughts").

COHORT, ko'hört: In RV of Mt 27:27; Mk 15:16; Jn 18:31; Acts 10:1; 21:31; 27:1, the tr of speira (AV and RV, "band"): the tenth part of a legion; ordinarily about 600 men. In Jn 18 the word seems to be used loosely of a smaller body of soldiers, a detachment, detail. See Army; Band.

COINS, koinz: There were no coins in use in Pal until after the Captivity. It is not quite certain how and when the first silver and copper coins that divided pieces of a certain weight for use as money or not, but there can be no question of coinage proper until the Pers period. Darius I is credited with introducing a coinage system into his empire, and his were the first coins that came into use among the Jews, though it seems probable that coins were struck in Lydia in the time of Croesus, the contemporary of Cyrus the Great, and these coins were doubtless the model upon which Darius based his system, and they may have circulated to some extent in Babylonia before the return of the Jews. The only coins mentioned in the OT are the Darics (see Daric), and these only in the RV, the word "drachm" being used in AV (Bar 2:69; 8:27; Neh 7:1-72). The Jews had no native coins until the time of the Maccabees, who struck coins after gaining their independence about 143-141 BC. These kings struck silver and copper, or the latter, at least (see Money), in denominations of shekels and fractions of the shekel, until the Maccabes were overthrown by the Romans. Other coins were certainly in circulation during the same period, esp. those of Alexander and his successors, the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, both of whom bore sway over Pal before the rise of the Maccabees. Besides these coins there were the issues of some of the Phoen towns, which were allowed to strike coins by the Persians and the Seleucids. The coins of Tyre and Sidon, both silver and copper, must have circulated largely in Pal on account of the commercial relations between the Jews and Phoenicians (for examples, see under Money). After the advent of the Romans the local coinage was restricted chiefly to the series of copper coins, such as the mites mentioned in the NT; the silver denarii being struck mostly at Rome, but circulating wherever the Romans went. The coins of the Herods and the Procurators are abundant, but all of copper, since the Romans did not allow the Jewish rulers to strike either silver or gold coins. At the time of the first revolt (67-70 AD) the Jewish leader, Simon, struck shekels again, or, as some numismatists think, he was the first to do so. But this series was a brief one, lasting between 3 and 4 years only, as Jesus was taken by Titus in 70 AD, and this put an end to the existence of the Jewish state. There was another short period of Jewish coinage during the second revolt, in the reign of Hadrian, when Simon Barcochba struck coins with Heb legends which indicate his independence of Rom rule. These were of gold and silver, and constitute the last series of strictly Jewish coins (see Money). After this the coins struck in Judea were Rom, as Jesus was made a Rom colony.

COLA, kō'la. See Cholla.

COLD, küld (יָרָם, ḫōr; ψυχρός [adj.], ψυχρός, ψιχρός [noun]): Pal is essentially a land of sunshine and warmth. The temperature of the cold northern latitudes is unknown. January is the coldest Palestine month; but the degree of cold in a particular place depends largely on the altitude above the sea. On the coast and in the snow never falls; and the temperature reaches freezing-point, perhaps once in thirty years. In Jerus at 2,500 ft. above the sea the mean temperature in January is about 45°F, but the minimum may be as low as 25°F. Snow occasionally falls, but lasts only a short time. On Mt. Hermon and on the Lebanons snow may be found the whole year, and the cold is most intense, even in the summer. In Jericho and around the Dead Sea, 1,292 ft. below sea-level, it is correspondingly hotter, and cold is not known.

Cold is of such short duration that no adequate provision is made by the people to protect themselves against the cold. The sun is always bright and warm, and nearly always shines for part of the day, even in winter. After sunset the people wrap themselves up and go to sleep. They prefer to wrap up their heads rather than their feet in order to keep warm. The only means of heating the houses is the charcoal brazier around which as many as possible gather for a little warmth. It is merely a bed of coals in an iron vessel. Peter was glad to avail himself of the little heat of the coals as late as the beginning of April, when the nights are often chilly in Jerus: "Having made a fire of coals; for it was cold: . . . and Peter also was with them, standing and warming himself" (Jn 18:18). There is no attempt made to heat the whole house. In the cold winter months the people of the mountains almost hibernate. They wrap up their heads in shawls and coverings and only the most energetic venture out: "The sluggard will not plow by reason of the winter" (Prov 20:4, AV "cold"). The peasants and more primitive people of the desert often make their shanties in the open, and in Melita where Paul was cast ashore after shipwreck: "The barbarians . . . kindled a fire . . . because of the cold" (Acts 28:2).
The cold is greatly dreaded because it causes so much actual suffering: “Who can stand before his cold?” (Ps 147:17). The last degree of degradation is to have “no covering in the cold” (Job 24:7).

1. The heat of the long summer, the shadow of a rock or the cool of evening is most grateful, and the appreciation of a cup of cool water can easily be understood by anyone who has experienced the burning heat of the summer sun: “As cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country” (Prov 25:25); “cold of snow in the time of harvest” (Prov 25:13), probably with reference to the use of snow (shaved ice) in the East to cool a beverage.

Figurative uses: “The love of the many shall wax cold” (Mt 24:12); “I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot” (Rev 3:15).

COL-HOZEH, kol-hôzeh (קֹל הָוֹצֶה), kol-hôzeh, “all seeing”; LXX omits: A man who son Shallum rebuilt the fountain gate of Jerus in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 3:15). The C. of Neh 11:5 is probably another man.

COLIUS, kol-îus (קִלּוּס, Kolios, 1 Esd 9:23). See CALITAS.

COLLAR, kol’ar, kol’er: (1) (קָלַר, κολλάριον, κολλᾶριον; lit. “drops,” from κολοπέ, “to drop”). Jgs 8:26 includes נַפְּפוֹתָה among the spoils taken by the Medinatis and Ishmaelites; RV “pendants.” AV “collars.” Kimhi ad loc. suggests “performs-dropper.”

(2) (קְפִיל, ἱπ, lit. “mouth”). In Job 30:18 the word is used to indicate the collar band, or hole of a robe, through which the head was inserted. Job, in describing his suffering and writhing, mentions the disfiguring of his garment, and suggests that the whole thing feels as narrow or close-fitting as the neckband, or perhaps that in his fever and pains he feels as if the neckband itself is choking him.

(3) (קֶּלֶר, קַלְּרָה, Kol, Jer 29:26, “stocks”; RV “shackles,” which see; ARV “collar”). An instrument of torture or punishment.

NATHAN ISAACS

COLLECTION, kol’k-shun: (1) In the OT (קֵלֵּל, קִלֵּל, mas’êth, “something taken up”), used in 2 Ch 24:6-9 AV with reference to the tax prescribed in Ex 30:12-16; RV “tax.”

(2) In the NT “collection” is the tr given to λόγια, λόγια, found only twice (classical, συλλογή, συλλογή). It is used with reference to the collection which Paul took up in the gentile churches for the poor Christians in Jerus, as, for some reason, perhaps more severe persecutions, that church was esp. needy (1 Cor 16:1.2; ver 2 AV “gathering”). Other words, such as bounty, contribution, blessing, alms, ministration, are used to indicate this same ministry. Paul seems to have ascribed to it great importance. Therefore, he planned it carefully long in advance, and urged systematic, yearly savings for it; he delegated carefully chosen to take it to Jesus; and, in spite of dangers, determined himself to accompany them. Evidently he thought that the crowning act of his work in the provinces of Galatia, Asia, Macedonia and Achacia, for as soon as it was finished he purposed to go to Rome and the West (Acts 24:17; Rom 16:25.26; 2 Cor 8,9). See also COMMUNION.

COLOR, kul’er, COLORS, kul’er: The word trd “color” in AV is aqin, which lit. means “eye” or “appearance,” and has been so trd in RV. In the NT the Gr προφάσεως, πρόφασις, has the meaning of preence or show (Acts 27:30; of Rev 17:4 AV). The references to Joseph’s coat of many colors (Gen 37:2.3.23.32) and “garments of divers colors” (2 S 13:18.19) probably do not mean the color of the garment at all, but the form, as suggested in ARV, “a long garment with sleeves.” In Jgs 5:30 the word for “dip” or “dye” in ARV is the original and has been so trd in ARV (see Dye). In 1 Ch 29:2 II ἀργον, ἀργον, meaning “variegated,” hence “varicolored,” is found. In Isa 54:11, ἀργον is used. This name was applied to the sulphide of antimony (Arab. ḥab) used for painting the eyes. Hence the ARV rendering “antimony” instead of “fair colors” (see PAINT). In Ezk 16 6 25, ἀργον, is found, meaning “covered with pieces” or “spotted,” hence by implication “divers colors.”

Although the ancient Hebrews had no specific words for “color,” “paint” or “painter,” still, as we know, they commonly met with displays of the art of coloring among the Babylonians (Ezk 23:14) and Egyptians and the inhabitants of Pal. Pottery.
glazed bricks, glassware, tomb walls, sarcophagi, wood and fabrics were submitted to the skill of the colorist. This skill probably consisted in bringing out the effects by the use of a few primary colors, rather than in any attempt at the blending of shades which characterizes modern coloring. That the gaudy show of their heathen neighbors attracted the children of Israel is shown by such passages as Jgs 6:27; Ezek 23:12-16.

Two reasons may be given for the indefiniteness of many of the Bib. references to color. (1) The origin of the Heb people: They had been wandering tribes or slaves with no occasion to develop a color language. (2) Their religious laws: These forbade expression in color or form (Ex 20:4). Yielding to the attractions of gorgeous display was discouraged by such prophets as Ezekiel, who had sickened of the abominations of the Chaldeans. (Ezek 23:14-15,16; “And I said unto them, Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eye” (Ezek 20:7)).

Indefiniteness of color language is common to oriental literature, ancient and modern. This does not indicate a want of appreciation of color but a fear to use and define color effects. The inhabitants of Syria and Pal today delight in brilliant colors. Bright yellow, crimson, magenta and green are used for adornment with no evident sense of fitness, according to the foreigners’ eyes, other than their correspondence with the glowing brightness of the eastern skies. A soapmaker once told the writer that in order to make his wares attractive to the Arabs he colored them a brilliant crimson or yellow. A peasant choices without hesitation a flaring magenta or yellow or green sunray (giraffe), rather than one of somber hues. The oriental student in the chemical or physical laboratory often finds his inability to distinguish or classify color a real obstacle. His closest definition of a color is usually “lightish” or “darkish.” This is not due to color blindness but to a lack of education, and extends to lines other than color distinctions. The colloquial language of Pal today is poor in words denoting color, and an attempt to secure from a native a satisfactory description of some simple color is usually disappointing.

The harmonious color effects which have come to us from the Orient have been, in the past, more the result of accident (see Dye) than of deliberate purpose, as witness the clashing of colors which modern artificers have been able to reduce. This inability of the peoples of Bible lands to define colors is an inheritance from past ages, a consideration which helps us to appreciate the vagueness of many of the Bib. references.

The following color words occur in the AV or RV: (1) bay, (2) black, (3) blue, (4) brown, (5) crimson, (6) green, (7) grey, (8) hoar, (9) purple, (10) red, (11) scarlet, (12) sorrel, (13) vermilion, (14) white, (15) yellow. In addition there are indefinite words indicating mixtures of light and dark: (a) grailed (graiyalz), (b) ringstraked (ringstraked), (c) speckled, (d) spotted. (1) Bay or red is more properly “strong” in the RV. Black (blackish): Eight different words have been trans “black.” They indicate various colors such as “dusky like the early dawn,” “shen,” “swarthily,” “moved with passion.” Black is applied to hair (Lev 16:11; Cant 5:11; Mt 27:56); to marble or pavement (Est 1:6); to mourning (Job 30:30); to passion (Ps 22:11 AV; Lam 5:10); to horses (Zec 2:6 Rev 6:5); to the heavens (1 K 18:45; Job 3:5; Prov 7:9 AV; Jer 4:28; Mic 3:6); to the sun (Rev 6:12); to the skin (racing) (Cant 1:5); to flocks (Gen 30:32.33.35. 40); to brooks because of ice (Job 6:10).

(3) Blue (םָּבָּשָּשָּש): A color from the eburnean musel: This word was applied only to fabrics dyed with a special blue dye obtained from a shellfish. See Dye. ‘םָּשָּש, sheash, in one passage of the AV is tr “blue” (Est 1:6). It is properly i in RV as “blue cloth.” “Blissness of a wound” (Prov 20:30) is correctly rendered in RV “stripes that wound.” Blue is applied to the fringes, veils, vestments, embroideries, etc., in the description of the ark and tabernacle (Ex 25:25ff; Nu 4:6ff; 16:38); to workers in blue (2 Ch 2:13ff; 3:14); to palaces, adorments (Est 1:6); to royal apparel (Est 8:15; Jer 10:9; Ezek 23:6; 27:7.24).

(4) Brown: The Heb word meaning “sunburnt” or “swarthily” is tr “black” in RV (Gen 30:32ff).

(5) Crimson (םָּשָּש, karmil): This word is probably of Pers origin and applies to the brilliant dye obtained from a bug. A second word (םָּשָּש תָּרָם, t Korah, is also found. Its meaning is the same. See Dye. Crimson is applied to rainment (2 Ch 27:14; 3:14; Jer 4:30 AV); to sins (Isa 1:18).

(6) Green (greenish): This word in the tr refers almost without exception to vegetation. The Heb (םָּשָּש, yarák, lit., “pal,”) is considered one of the three definite colors thus used in the OT. The Gr equivalent is chlóros; of Eng. “chlorine.” This word occurs in the following vs: Gen 1:30; 9:3; Ex 10:15; Lev 2:14 (AV); 23:14 (AV); 2 K 19:20; Ps 37:2; Isa 16:6; 27:27; Job 38:38; Chlóros, Mt 5:38; Rev 8:7; 9:4. 튀 을, ‘tohn, closely allied in meaning to yarák, is used to describe trees in the following passages: Dt 12:2; 1 K 14:23; 2 K 16:14; 17:16; 19:26; 2 Ch 28:4; Job 15:32; Ps 37:35; 52:8; Cant 1:16; Isa 87:5; Jer 2:20; 3:6; 11:10; 17:2; 8:3; Ezek 6:13; Hos 14:8. In the remaining vs the Heb equivalents do not denote color, but the condition of being full of sap, fresh or unripe (of similar uses in Eng.) (Gen 30:37 AV; Jgs 16:7; Ps 23:2; Cant 2:13; Job 8:16; Ezek 17:24; 20:47; Lk 23:31). In Est 6 the Heb word refers to a fiber, probably cotton, as is indicated by ARV. Greenish is used to describe leprosy spots in Lev 13:49; 14:37. The same word is tr “yellow” in Ps 68:13.

(7) Grey: The Heb הָּשָּש, šékhâ, means old age, hence refers also to the color of the hair in old age (Gen 42:28; 43:29; 44:21; Dt 4:22; Ps 71:18; Hos 7:9). See 1 Cor, next paragraph.

(8) Hoar (hoary): The same word which in other vs is tr “gray” is rendered “hoar” or “hoary,” applying to the hair in 1 K 2:9-6:3; Isa 46:4; Rev 19:22; Job 41:11; Prov 16:16. Another Heb word is tr “hoar” or “hoary,” describing “frost” in Ex 16:14; Job 38:29; Ps 147:16.

(9) Purple: The Heb equivalent is פָּשָּש, ’arjam, a kind of purple, porphyra. The latter word refers to the source of the dye, namely, a shellfish found on the shores of the Mediterranean. See 1 Cor. This color, which varied widely according to the kind of shellfish used and the method of dyeing, was utilized in connection with the adornment of the tabernacle (Ex 25:26, 27, 28, 35, 36, 39; Nu 4:14). There were workers in purple called to assist in beautifying the temple (2 Ch 2:7-14; 3:14). Purple was much used for royal raiment and furnishings (Jgs 8:26; Est 1:6; 8:15; Cant 3:10; Mt 15:17:20; Jn 19:19). Purple was typical of gorgeous colors (Prov 23:22; Ezek 7:5; Ezek 27:16; Lk 16:19; Acts 16:14; Rev 17:4; 18:12-16).

(10) Red: The Heb דְּּוָּשָּש, ’adham, from לָּשָּש, “blood,” hence, “blood-like.” This is one of the three distinctive color words mentioned in the OT (see Green; White), and is found in most of the references to red. Four other words are used: (a) ἐδρυμένος, probably "darkened" or "clouded"; (Gen 49 12; Prov 23 29); (b) ἐρυθάριον, to ferment; (Ps 76 8m; Isa 27 2 AV); (c) ἐρυθαῖς, ἐρυθάριον, probably "to glisten" (Est 1 6); (d) πυπόπρος, πυπόρρος, "firelike" (Mt 16 23; Rev 6 4; 12 3); Red is applied to dyed skins (Ex 25 26; 14 35; 7 23; 36 19; 39 54); to the color of animals (Nu 21 2; Zec 2 5; 6 2); to flowers (Isa 5 32); to the human skin (Gen 25 25; ruddy, 1 S 16 17; 12 42; Cant 5 10; Lam 4 7); to the eyes (Gen 49 12; Prov 23 29); to sores (Lev 13); to wine (Ps 76 8m; Prov 23 31; Isa 27 2 AV); to water (2 K 5 22); to tobacco (Isa 5 7); to pottage (Gen 26 30); to apparel (Isa 63 2); to the sky (Mt 16 23); to sins (Isa 1 18); to a shield (Nah 2 3).

(11) Scarlet: Scarlet and crimson colors were probably from the same source (see Crimson, Dye). ζυρώτω, θιλαθ, or derivatives have been tr4 "scarlet" and "crimson" (Gr kokkíus). A Chaldean word for purple has thrice been tr4 "scarlet" in AV (Dnl 5 16.29). Scarlet is applied to fabrics or yarn used (a) in the equipment of the tabernacle (Ex 25 26; Nu 4 8); (b) in rites in cleansing lepers (Lev 14); in ceremony and purification (Num 19 8); and in ceremonies of kings (2 S 1 24; Prov 31 21; Lam 4 5; Dnl 5 16.29, "purple"; Nah 2 3; Mt 27 28; Rev 17 4; 18 12.16); to marking thread (Gen 28 28.30; Josh 2 18.21); to lips (Cant 4 4); to sins (Isa 1 18); to beasts (Rev 17 3); to wool (He 9 19).

(12) Sorrel: This word occurs once in the RV (Zec 1 8).

(13) Vermilion: This word, ἄλειθες, ishāshar, occurs in two passages (Jer 22 14; Ezk 23 14). Vermilion of modern art is a sulphide of mercury. It is not at all improbable that the paint referred to was an oxide of iron. This oxide is still taken from the ground in Syria and Pal and used for decorative outlines.

(14) White: The principal word for denoting whiteness in the Heb was לֹֽאְבֵּן, lāḇēn, a distinctive color word. Some of the objects to which it was applied show that it was used as we use the word "white" (Gen 49 12). Mt. Lebanon was probably named because of its snow-tipped peaks (Jer 18 14). White is applied to goats (Gen 30 35); to rods (Gen 30 37); to teeth (Gen 49 12); to leporous hairs and spots (Lev 13; Nu 12 10); to garments (Eccle 9 8; Dnl 7 9); as symbol of purity (Dnl 11 35; 12 10; Isa 1 15); to horses (Zec 1 8; 8 5.6); to tree branches (Isa 9 17); to barley meal (Ezk 16 31). The corresponding Gr word, λευκός, leukós, is used in NT. It is applied to hair (Mt 5 36; Rev 1 14); to rain (Mt 17 2; 28 3; Mk 9 3; 16 5; Lk 9 29; Jn 20 12; Acts 1 10); to Rev 3 4.15.8; 11 7; 13 13.14; 19 14); to horses (Rev 6 2; 13 11.14); to a throne (Rev 20 11); to stone (Rev 2 17); to a cloud (Rev 14 14). Besides lāḇēn, four other Hebrew words have been tr4 "white": (a) יָם, yām, הֹרֵת, or יָם הֹרֵת, meaning "bleached," applied to bread (Gen 40 16); to linen (Est 1 6; 8 15); (b) יָם, yām, pāh, or יָם פָּה, pāhōr, lit. "dazzling," is applied to angels (Gen 6 10); to human appearance (Cant 5 10); to wool (Ezk 27 18); (c) יִשָּׁר, yīšār, probably mother of pearl or alabaster (Est 1 6); (d) יָם, yām, rīr, lit. "saliva," and, from resemblance, "white of egg" (Job 6 6).

(15) Yellow: This word occurs in Est 1 6 to describe pavement; in Lev 11 to describe leporous hair; in Dnl 13 to describe gold.

Mixtures of colors: (a) grizzle (grizzled), lit. "spotted with hair," applied to goats (Gen 31 10.12); to horses (Zec 6 3.6); (b) ringstraked (ringstraked), lit. "striped with bands," applied to animals (Gen 30 35 ff; 51 8 ff); (c) speckled, lit. "dotted or spotted," applied to cattle and goats (Gen 30 32 ff; 51 8 ff); to a bird (Jer 12 9); to horses (Zec 1 8 AV); (d) spotted, lit. "covered with patches," applied to cattle and goats (Gen 30 32). In Jude ver 23 "spotted" means "defiled." of the following cents. (e.g. Tert., De praescript., 7; Clem. Alex., Strom., I, 1; Orig., Contra Celsum, v.8). The authenticity was not questioned until the second quarter of the 19th cent. when Mayerhoff claimed that the 12th, not the 1st, was composed. This position has been thoroughly answered by showing that the teaching is essentially different from the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., esp. in the conception of Christ as prior to and greater than all things created (see V below). The attack in later years has chiefly been directed on the ground of vocabulary and style, the doctrinal position, esp. the Christology and the teaching about angels, and the relation to the Ephesian epistle. The objection on the ground of vocabulary and style is based, as is so often the case, on the assumption that a man, no matter what he writes about, must use the same words and style. There are thirty-four words in Col which are not in any other NT book. When one removes those that are due to the difference in subject-matter, the total is reduced to about that of our other Pauline epistles. The omission of familiar Pauline particles, the use of genitives, of "all" (παντί), and of synonyms, find parallels in other epistles, or are due to a difference of subject, or perhaps to the influence on Paul's language of his life and work in Rome (von Soden). The doctrinal position is not at heart contradictory to St. Paul's earlier teaching (cf Godet, Intro NT; St. Paul's Epistles, 440f). The Christology is in entire harmony with Phil (2 Cor. 8:6; 15:24-28), esp. in respect of the emphasis laid on "the cosmic activity of the preeminent Christ." Finally, the form in which St. Paul puts the Christology is that best calculated to meet the false teaching of the Colossian heretics (v. B). In recent years H. Holtzmann has advocated that this epistle is an interpolated form of an original Pauline epistle to the Colossians, and the work of the author of the Epistle to the Ephesians (v. q.v.). A modification of this theory of interpolation has recently been suggested by J. Weiss (TLZ, September 29, 1900). Both these theories are too complicated to stand, and even von Soden, who at first followed Holtzmann's view (von Soden, Einl., 12), while S Chand (DB^) has shown how utterly untenable it is. Sober criticism today has come to realize that it is impossible to deny the Pauline authorship of this epistle. This position is strengthened by the close relationship between Col and Philem, of which Renan says: "Paul alone, so it would seem, could have written this little masterpiece" (Abbott, JCC, viii). If Philem (v. q.v.) stands as Pauline, as it must, then the authenticity of Col is established beyond controversy.

II. Place and Date.—The Pauline authorship being established, it becomes evident at once that the apostle wrote Col along with the other Captivity Epistles, and that it is best dated from Rome (see PHILEM, EPISTLE TO), and during the first captivity. This would be about 68 or, if the later chronology is preferred, 63 or 64.

III. Destination.—The epistle was written, on the face of it, to the church at Colossae (v. q.v.), a town in the Lyceus valley where the gospel had been preached by Paul during his second journey (Col 4:12), and where St. Paul was, himself, unknown personally (1:4.8.9; 2:1.5). From the epistle it is evident that the Colossian Christians were Gentiles (1:27) for whom, as such, the apostle feels a responsibility (2:1 ff). He sends to them Tychicus (4:7), who is accompanied by Onesimus, one of their own community (4:9), and urges them to be sure to read another letter which will reach them from Laodicea (4:16).

IV. Relation of Other NT Writings.—Beyond the connection with Eph (v. q.v.) we need notice only the relation between Col and Rev. In the letter to Laodicea (Rev 3:14-21) we have two expressions: "the beginning of the creation of God," and "I will give to him to sit down with me in my throne," in which we have an echo of Col which suggests an acquaintance with and recognition of the earlier apostle's teaching on the part of St. John" (Lightfoot, Col, 42, n. 5).

V. The Purpose.—The occasion of the epistle was, we may be sure, the information brought by Epaphras that the church in Colossae was subject to the assault of a body of Judaistic Christians who were seeking to overthrow the faith of the Colossians and weaken their regard for St. Paul (Zahn). This "heresy," as it is commonly called, has had many explanations. The Tübingen school taught that it was gnostic, and sought to find in the terms the apostle used evidence for the 2d cent. composition of the epistle. Plērotōma and gnōsis ("fulness") and "knowing," were to be interpreted as a gnostic, rather than as a false, interpretation, but will not admit it. The very heart of Gnosticism, i.e. the theory of emanation and the dualistic conception which regards matter as evil, finds no place in Col. The use of plērotōma in this and in other gnostic epistles is gnostic, views, whether held by the apostle or by the readers of the letters. The significance in Col of this and the other words adopted by Gnosticism in later years is quite distinct from that later meaning. The use of plērotōma in Col is quite distinct from that later meaning. The Christ of the Colossians is not the so-called Christ of Gnosticism. In Esseniism, on the other hand, Lightfoot and certain Germans seek the origin of this heresy. Esseniism has certain affinities with Gnosticism on the one side and Judaism on the other. Two objections are raised against this explanation of the origin of the Colossian heresy. In the first place Esseniism, as we know it, is found in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, and there is no evidence for its establishment in the Lyceus valley. In the second place, no references are found in Col to certain distinct Essene teachings, e.g. those about marriage, washings, communism, Sabbath rules, etc.

The Colossian heresy is due to Judaistic influences on the one hand, and Gnosticism and Esseniism and certain superstitions on the other. The Judaistic elements in this teaching are patent, circumcision (2:11), the Law (2:14.15), and special seasons (2:16). But there is more than Judaism in this false teaching. Its teachers look to intermediary spirits, to angels whom they worship, and insist on a very strict asceticism. To seek the origin of angel worship in Judaism, as is commonly done, is, as A. L. Williams has shown, to miss the real significance of the attitude of the Jews to angels, and to magnify the bitter jeers of Celsus. Apart from phrases used in exorcism and magic he shows us that there is no evidence that the Jew ever worshipped angels (JTS, X, 413 f). This element in the Colossian heresy was local, finding its antecedent in the worship of the river spirits, and in later years the same tendency gave the impulse to the worship of St. Michael as the patron saint of Colossae (so too Ramsay, HDB, s.v. "Colossae"). The danger of and the falsehood in this teaching were twofold. In the first place he was to hold to the true worship of the river spirits; and in later years the same tendency gave the impulse to the worship of St. Michael as the patron saint of Colossae (so too Ramsay, HDB, s.v. "Colossae"). The danger of and the falsehood in this teaching were twofold. In the first place he was to hold to the true worship of the river spirits; and in later years the same tendency gave the impulse to the worship of St. Michael as the patron saint of Colossae (so too Ramsay, HDB, s.v. "Colossae"). The danger of and the falsehood in this teaching were twofold. In the first place he was to hold to the true worship of the river spirits; and in later years the same tendency gave the impulse to the worship of St. Michael as the patron saint of Colossae (so too Ramsay, HDB, s.v. to them that they are quite free from all obligations of the Law because Christ, in whom they have been baptized (3 12), has blotted out all the Law (2 14). The second danger is that their belief in and worship of the Lord and Christ, the Holy One, false teachers about Christ and the material world, would develop even further than it had. They, because of their union with Him, need fear no angelic being. Christ has triumphed over them all, leading them as it were by the reign of His train (2 15), as He conquered on the cross. The spiritual powers cease to have any authority over the Christians. It is to set Christ forward, in this way, as Head over all creation as very God, and out of His relation to the church and to the universe to develop the Christian life, that the apostle writes.

VI. Argument.—The argument of the Epistle is as follows:

1 1.2: Salutation.
1 3-8: Thanksgiving for their faith in Christ, their love for the saints, their hope laid up in heaven, which they had in and through the gospel and of which he had heard from Epaphras.
1 9-13: Prayer that they might be filled with the full knowledge of God’s will so as to walk worthy of the Lord and to be fruitful in good works, thankful for their inheritance of the kingdom of His Son.
1 14-23: Statement of the Son’s position, from whom we have redemption. He is the very image of God, Creator, and existent, the Head of the church, pre-eminent over all, in whom all the fullness (pleroma) dwells, the Reconciler of all things, as also of the Colossians, through His death, proved holy and faithful to the hope of the gospel.
1 24-2: 5: By his suffering he is filling up the sufferings of Christ, of whom he is a minister, even to reveal the great mystery of the ages, that Christ is in them, the Gentiles, the hope of glory, the object of the apostle’s preaching everywhere. This explains Paul’s interest in them, and his care for them, that their hearts may be strengthened in the love and knowledge of Christ.
1 6-3 4: He then passes to exhortation against those who are leading them astray, these false teachers of a vain, deceiving philosophy based on worldly wisdom, who ignore the truth of Christ’s position, as One in whom all the Divine pleroma dwells, and their relation to Him, united by baptism; raised through the faith; quickened and forgiven; whose righteousness is the observance of various legal practices, strict asceticisms and angel worship. This exhortation is closed with the appeal that as Christ’s they will not submit to these regulations of men which are useless, esp. in comparison with Christ’s power through the Resurrection.
1 5-17: Practical exhortations follow to real mortification of the flesh with its characteristics, and the substitution of a new life of fellowship, love and peace.
1 18-4 1: Exhortation to fulfil social obligations, as wives, husbands, children, parents, slaves and masters.
1 4-6: Exhortation to devote and watchful prayer.
1 7-18: Salutations and greeting.

COLT, költ (FOAL) (", "o'gir, ", ben; 6, noo, pölös, lód, huïds, with some word such as o'gir, huïgouïou, understood; huïds alone "son"); the Eng. words "colt" and "foal" are used in the Bible of the ass everywhere except in Gen 32 15, where the word "colt" is used of the camel in the list of animals destined by Jacob as presents for Esau. In most cases aígir (of Arab. a'ir, "ass") means "ass", but it may be borrowed and used in Zec 9 9, where we have: "al-kámár u'l-a'ígir ben-tásbînîth, lit. "on an ass, and on an ass’s colt, the son of the she-asses"; cf Mt 21 5: éfî lýôn kai éfî pólôm huïos huïgougos, "upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." In Jn 12 15 we have éfî pólôm lýôn, éfî pólôm lýôn, and in the previous verse the diminutive, dôágon, dôáron. The commonest NT word for "colt" is pôlos, akin to which is Ger. Pöhle and Eng. "foal", and "filly". The Latin pullus signifies either "foal" or "chicken," and in the latter sense gives rise to Fr. poulet and Eng. "pullet." In view of the fact that horses are but little mentioned in the Bible, and that only in connection with royal equipages and armies, it is not surprising that "colt" does not occur in its ordinary Eng. sense.

COME, kum: The tr. of many Heb and Gr words. In the phrase "The Spirit of Jeh came mightily upon him" (Jgs 14 6.19; 16 14; 1 S 10 10; 11 6; 16 13), the word is kum'fert; Jgs 14 6; 16 14 "came mightily," which is the uniform tr. of RV (cf 13 25 to move, i.e. to disturb or stir up), as in 1 Ch 12 18; 2 Ch 24 20, it is lâbâsh, "to clothe"; RV "The Spirit . . . clothed itself with Gideon" and . . . "with Zechariah," "The Spirit clothed Amasai." Among its many changes, RV has "come forth" for "come" (Mt 2 6); "gone up" for "come" (14 32, a different text); "come all the way" for "come" (Jn 4 15); "got out upon the" for "come to" (21 9); "draw near" for "come" (He 4 16), "come" for "come in" (Acts 27 16); "attain unto" for "come in" (Eph 4 13); and "I come for "I come again" (Jn 14 28).

COMELINESS, kümlîn-e, COMELY, kümlî: Cognate with "becoming," viz. what is suitable, graceful, handsome. The Servant of Jeh in Isa. 52 3 is without "comeliness" (hâdâhâr, "honor"), i.e. there is not in him a name, appearance or the like. His servant, while he is bowed humble man’s sin. "Praise a comely (nâwâch, of nâwâch; Ps 33 1; 147 1), i.e. suitable or befitting for the righteous," and, therefore, an honor and glory; "uncomely parts (asîchâ, 1 Cor 17 26), viz. less honorable. See also 1 S 16 18, "a comely person"; Cant 6 4, "comely as Jerus," etc.

COMFORT, kum'ľrt (kî, nâmâm; nôpanâkâlô, nôpanâkâlô): The NT word is variously tr. as "comfort," "exhorts," "beseech," the exact tr. to be determined by the context. Etymologically, it is "to call alongside of," i.e. to summon for assistance. To comfort is to cheer and encourage. It has a positive force, voliting in its synonym "console," as it indicates the dispelling of grief by the impartation of strength. RV has correctly changed the tr. of paraphramenai from AV "comfort," to "consolation." So in the OT, "Comfort ye my people" (Isa 40 1) is much stronger than "consolators," which is only the power of calm endurance of affliction, while the brightest hopes of the future and the highest incentives to present activity are the gifts of the Divine grace that is here bestowed.

COMFORTABLY, kum'ľrt-ta-bîl (ôlhîh, "to the heart"): "To speak to the heart," i.e. to speak kindly, to console, to comfort, is the ordinary Heb expression for woeing: e.g. Boaz spake "to the heart" of Ruth (Ruth 2 13a; AV "friendly," RV "kindly"). The beauty of the Hebrew term is illustrated in Gen 50 21 where Joseph "spake kindly unto his brethren, weeping and reproving them to his face to confidence. Rendered "comfortably" in five passages: thrice of human speaking, and twice of the tenderness of God's address to His people. David was urged to win back the hearts of the people by kind words; "speak comfortably" (2 S 19 7). Hoseah in like manner comforted the Levites (2 Ch 32 20) and encouraged his captains (2 Ch 32 6). The term has exceptional wealth of meaning in connection with God's message of grace and forgiveness to His redeemed people. The compassionate love that has atoned for their sins speaks to the heart ("comfortably") of Jesus, saying "that her iniquity is pardoned" (Isa 40 2). The same promise of forgiveness is given to the penitent nation by the prophet Hosea (Hos 2 14); "comfortable words" (Zec 1 13), i.e. words addressing comfort. Dwight M. Pratt COMFORTER, kum'fär-ter: This is a tr of the word παρακλητός, parakletos, in the Johannine writings. In the Gospel it occurs in 14 16 25; 15 24; 16 15 26; 20 7 27; 21 15 26; to the word mean lit. called to one's side for help. The tr "Comforter" covers only a small part of the meaning shown as in the context. The word "Helper" would be a more adequate tr. The Spirit does a great deal for the discipline and comforting them, although to comfort was a part of His work for them. The Spirit guides into truth; indeed, He is called the Spirit of truth. He teaches and quickens the memory of disciples and glorifies Christ in them. He also has a work to do in the hearts of unbelievers, convicting the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment (Jn 14 16). The Comforter remains permanently with disciples after He comes in response to the prayers of Christ. The word paraklētos does not occur elsewhere in the Scriptures except in 1 Jn 2 1. In 1 Jn 16 2 the active form of the word (paraklētos is passive) is found in the pl. where Job calls his friends "miserable comforters." The word "Comforter" being an inadequate, and the word "Helper" a too indefinite tr. of the word in the Gospel of John, it would probably be best to transfer the Gr word into Eng. in so far as it relates to the Holy Spirit (see Paraclete).

In 1 Jn 1 2 1 the word paraklētos refers to Christ: "He is the only begotten of the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." Here the tr Advocate is quite correct. As the next ver shows the writer has in mind the intercession of Christ for Christians on the basis of His mediatorial work: "And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world" (1 Jn 2 2). See Advocate; Holy Spirit; Paraclete.

E. Y. Mullins

COMFORTLESS, kum'fär-less (σπασανός, orpha- nosis, "orphans"): The Gr original (so also but twice in the NT; rendered "comfortless" in 14 18, RV "desolate"); "fatherless" in Jas 1 27 (cf Ps 68 5). The term signifies bereft of a father, parents, guardian, teacher, guide, and indicates what must be the permanent ministry of the Holy Spirit to the disciples of Jesus, in comforting their hearts. In harmony with these parting words Jesus had called the chosen twelve "little children" (Jn 13 33); without Him they would be "orphans," comfortless, desolate. The coming of the Holy Spirit marked Christ's transfer to the Holy Spirit, and to them, an abiding spiritual presence. Dwight M. Pratt

COMMANDMENT, kō-man'dment, COMMAN- DMENTS (τα γράμματα, miqraṯá; ἱερὰς ἔντολα, entolē): The commandments are, first of all, prescriptions, or directions of God, concerning particular matters, which He wanted obediently observed with reference to what He taught as they arose, in a period when He spoke immediately and with greater frequency than afterward. They were numerous, minute, and regarded as coordinate and independent of each other. In the Ten Commandments, or, more properly, Ten Words, EV (בְּצְכָרָה, dīḇārīm), they are reduced to a few all-encompassing precepts of permanent validity, upon which every duty required of man is based. Certain prescriptions of temporary force, as those of the ceremonial and forensic laws, are applications of these "Writings" of God, and were under the time for which they were enacted, demanded perfect and unconditional obedience. The Ps, and esp. Ps 119, show that even under the OT, there was a deep spiritual appreciation of these commandments and the extent of obedience was deemed a privilege rather than a mere matter of constrained external compliance with duty. In the NT, Jesus shows in Mt 22 37 40; Mk 12 29.30; Lk 10 28; of Rome, their organic unity. The "Ten" are reduced to two, and these two to one principle, that of love. In love, obe- dience begins, and works from within outward. Under the NT the commandments are kept when they are written upon the heart (He 10 16): While in the Synagogue, they are referred to in a more abstract and distant way, in both the Gospel and the Epp. of Jn their relation to Jesus is most prominent. They are "my commandments" (Jn 14 15 21; 15 10); "my Father's" (Jn 14 15 21; 15 10); or, many times throughout the epp. "his [i.e. Christ's] commandments." The new life in Christ enkindles love, and not only makes the commandments the rule of life, but the very life itself the free expression of the commandments and of the nature of God, in which the commandments are grounded. Occasionally the word is used in the singular collectively (Ex 24 12; Ps 119 96; 1 Cor 37 37). See Ten Commandments, The. H. E. Jacobs COMMANDMENT, THE NEW, nū ἱερὰς ἔντολα (ἐντολὴ kainē): The word "commandment" is used in the Eng. VSS of the OT to translate several Heb words, more esp. those meaning "word" (dīḇār) as the writings of God, His "command" (1 Esd 2); "precept" (miqraṯ) of God (Dt 4 2), of a king (2 K 18 30); "mouth" or "speech" (peh) of God (Ex 17 1), of Pharaoh (2 K 23 35). They express the theocratic idea of morality whereby the will or law of God is imposed upon men as their law of conduct (2 K 17 37).

This idea is not repudiated in the NT, but sup- plemented or modified from within by making love the essence of the command. Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, and the Old came not "to destroy the law or the Command- ment... but to fulfill" (Mt 5 17). He taught that "whosoever therefore shall break one of the least com- mandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5 19). He condemned the Pharisees for rejecting the commandments of God as given by Moses (Mk 7 8 13). There is a sense in which it is true that Christ propounded no new commandments, but that the new life in His teaching was the emphasis laid on the old commandment of love, and the extent and intent of its application. The great commandment is: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, [and] thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Mt 22 34 40; Mk 12 28 34; cf Dt 6 5; Lev 19 18).
When the law realizes itself as love for God and man in men's hearts, it ceases to bear the aspect of a command. The force of authority and the terror of sanctions or penalties of the law of God; and, in becoming internal, it becomes universal and transcends all distinctions of race or class. Even this was not an altogether new idea (cf Jer 31 31–34; Ps 51); nor did Christ's contemporaries and disciples think it was. The revolutionary factor was the death of Christ and the new dispensation which followed (1 Cor 15). This sense of the Law, which is slightly archaic, corresponds to the first meaning of the Lat. whence it comes, "to commit for preservation," cap. of the dying; to commend children, parents, etc., to the care of others (for examples, see Harper's Latin Dictionary).

(2) For emphasis, because, "to stand together," and then, by standing together, to establish, prove, exhibit, as "righteousness" and "love of God" (Rom 3 5; 5 8), and thus to attest (2 Cor 3 1; 4 2), and, finally, to certify or to recommend a stranger (Rom 16 1); 2 Cor 3 6. The use of paratēmēs in 1 Cor 8 8 is equivalent.

(3) "To praise," trauvē, epainō (Lk 16 8), and sunstatēmi in 2 Cor 10 12.18; for the OT, Heb hīlēlē, in Gen 12 15 AV; Prov 12 8.

LITERATURE

S. The Word—General Scope.—Etymologically, a commentary (from Lat commentus) denotes jottings, annotations, memoranda, on a given subject, or perhaps on a series of events; hence its use in the New Testament as a designation of a narrative or history, as the Commentaries of Caesar. In its application to Scripture, the word designates a work devoted to the explanation, elucidation, illustration, sometimes the homiletic expansion and edifying utilization, of the text of some book or portion of Scripture. The primary function of a good commentary is to furnish an exact interpretation of the meaning of the passage under consideration; it belongs to it also to show the connection of ideas, the steps of argument, the scope and design of the whole, in the writing in question. This can only be successfully accomplished by the help of a knowledge of the original language of the writing, and of the historical setting of the particular passage; by careful study of the context, and of the author's general usages of thought and speech; and by comparison of parallel or related texts. Aid may also be obtained from external sources, as a knowledge of the history, archaeology, topography, chronology, manners and customs of the lands, peoples and times referred to; or, as in the commentaries, the results of the light thrown on peculiarities of language by papyri or other ancient remains (see his Light from the Ancient East).
II. Differences in Character.—It is obvious that commentaries will vary greatly in character and value according as they are more scholarly, technical, and critical, entering, e.g. into philological discussions, and suitable and remarkable upon the various views held and defended, and more popular, aiming only at bringing out the general sense, and conveying it to the reader in an attractive and edifying form. When the practical motive predominates, and the treatment is greatly enlarged by illustration, application, and the enforcement of lessons, the work loses the character of commentary proper, and partakes more of the character of homily or discourse.

III. Range of Commentaries.—No book in the world has been the subject of so much commenting and exposition as the Bible. Theological libraries are full of commentaries of all descriptions and all grades of worth. Some are commentaries on the original Heb or Gr texts; some on the Eng. or other VSS. Modern commentaries are usually accompanied with some measure of introduction to the books commented upon; the more learned works have commonly also some indication of the data for the determination of the textual readings (see Critical Texts). The task of commenting and expositing the Bible as a whole, and, with the growth of knowledge, this task is now seldom attempted. Frequently, however, one writer contributes many valuable works, and sometimes, a cooperation of like-minded scholars, commentaries on the whole Bible are produced. It is manifestly a very slight survey that can be taken in a brief art. of the work of commenting, and of the literature to which it has given rise; the attempt can only be made to outline the lines most helpful to those seeking aid from this class of books. On the use and abuse of commentaries by the preacher, C. H. Spurgeon's racy remarks in his Commenting and Commentaries may be consulted.

Rabbinical interpretations and paraphrases of the OT may here be left out of account (see next art.; also Targums; Talmud; F. W. Farrar's History of Interpretation, 1). Logia, or Pharisaic Discourses. Luke could not begin till the NT books themselves were written, and had acquired some degree of authority as sacred writings (see Bible). The earliest commentaries we hear of are from the Alexandrian circles; Tatian, a Valentinian (cir 175 AD), wrote a commentary on the Gospel of John (fragments in Origen), and on parts at least of the Gospel of Luke. Tatian, a disciple of Justin Martyr, about the same time, compiled his Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Four Gospels, on which, at a later time, commentaries were written. Ephraim Syrus (4th cent.) wrote such a commentary, of which an Armenian text has now been recovered. The Church Father Hippolytus (beginning of 3rd cent.) wrote several commentaries on the OT (Ex, Ps, Prov, Ecc, Dnl, Zec, etc.), and on Mt, Lk and Rev.

1. Early Commentaries—(1) Origen, etc.—The strongest impulse, however, to the work of commenting and exposition of Holy Scripture undoubtedly proceeded from the school of Alexandria—esp. from Origen (225-34 AD). Clement, Origen's predecessor, had written a treatise called Hupotuposiotes, or "Outlines," a survey of the contents of Holy Scripture. Origen himself wrote commentaries on all the books of the OT, Ruth, Est and Eccd, and also on most of the books of the NT (Mt, 1 and 2 Cor, 1 and 2 Pet, 1, 2, and 3 Jn, Jas, Jude, Rev excepted). He furnished besides, scholia, or notes on difficult passages, and delivered Homilies, or discourses, the records of which fill three folio volumes. "By his Tetrapla and Hexapla," says Farrar, "he became the founder of all textual criticism; by his Homilies he fixed the type of a popular exposition; his scholia were the earliest specimens of marginal explanations; his commentaries furnished the church with her first continuous exegesis, most of which, fortunately the Alexandrian school adopted a principle of allegorical interpretation which led it frequently into the most extravagant fancies. Assuming a threefold sense in Scripture—a literal, a moral, and spiritual—it gave rise to caprice in foisting imaginary meanings into historical statements (Farrar, op. cit., 189 ff). Some of Origen's commentaries, however, are much freer from allegory than others, and all possess high value (cf Lightfoot, Galatian, 217). The later teachers of the Alexandrian school continued the exegetical works of Origen. Pamphilius of Caesarea, the friend of Eusebius, is said to have written OT commentaries.

2. Scholas-...
series of discourses by Zwingli on the Gospel of Mt. The same was true of Calvin, Beza, Knox and all associated with them. The production of commentaries or expository homilies was the necessary result.

(2) Luther and Calvin.—As outstanding examples may be mentioned Luther's Commentary on Gal, and the noble commentaries of Calvin. Not all by any means, but very many of the commentaries of Calvin were the fruit of pulpit prelections (e.g. the expositions of Job, the Minor Prophets, Jer, Dan). Others, as the commentaries on Rom and the Ps (reputed his best), were prepared with great care. Calvin's supreme excellence as a commentator is disputed by no one. From every school and shade of opinion on Christendom could be produced a chorus of testimony to the remarkable gifts of mind and heart displayed in his expositions of Scripture—to his breadth, moderation, fairness and modernness of spirit, in exhibiting the sense of inward genius of Holy Writ. The testimony of Arminius is as striking as any: "I exhort my pupils to peruse Calvin's commentaries...for I affirm that he excels beyond comparison in the interpretation of Scripture, and that his commentaries ought to be more highly valued than all that is handed down to us by the library of the Fathers."

(2) Beza, Grotius, etc.—Lutheranism had its distinguished exegetes (Brenz, d. 1572), who wrote able commentaries on the OT, and in both the Catholic and Arminian churches of the Reformed church the production of commentaries held a chief place. Beza, Calvin's successor, is acknowledged to have possessed many of the best exegetical qualities which characterized his master. Grotius, in Holland (d. 1645), occupied the foremost place among the expositors in this cent. on the Arminian side. His exegetical works, if not marked by much spirituality, show sagacity and learning, and are enriched by parallels from classical literature. The school of Cocceius (d. 1689) developed the doctrine of the covenants, and revelled in typology. Cocceius wrote commentaries on nearly all the books of Scripture. His pupil Vitringa (d. 1716) gained renown by his expositions of Isa and the Apocalypse.

(6) Durham (d. 1659) on Isa 63 consists of 72 sermons; Venema (Holland, d. 1787) on Jer fills 2 quarto, and on the Ps no less than 6 quarto. These are only samples of a large class. H. Hammond's A Paraphrase and Annotations on the NT, from an Arminian Standpoint belong to this period (1675). Another work which long took high rank is M. Poole's elaborate Synopsis Criticorum Bibliorum (5 vols, folio, 1699-76)—a summary of the opinions of 150 Bib. critics; with which must be taken into account the Author's Literary Bible, only completed up to Isa 68 at the time of his death (1679). The work was continued by his friends.

(1) Calmet, M. Henry, etc.—The 18th cent. is marked by greater sobriety in exegesis. It is prolific in commentaries, but only a few attain to high distinction. Calmet (d. 1757), a learned Benedictine, on the Roman Catholic side, produced his Commentaire littéral sur tous les livres de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament, in 23 quarto vols 4th Century (1708–10) easily holds the first place among devotional commentaries for its blending of good sense, quaintness, original and felicitous remark, and genuine insight into the meaning of the sacred writers. It is, of course, not a critical work in the modern acceptation, and often is unduly diffuse. Matthew Henry's work extends only to the end of Acts; the remaining books were done by various writers after his death (1714). Le Clerc (d. 1736) may be named as precursor of the critical views now obtaining on the composition and authorship of the Pent. His commentaries began with Gen in 1693 and were not completed till 1731. Other commentators of note on Arminian views were Daniel Whitby (d. 1729); converted to Arminianism, and, later, Adam Clarke, Wesleyan (1762–1832), whose work extends into the next cent. Clarke's Commentary on the Holy Scriptures (1810–26), still held by many in high esteem, is marred to some extent by eccentricities of opinion.

(2) Patrick, Lowth, Scott.—In the Anglican church the names of chief distinction in this cent. are Bishop Patrick, Bishop Lowth, and later, Thomas Scott. Both were classed with the Cambridge Platonists (d. 1707), contributed paraphrases and commentaries on the OT from Gen to Cant, while Bishop Lowth (d. 1787) acquired lasting fame by his Prelections on Heb Poetry, and A New Translation, with Notes on Isaiah. He was among the first to treat the poetical and prophetic writings really as literature. The commentaries of Patrick and Lowth were subsequently combined with those of Whitby and other divines (Arnold, etc) to form a complete Critical Commentary (1809), which went through many editions. The well-known commentary of Thomas Scott (1747–1821), representing a moderate Calvinism, is a solid and "judicious" piece of work, inspired by an earnest, believing spirit. The habit of basing commentary on pulpit exposition, the tendency early set in to undue prolixity in the unfolding of the meaning of Scripture. "In the Lutheran church," says Van Oosterzee, "they began to follow the same books of prelections; sometimes in a very proflix manner, as, e.g. in the case of the 220 sermons by one Striegnitz, a preacher at Meissen, on the history of Jonah, of which four are devoted to the consideration of the words 'Unto Jonah'" (Practical Theol., 120). The habit spread. The commentaries of Peter Martyr (Swiss Reformer, d. 1562) on Jgs and Rom occupy a folio each; N. Byfield (Puritan, d. 1622) on Col fills a folio; Caryl (Independent, d. 1673) on Job extends to 2 folios. John Ryland (d. 1653) on Isa 63 consists of 72 sermons; Venema (Holland, d. 1787) on Jer fills 2 quarto, and on the Ps no less than 6 quarto. These are only samples of a large class. H. Hammond's A Paraphrase and Annotations on the NT, from an Arminian Standpoint belong to this period (1675). Another work which long took high rank is M. Poole's elaborate Synopsis Criticorum Bibliorum (5 vols, folio, 1699–76)—a summary of the opinions of 150 Bib. critics; with which must be taken into account the Author's Literary Bible, only completed up to Isa 68 at the time of his death (1679). The work was continued by his friends.

(1) Calmet, M. Henry, etc.—The 18th cent. is marked by greater sobriety in exegesis. It is prolific in commentaries, but only a few attain to high distinction. Calmet (d. 1757), a learned Benedictine, of the higher criticism had begun in the OT; in Germany, the spirit of humanism, inherited from Lessing, Herder and Goethe, had found its way into literature; knowledge of the sciences, of oriental civilizations, of other peoples and religions, was constantly on the increase; scholarship was more precise and thorough; a higher ideal of what commentary meant had taken possession of the mind. Learning, too, had enlarged its borders, and books on all subjects poured from the press in such numbers that it was difficult to follow. This applies to commentaries as to other departments of theological study. Commentaries in the 19th cent., and in our own, are legion. Only the most prominent landmarks can be noted:

(1) Germany (a) The liberal school.—In Germany, as was to be anticipated, the rise of the critical spirit and the profound influence exercised by it are reflected in most of the commentaries produced in the first half of the cent. On the liberal side, the rationalistic school is shown in the rejection of miracle, the denial of prediction in prophecy, and the lowering of the idea of inspiration generally. The scholarship, however, is frequently of a very high order. This temper is seen in De Wette (d. 1814), whose Commentary, written when his views had become more positive, show grace and feeling; in Gesenius (d. 1822), who produced an epoch-making commentary on Issa; in Knobel (d. 1863), pronouncedly rationalistic, but with keen critical sense, as evinced in his commentaries on the Pent and Josiah, Eel, and Issa; in Hupfeld (d. 1866) in his Commentary on the Psl (4 vols); in Hitzig (d. 1875), acute but arbitrary, who wrote on the Psl and most of the Prophets; above all, in Ewald (d. 1875), a master in the interpretation of the poetical and prophetic books, but who commented also on the first three Gospels, on the writings of John, and on Paul’s epistles. Ewald’s influence is felt in the History of the Jewish Church by Dean Stanley, in England. The Exegetical Handbook (Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch) embraced copious annotations by Knobel, Hitzig, Bertheau (school of Ewald), etc, but also Olshausen (d. 1839; wrote likewise on the NT), on all the OT:

(b) Believing tendency.—On the believing side, from a variety of standpoints, evangelical, critical, mediating, confessional, a multitude of commentaries on the OT and NT were produced. The extremely controversial position of the time is shown by Hengstenberg (d. 1869; on Psl, Eel, Est, Jn, Rev), by Keil (d. 1888) in the well-known Keil and Delitzsch series (Gen to Est, Jer, Eel, Dnl, Minor Prophets; also NT commentaries), and by Haevernick (d. 1845; Dnl, Eel). Delitsch (d. 1890) wrote valuable commentaries on Gen, Job, Psl, Prov, Cant, Eel, Issa; also on He. After the rise of the Wellhausen school, he considerably modified his views in the newer critical direction. His New Comm. on Gen (1897) shows this change, but, with his other works, is still written in a strongly believing spirit.

On the other hand, the critical position (older, not newer) is frankly represented by A. Dietmann (d. 1894) in his commentaries on the books of the Pent and Josh (ET of Genesis, 1897; many also of the above works are tr). The mediating school, largely penetrated by the influence of Schleiermacher, had many distinguished representatives. Among the most conspicuous may be named Lücke (d. 1855), who wrote on John; Bleek, the OT and NT critical, whose brother (d. 1829), who has a work on the first three Gospels, and lectures on Eph, Col, Philem, He and Rev (his Comm. on He is the best known), and Tholuck (d. 1877, whose expositions and commentaries on Ps, Jn, Rom and He with his Comm. on the Sermon on the Mount, are fine pieces of exegetical work.

A special place must be given to two names of high distinction in the present connection. One is J. F. Lange (d. 1884), the projector and editor of the great Biblical and theological and classical history. In 12 vols, to which he himself contributed the commentaries on Gen to Nu, Hag, Zec, Mal, Mt, Mk, Jn, Rom, Rev, with introductions and homiletic hints. The other is H. A. W. Meyer (d. 1873), whose Critical and Exegetical Comm. on Mt (with the preceding books being done by other scholars, Lünemann, Huther, etc) is an essential part of every NT scholar’s equipment.

With the more positive and confessional theologians may be ranked E. R. Stier (d. 1862), whose Words of the Lord Jesus (ET in 8 vols; Bib., mystical, tendency to prolixity), with commentaries on 70 selected Ps, Prov, 2d Issa, Eph, He, Jas and Jude, found much acceptance. A. von Harless (d. 1879) wrote a Comm. on Eph, praised by Tholuck, who wrote his own commentary (d. 1882), of Jewish extraction, best known by his Comm. on Rom, was strictly Lutheran. One of the ablest of the Lutheran Confessionalists was Luthardt (d. 1892), whose works include a Comm. on St. John’s Gospels (1861), a Comm. on Rom (d. 1887), where his work on the Reformed side, has an esteemed Comm. on He. An eminent continental theologian who cannot be overlooked is the Swiss F. L. Gudet (d. 1900), whose admirable Comm. on St. John’s Gospel, and commentaries on Rom and Cor are highly appreciated.

(2) Britain and America.—Meanwhile the English-speaking countries were pursuing their own paths in the production of commentaries, either in continuing their old traditions, or in striking out on new lines, under the foreign influences which, from the beginning of the cent., had begun to play upon them. In England Bishop Blomfield (d. 1857) published Lectures on Jn and Acts. In the United States there appeared from the pen of Dr. J. A. Alexander, of Princeton (d. 1860), a noteworthy Comm. on Isa, fully abreast of the modern learning, but staunchly conservative; also a Comm. on Psl. From the same seminary proceeded the massive commentaries of Dr. Charles Dodd (Calvinistic, and later Presbyterian). Adapted for popular use and greatly in demand for Sunday-school purposes were the Notes, Critical, Explanatory and Practical of Albert Barnes (d. 1871; New School Presbyterian). These Notes, in the fruit of a life of unintermittent labor, gave a busy pastoral life, covered the whole of the NT, with several books of the OT (Job, Psl, Issa, Dnl). Sensible and informative, rather than original or profound, they proved helpful to many. Over 1,000,000 copies are stated to have been sold. Of similar aim, though less widely known, were the Notes of Professor M. W. Jacobus (d. 1876; on the NT, Gen and Ex).

A new era was opened in critical commentary in England by the publication of the Or Testament (1839-61) of Dean Alford (d. 1871), followed by his NT for Eng. Readers (1868). Here was presented a thoroughly critical treatment of the texts, with a full display of the critical apparatus, and notes philological and exegetical, accomplished by learned and lucid introductions, on all the books of the NT.

About the same time appeared the solid, if more theological and homiletical, commentaries of the Scottish scholar, J. Eadie (d. 1876), on Gal, Eph, Phil, 1 and 2 Thess. Anglican scholarship produced its results in the work of H. J. Holt and W. Phillips in their Critical and Grammatical Comm. of Bishop Elliott (d. 1905) on Gal, Eph, Phil, Col, Philem, Thess. Pastoral Epistles, and the yet more remarkable series of commentaries of Bishop J. B. Lightfoot (d. 1886), massive in learning, and wider in outlook than Eichhorn's. Gal, Phil, and Col, large part of the value of Lightfoot's works consists in the special essays or dissertations on important subjects embodied in them (e.g. "St. Paul and the Three ...", "The Christian Ministry ...", "The Colossian Hercules ..."). With these names should be associated that of Bishop Westcott, Dr. Lightfoot's successor in the see of Durham (d. 1901), whose commentaries on the Gospel and Epistles of St. John, and on He, take a place among the foremost. Bishop Perowne's value in this line Dr. W. A. Perowne has also written commentaries, simpler in character, on Rom, Eph, Phil and Col, in the Cambridge Bible Series, and on Rom in the Expositor's Bible. In OT exposition should be made of Bishop Perowne's valuable work on the Book of Psalms (2d ed, revised, 1870), with his contributions to the Cambridge Bible (see below).

The critical and theological liberalism of Germany has made its influence felt in England in the rise of a Broad Church party, the best products of which in commentary were Dean Stanley's (d. 1881) graphic and interesting Comm. on 1 and 2 Cor (1855) and Dr. B. Jowett's Epistles of St. Paul to the Thees, Gal, and Rom, with Critical Notes and Dissertations (1856-72), and a new popular edition has appeared in the Trend of the famous Essays and Reviews (1860), and in the works of Bishop Colenso on the Pent and Jos (1862-79). Bishop Colenso had already published a tr of Rom, with commentary (1861).

Besides works by individuals, books were appeared during this period several general commentaries, to the production of which many writers contributed. The following may be mentioned. The Speaker's Comm. (10 vols, 1871-82), under the general editorship of Dr. C. F. C. Cook (d. 1880), was called forth by the agitation over Bishop Colenso. Dr. Cook himself wrote introductions to Ex, Ps and Acts, and contributed the entire commentaries on Job, Hab, Mk, Luke, 1 Pet, with parts of commentaries on Ex, Ps and Mt. The work is of unequal value. A serviceable series is the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges (1877 ff), edited by Bishop Perowne, with Smaller Cambridge Bible for Schools, and Cambridge Gr Test. for Colleges (1894 ff). Dr. Perowne (d. 1904) himself contributed to the first-named the commentaries on Ob, Jon, Hag, Zec, Mal and Gal. Many valuable contributions appear in this series, e.g. A. F. Kirkpatrick on 1 and 2 Sam, and Ps. and Ps. on Ob; J. Whitehead on Ob, Dn; G. J. Findlay on Thes. etc. Next, under the editorship of Bishop Ellicott, were produced (1877-84) A NT Comm. for Eng. Readers (3 vols), and An OT Comm. for Eng. Readers (5 vols), which contained some valuable work (Gen by R. Payne Smith, Ex by Canon G. Rawlinson, etc). Akin to this in character was the Popular Comm. on the NT (4 vols, 1879-83), edited by Dr. W. Schaff. This embraced, with other excellent matter, commentaries on Thes by Dr. Marcus Dods, on 1 and 2 Pet by Dr. S. D. F. Salmond. The Pulpit Comm. (49 vols, 1880 ff), edited by J. S. Exell and Canon H. D. M. Spence, has expositions by good scholars, and an abundance of homiletical material by a great variety of authors. The series of Handbooks for Bible Classes (T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh) has a number of valuable commentaries, e.g. that of Dr. A. B. Davidson on He.

In the most recent period the contemporary spirit which characterizes in general the production of commentaries in series or by individual writers embodying the results of an advanced OT criticism—in less degree of a radical NT criticism. (1) Germany.—In Germany, in addition to the Kursgefaeite exegetisches Handbuch, older standing (see above), which still contributed, may be mentioned Marti's Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum AT (1897 ff) and Nowack's Handkommentar zum AT; also Strack and Zöckler's Kursgefaeite Kommentar (OT and NT; critical, but moderate). Marti contributes to his Hand-Commentar the vol. on Isa, Dn and the Minor Prophets; Nowack contributes to his Handkommentar the vols on Jgs and Ruth, 1 and 2 S and the Minor Prophets (of special importance in Nowack's series are the vols on Gen and Ex (written by H. Gunkel), and on Ps (by C. Stender-nagel); Strack writes in his own work the vols on Gen to Nu (Oettl contributes Dt, Josh and Jgs). Much more conservative in spirit are the commentaries of H. C. von Orelli (Basel) on Isa, Jer, Ezek and the Minor Prophets. In the NT, Meyer's Commentary has been "revised" by later writers, many of them (J. Weiss, W. Bouset, etc) of much more advanced tendency than the original author.

(2) Britain and America.—In Britain and America like currents are observable. Professor J. H. Cheyne, who wrote a helpful commentary on the Prophecies of Isa (1880-81), and subsequently commentaries on Mic and Hos (Cambridge Bible), Jer (Pulpit Comm.), and on The Book of Psalms (1884), has more recently contributed (1904) to the appearance of the famous Essays and Reviews (1860), and in the works of Bishop Colenso on the Pent and Jos (1862-79). Bishop Colenso had already published a tr of Rom, with commentary (1861).

For the writers of the commentaries on the special books in the above-noted German and Eng. series, lists may generally be seen attached to each vol. of the series.

LITERATURE

The following outline alludes to the leading Jewish commentators and their works in chronological order. However, with the principles which guided the various Jewish schools of exegesis, or the individual commentators, differ from those of the modern school, the latter will find a certain suggestiveness in the former’s interpretation which well merits attention. See PHILO JUDEUS.

Josephus cannot be called a Bible commentator in the proper sense of the term. See JOSEPHUS.

Targum (pl. Targumim): The Aram. tr. of the OT. Lit. the word designates tr in general; its use, however, was not always that of a literal translation. The Tg includes all the books of the OT excepting Dañ and Ezr-Neb, which are written in part in Aram. Its inception dates back to the time of the Second Temple, and it is considered a first approach to a common vernacular, the language of the Jews. The Tg is not a mere tr, but rather a combination of a tr with a commentary, resulting in a paraphrase, or an interpretative tr having its origin in exegesis. The language of this paraphrase is the vernacular tongue of Syria, which began to replace Aram. throughout Pal as the language of common intercourse and trade, as soon as a familiar knowledge of the Heb tongue came to be lost. The Targumim are:

TO THE PENTATEUCH

(1) Targum Onkelos or Babylonian Tg (the accepted and official);
(2) Targum yârâkhalî (Palestinian Tg ("Pseudo-Jonathan"); it has been restricted to the Aram. version of the OT, as contrasted with the Heb Talmâd); Tg may be called "bâkhrâk".

TO THE PROPHETS

(1) Targum Jonathan ben Uriel (being the official tr of the Jews); this is the complete Tg used by the Rabbinites;
(2) A Palestinian Targum, called Targum yârâkhalî (Palestinian Tg); in origin, ed. Lagarde, "Propheietse Chaldaes";
(3) Other Targumim (not officially recognized); (1) To the Psalms and Job; (2) To Proverbs; (3) To the Five Rolls; (4) To Chronicles—all Palestinian. See TARGUM.

Midrash: Apparently the practice of commenting upon and explaining the meaning of the Scriptures originated in the synagogues (in the first time of Ezra), from the necessity of an exposition of the Law to a congregation many of whom did not or might not understand the language in which it was read. Such commentaries, however, were oral and extemporaneous, they were not until much later crystallized, into a definite form. When they assumed a definite and, still later, written shape, the name Midrash (meaning "investigation," "interpretation," from dârash, "to investigate") a scriptural passage was given. The word occurs in 2 Ch 13 18, 22. For the Talmud, this is the first "commentary." From this fact some have drawn the inference that such Midrashim were recognized and extant before the time of the Chronicler. They are: Midrash Rabbi on the Pent and the Five Rolls, one on Genesis. A later interpretation among the various exegetical Midrashim, both on account of its age and importance. Next comes the one on Lam. (Zunz pointed out that the Midrash Rabbi consists of ten entirely different Midrashim.) On the same ten books there is a similar collection, called ha-Midrâsh ha-gâdôl (the "Great Midrash"), being a collection of quotations from a good many works including the Midrash Rabbi. Other Midrashim are: The Midrash Tanhûmah on the Pentateuch; the Mishna has been [Leipzig, 1809] tr into German by Winter and Wunensche; the latter also published, under the main title Bibliotheca Rabbínica, a collection of the old Midrashim in a German tr with introductions and notes. For the later, See, Spinoza, "History of the Jewish Religion"; and Dt; "Aggadah," which comments on sections taken from the entire range of Scriptures for various festivals. There are also extant separate Midrâshim on the Pes, Fov, etc.

In this connection we have yet to mention the Yalkut Shimônî, a haggadic compilation attributed to the 11th or, according to Zunz, the 13th cent. The Yalkut extends over the whole of the OT and is arranged according to the sequence of those portions of the Bible which refer to one subject. It is based on the Yalkut ha-Ma'kîrî, a work similar in contents to the Yalkut Shimônî, ed. Greenup. See COMMENTARIES; MIDRASH.

Talmud (Talmudî): This term is used here to designate the entire body of literature exclusive of the Midrash. Ample exegetical material abounds in the Talmud as it does in the Midrashim. The critical notes on the Bible by some Talmudists are very characteristic of their intellectual development. Some of them were extremely radical, and expressed freely their opinions on important problems of Biblical criticism, such as on the integrity of the text, the doubtful authorship of the books, the date of the 3d cent. AD held the opinion that the story of Job is purely fictitious, and as rev. of the Testament and as to his fate. The Talmudists also generalized, and set up critical canons. The "Yad ha-Rav," of the Thirty-two Midrashim, is the oldest of the later commentaries (Philo’s hermeneutical rules being rather fantastic), and contains exegetical notices valid to this very day. Hermeneutics, of course, is not exegetical proper, but the theory of exegesis; one results from the other. However, this Baha’s text calls attention, in fact, to the fact that words occur in the Talmud in an abbreviated form—a thing now generally accepted. See TALMUD.

Karaite: "Followers of the Bible." They are sometimes referred to as the "Protestants of the Jews," professing to follow the OT canon, excluding the rabbinical tradition. The founder of this Jewish sect was a Bab Jew in the 8th cent., Anan ben David, by name; hence they were first called Ananites. The principal Karaitic commentators of the 10th, 11th and 12th cents. are: Benjamin ben Haverdî the first to use the term "Karaite" (from the Arabic word "Ba’dle Mîdirî"); Solomon ben Jeroham, Sahl ibn Majlîsh, Yusuf al-Basîrî, Yâﬁth ibn Ali (considered the greatest of this period), and Abu al-Faraj Harum. Of a later date we will mention Aaron ben Joseph ben Eliezer, and Aaron ben Eliezer. The struggle between the Rabbinites and the Karaites undoubtedly gave the impetus to the great exegetical activity among the Jews in Arab-speaking countries during the 10th and 11th cents. The extant fragments of Saadia’s commentary on the Pent. (now less than his polemical writings proper) are full of polemics against the Karaite interpretation. And the same circumstance aroused Karaite to like efforts.

Middle Ages: In the old Mihdarastah as well as elsewhere the consciousness of a simple meaning of a text was never entirely lost. The principal tendencies in exegesis were four; these were afterward designated by the acrostic “PaReDeS”: i.e. P’shat (or the simple philological explanation of words); Remes (or the allegorical); Drash (or the ethical-homiletical); and Sodah (or the mystical). Naturally enough this division could never be strictly carried out; hence variations and combinations are to be found.

Saadia ben Joseph (892–942), the severest antagonist of the Karaites, the4th. the OT into Arab. with notes. The pacts published are: Pent, Isa, Prov, and Job.

Moses ha- Darashah (the Preacher) of Narbonne, Frank., and Tobiah ben Eliasar in Castoria, Bulgaria (11th cent.), are the most prominent representatives of Midrashic-symbolic Biblical exegesis. The former’s work is known only by quotations, and the latter’s, the so-called “Arkeistora”; the latter is the author of “Lekah Tobby” or “P’siakh ta Zutadrat” on the Pent. and the five M’qhitliah.

Rashi (Solomon ben Isaac, of Troyes; born 1040, died 1105) wrote a very popular commentary, which extends over the whole of the OT, with the exception of Oh, Eze-Neh, and the last part of Job. He strives for the P’shat, i.e., for a sober, natural, and rational interpretation of the Bible. His is still a commentary both for the boy and the man among the Jews. Christian exegeses of the Middle Ages as well as of more modern times made use of his Bible commentary. Nicolas de Lyra (see Commentaries) followed Rashi closely; and it is a known fact that Luther’s tr. of the Bible is dependent upon Nicolas de Lyra. Rashi’s commentary has called forth numerous supercommentaries.

An independent and important exegete was Joseph Kara’ (about 1100). He edited and partly completed Rashi’s commentary, particularly the part on the Pent.

Abraham ben Ezra’s (1092–1168) commentary on the Pent, like Rashi’s commentaries, has produced many supercommentaries. His is very scholarly. He was the first to maintain that Isa contains the work of two authors; and his doubts respecting the authenticity of the Pent were noticed by Spinoza.

The grammarians and the lexicographers were not merely exegetical expounders of words, but many of them were likewise authors of actual commentaries. Such were the Kimkls, Joseph (father), Moses and David (his sons): esp. the latter. The Kimkls were the most brilliant contributors to Biblical exegesis and Heb philology (like Ibn Ezra) in mediaeval times.

Maimonides (1135–1204): Philo employed his allegorical method for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation of Plato with the OT. Maimonides had something similar in view. To him Aristotle was the representative of natural knowledge and the Bible of supernatural—and he sought for a reconciliation between the two in his religious philosophy. Exegesis proper was the one field, however, to which this great genius made no contribution of first-class importance.

The Ma’morah (the book of philosophical turn) are: Joseph ibn Aknin, Samuel ibn Tibbon, his son Moses, and his son-in-law, Jacob ben Abba Mari Anatolio, whose Ma’morah ha-Talmidhim is the most important work of philosophical exegesis of the period.

Joseph Ibn Kaspi, chiefly known as a philosopher of the Machiavellian type, deserves attention. Ibn Kaspi is an exegete of the first quality. His exposition of Isa 63 might be the work of the most modern scholar. He refers the prophecy to Israel, not to an individual, and in this he is superior to that of some other Jewish expositors who interpret the chapter as referring to Hezekiah.

Through the philosophical humilily, which began to be used after the death of Maimonides, Aristotle was popularized on the pulpit. The pulpit changed to a chair of philosophy. Aristotle’s concepts—as Matter and Form, the Four Causes, Possibility and Reality—were then something ordinary in the sermon, and were very popular.

The principal commentators with a Kabalistic tendency are: Nahmanides (1194–1270?), whose great work is his commentary on the Pentateuch; Immanuel of Rome (1270–1350?) who does, however, not disregard the lit. meaning of the Scriptures; and R. A. Mahiya ben Asher (d. 1340) who formulated the four methods of exegesis of “PaReDeS” referred to above; he took Nahmanides as his model; many supercommentaries were written on his commentary on the Pent; Gersonides, the grandson of Nahmanides, who sees symbols in many Bib. passages; on account of some of his heretical ideas expressed in his philosophy, some rabbis forbade the study of his commentaries.

We must not fail to make mention of the Zohar (the “Bible of the Kabballists”), the book of all others in the Middle Ages that dominated the thinking and feeling of the Jews for almost 500 years, and which was in favor with many Christian scholars. This work is pseudographic, written partly in Aram. and partly in Hebr. It first appeared in Spain in the 13th cent., and was made known through Moses de Leon, to whom many historians attribute it.

Mention must also be made of Isaac Abarbenel (1430–94), whose A’kideh, his commentary on the Pent (homiletical in style), was the standard book for the Jewish pulpit for cents., much esteemed by the Christian world, and is still much read by the Jews, enjus in Russia and Poland.

Modern Times: Isaac Abravanel (or Abarbanel; 1437–1508): A statesman and scholar who came nearest to the modern idea of a Bible commentator by considering not only the literary elements of the Bible but political and social life of the people as well. He wrote a general introduction to each book of the Bible, setting forth its character; and he was the first to make use of Christian commentaries which he quotes without the least prejudice. Moses Alshech (second half of 16th cent.) wrote commentaries, all of which are of a homiletical character. In the main the Jewish exegesis of the 16th and 17th cents. branched out into homiletics.

We will pass over the critical annotations connected with the various editions of the Heb Bible, based upon the comparison of MSS, on grammatical and Massoretic studies, etc., such as those of Elijah Levita, Jacob ben Hayyim of Tunis (afterward a convert to Christianity), etc.

The “Biurists” (“Commentators”): A school of exegetes which had its origin with Mendelssohn’s (1729–86) lit. German tr. of the Bib. at a time when Christian Bib. studies were teaching the people as well. He wrote a general introduction to each book of the Bible, setting forth its character; and he was the first to make use of Christian commentaries which he quotes without the least prejudice. He wrote a general introduction to each book of the Bible, setting forth its character; and he was the first to make use of Christian commentaries which he quotes without the least prejudice.
Bible among modern Jews. It bore its fruit in the 19th cent. in the writings of Philippson, Munk, Fuerst, etc. The same cent. produced Zunz's (1794—1886) Gottesdienstlichen Vortrage der Juden, the book of essays. It also preserved three Jewish exegetes, Luzatto in Italy, Malbim and Ehrlich in Russia (the latter since 1875 residing in New York); he published, in Heb, a commentary on the OT, entitled Midrash hi-P'shah (Berlin, 1899—1901, 3 vols), and, in German, Randglossen zur heb. Bibel, two scholarly works written from the conservative standpoint (Leipzig, 1908). Malbim was highly esteemed by the Christian commentators Franz Delitzsch and Muehler, who studied under him. Others are Joseph Hallev, a French Jew, a most original Bible investigator, and D. Hoffman (the last two named are adversaries of "higher criticism") and D. H. Mueller. M. Heilprin wrote a collection of Bibelkritische Notizen (Baltimore, 1883), containing comparisons of various passages of the Bible, and The Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews (N.Y., 1879—80, 2 vols), and the American rabbis B. Saold, a Commentary on Job (Baltimore, 1886), written in classic Heb, and with accurate scholarship and in which full account is taken of the work of the exegetes, a commentary on the whole of the OT has been since 1908 in progress under the editorship of A. Kahana. This is the first attempt since Mendelssohn's B'sur to approach the Bible from the Jewish side with the latest philosophical and historical equipment. Among the most comprehensive of all Bible Commentaries is a large work called the "Kahana Commentary on Genesis and Jonah, Krauss on Isaiah, Chajes on Psalms and Amos, Wynkoop on Hosea and Joel, and Lambert on Daniel." This attempt well deserves attention and commendation.

There is still to be mentioned the work of M. M. Kalisch (1828—53), whose special object was to write a full and critical comm. on the OT. Of his Historical and Critical Commentaries on the OT, with a New Tr., only the following parts were published: Exodus, 1855; Genesis, 1858; Leviticus (pars 1-2), 1867—72. They contain a résumé of all that Jewish and Christian learning had accumulated on the subject up to the dates of their publication. In his Lev he anticipated Wellhausen to a large extent.

We conclude with some names of the liberal: Geiger (whose Ueberschrift is extremely radical), Graetz, the great Jewish historian, and Kohler (president of the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati), who edited the Segen Jacobs, is the author of the earliest essays of "higher criticism" written by a Jew.

COMMENTARY, kom'ë-tré (ἡπξοπία, ἐμπορία): 1. OT Times.—There were forces in early Heb life not favorable to the development of commerce.

1. Early Intercourse with foreigners was not encouraged by Israelite tradition and Overland trade was less common. From the days of Commerce the appearance of the Hebrews in Canaan, however, some commercial contact with the peoples around was inevitable. There were ancient trade routes between the East and the West, as well as between Egypt and the Mesopotamian valley. Pal lay as a bridge between these objective points. There were doubtless traveling merchants from very remote times, interchanging commodities of other lands for those of Pal. Some of the Heb words for "trading" and "merchant" indicate this (cf K'fah, g'har, "to travel," "trader," r'khal, "to go about"). In the nomadic period, the people were necessarily dependent upon overland commerce for at least a part of their food supply, such as grain, and doubtless for articles of clothing, too. Frequent, local famines would stimulate such trade. Companies or caravans carrying on this overland commerce are seen in Gen 37 25 28, "Ismaelites" and "Midianites, merchants," on their way to Egypt, with spices, palm and myrrh. Jacob brought to Egypt certain products to Egypt as a present with money to Joseph in return for grain: balsam, spices, honey, myrrh, nuts, almonds (Gen 43 111). The presence of a "Bab mantle" among the spoils of Ai (Josh 7 21) indicates commerce between Canaan and the East.

While there are slight indications of a possible sea trade as early as the days of the Judges (Jgs 5 17; cf Gen 49 18), we must wait 2. Sea till the days of the monarchy of Saul and esp. Solomon for the commerce of ships. Land traffic was of course continued and expanded (1 K 10 15 28 29; 2 Ch 1 16). Sea trade at this time made strides forward. The Phills were earlier in possession of the coast. Friendship with Hiram king of Tyre gave Solomon additional advantages seaward (1 K 5 9 26; 10 19 29; 2 Ch 8 17; 9 14), since the Phoenicians were preeminently the Mediterranean traders among all the people of Pal. Later, commerce declined, and the neighboring peoples attempted to revive it (1 K 22 48; 2 Ch 20 36), but without success. Tyre and Sidon as great commercial centers, however, long impressed the life of Israel (Isa 23; Ezk 26—27). Later, in the Maccaeban period, Simon acquired Joppa as a Jewish port (1 Macc 14 5), and so extended Mediterranean commerce.

During the peaceful reign of Solomon, there came, with internal improvements and foreign friendships, a stimulus to traffic with the Far East over the ancient trade routes as well as with Phoenicia on the Time of the Kings in the Time of the the Time of the Kings the Time of the Kings in the northwest. He greatly added to his wealth through tariffs levied upon the merchants (1 K 10 15). Trade with Syria in the days of Omri and Ahab is indicated by the permission Benhadad gave to Israelites to open streets, or trading quarters, in Damascus, as Syrians had in Samaria (1 K 20 34). The prophets disbelieve repeatedly the results of foreign commerce upon the people in the days of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, and of Jeroboam II, under whom great material prosperity was attained, followed by simple luxury (Isa 2 6 7 16; Hos 12 1 7; 8; Am 2 7—8). Amos, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Zephaniah alleged that the gain could not observe Sabbaths and feast days (Am 8 5); cf Sabbath trading and its punishment in the days of the restoration (Neh 13 15—22). "Canaanite" became the nickname for traffickers (Zec 14 21; cf Is 23 8).
II. NT Times. — After the conquests of Alexander 338 BC, trade between East and West was greatly stimulated. Colonies of Jews for trade purposes had been established in Egypt and elsewhere. The dispersion of the Jews throughout the Gr and Rom world added to their interest in commerce. The Great River of Asia Minor, Tyre, Seleucea, Tyre, Sidon and Antioch (port Seleucia). The apostle Paul made use of ships touching at ports on the coasts of Asia Minor and the islands along the coast, and also doing coast trade with Greece, Italy, and Spain, to carry on his missionary enterprises (Acts 13 4–13; 16 11 f.; 18 18; 20 13–16; 21 1–5; 27 1–44; 30 1–31). The rapidity with which the gospel spread throughout the Rom world in the 1st cent. was due no little to the use of the great Rom highways, built partly as trade routes; as well as to the constant going to and fro of tradesmen of all sorts; some of whom like Aquila and Priscilla, (Acts 18 1–26). Lydia, (16 14.40) and Paul himself (who was a traveling tent-maker) were active in disseminating the new faith among the Gentiles. In Jas 4 13 we have a good representation of the large number of Jews who would “go forth such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain” (AV). See also TRADE.

COMMIT, kó-mit: Used in two senses: (1) “To give in charge” or “entrust”: sim, “to put” (Job 5 8); gáthol, “to roll” (Ps 37 5; Prov 16 3); pákhath, “to give in charge” (Ps 31 5 A.V.; cf. Lk 23 46); áithémi, “committed to us” (RVm “entrusted on the one hand of a reconciliation” (2 Cor 5 19)); parárikhe, “that which I have committed unto him” (2 Tim 1 12; RVm “that which he hath committed unto me,” Gr “my deposit”); “that which is committed unto thee” (1 Tim 6 20). Gr “the good deposit.” (2) “To do or practise [evil]: prósadí, “commit such things” (Rom 1 32, RV “practice”; cf. 2 2). In 1 Jn 3 4 8 “doth sin” (poióš, AV “committeth sin”) shows that it is not committing a single sin that is in view, but sinful practice.

COMMODIOUS, kó-mó-di-us (äkoumíthos, äne-äthetaos, “not well placed”): The word occurs only in Acts 27 12. “As regards entering the place was certainly ‘not commodious,’ but as regards shelter from some winds (including N.W.), it was a good anchorage” (CH, XXIII, 639).

COMMON, kom’un: kýnés, koínós, in the classics, and primarily in the NT, means what is public, general, universal, as contrasted with τις, idios, what is peculiar, individual, not shared with others. Thus, “common faith” (Tit 1 4), “common salvation” (Jude ver 3), refer to that in which the members of all Christian churches and sects are united; “common,” because there is but one faith and one salvation (Heb 4 4–6). From this comes the derived meaning of what is ordinary and, therefore, to be diestemeated, as contrasted with what pertains to a class, and to be placed, because rare. This naturally coincides with OT exclusivism, particularity and separation. Its religion was that of a separated people, with a separated class as its ministers, and with minute directions as to distinctions of meat, drink, times, places, rites, vessels, etc. Whatever was not Commerce, on the other hand, with its universalism of scope, and its spirituality of sphere, rose above all such externals. The salvation which it brought was directed to the redemption of Nature, as well as of man, sanctifying the creature, and pervading all of it in being and all relations of life. The antithesis is forcibly illustrated in Acts 10 14 f., where Peter says: “I have never eaten anything that is c. and unclean,” and the reply is: “What God hath cleansed, make not thou c.”

COMMONWEALTH, kom’un-welth (poilediá, poiéletai): Spoken of the theocracy (Eph 2 12). The same word is rendered “freedom,” AV; “citizenship” RV. Also in the sense of commonwealth in the Apocalypse (Rev 2 11; 14 13); in the sense of citizenship in (3 Macc 3 21.23).

CITIZENSHIP.

COMMUNE, kó-mú’on, COMMUNICATE, kó-mu’k-ét, COMMUNICATION, ko-mú-ni-kék-shun: To commune is to converse confidentially and sympathetically. It is represented in both Heb and Gr by several words lit. signifying to speak (of Lk 6 11, kolámen, diaxalé; also Lk 22 4; Acts 24 28, díamó, homítea). To communicate is to impart something to another, so that it becomes common to giver and receiver. In 1 Tim 6 18, “willing to communicate” (RVm “sympathize”), represents a single word saískos, komnón, and refers to the habit of sharing with others either sympathy or property. RV gives “companionship” for homítea in 1 Cor 15 33 (AV “communications”). See also COMMUNION.

COMMUNION, kó-mú’n-yun (FELLOWSHIP): The terms “communion” and “fellowship” of the Eng. Bible are varying tr’s of the words κοινωνία, κοινωνία, and κοινωνία, κοινωνία, or their cognates. They designate acts of fellowship observed among the early Christians, the practice of a spirit of unity and fellowship of which these acts were the outward expression. The several passages in which these terms are used fall into two groups: those in which they refer to acts of fellowship, and those in which they refer as acts of fellowship, as described.

I. Acts of Fellowship. — The acts of fellowship mentioned in the NT are of four kinds.

Our information concerning the nature of the fellowship involved in the observance of this sacrament is confined to the single notice of the Lord’s Supper.

1. The Lord’s Supper. — In 1 Cor 10 16 17, “The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?” In this sense of the presence of the material elements in the sacrament there is a temptation to limit the word for communion to the sense of partaking. This, however, does not entirely satisfy the requirements of the context. The full significance of the term is to be sought in the light of the argument of the whole section (vs 14–22).

Paul is making a protest against Christians participating in idolatrous feasts on the ground that such feasts are really celebrated in honor of the demons associated with the idols, and that those who participate in them come into fellowship with demons. As a proof of this point the apostle cites the Lord’s Supper with which his readers are familiar. By partaking of the cup and the bread the communicants are linked together in unity:

"We, who are many, are one bread, one body: for we all partake of the one bread." Thus the communion of the elements is a real communion of the worshippers one with another and with Christ. Unless the communion be understood in this spiritual sense the illustration falls short of the mark. See Eucharist.

The term for fellowship as used in Acts 2 42 is by some interpreted in this sense: "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' teaching and in the communion of bread and in prayers." The fact that the four terms are used in pairs and that three of them refer to specific acts observed by the company of believers suggests that the term for fellowship also refers to some definite act similar to the others. It is very plausible to refer this to the community of goods described in the verses immediately following (see Communion of Saints).

2. Communion and bread and the prayers. The fact that the four terms are used in pairs and that three of them refer to specific acts observed by the company of believers suggests that the term for fellowship also refers to some definite act similar to the others. It is very plausible to refer this to the community of goods described in the verses immediately following (see Community of Goods).

The author might, however, with equal propriety have regarded the interchange of spiritual experiences as an aspect of communion in the class with "the breaking of bread and the prayers." Christian fellowship found a natural mode of expression in almsgiving. This is enjoined as a duty in Rom 12 13; 1 Tim 6 18; He 13 16. Almsgiving, its motives and its rewards are a frequent collection raised among the gentile converts for the poor saints of Jerusalem (Rom 15 26; 2 Cor 8 4; 9 13). To this collection St. Paul attached so much importance as a witness to the spirituality of the fellowship that he speaks of it in all his letters, whether as Jew or Gentile, that he desired even at the peril of his life to deliver it with his own hand. See Collection.

A form of fellowship closely related to almsgiving was that of formal aid in cooperation in Christian work, such as the aid given to St. Paul by the Philippians (Phil 1 5). A unique form of this cooperation is the act of personal endorsement by giving the right hand of fellowship as described in Gal 2 9.

II. Fellowship As Experienced. From the very beginning the early Christians experienced a peculiar sense of unity. Christ is at once the center of this unity and the origin of every expression of fellowship. Sometimes this fellowship has appeared as a formal act of fellowship in Christian life, and as such it is necessarily precarious. It may be regarded as a mystical union in Christ. In other instances the fellowship approaches or includes the idea of intercourse. In some passages it is a participation or partnership. The terms occur most frequently in the writings of Paul with whom the idea of Christian unity was a controlling principle.

In its various relations, fellowship is represented:

(1) As a communion between the Son and the Father. The gospel record represents Jesus as enjoying a unique sense of communion and intimacy with the Father. Among many such expressions those of Mt 11 25-27 (cf Mk 10 21,22) and Jn 14-16 are especially important. (2) As our communion with God, either with the Father or the Son or with the Father through the Son or the Holy Spirit. "Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Jn 1 3; cf also Jn 14 6,23,26). (3) As our communion one with another. "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another" (1 Jn 1 7). Sometimes the idea of communion occurs in relation with abstract ideas or experiences: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph 5 11) and "in fellowship with his sufferings" (Phil 3 10); "the fellowship of thy faith" (Philem ver 6). In three passages the relation of the fellowship is not entirely clear: the "fellowship of the Spirit" (Phil 2 1); "the communion of the Holy Spirit" (2 Cor 13 14); and "the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1 9). The fellowship is probably to be understood as that prevailing among Christians by virtue of the grace of Christ and the ministry of the Holy Spirit.

It is not to be inferred that the idea of fellowship is limited to the passages in which the specific words for communion are used. Some of the clearest and richest expressions of unity and fellowship are found in the Gospels, though these words do not occur there. The most familiar and forcible expressions of the idea are those in which they are represented symbolically, as in the parable of the Vine and the Branches (Jn 15 1 ff) or in the figure of the Body and its Members (Mt 20 23 ff; Rom 12 5; 1 Cor 12). See Communion.

RUSSELL BENJAMIN MILLER

COMMUNION WITH DEMONS, dė'monz (DEVILS, dev'-lz).

I. Use of Term. The actual expression "communion with demons" (κοινωνία τῶν δαίμων, koivnonia ton daimōn) occurs twice in the New Testament. See Communion with Demons (1 Cor 1 20) where its fig. meaning is evident, but it is implied in the Eng. version of a number of passages by the terms "one who has" or "those who have" "familiar spirits" (Lev. 19 31; 20 6,7; Dt 18 11; 1 S 28 7-22; 2 K 1 19-22; 15 20; of familiar and forcé expressions of the idea are those in which they are represented symbolically, as in the parable of the Vine and the Branches (Jn 15 1 ff) or in the figure of the Body and its Members (Mt 20 23 ff; Rom 12 5; 1 Cor 12). See Communion.

II. Teaching of Scripture. To begin with, we may safely say, in general, that there is no ground for asserting that the Bible admits the possibility of conscious and voluntary communion with spirits. This is an essential element of popular demonology in all ages, but it is absent from Scripture. Even in the passages mentioned above which refer to necromancers and wizards, while, as we shall see, the words indicate that such practitioners professed to rely upon spirits in their divinations, the Scriptures carefully refrain from sanctioning these claims, and a number of features in the various passages serve to indicate that the true scriptural view is quite the opposite. As this is not a prevalent opinion in the NT, we should do well to examine the passages with some little care.

(1) We may first deal with the NT. In the Gospels the demons are consistently looked upon and treated as unconscious and evil spirits. See Demonology.

1. The New Testament Monology. (1) The frequent use of the term "demonized" (daimonizomenon) together with all that is told us of the methods of treating these cases adopted by Our Lord and His apostles (see Exorcism) indicates the belief of the NT writers that the control of demons over men is obtained outside of or below the region of conscious volition and that the condition of the sufferers is pathological.

The essential must be said of the Lydian maiden whose cure by Paul is recorded in Acts 16 16. This is the one instance in the NT where divination is connected with spirits. The account emphasizes the excitable nervous system of the patient; and the belief on the part of the apostles and of the writer of Acts that the girl was not the conscious accomplice of her masters, but their unfortunate victim through her mysterious malady, is clear. She was treated, as the other cases recorded in the NT, not as a conscious wrongdoer, but as a sick person to be healed of her sufferings.

(1) Turning now to the OT, the instance which requires the most careful treatment, because it holds the key to all the rest, is the narrative of Saul's visit to the Witch of Endor in 1 S 28:3-25. The Heb word 'ô̂bh which is usually tr. "one who has a familiar spirit" (see list of passages at 2. The Old Testament rative four times (vs 3, 7, twice, 8).

According to the ordinary interpretation it is used of the different power to evince two of which occur here. These three senses are (a) a person who controls a spirit, (b) the spirit controlled, (c) the power to control such a spirit. This meaning appears to be altogether too broad. Omitting to translate the word we have (ver 2) till had put away 'ôb hostile, and 'ydhônîm' (ver 7), a woman, a mistress of an 'ôb, (ver 8) "Divine unto me. . . . by the 'ôb." It is extremely unlikely that the same word should be used in two senses so far apart as "person who has a spirit" and the "spirit itself" in the same context. In the last passage mentioned (ver 8) there is a double indication that the word 'ôbh cannot have either signification mentioned. Saul says: "Divine unto me by the 'ôb and bring me up whomsoever I shall name unto thee." The expression "divine by" clearly points to some magi-object used in divination. Control of a spirit through some magical object is familiar enough. The rest of Saul's statement confirms this view. The result of the divination is that calling up of a spirit. A spirit would hardly be called to call up another spirit. This conclusion is confirmed by the etymology. The word 'ôbh is supposed to mean 'one who has a familiar spirit," from its root-signification of holding and its primary meaning of "wine skin." According to this derivation the word is applied to a necromancer on the supposition that the spirit inhabits his body and speaks from within. The transference to spirit is extremely unlikely and the explanation is not consistent with primitive ideas on spirit manifestation (see BDB, s.v., end).

(2) We, therefore, hold with H. P. Smith (ICC, "Samuel in loc.", though partly on different grounds, that the word 'ôbh has the same meaning in all the passages where it occurs, and that it refers to a sacred object or fetish by which spiritistic divination was carried on.

The significance of this conclusion is that the misapprehension of the spirit-magician or spirit-appearing (see BDB, s.v., end).

(3) This opinion is confirmed by two separate items of evidence. (a) In the Witch of Enedor story Samuel's appearance, according to the idea of the narrator, was due to a miracle, not to the magic power of the feebly and cheating old woman to whom Saul had resorted. God speaks through the apparition a stern message of doom. No one was more startled than the woman herself, who for once had a real vision (ver 12). She not only gave a loud cry of astonishment and alarm but she described the figure which she saw as "a god coming up out of the earth." The story is told with fidelity and clearly indicates the opinion that the actual appearance of a spirit is so violently exceptional as to indicate the immediate power and presence of God.

(b) In Isa 8:19 the 'ôb hostile and 'ydhônîm are spoken of as those who "chirp and mutter." These terms refer to necromancers (LXX translates 'ôb hostile by egraîtrîma unequal ventriloquists who practised ventriloquism in connection with their magical rites. In Isa 29:4 it is said "Thy voice shall be an 'ôb, out of the ground." Here 'ôbh is usually interpreted as "ghost," but it is far more probable (see BDB sub loc.) that it refers as in 8:19 to the ventriloquistic tricks of those who utter their oracles in voices intended to represent the spirits which they have evoked. They are stamped in these passages, as in the Witch of Enedor narrative, as deceivers practising a fraudulent art. By implication their power with whom they were in familiar intercourse is denied.

This leaves the way clear for a brief consideration of the words of Paul in 1 Cor 10:20 in connection with cognate passages in the OT.

3. The Meaning is really demon-worship, the partaking of Idol-Worship with demons and a separation from Christ. It is usually taken for granted that this characteristic of heathen worship was simply a part of the Jewish-Christian polemic against idolatry. Our fuller knowledge of the spiritism which conditions the use of images enables us to recognize the fact that from the viewpoint of heathenism itself Paul's idea was strictly correct. The image is venerated because it is supposed to represent or contain an invisible being or spirit, not necessarily a deity in the absolute sense, but a superhuman living being capable of working good or ill to men.

(2) In the AV the term devils is used in four OT passages (Lev 17:7; Dt 32:17; 2 Ch 11:15; Ps 106:37). In RV "devils" has disappeared from the text—the word he-goats appears in Lev 17:7 and 2 Ch 11:15. The demon appears in Dt 32:17 and Ps 106:37. The term of "he-goats" is literally correct, but conveys an erroneous conception of the meaning. The practice repudiated is the worship of Satyrs (see SATYRS) or wood-demons supposed to be like goats in appearance and to inhabit lonely places. The same word is used in Isa 13:21; 34:14. The term tr. "demons" in RV is shedhîm, a term used only twice and both times in connection with the rites and abominations of heathen worship. It is interesting to note that the word shedhî is applied to the beings represented by the bull-colossi of Assyria (Driver, Dt in loc.). BDB holds that the word shedhîm is an Assyrian loan-word, while Briggs (ICC, Ps 106:37) holds that the word belongs to the Semitic stock. In either case the word belongs to heathenism and is used in Scripture to describe heathen worship in its own terminology. The interpretation of these beings as evil is characteristic of Bib. demonism in general (see DEMONLOGY); here no worship of personal beings more than man and less than God, according to Jewish and Christian ideas (see Driver op. cit., 363). LXX translates both the above words by daimonia.

The term "conmunion with demon" does not imply any power on the part of men to enter into voluntary relationship with beings of another world, but that, by sinful compliance in wrongdoing, such as idol-worship, a man may enter into a moral identification with evil powers against which it is their duty to fight.

LITERATURE.—The Dictionaries and Commentaries dealing with the passages quoted above contain discussions of the various aspects of the subject. Jewish superstitions are ably treated by Edersheim, LTJ M (5th ed.), I, 771, 773.

COMMUNITY, kō-mû'-ni, OF GOODS (ἀρεta koina, ἱππαρκία koina, lit., "They had all things in common""). In Acts 2:44, it is said that, in the infant church "they were together, and had all things common," and (4:34) "as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them at the apostles' feet." The inference from this, that there was an absolute disposal of all the property and the money in this church, and that its proceeds were contributed to a common fund, has been disputed upon the ground that the example of Barnabas in selling "a field" for this purpose (Acts 4:37) would not have been mentioned, if this had been the universal rule. The thought conveyed is that all believers in that church held their property as a trust from the Lord, for the benefit of the entire brotherhood, and, as there was need, did as Barnabas.

No commandment, of which record has been preserved, prevailed annulling this practice. It came from the spontaneous impulse of the sense of brotherhood in Christ, when the band of disciples was still small, making them in a sense one family, and under the external constraint of extreme want and persecution. So much there was, that they realized, under such conditions they had in common, that they were ready to extend this to all things. It was, in a sense, a continuance of the practice of a common purse in the band of immediate followers of Our Lord during his ministry. The name applied on Ananias and Sapphira was not for any failure to comply fully with this custom, but because this freedom which they possessed (Acts 5:4) they falsely professed to have renounced, thus receiving in recompense of their breach of credit that was not their due. This custom did not last long. It was possible only within a limited circle, and under very peculiar circumstances. The NT recognizes the right of individual property and makes no effort to remove the differences that exist among believers themselves. The community of goods which it renders possible is spiritual (1 Cor 3:21 f.), and not one of visible and external things. With respect to the latter, it enjoins upon the Christian, as a steward of God, the possession and administration of property for the progress of the kingdom of God, and the highest interests of men. The spirit of Acts 4:34 is always to pervade the association of believers as a true Christian community. Meyer, on the above passage, has suggested that it is not unlikely that the well-known poverty of the church at Jerusalem, and its long dependence upon the alms of other churches, may be connected with this early communistic practice, which, however justifiable and commendable at the time, bore its inevitable fruits in a subsequent season of great scarcity and lack of employment.

COMPACT, kom-pakt', COMPACTED, kom-paked ("ÇÈ") hbbkh, "to be joined"; wymbhîbâû, wymbhîbâdô, ("to raise up together"); "Compact" appears as tr of hbbkh in Ps 132:3, "Jerus.... a city that is compact together" (well built, its breaches restored, walls complete, and separate from all around), and separate from AV Eph 4:16, "fitted together and compacted," RV "fitted frame and knit together." In RV "compacted" is also the tr of wymbhîbucceeds in AV Eph 4:16, "fitted together and compacted," RV "fitted frame and knit together." In RV "compacted" is also the tr of wymbhîbcluded in AV Eph 4:16, "an earth compacted out of water and amidst [in, through] water," which suggests the idea of water as the primary material (cf Gen 1:2). COMPANY, kom-pá-ní: The fertility of the original language in synonyms and varied shades of meaning is seen by the fact that 20 Heb and 12 Gr words are represented by this single term. An analysis of these words shows that "company" is both an indefinite and limitless term, signifying few or many, and all kinds of assemblages of people, e.g.: (a) caravan (migratory) (Isa 21:13 AV); (b) commercial (Gen 37:25 AV); Job 6:19, "The companies of Sheba waited [in vain] for them."
ancient and modern, whether professcd by savages or prevalent among highly civilized communities, whether to be studied in sacred books or learnt orally from the people.

In this way we learn first of all that religion is a universal phenomenon, present among all nations, in all conditions, though differing immensely in its teachings, ceremonies and effects in different places. It is perhaps the most powerful for good or evil of all the instincts (for it is an instinct) which influence mankind.

To account for the origin and growth of various religions, there have been proposed: (1) "Humanism," which is the revival of the ethical principles of ancient nations, which resulted in the doctrine of no Atonement, though modern Hinduism endeavors to propitiate the deities by sacrifices, as indeed was done in Vedic times. Conscience they cannot explain. Christianity, while showing the heimounia of sin as no other system does, and so supplementing the others, supersedes them still further by the Atonement, showing that God is just, and teaching how His very righteousness can be brought to "justify" the sinner (Rom 3:26).

Mahatma Buddhism proclaims an immanent but not transendent being (Dharma-kaya), who is the ultimate reality that underlies all religions, who wills and reflects, though not fully personal. He is not the Creator of the world but a kind of Anima mundi, the "life spirit" of things. To Him all sentient beings and they have no individual existence, "no ego-soul." The world of matter has no real existence but is His self-manifestation. Christianity supplements, and corrects this by teaching the true essence of the immanence (Acts 17:28) of the Creator, who is at least personal, if not something higher, who is the Source of reality though not Himself the sole reality, and of our personality and life, and "who only hath immortality" (1 Tim. 6:16).

Vedantism and Sufism proclaim that ultimate absorption in the impersonal "It" is the summum bonum, and the Chândogya Upanishad says, "There is just one thing, without a second" (Book VI, 2 1, 2). Of this Bonum one thing everything is, so to speak, a part: there being no ultimate difference between the human and the Divine. Thus sin is denied and unreality proclaimed (Mâyâ, illusion). The yearning for union with the Divine is satisfied in this in Christianitv, which provides reconciliation with God and shows how by new spiritual birth men may become children of God (Jn 1 12:18) and "partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pet 1:4), and that the evolution has gone further and found that this is to be sought in Christ, who is the union between the spiritual and the material.

Orthodox (Sunni) Muslim theology declares God to be separated from man by an impassable gulf and hence to be unknowable.

4. Self-Revelation of God

Philosophically this leads to Agnosticism, though opposed to Polytheism. Among the Jews the philosophy of Maimonides ends in the same failure to attain to a knowledge of the Divine or to describe the God, except by negations (Sêpher Ha-naddâr, I 11). The Bible, on the other hand, while speaking of Him as invisible, and unknowable through merely human effort (Job 11 7:8; Jn 18), yet reveals Him in Christ, who is God and man. Jewish mysticism endeavored to solve the problem of creation by the invention of the 'Ashêr kudmân (archetypal man), and earlier by Philo's Logos doctrine and the Memra of the Targums. But these abstractions have neither reality nor personality. The Christian Logos doctrine presents Josephus in a wonderfu1 way the historical, eternal Christ (of Jn 1 1-3; 5.

5. Incarnation

Heathenism seeks to give some idea of the Invisible by means of idols; Vaishnavism has its doctrine of avatars; Buddhism and Bahá’ísm their dogma of “manifestations” (maghar) in human beings; the ‘Allâhâs are so called because they regard ‘Allâ as God. Instead of these unworthy theories and defilements, Christianity supplies the holy, sinless, perfect Incarnation in Christ.

Hinduism offers mukti (moksha), “deliverance” from a miserable existence; Christianity in Christ offers pardon, deliverance from sin, and Salvation reconciliation with God.

Krishnaism teaches unreasoning “devotion” (bhakti) of “mind, body, property” to certain supposed incarnations of Krisna (Vishnu), quite regardless of their immoral conduct;

Christianity inculcates a manly, reasonable “faith” in Christ, but only after “proving all things.”

Pilgrimages in Islam and Hinduism indicate but do not satisfy a need for approach to God; Christianity teaches a growth in grace and in likeness to Christ, and so a spiritual drawing to God.

III. General Characteristics of Ethnic Faiths.—All religions were, though in many various forms, certain common beliefs, such as:

1. Tenets power or powers, good or bad, superior Common to all nature life; (2) that there is a difference between right and wrong, even though not clearly defined; (3) that there is an after-life of some sort, with happiness or misery often regarded as in some measure depending upon conduct, and upon the observance of certain rites here. In the main the fact of the all but universal agreement of religions upon these points proves that they are true in substance. Even such an agnostic philosophy as original Buddhism has been shown by the human need to evolve from itself or admit from without deistic or theistic elements, and thus Buddha himself has been defied by the Mahâyânâ School. Yet no ethnic faith satisfies the “human soul naturally Christian” as Tertullian calls it (Liber Apolgeticus, cap. 17), for none of them reveals One God, personal, holy, loving, just, merciful, omniscient and omnipotent. Even Islam fails here. Ethnic religions are either (1) polytheistic, worshipping many gods, imperfect and some evil, or (2) mystical, evaporating away, as it were, God’s Personality, thus rendering Him a mental abstraction, as in the Hindû philosophical systems and in Mahâyânâ Buddhism. Christianity as revealed in Christ does just what all other faiths fail to do, reconciling these two tendencies and correcting both.

As a general rule, the nearer to their source we can trace religions, the purer we find them. In most cases a tendency to degradation and not to progressive improvement manifests itself as time goes on, and this is sometimes carried to such an extreme, as Lucretius found in progress, in Rome and Greece, religion becomes a curse and not a blessing. Thus, for example, regarding ancient Egypt, Professor Renouf says: “The sublimer portions of the Egypt religion are not the comparatively late result of a process of development. The sublimer portions are demonstrably ancient, and the last stage of the Egypt religion was by far the grossest and most corrupt” (Hobart Lectures, 91). Modern Hindûism, again, is incomparably lower in its religious conceptions than the religion of Vedas. The rule holds very well, as is evident from the myths about Tanganara.

In Samoa he was said to be the son of two beings, the “Cloudless Heaven” and the “Outspread Heaven.” He originally existed in open space. He made the sky to dwell in. He then made the earth. Somewhat later he was supposed to be visible in the moon! But a lower depth was reached. In Hawaii, Tanganara has sunk to an evil being, the leader of a rebellion against another god, Tane, and it is now condemned to abide in the lowest depths of darkness and be the god of death.

In South Africa, Australia and elsewhere, traditions still linger of a Creator of all things, but his worship has been entirely laid aside in favor of lower and more evil deities.

Almost everywhere mythology has arisen and perverted religion into something very different from what it once was. The same tendency has more than once manifested itself in the Christian church, thus rendering a return to Christ’s teachings necessary. As an instance, compare the modern popular religion of Italy with that of the NT. It is remarkable that no religion but the Christian, however, has shown its capability of reform.

For the most part, in ethnic religions, there is no recognized connection between religion and morality. The wide extension of phallic worship and the existence of hierodoulai and hierodoulai, because that religion has often consecrated gross immorality. Mythology aids in this degradation. Hence Seneca, after mentioning many evil myths related of Jupiter, etc., says: “By which nothing evil is effected but the removal from men of the shame at sinning, if they deemed such beings gods” (L. A. Seneca, De beata vida cap. 26). With the possibly doubtful exception of that religion certain savage tribes, in no religion is the holiness of God taught except in Christianity and its initial stage, Judaism. Ethnic deities are mostly born of heaven and earth, if not identified with them in part, and are rarely regarded as creating the world; it was otherwise, however, with Ahura Mazda in Zoroastrianism, and with certain Sumerian deities, and there are other exceptions, too. The “religions of Nature” have generally produced gross immorality, encouraging and even to some extent engaging in parts of their ritual; of Mylitta-worship in Babylon and that of the “Mater Deae,” Venus, Anâhîta, etc.

IV. Supposed Resemblances to Revealed Religion.—Much attention has been called to real or supposed community of rites and dogmas. “Many have supposed that the religion of the ancient Egyptians is compared with Christianity. Sacrifice, for instance, is an essential part of every religion. In Christianity none are now offered, except the “living sacrifice” of the believer, though that of Christ offered once for all is held to be the substance foreshadowed by Jewish sacrifices. Purificatory bathtings are found almost everywhere, and that very naturally, because of the universality of conscience and of some sense of sin.

Belief in the fiery end of the world existed among the Stoics, and is found in the Eddas of Scandinavia and the Purânas of India.
of separate deities. Belief in a resurrection is found in only very late parts of the Pers (Zoroastrian) scriptures, composed after cents. of communion with Jews and Christians. In the earlier Avesta only a "restoration" of the world is mentioned (cf Acts 3:21). Original (Hmaṇyāṇa) Buddhism teaches "immortality" (omata), but by this is meant Nir-vāya ("extinction"). Mithraism has been said to teach the "resurrection of the body," but, according to Eubulus and Porphyry, it taught rather the transmigration of the soul.

3. Asserted, said, for instance, that the resurrection of Adonis, Osiris and Mithra Gospel was believed in by their followers. It is history that, in some places, Adonis was said to have come to life the day after he had met his death by the tusk of a boar (the cold of winter); but everywhere it was recognized the way of the man who had been killed but the representative of the productive of the soil, slain or dying down in the cold weather and growing again in spring. As to Osiris, his tomb was shown in more than one place in Egypt, and his body was never supposed to have come to life again, though his spirit was alive and was ruler of the underworld. Mithra, it is said, was admitted to be the genius of the sun. He was said to have sprung from a rock (in old Pers and Sanskrit the same word means "sky," "cloud" or "rock"), but to have been incurred, or not to have died, much less to have risen from the dead. The modern erroneous fancy that Mithraists believed in his resurrection rests solely on one or at most two passages in Christian writers, which are only referred to in the ritual of Osiris and the removal of his body from the tomb by his hostile brother Typhon (Sat). The high morality attributed to Mithraism and even to the worship of Isis rests on no better foundation than the rendering of a few passages and the deliberate ignoring of many which contradict the theory.

Virgin birth, we have been told, is a doctrine of many religions. As a matter of fact, it is found in hardly one ethnic faith. Nothing of the sort was ever said regarding Osiris, Adonis, Horus, Mithra, Krishna, Zoroaster. Of Buddha it is denied entirely in all the books of the Southern Canon (Pālik), and is found expressed only vaguely in one or two late works of the Northern (Sanskrit) School. It was doubtless borrowed from Christianity. Supernatural birth of quite a different (and very repulsive) kind is found in many mythologies, but that is quite another thing.

Heathenism contains some vague aspirations and unconscious prophecies, the best example of which is to be found in Vergil's Fourth Eclogue, if that be not rather due to Jewish influence. Any such foreglimpses of the coming light as are real and not merely imaginary, such, for instance, as the Indian doctrine of the avatāras or "descents" of Vishnu, are to be accounted for as part of the Divine education of the human race. The "false dawn," so well known in the East, is not a proof that the sun is not about to can its existence justify anyone in shutting his eyes to and rejecting the day-light when it comes. It is but a harbinger of the real dawn.

of humanity. The failures of the ethic faiths no less than their aspirations show how great is man's need of Christ, and how utterly unable his imagination has ever proved itself to be even to conceive of such an ideal character as He revealed to us in the full light of history and in the wonder-working effects of His character upon the lives and hearts of those who then and in ages since have in Him received life and light.

COMPASS, kom-pā's, COMPASSES, kom-pā's.

Is: "Compass," noun, is the drs of T, dāmāh, hāsh, ṭūq, ṭrakh; parabāllā, parabālī, ṭvrkī, sugkrīnā: "Compass" is the drs of ṭūq, dāmāh, "to be like" (Cant 1:9); of ṭūq, hāshāl, "to liken," "compare" (Isa 46:5); of ṭūq, ṭrakh, "to set in array," "compare" (Ps 89:6; Isa 40:18); of ṭūq, hāshāh, "to be equal" (Prov 3:15; 8.11).

In the NT sugkrīnā, "to judge" or "sift together," is trv "comparing," comparing spiritual things with spiritual (I Cor 12:3, NV, RF "containing" adapting the discourse to the subject; Thayer says RFm "interpreting spiritual things to spiritual [men]."

COMPASS, kom-pā's, COMPASSES, kom-pā's.

Is: "Compass," noun, is the drs of T, bāh, "a circle," "vauut" or "arch" ("when he set a compass upon the face of the depth") Prov 27:18 AV, RV "circle" of Job 26:10; and see Circle.

VAULT OF EARTH; of 22q, karkōb, "a margin," "border" (Ex 27:5), "the compass of the altar," RV "the least round," so 38 T, "to fetch a compass" is the trs of 22q, sōbhāh, "to turn about," "go round about" (Nu 34:5; Jos 15:13, RV "turn about" 2 S 5:23; K 3:9, RV "make a circuit"; of pertēρhomat, "to go about" (Acts 28:13, RV "made a circuit"; in some ancient authorities read coast loo"; see CIRCLE).

"Compasses" is RV for "compass." ṭūq, ṭvṛghāh, an instrument for describing a circle: "He marketh it out with the compasses" (Isa 44:13) making in an idol.

The vb. "to compass" occurs frequently in the sense of "to surround" and "to go round about," e.g. Gen 2:11, "which compasseth the whole land of Havilah," Dt 2:1, "We compassed [went around] mount Seir many days"; in Jer 31:22 we have a "new thing on the earth; a woman shall compass her man," RV "encircle him." It is a frequent adj. of a man or place; but more probably as a protector. In those happy days, the protection of women (under God, ver 28) will be sufficient, while the men are at their work; "to encompass," "the cords of death compassed me," Ps 18:4, "the waves of death," 2 S 22:5, "to gird" (Isa 60:11 RV); "to lie around," "to be laid around" (He 5:2, "compassed with infirmity" [dotted with it]; 12:1, "compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses").
In Apcn we have "compassed about with yawning darkness" (Wis 19:17); "compassed the circuit of heaven" (Ecclus 24:5); "compassed with pomegranates of gold" (45:9); "The rainbow compasseth the heaven" (Ecclus 43:12); the course of the sun (1 Esd 4:34).

COMPASSION, kom-pash'un: Compassion is the tr of ἀματία, rábām, "to love," "pity," "be merciful" (Dt 13:17; 30:3); of ῥαβδίαν, "mercies" (1 K 8:50); of ἀματίας, ἀματίας, "to pity," "spare" (Ex 2:6; 23:11, 22; Ps 17:14; Pr 24:13; Mt 19:28; Lk 10:35; 14:4; 11:4; 14:58), is rendered by ARV "merciful."

We have σταυροπαθία, σπαυροπαθία, "to have the bowels yearning," in Mt 9:36; 14:14, etc; sumpathē; (He 10:34), "to suffer with [another];" sumpathētes (1 Pet 3:8, RV "compassionate," m or Gr sympathetic); metropathē (He 6:2, RV "who can bear gently with"); elekō, "to show mildness," "kindness" (Mt 18:33; Mk 5:19; Jude ver 22, RV "mercy"); okteleō, "to have pity" or "mercy" (Rom 9:15 bis).

Both rábām and σπαυροπαθία are examples of the physical origin of spiritual terms, the bowels being regarded as the seat of the warm, tender emotions or feelings. But, while rábām applied to the lower viscera as well as the higher, σπαυροπαθία denoted chiefly the higher viscera, the heart, lungs, liver.

RV gives "compassion" for "mercy" (Isa 9:17; 14:1; 27:11; 49:13; Jer 13:14; 30:18; Dn 1:9 AV "lender love with"); for "bowels of compassion," (1 Jn 3:17); for "mercy" (He 10:28); "full of compassion" or "merciful" (ARV "merciful" in cases) (Ex 34:6; Neh 9:17; Ps 103:8; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2); "compassions" for "mercies" (Isa 63:15; Phil 2:1), for "repentings" (Hos 11:8).

Compassion, lit. a feeling with and for others, is a fundamental and distinctive quality of the Bib. conception of God, and to its prominence the world owes more than words can express. (1) It lay at the foundation of Israel's faith in Jcb. For it was out of His compassion that He, by a marvelous act of power, delivered them from Epyg bondage and called them to be His own people. Nothing, therefore, is more prominent in the OT than the ascription of compassion, pity, mercy, etc, to God; the people may be said to have gloried in it. It is summed up in such sayings as that of the great declaration of Is 49:15-16; "Jehovah, the God full of compassion [ARV merciful] and gracious" (Ps 78:38; 86:15; 111:4; 112:4; 145:8; Lam 3:22, "His compassion fail not"). And, because this was the character of their God, the prophets declared that compassion was an essential requirement on the part of members of the community (Hos 6:6; Mic 5:8; of Prov 19:17). (2) In Jesus Christ, in whom God was "manifest in the flesh," compassion was an outstanding feature (Mt 9:36; 14:14, etc) and He taught that it ought to be extended, not to friends and neighbors only, but to all without exception, even to enemies (Mt 5:43-48; Lk 10:30-37).

The God of the NT, the Father of men, is most clearly revealed as "a God full of compassion." It extends to all a whole human race for which He effected not merely a temporal, but a spiritual and eternal, deliverance, giving up His own Son to the death of the cross in order to save us from the worst bondage of sin, with its consequences; seeking thereby to save, as new, wider, wider people for Himself, still more devoted, more filled with and expressive of His own Spirit. Therefore all who know the God and Father of Christ, and who call themselves His children, must necessarily cultivate compassion and show mercy, "even as he is merciful." Hence the many apostolic injunctions to that effect ( Eph 4:32; Col 3:12; Jas 1:27; 1 Jn 3:17, etc). Christianity may be said to be distinctively the religion of Compassion. W. L. Walker COMPULSORY, kom-pul'sö-är: Our Eng. word always has in it now the flavor of force, not always, however, physical. It may be strong moral urgency, though "constrain" better expresses this.

There are several words indicative of such strong pressure: (1) ἀνατρέπω, "to drive," "force;" (2) ὀντωδιέω, rendered "forced Judah thereto" (AV, RVm); "led Judah straitly" (RV 2 Ch 21:11). The same word rendered "force," as the adulteress by flattering words her victim (Prov 7:21); (3) ἀβᾱδ�, "abaddh, "to serve"; not to compel him to serve as a bond servant (Lev 25:39 AV, RV "make him serve"); (4) ἅγγαρ, parag, "to break forth upon," "urge;" his servants compelled him" (1 S 28:23 AV, RV "constrained").

In the NT two words are found: (1) ἐγγαρέω, gegareó. The word is of Pers origin and means to employ a courier. The ἀγγαροι in the NT were public couriers stationed by appointment of the kings of Persia, at fixed localities, with horses ready for use, to transmit speedily from one to another the royal messages. These couriers had authority to press their way into the service, in case of need, horses, vessels, and even men, they might meet (Jos, Ant. XIII, ii, 3); "compel thee to go a mile" (Mt 5:41 AV; RV "impress"); "compelled Simon to bear his cross" (Mt 27:32; Mk 15:21 AV; RV "impressed"). (2) ἀπαλαπώ, ἀπαλαπεῖν, "to constrain, whether by force, threats, entreaties, persuasion, etc; to compel them to come" (Acts 16:14 AV; RV "constrain"). This has been a favorite text of religious persecutors. As Robertson says in his history of Charles V, "As they could not persuade, they tried to compel men to believe." But it simply means that utmost zeal and moral urgency should be used by Christians to induce sinners to enter the Kingdom of God. Cf Acts 26:11.

George Henry Trever

COMPLAINING, kom-plan'ing (ταναγρία, ταναγρὸν, "cry," "outcry," τανάγρω, "meditation," "complaint"); "complain!" (ταναγρία, "crying") (2) "to complain" (Mt 14:14, RV "outcry," "to c. [outcry] in prayer") (Isa 28:1); (3) "open placer" where the people commonly assembled near the gate of the city (2 Ch 32:6; Neh 8:1); a picture of peace in the city (cf Isa 24:11; Jer 14:2); some render "battlement"; στῆν (RV Prov 23:29, AV "babbling"), of the drunkard.

COMPLETE, kom-plët': In AV for πλήρω, πλήνο, the vb. ordinarily used for the coming to pass of what had been predicted. AV translates this "complete" in Col 2:10; 4:12 to express the final and entire attainment of what is treated, leaving nothing beyond to be desired or hoped for; otherwise rendered in RV ("made full"). In RV, c. appears once for Gr ἀρίστος, from ἀρίστος, "to join," in 2 Tim 3:17, in sense of "accurately fitted for," where AV has "perfect.

COMPOSITION, kom-pö-zish'un (παρασχέω, παρασκόπω, makhōnth, "measure"); COMPOUND, kom-pound (subst.) (παρασκόπω, παρασκόπω, "to make perfume," παρασκόπω, "to make perfume") of the sacred anointing oil (Ex 30:25-33.33) and of the holy perfume (is 37:38), which were not to be used for any profane purpose.

COMPREHEND, kom-prë-händ': Used in a twofold sense in both the OT and NT. This.
double meaning appears in two Heb and two Gr words which signify in turn (1) mental or spiritual perception, (2) capacity to hold or contain, as in a vessel, comprehending an all-inclusive principle, e.g.: (1) ἐνθεόδοτα, ἀναθεοδοτά, "to lay hold of," hence mentally to apprehend: used of the spiritual capacity of the Christian "to comprehend [RV 'apprehend'] with all saints" (Eph 3:18) the measureless love of God; and of the inability of the unrenewed heart to know or perceive the revelation of God made in Christ: "the darkness comprehended it not" (Jn 1:5; RV "apprehended") (RvM "overcame") (cf 12:35). (2) ἐνθεόδοτα, ἀναθεοδοτά, "to lay measure or "contain," as grain in a bushel. So God's immeasurable greatness is seen in His being able to hold or contain the "head" and "corner," and "compass and the dust of the earth in a measure" (Isa 40:12). ἀναθεοδοσία, ἀναθεοδοσία, "to sum up under one head," e.g. love includes every other moral principle and process. The entire law on its manward side, says Paul, "is comprehended [RV 'summed up']" in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Rom 13:9).

Conaniah

Conaniah, kon-ə-ni′a (נַוַּתְנָה, könanyah), "Jah has founded or sustained." AV Coniah:

(1) A Levite, appointed with his brother Shimei by Hezekiah, the king, and Azariah, the ruler of the house of God, to be overseer of the oblations and tithes and the dedicated things (2 Chr 31:12-13).

(2) One of the chiefs of the Levites mentioned in connection with the passover celebration in Josiah's reign (2 Ch 35:9).

Conceal, kon-səl (צָהַל, parakalēō, parakalēōpēth): Found but once in the NT (Lk 9:45). The primary meaning is to cover by hanging something in front of the object hidden. The purpose of the one concealing is made prominent. There is, therefore, a reserve and studied progress in regard to the statement that is not always the suppression of truth (Prov 16:23). God withholds more than He reveals (Prov 25:2; cf Ps 97:2; 1 Tim 6:16).

Conceit, kon-sət: An idiomatic rendering of a phrase, φασίντο ἐγώ ἐστώ, φάσματο οἱ θρόνοι, in Rom 11:25; 12:16; meaning lit. "wise with one's self," i.e. "in one's own opinion," or, as in Ω OT passages (Prov 38:5.12 RvM), "in his own eyes" (Heb 8:2).

Conception, kon-sep′shun, CONCEIVE, kon-σεν (κοσμοῦν), ἀνακόσμον, and derivatives; συλλαμβάνω, συλλαμβανόν: Physically, the beginning of a new life in the womb of a mother, "to come out," used thus some forty times, as in Gen 3:16; 4:1; Ps 51:5. Metaphorically, applied to the start and growth within the heart, of thought, purpose, desire, e.g. "c. mischief" (Job 15:35; Ps 7:14), "c. craft" (Isa 33:11). This figure is carried out in details in Isa 1:15: "Lust, when it hath conceived, beareth sin."

Conception, immaculate. See IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

Concerning, kon-sur′ning: RvM makes frequent changes, such as "for," "as" for," "from," "about," for "concerning"; "concerning" instead of "for," "of," "over," "in," "against," etc. Some of the other changes are, "unto that which is good," "concerning" (Rom 16:10), "concerning" instead of "because of" (Jer 23:9), for "the miracle of" ( Mk 6:52), for "with" (10:41), for "of the Lord" (Acts 18:25), "concerning Jesus" (different text), "by way of disparagement" (2 Cor 11:21), instead of "concerning reproach"; "Why askest thou me concerning that which is good?" (Mt 19:17) instead of "Why callest thou me good?" (different text; see RvM).

CONCLUSION, kon-ei-zhun (καταρτισμός, katatomē, "mutilation," "cutting"): A term by which St. Paul contemptuously designates the merely fleshly circumcision upon which the Judaizers insisted as being necessary for gentle converts (Phil 3:2), as distinguished from περιτομή, the true circumcision (ver 3). Cf Gal 5:12 and Ds 23:1, and see CIRCUMCISION.

Conclude, kon-klu′d (καταλήγω, katallēgo, "sumblos isot): Used only in Acts 15:10, where AV has "assuredly gathering," i.e. "inferring." Where AV has "conclude," RV more accurately renders "reckon" (Rom 3:28); "giving judgment" (Acts 21:25); "shut up" (Rom 11:32; Gal 3:22).

Conclusion, kon-klo′zhun. In Eccl 12:13 AV, where RvM has "the end," viz. a summary of the entire argument of the book.

The object of a concordance of Scripture is to guide the reader to any passage he is in search of by means of an alphabetical arrangement of the words found in Scripture, of Work and the bringing together under each word of all the passages in which that word occurs. Thus, in the ver: "Cast thy burden upon Jeh" (Ps 55:22), the reader will look in the concordance under the words "cast" or "burden," and there will find a reference to the text. The merit of a concordance is obviously exhaustiveness and clearness of arrangement. There are abridged concordances of the Bible which give only the most important words and passages. These are seldom satisfactory, and a fuller work has in the end frequently to be resorted to.

The ordinary reader is naturally most familiar with concordances of the Eng Bible, but it will be seen that, for scholarly purposes, 2. Classes of concordances are just as necessary for the Scriptures in their original tongues, and for versions of the Scriptures other than Eng. There are required concordances of the OT in Heb, of the NT in Gr, of the LXX version (Gr) of the OT, of the Vulg version (Lat) of the NT, as well as of the τραπεζίου of the Scriptures into German, French and other living languages. There are now, further, required concordances of the RV of the Eng OT and NT, as well as of the AV. There are needed, besides, good concordances to the Apoc, alike in its AV and RV forms. Textual criticism leads to modifications of the earlier concordances of the Heb and Gr texts. It is the concordances of the Eng. version to facilitate reference by giving not only single words, but also phrases... under which several passages are grouped, and to make the work more useful by furnishing lists of Scripture proper names, with their meanings, and, in the larger works, references to the Heb or Gr words for which the Eng, words stand.

The indispensableness of a good concordance for the proper study of the Bible is so apparent that it is not surprising that, since the idea was first conceived, much labor has been expended on the preparation of such works. The wonder rather is that the idea did not occur earlier than it did. No single scholar could ever hope to produce a perfect work of the kind by his own efforts. Modern concordances are based upon the labors of previous generations.

The oldest concordances date from the 13th cent., and are based, as was then natural, upon the Latin Vulgate. A Concordantiae Mo daeles is attributed to Antony of Padua ances to (d. 1231). The first concordance based, as was then natural, upon the Latin which we have actual knowledge is Vulgate that of Hugo of St. Caro, Dominican monk and cardinal (d. 1263). It was called Concordantiae S. Jacobi from the monastery in which it was compiled, and is said to have been engaged upon its preparation. Hugo's Concordance became the basis of others into which successive improvements were introduced. The words of passages, at first wanting, were inserted; inedible particles were added; alphabetic arrangement was employed. Verse divisions were unknown till the time of Robert Stephens (1555).

See Bible.

The earliest Heb concordance seems to have been that of Rabbi Mordecai ben Nathan (1438-48). It went through several editions.

5. Concord- and was tr into Lat by Reuchlin ances to the (1506). Both original and tr con-

Hebrew OT caused many errors. It was improved by Calasio, a Franciscan friar (1521), and more thoroughly by John Buxtorf, whose Concordance was published by his son (1632). This latter formed the basis of Dr. Julius Fürst's Libr. Sacrorum Vet. Test. Concordantiae Hebraeae Liber (1640, Eng. tr, Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance). A later Heb Concordance in Germany is that of Solomon Mendels Kern (1896). In England, in 1754, appeared the valuable Heb Concordance, Adapted to the Eng. Bible, by Dr. Taylor, of Norwich. With it may be cited The English or the B C Chaldean Concordance (1843; rev. ed, 1876).

Though earlier attempts are heard of, the first printed concordance of the LXX (the Gr OT) was that of Tironius, published in Amsterdam in 1715, in the author's 64th year. This important work remained the standard till quite lately. It is very complete, giving references not only to the LXX, but to other VSS (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion) in which the words occur, and an index to the Heb or Chal words to which the Gr words correspond. In 1887 Bagster published A Handy Concordance of the Sept. Earlier works are superseded by the recent publication (1892, 1897, 1900) of Hatch and Redpath's strongly Concords, the New Gr OT of the Sept.

Concordances of the Gr NT began with that of Xystus Betulius (his real name was Bierk) in 1554.

The Concordance (Tomeon) of Eras domian (1638) is often given as the reprinted and reedited. On it is Greek NT based the useful abridged Concordance published by Bagster. Recent works are Bruder's (1842; 4th ed, 1888; based on Schmidt, with many improvements); in America, Hudson's Critical Gr and Eng. Concordance, revised by Ezra Abbot (1870); in England, Moulton and Geden's Concordance to the Gr Test. according to the Texts of Westcott and Hort, Trichendorf, and the Eng. Revised (1887).

The list of concordances to the Eng. Bible is a long one; it is necessary here to particularize only a few of the chief. The oldest is a of 1 K 1 41, “uproot”), “She [wisdom] crieth in the chief place of concourse,” RV “Heb at the head of the noisy [streets]”; swatrophé is tr’ “concourse” (Acts 19 40), a riotous crowd. Cf Jth 10 18.

CONCUBINAGE, kon-kü-bi-náj. See Family.

CONCUPISCENCE, kon-kü-pis-sens (tónuph, epithumia): Not used in RV, but in AV, Rom 7 8; Col 3 5; 1 Thess 4 5. The Gr noun, like the vb, from which it comes, meaning “to yearn,” “to long,” “to have the heart set upon a thing,” is determined in its moral quality by the source whence it springs or the object toward which it is directed. Thus Our Lord uses it to express the intensest desire of His soul (Lk 22 15). As a rule, when the object is not expressed, it refers to longing for that which God has forbidden, viz. lust. It is not limited to sexual desire, but includes all going forth of heart and will toward what God would not have us to have or be, as its use in the LXX of the Ten Commandments clearly shows, for “Thou shalt not covet” (Ex 20 17).

CONDEMN, kon-dem’, CONDEMNATION, kon-dem-ná-shun:

1. (1) The causative stem of ὑψω-, ῥαθδα, “to de- declare [or make] wrong,” “to condemn,” whether in civil, ethical or religious relations. Taken in this sense the word needs no OT comment (Ex 22 9; Dt 25 1; Job 40 8); “Who then can condemn?” (Job 34 29, AV “make trouble”).

2. ὑψω, “to fine.” “Condemned the land” (2 Ch 36 3 AV; AV “muddled”; RV “angered”; ARV “fined”); “wine of the condemned” (Am 2 8; RV “fined” [unjustly]).

3. The active part. of ὑψω, ἀδερφα, “to judge.” “From those that condemn his soul” (Ps 109 31 AV; RV “that judge his soul”).

The NT usage is much more complicated, both because of the greater number of Gr words rendered “condemn” and “condemnation,” and because AV tr’s the same word in several different ways, apparently with no rule whatever.

1. The most important word is καίνα, κρίνα, “to judge.” From it are a number of derivative vbs. and nouns. RV has rigidly excluded the harsh words “damn” and “damnation,” substituting “judge,” “condemn,” “judgment,” “condemnation.” This is proper, since the word damn (Lat damnum, “to inflict loss” upon a person, “to condemn”), and its derivatives has, in process of time, suffered degradation, so that in modern Eng. it usually refers to eternal punishment. This special application of the word for some cents. ran side by side with the original meaning, but even as late as Wycliffe’s version the word “damn” is usually employed in the sense of condemn, as in Job 9 20, “My mouth shall damme me.” It is even applied to the condemnation of Jesus by the chief priests and scribes (Mk 10 38). This degeneration of the word is perhaps due, as Bishop Sanderson says, “not so much to good acts as to bad manners.” Kría is rendered uniformly “judge” by RV, even where the context compels the thought of condemnation (Jn 3 17 18; 12 47; Acts 7 7; “might be damned,” 2 Thes 2 12 AV; Rom 14 22; Jas 5 9).

2. The more specific sense of condemn, however, is found in κατάκρινα, katókrinó, “to judge one down” (Mt 14 4); “is damned he eat” (Rom 14 23; 1 Cor 11 32 AV; RV “condemned”). See also Mk 18 16; 2 Pet 2 6.

(3) For “condemnation” there is the noun κακία, κρίνα, or κατακρίνα (for accent see Thayer’s Lexicon), in a forensic sense, “the sentence of the judge” (Lk 23 38; Mt 23 14, omitted in RV; “condemnation of the devil” 1 Tim 3 6; 5 12; Jude ver 4).

(4) Much stronger is κακόκρινα, katákrinma, “condemnation” (Rom 5 16 18; 8 1) with reference to the Divine judgment against sin.

(5) κατακρίνε, κρίνα, “the process of judgment,” “tribunal” (Jn 3 19; 5 24), with reference to “the judgment brought by men upon themselves because of their rejection of Christ.”

(6) A stronger word is the adj. κορακάδερφος, akókatákrinós, “self-condemned” (Tit 3 11; cf 1 Jn 3 20 21).

CONDUIT, kon’dút. See CISTERN.

CONEY, ko’ni (François), sháphán [Lev 11 5; Dt 14 7; Ps 104 18; Prov 30 26]: The word “coney” (formerly pronounced cooney) means “rabbit” (from Lat conicus). Sháphán is rendered in all four passages in the LXX κονικός, κατακρίνα, or κατακρίνα, “hedge-hog,” but is now universally considered to refer to the Syrian hyrax, Procavia (or Hyrax) Hyracara, which in southern Pal and Sinai is called in Arab. arar, in northern Pal and Syria typhon, and in southern Arabia shufa, which is etymologically closely akin to sháphán. The word “hyrax” (François, hírás) itself means “mouse” or “shrew-mouse” (cf Lat sorax), so that it seems to have been hard to find a name peculiar to this animal. In Lev 11 5 RVm, we find “rock badger,” which is a tr of kíyíp dáš, the rather inappropriate name given by the Boers to the Cape hyrax. The Syrian hyrax lives in Syria, Pal and Arabia. A number of other species, including several that are arboreal, live in Africa. They are not found in other parts of the world. In size, teeth and habits the Syrian hyrax somewhat resembles the rabbit, though it is different in color, being reddish brown, and lacks the long hind legs of the rabbit. The similarity in dentition is confined to the large size of the front teeth and the presence of a large space between them and the back teeth. But whereas hares have a pair of front teeth on each jaw, the hyrax has one pair above and two below. These teeth differ also in structure from those of the hare and rabbit, not having the persistent pulp which enables the rabbit's front teeth to grow continually as they are worn away. They do not hide among herbage like hares, nor burrow like rabbits, but live in holes or crevices in the rock, frequently in the faces of steep cliffs. Neither the hyrax nor the hare is a ruminant, as seems to be implied in Lev 11:5 and Dt 14:7, but their manner of chewing their food may readily have led them to be thought to chew the cud. The hyrax has four toes in front and three behind; the hare has five. In the tarsus (and in some fossil members of the horse family), all furnished with nails that are almost like hoofs, except the inner hind toes, which have claws. The hyraxes constitute a family of ungulates and, in spite of their small size, have points of resemblance to elephants or rhinoceroses, but are not closely alluded to these or to any other known animals. The camel, the coney and the hare are in the list of unclean animals because they "chew the cud but divide not the hoof," but all three of these are eaten by the Arabs.

The illustration is from a photograph of a group of conies in the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, prepared by Mr. Francis Carruthers, who collected these specimens in a clift in the neighborhood of Tyre. Specimens from the Dead Sea are rarer than those from Syria.

CONFECTION, kon-fek'shun, CONFECTIONARY, kon-fek'shun-'a-ri, CONFECTION-ACY, kon-fek'shun-'a-si: "Confidence" as an adj., in the sense of united or leagued is twice the tr of ἑαυτοῦ, brith, "covenant," in several instances tr league" (Gen 14:13, bατ’, brith, "lord or master of a man as if "thee were c. with Abram"; cf Ps 85:5; once of τῷ, naath, "to rest," "Syria is c. with Ephraim" (Isa 7:2, Rv'm revesth on Ephraim); also 1 Mac 10:47). CONFEDERATE, kon-fed'ə-rat, CONFEDERACY, kon-fed'ə-ras-i: "Confederate" as an adj. in the sense of united or leagued is twice the tr of τῷ, brith, "covenant," in several instances tr league" (Gen 14:13, bατ’, brith, "lord or master of a man as if "thee were c. with Abram"; cf Ps 85:5; once of τῷ, naath, "to rest," "Syria is c. with Ephraim" (Isa 7:2, Rv'm revesth on Ephraim); also 1 Mac 10:47). CONFERENCE, kon-fur', CONFERENCE, kon-fur'en-s: The equivalent of three Gr words of different shades of meaning. In Gal 1 16, προσανατομῆν, prosanatolhmi, had been used in classical writers for resorting to oracles (Lightfoot on Gal 2:6; Eilcott on Gal 1:16); hence, "to take counsel with," "to consult." In Acts 4; 15, συμβάλλεσ; συμβάλλεσ, "to compare views," "discuss;" and in Acts 26 12, συλλαλεσ, συλλαλεσ, "to talk together." Cf the single passage in the OT (1 K 1:7).

CONFESSION, kon-fe'sh'un (πτώς), γαθά; ἐμπλογία, homologē, and their derivatives): The radical meaning is "acknowledgment," "avowal," with the implication of a change of conviction, of course of conduct on the part of the subject. In Eng. "profession" (AV 1 Tim 6:12; He 3:1; 4:14), besides absence of the thought just suggested, emphasizes the publicity of the act. C., like its Gr equivalent, connotes, as its etymology shows (Lat. co, Gr ἐκοι), that the act places one in harmony with others. It is the uniting in a statement that has previously been made by someone else. Of the two Gr words from the same root in the NT, the compound with the Gr preposition ὥν found, among other places, also in Acts 20:28; cf Ga 5:14. Phil 2:11 implies that it has come from an inner impulse, i.e. it is the expression of a conviction of the heart. It is referred anthropologically to God in Job 40:14, where Jehovah says to the patriarch sarcastically: "Then will I also confess of (unto) thee"; and in Rev 3:5, where it means "to recognize" or "acknowledge."

When man is said to confess or make confession, the contents of the confession are variously distinguished. All, however, may be grouped under two heads, confession of faith and confession of sins. Confessions of faith are public acknowledgments of fidelity to God, and to the truth through which God is revealed, as 1 K 8:33. They are declarations of unequalled confidence in Christ, and of surrender to His will, as 1 Cor 10:13. Every one, ... who shall confess me before men." In Phil 2:11, however, c. includes, alongside of willing, also unwilling, acknowledgment of the sovereignty of Jesus. The word c. stands also for everything contained in the Christian religion—"the faith" used in the objective and widest sense, in He 3:1; 4:14. In both these passages, the allusion is to the NT. The "High Priest of our c." (He 3:1) is the High Priest, of whom we learn and with whom we deal in that new revelation, which in that epistle is contrasted with the old.

Confessions of sins are also of various classes: (1) To God alone. Wherever there is true repentance for sin, the penitent freely confesses his guilt to Him, against whom he has sinned. This is described in Ps 32:3-6; cf 1 Jn 1:9; Prov 28:13. Such c. may be made either silently, or, as in Dnl 9:19, orally; it may be general, as in Ps 51, or particular, as when some special sin is recognized; it may extend to what has not been discovered, but which is believed to exist because of recognized inner depravity (Ps 19:12), and thus include the state as well as the acts of sin (Rom 7:18). (2) To one's neighbor, when he has been wronged. (Lk 17:4): "If thou hast sinned against thy neighbor, go and restore him... seven times in the day, and seven times turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him." It is to this form of c. that James refers (5:16): "Confess.... your sins one to another"; cf Mt 5:23 f. (3) To a spiritual adviser or minister of the word, such as the c. of David to Nathan (2 S 12:13), of the multitudes to John in the wilderness (Mt 3:6), of the Ephesians to Paul (Acts 19:18). This c. is a general acknowledgment of sinfulness, and enters into an enumeration of details only when the conscience is particularly burdened. (4) To the entire church, where some crime has created public scandal. As "secret sins are to be rebuked secretly, and public sins publicly," in the apostolic age, where there was genuine penitence for a notorious offence, the acknowledgment was as public as the deed itself. An illustration of this is found in the well-known case at Corinth (cf 1 Cor 5:3 ff with 2 Cor 2:6 f.).

For auricular c. in the sense of the mediaeval and Rom church, there is no authority in Holy Scripture to traceable to the custom of confining those who were about to make a public c. of some notorious offence, and of giving advice concerning how far the circumstances of the sin were CONFIDENCE, kon-fid-ens. (Greek, πίστη, báthos, and forms, πίστις, kefal; πεπίστημι, parrhesía, πείθω, peithó, πιστεύω, pithéw, πεπιστεύω, pepithéw, πεποιθάω, peipotháw; πεποίθησι, peipóthésis; πιστοποιία, pisto póia). The chief Hebrew word tr' confidence (báthāh, and its forms, perhaps, radically, "to be open," showing thus what originated the idea of "confidence"; where there was nothing hidden a person felt; it is very frequently rendered "trust." In Ps 118:8,9 we have "It is better to take refuge in the Lord than to trust in princes," Hebrews in particular confidence in princes, and in 65:5, "O God of our salvation, thou that art the confidence (mibheth) of all the ends of the earth." Mibheth is tr' confidence in Job 18:11; 31:24; Prov 21:22, etc.

Kefal ("firmness," "stoutness") is rendered "confidence" in Prov 3:26, and kefalah in Job 4:6; peithó ("to persuade") is tr' confidence in 2 Cor 2:3; Gal 5:10, etc.; pepithéw, in 2 Cor 1:15; 8:22, etc.; hupostasia ("what stands under"), in 2 Cor 11:17; Heb 3:14; 1 Pet 2:4; parrhesía ("courage," "boldness") is invariably tr' in RV "boldness" (Acts 28:31; He 3:6; 4:16; 10:35; 1 Jn 2:28; 3:21; 5:14); tharáth or tharrhó ("to have good courage") is so tr' in "being therefore always of good courage" (2 Cor 5:6); "I am of good courage concerning you" (2 Cor 7:16), AV "confident" and "confidence.

RV has "confidence" for "hope" (Job 8:14); for "assurance" (Isa 32:17); for "trusting" (2 Cor 3:4); for "same confident boasting" (2 Cor 9:4); "is confident" for "trusted" (Job 40:29); "to have confidence" for "thinketh he hath whereof he might trust" (Phil 3:4); "confidently" for "constantly" (Acts 13:15); "confidently affirm for "affirm" (1 Cor 15:55); "confidently" we have for "his confidence" (Job 18:14), "wherein he trusted," for "with confidence" (Ezk 26:26) "securely therein." The Bible teaches the value of confidence (Isa 30:15; He 10:35), but neither in "gold" (Job 31:24), nor in man, however great (Ps 118:89; Jer 17:5), nor in self (Prov 14:16; Phil 3:3), but in God (Ps 65:5; Prov 3:26; 14:26), as revealed in Christ (Eph 3:12; 1 Jn 3:14).

CONFIRM, kon-fir'm. CONFIRMATION, kon-fir'm-as'han'm: In the OT represented by several Heb words, generally with reference to an increase of external strength, as "e. the feeble knees" (Isa 35:3); "e. the kingdom" (2 K 15:19); "e. inheritance" (Ps 69:9). In the NT, this external, objective sense is expressed by Believa, beha’ìs, as in Mk 16:20; Rom 15:8. The strengthening of mind, purpose, conviction, i.e. the inner or subjective sense (Acts 14:22; 16:32:41) corresponds to επιστείρα, epipítería. Used also of ratifying or making that which is done to appear to be valid (Acts 2:38), a covenant (Gal 3:15). The noun is used in the second sense (He 6:16; Phil 1:7). Confirmation, the rite, in some denominations, of admission to the full communion of the church, which the Rom church has elevated to the place of a sacrament, has only ecclesiastical, but no Scriptural, authority. It is grounded, however, in the Scriptural precedent of the laying on of hands after baptism. See HANDS, IMPOSITION OF.

CONFLICT, kon-flikt' (keyvón, agón, "contest," "fight"). In Phil 1:30, "having the same spirit of Christ ye saw in me," AV; 10:6 in 2 AV "contention"; συμμαχία, athletés (lit. "combat in the public games"), in He 10:32 (AV "fight".) See also Agony.

CONFORM, kon-fôrm', CONFORMABLE, kon-fôrm'-a-ble' (συμμορφωθείν, summormorpho, "to become or be like," or "of the same form"). Indicating an inner change of nature, working into the outward life (Rom 8:29; Phil 3:10:21); while *συμμορφωθείς, suschmatizó, "fashioned according to" (Rom 12:21) RV, AV "conformed," refers to that which is external.

CONFOUND, kon-found': The physical origin of spiritual terms is well illustrated by the principal Heb words for "confounded" (rendered also "ashamed," etc); בִּשָּׁם, bisháh, to become pale (2 K 19:26; Job 6:20; Ps 83:17; 129:5 AV; Isa 19:9, etc); קִּנָּח, qinnáh, "to become red (Ps 35:4; Isa 1:29; 24:23) "the moon shall be confounded," Mic 3:7); יִדְבֹּּך, yadhbash, "to be dried up (Jer 48:24 AV; 48:120 AV; 62:2 AV; Zec 10:5); רֶכֶם, rekem, "to blush (Ps 69:6 AV; Isa 41:11, etc). In Gen 11:7,9, of the confusion of tongues, the word is *משֶׁרֶת, mésháth, "to mix, "mingle." In Jer 1:17 AV it is נָרָּת, naráth, "to bring or put down.

In NT, kataischánó, "to put to shame" (1 Cor 1:27 AV; 1 Pet 2:6 AV); and *συγκίνησιν, "to pour together," "bewilder" (Acts 2:6; 9:22). RV frequently gives "ashamed" and "put to shame" instead of "conformed." W. L. Walker CONFOSSION, kon-fôz'shún (Greek, *καταίσχανον, katalískanó, "ashamed," "shame, paleness," πεπόιθησι, kelmáthm, "blushing," "shame of face," "shame," ἄπαθεία, akatastasis, ἄπαθαι, σιγάται, σιγάταις, στυγνος, στυγνον, στυγνος). In the OT used (Ps 109:29 AV) and kelmáthm (Ps 44:15; Isa 30:3) are the words most frequently tr' "confusion"; toáh, "wastiness," "emptiness" is so tr' (Isa 24:10; 3411; 41:29), also kalón, "lightness," "contempt" (Job 10:15 = ignominia, AV) and tehel, "profanation" (Lev 18:23; 20:12); râ'ash, "shaking," "trembling," rendered "confused" in Isa 9:5 AV; cf. RV. Gr. akatastasis, "instability" is tr' "confusion" (1 Cor 14:33; Jas 3:16); *συγκίνησιν, a pouring out together." (Acts 19:29).

In Wied 14:26, "changing of kind" (AV) is rendered "confusion of sex." W. L. Walker CONGREGATION. See BABEL, TOWER OF; TONGUES, CONFESSION OF.

CONGREGATION, kon-greg-á'shún (Hebrew, *בָּאוֹם, bo'ah; *הַעֲמָדָה, édháh): These two words rendered by "congregation" or "assembly" are used 1. Terms apparently without any difference of Employed sense. They appear to include an assembled or the whole people or an section that might be present on a given occasion. Indeed, sometimes the idea appears to correspond closely to that conveyed by "horde," or even by "crowd." Édháh is once used of bees (Jgs 14:8). It has been sought to distinguish the two words by means of Lev 4:13, "if the whole *édháh of Israel err, and the thing be hid from the eyes of the kôhâl." The kôhâl would then be the smaller body representing the whole 'êdâh, but the general usage is not favorable to this view (compare e.g., Ex 12:19, "cutting off from the 'êdâh of Israel," with Nu 19:20, "cutting off from the kôhâl"). The idea denoted by these words is said by Wellhausen to be "foreign to Heb antiquity," though it "runs through the PC from beginning to end" (PROLEGOMENA, 78). 1 WILKINSON'S view is that this presents us with laws excluding certain classes from the kôhâl, and the word is also found in Gen 49:6; Nu 22:4 (RV "multitude"); Dt 5:22; 9:10; 31:30; Josh 3:5; 1 S 17:47; 1 K 8:14; Mic 2:5, and other early passages. While 'êdâh occurs in 1 K 20:20 (see further, Eerdmans, DAS Buch Esod, 80 f). On the other hand taste and euphony appear to be responsible for the choice of one or other of the words in many cases. Thus the Chronicler uses kôhâl frequently, but 'êdâh only once (2 Ch 5:8 = 1 K 8:5).

Moses provided for the summoning of the congregation by trumpets (Nu 10:2-8). For the sin offering to be brought if the whole congregation errered, Lev 4:13-21.

2. Provisions Ptts 23:1-8 (in Heb 2-9) excludes bastards, Ammonites and Moabites from the assembly, even to the tenth generation, while Edomites and Egyptians were admitted in the third. Those who suffer from certain physical defects are also excluded.

One other word must be noted, מֹדֵד, mōdeḏ. It occurs often in the phrase 'âhel mo'âd ("tent of meeting"; see TABERNACLE). But in Nu 16:2 we find it used of certain princes who were "men of renown called to the assembly."

For מַעַבְד, maḇěḏ, rendered by RV "solemn assembly," see FEASTS. On מַעַבְד, maḇ'āḏ, see CONVOCATION.

HAROLD M. WIENER

CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF (תגּוֹר עֶתְכֶם, har-môḏâd, Isa 14:13): The prophet has depicted the excitement caused in Sheol by the descent of the once mighty king of Babylon into the world of shades, and now himself points the contrast between the monarch's former haughty boastings and his present weak and hopeless condition: "Thou sittest in thy boat, I will ascend into the heavens, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; and I will sit upon the mount of congregation, in the uttermost parts of the north." Instead he is brought "to the uttermost parts of the pit" (ver 15). By the "mount of congregation" (meeting or assembly) is evidently meant the fancied Olympus of the gods on some lofty northern height. The king vaunted that he would make his abode with the gods in heaven; now he is cast down to the depths of Sheol.

JAMES ŒR

CONIAH, kô-nîa' (kening, kōnâyâh, "Jah is creating"): A form of the name Jehoiachin, found in Jer 22:24:28; 37:1. See JEHOIACHIN.

CONONIAH, kon-on'i-ah. See CONANIAH.

CONQUEROR, kon'kâr-ôr: Known only in the compound vb. (עִקֵּרְךָ מְעַסֶּה, haperînkîmen, Rom 8:37): A usual meaning of the preposition in composition is "above all treasures; see Lève're-en-merèn, RV AV. The comparison is to the completeness of the victory. Others may place their enemies in subjection; those here mentioned master not only their foes, but themselves. Others destroy their foes and their resources; while those who are "more than conquerors" convert foes into means of still farther promoting the interests for which they struggle (Rom 3:3-5). Nor is the victory external and transient, but internal and permanent.

CONSCIENCE, kon'shân, (ᾲναισθήσεις, ἥ συνεξελέγης): 1. Sequent Conscience

I. Sequent Conscience. 1. Judicial

This is (1) judicial. No sooner is a decision formed than there ensues a judgment favorable or adverse, a sentence of guilty or not guilty. Conscience has often been compared to a court of law, in which there is the culprit, judge, and jury; but these are all in the subject's own breast, and are in fact himself.

It is (2) punitive. In the individual's own breast are not only the figures of justice already mentioned, but the executioner as well; for, on the back of a sentence of condemnation or acquittal, there immediately follows the pain of a wounded or the satisfaction of an approving conscience; and of all human miseries or blessings this is the most poignant. Esp. has the remorse of an evil conscience impressed the human imagination, in such instances as Cain and Judas, Saul and Herod; and the poets, those knowers of human nature, have found their most moving themes in the delineation of this aspect of human experience. The ancient poets represented the terrors of conscience under the guise of the Erinyses or Furies, who, with swift, silent, unserviceable footsteps, tracked the criminal and pulled him down; while in the Resurrection, in such dramas as Machbeth and Richard the Third, has burned the same lessons into the imagination of all readers of his works.

The satisfaction of a good conscience may stamp itself on the habitual serenity of one face, and the accusations of an evil conscience may impart a hunted and sinister expression to another (cf Wisd 17:11).

It is (3) predictive. There is no instinct in the soul of man more august than the anticipation of something after death—at a tribunal at which the whole of life will be reviewed and retribution awarded with perfect justice according to the deeds done in the body. It is this which imparts to death its solemnity; we instinctively know that we are going to our account. And such great natural instincts cannot be false.

It is (4) social. Not only does a man's own conscience pass sentence on his conduct, but the conscience of others pass sentence on it too; and to this may be due a great intensification of the consequent sensations. Thus, a crime may lie hidden in the memory, and the pain of its guilt may be assuaged by the action of time, when suddenly and unexpectedly it is found out and exposed to the knowledge of all; and, only when the force of the public conscience breaks forth on the culprit, driving him from society, does he feel his guilt in all its magnitude. The "Day of Judgment" (q.v.), as it is represented in Scripture, is an application of this principle on a vast scale; for there the character and conduct of every one will be submitted to the conscience of all. On the other hand, a friend may be to a man a second conscience, by which his own conscience is coopted or abrogated. We are from without, in some cases, be, even more than the judgment within, an encouragement to everything that is good or a protection against temptation.

II. Antecedent Conscience. —From the Sequent is distinguished the Antecedent Conscience, which designates a function of this faculty preceding moral decision or action. When the will stands at the parting of the ways, seeing clearly before it the right course and the wrong, conscience commands to strike into the one and forbids to choose the other. This is its imperative; and—employing the language of Kant—it is a categorical imperative. What conscience commands may be apparently against our interests, and it may be completely contrary to our inclinations; it may be opposed to the advice of friends or to the solicitations of companions; it may contradict the decrees of principalities and powers or the voices of the multitude; yet it is not withdrawn by any of these to modify its claim. We may fail to obey, giving way to passion or being overborne by the allurements of temptation; but we know that we ought to obey; it is our duty; and this is a sublime and sacred sense of guilt, of a great other, conscience issuing one command and self-interest or passion or authority another, and the question has to be decided which of the two is to be obeyed. The interpreters of human life have known how to make use of such moments, and many of the most memorable scenes in literature are of this nature; but the actual history of mankind has also been dignified with numerous instances in which confessors and martyrs, standing on the same ground, have faced death rather than contravene the dictates of the authority within; and there never passes an hour in which the eye of the All-seeing does not behold someone on earth putting aside the bribes of self-interest or the menaces of authority and paying tribute to conscience by doing the right and taking the consequences.

III. Intuitional and Associational Theories. —Up to this point there is little difficulty or difference of opinion as to what we understand by very differing views emerge. It was remarked above, that when anyone stands at the parting of the ways, seeing clearly the right course and the wrong, conscience imperatively commands him which to choose and which to avoid; but how does anyone know which of the two alternatives is the right and which the wrong? Does conscience still suffice here, or is he dependent on another faculty? Here the Intuitional and the Associational, or—speaking generally—the Scotch, the German and the French schools of ethics diverge, those on the one side holding that conscience has still essential guidance to give, while those on the other maintain that the guidance must now be undertaken by other faculties. The Sensationalist or Experimental school holds that we are dependent on the authority of society or on our own estimate of the consequences of actions, while the opposite school teaches that in the conscience there is a clear revelation of certain moral laws, approving certain principles of action and disapproving others. The strong point of the former view is the diversity which has existed among human beings in different ages and in different latitudes as to what is right and what is wrong. What was virtuous in Athens may be iniquitous in Athens; what is chivalrous in feudalism may be as heroism in Japan may be despised as foolhardiness in Britain. To this it may be replied, first, that the diversity has been greatly exaggerated; the unanimity of the human conscience under all skies being greater than is allowed by the philosophic historian, and, secondly, the world, says Butler, "before he engages in any course of action, ask himself, Is this I am going about right, or is it wrong? Is it good, or is it evil? and I do not in the least doubt but that this question will be answered accordingly to truth and virtue by almost any fair man in almost any circumstances." Then, there are many moral judgments supposed to be immediate verdicts of conscience which are really logical inferences from the utterances of this faculty and are liable to all the fallacies by which reasoning in any department of human affairs is beset. It is only for the major premise, not for the conclusion, that conscience is responsible. The strong point of the Intuitional school, on the other hand, is the power and right of the individual to break away from the habits of society, and, in defiance of the commands of authority or the voices of the multitude, to follow a course of his own. When he does so, is it a logical conclusion as to the consequences of a certain action or inaction? When, for example, Christianity announced the sinfulness of fornication in opposition to the laxity of Greece and Rome, was it an argument about consequences with which she operated successfully, or was the reason she held the outcry at the back of the actions and opinions of heathendom? The lettering of the moral law may have to be picked out and cleansed from the accumulations of time, but the inscription is there all the same.

IV. The Education of Conscience. —It may be, however, that a more exact analysis of the antecedent conscience is requisite. Between the categorical imperative, which commands to choose the right path and avoid the wrong, and the indicative, which declares that this is the right way and that the wrong, there ought perhaps to be assumed a certainty that one of the alternatives is right and must be pursued at all hazards, while the other is wrong and must be abandoned at whatever cost. This perception, that moral distinctions exist, separate from each other as heaven and hell, is the peculiar quality of conscience; but it does not exclude the necessity for taking time to ascertain, in every instance, which of the alternatives has the one character and the other, to the point at which the one possesses a great variety of knowledge to make this sure. Those who would limit conscience to the faculty which utters the major premises of moral reasoning are wont to hold that it can never err and does not admit of being educated; but such a use of the term is too remote from common usage, and there must be room left for the conscience to enlighten itself by making acquaintance with such objective standards as the character of God, the example of Christ, and the teachings of the wise and the experience of the good.

Another question of great interest about the conscience is, whether it involves an intuition of God. When it is suffering the pain of remorse, is it that inflicts the punishment? Is it only the conscience itself? Or is man, in such experiences, aware of the existence of a Being outside of and above himself? When the will is about to act, it receives the command to choose the right and refuse the wrong; but who issues this command? Is it only itself, or does the importance and solemnity betokening a higher origin? Conscience is an intuition of moral law—the reading, so to speak, of a luminous writing, which hangs out there, or is it the bosom of Nature—but who penned that writing? It is admitted that conscience, Conscience implied, in its very structure, a reference to God, meaning lit. "knowledge along with another," the other being God. Though this derivation be uncertain, many think that it exactly expresses the truth. There are few people with an ethical experience of any depth who have not sometimes been overwhelmingly conscious of the approval or disapproval of an uncle. Being; and, if there be any trustworthy argument for the existence of a Deity, prior to supernatural revelation, this is where it is to be found.

V. History and Literature.—Only a few indications of history can be given here. The conscience, at least the conscience, which was identified in the ancient world, and the power of preparation conscience, the Monasticism, Rothe in comprehending was because, Cor into the heavens (Gen 3:8); and, in the very next incident, the blood of Abel cries out to heaven from the ground (Gen 4:10). In the NT the word conscience typically occurs in the speeches (Acts 24:16, etc.) and writings of St. Paul (Rom 2:15; 9:1; 13:5; 1 Cor 6:7–12, etc); and this might have been expected to secure for it a prominent place in the doctrine of the church. But this did not immediately take effect, although Chrysostom already speaks of Conscience and Nature as two books in which the human mind can read of God, previous to supernatural revelation. In the Middle Ages the conscience received from two sources of stimulation. One was the Speculative Trend: both the title and name were certain to come into greater prominence in the speculations of the schools. The one of these influences was the rise of Monasticism, which, driving human beings into solitude, made the movements of their own minds the objects of everlasting study to themselves; and the other was the practice of auricular confession, which became, especially to many of the inmates of the houses of religion, the most interesting business of life. It is doubtless true that the confessors, they scanned every thought and weighed every scruple, becoming adepts at introspection and self-discipline. Thus it came to pass that ethics took the form of Cases of Conscience, the priest having to train the sinner to think for himself; and, as the confessors, they scanned every thought and weighed every scruple, becoming adepts at introspection and self-discipline.

2. The Reformation and After

At the Reformation the conscience was much in the mouths of men, both because the terrors of conscience formed a preparation for discarding the old order, and because, in appearing before principalities and powers in vindication of their action, the Reformers took their stand on conscience, as Luther did, not only in his famous sermon at Worms; and the assertion of the rights of conscience has ever since been a conspicuous testimony of Protestantism; whereas Romanists, especially as represented by the Jesuits, have treated the conscience as a feeble and ignorant thing, requiring to be led by authority—that is, by themselves. The forms of mediaevalism long clung even to Protestant lit. on this subject. It may not be surprising to find a High Churchman like Jeremy Taylor, in his _Doctor Dubitandum_, discussing ethics as a system of cases of conscience, but it is curious to find a Puritan like Baxter (in his _Christian Directory_), and a Scottish Presbyterian like David Dickson (in his _Therapeutica Sacra_) doing the same. Deism in England and the Enlightenment in Germany magnified the revelation which the saints had described as a power of revealing God as made any further revelation unnecessary; but the practical effect was a secularization and vulgarization of the general mind; and it was against these rather than the system which had produced them that Butler in England and Kant in Germany had to raise the standard of a spiritual view of life. The former said of the conscience that, if it had power as it had rights, it could absolutely govern the world; and Kant's sublime saying is well known at the close of his great work on _Ethics_: "Two things fill the soul with ever new and growing wonder and reverence, the often and the longer reflection continues to lay hold on itself in the starry heavens above and the moral law within." The rise of an Associational and Developmental Philosophy in England, represented by such powerful thinkers as the Mills, father and son, Professor Bain and Herbert Spencer, tended to remove the halo surrounding the conscience, by representing it as merely an emotional equivalent for the authority of law and the claims of custom, so stamped on the mind by the experience of generations that, its earthly source forgotten, it came to be attached to supernatural powers. But this school was antagonized with success by such thinkers as Martineau and T. H. Green. R. Rothe regarded conscience as a term too popular and of too variable signification to be of much use in philosophical speculation; but most of the great succession of writers on Christian ethics who followed him have treated it seriously; Dörner esp. recognizing its importance, and Newman Smyth bestowing on it a thorough modern treatment. There are few books on the subject that of Gass, which contains an appendix on the history of the term _synderesis_, is deserving of special attention; that by Köhler is unfinished, as is also the work in Eng. by Robertson; _The Christian Conscience_ is a work by a trained professor and an introduction to the subject. Weighty discussions will be found in two books on Moral Philosophy—the _Handbook of Calderwood_, and the _Ethics_ of Mises. But there is abundance of room for a great monograph on the subject, which would treat conscience in a comprehensive manner as the subjective standard of conduct, formed by progressive familiarity with the objective standards as well as by practice in accordance with its own authority and with the will of God.

CONSECRATE, kon'sēkrāt. CONSECRATION, kon'sēkrā'shən: In the OT for several Heb words of different meanings:

1. in the service of Jeh (Mic 4:13). See _ban_, OT.
2. _nāzar_ (Num 6:7, 12; _RV “separate”_). See _Nazarite_.
3. _kādēsh_; _kā'dēsh_; _kāh-dēsh_; "to be set apart," or "to be holy": of Aaron and his sons (Ex 28:3; 30:30; RV "sanctify"). The silver and gold and brass and iron of the banned city of Jericho are "consecrated" things (RV "holy") unto the Lord (Josh 6:19); of the priests (2 Ch 26:18); of sacrifices (2 Ch 29:33; 31:6; 2 Esd 3:5). See HOLINESS.

(4) צָלַל, millê' yâdah, lit. "to fill the hand"; and subst. pl. צָלָל, millû'îm, a peculiar idiom used frequently and generally for the installation of a priest into his office; and subst. for the installation offerings which were probably put into the priest's hands to symbolize his admission into office; hence the phrase, "and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons" (Ex 29:9; so 28:41; 29:33.35; 32:29; Lev 8:33; 16:32; 21:10; Nu 3:3; Jos 17:5.12; 2 Ch 29:31); of Jeroboam's non-Levitical priesthood (1 K 13:33; 2 Ch 13:9); of the altar (Ezk 43:20) and of these who contributed to build the temple (1 Ch 29:5). Subst. of an act of installation (Lev 7:37; 8:33), and of installation offerings (Ex 29:22.26.27.31; Lev 8:22.28.29.31).

2. In the NT transl., teleînô, "to make perfect" (He 7:28; RV "perfected"); εὐφαυίζει, εὐφαίνιζο, "to make new" (He 10:20; RV "dedicated"). T. Rees CONSENT, kon-sent'. The vb. implies compliance with the guidance and direction of another, and, therefore, a secondary and subordinate relation of approval, sympathy and cooperation to the part of the one who consents, He does not take the initiative, but yields to what the principal proposes. The phrase is commonly in the Greek, e.g. συμφωνεῖν, "by consent," means "by mutual agreement" (1 Cor 7:5), both parties concerned being placed on an equality. With one consent" (Zeph 3:9, Heb "with one shoulder"; Lk 14:18) suggests, though it does not necessarily imply, the result of deliberation and consultation; it may have no other force than that of unanimity.

CONSIDER, kon-sid'ër. In the NT the force of the word is brought out most vividly in Mt 6:26 (καταμαθάω, katamatánâô), where it means to "examine closely"; as though the observer had to bend down for this purpose, and in Lk 12:27; He 10:24 (katematô, to "observe well"), while in He 13:7 (the anathêthô - look up towards or "look again at") is consistent with the reverential regard commented on in the context. Used in the OT for a variety of Heb terms, signifying inspecting (Prov 31:16), examining (Lev 13:13), giving serious thoughts to (Ps 77:1; 139:1), it often means little more than "see" or "behold" (Ps 8:3; 9:13). H. E. Jacobs CONSIST, kon-sist'. (συνιστάμαι, sunistamâi): To stand together, exist, subsist (Col 1:17, "in him all things consist," i.e. the continuation of the universe is dependent upon His support and administration). In Lk 12:15, it is the vb. elî, eimi, "to be," to express the thought that wealth is only an accident, not an essential to the highest ideal of life.

CONSOLATION, kon-sôl'a-shun (παρακλητής, paraklêthis): "Consolation of Israel" (Lk 2:25), refers to the fulfillment of the promises in Isa 40:1 ff. See COMFORT. "Son of consolation" (Acts 4:36 AV and ARVM); see BANNERAS.

CONSORT, kon-sôrt' (προσαλλόω, prosklêrôô, "to allot," Acts 17:4). The vb. may be either in the middle or passive voice, RV, AV, and Luther's German tr regard it as middle, and render it: "cast their lot with, associated, and united with." In advocacy of the passive, see Alford's Greek Testament, proposing: "were added," as if by lot, the allotment being determined by God who gave them the Holy Spirit directing their choice. The Eng. has the Lat. for "lot" as its base.

CONSPIRACY, kon-spir'ä-si. See CONFEDERACY.

CONSTANT, kon'stant', CONSTANTLY, kon-stant'-li: In 1 Ch 28 (kîdzâk) meaning "firm," "strong." In Prov 21:28 the advb. ("constantly") of AV is replaced in RV by "shall speak so as to endure." RV "unchallenged" (2 Ch 21:2) "(2 confi- dently)" for AV "constantly" in Acts 12:15; Tit 3:8.

CONSPEL, kon-sôp'lä, kon-sôp-əl, kon-stran', kon-stránt': Generally in the sense of pressing urgently (2 K 4:8; Lk 24:29; Acts 16:15), to impel or carry away (2 Cor 5:14); sometimes to be compelled of necessity (Job 32:18; Acts 28:19; cf Gal 6:12). See COMPEL.

CONSULT, kon-sult' (πριγμαντου, ehd'al, é'pō, málak, kon-sult', kon-sult', kon-sil, kon-sil'). See ASTRONOMY, II, 11.

CONSTRAIN, kon-strân': Generally in the sense of pressing urgently (2 K 4:8; Lk 24:29; Acts 16:15), to impel or carry away (2 Cor 5:14); sometimes to be compelled of necessity (Job 32:18; Acts 28:19; cf Gal 6:12). See COMPEL.

CONFUSED, kon-sôf'ëd, kon-sôf'-ëd. (Gen 41:40; Ex 15:7; Ps 78:65, etc); kôl'dâ ("to finish") is also frequently tr""con- sume," "consumed" (Gen 31:30; Ex 32:10; Ps 59:13, etc); tâmâm, to "be perfect," "(finished" (Nu 17:13; Dt 25:15; Ps 73:19, etc). There are many other words tr""consume" and "consumed," e.g. ἐφύκα, "to end" (Jer 8:14; Dal 26:12; 33:23); balâd, "to fade", "wear away" (Job 13:28; Ps 49:14); ὑστασία, involving violence (Job 24:19); ἑστήκα, "to end" (Gen 19:15.17; Isa 7:20, etc); ἀκοφείλε, "to be old" (Ps 6:7; 31:9.10 AV); mágôkâ, "to become complete" (Ezk 4:17; Zech 1:7); kôl'dâ is rendered "utterly consumed" (Neh 9:31); αναλίσκω, to "use up," occurs in Lk 9:54; Gal 5:15; 2 Thess 2:8 (AV); dâpâdâ, "to spend," is tr""con- sume" in Jas 4:3 (RV "spend"); katalánaskô, "to consume utterly," occurs only in He 12:29; "for our God is a consuming fire.

In RV "devour," "devoured" are several times substituted for "consume," "consumed," e.g. Job 20:26; Jer 49:27; Nu 16:55; "boil well" (Ezk 34:10); for "be consumed with dying" (Nu 26:13); "perish all of us," "consume" is tr""corrupt"" in Mt 6:19; "my breath is consumed," for "my breath is corrupt" (Job 17:1); instead of "the flame consume the chaff" (Isa 5:6) we have "as the dry grass sinketh down in the flame; and for "what shall the Lord shall consume" (2 Thess 2:8). RV reads (after a different text) "whom the Lord Jesus shall slay," "consume" in ARVM.

CONSUMMATION, kon-su-mâ'shun (τέλεσθαι, ki-dîl森, fr rîç, kôl'dâ): The word, meaning destruction, completion, or failing (Isa 10:23; 28:22; Dan 9:27) is tr""interchangeably in the AV for another CONSUMPTION, kon-sup\'shun (\'k\'sum-\'), sha-hep\'th, "wasting away"): One of the punishments which was to follow neglect or breach of the law. It may mean pulmonary consumption, which occurs frequently in Pal; but from its association with fever in the texts, Lev 26:16; De 28:22, it is more likely to be the much more common condition of wasting and emaciation from prolonged or often recurring attacks of malarial fever.

CONTAIN, kon-t\'n. See CONTINUITY.

CONTEND, kon-tend', CONTENTION, kon-ten\'shun: The meeting of effort by effort, striving against opposition, or, in the bawdy sense, to keep up the battle (De 2:9), or with horses (Jer 13:5), sometimes orally (Neh 13:11), sometimes spiritually (Isa 57:16). In the NT διακρινειν, diakrin\'ein, for the hostile separation of one from another, dispute (Jude ver 9), or ἐκτοιναί, ekt\'o\'nai, esp. diakrin\'o\'nai, the effect of the strain to which a contestant is put. The noun is almost universally used with an unfavorable meaning, and as worthy of condemnation, for an altercation arising from a quarrelsome disposition. "By pride cometh only contention" (Prov 13:10). The contentions at Corinth (1 Cor 1:11) called forth the rebukes of Paul. Where used in AV in a good sense (1 Thes 2:2) RV has "conflict." In Acts 15:39, the noun has a peculiar force, where RV translates it "contention" (παραξεναι) by "sharp contention." The Gr word refer rather to the inner excitement and irritation than to its outward expression.

CONTENT, kon-tent', CONTENTMENT, kon-tent\'ment (\'k\'tent, ya\'al; ἀπειθέω, ark\'ēō): To be free from care because of satisfaction with what is already one's own. The Heb means simply "to be pleased." The Gr brings out the full force of the word in 1 Tim 6:8; Heb 13:5. Contentment (1 Tim 6:6) is more inward than satisfaction; the former is more a state of mind, the latter has to do with some particular occurrence or object.

CONTINUITY, kon-ti-nen-si (\'kyoo\-naren\-si, eg\'-krit\'e\'-o\'-mey, "to have self-control" or "continence") RV, "to contain" AV: Paul, although he would that all men were like himself unmarried, yet advises that they should marry if they cannot control their sexual passions, and hold them in complete subjection to Christian motives (1 Cor 7:9). The same Gr vb. is used in 1 Cor 9:25, and τρε\'-"is temperate" (AV and ERV) of the athlete who during the period of training abstains from all indulgence in food, drink, and sexual passion. For the general principle as expressed in subst. ekgr\'e\'-tik\'a (Acts 24:25; Gal 5:23; 2 Pet 1:6) and adj. ekgr\'e\'-tik\'os (Tit 1:8) see TEMPERANCE, TEMPERATE. T. Rees

CONTINUAL, kon-tin\'a-l, CONTINUALLY, kon-tin\'o\'-a-li: Without cessation, although there may be intervals between its presence; that which regularly recurs throughout a period, as Lk 24:53: [They] were continually in the temple]; "lest by her continual coming" (Lk 18:5). In OT for Heb ṣādāh, "pursue," as one drop of rain follows another in swift succession, but more frequently by tämdūd for offerings repeated at intervals, as Ex 29:42; occasionally the Heb has the phrase lit. meaning "all the day" (kol ha-yom), as Gen 8:5. In the NT most frequently for ἀγωνία, "through all" ("always" Mt 18:18; He 13:15), "sometimes," αἰδαλίητος, "incessantly" (Rom 9:2 AV) and διενέκ\'ēs, "continuously" (He 7:3).

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

CONTRADICT, kon-tra-lk\'shun: AV for ἀντιλόγια, antilog\'ia (He 7:7; 12:3). In the former passage, RV has "without any dispute," i.e. what has been said requires no argument; in the latter "quarreling," which is scarcely an improvement, the reference being to oral attacks upon the words and character of Jesus.

CONTRARY, kon-tra-ri (\'k\'tr, kər\-\'; i\'-nart, en\'-nartos), enantios): In the OT it has the sense of antagonistic, as one opposed to the other, esp. in Lev 26:21,23,24,27,28,40,41, where Jeh declares His attitude toward the people in such phrases as: "If ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk c. unto me; then I will walk c. unto you in wrath."

In the NT it has a more varied significance and is applied to both material and human relations as simply opposite, set over against an object or thing. Used of the wind as in Mt 14:24; Mk 6:48; Acts 27:4, where it is spoken of as "the contrary wind." Refers also to conflicting doctrines, customs or beliefs, as 1 Tim 1:10, "and if there be any other thing c. to the sound doctrine." Several other Gr words are τρε\'-with almost an identical meaning. Occasionally a prefix gives a slightly different shade of meaning.

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

CONTRIBUTION, kon-tri-bu\'-shun (kou\'-v\'ri\'-a, ko\'-n\'n\'ni\'-a, "communion" or "fellowship," Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 9:13): The meaning "contribution" is drawn from the context, rather than from the Gr word. The phrase in the passage cited, lit. rendered, would be "to exercise" or "put fellowhip into activity." The ko\'-n\'n\'ni\'-a subsisting among believers because of their inner communion with Christ placeth them and their gifts and possessions at the service of one another (see COMMUNION). They are enjoined not to forget to communicate (He 13:16). To be "communicative" (ko\'-n\'n\'nikol) is to be a habit of their lives, the Christian principle being that of the holding of all property as a trust, to be distributed as there is need (Acts 2:44; 2 Cor 8:14ff.). The first occasion for calling this fellowship into activity, by way of "contributions," was within the church at Jerus and for its needy members (see COMMUNITY or Goons). The second occasion was repeatedly from the infant gentile churches for the poor within the same church (Acts 11:29; Rom 16:26; 2 Cor 8:1-4; 9:2); the fellowship thus widening from intra-congregational to general church benevolence. These contributions were gathered weekly (Acts 2:44; 2 Cor 8:1-4; 9:2), were proportioned to the means of the givers (Acts 11:29; 1 Cor 16:2), were not exacted or prescribed, in a legalistic manner, but were called forth as the free-will offerings of grateful hearts (2 Cor 8:7), spirit moved, and was used for the public service of the spirit, and were sent to their destination by accredited representatives of the congregations (1 Cor 16:3; Acts 11:30).

H. E. JACOBS
CONTRITE, kon'trît, CONTRITION, kon-trish'un (נָדַק, ᵖדָקְד, 'bruise'): Only in OT (Ps 34 18; Ps 61 17; Isa 57 15; נָדַק, nakhakh, 'smitten' (Isa 66 2)). Contrite, "crushed," is only the superlative of "broken"; "a contrite heart" is "a heart broken to pieces." In Holy Scripture, the heart is the seat of all feeling, whether joy or sorrow. A contrite heart is one in which the natural pride and self-sufficiency have been completely humbled by the consciousness of guilt. The theological term "contrition" designates more than is found in these passages. It refers to the grief associated with the recognition of sin made by the preaching of the law (Jer 23 29). The Augsburg Confession (Art. XII) analyzes repentance into two parts: "Contrition and faith," the one the fruit of the preaching of the law, the other of the gospel. While c. has its degrees, and is not equal in all persons, the promise of forgiveness is not dependent upon the degree of contrition, but solely upon the merit of Christ. It is not simply a pre-condition of faith, but, as hatred of sin, combined with the purpose, by God's aid, to overcome it, grows with faith. H. E. Jacobs

CONTROVERSY, kon'tro-vérs-i (Σόφος), ráth, "strife," "contention," ὀμολογωμένος, homológo-mén-ós, "confessedly," "without controversy": Used frequently of disputes among men (as Dt 17 8) and then transferred to the justice of God as directed against the sins of men. Thus we read of Jeh's controversy with the nations (Jer 26 31); with the inhabitants of the land ( Hos 4 1); with His people (Mic 6 2). "Without controversy" (1 Tim 3 16), a positive rather than a negative expression, "by common consent," or better, "as unanimously confessed," introducing a quotation from a hymn or rhetorical confession of the early church. H. E. Jacobs

CONVENIENT, kon-vén'yent: In RV limited to τρ of καύρος, καιρύς, "suitable time," "season," and its compounds: "that which is seasonable" or "opportune" (Mk 6 21; Acts 24 26). AV is replaced, in Prov 30 8 RV, by "needful" (Heb ἀξιόλογον) "feed me with the food that is needful for me": Jer 40 4, by "right"; Eph 5 4, by "befitting"; in Rom 1 28, by "fitting," and in 1 Cor 16 12, by "opportunely." CONVENT, kon-vent': Found in the AVm of Jer 49 19: "Who will convert me in judgment?" and in Jer 50 44: "Who will convert me to plead?" The Heb term which is rendered convert is יָדַד, and it means to summon to a court, to call on to plead. Convert is obsolete, but it was formerly used, and meant to summon, or to call before a judge. Shakespeare used it several times. In King Henry IV, Act V, he says to Hal, "The lords of the council hath commanded that the archbishop be converted to the council board." CONVERSANT, kon-vür'sant (יוֹדַד, kalakh, "to go on," "to walk"): This word is τρ "conversant" in Jos 8 35 AV (m "walked"), and 1 25 15 AV meaning "going along with them," ARV "went." CONVERSATION, kon-vür'sa-shun (ἀναστραφόν, anastraphó, ἀναστράφη, anástraphē, homilia): This word is another illustration of the changes which time makes in a living language. The modern sense of the term is mutual talk, colloquy, but in AV it never means that, but always behavior, conduct. This broader meaning, at a time not much later than the date of AV, began to yield to the special, limited one of today, perhaps as has been suggested, because speech forms so large a part of conduct. The NT words for "converse" in the modern sense are ἀκολούθοι (Lk 24 14 15; Acts 20 11) and συνανωτήτως (Acts 10 27).

(1) In the OT, the word used to indicate conduct is תֹּרָה, derekh, "way," the course one travels (AV Ps 37 14; m 50 23). It is the common Heb idea of conduct, possibly due, as Hatch thinks, to the fact that in Syria intercourse between village and village was so much on foot, with difficulty on stony tracks over the hills, and this is reflected in the metaphors of "turning", "walking", etc.

(2) In the NT the idea of deportment is once rendered by τρόπος, "Let your c. be without covetousness" (He 13 5 AV; RV "be ye free from the love of money"); RVm "let your turn of mind be free." But in the NT, the word is more often used in the phrase "turning up and down," possibly due to the fact, as Hatch again avers, that life in the bustling streets of Athens and Rome gave rise to the conception of life as quick motion to and fro. "Ye have heard of my c." (Gal 1 14 AV; Romans 2 11 RVm). See also Eph 4 22; 1 Tim 4 12; He 13 7; "Let him show out of a good c." (Jas 3 13 AV; RV "by his good life"); "vexed with the filthy c." (2 Pet 2 7 AV; RV "vexful lives"); "holy c." (2 Pet 3 3 AV; RV "holy living"); "our c. is in heaven" (Phil 3 20 AV; RV "citizenship") (q.v.). See also in the Apoc (1Ob 4 14; 2 Macc 6 8).

The τρα in the Revisions put a wholesome emphasis upon conduct, and eliminate the danger of a much misunderstood wording. See further Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek. G. H. Trever CONVERSION, kon-vür-shun: 1. The Words "Conversion," "Convert," in Biblical Usage.—The noun "conversion" (ἐπιστροφή, epistrophē) occurs in only one passage in the Bible, "They passed through both English Phoenixia and Samaaria, declaring the Bible conversion of the Gentiles" (Acts 15 3). Derived forms of the vb. "convert" are used in the RV in Jas 5 19, "convert," "converted" (5 20), "converted" (Ps 51 13, m "return"), "converts" (Isa 1 27, m "they that return"). In later instances derived forms of the vb. "convert" the RV employs "turn again" ( Isa 6 10; Lk 22 32; Acts 3 19), or "turn" (Isa 60 5; Mt 15 15; 18 8; Mk 4 12; Jn 12 40; Acts 28 27); Ps 19 7 the reading of the AV; "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; it has been changed by the revisers into "restoring the soul." The words commonly used in the Eng. Bible as equivalent with the Heb and Gr terms are "turn," "return," "turn back," "turn again" (cf Dt 4 30; Isa 55 7; Jer 13 12 ff.; Ezek 16 53; Zeph 3 7). (3) In the fig., ethical or religious sense (a) from God (Nu 14 43; 1 S 15 11; 1 K 9 6); (b) more frequently to turn back to God (Isa 1: 9 38; Isa 19 22; Joel 2 12; Am 4 6 ff.; Hos 6 11; 10 10). The words used in the LXX and NT are ἀρρενοφόρος, stróphēm, and its compounds, ἀρρεν, ἀρρενα, ἀρρεναῖος, ἀρρεναν, ὁροστρόφης, ἀρρενοστρόφης, ἀρρεναστικόν, ὁροστρόφεια, ὁροστρόφειτος. The latter word occurs 39 times in the NT. It is used (1) in the lit. sense in Mt 9 22; 10 13; 24 18; Acts 9 40; 16 36, etc; (2) in the fig. sense, in transformative (Lk 1 16; Jas 5 19). In Lk 2 10; 2 11 it does not turn from the right way to the wrong. The opposite meaning, to turn from the right way to the right, we find in Lk 22 32; Acts 9 35; 11 21; 14 15; 16 19; 28 15; 2 Cor 10; 1 Thess 1 9; 1 Pet 2 25. In connection with metanoiein, "repent," it is used in Acts 3 19;

26 20. The root word strephos is used in the fig. sense in Mt 18 3; Jn 12 40. LXX and TR have here epistrephos.

3. In the NT. In the experience of heathen who turn from the worship of idols to faith in Jesus Christ. A sudden crisis is frequently witnessed in the case of persons who, having lived a life of flagrant sin, renounce their former life. Conversion to them means a complete revolution in their thoughts, feelings and outward manner of life. In other instances conversion appears to be the climax of a prolonged conflict for supremacy of divergent motives; and, again, it may be the goal of a gradual growth, the consummation of a process of discerning ever more clearly and yielding ever more definitely and thus experiencing ever more vitally truths which have been implanted and nurtured by Christian training. This process results in the conversion of the ordinary Christian, to the Saviour and in the consecration of life to His service.

Thus conversion may be an instantaneous act, or a process which is more or less prolonged. The latter is more frequently seen in the case of children and young people who have grown up in Christian families and have received the benefit of Christian training.
No conversions of this kind are recorded in the NT. This may be explained by the fact that most of our NT writings are addressed to the first generation of Christians, to men and women who were raised in Jewish legalism or heathen idolatry, and who turned to Christ after they had passed the age of adolescence. The religious life of their children as distinguished in its mode and manifestations from that of the adults does not appear to have been a matter of discussion or a source of perplexity so as to call forth specific instruction.

Conversion comprises the characteristics both of repentance and of faith. Repentance is conversion viewed from the point of view of the turning from the former life; faith indicates the objective point of conversion, the turning to God.

Of late the psychology of conversion has been carefully studied and elaborately treated by psychologists. Much has been gathered. It is shown that
4. Conversion and Psychology particularly susceptible to religious influences (of G. Stanley Hall, Adolescence, II, ch. xiv; E. D. Starbuck, Psychology of Religion, etc). Yet conversion cannot be explained as a natural process, conditioned by physiological changes in the adolescent, esp. by approaching puberty. The laws of psychology are certainly God's laws as much as all other laws of Nature. His Spirit works in harmony with His own laws. But in genuine conversion there is always at work in a direct and immediate manner the Spirit of God to which man, be he adolescent or adult, consciously responds. Any attempt to explain conversion by eliminating the direct working of the Divine Spirit falls short of the mark. See REGENERATION; Repentance.

LITERATURE.—See REGENERATION.

CONVICT, kon-vikt', CONVICTION, kon-vikh'- shun (κωνβική, eligēchó, and compounds, "to prove guilty"); Usual tr of Ev, where AV has "convince," as in Jn 8 46; Tit 1 9; Jas 3 9; once also replacing AV "reprieve" (Jn 16 8), while RV changes AV "convince" into "reprieve" in 1 Cor 14 24. It always implies the presentation of evidence. It is a decision presumed to be based upon a careful and discriminating consideration of all the proofs offered, and has a legal character, the verdict being rendered either by God's judgment (Rom 3 19) or before men (Jn 8 46) by an appeal to their consciences in which God's law is written (Rom 2 15). Since such conviction is addressed to the heart of the guilty, as well as concerning him exter-ingly, the word "convict" is sometimes substituted.

To "convict . . . in respect of righteousness, and of decision . . ." (Jn 16 8), refers to the conviction of the inadequacy and perversity of the ordinary, natural standards of righteousness and judgment, and the approval of those found in Christ, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, as the great interpreter and applier of the word of Christ.
H. E. Jacobs

CONVINCE, kon-vins' (δικάσεως, ελέησον): Another form etymologically of "convict," means to bring to a decision concerning the truth or the fals-hood of a proposition (Job 32 12). As usually applied to what is of a more individual and private character, and having reference to what is either good or bad in itself without moral quality, it has given way in RV to either "convict," "reprove," or "confute." See CONVICT.

CONVOCATION, kon-v6-k6'shun: A rendering for συνέλευσις, συνέσως, chiefly in the frequent "Holy Convocation"; but the word is sometimes used alone, e.g. Nu 10 2; Isa 1 13; 4 5. On a holy convocation no work could be done. The phrase differs from "solemn assembly," which in the Pent is only applied to the concluding festivals at the end of Passover and Tabernacles, while "Holy Convocation" is used of the Sabbath and all the great holy days of the Mosaic legislation.

CONVULSING, kon-vul'sing (Mk 1 26 m [AV torn]). See Unclean Spirit.

COOKING, k6'king. See Food.

COOL, cool (קָוִד, rūh, "wind"); καταψῦχω, kata-psūchō, "to cool down": "Cool of the day" (Gen 3 8, m "wind"), when the evening breeze has tempered the heat of the day, enabling Orientals to walk abroad. "Cool my tongue" (Lk 16 24), a phrase reflecting the Jewish notion that Abraham had the power to rescue his descendants from the fires of Hades.

COOS, kō's. See Cos.

COPING, ko'ping. See House.

COPPER, kop'ër (קָבָר, ṭhōshēth): The word is trf "copper" in only one passage (Ezr 8 27 AV).
In the ARV of this passage "brass" has been substituted. Neither describes the actual alloy according to present definitions so well as the word "brass." Copper was one of the earliest metals to be known and utilized in alloy, but copper, as a single metal, was probably little used. The remains of spars, balances, arms, vases, mirrors, statues, cooking utensils, implements of all kinds, etc., from Bible times are principally of an alloy of copper hardened with tin known today as bronze (see Bronze). In such passages as Dt 8 9, where reference is made to the native metal or ores, "copper" should be substituted for "brass" as in the ARV (cf Job 40 18). This is true also of coins as χαλκός, chalēkōs, in Mt 10 9.
Our modern Eng. word "copper" is derived from an old name pertaining to the island of Cyprus.
Copper was known to the ancients as Cyprian brass, probably because that island was one of the chief sources for this metal. The Sinai peninsula and the mountains of northern Syria also contributed to the ancient world's supply (see Am Tab). No evidences of copper ore in any quantity are found in Pal proper.
See Metal; Mines.

JAMES A. PATCH

COPPERSMITH, kop'ér-smith (χαλκόσμητος, chalēkōs'mētōs): The word is found in NT once only, in 2 Tim 4 14: "Alexander the coppersmith did [in "shoved"] me much evil." As the Bible word rendered "copper" (see Ezr 8 27 AV) is trf "brass" by RV, so the word here rendered "c." should be rendered "brassier," or "worker in brass." See Copper.

COPTIC VERSIONS, kop'tik vör'shunz:
I. Language and Alphabet
1. Alphabet
2. Dialects
3. Versions
3. Chief Editions
4. Literature

I. Language and Alphabet.—The Coptic alphabet consists of the Gr uncial letters, plus seven letters borrowed from Syr. or (wrongly) Memphitic.

1. Alphabet motric to express sounds not represented in the Gr. It can be traced back to the 4th cent., as the oldest Coptic MSS belong to the end of the 4th or beginning of the 5th cent. The language still prevailed in Egypt in the 9th cent., but was no longer understood in Middle Egypt in the 12th. Its last speaker died in 1633.

There were at least five written dialects and subdialects of Coptic. Of these the most important were (1) Buhairic, the dialect of Lower Egypt, often called Coptic par excellence, and also (wrongly) Memphitic. It is used as the ecclesiastical language in the services of the Coptic church. The other four dialects are somewhat more closely allied to one another than to Buhairic, which shows greater traces of Gr influence. These dialects are (2) the Sahidic (Sa'di, or dialect of upper Egypt), also called Thesisic; (3) the Hemmimtic—or rather Bushmuric—for which Papyricum has been suggested; (4) the Middle Egypt proper (known from MSS found in the monastery of Jeremias near the Theban Serapeum), differing but little from (3); and (5) the Akhmimic (Akbūmīm—identified with the ancient Chechel, the modern Cairo, the more primitive and more closely related to ancient Egypt than any other. Only a few fragments in it (of Ex, Eccles, 2 Mace, the Minor Prophets, and Catholic eps.) have yet been found. The last three dialects are often classed together as "Middle Egypt" and (4) is then called "Lower Sahidic."

II. Versions.—In all 5 dialects more or less complete versions of the Bible once existed. They were the earliest made after the early Syr. At latest they began in the 3rd point of view was (fixed at the beginning of the 3rd cent., though some (e.g. Hymenaeus) say as early as the 2d. It is thought that the Sahidic version was the earliest, then the Middle Egyptian, and finally the Buhairic.
The latter represents an early and comparatively pure Gr text, free from what are generally termed western additions, while the Sahidic, on the other hand, contains most of the peculiar western readings. It sometimes supports codex N, sometimes codex B, sometimes both, but generally it closely agrees with codex D, esp. in the Acts. A Coptic (Sahidic) MS, written at the end of the 4th century, was lost before 350 AD, and published by the British Museum in April, 1912, contains D, Jon, and Acts, and is older than any other Bib. MS (except a few fragments) yet known to exist. It proves that this Sa-idic version was made about 200 AD. It in general supports the "Western" text of cod Bezae (D).
Much of the NT esp. still exists in Sahidic, though not Rev. In Buhairic we have the Pent, Job, Ps., Prov. Isra., Ezek. Dn, the 12 Minor Prophets, and fragments of the historical books of the OT, besides the whole NT, though the Book of Rev is later than the rest. In the other dialects much less had been preserved, as far as is known. In Bushmiric we have fragments of Isa, Lam, Ep. Jer, and a good many fragments of the NT. In more than one dialect we have apoc gospels (see Texts and Studies, IV, no. 2, 1896) and Gnostic papyri, etc. The OT was tr from the LXX. The Pss seem unique.

III. Chief Editions.—The Buhairic Pss were first published in 1639. Wilkins published the Buhairic NT at London in 1716, and the Pent in 1731; Schwartz the Gospels in 1846–47; de Lagarde the Acts and Ep. in 1832. He also edited the Pss (trans. and lit. in 1875, 151 in number, of which the last celebrates David’s victory over Goliath. He added fragments of the Sahidic Psalter and of the Buhairic Prov. Tattam published the Minor Prophets in 1836 and the Major in 1832, an ed of the Gospels in London in 1847, and of the rest of the NT in 1852 (SPCK), with a literal Arab version. Horner’s ed of the Buhairic NT (4 vols, 1898, etc, Clarendon Press) and of Sahidic Gospels (1910, 3 vols) is the standard ed. Ford published part of the Sahidic NT in 1879, and part of OT and NT have since appeared: e.g. Ciasca published fragments of the Sahidic OT (Sacrorum Bibliorum Fragmenta Coptico-Sahidica Musci Borgiani) at Rome, 1855–69.

COR, kūr (עֵר), kôr: A liquid and dry measure, same as the homer of: about 90 gals. capacity (Exk 45 14). See HOMER; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CORAL, kor’al (כְּרוּל), râ’môth,(prâniyn). The red coral or precocious coral, Corallium rubrum, is confined to the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas. It is the calcareous axis of a branching colony of polyps. It does not form reefs, but occurs in small masses from 40 to 100 fathoms below the surface. It differs totally in structure from the white corals which form coral reefs, belonging to the order of Octocorallia or Eight-rayed Polyps, while the reef-building corals belong to the Hexactinia or Six-rayed Polyps.

Râ’môth, apparently from r. dâm, “to be high” (cf rûm, “to be high”), occurs in three passages. In Prov 24 7, EV have “too high” (Wisdom is too high for a fool.” In Job 28 12–19, where various precious things are compared with wisdom, EV has “coral” (AVm “Ramat”). It is mentioned here along with ge’ôhr, “gold” (RVm “treasure”); ketham, “gold of Òphir; shâbhim, “onyx” (RVm “brazilwood”); geppir, “aspshire”; sahâbî, “gold”; zâbhîkh, “crystal” (RV “glass”); pâz, “gold; ” geppith, “pearls” (RV “crystal”); prâniyn, “rubies” (RV “red coral” or “pearls”); pîzh’dâb, “topaz.” While the real meaning of some of these terms is doubtful (see Srodes, Fussklaus), they all, including râmôth, appear to be precious stones or metals. In Exk 27 16, râmôth occurs with nôphêkh, “emeralds” (RVm “carbuncles”); argândân, “purple; ” râkhôm, “broidered work; ” bâz, “fine linen; ” kâkhôkh, “agate” (AVm “chryesoprase; ” NT “rubies”). In the context does not require a precious stone or metal, and Vulg has sericum, i.e. “Chinese material” or “silk.” Notwithstanding, therefore, the traditional rendering, “coral,” the real meaning of râ’môth must be admitted to be doubtful. Prâniyn (from r. pân, “to separate”; cf Arab. fânân, “a branch of a tree”) occurs in Job 28 18; Prov 3 15; 8 11; 20 15; 31 10; Lam 4 7. In all these passages EV has “rubies” (Job 28 18, RVm “red coral” or “pearls”; Lam 4 7, RVm “corals”). Everywhere where a precious substance is indicated, but nowhere does the context give any light as to the nature of the substance, except in Lara 4 7, where we have the statement that the nobles of Jerus “were more ruddy in hue than rubai” (kôr, 18, RVm “corals”). This affords no assurance of a branching red substance such as precious coral. The occurrence of prâniyn and râ’môth together in Job 28 18 is, if we give the precedence to prâniyn, a further argument against râ’môth meaning “coral.”

COR-ASHAN, kôr-âsh’ân, kôr-râ’shân (ERV, AV Chor-ashan; כֹּרָשָׁן, kor ‘ashan, 1 S 30 30): The original reading was probably Bor-ashan, “well of Ashan.” See ASHAN.

CORBAN, kôr’bân (קֹרְבָּן), korban; sâpôr, dôron; tr “a gift,” “a sacrificial offering.” It “that which is brought near,” viz. to the altar: An expression frequently used in the original text of the OT; in the Eng. Bible it occurs in Mk 7 11; cf also Mt 15 5. It is the most general term for a sacrifice of any kind. In the course of time it became associated with an objectionable practice. Anything dedicated to the temple by pronouncing the votive word “C,” forthwith belonged to the temple, but only ideally; actually it might remain in the possession of him that made the vow to be justified in not supporting his old parents simply because he designated his property or a part of it as a gift to the temple, that is, as “C.” There was no necessity of fulfilling his vow, yet he was actually prohibited from ever using his property for the support of his parents. This shows clearly why Christ singled out this queer regulation in order to demonstrate the sophistry of tradition and to bring out the fact of its possible and actual hostility to the Scripture and its spirit.

CORBE, kôr’bê. See CORBEE.

CORD, kôrd (קְרֶד, khebhel, כּהֶבֵה, yether, נֵרֶה, mĕthâr, לֵבָה; dôbhôth; שְׁרוֹיָן, šarôyôn). The following:

(1) The Arab. khabîl corresponds to the Heb. habîl and is the common name for rope or cord throughout the East. Such ropes or cords are made of goat’s or camel’s hair, first spun into threads and then twisted or plaited into the larger and stronger form. Hêbel is tr rather inconsistently in RV by “cord” (Josh 2 15; Josh 36 8, etc); by “line” (2 S 8 2; Mic 2 5; Ps 16 6; 78 55; Am 7 17; Zec 2 1); by “ropes” (1 K 20 31), and by “tacklings” (Isa 33 23).

(2) YeBeth corresponds to the Arab. uwarân, which means caght. With a kindred inconsistency it is tr by “wittles” (Jgs 16 7 RVm “bowstring”); by “cord” (Job 30 11), where some think it may mean “bowstring,” or possibly “rein” of a bride, and by “bowstring” (Ps 11 2), doubtless the true meaning.

(3) Mebeth is considered the equivalent of Arab. abûbîk, which means tent ropes, being constantly so used by the Bedouin. They make the thing so called of goat’s or camel’s hair. It is used of the “cords” of the tabernacle (Jer 10 20), of the “cords” of the “hangings” and “pillars” of the court of the tabernacle in Ex and Num and 1qî, by Isa (46 2), “Lengthen thy cords,” etc.

(4) Abôhôth is thought to have its equivalent in the Arab. rûbîbî, which means a band, or fastening.
See Band. It is tr. by "cords" in Ps 118 27; 129 4; by "bands" in Ezek 3 25; Job 39 10; Hos 11 4; by "ropes" in Jgs 15 13.14; and by "cart rope" in Isa 5 18. See Cor. See also Nu 15 38 and Am 5 7. It seems to have meant the meaning of something twisted or interlaced.

(5) In the NT "cord" is found in Jn 2 15, translating schōtīon, but in Acts 27 32 the same Gr word is rendered "ropes".

Figurative: (1) of affliction (Job 36 8); (2) of God's laws (Ps 2 3); (3) of the artifices of the wicked (Ps 129 4; 140 5); (4) of sinful habits (Prov 5 22); (5) of true friendship or companionship (Eccl 4 9); (6) possibly of the spinal cord (Ecc 12 6); (7) of falsehood (Isa 5 18); (8) of the spirit of enterprise and devotion (Isa 64 2); (9) of God's gentleness.

Geo. B. Eager

Cords, kòr'des, Small (ἐγγουλον, schōtīon), the diminutive of schōtis, "a rush," hence "a rope of rushes"): Tr. "small cords" (Jn 2 15 AV; RV "ropes"). The same word is tr. "ropes" in Acts 27 32. See also Job 41 2 m.

Core, kòr'ē (Κόρη, Korē): In AV, Jude ver 11, used as a variant for Korah. See Korah, 3.

Coriander, kor'i-an'dēr (ἀγάθι, gadh; κόριον, kōrion): The fruit of the Coriandrum Sativum (N.O. Umbelliferae), a plant indigenous around the Mediterranean and extensively cultivated. The fruits are aromatic and stomachic-carminative. They are of a grayish-yellow color, ribbed, ovate-globular and in size about twice that of a hemp-seed. "The manna was like coriander seed" (Nu 11 7; see also Ex 16 31).

Corinth, kor'inθ (Κορινθία, Kōritia, "ornament"): A celebrated city of the Peloponnesus, capital of Corinthia, which lay N. of Argolis, and with the isthmus joined the peninsula to the mainland. Corinth had three good harbors (Lechaeum, on the Corinthian, and Cenchreae and Schoenus on the Saronic Gulf), and thus commanded the traffic of both the eastern and the western seas. The larger ships could not be hauled across the isthmus (Acts 27 6.37); smaller vessels were taken over by means of a ship tramway with wooden rollers. The Phoenicians, who settled here very early, left many traces of their civilization in the industrial arts, such as dyeing and weaving, as well as in their religion and mythology. The Corinthian cult of Apollon in Memmius (Melkart) and of Athena Phoenix are of Phoenician origin. Poseidon, too, and other sea deities were held in high esteem in the commercial city. Various arts were cultivated and the Corinthians, even in the earliest times, were famous for their cleverness, inventiveness, and artistic sense, and they prided themselves on surpassing the other Greeks in the embellishment of their city and in the adornment of their temples. There were many celebrated painters in Corinth, and the city became famous for the Corinthian order of architecture: an order, which, by the way, though held in high esteem by the Romans, was very little used by the Greeks themselves. It was here, too, that the dithyramb (hymn to Dionysus) was first arranged artistically to be sung by a chorus; and the Isthmian games, held every two years, were celebrated just outside the city on the isthmus near the Saronic Gulf. But the commercial and materialistic spirit prevailed later.

Not a single Corinthian distinguished himself in lit. Statusimon, however, there were in abundance: Periander, Phidias, Timoleon.

Harbors are few on the Corinthian Gulf. Hence no other city could wrest the commerce of these waters from Corinth. According to Thucydides, the first ships of war were built here in 664 BC. In those early days Corinth held a leading position among the Gr cities; but in consequence of her great material prosperity she would not risk all as Athens did, and win eternal supremacy over men: she had too much to lose to jeopardize her material interests for principle, and she soon sank into the second class. But when Athens, Thebes, Sparta and Argos fell away, Corinth came to the front again as the wealthiest and most important city in Greece; and when it was destroyed by Mummius in 146 BC, the treasures of art carried to Rome were as great as those of Athens. Delos became the commercial center for a time; but when Julius Caesar restored Corinth a cent. later (46 BC), it grew so rapidly that the Rom colony soon became again one of the most prominent centers in Greece. When Paul visited Corinth, he found it the metropolis of the Peloponnesus. Jews flocked to this center of trade (Acts 18 1-18; Rom 16 21 f; 1 Cor 9 20), the natural site for a great mart, and flourishing under the lavish hand of the Caesars; and this is one reason why Paul remained there so long (Acts 18 11) instead of sojourning in the old seats of aristocracy, such as Argos, Sparta and Athens. He found a strong Jewish nucleus to begin with; and it was in direct communication with Ephesus. But earthquake, malaria, and the harsh Turkish rule finally swept everything away except seven columns of one old Doric temple, the only object above ground left today to mark the site of the ancient city of wealth and luxury and immorality —the city of vice par excellence in the Rom world. Near the temple have been excavated the ruins of the famous fount of Peirene, so celebrated in Gr literature. Directly S. of the city is the high rock (over 1,800 ft.) Acrocorinthus, which formed an impregnable fortress. Traces of the old ship-canal across the isthmus (attempted by Nero in 66-67 AD) were to be seen before excavations were begun for the present canal. At this time the city was thoroughly

Rom. Hence the many Latin names in the NT: Lucius, Tertius, Gaius, Erastus, Quartus (Rom 16 21-23), Crispus, Titus Justus (Acts 18 7.8), Fortunatus, Achalicus (1 Cor 16 17). According to the testimony of Dio Chrysostomus, Corinth had become in the 2d cent. of our era the richest city in Greece. Its monuments and public buildings and art treasures are described in detail by Pausanias.

The church in Corinth consisted principally of non-Jews (1 Cor 12 2). Paul had no intention at first of making Corinth a base of operations (Acts 18 1; 16 9.10); for he wished to return to Thessalonica (1 Thess 2 17.18). His plans were changed by a revelation (Acts 18 9.10). The Lord commanded him to speak boldly, and he did so, remaining in the city eighteen months. Finding strong opposition in the synagogue he left the Jews and went to the Gentiles (Acts 18 6). Nevertheless, Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue and his household were believers and baptisms were numerous (Acts 18 8); but no Corinthians were baptized by Paul himself except Crispus, Gaius and some of the household of Stephanas (1 Cor 1 14.16) "the firstfruits of Achaia" (1 Cor 16 15). One of these, Gaius, was Paul's host the next time he visited the city (Rom 16 23). Silas and Timothy, who had been left at Berea, came on to Corinth about 45 days after Paul's arrival. It was at this time that Paul wrote his first Epistle to the Thessalonians (3 6). During Gallo's administration the Jews accused Paul, but the proconsul refused to allow the case to be brought to trial. This decision must have been looked upon with favor by a large majority of the Corinthians, who had a great dislike for the Jews (Acts 18 17). Paul became acquainted also with Priscilla and Aquila (18 18.26; Rom 16 3; 2 Tim 4 19), and later they accompanied him to Ephesus. Within a few years after Paul's first visit to Corinth the Christians had increased so rapidly that they made quite a large congregation, but it was composed mainly of the lower classes: they were neither 'learned, influential, nor of noble birth' (1 Cor 1 26).

Paul probably left Corinth to attend the celebration of the feast at Jerus (Acts 18 21). Little is known of the history of the church in Corinth after his departure. Apollos came from Ephesus with a letter of recommendation to the brethren in Achaia (Acts 18 27; 2 Cor 3 1); and he exercised a powerful influence (Acts 18 26.28; 1 Cor 1 12); and Paul came down later from Macedonia.

His first letter to the Corinthians was written from Ephesus. Both Titus and Timothy were sent to Corinth from Ephesus (2 Cor 7 13.15; 1 Cor 4 17), and Timothy returned by land, meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor 1 1), who visited Greece again in 56-57 or 57-63.

LITERATURE

I. The Authenticity of the Two Epistles.—1 and 2 Cor, Gal and Rom, all belong to the period of Paul's third missionary journey. They are the most remarkable of his writings, and are usually distinguished as the four great or principal epp., a distinction which not only is a tribute to their high originality and intrinsic worth, but also indicates the extremely favorable opinion which critics of almost all schools have held regarding their authenticity. Throughout the cent. the tradition has remained practically unbroken, that they contain the very dictata Paulinum, the mind and heart of the great apostle of the Gentiles, and preserve to the church an impregnable defence of historical Christianity. What has to be said of their genuineness applies almost equally to both.

The two epp. have a conspicuous place in the most ancient lists of Pauline writings. In the Muratorian Fragment (cir 170) they stand 1. External at the head of the nine epp. addressed to churches, and are declared to have been written to forbid heretical schism (primum omnium Corinthiss schismis heresiis in terdictis); and in Marcion's Apostolic (cir 140) they stand second to Gal. They are also clearly attested in the most important writings of the subapostolic age, e.g. by Clement of Rome (cir 95), generally regarded as the friend of the apostle mentioned in Phil 4 3; Ignatius (Ad Ephes., ch xviii, second decade of 2d cent.); Polycarp (ch ii, vi, xi, first half of 2d cent.), a disciple of John; and Justin Martyr (b. at close of 1st cent.); while the gnostic Ophites (2d cent.) were clearly familiar with both epp. (cf. Westcott, Canon, passim, and Index II; also Charteris, Canonicity, 222-24, where most of the original passages are brought together). The witness of Clement is of the highest importance. Ere the close of the 2d cent., he himself wrote a letter to the Corinthians, in which (ch xlvi, Lightfoot's ed., 144) he made a direct appeal to the authority of 1 Cor: "Take up the letter of Paul the blessed apostle; what did he write to you first in the beginning of the gospel?"
Verily he gave you spiritual direction regarding himself, Cephas, and Apollos, for even then you were dividing yourselves into parties." It would be impossible to desire more explicit external testimony.

Within themselves both epp. are replete with marks of genuineness. They are palpating human documents, with the cunning of reality.

2. Internal Evidence harmonize with the independent narrative of Acts; in the words of Schleiermacher (Eindigl., 148), "The whole fits together and completes itself perfectly, and yet each of the documents contains an authority and innateness which cannot be borrowed from those of the other." Complex and difficult as the subjects and circumstances sometimes are, and varying as the moods of the writer are in dealing with them, there is a unity and unanswerable likeness and character which, if it did not agree with the good faith. The very difficulty created for a modern reader by the incomplete and allusive character of some of the references is itself a mark of genuineness rather than the opposite; just what would most likely be the case in a free and intimate correspondence between those who understood one another in the presence of immediate facts which needed no careful particularization; but what would almost as certainly have been avoided in a fictitious work. The medium of literary sense suffices to forbid classification among the pseudographia. To take but a few instances from many, it is impossible to read such passages as those conveying the reminiscence in 1 Cor 9, the alternative between humility and pride in connection with the meeting of Titus in 2 Cor 2 and 7, or the ever-memorable passage which begins at 11 24 of the same ep.: "Of the Jews five times I warned," etc., without the hypothesis of fiction being an absurdity. No man ever wrote out of the heart if this writer did not. The truth is that the theory of pseudonymity leaves far more difficulties behind it than any it is supposed to solve. The unanswerable likeness and prodigy of the 2d cent., who in the most daring and artistic manner gloried in the fanciful creation of those minute and life-like details which have imprinted themselves indelibly on the memory and imagination of the whole church, cannot be regarded as anything other than a chimera. No one knows where or when he lived, or in what shape or form. But if the writings are the undoubted rescripts of fact, to whose life and personality do they fit themselves more exquisitely than to a man whose name stands not on their head, and whose compositions they claim to be? They suit beyond compare the apostle of the missionary journeys, the tender, eager, indomitable "prisoner of the Lord," and no other. No other that has even been suggested is more than the mere shadow of a name, and no two writers have as yet seriously agreed even as to the shadow. The pertinent series of questions with which Godet (Intro to NT; Studies on the Epp., 305) concludes his remarks on the genuineness may well be repeated: "What use was it to explain at length in the 2d cent. a change in a plan of the journey, which, suppose it was real, had interest only for those whom the promised visit of the apostle personally concerned? When the author speaks of five hundred persons who had seen the risen Christ, of whom the most part were still alive at the time he was writing, is he telling his readers a mere story that would resemble a bad joke? What was the use of discussing at length the giving detailed rules on the exercise of the gospelsalvation to whom that gift no longer existed, so to say, in the church? Why make the apostle say: 'We who shall be alive [at the moment of the Parousia] at a time when everyone knew that he was long dead? In fine, what church would have received without opposition into its archives, as an ep. of the apostle, half a cent. after his death, a letter unknown till then, and filled with reproaches most severe and humiliating to it?"

One is not surprised, therefore, that even the radical criticism of the 19th cent. cordially accepted the Corinthian epp. as belonging to the first group. The men of the 19th cent. of the three main groups who believed that the discussion of the "critical" school which followed that of Tübingen, and which, in many branches, has included the names of the leading German scholars to this day. F. C. Baur's language (Paul, I, 246) was: "There has never been the slightest suspicion of unauthenticity cast on these four epp, and they bear no incontestably the character of Pauline originality, that there is no conceivable ground for the reception of critical doubts in their case." Renan (St. Paul, Intro, V) was equally emphatic: "They are incontestable, and uncontested."

Reference, however, must be made to the ultra-radical attack on the Pauline epp. There has been some adherence to the view, especially among Dutch scholars, during the last 25 years. As early as 1792 Everson, a retired Eng. clergyman, rejected Rom on the grounds that all four epp. had been written by Paul, and the church existed in Rome in Paul's day. Bruno Bauer (1850-51-52) made a more sweeping attack, relegating the whole of the four principal epp. to the close of the 2d cent. His views received little attention, until a work in 1867 by Steck of Bern, Völter of Amsterdam, and above all by Van Manen of Leyden. According to these writers, with slight modifications of view among themselves, it is very doubtful if Paul or Christ ever really existed; if they did, legend has long since made itself master of their personalities, and in every case what borders on the supernatural is to be taken as the criterion of the authenticity of the epp. were written in the 1st quarter of the 2d cent., and as Paul, so far as he was known, was believed to be a reformer of anti-Judaic sympathies, he was chosen as the patron of the movement, and the writings were afterwards published in his name. The theory that the whole series was to further the interests of a supposed circle of clever and elevated men, who, partly imbued with Heb. ideals, and partly with the speculations of Or and Alexandrian philosophy, desired the spread of a universalistic Christianity and true Gnosis. For this end they perceived it necessary that Jewish legalism should be neutralized, and that the narrow national element should be expelled from the Messianic idea. Hence the epp. The principles on which the main conceptions of the critics are based may be reduced to two: (1) that there are relations in the epp. so difficult to understand that, since we cannot properly understand them, the epp. are not trustworthy; and (2) that the religious and ecclesiastical development is so great that not merely 20 or 30 years, but 70 or 80 more, are required, if we are to be able rationally to conceive it: to accept the situation at an earlier date is simply to accept what cannot possibly have been. It is manifest that on such principles it is possible to establish a whole "school," and that any historical lit. might be proved untrustworthy, and reshaped according to the subjective idiosyncrasies of the critic. The underlying theory of intellectual development is too rigid, and is quite oblivious of the shocks it receives from actual facts, by the advent in history from time to time of compelling, intelligible new possibilities, who rather mould them than are molded by it. None have poured greater ridicule on this "pseudo-Kritik" than the representatives of the advanced school in Germany whom it rather expected to carry with it, and against whom it complains bitterly that they do not take it seriously. On the whole the vagaries of the Dutch school have rather confirmed than shaken belief in these epp.; and one may freely accept Ramsay's view (HDB, I, 484) as expressing the modern mind regarding them, namely, that they are "the unapproachable and unsailable nucleus of admitted Pauline writings."

(Reference to the following will give a sufficiently adequate idea of the Dutch criticism and the replies that have been made to it: Van Manen, BB, art. 2. Text of 1 Cor. —A text of both epp. comes to us in the most ancient VSS, the Syr (Peshito), the Old Lat, and the Egypt.

Integrity of 1 Cor. undoubtably by the 3d cent. It is entered into the Syr uncial Sin. (B* and N*, 4th cent.), Vat. (B, 4th cent.), Alex. (A, 5th cent., minus two vs, 2 Cor 4 13; 12 7), and very nearly complete in Ephraemi (C, 5th cent.), and in the Gr-Lat Charismonunt (D, 6th cent.); as well as in numerous manuscripts. In the case of the original has been well preserved, and no exegetical difficulties of high importance are presented. (Reference should be made to the Intro in Sanday and Headlam's Romans, ICC[1896], where §7 gives valuable information concerning the text, not only of Rom, but of the Pauline ep. generally; also to the recent ed (Oxford, 1910), NT Graece, by Souter, where the various readings of the text used in RV [1881] are conveniently exhibited.) On the whole the text of 1 Cor flows on consistently, only at times, in a chaotic fashion, will reach back upon itself, and few serious criticisms are made on its unity, although the case is different in this respect with its companion ep. Some writers, on insufficient grounds, believe that 1 Cor contains relics of a previous ep. (cf 5 9), e.g. in 7 17-24; 5 1-15.

III. Paul's Previous Relations with Corinth. —When, in the course of his 2d missionary journey, Paul left Athens (Acts 18 1), he sailed 1. Corinth westward to Cenchreae, and entered in 55 AD Corinth "in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling" (1 Cor 2 3). He was doubtless alone, although Silas and Timothy afterward joined him (Acts 18 5; 2 Cor 1 19). The ancient city of Corinth had been utterly laid in ruins when Rome subjugated Greece in the middle of the 2d cent. BC. But in the year 46 BC Caesar had caused it to be rebuilt and colonized in the Roman manner, and during the cent. that had elapsed it had prospered and grown enormously. Its population at this time has been estimated at between 600,000 and 700,000, by far the larger portion of whom were slaves. Its magnificent harbors, Cenchreae and Lechaemum, opening to the commerce of the East and West, were crowded with ships, and its streets with travelers and merchants from almost every country under heaven. Even in that old pagan world the reputation of the city was bad; it has been compared (Baring-Gould, Study of St. Paul, 241) to an amalgam of New York market, Chicago and Paris, and probably it contained the worst features of each. At night it was made hideous by the brawls and lewd songs of drunken revelry. In the daytime its markets and squares swarmed with Jewish peddlers, foreign traders, sailors, soldiers, athletes in training, boxers, wrestlers, charioteers, racing-men, betting-men, courtesans, slaves, idlers and parasites of every description. The corrupting worship of Aphrodite, with its hordes of hierodoulos, was dominant, and all over the Gr-Rom world, "to behave as a Corinthian was a proverbial synonym for leading a low, shameless and immoral life. Very naturally such a pollute and idolatrous environment accounts for much that has to be recorded of the semi-pagan and imperfect life of many of the Corinthian converts.

Paul was himself the founder of the church in Corinth (1 Cor 3 6-10). Entering the city with anxiety, and yet with almost audacity of the knowledge nothing among its people save Church Jesus Christ and Him crucified (2 2). Undoubtedly he was conscious that the mission of the Cross here approached its crisis. If it could abide here, it could abide anywhere. At first he addressed himself to the business of his trade, and cultivating the friendship of Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18 2 f); then he opened his campaign in the synaguge where he persuaded both Jews and Greeks, and ultimately, when opposition became insurmountable, the head of Titus Justus, a proselyte. He made deep impressions, and gradually gathered round him a number who were received into the faith (Acts 18 7 8; 1 Cor 1 14-16). The converts were drawn largely but not entirely from the lower classes (1 26; 7 21); they included Crispus and Sothearas, rulers of the synaguge, Gaius, and Stephanadas with his household, "the firstfruits of Achaia" (16 15). He regarded himself joyfully as the father of this community (4 14 15), every member of which seemed to him like his own child.

IV. Date of the Epistle. —After a sojourn of eighteen months (Acts 18 11) in this fruitful field, Paul departed, most probably in the year 52 (cf Turner, Art. "Chorn. NT," HDB, I, 422 ff), and, having visited other places, (Rom, Gal, Eph, Col 4 17), he has, according to the third journey, established himself for a period of between two and three years (triaeta, Acts 20 31) in Ephesus (Acts 18 18 onward). It was during his stay there that his ep. was written, and is either in the spring or summer (Acts 18 18) or about 51 (cf 1 Cor 16 8) of the year in which he left, 55; or, that does not give sufficient interval for a visit and a letter to Corinth, with which there is considerable ground for believing intervened between 1 Cor and the departure from Ephesus, then in the spring of the preceding year, 54. This would give ample time for the conjectured events, and there is no insuperable reason against it. Pauline chronology is a subject by itself, but the suggested dates for the departure from Ephesus, and for the writing of 1 Cor, really fluctuate between the years 53 and 57. Harnack (Gesch. der altchrist. Litt., II; Die Chorn., I) and McGiffert (Apos Age) adopt the earlier date; Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller), G6; Lightfoot (Bib. Essays) and Zahn (Enl.), N; Turner (Jl supra), 55. Many regard 57 as too late, but Robertson (HDB, I, 485-86) still adheres to it.

V. Occasion of the Epistle. —After Paul's departure from Corinth, events moved rapidly, and it appears that the situation there was quite 1. A Pre-cognizant of them. The distance from Ephesus was not great—about eight days' journey by sea—and in the distance coming and going between the cities news of what was transpiring there frequently have come to ears. Members of the household of Chloe are distinctly mentioned (1 11) as having brought tidings of the contents that prevailed, and there were no doubt other informants. Paul was so concerned by what he heard that he sent Timothy and others to Corinth (1:10, 11). It seems that the present ep. probably reached Corinth first. He had also felt impelled, in a letter (5:9) which is now lost, to send earnest warning against companying with the immoral. Moreover, Apol. after excellent work in Corinth, had come to Ephesus, and was received as a brother by the apostle (3:5,6; 16:12). Equally welcome was a deputation consisting of Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus (16:17), from whom the fullest information could be gained, and who were the probable bearers of a letter from the church of Corinth itself (7:1), appealing for advice and direction on a number of points. This letter has not been preserved, but it was evidently the immediate occasion of our ep. and its tenor is clearly indicated by the nature of the apostle's reply. (The letter, professing to be this letter to Paul, and its contents purporting to be inspired, is here referred to, which dealt with gnostic heresies, and were for long accepted by the Syrian and Armenian churches, are manifestly apocryphal. Cf. Stanley's Corinthians, Appendix; Harnack's Gesch. der Kyrchen, 37-39; Zahn, dein., I, 183-249; Sanday, EB, I, 906-7.) If there be any relic in existence of Paul's previous letter, it is possibly to be found in the passage 2 Cor 14—7:1; at all events that passage may be regarded as reminiscence of its style and message.) So that 1 Cor. has no bow drawn at a venture. It treats of a fully understood, and, on the whole, of a most unhappy situation. The church had broken into factions, and was distracted by party cries. Some of its members were living openly immoral lives, and discipline was practically in abeyance. Others had quarrels over which they dragged one another into the heathen courts. Great differences of opinion had also arisen with regard to marriage and the social relations generally; with regard to banquets and the eating of food offered to idols; with regard to the behavior of women in the assemblies, to the Lord's Supper and the love-feasts, to the use and value of spiritual gifts, and with regard to the hopes of the resurrection of the dead. The church was filled with grief and indignation, which the too complacent tone of the Corinthians only intensified. They discussed questions in a lofty, intellectual way, without seeming to perceive their real drift, or the life and spirit which lay imperially at their heart. Resisting the impulse to visit them "with a rod" (4:21), the apostle wrote the present ep., and dispatched it, if not by the hands of Stephanas and his comrades, most probably by the hands of Titus.

VI. Character of the Epistle. In its general character the ep. is a strenuous writing, masterly in its restraint in dealing with opposition.

1. General. In its grasp of ethical and spiritual principles, and wise and faithful in exposition, their application. It is calm, full of reasoning, clear and balanced in judgment; very varied in its lights and shadows, in its kindness, its gravity, its irony. It moves with firm tread among the commonest themes, but also rises easily into the loftier spheres of thought and vision, breaking again and again into passages of glowing and rhythmical eloquence. It rebukes error, exposes and condemns sin, solves doubts, upholds and encourages faith, and all in a spirit of the utmost tenderness and love, fully grasping the truth. It is brought in its delightful, penetrating in its insight, unending in its interest and application.

It is also very orderly in its arrangement, so that it is not difficult to follow the way as he advances from point to point. Weissacker (Apos. Age, I, 324-25) suggestively and distinctly assigns the matter into (1) sub-divisions introduced by the letter from Corinth, and (2) those on which Paul had obtained information otherwise. He includes three main topics in the first class: marriage, meat offered to idols and spiritual gifts (there is a fourth—the logia or collection, 16:1); six in the second class: the factions, the case of incest, the lawsuits, the free customs of the women, the abuse connected with the Supper and the denial of the resurrection. It is useful, however, to adhere to the sequence of the ep. In broadly outlining the subject-matter we may make a threefold division: (1) chs 1-6; (2) chs 7-10; and (3) chs 11-end.

(1) Chs 1-6: After salutation, in which he associates Sotheanas with himself, and thanksgiving for the grace given to the Corinthians.

3. Outline (1-9), Paul immediately begins (10-13) to refer to the internal divisions among them, and to the unworthy and ungodly in whose presence he says—true to the great passage in his only public declaration, which has been interpreted as applying to the so-called "Christus-party," which may in fact be regarded as the eschatological development of the "Christus-party," which has become more evidently so-called. (In the 1 Cor. Meyer-Hiernicr., Comm., 5th ed: Godet, Introd., 250 ff.; Stahlin, 3rd ed, 278-79; Weiss, Intro. 229-33.) Paul declares that Heis part of the meaning is the close of the apostolic inferiority of Paul. On the other hand a few scholars maintain that the name does not, strictly speaking, indicate a party at all but rather designates those who were disgusted at the display of all party spirit, and with whom Paul was in hearty sympathy. See McGiffert, Apos. Age, 295-97.) After denouncing this petty partisanship, Paul offers an elaborate defence of his own ministry, declaring the power and wisdom of God in the gospel of the Cross (1:14—2:16), returning in ch 3 to the spirit of faction, showing its absurdity and narrowness in face of the fullness of the Christian heritage in "all things" that belong to them as belonging to Christ; and the part of his ministry in ch 4, making a touching appeal to his readers as his "beloved children," whom he had begotten through the gospel. In ch 5 he deals with the case of a notorious offender, guilty of incest, whom they unworthily harbor in their midst, and in the name of Christ demands that they should expel him from the church, pointing out at the same time that it is against the countenance of immorality within the church membership that he is so guilty, and had defrauded them, and had become "an example" to them. (Ch 6 deals with the shamefulness of Christian brethren haling another to the heathen courts, and not rather seeking the settlement of their differences within themselves; reverting once more in the closing vs to the subject of unchastity, which irrepressibly haunts him as by thoughts of them.

(2) Chs 7-10: In ch 7 he begins to reply to two of the matters on which the church had expressly consulted him in his ep., and which introduce the phrase peri de, "now concerning." The first of these bears (ch 7) upon celibacy and marriage, including the case of "mixed" marriage. These questions he treats quite frankly, yet with delicacy and truth. He advances carefully to distinguish between what he has received as the direct word of the Lord, and what he only delivers as own opinion, the utterance of his own sanctified common-sense, yet to which the good spirit within him gives weight. The second matter on which advice was solicited, questions regarding _idolatry_. He referred to idols, he discusses in ch. 8, recurring to it again (10 23-24). The apostle and casuistry involved he handles with excellent wisdom, and lays down a rule for the Christian conscience of a far-reaching kind, happily expressed: "All things are lawful; but not all things are expedient. All things are lawful; but not all things are edifying. Let no man seek his own, but each his neighbor's good" (10 23-24). By lifting their differences into the purer atmosphere of love and duty, he causes them to dissolve away. Ch. 9 contains another notable defence of his apostleship, in which he asserts the principle that the Christian ministry has a claim for its support on those to whom it ministers, although in his own case he deliberately waived his right, that no challenge on such a matter should be possible among them. The earlier portion of ch. 10 contains a reference to Jewish idolatry and sacramental abuse, in order that the evils that resulted might point a moral, and act as a solemn warning to Christians in relation to their activities.

(3) Chs. 11-16: The third section deals with certain errors and defects that had crept into the inner life and observance of the church, also with further matters on which the Corinthians sought guidance, namely, spiritual gifts and the collection for the saints. Ch. 11 1-16 has regard to the department of women and their veiling in church, a matter which seems to have occasioned some difficulty, and which Paul deals with in a manner quite his own, purposing thereby to treat of graver and more disorderly affairs, gross abuses in the form of gluttony and drunkenness at the Lord's Supper, which leads him, after severe censure, to make his classic reference to that sacred ordinance (vs. 20 to end). Ch. 12 sets forth the diversity, yet true unity, of spiritual gifts, and the confusion and jealousy to which a false conception of them inevitably leads, obscuring that "most excellent way," the love which transcend them all, which never fails, purposing thereafter to treat of graver and more disorderly affairs, gross abuses in the form of gluttony and drunkenness at the Lord's Supper, which leads him, after severe censure, to make his classic reference to that sacred ordinance (vs. 20 to end). He strives also, in the following chapter, to correct the disorder arising from the abuse of the gift of tongues, many desiring to speak at once, and, in effect, only publishing that which not one could understand, thinking themselves thereby highly gifted. It is not edifying: "I had rather," he declares, "speak five words with my understanding, that I might instruct others also, than ten thousand words in a tongue" (14 19). Thereafter follows the immortal chapter on the resurrection, which he had learned that some denied (15 12). He anchors the faith to the resurrection of Christ as historic fact, abundantly attested (vs. 3-8), shows how all else is to the Christian hope (vs. 13-18), and then proceeds by reasoning and analogy to brush aside certain naturalistic objections to the great doctrine, "then they that are Christ's, at his coming" (ver. 23), when this mortal shall have put on immortality, and death shall have swallowed up the victory (ver. 54). The closing chapter gives directions as to the collection for the saints in Jerusalem, which is his heart was deeply set, and in which he hoped the Corinthians would bear a worthy share. He promises to visit them, and even in the winter, and makes a series of tender personal references, and so brings the great ep. to a close.

VII. Distinguishing Features.—It will be seen that there are passages in the ep. of great doctrinal and historical importance, esp. with reference to the Person of Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Eucharist, and the Resurrection; also many that illuminate the nature of the religious meetings and services of the early church (cf. particularly on these, Weissacker, _Apost. Age_, II, 246 ff.). A lurid light is cast on many of the spiritual and doctrinal aspects still clung to those who were just emerging from paganism, and much allowance has to be made for the Corinthian environment. The thoroughness with which the apostle pursues the difficulties raised into the relations and consequences of the scope of matters which he subjects to Christian scrutiny and criterion, are also significant. Manifestly he regarded the gospel as come to fill, not a part, but the whole, of life; to supply principles that follow the believers to their homes, to the most secluded sanctum there, out again to the world, to the market-place, the place of amusement, of temptation, of service, of trial, of worship and prayer; and all in harmony with knowing nothing "save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." For Paul regards that not as a restriction, but as a large and expansive principle. He sets the cross on an eminence so high that its shadow covers the whole activities of human life.

Three broad outstanding features of a practical kind may be recognized. The first is the earnest warning it conveys against a factious spirit as iminical to the Christian life. The Party The Corinthians were imbued with a party spirit of petty democracy, and were infected also by the sporting spirit of the great games that entered so largely into their existence. They transferred these things to the church. They listened to their teachers with voting ears, not as men who wished to learn, but as partisans who sought occasion either to applaud or to condemn. Paul recognizes that, though they are not dividing on deep things of the faith, they are giving way to "schisms" of a pettier and perhaps even more pernicious kind, that appeal to the lowest elements in human nature, that cause scandal in the eyes of men and inflict grievous wounds on the Body of Christ. In combating this spirit he takes occasion to go below the surface, and to reveal the foundations of true Christian unity. That must simply be "in Christ." And this is true even if the divergence should be on higher and graver things. Any unity in such a case, still possible to cherish, must be a unity in Christ. Because of this truth He calls on the Corinthians to give Him; none severed from the true and catholic faith, who confess with their lips and testify with their lives that He is Lord.

The ep. also renders a high ethical service in the rules it lays down for the guidance of the Christian conscience. In matters where the issue is clearly one of the great imperatives, the conflict need never be protracted. An earnest man will see his way. But beyond these, or not easily reduced to them, there are things that cause perplexity and doubt. Questions arise regarding things that do not seem to be wrong in themselves, yet whose abuse or the offence they give to others, may well cause debate. Meat offered to idols, and then brought to table, was a stumbling-block to many Corinthian Christians. They said: "If we eat, it is consenting to idolatry; we dare not partake." But there were some who rose to a higher level. They perceived that even if this meat was a ground of offence for an idolator, it is not all, and the meat is not affected by the superstition. Accordingly their higher and more rational view gave them liberty and left their conscience free. But was this really all that they had to consider? Some say: "Certainly!"; and Paul acknowledges that this is undoubtedly the law of individual freedom. But it is not the final answer. There has not entered into it a consideration of the mind of Christ. Christian liberty must be willing to subject itself to the law of love. Granted that a neighbor is often short-sighted and over-scrupulous, and that it would be good neither for him nor for others to suffer him to become a moral dictator; yet we are not quite relieved. The brother may be wrong in his claim of his weakness may be strong. We may not ride over his scruples roughshod. To do so would be to put ourselves wrong even more seriously. And if the matter is one that is manifestly fraught with peril to him, conscience may be roused to say, as the apostle says: "Wherefore, if most meekth my brother to stumble, I will eat no flesh for evermore."

A third notable feature of the ep. is its exaltation of the cross of Christ as the power and wisdom of God unto salvation. It was the

3. The Power of the Cross to lift and change from its base, the life of that old heathen world. It was neither Paul, nor Apollos, nor Cephas who accomplished that colossal task, but the preaching of the cross of Christ. The Epistle of Alexandria. Corinth and of Europe began with the gospel of Calvary and the open tomb. It can never with impunity draw away from these central facts. The river broadens and deepens as it flows, but it is never possible for it to sever itself from the living fountain from which it springs.

I. TEXT, AUTHENTICITY AND DATE

— Of what has already been said in the preceding art. in the two important 5th-cent. uncials, A (Alex.) and C (Ephraemi), portions of the Evidence text are lacking. As to the genuineness internal evidence very vividly attests it. The elements of Pauline theology and eschatology, expressed in familiar Pauline terms, are manifest throughout. Yet the ep. is not doctrinal or didactic, but an intensely personal document. Its absorbing interest is in events which were profoundly agitating Paul and the Corinthians at the time, strains their relations to the point of rupture, and demanding strong action on Paul’s part. Our imperfect knowledge of the circumstances necessarily hinders a complete comprehension, but the references to these events and to others in the personal history of the apostle are so natural, and so manifest faith, that no doubt rises in the reader’s mind but that he is in the sphere of reality, and that the voice he hears is the voice of the man whose heart and nerves were being torn by the experiences through which he was passing. Scholars may differ as to the continuity and integrity of the text, there is no serious divergence among them in the opinion that all parts of the ep. are genuine writings of the apostle.

Externally, the testimony of the sub-apostolic age, though not so frequent or precise as in the case of 1 Cor, is still sufficiently clear.

2. External to establish the existence and use of Evidence the ep. in the 2d cent. Clement of Rome is silent when he might rather have been expected to use the ep. (of Kennedy, Second and Third Cor, 142 ff); but it is quoted by Polycarp (Ad Phil., ii.4 and vi.1), and in the Epistle to Diognetus 5 12, while it is amply attested to by external scholars. Tertullian, Clement and Alexander of Alexandria. It was written from Macedonia (probably from Philippi) either in the autumn of the same year as that in which 1 Cor was written, or in 54 or 55 A.D., or in the autumn of the succeeding year.

II. RESUMÉ OF EVENTS

— Great difficulty exists as to the circumstances in which the ep. was written, and as to the whole situation between 1 and 2 Cor. In 1 Cor Paul had intimated his intention of visiting the Corinthians and wintering with them, coming to them through Macedonia (16 5-7; of also Acts 19 21). In 2 Cor 1 15.16 he refers to a somewhat different plan, Corinth—Macedonia—Corinth—Judaea; and describes this return from Macedonia to Corinth as a second or double journey. But if this plan, on which he and his friends had counted, had not been entirely carried out, it had been for good reason (1 I7), and not due to mere fickleness or light-heartedness, but to suit his mind.

It was because he would "spare" them (1 23), and not come to them "again with sorrow" (2 1). That is, he had been with them, but there had been such a profound disturbance in their relations that he dared not risk it; and return meantime; instead, he had written a letter to probe and test them, "out of much affliction and anguish of heart .... with many tears" (2 4). Thank God, this severe letter had accomplished its mission. It had produced sorrow among them (2 2; 7 5 8), but it had brought their hearts back to him with the old allegiance, with great clearing of themselves, and fear and longing and zeal (7 11). There was a period, however, of waiting for knowledge of this issue, which was to him a period of intense anxiety; he had even nervously regretted that he had written as he did (7 5-8). Titus, who had gone as his representative to Corinth, was to return with a report of how this severe letter had been received, and when Titus failed to meet him at Troas (2 13), he had "no relief for his spirit," but pushed on eagerly to Macedonia to encounter him the sooner. Then came the answer, and the lifting of the intolerable burden from his mind. He that comforteth the lowly, even God, comforteth" (2 4). The Corinthians had been swayed by a godly sorrow and repentance (7 8), and the sky had cleared again with almost unfilled for brightness. One who had offended (2 5 and 7 13)—but whose offence is not distinctly specified—had been disciplined by the church; indeed, in the revulsion of feeling against him, and in sympathy for the apostle, he had been punished so heavily that there was a danger of passing to an extreme, and plunging him into despair (2 7). Paul accordingly pleads for leniency and forgiveness, lest further resentment should lead only to a further and deeper wrong (2 6-11). But in addition to this offender there were others, probably following in his train, who had carried on a relentless attack against the apostle both in his person and in his doctrine. He earnestly defends himself against their contemptuous charges of fleshliness and cowardice (ch 10), and by a crafty vaunty (12 16,17). Another Jesus is preached, a different spirit, a different gospel (11 4). They "commend themselves" (10 12), but are false apostles, deceitful workers, ministers of Satan, fashioning themselves into ministers of Christ (11 13,14). Their attacks are vehemently repelled in an eloquent apologia (chs 11 and 12), and he declares that when he comes the third time they will not be spared (13 2). Titus, accompanied by other well-known brethren, is again to be the representative of the apostle (8 6,17 ff). At no great interval Paul himself followed, thus making his third visit (13 14; 13 1), and so far fulfilled his original purpose that he spent the winter peacefully in Corinth (cf Acts 20 3,27 and 21). III. The New Situation.—It is manifest that we are in the presence of a new and unexpected situation, whose development is not clearly defined, and concerning which we have nowhere else so source of information to elucidate, but a chief point requiring attention are: (1) The references to the offender in chs 2 and 7, and to the false teachers, particularly in the later chapters of the ep.; (2) the painful visit implicitly referred to in 2 1; and (3) Paul's anxiety as written in tears and for a time regretted (2 4; 7 8). The offender in 1 Cor 5 1-5 had been guilty of incest, and Paul was grieved that the church of Corinth did not regard with horror a crime which even the pagan world would not have tolerated. His judgment on the case was uncompromising and the severest possible—that, in solemn assembly, in the name and with the power of the Lord Jesus, the offender should be delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh. On the other hand, the offender in 2 Cor 2 5ff is one who obviously has transgressed less heinously, and in a way more personal to the apostle. The church, says Paul, is capricious and inconsistent; they indeed cared for him and stood by him (2 9; 13 7), had, by a majority, brought censure to bear on this man, and Paul now urged that matters should go no farther, lest an excess of discipline should really end in a triumph of Satan. It is not possible to regard such references as applying to the crime dealt with in 1 Cor. Purposely veiled as the statements are, it would yet appear that a personal attack had been made on the apostle; and the "many" in 2 Cor 2 8, having at length persisted his cause, Paul then deals with the matter in the generous spirit he might have been expected to display. Even if the offender were the same person, which is most improbable, for he can scarcely have been retained in the membership, the language is not language that could have been applied to the earlier case. There has been a new offence in new circumstances. The apostle had been grievously wronged in the presence of the church, and the Corinthians had not spontaneously re- semblé the wrong done to him. The offender dealt with the apostle most deeply, and it is to secure their change in this respect that is his gravest concern.

Esp. in the later chs of 2 Cor there are, as we have seen, descriptions of an opposition by false teachers that is far beyond anything met with in 1 Cor. There indeed we have a spirit of faction, associated with unworthy partiality toward individual preachers, but nothing to lead us to suspect the presence of deep and radical differences undermining the gospel. The general consensus of opinion is that this opposition was of a Judaizing type, organized and fostered by implacable anti-Pauline emissaries from Pal, who, now followed the track of the apostle in Achaea as they did in Galatia. As this apostle pleads for himself a peculiar relation to Christ Himself ("Christ's men" and "ministers of Christ," 10 7; 11 13), it is possible that the Christus-party of 1 Cor (and possibly the Cephas-party) may have persisted and formed the nucleus round which these newcomers built up their formidable opposition. One man seems to have been conspicuous as their ring-leader (10 7,11), and to have made himself specially obnoxious to the apostle. In all probability we may take it that he was the offender in 2 Cor 12 17.

Under his influence the opposition audaciously endeavored to destroy the gospel of grace by personal attacks upon its most distinguished exponent. Paul was denounced as an upstart and self-seeker, the substitute of an apostle, and in proof of the contemptible appearance he made in person, in contrast with the swelling words and presumptuous claims of his ep. It is clear, therefore, that a profound religious crisis had arisen among the Corinthians, the result of which was a dislocation of their attachment to Paul and his doctrine being destroyed.

2 Cor 12 14 and 13 12 speak of a third visit in immediate prospect, and the latter passage also refers to a second visit that had been already accomplished; while 2 1 distinctly implies that Paul had been put in a position where, as the place of a character so painful that the apostle would never venture to endure a similar one. As this cannot possibly refer to the first visit when the church was founded, and cannot easily be regarded as indicating anything previous to 1 Cor which never alludes to such an experience, we must conclude that the reference points to the interval between 1 and 2 Cor. It is as if he were to say, "I shall return with sorrow," which humbled him (2 21) and left such deep wounds, had actually taken place. "Any exegesis," says Weisslieder justly, "that would avoid the conclusion that Paul had already been twice in Corinth argues for the identity of "argentum" (Apostle, Age, 1, 340). Sabatier (Apostle Paul, 172 n.) records his revised opinion: "The reference here (2 1) is to a second and quite recent visit, of which he retained a very sorrowful recollection, including it among the most bitter trials of his apostolic career."

Paul not only speaks of a visit which had ended grievously, but also of a letter which he had written to deal with the painful circumstances, and as a kind of ultimatum to bring the passage (2 4; 7 8). This letter was written because he could not trust himself meantime to another visit. He was so distressed and agitated that he wrote it "with many tears": after it was written he repented of it; and until he knew its effect he endured torture so keen that he hastened to Macedonia to meet his messenger, Titus, halfway. It is impossible by any stretch of interpretation to refer this language to 1 Cor, which on the whole is dominated by a spirit of didactic calm, and by a constant cord with its recipients. Even though there be in it occasional indications of strong feeling, there is certainly nothing that we can conceive the apostle might have wished to recall. The alternative has gen-eraly been to regard this as another case of a lost ep. Just as the writer of Acts appears to have been willing that the deplorable visit itself should drop into oblivion, so doubtless neither Paul nor the Corinthians would be very anxious to preserve an ep. which contains the gus of such a visit. On the other hand a strong tendency has set in to regard this intermediate ep. as at least in part preserved in 2 Cor 10—13, whose tone, it is universally admitted, differs from that of the preceding chapters in a remarkable way, not easily accounted for. The majority of recent writers seem inclined to favor this view, which will naturally fail to be considered under the head of "Integrity."

IV. Historical Reconstruction.—In view of such an interpretation, we may with considerable probability trace the course of events associated between 1 and 2 Cor as follows: After the dispatch of 1 Cor, news reached the apostle of a disquieting character: probably both Titus and Timothy, on returning from Corinth, reported the growth of dissensions within the church. The Judaizing party. Paul felt impelled to pay an immediate visit, and found only too sadly that matters had not been overstated. The opposition was strong and full of effrontery, and the whole treatment of things was against him. In face of the congregation he was baffled and flouted. He returned to Ephesus, and poured out his indignation in a severe ep., which he sent on by the hands of Titus. Before Titus could return, events took a disquieting turn: Ephesus, and Paul was forced to leave that city in peril of his life. He went to Troas, but, unable to wait patiently for tidings of the issue in Corinth, he crossed to Macedonia, and met Timothy possibly also Titus. The report was appalling demanding the immediate return of both. The congregation was left in their old attachment, and the heavy cloud of doubt and anxiety was dispelled from the apostle's mind. He then wrote—probably the ep. referred to as by 2 Cor—Titus and other brethren, he himself following a little later, and finally wintering in Corinth as he had originally planned. If it be felt that the interval between spring and autumn of the same year is too brief for the events, it must be remembered that the interval was of nearly 18 months. 1 Cor being referred to the spring of 54 or 55, and 2 Cor to the autumn of 55 or 56 AD. (Reference on the reconstruction should be made to Weizsäcker's Apostolic Age, Engl. tr. 1; to Sander's Note to the Eng. ed. [1865] of Paul's Apostolic Age; and to Robertson's art. in HDB.)

V. Integrity of the Epistle.—Although the genuineness of the various parts of the ep. is scarcely disputed, the homogeneity is much debated. Semler and some later writers, including Clemens (Einheitlichkeit), have thought that ch 9 should be eliminated as logically inconsistent with ch 8, and as evidently forming part of a letter to the Corinthians. But the connection with ch 9 is too close to permit of severance, and the logical objection, founded on the phraseology of 9 1, is generally regarded as hypercritical. There are two sections, however, whose right to remain integral parts of 2 Cor has been more forcibly challenged.

The passage 6 14 to 7 1 deals with the inconsistency and peril of intimate relations with the heathen, and is felt to be incongruous with the context. No doubt some were strongly affected on an inner impulse; the Corinthians to show the apostle the same frankness and kindness that he is showing them; whereas 7 2 follows naturally and links itself closely to such an appeal. When we remember that the particular theme of the last letter referred to in 1 Cor 5 9 was the relation of the converts to the immoral, it is by no means unlikely that we have here preserved a strand fragment of that ep.

It is universally acknowledged that there is a remarkable change in the tone of the section 10—13, which is exemplified in the phrase 2. Ch 10: previous chs. In the earlier chs there 1—13:10 is relief at the change which Titus has reported as having taken place in Corinth, and the spirit is one of gladness and content; but from ch 10 onward the hospitality to the apostle is unexpectedly represented as still raging, and as demanding the most strenuous treatment. The opening phrase, "Now I Paul" (10 1), is regarded as indicating a distinctive break from the previous section with which Timothy is associated (1 1), while the concluding vs, 13 11 to 13 10, seem fittingly to close that section, but to be abruptly out of harmony with the polemic that ends at 13 10. Accordingly it is suggested that 13 11 should immediately follow 9 15, and that 10—13 10 be regarded as a lengthy insertion from some other ep. Those who, while acknowledging the change of tone, yet maintain the integrity of the ep. do so on the ground that the apostle was a man of many moods, and that it is entirely possible for him to make unexpected and even violent transitions; that new reports of a merely scotched antagonism may come in to ruffle and disturb his comparative contentment; and that in any case he might well deem it advisable finally to deliver his whole soul on a matter over which he had brooded and suffered deeply, so that there might be no mistake about the ground being cleared when he arrived in person.

The question is still a subject of keen discussion, and is not one on which it is easy to pronounce dogmatically. On the whole, however, it must be acknowledged that the preponderance of recent opinion is in favor of the theory of interpolation. Haurwitz (Der Vier-Capitel-Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, 1870) gave an immense impetus to the view that this later section really represents the painful letter referred to in chs 2 and 7. As that earlier letter, however, must have contained references to the personal offender, the present section, which contains all such references, can be regarded as at most only a part of it. This theory is ably and minutely expounded by Schmiedel (Hand-Kommentar); and Pfliegerer, Lipsius, Clemen, Krenkel, von Soden, McGiffert, Cone, Flummer, Holtzmann, McG. Ads, and Zahn are all to be reckoned as advocates of the integrity of the ep.

VI. Contents of the Epistle.—The order of matter in the ep. is quite clearly defined. There are three main divisions: (1) chs 1—7; (2) chs 8—9; and (3) chs 10—15.

The first seven chapters as a whole are taken up with a retrospect of the events that have recently transpired, joyful references to the 1. Chs 1—7 fact that the clouds of grief in connection with them have been dispelled, and that the spiritual ministry as a Divine trust and power is clearly manifested; the whole, as an answer to the Corinthians to show the apostle the same frankness and kindness that he is showing them; whereas 7 2 follows naturally and links itself closely to such an appeal. still more fruitful to the church (1 3–11). He professes his sincerity in all his relations with the Corinthians, and particularly vindicates it in connection with a change in the plan which had originally promised a return ("a second benefit") to Corinth; his sole reason for refraining, and for writing a painful letter instead, being his desire to spare them and to prove them (1 12; 2 4–9). Far from harboring any resentment against the man who had caused so much trouble, he sincerely pleads that his punishment by the majority should go no further, but that perhaps a fresh start could now reign, lest the Adversary should gain an advantage over them (2 5–11). It was indeed an agonizing experience until the moment he met Titus, but the relief was all the sweeter and more triumphant when God at length gave it, as he might have been sure he would give it to a faithful and soul-winning servant of Christ (2 12–17). He does not indeed wish to enter upon any further apologies or self-commendation. Some believe greatly in letters of commendation, but his living testimonial is in his converts. This he has, not of himself, but entirely through God, who alone has made him an efficient minister of the new and abiding covenant of the Spirit, whose glory naturally excels that of the old covenant path which cannot bring life. Regarding this glorious ministry he must be bold and frank. It needs no veil as if to conceal its evanescence. Christ presents it unveiled to all who turn to Him, and they themselves reflect His glory in a new light transformed (3 1–18). As for those who by God's mercy have received such a gospel ministry, it is impossible for them to be faint-hearted in its exercise, although the eyes of some may be blinded to the because the god of this world has blinded them (4 4). It is miraculous that wonderful that ministers of this grace should be creatures so frail, so subject to pressure and affliction, but it is not inexplicable. Much more the obvious is it that all the power and glory of salvation are from God alone (4 7–15). Yes, even if one be called to die in this ministry, that is but another light and momentary affliction. It is but passing from a frail earthly tent to abide forever in a heavenly home (5 1). Who would not long for it, though this body of sin is no longer in mortality? Courage, therefore, is ours to the end, for that end only means the cessation of our separation from Christ, whom it is a joy to serve absent or present. And present we shall all ultimately, be before Him in the judgment seat (5 2). That self-uneschapably deepens the earnestness with which preachers of the gospel seek to persuade men. It is the love of Christ constraining them (5 14) in the ministry of reconciliation, that they should entreat men as ambassadors on Christ's behalf (5 20) So sacred and responsible a trust has subdued the apostle's own life, and is indeed the key to its manifold endurance, and to the earnestness with which he has striven to cultivate every grace, and to submit himself to every discipline (6 1–10). Would God the Corinthians might open their hearts to him as he does to them? (Let them have no fellowship with iniquity, but perfect holiness in the fear of God [6 14–7 1].) He has never wronged them; they are envirced in his heart, living or dying; he glories in them, and is filled with comfort in all his affliction (6 11–13; 7 2–4). For what blessed comfort that was that Titus brought him in Macedonia to dispel his fears, and to show that the things he regretted and grieved were not as he thought; and so it ran all through, but had rather wrought in them the joyful change for which he longed! Now both they and he knew how dear he was to them. Titus, too, was overjoyed by the magnanimity of their reception of him. The apostle's cup is full, and "in everything he is of good courage concerning them" (7 16).

In the second section, chs 8–9, the apostle, now abundantly confident of their good-will, exhorts the Corinthians on the subject of the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem. He tells them of the extraordinary liberality of the Macedonian churches, and invites them to emulate it, and by the display of this additional grace to make full proof of their love (8 1–8). Nay, they have a higher incentive than the liberality of Macedonia, even the self-sacrifice of Christ Himself (8 9). Wherefore let them go on with the good work they were so ready to initiate a year ago, giving out of a willing mind, as God hath enabled them (8 10–15). Further to encourage them he sends on Titus and other well-known and accredited brethren, whose interest in them is as great as his own, and he is hopeful that by their aid the matter will be completed, and all will rejoice when he comes, bringing with him probably some of those of Macedonia, to whom he has already been boasting of their zeal (8 16–9 5). Above all, let them remember that important issues are bound up with this grace of Christian liberality. It is impossible to reap bountifully, if we sow sparingly. Grudgingness and stinginess are unchristian, and displease, but God loveth and rewardeth a cheerful giver. This grace blesseth him that gives and him that takes. Many great ends are served by it. The wants of the needy are supplied, men's hearts are drawn after, that spiritually two things may be done, and God himself is glorified (9 6–15).

The third section, chs 10–13, as has been pointed out, is a spirited and even passionate polemic, in the course of which the Judaizing spirit is prolonged and made more clearly visible (10 15). The enemies of the apostle have charged him with being very bold and courageous when he is absent, but humble enough when he is present. He hopes the Corinthians will not compel him to show his courage (10 2). It is true, being human, he walks in the flesh, but not in the selfish and cowardly way his opponents suggest. The weapons of his warfare are not carnal, yet are they mighty before God to cast down strongholds, and to be swallowed up in immolation and disobedience. Some boast of being "Christ's," but that is no monopoly; he also is Christ's. They think his letters are mere "sound and fury, signifying nothing," by and by they will discover their mistake. If Christ is justified, we are justified. Wrought through faith, he is justified, for Corinth was verily part of his God-appointed province, and he at least did not there enter on other men's labors. But it would be well if men who gloried confined themselves to glorying "in the Lord." For after all it is His commendation alone that is of any permanent value (10 3–18). Will the Corinthians bear with him in a little of this foolish boasting? Truly he ventures on it out of concern for them (11 2). And as they are manifestly to every one in patience toward those who have come with a different gospel, they may perhaps extend some of their indulgence to him, for though he cannot lay claim to a polished oratory comparable to that of these "super-eminent" apostles, yet at least he is not behind them in knowledge (11 4–6). Can it be that he really sinned in preaching the gospel to them without fee or reward? Was it a mark of fleshly cunning when he resolved not to be burdened to them, while he accepted supplies from Macedonia? If he did not love them, but because he decided to give no occasion to those who were too ready to blame him—those false apostles, who, like Satan himself, masqueraded as angels of light and ministers of righteousness (11 7–15). Come, then, let him to this glorying, this poor folly, which they in their superlative wisdom bear with so gladly in the case of those insolent creatures who now bully and degrade them (11 16–21). Hebrews! Israelites! So is he the Magdalen of Christ! The modern harlot, in labors, in perils, in persecutions; in burdens, axies, sympathies; in visions and revelations of the Lord; in infirmities and weaknesses that have made more manifest in him the strength of Christ (11 22–12 10). Certainly all this is folly, but they are most to blame for it who, through lack of loyalty, have forced him to it. Did he injure them by declining to be burdensome? Is it so sore a point? Let it be forgiven! Yet when he comes again he will take no other course (12 11–18).
They must not imagine that in all this he is ex-cusing himself to them. He is sincerely and affectionately concerning himself for their edifying.
He trembles lest when they meet again they should be disappointed in each other; lest they should be found in unworthy strife and tumults, and lest he should be humbled of God before them, having cause to mourn over some who are hardened and impotent in their sins (12 19–21). For they must meet again—he is coming for the third time—and this time he will not spare. Let them prove them-seловe whether they be in the faith; for surely they must know whether Christ be in them. He earnestly prays for their goodness and honor; not to the end that no display of his power may be called for, but simply that he will be glad to appear weak if they should appear strong. Could they but believe it, their perfecting is the aim of all his labors (13 1–10).
And so, with words of grace and tenderness, exhorting them to unity and peace, and pronouncing over them the threefold benediction, he bids them farewell (13 11–14).

VII. Value of the Epistle.—The chief element of value in this ep. is the revelation it gives of the apostle himself. Through all its changing moods, Paul, in perfect abandon, shows us his very soul, suffering, rejoicing, enduring, overcoming. It has been truly said that “it enables us, as it were, to lay our hands upon his breast, and feel the very throbings of his heart.” (1) In relation to his conversion, however, he shows us how he was, how easy it was to touch him on the quick, and to wound his feelings. The apostle was very human, and nowhere are his kindred limitations more obvious than in these present incidents. He would probable not be the first were said that even with him the creed was greater than the life. In the hastily written and nervously repented passages of that severe ep.; in the restless wandering, like a perturbed spirit, from Troas to Macedonia, to meet the news and know the issue of his acts, we see a man most lovable indeed, most like ourselves when issues hang in the balance, but a man not already perfect, not yet risen to the measure of the stature of Christ. Yet we see also the intensity with which Paul labored in his ministry—the tenacity with which he held to his mission, and the invincible courage with which he returned to the fight for his imperiled church. He loved those converts as only a great soul in Christ could love them. His keenest sorrow came in the disaster that threatened them, and he flew to their defence.
He had not only won them for Christ, he was willing to die that he might keep them for Christ.
(2) The ep. is charged with a magnificent consciousness, on the apostle’s part of his high calling in Christ Jesus. He has been called with a Divine calling to the most glorious work in which a man can engage, to be to this estranged earth an ambassador of heaven. Received as Divine, this vocation is accepted with supreme devotion. It has been a ministry of sorrow, of strain and suffering, of hair-breadth escapes with the bare life; with its horn in the flesh, its buffeting of Satan. Yet through it all there rings the note of abounding consolation in Christ Jesus, and never was the “power of Christ,” resting on frail humanity, more signally manifested.

LITERATURE.—See the references to both ep., and to 2 Cor alone, under this heading in the preceding art. To the last there given should be added Moffett’s Introduction to the Literature of the N.T., 1911; valuable for its critical presentation of recent views, and for its references to the literature.

CORINTHIANS, kòr-in-th’us: Lat form for Gr
Korinthos in the subscription to Rom (AV). See Corinth.

CORMORANT, kôr-môr-ant (CTli, shâlakh; kàpatêkthi, katarâkthi; Lat Corvus marinus): A large sea-fowl belonging to the genus Phalaerocorax and well described by the Heb word used to designate it—which means a “plunging bird.”
The bird appears as large as a goose when in full feather, but plucked, the body is much smaller.
The adult birds are glossy blue, bronze tinted, touched with white on the cheeks and sides as a festal dress at mating season, and adorned with filamentary feathers on the head, and bright yellow gape. These birds if taken young and carefully trained can be sent into boats and bring to their masters large quantities of good-sized fish: commonly so used in China. The flesh is dark, tough and quite unfit to eat in the elders on account of their diet of fish. The nest is built mostly of seaweed. The eggs are small for the size of the birds, having a rough, thick, but rather soft shell of a bluish white which soon becomes soiled, as well as the nest and its immediate surroundings, from the habits of the birds. The young are leathery black, then goved with soft down of brownish black above and white beneath and taking on the full black of the grown bird at about three years. If taken in the squab state the young are said to be delicious food, resembling baked hares in flavor. The old birds are mentioned among the abominations for food (Lev 11 13–19; Dt 14 12–18). Gene Stratton-Porter

CORN, kôrn (ГР, dâghan; отрос, sâlos): A word used for cereals generally (Gen 27 28.37, etc.
AV) such as our Eng. word “corn.” ARV almost invariably substitutes “grain” for “corn.” The latter may be taken to include (1) barley, (2) wheat, (3) fitches (vetches), (4) lentils, (5) beans, (6) milllet, (7) rye—the wrong tr for vetches, (8) pulse—for these see separate articles. Rye and oats are not cultivated in Pal. For many references to corn see Agriculture; Food. “A corn (kôxos, kôk-kos, RV ‘grain’) of wheat” is mentioned (Jn 12 24).
CORNEILUS, kor-ne'1-lus (ΚΩΡΕΙΛΟΣ, KOR-EL-LOS, "of a horn"): The story of Cornelius is given in Acts 10:1—11:18. The name is
1. His Rom and belonged to distinguished
Family and families in the imperial city, such as Station the house and probably was, as we shall see, probably an Italian of Rom blood. Julian the Apostle reckons him as one of the few persons of distinction who became a Christian. He was evidently a man of importance in Caesarea and well known to the Jews (Acts 10:22). He was a centurion in the Italian cohort. To understand this we must note that the Rom army was divided into two broad divisions, the legions and the auxiliary forces. See ARM, ROMAN.

Legions were never permanently quartered in Pal until the great war which ended in the destruction of Jerus. 70 AD. From the year 6 AD, when Pal was made into a province of Rom, it was garrisoned by auxiliary troops recruited amongst the Samaritans and Syrian Greeks. The headquarters were naturally at Caesarea, the residence of the procurator. But it would not have been prudent for a garrison in Pal to be composed wholly of troops locally recruited. Therefore it recruited from the Roman legionaries mingled with the garrison 600 soldiers, free Italian volunteers. With this cohort Cornelius was a centurion.

He is described as devout and God-fearing, i.e. at least, one of those men so numerous in that age of decadent heathenism who, discontended with polytheism, yearned for a better faith, embraced, therefore, the monotheism of the Jews, read the Scriptures, and practised more or less of the Jewish rites. He was well reported of by the Jews, and his religion showed itself in prayer at the regular hours, and in aims to the people (of Israel). Even Jewish bigotry was not immune in presence of so noble a man. Moreover, he seems to have made his house a sort of church, for his kinsfolk and friends were in sympathy with him, and among the soldiers who closely attended him were some devout ones (Acts 10:1-27).

The story of his conversion and admission into the Christian church is told with some minuteness in Acts 10. Nothing further is known

3. His Ad- of Cornelius, though one tradition admission into sert's that he founded the church in the Christian community, and that he became the bishop of Scamandros.

The exact importance of the incident depends upon the position of Cornelius before it occurred. Certainly he was not a proselyte of the synagogue, a member of the Jewish community.

4. Signifi- of the This is abundantly evident from Acts cance of Incident 10:28-34.5; 11:3.15; 17:14. But was he not an inferior form of proselyte, later called "proselyte of the gate"? His question has been much debated and is still under discussion.

Ramsay (ST. PAUL THE TRAVELLER, 43) says that the expression, "God-fearing," applied to him, is always used in Acts with reference to this kind of proselytes. Such were, by custom, members of certain regulations of purity, probably those, this author thinks, mentioned in Acts 15, 29, and which stand in close relation to the principles laid down in Lev 17-18 for the conduct of strangers dwelling among Israel. Renan, on the other hand, denies that Cornelius was a proselyte at all, but simply a devout Gentile who adopted some of the Jewish ideas and religious customs which did not involve a special profession. The importance of the whole transaction to the development of the church seems to depend upon the circumstances that Cornelius was probably not a proselyte at all. Thus we regard Cornelius as lit. the first-fruits of the Gentiles.

The step here taken by Peter was therefore one of tremendous importance to the whole development of the church. The significance of the incident consists exactly in this, that under Divine direction, the first Gentile, not at all belonging to the old theocracy, becomes a Spirit-filled Christian, entering through the front door of the Christian church without first going through the narrow gate of Judaism. The incident settled forever the great, fundamental question as to the relations of Jew and Gentile in the church. The difficulties in the way of the complete triumph of Peter's view of the equality of Jews and Gentiles in the Kingdom of Christ were enormous. It would have been indeed little short of miraculous if the multitude of Christian Pharisees had not raised the question again and again. Did they not dog Paul's steps after the Council? Certainly Ramsay is wrong in saying that the case of Cornelius was passed over orcondoned as exceptional, for it was used as a precedent by both Peter and James (Acts 15:7-14).

As for Peter's subsequent conduct at Antioch, no one who knows Peter need be surprised at it. The very accusation that Paul hurled at him was that for the moment he was carried into inconsistency with his principles (HUSPOKRIEIS). Of course, this incident of Cornelius was only the first step in a much longer development; but the rest is settled. The rest in due time and proper order was sure to follow. By this tremendous innovation it was settled that Christianity was to be freed from the swaddling bands of Judaism and that the Christian church was not to be an appendix to the synagogue. The noble character of Cornelius was just fitted to abate, as far as possible, the prejudices of the Jewish Christians against what must have seemed to them a dangerous, if not awful, innovation.

CORNER, kör'när (Λόγος, misk6'n, θεί, pe'n δόμ, pinnádh, ýxó̂kh, archē, ywvía, gōnía, akro'-yovnoi, akro'-yovnaios, akro'-yovnaioi): In Ex 26:24; Exk 40

22; 46:22; misk6'n, "angle" is tr' "corner," pe'nákh, "side," "quarter," and pinnádh, "corner," "front," "chief," are more frequently so tr', e.g. Ex 26:26; Lev 19:9; Jer 9:26; 25:23; and Ex

27:2; 1 K 7:34; Ps 118:22; Isa 28:16 ("corner-stone"); Jer 51:26. Other words are kóp'ny, "wing and head" (Isa 33:12) Exk 1:2; káthēn's, "sheldur" (2 K 11:11 AV bia); pa'n, "foot" (Exk 9:12 AV); závōdýth, "corner-stones" (Ps 144:12; Zee 9:15 [tr' "corners"]).

For "corner-stone" RV has "side" (Exk 36:25), "corner-stone" (Zec 10:4), also for "stay" (Isa 19:13). Instead of "teacher removed into a corner" (Isa 30:20), "be hidden," "hide themselves"; for "corners" we have "feet" (Ex 26:12; 1 K 7:30); "ribs" (Exk 30:4; 37:27); for "divide into corners" (Neh 9:25), "alot after their portions"; for "into corners" (Dk 32:26), "afar"; the words to Israel (Isa 41:9) called thee from the chief men [dácftim] thereof are rendered by RV "called thee from the corners thereof" (of the earth).

In the NT we have gōnía ("angle," "corner"); "in the corners of the streets" (Mt 6:5), "the head of the corner" (21:42), the "four corners of the earth" (Rev 7:1; 20:8); archē ("a beginning") (Acts 10:11; 11:5); "chief corner stone" (Eph 2:20; 1 Pet 2:6), is a tr of akro'-yovnaios ("at the extreme angle").

CORNER GATE, kör'när gāt. See JERUSALEM.

CORNERS OF THE EARTH. See EARTH, Corners of.

CORNER-STONE, kör'när stōn (γόν, pinná, γώνι, závōth, akro'yovnaios, akro'yovnaios): Part of the public or imposing buildings to which importance has been attached in all ages and in many nations, both on account of its actual service and its figurative meaning. Ordinarily its use in the Bible is figurative, or symbolical. No doubt the original meaning has some importance to the stone, which was laid at the foundation of a building.

(1) With the Canaanites, who preceded Israel in the possession of Pal, corner-stone laying seems to have been a most sacred and impressive ceremonial. Under this important stone of temples, or other great structures, bodies of children or older persons would be laid, consecrating the building by such human sacrifice (see Fortification, II, 1). This was one of many hideous rites and practices which Israel was to extirpate. It may throw light on the curse pronounced upon the rebuilding of Jericho (Josh 6:26; see PEFs, January, 1904, July, 1908). See CANAAN.

(2) OT references.—The Heb word piramah, "corner," is found or implied in every occurrence of this idea. Derived from a root signifying "to turn," turn, and therefore "edge" or "corner." Ordinarily it is used with 'ebben, "stone" (Ps 118:22); or it may occur alone, having acquired for itself through frequent use the whole technical phraseology (see Ps 10:4 AV). While all the passages indicate the stone by which corners there appear to be two conceptions: (a) the foundation-stone upon which the structure rested (Job 38:6; Isa 28:16; Jer 51:26); or (b) the topmost or top-center, which linked the last to the first (Ps 118:22; Zac 4:7); in both cases it is an important or key-stone, and figurative of the Messiah, who is "the First and the Last." In Job 38:6 it beautifully expresses in figures the stability and firmness of the earth, which Jehovah created. In Zac 10:4 the leader or ruler in the Messianic age is represented by the corner-stone. The ancient tradition of the one missing stone, when the temple was in building, is reflected in or has been suggested by Ps 118:22 (Midr quoted by Pusey under Zac 4:7). It is probable that we should read in Ps 144 12 not "corner-stones," but "corner-pillars," or supports (cf Gr Caryatides) from a different Heb word, ystahs.

(3) NT passages.—Ps 118:22 is quoted and interpreted as fulfilled in Jesus Christ in a number of passages: Mt 21:42; Mk 12:10; Lk 20:17; Acts 4:11 and 1 Pet 2:7; it is also the evident base of passages in Is 28:16. It occurred twice in the NT: Rom 9:33, from LXX combined with the words of Isa 8:14, and in 1 Pet 2:6, which is quoted with some variation from LXX. The OT passages were understood by the rabbis to be Messianic, and were properly so applied by the NT writers. See also HOUSE, E wound MACK.

CORNET, kör-net, kor-net. See MUSIC.

CORNFLOOR, kör-floör (к? τα, goren daigham): "Thou hast loved a reward upon every cornfloor." (Hos 9:14 AV, RV "hire upon every grainfloor"). Israel had deserted Jeh for supposed material benefots and regarded bounteous crops as the gift of the heathen gods which they worshipped. Jeh would therefore cause the corn (grain) and wine to fail (ver 2). See also THRESHING-FLOOR.

CORONATION, kor-ö-na’shan (φυτοευλογία, protokolēsia): Occurs in 2 Mac 4:21 (AV, RV "en- thronement") where Apollonius was sent into Egypt for the coronation of Ptolemy Philometor king. The Gr word protokolēsia occurs nowhere else, and its meaning is uncertain. The reading in Swete is protokolēsia, and this means "the first call."
CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF (Χαρτώνιτες θρόνος), har ha-mashōḥeth; τὸ ὄρος τοῦ Μοσαθ, ὁ ὄρος τοῦ Μοοᾳθ: The hill on the right hand of which Solomon built high places for Ashoreth, Chemosh and Milcom (2 K 23 13). The mountain is referred to is no doubt the Mount of Olives. The high places would, therefore, be on the southern height called in later Christian writings the "Mount of Offence," and now, by the Arabs, Bāṭan el-Hawā. Har ha-mashōḥeth is probably only a perversian of har ha-mishāḥah, "Mount of Anointing," a later name of the Mount of Olives.

COS, kos (Κός, ὄς, "summit": AV Coos): An island of the coast of Caria, Asia Minor, one of the Sporades, mountainous in the southern half, with ridges extending to a height of 2,500 ft.; identified with the modern Stinichelo. It was famous in antiquity for excellent wine, amphorae, wheat, ointments, silk and other clothing (Coae vates). The capital was also called Cos and was a famous hospital and medical school, and was the birthplace of Hippocrates (the father of medicine), of Ptoselus Philadelphus, and of the celebrated painter Apelles. The large plane tree in the center of the town (about 5,000 years old) is called "the tree of Hippocrates" to this day. The older capital, Astypalaea, was in the western part of the island, the later (since 306 BC) in the eastern part. From almost every point can be seen beautiful landscapes and picturesque views of sea and land and mountain.

Cos was one of the six Dorian colonies. It soon became a flourishing place of commerce and industry; later, like Corinth, it was one of the Jewish centers of the Aegaean, as well as one of the financial centers of the commercial world in the eastern Mediterranean. Among the benefactors of the people of Cos was Herod the Great. It is mentioned in connection with Paul's third missionary journey in Acts 21 1, and in its relations with the Jews in Mt 19 2; Mk 3 12; Lk 10 25; Acts 28 16; Bf, I, xxxi. 11. For a list of works on the island see Paton-Hicks, Inscriptions of Cos, ix.

J. E. HARRIX

COSAM, kō'sam (Κόσαμ, Κόσαμ): An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy in the 5th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

COSMOGONY, kos-mog'ō-ni. See Anthropology; Creation; Earth; Evolution; World.

COSMOLOGY, kos-mol'-ō-ji. See World; Provi

COSTLINESS, kost'l-lness (χρηστλησις, timitldta), "preciousness," "an abundance of costly things": Found only in Rev 18 19, "made rich by reason of her costliness.

COTES, kōts. See Sheepfoot.

COTTAGE, kot'aj. See House.

COTTON, kot'n (קֵסֶר, karpas), is the better tr., as in Rv, where and AV and RV have "green" in Est 1 6): The Heb karpas is from the Pers kirdas and the Sanskrit karpḍa, "the cotton plant." The derived words originally meant "muslin" or "calico," but in classical times the use of words allied to karpḍa—in Gr and Lat—was extended to include linen. The probability is in favor of "cotton" in Est 1 6. This is the product of Gossypium herbaceum, a plant originally from India but now cultivated in many other lands.

COUCH, kouch (subst.). See Bed.

Couch (vb.): רָפה, raphag, "to crouch," "slurk," as a beast in readiness to spring on its prey. "If thou dost not well, sin coucheth at the door" (Gen 4 7, AV "lieth"), waiting for it to open. Cain is warned to beware of the first temptations to evil, in his case esp. a sullen and jealous disposition (cf. Dan 5, "Inferno, I, 30). See Abel; Cain. The tribe of Judah is compared for its bravery to a recumbent lion or lionness (Gen 49 9; cf. Nu 24 9 f); and Issacchar to "a strong ass, couching down between the sheepfolds" (49 14, AV "between two burdens"; cf. Jgs 5 16). "The deep that coucheth beneath" (Dt 33 13), probably the springs of water, or possibly, as Driver suggests, "the subterraneous deep, pictured as a gigantic monster." See Antss. (Kbe, L. E. O. E. Est 18.

COUCHING-PLACE, kouch'ing-plas (קְוֹצ, marbîc; once in EV Ezek 25 5): The same Heb word, however, which means simply "place of lying down" of animals in repose, is used also in Zeph 3 15 where the tr is "a place . . . to lie down in." The figure, a case, as the context (see besides, Isa 17 2; 27 10), suggests desolation.

COUler, kol'ær. See Flook.

COUNCIL, koun'sil, COUNCILLOR, koun'si-lar (συμβολιον, sumbolion): An assembly of advisers (Acts 26 12); a body of those taking counsel (see Schürer's Jewish People in the Time of Christ, I (1), 60). Distinguished from συνέκτρον, sunedrion, the supreme court of the Jews, by being of a less formal character, i.e. less of an institution. For "council" in the latter sense, its most frequent use, see Sanhedrin. A councillor (Gr bouleutēs) was a member of the Sanhedrin. Applied to Joseph of Arimathaea (Mt 27 55; Lk 23 50). In AV "counsellor."

COUNSEL, koun'sel, COUNSELLOR, koun'se-lar (συμβολιον, sumbolion): Ordinarily found as the object of συνεκτο, expressing, beside the idea of a practical end to be reached, that of consultation and deliberation among those united in a common cause (Mt 12 14; Mk 3 6). A councillor (samboulos) is a confidential adviser (Rom 11 34); often in the OT (Isa 9 6; Prov 24 6, etc). Confounded in AV with "counsellor" (see above), the latter being an official adviser, which the former does not necessarily mean.

COUNt, kount (קָׁנַת, qophar, קַנַת, mānâh; ψηφίσθαι, ψηφίσθαι): Used of arithmetical computation "to number" (Ps 139 18; Nu 23 10); also for קָנָה, qahnah, "to reckon," to indicate classification among or identification with, "c. for a stranger" (Job 19 15); "c. for his enemy" (Job 33 10). In the NT the arithmetical computation is less prominent, except in the sense of "calculate," ψηφίσθαι, sumpephseli, "to reckon with pebbles," each pebble representing a unit (Lk 14 28; Acts 19 19); of moral estimate, ἡχημοναι and ἔχομαι (Phil 3 7 13). The noun, fr Heb kōṯeth, "a count of" (Ex 12 4), viz. in the arithmetical sense.

COUNTENANCE, koun'te-nans: (1) The noun (see also s.v. Face) is the tr of a variety of Heb and Gr expressions, קָנָן, qânín; רָכָּן, râqô̂n, being the most frequent. Be sides there are found הָנָּה, mar'eh, "appearance," "shape," "comeliness," "visage," יָשָׁה, "eye," נָפָת, יָרָה, "appearance," "figure," etc., and Aram. יְד, יָדֵּה. To the Oriental the countenance mirrors, even more than to us, the character and feelings of the heart. The countenance (mar'eh) is rendered "light" (Prov. 17:1; 2 S 14:27; Job 15:20) in 2 S 16 12, lit. "face of eyes;" "comely" (Cant 2 14); "beautiful" (I 25 3); "cheerful" (Ps 183; 13); "angry" (Prov 26 23); "dreadful" (Dn 8 29); "troubled" (Ezk 27 33); "sad" (1 S 1 18; Ne 3 3; Eccl 7 3). The countenance is "shaped," i.e. made keen (Prov 27 17); it "falls;" i.e. looks dendespont, dispointed (Gen 4 5.6); is "cast down" (Job 29 24); "changed" (Job 14 20; cf. "altered" into glory, Lk 9 29; Dn 5 6.9.10; 7 28, Aram. רֵע). To settle one's countenance steadfastly upon a person (2 K 8 11) is synonymous with staring or gazing at a person. Not infrequently we find compound expressions such as "light of countenance," i.e. favor (Job 29 24; Ps 4 6; 44 3; 89 50; 30 8); "health of countenance" (Ps 11 2; 45 5); "help of countenance" (Ps 25 4); "rebuke of countenance" (Ps 80 16); "pride of countenance" (Heb "aph", lit. "haughty," "lofty ness," Ps 10 3). As vb. (Heb נָתַת, nathar, "to countenance") we find the word in AV of Ex 23 3, where the Revisers translate "Neither shalt thou favor [AV "countenance"] a poor man in his cause." Here the meaning seems to be that no distinction of persons shall be made by the judge. See Lev 19 15, where, however, a different word is used. There is therefore no need of the emendation proposed by Knobel and accepted by Kautzsch, who would read נָתַת, nathol, "great," for נָתַת, nathar, "and the poor" of the text. The LXX has πᾶν, pēnēs, "poor." H. L. E. LUXRING

COUNTER-CHARM, kōm'ter-charm. See Amulet; Charm.

COUNTERFEIT, kōm'ter-fêt (קִיפָּה, kīpāh, קוּפָּה, kōpāh, אָנָוגֵו, anōgāv, ἀνύγμα, homōtah): "Ok," occurs as the tr of kīpāh, "mixed with dross," "not genuine" (Wisd 15 9, "to make c. things," RV "moulded counterfeits," "spurious things, imitations," Ps 103 17; LXX Lev 17 19; Dn 2 11, "mixed metals,", and 2 Cor 13 5.6, addōkmos, "reprove" [silver]). "Counterfeit" in the older sense of a representation occurs in Wisd 14 17 (anōgāv, "to make a likeness"); "of his visage," RV "imagine him likeness from afar, and Eccles 38 27 (homōtah, "to make like," i.e. to c. imagery, RV "to preserve likeness in his portraiture.) W. L. WALKER

COUNTERVAIL, kōm'ter-vāl (מַזְמִית, māzamīth, "equalized"); To thwart or overcome by acting against with equal force; thus, "The enemy could not c. the king's damage" or loss (Est 7 4 ARV reads "The adversary could not have compensated for the king's damage"). "Nothing doth c. [RV 'can be taken in exchange for'] a faithful friend" (Eccles 6 15).

COUNTRY, kōm'tri (מָרָה, mrāh, "land," יַמִּי, yāmī, "sea," "sea," סָדָה, sādāh, "field," יָפָה, yāpāh, "field," חָרָה, charāh, "region"); The foregoing are the principal words rendered "country" in EV, though we find also בְּדָהֵנָה, earth (Jon 4 2); יֵבָּל, "island" (Jer 47 4 AV); גְּלַח, "circle" (Ezk 47 8 AV); הָבֵּל, "rope" (Dt 3 14); מַקְגֹּם, "place" (Gen 29 26 AV); נָךְ, "hill" or "height" (Jos 17 11 AV); גֵּנָא, "race" (Acts 4 36 AV); יַג, yāh, "earth" (Mt 9 31 AV; Acts 7 3 AV); פָּרָטָס, parātās, "native land" (Lk 4 23; Jn 4 44; He 11 14); ἐνεπίγωνος, ἐνεργόν, "country [ARV "region"] round about" (Mt 14 35; Lk 3 3; 4 37; 8 37). In He 11 14 ff, "heaven" is referred to as a country. Egypt and Assyria were "far country" or "great country" and the hill country (of the numerous Gibeans [gibh'-ah, "hill"]) was the mountainous region to the N. or to the S. of Jerus. The low country, skophēth (see SHEPHERELAH), consisted of the foothills to the west of the hill country. The "south country" or "country of (nagphēth), q.v., was the dry, extreme southern part of Pal, approximately between Beersheba and Kadesh-barnea.

COUNTRYMAN, kōm'tri-man (φανερός, φανερότατον, synphilētos): "Of the same tribe" (1 Thess 2 14); also in idiomatic rendering (γίνεσθαι, γένος) for those of one's own race or kin (2 Cor 11 26; Gal 1 14 AV, "one's own nation"). Cf Mk 6 4; Rom 9 3; and see Cousin; Kinship, etc.

COUPLE, kūp': (1) Used as a noun, indicates two objects of the same kind that are considered together. Thus we read of a couple of cakes (2 S 16 6, used loosely), and a couple of lessons (2 S 16 1, Heb geneh). (2) Used as a vb., it means to join or fasten one thing to another. This term occurs most frequently in the description of the tabernacle (see Ex 26 9.0.11; 36 13.0.16). Couple is used in 1 Pet 3 2 to describe the joining of fear to chaste behavior (Heb hadhāhbar).

COUPLING, kūp'ling: Is the EV rendering of מְדֹר, madhereth. This Heb BeNegev (nagphēth), or the place where one thing is joined to another, as of the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex 26 4.5), and of the different parts of the ephod (Ex 28 27; 39 20). It is also the EV rendering of מְדֹר, madhērēth, and this refers more to the thing that joins the two objects, as beams of wood (2 Ch 34 11), or hooks of iron (1 Ch 22 3).

COURAGE, kōr'ā: Heb נָשָׁא, "to show one self strong" (Nu 13 20; 2 S 10 12; 1 Ch 19 13; 2 Ch 15 8; Ezr 10 4; Ps 27 14; 31 24; Isa 41 6); רָע, "spirit," "animus" (Josh 2 11 AV); "amaq, to be alert" (physically and mentally), "to be agile," "quick," "energetic" (Dt 31 6.7.23; Josh 1 9 18.18; 10 29; 1 Ch 26 22); נַחַר, "heart," and fig.: "person," "spirit" (Dn 11 25); גֵר תְּרָסָא, "cheer" (Acts 28 15). A virtue highly esteemed among all nations, one of the four chief "natural" (cardinal) virtues (Wisd 8 7), while cowardice ranks among one of the mortal sins (Eccles 2 12.13; Rev 21 8).

COURSE, kōr' (from Lat cura, "a running," "race," "voyage," "way"): (1) קְפֶל, kofel, euthrōstathom, "forward or onward movement," as of a ship: "We made a straight c." (Acts 16 11; of Acts 21 11); "We had finished our c." (RV "voyage," Acts 21 7). (2) A (prescribed or self-appointed) path, as of the sun: "Swift is the sun in his c." (1 Esd 4 34); of the stars: "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Jgs 6 20 AV) (see Astronomy; Astrology); of a river (or irrigating canal): "as willows by the watercourses" (Isa 44 4); of a race of people, "repeas, triēch" (Acts 2 39); or the time (Acts 27 24); may have free c." (RV "may run") (2 Thess 3 1). (3) A career in such a course (hōphas, drōmos): "I have finished my [RV "the"] c." (2 Tim 4 7); "as John fulfilled [RV "was fulfilling"] his c." (Acts 7 45); "that we may accomplish [RV "may accomplish"] my c." (Acts 20 24). (4) A way or manner, as of life: "Every one turned to his e.” (Jer 8:6); “their e. is evil” (Jer 23:10); “walked according to the e. [sādāh, sāḥān, RVm “age”] of this world” (Eph 2:2).

(5) Orderly succession: “sang together by e.” (ARV “sang one to another”) (Exz 3:11); “by e.” (RV “in turn”) (1 Cor 14:27); the courses of the priests and Levites (1 Chr 23:1-15; 1 Chr 23:1; 2 Chr 5:11; Lk 1:58). See Priests and Levites.

(6) A row or layer, as of masonry: “All the foundations of the earth are out of e.” (RV “are moved”; ARV “are shaken”) (Ps 82:5).

The Tabernacle: (a) Was the residential dwelling-place of God (Exz 3:4). The Tabernacle, and particularly the “court of nature” (Jas 3:6). The cycle of generation (tōn trochón tēs genēsēs) here means the physical world as constituted by the round of origin and decay, and typified by the Orphic (legendary) cycle of births and deaths through which the soul passes in metempsychosis. COURT, kōrt. OF THE SANCTUARY, sā’kthr-āt (Tabernacle, Temple): By “court” (‘šēr), hāqér) is meant a clear space inclosed by curtains or walls, or surrounded by buildings. It was always an uncovered inclosure, but might have within its area one or more edifices.

The first occurrence of the word is in Exz 27:9, where it is commanded to “make the court of the tabernacle.” The dimensions for this court follow in the directions for the length of the Tabernacle of the linen curtains which were to inclose it. From these we learn that the perimeter of the court was 300 cubits, and that it consisted of two squares, each 75 ft., lying E. and W. of one another. In the westerly square stood the tabernacle, while in that to the E. was the altar of burnt offering. This was the worshipper’s square, and every Heb who passed through the entrance gate had immediate access to the altar.

The admission to this scene of the national solemnities was by the great east gate described in Exz 27:13-16 (see East Gate).

The fundamental conception out of which grew the resolve of Solomon to build a temple for the worship of Jeh was that the new structure was to be an enlarged duplicate in stone of the Temple of the Mishnah in Jerusalem. The Temple of the Mishnah was a magnifying and a lengthening of the inclosed area upon which the holy house was to stand. Hitherto a rectangular oblong figure of 150 ft. in length and 75 ft. in breadth had sufficed for the needs of the people in their worship. Now an area of 300 ft. in length and 150 ft. in breadth was inclosed within heavy stone walls, making, as before, two squares, each of 150 ft. This was that “court of the priests” spoken of in 2 Chr 4:9, known to its builders as “the inner court” (1 K 6:36; cf Jer 36:10). Its walls consisted of three courses of hewn stone, and a course of cedar beams” (1 K 6:36), into which we read the meaning of colonnades. Its two divisions may have been marked by some fence. The innermost division, accessible to all “priests,” was the site of the new temple. In the easterly division stood the altar of sacrifice; into this the Heb laity had access for worship at the altar. Later incidental allusions imply the existence of “chambers” in the court, and also the accessibility of the laity (cf Jer 35:4; 36:10; Ezk 8:16).

In distinction from this “inner” court a second or “outer” court was built by Solomon, spoken of by the Chronicler as “the great court” (1 K 6:17; cf 2Chr 4:9). The walls were of stone faced with bronze. Wide difference of opinion obtains as to the relation of this outer court to the inner court just described, and to the rest of the Solomonic buildings—particularly to the “great courts” of “the house of the forest of Lebanon” of 1 K 7:9-10. Some identify the two, others separate them. Did this court, with its brass-covered gates, extend still farther to the E. than the temple “inner” court, with, however, the same breadth as the latter? Or was it, as Keil thinks, a much larger inclosure, surrounding the whole temple area, extending perhaps 150 cubits eastward in front of the priests’ court (cf Keil, Bib. Archaeology, I, 171, ET)? Yet more radical is the view, adopted by many modern authorities, which regards “the great court” as a vast inclosure surrounding the temple and the whole complex of buildings described in 1 K 7:1-12 (see the plan, after Stade, in G. A. Smith’s Jerusalem, II, 50). In the absence of conclusive data the question must be left undetermined.

In Esæus’s plan of the temple yet to be built, the lines of the temple courts as he had known them in Jerus are followed. Two squares, 150 ft. by 325 ft., were set within the Holy of Holies, each of 150 ft. Temple courts lie E. and S. of one another, and bear the distinctive names, “the inner court” and “the outer court” (Ezk 8:16; 10:5).

In the Herodian temple the old nomenclature gives place to a new set of terms, the inner inclosure known later as “the court of the Gentiles” does not appear under that name in the NT or in Jos. What we have in the tract Midoth of the Mishnah and in Jos is the mention of two courts, the “court of the priests” and the “court of Israel” (Midoth, ii.6; v.1; Jos, BJ, V, v, 6). The data in regard to both are difficult and conflicting. In Midoth they appear as long narrow strips of 11 cubits in breadth extending from the temple and the altar across the inclosure—the “court of Israel” being rolled off from the “court of the priests” on the E.; the latter extending backward as far as the altar, which has a distinct measure. The design was to close approach of the lay Israelite to the altar. Jos makes the 11 cubits of the “court of Israel” extend round the whole “court of the priests,” inclusive of altar and temple (see Temple; and of G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 506-9, with the reconstruction of Waterhouse in Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 111 ff.). For the “women’s court,” see TREASURY. Many expressions in the Ps. show how great was the attachment of the devout-minded Heb in all ages to these courts of their Lord’s house where he was accustomed to worship (e.g. Ps 65:4; 84:2; 92:13; 96:8; 100:4; 116:19). The courts were the scene of many historical events in the OT and NT, and of much of the earthly ministry of Jesus. There was enacted the scene described in the Parable of the Pharisee and Publican (Lk 18:9-14). W. SHAW CALDECOTT

COURTS, JUDICIAL, jō-dish’āl, jō-dish’āl: At the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed judges (בֹּשֶׁפֶּה, shōphēṭim, Ex 18). In Egypt 1. Their Organization:

It appears that the Hebrews did not have their own judges, which, of course, was a source of many wrongs. Leaving Egypt, Moses took the judicial functions upon himself, but it was impossible that he should be equal to the task of administering justice to two and one-half million people; hence he proceeded to organize a system of jurisprudence.

He divided the country into hundreds, thousands—in all 78,600 judges. This system was adequate for the occasion, and these courts respectively corresponded practically to our Justices of the Peace, Mayor's Court, District Court, Circuit Court. Finally, there was a Supreme Court under Moses and his successors. These courts, though graded, did not afford an opportunity of appeal. The lower courts turned their difficult cases over to the next higher. If the case was simple, the judgment would not be appealed. If the question was too intricate for him, he would refer it to the next higher court, and so on until it finally reached Moses. There were certain kinds of questions which the tens, fifties, and hundreds would not take at all, and the people understood it and would bring them to the higher courts for original jurisdiction. When any court decided it, that was the end of that case, for it could not be appealed (Ex 18:25-26). On taking possession in Canaan, the judges were to be appointed for every city and vicinity (Dt 16:18), thus giving to all Israel a speedy and cheap method of adjudication. Though not so prescribed by the constitution, the judges at length were generally chosen from among the Levites, as the Levites were the legal administrators. The office is stated this plainly, and various passages of the Scriptures express it positively by inference (see Dt 1:13). Jephthah's election by vote of the people is clearly set forth (Jdg 11:6-11).

Among the Hebrews, the law was held very sacred; for God Himself had given it. Hence those who administered the law were God's special representatives, and of the Judges their person was held correspondingly sacred. These circumstances placed upon them the duty of administering justice without respect to persons (Dt 1:17; 16:18). They were to be guided by the inalienable rights granted to every citizen by the Heb constitution: (1) No man was to be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law (Nu 35:9-34). (2) Two or three witnesses were required to convict anyone of crime (Dt 17:6; 19:2-13). (3) Punishment for crime was not to be too severe. (4) No man is inviolate (Dt 24:10 11). (5) One held to bondage but having acquired liberty through his own effort should be protected (Dt 23:15 16). (6) One's homestead was inalienable (Lev 25:23-28; 34). (7) There was no money perpetual without the person's own consent (Ex 21:2-6).

Gradually a legal profession developed among the Hebrews, the members of which were designated as "Lawyers" or "Scribes," also known as "Doctors of the Law" (Lk 2:46). Their business was threefold: (1) to study and interpret the law; (2) to instruct the Heb youth in the law; and (3) to decide questions of the law. The first two they did as scholars and teachers; the last either as judges or as advisers in some court, as, for instance, the Senate of Jerusalem or some inferior tribunal. No code can go into such details as to eliminate the necessity of subsequent legislation, and this usually, to a great extent, takes the form of judicial decisions founded on the code, rather than of separate enactment; and so it was among the Hebrews. The provisions of their code were for the most part quite general, thus affording large scope for casuistic interpretation. Regarding the points not explicitly covered by the law, a decision must be found either in the form of established custom or in the form of an inference drawn from the statute.

As a result of the industry with which this line of legal development was pursued during the centuries immediately preceding our era, Hebrew law became a most complex affair. At the disputed points, the judgments of the individual lawyers could not be taken as the standard; hence the several disciples of the law must frequently meet for a discussion, and the opinion of the majority then prevailed. These were the meetings of the "Doctors." Whenever a case arose concerning which there had been no clear legal decision, the question was referred to the nearest lawyer; by him, to the nearest company of lawyers, perhaps the Sanhedrin; and the resultant decision was henceforth authority.

Before the destruction of Jerusalem technical knowledge of the law was not a condition of eligibility to the office of judge. Anyone who could command the confidence of his fellow-citizens might be elected, and many of the rural courts undoubtedly were conducted, as among us, by men of sterling quality, but limited knowledge. Such men would avail themselves of the legal advice of any "doctor" who might be within reach; and in the more dignified courts of a large municipality it was a standing custom to have a company of lawyers present to discuss and decide any new law points that might arise. Of course, frequently those men were themselves lawyers. Practically the entire system of jurisprudence was in their hands.

Though Judaea at this time was a subject commonwealth, yet the Sanhedrin, which was the body of state legislators, the law-making body of the state, was invested with authority, exercised autonomous authority, exercised autonomous authority, exercised autonomous authority, exercised autonomous authority, exercised autonomous authority, exercised autonomous authority.

4. Limitations under authority to such an extent that it not Roman only administered civil cases in accordance with Jewish law— "Law of Zoroaster"—for without this law, such a right a Jewish court would be impossible—but it also took part to a great extent in the punishment of crime. It exercised an independent police power, hence could send out its own officers to make arrests (Mt 26:57; Mk 14:49; Acts 4:2-3; 5:17-18). In cases that did not involve capital punishment, its judgments were final and unamendable (Acts 4:2-3; 5:17-18).

5. Time and Place of Sessions usually held their sessions during the second and fifth day (Monday and Thursday) of the week, but we do not know whether the same custom was observed by the Great Sanhedrin. On Sabbaths and days no court was held, much less on the Sabbath. Where a sentence was pronounced but not to be pronounced until the day after the trial, such cases were avoided also on the day preceding a Sabbath or other sacred day. The emphasis placed on this observance may be seen from the edicts issued by Augustus, absolutely demanding from the duty of attending court on the Sabbath. See Doctor; Lawyer; Sanhedrin; Scribe.

COUSIN, kus'n (אָנָפָא, anapäa): Only in Col 4 10, where Mark is said to be "cousin" (RV) to Barnabas, and not as in AV, "sister's son." The renderings "cousin" of AV for συγγόνος, suggests, in Lk 1 36-58 were probably understood at the time of the tr, in the wider, and not in the more restricted sense of the term. This religiously, and universally prevalent. In view of this the renderings "kinswoman," "kinsfolk" in RV are preferable. As a title of honor and dignity, it occurs in 1 Esd 44, etc. See Kinsman.

LITERATURE

1. General Meaning.—The etymological force of the Heb brith is not entirely certain. It is probable that the word is the same as the Assyrian biritu, which has the common meaning "fetter," but also means "covenant." The significance of the root from which this Assyrian word is derived is uncertain. It is probable that it is "to bind," but that is not definitely established. The meaning of biritu as covenant seems to come directly from the root, rather than as a derived meaning from fetter. If this root idea is to bind, the covenant is that which binds together the parties. This, at any rate, is in harmony with the general meaning of the word.

In the OT the word has an ordinary use, when both parties are men, and a distinctly religious use, between God and men. There can be no doubt that the related Lev. 11 53 comes from the ordinary, in harmony with the general custom in such cases, and not the reverse. There are also two shades of meaning, somewhat distinct, of the Heb word: one in which it is properly derived, i.e., a solemn mutual agreement, the other in which it is more a command, i.e., instead of an obligation voluntarily assumed, it is an obligation imposed by a superior upon an inferior. This latter meaning, however, has clearly been derived from the other. It is easy to see that an agreement, including as the contracting parties those of unequal position, might readily include those agreements which tended to partake of the nature of a command; but the process could not readily be reversed.

II. Among Men.—We consider first a covenant in which both contracting parties are men. In essence a covenant is an agreement, but an agreement of a solemn and binding force. The early Sem idea of a covenant was doubtless that which prevailed among the Arabs (see esp. W. Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 2d ed., passim). This was primarily blood-brotherhood, in which two men became brothers by drinking each other's blood (Gen 34 20). If this was not included into the clan of the other, hence this act involved the clan of one of the contracting parties, and also brought the other party into relation with the god of this clan, by bringing him into the community life of the clan, which included its god.

pointed out (op. cit., 481), this does not explain the passing between the pieces, which is the characteristic feature of the ceremony. It seems rather to be a metaphorical item, "were taken within the mystical life of the victim." (Cf. the interpretation of He 9 15-17 in COVENANT IN the NT.) It would then be an inheritance from the early times, in which the victim was regarded as kindred with the tribe, and hence also an equivalent of the drinking of each other's blood.

The immutability of a covenant is everywhere assumed, at least theoretically.

Other features beyond those mentioned cannot be covenant specific and universal. This is the case with the setting up of a stone, or raising a heap of stones (Gen 31:45-46). This is doubtless simply an ancient custom, which has no direct connection with the covenant, but comes from the ancient Semitic custom of recognizing the sacredness of single stones or heaps of stones. Striking hands is a general expression of an agreement made (Ex 10:19; Ezk 17:18, etc.).

In observing different varieties of agreements among men, we note that they may be either between different parties or between the parties of a clan, or between a clan and a king. When the covenant is between tribes it is thus a treaty or alliance. The following passages have this use of covenant: Gen 14:13; 21:27,32; 26:29; 32:42,44; Ex 25:12-15; Dt 7:9-14; Jos 1:1-15; 6:17,18; 8:14ff.; 1 K 6:12; 15:19; 2 Ch 16:3; 1 K 20:34; Ps 83:5; Isa 33:8; Ezk 16:61; 17:13-19; 30:5; Dn 11:22; Am 1:9. In other cases it is between a king and his subjects, where it is a command or ordinance, as 2 S 3:12-13,21; 5:3; 1 Ch 14:15; Jer 34:8-18; Dn 9:27. In other cases it is between individuals, or between small groups, where it is an agreement or pledge (2 K 11:4; 2 Ch 23:4; Jos 1:8ff.). Of this between David and Jonathan it is more specifically an alliance of friendship (1 S 18:3; 20:8; 23:18), as also apparently in Ps 55:20. It means an alliance of marriage in Mal 2:14, but probably not in Prov 2:17, where it is better understood as meaning being "her covenant with God.

In all cases of covenants between men, except Jer 34:10 and Dn 9:27, the technical phrase for making a covenant is kəra'ath b'rīth, "to make a treaty, covenant," originally "to cut." Everything indicates that this vb. is used with reference to the formal ceremony of ratification above mentioned, of cutting animals in pieces.

3. Between God and Men.—As already noted, the idea of covenants between God and men doubtless arose from the idea of covenants.

1. Essential between men. Hence the general idea thought is similar. It cannot in this case be a covenant between contracting parties who stand on an equality, but God, the superior, always takes the initiative. To some extent, however, varying in different cases, it is regarded as a mutual agreement; God with His commands makes certain promises, and men agree to keep the commands, or, at any rate, the promises are conditioned on human obedience. In general, the covenant of God with men is a Divine ordinance, with signs and pledges on God's part, and with promises for human obedience and penalties for disobedience, which are accepted by men. In one passage (Ps 25:14), it is used in a more general way of an alliance of friendship between God and man.

A covenant of this general kind is said in the OT to have been made by God with Noah (Gen 9:9-17 and elsewhere). In this the promise is God's first to multiply the descendants of Abraham to give them the land of Canaan, and to make them a blessing to the nations. This is narrated in Gen 15:18; 17:2-21, etc. A covenant is made with the nation Israel at Sinai (Horeb) (Ex 19:5; 34:7,8; 34:10.27.28, etc.), ratified by a feast or ceremony (Ex 24:3-8). This constituted the nation the peculiar people of God, and was accompanied by promises for obedience and penalties for disobedience. This covenant was renewed on the plains of Moab (Dt 29:1), and was confirmed by additional agreements on part of the covenant on their part to serve Jehovah. The covenant with Jehoiada and the people (2 K 11:17; 2 Ch 23:3) was an agreement on their part to be the people of Jehovah. The covenant with Hosiah and the people (2 Ch 30:10) consisted essentially of an agreement on their part to reform the worship; the covenant with Josiah and the people (2 K 23:3), of an agreement on their part to obey the Book of the Law. The covenant with Ezra and the people (Ezr 10:3) was an agreement on their part to take away their wives and obey the law. The prophets also speak of a new covenant, most explicitly in Jer, but with references elsewhere, which is connected with the Messianic idea (Is 52:8; 56:6; 61:8; Jer 31:31,33; 32:40; 50:5; Ezk 60:6-10; 20:37; 34:25; 37:26; Hos 3:18).

Various phrases are used of the making of a covenant between God and men. The vb. ordination is used of making covenants between men, kəra'ath, is often used here.

2. Phrase—ordinating covenant is used (cf. Ezk 20:5; Is 24:14). The phraseology Used as well. The following vb. are also used: hêšām, "to establish" or "confirm"; nāthān, "to give"; šām, "to place"; nāšā'ath, "to make"; nāšā'ath b'rīth, "to make another covenant"; bə'ar, "to enter into"; followed by b', "into"; b', "to enter"; followed by b'; and the phrase nāšā'ath b'rīth 'at pi, "to take up a covenant upon the mouth of someone."

The history of the covenant idea in Israel, as between God and man, is not altogether easy to see to trace. This applies esp. to the great

4. History covenants between God and Israel, of Covenant of the one with Abraham, and the idea main made at Sinai. The earliest references to this relation of Israel to Jehovah, under the term in which it is first used, is accepted by many a later addition, but largely because of this mention of the covenant. No other references to such a covenant are made in the prophets before Jeremiah. Jeremiah and Ezekiel speak of it, and it is implied in Second Isaiah. It is a curious fact, however, that most of the later prophets do not use the term, which suggests that the omission in the earlier prophets is not very significant concerning a knowledge of the idea in early times.

In this connection it should be noted that there is some variation among the Hexateuchal codes in their treatment of the covenants. Only one point, however, needs special mention. P gives no explicit account of the covenant at Sinai, and puts large emphasis upon the covenant with Abraham. There are, however, several references to the Sinaitic covenant (Lev 2 13; 24 8; 26 9.15.25.44.45). The facts indicate, therefore, principally a difference of emphasis.

It is also partly the facts already noted, however, it is held by many that the covenant idea between God and man is comparatively late. This view is that there were no covenants with Abraham and at Sinai, but that in Israel's early conceptions of the relation to Jeh He was their tribal God, bound by moral obligation to them and to their posterity. This is a larger question than at first appears. Really the whole problem of the relation of Israel to Jeh throughout OT history is involved, in particular the question at what time a comprehensive conception of the ethical character of God was developed. The subject will therefore naturally receive a fuller treatment in other articles. It is perhaps sufficient here to express the conviction that there was a very considerable conception of the ethical nature of Jeh in the early history of Israel, and that consequently there is no sufficient reason for doubting the fact of the covenants with Abraham and at Sinai. The statement of W. Robertson Smith, appears the matter (op. cit., 319): "That Jeh's relation is not natural but ethical is the doctrine of the prophets, and is emphasized, in dependence on their teaching, in the Book of Dt. But the passages cited show that the idea has its foundation in pre-prophetic times, in the sayings of the prophets, though they give it fresh and powerful application, plainly do not regard the conception as an innovation."

A little further consideration should be given to the new covenant of the prophets. The general teaching of the old covenant is broken by the sins of the people which led to the exile. Hence during the exile the people had been cast off, the covenant was no longer in force. This is stated, using other terminology, in Hos 3 5; 1 9; 2 2. The prophets speak, however, in anticipation of the making of a covenant again after the return from the exile. For the most part, in the passages already cited, this covenant is spoken of as if it were the old one renewed. Special emphasis is put, however, upon its being an everlasting covenant, as the old one did not prove to be, implying that it will not be broken as was that one. Jeremiah's teaching, however, has a little different emphasis. He speaks of the old covenant as passed away (31 32). Accordingly he speaks of a new covenant (31 31.33). This new covenant in its promises, however, is much like the old. But there is a new emphasis upon individuality in approach to God. In the old covenant, as already noted, it was the tribe that entered into the relation; here it is the individual, and the law is to be written upon the individual heart.

In the later usage the specific covenant idea is sometimes less prominent, so that the term is used practically of the religion as a whole; see Isa. 56 4; Ps 103 18.

Covenant in the OT

Covenant (in the NT): Διαθήκη, Diathēkê, the word chosen by the LXX translators to render the Heb brith, and it appears thus nearly 500 times in the Gr OT in the sense of covenant, while sānadh and enolat are used each once only. The choice of this word seems to have been occasioned by a recognition that the covenant which God makes with men is not fully mutual as would be implied in sunderēkē, the Gr word commonly used for covenant (although not a NT word), while at the same time the rarity of wills among the Jews made the common sense of diathēkē relatively unfamiliar. The Apocryphal writers also frequently use the word in the same sense and no other.

In the NT diathēkē is used some thirty times in a way which makes it plain that its must be 'covenant.' In Gal 3 15 and He 9 15-17 it is held by many that the sense of covenant must be set aside in favor of will or testament. But in the former passage it can be taken in the sense of a disposition of property or arrangement by God, a conception in substantial harmony with its regular NT use and with the meaning of brith. In the passage in He the interpretation is more difficult, but as it is acknowledged on all hands that the passage loses all argumentative force if the meaning covenant is accepted, it seems best to retain the meaning covenant if possible. To do this it is only necessary to hold that the death spoken of is the death of the animal sometimes, if not, indeed, commonly slain in connection with the making of a covenant, and that in the mind of the author this death symbolized the death of the contracting parties so far at least as to pledge them that thereafter in the matter involved they would no more change their minds than can the dead. If this view is taken, this passage falls in line with the otherwise invariable use of the word diathēkē by Jewish Hellenists. See Testament.

COVENANT OF SALT

Covenant of salt ( сочетание, synonym Also ἁλας, hala, classical Gr ἑλάς, hēla): As salt was regarded as a necessary ingredient of the daily food, and as all sacrifices offered to Jeh (Lev 2 13), it became an easy step to the very close connection between salt and covenant-making. When men ate together they became friends. Cf. the Arab. expression, "There is salt between us"; "He has eaten of my salt," which means partaking of hospitality which cemented friendship; cf. "eat the salt of the palace" (Est 4 14). Covenants were generally confirmed by sacrificial meals and salt was always present. Since, too, salt is a preservative, it would easily become symbolic of an everlasting covenant. So offerings to Jeh were to be by a statute for ever, "a covenant of salt for ever before Jeh" (Nu 18 19). David received his kingdom forever from Jeh by a 'covenant of salt' (2 Ch 13 5). In the light of these conceptions the use of salt here becomes the more significant: "Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another" (Mt 5 9).

4. True or Biblical Conception
5. Nature of the Laws
The name given in Ex 24:7 to a code or collection of laws found in the preceding chapters, 20:23, as the terms of the covenant made with Jehovah, and given for Israel's guidance until a more complete legislation was to be provided. In this covenant, between Jehovah and Israel, Moses served as mediator; animals were sacrificed; the blood thus shed being also called the "blood of the covenant" (dam ha-brit, Ex 24:8).

The second book of laws occupies a fitting and clearly marked place in the Pentateuchal collection.

1. Historical Connection. Moses arrived at Sinai. Immediately at the command which Moses had received from Jehovah in the Mount, they prepared themselves by a ceremonial of sanctification for entrance into covenant relation with Jehovah. Then the great day arrived for making this covenant, Moses waited in the midst of impressive natural phenomena. In the history of the words, the law, or the terms of the covenant, there is no thought of a people, and the latter are accepted by them. The first part of these covenant-terms, viz., the Decalogue (Ex 20:17), was spoken by the Divine voice, or its declaration was accompanied by awe-inspiring natural corollaries (Ex 19:16). Before the fighting of the terrified people Moses went up again into the mountain and received from Jehovah the rest of the "words" and "ordinances" (24:3); and these constitute the so-called Book of the Covenant (20:22-23). In this direct manner the narrator connected the book with the nation's consecration at Sinai. The prophets regarded the making of the Sinaitic covenant as the marriage of Jehovah and Israel, and these laws were the terms mutually agreed upon in the marriage contract.

While it is not possible to arrange the materials of this document into hard-and-fast divisions, the following analysis may be suggestive.

2. Analysis and Serviceable: (1) directions concerning worship, specifying prohibition of images and the form of altar for animal sacrifices (20:23–26); (2) ordinances for protection of Hebrew slaves, including celestial, for a price, of a daughter (21:2–14); (3) laws concerning injuries, (4) laws concerning the man by woman (25:32), (c) to beast by man (23:33), (d) to beast by beast (35:36); (4) concerning theft (22:1–4); (5) concerning damage to a neighbor's property, including violence to his daughter (5:17); (6) sundry laws against profaning Jehovah's name, under which are included proper worship, avoidance of oppression and dutiful offering of first-fruits (18:31); (7) against various forms of injustice and unbrotherliness (23:1–9); (8) festive occasions, and festivals, introduced by the hypothetical "if"; (2) words, or commands (dhabr, which relates chiefly to religious duties, being introduced by the imperative "thou shalt.

The critical analysis and dismemberment of the books of the Pentateuch, and the attempt to introduce the hypothesis of the introduction to this body of laws untrue and impossible. The four chapters are assigned to Jehovah, the Decalogue to E, and the Book of the Covenant to or E, the repetition of the Decalogue in the 32:34 being J's account. Ordinarily the Book of the Covenant is to be earlier than the Decalogue, and is indeed the oldest body of Hebrew legislation. However, it could not mean that one time, nor in the wilderness, since the laws are given for those in agricultural life, and seem to beensonments made at various times, and finally gathered together. Furthermore, this more primitive code either contradicts the later, or the former is an entirely different point of view. The chief contradictions or divergences are: nature and number of altars, absence of an official priestly class, and different conception of the annual feasts as agricultural celebrations. JF came into union for a while after the Pent, but this body of laws existed much earlier, embodying the earliest legal developments of Hebrew life in Canaan. It is suggested by JASTREBSKY, although he does not attempt the analysis, that this code is itself a composite of various layers and ages. See Criticism (GEBAH HYPOTHESIS).

But in favor of the simpler interpretation of these laws as the ethical obligations of the new bond between Jehovah and Israel, some statements are to be made. If a solemn or biblical covenant was made at Sinai—and to this all the history, all the prophets and the Psalms give testimony—there must have been some statement of the formalized and fundamental obligations of Israel's moral relation to Jehovah. Such statement need not be final nor exhaustive, but rather intended to instruct and guide until later and more detailed directions might be given. This is exactly the position of Moses and the priests in the resolutions and claims that this was the thought of the editor of the Pent, and this that is the first and reasonable impression made by the unsuspecting and connected reading of the record, can hardly be questioned by candid minds. In answer to the criticism that the agricultural flavor of the laws presupposes settlement in Canaan—a criticism rather remarkable for its blind ignorance—it may be suggested: (1) Israel had occupied in Egypt an agricultural section, and must have been able to teach the sects. (2) They were on the march toward a land in which they should have permanent settlement in agricultural life, and not the presence of allusions to such life, but rather their absence, should cause surprise. (3) However, references to settled farm life are not so obstinately frequent as those seeking signs would have us think. References to the animal life of the flock and herd of a shepherd people, such as the sheep, the fruit, the wine, are frequent (21:33:35; 22:10; 23:4, etc.). The laws are quite generic in form and conception, enforcing such duties as would devolve upon both temporary nomad and prospective tillers of the soil. R. B. Taylor therefore (art. on vol. HDB) accepts this code as originating in the desert wanderings.

In answer to the view, best presented by Wellhausen in Proleg. and W. R. Smith in OTJS, that this code is in conflict with later legislation, it may be said that this, in a sense, is the case. In the civil and civil summary, is its proper place in the narrative of the sojourn at Sinai, and does not preclude the expectancy of more elaborate organization of both ceremonial and civil order. But the whole question relates more properly to discussion of the later legislation or of the particular topics in dispute (q.v.). For a thorough treatment of them consult W. H. Green, Heb Feasts.

In the Book of the Covenant the moral elements strongly emphasized and legislation of state and spirituality of worship; a high and equitable standard of right; highest conception of the Laws of the weak and the poor; humane treatment of dumb animals; purity in the diet, and a recognition of the brotherhood; and the simple and joyful life. Whatever development in details came with later legislation.

καινόν, brith kaddashah, Jer. 31 31; יִדְגַּזֹּבִּיהַ, l diathkei kain, He 8 5 13, etc., or וַיָּהָנָא, He 12 24: the former Gr adj. has the sense of the "new" primarily in reference to quality, the latter the sense of 'young,' the "new," primarily in reference to time).

1. Contrast of "New" and "Old"—The Term "Covenant.

2. Christ's Use at the Last Supper

3. Relation of the transaction described in Ex 24 to Ex 24 7, when Moses "took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people" those "words," indicating God's undertaking on behalf of His people and what He required of them; "and they said, All that Jeh hath spoken will we do, and be obedient," thus taking up their part of the contract. Then comes the ratification. "Moses took the book [half of which had already been sprinkled on the altar], and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which Jeh hath made with you concerning all these words" (ver. 8). The blood was sacrificial blood, the blood of the animals sacrificed as burnt offerings and peace offerings (Ex 24 6, 10). The half of the "blood," which was placed on the altar, was of the sacrifice offered to God, the other half sprinkled on the people, of the virtue of the same sacrifice applied to the people, and so the covenant relation is fully brought about. Christ, by sprinkling the blood in His own body, "church" being the writings or Scriptures of the Old Covenant, those within the Christian church, the Scriptures of the New Covenant. The alternative name "Testament"—adopted into our Eng. description through the Lat., as the equivalent of the Heb brith, and the Gr diathēke, which both mean a solemn disposition, compact or contract—suggests the disposition of property in a last will or testament, but although the word diathēke may bear that meaning, the Heb diathēkā cannot, and as the Gr usage in the NT seems esp. governed by the OT usage and the thought moves in a similar plane, it is better to keep to the term "covenant." The one passage which seems to favor the "testament" idea is He 9 16,17 (the Revisers who have changed the AV "testament" into "covenant" in every other place have left it in these two vs), but it is questionable whether even here the better rendering would not be "covenant" (see below). Certainly in the context of the NT, if we enter into the "correction" and, confessedly, "testament," if allowed to stand, is an application by transition from the original thought of a solemn compact to the secondary one of testamentary disposition. The theological terms "Covenant of Works" and "Covenant of Grace" do not occur in Scripture, though the ideas covered by the terms, esp. the latter, may easily be found there. The "New Covenant" here spoken of is practically equivalent to the Covenant of Grace established between God and His redeemed people that again resting upon the eternal Covenant of Redemption made between the Father and the Son, which, though not so expressly designated, is not obscurely indicated by many passages of Scripture.

Looking at the matter more particularly, we have to note the words of Christ at the institution of the Supper. In all the three Synoptists, 2. Christ's as also in Paul's account (Mt 26 28; Use at Last Mk 14 24; Lk 22 20; 1 Cor 11 25): Supper "covenant occurs. Mt and Mk, Lk and Paul, 'the new covenant in my blood.' The Revisers following the critical text, have omitted "new" in Mt and Mk, but even if it does not belong to the original MS, it is implied, and there need be little doubt that Jesus used it. The old covenant was so well known to these Jewish disciples, that to speak of the covenant in this emphatic way, referring manifestly to something other than the old Mosaic covenant, was in effect to call it a 'new' covenant. The expression, in any case, looks back to the old and points to the new; but in the contrast there are points of resemblance. It is most significant that Christ here connects the "new" covenant with His "blood." We at once think, as doubtless the disciples would, that Christ's blood poured out for the remission of sins was no mere benefit unto His disciples, but in the new covenant there are points of resemblance. The expression, in any case, looks back to the old and points to the new; but in the contrast there are points of resemblance. It is most significant that Christ here connects the "new" covenant with His "blood." We at once think, as doubtless the disciples would, that Christ's blood poured out for the remission of sins was no mere benefit unto His disciples, but in the new covenant there are points of resemblance. It is most significant that Christ here connects the "new" covenant with His "blood." We at once think, as doubtless the disciples would, that Christ's blood poured out for the remission of sins was no mere benefit unto His disciples, but in the new covenant there are points of resemblance.
in the fact that He willingly endured the dread consequences of sin, and as a veritable expiatory sacrifice shed His precious blood for the remission of sins.

Of this that blessed shed blood, as the writer goes on to assert, "He is the mediator of a new covenant, that a death having taken the place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, they that have been called may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance" (ver 15). Thus Christ fulfills the type in a twofold way: He is the sacrifice upon which the covenant is based, whose blood ratified, as He is also, like Moses, the Mediator of the covenant. The death of Christ not only secures the forgiveness of those who are brought under the new covenant, but it was also for the redemption of the transgressions under the first covenant, implying that all the sacrifices gained their value by being types of Christ, and the forgiveness enjoyed by the people of God in former days was bestowed in virtue of the great Sacrifice to be offered in the fulness of time.

Not only does the blessing of perfect forgiveness come through the new covenant, but also the promise of the "eternal inheritance" in contrast to the earthly inheritance and the "high priests," which, under the old covenant, Israel occupied. The new covenant is held to justify the taking of the word in the next verse as "testament," the writer passing to the thought of a testamentary disposition, which is only of force after the death of the testator and which is said to be good ground for the analogy, and all the blessings of salvation which come to the believer may be considered as bequeathed by the Saviour in His death, and accruing to us because He has died. It has, in that sense, tacitly to be assumed that the testator lives again to be His own executor and to put us in possession of the blessings. Still, we think there is much to be said in favor of keeping to the sense of "covenant" even here, and taking the clause, which renders it, as: "a covenant is of force [or firm] over the dead," as meaning that the covenant is established on the ground of sacrifice, that sacrifice representing the death of the maker of the covenant. The allusion may be further explained by a reference to Jer 31:31-34, which has generally been considered as illustrating the ancient Sem method of making a covenant: the sacrificial animals being divided, and the parties passing between the pieces, implying that they deserved death if they broke the engagement. The technical Heb phrase for making a covenant is "to cut a covenant." (ver 17)

There is an interesting passage in Herodotus iii.8, concerning an Arabian custom which seems akin to the old Heb practice. The Hispanics observe pledges as religiously as any people; and they make them in the following manner: when any wish to pledge their faith, a third person standing between the two parties makes an incision with a sharp stone in the palm of the hand, nearest the longest fingers of both the contractors; then taking some of the blood from the garments of each, he smears seven stones placed between him and the blood; and as he does this he invokes Bacchus and Urania. When this ceremony is completed, the person who pledges his faith binds his friends as sureties to the stranger, or their citizens, if thought fit, with a citizen, and the friends also hold themselves obliged to observe the engagement. (Car. tr.)

Whatever the particular application of the word in ver 17, the central idea in the passage is that death, blood-shedding, is necessary to the establishment of the covenant, and so he affirms that the first covenant was not dedicated without blood, and in proof quotes the passage already cited from Ex. 24:8 that "apart from the shedding of blood there is no remission" (ver 22). See Cov- enant in NT.

This new covenant established by Christ was foretold by the prophet Jeremiah, who uses the very word "new covenant" in describing it, and the promise which was there given, 'heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." The argument rests, however, on the use of the "covenant" term in the NT. The writer of Hebrews 7:8 emphasizes the proposal of the "better covenant" by using the word Cocvenant a number of times. See Jer 31:31-34. His disciples to understand that the prophetic interpretation would be in Him be realized. There is no doubt that the author of Hebrews had the passage in mind, for he has led up to the previous statement by definitely quoting the whole statement of Jer 31:31-34. He had in ch 7 spoken of the contrast between Christ's priesthood "after the order of Melchizedek" (ver 11) and the imperfect, Aaronic priesthood, and he now introduces "the surety of a better covenant" (ver 22). Then in ch 8, emphasizing the thought of the superiority of Christ's heavenly high-priesthood, he declares that Christ is the "mediator of a better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better promises" (ver 6). The first covenant, he says, was not faultless, otherwise there would have been no need for a second; but the fault was not in the covenant but in the people who failed to keep it, though perhaps there is also the suggestion that the external imposition of laws does not suffice to secure true obedience. "For finding fault with them he saith, Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers," etc. (ver 8). He would repay careful study, but we noted only that not only is there prominence given to the great blessings of the covenant, perfect forgiveness and fulness of knowledge, but, as the very essence of the covenant—that which serves to distinguish it from the old covenant and at once to show its superiority and guarantee its permanence—there is this wonderful provision: "I will put my laws into their mind, and on their heart also will I write them; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people." This at once shows the spirituality of the new covenant. Its requirements are not simply given in the form of external rules, but the living Spirit possesses the heart; the law becomes an internal dominating principle, and so true obedience is secured.

Ezekiel had spoken to the same effect, though the word "new covenant" is not used in the passage, ch 36:27: "I will put my Spirit within you, and I will cause you to keep my statutes, and ye shall keep mine ordinances, and do them." In ch 37 Ezekiel again speaks of the great blessings to be enjoyed by the people of God, including cleansing, walking in God's statutes, reformation as God's people, etc, and he distinctly says of this era of blessing, "I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them" (ver 26). Other important foreshadowings of the new covenant are found in Isa. 22:20; 55:3; 55:21; 61:8; Hos 2:18-23; Mal 3:1-4. We may well marvel at the spiritual insight of these prophets, and it is impossible to attribute their forecasts to natural genius; they can only be accounted for by Divine inspiration.

The writer to the Hebrews seems to again to this theme of the "New Covenant"; in 10:16,17 he cites the words of Jeremiah already quoted about writing the law on their minds, and remembering their sins no more. In 12:25, he speaks of Jesus the mediator of a new covenant, and "the blood of sprinkling," again connecting the "blood" with the "covenant," and finally, in 13:20, he prays for the perfection of the saints through the "blood of an eternal covenant." In 2 Cor 3 Paul has an interesting and instructive contrast between the old covenant and the new. He begins it by saying that "our sufficiency is from God; who also made us sufficient as ministers of a new covenant; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life (2 Cor. 3:6). The "letter" is the letter of the law, of the Old and New covenant which could only bring condemnation, but the spirit which characterizes the new covenant gives life, wrieth the law upon the heart. He goes on to speak of the old as that "ministration of death" which nevertheless "came with glory" (ver. 7), and he refers esp. to the law, but the new covenant is "the ministration of the spirit," the "ministration of righteousness" (vs. 8, 9), and has a far greater glory than the old. The message of this "new covenant" is "the gospel of Christ." The glory of the new covenant is focused in Christ; rays forth from Him. The glory of the old dispensation was reflected upon the face of Moses, but that glory was transitory and so was the physical manifestation (ver. 13). The sight of the shining face of Moses awed the people of Israel and they revered him as a leader specially favored of God (vs. 7–13). When he had delivered his message he veiled his face and thus we could not see the glory of the law did not last; every time that he went into the Divine presence he took off the veil and afresh his face was lit up with the glory, and coming out with the traces of that glory lingering on his countenance he delivered his message to the people, and again veiled his face (cf. Ex 34:29–35), and thus the transitoriness and obscurity of the old dispensation was symbolized. In glorious contrast to that symbolical obscurity, the ministers of the gospel, of the new covenant, use great bitterness of speech. The veil is done away in Christ (vs 12 f). The glory which comes through Him is perpetual, and fears no vanishing away.

COVER, kuv'ër, COVERING, kuv'er-ing: The tr of several Heb words. The covering of the ark (תֹּהַלֶך, mikhkeh, Gen 8:13) was possibly the lid of a hatchway (cf Mitchell, World before Abraham, 215).

To the sons of Kohath was assigned the task of caring for the furniture of the Tabernacle whenever the camp was moved, a suitable covering (תֹּהַלֶך, kásáh) of sealskin being designated for each of the specially sacred objects, the temple curtains also belonged (Neh 8:19, 11:12 f).

Nu 19:15 (gâmãdâ) may refer to anything used as a lid or covering; Job 24:7; 31:19 (kéšâh) refer to clothing or bed-covering.

Figurative: "Abandon hath no covering" (kéšâh) from God (Job 26:6); "He will destroy . . . the face of the covering [kâ-lô] that covereth all peoples" (Isa 25:7). The removal of the veil, often worn as a token of mourning (cf 2 S 19:4), signified the destruction of death. W. N. Stearns COVERED WAY, kuv'ërd wâ (תֹּהַלֶך, kâsâkh), "a covered walk": Mentioned in 2 K 16:18 (AV "covert") as a gallery belonging to the temple, concerning the purpose of which opinions differ. Some consider it to have been the place where the king stood or sat during the Sabbath services; others, a public place for teaching; others, the way by which the priest entered the sanctuary on the Sabbath.

COVERING, kuv'er-ing, FOR THE HEAD (רָפָסָלָא, peribolasion): Mentioned in the NT only in 1 Cor 11:15: "For her hair is given her for a covering," lit. "something cast round," probably equivalent to "veil" (q.v.). Read in the light of the context: "Every woman praying or prophesying with her head uncovered dishonors her head" (ver 5). The meaning would seem to be that Nature itself, in providing women with a natural veil, has taught the lesson underlying the prevailing custom, that woman should not be unveiled in the public assemblies. Geo. B. Eager COVERT, kuv'ërt: Now seldom used, except for game, and then generally spelt "cover." "A covered way" (2 K 16:18 A.V.); also a shelter of any kind (Isa 4:6); "a hiding place," "air," a "kail," a "hatchway" (Job 28:40); "a face of secrecy," "a secret way" (1 S 25:20; Job 40:21; Ps 61:4; Isa 16:4; 32:2); "a den," "a lair" (Jer 25:38).

COVET, kuv'ët (תֹּהַלֶך, 'àwàth; ֶקֶּלֶב, zàlôôb, zôlôôb, "to desire earnestly," "to set the mind and heart upon anything"): Used in two senses: good, simply to desire earnestly but legitimately, e.g. AV 1 Cor 12:31; 14:30; bad, to desire unlawfully, or to secure illegitimately (תֹּהַלֶך, 'àwàth; תֹּהַלֶך, 'àwàth), e.g. AV Ex 18:21; Ezek 33:31. (2) The wish to have more than one possesses, inordinately, of course (נֶאֶסְתָּה, pleonexia), e.g. Lk 12:15; 1 Thess 2:5. (3) An inordinate love of money (πληθυσσων, philarguros, AV Lk 16:14; 2 Tim 3:2; philarguros, 1 Tim 6:10); negative in He 13:5 A.V.

Covetousness, kuv'ët-us-nes: Has a variety of shades of meaning determined largely by the nature of the particular word used, or the context, or both. Following are some examples: to gain dishonestly (תֹּהַלֶך, 'àwàth), e.g. AV Ex 18:21; Ezek 33:31. (2) The wish to have more than one possesses, inordinately, of course (נֶאֶסְתָּה, pleonexia), e.g. Lk 12:15; 1 Thess 2:5. (3) An inordinate love of money (πληθυσσων, philarguros, AV Lk 16:14; 2 Tim 3:2; philarguros, 1 Tim 6:10); negative in He 13:5 A.V.

Covetousness is a very grave sin; indeed, so heinous is it that the Scriptures class it among the very gravest and grossest crimes (Eph 5:5). In Col 3:5 it is "idolatry," while in 1 Cor 10:14 it is set forth as excluding a man from heaven. Its heinousness, doubtless, is accounted for by its being in a very real sense the root of so many other forms of sin, e.g. departure from the faith (1 Tim 6:9,10); lying (2 K 2:22–25); theft (Jos 7:21); domestic trouble (Prov 16:27); murder (Ezk 22:12); indeed, it leads to "many foolish and hurtful lusts" (1 Tim 6:9). Covetousness has always been a very serious menace to mankind, whether in the OT or NT period. It was one of the sins that broke out after Israel had entered into the promised land (Achan, Josh 7); and also in the early Christian church immediately after its founding (Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5); hence so many warnings against it. A careful reading of the OT will reveal the fact that a very great part of the Jewish law—such as its enactments and regulations regarding duties toward the poor, toward servants; concerning cleansing, usury, pledges, gold and silver taken during war—was introduced and intended to counteract the spirit of covetousness.

Eerdmsans maintains (Expos, July, 1909) that the commandment, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house" (Ex 20:17), meant to the Israelite that he should not take anything of his neighbor's possessions that were momentary or unprotected by their owner. Cf. Ex 34:23 f. Thus, it refers to a category of acts that is not covered by the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal." It is an oriental habit of mind from of old that when anyone sees abandoned goods which he thinks desirable, there is not the least objection to taking them, and Ex 20:17b is probably an explanation of what is to be understood by "house" in ver 17a.

Examples of covetousness: Achan (Josh 7); Saul (1 S 15:24–31); Judas (Matt 26:14–15); Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11); Balaam (2 Pet 2:15 with Jude ver 11).

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

COW, kou, KINE, kin (תְּלֵי, bāṭār [cf Arab. baḥār, "cow"]; תְּלֵי הַנַּגִּים, 'egklaša bāṭār [Isa 7 21]; תְּלֵי הַנְּגִים, pārōh [cf Arab. furār, "young of a sheep, goat, or cow"]; תְּלֵי הַנַּגִּים, pārōh 'ašār [1 & 6 7.10]), "milch kine," from לַיִל, 'al, "to suckle"; תְּלֵי, 'eleph): In Am 4 1, the term, "kine of Bashan," is applied to the voluptuous women of Samaria. In Gen 41 36 is the narration of Pharaoh's dream of the seven fat and seven lean kine. In Israel's vision (Isa 14 7) we have (Gen 10), and the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together." Cows do not seem to have been sacrificed. The sacrifice of the kine that brought the ark back from the Philis (1 & 6 14) was due to the exceptional circumstances. See ALFRED ELY DAY.

COZ, kox (ךֹז, kōz, "thorn"): A man of Judah (1 Ch 4 8). ARV has added the art., making the name Hakkos without sufficient reason. The name occurs with the art. (Ha-kōz) in Ezr 2 61; Neh 3 4.21; 7 63, and 1 Ch 24 10, but not with reference to the same person. Coz was of the tribe of Judah, while Hakkos belonged to the family of Aaron.

COZBI, koz'bi (ךֹּז בּי, kōz'ēbi, "deceitful"): A Midianitish woman, distinguished as the daughter of Zur, "head of the people of a fathers' house" in Midian. She was slain by Phinehas at Shittim in company with "Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince of a fathers' house among the Simeonites." (Nu 35 6-18).

COZBA, ko-zē'ba (1 Ch 4 22). See Achzib.

CRACKNEL, krak'nel: Occurs in 1 K 14 3, where Jeroboam bids his wife go to Abijah to inquire concerning their son: "And take with thee ten loaves and cracknels" (AV "cakes," ERV "cracknels," ABV "cakes"). The Heb word is בֶּן נַדֵּנָה, nikkuddatim, from nādāh, "to prick" or "mark." Most probably cakes with holes pricked in them like our biscuits.

CRAFT, kraft, CRAFTINESS, kraft'nes (πανουργία, panourgía), CRAFTY, kraft'i (πανουργός, panourgos): The original meaning is that of "ability to do anything," universally applied in a bad sense to unscrupulous wickedness, that stops short of no mean's vision that can be achieved, in order to attain its purposes; then, in a modified form, to resourcefulness in wrong, cunning (Dei 8 25; 2 Mac 12 24; RVm "jugglery"). In Lk 20 23, Jesus perceives "the craftiness" of His adversaries, i.e. the complicated network which they have laid to ensnare Him. The art with which a plot is concealed, and its direction to the ruin of others, are elements that enter into the meaning. Heinrici on 1 Cor 3 19 illustrates from Plato the distinction between craftsman and wisdom. There is a touch of humor in 2 Cor 12 16, when Paul speaks of his conduct toward the Corinthians as having been "crafty.")

LITERATURE

1. SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE.—Our knowledge of the arts and crafts of Bible times has come to us through two principal ways. First, from Bib., Assy, Bab and Egypt written records. Of these the Egypt are the most illuminating. Second, from examples of ancient handicraft which have been buried and preserved through many cens. and brought to light again by modern discoveries.

(1) Jewish craftsmanship.—The chief written documents from which we may learn about Hebraic handicraft are the Bible records. A study of what few references there are lead us to believe that before the Israelites came in contact with the people of Canaan and Phoenicia they had not developed any considerable technical skill (1 K 5 6; 1 Ch 14 1; 2 Ch 2 7.14; Ezr 3 7). Some of the simpler operations, such as the spinning and weaving of the common fabrics and the shaping of domestic utensils, were performed in the household (Ex 36 25.26) but the weaving and dyeing of fine fabrics, carving, inlaying, metal-working, etc., was the work of foreigners, or was learned by the Jews after the Exodus, from the dwellers in Pal.

The Jews, however, gradually developed skill in many of these crafts. It is believed that as early as Nehemiah's time, Jewish craftsmen had organized into guilds (Neh 3 8.31.32). In post-Bib. times the Jews obtained monopolies in some of the industries, as for example, glass-making and dyeing. These trades remained the secrets of certain families for generations. It is because of this secrecy and the mystery that surrounded these trades, and it is still maintained in many places, that we know so little as to how they were conducted. Until recently the personal indigo dyers in Damascus were Jews, and the Jewish guilds with Moslem craftsmen the right to make glass. In some of the Syrian cities Jewish craftsmen are now outnumbering other native workmen in certain trades.

Few examples of Heb handicraft have been discovered by the archaeologists which shed much light upon early Heb work. Aside from the pottery of the Israelitish period, and a few seals and coins, there are no traces of Heb workmanship remaining. It is even doubtful how many of the above objects are really the work of this people.

(2) Canaanith and Phoenician craftsmanship.—It is generally conceded that what technical skill the Hebrews acquired resulted from their contact with the Canaanites and Phoenicians. Frequent mention of the workmanship of these peoples is made in the Bible, but their own records are silent. Ezekieli's account of the glories of Tyre (Ezk 27) gives some idea of the reputation of that city for craftsmanship. Thy builders have perfected thy beauty (vers 4); "Syria was thy merchant . . . . Dameascus was thy merchant for the multitude of thy handiworks" (vers 16.18). Adad-nirari III (812-783 BC), the Assy king, enumerates the tribute which he exacted from the king of Damascus. "Variegated , 20, 20, an ivory bed, a seat of inlaid ivory, a table" were among the captured articles. These were probably Phoen work.
Many examples of Phoeni craftsmanship have been discovered. These are characterized, from the standpoint of art, by a crudeness which distinguishes them from the more delicately and artistically worked products of their two neighbors, the Babylonians and Egyptians. The credit remains, however, to the Phoenicians of introducing skilled craftsmanship into Pal. The Phoenicians, too, furnished the means of interchange between the Babylonians and Egyptians. From the very earliest times there was an interchange of commodities and ideas between the people of the Nile and those of the Tigris and Euphrates.

(3) Assyrian and Babylonian craftsmanship.—The Babylonians and Assyrans made few references to their own handicraft in their records; but the explorers of recent years have revealed many examples of the remarkable workmanship of the early inhabitants of Mesopotamia. In referring to a silver vase found in that country (Tellah), dating from the 4th millennium BC, Clay (see "Literature") says "the whole is exceedingly well rendered and indicates remarkable skill, which in no respect is less striking than that of Egypt contemporaries in this handicraft." Jewelry, weapons, votive images, various utensils, tools of many kinds, statues in the hardest stones, delicately wrought, gems, dating from the times of Abraham and earlier, lead us to ask when these people acquired their skill.

(4) Egyptian craftsmanship. The written records of Egypt are doubly important, because they not only refer to the various crafts, but also illustrate the processes by drawings which can leave no doubt as to how the workmen accomplished their ends. The extensive explorations in Egypt have given to the world many priceless relics of craftsmanship, some of them dating from the very dawn of civilization. Among the ruins of early Syrian and Palestinian cities are found numerous objects witnessing to the skill of the Egyptians. These objects and the evidence of the influence of their work on the Phoen arts show the part that the Egyptians played in moulding the ideas of the workmen who were chosen to build the temple at Jerusalem. In the following brief summary of the crafts mentioned in the Bible, it will be noticeable how well they may be illustrated by the monuments of the Nile country. To confirm the knowledge derived from the above sources, post-Biblical writings of the present-day customs in Bible lands are valuable. These will be mentioned in discussing the various crafts.

II. Crafts Directly or Indirectly Mentioned in the Bible.—(For a more detailed treatment of the crafts see under separate arts.) This industry probably originated in Babylonia, but the knowledge of the process was early carried to Egypt, where later the Hebrews, along with other captives, were driven to making the bricks of the Egyptian kings. The making of sun-dried bricks called for little skill, but the firing and glazing of bricks required trained workmen. See Brick.

Wood was extensively used by ancient builders. With the exception of the Egypt antiquities, little remains but the records to indicate this fact. Numerous references are made to the carpenter in building the temple and subsequent repairing of this structure (1 K 5:6; 2 Ch 22:6; 2 K 22:6; Ex 3:7; 4:1). David's house and that of Solomon and his favorite wife were made partly of wood. In the story of the building of the tabernacle, woodworking is mentioned (Ex 36:7). The people of Tyre built ships of cypress, with masts of cedar wood and oars of oak (Ezk 27:6). Idols were carved from wood (Dt 29:17; 2 K 19:18; Isa 37:19; 45:20). The Philis built a wooden cart to carry the ark (1 S 6:7). Threshing instruments and yokes were made of wood (2 S 24:22). Ezra read the law from a pulpit of wood (Neh 8:4). Solomon's chariots were made of wood (Cant. 3:9). Inlaid work, still a favorite form of decoration in Syria, was used by the Phoenicians (Ezk 27:5). How the ancient carpenters did their work can be assumed from the Egypt monuments. Some of the operations there pictured are still performed in the same ways. See Tools; Carpenter.

The terms "carving" and "engraving" are used interchangeably in translating OT passages. The first mention made of engraved objects is:

3. Carving is the signet of Judah (Gen 38:18). (Engraving) The art of engraving on various hard objects, such as clay, bone, ivory, metals and precious stones, probably came from Mesopotamia. The Hebrews learned engraving from the Canaanites. The nature of this engraving is shown by the Assyrian cylinders and Egyptian scarabs. It is doubtful how many of the signs found in Pal are Heb work, as the engraved devices are mostly Phoen and Canaan. It is likely that the custom in the Orient for men to carry constantly with them their signets. The seal was set in a ring, or, as was the case with Judah, and as the Arabs do today, was worn on a cord suspended at the back of the neck. In the city of Pal of the 8th century the signs in a Syrian city street is the engraver of signets, seated at his low bench ready to cut on one of his blank seals the buyer's name or sign.

The second form of carving is suggested by the Dialogue (Ex 20:4). The commandment explains why sculpturing remained undeveloped among the Jews, as it has to this day among the Moslems. In spite of the commandment, however, cherubim were carved of wood, the wooden fittings of the temple interior (1 K 6:23).

Among the peoples with whom the Jews came in contact, stone-cutting had reached a high degree of perfection. No stone proved too hard for their tools. In Egypt and Phoen tombs, carving was often done on plastered surfaces. See Carving.

Both the Egyptians and Babylonians were skilled in molding and baking objects of clay. The early Bab records consist of burnt clay tablets. Glass bricks with a lattice work pattern were an important decorative feature. In Egypt, idols, scarabs and amulets were often made of fired clay, glazed or unglazed. By far the most important branch of ceramic art was the making of jars for holding water or other liquids. These jars have been used throughout the East from earliest times. The Jews learned what they knew about this art from the Phoenicians. See Pottery.

Dyeing is one of the oldest of the crafts. The only references to the act of dyeing in the Bible are (a) in connection with the dyed skins of animals (Ex 25:5; 26:14), and (b) Js and Cleanse 5:30. That it was a highly developed trade is implied in the many other references to dyes and stuffs both in the Bible and in profane lit. Cleansing was done by the fuller, who was probably a dyer also. See Color; Dye; Fuller.

Very little is known of the work of embroidery, farther than that it was the working-in of color to the structure (Ex 27:21).

6. Embroidery. See Embroidery. In Dt 33:19 "hidden treasures of the sand" is interpreted by some to mean the making of objects from sand. There can be no question about the Hebrews being acquainted with glass-making, as its history extends back to very early times. The Egyptians and Phoenicians made bottles, glass beads, idols, etc. These objects are among those usually found in the tombs. Glass beads of very early manufacture were found in the mound at Gezer. Some of the pigments used for painting were made of powdered colored glass. In the NT we read of the "beauty of glass like unto crystal" (Rev 4:6). See Glass.

Grinding was a domestic task and can hardly be classed as one of the crafts. When flour was needed, the housewife, or more likely the servant, would rub the wheats or barley between two millstones (see Millstone) or, with a rounded river stone, crushed the wheat on a large flat stone. It is still a common custom in Syria and Pal for two women to work together as indicated in Mt 24:41 and Lk 17:35. Grinding of meal was a menial task, considered the employment of a concubine; hence setting Samson to grinding at the mill was intended as a disgrace. The rhythmic sound of the stone cutter at his work, the sound of the wheats being powdered in the mill: it is more common today, however, than in the earlier times when only high officials could afford stone houses. Frequently only the temple or shrines or tombs or castles or palaces were made of lime. As such buildings were very common, and much attention was paid to every detail of their construction, there was developed an efficient corps of masons, especially in Egypt and Syria. When the Israelites abandoned their nomadic life, many of the things that they planned were permanent places of worship. As these developed into structures more pretentious than mere piles of stones, the builders naturally resorted to the skill of the master builders of the city. A visitor to Jerusalem may still see the work of the ancient masons. The so-called Solomon's quarries under the city, the great drafted stones of the temple area, belong to an early date. The very shape of the masons' tools may be determined from the marks on the stones. See Mason.

Among the oldest objects that have been preserved are those of silver, gold and bronze. These are proof that the ancients understood the surviving art of smelting, smelting, refining and working of metals.

Oil-making

The oil referred to in the Bible is olive oil. Pliny mentions many other oils which were extracted in Egypt. The oils were usually extracted by first crushing the fruit and then pressing the crushed mass. At Gezer, Tell es Shāf and other ancient ruins old oil presses have been discovered. See Oil.

One who has visited the tombs and temples of Egypt will never forget the use which the ancient Egyptian painters made of colors. The otherwise somber effect produced by the expansive plain walls was overcome by sculpturing, either in relief or intaglio, on a coating of stucco, and then coloring these engravings in reds, yellows, greens and blues. Architectural details were also painted. The capitals of columns and the columns themselves received special attention from the painter. Colors were similarly used by the Greeks and Phoenicians. In the Sidon tombs, at Palmyra and similar ruins, traces of painting are still evident. See Painting.

The process of painting oil in the OT (Isa 19:7 AV) and once in NT (2 Jn 12) in Isa 19:7 the RV renders "paper reeds, "meadows." Papyrus (q.v.) occurs in Isa 19:2 and RVm of Ex 2:3. The nearest approach to our paper which the ancients possessed was that made from a species of papyrus reed. The reed was split half down the root, side by side, long strips of the inner lining of the papyrus reed, then over these other strips at right angles to the first, afterward soaking with some adhesive material and finally pressing and drying. Sheets made in this way were fastened together with glue into a long scroll. The Gr for papyrus plant is "biblos," from which the Eng. word "Bible" is derived. Parchment, leather and leaves were also used as paper. The natives of Syria and Pal still call a sheet of paper a "leaf" (Arab. warṣaf).

The art of perfume-making dates back to the ancient Egyptians. In Ex 30:35 we have the first mention of scented anointing oils.

Perfume-making (a) for religious rites as offerings and to anoint the idols and (b) for personal use on the body or clothes. Some perfumes were used in the form of ointments (ointments). See Perfume.

The trade of plastering dates back to the beginning of the history of building. There were two reasons for using plastering or stucco: (a) to render the building weather-resistant and (b) to make the surfaces more suitable for decoration by engraving or painting. See Plaster.

The arts of spinning and weaving were early practised in the household (Ex 35:25). Many different fibers were spun and woven into cloth. Fabrics of wool, cotton, flax, silk, wool fiber have been preserved from Bible times. In the more progressive communities, the weaving of the fabrics was taken over by the weavers who made it their profession. In 1 Ch 4:21 it is stated that many of the families of the house of Asbea were workers in fine linen. The modern invasion of European manufacturers has not yet driven out the weavers who till at looms much like those described by the ancient Egyptian drawings. See Spinning; Weaving.

Although it is known that tanning was practiced, the only reference to this trade mentioned in the Bible is to Simon the tanner (Acts 9:43). Leather girdles are mentioned in 2 K 1:8; Mt 3:4. Relics taken from the tombs show that the ancients understood the various methods for preserving skins which are used in present-day practice. See Tanner.

We think of Paul as the tent-maker. The tents which he made however were probably not like those so frequently referred to in the OT. Tents in Paul's time were made from Cilician cloth. Paul's work was probably the sewing together of the proper lengths of cloth and the attaching of ropes and loops. In OT times the tents were made of strips of coarse goat's hair cloth or of the skins of animals. See Tent.

This art is being written within sound of festivities about the winepresses of Mt. Lebanon where men and women have gathered for the annual production of wine. Molasses (Arab. hābe) are made of the remaining grape molasses (Arab. hābe). Their process is so like that of Bible times that one is transported in thought to similar festivities that must have taken place even so far back as the early Egyptian kings. That these workers understood the precautions necessary for procuring... a desirable product is evidenced by early writings. The choice of proper soil for the vineyards, the adding of preservatives to keep the wine, boiling the juice to kill undesirable fermentations, guarding against rain, and storing in casks or bottles, are examples of their knowledge of wine-making. See Wine Press.

III. Craftsmen. — Craftsmen were early segregated into groups. A trade usually remained in a family. This is true to some extent in the East today. In such cities as Beirút, Damascus, or Aleppo the shops of the craftsmen of a given trade will be found grouped together. There is a silver and goldsmiths' market (Arab. sīk), an iron market, a dyeing quarter, etc. Jewish craftsmen in early times sat separately in the synagogues. Some crafts were looked upon with disfavor, esp. those which brought men in contact with women, as for example, the trade of goldsmith, carder, weaver, fuller or tanner. There was a fellow-feeling among craftsmen referred to by Isaiah (Isa 41:6,7). This same feeling is observed among Syrian workmen today. The Arab has many phrases of encouragement for a man at his work, such as, "Peace to your hands," "May God give you strength." A crowd of men pulling at a pulley rope, for example, shout or sing together as they pull.

JAMES A. PATCH

CRAG, krag (תֶּן, šēn [1 S 7 12; 14 4; Job 39 28 AV and ERV]): In a mountainous country composed of sedimentary rocks, like the cretaceous rocks of Pal, cliffs are formed on a slope where hard strata are underlaid by softer strata. The soft strata wear away more rapidly, undermining the hard strata above them, which for a time project, but finally break off by vertical joint planes, the fragments rolling down to form the talus slope at the foot of the cliff. As the breaking off of the undermined hard strata proceeds irregularly, there are left projecting crags, sometimes at the top of the cliff, and sometimes lower down. Two such crags (šēn ha-qal'a, "sharp rock," RV "rocky crag"), which were given particular names, Bozez and Senach, marked the scene of the exploit of Jonathan described in 1 S 14. Conrad failed to identify the crags, and it has been proposed to alter the text rather extensively to make it read: "wall of rock" instead of "crag" (EB s.v. "Michmash"). Such rocks form safe resting-places for birds of prey, as it is said of the eagle in Job 39 28 ERV:

"She dwelleth on the rock and hath her lodging there.

Upon the crag of the rock, and the stronghold."

ALFRED ELIJAH DAY

CRANE, krān (בַּר, tāghār; yeğōna, ṣēḥerān; LXX Grus cinerea): A bird of the family gruidae. The crane is mentioned twice in the Bible: once on account of its voice (Isa 38 14: "Like a swallow or a crane, so did I chatter"); again because of the unforgettable picture these birds made in migration (Jer 8 7): "Yea, the stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle-dove and the swallow and the crane observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the law of the Lord.

Some commentators have advanced reasons for dropping the crane from the ornithology of the Bible, but this never should be permitted. They were close relatives of stork, heron and ibis; almost as numerous as any of these, and residents of Pal, except in migration. The two quotations concerning them fit with their history, and point out the two features that made them as noticeable as any birds of Pal. Next to the ostrich and pelican they were the largest birds, having a wing sweep of 8 ft. from tip to tip and standing 4 ft. in height. In migration such immense flocks passed over Pal as to darken the sky, and when they crossed the Red Sea they appeared to sweep from shore to shore, and so became the most noticeable migratory bird, for which reason, no doubt, they were included in Isaiah's reference to spring migration with the beloved doves, used in sacrifice and for caged pets, and with the swallows that were held almost sacred because they homed in temples. Not so many of them settled in Pal as of the storks, but large flocks lived in the wilderness S. of Jerus, and a few pairs homed near water as far north as Merom. The grayish-brown cranes were the largest, and there were also a crested, and a white crane. They nested on the ground or in trees and laid two large eggs, differing with species. The eggs of the brown bird were a light chocolate brown streaked, and those of the white, rough, pale-blue with brown splotches. They were not so affectionate in pairs or to their young as storks, but were average parents. It is altogether probable that they were the birds intended by Isaiah, because they best suited his purpose, the crane and the swallow being almost incessant talkers among birds. The word "chatter," used in the Bible, exactly suits the notes of a swallow, but is much too feeble to be used in describing the vocalizing of the crane. They migrated in large wedge-shaped companies and cried constantly on wing. They talked incessantly while at the business of living, and even during the watches of the night they scarcely ceased passing along word that all was well, or sending abroad danger signals. The Arabs called the cry of the cranes "bellowing.

We usually express it by whooping or trumpeting. Any of these words is sufficiently expressive to denote an unusual voice, used in an unusual manner, so that it appealed to the prophet as suitable for use in a strong comparison. GENE STRATTON-PORTER

CRASHING, krash'ing (שֶּבֶר, shebber): This word, meaning "a breach," fig. "destruction," is tr "crashing" in Zeph 1 10: "a great crashing from the hills," representing the doom to fall on evil-doers in Jerus, as the enemy advanced against the city from the north.
CRATES, krā'tēs (Κράτης, Krátēs), governor of the Cyprians, left as deputy of Sostratus the latter, who was governor of Jerus., was summoned to Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes, in consequence of a dispute with Menedius (2 Macc 4. 29). As Cyprus was not at the time in the possession of Antiochus, the words have been generally taken to mean Krates "who had formerly been, or afterward was, governor of the Cyprians." The Vulg translates the Gr into "Sostratus autem praemuniet Cypris."

LITERATURE
Much negative ground has been cleared away for any modern discussion of the doctrine of creation.

1. Creation as Abiding besides the world as at first constituted, all that to this day is in and of creation. For God creates not that which can exist independently of Him, His preserving agency being inseparably connected with His creative power. We have long ceased to think of God's creation as a machine left, completely made, to its own automatic working. With such a doctrine of creation, a theistic evolution would be quite incompatible. Just as little do we think of God's creative agency, as merely that of a First Cause, linked to the universe from the outside by effects. Nature in her entirety is as much His creation today as she ever was. The dynamic ubiquity of God, as efficient energy, is to be affirmed. God is still All and in All, but this in a way sharply distinguished from pantheistic views, whether of the universe as God, or of God as the universal substance. Of His creative agency, so that gnostic theories of natural and necessary emanation are left far behind. Not only have the "craftsmen" and the "gardeners" theories—of, of course, the architect or world-builder theory of Plato—been dismissed; not only has the conception of evolution been proved harmonious with creative end, plan, purpose, ordering, guidance; but evolutionary science may itself be said to have given the thought of theistic evolution its best base or ground. The tentative conception is, that the world—that all cosmic existences, substances, events—depend upon God.

The doctrine of formation—of the origin and persistence, of all finite existences—as the work of God, where the theistic conception is, that the world—God is a necessary postulation of the religious consciousness. Such consciousness is marked by deeper insight than belongs to science. The underlying truth is the anti-pathetic one, that the energy and wisdom—by which that, which was not, became—were, in kind, other than its own. For science can but trace the continuity of sequences in all Nature, while in creation, in its primary sense, this law of continuity must be transcended, and the world view of developmental which is immanent in its evolution. For God is the Aboulute Reason, always immanent in the developing universe. Apart from the cosmogonic attempts at the beginning of Genesis, which are clearly religious and ethical in scope and character, the OT furnishes no theocratic account of the manner and order in which creation was brought about.

The early chs of Genesis were, of course, not given to reveal the truths of physical science, but they recognize creation as marked by order, continuity, law, plastic power of God's productivity in all different kingdoms, unity of the world and progressive advance. The Genesis cosmogony teaches a process of becoming, as well as a creation (see EVOLUTION). That cosmogony has been recognized by Haeckel as meritoriously marked by the two great ideas of separation or differentiation, and of progressive development or perfecting of the originally simple matter. The OT presents the conception of time-worlds or successive ages, but its real emphasis is on the energy of the Divine Word, bringing into being things that did not exist.

The OT and the NT, in their doctrine of creation, recognize no eternal matter before creation. We cannot say that the origin of matter was included from the Genesis account of creation, and this quite apart from the use of bārā', as admitting of material and means in creation. But it seems wise to build upon Genesis passages that afford no more than a basis, and clear a way to the development of the doctrine. The NT seems to favor the derivation of matter from the non-existent—that is to say, the time-worlds were due to the efficient Divine Word or originate Will, rather than to being built out of God's own inanimate essence. So the best exegesis interprets He 11. 3.

In OT books, as the Ps, Prov, and Jer, the creation is expressly declared to be the work of Wisdom—a Wisdom not disjoined from God's own personality. As God, as yet more fully brought out in the Book of Job. The heavens and the earth were made by the Word of God—"is something apprehensible only by the power of religious faith, as the only principle applicable to the case (He 11. 3). Such idea of His absolute Wisdom is realized by the action of His perfect Love. It is philosophically necessary to maintain that God, as the Absolute Being, must find the end of creation in Himself. If the end were external to, and independent of, Him, then would He be conditioned thereby.

What the OT regarded concerning the absolute freedom of God in the production of the universe, and the fact that He is so much greater than the universe that existence has been by Him bestowed on all things that do exist. The Scriptures are, from first to last, shot through with this truth. Neither Kant nor Spencer, from data of self-consciousness or sense-perception, can rise to the conception of creation, for they both fail to reach the idea of Divine Personology. The inconceivability of creation has been pressed by Spencer, the idea of a self-existent Creator, through whose agency it has been made, being to him unthinkable. As if it were not a transparent issue in Spencer's own scientific practice refuted, that a hypothesis may not have philosophical or scientific value, because it is what we call unthinkable or inconceivable. As if a true and sufficient cause were not enough, or a Divine act of will were not a eer causa. Dependent

ence inevitably leads to the demand for an original (or absolute) dependence beyond the reach of human apprehension.

Creation is certainly not disproved by evolution, which does not explain the origin of the homogeneously stuff itself, and does not account for the manner in which the process--is obviously in no position to speak. Creation may, in an important sense, be said to have no place in time, since time cannot be posited prior to the existence of the world. The difficulties of the ordinary hypothesis of a creation in time can never be surmounted, so long as we continue to make eternity mean simply indefinitely prolonged time. Augustine was, no doubt, right when, from the human standpoint, he declared that the world was not made in time, but with time. Time is itself a creation simultaneous with, and conditioned by, world-creation and movement. To assume, in the ordinary fashion, that God, created in time, is apt to make time appear independent of God, or God dependent upon time. Yet the time-forms enter into all our psychological experience, and a concrete beginning is unthinkable to us.

The time-conditions can be transcended only by some deeper intuition than mere logical insight can supply--by such intuitive endeavor, or, in fact, as is realized in the necessity of intuition itself. God, we may say, is a Being such as acts or creates.

He may be said to act or create in eternity; and it is legitimate enough, in such wise, to speak of His creative act as eternal. This seems preferable to the position of Origen, who speculatively assumed an eternal or unbeginning activity for God as Creator, because the Divine Nature must be eternally self-determined to create in order to the manifestation of its perfections. Clearly did Aquinas perceive that we cannot affirm an eternal creation impossible; the creative act not falling within our categories of time and space. The question is purely one of God's free volition, in which—and not in "nothing"—the Source of the world is found.

This brings us to notice the frequently pressed objection that a beginning cannot be given to nothing, since out of nothing comes nothing.

10. Creation This would mean that matter is eternal—"ex nihilo" natural. But the eternity of matter, as something other than God, means its independence of God, and its power to limit or condition Him. We have, of course, no direct knowledge of the origin of matter, and the conception of its necessary self-existence is fraught with hopeless difficulties and absurdities. The axiom, that out of nothing nothing comes, is not contradicted in the case of creation. The universe comes from God; it does not come from nothing. But the axiom does not really apply to the world's creation, but only to the succession of its phenomena. Entity does not spring from non-entity. But there is an opposite and positive truth, that something presupposes something, in this case rather some One—aliquis rather than aliquid.

It is enough to know that God has in Himself the powers necessary and adequate for creating, without being able to define the ways in which creation is effected by Him.

11. From God's Will It is a sheer necessity of rational faith or spiritual reason that the something which conditions the world is neither the cause of the absolute, nor original or original

Will. We have no right to suppose the world made out of nothing, and then to identify, as Erigena did, this "nothing" with God's own essence. What we have a right to maintain is, that what God creates or calls into being, is His own, and that He can then save His will alone, Ground of all actualities. Pre-existent Personality is the ground and the condition of the world's beginning.

In this sense, its beginning may be said to be relative rather than absolute. God is always antecedent to the universe—its prior,

12. Error of Cause and Creator. It remains an

Pantheism effect, and sustains a relation of causal dependence upon Him. If we say, like Cousin, that God has taken nothing, we run risk of falling into Spinozistic pantheism, identifying God, in excluding from Him absolute freedom in creation, with the impersonal and unconscious substance of the universe. Or if, with Schelling, we posit in God something which is not God—a dark, irrational background, which original ground is also the ground of the Divine Existence—

we may try to find a basis for the matter of the universe, but we are in danger of being merged—by the process of dropping the dogmas of pantheism—to which God is but the soul of the universe.

The universe, we feel sure, has been caused; its existence must have some ground; even if we held a philosophical idealism as we do, the conception of created things one grand illusion, an illusion so vast would still call for some explanatory Cause. Even if we are not content with the conception of a

First Cause, acting on the world from without and antecedently to it, we are not yet freed from the necessity of asserting a Cause. An underlying and determining Cause of the universe would still need to be postulated as its Ground.

Even a universe held to be eternal would need to be accounted for—should we still have to ask how such a universe came to be. Its endless movement must have direction and character imparted to it from some immanent ground or underlying cause. Such a self-existent and eternal World-Ground or First Cause is, by an inexorable law of thought, the necessary correlate of the finite, or contingent character of the world. God and the world are not to be taken simply as cause and effect, for modern metaphysical thought is not content with such a mere ens extra-mundum for the Ground of all possible experience. God, self-existent Cause of the ever-present world and its phenomena, is the ultimate Ground of the possibility of all that is.

Such a Deity, as causa sui, creatively bringing forth the world out of His own potency, cannot be allowed to be an arbitrary resting-place, but a truly rational Ground, of

End—the thought. Nor can His Creation be

Divine allowed to be an aimless and meaningful universe: it is shot through with end or purpose that tends to reflect the glory of the eternal and personal God, who is its Creator in a full and real sense. But the Divine action is not dramatic: of His working we can truly say, with Isa 45 15, "Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself." As creation becomes progressively disclosed to us, its glory, as revealing God, ought to excite within us an always deeper sense of the sentiment of Ps 139: "O Jehovah Lord, how art thou is thy name in all the earth?" See also Anthro-poloay; Earth; World.

CREATOR, krē'tār (κτερις, kitesēs, 1 Pet 4:19): The distinctive characteristic of Deity, as the Creator, is that He is the Cause of all things. Cause of its being, not merely of its evolution or present arrangements. The doctrine of His being the Creator implies, that is to say, that He is the real and the exclusive Agent in the production of the world. For, as Baker remarks, the thought of the Creator is the most fruitful of all our ideas. As Creator, He is the Unconditioned, and the All-conditioning, Being. The universe is thus dependent upon Him, as its causative antecedent. He cannot, nor was it necessary to His own existence, become dependent upon any pre-existing basis. His power, as Creator, is different in kind from finite power. But the creative process is not a case of sheer almightiness, creating something out of nothing, but an expression of God, as the Absolute Reason, under the forms of time and space, causality and finite personality. In all His work, as Creator, there is no incitement from without, but it rather remains an eternal activity of self-manifestation on the part of a God who is Love.

God's free creative action is destined to realize archetypal ends and ideals, which are peculiar to Himself. For thought cannot be considered apart from the creative action of the Divine Will. This theistic postulation of His freedom, as Creator, rules out all theories of necessary emanation. His creative action was in no way conditioned on the past or necessary on His own blessedness or perfection, which must be held as already complete in Himself. To speak, as Professor James does, of "the stagnant felicity of the Absolute's own perfection" is to misconceive the infinite plenitude of His life and to place Him in a position of abject and unworthy dependence upon an eternal activity of world-making.

God's action, as Creator, does not lower our conception of His changelessness, for it is a gratuitous action, to produce either good or evil.

Time: the will to create was a sudden or to Time accidental thing, or that He could not will a change, without, in any proper sense, changing His will. Again, grave difficulties cluster around the conception of His creative thought or purpose as externalized in time, the chief source of the trouble being, as is often imperfectly realized, that, in attempting to view things as they were when time began, we are really trying to look out of, and beyond, experience, to the thinking of which time is an indispensable condition. God's work as Creator must have taken place in time, since the world must be held as no necessary element in the Absolute Life.

The self-determined action of the Divine Will, then, is to be treated as the ultimate principle of the cosmos. Not to any causal or meta-CREATURE, LIVING (Tτζ, ῥαγγάθ, ἤγων, ἀγων): "Living creature" (ῥαγγάθ) is the designation of each of the composite figures in Ezekiel's visions (1:5.13 ff; 3:13; 10:15.17.20) and, RV, of the similar beings in the visions of the Apocalypse, instead of the excessively unfounded of AV by "beasts" (Rev 4:6 ff; 5:6 ff; 6:1 ff; 7:11; 14:3; 16:7; 19:4), which, however, went back to Wilch, in whose time the word had not the low meaning which "beast," "beastly" have with us; hence he translates 1 Cor 15:44, "It is sown a beast's body," meaning simply animal (see Trench's Select Glossary); in Rev "the beasts of the earth," the "beasts" that came up, the notable "beast" that men worshiped, represent the Gr ἄγων, "a wild beast."

The "living creatures" in Ezekiel's vision (1:5 ff) were four in number, "with the general appearance of a man, but each with four faces and four wings, and straight legs with the feet of an ox. Under their wings was their own kind of hand and to place Him in a position of abject and unworthy dependence upon an eternal activity of world-making.

4. Christ in physical necessity, but to Divine or Creation Absolute Personality, must the created man be related, as he is through Him, and as Him are all things" (Rom 11:36). This creative action of God is mediated by Christ—by whom "were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him, and unto him" (Col 1:16). sent the powers of Nature—of the creation, "full of eyes" as denoting its permeation with the Divine Reason, the wings signifying its constant, ready service, and the unceasing praise the constant doing of God's will. The imagery is founded on Ezekiel as that had been modified in apocalyptic writings and as it was exalted in the mind of the Seer of Patmos.

CREDIT, kredít (προσέχω, pistedein; 1 Mac 10 46 AV, RV "gave no credence"; Wisd 18 6 AV, RV "trusted"; 1 Mac 30 30, AV "credence"). In the modern commercial sense the noun "credit" does not occur in the canonical Scriptures or in the Apost.

CREDITOR, kredít-tér (a) דִּיוֹן, nāsheh, participle of דִּיוֹן, nāsheh: Ex 22 24 [ET 25]; 2 K 4 1; Isa 50 1; 14 "extortioner," Ps 109 11; "taker of usury," Isa 24 2 AV; [b] דֵּי, melach, participle of דֵּי, melach, Isa 24 2 RV, AV "lender"; [c] דֵּי יִשָּׁה, ba'al melasheh yădah: "lord of the loan of his hand," Dt 15 2; [d] דֵּי וֹרָה, daniātes: Lk 7 41, "creditor" AV, "lender" RV; of further daniātes, Sir 29 28, "lender" AV, "money-lender" RV): In the ideal social system of the OT, debts are incurred only because of poverty, and the law protected the poor debtor from his creditor, who in Ex 22 25 is forbidden to demand interest, and in Dt 15 2 to exact payment in view of the nearness of the year of release. But it follows that the actual practice was not so considerate, and in consequence the creditor fell into bad repute. In Ps 109 11 he is the extortioner; in Prov 29 13 the oppressor is evidently the creditor, though a different word is used; cf also Prov 22 7. In Sir 29 28 the importance of the creditor is one of the hardships of the poor man of understanding. The actual practice of the Jews may be gathered from Neh 5 1 ff; Jer 34 8 ff; and Sir 29 1-11. LITERATURE

By "creed" we understand the systematic statement of religious faith; and by the creeds of the Christian church we mean the formal expression of "the faith which was delivered unto the saints." The word is derived from the first word of the Latin VSS of the Apostles' Creed, and the name is usually applied to those formulae known as the Apostles', the Nicene and the Athenian creeds.

In this art. we shall first indicate the Scriptural foundation and rudimentary Bib. statements upon which the distinctive dogmas of the church are based; and, secondly, briefly describe the origin and nature of the three most important symbols of belief which have dominated Christian thought.

I. Scriptural Basis. There are three forms in which the religious instinct naturally expresses itself—in a ritual, a creed and a life. Men first seek to propitiate the Deity by some outward act and express their devotion in some external ceremony. Next they endeavor to explain their worship and to find a rationale of it in certain facts which they formulate into a confession; and lastly, not content with the outward act or the verbal interpretation of it, they attempt to express their religion in life.

Pagan religion first appears in the form of a rite. The worshiper was content with the proper performance of a ceremony and was not, in the earliest stage at least, concerned with an interpretation of his act. The myths, which to some extent were an attempt to rationalize ritual, may be regarded as the earliest approach to a formulated statement of belief. But inasmuch as the myths of early pagan religion are not obligatory upon the reason or the faith of the worshipper, they can scarcely be regarded as creeds. Pagan religion, strictly speaking, has no theology and having no real historical basis of facts does not possess the elements of a creed. In this respect it is distinguished from revealed religion. This latter rests upon facts, the meaning and interpretation of which are felt to be necessary to give to revealed religion reality and truth.

Even in the OT there are not wanting the germs of a creed. In the Decalogue we have the beginnings of the formulation of belief, and in the proclamation, "Hear, O Israel: Jehovah is our God one Jehovah" (Deut 6 4), we have what may be regarded as the symbol of the OT faith and the earliest attempt to enunciate a doctrine.

It is to the NT, however, we must turn to find the real indications of such a statement of belief as may be designated a creed. We must remember that Christ lived and taught for a time before any attempt was made to portray His life or to record His sayings. The earliest writings are not the Gospels, but some of the Epistles, and it is to them we must look for any definite explanation of the facts which center in the appearance of Christ upon the earth. At the same time in the sequence of events the personality and teaching of Jesus come first, and in the relation to Him of His disciples and converts and in their personal confessions and utterances of faith we have the earliest suggestions of an expression of belief. The confession of Nathanael (John 1 49), "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God," and still more the utterance of St. Peter (Mt 16 16), "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," and the exclamation of Thomas (Jn 20 28), contain the germ of a creed. It is to be noted that all these expressions of belief have Christ as their object and give utterance with more or less explicitness to a conviction of His Divine nature and authority.

But while these sayings in the Gospels were no doubt taken up and incorporated in later interpretations, it is to the Epistles that we must first go, for an explanation of the facts which are familiar to the hearers, but also to draw inferences from them as to the meaning of Christ and the great truths centering in His person—His Incarnation, His death and resurrection (as we may see from the recorded sermons of Peter and Paul in Acts). It is in the Epistles that we find the core of the Epistle appeal. It was at once natural and necessary that some expression of the faith once delivered to the saints should be formulated for a body whose members were pledged to each other and to God and whose bond of union was the acknowledgment of "one Lord, one faith." Paul recognizes it as vital to the very spirit of religion that some definite profession of belief in Christ should be made: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. 10:9). These words would seem to imply that a confession of the Deity, the atoning death, and resurrection of Jesus was the earliest form of Christian creed.

Paul's reference to it does not prove that it was not a part of the ground upon which the Christ was commended to the first acceptance of faith. But though no direct allusion to the virgin birth occurs in Paul's writings the truth which gives spiritual value to the fact of the virgin conception, viz., God's new creation of humanity in Christ, is a vital and fundamental element in the faith both of St. Paul and of the whole early church. The Christian life is essentially a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15; Rom. 6:4) in Jesus Christ, the second Adam (Rom. 5:12–21), who is from heaven (1 Cor. 16:47). Into this spiritual context the facts recorded by Matthew and Luke introduce no alien or incompatible element (cf. W. Richardson The preeminence of the earliest form of creed reflected little more than Christ's final command to baptize all men "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt. 28:19), or perhaps similar sayings in the Epistle of St. Peter (1 Pet. 1:2). The ver in 8:37 AV, though disputed by some, is instructive in this connection. Faith in Jesus Christ was regarded as the cardinal point of the New Revelation and may have been taken to imply a relation to the Father as well as a promise of the Holy Spirit.

It is evident that the creeds that have come down to us are mainly an expression of the doctrine of the Trinity as embodied in the original baptismal formula derived from Our Lord's commission. Already indeed in some places of the OT this doctrine is foreshadowed; but it is first clearly incorporated in the Lord's command just mentioned and in the benediction of St. Paul (2 Cor. 13:14), and locally in the Christian church (cf. W. Richardson The testimony of the NT is evident that the earliest form of creed reflected little more than Christ's final command to baptize all men "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt. 28:19), or perhaps similar sayings in the Epistle of St. Peter (1 Pet. 1:2). the church. The efforts of the emperor, however, had no effect in allaying the dissensions of the church at Alexandria, which, upon the banishment of Arius, spread throughout eastern Christendom. It was decided, therefore, to convoke a general council of bishops in the winter of 325 A.D. at the Emperor Constantine's capital, Saloniki (Thessalonica), which met in May of the following year. It was attended by clerics from both the Greek and Latin churches, and their deliberations lasted for 20 sessions. The council is generally regarded as the first general ecumenical council held in Christendom, and it marks a significant development in the history of the Christian church.

The controversy turned upon the nature of the Son and His relation to the Father. The word homoiousios ("of one substance with") used in the course of the argument with a view of controverting the extreme orthodox position, became the battleground between the parties. The Arians violently condemned the Sabellians or Semi-Arians to evade its full content for the term homoousios ("of like substance"). But the majority finally adopted the former expression as the term best suited to discriminate their view of the Holy Trinity. The First Council of Nicaea was held in 325 AD.

The assembly of men who had met in the First Council of Nicaea was, in fact, a number of the bishops of the Western church, and the statement which it drew up was the Nicene Creed. This creed, which is the basis of the Christian faith, is a statement of the beliefs of the early church. The Nicene Creed, which is the basis of the Christian faith, is a statement of the beliefs of the early church.

The phrase "procedeth from the Father and the Son" has historical importance. The last three words are a later addition to the creed by western churches, formally adopted by the Council of Toledo in 589. But when the matter was referred to the 9th cent., Leo III pronounced against them as unauthorized. This interpolation, known as the Filioque, marks the difference still between the Latin and Greek churches. From the 9th cent. no change has been made in the Nicene Creed. It has remained, without the Filioque clause, the central dogma of the Eastern Church; and with the addition of that word it has taken its place among the three great creeds of the Western Church.

The Athanasian Creed, or the Symbol Quicumque, as it is called, from its opening words, differs entirely in spirit. It is historical, and history is what those who have just considered. It is not a gradual development of the Apostles' Creed, nor is it the outcome of synodal authority like the Nicene Creed. When the composition appears for the first time as a document of authority it is cited in its completeness and as the work of the Father whose name it has in the most part, because, although it was not brought to light for many centuries after his death (Lumby, Hist of the Creeds). Without going into the full and intricate evidence which has been brought forward by scholars to prove that it is incorrectly attributed to Athanasius, it is sufficient to observe that both authorship and date are uncertain. Dr. Swainson proves in the most conclusive manner that the existence of this document is a posterior invention and that its origin may probably be ascribed to the existing demand for a more detailed exposition of the faith than that in the Apostles' Creed. It is in no short mention at synods before the end of the 8th cent., whose special business it was to discuss the main matters which were afterward embodied within it in such detail. The composition of imposture has been raised with regard to this creed, and it has been maintained by some that it is simply a forgery of the same nature as the "false decretales" and the equally famous "Donation of Constantine" (Swainson). But it may be said that the work was directly inspired by the "natural" and inevitable result of the working of the mind of the Western Church to give a more detailed and detailed confession of its Trinitarian faith (Toole, Enc. Brit.). The imposture, if there was any, consisted not in the origin of the work in the mind of the council but in the taking of it as a name and a date with which it had no connection. This was done no doubt to secure for it credit and authority, and was supposed to be justified by its special doctrinal import.

This symbol, though too comphendable and elaborate to serve the purposes of a creed, itself standing in need of exposition and explanation, has its value as representing a further stage of doctrine. It has been said that the Apostles' Creed determined the nature of God and the Nicene Creed specified it should be Father and Son and the Holy Spirit, the Athanasian Creed may be regarded as establishing the great doctrine of the Trinity. It has its distinguished features are the its uncompromising statement of the value of the Christian faith from all other creeds. This Controversial view; this adds the danger of rejecting the others declare the faith; this insists also on its necessity. This, also, also exists upon the necessity of the Nicene Creed, for which Yonge, "An exposition of the Apostles' Creed," the closing warning of the Nicene creed on Christ's name form, etc (Mt 23.41.46). If this creed is seldom in its adoptions, we must remember that so also are the Gospels. On the whole it is a comprehensive summary of this truth, laying down the rule of faith as a foundation, following its issues of good or evil. True belief is closely connected with right action.

With the adoption of the "Athanasian" symbol, the creed-making of the early and medieaval church ceases. Of the three mentioned one only in the broadest sense, the Nicene, is Catholic. Neither the creeds of Arian, nor the Athanasian, was suited to the Gr or oriental church, which remained faithful to the faith settled by the holy fathers at Nicaea. The two others adopted by the West are really gradual growths or consequences from it, without any definite meaning or significance. To say that the faith as defined at Nicaea and ratified by subsequent councils is the only true Catholic symbol of the universal church.

With the Reformation a new era of creed-formation began. It was, however, necessary to do more than mention some of the confessions of the Reformers which consist mainly of elaborations of the creeds of the early church or the Apostles' Creed. The Reformers were so intent on safeguarding the distinctive doctrines and ecclesiastical positions of particular branches of the church. Of this nature are the Confessions of the Lutheran church—the Augsburg Confession of 1530; the Genevan or Calvinistic of 1549 consisting of 26 arts, defining particularly the nature of the Sacraments; the confessions of the Dutch church confirmed at the Synod of Dort in 1619 and known as the "Decrees of Dort"; and the famous Heidelberg Catechism. To this service of Protestant orthodoxy must be added the 39 Articles of the Church of England and the Westminster Confession of Faith, which is the doctrinal standard not only of the churches of Great Britain and America.

CREEK, krēk, coloq. krīk (kόκως, kópos) [Acts 27 39, RV "bay"]; The spot has been identified as the traditional Bay of St. Paul about 8 miles N.W. of the town of Valetta in the island of Malta. See MELITA.

CREEPING, krēp′ing, THING (κατασκυλtant, remes, τέρα τρέχον, τρέφον, herpeton); Remes and shereq, with the root vba, rămás and šārās, are used without any sharp distinction for insects and other small creatures. Rāmas means clearly "to creep," and is used even of the beasts of the forest (Ps 104).
20), while ἱδραγές is rather "to swurm." But in at least one passage (Lev 11:44), we have the noun, ἱδραγές, with the vb. ῥαμάς; "with any manner of creeping thing that moveth upon the earth." The principal passages where these utterances occur are the accounts of the Creation and the Flood and the references to unclean animals in Lev and in the vision of Peter. In the last we have the word heperelos as the G Ecquivalent of the Heb words (Acts 10:32). There is one other reference to creeping things (Is 34:11, 12; Jer 4:18), and as well the single, unclean, but an exception is made in favor of the locusts, "which have legs above their feet, whereunto to leap upon the earth." See INSECTA; LOCUST.

ALFRED ELY DAY

CREMATION, krē-mā'shun (cf ἀφανής, sāphānēs), Noah 7:15, etc.,"shall be burnt with fire"; καίαθα, καίαθα, 1 Cor 13:3, "If I give my body to be burnt, etc.": Cremation, while the customary practice of the ancient Greeks, and not unknown among the Romans, was certainly not the ordinary mode of disposing of the dead among the Hebrews or other oriental peoples. Even among the Greeks, bodies were sometimes burned (Hes. Arg. 134.6; Plato Phaedo 115 E; Plut. Lyce. xxvii). Cicero thought that burial was the more ancient practice, though among the Romans both methods were in use in his day (De leg. ii.22.56). Lucian (De mortibus 22) expressly says that, while the Greeks burnt their dead, the Persians buried them (see BURIAL, and of 2 S 21:12-14). In the case supposed by Amos (6:10), when it is predicted that Jehovah "abhorreth of the excellency of Jacob," shall "dwell no more in the tents of the Philistines" and take ten men in one house, that they shall die"; and "a man's kinsman [ARV] shall take him up, even he that burneth him," etc. the suggestion seems to be that of pestilence with accompanying infection, and that this, or the special judgment of Jehovah, is why burning is preferred. When Paul (1 Cor 13:3) speaks of giving his body to be burnt, he is simply accommodating his language to the customs of Corinth. (But see Plutarch on Zaramanocheosas, and C. Beard, The Universal Christ.)

How far religious, or sanitary, or practical reasons were influential in deciding between the different methods, it is impossible to say. That bodies were burnt in times of pestilence in the Valley of Hinnom (Jer 26:12), and the like, is certain; and there may have been special passages of the Scripture that have been referred to, and that we are not now able to recall. The "very great burning" at the burial of Asa (2 Ch 16:14) is not a case of cremation, but of burning spices and furniture in the king's honor (cf Jer 34:5). Nor is 1 K 13:2 a case in point: it is simply a prophecy of a king who shall take the bones of men previously burnt, and the priests of the high places that burn incense in false worship, and cause them to be burnt on the defiled altar to further pollute it and render it abominable.

It is in the NT no instance of cremation, Jewish, heathen or Christian, and clearly the early Christians followed the Jewish practice of burying the dead (see Tert., Apol., xliii; Minuc. Felix, Oedon, xxix; Aug., De civ. Dei, i.12,13). Indeed, cremation has never been popular among Christians, owing largely, doubtless, to the natural influence of the example of the Jews, the indisputable fact that Christ was buried, the vivid hope of the resurrection and the more or less material views concerning that event. While there is nothing anti-Christian in it, and much in sanitary considerations to call for it in an age of science, it is not likely that it will ever become the prevailing practice of Christendom. CRESCENTS, kress'ents (Κρήσσεντα, Krēssēnta, "increasing"): An assistant of Paul, mentioned in 2 Tim 4:10 as having gone to Galatia. That he was one of the Seventy, and that he founded the church in Vienna in Gaul, are traditions without any trustworthy basis.

CRETE, krēt. (Κρήτη, Krētē, ethnic Κρήτης, Krētēs, Acts 2:11; Tit. 1:21): An island bounding the Aegean Sea on the S. It stretches from 34° 50' to 35° 40' N. lat. and from 23° 30' to 26° 20' E. long. With Cythera on the N.W. and Carpathos and Rhodos on the N.E., it forms a continuous bridge between Greece and Asia Minor. The center of the island is formed by a mountain chain rising to a height of 8,193 ft. in Mt. Ida, and fringed with low valleys beside the coast. There are no considerable rivers; the largest, the Metropolis, on the S., is a tiny stream, fordable anywhere. An island of considerable extent (156 miles long, and from 7 to 30 miles broad), in several districts very fertile and possessing one or two good harbors, it seems marked out by its position for an important post in the Mediterranean. But never since an age which was already legendary when Gr history began has Crete occupied a dominating position among the powers of the surrounding continents. Internal dimensions, due in ancient times to the large island of Crete (Eteocretans—the original inhabitants—Pelagians, Achaeans, Cyclonians and Dorian), and in modern times to the fact that a large minority of the population has accepted the Ottoman religion along with the Ottoman government, have put the island in a position of political inferiority throughout the historical period.

Mt. Ida in Crete was famous in Gr legend as the birthplace of Zeus. The half-legendary, half-historical King Minos was said to be the son of Zeus, and to have derived his family from his father the wisdom to which, by a type of myth common in Gr lands, the constitution of the Cretan cities was ascribed. Minos was accepted as a historical personality by Thucydides and Aristotle, who say that he was the first dynasty in Greece to establish dominion on the sea. One of his exploits was the suppression of piracy in Cretan waters, a feat which had to be repeated by the Rom Pompeius at a later period. Aristotle compared the Cretans to the Spartans; the island was said to have been colonized by Dorian from Peloponnese (Politics ii.10). The most important cities in Crete were Knossos (whose palace has been excavated with fruitful results by Mr. Arthur Evans), Gortyna, near the Gulf of Messara, and Cydonia, with its river Iaritanos. The excavations of Mr. Evans at Knossos and of the Italians at Phaestos (near Fair Havens) prove that Cret was a center of Mediterranean civilization in early times. In the Homeric poems, Crete is said to have contained an hundred cities; at that period the Cretans were still famed as daring sailors. In the classical age of Gr history they never held a leading position. They are mentioned chiefly as traders and mercenary soldiers, skilled esp. in archery. During the Hellenistic period Crete remained free. Demetrius Nicator made the island his base of operations before his defeat at Azots in 148.

In 141, the Cretan Jews were influential enough to secure the patronage of Rome. They were being oppressed by the people of Gortyna, and appealed to Rome, which granted them protection. In strengthening the position of the Jews, the Romans were copying the Seleucid policy in Syria Minor; both the Seleucids and the Romans found the Jews among their most devoted supporters in their subject states. This interference of Rome in the interest of her future partisans paved the way for her annexation of the island in the following cent. From this date, the Jewish wars, of which there was a protracted history, had no serious result. The body of Jews in Crete, and Cretans are mentioned among the strangers present at the Feast of Pentecost in Acts 2.11. Its alliance with Mithradates the Great, and the help it gave to the Cilician pirates gave Rome the pretext she desired for making war on Crete, and the island was annexed by Metellus in 67 BC. With Cyrene on the north coast of Africa, it was formed into a Rom province. When Augustus divided the Empire between the Senate and himself, Crete and Cyrene were sufficiently peaceful to be given to the Senate. They formed one province till the time of Constantine, who made Crete a separate province.

3. Later History Byzantine Empire by Nephochs Phokas in the following cent. From the 13th till the 17th cent. it was held by the Venetian Republic: from this period dates its modern name "Kandia," which the Venetians gave to the Saracen capital Khania and after 1669, the island. After a desperate resistance, lasting from 1645 to 1669 AD, Crete fell into the hands of the Turks, who still exercise a nominal sovereignty over the island.

In 1 Sam 30.14; Ezek 25.16, and Zeph 2.5, the Philis are described as Cretians, which is usually taken to mean Cretans. The name is

4. Crete in connection with Caphtor and the OT Caphtorim (Dt 2.23; Jer 47.4; Am 9.7). The similarity between the river-names Jordan and Kandus (Hom. Odyssey iii. 292) "about whose streams the Kydones dwell," has suggested that Caphtor is to be identified with Cydonia; or possibly it was the name of the whole island. Tacitus believed in an ancient connection between Crete and Pal; the Jews, he said, were fugitives from Crete, and derived their name Iudaí from Mt. Ida (Hist. v.2). Crete is mentioned in connection with the campaign of Demetrius Nicator, referred to above, in 1 Macc 10.67. See Captain; Capiturers.

Cretes owe its connection with Pauline history to the accident of a gale which forced the ship carrying Paul to Rome to take shelter on the S. coast of the island. In the helmsman of Myra, on the coast of Lycaia, the centurion in charge of Paul transferred him from the Admiralty ship which had brought them from Caesarea, to a ship from Alexandria in Egypt, bound for Ostia with a cargo of grain. The fact that the centurion was in virtual command of the ship (Acts 27.11) proves that it was one of the vessels in the imperial transport service. Leaving Myra they came opposite Cnidus with difficulty, against a head-wind. The ordinary course from Cnidus in good weather was to steer straight for Cythera, but on this occasion the W. or N.W. winds made this route impracticable, and they sailed under the lee of Crete, whose S. coast would shelter them from a N.W. gale, and afford occasional protection from a W. gale. They passed Salamis, the N.E. corner of Crete, with difficulty, and worked round the coast to Fair Havens, a harbor somewhat to the E. of Cape Matala. The great Feast fell while they were at Fair Havens; in 99 AD this fell on October 5, in the middle of the season when the equinoxes made sailing impossible. Paul advised the centurion to winter in Fair Havens, but the captain wished to reach Phoenix, a harbor farther to the W., where ships from Egypt were accustomed to put in during the stormy season. It was decided to follow the captain's advice; but on its way to Phoenix the ship was struck by a N.E. wind called Euraqilo, which rushed down from Mt. Ida. The ship was carried out to sea; it managed to run under the lee of Cauda, an island 23 miles W. of Cape Matala, where the shipwrecked men in the boat, undergirded the ship, and alackened sail. On the fourteenth night they were driven on the coast of Malta, and wrecked.

The narrative does not state that Paul landed in Crete, but as the ship lay for some time at Fair Havens (Acts 27.8-9) he had plenty of opportunity to land, but not to travel inland. The centurion gave him permission to land at Sidon. Paul left Titus in Crete (Tit 1.5); tradition made the latter its first bishop, and patron saint.

Cretans were present, as noted above, at the Feast of Pentecost (Acts 2.11). Paul's estimate of the Cretan character (Tit 1.10-16) was the one current in antiquity.

6. The Cretans Paul quotes (1.12) a well-known line of the Cretan poet Epimenides (who lived about 600 BC) on the mendacity of the Cretans. The sentiment was repeated by Callimachus (Hymn to Zeus 8). Other ancient witnesses to the detestability in which the Cretan character was held are Zenon Plutarchus and Plutarchus.

CRIB (ךִּיב , 'ebhāq): "Crib" translates the Heb word 'ebhāq exactly, as it denotes "a barred receptacle for fodder used in cowsheds and foldyards; also in fields, for beasts lying out in the winter." The Heb is from a word meaning to feed (ךִּיב , 'ebhāq), and is used in the precise sense of the Eng. word in Job 39.9 of the "crib" of the wild ox, in Prov 14.4, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean," and in Isa 1.3, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib."

CRICKET, krik'et (ךִּיבָק , 'ebhāq): This occurs in Lev 11.22 (AV "beetle"), and doubtless refers to some kind of locust or grasshopper. See BEETLE; LOCUST; INSECT.

CRIER, kri'ēr (ךִּיבָק , 'ebhāq; cf βαδώ , βαδό): (1) Neither is this exact word found in EV, nor a word exactly corresponding to it in the Heb Bible, but the character it stands for appears as "one who cries aloud," i.e., proclaims mandates or gives public messages. In Prov 21.1 it is said, "She [Wisdom] crieth in the chief place of coucouse." (2) In the East today every village even has its public crier, selected for his loud or penetrating voice, and appointed to give notice of the fresh orders or mandates of the mudur ("governor") or other authorities. The muezzin of the Moslems, who at the five appointed times of prayer mounts the minaret and calls the faithful to prayer, is another striking example. Something like the ancient "heralds" of the king were the "heralds" of the Middle Ages in Europe who, preceded by trumpeters, made official proclamations.

CRIME, krim, CRIMES, krīmz: This term is used in Eng, as the equivalent of the Heb צֵאָב , minšāpā, "judgment," "verdict" (Ezk 7.23); נַפַּת, naphat, "a heinous crime" (Job 31.11); וָדָּחַמ , was̱āhām= "fault," "sin" (Gen 26.10, EV "guiltiness"); and Gr aitia, aitia, "case," "cause" (Acts 25 27, RV "charges"). In AV Jn 18 38; 19 4.6, the rendition is "fault."

Epakna, eiklēma, "indictment," "charge" (Acts 26 10 AV) is changed in RV to "matter." A crime is a transgression against the public right; serious offence against the law; a base weakness or iniquity, all of which are regarded by the Bible as offences against (1) God, or (2) man, or (3) both. An injury to the creature is regarded as obnoxious to the Creator. Specific forms of crime are the following:

Adultery.—See separate art.

Assassination.—This term does not occur in the EV, but, of course, is included in the more general "to kill," or "to slay" (Zeph 1 17; Zech 5 7). David expresses the deepest abhorrence of such an act (2 S 4 9-12). Instances are found recorded in Jgs 3 15; 13 28-20; 20 9.10; 2 K 12 20; 19 37; Isa 37 38. See also separate art.

Bestiality.—According to Webster: "unnatural connection with a beast." This form of vice was treated by the Mosaic law as something exceedingly loathsome and abhorrent, calling for extreme language and rigorous measures in its punishment. Both the beast and the guilty human were to be put to death (Ex 22 19; Lev 18 23; 20 15.16; Dt 27 21), in order, as the Talm says, to obliterate all memory of the crime.

Blasphemy.—See separate art.

Breach of Covenant (אֲבֹּדֵה בָּרְךָ, pāvar 'eth ha-brēkā).—According to Poucher (HDB, art. "Covenants"), this term included: (1) failure to observe the Day of Atonement (Lev 23 29) work on that day (Lev 23 28); (2) sacrifice of children to Moloch (Lev 20 3); (3) neglect of circumcision (Gen 17 14; Ex 4 20); (4) unauthorized manufacture of the holy oil (Ex 30 33); (5) anointing an alien therewith (Ex 30 33); (6) neglect of the Passover (Nu 9 13). Note also the following: Gen 17 14; Lev 26 15-44; Dt 29 25; 31 16.20. Paul (Rom 1 31) speaks of deērōthea, anōnthei = "covenant-breakers."

Breach of Ritual.—A term not found in the Scriptures, but designed to cover a number of acts prohibited by the ceremonial law. They have been enumerated by Poucher (HDB, art. "Crimes"): (1) eating blood, whether of fowl or beast (Lev 7 27; 17 14); (2) eating fat of the beast of sacrifice (Lev 7 25); (3) eating leavened bread during the Passover (Ex 12 15.19); (4) failure to bring an offering when an animal is slaughtered for food (Lev 17 4); (5) offering sacrifice while the worshipper is under the ban of uncleanness (Lev 7 20.21; 22 3.4.9); (6) making holy ointment for private use (Ex 30 32.33); (7) wearing the sacred vestments (Ex 30 38); (8) neglect of purification in general (Nu 19 13.20); (9) slaughtering an animal for food away from the door of the tabernacle (Lev 17 4.9); even the alien must comply, so that the introduction of worship at other places might be avoided; (10) touching holy things illegally (Nu 4 16.20 RV "the sanctuary"). The punishment for the non-observance of these prohibitions was the "cutting off" from the transgressor's people (דּוּחַ דּוּחַ, nīkhrah mīkerebāh = "cut off from among," i.e. excommunicated).

Breach of Trust.—See TRUST, BREACH OF.

Bribery.—See separate art.

Burglary.—This term does not occur. The corresponding act is defined as "thievery accompanied by breaking," and it places the offender beyond protection from violence (Ex 22 2). The crime might be committed in various degrees, and to burglarize the "devoted things" was punishable by death (Jos 7 24), as was also man-stealing (Ex 21 16; Dt 24 7).

Debt.—See separate art.

Deception.—See separate art.

Disobedience.—See separate art.

Divination.—See separate art.

Drunkenness.—See separate art.

Evil Speaking (Slander).—See Speaking Evil.

Falsehood.—Occurs as the rendition of פָּשָׁע, μείλιζε, "treachery," "sin," "trespass" (Job 21 34); and of פָּשָׁע, sheker = "a sham," "deceit," "lying" (25 13; Ps 7 14; 119 18; 144 8.11; Isa 25 57; 54 6.93; Jer 10 14; 13 25; Hos 7 1; Mic 2 11). In every case wilful perversion of the truth or preference for the untrue is at least presupposed, hence falsehood always marks an evil disposition, enmity against truth, and hence against God; consequently is criminal in the fullest sense.

False Swearing.—"Swearing to a lie or falsehood" (פָּשָׁע, sheker) is mentioned in Lev 6 3.5; 19 12; Jer 5 2; 7 9; Hos 10 4; Zec 5 4. From these passages and their context, it appears that this crime was considered in the twofold sense of a wrong against (1) the notion of the neighbor, and (2) against God, for the oath was an appeal to God as a witness to the truthfulness of the statement; hence to swear falsely was to represent God as a supporting false statement.

Falsehood.—See separate art.

Fornication.—Heb, פָּשָׁע, zānāh = "to commit adultery," esp. of the female, and less frequently of mere fornication, seldom of involuntary ravishment; also used figuratively in the sense of idolatry, the Jewish people being regarded as the spouse of Jeh (2 Ch 21 11; Isa 33 17; Ezek 16 28). Once we find the derivative noun פָּשְׁעְוִי, tzānāh (Ezek 16 20). In the NT, with both the literal and the figurative application, we find προφανεία, pornēia, and πορνεύω, porneuō, τουρνεύω, tornēvō (Mt 5 32; 16 19; Jr 8 41; Acts 15 20; 1 Cor 5 1; 6 13.18; 2 Th 2 10; 5 8; 1 Cor 12 21; Gal 6 19; Romans 2 20; 8 2; Thess 4 8; Rev 14 20.21; 49 21; 14 8; 27 24). The intensive καταφανεύω, ekporneuō = "to be utterly unchaste" is found in Jude ver 7. Every form of unchastity is included in the term "fornication."

Forswear. Found only in Mt 5 33 in the sense of committing perjury (ἐπιπορνήω, epiarkeō).

Harlotry.—The avocational or at least habitual, notorious practice of unchastity. In most instances the ordinary term for unchaste living, פָּשָׁע, zānāh, is employed (Gen 34 31; 35 19.24; Lev 21 14; Josh 2 1 (Rasbih); Jgs 11 1; 16 11; 1 K 3 16; Prov 7 29; 9 18; Jer 5 7; Am 7 17). For the publicly known woman of the street and the professional devotee in the pagan temple-worship, the term פָּשָׁע, kāhāshōd, was employed (Gen 38 21.22 AV; Hos 4 14). The Gr παρνασσία, pārnasía, occurs in Mt 21 31; Mk 10 18; 1 K 18 30; 2 K 11 31; Jas 2 25). Figurative: Often used metaphorically of idolatry or any deflection from the Divine covenant, and applied particularly to Jerusalem (Isa 52 1); the Jewish nation (Jer 2 20; 3 1.6 ff.; often in Ezek 18 and 33; Mic 1 7); Israel (7 5; 8 5); Nineveh (Nah 3 4); Tyre, with reference to the various arts employed to renew her commerce (Isa 23 16) and to her restored traffic (ver 17); and to anti-Christian "Babylon" (Rev 17 5.15; 19 2). See also Fornication.

Homicide.—"manslayer" (תֹּם, rāph, "to dash in pieces," to "kill," to "murder"); Gr ἄνθρωπος, andρόρος, with the same meaning; Mentioned: in Nu 36.6-12; 1 Tim 1.9. The Heb law distinguished between the premeditated and the unpremeditated slaying. See separate art.

Illicit marriage. —See separate art.

Ill-treatment of Parents (Ex 21.15-17; Lev 20.9; Dt 21.18 ff.). —See below.

Injuries to the Person (Ex 21.18 ff.; Lev 24.19 ff.; Dt 25.11).

Lying, Malice, Manslaughter, Murder, Oath. —See separate arts.

Parents, Crimes against. —The law enjoined upon the infant all the reverence toward his parents, esp. the father, that he could bestow on a merely human being. The reason for this lay in the fact that the heads of families were expected to transmit the Divine law to their household, and thus to stand in the place of God. That the mother was to share this reverence practically on equal terms with the father is shown by the fact that each is mentioned separately whenever obedience and reverence are enjoined upon the child (Dt 5.16). As the specific crime against Jehovah consisted in blasphemy and open rebellion against the law, so the crime against parents consisted in deliberate disobedience and stubbornness (Dt 21.18). And here again both the father and the mother are directed to lay hands upon him and bring him unto the elders for punishment. How greatly such conduct was held in horror is seen in many of the Proverbs, esp. 30.17. It would be hard to specify all the acts which, in view of the above, would be considered crimes against the parents, but it is evident that everything which would lower their dignity and influence or violate the sense of just recognition must be carefully avoided, as witness the curse visited upon Ham (Gen 9.20-27).

Perjury. —See False Swearing; Forswear above; also art. OATH.

Prophesying, False. —By reason of his position as the recognized mouthpiece of Jehovah, the prophet's word was weighty in influence; hence to prophesy falsely was equivalent to practicing fraud publically. Jeremiah described the condition as "wonderful and horrible," which made such things possible (15.20-21). See also Jer 42.32; 29.8 ff.; Ezek. 21.23; Zec 10.2; Mt 7.15; 24.11.24; Mk 13.22; Lk 6.26; Acts 13.6 (Bar-Jesus); 2 Pet 2.1; 1 Jn 4.1; Rev 16.13; 19.20; 20.10. See also separate art.

Prostitution. —Heb and Christian morality never condoned this practice, though the Bible recognizes its existence as a fact even among God's people. The Heb father was forbidden (Lev 19.29) to give his daughter over to a life of shame (277; halal, "to profane a person, place or thing, "to pollute"). See also Fornication, Harlotry, and Whoredom below.

Rape. —277; hizzak = "to seize," "bind," "restrain," "conquer," "force," "ravish." The punishment for this crime was greater when the act was committed against a betrothed woman (Dt 22.25-29). See also Seduction.

Removing Landmarks (Dt 19.14). See LANDMARKS.

Reveling (Ex 22.28). —See Irreverence above and art. REVILE.

Robbery. —277; gazal = "to pluck off," "strip," "rob," "take away by force or violence." forbidden in the law and frequently referred to as despicable (Lev 19.13; 26.22; 1 S 3.21; Prov 22.22; Isa 10.2.13; 17.14; Ezek 33.15; 39.10; Mal 3.8,9).

Sabbath-Breaking. —As the Heb Sabbath was regarded as a day of rest, all acts absolutely unnecessary were considered a violation, a "breaking" of the Sabbath, which appears sufficiently from the commandment (Ex 20.8-11); and the head of the household was held responsible for the keeping of this commandment on the part of all sojourners under his roof.

No other law gave the sophistical lawyers of later Judaism so much opportunity for hair-splitting distinctions as this. In answering the question what labors were forbidden, they mentioned 39 specific forms of work, and then proceeded to define what constituted each particular form. But as even these definitions Sodom became notorious, so that "sodomite" is the regular tr. of ἱδρακος, kâdēkâš, "a (quasi) sacred person, i.e. (technically) "a (male or female) devotee to licentious idolatry." (Dt. 23 17; K Ex 24; 15 12; 22 46; 2 K 23 7; Job 36 14m). Though permitted and even encouraged in heathen cult, it was never to be tolerated in the worship of Jeh.

Usury.—See separate art.

Witnessing. False.—The Heb idiom is "תוח ע' תוחו, 'thô sheker, 'truthfulness of a falsehood," "lie" (Ex 20 16; Dt 19 16 18; Prov 6 19; 14 5 25; 19 5 9). Greeks, peudesmarturê, "to bring false testimony"; -μαρτύρ, -marturia, "hearing of false testimony" (Mk 10 19; 14 55 57). It goes without saying that the law was emphatic in its denunciation of this practice, and in order that the innocent might be protected against the lying accuser, a criminal was to be convicted only on the testimony of at least two or three witnesses, testifying to the same facts (Nu 30 30). If one be found testifying falsely, he was to be punished by suffering the penalty which would have been inflicted on him against whom he testified, had he been convicted (Dt 19 16 19).

Whoredom. In Heb Ῥηα, Ῥα.authenticate="to commit adultery," "fornication or illicit incontinence of any kind;" and its derivative Ῥηατις, Ῥατινμ, "fornication," "harlotry," "whoredom;" Gr πορνεία, πορνεια (vb.), and πορνεία, πορνεία (noun), of the same meaning. The following passages will reveal the estimate in which such uncleanness was held, and the fact that men and women given to it were held in equal abhorrence and designated by the same terms: Gen 38 24; Lev 19 29; Nu 14 33; 22 11; Ex 22 15; Gen 38 24; 11 2 12 10; Hos 1 2 4 11 12; 6 10; Nah 3 4; Mt 5 32; Rom 1 26; 1 Cor 5 1; 7 10; 18 8; Jude ver 7; Rev 2 14 20 15; 19 19 2.

Figurative: Because of the infidelity to the life, and to right living involved in such acts, the practice became symbolical of infidelity to God and His law, and thus served as a frequent figure of speech for Israel's error and apostasy. See HâROT.

CRIMSON, krim's.n. See COloR.

CRIpple, krip'i (χαλκος, χιλδος).—Only occurs in Acts 14 8, denoting the congenitally lame man at Lystra. In AV (1611) the word is spelled "cripple." Originally meaning a bent body is bent together as in the attitude of creeping. This was probably a case of infantile paralysis.

CRISPING, kris'ping, PI NS. Pins for crispimg, or curling, the hair. Thus the AV renders Heb Ῥηατις, Ῥατινμ (Isa 3 22; cf Vulg). RV substitutes more correctly "satchels" (so Kinnîm [cf 2 K 5 23; of Arab.]). Others think of girdles; still others of veils or head-bands.

CRISPU S, kris'pus (Κρισπός, Kria'pos. "curled"): One of the small number baptized by Paul among the Corinthian Christians (1 Cor 1 14). He had been a ruler of the Jewish synagogue, but he "believed in the Lord with all his house"; and, following Paul, withdrew from the synagogue (Acts 18 7 8). He seems to have been succeeded by Sosthenea (ver 17). According to tradition he became bishop of Aegina.

II. LOWER OR TEXTUAL CRITICISM.-We take first lower or textual criticism. There has never been a time when criticism of Scripture—lower criticism—was altogether absent. The Jews applied a certain criticism to their sacred writings, alike in the selection of the books, and in the settlement of the text. Examples are seen in the marginal notes to the Heb Scriptures (K'rè and K'thîth). The Fathers of the early church compared MSS of the NT books, noting their differences, and judging of the books themselves. The Reformers, it is well known, did not accept blindly the judgments of antiquity, but availed themselves of the best light which the new learning afforded. The materials at the disposal of scholars in that age, however, though as much as existed were not used with much thoroughness or critical discernment. As aids multiplied with progress of discovery, comparison of MSS and VSS one with another and with patristic quotations, revealed manifold divergences and it became apparent that, in both OT and NT, the text in current use in the church was far from perfect. Various readings accumulated. Not a few of these, indeed, were obvious blunders; many had little or no support in the more ancient authorities. For others, again, authority was fairly equally divided. Some were interpolations which had no right to be in the text at all. How, in these circumstances, was the true text to be ascertained? The work was one of great delicacy, and could only be accomplished by the most painstaking induction of facts, and the strictest application of sound methods. Thus arose a science of textual criticism, which, ramifying in many directions, has attained vast dimensions, and yielded an immense body of secure knowledge in its special department.

The materials with which textual criticism works (apparatus criticus) are, as just said, chiefly MSS, VSS (translations into other tongues), etc., with lectionaries (church service-books), and similar aids. The first step is the collection and collation of the material, to which fresh discovery is constantly adding; the noting of its peculiarities, and testing of its age and value; the grouping and designation of it for reference. A next important task is the complete collection of the various readings and other diversities of text (omissions, interpolations, etc.), brought to light through comparison of the material, and the endeavor to assign these to their respective causes.

More frequently than not, errors in MSS are unintentional, and the causes giving rise to them are sufficiently obvious. Such are the carelessness of scribes, lapses of memory, similarity of sounds (in dictation), or in shape of letters (in copying), wrong dividing of words, omission of a line or clause owing to successive lines or clauses ending with the same word. Intentional changes, again, arise from insertion in the text of marginal notes or glosses, from motives of harmonizing, from the substitution of smoother for harsher or more abrupt expressions—more rarely, from dogmatic reasons.

Mistakes of the above kinds can generally be detected by careful scrutiny of sources, but a large sources, and to show how this "grew" from simpler beginnings to what it now is. Here, also, there is wide opening for arbitrariness. It would be wrong, however, to deny the legitimate place of "higher criticism," or to belittle the great services it is capable of rendering, because of the abuses to which it is frequently liable.

It is now necessary that these two forms of criticism should be looked at more particularly.

1. Origin of and higher—has been altogether absent.

The Science The Jews applied a certain criticism to their sacred writings, alike in the selection of the books, and in the settlement of the text. Examples are seen in the marginal notes to the Heb Scriptures (K'rè and K'thîth). The Fathers of the early church compared MSS of the NT books, noting their differences, and judging of the books themselves. The Reformers, it is well known, did not accept blindly the judgments of antiquity, but availed themselves of the best light which the new learning afforded. The materials at the disposal of scholars in that age, however, though as much as existed were not used with much thoroughness or critical discernment. As aids multiplied with progress of discovery, comparison of MSS and VSS one with another and with patristic quotations, revealed manifold divergences and it became apparent that, in both OT and NT, the text in current use in the church was far from perfect. "Various readings" accumulated. Not a few of these, indeed, were obvious blunders; many had little or no support in the more ancient authorities. For others, again, authority was fairly equally divided. Some were interpolations which had no right to be in the text at all. How, in these circumstances, was the true text to be ascertained? The work was one of great delicacy, and could only be accomplished by the most painstaking induction of facts, and the strictest application of sound methods. Thus arose a science of textual criticism, which, ramifying in many directions, has attained vast dimensions, and yielded an immense body of secure knowledge in its special department.

The materials with which textual criticism works (apparatus criticus) are, as just said, chiefly MSS, VSS (translations into other tongues), etc., with lectionaries (church service-books), and similar aids. The first step is the collection and collation of the material, to which fresh discovery is constantly adding; the noting of its peculiarities, and testing of its age and value; the grouping and designation of it for reference. A next important task is the complete collection of the "various readings" and other diversities of text (omissions, interpolations, etc.), brought to light through comparison of the material, and the endeavor to assign these to their respective causes.

More frequently than not, errors in MSS are unintentional, and the causes giving rise to them are sufficiently obvious. Such are the carelessness of scribes, lapses of memory, similarity of sounds (in dictation), or in shape of letters (in copying), wrong dividing of words, omission of a line or clause owing to successive lines or clauses ending with the same word. Intentional changes, again, arise from insertion in the text of marginal notes or glosses, from motives of harmonizing, from the substitution of smoother for harsher or more abrupt expressions—more rarely, from dogmatic reasons.

Mistakes of the above kinds can generally be detected by careful scrutiny of sources, but a large number of cases remain in which the correct reading is still doubtful. These, next, have to be dealt with by the impartial weighing and balancing of authorities; a task involving the grouping of MSS into classes and families, and the application of fresh rules. It does not suffice to reckon numbers; MSS and VSS have themselves to be tested as respects reliability and value. Through the presence of peculiarities pointing to a common origin to MSS come to be grouped into classes and families, and their individual testimony is correspondingly discounted. Older authorities, naturally, are preferred to younger but the possibility has to be reckoned with that a later MS may preserve a reading which the older MSS have lost. Such rules obtain as that, of two readings, preference is to be given to the more difficult, as less likely to be the result of corruption. But even this has its limits, for a reading may be difficult even to the point of unintelligibility, yet may arise from a simple blunder. As a last resort, in cases of perplexity, conjectural emendation may be admitted; only, however, as yielding probability, not certainty.

In the light of these principles an important distinction has to be made between the OT and the NT, arising from the relative paucity of material for critical purposes in the one case, and the abundance in the other. The subject is treated here generally: for details see SARGENT’s LANGUAGE OF THE OT; LANGUAGE OF THE NT; TEXT AND MSS OF THE NT.

(1) In the OT, textual criticism labors under the peculiar disadvantage that, with one minute exception (where the text has as its authority a version of the Decalogue), all known Heb MSS are late (the oldest not going beyond the 9th cent. AD); further, that the MSS seem all to be based on one single archetype, selected by the rabbis at an early date and thereafter adhered to by copyists with scrupulous care (cf. G. A. Smith, OTJC, 69 ff; Driver, Text of Sam, xxxvii ff; Strack, however, dissent). The variations which these MSS present, accordingly, are slight and unimportant. For a knowledge of the state of the text prior to the adoption of this standard, criticism is dependent on comparison with the VSS—esp. the Septuagint (q.v.), with the Sam Pent (q.v.), and with 1 passages in the OT itself (e.g. in S, K, Ch.). Pray the reader to bear in mind the impossible discrepancies in names and numbers, show that before the fixing of the text extensive corruption had already entered. A simple instance of mistake is in Isa 9:3, where the AV reads: “Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not increased the joy.” The context shows that the “not” is out of place; the RV therefore rightly reads (with the Heb K’tre: the sounds are similar), “thou hast increased their joy.” In the LXX the divergences are considerable; in general superfluous and unintelligible readings; there are extensive interpolations and omissions (in Jer, Graf reckons that 2,700 words of the Massoretic text are omitted); evidences, where the alterations are not of design, that the Heb MSS employed by the translators often differed widely from those approved in Pal. The Sam recension likewise exhibits considerable differences.

It does not follow that, where difference exists, these rival texts are to be preferred to the Massoretic. Few, since the exhaustive examination of Graeca, have ventured to go back directly to the Heb; even in regard to the LXX the trend of opinion seems increasingly in favor of the text of the Massoretes (cf. Skinner, “Genesis,” ICC, xxxv—xxxvi). There is no need, however, to maintain the general superiority of the above texts to the Massoretic to be convinced that, in many instances, the LXX, in some cases, probably, even the Sam, has retained readings from which the MT has departed. OT criticism has, therefore, a clear field for its labors, and there can be little doubt that, in its gradual progress, it will reach more and more results. Less reliance can be placed on the conjectural criticism now so largely in vogue. Dr. G. A. Smith has justly animadverted on the new textual criticism of the postcritical school (through which it drives like a great lightningsharp, turning up the whole surface, and menacing not only the minor landmarks, but, in the case of the prophets, the main outlines of the field as well) (Quarterly Rev., Jan., 1907). This, however, trenches on the domain of the higher criticism.

(2) In the NT the materials of criticism are vastly more abundant than in the OT; but, with the abundance, while a much larger area of certainty is attainable, more intricate and difficult problems present. The wealth of MSS of the whole or parts of the Gr NT far exceeds that existing for any other ancient writings (Nestle mentions 3,829: 127 uncials and 3,702 cursives: Intro to the Textual Criticism of the Gr NT, 1907). The MSS of VSS, excluding the Vulg., reckoned by thousands, are likewise very numerous.

(a) MSS and VSS: Gr MSS are usually divided into uncials and cursives (or minuscules) from the character of the writing (probably of the 4th and 5th cent.). The five chief, that alone need be named, are the Codex Sinaiticus (N, 4th cent.), the Codex Vaticanus (B, 4th cent.), the Codex Alexandrinus (A, 5th cent.), the Codex Ephraemi (C, 6th cent.), the Codex Bezae (D, 8th cent.). Of the MSS of VSS, the most complete, the Codex M, is a translation into Hebrew of the NT. The MSS of VSS (excluding the Vulg., reckoned by thousands), are likewise very numerous.

(b) The Western text: The question chiefly exercising scholars at the present time is, accordingly, the relation of the WH text based on N and B to the Western text (e.g. acepted by the 9th-c. Fathers) but now finding early support from the Old Lat and Syr, as well as from quotations in the 2d and 3d Fathers. The Western text is discounted by WH for its paraphrase character, and “astonishing freedom” in changing, inserting and omitting (WH, 122 ff); yet, on internal grounds, certain important omissions in this text of the last three chs of Lk are accepted by these authorities as representing the purer text, the rejected readings being termed “Western interpolations.” But this newer school, however, is disposed to accept the Western text, as, to a much larger extent than was formerly supposed, the more original; while some writers, as Blass, Nestle, in part Zahn (cf. Nestle, op. cit., 324 ff), seek a solution of the difference of texts in the theory of two editions (Blass, Lk and Acts; Zahn, Acts alone). This theory has not met with much acceptance, and the problems of the Western text must still be regarded as unsolved. The question is not, indeed, vital, as no important doctrine of the NT is affected; but it touches the genuineness of a large portion of the invariable readings, and makes the Hypocrite's document a doubtful case. E.g. the words at the Supper, "which is given for you," etc. (Lk 22:19.20, not in D), are excluded by WH as a non-Western interpolation; while the passage on the angel and the bloody sweat (Lk 22:44.44 in both $N$ and $D$), and the first word on the cross, "Father, forgive them," etc. (Lk 23:34, in $N$, omitted by D and Sin Syr), are rejected as Western interpolations. The RV retains these passages with marginal note.

(e) Results. As respects results, it may be said generally that the labora of a long line of scholars have given us a NT text on which, in nearly all essential respects, we can safely rely. Others, it is to be owned, take a less sanguine view (cf Nestle, op. cit., 227 ff). The correct reading seems undeniable settled in a large majority of cases. The RV embodies most of the assured results; doubtful cases are noted in the margin. Among passages long known to be interpolations, now altogether removed, is that on the three witnesses in 1 Jn 5:8. The passages not belonging to the original text are the last 12 vs of Mk (16:9–20), and the story of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7:53–8:11).

III. Higher Criticism.—The scope of the higher criticism has already been indicated. Many of the inquiries it undertakes were formerly covered by what was called Bib. introduction; the flight of the newer science, however, is bolder, and the problem is seeks to solve are more complicated and far reaching. A prominent part of its work is the analysis of books, with the view of determining their component parts (e.g. the J, E, P, D, of the Pent.), the age, origin, and characteristics of each, their connection with external conditions and the state of belief and life of the time. The nature of its task will be better understood from a rapid survey of its procedure.

Higher criticism began, mainly, with the OT. Already in the 2d cent., Gnostics assailed the OT, and in the 3d and 4th an attack was made by the Jews. (1) AStruc and successors.—The beginning of higher criticism in the stricter sense is commonly associated with the French physician Astruc, who, in his Conjectures, in 1753, drew attention to the fact that, in some sections of Gen, the Divine name employed is "Elohim" (God), in others, "Jehovah." This he accounted for by the use of distinct documents by Moses in the composition of the book. Ehlohorn (1779), to whom the name "higher criticism" is due, supplemented Astruc's theory by the correct observation that this distinction in the use of the names was accompanied by other literary peculiarities. It soon became evident that, though the distinction in the names mostly ceased after the revelation of Jesh to Moses (Ex 3:6), the literary peculiarities extended much farther than Gen, indeed till the end of Josh (Bleich, 1822; Ewald, 1831; Stähelin, 1835). Instead of a "Pentateuch," recognized as of composite authorship, there was now postulated a "Hexateuch" (see PENTATEUCH). Astruc's "Meaner De Wette" (1805–6), on grounds of style and contents, had claimed for Dt an origin not earlier than the reign of Josiah. "Fragmentary" theories, like Vater's, which contributed little to the general development, may be left unnoticed. A conservative school, headed by Henningsten (1831) and Hävernick (1837), contested these conclusions of the critics, and contended for the unity and Mosaic authorship of the Pent. Bolder spirits, as Vatke (1833), Hahn (1835), and H. Th. Elze, the provoking assumption that there was one fundamental document—the so-called Elohist, dated usually in the age of the Judges, or the time of Saul or David—and that the Jehovahistic parts were "supplementary" to this (not a separate document). It was the merit of Hupfeld to perceive that not a few of the sections in the "Elohist" document did not bear the usual literary marks of that writing, but closely resembled the "Jehovistic" sections in everything but the use of the Divine name. These portions he singled out and erected into a document by themselves (though they bear no signs of being such), while the Jehovahistic parts were relieved of their "supplementary character, and regarded as distinct narratives. There were thus now 3 documents, attributed to as many authors—the original Elohist, the 2d or Younger Elohist and the Jehovah. Dt, as a distinct book, was added to these, making 4 documents in all.

(2) Hupfeld.—A distinct advance on preceding theories was made by Hupfeld (1855), in part anticipated by Degen (1758). He supposed the provoking assumption had been that there was one fundamental document—the so-called Elohist, dated usually in the age of the Judges, or the time of Saul or David—and that the Jehovahistic parts were "supplementary" to this (not a separate document). It was the merit of Hupfeld to perceive that not a few of the sections in the "Elohist" document did not bear the usual literary marks of that writing, but closely resembled the "Jehovistic" sections in everything but the use of the Divine name. These portions he singled out and erected into a document by themselves (though they bear no signs of being such), while the Jehovahistic parts were relieved of their "supplementary character, and regarded as distinct narratives. There were thus now 3 documents, attributed to as many authors—the original Elohist, the 2d or Younger Elohist and the Jehovah. Dt, as a distinct book, was added to these, making 4 documents in all.

Graf and Wellhausen.—Thus matters stood till the appearance of Graf's work, The Historical Books of the OT, in 1866, through which something like a revolution in the critical outlook was effected. Following in the track of Vatke, earlier, Reuss, of Strassburg, had taken up the idea that the Levitical legislation could not, as was commonly presumed, be earlier than Dt, but was, on the contrary, later—in fact, a product of the age of the exile. Graf and developed this theory. He still for a time, while putting the laws late, maintained an earlier date for the Elohist narratives. He was soon led, however, to see that laws and history must go together; so the whole Elohistic writing was removed from its former place, and brought down bodily to the end of the religious development. Graf, at the same time, did not regard it as an independent document. At first the theory was scouted, but gradually, through the able advocacy of Kuenen and Wellhausen, it was acclaimed as the critical view par excellence. Order and nomenclature of the assumed documents were now changed. The Elohist, instead of standing first, was put last under the designation P or PC (Priestly Code). Wellhausen's symbol for this writing was Q. Its date was taken to be post-exilian. The Jehovah becomes J; the Elohist E. These are placed in the 9th or 8th cent. BC (cir 850–750), but are supposed to have been combined a cent. or so later (JE). Dt, identified with the law-book found in the temple in the reign of Josiah (2 K 22), is thought to have been written shortly before that time. The order is therefore no longer 1st Elohist—Jehovistic and 2d Elohist—Dt, but J and E—Dt—P. The whole, it is held, was finally united into the great law-book (Pent.) brought by Ezra to Jerus from Babylon (468 BC; Ezr 7:6–10), and read by him before the people 14 years later (444 BC; Neh 8).

(4) Literary and historical grounds of theory.—A sketch like this, naturally, leaves no proper idea of the grounds on which, apart from the distinction in the Divine names, the critical theory just described is based. The grounds are partly literary—the discrimination of documents, e.g. resting on differences of style and conception, duplicates, etc. (see Pentateuch)—but partly also historical, in accordance with the critic's conception of the development of religion and institutions in Israel. A main reliance is placed on the fact that the book of Deuteronomy, up to the time of Dt, is in conflict with the law of that book, which recognizes only one sanctuary as legitimate (ch 12), and equally with the PC, which throughout assumes this centralizing law. The laws of Dt and PC, therefore, cannot be early. The prophets, it is held, knew nothing of a Levitical legislation, and refused to regard the sacrificial system as Divine (Jer 7:22f).

(5) The code under which older Israel lived was that formulated in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), which permitted many altars (Ex 20:24f). The law of Dt was the product of a centralizing movement on the part of the prophets, issuing in the reformation of Josiah. The PC was the work of fertile brains and pens of post-exilian priests and scribes, incorporating older usage, devising new laws, and throwing the whole into the fictitious form of Mosaic wilderness legislation.

(6) Effects on history, etc.—The revolution wrought by new religious fragments, however, is not adequately realized till regard is had to their effects on the picture given in the OT itself of Israel's history, religion and literature. It is not too much to say that this picture is nearly completely subverted. There have come into the OT (Grat, Kuenen, Wellhausen, Duhm, Stade, etc.) the supernatural element in the history and religion is totally eliminated; even by those who do not go so far, little is left standing. The history of the Pent—indeed the history down to the kingdom of Judah—is largely given up. Gen is legend, Ex hardly more trustworthy, Josh a romance. The histories of Samuel and David are "written up" by a theocratic narrator. None of the laws—even the Decalogue—are allowed to be certainly Mosaic. Monotheism is believed to have come in with Amos and Hosea; earlier, Jeh was a "tribal" God. Ark, tabernacle, priesthood, feasts, as depicted in the PC, are post-exile fiction. The treatment accorded to the Pent necessarily reacts on the other historical books; the prophetic lit. suffers in an almost equal degree through disintegration and mutilation. It is not Isaiah alone—where the question has long been mopsted—what the post-exilic origin of the 466 (see Isaiah); the critical knife is applied with scarcely less freedom to the remaining prophetic books. Few, if any, of the psalms are allowed to be preexilic. Dn is a work of the Maccabean age.

(7) General results.—As a general summary of the results of the movement, which it is thought "the future is not likely to reverse," the following may be quoted from Professor A. S. Peake: "The analysis of the Pent into four main documents, the identification of the law on which Josiah's reformation is supposed to have been based, the criticism of the Pentateuch, the compilation of that code in the reign of Manasseh at the earliest, the fixing of the Priestly Code to a date later than Ezekiel, the highly composite character of some parts of the prophetic lit., esp. the Book of Isa, the post-exilic origin of most of the Ps, and large parts of the Book of Prov, the composition of Job not earlier than the exile and probably later, the Maccabeate date of Dn, and the slightly earlier date of Eccel" ("Present Movement in Biblical Science," in Manchester, Inaugural Lects., 32).

(8) Criticism of theory.—The criticism of this elaborate theory belongs to the arts. which deal with the several points involved, and is not here attempted at length (cf. the International Standard Bible Encyclopedia). The point may be passed over from it on the literary side in a more exact and scholarly knowledge of the phenomena to be explained (e.g. distinction in the Divine names; distinction of P element in the Pent from that known as JE) are not to be questioned; on the historical and religious side, there has been an extreme effort to make up the time lost, by large knowledge and correct older ideas which have proved untenable—in general, to place the whole facts of the OT in a clearer and more assured light. On the other hand, much even in the literary criticism is subjective, arbitrary and conjectural, while the main hypothesis of the posteriority of the Levitical law to Ezekiel, with the general view taken of the historical and religious development in Israel, is open to the most serious exception. The OT has its own account to give of the origin of its religion in the monotheism of Abraham, the covenants with the patriarchs, the legislation through Moses, which is not thus readily to be set aside in the interest of a theory resting largely on naturalistic presuppositions (see Bible). There is not a word in the history in Neh 8 to suggest that the law introduced by Ezra was a new one; it was received without demur by a deeply divided community as the ancient law of Moses. So with the law of Dtn (20:24f) as it stands in the time of Josiah (2K 22:18f); it was doubted by no one. The position of the theory, generally, is by no means so secure as many of its adherents suppose. Internally, it is being pushed to extremes which tend to discredit it to sober observers. Biblical criticism is not to be confined to modifications. Documents are multiplied, dates lowered, authors are converted into "schools." Archaeologists, in large majority, declare against it. The facts they adduce tend to confirm the history in parts of which it has been most much has. The new Bab school in Germany (that of Winckler) assails it in its foundations. Recently, the successor of Kuenen in Leyden, Professor B. D. Eerdmans, formerly a supporter, has broken with the theory in its entirety, and subjects the documentary hypothesis to a damaging criticism. It is too early yet to forecast results, but the opinion may be hazard that, as in the case of the Tübingen NT critical school in last cent., referred to below, the prevailing critical theory of the OT will experience fundamental alteration in a direction nearer to older ideas, though it is too much to expect that traditional views will ever be resuscitated in their completeness.

Higher criticism of the NT may be said to begin, in a Doistic spirit, with Reimarus (Fragments, published by Lessing, 1778), and, on

(1) The school of Baur.—In a more systematic way, F. Baur (1826-60), founder of the famous Tübingen school, likewise proceeding from Hegel, applied a dramatic, Neutermonism to the NT. Strauss started with the Gospels. Baur sought firmer ground in the phenomena of the Apostolic Age. The key to Baur's theory lies in the alleged existence of Pauline and Petrine parties in the early church, in conflict with one another. The true state of matters is mirrored, he holds, not in the Book of Acts, a composition of the 2d cent., written to gloss over the differences between the original apostles and Paul, but in the four common and undoubtedly genuine epistles of Paul, Gal, 1 and 2 Cor, and Rom, and in the Book of Hebrews. In these documents the church is seen rent by a schism that threatened its very existence. By and by attempts were made at conciliation, the stages of which are limited to the Gospels and remaining writings of the NT. The Fourth Gospel, according to D. J. A. Brings up the rear. This theory, which found influential support in the scholarship of the time (Schwegler, Zeller, etc.), could not stand the test of impartial investigation, and is now on all sides discredited. Professor Bacon, in a recent work, proceeds in the same direction, writing that the "two-source" theory "is as obsolete as the Ptolemic geography" (Fourth Gospel, 20). Its influence on later criticism has, however, been considerable.

(2) Synoptic criticism.—Meanwhile more sober scholarship was conciliating itself with the intricate problem of the relations of the Synoptic Gospels. The problem is a very real one (see Gospels). The three gospels of Mt, Mk, and Lk are seen on inspection to exhibit an amount of agreement in subject-matter, order, often in language, which cannot be accounted for except on the theory of some common source. Suppose the Gospels divided into sections, in 52 of these the narratives coincide, 12 more are common to Mt and Mk, 5 to Mk and Lk, and 14 to Mt and Lk, while 8 are peculiar to Mt, 2 to Mk and 9 to Lk. The verbal agreement is greater in the recital of the words of others, particularly of words of Jesus, than in the narrative portions.

How is this to be explained? Three forms of theories have been proposed—the oral, the documentary, and the hypothesis of dependence of one gospel upon another. Of these theories, the oldest is the 3d (Augustine already held that Mk was an abridgment of Mt and Lk), and to it, in combination with the 2d, through a reversed order (Mt being put first), it will be seen below that criticism has largely reverted. The oral theory, proposed by Gieseler (1815), has, till recently, been the favorite one in England (Westcott, Alford, etc., with Codet, Pressensé, etc., on the Continent). In it, the resemblances in the three Gospels are explained by an oral tradition assumed to have attained a relatively fixed form while the apostles were yet teaching together in Jerusalem. The documentary theory took its origin with Eichhorn (1794), but in the hands of Marsh (1801), finally in Eichhorn's own (#8), received so elaborate a development as completely to discredit it. The dependence theory, in turn, went through every possible shape. Gradually, the attempt was made to interpret the combinations by an emended text, that is, to disentangle them (those which put Lk first, or Mt last, or made Mk a middle term), till only two remained—Mt, Lk, Mk (Griesbach 1789-90, Baur, etc.), and Mk, Mt, Lk (Weisse, 1835, Wilke, 1838, etc.). The old view of the Bauer school was that Mk, as the new Gospel, was the outcome of the emended text, a terminus a quo for the former view—that which put Mk last; this, however, has now quite given way in favor of Mk's priority. There remained a division of opinion as to whether the Mk employed by the other evangelists was the canonical Mk (Weisse, Meyer, B. Weiss, etc.), or an ur-Markus (Holtzmann, Reuss, etc.), but the difficulties of the latter hypothesis proved so insurmountable that Holtzmann finally gave it up.

It is obvious, however, that the use of Mk by the other evangelists, even if granted, does not yet completely solve the synoptical problem. There is still to be considered that large mass of matter—chiefly discourses—common to Mt and Lk, no less, speak of the material peculiar to Lk itself. For the explanation of these sections it becomes necessary to postulate a second source, usually identified with the much-canvassed Logia of Papias, and designated by recent scholars (Wellhausen, etc.) Q. It is regarded as a collection of discourses, possibly by Matthew, with or without an admixture of narrative matter (B. Weiss, etc.). This yields the "two-source" theory at present prevailing in synoptical criticism (for a different view, cf Zahn's Introduction). Mt and Lk, on this view, are not independent Gospels, but are drawn up on the basis of (1) Mk and (2) Q—"the Logia, with original matter on the part of Luke (see Gospels). A theory which commands the assent of so many scholars has necessarily great weight. It cannot, however, be regarded as having finally solved the problem, for many difficulties remain; there is, besides, a prima facie improbability in a Gospel like Mark's being treated in the manner supposed or included among the "attempts" which Luke's own Gospel was designed to supercede (Lk 1 1-4; cf Wright, St. Luke's Gospel in Gr, xiv, 12-54).

With criticism of the sources of the Gospels there goes, of course, the question of authorship. A powerful vindication of the Lucan authorship of the 3d Gospel and the Book of Acts has recently come from the pen of Professor A. Harnack, who maintains that in this, as in most other points regarding early Christian lit., "tradition is right" (cf his Luke, the Physician, ET). Outside the Synoptics, the burning question still is the authorship of the Johannine writings. Here also, however, the extreme positions of the Bauer school are entirely given up ("It is perfectly apparent," says Professor Bacon, "that Bauer mistook the period of dissemination for that of origin," op. cit., 21), and powerful defences of Johannine authorship have been made (notably Sanday's Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, and ex-Principal Drummond's Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel). See Gospel of John.

(3) Modern "historical-critical" school.—On the other hand, a third and intensely aggressive radical school has recently come to the front, the so-called "historical-critical," which treats the text and history of the Gospels generally with a recklessness to which no limits can be put. It is even doubted if Jesus claims of Himself (Wrede). Sayings are accepted, rejected, or mutilated at pleasure. The latest phase of this school is the "Apocalyptic," which finds the essence of Christ's message in His insistence on the approaching end of the world (cf Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede; ET The Quest of the Historical Jesus). These excesses may be depended on to cure themselves.

(4) Remaining writings of the NT.—For the rest of the writings of the NT, the trend of criticism has been in the same direction. One by one the Pauline Epistles have been given back to the apostle—doubt chiefly still resting in certain minds on the Pastoral. The Book of Rev is restored to the age of John himself, where tradition places it. Its relation to the Fourth Gospel and to St. John is still in dispute, and some moderns would see in it a groundwork of Jewish apocalypse. These and kindred questions are discussed in the articles devoted to them.

LITERATURE

I. Preliminary.—In Jer 7 22.23 we read: “For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them through the hand of the prophecy I spake unto them by the hand of the prophets of my servants unto your fathers: Yet ye would not hear them; and ye would not receive them: For ye are a rebellious house.”

1. Thesis the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices: but this thing I commanded them, saying, Hearken unto my voice; and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people. It is the beginning of the exposition of the present art. that this statement of the prophet is correct (cf II, 5).

More specifically, it is contended that evidence can be produced from the OT to show that Israel’s religion can be seen in a long period of growth; and that, in a fixed sacrificial law, with a minutely regulated ritual obligatory on all Israelites, the culmination and not the beginning of the process. It is contended, moreover, that this conception of the development of the institutional side of the religion of the OT is attained by the strictest evaluation of all the OT evidence and by no a priori considerations.

To be sure, one is met at once in the OT by what seem to be complete denials of this point of view. In the Pentateuch we find statement after statement that a given law was due not to some late author but to Moses himself, and there are numerable passages in the historical books (most notably in Ch) that speak of these laws as in effect from the earliest times. Such evidence must be paid all possible respect and must be overruled only on the most imperative considerations.

However, if for the moment the books of the OT be viewed as having only the impulse and stimulus here given, that the possibility of overruling such evidence may well serve to show how very well without claiming in question In the slightest degree the good faith of the writers of questioned passages: for an acquisition of historical perspective comes very much into intellectual evolution, particularly—though not only—in the realm of religious history. Even the trained scholar has to be on his guard lest he read back the concepts of his own time into some past generation, while the non-specialist never succeeds in avoiding this error completely. For the uncultured mind, especially for the Oriental, the problem scarcely to-day that which is generally accepted and which is not obviously novel tends to be classified as that which “always has been.” A law so old that its actual source is forgotten is referred as a matter of course to some great lawgiver of the past. A custom that a generation’s own day is universally observed by the priests must always have been observed by the priests. Even documentary evidence to the contrary is not convincing to such a writer, for that document may be wrong is not a modern discovery. To be sure, the older document may be copied mechanically or the discrepancy may not even be noticed. But it is never surprising when we find a writer simply accrediting the priests of old with the theories of their contemporaries, and that even documentary evidence to the contrary he felt obliged to reject. This is not forgery, as we understand the word, nor need there be the faintest moral reproach connected with such conduct. Quite on the contrary, such a writer must be acting in the only sense that the conscience of any man of his generation could conceive right.

However, the OT is not a mere collection of human documents, and another question arises. Does the acceptance of inspiration compel us to assume that in every case a writer’s ordinary historical methods were entirely overruled? The question is a rather broad one and does not relate merely to the correct transmission of historic facts. To be asked, rather, is 3. Inspiration the idea that God present to His instruments a mechanically accurate set of past facts which would give a conception of history that no one of the sacred writer’s generation could understand? Or did He suffer His revelation to find expression in terms of the current conceptions of history, much as we are accustomed to say it found expression in terms of the current conceptions of science? A full discussion of the various theological arguments involved would be quite outside the purview of this encyclopaedia, but reference must be made to two important Bib. arguments: (1) In a question which thus affects the amount covered by the inspiration of the Bible, quotations from the Bible itself begin the question when added to evidence of a new and another sense. II. The Legislation.—As is well known, among the laws of the Pentateuch there exist several well-defined groups, of which the most notable is Lev 17-26. Another such group is Ex 20 22-23 19 or the Covenant Code (CC). With this last is closely connected the Decalogue and the little compend Ex 34 17-26. Now it will be convenient for present purposes to designate the remaining mass of Pentateuchal legislation under the non-committal symbol X. In the first place, attention may be directed to CC as a whole. Whatever it is meant to be, it was not meant as a mere interims-2. 2. Covenant code for the period of the wanderings, Code either in its civil or its religious prescriptions. One piece of evidence alone is enough to show the contrary: in the laws touching settlements of disputes it is presupposed that Moses himself is not accessible. And the life assumed is agricultural. Men are living in fields with settled boundaries (22.5.6). The vine and the olive are both under cultivation (22.5.29; 23.11), under such settled circumstances that the rest of the Sabbatical year can be observed. And of the feasts, Weeks and Tabernacles are connected with the harvests (23.16). Of course, Moses may very well have given commands that looked to the future, but the present contention is simply that it was the remote and not the immediate future that is in point on this assumption. The life is Canaan and not the wilderness. But, now, the life is very primitive life. Flocks are of great importance, and the portion of space given to laws about them. Rulers are mentioned only in 22.28 (notat).). and judges, as settled officers, are not mentioned at all, for the very rare word in 22.22, (mutli). And only should be “umpire.” Indeed in 23.1-9 the duties of citizens, witness and judge are so intermingled as to suggest that judgment was administered by a general gathering of the people. It is taken for granted that a master has marital rights over his maid-servants (21.7-11). Coins, money is men- tioned only in 23.32, if there. There is no attempt to define proportions exactly: cf 22.5 ("best of his own field") and 22.29 (the amount of the gift—"a tenth?"—not stated). Similarly there is no specific dating of the feasts of Weeks and Tabernacles in 23.16, while the exact day in Abib (ver 15) is at least not specified. Now, if this code could be isolated from the rest of the legislation, would not one refer it naturally on the above grounds to a time not very far from the days of Saul? Now, in what follows, the prescriptions of the various codes will be compared with each other in regard to the various institutions of Israel’s religion and also studied in the wider evidence of the his- torical books. So evidence of Ch, however, will be omitted for the most part, as a separate section is devoted to it (III, 1). (1) The firstling is to be with its dam seven days, but on the eighth (not later!) it is to be given to God. The offerings from the harvest 3 The from and the presses (wine and olives) Sanctuary are to be offered without delay (Ex 22.29.30). Consequently the place of offering must have been readily accessible. By what has been said above and by the mention of “presses” here, ready accessibility in Palestine is presupposed. But this implies a multiplicity of sanctuaries. And in Samuel-Kings this multiplicity of sanctuaries is exactly what is found. Samuel sacrifices in Mizpah (1 S 7.9), in Ramah (8.12 f), in Gilgal (11.15) and in Bethlehem (16.5). David’s family held a yearly sacrifice in Bethlehem, which David attended regularly (20.6). Solomon received a special revelation from God at Gibeon (1 K 3.4 f—for the account in Ch see III, 1). Among the off-erings, a special place is allowed the heart of Jehoshaphat right, yet the many altars were suffered to re- main (16.14; 22.43—again for Ch see III, 1). The destruction of the altars of God was to Elijah a terrible calamity (19.10). While Amos and Hosea abound in denunciations of sacrifices as substitutes for righteousness, yet they never even intimate a duty to offer sacrifices in some other place (Am 1.2; Hos 3.5 are irrelevant). Not even do Mic 4.2 and Isa 2.2 imply that Jerus was to have the sole right to the cultus of Yahweh. (2) Ezekiel is the first prophet who makes the place of sacrifice a matter of paramount importance, and this importance of the place is, in the Pentateuch, emphasized primarily in Dt. It is needless to collect the familiar evidence from Dt, but an illuminating comparison with CC is given by the law for firstlings. No longer is the firstling given on the eighth day. It must be kept, but not worked or shorn, until the time when “year by year” it may be eaten in the chosen place (Dt 15.19.20). So now the fruits of the field and the “present” is not offered “without delay” but again “year by year,” with a provision for turning them into money if the way be too long to the sanctuary (14.22- 27). Dt and CC evidently have distinct conceptions—and again attention be called to the fact that CC contains laws for Pal, not for the wilderness. H is as explicit as Dt—sacrifice anywhere except at the Tent is a capital offence (Lev 17.8.9). And the evidence of X need not be collected, but must be noted. In that moment, Josh 10-34 represents Israel as understanding from the first entrance into Canaan that sacrifice at any altar but the one was the worst of crimes. (3) How is the offering of sacrifices in various places by such men as Samuel to be explained? That the worship was disorganized and the proper sanctuary could not be reached is hardly an explanation. For no disorganization of the country could be great enough to justify the offering of sacrifices in places not only unauthorized but flatly forbidden in Lev 17.8.9. On the theory of Mosaic origin for the whole of the Pentateuchal legislation, Samuel knew much about the other statements of the Law as does any Jew of today, but it is clearly enough recognized by all Jews that no disorganization of the country or Divine reprobation of the Temple justifies sacrifice in any other place. A key, however, is alone to be found in Dt 12.8-11, where sacrifice in various places is actually authorized until such a time as the land should be pacified and the Divine choice given to a place—a time represented in the history of Israel as about the time of David, on which basis Solomon did not explain the situation as it is found in Samuel-Kings. Only, it is in flat contradiction with H and X. This point is important. Dt 12.8-11 not only represents sacrifice in various places as permitted until some later time, but it represents Moses and the Israelites as practising the same things in the wilderness—"the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes; for ye are not as yet come," etc; i.e. Dt’s conception was that in the wilderness Moses and the Israelites offered sacrifice wherever they thought good. This was to continue until God gave them rest from their enemies round about. Then the sacrifices were to be brought to the chosen place and to be offered nowhere else. Now, the conception in H and X is wholly different. On the mount Moses received directions for the building of the Tabernacle, with its altar. From the beginning it was a capital offence to offer sacrifices on any other altar than this (Lev 17.8.9), which was carried everywhere on the wanderings of the Israelites. In the days of Phinehas, the offering of sacrifices on a different altar was enough to make civil war justifiable (Josh 22.12). For further discussion see III, 2. (4) The difficulties of these data are obvious but are completely satisfied by the assumption that different conceptions of past history are present.Dt belongs to a period when the unity of the sanctuary had become an established fact, but still before the memory of the many altars as comparatively legitimate was extinguished. And X, however, belong to a considerably later day, when the unity of the sanctuary had been so long taken for granted that no pious Israelite could conceive that anything else had ever existed. The reference of the commands to Moses is altogether in oriental manner.

Note.—Ex 20. 24 has not been used in the above argument, but with the evidence presented there seems to be no need to weigh it. Therefore it has not been repeated above.

4. Kinds of sacrifice: (a) the sin offering and the trespass offering, very elaborately treated in Ezek 44. 20-31. (b) the burnt offering and the peace offering; and, standing a little by itself, the meal offering. The latter is of no especial significance for the present discussion and is not considered. Now curiously enough, it may be noted In the prophetic writings before Ezek there is not one single reference to class (a). This is not simply the argument from silence, for sacrifices with their special names are mentioned frequently. Perhaps the commonest is the burnt offering and class (b), even when presented for penitential purposes. If the offering is not burnt whole, the worshipper eats of it—it is a peace offering. Jer 7. 21 is a particularly significant example, but cf Am 4. 5; 6. 12; Hos 8. 3; 9. 4. Jer 11. 1-12: 18; 28. 7-8; Jer 6. 20. Turning to Samuel-Kings we find this borne out. The names of the sin and trespass offerings appear in 2. 12. 16, but it is money that is referred to (the EV should be corrected). This golden mindless offering, not a sacrifice, but a trespass offering in 1. 36. 36. And in the codes, neither CC nor Dt mentions class (a) and even in it they appear only in Lev 19. 22; i.e. what is in late times one of the greatest sacrifices of Israel—by Lev 8. 3 Israel’s first sacrifice was a sin offering—are found only in X and are mentioned in the prophets for the first time in Ezek 30. 39, while the other classes are mentioned frequently in the books of Samuel. We have inf erence that class (a) appeared relatively late in Israel’s history, a point discussed more fully in IV.

The problem presented by Jer 7. 22 is a very serious one. Obviously, to say that the command to offer sacrifices was no longer binding is not the same as saying that sacrifice was not offered. What follows is in itself an infinitesimal matter but the evidence is significant. The prohibition of steps for the altar in Ex 20. 26 is based on the fact that the Levitical ministers were of very unattractive type, clad in the clothing of pilgrims at of the temple. This is corroborated in 2. 14. 20-22, where Michal reproves David for exposing himself. But in X the priests wear rather elaborate vestments, described—e.g. in 1. 29. For the moment, this is the conception found there of David’s religious zeal at the bringing in of the ark. Besides the ephod he wore a long linen robe and Michal despises him, not for exposing himself, but only for dancing (1. 18. 27-29).

(1) CC has no regulations regarding the priesthood, but of course it does not follow that this silence has any significance. However, in the case of Kings (Ex 8. 24) it is said that David’s sons were kohanim and in 1. 4. 9 it is said that David’s sons were kohanim and in 1. 4. 9 that Zadok was kohen. Now if kohen does not mean the ‘priest’ in these passages, they do not add anything more than a total of 750 occurrences. That the Chronicler under- scored the word to mean priest is shown by the fact that in his parallel to 2. 8. 15 (1. 18. 17) he uses a different word altogether. The natural inference from these passages is that these restrictions on the appointment to a certain line came about after Solomon’s time (cf Jgs 17. 12. 13, a Levite is desirable but not essential).

(2) In Dt the priesthood appears as limited to the sons of Levi, but it is at least safe to say that no explicit distinction is made within the tribe. The only ones who are the ‘sons of Levi,’ just as in 17. 9; 18. 1. 24 is the term ‘the priests, the Levites.’ If no distinction is made between the offerings of incense and sacrifice are in no ways said to be restricted to a very small portion of the tribe. The two priests and the two Levites, unless questions of authenticity are irrelevant. A clear distinc tion within the tribe of Levi appears in the prophetic writings for the first time here, i.e. in Ezek. Then the two kinds of Levites are spoken of, ‘the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok,’ while the Levites of the sons of priest are not mentioned (ver 10). No third class is recognized (cf 40. 45. 46, where the distinction is between classes of priests). Now, the distinction between the Zadokian and non-Zadokian Levites is based by Ezekiel on one thing only, in the past the former had been faithful and the latter had been false. Because the former had ministered to the Lord’s house, therefore should take part in the office of the sanctuary. But, perform only inferior ministrations. Now this can mean only that the non-Zadokian Levites are excluded from priestly privileges and duties”的 meaning, it is essential.

Dues

Nothing is said about their disposition. In Dt, the first-fruits of grain, wine and oil (Ex 23. 19) belong to the ‘priests the Levites’ (34. 4). And the priestly first-fruits in the beautiful rite of 26. 11-11 probably had the same destination. Of the general harvest the tithe is to be dedicated, as explained at length in 14 22-29. The worshipper is to eat it himself, but shall take care to see that the Levite receives a portion. Every third year, however, the tithe is to be left for the benefit of all who need charity, including the Levite. Note that in either case the Levite receives only a part of the tithe. In X the first-fruits are again assigned to the clergy (but now specifically to the priests—Nu 18 12-18). But it appears that the tithe is to be given wholly to the Levites in Nu 18 21-24. The contradiction with Dt 14 22-29 is real. That two tithes were to be paid by the worshipper may safely be assumed as impossible, as a tax of one-fifth would have been undeniable. (It may be noted, though, that in later days the very pious took this interpretation—cf Tob 1 7—but it is certain that no such ruling ever maintained generally.) An alternative explanation offered is that it could be assumed that the Levite would invite the worshipper to join in a feast on the tithe. Frankly, it is difficult to treat this as quite candid. In Dt the worshipper is anything rather than a mere guest at another man’s banquet. When the tithe has been brought as money, the worshipper’s share is not only “thou shalt not forsake him.” Moreover, the tithe is to be consumed at the sanctuary and nowhere else (Dt 14 23; cf 12 11). In Nu 18, however, the tithe becomes the exclusive property of the Levite and is assigned him as his source of income (vs 25-32) and so exclusively is it his that in turn is tithed. And, far from being turned into a feast at which the worshipper shares, it need not be consumed, the sanctuary at all but may be eaten in “every place,” wherever the Levite and his family may happen to live (ver 31). It would be hard to conceive of two rules more mutually exclusive than the tithe directions in Dt and Nu. That the livelihood provided for the Levite in Dt is pitiful is hardly in point and at all events he received more than did the widow and the orphan. But of IV.

(2) Firstlings in CC must be offered on the eighth day (Ex 22 30), but in Dt 15 19-28 they were preserved without being worked or shorn, until “year by year” they could be taken up to the sanctuary. (Apparently by 14 23-25 it might be converted into money in case of great distance.) Here the worshipper was to offer it and eat of it (a peaceful scene vs 18). But that firstling becomes the personal property of the priest and he receives the flesh of the animal, if it can be sacrificed (i.e. it is his peace offering, not the worshipper’s). There is no question of giving back a portion to the worshipper, again. Note, moreover, that in Dt 15 21-23, an animal not fit for sacrifice was eaten at home by the worshipper and so did not come in contact with the priest at all; contrast Nu 18 15.

(3) A minor matter is found in the portion of the peace offering that went to the priest. In Dt 18 3 it is specified as the shoulder, two cheeks and maw. In X (Ex 29 26-28, etc) this has become the breast and the right thigh—a considerably more advantageous portion.

(4) In Dt it is laid down that a Levite has no inheritance among his brethren (10 9; 12 18; 18 1) and hence is recommended as an object of charity, like the widow and the orphan. And, like the widow and the orphan, he could “inhabit any of the cities of the tribes of the Israelites. Now in X the adoration to charity disappear, because he receives a fixed income (from the tithe), but it is said that this tithe is given the Levite in lieu of an inheritance, “Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance” (Nu 18 21-24). In another part of X, however, there is still a different conception—the Levites receive no less than forty-eight cities with ample “suburbs,” expressly said to be given them “from the spoils of their enemies.” The inheritance is for all time. In Dt 25 32-34 the houses of the Levites are “their possession among the children of Israel,” and the fields “their perpetual possession” and inalienable. Is there any natural explanation of these passages except that they represent increasing attempts to provide provisions for the Levites as the time went on? That the different rules represent advances within Moses’ own period cannot be taken seriously, esp. as on this hypothesis the Dt laws would have been the latest. See, in addition, III.

same direction. Now this investing of every slay-ing of an animal with a sacrificial character, explains the permission of Dt 12 20-25 to eat flesh 'after all the days of dedication' only, no death if sacrificial unless there had been an earlier contrary practice. It is to be noted, moreover, that in Dt 12 16 the blood is to be disposed of by pouring it on the earth, the practice condemned in I S 14 32. The conclusion is that before the legislation of Dt 18 the Israelites offered the blood of every slain sacrificial animal at the local sanctuary. Dt's rigid enforcement of the one sanctuary made this impossible, and so permission was given to eat flesh at home provided the soul was not needlessly such. It is evident that it was disposed of in a non-sacrificial way. Now in Lev 17 3-5 it becomes clear what has happened. The passage reads originally something like this: 'What man soever there be of the house of Israel, that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat, and hath not brought it to offer it as an oblation unto Jeh, blood shall be imputed unto that man. . . . ' This offering was to take place at the local sanctuary. But when the passage was incorporated into the whole body of the legislation, the editor was working at a time when the legitimacy of the local sanctuaries had long been forgotten. And so references to the "camp" and "the tent of meeting" were inserted, in accordance with the only laws that could be found in the oral tradition. The discrepancies with vs 5, 8, etc. were probably not observed.

It is to be understood that this passage is not used as presenting a basic argument for the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis. But it is cited as an example of other passages where the text is to be considered. And, also, because the editor of Dt conceived that this particular passage is a death-blow to the "critical" hypothesis. Naturally, it is nothing of the sort.

III. The History of the Ark

—It may be said at the outset that many of the attacks on the historic value of Ch have been very greatly exaggerated. But, none the less, a close comparison with Samuel-Kings shows that the Chronicler has most certainly read back into the history the religious institutions of his own late day— it need not be said, with perfect incoherence and sincerity. For instance, in comparing 2 K 11 14 with 2 Ch 23 2-6, we find the statement of K that Jehoiada brought captains of the guard with the king into the house of Jeh at the place where the gow was quite altered. In Ch Jehoiada summons Levites and heads of houses, with the express provision that only Levites shall enter into the house of Jeh. So holy a priest as Jehoiada could not have acted as K says he did. Similarly, the statement in 1 K 15 14 that Ass did not remove the high places is changed into the statement that he did remove the high places (2 Ch 14 3-5), and only those in (northern) Israel were left (15 17). So did Jehoshaphat (17 6), although in 20 33 the explicit statement to the contrary is copied (unnoticed?) from 1 K 22 43. Such righteous kings must have enforced the single sanctuary. The almost trivial matter of David's garb when the ark was brought into Jerus (contrast 2 S 6 20-22 with 1 Ch 16 27-29) has been noticed already in II, 6. The important matter in Ch, however, is the history of the Tabernacle. In 1 Ch 16 39-42 the Tabernacle is at Gibeon, with the full ministry surrounding it, with the exception of a detail left before the Ark in Jerus (cf 19 17-32). And in 2 Ch 5 5 it is brought up to Jerus, although the disposition made of it is not explained. Otherwise it is mentioned in 1 Ch 6 48; 21 29; 2 Ch 3 3. But the narrative is so sordid and grotesque that the idea in David build a special tent for the Ark in Jerus (1 Ch 16 1), if the one Divinely appointed covering for the Ark was still standing—not to be brought to Jerus until its utility was past (2 Ch 5 5)? That it was too fragile to be moved can hardly be taken seriously. In the first place, this explanation with David theArk alone is not without the suspicion inexplicable unless there had been an earlier contrary practice. In the second place, it is incredible for such a solid structure of wood, silver and brass, however much repair the curtains might have needed. Moreover, this explanation will not do at all for Bezalel's person altar, which was still quite usable, by 2 Ch 1 5, making the construction of a new altar (4 1) altogether inexplicable. The impression is created at once that the Chronicler has injected the Tabernacle into a narrative that knew nothing of it. This is corroborated by 9 17 where the Ark, at the floor of Oran is explained by the difficulty of reaching the Tabernacle. But, the Ark, the natural means for an inquiry of God, was in Jerus, with an altar by it (16 1)—why this third altar on the threshing-floor? The inaccessibility of the Tabernacle is invoked here only to solve what was a difficulty to the Chronicler. Now if 2 Ch 1 3 be compared with 1 K 3 2-4, the key of the whole is discovered. K not only does not mention the presence of the Tabernacle at Gibeon, but excludes it. Solomon's sacrificing at Gibeon is explained by saying that such was the custom of all Israel, who sacrificed in high places before the Temple was built; Solomon also sacrificed in high places, but none were left; and the one at Gibeon was an apologia for Solomon's conduct—why should the editor of K have apologized for sacrifice offered at the Divinely appointed Tabernacle? The Chronicler, however, could not believe that God blessed Solomon when offering sacrifices by the law of Ch's times, and hence he solves the difficulty by bringing in something that is unknown to the narrative in K.

Indeed, K mentions the Tabernacle only in 1 K 8 4. It mentions the Tabernacle as such only in 1 S 2 22. Jgs does not mention the Tabernacle at all (18 31 is the only reference to it). Now 1 S 2 22 is not found in the Vatican LXX, and the description of the Tabernacle as a tent contradicts 1 9; 3 15, where it appears as a temple or house. So it must be dropped as a gloss. Nor will it be denied that 1 K 8 4 looks suspiciously like a gloss as well, particularly in view of the house of Jer. The houses of Jer are practically unmentioned elsewhere in Samuel-Kings. At all events, there are only these two possible mentions of what should have been the center of Israel's worship in all of Jgs-Samuel-Kings. This is not the ordinary argument from silence, it is silent about what should have been the most vital matter of all. Dt knows nothing of the Tabernacle, and, as has already been shown in II, states as clearly as language only can that in the wilderness the centralization of worship was not observed. The argument from silence alone would be conclusive here, for how could the author of Dt in his passionate advocacy of the single sanctuary fail to appeal to the single sanctuary already established by God's decree, if he knew anything about it? But not only is there no such mention in Dt but a positive exclusion of such a sanctuary in express terms. The case would seem to be complete. The Tabernacle of X and Ch is an ideal structure projected back into the past, just as the temple of Ezekiel is an ideal structure projected into the future. And it is needless to appeal to the familiar argument that the Tabernacle of Ex 26 would have been blown to pieces by the first storm. It had no provision made at all for standing out in the wind, which alone could resist the blasts of the desert.

It is impossible in the space of the present art. to enter into all the corrobative evidence, but a very few important arguments may be mentioned. Simple people tend most naturally to think of heroes of the past as more and more glorious the more time passes. Now Jgs 1:1–19 has a rather different feeling. It is perhaps the worship of God that was to be taken.

The fate of Hebron is especially interesting. In Jgs 20:1–43 Hebron was Hophni and Phinehas’ death. But in Josh 16 Caleb takes Hebron during Joshua’s lifetime and at the latter’s direction. In Josh 10:36,37, however, Joshua takes Hebron personally and annihilates its inhabitants. Here are three distinct conceptions of Hebron’s fate, again. But still a fourth is found in Josh 21:11,12: it was not Caleb who received the city but the Levites. This evidently belongs to the time when the Levitical right to cities had become a commonplace, and was therefore repeated in days. The accounts of the annihilation of the Canaanites arose naturally enough. According to Jgs the conquest was gradual and merciful. But the Canaanites seduced Israel to idolatry repeatedly. Therefore they should have been swept out by 16–19. But Joshua was righteous and had all power. Therefore he must have rooted them out. How they suddenly reappeared again was a question that was not raised. But perhaps it may be thought a relief for the Canaanite campaigns of the Israelites are due to reflection and not to descriptions of what actually happened.

Simple people think of God quite naturally and reverently as a greater man. So in Ex 24:9–11 we read that Moses and many others met God in the mount, they all saw Him, ate, and drank before Him. A slightly more refined point of view is in Ex 33:11, where Moses (but no one else) sees God face to face, and Nu 12:8, where Jeconiah (alone) sees the form of God. But in Ex 33:20 no man, not even Moses, can see God face to face. In Dt 4:11–15 it is laid down that only darkness was seen—‘ye saw no form.’ Perhaps Moses was thought of as an exception, but the contradiction of the concept that conceived over seventy Israelites besides Moses to have seen God is complete. This official view of an official episode into the time of Moses can be seen in certain passages where Aaron appears predominantly. E.g. Ex 25:1: he is ‘7th with that of Aaron in the tent of meeting in the tabernacle’; Ex 32:19:16:10: Nu 20:2–13. Yet, despite the conspicuous presence of Aaron in the latter passages, in Ex 33:11 the minister of Moses in the Tent is Joshua, who is not a priest at all. Contrast similarly 17:1,17:14, Nu 28:1, and see how Exod. 17:17 appears in the latter passage, although the former excludes him. At the time of X it was not thought possible that Moses could have acted without the official mediation of the official priest.

Reasons of space preclude a further discussion of the other arguments here, such as the linguistic. As a matter of fact, the sections that contain the more developed concepts contain also a different vocabulary. To be repeated, however, is the fact that the argument is cumulative and that a single explanation of the differences is offered in the hypothesis of very varying dates for the various portions. Of course an exact analysis of every ver and a rigorous reconstruction of every source is not claimed to be possible. Many scholars have been convinced by their enthusiastic analysis into making previous suggestions. But the principal lines of division are sufficiently clear. And it may be hoped the reader will not think that the acceptance of them has been dictated by any motive except that of facing the truth—least of all by any motive of faith in the power of God or a suspicion of the miraculous.

IV. Reconstruction.—Israel came into Canaan, after having received through the mediation of Moses a covenant relation with God. 1. Covenant and Law was time passing. 2. Code panying legislation. But this legis- ration seems not to have prescribed the ritual form that the worship of God was to take. In part, old forms were simply continued and in part new forms were gradually developed or appropriated, the emphasis of the Law at that time being on the moral and the ritual being left quite free. In especial, sacrifices were offered wherever Israelites happened to live, doubtless frequently at former Canaanite sanctuaries now dedicated to Jeh. The local sanctuary was the center of the life. Men went thither to learn God’s will and to give a re- ligious character to what we should call purely secular transactions (contracts, etc.). Firstlings were offered there on the eighth day, first-fruits at once, every meal of flesh food was given a sacri- ficial character (peace offering), and, for more solemn purposes, the whole burnt offering was offered. So the local sanctuary corresponded to our “village churches.” It was the religious home of the people. Certain of these sanctuaries had an especial dignity, above all Shiloh, where the Ark was. Later, when a united Israel had been realized, David brought the Ark to Jerus, that the national ceremonies during the national religious life as well, and Solomon en- shrined the Ark in the Temple. So to Jerus there resorted naturally the best of Israel’s religious leaders, and there the worship of God would be found in its purest form, normally speaking.

As time went on, the progress of culture and the frer contact with other nations had bad effects as well as good. New and degrading religious practices flowed into the country and they revived old but equally degrading religious practices that had survived from the Canaanites. The priesthood at Jerus did not escape a taint, but the place where such rites gained the readiest foothold was of course the obscure local sanctuaries. Not the best-minded king or the most zealous prophet could watch all the services at them all, and attempts at purging them of idolatry or idolatrous rites (Elijah, Jehu, etc.) could not effect permanent improvement. And it could not have been very long after David’s death that Solomon’s reforms, which had begun to complete prohibition of country sacrifices and the rigid centralization of everything at Jerus was the only measure possible. This would soon become a fixed conviction of the better class of the Jerus priesthood and in a few generations would be a tradition. Detailed precepts to carry this tradition into effect arose necessarily and in turn became a tradition and in course of time were regarded as Moses’ work and committed to writing. In this way the legislation of Dt took form and at the time of its discovery under Josiah there is not the slightest occasion to attribute fraud to anyone engaged in the transaction. The document agreed fairly well with what was the tradition of Jerus, and no one at that day could distinguish between a writing a cent, old or even less and a writing of Moses’ own time. The country priests and the mass of the people were not consulted as to en- forcing it, and they would not have known if they had been consulted. By reading of the history, the reforms proceeded from the Jerus text, and any general “tradition of the Jews” was non- existent.

(1) The reforms added to the theoretical tradi- tion the additional influence of practical experience and the idea of course documentation in the minds of the more earnest among the exiles. Ezekiel, in particular, realized that only at a single sanctuary could the worship of God be kept pure—the single sanctuary was God's house. And Ezra kiel's influence was immense. Now it is to be noted that at the return only those came back who had a real enthusiasm for Jerusalem, as Babylonia was, materially speaking, a far more attractive place than the Focus of that day.

That the single sanctuary could have been questioned by any of these Jews or that they could have conceived of Moses as instituting anything of less dignity is impossible.

This reform also had been at work. Even in the hittine the more primitive note of joyousness was maintained in simple life. But joyousness in simple life is often dissipated in culture life and the peace offering could be made a debauch (Lea 12-14); in the temple see, with their dignity, had become far better developed and the incongruity of penitential worship with a festal meal was recognized. A very slight change was made: the portion was to be eaten by the priest instead of the worshippers and the sin and trespass offerings were cut down. The abuses were cut away by this one stroke and the peace offering proper retired into the background. And sacrifices were made the proper way to explain the officiating priest. In accord with the growing commerce, proportioning of gifts, dues, tithes of feasts, etc., were specified more and more exactly, the worship was surrounded with a more impressive ritual, and, in particular, the officiating priests substituted vestments suited to the better taste of the time for the old loin-cloth. Trace is left in the OT of difficulties regarding the rights of the various classes of priests to minister but the matter was settled essentially in a manner that satisfied all. Priests formally guilty of sacrilege were not excluded, but the descendants were admitted to share in the worship and the priestly revenues, but the actual offering of sacrifice was restricted to those who had been faithful. The proper support of the clergy so far as the smaller temples were concerned, was provided by the dignity, more elaborate provisions than had been needed in the simpler times of old, but was accomplished in a manner entirely satisfactory. The religion of no other nation could have survived the Babylonian exile and return, and with the elements formerly necessary but now outgrown changed into a form adapted to the new task the nation had before it—the preparation of itself and the world for the advent of Christ.

This growth towards the higher, involving as it did the meeting of all kinds of obstacles, the solving of all kinds of problems, the learning when to abandon elements that had been transcended, is unique in the history of religions. And the explanation of its uniqueness can be found only in the guidance of God. And in the history as reconstructed God is seen truly as the Father, who trained His children little by little, giving them only what they were able to bear, but bringing them surely to Himself. And in the documents that contain the precepts for each stage of progress God's hand can be seen no less clearly. To be sure, in the secular science of history (as in physics or astronomy) His revelation was expressed in forms that His people could understand. This alteration—and this alteration only—in our view of what is covered by Biblical inspiration is the sacrifice demanded by the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis.

3. Later

"Die israelitische Literatur" in Die Kultur der Gegenwart, 1, 2 (1899); should on no account be neglected. The best treatment of the inspiration question from the standpoint of pure dogmatics is Jeremias' Authority: Ecclesiastical and Biblical (1908).

In the above discussion it has been assumed that our text of the OT is at least relatively trustworthy. The reader interested in what can be done by textual reconstruction will find the opposite pole represented in the works of Wiener and of Cheyne.

Crook-Backed, kroök'bak't (R3, gibben; kroptös, kurtös): A disqualification for the priesthood (Lev 21 20); was probably an angular curvature of the spine, usually the result of tubercular caries of the vertebrae. It was by no means uncommon in ancient Egypt, where I have found a considerable number of skulls affected with this disease. Some alchemical works speak of it as the meaning "very dark colored," but this is unlikely.

The woman bound by the spirit of infirmity and unable to lift herself (Lk 13 11-17) was affected with senile kyphosis, a chronic bone disease often found among aged men (and more frequently women) whose lives have been spent in agricultural labor. In these the vertebrae become altered in shape so that it is impossible to straighten the back. Some rabbinical authorities believed all deformities of the spine to be due to sin and to this Our Lord seems to have alluded in his rebuke to those who caviled at His healing on the Sabbath. I have found this condition in some Egyptian skeletons, and have seen it in the case of a Palestinian skeleton. A skeleton affected with a similar curvature was found buried under the threshold of a house at Gezer, where she had evidently been offered as a foundation sacrifice.

Crooked, kroök'ed (R3, awedh, Fæph, ḡubash, kredan, ḡubail, ḡubādh, ḡubāl, ḡubāthūn, ḡubāštūn, pithalāt; skolos, skolos): Primarily designates something that is bent, twisted or deformed (Isa 27 1; 45 2 AV).

Figurative: (1) It designates a course of action that deviates from rectitude, esp. deceit, guile, hypocrisy (Dt 32 5; Prov 2 15; Ecc 1 15; Lk 3 5; Phil 2 15); (2) trials (sent by God, Eccl 7 15; Lam 3 9); (3) difficulties (removed by God, Isa 42 16).

Crooked Serpent, kroök'ed súrfent. See Astronomy.

Crop: (1) As now the translation of Nuph, murāh (Lev 1 10), which is the craw of a bird, esp. of doves and pigeons, which had to be removed by the priest before he offered the birds as a burnt sacrifice.

(2) As a v. it is (Ezk 17 4:22) the tr of ṣpāf, šābāph, which has the meaning of "cutting off," "cutting down," "plucking."

Cross (σταυρός, stauros, "a cross," "the crucifixion"; στάλις, στάλος, "a stake," "a pole"): The name is not found in the OT. It is derived from the Lat word cruze. In the Gr language it is stauros, but sometimes we find the word stelpos used as its Gr equivalent. The historical writers, who transferred the events of Rom history into the Gr language, make use of these two words. No word in human language has become more universally known than this word, and that because all of the history of the world, from the birth of Christ has been measured by the distance which separates events from it. The symbol and principal content of the Christian religion and of Christian civilization is found in this one word.

The cross occurs in at least four different forms: (1) the form usually seen in pictures, the cruz immissa, in which the upright beam is most likely the type of cross on which the Saviour died, as may be inferred from the inscription which was nailed above His head; (2) the cruz commissa, or St. Anthony's cross, which has the shape of the letter T; (3) the Greek cross of later date, in which the pieces are equally long; (4) the cruz decesata, or St. Andrew's cross, which has the shape of the letter X.

The early church historians Socrates (1,17), Sozomen (2,1), Rufinus (1,7) and Theodore (1,18) all make mention of this tradition. The most significant thing is that Eusebius in his Chronicle (Flavius), who use the form of the cross which has a hump or a curve on the lower part, and he caused it to be made on the traditional spot of His grave.

With the cross of the Saviour were found the two crosses of the malefactor who were crucified with Him. A miracle of healing, wrought by the cross of the malefactor, is mentioned in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, which says that the cross was made of iron, and it was stuck into the ground where it lay. It was found in the church of Our Lady of the Cross in Rome.

According to it, Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, in 325 AD, when she was 79 years old, discovered the true cross and the sepulcher of Christ, and she caused it to be made in the church of St. Peter in Rome. The balance was placed in a new church, especially erected for it at Rome and named after it Santa Croce. Small fragments of the wood of the true cross were sold, encrusted with gold and jewels, and since many among the wealthy believers were desirous of possessing such priceless relics, the miracle of the "multiplication of the cross" was devised, so that the relic suffered no diminution "et quasi intacta maneret" (Paulinus ep. 11 ad Sec.). Fragments of the true cross were found in many of the Catholic churches of many countries, all over Christendom. It is said that the East celebrated the stauronimos hēmera (Crucifixion Day) on September 14, since the 4th cent. The evidence for this is the similarity of the ceremonies in the Eastern Church, and the fact that the East celebrated the invention of the Cross on May 3, since the time of Gregory the Great in the 6th cent. The finding and publication of the apocryphal "Doctrina Adilael" has made it evident that the eastern legend of the discovery of the cross by Helena is but a version of the old Edessa legend, which tells of an identical discovery of the cross, under the very same circumstances, by the wife of the emperor Claudius, who had been converted to Christianity by the preaching of Peter.

(1) Extrascryptural.—The sign of the cross was well known in the symbolism of various ancient nations. Among the Egyptians it is said to have been the symbol of divinity and eternal life, and to have passed into the emblem of Serapis.

3. Symbolic Uses of the Cross

It is known either in the form of the Greek cross or in the form of the letter T. The Spaniards found it to be well known, as a symbol, by the Mexicans and Peruvians, perhaps signifying the four elements, or the four seasons, or the four points of the compass.

(2) Scriptural.—The suffering implied in crucifixion naturally made the cross a symbol of pain, distress and burden-bearing. Thus Jesus used it Himself (Matt. 20:28, 21:16, 26:31), and the cross stands for the preaching of the doctrine of the Atonement (1 Cor. 15:18; Gal. 6:14; Phil. 3:18; Col. 1:20). It expresses the bond of unity between the Jew and the Gentile (Eph. 2:16), and between the believer and Christ, and also symbolizes sanctification (Gal. 5:24). The cross is the center and circumference of the preaching of the apostles and of the life of the NT church.

As an instrument of death the cross was detested by the Jews. "Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree" (Gal 3:13; cf. Dt. 21:23), hence it became a stumbling-block to them, for how could one accused of God be their Messiah? Nor was the cross differently considered by the Romans. Let the very name of the cross be far away not only from the body of a Roman citizen, but even from his thoughts, his eyes, his ears" (Cicero Pro Rutilio 5).

The earliest mode of crucifixion seems to have been by impalement, the transfixion of the body of the criminal by a stake, and the mode of death-punishment still well known among the Mongol race. The usual mode of crucifixion was familiar to the Greeks, the Romans, the Egyptians, Persians and Babylonians (Thuc. 1, 110; Herod. iii. 50). Many excavations since has been excavated two thousand Tyrian captives in this way, after the fall of the city. The Jews received this form of punishment from the Syrians and Romans (Ant. XII, v, 4; XX, vi, 2; BJ, I, iv, v). The Roman citizen was sentenced to a mode of death, it being considered the death of a slave (Cicero In Verrem i, 56; Quint. viii.4). The punishment was meted out for such crimes as treason, desertion in the face of the enemy, robbery, piracy, assassination, sedition, etc. It continued in vogue in the Roman empire till the day of Constantine, when it was abolished as an insult to Christianity. Among the Romans crucifixion was preceded by scourging, undoubtedly to hasten impending death. The victim then bore his own cross, or at least the upright beam, to the place of execution. This in itself proves that the structure was less ponderous than is commonly supposed. When he was tied to the cross nothing further was done and he was left to die from starvation.

In Pauline lit. the Great, the mention of crucifixion is found only in Romans (15:24). In Pauline lit. the Cross is the center and circumference of the preaching of the apostles and of the life of the NT church.

The length of this agony was wholly determined by the constitution of the victim, but death rarely ensued before thirty-six hours had elapsed. Injuries are on record of victims of the cross who survived their terrible injuries when taken down from the cross after many hours of suspension (Joe, VITA, 75). Death was sometimes hastened by breaking the legs of the victims and by a hard blow delivered under the armpit before crucifixion. Crura fracta was a well-known Roman term (Cicero Phil. xii.12). The sudden death of Christ evidently was a matter of astonishment (Mk 15:44). The peculiar symptoms mentioned by John (19:34) would seem to point to a rupture of the heart, of which the Saviour died, independent of the cross itself, or perhaps hastened by its agony. CROSSWAY, kros'wa (krośwa, pereh, lit. "division"): A forking or dividing of the way. Obadiah warns Edom, "And stand thou not in the crossway, to cut off those of his that escape" (Ob ver 14). In LXX, "a mountain pass."

CROWN, kroun: The word crown in the OT is a tr of five different Heb words, and in the NT of two Gr words. These express the several meanings, and must be examined to ascertain the same.

The five Heb words are as follows: (1) צִרּ (tsir), קָדָךְ (qādākh), from קְדָשָׁה (kādāshah); (2) נֶצֶר, נֶצֶר, צִדּ (nēzer, nēzer, or tsid); (3) לֶבֶן, לְבֶן (leven, lev); (4) יִדּ (yid); (5) יִדים (yidēm).

1. In Hebrew: (a) קדשׁ (qādāsh), Hebrew "diadem," meaning "the crown of the head," and is also rendered in AV "top of the head," "scalp," "head," "pate," "head," "diadem," "crown." It is used in Ex 25:14-25; 30:34; 37:11-12.26-27.

2. In Greek: (1) stephanos means a chaplet (wreath) made of leaves or leaf-like gold, used for marriage and festive occasions, and expressing public recognition of victory in races, games and war; also figuratively as a reward for efficient Christian life and service (see GAMES). This symbol was more noticeable and intricate than the plain fillet. Only in the Rev of John is stephanos called 'golden.' The "crown of thorns" which Jesus wore was a stephanos (woven wreath) of thorns; the kind is not known (Mt 27:29; Mk 15:17; Jn 19:2,5). Lk makes no mention of it. Whether intended to represent royalty or victory, it was a caricature crown. Stephanos is found in 1 Cor 9:25; Phil 4:1,1; 1 Thess 2:19; 2 Tim 4:8,10; Jas 1:12; 1 Pet 5:4; Rev 2:10; 3:11; 6:2; 12:1; 14:14; plur. in Rev 4:10; 9:7; "crowned" in 2 Tim 2:5; He 2:9; "crownedest" in He 2:7.

3. In Greek: (2) διαδήμα, the word for "diadem," from διά (about) and δέ (bound), i.e. something bound about the head. In the three places where it occurs (Rev 12:3, 13:1 and 19:12) both AV and ARV tr it not "crown" but "diadem," thus making the proper distinction between stephanos and diadema, such as is not done either in AV or the LXX (see Trench, Synonyms of the NT). According to Thayer the distinction was not observed in Hellenic Gr. "Diademas" are on the dragon (Rev 12:3), the beast (Rev 13:1) and on the Rider of the White Horse, "the Faithful and True" (Rev 19:12). In each case the "diadems" are symbolic of power to rule.

3. Use and Remuneration: There are several examples in the Old Testament of the use of the crown in the Scripture references studied, viz. decoration, consecration, coronation, exaltation, and remuneration. The crown was given as a reward for service, and as a symbol of exaltation, or remuneration. The two Gr words of the NT tr crown are: (1) οτρόνος, stephanos, from stephō, and (2) δίδαμα, diadema, from diadō, "to bind round.

Ancient Asiatic Crowns.

The two Gr words of the NT tr crown are: (1) stephanos means a chaplet (wreath) made of leaves or leaf-like gold, used for marriage and festive occasions, and expressing public recognition of victory in races, games and war; also figuratively as a reward for efficient Christian life and service (see GAMES). This symbol was more noticeable and intricate than the plain fillet. Only in the Rev of John is stephanos called 'golden.' The "crown of thorns" which Jesus wore was a stephanos (woven wreath) of thorns; the kind is not known (Mt 27:29; Mk 15:17; Jn 19:2,5). Lk makes no mention of it. Whether intended to represent royalty or victory, it was a caricature crown. Stephanos is found in 1 Cor 9:25; Phil 4:1,1; 1 Thess 2:19; 2 Tim 4:8,10; Jas 1:12; 1 Pet 5:4; Rev 2:10; 3:11; 6:2; 12:1; 14:14; plur. in Rev 4:10; 9:7; "crowned" in 2 Tim 2:5; He 2:9; "crownedest" in He 2:7.

any utility purpose. These wavelet, gold moldings, used in the furnishings of the tabernacle of Moses, were placed about (a) the table of shewbread (Ex 25 24; 37 11); (b) the ark of the covenant (Ex 35 11; 37 2); (c) the altar of incense (Ex 30 3; 37 25). The position of these crowns is a debated question among archaeologists. Their purpose other than decoration is not known. The encircling gold might signify gratitude, purity and enduring worth.

(2) Consecration.—The nazar had a twofold use as the crown of consecration: (a) It was placed as a frontlet on the miter of the high priest, being tied with a blue lace (Ex 39 30). The priestly crown was a flat piece of pure gold, bearing the inscription, "Holy to Jehovah," signifying the consecration of the priest as the representative of the people (Ex 39 6; Lev 8 9). (b) Likewise the Heb king (2 K 11 12) was set apart by God in wearing on his head a royal nazar, whether of silk or gold we do not know. It was set with jewels (Zec 9 16) and was light enough to be taken into battle (2 S 1 10).

(3) Coronation.—The ordinary use of the crown. There were three kinds of kingy crowns used in coronation services: (a) The nazar or consecration crown, above referred to, was the only one used in crowning Heb kings. What seems to be an exception is in the case of Joshua, who represented both priest and king (Zec 6 11 ARVm). (b) The Å†arah, and (c) the kether were used in crowning foreign monarchs. No king but a Heb could wear a royal crown (Zec 6 13). It is recorded that David presumed to put on his own head the Å†arah of King Malecam (2 S 12 30 ARVm). The kether or jeweled turban was the crown of the Pers king and queen (Est 1 11; 2 17; 6 8).

(4) Exaltation. The Å†arah, the stephanos and the diaîdema were used as crowns of exaltation. Stephanos was the usual crown of exaltation for victors of games, achievement in war and places of honor at feasts. The Å†arah was worn at banquets (Cant 3 11; Isa 26 13). Probably taking the form of a wreath of flowers; also as a crown of honor and victory (Ezk 16 12; 21 26; 23 42).

Stephanos is the crown of exaltation bestowed upon Christ (Rev 5 2; 14 14; He 2 9). "Exaltation was the logical result of Christ's humiliation." (Vincent). The apocalyptic writers and Jews receive this emblem of exaltation (Rev 12 1; 9 7). The symbolic dragon and beast are elevated, wearing diâdema (Rev 12 3; 13 1). The conquering Christ has "upon his head a golden crown"; the beast, diaîdema (Rev 14 19). See further Turibulum, De corona.

(5) Remuneration.—Paul, witnessing the races and games, caught the vision of wreath-crowned victors flush with the reward of earnest endeavor. See Games. He also saw the persistent, faithful Christian at the end of his hard-won race wearing the symbolic stephanos of rejoicing (1 Thess 2 19 AV), of righteousness (2 Tim 4 8), of glory (1 Pet 5 4), of life (Jas 1 12; Rev 2 10). Paul's fellow-Christians were his joy and stephanos (Phil 4 1), of which Paul might justly make his boast (Phil 4 19). Before Paul, his Heb ancestors saw the Å†arah of glory (Prov 4 9) and the Å†arah of a good wife, children's children, riches and a peaceful old age (Prov 12 4; 14 24; 16 31; 17 6). For Apoc references see I Mac 10 29; 11 35; 13 39.

CROWN OF THORNS, thôrûn (akâthōnos stéphi- nov, akânthanos stéphiunos). Three of the four evangelists mention the crown of thorns, with which was placed the head of the Roman soldier (Mt 27 29; Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2). All speak of the akantine (Acanthus) crown, but there is no certainty about the peculiar plant, from the branches of which this crown of cruel mockery was plaited. The rabbinical books mention no less than twenty-two words in the Bible signifying thorny plants, and the word dkanthâ in the NT Gr is a generic and not a specific term. And this word or its adj., is used in the three Gospels, quoted above. It is therefore impossible definitely to determine what was the exact plant or tree, whose thorny branches were selected for this purpose. Tobler (Denkbl., 113, 179) inclines to the Spīna Christī, as did Hassequist. Its botanical name is Zâïphus Spīna Christī. It is a very common shrub with thorny branches, junipers, spines and sharp, round and pliable, and the leaves look like ivy, with a dark, shiny green color, making them therefore very adaptable to the purpose of the soldiers. Others have designated the Palīurus aculeatus or the Lycium horridum. Both Geikie (Life of Christ, 549) and Farrar (Life of Christ, note 625) point to the Nûbk (Zâïphus lotus). Says the latter, "The Nûbk struck me, as it has all travelers in Pal, as being most suitable both for making shields and pain, since its leaves are bright and its thorns singularly strong. But though the Nûbk is very common on the shores of Galilee, I saw none of it near Jerusalem." The settlement of the question is manifestly impossible.

CRUEL, krōō'el, CRUELTY, krōō'-el-tī ("ZN, 'akhzâr, "harsh," "fierce," Qâôô, "hatred," "violence"). There are various uses of the word "cruel" in the OT: (a) the cruel [deadly] venom of asps (Dt 32 33); (b) spoken of men of relentless hate: They hated not the Israelites (Ex 15 25), and "the cruel men of Edom" (Prov 5 9; 11 17; 12 10; Jer 6 23; 50 42); (c) Job speaks of God's dealings with him as "cruel" and arbitrary: "Thou art turned to be cruel to me" (Job 30 21); conscious of his virtue, yet holding God to be the author of his sufferings, Job is driven to the conclusion that God has become his enemy and is bent upon destroying him; (d) the "day of Jehovah"—a prophetic phrase to denote the time of God's manifestation in judgment—is described as the "day of the LORD'S cruel anger" (Isa 13 9). The word "cruelty" has nearly disappeared from the Bible. In RV it occurs only in Ps 27 12. AV has it in Gen 49 5; Ps 74 20 (RV "violence"); Ezek 34 4 (79, perekh, "crushing," RV "rigid").

The OT regards many acts on the part of chosen persons and the elect nation which are marked by gross cruelty, particularly when measured by the standards of our own age. Some of these acts are sanctioned by Scripture or even presented as commanded by God, as, for example, the sacrifice of Isaac, the extermination of the Canaanites, the authorization of the avenger of blood and of human slavery, and of retaliation for evil. Some of the deeds performed by Divinely appointed leaders of Israel are characterized by inhumanity. Samuel "hewed Agag in pieces" (1 S 15 33). David massacred the Ammonites with great barbarity (2 S 12 31). Eljah slew the prophets of Baal (1 K 18 40; cf 2 K 1 10; 10 25). Some of the utterances of the Psalmists breathe the spirit of hate and revenge, as in the so-called imprecatory psalms (Ps 137 8-9; 139 21 ff). This has often been a matter of great perplexity to the devout student of the Bible. He has found it difficult to reconcile such practices, which bear the mark of approval, with the highest standards of Christian morality. It is sometimes urged in justification that these deeds are permitted, but not commanded by God. But this answer hardly meets the facts of the case. We shall arrive at a truer answer if we recognize the fact, which Jesus emphasizes, that the OT religion is a self-accommodation to the low moral standard of those whom it was designed to instruct. This He reiterates in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:21-28,34), and afterward, to the hardness of the ancestral Jewish heart (Mt 19:8). In the OT we are dealing with the childhood of the world, in which revelation is compelled to limit itself to the comprehension of its subjects. It must speak so that they can understand. It must start with the where it finds them. It must lead them along lines in which they of their own volition can walk, that character may grow step by step. A gradual development of spiritual and ethical ideals may clearly be traced in the sacred records. We must therefore read the OT narratives and interpret their teaching, not according to the standards of our own age, but in the light of the age to which these narratives belong. The spirit of Elijah may not be the spirit of Christ (Lk 9:55). While many of the acts of cruelty and barbarity recorded in the OT are indicative of an age of a low type of morality, yet we must at the same time recognize the fact, that Israel's religion by emphasizing holy living and righteous conduct, created an atmosphere favorable for the growth of high ethical ideals. Wherever this religion is seen at its best, as in the teachings of the prophets, it is the mark of the righteous man to treat human life as sacred and to refrain scrupulously from inflicting unnecessary pain on man. Even the Greeks shall be brought to judgment for their barbarities and inhuman practices (Am 1:2 2; K 27:5). Among the blessings of the Messianic kingdom, predicted by the prophets, is the cessation of war with all of its attendant cruelties and horrors. The Law of Israel also reflected this tendency toward humanity, and many of its ordinances, while seemingly inhuman, really tended to mitigate prevailing barbarous customs. In fact, such ordinances are those referring to the maltreatment of slaves (Ex 21:20), to the Cities of Refuge (Nu 35:19f); cf. Josh 20), to rules of warfare (Dt 20:10 f), etc. The extermination of the Canaanites is represented as a Divine condemnation of a morally corrupt civilization (Gen 15:16; Dt 12:30). It is declared necessary in order to guard the Hebrews from contamination by the sins of the Canaanites (Ex 23:32). It is not so far back, that many of the practices that are the most esteemed in the Christian morality of our day, prevailed universally and were not thought incompatible with Christian civilization. Even our own time needs to secure a more widespread practical recognition of the principles of humanity, kindness and justice, which are professedly the law of the Christian life. L. KAISER CRUMB, krum, ψιθον, ψιθοί, "a little bit": Occurs only in the NT, of rennants of food, scraps. Lazarus desired to "be fed with the crumbs" that fell from the rich man's table' (Lk 16:21). "Every the little dogs eat out the crumbs'' (Mt 15:27; Mk 7:28), "possibly the fragments of bread on which the guests wiped their hands (after thrusting them into the common dish), and flung to the dogs" (Farrar, Life of Christ, 1, 476).

CRUSE, kroös: A small earthen vessel or flask, usually for holding liquids: γαύθος, γαύπαθος; as water, I S 26 11.12.16; I K 19 6; it being porous, the liquid is kept cool; also for holding oil, as in I K 17 12.14.16.

In I K 14:3 ("a cruse of honey") the word פֶּסֶת, בֶּשֶׁת, would be better rendered "bottle," doubtless deriving its name from the gurgling sound of issuing liquids. In 2 K 20:2 can, is not a jar or flask, but a dish, or platter, for salt or other substances.

In the NT a small jar or vial, ἀλάβαστρον, ἀλάβαστρον, "a small flask" or flask, for holding ointment; not 'box' as in AV (Mt 26:7; Mk 14:9; Lk 22:37, of 'box'; 1 K 10:18; 2 K 17:18) is used for "vial" RV. EDWARD BAGG P OLLARD

CRY, CRYING, κρίνειν, κρίνεται, κρίνομαι, "crying," [and forms], κρύος, κρέας, κρύον, κράην, (κρύον), τρίτον, τόνη; κρούω, κρόζω, κρόζω, κροσίον, κριστάλλος, "ice," believed to have been formed from water by intense cold. Thus in Rev 4 6; 21 11; 22 1, either "crystal" (RV) or "ice" (or "crystallus") suits the context. The word rendered "crystal" in Ezek 1 22 (727); κρυστάλλος is ambiguous in precisely the same way (R Vm "ice"). In Job 28 17 the context favors AV "crystal," rather than RV "glass" (4227; Ezek 2271). Finally, in Job 38 18 RV reads "crystal" for AV "pearls" (Heb gābīth; the weight of evidence favors RV in spite of the parallelism suggested by AV). See also Stoners, Precious.

CUB, kūb (םֵקֹב; AC Chub): The word occurs only in Ezk 30 5. There is almost certainly a corruption, and we should read, as in LXX, "Lub," i.e. Libya. Libya, in the earlier part of the same verse (AV), is a mistr of "Put," thus correctly rendered in RV.

CUBIT, kū'bit (םִקְבָּת, 'ammăh; פִּקְבָּה, pēkhâv): The standard for measures of length among the Hebrews. They derived it from the Babylonians, but a similar measure was used in Egypt with which they must have been familiar. The length of the cubit is variously estimated, since there seems to have been a double standard in both countries, and because we have no undisputed example of the cubit remaining to the present time. The original cubit was the length of the forearm, from the elbow to the end of the middle of the hand (Ex 30 14, Isa 48 20). The cubit mentioned in Ezk 40 5 and perhaps that of Solomon's temple, "cubits after the first measure" (2 Kgs 25 13), i.e. the ancient cubit. The ordinary cubit of commerce was shorter, and has been variously estimated at between 16 and 18 or more inches, but the evidence of the Siloam inscription and of the tombs in Pal seems to indicate 17.6 in. as the average length.

See Weights and Measures.

This was the cubit of six palms, while the other length was one of seven (Ezk 40 5). The cubit mentioned in Jgs 3 16 is from a different word in Heb (הָעָב, ābâ), and was probably shorter, for Ehud girded it on his thigh under his clothing (Jud 3 21, 25, 23). These are Mt 6 27, Lk 12 25, "Which of you . . . can add a c. unto the measure of his life?"; Jn 21 8, "about two hundred cubits off"; Rev 21 17, "the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits." H. Porter

CUCKOW, kōk'-ōkō (טָשָׁפָה, šakaph; ἁπάρος, lāros; Lat Cuculus canorus): The Heb root from which the word šakaph is derived means "to be lean" and "slender," and in older VSS of the Bible was tra' cuckow (cuckoo). It was mentioned twice in the Bible (Lev 11 16, and practically the same in Dt 14 15 AV "cuckoo"), in the list of unclean birds. The Lat term by which we designate the bird is very similar to the Arâb., and all names for it in different countries are so nearly the same that they prove themselves based on its double cry, "cuck-o," or the single note "kowk" or "gook," The bird is as old as history, and interesting because the European species placed its eggs in the nests of other birds, which gave rise to much fiction concerning its habits. The European bird is a brownish gray with white bars underneath, and larger than ours, which are a beautiful olive gray, with tail feathers of irregular length touched with white, knobbed bill black or yellow, according to species, and beautiful sleek head and shining eyes. Our birds build their own nests, attend their young with care and are much loved for their beauty. Their food is not repulsive in any species; there never was any reason why they should have been classed among the abominations, and for these reasons scientists in search of a "lean, slender" bird of offensive diet and habit have selected the "sea-mew" (q.v.) which is substituted for cuckoo in the RV with good natural-history reason to sustain the change.

CUMBER, kūm'bér, CUMBERED (καταργεῖν, katarğēn, "to make idle," περισσοῦμαι, perissoumai, "to be drawn about," mind "to be distracted"): Spoken of the barren fig tree in the parable: "Cut it down; why doth it also cumber [block up, make unproductive] the ground?" (Lk 13 7). Cumbered means to be over-occupied with cares or business; distracted: "But Martha was cumbered about much serving" (Lk 10 40). The word cumberance occurs in Lk 13 18: "How can I myself alone bear your cumberance? (קחו'א, ṭoḇaḥ, "an encumbrance," "a burden"). Cf Isa 14 14, where RV has "cumberance," RV "trouble."

Cumi, kō' mē, kī'mū. See Talitha.

CUMMIN, kūm'min (קַמְמִין, kāmū'mān; κύμινον, kūminon): The seed of the herb Cuminum cyminum (N.O. Umbelliferae). It has carminative properties and is used for flavoring various dishes, esp. during fasts. In flavor and appearance it resembles caraway, though it is less agreeable to western palates. As an illustration of Jeh's wisdom it is said (Isa 28 27) that cummin is scattered in sowing and beaten out with a rod in threshing. These facts are true in Pal today. The Jews paid tithes of cummin (Mt 23 23) (see cut on following page).

CUN, kūn (קָנָן; kān; in the one western text, ek lōn elektōn pōlelm; "from the chosen cities"); One of the cities of Hadarezer, king of Syria, spoiled by David (1 Ch 18 8, AV "Chun"). In the passages (2 8 8) its place is taken by Bereoth, which see.

Cunning, kūn'ing (קָנְתָּה, ḥakhāmim, נַפִּי), ḥāshah): In Bible-English "cunning" means always "wise" or "skilful"; the word does not occur in the bad sense, and it is found in the OT only. The chief Heb words are ḥḇāḥām, “wise,” “skilful” (2 Ch 2 7 AV “a man cunning to work in gold”; ver 13; Isa 3 3 AV, etc); ḥḇāḥāh, “to think,” “devise,” “desire” (Ex 26 131; 28 6.15 AV, etc). We have also ḏa’ā’āh, “knowledge” (K 7 14 AV); ḏῑn, “to be intelligent” (1 Ch 25 7 AV); maḥāḥēqeth, “thought,” “device,” “design” (Ex 31 4; 36 33.35 AV); ṭāmān, “artificer” (Cant 7 1 AV); yāḏāh, “to know,” once tr “cunning” (Dn 1 4 AV). For “cunning” ERV gives “skilful” (Ex 31 4, etc; Isa 3 3 “expert”); for “cunning work” the work of the “skilful workman” (Ex 26 131, etc, ERV “cunning workman”); for “curious,” “skilfully woven,” ERV “cunningly woven” (Ex 28 8, etc).

Not only were all commanded to drink of the wine (Mt 26 27), but the very irregularities in the Corinthian church point to its universal use (1 Cor 11 27). Nor does the Rom church attempt to justify its withholding the cup from the laity (the communicant cup is of a form used in the apostolic practice, or upon direct Scriptural authority. This variation from the original institution is an outgrowth of the doctrines of transubstantiation and sacramental concomitance, of the attempt to transform the sacrament of the Eucharist into the sacrifice of the Mass, and of the wide separation between clergy and laity resulting from raising the ministry to the rank of a sacerdotal order. The practice was condemned by Popes Leo I (d. 461) and Gelasius (d. 496); but gained a firm hold in the 12th cent., and was enacted into a church regulation by the Council of Constance in 1415. See also BLESSING, CUP OF.

As to the use of cups for divination (Gen 44 5), the reference is to supernaturalistic practice derived from the Gentiles. For various modes of divining what is unknown by the pouring of water into bowls, and making observations accordingly, see Geikie, Hours with the Bible, 1, 491 f, and art. DIVINATION.

CUPBEARER, kuv’bār-er ( getpid), mashakash, “one giving drink”; olvōyōs, oinochōs: An officer of high rank at ancient oriental courts, whose duty it was to serve the wine at the king’s table. On account of the constant fear of plots and intrigues, a person must be regarded as thoroughly trustworthy to hold this position. He must guard against poison in the king’s cup, and was sometimes required to swallow some of the wine before serving it. His confidential relations with the king often endeared him to his sovereign and also gave him a position of great influence. This officer is first mentioned in Scripture in Gen 40 1 ff, where the Heb word elsewhere tr “cupbearer is rendered “butler.” The phrase “chief of the butlers” (ver 2) accords with the fact that there were often a number of such officials under one as chief (cf Xen. Hellen. vii.1, 38). Nehemiah (11 11) was cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, and was held in high esteem by the king, both for his financial ability (Neh 5 8.10.14.17) would indicate that the office was a lucrative one. Cupbearers are mentioned further in 1 K 10 5; 2 Ch 9 4, where, they among other evidences of royal splendor, are indicated to have drunk before the king’s throne. Solomon’s glory. The title Rabshakeh (Isa 36 2), once thought to mean “chief of the cupbearers,” is now given a different derivation and explained as “chief of the officers,” or “princes” (DBB s.v.). CUPBOARD, kub’ēr’d (κύβερνος, κυβίκιον, 1 Mac 15 52): A kind of sideboard in or on which Simon’s gold and silver vessels were displayed, and which, among other evidences of his glory, amased the Syrian envoy Athenobius. Cf the Rom abacus, said to have been introduced into Rome from Asia.

CURDLE, kūr’i dl ( נְכָר, ṣēḇpaḥ), “to congeal,” “harden,” “curdle”: Occurs in Job 10 10, “Hast thou not... curdled me like cheese?” i.e. made him take solid form. “The formation of the embryo is a mystery on which the Heb dwells with a deep interest and reverence. Ps 136 15–16.” These similes are often met with in the Koran and oriental poetry. See Speaker’s Comm. in loc.

CURE, kār, CURES: Represents the words נֶלֶע, gāḏāh, נְכָר, מָרָפֶה, נַפָּר, rēšphāh, ḥeḇmēw, therapeuō, λυσσαίος. Gāḏāh in Prov 17 22 tr “medicine” means properly the removal of a bandage from a healed wound, and is used figuratively in Hose 5 13; curp’s, “healing,” is used in the sense of deliverance of the city in Jer 33 6; with a negative particle in 2 Ch 21 18 it is used to describe the blemish disease which改制 as invisible. The terms used for physical cures (miscus in Lk 13 32) as contradistinguished from the casting out of demons as Mt 17 16; Lk 7 21; Jn 5 10. Cure is only used in the NT in the sense of physical healing; in the OT usually in the sense of spiritual or national deliverance from disaster.

CURSE, kū-r̄s (קָוָר, ‘alāh [Nu 5 21.23.27, etc], קָוָר, me’erāh [Prov 3 33; Mal 2 2, etc], קיָר, le’ālah [Gen 27 12.13]; kār̄dā, kādrā [Gal 3 10. 13]): This word as noun and vb renders different Heb words, some of them being more or less synonymous, differing only in degree of strength. It is often used in contrast with “bless” or “blessing” (Dt 11 29). When a curse is pronounced against any person, we are not to understand this as a mere wish, however violent, that disater should overtake the person in question, any more than we are to understand that a corresponding “blessing” conveys simply a wish that prosperity should be the lot of the person on whom the blessing is invokd. A curse was considered to possess an inherent power of carrying itself into effect. Prayer has been defined as a wish referred to God. Curses (or blessings) were imprecatiion referred to supernatural beings in whose existence and power to do good or inflict harm primitive man believed. The use of magic and spells of all kinds is based on the belief that it is possible to enlist the support of the superhuman beings with whom the universe abounds, and to persuade them to do the supplicant’s wishes. It has been suggested that spells were written on pieces of parchment and past to the winds in the belief that they would find their way to their proper destination—that some demonizing being would act as postman and deliver them at the proper address. In Zec 6 (1–3) the “flying roll,” with curses inscribed on it “goeth forth over the face of the whole land.” It would find its way into the house of every thief and perjurer. But it was not always possible to commit such curses to writing, it was not enough to utter them aloud. Generally the name of some deity would be coupled with such imprecations, as Goliath cursed David by his gods (1 S 17 43). Such curses once uttered possessed the power of self-realization. It was customary of families of Israel to pay their declining years to bless their children, such a blessing being, not simply a paternal wish that their children should prosper in life, but a potent factor in determining their welfare (Gen 9 25). In this case Jacob seeks his father’s blessing, which was more than his good father’s wish for his future career. Such blessings and curses were independent of moral considerations. Before moral distinctions played any part in molding the Hebrew character, it was not necessary before a spell was pronounced that the individual against whom the spell was pronounced should be deserving, on moral grounds, of the fate which was invoked on him. It was sufficient that he should be the foe of the author of the curse. We may assume that such curses signalized the commencement of a battle. But in process of time such indiscriminate imprecations would not satisfy enlightened moral judgment. In the dramatic situation depicted in Dt (11 29; 12 f) the curse was placed on Mt. Edal and the blessing on Mt. Gerizim. But the curse was the penalty for disobedience, as the blessing was the reward for obedience. The Book of Prov (26 2) summarizes the traditional belief—the curse that is causless—alighteth on the head of the unbelieving. “In the discourses of Jesus we find blessings and curses. They are however simply authoritative declarations of the eternal connection between right doing and happiness, wrong doing and misery” (Cheyne).

Whereas curses by ordinary persons were considered more efficacious—some god being always only too glad to speed them on their way to their destination—yet special persons—“holy” persons—in virtue of their special relation to Divine beings possessed special powers of pronouncing effectual curses on account of their powers of enlisting supernatural aid. Balaam, according to the narrative in Nu (22 f), was an expert in the art. Balak was convinced that Balaam’s curse would bring about the total defeat of the Israelites (see Gray, “Numbers,” ICC.)

The term—and the thing signified—plays an important part in Paul’s interpretation of the cross. In the light of the law of all men are guilty. There is no acquittal through appeal to a law that commands and never forgives—prohibits and never relent. The violator of the law is under a curse. His doom has been pronounced. Escape is impossible. But on the cross Jesus Christ endured the curse—for “cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree” (Gal 3 10.13)—and having taken its victim is a spent force. See PUNISHMENTS.

Jesus commands His disciples, “Bless them that curse you” (Lk 6 28; cf Rom 12 14). He Himself cursed the fruitless fig tree (Mk 11 21)—a symbol of the doom that awaits false people.

Curse as the rendering of הֵרֵם, herem, implies a totally different idea (see ACCURSED). T. LEWIS

CURTAIN, kū-r̄’n, -ten, -tin: The word ordinarily used for curtain is רָעָשׁ, y’r̄’ash. Thus in Ex 26 1 ff; 36 8 ff of the curtains of the tabernacle (see TABERNACLE): in 2 S 7 2; Ps 104 2; Cant 1 5; Isa 54 2; Jer 4 20; 10 20; 49 29; Hab 3 7.

Figurative: In Isa 40 22 (like Ps 104 2, of the heavens), the word used is פָּנִי, dōk, lit. “gaze.”

CUSH, kush (ܩܘܫ, kush): (1) The first of the sons of Ham, from whom sprang Seba, H layered, Sabtah, Raasmah and Sabtcca. He was also the father of Nimrod, who founded Babylonia. Ancestor of Many Nations The meaning of the name is uncertain. (2) The name of the country around which the Gihon flowed (Gen 2 13), rendered “Ethiopia” in the AV, but in view of the distance of that country from the other rivers mentioned, this seems to be an unlikely identification. Fried.

Dehtiez has suggested (Wo lag das Paradies 74 ff) that the watercourse in question is the canal Gu-handé or Gu-handet, comparing it with the S. river Babylon a little to the E. of the Euphrates, and, flowing alongside the Festival-Street, entered the Euphrates to the N. of Nebuchadrezzar's palace. Koldeway (Tempel von Babylon und Borsippa, 38) regards the Gu-handet as the section of the Euphrates itself at this point. There is no indication, however, that the district which it enclosed was ever called Kâšu or Cush, and the suppression of the final syllable of Gu-handet would remain unexplained. Moreover, the identification of Cush with a possible Čak, for Kushu, "Chaldea," seems likewise improbable, esp. as that name could only have been applied, in early times, to the district bordering on the Persian Gulf (see CHALDEA). Another theory is, that the Cush of Gen 2 13 is the Kâšu of certain Assyrian letters, where it seems to designate a district in the neighborhood of Cappadocia. This identification apparently leads us back to an ancient tradition at some time current in the East, but later forgotten, which caused the Pyramids river to assume the name of Jhûneh (i.e. Gihon). This stream rises in the mountains N.E. of the Gulf of Alexandria, and, taking a southerly course, flows into the Mediterranean near Karashah. Though nearer than the Ethiopian Cush, this is still too far W., and therefore unsatisfactory as an identification—all the streams or waterways of the Garden of Eden ought to flow through the same region (3).

The well-known country of Cush or Ethiopia, from Syene (Ezk 39 10) southward—Egypt Kâš, Bab Kâšu, Assyrs Kâšu. (4) This name sometimes denotes the land Ethiopian (Isa 11 11; 13 1; Zeph 3 10; Ezek 29 10; Job 28 19; Est 1 1; 8 9), sometimes the people (Isa 20 4; Jer 46 9; Ezk 38 5); but it is in many passages uncertain. Notwithstanding that the descendants of Ham are always regarded as non-Semites, the Ethiopians, Gezë, regard themselves, and claim a Sem language of special interest on account of its likeness to Himyaritic, and its illustration of certain forms in Assyro-Babylonian. These Cushites were in all probability migrants from another (more northerly) district, and akin to the Cannamites—like them, dark, but by no means black, and certainly not Negroes. W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa, 113 n.) states that it cannot be proved whether the Egyptians had quite black neighbors (on the S.). In earlier times they are represented as brown, and later as brown mingled with black, implying that negroes only came to their knowledge as a distinct and extensive race in comparatively late times. Moses' first wife (Nu 12 1) was certainly therefore not a Negro, but possibly a Cushite woman, probably speaking a Sem language—prehistoric Gezë or Ethiopian (see CUSHITE WOMAN). In all probability Sem tribes were clasped as Hamitic simply because they acknowledged the supremacy of the Hamitic Egyptians, just as the non-Sem Elamites were set down as Semites (Gen 10 22) on account of their acknowledging Bab supremacy. It is doubtful whether the Hebrews, in ancient times, knew of the Negro race—they probably became acquainted with them, but not as a Sem language. (5)

In the opinion of W. Max Müller (A. und E., 112), the Egyptians, when they became acquainted with the Negroes, having no word to express this race, classed them with the nekesh, which thereafter included the Negroes. If the Hebrew name Phineas has (Pr-v'k’as) be really Egypt, and mean "the black," there is still no need to suppose that this meant "the Negro," for no Israelite

CUSH, kush (ךֶשֶׁך, kishh; LXX Xowrói, Chousel, Ps 7 title): A Benjamite, perhaps he that was "without cause" the "adversary" of David (cf Ps 7 4). See CUSHI.

CUSHAN, ki-shàn: In the Ps of Habakkuk (Hab 3 7) "the tents of C." are mentioned in an individualizing description of the effects of a theophany. Parallel is the phrase "the curtains of the land of Midian." LXX renders C., τῆς kushán, by ἄθλωρα, Αἰθιοπίαν, reading perhaps τῆς kushán, kishín, or τῆς kushán (κυστίν, kishin). The context indicates that the same land or people is intended as the OT elsewhere calls Cush, yet vaguely and not in any strict geographical usage that would limit it to Africa.

CUSHAN-RISHAIHAIM, ki-shan-rîsh-a-khîm (ךֶשֶׁךְ-רִשְׁא-הַיְם): Mentioned in Jgs 3 8–10 as a king of Mesopotamia who was chosen by God as his tool to chastise the Israelites for their idolatry. After Joshua's death the children of Israel soon began to affiliate themselves with the heathen peoples among whom they dwelt. This was the fertile source of all their troubles. God delivered ("sold") them into the hands of the heathen. C. is the first whose name is given in this connection. Barring this short passage in Jgs nothing is known of the man. Eight years the Israelites were under his dominion, when the Lord raised up a deliverer to them, Othniel, the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother—the first of the judges.

CUSHI, ki-shî: This name represents כָּשִׁי, kishî, in the original (LXX Xowrói, Chousel, Xowrói, Chous), either with or without the art. With the art (so in 2 S 19 21-32 seven out of eight times, all readings supported by LXX) it simply indicates that the person so designated was of the Cushite people, as in Jer 38 7 ff. Its use without the art is doubtless developed out of the foregoing according to the similarity of the name. For the Cush of Ps 7 title read "Cushi" with LXX.

1) The messenger (RV "the Cushite") sent by Joab to acquaint David with the victory over Absalom. That this man was in fact a foreigner is indicated by his ignorance of a shorter path which Ahimaaz took, by his being unrecognized by the watchman who recognizes Ahimaaz, and by his ignorance, as compared with Ahimaaz, of the sentiments of David, whom he knows only as a king accorded him not as a Sem language. (2)

The great-grandfather of Jehudi, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jr 36 14). The name Jehudi itself ("a man of Judah") is sufficient reiteration of the opinion that the use of C. as or in lieu of a proper name "seems to show that there were but few Cushites among the Israelites."

(3) The father of Zophaniah the prophet (Zeph 1:1).

CUSHION, kush' Iun (προσφάδλων, prosphadlōn): In NT, only in Mk 4:38 RV. The word means literally, a cushion, for a head (AV "pillow") but was also used of one for sitting or reclining upon, e.g. of a rower's cushion. The art. used with it in this passage suggests that it was one of the customary usages of the boat. It was probably similar to the cushion placed for the comfort of passengers in the stern of modern boats on the Sea of Galilee. "Silken cushions" of Am 3:12 RV is a rendering of the Heb d'mesekh from its supposed connection with damask. These cushions formed the divan, often the only article of furniture in an oriental reception room. "Cushions" occurs further in the somewhat doubtful RVm rendering of Prov 7:16; 31:22.

CUSHITE, kush' Iit: Whereas הָעָשִׁי, kushâ, is elsewhere rendered Ethiopian, in 2Sa 18:21-32 it is rendered Cushite in the RV (see Cush and of Cushite Woman). Its pl., which occurs in Zep, Dn 2, and Ch, also in the form כֵּשִׁית, kushâyim, in Am, is uniformly τρ' Ethiopians, following LXX. The other OT books use simply כֵּשׁ, kush, for people as well as land.

CUSHITE, kush' Iit (ETHIOPIAN) WOMAN: In Nu 12:1 Moses is condemned by his sister Miriam and her brother Aaron, "because of the Cushite woman τρ' ὄμην, ha'-tiskhâd ha-kush'îth whom he had married!" and the narrator immediately adds by way of needed explanation, "for he had married a Cushite woman τρ' ἰκάδθη κχποθή, tiskhâd khushtîth). Views regarding this person have been of two general classes: (1) She is to be identified with Zipporah (Ex 2:21 and elsewhere), Moses' Midianitish wife, who is here called "the Cushite," either in scorn of her dark complexion (cf Jer 13:23) and foreign origin (so most older exegetes), or as a consequence of an erroneous notion of the late age when this apocryphal addition was inserted in the narrative (so Wellhausen). (2) She is a woman whom Moses took to wife after the death of Zipporah, really a Cushite (Ethiopian) by race, whether the princess of Meroē of whom Još (Av 11, x. 2) is said (so Tarqum of Jonathan), or one of the "mixed multitude" (Ex 12:38; cf Nu 11:4) that accompanied the Hebrews on their wanderings (so Ewald and most). Dillmann suggests a compromise between the two classes of views, viz. that this woman is a mere "variation in the suga," from the wife elsewhere represented as Midianitish, yet because of this variation she was understood by the author as distinct from Zipporah. The implication of the passage, in any case, is clearly that this connection of Moses tended to injure his prestige in the eyes of race-proud Hebrews, and, equally, in that the author's opinion such a view of the matter was obnoxious to God. CUSTODY, kus' tō-dî (ץ, yâdâh, כּסְתִּי, kus'tî; pr' kud'dâh): In Est 2:3 8 bis 14, yâdâh, "the hand," is τρ' "cushion"; pr' kud'dâh, "numbering," "charge," occurs in Nu 3:36 RV "the appointed charge," m, Heb, "the office of the charge." "Custody, kus' tō-dî (ץ, yâdâh, כּסְתִּי, kus'tî; pr' kud'dâh): In Est 2:3 8 bis 14, yâdâh, "the hand," is τρ' "cushion"; pr' kud'dâh, "numbering," "charge," occurs in Nu 3:36 RV "the appointed charge."" Custody of the collectors' office; (d) τὸν, τὸμα, Mt 17:25 (RV "toll"); Rev 17:7; 1 Mac 11:35 (RV "tolls"); of 1 Mac 10:31). The tax designated by ἀλακὸς in Ex 4:13, etc. is usually taken to mean a road tax, a toll, from root ἀλακός, but cf AoF, II, 463, which derives from root ʿike, a command, a decree, hence, imposed tax. It is supposed to be a tax on merchandise or produce (as distinguished from "tribute," or the tax on houses, lands and persons), usually paid in kind and levied for the support of the native or provincial government. See also, Cambridge Bible, Ear-Neb, etc. Teleologically, NT and Mac is an indirect tax farmed out to the publicans.

CUSTOM, ku's' tōm (usage): In the OT, except Gen 31:35 where RV renders, better, "manner," "derekh," "way," the words τρ' "custom" are ἀκόν, ὀκόν, "statute," and μήσσαται, "judgment," Such passages as Jgs 11:30; Jer 32:11, and esp. Exz 3:4 (AV "custom," RV "ordinance"), illustrate the difficulty of deciding upon the proper τρ' in cases where the "custom" might be called a "usage" establish itself as "law." In Lev 18:30; Jer 10:3 the reference is to heathen religious practices.

In the NT, Lk 1:9; 2:42; Acts 6:14; 15:1 (AV "manner"); 16:21; 21:21; 28:3; 28:17 (τοῖς, τόθος), and Lk 2:27 from the same Gr root, refer likewise to definitely established religious practices; in every case except Acts 16:21, those of the Jewish law. The RV makes the τρ' of ethos uniform, rendering "custom" in Lk 2:30, also "custom," and in Jn 19:40; Acts 25:16; He 10:25 (AV "manner"). GR ἐλεός, ἐλεόθος, from the same root, is rendered "custom" in Lk 4:16 by EV, and by RV also in Acts 17:2, its only other occurrence in the NT. In Jn 18:39; 1 Cor 11:16 "custom" is the τρ' of Gr σύνεσθαι, in the meaning of "usage" rather than of "law." F. K. Farr Cut, Cutting (ץ, kârath, כּריַת, gâdâh, כּריַת, kârâh, נָלַח, nûlah; ἀποκόπτω, apokóptâ, ἀποκοπήτω, ekkoptâ): Many Heb words are τρ' "cut." Of these kârâth, "to cut down, cut off," is the most frequent. As "cut off" it is used in the sense of slaying or destroying (Gen 9:11; Dt 12:20; 1 K 11:16; 28:3) or "cutting off" transgressors from the community of Jeh, which meant probable separation, or exclusion, rather than death or destruction (Gen 17:14; Ex 12:16, 19). Other words are dâmâm, "to be silent," "cease" (Jbr 17:28 AV; 48:26 RV); "drammon" (Ps 54:5 AV; 94:23, etc); gâdâhâth, "to cut one's self," is used of cutting of one's flesh before heathen gods and in mourning for the dead, which was forbidden to the Israelites (Dt 14:1; 1 K 18:25; Jer 15:6; 41:5; 47:5); ἀξηδονήθη, "in- cision," are also used of those "cuttings of the flesh" (Lv 19:28; cf 21:5). See Cuttings in the Flesh. The cutting of the hair of head and beard in mourning for the dead is referred to in Isa 16:2; "Every heard is cut off" (gâdâhâh), and Jer 7:29, gâzâz, "Cut off thy hair [RV leadership, O Jerusalem" (cf Isa 23:12; Jer 16:6; Ezk 7:18; Am 5:10). This early and widespread practice was also forbidden to the Israelites as being unworthy of them in their relation to Jeh (Lv 19:27; Dt 14:1). Härdötheth, "carving," "engraving," is used for the "cutting of stones" (Ex 31:5; 35:33).

In the NT we have apokopátō, "to cut away" (Mk 9:43:45; Gal 5:12 AV; see Concision); diáproá, "to cut through" (Acts 13:30); diáproá, "to cut to the heart"; diabolomô, "to cut in two" (Mt 54:51); sunlêmô, "to cut together" (Rom 9:28), "finishing it and cutting it short," i.e. "making it conclusive and brief."
Among the changes of RV are “brought to silence” for “cut down” (Jer 25:37), also for “cut off” (Jer 49:26; 50:30); “sore wounded” for “cut in pieces” (Zoe 12:3); for “cut off,” “pass through” (Job 11:10), “gone” (Ps 90:10); “rolled up” (Isa 38:12); “cut off” for “destroy” (Ps 18:40; 69:4); “cut off” for “cut them in the head,” (in 11:9), “break them in pieces on the head of”; for “in the cutting off of my days” (Isa 38:10); Heb d’m, “silence,” “rest”); “noontide,” to “Or, tranquility” (Genesian, Delitzsch, etc., “in the quiet of my soul”) instead of “I would that they were even cut off which trouble you” (Gal 5:12), ERV has “cut themselves off, in mutilate themselves,” ARV “go beyond circumcision,” in “Gr, mutilate themselves.”

CUTH, kuth, CUTHUAH, k't/ha (כֹּתֹן, kāth, כּתָה כּתְּא, kāthāh, קְתוּדָה; Xoed, Choud, Xouvē, Chountch): The longer writing is better the the two, and gives the Heb form of the name of one of the cities from which Sargon of Assyria brought colonists to fill the places of the Israelites which he deported from Samaria in 772 BC (2 K 17:24-30). Probably in consequence of their predominating numbers, the inhabitants of Samaria in general were then called katîthim, or Cutheans.

Two contract-tables found at Tel-Imriham by the late Hormuzd Rassam, on which the ancient name of the place is given as Gudua or Kutu, it would seem that the on the site which has to be identified with the Ruins of Cuthah. It lies to the NE. of Babylon, and was one of the most important cities of the Baq empire. The explorer describes the ruins as being about 3000 ft. in circumference and 280 ft. high, and adjoining them on the W. lies a smaller mound, crowned with a sanctuary dedicated to Abraham (Abraham). From the nature of the ruins, Rassam came to the conclusion that the city was much more densely populated after the fall of Babylon than in earlier times. A portion of the ruins were in a very perfect state, and suggested an unfinished building

The great temple of the city was called E-meslam, and was dedicated to Nergal (cf 2 K 17:30), one of whose names was Mešlam-ta-ē. Both city and temple would seem to have been old Sumerian foundations, as the name Gudua and its later Sem form, Kutu, imply.

CUTHA, k't/ha (Koēva, Kouthi; 1 Esd 5:32, AV Coutha): Head of a family of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon; not mentioned in the canonical lists.

CUTHAH. See Cuth, Cuthah.

CUTHEAN, k't/a'n, CUTHITE, kuth/it. See Cuth; Samaritans.

CUTTING ASUNDER. See ASUNDER; DISMEMBERMENTS.

CUTTING OFF. See CONCISION; DISMEMBERMENTS.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH (קַרְּצָה, Karṣa, קַרְצָה, šaret; kārṣēth): For relatives or friends to cut or beat themselves even to free bleeding, especially in the violence of grief in mourning for their dead (see BURIAL; MOURNING), was a widely prevalent custom among ancient peoples, and is well-nigh universal among uncivilized races today (see Spencer, Prin. of Soc., 2d ed, I, 163 f). The fact is abundantly attested for most of the nations of antiquity, but there are two notable exceptions, the Egyptians (Herod. ii.61, 85; Wilke., Anc. Egypt, II, 374), and the Hebrews (Dt 14:1; Lev 21:5). According to Plutarch (Sol. 21) Solomon “instructed the women of Athens to beat themselves to the effusion of blood, and the laws of the Twelve Tables, quoted by Cic. (De leg. ii.23) contains a similar prohibition. Among the ancient Arabs the forbidden practice was associated, as among the Hebrews, with the cutting off of the hair (Wellhausen, Skizzen, III, 160 f).

That the prohibition among the Hebrews was urgently called for is made clear by the way it is dealt with by the Law and the prophets. The Law of Holiness reads: “Ye are the children of Jeh you: ye shall not cut yourselves” (Dt 14:1), or “make any incision” (קַרּץ, Karṣēth; Lev 19:28, קַרְצָה, šaret; LXX ἐφαρμός, ἐνθαμώμα) in the flesh “for the dead.” Probably the earliest reference to it is custom as actually prevalent among the Hebrews is in Hos 7:14 (ERVm).

It was widely prevalent in the time of Jeremiah among his countrymen, even as among the Philis (Jer 47:5) and the Moabites (48:37; cf Am 5:10; Isa 5:24; 15:2; 22:12; Ezek 7:14); 16:16; Ezek 7:14). In seeking for the reason or purpose underlying all such prohibitions, we may note, first, that the “cuttings” and “haldness” forbidden are alike said to be “for the dead.” Not less explicitly are they said to be incompatible with Israel’s unique relation to Jeh—a reflection at once of sonship (Dt 14:1) and of consecration (14:2). Moreover such mutilations of the body are always dealt with as forming part of the religious rites of the heathen (as of the Canaanites Baal [1 K 18:28] note “after their manner,” see art. in HDB, s. v.). Both such shedding of blood and the dedication of the hair are found in almost all countries of that day in intimate connection with the rituals of burial and the pre-sailing beliefs of propitiating the spirit of the deceased. The conclusion, then, seems clearly warranted that such tokens of grief were prohibited because they carried with them inevitably ideas and associations distinctly heathen in character and so incompatible with the Israel’s unique relation to Jeh, and unworthy of those who had attained to the dignity of the sons (“children”) of Jeh. See also MARK; STIGMATA.

CYAMON, s'ā-mon (Κυαμών, Kúamōn, Jeth 3): Probably identical with Jonean (q.v.).

CYMBAL, sim'bal. See MUSIC.

CYPRESS, sī'pres. See HOLM TREE.

CYPRIANS, sī'pri-ans (Κύπριος, Kýprioς): Occurs in 2 Mac 4:29. Menelaus who was high priest at Jerusalem, and Sostratus who was governor of the island, were summoned by King Antiochus to appear before him. “Menelaus left his own brother Lysimachus for his deputy in the highpriesthood; and Sostratus left Crates, who was over the Cyprians.” The Cyprians were the inhabitants of the island of Cyprus. Barnabas, who was Paul’s associate on his first missionary journey, was a Cyprian (Kuprios; see Acts 4:36). RV designates him as a man of Cyprus. The governor of the island was called a Cypriarch (see 2 Mac 12:2, and of Asiaich). A. W. FORTUNE

CYPRUS, νῆσος (Κύπρος, Kupros): An island situated near the N.E. corner of the Levant, in an angle formed by the coasts of Cilicia and Syria. In the OT it is called Kittim, after the name of its Phoenician Kition. The localization is expressly made by Ptolemy (Lib. VI, 1) and by the Cypriarch, Bishop Epiphanius (Haer., xxx.25). In the tablets from Tell el-Amarna it is referred to as Alasia (E. Meyer, Geseh. des Alterthums, I, §499), in Egypt records as Ais, while in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions it is named Yavan.

The island is the largest in the Mediterranean with the exception of Sardinia and Sicily, its area being about 3,584 sq. miles. It lies in 35° 30′–39° 41′ N. latitude and 32° 15′–34° 36′ E. longitude, only 46 miles distant from the nearest point of the Cilician coast and 60 miles from the Syrian. Thus from the northern shore of the island the mainland of Asia Minor is clearly visible, and Makron on the island can see Mount Ida from Eastern Cyprus. This close proximity to the Cilician and Syrian coast is a position of advantage in the relations between Asia Minor and Egypt, proved of great importance for the history and civilization of the island. Its greatest length, including the narrow channel, is 86 miles, its greatest breadth 60 miles. The S.W. portion of Cyprus is more elevated, consisting in the peaks of Troados (4,046 ft.), Madhari (3,505 ft.), Papoditis (3,124 ft.), and Mâchnara (4,674 ft.). To the N.E. of this lies the great plain of the Mesorâ, nearly 60 miles in length and 10 to 20 in breadth, in which lies the modern capital Nicosia. It is the largest watered country in the eastern Mediterranean, and is bounded on the N. by a mountain range, which is continued to the E.N. in the long, narrow promontory of Akamas, dividing in Cap Andrea, the ancient Dinarasetum. Its highest peaks are Buffavento (3,135 ft.), and Hagos Elites (3,105 ft.). The shore of this island is in the N. of these hills is steep, but remarkably gentle.

Cyprus is richly endowed by nature. Its fruits and flowers were famous in antiquity. Strabo, writing under Alexander, speaks of it as producing wine of the best quality, as well as very rich and elegant oil.

3. Products and oil in abundance and corn sufficient for the needs of its inhabitants (XIV. 634). The elder Pliny refers to Cyprian salt, alum, kypsiom, mica, unguents, iodamium, storax, resin and precious stones, including agate, Jasper, amethyst, lapis lazuli and several species of rock crystal. Its list includes the diamond (xviii.7.68) and the emerald (xviii.7.69). In addition to these there is rock crystal and the beryl are intended. The chief source of the island’s wealth, however, is the oil to be found in its olive and forested forests. This is mentioned by Strabo (loc. cit.) among its products; copper, which was first mentioned by Herodotus, and the silver of the island was extensively mined there from the earliest period down to the Middle Ages; iron too was found in considerable quantities, and could be smelted. The island, however, did not possess a central forest, and the richly important were the forests, which at an early date are said to have covered almost the whole island. The cypress seems to have been the principal tree, but Pliny tells of a giant cedar, 130 Rom feet in height, feigned in Cypriarch, and the island supplied timber for shipping to many successive powers.

The original inhabitants of Cyprus appear to have been a race akin to the peoples of Asia Minor. Its vast resources in copper and timber were an important factor in the commerce and wide commercial relations at a very remote period. Its wealth attracted the attention of Babylonia and Egypt, and there is reason to believe that it was conquered by Sargon I, king of Assyria, and later by Tyre, the S. Phoenicians, and by the XVIIIth Egyptian Dynasty (1501–1447 BC). But the influences which moulded its civilization came from other quarters also. Excavation has shown that in Cyprus were several seats of the Minoan culture, and their fragments of script, which are strong evidence of the Crete. The Minoan writing may well be the source of the curious Cyprian syllabic script, which continued in use for the representation of the Greek language down to the 4th century BC (A. J. Evans, Scripta Minora, I). But the Minoan origin of the Cyprian syllabary is still doubtful, for it may have been derived from the Hittite hieroglyphs. Phoen influences too were at work, and the Phoen settlements—Citium, Amathus, Paphos and others—together with the very early date of the Minoan civilization was followed by a “Dark Age,” but later the island received a number of German settlers from Arcadia and other Hellenic states, as we judge not only from the Crith tradition but from the evidence of the Cypriarch dialect, which is closely akin to the Arcadian. In 709 BC Sargon II of Assyria made himself master of Cyprus, and tribute was paid by its seven princes to him and to his grandson, Esarhaddon (681–667 BC). The overthrow of the Assyrian Empire probably brought with it the independence of Cyprus, but it was conquered afresh by Aahmose (Amsais) of Egypt (Herod. ii. 182) who retained it till his death in 526 BC; but in the following year the defeat of his son and successor Psamtek III (Psammeneus) by Cambyses brought the island under Pers dominion (Herod. iii.9, 19).

4. Early History.

The island is mentioned by Homer (Homer. Iliad, xxii.54). In 501 the Gr inhabitants led by Onesius, brother of the reigning prince of Salamis, rose in revolt against the Persians, but were decisive defeated by Cyprian (Herod., ii. 182). In 499 BC we find 150 Cyprian ships in the navy the Greeks with which Xerxes attacked Greece (Herod., vii.90). The attempts of Pausanias and of Cratius to win Cyprus for the Hellenic cause met with but poor success, and the withdrawal of the Athenian forces from the Levant after their great naval victory off Salamis in 449 was followed by a strong anti-Hellenic movement throughout the island led by Abclemon, prince of Cratius. In 430 BC, Miltiades set fire to the fortifications of Salamis and set to work to assert Hellenic influence and to champion Hellenic civilization. He joined with Pharnabazus the Pers satrap and Conon the Athenian to overthrow the naval power of Sparta at the battle of Cynos in 394, and in 387 revolted from the Persians. He was followed by his son Nicoleus, to whom Isocrates addressed the famous panegyric of Euagoras and who formed the subject of an enthusiastic eulogy by the same writer. Cyprus seems to have been a great power, if we judge by the Pers rule, but after the battle of Issus (333 BC) it voluntarily gave in its submission to Alexander the Great and rendered him valuable aid at the siege of Tyre. One year later (332) he bequeathed the island to the Polyeides of Egypt. It was, however, seized by Demetrius Poliorcetes, who defeated Polyeides in a hotly contested battle off Salamis in 306. But eleven years later it came into the hands of the Polyeides and remained a province of Egypt or a separate but dependent kingdom until the invasion of Rome (cf. 2 Mac 10 13). We hear of a body of Cyprians, under the command of a certain Cato, serving among the troops of Antiochus Ehphanes of Syria and forming part of the garrison of Jerusalem (2 Mac 172 BC). (1 Mac. 4 24.)

This interpretation of the passage seems preferable to that according to which Crates had been governor of Cyprus under the Polyeides before entering the service of Antiochus.

5. Cyprus annexation. The reigning prince, a and Rome brother of Polyeides Auletes of Egypt, received the offer of an honorable retirement and a large pension, but he preferred to end his life by poison, and treasures amounting to some 7,000 talents passed into Roman hands, together with the island, which was attached to the province of Cilicia. In the partitation of the Rom empire between Senate and Emperor, Cyprus was at first (27–22 BC) an imperial province (Dio Cassius lxi.12), administered by a proconsul, appointed by the imperial legate of Cilicia. In 22 BC, however, it was handed over to the Senate together with southern Gaul in exchange for Dalmatia (Dio Cassius lxi.12, lv.4) and was subsequently governed by ex-praetors bearing the honorary title of proconcol and residing at Paphos. The names of about a score of these governors are known to us from ancient authors, inscriptions and coins and will be found in D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, App. Among them is Sergius Paulus, who was consul and resident at the time of Paul’s visit to Paphos in 46 or 47 AD, and we may notice that the title applied to him by the writer of the Acts (13 7) is strictly accurate.

7. Cyprus and the Jews before the time of Alexander the Great. Cyprus was the number one Jewish residence during the Ptolemies was considerable (1 Mace 15 23; 2 Mace 12 2) and it must have been increased later when the copper mines of the island were farmed to Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. vii 5; xix, xxvi, cf CIG, 2628). We shall not be surprised, therefore, to find that at Salamis there was more than one synagogue at the time of Paul’s visit (Acts 13 5). In 116 AD the Jews of Cyprus rose in revolt and massacred no fewer than 240,000 Gentiles. Hadrian crushed the rising with great severity and drove all the Jews from the island. Henceforth no Jew might set foot upon it, even under stress of shipwreck, on pain of death (Cassius llxvii.22).

In the life of the early church Cyprus played an important part. Among the Christians who fled from Judaea in consequence of the persecution which followed Stephen’s death in Jerusalem (Acts vii 59) travelled far in Cyprus as Phoenicia, and Cyprus thereafter preaching to the Jews only.

8. The Church of Cyprus. Certain natives of Cyprus and Crete took a further momentous step in preaching at Antioch to the Greeks also (Acts 11 20). Even before this time Joseph Barnabas, a Levite born in Cyprus (Acts 4 36), was prominent in the early Christian community at Jerusalem, and it was in his native island that he and Paul, accompanied by Barnabas’ nephew, John Mark, began their first missionary journey (Acts 13 4). After landing at Salamis they passed through the whole island to Paphos (Acts 13 6), probably visiting the Jewish synagogues in its cities. The Peugtinger Table tells us of two roads from Salamis to Paphos in Roman times, one of which lay inland by way of Hermapolis, Tamassus and Soli, a journey of about 4 days, while the other and easier route, occupying some 3 days, ran along the south coast by way of Citium, Amathus and Curium. Whether the ‘ earthquakes, sickness and plagues ’ recorded by the writer of the Acts are a reference to the converts made at this time or had previously embraced Christianity we cannot determine (Acts 21 16).

Barnabas and Mark revisited Cyprus later (Acts 15 39), but Paul did not again land on the island, though he sighted it when, on his last journey to Jerusalem, he sailed south along the coast by way from Patara in Lycia to Perga (Acts 21 3), and again when on his journey to Rome he sailed ‘ under the lee of Cyprus,’ that is, along its northern coast, on the way from Sidon to Myra in Lycia (Acts 27 4).

In 401 AD the Council of Cyprus was held at Salamis, chief in consequence of the enmity of Theophilus of Alexandria, the invertebrate opponent of Origenism, and took measures to check the reading of Origen’s works. The island, which was divided into 13 bishoprics, was declared autonomous in the 5th cent., after the alleged discovery of Matthew’s Gospel in the tomb of Barnabas at Salamis. The bishop of Salamis was made metropolitan by the emperor Zeno with the title ‘archbishop of all Cyprus,’ and his successor, who now occupies the see of Nicoria, still enjoys the privilege of signing his name in red ink and is primate over the three other bishops of the island, those of Paphos, Kition and Kyrenia, all of whom are of metropolitan rank.

Cyprus remained in the possession of the Rom and then of the Byzantine emperors, who frequently and temporarily occupied the Saracens, until 1184, when its ruler, Isaac Comnenus, broke away from Byzantium and declared himself an independent emperor. Nevertheless, he was finally subdued by Richard I of England, who bestowed it on Guy de Lusignan, the titular king of Jerusalem, whose descendants occupied it until 1489. In that year it was ceded to the Venetians by Catherine Cornaro, widow of James II, the last of the Lusignans, and remained Venetian until 1797, when it was captured by the Ottoman Turks under Sultan Selim II, who invaded and subjugated the island in 1570 and laid siege to Famagusta, which, after a heroic defence, capitulated on August 1, 1571. Since that time Cyprus has formed part of the Turkish empire and has been subject to a series of events down to 1878; since 1878, however, it has been occupied and administered by the British government, subject to an annual payment to the Sublime Porte of £29,800 and a large quantity of salt. The High Commissioners, who reside at Nicosia, is assisted by a Legislative Council of 18 members. The estimated population in 1907 was 249,250, of whom rather more than a fifth were Moslems and the remainder chiefly members of the Gr Orthodox church.

CYRAMA, si-r̥ma,’si-r̥-ma-. See KIRAMA.

Cyrnē, sī-rēnē (Kynē, Kurnē, “wall”): Cyrene was a city of Libya in North Africa, lat. 32° 20′ N., long. 22° 13′ E. It lay W. of the modern Ténès, one of the ranges of mountains separated by a portion of the Libyan desert, and occupied the territory now belonging to Barca and Tripoli. It was situated on an elevated plateau about 2,000 ft. above the sea, from which it was protected on all sides except one by a high range of mountains lies to the S., about 90 miles NNE. This shelters the coast land from the scorching heat of the Sahara. The range drops down toward the N. in a series of terrace-like elevations, thus giving to the region a great variety of climate and vegetation. The soil is fertile.

Cyrene was originally a Gr colony founded by Baitus in 690 BC. Because of the fertility of the soil, a vast variety in climate and vegetation, together with its commercial advantages in location, the city soon rose to great wealth and importance. Greater fame, however, came to it through its distinguished citizens. It was the home of Callimachus the poet, Carneades the founder of the New Academy at Athens, and Eratosthenes the mathematician. To these must be added, from later times, the elegant ancient Christian writer Synesius. So important did this Gr colony become that, in little more than half a century, Amasis II of Egypt formed an alliance with Cyrene, marrying a Gr lady of noble, perhaps royal, birth (Herod. ii.181). Ptolemy III (Euergetes I), 231 BC, incorporated Cyrene with Egypt. The city continued, though with much restlessness, a part of the Gr empire until Apion, the last of the Ptolemies, willed it to Rome. It henceforth belonged to a Rom province.

In the middle of the 7th cent., the conquering Saracens took possession of Cyrene, and from that time to this it has been the habitation of wandering tribes of Arabs.

Cyrene comes into importance in Bib. history through the dispersion of the Jews. Ptolemy I, son of Lagus, transported Jews to this and other cities of Libya (Jos, Cap, Importance II, 4) and from this time on Jews were very numerous there. By the return of the Jews of the Dispersion to the feasts at Jerusalem, Cyrenians came to have a conspicuous place in the NT history. "A man of Cyrene, Simon by name," was caught by the Rom soldiers and compelled to bear the cross of Jesus (Mt 27:32; cf Mk 15:21; Lk 23:26). See CYRENIAN. Jews from Cyrene were among those present on the day of Pentecost. Their city appears as one of the important points in the wide circle of the Dispersion described by Peter in his sermon on that occasion (Acts 2 10). Cyrenian Jews were of sufficient importance in those days to have their name associated with a synagogue at Jerus (6 9). And when the persecution arose about Stephen, some of these Jews of Cyrene who had been converted at Jerusalem, were scattered abroad and came with others to Antioch and preached the word "unto the Jews only" (11 19, 20 AV), and one of them, Lucius, became a prophet in the early church there. In this case, as in so many others, the wise providence of God in the dispersion of the Jews in preparation for the spread of the gospel of the Messiah is seen.

In the ruins of Cyrene are to be seen the remains of some beautiful buildings, and a few sculptures have been removed. The most interesting remain of the wonderful civilization of this Gr colony are in a great system of tombs, some built, but the finest cut in the solid rock of the cliff. Doric architecence and brilliant decorative painting adorn these tombs.

CYRENIAN, si-ri'ni-ăn, CYRENIANS (Kyprianos, Kyririnos, "a native or inhabitant of Cyrene"): Two Jews of Cyrene are mentioned in the NT, viz. Simon (Mk 15 21 and Lk 23 26 AV) who was impressed to bear the Lord's cross (Mk 15 21 RVm), and Lucius, a Christian teacher at Antioch (Acts 13 1). See CYRENE; LUCIUS; Simon. For CYRENIANS see CYRENE.

CYRENIUS, si-ri'ni-us (Kyprios, Kyririos, "of Cyrene"): See QUINNIUS.

CYRIA, si'-rî-a (Kuria, Kuriâ): The word means "lady," feminine of lord, and is so treated in AV and the text of RV (2 Jn ver 5 RVm). But it is possible that the word is a proper name, and this possibility is recognized by placing Cyria, the usual transliteration of the word, in the margin by RV.

The son of the earlier Cambyses, of the royal race of the Achemenians. His genealogy, as given by himself, is as follows: "I am Cyrus, king of the host, the great king, the mighty king, king of Tindir [Babylon], king of the land of Sumere and Akkad, king of the four regions, son of Cambyses, the great king, king of the city Anzan, grandson of Cyrus, the great king, king of the city Anzan, great-grandson of Šispâš [Teispes], the great king, king of the city Anzan, the all-enduring royal seed whose sovereignty Del and Nebu live, etc (WÆI, V, pl. 35, 20–22).

As, in the Bab inscriptions, Anzan (Anzan, Anzan) is explained as Elam—the city was, in fact, the capital of that country—it is probable that Cyrus’ name was Elamite; but the meaning is doubtful. The Anzan or old Gr etymology connecting it with khûr, "the sun," in Persian, may therefore be rejected. According to Strabo, he was at first called Agradates, the name by which he was universally known being taken from that of the river Cyrus. This, however, is more likely to have been the reason why his grandfather (after whom he was probably named) was called Cyrus. Several versions of his birth and rise to power are recorded. Herodotus (i.5) mentions three. In that which he quotes (i.107 ff), it is said that Mandane was the daughter of the Median king Astyages, who, in connexion (Herodotus) sequence of a dream which he had had, foretelling the ultimate triumph of her son over his dynasty, gave her in marriage to a Persian named Cambyses, who was not one of his peers. A second dream caused him to watch for her expected offspring, and when this child came into the world Astyages delivered the child to his relative, Harpagus, with orders to destroy it. Being unwilling to do this, he handed the infant to a shepherd named Mitradates, who, his wife having brought forth a still-born child, consented to spare the life of the infant Cyrus. Later on, in consequence of his imperious acts, Cyrus was recognized by Astyages, who came to learn the whole story, and spared him because, having once been made king by his companions in play, the Magians held the prediction of Aryan-Ahura, that the royal station was to have been fulfilled. The vengeance taken by Astyages upon Harpagus for his apparent disobedience to orders is well known: his son was slain, and a portion, disguised, given him to eat. Though filled with grief, Harpagus concealed his feelings, and departed with the remains of his son's body; and Cyrus, in due course, was sent to stay with his parents, Cambyses and Mandane. Later on, Harpagus persuaded Cyrus to induce the Persians to revolt, and Astyages having blindly appointed Harpagus commander-in-chief of the Median army, the last-named went over to the side of Cyrus. The result was an easy victory for the latter, but Astyages took care to impale the Magians who had advised Harpagus in his plan. Having gathered another, but smaller, army, he took the field in person, but was defeated and captured. Cyrus, however, who became king of Media as well as of Persia, treated him honorably and well.

4. His Origin (Xenophon), 1. 8. 12. Cambyses, the father of Cyrus, was king of Persia. Until his 12th year, Cyrus was educated in Persia, where he was sent for, with his mother, by Astyages, to whom he was a son of the first instance. Astyages is said to have been succeeded by his son Cyaxares, and Cyrus then became his commander-in-chief, subduing, among others, the Lydians. He twice defeated the Assyrians ( = Babylonians), his first conquest of the country being while the Median king was still alive. As, however, the Cyropaedia is a romance, the historical details are not of any great value.

Nicolaus of Damascus describes Cyrus as the son of a Median satrap named Atrades, his mother's name being Argoosti. While in service in the palace of Astyages, he was adopted by Artembaris, a cupbearer, and thus obtained prominence. Cyaxares, with his banditti, father strapp of Persia, and, with base ingratitude, plotted against his king and benefactor. The preparations for a revolt having been made, he and his general Obiras were victorious at Hyrbo, but were defeated at Parsagadae, where his father Atrades was captured and later on died. Cyrus now took refuge in his mountain home, but the taunts of the women sent him and his helpers forth again, this time to victory and dominion.

Cyrus now took refuge in his mountain home, but the taunts of the women sent him and his helpers forth again, this time to victory and dominion.

6. His Origin (Ctesias), 7. 32. Cyrus, and was there hidden by his daughter Amytis, and Spitamezer husband. Had not Astyages yielded, Cyrus, it is said, would have tortured them, with their children. Cyrus afterward liberated Astyages, and married his daughter Amytis, whose husband he had put to death for telling a falsehood. The Persians have been so satisfied at the reconciliation of Cyrus with Astyages and his daughter, that they voluntarily submitted. Cyrus is said by Ctesias to have been taken prisoner by the Saece, but he was ransomed. He died from an illness in battle with the Derboas, assisted by the Indians.

In the midst of so much uncertainty, it is a relief to turn to the contemporary documents of the Babylonians, which, though they do not speak of Cyrus' youth in detail, and refer only to other periods of his career in which they were more immediately interested, may nevertheless, being contemporary, be held to have an all due value.

7. Babylonian Records of His Reign of the Cylinder of Nabonidus. According to the inscriptions, the conflict with Astyages took place in 549 BC. From the cylinder of Nabonidus we learn that the Medes had been very successful in their warlike operations, and had gone even as far afield as Haran, which they had besieged. The Babylonian King Nabonidus desired to carry out the instructions of Merodach, revealed in a dream, to restore the temple of Sin, the Moon-god, in that city. This, however, in consequence of the siege he could not do, and it was revealed to him in a dream that the power of Astyages would be overthrown at the end of three years, which happened as predicted. "They [the gods Sin and Merodach] have given [Merodach] a young servant, with his little army, to raise up against him [the Median]; he destroyed the wide-spreading Urman-manda [Medes], Istuwegu [Astyages], king of the Medes, he captured, and took [him] prisoner to his [own] hand." This incident is reported in the Babylonian Chronicle (which is, perhaps, Cyrus' own), as follows: "[Astyages] gathered his army, and went against Cyrus, king of Anian, to capture him, and [as for] Astyages, his army was captured.

8. The Babylonian Chronicle went to the land of Ecbatana, his royal city. He carried off from Ecbatana silver, gold, furniture, merchandize, and took to the land of Anian the furniture and merchandize which he had captured.

The above is the entry for the 6th year of Nabonidus, which corresponds with 549 BC, and it will be noticed that he is here called "king of Anian." The next reference to Cyrus in the Chronicle is the entry for Nabonidus' 9th year (546 BC), where it is stated that "Cyrus, king of the land of Parsu [Persia], gathered his army, and crossed the Tigris below Arbela," and in the following month (Iyyar) entered the land of the Medes, where he [Merodach's army], having taken a bribe, garrisoned the place, and afterward a king ruled there. The passage, however, is imperfect, and therefore obscure, but we may, perhaps, see therein some preparatory move on the part of Cyrus to obtain possession of the tract over which Nabonidus claimed dominion.

The next year (545 BC) there seems to have been another move on the part of the Persians, for the Elamite governor (?) is referred to, and had apparently some dealings with the governor of Ecbatana. All this time things seem to have been the same in Babylonia, the king's son (he is not named, but apparently Belshazzar is meant) and the soldiers remaining in Akkad (possibly used in the old sense of the word, to indicate the district around Sippar), where it was seemingly expected that the main attack would be delivered. The reference to the governor of Ecbatana might imply that some conspiracy was on foot more to the south—a movement of which the native authorities possibly remained in ignorance.

After a gap which leaves four years unaccounted for, we have traces of four lines which mention the goddess Istar of Ecbatana, and the gods of the land of Par... (?Persia) are referred to. After this comes the long entry, which, though the date is broken away, must refer to the 17th year of Nabonidus. A royal visit to a temple is referred to, and there is mention of revolt. Certain religious ceremonies were then performed, and others omitted. In the month Tammus, Cyrus seems to have fought a battle in Opis, and succeeded in attacking the army of Akkad situated on the Tigris. On the 14th of the month, Sennacherib was taken, without fighting, and Nabonidus fled. On the 16th Ugharu (Gobryas) governor of Media, entered Babylon, with the army of Cyrus, without fighting, and there Nabonidus was captured with his followers. At this time E-saggil and the temples of the land seem to have been closed, possibly to prevent the followers of Nabonidus from taking sanctuary there, or else to prevent plotters from coming forth; and on the 3d of Marcheswan (October), Cyrus entered Babylon. "Crowds collected before him, proposing peace for the city; Cyrus commanded peace of Babylon, all of it." Gobryas, his vice-regent, then appointed governors in Babylon, and the gods whom Nabonidus had taken down to Babylon, were returned to their shrines. On the night of the 11th of Marcheswan, Ugharu was sent against (some part of Babylon), and the son of the king died; and there was mourning for him from the 27th of Adar to the 3d of Nisan (six days). There is some doubt as to whether the text speaks of the king or the son of the king, but as there is a record that Nabonidus was exiled to Carmania, it would seem most likely that the death of Belahazzar "in the night" is here referred to. The day after the completion of the festival of Nisan, Cambyses, son of Cyrus, performed ceremonies in the temple E-nig-lad-kalamana, probably in connection with the new year’s festival, for which Cyrus had probably timed his arrival at Babylon. According to Herodotus (1.191), Babylon was taken during a festival, agreeing with Diodorus 5 1 ff.

The other inscription of Cyrus, discovered by Mr. H. Rassam at Babylon, is a kind of proclamation justifying his seizure of the crown. He states that the gods commanded peace of Babylon (of the various cities of Babylonia) forsook their dwellings in anger that he (Nabonidus) had made them enter within Su-anna (Babylon). Merodach, the chief divinity of Babylona, was the king of the city of his heart, whose hand he might hold—Cyrus, king of Anshar, he called his title—to all the kindred together (his) name was proclaimed.

The glory of Cyrus’ conquests probably appealed to the Babylonians, for Cyrus next states that Merodach placed the whole of the troops of Qutá (Media) under his feet, and the whole of the troops of the Manda (barbarians and mercenaries). He also caused his hands to hold the people of the dark head (Asiatics, including the Babylonians), and the righteous—ten thousand that he might understand. He commanded that he should go to his city Babylon, and walked by his side as a friend and a companion—without fighting and battle Merodach caused him to enter Su-anna. By his high command, the kings of every region from the upper sea to the lower sea (the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf), the kings of the Amorites, and the dwellers in tents, brought their valuable tribute and kissed his feet within Su-anna (Babylon). From Nineveh (?), the city A-Susa, Agara, the cities of the Mede, of the volunteers, of Mâ-Turn, said, and Dur, to the borders of Media, the gods inhabiting them were returned to their shrines, and all the people were collected and sent back to their dwellings. He finishes by soliciting the prayers of the gods to Bel and Nebo for length of days and happiness, asking them also to appeal to Merodach on behalf of Cyrus “his worshipper,” and his son Cambyses.

It was probably between the defeat of Astyages and the capture of Babylon that Cyrus defeated Cambyses. Certain religious ceremonies were then performed, and others omitted. In the month Tammus, Cyrus seems to have fought a battle in Opis, and succeeded in attacking the army of Akkad situated on the Tigris. He commanded that he should go to his city Babylon, and walked by his side as a friend and a companion—without fighting and battle Merodach caused him to enter Su-anna. By his high command, the kings of every region from the upper sea to the lower sea (the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf), the kings of the Amorites, and the dwellers in tents, brought their valuable tribute and kissed his feet within Su-anna (Babylon). From Nineveh (?), the city A-Susa, Agara, the cities of the Mede, of the volunteers, of Mâ-Turn, said, and Dur, to the borders of Media, the gods inhabiting them were returned to their shrines, and all the people were collected and sent back to their dwellings. He finishes by soliciting the prayers of the gods to Bel and Nebo for length Bab inscriptions do not reproduce Bab opinion, but the fact that on the occasion of the siege of Babylon the people trusted to his honor and came forth asking peace for the city (apparently with every confidence that their request would be granted); and that the Babylonians, as a whole, were contented under his rule, may be regarded as tacit recognition. Nabonius, before the invasion of his territory by the Pers forces, was evidently well disposed toward him, and looked upon him, as we have seen, as "the young servant of Merodach," the patron deity of Babylon. It is not altogether clear, however, why the Babylonians submitted to him with so little resistance—their inscriptions contain no indication that they had real reason to be dissatisfied with the rule of Nabonius— he seems to have been simply regarded as an alien, of a different religion, to be accepted better in that respect.

16. Why Did Cyrus' prophecy about the Babylonians and the Jews be held to supply a sufficient reason, though it does not redound to the credit of Bab patriotism. It has been said that the success of Cyrus was in part due to the aid given him by the Jews, who, recognizing him as a monotheist like themselves, gave him more than mere sympathy; but it is probable that he could never have conquered Babylonia had not the priests, as indicated by their own records, spread discontent among the people. It is doubtful whether we may attribute a higher motive to the priesthood, though that is not altogether impossible. The inner teaching of the Bab polytheistic faith was, as is now well known, monotheistic, and there may have been, among the priests, a desire to have a ruler holding that to be the true faith, and also not so inclined as Nabonius to run counter to the people's (and the priests') prejudices. Jewish influence would, in some measure, account for this.

If the Jews thought that they would be more sympathetically treated under Cyrus' rule, they were not disappointed. It was he who gave orders for the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerus (2 Ch 35 23; Ezr 1 2 2; 5 13; 6 3), restored the vessels of the House of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away (1 Ch 13), and also granted funds to build cedar trees from Lebanon (3 7). But he also restored the temples of the Babylonians, and brought back the images of the gods to their shrines. Nevertheless the Jews evidently felt that the favor he granted them showed sympathy for them, and this it probably was which caused Issiah (44 28) to see in him a "shepherd" of the Lord, and an anointed king (Messiah, τύχροφος μου, τέθρισαν μου, Isa 41 1)—a title suggesting to later writers that he was a type of Christ (Hieron., Comm. on Isa 44 1).

From Persia we do not get any help as to his character, nor as to the estimation in which he was held. His only inscription extant is above his idealized bas-relief at Susa in Murghâb, where he simply writes: His Bas-relief shows Cyrus standing, looking to the right, draped in a fringed garment resembling those worn by the ancient Babylonians, reaching to the feet. His hair is combed back in the Pers style, and upon his head is an elaborate crown, two horns extending to front and back, with a uræus serpent rising from each end, and between the serpents three vase-like objects, with discs at their bases and summits, and serrated leaves between. There is no doubt that this crown is symbolic of his dominion over Egypt, the three vase-like objects being modifications of the triple helmet-crown of the Egyptian deities. The king is represented as four-winged in the Assyro-Babylonian style, probably as a claim to divinity in their hierarchy as well as to dominion in the lands of Merodach and Asûr. In his right hand, which is raised to the level of his shoulder, he holds a kind of scepter seemingly terminating in a bird's head—in all probability also a symbol of Bab dominion, though the emblem of the Bab cities of the South was most commonly a bird with wings displayed.

DAGGER, dag'âr. See Armor, Arms.

DAGON, dâ'gon (דַּגוֹן, āhāshān; apparently derived from דג, dâgh, "fish"): Name of the god of the Philis (according to Jerome on Isa 41 19 the Phili generally); in the Bible Dagon is associated with Gaza (Jgs 16) but elsewhere with Ashdod (cf 1 S 6 and 1 Mac 11 39; 14 7); in 1 Ch 10 10 there is probably an error (cf the passage 1 S 31 10). The god had his temple ("the house of Dagon") and his priests. When the ark was captured by the Philis, it was conducted to Ashdod where it was placed in the house of Dagon by the side of the idol. But on the morrow it was found that the idol lay prostrate before the ark of the Lord. It was restored to its place; but on the following day Dagon again lay on the ground before the ark, this time with the head and both hands severed from the body and lying upon the mishâdôn (the word is commonly interpreted to mean "threshold"); according to Winckler, it means "pedestal"); the body alone remained intact. The Heb says: “Dagon alone remained.” Whether we resort to an emendation (דָּגוָן, dāgōn, “his fish-part”) or not, commentators appear to be right in inferring that the idol was half man, half fish. Classic authors give this form to Derceto. The sacred writer adds that from that time on the priests of Dagon and all those that entered the house of Dagon refrained from stepping upon the miṣpāhṭ of Dagon. See 1 S 5 1–5. The prophet Zephaniah (1:9) speaks of an idolatrous practice which consisted in leaping over the miṣpāhṭ. The Septuagint in 1 S 5:1 indeed adds the clause: “but he did not want to leap.” Leaping over the threshold was probably a feature of the Phil ritual which the Hebrews explained in their way. A god Dagon seems to have been worshipped by the Canaanites; see Bethe-DDAGON.

DAILY, dālī: This word, coming as it does from the Heb דָּלִי, yōm, “day,” and the Gr ἡμέρα, hēmēra, suggests either day by day (Ex 18 15), that which is prepared for one daily (Neh 6 18), as e.g. our “daily bread,” meaning bread sufficient for that day (Mt 6 11); or day by day continuously, one day after another in succession, as “the daily burnt offering” (Nu 29 6 AV), daily ministration (Acts 10 14), and “daily in the temple” (Act 5 42 AV). The meaning of the word “daily” as used in the Lord’s Prayer (Mt 6 11) seems to indicate sufficient for our need, whether we consider that need as a day at a time, or day after day as we are permitted to live. “Give us bread sufficient for our sustenance.”—WILLIAM EVANS

DAILY OFFERING, or SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICE.

DAINTIES, dān’tis, DAINTY (MEATS) (תּוֹנְסָה, tōnasah, “things full of taste,” ἀρετὴς, man’ammin, ἀρετή, ma’adābdān; ἀράπας, ἀράπας, “fat,” “shining”): Jacob is represented as predicting of Asher, “He shall yield royal d.” (Gen 49 20; cf § clause, “His bread shall be fat,” and Dt 33 23). The so-called “fat fish of Egypt; Eilat” (Ps 78 35) David is praying to be delivered from the ways of “men that work iniquity,” cries, “Let me not eat of their d.” (Ps 141 4). The man who sitteth “to eat with a ruler” (Prov 23 1–5) is counseled, “if thou be a man of marked d., be not desirous of his d.; seeing they are deceitful food” (cf John’s words in the woes upon Babylon [Rev 18 14], “All things that were d. and sumptuous are perished from thee, and Homer’s Iliad [Pope, xviii. 536]). “Dainties,” then, are luxuries, costly, delicate and rare. This idea is common to all the words thus rendered; naturally associated with kings’ tables, and with the lives of those who are lovers of pleasure and luxury. By their associations and their softening effects they are to be abstained from or indulged in moderately as “deceitful food!” by those who would live the simple and righteous life which wisdom sanctions. They are also “offered not from genuine hospitality, but with some by-ends.” He should also shun the dainties of the niggard (Prov 23 6), who counts the cost (ver 7 RVm) of every morsel that his guest eats. See DELICATE; FOOD, etc.

DAISAN, dā’san, dā’i-san (Δαίσαν, Daisan): Head of a family of temple servants (1 Esd 5 31) called Bezirin in Ezra 2 58; Neh 7 50, the interchange of D and R in Heb being not uncommon.

DAKUBI, da-kū’bi, da-kō’bi (Δακοῦβ, Dakōub, Δακοῦβ, Dakoubi; AV Dacobi): Head of a family of gate-keepers (1 Esd 5 28) called “Akub” in the canonical lists.

DALAIH, da-lā’a, da-lā’a: See DELAIH.

DALON, dā’lan (Δαλόν, Dalôn; AV Dalan): Head of a family that returned to Jerusalem, but which “could shew neither their families, nor their stock, how they were of Israel” (1 Esd 5 37); corresponds to Delaiha (Ezr 2 60). Another reading is “Asan.”

DALE, dal, KING’S ( אלה, ‘emek ha-melekh): (1) “Absalom in his lifetime had taken and reared up for himself the pillar, which is in the king’s dale” (2 S 18 18). According to Jos (Ant. VII. x, 3) this was a marble pillar, which he calls “Absalom’s hand” and it was two furlongs from Jerus. Warren suggests that this dale was identical with the KING’S GARDEN (q.v.), which he places at the open valley formed at the junction of the Tyropeon with the Kidron (see JERUSALEM). The so-called Absalom’s Pillar, which the Assyrians still hold, is in the Reproduction of Absalom’s disobedience, and which a comparatively recent tradition associates with 2 S 18 18, is a very much later structure, belonging to the Graeco-Roman period, but showing Egypt influence. (2) King’s Vale (Gen 14 17; AV dale). See King’s Vale; VALE. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

DALETH, dā’leth (ד, ד): The 4th letter of the Heb alphabet, and as such used in Ps 119 to designate the 4th section; transcribed in this Encyclopaedia with the daqesh as d, and, without, as dh (= th in the). It came also to be used for the number four (4), and with the daqesh for 4000. With the apostrophe it is sometimes used as abbreviation for the tetragrammaton. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

DALLY, dā’li: Occurs in Wisd 12 26: “But they that would not be reformed by that correction wherein he dailleth with them” (ταιριαζον εκτρισφερον, παιριαζον επιτιμεσθον, “child play of correction”), the reference being to the earlier and lighter plagues of Egypt: Ezr 6 7. The name Dali was probably used in the past tense, thus indicating past a d., “by a correction which was as children’s play,” Gr (as above). He first tried them by those lighter infestations before sending on them the heavier. In later usage “daily” implies delay.

DALMANUTHA, da-lam’n-tha. See MAGA-
        D. Cf Mk 8 10; Mt 15 39.

DALMATIA, dal-ma’ti-a (Δαλματία, Dalmatia, “deceitful!”): A district of the Rom empire lying on the eastern shore of the Adriatic. Writing from Rome to Timothy during his second imprisonment (in 66 or 67 AD, according to Ramsey’s chronology), Paul records the departure of Titus to Dalmatia (2 Tim 4 10). The name is made use of by special mission, and we cannot tell whether his object was to traverse regions hitherto unevangelized or to visit churches already formed. Nor can we determine with certainty the meaning of the word Dalmatia as here used. Originally it denoted the land of the barbarous Dalmatae or Dalmatae, a warlike Illyrian tribe subjigated by the Romans after a long and stubborn resistance; it was then applied to the southern portion of the Rom province of Illyricum, lying between the river Titus (mod. Kerka) and the Macedonian frontier; later the name was extended to the entire province. On the whole it seems most probable that the apostle uses it in this last sense. See further s.v. ILLYRICUM.

MARCUS N. TOD
DALPHON, dal'fon (דַּלְפֹּן, dalphony, "crafty"): The second of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews (Est 9 7).

DAM (דָּמָּם, 'em, ordinary Heb word for "mother"): Heb law prohibited the destruction of the "dam" and the young of birds at the same time, commanding that if the young be taken from a nest the dam be allowed to escape (Dt 22 6,7). In the same spirit it enjoined the taking of an animal for slaughter before it had been seven days with its "dam" (Ex 22 30; Lev 22 27; cf Ex 23 19).

DAMAGE, dam'áj (דָּמָּג, bábhádá): This word expresses any inflicted loss of value or permanent injury to persons or things. "Why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings?" (Ezr 4 22). In Prov 26 6 "damage" means "wrong," "injury" (Heb בֶּן, bámda). The tr of Est 7 4 is doubtful: "Although the adversary could not have compensated for the king's damage" (RV 'for our affliction is not to be compared with the king's damage'); AV 'the king's damage could not be compared with the king's damage'; but Heb Пֶּג (Peg) (Est 7 4) and Aram. פֶּזֶק (Pezek) (Est 7 4) have the meaning of "molestation" or "annoyance" (see Ges.-Buhl Dict. [15th ed] 489, 806, 906). We therefore ought to read 'for that oppression would not have been worthy of the molestation of the king' (Est 7 4) and 'that the king should have no molestation' (Dnl 6 2). The Gr γιῆ, zemia, "loss" and γιῶνα, zemitéo, "to cause loss"; RV therefore translates Acts 27 10 "will be with injury and much loss" (AV 'damage'), and 2 Cor 7 9 "but ye might suffer loss by us in nothing" (AV 'damage'). A. L. BRESLAUB

DAMARIS, dam'-a-ris (דָּמָּרִיס, Damaris, possibly a corruption of דָּמָּלִיס, dalmalis, "a healer"): The name of a female Christian of Athens, converted by Paul's preaching (Acts 17 34). The fact that she is mentioned in this passage together with Dionysius the Areopagite has led some, most probably in error, to regard her as his wife. The singing out of her name with that of Dionysius may indicate some personal or social distinction. Cf Acts 17 12.

DAMASCENE, dam'-a-sen (דָּם-אֶסֶּנְ, damassen, דָּמָּסָק, דָּמָּסָכְ, "of the city of Damascus"): The inhabitants of Damascus under Aretas the Arabian are so called (2 Cor 11 32).

The Eng. name is the same, as the Gr Δαμασκός, Damaskos. The Heb name is פֶּג (Peg), Damassen, but the Aram. form פֶּג (Peg), Damesek, occurs in 1 Ch 16 5; 2 Ch 23 5. The name appears in Egyptian inscriptions as Ti-mas-ku (16th cent. BC), and Sa-ra-mas-ki (13th cent. BC), which W. M. Müller, Asien u. Europa, 227, regards as representing Tri-ras-mas-ki, concluding from the "ra" in this form that Damascos had by that time passed under Aram. influence. In the Am Tobs the forms Ti-mas-keg and Bi-mas-ke are pointed to. The Arab. name is Dimashk esh-Sham ("Damascus of Syria") usually contrasted to Esch-Sham simply. The meaning of the name Damascus is unknown. Esch-Sham (Syria) means "the left," in contrast to the Yemen (Arabia) = "the right."

Damascus is situated (33° 30' N. lat., 36° 18' E. long.) in the N.W. corner of the Ghuta, a fertile plain about 2,300 ft. above sea level.

2. Situation. W. of Mt. Hermon. The part of and Natural the Ghuta E. of the city is called el-

Features The river Barada (see Abana) flows through Damascus and waters the plain, through which the Nahar el-Avaj (see Pharpar) also flows, a few miles S. of the city. Surrounded on three sides by bare hills, and bordered on the E., its open side, by the desert, its well-watered and fertile Ghuta, with its streams and fountains, its fields and orchards, makes a vivid impression on the Arab of the desert. Arab. lit. is rich in praises of Damascus, which is described as an earthly paradise. To see Damascus is to the Arab see a part of his homeland, and as he approaches it, he feels the praises are exaggerated, and it is perhaps only in early summer that the beauty of the innumerable fruit trees—apricots, pomegranates, walnuts and many others—justifies enthusiasm. To see Damascus is to the Arab see an ideal city, and as he approaches it, he feels as if he were visiting his homeland. The Barada (Abana) is the life blood of Damascus. Confined in a narrow gulf until close to the city, where it spreads itself in many channels over the plain, only to lose itself in a few miles as it sinks into the marshes of the desert, its whole strength is expended in making a small area between the hills and the desert really fertile. That is why a city on this site is inevitable and permanent. Damascus, almost defenceless from a military point of view, is protected by the desert and factory of inland Syria. In the course of its long history it has more than once enjoyed and lost political supremacy, but in all the vicissitudes of political fortune it has remained the natural harbor of the Syrian desert.

Damascus lies along the main stream of the Barada, almost entirely on its south bank. The city is about a mile long (E. to W.) and about half a mile broad (N. to S.). It is built on a south side a long suburb, consisting for the most part of a single street, called the Meidan, stretches for a mile beyond the line of the city wall, terminating at the Bavuweat Allah, the gate of God, the starting point of the Haj, the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. The city has thus roughly the shape of a broad-headed spoon, of which the Meidan is the handle. In the Gr period, a long, colonnaded street ran through the city, doubtless the street which is called Dussus; (Acts 9 11). This street, along the course of which remains of columns have been discovered, runs westward from the Babeshe-Sherki, the "East Gate." Part of it is still called Derb el-Mustakim ("Straight Street"), but it is not certain that it has borne the name through all the intervening cent. It runs between the Jewish and Christian quarters (on the left and right, respectively, going west), and terminates in the Suk el-Mudahiyyeh, a bazaar built by Midhat Pasha, on the north side of which is the main Moslem quarter, in which are the citadel and the Great Mosque. The houses are flat-roofed, and are usually built round a courtyard, in which is a fountain. The streets, with the exception of Straight Street, are mostly narrow and tortuous, but on the west side of the city there are some good covered bazaars. Damascus is not rich in antiquities. The Omayyad Mosque, or Great Mosque, replaced a Christian church, which in its time had taken the place of a pagan temple. The site was doubtless occupied from time immemorial by that which was the religious edifice of the city. A small part of the ancient Christian church is still extant. Part of the city wall has been preserved, with a foundation going back to Rom times, surmounted by Arab work. The traditional site of Paul's escape (Acts 9 25; kingdom in Damascus. Rezon, son-of Eliada, an officer in the army of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, escaped in the hour of defeat, and became a captain of banditti. Later he established himself in Damascus, and became its king (1 K 11 23f). He cherished a not unnatural animosity against Israel, and the rise of a powerful and hostile kingdom in the Israelitish frontier was a constant source of anxiety to Solomon (1 K 11 25).

(2) The Aramaean kingdom (cir 950-732 BC).—Whether Rezon was himself the founder of a dynasty is not clear. He has been identified with Hezon, father of Tab-rimmon, and grandfather of Ben-hadad (1 K 15 18), but the identification, though a natural one, is insecure. Ben-hadad (Bir-idri) is the first king of Damascus, after Rezon, of whom we have any detailed knowledge. The disruption of the Heb kingdom afforded the Aramaeans an opportunity of playing off the rival Heb fell before Ramoth-gilead, and his death relieved Ben-hadad of the only neighboring monarch who could challenge the supremacy of Damascus. Paul gives light upon the history of Damascus at this time by the Assyrian inscriptions. In 854 BC the Assyrians defeated a coalition of Syrian and Palestine states (including Israel) under the leadership of Ben-hadad at Karkar. In 849 and 846 BC renewed attacks were made upon Damascus by the Assyrians, who, however, did not effect any considerable conquest. From this date until the fall of the city in 732 BC the power of the Aramaean kingdom depended upon the activity or quiescence of Assyria. In 854 BC, when Ben-hadad and usurped his throne cir 844 BC, was attacked in 842 and 839, but during the next thirty years Assyria made no further advance westward. Hazael was able to devote all his energies to his western neighbors, and Israel suffered severely at his hands. In 803 Mari' of Damascus, who is probably identical with the Ben-hadad of 2 K 13 3, Hazael's son, was made tributary to Ramman-nirari III of Assyria. This blow weakened Aram, and afforded Jerusalem an opportunity of avenging the defeats inflicted upon his country by Hazael. In 773 Assyria again invaded the territory of Damascus. Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 BC) pushed vigorously westward, took Damascus, and made Hazael pay tribute. A year or two later he reverted, and attempted in concert with Pekah of Israel, to coerce Judah into joining an anti-Assyrian league (2 K 15 37; 16 5; Isa 7). His punishment was swift and decisive. In 754 the Assyrians advanced and laid siege to Damascus, which fell in 732. Rezin was executed, his kingdom was overthrown, and the city suffered the fate which a few years later befell Samaria.

(4) The middle period (cir 732 BC-650 AD).—Damascus had now lost its political importance, and for more than two centuries, we have only one or two inconsiderable references to it. It is mentioned in an inscription of Sargon (722-705 BC) as having taken part in an unsuccessful insurrection along with Hamath and Arpad. There are incidental references to it in Jer 49 23 ff and Ezek 18 17; 47 16 ff. In the Pers period Damascus, if not politically of great importance, was a prosperous city. The overthrow of the Persian empire by Alexander was soon followed by the establishment of the Seleucid kingdom of Syria, with Antioch as its capital, and Damascus lost its position as the chief city of Syria. The center of gravity was moved toward the sea, and the maritime commerce of the Levant became more important than the trade of Damascus with the interior. In 111 BC the Syrian kingdom was divided, and Antiochus Cyzicenus became king of Coele-Syria, with Damascus as his capital. His successors, Demetrius Eusebius and Antiochus Dionysus, had troubled careers, being involved in domestic conflicts and in wars with the Parthians, with Alexander Jannaeus of Judea, and with Aretas the Nabataean, who obtained possession of Damascus in 85 BC. Tigranes, being of Armenia, held Syria for some years after this date, but was defeated by the Romans, and in 64 BC Pompey finally annexed the country. The position of Damascus during the first cent. and a half of Rom rule in Syria is obscure. For a time it was in Rom hands, and from 31 BC - 33 AD its coins bear the names of Augustus or Titus. Subsequently it was again in the hands of the Nabataeans, and was ruled by an ethnarch, or governor, appointed by Aretas, the Nabataean king. In these cases, it refers to the political and ecclesiastical position, in which the city was regarded by the bishops who held it. In 2 Cor 11 32f. Paul places it as a Roman city. In the early history of Christianity Damascus, as compared with Antioch, played a very minor part. It is memorable in Christian history on account of its associations with Paul's conversion at the scene of his earliest Christian preaching (Acts 9 1-25). All the NT references to the city relate to this event (Acts 9 1-25; 22 5-11; 26 12,20; 2 Cor 11 32f; Gal 1 17).

Afterward, under the early Byzantine emperor, Damascus, though important as an outpost of civilization on the edge of the desert, continued to be, second to Antioch, the center of Moslem politics. It was not until the Arab conquest (634 AD) that it passed out of Christian hands, and reverted to the desert, that it once more became a true capital.

(4) Under Islam.—Damascus has now been a Moslem city, or rather a city under Moslem rule, for nearly thirteen centuries. For about a cent. after 650 AD it was the seat of the Omeyyad caliphs, and enjoyed a position of preeminence in the Moslem world. Later it was supplied by Bagdad, and in the 10th cent. it came under the rule of the Fatimides of Egypt. Toward the close of the 11th cent. the Seljuk Turks entered Syria and captured Damascus. In the period of the Crusades the city, though never of decisive importance, played a considerable part, and was for a time the headquarters of Saladin. In 1300 it was plundered by the Tartars, and in 1399 Timur released an enormous ransom from it, and carried off its famous armories, thus robbing it of one of its most important industries. Finally, in 1516 AD, the Ommans Turks under Sultan Selim conquered Syria, and Damascus became, and still is, the capital of a province of the Ottoman Empire.

DAMMSEEK ELIEZER (Gen 15 2 ERV). See ELIEZER (1).

DAMN, dam, DAMNATION, dam-nâ'shun, DAMNABLE, dam-na'ab-l: These words have undergone a change of meaning since the time of the LXX. They are derived from Lat damnare—to inflict a loss, to condemn, and that was their original meaning in Eng. Now they denote exclusively the idea of everlasting punishment in hell. It is often difficult to determine which meaning was intended by the translators in AV. They have been excluded altogether from RV. The words for which they stand in AV are:

(1) δικλίζω, apôleia, "destruction," trd "damnable" and "condemnation" only in 2 Pet 21 3 (RV "destructive," "destruction"). False prophets taught doctrines calculated to destroy others, and themselves incurred the sentence of destruction such as overtook the fallen angels, the world in the Deluge, and the cities of the Plain. Apôleia occurs otherwise 16 times in the NT, and is always trd in AV and RV by either "perdition" or "destruction": twice of waste of treasure (Mt 26 8 = Mk 14 4); twice of the beast that comes out of the abyss and goes into perdition (Rev 17 8,11). In all other cases, it refers to men, and defines the destiny that befalls them as the result of sin: Judas is the "son of perdition" (Jn 17 12). Peter consigns Simon Magus and his money to perdition (Acts 8 20).
Some men are “vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction” (Rom 9:22), and others, their “end is perdition” (Phil 3:19). It is the antithesis of salvation (He 10:39; Phil 1:28). Of the two ways of life, one leads to destruction (Mt 7:13). Whether it is utter, final and irretrievable destruction is not stated.

(2) ἑρωός, κρίνω, ἐδρέας "dammned" only in AV of 2 Thess 2:12 (RV “judged”) means “to judge” in the widest sense, “to form an opinion” (Lk 7:43), and forensically “to test and try” an accused person. It can only acquire the sense of “judging guilty” or “condemning” in the modern context. In the OT, (3) κατάρξω, κατακρίνω, ἐδρέας “dammned” only in AV of Mk 16:16; Rom 14:23 (“condemned in RV”), means properly “to give judgment against” or “to condemn” and is so tr. 17 t. in AV and always in RV.

“Judgment” may be neutral, an impartial use of the judge weighing the evidence (so in Mt 7:2; Acts 24:25; Rom 11:33; 1 Cor 6:2; 1 Pet 4:17; Rev 20:4) and “lawsuit” (1 Cor 6:7); or it may be inferred from the context that judgment is unto condemnation (so in Rom 2:2; 5:16; 10:1; Rev 19:14; 22:6; and Rom 13:2; 1 Cor 11:29). In places where κρίμα and κρίσις are rightly tr. “condemnation,” and where “judgment” regarded as an accomplished fact involves a sentence of guilt, they together with κατακρίνω define the relation of a person to the supreme authority, as that of a criminal, found and held guilty, and liable to punishment. So the Roman empire regarded Jesus Christ, and the thief on the cross (Lk 23:40; 24:20). But generally these words refer to man as a sinner against God, judged by Him, and liable to the just penalty of sin. They imply nothing further as to the nature of the penalty or the state of man undergoing it, nor as to its duration. Nor does the word “eternal” (αἰωνίως, ἐνδικηθῆναι, ἐνδικηθῆσθαι τῷ ἐναρέου) or “everlasting” (ἐναρέω, ἐναρέω) in AV when added to them, determine the question of duration. Condemnation is an act in the moral universe, which cannot be determined under categories of time.

These terms define the action of God in relation to man’s conduct, as that of the Supreme Judge, but they express only one aspect of that relation which is only fully conceived, when coordinated with the more fundamental idea of God’s Fatherhood. See ESCHATOLOGY; JUDGMENT.

DAMSEL, dam·zel·: A young, unmarried woman; girl (lass) (Acts 21:9); maiden (Fr. in Mt 26:69; Jn 18:17; Acts 12:13; 16:16 gives “maid” for παιδία, παιδίτσα, “a girl,” i.e. (spec.) a maid-servant or young female slave (AV “damsel”), and “child” for παιδία, παιδίον, “a half-grown boy or girl,” in Mk 5:30:40bis:41.

DAN [דָּן, dān, “judge”]: Δάν, Dān: The fifth of Jacob’s sons, the first borne to him by Bilhah, the maid of Rachel, to whom, as the child of her slave, he legally belonged. At his birth Rachel, whose barrenness had been an obstacle to her trial, had exclaimed “God hath judged me” (Gen 30:6). He was full brother of Naphtali. In Jacob’s blessing there is an echo of Rachel’s words, “Dan shall judge his people” (Gen 49:16). Of the patriarch Dan almost nothing is recorded. Of his sons at the settlement in Egypt only one, Hushim, is mentioned (Gen 46:23). The name in Nu 26:43 is Shuham. The tribe however stands second in point of numbers on entering Israel 62,700 men of war (Nu 1:39); and at the second census they were 64,400 strong (26:43). The standard of the camp of Dan in the desert march, with which were Asher and Naphtali, was on the north side of the tabernacle (Nu 2:25; 10:25; of Josh 6:9 AV “gathering host”). The prince of the tribe was Ahiezer (Nu 1:12). Among the spies Dan was represented by Ammiel the son of Gemalli (13:12). Of the tribe of Dan was Othniel (AV “Ahohish”) one of the wise-hearted artificers engaged in the construction of the tabernacle (Ex 31:6). One who was stoned for blasphemy was the son of a Danite woman (Lev 24:10). At the ceremony of blessing and anointing, Japhlet of the tribe of Dan stood on Mount Gerizim once while the other tribes were on Gerizim (Dt 27:13). The prince of Dan at the division of the land was Bukki the son of Jogli (Nu 34:22).

The territory assigned to Dan adjoined those of Ephraim, Benjamin and Judah, and lay on the western slopes of the mountain. The 3. Territory reference in Jgs 5:17: “And Dan, why did he remain in ships?” seems to mean that Dan had expected a naval attack. It is a glimpse of the difficulty. We are told that the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain (Jgs 1:34), so they did not enjoy the richest part of their ideal portion, the fertile plain between the mountain and the sea. The strong hand of the house of Joseph kept the Amorites tributary, but did not drive them out. Later we find Dan oppressed by the Philis, against whom the heroic exploits of Samson were performed (Jgs 14 ff.). The expeditions of the Danites recorded in Jgs 18 is referred to in Josh 19 47 ff. The 4. Danite Raid conditions prevailing in those days. Desiring an extension of territory, the Danites sent young men who reconnoitred for them upon Laish, a city at the north end of the Jordan valley. The people, possibly a colony from Sidon, were careless in their fancied security. The land was large, and there was “no want of anything that was in the earth.” The expedition of the 600, their dealings with Micah and his priest, their capture of Laish, and their founding of an idol shrine with priestly attendant, illustrate the strange mingling of lawlessness and superstition which was characteristic of the time. The town being captured the city of Laish they called Dan—see following art. Perhaps 2 Ch 2 14 may be taken to indicate that the Danites intermarried with the Philonicians. Divided between its ancient seat in the S. and the new territory in the N. the tribe retained its place in Israel for a time (1 Ch 12:35; 27:22), but it played no part of importance in the subsequent history. The name disappears from the genealogical lists of Ch. and it is not mentioned among the tribes in Rev 7:5 ff.

Samson was the one great man produced by Dan, and he seems to have embodied the leading characteristics of the tribe: unsteady, unscrupulous, violent, possessed of a certain grim humor; stealthy... in tactics—"a serpent in the way, an adder in the path" (Gen 49:17)—but swift and strong in striking—"a lion's whelp, that leapeth forth from Bashan' (Deut 32:11). Dan ranked as a city in which the true customs of old Israel were preserved (2 S 20 18 LXX). W. EWING

DAN: A city familiar as marking the northern limit of the land of Israel in the common phrase "from Dan even to Beer-sheba" (Jgs 20 1; 1 S 3 20, etc.). Its ancient name was Luah or Leshem (Jgs 18 7, etc.). It was probably an outlying sellosettlement of Tyre or Sidon. Its inhabitants, pursuing the ends of peaceful traders, were defenseless against the onset of the Danite raiders. Having captured the city the Danites gave it the name of their own tribal ancestral (Jgs 16). It lay in the valley near Beth-rehob (ver 28). Jos places it near Mt. Lebanon and the fountain of the lesser Jordan, a day's journey from Sidon (Ant, V, iii, 1; VIII, viii, 4; BJ, IV, i, 1). Onom says it lay 4 Rom miles from Paneeas on the way to Tyre, at the source of the Jordan. This points decisively to Tell Kadiyeh, in the plain W. of Banias. The mound of this name—Kadiyeh is the exact Arab. equivalent of the Heb Dan—rises from among the bushes and reeds to a height varying from 40 to 80 ft. The largest of the hillocks of the Jordan rises on the west side. The waters join with those of a smaller spring on the other side to form Nahar el-Ledden which flows southward to meet the streams from Banna and Hasbeijeh. The mound, which is the crater of an extinct volcano, has a certain aura that remains on the south side, while the tomb of Sheik Maruzk is sheltered by two holy trees. The sanctuary and ritual established by the Danites persisted as long as the house of God was in Shiloh, and the priesthood in this idolatrous shrine remained in the family of Jonathan till the conquest of Tiglath-pileser (Jgs 18 30; 2 K 15 29). Here Jeroboam I set up the golden calf. The ancient sanctity of the place would tend to promote the success of his scheme (1 K 15 20; 2 Ch 16 4). It was regained by Jeroboam II (2 K 14 25). It shared the country's fate at the end of Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15 29).

It was to this district that Abraham pursued the army of Chedorlaomer (Gen 14 14). For Dr. G. A. Smith's suggestion that Dan may have been at Bannias see HGL, 473, 480. F. W. EWING

DANDLE, dan'dlé (דנָלֶשׁ, sh'd'ëšh'ah', a Pulpal form, from root דלש, sh'dà', with sense of to be caressed'). Occurs in Isa 66 12, 'shall be dandled upon the knees.'

DANGER, dan'jér: Danger does not express a state of reality but a possibility. In Mt 5 21 f, however, and also AV Mk 3 29 (RV "but is guilty of an eternal sin") the expression "danger" refers to a certainty, for the danger spoken of is in one case judgment which one brings upon himself, and in the other the committing of an unpardonable sin. Both are the necessary consequences of a man's conduct. The reason for translating the Gr σκότειν, σκότος (lit. "to be held in anything so one cannot escape") by "is in danger," instead of "guilty" or "liable," may be due to the translator's conception of these passages as signs of judgment, and the warning against such an act rather than as a statement of the judgment which stands pronounced over every man who commits the sin. A. L. BRESLICH to give the interpretation thereof. The wise men having said that they could not tell the dream, nor interpret it as long as it was untold, the king threatened them with death. Daniel, who seemed not to have been concerned when the other wise men read before the king, when he was informed of the threat of the king, and that preparations were being made to slay all of the wise men of Babylon, himself and his three companions included, boldly went in to the king and requested that he would appoint a time for him to appear to show the interpretation. Then he went to his house, and he and his companions prayed, and the dream and its interpretation were made known unto Daniel. At the appointed time, the dream was explained and the four Hebrews were loaded with wealth and given high positions in the service of the king. In the 4th chapter, we have recorded Daniel's interpretation of the dream of Nebuchadnezzar about the great tree that was hewn at the command of an angel, thus prefiguring the insanity of the king.

Daniel's third great appearance in the book is in ch 5, where he is called upon to explain the extraordinary writing upon the wall of Belshazzar's palace, which foretold the end of the Medes and the incoming of the Medes and Persians. For this service Daniel was clothed with purple, a chain of gold put around his neck, and he was made the third ruler in the kingdom.

Daniel, however, was not merely an interpreter of other men's visions. In the last six chapters we have recorded four or five of his own visions, all of which are taken up with revelations concerning the future history of the great world empires, especially in their relation to the people of God, and predictions of the final triumph of the Messiah's kingdom.

In addition to his duties as seer and as interpreter of signs and dreams, Daniel also stood high in the governmental service of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius the Mede, and perhaps also of Cyrus. The Book of Dan, our only reliable source of information on this subject, does not tell us much about his duties and performances. It does say, however, that he was chief of the wise men, that he was in the gate of the king, and that he was governor over the whole province of Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar; that Belshazzar made him his third ruler in the kingdom; and that Darius made him one of the three presidents to whom his hundred and twenty satraps were to give account; and that he even thought to set him over his whole kingdom. In all of these positions he seems to have conducted himself with faithfulness and judgment. While in the service of Darius the Mede, he aroused the antipathy of the other presidents and of the satraps. Unable to find any fault with his official acts, they induced the king to make a decree, apparently general in form and purpose, but really aimed at Daniel alone. They saw that they could find no valid accusation against him, unless they found it in connection with something concerning the law of his God. They therefore caused the king to make a decree that no one should make a request of anyone for the space of thirty days, save of the king. Daniel, having publicly prayed three times a day as he was in the habit of doing, was caught in the act, accused, and on account of the irrevocableness of a law of the Medes and Persians, was condemned - with the decree to be cast into a den of lions. The king was much troubled at this, but was unable to withhold the punishment. However, he expressed to Daniel his belief that his God in whom he trusted continually would deliver him; and so indeed it came to pass. For in the morning, when the king drew near to the mouth of the den, and called to him, Daniel said that God had sent His angel and shut the mouths of the lions. So Daniel was taken up unharmed, and at the command of the king his accusers, having been cast into the den, were destroyed before they reached the bottom.

Daniel, Daniel, Book of:

I. Name.—The Book of Dan is rightly so called, whether we consider Daniel as the author of it, or as the principal person mentioned in it.

II. Place in the Canon.—In the Eng. Bible, Dan is placed among the Major Prophets, immediately after Ekr, thus following the order of the Sept and of the Lat Vulg. In the Heb Bible, however, it is placed in the third division of the Canon, called the Kethuvim or writings, by the Hebrews, and the hagapographies, or holy writings, by the Seventy. It has been considered that Dan was placed by the Jews in the third part of the Canon, either because they thought the inspiration of its author to be of a lower kind than was that of the other prophets, or because the book was written after the second or prophetical part of the Canon had been closed. It is more probable, that the book was placed in this part of the Heb Canon, because Daniel is not called a nāḇīhī ("prophet"), but was rather a hāḵeḵ ("seer") and a bāḵāh ("wise man"). None but the works of the nāḇīhīs are thus included in the second part of the Jewish Canon, the third being reserved for the heterogeneous works of seers, wise men, and priests; or for those that do not mention the name or work of a prophet, or that are poetical in form. A confusion between the office of the interpreter of the King's dreams and that of the prophet is used to render the two Heb words nāḇīhī and hāḵeḵ. In the Scriptures, God is said to speak to the former, whereas the latter see visions and dream dreams. Some have attempted to explain the position of Daniel by assuming that he had the prophetic gift, without holding the prophetic office. It must be kept in mind that all reasons given to account for the order and place of many of the books in the Canon are purely conjectural, since we have no historical evidence bearing upon the subject earlier than the time of Jesus ben Sirach, who wrote probably about 180 BC.

III. Divisions of the Book.—According to its subject-matter, the book falls naturally into two great divisions, each consisting of six chapters, the first portion containing the historical sections, and the second the apocalyptic, or predictive, portions; though the former is not devoid of predictions, nor the latter of historical statements. More specifically, the first chapter is introductory to the whole book; the second contains the marvelous events in the history of Daniel and his three companions in their relations with the rulers of Babylon; and chs 7-13 narrate some visions of Daniel concerning the great world-empires, esp. in relation to the kingdom of God.
According to the languages in which the book is written, it may be divided into the Aram. portion, extending from 2:4b to the end of ch. 7, and a Heb. portion embracing the rest of the book.

V. The language of the book is partly Heb. and partly a dialect of Aram., which has been called Chaldee, or Bib. Aram. This Aram. is almost exactly the same as that which is found in the MSS of Dn. or whether it was a peculiarity of the Bib. Aram. as distinguished from the Heb., or whether it was due to the unifying, scientific genius of Daniel himself, we have no means at present to determine. In view of the fact that the later Papyri often use the d sign to express the dh sound, it seems fatuous to insist on the ground of the writing of these two sounds in the Book of Dn., that it cannot have been written in the Pers. period. As to the use of koph and ayin for the Aram. sound which corresponds to the Heb. aleph, when equivalent to an Arab. dadd, any hasty conclusion is debarred by the fact that the Aram. papyri of the 5th cent. BC, the MSS of the Sam. Tg. and the Mandae MSS written from 600 to 900 AD all employ the two letters to express the one sound. The writing of aleph and he without any proper discrimination occurs in the papyri as well as in Dn.

The only serious objection to the early date of Dn. upon the ground of its spelling is that which is based upon the use of a final n in the pronoun suffix of the second and third persons masc. pl. instead of the n of the Aram. papyri and of the Zakir and Sendeschrii inscriptions. It is possible that Dn. was influenced in this by the corresponding Heb. usage by the Mandaeic dialects of the Aram. agree with the Bab. in the formation of the phonetic suffixes of the second and third persons masc. pl., as against the Heb. Aram., Minaean, Sabaean and Ethiopic. It is possible that the occurrence of n in some west Aram. documents may have arisen through the influence of the Heb. Phoen., and that pure Aram. always had n just as we find it in Assy and Bab., and in all east Aram. documents thus far discovered.

This is the case that the Heb. Dn. as a pre-formative of the third person masculine of the imperfect proves a Palestinian provenience has been shown to be untenable by the discovery that the earliest Assyrian and Syr. also used a. (See M. Fognon, Inscriptions sémitiques, première partie, 17.)

This inscription is dated 73 AD. This proof that in the earlier stages of its history the east Aram. was in this respect the same as that found in Dn. is confirmed by the fact that the forms of the 3d person of the imperfect found in the proper names of the Aram. docket of the Assyrian inscription also have the preformative a. (See CIS, II, 47.)

V. Purpose of the Book.—The book is not intended to give an account of the life of Daniel. It gives neither his lineage, nor his birthplace, nor his death, nor his age, nor the events of his long career. Nor is it meant to give a record of the history of Israel during the exile, nor even of the captivity in Babylon. Its purpose is to show how by His providential guidance, His miraculous interventions, His foreknowledge and almighty power, the God of heaven controls the destinies of the whole world. The ars of nations, the lives of Heb. captives and of the mightiest of the kings of the earth, for the accomplishment of His Divine and benevolent plans for His servants and people.

VI. Unity of the Book. The unity of the book was first denied by Spinoza, who suggested that the first part was taken from the chronological works of the Chaldaens, basing his supposition upon the difference of language between the former and latter parts. Newton followed Spinoza in suggesting two parts. But recent researches about the unity of ch. 7, where the narrative passes over from the 3d to the 1st person, Köhler follows Newton, claiming, however, that the visions were written by Daniel of the exile, but that the first 6 chapters were composed by a later writer who elaborated the story. Von Orelli holds that certain prophecies of Daniel were enlarged and interpolated by a Jew living in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, in order to show his contemporaries the bearing of the predictions of the book upon their times of oppression. Zeckler and Lange hold to the unity of the book in general; but the former thought that 11:5-45 is an interpolation; and the latter, that 10:1-11:44 and 12:5-13:3 were have been interpolated in the original MSS. The latter holds that the Aram. portions existed as early as the times of Alexander the Great—a view to which Strack also inclines. Eichhorn held that the book consisted of ten different original sections, which are bound together merely by the circumstance that they are all concerned with Daniel and his three friends. Finally, De Lagarde, believing that the fourth kingdom was the Rom., held that ch. 7 was written about 69 AD. (For the best discussion of the controversy as to the unity of Dn., see Eichhorn, Einleitung, §§ 612-19, and Buhl in RE, IV, 449-51.)

VII. Genuineness.—With the exception of the neo-Platonic Porphyry, a Gr non-Christian philosopher of the 3d cent., the genuineness of the Book of Dn. was denied by no one until the rise of the deistic movement in the 17th cent. The attacks upon the genuineness of the book have been based upon (1) the predictions, (2) the miracles, (3) the text, (4) the language, (5) the historical statements.

The assailants of the genuineness of Dn. on the ground of the predictions found therein, may be divided into two classes—those who deny prediction in general, and those who claim that the apocalyptic character of the predictions of Dn. is a sufficient proof of their lack of genuineness. The first of these two classes includes properly those who deny the mere Christian unity, but that the answer of the question of the contents of the book and the answering of them may safely be left to those who defend the doctrines of theism, and particularly of revelation. The second class of assailants is, however, of a different character, since it consists of those who are sincere believers in Christianity and predictive prophecy. They claim, however, that certain characteristics of definiteness and detail, distinguishing the predictive portions of the Book of Dn. from other predictions of the OT, bring the genuineness of Dn. into question.

The kind of prediction found here, ordinarily called apocalyptic, is said to have arisen first in the 2d cent. BC, when parts of the Book of Enoch and of the Sibylne Oraclies were written; and a main characteristic is to be that it records past events as if they were still future, thus bringing the speaker back into some distant past time. for the purpose of producing on the reader the impression that the book contains real predictions, thus gaining credence for the statements of the writer and giving consolation to those who are thus led to believe in the providential foresight of God for those who trust in Him.

Since those who believe that God has spoken unto man by His Son and through the prophets will not be able to set limits to the extent and definiteness of the revelations which He may have seen fit to make through them, nor to prescribe the method, style, time and character of the revelations, this attests the genuineness of Dn1. It would be safe to be left to the defenders of the possibility and the fact of a revelation. One who believes in these may logically believe in the genuineness of Dn1, as far as this objection goes. That there are spurious apocalypses no more proves that all are spurious than that there are spurious gospels or epistles proves that there are no genuine ones. The spurious epp. of Philarius do not prove that Cicero's Letters are not genuine; nor do the false statements of 2 Mac, nor the many spurious Acts of the Apostles, prove that 1 Mac or Luke's Acts of the Apostles is not genuine. Nor does the fact that the oldest portions of the spurious apocalypses which have been preserved to our time are thought to have been written in the 2d cent. BC, proves that apocalyptic, or spurious, were written before that time. There must have been a beginning, a first apocalypse, at some time, if ever. Besides, if we admit that the earliest parts of the Book of En and of the Sibyline Oracles were written about the middle of the 2d cent. BC, whereas the Book of Enoch was written about 300 AD, 450 years later, we can see no good literary reason why Dn1 may not have antedated En by 350 years. The period between 500 BC and 150 AD was not yet entirely devoid of all known Hebrew literary productions as to render it exceedingly precarious for anyone to express an opinion as to what works may have characterized that long space of time.

Secondly, as to the objections made against the Book of Dn1 on the ground of the number or character of the miracles recorded, we shall only say that they affect the whole of the Christian system, which is full of the miraculous; and we have rejected the books of the Bible because miraculous events are recorded in them, where indeed shall we stop?

Thirdly, a more serious objection, as far as Dn1 itself is concerned, is the claim of Eichhorn that the original text of the Aram. portion of the Text has been so thoroughly tampered with and changed, that we can no longer get at the genuine original composition. We ourselves can see no objection to the belief that these Aram. portions were written first of all in Heb, or even, if you will, in Bab; nor to the supposition that some Gr translators modified the meaning in their version either intentionally, or through a misunderstanding of the original. We claim, however, that the composite Aram. of Dn1 agrees in almost every particular of orthography, etymology and syntax, with the Aram. of the North Sem inscriptions of the 9th, 8th and 7th cents. BC and of the Egyptian papyri of the 5th cent. BC; and that the vocabulary of Dn1 has an admixture of Heb, Bab and Pers words similar to that of the papyri of the 5th cent. BC; whereas, it differs in composition from the Aram. of the Nabateans, which is devoid of Pers, Heb, and Bab words, and is almost derived exclusively from that of the Palauryenes, which is full of Gr words, while having but one or two Pers words, and no Heb or Bab.

As to different recensions, we meet with a similar difficulty in Jeremiah without anyone's impugning on that account the genuineness of the work as a whole. As to interpolations of verses or sections, they are found in the Sam recension of the Heb text and in the Sam and other Ts, as also in certain places in the text of the NT, Jos and many other ancient literary works, without causing us to disbelieve in the genuineness of the rest of their works, or of the works as a whole.

Fourthly, the objections to the genuineness of Dn1 based on the presence in it of three Gr names of musical instruments and of a number of Pers words do not seem nearly as weighty today as they did a hundred years ago. The Gr inscriptions at Abu Simbel in Upper Egypt dating from the time of Psamtek II in the early part of the 6th cent. BC, the discovery of the Minoan inscriptions and ruins in Crete, the revelations of the wide commercial relations of the Phoenicians in the early part of the 1st millennium BC, the lately published inscriptions of Sennacherib about his campaigns in Cilicia against the Gr mariners to which Alexander Polyhistor and Abydenus had referred, telling about his having carried many Greeks captive to Nineveh about 700 BC, the confirmation of the wealth and expensive ceremonies of Nebuchadnezzar made by his own building and other inscriptions, all will assure us of the possibility of the use of Gr musical instruments at Babylon in the 6th cent. BC. This, taken along with the well-known fact that names of articles of commerce and esp. of musical instruments go with the thing, leaves no room to doubt that a writer of the 6th cent. BC may have known and used borrowed Gr terms. The Aramaeans being the great commercial middlemen between Egypt and Greece on the one hand and Babylon and the Orient on the other, and being a subject people, would naturally adopt many foreign words into their vocabulary.

As to the presence of the so-called Pers words in Dn1, it must be remembered that many words which were formerly considered to be such have been found to be Bab. As to the others, perhaps all of them may be Median rather than Pers; and if so, the children of Israel who were carried captive to the cities of the Medes in the middle of the 8th cent. BC, and the Medes in the latter part of the 6th, were exposed to the Medes, at least from the time of the fall of Nineveh about 607 BC, may well have adopted many words into their vocabulary from the language of their rulers. Daniel was not writing merely for the Jews who had been taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, but for all Israelites through-out the world. Hence, he would properly use a language which his scattered readers would understand rather than the purer idiom of Judaea. Most of his foreign terms are names of officials, legal terms, and articles of clothing, for which there were no suitable terms existing in the earlier Heb or Aram. There was nothing for a writer to do but to invent new terms, or to transfer the current foreign words into his native language. The latter was the preferable method and the one which he adopted.

Fifthly, objections to the genuineness of the Book of Dn1 are made on the ground of the historical misstatements which are said to be found in it. These may be classed as (1) Chronological, (2) geographical, and (3) various.

(1) Chronological objections.—The first chronological objection is derived from Dn1 1, where it is said that Nebuchadnezzar made an expedition against Egypt in the 4th year of his reign, whereas Jeremiah seems to imply that the expedition was made in the 4th year of that king. As Daniel was writing primarily for the Jews of Babylon, he would naturally use the system of dating that was employed there; and this system differed in its method of denoting the 1st year of a reign from that used by the Egyptians and by the Jews of Jerusalem for whom Jeremiah wrote.

The Babylonian chronology is derived from the fact that Daniel is said (DnL 1 21) to have lived unto the 1st year of Cyrus the king, whereas in 10 1 he is said to have seen a vision in the 3d year of Cyrus, king of Persia. These statements are easily reconciled by supposing that in the former case it is the 1st year of Cyrus as king of Babylon, and in the second, the 3d year of Cyrus as king of Persia.

The third chronological objection is based on 6 28, where it is said that Daniel prospered in the kingdom of Darius and in the kingdom of Cyrus the Persian. This statement is harmonized with the facts revealed by the monuments and with the statements of the book itself by supposing that Darius reigned synchronously with Cyrus, but as sub-king under him.

The fourth objection is based on 8 1, where Daniel is said to have seen a vision in the third year of Belshazzar the king. If we suppose that Belshazzar was king of the Chaldeans while his father was still living, just as Oneus of Babylon while his father, Cyrus, was king of the lands, or as Nabonidus II seems to have been king of Harran while his father, Nabonidus I, was king of Babylon, this statement will harmonize with the other statements of Daniel and of Belshazzar.

(2) Geographical objections.—As to the geographical objections, three only need be considered as important. The first is, that Shushan seems to be spoken of in 7 2 as subject to Babylon, whereas it is supposed by some to have been at that time subject to Media. Here we can safely rest upon the opinion of Winckler, that at the division of the Assyrian dominions among the allied Medes and Babylonians, Elam became subject to Babylon rather than to Media. If, however, this opinion could be shown not to be true, we must remember that Daniel is said to have been at Shushan in a vision.

The second geographical objection is based on the supposition that Nebuchadnezzar would not have gone against Jerus, leaving an Egyptian garrison at Carchemish in his rear, thus endangering his line of communication and a possible retreat to Babylon. This objection has no weight, now that the position of Carchemish has been shown to be, not at Cireium, as conjectured, but at Jiribis, 350 miles farther up the Euphrates. Carchemish would have cut off a retreat to Nineveh, but was far removed from the direct line of communication with Babylon.

The third geographical objection is derived from the statement that Darius placed 120 satraps in, or over, all his kingdom. The objection rests upon a false conception of the meaning of satrap and of the extent of a satrapy, there being no reason why a subject province should be called a satrapy. Darius placed under him as Sargons of Assyria had governors and deputies under him; and the latter king mentions 117 peoples and countries over which he appointed his deputies to rule in his place.

(3) Other objections.—Various other objections to the genuineness of DnL have been made, the principal being those derived from the supposed non-existence of Kings Darius the Mede and Belshazzar the Chaldean, from the use of the word Chaldean to describe the wise men of Babylon, and from the silence of other historical sources as to many of the events recorded in DnL. The discussion of the existence of Belshazzar and Darius the Mede will be found under BELSHAZZAR and DARIUS. As to the argument based upon the silence of the historians of other ages, it is to be noted in the absence of all reference to Daniel on the monuments, in the Book of Ecclesiastes, and in the post-exilic lit. As to the latter books it proves too much; for Hag, Zec, and Mal, as well as Ezr, Neh, and Est, refer to so few of the older canonical books and earlier historical persons and events, that it is not fair to apply to them to refer to Daniel—at least, to use their not referring to him or his book as an argument against the existence of either before the time when they were written. As to Eclesius, we might have expected him to mention Daniel or the Three Children; but who knows what reasons Ben Sira may have had for not placing them in his list of Heb heroes? Perhaps, since he held the views which later characterized the Sadducees, he may have passed Daniel by because of his views on the resurrection and on angels. Perhaps he failed to mention any of the four companions because none of their deeds had been wrought in Pal; or because their deeds exalted too highly the heathen monarchies to which the Jews were subject. Or, more likely, the book may have been unknown to him, since very few copies at best of the whole OT can have existed in his time, and the Book of DnL may not have gained general currency in Pal before it was made so preeminent by the fulfillment of its prophecies on the evil over Pal.

It is not satisfactory to say that Ben Sira did not mention Daniel and his companions, because the stories concerning them had not yet been imbedded in a canonical book, inasmuch as he does mention the stories of Menahem and of Eliahu ben Sira, the two main men of Israel's great men, although he is not mentioned in any canonical book. In conclusion, it may be said, that while it is impossible for us to determine why Ben Sira does not mention Daniel and his three companions among Israel's great men, although he is known to us, it is even more impossible to understand how these stories concerning them cannot merely have arisen but have been accepted as true, between 298 BC, when Ecclus is thought to have been written; and 199 BC, when, according to 1 Macc, Matthias, the first of the Asmoneans, expelled his brethren to follow the example of Ananias and his friends.

VIII. Interpretation.—Questions of the interpretation of particular passages may be looked for in the commentaries and special works. As to the general question of the kind of prophecy found in the Book of DnL, it has already been discussed above under the caption of "Genuineness." As to the interpretation of the world monarchies which precede the monarchy of the Messiah Prince, it may be said, however, that the latest discoveries, ruling out as they do a separate Median empire that included Babylon, and portending that the four monarchies are the Bab, the Pers, the Gr., and the Rom. According to this view, Darius the Mede was only a sub-king under Cyrus the Pers. Other interpretations have been made by selecting the four empires from those of Assyria, Babylon, Media, Persia, Medo-Persia, Alexander, the Seleucids, the Romans, and the Mohammedans. The first and the last of these have generally been excluded from serious consideration. The main dispute is as to whether the 4th empire was that of the Seleucids, or that of the Romans, the former view being held commonly by those who hold to the composition of DnL in the 2d cent. BC, and the latter by those who hold to the traditional view that it was written in the 6th cent. BC.

IX. Doctrines.—It is universally admitted that the teachings of Daniel with regard to angels and
The resurrection are more explicit than those found elsewhere. Daniel attributes to them names, ranks, and functions not mentioned by others. It has become common in certain quarters to assert that these peculiarities of Daniel are due to Pers influences. The Bab monuments, however, have revealed the fact that the Babylonians believed in both good and evil spirits with names, ranks, and different functions. These spirits correspond in several respects to the Heb angels, and may well have afforded Daniel the background for his visions. Yet, in all such matters, it must be remembered that the Spirit gave us a vision, or revelation; and a revelation cannot be bound by the ordinary laws of time and human influence.

As to the doctrine of the resurrection, it is generally admitted that Daniel adds some new and distinct features to that which is taught in the other canonical books of the Old Testament. But it will be noted that he does not dwell upon this doctrine, since he mentions it only in 12:2. The materials for his doctrine are to be found in the day that day in Daniel 14:21 and 66:24; Ezek 37:1-14, and in Job 14:12; 19:25; Hosea 6:2; 1 K 17; 2 K 4, and 8:1-5, as well as in the use of the words for sleep and awakening from sleep, or from the dust, for everlasting life or everlasting sleep [Isa 26:19; Ps 127:2; Dtn 31:16; 2 S 7:12; 1 K 1:21; Job 21, and Jer 20:11; 23:40. The essential ideas and phraseology of Daniel's teachings are found in Isa, Jer, and Ezek. The first two parts of the books of En and 2 Macc have much in common with the resurrection; but on the other hand, Ecel seems to believe not even in the immortality of the soul, and Wisd and 1 Macc do not mention a resurrection of the body.

That the post-exilic prophets do not mention a resurrection depends not on the fact that they knew nothing about Dnl any more than it proves that they knew nothing about Isa, Jer, and Ezek.

There are resemblances, it is true, between the teachings of Daniel with regard to the resurrection and those of the Avesta. But so are there between his doctrines and the ideas of the Egyptians, which had existed for millennia before his time. Besides there is no proof of any derivation of doctrines from the Persians by the writers of the canonical books of the Old Testament. We have seen above, both the ideas and verbiage of Daniel are to be found in the acknowledged early Heb literature. And finally, this attempt to find a natural origin for all Bib. ideas leaves out of sight the fact that the Scriptures contain revelations from God, which transcend the ordinary course of human development. To a Christian, therefore, there can be no reason for believing that the doctrines of Dnl may not have been promulgated in the 6th cent. BC.

The best commentaries on Dnl from a conservative point of view are those by Calvin, Moses Stuart, Keil, Zöckler, Strong in Lange's Biblical Commentary, Pulpit in the Spurgeon Commentary, Thomson in the Spurgeon Commentary, and Wright, Daniel and his Critics. The best defense of Daniel's authenticity and genuineness are Henegstenberg, Authenticity of the Book of Daniel, Trumpe, Decisions of the Authenticity of Daniel, Fuller, Essay on the Authenticity of Daniel, Pusey, A Defense of the best of Daniel by O. H. H. Wright, Daniel and his Critics, Kennedy, The Book of Daniel in the critical standpoint, Joseph Wilson, Daniel, and Sir Robert Anderson, Daniel in the Critics' Den. One should consult also Politch, The Old Testament in the Light of the Historical and Archaeological Researches, and Beek, Clay, Light on the Old Testament from Babel and Orr, The Problem of the Date of Daniel, the reading of the text is best represented by Driver in his Lit. of the OT and in his Daniel; by Bevan, The Book of Daniel; by Prince, Commentary on Daniel, and by Cornill in his Intro. to the OT.

X. Apocryphal Additions.—In the Gr translations of Dnl three or four pieces are added which are not found in the original Heb. Aram. text as it has come down to us. These are The Prayer of Azarias, The Song of the Three Holy Children, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon. These additions have all been rejected from the Canon by the Protestant churches because they are not contained in the Heb Canon. In the Church of England they are read for example of life and instruction of manners. The Three was "ordered in the rubric of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI (AD 1549) to be used in Lent as a responsory to the OT Lesson at the Morning Prayer." It contains the Prayer of Azarias from the midst of the fire as a protest to the god of the place, and a song of praise by the three children for their deliverance; the latter being couched largely in phrases borrowed from Ps 148. Sus presents to us the story of a virgious woman who resisted the seductive attempts of two judges of the elders of the people, whose machinations were exposed through the wisdom of Daniel who convicted them of false witness by the evidence of their own mouth, so that they were put to death according to the law of Moses; and from that day forth Daniel had held in great reputation in the sight of the people. Bel contains three stories. The first relates how Daniel destroyed the image of Bel which Nebuchadnezzar worshipped, by showing by means of ashes strewn on the floor of the temple that the gods declared in that temple who came secretly into the temple by night. The second tells how Daniel killed the Dragon by throwing lumps of mingled pitch, fat and hair into his mouth, so causing the Dragon to burst asunder. The third relates that Bel and Azarias were denrying that there were seven lions and that Daniel lived in the den six days, being sustained by broken bread and pottage which a prophet named Habakuk brought to him through the air, an angel of the Lord having taken it. In the third the man becoms visible by the hair of his head and through the vehemency of his spirit set him in Babylon over the den, into which he dropped the food for Daniel's use.

LITERATURE.—For commentaries on the additions to the book of Dnl, see the works on Dnl cited above, and also The Apocrypha by Churton and others; the volume on the Apocrypha in Lange's Commentary by Bissell; "The Apocrypha" by Wace in the Speaker's Commentary, and Schürer, History of the Jewish People.

DANITES, dan'itis (םנדה, ha-dânî): Occurs as describing those belonging to Dan in Jgs 13:2; 18:11; 1 Ch 12:35.

DAN-JAAN, dan-jä'ân (םנדה, dān yā'ān; בְּדַע, Bād Elšāv, Sīlāb, Dān Eīdān kat Oūdān): A place visited by Job and his officers when taking the census (2 S 24:6). It is mentioned between Gilead and Sidon. Some would identify it with קדנ דנדים, a ruined site N. of Acheib. The text is probably corrupt. Klostermann would read "toward Dan and Ion" (cf 1 K 15:20).

DANNAH, dan'â (םנדה, dānāh): One of the cities in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:49) between Socoh and Kidron-sannah (Dâhur) probably Idnâh—the Idnâ of the Onom—Stille W. of Hebron. See PEF, III, 305, 330.

DAPHENE, dâf'âne (Δάφην, Daphné, "bay-tree"): A suburb of Abydos in the Orontes, overlooking to Strabo and the Jesus itinerary, about 40 furlongs, or 5 miles distant. It is identified with Belit el-Mâd on the left bank of the river, to the S.W. of the city. Here were the famous grove and sanctuary of Apollo. The grove and shrine owed their origin to Seleucus Nicator. It was a place of great natural beauty, and the Seleucid kings spared no outlay in adding to its attractions. The precincts enjoyed the right of asylum. Hither fled Onias the high priest (171 BC) from the wrath of Menelaus whom he had offended by plain speech. To the disgust and indignation of Jew and Gentile alike, he was lured from the sanctuary by Andronicus and basely put to death (2 Macc 4:33-38). It sheltered fugitives dyed with villainy a large number of the citizens of Antioch and it gained an evil repute for immorality, as witnessed by the proverbial Daphnicis mores. In Tiberiun deputit Orontes, says Juvenal (ii.62), indicating one main source of the corruption that demoralized the imperial city. The decline of Daphne dates from the days of Christian ascendency in the reign of Julian. The place is still musical with fountains and luxuriant with wild vegetation; but nothing now remains to suggest its former splendor. See Antioch; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, etc.

DARA, dâr'a (דַּרַא; dârâ). See Darda.

DARDA, dâr'dâ (дар'dâ) 'pearl of wisdom': One of the wise men to whom Solomon is compared (1 K 4:31). He was either a son of Mahol (ibid) or a son of Zerah, son of Judah (1 Ch 2:6, where the corresponding name in the same list is given as Dara). In rabbinic lore the name has been interpreted as dar 'dârî, 'the generation of knowledge'—the generation of the wilderness.

DARE, dâr: The expression "to dare" in the Scriptures never has the meaning of "to defy" "to challenge" or "to terrify." It is always found as the tr 'רָדָה, tômâh, 'to manifest courage.' This is particularly evident from 2 Cor 10:12, 'for we are not bold to number or compare ourselves' (AV 'for we dare not make ourselves the number').

DARIC, dar'îk (דרייק; darîmôn, and Δαρικός, dareîkós): A Pers gold coin about a guinea or five dollars in value. The first form of the word occurs in 1 Ch 29:7; Ezr 2:69, and Neh 7:70-72; the second in Ezra 8:27 and is rendered 'drum' in AV and 'drac' in RV. In the passage in Ch, it must refer to a weight, since at the time of David there were no coins, but in the days of Ezra Nehemiah the Pers dracas were current. See Money.

DARIUS, da-rî'us: The name of three or four kings mentioned in the OT. In the original Pers it is spelled "Darayavahsh"; in Bab, usually "Dariamush"; in Susan (?) "Tariyanmasshu"; in Egyptian, "Antaryashsh"; on Aram, inscriptions, "дарîgâhî or ".ProgressBar"; in Heb, "דָּרָי שׁ", dâr'îyâvâsh; in Gr, "Δαρέω" or " דֶּרֶו"; in Lat. "Darius." In meaning it is probably connected with the new Pers word Dara, "king." Herodotus says it means in Gr, 'Esaios, Erselos, coercitor, restrainer,' compeller,' 'commander.'

1) Darius the Mede (Dnl 6:1; 11:1) was the son of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) of the seed of the Medes (Dnl 9:1). He received the government of Belshazzar the Chaldaean upon the death of that prince (Dnl 5:30-31; 6:1), and was made king over the kingdom of the Chaldaeans.

From Dnl 6:28 we may infer that Darius was king contemporaneously with Cyrus. Outside of the Book of Dnl there is no mention of Darius the Mede by name, though there are good reasons for identifying him with Gubaru, or Ugbar, the governor of Gubaru, who is mentioned in the Nabonidus-Cyrus Chronicle to have been appointed by Cyrus as his governor of Babylon after its capture from the Chaldaeans. Some reasons for this identification are as follows:

(a) Gubaru is possibly a tr of Darius. The same radical letters in Arab. mean "king," "compeller," "restrainer." In Heb, derivations of the root mean "lord," "mistress," "queen"; in Aram., "mighty," "almighty."

(b) Gubaru was the designation of the country N. of Babylon and was in all possibility in the time of Cyrus a part of the province of Media. It was not a part of Media at that time, it was the custom of Pers kings to appoint Medes as well as Persians to satrapies and to the command of armies. Hence Darius-Gubaru may have been a Mede, even if Gubaru were not a part of Media.

(d) Since Daniel never calls Darius the Mede king of Media, or king of Persia, it is immaterial what his title or position may have been before he was made king over the realm of the Chaldaeans. Since the Medes of the Chaldaeans never included either Media or Persia, there is absolutely no evidence in the Book of Dnl that its author ever meant to imply that Darius the Mede ever ruled over either Media or Persia.

(c) That Gubaru is called governor (pîhâtsu), and Darius the Mede, king, is no objection to this identification; for in ancient as well as modern oriental empires the governors of provinces and cities were often called kings. Moreover, in the Aram. language, no mention is made of the "king." It can be found to designate the ruler of a sub-kingdom, or province of the empire.

(f) That Darius is said to have had 120 satraps under him does not conflict with this; for the Pers word "satrap" is indefinitely as to the extent of his rule, just like the Eng. word "governor." Besides, Gubaru is said to have appointed pîhâtsu under himself. If the kingdom of the Chaldaeans which he received was as large as that of Sargon he may easily have appointed 120 of these sub-rulers; for Sargon names 117 subject cities and countries over which he appointed his prefects and governors.

(g) The peoples, nations and tongues of ch 6 are no objection to this identification. For Babylonia itself at this time was inhabited by Babylonians, Chaldaeans, Arabs, Amaraneeans and Jews, and the kingdom of the Chaldaeans embraced also Assyrians, Elamites, Phoenicians and others within its limits.

This identification is supported further by the fact that there is no other possible kingdom or territory that can be well meant. Some, indeed, have thought that Darius the Mede was a reflection into the past of Darius Hystaspes; but this is rendered impossible in much as the character, deeds and empire of Darius Hystaspes, which are known to us from his own monuments and from the Gr historians, do not resemble what Daniel says of Darius the Mede.

(2) Darius, the fourth king of Persia, called Hystaspes because he was the son of a Pers king named Hystaspis, is mentioned in Ezr (4:5, et al.), Hag (1:1) and Zec (1:1). Upon the death of Cambyses, son and successor to Cyrus, Smerdis the Magus usurped the kingdom and was de-throned by seven Pers nobles from among whom Darius was selected to be king. After many rebellions and wars he succeeded in establishing himself firmly upon the throne (Amd, XI, 1). He reorgan-ized and enlarged the Pers empire. He is best known to general history from his conflict with Greece culminating at Marathon, and for his re-dig-ning of the Suez Canal. In sacred history he stands forth as the king who enabled the Jews under Joshua and Zerubbabel to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem.

(3) Darius, called by the Greek Cyneges, or Chyneges, was called Ochus before he became king. He reigned from 424 to 404 BC. In the Scriptures he is men-tioned only in Neh 12:22, where he is called Darius the Pers, probably to distinguish him from Darius the Mede. It is not necessary to suppose that Darius Codonmannus, who reigned from 336 to 330 BC, is meant by the author of Neh 13, because he mentions Jaddua; for (a) Johanan, the father of this Jaddua, was high priest about 408 BC, as is clear from the Aram. papyrius from Elephantine lately published by Professor Sachau of Berlin, and Jaddua may well have succeeded him in those troublous times before the death of Darius Nothus in 404 BC. And (b) that a high priest named Jaddua met Alexander in 332 BC, is attested only by Jos (Ant. xi, viii, 5). It is not fair to take the testimony of Josephus to Jaddua (but not taking his testimony as to the meeting with Alexander and as to the appeal of Jaddua to the predictions of the Book of Dan). But even if Jos be right, there may have been two Juddus, one high priest in 404 BC, and the other in 332 BC; or the one who was alive and exercising his functions in 404 BC may still have been high priest in 332 BC. He need not have exceeded 90 years of age. According to the Eshki Harran inscription, which purports to have been written by himself, the priest of the temple in that city had reigned for 100 years. In our own time how many men have been vigorous in mind and body at the age of 90, or thereabouts? Bismarck and Gladstone, for example? R. Dick Wilson DARK, dark, DARKNESS, dark'nes (יוֹמָה, hidhah; σκότος, sēlōs): The day and night, light and darkness, are notable antitheses in Ps 82 5; Prov 2 13; Jn 3 19; Rom 13 12), and their reward is to “sit in darkness” (Ps 107 10) or to be “cast forth into the outer darkness” (Mt 8 12) as a punishment for iniquity. For the “dunkel” see (1 K 8 12; Ps 97 2); (c) of trouble and affliction (2 S 22 29; Job 5 14; Prov 20 20; Isa 2 2; of Gen 15 12); (d) of punishment (Lam 3 2; Ezek 32 8; Zeph 1 15); (e) of death (1 S 2 9; Job 10 21; Ecc 11 8); (f) of nothingness (Job 3 4–6); (g) of human ignorance (Job 19 8; 1 Jn 2 11).

DARKLY, dark'ly: The word occurs in 1 Cor 13 12, “For now we see in a mirror, darkly,” in tr. the words οὕτως οὐκ εἰδοῦμεν, en ainosmati, RVm “in a riddle.” The contrast is with the “face to face” vision of Divine things in eternity. Earth’s best knowledge is partial, obscure, enigmatic, a broken reflection of the complete truth (“broken light of Thee”).

DARKON, dark'kon (יוֹמָה, hidhōn, “carrier”): Ancestor of a subdivision of “Solomon’s servants,” so called, in post-exilic times (Ezr 2 56; Neh 7 58; Lxson. 1 Esd 5 33).

DARK SAYINGS (Prov 1 6; Ps 78 2; sing., Ps 49 4[5]; יִתְנַה, hidothō, sing. יִתְנַה, hidōthē, elsewhere rendered “riddle,” “proverb”): In the headings of the canonical Book of Prov, the general term “proverbs” is made to include “a proverb [יִתְנַה, hidōthē], and a figure [or, an interpretation, יִתְנַה, hidōthē], the words [sing. יִתְנַה, hidōthē, of the wise, and their dark sayings [or, riddles]]. The proverb” is either a saying current among the people (cf 1 S 10 12; “the proverb of the ancients” 24 13[14]), or a sentence of ethical wisdom composed by the order of wise men (תְּנַה, hidōthēm). Of the latter kind are the sententious maxims of the Wisdom lit. (chiefly Prov, but also Job, Ecc, and among the uncanonical writings Ecdus). They are characterized by a secular touch; wisdom, moreover, flourished among the neighbors of Israel as well; so in Edom and elsewhere. Whatever the date of the collection known as the "Proverbs of Solomon," the wise men existed in Israel at a very early period; the prophets allude to them. But the Heb hidōthē is sometimes of a more elaborate character corresponding to our "parables"; frequently a vein of taunt runs through them, and they played an important part in compositions directed against other nations (cf Nu 21 27).

The prophets are fond of employing this genre of literary production; in their hands the hidōthē becomes a fig. or allegorical discourse (cf Ezek 21 5 [8]; Eccl). The hidōthē in the sense of a didactic poem occurs also in the Psalms (Ps 49 and 78). Hence it is that “proverb” and “figure,” or “proverb” and “dark saying” are interchangeable terms. The “dark saying” is the popular "riddle" (cf Agg 1,1. fixed) all the dignity of elaborate production. It is in short an allegorical sentence requiring interpretation. Both prophets and psalmists avail themselves thereof. The word of God comes to the prophet in the form of a vision: the visions of Amos, for instance, the truth presents itself to them in the form of a simile. To the perfect prophet the type of Moses the revelation comes direct in the shape of the naked truth without the mediation of figures of speech or obscure utterances requiring elucidation (of Nu 12).

In the same way St. Paul (1 Cor 13) distinguishes between the childish manner of speaking of things spiritual and the manner of a man: “For now we see in a mirror, darkly [or ‘in a riddle’]; but then face to face.” The psalmist, Alog 4,1, waxes yet all the other prophets saw God and things Divine in a dim mirror. Moses saw them in a polished, clear mirror. Both St. Paul and the rabbis feel the difference between mediate and immediate vision, the revelation which requires darkening and the clear perception which is the direct truth.

DARLING, dar'ling (יוֹמָה, hidhāthi; “only,” “AVm only one”; ARVm “dear life”): Used poetically for the life or soul (Ps 22 20; 35 17).

DART, dart' (יוֹמָה, hidhōn; RVm, bēlos): A pointed missile weapon, as an arrow or light spear (2 S 18 14; Job 41 26). See ARMOR, ARMs, 111, 4; AR-Figurative: (1) Of the penalty of sin (Prov 7 23 AV); (2) of strong suggestions and fierce temptations to evil (Eph 6 16; of 1 Mac 5 51). DART-SNAKE, dar'tsnake (Isa 34 15). See ARROWSNAKE.

DASH: The idea of “to throw violently” or “to strike” with purpose of causing destruction is usually connected with the word “to dash.” There is perhaps but one exception to this in Ps 11 12 and the quotations of this passage in the NT (Mt 4 6; Lk 4 11, ποιεῖται, prōbalein), having the meaning “to strike against accidentally” and not intentionally. Nah 2 1, “he that dasheth in pieces is doubtful."

Alfred H. Joy
"He that scattereth" would be in better harmony with the Heb שִׁפְחָה, mešephah, and the following description of destruction. In all other cases "to dash" is connected with the idea of destruction, esp. the infliction of punishment which is usually expressed by סְחָה, sāḥāh, "to dash to the ground" (2 K 11:11; Isa 13:16 f.; etc., "to dash in pieces," AV "smitten," "crushed," but also by סְחָה, sāḥāh, "to break to pieces" (Ps 2:9; 137:9, etc.) See also PUNISHMENTS.

DATES, dā'st (נַע, nā'ah): Arab. dibba (2 Ch 31:5 AVm); EV Honey (q.v.). See also PALM TREE.

DATHAN, dā'shan (דָתָן, dāṭān), dāthān: meaning and derivation unknown, though the name is foreshadowed in Assyr. (in the records of Shalmanezer II): The son of Eleab the son of Pallu the son of Reuben (Nu 26:5 f.; Dt 11:6; Ps 106:17). He and his brother Abiram, with others, followed Korah the Levite in disputing the authority of Moses: they were swallowed up in the earth (Nu 16-17, 26; Dt 11:6; Ps 106:17). Other followers of Korah perished by fire before the tent of meeting, but Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up by the earth, with their families and their goods, at their tents. See KORAH.

DATHHEMA, dāth'ē-ma (דָתְחָם, Dāṭhēma): A stronghold (1 Macc 5:29) in Gilead to which the Jews fled for refuge from the heathen (ver 9). They were delivered by Judas and Jonathan their brother (ver 10). It was within a night's march from Bosor. It may possibly be identical with 'Ath'amān which lies E. of el-Muṣirib.

DAUB, dōb: "To daub" always has the meaning "to cover," "to smear with" in the Scriptures. Ezk compares the flatteries of the false prophets to a slight wall covered with whitewash (lit. "spittle"). See Ezek 13:10 f.; 22:29. In Ezck 25:18 "daubed it with slime and with pitch" (Heb מָכָה, makāh, "to daub," see also "asphalt") "to daub" has the same meaning as in the Ezck passage.

DAUGHTER, dō'tēr (גָּדוֹת, gādōth; יָגְדוֹת, yagōth, thou- gāthēr): Used in Scriptures in several more or less distinct senses: (a) for daughter in the ordinary, literal sense (Gen 46:25; Ex 16:16); (b) daughter-in-law; Ruth 2:2; (c) granddaughter; or (d) female descendant (Ex 21; Lk 1:5; 13:16); (e) the women of a country, or of a place, taken collectively (Lk 23:28), of a particular religion (Mal 2:11); (f) all the population of a place, taken collectively, esp. in Prophets and poetic books (Ps 9:14; Isa 23:10; Jer 46:24; Mt 21:5); (g) used in familiar address, "Daughter, be of good comfort" (Mt 9:22 AV; Mk 5:34; Lk 8:48); (h) women in general (Prov 31:29); (i) the personification of towns or cities as the daughter of the female sex (Isa 47:1; Ezek 44:6; cf. Nah 3:47), esp. of dependent towns and villages (Ps 48:11; Nu 21:25 m; Jgs 1:27 m); (j) in Heb idiom for person or thing belonging to or having the characteristics of that with which it is joined, as "daughter of ninety years," of Sarah, ninety years old (Gen 17:17); "daughters of music," singing birds, or singing women (Eccl 12:4); daughters of a tree, i.e. branches; daughter of the eye, i.e. the pupil.

Daughters were not so highly prized as sons, not being usually mentioned by name. A father might sometimes sell his daughter as bondwoman (Ex 21:7); though not to a foreigner (ver 8); daughters might sometimes inherit as did sons, but could not take the inheritance outside of the tribe (Nu 27:1-12).

DAVID, dā'ved (דָוִד, dāvīd, or דָּוִד, dāvid, "beloved"); Dawi'd, also in NT, Dawie'd; see Thayer's Lex.

I. Name and Genealogy.—This name, which is written "defectively" in the older books, such as those of S, but plene with the yōdāh in Ch and the later books, is derived, like the similar name Jedidiah (2 S 15:25), from a root meaning "to love." The only person who bears this name in the Bible is the son of Jesse, the second king of Israel. His genealogy is given in the table appended to the Book of Ruth (4:18–22). Here the following points are to be noted: David belonged to the tribe of Judah: his ancestor Nahash was the Israelite of the whole tribe (Nu 1:7; 2:3; 1 Ch 2:10) and brother-in-law of Aaron the high priest (Ex 6:23). As no other descendants of Nahash are mentioned, his authority probably descended to Jesse by right of primogeniture. Thus Jesse was prince in the wilderness (Nu 16–17, 26; Dt 11:6; Ps 106:17). Other followers of Korah perished by fire before the tent of meeting, but Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up by the earth, with their families and their goods, at their tents. See KORAH.

II. Early Years.—The home of David when he comes upon the stage of history was the picturesque town of Bethlehem. There his family had been settled for generations, until his father had become the chief of the clan to which he belonged—the clan of Judah. Although the country round about Bethlehem is not very fertile, so that in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, the inhabitants joined to the cultivation of the soil the breeding of cattle (Lk 2:8). David's father, not only cultivated his ancestral fields, but kept flocks of sheep and goats as the daily occupation and for days of rest went to pasture in the neighboring valleys attended by the herdsmen armed so as to defend themselves and their charge, not only against marauders from the surrounding deserts, but also from the lions and bears with which the country was then infested. David seems to have been in the habit of accompanying his father's servants in their task (1 S 17:20,22), and on occasion would be left in full charge by himself. Nor was he at such times a mere herdsman. He had not only to keep a sharp lookout for thieves, but on more than one occasion had with no other weapon than his shepherd's club or staff to rescue a lamb from the clutches of a lion or a bear (vs 34 f.). Such adventures, however, must have been rare, and David must often have watched eagerly the lengthening of the shadow which told of the approach of sunset, when he could drive his charge into the zariba for the night and return home. There is, indeed, no life more monotonous and wearisome than that of an eastern shepherd, but David must have made good use of his idle time. He seems, in fact, to have made such good use of it as to have neglected his handful of eephe. The incidents of which he boasted to Saul would not have occurred, had his proper occupation taken up all his thoughts; but, like King Alfred, his head seems to have been filled with ideas far removed from his humble task.

David, like Nelson, does not seem to have known what it was to be afraid, and it was not to be expected that he could be satisfied with

2. Slinger the lot of the youngest of eight sons of the now aged chief (1 S 17:12; 1 Ch 2:13). In the East every man is a soldier, and David's bent was in that direction. The tribesmen of Benjamin near whose border his home was situated were famed through all Israel as slingers, some of whom had trained a hair and not miss (Jgs 20:16). Taught, perhaps, by one of these, but certainly by dint of constant practice, David acquired an accuracy of aim which reminds one of tales of William Tell or Robin Hood (1 S 17:49).

Another of the pastimes in the pursuit of which David spent many an hour of his youthful days was music. The instrument which he

3. Harpist used was the "harp" (Heb kinnor). This instrument had many forms, which may be seen on the Assyrian and Egypt monuments; but the kind used by David was probably like the modern Arab, rubaba, having only one or two strings, played not with a plectrum (Ant, VII, xii, 8) but by the hand (cf 1 S 16:23, etc., which do not describe the nature of the instrument). David acquired such proficiency in playing it that his fame as a musician soon spread throughout the countryside (cf 18:16). With the passing of time be becomes the Heb Orpheus, in whom music birds and mountains joined (cf Korân, ch 21).

To the accompaniment of his lyre David no doubt sang words, either of popular songs or of lyrics of his own composition, in that wailing echoing key with which he celebrated the lot of every挫败 the bleating of flocks. The verses he sang would recount his own adventures or the heroic prowess of the warrior of his clan, or celebrate the loveliness of some maiden of the tribe, or consist of elegies upon those slain in battle. That the name of D. was long connected with music the reverse of sacred appears from the fact that Amos denounces the people of luxury of his time for improvising to the sound of the viol, inventing instruments to which clause "like D." belongs, probably to both.) The only remains of the secular poetry of D. which have come down to us are his elegies on Saul and Jonathan and on Abner (2 S 1:19; 3:30; 2 S 17:5, 25), which show him to be an imitator of the elegies of the poets of the Hebrews.

Did D. also compose religious verses? Was he "the sweet psalmist of Israel" (2 S 23:1)? In the oldest account which we have, concerning 5. Psalmist tained in the books of S. D. appears as a musician and as a secular poet only, for it is obvious the poetical passages, 2 S 22:1-23:7, do not belong to the original form of that book but are thrust in in the middle of a long list of names of D.'s soldiers. The position is the same in Am (6:5). It is in the later books and passages that sacred music and psalms begin to be ascribed to him. Perhaps the earliest instance is the passage just cited containing the "last words" of D. (2 S 23:1-7). The Chronicler (about 800 BC) seems to put parts of Ps 105:96 and 106:12 into the mouth of D. (1 Ch 15:7 ff., and Nehemiah 12:36) regards him apparently as the inventor of the instruments used in the Temple service (1 Ch 23:5), or as a player of sacred music. So too in the LXX psalter (151:2) we read, "My hands made an organ, my mouth a saltpansh"; and a psalmist of the whole of the Psalms came to be ascribed to D. as author. In regard to this question it must be remembered that in the East at any rate there is no such distinction as that of sacred and secular. By sacred poetry we mean poetry which mentions the name of God or quotes Scripture, but the Heb or Arab poet will use the name of God as an accompaniment to a dance, and will freely sprinkle even comic poetry with citations from his sacred book. D. must have composed sacred poems if he composed at all, and he would use his musical gift for the purposes of religion as readily as for those of amusement and pleasure (2 S 6:14, 15). Whether any of our psalms was composed by D. is another question. The titles cannot be considered as conclusive evidence, and internal proofs of his authorship are wanting. Indeed the only psalm which claims to have been written by D. is the 18th (= 2 S 22). One cannot help wishing that the 23rd were sung by the little herd lad as he watched his father's flocks and guarded them from danger.

There are sayings of Mohammed that the happiest life is that of the shepherd, and that no one became a prophet who had not at one time tended a flock of sheep. What Mo-

6. Tribes- hammed meant was that the shepherd enjoys leisure and solitude for reflection and for plunging into those day dreams out of which prophesies are made. If D., like the Arab poet Tarafa, indulged in sport, in music and in poetry, even to the neglect of his official duties, he might well have written such verses which he might have written such verses which he wished to express his muse; and he must have been with no little chagrin that he learnt that whereas the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, Naphtali, Manasseh, Issachar, Zebulun, Levi, Dan, and even the non-Israelite tribes of Simeon and the Arab land of Gilead could boast of having held the hegemony of Israel and led the nation in battle, his own tribe of Judah had played a quite subordinate part, and was not even mentioned in the national war songs. It is to be an imitation of the poets of these tribes he could boast in his verses only of Iban who belonged to his own town of Bethlehem (Jgs 12:8). The Jerahmeelites were no doubt a powerful clan, but neither they nor any other of the subdivisions of Judah had ever done anything for the common good. Indeed, when the twelve pathfinders had been sent in advance into Canaan, Judah had been represented by Caleb, a member of the Uttlander tribe of Kenaz (Nu 1:16). Caleb became the leader of the tribe and so D. might claim kindship with him, and through him with Othniel the first of the judges (Jgs 1:13). D. thus belonged to the least efficient of all the Israelitish tribes except one, and one which, considering its numerical inferiority, was a true poet and who could play a worthy part in the confederacy. It is difficult to believe that the young D. never dreamed of a day when his own tribe should take its true place among its fellows, and when the deliverer of Israel from its oppressors should belong for once to the tribe of Judah.

III. In the Service of Saul.—The earliest events in the career of D. are involved in some obscurity. This is due mainly to what appears to be a double difficulty in the 16th and First Meets 17 of 1 S. In ch 16, D. is engaged Saul to play before Saul in order to dispel his melancholy, and becomes his squire or armor-bearer (16:21), whereas in the following chapter he is unknown to Saul, who, after the death of Goliath, asks Abner who he is, and Abner replies that he does not know (17:55). This apparent contradiction may be accounted for by the following considerations: (a) 16:14-23 may be inserted out of its chronological order for the sake of the contrast with the second verse; (b) the 17th verse was elaborated by JHVH came mightily upon D. from that day forward . . . . the spirit of JHVH departed from Saul" (16:13-14); (c) the fact of D. becoming Saul's squire does not imply constant personal attendance upon him; the text says D. became an (not his) armor-bearer to Saul. The king would have many such squires: Joab, though only commander-in-chief, had, it seems, eighteen (2 S 23 37 reads "armor-bearers"); (c) D. would not play before Saul every day; his presence might not be required for a space of weeks or months; (d) Saul's failure to recognize D. may have been a result of the 'evil spirit from JHVH' and Abner's denial of knowledge may have been feigned out of jealousy. If we accept all the statements of the dramatic persona in these narratives we shall not get very far. The facts seem to have been somewhat as follows: It had become evident that Saul was not equal to the task to which he had been set—

2. His First the task of breaking the Philib power, Exploit and it became the duty of Samuel, as the vicar of Jeh and as still holding very large powers, to look about for a successor. He turned to the tribe of Judah (the full brother of his own ancestor Levi), a tribe which was fast becoming the most powerful member of the federation. The headman of this clan was Jesse of Bethlehem. His name was well known in the country—Saul does not require to be told who he is (1 S 16 18; 17 58)—but he was by this time advanced in years (17 12). He had followers in the East, where he often foretold a great future for a young boy (of Lk 2 34), Samuel saw that D. was formed of other clay than his brothers, and he anointed him as he had done Saul (1 S 10 1). But whereas the anointing of Samuel was done in secret and for a definite purpose which was explained at the time (10 1), that of D. was performed before his whole family, but with what object he was not told (16 13). His brothers do not seem to have thought the matter of consequence, and for a time D. could conclude from it that he was destined to some high office—perhaps that of Samuel's successor (cf 1 K 19 15.16). It would have the effect of ensuring him for any adventure and raising his hopes high and steeling his courage. Whether by accident or by contrivance he became attached to Saul as minstrel (cf 2 K 3 15) and subsequently as one of his armor-bearers. He would probably be at this time about twenty years of age. It must have been after some time that the event happened which made it impossible for Saul ever again to forget the existence of D. This was the famous duel between D. and the Philii Goliath, which saved the situation for Saul for the time (ch 17). In regard to the issue of this conflict it may be noted that the first five verses of ch 18 are wanting in the best MS of the LXX, that is, the sending of D. from Bethlehem and his fresh introduction to Saul and Saul's failure to recognize him are left out. With the omission of these verses all the difficulties of the narrative vanish. For the reason why D. could not wear the armor offered him was not because he was still a child, which is absurd in view of the fact that Saul was exceptionally tall (1 S 21), but because he had had no practice with it (17 39). It is ridiculous to suppose that D. was not at this time full-grown, and that two armies stood by while a child advanced to engage a giant. The event gained for D. the reputation won in modern times at the cannon's mouth, but also the devoted friendship of Jonathan and the enmity of Saul (1 S 13 1–9).

The next years of D.'s life were spent in the service of Saul in his wars with the Philis. D.'s success was due to the fact that he gratifyingly only inflamed the jealousy of the latter, and he determined to put D. out of the way. More than once he attempted to do so with his own hand (15 11; 19 10), but he also employed stratagem. It came to his ears that his daughter Michal, as well as his son Jonathan, loved D., and Saul undertook to give her to D. on condition of his killing a hundred Philis. The gruesome dowry was paid, and D. became Saul's son-in-law. The

3. Envy of Saul and Flight of David

Heb text states that Saul first offered his elder daughter to D., and then failed to implement his promise (18 17–19.21a), but this passage is not found in the Gr. D.'s relation to Saul did not mitigate the hatred of the latter; indeed his enmity became so bitter that D. determined upon flight. With the help of strangers on the part of Michal, this was effected and D. betook himself to Samuel at Ramah for counsel and advice (19 18). Thither Saul pursued him, but when he came into the presence of the prophet his courage failed and he was overcome by the contagion of the prophetic ecstasy (19 24) as he had been on a previous occasion (10 11). D. returned to Gibeah, while the coast was clear, to meet Jonathan, but Saul also returned immediately, his hatred more intense than before. D. then continued his flight and came to Ahimelech, the priest at Nob (21 1). It is sometimes supposed that we have here two inconsistent accounts of D.'s flight, according to one of which he fled to Samuel at Ramah, and according to the other to Ahimelech at Nob; but both accounts are in the same position, and even if it were correct, it would not clear up all the difficulties of the narrative. There is evidently much in these narratives that is left untold and our business should be to fill up the gaps in a way consistent with what we are given. But Saul had made sure that D. would not return is shown by the fact that he gave his daughter Michal to a man of the tribe of Benjamin as wife (26 44).

The relation existing between Jonathan and David was one of the most interesting (ch 14 1–19). and all D. could see was that he should not be so. A heredi-

4. Jonathan tary monarchy did not yet exist in and David Israel. The only previous attempt to establish such an institution—that of Gideon's family (Jgs 9)—though not of Gideon himself (8 23)—had ended in failure. The principle followed hitherto had been that of election by the shekhs or caids of the clans. To this Saul owed his position, for the lot was a kind of ballot. Moreover, behind his own event happened that of rise of the prophib power of the prophets, the representatives of Jeh. Saul was indebted for his election to Samuel, just as Barak was to Deborah (Jgs 4 6). Like the judges who preceded him he had been put forward to meet a definite crisis, but he was a mere instrument in the rise of the prophib power (9 16). Had he succeeded in crushing these invaders, the newly established kingdom would in the absence of this bond of union have dissolved again into its elements, as had happened on every similar occasion before. He was the only judge who had failed to accomplish the task for which he was appointed, and he was the only one who had been appointed on the understanding that his son should succeed him, for this constituted the distinction between king and judge. Moreover, not only was Saul aware that he had failed, but he saw before him the man who was ready to step into his place and succeed. His rival had, besides, the backing of the mass of the people and of Samuel who was still virtual head of the state and last court of appeal. It is not to be wondered at that Saul was hostile to D. Jonathan, on the other hand, acquisiced in the turn things had taken and bowed to the will that D. had believed to be the inevitable. Such was his love for D. that he had, instead of a waezer (vizier) when D. came to the throne (1 S 23 17). D.'s position was perhaps the most difficult imaginable. He had to fight the battles of a king whose one idea was to bring about his ruin. He was the bosom friend of a prince whom he proposed to supplant in his inheritance. His hope of salvation lay in the death of his king, the father of his wife and of his best friend. The situation would in ordinary circumstances be intolerable, and it would have been impossible but for the fact that those concerned were obeyed by a profound belief in Fate. Jona-than had no grudge against D. for aiming at the throne because to the throne he was destined by the will of Jeh. To D. it would never occur that he had the choice of declining the high destiny in store for him. Had he had the power to refuse what he believed to be the decrees of Fate, he would hardly escape censure for his ambition and disloyalty.

IV. David in Exile.—From the moment of his flight D. became an outlaw and remained so until the death of Saul. This period of his career is full of stirring adventures as Outlaw which remind us of Robert Bruce

William Wallace of Scotland. Like King Arthur and other heroes he carried a famous sword—the sword of Goliah (21 9). Having obtained it of Ahimelech, he for the first time left He- rdole to ground betook himself to the Philis city of Gath (21 10). Not feeling safe here he left and took up his abode in the cave of Adullam (22 1) in the country of Judah, almost within sight of his native Bethlehem. This cave was admirably suited to his purpose and no doubt D. had many a time explored its recesses when a boy. Here he was joined by his parents and brothers, with their servants, as well as by all sorts of persons who were at war with the government, debtors, fugitives from justice, and disinherited persons generally. D. thus became the chief of a band of outlaws who numbered about 400. Of such stuff some of his bravest soldiers were made (2 23 13 ff). He had an augur, too, to direct his actions, and, after the mar- rial of Nob, a priest of Phatis, carrying an ephod with which to cast lots (1 25 23 6). During this period he supported himself and his men by making raids on the Philis outposts and levying blackmail on his own countrymen (2 2 ff) in return for giving them his protection from the Philis (23 1 ff). Ihard pressed before Saul and the Philis (who had established themselves even in Bethlem) he committed his parents to the keep- ing of the king of Nob, and himself proceeded to the court (25 15.25.26). On two occasions D. had Saul in his power, but refused to seize the opportunity of taking his life (24.25). Here again there are no adequate grounds for sup- posing we have here a parallel to the Jehovah, a passage as a fres- hing book a passage as a fre-

V. David as King.—D. immediately removed from Ziklag and took up his quarters at Hebron, where he was at once anointed king by the priests of Nob, a priest of Phatis, carrying an ephod with which to cast lots (1 25 23 6). During this period he supported himself and his men by making raids on the Philis outposts and levying blackmail on his own countrymen (2 2 ff) in return for giving them his protection from the Philis (23 1 ff). Ihard pressed before Saul and the Philis (who had established themselves even in Bethlem) he committed his parents to the keep- ing of the king of Nob, and himself proceeded to the court (25 15.25.26). On two occasions D. had Saul in his power, but refused to seize the opportunity of taking his life (24.25). Here again there are no adequate grounds for sup- posing we have here a parallel to the Jehovah, a passage as a fre-

The town of Gath appears to have been an asylum for the outlaws of the Philistines at this period (23 30). This is the first impulse on his flight from Saul had been to seek safety there (1 21 10–15). Then, however, he was the hero of Israel, whose assassination would be the highest gain to the Philis; now he was the embittered antagonist of Saul, and was welcomed accordingly. Achish placed at his disposal the fortified town of Ziklag in the territory of the now extinct tribe of Simeon, and there he and his follow- ers, each of whom had his family with him, took up their quarters for sixteen months (27 6.7). The advantage to D. wore many. He was safe at last from the persecution of Saul (27 4); he could secure ample supplies by making raids upon the Ama- lekites and other tribes hostile to Israel toward the S. (27 8); and if the opportunity presented itself he could deal a serious blow to the Philis army, his position was no doubt a precarious one. It could last just as long as D. could hoodwink Achish by per- suading him that his raids were directed against his own tribe (27 10). This he succeeded in doing so completely that Achish would have taken him with him on the campaign which ended in the decisive battle of Gilboa, but the other chiefs, fearing treach- ery, refused to allow him to do so. D. was forced to return with his followers to Ziklag, only to find that town razed to the ground and all the women and children carried off by his old enemies the Ama- lekites (30 1.2). By the time he had recovered the spoil and returned in triumph to Ziklag the battle of Gilboa had been fought and Saul was slain. The conduct of D. in relation to his former allies was not more reprehensible than that of the Cid who allied himself with Al-Mu'taman of Saragossa, or of Coriolanus who went over to the Volsci. D. com- posed upon the death of Saul and Jonathan an eloquent eulogy on every sentiment which Achish was capable of expressing.
6.8), a post which he held as long as D. lived. The materials and the skilled workmen for the erection of the palace were supplied by Hiram of Tyre (2 S 5 11). D. now turned his attention to the surrounding territory. The most formidable enemy, the Philis, were worsted in several campaigns, and their power crippled (2 S 17 ff; 8 1). In one of these D. so nearly came by his death, that his people would not afterward permit him to take part in the fighting (21 16-17). One of the first countries against whom D. turned his arms was the land of Moab, which he treated with a severity which would suggest that the Moabite king had ill-treated D.'s father and mother, who had taken refuge with him (8 2). Yet his conduct toward the Brd 'Ammon was even more cruel (12 31), and for a less cause (10 1 f). The king of Zobah (Chalkis) was defeated (8 3), and Israelite garrisons were placed in Syria of Damascus (8 6) and Edom (8 14). The Brd 'Ammon formed a league with the Syrian kingdoms to the N. and E. of Pal (10 6-16), but these also had no success. All those people became tributary to the kingdom of Israel under D. (10 18-19) except the Brd 'Ammon who were actually exterminated for the time being (12 31). Thus the Israelite power was the "great powers" of the world during the reign of D. and his immediate successor.

There is no doubt that the expansion of the boundaries of Israel at this period almost to their ideal size (2 K 18 31; 1 Ch 13 1) was largely due to the wealth which D. accumulated by his trading and by his military successes.

3. Political to the fact that the two great empires of Egypt and Assyria were at the moment passing through a period of weakness and decay. The Assyrian monarchy in a decade his whole empire (from about 1050 B.C. and the 22nd Dynasty—to which Shishak belonged (1 K 14 25)—had not yet arisen. D., therefore, had a free hand when his time came and found no more formidable opposition than that of the petty states bordering upon Pal. Against the combined forces of all the Israelitic tribes these had never been able to effect much.

It had been the custom of the Israelites on setting out upon expeditions in which the nation as a whole took part to carry with them the sacred ark.

4. The Ark box or "ark" which contained the two stone tables (Josh 4 7, etc). When D. had secured the fortress of Jebus for his metropoli in (10 12) he founded in it this emblem of victory. It was then lying at Kiriatjearim, possibly Abu Gosh about 8 miles N.W. of Jerus (cf Ps 132). Owing to the sudden death of one of the drivers, which he interpreted as indicative of anger on the part of Jehovah, D. left the ark at the house of a Philist which happened to be near at hand. As no misfortune befell this person, but on the contrary much prosperity, D. took courage after three months to bring the sacred chest and its contents into Jerusalem. The ceremony was conducted with military honors (2 S 6 1) and with religious dancing and music (6 5-14) and festivity (6 18-19). A tent was pitched for it, in which it remained (7 2), except when it was sent with the army to the seat of war (11 11). D., however, had already built for himself a stone palace, and he wished now to add to it a chapel royal in the shape of a small temple, such as being the neighboring kings had. He was the more anxious so to do as he had much of the material ready to hand in the precious metals which D. had turned the magnificent part of the spoils of the conquered races, such as bronze from Chalkis (8 8), gold and silver (8 11) and the vessels which he had received as a present from the king of Hamath (8 10). He was persuaded, however, by the prophet Nathan to forego that task, on the ground of his having shed much human blood, and to leave it to his successor (1 Ch 22 8; 28 3).

5. Domestic Life.—In accordance with the practice of the kings of his time D. had several wives. His first wife was Michal should be Merab (1 S 15 19). During the period of separation from Michal, D. took to wife Ahinoam of Jezreel and Abigail the wife of Nabal (1 S 25 43-42), who accompanied him to Ziklag (27 3 f), when they were among those captured by the Amal- ked (20 27). Solomon's mother was the daughter of Talmal of Geshur, Maacah, whom he had captured in war (27 8; 2 S 3 3). When he removed to Hebron Ahinoam bore him his eldest son Amnon, and Abigail his second son Chileb or Daniel (2 S 3 3; 1 Ch 3 1). D. lived a year and a half (2 S 6), his mother was Maacah, and his fourth Adonijah. His mother's name was Haggith; nothing is known about her. Two other sons, Shephatiah and Ithream were also born in Hebron (2 S 3 2-5; 1 Ch 3 4-5). D.'s sons discharged largely duties (2 S 8 18; cf Nathan in Zec 12 12). It was perhaps inevitable that in so large a household the usual dissensions and crimes of the harem should have sprung up in plenty. D.'s son D. had a dispute with him, and was killed.

2. Domestic most unvarnished account of these given in 2 S 11-20—it has been suggested by Abiathar the priest in order to avenge himself on Solomon for his disgrace (1 K 2 20). Solomon's mother was the daughter of Bathsheba (2 S 11, 12). Ch. 13 recounts the wrong done to Tamar, the daughter of D. and Maacah, and sister of Absalom, and how the last named, having avenged his sister's honor by killing Amnon, his eldest brother, fled to the court of his brother Absalom, king of Geshur. Thence after two years he returned (ch 14), only to foment rebellion against his father (ch 15), leading to civil war between D. and Judah on the one side and Absalom and Israel on the other (ch 16). When the rebellion collapsed (17), the king himself (ch 18) and of Amasa, D.'s nephew, at the hands of his cousins Joab and Abishai (20 7 ff), as well as nearly precipitating the disruption of the newly founded kingdom (19 43). The rebellion of Absalom was probably due to the fact of Solomon having been designated D.'s successor (cf 12 24; 1 Ch 22 9), for Absalom had the best claim, Amnon being dead and Chileb apparently of no account.

7. His Official.—As D.'s circumstances improved he reduced the number in the management of his affairs. The beginning of his

1. Prophets good fortune had been the friendship of the prophet Samuel (1 S 16 13; 19 18). The prophet or seer was keeper of the king's conscience and was appointed by him but claimed Divine authority (2 S 7 3 ff; 12 1 ff; 24 11 ff). Among the persons who discharged this duty for D. were Gad the seer (1 S 22 5) and Nathan the prophet (1 K 1 1 ff). All these are said to have written memoirs of their times (1 Ch 29 20; 2 Ch 9 9). Next to the prophet came the priest. The ko-hen (priest) was, as the name indicates, a soothsayer or diviner. The duty of Abiathar, 2. Priests D.'s first priest (1 S 22 20 ff), was to carry the ephod—an object of casting lots (23 6 ff), in order to decide what to do in cases where there was no other way of making up one's mind (30.7). It is not to be confused with the dress of the same name (1 S 2 18). Later, at Hebron, Abiathar was given a colleague, Zadok (1 Ch 12 28), and it became their duty to carry the ark in expeditions (1 S 15 24). Shortly after the death of D., Abiathar was deposed by Solomon for his part in Adonijah's attempt to seize the throne (1 K 2 26-27), and Zadok remained sole priest to the king (2 35). D.'s sons also acted in the same capacity (2 18). Solomon appointed an extra private priest in Zadok (2 S 20 26 (cf 25 26-38).

When still an outlaw D. required the services of a henchman to take command of his men in his absence. This post was held at first by different persons according to circumstances, but generally, it seems, by his nephew Abishai (1 S 26 6).

It was only after the death of Saul that his brother Joab threw in his lot with D. His great military talents at once gave him a leading place, and as a reward for the capture of Jecub he was given the chief command, which he held against all rivals (2 S 3 27; 20 10) during the whole reign. D.'s special body-guard of Philo troops—the Cherethites and Pelethites—were commanded by Benaiah, who in the following reign succeeded Zadok (2 35).

The office of recorder or magister memoriae was held during this reign and in the following by Jehoshaphat (2 S 8 16); and that of secretary by Seraiah (2 S 8 7), also called Shaphan (1 Ch 11 10) or Ishbosheth (1 K 4 3). There were also the counsellors, men noted for their great acumen and knowledge of human nature, such as Ahithophel and Hushai.

It was natural that there should be much mutual jealousy and rivalry among these officials, and that some of them should attach themselves to one of D.'s many sons, others to another. Thus Ahmon is the special patron of D.'s nephew Jonadab (2 S 13 3; cf 21 21), and Absalom is backed by Amasa (17 25). The claim of Adonijah to the throne is supported by Joab and Abiathar (1 K 1 7), as against, that of Solomon who was backed by Nathan, Benaiah, and Zadok (11 4). rushial (cf 2 Sam. VII, xiv, 4). Ahithophel sides with Absalom; Hushai with D. (2 S 16 12.32).

VIII. Personal Character of David.—We should obtain a very different idea of the personal character of D. on reading the conclusion of the books of S and K or the books of Ch. There is no doubt whatever that the former books are much nearer to fact, and any estimate or appreciation of D., or of any of the other characters described must be based upon them. The Chronicler, on the other hand, is biased by the religious ideas of his own time and is prejudiced in favor of some of those whose biographies he writes and against others. He accordingly exaggerates the good and minimizes the bad in D.'s life, e.g. the murder of Uriah (1 Ch 20), or sets them in a favorable light, e.g. by laying the blame of the census upon Satan (1 Ch 21). D.'s success, esp. as against Saul's misfortunes, is greatly exaggerated (12 22). Ceremonial functions are greatly elaborated (16 16; cf 2 S 6). The various orders of priests and singers in the second temple have their origin traced back to D. (16 4 ff; 26 ff; chs 25-27), and the temple of Solomon itself is to all intents and purposes that of D. (chs 22-23). At the same time there may be much material in the shape of names and isolated statements not found in the older books, which so long as they are not tinged with the Chronicler's pragmatism or "tendency," may possibly be authentic records preserved within the circle of the priestly caste, e.g. we are told that Saul's skull was fastened in the temple of Dagon (1 Ch 10 10). There is no doubt that the true names of Ish-bosheth, Mephibosheth and Eliaud (2 S 2 8; 4 4; 5 16) were Ish-baal (Esh-baal), Merib-baal, and Bertschab (Ps 73 6; 19 14 7); that the old name of Jerusalem was Jebus (11 4 5; cf Jgs 19 10 11); perhaps a son of D. called Nogah has to be added to 2 S 5 15 from 1 Ch 3 7 14 6; in 2 S 8 6 and 21 18, for Betah and Gob read Tehahnah (21 18). See Gen Ch 19 22 24; 1 Ch 20 4). The incident recounted in 2 S 23 9 ff happened at Pasdammim (1 Ch 11 13). Shammah the Harodite was the son of Elika (2 S 23 25; cf 1 Ch 11 27), and other names in this list have to be corrected after the readings of the Chronicler. This (not seven) years of famine was the alternative offered to D. (2 S 24 13; cf 1 Ch 21 12).

If we could believe that the Book of Ps was in whole or in part the work of D., it would throw a flood of light upon the religious side of his nature. 2. Psalms Indeed, we should know as much about his life as can be doubted about anyone. Unfortunately the date and authorship of the Ps are questions regarding which the opinions are held. In the early Christian centuries all the Ps were ascribed to D. and, where necessary, explained as primarily, or partly, ascribed to others. But it is certain that D.'s poetry is not only an expression of his own personal feelings and ideas, but it sheds light upon his nature and character. The Psalms are expressions of D.'s natural and intellectual life, and are the effect of his religious experience. They express D.'s love of God, his trust in God, and his dependence upon God. They express D.'s gladness in God, his sorrow in God, and his suffering in God. They express D.'s thankfulness to God, his praise to God, and his adoration of God.

In this way the Psalms are the expression of D.'s personal relationship with God, and are the record of his personal experience with God. They are the expression of his personal character, and are the record of his personal history.

3. Complex Character accepted as impossible. Of D.'s character the most opposite estimates have been formed. On one hand he is exalted as a saint, and yet few men have committed worse crimes. The character of D. must remain, like that of everyone, an insoluble enigma. A person is to be judged by his actions, and not by his character, and one's true motives are unknown even to oneself (Jer 7 9). There are several sides of D.'s nature in regard to which there cannot be two opinions. Perhaps the feature of his character which stands out most prominently in his earlier years, at any rate, is his boundless physical courage.

4. Physical He never shirked danger (1 S 17 28). Courage (34 7) and delight in hardship (23 6). Like most Semites he was fond of gambling and liked to take risks (26; cf 23 9; 30 7), even when modesty would have led him to decline them (17 32; cf Jgs 8 20). A native indifference to the shedding of blood grew into a liking for it, giving rise to the crime of cruelty (1 S 27 9; 2 S 8 2; 16 7, etc). He had need, indeed, to be a brave man, considering the character of the men whom he ruled (1 S 22 3). Yet he could rule them by gentleness as well as by force (30 23). All classes had unbounded confidence in his personal courage and soldierly qualities (2 S 18 3), and were themselves driven to restrain his military ardor (21 17).

Whether D. possessed moral courage to an equal degree is another matter. Had he done so he would hardly have permitted the execution of seven sons of Saul (2 S 21 1), Courage and that, too, at the cost of breaking his plighted word (1 S 24 21); he would not have stood in awe of the sons of his sister.
Zeruiah (2 S 3 39), and would have punished Joab instead of weakly invoking an imprecation on his head (ver. 37), however much he might have felt the loss of his services. But that he matters his natural sense of justice was blunted by the superstitions of the age in which he lived.

But D. was even more prudent than courageous. He is so described by the person who recommended him (somatologically) to Saul.

6. Prudence (1 S 16 18). Prudence or wisdom was indeed what his biographer most remarks in him (16 5,30), and situated as he was he could not have too much of it. It shows itself in the fact that he consistently made as many friends and as few enemies as was possible. His wonderful foreshow is seen in such acts as his conciliating the Judean chiefs with gifts taken from his spoil (30 26 ff), in his commedication of the men of Jabel-gilead (2 S 2 11), and his headship of Abner (3 20). Yet it must be confessed that this constant looking forward to the future takes away from the spontaneity of his virtue. His gratitude is often a keen sense of favors to come. His kindness to Mephibosheth did spring from advantage (ch 9; 19 24 ff), and his clemency to Shimei helped to win him the tribe of Benjamin (19 16 ff). Even in his earliest youth he seems to have preferred to attempt his ends by roundabout ways, the means by which he gained introduction or reintroduction to Saul (1 S 17 26 ff) afford some justification for the opinion which his eldest brother held of him (ver 28). Perhaps nothing proves the genius of D. better than his choice of Jesus as the capital of the country—which it still continues to be after a lapse of three thousand years.

Yet it must be confessed that D.'s prudence often degenerates in pugnacity he believed firmly in keeping

7. Strategy one's secret to oneself at all costs (1 S 21 2). The manner in which he got himself out of Gath after this first visit there (21 13) and the fact that he headship of Abner during sixteen months (ch 27; 28 1; 29) may excite our admiration but not our respect. The Oriental, however, delights in a display of cunning and makes use of it without shame (2 S 16 34), just as the European does not. There is an ancient and curiously modern in the diplomacy which D. employed to ensure his own return in due state (19 11 ff). We must remember, however, that D. lived among persons hardly one of whom he could trust. Joab accuses him of treachery and of having been guilty of common obliquity, that he remained as straightforward and simple as he was. D. was, indeed, a man very much ahead of the times in which he lived. He was the oriental sub-

8. Nobility and Absalom show that his nature was untainted with malice. It was no superstitious fear but a high sense of honor which kept him back from putting out of his way his arch-enemy when he had him in his power (1 S 24 26). He even attempts to find an excuse for him (26 19), while depreciating himself (24 14; 26 20) in phrases which are more than a mere oriental metonymy (2 S 8). It was the ambition of his life to be the founder of a permanent dynasty (2 S 7 20), yet he was willing that his house should be sacrificed to save his nation from destruction (24 17). Like most Orientals he was endowed with a refinement of

D.'s chief weakness in regard to his family was his indulgence of some of his sons and favoring some above others, and want of firmness in regard to them. He could refuse them nothing (2 S 13 27). His first favorite was his eldest son Amnon (13 21 LXX). After the death of Amnon, Absalom became the favorite (18 17), but D. was faithful to him (1 K 1 6). There is no reason to doubt the sin-low as to fear losing the good opinion even of Joab, this ready instrument of his worst crime (11 25).

One reason for the high position D. held in the popular estimation was no doubt his almost uninterupted success. He was regarded as the chosen of Heaven; his friend and Success foelike (1 S 23 17). Fortunes 3 4; 5; 17; 23 2; 25 2; 26 24; 30 24; 31 24; 37 24. If there were to be a ruling house, it must be the Davidic dynasty; it did not occur to the Jews the NT to think of any other solution.

12. His Foreign and his patriotism. Eastern peoples are united not by the ties of country but of religion. Still it does seem strange that two of D.'s closest friends were two enemies of his nation—Nahash, king of the Ben Ammon (1 S 11 1; 2 S 10 1 ff) and Achish, lord of Gath (1 S 21 10; 27; 28 1 ff; 29). He appears to have found the Philis more reliable and trustworthy than the Hebrews. When he became king his personal body-guard was composed of mercenaries of that nation—the Cherethites and Peletites—whom he had become acquainted with at Ziklag (1 S 30 14; 2 S 8 18; 20 20). It was to a native of Gath that the care of the sacred ark in its passage from Kiriat-jearim to Jerusalem (2 S 6 10 11). When the rebellion broke out under Absalom, he committed one-third of his forces to a banished soldier of the same town, who had come to him a little while before, and take the hand of followers (2 S 16 19 ff; 18 2). Some of the soldiers in whom he placed the greatest confidence were Hitites (1 S 26 6; 2 S 11 6), and his commissariat was furnished by persons outside of Israel (2 S 17 27; the Machir tribe were half Syrian; Gilead is the son of Machir, 1 Ch 7 14). The threshing-floor of a Jebusite became the site of the temple of Solomon (2 S 24 18 ff).

D. was a strong believer in the power of Nemesis, and that daughter of Night played a considerable role in his life. He felt a peculiar satisfaction in being undescendedly cursed by Shimeel, from a conviction that poetic justice would in the end prevail (2 S 16 12). He must have felt that the same unseen power was at work when his own eldest son was judged of a crime such as his father had committed before him (2 S 13 and 11), and when the grandfather of the wife of Uriah the Hitite became the enemy whom he had most to fear (2 S 11 3; 24; if of David's own stock). He would have thought, instead of being sent in repose and peace following upon a strenuous and successful life, were passed in meeting out vengeance to those who had incurred his displeasure as well as commending those who had done him service (1 K 2 5 ff).

Even as early as Ezechiel D. became the ruler who was to govern the restored people of Israel (34 23; 24; 37 24). If there were to be a ruling house, it must be the Davidic dynasty; it did not occur to the Jews the NT to think of any other solution.

14. Reference in the NT. The NT is the true Davidic dynasty; it did not occur to the Jews the NT to think of any other solution.

That Jesus was descended from D. (Mt 1 7; Mt 1 15; Mt 27 5) is proved by the fact that his enemies did not deny that he was so (22 41 ff). In the NT, D. is regarded as the author of the Ps (Acts 4 25; Rom 10 17; He 4 7) and as one of the OTP saints (He 11 32) whose actions (unless otherwise stated) are to be imitated (Mt 12 3); but yet not to be compared with the Messiah (Acts 2 29 ff; 13 30) who has power over the life to come (Rev 1 and 5; 22 16).

DAVID, ROOT, rööt. Of (א לֶא דָאָוִּי, hē rhize Davidl., Rev 5 5; 22 16). Here root means stock, family, descendant, hence 'the Root of David' is the one which descends from the fat of that from which David descended. Jesus Christ in His human nature and family connections was a descendant of David, a member of his family.

DAWN, dōn, DAWNING: The word means the approach of the morning light, the breaking of the day. There are several words in the Bible that indicate this. AaueCS, nesheph, 'twilight' of the morning (Job 7 3; 10 8), is used for evening twilight (1 S 30 17; 2 K 7 5 7). əḇḇāḇ 'the turning' of the morning, the change from darkness to light, approach of the morning (Jgs 19 26); əḇḇāḇ ʿephēḇ, 'the eyelids' of the morning (Job 3 9; 11 18 10); ʿelāḇ ʿelāḇ, 'the ascent or the rising of the morning' (Josh 6 15); ʿerōb ʿerōb, 'to grow bright', the approach of the dawn (Mt 28 1; Lk 23 54); ʿaḇḇāḇ, 'to give light', 'to turn white', the end of the evening and night (Acts 2 19 2). ʿaḇḇāḇ, 'to go to bed', 'to turn white', the end of the evening and night (Acts 2 19 2). DAY, dā (דָּיָּ֔, yom; ḫāpē, hēmēnā). This common word has caused some trouble to plain readers, because they have not noticed that the word is used in several different senses in the Eng. Bible. When the different uses of the word are understood the difficulty of interpretation vanishes. We note several different senses of the word:

(1) It sometimes means the time from daylight till dark. This popular meaning is easily discovered by the context, e.g. Gen 1 5; 8 22, etc. The marked periods of this daytime were morning, noon and night, and of his own accord (22 17). The exact hours were sometimes called 'the cool of the day' (Gen 3 8). After the exile the day or daytime was divided into twelve hours and the night into twelve (see Mt 20 12; Jn 11 9; Acts 23 32). 6 AM corresponded to the first hour, 9 AM to the third; 12 M to the sixth, etc. The hours were longer during the longer days and shorter during the shorter days, as they always counted 12 hours between sunrise and sunset.

(2) Day also means a period of 24 hours, or the time from sunset to sunset. In Bible usage the day begins with sunset (see Lev 23:32; Ex 12:15–20; 2 Cor 11:25, where night is put before day). See DAY AND NIGHT.

(3) The word "day" is also used of an indefinite period, "the day" or "day that means in general "that time" (see Gen 2:4; Lev 14:2); "day of trouble" (Ps 20:1); "day of his wrath" (Job 20:28); "day of Jehovah" (Isa 12:2); "day of the Lord" (1 Cor 5:5; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10); "day of salvation" (2 Cor 6:2); "day of Jesus Christ" (Phil 1:6)."

(4) It is used figuratively also in Jn 9:4, where "while it is day" means "while I have opportunity to work, as daytime is the time for work." In 1 Thess 5:5,8; "sons of the day" means spiritually enlightened ones.

(5) We must also bear in mind that with God time is not reckoned as with us (see Ps 90:4; 2 Pet 3:8).

(6) The apocalyptic use of the word "day" in Dn 12:13; Rev 2:10, etc., is difficult to define. It evidently does not mean a natural day. See APOCALYPSE.

(7) On the meaning of "day" in the story of Creation we note (a) the word "day" is used of the whole period of creation (Gen 2:4); (b) these days are divided into twelve hours; when the whole age or period of salvation is called "the day of salvation"; see above. So we believe that in harmony with Bible usage we may understand the creative days as creative periods. See also ASTRONOMY; CREATION; EVOLUTION.

Figurative: The word "day" is used in many senses, some of which are here given.

(1) The span of human life. —Gen 5:4: "And the days of Adam were eight hundred years." "And if thou wilt walk ... then I will lengthen thy days" (1 K 3:14; cf Ps 90:12; Isa 38:5).

(2) An indefinite period. —Existence in general: Gen 3:14: "All the days of thy life" (cf Gen 21:34; Nu 9:19; Josh 22:3; Lk 1:24; Acts 21:10).

(3) A set time. —Gen 25:24: "And when her days ... were fulfilled"; Dn 12:13: "Thou shalt stand in thy lot, at the end of the days" (cf Lev 12:6; Dn 2:44).

(4) A historical period. —Gen 6:4: "The Nephilim were in the earth those days"; Jgs 17:6: "In those days there was no king in Israel" (cf 1 S 3:1; 1 Ch 5:17; Hos 2:13).

(5) Past time. —Ps 10:18: "the day of my calamity"; Ps 7:9: "I have considered the days of old" (cf Mic 7:20; Mal 3:7; Mt 23:30).

(6) Future time. —Dt 31:14: "Thy days approach that thou must die"; Ps 72:7: "In his days shall ..." (cf Ezk 23:14; Joel 2:29; Mt 24:19; 2 Pet 3:3; Rev 9:6).

(7) The eternal. —In Dn 7:9,13, where God is called "the ancient of days." (8) A season of opportunity. —Jn 9:4: "We must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work" (cf Rom 13:12,13; 1 Thess 5:5–8). See DAY (4), above.

(9) Time of salvation. —Specially referring to the hopes and prospects of the parousia (see ESCHATOLOGY OF NT). Rom 13:12: "The night is far spent, and the day is at hand."

DAY AND NIGHT: "Day." יָמָה, yōm; ordinarily, the Heb "day" lasted from dawn to the coming forth of the stars (Neh 4:21). The context usually makes it clear whether the term "day" refers to the period of twenty-four hours or to daytime; when there was a possibility of confusion, the term יָמָּה, laydāh, "night," was added (Gen 7:4,12; 31:30). The "day" is reckoned from evening to evening, in accordance with the order noted in the account of Creation, viz. "And there was evening and there was morning, one day" (Gen 1:5); Lev 23:32 and Dn 8:14 reflect the same mode of reckoning the day. The phrase יָמָּה בָּאָה, 'erēb bōēr, "evening-morning," used in this last passage, is simply a variation of yōm bōēr, "day-night." It is the equivalent of the Gr ἐργασία, νυκτόθερον (2 Cor 11:25). That the custom of reckoning the day as beginning in the evening and lasting until the following evening was probably of late origin is shown by the phrase yom tov (day all night). Jgs 19:19–23; 20:24. The context shows that the day is regarded as beginning in the morning; in the evening the day "declined," and until the new day (morning) arrived it was necessary to "tarry all night" (cf also Nu 11:23).

The transition of day to night begins before sunset and lasts till after sunset; the change of night to day begins before sunrise and continues until after sunrise. In both cases, neither 'erēb, "evening," nor bōēr, "morning," indicate an exact space of time (cf Neh 13:11; Ex 10:14). The Heb word לָיְדוֹת, laydāh, is for both morning and evening; it is the equivalent of the Gk ἐργασία, νυκτόθερον. Afternoon was part of the day when the sun declined (יָמָּה הָיֵם, nēth hā-yōm); and evening was the time of the going down of the sun (יָמָּה בָּאָה, 'erēb). "Between the evenings" (יָמָּה בָּאָה לָיְדוֹת, bēn hā-‘erēb) was the interval between noon and darkness. The day was not divided into hours until a late period. לָיְדוֹת, shādāh = Aram. (Dn 3:6), is common in Syr and in later Heb; it denoted, originally, any short space of time, and only later came to be equivalent to our "hour." The Thesalonian division of the day into watches continued into post-exilic Rom times; but the Rom method of four divisions was also known (Mk 1:35), where all four divisions are referred to: "at even" (σβδμ, ouēth), "midnight" (μωσήνοικος, mesosēlπonēt), "at cock crowing" (ἀλατοφωνία, aλαλωτοφωνία), "in the morning" (ερῶν, proō). These last extended from six to six o'clock (cf also Mt 14:25; Mk 13:35). Acts 12:4 speaks of four particular periods on four Rom squares (quadrans), each of whom had to keep guard during one watch of the night. In Brākkadh 38, Rabbi Nathan (2d cent.) knows of only three night-watches; but the patriarch, Rabbi Judah, knows four. See also DAY.

DAY BEFORE THE SABBATH (נ עֶסֶרֵכֶעַ, hē parasekēq, "preparation"): Considered as a day of preparation, in accordance with Ex 16:23, both before the regular Sabbath and before a feast Sabbath (Mt 27:62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:14–31; p. 14).

At 3 PM, the Hebrews began to prepare their food for the next day, and to perform all labors which were forbidden to be done on the Sabbath and yet must be done. They bathed and purified themselves, dressed in festive apparel, set their tables, and lighted their lamps. On the day before Easter, the Hebrews of the later period made it their chief business to remove all leaven from the house (1 Cor 5:7). This custom of converting at least a portion of the day before the Sabbath into a holy day was recognized by the Romans to such an extent that, according to a rescript of Augustus, Jews need not appear in court after 3 PM on such days. Criminal cases were not brought before court on this day, and journeys exceeding 12 Rom miles were prohibited. The signal for the preparations was given by the priests by means of trumpets blown six times at intervals.

DAY, LAST (ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα): Repeatedly used by Jesus in Jn (6 39, 40, 44, 54; 11 24; 12 48) for the day of resurrection and judgment (see Eschatology of the NT). Cf. the usage in the OT (Isa 2 2, Mic 4 1) and the NT (Acts 2 17; 2 Tim 3 1; 2 Pet 3 3; 1 Jn 2 18; Jude ver 18) of "last days" and "last time" to denote the Messianic age. See Latter Days; Last Days; Last Time.

In Jn 7 37, "the last day, the great day of the feast" refers to the eighth day of the feast of Tabernacles. This closing day was observed as a Sabbath (Lev 23 36). On it the libation of water made on other days was not made; hence the allusion of Jesus to Himself as the Giver of the living water.

DAY OF THE LORD (JEHOVAH) (ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου, ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου): The idea is a common OT one. It denotes the consummation of the kingdom of God and the absolute cessation of all attacks upon it (Isa 2 12; 13 6, 9; 34 8; Ezek 13 5; 30 3; Joel 1 15; 2 11; Am 5 18; Zeph 1 14; Zec 1 14). It is a "day of visitation" (Joel 10 5), a day "of the wrath of Jehovah" (Ezek 7 19), a "great day of Jehovah" (Zeph 1 14). The entire conception in the OT is dark and foreboding.

On the other hand the NT idea is pervaded with the elements of hope and joy and victory. In the NT it is eminently the day of Christ, the day of His coming in the glory of His person. Very conception of Him as the "Son of Man" points to this day (E. Kuehl, Das Selbstbewusstein Jesu, 68). In Jn 5 28: "And he that believeth on me, the same shall live even as he liveth," He is saying in effect, "He is the Christ," the Son of Man, the judge of all. It is true in the NT there is a dark background to the bright picture, for it still remains a "day of wrath" (Rom 2 5, 6), a "great day" (Rev 6 17; Jude ver 6), a "day of God" (2 Pet 3 12), a "day of judgment" (2 Pet 15; 2 Pet 3 7; Rom 2 16). Sometimes it is called "that day" (Rom 7 22; 1 Thess 5 4; 2 Tim 4 8), and again it is called "the day" without any qualification whatever, as if it were the only day worth counting in all the history of the world and of the race (1 Cor 3 13). To the unbeliever, the NT depicts it as a day of terror; to the believer, as a day of joy. For on that day Christ will raise the dead, esp. His own dead, the bodies of those that believed in Him—"that all that which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day" (Jn 6 39). In that day He comes to His own (Mt 16 27), and therefore it is called "the day of our Lord Jesus" (2 Cor 1 14), "the day of Jesus Christ" or "Christ's day" (Phil 1 6, 10), the day when there shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Mt 24 30). All Paulinian lit. is esp. suffused with this longing for the "parousia," the day of Christ's glorious manifestation. The entire conception of that day centers therefore in Christ and points to the everlasting establishment of the kingdom of heaven, from which sin will be forever eliminated, and in which the antithesis between Nature and grace will be changed into an everlasting synthesis. DAYS JOURNEY, ἰόρην (ἡ ἰόρην, ἰόρην), derekh yom, Gen 30 36; Nu 10 33; 11 31: ἰόρην (ἡ ἰόρην), ἰόρην, hodès, ἰόρην 44); The common way of estimating distances in the East is by hours and days. This is natural in a country where roads are more bridle paths or non-existent, as in the desert. The distance traveled must of course differ largely according to the difficulties of the way, and it is more important to know where night will overtake the traveler than the actual distance accomplished. A day's journey is now commonly reckoned at about 3 miles per hour, the distance usually covered by a loaded mule, the number of hours being about 8. Hence a day's journey is about 24 miles, and this may be taken as a fair estimate for Bible times.

DAYS, LAST. See Last Days.

DAYS MAN, ἀνθρώπινος (ἡ ἀνθρώπινος, ἀνθρώπινος), "to argue, decide, convince," RV UMPIRE: The use of this word appears to have been more common in the 16th cent. than at the later date of the tr of AV, when its adoption was frequent. The oldest instance of the term given in the Oxford English Dictionary is Plumptre Corresp. (1889), p. 82: "Sir, the daysmen cannot agree us." It appears also in the 1551 text of the OT in 1 3 25, where the RV of Gen 31 37. It was the eastern custom for a judge to lay his hands upon the heads of the two parties in disagreement, thus emphasizing his adjudicatory capacity and his desire to render an unbiased verdict. Job no doubt considers a hand put upon an actor of acting as an umpire upon his own claims, but no man was worthy to question the purposes of Jehovah, or metaphorically, to "lay his hands upon" Him.

In the NT (1 Cor 4 3, ἀνθρώπινος, ἀνθρώπινος, ἀνθρώπινος, "man's judgment," lit. "man's day," in the sense of a day fixed for the trial of a case. Both Tindale and Coverdale so translate. See also 1 Tim 2 5, where the Saviour is termed the "one mediator . . . between God and men." Here the word understands a pleader, an advocate before an umpire, rather than the adjudicator himself (see Job 19 25-27).

DAYSpring, dā'spring: This beautiful Eng. word, in current usage, the time of the AV, is found in the OT as the two of ἰόρην, shahar, "Hast thou caused the day spring to know his place?" (Job 38 12 AV). This is no doubt intended lit. for the dawn. The "place" of the dayspring is the particular point of the horizon at which the sun comes up on any given day. This slowly changes day by day through the year, moving northward from midwinter to midsummer, and back again southward from midsummer to midwinter. See Astronomy, I. 2. Also once in the NT for ἐνατάντη, ἐνατάντη, a rising."

DAY-STAR

Also called Day-star, the morning star, and the star of the east. The moral significance of the morning star is illustrated by its being applied to Jesus (Matt 2:2), to John the Baptist (Rev 1:6), and to the Shining One who comes in the clouds with great power and glory (Dan 7:13). In the Old Testament the sun is called the morning star (Ps 118:24), and in the New Testament the dawn of the age (Lk 21:28).

DAY-STAR

Dead Sea

"The daystar from on high hath visited us" (AV; RV "shall visit us"); Lk 1:78. Also in Apoc, "At the daystar prays upon thee" (Rev 10:1). RV "plead with thee at the dawning of the light." 46:18. Both the Heb and Gr words, however, are of frequent occurrence, but variously rendered, "dawn," "break of day," "morning," "sunrise," "east." Note, esp., the "spring of the day" (1 S 9:26), "the day began to spring" (Igs 19:25). Used with "helios," "sun," for rising of the sun (Rev 7:2; 16:12). In LXX the same Gr word is used for Heb 쨔נה, "branch," to designate the Messiah (Jer 23:5; Zec 6:12). But this sense of the word is unhappily unknown in profane Gr. The word is also employed in LXX to express the rising of a heavenly body, as the moon (2sa 60:19). This is good Gr. See the kindred vb. anáello, "to rise" (LXX, Isa 60:1; Mal 4:2).

What is the meaning of anatolë in Lk 1:78? Certainly not branch; that does not fit any of the facts, unless it be rendered "branch of light" (see Reynolds, John the Baptist, 115). It occurs in Zacharias' hymn over the birth of his son: The word consists of two parts, "The glory of the Messiah's kingdom," and "the glory of the Forerunner." The expression before us is in the latter part. It naturally refers, therefore, not to the Messiah himself, but to John. He is the daystar from on high who hath visited the people (RV "world") in darkness and the shadow of death. With Godet we believe that the word is borrowed from the caravan which has missed its way in the desert. The unfortunate pilgrims, overtaken by the night, are sitting down expecting death, when suddenly a star brightly beams above them. They take courage at the sight. The whole caravan leaps to its feet. It is the herald of the coming day and soon they see the great orb himself filling the east with orient pearl and gold. Is not one tempted to go a little farther and see here the morning star, herald of the coming sun to be obliterated by his rising? 'He must wax, but I must wane' (Jn 3:30). What was John's work but, by his own testimony, to guide the benighted pilgrims into the way of peace, that is, to Him who was the Prince of Peace? If, however, as by most commentators, it be taken to refer to the Messiah, it probably implies prophetic knowledge that the great orb of the sun, already taken place, and that the Messianic era was at hand, when the Jewish world should be filled with spiritual splendor. See DAY-STAR.

DAY-STAR (תַּמְ套装ְלָה, hîâl bên-sâhâr, Isa 14:12; ἡφαίστος, ἡφαίστος, 2 Pet 1:19). The OT passage is rendered in AV "Lucifer, son of the morning," in AVM and RV "day-star," i.e. the morning star. The reference is to the king of Babylon (ver 4). In 2 Pet 1:19, "Until . . . the day-star arise in your hearts," the word is lit. "light-bringer." It is applicable, therefore, not only to the planet Venus, seen as a morning star, herald of the dawn, but to the sun itself, and is used here as a title of Our Lord. See Astronomy, 1, 6.

DAY, THAT (THE). See DAY OF THE LORD.

DEACON, dek'n, DEACONESS, dek'-n-es. The term διάκονοι, διάκονα, and its cognates occur: many times in the NT, as do its synonyms ἱερέας, ἱερέας, and δωδος, δωδος, with their respective cognates. It may be said in general that the terms denote the service or ministration of the bondservant (διάκονος, διάκονα), in all shades and gradations of meaning both literal and metaphorical. It would serve no useful purpose to list and discuss all the passages in detail. Christianity has from the beginning stood for filial service to God and His kingdom and for brotherly helpfulness to man, and hence terms expressive of these functions abound in the NT. We have already inquired where and when they occur in a technical sense sufficiently defined to denote the institution of a special ecclesiastical office, from which the historical diaconate may confidently be said to be derived.

Many have sought the origin of the diaconate in the institution of the Seven at Jerusalem (Acts 6), and this view was countenanced by many of the church Fathers. The Seven were appointed to "serve tables" (diakonein τροφήνων) in order to permit the Twelve to "pray and fast" (Acts 6:6), and in the ministry (diakonia) of the word." They are not called deacons (diakonoi), and the qualifications required are not the same as those prescribed by Paul in 1 Tim 3:8-13; furthermore, Stephen appears in Acts 6:8 as a deacon. Paul clearly recognizes women as deaconesses, but will not permit a woman to teach (1 Tim 2:12). The obvious conclusion is that the Seven may be called in the earliest records helpers of the Twelve as directors of the church, and that they served in the capacity, among others, of specially appointed ministrants to the poor.

Paul says, "I commend unto you Phoebe our sister, who is a servant in the church that is at Cenchreae" (Rom 16:1). This is by many taken as referring to an officially appointed deaconess; but the fact that there is in the earlier group of Paul's epistles no clear evidence of the institution of the diaconate, and the absence of any corresponding word in the Greek, shows that this interpretation is wrong. Phoebe was clearly an honored helper in the church closely associated with that at Corinth, where likewise evidence of special ecclesiastical organization is wanting.

In Phil 1:1 Paul and Timothy send greetings "to all the saints . . . at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." Here we find mention of "deacons" in a way to suggest a formal diaconate; but the want of definitions as to their qualifications and duties renders it impossible to affirm with certainty the existence of the office.

In 1 Tim 3:8-12, after prescribing the qualifications and the method of appointment of a bishop or overseer, Paul continues: "Deacons in like manner must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre; holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And let them also first be proved; then let them serve as deacons, if unblamable; in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, temperate, faithful in all things. Let deacons be husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well." Deacons and deaconesses are here provided for, and the character of their qualifications makes it clear that they were to be appointed as dispensers of alms, who should come into close personal relations with the poor.

We conclude, therefore, that the Seven and Phoebe did not exercise the diaconate in a technical sense, which appears first certainly in 1 Tim 3, although it is not improbably recognized in Phil 1:1, and was foreshadowed in the various agencies for the dispensing of alms and the care of the poor of the church instituted in various churches at an earlier date. DEAD, ded (תָּמִי, mût; νεκρός, nekros): Used in several senses: (1) base substantive, denoting the body deprived of life, as when Abraham speaks of burying his dead (Gen 23); (2) as a collective noun including all those that have passed away from life (as Rev 20:12). In several passages dead in DEAD BODY. See Corpse.

DEADLY, ded-il'. In the OT two words are used in the sense of "a mortal [Heb nephesh, "hateful," "foul"] enemy." (Ps 17 9), and in the sense of "fatal disease," the destructive result of which causes a general panic (Héb mā'āš, "death," 1 S 6 11).

In the NT we have in Rev 12 12 the expression "deadly wound" (Gr thámatos), better "death-stroke," as in RV, and the phrases "deadly thing," i.e. poison (thandásimó'n), ii. Mk 16 18), and "full of deadly poison" (méstis tōu thantasi-thínovóro, Jas 3 8), said of an unruled tongue. Both Gr words convey the idea of "causing or bringing death" and occur in classical lit., in a variety of uses in combination with the bite of venomous reptiles, deadly poisons, mortal wounds and fatal contagion.

LITERATURE

The name given by Gr and Lat writers to the remarkable inland lake occupying the deepest part of the depression of the Arabah (q.v.). In the Bible it is called the Salt Sea (Gen 14 3; Dt 3 17); the Sea of the Plain (Ar'dhabh) (Josh 3 10); and the (East) Eastern Sea (Ezk 47 18; Joel 2 20). Among the Arabs it is still called Bahar Lut (Sea of Lot). By Jos it was called Lake Asphaltites (Ant, I, ix) from the quantities of bitumen or asphalt occasionally washed upon its shores and found in some of the tributary wadis.

About two-thirds of the distance to the southern end, the peninsula, el-Lisan ("the Tongue"), projects from the top more than half-way across the lake, being in the shape, however, of a boat rather than a tongue, with the toe to the N., forming a bay between it and the eastern mainland. The head of this bay has been largely filled in by the débris brought down by Wady Kerak, and Wady Ben Hamid, and shoals very gradually down to the greatest depths to the N. The toe of this peninsula is named Point Costigan, and the heel, Point Molyneux, after two travelers who lost their lives about the middle of the 19th cent. in pioneer attempts to explore the lake. Over the entire area S. of Point Molyneux, the water is shallow, being nowhere more than 15 ft. deep, and for the most part not over 10 ft., and in some places less than 6 ft. In high water the lake extends a mile or more beyond low-water mark, over the Mud Flat (Sebhah) at the south end.

From the history of the crossing of the Jordan by Joshua and the expedition of Chedorlaomer when Lot was captured, it is evident that the outlines of the sea were essentially the same 3,500 years ago as they are now, showing that there has been no radical change in climatic conditions since then.

II. Former Enlargement—But if we go back a few thousand years into prehistoric times the evidence is abundant that the valley has witnessed remarkable climatic changes (see ARABAH). At Ain Abu Wiedah, about 40 miles beyond the south end of the lake, Hull in 1883 discovered deposits of an abandoned shore line 1,400 ft. above its level (see ARABAH). A pronounced abandoned shore line at the 650 ft. level had been observed first by Tristram, and noted afterward by many travelers. But from the more detailed examination made by Professor Ellsworth Huntington in 1909 (see Pal and Its Transformation) five abandoned shore lines of marked size have been determined, surrounding the valley at the following approximate heights above the present level of the lake: 1,430, 640, 430, 300 and 250 ft. He states that "at its greatest extent the sea stretched at least 30 miles south of its present termination, while northward it probably covered the Sea of Galilee and the Waters of Merom, and sent an arm into the Vale of Jezreel. . . . Lacustrine deposits exist in the Jordan valley shortly south of the Sea of Galilee. A mile north of Mar el-Mujumieh, as the modern railroad bridge is called, a tilted series of clays, apparently lacustrine, lies under some untilted whitish clays, also apparently lacustrine. The elevation here is about 840 ft. below that of the Mediterranean Sea, or 450 above the Dead Sea. . . . So far as can be detected by the aneroid the highest deposits [about the Dead Sea] lie at the same elevation on all sides of the lake."

There are also numerous minor strands below the 250 ft. major strand. These are estimated by Huntington as 210, 170, 145, 115, 90, 70, 56, 40, 30 and 12 ft. above the lake successively. It is noted, also, that the lower beaches all show less erosion than those above them. This certainly points to a gradual diminution of the water in the basin during the prehistoric period, while on the other hand there is much evidence that there has been a considerable rise in the water within the historic period. Date palms and tamarisks are seen standing out from the water in numerous places some little distance from the present shore where the water is several feet deep. These are of such size as to show that for many years the soil in which they grew was not subject to overflow. As long ago as 1876 Merrill noticed such trees standing in the water 40 ft. from the shore, near the N.E. corner of the lake (East of the Jordan, 224). Numerous trunks of date palms and tamarisks can now be seen submerged to a similar extent along the western shore. In 1818 Irby and Mangles (Travels, 454) saw a company of Arabs ford the lake from Point Molyneux to the west side, and noted that the branches of trees which had been stuck into the bottom. In 1838 Robinson found the water at such a stage that the ford was impracticable and so it has been reported by all travelers since that time. But Mr. A. Forder, having recently examined the evidence for the Pal Exploration Fund, learns from the older Arabs that formerly there was a well-known causeway leading from el-Lisdn opposite Wady Kerak to Wady Umam Baghek, across which sheep, goats and men could pass, while camels and mules could be driven across anywhere in the water. Moreover the Arab guide said that the channel "was so narrow that the people of his tribe used to sit on the edge of the Lisdn and parley with Arabs from the west as to the return of cattle that had been stolen by one or other of the parties."

III. Level of, in Early Historic Times.—Numerous general considerations indicate that in the early historic period the level of the water was so much lower than now that much of the bay S. of Point Molyneux was dry land. In Josh 15 2.5 f. the south border of Judah is said to extend from "the bay [tongue, Lisdn] that looketh southward" while the "border of the north quarter was from the bay [tongue, Lisdn] of the sea at the end of the Jordan: and the border went up to Beth-hoglah, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah." If the limits of the north end of the Dead Sea were the same as now the boundary must have turned down to the mouth of the Jordan by a sharp angle. But according to the description it runs almost exactly E. and W. from beyond Jerus to Beth-hoglah, and nothing is said about any change in direction, while elsewhere, any such abrupt change in direction as is here supposed is carefully noted. Furthermore, in detailing the boundary of Benjamin (Josh 18 19) we are told that "the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward; and the going out of the border were at the north bay [tongue, Lisdn] of the Salt Sea, at the south end of the Jordan: this was the south border." This can hardly have any other meaning than that the north end of the Dead Sea was at Beth-hoglah. From these data Mr. Clermont-Ganneau (see Recueil d'archéologie orientale, V [1902], 267-80) inferred that in the time of Joshua the level of the sea was so much higher than now that a tongue-like extension reached the vicinity of Beth-hoglah, while the underlying topography was essentially the same as now. On the contrary, our present knowledge of the geologic forces in operation would indicate that at that time the Dead Sea was considerably lower than now, and that its rise to its present level has been partly caused by the silting up of a bay which formerly extended to Beth-hoglah.
The geological evidence concerning this point is so interesting, and of so much importance in its bearing upon our interpretation of various historical statements concerning the region, that it is worth while to present it somewhat in detail. As already stated (see Ararat), the present level of the Dead Sea is determined by the equilibrium established between the evaporation (estimated at 20,000,000 cubic ft. per diem) over the area and the amount of the extent to which these encroachments have tended to narrow the limits of the original lake. The sediment deposited by the Jordan, at the north end of the Dead Sea, is practically all derived from the portion of the drainage basin between it and the Sea of Galilee—the latter serving as a catch-basin to retain the sediment brought down from the upper part of the valley. The Zôr, or narrow channel which the Jordan has eroded in the sedimentary water brought into the valley by the tributary streams. The present area of the sea is, in round numbers, 300 sq. miles. The historical evidence shows that this evaporating surface has not varied appreciably since the time of Abraham. But the encroachments of the delta of the Jordan upon this area, as well as of the deltas of several other streams, must have been very great since that period. The effect of this would be to limit the evaporating surface, which would cause the water to rise until it overflowed enough of the low land at the south end to restore the equilibrium.

It is easy to make an approximate calculation of plain through which it flows (see Jordan, Valley of), is approximately half a mile wide, 100 feet deep, and 60 miles long. All the sediment which formerly filled this has been swept into the head of the sea, while the Jarmuk, the Jabbok, and a score of smaller tributaries descending rapidly from the bordering heights of Gilead, three or four thousand ft. above the valley, bring an abnormal amount of debris into the river, as do a large number of shorter tributaries which descend an equal amount from the mountains of Galilee, Samaria, and Judah. The entire area thus contributing to this part of the Jordan is not less than 8,000 sq. miles.
All writers are impressed by the evidence of the torrential floods which fill these water courses after severe storms. The descent being so rapid, permits the water after each rainfall to run off without delay, and so intensifies its eroding power. The well-known figure of Our Lord (Mt. 7:26 f.) in describing the destruction of the house which is built upon the sand, when the rains descend and the winds beat upon it, is drawn from Nature. The delta terraces at the mouths of such mountain streams where they debouch on the lowlands are formed and re-formed with extreme rapidity, each succeeding storm tending to wash the previous delta down to lower levels and carry away whatever was built upon it.

The storms which descend upon the plains of Gilgal, as well as those upon the Judaean hills, are exceedingly destructive. For though the rainfall at Jerusalem, according to the observations of Chaplin (see J. Glaisher, "On the Fall of Rain at Jerusalem," PEFS [January, 1894], 39) averages but 20 inches annually, ranging from 32.21 inches in 1878 to 15.89 inches in 1870, nearly all occurs in the three winter months, and therefore in quantities to be, most effective in erosive capacity. And this is effective upon both sides of the Jordan valley, in which the rainfall is very slight. "Day after day," Tristram remarks, "we have seen the clouds, after pouring their fatness on Samaria and Judaea, pass over the valley, and then descend in torrents on the hills of Gilgal and Moab," a phenomenon naturally resulting from the rising column of heated air coming up from the torrid conditions of the depressed Jordan valley.

Tristram (The Land of Moab, 23, 24) gives a vivid description of the effect of a storm near Jerus. As his party was encamped during the night the whole slope up which they pitched became a shallow stream, while the deep ravines of the wilderness of Judah [were] covered with torrents, and tiny cascades rolling down from every rock . . . . So easily disintegrated is the soft limestone of these wadis, that the rain of a few hours . . . . did more to deepen and widen the channels than the storms of several years could effect on a Northumbrian hillside. No geologist could watch the effect of this storm without being convinced that in calculating the progress of denudation, other factors than that of time must be taken into account, and that denudation may proceed most rapidly where rains are most uncertain.

Lieutenant Lynch writes that while ascending the Kerak "there came a shout of thunder from the dense cloud which had gathered at the summit of the gorge, followed by a rain, compared to which the gentle showers of our more favoured clime are as dew drops to the overflowing cistern . . . . The black and threatening cloud soon enveloped the mountain tops, the lightning playing across it in incessant flashes, while the loud thunder reverberated from side to side of the appalling chasm. Between the peaks we soon heard a roaring and continuous sound. It was the torrent from the rain cloud, sweeping in a long line of foam down the steep declivity, bearing along huge fragments of rocks, which, striking against each other, sounded like mimetic thunder."

I can bear similar testimony from observations when traveling in Turkesthan where the annual rainfall is only about 4 inches. At one time a storm was seen raging upon the mountains 20 miles away, where it spent its entire force without shedding a drop upon the plain. Upon skirting the base of the mountain the next day, however, the railroad track was covered for a long distance 2 or 3 ft. deep with débris which had been washed down by the cloudburst. No one can have any proper comprehension of the erosive power of the showers of Pal without duly taking into account the extent and the steepness of the descent from the highlands on either side, and the irregularity of the rainfall. These form what in the Rocky Mountains would be called arroyos. After the débris has been brought into the Jordan by these torrents, and the rise of water... makes it "overflow all its banks." The sediment is thereby swept into the Dead Sea with great rapidity. All these considerations indicate that the deltas of the streams coming into the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea must be increasing at an unusually rapid rate. It will be profitable, therefore, to compare it with other deltas upon which direct observations have been made. The Mississippi River, which is sweeping into the Gulf of Mexico sediment at a rate which represents one foot of surface soil over the whole drainage basin, extending from the Rocky Mountains to the Alleghenies, in a little less than 3,000 miles in its way, has taken its drainage basin a foot in 1,464 years, while the river Po is reducing its level a foot in 729 years. So rapidly has the river Po filled up its valley that the city of Adria, which was a seaport 2,000 years ago, is now 14 miles from the mouth of the river. The Tigris and Euphrates rivers have silted up the head of the Persian Gulf nearly 100 miles. (See Croll, Climate and Time, 332, 333; Darwin, Formation of Vegetable Mould through the Action of Worms, 253.) From these observations it is a conservative estimate that the tributaries of the Jordan River between the Lake of Galilee and the Dead Sea bring down sediment enough to lower the basin one foot in 2,000 years, so that since the time of Abraham 167,-270,000,000 cu. ft. of solid material have been added to its delta. This would cover 25 sq. miles 250 ft. deep. Taking into consideration the probable depth of water at the north end of the sea, it is, therefore, not an extravagant supposition that the Jordan delta has increased upon the sea to the extent of 15 or 20 sq. miles, limiting the evaporative surface to that extent and causing the level of the water to rise, and extend an equal amount over the low lands at the south end.

At the same time the other streams coming directly into the lake have been contributing deltas to narrow its margin at various points. The Kerak, the Arnon and the Zerka Matrain bring in an immense amount of sediment from the E.; el-Hess, el-Jeb and el-Pikri from the S.; and Wady el-Mahawat, el-Arejeh and the Kedron, with numerous smaller intermediate streams, from the W. A detailed examination of these deposits will serve the double purpose of establishing the point in question and give a vivid conception of the sea and its surroundings.

Throughout the lower part of its course the river Jordan flows as has already been said, through a narrow gorge, the bottom of which is 150 ft. below the sea level. The stream has cut its way through the soft sedimentary deposits which cover the bottom of the valley (or Ghor) from side to side. Opposite Jericho the Ghor is about 15 miles wide. The Zer, however, does not average more than one-half mile in width and is about 100 ft. lower than the general level of the Ghor. But at "the Jews' Castle," about 9 miles from the mouth of the Jordan, the Zer begins to enlarge and merge into a true delta. The embankment of the Zer slopes away in a S.W. direction till it reaches the Judaean mountains at Khureb Kurnan, 10 miles distant. Here it leaves a triangle of low land between it and the Dead Sea averaging fully one mile in width and being nearly 3 miles wide opposite the mouth of the Jordan. The face of the embankment separating the Zer from the Ghor has in several places been deeply cut into by the small wadis which come down from the western mountains, and the wash from these wadis as well as that from more temporary streams after the summer has considerably widened the western border of the Zer throughout this distance. It can be seen at a glance that the original littoral of the Dead Sea has here been eneached upon to the extent of 10 or 15 sq. miles. Again, upon the eastern side of the Jordan the slope of the delta is much smaller and, equally in evidence. Merrill (East of the Jordan, 223, 224), in describing a survey of the Jordan valley, says he was compelled to stop for some hours along the shore and then north to reach his horses, which evidently had been coming down the river and more elevated surface of the Ghor. "The plain," he says, "for many sq. miles north of the sea is like ashes in which we often sank over shoc.''

Returning to the N.W. corner of the lake we find the delta deposit which we left at Khureb Kurnan extending 2 miles farther south with an average width of one-half mile to Râs Feshkâbah, which rises abruptly from the water's edge, and renders it impossible for travelers to follow along the shore. But just beyond Râs Feshkâbah a delta half a mile or more in length and width is projected into the sea at the mouth of Wady en Nâr, which comes down from Jerus and turns in an abrupt curve into the Dead Sea near Khedron. This is the wady which passes the convent of Mar en for and is referred to in such a striking manner in Ezek 47. Like most of the other wadis coming into the Dead Sea, this course the most of its wide and muddy delta, which rises up a delta at its mouth covered with "fragments of rock or boulders swept along by the torrent in its periodical overflows" (De Saulcy, 1, 137, 138).

From Râs Feshkâbah to Râs Meridi, a distance of 15 miles, the shore is bordered with a deposit of sand and gravel averaging a half a mile in width, while opposite Wady el-Dershâb and Wady Iriba (which descend from the vicinity of Bethlehem) and the wilderness of Tekoa the width is fully one mile. At the mouth of one of the smaller wadis De Saulcy noted what geologists call a "cone of deflection" where the gravel washed down from the heights was heaped up to the extent of nearly 250 yards (1, 44).

Râs Meridi, again, obstructs the passage along the shore almost as effectually as did Râs Feshkâbah, but farther south there is no other obstruction. The plain of En-gedi, connected in such an interesting manner with the history of David and with numerous other events of national importance, is described by the Pal Exploration Fund as "about half a mile broad and a mile in length." This consists of material brought down for the most part by Wady el-Arejeh, which descends from the vicinity of Hebron with the branch passing through Khedron. The principal path leading from the west side of the Dead Sea to the hills of Judaea follows the direction of this wady.

Between En-gedi and Sebbeh (Masada), a distance of 10 miles, the limestone cliffs rear itself till they are fully 3 miles from the shore. Across this space numerous wadis course their way bringing down an immense amount of debris and depositing it as deltas at the water's edge. These projecting deltas were noticed by Robinson as he looked southwest from the height above En-gedi, but their significance was not understood. "One feature of the sea," he says, "struck us immediately, which was unexpected to us, viz. the number of shoal-like points and peninsulas which run into its southern part, apparently at first sight small sandy islands. Below us on the S. were two such projecting banks on the western shore, composed probably of pebbles and gravel, extending out into the sea for considerable distance. The larger and more important of these is on the S. of the Dead Sea at Wady ta Khorâbah, or the indentation in the western precipice, where the water, flowing into shallow basins when it is high, evaporates, and deposits salt. This spot is just S. of the mouth of Wady ut-Râbâbah (BR, 1, 561). One of these deltas is described by De Saulcy as 500 yds. in breadth and another as indefinitely larger.

Six miles S. of Masada, probably at the mouth of Wady Umm Bajhek, Lynch notes a delta extending "half a mile out into the sea." Still farther S. the combined delta of the Wady Zuweirah and Wady Muhawut covers an area of 2 or 3 sq. miles, and is dotted with bowlders and fragments of rock a foot or more in diameter, which have been washed over the area by the torrential floods. Beyond Jebel Usdum, Wady Zuweirah, an area of 200 or 300 sq. miles, has deposited an immense amount of coarse sediment on the W. side of the Sekhah (a mud flat which was formerly occupied, probably by a projection of the Dead Sea). Into the S. end of the depression, extending from the Sekhah to the Ascent of Akrabbim, deltas of Wady el-Jebel, Wady el-Khanzireh and Wady Tuficheh have in connection with Wady Fikreh encroached upon the valley to the extent of 12 or 15 sq. miles. Altogether these washes drain an area of more than 3,000 sq. miles, and the granitic formations over which they pass have been so disintegrated by atmospheric influences that an excessive amount of coarse sediment is carried along by them (see Hull, Mount Seir, etc, 104-6). In ascending them, one encounters every indication of occasional destructive floods.

Following up the eastern shore, Wady el-Husei coming down from the mountains of Edom has built up on the plain of Sekhah which pushes out into the neck of the Sekhah and covers an area of 3 or 4 sq. miles. Farther N., Wady Kerak and Wady Bani Hamid have with their deltas encroached upon the extent of 25 or 30 sq. miles upon the head of the bay, projecting into the Lisan east of Point Costigan. Still farther N., Wady Majhle Arnon and Wady Zerka Ma‘alin (coming down from the hot springs of Caliribre) have built up less pronounced deltas because of the less depth of the water on the E. side, but even so they are by no means inconsiderable, in each case projecting a half-mile or more into the lake.

Putting all these items together, there can be little doubt that the area of the Dead Sea has been encroached upon to the extent of 25 or 30 sq. miles since the time of Abraham and that this has resulted in a rise of the general level of the water sufficient to overflow a considerable portion of the lagoon at the S. end, thus keeping the evaporating area constant. The only escape from this conclusion is the supposition that the rainfall of the region is less than it was at the dawn of history, and so the smaller evaporating area would be sufficient to maintain the former level. But of this we have no adequate evidence.

On the contrary there is abundant evidence that the climatic conditions connected with the production of the Glacial Period had passed away long before the conquest of the Vale of Siddim by Amraphel and his confederates (Gen 14).

The causes of this rise of the water are various and significant. It lends credibility to the persistent tradition that the sites of Sodom and Gomorrah are covered by the shallow water at the S. end of the sea, and also to the statement of Scripture that the region about these cities (on the supposition that they were at the S. end of the sea) was like the garden of the Lord; for that plain was then much larger than it is now, and was well watered, and possessed greater elements of fertility than are now apparent. Furthermore, this supposed lower level of the lake in early times may have greatly facilitated the passage of armies and caravans from one end to the other, thus rendering it more easy to understand the historical statements relating to the earliest periods of occupation. Even now the road at the base of Jebel Usdum which is open at low water is impassable at high water. On the last of December, 1883, Professor Hull (Mount Seir, etc, 135) traversed the shore at the base of the salt cliffs along the ridge of 100 ft. which had terminated in a descent of about 5 ft. to the line of driftwood which marked the upper limit of the water. On the 1st of January, 1901, the water along the base of the salt cliffs was so deep that it was impossible for my party to pass along the shore. It is easy to believe that the level might have been lowered sufficiently to expose a margin of shore which could be traversed on the W. side from one end to the other.

IV. Constitution of the Water.—As in the case of all inclosed basins, the waters of the Dead Sea are impregnated to an excessive degree with saline matter. "The salt which they contain," however, "is not wholly or even principally common salt, but is mostly the chloride and bromide of magnesium and calcium, so that they are not merely a strong brine, but rather resemble the mother liquors of a salt-pan left after the common salt has crystallized out" (Dawson, Egypt and Syria, 123). The following analysis is given by Booth and Muckle of water brought by Commander Lynch and taken by him May 5 from 195 fathoms deep opposite the mouth of Wady Zerka Ma‘alin. Other analyses vary from this more or less, owing doubtless to the different localities and depths from which the specimens had been obtained.

What is here labeled bromide of potassium, however, is called by most other analysts bromide of magnesium, it being difficult to separate and distinguish these elements in composition. The large percentage of bromide, of which but a trace is found in the ocean, is supposed to have been derived from volcanic emanations. As compared with sea water, it is worthy of note that that of the Dead Sea yields 26 lbs. of salts to 100 lbs. of water, whereas that of the Atlantic yields only 6 lbs. in the same quantity. Lake Urumiah is as salt as the Dead Sea.

As results of this salinity the water is excessively buoyant and is destructive of all forms of animal life. Lynch found that his metal boats sank an inch deeper in the Jordan when equally heavily laden than they did in the Dead Sea. All travelers who bathe in it relate that when they throw themselves upon their backs their bodies will be half out of the water. Jos (BJ, IV, viii, 4) relates that the emperor Vespasian caused certain men who could not swim to be thrown into the water with their hands tied behind them, and they floated on the surface. Dead fish and various shells are indeed often found upon the shore, but they have evidently been brought in by the tributary fresh-water streams, or belong to species which live in the brackish pools of the bordering lagoons, which are abundantly supplied with fresh water. The report extensively circulated in earlier times that birds did not fly over the lake has no foundation in fact, as some species of birds are known even to light upon the surface and sport upon the waters. The whole depression is subject to frequent storms of wind blowing through its length. These produce waves whose force is very destructive of boats encountering them owing to the high specific gravity of the water; but for the same reason the waves rapidly subside after a storm, so that the general appearance of the lake is placid in the extreme.

VI. Roads.—Except at the N. end the approaches to the Dead Sea are few and very difficult to travel. On the W. side the nearest approach is at En-gedi, and this down a windscanting descent of 2,000 ft. where a few men at the top of the cliff could hold an army at bay below. The path up to this cliff and the N. end of Jebel Usdum is scarcely better. Upon the S. end the path leads up Wady Fikreh for a considerable distance on the W. side of the Mud Flats, and then crosses over to the Wady el-Jeb, up whose torrential bed during the dry season caravans can find their way through the Aroebah to Alkabah. More difficult paths lead up from the E. of the Mud Flat into the Aroebah, and through the mountains of Moab to Petra into the plains beyond and the Pilgrim route to Damascus to Madinah a difficult path leads up Wady Kerak to the fortress of the same name 20 miles distant and 5,000 ft. above the lake. Another path a little farther north leads up the Wady Benti Hamid to Ash of Moab. From the Arnon to the N. end of the Dead Sea the mountains are so precipitous that travel along the shore is now practically impossible. But there are, according to Tristram (The Land of Moab, 355), remnants of an "old and well-engineered road of ancient times" extending as far S. at least as the Zerka Ma'in.

VII. Miscellaneous Items.—There are numerous points about the border of the lake of special interest. When Lot and Abraham looked towards Sodom from the heathen cities (Gen. 14:30; Plain of the 13 10 ft) they are said to have beheld Jordan "all the Plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before Jeh destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, like the garden of Jehovah, like the land of Egypt, as thou seest unto Zear. So Lot chose him all the Plain of the Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: . . . and Lot dwelt in the cities of the Plain, and moved his tent as far as Sodom. Then God overthrew the cities of the Plain of Sodom." This is the "Plain of Sodom" or the "Plain of Seir" (see Sodom, The). The word "Seir" is kəkkōr (Ciccar), meaning "circle," and indicating the appearance from Bethel of the Jordan valley surrounding the N. end of the Dead Sea. From this fact, many recent writers have located Sodom and Gomorrah at that end of the sea (see Cities of the Plain). But it is by no means certain that it is necessary thus to narrow down the meaning of the phrase. Though the S. end of the Dead Sea is not visible from the heights of Bethel, it is so connected with the general depression that it may well have been in the mind of Abraham, when they were dividing the country between them, one choosing the plain, a part of which was visible, the other remaining on the bordering mountainous area, so different in all its natural resources and conditions. The extent of the region chosen by Lot may therefore be left to be determined by other considerations.

Ain Jidā, "fountain of the kid" (?) (see En-gedi) is an oasis at the base of the western cliffs about half-way between the W. and the S. ends of the lake, fed by springs (En-gedi) of warm water which burst from beneath the overhanging cliffs. The 650 ft. shore line composed of shingle and calcareous marl is here prominent, and, as already remarked, there is an extensive gravel terrace at the present water level. Palms and vines formerly flourished here (Cant 1 14), but now only a few bushes of acacia and tamarisk are to be found. From time immemorial, however, it has been the terminus of the principal trail which ascends the cliffs to the plateau, across which paths lead to Hebron and Bethlehem.

The Fortress of Masada was the last stronghold held by the fanatical Jews (Zealot) after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and offers a bird's-eye view of the Dead Sea, which is as instructive as it is interesting. It is situated half-way between Jebel Usdum and En-gedi, directly opposite the the Herodian age. Standing upon this height one sees the outlines of the Rom camp, near the shore of the sea, and those of another camp in a depression several hundred yards to the W., from which the final attack of the besiegers was made over a pathway constructed along a sloping ridge.

Jebel Usdum (Mount of Sodom) is a salt mountain where it is capped by consolidated strata of sedimentary material, consisting of sand and loam, which most geologists think was deposited at the time of the formation of the 650 ft. terrace already described, and which they connect with the climatic conditions of the Glacial period.

This view is presented as follows by Professor B.K. Emerson: "In the earlier portion of the post-glacial stadion, a final sinking of a fraction of the bottom of the trough, near the S. end of the lake, dissected the low salt plateau, sinking its central parts beneath the salt waters, while fragments remain buttressed against the great walls of the trench forming the plains of Jebel Usdum and the peninsula el-Lisdn with the swampy Sebakh between. . . . It exposed the wonderful eastern wall of Jebel Usdum: 7 miles long, with 30-45 m. of clear blue salt at the base, capped by 125-140 m. of gypsum-bearing marls impregnated with sulphur, and conglomerates at times cemented by bitumen" ("Geological Myths," Proc. Am. Assoc. for Adv. of Sci. [1896], 110, 111). If this was the case there has been a depression of the S. end of the Dead Sea to the extent of several hundred feet within a comparatively few thousand years, in which case the traditional view that Sodom and Gomorrah were overwhelmed by Dead Sea water at the time of their destruction would refer to an occurrence exactly in line with movements that have been practically continuous during Tertiary, Glacial, and post-Glacial times.

With more reason, Lartet contends that this salt is a Cretaceous or Tertiary deposit covered with late Tertiary strata, in which case the sinking of the block between Jebel Usdum and el-Lisdn, for the most part, took place at a much earlier date than the formation of the 650 ft. terrace. A striking corollary of this supposition would be that the climatic conditions have been practically the same during all of the post-Carboniferous times, there having been cycles of moist and dry climate in that region succeeding each other during all these geological periods.

The Vale of Siddim (Gen 14 3.8.10) is probably the same as the Valley of Salt (2 K 14 7; 1 Ch 18 12; 2 Ch 25 11). This is in all probability the plain extending from the southern end of the Dead Sea to the "Ascent of Akrabbim" which crosses the valley from side to side, and forms the southern margin of the Dead. At present the area of the vale is about 50 sq. miles; but if our theory concerning the lower level of the Dead Sea in the time of Abraham is correct, it may then have included a considerable portion of the lagoon S. of el-Lisdn and so have been a third larger than now. In Gen 14 10 the vale is said to have been full of slime (that is, of bitumen or asphalt) pits. In modern times masses of asphalt are occasionally found floating in the southern part of the Dead Sea. After the earthquake of 1834 a large quantity was cast upon the shore near the S.W. corner of the lake, 3 tons of which were brought to market by the Arab natives. After the earthquake of January, 1837, a mass of asphaltum was driven ashore on the W. side not far from Jebel Usdum. The neighboring Arabs swam off to it, cut it up with axes and carried it to market by the camel load, and sold it to the value of several thousand dollars. At earlier times such occurrences seem to have been still more frequent. Jos affirms that "the sea in many places sends up black masses of asphaltum having the form and size of headless oxen"; while Diodorus Siculus relates that the bitumen (asphaltum) was thrown up in masses covering sometimes two or three acres and having the appearance of islands (Jos, BJ, IV, viii, 4; Diod. Sic. ii.48; Pliny, NH, vii.13; Tae. Hist. v.6; Dierocr., De re Med., i.99).

Since asphalt is a product of petroleum from which the volatile elements have been evaporated, the ultimate source of these masses is doubtless to be found in the extensive beds of bituminous limestone which appear in numerous places on both sides of the Dead Sea. An outcrop of it can be observed at Neye Moua, on the road from Jerus to Jericho, which Dawson describes as resembling dry chalk saturated with coal tar. When long weathered this soil becomes anhydrous and chalky, so that a mass of it, quite white externally, reveals an intense blackness when broken. It is this that the people of Bethlehem call "Dead Sea stone," and which they carve into various ornamental articles and expose for sale. Some specimens of it are sufficiently bituminous to burn with flame like cannon-coal. These beds are still more abundant about the S. end of the lake and doubtless underlie the whole region, and for all time must have been exhibited bituminous and gaseous matter, but much more abundantly in former times than now. In these accumulations of bitumen at the S. end of the Ghor we probably have the incentive which led the Babylonians under Amraphel and Chedorlamon to make such long expeditions for the sake of conquering the region and holding it under their power. Bitumen was much in demand in Babylon.

6. El-Lisân (the Tongue), which projects half-way across the lake from the mouth of Wady Kerak, is, like Jebel Usdum, a promontory of white calcareous sediment containing beds of salt and gypsum, breaking off the western side in a cliff 300 ft. high. Its upper surface rises in terraces 600 ft. high from the E., as Jebel Usdum does on the W. The length of the promontory from N. to S. is 9 miles. This corresponds so closely in line of appearance with Jebel Usdum on the opposite side of the lake that we find it difficult to doubt the view of Professor Emericus, stated above, that the formation originally extended across and that a block of the original bottom of the lake has dropped down leaving a connecting arm of water across the sides, of which frequent occurrences similar to this are noted by the United States geologists in the Rocky Mountain region.

VIII. History.—Difficulty of access has prevented the Dead Sea from playing any important part in history except as an obstruction both to commerce and to military movements. Boats have never been used upon it to any considerable extent. From earliest times salt has been gathered on its western shores and carried up to market over the difficult paths leading to Jerus. A similar commerce has been carried on in bitumen; that from the Dead Sea being specially prized in Egypt, while as already remarked, it is by no means improbable that the pits of bitumen which abounded in the "Vale of Siddim" to the north of the kingdom of Babylonia to undertake long expeditions for the conquest of the region. Productive as may have been the plain at the S. end of the sea, it was too far outside the caravanserai route leading through Petra to the S. to the Razzeh of the kings of the fame of the Sinaitic Peninsula to divert the course of travel. Still the settlements on the eastern border of the Vale of Siddim were of sufficient importance in medieval times to induce the Crusaders to visit the sea and leave their marks upon it. The Arabian town of Zohor, probably the Bib. Zoor, appears at one time to have been a most important place, and was the center of considerable commercial activity. Indigo was grown there, and the oasis was noted for its fine species of dates. The country round about abounded in springs and there was much arable land (see Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslem, 256 ff.). The hot springs upon the eastern shore of the Dead Sea at Calirhoo some distance up the Wady Zerka Matan were much resorted to for their medicinal properties. Here Herod came as a last resort, to secure relief from his loathsome malady, but failed of help. The fortress of Machaerus, where John the Baptist was imprisoned, is situated miles up the valley which ascends to the Dead Sea, but access to this region is possible only through a difficult road leading over the mountains a few miles E. of the sea.

On four occasions important military expeditions were conducted along the narrow defiles which border the S.W. end of the Dead Sea: (1) That of Mesha, king of Moab, in 805 b.c.; (2) that of the Amorites and the Moabites in 1435 B.C.; (3) that of Pharaoh Necho of Egypt in 614 B.C.; and (4) that of Nebuchadnezzar, who seem first to have opened the way past Petra to the mines of the Sinaitic Peninsula, and then to have swept northward through the land of the Amalekites and Amorites and come down to the Dead Sea at En-gedi, and then to have turned to subdue the Cities of the Plain, where Lot was dwelling. This accomplished, they probably retraced along the west shore of the lake, which very likely afforded at that time a complete passage-way to the west by the Jordan, having gone on eastward to the line of the present pilgrim route from Damascus to Mecca and followed it northward. (2) In the early part of the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20), the Moabites, Ammonites and some other tribes joined together, forming a large army, and, following around the S. end of the Dead Sea, marched along the W. shore to En-gedi, and having ascended the zigzag path leading up the precipitous heights to the wilderness of Tekoa, were thrown into confusion and utterly annihilated. (3) Not many years later Jehoram and Jehoshaphat "fetched a compass [RV made a circuit] of seven days' journey" (2 K 3 9) around the S. end of the Dead Sea and attacked the Moabites in their own land, but they did not complete the conquest. The particulars of this expedition are given in 2 K 3 and in the inscription on the Moabite Stone. (4) The Romans shortly after the destruction of Jerus conducted a long siege of the fortresses of Masada, of which an account has already been given in a previous section (VII, 3). All their supplies must have come down the tortuous path to En-gedi and thence been brought along the western shore to the camp, the remains of which are still to be seen at the base of the fortress. For many cents, indeed for well-nigh 1,800 years, the Dead Sea remained a mystery, and its geology and physical characteristics were practically unknown. The first expedition of the defiles of the lake below sea level was furnished in 1837 by Moore and Beke, who made some imperfect experiments with boiling water from which they inferred a depression of 500 ft. In 1841 Lieutenant Simons of the British navy, in making his hydrographic observations, estimated the depression to be 1,312 ft. In 1835 Costigan, and again in 1847 Lieutenant Molyneux ventured upon the sea in boats; but the early death of both, consequent upon their experiences, prevented their making any full reports. Appropriately, however, their names have been attached to prominent points on the Lisân. In 1848 Lieutenant Lynch, of the United States navy, was dispatched to explore the Jordan and the Dead Sea. The results of this expedition were most important. Soundings of the depths were carefully and systematically conducted, and levels were run from the Dead Sea by Jerus to the Mediterranean, giving the depression at the surface of the Dead Sea as 1,316.7 ft., and its greatest depth, 1,278 ft. More recently Sir C. W. Wilson in connection with the Ordinance Survey of Pal carried levels over the same route with the result of reducing the depression to 1,292 ft., which is now generally accepted to be correct. But as already stated the stage of water in the lake is not given, and that is known to vary at least 15 ft. annually, and still more at longer intervals.

DEAF, def (ἠκοινή, ἀκοῦσθαι, κόφεω, κούφω): Used either in the physical sense, or figuratively as expressing unwillingness to hear the Divine message (Ps 58 4), or incapacity to understand it for want of spirituality (Ps 35 13). The prophetic utterances were sufficiently forcible to compel even such to hear (Isa 42 18; 48 6) and thereby to receive the Divine mercy (Isa 18 19; 35 5).

The expression "deaf adder that stoppeth her ear" (Ps 58 4) alludes to a curious notion that the adder, to avoid hearing the voice of the charmer, laid its head with one ear on the ground and stopped the other with the tip of its tail (Diary of John Manningham, 1602). The adder is called deaf by Shakespeare (O Hen VI, iii, 2, 76; Troilus and Cressida, ii, 2, 172). The erroneous idea probably arose from the absence of the external ears.

Physical deafness was regarded as a judgment from God (Ex 4 11; Mic 7 16), and it was consequently ineffectual to curse the deaf (Lev 19 14). In NT times deafness and kindred defects were attributed to evil spirits (Mk 9 18 ff). See DUMS.

DEAL, dēl: The noun "deal" is not found in RV. The AV tr of ἀναπτύσσω, ἀναπτύσσων, at a price (cf 1 Cor 12, costly stones); 1 Pet 1 19, "precious blood"; Lk 7 2, the servant was "dear" to the centurion (Εὐαγγελισμός, εὐαγγελισμόν, "highly prized"; cf Phil 2 29; 1 Pet 2 6). These 2 8, "very dear to us" (ἀγαπᾶται, ἀγαπᾶτον, "beloved" in RV, ἀγαπᾶτον is generally τρεῖς "beloved". "Dear- ly" before "beloved" of AV is omitted in all passages in RV. The word "deal" occurs but once in the OT, viz. Jer 31 20. RV correctly changes "deal son" of AV (Col 1 13) into "the Son of his love." See H. E. JACOBS.

DEATH, dāth. See FAMINE.

DEATH (Τάθ), m. death; ἐπώνυμοι, thanatos):

PHILOSOPHICAL AND FIGURATIVE VIEW

The word "Death" is used in the sense of (1) the process of dying (Gen 21 16); (2) the period of decease (Gen 27 7); (3) as a possible synonym for poison (2 K 4 40); (4) as descriptive of person in danger of perishing (Jgs 15 18; "in death off" 2 Cor 11 23). In this sense the shadow of death is a familiar expression in Job, the Psalms and the Prophets; (5) death is personified in 1 Cor 15 55 and 20 14. Deliverance from this catastrophe is called the "issues from death" (Ps 68 20 AV; τρέχειν) in RV. Judicial execution, "putting to death," is mentioned 39 times in the Levitical Law.

Figuratively: Death is the loss of spiritual life as in Rom 6 5; and the final state of the unregenerate is called the "second death" in Rev 20 14.

ALEX. MACALISTER.

THEOLOGICAL VIEW

According to Gen 21 7, God gave to man, created in His own image, the command not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and 1. Conception of Sin: that thou eat thereof, thou shalt surely die." Though not exclusively, reference is certainly made here in the first place to bodily death. Yet because death by no means came upon Adam and Eve on the day of their transgression, but took place hundreds of years later, the expression, "in the day that," must be conceived in a wider sense, or the delay of death must be attributed to the entering-in of mercy (Gen 3 15). However this may be, Gen 2 17 places a close connection between man's death and his transgression of God's commandment, thereby attaching to death a religious and ethical significance, and in the other hand makes the life of man dependent on his obedience to God. This religious-ethical nature of life and death is not only decidedly and clearly expressed in Gen 2, but it is the fundamental thought of the whole of Scripture and forms an essential element in the revelations of salvation.

The theologians of early and more recent times, who have denied the spiritual significance of death and have separated the connection between ethical and physical life, have usually endeavor to trace back the opinions to Scripture; and those passages which undoubtedly did see in death a punishment for sin (Gen 2 17; Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12; 6 23; 1 Cor 15 21), they take as individual opinions, which form no part of the main and of religious revelation. But this endeavor shuts out the organic character of the revelation of salvation. It is true that death in Holy Scripture is often measured by the weakness and frailty of human nature (Gen 1 28; Job 14 12; Ps 39 5, 9, 10; 85 14; Ecc 3 20, etc). Death is seldom connected with the transgression of the first man either in the OT or the NT, or mentioned as a specified punishment for sin (Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12; 6 23; 1 Cor 15 21; Jas 1 15); for it is portrayed as something natural (Gen 5 5; 9 29; 15 15; 56 8, etc), a long life being presented as a blessing in contrast to death in the midst of days as a disaster and a judgment (Ps 103 23; Isa 65 20). But all this is not contrary to the idea that death is a consequence of sin, and a punishment of it. Death, everyone who agrees with Scripture that death is held out as a punishment for sin, speaks in the same way. Death, though come into the world through sin, is nevertheless at the same time a consequence of man's physical and frail existence now; it could therefore be threatened as a punishment to man, because he was taken out of the ground and was made a living soul, of the earth earthy (Gen 2 7; 1 Cor 15 44, 45). If he had not obeyed, he would not have been made dust (Gen 3 19), but have pressed forward on the path of spiritual development (1 Cor 15 46,51); his return to dust was possible simply because he was made from dust (see ADAM in the NT). Thus, although death in this way a consequence of sin, yet a long life is felt to be a blessing and death a disaster and a judgment, above all when men is taken away in the bloom of his youth or the strength of his years. There is nothing strange, therefore, in the manner in which Scripture speaks of death, and "death"; we all express ourselves daily in the same way, though we at the same time consider it as the wages of sin. Beneath the ordinary, everyday expressions about death lies the deep consciousness that it is unnatural and contrary to our innermost being.
This is decidedly expressed in Scripture, much more so even than among ourselves. For we are influenced always more or less by the Greek, Platonic idea, that the body is mortal. Such an idea is utterly contrary to the Israelite consciousness, and is nowhere found in the OT. The whole man dies, when in death the spirit (Ps 146:4; Ecc 12:7), or soul (Gen 35:18; 2 S 4:9; Ps 17:11). Man does not only his body, but his soul also returns to a state of death and belongs to the nether-world; therefore the OT can speak of a death of one’s soul (Gen 37:21 [Heb]; Nu 23:10; Mt 22:21; Jgs 3:13; Job 36:11; Ps 78:50), and of disfellowship by coming into contact with a dead body (Lev 19:28; 21:11; 22:4; Nu 6:2; 6:6; 9:6; 19:10 f; Dt 14:1; Hag 2:13). This death of man is not annihilation, however, but a deprivation of all that makes for life on earth. The Sheol (ab 52:4) is in contrast to the land of the living in every respect (Job 38:13; Prov 15:24; Ezk 26:20; 32:23); it is an abode of darkness and the shadow of death (Job 10:21; 22; Ps 88:12; 145:3), a place of destruction, yea destruction from the face of the earth. His body perishes (Job 15:14; 38:11; Prov 27:20), without any order (Job 10:22), a land of rest, of silence, of oblivion (Job 3:17-18; Ps 94:17; 116:17), where God and man are no longer to be seen (Isa 38:11), God no longer praised or glorified. He is everlastingly the same, in His perfection, and His works are acknowledged (Ps 88:10-13; Isa 18:19), His wonders not contemplated (Ps 88:12), where the dead are unconscious, do no more work, take no account of anything, possess no knowledge nor wisdom. The Sheol is not a gratuitous invention; anything that is done under the sun (Ecc 9:5.6.10). The dead ("the Shades" RV; of art. Deceased) are asleep (Job 26:5; Prov 2:18; 9:18; 21:6; Ps 88:11; Isa 26:14), weakened (Isa 14:10) and without strength (Ps 88:4).

The dread of death was felt much more deeply therefore by the Israelites than by ourselves. Death to them was separation from all that they loved, from God, from the service, from His laws, from His lawfulness, from the companionship in which they lived. But now in this darkness appears the light of the revelation of God and His love towards all men and life (Ps 91:19; 118:17; 119:5). The God of Israel is the living God and the fountain of all life (Dt 5:26; Josh 3:10; Ps 36:9). He is the Creator of heaven and earth, whose power knows no bounds and whose dominion extends over life and death (Ps 6:5; Ps 103:12). He gives life to man (Gen 1:26; 2:7), and creates and sustains every man still (Job 32:8; 33:4; 34:14; Ps 104:29; Ecc 12:7). He connects the life with the keeping of His law and appoints the death of His people according to the transgression of it (Gen 2:17; Lev 18:5; Dt 30:20; Ps 32:47). He lives in heaven, but is present also by His spirit in Sheol (Ps 139:7.8). Sheol and Abaddon are open to Him even as the hearts of the children of men (Job 28:6; 38:17; Prov 15:11). He kills and He gives life, brings down into Sheol and raises from thence again (Dt 32:38; 1 S 2:6; 2 K 5:7). He lengthens life for those who keep His commandments (Ex 20:12; Job 5:26), gives escape from death, can deliver when death menaces (Ps 68:20; Isa 35:5; 43:28; Heb 2:18), and is not asleep; he Endeth and Elijah to Himself without dying (Gen 5:24; 2 K 1:11), can restore the dead to life (1 K 17:22; 2 K 4:34; 13:21). He can even bring death wholly to nothing and completely triumph over it by rising from the dead (Job 12:13; 13:19; 25:27; Hag 6:2; 13:14; Isa 26:18; 13:19; Ezek 37:11.12; Dnl 12:2).

This revelation by degrees rejects the old con-
DEATH, BODY OF. See BODY OF DEATH.

DEATH, SECOND (אֵשׁ הַנָּזָרִים, ḫa ḫetanners): An expression, peculiar to the Book of Rev (2 11; 20 6,14; 21 8) in Scripture, denoting the final penalty of the unrighteous; parallel with another expression likewise peculiar, “the lake of fire,” in 20 14; 21 8. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

DEBATE, dê-bêt‘: This word is used only once in RV (Prov 26 9). It evidently refers to the setting of a difficulty with a neighbor, and anticipates Mt 18 15. It argues for and shows the advantage of private, peaceable settlement of difficulties. Cf Ecclus 29 9, and see MAKERBES.

DEBIR, dê-bêr (דֶּבֶר, dêbêr, or דֶּבֶר, dêbêr, “oracle”): King of Eglon, one of the five Amorite kings whose confederation against Israel was overcome and who were killed by Joshua (Josh 10 3).

DEBIR, dê-bêr (דֶּבֶר, dêbêr; Δεβηρ, Debir): “And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir, and fought against it: and he took it, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof; and they smote them with edge of the sword, not sparing them; and he left none remaining” (Josh 10 38,39). In Josh 15 15–17 and Jgs 11 13–15 is an account of how Othniel captured Debir, which “beforetime was Kiriaath-sepher,” and won thereby the hand of Achsah, Caleb’s daughter. In Josh 15 49 Debir is called Kiriaath-sannah. It had once been inhabited by the Anakim (Josh 11 21). It was a Levitical city (Josh 21 15; 1 Ch 6 58).

1. DEBIR is usually explained as meaning “back,” but this is a doubtful view; the word dêbêr is used to denote the “soul of holies” (1 K 5 5).

2. The Site Debir, some 11 miles S.W. of Hebron, has a good deal of support. It was unquestionably a site of importance in ancient times as the meeting-place of several roads; it is in the Negeb (of Jgs 1 15), in the neighborhood of the probable site of Anab (Josh 11 21; 15 50); it is a dry site, but there are “upper” and “lower” springs about 6 miles to the N. A more thorough examination of the site than has as yet been undertaken might produce added proofs in favor of this identification. No other suggestion has any great probability. See PEF, III, 402; PEFS, 1875.

(2) Debir, on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 50), must fall full of modern ruins: and at this point designates to the wholly renewed man a new heaven and a new earth, where death, sorrow, crying or pain shall no longer exist (Rev 21 4).

Finally, Scripture is not the book of death, but of life, of everlasting life through Jesus Christ Our Lord. It tells us, in oft-repeated and unmistakable terms, of the dreaded reality of death, but it proclaims to us still more loudly the wonderful power of the life which is in Christ Jesus. See also DECEASE. HERMAN DAYIN.

DEBIRAH, deb‘-ra (דְּבֵרָה, dêbêrah, signifying “bee”):

(1) Bebekah’s nurse, who died near Bethel and was buried under “the oak of weeping” (Gen 35 8m).

(2) A prophetess, fourth in the order of the “judges.” In aftertimes a palm tree, known as the “palm tree of Deborah,” was shown between Ramah and Bethel, beneath which the prophetess was wont to administer justice. Like the rest of the “judges” she became a leader of her people in times of national distress. This time the oppressor was Jabin, king of Hazor, whose general was Sisera. Deborah summoned Barak of Kedesh-naphtali and delivered the message, "The Lord meet Sisera in battle by the brook Kishon." Barak induced Deborah to accompany him; they were joined by 10,000 men of Zebulun and Naphtali. The battle took place by the brook Kishon, and Sisera's army was thoroughly routed. While Barak pursued the fleeing army, Sisera escaped and sought refuge with Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, near Kedesh. The brave woman, the prototype of Judith, put the Canaanite general to sleep by offering him a draft of milk and then slew him by driving a pin into his temple. Thus runs the story in Jgs 4. It is on the whole substantiated by the odes in ch 5 which is ascribed jointly to Deborah and Barak. It is possible that the editor mistook the archaic form ꝲ׃, ꝲ׃, in ver 7 which should be rendered "hath arosest" instead of "I arose." Certainly the ode was composed by a person who, if not a contemporary of the event, was very near it in point of time. The song is spoken of as one of the oldest pieces of Heb lit. Great difficulties meet the exegete. Nevertheless the general substance is clear. The Lord is described as having come from Sinai near the "field of Edom" to take part in the battle; "for from heaven they fought, the very stars from their courses fought against her." Sisera's host was in a state of panic, oppressed by a mighty king, and the tribes loth to surrender their separatist tendencies. Some, like Reuben, Gilead, Dan and Asher remained away. A community by the name of Meroz is slagged by the Lord, because they came not to the help of Jeh, to the help of Jeh among the mighty (ver 23; of RVm). Ephraim, Issachar, Machir, Benjamin were among the followers of Barak; "Zebulun . . . jeopardized their lives unto the death, and Naphtali, upon the high places of the field" (ver 18). According to the song, the battle was fought at Taanach by the waters of Megiddo. Sisera's host was swept away "by that ancient river, the river Kishon" (ver 21). Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, receives here due meed of praise for her heroic act. The psalm vividly paints the waiting of Sisera’s mother for the home-coming of the general; the delay is ascribed to the great booty which the conqueror is distributing among his Canaanite hosts. The general substance is clear. The song; "O Jeh: but let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might." It is a song in praise of the "righteous acts" of the Lord, His work of victory which Israel’s leaders, the four-bated princes, wrought, making their lives freely to the nation’s cause. And the nation was sore beset because it had become faithless to the Lord and chosen new gods. Out of the conflict came, for the time being, victory and moral purification; and the inspiring genius of it all was a woman in Israel, the prophetess Deborah.

(3) Tobit’s grandmother (AV "Debora," Tob 1 8).

MAX L. MARGOLIS

DEBT, det, DEBTOR, det’ér: It is difficult nowadays to think of debt without associating with it the idea of interest, and even usury. Certain it is that this idea is associated with the OT idea of the word, at least in the later periods of OT history. This is true of the NT entire. The Heb word (ฤษ, nāḥād) always carries with it the idea of "biting interest" (cf 2 K 4 7). The Gr words δανεῖον, δανείος (Mt 18 24), and ἀσφαλὴς, ἀσφαλέω (Mt 18 32), may point only to the fact of indebtedness; the idea of interest, however, is clearly taught in the NT (cf Mt 25 27).

Quite extensive legislation is provided in the OT governing the matter of debt and debtor. Indebt-sense also as indicating the obligation of a righteous life which we owe to God. To fall short in righteous living is to become a debtor. For this reason we pray, "Forgive us our debts" (Mt 6:12). Those who are ministered to in spiritual things are said to be debtors to those who minister to them (Rom 15:27). To make a vow to God is to put one's self in debt in a moral sense (Mt 23:16–18; RV 'bound by his oath'). In a deeply spiritual sense the apostle Paul professed to be in debt to all men in that he owed them the opportunity to do them good (Rom 1:14).

The parables of Jesus as above named are rich with comforting truth. How beautiful is the willingness of God, the great and Divine Creditor, to release us from our indebtedness! Just so ought we to be immigrants of the Father in heaven who is merciful.

DEACOLOGUE, dek'-a-log. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

DECAPOLIS, dek'-o-pol'-is (Δεκάπολις, Dekápolis): The name given to the region occupied by a league of "ten cities" (Mt 4:25; Mk 6:20; 7:31), which Eusebius designates (Onom) as "lying in the Peraean round Hippos, Pella and Gadara." Such combinations of Gr cities arose as Rome assumed dominion in the East, to promote their common interests in trade and commerce, and for mutual protection against the peoples surrounding them. This particular league seems to have been constituted about the time of Pompey's campaign in Syria, 63 BC, by which several cities in Decapolis dared their eras. They were independent of the local tetrarchy, and answerable directly to the government of Syria. They enjoyed the rights of association and asylum; they struck their own coinage, paid imperial taxes and were liable to military service (Ant, XIV, iv, 4; BJ, I, vii, 7; II, xviii, 3; III, ix, 7; Vida, 65, 14). Of the ten cities, Scythopolis, the ancient Bethshean, alone, the capital of the league, was on the W. side of Jordan. The names given by Pliny (NH, v.18) are Scythopolis (Beitāan), Hippos (Suṣiyeh), Gadara (Umm Qais), Pella (Faḥal), Philadelphia (Amera), Gadara (El Aidān?), Carināth (Kanawat), Damascus and Raphana. The last named is not identified, and Dion is uncertain. Other cities joined the league, and Ptolemy, who omits Raphana, gives a list of 18. The Gr inhabitants were never on good terms with the Jews; and the herd of swine (Mk 6:11 15) indicates contempt for what was probably regarded as Jewish prejudice. The ruins still seen at Gadara, but esp. at Kanawat (see KERNAT) and Jerash, of temples, theaters and other public buildings, attest the splendor of these cities in their day. W. Ewing

DECAY, de-kā': Although this word is still in good use in both its lit. sense, of the putrefaction of either animal or vegetable matter, and its der. sense, denoting any deterioration, decline or gradual failure, the RV has replaced it by other expressions in Lev 25:35; Ecol 10:18; Isa 44:26; He 8:13; in some of these cases with a gain in accuracy of tr. In Neh 4:10 (יָטב, kāšāš, "to be feeble," "stumble") RV retains 'is decayed'; in job 14:11 (יָטב, āsārāh, "to be dried up") ARV substitutes rendered by Jn 11:39 ARV has "the body decayeth" instead of the more literal or offensive to modern ears (δέσις, ōsei, "emits a smell")

DECEASE, de-sēs', IN NT (ταφάματος, taphamatos, "to come to an end;" "married and deceased") [Mt 22:25]: With ἀπαθέω, ἀπαθάτος, "death;" "die the death" (Mt 15:4; Mk 7:10, RVn 'surely die'). Elsewhere the word is rare; it is used with a different meaning in Jn 11:22, RV "end with high". Also the subst., θανάτος, θανάτους, "exodus," "exit," "departure," "his decease which he was about to accomplish" (Lk 9:31, RVn "departure"); "after my decease" (2 Pet 1:15, RVn "departure").

DECEIT, de-sēt' (πίπτωμα, mirimō, σπόλος, δόλος): The intentional misleading or being another; in Scripture represented as a companion of many other forms of wickedness, as cursing (Ps 10:7), hatred (Prov 26:24), theft, covetousness, adultery, murder (Mk 7:22; Rom 1:20). The RV introduces the word "Mace" in the translation of the title of 2 Thess 3:10; but in such passages as Ps 55:11; Prov 20:17; 26:26; 1 Thess 2:3, renders a variety of words, more accurately than the AV, "oppression;" "falsehood," "guile," "error."

DECEIVABLENESS, dē-ēwv's-b'l-nes, DE-CEIVE, dē-ēwv (N̄, nāhēd), "to lead astray": "The pride of thy heart hath deceived thee" (Jer 49:10), i.e. "Thy stern mountain fastnesses have persuaded thee that thou art impregnable." In Jer 20:7, "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived," כִּים, signifies "to be enticed," "persuaded," as in ARV and RVm.

In the OT most often, and in the NT regularly, the various words rendered in AV "deceive" denote some deliberate misleading in the moral or spiritual realm—false prophets (Jer 23:8), false teachers (Eph 5:6) and Satan himself (Rev 12:9) are deceivers in this sense. In the gospels, AV "deceive" (παραθέω, πλάνατω, 9; Mt 24:4.5; Mk 13:5.6; Lk 21:8; Mt 24 11:24; Jn 7:42) often designates "lead astray" or "falsehood" and is made in 1 Jn 2:26; 3:7; but elsewhere (13 t) both AV and RV render planātω by "deceive."

"Deceivableness" (dē-ēwv, apōdai), only in 2 Thess 2 10, signifies power to deceive, not liability to deception; RV "deceit." F. R. Farr

DECENTLY, dē-sent-li (eκw̃ñyovos, euakēmō̄nas): Only once is this word found in our Eng. Bible (1 Cor 14:40). It is in the last verse of that remarkable chapter on the proper use of spiritual gifts in the church and the proper conduct of public worship. It does not refer here to absence of impurity or obscenity. It rather refers to good order in the conduct of public worship. All things that are done and said in public worship are to be in harmony with that becoming and reverent spirit and tone that befit the true worshippers of God.

DECISION, dē-sizh'un: Has several different shades of meaning. It expresses the formation of a judgment on a matter under consideration. It expresses the quality of being firm or positive in one's actions. It expresses the termination of a contest or question in favor of one side or the other, as the decision of the battle, or the decision of the judge.

Until recent times the decision of disputed points between nations was determined by force of arms. Thus the questions of dispute were

1. National decisions decided between Israel and the surrounding nations, Israel and Assyria, between Israel and Egypt, and later between Judea and Rome.

2. Judicial decisions made by the patriarchs and kings of Israel (see Ex 14:13-26). One important function of those who are called judges was to decide the difficulties between the people. At first this was one of the most important duties of Moses, but when the task became too great he appointed judges to assist him (see Ex 15:13-26). One important function of those who are called judges was to decide the difficulties between the people (see Jgs 4:45). The kings also decided questions of dispute between individuals (see 2 Sam 5:1-11; 1 K 3:16-28). As the people developed in the kingdom and their national ideals, the decisions in judicial matters were rendered by councils appointed for that purpose.

Perplexing questions were many times decided by the casting of lots. The people believed that God would in this way direct them to the right course.

3. Methods of right decision (Prov 16:33; Josh 7:14-26). The statutes of God's Old Testament are the measure of truth.

DECISIONS lots must have been a common method of deciding perplexing questions (see 1 S 4.14.42; Jon 1:7). It was resorted to by the apostles to decide which of the two men they had selected should take the place of Judas (Acts 1:21-26). The custom gradually lost in favor, and decisions, even of perplexing questions, were formed by considering all the facts. See Augustus IV, 3; Lots.

DECISION, VALLEY OF. See Jehoshaphat Valley of.

DECLARATION, dek-ln-w'shun, DECLARE, dē-klār: "Declare" is the tr. of a variety of Heb and Gr words in the OT and NT, appearing to bear uniformly the meaning "to make known," "set forth," rather than (the older meaning) "to explain." (Dt 1:5). Declaration (Est 10:2 AV, RV "full account"); Job 42:17; Ecclus 45:6 (1 LAV "narrative"); 2 Cor 8:19 AV, RV "to show" has the like meaning.

DECLINE, dē-kîn: (נָדָה, nādāh, סָרָה, sārah): In AV this word occurs 9 t in its original sense (now obsolete) of "turn aside." RV substitutes "turn aside" in Ex 23:2; Dt 17:11; 2 Ch 34:2; Job 24:11. In Ps 102:11; 109:23, the lengthening shadows of afternoon are said to "decline," and RV introduces the word in the same general sense in Jgs 19:8; 2 K 20:10; Jer 6:4. See Afternoon.

DEDAN, dē dan, DEDANITES, dēdän-ite (AV Dedanites, ded-a-nim; גְּדָנִים, gēdanîm, "low," נְדָן, nēdan): An Arabian people named in Gen 10:7 as descended from Cush; in Gen 25:3 as descended from Keturah. Evidently they were, like the related Sheba (Subaens), of mixed race (cf Gen 10:7.28). In Is 21:13 allusion is made to the "caravans of Dedanites" in the wilds of Arabia, and Ezek mentions them as supplying Tyre with precious things (Ezk 27:20; in ver 15, "Dedan" should probably be read as in LXX, "Rodan," i.e. Rhodians). The name seems still to linger in the island of Dedan, on the border of the Persian Gulf. It is found also in Min. and Sab. inscriptions (Glazer, II, 392 ff).

DEDICATE, ded-ĭ-kat, DEDICATION, ded-i-kā'šun (גֶּדֶנְקָה, gedēnikah, "initiation," "consecration," שֶׁאָכַּה, sē'akah, "to be clean," "sanctify"; חַכֹּם, ḥeqhōm, "a thing devoted to God"): Often used in Heb of the consecration of persons, but usually in the EV of the setting apart of things to a sacred use, as of the altar (Nu 7:10f.84:88; cf Dn 3:25, "the d. of the image"); of silver and gold (2 S 8:11; 2 K 12:4), of the Temple (1 K 8:63; Ezr 6:16); of Ez 24:44), of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:27), of private dwellings (Dt 20:5). RV substitutes "devoted" for "dedicated" in Ezk 44:29. See CONSECRATION; SANCTIFICATION.

DEDICATION, ded-ĭ-kā'šun, FEAST OF (רָכָּסָה, ṭā yakolās, Jn 10:22): A feast held by the Jews throughout the country for eight days, commencing on the 25th Kislev (December), in commemoration of the cleansing of the temple and dedication of the altar by Judas Maccabaeus after their deliverance by the Maccabees (1 Macc 4:50.59). The feast was to be kept "with mirth and gladness." 2 Macc 10:6 it says it was kept
The fallow deer, Cervus dama, is a native of Northern Africa and countries about the Mediterranean. It is found in central Europe and Great Britain, where it has been introduced from its more southern habitat. A variety of the fallow deer, sometimes called a sika, is a small species under the name of Cervus Mesopotamicus, inhabits northeastern Mesopotamia and Persia. It may in former times have been found in Pal, and Tidstram reports having seen the fallow deer in Galilee (Pensea a Florid of Pal), but while Drietrum was a remarkably acute observer, he appears sometimes to have been too readily satisfied, and his observations, when unaccompanied, as in this case, by specmen, are to be accepted with caution. Now 'ayyal (and its fem. forms) occurs in the Bible 22 t, while yaḥmūr occurs only twice, i.e. in the list of clean animals in Dt 14 5, and in 1 K 4 23, in the list of animals provided for Solomon's table. In both places AV has "fallow deer" and RV "roeuck." In view of the fact that the roe deer has within recent years been common in Pal, while the occurrence of the fallow deer must be considered doubtful, it seems fair to render 'ayyal "roe deer" or "roe buck," leaving yaḥmūr for fallow deer.

The Arabic yaḥmūr, /.a,/.a,. is the proper name of the Pers wild goat, Capra aegagrus, and is also often used for the Arab. or Sin ibex, Capra beden, though only by those who do not live within its range. Where the ibex is at home it is sometimes called beden; its less common nomenclature must be taken into account, and we have no reason to suppose that the Hebrews were more exact than are the Arabs. There are many examples of this in Eng., e.g. panther, coney, rabbit (in America), lepus, and many others. Yaʾēl (incl. yaʿādāh) occurs 4 t. In Job 39 1; Ps 104 18; 1 S 24 2, EV renders yaʿēl by "wild goat." For yaʿēl in Prov 6 19, AV has "roe," while RV has "does," which is non-committal, since the name, "does," may be applied to the female of a deer or of an ibex. Since the Arab. waʾl, which is etymologically closely akin to yaʿēl, means the Pers wild goat, it might be supposed that that animal was meant, were it not that the plains of the Syrian desert, and not the mountains of Southern Pal, where the ibex lives. At least two of the passages clearly indicate the latter locality, i.e. Ps 104 18: "The high mountains are for the wild goats," and 1 S 24 2: "And when the gibeonites first made war against Gibeon...." It was the gibeonites who asked David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats. The conclusion then seems irresistible that yaʿēl, and consequently yaʿādāh, is the ibex. Cibhā (incl. cibḥāyim) is uniformly rendered "roe" or "roe buck" in AV, while RV, either in the text or in the margin, has in most cases "gazelle." In two places "roe" is retained in RV without comment, i.e. 2 S 2 18: "Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe," and 1 Ch 12 8: "were as swift as the roes upon the mountains." Ayyāl and cibḥā occur together in Dt 12 15 22; 14 5; 15 22; 1 K 4 23; Cant 2 9 17, i.e. in 7 of the 16 passages in which we find cibḥā. If therefore it be accepted that 'ayyāl is the roe deer, it follows that cibḥā must be something different. Now the gazelle and the roe, although both 'ayyāl and in Pal and satisfies perfectly every passage in which we find cibḥā. Further, one of the Arab. names of the gazelle is zabi, a word which is etymologically much nearer to cibhā than appears in this translation.

"Opher is akin to ʾaphār, "dust," and has reference to the color of the young of the deer or gazelle, to both of which it is applied. In Cant 2 9 17 and 8 14, we have ʾophēr hāʾ-ayyālām, EV "young hart," lit. "fawn of the roe deer." In Cant 4 5 and 7 5, we have ʾophērīn tīʾonāh cibḥāyim, AV "young does that are twins," RV "fawns that are twins of a roe," Defilement in the OT was physical, sexual, ethical, ceremonial, religious, the last four, esp., overlapping.

1. Defilement ( Dt 23 3): (a) Physical: “I have washed my feet; how shall I do thee?” (Cant 6 13)
(b) Sexual: “to commit the OT monial or moral; of individuals by illicit intercourse (Lev 18 20), or by intercourse at forbidden times (15 24; 18 21 5); of the land by adultery: ‘Shall not that land be greatly defiled?’ (Jer 3 1 ARV ‘polluted,’ usually substituted where the moral or religious predominates over the ceremonial).
(c) Ethical: “Your hands are defiled with blood” (Isa 69 3).
(3) Neither shall they d. themselves any more with any of their transgressions’ (Ezek 37 23).
4. Ceremonial: to render ceremonially unclean, i.e. disqualified for religious service or worship, and capable of communicating the disqualification.

(a) Persons were defiled by contact with carcases of unclean animals (Lev 11 24); or with any carcase (17 15); by eating a carcase (22 8); by contact with issues from the body, one’s own or another’s, e.g. abnormal issues from the genitals, male or female (15 22 5); menstruation (Lev 15 19); by contact with corpses (16 24); or with anyone thus unclean. These defilements, together with the slew and uiilat tiêu, defiled the person and all his possessions, and were transmitted to future generations.
(b) Holy objects were ceremonially defiled by the contact, entrance or approach of the defiled (15 31; Nu 19 13); by the presence of defiled persons; by the remains of the dead (Ezek 9 7; 2 K 23 16; Josiah’s defilement of heathen altars by the ashes of the priests); by the entrance of foreigners (Ps 79 1; see Acts 21 28); by forbidden treatment, as the altar by being tooled (Ex 20 25); objects in general by contact with the unclean. Ceremonial defilement, strictly considered, implied, not sin, but ritual unfitness.
(5) Religious: not always easily distinguished or entirely distinguishable from the ceremonial, was still less from the ethico, but in which the central attitude and relationship to Jeh as covenant God and God of righteousness, was more fully in question. The land might be defiled by bloodshed (Deut 23 25), esp. by blood shed for a just or innocent or by adultery (Jer 3 1); by idolatry and idolatrous practices, like sacrificing children to idols, etc (Lev 20 3; Ps 106 39); the temple or altar by disrespect (Mal 1 7 12); by offering the unclean (Hag 2 14); not ceremonially cleansed (Ezek 36 17); by the presence of idols or idolatrous paraphernalia (Jer 7 30).

The scope of defilement in its various degrees (direct, or primary, as from the person or thing defiled, indirect, or secondary, tertiary, etc), was further, by contact with the defiled in NT defiled had been greatly widened by rabbinism into a complex and immensely burdensome system whose shadow falls over the whole NT life. Specific mentions are comparatively few. Physical d. is not mentioned. Sexual d. appears, in a figurative sense: ‘These are they that were not defiled with women’ (Rev 14 4).

Ceremonial d. is found in, but not approved by, the NT. The OT defiles: ‘common’ by eating with unclean hands (Mk 7 2); by eating unclean, ‘common,’ food (Acts 10 14; Peter’s vision); by intimate association with Gentiles, such as eating with them (not expressly forbidden in Mosaic law; Acts 11 4); or entertainment of the Pharisees refusing to enter the Praetorium; by the presence of Gentiles in the Temple (Acts 21 25).
28). But with Christ’s decisive and revolutionary dictum (Mk 7:19): “This he said, making all meats clean,” etc., and with the command in Peter’s vision: “What God hath cleansed, make not thou common” (Acts 10:15); and with Peter’s bold and consistent teaching: “All things indeed are clean” (Rom 14:20, etc.), the idea of ceremonial or ritual d., having accomplished its educative purpose, passed. Defilement in the NT teaching, therefore, is uniformly ethical or spiritual, the two constantly merging. The ethical is found more predominantly in: (1) “things which proceed out of the mouth come forth out of the heart; and they defile the man” (Mt 15:18); “that did not defile their garments” (Rev 3:4); “defile the whole body” (Jas 3:6). The spiritual seems to predominate: “defiled and unbelieving” (Tit 1:15); “conscience being weak is defiled” (by concession to idolatry) (1 Cor 8:7); “lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby the many be defiled” (He 12:15). For the supposed origins of the idea and details of defilement, as from hygienic or aesthetic causes, “natural aversions,” “taboo,” “totemism,” associations with ideas of death, or evil life, religious symbolism, etc., see Politi, @, “ritual cleansing.” Whatever use God may have made of ideas and feelings common among many nations in some form, the Divine purpose was clearly to impress deeply and indelibly on the Israelites the ideas of holiness and sacredness in general, and of Jeh’s holiness, and their own required holiness and separateness in particular, thus preparing for the deep NT teachings of sin, and of spiritual consecration and sanctification.

DEFY, dë-’fë (καθιστασθαι, Heb. נגעש): In 1 S 17 10.25:26.36.45 (the story of David and Goliath) and kindred passages, this word is used in its most familiar sense—to taunt,” “challenge to combat” (Heb נגעש). In Nu 23:7.8 “denounce” would be a better tr than “defey” (Heb נגעש).

DEGENERATE, dë-jen’-er-āt: Only in Jer 2:11, where Judah is compared to a “vain vine” which it “turned into the degenerate branches of a foreign vine.” In Ps 80:15-16, “Deut” or “degenerate (shoots),” from גור to “turn aside,” etc. to turn aside from the right path (Gr προκρίνω, lit. “bitterness.”)

DEGREE, dë-grē’ (יוּדָה, ma’ālāh, “a going up” or “ascent,” hence a staircase or flight of steps; “rank”; ταπεινός, tapeinós, “low”): By derivation it should mean “a step down” (Lat. de, down, gradus, step). It is used, however, of any step up or down; then of grade or rank, whether high or low. (1) In its literal sense of step (as of a stair), it is used in the pl. to translate Heb ma’ālāth (“steps”), in the || passages 2 K 20:9-11 AV (5 t); Is 38:8 AV (3 t), where we read of the “degrees” (RV “stairs”) on the “dial of Ahaz” (Heb steps of Ahaz). See DIAL OF AHAZ. It seems to mean steps or progressive movements of the body toward a certain place in the phrase “A Song of Degrees” (RV “Ascents”), which forms the title of each of the Ps 120-34, probably because they were sung on the way up to the great feasts at Jerusalem. See Psalms. (2) The secondary (but now the more usual) sense of rank, order, grade is found in the following passages: (a) 1 Ch 15:18, “their brethren of the second (degree)” (Heb נוֹבֵא); cf. 1 Ch 25:7; “Elkanah that was next to the king,” Heb, “the king’s second,” i.e. in rank; (b) 1 Ch 17:17, “a man of high degree” (Heb ma’ālāh, “step”); (c) Ps 62:9, “men of low degree . . . men of high degree,” a paraphrase of Heb “sons of man . . . sons of man,” the first “man” being Heb Ḥadāhām (“common humanity”); cf. Gr ἀνθρωπος, Lat homo, Welsh dyn), and the second Heb ḫēh (man in a superior sense); cf Gr ἀνήρ, Lat vir, Welsh gwr); (d) “of low degree” for Gr τεπέλος in 1 S 11:1; 2 S 9:1; (e) in 1 Tim 3:3 AV “a good degree” (Gr bathmōs kalos, RV “a good standing”) is assured to those who have “served well as deacons.” Some take this to mean promotion to a higher official position in the church; but it probably means simply a position of moral weight and influence in the church gained by faithfulness in service (so Hort). DEGREES, SONGS OF (יוּדָהּ יַעֲדַת, shir ha-ma’ālāth; LXX φωνη των ανδροπονων, διδον ανδροπονων; Vg canticum graduum, RV “a song of ascents”): The title prefixed to 15 psalms (Ps 120-34) as to the significance of which there are four views: (1) The Jewish interpretation. According to the Mish, Mekhārāh 2:5, Sukkōr 51b, there was in the temple a semicircular flight of stairs with 15 steps which led from the court of the men of Israel down to the court of the women. Upon these stairs the Levites played on musical instruments on the evening of the Day of Tabernacles. Later Jewish writers say that these 15 psalms derived their title from the step 15 steps of the temple. (2) Gesenius, Delitzsch and others affirm that these psalms derive their name from the step-like progressive rhythm of their thoughts. They are called Songs of Degrees because, they move forward climatically by means of the resumption of the immediately preceding step. But this characteristic is not found in several of the group. (3) Theodoret and other Fathers explain that the 15 hymns as tracing the returning exiles. In Ezr 7:9 the return from exile is called the “going up [ha-ma'álāth] from Babylon.” Several of the group suit this situation quite well, but others presuppose the temple and its stated services. (4) The most probable view is that the hymns were sung by pilgrim bands on their way to the three great festivals of the Jewish year. The journey to Jerusalem was called a “going up,” whether the worshipper came from north or south, east or west. All of the songs are suitable for use on such occasions. Hence the title Pilgrim Psalms is preferred by many scholars. See DIAL OF AHAZ.

JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

DEHAYITES, dë-hā’-tēz (Nv-γά, dēhāwē; AV Dehavites): A people enumerated in Ezr 4:9 with Elamites, etc., among those settled by the Assyrian king Osannapar (Assurpanapal) in Samaria. The identification is uncertain.

DEHOR, dë-hōr’ (αυτάρκης, autarkēs; RV DISSUADE): Not found in the Eng. Bible; once only in Apoc (1 Macc 9:9). An obsolete Eng. word; the opposite of “exhort.” It means “to dissuade,” “to forbid,” “to restrain from.”

DEKAR, dē-kār (יַעֲדַת, deker, “lance”): Father of one of Solomon’s commissioners (1 K 4:9 AV). See BEN-DEKER.

DELALAH, dē-lā’-lah (יוּדָה, dēlah, “God has raised”):

(1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3:24; AV “Dalahiah”),

(2) One of David’s priests and leader of the 23rd course (1 Ch 21:18).

(3) One of the princes who pleaded with Jehoiakim not to destroy the roll containing the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer 36:12:25).

(4) The ancestor of a post-exilic family whose genealogy was first (Ezr 2:60; Neh 7:62; 1 Esd 5:37 n). See DALAH.

(5) The father of timorous Shemaiah (Neh 6:10).
DELAY, dĕ-lā': The noun “delay” (Acts 25 17, “I made no delay”; AV “without any delay”) means “procrastination.” The vb. “to delay” (Ex 22 20; Lev 19, ahar) involves the idea “to stop for a time,” the people being admonished not to discontinue a custom. The pl. pf. of ἀχαρία, achar (Ex 32 22) take pleasure in not coming, expresses not only the fact that he tarried, but also the disappointment on the part of the people, being under the impression that he possibly was put to shame and had failed in his mission, which also better explains the consequent action of the people. “To delay” (κρατέω, chronizo) is used transitively in Mt 24 48 (RV “My lord tarrieth”) and in Lk 12 45. The meaning here is “to prolong,” “to defer.”

A. L. BRENNICH

DELECTABLE, dĕ-lek-ta-b'l (תַּרְרָה לָי; bâmaâh, “to desire”): Found only in Isa 44 9 AV: “Their delectable things shall not profit,” AV “desirable.” ARV translates: “the things that they delight in.” The reference is to idols or images. Delitsch renders it as “passionate”: “Their dearest good are not for nothing.” The word may be traced back to the Lat. delectatibus, “pleasant,” or “delightful!”

W. L. WALKER

DELECTACY, dĕ-lek-ə-sē (τοῦ στρηνοῦ, τὸ στρενόν): Found only in Rev 18 3 AV: “The merchants of earth are enriched through the abundance of her delicacies.” RV has very properly changed delicacies to “wantonness,” and “luxury” in the margin, which is much nearer to the original.

W. A. STIMPSON

DELICATE, dĕl-ık-tāt, DELICATELY, dĕl-ık-tāt-ēl (תַּרְרָה, tahan, תַרְרָה, ἔν τῷ κρατήριῳ, en truphē): “Delicate” usually an adj., but once a subst. (Jer 51 34 AV), “He hath filled his belly [RV ‘maw!’] with my delicacies.” RV retains the word, but ARV very properly has replaced it with “delicacies.” In Sir 30 18, AV agabal, “good things.” The adj. seems to have two meanings, though not easily distinguished: (1) tenderly reared, and (2) wanton or voluptuous. In Dt 28 54-56, Isa 41 1, Jer 5 2, “luxurious” or “daintily bred” would certainly be nearer the original than “delicate.” “Delicate children” of Mic 1 16 AV is changed by RV to “children of thy delight,” i.e. beloved children, rather than children begotten in passion. The advb. “delicately” is employed in the same sense as the adj. (Lam 4 5; Lk 7 27). In the old Eng. writers “delicate” is often used for voluptuous: “Dives for his delicate life to the devil went!” (Piers Plowman). The meaning of “delicately” (ma'ad'hat) in 1 Sam 15 32 (AV) is a real puzzle. The AV reads, “And Agag came unto him delicately,” with a possible suggestion of weakness or fear. ARV and RV substitute “befriended.” Others, by metathesis or change of consonants in the Heb. tr “in bonds” or “letters.”

W. J. BURCHER

DELICIOUSLY, dĕ-lis'ĕ-li (ὑποϊνώμα, strêmidēs, “to live hard or wantonly”): “She [Batylion] . . . lived deliciously” (Rev 18 7.9 AV, RV “wantonly”), “RVm ‘luxuriously’.”

W. W. DAVIES

DELIGHT, dĕ-lĭt (vb, יָדָח, ἑπῆξ, יָדָת; הָמָא, ἐν πληρώμα, συνδεόμαι, συνδεόμαι): “To delight” is most frequently expressed by ἑπῆξ, which means originally “to bend” (of Job 40 17, “He moveth his limbs,” AV “inclined to,” RV “take pleasure in”), “to use up God’s pleasure in His people” (Nu 14 8; 2 S 22 20; Ps 18 19, etc.), and in righteousness, etc (Isa 66 4; Jer 9 24; Mic 7 18, etc), also of man’s delight in God and His will (Ps 40 8; 73 25; AV and RV, “There is none upon earth that I desire besides thee”), and in other objects (Gen 34 19; I S 18 22; Est 2 14; Isa 66 3); ἔθα’; “to stroke,” “cares,” “be fond of,” occurs in Ps 94 19, “Thy comforts delight my soul”; 119 16.47.70, “I will delight myself in thy statutes.” Similarly, St. Paul says (Rom 7 22), “I delight [ἐχέω, ἐχεῖν] in the law of God after the inward man.” This is the only occurrence of the word in the NT.

“This to delight one’s self” (in the Lord) is represented chiefly by ἀναφέρ (Job 22 20; 27 10; Ps 37 4.11; Isa 68 13).

DELIGHT, n., chiefly ἑπῆξ (1 S 15 22; Ps 1 12; 16 3), ταχὴν (Prov 11 1.20; 12 22; 16 8), ἀναφέρ (Ps 119 24.77.92.143.174; Prov 8 30. 31). RV has “delight” for “desire” (Neh 1 11; Ps 22 8; 81 10), for “observe,” different reading (Prov 23 20), “no delight” for “smell in” (Am 5 21), “delightest in me” for “favorost me” (Ps 41 11), “his delight shall be in” (m “Heb ‘seent’”) for “of quick understanding” (Isa 11 3).

The element of joy, of delight in God and His law and will, in the Heb religion is noteworthy as being something which we are apt to fall beneath even in the clearer light of Christianity.

DELIGHTSOME, dĕ-lĭt-sōn (Ƭַרְרָה, ἑπῆξ), is rendered “delightsome” (Mal 12 2), “myself shall be a delightful land,” lit. “a land of delight.”

WILLIS J. BURCHER

DELILAH, dĕ-lĭl-a (תַּרְרָה, ἑπῆξ, “dainty one,” perhaps; LXX Δαλιδᾶ, Dalidēs, Dalēdēs, Dalēdēs): The woman who betrayed Samson to the Philistines (Jgs 16). She was presumably a Philist, though not expressly stated. She is not spoken of as Samson’s wife, though many have understood the account in that way. The Philist paid her a tremendously high price for her services. The account indicates that for beauty, personal charm, mental ability, self-command, nerve, she was quite a wonderful woman, a woman to be admired for some qualities which she exhibits, even while she is to be utterly dissipated. See SAMSON.

WILLIS J. BURCHER

DELIVER, dĕ-lĭv-ĕr (יָדָח, nāgal, יָדָת, nāhan; ἐποίημαι, ῥῶμαι, παραπαθίζω, parapathizō, paradidōmi): Occurs very frequently in the OT and represents various Heb. terms. The Eng. word is used in two senses, (1) “to set free,” etc, (2) “to give,” etc.

(1) The word most often “deliver” in the first sense is nāgal, meaning originally, perhaps, “to draw out.” It is used of all kinds of deliverance (Gen 32 11; Ps 25 20; 143 9, etc; Jer 7 10; Ezek 3 19, etc; Zeph 1 18, etc). The Aram. nāgal occurs in Dan 3 29; 8 14; 8 47; yēnah, “to save,” in Isa 12 5-9; Jer 3 9-31 AV, etc; nadāl, “to let or cause to escape,” in Isa 46 2, “recover,” etc. In the NT rhōma, “to rescue,” is most frequently the “deliver” in this sense (Mt 6 13 AV, “Deliver us from evil”); katəglēt, “to make useless” or “without effect” (Rom 7 6 RV, “discharged”). In the NT “save” takes largely the place of “deliver” in the OT, and the idea is raised to the spiritual and eternal.

(2) For “deliver” in the sense of “give over, up,” etc, the most frequent word is nāhan, the common word for “to give” (Gen 32 16; 40 18 AV; Ex 5 18). Other words are παραθίζω (Hos 11 8, AV and ERV “How shall I deliver thee Israel?” i.e. “How shall I give thee up?” as in the first clause of the verse, with a different word [nāhan]; ARV “How shall I cast thee off?”)

In the NT paradidōmi, “to give over to,” is most frequent (Mt 6 25; 11 27, “All things have been delivered [given or made over] unto me of my Father”); Mt 7 13; Lk 1 2; 1 Tim 1 20, etc; katəglēt, “to grant as a favor” (Acts 25 11. 16 AV).
(3) Υδαθ, "to bring forth," is also rendered "deliver" in the sense of childbirth (Gen 25:24; Ex 1:19, etc.). In the NT this sense is borne by τεκνον, τικλό (Lk 5:7; 2:6; Rev 12:24), and γεννᾶ, γεννᾶδο (Jn 16:21).

In RV there are many changes, such as, for "deliver into the power of" (Gen 37:22; Ex 22:26; Dt 24:13), for "delivered," "defended" (1 Ch 11:14); for "cannot deliver thee," "neither . . . turn thee aside" (Job 36:18); for "betray," "betrayed" we have "交付," "delivered up," etc (Mt 26:4; Mk 14:11; Mt 21:16); for "delivered into hands," "committed to pits" (2 Pet 2:4, m "some ancient authorities read chains"; cf Wisd 17:17); "Deliver us from evil," omitted in Lk 11:4, m "Many ancient authorities add but deliver us from the evil one (or, from evil)."

DELOS, δῆλος (Δῆλος, Δῆλο). An island, now deserted, one of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea, about 8 miles long and 1 mile broad, with a rocky mountain peak (Cyclades), which has several hundred feet high in the center. In antiquity Delos enjoyed great prosperity. According to Gr legend, the island was formed by Poseidon from a shell, when he was pursued by the vengeful Hera. It was here that Apollo and Artemis were born; hence the island was sacred, and became one of the chief seats of worship of the two deities. Numerous temples embellished Delos. The most magnificent of all that of Apollo, which contained a colossal statue of the god, a dedicatory offering of the Naxians. This temple was a sanctuary visited by all the Greeks, who came from far and near to worship at the deity's sanctuary. The Delian annual festival, which was held in Delos from the beginning of the 4th cent. BC. To the N. was a remarkable altar composed entirely of ox-horns. The various Ionian cities sent sacred embassies (θερίαι) with rich offerings. There was also a celebrated oracle in Delos which was accounted one of the most trustworthy in the world. Every five years the famous Delian festival was celebrated with prophecies, athletic contests and games of every kind. All the nations of Greece participated.

The earliest inhabitants of Delos were Carian; but about 1000 BC the island was occupied by Ionians. For a long time it enjoyed independence. In 758 BC Delos was chosen as the seat of the council of representatives of the Gr states for deliberation about means for defence against Persia. The treasury of the Athenian Confederacy was kept here after 476. The island became independent of Athens in 454. During the 2d and 1st cent. BC it became one of the chief ports of the Aegean.

The ruins of the city of Delos, which became a flourishing commercial port, are to the N. of the temple. It became the center of trade between Alexandria and the Black Sea, and was for a long time one of the chief slave markets of the Gr world. But Delos received a severe blow, from which it never recovered, in the war between Rome and Mithridates. The latter's general landed in 88 BC and massacred many, and sold as slaves the remainder of the inhabitants, and sacked and destroyed the city together with the temple and its countless treasures. At the conclusion of peace (84) Delos came into the possession of the Romans, who later gave it back to Athens. Under the Empire the island lost its importance entirely.

Delos was one of the states to which Rome addressed letters in behalf of the Jews (138-137 BC; see 1 Macc 15:16-23). Among those who came to Delos from the East must have been many of this nation. Jos cites in full a decree passed in Delos which confirmed the Jewish exemption from military service (Ant, XIV, x, 4). The excavations of the French have laid bare 8 temples within the sacred inclosure (Apollo, Artemis, Dionysus). Numerous statues, dating from the earliest times of Gr art down to the latest, have been discovered; also 2,000 inscriptions, among which was an inventory of the temple treasures.

By the side of Delos, across a very narrow strait, lies Rheneia, another island which was the burying-ground of Delos; for on the sacred island neither births, deaths nor burials were permitted. In 426 BC Delos was "purified" by the Athenians—by the removal of the bodies that had been interred there previously.

The means described in Gen 6-9 by which the Lord destroyed, on account of their wickedness, all the members of the human race except Noah and his family. According to the Biblical account, Noah was warned of the coming Noah.

ACOUNT 120 years before (Gen 6:3; 1 Pet 3:20; 2 Pet 2:5). During all this time he is said to have been a "preacher of righteousness" "while the ark was a preparing," when we may well suppose (according to the theory to be presently presented for the case) that the leading up to the final catastrophe may have given point to his preaching. When the catastrophe came, the physical means employed were twofold, namely, the breaking up of the "fountains of the great deep" and the opening of "the windows of heaven" (Gen 7:11). But the rain is spoken of as continuing as a main cause only 40 days, while the waters continued to prevail for 150 days (ver 24), when 2:3) "the fountains also of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained; and the waters returned from off the earth continually," so that after 10 months the ark rested upon "the mountains of Ararat" (not the peak of Mount Ararat, but the highlands of Armenia in the upper part of the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris; see ARARAT). Here it rested 40 days before the water subsided sufficiently to suggest disembarking, when a raven (which could easily find its food on the carcases of the animals which had been destroyed) was sent forth, and did not return (ver 7); but a dove sent out at the same time found no rest and returned empty to the ark (ver 9). After 7 days, however, it was sent out again and returned with a fresh olive leaf (ver 11). After 7 days more the dove was sent forth again and did not return. After 56 days more of waiting Noah and his family departed from the ark. The following are the leading points in the story which has been given in "Noah's Log Book" appropriately styled by Sir William King Davidson in "Noah in Art" (see S. F. Langdon, Art and Bible, Bishop's art, in Bib. Soc. [1906], 510–17, and Rev. Joseph B. Davidson in the author's Scientific Conformations of OT History, 180–94).

It will thus be seen that there is no need of supposing any duplication and overlapping of accounts in the Bib. story. There is continual progress in the account from beginning to end, with only such repetitions for literary effect as we are familiar with in oriental writings. In Gen 6:5–7 13 the wickedness of the world is assigned as the reason which prevailed in the Divine counsels for bringing about the contemplated catastrophe. While emphasizing the righteousness of Noah which led to his preservation, Gen 6:13–21 contains the direction for the making of the ark and of the preparations to bring into it a certain number of animals. This preparation having been made, the order was given (7:1–4) for the embarkation of them, a dove being sent out daily to ascertain whether it returned. We are then told that Noah and his family, and beasts both clean and unclean, were shut up in the ark during the prevalence of the water, and its final subniaidna. Altogether the account is interesting and impressive (see W. H. Green, Unity of the Book of Genesis, 83 ff.).

Compared with other traditions of the Deluge, the Bib. account appears in a most favorable light, while the general prevalence of such traditions strongly confirms the reality of the Bib. story.

An Egyptian legend of the Deluge is referred to in Plato's Timaeus, where the gods are said to have purified the earth by a great flood of water from which only a few shepherds escaped by climbing to the summit of a high mountain. In the Egyptian documents themselves, however, we find only that Ra, the creator, on account of the insolence of man, proceeded to exterminate him by a deluge of blood which flowed up to Helopolis, the home of the gods; but the heinousness of the deed so affected him that he repented and swore never more to destroy mankind.

In Indian mythology there is no reference to the Flood in Rig Veda, but in the laws of Manu we are told that a fish said to Manu, "A deluge will sweep all creatures away. . . . Build a vessel and worship me. When the waters rise enter the vessel and I will save thee."

When the Deluge came, he had entered the vessel... Manu fastened the cable of the ship to the horn of the fish, by which means the latter made it pass over the mountains of the North. The fish said: 'I have saved thee; fasten the vessel to a tree that the water may not sweep it away while I am gone.' Thereafter, as the waters decrease, thou shalt descend.' Manu descended with the waters, and this is what is called the Descent of Manu on the mountains of the North. The Deluge had carried away all creations, and Manu remained alone' (4th by Max Müller).

The Chinese tradition is embodied in sublime language in their book of Li-Ki: "And now the pillars of heaven were broken, the earth shook to its very foundation; the sun and the stars changed their motion; the earth fell to pieces, and the waters enclosed within its bosom burst forth with violence, and overflowed. Man having rebelled against heaven, the system of the universe was totally disordered, and the grand harmony of nature destroyed. All these evils arose from man's despising the supreme power of the universe. He fixed his looks upon terrestrial objects and worked against heaven, until finally he became transformed into the objects which he loved, and celestial reason entirely abandoned him."

The Greeks, according to Plutarch, had five different traditions of the Deluge, that of Deucalion being the most important. Accord ing to this, Prometheus warned his son Deucalion of the flood which Zeus had resolved to bring upon the earth by reason of its wickedness. According to this tradition, Deucalion constructed an ark and took refuge in it, but with his vessel was stranded on Mount Parrassus in Thessaly, whereupon they disembarked and repeopled the earth by the fantastic process revealed to them by the goddess Themis of throwing stones about them, these which Deucalion threw becoming men and those which Pyrrha threw becoming women. Lucian's form of the legend, however, is less fantastic and more nearly in line with Sem tradition. In the Gr legend as in the Heb, a dove was sent out daily until it returned no more. In the second time, its feet being tinged with mud the second time, intimating the abatement of the flood. But neither Homer nor Hesiod have this tradition. Probably it was borrowed from the Semites or the Dravidians (see John Stalker, Theologische Zeitschrift, 3:14017).

In Britain there is a Druid legend that on account of the profigacy of mankind, the Supreme Being sent a flood upon the earth when "the waves of the sea lifted themselves on high round the border of Britain."

But the patriarch, distinguished for his integrity, had been shut up with a select company in a strong ship which bore them safely upon the summit of the waters (Ed. Davies in his Mythology and Rites of British Druids). From these the world was again repeopled. There are various forms of this legend but they all agree in substance.

Among the American Indians traditions of the Deluge were found by travelers to be widely disseminated. Mr. Catlin says, "Among the 120 different tribes which I visited in North, South, and Central America, Traditions no tribe exists that has not related to me distinct or vague traditions of such a calamity, in which one, or three, or eight persons were saved above the waters upon the top of a high mountain." (quoted by Wm. Restelle in Bib. Soc. [January, 1907], 157). While many, perhaps most, of these traditions bear the stamp of Christian influence through the early missionaries, the Mexican legend bears evident marks of originality. According to it the 4th age was one of water, when all men turned into fishes except Tezcatlipoca and his wife Hochiquetzal and their children, who with many animals took refuge in a ship which sailed safely over the tumultuous waters which overwhemed the earth. When the flood subsided the ship stranded on Mount Cobaquean, whereupon he sent forth a vulture which did not return, and then a huming bird which returned with some leaves in its beak. The Peruvian story differs from this in many particulars. According to it a single man and woman took refuge in a box and floated hundreds of miles from Cuzco to an unknown land where they made clay images of all races, and animated them.

The Moravian missionary Cranz, in his History of Greenland, says that "the first missionaries among the Greenlanders found a tolerably distinct tradition of the Deluge" to the effect that "the earth was once tilted over and all men were drowned" except one "who smote afterward upon the ground with a stick and thence came out a woman with which was a fowl, the end of which the Greenlanders point to the remains of fishes and bones of a whale on high mountains where men never could have dwelt, as proof that the earth was once flooded. Among the North American Indians generally the Deluge is emnibished so that they become extremely fantastic, but in many of them there are peculiarities which point unquestionably to a common origin of extreme antiquity. The unprejudiced reader cannot rise from the study of the subject without agreeing in general with François Lenormant, who writes: "As the case now stands, we do not hesitate to declare that, far from being a myth, the Bible, Deluge is a real and historical fact, having, to say the least, left its impress on the ancestors of three races—Aryan, or Indo-European, Sem, or Syrio-Arabian, Chamic, or Kushite—that is to say on the three great civilized races of the ancient world, those which constitute the higher humanity—before the ancestors of these races had as yet separated, and in the part of Asia together inhabited" (Contemporary Review, November, 1879).

The most instructive of these traditions are those which have come down to us from Babylonia, which was recently made known to us only through the Gr historian Berosus of the 4th cent. BC, who narrates that a Tradition great deluge happened at some indefinite time in the past during the reign of Xisuthrus, son of Ariastes. Xisuthrus was warned beforehand by the deity Cronos, and told to build a ship and take with him his friends and relations and all the different animals with all necessary food and trust himself fearlessly to the deep, whereupon he built a Deluge ship (300 ft. long and 2 stadia [1,200 ft.] broad). After the flood subsided Xisuthrus, like Noah, sent out birds which returned to him again. After waiting some days and sending them out a second time, they returned with their feet tinged with mud. Upon the third trial they returned no more, whereupon they disembarked and Xisuthrus with his wife, daughter and pilot offered sacrifice to the gods and were translated to live with the gods. It was found that the place where they were was "the land of Armenia," but they were told to return to Babylon. Berosus concluded his account by saying that "the vessel being thus stranded in Armenia, some part of it yet remains in the Corenaean mountains."

An earlier and far more instructive tradition was found inscribed on cuneiform tablets in Babylonia dating from 3000 BC. These were discovered by George Smith in 1870 and filled as many as 180 lines. The human hero of the account, corresponding to Noah of the Bible and Xisuthrus of the Mexican legend, mesh, who lived in Shuruppak, a city full of violence, on the banks of the Euphrates. He was warned of an approaching flood and exhorted to pull down his house and build a ship and cause "seed of life of every sort to go up into it." The ship, he says, was to be "exact in its dimensions, equal in its breadth and its length.... Its sides were 140 cubits high, the border of its top equaled 140 cubits. I constructed it in 6 stories, dividing it into 7 compartments. Its floors I divided into 9 chambers.... I chose a mast (or rudder pole), and supplied what was necessary. Six sars of bitumen I poured over the outside; three sars of bitumen over the inside." After embarking, the storm broke with fearful violence and the steering of the ship was handed over to Beuzel-Bel, the ship man. But amidst the roll of thunder and the march of mountain waves the helm was wrenched from the pilot's hands and the lightning flashes dismayed all hearts. "Like a battle charge upon mankind" the water rushed so that the gods even were dismayed at the flood and cowered like dogs, taking refuge in the heavens of Anu while Xisuthrus-like a valiant warrior, and repenting of her anger, resolved to save a few and "to give birth to my people" till like "the fry of fishes they fill the sea." The ship was therefore turned to the country of Nizir (Armenia). It is worthy of note that the cuneiform tablet exhibits as much variety of style as does the Bib. account. Plain narrative and rhetorical prose are intermingled in both accounts, a fact which effectually dispenses of the critical theory which regards the Bib. account as a clumsy combination made in later times by piecing together two or more independent traditions. Evidently the piecing together, if there was any, had been accomplished early in Bib. history. See BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA.

On comparing the Bib. account with that of the cuneiform tablets, the following similarities and contrasts are brought to light:

1. That the cuneiform inscription is from start to finish polytheistic (ll. 5–17), whereas the narrative in Gen 6 is monotheistic.

2. The cuneiform agrees with the Bib. narrative in making the Deluge a Divine punishment for the wickedness of the world (ll. 5, 6).

3. The names differ to a degree that is irreconcilable with our present knowledge.

4. The dimensions of the ark as given in Gen (6:15) are reasonable, while those of Berosus and the cuneiform tablets are unreasonable. According to Gen, the ark was 500 cubits (502 ft.) long, 50 cubits (95 ft.) wide, and 30 cubits (49 ft.) high, which are the natural proportions for a ship of that size, being in fact very close to those of the great steamers which are now constructed to cross the Atlantic. The "Celtic" of the White Star line, built in 1901, is 870 ft. long, 75 ft. wide and 49 ft. deep. The dimensions of the "Great Eastern," built in 1858 (662 ft. long, 83 ft. broad, and 58 ft. deep), are still closer to those of the ark. The cuneiform tablets represent the length, width and depth each as 140 cubits (592 ft.), which are the dimensions of an entirely unseaworthy structure. According to Berosus, it was 5 stadia (3,000 ft.) and 2 stadia (1,200 ft.) broad; while Origen (Against Cel- sus, 4.41) represented it to be 135,000 ft. (25 miles) long, and 3,000 ft. (1 mile) wide.

5. In the Bib. account, nothing is introduced conflicting with the sublime conception of holiness and the peculiar combination of justice and mercy ascribed to God throughout the Bible, and illustrated in the general scheme of providential government in the ordering of Nature and in history; while, in the cuneiform tablets, the Deluge is occasioned by a quarrel among the gods, and the few survivors escape, not by reason of a merciful plan, but by a mistake which aroused the anger of Bel (Il. 145-50).

(6) In all the accounts, the ark is represented as floating up stream. According to Gen, it was not, as is usually true, on "Mount Ararat" (8 4), but in the "mountains of Ararat," designating an indefinite region, i.e., upon the region or region to which the ark rested according to the inscriptions, it was in Nizir (ll. 115-20), a region which is watered by the Zab and the Tornadus; while, according to Berosus, it was on the Corecyrenian Mountains, included in the same indefinite area. In all three cases, its resting-place is in the direction of the headwaters of the Euphrates valley, while the scene of the building is clearly laid in the lower part of the valley.

(7) Again, in the Bib. narrative, the spread of the waters floating the ark is represented to have been occasioned, not so much by the rain which fell, as by the breaking-up of "all the fountains of the great deep" (7 11), which very naturally describes phenomena connected with one of the extensive downward breaks of the earth's crust with which geology has made us familiar. The sinking of the land below the level of the ocean is equivalent, in its effects, to the rising of the water above it, and is accurately expressed by the phrases used in the cuneiform narrative. This appears, not only in the language concerning the breaking-up of the great deep which describes the coming-on of the Flood, but also in the description of its termination, in which it is said, that the "fountains also of the deep were stopped, . . . . and the waters returned from off the earth continually" (8 2.3).

Nothing is said of this in the other accounts.

(8) The cuneiform tablets agree in general with the two other accounts respecting the collecting of the animals for preservation, but differ from Gen in not mentioning the severing of clean animals and in including others besides the family of the builder (ll. 66-69).

(9) The cuneiform inscription is peculiar in preservation, having been put in a chest, and putting it in charge of a pilot (ll. 45, 70, 71).

(10) The accounts differ decidedly in the duration of the Flood. According to the ordinary interpretation of the Bib. account, the Deluge continued a year and 17 days; whereas, according to the cuneiform tablets, it lasted only 14 days (ll. 108-7, 117-22).

(11) All accounts agree in sending out birds; but, according to Gen (8 5) a raven was first sent out, and then in succession two doves (8 8-12); while the cuneiform inscription mentions the dove and the raven in reverse order from Gen, and adds a swallow (ll. 121-30).

(12) All accounts agree in the building of an altar and offering a sacrifice after leaving the ark. But the cuneiform inscription is overlaid with a polytheistic coloring: "The gods like flies swarmed about the sacrifices" (II. 132-43).

(13) According to the Bib. account, Noah survived the Flood for a long time; whereas Nah- napishtim and his wife were at once defined and taken to heaven (ll. 177-80).

(14) Both accounts agree in saying that the human race is not again to be destroyed by a flood (Gen 9 11; ll. 102-8-91).

Close inspection of these peculiarities makes it evident that the narrative in Gen carries upon its face an appearance of reality not found in the other accounts. It is scarcely possible that the reasonable dimensions of the ark, its floating up stream, and the references to the breaking-up of the fountains of the deep, should all be occasioned by accident. It is in the highest degree improbable that correct statements of such unobvious facts should be due to the accident of legendary guess-work. At the same time, the duration of the Deluge, according to Gen, affords opportunity for a gradual progress of events which best accords with scientific conceptions of geological movements. If, as the most probable interpretation would imply, the water began to recede after 150 days from the ark and fell to a depth of 15 cubits in 74 days, that would only be 3\1 inches per day—a rate which would be imperceptible to an ordinary observer. Nor is it necessary to suppose that the entire flooded area was uncovered when Noah disembarked. The emergence of the land may have continued for an indefinite period, permitting the prevailing water to modify the climate of all western and central Asia for many centuries. Evidence that this was the case will be found in a later paragraph.

In considering the credihility of the Bib. story we encounter at the outset the question whether the narrative compels us to believe the Flood to have been universal. In the Flood Universal? answer, it is sufficient to suggest that although the Deluge as a whole caused the destruction of the human race, all the universality which it is necessary to infer from the language would be only such as was sufficient to accomplish that object. If man was at that time limited to the plains of western Asia, the same portion of that area would meet all the necessary conditions. Such a limitation is more easily accepted from the fact that general phrases like "Everybody knows," "The whole country was aroused," are never in literature literally interpreted. When it is said (Gen 41. 54-57) that the famine was "in all lands," and over "all the face of the earth," and that "all countries came into Egypt . . . . to buy grain," no one supposes that it is intended to imply that the irrigated plains of Babylonia, from which the patriarchs had emigrated, were suffering from drought like Pal. (For other examples of the familiar use of this hyperbole, see Dt 2 25; Job 37 3; Acts 2 25; Rom 1 8.)

As to the point to which the human race was spread over the earth at the time of the Flood, two suppositions are possible. First, that of Hugh Miller (Testimony of the Rocks) that, owing to the shortness of the antediluvian chronology, and the violence and moral corruption of the people, population had not spread beyond the boundary of western Asia. An insuperable objection to this theory is that the later discoveries have brought to light remains of prehistoric man from all over the northern hemisphere, showing that long before the time of the Flood he had become widely scattered.

Another theory, supported by much evidence, is that, in connection with the enormous physical changes in the earth's surface during the closing scenes of the Glacial epoch, a man perished from off the face of the earth except in the valley of the Euphrates, and that the Noachian Deluge is the final catastrophe in that series of destructive events (see Antediluvians). The facts concerning the Glacial epoch naturally lead up to this conclusion. For during the entire epoch, at all times, the conditions affecting the level of the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere were extremely abnormal, and continued so until some time after man had appeared on the earth.

The Glacial epoch followed on, and probably was a consequence of, an extensive elevation of all the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere at the close of the Tertiary period. This elevation was certainly as much as 2,000 ft. over the northern part of the United States, and over Canada and Northern Europe. Snow accumulated over this high land, and in ice form was certainly at least a mile thick, and some of the best authorities say 2, or even 3 miles. The surface over which this was spread amounted to 2,000,000 sq. miles in Europe and 4,000,000 in North America. The total amount of the accumulation would therefore be 6,000,000 cubic miles at the lowest calculation, or twice or three times that amount if the largest estimates are accepted. (For detailed evidence see Wright, Ice age in North America, 5th ed.) But in either case the transference of so much weight from the ocean beds to the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere brings into the problem a physical force sufficient to produce incalculable effects. The weight of 6,000,000 cubic miles of ice would be twenty-four thousand million million (24,000,000,000,000,000) tons, which is equal to that of the entire North American continent above sea level. Furthermore this weight was first removed from the ocean beds, thus disturbing still more the balance of forces which maintain the stability of the land. The geological evidence is abundant that in connection with the overloading of the land surfaces in the Northern Hemisphere, and probably by reason of it, the glaciated area and a considerable area outside of it sank down until it was depressed far below the present level. The post-Glacial depression in North America was certainly 600 ft. below sea level at Montreal, and several hundred feet lower farther north. In Sweden and Finland there is evidence of a depression of the land 1,000 ft. below the sea.

The evidences of a long-continued post-Glacial subsidence of the Aral-Caspian basin and much of the surrounding area is equally conclusive. At Trebizond, on the Black Sea, there is an extensive recent sea beach clinging to the precipitous volcanic mountain back of the city 750 ft. above the present water level. The gravel in this beach is so fresh as to compel a belief in its recent origin, while it certainly has been deposited by a body of water standing at that elevation after the rock erosion of the region had been almost entirely effected. The deposit is about 100 ft. thick, and extends along the precipitous face of the mountain for a half-mile or more. So extensive is it that it furnishes an almost perfect place for a reservoir. When the water was high enough to build up this shore line, it would cover all the plains of southern Russia, of Western Siberia and of the Aral-Caspian depression in Turkestan. Similar terraces of corresponding height are reported by competent authorities on the south shore of the Crimea and at Baku, on the Caspian Sea.

Further and most interesting evidences of this post-Glacial land depression is the existence of Arctic seal 2,000 miles from the Arctic Ocean in bodies of water as widely separated as the Caspian Sea, the Aral Sea and Lake Baikal. Lake Baikal is now 1,500 ft. above sea level. It is evident, therefore, that there must have been a recent depression of the whole area to admit the migration of this species to that distant locality. There are also clear indications of a smaller depression around the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea, where there are abandoned sea beaches from 200 to 300 ft. above the present level. In the case of shells identical with those now living nearby. These are found in Egypt, in the valley of the Red Sea, and in the vicinity of Joppa and Beirit. During their formation Asia and Africa must have been separated by a wide stretch of water connecting the Mediterranean with the Red Sea. The effect of such lingering wide expanses of water upon the climate of Western Asia must have been profound, and would naturally provide these conditions which would favor the early development of the human race. The vegetation (which was certain at elevation of 5,000 ft. the vine is indigenous), from which the second distribution of mankind is said to have taken place.

Furthermore there is indubitable evidence that the rainfall in central Asia was, at a comparatively recent time, immensely greater than it has been in the historic period, indicating that gradual passage from the conditions connected with the Deluge to those of the present time, at which we have been accustomed to see, must have been through the intermediate state of a semi-arid climate. The evaporation over the Aral Sea is so great that two rivers (the ancient Oxus and the Jaxartes), coming down from the heights of central Asia, each with a volume as great as that of the Nile, do not suffice to cause an overflow into the Caspian Sea. But the existence of such an overflow during the prehistoric period is so plain that it has been proposed to utilize its channel (which is a mile wide and as distinctly marked as that of any living stream) for a canal.

Owing to the comparatively brief duration of the Noahian epoch, we may possibly expect to find many positive indications of its occurrence. Nevertheless, Professor Prestwich (to whom there has been no higher geological authority in England during the last twenty years) has been especially active in relating to Western Europe and the Mediterranean basin which cannot be ignored (see Phil. Trans. of the Royal Soc. of Lond., CXXIV [1883], 903-84; SCOT, 288-82). Among these evidences one of the most convincing is to be found in the last of the Aral-Caspian basins at the base of the mountains surrounding the plain of Palermo in Sicily. In this cave there was found an immense mass of the bones of hippopotami of all ages down to the foetus, mingled with a few of the dear, ox and elephant. These were so fresh when discovered that they were cut into ornaments and polished and still retained a considerable amount of their nitrogenuous matter. Twenty tons of these bones were shipped for commercial purposes in the first six months after their discovery. Evidently the animals furnishing these bones had taken refuge in this cave to escape the rising water which had driven them in from the surrounding plains and cooped them up in the amphitheatre of mountains upon which the old depression of the land. Similar collections of bones are found in various ossiferous fissures, in England and Western Europe, notably in the Rock of Gibraltar and at Santenay, a few miles S. of Chalons in central France, where there is an accumulation of bones in fissures 1,000 ft. above the sea, similar in many respects to that in the cave described at San Ciro, though the bones of hippopotami did not appear in these places; but the bones of wolves, bears, horses, which in the existence of Arctic seal, 2,000 miles from the Arctic Ocean in bodies of water as widely separated as the Caspian Sea, the Aral Sea and Lake Baikal. Lake Baikal is now 1,500 ft. above sea level. It is evident, therefore, that there must have been a recent depression of the whole area to admit the migration of this species to that distant locality. There are also clear indications of a smaller depression around the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea, where there are abandoned sea beaches from 200 to 300 ft. above the present level. cal discoveries do show that such a catastrophe is perfectly credible from a scientific point of view; and the supposition that there was a universal destruction but of the human race in the northern hemisphere at least, in connection with the floods accompanying the melting off of the glacial ice is supported by a great amount of evidence. There was certainly an extensive destruction of animal species associated with man during that period. In Europe the great Irish elk, the machairodus, the cave lion, the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus and the elephant disappeared with prehistoric man, amid the floods at the close of the Glacial epoch. In North America equally large felines, together with horses, tapirs, llamas, great mastodons and elephants and the huge megalonyx went to destruction in connection with the same floods that destroyed so large a part of the human race during the dramatic closing scenes of the period. It is, therefore, by no means difficult for an all-round geologist to believe in a final catastrophe such as is described in Gen. If we disbelieve in the Bible Dehaye it is not because we know too much geology, but too little.

DELUSION, δελλτζήμιν: (1) Isa 66 4, "I also will choose their delusions" (RV "mockings"); Heb ta'ālāhîm, which occurs only here and Isa 3 4 (where it isRV "mocking"). Its meaning is somewhat ambiguous. The best tr seems to be "wantonness," "caprice." "Their wanton dealing, i.e. that inflicted on them" (DBD). Other trs suggested are "insults" (Skinner), "freaks of fortune" (Cheyne, "follies" (Whiston). LXX has ἐπαλάμαια, "mockings, Vulg. delusiones.

(2) These 2:11 AV, "God shall send them strong delusion" (RV "God sendeth them a working of error"); πάντα, πλην, "a wandering," "is roaming about in the NT, "error," either of opinion or of conduct.

DEMAND, δέμάντ': The peremptory, imperative sense is absent from this word in its occurrences in AV. It is found: in 1 Sam 1 17; Acts 21 19 (for demander) one or the other of the RV substitutes in 2 S 11 7; Mt 2 4; Lk 3 14; 17 20; Acts 21 33. RV retains "demand" in Ex 5 14; Job 38 18; 40 7; 42 2; Dan 5 27; and inserts it (AV "require") in Neh 5 18.

DEMAS, δέμα (Δημας, Δημάς, "popular"): According to Col 4 14; 2 Tim 4 10; Philem ver 24, one who was a leader of a "fellow-worker" with Paul at Rome (Col, Phil). But at last, "having loved this present world," forsook the apostle and betook himself to Thessalonica (2 Tim). No other particulars are given concerning him. See APOSTASY; DEMETRIUS.

DEMETRIUS, δέμετριος US (Δημήτριος, Démétrios, "of" or "belonging to Demeter," an ordinary name in Greece) in:

(1) Demetrius I, surnamed Sardes, Σάρδης ("saw-like"), was the son of Seleucus IV (Philopator). He was sent as a boy to Rome, by his father, to serve as a hostage, and remained there quietly during his father's life. He was detained also during the reign of his uncle, Antiochus Epiphanes (q.v.) from 175 to 164 BC, but when Antiochus died Demetrius, who was now a young man of 23 (Polyb. xxxii.12), chafed at a longer detention, particularly as his cousin, Antiochus Eupator, a boy of 9, succeeded to the kingdom with Lysias as his guardian. The Rom Senate, however, was moved to listen to his plea for a quick visit to Syria, because, as Polybius says, they felt surer of their power over Syria with a mere boy as king.

In the meantime, a quarrel had arisen between Potemky Phliometor and Eumetesus Physkon (Livy Epit. 46; Diod. Sic. ix. 33; and Gnaeus Octavius, who had been sent by the Romans to Syria, while plundering the country. Demetrius, taking advantage of the troubled condition of affairs, consulted with his friend Polybius as to the advisability of attempting to seize the throne of Syria (op. cit. xxxiii.19). The historian advised him not to stumble twice on the same stone, but to venture something worth of a king, so after a second unsuccessful appeal to the Senate, Demetrius escaped to Tripolis, and from there advanced to Antioch where he seized the city from Lysias (Polyb. xii. 27). His first act was to put to death young Antiochus, his cousin, and his minister Lysias (Appian, Syr., c. 47; Ant, XII, x, 1; 1 Macc 7 1–4; 2 Macc 14 1.2). As soon as he was established in power, Demetrius made an attempt to placate the Romans by sending them valuable gifts as well as the assassin of Gn. Octavius (Polyb. xii.23); and he then tried to secure the Hellenizing party by sending his friend Baccides (q.v.) to make the wicked Alcimus high priest. After a violent struggle and much treachery on the part of Baccides (Ant, XII, x, 2), the latter left the country, having charged all the people to obey Alcimus, who was protected by an army. The Jews under Judas resented his presence, and Judas inflicted on Baccides "wickedness". He was later on executed at Athens (q.v. 162 BC). Alcimus, in fear, sent a message for aid to Demetrius, who sent to his assistance Nicanor, the best disposed and most faithful of his friends, who had accompanied him in his flight from Rome (Ant, XXX, vii). On Alcimus' arrival in Judea, he attempted to win by guile, but Judas saw through his treachery, and Nicanor was forced to fight openly, suffering two signal defeats, the first of Caspians (1 Macc 7 31–32), and the second (in which Nicanor himself was killed), at Adasa (7 39 ff; 2 Macc 15 26 ff). In a short while, however, Demetrius, hearing of the death of Nicanor, sent Baccides and Alcimus into Judea again (1 Macc 9 1). Judas arose against them with an army of 3,000 men, but when these saw that 20,000 opposed them, the greater part of them deserted, and Judas, with an army of 800, lost his life, like another Leonidas, on the field of battle (1 Macc 9 40.15). Then Baccides took the wicked mantle and made himself king (1 Macc 9 25); while Jonathan, who was appointed successor to Judas, fled with his friends (1 Macc 9 29 ff).

During the next seven years, Demetrius succeeded in alienating both the Romans (Polyb. xxxii.20) and his own people, and Alexander Balas (q.v.) was put forward as a claimant to the throne, his supporters maintaining that he was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 10 1–21; Ant, XIII, ii, 1–3). Both Alexander and Demetrius made bids for the support of the Jews, the former offering the high-priesthood and the title of King's Friend (1 Macc 10 20), and the latter freedom from taxes, tributes and customs (10 28). Alexander's bait proved more alluring, since the Jews "gave no credence" to the words of Demetrius, and with the aid of the Maccabees, he vied with Demetrius for the space of two years for the complete sovereignty of Syria. At the end of this time, a decisive battle took place, in which Demetrius was slain, and Alexander became king of Syria (150 BC) (10 48–50; Ant, XIII, ii, 4; Polyb. iii.5; see also Maccabees).

(2) Demetrius II, surnamed Nikádros, Νικάδρος ("conqueror"), was the son of Demetrius Soter. When Balas was killed, Demetrius II, he sent his son to a place of safety in Crete. Three months after his father's death (147 BC), the unpopularity of Alexander gave the young man an opportunity to return and seize the government. He landed in Cilicia with Cretan mercenaries and secured the support of all Syria with the exception of Judaea (1 Mace 10 67 f.). Apollonius, his general, the governor of Cœle-Syria, who essayed the conquest of the Jews, was defeated at Azotus with great loss.

Philip, Ptolemy's son-in-law, who was an artful, primitive Mace (BJ, 10, 11; Alexander, 24), had secured the kingdom for himself by an agreement with his name Nikator (Ant, XIII, iv, 8; 1 Mace 11 14 ff)

Jonathan now concluded a favorable treaty with Demetrius, whereby three Samaritan provinces were added to Judaea and the whole country was made exempt from tax (1 Mace 11 20-37; Ant, XIII, iv, 9). Demetrius then dismissed his army except the foreigners, thinking himself safe with the loyalty of the Jews assured. In the meantime, Tryphon, one of Balas' generals, set up the son of Alexander, Antiochus, as a king in his stead, and secured the assistance of the discarded army of Demetrius. Jonathan's aid was sought and he quelled the rebellion, on condition that the Syrian garrison be removed from Jerusalem (1 Mace 11 41-62; Ant, XIII, iv, 9). The king, however, falsified all that he had said, and kept none of his promises, so the Jews, deserting him, took sides with Tryphon and supported the claims of the boy Antiochus (1 Mace 11 53-60; Anti- ochus Eusebius' generals then entered Syria but were defeated by Jonathan at Hazor (1 Mace 11 63-74), and by skilful generalship he made fortune a second attack at invasion (121 B.C. 4).

Tryphon, who was now master of Syria, broke faith with Jonathan (12 40) and essayed the conquest of Judaea. Jonathan was killed by treachery, and Simon, his successor, made proposals of peace to Demetrius, who agreed to let hostages be hostage (1 Mace 13 39-40; Ant, XIII, vi, 7). Demetrius then left Simon to carry on the war, and set out to Parthia, ostensibly to secure the assistance of the king, Mithridates, against Tryphon (1 Mace 14 1). Here he was captured and imprisoned (14 4; Ant, XIII, vi, 11; Josephus however, puts this event in 140 rather than 138 BC).

After an imprisonment of ten years, he was released and resumed the sovereignty 126 BC, but becoming involved in a quarrel with Ptolemy Phy- sailus, he was banished by Ptolemy Physa- lus (1 Mace 14 51-11). From this place, he fled to Tyre, where he was murdered in 126 BC, according to some, at the instigation of Cleopatra, his wife (Jos, Ant, XIII, ix, 3).

(3) Demetrius III, Ekeapôs, Bâkainos ("the fortunate"), was the son of Antiochus Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius Nikator. When his father died, civil war arose, in which his two elder brothers lost their lives, while Philip, the third brother, secured part of Syria as his domain. Demetrius then took up his abode in Cœle-Syria with Damas- cuses as his capital (Ant, XIII, xiii, 4; BJ, I, iv, 4).

War now broke out in Judaea between Alexander Jannaeus and his Pharisee subjects, who invited Demetrius to aid them. Thinking this a good opportunity to extend his realm, he joined the insurged Jews and together they defeated Jannaeus near Shechem (Ant, XIII, xiv, 1; BJ, I, iv, 5).

The Jews then deserted Demetrius, and he withdrew to Beroea, which was in the possession of his brother Philip. Demetrius besieged him, and Philip met the Parthians with his assistance. The tables were turned, and Demetrius, besieged in his camp and starved into submission, was taken prisoner and sent to Arsaces, who held captive until his death (Ant, XIII, xiv, 3). The dates of his reign are not certain.

DEMETRIUS, dê-môtr'i-us (Δημήτριος, Demétrios, "belonging to Ceres"): The name of two persons:
(1) A Christian disciple praised by St. John (3 Jn ver 12). The Hebrew name "Demetrius" was the Christian form (Acts 19 29). The apostles feared the teachings of Paul were injurious to the truth of the silversmiths, there arose a riot of which Demetrius was the chief. Upon an inscription which Mr. Wood discovered among the ruins of the city, there appeared the name Demetrius, a warden of the Ephesian temple for the year 57 AD, and some authors believe the temple warden to be identical with the ringleader of the rebellion. The name, however, has been most common among the Greeks of every age. Because of its frequent use it cannot be supposed that Demetrius, the disciple of 3 Jn ver 12, was the silversmith of Ephesus, nor that Demetrius of 2 Thess 3 14 is the same. The name in a contracted form, may be identified with him.

DEMON, DEMONIC, dé-mon, dé-mon-ik, DEMONOLOGY, dé-mon-ol'-6-ji, DEMONI-emon, earlier form daimon, daimon, =παύξειν άκα darpaton, συνον, πανικά akatharion, panôrôn, "demon," "unclean or evil spirit," incorrectly rendered devil in AV):
1. Definition.—The word daimon or daimonion seems originally to have had two closely related meanings; a deity, and a spirit, superhuman but not supernatural. In the former sense the term occurs in the LXX tr of Dt 32 17; Ps 106 37;
Acts 17 18. In the latter sense of the second, it involves a general reference to vaguely conceived personal beings akin to men and yet belonging to the unseen realm, leads to the application of the term to the peculiar and restricted class of beings designated "demons" in the NT.

II. The Origin of Biblical Demonology.—An interesting scheme of development has been suggested (by Baudissin and others) in which Bib. demonism is brought through polytheism into connection with primitive animism.

A simple criticism of this theory, which is now in the ascendancy, will serve fittingly to introduce what should be said specifically concerning

1. The Evolutionary
Theory

(1) Animism, which is one branch of that general primitive view of things which is designated animism, is the theory that all Nature is alive (see Ladd, Phil. Rel., I, 89 f) and that all natural processes are due to the operation of living wills. (2) Polytheism is supposed to be the outcome of animism. The vaguely conceived spirits of the earlier conception are advanced to the position of deities with names, fixed characters and specific functions, organized into a pantheon. (3) Bib. demonology is supposed to be due to the solvent of monotheism upon contemporary polytheism. The Hebrews were brought into contact with surrounding nations, esp. during the Pers, Bab and Gr periods, and monotheism made room for heathenism by reducing its deities to the dimension of demons. They are not denied all objective reality, but are denied the dignity and prerogatives of deity.

The objections to this ingenious theory are too many and too serious to be overcome. (1) The genetic connection between animism and polytheism is not clear. In fact, the specific religious character of animism is altogether problematical. It belongs to the category of primitive philosophy rather than of religion. It is difficult to trace the process by which spirits unnamed and with characteristics of the vaguest become deities—esp. is it difficult to understand how certain spirits only are advanced to the standing of deities. More serious still, polytheism and animism have coexisted with Christianity. This is the explanation (see Sayce, Babyloina and Assyrta, 232; Rogers, Religion of Babylon and Assyria, 75 f) for a long course of history. It looks as if animism and polytheism had a different raison d'être, origin and development. It is, at least, unsafe to construct a theory on the basis of so insecure a connection. (2) The interpretation of heathen deities as demons by no means indicates that polytheism is the source of Bib. demonology. On general principles, it seems far more likely that the category of demons was already familiar, and that connection with polytheism brought about an extension of its application. A glance at the OT will show how comparatively slight and unimportant has been the bearing of heathen polytheism upon Bib. thought. The demonology of the OT is confined to the following passages: Lev 16 21; 22; 17 7; Isa 13 21; 34 13; Dt 32 17; Ps 106 57 (elsewhere commented upon; see common union with demons). Gesenius well says: "the phraseology of the OT is intended as a symbolical declaration that the land and the people are now purged from guilt, their sins being handed over to the evil spirit to whom they are held to belong, and whose home is in the desolate wilderness remote from human habitations (ver 22), into a land cut off". A more striking instance could scarcely be sought of the way in which the religion of Jhe kept the popular spiritism at a safe distance. Lev 17 7 (see common union with demons) refers to participation in the rites of heathen worship. The two passages—Isa 13 20; 21; 34 13.14—are poetical and really imply nothing as to the writer's own belief. Creatures both seen and unseen supposed to inhabit places described as desolate and remote are usually used by them, to furnish the details for a vivid word-picture of uninhabited solitude. There is no direct evidence that the narrative of the Fall (Gen 3 1–19) has any connection with demonology (see HDB, 1, 509), though the idea of the Watchers seems to be a general one, and mention of satyrs and night-monsters of current mythology with such creatures as jackals, etc., implies "that demons were held to reside more or less in all these animal demeans of the ruined solitude" is clearly fanciful. It is almost startling to find that all that can possibly be affirmed of demonology in the OT is confined to a small group of passages which are either legal or poetical and which all furnish examples of the inhibiting power of high religious conceptions upon the minds of a naturally superstitious and imaginative people. Even if we add all the passages in which a real existence seems to be granted to heathen deities (e.g. Nu 21 29; Isa 19 1, etc) and interpret them in the extreme sense, we are still compelled to affirm that evidence is lacking to prove the influence of polytheism in the formation of the Bib. doctrine of demons. (3) This theory breaks down in another still more vital particular. The demonology of the Bible is not of kin either with paganism, or with any other Sem. demonism. In what follows we shall address ourselves to NT demonology—that of the OT being a negligible quantity.

III. NT Demonology.—The most marked and significant fact of NT demonology is that it provides no materials for a discussion of the nature and characteristies of demons. Whitehouse says (HDB, I, 593) that NT demonology "is all in its broad characteristic the demonology of the contemporary Judaism stripped of its crude and exaggerated features." How much short of this statement holds later, but as it stands it defines the specific direction of inquiry into the NT treatment of demons; namely, to explain its freedom from the crude and exaggerated features of popular demonism. The presence among NT writers of an influence curbing curiosity and restraining the imagination is of all things the most important for us to discover and emphasize. In four of its most vital features the NT attitude on this subject differs from all popular conceptions: (a) in the absence of all imaginative details concerning demons; (b) in the emphasis placed upon the moral character of demons and their connection with the ethical disorders of the human race; (c) in the absence of confidence in magical methods of any kind in dealing with demons; (d) in its intense restrictions of the sphere of demoniacal operations. A brief treatment under each of these heads will serve to present an ordered statement of the most important facts with the numerous conjectures of interpreters." If the prevalent modern view is accepted we find in it an actual meeting-point of popular superstition and the religion of Jhe (see Azzazi). According to Driver (HB) the word is fanciful. It is intended as a symbolical declaration that the land and the people are now purged from guilt, their sins being handed over to the evil spirit to whom they are held to belong, and whose home is in the desolate wilderness remote from human habitations (ver 22), into a land cut off." A more striking instance could scarcely be sought of the way in which the religion of Jhe kept the popular spiritism at a safe distance. Lev 17 7 (see common union with demons) refers to participation in the rites of heathen worship. The two passages—Isa 13 20; 21; 34 13.14—are poetical and really imply nothing as to the writer's own belief. Creatures both seen and unseen supposed to inhabit places described as desolate and remote are usually used by them, to furnish the details for a vivid word-picture of uninhabited solitude. There is no direct evidence that the narrative of the Fall (Gen 3 1–19) has any connection with demonology (see HDB, 1, 509), though the idea of the Watchers seems to be a general one, and mention of satyrs and night-monsters of current mythology with such creatures as jackals, etc., implies "that demons were held to reside more or less in all these animal demeans of the ruined solitude" is clearly fanciful. It is almost startling to find that all that can possibly be affirmed of demonology in the OT is confined to a small group of passages which are either legal or poetical and which all furnish examples of the inhibiting power of high religious conceptions upon the minds of a naturally superstitious and imaginative people. Even if we add all the passages in which a real existence seems to be granted to heathen deities (e.g. Nu 21 29; Isa 19 1, etc) and interpret them in the extreme sense, we are still compelled to affirm that evidence is lacking to prove the influence of polytheism in the formation of the Bib. doctrine of demons. (3) This theory breaks down in another still more vital particular. The demonology of the Bible is not of kin either with paganism, or with any other Sem. demonism. In what follows we shall address ourselves to NT demonology—that of the OT being a negligible quantity.
Edersheim when he says, "Greater contrast could scarcely be conceived than between what we read in the NT and the views and practices mentioned in Rabbinic writings" (LTJM, 11, 776).

It is to be noted that while in its original application the term daimonion is morally indifferent, in NT usage the demon is invariably an ethically evil being. This differentiates the NT treatment from extra-cannical Jewish writings. In the NT demons belong to the kingdom of Satan whose power it is the mission of Christ to destroy. It deepens and intensifies its representations of the earliness of human life and its moral issues by extending the sphere of moral struggle to the invisible world. It aptly teaches that the power of Christ extends to the world of evil spirits and that faith in Him is adequate protection against any evils to which men may be exposed. (For significance of this point see Plummer, St. Luke [ICC], 132-33.)

(b) The NT demonology differs from all others by its negation of the power of magic rites to deliver from the affliction. Magic which is clearly separable from religion at that specific point (see Gwatkin, Knowledge of God, I, 249) rests upon and is dependent upon spirituality. The ancient Bab isincination of a sacrifice as a suppliant in the presence of the extant documents, are addressed directly to the supposed activities and powers of demons. These beings, who are not trusted and prayed to in the sense in which deities are, command confidence and call forth prayer, are dealt with by magic rites and formulas (see Rogers, op. cit., 144). Even the Jewish non-canonical writings contain numerous forms of words and ceremonies for the expulsion of demons. In the NT there is no magic. The deliverance from a demon is a spiritual and ethical process (see Exorcism).

(d) In the NT the range of activities attributed to demons is greatly restricted. According to Bab ideas: 'These demons were everywhere; they lurked in every corner, watching for their prey. The city streets knew their malevolent presence, the rivers, the seas, the tops of mountains; they appeared sometimes as serpents gliding noiselessly upon their victims, as birds horrid of mien flying remorselessly, as afflic, as toady or drugs in human forms, grotesque, malformed, awe-inspiring through their hideousness. To these demons all sorts of misfortune were ascribed—a toothache, a headache, a broken bone, a raging fever, an outbreak of anger, of jeap, or of innumerable diseases' (Rogers, op. cit., 145). In the extra-cannical Jewish sources the same exuberance of fancy appears in attributing all kinds of illness and body to innumerable, swelling hosts of demons lying in wait for men and besieging them with attacks and ills of all descriptions. Of this affluence of morbid fancy there is no hint in the NT. A careful analysis of the instances will show the importance of this fact. There are, taking repetitions and all, about 50 references to demons in the NT. In 11 instances the distinction between demon-possession and diseases ordinarily caused is clearly made (Mt 4:24; 8:16; 10:8; Mk 1:32-34; 6:13; 16:17-18; Lk 4:40.41; 9:1; 13:22; Acts 15:12). The results of demon-possession are not exclusively mental or nervous (Mt 9:32-33; 12:22). They are distinctly and peculiarly mental in two instances only (Gadarene maniac, Mt 8:28 and parallels, and Acts 19:13). Epilepsy is specified in one ease only (Mt 27:15). There is distinction made between a demon of epilepsy and the demon of Sodom and Gomorrah (Mt 1:24). There is distinction made between diseases caused by demons and the same disease not so caused (cf Mt 12:22; 16:30). In most of the instances no specific symptoms are mentioned. In an equally large proportion, however, there are occasional fits of mental excitement often due to the presence and teaching of Christ.

A summary of the entire material leads to the conclusion that, in the NT cases of demon-possession, the symptoms which were very often of the most general character, as by its accompaniments. The aura, so to say, which surrounded the patient, served to distinguish his symptoms and to point out the especial case to which his suffering was attributed. Another unique feature of NT demonology should be emphasized. While this group of disorders is attributed to demons, the victims are treated as sick folk and are healed. The whole atmosphere of demonology is peculiarly Jewish and the spirit of Christ is calm, lofty and pervaded with the spirit of Christ. When one remembers the manifold cruelties inspired by the unreasoning fear of demons, which make the annals of savage medicine a nightmare of unimaginable horrors, we cannot but feel the world-wide difference between the Bib. narratives and all others, both of ancient and modern times, with which we are acquainted. Every feature of the NT narratives points to the conclusion that in them we have trustworthy reports of actual cases. This is more important for NT faith than any other conclusion could possibly be.

It is also evident that Jesus treated these cases of invaded personality, of bondage, of depression, of helpless fear, as due to a real superhuman cause, and to meet and overcome which He addressed Himself. The most distinctive and important words we have upon this obscure and difficult subject, upon which we know far too little to speak with any assurance or authority, are these: 'This doth not rise up by nothing, save by praying' (Mk 9:29).

DEMETHON, dem'-ton (Deme-thon, DeMetophon): A Syrian general in Pal under Antiochus V (Eupator) who continued to harass the Jews after covenants had been made between Lysias and Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc 12:2).

DEN (דֵּין, ma'ôn, מַדְּנָה, ma'ônâh, 'habitation'; דֵּנָא, madâh, and סִטְּרָא, spîl'â'aon, 'cave'; דֵּנָה, madâh [Isa 11:8], 'a light-hole,' fr 'â'ôn, 'or, light,' perhaps for ma'dâh; בָּקָה, bâkâh [Ps 10:9 AV], and בֶּקַּת, bekûtah [Job 38:40], 'a covert,' elsewhere "booth"; בַּקּות, 'erekh [Job 37:8], ' covert,' as in RV; בֶּקָה, bekâh; cf Arab. jubh, 'pit' [Dahl 6:7]; בַּקָּת, bikât; בִּקְרֵי, bikrei, 'bivouac' or 'encampment' [Jgs 6:2]). In the limestone mountains of Pal, caves, large and small, are abundant, the calcium carbonate, of which the rock is mainly composed, being dissolved by the water as it trickles over them or through their crevices. Even on the plains, by a similar process, pits or 'lime sinks' are formed, which are sometimes used by the Arabs for storing straw or grain. Of this sort may have been the pit, bôr, into which Joseph was cast by his brethren (Gen 37:20). Caves and crevices and sometimes spaces among pile of stones demonized and possessed and the stream bed are used as dens by jackals, wolves and other wild animals. Even the people, for longer or shorter periods, have lived as troglodytes. Cf Jgs 6:2: 'Because of Midian the children of Israel made them the dens [minhârâ'dh] which are in the mountains, and the caves [ma'dâh], and the strong-
The precipitous sides of the valleys contain many caves converted by a little labor into human habitations. Notable instances are the valley of the Kidron near Már-Saba, and Wádih-ul-Ḥamām near the Sea of Tiberias. See Cave.

DENARIUS, de-ná'ri-us (Gr. νήσειον, dénádión): A Roman silver coin, 25 of which went to the aureus, the standard gold coin of the empire in the time of Augustus, which was equal in value to about one guinea or $5.25; more exactly £1.0-6 =$5.00, the £ = $4.866. Hence the value of the denarius would be about 20 cents and this was the ordinary wage of a soldier and a day laborer. The word is uniformly rendered “penny” in the AV and “shilling” in the ARV, except in Mt 22 19; Mk 12 15 and Lk 20 24, where the Lat word is used, since in these passages it refers to the coin in which the tribute was paid to the Roman government. See Money.

DÉNOUNCE, dé-noun'se: Occurs in Dt 30 18: “I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish.” It is used here in the obsolete sense of “to declare,” to make known in a solemn manner. It is not found in the Bible with the regular meaning of “to conspire,” “araign,” etc.

DÉNÚNCE, dé-nún'se: This word is characteristic of the NT rather than the OT, although it translates three different Heb originals, viz. תַּלְאֶה, כָּפָשׁ, "to lie," "disown" (Gen 18 15; Josh 24 27; Job 8 18; 31 28; Prov 30 9); מְנָא, "to withhold, keep back" (1 K 20 7; Prov 30 7); שִׁבָּח, "to turn back, "say no" (1 P 2 16).

In the NT, ἀντιλέγειν, ἀντιλέγος, is once trd “deny,” in the case of the Saducees who denied the resurrection (Lk 20 27 AV), and where it carries the sense of speaking against the doctrine. But the word commonly is διαφωνεῖν, ἀντιλέγειν, with or without the prefix ὁπί. In the absence of the prefix the sense is “to disown,” but when it is added it means “to disown totally” or to the fullest extent. In the milder sense it is found in Mt 10 33; 26 70. 72; of Simon Peter, Mk 14 65-70 (Acts 3 13-14; 2 Tim 2 12, 13; 2 Pet 2 1; 1 Jn 2 12-22; Jude ver 4; Rev 2 13; 3 8). But it is significant that the sterner meaning is associated with Mt 16 24 and its parallels, where Christ calls upon him who would be His disciple to deny himself and take up his cross and follow Him. See also Peter, Simon.

DEPÓSIT, dé-póz'ít (παραθέτης, parاثètēs, 1 Tim 6 20; 2 Tim 1 12, 14 RVm, paraphrased in both AV and RV into “that which is committed” (see OXIMEN): The noun was used in the classical Gr, just as its Eng equivalents, for “that which is placed with another for safe keeping,” a charge committed to another’s hands, consisting often of money or property; cf Ex 22 7; Lev 6 2. This practice was common in Rome when there were no banks. (1) In 1 Tim 6 20; also 2 Tim 1 14, the reference is to a deposit which God makes with man, and for which man is to give a reckoning. The context shows that this deposit is the Christian faith, “the pattern of sound words” (2 Tim 1 13), that which is contrasted with the “oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so called” (1 Tim 6 20). “Keep the pattern of sound words, that what you have heard may be approved; that you may approve the things that are excellent” (2 Tim 1 13; 4 2). “Careful to preserve sound words, which you have heard; wherein was the entrance of the truth, that is, of Christ Jesus our Lord.” (2 Tim 1 13).

The deposit in question is not one which man makes with God. The key to the meaning of this expression is found probably in Ps 31 5: “Into thy hand I commend my spirit.” Thou hast redeemed me, i.e. “All that I am, with all my interests, have been intrusted to thy safe keeping, and, therefore, I have no anxieties with respect to the future. The day of reckoning, that day, will show how faithful are the hands that hold this trust.”

DEPUTY, dep'ú-ti: This is the correct rendering of θητής, nēsēb (1 K 22 47). In Est 8 9 and 9 3 the term improperly represents γήθης, sāghēn, in AV, and is corrected to “governor” in RV. In the NT “deputy” represents συνταττόν, ἀντισέπτον (Acts 13 7 12; 18 12; 19 38), which RV correctly renders “proconsul” (q.v.). The farmers were invested with consular power over a district outside the city, usually for one year. Originally they were retiring consuls, but after Augustus the title was given to governors of senatorial provinces, whether he was in residence or not. The proconsul exercised judicial as well as military power in his province, and his authority was absolute, except as he might be held accountable at the expiration of his office. See Government.

Derbe, dēr'be (Δέρβη, Derbē, Acts 14 20 21; 16 1; Δέρβας, Derbās, 20 4; Δέρβης, Derbēs), Strabo, Cicero, a city in the extreme I. E. corner of the Lycaonian plain is mentioned twice as having been visited by Paul (on his first and second missionary journeys respectively), and it may now be regarded as highly probable that he passed through on his third journey (to the churches of Galatia). The view that these churches were in South Galatia is now accepted by the majority of Eng. and Am. scholars, and a traveler passing through the Cilician Gates to Southern Galatia must have traversed the territory of Derbe.

Derbe is first mentioned as the seat of Antipater, who entertained Cicero, the Roman orator and governor of Cilicia. When the kingdom 1. History of Amyntas passed, at his death in 25 BC, to the Roman people, the province was divided into a separate province and called Galatia (see GALATIA). This province included Laranda as well as Derbe on the extreme I. E., and for a time Laranda was the frontier city looking toward Cappadocia and Cilicia and Syria via the Cilician Gates. But between 37 and 41 AD Laranda was transferred to the “protected” kingdom of Antiochus, and Derbe became the frontier city. It was the last city on distinctively Rom territory, on the road leading from Southern Galatia to the E.; it was here that commerce entering the province had to pay the customs dues. Strabo records this fact when he calls Derbe a limēn, or “customs station.” It owed its importance (and consequently its visit from Paul on his first journey) to this fact, and to its position on a great Rom road leading from Antioch, the capital of Southern Galatia, to Iconium, Laranda, Hareclia-Cybystra, and the Cilician Gates. Rom milestones have been found along the line of this road, one at a point 15 miles N.W. of Derbe. It was one of those Lyco- nian cities honored with the title “Claudian” by the emperor Claudius; its coins bear the legend “Claudio-Derbe.” This implied considerable importance and prosperity as well as strong pro-Rom feeling; yet we do not find Derbe standing aloof, like the Roman coloniae Iconium and Lystra, from the Common Council of Lycaonian cities (Known Lycaonias).

Derbe remained in the province Galatia till about 155 AD. The junction of the triarchy province Cilicia-Isauria-Lycia. It continued in this division till 296 AD, and was then included in the newly formed province Isauria. This arrangement lasted till about 372 AD, when Lycaonia, including Derbe, was formed into a separate province. The separation of the province of Lycaonia is based on the statement of the historians that the province of Derbe was "a fortress of the Isauria, originated in the arrangement which existed from 296 to 372 AD. Coins of the representative Heraclea, Fortuna, and a winged Victory writing on a shield with the name "Lystra." Derbe is mentioned several times in the records of the church councils. A bishop, Daphnus of Derbe, was present at the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325). The site of Derbe was approximately 8 miles N. of Iconium (Acts 14:25). S. of Damascus (Rom 15:23), and W. of Laodicea (Eph 3:5).

The site of Derbe was approximately fixed by the American explorer Sterrett, and more accurately by Sir W. M. Ramsay, who, after careful examination of the site and the neighborhood, placed it at Gudelis. An inscription of a village called Derbe of two arches from Lystra. A line of boundary stones, separating the province of Derbe from that of Barata, is still standing. The city is known as "a city of the frontier town of Galatia (Ramsay).

In Acts 14:20, it is narrated that Paul and Barnabas, after being driven out of Lystra, departed to Derbe, where they "preached 3. Paul at the gospel . . . and made many disciples. But they did not go farther. But Paul's mission included only the centers of Graeco-Rom civilization; it was no part of his plan to pass over the frontier of the province into non-Rom territory. This aspect of his purpose is illustrated by the reference to Derbe on his second journey (Acts 16:1). Paul did not start from Antioch to Iconium, "went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches" (15:41). "Then he came to Derbe and Lystra" (16:1). The unwarmed reader might forget that in going from Cilicia to Derbe, Paul must have passed through a considerable part of Antiochus' territory, and visited the important cities of Heraclea-Cybiatra and Lara. But his work ends with the Rom Cilicia and begins again with the Rom Galatia; to him, the intervening country is a blank. Concentration of effort, and use of the most fully prepared material were the characteristics of Paul's missionary journeys in Asia Minor. That Paul was successful in Derbe may be gathered (as Ramsay points out) from the fact that he does not mention Derbe among the places where he had suffered persecution (2 Tim 3:11). Gaius of Derbe (among others) accompanied Paul to Jerusalem, in charge of the donations of the churches to the poor in that city (Acts 20:4).

LITERATURE.—The only complete account of Derbe is that given in Sir W. M. Ramsay's "Cities of St. Paul, 389-404; there see the same author's "St. Paul the Traveller and Rom Citizen, 119, 178." Many inscriptions, including those later found on Derbe pottery, have been collected by Sterrett, "Wolse Expedition to Asia Minor, Nos. 18-32. The principal ancient authorities, besides Acts, are Cero Ad Fam. xiri.73; Strabo xxx.569; Ptolomaenus, v.6, 17; Steph. Byz., Hieroc., 675; Notis. Episcop., i, 404, and the Acts Commentarum.

DERISION, de-rizh-n, Three vbs. are so tr in the Bibles: (1) Is 21, 14, "torh, "sconir" (Ps 119:51); (2) laqh, "mock" (2 4: 59 8; Ezek 23:32); and (3) sahuk, "laugh at" (Job 30:1; Ex 32 25, "a whispering"; cf. Wisd 5:3). This word is found almost exclusively in the Psalms and Prophets. Jeremiah uses it of a god of idols. It is used both as a subst. and as vb., the latter in the phrase "to have in derision."

DESCEND, de-send' (777), yaradh; kara'salam, kata'alah, "go down"; DESCENT, de-seant' (777), kara'sal'me, "descent" (from Mt 3:16; of angels (Gen 28:12; Mt 22:22; Jn 5:1); of Christ (I Thess 4:16; Eph 4:9). "He also descended into the lower parts of the earth" is variously interpreted, the two chief interpretations being (1) "the descent into hell" (I Pet 3:19). The former regards the clause of the earth," an appositive genitive, as when we speak of "the city of Rome," viz., "the lower parts, i.e. the earth." The other regards the descent of Christ "as possessing an authority, as governed by the comparative, i.e. "parts lower than the earth." For the former view, see full discussion in Eadie; for the latter, Elliott and esp. Meyer, in commentaries on Eph. H. E. Jacobs DESCENT, de-seant', OF JESUS. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

DESCRIBE, de-skrib'. This vb., now obsolete, in the sense used in Josh 18:6.9.8.9 and Jgs 8:14, is a tr of χαθαμ, usually rendered "to write" or "inscribe." But in the above passages it has the OE meaning of dividing into parts or into lots, as for example: "Woolf divided the land, and described it according to their inheritance" (Josh 18:4); that is, described in writing the location and size of the several parcels of land thus portioned out. In Jgs 8:14 "described" should be tr "wrote down a list of." "Describe" occurs twice in the AV of the NT (Rom 4:6 and 10:5), where λέγo, λόγo, and γραφo, γράφo, are both rendered "described," RV corrects both, and substitutes "pronounced" in the first and "writeth" in the second passage.

Description = discri (1 Eisd 3:30).

W. W. DAVIES

DESCRY, de-skri'. This word like "describe" came into the Eng. through the Fr. descrire (Lat describe); it occurs only in the AV of Jgs 1:23: "And the house of Joseph sent to the desert Bethel."

DERTS, dezert' (777), m'dhhâr, h'rer, h'rabh, h'badhâr, h'badhâ, ciyakh, ciyakh, tûhâ; imûmos, erëmos, erëma erëma: Midhâbâr, the commonest word for "desert," more often rendered "wilderness," is perhaps from r. dâbâr, in the sense of "to drive, i.e. a place for drive or pasturing flocks. Yâkîmn is from yâ- sham, "to be empty," h'rabh (of Arab, h kB, "to lie waste"; khiyrib, "a ruin"; kharbâh, "desivation"), from hârâb, "to be dry," of also hâb, "to be dry," and h'rabh, "a desert" or "the Arabah" (see CHAMOON). For tûhâ, see Isha (Ps 63:1; Is 14:18), "a dry land," cf. yâm, "wild beasts of the desert" (Isa 13:21, etc.). Tûhâ, variously rendered "without form" (Gen 1:2), "empty space," AV "empty place" (Job 26:7), "waste," AV "nothing" (Job 6:18), "confusion," RVm "wasteness" (Isa 24:10 ERY), may be compared with Arab. tâb, "}
The desert as known to the Israelites was not a waste of sand, as those are apt to imagine who have in mind the pictures of the Sahara. Great expanses of sand, it is true, are found in Arabia, but the nearest one, an-Nafūd, was several days' journey distant from the farthest southeast reached by the Israelites in their wanderings. Most of the desert of Sinai and of Pal is land that needs only water to make it fruitful. E. of the Jordan, the line between "the desert" and "the south" lies about along the line of the Hijāz railway. To the W. there is barely enough water to support the crops of wheat; to the E. there is too little. Near the line of demarcation, the yield of wheat depends strictly upon the rainfall. A few inches more or less of rain in the year determines whether the grain can reach maturity or not. The latent fertility of the desert lands is demonstrated by the season of scant rains, when they become carpeted with herbage and flowers. It is marvelous, too, how the camels, sheep and goats, even in the dry season, will find something to crop where the traveler sees nothing but absolute barrenness. The long wandering of the Israelites in "the desert" was made possible by the existence of food for their flocks and herds.

"Thou crownest the year with thy goodness; And thy paths drop fatness. They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness, And the hills are girded with joy." Ps 65 11 and also Joel 2 22: "The pastures of the wilderness do spring."

"The desert" or "the wilderness" (ha-mīdhābār) usually signifies the desert of the wandering, or the northern part of the Sinaitic Peninsula. Cf Ex 3 1 AV: "Moses . . . . led the flock [of Jethro] to the backside of the desert"; Ex 5 3 AV: "Let us go . . . . three days' journey into the desert"; Ex 19 2 AV: "They . . . . were come to the desert of Sinai"; Ex 23 15 AV: "I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river" (Euphrates). Other uncultivated or pasture regions are known as Wilderness of Beersheba (Gen 21 14), W. of Judah (Jgs 1 16), W. of En-gedi (1 S 24 1), W. of Gibon (2 S 2 24), W. of Maon (1 S 23 24), W. of Damascus; cf Arab, Bādiyyet-ush-Shām (1 K 19 15), etc. Mīdhrāb yām, "the wilderness of the sea." (Isa 21 1), may perhaps be that part of Arabia bordering upon the Pers Gulf.

Aside from the towns and fields, practically all the land was mūdhābār or "desert," for this term included mountain, plain and valley. The terms, "desert of En-gedi," "desert of Maon," etc., do not indicate circumscribed areas, but are applied in a general way to the lands about these places. To obtain water, the shepherds with their flocks traverse long distances, springing, as it were, through the desert, usually arranging to reach the water about the middle of the day and rest about it for an hour or so, taking shelter from the sun in the shadows of the rocks, perhaps under some overhanging ledge.

DESIRE, dē-zīr: The vb. "to desire" in the Scriptures usually means "to long for," "to ask for," "to demand," and may be used in a good or bad sense (cf Dt 7 25 AV). RV frequently renders the more literal meaning of the Heb. Cf Job 20 20, "delight"; Prov 21 20, "precious"; Ps 40 6, "delight"; ateru, aitō (except Col 1 9), and apraśa, oritō (except Lk 7 36) are rendered "to ask" and jātā, zētō, "to seek" (cf Lk 9 9 et al.). The Heb נאום, kāyaph, lit. "to lose in value," is tr̄ (Zeph 2 1) by "hast no shame" (RVm "longing," AV "not desired"). The literal tr "to lose in value," "to degenerate," would be more in harmony with the context than the translations offered. The Heb נאום, hōmmāh, (2 Ch 2 10), "without buying his services rendered to the kingdom. For "desire" in Ecc 12 5, see Caperberry. A. L. Breeslich

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS: This phrase occurs only in Hag 2 7 (AV, ERV "desirable things," ARVm "things desired"), and is commonly applied to the Messiah. At the erection of the temple in Ezra's time, the older men who had seen the more magnificent house of Solomon were disappointed and distressed at the comparison. The prophet, therefore, is directed to encourage them by the assurance that Jeh is with them nevertheless, and in a little while will shake the heavens, the earth, the sea, the dry land and the nations, and "the desire of all nations" shall come, and the house shall be filled with glory, so that "the latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former." (1) Many expositors refer the prophecy to the first advent of Christ. The shaking of the heavens, the earth, the sea and the dry land is the figurative setting of the shaking of the nations, while this latter expression refers to those changes of earthly dominion coincident with the overthrow of the Persians by the Greeks, the Greeks by the Romans, and so on down to the beginning of our era. The house then in process of construction was filled with glory by the later presence of the Messiah, which glory was given as the sign of the Messiah's time. Objections are presented to this view as follows: First, there is the element of time. Five cents., more or less, elapsed between the building of Ezra's temple and the first advent of Christ, and the men of Ezra's time needed comfort for the present. Then there is the difficulty of associating the physical phenomena with any shaking of the nations occurring at the first advent. Furthermore, in what sense, it is asked, could Christ, when He came, be said to be the desire of all nations? And finally, what comfort would a Jew find in this magnifying of the Gentiles?

(2) These difficulties, though not insuperable, lead others to apply the prophecy to the second advent of Christ. The Jews are to be restored to Jerusalem, and another temple is to be built (Ez 40 48). The shaking of the nations and the physical phenomena; find their fulfillment in the "Great Tribulation" so often spoken of in the OT and Rev, and which is followed by the coming of Christ in glory to set up His kingdom (Mal 3:1; Mt 24:29, 30 and other places). Some of the difficulties supposed to impede an otherwise clear view of prophecy, is met, however, by saying that all the temples, including Solomon's, are treated as but one "house"—the house of the Lord, in the religious sense, at least, if not architecturally. Another such difficulty touches the question of time, which, whether it includes five centuries or twenty, is met by the principle that to the prophets, "ascending in heart to God and the eternity of God, all times and all things of this world are only a mere point. When the precise time of particular events is not revealed, they sometimes describe them as continuous, and sometimes blend two events together, having a near or partial, and also a remote or complete fulfillment. "They saw the future in space rather than in time, or the prospect rather than the actual accomplishment." It is noted that the Lord Jesus so blends together the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, AD 70, and the days of the anti-Christ at the end of this age, that it is difficult to separate them, and to say which belongs exclusively to either (Mt 24). That the words may have an ultimate fulfillment in the second advent of Christ receives strength from a comparison of vs 21 and 22 of the same chapter (ch 2) of Hag with He 12:26,27. The writer of that epistle could not afford to lose the allusions to the destruction of Jerusalem, which he would want to be present in the mind of his readers. This section is based on the OT, and also the NT, and the Heb adj. is derived from a vb. "to be sick," and the lit. rendering would be "incurable." (cf Mt 24, my wound is incurable). Desperately in Jer 17:9 AV, where the heart is said to be "desperately [i.e. incurably] wicked" or "sick." DESPISE, dé-spit', DESPISETFUL, dé-spit'föd: "Despise" is from Lat. despectus, "a looking down upon." As a noun ("contempt") it is now generally used in its shortened form of despot, and the longer form is used as a prep. ("in spite of"). In RV it is always a noun. In the OT it translates Heb shédî', in Exk 25 6, and in RV Ezk 25 16; 36 5 ("with despite of soul"). In He 10 29 ("bath done despite unto the Spirit of grace") it stands for Gr euvelō, "to treat with contempt." The adj. "despiteful" occurs in AV Ezk 25 16; 36 5; Sir 31 31 ("despiteful words"). RV "a word of reproach"); Rom 1 30 (RV "insolent")=Gr habrâbêtes, fr hupær', "above"; cf Eng."upish"

DESSAU, des'sö, des'snö (Aserwao, Dessauoi (2 Macc 14:16)): RV LESSAU (which see).

DESTINY, des'ni (MENI): A god of Good Luck, possibly the Pleiades. See Astrology, 10, MENI.

DESTROYER, dé-strö'ër: In several passages the word designates a supernatural agent of destruction, or destroying angel, executing Divine judgment. (1) In Ex 12 23, of the "destroyer" who smote the first-born in Egypt, again referred to under the same title in He 11 28 RV (AV "he that destroyed"). (2) In Job 33 22, "the destroyers" lit. ("they that cause to die")=the angels of death that are ready to take away a man's life during severe illness. No exact text to this is found in the OT. The "next nearest approach is the angel that destroyed the people" by pestilence (2 Sam 16 17: 1 Ch 21 15:16); the angel that smote the Assyrians (2 K 19 35=Isa 37 36; 2 Ch 32 21); "angels of evil" (Ps 78 49). (3) In the Apoc., "the destroyer" is once referred to as minister of punishment" (RV, lit. "him who was punishing"); who brought death into the world (Wis 18 22-25). (4) In 1 Cor 10 10, "the destroyer" is the angelic agent to whose Instrumentality Paul attributes the plague of Nu 16 40-41. In later Judæo-christian theology (the Tgs and Midr.), the "destroyer" or "angel of death" appears under the name Sammael (i.e. the poison of God), who was once an archangel before the throne of God, and who caused the serpent to tempt Eve. According to Weber, he is not to be distinguished from Satan. The chief distinction between these two was that of early theologians and the Sadducees of later Judaism that the former was regarded as the emissary of Jeu, and subsequent to him, in other ceremonies, the latter was regarded as a perfectly distinct individual, in independence or semi-independence, and from purely malicious and evil motives. The change was largely due to the influence of Pers dualism, which made good and evil to be independent powers.

DESTRUCTION, dé-struk'shun: In AV this word translates over 30 Heb words in the OT, and 4 words in the NT. Of these the most interesting, as having a technical sense, is 'abaddôn (from vb. 'âbahad, "to be lost," "to perish"). It was found 6 t in the Wisdom Literature, and nowhere else in the OT; cf Rev 9 11. See ABADDON.

DESTRUCTION, CITY OF (Isa 19 18; HELIOPOLIS OR CITY OF THE SUN). See Astron-omy, I, 2; IR-RA-HERES; ON.

DETERMINE, dé-tûr-mi-nát (ἀποφαίνων, ἀποφαί-νομαι, "determined," "fixed"): Only in Acts 2 23, "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," Gr ἀποφαίνομαι, fr ἀπό, "to set boundaries," "to determine," etc (cf. Heb. word "horizon," "orbit"; etc.) which implies being established or fixed in the plan of God, It is remarkable that Peter in one and the same sentence speaks of the death of Christ from two quite distinct points of view. (1) From the historical standpoint, it was a crime perpetrated by men who were morally responsible for their deed ("hum...ye by the hand of lawless men did crucify and slay"). (2) From the standpoint of Divine teleology, it was part of an eternal plan ("by the determinate," etc). No effort is made to determine the logical consistency of these two ideas. They represent two aspects of the one fact. The same Gr word is usually in Lk 22 22, where Christ speaks of His betrayal as taking place "as it was (RV 'hath been') determined" (καθὼς ἦν ἀποφαίνομαι). Cf Lk 24 26.

D. MIALL EDWARDS

DETERMINE, dé-tûr-min: (1) "To resolve," "decide." This is the primary meaning of the word and it is also the one that is the most common. In the NT the Gr word kriò, krisis, ("determined") is used, and it is the above meaning (Acts 20 16, 25 25, 1 Cor 2 3). The word occurs frequently in the OT with this meaning (see Ex 21 22, 1 8 20 7 33).

(2) "To decree," "ordain," "mark out." The Gr word that is rendered "determine" with this meaning is ἀποφαίνομαι. See Determined.

The Heb term kâhar is trd "determine" with the above meaning; as "his days are determined" (Job 14 5); "a destruction is determined" (Isa 10 22); "dispositions are determined" (Dnl 9 26). The Heb term mishpâh, which means "judgment" or "sentence," is trd "determination" in Zeph 3 8.

DETESTABLE, dë-tést-tab'l, THINGS (יִפְרָע, שִׁכְיָת, מִשְׁפָּר, שְׁקֵף, synonymous with מִשְׁפָּר, "abomination," "abominable thing"): The tr of yifrâ' in Jer 16 18; Ezek 6 11; 7 20; 11 18, 21; 37 23; a term always applied to idol-worship or to objects connected with idolatry; often also trd "abomination," as in 1 K 11 5 7 (bis); Jer 4 1; Ezek 20 7 8 30. Shâkeh, trd "abomination," as applied in the Scriptures to that which is ceremonially unclean (Lev 7 21), creatures forbidden as food, as water animals without fins or scales (11 10 12), birds of prey and the like (ver 18), winged creeping things (vs 20 23), creeping vermin (vs 41). Cf also Isa 66 17. By partaking of the food of the animals a question of one makes himself detestable (Lev 11 43; 12 20). Similarly the idolatrous ap-was no single historical event which brought together the NT books which were everywhere to be regarded as Scripture. These books did not make the same progress in the various provinces and churches. A careful study of conditions reveals the fact that there was no uniform NT canon in the church during at least the first 3 centuries. The Ethiopian church, for example, had 35 books in its NT, while the Syrian church had only 22 books. In Constantine's early date the churches were practically agreed on those books which are sometimes designated as the protocanonical, and which Eusebius designated as the homologoumena. They differed, however, in regard to the 7 disputed books which form a part of the so-called deutero-canon, and which Eusebius designated as the antilegomena. They also differed in regard to other ecclesiastical writings, for there was no fixed line between canonical and non-canonical books. While there was perhaps no council of the church that had passed on the books and declared them canonical, it is undoubtedly true that before the close of the 2nd century, all the books that are in our NT, with the exception of those under consideration, had become recognized as Scripture in the orthodox churches.

The history of these seven books reveals the fact that although some of them were early used by the Fathers, they afterward fell into disfavor. That is, esp. true of He and Rev. Generally speaking, it can be said that at the close of the 2nd century, the 7 books under consideration had failed to receive any such general recognition as had the rest; however, all, with perhaps the exception of 2 Pet, had been used by some of the Fathers. He was freely attested by Clement of Rome and Justin Martyr; Jas by Hermas and probably by Clem of Rome; 2 Jn. 3 Jn. and Jude by the Muratorian Fragment; Rev by Hermas and Justin Martyr who names John as its author. See Canon of the NT.

Jerome, who prepared the Vulg in the closing years of the 4th cent., accepted all 7 of the doubtful books, yet he held that 2 Jn. and 3 Jn. were written by the Presbyter, and he intimated that 2 Pet. and Jude were still rejected by some, and he said the Latin did not receive He among the canonical Scriptures, neither did the Gr churches receive Rev. Augustine, who was one of the great leaders during the 5th century, held that the first part of the 5th, accepted without question the 7 disputed books. These books had gradually gained in favor and the position of Jerome and Augustine practically settled their canonicity for the orthodox churches. The Council of Carthage, held in 397, adopted the catalogue of Augustine. This catalogue contained all the disputed books both of the NT and the OT.

Since the Reformation.—The Canon of Augustine became the Canon of the majority of the churches and the OT books which he accepted were added to the Vulg, but there were some who still held to the Canon of Jerome. The awakening of the Reformation inevitably led to a reinvestigation of the Canon, since the Bible was made the source of authority, and some of the disputed books of the NT were again questioned by the Reformers. The position given the Bible by the Reformers led the Rom church to reaffirm its sanction and definitely to fix the books that should be accepted. Accordingly the Council of Trent, which convened in 1546, made the Canon of Augustine, which included the 7 apoc books of the OT, and the 7 disputed books of the NT, the Canon of the church, and it pronounced a curse upon those who did not receive these books. The first codification of Rome and adopted those books which had long had the sanction of usage as their Bible. Gradually, however, the questioned books of the OT were separated from the others. That was true in Coverdale's tr., and in Matthew's Bible they were not only separated from the others but they were prefixed with the words, "the volume of the book called Hagiographa." In Cranmer's Bible, Hagiographa was changed into Apoc, and this passed through the succeeding ed into the AV.

In Heb בֵּיתָה הַיִּשְׂרָאֵל " Elijah hā-lishārā,' these are the words"; in Gr, Διαπανοστόμων, "second law"; whence the Lat deuteronomii, and the Eng. Deuteronomy. The Gr title is due to a mistranslation of the Sept of the clause in Dt 17 18 rendered, "and he shall write for himself this repetition of the law." The Heb really meant, "It he shall write out for himself a copy of this law." However, the error on which the Eng. title rests is not serious, as Dt is in a very true sense a repetition of the law.

Dt is the last of the five books of the Pentateuch or "five-fifths of the Law." It possesses an individuality and impressiveness of its own. In Ex-Nu Jeh is represented as speaking unto Moses, whereas in Dt Moses is represented as speaking at Jeh's command to Israel (1 14; 5 1; 29 1).

It is a hortatory recapitulation of various addresses delivered at various times and places in the desert wanderings—a sort of homily on the constitution, the essence or gist of Moses' instructions to Israel during the forty years of their desert experience. It is "a Book of Reviews"; a tr of Israel's redemptive history into living principles; not so much a history as a commentary. There is much of retrospect in it, but its main outlook is forward. The author speaks of it as "the Book of Reproofs." It is the text of all prophecy; a manual of evangelical oratory; possessing "all the warmth of a St. Bernard, the flaming zeal of a Savonarola, and the tender, graciousness of Jesus' parables.

The author's interest is entirely moral. His one supreme purpose is to arouse Israel's loyalty to Jeh and to His revealed law. Taken as a whole the book is an exposition of the great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might.

It was from Dt Jesus summarized the whole of the Old Covenant in a single sentence (Mt 22 37; of Dt 6 5), and from it He drew His weapons with which to vanquish the tempter (Mt 4 7 10; cf of Dt 6 3; 6 16 13).

Dt is composed of three discourses, followed by three short appendices: (1) 1 1—4 43, historical; a review of God's dealings with Israel, the story of the divided tongues in the day of Pentecost when delivered (1 1—5), recounting in broad oratorical outlines the chief events in the nation's experience from Horeb to Moab (1 6—3 29), on which the author bases his earnest appeal to the people to be faithful and obedient, and in particular to keep clear of all possible idolatries (4 1—10).

Appended to this first discourse is a brief note (vs 41—43) concerning Moses' appointment of three cities of refuge on the E. side of the Jordan. (2) 4 44—20 19, the ordinary and legal; introduced by a superscription (4 44—49), and consisting of a resume of Israel's moral and civil statutes, testimonies and judgments. Analyzed in greater detail, this second discourse is composed of two main sections: (a) chs 5—11, an extended exposition of the Ten Commandments on which the theocracy was based;
Deuteronomy THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA 886

(b) chs 12-26, a code of special statutes concerning worship, purity, tithes, the three annual feasts, the administration of justice, kings, priests, prophets, war, and the private and social life of the people. The spirit of the code is legalistic and religious. The tone is that of a father no less than that of a legislator. A spirit of humanity pervades the entire discourse. Holiness is its ideal. (3) 27 1-31 30, predictive and minatory; the subject of this third discourse being "the blessings of obedience and the curses of disobedience." This section begins with directions to inscribe these laws on plastered stones to be set up on Mt. Horeb (27 1-10), to be ratified by an antiphonal ritual of blessings and cursings from the two adjacent mountains, Gerizim and Ebal (va 11-20). These are followed by solemn warnings against disobedience (28 1-29 1), and fresh exhortations to accept the terms of the new covenant made in Moab, and to choose between life and death (29 2-30 20). Moses' farewell charge to Israel and his formal commission of Joshua close the discourse (ch 31). The section is filled with predictions, which were woefully verified in Israel's later history. The three appendices, speaking of Moses' Song (ch 32), which the great Lawgiver taught the people (the Law was given to the priests, 31 24-27); (b) Moses' Blessing (ch 33), which forecast the future for the various tribes (Simeon only being omitted); and (c) Moses' Death and Burial (ch 34) with a noble panegyric on him as the greatest prophet Israel ever had. Thus closes this majestic and marvelously interesting and practical book. Its keyword is "possess'"; its central thought is "Jeh has chosen Israel, let Israel choose Jehovah." The monotheism of Dt is very explicit.

4. Ruling Ideas

Following from this, as a necessary corollary almost, is the other great teaching of the book, the unity of the sanctuary. The motto of the book might be said to be, "One God, one sanctuary." (1) Jehovah, a unique god.—Jeh is the only God, "There is none else beside him" (4 35-39; 6 4; 32 39), "He is God of gods, and Lord of lords" (10 17), "the living God" (5 26), "the faithful God, who keepeth covenant and lovingkindness with them that love him and keep his commandments" (7 9), who abominate graven images and every species of idolatry (7 25-26; 12 31; 13 14; 18 12; 20 18; 27 15), to whom belong the heavens and the earth (10 14), who rules over all the nations (7 19), whose relation to Israel is near and personal (28 58), even that of a Father (32 6), whose being is spiritual (4 12-15), and whose name is "Rock" (32 4.15-18.30.31). Being such a God, He is jealous for his name and laws, and loving; hence all temptations to idolatry must be utterly removed from the land, the Canaanites must be completely exterminated and all their altars, pillars, Asherim and images destroyed (7 1-5.16; 20 16-18; 12 2, 3). (2) Israel, a unique people.—The old Israel had become unique through the covenant which Jehovah made with them at Horeb, creating out of them "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex 19 6). The new Israel who had been born in the desert were to inherit the blessings vouchsafed to their fathers through the covenant just now being made in Moab (Dt 26 16-19; 27 9; 29 1; 5 23). By means of it they became the heirs of all the promises given unto their fathers the patriarchs (43 7; 7 12; 8 18; 29 1). They were to be all, and especially beloved of Jehovah (7 6; 14 2; 21; 26 18.19; 28 9; 4 37), disciplined, indeed, but for their own good (8 2.3.5.16), to be established as a people, as Jehovah's peculiar lot and inheritance (32 6.9; 4 7). (3) The relation between Jehovah and Israel a unique relationship between religious and religious. The Israelite was expected not only to fear Jehovah but to love Him and cleave to Him (4 10; 5 29; 6 5; 10 12. 20; 11 1.3.12; 13 3.4; 17 19; 19 9; 28 55; 30 6.16.20; 31 12.13). The highest privileges are theirs because they are the caretakers of the covenant blessings; as others are strangers and foreigners, except they be admitted into Israel by special permission (23 1-8).

The essential unity of the great kernel of Dt (chs 5-26) is recognized and is followed by nearly everyone (e.g. Kautzsch, Kuekenen, Dillmann, Driver). Some would even defend the unity of the whole of chs 1-36 (Knobel, Graf, Kosters, Colenso, Kleinert).

No other book of the OT, unless it be the prophecies of Ezekiel, bears such unmistakable signs of unity in aim, language and thought. "The literary style of Dt," says Driver, "is very marked and individual; in his command of a chaste, yet warm and persuasive style, the book stands among the writers of the OT" (Dt, lixvii, lxxxviii). Many striking expressions characterize the style of this wonderful book of oratory: e.g. "cause to inherit"; "Hear O Israel"; the oft-repeated phrase "in his death and burial"; "learn," and in the Piel vb. "species "teach"; "be willing"; "so shalt thou exterminate the evil from among the people.

6. Authorship—Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi. . . . . And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished [i.e. to the end], that Moses commanded the Levites, that bare the ark of the covenant of Jehovah, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it by the side of the ark of the covenant of Jehovah your God, that it may be there for a witness against you. (Dt 31 9.24-27) This passage is of more than traditional value, and should not be ignored as is so often done (e.g. by Ryle, art. "Dt," HDB). It is not often enough to say that Moses was the great fountain-head of Heb law, that he gave the oral but not written statutes, or, that Moses was only the traditional source of these statutes. For it is distinctly and emphatically stated that "Moses wrote this law." And it is further declared (31 22) that "Moses wrote this song," contained in ch 32. Now, these statements are either both true, or the author of the work was not Moses. The authorship of no other book in the OT is so explicitly emphasized. The present writer believes that Moses actually wrote the great body of Dt, and for the following general reasons: (1) Dt as a whole is eminently appropriate to what we know of Moses' times.—It closely most fittingly

The formative period of Israel's history. The historical situation from first to last is that of Moses. The references to foreign neighbors—Egypt, Canaan, Amalek, Ammon, Moab, Edom—are in every case to those who flourished in Moses' own times. As a law book its teaching is based upon the Ten Commandments; but again the plot of the Commandments, then surely he may have written the Book of Dt also. Besides, the Code of Hammurabi, which antedates Moses by at least 700 years, makes it possible certainly that Moses also left laws in codified or written form.

(2) Dt is represented as emanating from Moses.—The language is language put into Moses' mouth. Nearly forty times his name occurs, and in the majority of instances as the authoritative author of the subject-matter. The first person is used predominatingly throughout: "I commanded Joshua at that time" (3:21); and "I charged your judges at that time" (1:16); "And I commanded you at that time" (ver 18); "I have led you forty years in the wilderness" (33:6). The language surely pertains to some form of Moses; even if it was not actually used by him, it is a most remarkable case of impersonation, if not of literary forgery, for the writer represents himself as reproducing, not what Moses might have said, but the exact words of Moses. (Zaw, 'The Antiquity of Heb Writing and Lit., 1911, 261).

(3) Dt is a military law book, a code of conquest, a book of exhortation.—It was intended primarily neither for Israel in the desert nor for Israel settled in Canaan, but for Israel on the borderland, eager for conquest. It is expressly stated that Moses taught Israel these statutes and judgments in order that they should obey them in the land which they were about to enter (4:5; 5:31). They must expect the law book (7:17; 31:4), but in their warfare they must observe certain laws in keeping with the theocracy (20:1-20; 23:9-14; 21:10-14; 31:6.7), and, when they have finally dispossessed their enemies, they must settle down to agricultural life and live no longer as nomads but as citizens of a civilized land (19:14; 22:8-10; 24:19-21). All these laws are regulations which should become binding in the future only (cf Kittel, 'History of the Hebrews, 1:32). Coupled with them are prophecions of judgments which are to be executed and to have had their birth in Moses' soul. Indeed the great outstanding feature of Dt is its patriarchal or hortatory character. Its exhortations have not only a military ring as though written on the eve of conquest, but also a paternal vein running throughout it which marks it with a genuine Mosaic, not a merely fictitious or artificial, stamp. It is these general features, so characteristic of the entire book, which compel one to believe in its Mosaic authorship.

Certain literary features exist in Dt which lead the present writer to think that the bulk of the book was spoken twice; once, to the first generation between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea in the 2nd year of the Exodus wanderings, and a second time to the new generation, in the Plains of Moab in the 40th year. Several considerations point in this direction:

(1) The names of the widely separated geographical places mentioned in the context. There are the words which Moses spake unto all Israel beyond the Jordan in the wilderness, in the Arabah over against Suth, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazereth, and Di-zahab"; to which is added, "It is eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea."

If these statements have any relevance whatever to the contents of the book which they introduce, they point to a wide area, from Horeb to Moab, as the historical-geographical background of the book. In other words, Dt, in part at least, seems to have been spoken first on the way between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, and later again when Israel were encamped on the plains of Moab. And, indeed, what would be more natural than for Moses when marching northward from Horeb expecting to enter Canaan from the south, to exhort the Israel of that day in terms of chs 5-26? Being baffled, however, by the adverse report of the spies and the faithlessness of the people, and being forced to wait and wander for 38 years, what would be more natural than for Moses in Moab, when about to resign his position as leader, to repeat the exhortations of chs 5-26, adapting them to the needs of the new desert-trained generation and prefacing the whole by a historical introduction such as that found in chs 1-4?

(2) The double allusion to the cities of refuge (4:41-43; 19:1-13).—On the supposition that chs 5-26 were spoken first between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, in the 2nd year of the Exodus, it could not be expected that in this historical introduction of the three cities chosen E. of the Jordan should be given, and in fact they are not (19:1-13); the territory of Sihon and Og had not yet been conquered and the cities of refuge, accordingly, had not yet been designated (cf Nu 32:16). But in 4:41-43, on the contrary, which forms a part of the historical introduction, which ex hypothesi was delivered just at the end of the 38 years' wanderings, after Sihon and Og had been subdued and their territory divested, the three E. of the Jordan are actually named, just as might be expected.

(3) The section 4:4-9, which, in its original form, very probably introduced chs 5-26 before these chapters were adapted to the new situation in Moab.

(4) The phrase "began Moses to declare this law" (1:5), suggesting that the great lawyer found it necessary to expound what he had delivered at some previous time. The Heb word 'book' is found elsewhere in the OT only in De 27:8 and in Hab 2:2, and signifies "to make plain."

(5) The author's evident attempt to identify the new generation in Moab with the patriarchs.—"Jehovah made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, which are all of us living this day," i.e. with us who have survived the desert discipline (Dt 5:3). In view of these facts, we conclude that the book in its present form (barring the exceptions above mentioned) is the product of the whole 38 years of desert experience from Horeb on, adapted, however, to meet the exigencies of the Israelites as they stood between the victories already won on the E. of the Jordan and those anticipated on the W. The impression given throughout is that the great lawyer's work is done, and that a new era in the people's history is about to begin.

The influence of Dt began to be felt from the very beginning of Israel's career in Canaan. Though the references to Dt in Josh, Jgs, and the references to Dt in Jos, Josh, Jgs, and they are comparatively few, yet they are sufficient to show that not only the principles of Dt were known and observed but that they were known in written form as codified statutes. For example, when Jericho was taken the city and its spoil were "devoted" (Josh 6:17.18) in keeping with Dt 13:15ff. (cf Josh 10:40; 11:12.15 with Dt 7:2; 20:16.17). Achan trespassed and he and his household were stoned, and afterward burned with fire (Josh 7:25; cf. Dt 13:10; 17:5). The fact that his sons and his daughters were put to death with him seems at first sight to contradict Dt 24:16, but there is no proof that they suffered for their father's sin (see Achan; Achor); besides the presence of the altar in the house, which held, even that of Rahab the harlot (Josh 6:17). Again when Ai was taken, "only the cattle and the spoils" did Israel take for a prey unto themselves (Josh 8:27), in keeping with Dt 20:14; also, the bodies of the inhabitants of Ai were burned before the terebinth upon which he had hanged (Josh 8:29), which was in keeping with Dt 21:23 (cf. Josh 10:26:27). As in warfare, so in worship. For instance, Joshua built an altar on Mt. Ebal (Josh 8:30:31), "as Moses the servant of Jehovah commanded!" (Dt 27:4-6), and he wrote on them a copy of the law (Josh 8:32), as Moses had also enjoined (Dt 27:3). Moreover, the elders and officers and judges stood on either side of the ark of the covenant between Ebal and Gerizim (Josh 8:33), as directed in Dt 11:29; 27:12,13, and Joshua read to all the congregation of Israel all the words of the law, the blessings and the curses (Josh 8:34-35), in strict accord with Dt 31:11,12. The way of men in the wilderness is the story of the two and a half tribes who, on their return to their home on the E. side of the Jordan, erected a memorial at the Jordan, and, when accused by their fellow-tribemen of plurality of sanctuary, emphatically disproved it (Josh 22:29; cf. Dt 12:5). Obviously, therefore, Dt was known in the days of Joshua. A very few instances in the history of the Judges point in the same direction: e.g. the utter destruction of Zephath (Jgs 1:17; cf. Dt 7:2; 20:16); Gideon's elimination of the fearful and faint-hearted from his army (Jgs 7:1-7; cf. Dt 20:1-9); the author's studied concern to justify Gideon and Manoah for sacrificing at altars other than at Shiloh on the ground that they acted in obedience to Jeh's direct commands (Jgs 6:25-27; 13:16); esp. the case of Micaiah, who congratulated himself that Jeh would do him good seeing he had a Levite for a priest, is clear evidence that Dt was known in the days of the Judges (Jgs 1:1-9; 12:16). In 1 K 8:1-9.21.24 the pious Ekanah is pictured as going yearly to worship Jeh at Shiloh, the central sanctuary at that time. After the destruction of Shiloh, when the ark of the covenant had been captured by the Philistines, the ark was shut up and was dwelt at with the Israelites (1 S 7:7-9:17; 16:5), but in doing so he only took advantage of the elasticity of the Deuteronomic law: "When . . . he gave thee rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety; then it shall come to pass that to the place which Jeh your God shall choose, to cause his name to dwell there, thither shall ye bring all that I command you: your burnt-offerings, and your sacrifices" (Dt 12:10,11). It was not until Solomon's time that Israel's enemies were all subdued, and even then Solomon did not observe strictly the teachings of Dt; "His wives turned away his heart," so that he did not faithfully keep Jeh's "covenant and statutes" (1 K 11:3,11). Political disruption followed, and religion necessarily suffered. Yet Jehoiada the priest gave the youthful Josiah "the crown" and "the testimony" (2 K 11:12; cf. Dt 17:18). King Amanaziah did not slay the children of the murderers who slew his father, in accordance with the law of Dt (2 K 14:6; cf. Dt 24:16). Later on, Hezekiah, the cultured king of Judah, reformed the cultus of his day by removing the high places, breaking down the pillars, cutting down the Asherabs, and even breaking in pieces the bronze serpent which Moses had made (2 K 18:4:22). Hezekiah's reforms were unquestionably carried through under the influence of Dt.

It is equally certain that the prophets of the 8th cent. were not ignorant of this book. For example, Hosea complains of Israel's sacrificing upon the tops of the mountains and under the oaks and on the hills, and warns Judah not to follow Israel's example in coming up to worship at Gilgal and Beth-aven (Hos 4:13,15). He also alludes to striving with priests (Hos 4:4; cf. Dt 17:12), removing land-swearers (15:15). And Dt: "in Egypt (Hos 8:13; 9:3; cf. Dt 28:68), and of Jeh's tender dealing with Ephraim (Hos 11:3; cf. Dt 1:31; 32:10). The courage of Amos, the shepherd-prophet of Tekoa, can best be explained, also, on the basis of a written law such as that of Dt with which he was already more or less familiar (Am 3:2; cf. Dt 7:6; 4:7,8). He condemns Israel's inhumanity and audacity in the name of religion, and complains of their retaining overnight pledges wrested from the poor, which was distinctly forbidden in Dt (Am 2:6-8; cf. Dt 24:12-15; 23:17). Likewise, in the prophecies of Isaiah there are conscious reflections of Dt's thought and teaching. Zion is constantly pictured as the center of the national regeneration is the place (Jas 2:2-4; 5:18; 28:16; 29:12; cf. Mic 4:1-4). In short, no one of the four great prophets of the 8th cent. BC—Isaiah, Micah, Amos, Hosea—ever recognized "high places" as legitimate centers of worship.

Over against the Bib. view, certain modern critics since De Wette (1805) advocate a late origin of Dt, claiming that it was first published in 621 BC, when Hilkiah found the "book of the law" in the temple in the time of King Josiah (2 K 22:8 ff.). The kernel of Dt and "the book of the law" discovered by Hilkiah are said to be identical. Thus, Dr. G. A. Smith claims that "is like the Book of Dt was not brought forth at a stroke, but was the expression of the gradual results of the age-long working of the Spirit of the Living God in the hearts of His people" (Jerusalem, II, 115). According to Dr. Driver, "Dt may be described as the prophetic reformation of the Law-book of the earlier three books, and part of an older legislation. It is probable that there was a tradition, if not a written record, of a final legislative address delivered by Moses in the steppes of Moab: the plan followed by the author would rather be that of two sources put upon a traditional basis. But be that as it may, the bulk of the laws contained in Dt is undoubtedly far more ancient than the author himself. . . . What is essentially new in Dt is not the matter, but the form. . . . The new element in Dt is thus not the laws, but their parenetic setting" (Dt, lxi, lvi). This refined presentation of the matter would not be so very objectionable, were Drs. Smith and Driver's theory not linked up with certain other claims and allegations to the effect thatDt, as seen in the 15th cent. BC could not possibly have promulgated such a lofty monotheism, that in theological teaching "the author of Dt is the spiritual heir of Hosea," that there are discrepancies between it and other parts of the Pent., that in the early history of Israel down to the 8th cent. plurality of sanctuaries was legally permissible, that there are no traces of the influence of the principal teachings of a written Dt discoverable in Heb. lit. until the time of Jeremiah, and that the book, as originally composed as a program of reform, not by Moses but in the name of Moses as a forgery or pseudograph. For example, F. H. Woods says, although not a necessary result of accepting the later date, the majority of critics believe this book of the law to have been the result of a pious fraud promulgated by Hilkiah and Shaphan with the intention of deceiving Josiah into the belief that the reforms which they desired were the express command of God revealed to Moses" (HDB, II, 368). Some are unwilling to go so far. But in any case, it is claimed that the law book discovered and published by Hilkiah bears no relation to the reformation by Josiah in 621 BC, was no other than some portion of the Book of Dt, and of Dt alone. But there are several considerations which are opposed to this theory: (1) Dt emphasizes centralization of worship at one sanctuary (12:5); Josiah's reform was of the Temple in general (2 K 23:4 ff.). (2) In Dt 18:6–8, a Levite coming from the country to Jerusalem was allowed to minister and share in the priestly perquisites; but in 2 K 25:5, "the priests of the high places came not up to the altar of Jeh in Jerusalem, but they did eat unleavened bread among their brethren." And according to the critical theory, "Levites" and "priests" are interchangeable terms. (3) The following passages in Ex may almost equally well be directed to Josiah's reform: 20:3; 22:18-20; 23:12-13.23:33; 34:13-14-17. (4) The law book discovered by Hilkiah was recognized at once as an ancient code which the fathers had disbelieved (2 K 25:13). Were there all difference between Exo 11 and Jer 11:34? "There were many persons in Judah who had powerful motives for exposing this forgery if it was one" (Raven, OT Introduction, 112). (5) One wonders why so many archaic and, in Josiah's time, apparently obsolete laws have been incorporated in a code whose express motive was to reform an otherwise hopeless age: e.g. the command to exterminate the Canaanites, who had long since ceased to exist (Dt 7:12-22), and to blot out Amalek (Dt 25:17-19). The last remnants of whom were completely destroyed in Hezekiah's time (1 Ch 4:41-43). Ex. is true of the score and more of laws peculiar to Dt, concerning building battlements on the roofs of houses (Dt 22:8), robbing birds' nests (vs 6.7), the sexes exchanging garments (ver 5), going out to war (20:1 ff), etc. (6) Ex. is remarkable is it that if Dt were written, as alleged, shortly before the reign of Josiah, there should be no anarchisms in it betraying a post-Mosaic origin. There are but two alleged exceptions to the schism between Judah and Israel, no hint of Assyrian oppression through the exaction of tribute, nor any threats of Israel's exile either to Assyria or Babylonia, but rather to Egypt (Dt 28:68). "Jerusalem" is never mentioned. From a literary point of view, it is psychologically and historically well-nigh impossible for a writer to conceive all traces of his age and circumstances. On the other hand, no Egyptologist has ever discovered any anarchisms in Dt touching Egypt matters. From first to last the author depicts the actual situation of the times of Moses. It is consequently hard to believe, as is alleged, that a later writer is studying to give an imaginative revivification of the past. (7) The chief argument in favor of Dt's late origin is its alleged teaching concerning the unity of the sanctuary. Wellhausen lays special emphasis upon this point. Prior to Josiah's reformation, it is claimed, plurality of sanctuaries was allowed. But in opposition to this, it is possible to point to the actual situation (2 K 18:4-22), as a movement in the direction of unity; and especially to Ex 20:24, which is so frequently misunderstood as to allow a multiplicity of sanctuaries. This classical passage when correctly interpreted allows only that altars shall be erected in places where God's edict had been given, "which presumably during the wanderings and the time of the judges would mean wherever the Tabernacle was" (Mackay, Intro to OT, 110). This interpretation of this passage is confirmed and made practically certain, indeed, by the command in Ex 23:14–19 that Israel shall repair three times each year to the house of Jehovah and there present their offering. On the other hand, Dt's emphasis upon unity of sanctuary is lost by exaggeration. The Book of Dt requires unity only after Israel's enemies are all overcome (Dt 12:10.11). "When" Jehovah giveth them rest, "then" they shall repair for worship to the place which Jehovah shall choose." As Davidson remarks: "It is not a law that is to come into effect after their entry into the land. It dates from the time that Jehovah shall have given them rest from all their enemies round about; that is, from the times of David, or more particularly, Solomon; for only when the temple was built did that place become known which Jehovah had chosen to place his name there" (OT Theology, 361). Besides, it should not be forgotten that in Dt itself the command is given to build an altar in Mt. Ebal (27:5-7). As a matter of fact, the unity of sanctuary follows as a necessary consequence of monotheism taught by Jehovah, he probably also enjoined unity of worship. If, on the other hand, monotheism was first evoked by the prophets of the 5th cent., then, of course, unity of sanctuary was of 5th-cent. origin also. (8) Another argument advanced in favor of the later origin of Dt is the contradiction between the laws of Dt and those of Lev-Nu concerning the priests and Levites. In Nu 16:10.35.40, a sharp distinction is drawn, it is alleged, between the priests and common Levites, whereas in Dt 18:1-8, all priests are Levites and all Levites are priests. But as a matter of fact, the passage in Dt does not invest a Levite with priestly functions (cf. 18:16), whereas it is distinctly stated in Dt that all Levites shall receive full recognition at the sanctuary and be accorded their prerogatives. It goes without saying that if the Levite be a priest he shall serve and fare like his brethren the priests; if he be not a priest, he shall enjoy the privileges that belong to his brethren who are Levites, but not priests" (J. D. Davis, art. "Dt," in DB, 117). The Book of Dt teaches not that all the tribe, but only the tribe of Levi may exercise priestly functions (cf. 18:16), whereas it is distinctly stated in Dt that all Levites shall receive full recognition at the sanctuary and be accorded their prerogatives. This was in perfect harmony with Lev Nu and also in keeping with the style of popular discourse. (9) Recently Professor Ed. Naville, the Egyptologist, has proposed the name "the Book of the Law" discovered by Hilkiah, which is not without some value. On the analogy of the Egypt custom of burying texts of portions of "the Book of the Dead" at the foot of statues of gods and within foundations of temple edifices, as at Ammonopolis, he concludes that Solomon, when he constructed the Temple, probably deposited this "Book of the Law" in the foundations, and that when Josiah's workmen were about their tasks of repairing the edifice, the long-forgotten document came to light and was given to Hilkiah the priest. Hilkiah, however, upon examination of the document found it difficult to read, and so, calling for Shaphan the scribe, who was more expert in deciphering antique letters than himself, he gave the script to him and he in turn read it to both Hilkiah and the king. The MS may indeed have been written in cuneiform. Thus, according to Naville, "the Book of the Law," which he identifies with Dt, must be pushed back as far as the age of Solomon at the very latest even to the period of the judges as to its date: "some time during the prosperous period of David and the United Monarchy" (Intro to the Heb Bible, 1909, 330).

AV "religious proserlyts"), with possible reference to the proserlyts of righteousness as distinguished from the proserlyts of the gate (see PROSERLYTE).

Devout women of honorable estate (15:50), proserlyts to Judaism and wives of the men who belong to the Levitical tribes (see Jb, II, xx, 2).

"Devout Greeks" (17:4), probably, though not necessarily, proserlyts of the gate, heathen by birth, who attended the synagogue services and worshipped God. "Devout persons" (ver 17), proserlyts of the gate.

1. Forma

DEW, dū (יָבָט, [al: סְפָרָא, drōsos]; Two things are necessary for the formation of dew, moisture and cold. In most countries there is less dew because the change in temperature between day and night is too small. In the deserts where the change in temperature between day and night is sometimes as much as 40°F, there is seldom dew because of lack of moisture in the atmosphere. Fall is fortunate date: in being a very important so that there is always a large percentage of water vapor in the air. The skies are clear, and hence there is rapid radiation beginning immediately after sunset, which cools the land and the dew drops settle on cool objects. Air at a low temperature is not capable of holding as much water vapor in suspension as warm air. The ice pitcher furnishes an example of the formation of dew. Just as the drops of water form on the cool pitcher, so dew forms on rocks, grass and trees.

In Pal it does not rain from April to October, and were it not for the dew in summer all vegetation would perish. Dew and rain are equally important. If there is no rain dew in the winter grass and harvests fail; Palestine if no dew, the late crops dry up and there is no fruit. Failure of either of these gifts of Nature would cause great want and hardship, but the failure of both would cause famine and death. Even on the edge of the great Syrian desert in Anti-Lebanon, beyond Jordan and in Sinai, a considerable vegetation of a certain kind flourishes in the summer, although there is not a drop of rain near the sea. So that the plants and trees are literally soaked with water at night, and they absorb sufficient moisture to more than supply the loss due to evaporation in the day. It is more surprising to one who has not observed this, than it is logically in the desert itself. Some of the small animals of the desert, such as the jerboa, seem to have no water supply except the dew. The dew forms most heavily on good conductors of heat, such as metals and stones, because they radiate their heat faster and cool the air around them. The wetting of Gideon's fleece (Jgs 6:38) is an indication of the amount of dew formed, and the same phenomenon might be observed any clear night in summer in Pal.

Dew was a present necessity to the people of Israel as it is today to the people of the same lands, so Jeh says, "I will be as the dew unto Israel" (Hos 14:5). Dew and rain are of equal importance and are spoken of together in 1 K 17:1. It was esp. valued by the children of Israel in the desert, for it supplied them for their sustenance (Ex 16:13; Nu 11:9).

Issac in blessing Jacob asked that the "dew of heaven" (Gen. 28) may be granted to him that these things which make for fertility and prosperity may be his portion.

Blessing "The remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many peoples as dew from Jeh" (Mic 5:7), as a means of blessing to the nations. "Blessed of Jeh for . . . . dew" (Dt 33:13).

Dew is the means of refreshing and reinvigorating all vegetation. Many Scripture references carry out this idea. The song of Moses says, "My spirit shall distil dew from heaven and cover the earth." (Dt 32:1-2)

5. Symbol of refreshment (Isa 34:4) refreshes the harvesters. "My hand is filled with dew" (Cant 6:2).

"Like the dew of Hermon" (Ps 133:3).

Thou hast the dew of thy youth" (Ps 110:3). "Thy dew is as the dew of herbs" (Isa 26:19). Job said of the time of his prosperity, "The dew lieth all night upon my branch." (Job 6:19).

Other figures of the dew as a symbol of the ordinary blessings of Nature which are mysteries to man (Job 38:28; Prov 3:20).

DIADEM, d’â dem: There are seven Bible references to the diadem, four in the OT and three in the NT. The Heb words do not mark any clear distinctions.

(1) חָדָם, חָדָם, מַכְשֶׁפֶת, means an official turban or tiara of priest or king, (2) also "mitre." Eek 21:26: "Remove the mitre, and take off the crown.

(3) διαδήμα, diadema, the Gr word in the NT for "diadem," means "something bound about the head.

Found 5 t, in Rev-12:3: a "great red dragon,... and upon his head seven diadema" (AV "crowns"); 13:1: "a beast..... and on his horns ten diadema"; 19:11:12: "a white horse..... and upon his head are many diadems." See CROWN.

WILLIAM EDWARD RAPFETY

One of the most striking instances recorded in Holy Scripture of the interruption, or rather reversal, of the working of a natural law is the going back of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz at the time of Hezekiah’s sickness and the Sign.

The record of the incident is as follows. Isaiah was sent to Hezekiah in his sickness, to say:

"Thus saith Jehovah, the God of David thy father. I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold, I will heal thee; on the third day thou shalt go up unto the house of Jehovah, and the shadow which is gone down shall return back ten steps. And the shadow of the dial went down ten steps." (Isa 38:8.)

The first and essential point to be noted is that this was no ordinary natural phenomenon, nor was it the result of ordinary astrology. It was a Real miracle peculiar to that particular place, and to that particular time; otherwise we should have read of the unambiguous prophecy of the princes of Babylon, who sent... to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Ch 32:31). It is impossible, therefore, to accept the suggestion that the dial of Ahaz may have been improperly constructed, so as to produce a reversal of the motion of the shadow, as some have supposed. For such a maladjustment would have occasioned the repetition of the phenomenon every time the sun returned to the same position with respect to the dial. The narrative, in fact, informs us that the occurrence was not due to any natural law, known or unknown, since Hezekiah was given the choice and exercised it of his own free will, as to whether a shadow should move in a particular direction or in the opposite. But there are no alternative results in the working of a natural law of things is repeated in every detail, it must lead to exactly the same consequences." The same natural law cannot indifferently produce one result, or its opposite. The movement of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz, therefore, signifies a kind of sense of the term. It cannot be explained by the working of any astronomical law, known or unknown. We have no information as to the astronomical conditions at the time; we can only inquire into the setting of the miracle.

It is unfortunate that one important word in the narrative has been rendered in both AV and RV by a term which describes a recognized astronomical instrument. The "Dial" a "diadem" (AV) or "staircase" (RSV) or "steps," or "stairs," and indeed is thus rendered in the same verse. There is no evidence that the structure referred to had been designed to serve as a dial or was anything other than a staircase, "the staircase of Ahaz." It was probably connected with that "covered way for the sabbath that they had built in the house, and the king’s entry without," which Ahaz turned "round the house of Jeh, because of the king of Assyria" (2 K 18:34). The staircase, called after Ahaz because the alteration was due to him, may have been substituted for David’s "causway that goeth up," which was "westward, by the gate of Shallecheth" (1 Ch 26:16), or more probably for the "causway" which he went up unto the house of Jehovah" which so impressed the queen of Sheba (2 Ch 9:4). At certain times of the day the shadow of some object fell upon this staircase, and we learn 4. Time of From both 2 K and Isa that this Staircase had already gone down ten steps, while from Isa we learn in addition that the sun also was going down.

The miracle therefore took place in the afternoon, when the sun moves on its downward course, and when all shadows are thrown in an easterly direction. We are not told what was the object that cast the shadow, but it must have stood to the west of the staircase, and the top of the staircase must have passed into the shadow first, and the foot of the staircase have remained longest in the light. The royal palace is understood to have been placed southeast of the Temple, and it is therefore probable that it was some part of the Temple buildings that had cast its shadow on the staircase, and had thrown down the residue of the shade to the west of the dying king, as he lay in his chamber. If the afternoon were well advanced the sun would be moving rapidly in altitude, and but little in azimuth; or, in other words, the shadow would be advancing down the steps at its quickest rate, but be moving only slowly toward the left of those who were mounting them. It may well have been the case, therefore, that the time had come when the priests from Ophel, and the officials and courtiers from the palace, would ascend into the house of the Lord to be present at the evening sacrifice; passing from the bright sunshine at the foot of the stairs into the shadow that had already fallen upon the upper steps. The sun would be going straight down behind the buildings and the steps to the house of the Lord, and therefore, by the time the steps were almost entirely in shadow, they would sink into deeper shadow, not to emerge again into the light until a new day's sun had arisen upon the earth.

We can therefore understand the nature of the choice of the sign that was offered by the prophet to the dying king. Would he choose that ten more steps should be straightway engulfed in the shadow, or that ten steps already shadowed should be brought back into the light? Either might serve as a sign that he should arise on the third day and go up in renewed life to the house of the Lord; but the one sign would be in accordance with the natural progress of events, and the other would be directly opposed to it. It would be a light thing, as Hezekiah said, for the shadow to go forward ten steps; a bank of cloud rising behind the Temple would effect that change. But no disposition of cloud could bring the shadow back from that point; that step had already passed into it, and restore it to the sunshine. The first change was, in human estimation, easily possible, "a light thing"; the second change seemed impossible. Hezekiah chose the seemingly impossible, and the Lord gave the sign and answered his prayer. We need not ask whether the king showed more or less faith in choosing the "impossible" rather than the "possible" sign. His father Ahaz had shown his want of faith by refusing to put the Lord to the test, by refusing to ask a sign, whether in the heaven above or in the earth beneath. The faith of Hezekiah was shown in asking a sign, which was at once in the heaven above and in the earth beneath, in accepting the choice offered to him, and so asking the Lord to the test. And sign in chosen was most fitting. Hezekiah lay dying, whether of plague or of cancer we do not know, but his disease was mortal and beyond cure; he was already cut off into death. The word of the Lord was sure to him; on "the third day" he would rise and go up in new life to the house of God. What of the sign? Should the shadow of death swallow him up; should his head be hidden until a new day should dawn, and the light of a new life, a life of resurrection, arise? (Cf. Jn 11. 24) Or should the shadow be drawn back swiftly, and new years be added to his life before death and diseases come upon him? Swift death was in the natural progress of events; restoration to health was of the impossible. He chose the restoration to health, and the Lord answered his faith and his prayer.

We are not able to go farther into particulars. The first temple, the royal palace, and the staircase of Ahaz were all destroyed in the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and we have no means of ascertaining the exact position of the staircase with respect to Temple or palace, or the number of the upper part of the steps thrown down. The upper part of the staircase was built in the middle of the day, or the season of the year when the sign was given. It is possible that if we knew any or all of these, a yet greater significance, both spiritual and astronomical, might attach to the narrative.

Fifteen years were added to the life of Hezekiah. In the restoration of the second temple by Herod fifteen steps led from the Court of the Women to the Court of Israel, and on these steps the Levites during the Feast of Tabernacles were accustomed to stand in order to sing the fifteen 'songs of degrees' (Cf. Ps. 122) and the hundred and twenty steps, as these were called, for his fifteen years of added life. Five of them are ascribed to David or as written for Solomon, but the remaining ten bear no author's name. Their subjects are, however, most appropriate to the great crises and desires of Hezekiah's life. His reign, over which all the tribes were invited, and so many Israelites came; the blasphemy of Rabbshakeh and of Sennacherib's threatening letter; the danger of the Assyrian invasion and the deliverance from it; Hezekiah's sickness unto death and his miraculous restoration to health; and the fact that at that time he would seem to have had no son to follow him on the throne—all these subjects seem to find fitting expression in the fifteen Psalms of the Steps.

DIAMOND, di-am'ond. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

DIANA, di-an'a (ARTEMIS) (Ἀρτέμις, Artemis, "princess," "herself"): a chief deity of Asia Minor, the mother goddess of the earth, whose seat of worship was the temple in Ephesus, the capital of the Rom province of Asia. Diana is but the Latinized form of the Gr word Artemis, yet the Artemis of Ephesus should not be confused with the Gr goddess of that name.

She may, however, be identified with the Cybele of the Phrygians whose name she also bore, and with several other deities who were worshipped under different names in various parts of the Orient. In Cappadocia she was known as Ma: to the Syrians as Atargatis or Myrrtha; among the Phoenicians as Astarte; whose name appears among the Assyrians as Ishtar; the modern name Esther is derived from it. The same goddess seems to have been worshipped by the Hittites, for a female deity is sculptured on the rocks at Yazılı Kaya, near the Hittite city of Bogazkale. It is possible that the various goddesses of Syria and Asia Minor all owe their origin to an earlier Assyrian goddess or goddesses of the goddess of love, whose chief attributes they possessed. The several forms and names under which she appears are due to the different forms of her temple and worship.

Tradition says that Diana was born in the woods near Ephesus, where her temple was built, when her image of wood (possibly ebony; Pliny, NH, xvi. 40; Acts 19. 35) fell from the sky (see also ASTRONOMY, I, § 2). Also according to tradition the city which was later called Ephesus was founded by the Amazons, and Diana or Cybele was the deity of those half-mythical people. Later when Ephesus fell into the possession of the Greeks, Gr civilization partly supplanted the Asiatic, and in that city the two civilizations were blended together. The Gr name of Artemis was given to the Asiatic goddess, and many of the Gr colonists represented her on their coins as Greek. Her images and forms of worship remained more Asiatic than Gr. Her earthen statues were often represented standing on a throne, or seated on a throne, or seated, and her mural headress, representing a fortified city wall; from it, drapery hung upon each side of her face to her shoulders. The lower part of her body was completely covered with rows of breasts to signify that she was the mother of all life. The lower arms were extended. The lower part of the body resembled a rough block, as if her legs had been wrapped up in cloth like those of an Egyptian mummy. In later times her Gr followers represented her with stag or lions standing at her sides. The most renowned of her statues stood on the platform before the entrance to her temple in Ephesus. As the statues indicate, she impersonated the reproductive powers of men and of animals and of all other life.

Diana.

At the head of her cult was a chief priest, originally a cuman who bore the name and later the title Megathos. Under him were priests known as Eseenes, appointed, perhaps from the city officials, for but a single year; it was their duty to offer the sacrifices to the goddess in behalf of the city. Other subordinate classes of priests known as Kurites, Koruba, and Hitro performed duties which are now obscure. The priestesses were even more numerous, and, probably from their great numbers, they were called Melissii or bees; the Ephesian symbol therefore which appears commonly upon the coins struck in the city, is a bee. The Melissii, which in the early times were all virgins, were of three classes; it is no longer known just what the special duties of each class were. The ritual of the temple service consisted of sacrifices and of ceremonial prostitution, a practice which was common to many of the religions of the ancient Orient, and which still exists among some of the obscure tribes of Asia Minor.

The temple of Diana was not properly the home of the goddess; it was but a shrine, the chief one, devoted to her service. She lived in Nature; she was everywhere wherever there was life, the mother of all living things; all offerings of every possible nature were therefore acceptable to her; hence the vast wealth which poured into her temple. Not only was she worshipped in her temple, but in the minute shrines or naos which were sometimes modeled after the temple. More frequently the shrines were exceedingly crude objects, either of silver or stone or wood or clay. They were made at Ephesus by dependents of the temple, and carried by the pilgrims throughout the world. Before them Diana might also be worshipped anywhere, just as now from the soil of the sacred Mesopotamian city of Kerbela, where the sons of Ali were martyred, little blocks are formed and are carried away by the Shi`ah Moslems that they may pray upon sacred ground wherever they may be. The makers of the shrines of Diana formed an exceedingly large class among whom, in Paul's time, was Demetrius (Acts 19:24). None of the silver shrines have been discovered, but those of marble and of clay have appeared among the ruins of Ephesus. They are exceedingly crude; in a little shell-like bit of clay, a crude clay female figure sits, sometimes with a tambourine in one hand and a cup in the other, or with a lion at her side or beneath her foot. Though the shrines were sold as sacred dwelling-places of the goddess, that the pilgrims who carried them to their distant homes, or buried them in the graves with their dead, might be assured of her constant presence, their real purpose was to increase the temple revenues by their sale at a price which was many times their cost. With the shrines of Diana may be compared the household gods of clay found in abundance among the ruins of the earlier Bab cities, esp. those cities in which temples to the goddess Ishtar stood. E. DIBLAH, dib'la (דִּבְלָהּ, diblah, "circle"; Aמ- לָהּ, Debêlah): The name occurs only in Ezek 14 (AV "Diblah"); and the place has not been identified. If the reading is correct it may possibly be represented by Dibî, a village in Upper Galilee, S. of Tîmîn. But more likely it is a scribal error for Riblah.

DIBLAIM, dib-lá-im, dib-lá-im (דִּיבֲלָי-מ, diblayim, "two cakes"): A native of Northern Israel and father of Gomer, the wife of Hosea (Hos 1:3).

DIBLATH, dib'lath. See Diblah.

DIBLATHAIM, dib-lá-thá-im. See Almon-Diblathaim.

DIBON, dib'on, nibon-gad (דִּבְוִנ, dibôn, "washing"); Aמ- לָוִנ, Diblon: (1) A city of Moab captured by the Amorites (Nu 21:30), and held by them at the invasion by Israel. It was taken and given to the tribe of Gad, whence it is called Dibon-gad (Nu 32:34; 33:45). In Josh 13:17 it is reckoned to Reuben. Along with other cities in the territory N. of the Arnon, Dibon changed hands several times between Moab and Israel. Moab claims it (MS), and in Jer 48:18.22 it is given to all among the cities of Moab. The form of the name, Dimon, in Isa 16:6, may have been given to make it resemble the Heb dâm, "blood," to support the play upon words in the verse (HDB, s.v.). It is represented by the modern Dibkhon, about the third miles N. of Ar'arat (Ararat), on the line of the old Rom road. The ruins that spread over two adjacent knolls are of no importance: walls, a tower, eistern, etc. Near Dibon the famous Moabite Stone was found. (2) A town in Judah, occupied after the exile (Neh 11:25). It may be the same as Dimonah (Jesh 15:22); unidentified. W. Ewing DIBRI, dib'ri (דִּבְרִי, dibhri, "eloquent" [?]): A Levite, whose daughter Shelomith married an Egyptian. Their son was "cut off" (stoned) for blasphemy (Lev 24:11).

DICTIONARIES, dik'shun-a-riz: A dictionary is a word-book or a list of words arranged in some fixed order, generally alphabetical, for ready reference, and usually with definitions or longer treatises. The vocabulary or glossary is a mere list of words, often without definitions; the Lexicon or dictionary of language (words or concepts) has bare definitions, and the alphabetical encyclopaedia or dictionary of knowledge or information (objects, things, subjects, topics, etc) has longer treatises, but they are all dictionaries: the alphabetical order being the main essential in modern use. There is, however, historically no good reason why the dictionary should not be logical or chronological. The earliest use of the word "encyclopedia" by Murray (Dictionary, 1841, de Garlandia, c1225) was of a collection of words classified and not alphabetical. So, too, almost the earliest use in Eng. (J. Wither's Dictionary, 1556) was of a book of words classified by subjects. A book like Roget's Thesaurus, which is a list of classified words without definition, or a systematic encyclopedia of treatises like Cowleridge's unfortunate experiment, the Encyclopaedia Metropolitana, is a dictionary in the historic sense. The earliest books usually quoted in the lists of Bib. dictionaries were also fact classified or chronological, and not alphabetical (Eusebius' Onomasticon; Jerome's De viris illustribus). Classified word lists, syllabaries, etc., of pre-alphabetic times, as well as in Chinese and other non-alphabetic literatures of to-day, are of course also non-alphabetic, but strictly dictionaries.

In pre-alphabetic times the dictionaries include, besides the syllabaries of which there were many examples in the Aramaic, Babylonian, Egyptian, Cypriot, etc., and the word lists proper, chronological lists of kings and various classified lists of tribute, and of astronomical or other objects. They include, in short, all the many lists where the material is grouped systematically, though not alphabetically.

The alphabetical dictionary began with the alphabetic itself, for this is a list of names of objects. The earlier alphabetical dictionaries were sometimes called alphabets. In a sense the alphabetical acrostic are the dictionaries rather than accuracies, and Ps 119, where considerable material is grouped under each letter of the alphabet, comes rather close to the dictionary idea.

So long as the quantity of literary material remained small, there was very little need for the development of the alphabetical dictionary, and the examples are rather few, the Lexicon of Suidas being perhaps the most noteworthy. With the immense increase in literary material there was a rapidly growing appreciation of the advantage of alphabetical arrangement, over the chronological or the systematic, in all cases where the object is to refer to a specific topic, rather than to read a book through or survey many topics closely related to the theme.

The number of alphabetical dictionaries of knowledge increased rapidly with the growth of learning from the 13th cent.; now it has become legion and there are few subjects so narrow that they cannot boast their dictionary of information.

The earliest Bible dictionary is usually counted the Onom of Eusebius, a geographical encyclopaedia; then came Jerome's De nominibus hebraicis et graecis De viris illustribus Dictionaries (chronological). The more noteworthy steps in the history of Bible dictionaries are represented by the names of Alsted, Calmet, Winer, Kittel, William Smith, Fairbairn, Schenkel. The best recent dictionaries among the larger works are the Encyclopaedia Biblica, standing for the extreme higher critical wing; Hastings, representing the slightly less radical; and this present International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, which represents a growing distrust of the extreme positions of the 19th cent. higher critics. All of these are on a large scale and stand for the latest and best scholarship, and the same quality is reflected in at least two of the recent single-volume dictionaries, A Standard Bible Dictionary (M. W. Jacobus, 1893) and The New Encyclopedia (Jacobus, 1908). Both of these in tendency stand between Cheyne's Encyclopaedia Biblica and this dictionary, Hastings facing rather toward Cheyne, and Jacobus toward this present work.

The John Crrcar Library list of encyclopaedias forms an excellent guide to the list of general encyclopaedias, which includes chiefly technology and physical and social sciences, but includes among its reference books very admirably chosen first-reference dictionaries to language, history, fine arts, and even philosophy and religion.

Following is a list of previous dictionaries:

BIBLICAL DICTIONARIES

Other recent one-vol. dictionaries are: Angus (1907), Bennett and Gossman (1906), Ewing (1910), Hyamson (1907), Piercy (1908).

Next in importance for Bible students to the Bible dictionaries are the general dictionaries of religious knowledge. Many of the more recent of these, such as the Hauck ed of RE, and the new Sch-Herr, Jew Éncyclopédie Catholique Encyclopaedia, and in general Enzyklopaedias all the larger and some of the smaller recent ones have arts. of real importance for Bible study, often better than some of the specific Bible dictionaries.

3. General Religious Enzyklopaedias

Cecarelli, A. Dizionario ecclesiastico illustrato. Milano.

Among the other ones the huge encyclopedia of Migne, which is a classified series of alphabetical dictionaries, was of the Moroni, which 190 vols. are still of great usefulness to the scholar on out-of-the-way topics, not so much for Bib. topics but at least for Bib. related matters.

The monumental dictionary in this class super- siding all others is Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Reli- gion and Ethics, but Forlong has served a useful purpose and some of the special dictionaries. Bischofer are quite similar in the same class with Hastings.

5. Comparative Religion

Hastings, James, Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics. Edinburgh; London; Berlin, 1906–

The admirable Jewish and Catholic encyclopaedias mentioned above, like the Methodist M’Clintock and Strong, belong rather to the denomination, the former, mentioned below, among which perhaps the best executed example is the Lutheran Encyclopaedia of Jacobs.

8. Dictionaries of Art and Music

96, 8 vols.

Müller, Herrmann Alexander. Allgemeines Künstler-

MUSIC

Many of these dictionaries are occasionally or indirectly on Bib. topics.
The great modern biographical dictionaries, although of little use for Scripture names, are of much value to the Bib. student for the writings on Bib. subjects, and in the case of ancient biography, of much value for contemporary persons in other lands.

Dictionaries

The lexicon and versions are treated under the head of the respective languages. The chief dictionaries in English are the great Murray and the aries of the encyclopaedic Century. The best one-volume dictionaries are probably the Standard and the last ed of Webster.

Dictionaries of Language

Webster, Noah. International Dictionary of the English Language. Springfield (Mass.), 1891 (c 1864-90); new ed, 1909.

The art. "Dictionary" in the new Enc Brü (11th ed) covers the whole matter of dictionaries of language with extraordinary fullness.

Didrachma, di-drák'ma. Two drachmas. See Drachma, Dram.

Didymus, did'í-mus (Diómos, Didúmos, i.e. "twin"): The surname of Thomas (q.v.).

Die (דִּיוֹנְיָס, mith, דִּיוֹנְיָס, gäade; ἀνθολόγις, apoθέλω, τελεότατον, telebátos): "To die," etc., is of very frequent occurrence, and in the OT is generally the tr of mithli, meaning perhaps originally, "to be stretched out" or "prostrate." "To die," should be the consequence of eating the forbidden fruit (Gen 2:17; cfe 20:7; 2 K 1:46). "Die" is commonly used of natural death (Gen 5:8; 25:5). It is also used of violent death (Gen 26:9-11; Ex 21:20; Deut 27:21; 31:16; 5 Nu 4:15; Ex 3 8 1-8 S 8 12-19; 25:4). But "to die," or perish, is also used of the result of the sin of man (Prov 10:21; 15:10; 19:16). To die "the death of the righteous" is something to be desired (Nu 23:10).

In the NT the word for "to die," etc., is generally apóthélwos, "to die off or away," used of dying in all forms: of natural death (Mt 22:24); of violent death (Mt 23:25); of death of Christ (Jn 12:33); of death as the consequence of sin (Mt 8:21-24; Rom 8:15); etc., and used in the latter case sometimes as an equivalent for "to perish." "To die," also occurs several times (Mt 15:4; 1 Th 1:9, once of Jesus as the "firstfruits," for he was the "first to die," etc; 1 Th 4:14). "To die," etc., is a thing that rendered him liable to death. In Rom 6:2 we have "we who died to sin," etc.; and in our acceptance of His death as representing ours; similarly we read in 2 Cor 5:14, "One died for all, therefore all died" (RV), i.e. represented, and in Col 2:20 "if ye died with Christ," etc. Cf 2 Tim 2:11; 1 Pet 2:24.

Of the changes in RV may be mentioned "abode" for "died" (Gen 23:18, in "or settled, Heb fell"); "he that is to die" for "worthily of death" (Dt 17:6); "died" for "are dead" (Jn 4:49-50, and AV Jn 5:23); "though he die" for "were dead" (Jn 11:25); "many died" for "were dead" (Rom 15:2); "died for a nourished for" for "in vain" (Gal 2:21); "when his end was nigh for" for "died" (He 11:22). Of special importance are the changes from "he, are, were, dead" in Rom 6:2-7; 8:2 Cor 5:14; Col 2:20; 3:3; 2 Tim 2:11, and "having died" for "being dead in" in 1 Pet 2:24, as bringing out the truth that in the sight of God all men died in Christ also die.

Diet, d'et (דִּיאָת, drubah, "prescribed"): A daily allowance or portion of food, as that given by King Evil-merodach to Jehoiachin, king of Judah (Jer 52 34 AV; cf 2 K 25 30).
DIG (ἡγαίων, ἐγαίων, “to dig”, ἐγαίων, hābhar; σπουδάσω, diōrāsō, “to dig through”): “I have digged and drunk strange waters” (2 K 19 24). In his campaign on foreign soil, where the enemy had stepped up the waterspings, Senacherib would at once dig fresh wells for his war ‘through houses’ (Job 24 16; cf Mt 6 19 20 m). Walls of eastern houses are often made of mud or clay, and frequently have no windows; and as the threshold of a Syrian house is sacred, the thief breaks in through the wall (see Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant). M. O. Evans

DIGNITIES, dig’ni-tīs, DIGNITY, dig’ni-tē ( Heb mārām, s’ēth, ṣēdhālāh): Rank or position, not nobility or austerity of personal character or bearing, is denoted by this word in its OT occurrences (Gen 49 3; Est 6 3; Eccl 10 6; Hab 1 7). In 2 Pet 2 10; Jude ver 8, “dignities” (σερή, dōnai) are angels, lofty spiritual beings, possible objects of blasphemy; of the context in both passages.

DIKE, dikē (σερή, dikē, “justice”): The avenging justice of God personified as a goddess (Acts 28 4). See JUSTICE.

DIKHŁAH, dik’lāh, dik’hālāh, “place of palms”): One of the “sons” of Joktan (Gen 10 27; 1 Ch 1 21). Perhaps a south-Arabian tribal or place-name connected with a palm-bearing district.

DILEAN, dil’e-an (דילאן, dil’ān, “cucumber”): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Migdal-gad and Mizpeh (Josh 15 38, ERV “Dilan”), which lay probably on the N. of Lachish and Eglon. It has not been identified.

DILIGENCE, dil’i-jens, DILIGENT, DILIGENT- LY, dil’i-jent-lī: This word is used in various senses in our Eng. Bible.

In Ezr 6 8, “with diligence” means “with care”; in Ezr 6 12; 7 17, “with speed,” “speedily”; in Prov 4 23 “watchfulness”; in Dt 4 1. In the 91 5 17; 19 18, Ps 77 6; Prov 27 23; Isa 56 2; Mic 7 3, “with care,” “serupulously,” “earnestly.” Sometimes it means “early,” “with haste” (Job 8 5; Prov 8 17). It may mean “industrious, “exacting” (Prov 10 26; 12 27; 22 29).

The American revisers have rendered “diligence” for various words in AV, e.g. for “business” in Rom 12 11; “giving diligence” for the “endeavoring” (Eph 4 3); “give diligence” for “studied” (2 Tim 2 15), for “labor” (He 4 11); “diligently” for “carefully” (Phil 2 28; He 12 17); “be diligent in” for “meditate upon” (1 Tim 4 15). It is well also to remember that the Old Eng. meaning of “diligence” is “with love,” from diligo, “to love.”

DILL. See ANISE.

DIMINISH, di-min’ish: RV has retained nearly all passages of AV where “to diminish” is used. Some of these uses have become obsolete: Dt 4 2, “neither shall ye diminish from it.” “Diminish” generally means “to reduce,” “to lessen.” In this sense it is employed in Ezr 5 11 from the Heb 鹑 мира, gārā, lit. “to shear.” The picture of shearing the beard, expressing degradation and loss of manhood, may underlie this passage.

DIMNAH, dim’nāh (דיננה, “dung”); Æmōn, Dommān): A city of the Merarite Levites in the territory of Zebulun (Josh 21 36). The name is probably a clerical error for Rimmon.

DIMON, di’mon, DIMONAH, di-mōnā. See DIBON.

DINAH, di’nā (דינה, dinah, “justice”): The daughter of Jacob and Leah, whose violation by Shechem, son of Hamor, caused her brothers, e.g. Simeon and Levi, to slay the inhabitants of Shechem, although they had induced the Shechemites to believe, if they would submit to circumcision, Shechem, the most honored of all the house of his father, would be permitted to have the young men to whom his soul clave for wife (Gen 34 1–31). The political elements of the story (of vs 21–23 and 30) suggest a tribal rather than a personal significance for the narrative. Nathan Isaacs DINAIITES, di’nā-ītes (דניאלה, dinayē’): A people mentioned in Ezr 4 9, as settled in the city of Samaria by Osnappar (Assurbanipal). The identification is uncertain.

DINHABAH, din’ha-bī, din-hā’sa (דינָחָה, dinḥāḥāh): The royal city of Bela, son of Beor, king of Edom (Gen 36 32; 1 Ch 1 43). There may be a resemblance in the name of Hodobat-et-Teneb, about 8 miles E. of Hebron; but this is in the land of Moab, and probably much too far to the N. No satisfactory identification has been proposed.

DINNER, din’er (σερήν, dinētron; Mt 22 4; Lk 11 38 [RVv “breakfast”]; 14 12; cf Ruth 2 14; Jn 21 13): In oriental as in classical lands it was customary, anciently, as now, to have but two meals in the day, and the evidence, including that of Jos, goes to show that the second or evening meal was the principal one. The “morning meal,” as the Talm calls it, was in no sense a “meal.” The peasant or artisan, before beginning work, might “break [his] fast” (Jn 21 12–15) by taking a bit of barley bread with some simple relish, but to “eat [a full meal] in the morning” was a reproach (Eccl 10 16). The full meal was not to be taken until a little before or after sunset, when the laborers had come in from their work (Lk 17 7; cf the “supper time” of 14 17). The noon meal, taken at an hour when climatic conditions called for refreshment from the heat of the Greeks, rendered “dinner” in EV, Mt 22 4; Lk 11 38, RVv “breakfast”), was generally very simple, of bread soaked in light wine with a handful of parched corn (Ruth 2 14), or of “potage and bread broken into a bowl” (Jn 21 13). Many, when on a journey especially, are content with one meal a day, taken after sunset. In general, eating at other times is casual and informal; evening is the time for the formal meal, or feast. See MEALS.

DIONYSIA, di-o-ni’sh-a (Διώνυσια, Dionisia, “festivals of Dionysus” [Bacchus]): The rural (vintage) Dionysia were celebrated in the month of Poseideon (April), and are roughly the December of the Asclepias. The celebration consisted of feasts, processions, songs and (sometimes) scenic performances. The Asclepias formed one of the most prominent features. After sacrificing a goat to the god, they filled the wine-skin with wine, made it slippery on the outside with oil, and then tried to hop on it with one leg. Whoever fell down furnished great sport for the spectators, but if anyone succeeded in maintaining an upright position to the end, he was declared victor. The demarch conducted the festival, the expenses of which were paid by the deme.

The Lenæa were celebrated on the 12th of Gæmelon (January) in Athens, and later in Ionia in Asia Minor. At this festival also the new wine was tasted. A procession was formed and they marched through the city, indulging in all sorts of...
os), surnamed "the Areopagite." One of the few Athenians converted by Paul (Acts 17 34). We know nothing further about him (see AREOPAGUS). According to one account he was the first bishop of the church at Athens; according to another he suffered martyrdom in that city under Domitian. We are even told that he migrated to Rome and was sent to Paris, where he was beheaded on Montmartre (Mount of the Martyr). The patron saint of France is St. Denys; of the French "Denys d' Halicarnasse" (Dióno-sóς of Halikarnassos). The mystical writings which were circulated in the Middle Ages and are still extant, are pronounced by the best authorities to be forgeries, and date from a period not earlier than the 5th cent.

DIONYSUS, di-o-nys'hus (BACCHUS) (Dióno-sóς, Dionísos): The youngest of the Gr gods. In Homer he is not associated with the vine. In later Gr legend he is represented as coming from India, as traversing Asia in a triumphal march, accompanied by woodland beings, with pointed ears, furzy noses and snub noses. This procession was called Satyrs. The vine was cultivated among European-Aryans first in Thrace, and here Dionysus is said to have established his worship first in Europe. Then the cult of Dionysus passed down thither from the Balkan peninsula to Thrace; and in the localized form of the myth the deity was born here—son of Zeus and Semele.

"Offspring of Zeus on high.
Thou that carest for all

And in Deo's sheltered plain Of Elysian lord God reigns.

Whither worshippers repair?
O Bacchus that dwellst in Thebes.
On whose broad and fertile groves
Fierce warriors from the dragon's teeth rose,
Where Issus softly floweth.

The city that Semele bare!"

—SOPHOCLES. Antigone.

Among all the Gr deities none appeared more vividly to the imagination than Dionysus. Gr tragedy is a form of worship, the ritual cult of the god of wine, who makes the initiate wise and the ungodly mad. Dionysius speaks most marvelously to the sense and to the spirit at the same time. There is nothing monotonous in the Dionysoic legend; it is replete with both joy and sorrow—in some aspects it is a "passion," in others a triumph. All the passion plays of the world (even the Oberammergau Passion plays, "Schauspiel") are the ancient spirit. One Dionysus after another has been substituted, but from the first there has been a desire on the part of the devotee to realize his god vividly with thrilling nearness, to partake of his joys and sorrows and triumphs in his manifold adventures. In the early myths Dionysus was one of the lesser gods; he is mentioned only twice in the Iliad and twice in the Odyssey; but he is always represented as being more nearly akin to man than the great august deities of Olympus. He is a man-god, or god-man. To the inhabitants of the vine-clad slopes of Attica, to which his cult had been brought from Phrygia through Thracian Bœotia, he was particularly dear. At their vintage feasts last year’s cask of wine was opened; and when the new vintage brought life to the bountiful god was greeted with songs of joyful praise. The burial of the wine in the dark tomb of the jars through the winter, and the opening of these jars at the spring festival symbolized the great awakening of man himself, the resurrection of the god’s worshippers to a fuller and more joyous life. The vine was not the only manifestation of the god—oil and wheat were also his; he was the god of ecstasy, the giver of physical joy and excitement, the god of life, the god of certain laws of Nature, germination and extinction, the external coming into being and the dying away of all things that are, fructification in its widest aspect, whether in the bursting of the seed-grain that lies interspersed in the earth, or in the generation of living creatures. Hence the prominence given to the phallic in the solemn processions in the Dionysiac festival of the wine harvest.

Nicanor (2 Mac 14 33) and Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 6 7) thought that the cult of Dionysus would not be objectionable to the Jews. Polykletus Philopator branded the Jews with an ivy-leaf (3 Mac 2 29), which was sacred to Dionysus. See also Bacchus.

DIOSCORINTHUS, di-o-skor'in-thi-us: A certain (unidentified) month (2 Mac 11 21). See Calendar; Time.
DIOCURI, di-ôk'û-rî (Διοκουρὶ). Diocuri; in Acts 28 11, AV Castor and Pollux, RV THE TWIN BROTHERS; in m, “Dioscuri”): The sign of the ship on which Paul sailed from Melita to Syracuse and Rhogiam. The Dioscuri (i.e. sons of Zeus), Castor and Pollux, are the two chief stars in the constellation of the Twins. Some 4,000 years BC they served as pointers to mark the beginning of the new year by setting together with the first new moon of springtime. The constellation of the Twins was supposed to be esp. favorable to sailors, hence ships were often placed under the protection of the twin gods. E. W. MAUNDER

DIOTREPHEES, di-ô-trêp'-fēz (Διοτρέφης, Dios trephēs): A person mentioned in 3 Jn vs 9,10 as contentiously resisting the writer's authority and forbidding others from exercising the Christian hospitality which he himself refused to show. The words “who loveth to have the preeminence, among them” may indicate that he was a church official, abusing his position. DIP: Priests when offering a sin offering were required to dip a finger into the blood of the sacrificed bullock and “to sprinkle of the blood seven times to the air” (Lev 4 6, etc.). See also the law referring to the cleansing of infected houses (Lev 14 51) and the cleansing of a leper (Lev 14 16). In all such cases “to dip” is “to moisten,” “to bespinkle,” “to dip in,” the Heb डीप, tāḥal, or the Gr ρηθή, βεφίō. See also ASHER. In Ps 68 22 “dipping” is not τρ but from the Heb, but merely employed for a better understanding of the passage: “Thou mayest crush them, dipping thy foot in blood” (AV “that thy foot may be dipped in the blood”). Rev 19 13 is a very doubtful passage. AV reads: “a vesture dipped in blood” (from ἄποθετο, “to dip”); RV following another reading (either ῥανίνθο, or ῥανίτζο, both “to sprinkle”) translates “a garment sprinkled with blood.” RV gives “dipped in.” See also SOP. A. L. BRENNICH

DIPHATH, dip'ath (吩吩, diaphath): A son of Gomer, son of Japheth, son of Noah (1 Ch 4 6), called Raphath (q.v.) in the corresponding genealogy in Gen 10 3.

DISALLOW, dis-a-lou': “To disallow” as used in the Scriptures means either “to oppose,” “not permit” (Heb ḥān, Nu 30 5.8.11), or “to reject” (Gr ἀποδικιμάζω, lit. “to consider useless,” 1 Pet 2 4 7 AV, RV “rejected”). DISANNUL, dis-a-nul'. See ANNUL.

DISAPPOINT, dis-a-point': “To disappoint” may be used transitively or intransitively. In the former case it naturally has a more forceful meaning. Therefore RV changes the tr of AV wherever “disappoint” is used with an object: Job 5 12, “frustrate”; Ps 17 13, “confront him,” RVn “forested”; Jth 16 6, “brought them to nought”; but RV retains “disappointment” where the person who disappoints is not expressed. Cf Prov 16 22.

DISCERN, di-zûrn': Five Heb words are thus tr: בָּט, yádha', nákhár, r'âād and šâmâ'a. It may simply mean “observe” (בָּט), “I discerned among the youths” (Prov 7 7); or discriminating knowledge, the vehicling of which was a part of the “discretion time and judgment” (Eccl 8 5, yádha'); “He discerned him not, because his hands,” etc (Gen 27 23, nákhár); “Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked” (Mal 3 18, r'âād); “So is my lord the king to discern good,” etc (2 S 14 17, šâmâ'a).

In the NT the words anaktirîa, diaktirîa and do-kîmâsia are thus tr, expressing close and distinct acquaintance with or a critical knowledge of things. Used in 1 Cor 2 14 AV of “the things of the spirit of God”; in 1 Cor 12 29 of “the (Lord’s) body” in the sacrificial setting (cf Mt 26 28); in Eph and Col 3 18 of “heaven”; in He 5 14 of a clear knowledge of good and evil as the prerogative of a full-grown man. See also next art. HENRY E. DOSKER

DISCERNINGS, di-zûrn'îngs, OF SPIRITS (Σαν- πλοῖον πνευμάτων, diakriseis pneumâdon, “judicial estimation,” “through judgment or separation”): Occurs in 1 Cor 12 10 as being one of the gifts of the Spirit. The Gr word occurs in He 5 14; and Rom 14 1: “But him that is weak in faith receive ye, yet not for decision of scruples.” This tr scarcely expresses the meaning, which Thayer has freely rendered, “not for the purpose of passing judgment on opinions, as to which one is to be preferred as the more correct.” Taking these three passages together it is evident that the Gr term which is rendered “discerning” means a distinguishing or discriminating between things that are under consideration; hence the one who possessed the gift of “discernments of spirits” expressed a distinction between the one who spoke by the Spirit of God and the one who was moved by a false spirit. This gift seems to have been exercised chiefly upon those who assumed the rôle of teachers, and it was esp. important in those days, when there were many false teachers abroad (see 2 Jn vs 7; Acts 20 29.30). See also SPIRITUAL GIFTS. A. W. FORTUNE

DISCIPLE, dis'îcpl': (1) Usually a subst. (μαθητής, mathētēs, “a learner,” from μαθαίνω, “to learn”; Lat discipulus, “a scholar”): The word is found in the Bible only in the Gospels and Acts. But it is good Greek, in use from Herodotus down, and always means the pupil of someone, in contrast to the master or teacher (διδάσκαλος, didaskalos). See Mt 10 24; Lk 6 40. In all cases it implies that the person not only accepts the views of the teacher, but that he is also in practice an adherent. The word has several applications: (a) The widest sense is that of the disciple of Jesus, who accept the teachings of anyone, not only in belief but in life. Thus the disciples of John the Baptist (Mt 9 14; Lk 7 18; Jn 3 25); also of the Pharisees (Mt 22 16; Mk 2 18; Lk 5 39); of Moses (Jn 9 28). But its chief use is to designate the adherents of Jesus. (a) In the widest sense (Mt 10 42; Lk 6 17; Jn 6 66, and often). It is the only name for Christ's followers in the Gospels. But (b) esp. the Twelve Apostles, even when they are called simply the disciples (Mt 10 1; 11 1; 12 1, et al.). In the Acts, after the death and ascension of Jesus, disciples are those who confess Him as the Messiah, Christians (Acts 6 1.2.7; 9 39 [form, mathētēs]; 11 26, “The disciples were called Christians”). Even half-instructed believers who had been baptized only with the baptism of John are disciples (Acts 19 1–4).

(2) We have also the vb, μαθήτρα, mathētērēs, "Jesus' disciple" (lit. "was discipled to Jesus," Mt 27 57); “Make disciples of all the nations” (AV "teach," Mt 28 19); “had made many disciples” (AV "taught many," Acts 14 21); “every seribe who hath been discipled to a kingdom to heaven” (AV "instructed," Mt 13 52). The disciple of Christianity may be an adherent of Farrar, as "one who believes His doctrines, rests upon His sacrifice, imbibles His spirit, and imitates His example." The OT has neither the term nor the exact idea, though there is a difference between teacher and scholar among David's singers (1 Ch 25 8); and among the prophetic guilds the distinction between the rank and file and the leader (1 S 19 20; 2 K 6 5).

G. H. TREVENER

DISCIPLINE, dis'pln (δισκευα, μαθησι): In AV only in Job 36 10, where it refers to moral discipline, the sternest cultivation of the righteous life; RV "instruction." RV in 2 Tim 1 7 has "discipline" for a Gr word (σφορισμός) meaning "sobering"; in 2 Tim 3 16 m, for Gr paideia, "instruction." In classic Gr paideia means "education," mental culture. Through the influence of the LXX, which translates the Heb midrash by paideia, the meaning of "chastisement" accompanies paideia in the NT. Cf He 12 5-7,8,11. See CHASTISEMENT; and for ecclesiastical discipline see CHURCH.

DISCOMFIT, dis-kum'ftr: DISCOMFITURE, dis-kum'f-ttr (דפוקת, קסום, מתקפה, m'tkph): These words are now obsolete or at least obsolescent and are confined in Bib. lit. wholly to the OT. The meaning in general is "to annoy," "harass," "confuse," "rouse" and "destroy." The most common use is upon the root meaning, "to trouble" or "annoy," sometimes to the point of destruction (Josh 10 10; Jgs 4 15; 1 S 7 10; 2 S 22 15).

The AV errs in the tr in Isa 31 8, where the meaning is "to become, subject to task work" or "to place a burden upon one." There seems also to be an unwarranted use of the word in Nu 14 45, where it means rather "to bruise" or "strike." The purest use is perhaps in 1 S 14 20, where the statement is made that "every man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture." WALTER G. CLIFFINGER.

DISCOURSE, dis-kwər': In RV of Acts 20 7,9, the tr of Gr diakopmai (AV "preach"), elsewhere rendered, according to the implications of the context, "reason" or "dispute," as Acts 17 2; 19 9 (AV "disputing," RV "reasoning"); Jude ver 9.

DISCOVER, dis-kuv'ər: In modern usage the word "discover" signifies "to get first sight or knowledge of," "to ascertain," or "to explore." Such usage appears in 1 S 22 6 of the discovery of David's hiding-place, where the Heb uses פַּנּוּת (P'nt), פַּנּוּת (P'nt). In AV the word "discover" often occurs in a sense now archaic or even obsolete. (Note in the cases cited below the Heb word is צְפִית, צְפִית, except Jer 13 26 [צְפִית, צְפִית, "to make bare"]; and Hab 3 13 [צְפִית, צְפִית, "to make naked"]). (1) "To exhibit," "uncover" (or "betray"), in which examples ERV also reads with AV "discover". ARV "uncover" (Ex 20 26; Job 12 22; Isa 57 7 ["discovered thyself"] AV and ERV; Jer 13 26; Lam 2 14; Hos 7 1; Nah 3 5). (2) "To cause to be no longer a covering," "to lay bare" (2 S 22 16 AV). (3) "To bring to light," "disclose" (1 S 14 8,11 [ERV with AV "discoverer"]). (4) "To unmask" or "reveal oneself" (Prov 18 2 AV). (5) "To take away the covering of" (Isa 22 8 AV). (6) "To lay bare" (Hab 3 13). In Ps 29 9, AV reads: "The voice of the Lord . . . discovereth the forests," where RV reads, "stripeth the forests bare," i.e., "stripeth the forests of their leaves" (Pev. or). The Psalms, 1, 148); "stripeth bare the forests" (Briggs, Psalms, I, 251, 253).

In the NT (AV), the word "discover" occurs as a tr of the Gr anaphānāntes in Acts 21 3, and for kakadōn in Acts 27 30, where RV reads in the first instance "had come in sight of," and in the latter case "perceived." W. N. STEARNS.

DISCIPLES, dis-krip'ə-səlz, BIBLICAL, bib'li-kəl: By this term should be understood substantial disagreements in the statements of Bib. writers. Such disagreements might subsist between the statements of different writers at different times, or between the several statements of a single writer. Contradictions of Bib. views from extra-Bib. sources as history, natural science, philosophy, do not fall within the scope of our subject.

Observant Bible readers in every age have noted, with various degrees of insight, that the Scriptures exhibit manifold interior differences.

2. Criticism and contrasts. Differences of literary form and method have ever seemed, except to those who maintained a mechanical theory of inspiration, wholly natural and fitting. Moreover, that there was progress in the Bib. revelation, esp. that the NT of Jesus Christ signifies a vastly richer revelation of God than the OT, has been universally recognized. In fulfilling the law and the prophets Christ put a marked distance between Himself and them, yet He certainly affirmed rather than denied them. The Christian church has ever held to the essential unity of the whole library of the Holy Scriptures. Moreover, the evangelical churches have recognized the Bible as "the only and sufficient rule of both faith and practice." Indeed, in the generation following the Reformation, the strictest and most literal theory of inspiration and inerrancy found general acceptance. Over against such a body of presuppositions, criticism, some generations later, began to allege certain errors and discrepancies in the Bible. Of course the orthodox sought to repel all these claims; for they felt that the Bible, whatever the appearances might seem to indicate, must be free from error, else it could not be the word of God. So there came with criticism a long period of sturdy defence of the strictest doctrine of Bib. inerrancy. Criticism, however, kept on its way. It has forced the church to find a deeper and surer ground of confidence in the authority of the Bible as the witness to God's self-revelation to man.

In our day the church has for the most part overcome the notion that the certainty of God in Christ stands or falls with the absolute inerrancy of each statement contained in the Bible. Still there remains, and doubtless ever must remain, a need of a clear understanding of the issue involved in the allegation—always an issue of "other human limitations"—of Bib. discrepancies.

Alleged discrepancies pertain (1) to statements of specific, concrete facts, and (2) to the utterance of principles and doctrines. Under the second head fall disagreements respecting moral and religious truths, the "superhistorical" realities and values. Our inquiry resolves itself into three parts: (1) to determine whether there be discrepancies, of either or both sorts, in the Bible; (2) to obtain at least a general understanding of the conditions and causes that may have given rise to the discrepancies, real or apparent; (3) to determine their significance for faith.

As to the first point, it should be observed that apparent inconsistencies may not be real ones; as the often in the Old Testament. Hence the doubt that the discovery of further data may resolve many an apparent contradiction. On the other hand, the affirmation a priori that there can be and are real discrepancies in the Bible is not only an outrage upon the human understanding, but it stands also in contradiction to the spirit of freedom that is of faith. Besides, it should not be overlooked that the discoveries of modern historical and archaeological research, which have tended to confirm very many Biblical statements, seem just as surely to neutralize any error in the text. In any event, we must bow to reality, and we may do this with fearless confidence in "the God of things as they are." But are there any real discrepancies in the Bible? It is a part of the present plan to attempt the impossible and at all events useless task of exhibiting definite statistics of all the alleged discrepancies, or even of all the principal ones. Passing by the childish folly that would find a "discrepancy" in mere rhetorical antitheses, such as that in Prov 26:4.5 ("'Answer not a fool according to his folly'"), or instances of merely formal contrariety of expression, where the things intended are manifestly congruous (e.g. Mt 12:30; Lk 11:23 contrasted with Mt 9:40; Lk 9:50; "He that is not with me is against me," "He that is not against us is for us"), it will serve our purpose to notice a few representative examples of real or apparent discrepancy. The chronologies of K and Ch are inconsistent in the enunciation of the genealogies in Gen 46; Nu 26; 1 Ch 2-7 show considerable variations. The two lists of exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2; Neh 7:6ff) show many discrepancies, including a marked difference in the enumeration. The accounts of the creation in Gen 1 and 2 (cf CREATION)—to take an example dependent upon the results of modern criticism—are mutually independent and in important particulars diverse. But the center of interest in our inquiry is the gospel history. Since Tatian and his Diatessaron in the 2nd ct., the variations and contrasts in the Gospels have not only been noted and felt, but many have striven to "harmonize" them. After all, however, there remain some irreducible differences. The Gospels, generally speaking, do not give us "ripassiamo verba" of Jesus; in reporting His discourses they show many variations. In so far as the essential meaning is the same in all, no one speaks of discrepancies; but when it is not clear or manifestly foreign to the plain meaning (e.g. Mt 12:39.40 and Lk 11:29.30), one may say that at least a technical discrepancy exists. In recording sayings or events the evangelists manifestly do not always observe the same chronological principle; Lk tends to make different connections sayings which Mt includes as parts of the Sermon on the Mount (e.g. the Lord's Prayer, Mt 6:9ff; Lk 11:1-4; cf Jesus Christ; CHRONOLOGY OF NT). We have two distinct genealogies of Jesus (Mt 1:1-16; Lk 3:23ff; cf GENEALOGY). We may even note that Pilate's superscription over the cross of Jesus is given in four distinct forms. Here, however, the discrepancy is not real except in the most technical sense, and is well not mentioning only to show that the evangelists' interest does not lie in a mere objective accuracy. That a perfect agreement as to the significance of an event exists where there are undeniable discrepancies in external details may be illustrated by the two accounts of the healing of the centurion's servant (Mt 8:5ff; Lk 7:1ff). Of enormous greater interest are the various accounts of the appearances of the risen Christ. If a complete certainty as to the form and order of these events is necessary to faith, the case is not a happy one for the historian who is unable to render a perfect account of these matters (cf Jesus Christ; RESURRECTION). Turning from the Gospels to apostolic history, we meet with real problems, e.g. how to relate Paul's autobiographical notes in Gal 1 with the accounts in Acts.

The discrepancies thus far noted pertain to historical matters, and not one of them involves the contradiction of a fact in which faith is interested. But are there also real or apparent discrepancies in matters of doctrine? Presenting the facts, tending to for instance, that the ideal of the doctrine of the prophets and that of the priestly class stand in a relative (not absolute) opposition to each other (cf, e.g. Jas 1:11; Mic 6:8 with the interpretation of the statements of the NT, some would assert—among them Luther—that James stands in opposition to Paul in respect to faith and works (cf Jas 2:17ff in contrast with Gal 2:16 and many other passages in Paul). But particular interest attaches to the problem of Christ's attitude toward the OT law. His "but I say unto you" (Mt 5:22 and passim) has been interpreted by many as a distinct contradiction of the OT. Another question of acute interest is the agreement of the Johannine picture of Jesus with that of the Synoptics.

It can scarcely require proof that some of these alleged discrepancies are not such at all. For example, Jesus' attitude toward the OT was one of profound reverence and affirmation. He was very much conscious that the OT law represented a stage in the Divine education of mankind. His "but I say unto you" was not a denying of the degree of advancement represented by the OT law, but a carrying out of the principle of the law to its full expression (cf LAW; FULFILMENT). Of course, the Divine education of Israel did not mean the mere inculcation of the truth in a fallow and hitherto unoccupied soil. There was much supersition and error to be overcome, and a relationship to the historical and theological, or grace and truth, which were to be the foundation of the New Testament. It was an essential part of the Divine revelation to overcome, still manifest themselves here and there in the OT; it may be replied that at all events the one grand tendency of Divine revelation is unmistakably clear. An idea is not "Scriptural" simply by virtue of its having been incidentally expressed by a Biblical writer, but because it essentially and inseparably belongs to the organic whole of the Biblical testimony. In the case of James v. Paul the antithesis is one of emphasis, not of contradiction, of a first principle. And as for the variations in the gospel history, these do not deserve to be called real discrepancies so long as the Gospels unite in giving one harmonious picture and testimony concerning the events in which the prophetic testimony and the whole of Jesus. Even from this point of view, John, though much more theological, preaches the same Christ as the Synoptists.

As to the conditions under which discrepancies may arise, it may suffice, first, to call attention to the general law that God in revealing His Spirit to men and in moving men by His Spirit to speak or write, never gives them out of the normal relations of human intelligence, so far as matters of history or science are concerned, as if to Himself and His will which is the result of revelation and inspiration. Their references to history and Nature are not therefore in any sense superhuman; accordingly they have no direct authority for faith (cf REVELATION; INSPIRATION). On this basis the divergences of human traditions or documents as exhibited in different genealogies, chronologies and the like are natural in the best sense and wholly fitting. As for the rest, errors of copists have played a part.

Faith, however, has no interest in explaining away the human limitations in God's chosen witnesses. It is God's way to place the heavenly "treasure in earthen vessels" (2 Cor 4:7). It seems that God has purposely led the church to see, through the necessity of recognizing the human limitations of the Bible, just where her faith is grounded. God has made Himself known through His Son. The Scripture preparations of the NT, and of the OT in preparation for Him, give us a clear and sufficient testimony to the Christ of God. The clearness and persuasive power of that testimony make all questions of verbal and other internal agreements essentially irrelevant. The certainty that God has spoken unto us in His Son and that we have this knowledge through the Scripture testimony lifts us above all anxious concern for the possible errors of the witnesses in matters evidently nonessential.

DISCUS, diskus (δίσκος, diskos, "the summons of the discus," 2 Macc 14 14 m., "to the game of the discus," AV "the game of discus"): The discus was a round stone slab or metal plate of considerable weight (a kind of quoit), the contest of throwing which to the greatest distance was one of the exercises in the Gr gymnasia, being included in the pentathlon. It was introduced into Jerusalem by Jason the high priest in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, 175-164 BC, in the Palæstra he had formed there in imitation of the Gr games. His conduct led to his being described in 2 Macc 14 13.14 as that "ungodly man" through whom even the priests forsook their duties to pray at the discus. A statue of a discobolos (discus-thrower) is in the British Museum. From discus we have the words "disc," "dish," "desk." See Games. W. L. WALKER

DISEASE, di-zēs, DISEASES, di-zēziz (נָשָּׁה, šāšāh, הָלָה, ḥālēt; vōcōs, nānos): Palestine, from its position and physical conditions, ought to be a healthy country. That it is so does not depend on the unsanitary conditions in which the people live and the absence of any attempts to check the introduction or development of syphilitic diseases. The number of marshes or pools is fairly small, and the use of active measures to destroy the larvae of mosquitoes might easily diminish or abolish the malarial fevers which now prevail all over the country. The freeing of Ismailieh and Port Said from these pools is an object-lesson in sanitation. When one examines the conditions of life in towns and villages all over the country, the evidences of the ravages of these fever and their sequelae appear on every hand as they affect all ages from infancy to middle age, and one meets but few individuals of extreme old age. The absence of any adequate system of drainage and the pollution of the water supplies are also factors of great importance in preserving the health of the people.

In ancient times it was regarded as healthier than Egypt, as it well might be, hence the diseases of Egypt are referred to as being worse than those of Pal (Dt 7 15; 28 60; Am 4 10). The sanitary regulations and restrictions of the PC would doubtless have raised the standard of public health, but it is unlikely that these were ever observed over any large area.

The types of disease which are referred to in the Bible are those that still prevail. Fevers of several kinds, dysentery, leprosy, intestinal worms, plague, nervous diseases as well as paralysis and epilepsy, insanity, ophthalmia and skin diseases are among the commonest and will be described under their several names. Medical treatment is described under Medicine. Physician. The word "disease" or "diseases" in AV is changed to "sickness" in RV in 2 K 1 2; 8 8; Mt 9 35, and left out in Jn 5 4; while in Mt 8 17 "sicknesses" is replaced by "diseases." RV also changes "infirmity" in Lk 7 21 to "diseases," and in Ps 38 7 "a loathsome disease" is changed to "burning." ALEX. MACALISTER

DISEASES OF THE EYE. See Eyes, Diseases of.

DISH: The rendering in RV in some connections of three Heb and one Gr word. The בֶּרֶד תֹּאֶרֶךְ of Ex 25 29; 37 16; Nu 4 7 was apparently a kind of sufler, in this case of gold, for holding the loaves of the "presence bread." The same word represents the silver "platters" (Nu 7 13 ff) brought by the princes as a dedication gift. The σφήλις of Jgs 5 25 was a large bowl, so τραπέζιον in Jgs 6 38. "Lordly dish" is lit. "bowl of [lit for] nobles." The calabash of 2 K 21 13; Prov 19 24; 26 15 (last two AV "bosom" after LXX) refers probably to the wide, deep dish in which the principal part of the meal was served. Of somewhat similar form may have been the τρίβην (LXX for בֶּרֶד תֹּאֶרֶךְ) mentioned in connection with the Passover meal (Mt 26 23; Mk 14 20). BENJAMIN RENO DOWNEE

DISHAN, dīshān, DISHON, dīshōn (דִּשָּׁן, dišān, דִּשָּׁה, dišāh, “anteleope,” “pygarg”): A Horite clan, mentioned as the youngest "son" and elsewhere as the "grandson" of Seir. The form Dishon occurs several times in the list of Horite clans, together with many other totem names (Gen 36 passim; 1 Ch 3 8f). See Gray, H/PN, 89.

DISHONESTY, dis-on-es-ī: Only in 2 Cor 4 2, the AV rendering of Gr αἰσθανόμενος; AV elsewhere and RV uniformly, "shame."

DISOBEDIENCE, dis-ō-bē-di-ēn-s, DISOBEDIENT (נְזֶב, nəzēḇ, מָרָד, mārād; ἀπεθεῖσθαι, ἀπαθεῖον, ἀθράστος, ἀθράστου); The word used chiefly in the NT has the general meaning of a lack of regard for authority or rulership. The stronger meaning of actual stubbornness or violence is perhaps conveyed in the OT (1 K 3 26; Neh 9 26; cf 1 K 3 21).

In the NT there seem to be two rather clearly defined uses of the word, one objective and practical, the other ethical and psychological. The first refers more to conduct, the second to belief and one's mental attitude toward the object of disobedience. To the first belong such passages as refer to the overt act of disobedience to one's parents (Rom 1 30; 2 Tim 3 2). Illustrating this more fully, the tr according to the AV of 1 Tim 1 9 is given as "unruly" in the RV. By far the greater emphasis, however, is placed upon the distinctly ethical quality in which disobedience is really an attitude of the mind and finds its essence in a heart of unbelief and unfaithfulness (1 Pet 3 7f; Eph 2 2; 4 6; Col 3 6). In the latter three references "children [sons] of disobedience" are mentioned, as if one should become the very offspring of such an unhappy and unholy state of mind. The classic phrase of NT lit. (Acts 26:10) contains both the practical and the ethical aspects. Paul's convictions were changed by the vision and his conduct was made to conform immediately to it. WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

DISORDERLY, dis-ór'dér-li (ἀρακτός, disaktos): The word is found four times in the Epp. to the Thess (1 Thess 5:14; 2 Thess 3:6,7,11), "Withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh d." We beheld not ourselves; 'We hear of some that walk among you d.' The word is a military term and has reference to the soldier who does not keep the ranks (inordinatus, Liv.). Then it refers to people who refuse to obey the civil laws, and thus it gets its meaning, "disorderly." It points to members in the early church, who, by their lives, became a reproach to the gospel of Christ (of 1 Thess 4:11.12). HENRY E. DOSKER DISPATCH, dis-pash': Occurs Tob 7:8 in the sense of dispatch of business, "Let this business be dispatched" (RV "finished"); 2 Mac 12:18, "before he had dispatched anything" (RV "without accomplishing"); Wis 11:19 [20] in the sense of finishing, destroying, "dispatch them at once" (RV "condemn them"); 4 Macc 1:8 (kataniein), which may mean "finish it quickly," RV spells "dispatch." EXECUTIVE, ex-ek'syütiv, ex-ek'syютив): The word (oikonomia) so tr signifies primarily, a stewardship, the management or disposition of affairs intrusted to one. Thus 1 Cor 9:17, AV "A dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me," RV "I have a stewardship intrusted to me." The idea is similar in Eph 3:6 Col 1:25 (RVm "stewardship"). In Eph 1:10 God's own working is spoken of as a "dispensation." EXECUTIVE, ex-ek'syютив, ex-ek'syютив)

4. Extent esp. into the chief cities of the civilized world. The successors of Alexander, Dispersion and their successors in turn, encouraged them to migrate into other countries and the mingling of nationalities. They needed colonists for the settlements and cities which they established, and with the offer of citizenship and facilities for trade and commerce they attracted many of the Jewish people.

In this way," says Philo, "J esus became the capital, not only of Judea, but of many other lands, on account of the colonies which it sent out from time to time to the bordering districts of Egypt, Phoenicia, Syria, Cæcilia, Syria, and into the more distant regions of Pamphylia, Cilicia, the greater part of Asia Minor as far as Bithynia, and the remotest corners of Pontus. And in like manner into Europe: into Thessaly, and Boeotia, and Macedonia, and Aetolia, and Attica and Argos, and Corinth, and into the most fertile and fairest parts of the Peloponnesus. And not only in the continent of Asia, but also in the most important islands, such as Euboea, Cyprus, and Crete. I say nothing of the countries beyond the Euphrates. All of them except a very small portion of Babylon, and all the atreparies which contain fruitful land, have Jewish inhabitants" (Philo, Leg ad Caium, 86).

About the middle of the 2nd cent. BC the Sibylline Oracles could say of the Jewish people: "Every land and every sea is full of thee" (3:271). About the same period the Rom Senate, being anxious to extend protection to the Jews, took a circular letter written in their favor to the kings of Egypt, Syria, Pergamum, Cappadocia and Parthia, and to a great number of provinces, cities and islands of the Mediterranean, where presumably there was a larger or smaller number of Jews (1 Mac 15:15 f). It is no surprise, therefore, to read that for the Feast of Pentecost at Jerusalem, there were present after the ascension of Jesus: "Parthians and Medes and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Paphia, and in Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt and the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and sojourners from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians" (Acts 2 9–12).

The Eastern Dispersion, caused by the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, seems to have increased and multiplied, and to have enjoyed a considerable measure of liberty, and Eastern prosperity. When the return from Dispersion the captivity took place under Zerubbabel, it was only a small proportion of the exiles who sought a home again in the land of their fathers. Nor did the numbers who accompanied Ezra from Babylon greatly diminish the exiles who remained behind. In the time of Christ, Jos could speak of the Jews in Babylonia by "of numerable myriads" (Ant, XI, v. 2). He also tells us of the 2,000 Jewish families whom Antiochus transferred from Babylon and Mesopotamia to Phrygia and Syria. Of the peculiarities of the Jews as a people, as well as of the history and character of their own customs and arousing the ill-will of the neighbors, we have a glimpse in the Pers period in the Book of Est (3 8). Babylonia remained a focus of eastern Judaism for centuries, and from this country the leaders of the Talm of Jerusalem in the 5th cent. of our era, and the Talm of Babylon a cent. later. The two chief centers of Mesopotamian Judaism were Nehardea, a town on the Euphrates, and Nisibis on the Mygdonius, an affluent of the Chaboras, which were also centers of Syrian Christianity.

The Egypt Dispersion is of special interest and importance, and recent discoveries have thrown unexpected light upon it. As far back as the days of Sheshen, a Egyptian founder of the 22d Dynasty, the Shi Dispersion shak of 1 K 14 25 f; 2 Ch 12 21; who invaded Pal in the 10th cent. BC, and engraver on the S wall of the great "Temple of Karnak the names of many districts and cities he had captured, war of Egypt and hostages may have been carried off to Egypt by the conqueror. At a later time Jewish mercenaries are said to have fought in the army of Pharaoh Neco II against Ethiopia, to which expedition belong the famous inscriptions of Abu Simbel (594–589 BC). So we learn from the well-known Letter of Aristaeus. But the clearest and best-known example of a settlement of Jews in Egypt is that connected with the prophet Jeremiah. When Gedaliah, the governor of Judaea, after the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BC, had been treacherously murdered, the depressed and dispirited remnant under Jehonan, the son of Kareah, resolved to take flight into Egypt, against the counsel of Jeremiah. A host of fugitives, including Jeremiah and his friend Baruch, accordingly set out thither, and settled at Migdol and Tahpanies and Noph (Memphis), and in the country of Puthoth in the wilderness, which is some distance from both the Nile and the desert. The journey was undertaken in the 44th year of Jeremiah. It was in Egypt with these fugitives that Jeremiah ended his life. Many of the fugitives were taken prisoners by Nebuchadrezzar on one of his latest expeditions to the west, and were transported to Babylon (Jos, Am, X, ix, 7; Jer, xxxviii, 13–18).

Of this colony of Jews it is natural to see a strong confirmation in the recent discovery of Aaram, pappi at Assouan, the Syene of the ancients. The pappi were the contents of a deed box of a member of a Jewish colony in upper Egypt, and they refer to house sales and in which Jews are concerned. Here then at Assouan, about 470 BC is a colony of Jews in Egypt. But, in addition to these, there have been bankers and money lenders, within a cent. of the death of Jeremiah. In the pappi there is evidence of the existence of a tribunal in Egypt, where cases could be decided, as fully recognized by law as any of the other courts. Egypt or Pers, for Egypt, the "chiefest of longines" in the case of Jews in Egypt. Most significant of all, Jeh is acknowledged as the God of the Jew and the symbol of the sanctity or existence of the altar of sacrifice is beyond all doubt. Evidently these Jews in Egypt did not consider that an altar of Jeh could not stand anywhere else as an altar of the Lord. In Jehu, the worship of the synagogue was the only worship of the God of their fathers. These facts are rather still more striking when we regard them as a fulfillment of Isaia's prophecy: "In that day there shall be five cities in the midst of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts: one shall be called the city of destruction. In that day shall Babylon be brought to Jehova in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to Jehovah" (Isa 19 4–19). These pappi give information similar to that which the clay tablets discovered at Nippur give regarding the house of Marduk son of Nis-Nergal King of Babylon. 5. The Dispersion.

8. Jewish Temple at Syene. One of these pappi contains the petition of the Jewish colony in Elephantine addressed to Bagohi, a Pers governor at Elephantine, and the other to the Pers governors of Egypt, about 408 BC. They ask for assistance to enable them to rebuild the temple of Jeh in Elephantine. The former was supported by the secretary of the priests of the ram-headed Egypt god Khnum. This temple was erected to Jeh at least 125 years before and had been seized by Cambyses in 525 BC when he destroyed the temple at Edfu. The temple erected to Jeh at Elephantine was also for burnt sacrifice, and there were gold and silver vessels in which the blood of sacrifice was contained. The text of the college of priests presenting this petition is Jehovah, a name found in an abbreviated form in Judon (Neh 3 7). An attempt has been made to identify this temple with the temple of the Pers army under Cambyses from their adopted homes in Assyria, and the cities of the Medes and had obtained possessions believed to point to the Northern Kingdom, like Roessa and Menahem, occur very frequently, but this is to overlook a foundation for the temple, and the Israelite origin of the Syene colonists is not established (4 K 409 7, 441 f.). The temple was said in favor of the view that they were the descendants of a Jewish military colony. That Jewish mercenaries were fought in the reign of the Pharaohs of the 21st century BC is seen. And that Elephantine was an important garrison town on the Nile is also certain. (SeeJer, xlviii, 4.) (2) mentions a Jewish military colony holding a post at Pelusium in the cent. before Christ, and this might be the same garrison which the Israelites destroyed in the 5th cent. BC. Such a garrison would attract Jews engaged in business and in the occupations of civilization, and so a distinct Jewish community would be formed. It has even been suggested that the tidings of the destruction of the temple at Jerus were false and the motives to this Egyptian Jews to build the temple and rear the altar of burnt offering which the heathen priests of Khnum had destroyed.

While the petition to the religious authorities at Jerusalem indicates that the priests of Elephantine regarded their temple as dependent upon the temple at Jerusalem, it is significant also, as is shown in their letter, in communication with Delaiah and Shelemiah to the sons of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria. That this was Nehemiah's temple at Elephantine (Neh 6 14), for he lived nearly a cent. earlier. But the association with descendants of him, himself Samarians, gives a schematical appearance to the position of the Elephantine temple. The existence of this temple with its priestly, its altars of sacrifice, and its names for 500 years BC, is an important fact in the history of the Dispersion. It was meant to keep those Jewish exiles true to the religion of the fathers, who had handed on to them their brethren in Pal. For a like purpose the temple of Onias at Alexandria, in the 100 years of the Maccabean struggle. Onias had to flee from Jerusalem with a number of priests and Levites, and for this he received a letter of protection. Pharaoh in Egypt, he received a gift of land upon which he built a
The great monument of Hellenistic Judaism, which had its chief seat in Alexandria, is the LXX tr of the OT. The Septuagint paro evanghelika, and was the Bible of the Gnostics and the first declaration of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. It is ascribed in the Letter of Aristeas to the interest of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285-246 BC) to secure a copy of the Jewish Law in an accessible tr for the famous Royal Library. It is more likely than its familiarity with their Hell tongue and in their new surroundings, the need of an intelligible version of the Law to lend a religious character to the work to act to produce it. In course of time the rest followed, but from the tradition of its being the work of 70 or 72 translators it is known as the LXX. See SERTUAGINT.

The question has been raised whether much has not been made of a Jewish community in Alexandria so early, and it has been asserted that the dispersion anywhere before the Maccabean Jewish period in the second half of the Community 2nd cent. BC. The evidence as we have seen points to the existence of Jewish communities continuously from the days of the Maccabees. Papry prove the presence of Jews in Egypt, not only in the towns but in country districts from a comparatively early period. A remarkable inscription has been found in this community at a late date, no record has yet been found to tell. Possibly it decayed in course of time, for Herodotus who visited Egypt about 450 BC makes no mention of the inhabitants as Jews in sufficient numbers to attract his attention. It was undoubtedly with the founding of Alexandria in 332 BC that the flourishing period of Judaism in Egypt commenced. Alexander the Great had hastened from the field of victory at Issus 333 BC, through Syria by way of Tyre, the siege of which occupied him some months, showing clemency to the inhabitants of Jer and severity to the rebellious inhabitants of Gaza till by its eastern gate he entered Egypt and took possession of the land of the Pharaohs. The Jews appear to have been friendly to Macedonian conquest, and in Alexander's new city they received the rights of citizenship and two quarters allotted to themselves. That they were persecuted and found by Jews in sufficient numbers to attract his attention. The sanctuary of the city was on a scale of great magnificence. In the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (182-146 BC) they were allowed to set up the temple at Leontopolis, as we have already noticed. In the time of Philo the Jewish colony in Egypt was considered to number a million. It was in Alexandria that the Jews first came so powerfully under the influence of Hellenism, and here that the peculiar Graeco-Jewish philosophy sprang up which Philo and the most original representatives. The Jews and Hellenism The same soil was eminently favorable to early Christianity which had from the end of the 2nd cent. onward its greatest teachers and their learned catechetical school. See ALEXANDRIA.

14. The Septuagint

The Septuagint was the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, completed around 200 BC. It is known as the LXX (Latin: Liber Septuaginta), as it was written in Greek and was the primary text used by the Jewish community in Alexandria. The LXX was commissioned by Ptolemy II in the mid-3rd century BC, possibly to secure a copy of the Jewish Law for the royal library. The text was completed by Ptolemy III in the early 3rd century BC. The LXX is significant because it was the first known translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek, making it accessible to Greek-speaking Gentiles and influencing Christian theology and liturgy. The LXX differs from the Masoretic Text in the Hebrew Bible, and its influence extends beyond Judaism to early Christian texts, such as the New Testament.

15. Early Evidence of Dispersion in Alexandria

Alexandria, founded by Alexander the Great in 332 BC, was a center of Hellenism and became a major city in the Mediterranean world. During the Hellenistic period, Jews lived in Alexandria and other Greek cities, and their presence is reflected in the LXX, the Greek Bible translated from Hebrew. The LXX was completed around 200 BC and was commissioned by the Ptolemaic dynasty in Egypt, with the aim of producing a Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures suitable for the royal library in Alexandria. The translation was completed by Ptolemy III around 246 BC, and it was the first known translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek. The LXX was then employed by the early Christian church, and its influence extends beyond Judaism to early Christian texts, such as the New Testament.
op. cit., 667 ff; cf 649 ff). He has also made it extremely probable that long before St. Paul's day there was a strong body of Jews in Tarsus of Cilicia, and Jews held a notable position in Antioch and other cities in the Levant as early as 171 BC. "The Seleucid kings," he says, "led the Jews as an element of the colonies which they founded to strengthen their hold on Phrygia and other countries." But it is difficult to trace the profound influence they exerted in the development of their country from the fact that they adopted to such an extent Gr and Rom names and manners, and were thus almost indistinguishable. At Laodicea and Hierapolis there are many remains of Jewish presence: for example, at the latter place an inscription on a gravestone tells how the deceased Publius Aelius Glyron mortified a sum of money to provide for the decoration of his tomb every year at the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

The Dispersion among the Greeks proper had attained to considerable dimensions in the time of Christ. Philo, as noticed above, mentions Thessaly, Boeotia, Macedonia, Greece, Aetolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth and the Peloponnnesus as having Jewish inhabitants. Inscriptions recovered from Delphi and elsewhere relating to the manumission of slaves in the time of Constantine the Great (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 325 ff). In Sparta and Sicily, Jews lived in the days of the Maccabees (1 Mac 15 23). At Philippi we know from Acts 16 16 there was a prosauchoi, or place of prayer, and at Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth there were synagogues in St. Paul's time. On the islands of the Greek archipelago and the Mediterranean there were Jews. Cyprus, the home of Bar-nabas, had a large Jewish population; and Euboëa and Crete are named by Philo as Jewish centers. Rhodes has the distinction of having produced two opponents of Judaism in the first half of the 1st cent. BC. Clearchus of Soli, a disciple of Aristotle, introduces in one of his dialogues a Jew from Coele-Syria, Hellenic not in speech only but in mind, representing him as having come in his travels to Asia Minor and there conversed with Aristotle. Such an experience may have been rare so early; the incident may not be fact, but fiction; yet such as it is, it tells us something of the spread of Judaism.

The relations of Rome with the Jewish people lend special interest to the Dispersion there. Jews do not appear to have been settled in Rome before the Maccabean period, but there is a certain path in the appearance of Jewish Dispersion made to the Roman state by Judas Maccabaeus, amid the difficulties that were gathering round his position, for "a league of amity and confederacy" with the Rom people (1 Mac 8 17-32). His brother and successor, Jonathan, followed this up later (12 1-416). And in 140 BC Simon sent a delegation which concluded a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Rome, which was duly intimated by the Senate to their allies in various countries, esp. of the East. During the stay of the mission at Rome its members seem to have made attempts at religious propaganda, and the praetor Hecules compell them to return to their homes for attempting to corrupt Rom morals by introducing the worship of Jupiter Sabazius which is no doubt the Rom interpretation of the Lord of Hosts (Jehovah Sabaoth). But cre long in Rome, as in Alexandria, they formed a colony by themselves, occupying Trastevere, the Trastiberine portion of the city, together with an island in the Tiber. Their prosperity grew with their numbers. When Cicero in 59 BC was defending Flaccus he speaks of gold being sent out of Italy, and all the provinces, to Jerusalem, and there was present among his listeners a large body of Jews interested in the case. When Pompey had captured Jerus in 63 BC, he sold a number of Jewish captives. They were sold as slaves, but many of them received their freedom and rights to citizenship. When Julius Caesar, who was a great patron and protector of the Jews, died, the Jews wept over him for nights on end.

there was nevertheless at the heart of Judaism a missionary purpose, as we see from the universalism of the Ps and the Prophets. Judaism was burdened with a message which concerned all men, to the effect that there is one God, and that the spiritual Creator of heaven and earth, who had committed to the family of Abraham in trust for the world His Law. To witness for the Living God, and to proclaim His Law, was the chief element of the Jewish propaganda in the Roman empire, and their system of proselytism enabled them to gain adherents in numbers. In this the OT Scriptures and the observance of the Sabbath were important factors, and enabled them to win the adherence of intelligent and educated people.

That the Jews of the Dispersion had an internal organization with courts of their own, having considerable jurisdiction, not only in spiritual but in civil affairs, there is no doubt. This would only be in accordance with the analogy of their constitution as seen in the NT, and of their commercial organization in many lands to this day. In all the lands of their Dispersion the Jews never lost touch with their land of their forefathers, or Jerusalem, the city of the Great King. The bond of unity was maintained by the pilgrimages they made from all the countries where they were scattered to their great national feast; by the payment of the half-shekel toward the services of the Temple as long as it stood; and by their voluntary submission, so long as they had a national polity, to the decrees of the great Sanhedrin.

That Judaism was influenced in its Dispersion by contact of the larger world of life and thought in which the Jews had their place outside of Pal we can see by the example of Alexandria. It was there that it felt most powerfully the penetrating and pervasive influence of Graec thought, and the large apocyphal and apocalyptic lit. which sprang up there is one of the most notable results. The Alexandrian Jew was in reality both a Jew and a Greek; he held the faith of Jeh and sincerely worshipped the God of his fathers, but he spoke the Graec language, had received a Gra education, and had contracted many Gra ideas and habits. Still those in his position were Jews first, and Gra afterward, and on all the 'fundamentals' were in thorough sympathy with their Palestinian brethren (Fairweather, From the Exile to the Advent, 109 f).

The Jewish people thus widely distributed over the Rom world with their monothelism, with their Scriptures, and with their Messianic hopes, did much to prepare the way for the advent of the Redeemer who was to be the fulfilment of Jewish expectation and hope. It was due to the strange and unique influence of Judaism and to the circulation of the glowing visions of Israel's prophets among the nations, that there was so widespread an expectation, mentioned by Tacitus, by Suetonius and by Jos, that from Judaea would arise a Ruler whose dominion would be over all. It is now believed that Virgil's conception of the Better Age which was to be inaugurated by the birth of a child was derived from Isaiah's prophecies. And not only did the Jewish Dispersion thus prepare the way for the world's Redeemer in the fulness of the time, but when He had come and suffered and died and risen and ascended, it furnished a valuable auxiliary to the proclamation of the apostles and the first preachers traveled with the good news, they found Jewish communities to whom they offered first the great salvation. The synagogue services lent themselves most effectually to the ministry of St. Paul and his colleagues, and it was to the synagogues that they first reported the city they visited. Even to this day this preservation of "the dispersed of Israel" is one of the marvels of the Divine government of the world, proving the truth of the words of the prophetic angels: "I will sift the house of Israel among all the nations, like as grain is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least kernel fall upon the earth" (Am 9 9).

Divinities Divination

The ancient Greek, and later Roman, cosmology posited deities and other beings of various kinds with diverse powers. Among ancient peoples, divination, the process of predicting the future by interpreting omens, was a common practice. It often involved или examining natural phenomena, interpreting dreams, or consulting oracle chalices. Among the ancient Greeks, there were three main models: (1) the oracles of Apollo, (2) the seers, and (3) the natural signs of omens.

LITERATURE

Divination is the act of obtaining secret knowledge, esp. that which relates to the future, by means within the reach almost exclusively of special classes of men.

1. Definition

Of this there are two main species: (1) artificial, (2) inspirational, or, as it was called in ancient times (Cicero, Lord Bacon, etc), natural divination. Artificial divination depends on the skill of the agent in reading and in interpreting certain signs and omens. See divination. In inspirational or natural divination the agent is professedly under the immediate influence of some spirit or god who enables the diviner to see the future, etc, and to utter oracles embodying what he sees. Among the Romans artificial divination prevailed almost exclusively, the other having vogue largely among the Greeks, and the Jews, and also among certain classes of diviners in a more spiritual trend of the Gr mind. Yet that great Roman, Cicero, in his memorable treatise on Divination, says he agrees with those who take cognizance of these two distinct kinds of divination. As examples of inspirational divination he mentions man, dreaming or in a state of ecstasy (De Divinatione, i. 18). But though Cicero arranges diviners according to their pretensions, he does not believe in any supernatural communication. Thus he explains dreams on purely natural grounds, and says that psychologists would (op. cit. ii.63 ff). As a matter of fact Cicero was an atheist, or at least an agnostic.

The Lat word divination was confined almost exclusively to divination by outward signs, though its mythology (e.g. certain suggestions that it denoted originally the other kind—that due to the inspiration of superhuman beings. Chrysippus (d. at Athens 207 BC), though himself a Gr philosopher, defines the word in a way which would have convinced the Greeks to draw the same conclusions as moderns, including Cicero himself. "Divination," Cicero makes him say (op. cit. ii.63), is "a power in man which forsees and explains those signs which the gods throw in his way." The Greeks, were, on the other hand, much more interested in the idea of a supernatural world, and with it theoretical divination held at bay by the human mind. The Gr term for divination (hē) mantikē (hē mantikē tekhnē) has reference to the work of the mantis, and it hardly ever means divination in the lower sort—that by means of signs.

Underlying all methods of divination there lay the belief that certain superhuman spiritual beings (gods, spirits) possess the secret knowledge desired by men, and that, in certain conditions, they are willing to impart it.

Divination (1) The word "divination" itself, from deus, "god," or dīvus, "pertaining to god," carries with it the notion that the information obtained is hence from deity. Since, however, to mantikē implies that the message comes to the mantis from gods or spirits by way of inspiration.

(2) Astrology, or astracmy, is but one form of divination and it rests upon the ultimate belief that the heavenly bodies are deities controlling the destinies of men and revealing the future to those who have eyes to see. According to the Weltanschauung or conception of the universe advocated by Hugo Winckler, Alfred Jeremias (see The OT in the Light of the East) and others, terrestrial events are but shadows of the celestial realities (cf Plato's doctrine of ideas). These latter represented the mind of the gods (see Astrology secs. 1,2).

(3) On hepatoscopy, or divining from the liver, see below, 5, (2), (c).

(4) It can be proved that among the ancient peoples (Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc) the view prevailed that not only oracles but also omens of all kinds are given to men by the gods and express the minds of these gods.

Among the ancient Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans the diviner stood in the service of the state and was officially consulted before wars and other great enterprises were undertaken. But among these three peoples certain classes of diviners were prohibited by the government from exercising their calling, probably because they were supposed to be in league with the gods of other and hostile nations. The gods of a people were in the beliefs of the time the protectors of their people and therefore the foes of the foes of their protégés. It is on this account that witchcraft has been so largely condemned and punished (see WITCHCRAFT). Necromancy is uniformly forbidden in the OT (see Lev 19:31; Dt 18:11; Is 19:3; 22:20), probably on account of its connection with ancestor worship. But among other ancient peoples it was allowed and largely practised. Note that the Heb words טָהַר (Dt 18:11) "consultor with a familiar spirit" and "wizards" denote alike such persons as seek oracles from the spirits of the dead (see the present writer's Magic, Divination, and Demotionary among the Hebrews, 85 ff). The early Fathers believed that in the divination of heathenism we have the work of Satan who wished to discredit the true religion by producing phenomena among pagan races very similar to the prophetic marvels of the chosen people. This of course rests on a view of the OT prophet which makes him a "predictor" and little if anything more. See PROPHECY.

The attitude of the Bible toward divination is on the whole distinctly hostile and is fairly represented by Dt 18:10 ff, where the prophet of

5. The Yahweh is contrasted with diviners of Bible and Divination of all kinds as the only authorized medium of supernatural revelation. Yet note the following:

(1) Balaam (Nu 22-24) was a heathen diviner whose words of blessing and of cursing were believed to have magical force, and when his services are enlisted in the cause of Yahweh, so that, instead of cursing he blessed Israel, there is not a syllable of disapproval in the narrative.

(2) In Is 3:2 diviners are ranked with judges, warriors and prophets as pillars of the state. They are associated with prophets and seers in Jer 27:9; 29:8; Ezek 22:28 (cf 15:6-9; 12:24). It is true that the prophets and diviners mentioned in these passages use utter falsehoods, saying peace where there is none; all the same the men called prophets and diviners are classed together as similar functionaries.

Pure Yahwism in its very basal principle is and must ever have been antagonistic to divination of every kind, though inspirational divination has resemblances to prophetism and even affinities with it. It is true that the Bible speaks with two voices, generally prohibiting but at times countenancing various forms of divination. In the actual religion of the OT we have a syncretism in which, though Yahwism forms the substructure, there are constituents from the religions of the native aborigines and the nations around. The underlying thought in all forms of divination is that by employing certain means men are able to obtain knowledge otherwise beyond their reach. The religion of Israel made Yahweh the source of that knowledge and the prophet the medium through which it came to men. We have an analogous example of syncretism resulting in the union of opposite elements in ancient Zaratustraism (Zoroastrianism) which, though in its central principle inconsistent with divination by omens, yet took on from the native Turanian cults of Persia certain forms of divination, esp. that by lot (see Lenormant, La Divination, 22 ff).

But should it be forgotten that the Bible is a historical book, and that many writers, living at widely separated times, have been at work it is natural to look for diversity of teaching, though no one can deny that in fundamental matters Bible authors are wonderfully consistent.

For means of divination in vogue among the ancient Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc, see the relevant works and dictionary articles. The species of divination spoken of in the Bible may be arranged under two heads: (1) those apparently sanctioned, and (2) those condemned in the Bible.

6. Modes of Divination Mentioned in the Bible. (a) Methods of divination tacitly or expressly sanctioned in the Bible.—(a) The use of Balaam has already been cited. He was a Moabite and therefore a heathen soothsayer. His word of blessing or of curse is so potent that whether he blesses or curses his word secures its own realization. So far is his vocation from being esteemed that it is actually called into the service of Yahweh (see Nu 22:24).

(b) To dreams the Bible assigns an important place as a legitimate means of revealing the future. Such dreams are of two kinds:

(i) Involutary or such as come unsought. Even these are regarded as sent for guidance in human affairs. The bulk of the dreams spoken of in the Bible belong to this class: see Gen 20:3.6 (Abimelech); 28:21 (Jacob); 37:5-9 (Joseph; see ASTRONOMY, II, 6); 50:21 (Pharaoh's butler and baker); 41:1-53 (Pharaoh); 7:14-9 (Gideon and an unnamed man); Dn 1:17 (Daniel had understanding of dreams); Dn 2:1-49 (Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its interpretation by Daniel); Mt 1:20; 2:13,19 ff (Joseph, king of the land of Magdala the virgin); 27:19,20 David's dream; 29:25 ff, where the lawfulness of prophetic dreams is assumed (cf ver 32, where "lying dreams" imply genuine ones). In the document usually ascribed by modern critics to the Elohist (E), dreams bulk largely as those above examples serve to show. Among the Babylonians belief in the significance of dreams gave rise to a science (oneiroscopy) so elaborate that only special interpreters called seers (sing, barsu) were considered able to explain them (see Lenormant, op. cit., 143, for examples).

(ii) The other species of dreams consists of such as are induced by what is called "incubation," i.e. by sleeping in a sacred place where the god or gods of the place is believed to reveal his secrets to the sleeper. Herodotus (iv.172) says that the Nasa- monians, an Egyptian tribe, used to practise divination by sleeping in the graves of their ancestors. The dreams which then came to them were understood to be revelations of their deified ancestors. See ESHBACH, S.P. 1:18, 19ff. See also DREAM, DREAMER.

(b) But the Bible appears in some places to give its approval to some kinds of artificial or (as it may be called) omens.

(c) Sortilege or divination by lot. The use of the lot as a means of ascertaining the will of Deity is referred to at least without expressed censure, and, as the present writer thinks, with tacit approval, in many parts of the Bible. It was by lot that Aaron decided which of the two goats was to be for Yahweh and which for Azzazel (Lev 16:7-10). It was by lot that the land of Canaan was divided after the conquest (Nu 26:56 ff; Josh 18, 19). For other Bible instances see Jos 18:1-31; 21:1-43; Jud 5:7; 6:6 ff, 13:2; 24:5 ff; 26:25 ff; 28:13 ff; Est 3:7 ("They cast Pur, that is, the lot"); see Century Bible in loc.; Neh 10:34; 11:1; Jer 1:7 ("The lot fell upon Joshua"); Mt 27:35; Acts 1:26. In the Urim and Thummim (q.v.), as explained by the Talmud scholars, the lot is applied, for these two words, though etymologically still obscure, stand for two objects (pebbles), one denoting "yes" or its equivalent, and the other "no." Whenever the high priest took from his ephod was decided, and an answer was given by casting the lot. In all cases it is taken for granted that the lot cast was an expression and indication of the Divine will. See AUGURY, IV, 3.

(6) Hydromancy, or divination by water. In Gen. 20:1 Joseph is reputed as practising this kind of divination, and not a word of disapproval is expressed. See AUGURY, IV, 2.

(7) We read in the OT of other signs or omens which are implicitly approved of, thus Jgs 6:36-40 (Gideon's fleece). Jonathan decides whether or not he is to attack the Philistines by the words which he may happen to hear them speak.

(2) Modes of divination condemned.—The following methods of divination are explicitly or implicitly condemned in the OT:

(a) Astrology. See ASTROLOGY.

(b) Rhodanomy, or the use of the divining rod, referred to apparently in Hos 4:12 (which may be paraphrased: "My people ask counsel of a bit of wood, and the rod made thereof answers their questions"); Ezek 8:17 ("They put a rod [EV "the branch"] to their nose").

(c) By an examination of the liver of animals; see Ezek 21:21. This mode of divining, hepatoscopy, was quite widespread among the Babylonians, Greeks, Romans, etc., of the ancient world, and it is still in vogue in Borneo, Burmah and Uganda. We have no evidence that it was practised among the Israelites, for in the ancient passage it is the king of Babylonia (Nebuchadnezzar) who is said to have "looked in the liver."

Opinions differ as to how the state of the liver could act as an omen. Jastrow says the liver was considered to be the seat of life, and that where the liver of the animal sacrificed (generally a sheep) was accepted, it took on the character of the deity to whom it was offered. The soul of the animal as seen in the liver became then a refector of the soul of the god (see R.B., XX, 102 f.). On the other hand, Alfred Jeremias says that in the view of the ancient Babylonians the lines and forms of the sheep's liver were regarded as reflecting the universe and its history (The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, 1:61). Neither of these explanations is made probable by its advocates.

(d) By teraphim (of Teraphim); see I Sam 15:23; Ezek 21:21; Zec 10:2.

(e) Necromancy, or consulting the dead; see Lev 19:18; 20:6; Deut 18:11; Isa 8:19; 19:3; see above.

(f) Divination through the sacrifice of children by burning (see Deut 18:10). The context makes it almost certain that the words "tr"("that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire" [EV]; but read and render "that burns his son or his daughter in the fire") refer to a mode of obtaining an oracle (cf. 2 K. 3:27). The Phoenicians and Carthaginians sacrificed their children to Kronos in times of grave national danger or calamity (Porphyry Apud Euseb. Praep. Ev. 16.44; Diod. Sic. xx.14).

These are examined in detail in T. Witton Davies' Magic, Divination, and Demonology among the Hebrews and Their Neighbors. See also:

7. Terms. The art, "Divination" in EB by the Used in the same sense. The following brief notes the OT in which suffice here.

Connection (1) דַּעַת, ēṣem, generally rendered with "divination," is a general term for divination of all kinds. In Ezek 21:21 [26] it stands for divination by arrows while in 1 S 28: 14 it is used of divination through the medium of an "āḵār ("familiar spirit"). On the derivation of the word see EB, art. "Magic," § 3.

2. מְמַסְתַּן, mēm'stān, probably from a Semit root (of Arab. "anna") which denotes to emit a hoarse nasal sound such as was customary in reciting the prescribed formula (see CHARM). For "oak of the mēm'stān" see AUGURY'S Oak. Some say the word means one who smiles with the evil eye," making the term a denominative from "apog, "eye." The usual rendering in AV is pl. "observers of times" and in RV "those that practise augury" (Deut 18:10).

(3) The vb. בָּשַׁק, nihēšāh, of which בָּשַׁק, bēššēq, is but a variant, is probably a denominative from בַּשָּׁק, bēššēq, "a serpent," (l and n interchange in Heb), denoting "to hiss," "to whisper" (like a serpent), then "to utter divinatory formulae. As it is used for so many kinds of divination, W. R. Smith concludes that it came to be a general term for the divine. Part of the vb. is tr""enchanter" in Deut 18:10, the cognate vb., "to use enchantments" in Lev 19:26; 2 K. 21:6; 2 Chr 33:6, and the corresponding noun "enchantment" in Num 23:23; 24:1.

(4) מְקַטֵּר, gāzārin, lit., "cutters," i.e. such as kill (in Arab, the cognate vb. = "to slaughter") for the purpose of examining the liver or entrails as omens. Perhaps the etymology implies "sacrifice," animals being sacrificed is implied, as it is here (cf. the word "innovation" occurs only in Dn. 2:27; 4:7; 4:5; 5:7; 11:31). We have seen the word "tr"soothsayers." Some think they were "astrologers," the etymology in that case referring to the dividing of the heavens with a view, by casting the horoscope, to forecasting the future.

(5) מְאָסָר, mē'asār (AV "astrologer," RV "enchanter"), occurs only in Dn. 11:3 in the Heb (1:20; 2:2) and in the Aram. (2:10; 4:4 [7], etc.) parts of the book. The term is probably taken from the Bab and denotes a magician and esp. an exorcist rather than a diviner.

(6) קָשַׁק, kāśāq, the same word as the Gr Chadadaios (Xαιδαδαιος) (EV "Chadadai"), denotes in Dn. 1:4, etc. where alone it occurs, not the people so designated but a class of astrologers. This usage (common in classical writers) arose after the fall of the Bab empire, when the only Chaldaeans known were astrologers and soothsayers. See further Magic. For "spirit of divination" (Acts 16:16) see Pyton; Philippi.

Inspirational divination and OT prophecy have much in common. Both imply the following conditions: (1) the primitive instinct that creates for secret knowledge of the future; (2) the belief in certain spiritual beings who are willing on certain terms to impart it; (3) such secret knowledge is imparted generally to special classes of men (rarely women) called diviners or (Bab) seers and prophets.

Many anthropologists (Tytor, Frazer, etc.) and OT scholars (Wellhausen, W. Robertson Smith, etc.) consider prophecy to be but an outgrowth and higher form of divination. The old theologians almost to a man, and a goodly number of moderns, take precisely the opposite view, that divination is a corruption of prophecy. Probably neither view is strictly true. Sometimes in human life we find evidences of progress from lower to higher. Sometimes the process is the very reverse. It is important to take notice of the differences as well as the resemblances between the diviner and the prophet.

(1) The OT prophet believes in a personal God whose spokesmen he considers himself to be. When he spoke or wrote it was because he was, at least professedly, inspired and informed by Yahweh. "Thus says Yahweh," was the usual formula with which he introduced his oracles. The Gr and Rom mantis, on the other hand, worked himself up to the necessary ecstatic state by music, drugs (intoxication), and smoke (like). Sometimes it has been thought a sufficient means of divination to swallow the vital portions of birds and beasts of omen. It was believed that by eating the hearts of crows, or moles, or of hawks, men look into their bodies the preexisting soul of the creature (Frazier, Golden Bough, II, 355).

(2) The mantis practised his art as a remunerative occupation, charging high fees and refusing in most cases to ply his calling without adequate remuneration. The local oracle shrines (Delphi, Clavus, etc.) were worked for personal and political ends. The OT prophet, on the other hand, claimed to speak as he was bidden by his God. It was with him a matter of conviction as to what lives men ought to live, what state of heart they should cultivate. So far from furthering his own material interests, as he could by saying what kings and other dignitaries wished to hear, he boldly denounced the sins of the time, even when, as often, he had to condemn the conduct of kings and the policies of governments. Look, for example, at Isaiah's fearless condemnation of the conduct of Ahaz in summoning the aid of Assyria (Isa 7 ff.), and at the scathing words with which Jeremiah censured the doings of the nation's leaders in his day (Jer 22). By both these noble prophets suffered severely for their courage, esp. Jeremiah, who stands out as perhaps the finest recorded example of what, in the face of formidable opposition, the religious teacher ought ever to be. Of Micaiah, King Ahab of Israel said, "I hate him; for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil." What reward did this prophet have for his fidelity to his conscience and his God? Imprisonment (1 K 22:1–35). Had he pleased the king by predicting a happy, prosperous future that was never to be, he would have been clothed in gorgeous robes and lodged in a very palace.

DIVISION, di-vizh'vn: Used in EV in the following senses:

(1) A separate body of people (a) of the tribal divisions of Israel (Josh 11:23; 12:17; 18:10); (b) of sects. A tribe was "the divisions of Reuben" (Josh 5:16,16 AV), but RV rightly substitutes "the watercourses of Reuben"; in Job 30:17 the same word is rendered "rivers"; (c) of the (late) organization of priests and Levites into classes or families who ministered in the temple in rotation, the 12th "courses" generally met and always in RV (1 Ch 24:1; 36:12,19; Neh 11; cf 2 Ch 35:5). Much prominence is given by the Chronicler to the 24 classes of priests, singers, and doorkeepers, who served in turns in the temple (cf Lk 1:58).

(2) Separation, distinction: "I will put a division (RV sign) of Israel between my people and thy people" (Ex 8:23). The Heb word here is pashhuth "rason," "resonation," "resounding" (cf Ps 119:9), but the reading is doubtful. AV and RV follow LXX. SYR and Vulg, which render "set a distinction," perhaps on the basis of a different reading from that of our Heb text.

(3) In the NT, dissension, disunion, schism (Lk 19:51; Rom 16:17; 1 Cor 3:3 AV, omitted in RV; 1 Cor 1:10; 11:18; Gal 5:20).

DIVORCE, di-vor's, IN OT: Woman, among the Hebrews, as among most nations of antiquity, occupied a subordinate position. The Heb wife and mother was treated somewhat more considerately than her sister in other lands, even in other Sem countries, her position nevertheless was one of inferiority and subjection. The marriage relation from the standpoint of Heb legislation was looked upon very largely as a business affair, a mere question of property. A wife, nevertheless, was, indeed, in most homes in Israel, the husband's private property, and while this is true, the husband was unconditionally and unreservedly the head of the family in all domestic relations. His rights and prerogatives were manifest on every side. Nowhere is this more evident than in his rights in the case of divorce. According to the laws of Moses a husband, under certain circumstances, might divorce his wife; on the other hand, if at all possible, it was certainly very difficult for a wife to put away her husband. Unfortunately a double standard of morality in matters pertaining to the sexes is, at least, as old as Moses (see Ex 21:7–11).

The OT law concerning divorce, apparently quite clear, is recorded most fully in Dt 24:1 ff. A 2. Law of nevertheless, convince anyone that Divorce: there are difficulties of interpretation. Dt 24:1–4 The careful reader will notice that the laws of divorce in the AV and RV differ materially. AV reads in the second part of vers 1: "then let him write a bill," etc., RV has "that he shall write," etc., while the Heb original has neither "then" nor "that," but the simple conjunction "and." There is certainly no need of a written "bill" of Moses, but, on the other hand, a clear purpose to render the proceeding more difficult in the case of the husband. Moses' aim was "to regulate and thus to mitigate an evil which he could not extirpate." The twofold matter of divorce, as far as possible, to favor the wife, and to protect her from an unceremonious expulsion from her home and children. As already suggested, marriage among the Hebrews, as among most Orientals, was more a legal contract than the expression of love or

3. Marriage affection. It would be, however, a Legal great mistake to assume that deep love

Contract was not often present, for at all times the domestic relations of the Heb married couple have compared most favorably with those of any other people, ancient or modern. In its last analysis it was, nevertheless, a business transaction. The husband or his family had, as a rule, to pay a certain dowry to the parents or guardians of the betrothed before the marriage was consummated. A wife thus acquired could easily be regarded as a piece of property, which, without great difficulty, could be disposed of in case the husband, for any reason, were disposed to rid himself of an ungenial companion and willing to forfeit the mohar which he had paid for his wife. The advantage was always with the husband, and yet a wife was not utterly helpless, for she, too, though practically without legal rights, could make herself so tolerably burdensome and hateful in the home that almost no husband would gladly avail himself of his prerogatives and write her a bill of divorce. Thus, though a wife could not divorce her husband, she could force him to divorce her.

The following words of Professor Israel Abrahams, Cambridge, England, before "the Divorce Commission" (London, November 21, 1910), are to the point: "In all such cases where the wife was concerned, as the moving party she could only demand that her husband should divorce her. The common term used in the Bible for divorce is גֶּהֶל, geheł, and the verb גָּהַל, gehal, "the sending away of a wife" (De 24:1). We never heard of "the sending away of a husband." The fem. part., גֶּהֶלַּת, gehalâth, "the woman thrust out," is the term applied to a divorced woman. The masc. form is not found.
Divorce in OT

Divorce in NT

The Mosaic law apparently, on the side of the husband, made it as difficult as possible for him to divorce his wife. 5. Process—ceremoniously and capriciously dismiss his wife without the semblance of a trial. In case one became dissatisfied with his wife, (1) he had to write her a bill or document (q.v.) drawn up by some constituted legal authority and in due legal form. In the very nature of the case, such a tribunal would use moral suasion to induce an adjustment; and, failing in this, would see to it that the law in the case assumed or authorized by the law, which would be upheld. (2) Such a bill or decree must be placed in the hand of the divorced wife. (3) She must be forced to leave the premises of her former husband. Divorce was denied two classes of husbands: (1) The man who had falsely accused his wife of actual infidelity (Dt 22:13 ff), and (2) a person who had seduced a virgin (Dt 22:28 f). In addition, a heavy penalty had to be paid to the father of such damsel.

It is probable that a divorced wife who had not contracted a second marriage or had been guilty of adultery might be reunited to her husband. But in case she had married the second time she was forever barred from returning to her first husband, even if the second husband had divorced her or had died (Dt 24:3 f).

Such a law would serve as an obstacle to hasty divorces.

Divorces from the earliest times were common among the Hebrews. All rabbis agree that a separation, though not desirable, was quite lawful. The only source of dispute among them was as to what constituted a valid reason or just cause.

The language in Dt 24:1 has always been in dispute. The Heb words, אֶרֶם וּדַבָּר, earowdâbâr, on which a correct interpretation depends, are used in two senses: "a divorce or divorcement" (Gesenius, Hebr. Wörterbuch) and "a divorce or adulteress." The latter is the meaning of Dt 24:1 where the phrase troubled the Jewish rabbis of olden times, as it does Jewish and Christian commentators and translators in our day. AV renders the words, "some uncleanness, and in the margin, "matter of nakedness." The latter, though a literal tr of the Heb, is quite unintelligible. RV and ARV both have: "some unseemly thing." Professor Driver translates the same words "some indecency." The Ger. RV (Kautzsch) has "etwas Widerwürdiges" ("something repulsive"). We know of no modern version which makes "erewath dâbâr" the equivalent of fornication or adultery. And, indeed, in the very nature of the case, we are forced to make the words apply to a minor fault or crime, for, by the Mosaic law, the penalty for adultery was death (Dt 22:20 f). It is, however, in line with his nation, still, "the penalty will ever be enforced. It is well known that at, and some time before, the time of our Saviour, there were two schools among the Jewish rabbis, that of Shammay and that of Hillel. Shammay and his followers maintained that "erewath dâbâr" signified nothing less than uncleahess or adultery, and argued that only this crime justified a man in divorcing his wife.

Hillel and his school insisted that the penalty would only be enforced. They placed great stress upon the words, "if she find no favor in his eyes" immediately preceding "erewath dâbâr" (Dt 24:1), and contended that divorce should be granted for the slightest reason: such as the presence of a dish or a bit of grass, or careless seasoning. Some of the rabbis boldly taught that a man had a perfect right to dismiss his wife, if he found another woman whom he liked better, or who was more beautiful (Mish. Gittins, 14:10). Here are some other points taken from the same book: "The following women may be divorced: She who violates the Law of Moses, e.g. causes her husband to eat food which has not been tithed . . . . She who vows, but does not keep her vow . . . . She who goes out on the street with her hair loose, or spins in the street, or converses [flirt] with any man, or is a noisy woman. What is a noisy woman? It is one who speaks in her own house so loud that the neighbors may hear her." It was easy to extend such a doctrine as the Mish and rabbinic writings are full of such laws.

From what has been said, it is clear that adultery was not the only valid reason for divorce. Besides, the word adultery had a peculiar significance in Jewish law, as it was recognized as an element in matrimony and as proof of uncleanliness or unchastity. Thus a Hebrew might have two or more wives or concubines, and might have intercourse with a slave or bondwoman, even if not married, without being guilty of adultery (Lev 19:20), for adultery, according to Jewish law, was possible only when a man dishonored his "free wife" of a Hebrew (20:10 f).

Divorcement, Bill of: This expression, found in Dt 24:1-3: Is 50:1; Jer 3:8 is the tr of the Heb נְבֵיהָנָא, nevēyahānāa, "mutterer of a bill of divorce." The two words, lit. rendered, signify a document or book of cutting off, i.e. a certificate of divorce given by a husband to a wife, so as to afford her the opportunity or privilege of marrying another man. The Heb term is rendered by the LXX μανάσπις, manaspîs, "writ of divorcement," and rendered "writ of divorcement" in AV, but Mt 19:7 AV has "writing," while RV and ARV have "bill." The certificate of divorce is called לְטָהָר, leṭâhâr, "covenant," in the Talm. There is an entire chapter devoted to the subjects in the Mish. It is not positively known when the practice of divorce by bills of divorcement commenced, but there are references to such documents in the earliest times. There is a clear fact that Joseph had in mind the putting away of his esposed wife, Mary, without the formality of a bill or at least of a public procedure prescribed by the law, but not regarded as absolutely necessary (Mt 19:10). The following were the usual methods of dissolution:

"On the—the day of the—week—in the—month—in the year—from the beginning of the world, according to the common computation in the province of—\[who\]—the son of—by whatever name I may be known, of the town of—by whatever name thou art called, of the town—who hath been my wife hitherto: But now I have dismissed thee—the daughter of—by whatever name thou art called, of the town—who hath been my wife hitherto. Let this be thy bill of divorcement from me, a writing of separation and expulsion, according to the law of Moses and Israel. . . . the son of—, witness; witness. . . . the son of—, witness. . . . the son of—, witness. . . . the son of—, witness. . . . the son of—, witness. . . . the son of—, witness. . . . the son of—, witness. . . . the son of—, witness. . . . the son of—, witness.

Spiritual application.—The Heb practices regarded as offenses, not only as the father and king of the cooking people, and thus entitled to perfect obedience and loyalty on their part, but they conceived of Him as a husband married to Israel. Isaiah, speaking to the wicked Maker is thy husband; Jehovah of hosts is his name" (Is 5:5). This is peculiarly true too makes use of similar language in the following: "Return, O backsliding children, saith Jehovah; for I am a husband unto you" (3:14). It is perfetely natural that NT writers should have regarded Christ’s relation to His church under the same figure. Paul in 2 Cor says: “I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a pure virgins to Christ” (11 2); see also Mt 9 15; Jn 3 29; Rev 19 7. Any unfaithfulness or sin on the part of Israel was regarded as spiritual adultery, which necessarily broke off the spiritual ties, and divorced the nation from God (Isa 1 21; Ezek 16 22; Rev 2 22). See also MARRIAGE.

DIVORCE IN NT (τὸ ἀπόστασιν, τὸ ἀποστάσιον:). The Scripture doctrine of divorce is very simple. It is contained in Mt 19 3–12.

We are not called upon to treat of divorce in the Mosaic legislation (Dt 24 1–4). That was passed upon by Jesus in the above discussion and by Him ruled out of existence in His system of religion. After Jesus had spoken as above, the Mosaic permission of divorce became a dead letter. There could not be practice under it among His disciples. So such OT divorces is now a mere matter of anti-quarian curiosity.

It may be of interest in passing to note that the drift of the Mosaic legislation was restrictive of a freedom of divorce that had been practised before its enactment. It put in legal proceedings to bar the personal will of one of the parties. It recognized marriage as a social institution which should not be disrupted without reference to the rights of society. The restrictive word “the lady is become our tutor to bring us unto Christ” (Gal 3 24). But here, in numerous other instances, Christ went behind the enactments to primitive original principles whose recognition would make the law of none effect, because no practice was to be permitted under it. Thus the OT is disposed of.

Of course what Jesus said will dominate the New. In fact, Jesus is the only author in the NT who has treated of divorce. It has been thought that Paul had the Bible in hand. But we shall find on examination, farther along, that he did not. We need then look nowhere but to this 19th ch of Mt for the Scripture doctrine of divorce.

True, we have other reports of what Jesus said (Mk 10 12), but in Mt 19, we have the fuller report, containing everything that is reported elsewhere and one or two important observations that the other writers have not included. Lk has but one verse where Mt has ten. Lk’s ver is in no necessary connection with context. It seems to be a mere memorandum among others of the spiritual or ethical teachings of Christ. Luke however caught the gist of the whole teaching about divorce in recording the prohibition to put away one woman and marry another. The records in Mt 19 and Mk 10 cover one and the same occasion. But there is nothing in Mk that is not in Mt: and the latter contains nearly a third more of text than the former. There is nothing, however, which is not in Ml, save the clause “except for fornication.” That exception will be considered later. We therefore need but to be justified here in saying that the total doctrine of the Scripture pertaining to divorce is contained in Mt 19.

Attention must be called to the fact that in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5 27–32), Jesus treated of divorce, and that in every essential particular it agrees with the elaboration in ch 19. Jesus there as plainly as in the argument with the Pharisees put Moses’ permission of divorce under severe limitation and thus treated the putting away of one partner to marry another person to be adultery. The same point is made plain in the absolute condition in the text of the Sermon on the Mount.

We have then a summary of the NT doctrine of divorce stated by Christ Himself as follows: “Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery” (Mt 19 9). This puts Him in line with the ideal of the monogamic, indissoluble family which pervades the whole of the OT.

It may be well here to treat of the exception which Christ made to the universal practice of divorce. It is a difficult matter to invade the psychology of writers who lived nearly two thousand years ago and tell why they did not include something practical under which someone else did in his. Neither Luke nor Mark were personal disciples of the Lord. They wrote at second hand. Matthew was a personal disciple of Christ and hes twice recorded the exception. It will be a new position in regard to judgment on human evidence when we put the silence of ancestors in rank above the twice expressed report of one in all probability present—one known to be a close personal attendant.

This may be said: Matthew’s record stands in ancient MS authority, Greek and also the Versions. And on this point let it be noted that the testimony of the MSS was up before the English and American revisers, and they have deliberately removed the text of 1611 and given us the exception in Christ’s rule in each place (Mt 5 32; 19 9). This makes the matter as nearly rēs adjudicata as can be done by human wisdom.

Let us consider the rationality of the exception. That feature has had scant attention from theologians and publicists, yet it will bear the closest scrutiny. In fact it is a key to much that is explanatory of the basic principle of the family. To begin with, the exception is not on its face a text thought of some transcription, but was called out by the very terms of the question of the Pharisees: “Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?” This plainly called for a specification from Jesus of exceptions which he would allow to the rule against divorce. It is fortunate that the Pharisees asked the question in the form they did, for that put on Jesus the necessity of enumerating such exceptions as he would allow. He mentioned one, and but one to reply. That puts the matter of exceptions under the rule in logic: Expressio unius exclusio alterius. All other pretences for divorce were deliberately swept aside by Christ—a fact that should be remembered when other causes are sought to be foisted in alongside this one allowed by Christ. The question may come up, Whose insight is likely to be truest?

Why, then, will reason stand by this exception? Because adultery is per se destructive of monogamic family life. Any adultery is, guilt: and a guilty party has taken another person into family relation. Children may be born to that relation—are born to it. Not to allow divorce in such case is to force an innocent party in marriage to live in a polygamous state. There is the issue stated so plainly that “the wayfaring man need not err therein,” and “he who runs may read,” and “he who reads may run.”

It is the hand of an unerring Master that has made fornication a ground for divorce from the bond of matrimony and limited divorce to that single cause. Wherever we understand the Saviour’s direction we land in polygamy. The society that allows by its statutes divorce for any other cause than the one that breaks the monogamic bond, is simply acting in aid of polygamy, consecutive if not concomitant.

Advocates of the freedom of divorce speak of the above view as “the ecclesiastical.” That is an attempt to use the argument ad invadam. The church of Christ held and holds its views, not because of that, but because Christ taught it, and that in His teaching we have a statement out of the righteousness, wisdom, insight and rationality of the all-wise God.

Paul is the only other NT author besides Christ who has been supposed to treat of divorce. But a careful examination of Paul’s writing will disclose the fact that he has nowhere discussed the question—for what cause or causes a man might put away his wife. In every case where Numbers under marriage to another person. If Paul has treated of divorce at all it is in 1 Cor. 7. But even a careless reading of that chapter will disclose the fact that Paul is not discussing the question for what causes marriage might be disrupted, but the question of manners and morals in the relation. Paul has not modified Christ in any respect. It has been supposed that in ver 15 Paul has allowed divorce to a believing partner who has been deserted by one uncircumcised. But there is not a single word which can be said in defense of this.

If the unbelieving departeth, let him depart: the brother or the sister is not under bondage [dedololástas] in such cases: but God hath called us in peace.

To say that a deserted partners “hath not been married” is not to say that he or she may be re-married. What is meant is easily inferred from the spirit that dominates the whole chapter, and that is that everyone shall accept the situation in which God has called him just as he is. “Be quiet” is a direction that hovers over every situation. If you are married, so remain. If unmarried, so remain. If an unbelieving partner departs, let him or her desert. So remain. “God hath called us in peace. Nothing can be more beautiful in the morals of the marriage relation than the direction given by Paul in this chapter for the conduct of all parties in marriage in all trials.

Many reasons might be given why Paul could not have given liberty of remarriage, besides the one we have already given in his text; but attention should be called to the fact that such an assumption of authority in divorce would soon have brought him into conflict with the Roman government. Paul’s claim that he was a Rom citizen was of some value to himself. Would not some Roman citizen have claimed to scrutinize pretty closely Paul’s right to issue a decree of divorce against him because he had “departed” from a wife who had become a Christian? There would be two sides to such divorces. Would not Paul, careful, shrewd, polite as he was, have known that, and have avoided an open rupture with a government that did not tolerate much interference with its laws? That neither Paul nor anyone else put such construction upon his language, is evidenced by the fact that there is no record in history of a single case where it was attempted for 400 years after Paul was in his grave, and the Roman Empire had for a century been Christian. There were about 400 years more before we find the suggestion repeated. That no use was ever made of such construction of Paul in the whole era of the adjustment of Christianity with heathenism is good evidence that it was never there to begin with.

So we shall pass Paul as having in no respect modified the doctrine of divorce laid down by Christ in Mt. 19.

In all civilized countries the machinery of legislation and law can always be open for removal or relief of troubles in marriage without proceeding to its annulment. If a father is cruel to his children, we do not abolish the parental relation. If a man deserts his wife and she is left to support herself and children, we do not put her to the necessity of living in sin. If a man deserts his wife and she is left to support herself and children, we do not put her to the necessity of living in sin. If a man deserts his wife and she is left to support herself and children, we do not put her to the necessity of living in sin. If a man deserts his wife and she is left to support herself and children, we do not put her to the necessity of living in sin.

dōdakō, always tr “teaching” in RV, except in Rom 16 17, where “doctrine” is retained in the text and “teaching” inserted in m = (a) the act
1. Meaning of teaching (Mk 4 2; Acts 2 42, AV “doctrine”); (b) what is taught (Jn 10 35; Rev 2 14.15.24, AV “doctrine”). In some places the meaning is ambiguous as between (a) and (b) and in Mt 7 28; Mk 1 22; Acts 13 12, the manner, rather than the act or matter of teaching is denoted, namely, with authority and power.

The meaning of these words in the NT varied as the church developed the content of its experience into a system of thought, and came to regard such a system as an integral part of saving faith (cf the development of the meaning of the term “faith”):

1. The doctrines of the Pharisees were a fairly compact and definite body of teaching, a fixed tradition handed down from one generation of teachers to another (Mt 16 12, AV “doctrine”, cf Mt 16 9; Mk 7 7). (2) In contrast with the Pharisaic system, the teaching of Jesus was unconventional and occasional, discursive and unsystematic; it derived its power from His personality, character and works, more than from His words, so that His contemporaries were astonished at it and recognized it as a new teaching (Mt 7 28; 22 33; Mk 1 22.27; Lk 4 32). So we find it in the Synoptic Gospels, and the more systematic form given to it in the Johannine discourses is undoubtedly the work of the evangelist who wrote rather to interpret Christ than to record His epissima verba (Jn 20 31).

The earliest teaching of the apostles consisted essentially of three propositions: (a) that Jesus was the Christ (Acts 3 18); (b) that He was raised from the dead (Acts 2 22; 3 16). While proclaiming these truths, it was necessary to coordinate them with Heb faith, as based upon OT revelation. The method of the earliest reconstruction may be gathered from the speeches of Peter and Stephen (Acts 2 14-36; 5 29-32; 7 2-53). A more thorough reconstruction of the coordination of the Christian facts, not only with Heb history but with universal history, and within a view of the world as a whole, was undertaken by Paul. Both types of doctrine are found in his speeches in Acts, the former type in that delivered at Antioch (13 16-41), and the latter in the speeches delivered in Lystra (14 15-17) and at Athens (17 22-31). The ideas given in outline in these speeches are more fully developed into a doctrinal system, with its center removed from the resurrection to the death of Christ, in the epistles, esp. in Gal, Rom, Eph, Phil and Col. But as yet it is the theological system of one teacher, and there is no sign of any attempt to impose it by authority on the church as a whole. As a matter of fact the Pauline system never was generally accepted by the church. Of James and the Apostolic Fathers.

In the Pastoral and General Epistles a new state of things appears. The repeated emphasis on “sound” or “healthy doctrine” (1 Tim 1 10; 6 3; 2 Tim 1 13; 4 3; Tit 1 9; 2 1), “good doctrine” (1 Tim 4 6) implies that a body of teaching had now emerged which was generally accepted, and which should serve as a standard of orthodoxy. The faith has become a body of truth “once for all delivered unto the saints” (1 Tim 3 16). Thus the meaning of the term “sound doctrine” is now formally given, but it is a probable inference that it corresponded very nearly to the Rom formula that became known as the Apostles’ Creed. See Dogma.

DOCUS, dō’kus. See Dok.

DODAI, dō’dài, dō’dā-i (1 Ch 27 4). See Dodo.

DODANIM, dō’dā-nim (דֶּדֶהוֹנֵמ, dō’dāhôm, “leaders”): In Gen 10 4, the son of Javan, the son of Japheth. This would place the Dodanim among the Ionians. The passage I Ch 1 7, with the LXX and S, has, however, “Rodanim,” which is probably the true reading. This identifies the people with the Rhodians (cf on Ezk 27 15 under DEDAN).

DODAVAHU, dō-dav’ā-hū (דֶּדֶהוֹדָהוֹב, dō’dāhovbh, “loved of God”; AV Dodavah): Father of Eleazar of Maresnah, a prophet in the days of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20 37).

DODAI, dō’dā, DODAI (דֶּדֶה, dō’dāh, dō’dāhov, “beloved”):
1. The grandfather of Tola of the tribe of Issachar, one of the judges (Jgs 10 1).
2. “The Ahohite,” father of Eleazar, one of David’s heroes, and (2 S 23 9; 1 Ch 11 12) himself the commander of one of the divisions of the army (1 Ch 27 4).
3. The Bethlehemite, father of Elhanan, one of David’s mighty men (2 S 23 24; 1 Ch 11 26).

DOE, dō. See DEER.

DOEG, dō’èg (דֶּק, dō’èkh, “anxious,” “cared for”): “The Edomite,” a servant of Saul, who watched David’s intercourse with the priest Ahimelech, then denounced the priest to the king, and later executed his command to slay the priests at Nob. The position he held is described as that of “the mightiest” of S’s herdsmen (1 S 21 7 m). LXX reads: “tending the mules.” Rabbinical legends speak of him as the greatest scholar of his time. The traditional title of Ps 52 associates the composition of that Ps with the events that led to the slaying of the priests (1 S 21 7; 22 9.18.22).

DOG (דָּג, kelekh; [cf Arab. kelb, “dog”]; κῦκος, kúkos; and dimin. κυκνοσ, kundrian): References to the dog, both in the OT and in the NT, are usually of a contemptuous character. A dog, and esp. a dead dog, is used as a figure of insignificance. Go’ath says to David (1 S 17 43): “Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?” David says to Saul (1 S 24 14): “After whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog, after a fowl.” Mephibosheth says to David (2 S 9 8): “Thou art thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?” The same figure is found in the words of Hazael to Elisha (2 K 8 13). The meaning, which is obscure in AV, is brought out well in RV: “But what is thy servant, who is but a dog, that he should do this great thing?" The characteristically oriental interrogative form of these expressions should be noted.

Other passages express by inference the low esteem in which dogs are held. Nothing worse could happen to a man than that his body should be devoured by dogs (1 K 14:11; 16:4; 21:19,23, etc.). Job 31 says of the youth who deride him that he disdained to set their fathers with the dogs of his flock. In Phil 3:2 and Rev 22:15, dogs are contrasted with the righteous, with Christ, etc. In Mt 7:6 we read: "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast your pearls before the swine."

Job 30:1 refers to the use of dogs to guard flocks; and the comparison of inefficient watchdogs with dumb dogs (Isa. 56:10) implies that at least some dogs are useful. In the apocryphal Book of Tob, Tobiah's dog is his companion on his travels (Tob 5:16; 11:4; on this see Ezech T, XI, 258; HDB, IV, 898; Geiger, Civilization of E. Iranians, I, 86 ff.).

There is further reference to the greyhound (Prov 30:15), Ev. 7:9, which are "stately in their going.") But the rendering, "greyhound," rests solely upon the LXX and Vulg, which have respectively ἀλεπος and gaulus, i.e. "cock, AVd. horse." The Heb has צארץ מזאמהים, which, although in color "girt" in the LXX and Vulg has "war-horse," Reb "well girt [or, well kilt] in the loins." In support of the reading, "girt," for צארץ, there is the word זכר, which, with צארץ, is assigned to the obs root צאר (Heb. "the Arab. zar, "; "from zar, " to butt.") Further, to render צארץ by "cock" logically requires a change in the text, for אגדיה, means "a war horse, a greyhound." The Pers greyhound would in that case be understood. A hairy race, which, according to the Royal Natural History, is less fleet than the Eng. breed and is used in coursing gazelles and in hunting the wild ass, and which according to Doughty (Arabia Deserta) is kept by the Bedawin. "These dogs are said to be sometimes girdled by their owners to prevent them from over-eating and becoming fat" (L. Fletcher, British Museum [Natural History]).

Domestic dogs have probably been derived from various species of wolves and jackals. In this connection, it is noteworthy that the dogs of certain regions greatly resemble the wolves of those regions. The pariah dogs of Syria and Pal resemble the jackals, and are kept in the same general way used by their kind in the wild. Each quarter of the city has its own pack of dogs, which vigorously resents any invasion of its territory. A dog which for any reason finds itself in foreign territory gets home as quickly as possible, and if it does not have to run the gauntlet of a pack of vicious foes. The pariah dog is sometimes brought up to be a sheep dog, but the best sheep dogs are great wolshen creatures, which are usually obtained from Kurdistan.

DOGMA, dog'ma (δογμα, δογμα, from σιδερ, dokd, "that which seems," "an opinion," particularly the opinion of a philosopher): In 1. As Law the decedent period of Gr philosophy, and in religion, is the Ordinance of a philosophical school came to be quoted as authoritative truth; also, the opinion of a sovereign imposed as law upon his subjects: a decree or ordinance of the civil authority. The word never appears in Ev, although it is used 5 t in the Gr NT, but with the one exception of Acts 16:4, in a sense widely different from that which ecclesiastical usage has given to it from the 2d cent. downward. "Dogma" is used in the NT, (1) of Rom laws: "a decree [Gr dogma] from Caesar Augustus" (Lk 2:1); "the decrees of Caesar" (Acts 17:7); the whole body of Rom law; (2) of ordinances of religious law: "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Eph 2:15); "the bond written in ordinances" (Col 2:14) = the Mosaic ordinances as expressing the moral law which condemned the sinner, and whose enmity Christ abolished by His death. It is a significant revelation of the spirit of Gr theology that all the Gr commentators understood by ordinances in these two places, the gospel as a body of dogmas which had removed the commandment or bond that was against us (see Lightfoot, Col. ad loc.); (3) of the decrees of the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15 20), which Paul and his companions delivered to the gentile churches (Acts 16 4). Here we have one element that entered into the later ecclesiastical meaning of the word. These dogmas were decisions on religious matters, expressed by a more or less authoritative council of the church as a condition of admission to its membership.

There is however one important difference. These decrees relate to moral and ceremonial matters, but the NT usage of the word "dogma" means esp. a theological doctrine.

2. As Formulated in Gr theology "dogma" and "dogmas" meant the same thing. Each had its origin in the opinion of some great teacher; each was a body of dogmatic expression and claimed its authority; each meant an exposition of a particular truth of the gospel, and of the whole Christian truth, which the church adopted as the only right exposition. Each word might be used for the teaching of one church, or of a group of churches, for the latter, "heresy" became the regular term. On the one side stood the doctrines or dogmas of the majority or the "Catholic" church, and on the other side, those of the heretics. So long as the "Catholic" ideal of orthodoxy and uniformity of belief held the field, there was no room for the distinction now made between "dogma," as a scientific and systematic expression of the truth of the Christian religion, and "dogmas," as those truths "authoritatively" ratified as exclusive of the church. This distinction could only arise when men began to think that various expressions of Christian truth could coexist in the church, and this is therefore new and recent. Dogma in this sense denotes the core of the concept of theology as an authoritative system of orthodoxy, and dogma, the modern conception, outside the domestic churches, where theology is regarded as a scientific exposition of truth.

DOK, dōk (ג'ו, דּוֹכָּ, דּוֹכָּן, דּוֹכָּנָן, Dogon): A small fortress, "little stronghold" (2 K 5:15), built by Ptolemy, son of Abubus, where he entertained and murdered his father-in-law Simon Maccabaeus and his two sons. Jos (Ant., XIII, vii, 1; BJ, i, 5, 3) calls the place Dagon and places it above Jericho. The name probably means "dew" or "moss," with its copious springs of excellent water about 4 miles N.W. of Jericho. Some ancient foundations in the neighborhood are possibly those of Ptolemy's fortress, but more probably of a Templars' station which is known to have stood there as late as the end of the 13th cent. For its importance in earlier Jewish history, see Smith, HGLH, 250, 251.

DOLEFUL, dōl'fūl (יַעֲקֹעַ, יַעֲקֹעַת, "howling"): The "doleful creatures" referred to in Isa 13:21 are probably "jackals," although some have suggested...
“leopard,” or “hyaena.” The older EV gives “great owls.” The word rendered “doeful lamentation” in Mic 2:4 (nēṯyāḵ) is simply a form of the word ordinarily tr indebted “wailing” (nēṯī). Cf AVm.

DOLPHIN dolfīn. See BADGER.

DOMINION dō-min-yōn: In Eph 1:21; Col 1:16 the word so tr (kupōrōn, kuridōkē) appears to denote a rank or order of angels. The same word is probably to be so interpreted in Jude vers 8 (AV and RV “dominion”), and in 2 Pet 2:10 (AV “government,” RV “dominion”). See ANGEL.

DOOM dōm: Occurs only once in AV (2 Ecd 7:48), “the day of doom shall be the end of this time” (RV “the day of judgement”); but RV gives it as the rendering of מָשָׁא, ְצֹלֶה, ְצֹלַר הָאֵשׁ, in Ezek 7:7. 10 (AV “the morning,” RVm “the turn” or “the crowning time”; but the meaning is not yet quite certain); and in 1 Cor 4:9 (ἐκθράσκων, ἐπιθανῶν, “as men doomed to death,” AV “appointed [originally ‘approved’] unto death”). Our word “doom” is connected with the word “deem,” and signifies either the act of judging or (far more often) the result or condition following from (thereof) the “Deeaster” of Isle of Man and Jersey. Generally, but not always, an unfavorable judgment is implied. Cf Dryden, Coronation of Charles II, i, 127: “Two kingdoms wait your doom, and, as you choose, This must receive a crown, or that the law.”

DOOR dōr: Most commonly the rendering of Heb *pētaḥ, “doorway,” delōth, “door” proper (the two distinguished in Gen 16:6, or of Gr ἱππα, thīra, which represents both meanings. The door proper was usually of wood, frequently sheathed with metal, sometimes of one slab of stone, as shown in excavations in the Hauran. It turned on pivots (the “hinges” of Prov 28:14) working in sockets above and below, and was provided with a bolt (2 S 13:17) or with lock and key (Jgs 3:23). The doorway was inclosed by the stone threshold (1 K 14:17), the two doorposts on either side, and the lintel above (Eccl 8:7). Doors were frequently two-leaved, and folding ones are mentioned in connection with the temple (1 K 6:34). Where “door” is used in connection with city gates (Neh 3:1 ff) it refers to the door proper which swings on its hinges and is opened or closed by its hinges. Thus the custom of fastening to the doorposts small cases containing a parchment inscribed with the words of Dt 6:4-9; 11:13-21 had its origin in the command there given. See also GATE; HOUSE.

Figurezhe: (1) Christ is “the door” into the gospel ministry (Jn 10:7,7,12); ministers must receive their authority from Him, and exercise it in His spirit. (2) “Through faith in Him also both shepherds and sheep enter into the kingdom of God (vs. 9), and find all their spiritual needs supplied.” (3) The fig. in Rev 3:20 is express of Christ's patient, persistent and affectionate appeal to men. (4) Elsewhere also of opportunity (Mt 26:10; Acts 14:27; 1 Cor 16:9; 2 Cor 2:12; Rev 3:8). (5) Of freedom and power (Col 4:3). See also ACHOR; SHEPHERD.

DOORKEEPER, dōrkēp-ār (πύλη, shōʾēr): The gate of an oriental city and of the temple courts so closely resembled the house of a house that the same Heb. word was used for doorkeeper and gate-keeper. It is often tr by the less definite word “porter” (q.v.).

In the preexilic writings (2 S 18:26; 2 K 7:10, 11) reference is made to porters at the gates of the cities Mahanaim and Samaria. In these early writings there is also mention of a small number of “keepers of the threshold” of the temple, whose duties included the gathering of money from the people for temple purposes, and the care of the sacred vessels (1 K 12:9; 2 K 20:23). They held an honorable position (2 K 25:18), and occupied chambers in the temple (Jer 36:4). The same term is used to describe officers in the household of the king of Persia (Est 2:21; 6:2). Differing from these “keepers of the threshold” in some respects are the doorkeepers or porters mentioned in Ch Ezr and Neh. These formed a numerous sacred order (1 Ch 9:22; 23:5) from the time of David. Their duties and the words describing them in two passages, “keepers of the thresholds” (1 Ch 9:19) and “porters of the thresholds” (2 Ch 23:4), connect them in some measure with the “keeper of the threshold” referred to above. They guarded the gates of the house of Jeh (1 Ch 25:23), closing and opening them at the proper times (ver 27) and preventing the unclean from entering the sacred inclosure (2 Ch 23:19); they had charge of the sacred vessels and of the free-will offerings (2 Ch 31:14), and dwelt in the chambers about the temple (1 Ch 29:27). They were Levites, and came in from among the Levites every seventh day for service in their turn (1 Ch 29:25). Their office was honorable, ranking with the singers, after the priests and Levites (Ezr 2:42; 1 Ch 15:18).

In Ps 80:3, “I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God,” the word is not used in its technical sense. RVm gives “stand (AVm ‘sit’) at the threshold,” to an eastern mind a situation of deep humility (cf title of the Ps and 1 Ch 9:19).

In the NT the order of temple doorkeepers is not referred to. But a doorkeeper (πορφύρης, thērōs) is mentioned in connection with a private house (Mk 13:34), with the high priest’s house (Jn 18:16,17), and with sheep-folds (Jn 10:3), a maid serving as doorkeeper in some cases (cf 13:13).

DOORPOST, dōrpōst. See HOUSE.

DOPHKHAH, dōf ka (πύλη), dophkhāh, “drover”: A desert camp of the Israelites, the first after leaving the wilderness of Shittim (Nu 33:12-13). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

DOR, dōr, DORA, dṑra (יוֹד, dṑr, dṑrā), “habitation,” “circle,” Δῷρ, Dōr; Jōs, Đōr; Dōrā; mod. Tantrārā; mod. Dōrā, Dōrā of Phoenician, Carmel (Cāp, II, 10; Vita, 8), about 8 miles N of Caesarea. It was occupied in the earliest times by the Canaanites and probably belonged to Phoenicia, tradition saying that it was a Sidonian colony. It furnished an abundance of the shell-fish so valuable for the manufacture of the Tyrian purple, and this would have led the Phoenicians to occupy the site. In the 12th cent., BC, the region was occupied by the northern people who raided the whole Syrian coast and Egypt. They were driven back by the Philistines, but renewed the attack, and the weakness of Egypt in the middle of the cent. enabled them to settle in the coast region S. of Carmel; a tribe of them occupied Dor, and others the territory to the limits of the desert of Sinai, and became the Philistines so well known by their contests with the Hebrews. Napholoth-dor, “the heights of Dor,” may be the slopes of Carmel inland from Tantrārā. Dor fell within the territory assigned to Manassah (Josh 17:11; cf Am., v. 1, 22). It was the seat of a king who possessed other towns on the heights back of the coast. He was one of the allies of Jabin of Hazor in the conflict with Joshua (Josh 11:2) and was conquered by him (12:23), but Dor was not occupied by the Israelites till 13:17; 14:1-27.

The inhabitants of Dor were at enmity with the Phoen towns and it would seem that the Sidonians seized it to obtain its rich supplies of shell-fish, and this probably caused the war of retaliation waged by Phoenicia against the Philistines, against Sidon in the middle of the 11th cent. Sidon was besieged by land, and the inhabitants were compelled to flee to Tyre. Dor seems to have been occupied by Solomon since he placed one of his purveyors in this town (1 K 4 11), and Tiglath-pileser III reduced it and set a governor over it (Rawil, Phoen., 84). Here Tryphon was besieged by Antiochus, but escaped to Apamea (1 Mac 15 11.13.25; Ant, XIII, vii, 2). It was made free by Pompey, and joined to the province of Syria (XIV, iv, 4). The youths of the place set up a statue of Tiberius in the Jewish synagogue, an outrage that was reported to Publius Petronius by Agrippa, and reparation was made (XIX, vi, 3). It does not seem to have been of much importance in later times, though the fortifications still remaining on the ruined site, from the period of the Middle Ages, show that it was then occupied. It is now only a miserable village nestled in the ruins.

DORCAS, dôr'kas (Δωρκάς, Dorkas, the Gr equivalent of Aram. tabithâ, "a gazelle"). The name was borne by a Christian woman of Joppa. She is called a disciple (mathêtria: Acts 9 36, the only place in the NT where the term form is used). She seems to have had some means and also to have been a leader in the Christian community. Dorcas was beloved for the manner in which she used her position and means, for she "was full of good works, and almsdeeds she did." Among her charities was the clothing of the poor with garments she herself made (ver 39), and by following her example, numerous "Dorcas societies" in the Christian church perpetuate her memory. There is a local memorial in the "Tabitha School" in Jaffa devoted to the care and education of poor girls.

Her restoration to life by Peter is recorded. At the time of her death Peter was in Lydda where he had healed Aeneas. Being sent for, he went to Joppa, and, by the exercise of the supernatural powers granted to him, "he presented her alive" to the mourning community. In consequence of this miracle "many believed on the Lord" (ver 42).

DORYMENES, dô-rîm'ë-nëz (Δορύμηνος, Dorumênos): Father of Ptolemy Macron (1 Mac 3 38; 2 Mac 4 45); probably the same man who fought against Antiochus the Great (Polyb. v.61).

DOSITHEUS, dô-sîth'ë-us (Δοσιθέας, Dosithéos): (1) A captain of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 12 19-25); along with Sositheus he captured Timotheus after the battle of Carmolin, but granted him his life and freedom on the representation that "he had in his power the parents of many of them and the brethren of some," if, when they put him to death, should "be disregarded."

(2) A soldier in the army of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 12 55); he made a special attack upon Gorgias, governor of Idumaæa, the opposing general, and would have taken the "accursed man" prisoner but for the interference of a Thradian horseman.

(3) A Jew, son of Drimylus (3 Mac 1 3) who rescued Ptolemy Philopator from a plot of Theodorus. He afterward proved an apostate from Judaism.

(4) A Levite priest who "in the 4th year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra" carried the tr of the Book of Est to Alexandria (Ad Est 11 7).

DOTE, dô't: "To dote" means either "to be weakminded" or "to be foolishly fond." In the latter sense it is employed in Est 23 5 ff.; in the former, in Jer 50 36 AV (RV "shall become foolish"); AV Sir 25 2 (RV "lacking understanding"), and AV I Tim 6 4 (RVm "to be sick"); AVm "a fool").

DOTHAIM, dô-thâ'im: Mentioned in Jth 4 6 and frequently in connection with the invasion of Holofemes. See next art.

DOTHAN, dô-thân (תָּרֹן, dôtharôn, דֹּחַן, "two wells," "double feast"); Dothaim, Döthaim: A place to the N. of Shechem whither Jacob's sons went for pasture for the flocks; where Joseph who followed them was sold to the Ishmaelites, after having been imprisoned in a "pit" (Gen 37 17 ff).

Here in later days the eyes of Elisha's servant were opened to see the mountain "full of horses and chariots of fire," guarding his master from the encircling Syrians (2 K 6 13 ff). This is certainly to be identified with Tell Dôthân, which lies on the E. of the ancient road leading from Gilead across Esdraelon to the seacoast, and thence to Egypt. It is about 5 miles to the S.W. of Jezin. There are some traces of old buildings, two cisterns—Dôthahin or Dôthahim=="two cisterns" or "pits"—and one copious spring. Excellent pasture is found in the surrounding plain, and on the adjoining slopes.

DOUBLE, dub'âl (דָּבָל, shânâdâh, "to repeat," as in counting; דָּבָל, kôphal, "to fold over," or "double," as a cloth): A word used quite frequently in the OT. Jacob ordered his sons to take double money in their hands, i.e. twice the necessary amount (Gen 43 12.15). If a thief be caught with a living animal he was to restore double (Ex 22 4); if property he stole out of the house of one to whom it is intrusted he was to restore double (Ex 22 7.9). The firstborn was to receive a double portion of the inheritance (Lev 21 17). Likewise the beautiful symbol Elisha asked for a double portion of Elijah's spirit to fall upon him (2 K 2 9). Degrees of punishment or sufferings were also expressed by the idea of a doubling (Isa 61 7; Jer 16 18; 17 18; Zec 9 12). The use of the second. Heb form in Job 11 6 and 41 13 seems quite confusing in its tr. AV translates it simply "double," but RV gives it its expanded and derived meaning, "manifold in understanding," and "who shall come within his jaws," respectively, "manifold" in the first instance meaning multiplied, and "jaws" doubtless meaning the double row of teeth. The classic phrases in the NT are those used by James to represent instability and a wavering disposition, διπλοφυσις, diplophusis, lit. "doubled-minded" (Jas 1 8; 8). WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

DOUBT, dôût: This word, found only a score of times in the Bible, translates nevertheless about half as many different Heb and Gr originals with a corresponding variety of meanings. In Gen 37 33 "without doubt" is to be taken in the common sense of "certainly"; in Job 12 2 in the sarcastic sense of "indeed." In Dnl 5 12.16, it is used as a difficult problem or mystery to be explained, and these are the only cases of its employment in the OT.

In the NT it is about equally used to translate δαβρος, διαπορ εις, and διακρινα, δικαστικον. and in their use these haunts to be given "utterly at a loss," "nonplussed;" and the second, "to judge diversely." For the first, see Jn 13 22; Acts 2 12 AV; 6 24 AV; 10 17 AV; 25 20 AV; and Gal 4 20 AV. For the second see Mt 21 21; Mk 11 22; Acts 10 20; Rom 14 23. The last-named is deserving of particular attention. "He that doubteth is condemned [AV "damned"] if he eat," means that in a case of uncertainty as to one's Christian liberty, it was better to err on the side of restraint. In Lk 10 24, "to be of a double mind:" (αναθηματικον, μεταποτεκων, lit. "to suspend!"); vide Thayer, s.v., means "to be driven by gusts," or "to fluctuate in mid-air."

Here, as in Mt 14 31, "doubt" does not indicate a lack of faith, but rather a "state of qualified faith": its weakness, but not its absence. In Jn 10 24 "doubt" translates ἄσπειρος ψυχή, ἀπόσπειρος ψυχή, which lit. means "to lift up the soul," or "to keep one in suspense"; so RV. See also DISPUTATION.

DOUGH, d6. See Bread.

DOVE, δαβρος, δαβρος, δωρον, γυναθα, ιπταμενο, πασχον. peristera, Lev ζηνοσαλινο, παλαιαθα; the bird of the family Columbidae. Doves and pigeons are so closely related as to be spoken of as synonymous, yet there is a distinction recognized from the beginning of time. It was esp. marked in Pal, because doves migrated, but pigeons remained in their chosen haunts all the year. Yet doves were the wild birds and were only confined singly or in pairs as caged pets, or in order to be available for sacrifice. Pigeons, without question, were the first domesticated birds, the record of their conquest by man extending if anything farther back than ducks, geese and swans. These two were the best known and the most loved of all the myriad of birds of Pal. Doves were given preference because they remained wild and were more elusive. The thing usually is more attractive than the thing we have. Their loving natures had been noted, their sleek beautiful plumage, their plump bodies. They were the most precious of anything offered for sacrifice. Their use is always specified in preference to pigeons. The first mention of a dove was used; if both, the dove is frequently mentioned first. Because of their docility when caged, their use in sacrifice, and the religious superstition concerning them, they were allowed to nest unmolested and, according to species, flocked all over Pal. The turtle-dove nested in gardens and vineyards, and was almost as tame as the pigeons. The palm turtle-dove took its name from its love of homing in palm trees, and sought these fields, and in cities, even building near the temple in Jerus. It also selected thorn and other trees. It has a small body, about ten inches in length, covered with bright chestnut-colored feathers, the neck dappled with dark, lustrous feathers. The rock dove swarmed over, through, and among the cliffs of mountains and the recesses of caves and ravines. The collared turtle-dove was the largest of the species. It remained permanently and homed in the forests of Tabor and Gilead, around the Dead Sea, and along the Jordan valley. This is the one used to render "dove," in Ps 80, and Noah saw it feed its mate little green olive leaves, for the dove never carries food in the beak, but swallows and then regurgitates it to mate and young. This first reference to birds was made on account of the loving, tender character of the turtledove, because they were the most loved by the people, and therefore chosen as most suitable to offer as sacrifice (Gen 15 9). In Lev 1 14 ff, doves are mentioned as sacrifice: "And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and grieve it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be drained out on the side of the altar." In Lev 5 7, the proper preparation of the sacrifice is prescribed. For method of handling sacrifice see vs 8, 9, 10. In Lev 12 6 the law for a sacrifice for a mother is given, and ver 8 of same ch provides that if she be too poor to offer a lamb, doves or pigeons will suffice. In Lev 14 4-8 the reference for the sacrifice of a leper is merely to "birds," because it is understood that they are pigeons and doves, and it contains the specification that if the victim is too poor to afford so elaborate a sacrifice, a smaller one will suffice. The birds are named in ver 22: "Two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, such as he is able to get; and in the one shall he offer a full burnt-offering" (cf Lev 15 14, 20; Nu 6 10). When David prayed for the destruction of the treacherous, he used the dove in comparison, and because he says he would " Jude the wilderness" he indicates that he was thinking of the palm turtle.

"And I said, Oh that I had wings like a dove! Then would I fly away, and be at rest." (Ps 55 6).

In chanting a song of triumph, David used an exquisite thought.

"When ye lie among the sheepfolds, It is as the wings of a dove covered with silver, And her pinions with yellow gold." (Ps 68 15).

He referred to the rock dove because the metallic luster on its neck would gleam like gold in sunshine, and the soft grayish-white feathers beneath the wings as he would see the bird above him in flight would appear silver-like. By this quotation David meant that the princes of peace, in their midst, and to all the people, Noah saw it feed(i.e., to caged pets, see account of its size and beauty.

In all, the dove is mentioned about fifty times in the Bible. Many of these references are concerning its use in sacrifice and need not all be mentioned. The others are quoted and explained from a scientific standpoint and in accordance with the characteristics and habits of the birds. The first reference to the dove is made in Gen 8 8-10. After the flood; then follows its specified use in sacrifice; note of its migratory habits is made, and then in poetry, prophecy, comparison, simile and song, it appears over and over throughout the Bible. In Gen 8 8-13, we read, "And he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated." Noah first sent out a raven, because it was a strong, aggressive bird and would return to its mate. But the raven only flew over the water and returned to perch on the ark. This was not satisfactory, so Noah in looking for a bird better suited to his purpose, bethought him of the most loving and tender bird he knew—the dove. It not only would return to the ark, but would enter and go to the cage of its mate, and if it found green food it would regurgitate a portion for her or its young, or if not nesting he could tell by its droppings if greenery had been eaten and so decide if the waters were going down. And this is precisely what happened. The dove came back, causing the watching Noah to feed it little green olive leaves, for the dove never carries food in the beak, but swallows and then regurgitates it to mate and young. This first reference to birds was made on account of the loving, tender character of the turtledove, because they were the most loved by the people, and therefore chosen as most suitable to offer as sacrifice (Gen 15 9). In Lev 1 14 f, doves are mentioned as sacrifice: "And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and grieve it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be drained out on the side of the altar." In Lev 5 7, the proper preparation of the sacrifice is prescribed. For method of handling sacrifice see vs 8, 9, 10. In Lev 12 6 the law for a sacrifice for a mother is given, and ver 8 of same ch provides that if she be too poor to offer a lamb, doves or pigeons will suffice. In Lev 14 4-8 the reference for the sacrifice of a leper is merely to "birds," because it is understood that they are pigeons and doves, and it contains the specification that if the victim is too poor to afford so elaborate a sacrifice, a smaller one will suffice. The birds are named in ver 22: "Two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, such as he is able to get; and in the one shall he offer a full burnt-offering" (cf Lev 15 14, 20; Nu 6 10). When David prayed for the destruction of the treacherous, he used the dove in comparison, and because he says he would " Jude the wilderness" he indicates that he was thinking of the palm turtle.
unto the wild beast: forget not the life of thy poor forever." Solomom uses the dove repeatedly in comparison or as a term of endearment. In Cant 1:15; 4:1; 5:12, he compares the eyes of his bride, ful tender, beautiful, with those of a dove. In 2:12 he uses the voice of the dove as an indication of spring. In 2:14 he addresses the bride as a rock dove. In 5:2 is another term of endearment, this time used in the dream of the bride (cf. 9:9). Isa 38:14 has reference to the waiting, mournful dove note from which the commonest species take the name "mourning dove." The reference in Isa 60:8 proves that the prophet was not so good an observer, or so correct in his natural history as David, who may have learned from the open. As a boy, David guarded the flocks of his father and watched the creatures around him. When exulting over the glory of the church in the numerous accessions of Gentiles, Isaiah cried, "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" This proves that he confounded pigeons and doves. Doves were wild, mostly migratory, and had no "windows." But the clay cotes of pigeons molded in squares so that one large cote sheltered many pairs in separate homes and the appearance of latticed windows and were used as a basis in estimating a man's wealth. This reference should be changed to read, "and as pigeons to their windows." In Jer 8:7 the fact is pointed out that doves were migratory; and in 48:28 people are advised to go live in solitary places and be peaceable, loving and faithful, like the rock doves. See also Ezek 7:16: "But those of them that escape shall escape, and shall be on the mountains like doves of the valleys, all of them mourning, every one in his iniquity." This merely means that people should be driven to hide among the caves and valleys where the rock doves lived, and that the sound of their mourning would resemble the cry of the birds. It does not mean, however, that the doves were mourning, for when doves coo and moan and to our ears grow most pitiful in their cries, they are the happiest in the mating season. The veneration cherished for doves in these days is inborn, and no bird is so loved and protected as the dove—hence it is unusually secure and happy and its mournful cry is the product of our imagination only. The dove is the happiest of birds. Hos 7:11 and 11:11 each compares people with doves; the first, because the birds at times appear foolishly trusting; the second, because, while no bird is more confiding, none is more easily frightened. "And Ephraim is like a silly dove, without understanding: they call unto Egypt, they go to Assyria" (7:11). "They shall come trembling as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria; and I will make them to dwell in their houses, saith Jhob" (11:11). The reference in Nah 2:7 is to the voice of the birds. NT references will be found in a description of the baptism of Jesus (Mt 3:16). People are admonished to be "harmless as doves" (10:16). "And Jesus entered into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold the doves" (Mt 21:12). This proves that these birds were a common article of commerce, probably the most used for caged pets, and those customarily employed for sacrifice.

Dove's Dung (דָּרָן קְרֶשׁ), hârî yônîm, K'thibh for דָּרֶנֶת קְרֶשׁ, (dârîn kôrîš), 2 K 6:25: "And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a kab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." This seems so repellent that some commentators have tried to prove the name applied to the edible root of a plant, but the history of sieges records other cases where matter quite as offensive was used to sustain life. The text is probably correct as it stands.

The term is added particularly to the concluding paragraph of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:13 m., "For thine is the kingdom," etc; of 1 Ch 29:11, and see Lord's Prayer). To the same general class belong Ps 41:13; 72:18 f.; 89:52; Rom 16:27; Eph 2:20; 1 Tim 1:17; Jude ver. 25; Rev 5:13 f.; 19:1–3, and the modern stanza beginning "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." DRACHMA, drak'ma, DRAM (δραχμή, drachmê): The word is used in the LXX as the rendering of...

Dove

DRAGON, drag'un (תנין, tannin, pl. תְּנִינֵי, tannīnē; ἀράχις, ἀράχιν), Tannin and the pl. tannīn occur 14 t. and in EV are variously rendered “dragon,” “whale,” “sea-monster,” “sea-serpent,” “sea-creature,” or “sea-fish.” In Rev. AV uses “serpent,” “sea-monster,” or “sea-creature.” Tannin occurs once, in Mal 1:3, where it is rendered “dragons.” "Dragons," "sea-monsters," or "monsters," etc., are used by Homer, in the constellations. Draco.) Tannin (I.XX. biuma clamata, “dwellings”) is a fam. pl. form ass from tannah, but it suits the context to give it the same meaning as tannin.

In Ex 7 9-10.13, tannin is used of the serpents which were produced from Aaron’s rod and the rod of the Egyptian magicians, whereas in Ex 4 3 and 7 15, for the serpents which were made to bite the Moabites and Midianites, the ordinary word for serpent. In two passages we find “whale,” RV “sea-monster”: Gen 1 21; “And God created the great sea-monsters, and every living creature that moveth;” Job 7:12: “Am I a sea, or a sea-monster, that I can watch the ways of the waters?” Other passages (ERV and AV) are Dt 32 33: “Their wine is the poison of dragons [ERV “serpents”], and the cruel venom of asps. They sware in the head of a serpent, and they go down to the ground by the valley gate, even toward the dragon’s [ERV “jackal’s”) well and the dragon’s [ERV “jackal’s) well;” Ps 91:13: “Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the serpent [AV “dragon”) shalt thou trample under foot.” Ps 148:7: “The young lion and the dragon shall know their end.” AV renders “sea-monster.” The adder: the young lion and the serpent [AV “dragon”) shall know their end.” Ps 148:7: “The young lion and the dragon shall know their end.”

The foregoing passages offer no especial difficulties in the interpretation of the word tannin. All may fairly be addressed to a serpent or to a sea-monster or some imaginary creature, without involving any ancient myths for their elucidation. The same may be said of the passages in Rev. A dragon is taken as the personification of Satan, as of Ps 22:21, and in passages in Ex 21:35. It is of course true that ancient myths may more or less distantly underlie some of these dragon and serpent references, and such myths may be demonstrated to throw additional light in certain cases, but at least the passages in question are intelligible without recourse to the myths. This however is not equally true of all the tannin passages. In Ps 74 12 we read: “Yet God is my King of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth. Thou didst divide the sea by thy power: thou brakest the heads of the sea-monsters [AV “dragons”) in the waters.” Cf Isa 27 1; 51 9f.

The three passages just cited seem to denote each some particular act, and are referred to by Canon Cheyne (Enc. t.v. “Dragon”) to the old Babylon myth of the conflict of Marduk and Tiamat in the Assyrian creation-legend (thus Gunkel, etc). Indeed he refers to that myth not only these passages, but also Jer 51 34; Ezek 29 3-6; 32 8-9 and Job 7 12, which have been cited above. In translating the two passages from Cheyne the definite article, “the dragon,” instead of “a” is in RV, which makes a great difference in the meaning. In Ps 87 4, it is clear that Rahab is a country, i.e. Egypt. Isa 30 7 is to the same point. In Isa 51 9-10, “that didst cut Rahab in pieces” and “that didst pierce the monster” (AV “dragon”), are two coordinate expressions of one idea, which is apparently the defeat of the Egyptians, as appears in the reference to the passage of the Red Sea. In Isa 27 1, “leviathan the swift serpent” and “leviathan the crooked serpent” and the monster [AV and ERV “dragon”) that is in the sea” have been identified with Babylon, Persia and Egypt (EB s.v. “Dragon,” 4). It is more probable that the first two expressions are coordinate, and amount to “leviathan the swift and crooked serpent,” and that the verse may therefore refer to Babylonia and Egypt. Ps 74 12-15 is more in line with the idea of the art. in EB, but it is nevertheless susceptible of an explanation similar to that of the other two passages.

Tannin, “dragons” (RV “jackals”) occurs in Job 30 20; Ps 44 19; Isa 13 22; 24 13; 35 7; 43 20; Jer 9 11; 10 22; 14 6; 49 33; 51 37; tan-nōth, “dragons” (RV “jackals”) is found in Mal 1 3. In all these passages, “jackal” suits the context better than “dragon,” “sea-monster” or “serpent.” An exception is in Rev 12:2, where AV has “whale” and RV Avm “dragon” (ERV “sea-monster”). Tannin occurs in Ezk 29 2, where AV has “whale” and ERV and AVm “dragon” (ERV “sea-monster”). Tannin occurs in Ezk 32 2, where AV has “whale” and ERV and AVm “dragon” (ERV “sea-monster”), and in Ezk 30 1, where AV has “whale” and ERV and AVm “dragon” (ERV “sea-monster”). Ezra 4 12; 5 2; Jer 9 11; 10 22; and Ps 49 33, these two passages “jackals” obviously will not suit.

According to the Mish Jehu turned the temple of Baal in Samaria into public latrines, “water-houses.” Mk adds here (7 19) that by this saying Jesus cleansed all articles of food, i.e., declared them to be clean.

DRAWER, drō’er, OF WATER (יָבִיא נֶוזֶר, šô’ēb magim, from נֶזֶר, šô’ēb, “to bale up” water): In Syria and Pal, outside of Mt. Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon, the Jennings of water are scarce and the inhabitants of these less favored places have always depended upon wells and cisterns for their water supply. This necessitates some device for drawing the water. In the case of a cistern or shallow well, an earthenware water jar or bucket made of tanned goats’ skin is lowered into the water by a rope and then raised by pulling up the rope hand over hand (probably the ancient method), or by running the rope over a crude pulley fixed directly over the cistern mouth. In the case of deep wells, the rope, attached to a larger bucket, is run over a pulley so that the water may be raised by the drawers walking away from the well as they pull the rope. Frequently animals are hitched to the rope to do the pulling.
In some districts where the water level is not too deep, a flight of steps leading down to the water’s edge is constructed in addition to the opening vertically above the water. Such a well is pointed out near Haman in Mesopotamia as the one from which Rebekah drew water for Abraham’s servant. In Gen 24:16 we read that Rebekah “went down to the fountain, and filled her pitcher, and came up.”

The deep grooves in their curbs, worn by the ropes as the water was being raised, attest to the antiquity of many of the wells of Pal and Syria. Any one of the hundreds of grooves around a single well was many years in being formed. The fact that the present method of drawing water from these wells is not making these grooves, shows that they are the work of former times.

St. Mary’s Well at Nazareth.

The drawing of water was considered the work of women or of men unfit for other service (Gen 24:11.13.43; 1 S 9:11; Jn 4:7). In Syria, today, a girl servant willingly goes to draw the daily supply of water, but seldom is it possible to persuade a boy or man to perform this service. When the well or fountain is at a distance, or much water is needed, tanned skins or earthen jars are filled and transported on the backs of men or donkeys.

Water drawing was usually done at evening time (Gen 24:11), and this custom has remained unchanged. There is no sight more interesting than the daily concourse at a Syrian water source. It is bound to remind one of the Bible stories where the setting is a wellsides (Gen 24; Jn 4).

The service of water drawing was associated, in early times, with that of hewer of wood (Dt 29:11). Joshua made the Gibeonites hewers of wood and drawers of water in exchange for their lives (Josh 9:21.23.27). The inhabitants of Nineveh were exhorted to draw water and fill the cisterns of their fortresses in preparation for a siege (Nah 3:14).

Figurative: Water drawing is mentioned in the metaphor of Isa 12:3, “Ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.”

DREAM, drăm, DREAMER, drăm’tër (דָּרָם, hālām, דָּרָן, hēlem; ὀναρ, onar): In all time dreams and their interpretation have been the occasion of much curious and speculative inquiry. Because of the mystery by which they have been enshrouded, and growing out of a natural curiosity to know the future, much significance has been attached to them by people esp. of the lower stages of culture. Even the cultured are not without a superstitious awe and dread of dreams, attaching to them different interpretations according to local color and custom.

Naturally enough, as with all other normal and natural phenomena for which men could assign no scientific and rational explanation, they would be looked upon with a certain degree of superstitious fear.

“Dreams:
Which are the children of an idle brain,
Begot of nothing but vain fantasy,
Which is as thin as substance in the air
And more inconsistent than the wind.”

—Shakespeare.

While a fully satisfactory theory of dreams has not yet been established and while it is hardly possible that there ever be a satisfactory explanation for each individual dream, yet through the rapid discoveries of physiological psychology in the recent decade or more, much new light is thrown on the subject. With the contribution of psychological knowledge of the association of ideas through the connected relation of certain cortical centers and areas, it has come to be pretty well established that the excitation of certain bodily organs or surfaces will stimulate certain brain areas, and only the stimulation of certain cortical areas will produce a response in certain bodily regions over which these centers or areas preside. Connecting thought processes are therefore dependent upon the proper correlation of ideas through what are known physiologically as the association centers. If then it comes to pass that, as occurs in dreams, only fragmentary ideas or loosely connected trains of thought occur, and if, as frequently happens, there is momentary connection, but the main connection with cerebral waking experience, it will easily be seen that the excitation of certain centers will awaken certain trains of thought which are but poorly related to the balance of one’s thinking processes. Much is being said about the dissociation of ideas and the disturbance of personality of which dreams are one of several forms. Others are hallucinations, trances, visions, etc. Dreams are abnormal and sometimes pathological. Sleep is a normal experience. Perfect and natural sleep should be without dreams of any conscious occurrence. Perhaps psychologically there can be no such thing as perfectly dreamless sleep. Such a condition would probably be death itself. Nature doubles both her silent vigil, keeping watch in the chambers of the soul during the deepest sleep. The only difference is that they do not come to the threshold of consciousness. Thus, dreams are to the sleeping state what visions and hallucinations are to the waking state, and like them are the result of a disturbed image-making function. While the source of the materials and the excitant may not be the same in each case, yet functionally they are the same.

The stimuli of dreams may be of two kinds. First, they may be physical and objective, or they may be due to suggestions and the association of ideas. They may be due to some physical disorder, such as imperfect digestion or circulation, improper ventilation or heating, or an uncomfortable position. Since by the very nature of the case, dreams do not occur in a conscious state, the real cause cannot easily be discoverable and then only after the subject is entirely awakened through the effects of it. They may also be due to the association of ideas. Suggestion plays a large part. The vividness and recency of a conscious impression during the waking state may be thrown up from the subconscious region during the sleeping hours. The usual distorted aspect of dreams is doubtless due to the uncoupling of groups of ideas through the uncoupling of the cortical association areas, so that of them becoming less susceptible than others to the existing stimulus.

The materials of dreams need not be recent; they may have been furnished by the conscious processes a long time before, but are brought to the threshold only by means of some train of ideas during a semi-conscious state. It is interesting to note Dreams have always played an important part in the lit. and religion of all peoples. They have served to furnish mythologies; they have been the sources of systems of necromancy; they have become both the source and the explanation of otherwise inexplicable acts of Providence. Growing out of them we have a theory of nightmares and demonology. They have become the working material of the prophet both Bib. and pagan. Mediaeval civilization is not without its lasting effects of dreams, and modern civilization still clings with something of reverence to the unsolved mystery of certain dreams. While we have almost emerged from anything like a slavish adherence to a superstitious belief in dreams, we must still admit the possibility of the profound significance of dreams in the impressions they make upon the subject.

The Bible, contrary to a notion perhaps too commonly held, attaches relatively little religious significance to dreams. Occasionally, however, reference is made to communica- tion through dreams (Gen 20:6; 1 K 3:5; Mt 1:20; 2 12.13.19.22). It recognizes their human relations more frequently. In the OT lit. dreams play but little part except in the books of Gen and Dal, in which there are abundant records of such dreams. For their moral bearings the most important ones perhaps are those referred to in Gen 37:5-10. An uncritical attitude will give to them a lifeless and mechanical interpretation. A sympathetic and rational exposition gives them beauty, naturalness and significance. Joseph was the youngest and most beloved son of Jacob. He was just in the prime of adolescence, the very period of daydreaming. He was perhaps inordinately ambitious. This was doubtless heightened by the attentions of a doting father. The most natural dream would be that suggested by his usual waking state, which was one of ambition and perhaps unhealthy rivalry (see Astronomy, II, 6). The source of Pharaoh's dreams is interestingly described by a psychological interpretation. A sympathetic and rational explanation gives them beauty, naturalness, and significance (Gen 41:7-32).

Another illustration of the psychological explanation of dreams is the dream of Solomon (1 K 3:5.11-15). In this narrative, after Solomon had done what pleased Jeh and had offered a most humble prayer on an occasion which to him was a great crisis and at the same time a moment of great ecstasy in his life, he doubtless experiences a feeling of sweet peace in consequence of it. His sleep would naturally be somewhat disturbed by the excitement of the day. The dream was suggested by the associations and naturally enough was the approving voice of Jeh.

Dreaming and the prophetic function seem to have been closely associated (Dt 13.1.5). Whether from a coldly mechanical and superstitious, a miraculous, or a perfectly natural point of view, this relation is consistent. The prophet must be a seer, a man of visions and ideals. As such he would be subject, as in his waking states, to extraordinary experiences. The remarkable dreams of Nebuchadnezzar, who stands out as an exceptional example, afford an illustration of what may be styled a God-given personal experience. They were due to a prophet, to a seer, to a man of visions (Dn 3:24-46; 4:5-19). The effort made by the magicians, the enchanters, the Chaldaeans, and the soothsayers, according to the best skill of the Orientals, was unavailing. Daniel, whether by extraordinary intellectual insight or by Divine communication, was able by his interpretation and its moral to set before the king a powerful lesson.

The NT gives still less place and importance to dreams than the OT. There are only six references and one citation to dreams or dreamers. It is significant that all these references are by Mt, and still more significant that Jesus nowhere refers to dreams, evidently attaching little if any importance to them. The references in Mt are confined entirely to warnings and announcements (Mt 1:20; 2:12.13.19.22; 27:19). Once a citation (Acts 2:10) is used for illustrative purposes (cf Joel 2:28). See also Augury, IV, 5; Divination, VI, 1, 1(b); Magic; Revelation.

Whether God communicates directly or indirectly by dreams is still unsettled. With our present knowledge of spirit communication it would not seem unreasonable to assume that He may reveal Himself directly; and yet on the other hand the safest and perhaps surest explanation for our own day and experience is that in dreams the mind is more impressionable and responsive to natural causes through which God speaks and operates. That dreams have been and are valuable means of shaping men's thoughts and careers cannot be denied, and this is true even in the social and moral life of individuals and of society. A valuable modern illustration of this is the dream of Adoniram Judson Gordon (see How Christ Came to Church), through the influence of which his entire religious life and that of his church were completely transformed.

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

DREGGE, droj: A mixture of oats and barley (Job 24:6 AVm; AV "corn"; RV "proverb"). The Heb word is דַּגַּה, b'ilil, usually "mixed grain," EDOMG, XLVIII, 236; grain not ground and boiled in water. Cf Job 6:5; Isa 30:24.

DREGS, dres: The "sediments," "lees," "grounds of liquor;" only in pl. In AV it stands for (1) Heb šm'mărîm, "bowl," "chalice," found only in Isa 61:17.22: "the dipped of the trembling;" (2) the dregs of the cup of my fury. RV correctly changes "dregs" into "bowl." (2) Heb șm'mărîm, "sediments" or "dregs," esp. less of wine. The dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall drink JAVY; "drake" the "dregs", or the "out" and "drink them" (Ps 75:8), i.e. God gives to the wicked the cup of wrathful judgment, which they must drink to the last drop.

DRESS: In the Heb and Gr there is a wonderful wealth of terminology having to do with the general subject of dress among the ancient Orientals. This is reflected in the numerous synonyms for "dress" to be found in AV, "adorned," "arrayed," "garments," "emblems," "attire," etc. But the words used in the originals are often greatly obscured through the inconsistent variations of the translators. Besides there are few indications even in the original Heb or Gr of the exact shape or specific materials of the various articles of dress named, and so their identification is made doubly difficult. In dealing with the subject, therefore, the most reliable sources of information, apart from the meaning of the terms used in characterization, are certain well-known facts about the costumes and dress-customs of the orthodox Jews, and others about the forms of dress worn today by the people of simple life and primitive habits in modern Pal. Thanks to the ultra-conservatism and unchanging usages of the nearer East, this is no mean help. In the endeavor to discover, distinguish and deal with the various oriental garments, then, we will consider: 1. The Meaning of Terms; 2. The Materials; 3. The Outer Garments; 4. The Inner Garments; 5. The Headdress; 6. The Foot-gear; 7. The Dress of Jesus and His Disciples.

There was originally a sharp distinction between classical and oriental costume, but this was palpably lessened under the cosmopolitanism of the Roman Empire. This of course had its effect both in the modification of the fashions of the day and upon the words used for articles of clothing in the NT.

(1) The terms most used for clothes in general were, in the OT, šādāh, sinālāh, solāth, and in the NT himation (Mt 21 7; 24 18; 26 65; Lk 8 27) and ἐνδυμα (Mt 22 11; cf 7 15), pl., though the oldest and most widely distributed article of human apparel was probably the "loin-cloth" (Heb ırió), entirely different from "girdle" (Gr zōnē). Bib. references for clothes are nearly all to the costume of the males, owing doubtless to the fact that the garments ordinarily used indoors were worn alike by men and women.

(2) The three normal body garments, the ones most mentioned in the Scriptures, are šādāh, a rather long "under garment" provided with sleeves; kēthōnēth (Gr chálón), a long-sleeved tunic worn over the šādāh, likewise a shirt with sleeves (see Masterman, DCG, art. "Dress"); and sinālāh (Gr himasion), the cloak of AV and RV, used in the pl. for "garments" in general; and the "girdle" (Gr zōnē; Arab, zunnar). The "headdress" (two types are now in use, the "turban" and the "kufiyeh") is never definitely named in the Bible, though we know it was the universal custom among ancient Orientals to cover the head.

(3) The sinālāh (Gr himasion) signifies an "outer garment" (see below), a "mantle," or "cloak" (see lexicons). A kindred word in the Gr himatismoς, (tṛ "raiment" in Lk 9 29, "garments" in Mt 27 35, and "vesture" in Jn 19 24) stands in antithesis to kēthōnēth. The Gr chálón, Heb kēthōnēth, the "under garment," is tṛ "coat" in Mt 5 40, "clothes" in Mk 14 63. The Heb word mś̄l, Gr stōθ, Lat stola, stands for a variety of garment used only by men of rank or of the priestly order, rendered RV "robe." It stands for the long garments of the scribes rendered "long robes" (Mk 12 38; Lk 20 40) and "best robe" in the story of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15 22). (For difference between mś̄l and sinālāh, see Kennedy, one-vol HDB, 107.) Oriental influences led to the adoption of the long tunic in Rome, and in Cicero's time it was a mark of effeminacy. It came to be known in its white form as tunica alba, or "white tunic," afterward in English " alb ."

Other NT terms are παρφίλα, porphíran, the "purple" (Lk 16 19); the purple robe of Jesus is called himation in Jn 19 2; lention, "the towel" with which Jesus girded himself (13 4 5); then ἄθλων, "linen cloth" (Lk 24 12; Jn 19 40); sinālāh, "linen cloth" (Mt 27 59); and bōsōs, "fine linen" (Lk 16 19).

The primitive "aprons" of Gen 3 7, made of "sewed fig-leaves," were quite different from the "aprons" brought to the apostles in Acts 19 12. The latter were of a species known among the Romans as semicinctium, a short "waist-cloth" worn esp. by slaves (Rich, Dict. of Rom and Gr Antiqu.). Anthropology, Scripture and archaeology all witness to the use by primitive man of skins of animals as dress material (Gen 3 21, "coats of skin"; cf He 11 37, "went about Materials in sheepskins, in goatskins").

Even today the traveler will occasionally see in Pal a shepherd clad in "a coat of skin." Then, as now, goat's hair and camel's hair supplied the materials for the coarser fabrics of the poor. John the Baptist had his raiment, ἐνδυμα, of camel's hair (lit. "of camel's hairs," Mt 3 4). This was a coarse cloth made by weaving camel's hairs. There is no evidence that coats of camel's skin, like those made of goat's skin or sheep's skin have ever been worn in the East, as imagined by painters (see Meyer, Bleek, Weiss and Brodus; but cf HDB, art. "Camel"). The favorite materials, however, in Pal, as throughout the Orient, in ancient times, were wool (see Prov 27 23, "The lambs are for thy clothing") and flax (see Prov 31.
3. The "Cloth"

Garments Here the "coat" (Heb k'hthonedh) was the ordinary "inner garment" worn by the Jew of the day, in which he did the work of the day (see Mt 24:18; Mk 13:16). It resembled the Roman "tunic," corresponding most nearly to our "long shirt," reaching below the knees always, and, in case it was designed for dress occasions, reaching almost to the ground. Sometimes "two coats" were worn (Lk 3:11; cf Mt 10:10; Mk 6:9), but in general only one. It was this garment of Jesus that is said by John (19:23) to have been "without seam, woven from the top throughout."

(2) The word himation, here rendered "coat," denotes the well-known "outer garment" of the Jews (see Mt 9:20.21; 14:36; 21:7.8; but cf also 9:16; 17:2; 24:18; 26:65; 27:31.35). It appears in some cases to have been a loose robe, but in most others, certainly, it was a large square piece of cloth, like a modern shawl, which could be wrapped around the person, with more or less taste and comfort. Now these two, with the "girdle" (a necessary and almost universal article of oriental dress), were commonly all the garments worn by the ordinary man of the Orient. The "outer garment" was frequently used by the poor and by the traveler as his only covering at night, just as shawls are used among us now.

(3) The common Heb name for this "outer garment" in the OT is as above, simlah or salmâh. Most cases it was of "wool," though sometimes of "linen," and was as a rule certainly the counterpart of the himation of the Gr (this is its name throughout the NT). It answered, too, to the pallium of the Romans. It belonged, like them, not to the Should be returned before sunset—"for that is his only covering, it is his raiment for his skin: whereon shall he sleep? . . . for I am gracious" (Ex 22:27). The Jewish tribunals would naturally, therefore, allow the "inner garment" to be taken by legal process, rather than the outer one (Mt 5:40; Lk 6:29); but Jesus virtually teaches that rather than have difficulty or indulge animosity one would better yield one's rights in this, as in other matters; of 1 Cor 6:7.

Some identify the simlah of the ancient Hebrews with modern abâ, the coarse blouse or overcoat worn today by the Syrian peasant (Nowack, Benziger, Mackie in HDB); but the distinction between these two garments of the Jews, so clearly made in the NT, seems to confirm the conclusion otherwise reached, that this Jewish "outer garment" closely resembled, if it was not identical with, the himation of the Greeks (see Jew Enc, art. "Cloke") and 1-vol HDB, "Dress," 197; but of Masterman, DCG, art. "Dress," 499, and Dearmer, DCG, art. "Cloke"). In no respect has the variety of renderings in our EV done more to conceal from Eng. readers the meaning of the original than in the case of this word simlah. For instance it is the "garment" with which Noah's nakedness was covered (Gen 9:23); the "clothes" in which the Hebrews bound up their kneading-troughs (Ex 12:34); the "garment" of Gideon in Jgs 8:25; the "raiment" of Ruth 3:3; just as the himation of the NT is the "cloak" of Mt 5:40, the "clothes" of Mt 24:18 AV (RV "cloak"), the "garment" (MK 13:16 AV, RV "cloak").

(1) In considering the under garments, contrary to the impression made by EV, we must begin with the "loin-cloth" (Heb 'ezor), which 4. The unlike the "girdle" (see Girdle), was Under always worn next to the skin. The Garments figurative use made of it in Is. 11:5, and Jer 13:11, e.g. will be lost unless this is remembered. Often it was the only "undergarment," as with certain of the prophets (Elijah, 2 K 1:8; cf John the Baptist, Mt 3:4; Isaiah, 20:2, and Jeremiah, 13:11). In later times it was displaced among the Hebrews by the "shirt" or endâmata, or garments "put on," but to the peri-bêlêmatha, or garments "wrapped around" the body. It was concerning this "cloak" that the Law of Moses provided that, if it were taken in pawn, it “tunic” (see Tunic). The universal “sign of mourning” was the girding of the waist with an ‘ezor or “hair-cloth” (EV “sack-cloth”). A “lining-cloth” of “linen” was worn by the priests of early times and bore the special name of ephodh (1 S 2 S 2; cf. 2 S 14 ff.).

(2) The ordinary “under garment,” later worn by all classes—certain special occasions and individuals being exceptions—was the “shirt” (Heb khtoneth) which, as we have seen, reappears as chiton in Gr, and tunica in Lat. It is uniformly rendered “coat” in EV, except that RVm has “tunic” in Jn 19 23. The well-known piece of Assyrian sculpture, representing the siege and capture of Lachish by Sennacherib, shows the Jewish captives, male and female, dressed in a moderately tight garment, fitting close to the neck (cf Job 30 18) and reaching almost to the ankles; which must represent the khtoneth, or kuttoneth of the period, as worn in towns at least. Probably the kuttoneth of the peasantry was both looser and shorter, resembling more the modern kamas of the Syrian fellah (cf Lat camisia, and Eng. “chemise”).

(3) As regards sleeves, they are not expressly mentioned in the OT, but the Lachish tunics mentioned above have short sleeves, reaching halfway to the elbows. This probably represents the prevailing type of sleeve among the Hebrews of the earlier period. An early Egypt picture of a group of Scm traders (c 2000 BC) shows a colored tunic without sleeves, which, fastened on the left shoulder, left the right arm free. Another variety of sleeves, restricted to the upper and wealthy classes, had long and wide sleeves reaching to the ground. This was the tunic worn by Tamar, the royal princess (2 S 13 18, “A garment of divers colors upon her; for with such robes were the king’s daughters that were virgins apparelled”), “the tunic of [i.e. reaching to] palms and soles” worn by Joseph, familiarly known as the “coat of many colors” (Gen 37 3), a rendering which represented an abandoned tradition (cf Kennedy, HDB). The long white linen tunic, which was the chief garment of the ordinary Jewish priest of the later period, had sleeves, which, for special reasons, were tied to the arms (cf Jos, Ant, III, vii, 2).

(4) Ultimately it became usual, even with the people of the lower ranks, to wear an under “tunic,” or “real shirt” (Jos, Ant, XVII, vii, 7 ; Mish, passim, where it is called halt). In this case the upper tunic is the chiton proper, which, being removed at night (cf Cant 5 3, “I have put off my garment”). The material for the tunic might be either (1) woven on the loom in two pieces, and afterward put together without cutting (cf Dict. of Rom and Gr Antq., art. “Tunica”), or (2) the garment might be woven whole on a special loom, “without seam,” i.e. so as to require no sewing, as we know from the description given in Jn 19 23, and from other sources, was the chiton worn by Our Lord just before His crucifixion. The garments intended by the Heb (Dnl 3 21–27), rendered “coats” AV, have not been certainly made out. The AVm has “mantles,” the ERV “hosen,” ARV “breeces” (see Hosyn). For “coat of mail” (1 S 17 5) see Arnos.

When the Hebrews first emerged into view, they seem to have had no covering for the head except on special demand, as in case of war.

5. The headdress

(1) when a leather-helmet was worn (see Headdress Arnos). Ordinarily, as with the follow of Pal today, bare or covered, it served as a fillet (cf 1 K 20 32, and Virgil, Aeneid [Dryden], iv.213: “A golden fillet binds his awful brows”). Such “fillets” may be seen surviving in the representation of Syrians on the monuments of Egypt. Naturally, in the course of time, exposure to the Syrian sun in the tropical summer would compel recourse to some such covering as the modern kufiyeh, which lets in the breeze, but protects in a graceful, easy way, the head, the neck and the shoulders. The head-gear of Ben-hadad’s tribute-carriers (see above) resembles the Phrygian cap.

Modern Druze Headdress.

The head covering, however, which is best attested, at least for the upper ranks of both sexes, is the turban (Heb ganith, from a root meaning “wind round”). It is the ladies’ “hood” of Isa 6 1, AV “turban”; the “royal diadem” of Isa 62 3, and the “mitre” of Zec 3 5, RVm “turban” or “diadem.” Ezekiel’s description of a lady’s headdress: “I bound thee with attire of fine linen” (Ezk 16 10 m), points to a turban. For the egg-shaped turban of the priests see Bones (RV “head-lace”). The hats of Dnl 3 21 (RV “mantles”) are thought by some to have been the conical Bab headdress seen on the monuments. According to 2 Mac 4 12 RV the young Jewish nobles were compelled by Antiochus Epiphanes to wear the pélotas, the low, broad-brimmed hat associated with Hermes. Other forms of headdress were in use in NT times, as we learn from the Mish, as well as from the NT, e.g. the sudar (ευρωφυς, σαικλωθος) from Lat sudarium (a cloth for wiping off perspiration, sudor) which is probably the “napkin” of Jn 11 44; 20 7, although there it appears as a kerchief, or covering, for the head. The female captives from Lachish (see above) wore over their tunics an upper garment, which covers the forehead and falls down over the shoulders to the ankles. Whether this is the garment intended by the Heb in Ruth 3 15, rendered “vail” by AV and “mantle” by RV, and “kerchiefs for the head” (Ezk 13 18 RV), we cannot say. The “vail” with which Rebekah and Tamar “covered themselves” (Gen 24 65; 38 13) was most likely a large "mantle" in which the whole body could be wrapped, like the sādāh (see above). But it is seems impossible to draw a clear distinction between "mantle" and "veil" in the OT (Kennedy). The case of Moses (Ex 34 33) gives us the only expression of a "face-veil." The ancient Hebrews, like Orientals in general, went barefoot within doors. Out of doors they usually wore sandals, less frequently

6. Footgear. The simplest form of sandal then, as now, consisted of a sole of untanned leather, bound to the foot by a leather thong, the shoe-latchet of Gen 14 23 and the latchet of Mk 1 7, etc. In the obelisk of Shalmanezer, however, Jehu's attendants are distinguished by shoes completely covering the feet, from the Assyrians, who are represented as wearing sandals fitted with a heel-cap. Ladies of Ezekiel's day wore shoes of "sealskin" (Ezk 16 10 RV). The soldiers' "laced boot" may be intended in Isa 9 5 (RV's). Then, as now, on entering the house of a friend, or a sacred precinct (Ex 3 5; Josh 5 15), or in case of mourning (2 S 13 30), the sandals, or shoes, were removed. The priests performed their offices in the Temple in bare feet (cf the modern requirement on entering a mosque).

In general we may say that the clothes worn by Christ and His disciples were of the simplest and least sumptuous kinds. A special interest must attach even to the clothes that Jesus wore. These consisted, it seems quite certain, not of just five separate articles (see Ederseim, of the modern requirement on entering a mosque).

7. The Dress of Jesus and His Disciples. LTJM, I, 625, but of six. In His day it had become customary to wear a linen shirt (bāhāṣ) beneath the tunic (see above).

That Our Lord wore such a "shirt" seems clear from the mention of the laying aside of the upper garments (hindīta, pl. i.e. the "mantle" and the "tunic," before washing His disciples' feet (Jn 13 4). The tunic proper worn by Him, as we have seen, was "woven without seam" throughout, and was of the kind, therefore, that fitted closely about the neck, and had short sleeves. Above the tunic would naturally be the linen girdle, wound several times about the waist. On His feet were leather sandals (Mt 3 11). His upper garment was of the customary sort and shape, probably of white woven cloth, as is suggested by the details of the account of the Transfiguration (Mk 9 3), with the four prescribed "tassels" at the corners. As to His head-dress, we have no description of it, but we may set it down as certain that no Jewish teacher of that day would appear in public with the head uncovered.

He probably wore the customary white linen "napkin" (sudarium), wound round the head as a turban, with the ends of it falling down over the neck. The dress of His disciples was, probably, not materially different.

In conclusion it may be said that, although the dress of even orthodox Jews today is as various as their lands of residence and their languages, yet there are two garments worn by them the world over, the tālīth and the 'arba' kānphōth (see DCG, art. "Dress," col. 1). Jews who affect special sanctity, esp. those living in the Holy Land, still wear the tālīth all day, as was the common custom in Christ's time. As the earlier one of these two garments, the 'arba' kānphōth is in 1350 AD, it is clear that it cannot have existed in NT times.

DRINK OFFERING. See SACRIFICE IN OT AND NT.

kērā; from "םד, šēkēhār, "to be or become drunk"); probably from the same root as sugar, saccharine). With the exception of Nu 28 7 (wine, etc.) and Dt 32 9 (wine, always coupled with "wine"). The two terms are commonly used as mutually exclusive, and as together exhaustive of all kinds of intoxicants.

Originally šēkēhār seems to have been a general term for intoxicating drinks of all kinds, without reference to the material out of which they were made; and in that sense, it would include wine. Reminiscences of this older usage may be found in Nu 28 7 where it is clearly used in place of the word ašaret, and equivalent to wine, as may be seen by comparing it with Nu 14, and Ex 29 40, where the term "mantle" is described as the drink offering is expressly designated "wine").

When the Hebrews were living a nomadic life, before their settlement in Canaan, the grape-wine was practically unknown to them, and there would be no need of a special term to describe it. But when they settled down to an agricultural life, and came to cultivate the vine, it would become necessary to distinguish it from the older kinds of intoxicants; hence the borrowed word yaqīn ("wine") was applied to the former, while the latter would be classed together under the old term šēkēhār, which would then come to mean all intoxicating beverages other than wine (Lev 10 9; Nu 6 3; Dt 14 26; Prov 20 1; Isa 24 9). The exact nature of these drinks is not clearly indicated in the Bible itself. The only fermented beverage other than grape-wine, specifically named is pomegranate-wine (Cant 8 2: "the juice of my pomegranate"); RV ṣēkēhār and pomegranate); but we may infer that other kinds of šēkēhār besides that obtained from pomegranates were in use, such as drinks made from dates, honey, raisins, barley, apples, etc. Probably Jerome (c 400 AD) was near the mark when he wrote, "Sīkera in the Heb tongue means every kind of drink which can intoxicate, whether made from grain or from the juice of apples, or when honeycomb is boiled down into a sweet and strong drink, or the fruit of palm oppressed into liquor, and when water is coloured and thickened from boiled herbs" (Ep. ad Nepotianum). Thus šēkēhār is a comprehensive term for all kinds of fermented drinks, exclusive of wine.

Probably the most common sort of šēkēhār used in Bib. times was palm- or date-wine. This is not actually mentioned in the Bible, and we do not meet with its Heb name ṣēkēp in the time of the Captivity period. But it is frequently referred to in the Assyrian-Sab contracts of Ummu-Nefer (Assur, 13th cent. B.C.), and other evidence we infer that it was very well known among the ancient Sem peoples. Moreover, it is known' that the palm tree flourished abundantly in B.H. lands, and the presumption is therefore very strong that wine made of the produce of the palm dates was a common beverage. It must not be supposed, however, that the term shekhrār refers to date-wine alone. It rather designates all intoxicating liquors other than grape-wine, while in a few cases it probably includes even wine.

There can be no doubt that shekhrār was intoxicating. This is proved (i) from the etymology of the word, it being derived from shekerār, “to be or become drunk” (Gen 9:21); Isa 29:9; Jer 25:27, etc.; the word for drunkard (shikkar), and for drunkenness (shekhrānūn) from the same root; (2) from descriptions of its effects; e.g. Isaiah graphically describes the stupefying effect of shekhrār on those who drink it excessively (28:7.8). Hannah defended herself against the charge of being drunk by saying, “I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink,” i.e. neither wine nor any other intoxicating liquor (1 S 15). The attempt made to prove that it was simply the unfermented juice of certain fruits is quite without foundation. Its immediate use is strongly condemned (Isa 5:11-12; Prov 20:1; see DRUNKENNESS). It was forbidden to minister to it (Lev 10:9), and to the Nazirites (Nu 6:3; 13:4.7.14; cf Lk 1:15), but was used in the sacrificial meal as drink offering (Nu 28:7), and could be bought with the tithes-money and consumed by the worshipper in the temple (Dtt 14:20). It is the weak which become stronger by means of drunkenness, their pain; but not to princes, lest it might lead them to pervert justice (Prov 31:4-7).

DROP, DROPPING: “To drop” expresses a “distilling” or “dripping” of a fluid (Jgs 5:4; Prov 3:20; Cant 5:13; Joel 3:18; Am 9:13; cf 1 S 14:26, “the honey dropped” in “a stream of honey”); Job 29:22 and Isa 45:8 read “distilled” (AV “drop”). The continuous “droppings” of rain through a leaking roof (roofs were usually made of clay in Pal, and always liable to cracks and leakage) on a “rainy day” is compared to a contentious wife (Prov 19:15; 27:15); “What is described is the irritating, unceasing, sound of the fall, drop after drop, of water through the chinks in the roof” (Plumptre loc. cit.); cf also AV Eccl 10:18 (RV “leaketh”).

DROPSY, dro’sē (δρόσυς, hūdrōpsis, “a man afflicted with hōdrōps or dropsy”): Both forms of this disease occur in Pal, that in which the limbs and body are distended with water called anaasarca, depending generally on cardiac or renal disease, and the form confined to the abdomen, usually the result of liver affection. The latter is the commoner, as liver disease is a frequent result of recurrent attacks of malarial fever. The man was evidently able to move about, as he had entered into the Pharisee’s house (Lk 14:2).

DROSS, dros (דְרָסִי, sīgh): The refuse of smelting of precious metal (Prov 25:4; 26:23); used figuratively of what is base or worthless (Isa 1:22-25; Ezk 22:18-19; Ps 119:110).

DROUGHT, drou’t. See FAMINE.

DROVE, drōv. See CATTLE.

DROWNING, drō’ning. See PUNISHMENTS.

DRUM, drum (דְּרֵם, targām; τόμπανον): This was the Heb tāgām, “tabret” or “timbrel,” a hand-drum, consisting of a ring of wood or metal covered with a tightly drawn skin, with small pieces of metal hung around the rim, like a tambourine. It was raised in the one hand and struck with the other, usually by women, but sometimes also by men, at festivities and on occasions of rejoicing. See 1 Mace 9:39, RV “timbrel.”

DRUNKENNESS, drunk’n-nes (דָרָשֵׁה, ráśeḥ, דָרָשׁ, ráš; μυθή, méthē):

I. Its Prevalence.—The Bible affords ample proof that excessive drinking of intoxicants was a common vice among the Hebrews, as among other ancient peoples. This is evident not only from individual cases of intoxication, as Noah (Gen 9:21), Lot (Gen 19:33.35), Nabal (1 S 25:36), Uriah made drunk by David (2 S 11:13), Amnon (2 S 13:28), Elah, king of Israel (1 K 18:9), Benhadad, King of Syria, and his confederates (1 K 20:16), Holofernies (Jth 13:2), etc., but also from frequent references to drunkenness as a great social evil. Thus, Amos proclaims judgment on the voluptuous and dissolute rich of Samaria “that drink wine in large bowls” (Am 6:6), and the wealthy ladies who press their husbands to join them in a carousal (4:1); he also complains that this form of self-indulgence was practised even at the expense of the poor and under the guise of religion, at the sacrifice, and the temple (Neh 13:18; 16; see also Isa 5:11.12.22, 28:1-3; 56:11f). Its prevalence is also reflected in many passages in the NT (e.g. Mt 24:49; Lk 21:34; Acts 2:13; Eph 5:18; 1 Thess 5:7). Paul complains that at Corinth even the love-feast of the Christian church which immediately preceded the celebration of the Eucharist, was sometimes the scene of excessive drinking (1 Cor 11:21). It must, however, be noted that it is almost invariably the well-to-do who are charged with this vice in the Bible. There is no evidence to prove that it prevailed to any considerable extent among the common people. Intoxicants were then an expensive luxury, beyond the reach of the poorer classes. See DRINK, SYRUP.

II. Its Symptoms and Effects.—Those are most vividly portrayed: (1) some of its physical symptoms (Job 12:25; Ps 107:27; Prov 23:29; Isa 19:14; 28:6.9; 29:10; Jer 45:16); (2) its mental effects (Isa 11:11.12; 28:1). It affords a vivid description of the universe (Prov 20:1); (4) its moral and spiritual effects. It leads to a maladministration of justice (Prov 31:5; Isa 5:25), provokes anger and a contentious, brawling spirit (Prov 20:1; 23:29; 1 Esd 3:22; Eccl 31:26.29.7), and conduces to a profane life (Eph 5:18, “riot,” “lust”). It is allied with gambling and licentiousness (Job 3:3), and indecency (Gen 9:21). Above all, it deadens the spiritual sensibilities, produces a callous indifference to religious influences and destroys all serious thought (Isa 5:12).

III. Attitude of the Bible to the Drink Question.—Intemperance is condemned in uncompromising terms by the OT and the NT, as well as by the semi-canonical writings. While total abstinence is not prescribed, a formal and universal rule, broad principles are laid down, esp. in the NT, which point in that direction.

In the OT, intemperance is most repugnant to the stern ethical rigorism of the prophets, as well as to the more utilitarian ethics of proph-conscience more sensitive to the sinfulness of overindulgence was gradually developed, and is reflected in the denunciations of the prophets and the warning of the wise men (cf references under 1 and 2, esp. Isa 511 fis. 22; 251-8; Prov 2319-33). Nowhere is the principle of total abstinence emphasized as a rule applicable to all. In particular cases it was recognized as a duty. Priests while on duty in the sanctuary were to abstain from wine and strong drink (Lev 1910; cf Ezek 4421). Nazirites were to abstain from all intoxicants during the period of their vows (Nu 63f; cf Amos 212), yet not on account of the intoxicating qualities of wine, but because they represented the simplicity of the elder pastoral life, as against the Canaanite civilization which the wine symbolized (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, 84f). So also the Rechabites abstained from wine (Jer 356.8.14) and social conveniences, because they regarded the nomadic life as more conducive to Jeh-worship than agricultural and town life, with its temptations to Baal-worship. In Daniel and his comrades we have another instance of voluntary abstinence (Dan 18-16). These, however, are isolated instances. Throughout the OT the use of wine appears as practically universal, and it is recognized as a cheering beverage (Psa 913; Ps 10415; Prov 3110; based on the sick to forget their pains (Prov 316). Moderation, however, is strongly inculcated and there are frequent warnings against the temptation and peril of the cup.

In Apoc, we have the attitude of prudence and common sense, but the prophetic note of stern denunciation is wanting. The path of Deutero-Cananites is as good as life to men, if thou drink moderately (Prov 231-8). The wine drunk in season and to satisfy is joy of heart, and gladness of soul: wine drunk largely is bitterness of soul, with provocation and conflict" (Eccl 3127-30 RV). A vivid picture of the effects of wine-drinking is given in 1 Esd 318-24. Stronger teaching on the subject is given in the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs. The use of wine is permitted to him who can use it temperately; excess and abuse is enjoined as the wiser course (XII P. 15163).

In the NT, invetement is treated as a grave sin. Only once, indeed, does Our Lord explicitly condemn drunkenness (Lk 2134), though it is implicitly condemned in other passages (Mt 2449; Lk 1245). The meagerness of the references in Our Lord's teaching is probably due to the fact already mentioned, that it was chiefly prevalent among the wealthy, and not among the poorer classes to whom Our Lord mainly ministered. The references in Paul's writings are very numerous (Gal 521; Eph 518, et al.). Temperance and sobriety in all things are everywhere insisted on (e.g. Acts 2425; Gal 523; 2 Pet 16). A bishop and those holding honorable station in the church would not be addicted to wine (1 Tim 32f; Tit 17f; 22f). Yet Jesus and His apostles were not ascetics, and the NT gives no rough-and-ready prohibition of strong drink on principle. In contrast with John the Baptist, who was a Nazirite from birth (Lk 115), Jesus was called by His enemies a "wine-bibber" (Mt 1119). He took part in festivities in which wine was drunk (Jn 210). There are indications that He regarded wine as a source of innocent enjoyment (Lk 191; Jn 217). There is no distinction between intoxicating and unfermented wine is a case of unjustifiable special pleading. It must be borne in mind that the drink question is far more complex and acute in modern than in Bib. times, and that the conditions of the modern world have given rise to problems which were not within the horizon of NT writers. The habit of excessive drinking has spread enormously among the common people, owing largely to the cheapening of alcoholic drinks. The fact that the evil exists today in the greatest proportion of all abstinence insisting on a double standard and a special crusade. But rather than defend total abstinence by a false or forced eves, it was better to admit that the principle is not formally laid down in the NT, while maintaining that there are broad principles exemplified, which in view of modern conditions should lead to voluntary abstinence from all intoxicants. Such principles may be found, e.g. in Our Lord's teaching in Mt 1624f; Mk 942f, and in the great Pauline passages—Rom 1413-21; 1 Cor 83-13.

4. Drunkenness. Metaphor.—Drunkenness very frequently supplies Bib. writers with striking metaphors and similes. Thus, it symbolizes intellectual or spiritual perplicity (Job 1225; Isa 1914; Jer 339), bewildermment and helplessness under calamity (Jer 1313; Ezek 2333). It is also represented as a figure for the movements of sailors on board ship in a storm (Ps 1071, and for the convulsions of the earth on the day of Jeh (Isa 2420). Jeh's "cup of staggering" is a symbol of addiction, and the fury of the drunkard is compared to a swine (Isa 5117-23; cf Isa 636; Jer 2515 f; Ezek 2333; Ps 768). The sword and the arrow are said to be soaked with drink like a drunkard with wine (Dt 3242; Jer 4610). In the Apocalypse, Babylon (i.e. Rome) is portrayed under the figure of a "great harlot" who makes kings "drunken with the wine of her fornication"; and who is herself "drunken with the blood of the saints, and . . . of the martyrs of Jesus" (Rev 172b).

DRUSILLA, dru-6-i-lia (Δρούσιλλα, Drousilla, or Δρούσιλλα, Droussila): Wife of Felix, a Jewess, who along with her husband 'heard [Paul] concerning the faith in Christ Jesus' during Paul's detention in Caesarea (Acts 2424). B text gives the rendering 'Drusilla, the wife of Felix, a Jewess, asked to see Paul and to hear the word.' The fact that Drusilla was a Jewess explains her curiosity, but Paul, who was probably well known, could hardly deny the past history of her and Felix, refused to satisfy their request in the way they desired, and preach to them instead concerning righteousness and self-restraint and the final judgment. At this "Felix was much terrified." (Acts 2626). Drusilla, being left in bonds on the retirement of Felix was due to the desire of the latter to please Drusilla (cf Acts 2427). Probably this explanation, besides that of the accepted text, was true also, as Drusilla, who was a member of the ruling house, saw in Paul an enemy of its power, and hated him for his condemnation of her own private sins.

The chief other source of information regarding Drusilla is Jos. Drusilla was the youngest of the three daughters of Agrippa I, her sisters being Berenice and Musa. She was born about 36 AD and was married when 14 years old to Azaius, king of Emesa. Shortly afterward she was induced to desert her husband by Felix, who employed a Cyprian sorcerer, Simon by name, to carry out his purpose. She was also influenced to take this step by the cruelty of Azaius and the hatred of Bernice who was jealous of her beauty. Her marriage with Felix took place about 54 AD and by him she had one son, Agrippa, who perished under Titus in an eruption of Vesuvius. After the death of "the woman" who perished along with Agrippa (Ant., XX, vii, 2) refers probably not to his mother Drusilla but to his wife.

DUALISM, du'6-al-'iz'm. See PHILOSOPHY.
DUE, dū. See DUTY.

DUKE, dūk: The rendering in AV in Gen 36 15 ff; Ex 15 15, and 1 Ch 1 51 ff of נון, ‘al-lūph (ARV and ERVM ‘chief’), and in Josh 13 21 of אֹבְקֵית (‘dukes’, RV ‘princes’). It occurs also, as the rendering of στρατηγός in 1 Chr 25 1. Elsewhere אֹבְקֵית is 4 ἀρχηγοί ‘princes’ or ‘principal men’. The fact that with two exceptions the term is applied in RV only to the chiefs of Edom has led to the impression that in the family of Esau the chief bore a special and hereditary title. But ‘duke’ was a general term for tribal chief or prince (of Zec 9 7; 12 5 6; RV ‘chieftains’, AV ‘governors’).

Moreover, at the time the AV was made the word ‘duke’ was not used as a title in England: the term had the same general force as dux, the word employed in the Vulg. So Sir T. Elyot (d. 1546) speaks of “Hannibal, duke of Carthage” (The Governor, ii, 233); Shakespeare, Henry V, III, 20, “Be merciful, great duke, to men of mould” (cf Midsummer Night’s Dream, i, 2 21); Sylvester (1991) Du Baron, “The great Duke, thorough, (In the holy saw | Upon Mt. Horeb learn’d eternal law.” In a still earlier age Witnesses the date of the Messiah (Mt 2 6); and in Select Works, III, 137, “Jesus Christ, duke of oure hater.”

Yet in all probability the Heb word was more specific than ‘chief’ or ‘duke’ in the broad sense. For if אֹבְקֵית is derived from אֹבָק, ‘thousand’, ‘tabor’, the title meant the leader of a clan, a ‘chilarch’ (cf LXX, Zec 9 7 12 5 6). ARV has eliminated the word ‘duke’. See CHIEF.

DULCIMER, dul’i-ser. See MUSIC under NEB’el and SUMPHEIOn.

DUMAH, dú’ma (דּוֹמָה, dōmāth, ‘silence’): This word occurs in the OT with the following significations: (1) the land of silence or death, the grave (Ps 94 17; 115 17); (2) a town in the highlands of Judah between Hebron and Beerseba, now ed-De‘anah (Jos 15 52); (3) an emblematical designation of Edom in the obscure oracle (Isa 21 11 12); (4) an Ishmaelite tribe in Arabia (Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30). According to the Arab, geographers this son of Ishmael founded the town of Dumat-al-Jandal, the stone-built Dumatl, so called to distinguish it from another D. near the Euphrates. The former now bears the name of the Jauf (‘belly’), being a depression situated half-way between the head of the Persian Gulf and the head of the gulf of Akaba. Its people in the time of Mohammed were Christians of the tribe of Keb. It contained a great well from which the palms and crops were irrigated. It has often been visited by European travelers in recent times. See Jour. Royal Geog. Soc., XXIV (1854), 138–58; W. G. Palgrave, Central and Eastern Arabia, ch ii. It is possible that the oracle in Isa (no. 3 above) concerns this place.

DUMB, dum (דָע, dūm, דֹּעִם, dō’im, filling, lit. ‘tied in the tongue’; δυσμένης, δυσμήνης): Used either as expressing the physical condition of speechlessness, generally associated with deafness, or figuratively as meaning the silence produced by the weight of God’s judgments (Ps 39 2 9; Dn 10 15) or the oppression of tormenting calamities (Ps 104 13). As an adj. it is used to characterize inefficient teachers destitute of spirituality (“dumb dogs,” Isa 56 10). The speechlessness of Saul’s companions (Acts 9 7) was due to fright; that of the man without the word, because he had no excuse to give (Mt 22 12). Idols are called dumb, because helpless and voiceless (Hab 2 18 19; 1 Cor 12 2). The dumbness of the sheep before the shepherd is a token of submission (Isa 53 7; Acts 8 32).

Temporary dumbness was inflicted as a sign upon Ezekiel (3 26; 24 27; 33 22) and as a punishment for unbelief upon Zacharias (Lk 1 22). There are several cases recorded of Our Lord’s healing the dumb (Mt 15 30; Mk 7 37; Lk 11 14, etc.). Dumbness is often associated with imbecility and was therefore regarded as due to demoniac possession (Mt 9 32; 12 22). The evangelists therefore describe the healing of these as effected by the casting out of demons. This is esp. noted in the case of the epileptic boy (Mk 9 17). The deaf man with the impediment in his speech (Mk 7 32) is said to have been cured by licking the string of his tongue. This does not necessarily mean that he was tongue-tied, which is a condition causing lisping, not stammering; he was probably one of these deaf persons who produce babbling, incoherent and meaningless sounds. I saw in the asylum in Jerusalem a child born blind and deaf, who though dumb, produced inarticulate noises.

In an old 14th-cent. psalter ‘dumb’ is used as a vb. in Ps 39 “I ‘dumbled and medled and was full stille.”

DUNG, dung, DUNG GATE (תּוֹמָה, ‘asaphóth, פֶּהֶנ, do’men, פֶּה, perech, ἄσφαλον, skabalon, etc.): Nine different words occurring in the Heb have been used as ‘dung’ or ‘OT. The word used to designate one of the gates of Jerus (‘asaphóth, Neh 2 13; 3 14) is more general than the others and may mean any kind of refuse. The gate was probably so named because outside it was the general dump heap of the city. Visitors in recent years riding outside the city walls of Jerus, on their way to the Mt. of Olives or Jericho, may have witnessed such a dump against the wall, which has existed for generations.

The first mention made of dung is in connection with sacrificial rites. The sacred law required that the dung, along with what parts of the animal were not burned on the altar, should be burned outside the camp (Ex 29 14; Lev 4 11; 8 17; 16 27; Nu 19 5).

The fertilizing value of dung was appreciated by the cultivator, as is indicated by Lk 13 8 and possibly Ps 83 10 and Isa 25 10.

Dung was also used as a fuel. Ezek 4 12 15 will be understood when it is known that the dung of animals is a common fuel throughout Pal and Syria, where other fuel is scarce. During the summer, villagers gather the manure of their cattle, horses or camels, mix it with straw, make it into cakes and dry it for use as fuel for cooking. The dung, when wood or charcoal or straw are not procurable. It burns slowly like peat and meets the needs of the kitchen. In Mesopotamia the writer saw it being used with forced draft to fire a steam boiler. There was no idea of uncleanness in Ezekiel’s mind, associated with the use of animal dung as fuel (Ezek 4 15).

Figuratively: Dung was frequently used figuratively to express the idea (a) of worthlessness, esp. a perishable article for which no one cares (1 K 14 10; 2 K 6 25; 9 37; Job 20 7; Ps 83 10; Jer 8 2; 9 22; 16 4; 25 33; Zeph 1 17; Phil 3 8 [ARV ‘refuse’]). Dunghill was used in the same way (1 S 2 8; Ezx 6 11; Ps 113 7; Isa 35 10; Dn 2 5; 3 20; Lk 14 35; Lam 4 5); (b) as an expression of disgust (2 K 18 27; Isa 36 12); (c) of rebuke (Mal 2 3).

DURA, dû'ra (דֻּרָא, dû'ra): The name of the plain on which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, set up the great golden image which all his subjects were ordered to worship (Dn 3 1). Opposed plant it to the E. of Babylon, near a small river and mounds bearing the name of Dourist or Dâiar, where, also, was what seemed to be the base of a great statue (Ézpéld. scientifique en Mésopotamie, I, 238 f.). Others have believed that name to indicate a portion of the actual site of Babylon within the great wall (dûra) of the city—perhaps the rampart designated dûr Ša-anna, "the rampart [of the city] Lofty-defense," a name of Babylon. The fact that the plain was within the city of Babylon precludes an identification with the city Dûru, which seems to have lain in the neighborhood of Erech (Hommel, Gremium, 264, n. 5). It is noteworthy that the LXX substitutes Δεόη, Deoir, for Dura, suggesting that the Gr translators identified it with the Bab Duru, a city which apparently lay toward the Elamite border. It seems to have been called also Dûr-li, "god's rampart." That it was at some distance from Dûru is shown by the Mïd. IV, 30 (39) in which Dûru, Dûrat and Yuwa (Cuthian), intervene between Dûru or Dûr-li and Tûnhr (Babylon). "The plain of the dûr" or "rampart" within Babylon would therefore seem to be the best rendering. T. G. Pinckney.

DURE, dûr (πρόκαιρος, prókairos): Used for "endure" (q.v.), AV Mt 13 21 (RV "endureth").

DUST, dust (דִּשָּׁה, ḥiphâh; κοντόριος, kontoriois, χατός, choas): Small particles of earth. The word has several figurative and symbolic meanings: (1) Dust being the material out of which God is said to have formed man (Gen 2 7), it became a symbol of man's frailty (Ps 103 14, "For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust"); cf Gen 19 27; Job 4 19, etc., and of his mortality (Gen 3 19, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return"); cf Job 34 15; Ps 104 29; Ecc 3 20; Eccl 12 7, etc.) Hence it is used figuratively for the grave (Ps 22 15 22). (2) Dust-air. Such airs, as to lie in the dust, to lick the dust, to sprinkle dust on the head, are symbols expressive of deep humiliation, abasement or lamentation (eg Job 2 12; 42 6, Ps 72 9; Isa 2 10; 47 1; 49 23; Lam 2 10; 3 17; Rev 18 19). Hence such expressions as "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust," i.e. out of their state of lowliness (1 S 2 8; Ps 113 7). (3) Throwing dust was an act expressive of execration. Thus Shimel ("cursed David and "threw stones at him, and cast dust," lit. "dusted [him] with dust") (2 S 16 13). So the crowd which Paul addressed at Jerusalem manifested their wrath against him by tossing about their garments and casting dust into the air (Acts 22 23). (4) Shaking the dust off one's feet against anyone (Mt 10 14; Mk 6 11; Lk 9 5; 10 11; Acts 13 51) is symbolic of renunciation, as we would say "washed one's hands of him," an intimation that all further intercourse was at an end. It was practiced by the Pharisees on passing from gentile to Jewish soil, it being a rabbinical doctrine that the dust of a heathen land defiles. (5) It is also used fig. for an innumerable multitude (eg Gen 13 10; 28 14; Job 27 16; Ps 28 27). (6) The expression "Jehovah will rain the dust" (cf Lam 4 13) means the dust in consequence of the drought shall fall down instead of rain on the dry ground. In Judaea and vicinity during a sirocco, the air becomes filled with sand and dust, which are blown down by the wind with great violence. D. Miall Edwards.

DUTY, dû'ti (דַּבָּר, dâḇâr; ἐπιθύμησις, epîthymēsis): The word d. occurs only three times in the OT and twice in the NT. In the OT it is the tr of dâḇâr, which, meaning originally "speech," or "word," came to denote any particular "matter" that had to be attended to. In the two places where it is rendered "duty" (2 Ch 8 14; Ezr 3 4) the reference is to the performance of the Temple services—praise and sacrifice—and it is probably from these passages that the phrase "taking duty" in church services is derived. In other passages we have different words employed to denote the priest's d. du'ra: AV Lev 10 13 14, āhôh ("statutory portion"); Dt 18 3, mishpâ'î ("judgment"). In Prov 3 27, we have a reference to d. in the moral sense, "Withhold not good from them (i.e. as in AVv, "from the owners thereof"). In Ex 21 10 we have the "duty of marriage" (ānâh), that which was due to the wife.

In the NT "duty" is expressed by opheîlô, "to owe," "to be due." In Lk 17 10, we have "Say, . . . we have done that which was our duty to do," and in Rom 15 27 AV, it is said of the Gentiles with reference to the Jewish Christians, "Their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

Dwarf, dwâr: The rendering in EV of Heb פֶּן, Pân, "thin," "small," in Lev 21 20, where a list is given of physical failings which forbade a man of the seed of Aaron to officiate at the altar, though he might partake of the sacrificial gifts. The precise meaning of the Heb word here is uncertain; elsewhere it is used of the lean knee (Gen 41 3) and blasted ears (ver 23) of Pharaoh's dream; of the grains of mice (Ex 8 23); of the pest of locusts (1 K 19 12), of dust (Isa 29 5), etc. LXX and Vulg suggest defective eyes; but "withered" would perhaps best express the meaning. See Priests and Levites.

Dwell, dwel: (1) In the OT "dwell" tr 9 words, of which by far the most frequent is בָּשָׂם, bâshâ, "to sit down," tr4 "dwell" over 400 times (Gen 4 20; Jesh 20 4; 1 Ch 17 4 5, etc); also very frequently "sit," and, sometimes, "stay" (Ex 15 11; Ps 34 7; Prov 4 20). Another word often rendered "dwell" is בָּשָׂה, bâshâ, shākhan or shākhân ("to settle down"), from which is derived the rabbinic word בָּשַׂמָּה, bâshāmâ (lit. "that which dwells"), the light on the mercy-seat which symbolized the Divine presence (Ex 25 8, etc). In order to avoid appearing to localize the Divine Being, wherever God is said to "dwell" in one place, the Tg renders that He "causes His Shekinah to dwell" there.

(2) In the NT "dwell" most frequently stands for oikê, oikō, or one of its compounds; also ἐκεῖος, ekhoïos, and (chiefly in the Johannine writings) ἔνεα, enêa, which, however, is always tr" abide" in RV, and generally in AV. Mention may be made of the mystical significance of the word in some NT passages, of the indwelling of the Father or of the Godhead in Christ (Jn 14 23; 15 5, 18), of the Godhead in Christ (Jn 14 26 50 AV; Eph 3 17), and in God (1 Jn 4 15 AV; cf Ps 80 1; 91 1), and of the Holy Spirit or God in the believer (Jn 14 17; AV 1 Jn 3 24; 4 15 f.)

Dye, dî, DYEING, dî'ing (נָטַה, netâh, כָּנָה, kānâh; גָּפָה, gophâh): Four different Heb words have been tr"dyed": AV (a)
The reference and other color words mentioned elsewhere (see Color) indicate that the Israelites were acquainted with dyed stuffs, even if they themselves did not do the dyeing. An analysis of the various bibl. references shows that purple colors were produced on cloth by dyeing, namely, purple, blue, (violet), crimson and scarlet. Of these, purple is the one best known because of the many historical references to it. It was the symbol of royalty and luxury. Because of its high price, due to the expensive method of obtaining it, only royalty and the rich could afford purple attire. One writer tells us that the dyestuff was worth its weight in silver. Probably it was because of its scarcity, and because it was one of the very limited number of colors known, rather than for any remarkable beauty of color, that the purple was so much sought after. If Pliny's estimate is to be accredited, then 'in the dyes the smell of the same was pensive and luxurious, and the color itself was harsh, of a greenish hue and strongly resembling that of the sea when in a tempestuous state.'

The purple and blue dyes were extracted from shellfish. The exact process used by the ancients is not certain. This question is not much disputed now. 1. Purple and Blue and Sidon were noted as the suppliers of these colors, hence the name "Tyrian purple." The inhabitants of these cities were at first simply dyers in the dyeing of the attempts. Various species of the murex are found today at Haifa (Syria), about the Gr isles and on the N. coast of Africa. The purple color has been produced from them by modern chemists, but it is of historical interest only, in the light of the discovery of modern artificial dyes with which it could not compete commercially.

Two words have been used in the Heb Bible to describe the colors from shellfish: (a) 'argamim (Cbl., "purple"); (b) 'tab'ot, and (c) 'shani. We know nothing further about the method of producing these colors than that they were both obtained from the kermes insect which feeds on a species of live oak growing in Spain and Turkey. The modern dyer can obtain several shades from the cochineal insect by varying the mordants or assistants used with the dye. Pliny mentions the same fact as being known by the ancient Egyptians. Some of the Syrian dyers still use the kermes, commonly called 'død' ("worms"), although many of them have been adopted to the European dyes which they indiscriminately call død framyng ("foreign worms"). The 'rama's skins dyed red' mentioned in Ex 25 are still made in Syria. After the ram's skin has been tanned in sumac, it is laid out on a table and a solution of the dye, made by boiling død in water, is rubbed on. After the dye is dry, the skin is rubbed with oil and finally polished. No native product is more characteristic of the country than the slippers, Beduin shoes, and other leather articles made from 'rama's skins dyed red' (see TANNER). Other dyes probably known were:

(1) Madder.—In Jgs 10 1, we read that "after Abimelech there arose to save Israel Tola, the son of Puah." These were probably names of clans. In the Heb they are also Dyers Probable names. Tola is the scarlet dye ably Known and pu'ah, if, as is probable, it is the same as the Arab. fawah, means "madder." This would add another dyestuff. Until the discovery of the cochineal, or rather the growing of fawah was one of the industries of Cyprus and Syria. It was exported to Europe and was also used locally for producing "Turkey red" on cotton and for dyeing dull reds on wool for cloths. (see TUTANTRA). It was the custom near Damascus for a father to plant a new madder field for each son that was born. The field began to yield in time to support the boy and later become his inheritance. Madder is mentioned in the Talul and by early Latin writers. A Saracen's helmet and a shield of similar origin, in the possession of the writer, are lined with madder-dyed cotton.

(2) Indigo.—Another dye has been discovered among the Egypt mummy cloths, namely, Indigo. Indigo blue was used in weaving to form the borders of the cloths. This pigment was probably imported from India.

(3) Yellows and browns of doubtful origin have also been found in the Egyptian tombs. The Jews acquired from the Phoenicians the secret of dyeing, and later held the monopoly in this trade in some districts. A Jewish guild of purple dyers is mentioned on a tombstone in Hierapolis. In the 1st century A.D. the Jews were still the principal dyers at Tyre. Akhissar, a Jewish stronghold in Asia Minor, was famous as a dyeing city. See also ATIRE, DYED.

Dysentery, dis'en-ter-i (συναρπασία, dysentēria): In Acts 28 8 RV uses this word in place of the phrase "bloody flux" of AV to describe the disease by which the father of Publius was affected in Malta at the time of S. Paul's shipwreck. The acute form of this disease is often attended with a high temperature, hence Luke speaks of it as "fever and dysentery" (purotia kat dysentēry). In 2 Ch 21 19 there is reference to an epidemic of a similar disease is still occasionally epidemic in Malta where there have been several bad outbreaks among the garrison in the last cent., and it has proved to be an intractable and fatal disease there. It is due to a parasitic microbe, the Bacillus dysenteriae. In 2 Ch 21 19 there is reference to an epidemic of a similar nature in the days of Jehoram. The malady, as predicted by Elisha, attacked the king and assumed a chronic form in the course of which portions of the intestine sloughed. This condition sometimes occurs in the amoebic form of dysentery, cases of which sometimes last over two years.

EAGLE, "\(\gamma\), nesher; ἄερος, aetos; Lat aquila): A bird of the genus aquila of the family falconidae. The Heb nesher, meaning "to tear with the beak," is almost invariably tr. "eagle," throughout the Bible; yet many of the most important references compel the admission that the bird to which they applied was a vulture. There were many large birds and carrion eaters flocking over Pal, attracted by the offal from animals slaughtered for tribal feasts and continuous sacrifice. The eagle family could not be separated from the vultures by their habit of feeding, for they ate the offal from slaughter as well as the vultures. One distinction always holds good. Eagles never flock. They select the tallest trees of the forest, the topmost crag of the mountain, and pairs live in solitude, hunting and feeding singly, whenever possible carrying their prey to the nest so that the young may gain strength and experience by tearing at it and feeding themselves. The vultures are friendly, and collect and feed in flocks. So wherever it is recorded that a "flock came down on a carcasse," there may have been an eagle or two in it, but the body of it were vultures. Because they came in such close contact with birds of prey, the natives came nearer dividing them into families than any birds. Of perhaps a half-dozen, they recognized three eagles, they knew three vultures, four or five falcons, and several kites; but almost every Bib. reference is tr. "eagle" no matter how evident the text makes it that the bird was a vulture. For example, Mic 1 16: "Make thee bald, and cut off thy hair for the children of thy delight: enlarge thy baldness as the eagle [in "vulture"]; for they are gone into captivity from thee." This is a reference to the custom of shaving the head when in mourning, but as Pal knew no bald eagle, the text could refer only to the bare head and neck of the griffon vulture. The eagles were, when hunger-driven, birds of prey; the vultures, carrion feeders only. There was a golden eagle (the opreay of AV), not very common, distinguished by its tan-colored head; the imperial eagle, more numerous and easily identified by a dark head and white shoulders; a spotted eagle; a tawny eagle, much more common and readily distinguished by its plumage; and the short-toed eagle, best known of all and especially a bird of prey, as also a small hooded eagle so similar to a vulture that it was easily mistaken for one, save that it was very bold about taking its own food.

The first Bib. reference to the eagle referred to the right bird. Ex 19 4: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself." This "bare you on eagles' wings" must not be interpreted to mean that an eagle ever carried anything on its back. It merely means that by strength of powerful wing it could carry quite a load with its feet and frequently was seen doing this. Vultures never carried anything; they feasted and regurgitated what they had eaten to their young. The second reference is found in Lev 11 13 and repeated in Dt 14 12, the lists of abominations. It would seem peculiar that Moses would find it necessary to include eagles in this list until it is known that Arab mountaineers were eating these birds at that time. The next falls in Dt 28 49: "[God] will bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand." This also refers to the true eagle and points out that its power of sustained flight and the speed it could attain when hastening to its hunger-clamoring young, had been observed. The next reference is in Dt 32 11:

"As an eagle that stirreth up her nest, That flattereth over her young, He spread abroad his wings, he took them, He bare them on his pinions."

This is good natural history at last. Former VSS made these lines read as if the eagle carried its young on its wings, a thing wholly incompatible with flight in any bird. Samuel's record of the lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan is a wonderful poetic outburst and contains reference to this homing flight of the eagle (2 S 1 23). In Job 9 26 the arrow-like downward plunge of the hunger-driven eagle is used in comparison with the flight of time. In Job 39, which contains more good natural history than any other chapter of the Bible, will be found everything concerning the eagle anyone need know:

"Is it at thy command that the eagle mounteth up, And maketh her nest on high? On the cliff she dwelleth, and maketh her home. Upon the point of the cliff, and the stronghold. From thence she spitteth out the prey. Her eyes behold it afar off. Her young also she gathereth, she also suck up blood: And where the slain are, there is she" (vs 27–30).

Ps 103 5 is a reference to the long life of the eagle. The bird has been known to live to an astonishing age in captivity; under natural conditions, the age it attains can only be guessed.

"Who satisflieth thy desire with good things, So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle." Prov 33 5 compares the flight of wealth with that of an eagle; 30 17 touches on the fact that the eye of prey is the first place attacked in eating, probably because it is the most vulnerable point and so is frequently fed to the young.

Ver 19: "The way of an eagle in the air; The way of a serpent upon a rock; The way of a ship in the midst of the sea; And the way of a man with a maiden."
This reference to the eagle is to that wonderful power of flight that enables a bird to hang as if from a rope in the sky, for long periods, appearing to our sight immovable, or to sail and soar directly into the eye of the sun, seeming to rejoice in its strength of flight and to exult in the security and freedom of the upper air.

The word "way" is here improperly translated. To the average man is it always meant a road, a path. In this instance it should be translated:

The characteristics of an eagle in the air:

The habit of a serpent upon the rock;

And the manner of a man with a maid.

Each of these lines stood a separate marvel to Agur, and had no connection with the others (but of Wisd 5:10,11, and see Way).

Isa 40:31 is another flight reference. Jer 49:16 refers to the inaccessible heights at which the eagle loves to build and rear its young. Ver 22 refers to the eagle's power of flight. Ezek 1:10 recounts a vision of the prophet in which strange creatures had faces resembling eagles. The same book (17:3) contains the parable of the eagle: "Thus saith the Lord Jeh: A great eagle with great wings and long pinions, full of feathers, which had divers colors, came, and made the top of the cedar." Hos 8:1 is another flight reference. Ob 4:2 is almost identical with Jer 49:16. The next reference is that of Micah, and really refers to the griffon vulture (Mic 1:16). In Hab 1:8 the reference is to swift flight. Mt 24:28 undoubtly refers to vultures. In Rev 4:7 the eagle is used as a symbol of strength. In Rev 8:13 the bird is represented as speaking: "And I saw, and I heard an eagle [AV 'angel'] flying in mid heaven, saying with a great voice. Wo, woe, woe, for them that dwell on the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, who are yet to sound."

The eagle makes its last appearance in the vision of the woman and the dragon (Rev 12:14).

EANES, έανής (1 Esd 9:21): RV MANES (q.v.), RVm "Harim."

EAR, εαρ (JHN, 'ear; oí̇s, oía, órion, οί̇oν, the latter word [lit. 'carlet'] in all the Gospels only used of the ear of the high priest's servant, which was cut off by St. Peter: Mt 26:51; Mk 14:47; Lk 22:51 [not 22:50]; Jn 18:10:26).

(1) The physical organ of hearing which was considered of immense importance as a chief instrument by which man receives information and commandments. For this reason the ear of the priest had to be specially sanctified, the tip of the right ear being touched with sacrificial blood at the consecration (Lev 8:23). Similarly the ear of the cleansed leper had to be rededicated to the service of God by blood and oil (Lev 14:14.17.25.28). The ear-lobe of a servant, who preferred to remain with the family of his master rather than become free in the seventh year, was to be publicly bored or pierced with an awl in token of perpetual servitude (Ex 21:6). It has been suggested that Ps 40:6 should be interpreted in this sense, but this is not probable (see below). The cutting off of the ears and noses of captives was an atrocious custom of war frequently alluded to in oriental lit. (Ezkh 25:25). The phrase "to open the ear," which originally means the uncovering of the ear by partially removing the turban, so as to permit a clearer hearing, is used in the sense of revolting anything to our giving important (private) information (1 S 9:15; 20:2.12.13; 2 S 7:27; 1 Ch 17:25; also Ps 40:6), and the NT promises similarly that "things which eye saw not, and ear heard not to be revealed by the reconciled God to the heart that in gladness some donor has come to Him to be taught by His Spirit (1 Cor 2:9)." (2) The inner ear, the organ of spiritual perception. If the ear listens, the heart willingly submits, but often the spiritual ear is "hardened" (Isa 6:10; Zec 7:11; Mt 13:15; Acts 28:27), or "heapy" (Isa 6:10; also Dr 29:4), either by self-seeking obstinacy or by the judgment of an insulted God. Such unwilling hearers are compared to the "deaf adder . . . which hearkeneth not to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely." (Ps 48:5; or of Prov 18:13; 23:9; Acts 20:37). The expression "He that hath ears to hear let him hear" is frequent in the Synoptic Gospels, occurring 7 or 8 times: Mt 11:15; 13:43; Mk 4:23 (17 RV omits); Lk 8:8; 14:35, and while not found in the Fourth Gospel, it occurs seven times in Rev 2 and 3. "Itching ears," on the other hand, are those that have become tired of the sound of oft-repeated truth and that long for new thus deceitful teaching (2 Tim 4:3). Ears may "tingle" at startling news, esp. of disaster (1 P 3:11; 2 K 21:12; Jer 19:3).

(3) God's ears are often mentioned in the anthropomorphic style of Scripture, signifying the ability of God to receive the petitions of His people, for He that pleaseth the ear, shall hear it (Ps 94:9; also Ps 10:17; 34:15; 130:2; Isa 59:1; 1 Pet 3:12). But God also hears the murmurings of the wicked against Him (Nu 11:1; 2 K 19:28; Wisd 1:10; Jas 5:4); still it lies in His power to refuse to hear (Ezk 8:18; Lam 3:8) of all ver 56.

EARING, ēring (ἐκρήγην, ἱνῆτην): The Heb word is twice tr. "earring" in AV (Gen 45:6; Ex 34:21). The RV rendering is "plowing-iron." There shall be neither plowing nor harvesting." See also Dr 21:4; 1 S 8:12; Isa 30:24.

EARLY, υἱή (ὑδρος, ὀρίας, and related words; πρῶτος, prōt): The word generally refers to the day, and means the hour of dawn or soon after (Gen 19:2; 2 Ch 36:15; Hos 6:4; Lk 24:22). Sometimes it refers to the beginning of the season, e.g. the early rain (Ps 84:6; Jas 5:7; see Rain). It may also have the sense of 'evening' (Heb 11:5). The early morning is frequently commended as the hour for prayer. See examples of Jesus (Mk 1:35; Lk 21:38; Jn 8:2); also Abraham (Gen 19:27). Jacob (Gen 28:18). Gideon (Jgs 6:38), Samuel (1 S 16:12), David (1 S 17:27).

G. H. Gerbering

EARNEST, νεανίς (ἀπανητή, ἀρχαστήν): Found three times in the NT: The "earnest of our inheritance" (Eph 1:14); "the earnest of our inheritance" (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5). It has an equivalent in Heb ἱεράθον (found in Gen 38:17.18.20), in Lat. praeb. Fr. arbre, and the OE æræs. The term is mercantile and comes originally from the Phoenicians. Its general meaning is that of a pledge or token given as the assurance of the fulfillment of a bargain or promise. It also carries with it the idea of forfeit, such as is now common in land deals, only from the obverse side. In other words, the one promising to convey property, wages or blessing binds the promise with an advance, a pledge partaking of the quality of the benefit to be bestowed. If the agreement be about wages, then a part of the wages is advanced; if it be about land, then a clod given to the purchaser or beneficiary may stand as the pledge of revenue or as a secret of or giving important (private) information (1 S 9:15; 20:2.12.13; 2 S 7:27; 1 Ch 17:25; also Ps 40:6), and the NT promises similarly that "things which eye saw not, and ear heard not to be revealed by the reconciled God to the heart that in gladness some donor has come to Him to be taught by His Spirit (1 Cor 2:9)."

Figurative: In the spiritual sense, as used in the passages above named, the reference is to the work of the Spirit of God in our hearts being a token and pledge of a perfect redemption and a heavenly inheritance. There is more than the idea of security in the word as used, for it clearly implies the continuity and identity of the blessing.

EARRING, ē-ring: An ornamental pendant of some kind hanging from the ear has been worn by both sexes in oriental lands from the earliest times. Among the Greeks and Romans, as with western peoples in general, its use was confined to females. The ears in the statue of the Medicean Venus are pierced and probably were originally ornamented with earrings. It is clear, however, that among the Hebrews and related oriental peoples earrings were worn by both sexes. Abraham's servant "put the earring upon [Rebekah's] face, and the bracelets upon her hands" (Gen 24 47 AV), in accordance with custom, evidently, but it is implied that it was customary for men also to wear earrings, in that the relatives and friends of Jacob "every one [gave him] an earring of gold" (Job 42 11 AV). Such ornaments were usually made of gold, finely wrought, and often set with precious stones, as archaeology has shown. Such jewels were worn in oriental lands, for decorative purposes as well as for protective purposes. RV renders "amulets" for AV "earrings" in Isa 3 20, the Heb word (Pšāḥim) being elsewhere associated with serpent-charming; but the earrings of Gen 35 4, also, were more than "decoration," and RV may well be right in their renderings here (Kennedy). The influence of Egypt, where amulets of various kinds were worn by men and gods, by the living and the dead, is shown by recent excavations at Gezer, Tell Khaib, and Megiddo. See Amulet; Ornament.

EARTH, ērth (יוֹם, ἥρθος, ἐρήμος), āḏdāmāh, ἔρήμος, āḇār, yēṯ, oḵōwēn, oḵōwōnēn: In a hilly limestone country like Pal, the small amount of iron oxide in the rocks tends to be oxidized, and thereby to give a prevailing reddish color to the soil. This is esp. the case on relatively barren hills where there is little organic matter present to prevent reddening and give a more blackish tinge.

"Āḏdāmāh (cf. āḏām, "a man," and Adam) is from āḏām, "to be red," and is used in the senses: "earth" (Ex 20 24), "land" (Ps 105 35), a "land" or "country" (Isa 14 2), "ground" (Gen 4 11), "the earth" (Gen 4 11): "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." (Psalms 19:1)

"Āḇār and its root word and derivatives are closely paralleled in the Arab., and refer mainly to "dust" or "dry earth" (cf Arab. afr, "to be of the color of dust"); afr, "dust"; yafr, "a gazelle"; Heb yḇēr, "a gazelle"). Cf Gen 2 7: "Jehovah God formed man of the dust of the ground"; Job 2 12: "... sprinkled dust upon their heads"; Ps 104 29: "... they die, and return to their dust"; Gen 18 27: "dust and ashes.

In the LXX and NT, ἔρημος is used in nearly all cases, oḵōwēn being used a few times for the "habitual dwelling place" (Ps 24 1 AV). See further Assyriology; Anthropology; Astronomy; Evolution; World.

EARTH, CIRCLE OF THE. See Astronomy, III, 1, 3.

EARTH, CORNERS OF THE: The "corners" or "ends" of the earth are its "wings" (կառապահā ḫā-ārēq), i.e. its borders or extremities. The word in general means a wing, because the wing of a bird is used as a covering for its young, and from this meaning it acquires that of the extremity of anything stretched out. It is thus used in Dt 22 12: "Thou shalt make thee fringes with a tassel [wing] of thy vesture, wherewith thou coverest thyself.

It thus also means the coasts or boundaries of the land surface of the earth; its extremities. It is the "corners" of the earth (Isa 11 12) or "ends" in Job 37 3 and 38 13. The "four corners" of the earth (Isa 11 12) or "land" (Ezk 7 2) are therefore simply the extremities of the land in the four cardinal directions. See also Astronomy, III, 3.

EARTH, ENDS OF THE. See Earth, Corners of the.

EARTH, PILLARS OF THE. See Astronomy, III, 2.

EARTH, THE NEW. See Eschatology of the NT, IX; Heavens (New).

EARTH, VAULT, vōl, OF THE: In one passage God is said to have "founded his vault [āqḥūddāḥ] upon the earth" (Am 9 6). It is not quite certain whether this vault was or vaulted structure over itself, or to the heavens arched above it. The latter is the usual interpretation, but in either case the reference is rather to the strength of the structure than to its form; the word implying something that is firmly bound together and hence an arch or dome because of its stability. See also Astronomy, III, 2.

EARTHEN, ērth, n., VESSELS (יוֹץ), ἕρετα, ἔρετα, ὕπερ, ὑπεράντον, ὠστρίκινοι): These vessels were heat-resistant and were used for cooking and for boiling clothes (Lev 6 28; 11 33; 14 50). They were probably non-porous and took the place of the šādār or maqāja used in Syria today. A traveler in the interior of Pal may still meet with the hospitality showed to David (2 S 17 28). The generous natives brought not only gifts of food but the necessary vessels in which to cook it. An earthen vessel was used to preserve a letter on the four borders or fringes of the earth (Heb 11 37).

Figurative: In Jer 19 1 breaking of an earthen vessel was symbolical of the destruction of Jesus. These vessels were also used to symbolize the commonness (Lam 4 2) and frailness of our bodies (2 Cor 4 7). See Porcelain.

James A. Pritchard

EARTHLY, ērth, li (יוֹתי, epheis, exiating upon the earth, "terrestrial," from ἐπί, ἐφ, "upon" and yēṯ, the earth), Vulg terrerens): Of or pertaining to the earth, or to the present state of existence. The word epheis is not found in LXX, but occurs in classical Gr from Plato down. In Plutarch Mor. 566 D, it occurs in the remarkable phrase, "that which is earthly of the soul. Its meaning is primarily merely local ("being on the earth"). The word passion is also itself an ethical significance, and does not carry a suggestion of moral taint, such as the word kōsmos ("world") has, esp. in the Johannine writings, and ἀμέν ("flesh"), esp. in Paul. It does, however, suggest a certain limitation or frailty; and in some passages, the context gives the adj. epheis an ethical color, though in the NT the purely local meaning is never lost sight of. It is in "earthly" in the following passages: (1) Jn 3 12: "If I tell you the earthly things which are revealed on earth, things within the circle of human observation, truths of subjective experience (e.g. the new birth); in contrast to "heavenly things," the objective truths which, as not directly realizable in human experience, must be revealed from above (the mysteries of the Divine purpose..."
and plans. Clearly “earthly” here implies no moral contrast to the heavenly or spiritual. (2) Cor 6:19. “Body of the tabernacle,” i.e. the body with which we are clothed on earth, in contrast to the spiritual resurrection-body, “which is from heaven” (ver 2). Here again the word has a merely local, not an ethical, significance. (3) Phil 3:19. “Glory in their shame, whose mind earthy things,” i.e. whose thoughts rest on earth, on the pleasures of life here below. (4) Jas 3:15. “This wisdom is not a wisdom that cometh down from above, but is earthy,” i.e. it is on the plain of life on earth, merely human, incapable of ascending to the level of Divine Wisdom. In the last two passages, the literal local meaning is still evident, but the word shades off into the moral and suggests that which is opposed to the spiritual in character. The same word is τὰ τερrestrial in 1 Cor 15:40, and “things in RV ‘on’ earth” in Phil 2:10. AV has “earthly” in Jn 3:31, where it translates ἐκ τῆς γῆς—lit. “out of the earth,” the reference being to the character and mission of the Baptist as a representative of the limited field of his earthly (human) origin, in contrast to the Messiah “that cometh from heaven.” The AV rendering is somewhat misleading, for it introduces a confusion with the “earthly” of ver 15 (vide Westcott in loc.). RV rightly renders “of the earth.” “Earthly” is to be distinguished from “earthly” =made of earth or clay (chosibb, from chos, “earth dug out,” 1 Cor 15:47 f.). D. MIALL EDWARDS EARTHQUAKE, urðhkívák (םָיָא), ra'ash; ra'ash; seismòs, seismòs): The last earthquake which worked any damage in Pal and Syria occurred in 1837, and destroyed the village of Safed, near Mt. Hermon, and was felt south to Hebron. So far that time a few feeble shocks have been felt but no damage was done. The region is just on the edge of the great earthquake circle whose center is in Armenia, and is liable to earthquakes. The large number of references in the Bible to earthquakes, and the evident fear in the minds of the people of those times, would seem to indicate that they were more frequent in Biblical times than recently.

There are three main causes of earthquakes:

1. Earthquakes in Palesteine

- Earthquakes are the result of the earth’s natural tendency to be more rigid in the core and less rigid on the surface. This causes a strain to be set up within the earth’s crust, which may cause the earth to crack and move. If the strata are too rigid to bend, they may break, allowing the earth's surface to move as a result. Seismographs located throughout the world help researchers understand these movements and are used to detect the waves, even though the origin is on the opposite side of the earth.

2. Explosion of steam or gases under the surface.

Some earthquakes, especially those that occur under the sea, are caused by water seeping through the soil and rocks, causing the pressure to build up and release suddenly, thus creating shock waves that move through the ground and cause the surface to move. Seismographs are used to detect these movements and are placed in various locations around the world to monitor them.

3. Volcanic activity.

As earthquakes are common occurrences in volcanic regions, it is likely that there is some connection between the two, but the relation has not been fully traced. It may be that the second cause is the origin of the volcanic and earthquake. See Further, DELUGE OF NOAH.

Many destructive earthquakes have been recorded in the history of Syria, but they have been mostly in the north, in the region of Aleppo. Jerusalem itself has seldom been affected by earthquakes. The Hauran region, near Jordan, and Jordan Valley, have been covered with volcanic remains and signs of violent shocks, and the cities on the coast have suffered much, but Jerusalem on the higher ground between has usually escaped with little destruction.

A number of earthquakes are mentioned in the Scriptures: (1) At Mount Sinai (Ex 19:18); (2) Korah and companions destroyed in the fissure and sinking ground (Nu 16:31); (3) In the Philh camp in the days of Saul (1 Sa 14:15); (4) In Israel’s flight (K J 19:19); and in the reign of Uzziah, between 790 and 740 BC (Am 1:1); Zec 14.5 probably refers to the same (Am, IV, iii, 3); (5) The Philh camp in the days of Saul (1 Sa 14:15); (4) In Israel’s flight (K J 19:19); and in the reign of Uzziah, between 790 and 740 BC (Am 1:1); Zec 14.5 probably refers to the same (Am, IV, iii, 3); (6) At Christ’s death (Mt 27:51-54); (7) At Christ’s resurrection (Mt 28:2); (8) At Philippi when Paul and Silas were freed from prison (Acts 16:26). Most of these shocks seem to have been slight and caused little loss of life. Jos mentions one in the reign of Herod, “such as had not happened at any other time, which was very instructing to men’s consciences, and induced them to own some moral or religious interests. The prophet Jeremiah used the phrase as an indication of national or tribal indissolubility: “Moab hath been at e. from his youth” (Jer 48:11); “I am very sore displeased with the nation which is at the e. of the earth” (Jer 1:12). The Hebrew term is commonly used to mean a great noise. Large earthquakes are sometimes accompanied by a rumbling noise, but as a rule they come silently and without warning.

In the Scriptures earthquakes are mentioned as tokens of God’s power (Job 9:8, 10; 38:37; Isa 13:1), as signs of trouble (Ps 8:12; 18:6; 51:16), and as signs of the coming of the end of the world (Mt 24:3-7). See also Rev 11:13, 19; 16:18.

EASE, eû (טֶוֹא), shal’ādn, shal’ādn, chiefly “at ease”: Used 19 t in the OT once and only in the NT, most frequently meaning tranquillity, security or comfort of mind; in an ethical sense, indicating carelessness or indifference with reference to one’s moral or religious interests. The prophet Jeremiah used the phrase as an indication of national or tribal indissolubility: “Moab hath been at e. from his youth” (Jer 48:11); “I am very sore displeased with the nation which is at the e. of the earth” (Jer 1:12). The Hebrew term is commonly used to mean a great noise. Large earthquakes are sometimes accompanied by a rumbling noise, but as a rule they come silently and without warning.

The word in another form is used also in a verbal sense and to apply to physical ease and comfort, as “My couch shall e. my complaint” (Job 7:13; esp. 2 Ch 10:49). Simple mental tranquillity or peace of mind is also expressed by it (Jer 45:21; 25:21). The single instance of its use in the NT is illustrative of its figurative but most common usage in the OT, where it refers to moral indissolubility in the parable of the Rich Fool. “Son . . . take thine e., eat, drink, be merry” (Lk 15:11, 31).

EAST, eû, CHILDREN OF THE (םיִּיֵּבֶת) kîrâh, kēthêm, kîthêm, and other derivatives of the same root; avâtôh, analôth.: Mîrâh is the equivalent of the Arab. marrak, “the orient” or “place of sunrse.” In the same way mîrâh and mā’îrâh correspond to the Arab. kâdhâm, except that the Arab. derivatives do not include the significatio “east.” In the majority of cases “east” and other words of direction require no explanation, but the expressions “children of the east” (bînê kodhem), "the land of the children of the east" (ereq b'nē kodhem), and "the east country" (ereq kodhem), belong to a different category. In the story of Gildeon (Jgs 6 3-33; 7 12; 8 10), we find several times the expression "kodhem of the children of the east." In Jer 8 24 it is said of the same host: "For they had golden earrings, because they were Ishmaelites." In Jer 49 28-29: "Go up to Kedar, and destroy the children of the east. Their tents and their flocks shall they take." In Gen 25 6: "But unto the sons of the concubines, that Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts; and he sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country." Now Ishmael is the son of Abraham and Hagar, Midian of Abraham and Keturah, Kedar the son of Ishmael, and Amalek the grand-son of Esau, dwelling in Edom. It is evident that we have to do with the Syrian desert and in a general way with Arabia, esp. its northern part, and with peoples like the modern Bedawin who keep camels and dwell in tents, "houses of hair" (bugūl sh'ar), as they are called by the Arabs of today.

A striking passage is Gen 29 1: "Then Jacob went on his journey, and came to the land of the children of the east." In Joseph's ascent through the country E. of the Jordan he traverses first a region of towns and villages with fields of grain, and then the wide desert where the Bedawin wander with their herds. The line is a sharp one. While in a very few hours he passes from the settled part where the rain, though scanty, is sufficient to bring the grain to maturity, to the bare desert.

Job was "the greatest of all the children of the east" (Job 1 5). These desert peoples had a name for wisdom which we see from 1 Ki 4 30, "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east, and all the wisdom of Egypt"; and from Mt 2 1: "Now when Jesus was born . . . Wise men from the east came." ALFRED EZY DAY

EAST COUNTRY, kun′tri (יוֹרֶר, יַעַר), Lit. "country of the sunrise" over against the "country of the sunset" (Zec 8 7). The two together form a poetical expression indicating the whole earth.

EAST GATE. See Gate, The East.

EAST (EASTERN, es′tērn) SEA (Zec 14 8). See Dead Sea.

EAST WIND. See Wind.

EASTER, es′tēr (אֶסְטֵר, pâshcha, fr Aram. אֵשֶׂר, pâkha), and Heb חַג, pâgêh, the Passover festival: The Eng. word comes from the AS Eastre or Easter, a Teutonic goddess to whom sacrifice was offered in April, so the name was transferred to the paschal feast. The word does not properly occur in Scripture, although AV has it in Acts 12 4 where it stands for Paschaw, as it is rightly rendered in RV. There is no trace of Easter celebration in the NT, though some would see an allusion to it in 1 Cor 5 7. The Jewish Christians in the early church continued to celebrate the Passover, regarding Christ as the true paschal lamb, and this naturally passed over into a commemoration of the death and resurrection of Our Lord, or an Easter feast. This was preceded by a fast, which was considered by one party as ending at the hour of the crucifixion, i.e. 3 o'clock on Friday, by another as continuing until the hour of the resurrection before dawn on Easter morning. Differences arose as to the time of the Easter celebration, the Jewish Christians naturally fixing it at the time of the Passover feast which was regulated by the paschal moon. Accord-
Mt. lower than Ebal. These two mountains overhang the pass through which runs the main artery of intercourse between E. and W., the city of Nablus lying in the throat of the valley to the W. The ancient Shechem probably stood farther to the E. The lower slopes of Ebal as one ascends from Nablus are covered with gardens and orchards, the copious streams from the fountains under Gerizim washing its foot, and spreading fertility and beauty. The vine, the fig and the olive grow luxuriantly. Higher up we scramble over rough rocky terraces, where grow only the ubiquitous thistles and prickly shrubs.

From the broad summit a view of surpassing interest and beauty rewards the climber’s toil. Westward beyond the hills and the plain of Sharon with its coast line of yellow sand running from Jaffa to Carmel, stretch the blue waters of the Mediterranean. From Carmel to Gilboa, Little Hermon and Tabor, roll the fruitful breadths of Esraelon: the uplands of Galilee, with Nazareth showing on the brow above the plain, rise away to the buttresses of Lebanon in the N. From the snowy peak of Hermon the eye ranges over the Jaulan and Mount Gilead to the Mountain of Bashan in the E., with the steep eastern wall of the Jordan valley in the foreground. The land of Moab is visible beyond the Dead Sea; and the heights around Jerus close the view on the S.

Round this splendid mountain, seen from afar on all sides, religious associations have gathered from old time. The Moalem Weley on the top—the usual white-domed sanctuary—where it is said the head of the Baptist is buried, is doubtless the modern representative of some ancient seat of worship. The ruins of a church show that Christians also came under the spell of the hill.

The slopes of Ebal toward Gerizim played their part in that memorable scene, when, having conquered the central region of Pal, Joshua led the people and erected an altar of hewn stones, wrote upon the stones—either engraving on the stone itself, or impressing on plaster placed there for the purpose—a copy of the law, and then, as Moses the servant of the Lord had commanded, placed half the tribes on the slope of Gerizim, and half on those of Ebal, and the ark with the priests and Levites in the center. Then with dramatic responses from the two divisions of the people, the blessings and the cursings of the law were read (Josh 8 30 ff.; cf Dt 27 11 ff.). In all the future, therefore, this mountain, towering aloft in the very heart of the land, would remind beholders far and near of their people’s covenant with God. It has sometimes been questioned if the reading of the law could be heard by the people in the way described. The formation of the sides of the valley at the narrowest part, and the acoustics, which have been tested more than once, leave no reasonable doubt as to the possibility.

The importance of the mountain from a military point of view is illustrated by the ruins of a massive fortress found on the summit. W. Ewing Ebed, eb‘ed (אֶבוּד, "ebbed, ‘servant’"): (1) Father of Gaal, who rebelled against Abimelech (Jgs 9 26–35). (2) A companion of Ezra in his return (Ezr 8 6) = Obeth (1 Esd 3 32).

Ebed-Melech, eb‘ed-ma‘lek, ob-ed-mählek (אֶבֶד-מֶלֶךְ, "ebbed-melech, ‘servant of the king’ or ‘of [god] Melek’): An Ethiopian eunuch in the service of King Zedekiah, who interceded with the king for the prophet Jeremiah and rescued him from the dungeon into which he had been cast to die (Jer 39 7–18). For this, the word of Jeh through Jeremiah promised Ebed-melech that his life should be spared in the fall of Jerus (Jer 39 15–18).

Eben-Ezer, eb-en-e‘zer (אֶבֶן אֶזֶר, ‘ebben ha-ezer, ‘stone of the help’); ‘Abi ezer’ (Abi-Ab): (1) Here Israel was defeated by the Philist, 4,000 men falling in the battle (1 S 4 1 ff.). It appears also to have been the scene of the disaster when the ark of God was captured (vs 3 ff.). The place is not identified. It was over against Azekah, but this site is also unknown (of Josh 12 18). Onom places it between Jerus and Ascalon, in the neighborhood of Beth-shemesh. Conder suggests Deir Abun, fully 3 miles E. of ‘Ain Shems (PEF, III, 24). (2) A stone set up by Samuel to perpetuate the memory of the signal victory granted to Israel over the Philis in answer to his prayer (1 S 7 12). It stood between Mizpeh and Shen. The latter is probably identical with ‘Ain Sinia, N. of Bethel. This defines the district in which it may be found; but no identification is yet possible. W. Ewing

En, eb‘er (אֶבֶר, ‘ebber; ‘Eber, in Gen; ‘Iḇĕḇĕř, ‘Obed, in Ch): (1) Occurs in the genealogies (Gen 10 21.25; 11 14 ff.) as the great-grandson of Shem and father of Pleg and Joktan. The word means “the other side,” “across,” and the form “Hebrew,” which is derived from it, is intended to denote the people or tribe who came “from the other side of the river” (i.e. the Euphrates), from Haran (Gen 11 31), whence Abraham and his dependents migrated to Canaan. The Ebionites were a sect of heretics frequently mentioned by the early Fathers. In regard to their opinions, as in regard to those of most early heretical sects, there is the difficulty that to a large extent we are dependent for our information on their opponents. These opponents were not generally very careful to apprehend exactly the views of those whose opinions they undertook to refute. It adds to the difficulty in the present case that there is a dubiosity as to the persons designated by the title. Sometimes, it is admitted, the name was used to designate all Jewish Christians irrespective of their opinions; at other times it denotes a sect akin to the Ebionites, ascribed a purely human origin to Our Lord. There are, however, certain works, the Clementine writings, which from statements of the Fathers may be assumed to represent the views of this sect, but as these represent views to some extent divergent, it is difficult to decide which is the truly Ebionite. There are also certain apocryphal books which present affinities with Ebionism. The quotations from the Gospel according to the Hebrews—the only gospel the Ebionites received—likewise afford means of appreciating their views. This gospel has come down to us only in isolated quotations, for the accuracy of which we have no guarantees. Finally, it has to be borne in mind that no sect can persist through centuries of changing circumstances, and not in turn undergo change.

1. Origin of the Name.—Tertullian and Epiphanius assume the sect to have received its name from a certain Ebion or Hebian. Others 1. The of the Fathers, without affirming it, use language which seems to imply the belief in a person called Ebin. This, however, is generally now regarded as a mistake. No trace of the existence of such a person is to be found. The sect in question seems to have assumed the name Ebionites, "the poor ones," from the first Beatitude (Mt 5:3), claiming to be the continuation into the new dispensation of the "poor and needy" of the Ps, e.g. 69 33; 70 5; 74 21.

It has been mooted that the sect may have had a leader who assumed the title "the poor man." Besides that we have no trace of his existence, the name would almost certainly have been treated as an Aram. word and put in the status emphaticus as Ebiona, which in Gr would have second Ebionae.

2. Origin and Name

The ordinary view of the origin of the name has the advantage of analogy in its favor. The pre-Reformation Protestants of the 12th and 13th cents. in France called themselves "the poor men" (of Lyons). The fact that the apostle James in his letter (James 1:26) was addressed as "the Father of the poor," and natural union between poverty and piety (2 5), "Did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith?" would confirm the Jewish Christians in their use of the name.

Some have been inclined to press unduly a play on the name of the Father of the Poor, a technical feature of the Ebionite views of this sect as to the person of Christ had led to their receiving this name from without.

The Ebionites were a sect of heretics frequently mentioned by the early Fathers. In regard to their opinions, as in regard to those of most early heretical sects, there is the difficulty that to a large extent we are dependent for our information on their opponents. These opponents were not generally very careful to apprehend exactly the views of those whose opinions they undertook to refute. It adds to the difficulty in the present case that there is a dubiosity as to the persons designated by the title. Sometimes, it is admitted, the name was used to designate all Jewish Christians irrespective of their opinions; at other times it denotes a sect akin to the Ebionites, ascribed a purely human origin to Our Lord. There are, however, certain works, the Clementine writings, which from statements of the Fathers may be assumed to represent the views of this sect, but as these represent views to some extent divergent, it is difficult to decide which is the truly Ebionite. There are also certain apocryphal books which present affinities with Ebionism. The quotations from the Gospel according to the Hebrews—the only gospel the Ebionites received—likewise afford means of appreciating their views. This gospel has come down to us only in isolated quotations, for the accuracy of which we have no guarantees. Finally, it has to be borne in mind that no sect can persist through centuries of changing circumstances, and not in turn undergo change.

1. Origin of the Name.—Tertullian and Epiphanius assume the sect to have received its name from a certain Ebion or Hebian. Others The of the Fathers, without affirming it, use language which seems to imply the belief in a person called Ebin. This, however, is generally now regarded as a mistake. No trace of the existence of such a person is to be found. The sect in question seems to have assumed the name Ebionites, "the poor ones," from the first Beatitude (Mt 5:3), claiming to be the continuation into the new dispensation of the "poor and needy" of the Ps, e.g. 69 33; 70 5; 74 21.

2. Origin and Name

The ordinary view of the origin of the name has the advantage of analogy in its favor. The pre-Reformation Protestants of the 12th and 13th cents. in France called themselves "the poor men" (of Lyons). The fact that the apostle James in his letter (James 1:26) was addressed as "the Father of the Poor," and natural union between poverty and piety (2 5), "Did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith?" would confirm the Jewish Christians in their use of the name.

a Christian. The heresy originated after the flight of the church to Pella. They denied the miraculous birth of Christ, and insisted that a divine influence came down upon Him as His baptism. This Divine wisdom inspired, and in a sense dwelt, in all the patriarchs and prophets. When Christ tabernacled on earth, the Ebionites regarded as that of Adam revived. This body was crucified and rose again, and a resurrection is clearly, as we have before observed (Gospel of 32:10). This imparts a materialistic view of the doctrine of the Trinity after the form of a human family. It is a note of an old geographical expression among the Ebionites. ‘He went up to the mountain’ is mentioned in the old Testament. It is only some 2,000 ft. high and behind it the mountains of the hill country of Galilee rise up to 4,000 ft., and the plateau alone, which is the top of Hermon, 10,000 ft. It is difficult to understand the Ebionite rejection of this as taught by and seen in the Baptist. Rising from the plain of Esdraelon it is prominent, but with the higher mountains behind it, it could not be overlooked. Jerome does Hippolytus, with Eclesiast: from him they learned that the head of the Jewish race was to be born, and is 24, and that the Holy Ghost had a female form of similar dimensions, only invisible. Although he connects the Ebionites with St. Paul by the Ebionites. It is exceedingly difficult to form a clear, self-consistent view of the Ebionites from the statements of Epiphanius, yet there are points in which his information is of value.

Though Justin Martyr does not name the Ebionites in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew (47), he mentions two classes of Jewish Christians: (a) those who not only themselves observe the law but would compel the gentile believers also to be circumcised and keep the whole law, and hold no communion with those who refuse to become Jews; (b) those who, observing the Mosaic law themselves, enter into communion with uncircumcised gentile believers. The former appear to be an anachronistic remnant. It may be noted that Justin does not ascribe to them any doctrinal divergence from the orthodox views. In the following ch he mentions some that denied the divinity of Our Lord, but these were Gentiles (hēmetērou génous) "of the heathen." III. Literature of the Ebionites.—One thing of importance we do owe to Epiphanius—the indication of the lit. produced by the Ebionites, from which we may get their views at first hand. This includes the Recognitions to the Hebrews, the Clementines (Homilies and Recognitions) to which we would add the Ascension of Isaiah and the Odes of Solomon. It may be remarked that this lit. appears to represent the opinion of different classes of the Ebionites more clearly than the bearing these works have on the Ebionites. The Gospel according to the Hebrews we know only through quotations. We can have no certainty that these quotations are accurate. The quotations may have been interpolated, and further the hook from which the quotations have been made has probably passed through several recensions. The discussion of the question of the relation of this book to the canonical Gospel of Mt is considered elsewhere (see Apocryphal Gospels). One thing is clear, there were at least two recensions of this gospel, one nearer to the Hebrew text and the other nearer to the Greek; the former was the Nazarene differed only by omitting the genealogy from the First Gospel of the Canon. The other was more strictly Ebionite and omitted all mention of the miraculous birth. The Ebionite reconstruction began, as Epiphanius tells us, apparently with the work of the Apostles. The assertion of Epiphanius that the Ebionites rejected the prophets is supported by a quotation from the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Recogn. ii, 12): "In the prophets, after they were anointed by the Spirit, sin was found (l. 9)," so, "Cakes of honey and oil;" cf Ex 16:31; Nu 11:8 in the account of the food of John may be due to the departure of a Gospel from the canonical form. One passage, which appears to be a denunciation of wealth in itself, is an addition of a second rich man to the text of the apocryphal singulary quoted, verse quoted from this gospel both by Origen and Jerome, deserves special notice for several reasons: "My mother, the Holy Ghost, took me by one of my hairs and bore me to the great mountain Tabor." The designation of the Holy Ghost as my maternal companion it implies a materialistic view of the doctrine of the Trinity after the form of a human family. It is a note of an old geographical expression among the Ebionites.

The Clementine lit. attributed by Epiphanius to the Ebionites is a more important source of information for their opinions. It has 2. The come down to us complete in three or Clementines four forms, the Homilies, the Recognitions, and two Epistles which, however, differ less than the two larger works. They all seem to be recensions of an earlier work which has disappeared. The foundation of all of these is a species of religious novel on which are grafted several of Peter and Jacob and Simon Magus. Clement, a young Roman orphan of rank in search of a religion, meets Barnabas, who tells him of Christ, describing Him as the "Son of God," and says that He had appeared in Judaea. To learn more about Jesus, Clement proceeds to Caesarea, where he meets Peter. He thereafter accompanies Peter to the various places the apostle pursues Simon Magus, and in course of his journeyings he meets and recognizes his father, his brother and his mother; hence the title Recognitions. It is in the discourses of Peter that the Ebionism appears. Its theology is fundamentally Jewish and Esseni. That it is Judaising is evidenced by the covert hostility to the apostle Paul. There are elements that are not those of orthodox Judaism. The Messiah is coequal, or nearly so, with the devil; in other words, the position is a modification of Parseesim (Hom., III, 5). If the discourse of Barnabas is excluded, Our Lord is always called the "Teacher" (Homilies). He is never asserted nor assumed to be Divine. Nothing is said of His miraculous birth. At the same time in the Recognitions He is regarded as not merely man. It is said He "assumed a Jewish body" (Hom., III, 27). It appears that Epiphanius says of the Ebionite idea that it was the body of Adam that the Christ appeared. The apostle Peter, who is represented as the model Christian, eats only herbs and practises frequent ablutions, quite in the manner of the Essenes. In his discourses Peter declares that the true prophet "quenches the fire of altars and represses war." These are Esseni peculiarities, but he "sanctions marriage, against Esseni as we find it in Philo and Jos. The phrase implies an opposition to some who not only did not sanction, but forbade, marriage (Hom., III, 26).

If the ignoring of the work and apostleship of St. Paul be regarded as the criterion of the Judaizers, then that is to say, the Ebionites, then in the earliest of these books to be recovered in any complete form. The writer refers to the martyrdom of Peter in Rome, in his discussion of Paul (IV, 3). The description of elders and shepherds hating one another (III, 29), "lawless elders and unjust shepherds who will ravage their sheep" (II, 24), seems a view of the church's state as it appeared to a Judaiser when the Pauline view...

was prevailing. Notwithstanding this not only is the Divine dignity maintained, but the doctrine of the Trinity, "They all glorified the Father of all and His beloved Son and the Holy Spirit!" (VIII, 18), is affirmed. As to the person of Christ, He descended through the successive heavens to the earth to be born (IX, 12, 8-9). The virginity of Mary and the birth of the child is born without pain, miraculously (XI, 8-14). A similar view of the birth of Christ is to be found in the Odes of Solomon (XIX, 7).

IV. History of Ebionism.—All authorities combine in asserting a close connection between the Jews and the Ebionites and the Essenes. At first sight there are serious points of difference, principally these, the Ebionites and the Essenes enjoined marriage, while the Essenes, if we may believe Philo and Jos., forbade it. This forbbid, however, appears to have been true only of the coobinities of Engedi. Moreover, some of the Judaisers, that is Ebionites, are charge with forbidden marriage (1 Tim 4 3). The Essenes in all their varieties seem to have come over with the Israelites to the Jewish state and the retreat of the church to Pella. When they joined the believers in their exile the Parsee elements began a ferment in the church and Ebionism was one of the products. This probably is the meaning of the fact that Ebionites were the first to teach the dualism of the quartines. If we may judge from the statements of Scripture and from the earliest of the non-canonical apocalypses, the Ebionites were not at first heretical in their Christology. Only after the débâcle of the ceremonial law, holding that believers of gentile descent could be received into the church only if they were first circumcised. The keen dialectic of Paul forced them from this position. The abrogation of the Law was closely connected in Paul's reasoning with the Divinity of Our Lord; consequently some of them may have felt that they could maintain their views more easily by denying His supreme Divinity and the reality of the incarnation. The phenomena of His life rendered it impossible for anyone to declare Him to be merely man. Hence the complex notion of a Divine influence—an aeon, coming down upon Him. If, however, His birth was miraculous, then the supreme greatness of our Lord; consequently they were led to deny the virgin birth.

Not till Theodotus appeared was the purely humanitarian view of Our Lord's person maintained. All the Heb. Christians, however, did not pursue the above course. A large section remained at each general stage, and to the end one portion, the Nazareans, maintained their orthodox doctrinal position, and at the same time obeyed the requirements of the Law. The dualism which is found in the Clementines is an endeavor to explain the power of evil in the world, and the function of Satan. The Clementines confirm the statement of the Fathers that the Ebionites read only the Gospel of Mt, for there are more quotations from Mt than from all the other books of the NT put together. These quotations are, however, all from chapters after the 3d. There are, it is to be noted, several unmistakable quotations from the Fourth Gospel. The Ebionites, noticed above, there is an avoidance of attributing Divinity to Our Lord. He is the Teacher, the Prophet; only in the discourse ascribed to Barabbas He called the Son of God. This, we are aware, is the reverse of the ordinarily received idea of the historic succession of beliefs. It is thought that the belief in the purely orthodox nature of Our Lord's birth, these Jewish believers gradually become Ebionites, and the Ebionites were regarded as a Divine person, the Divine Logos made flesh by miraculous conception and birth. The abstract and remote conception of this divinity is not denied, but we do say that what evidence we have tends in the direction. The quotations from the Clementines to Ebionism in the Epistle of Jts. is intended to appeal to the poor, the little pinnace given to the Divinity of Our Lord, the distinct manner of salvation, the actual source of Ebionist influence is not stated in this place. Dr. Schwegler, followed in more recent times by Dr. Camp-doctrines of the Trinity, and their holding it is an evidence that the church at large held it, not of course in that definiteness it assumed later, but essentially.

To some extent the same may be said in regard to the Pauline doctrine of redemption. It is to be observed that both writers, he of the Homilies as well as the writer of the Recognitions, dislike and ignore Paul, even if they do not attempt to pillory him under the image of Simon Magus, as many have thought that they do. What, however, is also to be observed, is that they do not venture to denounce him by name. Paul and his teachings must have been, in the early part of the 2d cent., held in such deep reverence that no one could hope to destroy them by direct assault; the only hope was a flank attack. This reverence for Paul implies the reception of all he taught. All the specially Pauline doctrines of original sin, of redemption through the atonement: Asc. Ixx; Odes of Solomon.

While the significance of this statement is somewhat debatable, yet there is little doubt, as judged from his attitude and statement immediately following, that Pilate was endeavoring to appeal to the acusers' sympathies and to point out to them the main features of Jesus. The ordinary punctuation which places an exclamation point after "Behold" and a period after "the man" is evidently incorrect if the grammatical structure in the Gr is to be observed, which gives to the second and third words the nominative form, and which therefore admits of a mild exclamation, and therefore of the emphasis upon "the man." Some, however, hold the contrary view and maintain that the utterance was made in a spirit of contempt and ridicule, as much as to say, "Behold here a mere man." See esp. on this view Marcus Dods in Expositor's Gr Test. It would seem, however, that the former of the two views would be sustained by the chief facts in the case.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN
Reading this book one soon becomes aware that it is a discussion of certain difficult problems of life. It begins with a title which is not misleading:

1. Structure (1:1), followed by a preface (vs 2–11).

2. Of the Book It has a formal conclusion (13:8–13). Between the preface and the conclusion the book of the book is made up of materials of two kinds—first a series of "I" sections, sections uttered in the 1st person, a record of a personal experience; and second, an alternating series of gnomic sections, sections made up of proverbs (say 5:6,9–12; 6:1–12; 7:1–14,16–22; 8:1–8; 9:7–10; 10:1–4; 11:22,23). These two sections are called the "thou" sections, as most of them have the pronoun of the 2nd person. The idea of the vanity of all things characterizes the record of experience, but it also appears in the "thou" sections (e.g. 9:9). On the other hand, the proverb element is not wholly lacking in the "I" sections (e.g. 4:1–3).

In the preface the speaker lays down the proposition that all things are unreal, and that the results of human effort are illusive (1:23). The same holds in regard to all human study and thinking (vs 8–11). The speaker shows familiarity with the phenomena which we think of as those of natural law, the persistence of things, but he thinks of them in the main as monotonously limiting human experience. Nothing is new. All effort of nature or of man is the doing again of something which has already been done.

After the preface the speaker introduces himself, and recounts his experiences. At the outset he had a noble ambition for wisdom and discipline, but all he attained to was unreason and perplexity of mind (vs 12–18). This is equally the meaning of the text, whether the wind, the streams, are alike the repetition of an unending round (vs 4–7). Finding no adequate satisfaction in the pursuits of the scholar and thinker, taken by themselves, he seeks to combine these with the pursuit of agreeable sensations—alle those which come from luxury and those which come from activity and enterprise and achievement (2:1–12). No one could make the shape of the abyss any experiment, but again he only attains to unreason and perplexity of spirit. He says to himself that at least it is in itself profitable to be a wise man rather than a fool, but his comfort is impaired by the fact that both alike are mortal (vs 13–17). He finds little reassurance in the idea of laboring for the benefit of posterity; posterity is often not worthy (vs 18–21). One may toil unremittingly, but what is the use (vs 22:23)?

He does not find himself helped by bringing God into the problem. If God is good for a man that he should eat and drink and make his soul see good in his toil (vs 24–26, as most naturally translated), even if he thinks of it as the gift of God; for how can one be sure that the gift of God is anything but love from human life? It was just to dismiss lightly the idea of God as a factor in the problem. It is true that there is a time for everything, and that everything is "beautiful in its time." It is also true that ideas of infinity are in men's minds, ideas which are not lost, and which are not fully comprehended (3:1–18). Here are tokens of God, who has established an infinite order. If we understood His ways better, that might unravel our perplexities. And if God is, immortality may be, and the solution of our problems may lie in that direction. For a man is not lazy and not toil; the moment the sleeper were coming out into the light, but doubt resumes its hold upon him. He asks himself, "Who knoweth?" and he settles back into the darkness. He has no sure answer, or even way to "eat and drink, and make his soul enjoy good" is not worth while; and now he reaches the conclusion that, unsatisfactory as this is, there is nothing better (vs 19–22).

And so the record of experiences continues, hopeful passages alternating with pessimistic passages. After a while the agnosticism and pessimism recede somewhat, and the hopeful passages become more positive. Even though "the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words, as the humane and wise heard in quiet are better than the cry of him that ruelit among fools" (9:17). He says "Surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God" (8:12), no matter how strongly appearances may indicate the contrary.

The gnomic sections are mostly free from agnosticism and pessimism. The book as a whole sums itself up in the conclusion, "Fear God, and keep his commandments" (12:15).

Of course the agnostic and pessimistic utterances in Eccle are to be regarded as the presentation of one side of an argument. Disconnect them and they are no part of the moral and religious teaching of the book, except in an indirect way. At no point should we look to this book for a real and genuine doubt in regard to God or moral obligation. He delineates for us a soul in the toils of mental and spiritual conflict. It is a delineation which may serve for warning, and which is in other ways wholesome and instructive; and in the outcome of it, it is full of encouragement.

In some passages the speaker in Eccle has in mind the solution of the problems of life which we are accustomed to call Epicurean (e.g. 5:18–20; 7:16; 8:15; 11:24)—the consistent in avoiding extremes, and in getting from life as many agreeable sensations as possible; but it is not correct to say that he advocates this philosophy. He rather presents it as an alternative.

His conclusion is the important part of his reasoning. All things are vanity. Everything passes away. Yet (he says) it is better to read and use good words than bad words. Therefore because the Great Teacher is wise, he ever teaches the people knowledge, and in so doing he ever seeks good words, vanities, and vaunting of spirit' or "vanity and a striving after wind" ("emptiness, and struggling for breath"), though the first of these two tr's is the better grounded.

3. Compositional Authorship?

Partitional hypotheses can easily be offered, and perhaps there is no great mystery, that there be in this book three points of views which cannot be accounted for by the hypothesis that we have here just the work of one author, who sometimes quotes proverbial utterances, either his own or those of other men. As proving the intention of the book three points of view present themselves. First, in some cases (e.g. 1:40b–16) the experience matter and the gnomic matter are closely combined in sense and in grammatical construction. Second, it is possible to interpret all the gnomic sections of the author's serious argument. Third, if so we interpret them the book is a unit, the argument moving forward co-tinuously out of the speculative into the practical, and out of the darkness into the light.

The speaker in Eccl calls himself 'Kôheleth' (1.1, 2.12 and other places), rendered "the Preacher" in the EV. The word does not occur 4. Koheleth elsewhere, although it is from a stem which is in common use. Apparently it has been coined for a purpose by the author of Eccl. In form it is a fem. participle, though it denotes a man. This is best explained as a case of the use of an abstract expression for a concrete, as when English say: "Your Honor," "Your Majesty." The other words of the stem are used of people gathering in assemblies, and the current explanation is to the effect that Kôheleth is a person who draws an audience whom he may address. To this there are two objections: First, the participle is intransitive; its natural implication is that of a person who participates in an assembly, not of one who causes the participants to assemble. Second, the assembly distinctively indicated by the words of this stem is the official assembly for the transac- tion of business, not some other social or religious assembly. On this basis Kôheleth seems to mean citizenship, or concretely, a citizen—a citizen of such respectability that he is entitled to participate in public assemblies. It is in the character of citizen-king that the speaker in Eccl relates his experiences and presents his ideas.

This word for "assembly" and its cognates are in the Gr often tras by ekklēsea and its cognates (e.g. Dt 4 10; 9 10; Jgs 20 2; 21 5-8). So we are not surprised to find Kôheleth rendered by the Gr Ekklesiastes, and this Latinized into Ecclesiastes.

The speaker in Eccl speaks not only in the character of Koheleth, but in that of "the son of David, king in Jerusalem" (1 1). So far as the "king in Jerusalem" question might be either Solomon or any other king of the dynasty, or might be a composite or an ideal king. He is represented (1 12—2 11) as "king over Israel," and as distinguished for wisdom, for his luxuries, for his great enterprises in building and in business. These marks fit Solomon better than any other king of the dynasty, unless possibly Uzziah. Possibly it is not absurd to apply to Solomon even the phrase "all that Israel saw of the works of the fingers of his hands" (1 16; 2 7.9; of 1 Ch 29 25; 1 K 3 12; 2 Ch 1 12). It is safer, however, to use an alternative statement. The speaker in Eccl is either Solomon or some other actual or composite or ideal king of the dynasty of David.

If it were agreed that Solomon is the citizen king who, in Eccl, is represented as speaking, that would not be the same thing as agreeing that

5. Date and Solomon is the author of the book. Authorship

No one thinks that Sir Galahad is the author of Tennyson's poem of that name. Koheleth the king is the character into whose mouth the author of Ecclesiastes puts the utterances which he wishes to present, but it does not follow that the author is himself Koheleth.

The statement is often made that Jewish tradition attributes the writing of Eccl to Solomon; but can anyone cite any relatively early tradition to this effect? Is this alleged tradition anything else than the confusing of the author with the character whom he has depicted? The well-known words in Bāḇbāḏ Balthēḏ attributes Eccl to "Hezekiah and his company," not to Solomon. And the tradition which is represented by the order in which the books occur in the Heb Bibles seems to place it still later. Some of the facts which in this tradition are to be noted: First, it classes Eccl with the 5 miscellaneous books (Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est) known as the five neḥillōth, the five Rolls. Second, in the count of books which makes the number 22 or 24 it classes Eccl as one of the last 5 books (Eccl, Est, Dan, Ezr-Neh, 1 and 2 Ch). That the men who made this arrangement regarded the books of this group as the latest in the Bible is a natural inference.

This agrees with the internal marks which constitute the principal evidence we have on this point. The grammatical character and the vocabulary of Eccl are exceptionally peculiar, and they strongly indicate that the book was written in the same period with these other latest books of the OT. The true date is not much earlier or later than 400 BC (see Chronicles), though many place it a cent. or a cent. and a half later. Details concerning these phenomena may be found in Driver's Introduction or other Introductions, or in commentaries. Only a few of the points will be given here, with barely enough illustrative instances to render the points intelligible.

In Eccl the syntax of the vb. is peculiar. The imperfect with was almost the only form of the ordinary Heb narrative tense, occurs—for example, "And I applied my heart" (1 17)—but it is rare. The narrator habitually uses the perfect with waw (e.g. 1 13; 2 11.12.14.15 bis. 17). In any Eng. book we should find it very nearly always that he were in the habit of using the progressive form of the vb. instead of the ordinary form—if instead of saying "And I applied my heart" he should say "And I was applying my heart," "And I was looking on all the works," "And I was turning" (1 13; 2 11.12), and so on. Another marked peculiarity is the frequent repeating of the pronoun along with the vb.: "I said in my heart, even I; And I was hating, even I, all my labor" (2 1.18 and con- tinually). The phrase "I said in my heart" is com- monly found in Eccl as compared with other parts of the Heb Bible (e.g. 4 2). The abbreviated form of the relative pronoun is much used instead of the full form, and in both forms the pronoun is used disproportionately often as a conjunction. In these and many similar phenomena the Heb of Eccl is affiliated with that of the later times.

The vocabulary presents phenomena that have the same bearing. Words of the stem tāḵan appear in Eccl (1 16; 4 12; Jer 12 2; Er 9 8; Ezk 24 5; 4 56), and not elsewhere in the Bible; they are frequent in the Talm. Words of the stem zāman (3 1) are used only in Eccl, Ezr, Neh, DnI, Est. Words of the stem shāḏāḏ, the stem whence comes the word "sultan," are frequent in Eccl—words which are used elsewhere only in the avowedly post-exilic books and in Gen 42 6, though a different word of this stem appears in the history of the time of David. Only in Eccl and Est are found the vb. kāḏēr, "to be correct" (whence the modern Jew- "kasher") and its derivative kāḇeḇāḏon. The Pers word parāḏ, "park" (2 5), occurs elsewhere only in Neh and Cant, and the Pers word pāḏāḏom, "official decision" or "record" (8 11), only in Est 1 20, and in the Aram. parts of Ezr and DnI. Eccl also abounds in late words formed from earlier stems, for example, ṣēḵēl and ṣēḵēlith, "folly" (10 6; 2 3, et al.; or mēḏānāḏ, "province" (5 8), frequent in the latest books, but elsewhere found only in one passage in 1 K (20 14.15.17.19). Esp. common are new derivatives that end in -āḏēm, for example, yēḇēn, "profit"; ṣīḇān, "travail"; ṣēḇēn, "that which is missing"; ṭeḇēn, "vexation" (1 3.13.15.17 and often). To these add instances of old words used in new meanings, and the various other groups of phenomena which can be grouped in such cases. No parts of the book are free from them.

The arguments for a later date than that which has been assigned are inconclusive. The Heb of Edians, ed′i-as. See IEdians.

Edinun, ed′i-on (B, 'Eṣṣwovē, Eddēnions, A, 'Eśwō, Eddinōs): One of the “holy singers”) at Josiah’s Passover (1 Esd 1 15). AV reads here Jeduthun, the corresponding name in the passage (2 Ch 35 15).

Eden, ed′on (ʾē-dān, “delight”); ’Edēn, “delight”; ’Eḏēp, ’Eḏeːm) (1) The land in which “Jeh God planted a garden,” where upon his creation “he put the man whom he had formed” (Gen 2 8). In the Assyrian inscriptions ’Ednu (Accadian Ṣēnu) means “plain” and it is from this that the Bib. word is probably derived. Following are the references to Eden in the Bible, aside from those in Gen 2 and 3: Gen 4 16; Isa 51 3; Ezek 28 13; 31 19; Jer 22 14; 35 5; Joel 2 3. The Garden of Eden is said to be “eastward, in Eden” (Gen 2 8): where the vegetation was luxurious (2 9) and the fig tree indigenous (3 7), and where it was watered by irrigation. All kinds of animals, including cattle, were found there (2 19-20). Moreover the climate was such that clothing was not needed for warmth. It is not surprising, therefore, that the pl. of the word has the meaning “delights,” and that Eden has been supposed to mean “the land of delights,” and that the word became a synonym for Paradise.

The location of Eden is in part to be determined from the description already given. It must be where there is a climate adapted to the production of fruit trees and of animals capable of domestication, and in general to the existence of man in his primitive condition. In particular, its location is supposed to be determined by the statements regarding the rivers coursing through it and surrounding it. This is the river “hākên” (Gen 2 10) which was parted and became four heads (“ro’shīm”), a word which (Jgs 8 16; Job 1 17) designates main detached branches into which an army is divided, and therefore would more properly signify branches than heads, permitting Joe and his leaders to intercept the river as it debouched into the ocean, which the Greeks was spoken of as the river “hōkēnandos” surrounding the world. According to Jos, the Ganges, the Tigris, the Euphrates and the Nile are the four rivers, being but branches of this one river. Moreover it is contended by some, with much show of reason, that the word prāḥ tāʾ Euphrates is a more general term, signifying “the broad” or “deep” river, and so may here refer to some other stream than the Euphrates, possibly to a river in some other region whose name is perpetuated in the present Euphrates, as “the Thames” of New England perpetuates the memory of the Thames of Old England. In ancient times there was a river Phrath in Persia, and perhaps two. It is doubtful whether the phrase “eastward, in Eden” refers to the position with reference to the writer or simply with reference to Eden itself. So far as that phrase is concerned, therefore, speculation is left free to range over the whole earth, and this it has done. Columbus and the sea-charts of the age put the mouth of the Orinoco surmised that its waters came down from the Garden of Eden. It is fair to say, however, that he supposed himself to be upon the E. coast of Asia, and the traditions of its location somewhere in Central Asia are numerous and persistent. Naturalists have, with Quatrefages, pretty generally fixed upon the portion of Central Asia stretching E. from the Pamir, often referred to as the roof of the world, and from which flow four great rivers—the Indus, the Tarim, the Sur Daria (Jaxartes), and the Amu Daria (Oxus)—as the original cradle of mankind. This conclusion has been arrived at from the fact that at the present time the three fundamental types of the races of mankind are grouped about this region. The Negro races are, indeed, in general far removed from the location, but still fragments of them both pure and mixed are found in various localities both in the interior and on the seashore and adjacent islands where they would naturally radiate from this center, while the yellow and the white races here meet at the present time in close contact. In the words of Quatrefages, "No other region of the globe presents a similar union of extreme human types distributed round a common center" (The Human Species, 176).

Philology, also, points to this same conclusion. On the E. are the monosyllabic languages, on the N. the polysyllabic or agglutinative languages, of the W. and S. the inflectional or Aryan languages, of which the Sanskrit is an example, being closely allied to nearly all the languages of Europe. Moreover, it is to this center that we trace the origin of nearly all the domesticated animals. Naturally, therefore, the same high authority writes, "There we are inclined to say the first human beings appeared and multiplied till the population flowed as from a bowl and spread themselves in waves by the migration of men and animals. Naturally, therefore, the same high authority writes, "We are inclined to say the first human beings appeared and multiplied till the population flowed as from a bowl and spread themselves in waves by the migration of man and animals." But it should be noted that if, as we believe, there was a universal destruction of antediluvian man, the center of dispersion had to be in the midst of the inhabited countries because we would be that from the time of Noah, and so would not refer to the Eden from which Adam and Eve were driven. The same may be said of Hazzekel's theory that man originated in a submerged continent within the area of the Indian Ocean.

Dr. William F. Warren has with prodigious learning attempted to show that the original Eden was at the North Pole, a theory which has been rejected by nearly every student of the question, and which, in the writer's opinion, is certainly conclusive, for it certainly is true that in preglacial times a warm climate surrounded the North Pole in all the lands which have been explored. In North America, Siberia, and Spitsbergen abundant remains of fossil plants show that during the middle of the Tertiary period the whole circumpolar region was characterized by a climate similar to that prevailing at the present time in Southern Europe, Japan, and the southern United States (see Asa Gray's lectures on "Forest Geography and Archaology" in the American Journal of Science, CXVI, 85–94, 183–96, and Wright, Ice Age in North America, 5th ed., ch. xvii). But as the latest discoveries have shown that there is no land within several hundred miles of the North Pole, Dr. Warren's theory, if maintained at all, will have to be modified so as to place Eden at a considerable distance from the actual pole. Furthermore, his theory would involve the destruction of "Tertiary man," and thus extend his chronology to an incredible extent, even though with Professor Green (see Antediluvians) we are permitted to consider the genealogical table of Gen 5 as sufficiently elastic to accommodate itself to any facts which may be discovered.

Much also has been said in favor of identifying Eden with Armenia, for it is here that the Tigris and Euphrates have their origin, while two others, the Aras (Araxes) emptying into the Caspian Sea and the Choruk (thought by some to be the Phasis) emptying into the Black Sea, would represent the Giron and the Pishon. Havilah would then be identified with Colchis, famous for its golden sands. But Cush is difficult to find in that region; while these four rivers could by no possibility be regarded as branches of one parent stream.

Two theories locate Eden in the Euphrates valley. Of these the first would place it near the head of the Pers Gulf where the Euphrates after their junction form the Tigris and Euphrates after their junction form the Tigris beneath the name of the Shatt el-Arab which bifurcates into the Euphrates and the western arm before reaching the Gulf. Calvin considered the Pishon to be the eastern arm and the Giron the western arm. Other more recent authorities modify the theory by supposing that Giron and Pishon are represented by the Karun and the Kerka River which comes into the Shatt el-Arab from the east. The most plausible objection to this theory is that the Bib. account represents all these branches as down stream from the main river, whereas this theory supposes them to rise upstream. This objection has been ingeniously met by calling attention to the fact that 2000 years before Christ the Pers Gulf extended up as far as Eridu, 100 miles above the present mouth of the river, and this ancient land entered the head of the Gulf through separate channels, the enormous amount of silt brought down by the streams having converted so much of the valley into dry land. In consequence of the tides which extend up to the head of the Gulf, the current of all these streams would be turned up stream periodically, and so account for the Bib. statement. In this case the river (nâdâr) would be represented by the Pers Gulf itself, which was indeed called by the Hebrews a marâmâr, "the bitter river." This theory is further supported by the fact that according to the cuneiform inscriptions Eridu was reputed to have in its neighborhood a garden, "a holy place," in which there grew a sacred palm tree. This "tree of life" appears frequently upon the inscriptions with two guardian spirits standing on either side.

The other theory, advocated with great ability by Friedrich Delitzsch, places its seat of ancient Babylon, where the Tigris and Euphrates approach to within a short distance of one another and where the country is intersected by numerous irrigating streams which put off from the Euphrates and Tigris and flow into the sea. The latter level is here considerably lower than that of the Euphrates—the situation being somewhat such as it is at New Orleans where the Mississippi River puts off numerous streams which empty into Lake Pontchartrain. Delitzsch supposes the Shatt el-Nahr, which flows eastward into the Tigris, to be the Giron, and the Pallacap, flowing on the W. side of the Euphrates through a region producing gold, to be the Pishon. The chief difficulties attending this theory pertain to the Choruk, which runs down to the Persian Gulf with the Pallacap, and the location of Havilah on its banks. There is difficulty, also, in all these theories in the identification of Cush (Ethiopia), later associated with the country from which the Nile emerged after giving countenance to the belief of Jos and many others that that river represented the Giron. If we are compelled to choose between these theories it would seem that the one which locates Eden near the head of the Pers Gulf combines the greater number of probabilities of every kind.

EDEN, HOUSE OF. See AVEN; BETH-EDEN; CHILDREN OF EDEN.

EDER, e’dër ( Mater card. ’Ather, “flock”):
(1) One of the “uttermost cities” of Judah in the Negeb (“South”) near the border of Edom (Josh 15 21), possibly Kh. el ’Adar, 5 miles S. of Gaza, but probably this is too far west.
(2) Edor (AV Eden) or better Migdal Eder, שדייה, migdal ’Edher, “the tower of the flock!”; פדeah, Gäder. After Rachel died and was buried “in the way to Ephrath (the same is Bethlehem) . . . Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Eden” (Gen 35 19). In ver 21 he is described as proceeding to Hebron. This “tower of the flock,” which may have been only a tower and no town, must therefore be looked for between Bethlehem and Hebron. Jerome says that it was one Rom mile from Bethlehem. In the LXX, however, vs 16 and 21 are transposed, which suggests that there may have been a tradition that Migdal Eder was between Bethel and Bethlehem. There must have been many such towers for guarding flocks against robbers. Cf “tower of the watchman” (2 K 18 8, etc.). The phrase “Migdal Eden” occurs in Mic 4 8 where Jerus is compared to such a tower.

(2) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 16, AV “Ader”).

EDES, e’dēs: RV EDOS (q.v.).

EDGE, ej: Very frequently occurs in the phrase “the edge of the sword” (Josh 10 28, etc.) from the Heb יד, peh, “lip,” or יד, ’šaphāh, “lip.” Ex 28 7 and 39 4 read “ends,” from יד, kāḏāh, “end” (AV “edge”), and Josh 13 27 has “uttermost part” for the same Heb word (AV “edge”). In Jer 31 29 and Ezek 18 2, “The children’s teeth are set on edge” ( יד, kāḏāh, “to be blunt”), i.e. set hard one against another.

EDIFICATION, edi-fi-kā‘shun, EDIFY, ed-fi: The Gr words ἐκσκαταί, ὀικοδομέω, “to build,” stem from the act of building, and are used both lit. and fig. in the NT: “edify,” “edifying,” “edification,” are the tr of AV in some 20 passages, all in the fig. sense of the promotion of growth in Christian character. RV in 2 Cor 10 8; 13 10; Eph 4 12,16; 1 Thess 5 11 renders “build up,” “build up,” “making the force of the figure clearer to the Eng. reader. In 1 Tim 1 4 the Gr text followed by RV has ἐκκατάνωσις, ὀικοδομή, “dispensation,” instead of ἐκσκατάσσω, ὀικοδομέω, “edifying” (AV).

EDNA, ed’na ( ידוה, Edna): Wife of Raguel and mother of Sarah who married Tobias (Tob 7 2, etc. 10 12; 11 1). E. in Heb means “pleasure” and corresponds to Lat Anna.

EDOM, e’duhn, EDOMITES, e’duhn-its ( ידומ, ’Edom, “red”;
(2) ?שאעם, ?שאום, Edom): The boundaries of Edom may be traced with some approach to accuracy. On the E. of the northern border ran from the Dead Sea, and was marked by Wady el-Karadī, or Wady el-Haṣā. On the E. it marched with the desert. The southern border ran by Elath and Ezion-geber (Dt 2 8). On the W. of the 'Arabah the north boundary of Edom is determined by the south border of Israel, as indicated in Nu 34 3 f: a line running from the Salt Sea southward of the Ascent of Akarabbin to Zin and Kadesh-barnath. This last, we are told, lay in the “uttermost” of the border of Edom (Nu 20 16). The line may be generally indicated by the course of Wādy el-Fikrah. How much of the uplands W. of the 'Arabah southward to the Gulf of 'Akbab was included in Edom it is impossible to say.

The land thus indicated varies greatly in character and features. S. of the Dead Sea in the bottom of the valley we have first the stretch of salt marsh land called eser and Sebbah; then, beyond the line of white Features cliffs that crosses the valley diagonally from N.W. to S.E., a broad depression strewed with stones and sandhills, the débris of an old sea bottom, rises gradually, and 60 miles to the S. reaches a height of about 700 ft. above the level of the Red Sea, 2,000 ft. above that of the Dead Sea. From this point it sinks until it reaches the shore of the Gulf of 'Akbab, 45 miles farther S. The whole depression is known today as Wādy el-l'Arabah (cf Heb ḫā-‘arabāh, Dt 2 8 RV, etc.). On either side the mountains rise steeply from the valley, their edges curved and the deep wadys that break down from the interior (see ARABAH). The northern part of the plateau on the W. forms the spacious grazing ground of the 'Azāzimeh Arabs. The mountains rise to a height of from about 1,500 ft. to a little over 2,000 ft. This district was traversed by the ancient caravan road to South Pal; and along the eastern side traces of the former civilization are still to be seen. The desert region to the S. is higher, reaching to as much as 3,600 ft. The mountain range E. of the 'Arabah is generally higher in the S. than in the N. Jebel Harān, beside Petra, is 4,780 ft. above sea-level; while E. of 'Akbab, Jebel el-Ḥismā may be as much as 5,900 ft. in height. Limestone, porphyry and Nubian sandstone are the prevailing formation; but volcanic rocks are also found. The range consists mainly of rough rocky heights with many almost inaccessible peaks separated by deep gorges. But there are also breadths of fertile land where wheat, grapes, figs, dates, and olives are cultivated with advantage. The northern district is known today by the name el-Jebāl, corresponding to the ancient Gebal. Seir is the name applied to the eastern range in Gen 36 8; Dt 2 1; 2 Ch 20 23. It is likely that it was used both in the rans. and the N.T. Seira, however, is used for the western highlands in Dt 33 2. This seems to be its meaning also in Jgs 5 4, where it appears as the equivalent of “the field of Edom.” With this same phrase, however, in Gen 32 3 it may still apply to the eastern range. See illustration under DESERT.

The name Edom, “red,” may have been derived from the red sandstone cliffs characteristic of the country. It was applied to Esau because of the color of his skin (Gen 25 25), or from the color of the potage for which he sold his birthright (ver 30). In Gen 36 8 Edom is equated with Edom as dwelling in Mt. Seir; and he is described as the father of Edom (ver 9, Heb). The name however is probably much older. It may be traced in the records of the Twelfth Dynasty in Egypt. In the Am Tab (Brit Mus No. 64) Uduum, or Edom, is named; and in Assyrian inscriptions the name Uduum occurs of a city, and the latter may have been named from the former: this again may have been derived from a deity, Edom, who may be traced in such a name as Obed-edom (2 S 6 10).

The children of Edom are said to have “destroyed” the Horites who dwelt in Seir before them (Gen 14 6; Dt 2 22). This only means that the Horites were subdued. Esau married the daughter of Naah, a Horite (Gen 36 20—in ver 2 he is called a Hivite); and the lists in this chapter show that races intermingled. The Horite government was in the hands of "dukes" (Gen 36 29 f., RV "chiefs"). They were succeeded by dukes of the house of Esau (vs 40 f.). This form of government gave way to that of an elective monarchy (vs 31 f.), and this had existed some time before Israel left the wilderness. Then reigning king would not permit Israel to pass through the land (Nu 20 14 ff.; 21 4). Israel was forbidden to "abhor an Edomite," on the ground that he was a brother; and children of the third generation might enter the assembly of the Lord (Dt 23 7 f.). War with Edom was out of the question.

Some thirty years after the Exodus, Ramesses III "smote the people of Seir." The Israelites could not have been far off. We first hear of war between Israel and Edom under Saul (1 S 14 47). David prosecuted the war with terrific force, slaughtering 18,000 Edomites (so read instead of "Syrians") in the Valley of Salt (2 S 8 13 f.)—so seldom for six months in the country, which wasarrisoned by Israelites, "until he had cut off every male in Edom" (1 K 11 15 f.). Hadad of the blood royal of Edom escaped to Egypt, and later became a source of trouble to Solomon (vs 14 f.25). The conquest of Edom opened to Israel the ports of the Red Sea, then the Edomites of Solomon and Jehoshaphat set out. In Jehoshaphat's time the king is called a "deputy" (22 47). Its king acknowledged the supremacy of Judah (2 K 3 9, etc.). Under Jehoram of Jehoshaphat, Edom revolted. Jehoram defeated them at Zair, but was unable to quell the rebellion (8 20 f.). Amaziah invaded the country, slew 10,000 in the Valley of Salt, and took Sela which he named Joktheel (14 7). Uzziah restored the Edomite port of Elath (14 22). In the Syrian war Rezin regained Elath for Syria, and cast out the Jews. It was then permanently occupied by Syrians—here also probably we should read Edomites (16 6). From the cuneiform inscription we learn that when Tiglath-pileser subdued Rezin, among the kings from whom he received homage at Damascus was Qaus-malaka of Edom (736 BC). Later Malik-rim paid homage to Senacherib. To Ezarhaddon also they were compelled to pay it. They were driven away no doubt—else they could to Nebuchadnezzar, and exulted in the destruction of Judah, stirring the bitterest indignation in the hearts of the Jews (Lam 4 21; Ezk 25 12; 35 3 f.; Ob vs 10 f.). The Edomites pressed into the new empty lands in the S. of Judah. In 300 BC Mt. Seir with its capital Petra fell into the hands of the Nabataeans. West of the 'Arabah the country they occupied came to be known by the Gr name Idumaea, and the people

5. Idumaeans in Idumaea. Hebron, their chief city, was taken by Judas Maccabaeus in 165 BC (1 Mac 4 29.61; 5 65). In 126 BC the country was subdued by John Hyrcanus, who compelled the people to become Jews and to submit to circumcision. Antipater, governor of Idumaea, was made procurator of Judaeans and Galileans, and Julius Caesar. He paved the way to the throne for his son Herod the Great. With the fall of Judah under the Romans, Idumaea disappears from history.

The names of several Edomite deities are known: Hadad, Qaus, Koze, and, possibly, Edom; but of the religion of Edom we are without information. The language differed little from Heb.

EDOS, e'dos (H8165, Edosat; AV Edes): One who agreed to put away his foreign wife (1 Ead 9 35); called Iddo, AV "Jadan," in Ezr 10 43.

EDREI, e'dre'i (H7690, 'edhre'i; 'Epdavv, Edr'dein): (1) One of the cities of Og, not far from Ashtaroth, where the power of his kingdom received its death-blow from the invading Israelites (Josh 12 4; Nu 21 33 f., etc.). It seems to mark the western limit of Bashan and ammonite lands on the E. (Dt 3 10). It was given to Machir, son of Manasseh (Josh 13 31). Onom places it 24 Rom miles from Bostra. The most probable identification is with Der'ah, a town of between 4,000 and 5,000 inhabitants, on the southern lip of Wady Zeidah, about 29 miles as the crow flies E. of the Sea of Galilee. It is the center of an exceedingly fruitful district. The accumulated rubbish in the town covers many remains of antiquity. It is, however, chiefly remarkable for the extraordinary subterranean city, as yet only partially explored, cut in the rock under the town. This is certainly very ancient, and was doubtless used by the inhabitants as a refuge in times of stress and peril. For a description see Schumacher, Across the Jordan, p 131. I. Education Defined.—By education we understand the sum total of those processes whereby society transmits from one generation to the next its accumulated social, intellectual and religious experience and tradition. In part these processes are formal and incidental, arising from participation in certain forms of social life and activity which exist on their own account and not for the sake of their educative influence upon the rising generation. The more formal educative processes are designed (1) to give the immature members of society a mastery over the symbols and technique of civilization, including language (reading and writing), the arts, the sciences, and religion, and (2) to enlarge the fund of individual and community knowledge beyond the measure furnished by the direct activities of the immediate environment (cf Dewey, art. on "Education" in Monroe's CE; cf Butler, M.).

Religious education among ancient and modern peoples alike reveals clearly this twofold aspect of all education. On its formal side it consists in the transmission of religious ideas and experience by means of the reciprocal processes of imitation and example. Each generation is thus perpetually participating in the religious activities and ceremonies of the social group, imbibing as it were the spirit and ideals of the preceding generation as these are modified by the particular economic and industrial conditions under which the entire process takes place. Formal religious education begins with the conscious and systematic effort on the part of the mature members of a social group (tribe, nation, or religious fellowship) to initiate the immature members to the solemnities of life, to patient training, or both, into the mysteries and high privileges of their own religious fellowship and experience. As regards both the content and form of this instruction, these will in every case be determined by the type and stage of civilization reflected in the life, occupations, habits and customs of the people. Among primitive races educational method is simpler and the content of formal instruction less differentiated than on higher culture levels (Ames, _ETH_). All education is as first religious in the sense that religious motives and ideas predominate in the educational efforts of all primitive peoples. The degree to which religion continues predominant in the educational system of a progressive nation depends upon the vitality of its religion and upon the measure of efficiency and success with which from the first that religion is instilled into the very bone and sinew of each succeeding generation. Here lies the explanation of the religious-educational character of the nation's life, and here, too, the secret of Israel's incomparable influence upon the religious and educational development of the world. The religion of Israel was a vital religion and it was a teaching religion (Kont, _GTJC_).

II. Education in Early Israel (from Patriarchal Times) Through social and national development the Hebrews passed through several clearly marked cultural stages which it is important to note in connection with their educational history. At the earliest point at which the OT gives us any knowledge of them, they, like their ancestors, were nomads and shepherds. Their chief interest centered in the flocks and herds from which they gained a livelihood, and in the simple, useful arts that seem gradually to have become hereditary in certain families. With the settlement of the Hebrew tribes in Palestine and their closer contact with Canaanitish culture, a more established agricultural life with resulting changes in social and religious institutions gradually superseded the nomadic stage of culture. A permanent dwelling-place made possible, as the condition of warfare of gradual conquest made necessary, a closer federation of the tribes, which ultimately resulted in the establishment of the monarchy under David (W. R. Smith, RS; Davidson, _HE_).

In those two cultures, both the nomadic and the agricultural, there was no distinct separation between the spheres of 1. Nomadic religion and ordinary life. The relation of the people to Yahweh was conceived by them in simple fashion as filial obedience and loyalty, and on Yahweh's part reciprocal parental care over them as His people. The family was the social unit and its head the patriarch, home and family, authority and leadership. The tribal head or patriarch in turn combined in himself the functions which later were differentiated into those of priest and prophet and king. Education was a matter of purely domestic interest and concern. The home was the only school and the parents the only teachers. But there was real instruction, all of which, moreover, was given in a spirit of devout religious earnestness and of reverence for the common religious ceremonies and beliefs, no matter to what the scholar was the elementary task of husbandry or of some useful art, or whether it was the sacred history and traditions of the tribe, or the actual performance of its religious rites. According to Jos (Ant. IV, viii. 12) Moses himself has commanded: "All boys are to learn the most important parts of the law since such knowledge is most valuable and the source of happiness"; and again he commanded (Apion, II, 25) to teach them the rudiments of learning (reading and writing) together with the laws and ceremonies, so that they might not transgress or seem ignorant of the laws of their ancestors, but rather emulate their example. Certain it is that the earliest legislation, including the Decalogue, emphasized parental authority and their claims on the reverence of their children: "Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which Jehovah thy God giveth thee" (Ex 20:12); "And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death. And he that curseth his father, or his mother, shall surely be put to death" (Ex 21:15-17); while every father was exhorted to explain to his son the origin and significance of the great Passover ceremony with its feast of unleavened bread: "And thou shalt tell thy son in that day, saying, It is because of that which Jehovah did for me when I came forth out of Egypt" (Ex 13:8).

The period of conquest and settlement developed leaders who not only led the allied tribes in battle, but served as judges between their people. They were the "rulers of the city and commercial life" (Ames, _PEE_, 174 f.). The establishment of the kingdom and the beginning of that "medical" religious life were accompanied by more radical cultural changes, including the differentiation of religious from other social institutions, the organization of the priesthood, and the rise and development of prophecy. Elijah, the Tishbite, Amos, the herdsman from Tekoa, Isaiah, the son of Amoz, were all champions of a simple faith and ancient religious ideals as over against the worldly-wise diplomacy and sensuous idolatry of the surrounding nations. Under the monarchy also a new religious symbolism developed. Yahweh was thought of as a king in whose hands actually lay the supreme guidance of the state: "Accordingly the organization of the state included provision for consulting His will and obtaining His direction in the affairs of State" (W. R. Smith, _RS_, 30). Under the teaching of the prophets the ideal of personal and civic righteousness was moved to the very forefront of Hebrew religious thought, while the prophetic ideal of the future was that of a time when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea" (Isa 11:9), when all "from the least of them unto the greatest of them" shall know him (Jer 31:34). Concerning the so-called "schools of the prophets", which, in the days of Elija, were also religious societies, Jericho and Gilgal (2 K 2:35; 4:38 f.), and probably in other places, it should be noted that these were associations or brotherhoods established for the purpose of mutual edification rather than education. The Bible does not use the word "schools" to designate those fraternities. Nevertheless we cannot conceive of the element of religious training as being entirely absent.

Shortly before the Bab captivity King Josiah gave official sanction and sanction to the teachings of the prophets, while the Deuteronomic legislation of the same period strongly emphasized the responsibility of parents for the religious and moral education of their children. Concerning the words of the law Israel is admonished: "Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up; (De 6:7)

For the benefit of children as well as adults the law was to be written "upon the door-posts" and "gates" (De 6:9; 11:11). For the benefit of Levites, who were the guardians of the law, the priestly leaders intrusted them with the teaching of the law (Dt 33:10). For the benefit of Israel as a whole the law was given to the children of Israel: ... Hear O Israel, the statutes and the ordinances which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and observe to do them." (De 6:20).

"For the commandment is a lamp: and the law is light; And reproofs of instruction is the way of life." (Pr 6:23)

4. Reading and Writing

With the development and reorganization of the ritual, priests and Levites, as the guardians of the law, were the principal instructors of the people, while parents remained in charge of the training of the children. In the families of the aristocracy the place of the parents was sometimes taken by tutors, as appears from the case of the infant Solomon, whose training seems to have been intrusted to the prophet Nathan (2 S 12:25). There is no way of determining to what extent the common people were able to read and write. Our judgment that these rudiments of formal education in the modern sense were not restricted to the higher classes is based upon such passages as Isa 29:11,12, which distinguishes between the man who "is learned" (lit. "knoweth letters") and the one who is "not learned," and Isa 10:19, referring to the ability of a child "to write," taken together with such facts as that the literary prophets Amos and Micah sprang from the ranks of the common people, and that "the workman who excavated the tunnel from the Virgin's Spring to the Pool of Siloam carved in the rock the manner of their work" (Kennedy in HDB).

It should be added that the later Jewish tradition, reflected in the Targums and Midrash, which represents both public, elementary and college education as highly developed even in patriarchal times, is generally regarded as altogether unworthy.

III. Education in Later Israel (from the Exile to the Birth of Christ).—The national disaster that befell the Heb people in the downfall of Jerusalem and the Maccabees was not without its compensating, purifying and stimulating influence upon the religious and educational development of the nation. Under the pressure of adverse external circumstances the only source of comfort for the exiled people was in the law and covenant of Yahweh, while the shattering of all hope of immediate national greatness turned the thought and attention of the religious leaders away from the present toward the future. Two types of Messianic expectation characterized the religious development of the exilic period. The first is the priestly, material hope, return, redemption and restoration which had been the prophecies of Ezekiel. The exiled tribes are to return again to Jerusalem; the temple is to be restored, its ritual and worship purified and exalted, the priestly ordinance and service elaborated. The second is the theocentric and idealized Messianic expectation of the Second Isaiah, based on teachings of the earlier prophets. For the greatest of Heb prophets Yahweh is the only God, and the God of all nations as well as of Israel. For him Israel is Yahweh's servant, His instrument for revealing himself to other nations, who, when they witness the redemption of Israel, will bow down to Yahweh and acknowledge His rule. "Thus the trials of the nation lead to a comprehensive universalism within which the suffering Israel gains an elevated and ennobling explanation." (Ames, PRE, 155). In the prophetic vision of Ezekiel we must seek the inspiration for the later development of Jewish ritual, as well as the basis of those eschatological hopes and expectations which find their fuller expression in the apocalypse of the Apocalyptic period.

1. Educational Significance of the Prophets

The theological and religious leaders of the exilic period were the religious leaders of the nation. In advance of their age they were the heralds of Divine truth; the watchmen on the mountain tops whose clear voice turned the nation away from the false and worldly religious teachings and principles they impressed upon the consciousness of their own and succeeding generations, thereby giving to future teachers of their race the essence of their message, and preparing the way for the larger and fuller interpretation of religion and life contained in the teachings of Jesus. The immediate influence of their teaching is explained in part by the variety and effectiveness of their teaching method, their marvelous simplicity and directness of speech, their dramatic emphasis upon essentials and their intelligent appreciation of social conditions and problems about them.

The immediate bond of union, as well as the textbook and program of religious instruction, during the period of the Exile, was the Book of the Law. When in 458 BC a company of exiles returned to the land, they brought with them the books of the Law, the Prophets, the Psalms and the Psalms of the Targums and the Greek versions of the Hebrew Bible. The Book of the Law, the Pentateuch, and the Prophets were the books which were read and studied in the schools and colleges of the Jewish nation.

2. The Book of the Law

Subsequently, the Book of the Law, or the Torah, was the book which the exiles carried with them to the land of Babylon. When in 458 BC a company of exiles returned to the land, they brought with them the books of the Law, the Prophets, the Psalms and the Psalms of the Targums and the Greek versions of the Hebrew Bible. The Book of the Law, the Pentateuch, and the Prophets were the books which were read and studied in the schools and colleges of the Jewish nation.

3. Wise Men or Sages

The term "sages" or "rabbis" is used to designate the wise men and scribes of the later post-exilic times who were to be regarded as one and the same class, as an increasing number of scholars are inclined to believe, or thought of as distinct classes, the wise men and the scribes. The term "sages" or "rabbis" is used to designate the wise men and scribes of the later post-exilic times as well as those of the preceding period. The term "rabbis" is used to designate the wise men and scribes of the later post-exilic times as well as those of the preceding period.
both in Israel and among other nations of the East. As illustrations of their appearance in preexilic OT history may be cited the references in 2 S 14 1–20; 1 K 4 32; Isa 20 10. It is no lesser personage than King Solomon who, both by his contemporaries and later generations as well, was regarded as the representative of this earlier group of teachers who uttered their wisdom in the form of clever, epigrammatic proverbs and shrewd sayings. The climax of Wisdom-teaching belongs, however, to the later post-exilic period. Of the wise men of this later day an excellent description is given for us in the Book of Eccles (39 3.4.8.10; cf 1 1–11):

"He seeks out the hidden meaning of proverbs, And is conversant with the subtleties of parables, He serves among great men, And appears before him who rules; He travels through the land of strange nations; For he hath tried good things and evil among men.

He shows forth the instruction which he has been taught, And glories in the law of the covenant of the Lord.

Nations shall declare his wisdom, And the congregation shall tell out his praise."

Of the pedagogic experience, wisdom and learning of these sages, the Book of Prov forms the Bib. repository. Aside from the Torah it is the oldest book of education. The wise men conscious of life itself as a discipline. Parents are the natural instructors of their children:

"My son, hear the instruction of thy father, And forsake not the law of thy mother."—Prov 1 8.

(Cf 4 1–4 f; 6 20; 13 1.) The substance of such parental teaching is to be the "wisdom of Yahweh" which "is the beginning of wisdom"; and fidelity in the performance of this parental obligation has the promise of success:

"Train up a child in the way he should go, And even when he is old he will not depart from it."—Prov 22 6.

In their training of children, parents are to observe sternness, not hesitating to apply the rod of correction, when needed (cf 23 13.14), yet doing so with discretion, since wise reproof is better than "a hundred stripes" (17 10). Following the home training there is provision for further instruction at the hands of professional teachers for all who would really obtain unto "wisdom" and who can afford the time and expense of such special training. The teachers are none other than the wise men or sages whose words "heard in quiet" (Ecc 9 17) are "as goads, and as nails well fastened" (12 11). Their precepts teach diligence (Prov 6 6–11), chastity (7 5), charity (16 21), truthfulness (17 7) and temperance (21 17; 22 20.21.29–31); for the aim of all Wisdom-teaching is none other than

"To give prudence to the simple, To the young man knowledge and discretion: That the wise man may hear, and increase in learning; And that the man of understanding may attain unto sound counsels."—Prov 1 4.5.

The ἥθρωμα or "men of book learning" were editors and interpreters as well as scribes or copyists of ancient and current writings. As such they did not become prominent until the wise men, as such, stepped into the background, nor until the exigencies of the situation demanded more teachers and teaching than the ranks of priests and Levites, charged with religious duties, could supply. Ezra (cf 1 Macc 8 11; Neh 8 1 f), concerning whom we read that he "set his heart to seek the law of Jeh, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and ordinances" (Ezr 7 10). Likewise the Levites often appear as teachers of the law, and we must think of the development of scribes (scribism) as a distinct profession as proceeding very gradually. The same is true of the characteristic Jewish religious-educational institution, the synagogue, the origin and development of which fell within this same general period (cf SYNAGOGUE). The pupils of the ἥθρωμα were the Pharisees (πρόσκειται or "separatists") who during the Maccabean period came to be distinguished from the priestly party or Sadducees.

The conquest of Persia by Alexander (332 BC) marks the rise of Gr influence in Pal. Alexander himself visited Pal and perhaps Jerusalem, and the Roman Jews and granted to them the privilege of self-government, and the maintenance of their own social and religious customs, both at home and in Alexandria, the new center of Gr learning, in the founding of which many Jews participated (see ALEXANDRIA). During the succeeding dynasty of the Ptolemies, the Gr and Gr culture penetrated to the very heart of Judaism at Jerusalem, and threatened the overthrow of Jewish social and religious institutions. The Maccabean revolt under Antiochus Epiphanes (174–164 BC) served to reestablish the temple ritual during the early part of the Maccabean period (161–63 BC) were the natural reaction against the attempt of the Seleucidae forcibly to substitute the Gr gymnasium and theater for the Jewish synagogue and temple (cf 1 Macc 1, 33; 6 20; 13 13 and 2 Macc 4–10). The end of the Maccabean period found Pharisaism and strict Jewish orthodoxy in the ascendency with such Hellenic tendencies as had found permanent lodgment in the life of the Jewish community were driven out of the aristocratic Sadducees. The establishment of Rom authority in Pal (63 BC) introduced a new determining element into the environmental conditions under which Judaism was to attain its final distinguishing characteristics. The genius of the Romans was practical, legalistic and institutional. As organizers and administrators they were preeminent. But their religion never inspired to any exalted view of life, and education to them meant always the life of a practical life of religious duties. Hence the influence of Rom authority upon Judaism was favorable to the development of a narrow individualistic Pharisaism, rather than to the fostering of Gr idealism and universalism. With the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in 70 AD more than a cent. later (70 AD) and the cessation of the temple worship, the Sadducees as a class disappeared from Judaism, which has ever since been represented by the Pharisees devoted to the study of the law. Outside of Jerusalem and Pal, meanwhile, the Jewish communities at Alexandria and elsewhere were much more hospitable to Gr culture and learning, at the same time exercising a reciprocal, modifying influence upon Gr thought. It was, however, through its influence upon early Christian theology and education that the Hellenistic philosophy of the Alexandrian school left its deeper impress upon the substance and method of later Christian education.

IV. Education in New Testament Times (from the birth of Christ to the end of the 1st cent.)—

Elementary schools: Jewish education in the time of Christ was of the orthodox traditional type and in the hands of scribes, Pharisees and learned rabbis. The home was still the chief institution for the dispensation of instruction in Pal. Although synagogues, with attached schools for the young, were to be found in every important Jewish community. Public elementary schools, other than those connected with the synagogues, were of slower growth and do not seem to have been common until, some time after Joshua ben Gamala, high priest from 63–65 AD, ordered that teachers be appointed in every province and city to instruct children having attained the age of 6–7 years. In the synagogue schools the tannaim, or attendant, not infrequently served as schoolmaster (cf. School; Schoolmaster).

As in earlier times the Torah, connoting now the sacred OT writings as a whole, though with emphaticasis still upon the law, furnished the material for instruction. To this were added, in the secondary schools of the rabbis, the illustrative and rabbinical interpretation of the law (the haggadah) and its applications (the halakhah). Together the haggadah and halakhah furnish the content of the Talmuds, as the voluminous collections of orthodox Jewish teachings of later centuries, came to be called.

As regards teaching method the scribes and rabbis of NT times did not improve much upon the practice of the sōphrēn and sages of earlier centuries. Memorization, the exact transcription of the master's teaching, rather than general knowledge or culture, was the main objective. Since the voice of prophecy had become silent and the canon of revealed truth was considered closed, the intellectual mastery and interpretation of this sacred revelation of the past was the only aim that education on its intellectual side could have. On its practical side it sought, as formerly, the inculcation of habits of strict ritualistic observance—obedience to the letter of the law as a condition of association and fellowship with the selected company of true Israelites to which scribes and Pharisees considered themselves to belong. The success with which the teaching of the scribes and rabbis were accompanied is an evidence of their devotion to their work, and more still of the psychological insight manifested by them in utilizing every subtle means and method for securing and holding the attention of pupils. It was the cultured and learned scribes and rabbis who were they, or the trained and obedient servants of an educational ideal. The defects in their work were largely the defects in that ideal. Their theory and philosophy of education were narrow. "Their eyes were turned inward by its imperfection, rather than the present and future." They failed to distinguish clearly the gold from the dross in their inherited teachings, or to adapt these to the vital urgent needs of the common people. In its struggle against foreign and foreign cults and foreign culture, Judaism had increased itself in a shell of stereotyped orthodoxy, the attempt to adapt which to new conditions and to a constantly changing social order resulted in an insincere and shallow casuistry of which the fantastic conglomeration mass of Talmudic wisdom of the 4th and 6th centuries is the lasting memorial.

Nevertheless, "Jewish education, though defective both in matter and in method, and tending to fetter rather than to free the mind, was a distinct advance, and a source of much moral and intellectual benefit to the people." To these four points of excellence enumerated by Davidson (HE, 80) must be added a fifth which, briefly stated, is this: (5) Jewish education by its consistent teaching of lofty monotheism, and its emphasis, sometimes incidental and sometimes outstanding, upon righteousness and holiness of life as a condition of participation in a future Messianic kingdom, prepared the way for the Christian view of God and the world, set forth in its original distinctness of outline and incomparable simplicity in the teachings of Jesus.

Jesus was more than a teacher; but He was a teacher first. To His contemporaries He appeared as a Jewish rabbi of exceptional influence and personality. He used the pre-eminence of teaching method to forge the link between Jesus as a rabbi and the Rabbi, a teacher group of chosen disciples (learners) whom He trained and taught more explicitly with a view to perpetuating through them His own influence and work. His followers called Him Rabbi, and the scribes and Pharisees conceded His popularity and power. He taught, as did the rabbis of His time, in the temple courts, in the synagogue, in private, and on the public highway as the exigency of the case demanded. His textbook, so far as He used any, was the same as theirs; His form of speech (parable and connected discourse), manner of life, and methods of instruction were theirs. Yet into His message and method He put a new note of challenge, of authority that was new and inspired confidence. Breaking with the traditions of the past He substituted for devotion to the letter of the law an interest in men, with boundless sympathy for their misfortune, abiding faith in their worth and high destiny and earnest solicitude for their regeneration and perfection. To say that Jesus was the world's greatest and foremost example as a teacher is to state a fact borne out by every inquiry, test and comparison that modern educational science can apply to the work and influence of its great creative geniuses of the past. Where His contemporaries and even His own followers saw only "as in a glass, darkly," He saw clearly; and His view of God and the world, or future He saw and high destiny, has come down through the ages as a Divine revelation vouchsafed the world in Him. Viewed from the intellectual side, it was the life philosophy of Jesus that made His teachings imperishable; esthetically, it was the character, their monomania, of His message that drew the multitudes to Him; judged from the standpoint of will, it was the example of His life, its purpose, its purity, its helpfulness, that caused men to follow Him; and tested by the standard of its success in fitting the doctrine, the ideal and the example of the human brotherliness and Divine sonship, that made Jesus the pattern of the great teachers of mankind in every age and generation. With a keen, penetrating insight into the ultimate meaning of life, He reached out, as it were, over the conflicting opinions of men and the mingling social and cultural currents of His time backward to the fundamental truths uttered by the ancient prophets of His race and forward to the ultimate goal of the race. Then with simple directness of speech He addressed Himself to the consciences and wills of men, setting before them the ideal of the higher life, and with infinite patience sought to lift them to the plane of fellowship with Himself in thought and action.

It remained for the disciples of Jesus to perpetuate His teaching ministry and to organize the new forces making for human betterment.

6. Educational Work of the Early Disciples

Paul, among the needly Gentiles (Gal 1:16; 2:7; 1 Tim 2:7). As regards a division of labor in the apostolic church, we read of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:11). The apostles were the itinerant leaders and missionaries of the entire church. Their work was largely that of teaching, Paul insisting on calling himself a teacher as well as an apostle (Gal 2:13; Col 1:11). The prophets were men with a special message like that of Agabus (Acts 21:10.11). The evangelists were itinerant preachers, as was Philip (8:40), while the pastors, also called bishops, had permanent charge of individual churches. The professional teachers included both laymen and those ordained by the laying on of hands. Their work was regarded with highest honor in the church and community. In contrast with the itinerant church officers, apostles and evangelists, they, like the pastors, resided permanently in local communities. With this class the author of the Epistle of Jasp identifies himself, and there can be little doubt that the epistle which he wrote reflects both the content and form of the instruction which these earliest Christian teachers gave to their pupils. Before the close of the 1st century the religious educational work of the church had been organized into a more systematic form, out of which there developed gradually the catechumenate of the early post-apostolic period (see Catechesis). In the Did., or Teachings of the Apostles, there has been reserved for us a textbook of religious instruction from this earlier period (Kent, GTJ). Necessarily, the entire missionary and educational work of the apostles, evangelists and teachers, and throughout this earliest period of church history we must think of the work of apostles, evangelists and pastors, as well as that of professional teachers, as including a certain amount of systematic religious instruction besides further Pedagogy; School; Teacher; Tutor.

EDUTH, eduth (ęk 더), "testimony," a technical term for the Ten Commandments or for the Law: In Ps 60 title, "set to Shoshan Eduth" (lit. "a lily [is the testimony]"); 99 title, "set to Shoahmanna Eduth" (lit. "lilies [is the testimony]"); 149 title, "set to Shoshan Eduth" (lit. "lilies [is the testimony]"). The Heb words appear to be intended to designate a melody by the first few words ordinarily associated with it. See PSALMS.

EFFECT, efekt, EFFECTUAL, efekti'al: In the OT, RV renders "fulfilment" for "effect" in Ezk 12:23 (Heb dabbah, "matter"); and in Jer 48:30 "His boastings have wrought nothing" for the vager "effect" of AV. The word "effect" is occasionally used for "cause" or "do" in the "make of none effect" occurs repeatedly—"as the tr of Ak avrbō, "render void" (Mt 15:6; Mk 7:13); of katargēo, "annul" (Rom 3:3 [AV "make without effect"]); 14; Gal 3:17); and of kenō, "make empty" (1 Cor 1:17). RV renders "make of none effect" in Rom 3:3; Gal 3:17; "make void" in the other cases, with no apparent reason for the lack of uniformity. Gr energeō is the opposite in meaning of katar-level above. Its derivative energeia, "effectual," is rendered "effectual" by EV in 1 Cor 15:20; Phil 2:6. RV dispenses with "effectual," referring to"effectually," in the other cases where AV has used these words as auxiliary in the tr of energeio or of energeia, "working" (2 Cor 1:6; Gal 2:8; Eph 3:7; 4:16; 1 Thess 2:3; Jas 5:10). F. K. FARR

EGLAH, eg'lah (אֶלֶה, 'ela, "heifer"): Wife of David and mother of Ithream (2 S 5:5 [1 Ch 3:3]).

EGLAIM, eg'laim (אֶלֶּה אי, 'egalaim; 'Ayla, Agilem): A place named in Isa 15:8, possibly in the S. of Moab. Onom identifies it with Agillium, a village 8 Rom.miles S. of Areopolis. It cannot now be identified.

EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH, eg-lath-shel-i-sh'yah (אֶלֶּת שלishi-야, "eghlah shlihishtiyah"): Found in Isa 15:5; Jer 48:34 (Heb) in oracles against Moab. AV tr* "an heifer of three years old," RV takes it as the name of a place, but AV's "a heifer three years old," see to LX. In the former case strong and unconquered cities, Zoar and Horonaim, are compared to the heifer not yet broken to the yoke. Such use of "heifer" is not infrequent (cf Jer 46:20; Hos 10:11, etc.). The majority of scholars, however, take it as a place-name of one word, as the "third Eglath," as if there were three towns of that name. No probable identification has been suggested.

EGLON, eg'lon (אֶלָל, 'elal, "circle"): A king of Moab in the period of the Judges who, in alliance with Ammon and Amanee, overcame Israel and made Jericho his capital, presumably driven across the Jordan by the turmoil in his own kingdom which at that time was probably being used as a battle ground by Edom and the desert tribes (cf Gen 36:35). After 18 years of servitude the children of Israel were delivered by Ehud the Benjamite, who like so many other Benjamites (cf Jgs 20:16) was left-handed. Under the pretext of carrying a present to the tyrant, he secured a private interview and assassinated him with a two-edged sword which he had carried concealed on his right side (Jgs 3:19-22). Ehud made his escape, rallied the children of Israel about him, and returned to conquer the Moabites (Jgs 3:30). ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

EGLON, ev·glohn (אֶגלּון, 'egholôn; Ἐγλών, Egolôn): A royal Canaanite city whose king joined the league headed by Adoni-zedek of Jerusalem against the Gibeonites, which suffered overwhelming defeat at the hands of Joshua (Josh 10). Joshua passed from Libnah to Lachish, and from Lachish to Eglon on his way to Hebron (vs 31 ff). It was in the Shephelah of Judah (15:39). The name seems to be preserved in that of Khirbet Ajlân, about 10 miles W. of Beit Jibrîn. Professor Petrie, however, thinks that the site of Tell Nejâleh better suits the requirements. While Khirbet Ajlân is a comparatively modern site, the city at Tell Nejâleh must have been contemporary with that at Tell el-Hesy (Lachish). It lies fully three miles S.E. of Tell el-Hesy. W. EWING

LITERATURE

Egypt (אֶיגֶרּוּ, mîráyôn; Ἐγύπτος, hê Águptoös): Usually supposed to represent the dual of Mir, referring to “the two lands,” as the Egyptians called their country. This dualism, however, has been discredited.

I. THE COUNTRY—Though Egypt is one of the earliest countries in recorded history, and as regards its continuous civilization, yet it is a late country in its geological history and in its occupation by a settled race. The whole land up to Silsileh is a thick mass of Eocene limestone, with later marls over that in the lower districts. It has been elevated on the E., up to the mountains of igneous rocks many thousand ft. high toward the Red Sea. It has been depressed on the W., down to the Fayum and the outer level. This strain resulted in a deep fault from N. to S. for so many hundreds of miles up from the Mediterranean. This fault left its eastern side about 200 ft. above its western, and into it there came the drainage of the plateau poured, widening it out so as to form the Nile valley, as the permanent drain of Northeast Africa. The access of water to the rift seems to have caused the basalt outflows, which are seen as black columnar basalt S. of the Fayum, and brown massive basalt at Khankaï, N. of Cairo.

The gouging out of the Nile valley by rainfall must have continued when the land was 300 ft. higher than at present, as is shown by the Nile Valley sands. It was covered with silt beds; and the filling up of the tributary valleys—as at Thebes—by deep deposits, through which the subsequent stream beds have been scoured out. The land still had the Nile source 30 ft. higher than it is now within the human period, as seen by the worked flints in high gravel beds above the Nile plain. The distribution of land and water was very different from that at present when the land was only 100 ft. lower than now. Such a change would make the valley an estuary up to S. of the Fayum, would submerge much of the western desert, and would unite the Gulf of Suez and the Mediterranean. Such differences would entirely alter the conditions of animal life by sea and land. And as the human period began when the water was considerably higher, the conditions of climate and of life must have greatly changed in the earlier ages of man’s occupation.

The earliest human remains belonging to the present condition of the country were Palaeolithic flints found in the side valleys.

3. Earliest at the present level of the Nile. As Human these are perfectly fresh, and not rolled Remains or altered, they show that palaeolithic man lived in Egypt in present conditions. The close of this palaeolithic age of hunters, and the beginning of a settled population of cultivators, cannot have been before the drying up of the climate, which by depriving the Nile of tributary streams, enabled it to subside lower, and have been deposited and formed a basis for agriculture. From the known rate of deposit, and depth of mud soil, this change took place about 10,000 years ago. As the recorded history of the country extends 7,500 years, and we know of two prehistoric ages before that, it is pretty well fixed that the disappearance of palaeolithic man, and the beginning of the continuous civilization must have been about 9,000 to 10,000 years ago. For the continuation of this subject see the section on “History” below.

The climate of Egypt is unique in the world. So far as solar heat determines it, the condition is tropical; for, though just N. of the tropic which lies at the boundary of Egypt and Nubia, the cloudless condition of the climate of this latitude is at once a peculiar advantage and disadvantage. The rainlessness and dry air give the same facility of living that is found in deserts, where shelter is only needed for temperature and not for wet; while the inundation provides abundant moisture for the richest crops.

The primitive condition—only recently changed—of the crops being all raised during five cool months from November to April, and the inundation covering the land during all the hot weather, left the population free from labor during the enervating season, and only required their energies when work was possible under favorable conditions. At the same time it gave a great opportunity for monumental work, as any amount of labor could be drawn upon without the smallest reduction in the produce of the country. The great structures which covered the land gave training and organization to the people, without being any drain upon the welfare of the country. The inundation covering the plain also provided the easiest transport for great masses from the quarries at the time when labor was abundant. Thus—the climatic conditions were all in favor of a great civilization, and aided its production of monuments.

5. Condition of Life

The whole mass of the country being of limestone, and much of it of the finest quality, provided material for construction at every point. In the south, sandstone and granite were also at hand upon the great waterway.

The Nile is the great factor which makes life possible in Northeast Africa, and without it Egypt would only be a desolate corner of the

6. The Nile Sahara. The course of the essentially different streams takes place at Khartum. The White or light Nile comes from the great plains of the Sudan, while the Blue or dark Nile descends from the mountains of Abyssinia. The Sudan Nile is not affected by the floods, and the sudd vegetation, so that it carries little mud; the Abyssinian Nile, by its rapid course, brings down all the soil which is deposited in Egypt, and which forms the basis for cultivation. The Sudan to Aswan, and about 6 days from Aswan to Cairo, or 80 to 90 miles a day, which shows a flow of 3 to 3½ miles an hour when in flood.

The fauna has undergone great changes during the human period. At the close of the prehistoric age, the hippopotamus came to Egypt, as elephant, wild ox, lion, leopard, stag.

long-necked gazelle and great dogs, none of which are found in the historic period. During historic times various kinds of antelopes have been exterminated, the hippopotamus was driven out of the Delta during Rom times, and the crocodile was cleared out of Upper Egypt and Nubia in the last century. Cranes and other birds shown on early sculptures are now unknown in the country. The animals still surviving are the wolf, jackal, hyena, dogs, ichneumon, jerboas, rats, mice, lizards (up to 4 ft. long) and snakes, besides a great variety of birds, admirably figured by Whymper, Birds of Egypt. Of tamed animals, the ox, sheep, goat and donkey are ancient; the cat and horse were brought in about 2000 BC, the camel was not commonly known till 200 AD, and the buffalo was brought to Egypt and Italy in the Middle Ages.

The cultivated plants of Egypt were numerous. In ancient times we find the maize (durrah), wheat, barley and lentil; the vine, currant, date palm, dun palm, fig, olive and pomegranate; the onion, garlic, cucumber, melon and radish; the sorghum, sycamore and tamarisk; the flax, henna and clover; and for ornamentation, the lote, cornflower and many others. The extension of commerce brought in by the Gr period, the bean, pea, sesame, lupin, helibeh, colocasia and sugar-cane; also the peach, walnut, castor-oil and pear. In the Rom and Arab. ages came in the chia, cotton, rice, indigo, orange and lemon. In recent times have come the cactus, aloe, tomato, Indian corn, leekbeak acaia and beetroot. Many European flowering and ornamental plants were also used in Egypt by the Greeks, and brought in later by the Arabs.

The original race in Egypt seems to have been of the steatopygous type now only found in South Africa. Figures of this race are known in the caves of France, in Malta, and in Somaliland. As this race was still known in Egypt at the beginning of the neolithic civilization, and is there represented only by female figures in the graves, it seems that it was being exterminated by the newcomer and that the women were taken as slaves.

The neolithic race of Egypt was apparently of the Libyan stock. There seems to have been a single type of the Amorites in Syria, the prehistoric Egyptians and the Libyans; this race had a high, well-filled head, long nose slightly aquiline, and short beard; the profile was upright and not prognathous, the hair was wavy brown. It was a better type than the present south Europeans, of a very capable and intelligent appearance. From the objects found and the religious legends, it seems that this race was subdued by an eastern, and probably Arabian race, in the prehistoric age.

Nile rises only 6 ft. from April to November; while the Abyssinian Nile rises 26 ft. from April to August. The latter makes the rise of the inundation, while the Sudan Nile maintains the level into the winter. In Egypt itself the unchecked Nile at Aswan rises 25 ft. from the end of May to the beginning of September; while at Cairo, where modified by the irrigation system, it rises 16 ft. from May to the end of September. It was usually drained off the land by the beginning of November, and cultivation was begun. The whole cultivable land of Egypt is but the dried-up bed of the great river, which fills its ancient limits during a third of the year. The time taken by a flush of water to come down the Nile is about 15 days from 400 miles above Khartum.

First Cataract of the Nile.
Dynasties were Berber in origin. The XIXth Dynasty was largely Sem from Syria. The XXII Dynasty was headed by an eastern adventurer Sheshonq, or Shoshma, "the man of Susa." The XXVIIIth Dynasty was Libyan. The Greeks then poured into the Delta and the Fayum, and Hellenized Egypt. The Roman made but little change in the population; but during his rule the Arab began to enter the eastern side, and by 641 AD the Arab conquest swept the land, and brought in a large part—perhaps the majority—of the ancestors of the present inhabitants. After 3 cents. the Tunisians—the old Libyans—conquered Egypt again. The later administrations by Syrians, Circassians, Turks and others probably made no change in the general population. The economic changes of the past cent. have brought in Greeks, Italians and other foreigners to the large towns; but all these only amount to an eighthith of the population. The Copts are the descendants of the very mixed Egyptians of Rom age, kept separate from the Arab invaders by their Christianity. They are mainly in Upper Egypt, where some villages are entirely Coptic, and are distinguished by their superior cleanliness, regularity, and the freedom of the women from unwholesome seclusion. The Copts, though only a fifteenth of the population, have always had a large share of official posts, owing to their intelligence and ability above that of the Muslims. In dealing with the history, we here follow the dating which was believed and followed by the Egyptians themselves. All the monuments remains agree with this, so far as they can be dated; and the various arbitrary reductions that have been made on some periods are solely due to some critics preferring their internal sense to all the external facts. For the details involved in the chronology, see Historical Studies, II (British School of Archaeology in Egypt). The general outline of the periods is given here, and the detailed view of the connection with OT history is treated in later sections.

The general outline of the periods is given here, and the detailed view of the connection with OT history is treated in later sections.

2. 3rd Age: 2d Dynasty. The prehistoric age begins probably about 5000 BC, as soon as there was a sufficient amount of Nile deposit to attract a settled population. The desert river valley of Egypt was probably one of the last haunts of steatopygous palaeolithic man of the Bushman type. So soon as there was an opening for a pastoral or agricultural people, he was forced away by settlers from Libya. These settlers were clad in goatskins, and made a small amount of pottery by hand; they knew also of small quantities of copper, but mostly used flint, of which they gradually developed the finest working known in any age. They rapidly advanced in civilization. Their pottery of red polished ware was decorated with white clay patterns, exactly like the pottery still made in the mountains of Algeria. The forms of it were very varied and exquisitely regular, although made without the wheel. Their hardstone vessels are finer than any of those of the historic ages. They adopted spinning, weaving and woodworking. Upon these people came in others probably from the E., who brought in the use of the Arab face-veil, the belief in amulets, and the Pers lapis lazuli. Most of the previous forms of pottery disappear, and nearly all the productions are greatly altered. Copper occurs. Copper, gold, silver and lead were also known. Helopolis was probably a center of rule. About 5000 BC a new people came in with the elements of the art of writing, and a strong political ability of organizing. Before 5500 BC they had established kings at Abydos in Upper Egypt, and for 3 cents. they gradually increased their power. On the carved slates which they have left, the standards of the allied tribes are represented; the earliest in style are from the XIXth Dynasty, and the lastest bears the standard of Letopolis, and shows the conquest of the Fayum, or perhaps one of the coast lakes. This last is of the first king of the Ist Dynasty, Mentu, the art from an almost barbarous state to its highest 3. 4th Age: 3rd Dynasty. The conquest of all Egypt is marked by the beginning of the series of numbered dynasties beginning with Men, at about 5550 BC. The civilization rapidly advanced. The art was at its best under the third king, Zer, and thence steadily declined. Writing was still hieroglyphic under Men, but became more syllabic and phonetic toward the end of the dynasty. The work in hardstone was at its height in the vases of the early part of the Ist Dynasty, when an immense variety of beautiful stones appear. It greatly fell off on reaching the IId Dynasty. The tombs were all of timber, built in large pits in the ground.

4. 5th Age: 4th Dynasty. The IId Dynasty fell about 4900 BC, and a new people, called, and are distinguished by their superior cleanliness, regularity, and the freedom of the women from unwholesome seclusion. The Copts, though only a fifteenth of the population, have always had a large share of official posts, owing to their intelligence and ability above that of the Muslims. In dealing with the history, we here follow the dating which was believed and followed by the Egyptians themselves. All the monuments remains agree with this, so far as they can be dated; and the various arbitrary reductions that have been made on some periods are solely due to some critics preferring their internal sense to all the external facts. The general outline of the periods is given here, and the detailed view of the connection with OT history is treated in later sections.

5. 6th Age: 5th to 6th Dynasty. The 5th Age: By about 4050 BC, the decline of Egypt allowed of fresh people press in from the N., probably connected with Crete. There are few traces of these invaders; a curious class of barbaric barbels used as seals are their commonest remains. Probably the so-called "Hylas sphinxes" and statues are of these people, and belong to the time of their attaining power in Egypt. By 5550 BC, the art developed into the great ages of the IId to the Xth Dynasties which lasted about 2 cent. The work is more scholastic and less natural than before; but it is very beautiful and of splendid accuracy. The exquisite jewelry of Dahshur is of this age. After some centuries of decay this civilization passed away.

6. 7th Age: The Sem tribes had long been filtering into Egypt, and Bab Semites even ruled the land Great Pyramid of Khufu.
until the great migration of the Hyksos took place about 2700 BC. These tribes were ruled by kings entitled “princes of the desert,” like

5. 6th Age: The Sem Absha, or Abishai, shown in the tomb of Beni-hasan, as coming to Egypt by 1700 BC the Berbers who had adopted the Egypt civilization pressed down from the S., and ejected the Hyksos rule. This opened the most flourishing period of Egypt history, the XVIIIth Dynasty, 1587–1298 BC. The profusion of painted tombs at Thebes, which were copied and popularized by Gardiner Wilkinson, has made the life of this period very familiar to us. The immense temples of Karnak and of Luxor, and the finest of the Tombs of the Kings have impressed us with the royal magnificence of this age. The names of Sheeshang I (Shishak) in 952 BC, the founder of the XXIIId Dynasty. His successors gradually decayed till the fall of the XXIIIId Dynasty in 721 BC. The Ethiopian XXVth Dynasty then held Egypt as a province of Ethiopia, down to 664 BC.

6. 7th Age—It is hard to say when the next age began—perhaps with the Ethiopians; but it rose to importance with the XXVIth Dynasty.

6. 7th Age: under Psamtek (Psammitichos I), 664–610 BC, and continued under the well-known names of Neoh, Hophra and Amasis until overthrown by the Persians in 525 BC. From 405 to 342 the Egyptians were independent; then the Persians again crushed them, and in 332 they fell into the hands of the Macedonians by the conquest of Alexander.

Obelisk of Thothmes I.

Thothmes I and III, of the great queen Hatshepsent, of the magnificent Amenhotep III, and of the monotheist reformer Akhenaton are among those best known in the history. Their foreign connections we shall notice later.

The XIXth and XXth Dynasties were a period of continual degradation from the XVIIIth. Even in the best work of the 6th Age there is hardly ever the real solidity and perfection which is seen in that of the 4th or 5th Ages. But under the Ramessides cheap effects and showy imitations were the regular system. The great Rameses II was a great advertiser, but inferior in power to half a dozen kings of the previous dynasty. In the XXth Dynasty one of the royal daughters married the high priest of Amen at Thebes; and on the unexpected death of the young Rameses V, the throne reverted to his uncle Rameses VI, whose daughter then became the heiress, and her descendants, the high priests of Amen, became the rightful rulers. This priestly rule at Thebes, beginning in 1102 BC, was balanced by a purely secular rule of the north at Tanis (Zoan). These lasted until the rise of

The Macedonian Age of the Ptolemies was one of the richest and most brilliant at its start, but soon faded under bad rulers till it fell hopelessly to pieces and succumbed to the Rom subjection in 30 BC. From that time Egypt was ground by taxation, and steadily impoverished. By 300 AD it was too poor to keep even a copper currency in circulation, and barter became general. Public monuments entirely ceased to be erected, and Decius in 250 AD is the last ruler whose name was written in the old hieroglyphs, which were thenceforward totally forgotten. After three more cents. of increasing degradation and misery, the Arab invasion burst upon the land, and a few thousand men rode through it and cleared out the remaining effete garrisons of the empire in 641 AD.

8. 8th Age—The Arab invasion found the country exhausted and helpless; repeated waves of tribes poured in, and for a generation or two

7. 9th Age: there was no chance of a settlement.

Arabic Gradually the majority of the inhabitants were pressed into Islam, and by about 800 AD a strong government was established from Bagdad, and Egypt rapidly advanced. In place of being the most impoverished country it became the richest land of the Mediterranean. The great period of mediaeval Egypt was under the guidance of the Medici civilization, 800–969 AD. The Tunisian dominion of the Fatimides, 969–1171, was less successful. Occasionally strong rulers arose, such as Salah-el-Din (Saladin), but the age of the Mamelukes, 1250–1577, was one of steady decline. Under the Turkish dominion, 1517, Egypt was split up into many half-independent counties, whose rulers began by yielding tribute, but relaxed into ignoring the Caliphate and living in continual internal feuds. In 1771 Aly Bey, a slave, succeeded in conquering Syria. The French and British quarrel left Muhammad Aly to rise supreme, and to guide Egypt for over 40 years. Again Egypt conquered Syria, 1831–39, but was compelled by Europe to retreat. The opening of the Suez Canal (1869) necessarily led to the subjection of Egypt to European direction.

The foreign connections of Egypt have been brought to light only during the last 20 years. In place of supposing that Egypt was isolated until the Greco-conquest, we now see that it was in the closest commercial connections with the rest of the world throughout its history. We have already noted the influences which entered by conquest. During the periods of high civilization in Egypt, foreign connections came into notice by exploration and by trade. The lazuli of Persia was imported in the prehistoric age, as well as the emery of Smyrna. In the Ist Dynasty, Egypt conquered and held Sinaï for the sake of the turquoise mines. In the IIInd Dynasty, large fleets of ships were built, some as much as 150 ft. long; and the presence of much pottery imported from Crete and the north, even before the palace, to a Mediterranean trade. In the Vth Dynasty, King Unas had relations with Syria. From the Xith Dynasty comes the detailed account of the life of an Egyptian in Pal (Sanchat); and Cretan pottery of this age is found translated in Egypt.

III. Old Testament Connections.—The Hyksos invasion unified the rule of Syria and Egypt, and Syrian pottery is often found in Egypt.

1. Semitic of this age. The return of the wave, Connections when Egypt drove out the Hyksos, and established the line of the Pharaohs, the greatest expansion of Egypt. Tahutmes I set up his statue on the Euphrates, and all Syria was in his hands. Tahutmes III repeatedly raided Syria, bringing back plunder and captives year by year throughout most of his reign. The number of Syrian artists and of Syrian women brought into Egypt largely changed the style of art and the standard of beauty. Amenhotep III held all Syria in peace, and recorded his triumphs at the Euphrates on the walls of the temple of Soleb far up in Nubia. His monotheist son, Amenhotep IV, took the name of Akhenaton, "the glory of the sun's disc," and established the worship of the radiant sun as the Aton, or Adon of Syria. The cuneiform letters from Tell el-Amarna place all this age before us in detail. There are some from the kings of the Amor- rites and Hittites, from Naharin and even Babylonia, to the great sacerdum Amenhotep III. There is also the long series describing the gradual loss of Syria under Akhenaton, as written by the governors and chiefs, of the various towns. The main letters are summarized in the Students' History of Egypt, II, and full abstracts of all the letters are in Syria and Egypt, arranged in historical order.

2. Early conquest, of Egypt was kept uneasy by Seti I and his son Ramses II, but they only held about a third of the extent which formerly belonged to Amenhotep III. Mer-Abimelech was Phichol, the Egyp name Pa-khal, "the Syrian," showing that the Gerarites were not Syrians.

The history of Joseph rising to importance as a capable slave is perfectly natural in Egypt at that time, and equally so in later periods down to 4. Joseph own days. That this occurred during the Hyksos period is shown by the title given to Joseph—Abrēkh (ābrēkhk) (Gen 41 43) which is Abarākē, the high Bab title. The names Zaphnath-panehak, Asenath, and Potipherah have been variously equated in Egyptian, Naville seeing forms of the XVIIth Dynasty in them, but Spiegelberg, with more probability, seeing types of names of the XXIId Dynasty or later. The names are most likely an expansion of the original document: but there is not a single feature or incident in the relations of Joseph to the Egyptians which is at all improbable from the history and civilisation that we know. See Joseph.

The descent into Egypt and sojourn there are what might be expected of any Sem tribe at this time. The allocation in Goshen (Gen 47 27) to the eastern border of the Delta, at the mouth of the Wady Tumilat, and was a district isolated from the general Egypt population. The whole of Goshen is not more than 100 sq. miles, being bounded by the deserts, and by the large Egypt city of Budeatis on the W. The accounts of the embalming for 40 days and mourning for 70 days (Gen 50 3), and putting in a coffin (Gen 50 26) are exact. The 70 days' mourning existed both in the Ist Dynasty and in the XXth.

The oppression in Egypt began with a new king that knew not Joseph. This can hardly be other than the rise of the Berber conquerors. 6. The Op-pressors who took the Delta from the Hyksos at the beginning of the XVIIth Dynasty, about 1552 BC, and expelled the Hyksos into Syria. It could not be later than this as the period of oppression in Egypt is stated at 4 cents. (Gen 16 13; Acts 7 6), and the Exodus cannot be later than about 1220 BC, which leaves 360 years for the oppression. Also this length of oppression bars any much earlier date for the Exodus. The 360 years of oppression from 430 of the

The store cities Pitom and Raamases are the sites Tell el-Ma‘akhula and Tell Rotāb in the Wady Tumilat, both built by Rameses II as frontier defences. It is evident then that the serving with rigor was under 7. The Historic Position that king, probably in the early part of his long reign of 67 years (1500-1234 BC), when he was actively campaigning in Pal. This is shown in the narrative, for Moses was not yet born when the rigour began (Ex 1; 2 2), and he grew up, slew an Egyptian, and then lived long in Midian before the king of Egypt died, perhaps 40 or 50 years after the rigorous servitude began, for he is represented as being 80 at the time of the Exodus (Dt 34 7). These numbers are probably not precise, but as a whole they agree well enough with Egyp history. After the king died, Moses returned to Egypt, and began moving to get his kin away to the eastern deserts, with which he had been well acquainted in his exile from Egypt. A harsher servitude ensues, which might be expected from the most rigorous reign of a monarch over the slackness of the old age of Rameses. The campaign of Merenptah against Israel and other people in Pal would not make him any less severe in his treatment of Semites in Egypt.

The plagues are in the order of usual seasonal troubles in Egypt from the red unwholesome Nile in June, through the Plagues frogs, insects, hail and rain, locusts, and sandstorms in March. The death of the firstborn was in April at the Passover.

The date of the Exodus is indicated as being about 1200 BC, by the 4 cents. of oppression, and by the names of the land and the city 9. Date of Raamasses (Gen 47 4; of Ex 1 11). The Exodus The historical limit is that the Egyptians were incessantly not of the Pal domination to 1194 BC, and then abandoned it till the invasion of Shishak. As there is no trace of these Egypt invasions during all the ups and downs of the age of the Judges, it seems impossible to suppose the Israelites entered Canaan till after 1194 BC. The setting back of the Exodus much earlier has arisen from taking three simultaneous histories of the Judges as consecutive, as we shall notice farther on. The facts stated above, and the length of all three lines of the priestly genealogies, agree completely with the Egyp history in putting the Exodus at about 1220 BC, and the entry into Canaan about 1180 BC.

The route of the Exodus was first a concentration at Raamasses or Tell Rotāb, in the Wady Tumilat, followed by a march to Succoth, a general name for the region of Bedawy booths; from there to Elam in the edge of the wilderness. 10. Route about the modern Kissāb. Then they of the turned and encamped before Pi-hiābruth, the Egyp Pa-hakerty, a serapeum. Thus turning S. to the W. of the Red Sea (which then extended up to Tell el-Ma‘akhula), they had a Midget tower behind them and Baal-lephan opposite to them. They were thus "entangled in the land. Then the strong east wind boiled the shallows, and made a wall of water, and went across the half lake and return to the opposite shore. They then went "three days in the wilderness," the three days' route without water to Marah, the bitter spring of Hawara, and immediately beyond reached Elam, which records entrance with the Wady Tumilat, and as they encamped by the Red Sea. All of this account exactly agrees with the traditional route down the W. of the Sinaitic peninsula; it will not agree with any other route, and there is no reason to look for any different location of the march. See Exodus.

The numbers of the Israelites have long been a difficulty. On the one hand are the census lists (Nu 1, 2 and others) with their summaries of 600,000 men besides children and a mixed multitude of 32, 37, 38; 38, 33, 34; 12, 37, 38; 33, 37, 38. On the other hand there are the exact numbers of enlisting of soldiers 40,000 men. It is, therefore, to be thought that 40,000 armed men entered Canaan with Joshua (Jos 4 13), and the 36,000 who went against Midian (Jos 7 3). Besides these, there are the general considerations writing. The statements, such as “Rouhen, 46,500,” the original list would be 46 ‘thousands’ or ‘families.’ Hence a census of 46 tents, 500 people would be ambiguous, and a later compiler might well take it as 46,500. In this way the whole census of 90 tents, 5,550 people, would be misread as 663,550 people. The checks on this are, that the number per tent should be reasonable in all cases, that the hundreds should not fluctuate more than the tents between the first and last census, and that the total should correspond to the known populations of Goshen and of Sina, these requirements all agree with the reading of the lists. The other details beyond the Egyptian period are dealt with in the Egypt and Israel, 45, 55. See Exodus, IV.

Two points need notice here as incidentally bearing on the Egypt connections: (1) the Israelites in the great famine before the Exodus, indicated by the peculiar use of the word ‘island’ in Canaan (12) Israel. Merenptah triumphing over them there before 1230 BC, and the raids during the Egyptian residence (1 Ch 7 21); (2) the triple history of the Judges, west, north, and east, each totaling to 120 years, in accord with the length of the four priestly genealogies (1 Ch 6 4-8 22-28,33-35,39-43,44-47), and showing that the dates are about 1220 BC the Exodus, 1180 BC the entry to Canaan, 1150 BC the beginning of Judges, 1050 BC Saul (Egypt and Israel, 52-55).

The connections with the monarchy soon begin; David and Joab attacked Edom (2 8 14), and Hadad, the young king, was carried off by his servants to Egypt for safety.

13. Hadad ob 15 16

Hadad was married to the Egypt queen’s sister when he grew up, probably in the reign of Pasekhbani II.

The Pharaoh whose daughter was married to Solomon must have been the same Pasekhbani; he reigned from 987–952 BC, and the marriage was about 970 in the middle of his reign. Another daughter of Pasekhbani was Karamat, who was the wife of Shishak. Thus Solomon and Shishak married two sisters, and their aunt was queen of Edom. This throws light on the politics of the kingdoms. Probably Solomon had some child by Pharaoh’s daughter, and the Egyptians would expect that to be the heir. Shishak’s invasion, on the death of Solomon, was perhaps based upon the right of a nephew to the throne of Judah.

The invasion of Shishak (Egypt, Sheshenq) took place probably at the end of his reign. His troops were Lihim (Libyans), Sukkim (men of the families), and Amalekites.

15. Shishak of Succoth, the east border and Kushim (Ethiopians). The account of the war is on the side of the great fore-court at Karnak, which shows long lists of places in Judah, agreeing with the subjugation recorded in 1 K 14 25,26, and 2 Ch 12 2–4.

Zerah, or Usarkon, was the next king of Egypt, the son of Karamat, Solomon’s sister-in-law. He invaded Judah unsuccessfully in 930 BC (1 Ch 14 9; 2 Ch 15 8). A statue of the Nile, dedicated by him, and naming his descent from Karamat and Pasekhbani, is in the British Museum.

After a couple of cents, the Ethiopian kings intervened. Shabaka was appointed viceroy of Egypt by his father Piankhy, and is described by the Assyrians as Sibe, commander-in-chief of Muzri, and by the Hebrews as Shemiram, or So, king of Egypt (2 K 17 4). Tirhakah next appears as a viceroy, and Hezekiah was warned against trusting to him (2 K 19 9). These two kings touch on Jewish history during their viceregalities, before their full reigns began. Necho next touches on Judah in his raid to Car cenamiah in 609 BC, when he slew Josiah for opposing him (2 K 23 29,30; 2 Ch 35 20–24).

After the taking of Jerus, for fear of vengeance for the usurpation of Ismael (2 K 25 25,36; Jer 40 41, 42), the royal body was exiled to the frontier fortress of Egypt, 18. Ta apanes Tartan, Tahapshes, Thadphnes, Gr Daphna, mod. Defennah, about 10 miles W. of the present Suez Canal. The brick pavement in front of the entrance to the fortress there, in which Jeremiah hid the stones, has been uncovered and the fortress completely planned. It was occupied by Greeks, who there brought Gr words and things into contact with the traveling Jews for a couple of generations before the fall of Jerus.

The prophecy that Hophra would be delivered to them that sought his life (Jer 44 30) was fulfilled, as he was kept captive by his successor, Hophra of Amasis, for 3 years, and after a brief attempt at liberty, he was strangled.

The account of the Jews settled in Egypt (Jer 44) is singularly illustrated by the Aram. Jewish papyri found at Syene (Aswan). These show the use of Aram. and of oaths by Yahu, as stated of 5 cities in Egypt (Isa 19 18). The colony of 12,000 was unable to do, though not rich; they were house-and faced upon 3 houses, implying a building about 60 or 70 ft. wide. It was built of hewn stone, with stone columns, 7 gates, and a cedar roof. It was destroyed in 410, after lasting from before Cambyses in 525 BC, and a petition for rebuilding it was presented to Darius.

The most flourishing period of the Jews in Egypt was when Oniah IV, the son of the righteous high priest Oniah, was driven from Jerusalem by the abolition of Jewish worship and ordinances at Syene, a woman named 'Shemiramoth'. In 170 BC he fled to Egypt, and there established a new Jewish temple with a high priest and sacrifices as being the only way to maintain the Jewish worship. Oniah IV was a valiant man, general to queen Cleopatra I; and he offered to form the Jewish community into a frontier guard on the E. of Egypt, hating the Syrians to the uttermost, if the Jews might form their own community. They so dominated the eastern Delta that troops of Caesar could not pass from Syria to Alexandria without their assent. The new Jew was 20 miles N. of Cairo, a site now known as Tell el-Yehudiyeh. The great mound of the temple still remains there, with the Passover ovens beneath it, and part of the massive stones transported from it by the Greeks. Titus took Jerusalem; and it was only when the Zealots tried to make it a center of insurrection, that at last it was closed and fell into decay. Jos is the original authority for this history (see Egypt and Israel, 97-110).

The Jew in Egypt followed a very different development from the Bab Jew, and this Egyptian type largely influenced Christianity. In the colossus at Syene the last 'Yahveh' had no objection to swearing by the Egyptian goddess Sethi when making an Egyptian contract; and in Jer 44 15-19, the Jews boasted of their heathen worship in Egypt. Oniah had no scruple in establishing a temple and sacrifices apart from Jerusalem, without any of the particularism of the Macedonian zealots. Philo at Alexandria labored all his life for the union of Jewish thought with Gr philosophy. The Hermetic books show how, from 300 BC, religious thought was developing under celetic influence of Egyptian, Jewish, Pers, Indian and Gr beliefs, and producing the tenets about the second God, the Eternal Son, who was the Logos, and the types of Conversion, as the Divine Ray, the New Birth, and the baptismus. For the liturgy of Amenhotep IV, 200-100 BC, provided the basis of thought and simile on which the Pauline Epistles were built. The great wreck in the history of the church came when it escaped from the Bab-Jewish formalism of the Captivity, which ruled at Jerusalem, and grew into the wider range of ideas of the Alexandrian Jews. These ideas had been preserved in Egypt from the days of the monarchy, and had developed a great body of religious thought and phraseology from their eclectic connections. The ideas of Christianity with Egypt are outside our scope, but some of them will be found in Egypt and Israel, 124-41.

The Egyptian cities, places and peoples named in the Of may briefly be noted. Aven (Ezk 30 17) or On (Gen 41 45) is the 'As-set Egyptian, was "the great seer," one of the greatest of the religious officials. The schools of Heliopolis were celebrated, and it is seen to have always been a center of learning. The site is now marked by the great inclosure of the temple, and one obelisk of Senusert (XXIst Dynasty). It was here that the Egyptian kings had their installation to come and bathe in the lake in which the sun bathes daily, the 'Aneinah-Setaen, or "Lake of the Sun" of the Arabs, connected with the fresh spring here which Christian tradition attributes to the visit of the Virgin and Child. The great sycamore tree here is the successor of that under which the Virgin is said to have rested.

Baal-Zephon was a shrine on the eastern site of the head of the Red Sea, a little north of Ras-Mallayeh; notrace is now known of it (Ex 14 2).

Cushim or Ethiopians were a part of the Egyptian army of Shishak and of Onarkon (2 Ch 12 3-18).

The army was in 4 brigades, that of Pthah of Memphis, central Egypt; that of Amen of Thebes, Southern Egypt and Ethiopia; that of Set of the eastern frontier (Sukkim); and that of Ra, Heliopolis and the Delta.

Goshen was a fertile district at the west end of the Wady Tumilat, 40 to 50 miles N.E. of Cairo. It was founded by the desert of the N. and S.E. and by the city of Bubastis on the W. Its area was not over 100 sq. miles; it formerly supported 4,000 Bedawin and now about 12,000 cultivators.

Libyn, the Libyans who formed part of the Egyptian army as light-armed archers, from very early times.

Mopol is the name of any tower, familiar also as Magdala. It was applied to some watchtower on the W. of the Red Sea, probably on the high land above the Suez canal.

No is Thebes, in Assy Nia, from the Egyptian Nu, "the city." This was the capital of the XIth Dynasty, and of the XVIIth-XXIst Dynasties.

Owing to the buildings being of sandstone, which is not of much build for reworking, they have largely remained since the desolation of the city under Ptolemy X. The principal divisions of the site are: (1) Karnak, with the temple of the XIth Dynasty, built over by all the successive kings of the XXIst Dynasty, and enlarged by Seti I and Rameses II, and by Shishak, Tirhakah, and the Ptolemies. The whole temple of Amen and its subsidiary temples form the largest mass of ruins that is known. (2) Luxor, the capital of the XVIIIth Dynasty. The temple in fair condition is that of Rameses III, which is left because no later king required its material for building. (3) The funerary temples, bordering the western shore of the kings of the XVIIIth to XXth Dynasties. These have mostly been destroyed, by the unscrupulous quarrying done by each king over the next succeeding, and the tombs of the kings remaining in fair condition is that of Rameses III, which is left because no later king required its material for building. (4) The great cemetery, ranging from the splendid rock halls of the Tombs of the Kings, covered with paintings, down to the humblest graves. For any detailed account see either Badeker's or Murray's Guides, or Weigall's Guide to Antiquities.

Norus, the Egyptian Men-nofer, Gr Memphis, now Mitrekh, 12 miles S. of Cairo. This was the capital from the foundation at the beginning of the dynasties. Thebes and Alexandria shared its importance, but it was the seat of government down to the Arab invasion. In Rom times it was as large as London N. of the Thames. The outlying parts are now all buried by the rise of the soil, but more than a mile length of ruins yet remains, which are now being regularly worked over by the British School. The heart of the city is the great metropolitan temple of its high priest, was "the great seer," one of the greatest of the religious officials. The schools of Heliopolis were celebrated, and it seems to have always been a center of learning. The site is now marked by the great inclosure of the temple, and one obelisk of been located, as well as the foreign quarter containing early Gr pottery and the temple of Proteus named by Herodotus (see Memphite I, II, III). The name is the ancient name for Upper Egypt in the prophets. "It is the Egypt of the earth," to be added there, "the great land." Fитесети is the Egypt Pa-Bast, Gr Bubastis, at the eastern side of the Delta, the city of the cat-headed goddess Bast. The ruins are still large, and the temple site has been excavated, producing sculptures from the IVth Dynasty onward.

Pythom is the Egypt Pa-Tum, the city of the Sungod Tum or Atmu, who was worshipped on the E. of the Delta. The site has remains of the fortress of Rameses II, built by the Israelites, and is now known as Tell el-Maskhuta, 11 miles W. of Ismailia.

RAAMESES is the other city built by the Israelites, now Tell Rotab, 20 miles W. of Ismailia. A walled camp existed here from early times, and the temple of Rameses was built on the top of the older ruins. A large part of the temple front is now at Philadelphia, excavated by the British School.

Sin is the Gr Pelusium, Assyr Siuru, Arab, Tнik, now some desolate mounds at the extreme E. coast of Egypt.

Sokarn was the district of "booths," the eastern part of the Wady Tumilat. It was written in Egypt Thuku and abbreviated to Thu in which form it appears as a Rom name. The people of Sucroth were Sukkim, named in the army of Shishak (2 Ch 12:12).

SYENE, Heb Sуwнх, mod. Aswan, the southern border town of Egypt at the Cataract. The greater part of the old town was on the island of Elephantine. There the Jewish papyri were found, and that was partly a Jewish settlement with the temple of Yahu. The town on the eastern bank — the present Aswan — was of less importance.

TAMPHERES, ТЕРЕПНЕЕВ, Gr Daphnae, Arab, Tell Денен. This was the first station on the Syrian road which touched the Nile canals, about 10 miles W. of Kantara on the Suez Canal. It seems to have been founded by Psammeticus about 664 BC, to hold his Gr mercenaries. The fort, built by him, abounded in Gr pottery, and was finally desolated about 666 BC; as described by Herodotus. The fort and camp have been excavated; and the pavement described by Jeremiah (ch 43), as opposite to the entrance, has been identified.

ZоAN, Gr Ταυσ, Arab, Sаn, is about 26 miles from the Suez Canal, and a literary work from before the coast. The ruins of the temple are surrounded by the wall of Pasebakhanu, 80 ft. thick of brickwork, and a ring of town ruins rises high around it. The temple was built in the IVth Dynasty, adorned with many statues in the XIIth and XIIIth Dynasties, and under Rameses II had many large granite obelisks and statues, esp. one colossal of the king in red granite about 90 ft. high. It is probable that the Pharaoh lived here at the time of the Exodus.

IV. The Common Language. — W. the outlines of the civilization of the Egyptians. The language had primitive relations with the Sem and the Libyan. Perhaps one common stock has separated into three languages—Sem, Egypt and Libyan. But though some basic words and grammar are in common, all the bulk of the words of daily life were entirely different in the three, and no one could be said to be derived from the other, Egyptian, so far as we can see, is a separate language without any connection as close as that between the Indo-European group. From its proximity to Syria, Sem loan words were often introduced, and became common in the XVIIIth Dynasty and fashionable in the XIXth. The language continually altered, and in later periods especially. Coptic is as different from it as Italian is from Latin.

The writing was at first ideographic, using a symbol for each word. Gradually, signs were used phonetically; but the symbol, or some emblem of the idea of the thing represented, was added to it, now called a determinative. From syllabic signs purely alphabetic signs were produced by clipping and decay, so that by 1000 to 500 BC the writing was almost alphabetic. After that it became modified by the influence of the short Gr alphabet, until by 200 AD it was expressed in Gr letters with a few extra signs. The actual signs used were elaborate pictures of the objects in the early times, and even down to the later periods very detailed signs were carved for monumental purposes. But as early as the I st Dynasty a very much simplified current hand had been started, and during the pyramid period this became hardly recognizable from the original forms. Later on this current hand, or hieratic, is a study by itself and was written much more fully than the hieroglyphs on monuments, as its forms were so corrupt that an ample spelling was needed to identify the word. By about 800 BC begins a much shortened set of signs, still more remote from their origins, known as demotic, which is about the popular writing till Rom times. On public decrees the hieroglyphic and demotic are both given, showing that a knowledge of one was useless for reading the other, and that they were separate studies.

The literature begins during the pyramid period, before 4000 BC, with biographies and collections of maxims for conduct; these show well-regulated society, and would benefit any modern community in which they were read. In the XIIth Dynasty tales appear, occupied with magic and foreign travel and wonders. A long poem in praise of the king shows very regular versification and system, of the type of Ps 136, the refrain differing in each stanza and being probably repeated in chorus, while the independent lines were sung by the leader. In the XVIIIth Dynasty, tales of character begin to develop and show much skill, long annals were recorded, and in the XIXth Dynasty there is an elaborate battle poem describing the valor of Rameses II. At about 700 BC there is a considerable tale which describes the quarrels of the rival chiefs, and the great fight regulated like a tournament by which the differences were settled. Such are the principal literary works from before the time of the Exile.

The religion of Egypt is an enormous subject, and that by which Egypt is perhaps most known. Here we can only give an outline of the growth and subdivisions of it. There was never any one religion in Egypt during historic times. There were at least four religions, all incompatible, and all believed in at once in varying degrees. The different religions can be seen apart by their incongruity in the story of the future life.

(1) The dead wandered about the cemetery seeking food, and were partly fed by the goddess in the sycamore tree. They therefore needed to have plates of food and jars of water in the tomb, and provided perpetually by their descendents in front of the doorway to the grave. The deceased is represented as looking out over this doorway in one case. Here came in the great principle of substitution. For the food, substitute its image which cannot decay, and the carved table of offerings results. For the farmead of animals, substitute its carved image on the wall and the animal sculptures result. For the life of the family, substitute their carved figures doing all that was wanted, sacrificing and eating, and the funerary result.

For the house, substitute a model upon the wall or in the tomb. The doors and the pottery soul-houses appear with their furniture and provisions. For the servants, put their figures doing household work, and their service is eternal. For the master himself, put the most lifelike image that can be made, and his soul will occupy that as a restful home fitted for it. This principle is still believed in. Funeral offerings of food are still put even in Muslim graves, and a woman will visit a grave, and, removing a tile, will talk through a hole to her dead husband.

(2) The dead went to the kingdom of Osiris, to which only the good were admitted, while the evil were rejected, and consumed either by monsters or by fire. This heavenly kingdom was a complete duplicate of the earthly life. They planted and reaped, sported and played. And as the Egyptian felicity consisted in making others work for them, so each man was provided with a retinue of serfs to cultivate the land for him. These ushabti figures in later times usually number 400, and often 1 in 10 of them is clad as an overseer. A special chapter of the Book of the Dead is to be recited to animate them, and this, more or less abbreviated, is often inscribed upon the figure.

(3) The dead joined the company of the immortal gods, who float on the heavenly ocean in the boat of the sun. With them they have to face the terrors of the hours of the night when the sun goes through the dark chambers. Night charisms are needed for safety in this passage, and these form a large part of the funerary texts, esp. on the Tombs of the Kings in the XVIIth–XXlst Dynasties. To reach the boat of the sun a boat must be provided in the tomb, with its sails and oars seen in figures. Such are frequent from the Vth–XIIth Dynasties.

(4) The dead were carried off by the Hathor cow, or a bull, to wait for a bodily resurrection. In order to preserve the body for some life after the soul has left it, mummification was practiced by an appropriate amulet; hence dozens of different amulets were placed on the body, esp. from about 600–400 BC.

Now it will be seen that each of these beliefs contradicts the other three, and they represent, therefore, different religious origins.

The mythology is similarly diverse, and was unified by uniting analogous gods. Hence when we see the compounds such as Pta-Hor, Amon-Ra, or Osiris-Khentamenti, it is clear that each god of the compound belongs to a different religion, like Pallas-Athene or Zeus-Labrandeus, in Gr compounds. So far as we can at present see, these gods linked with each of the beliefs about the soul are as follows:

1. The soul in the tombs and cemetery.—With this belief belong the animal gods, which form the earliest stratum of the religion; also Sokar the god of Silence and Mirt Sokar, the "Lover of Silence," as the gods of the dead. With this was allied a belief in the soul sometimes going to the west, and hence Khentamenti, a jackal-headed god, "he who is in the west," became the god of the dead.

2. The soul in the heavenly kingdom.—Osiris is the lord of this kingdom, Isis his sister-wife, Horus their son, Nebhet (Nephthys) the sister of Isis, and Set her husband. Set also was regarded as coequal with Horus. This whole mythology results probably from the fusion of tribes who were originally monotheistic, and who each worshipped one of these deities. It is certain that the later parts of this mythology are tribal history, regarded as the victories and defeats of the gods whom the tribes worshipped.

3. The soul in the sun-boat.—Ra was the Sun-god, and in other forms worshipped as Khepera and Atmu. The other cosmic gods of the same group are Nut, the heaven, and her husband Geb, the earth; Shu, space, and his sister Tefnut. Anher the Sky-god belongs to Upper Egypt.

(4) The dead promised with amulets preserved for a future life.—Probably to this group belong the gods of principles, Hator the female principle; Min the male principle; Ptah the architect and creator of the universe; his spouse Maat, abstract truth and justice. Foreign gods frequently appear also in Egypt, mostly from Syria. Two importations were of great effect. Aton the radiant energy

6. Foreign of the sun, the Adon or "lord," Adonis, was introduced about the Vth Century B.C., and all the other gods were proscribed. It was a strictly rational and scientific religion, attributing all life and power to the action of the sun's rays; but it only lasted 20 years in Egypt, and then vanished.

The other important worship was that of Zeus Sarapis. The Zeus statue is said to have been imported from Sinai by Ptolemy I, but the Sarapis was the god of Memphis, Osarhapi, the Osiris form of the Hapi bull. The Egyptian worshipped his old gods; the Greek was satisfied with the new god, and both were united in adoring Zeus Sarapis. The temples and ritual are too wide a subject to touch in our present space; but the essential principle was that of providing a banquet for the god, and feasting in his temple, not with the usual sacrificial sacrifice or burnt offering, which is Semitic.

The laws are but little known until the late Gr accounts. Marriage was usual with a sister, but this may have been with a half-sister, the sons the Grs.

8. Character and careless—as at present. Firmness, decision and fortitude were held up as the leading virtues. The structure of society, the arts and the industries are outside of the scope of this article.

LITERATURE—Works in Eng., that are the most accessible, are stated in preference to foreign works, the references to which will be seen in the books stated below.
EGYPT, BROOK (RIVER, STREAM) OF. See Brook of Egypt.

EGYPTIAN KINGS (LATER). See PHARAON HOPHRA; Necho; Shishak; Egypt, III.

EGYPTIAN, ē-jāph-ān, THE (ē 'Ajiq̄tōs, ko Aiqap̄tios): Mentioned in Acts 21 38, by Claudius Lysias as having “before these days stirred up to sedition and led out into the wilderness the four thousand men of the Ascalonian (q.v.). Reference to this Egyptian is the suppression of his rebellion by the procurator Felix is likewise found in Jos (Ant, X, xv, vii, 6; BJ, II, xiii, 5).

EGYPTIAN VERSIONS, vār'ahuns. See Coptic Versions.

EGYPTIANS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE. See APOCYPHAL GOSPELS.

EHI, ē-hē (ēhē; 'ēhē): Apparently a contracted form (Gen 46 21). See AHIRAM.

EHUD, ē-hōd (ē-hōd, 'ēhōd, “united,” “strong”): A Benjaminite, son of Gera, deliverer of Israel from oppression by Moab (Jgs 3 15–30). Gaining access alone to the presence of King Edom under pretence of a secret errand connected with the payment of Israel’s tribute, Ehud, a left-handed man, drew the sword he had concealed upon his right side, and thrust the king through. He locked the doors of the upper chamber after him, made his escape, and with the Israelites overcame Moab at the fords of the Jordan, slaying some 10,000. Ehud’s name occurs again in the Benjamite genealogy (1 Ch 7 10).

E. F. PAIR.

EITHER, ē-thēr, ē-thēr: Often in the sense still common, “one or the other” (1 Ch 21 21; Mt 6 24, etc.), but also in the obs sense of “both” or “each” (Lev 10 1; 1 K 7 15; Jn 19 18; Rev 22 2), or in place of (RV) “or” (Lk 6 42; 15 8; Phil 3 12; Jas 3 13).

EKER, ē-kēr (ē-kēr, ē-kēr, “root”): A Jemnehelite (1 Ch 2 27).

EKREBEL, ek-ē-re-bel (Ekrebel, Ekrebēl): Appears only in Jdh 7 18. It lay on the brook Mochmur, near Qdoth. It is identical with Akrebel, one of which Onom speaks as the capital of the district of Akrabattine. It corresponds to the mod. Akrebeh, 8 miles S.E. of Nablus.

EKRON, ek-ōrōn, EKRONITE, ek-ōrōn-īt (ē-kōrōn, ‘ē-kōrōn, “migration,” “rooting out”; ‘ē-kōrōn, ‘ē-kōrōn): The most northerly of the chief cities of the Philistines. It was not subdued by Joshua (13 3) but was allotted, in the division of the land, first to Judah and then to Dan (16 11.45.46; 19 43). It was taken by Judah (Jgs 1 18). The people of E. are prominent in the story of the ark in the land of the Philistines. It was there they who proposed to have it sent back to Israel (1 8 5; 16 10). After the defeat of the Philistines, when David killed Goliath, the Israelites pursued them to the gates of E., which was evidently the nearest walled town in which the fugitives could take refuge (17 52). It was the seat of the worship of the god Baalzebub, as appears in the account of the sickness and death of Hezekiah (2 K 1 2). When Hezekiah was 36 years old, it is included among other cities in the denunciations of Amos (1 8) and of Jeremiah (25 20). Zephaniah declares that it shall be rooted up (2 4), and Zechariah speaks of its consternation at the fall of Tyre (9 7–8). From the Amorite records we learn that it revolted against Sennacherib and expelled Padi, the governor he had placed over it, and sent him to Hezekiah, at Jerusalem, for safe keeping. Sennacherib marched against it and E. called in the aid of the king of Assyria. Formerly supposed to be Egypt but now regarded by some scholars as a district of Northwestern Arabia. Sennacherib raised the siege of E. to defeat this army, which he did at Eltekeh, and then returned and took the city by storm and put to death the leaders of the revolt and carried their adherents into captivity. He then compelled Hezekiah to restore Padi, who was once more made governor. This affair led to the famous attack of Sennacherib on Hezekiah and Jerusalem (Rawl., Anc. Mon., I, 159). E. is mentioned in 1 Mac 10 59 as being given by Alexander Balas to Jonathan Maccabaeus, and it appears in the accounts of the first Crusade.

Ekonite: An inhabitant of Ekron, used in pl. in Josh 13 3 and I S 5 10.

EL. See God, Names of.

ELA, ē-lā (ē-lā; ālā, “root”): 1) Same as El (Ezr 10 26).

2) Father of Shimei (1 K 4 18, AV “Elah”). See Elah.

ELADAH, ē-lā-da. See Eledah.

ELAH, ē-lāh (ē-lāh, “root” or “terebinth”): (1) A “duke” or “sheik” (head of a clan, RV “chief”) of Edom (Gen 36 41).

(2) Shimei-ben-Elah, Solomon’s commissary in Benjamin (1 K 4 18 AV).

(3) A son of Caleb the son of Jephunneh (1 Ch 4 15).

(4) Father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (2 K 15 30; 17 1).

(5) A Benjamite, son of Uzzzi, one of the chiefs of the tribes when the country was settled (1 Ch 9 8).

(6) King of Israel. See next article.

ELAH, ē-la. Son of Baasha, fourth king of Israel (1 K 6 1–4). He reigned two years, 888–887 BC. The statement that he came to the throne in the 26th year of Asa, reigned two years, and died in the 27th year of Asa, illustrates the Hebrew method of synchronizing the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah (cf 1 K 15 33; 16 8). Elah appears to have been a debauchee. While he was drunk, the prophet Jehu passed in the house of Azariah, his chamberlain, Zimri, one of his military leaders, conspired against him and murdered him. According to Jos (VIII, xii, 4) he took advantage of the absence of the army, which was at Gibbethon, to kill Elah. The exhortation of the royal family followed the murder of the king. Baasha’s dynasty had its origin in a murder and it ended in a murder. The government had no stability. These revolutions illustrate the truth that “the sword which the sword shall perish with the sword.”

ELAH, VALE OF (ē-lāh, ‘ēlāh, “valley of the terebinth”; ‘ēlāh, ‘ēlāh, “valley of the terebinth”; ‘ēlāh, ‘ēlāh; ‘ēlāh, ‘ēlāh, “valley of the terebinth”), or part of it. This is the southernmost of the great valleys which cut through the Shephelah. Commencing near Hebron, close to Beit Sūr, it descends under the name Wady es Sūr in a more or less northerly direction until near Beit Netifīt where it turns abruptly west and receives the name Wady es Sūr. Here it is joined by the Wady en Najd, coming from the N, and from the E. by the Wady el-Fain, down which descends an ancient road from Bethlhem. Where all these valleys coalesce the Wady es Sunt expands into a wide and level bottom, half a mile across. On a steep hill to the southern side and a little S.E. of the wide expanse is Kh. esh-Shuweikeh, the site of Sococ. That the great events of 1 S 17 2 took place here there can be no doubt; the Philis ranged themselves on the southern hills; the Israelites to the N. or N.E. Upon the wide level valley the context with Goliath occurred. The exact position of Saul's forces may be a matter of speculation, but the late Principal Miller of Madras, who made a special study of the locality (Leaves of All Lands, ch. 7), considered that the little valley ascending N.E. from Wady es Sunt to Beit Netfy was probably the actual Vale of Elah and that here the Israelites had their fortifications. His elucidation of the whole story is most convincing.

LITERATURE

A well-known tract, partly mountainous, whose western boundary, starting on the N.E. side of the Pers Gulf, practically followed the course of the lower Tigria. It was geographical bounded on the N. by Media, on the Position E. by Persia and on the W. by Baby-lon and Niasia. The Assyro-Babylonians called it the tract Elam, expressed ideographically by the Sumnerian characters for Nimma or Numma, which seems to have been its name in that language. As Numma or Elam apparently means "height," or the like, these names were probably applied to account of the mountainous nature. Another name by which it was known in early times was Ashshan, for Anshan or Anzan (Anshan), one of its ancient cities. The great capital of the tract, however, was Susa (Shushan), whence its Gr name of Susiana, interchanging with Elam, from the Sem Elam.

Elam consisted of a plain occupying a depression in the mountains of Iran or Persia. Of this the smaller part—which, however, was also the most ancient historically—lay between the Pusht-e-Kuh on the Persia, the Lur mountains on the N., the Bakhtiari hills to the E. and S.E., and the hills of Ahwaz to the S. The larger plain has as its northern boundary these same Ahwaz hills, and reaches to the sea on the S.

The Pusht-e-Kuh mountains are a series of very high parallel ranges described as "a veritable wall" between Mesopotamia and the elevated depression of the Kerkha. Its principal peak is in the Kebir-Kuh (2,500 meters = 8,200 ft.)—a difficult range of surprising regularity. The valleys on the S.W. slope belong properly to Babylonia, and could not be invaded by that side with ease. In the Kebir-Kuh the country is well protected not only against Mesopotamia, on the W., but also against Persia on the E. The nomad Lurs of the present day are practically independent of Persia. The mountain ranges of Luristan incline in height as one approaches the Pers plain, the loftiest summits of the principal range attaining a height of 5,000 meters (= 16,400 ft.).

From these mountain ranges descend larger rivers which flow through the high Elam to the sea. The Kerkha (Gamass-dub) rises in the Pers plain near Nehavend, and is practically a torrent until it reaches Susa, below which it becomes less rapid, and loses itself in the Hwazeh marshes. The Ab-e-Diz, a river with greater volume of water, is formed by the uniting of two streams above Dizful. It is so violent that it carries down boulders and even tree-trunks from the mountains, and after a winding course joins the Kuran at Kut-e-Bende-Kir. The Bellad-Rud, between the Ab-e-Diz and the Kerkha, rises in the mountains of Luristan, and varies greatly as to its volume, being sometimes a mere brook, and at others a large river. The Kuran, with which a number of smaller streams unite, rises in the Bakhtiari mountains. After receiving the Ab-e-Diz and the Bellad-Rud at Kut-e-Bende-Kir, it becomes an important waterway, navigable as far as Shuster. This is identified with the Bib. Ula (Assyr Ulâ, classical Evacil), Anciently it is itself itself into the Pers Gulf, which in past cents. extended much farther inland than now, at present joins the Shatt-el-Arab at Mohammernah.

The climate is a variable one. Between November 1 and 15 the rains begin, with S.E. and S. winds, and the mountains are covered with snow. In January and February there are violent storms, and the night brings 8° or 10° of frost. Spring begins at the end of February, and vegetation advances so rapidly that harvest takes place about the end of April. The wind then turns S. and S.W., bringing with it a heat rising sometimes to 140° F., destroying all the verdure of the country. Notwithstanding the rigors of the climate, however, it was anciently a well-populated district, and exceedingly fruitful, as now. That the district of Arabistan is poor and barren is due to the carelessness and improvidence of the people, who, like the people of the Turkish province of Bagdad, have neglected the ancient irrigation canals which utilized the land.

The vegetation of Susiana is said not to be very varied. On the river banks are to be found willows, tamarisks and many kinds of acacias. Apparently there are no forests—the sacred groves referred to by Aššur-bani-āpil are thought by De Morgan to have been artificial plantations. Oranges and lemons, which are at present cultivated there, are late importations. The date palm has been brought from the banks of the Shatt al Arab and the pomegranate and other fruit trees from the Iranian plain. Wheat and barley, sown in October and November, are harvested in April. Sorghum remains in the ground all through the dry season, and is watered artificially until October, and put in November. Castor beans, indigo, lentils, haricots, etc., are less cultivated.

The fauna is said at present to be less numerous than formerly. It contains species both of central Asia, Europe, and, to a certain extent, Africa. The elephant, wild ass, wild ox and ostrich are no longer to be found on the Chaldean-Elamite plain, but a few examples of the lion still exist there. Bears, panthers, wild boars, wolves, wild cats, foxes, jackals, and several species of wild dogs, however, still exist. Numbers of porcupines inhabit the brushwood by the rivers and marshes. Among the birds which do not leave the country are the eagle, vulture, falcon, raven, francolin, jay, sparrow, gurnard, wagtail, bustard, sparrows, turtle dove, and numerous brilliantly colored waders. The winter birds of passage are the pelican, stork, crane, cormorant, sea gull, many species of wild duck, the wild goose, bustard, woodcock, snipe, pigeon, turtledove, and numerous brilliantly colored waders. The waterfowl, a great deal of fish, among them being the barbel, silurus, carp (sometimes of great size), and gurnards similar to those of the Nile. Some of the rivers being salt, sea fish are also to be found, and it is not rare to see sharks at Shuster, and eels in the lower Kūram by the time of Naram-Sin about 3000 BC. Nevertheless pure Semites had settled in the country at a very early date, and it is probably on account of this that Elam is called (Gen 10:22) a son of Shem—indeed, the main Semitic names found by the Fr. explorers at Susa show how strong their influence was. It was to all appearance during the 2d millennium BC that certain Kassites overran W. Mesopotamia, and settled in the northern part of Elam, which was thereafter called by the Assyrians nat Kaldi, "the land of the Cossaeans." As these people seem to have spoken an Aryan language, there was apparently no really new race introduced in consequence of their invasion.

The two principal cities were Susa or Shushan, called Susan in the native texts, and regarded as the old capital, situated on the Ulai (Kārkha); and Anzan (Aššhan, Anshan), more to the S.W. This latter was the capital of Cyrus the Great and his immediate predecessors, the tract having been conquered apparently by Sīpiš (Tētespas), his ancestor, at the end of the 6th cent. BC. Susa, an important commercial center in the 3d millennium BC, became again one of the three capitals of the Achaemenian empire during the rule of the Achaemenians.

From the inscriptions of Mal-Amir, to the E., we learn that that was the place of another kingdom called Apirti, the land of the Apshares of Ezra 4:9. In the 2d (so-called Median or Scythian version of the late Pers inscriptions this name is given as Ḥapiri, Ḥalpiri, and Ḥaltupiri, and appears as the equivalent of the Bab Elammat (Elamtu) or Elam without the nominative ending. In the Fāravahār, the Pers rendition of the Elam, Khuzi-Naor, ElamITES Nations" whence the modern Hūz or Khuisstan. This implies that the kings of Apirti at one time held dominion over Susa, and perhaps the whole of Elam. Strabo (xi.13,5,6) quoting Nearchus speaking of "a land named Elam who occupied the mountains E. of the Euphrates— the Amardians or Mardians on the Pers border, the Oxians, and Elymeans on the borders of Persia and Susa, and the Cossaeans (Kassites) by the Medes. The Aryanians would seem to have been the Apirti (Ḥapiri), the Oxians were probably from (Hūwaza) while the Elymeans (cf I Macc 6:1) were the Elamites. Among the tribes who made the history of the country, therefore, were probably the Oxians, who seem not to be mentioned in the early inscriptions.

The dialects of Susa, the second Achaemenian VSS, and of Apirti, differ but slightly from each other. They are variants of an agglutinating tongue, not related to any other known language. The statement in Gen 10:22, therefore, applies only to the Semitic section of the population, as it is unlikely that the people speaking Apirtian could be described as "sons of Shem."

11. The Languages of Elam

The earliest period—Beginning with the semimythical period, we have the story of the fight of the Bab hero Gilgamesh with the Elamite Kārūm kal-Rujiuratir, who was defeated by the hero and his helper Enki-di, and beheaded. The earliest really historical reference to the Elamites as the foes of Babylon, however, is apparently contained in a letter from the priest Lu-enna to the priest Ënu-tari announcing that the Elamites had invaded Lagāš and carried off considerable booty. The writer, however, had attacked the Elamites, and taken plunder from them in his turn. As there seems to be a reference to division of spoil, this is an excellent parallel to the Elamite expedition, made in alliance with the Babylonians, against the cities of the plain (Gen 14).

2) Sargon of Agade and his successors.—Sargon of Agade, early in his reign, attacked the Elamites, but apparently Elam only fell to the conquerors of the Babylonians during the time of Naram-Sin, his son, who is seemingly shown leading his troops in that region on the splendid stele bearing his name that was found at Susa. Elam apparently regained its independence, however, during the time of Urwūšu, king of Kiš, who invaded the country, and brought back considerable spoil. One of the chiefs of Susa about this time was Simbi-tēbak. Chaldaean domination, however, did not last long. Dungi, king of Ur of the Chaldees, about 2500 BC, invaded the country accompanied by his vassal Gudea, viceroy of Lagāš. Dungi has left evidences of his conquests in the buildings which he erected at Susa, but the principal buildings of this period were constructed by Ba-ša-šušinak, son of Simbi-tēbak, viceroy of Susa and potentate in Elam. He built a temple to Šugur, the gate of Šušinak, and dug the Sītu canal. He was evidently one of the great rulers of the land.

3) The vexatious of the kings of Ur.—Somewhat later came Išatdū, his son Kal-Ruhurarrār, and his grandson Išatdū II, who in turn occupied the throne during the time of Bār-Sin, king of Ur. Elam was at this time still under Bab sovereignty, which continued under his successor, Gimil-Sin, who also built at Susa, his vassal being Ebari-kin-Daddu, viceroy of Susa. Gimil-Sin was succeeded by his son Ibi-Sin as overlord in Elam, who invaded and devastated the country, probably to suppress a revolt. There was apparently no ill-will between the two nations, however, for the viceroy of Susa is said to have married a daughter of Ibi-Sin. Another and possibly later viceroy seems to have married Mekubi, daughter of Billaama, viceroy of Anunnak, who, as Elamite princess, erected buildings at Susa.

(4) Elam becomes predominant 2280 BC.—It was probably shortly after this that Kudur-Nabûjunte threw off the Sem yoke, and, invading Babylonia, brought back much spoil to Elam. The date indicated for this ruler by the inscriptions of Assurban-apil is 2280 BC. The positions of the rulers of Elam and Babylonia were now changed, and the kings of Babylon had to acknowledge Elamite suzerainty. As Elamite and Bab sovereign, Kudur-Nabûjunte intrusted Susa to a feudalatory ruler, and among the viceroys who governed Elam may be mentioned Sirukdu', who constructed at Susa, and Tmitt-Agum, his sister's son, who built in that city the temple to Isme-karaś, "for the health of Kutir-Nabûjunte and his family." After passing to other rulers, the government of Susa fell to Ebari, father of Silpaša, during whose reign Sitti-Siljak ruled in Babylonia. Nur-Addi and Rim-Anum, kings of Larsa (Elassar), were his vassals.

(5) The extension of Elamite authority westward.—Attapaššu (or Attahušu), Silpaša's sister's son, then became 'shepherd of Susa.' Among the temples which he built was one dedicated to the goddess Narute, and he erected a bridge near his residence. Kudur-mabuk, son of Sitti-Siljak, was at this time adda ("father," probably meaning protector) of Euffin-Balu and the W.-Amurrû, the land of the Amorites, whither marched Chedorlaomer and Amraphel, with their allies, in the time of Abraham (Gen 14). Kudur-mabuk of Larsa was succeeded by his son Eri-Aku (probably the Iri-Agu of Larsa of the Elamite texts), and if he be really, as some probable, the Amsu of Gen 14:19, then this is also the period when Chedorlaomer ruled in Elam. The strange thing, however, is, that the name of this last does not occur in any recognizable form, unless it be the Kudurugaljam of certain half-legendary inscriptions (see CONOR-LAOMER). The Elamite line in Larsa was continued after the death of Eri-Aku by Rim-Sin, his brother, who succeeded him.

(6) Babylonia again supreme.—What the history of Elam during this period was to be discovered, but Ammurapi, who, as Biliaam, succeeded Amraphel of Gen 14:19, seems to have invaded the country in his 30th year. In his 31st he defeated Rim-Sin of Larsa, following this up, in his 32d, by overthrowing the army of Anunnak. All these successes in Elam and its dependencies probably made the kingdom of Babylon supreme in the land. But more details bearing upon this period are needed. It is thought probable that the Elamite king Sadi(?) or Taki(?) came into conflict with, and was defeated by, Ammi-sun-erit, the 4th descendant from Hammurabi, who reigned about 1890 BC. Apparently the Elamite ruler had tried to regain his independence, but failed.

(7) Hurbatil's challenge to Kuttu-palzu.—Omitting the names of rulers concerning whom but little or nothing is known, we come to the reign of Untaš-Gal, patron of the arts. Numerous temples were built by him, and sanctuaries at Susa dedicated. He has left a magnificent bronze statue representing his queen Naruš-Ašu. He seems to have been overthrown by Untaš-Gal, of a more legitimate line, who was likewise a builder of temples. After the apparently short reign of Kidin-Ḫturu came that of Hurbatil (Hurbatil), who, desiring to throw off the Babylonian yoke, challenged Kuttu-palzu, king of Babylon, to battle at Dür-Dungi. The challenge was accepted, with disastrous results, for Hurbatil was captured by the Bab king at the place named. This, however, did not put an end to the strife, and in the end Kidin-Ḫturuššu was victorious over Béla-nadin-šum, king of Babylon, about 1180 BC.

(8) Elam again supreme.—Later came the military exploits of Sutruk-Nabûjunte, who invaded Babylonia, slew the king Zagaš-sum-idlišu, and helped by his son Kutir-Nabûjunte. He threw off the Babylonian yoke and took away the stele of Naram-Sin, the code of Hammurabi, and several other monuments, which were carefully preserved at Susa. He also defeated the king of Anunnak. It is this collection of spoils which has contributed to make the success of the Fr. excavations at Susa what it is.

(9) Elam again defeated, but recovers.—The war between Babylonia and Elam recorded for the reign of Nebuchadrezzar 1 (c 1020 BC) probably took place, according to Schöbel, during the reign of Ši-šina-hamurā-Lagamar. The Elamite king was defeated on the banks of the Ulai, Elam was ravaged, and much spoil taken. The principal city called Namur was detached from Susian territory and reunited to the domain of Babylonia. Apparently the Elamites now turned their attention to regaining their military prestige, the result being that an Elamite king occupied the Bab throne from 939 to 934 BC. The history of this period has still to be discovered, but the Babylonians apparently soon shook off the yoke. About this time, however, that another power—Assyria—appeared on the scene, and took the field—not only against Babylon, but also on the borders of Elam. An Elamite contemporary of Nabonasser of Babylon was Bubhanagis, 742 BC.

(10) The conflict between Elam and Assyria.—At this time, however, the Assyrians became dominant in Babylonia (see Tiglath-Pileser and
Elam, Elamites  THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA  920

Shalmaneser), but it was probably not until the reign of Sargon of Assyria (see SARGON) that Elam came into conflict with Assyria. Merodach-baladan, a pretendant to the throne of Babylon, made common cause with Humbaniñas, who fought with the Assyrian army at Dēr. Naturally the Assyrians claim the victory, but the Babylonians say that they were defeated. After the death of Humbaniñas, his successor, Šutur-Nabānī or Ištar-hundu (Bab), still befriended Merodach-baladan, and advanced to his help. Sargon first attacked the Chaldaeans and defeated them at Dūr-Āššur, and, entering Elam, stormed and captured the cities of the land. The Elamite king took refuge in the mountains, and Merodach-baladan had to resist the Assyrians unaided.

gance, for Sennacherib invaded and ravaged the country from Rab to Bit-Burnaki. Apparently the Elamites had expected their new ruler, Kudurru (Kudur-Nabūnī), to save them from the reprisals of the Assyrians, but as he had failed to do this, he, in his turn, was deposed and killed after a reign of 10 months. The new king of Elam was Ummannānu, who espoused the cause of Mušēzib-Marduk, the new king of Babylon, and gathering a force of Babylonians and Elamites at Ḫalûf, fought a battle there, in which the Babylonians record success for the allies. Sennacherib, however, himself claims the victory, and describes with great wealth of detail the horrors of the fight. Next year (689 BC) Sennacherib marched into Babylon to complete the work, and Mušēzib-Marduk, having been captured, was sent prisoner to Assyria. Umman-

The Installation of Ummanīgas.

(11) Sennacherib against Chaldaea and Elam.—As Sargon had his attention fully occupied elsewhere, he made no attempt to follow up his success, and it seems not to have been until the reign of Sennacherib that any serious invasion of the country on the part of the Assyrians was made. In 697 BC that king marched again against Merodach-baladan, who had taken refuge at Nāqulu and other places on the Elamite side of the then elongated Pers Gulf. Here the Chaldaeans, with their Elamite allies, were defeated, and the Elamite cities plundered and destroyed. Hālulu, king of Elam, on the retirement of the Assyrian troops, invaded Babylonia as being part of the territories of the Assyrian king, and having captured Aššur-nadin-šum, Sennacherib's son, who had ruled in Babylon 6 years, carried him off to Elam, setting Nergal-ūṣezīr on the throne of Babylonia. On the arrival of the Assyrian avenging host in Babylonia, Nergal-ūṣezīr fled to Elam, but was captured near Niffer. The Elamites were evidently very dissatisfied with their king—possibly owing to his policy—and killed him in a revolt after a reign of six years. This action on the part of the Elamites, however, did not save the people from Assyrian

(12) Assyrian friendship and Elamite ingratitude. —Friendship with Assyria was a complete reversal of Elamite policy, and to all appearance peace, though probably unpopular, persisted between the two countries for several years. Humba-haldāšu's two brothers revolted against him and assassinated him, and Urtaku, one of the murderers, took the Elamite throne. Not daring to be openly hostile to Assyria, however, he sent his brother Ta-umman to intrigue in Chaldaea in favor of a man named Nahūšallim, but the Chaldaean chiefs answered that Na'id-Marduk, their lord, lived, and they were the servants of the king of Assyria. Also, during a famine in Elam, certain Elamite tribes migrated into Assyria to escape the scarcity, and were kindly treated by Assür-bani-āpil, who had succeeded his father on the Assyrian throne. Notwithstanding this, however, Urtaku invaded BABYLONIA as ally of certain Chaldaean tribes. Overlaid by the Assyrian army, he fought with them near his own border, but was defeated and fled. He died prematurely (by his own hand) the same year, and was succeeded by his brother Te-umman (Tepti-Humah).

(13) Te-umman and the Elamite seed-royal; Assyr's triumph._—This king, who is described by Assür-bani-āpil as being in the likeness of an evil spirit, immediately set to work to secure the death of all the sons of Urtaku and Umman-aldās, (Jumab-Haldāšu II), his brother; and these princes, five in number, with 60 of the royal seed of Elam, fled and sought refuge with the Assyrian king. Te-umman immediately sent two messengers to Assür-bani-āpil demanding the surrender of the fugitives. This was refused, and war broke out between the two countries immediately after. The Assyrians came up with the Elamites at Dēr, but Te-umman feared to join issue there, and, retreating, took up a strong position near his capital, Susa, with his front protected by the river Ulai. Defections from his army now so weakened the forces of Te-umman that he endeavored to treat with Assür-bani-āpil, who naturally refused to listen to terms, and ordered his troops to attack. The defeat of the Elamites was a foregone conclusion, and Te-umman perished, with his son, in the thick of the battle, as is dramatically depicted by the sculptors of Assür-bani-āpil in the bas-reliefs which adorned the walls of his palace. An Assyrian general was now sent to Susa with Umman-īgās, the prince chosen to succeed Te-umman, and he was proclaimed while the bodies of the fallen Elamites covered the battlefield, and the waters of the Ulai carried others down to the place of its outflow. Tammuritu, the new king's youngest brother, was at the same time made king of Hitāšu, in the mountain region. In the triumphal procession at Nineveh which took place on the Assyrian army's return, the head of Te-umman and his son Tamritu figured, the former hanging from the neck of Dunanu, king of Gamбуḫu, and the latter from the neck of Samgum, Dunanu's brother.

(14) Elamite ingratitude and treachery.—For a time there was peace in Elam, but soon the discontent of Šamaš-sum-ukín, king of Babylon, Assūr-bani-āpil's brother, sought to break it. Urged by him, Umman-īgās forgot the benefits which he had received at the hands of Assūr-bani-āpil, and sent an army into Babylonia under the command of Undas, son of Te-umman, telling him to avenge upon Assyria the killing of his father. Notwithstanding the great strength of the allied army, they did not succeed in making headway against the Assyrians. Tammuritu, nephew of Umman-īgās, after the defeat of the Elamite forces in Chaldaea, revolted against him, and having defeated him, cut off his head, and took the crown. Šamaš-šum-ukín immediately turned his attention to the new ruler, and induced him by fresh presents to come likewise to his aid.

Tammuritu therefore marched at the head of an army into Babylonia, but in his absence Indabigaš, one of his servants, headed a revolt against him, and proclaimed himself king in Susa. In the battle which ensued between the two pretenders, Tammuritu was defeated, and fled to the seacoast with a part of the Elamite royal family. He ultimately embarked in a ship on the Pers Gulf with the intention of escaping, but was wrecked, and gave himself up to an Assyrian officer, who sent him to Assyrria.

(15) Elam's further changes of rulers._—Indabigaš, the new Elamite king, now sent an embassy to make peace with Assūr-bani-āpil, who at once demanded the surrender of Nabē-bel-šumi, son of Merodachi-baladian, and the Assyrians whom he had enticed and taken with him. Before this demand could reach Indabigaš, however, his people had revolted against him and put him to death, and Umman-aldāšu, son of Attametu, sat on the throne, after defeating Indabigaš on the banks of the Hitūšu. The same demand was made to Umman-aldāšu as had been made to Indabigaš, but Nabē-bel-šumi, not wishing to fall into the hands of the Assyrians, called on his armor-bearer to dispatch him, and the two ran each other through with their swords.

(16) King Tammuritu's treachery._—Nevertheless Assūr-bani-āpil decided to replace Tammuritu, the former Elamite king, on the throne, and to this end invaded Elam. The Assyrians were, as usual, successful, and on learning this, Umman-aldāšu fled to the mountains. Entering Susa, Tammuritu was once more proclaimed king of Elam, he, in return, promising to regard Assūr-bani-āpil as his lord, and to pay tribute. No sooner had the Assyrian army departed, than the new king of Elam began to plot against the power which had raised him. To all appearance his intentions to revolt were reported to the Assyrian king, who at once sent an army and plundered the country, and Tammuritu again fell into Assūr-bani-āpil's hands. Umman-aldāšu now returned and resumed the government. Unwilling to regard his former efforts as fruitless, the Assyrian king decided to finally subdue the land, and to this end invaded it, the pretext being that the Elamites refused to deliver up the image of the goddess Nānāš, which had been carried off from Ewhē 1,633 years before, in the time of Kudur-Nabûhunte (see [4] above). The two armies faced each other on the banks of the Jiftie, and after an attack in which the Assyrians were at a disadvantage, the Elamites gave way, and Umman-alids fled to the mountains. According to the Assyrian king's record, an enormous booty was taken, including many sacred and ancient royal statues preserved at Susa. The image of Ninlil was restored to the shrine at Eresh with great rejoicing. In the triumphal celebrations at Nineveh, Tammaritu was one of the captive kings who drew the Assyrian chariot to the temple of Ištar, when he rendered the goddess thanks for his victory.

(17) Dominion passes from Assyria.—To all appearance Elam now became a province of the Assyrian empire, though not for long, as this collapsed in the year 606 BC, and the center of government was shifted to Babylon, under Nabopolassar, who became its ruler. Nebuchadrezzar (604), Evil-merodach (561), Neriglissar (559), and Nabonidus (555-538 BC), were successively masters of Elam.

The mention of the kings of Elam in Jer 25-26, however, suggests that the old states of the country were yet recognized as independent, though 49:35-39 prophesies the dismemberment of the country, and the destruction of its king and princes. This is thought to refer to the annexation of the country by Tishops, and its passing, through his grandson Cyrus, to Cambyses. The Great Kuraš, or Susinak, was all who wereTans of Anzan—to Darius Hystaspis. In Isa 21:2 it is apparently the later Cyrus who is referred to when Elam, with Media, is called upon to “go up” to the siege of Babylon.

(18) The later state of Elam.—After Cyrus, the history of Elam was that of Persia, of which it henceforth formed a part. In all probability, however, the Elamites were as warlike and as intractable as ever. During the reign of the little-known Kharacensian king, Arpāšēn, they made incursions into Babylonia, one of the opponents of this king's generals being Ptit, “the enemy, the Elamite”—a phrase of old standing, apparently. Elam, to its whole extent, was smitten with the sword, and Ptit (was slain or captured). One of the cities which they attacked was Apamea, probably that on the Sellas river. Acts 2:9 implies that the old language of Elam was still in use, and the Elamites were still recognized as a nationality, as late as the 1st cent. of our era.

Owing to the many Semites in Elam, and the nearness of the Arab states, Bab deities—Anu and Anat, Enil and Ninlil, Merodach and Tammuz—were largely worshipped (see BABYLON, babylonia). The chief deity of the non-Semitic pantheon seems to have been Inšinnak, the patron-deity of Susa, identified with Ninlil, the son of Enil, by the Babylonians, who quote also other names applied to him—Lajuratil, Simeš, Ashana, Susinnak, and Dughak. Merodach seems to have been represented by the Sumerian character Gal, “great,” and Zēr-pantu was apparently called Nin-sî in Elam. Ištar was known as Šan. Lagamar, Lagamar, or Lagamal, was apparently identifed with the Bab Lagamal, one of the gods of Dalaim near Babylon—his name is generally regarded as forming part of the name CHEDEKLAMEGH (q.v.). Naḫhunte, Naḫunte, or (Bab) Nanhundii was the Bab sun-god Sumas; Kuzidami was the W. Sem. Hadad, also known by his Mitannian (Hittite) name, of Telpii, Rumina, Human, or Umman (Assyr.), “the god of the land,” “the king,” was possibly regarded as the Bab Merodach. The currency of Bab myths in Elam is suggested by the name of the goddess Belalaa, possibly the Bab Belili, sister of Tammuz. The word for “god” in Elamite was not explained by the Babylonians as one of the names of Enil, implying that the Elamites regarded him as “the god” by divine right. Of their deities, six (one of them being Lagamar) were worshipped only by Elamite kings. Elam had temples and temple-towers similar to those in Babylonia, as well as sacred groves, wherein no stranger penetrated. (See ERE, s.v. “Elamites.”)

The rediscovery of the history of Elam is one of the most noteworthy things of modern research. It has revealed to us the wonderful development which that kingdom had attained in art and lit. Nevertheless, the country had adopted the cuneiform method of writing, and possessed also another script, seemingly of more ancient date. As both Sem Bab and Susian (Anzanite) were spoken in the country, numerous documents in both languages have been found, mostly historical, or of the nature of dedications, some of which are inscribed on objects presented to temples. There are also a number of archaic tablets of the nature of accounts, written in a peculiar cuneiform character. The cylinder-seals are either inscribed with dedications, or with the name of the owner, his father, and the god whom he worshipped, as in Babylonia. Of other lit. there are but mere traces—an excorium against mosquitos shows the desire of the people to rid themselves of the discomforts of this life. Contracts testify to the existence of laws, but the laws themselves have yet to be discovered. The stele of Hammurabi, which was found at Susa, did not belong to Elamite lit., but to that of Babylonia.

Elamite art during the first period was naturally rude, and it is doubtful whether metals were then used, as no traces of them were found. Art during the 1st and 2d millennium BC was extreme delicacy, and very elegant. Prehistoric Periods The second period is described as being less artistic than the first. The pottery is more ordinary, and also more roughly made, though better ware also exists. Painted ornamentation is found. Vessels of white or pink limestone, some of them very large, occur, but alabaster is exceedingly rare. There is no indication of writing at this period, but rudely engraved seals, with animal forms, are found. The buildings were of crude brick or piled-up earth, though baked brick was sometimes used. A change seems to have taken place in the conditions of life at the end of this period, implying invasion by a more civilized race.
The indications of invasion during the second prehistoric period are confirmed, according to M. Jocquier, by what is found in the layer of the archaic period, which succeeded the Pre-Persian. The preserved clay tablets, some of which have impressions of certain sacred trees, are good and varied. Some have the form of the duck, the wild boar, and other animals. During the period of the iskak and viceroy, fine sculptures in low relief occur—the scorpion-man and the sacred tree, military prisoners with their guard, siege-operations and the dead on the battlefield; and as examples of work in the round, ivory and alabaster statuettes. Later on, during the time of the kings of Elam and Susa, the objects of art increase in number, though large objects in the round are rare. Noteworthy are the statuettes and statues in bronze, the former being very numerous. The largest production of this kind is the almost life-size statue of queen Napat-Asu, consort of Untash-Gal, which, however, is unfortunately headless. It is a remarkable piece of work, and has great artistic merit.

In all probability Elam was much hindered in her material and intellectual development by the intractable and warlike nature of her conquerors—indeed, the history of the country, as far as it is known, is a record of strife and conflict, and the temperament indicated by the ancient records seems to have been inherited by the wild tribes which occupy the more inaccessible districts. What conduced to quarrels and conflicts in ancient times was the law of succession, for the Elamite kings were not generally succeeded by their eldest sons, but by their brothers (see ELSABA). The inhabitants of the towns at the present time in all probability do not differ in any essential respect from those of Persia in general, and among them there is probably no great deal of ancient Elamite blood, though the Elamite type is met with, and probably occurs, in consequence of frequent mingling, in various parts of modern Persia.

ELASA, el-a-sa (Aa셔드, Alassian; AV Elasa, el-ē-a-sa): The place where Judas pitched his camp before the battle in which he was overwhelmed and slain (1 Mace 9 5). It probably corresponds to the modern Khirbet el-Asad, between the two Beth-horons.

ELSAB, el-a-sa (תִּשְׁאַּב, 'el-ASH, "God has made")

(1) An Israelite who had married a foreign wife (Ex 21 22).

(2) A son of Shaphan, by whom, with Gemariah, King Zedekiah sent a message to Babylon (Jer 29 3). See ELASA.

ELATH, 'eloth, or ELOTH, 'eloth (אֵלֶּחֶת, 'eloth, גָּלוּת, 'galoth; ADON, Ailôn [Dt 2 8], ADAB, Ailâth [2 K 16 8]): A seaport on the Red Sea in the territory of Edom. It is named along with Ezion-geber in the account of Israel's journey round the land of Edom (Dt 2 8). It appears as Allath, and Ailôn in the LXX, and in Jos as Ilanias (Ant, vi, 4), while Onom has AILÄH, Ailam. From this we may gather that the Aram. İlan or İlân was in use as well as the Heb 'eloth or 'eloth. The name, "grove," was doubtless originally derived from that presence (16 7). It may be identical with El Paran of Gen 14 6, and Elah of Gen 36 41. When David conquered Edom, Elath passed into the hands of Israel (2 S 8 14). It was a position of great importance in connection with the trade with South Arabia. Here the merchant fleets of Solomon and Jehoshaphat were fitted out, and hence they sailed (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17; 1 K 22 48). In the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, Edom shook off the hand of Judah (2 K 8 20), but under Amaziah and Uzziah it was again subdued (21 7 10 22). Finally it was taken from Azah by Rezin, king of Syria. The Jews were driven out and the Syrians (Edomites?) took permanent possession (16 6). It is identical with the modern Aṣaba, at the head of the gulf of that name. W. Ewing ELBERTH, el-bē'rīth (Jgs 9 46). See ISILAHR.

EL-BETH-EL, el-beth'el (בֵּיתֶל, 'el bēth-'el, "God of Bethel"; BAIOTH, Baithel): By this name Jacob called the scene of his vision at Luz, when he returned from Paddan-aram (Gen 35 7).

ELCIA, el-she'-a, RV ELKIAH (q.v.).

ELDAEH, el-da'a (גֶּדֶּדָה, "God has called"): A son of Midian (Gen 25 4; 1 Ch 1 33).

ELDAD, el-dad (גֵּדָד, "God has loved")

One of the 70 elders chosen by Moses at the command of Jehovah to share "the burden of the people" (Nu 11 26 25). Eldad and his companion Medad were not present with the rest at the tent of meeting, yet the Spirit rested also upon them and they prophesied in the camp (vs 26 29).

ELDAD, el-dad, AND MODAD, mö'dad, BOOK OF: In the LXX they are called Eklad and Modad. In the AV the names are given as Eldad and Medad: meaning "God has loved" ("God loves") and "object of love" (?) . They were two of the seventy elders chosen by Moses (Nu 11 26), and while the others obeyed the summons and went to the tabernacle, these two remained at home (Nu 11 25). The nature of their prophecy is not recorded, and this naturally became a good subject for the play of the imagination. It furnished the basis for a lost work which was quoted by Hermes (V 6 3): "The Lord is near to them who return unto him, as it is written in Eldad and Medad, who prophesied to the people in the wilderness." The Pal Tg also filled in the subject of the prophecy of Eldad and Modad, and, as they have it, it related to the coming of God and Magog against Israel at the end of the days. One of the Tgs has the expression, "The Lord is near to those who are in the hour of tribulation." The authors of the Tgs were either dependent upon that work or upon a similar tradition; and the former of these views is the more probable. Lightfoot and Holtzmann think the lengthy quotation in 1 Clem 23 and 2 Clem 11 is from the Book of Eldad and Medad. The work is found in the Stichometry of Nicephorus and consists of 400 stichoi, which would make it about twice the length of the Cant. A. W. Fortune

ELDER, el-dér, IN THE OT (זָכֶן, zaken): Among primitive peoples authority naturally seems to be invested in those who by virtue of greater age and, consequently, experience is best fitted to govern: thus ηρευας iii.149). Later the idea of age became merged in that of dignity (I. ii.409, ii.570; Oden, Biblical Dictionary). In like manner the word πατρας came to be used among the Romans (Cic. Rep. 2.8.14). So also among the Germans authority was intrusted to those who were older; cf Tacitus Agricola. The same is true among the Arabians to the present day, the sheik being always a man of age as well as of authority.

From the first the Hebrews held this view of government, although the term “elder” came later to be used of the idea of the authority for which, at first, age was regarded necessary. Thus the office appears in both J (9th cent. BC) (Ex 3 16; 12 21; 24 1, of the elders of the Hebrews; and of the Egyptians, Gen 50 7); and E (8th cent. BC) (Ex 17 5; 18 12; 19 7 [2a]; Josh 24 31, elders of Israel, or of the people. Cf the principle of selection of heads of tens, fifties, etc, Ex 13 13 ff., seventy being selected from a previous body of elders); cf J/E (Nu 11 16.24). Seventy are also mentioned in Ex 24 1, while in Jgs 8 14 seventy-seven are mentioned, although this might be taken to include seven princes. Probably the number was not uniform.

Elder as a title continues to have place down through the times of the Judges (Jgs 8 16; 2 7[2]; cf Ruth 4 2 ff) into the kingdom. Saul asked to be honored before the elders (1 S 15 30); the elders of Bethlehem appeared before Samuel (16 4); the elders appeared before David in Hebron (2 S 17 15; 1 Ch 11 3); elders took part in the temple procession of Solomon (1 K 8 3; 2 Ch 5 4). They continued through the Pers period (Ezr 6 5.8; 6 13.4; 10 8.14) and the Maccabean period (Jdt 6 16; 7 23; 8 10; 10 6; 13 12; 1 Macc 12 35), while the NT (παπατραν, παπατραον, presbuteros, Mt 16 21; 28 47.57; Mk 8 31; Lk 9 22; Acts 4 2.53) makes frequent mention of the office.

The elders served as local magistrates, in bringing murderers to trial (Dt 19 12; 21 1 ff; Josh 20 4), punishing a disobedient son (Dt 21 19), inflicting penalty for slander (22 15), for noncompliance with the Levirate marriage law (25 7 ff), enforcing the Law (27 1), conducting the service of the sin offering, and the Law (Lev 13 1 ff). In certain passages different classes of officers are mentioned as “judges and officers” (Dt 16 18), “elders” and “officers” (31 28), “heads, tribes, elders, officers” (29 10 [Heb 9]). It is probable that both classes were elected from among the elders, and that to one class was assigned the work of judgment, and that the “officers” exercised executive functions (Schurer). In entirely Jewish communities the same men would be both officers of the community and elders of the synagogue. In this case the same men would have jurisdiction over civil and religious matters.

LITERATURE.—Schurer, GJT, § 23, esp. 175 ff (Eng. ed. II, 1. 149 ff; Bonniger, H A, 51; Deissmann, BZ 3.1, § 277); Preuschen, Griechisch-Deutsches Handwörterbuch, e.v., 958 f.

Elder in the NT (παπατραυν, παπατραουν)

(1) The word is used adjectively to denote seniority (Lk 15 25; 1 Tim 5 2).

(2) Referring to the Jewish elders of the synagogue, usually associated with the scribes and Pharisees, and NT passages cited in the previous article.

(3) It denotes certain persons appointed to hold office in the Christian church, and to exercise spiritual oversight over the flock committed to them. From the practice in Acts (14 23; 20 17) it may be inferred that the churches generally had elders appointed over them. That ‘elders’ and ‘bishops’ were in apostolic and sub-apostolic times the same, is now almost universally admitted; in all NT references their functions are identical. The most probable explanation of the difference of names is that “elder” refers mainly to the person, and “bishop” to the office; the name “elder” emphasizes what he is, while “bishop”, that is “overseer”, emphasizes what the elder or presbyter does. ELEAD, el-e-ad (אֶלֶאָדָה, "God has testified"): An Ephraimites, slain while making a raid, by the men of Gath (1 Ch 7 21).

ELEADAH, el-e-ad-ah (AV) (אֶלֶאָדָה, "God has adorned"): An Ephraimites (1 Ch 7 20).

ELEALEH, el-e-al-eh (אֶלֶאָלָה, "God has ascended"): Lay in the country taken from Sihon and within the lot given to Reuben (Nu 32 3.37 f). “Their names being changed” seems to apply to all the towns mentioned. There is no indication of the other names. Elealeh is noticed with Heshbon in the oracles against Moab in Isa 15 10.48 34. Onom locates it one Rom mile from Heshbon. It is represented today by el-Al, a mound crowned with ruins, about a mile N. of Heshbon.

ELEASA, el-e-as-ah. See ELASA.

ELEASAH, el-e-as-ah (in Heb identical with ELASAH, which see):

(1) A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 2 39.40).
(2) A Benjamite, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8 37; 9 43).

ELEAZAR, el-e-az-er, el-e-as-er (אֵלֶאָזָר, "God is helper"): (1) The 3d son of Aaron by Elisheba (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2). He married one of the daughters of Putiel, who bore him Phinehas (Ex 26 25). With his father and 3 brothers he was consecrated to the priest’s office (Ex 21 1). After the destruction of Nadab and Abihu, he occupied a more important position, and he and Ithamar “ministered in the priest’s office with the presence of Aaron their father” (Lev 10 6 f; Nu 3 4; 1 Ch 24 2 ff). He was given the oversight of the Levites and had charge of the tabernacle and all within it (Nu 3 32; 4 16). To Eleazar fell the duty of beating out for an altar covering the censers of Korah and his fellow-conspirators who had attempted to seize the priesthood (Nu 16 37.39). On the death of Aaron, Eleazar succeeded him (Nu 20 25 ff). He assisted Moses with the census after the plague in the plains of Moab (Nu 26 1 ff), and with Moses and the elders heard the petition of the daughters of Zelophehad who wished to be served as heirs to their father (Nu 27 1 ff). After the entrance into Canaan, Eleazar and Joshua gave effect to the decision arrived at by giving the daughters of Zelophehad a share in the land of Manasseh (Josh 17 4). He was priest and adviser to Joshua, the successor of Moses (Nu 27 19; 31 12 ff), whom he also assisted in partitioning Canaan among the tribes (Nu 34 17; Josh 14 1; 19 51; 21 1). He was buried in the hill (Num 26 72). "Gibeon", a son of his was his son in the hill country of Ephraim (Josh 24 33). For some reason unknown the descendants of Ithamar seem to have held the chief position among the priests from Eil till the accession of Solomon, when Abiathar was sent to them. And Zadok, the descendant of Eleazar, was appointed in his place (1 K 2 26 f). Ezra was a descendant of Zadok.
ELEAZURUS, el-ê-a-zûr'us, RV ELIASIBUS (q.v.).

ELECT, ê-lekt'. That is, “chosen,” “selected.” In the OT the word represents derivatives of "ek")(Eileas), eklektos. It means properly an object or objects of selection. This primary meaning sometimes passes into that of “eminent,” “precious,” “favored,” or “elect” to translate the original (e.g. Isa 42 1; 1 Pet 2 6). In AV “elect” (or “chosen”) is used of Israel as the race selected for special favor and to be the special vehicle of Divine purposes (so 4:4 in Apoc. Tod and Ecclus); of the great Servant of Jeh (cf Lk 23 35; the “Christ of God, his chosen”; cf: of eminent saints as Jacob, Moses, Rufus (Rom 16 13); “the lady” and her “sister” of 2 Jn; of the holy angels (1 Tim 5 21), with a possible suggestion of the lapse of otherwise good angels, and definitely in the NT; it denotes a human community, also described as believers, saints, the Israel of God; regarded as in some sense selected by Him from among men, objects of His special favor, and correspondingly called to special holiness and service. See further under Election. In the Eng. VSS “elect” is not used as a vb.: “to choose” is preferred; e.g. Mk 13 20; Eph 1 4.

HANLEY DUNELM

ELECT LADY, ê-lekt' lâ'di (êlekt'st kuri'ah, eklektê kuria; 2 Jn ver 1). In correspondence with strict grammatical usage these words of address may be tr. in three ways: “to an elect lady” (which as an address is too indefinite); or, both words being taken as proper names, “to Eklektê Kuriâ” (an improbable combination of two very rare names); or “to Eklektê, lady” (angle, “to the lady [or Madam] Eklektê.” The other translations which have been given—“to the elect lady” or “to the elect Kuriâ”—are open to objection on account of the omission of the article; but this violation of rule is perhaps not without parallel (cf 1 Pet 1 1). The translation adopted will partly depend upon whether we regard the epistle as addressed to an individual or to a community. Dr. Rendel Harris believes this question to be settled by the discovery in the papyri of numerous instances which prove that Kuriâ and Kuriâ were used by ancient letter-writers as terms of familiar endearment, applicable to brother, sister, son, wife, or intimate friend of either sex (Epiphan, March, 1901; see also Findlay, Fellows on the Life Journal, ch. III). In the light of this suggestion we should naturally translate, “to my [dear] lady Eklektê.” Grammatically, this is strongly supported by 1 Tim 1 2 and 2 Tim 1 2 (Timoth (y evlogis ... agape ... tis tis, Tim ochos patris ... agape ... ti oth (y tis, Timis beloved ... child’); and the fact that the name Eklektê has not yet been discovered, though Eklektos has, offers no grave objection. This is the tr favored by Clement of Alexander, who says of the epistle: scripta vero est ad quaedam Babyloniam nomine Electa, but scripta est auctum electionem ecclesiae sanctae (“It is written to a certain Babylonian, Electa by name; but it signifies the further election of the holy church”). It seems doubtful whether he means by the last clause that Electa is simply a personification of the church, or a real person whose name was derived from the Christian idea of election. Either way the rendering, “to the lady Electa,” is suitable, and upon the whole it seems the best. Eklektê is not an adj; but a noun. In a person is intended, it is “the lady Electa”; if a church, it is designated, not “the elect Lady,” but “the lady Elect.” The mention of “thy elect sister” in 2 Jn ver 13 does not hinder either supposition. See further Cyria; JOHN, THE EPISTLES OF.

VI. PERSEVERANCE

VII. CONSIDERATIONS IN RELIEF OF THOUGHT

1. Antinomies

2. Fatalism Another Thing

3. The Moral Aspects

4. “We know in Part”

5. The Unknown Future

I. The Word in Scripture.—The word is absent from the OT, where the related Heb vb. (êlektê, bâhar) is frequent. In the NT it occurs 61 (Rom 9 11; 11 5 7 28; 1 Thess 1 4; 2 Pet 1 10). In all these places it appears to denote an act of Divine selection taking effect upon human objects so as to bring them into special and saving relations with God: a selection such as to be at once a mysterious thing, transcending human analysis of its motives (so eminently in Rom 9 11), and such as to be knowable by its objects, who are (2 Pet) exorted to “make it sure,” certain, a fact to consciousness. It is always (with one exception, Rom 9 11; see below) related to a community, and thus has close affinity with the OT teachings upon the privileged position of Israel as the chosen, selected race (see under ELECT). The objects of election in the NT are, in effect, the Israel of God, the new, regenerate race called to special privilege and special service. From one point of view, that of the external marks of Christianity, they may thus be described as the Christian community in its widest sense, the sense in which the sacramental position and the real are prima facie assumed to coincide. But from 2 Pet it is manifest that much more than this has to be said if the incidence of the word present to the writer’s mind is to be rightly felt. It is assumed there that the Christian, baptized and a worshipper, may yet need to make “sure” his “calling and election” as a fact to his consciousness. This implies conditions in the “election” which far transcend the tests of success and external circumstances.
the other passages. In Rom 9 11 the context is charged with the most urgent and even staggering challenge to submission and silence in the presence of the inscrutable. To illustrate large assertions as to the liberty and sovereignty of the Divine dealings with man, the apostle brings in Esau and Jacob, individuals, twins as yet unborn, and points to the inscrutable difference of the Divine action toward them as such. Somehow, as a matter of fact, the Eternal appears as appointing to unborn Esau a future of comparative disfavor and to Jacob of favor; a future announced to the still pregnant mother. Such discrimination is announced, says the apostle, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand." In the whole passage the gravest stress is laid upon the isolation of the "election" from the merit or demerit of its object.

III. Incidence upon Community and Individual.
—It is observable that the same characteristic, the inscrutable, the sovereign, is attached in the OT to the "election" of a favored and privileged nation. Israel is repeatedly reminded (see e.g. Deut. 7) that the Divine call and choice of them to be the people of God has no relation to their virtues, or to their strength. The reason lies out of sight, in the Divine mind. So too "the Israel of God" (Gal 6 16) in the NT, the Christian community, "the new, peculiar people of God" (Acts 20 21), pronounced its sacredness by quite unmerited favour (e.g. Tit 3 5). And the nature of the case here leads, as it does not in the case of the natural Israel, to the thought of a Divine election of the individual, similarly inscrutable and sovereign. For the idea of the New Israel involves the thought that in every genuine member of it the provisions of the New Covenant (Jer 31 31f) are being fulfilled: the sins are remembered no more, and the law is written in the heart. The bearer of the Christian name, but not of the Christian spiritual standing and character, having "not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his" (Rom 8 9). The chosen community accordingly, not as it seems ^.extra, but as it is in its essence, is a fellowship of individuals each of whom is an object of unmerited Divine favor, taking effect in the new life. And this involves the exercise of electing mercy, e.g. 1 Pet 1 3. And consider Rom 11 4-7 (where observe the exceptional use of "the election," meaning "the election in the Divine election of what is Elect.

IV. Cognate and Illustrative Biblical Language.
—It is obvious that the aspects of mystery which gather round the word "election" are not confined to it alone. An important class of words, such as "election," "elect," "choice," "selected," and the cognate "purpose," "gift," bears this same character; asserting or connoting, in appropriate contexts, the element of the inscrutable and sovereign in the action of the Divine will upon man, and particularly upon man, and will and action toward God. And it will be felt by careful students of the Bible in its larger and more general teachings that one deep characteristic of the Book, which with all its boundless multiplicity is yet one, is to emphasize on the side of man everything that can humble, convict, reduce to wretched silence (see for typical passages Job 40 3.4; Rom 3 19), and on the side of God everything which can bring home to man the transcendence and sovereign claims of His almighty Maker. Not as unrelated utterances, but as part of that vast whole of view and teaching, occur such passages as Eph 2 8.9 and Rom 11 33-36, and even the stern, or rather awestruck, phrases of Rom 9 20.21, where the potter and the clay are used in illustration.

V. Significations of Inquiry Here. Scope of Election.
—We have sought thus in the simplest outline to note first the word "election" and then some related Scriptural words and principles, weighing the witness they bear to a profound mystery in the action of the Divine in the spiritual sphere. What we have thus seen leaves still unasserted what, according to Scripture, is the goal and issue of the elective act. In this art, remembering that it is part of a Bible Encyclopaedia, we attempt no account of the history of thought upon election, in the successive Christian centuries, nor again any discussion of the relation of election in Scripture to extra-Scriptural philosophies, to theories of necessity, determination, fatalism. What we attempt to do as it happens before us in the Bible. Studying it so, we find that this mysterious action of God on man has relation, in the Christian revelation, to nothing short of the salvation of the individual (and of the community of such individuals) from sin and condemnation, and the preservation of the saved to life eternal. We find this not so much in any single passage as in the main stream of Bible language and tone on the subject of the Divine selective action. But it is remarkable that the recorded thought of Our Lord if true are we find assertions of this direction which could hardly be more explicit. See John 6 37, 44.45; 10 27-29. To the writer the best summary of the Scriptural evidence, at once definite and restrained, is the language of the 17th Anglican art: "They which were made of those who were called according to God's purpose by His Spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of His Son, even Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity."

VI. Perseverance. —The anxious problem of PERSEVERANCE will be treated under that word. It may be enough here to say that alike what we are permitted to read as revealed, and what we may humbly apprehend as the reason of the case, tend to the reverent belief that a perseverance (rather of the Lord than of the saints) is both taught and implied. But when we ponder the nature of the subject we are amply prepared for the large range of Scriptures which on the other hand condemn and preclude, for the humble disciple, so gross a misuse of the doctrine as would let it justify one moment's presumption upon Divine mercy in the heart which is at the same time sinning against the Divine love and holiness.

VII. Considerations in Relief of Thought. —We close, in view of this last remark, with some detached notes. We acknowledge the unspeakable trial which to many devout minds the word before us has always brought.

First in place and importance is the thought that a spiritual fact like election, which belongs to the innermost purport and work of the 1. Antithesis. Eternal, necessarily leads us to a region omimics where comprehension is impossible, and where we can only reverently apprehend. The doctrine passes upward to the sphere where antinomies live and move, where we must be content to hear that there are antinomies, but which are really various aspects of infinite truth. Let us be content to know that the Divine choice is sovereign; and also that "his tender mercies are over all his works," that "He will not the death of a sinner," that "God is love." Let us relieve the tension of such submissive reliance by reverently noting how the supreme antimony meets one type of human need with its one side, and with its other another. To the "fearful saint" the Divine sovereignty in love is a sacred cordial. To the seeking penitent the Divine compassion in love opens the door of peace. To the deluded theorist who does not love and obey, the warnings of a fall and ruin which are possible, humanly, from any spiritual height, are a merciful beacon on the rocks.

Further, we remember that election, in Scripture, is as different from the Stoic as the LXX from a foolish supposition of, e.g., the Stoics. It never appears as mechanical, or as a blind destiny.

Another thing has given us otherwise supreme proofs that He is all-good and all-kind. And it is related that, in ancient times, He has been but as a sinner. It is never presented as an arbitrary force majeure. Even in Rom 9 the "sinence" called for is as if not to say, "You are hopelessly passive in the grasp of infinite power;" but, "You, the creature, cannot judge your Maker, who must know infinitely more of cause and reason than his handiwork can know." The mystery, we may be sure, has behind it supreme right and reason, but in a region which at present at least we cannot penetrate. Again, election never appears as a violation of human will. For never in the Bible is man treated as irresponsible. In the Bible the relation of the human and Divine wills is inscrutable; the reality of both is assured.

Never is the doctrine presented apart from a moral context. It is intended manifestly to deepen man's submission to—not force, but—moral faith. In the practical experience of the soul its designed effect is to emphasize in the believer the consciousness (itself native to the true state of grace) that the whole of his salvation is due to the Divine mercy, no part of it to his merit, to his virtue, to his wisdom. In the sanctified soul, which alone, assuredly, can understand all of the mystery, the truth is designed to generate, together and in harmony, awe, thanksgiving and repose.

A necessary caution in view of the whole subject is that here, if anywhere in the regions of spiritual study, we inevitably "know in part," and in a very limited part. The treatment of election has at times in Christian history been carried on as if, less by the light of revelation than by logical process, we could tabulate or map the whole subject. Where this has been done, and where at the same time, under a sort of mental rather than spiritual fascination, election has been placed in the foreground of the system of religious thought, and allowed to dominate the rest, the truth (to say the least) too often has been distorted into an error. The Divine character has been beclouded in its beauty. Sovereignty has been divorced from love, and so defaced into an arbitrary fiat, which has for its only reason the assertion of omnipotence. Thus the grievous wrong has been done of aληθευό τις λέγων περι του Θεου, "defamation of God." For example, the revelation of a positive Divine selection has been made by inference to teach a corresponding rejection ruthless and terrible, as if the Eternal Love were ever by any possibility reject or crush even the faintest aspiration of the created spirit toward God. For such a thought not even the dark words of Rom 9 18 give Scriptural excuse. The case there in hand, Pharaoh's, is anything but a rational power of a human will in conflict with God and right. Once more, the subject is one as to which we must on principle be content with knowledge so fragmentary that its parts may seem contradictory in our present imperfect light. The one thing we may be sure of is that the veil is being lifted, and nothing can be hidden there which will really contradict the supreme and ruling truth that God is love.

Finally, let us from another side remember that here, as always in the things of the Spirit, "we know in part." The chosen multitude are the "sovereignly called, justified, glorified" (Rom 8 29.30). But Future is for that purpose in God's purpose for an end terminating in themselves. They are saved, and kept, and raised to the perfect state, for the service of their Lord. And not till the cloud is lifted from the unseen life can we possibly know what that service under eternal conditions will be. The law of the God of the universe, however, may well have been known to Ezekiel (E B s.v.). See also  Stones, Precious: Buying, IV.

EL-ELOH-YE-ISRAEL

el-eh-loh-ye-‘el, el-‘el“he-‘is-ra-el, el-‘el“he-‘is-ra-el, el‘i-r’el (from el, ‘el, "God," the God of Israel" in ARVm and AVm). Found only in Gen 33 20 as the name given to the altar erected at Shechem by Jacob, henceforth known as Israel, on the parcel of ground purchased by him from the inhabitants of Shechem, his first encampment of length and importance since the return to Canaan from the land of Ammon (Gen 33). This unusual combination of names has given occasion for much speculation and for various text emendations. Already the LXX sought to meet the difficulty by reading ουα-γείρα dol ‘el ‘el‘hē yārā‘el, and he called upon the God of Israel," instead of the use of the l bēr ‘el ‘el of MT, "and he called it El" etc. Wellhausen, followed by Dillmann, Driver and others, changes "altar" to "pillar," because the Heb. verb, הָקִיד, is used with הָקִיד, "pillar," in Gen 34 14-20, so making this religious act a parallel to that at Bethel. But Dittach, New Comm. on Gen, properly rejects this purely fanciful change, and understands the compound name as the altar’s inscription. Dillmann well suggests that "altar" or "pillar" is supplied, reading thus: "called it the altar of El, the God of Israel." The peculiar phrase is best and most readily understood in its close connection with the struggle at Peniel, recounted in Gen 32. Being victorious in that struggle, Jacob received the new name "Israel"; and to his first altar in Peniel he gave that name of God which appeared in his own new name, further explaining it by the appositive phrase "Elohe-Israel." Thus his altar was called, or dedicated to, "El, the God of Israel." Edward Mack

ELEMENT, e‘l-‘ment, ELEMENTS (rā stot’chē, tā stoichēla, "the letters of the alphabet," "the elements out of which all things are formed," "the heavenly bodies," "the fundamental principles of any art or science," one of the constituent parts of the physical universe ("elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat," ARVm "the heavenly bodies").")

(1) In 2 Pet 3 10, the component parts of the physical universe ("elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat," ARVm "the heavenly bodies").)

(2) In Gal 4 3, 9, RV has "rudiments," as in AVm, and in Col 2 8.20, where the reference is to imperfect Jewish ordinances. See Rudiments.

ELEPH (e-leph, há-eleph, "the ox"): A place in the lot of Benjamin not far from Jerus (Josh 18:28). The name is omitted by LXX, unless, indeed, it is combined with that of Zelah. It may be identical with Lifta, a village W. of Jerus (Conder, HDB, s.v.). Others identify Lifta with Nephtoah.

ELEPHANT, el'-f-ant (Job 40:15 AV [ARVm “hippopotamus,” RV “ivory”]; 1 K 10:23 AVv; 2 Ch 9:21 AVv; 1 Mac 3:34; 6:28 ff; 8:6): Possibly in Job it is the extinct mammoth. See Behemoth; Ivory.

ELEPHANTINE, el'-f-ant-ine. See SEVENNEH.

ELEUTHERUS, el'-i-th'er-us (Eլեթերος, Eletheros; 1 Mac 11:7; 12:30): A river separating Syria and Phoenicia.

ELEVEN, el'-lev'n, STARS. See ASTRONOMY.

ELEVEN, el'-lev'n, THE (οἱ δέκα, koi hendeuka): The eleven apostles remaining after the death of Judas. The definite art. used serves to designate them as a distinct and definite group whose integrity was not lost by the loss of one of the twelve. The college of “the Twelve” had come to be so well recognized that the gospel writers all used on occasions the word with the definite art. to represent the Twelve Apostles chosen by Jesus. This custom still remained and the numeral merely changed, as, “Afterward he was manifested unto the eleven” (Mk 16:14; cf Lk 24:33; Acts 2:14). On the other hand, however, the subset. is also sometimes used, as “The eleven disciples went into Galilee” (Mt 28:16; cf also Acts 1:26). As an illustration of the fixedness of usage, Paul refers to the eleven “as the twelve” when he recounts the appearances of Jesus after His resurrection: “And that he appeared to Cephas; then to the twelve” (1 Cor 15:5).

ELHANAN, el-ha'nan (אֶלְחָנָן, elḥānān, “whom God gave”): (1) A great warrior in the army of David who slew a Philii giant. There is a discrepancy between 2 Sa 21:19 and 1 Ch 20:5. In the former passage we read, “And there was again war with the Philis at Gez; and Elhanan, the son of Jaare-oregim the Beth-lehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver’s beam”; while in the latter we are told, “And there was again war with the Philis; and Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver’s beam.” Most modern critics prefer as the original text of the latter part of the two discrepant statements the following: “and Elhanan the son of Jair the Beth-lehemite slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver’s beam.” It is contended that the Chronicler slightly modified the text before him, in order to bring it into harmony with 1 Sa 17, where David is said to have slain a Philii giant Goliath. There is almost unanimous agreement that “Jaare-oregim is a corrupt reading, and the “Jair” in 1 Ch to is to be preferred. From Jerome to the present some scholars identify Elhanan with David, and thus remove the discrepancy. Ewald (Hist, III, 70) argued that the name “Goliath” was inserted in 1 Sa 17 and 21 by the narrators whose compositions are embodied in Samuel, Elhanan being the real victor over Goliath, while David’s antagonist was simply called “the Philistine.”

(2) The son of Dodo of Bethlehem, one of David’s mighty men (2 Sa 23:24; 1 Ch 11:26). Some moderns think that there was only one Elhanan, and that he was the son of Dodo of the clan of Jaar.

JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

ELI, el’i (אֵל, 'el; 'el): A descendant of Ithamar, the fourth son of Aaron, who exercised the office of high priest in Shiloh at the time of the birth of Samuel. For the first time in Israel, Eli combined in his own person the functions of high priest and judge, judging Israel for 40 years (1 Sa 4:18). The incidents in Eli’s life are few; indeed, the main interest of the narrative is in the other characters who are associated with him. The chief interest centers in Samuel. In Eli’s first interview with Hannah (1 Sa 1:12 ff), she is the central figure; in the second interview (1 Sa 2:1 ff), it is the child Samuel. When Eli next appears, it is as the father of Hophni and Phinehas, whose worthless and licentious lives had profaned their priestly office, and earned for them the title “men of Belial” (or “worthlessness”). Eli administered no stern rebuke to his sons, but only a gentle chiding of their greed and immorality. Thereafter he was warned by a nameless prophet of the downfall of his house, and of the death of his two sons in one day (1 Sa 2:27-30), a message later confirmed by Samuel, who had received this word directly from Jehovah (1 Sa 3:11 ff). The prophecy was not long in fulfillment. During the next invasion of the Philis, the Israelites were utterly routed, the ark of God was captured, and Hophni and Phinehas were both slain. When the news reached Eli, he was so overcome that he “fell from off his seat backward by the side of the gate; and his neck brake, and he died” (1 Sa 4:14). The character of Eli, while sincere and devout, seems to have been entirely lacking in firmness. He appears from the history to have been a good man, full of humility and gentleness, but weak and indulgent. His is not a strong personality; he is always overshadowed by some more commanding or interesting figure.

(2) A Reubenite, father of Dathan and Abiram (Nu 16:11; 26:8; Dt 1:6).

(3) Eldest son of Jesse and brother of David (1 S 16:6), once called Elihu (1 Ch 27:18). He was of commanding appearance (1 S 16:6), and when serving with Saul’s army at the time when it was confronting the Philis and, having slain a Philis, was about to judge it, he overthrew his brother David (17:28 f). His daughter Abihail became a wife of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11:18).

(4) An Ephraimite, an ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6:27); called Eliel in ver 64, and Elihu in 1 S 1:1.

(5) A Gadite warrior with David (1 Ch 12:9), one of eleven mighty men (vs 8:14).

(6) A Levite musician (1 Ch 15:18; 20:16).

(7) An ancestor of Judith (Jth 1:1; 9:2).

ELIADA, el’i-a-da, ELIADAH (אֵלְיָדָה, el’ı’adáh), “God is knowing.” Cf HPN, 219, 286, 301; E’velad Epida, or El’adah, Eliadah): (1) One of the sons of David (2 S 5:16; 1 Ch 3:8; called Beeliada, 1 Ch 14:7 [q.v.]).

(2) A descendant of Benjamin and a captain in the army of Jehoshaphat, commander of 200,000 men (2 Ch 17:17).

(3) Father of Rezon, an “adversary” of Solomon (1 K 11:23, AV “Eladiah”).

ELIADAS, el’i-a-das (E’laːdəs, Eliadas): A son of Zamoth who had married a strange wife (1 Esd 9:28); called Elioenai in Eze 10:27.

ELIADUN, el’i-a-du’n, RV ILIADUN (q.v.).
ELIAH, č-l'a. See ElijaH.

ELIAHBA, č-l'a-ba, č-l'a-ba (אֵלְיָהָבָא, 'elyah-ba' God hides'); One of David's 30 mighty men (2 S 23 32; 1 Ch 11 35).

ELIAM, č-l'a-'am ( אֵלְיָמ, 'el'ām, "people's God"): (1) Father of Bathsheba (2 S 11 3); in 1 Ch 3 called Ammiel. (2) One of David's "thirty," son of Athiophel the Gilonite (2 S 23 34).

ELIAONIAS, č-l'a-ō-ni's (אֵלְיָיוֹנִיָּאָס, Eliaōnias): A descendant of Phaath Moah (1 Esd 8 31); called "Elihoenai" in Ezra 8 4.

ELIAS, č-l'a-s. See Elijah.

ELIASAPH, č-l'a-saf (אֵלְיָסָפ, 'elyasaph, "God has added"): (1) Son of Deuel; prince of the tribe of Gad in the Exodus (Nu 1 14; 2 14; 7 42.47; 10 20). (2) Son of Lael; prince of the Gershonites (Nu 3 24).

ELIASHIB, č-l'a-shib (אֵלְיָשִּׁיב, 'elyashibh, "God restores"): (1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 24). (2) Head of the eleventh course of priests (1 Ch 24 12). (3) The high priest in the time of Nehemiah. He, with his brethren the priests, helped in the rebuilding of the wall (Neh 3 1). But later he was "allied unto Tobiah" the Ammonite (13 4) and allowed that enemy of Nehemiah the use of a great chamber in the temple (ver 5); and one of his grandsons, a son of Joiada, married a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite and was for this expelled from the community by Nehemiah (ver 28). See SANBALLAT.

(4, 5, 6) Three Israelites, one a "singer," who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 24.27.36).

(7) Father of Jehohanan (Ezr 10 6); probably identical with (3) above. Called Eliashih in 1 Esd 9 1. F. K. PARR ELIASIB, č-l'a-sib. See Eliashih.

ELIASIBUS, č-l'a-si'bus (אֵלְיָאִיבּוּס, Elidasbos, AV Elisezuros): One of the holy singers who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 24); called "Eliashib" in Ezra 10 27.

ELIASIMUS, č-l'a-si'nums (אֵלְיָאִיסִיִּמְס, Elidasimos, AV Elisimus): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 25).

ELIASIS, č-l'a-sis (אֵלְיָאִיס, Eliasia): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 34); corresponds to "Jaaesu" in Ezra 10 37.

ELIATHAH, č-l'a-th (אֵלְיָתָח, 'el'athāh, "God has come"): A Hemanite, head of the twentieth division of the temple musicians (1 Ch 25 4.27).

ELIDAD, č-l'dad (אֵלְיָדָד, 'elidād, "God has loved"): Prince of Benjamin in the division of the land (Nu 31 21); perhaps the same as ELAD (q. v.).

ELIEHOENAI, č-l'-ē-hō'-ēn (אֵלְיֵהוֹהֵנָי, 'elyhōnay, "to Jeh are mine eyes"): (1) (AV Elioenai) a Korahite doorkeeper (1 Ch 26 3). (2) (AV Elihoenai) Head of a family in the Return (Ezr 8 4).

ELIEL, č-l'ēl, č-l'ēl (אֵלֵיֵל, 'elēl, "El is God," or "my God is God"): (1, 2, 3) Mighty men of David (1 Ch 11 46.47; 12 11). (4) A chief of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Ch 5 24). (5, 6) Two chiefs of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 20.22). (7) A chief Levite from Hebron (1 Ch 15 9.11). (8) A Kohathite in the line of Elkanah, Samuel and Heman (1 Ch 6 34); see ELIA 4. (9) A Levite of the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 13).

ELIENAI, el-'ē-nē'-ā (אֵלְיֵנֵא, 'elīnay): A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8 20).

ELIEZER, el-'ē-z'er, el-'ē-z'r (אֵלְיֵזֶר, 'elīzer; AV Elipser, Eliezir, "God is help"): (1) The chief servant of Abram (Gen 16 2); ARV "Eliezer of Damascus," ERV "Dammasik Eliezer." The Heb is peculiar: lit. "And the son of the possession [meshebek] of my house is Dammasik [of] Eliezer." A possible but unlikely meaning is that his property would become the possession of Damascus, the palace of Eliezer. Tg Syr (RVM) read "Eliezer the Damascene": this supposes a reading, "Eliezer ha-dammasek" or "mid-dammasek." The text may be corrupt: the assurance between meshebek and Dammasek is suspicious. Abram calls Eliezer "one born in my house," i.e. a dependant, a member of his household, and so regards him as a heir, Lot having gone from him (Gen 13). Eliezer is probably the servant, "the elder of his house, that ruled over all that he had," of Gen 24.
(2) The 2d son of Moses and Zipporah, called thus for "the God of my father was my help, and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh" (Ex 18 4; 1 Ch 23 15 ff).
(3) A son of Becher, one of the sons of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 8).
(4) A priest who assisted in bringing up the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerus (1 Ch 15 24).
(5) The son of Zichri, ruler over the Reubenites in the time of David (1 Ch 27 16).
(6) The son of Dodavahu of Mareshah who prophesied the destruction of the ships which Je-hoshaphat, king of Judah, built, because he had done so in cooperation with Ahaziah, king of Israel (2 Ch 20 35 ff).
(7) One of the messengers whom Ezra sent to Iddo, the chief at Casiphia, with the request for ministers for the Temple (Ezr 8 16 ff).
(8) 9, 10) A priest, a Levite, and one of the sons of Harim who had married non-Israelitish women (Ezr 10 18-23.31).

ELIHU (ךִּלֹה). "Hēli; Haitou, Haitou, "He is [my] God"); Elāū, Elāouis): One of the disputants in the Book of Job; a young man who, having listened in silence to the arguments of Job and his friends, is moved to prolong the discussion and from his just views of truth set both parties right. He is of the tribe of Buz (cf Gen 22 21), a brother-tribe to that of Us, and of the family of Ram, or Aram, that is, an Aramaean. He is not mentioned as one of the characters of the story until ch 32; and then, as the friends are silenced and Job's words are ended, Elihu has the whole field to himself, until the theophany of the whirlwind proves too portentous for him to bear. His four speeches take up chs 32-37. Some critics have considered that the Elihu portion of the Book of Job was added by a later hand, and urge obsccurities and perplexities, as well as a different style, to prove that it was the work of an inferior writer. This estimate seems, however, to take into account only the part it plays in the discussion, and not the whole. It is a skillfully managed agency in preparing the dénouement. Consider the situation at the end of Job's words (31 40). Job has vindicated his integrity and stands ready to present his cause to God (31-37). The friends, however, have exhausted their resources, and through three discourses have been silent, as it were, smitten out of existence. Then, at this point, that Elihu is introduced, to renew their contention with young construction, and represent their case (as he deems) better than they can themselves. He is essentially at one with them in condemning Job (34-37), but his only quarrel with them is on the score of the inconclusiveness of their arguments (32 3.5). His self-portrayal is conceived in a decided spirit of satire on the part of the writer, not unmingled with a sardonic humor. He is very egotistic, very sure of the value of his ideas; much of his alleged prolixity is due to that voluble self-deprecation which betrays an inordinate opinion of oneself (cf 32 6-22). This, whether inferior composition or not, admirably adapts his words to his character. For substance of discourse he adds materially what the friends have said, but in a more rationalistic vein; speaks edifyingly, as the friends have not done, of the disciplinary value of affliction, and of God's means of revelation by dreams and visions and the interpreting of an inner heavenly mystery (33 13-28). Yet evidently, however, his ego is the center of his system; it is he who turns up as Job's mediator (33 5-7; cf 9 32-35), and his sage remarks on God's power and wisdom in Nature are full of self-importance. All this seems designed to accentuate the almost ludicrous humiliation of his collapse when from a natural phenomenon the oncoming tempest shows unusual and supernatural signs. His words become disjointed and incoherent, and cease with a kind of attempt to retrace his pretensions. And the verdict from the whirlwind is: "darkened counsel by words without knowledge." Elihu thus has a real function in the story, as honorable as overweening self-confidence is apt to be. JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

LITERATURE.

(1) The great prophet of the times of Ahab, king of Israel. E. is identified at his first appearance (1 K 17 1) as "E. the Tishbeh, who was of the sojourners of Gilead." Thus his native place must have been called Tishbeh. A Tishbeh (Thisseb) is in the territory of Naphtali, a place known from Tob 1 2, but if (with most modern commentators) the reading of the LXX in 1 K is followed, the word τῆς sojourners" is itself "Tishbeh," locating the place in Gilead and making the prophet a native of that mountain region and not merely a "sojourner" there.

I. THE WORKS OF ELIJAH.—In 1 K 16 29-34 we read of the impetuous Ahab, culminating in his patronage of the worship of the Tyrian Baal, god of Tyrian queen Jezebel. In 21, we read of an instance of the little weight attached in Ahab's time to ancient prophetic threatenings, the rebuilding by Hiel the Bethelite of the hallowed city of Jericho, with the "loss" of Hiel's eldest and youngest sons. elijah

2) Ver 34 mentions as another instance of the light weight attached in Ahab's time to ancient prophetic threatenings, the rebuilding by Hiel the Bethelite of the hallowed city of Jericho, "with the "loss" of Hiel's eldest and youngest sons. This is the situation which calls for a judgment of Jeh, announced beforehand, as is often the case, by a faithful prophet of Jeh.
Whether E. was already a familiar figure at the court of Ahab, the narrative beginning with 1 K 17 does not state. His garb and manner identified him as a prophet, in any case E. declared of the few words that Jeh, true and only rightful King of Israel, whose messenger he was, was even at the very time sending a drought which should continue until the prophet himself declared it at an end. The term is to be fixed, indeed, not by E. but by Jeh; it is not to be short ("these years"), and it is to continue only when the challenge of the drought is sufficient. Guided, as true prophets were continually, by the "word of Jeh," E. then hid himself in one of the ravines east of ("before") the Jordan, where the brook Cherith afforded him water, and ravens brought him abundant food ("bread and flesh" twice daily), 1 K 17 2-6. As the drought advanced the brook dried up. E. was then directed, by the "word of Jeh," as constantly, to betake himself beyond the western limit of Ahab's kingdom to the Phoenician villages near Zarephath, where the widow to whom Jeh sent him was found gathering a few sticks from the ground at the city gate, to prepare a last meal for herself and her son. She yielded to the prophet's command that he should be first fed from her beauty and family. The prophet enjoyed the fulfillment of his promise, uttered in the name of Jeh, that neither barrel of meal nor cask of oil should be exhausted before the breaking of the drought. (1 K 17 16-17; 2 K 4 37-44; Jgs 16 17—give three years and six months as the length of the drought), E. was directed to show himself to Ahab as the herald of rain from Jeh. How sorely both man and beast in Israel were pressed by drought and the resulting famine, is shown by the fact that King Ahab and his chief steward Obadiah were in person searching through the land for any patches of verdure, or green vegetable that the drought, extended to Phoenicia and continued there for a full year.) But when the widow's son fell sick and died, the mother regarded it as a Divine judgment upon her sins, a judgment which had been drawn upon her by the harvest reapings of her father (and the prophet directed to the mourning E. to return the child to the child) vs 17-24.

"In the third year," 1 K 18 1 (lk 4 25; Jgs 5 17 give three years and six months as the length of the drought), E. was directed to show himself to Ahab as the herald of rain from Jeh. to take his stand upon the sacred mount; and Jeh was heralded by tempest, earthquake and thunderstorm (vs 9–12). These were Jeh's forerunners only; Jeh was not in them, but in the "still small voice," such as the prophets were accustomed to hear within their souls. When E. heard the not unfrequent inner voice, he recognized Jeh present to hear and answer him. E. seems to be seeking to justify his own retreat to the wilderness by the plea that he had been "very jealous," had done in Jeh's cause all that mortal prophet could do, before he fled, yet all in vain! The same people who had forsaken the law and "covenant" of Jeh, thrown down His altars and slain His prophets, would have allowed the slaughter of E. himself at the command of Jezebel; and in him would have perished the last true servant of Jeh in all the land of Israel (vs 13.14).

Divine compassion passed by E.'s complaint in order to give him directions for further work in Jeh's cause. E. must anoint Hazael to seize the throne of Syria, Israel's worst enemy among the neighboring powers; Jehu, in like manner, he must anoint to put an end to the dynasty of Ahab and assume the throne of Israel; and Elisha, to be his own successor in the prophetic office. These three, Hazael and his Syrians, Jehu and his followers, even Elijah himself, were enemies to all civil and religious order upon the idolaters and the scorners in Israel. Jeh will leave Himself 7,000 (a round number, a limited but not an excessively small one, conveying a doctrine, like the doctrine of later prophets, of the salvation of a remnant) to express his judgment upon the idolaters and the scorners in Israel. Jeh will rebuke all 7,000, it was only in the contrast between the 7,000 faithful and the one, himself, which he believed to number all the righteous of Israel.

The anointing of Hazael and of Jehu seems to have been left to E.'s successor: indeed, we read of no anointing of Hazael, but only of a significant interview between that worthy and Elisha (2 K 8.7–15).

4. The Case of Naboth. E. next appears in the narrative as rebucker of Ahab for the judicial murder of Naboth. In the very piece of ground which the king had coveted and seized, the prophet appeared, unexpectedly and uninvited, and bounded upon Ahab, Jezebel and all their house the doom of a shameful death (1 K 21). There was present at this scene, in attendance upon the king, a captain named Jehu, the very man already chosen as the successor of Ahab, and he never forgot what he then saw and heard (2 K 9.25,26).

Ahab's penitence (1 K 21.28,29) averted from himself some measure of the doom. His son Ahaziah, pursued it down upon his own head. Sick unto death from injuries and received in a fall, Ahaziah sent to ask Ahaziah an oracle concerning his recovery at the shrine of Baal-zeph in Ekron. E. met the messenger with a rebuke and a prediction, not from Baal-zeph but from Jeh, of impending death. Ahaziah recognized by the messengers' description the ancient "enemy" of his house. A captain and fifty soldiers sent to arrest the prophet were consumed by E. from without as E.'s word. A second captain with another fifty met the same fate. A third besought the prophet to spare his life, and E. went with him to the king, but only to repeat the words of doom (2 K 2). A foreboding, shared by the "sons of the prophets" at Bethel and Nob, warned E. that the closing scene of his earthly life was at hand.

5. Elijah. E. desired to meet the end, come in Translated what form it might, alone. Elisha, however, bound himself by an oath not to leave his master. E. divided Jordan with the stroke of his mantle, that the two might pass over toward the wilderness on the east. Elisha asked that he might receive a firstborn's portion of the spirit which rested upon his master. "A chariot of fire, and horses of fire" appeared, and parted the two assurer; "and E. went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2 K 2.1–11).

In 2 Ch 21.12–15 we read of a "writing" from E. to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. The statements of 2 K 3.11.12 admit of no other interpretation than that Elisha prophetic work had already occurred in the lifetime of Jehoshaphat. It has been pointed out that the difficult verse, 2 K 8.16, appears to mean that Jehoram began to reign at some time before the death of his father; it is also conceivable that E. left a message, reduced to writing either before or after his departure, for the future king of Judah who should depart from the true faith.

II. The Work of Elijah.—One's estimate of the importance of the work of E. depends upon one's conception of the condition of things which the prophet confronted in Northern Israel. While it is true that the reign of Ahab was outwardly prosperous, and the king himself not without a measure of sagacity, yet the measure of his religious policy at best involved such tolerance of false faiths as could lead only to disaster. Ever since the time of Joshua, the religion of Jeh had been waging its combat with the old Canaanite worship, of the powers of the earth, the gods of Baal, of Astarte, of the Baalim or "lords" of this and that neighborhood, whose ancient altars stood "upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree" (Dt 12.2). The god imported from Phoenicia by Jezebel bore about her character and his worship were worse and more debasing than anything that had before been known. Resistance offered by the servants of Jeh to the claims of the queen's favored god led to persecution, rightly ascribed by the historian to Jezebel (1 K 18.4). In the face of this danger, the differences between the worship of Jeh as carried on in the Northern Kingdom and the same worship as practiced at Jerusalem, cut out of sight, until it was E.'s task to recall the people from the Tyrian Baal to Jeh, the God of their fathers. The vitality of the true religion in the crisis is shown by the fidelity of such a man as Obadiah (1 K 18.3f), or by the perseverance of a righteous man, however, the apostacy of the house of Jehu, the eyes, of all that had happened of persecution (19.18). The work begun by E. was finished, not without blood, by Jehu; we hear no more of the worship of the Tyrian Baal in Israel after that anointed usurper's time (2 K 9.10). To say that E. at Horeb "learns the gentleness of God" (Strachan in HDB) is to contradict the immediate text of the narrative and the history of the times. The direction given E. that he should anoint one man to seize the throne of Syria, and another to succeed to Elisha's throne, and a prophet to continue his own work, with the promise and prediction that these three forces should unite in executing upon guilty Israel the judgment still due for its apostasy from Jeh and its worship of a false god, without a measure of peace; the very vision of peace was hidden from his eyes, reserved for later prophets for whom he could but prepare the way. It was his mission to destroy at whatever cost the heathen worship which else would have destroyed Israel itself, with consequences whose evil we cannot estimate, and which had would have had no standing-ground had it not been for the work of E. and the influences which at Divine direction he put in operation.

III. Character of the Prophet.—It is obvious that the Scripture historian does not intend to furnish us with a character-study of the prophet E. Does he furnish adequate material upon which such a study may profitably be attempted? This question is found in Jas 5 17, "E. was a man of like passions [m "nature"] with us," is brief indeed; but examination of the books which have been written upon the life of E. leads to the conclusion that it is possible to err by attaching to events meanings in which those events were never intended to bear, as well as by introducing into one's study too much of sheer imagination. It is easy, for example, to observe that E. is introduced to the reader with suddenness; he has appeared in the narrative, his "training" in the narrative seem abrupt; but is one warranted in arguing from this a like abruptness in the prophet's character? Is not the sufficient explanation to be reached by observing that the historian's purpose was not to give a complete biography of any individual, whether prophet or king, but to display the working of Jeh upon and with the kingdoms of Israel and Judah through the prophets? Few personal details are therefore to be found recorded concerning even such a prophet as E.; and most at all, unless they have a direct bearing upon his message. The imagination of some has discerned a "training of E." in the experiences of the prophet; but to admit that there must have been such a training is to oblige us to discover traces of it in the scenes and incidents which we have recorded. Distrusting, for the reasons above suggested, any attempt at a detailed representation of the prophet's inner life, one may seek, and prize, what seems to lie on the surface of the narrative: faith in Jeh as God of Nature and as covenant God of the patriarchs and their descendents; consuming "zeal" against the false religion which would displace Jeh from the place which must be His alone; keen vision to perceive hypocrisy and falsehood, and sharp wit to lash them, with the same boldness and disregard of self that must needs mark the true prophet in any age.

IV. Miracles in the Elijah Narratives.—The miraculous element must be admitted to be prominent in the experiences and works of E. It cannot be estimated apart from the general position which the student finds it possible to hold concerning miracles recorded in the OT. The effort to explain away the supernatural by a naturalistic way seems wholly unprofitable. E.'s "ravens" may indeed be converted by a change of vowel-points into "Arabians"; but, in spite of the fact that Orientals would bring offerings of food to a holy hermit, the whole tenor of the narrative favors no other supposition than that which its writer means "ravens," and saw in the event another such exercise of the power of Jeh over all things as was to be seen in the supply of meal and oil for the prophet and the widow of Zarephath, the fire from heaven, the parting of the Jordan, or the ascension of the prophet by a whirlwind into heaven. Some modern critics recognize a different and later source in the narrative of 2 K 1; but here again no real difficulty, if any difficulty there be, is removed. The stern prophet who would ordain the death of Elishah to whom the angel of the Lord appeared, who might well call down fire to consume the soldiers of an apostate and a hostile king. The purpose and meaning of the E. chapters is to be grasped by those who accept their author's conception of Jeh, of His providence over Nature and affairs, and bread with measure rather than by those who seek to place that conception by another.

V. Elijah in the NT.—Malachi (4 5) names E. as the forerunner of the "great and terrible day of Jeh," and the expectation of that event is anticipated in Mt 6 15 | Mk 8 15 | Lk 9 8 | Mt 16 14 | Mk 8 27 | Lk 9 19 | Mt 27 47-49 | Mk 16 35-36. The interpretation of Malachi's prophecy fore-shadowed in the angelic announcement to Zacharias (Lk 1 17), that John the Baptist should do the work of another Elijah, is given on the authority of Jesus Himself (Mt 11 14). The appearance of E., with Moses, on the Mt. of Transfiguration, is recorded in Mt 17 1-13 | Mk 9 2-13 | Lk 9 28-36, and in Mt 11 14 | Mk 9 13 Jesus again identifies the E. of Malachi with John the Baptist. The fate of the soldiers of Ahaziah (2 K 1) is in the mind of James and John on one occasion (Lk 9 54). Jesus Himself alludes to E. and his sojourn in the land of Sidon (Lk 4 25-26). Paul makes use of the prophet's epithet for the epistle to the Hebrews (Rom 11 14). In Jas 5 17 the work of E. affords an instance of the powerful supplication of a righteous man.

He lived during the period of the Judges, had a hereditary possession near Bethlehem, and is chiefly known as the husband of Naomi, the mother-in-law of Ruth and ancestress of David the king. Because of a severe famine in Judaea, he emigrated to the land of Moab with his wife and his sons, Mahlon and Chilion. Not long afterward he died, and his two sons married Moabite women, Ruth and Orpah. Ten years in all were spent in Moab, when the two sons died, and the three widows were left. Soon afterward Naomi decided to return to Judah, and the sequel is told in the Book of Ruth. See Ruth; Naomi.

ELIPHAZ: The first and most prominent of the three friends of Job (Job 2 11), who come from distant places to condole with and comfort him, when they hear of his affliction. That he is to be regarded as their leader and spokesman is shown by the greater weight and originality of his speeches (contained in chs 4, 5, 16, 22), the speeches of the other friends being in fact largely echoes and emotional enforcements of his thoughts, and by the fact that he is taken as their representative (Job 42 7) when, after the address from the whirlwind, Jehovah appoints their expiation for the wrong done to Job and to the truth. He is represented as a venerable and benignant sage from Teman in Idumea, a place named for its wisdom (cf Jer 49 7), as was also the whole land of Edom (cf Ob ver 8); and doubtless it is the writer’s design to make his words typical of the best wisdom of the world. This wisdom is the result of ages of thought and experience (cf Job 15 1-3, 5 14-15), of which Job is accused for his wisdom (cf 4 7-11), which cause he makes broad enough to include innate impurity and depravity (4 17-19); evinces a quietism which depresses Job’s self-destructing ebullitions of wrath (5 2.3; cf Job’s answer for its wisdom (cf 4); and promises restoration as the result of penitence and submission. In his second speech he is irritated because Job’s blasphemous words are calculated to hinder devotion (16 4), attributes them to impurity (vs 5,6), reiterates his depravity doctrine (vs 14-16), and initiates the lurid descriptions of the wicked man’s fate, in which the friends go on to overstate their case (16 20-35). In the third speech he is moved by the exigencies of his theory to impute actual frauds and crimes to Job, and accuses him of because God was too far away to see (22 5-15); but as a close holds open to him still the way of penitence, abjuring of impurity, and restoration to peace and health (23 21-30). His utterances are well composed and judicial (see coldly academic, Job thinks, 16 4 ff). full of good religious counsel abstracly considered. Their error is in their invertebrate presupposition of Job’s wickedness, their unsympathetic clinging to theory in the face of facts, and the supressing of the human element.

GENERAL ESTIMATE

LITERATURE
A prophet, the disciple and successor of Elijah. He was the son of Shaphat, lived at Abel-meholah, at the northern end of the Jordan valley and a little S. of the Sea of Galilee. Nothing is told of his parents but the father’s name, though he must have been a man of some wealth and doubtless of earnest piety. The hint is given of Elisha’s age or birthplace. and it is almost certain that he was born and reared at Abel-meholah, and was a comparatively young man when we first hear of him. His early life thus was spent on his father’s estate, in a godly family, and had perhaps been associated with many of God’s prophets. His moral and religious nature was highly developed in such surroundings, and from his work on his father’s farm he was called to his training as a prophet and successor of Elijah.

I. HIS CALL AND PREPARATION—The first mention of him occurs in 1 K 19 16. Elisha was at Horeb, learning perhaps the greatest lesson of his life; and one of the three duties with which he was charged was to anoint Elisha, the son of Shaphat of Abelmeholah, as prophet in his stead.

Elisha soon went northward and as he passed the lands of Shaphat he saw Eliaia plowing in the rich level field of his father’s farm. Twelve

1. His Call yoke of oxen were at work, Elisha was his assistant, and plowing with the tenth yoke.

Crossing over to him Elijah threw his mantle upon the young man (1 K 19 19). Elisha seemed to understand the meaning of the symbolic act, and was for a moment overwhelmed with its significance. But it was his manner not to deliberate but to act. He was an anointed successor of Elijah in the prophetical office. Naturally he would hesitate a moment before making such an important decision. As Elijah strode on, Elisha felt the irresistible force of the call of God and ran after the great prophet, announcing that he was ready to follow, only he wished to give a parting kiss to his father and mother (19 20). Elisha seemed to realize what it meant to the young man, and bade him “Go back again; for what have I done to thee?” The call was set aside. But Elisha seemed to think, and the response had better be deliberate and voluntary. But Elisha had fully made up his mind, slew the yoke of oxen with which he was plowing, boiled their flesh with the wood of the implements he was using, and made a farewell feast for his friends. He then followed Elijah, making a full renunciation of home ties, comforts and privileges. He became Elijah’s servant; and we have but one statement describing their relationship (2 K 3 11): “he poured water on the hands of Elijah.”

They seem to have spent several years together (1 K 22 1; 2 K 1 17), for Elisha became well known among the various schools of the prophets. While ministering to the need of the people, Elisha learned many deep and important lessons, imbued much of his spirit, and developed his own rare capacity for effective, efficient work. Until he was ready for the prophetic service himself. It seems almost certain that they lived among the schools of the prophets, and not in the mountains and hilles as Elijah had previously done. During these years the tie between the two men became very deep and strong. They were years of great signification to both the prophet and of careful teaching on the part of the elder. The lesson learned at Horeb was not forgotten and its meaning would be profoundly impressed upon the mind of the younger man. The whole afterlife shows that he had deeply imbied the teaching.

The final scene shows the strong and tender affection he cherished toward his master. Aware that the end was near, he determined to be with him until the last. Nothing could persuade him to leave Elijah.

3. The Parting
Gift of When asked what should be done for Elijah, he asks for the elder son's portion, a double portion, of his master's spirit (2 K 2:9). He has no thought of taking an inheritance; the following firstborn son. The request shows how deeply he had imbied of his master's spirit already. His great teacher disappears in a whirlwind, and, awestruck by the wonderful sight, Elisha rends his clothes, takes up the girdle of Elijah, and places his shoe to the Jordan, smites the waters to test whether the spirit of Elijah had really fallen upon him, and as the water parts, he passes over dry shod. The sons of the prophets who have been watching the proceeding, are at once overcome, that the spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisha, and they bowed before him in reverence and submission (2 K 2:12-15).

Elisha now begins his prophetic career which must have lasted 50 years, for it extended over the reign of Jehu, Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah (2 K 3:1). The change in him is so manifest that he is universally recognized as Elijah's successor and the religious leader of the prophetic schools. The skepticism of the young prophets regarding the translation of Elijah found little sympathy with Elisha, but he is conciliatory and humors them (2 K 2:16-18).

II. His Prophetic Career.

1. Record of His Career

1. Record of his prophetic career is found in 2 K 3:1-25. There are no strict chronological order. Like other Scripture writers he has followed the system of grouping his materials. The events in 2 K 3:1-25 are probably in the order of their occurrence. The events He is now on a mission of mercy and healing and in the spirit of Elijah, and once in the face of the Jordan in the spirit of Elijah, and this is the time of his first interview with Elisha (2 K 13:14-19) which event occurred some years previously.

When he began his career of service he carried the mantle of Elijah, but we read no more of that mantle; he is arrayed as a right-handed citizen (2 K 2:12) in common garments (brikkâdâmah). He carries a walking-staff of ordinary citizens, using it for working miracles (2 K 4:29).

2. His Ministry in 2 K 4:28-37. He is sent, and the two cities, sojourning at Bethel or Jericho with the sons of the prophets, or dwelling in his own home in Dothan or Samaria (2 K 4:24-32). He passed Shunem so frequently on foot that a prophet's chamber was built for his special use (4:8-11).

One of these possessed certain noxious qualities, and complaint is made to Elisha that it is unfit for divine service, and he takes a piece of salt from the new vessel, casts it into the spring and the waters are healed so that there was no longer any death or miscarriage (2:21).

(2) Leaving Jericho, 'a pleasant situation,' he passes up to the highlands of Ephraim, doubtless by the Wady Suweinit, and approaches Bethel, a seat of Baal worship and headquarters of idolatry. The bald head, or perhaps merely cropped head, of Elisha, in contrast with the well-grown and full head, the ridicule of some 'young lads out of the city,' who called after him 'Go up thou baldhead,' their taunt manifesting the most blatant profanity and utter disregard of God or anything sacred. Elisha, justly angered, turned and cursed them in the name of Jehovah. Two years soon break forth from the woods of that wild region and make fearful havoc among the boys. Elisha may have shown severity and a vindictiveness in this, but he was in no way blaming for the punishment which overtook the boys. He had nothing to do with the bears and was in no way responsible for the fate of the lads. The Sept adds that they threw stones, and the rabbis tell how E. was himself punished, but these attempts to tone down the affair are uncalled for and useless (2:23-24).

(3) From Bethel E. passed on to Mt. Carmel, the home of a school of the prophets, spent some time there and returned to Samaria the capital (2:25). His next deed of mercy was to relieve the pressing need of a want of one of the prophets. The name of the place is not given (4:1-7).

(4) On his many journeys up and down the country, he frequently passed by the village of Shunem, on the slopes of 'Little Hermon.' The modern name is Tell el-Far'ah. It was about three miles from Jezreel. Acustomed to accept hospitality of one of the women of the place, he so impressed her with his sanctity that she appealed to her husband to build a chamber for the 'Holiest of men of God,' that passeth by us continually (4:8). The chamber was built and in return for this hospitality a son was born to the woman, who suddenly dies in early boyhood and is restored to life by the prophet (4:8-37).

(5) E. is next at Gilgal, residing with the sons of the prophets. It is a time of famine and they are subsisting on what they can find. One of them finds some wild gourds (pâkêšu'dâh), shreds them into the pot and they are cooked. The men have no sooner begun to eat than they taste the poison and cry to Elisha, 'O man of God, there is death in this pot.' Throwing in some meal, E. at once renders the dish harmless and wholesome (4:38-41).

(6) Probably at about the same time and place and during the same famine, a man from Baal-shalisha brings to the prophet a measure of lentils and twenty loaves of fresh barley bread and fresh ears of grain. Unselfishly E. commands that it be given to the people to eat. The servant declared it was altogether insufficient for a hundred men, but E. predicts that there will be enough and to spare (4:42-44). This miracle closely resembles the two miracles of Jesus.

(7) The next incident is the healing of Naaman, the leprous commander of the Syrian army (5:1-19). He is afflicted with the white leprosy, the leprosy of the leprous kind (ver 27). A Jewish maiden, captured in one of their numerous invasions of Eastern Pal. and sold into slavery with a multitude of others, tells her mistress, the wife of Naaman, about the wonder-working Elisha. The maiden tells her mistress that Elisha can heal the leprosy, and Naaman resolves to visit him. Through the king he obtains permission to visit E. with a great train and rich presents. The prophet sends his servant to tell him to dip seven times in the Jordan and he will be healed. Naaman is angered at the lack of deference on the part of Elisha and turns away in a rage to go home. Better counsels prevail, and he obeys the prophet and is cured. E. absolutely refuses the rich presents Naaman offers, and permits the Syrian to take some earth from Jeho's land, that he may build an altar in Syria and worship Jeh there. The idea was that a God was localized and could be worshiped by the local people. E. gains Naaman permission apparently to worship Rimmon while avowedly he is a worshipper of Jeh. The prophet appreciates the difficulties in Naaman’s path, believes in his sincerity, and by this concession in no way proves that he believes in the actual existence of a god named Rimmon, or that Jeh was confined to his own land, or in any way sanctions idolatrous worship. He is conciliatory and tolerant, making the best of the situation.

(6) An act of treachery on the part of Elisha follows, but it was richly deserved. Gehazi’s true character now manifests itself. He covets the rich presents brought by Naaman, runs after him, and by a clever story secures a rich present from the general. E. divines his trick and deems him and his family to be afflicted with Naaman’s leprosy forever (5:20-27).

(9) A group of the sons of the prophets, probably at Jericho, finding their quarters too small, determine to build new quarters near the Jordan. While felling the timber the ax-head of one, a borrowed tool, fell into the water and disappeared. It would have been useless to have attempted to search for it in that swift and muddy stream, so he cries in despair: Elisha, his servant strewing it in the spot where the ax fell, and makes the iron swim on the surface (6:1-7).

Elisha’s services to his king and country were numerous and significant.

3. His Ministry in a Public and National Capacity

(1) The first one recorded took place during the attempt of Jehoram to resubjugate Moab which had revolted under King Mesha. In company with Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom his southern neighbors, the banded hosts found themselves without water in the wilderness of Edom. The situation is desperate. Jehoram appeals to Jehoshaphat, and on discovering that Elisha was in the camp all three kings appeal to him in their extremity. He refuses any help to Jehoram, biding him appeal to the prophets of his father Ahab and his mother Jezebel. For Jehoshaphat’s sake he will help, calls for a minstrel, and under the spell of the music recites the psalm: Of the fool have I said foolishness, and of the cunning man have I said madness. He orders them to dig trenches to hold the water which shall surely come on the morrow from the land of Edom and without rain. He moreover predicted that Moab would be utterly defeated. These predictions are fulfilled, Mesha is captured, and in desperation sacrifices his firstborn son and heir on the walls in sight of all Israel. In great horror the Israelites withdraw, leaving Mesha in possession (5:4-27).

(2) His next services occurred at Samaria. The king of Syria sends a large army to capture him. Surrounded by night, E. is in no way terrified as his servant is, but prays that the young man’s eyes may be opened to see the mountains full of the chariots and horses of Jeh. Going forth to meet the Syrians as they close in, E. prays that they may be stricken with blindness. The word sam’ūrīm is used only here and in Gen 19:11 and probably means mental blindness, or bewilderment, a confusion of mind amounting to illusion. He now tells them the place to go, and they will lead them to the right place. They follow him into the very heart of Samaria and into the power of the king. The latter would have smitten them, but is rebuked by E. who counseled that they be fed and sent away (2 Kgs 5:8-23). Impressed by such mysterious power and strange clemency the Syrians depart.

(3) The next incident must have occurred some time previous, or some time after these events. Samaria is besieged, the Israelites are encouraged to defend their capital to the last, famine prevails, and mothers begin to cock their children and eat them. The king in horror and rage will wreak vengeance on Elisha. The latter divines his purpose, anticipates any action on the king’s part, and predicts that there will be abundance of food on the morrow. That night a great host. They imagined they heard the Hittites coming against them, and fled in headlong rout toward the Jordan. Four lepers discover the deserted camp and report the fact to the king. He suspects an ambush, but is persuaded to send a few men to reconnoitre. They find the camp deserted and treasures strewing the path right to the Jordan. The Samaritans lose no time in plundering the camp and Elisha’s predictions are fulfilled to the letter (6:24-7).

(4) The prophet’s next act was one of great significance. It was the carrying out of the first order given to Elijah at Horeb, and the time seemed ripe for it. He proceeds north to Damascas and finds Benhadad sick. Elisha sends a rich present by the hands of his chief captain Hazael and inquires whether he will recover. Elisha gives a double answer. He will recover, the disease will not be fatal, yet he will die. Fixing his eyes on Hazael, E. sees his heir and successor to Benhadad who will be a terrible scourge to Israel. The man of God weeps, the chief captain is ashamed, and when told of what he shall do, represents himself as a dog and not able to do such things. But the prophet is too enterprising; he tells Benhadad he will recover, and on the morrow smothers him and succeeds to the throne (7:7-15).

(5) The next move of E. was even more significant. It is the fulfilling of the second order given Elijah at Mt. Horeb. The Israelites are fighting the Syrians in defense of Ramoth-gilead. The king, Jehoram, is wounded and returns home to Jezreel to recover. E. seizes on the opportune moment to have the house of Ahab avenged for its many sins. He orders his men to dig trenches to hold the water which shall surely come on the morrow from the land of Edom and without rain. He moreover predicted that Moab would be utterly defeated. These predictions are fulfilled, Mesha is captured, and in desperation sacrifices his firstborn son and heir on the walls in sight of all Israel. In great horror the Israelites withdraw, leaving Mesha in possession (5:4-27).

(6) Elisha retains his fervent and patriotic spirit until the last. His final act is in keeping with his long life of generous deeds and faithful patriotic service. He is on his death bed, having witnessed the fearful oppressions of Israel by Hazael who made Israelites as dust under his feet. The young king Joash visits him, weeps over him, calling him, “My father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof.” The dying prophet bids him take his bow and arrow to the Syro-gilead place, but he will lead them to the right place. They follow him into the very heart of Samaria and into the power of the king. The latter would have smitten them, but is rebuked by E. who counseled that they Syria many times, but now he shall smite her only three times (13 14-19).

(7) The last wonder in connection with Elisha occurs after this death. His bones were reported to have vitalizing power (13 20-21). Tradition says that the man thus restored to life lived but an hour; but the story illustrates something of the reverence held for E.

(1) In comparison with Elijah.—In many respects Elisha is a contrast to his great predecessor. Instead of a few remarkable appearances and striking events, he has a stormy ministry; instead of the rugged hills his home was in the quiet valley, and instead of solitary goodness he loved the social life and the home.

4. Characteristic of His Ministry

There were no sudden appearances and disappearances. People always knew where to find him. There were no long seasons of hiding or retirement; he was constantly moving about among the people or the prophetic schools. There were no spectacular revolutions, only the effect of a long steady ministry, working through the ranks of Elisha's more than the earlier. Elisha had learned well his lesson at Horeb. God had not so much in the tempest, the fire and the earthquake, as in the 'still small voice.' (1 K 19 12). Elisha was a prophet of fire. Elisha more of a model to the nation was the upper hand. He would come down into the valley and consume those sent to take him; Elisha anticipates the king when he comes to take him (2 K 2 5-33). But Elijah was the noble prophet of wind, fire, and rain. Elisha could only show to the people his fidelity to the prophetic inscription by being moved more by the strains of music than by the mountain solitude. The multiplication of the oil and the cruse is much like the continued supply of meal and oil to the widow of Zarephath (1 K 17 10-16), and the raising of the Shunammite's son like the raising of the widow's son at Zarephath (17 17-24).

(2) General features of his ministry.—His services as a pastor-prophet were more remarkable than his military prowess. He could be as severe and stern in the presence of deliberate wrongdoing as a pastor, and unflinching when the occasion required. He could weep before Hazael, knowing what he would do to Israel, yet he anointed him king of Syria (2 K 8 11-13). When the time was ripe and the occasion opportune, he could instigate a revolution that wiped out a dynasty, exterminated a family, and caused the massacre of the priests of Baal (chs 8, 9). He possessed the confidence of kings so fully that they asked advice of him, and gave him sons as his own (6 21; 13 14). He accompanied an army of invasion and three kings consult him in extremity (3 11-19). The king of Syria consults him in sickness (8 7-3). The king of Israel seems to blame him for the rapid advance of the Syrians, as though he had wreaked vengeance on him (31 31). He was something of a military strategist and many times saved the king's army (6 10). The king of Israel goes to him for his parting counsel (13 14-15). His advice or command seemed to be always taken unhesitatingly. His contribution to the religious life of Israel was not his least service. Under Jehu he secured the destruction of the Baal worship in its organized form. Under Hazael the nation was trodden down almost as do the little of Isaiah, and when it was rebuilt by his own ministry many were saved from bowing the knee to Baal. His personal influence among the schools of the prophets was widespread and beneficial. He that escaped the sword of Hazael was slain by Jehu, and he that escaped Jehu was slain by Elisha. Elisha finished the great work of putting down Baal worship begun by Elijah. His work was not so much to add anything to religion, as to cleanse the religion already possessed. He did not ultimately save the nation, but he saved a large number of Israel's young men. The corruption were not all eradicated, the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat were never fully overcome. He passed through a bitter and distressing national humiliation, but emerged with hope. He eagerly watched every turn of events and his counsels were more frequently adopted than those perhaps of any other prophet. He was "the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof" (13 14). No condemnation of calf-worship at Dan and Bethel is recorded, but that does not prove that he was not fully sanctioned by God. There is no test between Jeh worship and Baal worship. The corrupted form of Jeh worship was a problem which Amos and Hosea had to face nearly a cent. later.

III. General Estimate.—His character was largely molded by the events of his ministry. He was friend and benefactor of foreigner as well as of Israelite. He was large-hearted and generous, tolerant to a remarkable degree, courageous and shrewd when the occasion required, a diplomat as well as a statesman, severe and stern only in the presence of evil and when the occasion demanded. He is accused of being vindictive and of employing falsehood with his enemies. His faults, however, were the faults of his age, and these were but little manifested in his long career. His was a strenuous pastor's life. A home-loving and patient man he was, given to teaching and helping, rather than to working miracles. He continually went about doing good. He was resourceful and ready and was gifted with a sense of humor. As "the man of God," he proved his right to the title by his zeal for God and loving service to man.

ELISHAH, 'el-lásah(אֶלִישָׁה, 'elíshaḥ), "God saves";

'Ehol, 'elíss, 'elísh, 'elísah, 'elíssah) (551?5515, 5551); Moses born in Gen 10 4 as the eldest son of Javan, and in Ezek 27 7 as the source from which the Tyrians obtained their purple dyes. On the ground of this latter statement attempts have been made to identify it with Southern Italy or the north of Africa. Jos (Ant. I, vi, 1) identified Elishah with the Aeliones. The Tg on Ezek gives "the province of Italy." Other suggestions include Hellas, Elis, and Asia; the last-named is a kingdom mentioned in the Am Tob, but its precise location is unknown. The term is applicable as yet to claim certainty for any of these conjectures.

ELISHAMA, 'elíshá-ma (אֶלִישָׁה-מָא, 'elíshá-mà), "God has heard!"

"God has heard!"

(1) Grandfather of Joshua and son of Anniah; prince of the tribe of Ephraim in the Exodus (Nu 1 10; 11 48 53; 1 Ch 7 26);

(2) A son of David, born in Jerus (2 S 5 16; 1 Ch 3 8).

(3) By textual corruption in 1 Ch 3 6 for Elishah, another of David's sons; cf 2 S 5 15.

(4) A scribe of Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12 20 21).

(5) Taken of the seed royal, grandfather of Ishmael, the slayer of Gedaliah (2 K 25 25; Jer 41 1).

(6) A man of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 2 41).

(7) One of the priests appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach the law (2 Ch 17 7).

ELISHAPATH, 'elíshá-páth (אֶלִישָׁפָח, 'elíshá-páx), "God is judge!"

"God is judge!"

This man figures in the Levitical conspiracy against Athaliah, to make Joash king. He was one of the "captains of hundreds" employed in the enterprise by Jehoiada the priest (2 Ch 23 1).

ELISHBA, 'elíshá-bá (אֶלִישָׁבָה, 'elíshá-báh), "God swears," "God is an oath!") Daughter of Amminadab, sister of Nahash, wife of Aaron, mother of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, the foundress, therefore, of the entire Levitical priesthood (Ex 6 23).
ELISHUA, el-ih-shoo'ah, el-ih-shoo'ah (el'íshúh, 'elishāh), "God is rich," "God is salvation": Son of David (2 S 5 15; 1 Ch 14 5); apparently called Elisheva (1 Ch 3 6). In the latter loci we have most probably a misreading by the copyist of the name Elshua.

ELISIMUS, el-ih-r'mus, RV ELIASIMUS (q.v.).

ELIU, el'-lu (ʾelū, Eliod; RV ELIHU): One of the ancestors of Judith (Jth 8 1), and therefore of the tribe of Simeon.

ELIUD, el'-lu'd (ʾelūd, Elioid, "God my praise"): An ancestor of Jesus, four generations before Joseph (Mt 1 15).

ELIZAPHAN, el-ih-zaf-foo'ah (ʾelı́zaphān; LXX Ελίσαφαν, Ελισαφάν, Ελισαφαν, Ελισαφάν, Ελισαφάν, Ελισαφάν, "God has protected"); cf גלזנַה, גלֶשָׁה, Zeophaniah, "Yah has protected," and Phoen גלנַה, "Baal has protected");

(1) The son of Uzziel, the son of Kohath, and so a prince of the Levitical class of the Kohathites (Nu 3 30; 1 Ch 15 8; 2 Ch 29 13). But in 1 Ch 15 8; 2 Ch 39 13 his class seems to be coordinate with that of the Kohathites. He is called Elizaphan in Ex 6 22; Lev 10 4.

(2) A "prince" or chief of Zebulun, who represented that tribe in the division of the land (Nu 34 25).

WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

ELIZUR, el-ih-zoo'ur (ʾelīzūr; LXX Ελιζοῦρ, Ελίζοῦρ, Ελίζοῦρ, Ελίζοῦρ, My God is a rock"); cf Zuriel "my rock is God" (Nu 3 35)): A chief or prince of the tribe of Reuben (Nu 1 5; 2 10; 7 30.35; 10 18).

ELKANAH, el-k'a-nuh (ʾel-kānāh, "God has possessed"): An Ephraimite, the father of Samuel (1 S 1 1–28; 2 11–20). Of his two wives, Hannah, the childless, was best beloved. At Shiloh she received through Eli the promise of a son. Elkanah, with Hannah, took the young Samuel to Shiloh when he was weaned, and left him with Eli as their offering to Jeh. They were blessed w.l.th three other sons and two daughters.

(2) The second son of Korah (Ex 6 24), who escaped the fate of Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Nu 26 11).

(3) One "next to the king" in Jerus in the time of Ahaz; slain by one Zichri of Ephraim in war with Pekah (2 Ch 28 7).

(4) One of the Korahites among David's "mighty men" (1 Ch 12 15).

(5) A Levite, possibly the same as (2) above (1 Ch 6 23.25.36).

(6) Another Levite of the same line (1 Ch 6 26.35).

(7) Another Levite, ancestor of Berechiah (1 Ch 9 16).

(8) Another Levite (if not the same as [4] above), one of the "doorkeepers for the ark" (1 Ch 15 23).

F. K. FARR

ELKIAH, el-k'ee-a (ʾel-kāy, "Elkia"): AV Elcia: An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

ELKOSHITE, el-kosh-heet' (ʾe-lish-kōshīt; LXX Ἐλκοσίατος, Ἐλκοσίατος, Ἐλκοσίατος, Ἐλκοσίατος, Ἐλκοσίατος, Ἐλκοσίατος): Used with the art. "the Elkoshite" (Nah 1 1). Probably a gentleli adj. giving the home of the prophet; not definitely identified. Three traditions may be noted: (1) The Neo-torians venerate the supposed tomb of the prophet in the village of Alkūsh not far from the east bank of the Tigris, about two days' journey almost directly north of Mosul. (2) Jerome states in the prologue to his commentary on Nah that the village of Helkeia in Galilee was pointed out to him as Elkosh. This Helkeia is probably El-Kauzeh between Ramleh and Bint Jbeil. (3) The treatise De Vitis Propheta- tarum of the Pseudo-Epiphanius says that Nahum came from "Elkeiæ beyond Jordan towards Baga- dor and was slain by the tribe of Simeon." Nestle has shown that the words "beyond Jordan" are probably a gloss, and that for Bagador should be read Betogat, the modern Beit Jibrin in Southern Pal. In favor of this identification may be urged the following facts: (a) that parallels to the name Elkosh, such as Eltekeh and Eilekon, are found in the southern country; (b) that the word probably con- tains the name of the Edomite god Kaush, whose name appears in the names of Edomite kings in the Assyrian inscriptions of the 8th and 7th centuries BC, such as Kaush-malaks and the like, and (c) that the internal evidence of the prophecy makes the Judaean origin of the prophet almost certain.

ELLASAR, el-l'ee-sar (ʾel-lāsār, "el-lāsār"): The city over which Arioch (Eri-Aklu) and other Bab kings ruled (Gen 14 1). The Sem-Bab form of its name is (4) Larse, "the city Larsa," a city of the Dinrak, and to judge from what he says, the city of Larsa, the Edomite king. Its Sumerian name is given as Arara, apparently for the name Aarrara, "two abode," which is the name of the ideographic group with which it is written. The ruins of this ancient site are now known as Sengāra, and lie on the E. bank of the Eufrates, about midway between Warah (Erech) and Muqayyar (Ur of the Chaldees). In addition to the name Larsa, it seems also to have been called Al-tas-azaga, "the holy [bright, pure] seat" (or throne), and both its names were apparently due to its having been one of the great Bab centers of sun-god worship.

Like most of the principal cities of Babylonia, it had a great temple-tower, called Er-Sum, "the house of the bond of heaven and earth."

2. Its Holy Places

The temple of the city bore the same name as that at Sippur, i.e. E-babbar, "House of Light," where the sun-god Šamaš was worshipped. This temple was restored by Ur-Engur, Hammurabi (Amraphel), Burna- buriaš, Nebuchadrezzar and Nabonidus. Among the tablets found on this site by Loftus was that which gives measures of length and square and cubic roots, pointing to the place as one of the great centers of Bab learning. Besides the remains of these temples, there are traces of the walls, and the remains of houses of the citizens. The city was at first governed by its own kings, but became a part of the Bab empire some time after the reign of Hammurabi.

ELMADAM, el-mādām (WH ʾel-mādām, Elmad- am; Th ʾel-mādām, Elmadām; AV Elmadam): An ancestor of Jeros according to St. Luke's genealogy, in the 6th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).
ELNAAM, el-nā'ām (אֵלנָאָם, 'elna'am, "God is delightfulness"); of Phoen ("Gadnamzi"). According to MT the father of two of David's warriors (1 Ch 11 46); according to LXX himself one of the warriors.

ELNATHAN, el-nā'athan (אֵלנָתָן, 'elnatān, "God has given"): 1) The grandfather of Jehoachin (2 K 24 8). 2) A courtier of Jehoiakim; he was one of those sent to Egypt to bring back the prophet Uriah (Jer 26 22), and one of those who heard the reading of the law (Neh 8 17, 18), and entreated Jehoiakim not to burn the roll (Jer 36 12-25)—possibly the same person as 1) above. 3) (3, 4, 5) The name of two "chief men"—unless textual corruption has introduced the name at its second occurrence to each other. He or she sent for by Ezra from the camp at the river Ahava (Esr 8 16). F. K. FARR ELOI, el'oi, el-o'i, ELOI, LAMA, lâ'mâ, SA-BACTHANI, sa-bâkh'tha-nî, or ELI, ELI, LAMA SA-BACTHANI ('Elo, 'olâ, lâmah 'ophâshâyâni, Elô, Elô, lâmâ 'ophâshâyâni): The forms of the first word as tr vary in the two narratives, being in Mk as first above and in Mt as in second reading. With some perversions of form probably from Ps 22 1 (ד"'ל א"ל ו"ל נ 'י פ "ל הת' א"ל 'ל ה 'ל נ 'ל), "eli 'l lâmâ 'dabâb-tântî"). A statement uttered by Jesus on the cross just before his death, tr: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34). There is an interesting but difficult problem in connection with the interpretation of this passage. There seems to be a mixture of Aram. and Heb. The first two words, whether in Heb or Aram., have sufficient similarity to each other and each sufficient similarity to the name itself to warrant the jeer that Jesus was calling upon Elias, or the sincere supposition of those who might not fully understand the language, that he was actually calling on Elias. The forms lâmâ and lâmâ used in Mt and Mk respectively (WH ed) represent the various possible forms, the first the Aram., and the second the Heb. The various readings and tr of the latter word, sa-bâkhâni, only add confusion to an effort at ultimate explanation of the real statement. Certainly the influence of the Aram. played a great part in the tr and transmission of the original. The spirit revealed by Jesus in this utterance seems to be very much like that displayed in the Garden when He cried out to have the cup of suffering removed from Him.

ELON, elôn ('elôn, lôn, lôn, elôn, "tere-binth"): 1) A Zebulunite, who judged Israel ten years, and was buried in Ajalon (Jgs 12 11, 12). 2) A son of Zebulun (Gen 46 14; Nu 26 26). 3) A Hittite who made daughter Esau wedded (Gen 26 34; 36 2).

ELON, elôn ('elôn, lôn, a "tere-binth"; Alkôb, Aîlôn): An unidentified town in the territory of Dan named between Jablath and Timnah (Josh 19 43). It is possibly identical with Elon-beth-Hanan which, along with Shaalbam and Bethshemesh, formed one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K 4 9). Conder has suggested Beit 'Anân, about 4 miles N.W. of Neby Samuil: it is quite uncertain.

It is probably identical with the Assyr Alaka'â, where Sennacherib (Hexagon prism inscrip.) claims to have defeated the allied armies of the Philis and the Egyptians. It should probably be sought somewhere E. of Ekron. Beit Libba, the place marked Eltekeh on the PEF map, seems a position for such an encounter. It is about 2½ miles S.W. of Beth-horon the Upper. W. ELTEKON, el'tê-kôn (אֵלטֵקָון, 'eltekôn, "founded by God"): A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 59) near Ramonic (q.v. to be looked for, therefore, a little N. of Hebron. Site unknown.

ELTOLAD, el-to'lâd (אֵלְתוֹלָד, 'eltolâd, "kindred of God"): A city of Judah in the Negeb near Edom (Josh 15 30); in Josh 19 4 ascribed to Simeon. Probably the same as Tolad (1 Ch 4 29), the Arab. art. el being omitted. Site unknown.

ELUL, e'ul, e'ool (אֵלֻל, 'ôlî, Neh 6 15; 'Ekûâ, Eouli, 1 Mac 14 27): The 6th month of the Heb year, corresponding to August-September. The derivation is uncertain. See TIME.

ELYMAEANS, el-i-mê'anos. See ELAMITES.

ELYMAIS, el-i-mâ'is (Eliyam, Elu'mais): This name, representing the OT Elam (see ELAM), was given to a distant of Persia lying between Media and N. of Susiana. In 1 Mac 6 1 the common reading, which is adopted by AV, refers to Elamais as a rich city in Persia. No other reference, however, to such a city is found except in Jos (Ant, XII, ix, 1) who simply follows 1 Macc. The text should therefore be corrected to read as in RV, “in Elymas in Persia there was a city.”

ELYMAS, el-\'m\'as (\'E\'l\'m\'as, El\'m\'as, “wise”; Acts 13 8). See Bar-Jesus.

ELYON, e-\'l\'yon. See El-Elyon; God, Names of.

ELZABAD, el-z\'a-b\'ad (\'El-z\'a-b\'ad, “elected one, “God has given”); cf ZABDIEL and ZEBADIAH: (1) The ninth of David’s Gadite heroes (1 Ch 12 12). (2) A Korashite doorkeeper (1 Ch 26 7).

ELZAPHAN, el-z\'a-f\'an. See Eliahaph.

EMADABUN, e-m\'d-a-b\'un (\'E\'m\'d-a-b\'un, Em\'d-a-bo\'ni; AV Maidiabun [1 Esd 5 58]). The head of a family of Levites who superintended the repair of the temple; not named in Ezr 3 9.

EMATHEIS, e-ma-th\'e-is (\'E\'m-a-th\'e-is, Amathias; Emeus; B, \'E\'m\'a-th\'e-is, Amathis; A, \\ \'E-m\'a-th\'e-is, AV Amathis): One of the sons of Bebai (1 Esd 9 29), called “Athali” in Ezr 10 28.

EMBALMING, em-bal\'m-ing (\'E\'m-bal\'m\'-ing, h\'anat, “to spice”): E. is mentioned in Scripture only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen 50 2; 26). It was a distinctly Egyptian invention and method of preserving the bodies of men and animals. Examples of its use go back to over 3,000 years ago. It prevailed to some extent among the peoples of Asia, and at a later period among the Greeks and Romans, but was in origin and use distinctly non-Israelitish. See Burial.

EMBRACE, em-br\'a-s\': The word has two distinct meanings in the OT: (1) to grasp and hold fondly in the arms, pointing to a common custom (Gen 29 13; 33 4; 48 10; 2 K 4 16; Cant 2 6; 8 3; cf Acts 20 10), and (2) to have sexual intercourse (Prov 4 8; 5 20; Eccl 3 5). It seems to have acquired this technical sense in later Jewish usage.

EMBROIDERY, em-broid\'-er\'i (\'E\'m-broid\'-er\'i, \'r\'i-k\'m\'a-h; AV Needlework): Rikmah was applied to any kind of cloth which showed designs in variegated colors. The method of manufacture is unknown. The designs may have been woven into cloth or drawn in by a needle or hook (Jgs 5 30; Ps 45 14; Ezk 16 10.13.18; 26 16; 27 10.24).

\'A\'d\'a-w\'e\'r\'e\'-t\'u-r\'i\'m, “the work of the embroiderer” in RV instead of “needlework” (Ex 26 36; 27 16; 28 39; 36 37; 38 18; 39 29; Jgs 5 30; Ps 45 14).

\'A\'d\'a-w\'e\'r\'e\'-t\'u-r\'i\'m, “embroiderer,” occurs in Ex 35 35; 38 23. The fact that this word is used instead of ʼaroqh, “weaver,” would lead us to suppose that the embroidery work was either different from that of the weaver or that a ʼra\'b\'am was esp. skilled in fine weaving. Another word,’hoseh\'eb, is used to describe a skilled weaver. “Cunning work” in AV of Ex 26 1.31; 26 6.15; 35 33.35; 36 8.35; 39 8.38 is rendered in ARV “work of the skillful workmen.” The passage has been freely rendered “designers.”

In RV of Ex 28 39 sh\'a-b\'a\'h\'a\'c is trd “weave.” In Ex 28 4 occurs the word tawb\'a\'c, which is trd “broidered” in AV and “checker work” in RV. If this kind of work is what it is supposed to be, it is more truly “needlework” than the embroidery. This work is still done in some of the Syrian cities and towns, esp. in Damascus. Small caps for men to wear under their ordinary headdress and loose outer garments or dressing-gowns are the forms in which it is commonly seen. The checker-work effect is obtained by sewing in a cotton string between two pieces of cloth, so as to form designs. The patterns usually run to straight lines such as signage or squares. The effect is striking, and we can well imagine would have made an impressive priest’s robe, esp. if costly materials were used. See also Crafts.

EMEK-KEZIZ, e-mek-ke\'z\'i-z\' (\'E\'m\'e-k\'e-z\'i-z; ‘emek k\'i-g\'it; AV Valley of Keziz [Josh 18 21]): A town in Benjamin named between Beth-hezrah and Beth-arabah, and therefore to be sought in the plain, probably S. of Jericho. The name has not been recovered.

EMERALD, e\'m\'er-a\'l-d. See Stones, Precious.

EMERODS, em\'er-od\'z (\'E\'m\'e-r\'o-d\'z, ‘op\'ha\'l\'i\'m, ‘\'e\'m\'e-r\'o-d\'z, ‘t\'h\'o-r\'i\'m): These words are used in the account of the plague which broke out among the Philis while the captive Ark of the Covenant was in their land.

‘Op\'halim lit. means rounded eminences or swellings, and in RV AV “tumors” (1 S 6 12). In the Heb text of this passage K\'r\'e substitutes for it the word t\'h\'or\'i\'m, a term which occurs in the next chapter in the description of the golden models of these swellings that were made as votive offerings (6 11-17). The swellings were symptoms of a plague, and the history is precisely that of the outbreak of an epidemic of bubonic plague. The older writers supposed by comparison of the account in 1 S with Ps 78 66 that they were hemorrhoids (or piles), and the older Exeg. term in AV is a 16th-cent. form of that Gr word, which occurs in several medical treatises of the 16th and 17th centuries. There is, however, no evidence that this identification is correct.

In the light of the modern research which has proved that the rat flea (Pulex cheopis) is the most active agent in conveying the virus of plague to the human subject, it is worthy of note that the plague of tumors was accompanied by an invasion of mice (’akkh\'or) or rats. The rat is not specifically mentioned in the Bible, although it was as common in Can. and Israelite times as it is today, a fact demonstrated by the frequency with which their bones occur in all strata of the old Palestinian cities, so it is probable that the term used was a generic one for both rodents.

The coincidence of destructive epidemics and invasions of mice is also recorded by Herodotus (ii.141), who preserves a legend that the army of Senacherib which entered Egypt was destroyed by the agency of mice. He states that a statue of Ptah, commemorating the event, was extant in his day. The god held a mouse in his hand, and bore the inscription: “Whoever sees me, let him reverence the gods.” This may have been a reminiscence of the story in Isa 37 36, 38, or other references see Plague.

EMIM, e-mim (\'E\'m\'i-m; e-mim; ‘e\'m\'i-m; ‘O\'m\'m\'a\'n, Om\'m\'a\'n; ‘O\'m\'a\'m, Om\'m\'a\'m; ‘O\'m\'m\'e\'n, Om\'m\'e\'n; ‘O\'m\'m\'e\'n, Om\'m\'e\'n; “Stated to have been the earlier inhabitants of Moab (Dt 2 10.11), and to have been of tall stature, and hence “accounted Rephaim [or giants] as the Annakim” or the Zemzummim of Ammon (ver 20). As the name was given to them by the Moabites, it may not have been that by which they called themselves. A tall race, known to the Israelites as Rephaim (q.v.), once existed in Southern Pal as well as on the E. side of the Jordan, but its exact relationship is unknown. In the time of Abraham the Emim were living in the Moabite district of Shaveh-kiriathaim, identified with the modern Kureiyat (Gen 14 5).}

A. H. SAYCE
EMINENT, em'-i-ent: In AV (only in Ezek 16 24:31:39; 17:22) refers lit. to physical elevation; RV in the last passage renders "highly" (Heb tótlá, "uplifted," "heaped up") and in the others "vaulted place" (Heb gább, "rounded place," "mounded," ERV "a vaulted chamber").

EMMANUEL, é-man'-ú-el. See Immanuel.

EMMAUS, ém-máás, em'-mas (Ἐμμαύας, Emmaúas, derivation uncertain, but probably from Ἔμμαυας, hammath, "a hot spring"): Jos (BJ, IV, i, 8) says: "Now Emmaus, if it be interpreted, may be rendered 'a warm bath' for therein is a spring of warm water useful for healing." Here he is referring to the hot springs near Tiberias. Possibly the same Gr name may not always have been derived from the same Heb, and as Cheyne suggests (2) may have come from Ἐμμαύας, ha-mósheth (see below).

1. A place where Judas Marcanthus which has been defeated Gorgias (1 Mac 1:40); it was "in the plain" (1 Mac 3:40); it was subsequently fortified Emmaus by Bacchides (1 Mac 9:50). It is of the Acrophora xi, 3; BJ, I, xi, 22; H, i, x; v, 1; xx, 4; IV, 3; Jos 15:7; 1 Chron 6:64). Here it is mentioned as the Talm and Midr. It is now the modern mud-village of 'Amwas, 20 miles along, and a little N. of, the main road from Jerusalem to Jaffa. In the 2d cent. it was called Nicopolis and was an episcopal see; in early Christian times it was famous for a spring of reputed healing qualities.

2. The Emmaus of Lk 24:13, a village 60 furlongs (stadia) from Jerusalem.

Early Christian tradition appears to have identified it with (1) and, hence, to harmonize the latter with some 68 furlongs. Eusebius and Jerome place this Emmaus at 'Amwas; but in the first place (1) was a city and not a village (kómmē), and secondly (2) the distance, 40 miles there and back, is an almost impossible one for the narrative. In Crusading times this difficulty appears to have been realized, and on what grounds is not known. Kubeibeh is just over 80 stadia, N.W. of Jerusalem, was selected as the site of Emmaus. There is a fine church there which is modern; and today a Franciscan hospice and school, attached to the church, and a newer German hospital, combine with the considerable picturesque-ness of the place itself to fortify the tradition.

A much more probable site is Kulunýégh, a village about 35 stadia from Jerusalem, on the road to Jaffa. Jos narrates (BJ, VII, vi, 6) that Vespasian "assigned a place for 800 men only whom he had dismissed from his army which had been for their habitation; it is called Emmaus and is distant from Jerusalem 60 furlongs." This is almost certainly the Emmaus of Lk; it is highly probable that the name kulunýégh is derived from the fact of its being this Kolonía. Close to this place is a ruin known as Bít Mizána, which is probably the Mozah (Μοζάχ), ha-mósheth of Josh 18:26 which in the Talm (Shab. 45) is also described as a kolonia. Today it is a "colony" of Jews who have revived and always use the old name Mósheth for their settlement.

Other suggestions for these Emmaus are (a) el Khamaa, considerably 6 stadia S.W. of Jerusalem (Conder); Jaffa road than Kulunýégh (LB, etc); and (b) 'Atisas, S. of Bethel, where Rem property has been found (MRS. FINN). In not one of the places suggested are there any hot springs.

EMMER, em'ér (אֶמֶר, Emmér): Head of a family, some of whom had married foreign wives (1 Esd 9:21); called "Immer" in Ezra 10:20.

EMMERUTH, em'-er-uth (אֶמֶרְוֹת, Emméroth; AV Meruth; 1 Esd 5:24): Corresponding to "Immer" in Ezr 2:37.

EMMOR, em'mor: Transliterated from the Gr Ἐμμόρ, Emmórr, the tr of Heb hapirah, hámpôr, "ass" (Acts 7:16 AV; RV "Hamor", q.v.).

EMPTY, emp'ti, EMPTY, emp'ti-ér (קָוֹדֵשׁ, qôsósh, kôdsósh, kôdsh, kôsdó: "Empty," adj: meaning void, etc, as the tr of ἔρημος, ἔρημος, ἔρημος, ἐρήμος, etc, occurs in the literal sense of "with nothing" (Gen 31:42; Job 22:9); in 2 S 1 22, it is equivalent to "in vain," "hungry" (Isa 29:8); in some instances the meaning is comparative only; ἐρήμων, ἔρημος, "to gush out," "to pour out," "to empty" is used adjectively (Hos 10 1, "Israel is an empty vine"; but RV takes the Heb word in its original sense of "pouring out," rendering "Israel is a luxuriant vine"); טוֹפָה, temp'-tiness" (Job 26:7); וָנָכוֹנָה, "empty" is so tr (Mk 12:3); in Mt 24:44, the Gr word is scholastic, "to be free," "unoccupied"; (vb) is the tr of בָּשָׂב (Nah 2:2), of dôl, "to become poor," etc (Isa 6:9, ERV "minished," AV "diminished"). RV has "empty" for "vain" (Eph 6:6), "emptied himself" for (Phil 2:7), "emptied out" for "gathered" (2 K 22:9; 2 Ch 34:17, m "poured out"). W. L. WALKER

EMULATION, em'-o-lu'ashun (ἐμπαινέω, zélos, παρα-πεινειν, paraζεῖθο), Occurs twice in the NT, once in a bad and once in a good sense.

1. In Gal 5:20 AV it is the tr of zélos ("zeal," "earnestness," "enthusiasm") where it is classed among "the works of the flesh" and signifies the stirring up and excites emulators, begetting of what we are, or have, or profess. The Gr word is used in this sense in Acts 13:45; Rom 13:13; 1 Cor 3:3; Jas 3:14,15; 2 Cor 12:20; Gal 5:20; RV tr by "jealousy." It denotes a work of the flesh or lower nature, which Christians often fail sufficiently to guard against; it Pleasees the "flesh" to excite such a feeling in others.

2. In Rom 11:14 AV " emulation" is the tr of paraζεῖθο ("to make one zealous or jealous"), and is there used in a good and approved sense. I may provoke to emulation [RV jealousy] them that are my flesh" (of Rom 10:19, quoted from Dt 32:21). It is well to "provoke to emulation" in this sense, those who are slow or indifferent, by the examples of earnestness and diligence which our part. This is not to please the "flesh," but to serve the "Spirit." W. L. WALKER EN- (エン, yain [Arab, yáín]): The Heb word for "spring" or "fountain" (Gen 16:7; Nu 33:9; Neh 2:14; Prov 8:28 [em., pl.]). It occurs in numerous compound words, as EN-GENI, EN-HADDAH, EN-NAKHORE, EN-HAZOR, EN-RIMMON, EN-BOGEL, EN-SHEMESH (q.v.). In the same way the word אִין (EN, a common component of Arab. names of places throughout Pal and Syria at the present day. Places with names compounded with EN- were almost certainly located near a spring. See Fountain; well.

ENABLE, en'-abl: Only in 1 Tim 1:12 (AV and RV) in the sense of "strengthenen" (Gr endur neat, "endue with strength").

ENAIM, é-na'im (עֵנָאִים, enay'im, "place of a fountain"; אָיוֹד, Aidan; Gen 14:14 [AV "in an open place"; vs 21 AV "openly")]: A place which lay between Adullam and Timnath; probably the same as Enam (Josh 15:34). Also mentioned in close connection with Adullam. It was in the Shephelah of Judah. The Talm ( Pesik. Rab. 23) mentions a Kheph Enam. Conder proposes Kurbet Wady 'Albin, which is an ancient site, evidently of great strength and importance, lying between Kh. 'Ain Shems and the village of Deir Aban. The ruins crown a lofty and almost isolated hill; the greatest object to the identification is that there is no fountain at all in the immediate neighborhood. There may have been one in earlier times. See PEF, III, 128.

E. W. G. Masterman

Enam, 'e-nam. See preceding article.

Enan, 'e-nan (םנ, 'enân, "having fountains," or "eyes," i.e. "keen-eyed"); in LXX Αἰνᾶ, Αἶναν: The father of Ahira, and prince of Naphtali at the first census of Israel (Nu 1 15; 2 29; 7 78.83; 10 27).

Enasibus, ένας-ι-βος (Evaribos, Endisobos, 1 Esd 9 34): Corresponding to "Elisahih" in Ezra 10 30.

Encampment, en-kämp'ment. See WAR.

Encampment by the Red Sea: According to the version of the wanderings of Israel given in Nu 35, they "encamped by the Red Sea." (ver 10) after leaving Eilim and before entering the Wilderness of Sin. See Wanderings of Israel.

Enchantment, en-chânt'ment: The occult arts, either supposedly or pretentiously supernatural, were common to all oriental races. They included enchantment, sorcery, witchcraft, soothsaying, augury, necromancy, divination in numberless forms, and all kinds of magic art. Nine varieties are mentioned in one single passage in the Pent (Dt 18 10-11); other varieties in many passages both in the OT and NT, e.g. Lev 19 26.31; Isa 2 6; 57 3; Jer 27 9; Mic 5 12; Acts 8 9.11; 13 6.8; Gal 5 20; Rev 9 21. The extent of the magic arts (forbidden under Judaism and Christianity) may incidentally be seen from the fact that the Scriptures alone refer to their being practised in Chaldaea (Dnl 5 11), Babylon (Ezk 21 21), Assyria (2 K 17 17), Egypt (Ex 7 11), Cannan (Lev 18 3.21; 19 26.31), Asia (Ephesus, Acts 19 13, 19), Greece (Acts 16 10), Arabia also, as "customs from the East," etc (Isa 2 6) indicates. These secret arts were prohibited by the laws of Moses (Dt 18 9-12), inasmuch as they constituted a peculiar corruption to Israel to apostatize. There were a constant incentive to idolatry, clouded the mind with superstition, tended and were closely allied to imposture (Mt 24 24). The term "enchantment" is found only in the OT and its Heb original indicates its varieties.

(1) נָחָשׁ, nāshash, "to wrap up," "muffle," "cover," hence "clandestine," "secret.

This was the hidden element that enabled the magicians of Egypt to impose on the credulity of Pharaoh in imitating or reproducing the miracles of Moses and Aaron; "They... in like manner with their enchantments." (Ex 7 11.22.) Their inability to perform a genuine miracle is shown by Ex 8 18.

(2) נָפָשׁ, nāphash, "to hiss," "whisper," referring to the mutterings of sorcerers in their incantations. Used as a derivative noun this Heb word means "a serpent." This involves the idea of cunning and subtlety. Although employed in the wider sense of augury or prophecy, its fundamental meaning is divination by serpents. This was the form of enchantment sought by Balaam (Nu 24 1). Its impotence against the people of God is shown by Nu 23 23 in. Shalmaneser forced this forbidden art upon the Israelites when he carried captive to Assyria (2 K 17 17). It was also one of the heathen practices introduced during the apostasy under Ahab, against which Elijah protested (cf 1 K 21 20).

(3) נָקַשׁ, nakhash, "to whisper," "mutter," an onomatopoetic word, like the above, in imitation of the hiss of serpents. It is used of the offensive practice of serpent charming referred to in Eec 10 11, and as Dlitzes says, in loc., "signifies the whispering of formulas of charm." See also Isa 3 3, "skilful enchantress"; Jer 30 11, "serpents, cockatrices, RV 'adders'; the latter of which will be charmed; Ps 58 4.5, "the voice of charmers [RV 'enchanters'], charming never so wisely." Ophiphoany, the art of charming serpents, is still practised in the East.

(4) נָפָשׁ, nāphash, "spell," from נָפָשׁ, nāphash, "to bind," hence "to bind with spells," "fascinate," "charm," descriptive of a species of magic practised by binding knots. That this method of imposture, e.g. the use of the magic knot for exorcism and other purposes, was common, is indicated by the monuments of the East. The first general helpless and uselessness of this and other forms of enchantment are clearly shown in Isa 47 9.12. This word is also used of the charming of serpents (Dt 18 11; Ps 58 4). (5) נָוגַי, nōgai, "to cover," "to cloud," hence "to use covert arts." This form of divination was esp. associated with idolatry (so Gesenius, Heb Lex.). Dlitzes, however, in a note on this word (Isa 2 6), doubts the meaning "conceal" and thinks that it signifies rather "to gather auguries from the clouds." He translates it, "cloud-interpretation," "clouds," "divination," "cloud conjectures." This view is not generally supported. Rendered "enchancers" (Jer 27 9, RV "soothsayers"; so also in Isa 2 6). Often τεχνη in RV "practice augury," as in Lev 19 26; Dt 18 10-14; 2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 32 6; a form of magical art corresponding in many respects to that of the Gr μαντις, who uttered oracles in a state of divine frenzy. LXX ψαρισίς, κλει-δονωσαι, i.e. augury through the reading or acceptance of a sign or omen. A kindred form of enchantment is mentioned in the NT (1 Cor 14 24). Gr γόργας, γότται, "enchancers," "jugglers," the original indicating that the incantations were uttered in a kind of howl; rendered "seducers" AV, "impostors" RV; of Rev 19 20). The NT records the names of several magicians with whom was associated a class of conscious impostors: Simon Magus (Acts 8 9); Bar-Jesus and Elymas (Acts 13 8.8); the slave girl with the spirit of Python ("divination," Acts 16 16); "vagabond [RV 'strolling'] Jews, exorcists" (Acts 19 13; cf Lk 11 19); also the magicians of Moses' day, named Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim 3 8).

All these forms of enchantment claimed access through supernatural insight or aid, to the will of the gods and the secrets of the spirit world. In turning away faith and expectation from the living God, they struck a deadly blow at the heart of true religion. From the enchanters of the ancient Orient to the medicine-men of today, all exponents of the "black art" exercise a cruel tyranny over the benighted people, and multitudes of innocent victims perish in body and soul under their subtle impostures. In no respect is the exalted nature of the Heb and Christian faiths more clearly seen than in their power to emancipate the human mind and spirit from the mental and moral darkness, the superstition and fear, and the benighting effect of these occult and deadly arts. For more detailed study see DIVINATION; ASTROLOGY.

Dwight M. Pratt
END (תקס, הַקָּס, ἐρήπης, ἐρήπης, קַלָּדִים, רוֹדֶה, תְּלֶה, תְּלַנְּהָלָו, עַנַּדְלָו): The end of anything is its termination, hence also finality or purpose: it is the tr of several Heb and Gr words, chiefly in the OT of תְּלֶה (properly, "a cutting off") and other words from the same root (Gen 6 13, "The end of all flesh is come before me"); יַיְדָר, "hinder part," is also frequently tr (end) (Dt 11 12; Ps 37 37, 38, ARV) "There is a happy end to the man to peace...The end of the wicked shall be cut off"; ERV "latter end" (ver 37), m "reward" or "future posterity"; 73 17; Jer 6 31); גַּלָּל (from גָּלָל to "come together") is several times tr (end) (2 Chr 20 16; Ecc 3 11; 7 2). "End" in the sense of purpose is the tr of מַלְעָן, "to the intent" (Ex 8 22, "to the end thou mayest know"), and of דְּבַרְרָה (from דָּבָר, 'to speak'); Ecc 7 14, "to the end that man should find nothing after him" (RV should not find out anything [that shall be after him]). "Ends of the earth" is the tr of εἴρημα, "extremities" (Dt 33 17; Ps 22 27), also of כָּנָּבֶּך, "wing" (Job 37 3; 38 13). Other words are נֶפֶשׁ, "utmost" (Job 34 36, 38; Prov 17 6, ARV "revulsion" (Ex 34 22; 2 Ch 24 23, RV "revolution"), etc. The vb. occurs almost invariably in the phrase "to make an end," as the tr of קָלָל, "to finish," "complete." (Gen 27 30; Dt 20 9; Jer 26 8, etc); also of נָלָל, "to complete" (Isa 33 1), and שָׂלָם, "to finish" (38 12 18).

In Dn 9 24, the Heb text has יְהָקְמָם, "to seal up" ("to complete or finish"), but the margin, followed by AV, RV, Driver and most moderns, has יְהָקְמָם, "to finish," "end," "complete." A difference of one letter, but practically none in the Heb word, is the tr of an end; "to finish the transgression," which proceeds.

In the NT the common word for "end" is τέλος "an end," "completion," "termination" (Mt 10 22; 24 6; Jn 13 1, RVm "to the uttermost"; Rom 6 21, "The end of those things is death"; 6 22, "the end eternal life"; 10 4, "Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness" (Rom 3 19; 15 6; 22 13, etc); κόπως, "outgoing" (He 13 7, RV "issue"); οὔτελεία, "full end," is used of "the end of the world" (Mt 13 39; He 9 26); πέρας, "extremity," "the ends of the world" (Rom 10 18); ἀκόρα, "a point, end" (Mt 24 31), "from one end of heaven to the other end" as purpose: the tr of τοῦ ἐκ τοῦ "with a view to" (Acts 7 19; Rom 11 11; 4 16; 1 Thess 3 13); of εἰς τὸν αὐτόν, "unto this" (Jn 18 37; Rom 14 9; 2 Cor 2 9); of πρὸς τὸν, "toward this" (Lk 18 11); To "end" (vb.) in πλήρως, "to fill up," (Lk 7 1; Acts 17 21): once τοιοῦτον, ("exert oneself"). Cf. also Acts 16 10, AV "endeavored," RV "sought" (Gr σέβεται, 'seek').

ENDRONS, end·t·urns (ἐνδρόντων, sh'phattayim): Used once (Ezek 40 43 AV) in the m. only. In text, both AV and RV, "hooks," denoting stails or places for the fastening of victims as for sacrifice, or perhaps the two heartstones. The term is a corruption from another word similar in form and identity of usage. This word, "andiron," from Middle Eng., has assumed many peculiar forms, as "aundirne," "aundirne," from which the form is doublet derived, though this is not the original and has no relation to it. ARV m. reads, "According to Vulg and Syr, ledges."

ENDLESS, end·les·s (εκάκαρανός, akatóthos [He 7 16], ἀμπαράστως, aparántos [1 Tim 1 4]): This Eng. word occurs twice in the NT, and is there represented by the two Gr words above noted.

(1) In He 7 16 Jesus is said to be a priest "after the power of an endless life." The word means lit. as in RVm, "indissoluble." It is not simply that Christ's priesthood was eternal. The priesthood was based upon His possession, by nature, of a life which in time and eternity death could not touch. This distinguished Him especially from priests under the law.

(2) In 1 Tim 1 4, Paul warns Timothy against giving heed in his ministry to "fables [μιθοῖοι] and endless [limitless] genealogies." The allusion seems to be to the series of emanations (aenôs in gnostic speculation, to which no limit could be set.

EN·DOR, en·dér ( אֶנְדוֹר, en dór, Josh 17 11; יִנְדוֹר, 'en dór, 1 Sam 8 28 7; יִנְדוֹר, 'en dór), Ps 83 10; A, נַדְבָּר, Nedor; B, "Abedor, Addor: A town in the lot of Issachar assigned to Manasseh (Josh 17 11). Here dwelt the woman who had a familiar spirit, whom Saul consulted on the night before the battle of Gibboa (1 Sam 28 7). Here also, according to Ps 83 10, perished fugitives of Sisera's army, after the battle of Meggido. It was therefore not far from the Kishon and Tabor. It is generally identified with the modern Endor, a small village on the northern slope of Jebel ed-Duby, with several ancient caves. It is not far from Naft and Shunem, and looks across the plain which the broken neck of the Philistines is on the other side. The Sissare may have attempted to make their way eastward to the open uplands, and thence to their native North. Coming hither from Gibboa, eluding the Philistines outposts under cover of the darkness, Saul would cross the Vale of Jezreel, and pass round the eastern base of the mountain, the Philis being on the west.

EN-DOR, WITCH, with OF: I Jn 1 8 58 8-25, it is narrated how Saul, in despair of mind because Jeh had forsaken him, on the eve of the fatal battle of Gilboa, resorted in disguise to "a woman that had a familiar spirit" ("sōkh: see DIVINATION; NECHOMANCY), at En-dor, and besought the woman to divine for him, and bring him up from the dead whom he should name. On the woman reminding him how Saul had cut off from the land those who practised these arts—a proof of the existence and operation of the laws against divination, witchcraft, necromancy, etc (Lev 19 31; Dt 18 9-14) the king assured her of immunity, and bade her call up Samuel. The incidents that followed have been the subject of much discussion and of varied interpretation. It seems assumed in the narrative that the woman did see an appearance, which the king, on her describing it, recognized to be that of Samuel. This, however, need be only the narrator's interpretation of the events. It is not to be credited that the saintly Samuel was actually summoned from his rest by the spells of a professional diviner. Some have thought that Samuel, by God's permission, did indeed appear, as much to the woman's dismay as to the king's; and urge in favor of this the woman's evident surprise and terror at his appearance (vs 12 ff), and the true prophecy of Saul's fate (vs 16-19). It may conceivably have been so, but the more reasonable view is that the whole transaction was a piece of feigning on the part of the woman. The LXX uses the word epyatêmatos ("a ventriloquist") to describe the woman and those who exercised kindred arts (ver 9). Though pretending ignorance (ver 12), the woman doubtless recognizes Saul from the first. It was she who saw Samuel, and reported his words; the king himself saw and heard nothing. It required no great skill in a practised diviner to forecast the general issue of the battle about to take place, and the disaster that would overtake Saul and his sons; while if the forecast had proved untrue, the narrative of the witch of En-dor would never have been written. Saul, in fact, was not slain, but killed himself. The incident, therefore, may be best ranked in the same category as the feats of mediumship.

ENDOW, en-7ou', ENDUE, en-7ou'; "endow" meant originally "to provide with a dowry"; "endue" took the meaning "clothe"; the likeness between the lit. meanings has confused the metaphorical use of the words in spite of their difference in origin. Thus we find in Gen 30 20, AV "endued me with a good dowry," RV "endowed me with a good dowry." RV "endowed" (""aw", zāḇ̄āḥāth, "bestow upon," "endow"); Ex 22 16, AV "endow her to be his wife," RV "pay a dowry for her" (""aw", māḥār, "purchase"; "endow"); cf Dt 22 29; 2 Ch 2 12.18, AV and RV "endued" with understanding (from ""aw", yāḏāh, "know"); and Lv 24 49, AV "endued with power," RV "clothed" ("ēḏāw, endādāh, "clothe"). ENDS OF THE EARTH. See Astronomy, III, 2.

ENDURE, en-7ōr;: Used in the Bible (1) in the sense of "continue," "last," as in Ps 9 7, "The Lord shall endure for ever" (ARV "Jeh sitteth as king for ever"); 30 5, "Weeping may endure for a night" (RV "tarry," m "may come in to lodge at even"); Jn 6 27, "the meat which endureth," AV, RV "the food which abideth"; (2) in the sense of "bear" (He 12 20): "bear up under" hardship, persecution, etc (2 Tim 3 11; 1 Pet 2 19); "to remain under" (He 10 32; 12 2; Jas 1 12; 5 11); "to be strong, firm" (He 11 27): "to persevere" beneath a heavy burden (Mt 10 22).

EN-EGLAIM, en-ēg-lā'im, en-ēg-lā'īm (sent-and, "en-g-road, "en-g-roach"): ("En-eglaim") (Bible Places, 93) identifies it with 'Ain Hajlah (of Beth-hoglah); Robinson (BVP, II, 490), with 'Ain Fastubah.

ENEMESSAR, en-ē-mō-šar ("Enemessar, Enemessar, Enemesser, Enemessara, Enemessaron"): Generally allowed, since Grooting, to be a corruption, though occasionally defended as an alternative form of Shalmanesar (Tob 1 2.15, etc) who carried Israel captive to Nineveh, as related in 2 K. Among the captives was Tobit, taken from Thibse in Gilead, where the prophet Elijah was born, and the place lived. The writer of Tob makes Sennacherib the son (1 15), as well as the successor of Enemessar, whereas, according to the Assyry inscriptions, Sennacherib was the son of Sargon. This is only one of several serious historical difficulties in the narrative of Tob. The corruption of the name is variously explained. Rawlinson supposes the first syllable of the word Shal to have been dropped, comparing the Buphaschar of Abydenus for Nabopolassar. Dr. Pinches takes Enemesser for Sephenesser, the sh being changed to s and then to the smooth breathing, though the rough breathing more commonly takes the place of a dropped s; both scholars admit the easy transposition of the liquids m and n. Shalman-usharid is the Assyry form of Shalmaneser.

ENEMY, en'e-mi ("ēnē̂m, qē∂ō̂th, " car, " car; "ēnē̂m, echthros): "Enemy," "enemies," are frequent words in the OT. The Heb word most often so rendered is qē∂ō̂th (qē∂ō̂th, "the enemy") a name which has the meaning "the enemy" very frequently in the Pss, e.g. 3 7; 6 10; 7 5; 8 2; 9 36; 13 2, where the cry is often for deliverance from enemies. Another word for "enemy," found chiefly in the poetical books, is qē∂ō̂th, or "car, "dis-"tresser," "straitener" (Nu 39 9; Job 16 9; Ps 27 12.21, RV "adversary," etc); also ṣḇr (Est 3 10; Ps 8 2; 10 5 AV, etc). Other words are ṣḇr, "one awake" (1 S 28 16 AV; Dn 4 19 AV); ṣḇn̄, "incare," "be sharp or bite" (Ex 1 10; Prov 25 21; 27 6); ṣḇr, "to wash" (Ps 5 8; 27 11), and ṣḇn̄, "to stand up," "to withstand" (Ex 32 25).

In the NT echthros, "enemy," "opponent," is the only word or "enemy" (Mt 5 43.44; Mk 12 36; Lk 1 71.74, Rom 5 19.21; 1 Cor 10 13.28, etc) with ṣḇn̄hō̂th ("a man"); joined to echthros (Mt 13 28).

In RV "adversary" is frequently substituted for "enemy" (Nu 24 8; Dt 32 41; Ps 6 7; 7 6; 44 10.
EN-NAGDI, en-gad+'i (Sir 24 14 RV, “on the sea shore”). See EN-GEDI.

ENGATE, en-gai: From שֶׁרָב (sharab, “to pledge,” Jer 30 21, AV “Who is this that engaged his heart?”); RV “he that hath boldness?”; RVm Heb “hath been surety for his heart!”

EN-GANNIM, en-gan-im (עֵגָנִים, ’en gannim), “spring of gardens”:
(1) A town in the territory of Judah, named with Zanoah and Ena'hot (Josh 15 34). It is probably identical with the modern Enim Juna, S. of Wady of Seror, not far from Zanoah (Zanoah’s).
(2) A town in the lot of Issachar (Josh 19 21), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (21 29). In 1 Ch 6 73 it is replaced by Anem. It probably corresponds to the Gimea of Jos (Ant. XX, vi, 1); and may certainly be identified with the modern Jenin, a prosperous village on the northern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, with beautiful gardens, fruitful orchards and plentiful supplies of water from the local springs. W. EWING

EN-GEDI, en-ge-di, en-ge'di (עֵגֶדִי, ’en geddi), “fountain of the kid”): Identical with the present Ain Jidi. According to 2 Ch 20 2 it is the same as Hazazon-tamar, mentioned in Gen 14 7 as occupied by the Amorites and as having been attacked by Chedorlaomer “after leaving Kadesh and El Paran on his way to the Vale of Siddim. The place is situated upon the W. shore of the Dead Sea about midway between the N. and the S. ends, and was included in the territory of Judah (Josh 15 62). The spot is rendered attractive by the verdure clothing it by reason of immense fountains of warm water, 80° F., which pour out from beneath the limestone cliffs. In the time of Solomon (Cant 1 14) palms and vines were cultivated here. Jos also mentions it as a beautiful palm grove. In the time of Eusebius it was still a place of importance, but since the Middle Ages it has been almost deserted, being occupied now only by a few Arabs. The oasis occupies a small area a few hundred feet above the Dead Sea marked by the 690 ft. sedimentary terrace heretofore described (see Dead Sea). The limestone borders rise so abruptly to a height of 2,000 ft. immediately on the W., that the place can be approached only by a rock-cut path. Two streams, Wady Susaie and Wady el-Aregel, descend on either side through precipitous rocky gorges from the unproductive wilderness separating it from Bethlehem and Hebron. It was in the caves opening out from the sides of these gorges that David took refuge from Saul (1 S 24 1). During the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20 2), the children of Ammon, Lachish and Moab attempted to invade Judah by way of En-gedi, but were easily defeated as they came up from the gorges to occupy the advantageous field of battle chosen by Jehoshaphat.

English Versions of the Scriptures.—The battle for vernacular Scripture, the right of a nation to have the sacred writings in its own tongue, was fought and won in England land. Ancient MSS, such as the Syr and the Gothic, were produced to meet obvious requirements of the teacher or the missionary, and met with no opposition from any quarter. The same was the case with the efforts of the Anglo-Saxon church to provide portions of Scripture for the use of the people. Even in later times the Latin church seems to have followed no consistent policy in permitting or forbidding the tr of the Scriptures. In one country the practice was forbidden, in another it was regarded with forbearance or permitted under authority (Adlitz and Arnold, Catholic Dictionary, London, 1884, art. “Bible”); and so it came about that the different nations of Europe came by the inestimable boon of an open Bible in different ways. Germany, for example, after the attempts of numerous translators who seem to have been quite untracmeled in their work owed, under Providence, to the faith, the intrepidity and the genius of Luther the national version which satisfied it for more than three centuries, and, after a recent and essentially common, and the new form of expression. The century of Wycliffe, it is to be remembered, was also that of Langland, Gower and Chaucer.

Born in Yorkshire about the year 1320, Wycliffe was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, of which he soon became a Fellow and was for a short time Master, resigning the latter post in 1361 on account of a new form of expression. The century of Wycliffe, it is to be remembered, was also that of Langland, Gower and Chaucer.

3. John Wycliffe

Wycliffe was the last great scholar of the Middle Ages, and his influence on the later history of the English language is profound. He was a scholar of the highest order, and his work was done at a time when the English language was passing through a period of rapid development. The English language, which had hitherto been spoken only in the north of England, began to spread southwards, and Wycliffe's work was done at a time when the English language was passing through a period of rapid development. He was a scholar of the highest order, and his work was done at a time when the English language was passing through a period of rapid development.

part of the criticisms and claims put forth by Dr. Gasquet (Our Old English Bible and Other Essays, London, 1898; 2d ed., 1908). The claim is made that the work published in Oxford in 1850 is really not Wycliffe's at all but that of his bitterest opponent, the Bishop of Cambridge, who represented the party of Rome. Gasquet's work on this subject is mainly worthy of notice on account of his meritorious research in other departments of the English Reformation. His arguments and statements are met by Kenyon (op. cit., 204–8). The controversy is further perverted by M. Trevelyan, by C. M. Trevelyan (2d ed, London, 1908), a work which cannot be too highly praised for its deep research, its interesting exposition and its cordial appreciation of the reformer and his works. “Nothing,” says Trevelyan (Appendix, 361), “can be more damming than the licenses to particular people to have Eng. Bibles, for they distinctly show that without such licenses it was thought wrong to have them. The age of printing, it is to be remembered, was not yet.

The Wycliffe Bible was issued and circulated in copie each of which was written by the hand. About 170 copies of this manuscript Bible are still in existence. They form a striking proof of what England and the world owed to the courage and the labor of John Wycliffe and his "poor priests."

It is a remarkable fact that before the year 1500 most of the countries of Europe had been supplied with a version of the Scriptures printed in the vernacular tongue, while England and the world owed to the courage and the labor of John Wycliffe a translation of the Scriptures which is still the basis of some of our most famous Bibles—especially the famous VSS which, as already stated, had anticipated that of England. The story of the edition by Coehlaeus of the actual work of printing, and of his warning the King and Wolsey of the impending invasion of the Scriptures printed by Luthermen, who had used them to some extent as a romance of history. His interference resulted in the prohibition by the city authorities of the printing of the work and in the sudden flight of Tyndale and his assistant, John, who sailed up the Rhine with the precious sheets already printed and sold an edition to Worms, the city of the famous Diet in which Luther four years before had borne his testimony before the Emperor. The place was now Lutheran, and there the work of printing could be carried out in security and at leisure. To baffle his enemies, as it seems, a small octavo edition was first printed without glosses; then the quarto edition was completed. The "pernicious literature" of both editions, without name of the translator, was shipped to England in 1526; and another of the NT in English (three surreptitiously) were distributed, numbering, it is computed, 15,000 copies. The unfavorable reception of Tyndale's work by the King and the church authorities may in some measure be accounted for by the fact which at the moment were associated with the Reformation in Germany, and by the memories of Lollardism in connection with the work of Wycliffe. So vehement was the opposition at any rate to Tyndale's work, and so determined the seal in buying up and burning the book, that of the six editions above mentioned there "remains of the first edition one fragment only: ... of the second one copy, wanting the title-page, and another very imperfect; and of the other two, for which are not however satisfactorily identified" (Westcott, History of the English Bible, 45, London, 1868). Meanwhile Tyndale took to working on the OT. Much discussion has taken place on the question whether he knew Heb (see Eadie, I, 200 ff.). Tyndale's own distinct avowal is that it was from the Heb direct that such tr of the OT as he accomplished was made. Very early in 1531 he published separately VSS of Gen and Dt, and in the following year the whole of the OT in English, with a preface and marginal glosses. In 1534 appeared the Book of Jon, with a prologue; and in the same year a new version of the NT to counteract one made by Joyce from the Vulgate. This has been described by Westcott (op. cit., 185) as "altogether Tyndale’s noblest monument,” mainly on account of its short and pregnant glosses. “Bengel himself is no more terse or pointed.” A beautifully illuminated copy of this edition was struck off on vellum and in 1529 published under the control of his friends and an edition of his revised NT was printed in London—“The first volume of Holy Scripture printed in England”—in 1536, the year of the Queen’s death. Tyndale had for some time lived at Antwerp, enjoying a “considerable yearly exhibition” from the English merchants there; but his enemies in England were numerous, powerful and watchful. In 1534 he was betrayed and arrested; and after an imprisonment of nearly a year and a half at the castle of Vilorçe, about 15 miles from Brussels, he was strangled and then burned in 1536, the same year as that of the death of the Queen. The last days of the hero and martyr may have been cheered by the news of the printing of his revised edition of the NT in England.

Miles Coverdale, who first gave England a complete and authorized version of the Bible, was a younger contemporary of Tyndale.

Miles Coverdale was a year younger than Tyndale, who was born in 1496, and Coverdale was four years younger than Tyndale. Born in the North Riding of Yorkshire, he found his way to Cambridge at the time when Erasmus was professor of Gr, and appears as an earnest student not yet his tires. He had got into the good graces of Cranwell, the “malleus monachorum,” factotum and secretary to Wolsey, and later on the King’s principal abettor in his efforts to render the Church of England thoroughly national, if not nationalistic. Meanwhile, and during the period in which he held Lutheran or evangelical views of religion, cast off his monastic habit, and, as Bale says, gave himself up wholly to the teaching of the gospel. He is found in 1527 in intimate connection with More and Cranwell and probably from them he received encouragement to proceed with a tr of the Bible. In 1528 he was blamed before Tunstall, bishop of London, as having caused some to desert the mass, the confessional and the worship of images; and seeking safety, he left England for the Continent. He is said by Foxe to have met Tyndale at Hamburgh in 1529, and to have given him some help in the tr of the Pent. An uncertainty hangs over Coverdale’s movement at this time, and it is possible that much was happening that could not fail to be powerfully changing opinion in England. The result of the Assembly held at Westminster by Warham in May, 1530, and of the Convocation held under his successor, Cranmer, in December, 1534, was that in the latter it was petitioned that “his Majesty would vouchsafe to decree that the sacred Scriptures should be tr into the Eng. tongue by certain honest and learned men, named for that purpose by the lords and Parliament,” and that the new version “should be introduced into the several parishes, and the people taught to read by the people according to their learning.” Cranwell, meanwhile, who had a shrewd forecast of the trend of affairs, seems to have arranged with Coverdale for the printing of his tr. However this may be, by the year 1534 “he was ready, as he was desired, to set forth” (i.e. to print) his tr; and the work was finished in 1535. And thus, “as the harvest springs from the seed which germinates in darkness, so the entire Eng. Bible, tr no one knows where, presented itself, unbroken and unanticipated, at once to national notice in 1535” (Edie, I, 266). It is declared on the title-page to be “faithfully and truly translated out of Douthe and Latyn into Englishe: MDXXXV.” Coverdale was aware of the impression that he was a conspicuously honest man. Unlike Tyndale who regarded himself as, in a way, a prophet, with his work as a necessity Divinely laid upon him, Coverdale describes that he had no particular desire to undertake the work—and how he wrought, as it were, in the language of these days, under a command from whom he sought directions and who “required him to use the Douche [i.e. the German] and the Latyn.” He claims further to have done the work entirely himself, and he certainly produced a new version of the OT and a revised version of the NT. He used, he says, five sundry interpreters of the original languages. These interpreters were, in all probability, the Vulg, Luther’s version, the Zurich or Swiss-German Bible, the Lat version of Pagninus, and he certainly consulted Tyndale on the Pent and the NT. He successfully studied musical effect in his sentences and many of the finest phrases in the AV are directly traced to Coverdale. His version of the Ps is that which is retained and is still in daily use in the ritual of the Church of England. Two new editions of Coverdale’s version were issued in 1537 “with the King’s most gracious license,” and after this the Eng. Bible was allowed to circulate freely. Certain changes in the title-page, prefaces and other details are discussed in the works mentioned at the end of this article.

Convocation meanwhile was not satisfied with Coverdale’s tr, and Coverdale himself in his honest modesty had expressed the hope that he would follow the work of the King. Accordingly in 1537—probably at the suggestion of, and with some support from, Cranwell and certainly to his satisfaction—a large folio Bible appeared, as edited and dedicated by a certain Thomas Matthew. This name has, since the days of Foxe, been held to be a pseudonym for John Rogers, the protomartyr of the Marian persecution, a Cambridge graduate who had for some years lived in intimacy with Tyndale at Antwerp, and who became the possessor of his MS at his death. Besides the NT, Tyndale, as above mentioned, had published trs of the Pent, the Book of Job, and portions of the Apoc, and had left a MS version of Josh to 2 Ch. Rogers, apparently taking all he could find of the work of Tyndale, supplemented this by the work of Coverdale and issued the composite volume with the title, “The Bible, which is all the Holy Scriptures, in which are contayned the Olde and Newe Testamentes, translated by Coverdale, and further increased by Thomas Matthew. “Essay I. Hearken to ye heavens, and thou earth, geave eare: for the Lord speaketh. MDXXXVII.” After the burning and burning of Tyndale’s NT on its arrival in England 11 years before, it is not easy to account for the royal sanction with which the tr appeared. It was probably granted to the united efforts of Cranmer and Cranwell, aided perhaps by the King’s desire to show action independent of the church. The royal sanction did it, it was given by the King in the same year in which it was given to Coverdale’s second edition. That version became the basis of our present Bible. It was on Matthew’s version that for 75 years thereafter all other versions were based.

Matthew’s first edition of 1,500 copies was soon exhausted, and a new edition was issued with some revision by Richard Taverner, a cultivated young layman and lawyer who had in his early years been selected by Cranwell for his college at Oxford. He was imprisoned in its cellars for refusing Tyndale’s NT; but he was soon released for his singular musical accomplishments. He was an excellent Grecian, of good literary taste and of personal dignity. For the reason given above, he may have been made a Grecian as he was, no use of their parts; but the aim of his out aimed to be a successful attempt at idiomatic expression, as Taverner had in his early years been selected by Cranwell for his college at Oxford. He was imprisoned in its cellars for refusing Tyndale’s NT; but he was soon released for his singular musical accomplishments. He was an excellent Grecian, of good literary taste and of personal dignity. For the reason given above, he may have been made a Grecian as he was, no use of their parts; but the aim of his out aimed to be a successful attempt at idiomatic expression, as also at compression and viviscidness. Some of his changes are kept in the AV, such as “parables” for “similitudes,” and in Mt 54.12, “The love of the many shall be a plaid,” and really in greater justice to the Gr article. His dedication to the king is manly and dignified and compares most favorably with the dedications of other translators, including that of the AV. The book appeared in two editions, folio and quarto, in 1539, and in the same year two editions, folio and quarto, of the NT. The Bible and the NT were each reprinted once, and his OT was adopted in a Bible of 1551. But with these exceptions Taverner’s version was practically outside of influence on later trs.

The next Bible to appear was named from its size. Its pages are fully 15 in. long and over 9 in. broad. It was meant to be in a way a state edition, and is known as the Great Bible. As sufficiently good type, paper and other requisites could not be found in England, it was resolved that it should be printed in Paris. Coverdale and Grafton, the printer, went to Paris to superintend the printing; but the French church authorities interfered and the work was not started, and was returned to be undertaken in London where the work was finished. It was the outcome of the Protestant zeal of Cranwell who wished to improve upon the merely composite volume of Tyndale and Coverdale. Its origin was based on authority, such as Hune, Burnet and Froude have ventured upon statements regarding it, for which there is really no proof (Eadie, 1, 356 f). The duty of editor or reviser was by Cranwell assigned to Coverdale who, as a protest, refused to undertake the work, and the method of revising the Eng. version, was quite willing to undertake a work that might supersede his own. The rapidity with which the work was executed, and the proofs of the minute care devoted to it by Coverdale may appear remarkable to those who are acquainted with the deliberate and leisurely methods of the large committee that produced the AV in the reign of James or the RV in the reign of Queen Victoria. Of course Coverdale had been over all the work before and knew the points at which improvements were to be applied; and a zealous and expert individual can accomplish more than a committee. Luther trd the NT and, after revising his work with Melanchthon, had it printed and it was a great success. The publication of the Great Bible began in May, 1539, and was completed in April, 1540, a handsome folio, printed in black letter, with the title, “The Bible in Englyshe, that is to say, the contents of all the holy scripture, bothe of the ole and newe testament, truly translated after the vertey of the Hebrewe and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tongues. Prunted by Rycharde Grafton and Edward Whitchurch. Cum prorsum epistola edovens, 1539.” The elaborate notes for which asterisks and various other marks are provided were never supplied; but the actual tr showed attention to the work and much fine appreciation of the original languages and of English. In the NT the version derived assistance from the Lat version of Erasmus, and in the OT from Munster and Pagnina. Variations in the text could of course be got from the Complutensian Polyglot. The Great Bible shows considerable improvement upon the older Tyndale and Cranwell in the OT. “So careful,” says Eadie (L, 370), “had been Coverdale’s revision and so little attachment had he to his own previous version, that in the 53rd chapter of Isaiah the Bible of 1539 differs in nearly forty places from his version of 1535. The tr work had a love for Cranwell and still less for his work, though to avert clerical prejudices, Coverdale had made concessions in his tr. The work was cordially welcomed by the people, and a copy was ordered to be printed for the King. He also does him most justice to the parson and half by the parishioners. A further revision of this version was carried out by Coverdale for a second edition which appeared in April, 1540, and is known as Cranmer’s Bible, mainly from the judicious and earnest preface which the archbishop wrote for it. It exhibits a text formed on the same principles as that of 1539, but after a fuller and more thorough revision” (Westcott, 254). Two other editions followed in the same year and three more in the year following (1541).

After the publication of the Great Bible (1539–41) no further advance took place for many years. The later years of Henry VIII indeed were marked by serious reaction. In 1542 Convocation with the royal consent made an attempt, fortunately thwarted by Cranmer, to Latinize the Eng. version and to make it in reality what the Romish version of Rheims subsequently became. In the following year Parliament, which then practically meant the Privy Council, restricted the use of the Eng. Bible to certain social classes that excluded nineteen-tenths of the population; and three years later it prohibited the use of everything but the Great Bible. It was probably to prevent the great destruction of all previous work on the Eng. Bible which has rendered examples of that work so scarce. Even Tusstall and Heath were anxious to escape from their responsibility in lending their names to the new tr. This knowledge of this reaction Henry VIII died, January 28, 1547.

No new work marked the reign of Edward VI, but great activity prevailed in the printing of previous VSS. Thirty-three New Testament and thirteen Bibles were published during his reign of six years and a half; and injunctions were issued urging every person to read “the very lively Word of God” and for a copy of the Great Bible with the Eng. paraphrase of Erasmus to be set up in every church. By royal order a NT was to be sold for 22d., a sum representing as many shillings of present value.

Less repressive work regarding the tr and diffusion of Scripture than might have been expected occurred in the reign of Edward VI. The printing in other directions the reaction was severe enough. According to Lord Burghley, during the three years and nine months of Mary’s reign, the number of 400 persons perished—men, women, maidens and children—by imprisonment, torment, famine and fire. Among the martyrs were Cranmer and Rogers; Coverdale escaped martyrdom only by exile and the powerful intervention of the King of Denmark. The copies of the Bibles were banned; and—though individual trs were not specified—proclamations were issued against certain books and authors. Still the books were not, as formerly, bought up and confiscated; and so the activity of Edward’s reign in the production of Bibles left copies widely distributed throughout the country at the close of Mary’s reign. At this time a NT was printed at Geneva which had great influence upon future VSS of the Bible.

This NT was in 1557 and was most probably the work of W. Whittingham, an English exile who had married Calvin’s sister. It was trd from the Gr and compared carefully with other VSS. It had also a marginal commentary written by an author of similar works that were published in England; and it was the first tr that was printed in roman letter and in which chapters were divided into verses. Caxton wrote an introductory Epistle, and it had also an address by the reviser himself. A few months after its publication the more serious task of the revision of the whole Bible was begun and continued for the space of two years and more, the translators working at it "day and night." Who the translators were is not said; but Whittingham, probably with Gilby and Sampson, stayed at Geneva for a year and a half after Elizabeth came to the throne, and saw the work through. It was finished in 1560, and a dignified preface was dedicated to Elizabeth. The first part was used by the Congregation at Geneva, among whom was John Bodley, father of the founder of the great library at Oxford. Its handy form—a modest quarto—along with its vigorously expressed commentary, made it popular even with people who objected to its source and the occasional Calvinistic tinge of its doctrines. It became and remained the popular edition for nearly three-quarters of a century. The causes of its popularity are explained in Westcott, 126 f. Bodley had received the patent for its publication; and upon his asking for an extension of the patent for twelve years, the request was generously granted by Archbishop Parker and Grindly, bishop of London, though the Bishops' Bible was already begun.

The "Breeches Bible."—The Geneva version is often called the "Breeches Bible" from its tr of Gen 3 7: "They sewed figleaves together, and made themselves breeches." This tr, however, is not peculiar to the Geneva version. It is the tr of perisbomata in both the Wycliffe VSS; it is also found in Caxton's version of the "Golden Legende." Queen Elizabeth, the beginning of whose reign was beset with great difficulties, refused the arrangements of Edward VI. A copy of the Great Bible was required to be provided in every church, and every Bible encouragement was given to the reading of the Scriptures. The defects of the Great Bible were admitted, and were not unnatural result of the haste with which it was brought out. These became more apparent when set beside the Geneva, which, however, the clergy could hardly be expected to receive with enthusiasm, as they had had nothing to do with its origin and had no control over its renderings and marginal notes. Archbishop Parker, moreover, who had to his license to publish the Bishops' Bible, had at the same time a passion for uniformity; and probably to this combination of circumstances may be traced the origin of the Bishops' Bible. Parker superintended the work, which was begun in 1568-69; he was aided by eight bishops—from whom the version received its name—and other scholars. It appeared in a magnificent volume in 1569, without a word of flattery, but with a preface in which the revisers express a lofty consciousness of the importance of their work. It was published in 1569 with privillegio regiae Majestatis. A revised and in many places corrected edition was issued in 1572, and another in 1575, the year of the archbishop's death. The general aim of the version is a quaint literalness, but along with this is found the use of not a few explanatory words and phrases not found in the original text. More exact notice also than in previous VSS is taken of the use of the Gr art. and of the particles and conjunctions. It bears marks, however, of the translation translators by whom the work was done; and of the want of the revision of each translator's work by the rest, and of some general revision of the whole. The Geneva version was the work of collegiate labor, to which much of its superiority is due. Though Parker did not object to the circulation of the Genevan version, Conversations were some unsuccessful attempts to popularize the Bishops' Bible; but the Genevan tr was not easily thrust aside. "It grew," says Eadie (II, 35), "to be in greater demand than the Bishops' or Cranmer's. Ninety editions of it were published in the reign of Elizabeth, as against forty of all the other VSS. Of Bibles, as distinct from New Testaments, there were twenty-five editions of Cranmer's and the Bishops', but sixty of the Genevan.

The production of an official version of the sacred Scriptures for England, of which the Catholics was probably due more to rivalry with the Reformers than to any great zeal of the authorities of the Roman church for the spread of vernacular Scripture, though, according to the Arundellian Constitution above mentioned, it was only to the printing and reading of unauthorized tr that objection was then taken by the Rom authorities. But if there was to be a special version for Catholics, it was clearly reasonable that the work should be done by Catholics and accompanied by Catholic explanations. This was undertaken by some Eng. Catholic scholars who, on the success of the Reformation in England, had received the countrypapers in the N.E. of France, with a short transference of their seminary to Rheims. The version was probably produced under the influence of (Cardinal) Allen and an Oxford scholar, Gregory Martin. It was made from the Vulg, the Bible of Jerome and Augustine, and not, like the Protestant VSS, from the Heb and Gr originals. The NT was issued from Rheims in 1582 and the OT from Douai in 1609. The main objection to the version is the too close adherence of many of the translators to the words of the original and the too great Latinizing of the Eng, so that their tr "needs," as Fuller said, "to be trined." Still they have a few words which along with a few Latinisms were adopted by the translators of the AV, such as "upbraided not," "brilleth his tongue," "at his own charges," and others; and they have the special merit of preserving uniformity of rendering. The tr met with no great success and the circulation was not large.

The last AV of Bishop and Puritan Authorized clergy held (1604) in the interest of Version revision had an impetus to Bible study and Charles James was actually crowned. The meeting was ineffectual in all points raised by the Puritans, but it led to the production of the Eng. Bible. Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, probably with some reference to the rivalry between the Bishops' Bible and the Genevan version, remarked on the imperfections of the current Bibles. The remark was not very enthusiastically received except by the King, who caught eagerly at the suggestion of a fresh version, "professing that he could never yet see a Bible well translated in English," and blaming specially the Genevan version, probably on account of the pointed character of its marginal notes. Probably with the aid of the universities, the King without delay nominated the revisers to the number of fifty-four from among the best Heb and Gr scholars of the day. Only 47 actually took part in the work which, however—officially at least—they were in no hurry to begin; for, although named in 1604 and with all the preliminary arrangements had and settled at the end of the first year, they did not begin their work till 1607. Their remuneration was to be by church preferment, for which the archbishop was to take measures. The immediate expense, the King suggested, should be supplied by the bishops and chapters who, however, did not respond. "King James' version never cost King James a farthing," says Eadie (II, 153 f.), who notes in passing on the text of the copies which was in which the text was preserved, that the first edition of the King James' version was printed in 1611, and the second and third editions in 1612 and 1613, respectively. The text of the first edition was not altered in the second and third editions.

The King James' version was the result of a comprehensive revision of the existing English versions of the Bible, including the Authorized Version (AV), the Geneva Bible, and the Coverdale Bible. The revision was undertaken by a committee of translators, including John Geneva, John Bale, and John Dee, who were appointed by the King. The committee was given the task of revising the existing English versions of the Bible, and the result was the King James' version, which was published in 1611.

The King James' version was intended to be a more accurate and reliable version of the Bible, and it was widely accepted as the standard English version of the Bible for several centuries. It was used as the basis for many later English translations of the Bible, and it is still widely used today.

The King James' version was a significant achievement in the history of the English language, and it is still studied and admired by scholars today. It is a testament to the skill and dedication of the translators who worked on it, and it remains one of the most important and influential works in the English language.
original text and a more correct and not displeasing rendering of the same. A large number of the changes are certainly not such as appeal strongly to popular prejudice. "The Old version of the NT of 1851 has been estimated to differ from that of 1611 in no less than 5,788 readings, of which about a quarter are held notably to modify the subject-matter; though even of these only a small proportion can be considered as of first-rate importance." (Kenyon, 239). On the other hand Heib, and esp. the cognate Semitic languages, are now a great deal better known than before 1611, and considerable improvement is noticeable in the bringing out of the more poetical and metaphorical books. The RV contains the best results of the scholarship of the Victorian age and cannot be regarded as of the greatest utility to the reader and student of the AV. In the religious life the mind is essentially time will show whether the undoubted merits of the RV are such as to outweigh the claims of sentiment and affection with which the AV is held. See further American Revised Version.

Observations—The most complete work on the subject in all its aspects is that by Dr. John Earle, The English Bible: An External and Critical History of the Various English Versions of Scripture, 1876. Earle was himself one of the revisers of 1870, and some of his concluding chapters are a series of remarks on the "History of Revision of the English NT." He is also highly appreciative but judiciously critical of his predecessors in the same field, e.g. of Lees's History of the Old Testament in the English Bible and NT into Eng., 1751, 1818; and Christopher Anderson, The Anals of the English Bible, 2 vols, 1845, 1 vol rev. ed., 1862. An earlier and also very good book is Westcott's General View of the History of the English Bible, 1854. Westcott was also one of the revisers of 1870 and criticizes the work of the various translators as he narrates the succession of the AV. A good discussion of the internal history of the text will also be found in the History of the English Bible by Dr. Moultan, and in Kenyon, Old- and Ancient MSS, 1895, considers specially the text on which the successive Eng. VSS were based. He writes judiciously also on the Wycliffe period and on the RV. The Wycliffe period should also be studied in Forshall and Madden, 4 vols, 4to, Oxford, 1850; England in the Age of Wycliffe, by G. M. Trevelyan; Dr. Gasquet's Our Old English Bible and Other Essays, 1906; and Diezcher's John Wycliffe and His English Preachers, 1st and edited by Lorimer. For the Reformation period generally Foxe's History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church still deserves to be studied. "Foxe's story is doubtless subverted by the facts, although disfigured by credulity and bitter prejudice." For Tyndale's special work see William Tyndale, a Biography, by R. Demus, new ed of L. Lovett, 1889. Fry's Bibliographical Descriptions of the Editions of the NT, Tyndale's Version in Eng., Fry has been used as a valuable work on the English Bible. Cranmer's Bible and the Genevan Version. The AV is very fully described in the works above mentioned, and in a larger collection the author of this is "to Scripture, The Authorized Edition of the English Bible, 1884, and more esp. to his own Eadie, Eadie's Parallel Bible, 1872, and the Eadie-Pepper's Parallel Bible, 1872. More popular histories of the Bible are those of Stoughton, Patterson, 1874, and Professor Milligan of Glasgow, 1895. General histories of England and of Eng. literature may also be profitably committed on the history of the Bible, and time into the vernacular, such as those of Humf. Burnet, Hailam, Proud, Green and Gardner. The revision of the AV called for a large effort on the part of the revisers, is a way of presentation for it or of criticism of it when carried through. To this literature many of the revisers themselves contributed, among whom may be mentioned Eadie,Millis, Wycliffe, Humphry, Newth and Kennedy; nor should the important contributions of Archbishop Trench and Dean Alford, though of a slightly earlier generation, be overlooked. The American revisers also republished a series of Essays written by some of the members of the American Committee on Revision by that committee for the use of its members.

ENGRAFT, en-graft' (Isa 1 21 AV, RV IM-PLANT [q.v.]).

ENGRAVING, en-graving. See CARVING; CRAFTS.

EN-HADDAH, en-had'-a (נַחַד הָדָּה, "en haddah, "swift fountain"): A town in the lot of Issachar mentioned along with En-gannim (Josh 19 21). It is probably identical with Kefr Adan, a village some 3 miles W. of Jenin.

EN-HAKKORE, en-hak'-kör, en-hak'-kör' (נַח-קַוְר לָה, "spring of the partridge"): Interpreted (Jgs 15 19) as meaning "the spring of him that called." So LXX: ἐκ τοῦ εὐκαλυπτούμενου, ρέει τον εὐκαλύπτηνων. The spring was in Lehi but the site is unknown.

EN-HAZOR, en-ha-zor (נַח-זוֹר לָה, 'en hazoır; תַּרְגָּמָה: Ἐαρόν, ρέει Αἰαρόν): A city in the territory of Naphtali mentioned along with Kadesh, Edrei and Iron (Josh 19 37). The ancient name probably survives in that of Hazireh, on the slopes W. of Kedesh. "En-b" (AV "an enlarging")

ENLARGE, en-lärj', ENLARGEMENT, en-lärj'ment: "To enlarge" is very frequently used fig.: "God enlarge Japheth" (Gen 9 27), i.e. "make him a great nation"; or "Thou hast enlarged my steps under me" (2 Sam 22 37), i.e. "Thou hast given me success." A very peculiar use of "enlarge" is found in AV Ps 4 1: "Thou hast enlarged me" (RV "set me at large"), i.e. "Thou hast given me freedom, deliverance from distress." "Our heart is enlarged" (περιτείχομαι, plenitudo; 2 Cor 6 11), and "Be ye also enlarged" (ver 13), express great love of one party to another. See also 1 Sam 2 1, "My mouth is enlarged," i.e. "full of praise." Ezek 41 7, "ze followed" (AV "an enlarging").

Enlargement, AV Est 4 14 from יֶרְחָא, rēxāh, "to enlarge," "to respite," is rendered "relief" by RV in better harmony with "deliverance" with which the word is paired. A. L. Bassluc ENLIGHTEN, en-lit'n: (1) "N., or, "Illumination" in every sense, used in the ordinary sense of giving natural light (Ps 97 4 AV; see also Exz 9 8) or as a sign of health and vigor (1 Sam 14 27 29). "His eyes were enlightened," lit. "became bright." He had become weary and faint with the day's exertions and anxieties, and now recovers (see Job 33 30 and of Ps 13 3). Thus in sickness and grief, the eyes are dull and heavy; dying eyes are gazed; but health and joy render them bright and sparkling, as with a light from within.

(2) In Ps 18 28 AV, the word יֵדָעָה, nēḏāh, fig. describes the believer's deliverance from the gloom of adversity and the restoration of joy in the knowledge of God.

(3) Most frequently the terms so tr mean the giving of spiritual light to the soul (Ps 19 8; Eph 1 18, φωτίζω, φόβοι; Heb 6 4; 10 32). This spiritual enlightening the Spirit of God brings about through the Divine word (Ps 119 130; 2 Tim 3 15; 2 Pet 1 19). Sin mars the intellectual discernment; "but that is spiritual discerneth all things" (1 Cor 2 5 AV). M. O. EVANS

EN-MISHPAT, en-mish'pat. See KADESH.

ENMY, en-m'î (נָמְיו, 'ēḏāh; cf קָרֶנ, 'ēkhra): "Enmy" (hate) occurs as the tr of 'ēḏāh in Gen 3 15, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed," and in Nu 35:21-22, where the absence of enmity on the part of the man-slayer modifies the judgment to be passed on him.

In the NT "enmity" is the term of echthra: Lk 23:12; Rom 8:7, "The mind of the flesh is enmity against God." Gen 2:14, "The friendship of the world is enmity with God!" (because "the world" is preferred to God); in Eph 2:15-16, Christ is said to have "abolished in his flesh the enmity," by His cross to have "slain the enmity," that is, the opposition between Jews and Gentiles, creating in Himself "one new man, so making peace." See also Abolish; Hate.

ENNATAN, ē-nā-tān (Ἐννατάν, Ennatān; AV Ennatan) (a misprint): One of Ezra's messengers to fetch Levites for the temple service (1 Esd 8:44); called "Elnathan" in Ezra 8:16.

ENNOCH, ē-nōk ( النبي, Ḥānōḵ, "initiated"); "Enôḵ, Henôḵ;"

(1) The eldest son of Cain (Gen 4:17,18).
(2) The son of Jared and father of Methuselah, seventh in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Jude ver 14). He is said (Gen 5:23) to have lived 365 years, but the brief record of his life is comprised in the words, "Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God translated him" (Gen 5:24). The expression "walked with God" denotes a devout life, lived in close communion with God, while the reference to his end has always been understood, as by the writer of He, to mean, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him" (He 11:5). See further, Apocalyptic Literature, II, i, 1. A. C. GRANT

ENOCH (CITY): In Gen 4:17 it is narrated that Cain, who had taken up his abode in the land of Nod, E. of Eden (ver 16), built there a city, and called it after the name of his firstborn son Enoch. It is impossible to fix more definitely the locality of this first of cities, recorded, as Delitzsch says (Genesis, in loc.), as registering an advance in civilization. The "city" would be a very simple affair, a place of protection for himself, wife and household, perhaps connected with the fear spoken of in 4:14.

ENNOCH, ETHIOPIAN, ē-nōk, Book of. See Apocalyptic Literature.

ENNOCH, SLAVONIC, sla-von'ěk, Book of. See Apocalyptic Literature.

ENOCH, THE BOOK OF THE SECRETS OF. See Apocalyptic Literature.

ENORMITY, e-nôr'mi-tē: The marginal rendering in AV of Is 66:16 for "wickedness," and in RV of Lev 26:39; 19:29; 20:14 for "wickedness." In each case it is the term of θύμημα, zimmâh, meaning originally, "thought!" or "plot," mostly in a bad sense, wickedness, wickedness; in Lev it is unnatural wickedness—incest.

ENOS, ē-nōs, Enos, ē-nōsh (אֵנוֹשׁ, ēnôshh, "mortal"); "Enôš, Enôšë": In the NT (RV and AV) and the OT (AV except 1 Ch 1:1), the form is Enos; in the OT (RV and 1 Ch 1:1 AV), the form is Enoch. Enos is the son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen 4:26; 5:6ff.; 1 Ch 1:1; Lk 3:38). Enoch denotes man as frail and mortal. With Enoch a new religious development began, for "then began men to call upon the name of Jeh" (Gen 4:26). There seems to be an implied contrast to Gen 4:17 ff which records a development in another department of life, represented by Enoch the son of Cain.

ENQUIRE, en-'kwîr: This is an OE word now obsolete. It is common in AV. In ARV it is nearly always replaced by the more modern "inquire," a few times by "seek" and "ask," once by "salute" (1 Ch 18:10). With this one exception in the OT the change does not affect the meaning. In Acts 23:15, "enquire something more perfectly" is substituted by "judge more exactly." In Mt 10:11, "search out" replaces it. In Mt 2:16, "learned exactly" replaces "inquired diligently." See Inquire.

EN-RIMMON, en-rē'mōn (אֶנ-רִמְמִון, 'En-rimmôn), "the fountain of Rimmon" [see Rimmon], perhaps "the spring of the pomegranate"; Ἐρμόνι, Ἐρμόν, Ἐρμών, Ἐρμώνϊος: A city of Judah (Josh 15:32), "Ain and Rimmon"; ascribed to Simeon (Josh 19:7; 1 Ch 4:32, "Ain, Rimmon"). In Neh 11:11 mentioned as one inhabited after the Captivity. Zac 14:10, runs: "All the land shall be made like the Arabah, from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerus.

It must have been a very southerly place. In the Onom ("Erimmon") it is described as a very large village, and "the dieopolis." Kh. Umm er Ramân, 9 miles N. of Beerseba is the usually accepted site. See PEF, 398; Sh XXIV. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

EN-RGOEL, en-rō'gel (אֶנ-רְגוֹאֵל, 'En-rō'gâl), "en rōgâh;" πῶνη Ἐργώα, πῆτρ Ἐργωᾶ, meaning uncertain, but interpreted by some to mean "the spring of the fuller":

No argument from this meaning can be valid because (1) it is a very doubtful rendering and (2) "fulling" vats are common between Dor撞击 and the neighborhood of most town springs and are today plentiful at both the proposed sites. G. A. Smith thinks "spring of the current," or "stream," from Syr ṛgōl, more probable.

(1) En-rogel was an important landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 16:7; 18:16). Here David's spies, Jonathan and Ahimaaz, hid themselves (2 S 17:17), and here (1 K 1:9) "Abinadab slew sheep and oxen and fatlings by the stone of Zoheleth, which is beside En-rogel," when he anticipated his father's death and caused himself rebelliously to be proclaimed king.

(2) The identification of this important landmark is of first-choice importance in Judah toposgraphy. Two sites have been proposed:

(a) The older view identifies En-rogel with the spring known variously as "the Virgin's Font," 'Ain setti Miriam and 'Ain Umm el deraj, an intermittent source of water which rises in a cave on the W. side of the Kidron valley opposite Siloam (see Girion). The arguments that this is the one Jerus spring and that this must have been a very important landmark are inconclusive. The strongest argument for this view is that put forward by M. Clermont-Ganneau, who favors the "ruin" surface on the mountain slope opposite, an ascent to the village of Sitthan, known as es Zehudeh, a word in which there certainly appears to linger an echo of Zoheleth. The argument is, however, not as convincing as it seems. Firstly, Zoheleth was a stone; this is a natural rock scarp; such a stone might probably have been transferred from place to place. Secondly, it is quite common for a name to be transferred some miles, instances are numerous. Thirdly, the writer of the Apocrypha, after frequent use of the "fallahin of Sitthan," is satisfied that the name is by no means confined to the rock scarp near the spring, but to the whole ridge running along from here to, or almost to, Bir Byyâb itself. The strongest argument against this identification is, however, that there are so much stronger reasons for identifying the "Virgin's Fountain" with Gihon (see Gihon), and that the two springs En-rogel and Gihon cannot be at one site, as is clear from the narrative in 1 K 4.

(b) The view which places En-rogel at Bir Eyygāb in every way harmonizes with the data. It has been objected that the latter is not a spring but a well. It is today a well, 125 ft. deep, but one with an inexhaustible supply—there must be a true spring at the bottom. Probably one reason it only overflows today after periods of heavy rain is that such enormous quantities of débris have now covered the original valley bed that the water cannot rise to the surface; much of it flows away down the valley deep under the present surface. The water is brackish and is impregnated with sewage, which is not extraordinary when we remember that a large part of the rock strata from which the water comes is overlaid by land constantly irrigated by the city's sewage.

Although the well may itself be of considerable antiquity, there is no need to insist that this is the exact position of the original spring En-rogel. The source may in olden times have arisen at some spot in the valley bottom which is now deeply buried under the rubbish, perhaps under the southernmost of the irrigated gardens of the felahíkh of Sūreda. The neighborhood, at the junction of two deep valleys—not to count the small el wād, the ancient Tyrian promontory place for fishing. This would appear to have been considerable disturbance here. An enormous amount of débris from various destructions of the city has collected here, but, besides this, Jos records a tradition which apparently bears this to the neighborhood. He says (Ant. IX, 5, 4) that an earthquake took place once at Erogē—which appears to be En-rogel—when "half of the mountain broke off from the remainder on the W., and rolling with overloads, came to stand on the eastern mountain till the roads, as well as the king's gardens, were blocked." It is sufficient that En-rogel is to be located either at Bir Eyygāb or in its immediate neighborhood; for practical purposes the former will do. En-rogel was an important point on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin. The line passed down the lower end of the Kidron valley, past En-rogel (Bir Eyygāb) and then up the Valley of Hinnom (Wady er Rabbi) to the boundary well adapted to the natural conditions.

With regard to David's spies (2 S 17 17), whereas the Virgin's Fount—the great source of the city's water supply (see Gihon)—just below the city walls (see Zos) was an impossible place of hiding, this lower source, out of sight of almost the whole city and removed a considerable distance from its nearest point, was at least a possible place. Further, the fact that it was off the main road, that it afforded a supply of this necessity of life—water—and that there were, as there today, many natural caves in the neighborhood, greatly added to its suitability.

Here too was a most appropriate place for Adoni-jah's plot (1 K 17 9). He and his confederated dared not go to Gihon, the original sacred spring, but had to content themselves with a spot more secluded, though doubtless still sacred. It is recorded (1 K 4 40-41) that the adherents of Solomon defamed him at Gihon (the Virgin's Fount) and the people "rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them. And Adonijah and all the guests that were with him [at En-rogel] heard it as they had made an end of eating." The relative positions of these two springs allow of a vivid reconstruction of the narrative as do no other proposed identifications. The two spots are out of sight the one of the other, but not so far that the shout of a multitude at the one could not be carried to the other.

ENSAMPLE, en-sam-p'l. See Example.

EN-SHEMESH, en-shē'mesh (אֶנשֶׁ-מְשֶׁ, 'en shemesh, "spring of the sun"): An important landmark on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 7; 18 17). The little spring "Ain el hawd, E. of Bethany, the last spring on the road descending to Jericho, seems to suit the conditions (see Josh 15 7). It is called the "Apostles' Fountain" by Christians, on account of a tradition dating from the 15th cent. that the apostles drank there.

ENSIGN, en'sin. See BANNER.

ENSUE, en-sū': Synonymous with "to pursue," "ensue" is found in 1 Pet 3 11 AV as a tr of διακόνετο, "to follow after," "to be entangled in." Also in Jth 9 5, "such as ensued after" (τὰ προτέρατα, "the things that follow").

ENTANGLE, en-tan'g'l: Found but 5 t in the Scriptures (AV), once in the OT, yet most significant as illustrating the process of mental, moral and spiritual confusion and enslavement.

(1) Used of physical entanglement, as in the mazes of a labyrinth (32 הָבָּה, "to involve," "be perplexed"). At Moses' command the children of Israel, before crossing the Red Sea, took the wrong way in order to give Pharaoh the impression that they were lost in the wilderness and cause him to say "They are entangled in the land" (Ex 14 3).

(2) Mental: "ear. is ensnared," "to entrap," "ensnare," with words, as birds are caught in a snare; cf Ecd 9 12. The Pharisees sought to "entangle" (RV "ensnare") Jesus in His talk (Mt 22 15).

(3) Moral: תָּרוּכָּא, emphēēō, "to inwove," hence intervene and involve. "A good soldier of Jesus Christ," says Paul, does not "entangle himself," i.e. become involved, "in the affairs of this life" (2 Tim 2 4). Having "escaped the defilements of the world," Christians are not to be "again entangled therein" (2 Pet 2 20).

(4) Spiritual: בָּבָה, enebhō, "to hold in," hence to hold captive, as a slave in fetters or under a burden. Having experienced spiritual emancipation, freedom, through Christ from bondage to sin and false religion (Gal 5 1; cf 4 8), the Gentiles were not to become "entangled again in a yoke of bondage" by submission to mere legal requirements, as the external rite of circumcision.

With reference to the thoroughness and irresistibility of God's judgments, we read in Nah 1 10, "For entangled like thorns" (AV "while they be held together as thorns"), damp, closely packed and intertwined, "they are consumed utterly as dry stubble" (AV "devoured as stubble fully dry").

EN-TAPPUH, en-tap'ū-ā, en-ta-pō'ā (תַּפְּתָּה, 'en tap'āh; πᾶς Θαφῆθω, pēs Thaphēthŏth, "apple spring"): Probably in the land of Tappuah which belonged to Manasseh, although Tappuah, on the border of Manasseh, belonged to Ephraim (Josh 17 7 f.). It lay on the border of Ephraim which ran southward E. of Shechem, and is probably to be identified with the spring at Yāsuf, about 3 miles N. of Lebanon.

ENTREAT, en-trēt'. See INTREAT.
ENY, ev'ni (Ἐνύ), kin'ah; ἤθος, ἡθος, ἐθόνος, phthónos); "Envy," from Lat in, "against," and video, "to look," "to look with ill-will," etc., toward another, is an evil strongly condemned in both the OT and the NT. It is to be distinguished from jealousy. "We are jealous of our own; we are envious of another man's possessions. Jealousy fears to lose what it has; envy is pained at seeing another have" (Crabb's Eng. Synonyms). In the OT it is the tr of kin'ah from kādā, "to redden," "to glow" (Job 5 2, RV "jealousy," in "indignation," in 12 11 RV "see they scorch the people; Prov 27 4, etc.); the vb. occurs in Gen 24 18, etc.; Nu 11 29 AV; Ps 106 16; Prov 3 31, etc.; in the NT it is the tr of phthónos, "envy" (Mt 27 18; Rom 1 29; Gal 5 21, "envying," etc); of ἤθος, "resent," "jealousy," "envy" (Acts 13 45), tr. "envying," RV "jealousy" (Rom 13 13; 1 Cor 3 3; 2 Cor 12 20; Jas 3 14.16); the vb. phthónê occurs in Gal 5 26; zélôō in Acts 7 9; 17 5, RV "moved with jealousy"; 1 Cor 10 3, "charity [RV 'love'] envies not." The power of envy is stated in Prov 27 4: "Who is able to stand before envy?" (RV "jealousy"); its evil effects are depicted in Job 5 2 (RV "jealousy"), in Prov 14 30 (RVm "jealousy"); it led to the crucifixion of Christ (Mt 27 19; Mt 27 10); it is one of the sins enumerated in the list of the Pharisees (Gal 5 21; Psal Ps 1.29; 1 Tim 6 6); Christian believers are earnestly warned against it (Rom 13 13 AV; 1 Cor 3 3 AV; Gal 5 26; 1 Pet 2 1). In Jas 4 5 "envy" is used in a good sense, akin to the jealousy ascribed to God. Where AV has "the spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy," RV reads "Doth the spirit which he made to dwell in us long unto envying?"; ARVm "The spirit which he made to dwell in us ye yearneth for unto jealous envy;" cf Jer 14 15; Hos 2 19; or ERVm "That spirit which he made to dwell in ye yearneth [for us] even unto jealous envy." This last seems to give the sense; cf "Ye adulteresses" (ver 4), ARVm "That is, who break your marriage vow to God." W. L. WALKER

EPAENETUS, ep'a-ne-tus (Ἐπανέντως, Epâne-tos, "praised"): One of the Christians at Rome to whom greetings are sent by Paul (Rom 16 5). All that is known of him is told here. Paul describes him thus: "I have never heard of the firstfruits of Asia unto Christ." TR has "firstfruits of Achaia" but this wrong reading is due to 1 Cor 16 15. He was one of the first Christians in the Roman province of Asia.

This salutation brings up the question of the destination of vs 3-16, for it is argued that they are addressed to the church in Ephesus owing to the fact that Priscus and Aquila and Epaphnetus are known to have dwelt in Asia. On the other hand, there are more than 20 others in this list who are not known to have spent any time in Asia. Priscus and Aquila had once dwelt in Rome (Acts 18 2), and there is nothing unusual in an Ephesian dwelling in the capital of the empire. An interesting discovery was made in Rome of an inscription in which was the name of Epaphnetus, an Ephesian.

EPAPHRAS, ep'a-fras (Ἐφαρπάς, Ephárpaś): A contracted form of Epaphroditus. He must not, however, be confounded with the messenger of the Philippian community. He was with Paul during a part of his 1st Roman imprisonment, joining in Paul's greetings to Philemon (Philem ver 25). Epaphras was the missionary by whose instrumentality the Colossians were converted to Christianity (Col 1 7), and probably the other churches of the Lycaus had been founded by him. In sending his salutation to the Colossians Paul testified, "He hath much labor for you, and for them in Laodicea, and for them in Hierapolis" (Col 4 13). Epaphras had brought to Paul good news of the progress of the gospel, of their "faith in Christ Jesus" and of their love toward all the saints (Col 1 4). Paul's regard for him is shown by his designating him "our beloved fellow-servant," "a faithful minister of Christ" (Col 1 7), and "a bond-servant of Christ Jesus" (Col 1 12 m). The last designation Paul uses several times of himself, but only once of another besides Epaphras (Phil 1 1).

EPAPHRODITUS, ep'a-frô-di'tus (Ἐφαρφοδίτως, Ephêphroditès, "lovable"): Mentioned only in Phil 2 15, 18. The name corresponds to the Lat Venustus (=handsome), and was very common in the Roman period. The name occurs very frequently in inscriptions both Gr and Lat, whether at full length Epaphroditus, or in its contracted form Epaphras" (Lightfoot, Philippians, 123). Epaphroditus was the delegate of the Christian community at Philippi, sent with their gift to Paul during his first Roman imprisonment. Paul calls him "my brother and fellow-worker and fellow-soldier." "The three words are arranged in an ascending scale: common sympathy, common work, common danger and toil and suffering" (Lightfoot, i. e.). On his arrival at Rome, Epaphroditus devoted himself to "the work of Christ," both with his own hands and as a missionary. So assiduously did he labor that he lost his health, and was sick nigh unto death. He recovered, however, and Paul sent him back to Philippi with this letter to quiet the alarm of his friends, who had heard of his serious illness. Paul besought for him that the church should receive him with joy and hold him in honor.

EPIPHAN, ep'i-fan, e'phân, "exalted"; Ἐπίφανος, Gephôr [Gen 25 4], ġēfôr, Gaphôr [Isa 60 6]: The name of three persons in the OT, both male and fem.

(1) The son of Midian, descended from Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gen 25 4 = 1 Ch 1 33), mentioned again in Isa 60 6 as a transporter of gold and frankincense from Sheba, who shall thus bring enlargement to Judah and praise to Jeh. According to Fried. Delitzsch, Schrader, and Hommel, "Epiphân is an abbreviation of 'Aýyapá, the Kha- yappa Arabs of the time of Tîglah-pîlesér III and Sargon. See treatment of this view in Dillmann's Comm. on Gen 25 4).

(2) A concubine of Caleb (1 Ch 2 46).

(3) The son of Jahdai, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 2 47).

CHARLES B. WILLIAMS

EPIPHAN, e'fën, e'phən, e'phane, in Ktē, e'phn, e'phai, in K'thîb; Ἐφής, Ἐφές, Ὠφέ, Ὠφῆ, "gloomy," "observing," in LXX): "The Netopha-thite," whose sons were numbered among "the captains of the forces" left in Judah after the carrying away to Babylon (Jer 49 [LXX 47] 8). His sons assembled at Mizpah with Gedalish, governor of the scattered Jews, and with him were slain by Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah (Jer 41 3).

EPHER, e'fër (Ἐφηρ, e'pher, "e'phr, "e'fell," "young deer"); ᾿Αφέρ, ᾿Αφρέ, Ὠφρ, Ὠφρη: (1) The second son of Midian, descended from Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gen 25:4; 1 Ch 1:33). See further Dillmann’s Comm. on Gen (Gen 4). (2) The third son of Ezra, descended from the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 4:17).

(3) The first of five heads of their fathers’ houses, “the chief of the scribes, of the men of valor, famous men,” in the half-tribe of Manasseh, who dwelt between Bashan and Mt. Hermon (1 Ch 7:23-24).

Ephes-dammim, e-fes-dam’mim (יוֹבָם Ἐφέσιον), Ephesians, e-fes’than: A term which, as in Acts 19:28-34.35 and 21:29, was applied to those natives or residents of the city of Ephesus who were adherents of the cult of the goddess Diana. A Jew or a Christian, though a native of Ephesus, would probably have been designated as such, rather than as an Ephesian.

VII. LITERATURE

I. AUTHENTICITY.—None of the epistles which are ascribed to St. Paul have a stronger chain of evidence to their early and continued use than that which we know as the end of this epistle.

1. External Evidence to the Ephesians. Leaving for the moment the question of the relation of Eph to other NT writings, we find that it not only colors the phraseology of the Apostolic Fathers, but is actually quoted. In Clement of Rome (c. 95 AD) the connection with Eph might be due to some common liturgical form in xvi.6 (cf Eph 4:6); though the resemblance is so close that we must feel that our epistle was known to Clement both historically (cf Eph 1:3-4); xxxvii (of 5:21); xxxvi (of 5:18); xxxvi (of 5:21); lix (of 1:18; 4:18). Ignatius (d. 115) shows numerous points of contact with Eph, esp. in his Epistle to the Ephesians. In cap. xii we read: “Ye are associates and fellow students of the mysteries with Paul, who in every letter makes mention of you in Christ Jesus.” It is difficult to decide the exact meaning of the phrase “every letter,” but in spite of the opinion of many scholars that it must be rendered “in all his epistles,” i.e. in every epistle of his epistle, it is safer to take it as an exaggeration, “in all his epistles,” justified to some extent in the fact that besides Eph St. Paul does mention the Ephesian Christians in Rom (16:5); 1 Cor (15:32; 16:8;19); 2 Cor (1:8; 2 tim (1:6) and 2 Tim (1:8). In the opening address the connection with Eph 1:3-6 is too close to be accidental. There are echoes of our epistle in cap. i of Eph (6:1); ix (20-22); xviii (10:10); xx (21:18; 4:24); and in Ignat. ad Polyc. v we have close identity with Eph 5:25 and less certain connection with Eph 4:2, and in vii with Eph 6:13-17. The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians exhibits a textual and formal agreement with Eph: in cap. i with Eph 1:8, and in xii with Eph 4:26, where we have (the Gr is missing here) ὁ στίστις δικαίως εἰς τὴν ἐπιστολὴν. Hermas speaks of the grief of the Holy Spirit in such a way as to suggest Eph (1:5-11; cf Eph 4:20). Sim. IX, xiii, shows a knowledge of Eph 4:3-6, and possibly of 5:26 and 1:13. In the Did (4) we find a ἡ ἐπιστολή ἡμῶν, “Servants submit yourselves to your masters.” In Barnabas there are two or three turns of phrase that are possibly due to Eph. There is a slightly stronger connection between II Clement and Eph, esp. in cap. xiv, where we have the Ephesian figure of the church as the body of Christ, and the relation between them referred to in terms of husband and wife.

This early evidence, slight though it is, is strengthened by the part Eph played in the 2d cent. where, as we learn from Hippolytus, it was used by the Ophites and Basildes and Valentinus. The latter acceding to (cf Ps.-Phil., Phil. VI, 12; Eph 4:30). Eph 16, 18, saying, “This is what has been written in Scripture,” while his disciple Ptolemais is said by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., 1:8, 5) to have attributed Eph 5:13 to St. Paul by name. According to the Tertullian Fragment (106, 1.20) as the second of the epistles which “Paul wrote following the example of his predecessor John.” It is used in the letter from the church of Lyons and Vienne and by Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Theodotus, a contemporary of Valentinus, quoted Eph 4:10 and 30 with the words: “The apostle says,” and attributes Eph 4:24 to St. Paul. Marcion knew Eph as Tertullian tells us, identifying it with the epistle referred to in Col 4:16 as ad Laodicenses. We find it in the Muratorian Fragment (106, 1.20) as the second of the epistles which “Paul wrote following the example of his predecessor John.” It is used in the letter from the church of Lyons and Vienne and by Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen and later writers. We can well accept the dictum of Dr. Hort that it “is all but certain on this evidence that the Epistle was in existence by 95 AD; quite certain that it was in existence but five years later or conceivably a little more” (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 118).

To this very strong chain of external evidence, reaching back to the very beginning of the 2d cent., I add the fact that the phrase of St. Paul to the Ephesians (Eph 1:16), “To be a chaste woman” (μήτρια τῆς ἀρχῆς), renders a more Christological sense than it had before. Eph 1:4, “But his excellency is from God” (ἐξουσία ἐξ αὐτοῦ) is similarly one of the earliest examples of the use of the word “excellence.” In the teaching of St. Paul the word is used in its highest and most comprehensive sense.

(1) That it claims to be written by St. Paul is seen not only in the greeting, “Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God, to the saints that are at Ephesus,” but also in 3:1, where we read: “For this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus in behalf of you Gentiles,” a phrase which is continued in 4:1: “I therefore, the prisoner in the Lord.” This claim is substantiated by the general character of the epistle which is written after the Pauline norm, with greeting and thanksgiving, leading on to and serving as the introduction of the special doctrinal teaching of the epistle. This is the first great division of the Pauline epistles and is the very part often referred to by an application of the teaching to practical matters, which in turn yields many personal greetings, salutations, and the final benediction, commonly written by the apostle’s own hand. In only one particular does Eph fail to answer completely to this outline. The absence of the personal greetings has always been marked as a striking peculiarity of our letter. The explanation of this peculiarity will meet us when we consider the destination of the epistle (see III below).

(2) Further evidence for the Pauline authorship is found in the general style and language of the letter, which is absolutely at variance (Eph. v. 20; Christ. Lit., 294) that "every sentence contains verbal echoes of Pauline epistles, indeed except when ideas peculiar to the Epistle come to expression it is simply a mosaic of Pauline phraseology," without accepting his compo as a whole, a view he did not write it. We feel, as we read, that we have in our hands the work of one with whom the other epistles have made us familiar. Yet we are conscious none the less of certain subtle differences which give occasion for the various arguments that critics have brought against the claim that St. Paul is the actual author. This is not questioned until the beginning of the last century, but has been since Schleiermacher and his disciple Usteri, though the latter published his doubts before his master died. The Tübingen scholars attacked the epistle mainly on the ground of supposed traces of Gnostic or Montanist influences, akin to those ascribed to the Colossians. Later writers have given over this claim to put forward when they differ from Brunner (De Wetstein), followed by Holtzmann, von Soden and others; dependence on Colossians (Hitzig, Holtzmann); the attitude to the Apostles (von Soden); doctrinal differences, esp. those that concern Christology and the Parousia, the concepts of the church (Klopper, Wrede and others). The tendency, however, seems to be toward a saner view of the questions involved; and most of those who do not accept the Pauline authorship would probably agree with Jülicher (23 R), who asserts that "the whole Pauline character of the Epistle is unique, intimately familiar with the Pauline epistles, esp. with Col., writing about 90," who sought in Eph. "to put in a plea for the true catholicism in the meaning of Paul and in his name.

(3) Certain of these positions require that we should examine the doctrinal objections. (a) First of these is the claim that Eph. has a different conception of the person and work of Christ from the acknowledged epistles of St. Paul. Not only have we the exaltation of Christ, which we find in Col. 16 and elsewhere, the earlier writer's further statement that it was God's purpose from the beginning to "sum up all things in Christ, the things in the heavens, and the things upon the earth" (Eph. 1 10). This is no more than the natural expansion of the teaching "all things that were written to Christ in 1 Cor. 6, and is an idea which has at least its foreshadowing in Rom. 8 19,20 and 2 Cor. 5 18,19. The relation between Christ and the church as given in 1 22 and 5 23 is in entire agreement with St. Paul's teaching in Rom. 13 and 1 Cor. 12. It is still the Pauline figure of the church as the body of Christ, in spite of the fact that Christ is not thought of as the head of that body. The argument in the epistle does not deal with the doctrine of the cross from the standpoint of the epistles, but the latter is used as a text, exactly the same. There is redemption (1 7, 14; 4 30); reconciliation (2 14-16); forgiveness (1 7; 4 32). The blood of Christ shed on the cross redeems us from our sin and restores us to God. In like manner it is said that the Parousia is treated (2 7) as something far off. But St. Paul has long since given up the idea that it is immediately; even in 2 Thess. 2 he shows that an indeterminate interval must intervene, and in Rom. 11 25 he sees a period of time yet unfulfilled before the Parousia (6). The doctrine of the cross is the most striking contrast to the earlier epistles. We have already dealt with the relation to Christ of the church. The conception of the church universal is in advance of the earlier epistles, but it is the natural climax of the development of the apostle's conception of the church as shown in the earlier epistles. Writing from Rome with the idea of the empire set before him, it was natural that Paul should see the church as a great whole, and should use the word ecclesia in a more absolutely and universally as the epistle to the Ephesians, (Eph.). As a matter of fact the word is used in this absolute sense in 1 Cor 12 28 before the Captivity Epistles (cf. 1 Cor. 1 2; 10 32). The emphasis here on the unity of Jew and Gentile in the church (as against the other gospels) is a part of the foreshadowing of the Epistle to the Rom., though in Eph this is "urged on the basis of God's purpose and Christian faith, rather than on the Law and the Promises." It may be true that in Eph the Law is spoken of slightly, as some say, by the reference in 24 7 (11). In no case is the doctrinal portion of the epistle counter to that of the acknowledged Pauline epistles, though in the matter of the church, and of Christ's relationship to it and to the universe, there is evidence of progress in the apostle's conception of the underlying truths, which none the less find echoes in the earlier writings. "New doctrinal ideas, or a new proportion of these ideas, is no evidence of different authorship." (c) In the understanding of the organization of the church there is in any essential different from what we have in 1 Cor.

(4) The linguistic argument is a technical matter of the use of Gr. words that cannot well be discussed here. The general claim is that the greater part of the sentences, the repetitions on the one hand; the lack of argument, the full, swelling periods on the other, its evident counterpart in portions of Rom. The minute differences which show themselves in new or strange words will be much reduced in number when we take from the list those that are due to subjects which the author does not discuss elsewhere, or that the author of the Pauline Christology (Holtzmann, (17), 25) gives us a list of those hapax legomena (76 in all). But there are none of these which, as Lock says, "Paul could not have known..." and there are certain which he does not use elsewhere and others which are only found in his acknowledged writings. The following stand out as affording special ground for objection. The phrase "heavenly places" (to epouranioskos, 1 3, 20; 6, 6; 3, 10; 6, 12) is peculiar to this epistle. The phrase finds a partial (1 15 49) and the thought is found in Phil. 3 20. The devil (ho diabolos, 1, 27; 2, 11) is used in place of the more usual Satan (satanas). In Acts St. Paul is quoted as saying diabolos in 13 11, and in 14 10 of his own-words, that he would have used the Gr term when writing from Rome to a Gentile church. The catching commissary, the expression "holy" (haligois) of the apostles (3 5) fails to the ground when we remember that the expression "holy" (hagios) is St. Paul's common word, and that he uses it of himself in this very epistle (3 8). In like manner "mystery" (mathema), "dispensation" (oikonomia) are found in other epistles in the same sense that we find them in here.

The attack on the epistle fails, whether it is made from the point of teaching or language; and there is no ground whatever for questioning the truth of Christian tradition that St. Paul wrote the letter which we know as the Epistle to the Ephesians.

II. Place and Date of Writing.—The time and place of writing Eph turn on the larger question of the chronology of St. Paul's life. It is a question of the relation of the Captivity Epistles to each other; and the second question whether they were written from Caesarea or Rome (for this see Phil., Ephesus). Suffice it here to say that the place was undoubtedly Rome, and the Epistle written during the latter part of the two years' captivity which we find recorded in Acts 28 30. The date will then be, following the later chronology, 63 or 64 AD; following the earlier, which is, in many ways, to be preferred, about 56 AD.

III. Destination.—To whom was this letter written? The title says to the Ephesians. With this the witness of the early church almost universally agrees. It is distinctly stated in the Muratorian Fragment (10b, l. 20); and the epistle is quoted as to the Ephesians by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., v.14, 3; 24, 3; Tertullian (Adv. Marc., v.11, 17; De Praeae., 36; De Monag., v.); Clement of Alexandria (Strom., iv.65; Paed., i.18) and Origen (Contra Celsum, iii.20). To these we may add the evidence of the extant MSS and VSS, which unite in ascribing the epistle to the Ephesians. The only exception to the universal evidence is Tertullian’s account of Marcion (cir 150 AD) who reads Ad Loadoiciens (Adv. Marc., v.11: “I say nothing (contra ibid) saying epistles en Epheos” which we have with the heading ‘to the Ephesians,’ but the heretics ‘to the Laodiaceans’ . . . . [v.17]: According to the true belief of the church we hold this epistle to have been dispatched to the Ephesians, not to the Laodiaceans; but Marcion had to falsify its title, wishing to make himself out a very diligent investigator”).

This almost universal evidence for Ephesus as the destination of our epistle is shattered when we turn to the evidence of the MSS. The MSS are lacking in Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, and that the corrector of the cursive known as 67 has struck them out of his copy. Besides these a recently described MS, Cod. Laura 184, given to us by the present editor, shows that a text is ascribed to Origen by that scribe that it was compiled from Origen’s writings, omits these words (Robinson, Ephesians, 293). To this strong manuscript evidence against the inclusion of these two words in the inscription we must add the evidence of Origen and Basil. Origen, as quoted in Cranmer’s Catena ad loc., writes: “In the Ephesians alone we found the expression ‘to the saints which are,’ and we ask, unless the phrase ‘which are’ is redundant, what it can mean. May it not be that as in Exodus He who speaks to Moses declares His name to be the Absolute One, so also those who are partakers of the Absolute become existent when they are called, as it were, from non-being into being.” Origen evidently knows nothing here of any reading en Epheos, but takes the words “which are” in an absolute, metaphysical sense. Basil, a century and a half later, probably refers to this comment of Origen, for he says (Contra Eunapios, iii.39) when writing to the Ephesians, as to men who are truly united with the Absolute One through clear knowledge, he names them as existent ones in a particular phrase, saying ‘to the saints which are and that are in Christ Jesus.’ For so those who were before us have handed it down, and we also have found [this reading in old copies].” In Jerome’s note on this verse there is perhaps a reference to this comment on Origen, but the passage is too indefinitely expressed for us to be sure what its bearing on the reading really is. The later writers quoted by Lightfoot (Bib. Essaye, 384 f) cannot, as Robinson shows (Eph, 293), be used as witnesses against the Textus Receptus. We may therefore conclude that the reading en Epheos, it is shown in the phrase “the saints which are” (tous oisaias) as absolute, as Origen did; or as meaning “truly,” is impossible. It is possible to take the words with what follows, “and faithful” (kai pistola), and interpret this latter expression (pistola) as the NT：“believers,” or “to the saints who are also believers,” or “to the saints who are also faithful,” i.e. steadfast. Neither of these is wholly in accord with St. Paul’s normal usage, but they are at least possible.

The determining factor in the question of the destination of the epistle lies in the epistle itself. We must not forget that, save perhaps at Corinth, there was no church with which Paul was so closely associated as that in Ephesus. His long residence there, of which we read in Acts (chs 19, 20), finds no echo in our epistle.

There is no greeting to anyone of the Christian community, many of whom were probably intimate friends. The close personal ties, that the scene of Acts 20 17-38 shows us existed between him and his converts in Ephesus, are not even hinted at. The epistle is a calm discussion, untouched with the warmth of personal allusion beyond the opening greeting of the first verse, and so we have the heading ‘to the Ephesians,” but the heretics “to the Laodiaceans” . . . . [v.17]: According to the true belief of the church we hold this epistle to have been dispatched to the Ephesians, not to the Laodiaceans; but Marcion had to falsify its title, wishing to make himself out a very diligent investigator”).

2. The In-Here according to TR we read “Paul scription unto the saints which are at Ephesus [en Epheos] and to the faithful in Christ Jesus.” When we look at the evidence for this reading we find that the.To members en Epheos are lacking in Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, and that the corrector of the cursive known as 67 has struck them out of his copy. Besides these a recently described MS, Cod. Laura 184, given to us by the present editor, shows that a text is ascribed to Origen by that scribe that it was compiled from Origen’s writings, omits these words (Robinson, Ephesians, 293). To this strong manuscript evidence against the inclusion of these two words in the inscription we must add the evidence of Origen and Basil. Origen, as quoted in Cranmer’s Catena ad loc., writes: “In the Ephesians alone we found the expression ‘to the saints which are,’ and we ask, unless the phrase ‘which are’ is redundant, what it can mean. May it not be that as in Exodus He who speaks to Moses declares His name to be the Absolute One, so also those who are partakers of the Absolute become existent when they are called, as it were, from non-being into being.” Origen evidently knows nothing here of any reading en Epheos, but takes the words “which are” in an absolute, metaphysical sense. Basil, a century and a half later, probably refers to this comment of Origen, for he says (Contra Eunapios, iii.39) when writing to the Ephesians, as to men who are truly united with the Absolute One through clear knowledge, he names them as existent ones in a particular phrase, saying ‘to the saints which are and that are in Christ Jesus.” For so those who were before us have handed it down, and we also have found [this reading in old copies].” In Jerome’s note on this verse there is perhaps a reference to this comment on Origen, but the passage is too indefinitely expressed for us to be sure what its bearing on the reading really is. The later writers quoted by Lightfoot (Bib. Essaye, 384 f) cannot, as Robinson shows (Eph, 293), be used as witnesses against the Textus Receptus. We may therefore conclude that the reading en Epheos, it is shown in the phrase “the saints which are” (tous oisaias) as absolute, as Origen did; or as meaning “truly,” is impossible. It is possible to take the words with what follows, “and faithful” (kai pistola), and interpret this latter expression (pistola) as the NT：“believers,” or “to the saints who are also believers,” or “to the saints who are also faithful,” i.e. steadfast. Neither of these is wholly in accord with St. Paul’s normal usage, but they are at least possible.

The determining factor in the question of the destination of the epistle lies in the epistle itself. We must not forget that, save perhaps at Corinth, there was no church with which Paul was so closely associated as that in Ephesus. His long residence there, of which we read in Acts (chs 19, 20), finds no echo in our epistle.

There is no greeting to anyone of the Christian community, many of whom were probably intimate friends. The close personal ties, that the scene of Acts 20 17-38 shows us existed between him and his converts in Ephesus, are not even hinted at. The epistle is a calm discussion, untouched with the warmth of personal allusion beyond the opening greeting of the first verse, and so we have the heading ‘to the Ephesians,” but the heretics “to the Laodiaceans” . . . . [v.17]: According to the true belief of the church we hold this epistle to have been dispatched to the Ephesians, not to the Laodiaceans; but Marcion had to falsify its title, wishing to make himself out a very diligent investigator”).

3. The Evidence of the Letter Itself

There is no greeting to anyone of the Christian community, many of whom were probably intimate friends. The close personal ties, that the scene of Acts 20 17-38 shows us existed between him and his converts in Ephesus, are not even hinted at. The epistle is a calm discussion, untouched with the warmth of personal allusion beyond the opening greeting of the first verse, and so we have the heading ‘to the Ephesians,” but the heretics “to the Laodiaceans” . . . . [v.17]: According to the true belief of the church we hold this epistle to have been dispatched to the Ephesians, not to the Laodiaceans; but Marcion had to falsify its title, wishing to make himself out a very diligent investigator”).

This element in the epistle, coupled with the strange fact of Marcion’s attributing it to the Laodiaceans, and the expression in Col 4 16 that points to a letter coming from Laodicea to Colosse, has led most of the present day to accept Unsscher’s suggestion that the epistle is really a circular letter to the churches either in Asia, or, perhaps better, in that part of Phrygia which lies near Colosse. The readers were evidently Gnostics (2 1; 3 1, 2) and from the mission of Tychicus doubtless of a definite locality, though for the reasons given above this could not well be Ephesus alone. It is barely possible that the cities to whom St. John was bidden to write the Revelation were also towns near Ephesus, possibly because it was so written in the first verse, and from the connection with Colossians, it is at least probable that two of these churches were at Colosse and Laodicea. On this theory the letter would seem to have been written from Rome to churches in the neighborhood of, or accessible to, Colosse, dealing with the problem of Christian unity and fellowship and the relations between Christ and the church and sent to them by the hands of Tychicus. The inscription Ephe to THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA
The connection between Eph and 1 Pet is not beyond question. In spite of the disclaimer of as careful a writer as Dr. Bigg (ICC) it is impossible to follow the references to Eph used by Holtzmann and others and not feel that St. Peter either knew Eph or at least had discussed these subjects with its author. For, as Dr. Hort tells us, the similarity is one of thought and structure rather than of phrase. The following are the more striking passages with their parallels in 1 Pet: Eph 1:8 (1 Pet 1:3); 1:18–20 (1 Pet 1:3–5); 2:18–22 (1 Pet 2:4–6); 3:20–22 (1 Pet 3:22); 3:9 (1 Pet 1:20); 3:20 (1 Pet 1:12); 4:19 (1 Pet 1:14). The explanations that 1 Pet and Eph are both from the pen of the same writer, or that Eph is based on 1 Pet, are overthrown, among other reasons, by the close relation between Eph and Col.

Write

Holtzmann adds various minor similarities, but none of these are sufficient to prove any noticeable dependence on Eph. The contact with the Fourth Gospel is more positive. Love (agapé) and knowledge (gnōsis) are used in the same sense in both the Gospel and the Epistle. The application of the Messianic title, the Beloved (Eph 1:6), to Christ does not appear in the Gospel (it is found in Mt 3:17), but the statement of the Father's love for Him constantly recurs.

The reference to the going up and coming down of Christ (Eph 4:9) is closely akin to Jn 5:13 ("No man hath ascended into heaven, but he"). So, too, Eph 5:11.13 finds echo in Jn 3:19; Eph 4:4.7 in Jn 3:34; Eph 5:6 in Jn 3:36. Eph 5:1 is akin to Jn 1:16 and Eph 2:3 to Jn 3:10.

When we turn to Col we find a situation that is without parallel in the NT. Out of 155 verses in Eph, 78 are found in Col in varying degrees of identity. Among them are these: Eph 1:6 || Col 1:18; Eph 1:16ff || Col 1:9; Eph 1:21ff || Col 1:16ff; Eph 1:25ff || Col 2:1; Eph 4:14 || Col 2:19; Eph 4:22 || Col 3:9; Eph 4:32 || Col 3:12ff; Eph 5:5 || Col 3:5; Eph 5:19ff || Col 3:16ff; Eph 6:4 || Col 2:11; Eph 6:5–9 || Col 3:22–4. For a fuller list see Abbott (ICC, xxii).

New, however, is the notion that the church is the body of Christ, a similarity in argument so great that Bishop Barry (NT Comm, for Eng. Readers, Ellicott) can make a parallel showing the divergence and similarity by the simple device of different type.

To this we must add that there are at least a dozen Gr words common to these two epistles not found elsewhere. Over against this similarity is to be set the dissimilarity. The general subject of the epistles is not approached from the same standpoint. In one it is Christ as the head of all creation, and our duty in consequence. In the other it is the church as the fulness of Christ and our duty—put constantly in the same words—in consequence thereof. In Eph we have a number of OT references, in Col only one. In Eph we have unique phrases, of which "the heavenly spheras" (καταστάσεις) is most striking, and the whole treatment of the relation of Jew and Gentile in the church, and the marriage tie as exemplified in the relation between Christ and the church. In Col we have in like manner passages which are real, but the controversy in ch 2, and the salutations. In truth, as Davies (Ep. St. Paul to Eph, Col, and Phil) well says: "It is difficult indeed to say, concerning the patent coincidences of expression in the two epistles, whether the points of likeness or of unlikeness between them are the more remarkable."

This situation has given rise to various theories. The most complicated is that of H. Holtzmann, who holds that some passages point to a priority of Col, others to that of Eph; and that Col, as we have it, is composite, based on an original epistle of St. Paul which was expanded by the author of Eph—whom was not St. Paul—after he had written this epistle. So Holtzmann would give us the original Col (Pauline), Eph (based on it), and the present Col (not Pauline) expanded from the former through the latter. The theory falls to the ground on its fundamental hypothesis, that Col as it stands is interpolated. The most reasonable explanation is that both Col and Eph are the work of St. Paul, written at practically the same time, and that in writing on the same subjects, to different people, there would be just the differences and similarity which we have in these epistles. The objection that St. Paul could not repeat himself and yet differ as these two letters do is purely imaginary. Zahn shows us that men do just this very thing, giving an account of Bismarck's speaking on a certain subject to a group of officers and later to a large body of men, and yet using quite different language. Moreover, St. Paul was a lawyer, used to argue (cf Rom and Gal and 1 Tim and 2 Tim) when to do so will serve his purpose. "Simultaneous authorship by one writer," and that writer St. Paul, is the only explanation that will satisfy all the facts in the case and give them their proper weight.

V. The Purpose. If our interpretation of the circumstances, composition and destination of Eph be right, we are now in a position to look beneath the surface and ask why the apostle wrote it. To understand its central theme we must remember that St. Paul, the prisoner of the Lord, is writing in the calm of his imprisonment, far from the noise and turmoil, the conflict and strife, that marked his earlier life. He is now able to look out on the church and get a view of it in its wholeness, to see the part it is to play in God's scheme for the restoration of the human race, to see God's purpose in it and for it and its relation to Him. With this standpoint he can write to the churches about Ephesus, on the occasion of his release (cf Col 1:4, "a to correct false views on some special point, but to emphasize the great central truth which he had put in the very forefront of his letter. God's eternal purpose is to gather into one the whole created universe, to restore the continuity of creation between them and Himself. The apostle's whole prayer is for this end, his whole effort and desire is toward this goal: that they may have full, clear knowledge of this purpose of God which He is working out through Christ Jesus, who is the head of the church, the very fulness of Him who is being fulfilled all over the world. Everything, for the apostle, as he looks forth upon the empire, centers in the purpose of God. The discord between the elements in the church, the distinction between Jew and Gentile, all these must yield to that greater purpose. The vision is of a great oneness in Christ and through Him in God, a oneness of birth and faith and life and love, as men, touched with the fire of that Divine purpose, seek to fulfill, each in himself, the part that God has given him to play in the world, and, fighting against the foes of God, to overcome at last.

It is a noble purpose to set before men this great mystery of God's means by which, in Christ, He may restore all men to union with Himself. It is an impossible vision except to one who, as St. Paul was at the time, is in a situation where the strife and turmoil of outside life can enter but little, but a situation where he can look out with a calm vision and, in the midst of the world's—cord, discern what God is accomplishing among men.

VI. Argument.—The Argument of Eph is as follows:

1. Greeting (1-2):

1 1-10: Hymn of praise to God for the manifestation of His purpose for men in Christ Jesus, chosen from the beginning to a holy life in His love, to be adopted as sons through Jesus Christ, in whom as the Beloved He has predestined us (vs 1-6). Redeemed by the blood of Christ by whom we have forgiveness of sins through His grace abounding in us and making us know the mystery of His unchangeable love for all through the entire universe (vs 7-10).

1 11-14: For this Israel has served as a preparation, and to this the Gentiles are come, sealed unto salvation by the Holy Spirit of power.

1 14-15: Thanksgiving for their faith.

1 16-21: Prayer that they may, by the spirit of wisdom and revelation, know their destiny and the power of God to fulfill it.

1 22-2:10: Summary of what God has done in Christ: God's sovereignty (vs 22-24), and headship in the church (vs 22,23): His work for men, quickening us from a death of sin into which man has sunk, and existing us to fellowship with Christ by His grace, which has created us for good works as part of His eternal purpose (1:10).

1 11-13: The contrast between the former estate of the Gentiles, as strangers and aliens, and their present one, as citizens of the heavenly kingdom (1:11-13).

1 14-18: Christ, who is our peace, uniting Jew and Gentile and reconciling man to God through the cross; by which He has access to the Father and has power to fulfill His will in His character as God.

1 19-22: This is theirs who are fellow-citizens of the saints, built up on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, become a temple of God in the Spirit.

1 21-2: A digression on the "mythology," i.e., the revelation, of the pagans, that man may grasp it. The "mythology" is that all men, Jews and Gentiles, are brought together in the priesthood of this lit. Paul is a minister, to whom has been given the stewardship of that mystery, unfolding to all creatures God's wisdom, in its briefest expression: "with the mystery of Christ." (1:18-19). Prayer that they may live up to their opportunities (vs 14-19).

2 1-6: The outcome of this privilege, the fulfillment of the Divine purpose, must show itself in unity of life in the Christian fellowship.

2 7-16: The different gifts which the Christians have are for the upbuilding of the church into that perfect unity which is found in Christ.

2 17-24: The spiritual darkness and corruption of the old Gentile life set over against the enlightenment and purity and holiness of the new life in Christ.

3 1-6: Special features of the Christian life, arising out of the union of Christians with Christ and making for the fellowship in the church. On the side of the individual: sins in word (4:25-30); of temp (vs 31-32); self-sacrifice as opposed to self-indulgence (5:1-8); the continuation of the love of Christ and the passing of this (vs 9-14) general behavior (vs 15-20); on the side of social relations: husband and wife exemplified in the relation of Christ and the church (vs 25-33); children and parents (6:1-4); servants and masters (vs 5-9).

3 10-13: The Christian warfare, its foes and armor and weapons.

3 21-34: Conclusion.

VII. Teaching.—The keynote to the doctrinal basis of the epistle is struck at the very outset. The hymn of praise centers in the thought of God, the Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ. It is to Him that the blessing is due, to Him, who had chosen us from the beginning, in whom there is redemption (1:3-7). God as the very heart and soul of every thing, "the firstborn among all created things." (4:6).

He is the Father from whom all revelation comes (1:17), and from whom every human family derives its distinctive characteristics (3:15). But He is not only Father in relation to the universe: He is also the Head of the church. The significance of the Head is that He is the Beloved Son (1:6) clearly a Messianic term, as the voice from heaven at Christ's baptism, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," shows (Mt 3:17). In Him we are quickened (2:5). He is made up of His church (2:5). He died on the cross (ver 10), and by His blood (1:7) we have redemption (4:30), and reconciliation with God (2:16).

raised from the dead (1:20), now is in heaven (1:20; 4:8) from which place He comes (4:5), bringing gifts to men. (This interpretation makes the descent follow the ascents, and the Lord's return the return of Christ through His gifts of the Spirit which He gave to the church.) He is who in heaven fills all things (ver 10); and, from a wealth which is unsearchable (3:8), as the Head of the church (1:22), pours out His grace to free us from the power of evil (1:21). To this end He endues us with His Spirit (3:16). This teaching about God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, is no abstract theorizing. It is all intensely practical, having at its heart the purpose of God from the ages, which we saw above, is to restore again the unity of all things in Him (1:9-10); to heal the breach between man and God (2:16,17); to break down the separation between Jew and Gentile, and to abolish the enmity not only between them, but between them and God. This purpose of God is to be accomplished in a visible society, the one church, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets (ver 20), of which Jesus Christ is the head of the corner, into which we are meant to be admitted by holy baptism, where they own one Lord, hold to one faith, in one God and Father of all who is above and through all (4:4-7).

The teaching as to the church is one of the most striking elements of the epistle. In the first place we have the church as the one body which has been already discussed. The apostle sees the whole Christian community throughout the world bound together into a unity, one fellowship, one body. He has risen to a higher vision than man had ever had before. But there is a further teaching in the epistle. Not only is the church throughout the world one body, but it is the body of Christ who is its Head (1:21 f). He has, as Lightfoot suggests, the same relation to the church which in ver 10 He has to the universe. He is its Head, "the inspiring, ruling, guiding, combining, sustaining power, the mainspring of its activity, the center of its unity and the seat of its life." But the relation is still closer. If, as the evidence adduced would necessitate, one accepts J. Armitage Robinson's explanation of πλοῖον, as that without which a thing is incomplete (Eph, 255 f), then the church, in some wonderful mystery, is the complement of Christ, apart from which He Himself, as the Christ, lacks fulness. We are needed by Him, that so He may become all in all. He, the Head of restored humanity, the Second Adam, needs His church, to fulfill the unity which He came upon earth to accomplish (of Stone, Christian Church, 85, 86). Still further, we find in this epistle the figures of the church, as the Temple of the Spirit (2:21 ff), and the Bride of Christ (5:23 ff). Under the latter figure we find the marriage relation of the Lord to Israel, which runs through the Old Testament (Hos 3:1, 6, et al.), applied to the union between Christ and the church. The significance of the close tie that binds them, the self-sacrificing love of Christ, and the self-surrender of obedience on the part of the church; and the object of this is that so the church may be free from any blemish, holy and spotless. In the figure of the Temple, which is an expansion of the earlier figure in 1 Cor 3:16; 2 Cor 6:16, we see the thought of a spiritual building, a sanctuary, into which all the diverse elements of the churches grow into a compact unity. These figures sum up in the community which the Divine purpose finds its fulfillment. The progress forward to that fulfillment is due to the combined effort of God and man. "The church, the society of Christian men . . . . is built and yet grows. We need a further church to cooperate in its development" (Westcott). Out of this doctrinal development the apostle works out the practical life by which this Divine purpose can find its fulfillment. Admitted into the fellowship of the church by baptism, we become members one of another (4:23). It is on this basis that he urges harmony among the believers as a means of living together with each other, and pleads for gentleness and a forgiving spirit (vs 25-32). As followers of God we are to keep free from the sins that spring from pride and self-indulgence and any fellowship with the spirit of evil (5:1-14). Our life is to be lived as seeking the fulfillment of God’s purpose and the fulfillment of all the relationships of life (5:15-6:9). All is to be done with the full armor of the Christian soldier, as is fitting for those who fight spiritual enemies (6:10ff). The epistle is predominantly practical, bringing the significance of the great revelation of God’s will to the everyday duties of life, and lifting all things up to a higher level which finds its ideal in the indwelling of Christ in our hearts, out of which we may be filled with all the fulness of God (3:17-19).

CHARLES SMITH LEWIS

EPHESUS, Ἐφέσος, Ephesos, “desirable”: A city of the Roman province of Asia, near the mouth of the Cayster river, 3 miles from the western coast of Asia Minor, and opposite the island of Samos. With an artificial harbor accessible to the largest ships, and rivaling the harbor at Miletus, standing at the entrance of the valley which reaches far into the interior of Asia Minor, and connected by highways with the chief cities of the province, Ephesus was the most easily accessible city in Asia, both by land and sea. Its location, therefore, favored its religious, political and commercial development, and presented a most advantageous field for the missionary labors of Paul. The city stood upon the sloping sides and at the base of two hills, Prion and Coressus, commanding a beautiful view of the city below, its climatic climate, mild, and the soil of the valley was unusually fertile.

Tradition says that in early times near the place where the mother goddess of the earth was born, the Amazons built a city and a temple in which they made their worship. This little truth in our literature, bearing at different times the names of Samornia, Trachea, Otygia and Ptelea, flourished until in the early Gr days it aroused the cupidity of Androcles, a prince of Athens. He captured it and made it a Gr city. Still another tradition says that Androcles was its founder. However, under Gr rule the Gr civilization gradually supplanted that of the Orientals, the Gr language was spoken in place of the Asiatic, and the Asiatic goddess of the temple assumed more or less the character of the Gr Artemis. Ephesus, therefore, and all that pertained to it, was a mixture of oriental and Gr. Though the early history of the city is obscure, it seems that at different times it was in the hands of the Carianus, the Lelges and Ionians; in the early historical period it was one of a league of twelve Ionian cities. In 560 BC it came into the possession of the Lydians; 3 years later, in 557, it was taken by the Persians; and during the following years the Greeks and Persians were constantly disputing for possession. Finally Alexander the Great took it; and at his death it fell to Lysimachus, who gave it the name of Arsinoe, from his second wife. Upon the death of Attalus II (Philippus), king of Pergamos, it was bequeathed to the Rom Empire; and in 190, when the Rom province of Asia was formed, it became a part of it. Ephesus and Pergamos, the capital of Asia, were the two great rival cities of the province. Though Pergamos was the center of the Rom religion and of the government, Ephesus was more accessible, the commercial center and the home of the native goddess Diana; and because of its wealth and situation it gradually became the chief city of the province.

It is to the temple of Diana, however, that its great wealth and influence are largely due. Like the city, it dates from the time of the Amazons, yet what the early temple was like we now have no means of knowing, and of its history we know little excepting that it was seven times destroyed by fire and rebuilt, each time on a scale larger and grander than before. The wealthy king Croesus supplied it with many of its stone columns, and the present temple is of all the ancient buildings the most magnificent.

In time the temple possessed valuable lands; it controlled the fisheries; its priests were the bankers of its enormous revenues. Because of its strength the people stored there their money for safe-keeping; and it became to the ancient world practically all that the Bank of England is to the modern world.

In 356 BC, on the very night when Alexander the Great was born, it was burned; and when he grew to manhood he offered to rebuild it at his own expense if his name might be inscribed upon its portals. The priests of Ephesus were unwilling to permit, and they politely rejected his offer by saying that it was not fitting for one god to build a temple to another. The wealthy Ephesians themselves undertook its reconstruction, and 220 years passed before its final completion.

Not only was the temple of Diana a place of worship, and a treasure-house, but it was also a museum in which the best statuary and most beautiful paintings were preserved. Among the paintings was one by the famous Apelles, a native of Ephesus, representing Alexander the Great hurling a thunderbolt. It was also a sanctuary for the criminal, a kind of city of refuge, for none might be arrested for any crime whatever when within a bowshot of its walls, and it was, in a sense, the Amazons to which the temple a village in which the thieves and murderers and other criminals made their homes. Not only did the temple bring vast numbers of pilgrims to the city, as does the Kaaba at Mecca at the present time, but it employed hosts of people apart from the priests and priestesses; among them were the large number of artisans who manufactured images of the goddess Diana, or shrines to sell to the visiting strangers.

Such was Ephesus when Paul on his 2d missionary journey (Acts 18:19–21) first visited the city, and when, on his 3d journey (19:8-10; 20:31), he remained there for two years preaching in the synagogue (19:8.10), in the school of Tyrannus (19:9) and in private houses (20:20). Though Paul was probably not the first to bring Christianity to Ephesus, for Jews had long lived there (2:9; 6:9), he was the first to make progress against the worship of Diana. As the fame of his teachings was carried by the pilgrims to its possession, his influence extended to every part of Asia Minor. In time the pilgrims, with decreasing faith in Diana, came in fewer numbers; the sales of the shrines of the goddess fell off; Diana of the Ephesians was no longer great; a Christian church was founded there and flourished, and one of its first leaders was the apostle John. Finally in 262 AD, when the temple of Diana was again burned, its influence had so far departed that it was never again rebuilt. Diana was the chief goddess of the women of Ephesus, and in 341 AD a council of the Christian church was held there. The city itself soon lost its importance and decreased in population. The sculptured stones of its great buildings, which were no longer in use and were falling to ruins, were carried away to Italy, and esp. to Constantinople for the great church of Saint Sophia. In 1308 the Turks took possession of the little that remained of the city, and deported or murdered its inhabitants. The Cayster river, overflowing its banks, gradually covered with its muddy deposit the spot where the temple of Diana had once stood, and at last its very site was forgotten.

The small village of Ayasaluk, 36 miles from Smyrna on the Aidin R.R., does not mark the site of the ancient city of Ephesus, yet it stands nearest to its ruins. The name Ayasaluk is the corruption of three Gr words meaning “the Holy Word of God.” Passing beyond the village one comes to the ruins of the old aqueduct, the fallen city walls, the so-called church of St. John, the bath of the Turkish fort which is sometimes called Paul’s prison, the huge theater which was the scene of the riot of Paul’s time, but which now, with its marble torn away, presents but a hole in the side of the hill Frequent raids from Mr. J. T. Wood, for the British Museum, obtained permission from the Turkish government to search for the site of the lost temple of Diana. During the eleven years of his excavations at Ephesus, $80,000 were spent, and few cities of antiquity have beheld such a century of exploration. The city wall of Lysimachus was found to be 36,000 ft. in length, inclosing an area of 1,027 acres. It was 10½ ft. thick, and strengthened by towers at intervals of 100 ft. The six gates which pierced the wall are now marked by mounds of rubbish. The sites and dimensions of the various public buildings, the streets, the harbor, and the foundations of many of the private houses were ascertained, and numerous inscriptions and sculptures and coins were discovered. Search, however, did not reveal the site of the temple until January 1, 1870, after six years of faithful work. Almost by accident it was then found in the valley without the city walls, several feet below the present surface. Its discovery brought about an arrangement which enabled Mr. Wood to reconstruct the entire temple plan. The temple was built upon a foundation which was reached by a flight of ten steps. The building itself was 425 ft. long and 220 ft. wide; each of its 127 pillars which supported the roof of its colonnade was 60 ft. high; like the temples of Greece, its interior was open to the sky. For a further description of the temple, see Mr. Wood’s excellent book, Discoveries at Ephesus. J. E. BANKS.

EPHOD, e’fod (יוּד, ye’ad; LXX εποδή, ἐφόδος, ἐφόδθος; ephôd, ἐφόδος, ἐφόδ, ἐφόδθ, ἐφόδθος, ἐφόδθιος, ἐφόδθαι, στολὴ ἐξαλλος, στολὴ ἐξαλλος, στολὴ ἐξαλλον, στολὴ ἐξαλλον); 1) A sacred vestment originally designed for the high priest (Ex 28 4 ff.; 39 2 ff.), and made of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, held together by two shoulde rpieces and a skilfully woven band which served as a girdle for the ephod. On the shoulde rpieces were two onyx stones engraved with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. It is not known whether the ephod extended below the hips or only to the waist. Attached to the ephod by chains of pure gold was a breastplate containing twelve precious stones in four rows. Underneath the ephod was the blue robe of the ephod extending to the bottom of the priest. The robe of the ephod was thus a garment comprising, in addition to the long robe proper, the ephod with its shoulderpieces and the breastplate of judgment.

2) From the historical books we learn that ephods were worn by persons other than the high priest. Thus the boy Samuel was girded with a linen ephod while assisting the aged high priest (1 S 2 18); the priests at Nob, 85 in number, are described as men wearing a linen ephod (28 18); and David was girded with a linen ephod when he danced in the procession that brought the ark into Jerusalem (2 S 6 14). The ephod was considered appropriate for the king on this solemn and happy occasion; but it would be reading into the narrative more than it contains to infer that lay worshipers were regularly clothed with the ephod; nor are we to suppose that priests other than the high priest were accustomed to wear ephods as rich and elaborate as that of the high priest. Abiathar, who became high priest after the assassination of his father by Doeg, probably brought to the camp of David the ephod worn by the high priest in his misin

EPHOD, e’fod (יוּד, Ye’ad): Father of Haniel, prince of Manasseh (Nu 24 23).

EPHIPHATHA, ef’ha-tha, ef’ ha-tha (’Ephâpha, Eph’phathâ): Aram. word used by Christ (Mt 7 34), the ’Ephâha’al imper of Aram, petlhâ (Heb petlah), translated “Be thou opened” (cf. Is 35 5). The Aram. was the sole language of Pal (II Par. Hg 9) and its use shows that we have here the graphic report of an eyewitness, upon whom the dialectic form employed made a deep impression. This and the corresponding act of the touch with the moistened finger is the foundation of a corresponding ceremony in the Roman Catholic formula for baptism.
Ephraim

Ephraim, Ephraim, Ephraim (בֶּן-עָפָרָיָם, 'ephrayim; "double fruit"): The younger of the two sons of Joseph and Asenath, born in Egypt.

1. The Patriarch
   - He and his brother Manasseh were adopted by Jacob, and ranked as his own sons, each becoming the ancestor of a tribe in Israel. In blessing his grandchildren, despite their father's protest, Jacob preferred the younger, foreshadowing the future eminence of his descendants (Gen 41:50 ff; 48:20 ff). In the Blessing of Jacob, however, the two are included under the name of Joseph (pp 49 ff).

   At the first census on leaving Egypt, Ephraim's men of war numbered 40,500; and at the second census they are given as 52,500 (Nu 1:33; 26:37). See, however, art. Numbers.

2. The Tribe
   - The head of the tribe on the Exodus was Eliashama, son of Ammihud (1:10).
   - With the standard of the tribe of Ephraim on the W. of the tabernacle in the desert march were Manasseh and Benjamin (15:18 ff).
   - The Ephraimites among the spies was Hoshea (i.e. Joshua), the son of Nun (13:8).
   - The division of the land Ephraim was represented by prince Kemuel, son of Shiphtan (34:24).
   - The future power of this tribe is again foreshadowed in the Blessing of Moses (De 33:17). That it was a tribe of men, Moses died, as he, Joshua, whose faith and courage had distinguished him among the spies, succeeded to the chief place in Israel. It was natural that the scene of national assemblies, and the center of the nation's worship, should be chosen within the land occupied by the children of Joseph, at Shechem and Shiloh respectively. The leadership of Ephraim was further emphasized by the rule of Samuel.
   - From the beginning of life in Pal they enjoyed a certain prestige, and were very sensitive on the point of honor (Jos 7:24; 8:1; 12:1 ff). Their acceptance of and loyalty to Saul, the first king chosen over Israel, may be explained by his belonging to a Rachel tribe, and by the close and tender relations existing between Joseph and Benjamin.
   - But they were never reconciled to the passing of the scepter to Judah in the person of David (2 S 2:8 ff). That Israel would have submitted to the sovereignty of Abolam, any more than to that of David, is not to be believed; but his revolt furnished an opportunity to the northern tribes for the shrewd blow at the power of the southern tribe (15:13). Solomon's unwisdom and the crass folly of Rehoboam in the management of the northern tribes fanned the smoldering discontent into a fierce flame. This may be why the work of the Jebel Jebel was longer, and from the day of the disruption till the fall of the Northern Kingdom there was none to dispute the supremacy of Ephraim, the names Ephraim and Israel being synonymous.
   - The most distinguished of Ephraim's sons were Joshua, Samuel and Jeroboam I.

3. The Territory
   - The central part of Western Pal fell to the children of Joseph; and, while the boundaries of the territory allotted to Ephraim and Manasseh respectively are given in Jos 16:1; the Canaanites in certain cities of both divisions were not driven out. It was probably thought more profitable to enslave them (16:10; 17:13).
   - The boundaries of Ephraim cannot be followed with accuracy, but roughly, they were as follows: the southern boundary, agreeing with the northern border of Benjamin, started from Bethel, and passed down westward by neither Beth-horon and Gezer toward the sea coast; in yr 3 it met the tops at upper Beth-horon; it turned northward to the southern bank of the brook Kanah (Wady Kanah) along which it ran eastward (17:10) to Michmethath (the plain of Makkheh); thence it went northward along the western edge of the plain to Shechem. It then bent eastward and southward past Taanath-shiloh (Bethshan), Janoah (Yanun) to Ataroth and Naarah (unidentified) and the Jordan (16:7). From Ataroth, which probably corresponds to Ataroth-addar (see 16:7), possibly identical with Ataroth, the southern border passed up to Bethel.
   - Along the eastern front of the land thus defined there is a steep descent into the Jordan valley. It is torn by many gorges, and is rocky and uninhabited. The花椒 slopes are well watered, however, furnish much of the finest land in Pal. Well watered as it is, the valleys are beautiful in season with cornfields, vineyards, olives and other fruit trees. The uplands are accessible at many points from the maritime plain; but the great avenue of entrance to the country runs up Wady es-Sha in Nablous, where the road, threading the pass between Gerizim and Ebal, it descends to the Jordan valley. In this favored region the people must have lived in the main a prosperous and happy life. How appropriate are the prophetic allusions to these conditions in the days of Ephraim's moral decay (Isa 28:1-4; Jer 31:18; Hos 9:13; 10:11, etc)!

Ephraim

(1) A position apparently of some importance, since the position of Baal-hazor (probably = Tell Asur), where Abraham's sheep-farm was located, is determined by relation to it (2 S 15:25). That it lay N. of Jerusalem seems to be indicated in yr 26.

(2) The town near the wilderness to which Jesus retired after the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11:54).

This probably corresponds to Ephraim of Onom (A.V. "Afra") 6 Roman miles N. of Jerus. and therefore to be sought somewhere in the neighborhood of Sinjil and el-Lubbân. Connected with this may have been the name Aphaerema, a district in Syria mentioned in 1 Mac 11:34; Ant. XIII, iv, 9.

The antiquity of the site is attested by the cisterns and rock tombs which stand in the midst of the olive plantations including the plains of Jericho and the Dead Sea. See Ephron.

Ephraim, Forest of (בְּנֵי אֲפָרְיָם; ya'ar 'ephrayim): The word ya'ar (Heb) probably agrees in meaning with the Arab. 'Afra', which indicates a rough country, abounding in rocks, stones and scrub, with occasional trees; not a "forest," as we understand the term. Here Abalâm was defeated and slain (2 S 18:6 ff, AV "wood of Ephraim"). It must be sought, therefore, E. of the Jordan, in the neighborhood of Mahanaim; but no identification is yet possible.

Ephraim,Gate of. See Jerusalem.

Ephraim,Mount (בֵּין אֲפָרְיָם, har 'ephrayim): Means that part of the mountain which fell to Ephraim (Josh 19:50, etc). The natives speak today of Jebel Nablus, Jebel Safad, etc, meaning that section of the central range which is subject to each city. It is better therefore to retain the rendering of AV, and not to read with RV "hill-country of Ephraim."

Ephraim,Wood of. See Forest of.

Ephraimites, Ephraimite (בְּנֵי אֲפָרְיָם, 'ephrayim; sing. בֵּין אֲפָרְיָם, 'ephrāthi): A member of the tribe of Ephraim (Josh 16:10, etc). See also Ephraimite.
Ephrath, Ephrain, Ephron, Ephronite, Ephron Thath, Ephronites, Ephron Thathites, ephrath, ephrat (אפרתה, אפרת; אפרת; אפרדו, אפרדו; Gen 35:16; 48:7; Ephrathath, Ephra-thah, eph-ra-tha, eph-rá-tha (אפרת), אפרת), in the other references: Josh 15:50 [in added vers of LXX only]; Ruth 4:11; 1 Ch 2:19.24.50; Ps 132,6; Mic 5:2, AV “Ephrathah”): The name either of Bethlehem itself or of a district in which Bethlehem was situated. A man of this place was called an Ephrathite (Ruth 1:2; 1 S 17:12). It is held by many authorities that the Ephratath where Rachael was buried (Gen 35:16; 48:7) was a different place, the words “the same is Bethlehem” being a gloss. The reading in Ps 132:6 is doubtful; RVM has “Ephratham.”

Ephrathite, Ephran, Ephran Thath, se Ephrath.

Ephron, Ephron Thath (אפרון, אפרון, אפרון), “Ephronite, Ephronites, Ephronites (אפרון, אפרון, אפרון):” The Hittite of whom Abraham bought the field and cave of Machpelah (Gen 23:6 ff.; 26:30; 49:30). The transaction was conducted in true oriental fashion, with excessive courtesy, but the large sum of 400 shekels' weight of silver was in the end required (cf 33:19; 1 K 16:24). See also Money, Money, Current.

Ephron, Ephron Thath (אפרון, אפרון, אפרון): (1) 2 Ch 13:19: “And Abijah pursued after Jeroboam, and took cities from him, Beth-el with the towns thereof, and Jeshanah with the towns thereof, and Ephron with the towns thereof.” Another reading is “Ephrathim” (RVM). This is thought by many to be identical with Ophrah (אפרת, אפרת, Josh 18:23) and perhaps with Ephram (אפרה, אפרה, Ephrayim, 2 S 13:23) which both have been localized at the lofty town of Eftiyobih.

(2) A city E, of the Jordan between Carmion (Asheroth-karnain) and Scythopolis (Beisan): “Then Judas gathered together all the Israelites that were in the country. . . . Now when they came unto Ephron (this was a great city in the way as they should go, very well fortified) they could not turn from it either on the right hand or on the left, but they must needs pass through the midst of it” (1 Mach 6:45 46 AV; Ant. XII, viii, 5; also 2 Mach 12:27). Buhl and Schumacher propose Yada el Ghofer, a ruined tower which completely commands the deep Yada el Ghofer, but the ruins appear to be scanty.

(3) Mt. Ephron: The border of Judah is described (Josh 15:9): “It went out to the cities of Mount Ephron.” The position will depend on that of Nephtoch and of Kiriath-jearim.

E. W. G. Masterman

The Epicureans with the Stoics (q.v.) encountered Paul in Athens (Acts 17:18). They were the followers of Epicurus, a philosopher who was born in Samos in 341 BC, and who taught first in Asia Minor and afterward in Athens till his death in 270 BC. His system, unlike most philosophies, maintained its original form, with little development or dissent, to the end of its course. The chief of Paul's opponents of this school may therefore be gathered from the teaching of Epicurus.

The conditions for the rise of Epicureanism and Stoicism were political and social rather than intellectual. Speculative thought had reached its zenith in the great con-

1. Social and Political Causes of the epiclopeadic system of Aristotle. Criticism of these would necessarily drive men back upon themselves to probe deeper into the meaning of experience, as Kant did in later times. But the conditions were not propitious to pure speculation. The breaking up of the Gr city-states and the loss of Gr independence had filled men's minds with a sense of insecurity. The institutions, laws, and customs of society, which had hitherto sheltered the individual, now gave way; and men demanded from philosophy a haven of rest for their homeless and weary souls. Philosophy, therefore, became a theory of conduct and an art of living.

Epicurus deprecated the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, whether as philosophy or science, and directed his inquiries to the two practical questions: What is the aim of life? and How to attain to it? Philosophy he defined as "a daily business of speech and thought to secure a happy life.”

His ethical teaching is therefore the central and governing factor of Epicurus' philosophy. It belongs to the type generally described as Epicastic as Epicastic Hedonism. The same general hedonistic principles had been taught by Aris-tippeus and his school, the Cyrenaics, a century earlier, and they were again revived in the 17th cent. in England by Thomas Hobbes.

The aim and end of life for every man is his own happiness, and happiness is primarily defined as pleasure. "Wherefore we call pleasure the Alpha and Omega of a blessed life. Pleasure is our first and kindred good. It is the starting-point of every choice and of every aversion, and to it we come back, insomuch as we make feeling the rule by which to judge every good thing" (Epicurus, Letter to Menocaus). So far Epicurus might seem to be simply repeating the view of the Cyrenaics. But there are important differences. Aristippus held the pleasure of the moment to be the end of action; but Epicurus taught that life should be so lived as to secure the greatest amount of pleasure during its whole course. And in this larger outlook, the pleasures of the mind came to occupy a larger place than the pleasures of the body. For happiness consists not so much in the satisfaction of desires, as in the suppression of wants, and in arriving at a state of independence of all circumstances, which secures a peace of mind that the privations and changes of life cannot disturb. Man's desires are of various kinds: “Some are natural, some are groundless; of the natural, some are necessary as well as natural, and some are natural only. And of the necessary desires, some are necessary if we are to be happy, some if the body is to be rid of uncleasiness, some if we are even to live.” Man's aim should be to suppress all desires that are unnecessary, and esp. such as are artificially produced. Learning, culture, civilization and the distractions of social and political life are proscribed, much as they were in the opposite school of the Cynics, because they produce many desires difficult to satisfy, and so disturb the peace of mind. The mind is a little compared to that of Rousseau and even of Buddha. Like the former, Epicurus enjoins the withdrawal of life from the complexities and perplexities of civilization, to the bare necessities of Nature, but he stops short of the doctrine of Nirvana, for life and the desire to live he regards as good things. He even rises above the superficial resemblance to that of his opponents, the Stoics. The end

3. Back to Nature

Naturism is a view that has some kinship with modern Spiritualism, in his affirmation of the mastery of mind over adverse circumstances. “Though he is being tortured on the rack, the wise man is still happy.”

Epicurus’ definition of the end of life and of the way to it bears the superficial resemblance to that of his opponents, the Stoics. The end

4. Ataraxy sought by both is ataraxia, “imper¬ turbability,” a peace of mind that transcends all circumstances, and the way to it is the life according to Nature. But Nature for Epicurus is purely physical and material, and the utmost happiness attainable is the complete absence of pain.

He justly protests against the representation of his teaching as gross and immoral. “When we say, then, that pleasure is the end and

5. Pleasure aim, we do not mean the pleasures of Is the Ab¬

Pain

supposedly through ignorance, prejudice or wilful misrepresentation. By pleasure we mean the absence of pain in the body and trouble in the soul” (Letter to Menaeceus). His own life was marked by a simplicity verging on asceticism, and by kindly consideration for his friends. But the theory was capable of serving the purposes of worse men to justify license and selfishness.

Justice and ordinary morality were recognized in the system as issuing from an original social compact, such as Hobbes found them, so Rousseau

6. Social Contract

interested and residing upon the self interest and happiness of individuals who entered into the compact the better to gain those ends. Ordinary morality has therefore no stronger sanction than the individual’s desire to secure his own happiness. Against public violations of the moral code, the sanction finds its agent in the social order and the penalties it inflicts; but the only deterrent from secret immorality is the fear of being found out, and this necessarily disturbs, and is necessarily dismaying to that fear itself. Friendship, the supreme virtue of Epicureanism, is based upon the same calculating selfishness, and is to be cultivated for the happiness it begets to its owners. The fundamental defect of the system is its extreme individualism and self-interest, that denies any value of their own to the social virtues, and in the negation of the larger activities of life.

Epicurus had no interest in knowledge for its own sake, whether of the external world, or of any ultimate or supreme reality. But he found men’s minds full of ideas about the world, immortality and the gods, which disturbed their peace and filled them with vain desires and fears. It was therefore necessary for the practical model of his philosophy to find a theory of the things outside of man that would give him tranquillity and serenity of mind.

Epicurus, however, did not give up Democritus’ atomic theory of the world. The original constituents of the universe, of which no account could be given, were atoms, the void, and motion. By a fixed law or fate, the atoms moved through the void, so as to form the world as we know it. The same uniformity of law that exists for all that exists. Epicurus modified this system so far as to admit an initial freedom to the atoms, which enabled them at the beginning of their universal existence to move as they felt like over the void, and so to impinge, combine and set up rotatory motions which the worlds, that was that in them, came into being.

7. Atomic Theory

He did not follow the idea of freedom in the way the man beyond the exigencies of his theory, and the thoroughly materialistic nature of his universe precluded him from deducing a moral realm. By this theory he gets rid of the causes of fear and anxiety that disturb the human mind. Technology, providence, a moral order of the universe, the art of living, the god of nature, mortality, hell, reward and punishment after death, are all excluded from common thought, where only the physical and the material can form the basis of everything. The soul, like the body, is made of atoms, but of a smaller or finer texture. In death, the one like the other dissolves and goes out of existence.

From the same premises one would expect the complete denial of any Divine beings. But it is a curiosity that the system at all allows that a god might exist. As a theory of knowledge nothing should require the affirmation of the existence of the gods and their actions, since only the theory that every idea must have been produced by a corresponding object would fail. Therefore, gods must exist to produce those ideas, which come to men in sleep and dreams. But they are not such gods as men generally believe to exist. They are constituted of the same atomic matter as men, but of a still finer texture. They dwell in the intermundus, the interstices outside the worlds, where earthly cares and the dissolution of death cannot approach them. They are immortal and completely blessed. They cannot therefore know anything of the world, with its pain and its troubles, nor can they be in any way concerned with it. They are apostrophes of the Epicurean sage, entirely withdrawn from the world’s turmoil, enjoying a life of peace and safety, and satisfied with the knowledge that Nature provides for them. “The notion of the gods seems to me to be a comfort and a necessity enjoy immortality with supreme resep, far removed and withdrawn from our concerns; since they exempt from every bodily danger, strong in its own resources, not wanting aught of us, it is splendidly obtained by favorably interpreting the world (Lucretius). All religion is banned, though the gods are retained. Epicurus failure to carry the logic of his sys¬ tem to the denial of gods is an instance of his theory of ideas. He was impressed by the fact that a steadfast unalterability continued to prevail among men without exception” that gods exist. “A consciousness of god does not allow him to deny the exist¬ ence of God altogether. Hence his attempt to explain that as not to interfere with his general theory” (Wallace, Epicureanism, 209).

During his lifetime, Epicurus attracted a large following to his creed, and it continued to flourish far down into the Christian era. It was presented to the Rom world by the poet Lucretius in his poem De natura rerum, which is still the chief source for the knowledge of it. One OT writer, the author of Ecel, may have been influenced by its spirit, though he did not adopt all its ideas.

The personal charm and engaging character of Epicurus himself drew men to him, and elevated him into the kind of hero that success as was the custom of all schools of philosophy. The system was clearcut and easy to state in 2094. It has offered a plausible theory of life such as could not follow the profounder and more difficult speculations of other schools. Its moral teaching found a ready response in all that was worldly, commonplace and self-seeking in men that had lost their high ideals and great enthusiasm. Above all it deliv¬ eried men from the terrors of a dark superstition that had taken the place of religion. It is a remark¬ able revelation of the inadequacy of Gt religion that Epicurus should have relegated its gods to the invisible world, without any sense of loss, but only the relief of a great deliverance.

It was inevitable that the teaching of Paul should have brought this school up against him. He came to Athens teaching a God who had become a judge and a rewarder of the righteous and the law and died to accomplish the utmost self¬ thesis of Paul’s teaching according to their deeds reward or punish them in a future world. To the Epicurean this was the revival of all the ancient and hated superstitions. It was not only but impiously; for Epicurus had taught that "not the man who denies the gods worshipped by the multitude, but he who affirms of the gods that they are of no multitude believe about them, is truly impious."

A written communication; a term inclusive of all forms of written correspondence, personal and official, in vogue from an early antiquity. As applied to the twenty-one letters, which constitute well-nigh one-half of the NT, the word "epistle" has come to have chiefly a technical and exclusive meaning. It refers, in common use, to the communications addressed by five (possibly six) NT writers to individual or collective churches, or to single persons or groups of Christian disciples. Thirteen of these letters were written by St. Paul; three by St. John; two by St. Peter; one each by St. James and St. Jude; one—the epistle to the Hebrews—by an unknown writer.

As a whole the Epistles are classified as Pauline, and Catholic, i.e. general; the Pauline being divided into two classes: those written to churches and to individuals, the latter being known as Pastoral (1 and 2 Tim., Titus, Philem., 1 and 2 John; see Lange on Romans, Am. ed. 16).

The fact that the NT is so largely composed of letters distinguishes it, most uniquely, from all the sacred writings of the world. The Scriptures of other oriental communities—Brahman, Zend Avesta, the Tripitaka, the Koran, the writings of Confucius—lack the direct and personal address altogether. The Epistles of the NT are specifically the product of a new spiritual life and era. They deal, not with truth in the abstract, but in the concrete. They have to do with the soul's inner experiences and processes. They are the burning and heart-throbbing messages of the apostles and their confrères to the fellow-Christians of their own day. The chosen disciples who witnessed the events following the resurrection of Jesus and received the power (Acts 1 $8$) bestowed by the Holy Spirit on, and subsequent to, the Day of Pentecost, were spiritually a new order of men. The only approach to them in the spiritual history of mankind is the ancient Heb prophets. Consequently the Epistles, penned by men who had experienced a great redemption and the marvelous intellectual emancipation and quickening that came with it, were an altogether new type of literature. Their object is personal. They relate the vital truths of the resurrection era and the fundamental principles of the new teaching, to the individual and collective life of all believers. This specific aim accounts for the form in which the apostolic letters were written. The logic of this practical aim appears conspicuously in the orderly Epistles of St. Paul who, after the opening salutation in each letter, lays down the basis for the doctrinal basis on which he builds the practical duties of daily Christian life. Following these, as each case may require, are the personal messages and affectionate greetings and directions, suited to this familiar form of address.

The Epistles consequently have a charm, a directness, a vitality and power unknown to the other sacred writings of the world. Nowhere are they equalled or surpassed except in the personal instructions that fell from the lips of Jesus. Devoted exclusively to experimental and practical religion they have, with the teachings of Christ, become the textbook of the spiritual life for the Christian church in all subsequent time. For this reason "they are of more real value to the church than all the systems of theology, from Origen to Schleiermacher" (Schaff on St. Paul's Epistles, Hist of Christian Church, 741). No writings in history so unfold the nature and processes of the redemptive experience. In St. Paul and St. John, esp., the pastoral instinct is ever supreme. Their letters are too human, too personal, too interior to be mere Epistles. They throb with passion for truth and love for souls. Their directness and affectionate intensity convert their authors into prophets of truth, preachers of grace, lovers of men and missionaries of the cross. Hence their value as spiritual biographies of the writers is immeasurable. As letters they are the most spontaneous and the freest form of writing, the NT Epistles are the very life-blood of Christianity. They present theology, doctrine, truth, appeal, in terms of life, and pulsate with a vitality that will be fresh and re-creative till the end of time. (For detailed study of their chronology, contents and distinguishing characteristics, see arts. on the separate epistles.)

While the NT Epistles, in style and quality, are distinct from and superior to all other lit. of this class, they nevertheless belong to a form of personal and written address in common to all ages. The earliest known writings were epistolary, unless we except some of the royal letters and inscriptions of the ancient Bab and Assyrian kings. Some of these royal inscriptions carry the art of writing back to 3800 BC, possibly to a period still earlier (see L. Oppenheim, Rt's Historical Series, 42-43, secs. 40-41), and excavators have sought to light "an immense mass of letters from officials to the court—correspondence between royal personages or between minor officials," as early as the reign of Khammurabi of Babylon, about 2275 BC (ib, 33). The civilized world was astonished at the extent of this international correspondence as revealed in the Am Tab (1450 BC), discovered in Egypt in 1887, among the ruins of the palace of Amenophis IV. This mass of political correspondence is thus approximately synchronous with the Heb exodus and the invasion of Canaan under Joshua.

As might be expected, then, the OT abounds with evidences of extensive epistolary correspondence in and between the oriental nations.

4. Letters

That a postal service was in existence in the OT in the time of Job (Job 9 25) is evident from the Heb term דְּחָזָן, ḏēḥān, signifying "runners," and used of the mounted couriers of the Persians who carried the royal edicts to the provinces of their dominion. The development of this courier service in the OT occurs in Est 3 13-15; 8 10.14 where King Ahasuerus, in the days of Queen Esther, twice sends royal letters to the Jews and straps of his entire realm from India to Ethiopia, on the swiftest horses. According to Herodotus, these were usually stationed, for the sake of the garrison, in the isles. In Philemon, the letters to Ephraim and Manasseh were sent in the same way (2 Ch 30 1 6.10). Other instances of epistolary messages or communications in the OT are David’s letter to Joab concerning Uriah and sent by him (2 S 11 14.15); Jezebel’s, to the elders and nobles of Jezreel, sent in Ahab’s name, regarding Naboth (1 K 21 8.9); the letter of Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to Jehoram, king of Israel, by the hand of Naaman (2 K 5 5.7); Jehu’s letters to the rulers of Jezreel, in Samaria (2 K 10 1.2.6.7); Sennacherib’s to Hezekiah of Judah (2 K 18 14; Isa 37 14; 2 Ch 32 17), and also that of Merodach-baladan, accompanied with a gift (2 K 20 12; Isa 39 1). Approximating the NT epistle in purpose and spirit is the letter of earnest and loving counsel sent by Jeremiah to the exiles in Babylon. It is both apostolic and pastoral in its prophetic fervor, and is recorded in full (Jer 29 1.4–32) with its reference to the bitterly hostile and jealous letter of Sennacharib, the false prophet, in reply.

And more specifically with regard to the Babylon captivity must have been a great stimulus to letter-writing on the part of the separated Hebrews, and between the far East and Pal. Evidence of this appear in the histories of Ezra and Nehemiah, e.g. the correspondence, based usually on the correspondence, on the enemies of the Jews at Jerus and Artaxerxes, king of Persia, written in the Syrian language (Ezr 4 7–23); also the letter of Tattenai (AV “Tatnai”) the governor to King Darius (Ezr 5 6–17); that of Maaseiah (Ezr 8 33) and to Asaph, keeper of the royal forest (Neh 2 8); finally the interchange of letters between the nobles of Judah and Tobiah; and those of the latter to Nehemiah (Neh 6 17.19; so Sanballat ver 5).

The OT Apoc contains choice specimens of personal and official letters, approximating in literary form the epistles of the NT. In each case they begin, like the latter, in true epistolary form with a salutation: “greeting” or “beginning greeting” (1 Mace 11 30.32; 12 6.20; 15 2.16), and in two instances closing with the customary “Fare ye well” or “Farewell” (2 Mace 11 27–33. 34–38; cf 2 Cor 13 11), so universally characteristic of letter-writing in the Hellenistic era.

The most obvious and perhaps the first of official correspondence in the NT is Claudius Lysias’ letter to Felix regarding St. Paul (Acts 23 25–30). Equally complete in form is the letter sent, evidently in duplicity by the apostles and elders to their brethren in the provinces of Asia (Acts 15 23–29). In these two letters we have the first, and with Jas 1 1, the only, instance of the Gr form of salutation in the NT (χαίρετε, χαίρετω). The latter is by many scholars regarded as probably the oldest letter in epistolary form in the NT, being in purport and substance a Pastoral Letter issued by the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem to the churches of Antioch, Syria and Cilicia. It contained instructions as to the basis of Christian fellowship, similar to those of the great apostle to the churches under his care.

The letters of the high priest at Jerusalem commending Saul of Tarsus to the synagogues of Damascus are some of the earliest letters in NT epistolary form, being in purport and substance a Pastoral Letter issued by the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem to the churches of Antioch, Syria and Cilicia. It contained instructions as to the basis of Christian fellowship, similar to those of the great apostle to the churches under his care.

Worthy of classification as veritable epistles are the letters, under the special guidance of the Holy Spirit, to the seven churches of Asia (Rev 2 1–3 22). In fact, the NT epistolary letters are in form, beginning with the benedictory salutation of personal and apostolic address, and closing with the benediction common to the Pauline epistles. This again distinguishes the NT lit. in spirit and form from all other sacred writings, being almost exclusively direct and personal, whether in vocal or written address. In this respect the gospels, histories and epistles are alike the product and exponent of a new spiritual era in the life of mankind.

This survey of epistolary writing in the far East, and esp. in the OT and NT periods, is not intended to obscure the distinction between the letter and the epistle. A clear line of demarcation separates them, owing not merely to differences in form and substance, but to the exalted spiritual mission and character of the apostolic letters. The characterization of a letter as more distinctly personal, confidential and spontaneous, and the epistle as more general in aim and purpose is founded on the fact that the latter accounts only in part for the classification. Even when addressed to churches Paul’s epistles were as spontaneous and intimately and affectively personal as the ordinary correspondence. While in the one form of the letter-books of the writers of the NT ever anticipated such extensive and permanent use of their letters as is made possible in the modern world of printing. The epistles of the NT are lifted into a distinct category by the transcendent endowment and power, and have given the word epistle a meaning and quality that will forever distinguish it from letter. In this distinction appears that Divine element usually defined as inspiration: a vitality and spiritual endowment which keeps the writings of the apostles permanently “living and powerful,” where those of their successors pass into disuse and obscurity.

Such was the influence of the NT Epistles on the lit. of early Christianity that the patristic and pseudoepigraphic writings of the next century assumed chiefly the epistolary form. In letters to churches and individuals the apostolic Fathers, as far as possible, reproduced their spirit, quality and style. Such literature is called epistolary.

Pseudo-epistles extensively appeared after the patristic era, many of them written and circulated in the name of the apostles and apostolic Fathers. See APOCRYPHAL EPIS-

EPISTLES. This early tendency to hide epistles ambitious or possibly heretical writings under apostolic authority and Scriptural guise may have accounted for the anathema pronounced by St. John against all who should attempt to start new books or detract from one epistle (Rev 22 18.19). It is hard to be supposed that all the apostolic letters and writings have escaped destruction. St. Paul in his epistles refers a number of times to letters of his that do not now exist and that evidently were written quite frequently to the churches under his care (1 Cor 6 9; 2 Cor 10 9.10; Eph 3 3); “in every epistle” (2 Thess 3 17) indicates not merely the apostle’s uniform method of subscription but an extensive correspondence. Col 4 16 speaks of the letters “from Laodicea,” now lost, doubtless written by St. Paul himself to the church at Laodicea, and to be returned by it in exchange for his epistle to the church at Colosse.

EQUAL, e'kwal (toso, issos): In Ezek (18 25. 29; 33 17-20), "The way of the Lord is not equal," translates Heb gadoshen for tāḥon, "to weigh," and means "is not adjusted to any fixed standard," "arbitrary," "fitful," and, therefore, "not equitable, fair, or impartial" (LXX "is not set straight"). Cf same Heb word in 1 S 2 3, where the Lord is said to be "equally resolved.

(1) They are the "sisters" (to-os, tāsin) of those nations which were to be "brothers" (to-ō, tāsin) of Israel. This is well expressed in the context.

The precise meaning of tāso in Jn 5 18, "making himself equal with God," is clearly defined by the preceding clause, for Our Lord's opponents say that He has "called God His own Father." (Or idon patēr, i.e. His Father in a peculiar and exclusive sense; cf idōn huiōn of Rom 8 32, applying the same adj. to the Son in His relation to the Father, i.e. His Son in a sense in which no one else can claim the title). They correctly interpreted the language of Jesus as declaring that He was the Son of God in a way that put Him on an equality with God. The charge against Him is not that He said that He was "like" (hēmoinos), but that He was "equal" (issos), i.e. of the same very rank and authority.

H. E. JACOBS

EQUALITY, e'k-wel-i-ti (tōrēn, isōtē): In 2 Cor 8 14, lit. "out of equality," i.e. "in equal proportion" or "that there may be equality." In Phil 2 6, it occurs in a paraphrase of Gr to énuv tās theō, "the being on an equality with God." In this much-discussed passage, tāso, according to a not unusual Attic idiom, is construed adverbially (see Meyer on passage), meaning, therefore, not 'the being equal' (AV), which would require tāso, but "the having equal prerogatives and privileges." The personal equality is one thing; the equality of attributes is another, and it is the latter which is here expressed (Lightfoot). The "being on an equality" with God was, of course, what the Pharisees sought to prove by the "having equal prerogatives" which are both deductions from the possession of the "form of God." The thought is that if He who had "the form of God" had under all circumstances exercised His Divine attributes, He would have been employing only what belonged to Him, and would in no way have derogated from what belongs only to God. We regard this as referring to the incarnate Son in His historical manifestation. H. E. JACOBS

EQUITY, e'k-wi-ti: Is synonymous with "uprightness," which is found in Prov 17 26; Is 59 14; Mal 2 6 in place of AV "equity." Ecol 2 21 has "skillfulness" and RVM "success" for AV "equity." The context favors this tr of ה"ץץ, kishrōn, which is derived from ה"ץץ, kāsher, "to succeed." Equity is the spirit of the law behind the letter; justice is the expression of the spirit of equity; honesty is the general everyday use of justice or fairness, equity being the interior or abstract ideal. The Court of Equity overrides the Court of Common Law, deciding not upon terms, but the spirit of the deed.

ER, ēr ("Er", "er", "watcher"; "H'p, E'p"): (1) The eldest son of Judah, the son of Jacob, by Shua the Canaanite. Judah took for him a wife named Tamar. It is recorded that Er "was wicked in the sight of Jeh; and Jeh slew him" (Gen 38 36; 43 12).

(2) "Er the father of Lechah" is mentioned among the "sons of Shelah the son of Judah" (1 Ch 4 21).

(3) An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy in the 7th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

ERA, e'ra: We find no definite era in use in OT times, and such usage does not appear until we reach the period of the Maccabees. There are some references to important events that might have served as eras had they been generally accepted and constantly employed. Such was the Exod; and this is referred to as the starting-point in fixing the date of the building of Solomon's temple (1 K 6 1), and also for the date of Aaron's death (Nu 33 38).

An earthquake is referred to by Amos (1 1) as a well-known event by which to date the beginning of his prophetic career; and Ezekiel in two passages refers to the captivity of Judah as a date for marking certain events in his life. Of these the Exodus would have been the most appropriate event to use as an era, since it marked the birth of the Hebrew nation; but the universal custom of antiquity was to date from the regnal years of the kings, as we see in the history of Egypt and Babylonia and Assyria; this custom was followed by the Hasmoneans as well as by the Christians, and was continued down to the Captivity. After the return of the Jews they naturally adopted the regnal years of the Pers kings, under whose rule they were, until the overthrow of the kingdom by Alexander. After this event, the era which was most widely in Syria was that of the Seleucid kingdom, which began in 312 BC, and must have been familiar to the Jews, and we have evidence that they made use of it. When Simon the Maccabaeus secured the independence of the Jews from the Seleucid king, Demetrius II, in 141-140, they began to date their instruments and contracts from this event as is stated in 1 Macc 13 41.42; and we find that the year of their independence is fixed by reference to the Seleucid era, the first year of Simon being the 170th of that era (see Jos, Ant, XIII, vi, 7). After this they used the era of Simon, dating by the regnal years; but whether they used this as a permanent era during the Asmonean Dynasty or dated simply from events, we do not know. There is no doubt that the Seleucid era continued to be used throughout the country for several centuries after the downfall of the Seleucid kingdom, as we have abundant evidence from inscriptions. When the Roman provincials of Syria and Pal, their era was of course employed by Rom officials, but this did not prevail among the people. The dynasty of the Herods sometimes employed their own regnal years and sometimes those of the emperors, as appears from their coins. The Jews must have been familiar with the era employed by some of the Phoen towns, such as Tyre and Sidon. Tyre had a local era which began in 250 BC, and Sidon one beginning in 112 BC; and most of the towns on the coast used the era of Alexander, dating from the battle of Issus, until the establishment of the Seleucid era. The Jews would be familiar with these from their commercial connections with the coast towns, but we do not know that they used them. They did not adopt the era of the Creation until after the time of Christ. It was fixed at 4,000 years before the destruction of the later temple, or 3760 BC.

ERAN, e'ran ("Erān, e'rān, "watcher," "watchful"); "Eš'ēn, Eshēn": The son of Ephraim's oldest son Shuthelah (Nu 26 36). Erantes, the descendants of Eran (ib).
ERASTUS, ē-ras’tus ("Ērastos, Ėratos, "beloved"): The name occurs three times, each time denoting a companion of Paul.

1. Erastus was sent with Timothy from Ephesus into Macedonia while Paul remained in Asia for a while. They are designated “two of them that ministered unto him” (Acts 19:22).

2. “Erastus the treasurer of the city” sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom 16:23). He was apparently an important person in the Corinthian community, and with Gaus probably represented that church in these fraternal relations with the Rome community.

3. Erastus is one who, in 2 Tim 4:20, “remained at Corinth.”

We have no means of discovering whether one or more than one person is meant in these references. A. C. Headlam (UDB, s. v.) thinks it improbable that one who held an office implying residence in one locality should have been one of Paul’s companions in travel. On the other hand Paul may be designating Erastus (Rom 16:23) by an office he once held, but which he gave up to engage in mission work.

ERECH, ē-rek, ē’rek ( Heb., Ėrēk; Gr. Ὑρέχ, Ὑρέχ): The second of the cities founded by Nimrod, the others being Young Babel, Eridu, and Calneh (Gen 10:10). The derivation of the name is well known, Eréch being the Sumerian Urup, a word meaning “seat,” probably in the sense of “presidential seat.” The character with which it is written enters into the composition of the Bab names of Larsa and Ur of the Chaldees.

Its identification with Warka, on the left bank of the Euphrates, half-way between Hillah (Babylon) and Korsia, is beyond a doubt. It is 1. Ety- about 12 miles from the sea.

2. Position and Nature: thought that the Euphrates must have flowed nearer to the city in ancient times, as the Gilgamesh legend relates that that hero and his companion Enkidu washed their hands in the stream after having killed the divine bull sent by the godess Ishtar to destroy them. The shape of the ruin is irregular, the course of the walls of the N.E. having been seemingly determined by that of the N. E. canal (Shat-en-Nil), which flowed on that side. The extreme length of the site from N. to S. is over 3,000 yds., and its width about 2,800 yds. This space is very full of remains of buildings; and the foundations of the walls, with their various gateways, walls and defences, are traceable even now.

Two great deities, Ishtar and Ninmah, were worshipped in this city, the temple of the former being Eanna, “the house of heaven” (or “of Anu,” in which case it is probable that the god of the heavens, Anu, was also worshipped). Their shrine dedicated to Ishtar is apparently called on account of the layers of matting at intervals of 4 or 5 ft. This is the great temple-tower (ziqurat) of the site, called E-gipar-imina, “the house of 7 enclosures.” The remains are situated in a large courtyard measuring 530 ft. by 270 ft. As in the case of other Bab erections, the corners are directed toward the cardinal points, and its height is about 100 ft. above the desert-plain.

As Erech is mentioned with Babylon, Niffer (Calneh) and Eridu, as one of the cities created by Merodach (Eninnu), it is clear that it was classed with the other nine foundation cities of Babylonia. It was in the city of Gilgamesh, the half-mythical king of the earliest period, who seems to have restored the walls and temples. Its earliest known ruler of historical times was Encekaldu-anna, about 4000 BC. The celebrated storehouse of Istar at Erech was mentioned in Genesis 11:2, but the present city of the site.

4. History: was already in existence in the time of the City’s of Lugal-zaggisi, who came somewhat later. King Dungi (2600 BC) restored etc. Eanna and built its great wall.

5. Literary Remains: the importance of the site.

6. The City’s Numerous Names: Ub-imina, “the 7 regions”; Uru-gipara-imina, “the city of the 7 enclosures”; and Uruk-nupuri, “Erech of the fold” (the name which it always bears in the Gilgamesh legend), given to it either on account of its being a center where pastoral tribes gathered, or because of the flocks kept for sacrifice to its deities.

B. The Tombs of the town and the country around, Late Date: the number of the numerous glazed earthenware (slipper-shaped) cufins and other remains, used for and in connection with the burial of the dead, occur. These are mostly of the Parthian period, but they imply that the place was regarded as a necropolis, possibly owing to the sanctity attached to the site.

ERI, ē’ri, ERETES, ē’rite’s (Gr., ē’rī, “watcher”): The fifth of the seven sons of Gad (Gen 46:16; Nu 26:16). Patronymic, Erites (ib.), a clan of Gad.

ERI-AKU, ēr-i-ā-kū, ēr-i-ā-kū': This is the probable Sumerian reading of the well-known Bab name written with the characters for "servant" (Sem ārdu) and the group standing for the Moon-god Sin (written Én-zi-um), otherwise Aku, the whole Name and its Etymology (Ellasar—cf that art.), is generally identified with the Arōr (q.v.) of Gen 14 9. Several Assyriologists read the name with the Sem Bab pronunciation of Warad-Sin; and, if this be correct, there would be a certain amount of doubt as to the generally received identification; though this, on the other hand, might simply prove that the ancient Hebrews obtained their transcription from a Sumerian source.

In addition to a number of contract-tablets, the following inscriptions mentioning Eri-Aku or Warad-Sin are known:

2. Inscriptions Mentioning Eri-Aku or Warad-Sin:
   (1) A dedication, by Kudur-mabuk, "father of Martu" (Amēra), the landowner of the Amorites, son of Simit-Sīlāk, Eri-Aku of some sacred object to the Moon-god Nannar, for his own life and that of Eri-Aku, his son, the king of Larsa.
   (2) A dedication, by Eri-Aku, to Istar of Hallabu, for his own life and that of his father and begetter Kudur-mabuk, the text records the restoration of Ḡnarr’s sanctuary.
   (3) A dedication, by Eri-Aku, to the god Nannar, for the preservation of his own life and that of his father, Kudur-mabuk. The restoration of several temples is referred to.
   (4) An inscription of Eri-Aku, “the powerful man,” “the nourisher of Ur [of the Chaldees], the king of Larsa, the king of Sumer and Akkad; son of Kudur-mabuk, the father of Emutūba.” The text records that he raised the wall of Ur, called “Nannar is the consolidator of the foundations of the land,” high like a mountain.
   (5) A dedication by Eri-Aku to Niin-insina (titles as above). It records the building of the temple En-inamatal, for his own life, and the life of Kudur-mabuk, the father his begetter.

3. The Nationality and Sumerian of Elam. Kudur-mabuk would seem to be a motive of Family policy, to have given his sons Sumerian and Sem Bab names; and it is noteworthy that he did not retain the rule of Larsa for himself, but delegated it to his offspring, keeping for himself the domain of Emutūba and, as his own inscription shows, the land of the Amorites. With regard to these it may be noted, that the expression adda, “father,” probably means simply “administrator.”

Eri-Aku seems to have died while his father was still alive, and was succeeded by Rjm-Sin, who, as François Thureau-Dangin points out, was named Tddyā (or Tdyā), the eldest son of Larsa, who thus became king of Larsa. The “father,” probably means simply “administrator.”

1 Written Tddyā, but the syllabaries indicate the final s as silent.

4. Eri-Aku and Rjm-Sin: Kudur-mabuk, who was the eldest son of Larsa, was succeeded by Rjm-Sin, who, as François Thureau-Dangin points out, must have been his brother. As in the case of Eri-Aku, Kudur-mabuk inaugurated the reign of Rjm-Sin by a dedication; but there seems to be no inscription in which Rjm-Sin makes a dedication for the life of his father, implying that Kudur-mabuk died soon after his second son came to the throne.

And here the question of the identification of Eri-Aku with Elam [Eku].-Eku] claims consideration. This name occurs on certain tablets of late date from Babylonia, and is coupled with a name which may be read Kudur-laglugum (for Kudur-laglugum, i.e. Chedarlomer), and Tūdul, the

5. Is Eri-Aku to Be Identified with the Lamb of Larsa and Old Man and Child [were slain] with the Eaku? Similar things seem to be said of Tūdul or Tidal. The larger fragment gives further details of the life of Durmaṭi-lānī, who had usurped royal power and had been killed with the sword. If the events recorded belong to this period, they must have taken place after the death of Eri-Aku ((Eku), and, before that of Kudur-laglugum. It is to be noted that, in accordance with Elamite usage, the son did not pass to the eldest son after a king’s death, but to the king’s eldest brother. In Elam this led to endless conflicts, and the same probably took place in Larsa until incorporated with the states of Babylonia.

The fact that the history of Kudur-laglugum (7) forms the subject of a poetical legend suggests that the texts mentioning these kings may have belonged to a kind of historical romance, of which Chedarlomer (Amāphil), Arioch, and Tidal were the heroes—and, in truth, this is implied by their style. That they are utterly apocryphal, however, remains to be proved.

ERR, ər, ERROR, ərˈər: To err is in the OT the tr of יָּלַע, shāghād, and יָּלִא, tāḏāh, both of which mean lit. “to wander.” To go astray is הָעָנָיה, Anocher, or Ḥinahnah. We have כָּמַו, “I have played the fool, and have erred”; Josh 14 9, “Mine error remaineth with myself,” i.e. “is my own concern,” or, perhaps, “only injures myself!” Ps 119 118, Isa 38 7 A.V. (thrice); tāḏāh, Ps 56 10; Prov 14 22; Isa 35 8. It means also “to cause to err” (Isa 3 12; 30 28, “a bridle that causeth to err”; Jer 23 13.32; “Their lies [i.e. the unreal deities, creatures of their own imagination] have caused them to err,” Am 2 4). In the NT the word is generally παραδομαί, παραδομανόμαι, “to wander” (Mt 12 24.27; He 3 10; Jas 5 19); ἀποκεραυκό, “to miss the mark,” to swerve, occurs twice (1 Tim 6 21; 2 Tim 18 2). Error in the OT represents various words: shāghād, “to injure,” “to stagger,” “to err,” “to err”; shaḥ, “to err,” “to fall,” “to go astray,” “to wander” (Eccl 5 5; cf Prov 20 25 and see INQUIRY); mškādāḥ, with the same meaning, “wandering” (Job 19 4; cf Ps 19 12); shaḥ, “wandering,” “to wander” (Zech 7: 2; Prov 19 14; Prov 20 1) have “ereeth,” m “or recketh,” “for them that are out of the way” (He 5 2), “the ignorant and erring,” “for deceit” (1 Thess 2 3), “error.”

The Eng. word “error” has the same original meaning as the Heb and Gr main words, being derived from error, “to wander.” “To err is human,” but there are errors of the heart as well as of the head. The familiar phrase just quoted seems to have its equivalent in the marginal rendering of Gen 6 3, “the root of their going astray are flesh.” Errors through ignorance are a sign of the times, distinguished from errors of the heart and willful errors (Lv 5 18; Nu 16 22; Ezk 45 20).

ESARHADDON, ē-sar-had ’on (してる, ‘esar­haddon; Assyr. Ašur-ah-ādīdina, “Ashur hath given a brother’): During his lifetime, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, made his favorite son, Esarhaddon (681-669 BC), co-ruler of Assyria. And although he was not the eldest son, he decreed that he should become the legal heir to the throne of Assyria. Sennacherib, having been slain in 681, apparently by two of his sons, who are called in the OT Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 K 19:37), Esarhad­don proceeded to Nineveh, where the rebellion which followed the death of his father collapsed, having existed for about a month and a half. The OT informs us that the murderers of his father fled to Armenia. This is corroborated by the inscriptions which say that at Mecd, in the land of Hani­rabbat, which can be said to be in Armenia, Esarhaddon fought the rebels and defeated them; whereupon he was proclaimed king. His father had been so dispossessed by Babylon that he had attempted to annihilate the city by making it a swamp. Esarhaddon, however, having been infatuated with the ancient culture of the Babylonians, adopted a conciliatory attitude toward the people. Immediately he planned to restore the city on its foundations. The preparations and foundations of his work were laid with impressive ceremonies, and in every way he endeavored to ameliorate the inhabitants by his gracious deeds. Even at Nippur evidences of his work in restoring the ancient shrine of Ellil are seen. He kindled the fire whose flames became his vassals, among them being Manasseh of Judah, were required to furnish building materials for his operations in Babylonia. His work in that land explains why the Judean king was incarcerated at Babylon (Ob 13:11) instead of Assyria; and although Esarhaddon was first compelled to defend the kingdom against the inroads of the hordes from the North. The Gimirra (perhaps referring to Gomer of the OT), who were called Manda, seemed to pour into the land. A decisive victory was finally gained over them, and they were driven back into their own country. Afterward, the Medes and the Chal­daeans were also subjugated. He then directed his attentions toward the West. Sidon having revolted against him, he sent his brother, Esarhaddon (4:10), which after three years was finally captured and destroyed. He built another city upon the same site, which he called Kar­Esarhaddon, and endeav­ored to revive its commerce. And, as is mentioned in v. 11, he raised the city (Samaria) with captives from Elam and Babylonia.

The capture of Tyre was also attempted, but, the city being differently situated, a siege from the land was insufficient to bring about submission, as it was impossible to cut off the commerce by sea. The siege, after several years, seems to have been lifted. Although on a great monolith Esarhaddon depicts Baal, the king of Tyre, kneeling before him with a ring through his lips, there is nothing in the inscriptions to bear this out. Siege to the city.

His work in Canaan was preparatory to his con­quest of Egypt. TIRHAKAH, the Ethiopian king of Egypt, was attacked on the borders, but no victory was gained. Several years later he crossed the borders and gained a decisive victory at Ikhshupri. He then proceeded to lay siege to Memphis, which soon capitulated; and Egypt, to the confines of Nubia, surrendered to Assyria. Esarhaddon reor­ganized the government, and even changed the names of the cities. Napoleon once visited the land. In 668, Egypt revolted and Esarhaddon, while on his way to put down the revolt, died. He had arranged that the kingdom be divided between two of his sons: Ashurbanipal was to be king of Assyria, and Shamash-shum-ukin was to reign over Babylonia. The nobles decreed, however, that the empire should not be divided, but Shamash-shum-ukin was made viceroy of Babylonia. A. T. CLAY

ESAU, ē-so (ערת, ‘eraṭ, “hairy”; הראוי, Ḥ’roʾ), Son of Isaac, twin brother of Jacob. The name was given on account of the hairy covering on his body at birth: “all over like a hairy garment” (Gen 25:25). There was a prenatal foreshadowing of the relation his descendants were to sustain to those of his younger brother, Jacob (ver 23). The mo­ment of his birth also was signalized by a circum­stance that betokened the same destiny (ver 26). The young E. was fond of the strenuous, daring life of the chase—he became a skilful hunter, “a man of the field!” (Ish sēḇakēh). His father warmed toward him rather than toward Jacob, because E.’s hunting expeditions resulted in meats that appealed to the old man’s taste (ver 25). Returning hungry from one of these expeditions, however, E. exhibited a characteristic that marked him for the inferior po­sition which had been foretold at the time of his birth. Enticed by the pottage which Jacob had baked, he could not deny himself, but must, at once, gratify his appetite, though the calm and calculating Jacob should demand the birthright from him at the price (vs 30–34). Impulsively he snatched an immediate and sensual gratification at the for­feit of a future glory. Thus he lost the headship of the people through whom God’s redemptive pur­pose was to be worked out in the world, no less than the mere secular advantage of the firstborn son’s chief share in the father’s temporal possessions. Though E. had so recklessly disposed of his birth­right, he afterward would have secured from Isaac the blessing that appertained, had not the cunning of Reuben provided for Jacob. Jacob, to be sure, had some misgiving about the plan of his mother (Gen 27:12), but she reassured him; the deception was successful and he secured the blessing. Now, too late, E. bitterly realized somewhat, at least, of his loss, though he blamed Jacob altogether, and himself not at all (vs 34–36). Hating his brother on account of the grievance thus held against him, he determined upon fratricide as soon as his brother should pass through the city gates (34:17). Rebekah sent Jacob to Haran, there to abide with her kindred till E.’s wrath should subside (vs 42–45).

E., at the age of forty, had taken two Hittite wives, and had thus displeased his parents. Re­bekah had advised him to use the name Jacob (vs 25). E. was the name given him by his father, in accordance with the idea of a young man who would be able to struggle for himself, rather than as a name signifying “hairy” (as the rabbah). Whereupon, he was changed to Jacob (Gen 35:9). Jacob was the name given to him by his mother, in conformity with the idea of one who would be able to subdue or sup­press his enemies, rather than as a name signifying “hairy” (as the rabbah). The name Jacob is a title, signifying the manifestation of God’s will, and was immediately bestowed on him by his father, and conferred by the children on Joseph (Gen 35:9). Joseph was the name given to him by his mother, in conformity with the idea of one who would be able to subdue or sub­due his enemies, rather than as a name signifying “hairy” (as the rabbah). The name Joseph is a title, signifying the manifestation of God’s will, and was immediately bestowed on him by his father, and conferred by the children on Joseph (Gen 35:9). Joseph was the name given to him by his mother, in conformity with the idea of one who would be able to subdue or sub­due his enemies, rather than as a name signifying “hairy” (as the rabbah). The name Joseph is a title, signifying the manifestation of God’s will, and was immediately bestowed on him by his father, and conferred by the children on Joseph (Gen 35:9).

future life, the end of the world (resurrection, judgment; in the NT, the Parousia), and the eternal destinies of mankind. In this art. it is attempted to exhibit the beliefs on these matters contained in the OT, with those in the Jewish apocalyptic and apocalyptic writings that fill up the interval between the OT and the NT.

The subject here treated has been dealt with by many writers (see "LITERATURE" below); by none more learnedly or ably than by Dr. R.
B) Dr. H. Charles in his work on Heb, Jewish Charles's and Christian eschatology (A Critical Work on the History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, in Judaism, and in Christianity). The present writer is, however, unable to follow Dr. Charles in many of his very radical critical positions, which affect so seriously the view taken of the literary evidence, and of the development of Israel's religion; is unable, therefore, to follow him in his interpretation of the religion itself. The subject, accordingly, is discussed in these pages from a different point of view from that of Dr. Charles.

Individual religion in Israel.—One special point in which the writer is unable to follow Dr. Charles in his treatment, which may be noticed at the outset, is in his idea—now so generally favored—that "the time of the Exile religion was not individual—that Jeh was thought of as concerned with the well-being of the people as a whole, and not with that of its individual members. "The individual was not the religious unit, but the family or tribe" (op. cit., 82). How anyone can entertain this idea in face of the plain indications of the OT itself to the contrary is to the present writer a mystery. There is, indeed, throughout the OT, a solidarity of the individual with his family and tribe, but not at any period to the exclusion of a personal relation to Jeh, or of individual moral and religious responsibility. The pictures of piety in the Book of Gen are nearly all individual, and the narratives containing them are, even on the critical view, older than the 9th century. According to Dr. Charles, the OT has two contradictory representations of the constitution of man, and of the effects of death. The older idea of pre-prophetic view distinguishes between soul and body in man as surviving death (this is not easily reconcilable with the other proposition [p. 37] that the "soul or nephesh is identical with the blood"), and as retaining a certain self-consciousness, and the power of speech and movement of soul (pp. 39 ff.). This view is in many respects identical with that of ancestor worship, which is held to be the primitive belief in Israel (p. 41). The other and later view, which is thought to follow logically from the account in Gen 2 7, supposes the soul to perish at death (pp. 41 ff.). We read there that "Jehovah God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." The 'breath of life' (neshmâh hayyîm) is identified with the "spirit of life" (ru'âh hayyîm) of Gen 6 17, and is taken to mean that the soul has no independent existence, but is "really a function of the material body when quickened by the [impersonal] spirit." (p. 42). According to this view the incarnation of soul (-ru'âh) is impossible at death, that is, when the spirit is withdrawn" (p. 43). This view is held to be the parent of Sadduceism, and is actually affirmed to be the view of Paul (pp. 43-44, 409)—the apostle who repudiated Sadduceism in this very article (Acts 23 6-9).

Body, soul and spirit.—The above view of man's nature is here rejected, and the consistency of the OT doctrine affirmed. The Bib. view has nothing to do with ancestor worship (cf. the writer's Body 135-36). In Gen 1 26.27 man is created in God's image, and in the more anthropomorphic narrative of Gen 2 7, he becomes "a living soul" through a unique act of Divine inbreathing. The soul (nephesh) in man originates in a Divine inspiration (cf Job 32 8; 33 4; Isa 42 5), and is at once the animating principle of the body (the blood being its vehicle, Lev 17 11), with its appetites and desires, and the seat of the self-conscious personality, and source of rational and spiritual activities. These are higher activities of the soul which, in the OT, are specially called "spirit" (ru'âh). Dr. Charles expresses this correctly in what he says of the supposed earlier view ("the ru'âh had become the heat of the body, the seat of breath in man," p. 46; see more fully the writer's God's Image in Man, 47 ff.). There is no ground for deducing "annihilation" from Gen 2 7. Everywhere in Gen man is regarded as formed for living fellowship with God, and capable of knowing, worshiping and serving Him. See Soul; Spirit.

It follows from the above account that man is regarded in the OT as a compound being, a union of body and soul (embracing spirit), both being elements in his one personality. His destiny was not to death, but to life—not life, however, in separation of the soul from the body (disembodied existence), but continued embodied life, with, perhaps, as its sequel, change and translation to higher existence (thus Enoch, Elijah; the saints at the Parousia). This is the true original idea of immortality for man (see Immortality). Death, accordingly, is not, as it appears in Dr. Charles, a natural event, but an abnormal event—a mutation, separation of two sides of the soul ends intended to be separated—due, as the Scripture represents it, to the entrance of sin (Gen 2 17; 3 19.22; Rom 5 12; 1 Cor 15 21.22). It is objected that nothing further is said in the OT of a "Fall," and a subjection of man to death as the result of sin. In truth, however, the whole picture of mankind in the OT, as in the NT, is that of a work turned aside from God, and under His displeasure, and death and all natural evils are ever to be connected in relation to our world (Isa 11 8-9; Allatt. Thes. 368, 376 ff; God's Image in Man, 198 ff, 249 ff). This alone explains the light in which death is regarded by holy men; their longing for deliverance from it (see below); the hope of resurrection; the place which resurrection of the body occupies in the pattern of Christ's resurrection (Phil 3 21), has in the Christian conception of immortality.

II. Conceptions of the Future Life—Sheol.—It is usual to find it contended that the Israelites, in contrast with other peoples, had not the conception of a future life till near Israel No the time of the Exile; that then, Belief in a through the teaching of the prophets Future Life? and the discipline of experience, ideas of individual immortality and of judgment to come first arose. There is however, a good deal of ambiguity of language, if not confusion of thought, in such statements. It is true there is development in the teaching on a future life, true also that in all the books ensues inevitably at death, that is, when the spirit is withdrawn" (p. 43). This view is held to be the parent of Sadduceism, and is actually affirmed to be the view of Paul (pp. 43-44, 409)—the apostle who repudiated Sadduceism in this very article (Acts 23 6-9).

1. Reserve on This Subject: Israel was trained to a severer reserve Hopes and Promises in regard to the future, and the hopes Largely wards of righteousness and penalties Temporal of transgression—were chiefly temporal. The sense of individual responsibility, as was shown at the commencement, there was certain regard to the fact (cf. Deut 11 8 ff; 28 1-14), and warned by the most terrible temporal curses (28 15 ff); David has pledged to him the sure succession of his house as the reward of obedience (2 S 7 11 ff). So in the Book of Job, the patriarch's fidelity is rewarded with return of his prosperity (ch 42). Temporal promises abound in the Prophets (Hos 2 14 ff; 14; Isa 1 19.26; 36, etc); the Book of Prov likewise is full of such promises (3 18 ff, etc).

All this, however, in no way shows that the Israelites had no conceptions of, or beliefs in, a state of being beyond death, or believed the death of the body to be the extinction of existence. This was very far from being the case. A hope of a future life it would be wrong to call it; for there was nothing to suggest hope, joy or life in the good sense, in the ideas they entertained of death or the hereafter. In this they resembled most peoples whose ideas are still primitive, but to whom it is at least possible to refer a future state not in the form of a literal future life or purgatory. It is true that what we call ancestors.

As to the Scriptural point of view, the early Hebrews were too poor to be dignified with the high name of "immortality."

It is not necessary to do more than sketch the main features of the Hebrew belief in a future state. They stand as yet, though with differences to be afterward pointed out, as distinguished from the general level of Sem peoples in their conceptions of what the future state was. This view was taken by Dr. Charles. He recognizes that early Israelitish thought attributed a "categorically large measure of life, movement, knowledge and likewise power" (Ps 63 9; 86 13; Eze 26 20; 31 14; 32 18 24; cf Nu 16 30; Dt 32 22). The dead are there gathered in companies, hence the frequently recurring expression, "gathered unto his people" (Gen 55 8; 35 29; 49 33; Nu 20 24, etc). The phrase denoting, as the context shows, something quite distinct from burial. Jacob, e.g. was "gathered unto his people", afterward his body was embalmed, and, much later, buried (Gen 50 2 ff). Poetical descriptions of Sheol are not intended to be taken with literalness, hence it is a mistake, with Dr. Charles, to press such details as "bars" and "gates" (Job 17 16; 38 17; Ps 9 14; 39 10, etc.). In the general conception, Sheol is a place of darkness (Job 21 22; Ps 143 3), of silence (Ps 94 17; 115 17), of forgetfulness (Ps 88 12; Ecc 9 5 8 10). It is without remembrance or praise of God (Ps 6 6), or knowledge of it (Ps 147 14). Even this language is not to be pressed too literally. Part of it is the expression of a depressed or despairing (cf Isa 38 10 ff) or temporarily skeletal (thus in Ecc; cf 12 7 13 14) mood; all of it is relative, emphasizing the contrast with the brightness, joy and activity of the earthly life (of Job 10 22, "where the light is as midnight")—comparative.

Elsewhere it is recognized that consciousness remains; in Isa 14 9 ff the shades (r'phâ'lm) of one mighty kings are stirred up to meet the descending king of Babylon (of Eze 32 21). If Sheol is sometimes described as "destruction" (Job 26 6 m; 38 22; Prov 15 11 m) and "the pit" (Ps 30 9; 55 23), at other times, in contrast with the weariness and trouble of life in this world; the Christian Doctrine of Immortality, 1 [ideas of lower races, Indian, Egyp, Bab, Pera and Gr beliefs]; in Sayce, Hibbert Lectures, Religion of Ancient Babylonia, and Clifford Lectures, Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia: Dr. Charles, Bibliology, ch iii, on Gr conceptions. The Heb conception of Sheol, the gathering-place of the dead, is not in essentials dissimilar. "The resemblance," says Dr. Salmond, "between the Heb Sheol, the Homeric Hades, and Bab Apsû is unmistakable" (op. cit., 3d ed, 173). As to its origin, Dr. Charles would derive the belief from ancestor worship. He supposes that "in all probability Sheol was originally conceived as a combination of the graves of the clan or nation, and as thus its final abode" (op. cit., 33). It is far from proved, however, that ancestor worship had the rôle he assigns to it in early religion; and, in any case, the explanation inverts cause and effect. The survival of the soul or shade is already assumed before there can be worship of ancestors. For simpler is the explanation that man is conscious from the first of a thinking, active principle within him which disappears when death ensues, and he naturally thinks of this as surviving somewhere else, if only in a ghost-like condition. Its future state was, it appears, too poor to be dignified with the high name of "immortality."

3. Survival of the Soul or of the Body.

In the Hebrew belief, death is conceived as the separation of the soul from the body. The Hebrew word is "shâ'âl", Isa 21 26:22, Job 26 6; Prov 15 11; Ps 139 8; Am 9 2, etc; cf above).

III. The Religious Hope—Life and Resurrection.

—Such is Sheol, regarded from the standpoint of nature; a somewhat different aspect a) Nature is presented when it is looked at from the point of view of grace. As yet no Moral trace is discernible between righteous Distinctions and wicked in Sheol; the element of retribution seems absent. Reward and punishment are in this world; not in the state beyond. Yet one must beware of drawing too sweeping conclusions even here. The state, indeed, of weakened consciousness and slumberous inaction of Sheol does not admit of much distinction, and the thought of exchanging the joys of life for drear and desolate conditions in Sheol, which might vividly appalled the stoutest hearts, and provoked sore and bitter complaints. Even the Christian can b}ewail a life brought to a sudden and untimely close.
But even on natural grounds it is hardly credible that the pious Israelite thought of the state of the godly gathered in peace to their people as quite the same as that experienced under the ban of God's anger, and went down to Sheol bearing heavy penalty. There is a pregnancy not to be overlooked in such expressions as, “The wicked shall be turned back unto Sheol” (Ps 9 17), a “low sheol” unto which God’s anger burns (Dt 32 22), “uttermost parts of the pit” (Isa 14 15; Ezek 32 23) to which the proud and haughty in this life are consigned.

Dr. Charles goes so far as to find a “penal character of Sheol” in Pss 49 and 73 (op. cit., 74). Consolation breathes in such utterances as, “Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for there is a happy end to the man of peace” (Ps 37 37), or (with reference to the being taken from the evil to come), “He entereth into peace; they rest in their beds, each one that walketh in his uprightness” (Isa 67 2; cf ver 21: “There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked”). Even Balaam’s fervent wish, “Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his” (Nuz 25 10), seems weakened when interpreted only of the desire for a glorious end and not capable to rest too much into OT expressions; the tendency at the present time would seem to be to read a great deal too little (P. Fairbairn, Typology of Scripture, I, 173 ff, 422 ff, may profitably be consulted).

To get at the true sense and meaning of the hope of immortality in the OT, however, it is necessary to go much farther than the idea of any b) Religious happier condition in Sheol. This disembodied existence, which is of necessity enfeebled, partial, imperfect existence, was not part of the Divine plan for man. His immortality was to be in the body, not out of it. Separation of soul and body, an after-existence of the soul in Sheol, belonging to the doom of sin. Dr. Salmond fully recognizes this in his discussion of the subject. “The penal sense of death colours all the OT says of man’s end. It is in its thoughts where it is not in its words” (op. cit., 158; see the whole passage; cf also Oehler, Thol. of the OT, I, 243 ff, ET; A. E. Davidson, Thol. of the OT, 432 ff, 439 ff). The true type of immortality is therefore to be seen in cases like those of Enoch (Gen 5 24; cf He 11 5) and Elijah (2 K 2 11); of a bare “immortality of the soul,” Scripture has nothing to say on all hands conceded that, so far as the hope of immortality, in any full or real sense, is found in the OT, it is connected with religious faith and hope. It has not a natural, but a religious, root. It springs from the believer’s trust and confidence in the living God; from his conviction that God—His God—who has bound him to Himself in the bonds of an unchanging covenant, whose everlasting arms are underneath him (Dt 33 27; cf Ps 90 1). Hope of Immortality Davidson, Comm. on Job, 293-95; Salmond, op. cit., 175). Life is not bare existence. It consists in God’s favor and fellowship (Ps 16 11; 20 5; 63 8). The relevant passages in Ps and Prophets will be considered after. Only, it is contended by the newer school, this hope of immortality belongs to a late stage of Israel’s religion—to a period when, through the development of the monothestic idea, the growth of the sense of individuality, the acute feeling of the contradictions of life, this great “venture” of faith first became possible. One asks, however, Was it so? Was this hope so entirely a matter of “intuitive ventures, and forecasts of devout souls in moments of deepest experience or keenest conflict,” as this way of considering the matter represents?

Not necessarily late.—That the hope of immortality could only exist for strong faith is self-evident. But did strong faith come into existence only in the days of the prophets or the Exod? Has it already been taken to the assumption that monotheism was a late growth, and that individual faith in God was not found in early times. It is not to be granted without some reservation that commonly alleged, the Ps and the Book of Job, which express this hope, are post-exilian products. If, however, faith in a covenant-keeping God is of earlier date—if it is present in patriarchal and Mosaic days—the question is not, Why did not men from similar hopes? But rather, How should it be prevented from doing so? If a patriarch like Abraham truly walked with God, and received His promises, could he, any more than later saints, be wholly distrustful of God’s power to keep and deliver him in and from Sheol? It is hard to credit it. It is replied, there is no evidence of such hope. Certainly these ancient saints did not write psalms or speak with the tongues of prophets. But is there nothing in their quiet and trustful walk, in their tranquil deaths, in their sense of unfinished promises, in their prevailing confidence in God in all the vicissitudes of life, to suggest that they, too, were able to commit themselves into the hands of God in death? To graze lightly over this passage or would ultimately be, well with them in the future? Thus at least Jesus understood it (Mt 22 32); thus NT writers believed (He 11 13.14). Faith might falter, but in principle, this hope must have been bound up with faith from the beginning.

This raises now the crucial question, What shape did this hope of immortality assume? It was not, as already seen, an immortality enjoyed in Sheol; it could only then be a hope connected with the belief in the power of Sheol—in essence, whether precisely formulated or not, a hope of resurrection. It is, we believe, because this has been overlooked, that writers on the subject have gone so often astray in their discussions on immortality in the OT. They have thought of a blessedness in the future life of the soul (thus Charles, op. cit., 76-77); whereas the redemption the Bible speaks of invariably embraces the whole personality of man. Body and soul together. Jesus may be remembered, thus interprets the words, “I am the God of Abraham,” etc (Mt 22 32), as a pledge not simply of continued existence, but of resurrection. This accords with what has been seen of the connection of death and sin in the case of Adam. The immortality man would have enjoyed, had he not sinned, would have been an immortality of his whole person. It will be seen immediately that this is borne out by all the passages of hope of immortality in the OT. These never contemplate a mere immortality of the soul, but always imply resurrection.

(1) Not a late or foreign doctrine.—If the above is correct, it follows that it is a mistake to place the belief in resurrection so late as is often done, still more to derive it from Zoroastrianism (thus Cheyne, Origin of Psalter, lect viii) or other foreign sources. It was a genuine corollary from the fundamental Israelitic belief about God, man, the soul, sin, death and redemption. It is “the immeasurable significance” of this doctrine, and speaks of it as “one of the greatest things found anywhere in the history of religion,” but thinks “it cannot be derived from within Judaism itself, but must take its origin from a ruling belief in the Orient of the later time” (Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des NT, 32-33; for criticism of Gunkel’s positions see the writer’s Resurrection of Jesus, 255 ff.). To make good his theory, however, he has to discount all the evidence for the belief furnished by the earlier OT writings, and this, it is believed, cannot be done successfully. It was before noted that cases of resurrection appear in the historical books (1 K 7:15-17; Ps 16:8-11). It is, however, the reverence with which the patriarchs for their dead was, as with the Egyptians, inspired by some hope of this kind (Gen 23; 50 5.25; Ex 13 19; cf. He 11:22). In any case an impartial survey of the evidence proves that the thought of resurrection colors all the later expressions of the hope of immortality (see IMMORTALITY; cf. also the writer’s appendix on the subject in Christian View of God, 200 ff).

(2) The Psalms.—The passages in the Psalms in which faith rises to the hope of immortality are principally Ps 16:8-11; 17:15; 49:14-15; 73:24. There are a few others, but these are the chief, and so far as they are allowed to express a hope of immortality at all, they do so in a form which implies resurrection. Dr. Cheyne, believing them to be influenced by Zoroastrianism, formerly granted this (Origin of Psalter, lect viii); now he reads the passages differently. There is no good reason for putting them in post-exilic times, and they have not in their most natural sense, their testimony seems explicit. Ps 16 8-11 (cited in Acts 2 24-31 as a prophecy of the resurrection of Christ) reads “My flesh also shall dwell in safety [or confidently, m.]. I shall be satisfied when I awake, with beholding thy form” (AV, ERV, “with thy likeness”). Cheyne (op. cit., 406) refers this to the resurrection of (cf. Belshach, Perowne, etc.) Yet more explicit is Ps 49:14-15, “They [the wicked] are appointed as a flock for Sheol . . . . and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning . . . . But God will redeem my soul from the power [hand, m] of Sheol; for he will receive me.” The last clause, i.e., “He will take me,” has, as Perowne, Delitzsch, Cheyne (formerly), even Duhm, allow to cases like those of Enoch and Elijah. It cannot, however, contemplate actual bodily translation; it must therefore refer to resurrection in the latter sense. Dr. Davidson says, “Oh that thou wouldst hide me in Sheol, that thou wouldst keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldst appoint me a set time and remember me. . . . Thou wouldest call and I would answer thee: thou wouldest have desire to the work of thy hands” (vs 13-15; m. reads “Thou shalt call,” etc.). Dr. A. B. Davidson says, “To his mind this involves a complete return to life again of the whole man” (Cambridge Comm. on Job, in loc.). With this must be taken the splendid outburst in 25 25-27, “I know that my Redeemer liveth,” etc., which, whatever doubts may attach to the precise rendering of certain clauses, undoubtedly expresses a hope not inferior in strength to that in the verse just quoted.

(3) The Prophets.—The presence of the idea of resurrection in the Prophets is not doubted, but the passages are put down to exilic or post-exilic times, and are explained of spiritual” or “national,” not the resurrection of individuals. Cheyne granted this regarding the passages in Isa (25:6-8; 26:19): “This prospect concerns not merely the church-nation, but all of its believing members, and indeed all, whatever Jews or not, who submit to the true king, Jehu” (op. cit., 402). There is no call for putting the remarkable passages in Hos—“After two days will he revive us: on the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live before him” (Hos 6:2). “I will raise them up from the power of Sheol: I will redeem them from death: O death, where are thy plagues? O Sheol, where is thy destruction?” (13:14)—later than the time of that prophet. In them the idea of resurrection is already fully present; as is also the doctrine in Ezek 37 1-10 of the valley of dry bones. The climax is, however, reached in Isa 25 6-8; 26 19, above referred to, from which the individual element cannot be excluded (cf. Salmond, op. cit., 211-12: “The theme of this great passage, 25:18, therefore, is a personal, not a corporate resurrection”).

(4) Daniel—resurrection of wicked.—Finally, in the OT we have the striking statement in Dan 12:2, “And many of them that sleep in the dust . . . . shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament,” etc. The peculiarity of this passage is, that in it, for the first time, is announced a resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous (cf. in the NT Jn 5 28-29; Acts 24 15; Rev 20 12 f). The word “many” is not to be understood in contrast with “all,” though probably only Israel is in view. The event is connected with a “time of trouble” (ver 1) following upon the overthrow of Antiochus. The chief problem is, How did this conception of the resurrection of the wicked come about? The resurrection of the righteous, it has been seen, is a corollary from the covenant-faithfulness of Jeh.
But this does not apply to the wicked. Whence then does the idea come? It is given as a revelation, but even revelation connects itself with existing ideas and preconceptions. The resurrection of the wicked, certainly, does not arise, like that of the righteous, from the consciousness of an indissoluble union with God, but it may well arise from the opposite conviction of the judgment of God. As the sense of individual guilt grew strong—and it is granted that the teaching of the prophets did much to strengthen that feeling—and the certainty of moral retribution developed, it was inevitable that this should react on the conception of the future, in making it as certain that the wicked should be punished that the good should be rewarded, in the world to come. Naturally too, as the counterpart of the other belief, this shaped itself into the form of a resurrection to judgment. We are thus brought, as a last step, to consider the idea of judgment and its effects as found in the prophetic teaching.

IV. The Idea of Judgment—the Day of Jehovah.—It was seen that, under Mosaicism, the promises and threatenings of God were mainly confined to the people and that the sense of distinctions in Sheol, though not absent, was vague and wavering.

Judgment a Present not absent, was vague and wavering.

Reality Through temporal dispensations men were trained to faith in the reality of moral retributions. Under the Mosaic system, the judgments of God on nations and individuals were still primarily viewed as pertaining to this life, there gradually shaped itself a further idea—that of an approaching consummation of history, or Day of Jehovah, when God's enemies would be completely overthrown. His righteousness fully vindicated and His kingdom established in triumph throughout the earth. The developments of this idea may now briefly be exhibited. In this relation, it need only be stated that the writer does not follow the extraordinary mingling of the prophetic texts by certain critics, accepted, though with some misgiving, by Dr. Charles.

The "Day of Jehovah," in the prophetic writings, is conceived of, sometimes more generally, as denoting any great manifestation of God's power in judgment or salvation (e.g. the locusts in Joel 2), sometimes more eschatologically, of the final crisis in the history of God's people. The overthrow of all opposition, and the complete triumph of righteousness (e.g. Isa 2 2-5; Joel 3; Am 9 11 ff; Zec 14, etc). The two things are not unconnected: the one is the prelude, or anticipatory stage, of the other. That feature of prophetic vision sometimes spoken of as the absence of perspective is very conspicuous in the fact that chronology is largely disregarded, and the "Day of Jehovah" is seen looming up as the immediate background of every great crisis in which the nation may for the time be involved (Assyr invasions; Bab captivity; Maccabean persecution). The one thing ever certain to the prophet's mind is that the "Day" is surely coming—it is the one great, dread, yet for God's people joyful, event of the future—but the steps by which the goal is to be reached are only gradually revealed in the actual march of God's providence.

(1) Relation to Israel.—"The 'Day' is in its primary aspect a day of judgment (Isa 2 12:); not however, confined to the nations, but the thought of vengeance only on the adversaries of Israel (Am 5 18 ff). Israel itself would be the first to experience the strokes of the Divine chastisement: "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore will I visit you all for the outrights" (Am 3 2). God's judgments on Israel, while retributive, were also purifying and sifting; a "remnant" would remain, who would be the seed of a holier community (Isa 6 13; Am 9 9; Zeph 3 13-20, etc). The Book of Hose beautifully exhibits this aspect of the Divine dealings (Hos 4-6).

(2) To the nations.—Of wider scope is the relation of the "Day" to the gentle world. The nations are used as the instruments of God's judgments on Israel (Assyrians, Chaldaean, Persians), but they, too, would in turn be judged by Jehovah (cf. the prophecies against the nations in Isa, Jer, Ezh, Nah, Hab, etc). The end would be, although this does not fully appear in every prophet, that a remnant of the heathen also would turn to Jehovah, and be rescued from the judgment (Zec 14 10). More generally, an extension of the kingdom of God would take place till the earth was filled with God's glory (e.g. Isa 2 2-5, with Mic 4 1-5; Isa 42 4; 60; 66 6-9; Jer 12 14-16; 16 19-21; Eze 16 53-55, 61, God will turn the captivity of Sodom and her daughters; Am 9 11; Hab 2 14; cf Ps 22 27-31; 66 25; 86 9; 87). These events, in prophetic speech, belong to "the latter days" (Isa 2 2; Jer 48 47; Eze 38 10; Hos 3 5; Mic 4 1). In Daniel (Dan 2 34-45; 7), the prophecies are represented as broken pieces in the kingdom by pieces of heaven, symbolized by a stone cut out of the mountain without hands (Dan 2 44-45; cf 7 27). The kingdom is given by the Ancient of Days to one like unto the Son of Man (Dan 7 13-14). In Zechariah, the post-exilic prophets, share in these glowing hopes (Hag 2 6-7; Zec 10 2; 12 20-23; 14 16). In Mal is found one of the noblest of all the prophetic utterances: "From the rising of the sun even unto the west in my name shall be great among the Gentiles," etc (1 11); and prophecy closes with the announcement of Him, Jehovah's messenger, by whom this "great and terrible day of Jehovah" is to be brought in (Mal 4).

The purview, in what is said of the "Day of Jehovah," is thus seen to be confined to earth, though the references to resurrection, and the passages in the close of Isa (66 16-22) about "new heavens and a new earth" imply a further vista. The hope of immortality—of resurrection life—in the case of the righteous has already been considered. But what of judgment after death in the case of the wicked? Only dim premonitions of it, involving the judgment of God's enemies, are found in the earlier doctrine of Sheol. There are frequent references to "judgment" in the Psalms, sometimes on the world (e.g. 96 13; 98 9; cf 50), sometimes on individuals (e.g. 1 5), but it is doubtful if any of them look beyond earth. Yet many things combined to force this problem on the attention.

(1) Incompleteness of moral administration.—There was the sharpening of the sense of individual responsibility in the prophetic age (Jer 31 29-30; Eze 18 2 ff), which the nation may for the time be involved (Assyr invasions; Bab captivity; Maccabean persecution). The one thing ever certain to the prophet's mind is that the "Day" is surely coming—it is the one great, dread, yet for God's people joyful, event of the future—but the steps by which the goal is to be reached are only gradually revealed in the actual march of God's providence.

(2) Prosperity of wicked.—There was the special difficulty that the wicked did not always seem to meet with the punishment due to their misdeeds in time. On the thought of as a prophecy of the four kingdoms, these are contained for a remnant of the mind of the psalmists (Ps 10 17, 17, 37, 49, 73, etc). The thought of the prosperity of the wicked did not endure. It came to a sudden end (Ps 37 35-36; 73 18-20, while the righteous had a sure compensation in the future (Ps 17:15; 49:15; 73:24, etc.). It was not, however, one that went back to the claims of the pre-Christian age. There was a wrath of God that burned to the lowest Sheol (Dt 32:22; cf. Charles, op. cit., 74). But this abode of the shades was not, for the evil any more than for the good, a fitting sphere for moral recompense. It was the idea of righteous men being punished after death. Hence, as before seen, Sheol was being set in a later age to assume something of a penal character for the unrighteous. The Sheol was the abode of wicked men. It was more in line with the pre-Christian age than the Christian phase of thinking.

(3) Suffering of righteous with wicked.—There was the kindred fact, in the calamities that overtook the wicked, the righteous were often the involuntary sharers. The wicked did not suffer by themselves. They were caught up in the storms of judgment (war, captivity, plague) that broke upon them. Here was something else calling for redress at the hands of a God of righteousness.

From these causes the thought almost necessarily presented itself of the extension of retribution for the wicked into the state beyond death. Hence, as before seen, Sheol was by the Hebrews called the place of the dead (I. II. 11; 13:14 referred to the state beyond death)—it is probable that the LXX (2d cent. BC) translated the earlier (op. cit. 216–17). The first clear intimation of a resurrection of the wicked, however, is found, as already said, in Dn 12:2, which likewise implies judgment. Perhaps a hint of the same idea is given in Is 66:24: "They shall go forth" etc. (cf. Dn 12:2). Dn 12:2 is speaking of the times of the new heavens and the new earth, ver. 22, and look upon the dead bodies of the men that have transgressed against me: for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." Dr. Charles connects this with the idea of Gehenna as "a place of punishment for rebellious and apostate Jews," which he thinks also to be implied in Is 50:11 (op. cit. 158). It is the same word "abhorred" in the above passage, THE "abhorred place" (cf. Dn 12:2), which is rendered in Dn 12:2, "contempt" and Dr. Charles says: "the reference in both is to Gehenna," and the punishment "is conceived as eternal" (pp. 158–59).

It is hardly possible to carry the subject farther within the limits of the OT. Further developments belong to the later Judaism.

V. Later Jewish Conceptions.—Apocryphal, Apocalyptic, Rabbinical.—The sources of our knowledge of the eschatological conceptions among the Jews in the immediately pre-Christian period are:

(1) Apocrypha.—The books of the OT Apoc (see Apocrypha) taken over, with the exception of 2 Esd, from the LXX (2d Esd, better known as 4 Esd, is more properly classed with the apocryphal writings. The original work consists only of chs 3–14, with a passage in ch 7 not found in the ordinary version. The book is post-Christian (c. 80–90 AD).

(2) Apocalyptic literature (see art. under that head, I, i, j, ii).—The remains of this lit. consist of the SS Or (oldest parts, Book III, from 2d cent. BC), the Book En (see below), the Ps Sol (70–40 BC), with the Ps Bar (200 AD); the Book of Jub, and XII P (see below), the Asc Isa (end of 1st cent. AD, and the Asc Isa (before 50 AD). A good deal turns on the dating of some of these books. Several (Apoc Bar, Ass M, Asc Isa, with 4 Esd) are post-Christian.

The Book of Jub and XII P have also usually been regarded as such, but Dr. Charles argues for dates ranging back to the close of the 2d cent. BC for both. Late Jewish and Christian additions are recognized in the latter. Formerly Dr. Charles dated Jub "before 10 AD." The chief dispute relates to the Similitudes (the "Similitudes") of the Book of En. These important sections are held by some (Dr. Stanton, etc.) to be post-Christian (end of 1st cent. AD)—a view to which we incline; Dr. Charles and others place them in the 1st cent. BC. Most of the remaining portions of the book are assigned to dates in the 2d cent. AD. It should be added the notices of Jewish opinions in Jos.

(3) Rabbinical writings.—For rabbinical ideas, we are chiefly dependent on the Talmudic writings and the Tg.—sources whose late character makes their witness often doubtful (see Talmud; Targums).

It is only possible to summarize very briefly the varying and frequently conflicting conceptions on eschatological subjects to be gleaned from this material. The representations are often wildly imaginative, and, so far as they are not genuine developments from OT ideas, have value only as they may be supposed to throw light on the teaching of the later Christians. Two exceptions, little is to be gathered from the apocryphal books, and it will be best to treat the subject under headings,

(1) Less definite conceptions.—In the apocryphal books the images of Gehenna are still on the old ground of Sheol as a place in which there is no remembrance, thanksgiving or retribution (17:27–28; 41:4–5, etc.; a somewhat different note is heard in 21:10). It is the same in Bar 2:17 and Tob 3:8. Less widely used are the OT phrases, "gathering to his fathers" (2:9), "gathering to his people" (14:30). In the Book of Wisd, the influence of Gr ideas is seen in a doctrine of the immortality of the soul only (2:23; 5:1–4; 4:13–14; 15:3; not a resurrection), possibly of preexistence (8:20). The wicked suffer punishment in Sheol (3:1–10; 5:1–14, etc).

(2) Ideas of Sheol.—Generally, however, in the apocryphal books, a marked change is seen in the ideas of Sheol. It is still the place of the dead, but is regarded as now a state in which the wicked are punished for their death and the resurrection for such as shall be raised; in which righteous and wicked are separated; in which the wicked suffer punishment. The Book of En distinguishes four abodes for the departed: 1. for the righteous, and two for the wicked (21:1–13). One class of the wicked (those already punished in this life) remain there forever, while the others are raised, and pass to the torment of Gehenna (17:2). The righteous are in Paradise—"the garden of life" (61:12), "the garden of righteousness" (67:12). This character of Sheol as a place of punishment (intermediate or final) is met with frequently (Book of Jub 7:29; 22:22; 2 Macc 6:23; 1 Esd 14:6; 15:11; 15:2, etc.). In certain places, Dr. Charles says, "Sheol has become an abode of fire, and therefore synonymous so far with Gehenna.... In several passages in the Similitudes, and throughout En 91–104, Sheol and Gehenna are practically identical" (op. cit., 287).

Similar ideas are found in the Slavonic version of En (5b, 261 ff).

(3) The fallen angels.—Much prominence in the Book of En is given to the fallen angels (those who sinned with women, Gen 6:2). They are consigned to the judgment to ever-burning fire (En 21:1–6; 90:2–25).

(4) Resurrection.—Ideas of the resurrection vary. In En 22, the righteous and one class of the wicked are raised; elsewhere all the righteous are raised and none of the wicked (En 61:5; 90:33; Ps Sol 3:16); sometimes there is to be a resurrection of all, just and unjust (En 61:12). 2 Macc dwells much on the Messiah, which seems to embrace all Israel (3:16; 13:9; 7:9:14:23). The resurrection is described as "transformed" in the resurrection (cf. the "Similitudes", 39:7; 61:4; 62:15). The doctrine of the resurrection (universal) is taught in the Apoc Bar 30:2-5; 50:61, and in 4 Esd 7:32-37. In Jos the Pharisees are said to have believed in the resurrection of the righteous only (Ant, XVIII, 1, 3).

This does not coincide with Paul's statement in Acts 24:15.

(5) Judgment.—The reality of a final judgment, supervening upon the intermediate judgment in Sheol, is strongly affirmed in most of the apocalyptic books. The Book of En speaks much of this final judgment. It describes it as "the great day," "the righteous judgment," "the great day of judgment," the last judgment," "the judgment of all eternity." (10:6.12; 16:1; 19:1; 22:4.11; 25:4; 90:26.27, etc.). Wicked angels and men are judged, and sentenced to Gehenna without a chance for repentance.

The Messiah: An interesting parallel is the relation of the Messiah to this judgment. With the exception of 4 Esd, the apocalyptic books are silent on the Messiah. In the apocalyptic books the Messiah does appear, but not always in the same light. In the Sib Or (3), Ps of Sol (17,18), Apoc Bar (39,40) and in 4 Esd (13 32f) the appearance of Messiah is associated with the overthrow and judgment of the ungodly worldly powers; in the older portions of En (90:16-25) God Himself executed the judgment, whereas in the later portions, the Messiah does not appear till after the. In the sec. of En, chs 37-70, on the other hand, the Messiah appears definitely as the judge of the world, and titles resembling those in the NT, "the Righteous One" (38:2; 63:6), "the Elect One" (40:5; 46:3, 4, etc.) above all, "the Son of Man" (46:2-4; 48:2, etc.), are given Him. It is these passages which suggest Christian influence, especially as the conception is not found elsewhere in pre-Christian apocalyptic theology. (2) The Coming of the Messiah, and the Messiah does not appear till after the. In the sec. of En, chs 37-70, on the other hand, the Messiah appears definitely as the judge of the world, and titles resembling those in the NT, "the Righteous One" (38:2; 63:6), "the Elect One" (40:5; 46:3, 4, etc.) above all, "the Son of Man" (46:2-4; 48:2, etc.), are given Him. It is these passages which suggest Christian influence, especially as the conception is not found elsewhere in pre-Christian apocalyptic theology. (2) The Coming of the Messiah, and the Messiah does not appear till after the.

(6) The Messianic age and the Gentiles.—The Messianic age, when conceived of as following the judgment (the older view), is unlimited in duration, has Jesus for its center, and includes in the scope of its blessing the converted Gentiles (Sib Or 3 698-726; En 90 30.37; cf 48:5; 63:1; Ps Sol 17 32-35). The righteous dead of Israel are raised to participate in the kingdom. Already in En 90 28:29 is found the idea that the new Jesus is not the earthly city, but a city that comes down from heaven, where, as in 4 Esd, the Messianic reign is limited, the blessed life after resurrection is transferred to heaven.

(7) Resurrection.—Little is to be added from the rabbinical conceptions, which, besides being difficult to ascertain precisely, are exceedingly confused and contradictory. Most of the ideas above mentioned appear in rabbinical teaching. With the development of the Christian world-view the emphasis in the later rabbinism is the appearance of "Armilus"—an Antichrist. The reign of Messiah is generally viewed as limited in duration—400 years (as in 4 Esd), and 1,000 years being mentioned (of Schürer, Hist of Jewish People, Div II, Vol II, 179, ET). At its close takes place a renovation of the world, resurrection (for Israelites only, certain classes being excluded), judgment, and eternal heavenly happiness for the righteous. The punishments of the wicked appear mostly to be regarded as eternal, but the view is also met with of a limited duration of punishment (see authorities in Schürer, op. cit., 183; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, app. XIX, and other works noted in "Literature" below).

LITERATURE

I. DOCTRINAL AND RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE.—The subject of eschatology plays a prominent part in NT teaching and religion. Christianity in its very origin bears an eschatological character. It means the appearance of the Messiah and the inauguration of His work; and from the OT point of view these form part of eschatology. It is true in Jewish apocalyptic theology the Messianic age was not always included in the eschatological age proper, but often regarded as introductory to it (cf Weber, Jüdische Theol., 371 ff). And in the NT also this point of view is to some extent represented, inasmuch as, owing to the preoccupation with the Messiah and the only partial fulfilment of the prophecies for the present, that which the OT depicted as one synchronous movement is now seen to divide into two stages, viz. the present Messianic age and the consummate state of the future. Even so, however, the NT draws the Messianic period into much closer connection with the strictly eschatological process than Judaism. The distinction in Judaism rested on a consciousness of difference in quality between the two stages, the content of the Messianic age being far less spiritually and transcendentally conceived than that of the final state. The NT, by spiritualizing the entire Messianic circle of ideas, becomes keenly alive to its affinity to the content of the highest eternal hope, and consequently tends to identify the two, to find the age to come anticipated in the present. In some cases this assumes explicit shape in the belief that great eschatological transactions have already begun to take place, and that believers have already attained to at least partial enjoyment of the hopes and privileges. Thus the present kingdom in Our Lord's teaching is one in essence with the final kingdom; according to the discourses in John eternal life is in principle realized here; with Paul there has been a prelude to the last judgment and resurrection in the death and resurrection of Christ, and the life in the Spirit is the first-fruits of the heavenly state to come. The strong sense of this may even express itself in the phrase that the Jewish eschatological state had arrived and the one great incision in history has already been made (He 2:35; 9:11; 10:1; 12:22-24). Still, even where this extreme consciousness is reached, it nowhere surpasses the other more common representation, according to which the present state continues to lie this side of the eschatological crisis, and, while directly leading up to the latter, yet remains to all intents a part of the old age and world-order. Believers live in the "last days," upon them "the ends of the ages are come," but "the last day," "the consummation of the age," still lies in the future (Mt 13:39-40; 24:3; 28:20; Jn 6:39-44; 12:48; 1 Cor 10:11; 2 Tim 3:1; Heb 1:2; 9:26; Jas 5:3; 1 Pet 1:5-20; 2 Pet 3:3; 1 Jn 2:18; Jude ver 18).

The eschatological interest of early believers was no more fringe to their religious experience, but the very heart of its inspiration. It expressed and embodied the profound supernaturalism and soteriology of the OT, so that the new world was not to be the product of natural development but of a Divine interposition arresting the process of history. And the deepest motive of the longing for this world was a conviction of the absurdity of the present age, and the stronger sense of evil and sin. This explains why the NT doctrine of salvation has grown up to a large extent in the closest interaction with its eschatological teaching. The present experience was interpreted in the light of the future. It is necessary to link this in mind for a proper appreciation of the generally prevailing hope that the return of the Lord might come in the near future. Apocalyptic calculation had less to do with this than the practical experience that the earnest of the supernatural realities of the life to come was present in the church, and that therefore it seemed unnatural for the full fruition of these to be long delayed. The subsequent reeding of this acute eschatological state has something to do with the gradual disappearance of the miraculous phenomena of the apostolic age.

II. General Structure.—NT eschatology attaches itself to the OT and to Jewish belief as developed on the prophetic revelation. It creates on the whole no new system or new terminology, but incorporates much that was current, yet so as to reveal by selection and distribution of emphasis the essential newness of its spirit. In Judaism there existed at this time two distinct types of eschatological outlook. There was the ancient national hope which revolved around the destiny of Israel. Alongside of it existed a transcendent form of eschatology with cosmical perspective, which had in view the destiny of the universe and of the human race. The former of these represents the original form of OT eschatology, and therefore occupies a legitimate place in the beginnings of the NT development, notably in the revelations accompanying the birth of Christ and in the earlier (synoptical) preaching of John the Baptist. There entered, however, into it, as held by the Jews, a considerable element of individual and collective eudaemonism, and it had become identified with a literalistic interpretation of prophecy, which did not sufficiently take into account the typical import and poetical character of the latter. The other scheme, while to some extent the product of subsequent theological development, lies prefigured in certain later prophecies, esp. in Dn, and, far from being an improvement on that of its forerunners, as is sometimes as some at present maintain, represents in reality the true development of the inner principles of OT prophetic revelation. To it the structure of NT eschatology closely conforms itself. In doing this, however, it discards the impure motives and elements by which even this relatively higher type of Jewish eschatological state had been influenced. The attempt of the apocalyptic writings a compromise is attempted between these two schemes after this manner, that the carrying out of the one is merely to follow that of the other, the national hope first receiving its fulfillment in a provisional Messianic kingdom of limited duration (400 or 1,000 years), to be superseded at the end by the eternal state. The NT does not follow the Jewish theology along this path. Even though it regards the present work of Christ as preliminary to the consummate order of things, it does not separate the two in essence or quality, it does not exclude the Messiah from a supreme place in the coming world, and does not expect a temporal Messianic kingdom in the future as distinguished from Christ's present spiritual reign, and as preceding the state of eternity. In fact the figure of the Messiah becomes central in all the eschatological process, far more so than is the case in Judaism. All the stages in this process, the resurrection, the judgment, the consummation, the eternal state, receive the impress of the absolute significance which Christian faith ascribes to Jesus as the Christ. Through this Christocentric character NT eschatology acquires also far greater unity and simplicity than did the Jewish schemes. Everything is practically reduced to the great ideas of the resurrection and the judgment as consequent upon the Parousia of Christ. Much apocalyptic embroidery to which no spiritual significance attaches, is eliminated. The overheated phantasy tends to multiply and elaborate, the religious interest tends toward concentration and simplification.

III. Course of Development.—In NT eschatological teaching a general development in a well-defined direction is traceable. The starting-point is the historico-dramatic conception of the two successive ages. These two ages are distinguished as hoi dos ho aion, ho nain aion, ho eneuta aion, "this age," "the present age" (Mt 12:32; 13:22; Lk 16:8; Rom 15:2; 1 Cor 1:20; 2:6-8; 3:18; 2 Cor 4:4; Gal 1:4; Eph 1:21; 2:2; 6:12; 1 Tim 6:17; 2 Tim 4:10; Tit 2:12), and ho aoion ekeinos; ho aion melion, ho aoion erchomenos, "that age," "the future age" (Col 2:9; Eph 3:21; 4:22; Eph 2:7; He 8:5). In Jewish lit. before the NT, no instances of the developed antithesis between these two ages seem to be found, but from the way in which it occurs in the teaching of Jesus and Paul it appears to have been current at that time. The oldest undisputed occurrence is a saying of Johann ben Zakkyah, about 80 AD.) The contrast between these two ages is (esp. with Paul) that between the evil and transitory, and the perfect and abiding. Thus each age belongs to a different character, and order of things, and so the distinction passes over into that of two "worlds" in the sense of two systems (in Heb Arama., the same word 'olam, 'olam, does service for both, in Gr aoion usually renders the meaning "age," occasionally "world" [He 1:11; 11:3], kosmos meaning "world"; the latter, however, is never used of the future world). Cf. Da 7:11, Die Welt Jesu, 1, 132-46. Broadly speaking, the development of NT eschatology consists in this, that the two ages are increasingly recognized as answering to two spheres of being which coexist from of old, so that the coming of the new age assumes the character of a revelation and extension of the super mental order of things, rather than a destruction of that of its first phase, or ultimate as some at present maintain, represents in reality the true development of the inner principles of OT eschatology.
order of things already existed, the reflection inevitably arose that these two were in some sense identical. But the new significance which the antithesis assumes does not supersede the older historical character of the present crisis, but throws a new interpose of the course of the lower as to bring the conflict to a crisis. The passing over of the one contrast into the other, therefore, does not mark, as has frequently been asserted, a recession of the eschatological perspective, but rather a change in the way in which the future to the present life. Esp. in the Fourth Gospel this "diescholatizing" process has been found, but without real warrant. The apparent basis for such a conclusion is that the realities of the future life are so vividly and intimately felt to be present in heaven and from there operative in the believer's life, that the distinction between what is now and what will be hereafter enjoyed becomes less sharp. Instead of the superstructure of the eschatological, this means the very opposite, viz. its most real anticipation. It should further be observed that this development in question is intimately connected and keeps equal pace with the disclosure of the pre-existence of Christ, because this fact and the descent of Christ from heaven furnished the clearest witness to the reality of the heavenly order of things. Hence it is esp. observable, not in the earlier epistles of Paul, where the structure of eschatological thought is still in the main historicist-dramatic, but in the epistles of the first captivity (Eph 1; 3.20-22; 2; 3; 3.10-14; 4.9.10; 6.12; Phil 2 5-11; 2 Thess 1 15.17; 3.2; further, in He 1 2.3; 2 5; 3.4; 6.11; 7 13.16; 9 14; 11 10.16; 12 22.23). The Fourth Gospel marks the culmination of this line of teaching, and it is unnecessary to point out how here the contrast between heaven and earth in its christological consequences determines the entire structure of thought. But here it also appears how the last outcome of the NT progress of doctrine had been anticipated in the highest teaching of Our Lord. This can be accounted for by the inherent fitness that the supreme discourses which touch the personal life of the Saviour should come not through any third person, but from His own lips.

IV. General and Individual Eschatology.—In the NT the destiny of the apostle of Israel, such extent overshadowing that of the individual, that only the first rudiments of an individual eschatology are found. The individualism of the later prophets, esp. Jeremiah and Ezekiel, bore fruit in the thought of the intermediate period. The question of the religious concern is shown for the ultimate destiny of the individual. But not until the NT thoroughly spiritualized the conceptions of the last things could these two aspects be perfectly harmonized. Through the centering of the eschatological hope in the Messiah, and the suspending of the individual's share in it on his personal relation to the Messiah, an individual significance is necessarily imparted to the great final crisis. This also tends to give greater prominence to the intermediate state, also, apocalyptic thought had pointed the way. None the less the OT point of view continues to assert itself in that even in the NT the main interest still attaches to the collective, historical development of events. Many questions in regard to the intermediate period are passed by in silence. The OT prophetic foreshadowing of the perspective, immediately connecting each present crisis with the ultimate goal, is reproduced in NT eschatology on an individual scale in so far as the believer is linked, not with his death, but rather with the consummate state after the final judgment. The present life in the body and the future life in the body are the two outstanding illuminated heights between which the disembodied state remains largely in the shadow. But the same foreshortening of the perspective is also carried over from the OT into the NT delineation of general eschatology. The NT method of depicting the future is not chronological. Things lying widely in the future are closely connected, and by reason of adjustment to the general method of prophetic revelation, the "parousia" of the NT is primarily considered, the second coming coming only, partly because it had already become a fixed Messianic term, partly because there was a point of view from which the future appearance of Jesus appeared the sole adequate expression of His Messianic dignity and glory. The explicit distinction between "first advent" and "second advent" is not found in the NT. It occurs in Text. XII P, Text. Abr. 92 16. In the NT it is approached in He 9 28 and in the use of epiphaneia for both the past appearance of Christ and His future manifestation (2 Thess 2 8; 1 Tim 6 14; 2 Tim 1 10; 4 1; Tit 2 11,13). The present is for the NT either more or less colored by the consciousness of the present bodily absence of Jesus from His own, and consequently suggests the thought of His future abiding presence, without, however, formally coming to mean that the Saviour's presence is shared with believers (1 Thess 4 17). Parousia occurs in Mt 24 33.37-39; 1 Cor 15 23; 1 Thess 2 19; 3 13; 4 15; 5 23; 2 Thess 2 1.8; Jas 5 7.8; 2 Pet 1 16; 3 4.12; 1 Jn 2 8. A synonymous term is apokalupsis, or "annunciation," the Christian origin, presupposing the preexistence of the Messiah in hidden form previous to His manifestation, either in heaven or on earth (cf Apoc Bar 29.3; 30 1; 4 Ezr (2 Esd) 7 28; Test. XII P, Test. Levi 18; Jn 7 27; 1 Pet 4 20). It could be adopted by Christians because Christ had been withdrawn into heaven and would be publicly demonstrated the Christ on His return, hence used with special reference to enemies and unbelievers (Lk 17 30; Acts 2 31; 3 19.26; 2 Pet 3 3; 2 Thess 1 11; 3 5; 4 13.20; 5 4). Another synonymous term is "the day of the [Our] Lord," "the day," "that day," "the day of Jesus Christ." This is the rendering of the well-known OT phrase. Though there is no reason in this case to preserve the "parousia," should not be Christ, the possibility exists that in some cases it may refer to God (cf "day of God" in 2 Pet 3 12). On the other hand, what the OT with the use of this phrase predicates of God is sometimes in the NT purposely transferred to Christ. "Day," while employed of the parousia generally, is, as in the OT, mostly associated with the judgment, so as to become a synonym for judgment (cf Acts 2 27; 3 19; 1 Cor 4 9). The phrase is found in Mt 7 22; 24 36; Mk 13 32; Lk 12 17; 24 21; 24 31; Acts 2 20; Rom 13 12; 1 Cor 1 5; 3 13; 5 5; 2 Cor 1 14; Phil 1 6; 2 16; 1 Thess 5 3-4 (cf vs 5.8); 2 Thess 2 2; 2 Tim 1 12; 18; 4 8; He 10 25; 3 Pet 3 10.

The parousia is preceded by certain signs heralding its approach. Judaism, on the basis of the OT, had worked out the doctrine of the "woes of the Messiah," heeb'h ha-ma-shi'kh, the calamities and afflictions that are to fall upon the Gentiles and the beginning of the coming age being interpreted as birth pains of the latter. This is transferred in the NT to the parousia of Christ. The phrase occurs only in Mt 24 8; Mk 13 8, the idea, in Rom 8 22, and allusions to it occur in 1 Cor 7 26; 1 Thess 3 2; 5 3.
Besides these general "woes," and also in accord with Jewish doctrine, the appearance of the Anti-christ is made to precede the final crisis. Without Jewish apocalyptic the parousia would be a stumbling-block, and preparatory to it, the pouring out of the Spirit, the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the conversion of Israel and the preaching of the gospel to all the nations. The problem of the sequence and interrelation of these several precursors of the end is a most difficult and complicated one and, as would seem, at the present not ripe for solution. The "woes" which in Our Lord's eschatological discourse (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 21) are mentioned in more or less close succession by Jewish—Christian apocalypses from the time of the Jewish War 68–70 (He, II, 3, 3). In the text of Mk this so-called "small apocalypse" is believed to consist of vs 7.8.14–20.24–27.30.31. But this hypothesis main springs from the disinclination to accept the closer realisation expectations, and the entirely unwarranted assumption that He must have spoken of the end in purely ethical and religious terms only. That the typically Jewish "woes" bear no direct relation to the disciples and their faith is not a sufficient reason for declaring the prediction of them unworthy of Jesus. A contradiction is pointed out between the two representations, that the parousia will come suddenly, unexpectedly, and that it will come heralded by these signs. E. g., in Mk 13:32 the contradiction is said to be pointed. To this it may be replied that even after the removal of the assumed apocalypse the same twofold representation remains present in what is recognized as genuine discourse of Jesus, viz, in Mk 13:28.29 as compared with vs 32.33–37 and other similar admonitions to watchfulness. A real contradiction between ver 30 and ver 32 does not exist. Our Lord could consistently affirm both: "This generation shall not pass away until all these things shall be fulfilled, and of that day or that hour knoweth no one." To be sure, the solution should not be sought by understanding "this generation" of the Jewish race or of the human race. It must mean, according to ordinary usage, the then living age, for declaring the prediction of them unworthy of Jesus. Nor does it help matters to distinguish between the prediction of the parousia within certain wide limits and the denial of knowledge as to the precise day and hour. In point of fact the two statements do not refer to the same matter at all. "That day or that hour" in ver 32 does not have "these things" of ver 30 for its antecedent. Both by the demonstrative pronoun "that" and by "but" it is marked as an absolute self-explanatory conception. It simply signifies as elsewhere the day of the Lord, the day of judgment. Of these "things," the exact meaning of which phrase must be determined from the foregoing, Jesus declares that they will come pass within that generation; but concerning the parousia, "that [great] day." He declares that no one but God knows the time of its occurrence. The correctness of this view is confirmed by the preceding parable, Mk vs 28.29, where in precisely the same way "these things" and the parousia are distinguished. The question remains whether the "these things" (Mt 33.34, Mk ver 30) "all these things" (Lk ver 32) is intended to cover of what is described in the preceding discourse. The answer will depend on what is there represented as belonging to the precursors of the end and what as strictly constituting part of the end itself; and on the other question whether the parousia is represented as a train of premonitory signs, or refers to two crises each of which will be heralded by its own series of signs. Here two views deserve consideration. According to the one (advocated by Zahn in his Comm. on Mt, 1552–66) the signs cover only Mt 24 4–14. What is related afterward, viz. "the abomination of desolation," great tribulation, false prophets and Christs, communications in the heavens, the sign of the Son of Man, all this belongs to the "end" itself, in the absolute sense of the so-called "apocalyptic" parousia and excepted from the prediction that it will happen in that generation, while included in the declaration that only God knows the time of its coming. The destruction of the temple and the holy city, though not explicitly mentioned in vs 4–14, would be included in what is there said of wars and tribulation. The prediction thus interpreted would have been literally fulfilled. The objections to this view are: (1) It is unnatural thus to assume what is related in vs 15–26 under the "end." From a formal point of view it does not differ from the phenomena of vs 4–14 which are "signs." (2) It creates the difficulty, that the existence of the temple and the temple-worship in Palestine could not be hushed in before the parousia. The "abomination of desolation" taken from Dni 8 13; 9 27; 11 31; 12 11; of Sir 49 2—according to some, the destruction of the city and temple, better a desecration of the temple-site by the setting up of some in- tros, as a result of which it becomes desolate—and the flight from Judea, are put among events which, together with the parousia, constitute the end of the world. This would seem to involve chiliasm of a very pronounced sort. The difficulty recurs in the strictly eschatological interpretation of 2 Thes 2 3, 4, where "the man of sin" (see Sin, Man of) is represented as sitting in "the temple of God," and in Rev 11 1, 2, where "the temple of God" and "the altar," and "the court which is without the temple" and "the holy city" figure in an episode inserted between the sounding of the trumpet of the sixth angel and that of the seventh. On the other hand it ought to be remembered that eschatological prophecy may be composed of something haphazard, as a result of which it becomes desolate—and the flight from Judea, are put among events which, together with the parousia, constitute the end of the world. This would seem to involve chiliasm of a very pronounced sort. by Briggs, Messiah of the Gospels, 132-65. It makes Jesus' discourse relate to two things: (1) the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple; (2) the end of the world and the parousia. The disciples are informed with respect to two points: (1) the time; (2) the signs. In the answer to the time, however, the two things are not sharply distinguished, but united into one prophetic perspective, the parousia standing out more conspicuously. The definition of the time of this complex development is: (a) negative (Mk 13 5-8); (b) positive (vs 9-13). On the other hand in describing the signs Jesus discriminates between (a) the signs of the destruction of Jerusalem (Mt 24); and (b) the signs of the parousia (vs 24-27). This view has in its favor that the destruction of the temple and the city, which in the question of the disciples figured as an eschatological event, is recognized as such in the answer of Jesus, and not alluded to after a mere incidental fashion, as among the signs. Esp. the vogue of Lk 21 20-24 proves that it figures as an event. This view also renders easier the restriction of Mk 13 30 to the first event and its signs. It places “the abomination of desolation” in the period preceding the national catastrophe. The view that the two events are successively discussed is further favored by the movement of thought in vs 32 ff. Here, after the Apocalypse has been brought to a close, the context of the dialogue is re-entered, and all the previous phases are brought together in the same order as was observed in the prophecy, i.e., the true attitude toward the national crisis is defined in the parable of the Fig Tree and the solemn assurance appended that it will happen in this generation (vs 30). The question of whether the parousia is, as Mk 13 24: “in those days”; Mk 13 24: “in those days””). The question is whether this mode of speaking can be explained on the principle of the well-known foreshortening of the perspective of prophecy. It cannot be a priori denied that this peculiarity of prophetic vision may have here characterized also the outlook of Jesus into the future which, as vs 32 shows, was the prophetic outlook of His human nature, as distinct from the Divine omniscience. The point at issue here is the sequence in perspective with chronological succession in the present case guarded against by the statement that the gospel must first be preached to all the nations (of Acts 3 19.25.26; Rom 11 25; Rev 6 2) before this event can come, that no one knows the time of the parousia except God, that there must be a period of desolation after the city shall have been destroyed, and that the final coming of Jesus to the people of Israel will be a coming not of judgment, but in which they shall hail Him as blessed (Mt 23 38.39; Lk 13 34.35), which presupposes an interval to account for this changed attitude (cf Lk 21 24: “until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled”). It is not necessary to carry the distinction between the two crises joined together here into the question as put by the disciples in Mt 24 3, as if “when shall these things be?” related to the destruction of the temple exclusively, as the other half of the question speaks of the coming of Jesus and the end of the world. Evidently the two events are the events (when exactly considered) and the signs are distinguished. These signs have their antecedent not exclusively in vs 2, but even more in 33 38-39. The disciples desired to know not so much when the calamitous national catastrophe would take place, which would put a limit to the distressing results of this catastrophe, and bring with it the re-acceptance of Israel into favor. This explains also why Jesus does not begin His discourse with the national crisis, but He first points out the parousia, to define negatively and positively the time of the latter, and that for the purpose of warning the disciples who in their eagerness for the ultimate issue were inclined to foreshorten the preceding calamitous developments. That Jesus could actually join together the national and the cosmical crises appears from other passages, such as Mt 10 23, where His interpretation for the deliverance of the fugitive disciples is called a “coming” of the Son of Man (Mt 10.11) to the coming of the Son of Man in His kingdom (Mt), or a coming of the kingdom of God with power (Mk), or a seeing of the kingdom of God (Lk) is promised to some of that generation. It is true these passages are frequently referred to the parousia, because in the immediately preceding context the latter is spoken of. The connection of thought, however, is not that the parousia and this promised coming are identical. The proximate coming is referred to as a sign of encouragement toward faithfulness and self-sacrifice, just as the reward at the parousia is mentioned for the same purpose. The conception of an earlier coming also receives light from the confession of Jesus at His trial (Mt 26 64); where the disciples are urged to judge upon His judge. The closing discourses of Jn also have the conception of the coming of Jesus to His disciples in the near future for an abiding presence, although here this is associated with the advent of the Spirit (Jn 14 18.19.21.28; 15 16. 19.22.23). Finally the same idea recurs in Rev, where it is equally clear that a preliminary visitation of Christ and not the parousia for final judgment can be meant (3 5.16; 3 20; cf also the pl. “one of the days of the Son of man” in Lk 17 22).

To the events preceding the parousia belongs, according to the uniform teaching of Jesus, Peter and Paul, the conversion of Israel (Mt 3 5-9; Lk 3 35; Acts 2 38; Lk 7 29; cf also Lk 21 20). The parousia is the “fulfillment” of the parousia. Hence the previous events can be called “preparing” or “preparing the parousia” (Lk 19 10). The “coming of the refreshing” and “the times of restoration of all things” is made dependent on the eschatological sending of the Christ to Israel, and this again is said to depend on the repentance and conversion and the blotting out of the sins of Israel; Rom 11, where the problem of the unbelief of Israel is solved by the twofold proposition: (1) that there is even now among Israel an election according to grace; (2) that in the future there will be a comprehensive conversion of Israel (vs 5.25-32).

Among the precursors of the parousia appears further the Antichrist. The word is found in the NT in 1 Jn 2 18.22; 4 3; 2 Jn ver 7 only, but the conception occurs also in the Synoptics, in Paul and in Rev. There is no instance of its earlier occurrence in Jewish lit. Antichrist may mean “in place of” and “against”; the former includes the latter. In Jn it is not clear that the heretical tendencies or hostile powers connected with the anti-Christian movement make false claims to the Messianic dignity. In the Synoptics the coming of false Christs and false prophets is predicted, and that not merely as among the nearer signs (Mk 13 6), but also in the remote eschatological period (Lk 21 8). With Paul, who describes the other when he introduces the subsequent coming of the Lord would take place, which would put a limit to the distressing Christ (2 Thess 2 6.8); his manner of working and its pernicious effect are set over against the manner in which the enthronement of the last beaks (vv. 9–12). Paul does not treat the idea as a new one; it must have come down from the OT and Jewish eschatology and have been more fully developed by NT prophecy; cf in Dnl 7 20; 8 10.11 the supernaturally magnified figure of the great enemy. According to Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos, 1895) and Bousset (Der Antichrist in der Überlieferung des Judentums, des NT und der alten Kirche, 1875) the origin of the conception of a final struggle between God and the great enemy must be sought in the ancient myth of Chaos conquered by Marduk; what had happened at the beginning of the world was transferred to the end. Then this was anthropomorphized, first in the form of a false Messiah, later in that of a political tyrant or oppressor. But there is no need to assume any other source for the idea of a last enemy than OT eschatological prophecy (Ezk and Dnl and Zec). And no evidence has so far been adduced that the Pauline idea of a counter-Messiah is of pre-Christian origin. This can only be maintained by carrying back into the older period the Antichrist tradition as found later among Jews and Christians. It is reasonable to assume in the present state of the evidence that it developed out of the profound ideas of the great eschatological enemy and that of the counter-Messiah, a product of Christian prophecy. In fact even the conception of a single last enemy does not occur in pre-Christian Jewish lit.; it is found for the first time in Apoc 10.12, which changes the general conception of 4 Ear to this effect. Even in the eschatological discourse of Jesus the idea is not yet unified, for false Christ and false prophets in the plural are spoken of, and the instigation of the antichrist iscribed to the devil. If anything presupposed, remains in the background. In the Epistle of Jn the same plural representation occurs (1 Jn 2 18.22; 2 Jn ver 7), although the idea of a personal Antichrist in whom the movement culminates is not only familiar to the author and the reader (1 Jn 2 18, "as ye heard that antichrist cometh"), but is also accepted by the writer (4 3, "This is the spirit of the antichrist, whereby ye have not heard that it cometh; and now it is in the world already"); of 2 Thess 2 7, "the mystery of lawlessness doth already work").

Various views have been proposed to explain the concrete features of the Pauline representation in 2 Thess 2 and that of Rev 13 and 17. According to C. H. W. N. Baur, in the first instance, the idea of the emperor, one of the heads of the great enemy, as the enemy, one of the heads of the great enemy, as the Antichrist, was taken over from the Graeco-Roman world, and this conception was assumed by the Apostle Paul in his discussions with the Corinthians. This is the view of Baur, who assumes that the conception of the Antichrist was a development of the idea of the Messiah, as assumed by Paul in his mind the person whom the Jews would acclaim as their Messiah. The idea would then be the precipitate of Paul's experience of hostility and persecution from the part of the Jews. He expected that this Jewish Messianic pretender would be helped by Satanic influence, overthrow the Rom power. The continuance of the Rom power is "that which restrains," or as embodied in the emperor, one that restrains now" (2 Thess 2 6.7). (For an interesting view in which the rôle played by these two powers are reversed, cf. Warfield in Expos, 3d ser., IV, 30–44.) The objection to this is that the lawless one," not merely from Paul's or the Christian point of view, but in his own avowed inten- tion, opposes and exalts himself against all that is called God or worshipped. This no Jewish pre- tending to the Messiahshead could possibly do: his very Messianic position would preclude it. And the conception of a counter-Christ does not necessarily exclude that the idea of Messiahship in Paul's mind has been raised far above its original national plane and assumed a universalistic character (cf. Zahn, Einleitung in das NP, 1, 171). Nor does the feature that according to ver 4, the lawless one" will take his seat in the temple favor the view in question, for the description of the temple beaks (vv. 9–12).
12. And the same interpretation seems to be required by the mysterious statements of ch 17, where the woman sitting upon the beast is the metropolis of the world-power, changing its seat together with the latter, yet so as to retain, like the latter in all its transformations, the same character wherein she bears the same name of Babylon (ver 5). Here as in ch 13 the beast has seven heads, i.e. passes through seven phases, which idea is also expressed by the representation that these seven heads are seven kings (ver 10); for, as in Dnl 7, the kings stand not for individual rulers, but for kingdoms, phases of the world-power. This explains why in ver 11 the beast is identified with one of the kings. When here the further explanation, going beyond ch 13, is added, that the beast was and is not and is about to come up out of the abyss (ver 8), and in vs 10,11 that of the seven kings five are fallen, one, the other is not yet come, and when he comes must continue a little while, to be followed by the eighth, who is identical with the beast that was and is not, and with one of the seven, the only way to reconcile these statements lies in assuming that "the beast," while in one sense a comprehensive figure for the world-power in all its phases, can also in another sense designate the supreme embodiment and most typical expression of this power in the past; in respect to this acute phase the beast was and is not and is to appear again, and this acute phase was one of seven successive forms of manifestation, and in its reappearance will add this number the eighth. Although a single scene in the employment of the figures thus results, this is no greater than when on the other view Nero is depicted both as "the beast" and as one of the heads of "the beast." Which concrete monarchies are meant by these terms is of course of less importance. For a suggestion of Zahn, op. cit., II, 624: (1) Egypt; (2) Assyria; (3) Babylon; (4) the Medo-Pers power; (5) the Graeco-Alexandrian power; (6) the Rom power; (7) a short-lived empire to succeed Rome; (8) the eighth and last phase, which will reproduce in its acute character the fifth, and will bring on the scene the Antichrist, the counterpart and, as it were, reincarnation of Antiochus Epiphanes. The see evidences how his present in the eighth and last phase of the beast, and this renders it possible for him to give in 17 9 another turn to the figure of the seven heads, interpreting it of the seven mountains on which the woman sits, but this apocalyptic looseness of handling and the intellectual objection to the view just outlined, since on any view the two incongruous explanations of the seven heads as seven mountains and seven kings stand side by side in vs 9 and 10. Nor should the mysterious number of 666 in 13 18 be appealed to in favor of the reference to the beast to Nero, for on the one hand quite a number of other equally plausible or implausible solutions of this riddle have been proposed, and on the other hand the interpretation of Nero is open to the serious objection, that in order to make out the required number from the letters of Nero's name this name has to be written in Heb characters and that with scriptio defectiva of Kesar (Neron Καισαρ) instead of Kesar, the former of which two peculiarities is out of keeping with the usage of the book elsewhere (cf Zahn, op. cit., II, 622, 624, 625, where the chief proposed explanations of the number 666 are recorded). Under the circumstances the interpretation of the figure of the beast and its heads must be allowed to pursue its course independently of the number 666, regard to which no certain conclusion appears attainable.

The following indicates the degree of definiteness to which, in the opinion of the writer, it is possible to go in the interpretation of the prophecy. The terms in which Paul speaks remind of Daniel's description of the "little horn," Similarly Rev attaches itself to the imagery of the beasts in Dnl. Both Paul and Rev also seem to allude to the self-deification of rulers in the Hellenistic and Rom world (of ZNTW, 1904, 385 ff). Both, therefore, appear to have in mind a politically organized world-power under a supreme head. Still in both cases this power is not viewed as the climax of enmity against God on account of its political activity as such, but distinctly on account of its self-assertion in the religious sphere, so that the whole conception is lifted to a higher plane, purely spiritual standards being applied in the judgment expressed. Paul so thoroughly applies this principle that in his picture the seductive, deceptive aspect of the movement in the sphere of false teaching is directly connected with the person of "the lawless one" himself (2 Thess 2 9-12), and not with a separate organ of false prophecy, as in Rev 13 11-17 (the second beast). In Rev, as shown above, the final and acute phase of anti-Christian hostility is clearly distinguished from its embodiment in the Rom empire and separated from the latter by an intermediate stage. In Paul, who stands at a somewhat earlier point in the development of NT prophecy, this is not so. For Paul, the "mystery of lawlessness" is already at work in his day, but this does not necessarily involve that the person of "the lawless one," subsequently to appear, must be connected with the same phase of the world-power as the latter. In fact Paul could and would reconcile this mystery already at work, since the succeeding phases being continuous, this will also insure the continuity between the general principle and its personal representative, even though the latter should appear in a latter stage of time. It is for Paul to determine how far Paul consciously looked beyond the power of the Rom empire to a later organization as the vehicle for the last anti-Christian effort. On the other hand, that Paul must have thought of "the lawless one" as already in existence at that time cannot be proven. It does not follow from the parallelism between his "revelation" and the parousia of Christ, for this "revelation" has for its correlate simply a previous hidden presence for the Rom empire extending to Paul's or the time of the Rom empire, far less a preexistence, like unto Christ's, in the supernatural world. Nor is present existence implied in what Paul says of "the locator power.

This, to be sure, is an objection at that time, that restraint is not exerted directly upon "the lawless one"; it relates to the power of which he will be the ultimate exponent; when this power, through the removal of the restraint, develops freely, its revelation follows. According to ver 9 his "parousia is according to the working of Satan," but whether this puts a supernatural aspect upon the initial act of his appearance or relates more to his subsequent presence and activity in the world in which he will be attended with the powers and signs and laying wonders, cannot be determined with certainty. But the element of the supernatural is certainly there, although it is evidently erroneous to conceive of "the lawless one" as an incarnation of Satan, literally speaking. The phrase "according to the working of Satan" excludes this, and "the lawless one" is a true human figure, "the man of sin" or "the man of lawlessness," according to another reading; cf the distinction between Satan and "the beast" (Rev 20 14), ver 8. The "power" and "signs" and "wonders" are not merely "seeming"; the genitive paideutikos is not intended to take them out of the category of the supernatural, but simply means that what they are intended to accredit is a lie, viz. the Divine dig-uity of "the lawless one." Most difficult of all is the determination of what Paul means by the hindering power or the hinderer in ver. 7. The most common view refers this to the Rom authority as the basis of civil order and protection, but there are serious objections to this. If, as 2 Thess 2:4, 7; 22; 2 Pet 3:3; 1 Thess 4:15; 1 Cor 15:19; cf. Ezr 4:45; 7:22; and all near dates to the Antichrist in any way with the Rom power, he cannot very well have sought the opposite principle in the same quarter. And not only the hindering power but also the hindering person seems to be a unit, which latter does not apply to the Rom empire, which had a succession of rulers. It is further difficult to dismiss the thought that the hindering principle or person must be more or less supernatural, since the supernatural factor in the work of "the lawless one" is something attractive in the old view of von Hofmann, who assumed that Paul borrowed from Dnl, besides other features, also this feature that the historical conflict on earth has a supernatural background in the work of "the lawless one." Precise definition, however, is impossible. Finally it should be noticed that, as in the eschatological discourse of Jesus "the abomination of desolation" appears connected with an apostasy within the church, which latter does not apply to the Rom empire, so Paul joins to the appearance of "the lawless one" the destructive effect of error among many that are lost (2 Thess 2:9–12). The idea of the Antichrist in general and that of the apostasy in particular remain for us that we may expect an uninterrupted progress of the Christianization of the world until the parousia. As the reign of the truth will be extended, so the forces of evil will gather strength, esp. toward the end. The universal sway of the kingdom of God cannot be expected from resuscitation of one or many, but it requires the eschatological interposition of God.

In regard to the manner and attending circumstances of the parousia we learn from Paul that it will be widely visible, like the lightning (Mt 25:31; Lk 17:24; the point of comparison does not lie in the suddenness); and in the manner of the unbelieving it will come unawares (Mt 24:42; Lk 17:26; 32; 1 Thess 5:2). A sign will precede, "the sign of the Son of Man," in regard to the nature of which nothing can be determined. Christ will come "on the clouds," in clouds ("in a cloud", "with great power and glory") (Mt 24:30; Mk 13:26; Lk 21:27); attended by angels (Mt 24:31 [cf 13:41; 16:27; Mk 8:38; Lk 9:26]; Mk 13:27; 2 Thess 1:7).

VI. The Resurrection.—The resurrection coincides with the parousia and the arrival of the future age (Lk 20:35; Jn 6:40; 1 Thess 4:16). From 2 Thess 2:13; 4:16 it has been inferred that the dead rise before the descent of Christ from heaven is completed; the sounds described in the later passage are then interpreted as sounds accompanying the descent (cf Ex 19:16; Is 27:13; Mt 24:31; 1 Cor 15:52; He 12:19; Rev 10:7; 11:15; "the trump of God=the great eschatological trumpet"). The two words for the resurrection are egeirein, "to wake," and anastómein, "to raise," the latter less common in the active than in the intransitive sense.

The NT teaches in some passages with sufficient clearness that all the dead will be raised, but the emphasis rests to such an extent on the resurrection of the righteous that the NT differs from Paul, where it is closely connected with the doctrine of the Spirit, that its reference to non-believers receives little notice. This was already partly so in the OT (Jer 31:38; 51:2; Dan 12:2). In the intervening Jewish lit., the doctrine varies, sometimes a resurrection of the martyrs alone is taught (En 90); sometimes of all the righteous dead of Israel (Ps Sol 3:10 ff; En 91–94); sometimes of all the righteous and of some wicked Israelites (En 1:36); sometimes of all the righteous and all the wicked (4 Ezra 2:36); all these passages, however, refer to the Pharisees the doctrine that only the righteous will share in the resurrection. It ought to be noticed that these apocalyptic writings which affirm the universality of the resurrection present the same phenomena as the NT, viz., that they contain passages which so exclusively reflect upon the resurrection in its bearing upon the destiny of the righteous as to create the appearance that no other resurrection was believed in. Among the Pharisees probably a diversity of opinion prevailed on this question, which Jos will have obliterated. Our Lord in His argument with the Sadducees proves only the resurrection of the pious, but does not exclude the other (Mk 12:20–27); "the resurrection of the just" in Lk 14:14 may suggest a twofold resurrection. It has been held that the phrase, ἡ αναστάσις ἡ ἐκ νεκρῶν (Lk 20:35; Acts 4:2), always describes the resurrection of a limited number from among the dead, whereas ἡ αναστάσις ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ (I Cor 15:23) denotes a universal resurrection (Plummer, Comm. on Lk 20:35), but such a distinction breaks down before an examination of the passages.

The inference to the universality of the resurrection, sometimes drawn from the universality of the judgment is scarcely valid, since the idea of a judgment of disembodied spirits is not inconceivable and actually occurs. On the other hand the punishment of the judged is explicitly affirmed to include the body (Lk 16:24), and it cannot be seen that the term "resurrection" is ever in the NT eschatologically employed without reference to the body, of the quickening of the spirit simply (against, Fries, in ZNTW, 1900, 291 ff). The sense of Our Lord's argument with the Sadducees does not require that the patriarchs were at the time of Moses in possession of the resurrection, but only that they were enjoying the covenant-life, which would in due time inevitably issue in the resurrection of their bodies. The resemblance (or "equality") of the "resurrection of a great king" (Lk 16:25) does not consist in the disembodied state, but in the absence of marriage and propagation. It has been suggested that the Hebrews contains no direct evidence for a bodily resurrection (Charles, Eschatology, 177), but of it there is an implied assumption. The spiritualism of the eschatological points, in connection with its Pauline type of teaching, to the conception of a pneumatic heavenly body, rather than to a disembodied state.

The NT confines the event of the resurrection to a single epoch, and nowhere teaches, as chiliasm assumes, a resurrection in two stages, one, at the parousia, of saints or mar­tyrs, and a second one at the close of the millennium. Although the doctrine of a temporary Messianic kingdom, preceding the consummation of the world, is of pre-Christian Jewish origin, it had not been developed in Judaism to the extent of assuming a repeated resurrection; the entire resurrection is always placed at the end. The passages to which this doctrine of a double resurrection appeals are chiefly Acts 3:19–21; 1 Cor 15:23–28; Phil 3:9–11; 1 Thess 4:13–18; 2 Thess 1:5–12; Rev 20:1–6. In the first-named passage Paul refers to the period when Israel shall have repented and turned to God. The arrival of these coincides with the sending of the Christ to the Jews, i.e. with the parousia. It is argued that Peter in ver 21, "whom the heavens must [present tense] receive until the times of restoration of all things," places after this coming of Jesus to His people a renewed withdrawal of the Lord into heaven, to be followed in turn, after a certain interval, by the restoration of all things. The sequence of events, presupposed in Col 1:27, is that of the millennium with Christ present among His people. While this interpretation is not grammatically impossible, there is no room for it in the general scheme of the Petrine eschatology, for the parousia of Christ is elsewhere represented as bringing not a provisional presence, but as bringing in the day of the Lord, the day of judgment (Acts 2:17–21). The correct view is that “the seasons of refreshing” and “the times of restoration of all things” are identical; the latter phrase relates to the prospects of Israel as well as the former, and should not be understood in the later technical sense. The present tense in ver 21, “must receive,” does not indicate that the reception of Christ into heaven still lies in the future, but formulates a fixed eschatological principle, viz. that after His first appearance the Christian must be withdrawn into heaven till the hour for the parousia has come. In 1 Cor 15:22–28 two tignata, “orders,” of the resurrection are distinguished, and it is urged that these two orders “belong together.” But there is no reflection here upon non-believers at all, the two “orders” are Christ, and they that are Christ’s. “The end” in ver 24 is not the final stage in the resurrection, i.e. the resurrection of non-believers, but the kingdom of God and other eschatological events. The kingdom of Christ which comes to a close with the end is not a kingdom beginning with the parousia, but dates from the exaltation of Christ; it is to be Paul not future but already in operation. In 1 Cor 15:20 the resurrection is not that the dead were raised as the Gentiles who knew no resurrection, but whatever, i.e. they had doubted the fact of the resurrection as such. Paul accordingly gives them in ver 14 the general assurance that in the resurrection of Jesus that of believers is guaranteed. The vb. “receive” in ver 15 does not imply that there was thought of precedence in the enjoyment of glory, but is only an emphatic way of affirming that the dead will not be one moment behind in inheriting the living the blessedness of the parousia. In ver 17, “so shall we ever be with the Lord,” we have the conception of a provisional kingdom. 2 Thess 1:5–12 contains merely the general thought that sufferings and glory, persecution and the inheritance of the kingdom are linked together. There is nothing to show that this glory and kingdom are aught else but the final state, the kingdom of God (ver 5). In Phil 3:9–11, it is claimed, Paul represents attainment to the resurrection as dependent on special effort on his part, therefore as something not in store for all believers. Since the general resurrection pertains to all, a special grace of resurrection must be meant, i.e. inclusion in the number of those to be raised at the parousia, at the opening of the millennial kingdom. The answer to this is, that it was quite possible to Paul to make the resurrection as such depend on the believer’s progress in grace and conformity to Christ, seeing that it is not an event out of all relation to his spiritual development, but the climax of an organic process of transformation begun in this life. An interpretation of all this is given to the parousia (cf for the Pauline passage Vos, “The Pauline Eschatology and Chiliasm,” PTR, 1911, 26–60). The passage Rev 20:1–6 at first sight much favors the conception of a millennial reign of Christ, principally in the sense of the millennium, but the context of the passage precludes this idea and marks by a suspension of the activity of Satan. And it is urged that the sequence of visions places this millennium after the parousia of Christ narrated in ch 19. The question of the temporal sequence in Rev 20:1–6 means nothing. In other parts of the book the principle of “recapitulation,” i.e. of cotemporaneousness of things successively depicted, seems to underlie the visions, and numbers are elsewhere in the book meant symbolically. These facts leave open the possibility that the thousand years are synchronous with the earlier developments recorded, and symbolically describe the state of glorified life enjoyed with Christ in heaven by the martyrs during the intermediate period preceding the parousia. The term “millennial” is employed, do not suggest an anticipated bodily resurrection. The ser speaks of “souls” which “lived” and “reigned,” and finds in this the first resurrection. The scene of this life and reign is in heaven, where also the “souls” of the martyrs are behold (6:9). The words “this is the first resurrection” may be a pointed disavowal of a more realistic (chiliasm) interpretation of the same phrase. The symbolism of the thousand years consists in this, that it contrasts the glorious state of the martyrs with the dark and evil state of the antichrist. Paul it appears, has passed here on earth, and on the other hand with the eternal life of the consummation. The binding of Satan for this period marks the first eschatological conquest of Christ over the powers of evil, as distinguished from such apocalyptic registral events as displayed by Satan toward the end in bringing up against the church still other forces not hitherto introduced into the conflict. In regard to a book as enigmatical, it were presumptuous to speak with any degree of precision. It is not that the marriage of the first-born (22:19) is of the idea of the millennium from the eschatological teaching of the NT elsewhere ought to render the exegete cautious before affirming its presence here (cf Warfield, “The Millennium and the Apocalypse,” PTR, 1904, 599–617).

The resurrection of believers bears a twofold aspect. On the one hand it belongs to the forensic side of salvation. On the other hand it belongs to the pneumatic transforming side of the saving process. Of the former, traces appear only in the teaching of Jesus (Mt 5:9; 22:29–32; Lk 20:33–36). Paul clearly ascribes to the believer’s resurrection the salvific significance as to that of Christ (Rom 8:10–23; 1 Cor 15:30–32.55–58). Far more prominent with him is, however, the other, the pneumatic interpretation. Both the origin of the resurrection life and the continuance of the resurrection state are dependent on the Spirit (Rom 8:10.11; 1 Cor 15:45–49; Gal 6:8). The resurrection is the climax of the believer’s transformation (Rom 8:11; Gal 6:8). This part ascribed to the Spirit in the resurrection is not to be explained from what the OT teaches about the Spirit as the source of physical life, for to this the NT hardly ever refers; it is rather to be explained as the correlate of the general Pauline principle that the Spirit is the determining factor of the heavenly state in the coming soon. This pneumatic character of the resurrection also links together the resurrection of Christ and that of the believer. This idea is not yet found in the Synoptics; it finds expression in Jn 5:22–29; 11:25; 14:6.19. In early apocalyptic teaching a trace of it may be found in Acts 4:2. We find it in the beginning as a well-established principle. The continuity between the working of the Spirit here and His part in the resurrection does not, however, lie in the body. The resurrection is not the culmination of the spiritual transformation that begins in this life undergoes. There is no preformation of the spiritual body on earth. Rom 8:10.11; 1 Cor 15 49; 2 Cor 5 1-2; Phil 3 12 positively exclude this, and 2 Cor 3 18; 4 7-18 do not require it. The second stage, which heralds the transformation through the beholding (or reflecting) of the glory of Christ as in a mirror is not a bodily but inward glory, produced by illumination of the gospel. And the manifestation of the life of Jesus in the body or in the mortal flesh refers to the preservation of bodily life in the midst of deadly perils. Equally without support is the view that at one time Paul placed the investiture with the new body immediately after death. It has been assumed that this, together with the view that it should not last, is an instance of Paul's eschatological belief. The initial stage of this process is found in 1 Thess 4:10; for the resurrection is that of an earthly body. The next stage is represented by Col 1: the future body is pneumatic in character, although not to be received until the parousia. The third stage removes the inconsistency implied in the preceding position between the character of the body and the time of its reception, by placing the latter at the moment of death (Rom. Col., and by an extreme flight of faith the view is even more approached that the resurrection body is in process of development now (Teichmann, Charles). This scheme has no real basis of fact. 1 Thess does not treat of any eschatological body (cf. 4 14-15). The second stage given is the only truly Pauline one, nor can it be shown that the apostle ever abandoned it. For the third position named finds no support in 2 Cor 5 1-10; Rom 8 19; Col 3 4. The progress of the argument is not 15 1-10 to 4 17 followed and cannot be here given in detail. Our understanding of the main drift of the passage, put into paraphrase, is as follows: we feel assured of the eternal weight of glory (4 17), because we know that we shall receive, after our earthly tent-body shall be dissolved (so sub.), a new body, a supernatural house for our spirit, to be possessed eternally in the heavens. As sureproof of this lies in the heightened form which our desire for this future state assumes. For it is not mere desire to obtain a new body, but specifically to obtain it as soon as possible, without an intervening period of nakedness, i.e. of a disembodied state of the spirit. Such would be possible, if it were given us to survive till the parousia, in which case we would be clothed upon with glory. As it is the divine, natural body, the old body not having to be put off first before the new can be put on, but the new body being superimposed upon the old, so that no "unclothing" would have to take place first, what is mortal is not intended nor even involved (15 52 f.). And we are justified in cherishing this supreme aspiration, since the ultimate goal set for us in any case, even if we should have to die first and to unclothe and then to put on the new body over the naked spirit, since the ultimate goal, I say, excludes under all circumstances a state of nakedness at the moment of the parousia (ver 3). Since, then, such a new embodied state is our destiny in any event, we must long for that mode of reaching it which involves least delay and least distress and avoids intermediate nakedness. (This on the reading in ver 3 of ei ge kai endusamenoi ou gynnoi keurrenthēmata. If the reading ei ge kai edusamenoi be adopted the rendering of ver 3 will have to be: "If so be that also having put off [i.e. having died], we shall not at the end be found naked." If eiper ge kai edusamenoi be chosen it will be: "Although even having put off [i.e. having died] we shall not at the end be found naked." These other readings do not materially alter the meaning of the passage will be seen to rest on the pointed distinction between being "clothed upon," change at the parousia without death (vs 24), to be "unclothed," loss of the body in death with nakedness resulting (ver 4), and "being clothed," putting on of the new body after a state of nakedness (ver 3). Interpreted as above, the passage indeed shows that the instantaneous endowment with the spiritual body immediately after this life, but only on the supposition that the end of this life will be at the parousia, not for the case that death should intervene before, which latter possibility is distinctly left open. In Rom 8 19 what will happen at the end to believers is called a "revealing of the sons of God," not because their new body existed previously, but because their status as sons of God existed before, and this status will be revealed through the bringing upon them of the glorious body. Col 3 3.4 speaks of a life . . . hid with Christ in God," and of the "manifestation" of believers with Christ in glory at the parousia, but "life" does not imply bodily existence, and while the "manifestation" at the parousia is the body, it does not imply that this body must have been acquired long before, as is the case with Christ's body. In conclusion it should be noted that there is ample evidence in the later epistles that Paul continued to describe the resurrection body at the parousia (2 Cor 5 1-8; Phil 3 20.21). The main passage informing us as to the nature of the resurrection body is 1 Cor 15 35-58. The apostle here does not concern the substance of the future body, but its kind (cf ver 35 "With Body what manner of body do they come?"). Not until ver 50 is the deeper question of difference in substance touched upon. So, for example, the figure of the figure of "sowing" is not that of identity of substance, but rather this, that the impossibility of forming a concrete conception of the resurrection body is no proof of its impossibility, because in all vegetable growth there is the same incompleteness, the same inadequacy like that which is sown, a body the nature and appearance of which are determined by the will of God. We have no right to press the figure in other directions, to solicit from it answers to other questions. That there is to be a real connection between the present and the future body is implied rather than directly affirmed. Ver 36 shows that the distinction between the earthly body and a garm of life in it, to be intrusted with it to the grave and then to be quickened at the last to new life (ver 39) = spiritual mind, for what is sown is the body; it dies and is quickened in its entirety. Esp. the turn given to the figure in ver 37—that of a naked grain putting on the plant as a garment—proves that it is neither vegetable nor protoplasmic that is in the apostle's mind, for it is said of the seed that it dies; which does not apply to the Pneuma (cf also ver 44). The fact is that in this entire discussion the subjective spirit of the believer remains entirely out of consideration; the matter is treated entirely from the standpoint of the body. So far as the Pneuma enters into it, it is the objective Spirit, the Spirit of Christ. As to the time of the sowing, some writers take the view that this corresponds to the entire earthly life, not to the moment of burial only (so already Calvin, recently Teichmann and Charles). In vs 42-43 there are points of contact for this, inasmuch as esp. the three last predicates "in dishonor," "in weakness," "a natural body," seem more applicable to the living than to the dead body. At any rate, if the conception is thus widened, the act of burial is certainly included in the sowing. The objection arising from the difficulty of forming a concrete conception of the future body is further met in vs 39-41, where Paul argues from the multitude of bodily forms God has at His disposal. This thought is illustrated from the ani-nal world (ver 30); from the difference between the heavenly and the earthly bodies (ver 40); from the difference existing among the heavenly bodies themselves (ver 41). The argument is indicated by the interchange of two words for "other," ἄλλας and hêteras, the former designating difference of species within the genus, the latter difference of genus, a distinction lost in the Eng. versions. In all this the reasoning revolves not around the substance of the bodies but around their kind, quality, appearance (stderr in ver 39 = σῶμα, "body," not = "flesh"). The conclusion drawn is that the resurrection body will differ greatly in kind from the present body. It will be hêteros, not merely ἄλλας, from the points of difference are enumerated in vs. 42-43. Four contrasts are named; the first three in each case appear to be the result of the fourth. The dominating antithesis is that between the σῶμα psuchikôn and the σῶμα pneumaticô (vs 44). Still Paul can scarcely mean to teach that "corruption," "dishonor," "weakness" are in the same sense necessary and natural results of the "psychical" character of the earthly body, as the corresponding opposites are necessary and natural consequences of the pneumatic character of the resurrection body. The sequel shows that the "psychical body" was given at creation, and according to ver 53 corruption and death go together, whereas death is not the result of creation but the outcome of sin (of φαναρία, of σακρίζω, of σακρός) as the form teaching elsewhere. Hence also the predicate σαιρικός is avoided in vs. 46-47, where the reference is to creation, for this word is always associated in Paul with sin. The connection, therefore, between the "natural (psuchikô)" and the "psychical" attributes conjoined with it, will have to be so conceived, that in virtue of the former character, the body, though it need not of itself, yet will fall a prey to the latter when sin enters. In this lies also the explanation of the term "psychical body." This means a body in which the psychê, the natural soul, is the vitalizing principle, sufficient to support life, but not sufficient to that supernatural, heavenly plane, where it is forever immune to death and corruption. The question must be asked, however, why Paul goes back to the original state of man's body and does not content himself with contrasting the body in the state of sin and in the state of eternal life. The answer is found in the exigency of the argument and the nature of the argument for the possibility of a different body drawn from analogy, an argument drawn from the typical character of the original creation-body. The body of creation, on the principle of prefiguration, pointed already forward to a higher body to be received in the second stage of the world-process: "if there exists a psychical body, there exists also a pneumatic body" (ver 44). The proof lies in Gen 2 7. Some think that Paul here adopts the Philonic doctrine of the creation of two worlds and means 435 as a quotation from Gen 1 27. But the sequence is against this, for Paul's spiritual man appears on the scene last, not first, as in Philo. Nor can the statement have been meant as a correction of Philo's sequence, for Paul cannot have overlooked that, once a double creation were found in Gen 1 and 2, then Philo's sequence was the only possible one, to correct which would have amounted to correcting Scripture. If Paul does here correct Philo, it must be in the sense that he rejects the entire Philonic exposition by Gen 6 of the twofold creation (cf 1 Cor 11 7). Evidently for Paul, Gen 2 7 taken by itself contains the proof of his proposition, that there is both a psychical and a pneumatic body. Paul regarded the creation of the first Adam as a typical light. The first creation is only the provisional form in which God's purpose with reference to man was embodied, and in so far looked forward to a higher embodiment of the same idea on a higher pneumatic plane (cf Rom 8 14). The first man is of the earth, the second man is of heaven (1 Cor 15 47); "of" or "from heaven" does not designate heavenly material, for even here, by not giving the opposite to chôkîn, "earthly," Paul avoided the question of substantiality. A "pneumatic" body is not, as many assume, a body made out of pneuma as a higher substance, for in that case Paul would have had pneumatikôn ready at hand as the contrast to chôkîn. Only the question of substance is touched upon in ver 30: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," but the apostle does not say what will take their place. Cf further, for the non-substantial meaning of pneumatikôn, Rom 15 27; 1 Cor 9 11; 10 34-3; Eph 1 5; 5 19; 6 12; Col 1 9. The only positive thing which we learn in this direction is formal, viz. that the resurrection body of the believer will be the image of that of Christ (ver 49).

VII. The Change of Those Living at the Parousia. —This is confined to believers. Of a change in the body of non-believers found living or raised at the parousia the NT has little to say. Referring to this subject are 1 Cor 15 51-53; 2 Cor 5 1-; Phil 3 20.21. The second of these has already been discussed: it represents the change under the figure of a putting-on of the heavenly body over the earthy body and the fact that the mortal is swallowed up so as to disappear by life. This representation starts with the new body by which the old body is absorbed. In 1 Cor 15 and Phil 3, on the other hand, the point of departure is from the old body which is changed into a new difference between the resurrection and the change of the living is brought out in 2 Cor 5 1-5 in the two figures of "putting on" and "putting on over;" ἐνισχύομαι and ἐπανασχηματιζομαι. The passage finds in 1 Cor 15 51-53 the description of a process kept in such general terms as to be equally applicable to those raised and to those transformed alive. If this be adopted it yields new evidence for the continuity between the present body and the resurrection body. Others, however, find here the expectation that Paul and his readers will "all" survive until the parousia, and be changed alive, in which case no light is thrown on the resurrection process. The more plausible exegesis is that which joins the negative "not" instead of to the vb., which makes Paul affirm that "not all" will die, but that all, whether dead or surviving, will be changed at the parousia; the difficulty of the exegesis is reflected in the early attempts to change the reading. In Phil 3 20.21 there are no data to decide whether the apostle conceives of himself and his readers as living at the moment of the parousia or speaks generally so as to cover both possibilities.

VIII. The Judgment. —The judgment takes place on a "day" (Mt 7 22; 10 15; 24 36; Lk 10 12; 21 34; 1 Cor 1 8; 3 13; 2 Tim 4 8; Rev 6 17), but this rests on the OT conception of "the day of Jehovah," and is not to be taken literally, whence also "hour" is interchangeably with "day" (Mk 13 32; Rev 14 7). While not confined to an astronomical day the judgment is plainly represented as a definitely circumscribed transaction, not as an indefinite process. It coincides with its parousia. Of a judgment immediately after death, the NT is nowhere speaking. Gen 9 25 is the only NT reference to the locality of the earth, as would seem to follow from its dependence on the parousia (Mt 13 41.42; Mk 13 26.27), although some infer from 1 Thess 4 17 that, as far as believers are concerned, it will take place in the daytime. But this will not speak of the judgment, only of the parousia and the meeting of believers with Christ. The judge is God
In Phil also 2:17; 10). He does nothing, in the sense of the OT conception of "the day of Jehovah", is changed into "the last day" by the Synoptics (1 Cor 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10). In the one representation passes over into the other. Jesus always claims for Himself the judgment in the strictly forensic sense of the term. His presence in the Hebrews = 5:10. In the Fourth Gospel, it is true, He denies that His present activity involves the task of judging (Jn 8:15; 12:47). That this, however, does not exclude His eschatological role as judge, is apparent from Mt 26:27-29, which culminates in His passion and death, the judgment of the world and the Prince of the world (13:11; 14:30; 16:11). A share of the judgment is assigned to God and to His saints (Mt 16:27; 17:1; 18:28; 21:21; Ex 15:9; Rev 1:5; 14:1; 17:8). This one organic product of "work" is treated back to the root of faith (1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 3:1, where the gen. pisteus is a gen. of origin), and Paul speaks as a rule not of pistein but of praisein, i.e. of the practice, the systematic doing, of that which is good.

The judgment assigns to each individual his eternal destiny, which is absolute in its character either of blessedness or of punishment, though admittedly of degrees within these two states. Only two groups are recognized, those of the condemned and of the saved (Mt 25:31-34; Jn 5:29); no intermediate group with as yet undetermined destiny anywhere appears. The degree of guilt is fixed according to the knowledge of the Divine will possessed by the agent who acts.

The judgment is described as that of a never-dying God who makes his power evident. While this adjective etymologically need mean no more than "what extends through a certain season or period of time," yet its eschatological usage correlates it everywhere with the "coming age," and this age being endless in duration, every state or destiny connected with it partakes of the same character.

It is therefore theologically impossible to give a relative sense to such phrases as pûr aînôn, "eternal fire" (Mt 18:8; 25:41; Jude ver 7), klôsis aînôn, "eternal punishment" (Mt 25:46), déthros aînôn, "eternal destruction" (2 Thess 1:9), kriasa aînôn or kriema aînôn, "eternal judgment" (Mt 3:29; He 6:2). This is also shown by the figurative representations which unfold the import of the adj.: the "unquenchable fire" (Mt 3:12), "the never-dying worm" (Mt 9:43-48), "the smoke of their torment for ever and ever" (Rev 4:8), "tormented day and night forever and ever" (Rev 14:11), "tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev 20:10).

The endless duration of the state of punishment is also required by the absolute eternity of its counterpart, zôi aînôn, "eternal life" (Mt 25:46).
In support of the doctrine of conditional immortality it has been urged that other terms descriptive of the fate of the condemned, such as ἀπόλεια, “perdition,” ἀθάνατος, “immortality,” ἁθορία, “corruption,” ὀλέθρος, “destruction,” ἀπόλυτην, “death,” point rather to a cessation of being and point to the destruction of the person's consciousness without any resurrection to come. This interpretation of these terms, which everywhere in the OT and the NT designate a state of existence with an undesirable content, never the pure negation of existence, just as “life” in Scripture describes a positive mode of being, never more existence as such. Perdition, corruption, destruction, death, are predicated in all such cases of the welfare or the ethical spiritual character of man, without implying the annihilation of his physical existence. No more support can be found in the NT for the hypothesis of an ἀποκατάστασις πάνω, “restoration of all things,” i.e. absolute universalism implying the ultimate salvation of all men. The phrase occurs only in Acts 3:21, where, however, it has no cosmic reference but relates to the fulfillment of the promises to Israel. Jesus uses it of the restoration of the Jews to their land after the Captivity, Philo of the restoration of inheritances in the year of jubilee (cf Mal 4:6; Mt 17:11; Mk 9:12; Acts 1:6). Absolute universalism here is the state is that of the NT (Acts 1:6; 1 Cor 15:22,58; Eph 1:10; Col 1:20), but in all these passages only a cosmic or national universalism can be found, not the doctrine of the salvation of all individuals, which latter would bring the statements in question in direct contradiction to the most explicit deliverances of Paul elsewhere on the principle of predestination and the eternity of the destiny of the wicked.

IX. The Consummative State.—Side by side with the “future age,” and characterizing it from a less formal or recondite point of view, the phrase “Kingdom of God” designates the consummative state, as it will exist for believers after the judgment. Jesus, while making the kingdom a present reality, yet continues to speak of it in accordance with its original eschatological usage as the “kingdom” which lies in the future (Mt 13:43; 56:34; 56:29; Mk 9:47; Lk 12:32; 13:28,29; 21:31). With Paul the phrase bears preponderantly an eschatological sense, although occasionally he uses it of the present state of believers (Rom 14:7; 1 Cor 4:20; 6:9,10; 15:24; 50; Gal 5:21; Eph 5:5; Col 1:13:4:11; 1 Thess 2:12; 2 Thess 1:5; 2 Tim 4:1.18). Elsewhere in the NT the eschatological use occurs in He 12:28; Jas 2:5; 2 Pet 1:11; Rev 21:5. The idea of the kingdom is universal, and it is used in both a temporal, to which does not exclude that certain privileges are spoken of with special reference to Israel. Although the eschatological kingdom differs from the present kingdom largely in the fact that it will receive an external, visible embodiment, yet this does not hinder that even in it the core is constituted by those spiritual realities and relations which make the present kingdom. Still it will have its outward form as the doctrine of the resurrection and the regenerated earth (Gal 4:26) teach. Hence the phrases in which Jesus speaks of it, such as eating, drinking, reclining at table, while not to be taken sensually, should not on the other hand be interpreted allegorically, as if they stood for wholly internal spiritual processes: they evidently point to, or at least include, outward states and activities, of which our life in the future in the kingdom, “life” remains in the Synoptics an exclusively eschatological conception. It is objectively conceived: the state of blessedness the saints will exist in; not subjectively as a potency in man or a process of development (Mt 7:14; 18:8,9; 19:16,29; 25:46; Mk 10:30). In Jn “life” becomes a present state, and in connection with this the idea is subjectivized, it becomes a process of growth and expansion. Points of contact for this in the Synoptics may be found in Mt 8:25, the spiritual interpretation of the sea and the other elements. When this eschatological life is characterized as αἰώνιος, “eternal,” the reference is not exclusively to its eternal duration, but the word has, in addition to this, a qualitative connotation; it describes the kind of life that belongs to the consummate state (cf the use of the adj. with other nouns in this sense: 2 Cor 5:1; 2 Tim 2:10; He 5:9; 9:12. 15; 2 Pet 1:11, and the unfolding of the content of the idea in 1 Pet 4). With Paul “life” has sometimes the same eschatological sense (Rom 2:7; 5:17; Tit 1:2; 3:7), but most often it is conceived as already given in the present state, owing to the close association with the Spirit (Rom 6:11; 7:4,8. 11; 8:6; Gal 2:19; 6:5; Eph 4:18). In its ultimate analysis the Pauline conception of “life,” as well as that of Jesus, is that of something dependent on communion with God (Mt 23:27=Lk 20:38; Rom 8:6.7; Eph 4:18). Another Pauline conception associated with the consummate state is that of an all in all (Rom 15:28), where, conceived as a reflection of the glory of God, and it is this that to the mind of Paul gives it religious value, not the external radiance in which it may manifest itself as such. Hence the element of "oath" is ascribed to it (Rom 15:28; 2 Cor 1:21; 9:23; 1 Cor 15:43). It is not confined to the physical sphere (2 Cor 3:18; 4:16.17). The outward doxa is prized by Paul as a vehicle of revelation, an exponent of the inward state of acceptance with God (2 Cor 11:7). The consummation of the final state after a highly theocentric fashion (1 Cor 15:28); it is the state of immediate vision of and perfect communion with God and Christ; the future life alone can bring the perfected sonship (Rom 6:10; 8:23,29; cf Lk 20:30; 2 Cor 4:4; 6:7,8; 13:4; Phil 1:23; Col 2:13; 3:3,4,; 1 Thess 4:17).

The scene of the consummative state is the new heaven and the new earth, which are called into being by the renewed earth (cf the reference to Gen 5:28). In its final comprehensive state (Mt 5:18; 19:28; 24:35; 1 Cor 7:31; Heb 10:12; 12:26,27; 2 Pet 3:10; 1 Jn 2:17; Rev 21,1, in which last passage, however, some exegetes understand the city to be a symbol of the church, the people of God. The idea of the presence of the present world is not taught (cf the comparison of the future world-configuration with the Deluge in 2 Pet 3:6). The central abode of the redeemed will be in heaven, although the renewed earth will remain accessible to them and a part of the inheritance (Mt 5:5; Jn 14:23; Rom 8:18-22; and the closing visions of the Apocalypse).

X. The Intermediate State.—In regard to the state of the dead, previously to the parousia and the resurrection, the NT is far less explicit than the Synoptics in its treatment of what belongs to general eschatology. The following points may here briefly be noted.

1. The state of death is frequently represented as “sleeping,” just as the act of dying as a “falling asleep” (Mt 9:24; Jn 4:9; 11:11; 1 Cor 7:39; 15:31, 6:18.20.51; 1 Thess 4:13.15; 2 Pet 3:4). This usage, while also purely Gr, rests on the OT. There is this difference, that in the NT (despite the equally apocalyptic books) the conception is chiefly used with reference to the righteous dead, and has associated with it the thought of their blessed awakening in the resurrection, whereas in the OT it is indiscriminately applied to all the dead and without such connotation. With Paul the word always occurs of believers. The
